EACHARD, John, D.D., b. in Suffolk, 1636; d. as Master of Catherine Hall, in Cambridge, July 7, 1697. He is famous for his essay on The grounds and occasions of the contempt of the clergy and religion, inquired into in a letter to R. L. (1670), with its sequel, Observations on An Answer to the Inquiry, in a second letter to the same (1671), and for his vigorous attacks upon Thomas Hobbes. He was master of a light, bantering, satirical style, which was very effective. He attributed the failure of the clergy to their defective education, small salaries, and lack of spirituality, and illustrated these points very humorously. His Works were published, London, 1705, best edition, 1784, 3 vols., with account of his life and writings.

EADFRID, Bishop of Lindisfarne 698-721, wrote and illuminated the celebrated Evangeliarium, known as the Durham Book, or Lindisfarne Gospels, to which Aldred added an interlinear gloss in the Anglo-Northumbrian dialect. The manuscript, which is one of the most beautiful in Europe, and noticed by every writer on palæography, is preserved among the Cottonian manuscripts of the British Museum, and has been edited by Stevenson and Waring for the Surtees Society, and by Kemble, Hardwick, and Skeat, for the Syndics of the University of Cambridge. The gloss has been printed by Karl Bouterwek: Die vier Evangelien in altnordhumbrischer Sprache, 1857.

EADIE, John, D.D., LL.D., pastor, professor of theology, and commentator on some of the Pauline Epistles; b. at Alva, Stirlingshire, Scotland, May 9, 1810; d. at Glasgow, Saturday, June 3, 1876. He was educated at the University of Glasgow and in the theological seminary of the United Secession, now United Presbyterian, Church. He was ordained, on Sept. 21, 1835, to the pastorate of the Cambridge-street Church, Glasgow, which he retained until, in 1863, he removed, with a portion of his people, to form the new Lansdowne church, of which he was minister until his death. As early as his student days, he showed his leaning to the department in which he achieved his greatest success by writing an able article in the Edinburgh Theological Magazine for 1832, in review of Moses Stuart's commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews; and he had so diligently given himself to biblical study in later years, that, on the death of Dr. John Mitchell, he was elected by the synod of his church (May 5, 1843) to the professorship of biblical literature in its divinity hall. Such an appointment at that time did not involve, as it now does, the dissolution of the pastoral relationship; for then the seminary sat for only two months in the year, those of August and September, and the professors were at once pastors and professors. But in the professorship Eadie found the great sphere of his life, and now began that course of industry which resulted in the extensive authorship which is indicated below. He held the offices of pastor and professor for thirty-three years; and just after the synod had decided to remodel its theological seminary by lengthening its annual session from two to five months, shortening its curriculum from five to three years, increasing its corps of professors, and dissolving the relationship between them and their congregations, he died, on the 3d of June, 1876.

As a preacher, Eadie was satisfying rather than striking. His manner was not elegant, and his utterance was often thick; but he was always, like Elihu, "full of matter," and one could not listen to him without learning much at his lips. He was especially excellent as an expositor, and frequently by a few clear sentences cast a flood of light upon a difficult portion of the word of God. As a professor he was affable, easy, and natural, "wearing his load of learning lightly like a flower," and possessing that magnetic influence which quickened all his students into enthusiasm. His scholarship was extensive and accurate, and was so generally recognized, that he was chosen as a member of the New-Testament company to whom was committed the preparation of the Canterbury revision of the English Bible. His commentaries are distinguished for candor and clearness, and above all for an evangelical "unction" not common in works of the kind, and which may, perhaps, be accounted for from the fact, that, while he was poring over these epistles in his study, he was also discoursing on them from his pulpit. His influence gave an immense impulse to biblical exegesis in the denomination to which he belonged, and indeed to Scotland generally. He received the degree of LL.D. from the University of Glasgow in 1844, and that of D.D. from the University of St. Andrews in 1850.

LIT. — Besides contributions to the Eclectic and North British Reviews, and KIRTO'S Journal of Sacred Literature, Dr. Eadie did an immense amount of literary work in connection with MCKENZIE'S Imperial Dictionary of Universal Biography (in which he had charge of the department of ecclesiastical biography), with the first and last (3d) editions of KIRTO'S Cyclopædia, and with FAUBAURN'S Imperial Bible Dictionary. He prepared an excellent Concordance to the Scriptures on the Basis of Cruden (1839), and compiled the series published in Edinburgh, and very widely circulated, The Bible Cyclopædia (1848, based upon The Union Bible Dictionary, Phila., in condensed form, under the caption Dictionary of the Holy Bible for the Young; new ed. of the Cyclopædia, entirely re-written, 1869); An Analytic Concordance to the Holy Scriptures (1856); and The Ecclesiastical Cyclopædia (1861). He published two volumes of discourses, The Divine Love (1855), and Paul the Preacher (1859). But his fame rests on his commentaries on the Greek text of Ephesians (1851), Colossians (1856), Philippians (1859), Galatians (1869), and, published posthumously, on First Thessalonians (1877). In addition must be mentioned his interesting biographies of John Kitto (1857) and William Wilson, his posthumous treatise on Scripture Illustrations from the Domestic Life of the Jews and other Eastern Nations (1877), and finally The English Bible, an External and Critical History of the Various English Translations of Scripture, with Remarks on the Need of Revising the English New Testament, London, 1876, 2 vols. See JAMES BROWN: Life of John Eadie, D.D., LL.D., London, 1878. WILLIAM M. TAYLOR.

EADMER, monk in Canterbury; was elected Bishop of St. Andrews in 1120, but never took possession of the see, on account of disagreement with King Alexander, and died in Canterbury, 1124. He is one of the most important English historians of the period, and wrote: I. Historie Novorum, in six books, giving the history of the three archbishops of Canterbury, Lanfranc, Anselm, and Radulf, edited by Selden, London, 1623, reprinted in Gerberon's edition of Anselm's works, Paris, 1675; II. The Life of Anselm, edited by Surius and the Bollandists, April 21; III. Two letters to the monks of Glastonbury about the life of St. Dunstan, and to the monks of Winchester about episcopal election; IV. The Lives of St. Bregwin, St. Oswald, and St. Odo, edited in Wharton's Anglia Sacra; V. The Life of St. Wilfrid of York, edited by the Bollandists, April 21; VI. Finally, some minor works, hitherto wrongly ascribed to Anselm. His collected works are found in MIGNE: Patrol., CLIX., pp. 315 sqq.

EDMUND, or EDMUND, king and martyr; was b. in 840, and ascended the throne of East Anglia in 855, when King Offa abdicated, and retired to Rome as a penitent. Edmund ruled in meekness, was the shelter of the weak, learned the psalter by heart, and made his whole life a preparation for martyrdom. In 870 the heathen Danes landed in East Anglia, slew the clergy, outraged the nuns, burnt and pillaged churches and houses. Edmund tried to stem the flood, but was overwhelmed, taken prisoner, tortured, and finally beheaded, Nov. 20, 870. His remains were interred at Bury St. Edmunds, and miracles were wrought at his grave. In 1020 Canute the Great built there a magnificent church and abbey in his honor. In 1122 the national council of Oxford placed the Festival of St. Edmund among English holy days. The English kings have taken him for their patron. His life was written by Abbo of Canterbury and John Lydgate.

EDMUND, St., b. at Abingdon c. 1195; d. at Soissy Nov. 16, 1240; studied at Oxford and Paris, and became a teacher at Oxford, treasurer of Salisbury Cathedral (1222), and Archbishop of Canterbury (1233). But Eadmund belonged to the national party, and was consequently in opposition to the king; and, when the king succeeded in having a papal legate sent to England to neutralize the influence of the archbishop, Eadmund found himself in opposition also to the Pope. He fought manfully, but was at last compelled to yield. He left England in 1240, and settled, first at Pontigny, then at Soissy, where he died, Nov. 16, same year. He had adopted and practised asceticism since a boy; in 1227 he had preached a crusade. Miracles were wrought at his grave, and 1246 the Pope canonized him. His life has been written by his brother, Robert Rich, and by Bertrand, prior of Pontigny.

EDWARD, or EDWARD, III., the Confessor, king of the Anglo-Saxons; b. 1004; crowned King at Winchester, April 3, 1013; d. at Shene Jan. 5, 1066. He dedicated Westminster Abbey, Dec. 28, 1065. His virtues were monastic rather than regal; but such was his reputation for sanctity, that he was canonized by Pope Alexander III. in 1166. An interesting and sympathetic sketch of Eadward is given by GREEN, in his Short History of the English People (Harper's ed., pp. 91-100); but for full information see FREEMAN'S History of the Norman Conquest (vol. ii.), and also LUARD'S Lives of Eadward the Confessor.

EAR-RING. See CLOTHING AND ORNAMENTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

EAST. The Hebrew mizrach and kedem are both translated "east." The first means literally rising (i.e., of the sun), and therefore indicates the place of the sun's rising, answering to ἀνατολή and oriens, and means the east in distinction from the west (Josh. xi. 3; Ps. l. 1, ciii. 12; Zech. viii. 7). Kedem means rather the east as one of the four quarters of the globe (Gen. xiii. 14; Job xxiii. 8, 9; Ezek. xlvi. 18 sq.). Each term has a secondary or derivative meaning. Kedem is the proper name for the countries on the immediate east of the Holy Land; while mizrach designates the far east (Isa. xli. 2, 25, xliii. 5, xlvi. 11).

EAST, Praying towards, a custom of the early church. It evoked the charge that the Christians were sun-worshippers (Tertullian, Apolog., 16). Augustine (De Serm. in Monte, ii. 5) speaks of it as a general custom: cum ad orationem stamus, ad orientem convertimus ("when we rise for prayer, we turn toward the east"). The reason usually given was, that the rising of the sun is the type of the new life, and Christ is called the "Day-spring from on high" (Clem. Alex., Stromata, vii. 7). Other reasons mentioned were, that thereby the soul utters its longing after the lost Paradise (Basil, De Sp. Sancto, 27), or that Christ will appear in the East when he comes again the second time (Matt. xxiv. 27). The practice has been revived by some of the ritualists of the Episcopal Church. The influence of the last reason mentioned for praying towards the east is felt in the practice of burying the dead with their feet turned in that direction. The Jews in exile turned their faces toward Jerusalem when they prayed (Dan. vi. 10); and the Mohammedans face Mecca, the holy city.

EASTER, the festival of our Lord's resurrection, and with Christmas the most joyous day observed by the Church. Term.—The term is derived from the Saxon Ostara, or Eostre (German Ostern), the goddess of spring. The French designation pâques preserves a reference to the Jewish pascha, or passover. In the early church, pascha designated the festival of Christ's crucifixion. After the second century (Neander, Hilgenfeld, etc.), or, according to others, after the third or fourth (Steitz), it designated both the festival of the crucifixion and the resurrection (πάσχα στανρώσιμον and ἀναστάσιμον). Subsequently the term was limited to the latter. Only in a single instance is the original rendered Easter (Acts xii. 4) in our version; in all other cases, passover. The Revised Version has rectified this inconsistency in translation.

Date.—In the early church there was no uniformity in the day observed (Epiphani., Hær., LXX.). Bede at a later date makes frequent reference to this discrepancy, and mentions, that, while Queen Eanfelda was keeping Palm Sunday, King Oswy was observing Easter (about 651). The present (or Nicene) rule seems to have been adopted in England by Archbishop Theodore, in 669. A party called the Quartodecimani, or Fourteeners (Greek Tetraditai and Tetradekaitai) observed the day (of crucifixion) on the 14th of Nisan, no matter on what day of the week it fell. The Western Church deviated from this custom; and Polycarp, on a visit to Rome (154), endeavored in vain to persuade Anicetus to adopt the quartodeciman mode. Victor of Rome (197) was only restrained by public opinion, and the protests of Irenæus, from excommunicating the Quartodecimans, so grave an offence was it considered to observe the 14th. The Council of Nicea (325) decreed that there should be uniformity in the date of observance. It is not in place here to go farther into the question of the ancient controversy on the date of Easter. See art. PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES. It is, however, proper to state the results of the decree of Nicea which determines our date of Easter. By that decree it is fixed on the Sunday immediately following the fourteenth day of the so-called Paschal moon, which happens on or first after the vernal equinox. The vernal equinox invariably falls on March 21. Easter, then, cannot occur earlier than March 22, or later than April 25. In the former case the fourteenth day of the moon would coincide with March 21, the day of the vernal equinox. In the latter, the fifteenth day of the moon would happen on March 21, and a whole lunar month would have to intervene before the condition, "the fourteenth day of the moon first after the vernal equinox," was fulfilled; and, as this might be Sunday, Easter sabbath would not occur till seven more days had elapsed, i.e., April 25.

Celebration.—The key of the observance of Easter is set in the exultant strain of St. Paul, "Now is Christ risen!" (1 Cor. xv. 20). The ancient church celebrated it with solemn and joyous observances. The fasting which had begun on Good Friday was discontinued on Saturday, at midnight (39th Trullan Canon) or at the cock-crow on sabbath morning (Apost. Constit., v. 18). Gregory Nazianzen (d. 390) and Gregory of Nyssa (d. 395; Orat. xlii. De Pascha) speak of persons of all ranks carrying lamps and setting up tapers on Easter Eve. This custom was significant of the vigils which were kept (Laetant., Die. Inst., vii. 19) in the expectation that the Lord at his coming again would appear at this time. Easter Eve was also set apart as a special season for the baptism of catechumens. Easter Day itself was observed as a feast of universal gladness and jubilation. Gregory Nazianzen (Or., xix.) calls it the "royal day among days" (βασιλίσσου τῶν ἡμερῶν ἡμέρα). The early Christian emperors signalized its return by setting minor criminals at liberty (Cod. Theod., ix. 38, 3). For fourteen days public spectacles were intermitted, and business largely stopped. But by the third Council of Orleans, Canon 30 (538), and the Council of Maçon, Canon 11 (581), Jews were forbidden to tread the streets, and mingle with Christians, lest their joy should be interrupted.

In the Roman-Catholic Church elaborate rites are still observed; and at the cock-crowing the tapers are re-lighted with the words Lumen Christi! ("Light of Christ!") to which the priests respond Deo Gratias! ("Thanks be to God!") St. Peter's at Rome is illuminated, and the Pope from the balcony at mid-day pronounces a blessing upon the world.

In the Protestant churches of Europe, Easter is generally observed, especially among Lutherans and Episcopalians. It was formerly entirely disregarded, with other church festivals, by the English dissenters and Scotch Presbyterians, but is coming to be pretty generally observed in America.

See SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dict. Antiq., the Encyclopædia Britannica, and art. PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES. D. S. SCHIAFF.

EASTERN CHURCH meant originally simply the Greek Church in contradistinction to the Latin or Western Church, but means now generally those churches which in the East sprung from the Greek Church, and includes the orthodox Russian Church, and in a wider sense also the Oriental schismatics, namely the Armenians, the Copts, the Nestorians, and the Jacobites. See GREEK CHURCH.

EATON, George W., D.D., LL.D., b. at Henderson, Penn., July 3, 1804; d. at Hamilton, N.Y., Aug. 3, 1872. He was professor of ancient languages in Georgetown College, Ky. (1831-33), of mathematics and natural philosophy (1833-37), and of ecclesiastical and civil history (1837-50), at the Literary and Theological Institution, Hamilton, N.Y. The institution was incorporated in 1846 as Madison University: in it he served as professor of systematic theology (1850-61), was president (1856-68), and president of the theological seminary, and professor of homiletics (1861-71).

E'BAL (stone, stony). a mountain opposite Gerizim; rises 3,076 feet above the sea, and 1,200 feet above the valley. The distance between the two peaks is at the summit about a mile and a half, while their bases nearly meet; and experiments have shown that the voice can be distinctly heard from one peak to the other, as well as in the intervening valley. Elbal was one of the two mountains upon which Israel stood pronouncing blessings and cursings (Deut. xi. 29; Josh. viii. 30-35); and Conder thinks that the site of Joshua's altar may be found at the modern Amâd-ed-Dîn ("monument of the faith"), a sacred place on the top of Elbal. The modern Nablûs (the ancient Shechem) is situated in the valley.

EBBO, Archbishop of Rheims; b. 786; d. March 20, 851; was the son of a serf, but the foster-brother of Louis the Pious, and was given freedom by Charlemagne; educated in a cloister school, ordained priest, and appointed to some ecclesiastical position at the imperial court. Louis the Pious made him Archbishop of Rheims in 816; and in 822 he assumed the lead of the Danish mission. He visited Denmark twice; and it was no doubt due to him that the Danish king, Harold Klak, when heavily pressed by domestic foes, sought refuge at the Frankish court, was baptized, and returned with Ansgar in his retinue. But there is no evidence, except his own words (Apologia Archiepiscopi Remensis cum ejusdem ad gentes septentrionales legatione), that he did any thing for the introduction of Christianity in Denmark, beyond cunning utilization of confused political circumstances. He was less successful in manipulations of the same kind in his native country. Though he owed every thing to Louis the Pious, he deserted him as soon as it became apparent, that, in the contest with his three sons, the sons had the ascendancy. When the armies met at Colnar, Ebbo did what he could in order to allure people away, by bribes and by threats, from the camp of Louis; and when the battle was lost, and the poor emperor was condemned to make public penance, Ebbo was there to take off his golden arms, and lay on the sackcloth and ashes, announcing to the world that he was thereby incapacitated to reign. But there came a turn in the affairs. Louis the Pious once more was in power; and Ebbo hastened to the diet of Diederhofen (835) to be reconciled to him. The emperor was too angry, however. He threw the archbishop into a dungeon at Fulda; and there he lay, in spite of the Pope's protest, till the death of Louis (840). Lothair re-instated him in the archiepiscopal see, but Charles expelled him. Lothair then gave him as a recompense the abbeys of Stablo and Bobbio; but Ebbo felt disappointed, and tried Louis the German, who, however, had only a pittance left for him, — the administration of the diocese of Hildesheim. Besides the above Apologia, Ebbo has also written an Indiculum de ministris Remens. Eccl.

EBED JESU (Syriac, "Servant of God"), surnamed Bar Brika ("Son of the Blessed"), a Nestorian theologian of comprehensive scholarship; was born in the middle of the thirteenth century, in Gozarta, an island in the Tigris; became early Bishop of Sinshar and Arabia, and was, between 1285 and 1287, made metropolitan of Nisibis, or Zoba, where he died in the beginning of November, 1318. He left twenty works: one, exegetical, on the Old and New Testaments (not allegorical, as often stated); three, dogmatical, on the incarnation of the Logos, on the sacraments, and on the verity of the faith (edited in Syriac and Latin by A. Mai, in Script. Vet., 10, 317-366); several works referring to canon law; The Paradise of Eden, a collection of fifty poems (comp. Assemani, Bibl. Or., 3, 1, p. 325); twelve poetical tracts on the sciences; a book on the philosophy of the Greeks; a rhymed catalogue of two hundred Syrian authors (Assemani, Bibl. Or., 3, 1, p. 1-362), enumerating also his own works.

Different from this Ebed Jesu is another Nestorian patriarch of the same name, who in 1562 was converted to Romanism. R. GOSCHÉ.

EBEL, Johannes Wilhelm, Dr., b. March 4, 1784, at Passenheim; d. Aug. 18, 1861, at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg. After his graduation at Königsberg, he became acquainted with Johann Heinrich Schönherr one of the most original thinkers of the period, and espoused his views of relative dualism (see SCHÖNHERR). His pronounced evangelical views, and eloquent advocacy of practical Christianity, were distasteful to the rationalistic and dead orthodox clergy of the province, who tried, from the very beginning of his ministerial career at Hermsdorf (1807-1809), to awe him into submission, and, upon his removal to Königsberg as preacher and teacher of Frederick College (1810), resented his growing popularity by charging him with heresy. The matter being referred to Berlin by the local consistory, the latter, whose masked purpose was duly penetrated by Schleiermacher, received a scathing and well-merited rebuke for their ill-natured odium theologicum; while Ebel, whose dignified bearing under this persecution increased both his influence and popularity, was chosen preacher of the Old Town Church at Königsberg, the largest in the city, in 1816, and filled that high position until his deprivation in 1842.

This was brought about as follows. In 1826 a ministerial rescript, warning the several consistories against mysticism, pietism, and separatism, was eagerly seized by Schön, the provincial governor, a notorious enemy of Christianity, and an utterly unprincipled man, and the opponents of Ebel and Diestel, his brother minister and friend, as an opportunity for assailing him, on the pretence that he had founded a sect which held secret meetings, and advocated tenets of perilous and immoral tendency. The wildest rumors were circulated and believed; and after an animated controversy, necessitating the withdrawal of the first from Königsberg, Ebel and Diestel were openly charged with having founded a sect. Schön appointed Kähler, a member of the consistory, known to be personally hostile to and jealous of Ebel, to investigate the matter, with the result that he discovered, or rather invented, him guilty of the alleged charge of having founded a sect. Ebel refusing to admit the charge, and to submit to an interrogatory, unless the specifications were communicated to him, the consistory arbitrarily and illegally decreed his suspension ab officio, Oct. 7, 1835, and that of Diestel, Dec. 9, 1835. The action of the consistory led to a criminal suit, which lasted four years, with the result that the accused were acquitted of all charges except that of having founded a sect, and sentenced to be deposed, and Ebel to be imprisoned until he should have given proof of amendment. From this sentence appeal was made; and, after a further delay of eighteen months, the finding of the lower court was cancelled, Ebel acquitted of the charge of having founded a sect, but nevertheless deprived, on the ground of gross neglect of duty. There is probably no criminal case on record more flagrantly unjust; for, in spite of the acquittal of the offence with which Ebel and Diestel were falsely charged, they were punished with degradation from the ministerial office, of which they were bright and shining ornaments. Their persecution, originating in theological hatred, and eventuating in their sacrifice to it, took place at a time (1842) when the judicial process in Prussia was still private: that explains the injustice. To-day it would be impossible to bring such a case to the cognizance of a jury. After his deprivation, Ebel lived at Grunenfeld from 1842 to 1848, at Meran-in-the-Tyrol from 1848 to 1850, and at Hoheneck-in-Württemberg from 1850 to 1861, in which year he entered into rest. The memory of that noble man, purified from all the aspersions of theological hatred, and the calumnies of ungodly men, has been vindicated in the following and other works: HAHNENFELD: Die Religiöse Bewegung, etc., Braunsberg, 1858; VON DER GRÖHEN: Die Liebe zur Wahrheit, Stuttgart, 1850; KANITZ: Aufklärung nach Actenquellen, Basel and Ludwigsburg, 1862. The last is a masterpiece; and its author has succeeded, by making the official record disclose the truth, in inducing every respectable encyclopædia and church-history to correct the slanderous and false notices which twenty years ago disfigured their pages. — An article on the Religious Suit may be seen in the Bibliotheca Sacra, 1869, vol. XXVI., No. 104, and the full history in my Life of Ebel, London and New York, 1882. — The most important of the works of Ebel are: Die Weisheit von Oben, 1823, 2d ed., Basel, etc., enlarged, 1868; Die Treue, 1835, 2d ed., ibid., 1863; Gedehliche Erziehung, Hamburg, 1825, in English, 1825; Die apostolische Predigt ist zeitgemäss, Hamburg, 1835; Verstand und Vernunft (by DIESTEL and EBEL), Leipzig, 1837; Zeugniß der Wahrheit (by the same), ib., 1838; Grundzüge der Erkenntniß der Wahrheit, ib., 1852; Die Philosophie der heiligen Urkunde des Christenthums, Stuttgart, 1854–56; Compas de route, containing extracts from most of these works, and also from the Liebe zur Wahrheit. See also s.v. SCHÖNHERR. J. I. MOMBERT.

EBER, Paul, b. at Kitzingen, Franconia, Nov. 8, 1511; d. at Wittenberg, Dec. 10, 1569; was educated at Ansbach and Nuremberg, and entered in 1532 the University of Wittenberg, where he gradually formed so intimate a connection with Melancthon, that he was called Philippi Repertorium. In 1511 he was appointed professor in Latin grammar, and began to lecture on the whole range of the artes liberales, publishing a handbook of Jewish history, a historical calendar, destined to supplant the calendar of Roman saints, etc. In 1557 he was made professor of the Old Testament, and in 1559 superintendent-general of the whole electorate. During the last years of his life he devoted himself almost exclusively to theology, and took part in the various theological controversies and disputations of the time, though essentially as a mediator. His Biblia Latina, a correction of the Latin translation of the Old Testament, he himself considered as his principal work. See SIXT: Paul Eber, Freund und Amtsgenosse der Reformatoren, 1813, and Paul Eber, ein Stück Wittenberger Lebens, 1857; PRESSL: Paul Eber, in Väter und Begründer der luther. Kirche, VIII., 1862.

EBERLIN, Johann, b. at Günzburg, in Suabia, in the second half of the fifteenth century; d. 1530; studied philology and philosophy at Basel; entered the order of the Franciscans, and was appointed preacher in their monastery at Tübingen, but afterwards removed to Ulm on account of disagreement with his superiors. In Ulm he became acquainted with the writings of Luther, and began to preach the views of the reformers. Compelled to leave the city, he went to Switzerland, where he wrote his first book, Die fünfzehn Bundesgenossen, 1521, dedicated to Charles V. After a stay in Wittenberg (1521–23), where he became intimately acquainted with Luther and Melancthon, he visited the regions of the Rhine, especially Basel and Ulm, preaching and publishing pamphlets in the spirit of the Reformation. During a second visit to Wittenberg he published his Wie sich eyn Diener Gottes worts ynn all seyem thun halten soll, etc., 1525. The last years of his life he spent in Thüringia, steadily working with energy and success, though in his own independent and original way, for the cause of the Reformation. See BERNHARD RIGGENBACH: Johann Eberlin von Günzburg und sein Reformprogramm, Tübingen, 1874.

EBIONITES. This designation was at first, like "Nazarenes," a common name for all Christians, as Epiphanius (d. 403) testifies (Adv. Har., xxix. 1). It is derived from the Hebrew עֲבִיּוֹן, "poor," and was not given, as Origen supposes, in reference to their low views of Christ, but to their own poverty. This poverty, especially characteristic of the Christians of Jerusalem, evoked from the Pagan and Jewish world the contemptuous appellation of "the poor." Minutius Felix says, "That we are called the poor is not our disgrace, but our glory" (Octav., 36). Subsequently its application was limited to Jewish Christians. "The Jews who accept Christ are called Ebionites," writes Origen (c. Cels., II. 1). Then, when a portion of the Jewish Church became separate and heretical, the designation was used exclusively of it. Later in the fourth century Epiphanius, Jerome, and others use it of a separate party within the Jewish Church distinct from the Nazarenes. This outline of history proves that Tertullian was wrong when he derived the term from a pretended founder of the sect called Ebion.

The notices in the early fathers are fragmentary, and at times seem to be contradictory on account of the double application of the term, now to Jewish Christianity as a whole, now only to a party within it. The New Testament knows of no sects in the Jewish Church, but indicates the existence of different tendencies. At the Council of Jerusalem a legalistic and Judaizing spirit manifested itself, which was in antagonism to the spirit of Paul, and was shown in the Judaizing teachings which did so much mischief in the Galatian churches. But it was not until after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the founding of Aelia Capitolina by Hadrian, in 131, that Jewish Christianity became a distinct school, gradually becoming more and more heretical till it separated into the two sects of Ebionites proper and Nazarenes. The latter still held to Paul as an apostle, and while they kept the law themselves, did not demand its observance of the Gentile Christians. The former held the observance of the law to be obligatory upon all Christians alike, and rejected Paul as an apostate. This was the state of affairs at the time of Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph., 47). Irenæus, who does not mention this party division, describes the Ebionites as stubbornly clinging to the law, as rejecting the apostle Paul as an apostate, and all the Gospels except Matthew. He further notices a christological heresy. Denying Christ's birth from the Virgin, they regarded him as a mere man. Origen (c. Cels., V. 61) distinguishes between two branches of Ebionites, — those who denied and those who accepted the miraculous birth. Here the distinction between Nazarenes and the Ebionites proper becomes apparent. In the later fathers, as Jerome, Epiphanius, etc., the notices are more frequent; but nothing is added to our knowledge except that the Ebionites were chiliasts (Jerome ad. Esdr., 35, 1). In Epiphanius' day (d. 403) they dwelt principally in the regions along the Dead Sea, but also in Rome and Cyprus. The disintegration of Jewish Christianity was consummated by the introduction of Gnostic philosophy, of Greek culture, as also, perhaps, of Oriental theosophy. See the art. ELKESAITES.

EBRARD OF BETHUNE, a place in Artois, lived in the latter part of the twelfth and the beginning of the thirteenth century, and acquired a name as a writer on grammar and theology. Of his personal life nothing is known. His two known works are, Græcismus, a poem of two thousand verses, on grammar, prosody, rhetoric, etc., used for a long time as a handbook in the schools of the middle ages, and Liber antihæresis, a refutation of the heresies of the Cathari, at that time very numerous in the Flanders. The latter work, still important as a source of information concerning the doctrines of the Cathari, was first printed by the Jesuit Gretser, under the title Contra Waldenses, in his Trias Scriptorum contra Waldenses, Ingolstadt, 1614, then in Max. Bibl. Patr., Lyons, vol. XXIV., and finally in Gretser's Works, vol. XII. Several other works are ascribed to Ebrard; but the books are unimportant and the authorship doubtful. C. SCHMIDT.

ECBATANA (Greek Ἐκβάτανα, or Ἐκβάτανα, Babylonian Agamutanu or Agamtanu), the capital of Media, is mentioned (Ez. vi. 2) as Ἀχμῆθα, Achmetha. It was the place where, in Darius' time, was found the record of Cyrus' decree authorizing the restoration of the temple at Jerusalem. The name occurs often in Greek (Herodotus, Æschylus, Ctesias), and notably in the apocryphal books (Tob. iii. 7, vii. 1, xiv. 12, 14; Jud. i. 1, 2, 14; 2 Macc. ix. 3, etc.). It was, however, applied to several different places; and the question has been discussed whether the Ecbatana, whose magnificent fortifications are described by Herodotus (i. 98, 99), and in the Book of Judith (i. 2-4), is the same with the Ecbatana which was the summer residence of the Persian kings, — the modern Hamadân, and, if not, which of the two is the Hebrew Achmetha. Sir H. Rawlinson has sought to place the former at Takht-i-Suleiman, to the north of Hamadân, where there are remarkable ruins, and where topographical features are thought to favor Herodotus' description. There is, however, no evidence from the cuneiform inscriptions that the Agamtanu, the royal city of Astyages, which Cyrus captured (Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., VII.), was not the Agamtanu of Darius (Behistun Inscr. 69); and the identity of this with the old Median capital on the one hand, and with Achmetha on the other, is probably to be maintained. In the autumn of B.C. 321, after the battle of Arbela, Alexander the Great spent some months in Ecbatana, and celebrated the Dionysia (ARRIAN., Exp. Alex. iii. 19); but after his death it had a checkered history, losing much of its prestige and influence, and subjected to the harsh treatment of successive conquerors. It was favored by the Parthian rulers, who made it once more the royal summer residence. But this honor was again taken away under the Sassanides; and it was completely overshadowed by Bagdad and Ispahan, dropping almost entirely out of notice. Hamadân, its modern representative, is an active business town of some fifty thousand inhabitants. There are few traces of antiquity to be found there, though the tombs of Esther and Mordecai are pointed out with pride. See KARL RITTER: Erdkunde, IX. 98-128; H. ECHELLENSIS, Abraham, b. at Eckel, in the latter part of the sixteenth century; d. in Rome 1664; was educated in the Maronite College in Rome, and appointed professor of the Syriac and Arab languages at the Congregation of the Propaganda. His chief work was his participation in the edition of the Paris polyglot under Le Jay, which lasted from 1640 to about 1653, though with interruptions. He furnished the Syriac, Arab, and Latin texts of the Book of Ruth, and the Arab text of the third Book of the Maccabees. He also undertook a revision of the labor of his predecessor, Gabriel Sionita; but this revision brought upon him a very severe criticism by Valerian de Flavigny (Paris, 1646), to which, however, he gave a very sharp answer (Paris, 1647). Comp. MASCH: Bibl. Sacra, I, 357 sqq. Among his independent works are: a Syriac handbook, Rome, 1628; Eutychius Patriarcha Alexandrinus vindicatus, Rome, 1661; a defence of the episcopacy, directed against J. Selden; an edition of the letters and sermons of Anthony, Paris, 1641 and 1646; an edition of the Chronicon Orientale of Ibu ar-Râhib, Paris, 1653; Concordantie nationum Christ. Orient. in fidei catholice dogmata, Mayence, 1655 (together with Leo Allatius), etc. Assemani's verdict on him is severe but not undeserved. R. GOSCHE.

ECCLESIA. See CHURCH.

ECCLESIASTES (ἐκκλησιαστής, LXX., Ἐκκλησιαστής). 1. Title. — "The Book of Kohleth, the son of David, King in Jerusalem" (i. 1). The word Kohleth is the feminine participle of Kâhal, "to call together," "to assemble." Though feminine in form, which does not necessarily imply that the writer wished to identify himself with Wisdom (cf. Prov. i. 20), it is masculine in meaning, following the analogy of Sophereth (Neh. vii. 57), Pochereth (Ez. ii. 57), Atemeth, and Azmaveth (1 Chr. viii. 36). It is interpreted "preacher" (as if in the Hiphil, one who addresses an assembly, — Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Modern Versions), "debater" (one who is a member of an assembly), "collector" (i.e., of different opinions), "gatherer" (i.e., of an assembly).

2. Author. — (1) Solomon. — This is the traditional view. It is maintained by the rabbins, the fathers, and by the great majority of commentators. In its favor are: (a) The age of the opinion, which is strong a priori evidence in its favor; (b) The eminent fitness of Solomon to write this book, because of his divine wisdom and wide experience; (c) The style and diction belong to the golden age of Hebrew literature (so, e.g., argues Taylor Lewis; but others maintain the exact opposite); (d) The claim of the book itself, not made, it is true, in so many words (i.e., Koboeth does not say he was Solomon), but still made in the very title, in the sentence, "I was king over Israel in Jerusalem" (i. 12), and in many allusions (i. 16, ii., xii. 9, etc.); (e) The lack of agreement among critics as to date and authorship, if the Solomonic view be given up; (f) The natural desire to find some confession of repentance from one who so flagrantly disobeyed the elementary truths of Judaism; for, as Dante says, "All the world craves tidings of his doom" (Par., x.). (2) An unknown personator of Solomon. — In favor of this view are: (a) The spirit of the book, which is sceptical, and most unlike that of Proverbs; for, whereas the latter book is cheerful and inspiring, Ecclesiastes is sad and depressing; (b) The difference of style between Ecclesiastes and Proverbs; for, whereas the latter's is correct and elegant, the former's is so full of irregularities, that "one might almost say the writer was in a death-struggle with the language;" (c) Such expressions as "I have been king in Jerusalem" (i. 12), "all that have been before me over Jerusalem" (i. 16); (d) The studied absence of direct statement regarding the personality of the writer; (e) The vocabulary is of an Aramaic cast; (f) The author's allusions to prevalent corruptions (iv. 1, v. 8, viii. 9, x. 5) are those of a student of life, and not of a king directly responsible for such abuses; (g) The late reception (in the first century B.C.) of Ecclesiastes into the canon, and that not without debate; for, as Plumptre says, "Absolutely the first external evidence which we have of its existence is found in a Talmudic report of a discussion between the two schools of Hillel and Shammai as to its admission into the canon of the sacred books" (Com., p. 27); the decisive fact in its favor was that its first and its last words were in harmony with the law; (h) The existence of an apocryphal book called The Wisdom of Solomon, which would scarcely have been written as a rival, and in places (cf. Wisd. ii., iii.; Eccles. ii. 18-26, iii. 18-22) as a corrective, of Ecclesiastes, if the latter were generally believed to have been Solomon's.

To these arguments the defenders of the traditional view reply. (a) The differences between Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, in spirit and style, are explicable on the ground that Solomon was an old and jaded man when he wrote the former book; and, besides, Hebrew is unfit for philosophy, while it is eminently fit for pithy, sententious expressions; (b) The Aramaic cast is much exaggerated; the one hundred (so styled) non-Hebrew words, or forms, or meanings (Delitzsch), can be reduced to eight (Herzfeld); and we know too little of the ramifications and connections of Hebrew with cognate dialects to make the argument of much weight either way; (c) The author's use of the past tense ("I was king," etc.) is happily paralleled by Mr. Bullock's quotation (Speaker's Com., iv. p. 623) of the language of Louis XIV. in his old age. — quand j'étois roi ("when I was king"); (d) The allusion to those who had been before the writer (i. 16) is quite easily interpreted of the "long line of Jebusite kings;" (e) The corruptions alluded to may have been outside of Judaism, nor was Solomon responsible for them all; (f) and (g) do not materially weaken the Solomonic origin theory.

The advocates of this theory emphasize the point that no other Hebrew than Solomon answers the descriptions given of the magnificence in which the unnamed author lived, nor is known to have possessed so rich an experience.

3. Date. — Among those who deny the Solomonic origin there is no agreement as to time. Opinions among the deniers vary from 975-588 B.C. — somewhere between Solomon and Jeremiah (Nachtigall) — to A.D. 8, the time of Herod the Great (Grätz, a modern rabbi); the reason for this extraordinary difference being the different opinions held as to the historical period whose social condition could explain the general tone of the production; for all agree that the time must have been very evil. To quote two eminent modern commentators upon Ecclesiastes. — Zöckler, in Lange, and Dean E. H. Plumptre. Zöckler says, "The book may be considered as about contemporary with Nehemiah and Malachi, or between B.C. 150 and 100, and the author to be a God-fearing Israelite of the sect of the Chakamin" (p. 15). Plumptre thinks that Ecclesiastes was written somewhere between B.C. 240 (the death of Zeno) and B.C. 181 (that of the death of Ptolemy Epiphanes); his principal reasons for this late date being the traces in the book of "the influence of the teaching both of Stoic and Epicurean philosophy, and the thorough saturation of the book with Greek thought and language. Such phrases as 'under the sun,' 'seeing the sun,' 'birds in the air,' are echoes in Hebrew of Greek expressions and ideas" (Comm. pp. 30-34).

4. Plan. — Here, again, there is no agreement. Some (like Zöckler) maintain that it is a formal treatise; others, that it is a collection of unconnected thoughts and maxims (Luther), like the Meditations of Marcus Aurelius, or Pascal's Thoughts; or a colloquy between a seeker and a teacher (Herder). One of the most elaborate attempts to analyze the book is Zöckler's. He maintains that it contains four discourses, of about equal length, upon the vanity of all human relations, destinies, and efforts: 1 (i. and ii.) Knowledge and enjoyment alike fail of their end; 2 (iii.-v.) The highest good is to enjoy this life and to do good; 3 (vi.-viii. 15) The practical wisdom of life consists of patience, contempt of the world, and fear of God; 4 (viii. 16-xii. 7) The only true happiness springs from benevolence, fidelity to duty, a contented and serene enjoyment of life, and sincere fear of God from early youth to advanced age. To these discourses is added an epilogue (xii. 8-14), which contains a comprehensive view of the whole, and a recommendation of the truths therein taught, with reference as well to the personal worth of the author as to the serious and important contents of his teachings. Zöckler, following other commentators, divides each of these discourses into almost as many subdivisions as there are verses. But instead of putting the book under the scalpel, and laying bare its bones, it is better to consider it as a living body, and discover the secret of its life. Taken thus as a whole, it may be considered as a confession written in prose, yet with a rhythmical flow (sufficient to justify Taylor Lewis in making a metrical version of it), devoid of plan, except so far as it is a continuous unburdening of self. Its unity is in its authorship and theme,—the vanity of life. Its contents are miscellaneous illustrations of the theme, derived from experience, and told with great sadness. It is because the book is thus a collection of observations, that some interpret the title, Koheleth by “collector.”

5. Character and Tendency.—Many advocates of the Solomonic hypothesis find in the book evidence of his change of heart. But, whether Solomon be the author or not, it will be probably best to consider it a unique exhibition of Hebrew scepticism, subdued and checked by the Hebrew fear of God, and reaping lessons of wisdom from the follies of life. The tone is sad. On every side the writer sees persistent and gigantic evil. Nothing turns out as he would like. “O vanity of vanities, all is vanity.” And yet the conviction is fixed that it is always right to do right; and, in view of the coming judgment (xi. 9), the book closes with this memorable sentence: “Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is all of man.” Such a book is edifying rather than enlivening reading. Its facts are undeniable; but they are depressing, and represent only the dark side. There is no glad recognition of the glorious outcome of all the ills of life. Ecclesiastes has its place in the canon of Holy Scripture. It puts more vividly than in any other way the worthlessness of all human efforts to get happiness, and thus prepares the heart to accept of God’s way of happiness,—a blameless, trustful, pious life.

ECK, Johann Maier von, b. at Eck, on the Günz, Nov. 13, 1486; d. at Ingolstadt, Feb. 10, 1543: was the son of a peasant, but was educated by an uncle, Martin Maier, who was priest at Rottenburg, on the Neckar. He studied at Heidelberg, Tübingen, and Cologne, and took his degree, as master of arts, at Tübingen, 1501. From 1502 to 1510 he lived in Freiburg, in Breisgau, studying and teaching; and here he made his debut as a writer by his Logices Exercitamenta. He also found opportunity to distinguish himself as an orator, more especially as a disputant; and in 1510 he was appointed professor of theology in the University of Ingolstadt, which institution he actually ruled for the rest of his life. He was a man of great learning, though not a great scholar. His learning was knowledge rather than insight, the result of a remarkable memory rather than the product of a clear intellect. He was also possessed of great talent as a disputant; though he generally had the misfortune to confirm his adversaries in their own opinions, instead of alluring them over to his, for he lacked that seriousness of conviction which alone is able to create conviction in others. Though by no means a charlatan, he was one of those vain characters who believe the victory won when they feel their vanity gratified. Characteristically enough, he won his first laurels as a disputant by defending, in October, 1514, at the instance of the merchants of Augsburg, the proposition that “usury,” as the taking of five per cent interest was then called by the Church, was legitimate business.

Having received the ninety-five theses of Luther, with whom he before had had friendly relations, Eck circulated, in March, 1518, a manuscript criticism on them,—Obelisci (marks made in books to draw the attention to suspicious passages). As Luther was away on his Heidelberg journey, Carlstadt published some counter-criticism (Conclusiones); and, when Luther returned, he answered with his Asterisci. A rapid exchange of theses and counter-theses now followed; and the affair was finally wound up by a grand disputation, which was solemnly opened at Leipzig, June 27, 1519. On June 27 and 28, and on July 1 and 3, Eck disputed with Carlstadt concerning divine grace and good works, etc.; and from July 4 he disputed for ten successive days with Luther concerning the absolute supremacy of the Pope, purgatory, penance, etc. The general impression was that Eck had won. He was flattered and feasted as the "Achilles of the Church." But the real result was, that Luther went away much clearer and more decided with respect to the futility of the Pope's claims to infallibility. Eck himself, however, does not seem to have felt quite sure about his victory. He suffered the humiliation that the arbitrators declined to give any verdict; and though he continued to shower a multitude of rabid theses, criticisms, etc., down upon Luther and the other reformers, he now saw fit to appeal to force. With the German princes he failed; but in January, 1520, he went to Rome, and the result was the bull Exurge Domine, which he was to make public in Germany himself in the quality of apostolical prothonotary and papal nuncio. The task, however, proved less enjoyable than he had expected. From Leipzig, from Erfurt, etc., he had to flee from the riots of the mob, covered with ridicule and scorn; and even in his own city, in Ingolstadt, he found it difficult to get the bull published with due solemnity.

Twice more Eck visited Rome on diplomatic errands; and though he was not received by Adrian VI. with the same cordiality as by Leo X., he nevertheless achieved his purpose. In Bavaria, too, his influence was steadily increasing, and he fairly succeeded in transforming the country into a province of the Spanish Inquisition. One process of heresy followed the other, and in them all Dr. Eck played a conspicuous part; but, in his ever-raging contest with the reformers, his successes were half only. His Enchiridion locorum communium adversus Lutherum ran through forty-six editions between 1525 and 1576. It was read and admired, but it had no permanent effect. Similarly with his disputation with the Swiss reformers. It cost him much exertion and many intrigues to bring it about. Zwingli would not leave Zürich, and to Zürich Eck dared not go. Finally Baden-in-Argau was fixed upon; and from May 21 to June 8, 1526, the disputation took place. Ecolampadius and Eck were the principal interlocutors, the doctrine of transubstantiation the principal subject. But, though Eck seemed to be in an uncommonly conciliatory humor, the only result of the disputation was, that the Swiss-reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper became still more distinctly developed in its difference from the Lutheran. At the diet of Augsburg (1530) Eck had to write the refutation of the Protestant Confession; and he worked on it day and night from June 27 to July 13, assisted by twenty other theologians. But he was compelled to re-write it twice before it suited the emperor. In the last years of his life he was chiefly occupied in counteracting the various attempts made to bring about a reconciliation. It was due to him that the Roman-Catholic princes rejected the Regensburg interim in 1541.

ECKHART (generally called Meister Eckart), the most remarkable of the German mystics of the fourteenth century, was probably born at Strassburg, 1260, and died, probably on a journey to Avignon, 1329. He belonged to the Dominican order, and was prior of Erfurt towards the close of the thirteenth century. In 1302 he taught in the College of St. Jacques in Paris, and took the degree of licentiatus theologiae. In 1303 he was appointed provincial of his order for Saxony, and in 1307 vicar-general for Bohemia. In 1308 he again taught in Paris, and in 1316 he settled at Strassburg as vicar for the grand-master of his order. There he became acquainted with the Brethren of the Free Spirit; and when, some time after, he was removed to Francfort as prior of the Dominican monastery, the extraordinary character of his preaching aroused suspicion, and he was accused, before the grand-master Hervé (at that moment present at Metz), of entertaining connections with suspicious persons. An investigation was instituted, and Eckart was acquitted. Archbishop Henry of Cologne, however, the implacable enemy of the Beghards, had formed an opinion of his own about Eckart; and in 1325 very heavy accusations against him were laid before the chapter of the order assembled in Venice. Nicholas of Strassburg, as papal nuntius et minister, was charged with the investigation; and, as he himself belonged to the mystical school of theology, he found nothing to blame in Eckart. But Henry would not suffer himself to be robbed of his prey in this way. He accused both Eckart and his protector, Nicholas, of heresy; and a regular process was instituted before an episcopal court of inquisition. Both Eckart and Nicholas protested against the competency of the court, and appealed to the Pope; but they were, nevertheless, both of them condemned. On Feb. 13, 1329, Eckart read from the pulpit of the cloister-chapel in Cologne a solemn declaration, in which he protested his willingness to recant any error into which he might have fallen. Immediately after, he set out for Avignon; but when the papal decision was given, in the bull of March 27, 1329, he had died. The bull, however, treated the case with great leniency. On account of the declaration he had made at Cologne, Eckart was evidently considered as one who, before death, had returned to the bosom of the Church. The bull condemned seventeen propositions of his, and pointed out eleven more as suspicious. But, in spite of this condemnation, his pupils still clung to him with great reverence and love. When Heinrich Suso wrote his autobiography, in 1360, he spoke of Eckart as the "holy master;" and his sermons were frequently copied in the monasteries of Germany, Switzerland, Tyrol, and Bohemia. In 1430 the papal condemnation was repeated; but in 1440 Nicholas of Cusa, nevertheless, mentions Eckart's works as one of the sources of his system. A collected edition of his works was given by Franz Pfeiffer, Leipzig, 1857.

What startles the reader in Eckart's writings is his strongly pronounced though mystic pantheism, often expressed with singular power. God is not the highest being, he says, for he is the only being. Outside of God there is nothing but illusion and deception. In its true existence every creature is not only a revelation of God, but a part of him; and—here enters the easy transition from Eckart's pantheistic speculations to his ascetic morals—the true object of human life must consequently be to strip it of all illusions and deceptions, and return into the one great being, God.

ECLECTICISM, a philosophical method by which a philosopher extracts from various systems of philosophy that which seems to him to be most strikingly true, and fits it together as best he knows how. The method is completely unscientific, and has never produced results of any account. It generally becomes very fashionable, however, in all post-philosophical ages, when the true philosophical productivity has died out. Neoplatonism was at the bottom eclecticism, and so was Roman philosophy in general.

ECUADOR, The Republic of, situated between Brazil, Peru, the Pacific Ocean, and Colombia, comprises an area of about three hundred thousand square miles, and contains, according to the census of 1875, about nine hundred thousand inhabitants, besides two hundred thousand Indians who are semi-civilized. The bulk of the civilized population consists of descendants of whites and Indians, Indians with fixed abodes, negroes, and descendants of negroes and whites, and negroes and Indians. They are all Christians; while the Indians, among whom there formerly was carried on a very active mission, have now relapsed completely into Paganism. According to the constitution, the Catholic-Apostolical-Roman Church is the Church of the State, and other denominations are excluded. Toleration is shown, however; but as yet no independent congregation has been established in the country. The relation to Rome is based upon a concordat of Sept. 26, 1862. The capital (Quito) is the seat of an archbishop. There are episcopal seats at Cuenca, Guayaquil, Riobamba, Loja, and Ibarra, and an apostolical vicarate at Napo. The number of the clergy is not given in the latest statistics: in 1858 it was insufficient. By the revolution, the Church lost its estates: it is now poor. Nor is proper care taken of popular education: its standard is very low. G. PLITT.

EDELMANN, Johann Christian, b. at Weissenfels, July 9, 1698; d. in Berlin, Feb. 15, 1767; studied theology at Jena and Eisenach; was tutor in several Austrian families; lived for some time with the Moravian Brethren, and partook in the Berleburg translation of the Bible. He translated the Second Epistle to Timothy and the Epistles to Titus and Philemon. In the mean time he had reached the stand-point of absolute rationalism, considering all the positive religions as defective forms, and reason as the highest authority also in the field of religion; and with this conviction he proposed to retire into obscurity, and maintain himself as a weaver. But he had already written his Unschuldige Wahrheiten (1735), and his friends induced him to go on with his authorship. There followed Moses mit aufgedecktem Angesicht (1740), Die Göttlichkeit der Vernunft (1741), etc., books which attracted some attention by their coarse eloquence, and talent for blasphemy, but which made no real impression. The last years of his life he spent in Berlin, under the protection of Friederich II., though on the condition that he should publish nothing more. His autobiography was published by Klose, 1819. See MÖSCKEBERG: Reimarus und Edelmann, Hamburg, 1867; GUDEN: Edelmann, 1870. PAUL TSCHACKERT.

E'DEN (Heb. עֵדֶן; LXX. Ἔδέμ) is the land or region in which "the Lord God planted a garden," where "he put the man whom he had formed" (Gen. ii. 8). The Hebrew word (עֵדֶן), when used in the plural, has the meaning "delights;" and hence Eden has been supposed to mean "land of delight" (LXX. ἡδονή; Vulg. voluptas). The Hebrews themselves may have so understood it; but the real origin of the name is more probably to be found in the Assyrian édimu (from Accadian édim), "plain."

Description of the Garden of Eden. — Eden and the garden are so closely related in the Old Testament and in Christian thought, that it is necessary to treat of them together. Although in Gen. ii. 8, 10 they are not identical, and "the garden" is repeatedly mentioned alone in chapters ii. iii., while in iv. 16 Eden is so mentioned, with apparent reference to the land or region, yet the expression עֵדֶן-עֵדֶן ("garden [of] Eden") occurs Gen. ii. 15, iii. 23, 24; Joel ii. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35; and in the following passages Eden alone seems to be used in the same sense: Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 9, 16, 18; Isa. li. 3. We find also the expression "garden of God," גַּן אֱלֹהִים Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 (twice), 9, and "garden of Jahve," גַּן-יְהוָה (Gen. xiii. 10, Isa. li. 3), and, with kindred meaning, "mountain of God," הַר אֱלֹהִים (Isa. xi. 9, lxv. 25, Ezek. xxviii. 14, 16). The LXX. generally translate עֵדֶן by ἡδονή (see above), in Gen. ii. 8, 10, iv. 16, by Ἔδέμ, and in Isa. li. 3 by παράδεισος. This latter word (from Pers. pairidaēza, whence also Heb. פַּרְדֵּס) is generally employed by the LXX. for גַּן, "garden" (Ezek. xxxvi. 35, ἀήπτος), and the Vulgate in most cases follows their example.

Eden and the garden were situated "toward the east;" i. e., eastward from the writer (Gen. ii. 8). The vegetation was luxurious (ii. 9): among other fruit-trees was found the fig-tree (iii. 7), and two trees beside, which are repeatedly named, but not minutely described, — "the tree of life," and "the tree of knowledge of good and evil." Irrigation was secured by a river flowing into the garden from Eden: where its sources were we are not distinctly told. On leaving the garden it divided into four "heads," or branches: and the course of each is indicated, except in the case of the fourth, which was too well known to need it. Besides its abundant fertility, the garden was also the home of all kinds of animals, including cattle, beasts of the field, and birds (ii. 19, 20).

Into this garden man was put "to dress it and to keep it" (ii. 15); i. e., to cultivate and guard it. Here he gave names to all the animals (ii. 20); here the woman was fashioned out of his rib (ii. 21, 22); here the two lived unclothed and innocent (ii. 25), accustomed to intercourse with God (ii. 19, 22, cf. iii. 8), with only one restrictive command to observe, — the prohibition to eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (ii. 17). Through the specious words of the serpent (iii. 1-5) the woman was led to disobey the command, and the man followed her example (iii. 6). Thus they lost their innocence; and the Lord passed sentence upon them, and cursed the serpent. He provided tunics of skins (iii. 21) to take the place of the aprons of fig-leaves which the man and his wife in their shame had made (iii. 7), and then sent them out of the garden, that, with their newly-gained knowledge of good and evil, they might not eat of the tree of life also, and so live forever (iii. 22, 23). On the east of the garden the Lord placed "the cherubim, and the flaming sword, self-brandishing, to guard the way to the tree of life" (iii. 24). (See ADAM, CHERUBIM, CREATION, EVE, SERPENT, SIN.)

The conception of an early home of man, where innocence and happiness reigned, and there was habitual intercourse with divine beings, is found, with some striking similarities to the account in Genesis, in the mythologies of other peoples, notably those of India and Persia. According to the former, Mêru, the "mountain of the gods," situated in the north, gives rise to the spring Gangâ, which waters the "land of joy," on the summit, and then forms four lakes, whence issue four rivers that flow through four regions, and empty into four seas. On the northern side of Mêru was Uttara-Kuru, a kind of paradise, in which Manu Vâivasata lived before the flood.

According to the Persian myths, the sacred mountain Harâ-Berezaiti, from which flow twenty rivers, overshadows the happy land, Airyana-Vaedya, where Yima dwelt in the time of his purity.

Such details as the tree, the serpent, and the loss of paradise through sin, also re-appear in these mythologies. The first two are found also in that of Babylonia; and here the conception of the cherubim appears under the form of the winged bull, called generally lamasu and šidu, and by other names, but also Kirûbu = כְּרִיב (derivation probably from karûbu, "to be mighty, majestic"). The exact belief of the Babylonians as to the primitive condition and surroundings of man is not yet known.

But, whatever the general or even detailed resemblance between the biblical account and those in heathen mythologies, the differences are still more marked. The former is unique in its simplicity, dignity, lofty conception of God and of man, and in its distinct idea of sin as a voluntary and responsible violation of God's command, entailing the gravest moral consequences. And, while the Old-Testament writers looked back to the garden of Eden as the ideal of that which was lovely and desirable (Gen. xiii. 10; Joel ii. 3; Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxviii. 13 sq., xxxi. 8, 9, 16, 18, xxxvi. 35; cf. Prov. iii. 18, xi. 30, xiii. 12, xv. 4), it became to the prophets a standard to measure the coming blessedness of the Messianic age (Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 35); and the conception of that happy time was more or less shaped by the recollection of what had been (Isa. xi. 6-9, lxxv. 25; Ezek. xlvi. 1 sq.). Later Jewish thought (as seen especially in the Book of Enoch) developed the notion of the future abode of the chosen, and in the New Testament there appeared the clear belief in the Christian paradise. (See PARADISE.)

sired and intended that his readers should understand where Eden lay. He speaks of it as "eastward." He points out, incidentally, marked features of the land and climate. He seems to regard Eden as a definite region or district, by whose location another land could be described, — "the land of Nod on the east of Eden" (Gen. iv. 16). But most important of all is his statement with regard to the rivers. First there is a נַהַר, nahar (sometimes = "current," and then it may be used of the sea, as Jon. ii. 4; Ps. xxiv. 2; generally = "river," never "river-system"), flowing into the garden: this is not named. Then there are the four branches into which this river divides as it leaves the garden. The first is Pison (פִּישׁוֹן), whose course is described with reference to "the land of the Havilah" (הַחִיִּלָּה) (A. V., "which compasseth") can mean "which surrounds," "flows quite around," or "bends around" one side (Num. xxi. 4; Judg. xi. 18), or even "goes about in," i. e., goes circuitously in; cf. Isa. xxiii. 16. (If this last is the meaning here, then we understand the use of כָּל, "all" before the names of the countries. Without this, the idea of passing quite through the countries would be unexpressed.) The land of "the Havilah" is then described as the land "where the gold is." It is added, "And the gold of that land is good; there is the bdolach and the shoham-stone."

The bdolach (בְּדוֹלַח) is mentioned in Num. xi. 7, where the manna is compared with it. Joseph, Ant., III. 1, 6, calls it βδέλλιον, a reddish-brown resinous gum, transparent and fragrant, and he is generally followed. The manna was white (Exod. xvi. 31): the resemblance was perhaps partly in the consistency, and partly in the transparent character. The shoham-stone (שֹׁהַם) has not been satisfactorily explained. LXX. (Job xxviii. 16) render ὄνυξ, "onyx"; Joseph., "sardonyx"; LXX. (Exod. xxxv. 9), λίθος σαρδίου, "sardius"; LXX. (Exod. xxviii. 20; Ezek. xxviii. 13, and Targg.), "beryl" (βηρύλλιον); LXX. (Gen. ii. 12), ὁ λίθος ὁ παρασπρος, "chrysoprasus"; LXX. (Exod. xxviii. 9, xxxv. 27), λίθος (τῆς) σμαράγδου, "smaragdus." All these interpretations and other later ones (derived from Arabic sâhim, "sun-burnt," or Hebrew שָׁחַם, "leek," from the green color) are wholly uncertain. The Babylonians apparently knew the stone as (abnu) sâmtu.

The second river (גִּיחֹן, as above) is Gihon (גִּיחֹן), "which flows about," or "winds through," "all the land of Cush." The third river is Chiddekel (Tigris): "this is the one going before Assyria." The fourth river is Pbrat (Euphrates). No one questions the identity of the third and fourth rivers. The whole question turns about the first two, and the lands around or through which they flow. Each of these two rivers bears a name admitting of explanation from the Hebrew, Pison from פִּישׁוֹן, and Gihon from גִּיחֹן, both with the same general meaning, "to break forth," "flow forth." It is, however, quite conceivable that the original derivation was different, and that the Hebrews merely associated them with these roots.

But there is the greatest difficulty in harmonizing the statements in regard to them with modern geographical knowledge, and wide disagreement still prevails. There are said to have been in all some eighty hypotheses as to the position of Eden. This number, however, includes the eccentric proposals to find it in Prussia, on the shores of the Baltic (HASSE), or in the Canary Islands (CREDNER), and others of like character.

All the views which deserve notice here may be grouped under three heads:—

I. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN THE FAR EAST.—This class of views is sometimes called "traditional," because it can be traced back to Josephus, and has been thought to rest on genuine tradition. It identifies the Pison with the Indus or the Ganges, and Havilah with India or, vaguely, with the Eastern region. Cush is then commonly the country south of Egypt, or, in general, the south land of Asia and Africa (see CUSH), and Gihon is the Nile; or else Cush is derived from the supposed Caspian people, Kossaiot; and Gihon is the Oxus, called by Islamites Gaihūnu. (When Pison is made identical with Indus, then Gihon has sometimes been explained as Ganges.) It is then sometimes supposed that Euphrates and Tigris have been inserted in place of two other Eastern rivers. This general theory has been held, in some form of it, by Josephus, most church fathers, and, among modern writers, Ewald, Renan, Maspero, Bertheau, Dillmann, Rüetschi, etc. In support of this view such grounds as the following have been adduced, (a) The language of Gen. ii. 8, iv. 16, xi. 2, as well as modern research, point to the far East as the early home of man. (b) The Indian conception of Mēru suggests that the biblical account rests on recollections from that region. (c) Gold and gems are products of India. (d) Havilah (being, perhaps, originally an appellative from הוּל, "sand," hence "the sandy," or "sand-land") can be applied to India as a country of which the Hebrews had only dim knowledge; it denoted in their history a land south and south-east of Palestine; to extend it vaguely eastward was easy. (e) Gihon (= Nile, called Γήων; LXX.

(Jer. ii. 18) for Hebrew שְׁחִיר) may be regarded as the re-appearance of an Asiatic river, or as flowing out of the same earth-embracing Okeanos from which the Pison, Tigris, and Euphrates came. Gihon = Oxus is of course relieved from all such difficulty. It is replied to these arguments, (a) The language of Gen. xi. 2 only shows that after the flood men came from the East; and although the legends of other peoples identify the original home of man with the resting-place after the flood (see Lenormant, Ararat and Eden, Contemp. Rev., September, 1881), there is no evidence that the Hebrews did the same. Gen. iv. 16, however, says nothing of the location of Eden, but only of the land of Nod; and Gen. ii. 8 need not mean more than that Eden was eastward from the writer of the account, or from those for whom he wrote. The scientific word as to the cradle of the human race is not yet so definite as to warrant the theory. (b) The assumption that the form of an Aryan tradition is a sure key to Shemitic traditions is groundless. (c) Gold and gems are indeed found in India, but not only there. (d) Havilah was a land known to the Hebrews (see CUSH); and, whether India was so or not, the Hebrews must have been aware that Havilah did not extend across Tigris and Euphrates, and off into the distant south-east. (e) The "river" of Gen. ii. 10, which "went forth from Eden," can have nothing to do with Okeanos; and there is no proof that the notion of a river which disappeared in one continent, and re-appeared in another, existed among the Hebrews. As to the identification of Gihon with Oxus: the Arabic Gaihūn is an appellative, and can be applied to any rushing river (e.g., Araxes, Gaihūn er Ras); and the Kossaiot did not live east of the Caspian Sea, but, as is clear from the cuneiform inscriptions, in the mountain-region south-west from the Lake of Oroomiah, and thence eastward toward the borders of Elam and Media.

II. THEORIES WHICH FIND EDEN IN ARMENIA.—These take as the starting-point the known sources of the Tigris and Euphrates, and seek two other rivers rising in the same region. Thus, Pison = Phasis, Havilah = Colchis (or Pison = Kur, Cyrus), Gihon = Araxes, Cush = Kossaiot. Representatives of this class of views are Reland, Calmet, Leclerc, Keil, etc. But, if the Kossaiot cannot be found on the eastern shore of the Caspian, neither can they on its western shore; and although some might be tempted to make use of the name of the country Kūsu, or Kusua, which appears on a Cappadocian tablet (Proceedings Soc. Bib. Arch., November and December, 1881), still it is not easy to see how this could be connected with an Armenian river. The other proposed identifications are still more precarious. Further: by no possibility could these four rivers be supposed to be branches of one parent-stream. When it is claimed that nahar can mean "river-system," this is not borne out by the usage of the language (see above); and the hypothesis (Luther and others) that the flood altered the physical features of Asia, so that the courses of streams are now different from the original courses, is unsupported by any thing in the biblical account of the flood, and is so far from being hinted at by the writer of Gen. ii. that he evidently expects, in his description, to be understood by his contemporaries as referring to a region still accessible to men, and recognizable by them.

III. THEORIES WHICH PLACE EDEN IN BABYLONIA.—Advocates of this location had their attention fixed by the fact that the Euphrates and the Tigris are actually united for a certain distance in the Satt el-Arab, which then empties into the Persian Gulf by two or more mouths. The Satt el-Arab was therefore regarded as the "river" of Gen. ii. 10; the Euphrates and Tigris were looked upon as its branches, reckoning up the stream; and the Pison and Gihon were identified with the two main arms through which the Satt el-Arab empties. Calvin, who held this view, considered the Pison to be the eastern arm, and the Gihon the western. Scaliger and others followed him; while Huet, Bochart, etc., found Pison in the western, Gihon in the eastern arm. A modification of this view is given by Pressel (Herzog's Real-Encycl., ed. I., vol. XX., art. Paradies), to the effect, that, instead of being these outlets of the Satt el-Arab, Pison and Gihon are two tributary streams flowing in from the east. This form of the theory is more consistent than the other, since it seeks all four branches in the same general direction,—up the stream; but the words of Gen. ii. oblige us to seek them all in the opposite direction,—down the stream. Only in the direction of its current could the river, on leaving the garden, divide into four branches. Against these theories it is further urged that we have ample grounds, from classical history and from the cuneiform inscriptions, as well as from the nature of the soil and the present rate of physical change in that region, to believe that the sea once extended a hundred miles or more beyond its present limits to the north, thus covering the supposed site of Eden, and that the Euphrates and Tigris emptied into it without uniting (PLINY: Nat. Hist., VI., § 31; RITTER: Erdkunde, X. 3; KIEPERT: Alte Geog., p. 138).

Another view has been proposed, and advocated with great force and skill. It finds Eden in Northern Babylonia, immediately about the site of Babylon (FRIEDR. DELITZSCH, Wo lag das Paradies?). Where the Euphrates and Tigris approached nearest to each other, the country was intersected by very numerous water-courses, whose current was always from the Euphrates toward the Tigris, on account of difference of level (ARRIAN: Exp. Alex., VII. 7, contr. Xen. Anab., I. 7. 15). The effect was that of an extremely wide river flowing in almost countless channels. This is claimed to satisfy the requirements of Gen. ii. 10, and to be precisely the way in which an Oriental would conceive of irrigation,—the express object of the "river." As the Euphrates and Tigris, which have thus formed in effect only the outside limits of this great irrigating stream, diverge more widely from each other, they resumed their independent course; and from the former there proceeded two important streams, partly natural, perhaps partly artificial, like the water-courses named above; the Satt en-Nil (=Gihon) on the east, and the Pallakopas (=Pison) on the west. The Satt en-Nil was known as an important navigable stream as late as when the Arabs overran Babylonia. Delitzsch identifies it with the Assyrian Arahtu, or Gūgūn dē (Cun. Inscr. of Western Asia, II. pl. 50, and cf. גִּיחוֹן), mentioned immediately after the Tigris and Euphrates. This stream flowed through Babylonia, where the Kaššu from the mountains (cf. Koccaioi, and Egyptian Kaš. Kāš, for כַּשְׁשׁוּ) had settled. The Pallakopas (Παλλὰκόπας, ARRIAN, Exp. Alex., VII. 21), although the name "Pison" (from Assyrian pisānu, "water-holder," "channel"?) is not known to have been applied to it, was of sufficient importance, and flowed into the Persian Gulf west of the mouth of the Euphrates; and Gen. x. 29, xxv. 18, I Sam. xv. 7, point to the north-west shore of the Persian Gulf as the location of Havilah. Gold, bdolach (if, as is probable, this is bdellium), and the yet unexplained shoham-stone (Babylonian sāmtu) are all authenticated products of Babylonia, to which, on this hypothesis, Havilah is immediately adjacent: there is therefore no difficulty in attributing these products to Havilah as well.

In general support of this theory are advanced, the dependence of the Hebrews on the Babylonians for their traditions, the extreme fertility of the district surrounding Babylon, the name attaching to that district (Kardunias = "Garden of the god Dunias"), the oldest name of Babylon and its environs (Tintira, "Grove of Life"), the fact that "Eden" has a satisfactory etymology in Akkadian ēdin, Babylonian-Assyrian idīnu ("plain," "lowland"), and the fact that the district northward from the junction of the Euphrates and Tigris is now called the Zōr, i. e., "depression" (WETZSTEIN, in DEL. Jesaja, 3 Ausg.).

The weak points in this theory are the following: the difficulty of understanding why the main river is not named in Gen. ii., if it is thus really the divided current of the Euphrates; the description of the Tigris by naming its course previous to its reaching Babylonia; the uncertainty attaching to the identification Pison = Pallakopas, and to the location of Havilah (the statements in Gen. x. 29, etc., quoted above, are, after all, vague); the lack of clear knowledge about the Kaššu (=כַּשְׁשׁוּ) in Babylonia. While, therefore, it has the great merit of treating the biblical account as intelligent, and meant to be intelligible, and has much in its favor, we must await further light before accepting it as fully established.

EDEN (Heb. עֵדֵן) is named (Ezek. xxvii. 23) after Haran and Canneh. It denotes a people, probably the same with "the children of Eden," עֵדֵן בְּנֵי-עֵדֵן (2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12), who are said to live "in Tclassar" (תַּלְסָר), and are perhaps to be identified with the Bit-Adini ("house of Adin") in Western Mesopotamia, often named in the cuneiform inscriptions.

Whether the Beth-Eden of Amos i. 5 (בֵּית־עֵדֵן, A.V., "house of Eden") is the same people, is still a matter of question. This is at any rate more likely than its identification with 'Ehden on Lebanon, Beit Djenn at the foot of Hermon, or Djusieh el-Kadimeh, south-east from Laodicea, the Paradisus of Ptolemy. The fact that it is named in connection with Damascus does not necessarily disprove its identity with the Mesopotamian Eden; for the intention of the prophet might be to extend his threatening to the Aramaic tribes generally.

At all events, the Hebrew pointing of בֵּית־עֵדֵן in these passages shows a correct apprehension that these Edens were distinct from the Eden (עֵדֵן) of Genesis.

(See FR. DELITZSCH: Wo lag das Paradies? Leipz., 1881; R. SMEND: Der Prophet Ezechiel, Leipz., 1880; E. SCHRADER: Die Keilinschriften und die Geschichtsforschung, Giessen, 1878.)

EDESSA, a city of Northern Mesopotamia (the Armenian Edesia, the Syrian Urhoi, the Arab er-Rohâ, the present Orfa or Urfa), is situated on the Daisun, a tributary to the Euphrates, fifty-five miles west of Diabekir, and is estimated to have a population of from twenty-five thousand to fifty thousand. It seems to be a very old city. One tradition identifies it with Erech, one of the principal cities of the Babylonian Empire; another, with the Ur of the Chaldeans. But nothing is known with certainty of its history until after the Macedonian conquest of Persia. A Græco-Macedonian colony was settled in the city and its neighborhood; and in 136 B.C. Urhoi, or Osrhoene, founded an independent kingdom there, Osrhoene, which lasted till 217 A.D., when Caracalla made the country a Roman province. In 637 the city was conquered by the Arabs; but in 1097 Count Baldwin of Flanders succeeded in establishing once more an independent empire there, which for fifty years formed a bulwark for the kingdom of Jerusalem. It was conquered in 1146 by Noureddin, and the city is now a Turkish possession.

Christianity was early introduced in Edessa; though the legend about the correspondence between Christ and King Abgar appears to have no historical foundation. In the third century the city became the seat of a bishop, and in the fourth the wealth and splendor of its churches and monasteries was such as to tempt the spoliation of Julian. In the fourth century it also became the principal seat of Syrian learning. Ephrem Syrus resided there, and was the founder of the Edessene school of theology. At the same time the Persian school flourished in the city. After the death of Ephrem, however, his school fell into the hands of the Arians, just as, later on, the Persian school became the stronghold of Nestorianism. After the Mohammedan conquest, all the Christian churches were transformed into mosques. The city is still the seat of a Greek archbishop and an Armenian bishop.

EDICT (1) is an order issued by a ruler, either of command or prohibition. It is applied in church history to the orders of the Roman emperors relating to Christianity. From Trajan to Constantine these edicts had instituted persecution. But Constantine issued three which forbade meddling with Christians on the part of the authorities. Several religious edicts of previous Roman emperors are extant; but, as they are altogether too favorable to Christianity, grave doubt is thrown upon their genuineness. The distinction between an edict and a rescript is that the latter is issued in answer to an inquiry. See PERSECUTIONS, and KEIM, Rom und d. Christenthum, Berlin, 1881.

(2) Edict is the technical name for a formal invitation given by presbyteries in Scotland to all who know any thing against the character of a pastor-elect to come forward and testify.

EDIFICATION, a New-Testament designation, comparing the Church and the Christian believer to a house or temple (1 Cor. iii. 9; Eph. ii. 21). Christian character is an edifice built on Christ (Eph. ii. 20; Col. ii. 7), and enlarged by the Word (Acts xx. 32), Christian intercourse (1 Thess. v. 11), and all the other means of grace. The Holy Ghost himself dwells in the believer regarded as a temple (1 Cor. vi. 19); and the constant injunction is, that it should be kept holy, and thus be a fit sanctuary of God (1 Cor. iii. 17).

E'DOM, E'DOMITE, IDUMÆA, IDUMÆAN.

[Esau (עֵשָׂו), the twin-brother of Jacob, was the son of Isaac and Rebekah, and was so called because he was "hairy" (Gen. xxv. 25). He was subsequently named Edom (עֵדוּם, "red"), because he said to Jacob, "Feed me with that same red," meaning lentils (xxv. 30). The traits of their ancestor re-appear in the Edomites; for, like Esau, they were wild hunters, and of low spiritual tone.]

The Land of the Edomites was called Seir (שֵׁעִיר, "rugged"). The original inhabitants were the Horites ("dwellers in caves"), or troglodytes. The Edomites, who dispossessed them, are sometimes called "children of Seir" (2 Chron. xxv. 11, 14). The country lay south of the Dead Sea, and west of the Arabah (Josh. xv. 1; Judg. v. 4); although in a wider sense the same name is given to a stretch to the east of the Arabah (Deut. ii. 1). Poetically the country was the "Mount of Esau" (Obad. 8, 9, 19, 21). From the "Mount of Judah" it was separated by the wilderness of Zin (Josh. xv. 1). Bozrah (now Busairah) was, at all events, at times, its capital (Isa. xxxiv. 6). Among its other cities were Sela (Petra), in a narrow wady off the Arabah (2 Kings xiv. 7; Isa. xvi. 1); Maon (now Ma'an) (Judg. x. 12); Elath, or Eloth, and Ezion-geber, the important harbors at the northern end of the Red Sea (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Chron. viii. 17). The borders of the country varied, especially to the west and east, as their fortunes rose and fell. The country is mountainous; but the soil in the glens and on the mountain-terraces bears a luxuriant growth of plant and vegetable life,

The People and their History.—There were kings in the land of Edom "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. xxxvi. 31). The Edomites were brave warriors, and fond of the chase; but they also cultivated the soil, and carried on trade, especially from their great ports Elath and Ezion-geber. They, or at least the Temanites, one of their tribes, were famous for wisdom (Jer. xlix. 7; Obad. 8; cf. Eliphaz the Temanite, Job ii. 11). In religion they were polytheists, and probably Baal-worshippers. Their history as given in the Bible begins with the victory of their King Hadad over Midian (Gen. xxxvi. 35). When the Israelites, on their way to the promised land, asked permission to go through Edom, they were refused (Num. xx. 11-17), and therefore they went around (xx. 21). The insult was all the greater because of Moses' recognition of brotherhood in Edom. The ill feeling thus naturally produced increased; and, as soon as the Israelites were united under a king (Saul), they made war upon the Edomites, whom they now called "enemies," and under David brought them into subjection (1 Sam. xiv. 47; 1 Kings xi. 15 sqq.); in which condition they remained until the reign of Jehoram (2 Kings viii. 20-22), when they broke the yoke, and "made a king over themselves." Amaziah fifty years afterwards attempted to reconquer them, but was only partially successful (2 Kings xiv. 7; cf. 2 Chron. xxviii. 17). The later kings of Judah were too much engrossed by troubles with Assyria to undertake expeditions against Edom, and therefore the Edomites enjoyed independent government (Jer. xxvii. 3). The relations between the two kingdoms probably continued hostile: at all events the Edomites joined Nebuchadnezzar in the siege and pillage of Jerusalem, and therefore are cursed by the prophets (Ezek. xxxv. 15; Amos i. 11, 12; Obad. 10-16). They also improved the opportunity to leave their territory, and go as far north as Hebron (1 Macc. v. 65); and therefore the later name, Idumæa, designated quite another district than the old Edom. Into the lands they left, Arab tribes came, and built up a mighty kingdom, with Petra as its capital. The highly interesting ruins discovered at Petra by Burckhardt, in 1812, date from the time of the Roman rule. Petra gave at a later period the name Arabia Petraea to the whole land (see art. NABATHEANS). The old hate of Edom for Israel came out in the later relations of the two peoples (1 Macc. v. 3, 65; 2 Macc. x. 15, xii. 13 sqq.). John Hyrcanus (135-105 B.C.) forced the Idumæans to unite with the Jews and to receive circumcision (Joseph., Antiq., XIII. 9, 1, XV. 7, 9); but Antipater, the son of the governor of Idumæa, having gained Julius Cesar's favor, was by him appointed Procurator of Judæa (17 B.C.). His son was Herod the Great, whom the Roman senate appointed (10 B.C.) King of Judæa (Joseph., Antiq., XIV. 14, 4); and in his family the kingdom was held until the death of the last king, Agrippa II. (A.D. 100).

Under the Romans, Idumæa formed one of the eleven toparchies into which Judæa was divided (Joseph., War, III. 3, 5). During the confusion of the great Jewish war against Rome, the Idumæans make their last appearance on the stage of history, and their rôle is tragic. Twenty thousand of them came to Jerusalem on the invitation of John of Gischala and the Zealots; and, because they were not immediately received, they were so enraged that they caused the streets of Jerusalem to run with blood (Joseph., War, IV. 4 and 5).—Curiously enough the name of "Edomite" is given by the rabbins to the Romans, because the latter were also the death-foe to the Jews.

ED'REI (strength, stronghold) was (1.) the name of the second capital of Bashan, situated on the road which the Israelites under Moses followed to go from Gilead to Bashan, and the place where King Og attacked them, and lost his life (Num. xxi. 33; Deut. iii. 1-10). Its ruins, covering a space of three miles in circuit, and consisting of remains of temples, churches, and mosques, form the present Edhra or Der'at, a place inhabited by about five hundred souls.

(2.) A town of Naphtali, identified by Porter with Tell Khuraibeh, two miles south of Kedesh (Num. xix. 37).

EDUCATION AMONG THE HEBREWS, before the exile, consisted mainly in the knowledge of the distinctive tenets, facts, and symbolism of their religion, and was imparted by parents to their children (Exod. xii. 26, 27; Deut. iv. 9, vi. 6, 20). Some have inferred from Deut. vi. 8, 9, xxvii. 2-8, that a knowledge of reading and writing was common; but this is probably going too far. The priests, of course, could read and write; and thus there was always a large body of educated men. Educated laymen are also mentioned, such as the historians of the Judges and Kings, the surveyors of the promised land (Josh. xviii. 8, 9), and the diplomats, who conducted the business with foreign courts and peoples (2 Kings xviii. 26). That the mass of the people were illiterate was nothing particularly unfavorable to Judaism; for what ancient people, except possibly the Chinese, could show any different state of things? Popular education is, in our sense of the term, a very modern and Protestant phenomenon. It may be claimed for the ancient Hebrews that their sacred books and their profound religious mysteries and services gave them a mental training far superior to that of any contemporary nation.

From the mention of "sons of the prophets" (1 Kings xx. 35; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5), it has been inferred that certain young men were trained for the prophetic office in so-called "schools of the prophets," at Naioth (1 Sam. xix. 18--for this name is interpreted in the Targum "the house of learning"), Bethel, Jericho (2 Kings ii. 3, 5), and other places; but such training was given to few, and, besides, was technical, consisting of homiletics and music.

During the captivity the synagogue system of worship was developed; and as a consequence, a higher grade of intelligence in religious and educational matters characterized the national life. On the return, the disuse of Hebrew as a vernacular rendered instruction in it imperative, if the people at large were to understand their own sacred books. Contact with great nations like the Babylonian, the Greek, and the Roman, enlarged the Hebrew mind. Other things than religion claimed attention. Jerusalem became the seat of a university, and in strange contrast to former exclusiveness there was generous appreciation of heathen culture. In the towns and villages education was not carried so far. Reading and writing, the law, and the tenets of the Jewish faith, were probably the only topics taught. "At five years a child should study the Bible, at ten the Mishna, and at fifteen the Talmud." A graphic description of the school in Nazareth in our Lord's day is given by an anonymous writer in these words: [The school-room is] "the interior of a squalid building rudely constructed of stone, with a domed roof, and whitewashed walls, a wooden desk or cupboard on one side, and an inscription in Hebrew over the door. From the building, as we approach, comes the hum of many children's voices, repeating the verses of the sacred Torah [the law] in unthinking and perfunctory monotone. The aged teacher sits silent in the midst. As we look in, we see his huge turban, his gray beard, and solemn features, appearing over the ruddy faces of the dark-eyed boys who sit on the floor around him. The long row of tiny red slippers extends along the wall near the door. The earthen water-bottle stands on the mat beside the Khazzan, or synagogue teacher. The scholars are the children of the richer members of the village community; of the Betlanim, or 'men of leisure,' who form the representative congregation at every synagogue service; or of the 'standing men,' who go up yearly with the village priest for a week in Jerusalem, to fulfil similar functions in the temple ritual" (Rabbi Jeshua, Lond. and N.Y., 1881, pp. 23, 24).

Thus, even then, education was limited, and there was much ignorance; so that the phrase "country people" was synonymous with the "illiterate." Of these the contemptuous remark was made by the Sanhedrin, "This multitude which knoweth not the law are accursed" (John vii. 49). Very probably this ignorance was principally among the lowest class, the lineal descendants of the primitive settlers of Palestine, whose children are the wretched fellahin of today. According to Philo (On the Virtuous being also Free, Bohn's trans., vol. iii. 509) Josephus (Contra Apion, i. 12), and the Talmud, the pious Jews took great pains with their children's education. "Jerusalem was destroyed because the education of children was neglected." "The world is preserved by the breath of the children in the schools." So said the rabbins. The later Jews were taught a trade in their schools, and thus could earn their own living. That Saul of Tarsus, the learned pupil of the great rabbin Gamaliel, had a trade (tent-making) was quite in the order of things (Acts xviii. 3). The most celebrated doctors of the law supported themselves. — Unmarried men or women were forbidden to teach boys. The Essenes are honorably mentioned for their care of children.

Female education was of very limited extent among the Hebrews, as among all Oriental peoples; but more advantages were open to Hebrew mothers than to those of other lands. They were taught the law (for they were expected to join their husbands in educating their children) and also woman's proper work. The Hebrew ideal wife (Prov. xxxi. 10-31) was a woman of superior training, destitute though she might be of book-learning. To be a model wife and mother was set before the Hebrew maiden as a loftier object of womanly ambition than a so-called "higher education." Yet a few women acquired learning.

After the destruction of Jerusalem the Jewish rabbins set up high schools in other places. Two of these achieved great fame (Tiberias and Babylon); for they furnished respectively the Jerusalem and the Babylonian Talmud (i. e., the Gemara portion), in which they poured forth a stream of varied learning unparalleled in history. "The Talmud is an encyclopædia of all the sciences of that time, and shows that in many departments of science these Jewish teachers have anticipated modern discoveries." See the elaborate article on Schools, Hebrew, by Dr. Ginsburg, enlarged by Rev. B. Pick, Ph.D., in McCINTOCK and STRONG'S Cyclopædia, vol. ix. 429-435. Monographs to be mentioned are: MARCUS: Zur Schul-Pädagogik, Berlin, 1866; VAN GELDER: Die Volksschule des jüdischen Alterthums, Berlin, 1872; SIMON: L'éducation des enfants chez les anciens Juifs, 3d ed., Leipzig, 1879.

EDUCATION, Ministerial. — Organizations and Measures for aiding in. — From the earliest ages it has been the policy of the Christian Church to aid in the education of worthy but indigent students who had consecrated themselves to the gospel ministry. Calvin, in his Institutes, Book IV. chap. 4, § 9, speaking of the pattern set for us in this particular by the primitive fathers, says, "For to form a seminary which shall provide the church with future ministers, those holy men took under their charge, protection, and discipline such youths as, with the consent and sanction of their parents, enlisted themselves in the spiritual warfare. And so they educated themselves from an early age, that they might not enter on the discharge of their office ignorant and unprepared." And this custom was kept up through the middle ages by the monastic schools, which were liberally endowed for this purpose by pious souls, and it is still maintained everywhere by the Roman Church. Her priests are to this day all and altogether educated at the church's expense. The Protestant churches have been no less wisely liberal in their provisions for the supply of their pulpits. Neither by those of the Lutheran or Reformed name was poverty allowed to bar any worthy young man from the privilege of qualifying himself for the Christian ministry: aid was furnished him, sometimes by scholarships attached to the schools, and sometimes by contributions taken up directly for this purpose by the congregations, and sometimes by private mu-nificance. As an example may be cited the act passed by the first national synod of the French Reformed Church in 1559: "In order that the church may be furnished with a sufficient number of pastors and other persons fit to govern them, and preach the word of God unto them, they shall be advised to choose those scholars who are already well advanced in good learning, and of most promising and hopeful parts, and to maintain such in the universities, that they may be fitted and prepared for the work of the ministry. Kings, princes, and the nobility shall be petitioned and exhorted particularly to mind this important affair, and to lay by some part of their revenues towards their maintenance; and the richer churches shall do the like. Colloquies (i.e., presbyteries) shall, as they see meet, take the best measures in the premises that matters of so great necessity may be successful. If single churches have not means, their neighbors shall join them, so that one poor scholar at least may be maintained in every colloquy. And, in order that this design shall not fail, every fifth penny of all churches shall be set apart, when it may conveniently be done, to be employed in this service." A like policy was general throughout the Reformed bodies of France.

In 1641 the General Assembly of the Scotch Church recommended that every presbytery consisting of twelve ministers should maintain one bursar, and, when the number was fewer than twelve, they should be joined to another presbytery. Four years later, the minimum of aid ordered to be given was put at a hundred pounds scots yearly. Shortly after the session of the Westminster Assembly, a society for securing and aiding candidates of the ministry was organized by leading divines and laymen, several of whom were members of that assembly; and among these were such men as Baxter, Bates, Poole, Stillingfleet, and Cudworth. This movement, however, came to an end soon after the Restoration. The Church of England attains the same result by scholarship endowments at her universities.

In the United States of America the scarcity of ministers, and the exigencies of an extending population, constrained the leading ecclesiastical bodies and prominent members in the church early to adopt vigorous measures for meeting the demand thus created. Colleges were founded at Cambridge (1636) and New Haven (1700) and in New Jersey (1748), where education was freely granted to young men contemplating the ministry who were unable to defray their own expenses. In 1751 the synod of New York "recommended an annual collection from all its churches for the support of young students whose circumstances render them incapable of maintaining themselves at learning." Funds also were obtained from England and Scotland and Ireland for this same cause, but with special reference to the supply of the ministry. In 1770 the combined synods of New York and Philadelphia approved and recommended a plan proposed by the president of New Castle "for the assistance of candidates for the ministry by assessments in proportion to the number of ministers and on vacant congregations, as well as by voluntary annual subscription." These and other initiatory measures culminated in the organization of a "board of education" by the General Assembly in 1819. This board with various modifications of rules and measures, has continued until this time. At present (1881) the maximum appropriation for a student, when the funds allow it, is a hundred and fifty dollars for students in college and theological seminary. Besides the aid thus given, there are scholarships attached to her institutions, of which worthy students may avail themselves. Full three-fourths of her ministry have thus been more or less helped into sacred orders.

There is also a board of education in Presbyterian churches (South), conducted on the same principles.

In the Episcopal Church the education work is left to the several dioceses, some of which have small societies collecting each a few hundred dollars per year. It has, besides, two general societies representing the two prominent schools of thought in the Church; viz., the Society for the Increase of the Ministry (organized 1857, and having its office in New York, mainly High Church in its tendencies, which has helped to ordination five hundred and fifty young men), and the Evangelical Education Society (organized 1862, and having its office in Philadelphia, which has contributed two hundred and fifty men to the ministry). It acts upon a liberal policy, and grants stipends according to the needs of the student, even to the amount of three hundred dollars per annum.

In 1815 was formed the American Education Society, a voluntary association, combining among its members at the first both Presbyterians and Congregationalists, but of late years confined almost exclusively to the latter body. For a long period this society was strengthened by auxiliary bodies organized in the several States of the North and in parts of the West; but these auxiliaries have now altogether expired. In 1873 this society was united under one administration with the college society, and has its office in Boston. Besides annual contributions from the Church, it has fifty-four endowed scholarships, the revenues of which go to aid students. The whole number of students aided by it up to the year 1880 is 6,724.

The Baptists have no general education society; but, instead, they have a number of limited organizations scattered throughout the States. Of these there are at present nine. The amount of aid granted by these varies according to the need of the students; some receiving per year between two hundred and fifty and three hundred dollars.

The Board of Education of the Methodist-Episcopal Church was organized in 1869, and has several auxiliary societies established in different parts of the Union. Its scope is broader than most of the other kindred organizations; as it contemplates aiding, not only individual students, but also literary and theological institutions, both at home and abroad. The grants made to students are chiefly in the form of loans, to be paid back at the earliest opportunity.

The Reformed Church (lately Dutch), the Lutheran Church, the German-Reformed Church, and indeed nearly all other Christian bodies, operate on the same principle to secure a ministry among themselves suited to edify their congregations, and command public respect. And we must add, that it is to the wise and liberal policy thus pursued the fact is largely due that the ministry of Protestant Christendom throughout the world has attained its present high repute, not only for sound moral and religious character, but also for broad intelligence and extensive learning.

D. W. POOR.

EDWARDS, Bela Bates, D.D., was b. in Southampton, Mass., July 4, 1802; graduated at Amherst College in 1821, at Andover Theological Seminary in 1830. In the two years 1826-28 he was a tutor in Amherst College, and in the five years 1828-33 he was assistant secretary of the American Education Society. In 1837 he was ordained as a minister of the gospel, and was also appointed professor of the Hebrew language in Andover Theological Seminary. Professor Moses Stuart having resigned his office in 1848, Professor Edwards was elected as his successor. In this professorship he explained the Hebrew and Greek Scriptures with great accuracy and success. He was an enthusiast in sacred philology. He injured his constitution by his unremitting toil. In 1816, in consequence of enfeebled health, he made an extended tour in Europe, visiting England, France, Germany, and Italy. In 1851 he was again compelled to absent himself from Andover, and spend the winter in the South. He died at Athens, Ga., April 20, 1852 when he was nearly fifty years of age. He was distinguished not only as a skilful instructor, but also as a wise counsellor. He united soundness of judgment with rare delicacy of taste and poetic sensibility. Without grace of elocution, he was an eloquent preacher. The tenderness of his sensibilities, and the earnestness of his piety, were indicated in his countenance and tones of voice, as well as in his pure and classical language. He originated and planned many philanthropic institutions, among others, that which has resulted in the Congregational Library at Boston. He published various addresses and sermons, and an indefinite number of newspaper articles. In 1831 he edited the Memoir of Henry Martyn, and added to it valuable Notes and an Introductory Essay. His character bore a striking resemblance to that of Martyn. In 1832 and 1835 he edited two high-school books, The Eclectic Reader and The Introduction to the Eclectic Reader. In 1832 he published The Biography of Self-taught Men, also The Missionary Gazetteer. The former of these works has been repeatedly republished. In 1839 he united with E. A. Park in a volume of Selections from German Literature. In 1843 he united with Dr. Sears, afterward president of Brown University, and Professor Felton, afterward president of Harvard College, in publishing a volume entitled Classical Studies. In 1844 he and Dr. Samuel H. Taylor translated and published the larger Greek Grammar of Dr. Kühner. While assistant secretary of the Education Society, he became an editor of The American Quarterly Register, and had the chief care of this periodical from 1828 to 1842. In 1833 he founded The American Quarterly Observer, took the sole care of it for three years, and then united it with The American Biblical Repository, which, during the four preceding years, had been edited by Professor Robinson at Andover. In 1844, in conjunction with E. A. Park, he established the Bibliotheca Sacra on its present plan. Of this periodical he remained editor-in-chief until 1852. Mainly through his influence The Biblical Repository, then published in New York, was united with the Bibliotheca Sacra in 1851. For twenty-three years he was employed in superintending periodical literature, and, with the assistance of several associates, has left thirty-one octavo volumes as the monuments of his enterprise and industry. As an early and active friend of two important academies and of Amherst College, which he served as a trustee, as a director of the American Education Society, and a zealous member of other philanthropic institutions, he performed a vast amount of labor, the results of which will long remain. Some of his discourses and essays were published in Boston in 1853, in two duodecimo volumes. The first volume contains a Memoir in 370 pages by the editor.

EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, John, D.D., b. at Hertford, Feb. 26, 1637; d. at Cambridge, April 16, 1716. He was "a zealous Calvinist, and a most voluminous writer." His principal works were, Discourse concerning the authority, stile and perfection of the books of the Old and New Testament, London, 1693, 3 vols.; A complete history, or survey, of all the dispensations and methods of religion from the beginning of the world to the consummation of all things, as represented in the Old and New Testament, London, 1699, 2 vols.; The preacher, London, 1705-1709, 3 vols.; Theologia reformata, London, 1713-26, 3 vols. folio.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, the Elder. The ancestors of Jonathan Edwards in this country were notable men. His great-grandfather, William, and his grandfather, Richard, were among the pillars of society in Hartford, Conn. His father, Rev. Timothy Edwards, was born at Hartford, in May, 1669, graduated with distinguished honor at Harvard College in 1691, ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in "Windsor Farms," now East Windsor, Conn., in 1694. He remained pastor of this church more than sixty-three years, and died Jan. 27, 1758, at the age of eighty-eight. There was a marked resemblance between the sermons of the father and those of his son. — The mother of Jonathan Edwards was Esther Stoddard, daughter of the noted "father in Israel," Solomon Stoddard, who for more than fifty-six years (1672-1729) was pastor of the Congregational Church in Northampton, Mass. She was a woman of queenly presence and admirable character. She was born in 1672, married in 1694, became the mother of eleven children, and died in 1770, in the ninety-ninth year of her age. Ten of her eleven children were daughters; Jonathan being the only brother in a nest of sisters, four of whom were elder, and six younger, than himself. He was born in East Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703. In his early years he was instructed, partly at the public school, chiefly by his parents and sisters, at home. His father being an excellent classical scholar, his mother being uncommonly intelligent and refined, his elder sisters being well trained in Latin and Greek, were the best instructors he could have had. He began the study of Latin when he was only six years old. Before he was thirteen, he had acquired a good knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. In his childhood he was taught to think with his pen in hand. — thus to think definitely, in order that he might express his thoughts clearly. When he was about nine years old he wrote an interesting letter on Materialism, and when he was about twelve he wrote some remarkable papers on questions in natural philosophy. One month before he was thirteen years of age, he entered Yale College. There he spent four years, and was graduated, with the highest honors of his class, in 1720. At the age of fourteen, one of his college studies was Locke on the Human Understanding. "Taking that book into his hand upon some occasion, not long before his death, he said to some of his select friends who were then with him, that he was beyond expression entertained and pleased with it when he read it in his youth at college; that he was as much engaged, and had more satisfaction and pleasure, in studying it, than the most greedy miser in gathering up handfuls of silver and gold from some new-discovered treasure."

As a child, his sensibilities were often aroused by the truths of religion. He united himself to the church, probably at East Windsor, about the time of his graduation at college. After his graduation he spent nearly two years as a resident scholar in New Haven: then and there he pursued his theological studies. He was "approved" as a preacher in June or July, 1722, several months before he was nineteen years of age. From August, 1722, until April, 1723, he preached to a small Presbyterian Church in New-York city. Here he penned the first thirty-four of his well-known Resolutions, and some exquisitely poetical descriptions of the spiritual life. His eloquence in the pulpit moved his hearers deeply. They desired him to become their pastor, but he felt impelled to labor elsewhere. In September, 1723, he was appointed a tutor in Yale College. He devoted himself to severe study in the winter and spring of 1723-24, and entered on his tutorship in June, 1724. In this office he remained about two years.

On the 15th of February, 1727, when in his twenty-fourth year, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church at Northampton. On the 27th of the next July he was married to Sarah Pierrepont, daughter of Rev. James Pierrepont, "an eminent, pious, and useful minister at New Haven," one of the fathers and trustees of Yale College. At the time of her marriage she was in the eighteenth year of her age, was distinguished by her graceful and expressive features, her vigorous mind, fine culture, and fervent piety. The description which Mr. Edwards gave of her in her girlhood was regarded by Dr. Chalmers as a model of fine writing. During her married life she relieved her husband of many burdens which are commonly laid upon a parish minister, and thus enabled him to pursue his studies with comparatively few interruptions.

During the first two years of his pastorate he was colleague with his grandfather, the celebrated Solomon Stoddard; but in 1729, after the death of his grandfather, he took the entire charge of the congregation. As a youthful preacher he was eminent for his weighty thought and fervid utterance. His voice was not commanding, his gestures were few; he was apt to keep his eye fixed upon one spot above the front gallery of his meeting-house: but many of his sermons were overwhelming. He wrote some of them in full. Often he spoke extempore, oftener from brief but suggestive notes. The traditions relating to their power and influence appear well-nigh fabulous.

In 1734-35 there occurred in his parish a "great awakening" of religious feeling; in 1740-41 occurred another, which extended through a large part of New England. At this time he became specially intimate with George Whitefield. During these exciting scenes, Mr. Edwards manifested the rare comprehensiveness of his mind. He did not favor the extravagances attending the new measures of the revivalists; but he felt compelled to advocate the principle out of which those extravagances needlessly sprang. He did more, perhaps, than any other American divine in promoting the doctrinal purity, and at the same time quickening the zeal, of the churches; in restraining them from fanaticism, and at the same time stimulating them to a healthy enthusiasm. His writings were in his own day, and are in our day, a kind of classic authority for discriminating between the warmth of sound health and the heat of a fever. He did not remain stationary, like the centre of a circle: he moved in an orbit not eccentric, but well-rounded and complete.

As early as 1744 he preached with great vehemence against certain demoralizing practices in which some of his parishioners indulged. He offended several influential families by his method of opposing those practices. In process of time he became convinced that his grandfather, Mr. Stoddard, was wrong in permitting unconverted persons to partake of the Lord's Supper. He feared, that, in resisting the authority of Mr. Stoddard, he would make a sacrifice of himself. He followed his convictions: he made the sacrifice. After a prolonged and earnest controversy, he was ejected from the pastorate which he had adorned for more than twenty-three years.

In August, 1751, about a year after his dismissal from Northampton, Edwards was installed pastor of the small Congregational Church in Stockbridge, Mass., and missionary of the Housatonnuck tribe of Indians at that place. Here he was in the wilderness. He was sadly afflicted with the fever and ague and other disorders incident to the new settlement. His labors were interrupted by the French and Indian War. He persevered, however, with marked fidelity in his mission. He preached to the Indians through an interpreter. He gained their admiration and their love.

While living in a kind of exile, among the Indians at Stockbridge, he was invited to the presidency of the college at Princeton, N.J. He was elected to the office on the 26th of September, 1757. He was reluctant to accept it; but finally yielded to the advice of others, and was dismissed from his Stockbridge pastorate, Jan. 4, 1758, after having labored in it six years and a half. He spent a part of January and all of February at Princeton, performing some duties at the college, but was not inaugurated until the 16th of February, 1758. One week after his inauguration he was inoculated for the small-pox. After the ordinary effects of the inoculation had nearly subsided, a secondary fever supervened, and he died on the 22d of March, 1758. He had then resided at Princeton about nine weeks, and had been the inaugurated president of the college just five weeks. His age was fifty-four years, five months, and seventeen days. His aged father died only two months before him. His son-in-law, President Burr, died in his forty-second year, only six months before him. His daughter, Mrs. President Burr (the mother of Vice-President Burr), died in her twenty-seventh year, only sixteen days after him. His wife died in her forty-ninth year, only six months and ten days after him.

While the pastor at Northampton, President Edwards published the following works: God glorified in Man's Dependence, 1731; A Divine and Supernatural Light Imparted to the Soul by the Spirit of God, 1734 (a sermon noted for its spiritual philosophy; the hearers of it at Northampton requested it for the press); Curse ye Meroz, 1735; A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of many Hundred Souls in Northampton, etc., London, 1736; Five Discourses prefixed to the American Edition of this Narrative, 1738; Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God, 1741 (one of his most terrific sermons; frequently republished; severely criticised without regard to the character and condition of the persons to whom it was preached); Sorrows of the Bereaved spread before Jesus, 1741; Distinguishing Marks of a Work of the True Spirit, 1741; Thoughts on the Revival in New England, etc., 1742; The Watchman's Duty and Account, 1743; The True Excellency of a Gospel Minister, 1744; A Treatise concerning Religious Affections, 1746 (one of his most spiritual and analytical works; "it will no doubt always be considered as one of the most important guards against a spurious religion"); An Humble Attempt to promote Explicit Agreement and Visible Union among God's People in Extraordinary Prayer, 1746; True Saints when Absent from the Body Present with the Lord, 1747; God's Awful Judgments in breaking the Strong Rods of the Community, 1748; Life and Diary of the Rev. David Brainerd, 1749 (a volume which exerted a decisive influence on Henry Martyn, and has affected the missionary spirit of the English as well as American churches: Brainerd was a beloved pupil of Edwards, and was engaged to be married to Edwards's second daughter, Jerusha); Christ the Example of Gospel Ministers, 1749; Qualifications for Full Communion in the Visible Church, 1749 (a treatise of great historical not less than theological importance); Forewell Sermon to the People of Northampton, 1750. After he had left his first pastorate, his more important works were published; some of them not until after his death: Misrepresentations Corrected, and Truth Vindicated, in a Reply to Mr. Solomon Williams's Book on Qualifications for Communion, to which is added a Letter from Mr. Edwards to his Lote Flock at Northampton, 1752; True Grace distinguished from the Experience of Devils, 1752; An Essay on the Freedom of the Will, 1754 (Dr. Chalmers said that he recommended to his pupils this Treatise on the Will "more strenuously" than any other "book of human composition;" and he added, it was "read by me forty-seven years ago, with a conviction that has never since faltered, and which has helped me, more than any other uninspired book, to find my way through all that might otherwise have proved baffling and transcendental and mysterious in the peculiarities of Calvinism"); The Great Christian Doctrine of Original Sin defended, etc., 1758; Eighteen Sermons annexed to Dr. Samuel Hopkins's Memoir of Edwards, 1761; History of Redemption, 1772; Dissertation concerning the End for which God created the World, and Dissertation concerning the Nature of True Virtue, 1788; Two New Volumes of Sermons, 1789 and 1793; Miscellaneous Observations on Important Theological Subjects, 1793; Remarks on Important Theological Controversies, 1796; Types of the Messiah, 1829; Notes on the Bible, 1829; Charity and its Fruits, 1851 (edited by Rev. Dr. Tryon Edwards, and republished in 1872 under the title of Christian Love as Manifested in the Heart and Life); Selections from the unpublished writings of Jonathan Edwards, 1865 (edited by Rev. Alexander D. Grosart. See Bibliotheca Sacra, vol. xxxviii. pp. 147-187, 333-369).

The published works of Edwards were collected, and printed in eight volumes, at Worcester, Mass., under the editorship of Dr. Samuel Austin, in 1809. A larger edition of his writings, in ten volumes, including a new Memoir and much new material, was published at New York, in 1829, under the editorial care of Rev. Dr. Sereno Edwards Dwight. Some of Edwards's writings were originally published, and many of them have been republished, in Great Britain. They have been collected in an English edition, and published by Messrs. Ogle & Murray, Edinburgh. The edition more commonly used in the United States at the present time is entitled The Works of President Edwards, in four volumes; a Reprint of the Worcester Edition, with Valuable Additions, and a Copious Index, New York.

The works of Edwards have received the highest encomiums from Dr. John Erskine, Dugald Stewart, Sir Henry Moncrief, Dr. Priestley, Dr. George Hill, Isaac Taylor, and other British scholars. Robert Hall says, "I consider Jonathan Edwards the greatest of the sons of men. He ranks with the brightest luminaries of the Christian Church, not excluding any country or any age, since the apostolic." Sir James Mackintosh says of Edwards, "This remarkable man, the metaphysician of America. . . His power of subtle argument, perhaps unmatched, certainly unsurpassed, among men, was joined, as in some of the ancient mystics, with a character which raised his piety to fervor." Robert Morehead says, "Edwards comes nearer Bishop Butler as a philosophical divine than any other theologian with whom we are acquainted." EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, Jonathan, the Younger, was the second son and ninth child of Jonathan Edwards the Elder, and was b. at Northampton, Mass., May 26, 1745. In 1788 he said of himself, "When I was but six years of age, my father removed with his family to Stockbridge, which at that time was inhabited by Indians almost solely, as there were in the town but twelve families of whites, or Anglo-Americans, and perhaps one hundred and fifty families of Indians. The Indians being the nearest neighbors, I constantly associated with them: their boys were my daily schoolmates and playfellows. Out of my father's house I seldom heard any language spoken but the Indian. By these means I acquired the knowledge of that language, and a great facility in speaking it. It became more familiar to me than my mother-tongue. I knew the names of some things in Indian that I did not know in English. Even all my thoughts ran in Indian; and, though the true pronunciation of the language is extremely difficult to all but themselves, they acknowledged that I had acquired it perfectly, which, as they said, had never been done before by any Anglo-American. On account of my skill in their language in general, I received from them many compliments applauding my superior wisdom. This skill in their language I have in a good measure retained to this day.

The elder Edwards, being himself a missionary to the Indians, intended that his son should be one also, and therefore sent him, in October, 1755, to a settlement of the Oneida Indians, on the banks of the Susquehanna, in order that he might learn their language. At this time the boy was not eleven years old. He was accompanied by his father's friend, Rev. Gideon Hawley, and resided about six months in the family of Mr. Hawley, the noted missionary to the Oneidas. The boy endeared himself to the Oneida tribe; and on one occasion, when they expected an attack from the French, the Indians took him upon their shoulders, and bore him many miles through the wilderness to a place of safety. The settlement of the Oneidas was about one hundred miles distant from any English settlement; but young Edwards exhibited a rare degree of courage, fortitude, and perseverance. He uttered no complaint, when, in the depth of winter, he was compelled to sleep on the ground in the open air. He returned to Stockbridge in 1756, and resided there until January, 1758, when his father removed to Princeton. In less than ten weeks after that removal the father died, and in less than seven months after the father's death the mother died; and thus in his fourteenth year young Edwards was left an orphan.

He entered the grammar-school at Princeton in February, 1760; was admitted to Princeton College in September, 1761, and was graduated there in September, 1765. He became a member of the church in 1763, studied theology with Dr. Joseph Bellamy in 1765-66, and was "approved" as a preacher, in October, 1766, by the Litchfield County Association in Connecticut. In his early childhood he had been afflicted with an ocular disease, and therefore did not learn to read at so early an age as his instincts prompted. His father's ecclesiastical troubles deprived him of certain facilities for his education; but his native power triumphed over all discouragements. He was indefatigably diligent while at college; was appointed a tutor there in 1767, remained in that office two years, and received an appointment (which, however, he declined) to a professorship of languages and logic in the college. On the 5th of January, 1769, he was ordained as pastor of an important church in New Haven, Conn. He remained in this office more than twenty-six years. Several members of his church were advocates of the "Half-way Covenant;" he opposed it. His pastorate was also disturbed by the spiritual re-action which had followed the "great awakening" in 1740-42, and by the demoralizing influences of the Revolutionary War. The result was his dismissal from his pastorate on the 19th of May, 1795.

In January, 1796, he was installed pastor of the church in Colebrook, Conn. Here he desired and intended to pass the residue of his life. His parishioners were intelligent, affectionate, and confiding. They gave him leisure to pursue his theological and philosophical inquiries. In May, 1799, however, he was elected president of Union College, Schenectady, N.Y. As he had declined a professorship at Princeton, so he was prompted to decline the presidency of Union College. He applied to an ecclesiastical council for advice: the advice was in favor of his removal. He was therefore dismissed in June, and entered on the duties of his presidency in July, 1799. He discharged his duties with his accustomed fidelity. His reputation as a philosopher gave him an uncommon influence over his pupils, and his skill as a teacher heightened his reputation as a philosopher. He remained in this office, however, but a short time. About the middle of July, 1801, he was attacked by an intermittent fever, and on the 1st of August, 1801, he died. A sermon was preached at Schenectady, on occasion of his death, by his friend Rev. Robert Smith of Savannah; another sermon was preached at New Haven by President Timothy Dwight.

The college at Princeton conferred on Mr. Edwards the degree of D.D.: hence he is usually styled "Dr." Edwards, in distinction from his father, who is styled "President" Edwards.

As a theological teacher Dr. Edwards was eminently successful. He was powerful in his conversation with his pupils, a prince among disputants. Several of his scholars in theology rose to eminence. One of them was his nephew, Timothy Dwight, President of Yale College; another was Dr. Edward Dorr Griffin, President of Williams College; still another was Dr. Samuel Austin, President of Burlington College. Each of these presidents bore hearty testimony to his faithfulness and skill as a teacher. Among his other pupils were Dr. Samuel Nott and Dr. Jedediah Morse.

One great work of Dr. Edwards's life was his editorship of his father's writings. He was an early and confidential friend of Dr. Joseph Bellamy and Dr. Samuel Hopkins. From them, especially from the latter, he obtained many nice discriminations in regard to the President's theories. He studied the President's writings with great assiduity. He prepared for the press the President's History of the Work of Redemption, also his Miscellaneous Observations on Important Theological Subjects, his Remarks on Important Theological Controversies, and two volumes of Sermons. After careful study of his father's doctrinal system, as that system was modified by Hopkins, Bellamy, Smalley, and others, Dr. Edwards was well fitted to write his noted paper on the Improvements in Theology made by President Edwards and those who have followed his Course of Thought. It is in his published works that the influence of Dr. Edwards has been most conspicuous. While he was at Colebrook he published, in 1797, A Dissertation concerning Liberty and Necessity, in Reply to the Rev. Dr. Samuel West. Perhaps this volume is the fairest exposition yet given of President Edwards's theory of the will.

Dr. Edwards published a large number of articles in The New York Theological Magazine, over the signatures "I" and "O." He also published many sermons: one in 1783, at the ordination of Rev. Timothy Dwight, at Greenfield, Conn.; one in 1791, on the Injustice and Impolicy of the Slave-trade (Dr. Edwards, like his friend Hopkins, was an early opponent of the slave system); one in 1791, on Human Depravity; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. Dan Bradley, at Hampden; one in 1792, at the ordination of Rev. William Brown at Glastenbury; one in 1792 (Concio ad Clerum), preached in the chapel of Yale College, on the Marriage of a Deceased Wife's Sister; one in 1793, on the Death of Roger Sherman; an Election Sermon, in 1794; a Sermon on the Future State of Existence, and the Immortality of the Soul, in 1797; and a Farewell Sermon to the people of Colebrook, in 1799. The most celebrated of his discourses are the three On the Necessity of the Atonement, and its Consistency with Free Grace in Forgiveness. They were "preached before his Excellency the Governor, and a large number of both Houses of the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, during their sessions at New Haven, in October, 1785, and published by request." They have been frequently republished; and they form the basis of that theory of the atonement which is sometimes called the "Edwardean theory," and is now commonly adopted by what is termed the "New-England school of divines." Closely connected with this volume was another, entitled The Salvation of all Men strictly examined, and the Endless Punishment of those who die impenitent, argued and defended against the Reasonings of Dr. Chauncey in his book entitled "The Salvation of all Men." This work was originally published in 1789, but has been frequently republished. It exhibits a singular acuteness of mind, a depth of penetration, a rare precision of thought and style. In 1788 he published a paper which established his fame as a philologist, and has elicited the enthusiastic praises of Humboldt. This work is entitled Observations on the Language of the Muhhekaneew Indians, in which the Extent of that Language in North America is shown, its Genius grammatically traced, and some of its Peculiarities, and some Instances of Analogy between that and the Hebrew, are pointed out. These observations were "communicated to the Connecticut Society of Arts and Sciences, and published at the request of the Society." One of the most accomplished of American linguists, Hon. John Pickering, who edited one edition of this paper, says of it, "The work has been for some time well known in Europe, where it has undoubtedly contributed to the diffusion of more just ideas than once prevailed respecting the structure of the Indian languages, and has served to correct some of the errors into which learned men had been led by placing too implicit confidence in the accounts of hasty travellers and blundering interpreters. In the Mithridates, that immortal monument of philological research, Professor Vater refers to it for the information he has given upon the Mohegan language, and he has published large extracts from it. To a perfect familiarity with the Muhhekaneew dialect, Dr. Edwards united a stock of grammatical and other learning which well qualified him for the task of reducing an unwritten language to the rules of grammar."

Nearly all of Dr. Edwards's published writings were collected and reprinted in two octavo volumes, each of above five hundred pages, in 1842. Rev. Tryon Edwards, D.D., edited them, and prefixed to them a Memoir.

Dissimilar as the two Edwardses were in some, they were similar to each other in many, respects. Dr. Samuel Miller of Princeton says, "The son greatly resembled his venerable father in metaphysical acuteness, in ardent piety, and in the purest exemplariness of Christian deportment." The son, like the father, was a tutor in the college where he had been a student; was first ordained over a prominent church in the town where his maternal grandfather had been the pastor; was dismissed on account of his doctrinal opinions; was afterwards the minister of a retired parish; was then president of a college; and died at the age of about fifty-five years, soon after his inauguration. His Memoir states that both father and son preached, on the first sabbath of the January preceding their death, from the text, "This year thou shalt die." EDWARDS A. PARK.

EDWARDS, Justin, D.D., b. in Westhampton, Mass., April 25, 1787; d. at Virginia Springs, July 23, 1853. He was settled in the ministry at Andover, Mass., 1812-28; was one of the founders of the Tract Society at Boston, 1814; and in 1825, with fifteen others, founded the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance, of which he was, from 1829 to 1836, the efficient secretary. From 1837 to 1842 he was president of the seminary at Andover. In the latter year he became secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union. He was the author of numerous popular tracts, and a work upon The Sabbath. For several years he was engaged upon a commendable Bible commentary, of which the New Testament was finished; and the first volume of the Old Testament was in the press of the American Tract Society, Boston, at the time of his death. See WILLIAM A. HALLOCK: Life and Labors of the Rev. Justin Edwards, D.D., N. Y., 1856.

EDZARDI, Ezra, b. at Hamburg, June 28, 1629; d. there Jan. 1, 1708; studied at Leipzig, Wittenberg, and Tübingen, and more especially at Basel, under Buxtorf. On his return to Hamburg he declined to accept any office, and lived as a private teacher of Hebrew, and as a missionary among the Jews. In both respects he was very successful. His fame as a Hebrew scholar drew pupils to his school from all Germany. Most of his writings still remain in manuscript. See MÖLLER: Cimbria literata, III. p. 221; GLEISS: E. E. ein alter Judenfreund, Hamburg, 1871. — His youngest son, Sebastian Edzardi, b. at Hamburg, Aug. 1, 1673, d. there June 10, 1736, succeeded him as teacher and missionary, but became more noticeable as a polemist against the Reformed Church. Several of his books were publicly burnt at Berlin. See MÖLLER: Cimbria literata, I. 147-151.

EGBERT, St., b. in Northumbria [639]; d. at Ily [April 24], 729; was monk in the monastery of Rathmelsigi, and made, when smitten by the plague (644), the vow, that, if he recovered, he would go to foreign countries to preach the gospel to the Pagans. He recovered, and immediately set out for Germany, but was by storm compelled to return, and settled in the monastery of Ily. Thence he sent out Wictbert and twelve others missionaries to Friesland, and contributed much to stimulate the missionary zeal of the Scoto-Irish Church. In Ily he persuaded the monks to adopt the Roman calculation of Easter and the Roman tonsure. See BEDA: Hist. Eccl. Angl., III. 27, V. 10, 11, 23.

HERZOG.

EGBERT, or ECQBERT, Archbishop of York, a pupil and friend of Bede, was first teacher in the cathedral school of York, and brought it into a flourishing condition by his talent and learning. Among his pupils were Alcuin and Albert. In 731 he was made Bishop of York; and in 735 York was made an archiepiscopal see, with metropolitan authority over all bishoprics north of the Humber. He continued, however, his activity as teacher in the school till his death, 767. Alcuin he appointed librarian of the library he founded, and also his successor as teacher. He left a collection of canonical prescriptions: De jure sacerdotali, of which, however, only fragments are still extant; Dialogus de ecclesiastica institutionis; De remediis peccatorum, probably an extract from the first-mentioned work made by another hand,—all to be found in MANSI, XII. The penitentials ascribed to him are not by him.

HERZOG.

EGEDE, Hans, the apostle of the Greenlanders, b. at Senjen, in the northern part of Norway, Jan. 31, 1686; d. at Stubbekjøbing in the Danish island of Falster, Nov. 5, 1758; studied theology in the University of Copenhagen, and was appointed pastor of Waagen, one of the Lofoten Islands, 1707. In the same year he married Gertrude Rask. From his brother-in-law, a whaler from Bergen, he heard that the south-western part of Greenland was inhabited by heathen savages; and the reading of old Norwegian chronicles made him believe that these heathen savages were descendants of former Norwegian colonists. Greenland was, indeed, discovered by Pagan Norsemen from Iceland in the tenth century; and, the natives having been pushed towards the interior, a flourishing colony was founded on the south-western coast. Under Olaf the Saint, about 1000, Christianity was introduced in this colony. In 1055 an itinerant bishop was established there by the archbishop of Bremen, and in 1125 a fixed episcopal see was founded by the Archbishop of Lund. Sixteen congregations, with their churches and several large monasteries, belonged to the diocese. But in 1345 the whole of Scandinavia was scourged by the "black death;" and so completely was the mother-country paralyzed, that all communication with the colony in Greenland immediately stopped. For half a century the colony strove along as best it could; but the natives took advantage of its insolation, and attacked it time after time. The last authentic report which reached Norway from it dates from 1110. In the sixteenth and seventeenth century the Danish kings, Norway being at that time united with Denmark, tried to vindicate their rights to the country, and establish mercantile connections; but the attempts failed. The real reconqueror of the country was Hans Egede. He had made up his mind that he would go thither, and preach the gospel to the heathen savages; and he realized his plan in spite of all difficulties. He first addressed the bishops of Bergen and Drontheim, the newly established committee of missions in Copenhagen, and the king himself (Frederik IV.), without obtaining any thing but bland words. Understanding that he had to take the whole task upon himself, or leave it undone, he resigned his position in Waagen, 1717, and went, with wife and children, to Bergen. By combining a mercantile enterprise with his missionary project he succeeded in forming a company willing to support him; and May 3, 1721, he left Bergen on board the vessel "Hope," and started for Greenland with his family. In the last moment he received notice from Copenhagen that the king would contribute three hundred dollars a year.

July 3, 1721, Egede landed on the south-western coast of Greenland; and he was immediately met with a disappointment, as the heathen savages turned out to be Esquimaux, and not at all descendants of the old Norwegian colonists. A settlement was made, however, at Godt-Haab ("Good Hope"), and the work was begun. The Greenlanders proved ignorant and stupid, kind but shy, and the tradesmen scared them away. Only through the intercourse between his own children and theirs was Egede able to come into relations with them, to learn their language, and to induce them to listen to him. Nevertheless, already (in 1723) a new settlement could be made; and Luther's catechism was translated into the native tongue. But in 1727 the trading company of Bergen dissolved; in 1730 Frederik IV. died; and in 1731 Egede received notice that the royal support would be withdrawn, and that all Europeans should return home immediately, or remain on their own risk. Egede hesitated; but when the Greenlanders themselves implored him to stay, and his wife consented, he remained. The new king, however (Christian VI.), belonged to the Pietists, and when Count Zinzendorf came to Copenhagen he easily induced the king to renew the support: only it was for the future to be divided with another mission, sent out by the Moravian Brethren; and with this mission Egede could not work in harmony. But the troubles thus arising were soon forgotten for that horrible calamity which befell the country in 1735. A Greenland lad returning from Copenhagen brought the small-pox with him; and in the course of a few months more than three thousand people died. The misery was unspeakable. The settlements were transformed to graveyards. Egede's wife died. He himself held out heroically as long as the hardships demanded his exertions; but when all was over he felt himself a broken man. July 29, 1735, he preached his farewell sermon, intrusted the work to his son Paul, and returned to Copenhagen. In Denmark the Greenland mission had in the mean time awakened much interest. A seminary for the education of fit laborers was established, and Egede was made its director. In 1747, however, he retired to Stubbekjøbing; but he continued to labor for his life-work till his death. His son, Paul Egede, remained in Greenland till 1740, wrote a Greenland grammar and dictionary, and translated the New Testament into Greenland. The Greenland mission was afterwards never abandoned by the Danish Government; and, though the zeal slackened somewhat during the rationalistic period (1790-1820), the Christian Church in Greenland is at present in a flourishing condition. There are no more heathen in the country.

EGINHARD, or EINHARD, b. in Franconia about 770; d. at Seligenstadt, March 14, 844; was educated at the court of Charlemagne, a pupil of Alcuin; acted first as secretary to the emperor, and superintendent of public buildings at Aix-la-Chapelle, then as tutor to the children of Louis le Debonnaire, and retired finally to the monastery which he had founded at Seligenstadt, near Mülheim, on the Rhine. He wrote a life of Charlemagne, which is invaluable for the general history of the age, and of great interest also to church history. He left seventy-one letters, and a minor essay, De adoranda cruce, which now is lost. His works have been edited by Teulet, Paris, 1840-43, and by Jaffé, in Monumenta Carolina, Berlin, 1867.

ECLINUS, Raphael (Latin Iconius), b. at Rüs-sickon, in the canton of Zürich, Dec. 28, 1559; d. at Marburg, Aug. 20, 1622; studied at Zürich, Geneva, and Basel; settled as a teacher at Sonders, in the Veltlin, in Lombardy, but was compelled, like all other Protestants, to leave the place in 1586; was made professor of the New Testament in Zürich, 1592; and was called to Marburg in 1606 as professor of theology. He was an enthusiastic student of alchemy; and it was his reputed proficiency in that art which procured for him the call to Marburg. In other respects, too, he was inclined to a fanciful mysticism. He wrote, in defence of the Rosicrucians, Assertio fraternitatis R. C., 1618, and also Meerwunderliche Prophezeihung, etc., 1611, in which, from the peculiar appearance of a herring caught in Norway in 1593, he believed himself able to discover the secrets of the future. He is of interest in church history, however, on account of the influence he exercised on the Hessian theologians: gradually bringing them over from the standpoint of Melancthon to that of Calvin. His two principal theological works are, besides a number of disputations, theses, etc., Dixodus theolog. de magno illo insitione nostrae in Christum mysterio, and Disput. theol. de fœdere gratiæ. A list of all his works is found in STRIEDER: Hess. Gelehrten-Geschichte, III. pp. 301-318. HEFPE.

EG'LOM (calf, calf-like). I. A king of the Moabites who made an alliance with the Ammon-ites and Amalekites, subjugated Israel, and kept them in bondage for eighteen years (Judg. iii. 14). He resided at Jericho, and was assassinated there by Ehud.

II. An Amorite town conquered by Joshua, and allotted to Judah (Josh. x. 3-5, xv. 39). Ruins of it were found ten miles north-east of Gaza, covering a hill, now called Ajlon, and situated among cornfields and tobacco-plantations.

EGYPT, Ancient. NAME. — The name Αἴγυπτος is used by Homer both of the country and of the river which has formed the country, the Nile. Some have derived it from a Shemitic root, guph; others, from a Sanserit, âgupta: but as it occurs only among the Greeks, and peoples connected with the Greeks, its Greek origin seems certain, though no root has been found for it in the Greek language. The native name was Keme, represented hieroglyphically with the ideographic character of the crocodile-tail. It means "black," both in the hieroglyphic inscriptions and in the Coptic language. Egypt was thus called "the black country," not on account of the color of the skin of its inhabitants, for that was red and not black, but on account of the color of its soil; the floods of the Nile covering the bottom of the valley with a black mud, and thereby distinguishing the fertile fields from the surrounding deserts. Herodotus noticed that the soil of Egypt resembles neither that of Arabia nor that of Libya, but is black from the mud which the river carries down with it from Ethiopia. The native name has often been brought into connection with the Hebrew name Ham, the name of one of the sons of Noah, the progenitor of the Hamites. But the Hebrew root ham means "hot," and not "black;" though the Hebrew Ham, like the Greek Aithiops, was used as a general designation of the hot southern countries. The common Hebrew designation of Egypt was Masôr, or more frequently the dual form Misrayim, from Masôr, to enclose or to watch over. Originally this name was probably used only for the capital, that is, Memphis, just as, in our days, Cairo is called by the Arabs El Masr. The dual form referred to the division into Upper and Lower Egypt, not to the two banks of the Nile. From the hieroglyphics it is evident that the Egyptians always considered their country as double or divided; the division into Upper and Lower Egypt being not simply geographical or political, but historical, manifesting itself in the language, customs, and worship of the two peoples. The cuneiform inscriptions show that Masr was generally used in Asia as name for Egypt.

COUNTRY. — Egypt, in the narrower sense of the word, comprises only the Valley of the Nile from the first cataract to the Mediterranean, between 24° 6' and 31° 36' N. Lat. So far as the river runs along undivided, the average breadth of the valley is only about six miles, though occasionally it widens to about sixteen miles; but at 30° N. Lat. both the walls enclosing the valley retreat to the east and to the west, and the river divides into several arms, and forms the low fertile plain of the Delta. Surrounded on the north by the sea, and on all other sides by immense deserts, the long narrow strip of fertile and inhabited country forms an oasis, whose perfectly secluded position has exercised a decisive influence on the development of the Egyptian people. The two high walls enclosing the valley are often, but wrongly, described as two mountain-ranges running parallel with the river. They are simply abrupt cleavages in the elevated stone plateau of the desert, through which the Nile has carved a deep furrow for its bed. Only at a distance of several days' journey to the east is the level surface of the desert broken by a real mountain-range, which runs parallel with the coast of the Red Sea, and of which several peaks rise about six thousand feet. This broad stretch of land between the Nile Valley and the Red Sea has always been considered a part of Egypt, as have also the oases in the western desert, so far as they can be reached from the Nile Valley. To the south the first cataract, formed between the Islands of Elephantine and Philæ by a ledge of granite stretching east to west for many miles, and absolutely interrupting all navigation, has always formed a national and linguistic boundary, separating in old times Egypt from Ethiopia, as it now separates Egypt from Nubia. On the western boundary of the Delta lived the Libyan people; and near this frontier lay, in the Delta, the principal part of the country in the oldest times, as later on. To the east, Egypt communicated with Syria and Palestine by a route along the desert coast of the Mediterranean. The "River of Egypt," the present Wadi-el-Arish, which runs through the northern part of the Sinaitic peninsula, formed the boundary between Egypt and Palestine; and at its issue in the Mediterranean lay the Egyptian frontier fortress Pelusium.

The climate is different in different parts. The Delta near the sea has the common coast-climate of the Mediterranean, and rain is not rare; while in the Thebaid not a cloud is seen on the sky all the year round. The fertility of the country depends altogether on the floods of the Nile, whose regulation and utilization are and always have been of the utmost importance for the welfare of the people. In the southernmost part of Egypt the flood does not now reach the height of the banks any more; and there, as in Nubia, the water has to be raised by means of water-wheels. The annual rise of the Nile is caused by long protracted rains regularly occurring in the tropical highlands between 1° and 16° N. Lat. The flood reaches the first cataract in the middle of June, and the Delta at the end of June. The water rises during three months: at the end of the second month the dams are cut in Upper Egypt, a month later in Lower Egypt, and the waters are let in over the fields. At the end of September the waters retreat; in the course of October the ground becomes dry, and is sown; towards the close of March the harvest begins, the river decreasing all the while until June, when a new rotation begins. Egypt has thus only three seasons, each of four months, — the water-season, June-September; the gardening season, October-January; and the harvest-season, February-May.

Egypt was in antiquity famous for its great fertility. It was the granary of all the neighboring countries. Abraham and the sons of Jacob were attracted thither by its richness in grain (Gen. xii. 10, xlii. 1, xliii. 2). But, besides corn, also other kinds of food abounded. The children of Israel longed for the flesh-pots of Egypt (Exod.

xvi. 3), and for its fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. xi. 5). Pictorial representations on its monuments bear witness to its richness in cattle, sheep, goats, swine, game, wine, figs, fruits, and vegetables of all kinds. In a tomb near the Pyramids of Memphis 835 cows, 220 calves, 760 asses, 974 sheep, and 2,235 goats are enumerated as belonging to the interred person. Among the plants growing in the country the papyrus and the lotus were especially noticeable: the former, however, is not found any more in Egypt. The date-palm, on the other hand, which now is of the greatest importance to the country, occurs very seldom, either in the hieroglyphic inscriptions, or in the pictorial representations on the monuments, and the camel not at all. The camel cannot have been entirely unknown to the ancient Egyptians, as it was much used by all neighboring peoples, especially in Palestine, for mercantile expeditions to Egypt (Gen. xxiv. 10, xxx. 43, xxxvii. 25): Pharaoh even presented camels to Abraham (Gen. xii. 16). The horse was also introduced from Asia. During the old empire, before the invasion of the Hyksos, it does not appear: it occurs for the first time during the new empire, in the reign of Thothmes III., in the sixteenth century B.C., in a representation of a procession of foreigners bringing as presents various Asiatic animals, among which are a couple of horses. Under the kings of the nineteenth dynasty great numbers of horses were used, though only to draw the chariots: the Old Testament, however, speaks also of cavalry (Gen. l. 9; Exod. xiv. 9, 23). The animal generally used for riding was the ass, which was kept in great numbers. Wild asses are still found in great herds in the highlands of Nubia. The Leviathan of Job xli. 1 is the crocodile: the Behemoth of Job xl. 15 is the rhinoceros. The country was also rich in minerals and in building-stones. Through the larger part of the country both the walls of the valley consist of limestone of a fine and firm quality. Beyond Thebes, in the neighborhood of El Cab, the sandstone begins, of which there are famous quarries at Silsileh. Granite and sienite of beautiful coloring occur in the cataract. The pale-yellow alabaster and various kinds of porphyry are found in the Arabian mountains. Gold occurs at Syene, emerald at Berenice. Copper-mines were worked from the oldest times in the Sinaitic peninsula.

HISTORY. — The fertility of the soil, the ease of life under a sky always gay, and in a warm, healthy climate, and especially the seclusion of the geographical position of the country, preventing all interference by unruly neighbors, were the natural advantages which made the Egyptians the first people on earth having a history. The historical sense, once awakened, found in the country excellent and abundant materials for its gratification by erecting monuments; and in this respect the Egyptians have preceded and surpassed all other peoples. After further development, a want arose for correct annalistic reports of events requiring an exact chronology; and the monuments even of the first historical epoch, the old empire, give ample evidence of the knowledge of astronomical periods based upon long and accurate observation of the stars. What we know chronologically of the first Egyptian Empire, before the invasion of the Hyksos, we owe to the work of Manetho (supreme pontiff at Heliopolis), which he wrote in Greek on the command of Ptolemy Philadelphus, drawing his materials from the annals and chronicles of the temple archives. Extracts of this work have come down to us through Josephus, Africanus, and Eusebius; and the historical character of the statement that there ruled thirty dynasties in Egypt before the Greek rule began is proved by the deciphering of the hieroglyphics. Already Champollion reached back as far as the beginning of the new empire (the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries), and now also the first part of Manetho's dynasties must be considered an indubitable historical fact. A great multitude of monuments, whose dates are ascertainable, present us a nearly continuous series of kings as far back as the fourth dynasty; and we have the hieroglyphic names and annalistic reports as far back as Menes himself, the head of the first dynasty. There were originally two different views with respect to Manetho's dynasties: one represented by Böckh, Manetho und die Hundsternperiode, Berlin, 1845; and the other by Bunsen, Ägyptens Stelle in der Weltgeschichte, Hamburg, 1815, and Lepsius, Chronologie der Aegypter, Berlin, 1848. Böckh holds that the thirty dynasties have succeeded each other, and places the first year of the reign of the first king (Menes) at 5702. Bunsen and Lepsius hold that several of these dynasties have been contemporary, and place the beginning of the Egyptian Empire, the former at 3643, the latter at 3892. The latter view is now generally adopted by Egyptologists.

The Egyptians, like all other peoples, assumed, that, before the human dynasties spoken of in the annals began, there had been a government by gods, and that in three dynasties: the first consisting of Rā, the sun-god, the family of Osiris, and the local god of the oldest royal residence, This, in Upper Egypt; the second of twelve gods, with the moon-god Thoth at their head; and the third of thirty demigods. See Lepsius: Ueber den ersten ägyptischen Götterkreis, Berlin, 1849. Between the government by the gods and the first historical king (Menes) the Egyptians further placed a prehistoric dynasty of so-called Manes, whose residence was at This, the native city of Menes. Menes came from This, and settled in Lower Egypt, where he founded Memphis and the first historical dynasty. During the fourth dynasty the old empire reached its point of culmination. The two largest Pyramids—those of Cheops and Chephren, the khufu and khafra of the inscriptions—were then built. From the tombs arranged around the royal Pyramids, partly hewn into the cliffs, and especially from the chambers destined for the worship of the dead, with their innumerable inscriptions and pictorial representations, we derive a surprisingly complete idea of the life which the Egyptians then led,—their arts and trades, their riches, customs, offices, honors, their worship of the gods and the dead, etc. More than three thousand years before Christ, while all the rest of the world is still mute, human speech here becomes audible to us. At the same time as the fifth dynasty, the names of whose members we find in the tombs of Memphis, reigned in Lower Egypt, the sixth dynasty, descending from Elephantine on the Ethiopian frontier, reigned in Upper Egypt; and thus the Ethiopians appear for the first time in Egyptian history. Under the following dynasties up to the eleventh the prosperity of the country decreased. The eleventh was the first Theban dynasty; and with it begin the power and fame of that city, hitherto unmentioned, and of its local god Ammon. Under the twelfth dynasty (the second in Thebes) the country again flourished. The grand character of the whole epoch is proved by the gigantic undertakings which were accomplished, as, for instance, the construction of the Joseph Canal. It carried the waters of the Nile into an artificial lake (Mœris), and thereby transformed Fayum, by nature one of the poorest provinces of the country, into one of the most fertile. Amenemha III., who reigned for forty-two years, extended the empire to the present Semneh in Ethiopia, beyond the second cataract. He ordered the height of the annual flood to be measured, and denoted on the cliffs of the shore. The pyramid and temple which he built in Fayum afterwards became the centre of the famous Labyrinth.

Shortly after the death of Amenemha III. (about 2100 B.C.), the Hyksos, a warlike people, shepherds, coming from the East, invaded the country. Without opposition, they took possession of all Lower Egypt, captured Memphis, which they made their capital, laid tribute both upon Lower and Upper Egypt, and fortified the north-eastern entrance to the country, which they themselves had found open, but which they wanted to close against any other people likely to follow them, more especially against the Assyrians, who at that time were powerful in Asia. For five hundred and eleven years they reigned in Egypt. At last the native kings, who had kept independent in Upper Egypt and Ethiopia, succeeded, after long and stubborn resistance, in expelling them from their principal stronghold, Auaris, near the later Pelusium, and drove them into Syria. This first counter-movement from the south, against the stream of peoples which from Central Asia rushed onwards to the south and to the west, must have produced an effect so much the greater as it was followed by the brilliant victories and great conquests of the Pharaohs of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties, which extended the boundaries of the Egyptian Empire far into Asia. A people numbering hundreds of thousands, and, at least to some degree, conversant with the arts and sciences of Egypt, could not be compelled to change abode without causing a corresponding commotion among other peoples; and, indeed, all the historical or historico-mythical remembrances of the nations of antiquity, especially so far as they concern immigration, colonization, introduction of divine worship, or knowledge of mythological genealogies, can be traced back to this epoch (between the sixteenth and fourteenth centuries B.C.), and no farther.

The expulsion of the Hyksos has often and very early been put in connection with the exodus of the children of Israel. The two events have even been declared identical. Josephus held this view. He gives no other proof, however, than that which he extracted from Manetho; and he does not notice that he is in complete contradiction to his source. An impartial examination of the statements of Manetho does not leave it in the least doubtful that the Egyptians themselves considered the two events as entirely different. According to Manetho, the expulsion of the Hyksos from Auaris took place under King Thummosis, or Thothmosis (Thothmes) III.; while the exodus of the Israelites—which by Egyptian historians is generally spoken of as the expulsion of a rebellious tribe under the leadership of a Heliopolitan priest, Osarsiph, who afterwards called himself Moses—took place under a king who was the son of a Rameses and the father of a Sethos, and who consequently can be no other than the Menophthes, or Menephtes (Africanus reads Amenephtes), of the list of Manetho, who was the son of Rameses II., and the father of Sethos II. (Josephus calls him sometimes Amenophis, and sometimes Menophis). As the two kings, Thothmes III., and Menophthes, denote the beginning and the close of the epoch of the greatest prosperity of Egypt, they are both perfectly well known to us through the monuments. The latter lived about two hundred and fifty years later than the former, and that period consequently separated the two events from each other.

With respect to Manetho's views of the two events there can be no difference of opinion. The date of the reign of King Menophthes can be ascertained from the fact that the last Sothis period, beginning 1322 B.C., and ending 139 A.D., was, according to the mathematician Theon of Alexandria, called the era of Menophthes, because it opened during his reign. The question now arises, How do the statements of the Old Testament correspond with those of the Egyptian historian? They are so far from contradicting each other, that, on the contrary, the Egyptian tradition would receive its most decided confirmation from the Hebrew documents, if we could presume a mistake in the latter's calculation of the period between the exodus and the building of the temple, which, according to 1 Kings vi. 1, comprised four hundred and eighty years. But this figure does not harmonize with the figures in the Book of Judges, or with the reading of the Septuagint, or with the view of the author of Acts (xiii. 20), or with even the view of Josephus (Ant., VIII. 3. 1; C. Ap., 2, 2). Most of these deviations arrive at still higher figures; but an impartial investigation and a comparison of the genealogical tables, of which especially the Levitical can claim the highest trustworthiness, bring out a much lower figure, but one which exactly corresponds with the Egyptian tradition. A piece of evidence of the greatest importance is derived from a circumstance mentioned in the Hebrew narrative, and pointing decisively to the date indicated. It is the building by the Jews of the cities of Pithom and Ramses, under the predecessor of the Pharaoh of the exodus; that is, Rameses II. From the monuments we know that this powerful Pharaoh dug many canals, and founded many cities, and, more especially, that he constructed the great canal in the province of Goshen, which afterwards was used to complete the communication between the Red Sea and the Nile, and at whose western termination Pithom (Patumos) was situated, as was Ramses at the eastern. Among the ruins of the latter city a granite group was found of two deities, and between them the deified Rameses II., whose statue, as the heros eponymos of the city, stood in the sanctuary of the temple.

That the Israelites did not arrive in Egypt until after the expulsion of the Hyksos, is evident from every detail of the Hebrew narrative. It is not an Arab, but a genuinely Egyptian court, at which Jacob is received. The king bears the Egyptian title of "king." Joseph has an Egyptian name, Zaphnathphaneach ("the savior of life"). The officers of the king have also Egyptian names, such as Potiphar ("consecrated to Phra"). Joseph speaks to his brothers through an interpreter; and the Egyptians refuse to eat bread with them, because they are shepherds, etc. Still more decisive is the circumstance, that the expulsion of the Hyksos, the greatest historical event of the age, is even not alluded to in the Bible; which would be inexplicable if it had taken place while the Israelites were in Goshen, under the father or grandfather of Moses. To all this may be added, that the important political reforms, which, according to the Old Testament (Gen. xlvii. 20-26), were introduced into Egypt by Joseph, are mentioned and described with essential similarity both by Herodotus (II., 108, 37) and Diodorus (I., 54, 73, 74), who ascribe them to King Sesostris, or Sesosis; that is, Sethos I., whose reign began in the middle of the fifteenth century B.C.

Of the three kings of the nineteenth dynasty whom we know best,—Sethos I., under whom Joseph arrived in Egypt; Rameses II., at whose court Moses was educated; and Menophthes, in whose reign the exodus took place,—Rameses II. is by far the greatest: yea, we may say that under him the Egyptian Empire reached the culminating point of its power and fame. His successor, Menophthes, under whom Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt, and founded the Jewish theocracy, is by Herodotus (II., III) described as a weak but haughty man, smitten with blindness for ten years as a punishment of godlessness. ["He impiously hurled his spear into the overflowing waves of the river, which a sudden wind caused to rise to an extraordinary height."] Under the last kings of the nineteenth dynasty, and under the following dynasties, the empire gradually sank down into luxury and indifference. Only the first king of the twentieth dynasty, Rameses III., is by the monuments pointed out as a ruler who made several successful campaigns into Asia. But at that time the Asiatic empires themselves began to rise in power and activity.

The next noticeable contact between Egyptian and Israelitic history took place during the twenty-second dynasty, about 970 B.C., when Shishak made war upon Rehoboam, the first king of Judah, and conquered Jerusalem (1 Kings xiv. 25); which event is also commemorated on the monuments, though in a somewhat obscure manner, by the name Futhmalk (i.e., "King of Judah"). The royal family of Thebes was afterwards succeeded by other families from Tanis, Bubastis, and Sais in Lower Egypt; and towards the close of the eighth century the decaying empire fell into the hands of the Ethiopian conqueror Shabak, the Sabakon of Herodotus, the So of the Bible. He and his successors, Shabatak and Taraka, the Tirhakah of the Old Testament (2 Kings xix. 9; Isa. xxxvii. 9), constitute, according to Manetho, the twenty-fifth dynasty. Tirhakah afterwards retired to the old Ethiopian residence on the mountain of Barkal, the Meroc of Herodotus, where he built several temples, the names upon whose ruins show that his dynasty still flourished there for a long time.

When the Ethiopians had gone, there followed a period of dissolution and confusion, described by Herodotus as the dodekarchy, but not mentioned by Manetho, who speaks only of the legitimate rulers. Finally, Psammetichus I., one of the dodekarchs, and the legitimate heir of the crown, succeeded in putting an end to the anarchy; and under him and his successors, forming the twenty-sixth dynasty, the country once more enjoyed a period of great prosperity. Psammetichus I. ascended the throne by the aid of Ionian and Carian mercenaries; and in reward he gave them large estates and great privileges, which no doubt was the reason why, during his reign, a large portion of the national warriors emigrated to Ethiopia. The Greek colony in the country increased rapidly. Amasis allowed them to build the city of Naukratis, which soon became an important commercial port. The gates of Egypt were opened to foreign commerce, and greater riches flowed into her lap than in the times of the victories of the eighteenth and nineteenth dynasties. The number of cities is said to have increased under Amasis to twenty thousand; and private people were able to build for themselves rock tombs larger and more magnificent than the royal tombs of Bab-el-meluh. But the military strength of the country did not increase in a corresponding measure, and the empire finally succumbed before the power of Persia. From 525 to 504 Egypt was a Persian province; and, though she once more enjoyed a short period of independence under the twenty-ninth and thirtieth dynasties, she was conquered a second time by the Persians in 340, and fell in 332 to Alexander the Great, who founded Alexandria, where he was buried (323).

Under the Ptolemies, Egyptian civilization may be said to have fulfilled its last mission in the history of the world, after which it vanished. During this period, Greek curiosity, still young and sound, took possession of all the accumulated wisdom and learning of the dying country as its legitimate inheritance; and Alexandria became the centre of Greek study. Immense libraries were formed; and every important work, not only of the Egyptian literature, but of all Oriental literatures, was translated into Greek. While this infiltration of the Oriental into the Greek civilization was still going on, Egypt finally lost its independence under Cleopatra VI. After the battle of Actium (30 B.C.), the country was incorporated with the Roman Empire. Already in the first century after Christ, Christianity was introduced into Egypt, and spread rapidly, though hieroglyphical inscriptions are found in the temples of Esneh dating from the middle of the third century; and the Isis-worship at Philæ did not cease completely until the middle of the sixth century, under Justinian. RECENT DISCOVERIES.—In the summer of 1881 there were discovered in a cave near Thebes thirty-nine royal mummies, besides papyrus rolls and other objects of interest and value. Among the mummies was that of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression. It was in a perfect state of preservation, in a mummy-case of plain sycamore-wood, unpainted and unvarnished, carved to represent Rameses as Osiris. The arms are crossed upon the breast. In his right hand he holds the royal whip, in the left the royal hook. The mummy itself is wrapped in rose-colored and yellow linen, figured with lotus-flowers, of a texture finer than the finest Indian muslin. One of the bands which pass across the shrouds to keep them in place bears a hieratic inscription statin.

that this (the mummy of Rameses II.) was concealed in a pit at a time when a foreign army invaded Egypt. In January, 1882, G. Maspero, the director of the Boolak Museum, made his official report of this remarkable discovery.

Another discovery in 1881 was that of a trilingual stela containing the decree of the synod of priests assembled at Canopus, ordaining the deification of Berenice, the daughter of Ptolemy Euergetes (q.v.), and creating a fifth order of priests, to be called Euergetæ. This Ptolemy is supposed to have been prophetically described Dan. xi. 7, 8. He was one of Egypt's greatest rulers. The date of the decree is B.C. 238, and it is therefore a century older than the Rosetta Stone. The inscription upon the newly discovered tablet is the same as that upon the stone of Sân, discovered in 1865, but better preserved.

The year 1881 witnessed also the opening of the Pyramid of Maydoom, which is a century older than the Great Pyramid of Cheops, and probably is the tomb of Snefroo of the third dynasty, B.C. 4200 or 3766.

Meanwhile, our knowledge is being increased through the correct decipherment of the demotic writing, which was a very much abbreviated form of the hieratic, — the usual style of penmanship employed by the priests. In the demotic the ordinary business and legal transactions of the Egyptians were recorded. From the numerous documents written in it which have been preserved, an insight will be given into the laws, social state, customs and manners, of the Egyptians, such as is not afforded by those in the monumental styles of the hieroglyphic and hieratic. But there is a growing conviction among Egyptologists, that the earliest Egyptian civilization we know of is the highest, and that all we know of it is its decadence.

RELIGION OF ANCIENT EGYPT. — The Egyptians were among the most religious of the ancient nations. It is true that the principal reason why most of the documents which have come down to us are of a religious character is that all the ancient monuments of Egypt have perished, except some which were necessarily of a religious nature, — the temples and the tombs. The palaces of kings and nobles have utterly disappeared. Our knowledge of Egyptian civil architecture is derived from paintings in the tombs. Many texts of historical interest have been preserved; but the original intention was not historical, but religious. Religion in some form or other was dominant in every relation of life in ancient Egypt. The Egyptian deities were literally innumerable. Every town and village had its local patrons. Every month of the year, every day of the month, every hour of the day and of the night, had its presiding divinity. All these gods had to be propitiated; and Egyptian life thus became a constant round of religious and semi-religious ceremonies and festivals which amazed the foreigner. When Herodotus visited Egypt, in the middle of the fifth century B.C., the first remark he made of the people was that they were religious to excess. He said it was easier to find a god in Egypt than a man.

In order to reduce this bewildering multitude of deities into something like a mythological system, it is only necessary to notice that special titles and names were given to divinities according to the place in which they were worshipped. Thus Osiris was called Che ("the child") at Thebes, Ura ("the great one") at Heliopolis, Oti ("the sovereign") at Memphis. The goddess Hathor was identical with Isis at Denderah, with Sechet at Memphis, with Neith at Sais, with Saosis at Heliopolis, with Nehemanit at Hermapolis, with Bast at Bubastis, with Sothis at Elephantine, etc. Hence the explanation of the singular fact that Apis is called the son of Ptah, of Tum, of Osiris, and of Sokari; that Horus is called the son of Isis and of Hathor; that Osiris is called the father, brother, husband, and son of Isis, and also the son of their child Horus; that Horus is said to have been born in Tattu, but also in Cheb, etc. What at first glance represents itself as different deities is in reality only different aspects of the same deity. That Egypt which Menes first gathered together under one sceptre was a country divided up into nomes. Each nome had its own capital, and each capital had its own gods with their special names. But it is only the names which are different: the doctrines are everywhere the same. It is evident that Mentu and Tum, two of the great gods of Thebes, are merely individual or local aspects of the sun-god Râ; and so are Ptah and Amon: indeed, the whole swarm of gods of the first order is easily reduced to two groups; the first representing the sun-god Râ and his family, and the second, Osiris and his family. Râ is not only the name of the sun-god, but also the word commonly used to denote the sun itself. In other mythologies the sun-god generally rides across the sky in a chariot drawn by horses: in Egypt he sails in a boat. The sky is conceived as an expanse of water, to which the Nile forms the earthly counterpart. The adversary of Râ is Apap, and the conflict between them is that between light and darkness. Osiris is the eldest son of Seb ("the earth") and Nut ("the sky"), but more powerful than his parents. He wedded his sister Isis whilst they were yet in their mother's womb, and their son was Horus. Osiris' adversary is Set, who shall slay him; but he shall be avenged by Horus. Osiris means the same as Râ, only his myth is more elaborate and wilder in its features. Already in antiquity it was the subject of much subtle meditation and many fanciful interpretations. Modern mythologists do not find it difficult — either with this particular myth, or with the whole Egyptian mythology — to go behind the wild, gaudy, coarse, and often ridiculous polytheism, which was the religion of the multitude, to the subtle, mystical, often sublime monotheism, which was the heart and conscience of the educated classes.

Egyptian religion, considered not as a mythological system, but in its bearing upon morals and practical life in general, presents two very remarkable features, — its worship of the dead, and its worship of sacred animals. In Egyptian life the tomb played a much more prominent part than the temple. The temple was exactly a place of worship in our sense of the word; it was principally and essentially an offering made by the king to some god; but the tomb was the centre of all family worship. The greatest importance was attached to the permanence of the tomb, to the continuance of the religious ceremonies, and even to the prayers of passers-by. We constantly find men praised for having made the names of their father and mother, or of their "fathers," live again. Ancestor-worship, however, even though it may not be the first origin of all religion, is a part of human nature itself, commands respect, even when it presents itself under very curious forms, and will continue under some refined form as long as human nature keeps whole and sound. But animal worship is always a strange phenomenon, and it became especially so in Egypt on account of the grotesque forms under which it presented itself. Some kinds of animals were held sacred universally, others received only a local veneration. To the first class belonged the cat, sacred to Bast or Sekhet; the ibis and the cynocephalous ape, sacred to Thoth; the hawk and the beetle, sacred to Rā, etc. None of these animals were allowed to be killed or injured. In each locality where any kind of animal was sacred, some individuals of the species were attached to the principal temple, where they had their special shrines or chambers, and their train of priestly attendants, who carefully fed them and cleaned them. When they died, they were embalmed according to the most approved method, and entombed with much pomp and ceremony. The origin of this animal-worship may have been natural enough, starting from the idea of transmigration; but its continuance down to the third century of our era exposed the Egyptians to the laughter and contempt of the rest of the civilized world. The Greek comedy-writers of the middle and of the last school, and the Christian fathers, as, for instance, Clemens Alexandrinus and Origen, agree in their feelings on this point. See P. LE PAGE RENOUF: Religion of Ancient Egypt (the Hibbert Lectures for 1879), New York, 1880, from which these last paragraphs have been chiefly drawn.

RELATIONS OF EGYPT AND THE BIBLE. — With Abraham the mention of Egypt in the Bible begins, and is, as always, minutely accurate (Gen. xii. 10–xiii. 3). The plenty in Egypt in that time of famine was the attraction, for the overflowing of the Nile has always blessed that land. Sarah was unveiled (xii. 11), for at that time women upon the monuments always appear so. No mention is made of horses (xii. 16, xiii. 2) in the caravan which accompanied him thither, nor among his presents when he went away, for none are portrayed until Thothmes III., neither are camels; but bones of dromedaries were dug up in the Delta in 1852. His arrival was announced to the Pharaoh (xii. 15, 18), since strangers from Asia were personally examined by the monarch; and permission to remain, if given, was by a duly certified document. Sarah was taken into the royal harem, as the tale of The Two Brothers (trans. in Records of the Past, vol. ii. 137–152) shows was customary in the case of beautiful women.

The next mention of Egypt is in the history of Joseph (Gen. xxxix.–l.), which is truthful and accurate beyond doubt. The Midianites brought "spicery, balm, and myrrh" (xxxvii. 25),—articles necessary to embalming. Joseph was sold (xxxvii. 36) to Potiphar ("consecrated to the god Phra, i. e., the sun") the captain of the guard, which had its headquarters in a famous fortress, known to the Romans as the "White Castle," at Memphis. A papyrus of the period states the daily quantum of bread supplied to the fortress (xxxix. 5, 6). The wives of the Egyptian nobles were not above reproach (xxxix. 7–17; cf. The Two Brothers). The very prison where Joseph was confined is copied upon an existing mosaic found in a Roman house at Preneste (see woodcut in Geikie's Hours with the Bible, vol. i. p. 461). The wine-drinking habits of the country (xl. 1) are illustrated by the tombs of Beni Hassan, built long before Abraham. The importance of dreams was universally granted in antiquity; but Joseph dared a good deal in invading priestly prerogatives in interpreting those of his fellow-prisoners (xl.). His sudden call to the presence of the Pharaoh (a Hyksos), Apepi, according to Brugsch, cleanly dressed and closely shaven (xli. 14), as custom demanded, and his sudden promotion (xli. 41), are thoroughly Egyptian. So, too, are the insignia of his rank, the new name, and the mode of his public reception (xli. 42, 43). By his marriage with Asenath ("devoted to Neith"), the daughter of a priest in the great university temple of the Sun at On, near Memphis, he was incorporated into the priesthood, and therefore into the highest class of the land. The "divining bowl," which comes up in the subsequent narrative (xlv.), is a proof how a man's environment saps his faith. Brugsch finds an allusion to the seven years of famine in an inscription at El-kab from the age of Joseph: "I gathered grain, a friend of the god of harvest; I was watchful at the seed-time, and, when a famine arose through many years, I distributed the grain through the town in every famine."

The land of Goshen, where Joseph settled his family (Gen. xlvii. 4), was admirably adapted for the purpose. It lay on the north-east of the Delta, toward the Isthmus of Suez, and was isolated from the native Egyptians in the Valley of the Nile, who held in abhorrence all shepherds (xlvii. 34). Goshen was famous for its fertility; and, being especially fitted for tillage, the Israelites there were providentially led to change from a pastoral to an agricultural people. To the south were Memphis, the ancient capital, and On, the seat of a great university. In direct contact with Egyptian pomp, at a period when the nation was at its height, the Israelites lived unmolested for four hundred years. The Pharaoh who welcomed them was a Hyksos king; but after a struggle of a hundred and fifty years the Hyksos were driven out, and a native dynasty once more reigned. Then began oppression. They were set to building and beautifying cities (Exod. i. 11). The outrages to which the modern fellahin in Egypt are subjected give an idea of the sore trials of the chosen people. But "at evening time it shall be light," and to the weary Israelites day was about to dawn; for in one of their most pious families, to judge by the names of his parents, — Amram ("kindred of the Lofty One") and Jochebed ("my glory is Jehovah") (vi. 20), — Moses, their future savior, was born (ii. 2). By the instrumentality of Thermouthis, as Josephus calls the princess who found him (one of the wives of Rameses II., as a contemporary document proves), he was taught all the learning of the Egyptians. But his mother was his first teacher, and from her he received his religion. His killing of an officer was the cause of his flight, rendered all the more imperative because he had buried the body in the sand (ii. 12), and thus prevented its embalment, without which, according to Egyptian belief, the dead man's soul could not live.

When Moses returned, Menephta, the thirteenth son of Rameses, was on the throne. The plagues (vii. 14-xii. 29) were directed against the idolatry of Egypt. By them, in order, the following gods were mocked: (1) Osiris, the great god of the Nile, the sacred river; (2) Heki, the "driver away of frogs;" (3) and (4) The fly gods; (5) The sacred ram worshipped at Thebes, and the sacred ox at Memphis and On; (6) "Human sacrifices of foreigners were offered yearly, and their ashes scattered in the air, to avert evil from the land; but now ashes similarly cast abroad carried misery far and near;" (7) The multitude of divinities who had charge of the air; (8) The insect gods; (9) The sun, the chief Egyptian divinity; (10) The destruction of the first-born put the whole religion to shame; for it demonstrated that a greater than any god in their pantheon had the Egyptians in his power, and favored unmistakably the despised Israelites. For a discussion of the exodus, see EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.

The references to Egypt after the exodus are few and incidental, although several Pharaohs are named. Sheshonk, or Shishak, in the ninth year of Rehoboam (969 B.C.) came up against Jerusalem with twelve hundred chariots and sixty thousand horsemen, and took all the walled towns of Judah (2 Chron. xii.). Upon the south wall of the Temple of Karnak is inscribed, among the conquered kings, "Yuthmalk:" probably Rehoboam is meant. Osarehon, or Zerah, the Ethiopian who was expelled by Asa 910 B.C. (2 Chron. xiv. 9), is inscribed on the same temple. In 1878 an inscription of Tirhakah (2 Kings xix. 9), contemporary of Hezekiah (700 B.C.), who defeated Sennacherib, was discovered at Tanis (the Bible Zoan). Pharaoh-Hophra is mentioned in Jer. xlv. 30. A recently deciphered cuneiform inscription proves that Jeremiah's prophecy was fulfilled in the thirty-seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar. Pharaoh-Nechoh (2 Kings xxiii. 29) is sculptured at Thebes. See HENGSTENBERG: Egypt and the Books of Moses, Eng. trans., Edin., 1847; EBERS: *Aegypten u. d. CHRISTIANITY IN EGYPT dates, according to tradition, from St. Mark the evangelist, who is said to have founded the church in Alexandria. This became afterwards a metropolitan and even a patriarchal see. In the second century, Alexandria (see art.) was the seat of a theological school where the great Origen taught. It flourished for two centuries, and trained some of the most distinguished divines of the Greek Church. Nevertheless, Christianity seems never to have permeated the entire people, nor altered very much many of those who were superficially affected by it: for the great mass of the people simply exchanged a gross for a refined idolatry. The Arabs swept in triumph over Egypt, and at the sword-point forced Mohammedanism upon the nation; and in this religion they have ever since remained. Yet a considerable number of Christian Egyptians remained faithful, and their descendants constitute the present Coptic Church. See COPTS. They are schismatics, rejecting the orthodox dogma of the two natures of Christ. As in ability and training they are superior to the Arabs, they hold most of the government clerkships. In November, 1854, the United Presbyterian Church of America began in Alexandria, and especially in Cairo, a work among these degenerate Christians. It was not the first attempt to preach among them Protestant Christianity; for the Moravians in 1769, and the Church Missionary Society of London in 1826, started missions among them. But the first was abandoned in 1782, owing to the unfavorable character of the times, and the second after a quarter-century of effort, when the delusion of the hope of a reform inside the Coptic Church was demonstrated. The United Presbyterians were more favored as to time, and wisely adopted a different method. Not to resuscitate, but to regenerate, has been their aim. For the first ten years they limited their efforts to the two principal cities; but since then they have extended their operations to Middle and Upper Egypt. From Alexandria, along the Nile to Nubia, they had (1881) four central stations (Alexandria, Cairo, Sinoris, and Osiout), forty out-stations, eight ordained foreign missionaries, sixteen female foreign assistants, a hundred and forty-nine native helpers, and over a thousand communicants. In Cairo and Osiout the mission has acquired valuable property, and in the latter place has even a college and theological seminary for training a native clergy.

Miss M. L. Whately, a daughter of the late Archbishop of Dublin, has for the past twenty years conducted a school in Cairo for the training of Arab youth. It is unsectarian, but strongly Christian, and spreads Bible truth into households which otherwise would be wholly inaccessible. There are also a few English and German churches in Alexandria and Cairo for the foreign population there.

The Roman-Catholic Church has also a hold in Egypt; and there is a sect, called the United Copts, which acknowledge the papal supremacy.

EHRENFEUCHTER, Friedrich Aug. Edu., an evangelical theologian (Vermittlungstheologe), b. Dec. 15, 1814, in Leopoldshafen; d. March 20, 1878, in Göttingen. He studied theology at Heidelberg; in 1845 became professor and university preacher in Göttingen, where he remained in spite of calls to Heidelberg, Leipzig, etc. His principal department was practical theology. His lectures attracted large audiences; and his sermons, two volumes of which appeared in 1849 and 1852, are profound in thought, and finished in form. He was a man of irenic temperament, and bore patiently the attacks of the new Lutheran party in Hanover. His principal works are, Entwicklungsgesch. d. Menschheit, Heidelb., 1815; Die praktische Theologie, Götting., 1859; Christenth. u. d. moderne Weltanschauung, Götting., 1876.

EICHHORN, Johann Gottfried, b. at Dörrenzimmern, in the principality of Hohenlohe-Oehringen, Oct. 16, 1752; d. at Göttingen, June 27, 1827; studied at Göttingen, and was appointed professor of Oriental languages and literatures at Jena in 1775, and professor of theology at Göttingen in 1788. To his Jena residence belong Gesch. d. ostindischen Handels vor Mohammed (Gotha, 1775), Monumenta antiquissima historia Arabum (Gotha, 1775), De rei nummarie apud Arabes initiis (Jena, 1776), Der Naturmensch, a translation of an Arab romance (Berlin, 1783), a great number of historical and critical essays in his Repertorium für biblische und morgenländische Litteratur (18 vols., 1777-86), which from 1787 to 1803 was followed by his Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Litteratur (10 vols.), and finally his Einleitung in's Alte Testament (Leipzig, 1780-83, 3 vols.), a work written with great boldness and enthusiasm, and accepted by its times as a new departure in theological science. To his Göttingen residence belong his Einleitung in d. apokryphischen Bücher des A. T. (1795: Kritische Schriften, I.-IV.), Einleitung in d. N. T. (1804-12: Kritische Schriften, V.-VII.), Die Propheten (3 vols., 1816-19), a number of voluminous works on history, Weltgeschichte (5 vols., 1801-14), Gesch. d. drei letzten Jahrhunderte (1803, 1804), Gesch. d. Litteratur von ihrem Anfange bis auf d. neuesten Zeiten (5 vols., 1805), etc., besides a multitude of minor essays and reviews. When it is remembered that during fifty-two years he lectured every day three hours in the university, his activity is simply amazing. His historical writings have now fallen into oblivion; but his works on biblical criticism, though their rationalistic tendency has been completely overthrown, are still acknowledged to contain many happy views and profound investigations. See H. EWALD: Jahrbücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft, I, 1849, Die ehemaligen Götting. Lehrer, J. D. Michaelis, J. G. Eichhorn, Th. Chr. Tycheus.

EICHHORN, Karl Friedrich, son of J. G. Eichhorn; b. at Jena, Nov. 20, 1781; d. at Berlin, July 5, 1854; studied law at Göttingen, Wetzlar, and Vienna; and was appointed professor of law at Francfort-on-the-Oder in 1805, at Berlin in 1811, at Göttingen in 1817, and again at Berlin in 1832. His Grundsätze d. Kirchenrechts d. kuthol. u. d. evangel. Religionspartei in Deutschland, 1831-33, is one of his best works, and the first attempt to apply the principles of the so-called historical school to ecclesiastical law. EINHARD. See EGINHARD.

EINSIEDELN, or MARIA-EINSIEDELN, a Benedictine monastery in Switzerland, and a famous place of pilgrimage. In the first half of the ninth century Meginrad, or Meinrad, from Sulichgau, in the Neckar region, settled on the top of the Etzel, a cliff on the southern shore of the Lake of Zürich, whence he afterwards penetrated farther into the wild Alpine regions, until in 861 he was murdered by robbers in his cell. In the beginning of the tenth century Benno and Eberhard from Strassburg came to the spot where St. Meinrad had been murdered; and there they founded a monastery, which was splendidly endowed by Otho I. and Otho II., and prospered much. It never attained, however, the celeb-erity of the neighboring St. Gall; and when the Reformation began, it became almost completely deserted. Abbot Joachim Eichhorn (1511-69) retrieved its good fortune, and made it a stronghold for the counter-Reformation. The French invasion of 1798 it also outlived; and when, in 1861, it celebrated its millenary anniversary, it numbered about a hundred inmates, and was visited by about a hundred and fifty thousand pilgrims. The object of the pilgrimage is a visit to the black image of the Virgin, preserved in a separate chapel: and the origin of a special devotion in this chapel is, according to the legend, the circumstance that on Sept. 14, 948, Mary herself and the angels came down from heaven, and consecrated the chapel. Materials for the history of the institution are found in Documenta Archivi Einsiedlensis, published in 3 vols. fol. in the seventeenth century, under Abbot Placidus Reymann; and a continuous history was given in 1612 by the librarian P. Chr. Hartmann, in his Annales Heremi. MEYER VON KNONAU.

EISENMENCER, Johann Andreas, b. at Mannheim, 1654; d. at Heidelberg, Dec. 20, 1704; was educated in the Collegium Sapientia, and studied Hebrew and Arabic in Holland and England; was appointed registrar at the Palatine court in 1693, and professor of Oriental languages at Heidelberg in 1700. The fanatical hatred of Christianity which characterized the Jewish rabbins of that period, more especially his teacher of Hebrew, the famous David Lida, engendered an opposite fanaticism in him; and he spent nineteen years in writing his Entdecktes Judenthum, a curious and learned but exceedingly one-sided and spiteful representation of Judaism. When the book was printed, the Jews procured an inhibition against its publication from the emperor, and even offered to buy the whole edition for twelve thousand florins; but Eisenmenger demanded thirty thousand. After the death of the author, the Prussian king, Friedrich I., appealed to the emperor on behalf of the heirs, but in vain. Finally, however, the book was printed at Königsburg (1711) at the expense of the Prussian King. Eisenmenger's Lexicon Orientale Harmonicum was never printed. His edition of the Hebrew Bible (without points), which he undertook in connection with Lensden, was published 1694. PRESSEL.

EKKEHARD is the name of several monks of literary fame, of the Monastery of St. Gall. — Ekkehard the First, d. 973; was educated there; became director of the cloister-school, and dean of the convent, and made the place a centre of learning and study. He wrote hymns, and a Latin poem on the life and deeds of Walter of Aquitania, last ed. by R. Peiper, Berlin, 1873. — Ekkehard the Second (surnamed Palatinus), d. April 23, 990; was a nephew of the preceding, and educated by him; taught for some time in the school of St. Gall, but was by the Duchess Hedwig of Suabia invited to Hohentwiel, where he taught the duchess Latin and Greek. He was afterwards drawn to the imperial court as one of the chaplains of Otho II., and was finally made provost of the Cathedral of Mayence. — Ekkehard the Third was a cousin of the preceding, and accompanied him to Hohentwiel as teacher of the young clerks at the court of the duchess.

He afterwards returned to St. Gall, and died, as dean of the convent, in the beginning of the eleventh century. — Ekkehard the Fourth (Ekkehardus junior), b. about 980; d. about 1060; was educated at St. Gall by the celebrated Notker Labeo, and became early a master in Latin, Greek, mathematics, astronomy, and music. In 1022 he was invited to Mayence by Archbishop Aribio as director of the cathedral school; but in 1024 he returned to St. Gall. He continued the chronicle of St. Gall, Casus Monasterii Sancti Galli (Monum. Germ. Hist. Script., II. pp. 74–163), commenced by Ratpertus. He made a collection of hymns (Liber Benedictionum), wrote a poem (De ornatu dictionis), and translated into Latin the Life of St. Gall, written in German by Ratpertus. — Ekkehard the Fifth (surnamed Minimus) lived in the beginning of the twelfth century, and wrote a Vita Sancti Notkeri, of no great interest. — See MEYER VON KNONAU: Die Ekkeharte von St. Gallen, Basel, 1876. ELAM (highland), the classical Elymais, was the name of a country east of Babylonia, on the other side of the Tigris, bounded north by Assyria and Media, east by Media and Persia, and south by the Persian Gulf. Its capital was Susa. According to Gen. x. 22 this land was inhabited by descendants of Shem, and called after his son Elam. But from the circumstance that the Hebrews called the land Elam, and the Assyrian inscriptions Ilam, or Ilamti, it cannot be inferred that the people itself also used the name: on the contrary, the Elamites named themselves after their principal cities, — Kis, whence the Greek Cissia; Uwaya, whence the Greek Uxia, etc. When the Shemites settled in Elam, they found there, as in Babylonia, a primitive non-Shemitic population; but while, in Babylonia, the Shemites gained the ascendancy over, in Elam they were absorbed by, that population, as is proved by the circumstance that the language of the inscription found in Elam does not belong to the Shemitic, but to the Altaï-Turanian stock. In the time of Abram the Elamites were quite a powerful nation (Gen. xiv. 9). By the Assyrians, however, they were conquered; and they followed Sennacherib's army when he invaded Judæa (Isa. xxii. 6). Afterwards they once more became independent; and Jeremiah mentions them among those nations upon which the wrath of God was about to descend (Jer. xlix. 31–39). The doom came with Nebuchadnezzar. After the fall of Babylon they were incorporated with the Persian, then with the Syro-Macedonian, and finally with the Parthian Empire. A remarkable confirmation of the Scripture is a record of the Assyrian Assur-banipal (B.C. 668–626), recently deciphered: "In my fifth expedition, to Elam I directed the march. . . I overwhelmed Elam through its extent. I cut off the head of Teumman, their wicked king, who devised evil. Beyond number I slew his soldiers; alive in hand I captured his fighting men" (Records of the Past, vol. i. p. 71).

ELATH, or ELOTH (strong trees), a seaport at the northern extremity of the eastern arm of the Red Sea, the Gulf of Akabah, belonged to the Edomites, and owed its prosperity to its trade with the Indies. Israel passed by it on their exodus from Egypt; and David conquered it (Deut. ii. 8; 2 Sam. viii. 14). From it and Ezion-geber Solomon sent his ships to Ophir (1 Kings ix. 26, 28); but after his death it was retaken by the Edomites (2 Kings viii. 20), and was only for a short time in the possession of Israel, during the reign of Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 22; 2 Chron. xxvi. 2). Under the Romans it was still an important mercantile place, the station of a legion, and the seat of a bishop, present at various councils between 320 and 536. Under the Mohammedans it lost its trade. Various ineffectual attempts were made by the crusaders and the kings of Jerusalem to regain it. About 1300, at the time of Abulfeda, it had been completely deserted. The present town of Akabah consists only of some scattered huts, and an old fortress with towers, occupied by some Turkish troops. It forms the tenth station on the pilgrims' route from Cairo.

ELDER. See PRESBYTER.

ELDERS AMONG THE HEBREWS were not necessarily old men, but merely the first-born of the several chief families in each tribe, just as to-day the Arab sheik claims authority by reason of priority of birth. The same phenomenon was true respecting the Midianites and other neighboring tribes (Num. xxii. 4, 7; Josh. ix. 11). There must have been hundreds of them in Israel when Moses chose the "seventy" to be the National Council. It is not stated that this number was composed of one from each of the fifty-eight families (Num. xxvi.), and one from each tribal chief family; and indeed the phraseology is against this idea (Deut. i. 15). The elders were sometimes judges, but not necessarily, for David put priests and Levites in this office; and in Deut. xxi. 2, 6, the elders are expressly distinguished from judges. After the settlement in Canaan the elders constituted the governing body in every village, town, and city (Ruth iv. 2 sqq.), and the medium of business with another place (Deut. xix. 12). It was the elders who demanded a king in the people's name (1 Sam. viii. 4 sqq.), and who chose him (2 Sam. iii. 17); they were also the natural companions and advisers of the king (1 Kings viii. 1; 2 Kings xxiii. 1), and the best agents of the prophets in promoting a revival of religion (Jer. xix. 1). In the exile the elders kept up their authority; and on the return they sided with the priests, and next to the princes were the rulers (Ez. x. 8, 14, 15). The great synagogue, according to tradition, was composed of priestly and civil elders. In our Lord's mouth the elders are the channels of tradition (Matt. xv. 2; Mark vii. 3, 5), which bound like fetters the pious Jews. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS, a city of Southern Palestine, and the seat of a bishop, received its name, "Free City," from Alexander Severus (203), and was a place of importance in the days of Eusebius and Jerome. In 796 it was razed to the ground by the Saracens, and its Greek name was replaced by the old Aramaic Bethgebrim. In the twelfth century the crusaders built a fortress on the spot, which was taken by Saladin, and retaken by Richard. At present the site is occupied by an insignificant village (Beit Jibrin), and covered with ruins. See ROBINSON: Biblical Researches, New York, 1841.

ELEUTHERUS, a river of Syria, mentioned 1 Macc. xi. 7, xii. 30, the modern Nahr-el-Kebir; rises at the north-eastern base of the Lebanon, and enters the Mediterranean about eighteen miles north of Tripolis.

ELEUTHERUS, Bishop of Rome 177-193; was a Greek by birth. Two events are noticed during his administration: first, the churches of Lyons and Vienne sent Irenæus (then a presbyter, afterwards bishop) to Rome to present to Eleutherus the acta martyrum from the persecutions which the churches had just suffered (EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl., V. 4); next, the British king, Lucius, wrote to Eleutherus (according to BEDA, Hist. Eccl., III. 25, and the Liber Pontificalis) to tell him that he was ready to accept Christianity as soon as Eleutherus would send him teachers. The latter notice is a little suspicious; as, towards the close of the sixth century, Augustine found in Britain a Christianity quite different from the Roman type, while Beda was naturally anxious to catch any hint at an early connection between Britain and Rome.

HERZOG.

ELEVATION OF THE HOST. See MASS.

ELI (עֲלִי, "elevation"), a descendant of Ithamar, and high priest. The proof of the first statement is this: Abiathar was a lineal descendant of Eli (cf. 1 Kings ii. 27; 1 Sam. ii. 31, 35); but his son Ahimelech is expressly stated to have been "of the sons of Ithamar (1 Chron. xxiv. 3). The sins of his two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, brought sorrow upon his head, and entailed the destruction of his house. Sammel disclosed to him these judgments (1 Sam. iii. 13, 14). He judged Israel forty years (1 Sam. iv. 18). At the news of the defeat of the Israelitish army he fell backward and broke his neck. He had grown dim of sight, and was ninety-eight at the time of his death (1 Sam. iv. 15).

ELIAS LEVITA, or, more properly, Elihu ben Asher Hallevi, acquired great reputation in the first half of the sixteenth century, both in Italy and Germany, as a teacher of Hebrew. Renchlin, Pellican, and Luther had learned their Hebrew from Matthew Adrianus, a converted Jew from Spain, who taught at Basel, Heidelberg, Liège, Louvain, and Wittenberg. But the next generation of Hebrew scholars, Sebastian Münster, Fr. Buxtorf, etc., were the pupils of Elias Levita, either directly or indirectly through his works. He was born 1472 (probably Feb. 8), at Neustadt-on-the-Aisch, near Nuremberg, but emigrated early to Italy, taught Hebrew at Padua (1504-09), and wrote a commentary on the Hebrew grammar of Moses Kimchi, which Sebastian Münster translated into Latin (Basel, 1531). When Padua was captured and pillaged by the French in 1509, he lost all his property, and removed first to Venice, and then, in 1512, to Rome, where he was well received by Egidio of Viterbo, the general of the Augustine order, and afterwards a cardinal. He did not exactly teach the cardinal Hebrew: he only aided him in deciphering the enigmas of the Cabala, and was in reward boarded and lodged

(he and his family) for thirteen years in the cardinal's house. But Dr. Eck was his pupil in this period. In Rome he wrote a Hebrew grammar (1518), and a book on composition explaining difficult forms. The first was translated into Latin by Sebastian Münster. When Rome was captured and pillaged (1527) by the troops of Charles V., he lost for a second time all he owned. He then removed to Venice; and there he remained till his death (1549), with the exception of a few years he spent at Isny in Suabia, as assistant of Paul Fagius, who had established a Hebrew printing-press there. In Venice he wrote his principal work, an introduction to the Massorah (1538); and at Isny he published a Chaldee dictionary (1541). As a grammarian he was neither deep nor original, but he was a man of great erudition and just views. He first popularized the idea that the canon of the Old Testament was formed by Ezra and the great synagogue; and he also held the view that the vowels of the Hebrew language were of late origin, later even than the Talmud. See J. C. WOLF: Bibliotheca Hebraica, I. 153-161; III. 97-102; IV. 182; Rossi: Dizionario degli Autori Ebrei; and a biography written in Hebrew by BUBER, Leipzig, 1856.

ELIGIUS, b. at Chatelat, near Limoges, about 588; d. at Noyon, Nov. 30, 658 or 659; descended from a Gallo-Roman, not Frankish family, and was apprenticed to the goldsmith Abbo, at Limoges, the mint-master of the king of Aquitania. In 610 he went to Paris, the residence of the king of Neustria; got work in the royal treasury; acquired the particular favor of King Clotaire, and accumulated a fortune. Meanwhile, the influence of Columban reached the Neustrian court from Burgundy and Austrasia, and obtained absolute sway over Eligius and his young friend Audoenus, at that time page to the king. Without abandoning his trade, Eligius began an ascetic life; and he soon earned a great reputation, not only as an artist, but also for his piety. In 628 Clotaire died, and was succeeded by his son Dagobert; but this change only made the influence of Eligius stronger at the Neustrian court, though he was opposed by the Frankish chieftains and courtiers, headed by the major domus. Young Saxons were then brought to Paris, often in great numbers, and sold there as slaves. He bought them by the hundreds, and gave them freedom, either sending them home or making them monks. Monasteries and churches he founded, built, adorned, and supported in the most lavish manner. The Monastery of Solignac, near Limoges, was one of his foundations; the great nunnery in Paris, another. Even on the appointment of bishops, he is said to have exercised a decisive influence. But in 638 Dagobert died, and Herchenvald, the major domus who governed the realm during the minority of Clodvig II., wished to have Eligius removed from the court. In 610 he was made Bishop of Noyon, at the same time as his friend Audoenus was made Bishop of Rouen. As a bishop he was very austere and active, reforming not only the chapter of his cathedral and the monasteries of his dioceses, but also the courts of the Frankish chieftains, whose wild drinking-bouts and fighting-feasts were a scandal to him. In the synod of Chalons (644) he effected the deposition of the metropolitan, Theodosius of Arles, on account of his arbitrary and uncanonical rule. In the synod of Orléans (650) he and the whole clergy of Neustria declared in favor of Martin of Rome, and persecutions were instituted against the Monothelists. In 656 both Clodwig II. and Herchenoald died; and, during the reign of the pious Queen Bathilde, Eligius again occupied his old position at the court. After his death, miracles were said to take place at his grave, and he was honored by the people as a saint. His life (Vita S. Eligii) was written by his friend Audoenus, and is found in D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, II. pp. 76-123; but, in the form in which it is found there, it belongs certainly to a later time. Some sermons ascribed to him, and printed in Bibl. Mac. Patr., Lyons, 1677, XII. pp. 300-322, belong evidently to the Carolingian period. A letter from him to Desiderius, Bishop of Cahors, is found in CANISI, Antiqu. Lect., ed. Basnage, I. p. 616. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

ELIJAH (אֵלִיָּהוּ, or אֵלִיָּהוּ, "My God is Jehovah;" LXX. Ἠλιὰς; New Testament [West. and Hort] Ἠλιᾶς), the greatest of the prophets belonging to the northern kingdom of Israel, and one of the grandest and most romantic characters in Hebrew history. The events of his life are recorded in four chapters of 1 Kings (xvii., xviii., xix., xxi.), in the first two chapters of 2 Kings, and in 2 Chron. xxi. 12-15. As in the case of Daniel, and of a majority of the twelve minor prophets, nothing is known of his parentage. Six times in the course of the narrative, including a later reference (2 Kings ix. 36), he is called "the Tishbite," which indicates his birthplace. This cannot have been the Thisbe of Upper Galilee, from which Tobit was carried captive by the Assyrians in the time of Shalmaneser (Tob. i. 2), since Elijah the Tishbite is said expressly to have been "of the inhabitants of Gilead" (1 Kings xvii. 1). The Septuagint reads, "from Thisbe [or Tishbi] of Gilead;" Josephus (Ant., VIII. 13. 2) also says, "of Thesbona, a city of Gilead." Somewhere in this wild but fertile and beautiful district the great prophet was born; and the exact spot is now probably determined. In the fourteenth century Pardi, the learned Jewish traveller in Palestine, heard of it, and considered it the birthplace of Elijah. In 1876 it was found and identified by Dr. Selah Merrill, archaeologist of the American Palestine Exploration Society. The name of the place is El-Istib, which Dr. Van Dyck of Beyrout pronounces the exact Arabic equivalent of Tishbi. It is in the Wady Mareh, which opens northward into the Wady Yabis, which, in turn, opens westward into the Jordan Valley. El-Istib (or Listib) is about twenty-two miles in an air line south of the Lake of Galilee, some ten miles east of the Jordan, and some six miles south-east of ancient Pella. The brook Cherith was probably in the same immediate neighborhood, though no relic of the name has yet been discovered.

We have no account of the early life of the prophet, nor is it certain at what time exactly his translation occurred. From the narrative in Kings it might be supposed to have occurred in the reign of Ahaziah, king of Israel (897-896 B.C.), the immediate successor of Ahab. But if the "writing" spoken of in 2 Chron. xxi. 12 was a personal letter from Elijah to Jehoram, king of Judah (892-885 B.C.), Elisha must have commenced his public ministry before his master's translation. At all events, the public ministry of the Tishbite in Israel ended with his rebuke of Ahaziah (897-896 B.C.); the great errand of his life having been to antagonize the idolatry of Ahab (919-897 B.C.).

The dramatic interest of the narrative is surpassed only by that of the exodus from Egypt. Ahab, seventh of the nineteen kings of Israel, a weak man, who had married the Phœnician Jezebel, gave himself up also to the Phœnician idolatry, and the true religion was in imminent danger of being rooted out. Suddenly the apostate king is confronted by a rough-looking man from beyond the Jordan, described as a hairy man wearing a leathern girdle and a sheepskin cape or mantle. It was Elijah the Tishbite, who had come as a prophet of Jehovah to tell the king there should be neither dew nor rain but according to his word. And then the prophet hastens back to Gilead. There, in the Wady Cherith, the ravens feed him till the brook dries up, and he is told to betake himself to the Phœnician Zarephath, where a widow-woman had been commanded to care for him, where he and the widow's family are fed miraculously, and the dead son of the widow is restored to life. Some three years later, when drought and famine had become well-nigh intolerable, he meets Ahab again, calls down fire from heaven upon his altar on Carmel, and slays, with Ahab's consent, the four hundred and fifty prophets of Baal, reddening the Kishon with their blood. Then he prayed for rain; and then he ran before the chariot of the apparently repentant Ahab, sixteen miles across the plain of Esdraelon, to the entrance of Jezreel. But the rage of Jezebel drives him to Beersheba, and into the desert south of it, where he sinks down discouraged, praying for death. Thence he goes on to Sinai, where he has wonderful visions of God, which revive his faith and courage. Some six years later he appears again to denounce both Ahab and Jezebel for what they had done to Naboth, causing him to be put to death on a false charge of blasphemy, that they might seize his vineyard. His last personal appearance was to Ahaziah, son of Ahab and Jezebel, some three or four years after the Naboth tragedy. Elijah's life was thus one of bold, sudden appearances and disappearances in a gallant struggle against the mad idolatry that was working the ruin of the northern kingdom. Where he was, and what he was doing, during the long intervals of his public ministry, we can only conjecture. His departure out of life was in keeping with the whole previous tenor of it. His sheepskin mantle, rolled up into a rod, smote a path for himself and for Elisha across the Jordan. A chariot of fire, and horses of fire, parted the two prophets, and the Tishbite went up in a storm into the sky. This, however, does not quite end his biography. Second only to Moses, who, also, was strangely snatched away not far from the same locality, Moses and Elijah came back together to meet our Lord transfigured on Hermon. The abundance and boldness of the miracles ascribed to Elijah bring no suspicion upon the narrative, when it is considered that the true religion was in such desperate straits. Elijah has been canonized in both the Greek and the Latin churches, the twentieth day of July being sacred to his memory.

The literature of the subject is abundant. ELIM (strong trees), the second station of Israel after crossing the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 27; Num. xxxiii. 9). As the place had twelve springs and seventy palm-trees, and no alteration is likely to have taken place in the desert since that time, Elim is with most probability identified with Wady Gharandel; though by some it is placed a little more to the south, at Wady Useit, or Wady Taiyibeh. See SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, pp. 152, 164.

ELIOT, John, "The Apostle to the Indians" (1604-90), was a native of Nasing, Essex County, Eng. Of his childhood and youth but little is known, except that he was blessed with eminently godly parents, by whom, to use his own language, his "first years were seasoned with the fear of God, the Word, and prayer." He was educated at the University of Cambridge, where his superior attainments, especially in the knowledge of the Hebrew and Greek languages, marked him out already for the great work to which in the New World his life was to be consecrated. Upon leaving the university, he became an usher in the grammar-school of the Rev. Thomas Hooker, at Little Baddow, near Chelmsford in Essex. Mr. Hooker had been silenced for nonconformity. He afterwards emigrated to New England, and is known in history as the father of the Connecticut churches. Eliot's connection with this admirable man formed a turning-point in his spiritual history. "When I came to this blessed family," said he, "I then saw, and never before, the power of godliness in its lively vigor and efficacy." He resolved to devote himself to the ministry of the gospel; and as his nonconformist principles exposed him to the tyranny of Laud, he sought the shores of America, arriving at Boston in November, 1631. In November, 1632, he was settled as teacher of the church of Christ in Roxbury, and continued in that office until his death,—a period of nearly sixty years. He married also in the same year. In 1639 he was appointed, with his colleague Mr. Welde, and Richard Mather of Dorchester, to make a new version of the Psalms. It was printed in the following year, and was called The Bay Psalm Book, but is now best known as The New-England Version of the Psalms. It was the first book printed in North America.

Soon after his settlement at Roxbury, Eliot became deeply interested in the Indians, and at length resolved to preach the gospel to them. There were some twenty tribes within the limits of the Colonies, but they spoke substantially the same language. Having acquired a competent knowledge of it, he met for the first time an assembly of Indians at Nonantum, in the present town of Newton, Oct. 28, 1616, and opened to them the way of salvation. He thus entered upon that career of missionary zeal and labors which has rendered his name so illustrious throughout Christendom. He was violently opposed by the sachems and powwows, or juggling priests; but, nothing daunted, he prosecuted his mission with apostolic energy, until villages of praying Indians began to appear in different parts of the Colony. In 1660, at Natick, the first Indian church was organized. Eliot tried also, though with only partial success, to civilize as well as convert the Indians. In process of time he came to be regarded by them as their best friend. His influence over them was extraordinary; and he exerted it for their good, in things temporal and spiritual alike, with rare wisdom and sagacity. The story of his missionary tours among the different tribes is full of interest. In 1661 he had the joy of publishing the New Testament in the Indian language, and three years later the whole Bible. Richard Baxter said of a copy of it sent to Charles II., "Such a work and fruit of a plantation was never before presented unto a king." Of this Bible Cotton Mather wrote: "Behold, ye Americans, the greatest honor that ever ye were partakers of,—the Bible printed here at our Cambridge; and it is the only Bible that ever was printed in all America, from the very foundation of the world." Eliot's Indian Bible is the grandest monument of early American scholarship and evangelism. The longest word in it is in Mark i. 40, Wutapesittukqussunmoohehtunkquoh ("kneeling down to him"). Eliot also translated into the Indian tongue a catechism, Baxter's Call to the Unconverted, and various other treatises on practical religion, besides preparing an Indian grammar. At the end of the latter he wrote, "Prayer and pains, through faith in Christ Jesus, will do any thing." In his last years, when weighed down by bodily infirmities, and unable any longer to preach, or to visit the Indians, he induced several families to send their negro servants to him once a week, that he might instruct them in the truths of the gospel. His old age was adorned with the simplicity and artlessness of a little child, with wonderful humility, and a charity that never failed. Nor was he wanting in fine touches of humor. He pretended to fear that his old friends and neighbors, Cotton of Boston, and Mather of Dorchester, who had gone to heaven many years before, would suspect him to have gone the wrong way, because he staid so long behind them. His missionary work excited great interest in England; and the funds for carrying it on were chiefly supplied by the Society for propagating the Gospel in New England. This corporation, instituted in 1649 by an ordinance of the famous Long Parliament, largely aided him also in defraying the expense of publishing the first and second editions of his Indian Bible. Mr. Eliot died on the 20th of May, 1690, in the eighty-sixth year of his age. His wife, a woman of uncommon excellence, and singularly adapted to be his companion and helpmeet, passed on to the better country three years before him, in the eighty-fourth year of her age. They had six children, — a daughter and five sons. Four of the sons were graduated at Harvard College, and three of them became ministers of the gospel. Only the daughter and one son survived their father.

No worthier or more venerable name than that of John Eliot is to be found in all the annals of New England. "There was no man on earth whom I honored above him," wrote Richard Baxter. Southey pronounced him "one of the most extraordinary men of any country." Even in his own day he was called "The Apostle to the Indians;" and, although he earnestly deprecated such a title, it has adhered to him ever since by common consent of the Christian world.

LIT. — In addition to his Indian Bible, grammar, etc., Eliot published various other works, among them, The Harmony of the Gospels, The Divine Management of Gospel Churches by the Ordinance of Councils, The Christian Commonwealth, also several letters and other writings relating to the progress of the gospel among the Indians. The best account of him and his missionary labors is Life of John Eliot, the Apostle to the Indians, by CONVERS FRANCIS, vol. V. of SPARKS'S Library of American Biography (Boston, 1836).

GEORGE L. PRENTISS.

ELISÆUS (Armenian Egishê), an eminent Armenian historian and theologian of the fifth century; was educated by Sahak and Mesrob, and served as secretary to the Armenian prince Vartan during the rebellion against Yzdegerd II., the Persian king, who threatened the existence of Christianity in Armenia. Elisæus was afterwards made Bishop of Amatunik, and was as such present at the great national synod of Ardushad, 449. He died 480 at Reschdonni, on the southern shore of Lake Van. His principal work is a history of the Persian persecution of Christianity in Armenia, which he narrates as an eyewitness, and with the employment of all official sources. The work was first printed in Constantinople, 1764: the best edition of it is that of Venice, 1852. It was translated into English by Neumann, Lond., 1830. He has also written commentaries on various books of the Old Testament and other theological works, of which a collected edition appeared at Venice, 1838. R. GOSCHE.

ELISHA (עִשָּׂא, "God is salvation;" LXX. Ἐλισαί; New Testament Ἐλισαῖος), Hebrew prophet, and successor of Elijah. As he was engaged in ploughing, Elijah consecrated him to the prophetic office by throwing his mantle over him (1 Kings xix. 19-21). He left his plough, and became the most faithful and eminent disciple of the great master. His prophetic activity fell in the reigns of four kings, and lasted more than half a century (c. 890-810). Under his predecessor a religious reformation had been effected, so that the times of Elisha were favorable to a dispensation of healing and of grace. It was this difference of surroundings, and also a difference in temperament, to which is to be attributed the difference in kind of the activity of the two prophets. Elijah was stern and severe, solitary and lonely; Elisha benevolent and tender, a man of the city and the home. He was often seen in the vicinity of Jericho, and on the Jordan, at Gilgal and at Bethel, and owned a house at Samaria. He is the friend of the poor and needy, who interests himself in the smallest details of domestic life. Now he heals the impure waters with salt (2 Kings ii. 19-22), now he makes the penurious fare of the sons of the prophets palatable (iv. 38-41). He helps the widow out of debt (iv. 1-7), and restores to a poor boy the axe which had fallen into the water (vi. 1-7). A few loaves through his blessing suffice for a hundred (iv. 42-44). To his hospitable Shunammite friend he promises a child (iv. 8-17), and, when it has died, restores it to life (viii. 1-6). His fame extended to Syria; and Naaman the captain, by his counsel, bathes in the Jordan, and loses his leprosy (v.).

But Elisha's gracious activity was not confined to cases in private life. King Joram applies to him for counsel in his distress (iii. 11-20). His prediction of the Syrian attacks is so accurate, that the Syrian commander attributes his defeats to a traitor in the camp (vi. 11); and, when he seeks to take the prophet captive, Elisha leads him and his army to Samaria, as though they had been stricken with blindness (vi. 13-19). Elisha was obliged to follow the divine direction, and against his will, and with tears, predicted before Hazael that he would come to the throne, and would ravage Israel (viii. 7-15). He had constantly before his mind the well-being of his people, as is evidenced by the unceasing esteem of the nation, and the testimony of a king at his death, who called him his father, and Israel's "chariot and horsemen" (xiii. 14).

In sublime intellectual power Elisha was not equal to his predecessor; but in him the grace of God shows its tender and solicitous care for the smallest events. His miracles approach nearest to those of the Saviour, in which the fulness of divine grace revealed itself. He who sees deeds of supernatural power in the saving life of Christ will not deny them to his type in the Old Testament.

ELIZABETH, QUEEN. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

ELIZABETH, ST., of Hungary, the daughter of Andreas II., King of Hungary; b. in Pressburg, 1207; d. at Marburg, Nov. 19, 1231. In her fourth year she was betrothed to Ludwig, son of Hermann, Landgrave of Thuringia, to whose court she was at once sent in a silver cradle. The Wartburg, the residence of the landgrave, was at that time one of the most brilliant courts in Germany. The marriage was perfected in 1221, Ludwig having succeeded his father in 1216. It proved to be a happy one. Both were of serious temperament, and under their administration the tone of life radically changed at the Wartburg. Elizabeth displayed in an ever increasing measure the virtues of humility, mercy, and charity. She was the friend of the afflicted, in person relieved the sufferings of the sick, and distributed large sums among the needy; and in the famine of 1226 her charity relieved the poor from far and near. She founded a hospital at Eisenach for twenty-four persons enfeebled by age, or rendered helpless by disease. The even tenor of this life of marital felicity and charitable effort was interrupted by the death of Ludwig in 1227, in Apulia, on the eve of departure on a crusade with Frederick II. Beautiful and bright as her life had heretofore been, it henceforth becomes a melancholy record of ascetic mortification, which the religious sentiment of the time commended and praised as the best evidence and most perfect fruit of piety, but which the more evangelical spirit of modern Christianity condemns as unnatural and barbarous.

While her husband was still living, and with his consent, Elizabeth had made Conrad of Marburg, the papal inquisitor-general in Germany, her confessor and religious guide. Under his influence she gave herself up to an ascetic discipline, undergoing severe castigations at the hands of her attendants. Conrad endeavored to separate her from her husband, but only succeeded in extracting a promise, that, in the event of his death, she would not marry again. After Ludwig's demise, she submitted herself slavishly to this iron-hearted priest. She received harsh treatment from Heinrich Raspe, her brother-in-law, who had usurped the throne, and was driven forth from the Wartburg. After much suffering she found refuge with her uncle Egbert, Bishop of Bamberg. The knights who brought back her husband's remains, sought and secured justice for Elizabeth. She was invited back to the Wartburg, but at her own request was sent to Marburg, where she ended her days. After occupying for a while a dilapidated cottage, she entered a convent, but did not become a nun. She was wholly under the withering influence of Conrad, who set himself to the task of destroying every natural affection, however pure, in the hope of making a saint. Elizabeth submitted to the most menial services, separated herself from her three children, and bared her back while brother Gerhard flagellated it, and Conrad sang the Miserere as an accompaniment. From this painful and ghastly spectacle, which was, however, in perfect accord with the morbid and mistaken religious ideas of the day, we turn away with relief, and think only of the Christian humility and tender charity of character which underlay this asceticism. In Marburg, as in the bright days on the Wartburg, she labored to relieve the wants of the sick and poor. A hospital which still stands attests her munificence. She was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1235; and the same year the Landgrave Ludwig laid in Marburg the corner-stone of the stately Elizabeth Church, which still stands, and, up to the time of the Reformation, contained the remains of this most honored of the women of mediæval Germany.

ELIZABETH ALBERTINE, countess-palatine,

b. at Heidelberg, Dec. 26, 1618; d. at Herford, in Westphalia, Feb. 11, 1680; was a daughter of Friedrich V., elector of the Palatinate, and king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth Stuart, a daughter of James I. She was educated at the Hague, where her parents kept a quiet court. She learned six languages. Descartes was her teacher in mathematics. Malebranche and Leibnitz were among her friends and correspondents. She early decided to remain unmarried, and devote her life to philosophy; and the decapitation of her uncle, Charles I. (1648), and the unhappy marriage of her brother, Karl Ludwig of the Palatinate, etc., only confirmed her decision. In 1667 she retired to Herford in Westphalia as abbess; and there she had opportunity to show hospitality to the followers of Labadie in 1670, and to the Quakers in 1676; circumstances which, towards the close of her life, gave her mind a more decidedly religious turn. Biographies of her have been written by GUNRAUER, in Raumer's hist. Taschenbuch (1851), and by GOEBEL, in his Geschichte d. christ. Lebens, etc., Coblenz, 1855, vol. II.

ELKESAITES, a school in the Jewish Christian Church, whose doctrines were tinged with Gnosticism. Our principal sources of information are the Philosophumena of Hippolytus and Epiphanius, who also calls them Sampsaiotai (from ὨΨ, "sun"). The derivation of the name has led to many conjectures. Delitzsch derives it from a Galilean village (Elkesi); others, from a Hebrew word meaning apostate; while the church-fathers derive it from a pretended founder, Elxai. Epiphanius (Her., xix. 2) defines the name to mean "hidden power" (δύναμις κεκαλυμμένη). It was probably merely the designation of a book. At any rate, the Elkesaites had in their possession a book which was widely used, and, according to Origen, believed to have fallen from heaven, or, according to the more accurate Philosophumena, was revealed by the Son of God himself. Elxai is reported to have received it in Parthia in Trajan's reign, and to have presented it to the Sobiai (Epiphanius, xix. 1; Philos., ix. 13). The work itself contains a large element of natural religion mingled with Judaistic and Christian ideas. It authorizes the practice of astrology and magic. Besides those features which Elkesaitism had in common with Ebionism may be mentioned the doctrine that baptism washes away sins; and the frequent repetition of the rite is enjoined. Before the Philosophumena were discovered (1851), the Elkesaites were identified with the Ebionites (Gieseler), and the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies were regarded as the main authority on the subject. But the two works differ; the Philosophumena teaching an intensified Ebionism, and the Clementines a modified type, giving up circumcision. The book of Elxai was widely circulated, but cannot be regarded as the confession of Ebionism. The Elkesaites were not a distinct sect, but rather a school scattered among all parties of the Judæo-Christian Church.

ELLER, Elias, b. at Ronsdorf in the duchy of Berg, 1690; d. there May 16, 1750; married at Elberfeld a rich widow (Boleckhaus), and established himself at the head of a sect of apocalyptic millenarians, called "Ellerians," or "Ronsdorfers," who received their revelations through a young baker-daughter from Elberfeld (Buchel), whom Eller married after the death of his first wife. The Bible the sect accepted as the word of God; but it needed various kinds of supplements; and these were given by Buchel, in the Hirtentasche ("shepherd's bag"). Abraham, Moses, and Elijah were only prototypes of Eller, in whom the whole fulness of divinity dwelt. The Messiah was to be born again by Buchel, etc. When investigations were had at Elberfeld concerning the meetings of the sect, Eller moved (in 1737), with all his followers, to Ronsdorf, where a church was to be built, and a minister was appointed (Schleiermacher). After the death of his second wife, Eller married another rich widow (Bosselmann); and the sect, though suspected of immoralities, began to spread, when disagreement broke out between Eller and Schleiermacher. Schleiermacher was expelled, and fled to Holland, formally accused by Eller of sorcery. Wülffing was appointed minister in his place. After the death of Eller, Wülffing and Boleckhaus (a son of Eller's first wife) tried to propagate the sect; but it soon after died out. Full accounts of it are found in the writings of J. W. KNEVEL, (the defender of Schleiermacher), P. WÜLFING, and J. BOLCKHAUS. See J. A. ENGELS: Geschichte der religiösen Schwärmerei in Herzogthum Berg, Schwelm, 1826. G. H. KLIPPEL.

ELLIOTT, Charles, D.D., b. at Glenconway, County Donegal, Ireland, May 16, 1792; d. at Mount Pleasant, Io., Jan. 6, 1869. He was licensed as a local Methodist preacher 1813, and in 1815 emigrated to America. He served in various capacities, having been superintendent of the mission among the Wyandotte Indians at Upper Sandusky, a presiding elder of the Ohio district, professor of languages in Madison College, Uniontown, Penn., and for many years editor of different Methodist religious papers. From 1857 to 1860 he was professor of biblical literature, and president of the Iowa Wesleyan University, and again from 1864 to 1867. His general reputation rests upon his Delineation of Roman Catholicism, N.Y., 1841, 2 vols., London, 1851 (with full index); but he also wrote The Great Secession (a history of the division of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in 1814 on account of slavery), N.Y., 1852; and *South-western Methodism, a History of the M. ELLIS, William, missionary, b. in London, Aug. 29, 1791; d. at Hoddesdon, Hertfordshire, June 25, 1872. He was sent by the London Missionary Society to the South Sea Islands in 1816, and labored there until 1823, when he removed to Hawaii, and rendered efficient service to the American missionaries in reducing the Hawaiian language to a written form. See SANDWICH ISLANDS. The state of Mrs. Ellis's health compelled his return to England in 1825. He entered into the home-work of the society, at first as travelling agent, but from 1832 to 1839 as foreign secretary. In 1839 he published the Martyr

Church of Madagascar; in 1844, the first volume of a history of the London Missionary Society. Circumstances prevented the completion of the work. In 1853 he was sent out to Madagascar to revive the mission there, which had suffered so terribly from persecution. By his tact and zeal he succeeded in putting Christianity upon a firm basis. Between 1853 and 1863 he visited the island four times; and he has published his experiences and information in Three Visits to Madagascar (London, 1858), Madagascar Revisited (London, 1867).

Mr. Ellis was one of those missionaries who have laid the church and the world under tribute. He was not only indefatigable in labor, and solicitous for the spiritual welfare of his converts and their brethren, but he was also able to improve their temporal condition by his practical knowledge. In his boyhood he had worked enthusiastically at market-gardening; and, in the year before he sailed on his first missionary journey, he learned not only theology, but printing and book-binding. He was able, therefore, to acclimatize many species of fruits and plants in the South Sea Islands, which have been a source of revenue to the inhabitants, and also to set up the first printing-press in Polynesia. His books are not merely faithful and interesting records of missionary labor, but contributions to science.

ELLWOOD, Thomas, a Quaker, the suggester of Paradise Regained; b. at Crowell, Oxfordshire, 1639; d. at Hunger Hill, near Amerdean, Buckinghamshire, March 1, 1713. He was Latin reader to Milton for some months. During the Great Plague in London (1665) he took a house for Milton at Giles Chalfont; and there he read the manuscript of Paradise Lost, which he returned with the remark, "Thou hast said much here of Paradise lost; but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" To Ellwood we are indebted for much information in regard to Milton and the persecutions of the Quakers. Of his own works the most important are, Forgery no Christianity (London, 1674), and Foundation of Titles Shaken (1682), and his Autobiography, with supplement by Joseph Wyeth (1714), reprint, Boston, 1877, in the Choice Autobiographies series, edited by W. D. Howells.

ELO'HIM (אֱלֹהִים), the term most frequently used in the Old Testament for God. It is the plural form, the singular, Eloah (אֱלֹהַ), being exclusively used in poetry. The ancient Semitic name for God, El (אֱל), occurs seldom. It defines God, beyond dispute, as having absolute power. So in Assyrian alhu means "powerful." But Eloah cannot be proved to mean "powerful." The verb means in the Arabic "to be afraid," and (according to Oehler) is connected with the Assyrian alal, so that it would mean power which inspires fear. Elohim, as the designation of the true God, is not used in any of the Semitic languages except biblical Hebrew. Various explanations have been given of this plural form. The old theologians, beginning with Peter Lombard, found a reference to the Trinity; and, by pointing to the inexhaustible fulness of the Deity, it is, to say the least, inconsistent with an abstract monotheism. A second view sees in the plural form a relic of an ancient polytheism; but the opinion is untenable, that the monotheism of the Old Testament developed out of polytheism. A third view finds the higher spirits who surround God referred to; but the use of the word for angels cannot be proved, confessedly not [many commentators, like Perowne on the Psalms, dissent] in Ps. viii. 5, xvii. 7, cxxxviii. 1, where the Septuagint translates it "angels." And in Ps. lxxxii. Elohim does not mean, as Hupfeld thinks, angels, but the theocratic officers of the law. The correct view was advanced by Dietrich in his Hebrew grammar (1816), who regards it as a plural of quantity, the same which is used for natural objects, like the ocean and the heavens, which make the impression of power. Elohim, therefore, designates the fulness of divine power, and is rightly called by Delitzsch a plural of intensity. [See TH. NÖLDECKE: Ueber den Gottesnamen El, Berlin, 1880.] (OEHLER) DELITZSCH.

ELVIRA, a town of Spain which has now disappeared, but which probably was situated near Granada. A council (Concilium Eliberitanum, or Illiberitanum) was held there in 305 or 306, according to Hefele (in the spring of 306, according to Dale, not 324, as in some copies of the acts), and attended by nineteen bishops, among whom was Hosius of Corduba, and a number of priests. Its canons refer exclusively to discipline, prohibiting unchastity, clerical marriages, pictures in churches, lights by day in cemeteries, etc. See MANSI, II.; HEFELE: Conciliengeschichte, i. § 13; DALE: The Synod of Elvira, London, 1882.

ELY, the seat of an English bishopric, is a town on the Isle of Ely, near the Ouse, sixteen miles north-north-east of Cambridge. A monastery was founded there by Etheldreda, Queen of Northumbria (673), of which she died abbess (679); but, when the town was ravaged by the Danes (870), it was burnt. Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, rebuilt it in 970, and placed in it monks, instead of nuns. In 1083 the Abbot Simeon commenced the conventual church, which was converted by Henry VIII. into a cathedral. The see of Ely was founded 1107. The cathedral is of mixed architecture, but very imposing. It has recently been restored at an expense of more than seventy thousand pounds. The bishop is paid fifty-five hundred pounds yearly. The present incumbent (1882) is Dr. James Russell Woodford. See Whitaker's Almanack for 1882, p. 199.

EMANATION denotes a theory of the relation between God and the universe, according to which the world was not created by a divine fiat, but developed through various stages, and by an involuntary outflow of the divine substance, gradually deteriorating, and at last ending in mere matter. In a vague and confused form this theory may be found in most Oriental religions; but it owes its elaborate and systematic form to the Neo-Platonists, from whom it was borrowed by the Gnostics. Its scientific value was absolutely null; but teaching people, as it did, to raise themselves above their natural state, and strive towards the divine, it has had some moral influence.

EMBALMING, an art peculiar to the Egyptians, was not practised by the Hebrews, and is mentioned in the Bible only in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 1. 2, 26), both of whom died in Egypt, and were afterwards transferred to Canaan; the former immediately after his death, the latter not until after the lapse of centuries (Exod. xiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32). According to Herodotus (II., 86), the Egyptians knew three different methods of embalming. After the first, which cost about one talent of silver, the brain was removed through the nostrils, and replaced with drugs. An opening was then cut in the left flank, and the intestines taken out by the hand, placed in a peculiar vessel, and thrown into the river. The cavity was rinsed with palm-wine, and filled with aromatic herbs, after which the opening in the flank was again closed by being sewn up. The corpse thus prepared was then steeped for seventy days in "natron" (according to a recent analysis, sub-carbonate of soda), and swathed in linen bandages smeared with gum. The mummy was finally laid in a coffin of sycamore-wood, which was placed vertically in the tomb. After the second method the intestines were not removed by hand, but by means of cedar-oil, which, introduced into the body, dissolved them. The corpse was then steeped, as usually, in natron. After the third method, the corpse was only rinsed internally by an infusion, and then steeped. The embalming of Jacob's corpse took only forty days; but it appears, from the mummies preserved at Memphis, that a method of embalming was employed there, less complete and less careful than that employed at Thebais. In the Christian Church embalming seems to have been used now and then with martyrs and saints, as intimated by Tertullian (Apol., 42); or perhaps this was only an adaptation of the Jewish custom of filling the grave with myrrh and spices (2 Chron. xvi. 14; John xix. 39). See WILKINSON: Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egypt, London, 1837-41, re-edited by S. Birch, London, 1878; MASPERO: Mémoire sur quelques papyrus du Louvre; le rituel de l'embaumement. EMBER DAYS are the first Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday after the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsunday, after the 14th of September, and after the 13th of December, which were fixed by the council of Placentia, 1095. Their name is in Latin, Jejunia Quatuor Temporum; in French, Quatre-Temps; in German, Quatember; in Danish, Tamperdag; which seems to indicate pretty plainly the derivation of the English name, though another has been attempted, from the Anglo-Saxon Ymbren, "a circuit." In the ancient church they were solemnized with fasting, and prayers for God's blessing on the seasons ushered in by them. Afterwards they were fixed by the Roman and the Anglican Church as fit periods for ecclesiastical ordination.

EMBURY, Philip, the first Methodist minister in America; b. in Ballygaran, Ireland, Sept. 21, 1729; d. at Camden, Washington County, N.Y., August, 1775. He emigrated to America 1760. He was a carpenter by trade, and had been a preacher in Ireland. He settled first in New-York City, but did not preach until 1766, when he acted on the advice of Barbara Heek. The first services were in his own house; but in 1767 the famous "Rigging Loft" was the place of meeting, and there Methodism in New York may be said to have been born. In 1768 the first Methodist chapel was built, on the site of the present John-street Church; and upon it he worked as a carpenter. In 1769 the first missionaries sent out by Wesley came to the city, which then had a population of only twenty thousand; and Einbury resigned his charge, and went to Camden, near which place (at Ashgrove) he organized a society, and continued his joint work of carpenter and preacher. His remains were thence interred, — in Camden, Ashgrove, and finally, by order of the Troy Conference, in Woodland Cemetery, Cambridge, N. Y.

EMERSON, Ralph, D.D., b. at Hollis, N.H., Aug. 18, 1787; d. at Rockford, Ill., May 26, 1863. He was graduated at Yale College 1811, and at Andover Seminary 1814, and was professor of ecclesiastical history and pastoral theology in that seminary from 1829 to 1851. Besides a life of his brother, Rev. Joseph Emerson, he translated and annotated the first volume of Wigger's Augustinianism and Pelagianism (Andover, 1840), and contributed to various periodicals.

EMMAUS (Hebrew Khammath, "hot spring"), the village, "threescore furlongs," or sixty stadia (seven miles and a half), from Jerusalem, where Christ revealed himself to the two disciples on the day of his resurrection (Luke xxiv. 13). Its site has not yet been satisfactorily determined, although many attempts have been made. It has been identified with (1) Anwas, the Emman-Nicopolis mentioned in 1 Macc. iii. 40, 57, ix. 50, where Judas conquered the Greeks. So an old tradition supported by Eusebius and Jerome. The conclusive arguments against this view are that Emman-Nicopolis was not sixty, but a hundred and sixty, stadia from Jerusalem, and was not a small village, but a town of some importance. (2) Kubeibet, seven miles north-west of Jerusalem, the last halting-place before reaching that city, in the beautiful Wady Beit Chanina. Supported by tradition dating back to the twelfth century, the time of the crusades. So Robinson. See H. ZSCHOKKE: Das zusestamenliche Emmaus, Schaffhausen, 1865. (3) Khamesa, now a ruin. Supported by similarity of name, but opposed by its distance from Jerusalem, which is at least eight miles and a half in a straight line, and nine miles and a half by road. (4) Beit Mizzeh, a ruin a mile north of Kolonieh (Colonia); but it is only forty furlongs from the city. (5) Kolonieh. This was and is still a place of resort by the Jerusalemites. The expression "went into the country" (εις αγρον, Mark xvi. 12) may be understood of making this usual excursion. Josephus states that Emmaus was colonized by eight hundred of Titus' soldiers, hence the name Colonia; and the Talmud asserts that the willows which adorned the temple at the Feast of Tabernacles were brought from there. These two facts make out a case for Kolonieh. But the distance is too short. See Quarterly Statement of the Pal. Explor. Fund for January (p. 46), July (pp. 237, 238), and October (p. 274), 1881.

EMMERAM, or HAIMAREM, was made Bishop of Poitiers in the beginning of the eighth century, but abdicated shortly after in order to go to Pannonia as a missionary to the Pagan Avars. At Radaspona, the residence of Duke Theodo of Bavaria, he was persuaded to remain for some time, purifying and consolidating the Christian Church in Bavaria. After a stay of three years, he left for Rome, but was overtaken, still on this side of the mountains, by Theodo's son, Lautbert, who had him tied to a ladder, and sawed to pieces joint by joint; the reason being that Lautbert's sister Uta confessed, immediately after the missionary had left, that she was pregnant by him. Just before dying, however, Emmeram explained that he was innocent, that he had allowed Uta to accuse him only in order to save herself, that the guilty man was one Siegbald, etc. When Duke Theodo heard this, he ordered the bones of Emmeram to be gathered, and deposited in a chapel at Aschheim. Another chapel was afterwards built in his honor in Regensburg, and he was made a saint, Sept. 6 being fixed by the Roman-Catholic Church as his day of celebration.

The life of St. Emmeram was written in the second half of the eighth century by Aribo, Bishop of Freising, and again in 1036 by Arnold of Vochburg, and finally by Meginfred a short time after. These three biographies are found in Acta Sanctorum, Sept. VI.; CANISUS: Lectiones Antiquae III.; and PERTZ: Monum., VI. It has proved very difficult, however, to lay bare the historical kernel of the Emmeram legend on account of its chronological absurdities; and it must be added that such a feat, even if it could be done, would probably hardly be worth doing.

EMMONS, Nathanael, D.D., was b. April 20 (O.S.), 1745, in the parish of Millington, in the town of East Haddam, Conn. This town was also the birthplace of the missionary brothers, David and John Brainerd, of President Edward Dorr Griffin, and his brother George D. Griffin, Esq., of the jurist, Jeremiah Gates Brainerd, and the poet, James Brainard Taylor. In 1763, at the age of eighteen, he entered Yale College. Here he was a classmate of John Trumbull, the author of McFingall; John Treadwell, governor of Connecticut; and Dr. Samuel Wales, professor of divinity in Yale College. These three and Emmons were the first four scholars of his class, which contained other eminent men, among them Rev. Dr. Joseph Lyman of Hatfield, Mass. A few months after his graduation, in 1767, he began his theological studies with Rev. Nathan Strong of Coventry, Conn., and finished them with Dr. John Smalley of Berlin, Conn. Smalley was a pupil of Bellamy, and Bellamy of the elder Edwards. Through Smalley, Emmons gained a well-nigh personal acquaintance with the Bethlem and Northampton divines. In 1769 he was "approved" as a preacher, and on the 21st of April, 1773, was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Franklin, Mass. He resigned his pastorate on the 28th of May, 1827. He had remained in the office fifty-four years. He died Sept. 23, 1810, in the sixty-eighth year of his ministry and the ninety-sixth year of his age. He retained his faculties to a surprising degree until his death. Few men have ever left the world with a more unflinching and solid faith in Christ. He enjoyed to the last the reverence of his parishioners and the highest esteem of the neighboring churches. He was an intimate friend of Dr. Hopkins of Newport, R.I., Dr. Hart of Preston, Conn., Dr. West of Stockbridge, Mass. He was a brother-in-law of Rev. Dr. Spring of Newburyport, Rev. Dr. Austin, President of Burlington College, Rev. Leonard Worcester, Rev. William Riddel. These four Hopkinsian ministers married the daughters of Rev. Dr. Hopkins of Hadley, who himself was not a Hopkinsian.

Dr. Emmons published more than two hundred Articles in various periodicals, such as The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine, The Connecticut Evangelical Magazine, The Utica Christian Repository, The Hopkinsian Magazine, and The Christian Magazine. He also published numerous ordination and funeral sermons, which are not found in the collected editions of his works. The following are his more important publications: A Dissertation on the Scriptural Qualifications for Admission to the Christian Sacraments, in Answer to Dr. Hemmenway (1793); Candid Reply to Dr. Hemmenway's Remarks on [this] Dissertation (1795); an Essay on Miracles (1798); a volume of sermons (1800); a second volume (1812); a third volume (1813); a fourth volume (1823); a fifth volume (1825); a sixth volume (1826). In 1842 many of his sermons were collected, and published in a uniform edition of six octavo volumes. His son-in-law, Rev. Jacob Ide, D.D., prefixed to this edition a Memoir of Dr. Emmons. In 1850 a seventh volume of his sermons was published. In 1860 and 1861 a new collected edition of his works was published in Boston in six large octavo volumes; and to this edition was prefixed a Memoir containing 468 pages, by E. A. Park of Andover Theological Seminary.

The house of Dr. Emmons was a theological school. No private instructor in our land has educated so many young men as he for the Christian ministry: the number of them cannot be exactly ascertained, but was probably not less than a hundred. Among his pupils nine became presidents or professors of colleges or theological seminaries, fourteen had an important agency in establishing literary and charitable institutions, forty-six are noticed in the biographical dictionaries of eminent men.

Few ministers in the world have devoted themselves so earnestly, patiently, and methodically as Dr. Emmons to their professional work. He preached nearly or quite six thousand times, and spent ten, twelve, or fourteen hours every day in his study, with his pen or book in hand, for more than seventy years. He was temperate, even abstemious, in his diet, regular in his habits, and was a model of punctuality, self-consistency, persevering industry. He combined a sprightly wit with a profound reverence for the truth. His style of thought was precise, definite, sharp. Dr. Leonard Woods of Andover said, "Emmons has one of the grandest understandings ever created." He was an original thinker, and formed his theological system with rare independence of mind. Although a man of study, rather than a "man of affairs," he entered with zeal into several public enterprises. He was one of the fathers of the Massachusetts Missionary Society, and for the first twelve years of its existence was its president. He was one of the original editors of The Massachusetts Missionary Magazine. When the Masonic fraternity was most popular, he was a pronounced anti-Mason. When antislavery was most generally condemned, he was an active abolitionist. In politics he was an outspoken Federalist. His Jeroboam Sermon is a curiosity in politico-homiletical literature.

The theological system of Dr. Emmons is often confounded with that of Dr. Samuel Hopkins. The following statement of the two systems was given by Emmons himself, and will explain the difference, as well as the agreement, between the two.

The distinctive tenets of Hopkinsianism are: 1. All real holiness consists in disinterested benevolence; 2. All sin consists in selfishness; 3. There are no promises of regenerating grace made to the doings of the unregenerate; 4. The impotency of sinners with respect to believing in Christ is not natural, but moral; 5. A sinner is required to approve in his heart of the divine conduct, even though it should cast him off forever; 6. God has exerted his power in such a manner as he purposed would be followed by the existence of sin; 7. The introduction of moral evil into the universe is so overruled by God as to promote the general good; 8. Repentance is before faith in Christ; 9. Though men became sinners by Adam, according to a divine constitution, yet they have and are accountable for no sins but personal; 10. Though believers are justified through Christ's righteousness, yet his righteousness is not transferred to them.

The distinctive tenets of Emmons's system are: 1. Holiness and sin consist in free, voluntary exercises; 2. Men act freely under the divine agency; 3. The least transgression of the divine law deserves eternal punishment; 4. Right and wrong are founded in the nature of things; 5. God exercises mere grace in pardoning or justifying penitent believers through the atonement of Christ, and mere goodness in rewarding them for their good works; 6. Notwithstanding the total depravity of sinners, God has a right to require them to turn from sin to holiness; 7. Preachers of the gospel ought to exhort sinners to love God, repent of sin, and believe in Christ immediately; 8. Men are active, not passive, in regeneration. Dr. Emmons believed that these eight statements are involved in the system of Dr. Hopkins; that they are evolved from that system, rather than added to it. Still they characterize Emmonism as it is grafted upon Hopkinsianism.

EMORY, John, a Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. in Queen Anne County, Maryland, April 11, 1789; d. in Reisterstown, Md., Dec. 16, 1835. From 1824 to 1835 he was book-agent and editor for the Methodist Church at New York, during which time he paid off all the debts of the book concern, and put it in a far better position than ever before. He also founded the Methodist Quarterly Review; and nearly all the original articles in the first two volumes are from him. In 1832 he was elected a bishop. He was one of the organizers of Dickinson College. He wrote Defense of our Fathers, N.Y., 1824; The Episcopal Controversy Reviewed, N.Y., 1838. — Robert, son of preceding; b. in Philadelphia, July 29, 1814; d. in Baltimore, May 18, 1848. He was elected president of Dickinson College in 1845. He wrote a life of his father (N.Y., 1841), a History of the Discipline of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, N.Y., 1843 (in a new edition brought down to 1864, and an unfinished analysis of Butler's Analogy, completed by Dr. Crooks. N.Y., 1856.

EMSER, Hieronymus, b. at Ulm in March, 1477; d. at Dresden, Nov. 8, 1527; studied at Tübingen and Basel, and accompanied Cardinal Raymund of Petrandi as secretary on his tour of visitation through Germany. Raymund was a great collector of relics, and Emser's first work was an essay on crosses said to have fallen down from heaven. After lecturing on humaniora at Erfurt, where he had Luther among his hearers, and editing the works of Picus of Mirandola, he went to Leipzig, where he lectured on canon law, and published some essays on the propriety of toasting each other when drinking (1505), on the improvement of wine, beer, and vinegar (1507), etc., and an apotheosis of Bishop Benno, which has been incorporated with the Acta Sanctorum. In 1510 he was sent by Duke George of Saxony to Rome to negotiate the canonization of Benno; and on his return he received several rich benefices, and settled at Dresden, where Luther was his guest in 1517. It was already then apparent, however, that, if the case of the reformer should ever become decidedly serious, Emser would not be found on his side; and immediately after the conference of Leipzig a rupture took place between them, and a controversy began, of a character by no means edifying, and without any profit to the cause. Luther called him the herget of Dresden, with reference to his escutcheon, and he called Luther the bull of Wittenberg: that is about all which needs be said of the controversy. The only one of Emser's polemical writings which has any real worth, and has exercised any real influence, is his Annotationes uber Luthers new testament. Many of his corrections were adopted by Luther himself, and others were afterwards introduced in Luther's translation by others. A translation he himself made of the New Testament after the Vulgate (1527) is completely worthless. EMS, Congress of (1786). In the latter part of the eighteenth century there prevailed among the German prelates a general discontent with the encroachments of the Pope upon the episcopal authority. More than once complaints were lodged with the emperor, and protection was urgently demanded at every new imperial election. Finally the establishment of a new nunciature at Munich brought the archbishops of Cologne, Mayence, Treves, and Salzburg to combine in action. The papal nuncios had always by the German prelates been considered a great inconvenience; and the nunciature was, indeed, by its very nature a limitation, if not an infringement, of the episcopal power. That just the above four prelates should feel called upon to take hold of the matter was only natural. They all favored the Gallican principles of episcopal independence which recently had been so vigorously expounded by Honthelm, the suffragan Bishop of Treves, in his famous work, Justini Febronii Acti de statu ecclesie et legitima potestate Romani pontificis liber singularis ad reuincendo dissidentes in ecclesia Chris- tianos compositus, 1763, and, in conformity with these views, they had begun to reform both the school and the church in their dioceses; but they knew only too well from experience that such reforms would meet with the most decided opposition from a papal nuncio. They were, moreover, led to believe that they would receive vigorous aid from the emperor, Joseph II. When, in October, 1785, they laid their complaints before him, he declared that he would recognize the papal nuncios only as political agents, as emissaries concerned with the general polity of the church only; that he would tolerate no encroachments upon the diocesan rights of the bishops and archbishops, etc.; and he encouraged them to openly resist any such attempt from the side of the Pope. The four prelates consequently made inquiries in Rome whether the new nuncio at Munich was sent simply as an ambassador to the Bavarian court, or whether he came intrusted with papal powers; and, when it was answered that the latter was the case, they remonstrated.

Nevertheless, the new nuncio, Zoglio, appeared at Munich in May, 1786; and the nunciature of Cologne, falling vacant shortly after, was immediately filled by Pacca. The prelates then took an energetic step: they sent representatives to meet at Ems, and a minute investigation was made of all the precepts of canon law concerning the relation between the Pope and the bishops. As the result of this investigation, an elaborate exposition, the so-called Emser Punctuation, was signed by the four prelates Aug. 25, 1786, and sent at the same time to the Pope and the emperor, requesting that the actual relation between the Pope and the bishops should be regulated according to these prescripts. The general bearing of this exposition is, that the Pope shall renounce all such rights and privileges and reservations as did not belong to the papal primacy during the first centuries of the Church, but were derived from the Isidorean decretals. As these decretals have been proved to be false, and are now generally recognized as such, any power based upon them must be considered an empty pretence. The whole relation between the Pope and the bishops is defined in harmony with the Febronian principles. The Pope is and must always be the primate of the Church, the centre and the point of unity; but the bishops, as the successors of the apostles, have from Christ received the power of the keys, the right to give laws and to suspend them, etc. Any person living in a diocese is subordinate to the bishop; no recourse can be had to the Pope except through the bishop; the office of the nuncio must be abolished; exemptions cannot be granted by the Pope; dispensations can be granted only by the bishop; monastic orders in the diocese cannot be governed by a general outside the diocese, etc. In short, a theory of the Papacy is propounded which involves the very cessation of the Papacy, and which only existed in reality before the Papacy itself became a reality. Since the œcumenical councils of the fifteenth century, such an attack was never made upon the Papacy by dignitaries of the Church.

In the controversy which now ensued, the Pope took care not to touch the principal question,—whether the conception of the Papacy set forth by the Punctuation was right or wrong. His first step was to order the nuncios to continue their work in accordance with the instructions given. This, however, it was impossible for them to do, as the archbishops opposed them at every point; and it began to look doubtful whether the Pope would not finally be compelled to yield. Then aid came from various sides. The emperor, on receiving the Punctuation, advised the archbishops to try to come to a complete understanding with their suffragan bishops and the secular powers of their dioceses. But this the archbishops neglected to do, and the exclusiveness of their proceedings gave umbrage to the bishops. Many bishops believed, and perhaps not altogether without reason, that the real purpose of the Punctuation was to transfer the power which had hitherto been exercised by the Pope to the metropolitans; and they preferred the Pope far away in Rome, to the metropolitans close at their doors. Thus it came to pass that several German bishops, headed by the Bishop of Spire, declared against the Punctuation. A still more effective aid the Pope obtained from the Elector of Bavaria, Charles Theodore. Bavaria did not form a compact diocese, but was in ecclesiastical respects cut up in a number of sections, each section belonging to some foreign diocese. Discontented with this state of affairs, Charles Theodore had worked hard for the establishment of a nunciature in Munich, and he now supported the nuncio with all his might in the contest with the archbishops. The archbishops were defeated. Finally the union between the archbishops became loosened by the ambiguous behavior of the Archbishop of Mayence. He was a member of the Fürstenbund (Union of Princes) which Friedrich II. had formed in 1785 against Austria; and, as he was an old man, Friedrich was very anxious to have Baron von Dabberg, who was decidedly in favor of the Fürstenbund, appointed his coadjutor. But this could not be done without the consent of the Pope; and it was not probable that the Pope would give his consent without certain stipulations with respect to the Punctuation. Secret negotiations were carried on with the papal court through Prussia; and, though no definite results ensued, the union of the archbishops was incapacitated for action. When the case was laid before the diet of Ratisbon (1788), the diet advised the archbishops to seek reconciliation with the Pope, each for himself. The brooding thunderstorm in France, whose first low murmur just now became audible, also acted as a persuasion to drop the question; and the Pope's answer to the Punctuation (November, 1789) was consequently received with a kind of passive and silent acquiescence, though it openly took its stand upon the Isidorean decretals, and flatly denied the justness of any of the remarks of the Punctuation. See CHR. F. WEIDENFELD: Geschichte des Nuntiaturstreitcs, 1788; MÜNCH: Geschichte des Emser Congresses, 1840.

ENCRATITES (abstincts) is not the name of any distinct sect, but denotes generally the adherents of a certain false view of asceticism. According to Irenæus, there were Encratites both among the followers of Saturninus, and among those of Marcion. This view, enjoining abstinence from flesh-meat, wine, the marriage-bed, etc., did not originate within the pale of Christianity. It was found a long time before our era, in India, among the Jews (the Essenes), and among the Greeks (the Pythagoreans). When entering the Christian world, it became very popular among the Gnostics; though not all Encratites were Gnostics, or held the Gnostic doctrine of matter as evil and a creation of the evil principle. The most prominent leaders among the Encratites were Tatian, Saturninus, Marcion, Julius Cassianus, and Severus. They used the gospel according to the Egyptians, the Acts of Andrew, John, and Thomas, and other apocryphal writings.

ENCYCLICAL LETTERS are circular letters, which in the ancient church were generally sent by one church to the churches of a certain circuit, but which in our times are sent exclusively by the Pope to the bishops of the Roman-Catholic Church.

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF THEOLOGY means, in one sense of the words, simply a dictionary of theological knowledge: in another, it denotes a distinct branch of the theological science itself; that branch, namely, which represents and explains the inner organization of this science, its divisions, and the relation of these divisions, both to each other reciprocally, and to the system as a whole. In this latter sense the name occurs for the first time in S. MURSINNA'S Prima linea Encyclopædia theologica (Magdeburg, 1761), adopted from the Greek ἐγκύκλιος παιδεία (orbis doctrina), which meant, among the ancient Greeks, that course of general instruction which every free boy had to go through before he adopted a special trade or profession. The real development, however, of theological encyclopædia as a science, is much later, and was due to Schleiermacher.

As soon as the church began to develop a theology, there arose, of course, certain ideas about what was necessary for a teacher in the church to know in order to fulfil his duty; and hints were thrown out with respect to the proper way in which to attain this knowledge. Thus CHRYSOSTOM'S De officiis ministrorum, AMBROSIUS' De doctrina Christiana, etc., may be considered encyclopædias of theology; only it must be noticed that these works have a practical rather than a theoretical character. They teach how to study theology, rather than explain what theology is. They correspond to what we now call methodology; and this character all works of the kind retain, more or less, up to the days of Schleiermacher. Noticeable during the middle ages are the Didascalion of HUGO OF ST. VICTOR (d. 1141), in which the differentiation begins (the first three books being of purely propædæutic, the last three of marked methodological character), and the De studio theologico of NICHOLAS OF CLEMANGIS (b. 1360). From the Reformation the theological encyclopædia, like every other branch of theological science, received a new impulse. The Lutheran Church produced, among many other works, the Methodus studii theologici, by JOHANN GERHARD, Jena, 1617, and, more in harmony with the humanistic tendencies of the age, the Apparatus theologicus, by GEORG CALIXTUS, Helmstädt, 1628. The Reformed Church produced the Theologus seu de ratione studii theologici, by ANDREAS GERHARD (Hyperus), Marburg, 1572, in which the quadripartite division of theology into exegetical, dogmatical, historical, and practical theology occurs for the first time; and the Academy of Saumur, corresponding in the Reformed Church to the University of Helmstädt in the Lutheran, the essays of STEPHAN GAUSSEN, De studii theologiæ ratione, De natura theologiæ, etc. The Roman-Catholic Church also showed signs of life. POSSEVINUS' Bibliotheca selecta de ratione studiorum (Cologne, 1607) is merely an instance of modern scholasticism; but the Méthode pour étudier la théologie, by L. ELLIES DU PIN (1716), is a meritorious work, and was translated into several foreign languages.

A new epoch in the history of the theological encyclopædia, by which this branch of the theological science really became a science itself, was ushered in by SCHLEIERMACHER'S Darstellung des theologischen Studiums zum Behufe einleitender Vorlesungen, Berlin, 1811. An exposition of the internal organization of the theological system is here attempted and achieved for the first time. A tripartite division into philosophical, historical and practical theology, is employed. But the philosophical theology comprises only apologetics and polemics: while dogmatics and ethics, as well as exegesis, belong to historical theology. That part of the book, however, which most strikingly shows the author's powerful grasp of his subject, is the section on practical theology, considered under the double view of church-government and church-service. At its first appearance this book seemed not to have attracted any particular attention; but, after the appearance of its second edition in 1830, the strong influence which it had exercised soon became evident. In 1831 appeared the Encyklopädie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. ROSENKRANZ, completely under the influence of the Hegelian philosophy; in 1833, the Encyklopädie und Methodologie der theologischen Wissenschaften, by K. R. HAGENBACH [11th ed., edited by Kautzsch, 1884]; in 1837, the Encyklopädie und Methodologie, by G. C. A. HARLESS, etc. The influence of Schleiermacher's work was felt also in the Reformed Church—J. G. KIENLEX: Encyclopédie des sciences de la théologie chrétienne, Strassburg, 1842; HOFSTEDÉ DE GROOT: Encyclopædia theologi christiani, Grœnningen, 1851—and even in the Roman-Catholic Church, F. A. STAUDENMAIER: Encyclopaedie der theologischen Wissenschaften, Mayence, 1831; [JOHN MCCLINTOCK: Theological Encyclopædia and Methodology, Cincinnati, 1873; DOEBES: Encyclopaedie der christelijken theologie, Utrecht, 1876; J. R. LANGE: Grundriss d. Theolog. Encyk., Heidelberg, 1877; J. CH. K. V. HOFMANN: Encyk., ed. Bestmann, Nördlingen, 1879; J. F. RÄBIGER: Enc. trans., Edinb., 1884 sq.; R. ROTHE, Wittenberg, 1880; CROOK and HURST, N.Y., 1885; WIEDNER, Phila., 1885]. HAGENBACH.

ENCYCLOPEDISTS is the name generally given to the editors of and contributors to the Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des Sciences, des Arts et des Métiers, which appeared in Paris, 1751-61, in 21 vols. fol. This work, so famous on account of the extraordinary influence which it exercised on its age, was edited by Diderot, and, for its mathematical and physical articles, by D'Alembert. Among its contributors were Rousseau, Voltaire, Euler, Buffon, Haller, Marmontel, Montesquieu, D'Anville, Holbach, Sulzer, Turgot, etc. Its religious, theological, and ecclesiastical articles were mostly written by Abbé Mallet, professor of theology in the University of Paris, and the abbés Yvon, Pastre, and De Prades.

It is generally believed that this book is full of open and bold attacks on religion, Christianity, the Roman-Catholic Church, etc. But this is a mistake. Though the article on the Jesuits is written with great gusto for scandals, and though the article on the Pope vindicates the Gallican views of the episcopacy, the work as a whole is confessedly Roman Catholic, and the Reformation, with all that belongs to it, is treated in a supercilious manner as a vicious innovation; to which must be added that there is hardly any Christian dogma which is not accepted and defended,—such as those of the trinity, of inspiration, of the atonement, etc. But (and this is characteristic of the book) the reasons for the acceptance of the Christian dogmas are generally of such a quality that a flat rejection, for no reason whatever, could not have made the matter worse. Theism is preferred to atheism, because it is better for the development of human happiness to accept than to reject the idea of the existence of God. Christ is the first and foremost of all religious founders, because he revealed the best and highest morality, etc.

By this perfidious acquiescence in something which it felt itself too weak to overpower, the book presented itself to the eyes of a godless and religiously indifferent age as the soundest and wisest compromise with an existing superstition, and obtained freedom to preach its sensualistic philosophy, which sooner or later would surely extinguish said superstition. The philosophical programme of the book—that is, its intellectual and moral stand-point—is set forth in the preface, written by D'Alembert; and there is really no contradiction between the sensualism and eudæmonism of the preface, and the choice reasons on which religion, Christianity, and the Roman-Catholic Church are accepted and defended in the book.

ENERGUMENS (ἐνεργούμενοι, "possessed by an evil spirit;" cf. Eph. ii. 2, ἐνεργούντος) were those in the early church who were, according to popular belief, plagued by demons, but who in our day would be simply called "insane." They were not permitted to enter the church if they were violent, but commanded to stand in the porch, so that they could hear the singing and prayers; and with them might be found lepers, and persons of offensive lives (see Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, vol. i. § 16, see Can. 17). After the prayers they came in to receive the blessing of the bishop (see Constt. Apost., viii. 6, 7, 32); but, if they were quiet, they were allowed in the church, yet separated from the catechumens, and listened to the sermon. They were also called Χεῖραζύμβροι, because they were "tossed to and fro by the storms and billows of uncontrollable impulse," and not because they were "exposed to the inclemency of cold or rain," as many have explained it. The exorcists daily brought them food, laid their hands upon them, and prayed for them. After their recovery they kept a twenty to forty days' fast, then partook of the sacrament; a particular prayer was made for them by the priest, and their names were entered upon the church-records, with especial mention of their recovery. See the excellent art., 'Ἐνεργούμενοι, in KRAUS: Real-Encyclopädie.

ENGEDI (the fountain of the kid), the present Ain Jidy, a small town about one mile from the western shore of the Dead Sea, at the foot of the mountains of Judæa, between three hundred and thirty and five hundred feet above the level of the Dead Sea, and about twelve hundred feet below the summit of the cliffs; received its name from the neighboring thermal springs, and is known to history as David's hiding-place from Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 29, xxiv. 1-4).

ENGELBRECHT, Hans, b. at Brunswick, 1599; d. there 1644; was the son of a tailor, and a weaver by trade, but suffered from infancy so much from bodily illness, that he became very melancholy, and at times was oscillating between suicide and lunacy. In his twenty-second year he began to be haunted by religious visions, inspirations, and revelations, which he expounded before admiring crowds, generally to the great disgust of the clergy. Expelled from Brunswick, he roved about in Northern Germany, and was for some time imprisoned in Hamburg; but he finally returned to his native city, and died there in loneliness and seclusion. He wrote several pamphlets about his revelations; collected edition in a Dutch translation in 1697 [Eng. trans., Northampton, 1780]. See REHMEYER: Braunschwe. Kirchengesch., IV. p. 417. HIEZOG.

ENGELHARDT, Jonann Georg Veit, b. at Neustadt-on-the-Aich, Nov. 12, 1791; d. at Erlangen, Sept. 13, 1855; studied at Erlangen, and was appointed professor at the gymnasium there (1817), and professor of theology in the university (1821). Besides a number of dissertations on the church fathers and the mystics, he wrote a Handbuch der Kirchengeschichte in 4 vols., Erlangen, 1833-34, and a Dogmengeschichte in 2 vols., Neustadt-on-the-Aich, 1839.

ENGLAND, Church of, is the established National Church of England, and adopts as its creed the Thirty-nine Articles, together with the Book of Common Prayer. In its autonomous organization it is, like the other churches of the Protestant Reformation, the product of emancipation from the Church of Rome; and its history begins with the reign of Henry VIII., when, breaking with the Pope, he was declared head of the Church in his dominions. In theology it has preserved the general features of the Protestant churches of the Continent; but, in the department of ecclesiastical government, it has retained in unbroken succession the three orders of the larger pale from which it came. It is proper here to state that many Anglo-Catholic writers regard the Reformation merely as an incident in the history of the Church of England, which did not interrupt its historic continuity, dating from Augustine, or even from the old Keltic Church.

I. Introductory.—The history of Christianity in England before the Reformation has three well-defined periods,—the British, Saxon, and Norman.

The annals of the British period are sparse and unsatisfactory. The traditional accounts of the founding of the Christian Church among the Britons by Joseph of Arimathea, St. Paul, or other of the apostles, as well as the history of the conversion of King Lucius, adopted by Ussher, must be given up as untrustworthy. Our first reliable information comes from Tertullian, who writes early in the third century that Christianity had penetrated into regions of Britain inaccessible to the Romans. The history of the British Church was thenceforth that of early Christianity everywhere. It furnished victims to persecution, one of whom, Alban (303), was early canonized. It sent its representatives to councils, as, for example, that of Arles (314), which three of its bishops attended.—Eborius, Restitutus, and Adelfius. And it had its heresies. Pelagius was a Briton; and, although he went to the East with Celestius of Ireland, he left the seed of his errors behind him.

The Anglo-Saxon period dates from the arrival, in 597, of the monk Augustine, who had been despatched by Gregory I. The Anglo-Saxons were still heathen when he landed on the Isle of Thanet. Augustine proceeded immediately to the court of Ethelberht of Kent, whose queen, Bereta, was the Christian daughter of the Frankish King Charibert. He was made bishop of the English, and afterwards metropolitan. Augustine came in conflict with the bishops of the old British Church; but the Roman type of Christianity prevailed over the Keltic (see Keltic Church), and crowded it out. Christianity spread rapidly in Southern England, and was introduced into Northumbria by Paulinus, and made the permanent religion by the labors of St. Aidan of Ireland. Under Theodore of Tarsus (consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury 668) the English episcopate was fully organized, and the dioceses grouped around Canterbury as the central and superior see. During this period monasteries were founded; and here and there a solitary form—like Cædmon, the Monk of Whitby; or Bede, "the father of English learning;" or Alcuin the scholar, called to the court of Charlemagne—stands out prominently on the dark background. The Danish invaders of the eighth and ninth centuries interrupted the services, and devastated the property of churches and monastic orders. But the judicious wisdom and enlightened zeal of Dunstan (959-988), the first of many English ecclesiastical statesmen, repaired their ravages, and effected a severer discipline and a more compact organization of the clergy.

The Norman period dates from the battle of Hastings in 1066. It is distinguished by the complete vassalage into which the Church went to the papal see, the humiliating subjection of the State to ecclesiastical domination, and the growing corruption of the clergy. But the State, in turn, struggled to emancipate itself from ecclesiastical fetters by legislation, and the people to rid themselves of clerical incompetency and scandal by a reform in the life and doctrines of the Church.—William the Conqueror dealt harshly with the Saxon bishops and abbots, many of whom were obliged to give way to foreign prelates, and he practically chose all ecclesiastical dignitaries himself. But under his successors, able ecclesiastics asserted and won the independence of the Church. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury (1070-89), secured the institution of special ecclesiastical courts, in which all ecclesiastical cases were tried. His successor, the learned Anselm (1093-1109), obliged the crown to relinquish its ancient custom of investing the new bishops with ring and crosier, and vindicated the dangerous precedent, that appeals should be made to Rome. Another great archbishop, Thomas à Becket (1162-70), contended with Henry II., who sought to reform the abuses growing out of clerical exemption from civil jurisdiction. The churchman was murdered, but victory did not rest with the king. It still remained for the State as a national body to come into subjection to the ecclesiastical power of Rome. This was accomplished under the most depraved, but, according to Green, the ablest, of the Angevin kings, John. For daring to resist the wishes of the papal see, his realm was placed under interdict by Innocent III. (1208). John finally submitted (a submission which was no more ignominious than it was politic), and accepted Stephen Langton (1207-28), the papal appointee, as primate.

The Church passed into a state of lethargy, and the clergy into official carelessness and personal corruption. The earnest and plain preaching of the Dominican (1221) and Franciscan (1224) friars aroused the laity for a time; but, becoming fat with lands, they lost their hold on the popular mind. Here and there a great bishop, like Grosseteste of Lincoln, 1235-53 (see GROSSETESTE), lifts up his voice boldly against the corruption of the clergy, dares to resist the Pope's assumption to force appointments within his diocese, and insists upon the authority and preaching of the Scriptures. The State is not completely paralyzed, and seeks to meet the ecclesiastical abuses with remedial legislation. Two great acts stand out as protests against them. The statute of mortmain (1279) forbade the alienation of lands to religious corporations in such wise as to be exempt from taxation. The statute of pramunire (Richard II.) made a royal license necessary to the validity within the realm of papal appointments and bulls. Neither of these acts accomplished much at the time, but the latter was used effectively by Henry VIII. Finally protests from the people and clergy themselves were beginning to be spoken. John Wiclif (1328-84), the "morning star of the Reformation," translated the Scriptures, and asserted the rights of conscience. William Longland, without Erasmus' scholarship, but in a more popular and earnest vein than he, sang rhymes ridiculing the friars. The Lollards were so numerous, that, according to the chronicler Knighton, every other person on the road was one. The indistinct mutterings of the Reformation were heard; and although Wiclif's ashes were disinterred, and scattered in the Swift, and the Church slumbered on for more than a century longer, the great movement finally came, out of which Christianity in England, crystallized in the Church of England, started forward on a new career of life and achievement.

II. History since the Reformation.—The Church of England dates its existence as a national body, independent of the papal see, from the passage of the Act of Supremacy (1534), and received its distinctive doctrinal character at the adoption of the Forty-two Articles in the reign of Edward VI.

(subsequently reduced to thirty-nine under Elizabeth), and the approval of the Book of Common Prayer. The same general principle of revolt against ecclesiastical corruption was involved in the Reformation movement in England that inspired the Reformation on the Continent. However, the movement in England had its own salient and distinguishing features. It preserved in unbroken continuity the ecclesiastical orders and succession of the Catholic Church, many of the bishops identifying themselves with it. But it did not in the first instance owe its origin to a pure motive to remedy ecclesiastical abuses, and correct doctrinal errors. The inglorious character of some of its early history, as Canon Perry says, cannot be denied. Yet some of the reformers of England, like Ridley and Latimer, were men of most fervent piety and lofty devotion; and its first annals describe the heroic constancy of a noble galaxy of martyrs who sacrificed their lives for their faith.

Circumstances had been preparing the way for the Reformation in England. The signs of the times in the early part of the sixteenth century indicated a mighty movement of men's minds in England as well as on the Continent. The revival of classical learning with such names as Erasmus, Colet, and Thomas More, the bold satire upon clerical abuses, the independence of thought (e.g., Erasmus' appeal to the Greek New Testament in the preface of his edition, Basel, 1516, and More's dreams of improvements in Church and State in his Utopia), the translation of the New Testament by Tyndale (1526), and its circulation in spite of public burnings and private espionage, were amongst the signs. Luther's mighty words from across the sea, arraiging the papal dominion as the Babylonish captivity of the Church (1520), found an eager audience in England, which the public conflagration of his tracts by Wolsey (1521) could not quiet. But these were only the signs and forerunners of the Reformation: they did not accomplish it. The rupture from Rome in England was not, in the first instance, the product of the protest of religious principle against ecclesiastical abuse, however widely prevalent Reformation sentiments were among all classes: it was a political necessity to which Henry VIII. resorted in order to accomplish and to justify his divorce from Catherine, and marriage with Anne Boleyn. In 1531 Henry arraigned the clergy of a violation of pramunire for being accomplices with Cardinal Wolsey, who had exercised legatine functions without the royal consent. The two convocations compounded by the payment of a hundred and eighteen thousand pounds. But the king, not satisfied with this evidence of a submissive temper, demanded that he should be recognized as "chief protector, the only supreme lord and head of the Church and clergy in England." The Convocation of Canterbury accepted the title, only adding the limiting clause, "So far as the law of Christ will allow." In 1533 a parliamentary statute forbade all ecclesiastical appeals beyond the kingdom. The year following, actuated thereto by the Pope's command to take back Catherine, Henry secured the passage of the Act of Supremacy, by which the English sovereign became, without limitation, "the only supreme head in earth of the Church of England, called the "Anglicana Ecclesia." This statute made all papal appointments within the realm illegal, and vested in the crown unlimited authority to reform and redress ecclesiastical abuses. The Church in England was thus severed from the papal communion, and constituted an independent body. It was not long before the king made a bold use of his new authority by abolishing the monastic establishments, and confiscating their wealth, amounting to thirty-eight million pounds (1536-39).

But a thorough doctrinal reformation was not among the purposes of Henry. With the Continental Reformation he had little or no sympathy. The ten articles adopted by convocation in 1536 retained the doctrine of the real presence, the use of images, prayer to saints, purgatory, and auricular confession, and only divested these practices of some of the grosser superstitions. The king seemed to take higher ground when he gave his sanction to the translation of the Scriptures known as the Great Bible (1539). But all hopes of a thorough doctrinal reformation were doomed to disappointment. The six so-called "Bloody Articles" of 1539 denounced all denial of transubstantiation as heresy, and declared strongly in favor of auricular confession, the celibacy of the clergy, and the sacrifice of private masses. Henry had done his work. He was no reformer from principle; but Providence had used him to assert the independence of the Church of England, and to break the spell of tradition.

Under Edward VI. the doctrinal reformation was accomplished. The six articles were repealed, and the sympathy with the Continental reformers shown in the call of Bucer and Fagius to Cambridge, and Peter Martyr and Ochino to Oxford. A Prayer-Book was issued in 1549, and a second three years afterwards. The Forty-two Articles were drawn up in 1552. They state, in general, that "the Church of Rome hath erred not only in its living and manner of ceremonies, but also in matters of faith" (xix.). They expressly denied transubstantiation, admitted the marriage of the clergy, discontinued auricular confession, approved of the communion in both kinds. With their adoption the formative period of the Church of England closes. The reign of Mary (1553-58) checked the Reformation for the moment, but did not crush it. Hooper, Latimer, Ridley, Cranmer, were brought to the stake, and many refugees fled to Basel and Geneva; but these persecutions, which were attributed largely to Spanish influence, only awakened horror and dogged resistance.

With Elizabeth, Protestantism was restored, and — in spite of occasional resistance from within, the Spanish Armada and papal deposition from without (1570) — became the permanent religion of the large majority in the land. Two periods stand out in the history of the Church under Elizabeth. In the early part of the reign the divorce of the National Church from the Roman-Catholic see was consummated; in the latter part its position was clearly stated in regard to Puritanism, which demanded recognition, if not supremacy, within its pale. The queen was no zealous reformer, but directed the affairs of the Church with the keen sagacity of a statesmanship which placed national unity and the peace of the realm above every other consideration. In the first year of her reign the Acts of Supremacy and Uniformity were passed. By the former, all allegiance to foreign prince or prelate was forbidden; by the latter, the use of the liturgy enforced. The royal title of "Defender of the Faith and Supreme Head of the Church" was retained, with the slight alteration of "Head" to "Governor." But the passage was struck out of the Litany which read, "From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities, good Lord deliver us." The queen retained, against the protest of bishops, an altar, crucifix, and lighted candles in her own chapel, disapproved of the marriage of the clergy, interrupted the preacher who spoke disparagingly of the sign of the cross, and imperiously forced her wishes upon unwilling prelates. But, in spite of seeming to cater to the Church of Rome in points of ritual, Elizabeth did not interfere by any public measures with the results of the Reformation of Edward VI. The reduction of the Forty-two Articles to thirty-nine (1563), the form which they have ever since retained, did not impair their Protestant character.

The independence of the National Church being thus permanently settled, it only remained to settle disputes within her own pale. The great question was, whether Puritanism should be tolerated. This was a question not of doctrine, divine sovereignty, and predestination; for the prevailing doctrinal views were Calvinistic, and all of Elizabeth's bishops, almost without an exception, were Calvinists. It was a question of ecclesiastical polity and ritual. Many of the refugees who had fled to the Continent in Mary's reign returned strongly prejudiced against an elaborate ritual, and in favor of the Genevan form of government. Cartwright, Margaret Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, was the ablest exponent of these views (1570). There was no uniformity practised in the conduct of public services and the dress of the clergy. Hooper, Bishop of Gloucester, who died at the stake (1555), for a long time refused to be consecrated, from conscientious scruples against the usual episcopal habits; and Bishop Jewel pronounced the clerical garb a stage dress, and a relic of the Amorites. It is noticeable that two of Elizabeth's archbishops — Parker (1559-75) and Grindal (1575-83) — were averse to enforcing uniformity in these matters. The latter, with Bishops Parkhurst and Ponet, not only would have allowed a co-ordinate authority to the presbyterian system of Geneva, but would have gone even farther (Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vol. I. p. 39, Boston ed.). Grindal was so lukewarm in obeying the queen's command for the suppression of the Puritan "Prophesyings," as to incur suspension from his office. By a royal proclamation these were suppressed, as before a royal proclamation had required the use of clerical vestments. It thus was decided that no liberty in matters of ritual and the conduct of public worship was to be tolerated. These acts forced many Puritan clergymen to resign their benefices. In Grindal's successor, Archbishop Whitgift (1583-1604), Elizabeth had a prelate more to her hand. The breach between the two parties became wider; and if the Church, on her part, was intolerant of all dissidence, the Puritans on theirs became coarse, as in the so-called Mar-prelate controversy (1588), when they issued scurrilous libels against the queen and bishops. The controversy was closed in 1593 by an act of Parliament making Puritanism an offence against the statute law.

The history of the seventeenth century is marked by the consolidation of the Church in spite of a temporary triumph of Puritanism, the growth of the doctrine of the essential necessity of episcopacy, the first indications of which show themselves in the Puritan controversy of the Elizabethan period, and a consequent intolerance towards all dissent from its forms and doctrines, culminating in the harsh legislation of Charles II. Under James I. (1603-25), who came to England with a cordial hatred of Presbyterianism, the Puritan party was completely humiliated. All their hopes, expressed in the famous Milwauy Petition, signed by eight hundred clergymen, and asking for the removal of superstitious usages from the Prayer-Book, etc., were doomed to disappointment. James maintained relations with the churches of the Continent, and sent five commissioners to represent the Church of England at the synod of Dort with instructions to "favour no innovations in doctrine, and to conform to the confessions of the neighboring Reformed churches." But full sympathy with the Continental churches was hereafter rendered impracticable, and recognition of their orders (as was the case under Elizabeth, see Professor Fisher, in the New-Englander, January, 1874, pp. 121-172) impossible by the high views of episcopacy which were spreading, and which, under Archbishop Laud (1633-45), assumed an extreme form. This prelate taught that episcopacy was not only necessary to the well-being, but essential to the very being, of the Church. His administration revived the ritual of Rome, and displayed, or seemed to display, so much sympathy with it, that he was offered a cardinal's hat. Since his day a large liberty of opinion has been allowed and practised in the Church of England on the question of ritual and episcopacy; the High-Church views of Laud, and the moderate views of Parker and Grindal, both having their representatives.

During the commonwealth period the Established Church was in fact a religio illicita, an act of Parliament having abolished episcopacy, and discontinued the use of the Liturgy (Sept. 10, 1642). Puritanism triumphed for a time; but its attempt to establish an ecclesiastical government was, in spite of towering theological intellects, and the massive and stern genius of Cromwell, a failure. (See the masterly account of Green, vol. iii. 321 sqq.) The accession of Charles II. in 1660 restored the Episcopal Church to the national position which it has ever since held. Harsh measures against the Puritans soon followed. By the Act of Uniformity of 1662 the use of the Prayer-Book was rigidly enforced; and two thousand English clergymen, amongst them some of the most scholarly and pious divines of the time (Baxter and Howe), were driven from their benefices. These hardships were increased by the Five-Mile Act (1665), which forbade them to approach within five miles of any parliamentary town or other place where they had preached. The Test Act of 1673, by excluding all Puritans from office, completed their discomfiture, and marked the culminating device of legislation disabling dissenters. Charles II. died a Roman Catholic. His brother James II. lived one. His efforts, however, to restore confidence and toleration for the Roman Church failed.

The accession of William and Mary ushered in a new epoch. To put it in a strong way, the principle that the National Church had an exclusive right to existence and protection was abrogated. The movement in favor not only of toleration, but of absolute freedom of worship, and political equality without reference to ecclesiastical connection, started with this reign. Put into more and more extensive practice, this principle has effected the abolition of most, if not all, political disabilities on account of religious differences. The first legislation in this direction was the Act of Toleration (1689), establishing freedom of worship. The present century has witnessed the repeal of the Test Act (1828), the removal of the disabilities of the Roman Catholics (1829) and Jews (1858), and the disestablishment of the Irish Church (1868).

The eighteenth century was characterized by a wide-spread religious apathy and worldliness among the clergy, until, in its final decades, the Church was aroused by the great popular revival, and in numbers weakened by the defection, of the Methodists. The intellectual classes were affected by the deistic controversy, which, beginning with Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1633), identified the Christian revelation with natural religion, and excluded from Christianity, as un-genuine and false, all that was not contained in the latter. It became as fashionable for statesmen to scoff at the Christian religion in their writings as it was common for them in their practice to treat its precepts with contempt. But while deism was being resolved into scepticism by Hume, its influence was more than counteracted by the evangelical spirit and earnest preaching of Whitefield and the Wesleys (graduates of Oxford), which worked with irresistible power upon the masses, and aroused the clergy of the realm out of their indifference to a new sense of their spiritual obligations. Fresh life sprang up in the Church of England as a result of this impulse. The so-called Evangelicals, including some of the most faithful pastors, fervent preachers, devout poets, and genial philanthropists,—men like Venn and Newton and Cowper and Wilberforce,—brought a warm consecration to their work, and vied with the more eloquent but no more devoted leaders of the Methodist movement to spread the truths and blessings of the gospel. And so the century went out with an intense sympathy for the heathen abroad and the depraved classes at home, in practical efforts to plant missions, and found charitable institutions.

The present century has witnessed the realization of these plans in part or in whole. No preceding period has been distinguished for piety at once more practical and more liberal than the nineteenth century. This is eminently true of the Church of England. It has also given evidence of vigor, as well as been distracted, by discussions of ecclesiastical order and discipline. The so-called Tractarian movement has agitated the Church to its depths. While Parliament was legislating in the interest of equal political rights, a movement in the interest of deeper piety, more aggressive effort, churchly zeal, and church authority, was spreading at Oxford (1838). Dr. Pusey was the moral, Dr. Newman the intellectual leader, and the saintly Keble the poet, of this movement. It led to a new investigation of the claims of the Catholic Church; and, before a decade had passed, the Church received a blow, from which, Lord Beaconsfield said a few years ago, it "still continues to reel." John Henry Newman, Edward Manning, Frederick W. Faber, and others of her ablest men of the clergy and nobility, went over to the Roman-Catholic communion.

The present state of opinion in the Church is classified under three heads. The High-Church party lays emphasis upon the exclusive right of episcopacy and apostolical succession, and practises an advanced ritual. The extreme wing, known as the Ritualists, has introduced practices which the Reformers regarded as papistical,—such as the elevation of the host, auricular confession, the burning of candles, etc. Some of their number go even so far as to declare the Reformation to have been a mistake and a misfortune. They display great zeal and devotion in benevolent church-work. Occupying opposite ground is the Low-Church party, which holds strictly to the natural interpretation of the Thirty-nine Articles, denies episcopacy to be of the essence of the Church, and renounces so-called ritualistic practices. Between these two schools a third has grown up within the last fifty years. Its combination of tolerant sympathies with loyalty to the Church has secured for it the name of the Broad-Church party. Among its more prominent representatives have been Arnold, Julius Hare, Maurice, Kingsley, and Stanley. During the century the vigorous life of the Church has been further shown by the restoration of cathedrals, and construction of churches, in the creation of new episcopal sees at home,—Truro, St. Albans (1877), and Liverpool (1880),—and the rapid extension of the Church and Episcopate in the Colonies. At no time in its history has it been stronger and more vigorous than now, more alive with theological discussion and achievement, more competent to cope with infidelity, more solicitous to relieve the poor and fallen, more munificent in its gifts for the conversion of the heathen, or more adapted to secure the esteem, and win the respect, of the Anglo-Saxon people on the island of Latimer and Ridley, as well as far beyond the seas, in the United States and Australia and India.

III. Theology and Worship.—The doctrinal standards of the Anglican Church are the Thirty-nine Articles and the Book of Common Prayer. To these may be added the Catechism and the two Books of Homilies issued in the reign of Edward VI., and sanctioned by the Thirty-nine Articles. Within the pale of the Church the most divergent views have prevailed concerning its doctrinal status. On the one hand it has been represented as strongly Calvinistic, both in respect to the sacraments and to the decrees: on the other, theologians,—such as Dr. Newman (before his transition to Rome), the late Dr. Forbes, Bishop of Brechin, Dr. Pusey (Eirenicon), and others,—minimizing the Protestantism of its standards, hold that nothing is taught in the Thirty-nine Articles which cannot be harmonized with the Tridentine decrees. An unprejudiced study of the plain and natural meaning of the language, without any inferences from what is left unsaid, will force upon us the conclusion that the Anglican standards teach a moderate Calvinism, and are, in the main, in sympathy with the Protestant Reformation of the Continent. The sole and supreme authority of the Scriptures is emphasized, as also justification by faith; Art. xi. reading, "Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine," etc. Original or birth sin is the corruption of nature of every descendant of Adam; and predestination is God's everlasting purpose to redeem "those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind" (Art. xvii.). The erroneous doctrines of purgatory, the mass, celibacy, etc., are specifically denounced. The teaching concerning the Lord's Supper is plainly against transubstantiation, which in Art. xxviii. is declared to be "repugnant to the plain words of Scripture," the "body of Christ being given, taken, and eaten only after an heavenly and spiritual manner." Art. xxvii. can hardly be pressed to favor the theory of baptismal regeneration. But the case is different in the service of baptism in the Prayer-Book. After the child has been baptized, the minister says, "Seeing now . . . that this child is regenerate, and grafted into the body of Christ," etc. And again, after repeating the Lord's Prayer, he gives thanks to the heavenly Father for regenerating the infant, etc. These words interpreted naturally teach baptismal regeneration; but they are frequently explained as being used only in a hypothetical sense. For a fuller statement under this head, see ARTICLES THIRTY-NINE.

The worship of the Church of England is liturgical, and regulated by the Book of Common Prayer, one of the most precious legacies of the Protestant Reformation. Its beautiful forms of service, and its solemn and venerable prayers, are not only among the choicest specimens of English, but exert an influence on the ear and heart of those who use them which nothing else can replace. The rubrics (so called from having been printed in red ink) give directions for the smallest details of the service. The sabbath services consist of prayers, lessons from the Scriptures, responsive reading of the Psalms, chants, hymns, the offertory, and the sermon. The form and matter of the service of baptism, communion, marriage, and other services, are all prescribed. The inconveniences of this method are not to be overlooked, by which all departure from the fixed form is forbidden. An illustration is found in the service of burial. In all cases, over the most notorious sinner, as well as the pious churchman, the same consolatory passages (1 Cor. xv., etc.) are read, and the same prayers offered. But, on the other hand, there are manifest advantages which it would be hard to deny. See, on this subject, art. LITURGY.

IV. The Clergy and Clerical Patronage.—The clergy consists of three orders,—deacons, priests (presbyters), and bishops. The canonical age is respectively twenty-three, twenty-four, and thirty. The duties of the deacon are to render assistance to the priest in the services of the sanctuary and in pastoral work. He may preach, read the prayers and Scripture-lessons, assist in the distribution of the elements at communion, and administer baptism. In his ordination he assents to the Thirty-nine Articles and the constitution of the Episcopal Church as agreeable with the word of God. The priest serves at the altar, and consecrates the elements in the Lord's Supper. At his ordination the bishop pronounces upon him the words, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a priest in the Church of God," etc. This is interpreted to be a petition for the anointing of the Holy Spirit, or to mark the transmission of a heavenly grace through the bishop, according to the different stand-point of the interpreter. The bishop has the exclusive right of ordination, confirmation, or admitting members to the Lord's table, and the consecration of churches. Bishops are appointed by the crown. A congé d'élire is sent to the chapter when a bishopric is vacant; but it is only a formality, as the name of the new incumbent is sent with it. A class of the priesthood known as the dignified clergy are the deans and archdeacons. Deans have charge of cathedral churches, and are assisted by canons, the number of which may not exceed six for any cathedral. The archdeacon assists the bishop in his official duties as superintendent of the diocese. He holds synods, delivers charges, and visits parishes. He is himself sometimes aided by rural deans. Both these classes are members of convocation by virtue of their office. No bishop is allowed to transgress the limits of his diocese in the performance of episcopal functions, unless requested so to do. The bishops frequently associate with themselves suffragan bishops.

England is divided into the two archbishoprics of Canterbury and York. Within the limits of the former there are twenty-three sees, including the two new ones (Truro and St. Albans) created 1577; within the latter, seven.—Durham, Ripon, Chester, Carlisle, Manchester, Liverpool (organized 1880), and Sodor and Man. In the order of dignity they rank, Canterbury, York, London, Durham, Winchester, etc. In addition to the Irish (twelve) and Scotch (seven) bishops, there are at present, in connection with the Church of England, sixty-three colonial and ten missionary bishops. The first colonial see was Nova Scotia (1757). The see of Calcutta was organized 1813. Nineteen colonial or missionary bishops have resigned their sees, and are now living in England. There are thirty deans presiding over as many cathedrals. The Deans of Westminster and Windsor are independent of episcopal control, and directly subject to the crown. All the sees have deans, except Liverpool, St. Albans, Truro, and Sodor and Man. There are eighty-two archdeacons, and six hundred and thirteen rural deans. The lower clergy of the Church in England and Wales (who number about 23,000) are called "rector," "vicar," "curate," etc. The benefices, or livings, number nearly 13,500. Their patronage is divided between the crown (1,150 livings), the bishops (1,853), universities (770), private patrons (6,200), etc. The consent of the bishop of the diocese is necessary to the induction of an incumbent; and, in the event of a disagreement between patron and bishop, the case is decided by the Court of Arches. The people have no voice in the choice of their rector; but the rector, once inducted, has absolute control of his church, so that not even the bishop may enter it without his consent. Many of the parishes have endowments in lands: others are supported, in whole or in part, from public funds, such as Queen Anne's Bounty. The system of patronage has led to very great abuses, some of which still remain. Benefices are sometimes held up for public sale, and, being subject to the choice of private patrons, may be filled with men of little ability or small interest in the spiritual welfare of the people. The Plurality system, by which a clergyman might hold any number of livings at the same time, and which was so much abused in the latter part of the last century, has been modified by parliamentary legislation. Under the present law no one can hold two cathedral positions at the same time. The holder of a cathedral position may hold besides only one parish. A clergyman may have two parishes; but, if the one numbers three thousand souls, the other may not include more than five hundred. The evils of non-residence have likewise been restrained by law. The yearly income of the Church of England amounts to at least eight million pounds. The income of the Archbishop of Canterbury is fifteen thousand pounds; of York, ten thousand pounds; of London, ten thousand pounds; of Durham, eight thousand pounds. The lowest income is that of the Bishop of Sodor and Man, which amounts to two thousand pounds. The average income of a dean is one thousand pounds. The incomes of the clergy are from one hundred and fifty pounds upward. A fund managed by the so-called "Ecclesiastical Commission," and supplied by the revenues of suppressed canonries, sinecures, and the surplus revenues of bishoprics over and above the episcopal salary, is used for the augmentation of bishoprics, the increase of the smaller salaries, the endowment of new ministers, etc. This commission was constituted in 1835.

V. Church Polity.—The Church or spirituality of England is one of the estates of the realm. Its relation to the State is one of dependence, the Sovereign being its supreme governor, and Parliament its highest legislature. The Archbishop of Canterbury is the first peer in the realm, and crowns the king. The bishops have their "palaces," and seats in the House of Lords, except the Bishops of Sodor and Man, Liverpool, Truro, and St. Albans. The Church does not legislate for itself independently or directly; it is subject to Parliament.

The Convocations of Canterbury and York are the two highest official church bodies. Constituted by Edward I., they enjoyed independent rights of ecclesiastical legislation until 1532, when, by the Submission of the Clergy, they became subject to the king. In 1717 the Convocation of Canterbury was dissolved by George I., for the supposed hostility of the lower house to the House of Hanover, was not revived till 1852, and did not receive the royal license to proceed to business till 1861. These convocations consist of two houses. Over the upper, consisting of the bishops, the archbishop presides. The lower house, whose presiding officer is called prolocutor, is made up of the archdeacons, deans, and representatives of the lower clergy. The laity have no representation. In the Convocation of York the distinction between the two houses is only made on occasions of actual transaction of business. The archbishops have the right of veto upon all measures. Convocation is assembled by the king's writ, and cannot proceed to make new canons without his license, nor have its decisions validity till confirmed by his sanction.

The judicial business is transacted in three courts. The lowest is the Diocesan Consistory Court, presided over by the bishop's chancellor. Appealed cases go up to the Court of Arches, the official head of which is styled Dean of the Arches. The last tribunal of appeal is the king in council. There are three church censures, — suspension (for the neglect of parish duties), deprivation, and degradation. The two latter follow upon the disuse of the Prayer-Book, teachings subversive of the Thirty-nine Articles, simony, or conviction in a civil court. The Court of Arches alone exercises the right of deprivation.

ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS. 1. Anglo-Saxon. — The earliest monument is that of CÆDMON, a monk of Whitby (d. 680), On the Origin of Things, consisting of poetical paraphrases of parts of the Bible, some of which were published by Junius at Amsterdam, 1655, and most of them by Thorpe (Cædmon's Metrical Paraphrase of Parts of the Holy Scripture, with an English translation, notes, etc.), London, 1832. In the beginning of the eighth century Aldhelm and Guthlac produced an interlinear Anglo-Saxon version of the Psalter on the basis of the Roman text. The manuscript is among the Cotton Manuscripts marked Vespasian A., 1. In 730 (circa) Eadtrith, Bishop of Lindisfarne, translated parts of the Gospels (Durham Book,¹ Cotton Manuscripts, Nero D., IV.); and the Venerable Bede died (735) while engaged on the translation of John, in which he only proceeded to the beginning of chapter six. Parts of the Book of Exodus and the Psalter were translated by King Alfred (d. 901). The Rushworth Gloss (in the Bodleian Library), an interlinear evangelistary, made by Farnen and Owen about the same time, is peculiarly interesting from the agreement of its Latin text with the Codex Bezae where it differs from the Textus Receptus. Proverbs, in part, in an interlinear version, belongs to the tenth century (Cotton Manuscripts, Vespasian D., VI.). Towards the close of that century Aelfric, peculiarly odious to the monks of the period, produced in popular form paraphrases of the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges, parts of the historical books (Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles), Esther, Job (perhaps), Judith, and the Maccabees. Of these, the Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Job, and part of Judith, were printed in the Heptateuchus, edited by Thwaites, Oxoniae, 1699, 8vo. An Anglo-Saxon version of the Gospels, of somewhat later date, by an unknown translator, based on an ante-Hieronymian Latin text, with a preface by John Foxe the martyrologist, was printed in London by John Daye, 1571, 4to. There exist, likewise, in manuscript, several copies of the Psalter, written shortly before the Conquest, and three Anglo-Norman manuscripts of the Gospels, of which the first is assigned to the time of William III., and the two others to that of Henry II. Besides the printed works already named, there appeared in 1640 the interlineated Psalter by John Spehman, London, 1658; an edition of the Gospels by William L'Isle, 4to; and another by Thomas Marshall, Dordrecht, 1665 (Amsterdam, 1684), 4to, with the Mæso-Gothic version. Benjamin Thorpe published Libri Psalmorum Versio Antiqua Latina cum Paraphrasi Anglo-Saxonica, London, 1835; The Anglo-Saxon Version of the Holy Gospels, Ib., 1842, reprinted in New York, 1846; The Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels in Parallel Columns, with the Versions of Wiclif and Tyndale, by Joseph Bosworth, with preface and notes, London, 1865; The Gothic and Anglo-Saxon Gospels, by Bosworth and Waring, London, 1865, 2d ed., 1874; W. W. SKEAT; Gosp. accord. St. John in Anglo-Saxon and Northumbrian Versions, synoptically arranged, Cambridge, 1878; A Translation of the Anglo-Saxon Version of St. Mark's Gospel, with preface and notes, by H. C. Leonard, London, 1881.

2. Wiclifite.—Prior to Wiclif we have the Ormulum, so called from its author, Orm or Ormin, an English monk who lived in or about the twelfth century, and says in the preface, This boc is nemmedd Ormulum, Forthi thatt Orm ut wrohhte. It is a metrical paraphrase on the Gospels and Acts, neither alliterative nor in rhyme, but in imitation of a certain species of Latin mediæval poems, and is remarkable for its smooth, fluent, and regular versification. It was published by Dr. White, Oxford, 1852.—The Sowlehele, a very large volume (Bodleian Manuscripts, 779), assigned to the thirteenth century, author unknown, contains, among other writings, a metrical paraphrase of the Old and New Testaments.—A paraphrase, in the Northern dialect, of Genesis and Exodus, author and date unknown (? before 1300), and a metrical version of the Psalms, the first known translation into English, from the text of the Gallican (Jerome's) Latin Psalter, are among the manuscripts of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge.—The first prose translation of the Psalter into English is that of Richard Rolle, hermit of Hampole (assigned to the first half of the fourteenth century). It is excellent in its way; e.g., (Ps. xxiii. 4) "For win gif I hadde goo in myddil of the shudewe of death; I shal not dreede yeles, for thou art with me." There are quite a number of other manuscripts, notably one in Benet College, mentioned by Lewis, of which this is a specimen: (Mark vi. 22) "When the doughtyr of that Herodias was in comyn and had tombylde and plesid to Harowide, and als to the sittande at mete the king says to the wench."—John de Trevisa, Vicar of Berkeley, said to have translated the whole Bible into English before 1387, appears to have Englished only a few isolated passages: the assertion cannot be verified. The literature is given below.—John Wiclif, b. 1324 at Wiclif, near Richmond, in Yorkshire; studied at Oxford; was warden of Baliol Hall, rector of Fyningham, and warden of Canterbury Hall (1361-65), royal chaplain, and commissioner to Bruges (1374); on his return to England he was presented by the crown with the prebend of Aust and the rectory of Lutterworth in Leicestershire, which he held until his death (1384). The generally received statement, that it was only during the last ten years of his life that he was engaged upon the translation of the Scriptures, lacks proof; and it is safer to hold, with Baber, that he bestowed upon that great work a much longer period. His translation of the Bible is the first published translation, which imports that he must have been unremitting in his zeal to diffuse it among the people; and the proof is furnished in the fact, that, in spite of the prohibition of 1408, numerous copies of it have come down to us. His version was made from the Vulgate; i.e., from Jerome's version, or such copies as passed for it. The portion from Genesis to Baruch iii. 20 was made by Nicholas de Hereford, an English ecclesiastic: the balance of the Old Testament and of the Apocrypha, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are ascribed to Wiclif. The original text of the version was completed about 1380; the revision of it by Richard Purvey was finished about 1388. It may be considered certain that Hereford did not translate from the Latin alone, but used the French translation, from which the new idiom introduced is clearly taken. The New Testament of Wiclif was made from the Latin and Anglo-Saxon, and is rather literal: the revision by Purvey, and other unpublished versions in manuscript, seek to give the sense. Purvey's authorities were Augustine, Jerome, the Glossa Ordinaria, and Lyra. Wiclif's Version is, as to style, robust, terse, and homely; Purvey's, and that of the others referred to, more polished, though quaint. The peculiar strength of the Authorized Version is of Wiclifite origin. In the absence of illustrations, for which no space can be found, a few examples of curious renderings may be given (Matt. v. 22, "fy" or "fogh" for "raca;" Luke xvi. 13, "bishop" for "high priest"), as well as of explanatory glosses, now more obscure than the word to be explained; e.g., yvel fame, schendeschepe; incorruptible, that may not dye ne ben peyred; justified, founden trow; accepcion of persons, that is put oon bifore an other that is withouten deserte. Of obsolete words employed, the following are samples: tendith, kindleth; anentis, with; unbileful, unbelieving; leende, loins; herbore, lodging; maxmetis, idols; laburioun, breastplate; aretid, imputed; thilke, the same; stie, ascend; senuey, mustard; culueris, doves; cheppyng, market; exene, fellow.

3. Tyndale's.—William Tyndale b. in Gloucestershire, 1471; went to Oxford about 1500; took his degrees at Magdalen Hall; began the translation of the New Testament from the Greek as early as 1502; but upon his removal to London in 1522 met with so little encouragement there for the accomplishment of his purpose, and on account of his evangelical sentiments became so obnoxious to the clergy, that he left for the Continent, where he translated the New Testament (1524-25) from the Greek, strongly but legitimately influenced by Luther's Version. He proceeded to Cologne, and was carrying his quarto edition through the press, when, in consequence of the opposition of the local authorities, instigated by Cochlæus, he had to leave the city with the unfinished sheets, and completed the printing of the first edition (4to) and the second edition (8vo), at Worms, 1525. The place or places where he was in hiding under an assumed name, and where he translated the Pentateuch, and had it as well as other works printed, are not yet fixed: the strongest probability points to Wittenberg. But the writer of this article feels warranted to announce the established facts, that the Pentateuch was not printed at Marburg, that Hans Luft never had a printing-press in that place, and that neither Tyndale nor Fryth ever were at Marburg. These conclusions, published by the author Dec. 10, 1881, have since been fully confirmed by Professor Dr. Julius Caesar, the librarian of the University of Marburg, and are stated at length in his forthcoming volume on the English versions. — The numerous surreptitious editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here. The Pentateuch was published in 1530, the Book of Jonah in 1531. There is evidence that Tyndale translated, though he did not live to publish, other portions of the Old Testament from the Hebrew, most probably to the end of Second Chronicles, and several of the prophetic books. The translation of the Old Testament was his occupation in the gloomy prison of Vilvorde, where he was confined from May, 1535, till Oct. 6, 1536, on which day he suffered martyrdom, having been first strangled, and then burned. — Tyndale's translation is the first English version made from the original tongues. His helps were very meagre; and although he used the Vulgate, Wiclif, and Luther, he is thoroughly independent. His English is noble, and his phrase racy Saxon, his idiom singularly pure; and much of his version remains unchanged in the Authorized Version, of which it is really the original basis. Samples of his felicitous renderings are: (Matt. xiv. 14) "his heart did melt upon them;" (xv. 27) "the whelps eat of the crumbs;" (xxiv. 11) "iniquity shall have the upper hand;" (Mark viii. 29) "thou art very Christ;" (Luke xxii. 1) "the feast of sweet bread drew nigh, which is called Easter;" (John ii. 7) "filled them up to the hard brim;" (Acts xii. 18) "there was not a little ado among the soldiers;" (1 Cor. ii. 10) "searcheth the bottom of God's secrets;" (Phil. i. 8) "I long after you all from the very heart root in Jesus Christ;" (1 Tim. vi. 4) "but wasteth his brains about questions;" (Heb. viii. 1) "this is the pith;" (Jas. i. 1) "which are scattered here and there." Samples of homely phrase: (Matt. xxvi. 30) "and when they had said grace;" (Rev. i. 10) "I was in the Spirit on a Sunday;" (Acts xiv. 13) "brought oxen and garlands unto the church porch." — The numerous editions of Tyndale's New Testament cannot be noticed here beyond saying that that of 1525 (1526) is the first; and that of 1534-35, with the monogram G. II. on the second title, the last. (See Fry's Collation of Three New Testaments of William Tyndale, etc., and Biographical Description of Tyndale's New Testaments, and of two editions of the Bishops' Version, London, 1879.)

4. Coverdale's. — Miles Coverdale, b. about 1488 at Coverdale, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, was educated at Cambridge, and priested by John, Bishop of Chalcodon, at Norwich, in 1514. He fled to the Continent; but his meeting with Tyndale is purely conjectural, and his having assisted him in the translation of the Scriptures not only improbable, but absurd; for he was not an independent scholar, and his moderate proficiency in the tongues the accretion of a later period. Where he was from 1528 to 1535 is not positively known. At the instance of Crumwell he took in hand the translation of the Bible; and, as he was unquestionably an excellent German scholar, his proficiency in German explains, as the nature of its execution sustains, the honest titlepage of his first edition of the Bible (printed most probably by Froschover at Zurich, 1535); viz., Biblia — the Bible: that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and Neue Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn in to Englishe, MDXXXV. The "Douche" undoubtedly signifies "German," and the German versions he used were Luther's and the Zurich, perhaps also the Worms editions. The Latin versions he used were the Vulgate and that of Pagninus; and the published portions of Tyndale were the basis of his English. The Old Testament from Second Chronicles onward is Coverdale's own work; that is, it is a translation of Luther's and the Zurich versions, and a very servile one. His Diglott New Testament (exhibiting the English and the Vulgate in parallel columns) appeared in three editions (1538); his Bible was published in London by Andrewe Hester in 1550, and by R. Jugge in 1553. The part Coverdale had in the production of the Great Bible is noticed below. Coverdale's Version, though a second-hand production, has the merit of a pure and strong idiom: it is the basis of the version of the Psalter in the Book of Common Prayer. His language and his renderings are very musical; e.g., (Ps. xc. 10) "The days of our age are threescore years and ten;" (Isa. xlvi. 19) "Thy seed shall be like as the sand in the sea, and the fruit of thy body like the gravel-stones thereof; thy name shall not be rooted out, nor destroyed before me." He is also very quaint; e.g., (Job xix. 18) "Yea, the very desert fools despise me;" (Prov. xvi. 28) "he that is a blabbe of his tongue maketh division;" (Jer. xvii. 1) "graven upon the edge of your altars with a pen of iron and with an adamant claw;" (Col. ii. 10) "Let no man make you shoot at a wrong mark, which after his own choosing walketh in humbleness and spirituality of angels, things which he never saw."

5. Matthew's. — The name of Thomas Matthew is an alias of John Rogers, b. about 1500, at Deritend (in Birmingham); educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge (B.A., 1525); transferred to Cardinal College, Oxford, where he took orders the same year. He was next rector of Holy Trinity, London (1532), and accepted the chaplaincy at Antwerp, probably in 1534; there he became acquainted with Tyndale, and subsequently his literary executor. He published (where is not known, but most probably at Wittenberg) a folio edition of the Bible, entitled The Bible, which is all the Holy Scriptures, in which are containyd the Olde and Neue Testaments, truly and purely translated into English, by Thomas Matthew. Esaye I. Hearcken to, ye heavens, and thou earth, geave care: for the Lorde speaketh. MDXXXVII. This folio is a composite volume, and its critical analysis shows that the Pentateuch, and the portion from Joshua to Second Chronicles, as well as the whole of the New Testament, are Tyndale's translation: the remainder is Coverdale's. Rogers, however, did not merely put together these materials, but very skillfully edited and revised them. He added very valuable prefatory matter, especially the "Summe and content of all the Holy Scripture, both of the Olde and the Newe Testament," and "A Table of the pryncypal matters conteyned in the Byble, in which the readers may fynde and practyse many commune places," filling twenty-six folio pages, and constituting a sort of concordance and dictionary. It is chiefly taken from the French Bible of Olivetan. He likewise added several alternate renderings in his notes, introduced by the formula, "Some reade." He placed the contents or summaries before each chapter, and the notes at the end. His notes are diversified (textual, doctrinal, polemical, and practical), and form almost a running commentary. They are of various origin: many are taken from Pellicanns, and quite a number are original. His anti-papal notes are very striking: that on Matt. xvi. ("I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and upon this rock," etc.) reads, "That is, as saith St. Anstin, upon the confession which thou hast made, knowledging me to be Christ, the Son of the living God, I will build my cogregation or Church;" that on xxv. ("And the wise answered, Not so, lest there be not enough," etc.), "Note here that their own good works sufficed not for themselves, and therefore remained none to be distributed unto their fellows." The title of the Apocrypha reads, The volume of the bokes called Apocrypha conteyned in the comen translation in Latyne, which are not found in the Hebrue, nor in the Chalde. He supplies the prayer of Manasses, omitted by Coverdale, from the French version of Olivetan; and he protests, in the language of the same writer, against their reception as an inspired collection. The peculiarities of the version, as distinguished from Tyndale's and Coverdale's, cannot be illustrated here; but an idea of it may be conveyed by two or three of its characteristic notes. "Selah." This word, after Rabbi Kimchi, was a sign or token of lifting up the voice, and also a monition and advertisement to enforce the thought and mind earnestly to give heed to the meaning of the verse unto which it is added. "Some will that it signifies perpetually or verily." "Messiah." It signifieth anointed. "Jesus Christ then is the earnest and pledge of God's promise, by whom the grace and favour of God is promised to us with the Holy Ghost, which illumineth, lighteth, reneweth our hearts to fulfil the law." Matthew's Bible is practically the basis of the text of the Authorized Version. It remains to say that John Rogers, in 1537, married, and moved to Wittenberg. He is supposed to have remained there until 1517. Distinguished by many favors under Edward VI., he was the first martyr in the Marian persecution, and was burned alive in Smithfield in February, 1555.

6. Taverner's. — Richard Taverner, b. at Brisley, Norfolk, about 1505; studied at Cambridge and Oxford (B.A., 1529); was a fine Greek scholar, and, though a laic, was asked by Crumwell to revise the Bible, which work he completed in 1539. It is more than an examination (recognitio), and less than a new translation, occasionally pedantic, and very unequal. His recognition is frequently in servile imitation of the Vulgate, on which he seems to have wholly relied in the Old Testament; e.g., (Gen. i. 2) "the Spirit of God was borne upon" (ferabatur);

(i. 7) "and so it was doon" (factum est); "bereth seed" (afferentem). In the New Testament, on the other hand, both the number and quality of his renderings proclaim the finished Grecian; and a large proportion of them are retained in the Authorized Version. Matt. i. 25 (Matthew's "Till she had brought forth her fyrst sonne") he renders "tyll at last she had brought forth her fyrst borne sonne;" xxii. 12 ("he was even speechless") is changed into "had never a word to say;" and xxii. 34 ("put the Sadducees to silence") into "stopped the Sadducees' mouth." In his studious endeavor to find Saxon terms, he gave us (1 John ii. 1) "spokesman" for "advocate," and (at ii. 2) coined "mercystock" as the equivalent of ἰσχυρὸς, and in place of Tyndale's and Coverdale's "he it is that obtaineth grace for us." To his regard for the Greek article are due the renderings (John i. 9), "that was the true light which . . . coming," (i. 23) "I am a voice of one crying," (i. 25) "Art thou the prophet?" Among the many phrases introduced by him, and retained in the Authorized Version, are, (Matt. xiii. 58) "because of their unbelief;" (xviii. 12) "ninety and nine," (xxv. 35) "a stranger," (xxvii. 65) "Ye have a watch," (Gal. iv. 20) "I stand in doubt of you," (vi. 16) "the Israel of God." In 1551 his Old Testament appeared in the folio Bible, revised by Beeke, and printed by Jhon Day. After that period it fell into neglect. The Epistles in this edition, as well as Matthew's Bible, follow the order of the Authorized Version as far as Philemon, after which come the Epistles of John, Hebrews, First and Second Peter, James, and Jude.

7. The Great Bible. — Tyndale's and Matthew's Bibles were for ecclesiastical reasons, Coverdale's, on account of its inaccuracy, not acceptable to Crumwell, at whose instance and charge the latter was directed to produce a new edition on more critical principles. Coverdale, accompanied by Grafton, repaired for that purpose to Paris (1538), where better paper and more skilful printing were to be had; and the work progressed satisfactorily at the press of Regnault, until, by the interference of the inquisitor-general, it was stopped, and had to be completed (in April, 1539) in London. This handsome folio, on account of its size, is the Great Bible, not Cranmer's, as it is sometimes loosely called. Its title runs: The Byble in Englyshe, that is to saye, the content of all the Holy Scripture, bothe of the Olde and Newe testament, truly translated after the verryte of the Hebrue and Greke textes, by the dylygent studye of dyuerse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges. Prynted by Rychard Grafton & Edward Whitchurch. Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum. 1539.

These "dyuerse excellent learned men" appear to have been the works of Munster and Erasmus. The elaborate frontispiece of this Bible is said to have been designed by Holbein. It is the text of Matthew, revised, or Coverdale's revision of Tyndale and of his own Bible; and he was so little attached to that, that (e.g., in Isa. liii.) he corrected it in about forty places. Almost every change in the Old Testament may be traced to Munster and Pagninus, and in the New, to Erasmus. Two examples will show this: (1) Ps. xxiii. 5 (COVERDALE, 1535), "Thou preparest a table before me agaynst mine enemies:^{a1} thou anoyntest my head with oyle, and fyllest my cuppe full;”^{b1} (GREAT BIBLE, 1539) “Thou shalt prepare;^{a2} a table before me agaynst them that trouble me;^{b2} thou hast^{c2} anoynted my head with oyle, & my cuppe shalbe full;”^{d2} (2) Gal. iii. 7 (TYNDALE), “Understand therefore that,” (GREAT BIBLE, 1539), “ye know therefore” (scitis igitur); iii. 29 (TYNDALE), “by promise,” (GREAT BIBLE) “according to the promise” (juxta promissionem). This Bible was very popular. A new edition appeared in the next year, again revised (and unsparingly, though often for the worse) by Coverdale. It had a preface by Crammer; and the editions of April, July, and November, 1540, and May, November, and December, 1541, are really the Crammer Bibles. This Bible (the Great and Crammer’s) remained the authorized version for twenty-eight years.³ The greater part of the portions of the Scriptures in the Prayer-Books of 1549 and 1552 were taken from it. It contains numerous paraphrastic and supplementary clauses from the Vulgate, and is decidedly inferior to Matthew’s.

8. The Genevan. — Three among the English exiles at Geneva (namely, William Whittingham, Thomas Sampson, and Anthony Gilby) are conspicuous among the translators of this version; and among these three the most laborious was William Whittingham, b. at Lanchester, near Durham, in 1524; an Oxford man; married the sister of John Calvin’s wife (Catherine Jaquemaine of Orléans); and was minister of the English Church at Geneva. They produced from the original Greek the New Testament, first in 1557, and a distinct version of it, with the whole Bible, in 1560. The first seems to have been the sole work of Whittingham, and was printed before the translation of the entire Bible was taken in hand. The Testament of 1557 was a small octavo, entitled The Newe Testament of our Lord Jesus Christ, conferred diligently with the Greke and best approued translations. With the arguments as well before the Chapters, as for every Boke and Epistle, also diuersities of readings, and most profitable annotations of all hard places: wherunto is added a copious Table. At Geneva, printed by Conrad Badius, MDLVII. This Testament is really Tyndale’s, revised, collated with the Great Bible; which in the New Testament is likewise based on that version, and a strong leaning on Beza, with the result of a substantial agreement with Tyndale, a less frequent difference from him and agreement with the Great Bible, and an occasional agreement with Beza and difference from the two former. Among its peculiar readings note: (Matt. ix. 16) “No man peceth an olde garment with a peece of new clothe and yndressed. For that same peece taketh away something from the garment, and the cutte is made worse;” (Luke xviii. 34) “do me iustice agaynst myne aduersarie;” (John vi. 9) “there is a little boy here;” (Acts xxvii. 9) “because also the tyme of the Fast was passid;” (xxvii. 13) “lowsted nearer” (cf. Asson, in Wiclif, Tyndale, and Great Bible),

— all exhibiting independent and superior scholarship, which likewise distinguish the notes for which the Genevan Testament is famous, and most of which were put into the edition of 1560. These notes are mostly original, or selected from Calvin and Beza, and treat of theology, history, geography, etc.; some are also inferential. This Testament is the first English Testament with verse division. The whole Bible of 1560 is a noble, scholarly production. Sampson was a fine Hebraist; and the translators were indebted in the Old Testament to Pagninus, Münster, and Leo Judæ. In the New Testament the force of the Greek particles γάρ, δέ, etc., is uniformly attended to. It was finished and published April, 1560, and printed by Rowland Hall. It is known also as the Breeches Bible, from the rendering of Gen. iii. 7, — “They sewed fig-leaves together, and made themselves breeches.” It was printed — at the expense of the English congregation at Geneva, of which John Bodley (father of Sir Thomas, the founder of the Bodleian Library at Oxford) was a generous member — in quarto, and became very popular, more than one hundred and thirty editions having been published, the last in 1644, and the Authorized Version, with the Genevan notes, in 1715. Peculiar and novel features were, the attempted restoration of the original form of Hebrew names, the omission of St. Paul from the title of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the use of Italic letters for supplemental words, the substitution of biblical events and the names of reformers for the names of saints in the Calendar, and the entire omission of the Apocrypha. The Anglo-Genevan edition of the New Testament of 1576, by Lawrence Tomson, one of the best linguists of the day, introduced many changes, especially in the rendering of the article by that (e.g., John i. 1, 4, 5, 9, 14, etc.), and the notes, which, though more numerous, are less pithy than the old ones. The first Bible printed in Scotland (1579) is an exact reprint of the Genevan of 1561.

9. The Bishops’. — The superior merits of the Genevan Bible, its great popularity, and the general dissatisfaction with the Great Bible, induced Archbishop Parker to make preparations for a new edition under church authority, looking to a revision of that Bible by the originals with the aid of Pagninus and Münster, etc., temperate annotations, the marking of unedifying portions, and the use, where required, of nobler forms of expression. Some of his episcopal coadjutors held extraordinary views (e.g., Bishops Guest, Cox, and Sandys), and the archbishop exercised accordingly a wise discretion in the assigning of the several books. The revision — on which not less than eight bishops were engaged (hence its name), as well as several deans and professors — was completed, and the Bible published in a handsome folio, on good paper, and superbly printed, in 1568, 1569, 1570, 1571 (New Testament), and 1572. It contains a vast amount of excellent prefatory and introductory matter, among it the preface by the archbishop, and Crammer’s prologue, and is highly ornamented, some of the ornaments of very dubious taste. As a translation it is of unequal merit; the different books in the edition of 1568 being qualitatively unequal, and the whole edition of 1572 greatly superior to the former. That of 1572 is the basis of the Authorized Version. The critical helps available to the Geneva translators were used by the translators of the Bishops' Bible; and, while the influence of the Geneva Version on this is very pronounced, the original was diligently consulted. The critical examination of Isa. liii. by Professor Westcott yields the result, that, of twenty-one corrections, five are due to the Geneva, five agree with Pagninus, three with Leo Judæ, three with Castalio, one with Münster, one is linguistic, and three are apparently original. These last are the omission (liii. 3) of "Yea, he was . . . regarded him not," and (liii. 4) of "and punished," and the correction (liii. 4) of "infirmities" into "infirmity." In Job xix. 25 the Bishops' of 1568 brings the new rendering, "he shall raise up at the latter day them that lie in the dust." Twenty-nine passages in the New Testament of 1565, faulted by Lawrence as incorrect, were, for the most part, as corrected by him, received in the edition of 1572, and into the present text of the Authorized Version. The examination of Eph. iv. 7-16 (by Westcott) in the Great Bible of 1550, and the Bishops', shows, that, among twenty-six changes, seventeen are new, nine being due to the Geneva, and the remainder the result of close and thoughtful reference to the Greek. The independence of the revision is evident in that only four of the new changes agree with Beza, while nine go against him. But, in spite of many excellences, the Bishops' Bible was the least successful of all the English versions. As peculiar to this Bible appear the attempted classification of the books of the Bible into legal, historical, sapiential, and prophetic (with the curious result that the Gospels, the Catholic Epistles, and those to Titus, Philemon, and the Hebrews, are described as legal, the other Pauline Epistles as sapiential, the Acts alone as historical, and Revelation as prophetic), the indication of ostracized portions, and, in one edition, two versions of the Psalter (Matthew's and the new).

10. The Rheims and Douay. — William Allen, Gregory Martin, and Richard Bristow were the chief promoters of this extraordinary version, which claims for the Vulgate, from which it is made, not only equal authority with the original Scriptures, but superior, reasoning thus: As a rule, the Latin agrees with the Greek; when it differs from the common Greek text, it agrees with some copy, "as may be seen in Stephens's margin," and the adversaries frequently concede the superiority of the marginal readings; when the Greek goes against the Latin, quotations from the Greek fathers are sure to sustain it, and, where these fail, conjecture may come in to adapt the Greek to the Latin; and, where conjecture and the Greek fathers fail, the Latin fathers are almost sure to sustain the Vulgate, and, if their readings should differ, the cause is to be sought in "the great diversity and multitude" of the Latin copies. Admit these principles, and the superiority of the text of the Vulgate to the Greek text is established.

I am undecided whether the actual translation of the Rhemish New Testament agrees or conflicts with the expressed purpose of its authors; for their text, especially in the correct use of the article, often agrees with the Greek, and in spite of their deification of the Vulgate, even as authorized by the Council of Trent, and their ceaseless fulminations (in the notes) against heretics, they are greatly indebted to the Geneva mouse (Beza), the Geneva Version, the Bishops' Bible, and to Wiclif. The New Testament appeared in 1582, at Rheims, and the Old Testament in 1609, at Douay. The production is very scholarly, in fact, equal to that of any version extant at the time, and on that very account utterly useless as a translation. It is designedly literal, and its English so utterly unenglish, that it might pass for Latin; e.g., (Matt. i. 17) "transmigration of Babylon," (vi. 11) "supersubstantial bread," (xvi. 26) "what permutation," (Mark v. 35) "arch-synagogue," (xv. 46) "wrapped him in the sindon," (Luke xxii. 7) "the day of the Azymes . . . the pasche," (John vii. 5) "Scenopegia was at hand," (Rom. i. 30) "odible to God," (1 Cor. x. 11) "written to our correption," (xi. 4) "dishonesteth his head," (Phil. ii. 7) "exinanited himself," (Philem. 6) "evident in the agnition," (Heb. vi. 7) "grasse commodious," (ix. 23) "exampers of the coelestials," (xiii. 16) "God is promerited," (Jas. iii. 4) "with a litle sterne whither the violence of the director wil," (iii. 6) "the wheels of our nativity," (1 John iv. 3) "every spirit that dissolueth Jesus," (Rev. xxii. 14) "blessed are they that wash their stoles." This new beatitude may have been necessary in certain monasteries, but cannot be accepted by the Latin Church; for many copies of the Vulgate add, "in sanguine Agni." The version is nevertheless meritorious in other respects, notably in the uniformity of its renderings (e.g., of Amen, Rabbi, charity, multitude, work); but not a word of commendation can be said of the notes, which are truly savage. Lord Bacon liked this version. It is proper to add that the modern editions are less unenglish and less furious. See Vulgate New Testament with the Douay Version of 1582, London, 1881. See also below in Miscellaneous.

11. The Authorized Version. — At the Hampton Court Conference (1604) the demand of Reynolds for a new translation was really the starting-point which eventuated, mainly through the king's dislike (pretended or real) of the Geneva, in the Authorized Version,—the work (in all) of fifty-four scholars (forty-seven on the list), divided into six companies, of which two met at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge, for the space of three years; after which six men, two from each place, met in London to superintend the publication. Bilson, Bishop of Winchester, who wrote the arguments of the several books, and Dr. Miles Smith, who wrote the noble preface, were the final correctors. The preface states, among many other matters, that their object was to make of many good translations a principal good one, to avoid extremes, and produce uniformity of rendering. "Never was a great enterprise like the production of our Authorized Version, carried out with less knowledge handed down to posterity of the labourers, their method, and order of working" (Scrivener, Introd. to Cambridge Paragraph Bible). It was published in 1611; and a number of years elapsed before its intrinsic superiority and merits drove all other English translations out of the field. Taken as a whole, it is the best and most truly English version. Couched in noble language, it abounds in felicities. It is musical, dramatic, and even tragical. It is, in turn, pathetic and sublime, and has, withal, a directness and force which commend it to all classes and conditions of men. But it is far from perfect; and wherein, in the opinion of many of its most ardent admirers, it should be made to conform more thoroughly and consistently with the original Scriptures remains to be briefly indicated under the following heads, preparatory to the Anglo-American revision:—

(1) The critical apparatus at the command of the translators of King James's Version was that already noticed in the earlier portions of this article, to which must be added, for the Old Testament, the Latin translations of the Hebrew by Arius Montanus (1572) and Tremellius (extended to the Apocrypha by his son-in-law, Francis Junius, 1579). They had likewise the translation of the Syriac New Testament by Tremellius, and of the Greek by Theodore Beza (London, 1593, 1597). For the Greek text of the New Testament they had Beza's edition of 1589, and the third edition of Stephens, with this result (following from the critical value, or rather want of value, of those Testaments), that many readings of the Authorized Version are unsupported by any known Greek manuscript, and that the Greek text they used, in more than a thousand cases, requires to be corrected by what is now known to be the true text (Professor Abbot's Paper in Anglo-American Bible Revision, New York, 1879). Of then existing critical versions (i.e., those made directly from the original) they had Luther, the Geneva-French (1587-88), the Italian by Diodati (1607), and the Spanish by C. Reyal (1569), and Valera's (1602).

(2) The improvements made upon former English versions, and their sources.—A critical examination of Isa. liii. shows, that, of forty-nine changes, about seven-eighths are due to the Geneva Version, two to Tremellius, two to Pagninus, that the Geneva is abandoned three times, and one rendering is independent (Westcott); to which I would add, that, in three instances, the Authorized Version returns to older English versions, that two renderings (comeliness, ver. 2, and griefs, ver. 4) are original, and in thirteen places the influence of Luther appears to me undeniable. In the New Testament the same scholar notes, that, in Romans, seventeen phrases are common to the Authorized Version and the Rhemish; in Heb. xiii. 1-16, of the twenty-three changes made, seven are due to Beza, or the Geneva, about seven to the Rhemish, two apparently suggested by the Syriac (Tremellius), and seven original or linguistic. Of thirty-seven alternative readings in Mark he found one-half to agree with the Geneva, or Beza, six with the Rhemish, three with the French, six with earlier English versions, and one each with Castalio and the Vulgate.

(3) Alleged blemishes requiring correction.—These are very numerous and diversified, and touch geography, proper names, mistakes of the meaning, grammar, archaisms, etc. For full and long lists and illustrations, impossible to supply here, see LITERATURE below.

The felicities of the Authorized Version are confessedly remarkable; e.g., (Gen. ii. 16) "Thou mayest freely eat," (xv. 2) "Seeing I go childless," (1 Chron. xi. 9) "David waxed greater and greater," and the now naturalized Hebraisms,

"God of peace," "Sun of righteousness," "Man of sin," "Man of sorrows," "Son of man," "Rock of ages," etc. The Saxon-English of the version is also striking. In the Lord's Prayer (Matthew) the sixty-five words exclusive of Amen consist of fifty-nine Saxon and six Latin ones. The first thirty-five are all Saxon in succession. Of the modern editions of the Authorized Version, those of Mant, and, as a rule, those published by the S. P. C. K., contain only authorized matter, which consists, besides the text, of 6,637 marginal notes in the Old Testament, 1,016 in the Apocrypha, and 765 in the New Testament; of the summaries of the contents of each chapter; and of nine thousand marginal references; viz., 6,588 in the Old Testament, 885 in the Apocrypha, and 1,527 in the New Testament. The chronological dates in the margin, and the chronological index at the end, were added by Dr. William Lloyd (d. 1717).

12. The Anglo-American Revision.—The action taken by the Convocation of Canterbury in February, 1870, and eventuating in the formation of a committee (consisting of two companies, one for the Old, the other for the New Testament) for the revision of the Bible in England, beginning their work June 22, 1870, and of a similar committee (with two companies) in America, beginning work Oct. 4, 1872, has culminated thus far in the publication, on May 17, 1881, of the first fruits of their joint labors; viz., The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, Translated out of the Greek. Being the Version set forth A.D. 1611 Compared with the most ancient authorities, and Revised A.D. 1881. The whole number of the English revisers in 1880 amounted to fifty-two,—twenty-seven in the Old-Testament company (Dr. Browne, Bishop of Winchester, chairman), and twenty-five in the New-Testament company (Dr. Ellicott, Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, chairman). The whole number of the American revisers amounted in 1880 to twenty-seven,—fourteen in the Old-Testament company (Professor Dr. Green, chairman), and thirteen in the New-Testament company (ex-President Dr. Woolsey, chairman, and Professor Dr. Schaff, President, of the American Revision Committee). More than two-thirds of the English revisers belong to the Church of England: the remainder are representatives of other churches. The American revisers represent the different Protestant churches. And all the revisers, both in England and America, are eminent biblical scholars. The general principles on which the revision is made are: 1. The least possible changes in the text of the Authorized Version consistent with fidelity; 2. To be expressed, if possible, in the language of the Authorized and earlier English versions; 3. To be twice revised; 4. The text to be adopted to be that sustained by preponderating evidence, and the changes to be noted in the margin; 5. Textual changes to be made by simple majorities on the first revision, by two-thirds majorities on the second; 6. The voting on changes causing discussion to be deferred to the next meeting, if required by one-third of the revisers present; 7. Headings of chapters, pages, paragraphs, Italics, and punctuation to be revised; 8. Reference, when desirable, to other experts, at home or abroad, for their opinion. The principles regulating the American co-operation are substantially as follows: "The English revisers to send their revisions to the American revisers, to consider the American suggestions, to furnish them with copies of the revision in its final form before publication, and to allow them to present in an appendix remaining differences of reading and rendering of importance not adopted by the English revisers." The result, thus far, of this harmonious union and co-operation, is the Revised New Testament, which is unquestionably a most faithful and noble English version, and equal to any version of the sacred original, for the following reasons:—

(1) Its text, i.e., the Greek, is the purest extant, based on the authority of documentary evidence without deference to any printed text of modern times; which imports that only the most ancient and authentic manuscripts, versions, and patristic quotations were received, and diligently compared by competent experts, and their united testimony required for the adoption of any, even the minutest, integral portion of the sacred volume. The readers of the new revision have the undoubted assurance that the Greek text from which it has been translated has been verified, as far as human learning and fidelity could verify it, as the word of God. What the revisers rejected from the text had been added by careless or designing transcribers, what they received into it had been omitted by them. No version rests on a purer text.

(2) Its translation is a marvel for fidelity, accuracy, elegance, purity of idiom, and harmony of expression. Some of its noblest features depend for their full appreciation on the publication of the Old Testament. The changes introduced are fivefold: 1. Those required by change of reading in the Greek text; e.g., (1 Pet. ii. 21) "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example." 2. Where the Authorized Version appeared to be incorrect; e.g., (1 Cor. xi. 31) "that your coming together be not unto judgment." 3. The removal of ambiguous or obscure renderings; e.g., (Matt. xvi. 23) "thou art a stumbling block unto me." 4. The removal of inconsistent renderings; e.g., (1 Cor. xv. 27, 28) "For He put all things in subjection under his feet. But when he saith. All things are put in subjection, it is evident that he is excepted who did subject all things unto him. And when all things have been subjected unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subjected to him that did subject all things unto him, that God may be all in all." 5. Changes made necessary by consequence (see Preface). The grammatical inaccuracies of the Authorized Version have been removed; e.g., (Matt. ii. 4) "The Christ;" (1 Tim. iv. 10) "a root of all evil;" (Acts xix. 2) "did ye receive . . . when ye believed?" (v. 30) "whom ye slew, hanging him on a tree;" (Matt. xxviii. 19) "baptizing them into the name;" (Rom. viii. 7) "the mind of the flesh . . . the mind of the Spirit;" (Matt. xxvii. 11) "cast upon him the same reproach." Such archaisms as "anon," "offend," "scrip," "an eight days," "highest room," "lewd," "carriages," "profited," "proper," etc., used in senses now unintelligible, have been corrected by proper words. Consistency has been introduced in the rendering of proper names by the uniform preservation of one word for the same person or place.

Technical expressions, such as "deputy," "chief of Asia," "executioner," and "chamberlain," have been corrected by more appropriate terms. Some improvements have been made in the rendering of terms denoting coins. The adoption of "Hades" (e.g., Acts ii. 27) in place of "hell" is a great gain. The marginal notes are very valuable, and embody a vast amount of learning, and frequently shed light on the changes recommended by the American revisers (many of which are uncommonly well taken), but not adopted in England. Italics are used sparingly, and the combination of the paragraph system with that of the familiar division of chapters and verses is a decided improvement; but the preface does not explain the entire disappearance of the headings of chapters and pages, which, under their principles, the revisers were required to revise, not to discard. The same remark applies to the parallel references. The metrical arrangement of quotations from the poetical books of the Old Testament, etc., is a great aid to the right understanding of the sacred text, which is likewise facilitated by the system of judicious and consistent punctuation which marks this revision. Taken as a whole the unprejudiced reader of this English version enjoys the unspeakable privilege of reading the pure and true word of God in his mother-tongue, so faithfully rendered that he is virtually placed in the same position which was enjoyed by those to whom the New Testament came originally in Greek. It is a noble translation, destined to win its way into the hearts of all lovers of the word of God, who are under the greatest possible obligations to the noble company of learned and devoted men who have spent so many years on its production.

13. Miscellaneous.—During the short reign of Edward VI. there were published, in 1547, an edition of the New Testament in English and Latin Of Mayster Erasmus' Translacion with the Pystles taken out of the Old Testament, and altogether thirty-five editions of the New Testament, and thirteen of the whole Bible, distributed as follows: three of Coverdale (two in 1550, one in 1553), seven of Cranmer's Bible, and eight of the New Testament, five of Matthew's, two of Tavernier (1549–51), twenty-four editions of Tynedale's or Matthew's New Testament; further, the Worcester edition of the New Testament sold by royal order at twenty-two pence, and, besides the Latin-English New Testament of 1547, two others with the paraphrase of Erasmus, translated by Nicholas Udall, 1548–49; that of 1548 ends with Hebrews, and the translator states, in the fulsome speech of the period, that the Princess Mary (of bloody memory) did part of John's Gospel; that of 1549 added Revelation in a translation of Leo Jude's paraphrase of that book. The fragment of Sir John Choke's translation from the Greek (published by James Goodwin, B.D., London, 1843) belongs to this period (1550). It consists of Matthew (omitting the last ten verses), and twenty-one verses of Mark i., and is the most intensely Saxon version extant, made by a fine Grecian; e.g., he uses these words, wizards (wise-men), frosent (apostle), freslmen (proselytes), devild (possessed), crossed (crucified), mummd (humatic), and toller (publican). The New Testament translated by Mace (1729) is an utterly undignified, if not vulgar and profane, production. The edition of the Authorized Version, containing for the first time the chronological dates (see Authorized Version) is known as Archbishop Tenison's of 1701. The Cambridge edition of the Bible by Dr. Paris (1762) and the Oxford edition by Dr. Blayney (1769) are important: the latter, on account of its great accuracy, is regarded as the standard in England. Dr. Scrivener's Cambridge Paragraph Bible (1873) is said to be the most accurately edited in the language. The Rheims New Testament was printed in a second edition, 1600, in a third at Douay, in 1621, and in a fourth, probably at Rouen, in 1633. The Old Testament appeared in a second edition in 1635. Among the later Roman-Catholic versions are prominent: (1) Nary's New Testament, 1719 (Dublin?), a vast improvement on the Rheims and Douay in tone and English; (2) Welham's New Testament, 1730-33 (Douay?); (3) Troy's Bible, Dublin, 1816, with very savage notes; (4) The Holy Bible, Dublin and London, 1825, in better English, but a very corrupt text; (5) A New Version of the Four Gospels by a Catholic (Dr. Lingard), 1836, by far the best of all, and on that account disparaged by Roman-Catholic writers, notably by Cardinal Wiseman.

14. LIT. — The enumeration of all the works would require many pages. Of those consulted, and containing the fullest information, the most important are, LEWIS: History of the Translations of the Holy Bible, etc., into English, etc., Lond., 1818; BAGSTER'S Hexapla, with an account of the Principal Eng. Translations, London, no date; ANDERSON: Annals of the English Bible, Lond., 1845, 2 vols., rev. ed., 1862, Am. ed., 1 vol., abridged and continued by Dr. Prime, N.Y., 1849; CONANT, MRS.: Pop. Hist. of the Translation of the Holy Scriptures, N.Y., 1856, revised ed. by Dr. Conant, N.Y., 1881; WESTCOTT: A General View of the History of the English Bible, London, 2d ed.; EADIE: The English Bible, London, 1876, 2 vols.; MOULTON: History of the English Bible, London, 1878; STOURGTON: Our English Bible, London, no date; MOMBERT: Handbook of the English Versions of the Bible, N.Y., n.d. [1883]. On the revision, see especially the works of Bishop LIGHTFOOT, Archbishop TRENCH, and Bishop ELLICOTT, Am. ed. in 1 vol. with introduction by Dr. SCHAFF, N.Y., 1873; also Anglo-American Bible Revision, by members of the American Revision Committee, Phila. and New York, 1879; B. ENNODIUS, Magnus Felix, b. at Arles about 473; d. at Pavia, July 17, 521; belonged to a distinguished but poor Gallie family; lost his parents very early, and was educated at Milan by an aunt, who died 489, and left him nearly destitute. Having made a rich match, he lived, as it seems, only to enjoy himself, when a severe sickness awakened him to serious reflections. His wife entered a nunnery, and he was ordained a deacon: as such, he accompanied Bishop Epiphanius of Pavia on his mission to the Burgundian King Gundebaud (494), and, two years later on, he distinguished himself in Rome by an apology for Pope Symmachus and a panegyric of Theodoric.

By Pope Hormisdas he was made Bishop of Pavia, and as such he was twice sent as ambassador to Constantinople (515 and 517). His works (consisting of some poems, a number of letters, the panegyric of Theodoric, the defence of Symmachus, a life of Bishop Epiphanius, etc.) were first printed at Basel, 1569, Paris, 1611, in MIGNE, Patrol. Lat., vol. 63; best editions by Hartel, Vienna, 1882, and Vogel, Berlin, 1885. They have no æsthetic merits, and only small historical interest: they show that in theology he was a semi-pelagian, and with respect to church-polity an ardent champion of the Papal supremacy. He was the first who addressed the Bishop of Rome as papa.

E'NOCH (initiator, or initiated). There are several of this name mentioned in the Old Testament (Gen. iv. 17, and, in the Hebrew text, xxv. 4, xlv. 9; and Exod. vi. 14); but the only one of any interest is the son of Jared and the father of Methusaleh (Gen. v. 18, 21-24). He "walked with God," a phrase expressive of constant companionship, an undisturbed, intimate intercourse with God; and so, at the age of three hundred and sixty-five years (very young for an antediluvian), suddenly he was not, for God took him. His disappearance was, in the antediluvian age, the striking evidence of immortality, just as Elijah's was to his age, and Christ's resurrection is to us. Men may have looked for him, as they did subsequently for Elijah (2 Kings ii. 16), but as vainly. He had gone, not to return. He had been translated. In the absence of biblical information, speculation has been active. According to the majority of the rabbins and the fathers he was taken to paradise, although some put him in heaven, and others in the seventh heaven. A parallel to Enoch's translation will be that of the saints who are alive at the second coming of Christ (1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51). In the Epistle to the Hebrews, Enoch's walk with God is regarded as a triumph of faith (Heb. xi. 5).

Tradition has made of Enoch not only a preacher of repentance, and prophet of judgment, which indeed is very likely, but also (as "Enoch" may mean the initiated) a sage acquainted with divine secrets by reason of his walk with God, the transmitter of the true gnosis in contradistinction to the knowledge which demons had brought into the world, and the inventor of writing and the sciences, particularly astronomy. Finally, in the century before Christ, a book was attributed to him, in which all the knowledge then attained about God, nature, and history, was by a fiction transferred to him. A quotation is made from it in Jude 14. See Enoch, Book of, in art. Pseudepigraphs of the Old Testament, and A. DILLMANN, Das Buch Henoch, Leipzig, 1853. Among the Arabs, Enoch or Idris (the learned), as he is more commonly called, plays the rôle of a medium of the higher knowledge and science.

The heathen myths of the assumption of Hercules, Romulus, and others, are not in point; because the ground for the translation of Enoch was his relations with God, while the legends rest upon a naturalistic conception of divinity, which merges the gods with the highest human development. Much nearer to the biblical account is the Babylonian Nisuthrus in the history of Berosus, who indeed corresponds to Noah, but who was after the flood translated, and was sought for until his voice was heard announcing, that, on account of his piety, he had been removed to dwell among the gods. In the cuneiform inscriptions he is called Ardrakhasis, and was with his wife taken away to live as the gods in a remote place at the mouth of the rivers. [See GEORGE SMITH: The Chaldean Account of Genesis, ed. Sayce, pp. 288, 309.] Another supposed parallel to the Bible Enoch is King Annakos, or Nannakos, who is said to have lived three hundred years before the Deukalion flood, and to have prophesied with tears the overthrow of the race after his death. But this story comes through Zenobius (200 A.D.), who borrowed freely from Didymus of Alexandria (30 A.D.); and it is therefore extremely probable, as the similarity of names would itself indicate, that the story is really derived from Jewish sources.

An endeavor has been made to identify Enoch with the Latin Janus, the god of the new year, because the year has 365 days, and he had 365 years; but it remains only an endeavor. See the commentaries and Bible histories and Bible dictionaries upon Enoch; [BARING-GOULD: Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, American reprint, N.Y., pp. 85-91].

VON ORELLI.

ENTHUSIASM (from ἐνθεός, filled or inspired by God) is an intense moral impulse or all-engrossing temper of mind. There is an enthusiasm for popular freedom and for art, for the emancipation of the slaves and for conquest. The term as applied to religion designates both a noble temper of mind and moral fervor (expressed by the apostle as a "being zealously affected in a good cause"), and also a misdirected and even destructive intensity of feeling.

The distinction between genuine and morbid enthusiasm will often depend upon the nice discrimination of a keen judgment, or the moral stand-point of the critic, as in the case of that ridicule which is by some applied to all religious workers or philanthropists who have undergone hardship, or even death, in the service and for the benefit of others; as in the case of monasticism, and of the apostles on the Day of Pentecost, who were said by some to be drunken (Acts ii. 13).

Enthusiasm is the quality without which the best in any department cannot be reached, nor the largest amount of results achieved. It is also a quality, which, controlled by ignorance, or misapplied, although conscientiously it may be, may work great harm.

In the better sense of the term, our Lord was the highest illustration of enthusiasm. His soul was possessed with overwhelming affection for men, and an intense impulse to help them. The apostles were enthusiasts in a good sense; being constrained by an overwhelming desire to preach the gospel, and ready to show it by suffering and death. The early monks, St. Francis of Assisi, Dominic, Hus, the Reformers, the early Methodists, and the present missionaries in foreign lands, are also examples of religious enthusiasm. Heathen religions have had their enthusiasts, as well as the Christian.

Christian enthusiasm in the good sense is derived in two motives, — love for men (brought out in a strong way by the author of Ecce Homo) and love for Christ. The New Testament combines both these motives in the labors and heroism of the apostles, the greatest of whom, however (St. Paul), attributes his enthusiasm prevailing to the love for Christ (Phil. i. 21, "To me to live is Christ; 2 Cor. v. 14, "The love of Christ constraineth us").

In the bad sense, enthusiasm is almost synonymous with fanaticism, and enthusiasts with zealots. It is fervor of soul drawn from wrong principles, founded on wrong judgments, and applied to wrong ends. Neither selfish nor impure motives necessarily prevail in such a temper of mind, and zeal of activity. Such enthusiasm may proceed from a sincere desire to glorify God. It substitutes fancies for the truth, and in its last stages the disorder of the mind becomes mental insanity. Warburton defines enthusiasm in this second sense as that "temper of mind in which the imagination has got the better of the judgment" (Div. Leg., V., Appendix).

The term "enthusiasts" has also had a technical sense, as in the Elizabethan period. Jewel, Rogers (Thirty-nine Articles, p. 158, Parker Soc. ed.), and others speak of Enthusiasts as they do of Anabaptists. During the Commonwealth period, and afterwards, the term was frequently applied to the Puritans in a tone of depreciation, as notably by Robert South, who preached a special sermon on the subject, "Enthusiasts not led by the Spirit of God," meaning by enthusiasts the Puritans. See ISAAC TAYLOR: Natural Hist. of Enthusiasm, 9th ed., Lond., 1843.

ENZINAS, Francisco de (Dryander, Duchesne, Van Eyck, Eichman, translations of the Spanish name "oakman"), b. at Burgos, 1520; d. at Geneva, 1570; studied in Italy, afterwards at Louvain and Wittenberg; embraced the Reformation; was arrested at Brussels (1513), escaped to England (1545), and lived afterwards on the Continent, — at Strassburg, Basel, and Geneva. He translated the New Testament into Spanish, and dedicated it to Charles V. — His brother, Jaques de Enzinas, also embraced Protestantism, and was burnt at the stake in Italy, 1516.

EON, or EUDO DE STELLA, an enthusiast in the middle of the twelfth century, and probably connected with the Cathari; was b. in Bretagne, and was, by the words which he once heard in the church ("per eum qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos"), led to believe that he ("Eon") was meant by that eum. Preaching, prophesying, and working miracles, he roved about in Bretagne, and much people gathered around him, and were seduced by him. In 1145 the papal legate, Cardinal Albericus of Ostia, preached against him at Nantes; then Archbishop Hugo of Rouen wrote a book against him, Dogmatum christianæ fidei Libri Tres (found in Bibl. Patr. Mar., Lyons, T. XXII.); and finally troops were sent against him. Several of his adherents were burnt in the diocese of Alet, while he himself retreated into Guyenne. In 1148 he appeared in Champagne, but was caught, together with a number of his disciples. When placed before the synod of Rheims, and asked by Pope Eugenius III. who he was, he answered, "Is qui venturus est judicare vivos et mortuos." The synod declared him crazy, and ordered him shut up in a dungeon; his followers were burnt, and very soon all trace of his sect disappeared. C. SCHMIDT.

EPAGON, The Council of, was held in 517 in a town of Burgundy whose site cannot be identified any more. It was called by Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, and Viventolus, Bishop of Lyons, and attended by twenty-four bishops. On Sept. 14, 517, they subscribed forty canons, mostly of a disciplinary character, regulating the relations of bishops, priests, and monks. Canon 4 forbids bishops, priests, and deacons to keep hawks or dogs for hunting; canon 9 forbids an abbot to preside over two monasteries; canons 15, 16, 29, and 33 concern heretics, and forbid Catholic clergymen to eat at the same table with a heretic, etc.; canon 26 forbids any altar not of stone to be consecrated with chrism, etc. See LABBE: Dissertatio philosophica de Concilio Epaunensi; Mansi: Con. Coll., VIII. 319-342, 347-372, 555-574.

EPARCHY (ἐπαρχία) denoted originally a merely political division, being the official administrative name of a province. It consisted of counties, and formed part of a diocese. This scheme of secular administration was afterwards followed by the organization of the church; so that the head of a county community became a bishop, the head of an eparchy a metropolitan, and the head of a diocese a patriarch. At the time of the Council of Nicæa (325) this organization and its terminology were fully developed.

EPHESIANS, Epistle to the. See PAUL.

EPHESUS, renowned as a seat of heathen rites, and conspicuous in the history of early Christianity, was an opulent city on the western coast of Asia Minor. It was advantageously situated on the fertile banks of the Cayster, and built partly on the plain, and partly on the hills, of which Prion and Coressus were the two principal ones. It was on the direct road to Sardis. To the south of it, on the Mæander, lay Miletus; at an equal distance to the north, Smyrna, on the Hermus. The city was colonized as early as the eleventh century, by Androclus, the son of the Athenian king, Codrus. It soon became famous as a mart and hostelry, the harbor affording ample shelter for ships. Asiatic elements mixed on its streets with Greek influences, and colored the social life. The city came successively under subjection to Cresus, the Persians, the Macedonians, and the Romans. In 262 A.D. it was destroyed by the Goths. Although rebuilt, it never regained its former glory. The ravages of time and the ruthlessness of man have secured its total desolation. A squalid village, containing only twenty regular inhabitants (Wood's Ephesus, p. 14), occupies, in mockery of human magnificence, the ancient site, but in its name Ayasaluk (a corruption of ἅγιος θεολόγος, "holy theologian") retains a reminiscence of the Evangelist John, and the early Christian congregations.

Temple of Diana.—That which made Ephesus most famous was the celebrated Temple of Diana. It was reputed one of the seven wonders of the world, and was visited from all parts of Greece. The divinity was primarily an Asiatic goddess, and seems to have had little in common with the fair huntress. She was represented swathed like a mummy, her bosom covered with breasts,—a symbol of fertility, or a type of the many fountains which bubbled up on the Ephesian plain (Guhl). Her statue was believed to have fallen from heaven (Acts xix. 35). In 356, on the night of Alexander's birth, the temple was burned down. The Ephesians immediately set to work with great enthusiasm to rebuild, the women of the city contributing their ornaments. The structure was erected on a magnificent scale, and when completed was regarded as the most perfect work of Ionic architecture. The priestesses that ministered at the fane were virgins, and the priests celibates. When the Goths ravaged the city (262 A.D.), they spared not the temple. Some of its graceful columns are said to be incorporated in the Church of St. Sophia. But the very site of the magnificent structure was completely obliterated by the detritus of the river, and remained a mystery until the important discoveries of Mr. J. T. Wood (1863-74). Its dimensions were four hundred and twenty-five by two hundred and twenty feet. The roof was sustained by a hundred and twenty-seven columns sixty feet high.

Ephesus and the Christian Church.—The city early became one of the most conspicuous scenes of apostolic labors. The Church was distinguished by having St. Paul for its founder, St. John for its counsellor, and Timothy for its bishop. To it St. Paul addressed one of his Epistles, which abounds in references to the temple and theatre of the city. The congregation was fully organized at an early date, as is evident from the presbyters who bade Paul farewell at Miletus (Acts xx. 24 sqq.), and its mention as the first among the churches of Asia Minor (Rev. ii. 1). Here St. John spent his last years (Eusebius), and was probably stirred up to write his Gospel by the indications of heretical sentiments here manifesting themselves. Here Apollos first preached (Acts xviii. 24-28); and here the third œcumenical council met, which defined the doctrines of the Church over against Nestorius. Before passing away from the history of Christianity in Ephesus, it is proper to make a more specific mention of the labors of St. Paul in the city. His first visit was on his return from the second missionary tour. He was then accompanied by Priscilla and Aquila. On his second visit he made a sojourn of two or three years (Acts xx. 31). After preaching in the synagogue, he went to the school of Tyrannus. His preaching was so effective, that many brought their books of magic, to which the city was addicted (Acts xix. 12), and made a bonfire of them; and it interfered so materially with the superstitious traffic in silver shrines (xix. 26), as to arouse the enmity of Demetrius and the craftsmen. A riotous popular tumult was excited, and the watchword rang through the city, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians;" but Paul himself escaped.

LIT.—The city is described at length in the Travels of POCOCKE, CHANDLER, SCHUBERT, FELLOWS, HAMILTON, etc. GUHL: Ephesiaca, Berlin, 1843; FALKENER: Ephesus and the Temple of Diana, Lond., 1862; WOOD: Discoveries in Ephesus, London and Boston, 1877 (an interesting and elegant volume); CONYBEARE and HOWSON: Life of St. Paul, ii. 80 sqq., Am. ed.; FARRAR: St. Paul, II. pp. 1-14. EPHESUS, Councils of. The third œcumenical council was held in St. Mary's Church, Ephesus, A.D. 431 (June 22–Aug. 31). It condemned the heresy of Nestorius, that Christ had two persons as well as two natures. It was convened by letters of Theodosius II. and Valentinian II. Cyril of Alexandria presided, and opened the meetings with a hundred and sixty bishops. The number was afterwards increased to a hundred and ninety-eight. Nestorius was cited, but refused to appear until all the bishops had arrived, some of whom, like John of Antioch, were delayed. In the mean time, his heresy was denounced, and himself excluded from the episcopal office, and from all sacerdotal fellowship.

The so-called Robber Council was convened by Theodosius in 449. It was first so denominated by Leo, Bishop of Rome (Epist. 95), on account of the partisan and overbearing demeanor of the presiding officer, and the use of violence in the introduction of soldiery. Dioscuros of Alexandria, a man of hierarchical temper and inordinate ambition, presided. A hundred and thirty-five bishops were present. The council restored Eutyches, who had been deposed by the synod of Constantinople (448). Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed from his office for the hand he had taken in the deposition of Eutyches. All efforts to express dissent were brutally checked. Hilary, Deacon of Rome and papal delegate, one of the dissidents, only narrowly escaped with his life; while Eusebius, Bishop of Dorylæum, the accuser of Eutyches, lost his through the violence of the soldiery. The decisions of this scandalously conducted council were reversed by the Council of Chalcedon (451).

EPHESUS, The Seven Sleepers of. This legend gained currency very early, and was adopted in the Koran. Seven Ephesian youths of noble extraction, in the persecutions of Decius (249–257), concealed themselves in a cave which was ordered by the authorities to be sealed up. They fell into a slumber which lasted for a hundred and eighty-seven years. Some of the stones being removed from the entrance, a ray of light was admitted. Awakening, as from a night's sleep, they sent one of their number (Jamblichus) into the city to buy bread. The obsolescence of his dress, and the antiquity of the coin which he offered to the baker, no more startled the inhabitants than the change in the aspect of the city confounded himself. The facts becoming known, the bishop and magistrates of the city visited the cavern. After conferring their blessing, the Seven Sleepers immediately expired. See the story well told, GIBBON'S Rome, Am. ed., iii. 383 sq.

EPHRAÏM. See TRIBES.

EPHREM SYRUS (or Ephraem) is the most prominent of the fathers of the Syrian Church in the fourth century, and the greatest orator and hymn-writer produced by that church.

Life.—Besides the so-called confession of Ephraem (existing both in Greek and in Armenian) and his testament (existing both in Syrian and Greek), we have a panegyric of him by Gregory of Nyssa (written shortly after his death, and found both among Gregory's works and in the first volume of the Roman edition of Ephraem's Greek works), and an elaborate life of him (Acta Ephraemi), written in Syriac, and found in the third volume of the Roman edition of his Syrian works. All these materials are very unreliable, however. They contradict each other, and are full of legendary matter. In modern times his life has been written by Zingerle, in the first volume of his translation, and by Alsleben, Berlin, 1853.

Ephraem was born in the beginning of the fourth century, according to a notice in his commentary on the Genesis (Op. Syr., l. 23), in Mesopotamia; according to Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., III. 16) and the Syrian biography, at Nisibis. He was educated by Bishop Jacob of Nisibis, and seems to have accompanied him to the Council of Nicæa (325). When, in 363, the Emperor Jovian surrendered Nisibis to the Persians, Ephraem moved first to Amid, the native place of his mother, and then to Edessa, at that time the centre of Syrian learning. He settled among the anchorites in a cave outside the city, adopted a life of severe asceticism, and devoted himself wholly to theological study and authorship. Now and then he appeared among the people; and his hymns and polemical speeches, directed against the Chaldaean astrologers, against Bardesanes and Harmonius, the Arians and Sabellians, Apollinaris, Marcion, etc., made a deep impression, and obtained a lasting influence. Later writers (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., IV. 924) tell us that he founded a school in Edessa; and it is, at all events, certain that he had pupils, and among them some of great celebrity. A tradition reports that he visited Egypt, and staid there eight years; another, that he visited Basil the Great at Cæsarea. He died during the reign of Valens, either 373, or 375, or 378.

Works.—Ephraem was a very prolific author; but of his numerous writings only a part exists in the original Syrian text, and the rest in Greek, Latin, Armenian, and Slavic translations. A complete list of his writings is given by J. S. ASSEMANI, in Bibl. Orient., l. 59–161, and in the preface to the Roman edition of his Greek works. See also WRIGHT: Catalogue of Syriac Manuscripts in the British Museum, 3. 1271. The Slavic translations from his works were edited by J. P. Kohl, Moscow, 1701; the Armenian, by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1836. The principal edition of the Syrian and Greek texts is that which appeared in Rome in 6 vols. fol., 1732–16, under papal authority, — 3 vols. Greek text, with Latin translation, edited by J. S. Assemani, and 3 vols. Syrian text, also with Latin translation, edited by Petrus Benedictus and S. E. Assemani.

It is doubtful whether or not Ephraem himself understood Greek; but it is quite certain that those of his works which have come down to us only in a Greek version are translations. Sozomen says that the works of Ephraem were very early translated into Greek, even in the lifetime of the author; and this statement is corroborated by the fact that Chrysostom and Jerome were acquainted with them. They consist of sermons, homilies, and tracts, exegetical, dogmatic, and ascetic. Photius mentions (Bibl. Cod., 196) that he knew fifty-two such productions by Ephraem, and had heard that there existed more than a thousand. In many churches in the East they were read aloud during service, after the Bible recitals; and they seem to have attained the same honor in the Western Church. Translations into Latin were early made. Small collections of Ephraem's discourses translated into Latin circulated in the fifteenth century. The first larger collection (in 3 vols. fol.) was given by Gerhard Vossius, Rome, 1589, and reprinted in 1593 and 1598. It contains 171 pieces, of which only one was translated directly from the Syrian. Augmented editions of this collection appeared at Cologne (1603) and at Antwerp (1619). The first collected edition of Ephraem's Greek works was given by Ed. Thwaites, Oxford, 1709. The best edition is Rome, 1732-46, 6 vols. folio, ed. by the Assemanis.

The existing Syrian works of Ephraem consist of commentaries on the Pentateuch and most of the historical and prophetic books of the Old Testament. According to Ebed Jesu (Assemani, Bibl. Orient., III. 1, p. 62), he also wrote a commentary on the Psalms. Of his commentaries on the books of the New Testament, only an Armenian translation of that on the Pauline Epistles, and on Tatian's Diatessaron [for the latter see ZAHN: Forschungen zur Gesch. d. N.T. Kanons, Th. I., Erlangen, 1881, pp. 44 sqq., and LIT. below] have come down to us. The rest of his Syrian works, contained in the third volume of the Roman edition, consist of sermons, tracts, and hymns, all written in verse; that is, in lines of an equal number of syllables, grouped together in strophes, and adorned with rhymes and alliterations. The poetical form was, no doubt, adopted as the one best suited to impress the popular mind. At times it becomes prolix and dry; at others it exhibits truly poetical beauties. Several Syrian works ascribed to Ephraem still remain in manuscript; as, for instance, a world's chronicle from the creation to the birth of Christ, of which one manuscript is found in the library of the Vatican, another in the British Museum.

Of modern translations we mention one in Latin, by CAILLAU (Paris, 1832-35, 8 vols.), forming part of the Patres Selecti. PIUS ZINGERLE: Die heilige Muse der Syrer (Innsbruck, 1830-38), and Ausgewählte Schriften des heiligen Ephraem (Kempten, 1870-76); ANGELO PAGGI and FAUSTO LASSINO: Iuni funebri di S. Efrom Siro (Florence, 1851); J. B. MORRIS: thirteen pieces on the Nativity (Oxford, 1817); H. BURGESS: Select Hymns and Homilies of Ephraem Syrus (London, 1853); [Evanglii concordantis expositio facta a sancto EPHRAEMO doctore Syro, in Latinum translata a R. P. Joanne Baptista Aucher, ed. G. Mœsinger, Venise, 1879].

EPICTETUS, one of the most imposing representatives of the stoic philosophy, was b. at Hieropolis, in Phrygia; lived afterwards in Rome, first as a slave in the house of Epaphroditus, then as a freedman, and teacher of philosophy, but was in 90 A.D., together with all the other stoical philosophers, expelled from Rome, and settled at Nicopolis, in Epirus, where he continued teaching, and finally died. He wrote nothing himself; but many of his teachings were taken down by his pupil, Flavius Arrianus, and are still preserved. They have a peculiar interest to the church-historian on account of the influence they exercised on Marcus Aurelius. The best edition of the works of Epictetus is that by Schweighäuser, Leipzig, 1799-1800, 6 vols. There are at least two English translations, — one by Elizabeth Carter (London, 1758, 4to, new revised ed. by Thomas W. Higginson, Boston, 1865), and one by George Long (London, 1876). The Enchiridion was translated by T. Tallot, and also by T. W. II. Rolleston, both London, 1881. See F. W. FARRAR: Seekers after God; Lives of Seneca, Epictetus, and Marcus Aurelius, London, 1868.

EPICUREANISM is the common name of a system of morality which represents happiness as the only true aim of human actions, and pleasure as the only true happiness of human life (eudæmonism). The metaphysics on which this system is based is necessarily materialistic, and often atheistic. Such, however, as it was expounded by its founder, Epicurus (342-270 B.C.), in his garden in Athens, the system seemed not only decent, but even attractive. It meant to lead its pupils to a quiet and frugal, but elegant and refined enjoyment of life; but when in the time of the Roman emperors, and again in the time of the English deists and the French encyclopedists, the metaphysical premises of the system were carried out to their last practical consequences, the system was found to lead its pupils into shameless debauchery and abject stupidity. See art. Moral Philosophy, also P. v. GIZYCKI: Ueber das Leben u. die Moralphilosophie d. Epikur, Berlin, 1879, 64 pp.; W. WALLACE: Epicureanism, London, 1880; E. PFLEIDERER: Eudæmonismus u. Egoismus, Leipzig, 1880.

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Constantia (the old Salamis of Cyprus), was b. in the beginning of the fourth century, at Besandirke, a village of Palestine, in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis, and educated among monks. He afterwards lived for some time in Egypt, also among monks, and founded, after his return to Palestine, a monastery in his native town, of which he became abbot. His fame for holiness brought him to the metropolitan chair of Constantia (367), and from that time he took an active part in the theological controversies of his age. He was present at a synod in Antioch (376), and at another in Rome (382), where the trinitarian questions were debated. He went to Palestine in 394 to crush the influence of the famous Origen, and to Constantinople in 403 for the same purpose. He died on board the ship on which he was returning from Constantinople to Constantia (spring 403).

The life of Epiphanius fell in a period when monasticism — sprung from the martyr-inspiration of the primitive Church, and hailed by the age as a higher standard of virtue — spread rapidly in the East, but at the same time assumed a character of narrow hostility to all free theological investigation, always preferring a system of stiff dogmatical definitions to the life of a vigorous personal conviction. But the man's character was well suited to the demands of the time; and he, as well as his friends, considered it a great merit to spend a whole life in bitter opposition to the greatest genius the Eastern Church ever produced, without understanding him. He seems, however, to have discovered during his stay in Constantinople. — whither he went at the instance of Theophilus of Alexandria, and for the purpose of opposing Chrysostom, and through him Origen, — that he had in most cases been a tool only in other men's hands. He left the city abruptly and in a rage.

His principal works are, Πανάριον ("the drug-chest"), a description and refutation of eighty different heresies, confused and trivial, but of historical value, and Ἀγκυρατος ("the anchor of faith"), a dogmatical work, much read in its time. A life of him by a friend was edited, together with his works, by Petan, Paris, 1822, 2 vols. fol. The best edition of his works is Diendorf's, Leipzig, 1859, 5 vols.; and of the Panaria by Oehler, Berlin, 1859-61, 3 vols. (4 parts). See GERVAIS: L'Histoire et la Vie de S. Epiphane, Paris, 1738; EBERHARD: Die Betheligung des Epiphanius an dem Streite über Origenes, Treves, 1859; LIPSJUS: Zur Quellenkritik des Epiphanius, Vienna, 1865. SEMISCH.

EPIPHANIUS, Bishop of Pavia, was b. in that city (439) of noble descent, and educated for the Church. When he was eighteen years old he was ordained a sub-deacon, and in 465 he was unanimously elected bishop by the clergy and the people. After his accession to the episcopal dignity, he increased the severity of his asceticism: he took only one meal a day; he abstained altogether from flesh, from wine, from baths, etc. The same energy he also evinced in taking care of his diocese and the Church in general. He was one of those admirable Italian bishops, who, while the dissolution of the Western Empire was going on, rapidly and inevitably, stood like rocks in the midst of the confusion, breaking the surges. In the wars between Anthemius and Ricimer, Glycerius and Euric, Odoacer and Theodoric, he often succeeded in making peace between the combatants; and, when peace could not be made, he was always able at least to mitigate the evils of the combat. He died in 491. His life has been written by his successor, Ennodius, among whose works it is found. HERZOG.

EPIPHANIUS SCHOLASTICUS translated, at the instance of his friend Cassiodorus, the works on church history by Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, from Greek into Latin; which translations, corrected, condensed, and connected with each other by Cassiodorus, formed the Historia Tripartita so famous in the middle ages. Epiphanius also translated the so-called Codex Encyclicus, a collection of synodal letters to the Emperor Leo I. in defence of the synod of Chalcedon, the commentary by Epiphanius, Bishop of Cyprus, on the Song of Songs, the commentary of Didymus on the Catholic Epistles, etc.

EPIPHANY (ἑπιφάνια, Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4), one of the oldest Christian festivals, originated in the Eastern Church, and opened the annual cycle of festivals, though it referred to the baptism of Christ rather than to his birth. It was generally held, however, by the Eastern Church, that the manifestation of Christ to man took place at his baptism, and not at his birth; and consequently his nativity was celebrated only as an introduction to his epiphany, which fell on Jan. 6. The separation of the two festivals did not take place until the latter part of the fourth century, according to a homily preached by Chrysostom in Antioch, Dec. 25, 356. It was also generally held in the Eastern Church, that, by his baptism, Christ imparted certain qualities to the waters, which made them a fit bath of regeneration; and consequently the Epiphany became a favorite term for baptism.

From the East the festival was introduced to the West. The first trace of it in the Western Church is the report, by Ammianus Marcellinus (XXI. 2), that Julian celebrated it at Vienne in 360. But its doctrinal basis was changed. It was referred, not to the manifestation of Christ to man in general, but to his manifestation to the heathens, to the Three Wise Men of the East, to the Three Holy Kings. It also lost favor as a term for baptism. Pope Leo I. opposed this custom as an "irrational novelty." On the whole, in the Western Church it never became more than an appendix to the Nativity; hence its familiar English name "Twelfth-Day."

EPISCOPACY. Under BISHOP will be found a discussion of the origin, functions, and relative position of the episcopal office. The design of this article is to give a concise statement of the views held on the subject by different Christian communions.

I. The Roman-Catholic Church holds to the divine origin and authority of Episcopacy. Its position was distinctly defined by the Council of Trent at its twenty-third session: "If any one saith that in the Catholic Church there is not a hierarchy instituted by divine ordinance, consisting of bishops, priests, and deacons, let him be anathema" (Canon vi.). Episcopacy is as essential to the Church as the sacraments. The Church cannot exist without it. The words of Cyprian (iv. Ep., 9), Ecclesia est in Episcopo ("The Church is in the Bishop"), concisely represent this view. The bishops are the immediate successors of the apostles (Apostolis vicaria ordinatione succedunt, Cyprian, Ep. 69 ad Flor.), and superior to the priests and deacons, not merely in extent of jurisdiction, but in the kind of grace and function. Ordination is a sacrament, and confers a special grace, which is permanent. The Pope, or Bishop, of Rome is at the head of the hierarchy of bishops, and is the immediate successor of St. Peter, upon whom Christ promised to rear his Church (Matt. xvi. 18, 19), and who was the first Bishop of Rome. All bishops are subject to him as the vicar of Christ, but their apostolical power is derived through consecration. The Vatican Decrees (Session iv.) assigned to the Roman pontiff authority over the "Universal Church," and above œcumenical councils. This limits the prerogative of the bishop materially, and is opposed to the view ably advocated by D'Ailly and Gerson in the fifteenth century and by Gallicanism, and adopted by the Old Catholics.

II. The Eastern Church holds likewise to the divine origin of Episcopacy, to the transmission of apostolic grace, and to apostolic succession; but it dissents from the Latin Church in refusing to recognize the Pope, whom it regards as an usurper, and to acknowledge any pontiff with supreme authority in the Church and over the bishops.

III. The Jansenist Church of Holland, and the Old Catholics, both agree with the Roman-Catholic Church on the question of Episcopacy, but differ from it in their allegiance to the Pope. The episcopate in Holland was received (in 1724) from Dominique Marie Varlet, Bishop of Babylon, then living in Amsterdam. Other Catholic bishops, on being applied to, refused the rite of consecration. Each new consecration ever since has been noticed by a special excommunication from Rome. The Old Catholics secured their orders from the Jansenists of Holland, the Bishop of Deventer consecrating Bishop Reinkens (Aug. 11, 1873), who subsequently consecrated Dr. Herzog, Bishop for Switzerland (Sept. 18, 1876); so that they preserve the apostolic succession.

IV. The Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States tolerate two classes of opinion,—the Anglo-Catholic or High Church view, and the Low or Broad Church view. 1. The Anglo-Catholic view of the episcopate is in essential particulars that of the Roman-Catholic Church. It does not recognize the superior authority of the Pope, as the vicar of Christ and the infallible successor of St. Peter, nor even place ordination among the sacraments. But it regards Episcopacy as indispensable to the very being of the Church, holds to the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, and accepts apostolic succession. Bishops, as "being the successors of the apostles, are possessed of the same power of jurisdiction" (Blunt). They are, and have been from the time of the apostles, an order distinct from the priesthood and diaconate, and higher than both. Archbishop Laud (1633-45) was the most extreme representative of the jure divino right of Episcopacy. 2. The Low and Broad Church view regards the episcopate as desirable and necessary for the well being of the Church, but in no wise indispensable to its existence. The episcopal is not the only form of government with scriptural authority (if, indeed, it or any other be recommended by Scripture); but it is the one best adapted to forward the interests of Christ's kingdom among men. The best writers on this side agree that the episcopate developed out of the presbyterate, and that there are only two orders of the ministry in the New Testament,—presbyters and deacons. Dr. Lightfoot, Bishop of Durham, in his very scholarly and exhaustive discussion of the subject in his Christian Ministry (Com. on Philippians, pp. 180-267), says, "It is clear, that, at the close of the apostolic age, the two lower orders of the three-fold ministry were firmly and widely established; but traces of the episcopate, properly so called, are few and indistinct." . . . "The episcopate was formed out of the presbyteral order by elevation; and the title, which originally was common to all, came at length to be appropriated to the chief of them." And again he says, "The episcopate was formed out of the presbytery." The late Dean Stanley, in the chapter on the Clergy in his Christian Institutions, representing the same view, says (p. 210), "According to the strict rules of the Church derived from those early times, there are but two orders,—presbyters and deacons."

This view, which is also held by such men as Arnold, Alford, Jacob, and Hatch, was the view of the divines of the English Reformation. Cranmer, Jewel, Grindal, and afterwards Field ("The apostles left none to succeed them," Of the Church, vol. iv. p. vii.), defended Episcopacy as the most ancient and general form of government, but always acknowledged the validity of Presbyterian orders. (See this subject ably discussed by Professor Fisher, in the New-Englander, 1874, pp. 121-172.) Bishop Parkhurst looked upon the Church of Zurich as the absolute pattern of a Christian community; and Bishop Ponet would have abandoned even the term "bishop" to the Catholics (Macaulay, Hist. of Eng., vol. I. p. 39, Bost. ed.). Ecclesiastics held positions in the Church of England who had only received Presbyterian ordination. Such were Wittingham, Dean of Durham, and Cartwright, Professor of Divinity at Cambridge. It is doubtful whether any prelate of the English Church in Elizabeth's reign held the jure divino theory of Episcopacy. Two of the most elaborate defenders of the Low-Church view in the seventeenth century were Stillingfleet and Ussher, the latter representing the episcopate as only a presidency of the presbyters over his peers; yet the Episcopal Church re-ordains all ministers who have not been episcopally consecrated, but accepts priests of the Greek and Roman-Catholic Churches without reordination.

V. The Reformed Episcopal Church holds to an Episcopacy of expediency. "It adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity" (Declar. of Principles, passed Dec. 2, 1873). Its founder and first bishop was Dr. Cummins, who had been assistant bishop of the Episcopal Church in Kentucky.

VI. The Moravian Church deserves separate and special mention, for three reasons. Its episcopate was active before the Reformation on the Continent and in England began; it is in the apostolic succession; and its bishopric in America antedates those of the Episcopal (1784) and Methodist (1784) denominations by forty years. The first Moravian bishop was consecrated in 1467, by the regularly ordained Waldensian Bishop Stephens. (See Wetzer and Welte, Encyclop., ii. p. 65, and De Schweinitz, Moravian Episcopate, Lond., 1877.) The British Parliament, in 1749, recognized the validity of Moravian ordination. But the recent course of Bishop Stevens of Pennsylvania, in re-ordaining a Moravian presbyter, disparages the episcopate of this venerable body. This occurred in Philadelphia (Sept. 30, 1881), and was designed to give the applicant, to use Bishop Stevens's own language, "a more ample ordination." The Moravians, or, as they prefer to be called, the Brethren, recognize the ordination of other Christian bodies as valid, admitting presbyters at once into their ministry (Law Book of the Church, ix. 63).

VII. The Lutheran Church has for the most part abandoned Episcopacy. The bishops on the Continent, unlike the bishops in England, held aloof from the Reformation. In Germany one order of the ministry only is recognized. An officer with jurisdiction somewhat similar to that of bishop is called superintendent. The office is only one of expediency. The Lutheran Church in Sweden has bishops, the validity of whose orders a committee was appointed in 1874, by the convention of the Episcopal Church in the United States, to investigate. The convention has taken no further action. There is much doubt concerning the integrity of the succession. Lawrence Peterson was consecrated by Paul Justin, Bishop of Abo, in 1575 Archbishop of Upsala. The evidence for the validity of Justin's consecration is defective. But the confessions of the Swedish Church recognize the equality of the ministry. The bishops of the Church of Denmark have no claim whatever to apostolic succession, although the English bishops of India have recognized Danish ordination. Christian III. in 1536 imprisoned the old bishops; and the new ones whom he appointed were at first called superintendents, and ordained by Bugenhagen.

VIII. The Reformed Churches recognize two orders of the ministry. — presbyters and deacons. The bishops of the New Testament are regarded as identical with presbyters. They do not deny that Episcopacy as a matter of expediency is justifiable; but they do not concede either its divine origin, or the transmission of grace by the imposition of hands, or apostolic succession, in the Anglo-Catholic sense. (See Form of Government of Presbyterian Church, chaps. iii. v. etc.)

IX. The American Methodist church has an Episcopacy. It is neither diocesan nor hierarchic, but itinerant and presbyteral. The bishops constitute an "itinerant general superintendency," and are "amenable to the body of ministers and preachers," who may divest them of their office. They are not a distinct order of the clergy, but only presbyters. The Methodist Church cannot lay claim to apostolic succession, if it would. John Wesley, after having previously applied in vain to the Bishop of London to ordain preachers for America, himself ordained the first bishop, Thomas Coke, in 1784. The Evangelical Association and the Church of the United Brethren also have episcopates. Their bishops are only elected for a stated period, and not for life. For further information see the articles under these special heads. For literature, see arts. BISHOP, POLITY, and the Forms of Government and Confessions of the several communions. D. S. SCHAFF.

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, The Protestant, in the United States of America. History. — The first known clerical representative of the Church of England in America was Albert de Prato, a learned mathematician, and a canon of St. Paul's, London, who visited St. John's, Newfoundland, in August, 1527. The next clergyman appeared after the Reformation, in connection with Frobenius's expedition of 1578. This was Woolfall, who landed in the Countess of Warwick's Sound, and celebrated the first English communion recorded in connection with the New World. In 1583 Sir Humphrey Gilbert proclaimed the order of the English Church and State in Newfoundland. In 1581, Sir Walter Raleigh commenced his unsuccessful attempt to colonize Virginia, where, in 1587, the clergyman attached to the Colony baptized Manteo, an Indian chief. About the same time he also baptized Virginia Dare, the first white Christian born in Virginia. In 1605

the expedition of Waymouth reached the coast of Maine, and explored the Kennebec, having on board a person who regularly performed the service of the Church of England. In 1607 the work of colonization was commenced, both in Virginia and New England. On the coast of Maine the passengers and crews of two ships, sent out under Popham and Gilbert, landed at Monhegan, Aug. 9, 1607 (O. S.). A sermon was preached, and the first New-England Thanksgiving was observed. A colony was commenced at the mouth of the Kennebec, where, until the spring of 1608, the chaplain (the Rev. Richard Seymour) regularly celebrated the service of the Church of England, which was familiar to the savage ear on that coast nearly twenty years before the arrival of "The Mayflower" at Plymouth. This colony attempted on the peninsula of Sabino was not successful, though scattered emigrants continued to pursue the fisheries on the adjacent coasts. In Virginia, however, the work of colonization, under Church-of-England leaders, went on without interruption, the minister being the Rev. Mr. Hunt. When the Leyden adventurers reached New England (in 1620), the Virginia Colony was an accomplished fact. On Christmas Day, 1621, the "most part" of the people at Plymouth desired to keep the festival, showing their attachment to the Church of England. Soon, however, they were outnumbered by fresh arrivals; and the majority of the people who landed elsewhere set up their standard against the church, which it was expected they would favor on reaching their new homes. Soon the scattered adherents of the Church of England found that they were not to be tolerated in Massachusetts; and New Hampshire, under Mason, became the chief resort of the persecuted who sought religious liberty, though the Rev. William Blackstone went to Rhode Island. In 1631 the church services were celebrated in New Hampshire by the Rev. Richard Gibson; and in 1640, at Portsmouth (the ancient "Strawberry Bank"), an Episcopal Church (the present St. John's) was duly organized, being the first Episcopal parish known on this continent. In 1662 the royal proclamation secured to churchmen in Massachusetts the nominal liberty to observe their own forms of worship, and in 1682 King's Chapel was organized at Boston. After this period, Church-of-England clergymen labored in various parts of New England; and, though bitterly opposed, they met with some success, especially in Connecticut, where, in 1722, Cutler (president of Yale College) and six others declared for episcopacy. During the colonial period the strength of the church advanced in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Georgia, and the Carolinas. Trinity Church, New-York City, was in existence as early as 1692. The Rev. William Veasey, formerly a Presbyterian minister, became the first rector; and the churchmen of New York appear to have acted on the belief that the Ministry Act of 1693 was designed for their exclusive benefit. In due time the church became an acknowledged power. In New Jersey also, under Lord Cornbury, the church practically enjoyed benefits that attend establishment. In Maryland, Virginia, and Georgia the church was formally established by law; and at one period the Vir-gians were almost exclusively Episcopalians. The church continued to grow, especially under the impetus given by the missionaries of the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, organized in 1701; but at the Revolution, a large portion of the clergy being royalists, the congregations, to a great extent, were broken up, and their property dissipated. At the close of the war the church was a melancholy wreck. Nevertheless, the clergy who remained commenced the work of restoration, aiming especially to secure the episcopate, which many had desired to obtain during the colonial period. Before the evacuation of New York by the British, the Rev. Samuel Seabury had been recommended for the office, and was consecrated by the non-juring bishops at Aberdeen, Scotland, Nov. 14, 1784. The first meeting for organization was held at New Brunswick, N.J., in May, 1784. In September, 1785, another convention was held in Philadelphia, when the so-called "Proposed Book" was drawn up, and when the convention also framed and adopted a constitution for the church known as "The Protestant-Episcopal Church." At the convention held in Philadelphia the following June, the members not being satisfied with the consecration of Dr. Seabury, the Rev. Samuel Provoost, D.D., the Rev. William White, D.D., and the Rev. David Griffith, D.D., were chosen, and instructed to proceed to England, and obtain consecration. Feb. 4, 1787, Drs. White and Provoost were consecrated in Lambeth Chapel by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John Moore, Dr. Griffith failing to appear. Subsequently the Rev. James Madison, D.D., was consecrated, the succession being made threefold. At the triennial convention of 1789 the consecration of Bishop Seabury was recognized, thus securing the adhesion of New England. The convention adjourned to September, when the present Book of Common Prayer was adopted, and the church entered fully upon her independent career, under the leadership of the sagacious Bishop White, who stood the acknowledged head for a period of forty years.

Organization. — This church is organized on the primitive episcopal plan, embracing a system of dioceses; the ministry being composed of the threefold order of bishops, priests, and deacons. The first order comprehends both the diocesan bishops and the missionary bishops, home and foreign. Each diocesan has charge of a particular diocese, while the missionary bishop presides over a jurisdiction formed of one or more States or Territories, or parts thereof. A missionary bishop may be elected bishop of a diocese, but the diocesan cannot; though, in case his diocese is divided, he may decide which part he will retain. Many States form a single diocese, while others are divided into several. The Episcopal Church in the United States has no legal connection with the Church of England, being governed in accordance with a constitution, and a body of canons drawn up and approved by conventions of the bishops, clergy, and laity. The legislative body known as the General Convention is composed of the House of Bishops and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies. The approval of both houses is necessary to render any act effective. The House of Bishops (which is the upper house, corresponding to the Senate of the United States) is composed of both the diocesan and missionary bishops; and the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies consists of an equal number of clergy and laity, elected by regularly organized diocesan conventions. This lower house admits delegates from missionary jurisdictions to a seat; and they also have a voice on matters in which they are specially interested, but have no vote. The upper house is presided over by the bishop senior in consecration, who also has charge of various interests affecting the general administration of the church. The presiding officer of the lower house is chosen by ballot. The General Convention meets triennially. The Diocesan meets annually; being composed of three lay delegates from each parish in union with the convention, in addition to the duly qualified parochial clergy. Recently the attempt has been made, with some degree of success, to introduce the provincial system, in accordance with which two or more dioceses may enter into a confederation for the purpose of promoting such particular objects as may not come within the range of either Diocesan or General Conventions. Such confederated dioceses may have a special council and an appellate court. Many dioceses are divided into convocations, whose chief work is to advance missions within their own boundaries. Lay representation forms a special feature of this church, in which respect it is unlike the Church of England.

Discipline. — The discipline of the church is administered in accordance with the canons expressly provided; and all classes of the bishops, clergy, and laity, must be presented and tried by their peers. The church at large has no appellate court; but an appeal may be taken to the General Convention.

Doctrine. — The doctrine of the church, as drawn from Holy Scripture, is incorporated in the Book of Common Prayer, and is expressed chiefly by means of the Apostles' and the Nicene Creed, together with thirty-eight of the Articles of the Church of England, modified to meet the condition of things in this country. In framing the Book of Common Prayer, the American Church, while affirming a general agreement with the Church of England, made certain departures. The Athanasian Creed is omitted. In the Apostles' Creed, the clause "He descended into hell" is made optional, as well as the use of the sign of the cross in baptism; while the Absolution is made declarative, instead of positive, and is left out of the office for the visitation of the sick. In various other respects the American Prayer-Book conforms better to the wants of the average mind. The office for the Holy Communion is generally regarded as more especially the work of Bishop Seabury, showing as it does, quite strongly, the influence of the Scotch Communion office. Yet, while decided in its teaching as respects the presence of Christ in the sacrament, its language is irrevocably opposed to the theory of an objective presence, as it is to consubstantiation: the worshipper being taught that Christ is truly present, but in a spiritual sense, and in a manner that has baffled all attempts at statement upon the part of the doctors of the Catholic Church. The baptismal office has been cited in support of that extreme view of "the washing of regeneration" which has been pushed to the border of the opus operatum; yet the bishops of the church, in 1870, put forth what is known as the "Declaration," affirming that the word "regenerate" is not used in the baptismal office so "as to determine that a moral change in the subject of baptism is wrought in the sacrament." The Articles, to which Bishop Seabury was strenuously opposed, as the Scotch Church had none, do not meet with universal approval. In substance they are orthodox, and in spirit thoroughly Protestant; still they are intended to be comprehensive. On Predestination and Free Will they seem to serve the purpose of both Calvinist and Arminian. Indeed, the entire doctrinal system of the Protestant-Episcopal Church is tolerant. The church has continued in the lines of reformation adopted by the Church of England, in opposition to the policy of many Protestants on the Continent; the intention being to embrace all of the laity who accept the Christian faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed, no one being debarred from communion on account of any opinion entertained in connection with the test questions of certain denominations. Accordingly the Episcopal Church embraces various schools of thought, ranging from the so-called Evangelical to the Sacramentarian, or from the Genevan to the advanced Oxford type. Yet the schools in the American Church are not always to be considered as identical with those passing under the same name in England. All phases of theological opinion undergo essential modification in passing from the English to the American Church. This is especially the case with respect to the Broad-Church type of thought, which, in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, often comprehends the liberal Evangelical and the high advocate of church order; being a feeling as well as a conviction, though it also includes the rationalist and the legendarian.

Institutions. — The institutions of the church are quite numerous, and the principal ones only can be mentioned. The foremost is the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, founded in 1820, and incorporated in 1816. Its work extends throughout the United States, to Mexico, Africa, China, and Japan. The General Theological Seminary, situated in New-York City, was founded at about the same period as the Missionary Society. Its trustees are selected from all the dioceses. The American Church Missionary Society, the Evangelical Education Society, and the Evangelical Knowledge Society are of more recent origin, being devoted to the promotion of so-called evangelical interests. The Society for the Increase of the Ministry has a wider scope. Mention should also be made of the Free Church Association (devoted to the work of increasing the number of free sittings), the Church Congress, the Church Temperance Society, and the American Church Building-Fund Commission, with the Western Church Building Society. The colleges and theological seminaries number about twenty-five; Columbia and Trinity College holding the foremost rank. A Quarterly Review is published, together with twelve or more newspapers, several of which are influential and widely circulated.

Statistics. — At the present time (1886) the church numbers 69 bishops, 3,729 priests and deacons, 4,565 parishes and missions, 321 candidates for orders, 397,192 communicants, 36,001 Sunday-school teachers, 326,203 Sunday-school scholars. Aggregate of contributions and offerings for the year amounts to $9,017,155. There are 48 dioceses, 17 missionary jurisdictions, including 4 missions; viz., among the Indians, and in Japan, China, and West Africa.

(Rector St. John the Evangelist, N.Y.).

EPISCOPAL CHURCH, Reformed. The English, unlike the Continental Reformation, was political in its origin. Henry VIII., casting off the yoke of the Pope of Rome, became himself the Pope of England. Thus released from ecclesiastical bondage, the English Church, under Edward VI., who was largely guided by Archbishop Crammer, attained a much more intelligent conception of spiritual truth.

The Edwardian reformers compiled the First Book of Edward, but died before they had completed the Second. During Mary's reign the Church of England fell back into the superstition from which it seemed to have escaped; and the teachings of the Reformation, to use the language of Froude, "passed away like a dream." It was Elizabeth's policy to frame such a Liturgy as would satisfy and conciliate both her Roman-Catholic and Protestant subjects, and unite them in peaceable submission to the church and the throne. Such a Liturgy was published early in her reign, at a time when there was some hope of effecting a reconciliation with Rome, and, as might be expected, was so constructed as to foster this hope. Later on, Elizabeth became greatly offended with the Pope; and the Articles of Religion, which were issued in 1571, were, as a consequence, uncompromisingly Protestant in their tone. The royal commissioners of 1689 failed in their effort to bring the Formulary back to the spirit of the Second Book of Edward.

The English Prayer-Book, being thus the offspring of compromise, contains within itself antagonistic elements; its ritual (which constitutes its educating power) looking towards Rome; its articles of faith, towards Geneva. As a consequence of this the Church of England has always contained within itself two manner of peoples, two schools or parties,—one asserting its Protestantism, the other claiming its affinity with Rome.

When the Church of England in the Colonies became the Protestant-Episcopal Church of the United States, these influences, which had been transmitted and perpetuated here, secured the retention of the same Formularies and Articles; and so the American Book of Common Prayer wears all the marks of the old compromise.

In the early part of the second quarter of the present century the Tractarian movement began at Oxford. It was an attempt to revive those Anglo-Catholic sentiments which had been largely developed by Archbishop Laud, and, after his time by the non-juring clergy. It counted among its chief promoters John Henry Newman, John Keble, and Dr. Pusey. They and their associates issued a number of publications known as Tracts for the Times, by means of which they succeeded in largely leavening the Church of England with Anglo-Catholic ideas. These ideas engendered the ritualistic views and practices now prevalent in the Church of England and the Protestant-Episcopal Church in this country. Newman and a number of others of the more advanced mediaevalists subsequently united with the Church of Rome. It is estimated that by 1852 two hundred clergymen, and as many more laymen thus influenced, had abjured Protestantism.

This Romeward drift became shortly afterwards apparent in the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the United States; conspicuously so at the time of the ordination of the Rev. Arthur Carey in New York, July, 1843. This young man deemed the difference between the Protestant-Episcopal Church and the Church of Rome such as embraced no points of faith, doubted whether the Church of Rome or the Anglican Church were the more pure, considered the Reformation from Rome unjustifiable, and declared that he received the Articles of the Creed of Pius IV. so far as they were repetitions of the decrees of the Council of Trent. On the ground of these views the Rev. Drs. Hugh Smith and Henry Anthon protested against his ordination, but in vain. This event created a profound sensation in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and rallied the Low-Church or Evangelical party to the defence of their now clearly endangered principles.

Thenceforth the antagonism between the two parties—the Low Church on the one side, and the High, with which the Ritualistic party affiliated, on the other—became increasingly distinct and pronounced; the latter grasping the organized machinery of the church in its domestic missionary work; and the former, in self-defence, organizing three societies,—one for publication, a second for missionary labor, and a third for ministerial education. The Low-Church party sought in this way to defend, conserve, and disseminate its principles.

These measures widened the chasm. Evangelical men became more and more restive as the purpose of the dominant party to mould and control the church in the interest of mediaevalism became increasingly apparent. Discussions were had, conferences held. Particular attention began to be paid to the writings of the English reformers; and finally the conclusion was reached by many, that the root of the difficulties which beset the church was to be found in the Romanism latent in the Book of Common Prayer as a result of the Elizabethan compromise. Urged by this conviction, a movement was quietly set on foot looking toward the revision of the Prayer-Book; and at a conference held in Philadelphia, 1867, a committee was appointed to consider and report upon the subject. Meanwhile the flames of discontent were fanned by events which indicated a determination on the part of the High-Church party to deal oppressively and repressively with their opponents.

These events were keenly watched by the Christian public generally, and undoubtedly exerted a great influence on the struggle.

They were:—

I. The trial (February, 1867) and admonition of the Rev. S. H. Tyng, jun., for preaching in a Methodist Church in New Brunswick, N.J., within the claimed parochial limits of a parish of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

II. The trial (1868) of Rev. J. P. Hubbard of Rhode Island, for exchanging pulpits with a Baptist clergyman.

III. The sentence of suspension, subsequently of degradation, passed by an ecclesiastical court, in the diocese of Illinois, upon Rev. (now Bishop) Charles E. Cheney, for the omission of the word "regenerate" in the baptismal office.

Meanwhile the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, which meets triennially, was besieged with remonstrances, suggestions, and petitions for redress and relief. These pleadings brought no result. The applications were either dishonored, or referred to committees, for quiet burial, to be heard of no more.

The fate of these measures convinced many of the Low-Church party that the dominant majority were resolved to yield nothing, that no reform could be hoped for within the Protestant-Episcopal Church, and they must either crush their consciences, or seek relief elsewhere.

They were anxiously waiting the indications of Providence when the Sixth General Conference of the Evangelical Alliance met in the city of New York (October, 1873). While this distinguished body was in session, a union communion service was held in one of the churches of the city, at which, in company with the representatives of other denominations, Bishop George D. Cummins, D.D., assistant bishop of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in the diocese of Kentucky, by invitation officiated. For this act of Christian courtesy and fellowship he was at once bitterly assailed through the press by representatives of the High-Church party. Pained by this manifestation of exclusiveness, and convinced, by previous experience in the diocese of Kentucky, that his official position obliged him to countenance, in some degree, the growing evils of ritualism, Bishop Cummins reached the conclusion that he could not, without sin, longer give his life, ministry, and influence to the advancement of a church, the theory and practice of which, as interpreted by the great majority of its adherents, denied the brotherhood of believers in Christ.

Accordingly, in a letter addressed to the Right Rev. Bishop Smith, D.D., the presiding bishop, he, on the 11th of November, 1873, withdrew from the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church.

After consultation had with brethren like-minded, the Reformed Episcopal Church was organized, Dec. 2, 1873, in the parlors of the Young Men's Christian Association, New-York City, eight clergymen and twenty laymen giving in their adhesion to the movement. At the same time and place Bishop Cummins was chosen the presiding officer of the church; Rev. C. E. Cheney, D.D., rector of Christ Church, Chicago, was elected bishop (consecrated by Bishop Cummins in Chicago, Dec. 14, 1873); and a Declaration of Principles (of which subsequent statements of doctrine, polity, worship, and discipline are little more than an expansion) was set forth, as follows:—

I.—The Reformed Episcopal Church, holding "the faith once delivered unto the saints," declares its belief in the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, and the sole Rule of Faith and Practice; in the Creed "commonly called the Apostles' Creed;" in the Divine institution of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; and in the doctrines of grace substantially as they are set forth in the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion.

II.—This Church recognizes and adheres to Episcopacy, not as of divine right, but as a very ancient and desirable form of church polity.

III.—This Church, retaining a Liturgy which shall not be imperative or repressive of freedom in prayer, accepts the Book of Common Prayer, as it was revised, proposed, and recommended for use by the General Convention of the Protestant-Episcopal Church, A.D. 1785, reserving full liberty to alter, abridge, enlarge, and amend the same, as may seem most conducive to the edification of the people, "provided that the substance of the faith be kept entire."

IV.—This Church condemns and rejects the following erroneous and strange doctrines as contrary to God's Word:—

First, That the Church of Christ exists only in one order or form of ecclesiastical polity;

Second, That Christian ministers are "priests" in another sense than that in which all believers are "a royal priesthood;"

Third, That the Lord's Table is an altar on which the oblation of the Body and Blood of Christ is offered anew to the Father;

Fourth, That the Presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper is a presence in the elements of Bread and Wine;

Fifth, That Regeneration is inseparably connected with Baptism.

The Reformed Episcopal Church has upon its roll ninety-two clergymen, including seven bishops. It has parishes in the chief cities of the United States, in England, Canada, and the Bermuda Islands.

According to last official report, on June 1, 1885, it had

Communicants	7,877
Sunday-school scholars	11,267
Sunday-school teachers	960
Church property (exclusive of enumerations) valued at	$1,009,843

At the late General Council (May, 1885) the additions to the membership by confirmation and letter were 889.

The contributions for parochial, benevolent, and missionary objects, were, at the same time, reported as $152,200.

This church recognizes but two orders in the ministry,—the presbyterate and the diaconate. The episcopate is not an order, but an office; the bishop being simply the first presbyter. The bishops preside over synods or jurisdictions, do not, as in the Protestant-Episcopal Church, constitute a separate house, but in council vote with and as their brother-presbyters, and are subject to confirmation or appointment by the General Council. EPISCOPIUS, Simon, b. in Amsterdam, 1583; d. there 1643; studied, at Leyden, philosophy and theology, under Jacob Arminius and Francis Gomarus; but, when the great controversy between the Arminians and the Gomarists broke out, he declared for the former, and suffered (especially after the death of Arminius, 1609) so much from the intolerance of the latter, that he left Leyden altogether, and settled at Franeker. In 1610 he accepted the position as minister of Bleysswick, a village in the neighborhood of Rotterdam; and when, in 1611, Gomarus retired from his chair in Leyden, Episcopius was appointed his successor. In the beginning he experienced no troubles. He wrote his commentaries upon the Revelation and the First Epistle of John, his paraphrase of the twenty-four first chapters of Matthew, etc.; but by degrees, as his fame grew and the importance of the Arminian party increased, the annoyances from the side of the Gomarists began. At the synod of Dort (1618) he was the principal spokesman of the Arminians, but produced very little effect. He and twelve other Arminian theologians were condemned by the synod, and banished from the country. Episcopius went to the Spanish Netherlands, and settled in Brussels, where he wrote his Confessio (1622), in the name of all Arminian theologians, and his Responsio ad duas Petri II. Advingi Jesuitæ epistolæ, etc. On the outbreak of the war between France and Spain he removed to France, where he lived, partly in Paris and partly in Rouen, and wrote a great number of his minor treatises. In 1626 he was allowed to return to his native country, and was appointed preacher at the Remonstrant Church in Amsterdam, and in 1631 professor of theology in the Arminian college in that city. To this last period of his life belong, besides his Apologia pro Confessione and Verus Theologus Remonstrans, his two principal works, Institutiones Theologicæ and Responsio ad Questiones Theologicæ, which became the standard works of Arminian theology. A collected edition of his works appeared in two volumes folio, the first volume edited by Carellæus, 1650, the second by Polenbrugh, 1665. His life was written by PHILIP LIMBORCH in Dutch, and afterwards translated into Latin, 1701. [See CALDER: Memoirs of Simon Episcopius, New York, 1837.]

HEPPE.

EPISCOPUS IN PARTIBUS, episcopus titularis, episcopus suffraganeus. When the Arabs conquered the southern part of Spain, the Christian bishops were expelled, and fled to Oviedo. There they remained for centuries, waiting for a return to their dioceses; and when one of them died, a successor was immediately appointed to him. Something similar took place when the Eastern Church was broken up by the Mohamuedans. Dioceses entirely in the hands of the infidels (in partibus infidelium) had bishops, who lived in Rome, or elsewhere, as it became customary to employ these bishops without dioceses as help to such bishops as were unable to manage the whole business of their diocese. Many misuses and corruptions grew up from this custom; and the councils, from that of Ravenna (1311) to that of Trent (1515), tried hard to regulate, without destroying altogether, the useful practice.

EPISTLES, The, as the letters of the apostles contained in the New Testament are called, may be divided into congregational, those addressed to a particular church, and dealing with doctrinal or practical questions; private, those addressed to individuals, yet containing matter of wider interest; and general, those of an encyclical character, not meant for any one church or person. Paul's Epistles belong to the first two classes, or even to all three, if the words, "to Ephesus," be left out of Eph. i. 1, as there is weighty authority for doing; in which case this Epistle would be general. John's Epistles belong to the last two classes; James's, Peter's, and Jude's to the last. There are thirteen Epistles of Paul, three of John, two of Peter, and one each of James and Jude. The Epistle to the Hebrews is of uncertain authorship.

The Epistles in their outward form are similar to those of their day. With the exception of Hebrews and 1 John, they begin, according to the custom, with the author's name, and that of the person or congregation primarily addressed. Then follows the salutation (omitted in 3 John). This is usually "grace" and "peace;" but in 1 and 2 Timothy, 2 John, and Jude, "mercy" is added; while James employs the classic Greek expression, "greeting." "Grace" was Greek, and "peace" Hebrew; but they were not used by these writers in their original sense, which referred rather to physical health and temporal comfort, but transformed into a prayer for the saving grace of God and the peace in Christ. In the body of the Epistle the first personal pronouns, singular and plural, are used indiscriminately, just as they are in Cicero's letters. The terminations of the Epistles vary. James closes abruptly, and so does 1 John; 2 and 3 John close with salutations; Romans and Jude, with a doxology; the remaining Epistles, with a brief benediction.

The earlier Epistles antedate the Gospels. There was need of direction prior to written accounts of the life of Jesus. Our collection by no means includes all the letters of the apostles, but only such as were inspired for the reading and guidance of the Church in all ages.

Paul employed an amanuensis (Rom. xvi. 22), and only added a few words at the close in his own hand, by way of authentication; for it would seem that his letters had been forged or plagiarized (1 Cor. xvi. 21; Gal. vi. 11; Col. iv. 18; 2 Thess. iii. 17, cf. ii. 2). This fact explains many of the peculiarities of the style of the great apostle; for his sentences often read like the utterances of an impassioned speaker.

His letters were the answers of his heart and head to questions submitted to him. He put all his learning, his dialectical skill, his tact and judgment, and also all his affection, at the service of his converts and friends. His fellow-writers did the same, according to their ability.

In the Epistles are many doctrinal statements, upon which different theologies are founded, besides rich practical instruction. The chief facts of the gospel are alluded to; and so, if the Gospels were destroyed, the Church would yet possess an inspired though fragmentary history of her Lord. One of the most important services of the Epistles is their stimulus and support to the piety of the Church. Many passages in Paul's writings, 1 and 2 Peter, and 1 John entire, have ever been of incalculable value in centring the thought of the Church upon Christ. The common sense of James makes it the "business man's epistle;" but even this is full of the spirit of the Master. No other religion can boast of such letters as the twenty-one Epistles of the New Testament. Their existence is an unanswerable argument for the divine origin of Christianity. See LETTERS, PAUL, WRITING; also art. Epistle in the Bible Dictionaries.

EPISTOLÆ OBSCURORUM VIRORUM. The first edition of this famous book appeared in 1515, containing forty-one letters. A second edition, unchanged, soon followed, and a year later a third, augmented with seven letters. In 1517 a new series appeared, numbering sixty-two letters, which in the second edition were augmented with eight. Full information with respect to the history of the work may be found in EDUARD BÖCKING: Ulrich Hutten's operum supplementum, Leipzig, 1864-70, 2 vols., containing also the various answers to the book.

The immediate occasion for the production of the Epistolæ obscurorum virorum was the publication in 1511, at Tübingen, of the Epistolæ clarorum virorum. The latter intended to place the mental wealth of the humanists in a proper light; and, as a supplement, the former undertook to give a picture of the mental poverty and moral obscurantism of the Roman-Catholic Church, its monks, and its scholasticism. In its details the book is often coarse, and somewhat offensive to modern taste; but, considered as a whole, it is nevertheless a brilliant performance. The caricature of the style and language then used in the monasteries is extremely ludicrous; and the naïveté with which the evri obscuro lay bare their own ignorance and stupidity is very enjoyable.

With respect to the authorship, the plan of this "mimical satire" was due to Crotus Rubianus; and Ulrich von Hutten, a learned and fearless knight (see art.), was his principal collaborator. The effect was tremendous. In some places the monks mistook the book, and believed it to be a serious performance in their favor; but the mistake was of course soon discovered, and the delight turned into rage. Ortwin Gratius, to whom the letters are addressed, a comical person, a scholastic in humanist robe, the poetista asinus, as Luther called him, did his utmost to suppress it by means of a papal brief, and to disturb its influence by writing against it. [German trans., by Dr. Wilhelm Binder, Briefe von Dunkelmännern, Stuttgart, 1876.]

BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

EQUITIUS, abbot of several monasteries in the province of Valeria (a district in Abruzzo Ulteriore, thus called because it was traversed by the Via Valeria), flourished in the sixth century, and preached often in the neighboring towns and villages, though he was not ordained. This excited the jealousy of the ordained priests, and he was summoned to Rome by the Pope: but, after an interview, the Pope dropped the case. According to Alanus, the Waldenses afterwards used his example against the hierarchy, when forbidden to preach because they were laymen. An account of him, much mixed up with legendary matters, is found in GREGORY I.: Dial., I. 4.

HERZOG.

ERA (Latin ara, or era) occurs for the first time in Isidorn's Etym. (V. 36), and is there applied to a chronological arrangement by Augustus, beginning with the year 716 A.U.C. Afterwards it became the common name for any chronological arrangement starting from a fixed point. Its etymology is uncertain. Ideler derives it from the Gothic jera ("year"), and asserts that it was first used for the chronology which the Visigoths found established in Spain and Southern France. Others derive it (and with more right) from the Latin as, like opera from opus, and ora from os. The term ara (singular feminine) is used already by Cicero to denote the unit of certain measurements.

In the books of the Old and New Testaments, traces of an era, properly speaking, occur only in a few passages; a circumstance not to be wondered at, on account of the great age and devotional character of these books. The nations of antiquity used no era, either in their private or in their public life: contrivances of that kind were left solely to the historians and the chronologists by profession. Even the Romans, though they had a fixed era, beginning with the year of the building of Rome, dated all public and private documents, in social and political life, simply by the name of the consul in office, to which afterwards was added the year of the reign of the emperor. In the historical and prophetic books of the Old Testament, dates of some kind or other are of frequent occurrence; but continuous computation of time from a fixed point is very rare. In the Pentateuch, and down to the time of Jacob, all chronology is bound up with genealogy. When the Israelites had kings of their own, they dated the year after the reign of the king, as is done in Kings, Chronicles, and Jeremiah. When they were subjugated by foreign peoples, they dated after the reign of the foreign ruler: as, for instance, after the Babylonian kings (Jer. xxv. 1, lii. 12, 28; Dan. ii. 1, vii. 1), or the Persian kings (Ez. iv. 24, vi. 15, vii. 7; Neh. ii. 1, v. 14, xiii. 6; Hag. i. 1, ii. 11; Zech. vii. 1; Dan. x. 1). Dates of this kind also occur in the New Testament (Luke iii. 1; Matt. ii. 1; Luke i. 5). Sometimes, though not often, great national events are used as chronological starting-points; as, for instance, the exodus (Exod. xix. 1; Num. xxxiii. 38; 1 Kings vi. 1), or the beginning of the Babylonian exile (Ezek. xxxiii. 21, xl. 1). When the Jews became Syrian subjects, they adopted the Seleucidian era, beginning with the year 312 B.C. It is uniformly used in the first two books of the Maccabees; though else it appears that the authors of the books of the Maccabees do not date from exactly the same starting-point.

The establishment of the Christian Church was not immediately followed by the establishment of the Christian era. For centuries the Christians continued to date, each in the way to which he was accustomed. Thus the Christians of the East continued to use the Seleucidian era; and, indeed, the Syrian Christians still use it in all ecclesiastical affairs besides the Christian era, only that a difference with respect to the computation of New Year has crept in among them; the Nestorians and Jacobites reckoning from Oct. 1, and the Roman Catholics from Sept. 1. In Alexandria the era of Diocletian was adopted for the computation of Easter. It begins with the reign of Diocletian (Aug. 29, 284); and, as this reign was ushered in with horrible persecutions, the era received the name of Æra Martyrum. It was commonly used in Egypt, in all civil affairs, down to the invasion of the Arabs; and it is still used by the Egyptian and Ethiopian Christians, though the latter also employ a world-era, beginning from the creation. The Christian Armenians date from the year 551 A.D., when their chronology was reformed and finally fixed by the patriarch Moses.

The Christian era, thus called because it dates from the person of Christ, is now universally used by the nations of Europe and America; but five centuries elapsed before it was invented, and five more before it was generally adopted. In 537 the Emperor Justinian ordered that all public documents should be dated by the year of the emperor, the name of the consul, the indiction (tax-period), the month, and the day (Novella, XLVII.); but in 511 the last consul was elected, and the need of a new starting-point for the computation of time, fixed once for all, and generally adopted, became more and more urgent. Meanwhile, in 525, the Roman abbot, Dionysius, had begun in his Easter-tables to count the years ab incarnatione Domini, and not after the era of Diocletian; which, though adopted by the Alexandrians, never became popular among the Christians. The first year of this Dionysian era runs from Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 754 A.U.C.; and the birth of Jesus falls towards the close of the year, — Dec. 25, as, according to common patristical usage, incarnatio means conceptio, and not nativitas. This method of computing time found great favor; and Bede and Charlemagne contributed much to introduce it. In the tenth century it was widely adopted. In Spain, however, it did not supersede the so-called Spanish era, beginning with the year 716 B.C., until the latter part of the fourteenth century. In Russia it was introduced in 1700 by Peter the Great. Great inconveniences arose at first, from the circumstance, that, in different places, the year was begun at different dates, — Dec. 25, Jan. 1, March 25, or Easter Day. Thus there was a difference of a whole year between the chronology of Pisa and that of Florence; and uniformity was not established until 1749. The German emperor began the year at Dec. 25, until the latter part of the sixteenth century; France, at Easter Day, until 1567. Jan. 1 was not fixed upon as New-Year's Day in Scotland until 1599, and in England 1752.

A world's era, dating from the creation, and constructed out of the Old Testament, was in use among the Jews at the time of Christ. The Jewish historian, Josephus, employs it in his work on archaeology. Such an era seems to recommend itself in several respects; but its construction presents difficulties which can hardly ever be overcome. Every scholar who tries comes to a different result. L'art de vérifier les dates gives no less than a hundred and eight different views; and the two extremes differ no less than two thousand years from each other. Julius Africanus counts, from the creation to Christ, 5,500 years; Eusebius, Bede, and the Roman martyrologium, 5,199; Scaliger and Calvisius, 3,950; Kepler and Petavius, 3,984; Ussher, 4,004, etc. Uniformity is not to be hoped for under such circumstances; and without uniformity no practical good can be accomplished. The so-called Byzantine or Constantinopolitan era also begins from creation, and counts 5,509 years down to Christ. It first occurs in the Chronicon Paschale, from the seventh century; but it was afterwards generally adopted by the Byzantine historians, the East-Roman emperors, and the patriarchs of the Eastern Church, and it is still used throughout the Greek Church, with the exception of Russia.

ERASMUS, St., was bishop somewhere in the patriarchate of Antioch, suffered much under Diocletian in Antioch and Sirmium, and d. at Formiæ in Campania, whither he had retired. Already Gregory the Great calls him a martyr (Ep. I. 8), and his acts are found in Act. Sanct., June 2. In the ninth century, when Formiæ was destroyed by the Saracens, his bones were brought to Gaëta; nevertheless, several other Italian cities boast of possessing them. As he is often represented with the intestines laid bare, he has become the popular patron of stomach-ache and all kinds of complaints of the bowels. In Italy and Portugal he is worshipped under the name of St. Elmo. HERZOG.

ERASMUS, Desiderius, the most brilliant representative of humanistic culture at the beginning of the sixteenth century, and the head of a movement in the interest of a reformation of ecclesiastical abuses which prepared the way for the Protestant Reformation. His life divides itself naturally into three periods; the first, lasting till 1507, was the period of gradual emancipation from the fetters of his age; the second lasted till 1519, and marked his greatest reputation and most efficient reformatory activity; the last is the period of conflict, isolation, and final abandonment of the Reformation movement.

Erasmus was b. in Rotterdam, and d. in Basel July 12, 1536. The date of birth is variously put in 1466, 1467, and 1469. Oct. 28, 1465, is probably the right one, and is favored by the statement of Rhenanus, that Erasmus died in his seventieth year, as by his own statement (Ep. 207, Feb. 26, 1516), "I have entered my fifty-first year." He seems to have been born out of wedlock. His father, Gerhard Roger, according to some accounts, was a priest at the time; but according to others he did not enter a convent till after the event. Erasmus was sent to the famous school of Hegius at Deventer, attended at that time by two thousand scholars. His parents died in his thirteenth year, and, being cheated by a guardian out of his inheritance, he entered the convent school of Herzogenbusch, and subsequently took vows in the convent of Emaus, at Steyn. At a later period (1514) he calls this step the direst misfortune of his life. In 1491 he went into the service of the Bishop of Cambrai, who sent him to Paris to conclude his studies. While attending the College of Montaigu he contracted a disease, which forced him to seek relief in Holland. Returning to Paris, he acted as tutor to several English youths, one of whom, Lord Mountjoy, induced him to visit England in 1498. Erasmus resided for a while at Oxford, and formed a close friendship with More and Colet. In the face of Henry VII.'s offer of a house, and a pension amounting to a thousand pounds in present money, he returned to the Continent. In 1500 his Adagia (a collection of proverbs and witty sayings derived from ancient writers) appeared, and in 1502 the Enchiridion Militis Christiani, which, he says, was "designed to counteract the error of those who place piety in ceremonies and external observances, but neglect its very essence" (Ep. 102). In 1505 he edited Valla's Annotations to the New Testament with a preface, which calls for a return to the Greek text, and its grammatical exposition as the fundamental conditions of a right understanding of the Scriptures. In 1506 he visited Italy, taking the degree of doctor of divinity at Turin, and receiving from the highest dignitaries marks of distinction. In 1509 he returned to England, forming on the way the plan of his Encomium Morie ("The Praise of Folly"), which subsequently appeared with a dedication to More in 1511. Here the second period of his career begins.

Erasmus was now in the zenith of his fame, a fame which has never been surpassed in the annals of men of letters. He remained in England about five years, a part of the time lecturing at Cambridge. Returning to Brabant, he was elected by the archduke one of his counsellors, and subsequently to a similar position by Charles V. From 1515 to 1521 he resided in Brussels, Antwerp, and Louvain (Ep. 354). A papal brief gave him a much desired relief from the duties and dress of his monastic vow. From 1514 all his writings were published by Froben at Basel. This necessitated frequent journeyings to Switzerland through Germany. These journeys were triumphant processions; scholars, councils, and bishops doing him homage. His correspondence at this period was enormous, and included princes, the highest prelates, and the Pope himself. In Germany a party grew up called the "Erasmians," which regarded him as a leader of a new movement in the church as well as in the department of letters. Among the writings of this period are a school-book, de Duplici Copia Verborum ac Rerum, 1512, and the Colloquia Familiaria, 1518, 1522, much enlarged in 1526. The latter is the most read of all Erasmus' writings. It contains the keenest sarcasm, and wittiest sallies against conventual life, fasting, pilgrimages, and the worship of saints. He edited numerous editions and translations of classic authors and the fathers, the most valuable of which is that of Jerome. The most important of all Erasmus' works appeared in 1516. It had a decided influence upon the Reformation. It was an edition of the Greek Testament under the title of Novum Instrumentum omne, diligenter ab Erasmo Rotodamo recognitum et emendatum, etc. Besides the text, it contained a Latin translation, which departs quite largely from the Vulgate; and annotations justifying these departures, explaining different passages, and condemning frequently, by comparison with apostolic teaching, the excesses and ignorance of the monks. The work was prefaced with a dedication to Leo X. to stamp it with the sanction of the Church. An Introduction, composed of three parts, exhorts to the study of Scripture. The text was faulty, and inferior to that of the Complutensian Polyglot, which, although completed two years previously, did not appear till 1520. The printer's errors were corrected in subsequent editions, but the editorial faults remained. This text had a very large circulation. Within a few decades, thirty unauthorized reprints were made. Erasmus himself sent out four more editions. Luther's translation was based upon the second edition (1519); and in the third (1522) the editor restored to the text 1 John v. 7, "ne cui foret ansa calumniandi." (See BIBLE TEXT.) In 1517 he began to publish the Paraphrases of the Epistles and Gospels, which also exerted an extensive influence upon the Reformation.

In these writings Erasmus is in many points the precursor of the Reformation. His satire against the ecclesiastical abuses and corruption of the day is keen and bold. He also made the Scriptures the standard of doctrine and life in the Church. They had disabused his own mind of prejudices in favor of the specific holiness of cloistral and celibate life. With the Reformers he thus far agreed. He differed in particulars equally important. They found the essence of Christianity in the reconciliation of the sinner to God and his sense of the forgiveness of sin. Erasmus regarded Christ from another standpoint, as the exemplar of all virtue, and the restorer of moral order to the world. The Reformers were Augustinian in their theology, he Pelagian. Erasmus treated with somewhat of indifference the doctrinal part of Christianity, and at times estimated the morality of Greece and Rome so high as to obliterate the line between it and that of Christianity (Enchir., ii., etc.).

There were certain defects of character, and certain qualities of disposition, which explain the failure of Erasmus to understand and advocate the Reformation. His opposition to the state of the Church had proceeded from æsthetic feeling, rather than from moral indignation. He lacked the enthusiasm of a moral cause. He says he would rather sacrifice a part of the truth than destroy peace (Ep. 543, Dec. 25, 1522). After long vacillation, in which the fear of man comes out only too conspicuously, he cut loose from the Reformation.

The third period of Erasmus' life is marked by a complete rupture with the Reformers. The most prominent of these attributed their emancipation from the dominion of the Church to his writings. He was popularly classed with them. But Luther saw deeper, and wrote to Lange (Letters 22, 29), "I fear that Erasmus does not sufficiently exalt Christ and the divine grace." But down to his letter of March 28, 1519, to Erasmus, he had the highest esteem for him, calling him "our pride and hope." In his reply (Ep. 325), Erasmus, while applauding Luther's attitude towards the friars, counsels him to be moderate and careful. After preserving, as long as it was possible, an attitude of neutrality, he gradually drew off from the German reformer, and studiously avoided his writings, lest he should be called upon to give an opinion upon them. [Mr. Froude keenly discriminates between these two men in his essay: "In Luther, belief in God was the first principle of life: in Erasmus it was an inference which might be taken away, and yet leave the world a very tolerable and habitable place," etc.] In spite of this, his enemies (Ep. 562) said Luther had sucked poison at his breast, or that he "laid the egg which Luther hatched out." Erasmus was, however, still opposed to persecution, and did not conceal his disgust at the papal bull of excommunication. But in a letter to Leo X., dated Sept. 13, 1520, he hastens to clear himself of all connection with the excommunicated reformer, and to declare that only his incapacity, and fear of stirring up strife, keep him from answering Luther (Ep. 529). Neither death nor life would induce him to leave the communion of the Church (Ep. 621, 645).

In 1521, no longer feeling himself safe in the Netherlands, Erasmus went to Basel to reside permanently. The open breach with Luther was now to occur. In September, 1524, he wrote, in answer to the reformer, his Diatriba de Libero Arbitrio. The work shows him to be unequal to the problem, and inferior to Luther, who replied in the De Servo Arbitrio. Erasmus wrote, in 1526, a feeble retort, — Hyperaspistes. Luther henceforth regarded Erasmus as a "sceptic and epicurean, an enemy of all true religion." In 1523 Erasmus broke off correspondence with Zwingli, and henceforth he regarded the Reformation as a calamity and a crime (Ep. 906). In contrast to his former utterances, he now ridiculed the marriage of the clergy, and proclaimed for the authority of the Church to punish heretics with death. The Reformation extended to Basel; and he removed to Freiburg, in Breisgau, where he heard with satisfaction the news of Zwingli's and (Ecolampadius' death (Ep. 1206).

In the last decade of his life the most of his editions of the fathers appeared, — Hilary (1523), Irenæus (1526), Ambrose (1527), Augustine (1528), Epiphanius (1529), Chrysostom (1530), Origen (1531). His Modus Confitendi (1525) vindicated the confessional, and his Ecclesiastes (1535) is in many respects a valuable homiletic commentary. While bowing submissively to the Church, he still continued to ridicule ecclesiastical abuses. The Sorbonne, in 1527, condemned thirty-two articles extracted from his works, after having previously forbidden the circulation of the Colloquies in France. But the Pope's friendship suffered no abatement. Paul III. offered to make him cardinal, but he declined on account of age. Erasmus returned to Basel in 1535, where he died of an attack of his old trouble, the stone, combined with dysentery. He died without the priest, but invoking the mercy of Christ. His body lies interred in the cathedral of Basel. A lifelike portrait by Hans Holbein hangs in the museum of the same city.

LIT. — A collected edition of Erasmus' works, with biographical sketch, appeared, under the editorship of his friend BEATUS RHENANUS, at Basel, 1540, 9 vols. folio; more complete, but less accurate, edition, by LE CLERC, 10 folio vols., Leyden, 1703-06. ERASTUS, Thomas, b. Sept. 7, 1524, at Baden, in Switzerland, or, according to another account, at Auggen, in the margraviate of Baden; d. at Basel, Jan. 1, 1583; studied theology at Basel, and philosophy and medicine at Bologna and Padua, and was in 1558 appointed body-physician to the elector-palatine, and professor of medicine at Heidelberg, whence, in 1580, he moved, as professor of medicine, to Basel. As a practical physician he enjoyed a great reputation, and as a student of nature he strenuously opposed the astrology, alchemy, and magic of Paracelsus and his school; but it is chiefly as a theologian that his name has become known to the after-world. He was a pupil of Zwingli; took active part in the conferences at Heidelberg (1560) and Maulbronn (1564); and defended, in the controversy concerning the Lord's Supper, the Swiss view against Dr. Johann Marbach, a Lutheran minister at Strassburg. Some years later he had occasion to defend his master's ideas against the Calvinists in a question of church-polity. There was in Heidelberg a Calvinist party, headed by Caspar Olevianus, which wanted to introduce in the country a purely presbyterian church-constitution with a corresponding church-discipline. Erastus strongly opposed the movement, but in vain. He was himself the very first victim of the established church-discipline, being excommunicated on a charge of latent Unitarianism. He was restored after five years; but, six years after his death (1589), Castelvetro, who had married his widow, published a work of his, Explicatio gravissimæ quæstionis, utrum excommunicatio mandato nitatur divino, an excogitata sit ab hominibus, written in 1568, and found among his posthumous papers. The book, written, according to the fashion of the time, in form of theses, and denying that excommunication is a divine ordinance, that the Church has any power to make laws or decrees, and to inflict pains and penalties of any kind, that the sins of professing Christians are to be punished by pastors and elders, instead of the civil magistrate, etc., attracted much attention, and was attacked by Beza. It was translated into English in 1659, and again, in 1844, by R. Lee; and its views were adopted by a distinct party in the Westminster Assembly, headed by Selden, Lightfoot, Coleman, and White Locke. Since that time the doctrine of the State supremacy in ecclesiastical causes generally goes under the name of Erastianism; though in its broad sense, and wide application, this doctrine is by no means due to Erastus. ERNESTI, Johann August, b. Aug. 4, 1707, at Tennstädt, in Thuringia; d. at Leipzig, Sept. 11, 1781; studied at Wittenberg and Leipzig, and was appointed professor in the latter place, of classical literature (1742), of rhetoric (1756), and of theology (1758). As a philologist he enjoyed a great fame. His editions of Cicero, Homer, Xenophon, Tacitus, etc., were celebrated; and his Opuscula Oratoria (1762), Opuscula philologico-critica (1764), and Initia Doctrinæ Solidioris (1736) were much read. His principal theological work is his Institutio Interpretis N. T. (1761), [translated into English by Terrot, and published in the Biblical Cabinet, Edinburgh, 1834.] which opened a new epoch in the history of hermeneutics, and founded the grammatico-historical school. Its principle is, that, in the divinely inspired book, the sense shall not be sought for, nor can it be found out, by any other method than that applied to an ordinary human book; and by this principle the chains of the old dogmatical method of interpretation were burst. He also edited the Theologische Bibliothek, first series, 1760-69, second, 1773-79. ERPENIUS, Thomas (van Erpe), b. at Gorkum, in South Holland, Sept. 7, 1584; d. at Leyden, Nov. 13, 1624; studied at Middleburg and Leyden; travelled in England, France, Italy, and Germany; and was in 1613 appointed professor of Oriental languages at the University of Leyden, acting at the same time as interpreter to the government. He was the first to draw attention to the great advantages which the student of the Bible may derive from a knowledge of the Arab language and literature. His Grammatica Arabica (1613) and Rudimenta Lingue Arabice (1620) were universally used by Arab students for two centuries, until they were superseded by the works of De Sacy. His translation of the New Testament into Arabic appeared 1616; that of the Pentateuch, 1622. See P. SCRIVERIUS: Manes Erpeniani, Leiden, 1625.

R. GOSCHIE.

ERSKINE, Ebenezer, M.A., founder of the Scottish Secession Church; b. June 22, 1680; d. June 2, 1754. His father, Henry Erskine, an English Nonconformist minister (ejected by the Act of Conformity, 1662, and a sufferer otherwise from the persecutions of the reign of Charles II.), belonged to the family of the Earls of Mar. His mother, Margaret Halcro, was descended, on one side, from Halcro, Prince of Denmark, and on the other from the Duke of Albany, son of James V. of Scotland. Both parents were even more distinguished by their piety and holy living than by birth. The son inherited their more valuable qualities, but also somewhat of the high spirit not unbecoming the noble blood which flowed in his veins. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and having been licensed as a probationer in February, 1703, he was ordained minister of the parish of Portmoak before the end of the same year. In 1731 he was translated to the more important charge of Stirling, which he occupied till his deposition from the ministry of the Church of Scotland, in 1740.

As a minister of the National Church, no less than after his secession, his labors were most abundant, and eminently successful. Few ministers of that day enjoyed greater popularity as a preacher. People came from distances of sixty or seventy miles to benefit by his ministrations; and at the dispensation of the communion it was sometimes found necessary, even in the small parish of Portmoak, to make provision for no fewer than two thousand participants. His discourses were plain, even homely in style, but were delivered with a certain elevation and dignity of manner which was always characteristic of him. A contemporary, Mr. Hutton, minister of Dalkeith, writes, "I never saw so much of the majesty of God in any mortal man as in Ebenezer Erskine."

But it is chiefly as a leader in ecclesiastical affairs, at a critical period of the history of the Church of Scotland, that Mr. Erskine was known in his own day, or will be remembered in after-times. The history of the secession of 1733 (a movement small in its beginnings, but destined to influence materially the ecclesiastical and religious life of Scotland) cannot be told here. (See SECESSION CHURCH.) Of this first considerable division in the Scottish Church, Mr. Erskine is admitted both by friends and foes to have been the prime mover. The immediate occasion of the rupture was an act of the General Assembly of 1732, in connection with the questio vexata of Patronage. It may be noticed, however, that the relations of Mr. Ebenezer Erskine and his followers to the "ruling party in the Church" had been already strained long before this: first, in the controversy as to The Marrow of Modern Divinity,—a book condemned by the Assembly, but which Erskine and others saw warmly approved; and again, in a celebrated case of alleged heresy,—the case of Mr. John Simson, professor of divinity in the University of Glasgow. In fact, in announcing their secession in the formal Protest of Nov. 16, 1733, the four original members of the Associate Synod, as the new body was at first called, expressly ascribed the step which they felt it their duty to take, not to any one act of the Church, but to "a course of defection from our Reformed and covenanting principles."

Among the incidents of his later years must not be omitted the part he took at the time of the rebellion of 1745, when he even offered his services as a volunteer soldier on behalf of the government, and for his patriotic conduct received the public thanks of the Duke of Cumberland. It is also to his credit, that when the Associate Synod was in 1747 rent asunder by disputes as to the religious clauses in some burgher oaths, he took the side of toleration, refusing to make non-subscription a term of communion.

Mr. Erskine was twice married, and left a numerous family. His only published works were occasional sermons, collected after his death in four volumes 12mo.

WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, John, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Church of Scotland; b. at Edinburgh in (or about) 1721; d. there Jan. 19, 1803. He was the eldest son of John Erskine, Esq., of Carnock, a member of the Scottish bar, and the author of The Institutes of the Law of Scotland. His mother was a daughter of the Hon. James Melville of Bagarvie, and grand-daughter of the fourth Lord Melville. It had been intended by his parents that he should follow his father's profession; and for a year or two, out of deference to their wishes, he applied himself to the study of the law. But a strong predilection for the service of the Church had been early formed, and showed itself, even while he was still a law-student, in the publication of a theological work which gained him the friendship and correspondence of Bishop Warburton. He became a licentiate of the Church in 1743; and in 1741 he was ordained minister of the parish of Kirkintilloch, near Glasgow. In this laborious country-charge Dr. Erskine, from the first, devoted himself earnestly and faithfully to his professional duties,—duties which throughout his life he always regarded as having paramount claims on his attention. And he here, also, formed those habits of careful preparation for the pulpit which never failed to render his sermons, which are vigorous expositions of Calvinism, if not eloquent, interesting and useful.

It was at this period of his life, too, that he began a practice which illustrates an important phase of his character; namely, that of maintaining friendly intercourse on religious questions with the representatives of foreign churches. In an age of bigotry and intolerance—at least among the members of the party to which he himself belonged—Dr. Erskine was, if no Broad-Churchman in the modern acceptance of the term, a man of wide sympathies and enlightened Christian liberality. In the list of his earliest correspondents were several distinguished ministers of America, amongst them being found the honored name of Jonathan Edwards. A frequent interchange of letters between Dr. Erskine and leading American ministers was indeed continued down to his death. Reference has already been made to his friendly relations with Bishop Warburton, many of whose letters will be found in Moncreiff's Life. He had no less loyal intercourse with some of the English Dissenters, especially with Mr. George Whitefield and the Wesleys. His correspondence with members of the Continental churches was carried on for a long time under circumstances of peculiar difficulty, from his ignorance of any foreign language except French; and it is a singular proof at once of his energy, and of the importance he attached to fellowship with Christian brethren outside his own church, that, for the purpose of carrying it out more extensively, Dr. Erskine undertook, as late as in his sixtieth year, the acquisition of the Dutch and German languages, and, in the absence of any teacher of these languages within his reach, gained a competent knowledge of them without assistance except from books.

It is greatly to Dr. Erskine's honor that he was one of the first advocates of missions to the heathen in the Church of Scotland, having actively supported and strenuously defended them at a time when, as a rule, churchmen and dissenters were, in Scotland at least, equally indifferent to what is now recognized as one of the chief obligations of the Christian Church.

He was married in the year 1746; his wife being Christian Mackay, a daughter of George, Lord Reay. In 1753 he was translated from Kirkintilloch to the parish of Culross, and thence he removed, in 1758, to New Greyfriar's Church, Edinburgh; which charge he held for nine years, afterwards exchanging it for the Collegiate Church of Old Greyfriars in the same city. Here he had Principal Robertson, the historian of Charles V., as his colleague, and, in spite of their differences in ecclesiastical politics, as one of his best friends. In Edinburgh he found his work as a minister somewhat different in character from that of either of his country parishes, but not less laborious; and he was equally conscientious in giving his first attention to it, while always finding time for literary study, and for social intercourse with his friends. As an Edinburgh minister, he was also called to take a more prominent place in public business than before. As a leader in the church courts, he represented for many years the evangelical or popular party in the Church. In this position, as in every other, he was far from adopting extreme views; and it may be added that he enjoyed the respect and esteem of all parties throughout the whole of his long and useful life.

LIT. — A striking description of Dr. Erskine's appearance and manner in the pulpit, and his character as a preacher, evidently derived from personal observation, is given by Sir Walter Scott, in Guy Mannering (see chap. XXXVII.). Two graphic pen-and-ink sketches of him, with biographical notices, will be found in KAY'S Series of Original Portraits, Edinburgh, 1837, vol. I. pp. 171-176. See, however, especially, the Account of the Life and Writings of John Erskine, D.D., by Sir HENRY MONCREIFF WELLWOOD, D.D., Edinburgh, 1818. WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, Ralph, M.A., minister of Dunfermline, N.B.; b. at Monilaws, on the English border, March 15, 1685; d. at Dunfermline, Nov. 6, 1752. He was a brother of Ebenezer Erskine (see above), with whose ecclesiastical views he sympathized, and whose secession from the Church he eventually joined. His diary shows him to have been a man of fervent piety. He was hardly less popular as a preacher than his brother; and his Gospel Sonnets and other Scripture Songs were received with favor in his own day. His works were published after his death, in two vols. folio, Glasgow, 1764. See DONALD FRASER: Life and Diary of Ralph Erskine, Edinburgh, 1834. WILLIAM LEE.

ERSKINE, Thomas, of Linlathen, b. in Edinburgh, Oct. 13, 1788; d. there March 20, 1870. He was educated a lawyer, and practised from 1810 to 1816; but then, succeeding to the family estate at Linlathen, near Dundee, he retired from the bar, and spent the rest of his life in the care of his property, and in literary labor in behalf of his views. He never married. While still a young man, he rebelled at the current Scotch theology, and at length found what he conceived was a better way in which to represent the divine revelation. His views may be thus expressed: the only proper criterion of the truth of Christianity is "its conformity or nonconformity with man's spiritual nature, and its adaptability or nonadaptability to man's universal and deepest spiritual needs." The incarnation of Christ was "the necessary manifestation to man of an eternal sonship in the divine nature, apart from which those filial qualities which God demands from man could have no sanction." Faith as used in the Bible is a "certain moral or spiritual condition which virtually implied salvation, because it implied the existence of a principle of spiritual life possessed of an immortal power. This faith could be properly awakened only by the manifestation, through Christ, of love as the law of life, and as identical with an eternal righteousness which it was God's purpose to bestow on every individual soul" (Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., vol. viii. pp. 530, 531). Such views were not "orthodox," and at first subjected Mr. Erskine to considerable adverse criticism. But they gained favor; and he numbered among his intimate friends some of the finest minds of the century, — Thomas Carlyle, Edward Irving, Frederick Denison Maurice, John McLeod Campbell, Bishop Ewing, and Dean Stanley. Maurice and Campbell were indebted to him for those conceptions of the atonement which have had so great an effect upon later

English and American popular religious thought; and it was Campbell's public advocacy of them which led to his expulsion from the Kirk. Mr. Erskine's theology was part of his life, it permeated his being; and it was his unfailing delight to impress his views upon all he met. His sincerity, his earnestness, his pure and lofty character, gave him a great influence.

Besides minor and fugitive pieces, he wrote (all except one published in Edinburgh): Remarks on the Internal Evidence for the Truth of Revealed Religion, 1820, 3d ed., 1821, reprinted Andover, 1853, new ed., 1871; An Essay on Faith, 1822, 3d ed., 1823; The Unconditional Freeness of the Gospel, 1828, new ed., 1873; The Brazen Serpent, or Life coming from Death, 1831; The Doctrine of Election, London, 1837. There also appeared, posthumously, Spiritual Order and Other Papers, 1871, 2d ed., 1876, and in 1877 two volumes of his letters, edited by Dr. William Hanna, with reminiscences by Dean Stanley and Principal Shairp.

E'SARHAD'DON (Heb. אֶסְרַחְדָּן, LXX. Ἐσάρδαδων and Ἐσαράδαδων, Assyr. Ašsur-ab-iddina, "Assur gave a brother"), son and successor of Sennacherib, was king of Assyria B.C. 681-668. He is named in the Bible, 2 Kings xix. 37 (= Isa. xxxvii. 38), and Ez. iv. 2; see also Tob. i. 21, where he is called Σαρχερόδωρος. It is disputed whether the "King of Assyria" who carried Manasse captive to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11) was Esarhaddon, or his son Asurbanipal, with the probabilities in favor of the latter. The passages in 2 Kings and Isaiah relate Esarhaddon's accession after the murder of Sennacherib by two other sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer. From the latter we learn that the "adversaries of Judah and Benjamin" (Ez. iv. 1) had been brought into Palestine by him. The numerous cuneiform inscriptions dating from his reign give no additional information in regard to the circumstances of his ascending the throne, if we except the account of a battle in the country Hanigalmit or Hanirabbat (perhaps Eastern Cappadocia) against enemies who are believed to have been his patricidal brothers. (Comp. Abydenus, in Euseb., Chron. i. 9. Abydenus calls him Azerdis: Alexander Polyhistor, in Euseb., Chron. i. 5, calls him Asordanes.) The statement of Ez. iv. 2 receives incidental confirmation from an inscription which speaks of his transplanting "inhabitants of the mountains and the sea of the rising sun" (i.e., the Persian Gulf) to the conquered city of Sidon (Cun. Insc. of West. Asia, I. 45, l. 31-33). His records, and those of his son Asurbanipal, represent him, further, as a mighty and sagacious king. One of the earliest acts of his reign was to subjugate Babylon (B.C. 680). Thenceforth he repeatedly designates himself "Ruler of Babylon, King of Sumir and Accad" (Southern and Northern Babylonia). Ptolemy's canon, or list of Babylonian kings, names him as Ἐσάρδαδων, and, in agreement with the inscriptions, assigns him a reign of thirteen years. But, besides this, he waged successful wars against districts of Media, and subdued all Western Asia as far as Cyprus, including Judah, Phœnicia, and Philistia. Cylinders from his reign and that of his son give the names of "twelve kings of the seacoast" and ten kings of Cyprus who paid tribute to him. The list begins "Baal, king of the land of Tyre; Manasseh, king of the land (var. 'city') of Judah; Kausgabri, king of the land (var. 'city') of Edom; Musuri, king of the land (var. 'city') of Moab; Sil-Bel, king of the land (var. 'city') of Gaza," etc. Among the tributaries from Cyprus are the kings of Idalium, Salamis, Paphos, Soli, and Curium. In the latter part of Esarhaddon's reign (subsequent to B.C. 673) he extended his authority over Egypt. He vanquished the powerful Cushite king, Tirhakah, and put an end to the Cushite dominion in Egypt, where he established his own governors. In his later inscriptions he takes the title "King of Egypt and Cush," or "King of the Kings of Egypt and Cush."

Besides these conquests, in which he often showed a wise clemency as well as great military vigor, his reign was marked by splendor at home. He built or rebuilt great palaces, fortresses, and temples, particularly in Nineveh, Calah (Nimroud), and Babylon. The last and greatest of these buildings, the "South-west Palace" at Calah, was unfinished at his death. It shows the influence of Egyptian art in the appearance, for the first time, of sphinxes by the side of the usual colossal bulls and lions. Esarhaddon was succeeded by his son Asurbanipal, probably the "great and noble Asnapper" of Ez. iv. 10.

ESCHATOLOGY, or "the doctrine of the last things," is that branch of theology which concerns itself with the termination of our earthly life, and those things which may lie beyond death. The term may have been derived, like the old designation, De Novissimis, from Jesus Sirach (vii. 36). The expression τὰ ἔσχατα, or "the last things," is of biblical origin (comp. Isa. ii. 2; Mic. iv. 1). This sketch cannot go into a discussion of the particular subjects of eschatology. They will be found treated under their special heads,—APOKATASTASIS, DEATH, HADES, PUNISHMENT, PURGATORY, etc.

The meaning of death, and the question of a future life, have engaged thought at all times; and hardly a people has been found destitute of all belief in a future existence.

The position of the Old Testament on this question has been a matter of dispute. Expositors, from the older Jews and the church fathers down to the present day, have differed as to whether it teaches immortality or not. Israel, in the first instance, turned its hopes not to the destiny of the individual, but to the coming of the Messiah, and the generation living at the time of that coming (Hos. vi. 2; Isa. xxv. 8; Ezek. xxxvii.). Only as a secondary matter is the presentiment introduced of the restoration of the righteous dead, who should participate in the glory of Israel (Isa. xxvi. 19; Dan. xii. 2, 13). God is recognized as having power over death and its kingdom (Deut. xxxii. 39; 1 Sam. ii. 6); and his power over life is the pledge of the immortality of his people (Isa. xl. 28 sqq.; Ps. cii.

27 sqq.). Out of this relation grew the belief in the existence of the individual after death. Such passages, however, as Ps. xvi. 10 sq., xlix. 15, lxxiii. 23 sqq., Job xix. 25-27, do not contain a clear and positive statement of the resurrection, but rather the kernel of hope and presentiment (Oehler and Schultz). The essential points of Old-Testament eschatology are the Messiah and his world-wide kingdom of peace and righteousness, and the sifting judgment upon God's people and against the world that is at enmity with it. In the Apocrypha the national hope of the Messianic coming is intense, and pictured in rich colors; and at the side of this the belief in personal immortality is brought out, which was afterwards so strong among the Pharisees at the time of Christ.

From an eschatological point of view, as in other respects, our Lord did not destroy, but fulfilled. Adopting the expression "kingdom of God," and associating it with his own person, he gives prominence to the expectation of that kingdom, which was so universal among the Jews. He also predicted his second coming, which implies his resurrection. We must notice the construction he gives to the views he takes up. In the parables of the kingdom of heaven he confirms the expectation of a Messianic judgment, but gives to it a purely moral (as opposed to a national) significance (Matt. viii. 11 sqq., xxi. 43, xxii. 1 sqq.). All will be rewarded in the final adjudication, according to their relation to Christ, with full communion with God on the one hand, or unending death (not annihilation) on the other (Matt. vii. 21 sqq., xxv. 31 sqq.). Of individual immortality our Lord speaks expressly only on special occasions, but then bases it upon our union with God (Matt. xxii. 23 sq.). Of this certainty the Gospel of John testifies most positively (iv. 14, v. 24, vi. 39 sq., 50 sq., x. 28, xi. 25 sqq.).

In the writings of the apostles three things are to be noticed: (1) Their first preaching of the gospel gives prominence to eschatological subjects (Acts ii. 17 sqq., iii. 19, x. 42, xvii. 30, 31); (2) The hope of eternal life is associated immediately with the person of a risen Christ, who will return again (1 Cor. xv. 1; Eph. i. 18 sq.; Col. iii. 3, 4; Heb. ix. 28; Jas. v. 7; 1 Pet. i. 7 sqq.; 1 John iii. 2, etc.); (3) This hope reaches out with confidence beyond this earthly development, and the moral distinction between heaven and earth shall be blotted out (1 Cor. xv. 44 sqq.; 2 Pet. iii. 10 sqq.; Rev. xxi. 22).

The Church, in its first period, opposed to heathenism and its pessimistic tendency a renunciation of the world, and a confident assurance of the victory with which it awaits the Lord and prosecutes the evangelization of the world. The second coming of Christ may be called the oldest church dogma (Dorner, Person of Christ). This early Chiliasm looked for an earthly Messianic kingdom. But, while the persecutions were still raging, the Alexandrian school, opposing itself to these worldly conceptions, claimed the future for the moral development of the individual, and affirmed degrees of bliss, the termination of punishment, and universal restoration. After the Church ascended the Roman throne, eschatological questions were made to give way to the burning questions concerning the present. But the Greek Church still held firmly to that notion of the incarnation which makes it the implanting of the germ of eternal life in our nature (Dorner). The Church of the middle ages presumed to have a jurisdiction beyond the grave, and developed the ideas of purgatorial fire. It was this eschatological excrecence of a Pelagianizing hierarchy which gave the external occasion for the Reformation. Four points were taken up in the eschatology of the Protestant confessions, — death, the resurrection, the judgment, and the consummation, — and stress laid upon the intimate connection of the seed of eternal life implanted here, and its perfect development hereafter. Rationalism knew only of a certainty of immortality which was based upon philosophical reasoning, and the prevalence of the belief among different peoples (Wegscheider). This was followed by the pantheistic renunciation of individual immortality. Finally came the triumphant sneer against the future life, as the last enemy of "speculative criticism" (Strauss, Glaubenslehre, § 106 sq.). M. KÄHLER.

ESCOBAR Y MENDOZA, Antonio, b. at Valladolid, 1589; d. July 4, 1669; entered the Society of Jesus in 1604, and acquired a great name both as a preacher and as a writer. His collected works, mostly on morals, comprise forty volumes in folio. The principal are Summula Casuum Conscientiæ, Universæ Theologiæ Moralis Problemata, and Liber Theologiæ Moralis, the last of which appeared in Lyons, 1646, ran through forty editions in the author's lifetime, and has been translated into several foreign languages. His works give the most complete and also the most authoritative representation of the moral system which the Jesuits inculcated; and they far outdo any other attempt of the kind, even the writings of Busenbaum, in the audacious frivolity of their probabilism and the ludicrous subtlety of their casuistry. After passing through the hands of Pascal, Molière, and Boileau, they became an object of scorn, even to devout Roman Catholics; and in French speech the author's name, Escobarierie, is now synonymous with egotism, levity, and licentiousness adroitly covered up with hypocrisy.

ESCORIAL, or ESCURIAL, one of the most remarkable buildings in Europe, — at once a palace, a church, a convent, a mausoleum, and a museum, — is situated twenty-seven miles north-west of Madrid, at an elevation of thirty-five hundred feet above the level of the sea, in a barren and inhospitable waste. It was built by Philip II. (1563-93), in honor of St. Lawrence, on whose day (Aug. 10) the battle of St. Quentin was won (1557). With an allusion to the martyrdom of the saint, the ground-plan of the whole ensemble of buildings shows the form of a gridiron; and, in spite of its splendor and real magnificence, it makes a most gloomy and dismal impression. The church, one of the noblest in Europe, is three hundred and forty feet long, two hundred feet broad, and three hundred and twenty feet high under the dome. The convent houses two hundred monks of the order of the Hieronymites. The picture-gallery contains the masterpieces of Velasquez and Murillo.

ESNIK, b. at Kolp, near Mount Ararat, 397; d., as Bishop of Bagrewand, 478; was a pupil of Sahak and Mesrob; travelled in Mesopotamia, Syria, and Greece, whose language he learnt; took an active part in the conflict between the Christian Church in Armenia, and Parseism, and wrote a book, which is still extant, against various forms of Pagan infidelity and Gnostic heresy. The book was first printed at Smyrna, 1762, and then by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1826. It was translated into French by Le Vaillant de Florival: Réfutation des différentes Sectes, Paris, 1853.

ESPEN, Zeger Bernhard van, b. at Louvain, July 9, 1646; d. at Amersfort, in the diocese of Utrecht, Oct. 2, 1728; studied theology and canon law at the university of his native city, and was appointed professor there of canon law, 1675. As he sided with the Jansenists, his Jus Ecclesiasticum, which appeared at Louvain, 1700, was put on the Index; and he escaped from further persecution only by living in a very quiet and retired manner. Nevertheless, when, in 1723, the chapter of Utrecht elected an archbishop in opposition to the Roman curia, he stepped forward, and defended the election as valid. But he was then compelled to flee from Louvain, and all his works were put on the Index; which condemnation, however, does not seem to have detracted anything from their authority. ESS, van, is the name of two Roman-Catholic priests in Germany, who in modern times have acquired a name as translators of the Bible. — Karl van Ess, b. Sept. 25, 1770, at Warburg, on the Diemel, in the diocese of Paderborn; d. Oct. 22, 1824, at Hnysburg, near Halberstadt; entered the Benedictine abbey of Hnysburg in 1788; was ordained priest in 1791; became prior in 1801, and was, after the secularization of his monastery in 1801, made first pastor of the congregation of Hnysburg, and since 1811 also episcopal commissary for the dioceses of Magdeburg, Halberstadt, and Helmstädt. By the enthusiasm of his cousin Leander he was induced to take part in the translation of the New Testament; but when that movement of nationality and independence, which in the first decade of the present century affected also the relation between the Roman-Catholic Church in Germany and the Pope, subsided, and was followed by a strong ultramontane re-action, he left the enterprise, and seemed to change views. — Leander (properly Johann Heinrich: the other is his monkish name), b. at Warburg, Feb. 15, 1772; d. at Affolderbach, in the Odenwald, Oct. 13, 1817; entered the Benedictine abbey of Marienmünster, in the diocese of Paderborn, in 1790; was ordained priest in 1796; was appointed pastor of Schwalenberg in 1799, and professor of theology in the University of Marburg in 1812, but resigned his position in 1822, and lived thenceforward as a private gentleman. The translation of the New Testament, which he made in connection with his cousin Karl, appeared in 1807 at Brunswick, and ran through many editions. The first part of the translation of the Old Testament did not appear until 1822; the second followed, 1836; and the first edition of the whole Bible was published, 1840, at Sulzbach. He also gave out editions of the Vulgate (1822), the Septuagint (1824), and the Greek text of the New Testament (1827). Persecuted in every way by the Romanists for his zeal in spreading the Bible among laymen, he wrote a number of pamphlets in defence of his views, some of which have a scientific interest, as, for instance, his Geschichte der Vulgata, Tübingen, 1824. His library is now in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City, and is extremely valuable, containing as it does that of the abbey of Marienmünster. It consists of over 13,000 volumes, including 430 incunabula, 1,246 numbers of reformation literature in original editions, 37 manuscripts, about 200 editions of the Vulgate and of German Bibles (the earliest being 1470). It was bought in April, 1838, at the suggestion of Dr. E. Robinson, one of the professors of the seminary.

ESSENCE (Latin essentia, from esse, "to be") denotes that which makes a thing to be what it is. The schoolmen made a distinction between essence and substance, referring the former to the logical combination of qualities expressed in the definition, the latter to the abstract notion of matter underlying all existence. Ancient philosophy, however, did not know this distinction, the Greek ὀυσία denoting at once essence and substance; and so again in modern philosophy.

ESSENES, The. At the time when Christ appeared on earth, Judaism was divided into three religious parties, — the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes. With the first two we are somewhat familiar from the New Testament, but not with the last, who were the object of admiration to Jews, heathens, and Christians, although their admirers are uncertain to this day whether they were Jews, or a school of Jewish proselytes, or, as Eusebius thinks, Christians.

Sources. — The sources from which our information is derived concerning the Essenes are, chiefly, Josephus (Jewish War, II. 8, 2-13; Antiquities, XIII. 5, 9, XV. 10, 4, 5, XVIII. 1, 2-6), Philo (Every virtuous man is free, §§ 12, 13 [Mangey's ed. ii. 457-459] and Apology for the Jews [preserved by Eusebius, Præp. Evang., VIII. 11, also found in Mangey's ed. ii. 632-634]), and Pliny (Nat. Hist., 5, 17). These sources were again made use of by Solinus, Porphyry, Eusebius, Hippolytus, and Epiphanius, all of whom copy either the one or the other.

Name. — As to the name, which is variously written in the Greek, it has provoked countless interpretations. The best is probably that given by Ewald, according to whom it means "the pious;" whilst Lightfoot prefers "the silent ones."

Origin. — As difficult as the explanation of the name is the fixing of the precise date of their origin. The probable date may be derived from Josephus, who assigns their rise to the time when the Pharisees and Sadducees had their origin; that is, in the middle of the second century before Christ. But it is questionable whether they were the outgrowth of Judaism, or whether they stand between Judaism and Hellenism. They were allied to the Pharisees, and yet with very distinctive differences; they were zealous for the law, and yet transgressed it; they were righteous in the spirit of the prophets, and yet more painfully intent than the Pharisees on outward purification. They were Jews, and yet shut themselves out from the nation; servants of Jehovah, and yet praying, like the heathen, to the sun. "They were," as Keim remarks, "like a mosaic picture, with no inward unity, — a phenomenon of religious despair."

Organization and Tenets. — According to Philo and Josephus, the number of the Essenes amounted at their time to more than four thousand, and they lived exclusively in the Holy Land and in the adjoining parts of Syria. But Pliny found the Essenes also on the western side of the Dead Sea, near the city of Engeddi; and, if we may believe Josephus, they were found everywhere. They lived in a separate community, having every thing in common. There existed no distinction among them. They lived peaceably with all men, reprobated slavery and war, and would not even manufacture any martial instruments whatever. They were governed by a president, who was elected by the whole body, and who also acted as judge of the community. All matters of the society were governed by a jury of at least a hundred members. A brother guilty of a gross offence was excommunicated, but received again after due repentance. Celibacy being the rule of the order, the ranks of the brotherhood had to be filled up by recruits from the Jewish community at large. They preferred taking children, whom they educated most carefully, and taught the practices of the order. Every grown-up candidate, upon entering the order, had to cast all his possessions into the common treasury. He then received a copy of the regulations of the brotherhood, a spade to bury the excrement, an apron to be used at lustrations, and a white robe to put on at meals. He was not at once admitted, but had to pass through a novitiate of twelve months, when he was admitted to the lustrations. Then followed another novitiate of two years; and at the end of this period he was admitted to the common meals, after having bound himself by a most solemn oath not to divulge any thing to outsiders, and to be open with the members of the order.

In order not to come in contact with such as did not practise the laws of Levitical purity, the Essenes raised the supplies of all their wants among themselves. Each one of the community took his share of work in the department in which he most excelled. Some were tillers of the ground; others tended flocks, and reared bees; some prepared the food; some made articles of dress: some attended to the sick, and some instructed the young; whilst all of them devoted certain hours to studying the mysteries of nature and revelation, and of the celestial hierarchy. They always got up before the sun rose, and never talked about any worldly matters till they had all assembled together, and, with their faces turned towards the sun, offered up their prayer. This done, every one betook himself to his allotted work. They remained at their work till about eleven o'clock A.M., when they assembled together for a common bath. Having put on their white robes, they entered, with great solemnity, the refectory, to partake of the common meal, which was very simple, consisting chiefly of vegetables. The blessing having been invoked by the priest, the repast commenced. The deepest silence reigned throughout, to be interrupted only by the priest, who concluded the meal by offering thanks; which was the sign of dismissal. Thereupon all withdrew, dressed themselves in their working-dress, resumed their several employments till the evening, when they assembled again in the aforesaid manner to partake of a common meal. Whilst every thing was done according to the directions of the overseers, yet they were at liberty to act as they pleased in relieving the distressed with as much money as they thought proper, and to manifest their compassion for those who were not of the brotherhood as much as they liked and whenever they liked. Such was their mode of living during the week. The Sabbath was observed very strictly. They prepared the food on the previous day in order that no fire need be lighted on the Sabbath, and did not dare to remove a vessel from its place on that day. They even restrained the necessities of the body. The whole day was given up to religious exercises and to exposition of the Scriptures. In the synagogue, as at meals, each one took his seat according to age, in becoming attire. One read aloud out of the law of their land, and the most experienced among them expounded, clothing the mystery in symbols. The others remained quiet, only giving a sign of assent or doubt with the head, the eye, or hand. In their abstention they went even so far as to abstain from anointing the body, which in hot climates is almost a necessity of life.

Theology of the Essenes. — They had a tendency to sun-worship. This tendency is rather a foreign element in Judaism. As has already been indicated above, at daybreak they addressed certain prayers to the sun, "as if entreating him to rise." They were careful, also, to conceal and bury all polluting substances, so as not "to insult the rays of the god." They denied the resurrection of the body, but believed in the immortality of the soul. Whilst they refused to offer sacrifices at Jerusalem, they sent gifts to the temple. They believed in angels; and to conceal the names of the angels was included in the oath taken by the candidate. They studied sacred books, which, however, are not described. They also learnt the qualities of roots and the properties of stones. By means of these and similar studies connected with their lustrations, the Essenes believed to be enabled to foretell the future; and Josephus affirms, that, in their prophecies, they seldom erred, giving some examples of fulfilled prophecies.

The question has been raised, and has been agitated by Continental scholars, whence Essenism derived its foreign influences, which distinguished it from Pharisaic Judaism: for, although most of the peculiarities which distinguish Essenism could be traced back to Judaism, yet there is an alien admixture of foreign elements which could hardly be reconciled with Judaism. Some have regarded the distinctive characteristics of the sect as an offshoot of the Neo-Pythagorean school grafted on the stem of Judaism. This solution is suggested by the statement of Josephus, that "they practise the mode of life which among the Greeks was introduced by Pythagoras." This theory has found its ablest and most persistent advocate in Zeller, who draws out the parallels with great force and precision (Geschichte der Philosophie der Griechen, III. 2, p. 281). This theory of Zeller was objected to by Lightfoot from a chronological and geographical stand-point, showing, on the one hand, the priority of Essenism to Neo-Pythagoreanism, and, on the other hand, that Essenism (having its home on the eastern borders of Palestine, the shores of the Dead Sea) was least of all exposed to the influences of Greek philosophy. Lightfoot is rather inclined to trace the tenets of Essenism back to the influence of Parseeism, and makes his assertion good by drawing out the parallels between both. Which of the two theories is the correct one is hard to decide. This much is certain, that the theories of Jewish and Christian writers who would explain Essenism from a Talmudic stand-point have no foundation at all. Of greater importance, however, is the question as to the relationship between—

Essenism and Christianity.—It has become a common practice with a certain class of Jewish and Christian writers to call Essenism to their aid in accounting for any distinctive features of Christianity. We cannot enter into a refutation of the points of resemblance between Essenism and Christianity adduced by such writers as Graetz and Ginsburg. This theory has been ably treated and refuted by Lightfoot. Suffice it to say that Essenism, notwithstanding all its favorable effect upon individuals, had no influence upon the Jewish people in particular, or upon the world in general. "Essenism," as Keim says, "was, in fact, only an admission of helplessness against the actual state of things, renouncing the attempt to restore all Israel, to which it was opposed as heterodox and impure. . . . In short, the salvation of individuals in the general shipwreck is frankly the watchword of the party. We hear nothing from them of a cry for the kingdom of God, nor for the Messiah, since these were enclosed within their own limits. . . . We may learn from its weakness, that the healing power which arose upon the nation, and, indeed, upon the world, with fresh creative fruitfulness, cannot be counted among the impulses and forces of Essenism."

LIT.—The literature on the Essenes is very rich. Besides what has been enumerated by SCHÜRER (Lehrbuch der Neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, Leipzig, 1874, pp. 599 sq.), see KEIM: The (Greatly enlarged, and with literature added by B. PICK).

G. UHLHORN

ES'THER (star, from the Persian sitareh), the Persian name of the Jewish Hadassah (ii. 7), and the adopted daughter of Mordecai, her cousin. After the deposition of Vashti, her charms won the admiration of Ahasuerus, who chose her above many competitors for his queen. Through her mediation the extermination of the Jews in the Persian Empire was averted, and their bitter enemy, Haman, executed. Esther's patriotism and heroism have won for her a place beside Deborah and Judith in the gratitude of her nation.

Book of. The Book of Esther describes the elevation of Esther to the Persian throne, the overthrow of Haman's scheme for the destruction of the Jews, and Haman's own ignominious death. The scene is laid in Susa, at the court of Ahasuerus (Xerxes). The book opens with the description of a great feast for the princes of the empire (488 B.C.), the deposition of Queen Vashti for refusal to comply with the king's request (i. 12), and the elevation of Esther to the throne. The narrative then dwells upon the power of the prime minister Haman, his wounded pride at the refusal of Mordecai to bend before him, and his plot to exterminate all the Jews in the empire, out of revenge (iii. 6). He secured a decree to this end; and the Pur, or lot for its execution, fell on the thirteenth day of Adar (iii. 7). The wariness of Mordecai, and Esther's influence over the emperor, were used to secure counter-legislation, whereby the evil effects of the irreversible decree were averted (v. 6). The Oriental monarch now changes his mind towards Haman himself, and orders him to be hung on the gallows he had erected for Mordecai (vii. 9). At this point, with the humiliation of Haman's haughty pride and the deliverance of the people by the counter-decree, the story culminates. The book closes with the appointment of a national festival to commemorate the deliverance, and a notice of the advancement of Mordecai to Haman's place of power. The whole narrative is told with consummate dramatic skill. It gives a striking illustration of patriotism, a terrible warning against pride and contempt for inferiors, and shows how the self-sacrificing devotion of the heroine fits in with the workings of Divine Providence to defeat the plot of the enemy.

The authorship has been attributed to Morde-cai (Clement of Alexandria), Ezra (Augustine), and Joiakim, the high priest. These names are nothing more than conjectures. But the references to Ahasuerus and Mordecai (comp. i. 1 sqq., x. 1 sqq.) make it necessary that the work should have been written after their death. As to the time of composition, we can only speak with probability. Eichhorn, Keil, and others put it in the reign of Artaxerxes I. (464-425 B.C.); but the style rather points to the Greek period (about 325 B.C.). [Rawlinson fixes upon 444-434 B.C. as the date. That the author wrote in Persia is made very probable by the accuracy of the references to Persian customs, and the absence of all allusion to Palestine.]

The authenticity has been questioned, but without good reason. The allusions to Persian manners are minute and accurate. The luxurious habits and capricious temper of Xerxes are in exact accord with the portraiture of secular history. The great assembly of his princes, recorded in chap. i., agrees with the statement of Herodotus, that the king began to make preparations for his Grecian campaign in the third year of his reign. That Herodotus does not mention Esther (for Amestris cannot be identified with her) offers no difficulty when we remember that Persian monarchs did not limit themselves to one wife. But an irrefutable argument for the truth of the narrative is the Feast of Purim, which commemorates the facts, and is inexplicable on any other hypothesis than that they occurred.

The religious character of the work has from the earliest times been the subject of unfavorable criticism. It makes not a single mention of God by name, and yet mentions the Persian monarch a hundred and eighty-seven times. Luther speaks of its marked Judaistic features, and its heathen frivolity, and thought it unworthy of a place in the canon. Others have spoken of the spirit of national revenge and pride which pervades it (De Wette). But, in spite of these criticisms, the book is not irreligious in tone. The fast which Esther orders, and the heroic words of Mordecai, indicate the very opposite (iv. 14-16). The latter's refusal to bow down before Haman was based upon his regard for the Jewish law. And, if the religious allusions are few, this is due to the fear of profaning the sacred in a book which was to be read at joyous feasts. The canonicity of Esther was at one time questioned in the Jewish Church, as we infer from the conduct of the eighty-five elders in opposing the observance of the Feast of Purim. In the early Greek Church it was placed by some (e.g., Athanasius) amongst the Apocrypha; but the Latin Church always held it to be canonical.

In the Septuagint Esther appears with apocryphal additions, which were no doubt made by some Hellenistic Jew. They bear on their face the marks of being spurious, inaccurate as their references to Persian customs are, and designed as their frequent mention of the name of God is, to give to the original work a specifically religious character.

ETHELBERT, or ÆTHELBERHT, d. Feb. 24, 616; king of Kent 560-616, and, since 593, bretwalda among the Anglo-Saxon kings; married Bertha, a daughter of Charibert, king of Paris, and allowed her to practise her own Christian religion at the old Roman-British Church of St. Martin, in Canterbury, under the guardianship of her bishop, Liudhard, but seems to have taken no further interest in the peculiar faith of his wife. When Augustine, however, landed at the Isle of Thanet in 597, he was well received by Ethelbert, who was converted and baptized in the very same year; and it seems that Ethelbert henceforward used all his influence as king and bretwalda for the promotion of Christianity. He removed the royal residence to Reculver (Regulbium), and left Canterbury to Augustine; he aided in the rebuilding of the old Roman church, and himself built a large monastery (St. Augustine) outside the walls of Canterbury; and, among the ninety dooms and decrees of his which are extant (THORPE: Ancient Laws and Institutes of England), one makes provision for the security of the property of the church and the ecclesiastical officials. He issued (600) the earliest code of Anglo-Saxon laws now extant. He founded the see of Canterbury (602) and that of Rochester (604).

ETHELDREDA, St., a daughter of the East Anglian king, Anna, made a vow that she would remain a virgin, and kept her word, though she was twice married, first to Tondbert, an East-Anglian prince, who died shortly after the marriage, and then to Egfrid, King of Northumbria, from whom she was divorced. After the divorce had taken place (671), she retired to the Isle of Ely, where she led a life of severe asceticism, and died from the plague, June 23, 679. See BUTLER: Lives of Saints, June 23.

ETHERIDGE, John Wesley, a Methodist Orientalist; b. at Grangewood, near Newport, Isle of Wight, Feb. 24, 1804; d. at Camborne, May 24, 1866. Although not a university man, he made himself master of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, French, and German. He was nearly all his life a circuit preacher, yet found time to prepare valuable books showing biblical and linguistic learning. In 1848 he received the degrees of M.A. and Ph.D. from the University of Heidelberg. His chief works are Horæ Aramæicæ, comprising Concise Notices of the Aramæan Dialects in General, and of the Versions of Holy Scripture Extant in them, with Translations of St. Matthew and Epistle to the Hebrews, from the Ancient Peshito Version, London, 1843; The Syrian Churches, their Early History, Liturgies, and Literature, London, 1846 (contains a translation of the four Gospels from the Peshitto); The Apostolical Acts and Epistles, from the Peshito, or Ancient Syriac, to which are added the Remaining Epistles and the Book of Revelation, after a Later Syriac Text, translated with Prolegomena and Indices, London, 1849; Jerusalem and Tiberias: Sora and Cordora, a Survey of the Religious and Scholastic Learning of the Jews, designed as an Introduction to the Study of Hebrew Literature, London, 1856; The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan Ben Uzziel on the Pentateuch, with the Fragments of the Jerusalem Targum, from the Chaldee, London, 1862-65, 2 vols. He wrote also Lives of Adam Clarke (London, 1858, N.Y., 1860) and Thomas Coke (London, 1860). See THORNLEY SMITH: Memoir of Rev. John Wesley Etheridge, London, 1871.

ETHICS, from the Greek ἠθός, which, besides the objective element (customs, habits, the Latin mores, whence disciplina moralis), also includes a subjective element, a conscious feeling at home in the customs, an approval by conscience of the habits, which transforms the merely mechanical routine into responsible action, and elevates the merely instinctive disposition to character.

Ethics is the science of conduct; Christian ethics, the scientific representation of the truths of Christianity in their practical application to individual life as duties and ideals. (Philosophical ethics, see MORAL PHILOSOPHY.) In the science of divinity considered as an organic whole ethics occupies a position of its own as one part of systematic theology. From exegesis and church history it is distinguished by its very object; for it is neither a demonstration of what, according to the authentic documents of the divine revelation, is true Christianity, nor a record of what, in the course of history, has vindicated itself as such, but an exposition, with respect to a peculiar sphere, — the sphere of conduct, — of Christianity as the highest truth. Less distinct is its relation to dogmatics, which forms the other part of systematical theology. At one time it was treated as a mere appendix to dogmatics; at another it was fairly in the way to entirely supersede it. In general, however, the relation between dogmatics and ethics may be defined as that between the theoretical and practical aspects of the same thing; not that ethics has no theoretical interest, and dogmatics no practical bearing; on the contrary, the connection between them is a deep, reciprocal interdependence.

Rich materials for a Christian ethics are found in the writings of the apostolical fathers, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Barnabas, Hermas. They refer mostly to individual life, often also to married life and the family, and sometimes to the church (Ignatius, Hermas, Clemens Romanus). Still more deeply Tertullian penetrated into the subject in his numerous ethical writings, — De spectaculis, De velandis virginibus,

De monogamia, De pœnitentia, etc., — everywhere expounding his peculiar conception of Christianity as a spiritual power which shall keep aloof from the Pagan world, organize its children into a compact army, attack Paganism in closed ranks, conquer it, judge it. Starting from quite a different conception of Christianity, and not at all afraid of adopting elements of Greek philosophy, Clemens Alexandrinus develops a number of striking ethical ideas in his Pædagogus, Stromata, Exhortation to the Pagans, etc. To him Christianity is a spiritual power, which certainly raises the soul far above any epicurean eudæmonism, or stoical apathy, or merely negative asceticism, but whose proper task it is to get itself naturalized in the world, to penetrate its every fibre, to regenerate it. With Cyprian (De ecclesiæ unitate, De observatione disciplinæ, etc.) the church comes into prominence in the sphere of ethics, not simply as governing Christian life, legislating for it, influencing it in many various ways, but as the very centre of the whole field of ethics: to every Christian individual his relation to the church now becomes the principal ethical relation of his life. The full realization of this idea was the result of a long development; but in this development Cyprian occupies a central position. His views were the natural outcome of the Montanist and the Novatian movements; and they reached their perfection by Augustine's victory over the Donatists. While the Montanists accepted the sudden outbursts of individual enthusiasm as the true medium through which the Holy Spirit communicates with the congregation, and consequently demanded absolute obedience to the dictates of this ecstatic prophecy as a condition of communion between the spirit and the individual, the Novatians found the true vehicle of spiritual communion in the church itself considered as a totality, as an organization of the universal priesthood under presbyterial forms; and they were consequently very rigorous with respect to admission to membership. Cyprian opposed both parties, and did so in favor of the hierarchical development of the idea of the church. Though he asserted the possibility of a second penance, and rejected the possibility of a church of saints, he agreed with the Novatians in the holiness of the church as a totality; but this totality he found represented by the episcopacy, which, in its nature and essence, is one and undivided, though in reality it is distributed over a plurality of individuals. With this idea of the episcopacy as the true expression of the unity of the church, he turned upon the Montanists, and opposed to their abrupt, sporadic, and incidental ecstasies the sacrament of ordination as the true medium of communion between the spirit and the church. He did not go the full length, however, of his own argument. He never dared assert that infallibility and personal holiness followed as necessary effects of the sacrament. He demanded blind obedience to the bishop, but he granted that the congregation might expel an unholy and unworthy bishop. He stopped in a self-contradiction. The Council of Nicaea led the way out of this contradiction by basing the infallibility of the church, its inspiration, not upon the individual bishop, but upon the collective episcopacy, the œcumenical council; and when the Donatists, nevertheless, vehemently urged the holiness of the bishop as an absolute condition of the holiness of the church, Augustine was naturally led to object, that, in that case, the whole idea was reduced to something merely subjective, and quite impalpable. It is not necessary, he said, that the sacrament of ordination shall confer personal infallibility and personal holiness on the ordained: it is sufficient, when it gives authority in teaching, efficacy in the administration of the sacraments, and power to govern the congregation; for the church is holy, not on account of the holiness of its members, but because it is a divine institution: its holiness is impersonal. Thereby the foundation was laid for the hierarchical fabric soon to be reared, and thereby the ethical relation between the church and the individual was fixed in a manner soon to become strikingly apparent; for the more vigorously the church developed as a divine institution, a holy state, the more closely its ethics assumed the aspect of a criminal code. A new, so-called higher virtue, with the character of a pre-eminently negative asceticism, and blooming forth in monasticism, virginity, poverty, etc., became the real focus of Christian life, and found in the penitential its true literary expression. Ethical studies, in the broader and sounder sense of the word, were few and far between; nor do they generally evince any marked originality. Ambrose, De officiis (comp. J. Daseke, Cicerois et Ambrosii de officiis Libri III., etc., Augsburg, 1875); Gregory the Great, Magna Moralia; Martin of Bracara, Formula honestæ vitæ; Alcuin, De virtutibus et vitiis; Paschasius Radbertus, De fide, spe, et caritate — that is about all produced down to the time of Thomas Aquinas. On the other hand, the so-called Libri Penitentiales (that is, collections of disciplinary precepts extracted from the apostolical constitutions, the fathers, and the canons of the councils) were innumerable: some of the most prominent are those made by Johannes Jejunator, Fulgentius Ferrandus, Cresconius, Theodorus Cilix, Bede, and Rhabanus Maurus.

The ethics of the mediæval mystics is also ascetic, but the asceticism is there of another and higher type. By John Scotus Erigena the Greek mysticism — represented by Makarius the Egyptian, Dionysius Areopagita, and Maximus Confessor — was introduced into the Latin world, and became the starting-point of the mysticism of the Western Church, both in its Romanic form (Hugo and Richard of St. Victor, Bernard of Clairvaux, Bonaventura, Gerson, Molino) and in its Germanic form (Suso, Ruysbroeck, Tauler, Eckart). So far as this mysticism developed an ethics, the principle of the false asceticism was retained. The contradiction between finite and infinite, matter and spirit, world and God, was left standing. To escape from the finite, to die away from the world, to crush the flesh, was still considered the only true ethical process. But to this mere negation was added a positive object, — to be absorbed by the infinite, to arrive at spiritual freedom, to live in God; and thereby the mainspring of Christian ethics was actually touched. When, nevertheless, the mediæval mystics failed to produce a true ethics, the reason was that they lacked that conception of the human personality which achieves a perfect union of finite and infinite by means of the created soul's capability to receive the divine. — an idea which first obtained full scope in Luther's doctrine of faith and justification by faith. Alongside with the mystics — who, in spite of all shortcomings, form the real sap-carrying vesicles both of ethics and dogmatics during the middle ages — the scholastics went their own way, in some respects continuators, they too, of asceticism, though generally more deeply engaged in other directions. After the example of Petrus Lombardus, they used to incorporate a certain amount of ethical materials with their dogmatical sententiæ and summe. To the four philosophical virtues — justitia, fortitudo, moderatio, et sapientia — the three theological virtues were added, — faith, hope, and charity; thus making the sacred seven full. The internal relation, however, between these two groups of virtues always remained somewhat vague. The best treatment which the subject found among the schoolmen was that by Thomas Aquinas, in his Prima et secunda secundæ, which became the model for all later Roman-Catholic ethics. But, besides these products of the theoretical interest of the scholastic philosophy, the practical wants of the confessional called forth a luxuriant ethical literature of quite another type, the so-called casuistry. (See article.)

When the Reformation took its final stand upon Scripture, it not only escaped the great errors of the middle ages, but it also succeeded in establishing the true principles of Christian ethics. By the new doctrines of faith, and justification by faith, the fundamental ethical ideas of duty, virtue, and highest good, were, so to speak, melted down and recast. A new ethics appeared, bearing the characteristic marks of the double development of the Protestant or evangelical principle. — the Lutheran Church, with its talent for plastic representation, art, hymnology, science; and the Reformed Church, with its talent for practical action, discipline, missions, statesmanship. Though neither Luther nor Calvin has written on ethics, in the proper sense of the word, both have occasionally treated of various ethical subjects, such as prayer, oath, marriage, civil authority, etc., especially in the form of expositions of the Decalogue in the Catechism. The Catechism is, indeed, the primitive form of evangelical ethics. Just as evangelical dogmatics arose from the regula fidei and the apostolical symbolum, so evangelical ethics grew out of the Decalogue. The religious relations of ethics were treated under the first three Commandments, — more especially the doctrines of worship, prayer, and devotion, under the third, — family, education, school, state, and civil authority, under the fourth; the duties towards our neighbors, temperance, care of the body, also the question of capital punishment, under the fifth; marriage and chastity, under the sixth; property and honor, under the seventh and eighth. Even the scientific writers retained for a long time this form; as, for instance, David Chytræus (Virtutum descriptiones, 1555), Paul von Eitzen (Ethica doctrina libri II., 1571), Lambert Danaeus (Ethices Christiana, Geneva, 1577). Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the evangelical churches, especially the Lutheran Church, in the beginning, showed a lack of fertility in the field of ethical science; and the reason seems to have been a certain awkwardness in the establishment of the true relation between philosophical and theological ethics. The new principle was obtained in the doctrines of faith, and justification by faith. Materials were plentifully at hand in the works of the ancient philosophical ethics; but the evangelical theologians felt a certain shyness when applying the new principle to the old materials, and for some time this, the most fertile of all ethical principles, was left in a state of lonesome grandeur, like a king without subjects. Melancthon, in his Philosophia moralis (1539) and Enaratio aliquot librorum Aristotelis (1545), derived his whole system from general human consciousness and philosophical knowledge, without attempting to give to Christian ethics an entirely new shape by the application of the principle of faith. In his Systema ethica (Geneva, 1614), Keckermann places the philosophical ethics after the theological, as the practical part. The theological ethics deals only with vita interior, the bonum gratia, the vir pius et religiosus; the philosophical, only with the bonum civile, the felicitas civilis, the vir probus et honestus. Less mechanical was Calixtus, in his Epitome theologiæ moralis, Helmstädt, 1631. He distinguishes between philosophical and theological ethics by distinguishing between a natural and a supernatural law; but he defines both laws as eternal, and ascribes to human nature an ineffaceable right within Christianity, and to Christianity an internal affinity to human reason. What was needed as a preparation for a completely harmonious union of the philosophical and theological principles in ethics was an independent development of each of them; and a development in that direction—in the direction of the emancipation of the philosophical principle—began with Hugo Grotius, Puffendorf, and Thomasius. In his De jure pacis et belli (Paris, 1625), Grotius defines the highest good, and the duty therein involved, as the weal of the community. His antagonist, Schomer, proposed as the fundamental ethical maxim, Follow Reason and her innate ideas. Lorenz von Mosheim finally introduced the principle of happiness in ethics, and thereby opened the long series of eudæmonistic attempts. On the other hand, Buddeus (Institutiones theologiæ moralis, 1711), J. F. Reuss (Elementa theologiæ moralis, 1767), and C. A. Crusius (Moraltheologie, Leipz., 1772), developed the principle of faith as the true principle of Christian ethics, defining the highest good as the kingdom of heaven, though placing the kingdom of heaven beyond the earth.

A philosophical ethics, truly deserving the name, was first founded, however, by Kant (Kritik d. prak. Vernunft, Metaphysik der Sitten, etc.). Ethics then became severed from religion by the autonomy of the individual; but an end was put forever to the flat eudæmonism of the ethics of the Wolffian school. The subjectivism of Kant having reached its last consequences in Fichte, philosophy turned with Schelling once more towards objectivism; and on this basis of identity of subject and object Schleiermacher became the founder of modern theological ethics. He returned to the old idea of the kingdom of heaven as the highest good,—an idea which had entirely disappeared from the ethics of the Wolffian and Kantian schools,—but without adopting either the definition of Buddeus, as an indefinite realm beyond the grave, or the definition of the Roman-Catholic moralists, as a ready-made institution on earth,—the Church. The kingdom of heaven he found produced and reproduced in every sphere of human life—church, state, science, art, family, marriage, etc.—by the virtuous action of the individual. In his Monologen (1800) he set forth a multitude of new ethical ideas; and in his Grundlinien einer Kritik der bisherigen Sittensysteme (1803) he approached the centre of the subject. In 1819 he wrote for the Berlin Academy several spirited essays (Ueber den Tugendbegriff, Pflichtbegriff, etc.); but his complete system did not appear until after his death, edited by Twisten and A. Schweizer (1835). Harless (Christliche Ethik, 1842 [translated by Morrison, Edinburgh, 1868]) is not strictly scientific in method, and returns to a pre-Kantian stand-point. After Schleiermacher, the greatest production of evangelical theology in the field of ethics is, no doubt, Richard Rothe's Theologische Ethik (Wittenberg, 1845–48, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1867). Rothe was at once a pupil of Schleiermacher and Hegel. In his Rechtsphilosophie Hegel had established the State as the highest good, in direct opposition to the doctrine of the Roman-Catholic ethics; and this idea Rothe retained, making it the object of the Church, so to speak, to resolve itself into the State. Beside Rothe must be mentioned Schmid (Christliche Sittenlehre, ed. by A. Heller, Stuttgart, 1861, noticeable especially for its development of the idea of the law). Strongly polemical, both against Schleiermacher and Rothe, is Wuttke (Handbuch der christlichen Sittenlehre, 3d ed., Leipzig, 1874, 2 vols. [translated by Lacroix, N.Y., 1873, 2 vols.], giving in the first part of first volume an interesting survey of the history of ethics). Noticeable are also the works of A. von Oettingen (Die Moralstatistik u. die christliche Sittenlehre, Erlangen, 1872 seq., 2 vols.); J. Chr. von Hoffmann (Theologische Ethik, Nördlingen, 1878) and H. Martensen (Den christelige Ethik, Copenhagen, 1871–78, 3 vols., Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1873–82, 3 vols.); though both are of a somewhat more popular character.

The ethics of the Roman-Catholic Church continued, from the middle ages down to the eighteenth century, to run along in the two above described parallel lines,—scholasticism and mysticism. The peculiar legalism of the former is often apparent from the very title of their works,—De jure et justitia (Joh. de Lugo; Dominicus a Soto). Among the principal representatives of the latter are Bellarmine, St. Theresa, Francis of Sales, Molinos, Pascal, Arnault, Nicole Perrault. But, when the quietism of Molinos was condemned, the whole mystical branch of Roman-Catholic ethics withered, and the Jesuits were left alone in the field. They lost, however, all hold on public confidence by their doctrine of probabilism, by their attack on Port Royal, and by the merely mechanical method of their ethics. But from the philosophy the Roman-Catholic, like the evangelical moralists, received powerful and fertile impulses during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; from the Wolffian school, Luby, Schwazhüber, Schanza, Stadler; from the Kantian school, Wanker, Mutschelle, Hermes, Elvenich, Vogelsang; from Fichte, Geishüttner; from Schelling, C. Weiller. More independent are Michael Sailer (Handbuch der christ. Moral, 1831), Werner (System der christ. Ethik, Ratisbon, 1850-52, 3 vols.), Palasthy (Theologia Morum Catholica, Buda, 1861, 4 vols.), and Simar (Lehrbuch d. kath. Moraltheologie, Bonn, 1867, giving a survey of the history of Roman-Catholic ethics).

ETHIOPIC VERSION. See BIBLE VERSIONS, VII.

ETHNARCH (ἔθναρχης, "ruler of a nation") was the title of a ruler or prince, who, though not fully independent, or possessed of royal power, nevertheless governed his people according to their national laws. It was specially applicable to the Jews, after their relations with the Romans had begun, and several of their rulers bore it; as, for instance, Simon (1 Macc. xiv. 47), his son Hyrcanus (Josephus, Arch., 14, 8, 5), and Archelaus, the son and successor of Herod. It was, however, also applied among other nations. Thus King Aretas had settled an ethnarch at Damascus (2 Cor. xi. 32).

ETSHMIADZIN, or ECHMIEDZIN, a famous Armenian monastery, situated fifteen miles west of the city of Erivan, in Asiatic Russia. It was founded in 524, contains a valuable library, is the seat of the Catholicos, or patriarch of the whole Armenian Church.

ETTWEIN, John, a Moravian bishop; b. at Freudenstadt, Württemberg, June 29, 1721; d. Jan. 2, 1802. In 1754 he emigrated to America, and labored efficiently as evangelist and bishop. In 1772 he led the Christian Indians from Susquehanna County in Pennsylvania to the Tuscarawas in Ohio. He enjoyed friendly intercourse with Washington, and devoted himself to the care of the sick soldiers in the general army hospital at Bethlehem, Penn. In 1784 he was appointed a bishop. In 1787 he founded the Society of the United Brethren for Propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, to which Congress granted several townships on the Tuscarawas, in trust, for the Christian Indians.

EUCHARIUS was, together with Valerius and Maternus, sent by the apostle Peter across the Alps to preach the gospel in the Valley of the Rhine, and occupied the episcopal chair of Treves for twenty-five years. According to the criticism of the Bollandists he belongs to the second half of the third century; and the legends of his missions and miracles are mere fables.

EUCHELAION, in the Greek Church, is the "prayer oil," consecrated by seven priests, and used for the unction of the sick. It is counted one of the seven sacraments of the church, and corresponds to the extreme unction of the Roman Church, but is not limited to cases of mortal illness. See EXTREME UNCTION.

EUCHERIUS, St., d. about 450; was b. at Lyons, of a distinguished family, and was a senator, and married; when, in 422, he entered the monastery of Lerinum, and became a monk. He afterwards retired to the Island of Lero (St. Marguerite), where he lived as a hermit till 434, when he was elected Bishop of Lyons. He has left several works, among which are Epistola de contentu mundi et secularis philosophiæ (edited by Rosweid, Antwerp, 1621), Epistola de laude eremi (edited by Rhenanus, Basel, 1516, and by Erasmus, Basel, 1520), Liber formularum spiritualium (ed. Pauly, Graz, 1884), etc. There are collected editions by BRASSICANUS (Basel, 1531), also in Biblioth. Patr. Max. (Lyons, Tom. VI.), and in Migne, Patrol. Lat., vol. 50, containing, however, many spurious writings. See A. MELLIER: De vita et scriptis sancti Eucherii, Lyons, 1878; A. GOULLARD: Saint Eucher, Lérins et l'église de Lyon au I^e siècle, Lyons, 1881.

EUCHITES. See MESSALIANS.

EUCHOLOGION (εὐχολόγιον, "collection of prayers") is in the later Greek Church the common name for books on liturgy, and rituals. It occurs for the first time in the writings of Anastasius Sinaita (Quest. 141) in the sixth century, but is afterwards very frequent in the liturgical works of the Byzantines. Numerous manuscripts of books of this kind, in which the Greek Church was much richer than the Latin, are found in the libraries of Vienna, Rome (Bibliotheca Barberina), Paris, Venice, and the monasteries of Mount Athos. A series of printed editions have appeared at Venice since 1526 (1544, 1553, 1570, etc.); but the best and most complete edition is that by Jacobus Goar, Paris, 1645.

EUDEMONISM. See EPICUREANISM.

EUDES, Jean, founder of the Eudists; b. at Mezerai, in Normandy, Nov. 14, 1601; d. at Caen, Aug. 19, 1680; was educated by the Jesuits at Caen; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in Paris, 1623; was ordained priest in 1625; labored among the plague-stricken people of Normandy and as a missionary among the clergy; was in 1639 made superior of the House of the Oratorians at Caen, but was shortly after called to Paris by Cardinal Richelieu, for the purpose of founding an ecclesiastical seminary. This plan was foiled by the death of the cardinal; but, on the advice of several bishops, Eudes, nevertheless, left his order, and founded an independent congregation—the Eudists, or the Congregation of Jesus and Mary—for the education of priests and for missions among the clergy. The congregation, however, never attained any great importance. During the storms of the Revolution it was dissolved. In 1826 it was re-established. It has a college in Indiana. HERZOG.

EUDOCIA, Empress, wife of Theodosius II.; was b. at Athens; the daughter of a sophist; came while very young to Constantinople, where she captivated not only Pulcheria, but also her brother, with her accomplishments; was baptized, and married to the emperor, 413 or 421. The latter part of her married life was clouded, however, by some misunderstanding between her and her husband; and she lived, separated or divorced, in Palestine. Photius mentions several works by her, — a paraphrase in verse of the Pentateuch, Joshua, etc.; a poem on the martyrdom of St. Cyprian, etc., — and he praises them much; but they have not come down to us. She is also said to have finished the Centones Homerici of Patricius, — a life of Christ composed of verses, or fragments of verses, of Homer, printed at Frankfurt, 1541, Paris, 1578, and Leipzig, 1793.

EUDOXIA, Empress, wife of Arcadius; descended from a Frankish family; was married to the emperor, April 27, 395, and d. Nov. 6, 404. The origin of the enmity between her and Chrysostom is not clear, but she caused his banishment in 403. The horror which seized the inhabitants of Constantinople on account of an earthquake compelled her to recall him; but his denunciations of the Pagan chants and dances which accompanied the inauguration of her silver statue, raised in front of the Church of St. Sophia, exasperated her to such a degree, that she caused him to be banished a second time. See CHRYSOSTOM.

EUDOXIUS was made Bishop of Germanicia, on the confines of Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, in 331, Bishop of Antioch in 347, and finally Patriarch of Constantinople in 360. He died in 370. He was a full-blooded Arian, a disciple of Aëtius, a friend of Eunomius, and the leader of the Anomœan party. Baronius calls him the worst of all the Arians.

EUGENIUS is the name of four popes. — Eugenius I. (Aug. 10, 651–June 1, 657) was a weak character, who for the sake of peace, and in order to escape the fate of his predecessor, Martin I., who had been sent in banishment by the emperor to the Thracian Chersonesus, made an agreement with Pyrrhus, Patriarch of Constantinople, and leader of the Monothelites, on the basis that Christ had neither one nor two wills, but three (unam super duas), — a compromise worthy of a farce. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Rom.; BOWER: History of the Popes, III. 70. — Eugenius II. (June, 824–August, 827) submitted with good grace to the imperial sway which Louis the Pious still exercised over the Church, in imitation of his father. Louis sent his son Lothair to Rome with an army, to establish order and peace in the city; and the decrees of a council which he convened at Paris (November, 825), and which decided the question of image-worship in the same spirit as the synod of Frankfurt, were accepted and confirmed by Eugenius, though without exercising any influence on the practice of the Roman Church. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Rom. — Eugenius III. (Feb. 18, 1145–July 8, 1153) was a monk from Cîteaux, and a pupil of St. Bernard of Clairvaux. Immediately after his election, the Roman people rose, and demanded that he should content himself with the spiritual authority, and renounce all secular power. He fled to Viterbo, laid interdict upon the rebellious city, and succeeded in returning in 1146. But in the mean time Arnold of Brescia had begun his stirring agitations; and Eugenius was compelled to flee a second time. Over Siena and Brescia he went to Treves, and thence to Paris, accompanied by St. Bernard, holding synods and conferences, and enjoying a good reception everywhere. By the aid of Roger of Sicily he was enabled to return to Rome in 1149; but in the beginning of 1150 he left the city again, driven away by the Republicans. He afterwards lived mostly at Segni. The principal event of his reign was the second crusade. His letters are found in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom.; the sources of his life, in WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vita, II. — Eugenius IV. (March 3, 1431–Feb. 23, 1447) began his reign by stirring up the hatred of the family of Colonna against him. The Colonnas fled; and in the war which he waged, in connection with Florence and Venice, against Milan and Naples, they took the side of his enemies. One province of the Papal States was conquered after the other. In Rome rebellion broke out, and (June 4, 1433) Eugenius fled in disguise to Florence. But the greatest danger to him was the Council of Basel, opened Aug. 27, 1431. It first assumed the character of an episcopal aristocracy, and then changed into an ecclesiastical democracy; but under both forms it was in decided opposition to the Pope. Eugenius tried to dissolve it (1437), but failed. The council deposed him, and set up an antipope, Felix V. Meanwhile, Eugenius succeeded in convening a more tractable council at Ferrara (1438), which the following year was transferred to Florence; and the refractory council of Basel, and its antipope, gradually sank into insignificance. In his warfare he also experienced a change of fortune, especially after he abandoned his old allies, the republics, and united himself with his old enemies, the monarchies. In 1443 he was enabled to return to Rome. See BOWER, Hist. of the Popes, VII. 238, and the sources to the history of the Council of Basel. G. VOIGT.

EUGIPPIUS, or EUCYPPIUS, a monk of Italian descent; lived for some time in the monastery of St. Severinus, near Fabiane, in Noricum; returned after the death of the saint, and carrying his remains with him, to Castrum Lucullanum, near Naples, and wrote (in 511) a Vita St. Severini, often printed, best by Friedrich, at the end of the first volume of his Kirchengesch. Deutschlands. Besides this work, which is invaluable for the first period of the church history of Germany, he also compiled a Thesaurus ex D. Augustini Operibus, Basel, 1512; wrote monastic rules, etc. See Opera, ed. Knoell, Wien, 1885.

EUEMERUS, a Greek philosopher who flourished about 300 B.C.; was the originator of that principle of interpreting the Pagan mythology according to which each myth is supposed to have developed from some simple historical event as its kernel. This principle of interpretation, Euhemerism, was afterwards much in favor with Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Lactantius, Chrysostom, and others of the church fathers. Of the works of Euhemerus, nothing has come down to us but a fragment of a Latin translation by Ennius.

EULALIUS was put up as antipope against Boniface I. (in 118), after the death of Zosimus, by a minority of the clergy of Rome, and the city prefect, Symmachus. The emperor convened a council to decide the question, and ordered the two contenders meanwhile to leave the city. Boniface obeyed; but Eulalius did not, and was consequently banished from the city by the emperor. He was afterwards made Bishop of Nepe, and kept quiet during the reign of Boniface I. After the death of the latter the friends of Eulalius wished him to step forward and try to enforce his claims; but he declined.

EULOGIA (εὐλογία), properly fine, sonorous speech, then praise, benediction, consecration. Thus the formulas with which the liturgical materials were consecrated, or the benediction of the congregation spoken by the bishops and presbyters, were called "eulogiæ." From many passages in the works of Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, etc., it appears, that, up to the fifth century, eulogia was used synonymously with eucharistia, probably referring to Paul's words (1 Cor. x. 16); but after that time it was confined to the consecrated bread which the participants of the Lord's Supper brought home with them to sick persons or absent friends.

EULOGIUS OF CORDOVA was elected Archbishop of Toledo in 858, but by the Moors prevented from entering upon the duties of his office. He was a zealous champion of Christianity in its contest with Mohammedanism, and was beheaded March 11, 859, because he had been instrumental in the conversion of a young Moorish girl. His writings, among which his Memoriale Sanctorum sive Libri III. de Martyribus Cordubensibus occupies the chief place, were first printed by Peter Pontius Leo at Complutum, 1574. They are found, together with the commentaries of Ambrosius de Morales, in Andreas Schott's Hispania Illustrata, IV., and, together with his life by his friend Alvarus of Cordova, in Migne, Pat. Lat., CXV. See BAUDISSION: Eulogius und Alvarus, Leipzig., 1872. KLÜPFEL.

EUNOMIUS and the EUNOMIANS. Eunomius, b. at Dacora, in Cappadocia, near Altisiris, on the Galatian frontier; d. there about 392; came in 356 to Alexandria to study under Aëtius, whose pupil and amanuensis he became. He was an honest and robust but dry and mechanical nature; and in the most extreme Arianism — that of Aëtius and the Anomæans — he found exactly what he sought. In 358 he accompanied Aëtius to the Arian Council convened at Antioch by Eudoxius. The Semi-Arians were in power; and through various intrigues they succeeded in getting Aëtius banished to Pepuza, and Eunomius to Migde; while Eudoxius, retiring before the storm, retreated into his native Armenia. Eudoxius, however, understood how to ingratiate himself with Constantius; and in 359 he was made Patriarch of Constantinople. Aëtius he could not or would not re-instate; but Eunomius was recalled, and made Bishop of Cyzicus, 360. He remained there four years. In the beginning he refrained, at the instance of Eudoxius, from openly proclaiming his extreme Arian views; but hypocrisy was not his vice, and the contempt he felt for people who were not of his opinion soon made him forget all prudence. The inhabitants of Cyzicus repeatedly and bitterly complained of him and his heresies; and finally Eudoxius was compelled, by a direct order from the emperor, to summon him to Constantinople, and institute an investigation, the result of which was that he was deposed and banished. He then placed himself at the head of the Anomæans (who from this time generally bore the name of the Eunomians), and wrote and spoke in their interest; but he never again held an official position in the church. He moved about from place to place, always in banishment.

In his treatment of the great question of his day, — the divinity of Christ, — he started from the conception of an absolute unlikeness in substance between the Father and the Son, and was thereby led to represent the Son as a creature among other creatures, as a mere man. These views produced such an indignation, that successive imperial edicts ordered his books to be burnt. Of his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, and of his Letters (more than forty, according to Photius), nothing has come down to us. The Confession (Ἐκθέσις τῆς πίστεως), which he presented to Theodosius in 383, but which was not accepted, was first printed by Valerius, in his Notes to Socrates, then by Baluze, in his Concill. Nov. Collect., I. 89. Of his two Apologies, the first was written directly against the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, the second as a defence against the attacks of Basil. From several manuscripts of the latter's work (Adversus Eunomium) it has been possible to restore the whole first Apologeticus of Eunomius. The attempt was first made by CAVE (Hist. Lit., I. 220), and then more completely by FABRICIUS (Bibl. Græca, V. 23). There is also an English translation of the book by WILSON, Eunomianismus Redivivus, Lond., 1711. About the second Apology, Philostorgius, an admirer of Eunomius, tells us that Basil died of despair after reading it; while Photius, an adversary, states that Eunomius dared not publish it until after the death of Basil. The writings of Eunomius were, indeed, as much extolled by his adherents as they were disparaged by his enemies. After his death, his party separated from the church, and branched off in a number of minor divisions named after various leaders, such as Eutyches, Theophronius, etc., until it was dissolved by internal dissensions. See KROSE: Gesch. u. Lehre d. Eunomius, Kiel, 1833. GASS.

EUNUCH (lit. bed-keeper, chamberlain). This class of persons is a natural consequence of polygamy, and is numerous to-day throughout the East. Frequent mention is made of them upon Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, and they were common in the degenerate days of Greece and Rome. The men who sing soprano in the Sistine Chapel at Rome are eunuchs. Eunuchs always display the same character: they are cowardly, jealous, intriguing, licentious, and shameless. They incline to melancholia, and frequently commit suicide. Yet they rose to the highest eminence, and were intrusted with the life of the sovereign.

According to Deut. xxiii. 1, eunuchs could not enter into the congregation of the Lord. In the Christian Church eunuchs could not be ordained.

History records a few instances of self-mutilation (of which the most famous is Origen) out of a fanatical or ascetic obedience to our Lord's words (Matt. xix. 12): "There are eunuchs who made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake." If, however, a man was a born eunuch, or was made one by his persecutors, the prohibition against ordination did not apply to him. Abelard was mutilated, but, notwithstanding, rose to be an abbot. In the famous saying of Christ's already referred to, the word "eunuch" is used in three senses: (1) Of those who were born so, (2) Of those who were made so, (3) Of those who abstain from marriage in order that they may give their attention more exclusively to the interests of the kingdom of heaven.

EUPHRATES (Hebrew פְּרַת; LXX. Ἐυφράτης; Assy. Purât, Purûtu, "the river") occurs (Gen. ii. 14, xv. 18; Deut. i. 7, xi. 24; Josh. i. 4; 2 Sam. viii. 3; 2 Kings xxiii. 29, xxiv. 7; 1 Chron. v. 9, xviii. 3; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20; Jer. xiii. 4, 5, 6, 7, xvi. 2, 6, 10, li. 63) as the name of the well-known river, called also "the great river" (הַיְהוּדָה הַגְּדוֹלָה, Gen. xv. 18; Deut. i. 7, etc.), "the river" (הַיְהוּדָה, Gen. xxxi. 21; Exod. xxiii. 31; A.V. "flood," Josh. xxiv. 14, 15), and even "river" (נְהַר, Isa. vii. 20; Jer. ii. 18; Mic. vii. 12).

It takes its rise in the mountains of Armenia, its volume being due to the union of two streams, — the Murâd Su or Eastern Euphrates, and the Frat or Northern Euphrates, — which unite about lat. 39° and long. 39°. The sources of the Euphrates are expressly mentioned by Salmanassar II. (B.C. 860–825), who relates how he marched from the sources of the Tigris to those of the Euphrates (probably meaning the sources of the Murâd Su, north-east of Lake Van; the Frat begins near Erzurum), and there sacrificed to the gods, dipped "the weapons of Assur" in the water, and set up his royal likeness.

The river breaks through the Taurus range toward the west, then turns southward in a winding course, making a second great bend toward the south-east, in about lat. 36°, and following this general direction till it joins the Tigris in Lower Babylonia, and empties through the Satt el-Arab into the Persian Gulf. Its total length is from sixteen hundred to eighteen hundred miles, and it is navigable for small craft twelve hundred miles from its mouth. After the junction of the two branches, it has few tributaries. The only considerable ones are the Sajur (Assyr. Saugura, or Sagura), entering from the west in lat. 36° 40'; the Belik (Assyr. Balihu), entering from the north (below the great south-easterly bend), in long. 39° 9'; and the Khabûr (Assyr. Hâbûr), entering from the north-east in lat. 35° 7', long. 40° 30'. From the Khabûr to the sea, a distance of eight hundred miles, there is no tributary, but, on the other hand, a tendency toward the mouth to divide into smaller streams. The melting of the mountain snows causes a yearly flood, beginning in March, and increasing gradually till May; when, after some weeks, the waters sink by degrees, until, in September or October, the river is at the lowest.

Forming the western boundary of Mesopotamia proper, it was, of course, in ancient times, the limit of the various districts of that region inhabited largely by Aramæan peoples, which gradually came under the control of Assyria; so that the expression "I crossed the Euphrates" denoted for an Assyrian king the beginning of a foreign campaign. It divided Mesopotamia from the "Land Hatti," a name, which, from the time of Sargon (B.C. 722–705), was applied to the whole territory between the Euphrates and the Mediterranean. (See HITTITES.) The most important ancient cities on or near the Euphrates were Charchemish (2 Chron. xxxv. 20), later Hierapolis, now Jerablûs, not far from one of the main crossings of the river, and, lower down, Sippara, Agade, Babylon, Borsippa, Erech (Warka), Larsa and Ur (Mugheir).

For the ancient Babylonians the river was indispensable, not only nor mainly as giving them water-communication with the sea, but as offering them means of irrigation by opening canals through the land; the result was a fertility abundantly evidenced in classic writers (e.g., Herodotus, i. 193; Xen., Anab. ii. 3, §§ 14–16; Strabo, xvi. 1, § 14), which, by proper engineering, might be restored.

The union of the Euphrates and Tigris in the Satt el-Arab is of comparatively modern date. The encroachment of the land on the water of the Persian Gulf is said by Lord Loftus (Chaldea and Susiana, p. 282) to have been going on at the rate of a mile in seventy years since the beginning of the Christian era. It is believed that the rate was once larger, so that in the earliest historic times the sea may have extended a hundred and fifty or two hundred miles farther to the north-west than at present. This great physical change is confirmed by the statement of Pliny (Nat. Hist., VI. § 31) and by the cuneiform inscriptions. These (Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, III. 12 s.) represent Sennacherib (B.C. 705–681) as sailing down the Euphrates to its mouth, and then, after solemn sacrifices, as before a dangerous voyage, embarking his army in Phœnician ships, and crossing the sea to the mouth of the Eulaus, the River of Elam: this is now the Karûn, and empties into one of the arms of the Satt el-Arab. An inscription of Sargon (Cun. Inscr. West. Asia, III. 11, 23–25) speaks also of the city Dilmun, situated "thirty Kasbu" (about a hundred and twenty miles, which may be an exaggeration) in the sea. The island or peninsula where this city stood has now become a part of the mainland.

EUSEBIUS, a Greek by birth, the son of a physician, succeeded Marcellus as Bishop of Rome in 310. There raged at that moment a bitter controversy in Rome concerning the treatment of the lapsi. Eusebius insisted on penance, but caused thereby great tumults, which caused Maxentius to banish the leaders of both parties. Eusebius died in Sicily, after a reign of four, or, according to other authorities, of seven months. He is honored in the Roman calendar as a saint. Sept. 26 is his day.

EUSEBIUS OF ALEXANDRIA is the author of a number of homilies (twenty-one) which enjoyed great reputation in the Eastern Church during the sixth and seventh centuries. Nothing is known with certainty of his life. In the manuscripts of his works he is described as a monk and high dignitary of the church, — bishop, archbishop, patriarch, papa: in an old biography of him, printed by Cardinal Mai, in Spicileg. Rom., IX. p. 703, he is designated as Bishop of Alexandria after Cyril. But we have the list of Alexandrian bishops; and there is nowhere room for an Eusebius, least of all immediately after Cyril. Some of the homilies, which, however, are of no great interest, are found in GALLANDI, Bibl. Patrum, VIII. p. 252. See THILO, Ueber d. Schriften d. E. v. A., Halle, 1832. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, surnamed Bruno, Bishop of Angers from 1047 to his death (1081), was, at least for some time, an adherent and defender of Berengarius of Tours. In a letter dating from 1049 he bitterly complains of the manner in which the Pope treated Berengarius. Berengarius himself reckoned him one of his patrons (Cæn. Sacr., ed. Vischer, p. 52): so did others. Bishop Theotwin of Liège expressly charges him with having renewed the old heresy concerning the Lord's Supper, that it contained only a semblance or shadow of Christ's body (Gallandi, Bibl. Patr., XIV. p. 244). Nevertheless, after the death of Count Gaufried of Anjou (1060), the valiant champion of the cause of Berengarius, he seems to have lost his courage. At the conference of Angers (1062) he assumed a very cool attitude towards Berengarius; and in the same mood is the famous letter written (somewhere between 1063 and 1066), in which he declines to act as arbiter in a disputation between Berengarius and Gaufried Martini. Lessing has called this letter one of the most excellent theological productions of the eleventh century; but this is simply a mistake. The letter is nothing but a cunningly devised cover for a cowardly retreat. The letters of Eusebius are found in an authentic text in MENARDUS: Augustini c. Julian. operis imperf. 1. 2 priores, p. 499. The texts given by Du Roye and Du Bouley are mutilated. Two new letters were given by SUDENDORF, Bereng. Turonensis, 1850. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Cæsarea (surnamed Pamphilus, "the friend of Pamphilus"), was b. in the latter part of the third century, between 260 and 270, probably in Palestine; d. at Cæsarea, 340. One of his earliest teachers was Bishop Meletius of Pontus, who, during the persecution of Diocletian, sought refuge in Palestine. Afterwards he studied at Antioch, under the presbyter Dorotheus. But the two great decisive influences in his education were the writings of Origen, and the intimate intercourse, at Cæsarea, with Pamphilus, under whose guidance he made his first literary attempt as an exegete (305). In 309 he was compelled to leave Cæsarea on account of the persecution, during which Pamphilus suffered martyrdom. He fled to Tyre, and thence to Egypt. After his return he was made Bishop of Cæsarea (313). The principal problem which presented itself for solution during his episcopate was the Arian controversy, opened in 318. His own stand-point was one intermediate between Arius and Athanasius, based on Origen; but he had neither dialectical power to justify, nor force of character to maintain it. At the Council of Nicaea (325) he tried to effect a reconciliation between the two contending parties, but failed. After fighting against the idea of homoousion to the last, he finally yielded, and signed the orthodox confession. But he retained in his heart a feeling of rancor against Athanasius, and he was ever afterwards one of the leaders of the Arians. He presided at the synod of Tyre (335), convened for the purpose of deposing Athanasius. But the attempt at reconciliation he made at Nicaea procured him the friendship of the emperor. He enjoyed the confidence of Constantine in a particular degree; though it may be, that, in many cases, this confidence was addressed to the author, rather than to the person. In his relation to Constantine, however, he showed the same weakness of character as in his relation to Athanasius. As he was unable to see the truth when it concerned Athanasius, he was unable to speak the truth when it concerned Constantine.

It is as an author, however, rather than as a bishop, that Eusebius attained his great fame. His writings are historical, apologetic, theological, and exegetical. The most important of them are those on history; and his ἐκκλησιαστικὴ ἱστορία, in ten books, giving the history of the Christian Church from its origin to 324, has naturally procured for him the title of the "Father of Church History;" not because he was a master of the historiographer's art, — for he has neither method with respect to the whole, nor criticism with respect to details; neither style nor absolute veracity, — but because he was the first in the field; because he was possessed of materials which would soon have been lost if he had not utilized them; and because he availed himself of these advantages with indefatigable industry and energy. As a repertory of facts and documents, his work is invaluable. The principal editions are by Valesius (Du Valois), with Latin translation, Paris, 1659, re-edited by Reading, Canterbury, 1720; by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1827, 2d ed., 1868, 3 vols.; Burton, Oxford, 1838; Schwegler (pocket edition), Tubing., 1852; Dindorf, Leipzig, 1871. [Into English the book has been translated by Hammer, 1584, and, better, by C. F. Crusé, N.Y., 1865.] Special investigations into the trustworthiness of the book have been made by Möller, Copenhagen, 1813; Danz, Jena, 1815; Kestner, Göttingen, 1816; Reuterdahl, Land, 1826; Rienstra, Treves, 1833. Before he wrote his Ecclesiastical History, and as a preparation for it, Eusebius compiled his Chronicle, of which the first part gives an outline of the history of the world to 325, and the second an extract of this outline, arranged in tabular form. Of the original Greek text, only fragments have come down to us. Of the second part, Jerome gave a free translation into Latin. Collections of all fragments (Greek, Latin, and Armenian) of the Chronicle have been made by Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll., 1833, VIII.), and best by A. Schöne, Berlin, 1866, 1875, 2 parts. Among the other historical works of Eusebius are: a Life of Constantine, written after 337, edited by Heinichen, Leipzig, 1830, 2d ed., 1869, a somewhat fulsome panegyric of Constantine, written on the occasion of the thirtieth anniversary of his reign; a book on the Martyrs of Palestine, during the persecution of Diocletian; a letter on pictures of Christ, to the sister of Constantine, etc.

Next in importance to his historical writings are his apologetic works, especially the two most elaborate ones.—the Preparation [for the demonstration] of the Gospel (προπαρασκευὴ εὐαγγελική) and the Demonstration of the Gospel (ἀποδείξις). The former (edited by Vigerus, Paris, 1688, and Heinrich, Leipzig, 1842) shows the insufficiency and inner unreasonableness of Paganism: the latter (edited Paris, 1628, Cologne, 1688, and by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852) proves the truth of Christianity from its internal character and its external effects. The gist of both these works was compressed into the Theophania; but that book exists now only in a Syrian translation, first discovered in a Nitrian monastery by Tattam, edited by Lee, London, 1842, and translated into English in 1843. His Prophetical Extracts (προφητικὰ ἐκλογαί) was edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1842. Of his Defence of Origen, written in company with Pamphilus, only the first book is extant, and that only in an unreliable translation by Rufinus.

Of much less consequence are Eusebius' dogmatical and exegetical writings. The former comprise two works against Marcellus, generally printed as an appendix to the ἀποδείξις, independently edited by Gaisford, Oxford, 1852. The latter contain commentaries on the Psalms, Isaiah, Daniel, the Song of Songs, the Epistle to the Hebrews, etc.; but they are extant only in fragments. A work of special interest is his Onomasticon, of which the first part contains a topography of Palestine, and specially of Jerusalem; the second, an alphabetically arranged list of names of biblical places, with descriptions. The work was edited (Greek and Latin, the Latin text being a free translation by Jerome of the second part) by Bonfrère, Paris, 1631; Clericus, Amsterdam, 1707; Larsov and Parthey, Berlin, 1862; Lagarde, Göttingen, 1870. A collected edition of all the works of Eusebius is found in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Græca, XIX.—XXIV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Dorylæum, lived as a rhetorician in Constantinople, and held some minor government office (agens in rebus), when one day, in 430, he arose in full church, and interrupted Nestorius in the midst of his sermon, with a protest against his views as heretical; and shortly after he posted in the principal church of Constantinople an elaborate denunciation of the Nestorian heresies, comparing them to those of Paul of Samosata. As he thus opened the Nestorian controversy, he also opened the Eutyechian by his complaint of Eutyches at the synod of Constantinople (448). He had in the mean time been appointed Bishop of Dorylæum in Phrygia; and by his persistency he succeeded in getting Eutyches condemned and deposed. By the synod of Éphesus, however (449), he was himself deposed, and fled to Rome; but by the Council of Chalcedon (451) he was re-instated, and died in his see. Some minor polemical writings of his—Libellus adv. Eutychem, Libellus adv. Dioscurum, etc.—have come down to us, and are found in LABBE, Conc. Coll., IV.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Emesa, d. about 360; was b. of a distinguished family in Edessa, Mesopotamia; studied under Eusebius of Casarea, and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, also in Antioch after 330 (with the method and spirit of whose school he became thoroughly imbued), and finally in Alexandria. His fame as an exegete and preacher was so great, that in 341 the synod of Antioch designated him as a fit successor to the deposed Athanasius; but he knew too well how ardently the Alexandrian congregation adhered to its bishop, and he declined. He was then appointed Bishop of Emesa, in Phœnicia; but there, too, he encountered great opposition. The inhabitants feared his astronomical knowledge, and rose against him as a magician. He fled to Laodicea, and settled afterwards in Antioch, where he spent the rest of his life. Of his numerous writings (Jerome mentions polemical works against the Jews, Pagans, and Novatians, ten books of commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians, and homilies on the Gospels; Theodoret mentions polemics against the Marcionites and Manichæans; Ebed Jesu, a work on the Old Testament, etc.), nothing but fragments have come down to us. The homilies edited by Gagnée, (1547) and by Fromy (1575) are spurious; but the two first homilies against Marcellus, ascribed to Eusebius of Casarea, and found among his works (Opuscula H. ed. Sirmondi, 1616), belong probably to Eusebius of Emesa. His Life, written by Bishop George of Laodicea, is also lost. See AUGUSTI: Eus. Emes. Opuscula, Elberfeld, 1829; TULLO: Eus. of Alex. and Eus. von Emes., Halle, 1832. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Laodicea, in Syria, d. 269; was b. in Alexandria, and gave, while deacon of the church in his native city, the most striking proofs of Christian love, and fearless constancy of faith, both during the persecution of Valerian (257) and during the plague (263). As the representative of the Alexandrian bishop, he was present at the synod of Antioch which condemned Paul of Samosata; and the impression he made was so favorable, that he shortly after was elected Bishop of Laodicea. See EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl., 7, 11, 21, 23, 32. SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS OF NICOMEDIA was first Bishop of Berytus, in Phœnicia, then of Nicomedia, where the imperial court resided, and finally of Constantinople, where he died 342. Distantly related to the imperial house, he not only owed his removal from an insignificant to the most splendid episcopal see to his influence at court, but the great power he wielded in the church was also derived from that source. With the exception of a short period of eclipse, he enjoyed the complete confidence both of Constantine and Constantius; and it was he who baptized the dying emperor, May, 337. Like Arius, he was a pupil of Lucian of Antioch, and it is probable that he held the same views as Arius from the very beginning. He afterwards modified his ideas somewhat, or perhaps he only yielded to the pressure of circumstances; but he was, if not the teacher, at all events the leader and organizer, of the Arian party. At the Council of Nicæa (325) he signed the Confession, but only after a long and desperate opposition. His defence of Arius excited the wrath of the emperor, and a few months after the council he was sent into exile. After the lapse of three years, he succeeded in regaining the imperial favor; and after his return (in 329) he brought the whole machinery of the state government into action in order to impose his views upon the church. In 331 a synod of Antioch condemned and deposed Eustathius, one of the pillars of the orthodox party. In 336 Athanasius was banished to Treves, and in 337 Arius was invited to Constantinople to be solemnly received again into the bosom of the Catholic Church. The Arian party was victorious, and ready to take possession of the church; and the victory was due chiefly to Eusebius. See, for further information, literature, etc., the article on ARIANISM.

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Samosata, on the Euphrates, since 361, d. about 379; was one of the chief pillars of the orthodox church during its contest with Arianism in the latter part of the fourth century. During the reign of Valens he travelled through the dioceses of Syria, Phœnicia, and Palestine, in the disguise of a soldier, exhorting the faithful, and consecrating orthodox priests; and the election of Basil to the see of Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, was chiefly due to his exertions (370). In 373 he was banished to Thrace, and lived in exile to the death of Valens, 378. Shortly after his return, while engaged in the re-organization of the Syrian Church, he was killed at Dolica (a small town in the district of Comagene) by a stone thrown at him by an Arian woman. See, besides THEODORET (Hist. Eccl., 2, 28; 4, 12, etc.), the Letters of Basil (Ep. 5-9, 253-265; Opp., ed. Paris, 1638, 111.) and Gregory Nazianzen (Ep. 28-30, 204; Opp., ed. Paris, 1690, I.) SEMISCH.

EUSEBIUS, Archbishop of Thessalonica, flourished about 600; wrote ten books against the Aphthartodocetæ (a branch of the Monophysites), which have been lost, but of which Photius gives the list of contents (Bibl. Cod., 162); and was by Gregory the Great encouraged to employ still more vigorous measures against heretics (Ep. 10, 42; 11, 74).

EUSEBIUS, Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, d. about 371; was b. in the island of Sardinia, and educated in Rome by Pope Eusebius. Elected Bishop of Vercelli by an unanimous vote of the people and the clergy, he became one of the principal champions of the orthodox church in its contest with Arianism during the reign of Constantius. The synod of Milan was convened in 355. The orthodox party hoped to procure a vindication and restitution of Athanasius. The Arians tried to get the condemnation of Arles repeated and confirmed. The emperor finally employed force, and the Arians gained the ascendancy; but Eusebius did not yield. He was banished, first to Scythopolis, afterwards to Cappadocia, and finally to the Thebaid; and in the latter places he was kept in close confinement. After the death of Constantius he regained his liberty; but the contest with Arianism still continued, and he was finally stoned to death, according to the legend, by his adversaries. His Letters are found in GALLANDI, Bibl. Patr., V. p. 78, etc. For his life, see JEROME, Vires Illustres, c. xcvi. Migne's ed., T. 23, p. 697; Act. Sanct., Aug., I. p. 340; and UGHELLI, in Italia Sacra, IV. p. 747.

EUSTACHIUS, or, as the Greeks call him, EUSTATHIUS, is one of the most celebrated saints of the Roman-Catholic Church, though his life lies wholly in the field of romance. According to his acts, written in Greek, and dating from the eighth century, he was an officer of some repute in the army of Trajan. His name was Placidus. By a miraculous apparition of Christ he was converted; and, after many wonderful vicissitudes, he was roasted to death in Rome, together with his whole family. His remains came afterwards to France, and rest now in the Church of St. Eustache in Paris. In the Roman-Catholic Church he has been celebrated since the sixth century as a saint and martyr. His day is Sept. 20. His acts, Greek and Latin, were edited by Cambefis, Illustrium Christi Martyrum Lecti Triumphi, Paris, 1660.

EUSTATHIUS OF ANTIOCH, b. at Side, Pamphylia; d. at Philippi 337; was first Bishop of Berrhœa (Syria), and then of Antioch. In the Council of Nicæa he vehemently opposed the Arians; but they took revenge when they got into power, and deposed him in 331. The inhabitants, however, of Antioch, arose in defence of their bishop, though in vain: they only succeeded in provoking the emperor, and Eustathius was banished to Thrace. Of his numerous writings, only a work against Origen is still extant: Bibl. Max. Patr., XVII.

EUSTATHIUS, Bishop of Sebaste (Armenia) from 350; a native of Cappadocia; d. 380; changed several times from orthodoxy to Arianism, and from Arianism to Semi-Arianism, and back again, and joined finally the Eunomians, but was condemned by several synods, and lost at last the confidence of all parties. He built a hospital for sick people and travellers in Sebaste, and introduced monasticism in Armenia, Pontus, and Paphlagonia, which gave rise to the formation of an enthusiastic ascetic party, the Eustathians. They were condemned by the synod of Gangra, and disappeared speedily. See SYCRATES: H. E., II. 43; SOZOMEN: H. E., III. 14. HERZOG.

EUSTATHIUS OF THESSALONICA, b. in Constantinople in the first half of the twelfth century; metropolitan of Thessalonica since 1175; d. there in 1194; has long been famous for his commentaries on the Greek classics, especially Homer. But the publication of his theological works by Tafel (Opuscula, Francfort, 1832, and De Thessalonica, Berlin, 1839) shows, furthermore, that he was a man of true Christian spirit, with a sharp eye for the moral and religious depravation of his time, and with something of the talent and character of a reformer. His Thoughts on the Monastic Life (Ἐπίσκοπος βίου μοναχικοῦ) was translated into German, Betrachtungen über d. Mönchsstand, by Tafel, Berlin, 1847. GASS.

EUSTOCHIUM, a daughter of Paula; was b. in Rome about 370; made while young a vow of perpetual virginity, which caused Jerome to write his De Virginitate, and devoted herself to an ascetic life. Together with her mother, she accompanied Jerome to Palestine (385); and, after the death of Paula, she became superior of the convent in Bethlehem, where she died 418. In the Roman Church she is considered a saint. Her day of celebration is Sept. 28.

EUTHALIUS, a deacon of the Alexandrian Church, and afterwards Bishop of Sulca; flourished in the middle of the fifth century, and introduced in the Acts, the Epistles of Paul, and the Catholic Epistles, the same division into chapters and verses which had already been introduced in the Gospels by Ammonius of Alexandria in the middle of the third century. See BIBLE TEXT, p. 269.

EUTHYMIUS ZICADENUS, or ZICABENUS, one of the most prominent Byzantine theologians of the twelfth century, and a characteristic representative of the whole school. Of his life very little is known. He was monk in a monastery near Constantinople, enjoyed the favor of the Emperor Alexius Comnenus, is spoken of with praise by Anna Commena, and died after 1118. Of his exegetical works his commentary on the Psalms was published in a Latin version by Philip Saul, Verona, 1530, and afterwards often. The Greek text of the preface and introduction was printed by Le Moyne, Varia Sacra, Lyons, 1685, I. pp. 150-210. The whole work, Greek and Latin, is found in Opera Omnia Theophylacti, Venice, 1754-63, T. IV. Another and still more important work, a commentary to the four Gospels, was likewise first printed in a Latin version by J. Hentenius, Louvain, 1544; the Greek text was not published until 1792, by C. F. Matthäi, at Leipzig. His great dogmatical work, Πανοπλία δογματικῆ, a refutation of twenty-four different heresies, was written at the instance of the Emperor Alexius. In the Latin version by P. F. Zini (Venice, 1555) the twelfth and thirteenth chapters against the Pope and the Italians are left out. In the only Greek edition (Tergovist, Wallachia, 1771), the twenty-fourth chapter against the Mohammedans is lacking. Single parts of the work have been specially edited; for instance, the chapter against the Bogomiles in Wolf: Hist. Bogomilorum, Viteb., 1712 (edited by Gieseler, Gottingen, 1842); the chapter against the Massilians in Tollius: Insignia Itinrar. Ital., Treves, 1696, etc. See ULLMANN: Nikol. von Methone, Euth. Zig. und Nic. Choniates. GASS.

EUTYCHES and EUTYCHIANISM. Eutychnianism denotes that form of the older christology in which the Alexandrian doctrine of one nature in the incarnation was pushed to a docetic absorption of the human by the divine in the person of Christ. It originated as a re-action against Nestorianism. The reconciliation which (in 433) was effected between the Syrian and Egyptian Churches, and between the schools of Antioch and Alexandria, was nothing but a compromise; and the vague formulas of the instrument could not fail increasing the confusion. Both parties claimed the victory. The Antiochians pointed to the strong emphasis which was laid upon the two natures; and the Alexandrians exulted over the actual condemnation of Nestorius. In the dogmatical stand-points of the two adversaries nothing was changed. The Antiochians continued accusing the Alexandrians of Apollinarianism and Docetism; and the Alexandrians answered by accusing the Antiochians of Nestorianism and Photinianism. The Alexandrians were supported by the court and the monks, and labored secretly but successfully to spread suspicion throughout the church with respect to the orthodoxy of Diodorus and Theodore of Mopsuestia. The Antiochians employed chiefly the weapons of science; and they were in this respect far superior to their antagonists, especially since the death of Cyril. In 447 Theodoret published his Eranistes, which is simply a challenge to all the adherents of the Anathematismata of Cyril. In the Eastern Church the whole atmosphere was overloaded. A storm was inevitable.

Eutyches finally caused it to burst forth. He was at that time about seventy years old, and had lived for more than thirty years as superior of a monastery in the neighborhood of Constantinople. A severe ascetic, he seldom left the monastery; but in his cell he used to converse with his visitors in an astounding manner about the mystery of the god-man. He was honest, but uneducated; unpractised in reasoning, and yet delighting in debate. He hated the Antiochian theology; and all his life through he was zealous in hunting down heretics. At the synod of Ephesus (431) he was one of Cyril's most devoted partisans; and he no doubt was one of the leaders of that procession of psalmodizing monks which penetrated into the imperial palace, and compelled Theodosius II. to confirm the party-maneuvres of the synod as oecumenical decisions. At present he was in great favor at the court, especially with the imperial minister of state, Chrysaphius; and, playing with equal force the saint in the halls of the palace and the oracle in the cell of the monastery, he was deeply engaged in counteracting the Antiochians. In the spring of 448 he wrote to Pope Leo I. (Leo. Ep., 20, in Mansi, V. p. 1323), to inform him that the Nestorian heresy was still living in the Eastern Church. Indeed, when at this time Domnus, Patriarch of Antioch, appeared before the emperor, and accused Eutyches of heresy, it was simply an act of self-defence from the Antiochian side.

The move of Domnus had no effect; but in the fall of the same year (448) Bishop Eusebius of Dorylaeum laid before the synod of Constantinople a formal accusation of Eutyches, as holding and teaching blasphemous views of the person of Christ. Flavian, who was a moderate Antiochian, and who knew that he had a bitter enemy in Dioscuros, Cyril's successor in Alexandria, wanted to have the whole matter smoothed down by means of a personal conference between Eutyches and Eusebius; but the latter pushed his case with so much vigor, that Eutyches was actually summoned before the synod. After many delays he appeared, accompanied by a division of the imperial guard, and swarms of excited monks. He was examined, and he answered half defiantly, half evasively. Nevertheless, he acknowledged that he considered the body of Christ to have been of quite another substance than other human bodies, and that was of course enough to prove his Apollinarianism, Valentinianism, Docetism, etc. Under tears and sobs, as the official style has it, he was deposed from his office as a priest and archimandrite, and expelled from the community of the faithful.

Eutyches, however, Dioscuros, Chrysophius, and the whole party whose interests were at stake, did not feel willing to acquiesce in the decision. Their first move was to demand a revision of the acts of the synod. It was granted, but no irregularity was discovered. They then began to clamor for a new œcumenical council. Flavian and Leo I. tried to prevent such a measure; but when Leo I. dated his famous letter (Leo. Ep., 28, in Mansi, V. p. 1366), by which he hoped to place himself as arbiter between the two contending parties (June 13, 449), the invitation to the new council had already been sent out (March 20, 449). It opened at Ephesus (Aug. 8, 449), under the presidency of Dioscuros, a shameless and violent character; it proceeded amid the howlings and tumult of drunken soldiers and fanatical monks; and it bears in history, for good reasons, the name of the "Robber Synod." Eutyches was re-instated, and Eusebius was even not allowed to speak. Flavian was condemned; and when some bishops attempted to embrace the feet of the president, and move him to pity, he cried out for the soldiers; and in broke the rabble with unspeakable confusion. Flavian was trampled upon, and beaten almost to death. Eusebius fled; also the papal legate escaped. Domnus of Antioch, Theodoret, and other prominent members of the Antiochian school, were deposed; and by means of falsified acts the sanction of the emperor was obtained. The triumph of the Alexandrian party was complete; but it did not prove lasting.

The sudden death of Theodosius II. (450) produced a change in the affairs. The new rulers, Pulcheria and her husband Marcian, were orthodox. The bishops who had been banished by the instrumentality of Dioscuros were recalled; the remains of Flavian were brought to Constantinople, and entombed in the Church of the Apostles; Eutyches was once more excommunicated, and banished from the metropolis. It was the wish of the new government to give the country peace; and nothing seemed better suited to stop all controversies, and appease the reigning feeling of excitement, than a fourth œcumenical synod. It was convened at Chalcedon, and opened Oct. 8, 451. Dioscuros was unanimously condemned; not on account of heresy, however, but on account of the frightful accusations of fraud, violence, and crimes of almost every description, which were raised against him by his own congregation. More difficulty was experienced in elaborating a set of christological formulas, which should exclude all heresies, and gather the whole church together. The problem was solved, however, by taking the above-mentioned letter of Leo I. for a basis; and an imperial edict of Feb. 7, 452, made this confession obligatory. The measures which were employed against the Eutychians were rather harsh. Nevertheless, remnants of the party, having monasteries of their own, and celebrating service in a somewhat peculiar manner, lived on for a long time. See the article CHRISTOLOGY.

EUTYCHIANUS, Bishop of Rome (from January, 275, to December, 283), is honored in the Roman-Catholic Church as a saint and martyr. His day falls on Dec. 1. There is, however, no proof of his martyrdom but a report found in some later recensions of the Liber Pontificalis. The earlier recensions, as well as all other sources, are silent on the subject. Some decretals ascribed to him, but spurious, are found in MIGNÉ, Patr. Lat., V.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Alexandria, b. 876, at Fostat, the present Cairo; d. May 12, 940; was originally a physician; studied afterwards history and theology; entered the church, and was made patriarch in 933. As such he sustained very severe attacks from the Jacobite Copts, he himself being the leader of the orthodox or Melchite party. He was a prolific writer, and wrote in Arabic; but most of his writings have perished. His principal work, however (a world's history from the creation to 937, and of no small interest for the history of the Eastern Church), is still extant, and was edited in Arabic, with a Latin translation by E. Pococke, Oxford, 1658, 1659.

EUTYCHIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, b. about 510; d. 582; was a monk and catholicos in the city of Amasia, in Pontus; came in 552 as delegate from his bishop, and gained the favor of the Emperor Justinian by proving from Scripture that it was right to lay the ban of the church upon men, even though they had died long ago; was in the same year made Patriarch of Constantinople; played a prominent part in the "Three Chapters" controversy, and presided at the œcumenical synod of 553, but lost the favor of the emperor by refusing to acknowledge the doctrine of the monophysite Aphthartodocetes as orthodox; was deposed, and banished to Amasia 565. After twelve years of banishment he was re-instated in his see by Justin II.; and by the church he was honored with the dignity of a saint on account of his sufferings for the cause of orthodoxy. His Life, written by an intimate servant of his, is found in Act. Sanct., April, I. p. 550. Of his writings three fragments on the Lord's Supper have been published by Mai; Class. Auct., X. 493, and Script. Vet. Coll., IX. 623. A letter from him to Pope Vigilius, dated 553, is found in MANSI, X. 186.

EVAGRIUS PONTICUS was b. at Iheris, on the Black Sea; studied under Basilus, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzen, who brought him to Constantinople in 379, and with whom he went to Jerusalem in 385. He afterwards retired into the Nitrian Desert, and lived a hermit among the hermits. The year of his death is unknown. From contemporary documents it is evident that he enjoyed a considerable reputation; and the reason why the after-time treated him so coolly is simply, that, in the Origenistic controversy, he took the side of Origen. What has come down to us of his works is found in GALLANDIUS, Bibl. Patr., VII. pp. 551-581. GASS.

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS, b. about 536, at Epiphania, in Cœlesyria; enjoyed a careful instruction in the schools of the rhetoricians and grammarians, and settled in Antioch, where he practised as a lawyer. He lived in intimate connection with Bishop Gregory, and wrote, as a continuation of Eusebius and the older church historians, an ecclesiastical history from the synod of Ephesus (431) to the twelfth year of the reign of Mauritius (594). He is superstitious, but orthodox; credulous, but impartial; and his work is invaluable for the understanding of the Nestorian and Eutychian controversies. It was first edited by R. Stephans (Paris, 1544, Geneva, 1612), then by Valesius (Paris, 1673, Francfort, 1679, etc.), and finally by Reading (Canterbury, 1720). [There is an English translation of it by M. Hamner, in BAGSTER'S Eccles. Historians, and in BOHN'S Eccles. Library.] GASS.

EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE. See ALLIANCE, EVANGELICAL.

EVANGELICAL ASSOCIATION, an ecclesiastical body which in all essential particulars follows the doctrine and polity of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. Its founder, Jacob Albright, was a man of limited education, but earnest piety. Originally a Lutheran, he connected himself with the Methodist Church, and began to preach in 1796. A meeting of his followers in 1803 ordained him as a minister of the gospel in accordance with Acts xiii. 1-3. Albright labored amongst the German-speaking classes; and, as the Methodist-Episcopal Church did not make any effort among the Germans, the congregations gathered by his labors banded themselves together in a separate denomination. In 1807 a conference was held, and Albright elected bishop, and instructed to draw up articles of faith and discipline. Several years after his death (1808) his followers, who had been known as "Albright People," adopted for their organization the name of Die evangelische Gemeinschaft von Nord Amerika, "Evangelical Association of North America." The organization of the church is similar to that of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. Bishops and presiding elders are elected by the general and annual conferences, and hold office for four years. The itinerant system is practised. In doctrine they are Arminian, but are very decidedly biblical. The progress of the body in its early history has in recent years been rapid. The first general conference was held in 1816 in Union County, Pennsylvania. The labors of the association were at first exclusively among the Germans, whence the name "German-Methodist Church." More recently English congregations have been organized. It has also a conference in Germany numbering 8,000 adherents, and carries on a mission in Japan. The strength of the denomination in 1885 was 24 conferences, 1,611 ministers, and 128,634 church-members. It has three bishops, and conducts a biblical institute at Naperville, Ill., in connection with the North-western College. Its book concern at Cleveland is in a prosperous condition, and publishes several papers in German and English, the principal of which are Der christliche Botschafter and The Evangelical Messenger.

EVANGELICAL UNION. In 1841 James Morison, minister of the United Secession Church at Kilmarnock, Scotland, was deposed for holding anti-Calvinistic views upon faith, the work of the Spirit in salvation, and upon the extent of the atonement. Faith was declared to be one's belief that Christ died for him; the Spirit is "poured out upon all flesh," and strives with all the unregenerate, and dwells in all believers; while the atonement was universal. Mr. Morison's father, who was a minister, and two other ministers who held these views, met at Kilmarnock, and formed the Evangelical Union. The movement spread, and now the union embraces about ninety churches. These are independent in government, and also in doctrines resemble in general the Congregational churches of Scotland and the Cumberland Presbyterian Church of the United States. Mr. Morison is the author of very valuable commentaries upon the Third Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans (Lond. 1866), Matthew (1870), and Mark (1873, 3d ed., 1881). See Evangelical Union Annual, and F. FERGUSON, History of the Evangelical Union, Glasgow, 1876.

EVANGELIST (εὐαγγελιστής, "a herald of glad tidings") is from the same root as the words translated "gospel" (εὐαγγέλιον) and to "preach the word" (εὐαγγελίζομαι). In Eph. iv. 11 the evangelists are enumerated side by side with apostles, prophets, pastors, and teachers, and follow prophets. This special mention leads us to attribute to them a distinct form of activity. It did not consist in the execution of apostolic functions, the exercise of prophetic gifts, the oversight of churches, or diaconal service, but in preaching, and testifying to the facts of Christ's life. But the evangelists are not to be regarded as a distinct order of church officials. Deacons, presbyters, and apostles (Acts viii. 25; 1 Cor. i. 17, etc.), all might exercise evangelistic functions. Timothy, the bishop-presbyter, was exhorted to "do the work of an evangelist" (2 Tim. iv. 5); and Philip, one of the seven deacons at Jerusalem, is called an evangelist (Acts viii. 5, xxi. 8). The evangelists are to be regarded as itinerants, travelling from place to place. This was the case with Philip, who preached in Samaria, expounded the word to the eunuch on his way to Gaza, and then labored in Casarea and the cities round about (Acts viii. 40). They acted independently (Acts viii. 4), but largely as "fellow-laborers" and assistants of the apostles, accompanying them on their journeys, and laboring under their direction. Theodorot was the first to restrict the term to itinerant preachers (περιόητες ἐκίρητων); and Eusebius applied it for the first time strictly to the authors of the Gospels. The term is used at the present time in both these senses.

EVANGELISTARY (Evangelistarium), the name of the church-book which contains the portions of the Gospels to be read in the Liturgy. If the book contained all the four Gospels, it was called Evangelistarium plenarium.

EVANGELIUM ÆTERNUM was a supposed book, rather than a real book, based upon the writings of Joachim of Floris, and referring to certain ideas entertained by one party of the Franciscans concerning the reforming and reorganizing mission of their order. Gerhardus, a Franciscan monk belonging to the above party, compiled in the middle of the thirteenth century, from the writings of Joachim of Floris (d. 1202), a book, which he called Introductorium in Evangelium Æternum, and in which he applied to his order Joachim's vague prophecies of a third stage in the history of mankind, — the era of the Holy Spirit. From the title of this book arose the rumor of a new gospel, the Everlasting Gospel, in the possession of the Franciscans. The book itself has perished; but it is partially known to us from a fragment of a work by Hugo of Caro (d. 1262), Processus in Evangelium Æternum, communicated by Quétif and Echard, in Script. Prædict., i. 202-213. See JOACHIM OF FLORIS.

EVANS, Christmas, an eloquent Baptist preacher of Wales; b. at Esgaiswen on Christmas Day, 1766; d. July 14, 1838. He was the son of a shoemaker, and after his father's death was forced to work at servile employments for a living. At the age of seventeen he was converted, and for the first time learned to read. At this period he lost an eye in an act of self-defence. He was ordained 1790, and, after a pastorate of two years at Lley, went to the Isle of Anglesea, where his salary for many years was only seventeen pounds. In 1826 he removed to Tonyvelin, and in 1833 to Caernarvon. Evans was a man of ardent piety, and great power as a preacher. The fragments that remain of his sermons show him a master in parabolic comparison and dramatic representation. These characteristics have won for him the title of the "Welsh Bunyan." When Robert Hall was reminded that Evans had only one eye, he replied, "Yes, sir; but that eye could lead an army through a wilderness at midnight." In recent times Evans's career has acted as a powerful stimulus upon Mr. Moody.

EVANS, John, D.D., a nonconformist divine; b. at Wrexham, Denbighshire, 1680; d. in London, May 16, 1730. He succeeded Dr. Daniel Williams in London. He completed Matthew Henry's commentary on Romans, and gathered much of the material subsequently used by Mr. Neal in his history of the Puritans. His best-known work is his Discourses concerning the Christian Temper; being Thirty-eight Sermons upon the Principal Heads of Practical Religion, Lond., 4th ed., 1737, 2 vols., edited, with a Life, by Dr. John Erskine, Lond., 1825.

EVANS, John, LL.D., a Baptist minister: b. at Usk, Monmouthshire, 1767; d. in London, 1827; wrote A Sketch of the Denominations of the Christian World, with a Persuasive to Religious Moderation, London, 1791; 15th ed., revised by the author, 1827; 18th ed., 1841, trans. into Welsh and Continental languages, reprinted in several editions in United States. Upwards of a hundred thousand copies were sold during the author's lifetime; but for the copyright he received only ten pounds.

EVANSON, Edward, a minister of the Church of England; b. at Warrington, Lancashire, April 21, 1731; d. at Colford, Gloucestershire, Sept. 25, 1805. He took his M.A. at Cambridge, 1753. In 1773 he was tried in the Consistorial Court of Gloucester for publicly altering or omitting such phrases in the church-service as seemed to him to be untrue, correcting the authorized version of the Scriptures, and for conversing against the Creeds and the divinity of Christ. The case was carried on appeal to the Court of Arches, and finally quashed, on technical grounds, in 1777. He gave the widest currency he could to his heretical views in his Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, and the Evidence of their Respective Authenticity examined, with that of other Scriptures deemed Canonical (Gloucester, 1792), in which he rejected the greater part of the New Testament as a forgery, and accepted the Gospel of Luke alone of the four. To this book Thomas Falconer replied in the Bampton Lecture for 1810, — Certain Principles in Evanson's Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, etc., examined. Evanson's views upon the sabbath brought him into controversy with Dr. Priestley.

EVE (חַוָּה, "life;" so LXX., in Gen. iii., translates by Ζωή "life;" elsewhere, however, Εβα), "the mother of all living." According to Gen. ii. 20, God would give man a "help meet for him;" literally, a help as before him; i.e., corresponding to him, his fellow in body and spirit. The simple, straight-forward Bible narrative of Eve's creation and reception is given in Gen. ii. 21-25. Different interpretations have found defenders and expositors.

1. The Literal. — While Adam slept, God took one of his ribs, and fashioned out of it a woman. Adam recognized the identity of substance and unity of life, and called the new creation אִשָּׁה (Ishsha, "female man"), because she was taken out of אִישׁ (Ish, "man"). The name חַוָּה was not given until after the fall, and was not an appellative, but her proper name, having not only a natural, but an historical significance, connected with the history of redemption; for it indicated Adam's faith that new life and salvation would issue from the womb of Eve. How long the first pair lived in Eden is unknown. By eating the forbidden fruit, under the temptation of Satan, they fell. Outside of the garden, Eve bore her first-born, and called him Cain ("possession"), apparently under the impression that she had borne the promised deliverer. Her second son she named Abel ("vanity"), indicating her disappointment: the third son she called Seth ("compensation"), because God had appointed her a seed, instead of dead Abel. With this remark the history of Eve closes.

2. The Allegorical. — The allegorists find their Coryphæus in Philo, who, having declared (in the second book of his Allegories of the Sacred Laws, after the Work of the Six Days of Creation, II. § vii.) the literal statement (that Eve was made from Adam's rib) to be fabulous, proceeds to explain that by the story is meant the creation of the external sense immediately after the creation of the mind. This took place when the mind was asleep. By "rib" he understands "one of the many powers of the mind; namely, that power which dwells in the outward senses." This mode of interpretation was followed by the Alexandrian school among the fathers, who, however, granted the historicity of the story. To them Eve represented the sensuous or perceptive part of man, and Adam the rational.¹ The Latin fathers did not go quite this length, although willing to allow that a spiritual sense underlay the literal, and to find in the formation of Eve from the side of Adam a type of the formation of the Church from the Saviour's side. Later on, among the schoolmen, Thomas Aquinas speaks of Eve as a type of the Church, and her formation from the side of Adam as a type of the sacraments — blood (i.e., the wine of the Lord's Supper) and water (i.e., baptism) — which flowed from the side of Christ.² In the same paragraph is the apparent genesis of the famous remark of Matthew Henry: "The woman was made of a rib out of the side of Adam; not made out of his head, to top him; not out of his feet, to be trampled upon by him; but out of his side, to be equal with him; from under his arm, to be protected; and from near his heart, to be beloved;" for he says, responding to arguments against the formation of woman from the rib of man, "Primo quidem ad significandum quod inter virum et mulierem debet esse specialis conjunctio; neque enim mulier debet dominari in virum; et ideo non est formata de capite; neque debet a viro despicere, tanquam serviliter subjecta; et ideo non est formata de pedibus."

3. The Mythical. — Adam, Eve, the whole story of the early life of the race, in short, is a mist spread over the face of creation. There were no beings corresponding to the biblical pair: the story is mere dramatic personation of ideas, — sexual contrast, sexual love, the beginning of existence.

4. The Poetical. — The advocates of this interpretation believe in all the results stated in Genesis, but not in the processes. The creation of woman after that of man they allow; but as for the story — it is a charming idyl. The Bible opens with a poem. Adam and Eve doubtless existed, but one cannot vouch for the actions attributed to them.

It remains to glance at the legends which are actually told about Adam and Eve. A very widely circulated opinion is, that man and woman were originally joined in one body, and that God separated them, the rabbins say by a hatchet. They say further, that, "When Eve had to be drawn out of the side of Adam, she was not extracted by the head, lest she should be vain; nor by the eyes, lest she should be wanton; nor by the mouth, lest she should be given to gossiping; nor by the ears, lest she should be an eavesdropper; nor by the hands, lest she should be meddlesome; nor by the feet, lest she should be a gadabout; nor by the heart, lest she should be jealous; but she was drawn forth by the side: yet, notwithstanding all these precautions, she has every fault specially guarded against." It was a rabbinical fancy that Eve was Adam's second wife, the first being Lilith. In this way the double account of woman's creation (Gen. i. 27 and ii. 18) was accounted for. Lilith was formed of clay at the same time with Adam, but expelled for pride and bad conduct. She subsequently married the Devil, and was the ancestress of the Jins, — creatures endowed with human and devilish qualities. According to the Targum of Jonathan, Eve was made from Adam's thirteenth rib.

EVERLYN, John, b. at Wotton, Surrey, Oct. 31, 1620; d. there Feb. 27, 1706. He is best known by his Sylva, London, 1664, an elaborate work upon arboriculture (the first book published by the Royal Society), and by his Diary from 1641 to 1706 (best edition by William Bray, with Life by Henry B. Wheatley, London, 1879, 4 vols.), a treasury of information in regard to the private life of his century. He is mentioned here because of his History of Religion, a Rational Account of the True Religion (first published from his manuscript by Rev. R. M. Evanson, London, 1850, 2 vols.), a valuable epitome of arguments against the infidelity of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Evelyn preserved an untarnished reputation at a time when men of his high social position were commonly lax in morals.

EVILMERO'DACH (Heb. אֵוִיל מֵרוֹדָךְ; LXX. Εὐιλμεροδᾶκ, Οὐλαμροδάχαρ, and variants; Babyl. Avil-Marduk; late pronunciation of Avil-Marduk, "man of the god Merodach") was the son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and reigned, according to Ptolemy's canon (list of Babylonian kings), B.C. 561-560. The only scriptural mention of him is in 2 Kings xxv. 27-30 (= Jer. lii. 31-34), where it is related, that, in the year of his accession, he released from prison, after a captivity of thirty-seven years, Jehoiachin, king of Judah, that he changed his prison-garments, set his seat above the seat of the ² Summe Theologicæ pars prima, quæst. xcell., art. III., Migne's ed., tom. 1., col. 1231. A modern instance of this allegorical interpretation is in Bishop Wordsworth's Church History to the Council of Nicaea (Lond. and N.Y., 1881): "Almighty God in Paradise formed Eve, the Bride of Adam, from the side of Adam as he slept, and she became 'the mother of all living.' So the spiritual Eve, the Church, the Bride of the Second Adam, 'Who is the Lord from heaven,' and the Author of the new, regenerate race, was formed from Christ, the Second Adam, sleeping in death on the cross, and she owes her life to the sacramental streams of Blood and Water which then issued from His side; and by her union with Him, and by the ministry of the Word and Sacraments instituted by Him, she imparts the life to all which she receives from her Lord" [pp. 3, 4].

Babylonian vassal-kings or princes, gave him a daily allowance, and made him his constant table companion. Notwithstanding this, Josephus (c. Ap., I. 20) represents him, on Berosus' authority, as a lawless and dissolute ruler. On the same authority he was murdered, after a two-years' reign, by his brother-in-law Neriglissar, whom Ptolemy's canon also names as his successor. The statement of Josephus (Ant., X. 11, 2), that he reigned eighteen years, is as little worthy of credence as the twelve years assigned to him by Alexander Polyhistor (Euseb., Chron., I. 6), or his regency of seven years, of which Jerome speaks (on Isa. xiv. 19). Contemporary records exist in the form of eleven contract tablets, inscribed in the cuneiform character, and dated in his reign, three from the year of his accession (B.C. 562), four from his first year, and four from his second year (W. ST. C. BOSCAWEN, in Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., VI. p. 52).

FRANCIS BROWN.

EVOLUTION and DEVELOPMENT. These phrases, so much used in the present day, have much the same meaning. Both point to one process viewed under two different aspects. Both indicate that one thing comes out of another. But development denotes the process going on; whereas evolution refers more to the process as we look back upon it. We talk of the seed being developed into the plant, and of the plant being evolved from the seed. Development or evolution is a method of procedure adopted by God, both in the kingdom of nature and the kingdom of grace.

1. There is undoubtedly development in nature. It is wrong in religious people to deny it. Everybody acts upon it. We all regard events as coming out of antecedent circumstances, commonly out of a concurrence, or train of occurrences. The process is seen more particularly in organic nature, in which there is a double development,—the seed from the plant, and the plant from the seed; the child from the parent, and, it may be, growing into the parent. Generally, in God's works, the present is the fruit of the past and the seed of the future. This was noticed from the beginning of observation. But of late years it has been scientifically examined, and the process is shown to be extensively employed, in a sense to be universal. What science and philosophy combined require to do in the present day is to determine the precise nature of development and the limits to it.

For several ages it has been acknowledged that there is universal causation; not merely the grand first and abiding Cause, but second causes. It is God who produces the spring; but he does so by agents, like the sun, the seed, and the soil. Pious people have come to acknowledge this, and have found it not inconsistent with their belief in God, to whose existence these works bear witness.

There is not only individual causation, that is, one cause producing its effect: there is combined and co-operative causation. I believe that J. S. Mill has shown that there is more than one agent in all physical causation. We speak of the cause of the killing of that plant to be the frost; but the full and true cause consists of the cold, and the state of the plant, without both of which the effect would not have occurred. I have shown that there is a like duality, or plurality, in the effect; each agent producing other effects. In almost all natural action there is a considerable number of agencies in the operation. What a variety of combined powers in the growth of every plant and in the production of spring!

Now, development consists essentially in a combination, or rather I would call it an organization, of causes, or, better still, a corporation of agencies for mutual action. Such are the united powers that produce the spring, that produce the plant, that produce the animal. Such are the activities which unite to produce the great events of history,—the rise and fall of literature in Greece, and of the Roman Empire, the Protestant Reformation, the English, French, and American Revolutions.

In many of these organizations I discover evident design. Such is the union of elements and powers producing vision,—the coats and humors, the rods, cones, and nerves, so arranged as to enable us to see. Such are the vibrations, the canals, convolutions, hammer and stirrup, and fibres, which work together to give the power of hearing. Men are led spontaneously, and I hold reasonably, to believe that there is design in these collocations, and adaptations of one thing to another, to produce a good end.

In some cases there is only one set of agencies in the development. A number of agencies are thrown, as it were, into a closed ball (this was a Pythagorean idea); and these as they work produce certain results, which are the same from year to year, and from age to age. In other cases, powers come in from without to act upon and with the more central and abiding agents, and so far modify and vary their actions: hence the varieties in the same species of plants and animals, and the differences between events so far alike, such as the English, French, and American Revolutions. In evolution thus considered there is nothing irreligious, provided we see therein the wise God carrying out his designs, and connecting the past, the present, and the future in one grand system.

The great and utterly inexcusable error of certain physicists is, that they make development do every thing, and supersede all other natural powers, and even God himself. This has made many good men turn away from the name and thing with aversion. But it is surely possible to maintain that evolution (that is, organized causation) reigns widely, even universally (that is, over all nature), and yet believe, that, like all creative action, it is limited, and is not the only process in operation, and that it is one, and only one, exercise of the mighty power of God. Let us notice its limitations.

1. It cannot give us the original matter, which must be there before it begins to develop. Its very name and nature indicate that there was something prior, from which it is derived. Whence did this come? We have clear proof that there is intelligence needed to organize nature (διακόσμεν, as Anaxagoras expresses it), and it is most reasonable to believe that He who arranged it also made it. At all events, evolution cannot give us the original matter, and we have to call in a power which I believe is still working.

2. Development cannot account for the beneficent order and special arrangements of the universe. Being itself blind, it might as readily work evil as good. A railway train, without a head and hand to set it on the track, might go on to destruction. We have to call in a power above itself to account for the beneficence of evolution.

3. There is evidence that new potencies have been added from time to time. Geology shows us new powers coming in. It is not possible to account for the actual phenomena of the world by a mass of molecules acting according to mechanical laws. There is no proof that there was life in the original atom, or molecule formed of atoms. How, then, did life come in when the first plant appeared? Was there sensation in the original molecule? If not, what brought it in when the first animal had a feeling of pleasure and pain? Was there mind in the first molecule, say a power of perceiving objects out of itself? Was there consciousness in the first monad, say a consciousness of self? Was there a power of discerning things, of comparing and judging, of noting resemblances and differences? Had they the power of reasoning, of inferring the unseen from the seen, of the future from the past? Were there emotions in these primitive existences, say a hope of continued existence, or a fear of approaching dissolution? All sober thinkers acknowledge that there is no evidence whatever in experience or reason to show that matter can produce mind, that mechanical action can generate thought, that chemical action can manufacture consciousness, that electricity can reason, or organic structure give us the idea of the good and holy. According, then, to the principles of thinking and right observation, we have to call in powers above the original physical forces to produce such phenomena. In particular there must have been a special act when man appeared with intelligence and moral discernment, with free will and love.

4. When these new and higher potencies come in, they act upon and act with the previously existing powers. In our bodily frame, mind acts harmoniously with matter, and the two produce joint results. The memory proceeds upon the information given by the senses, and the understanding and the conscience presuppose both the senses and the memory. Man is made of the dust of the ground; but there is breathed into him the breath of life, and he becomes a living soul.

5. As the result of the whole — of the action of the old forces and the introduction of the new — the work goes on in eras or epochs, in which we have, first, lifeless creation with all things mixed, then the separations of air from water, and of land from sea, the distinct appearance of the heavenly bodies, the forthcoming of plants, and animals rising higher and higher till they culminate in man.

6. This work combined — the evolution of the old and the superaddition of the new — is progressive, advancing from the inferior to the higher. This progression is still going on; and from causes now operating, especially from the intelligence and industry of man, there will be an increased fertility and wealth; and the earth and its principal inhabitant will be brought to a higher and higher condition.

In regard to development, see, on the one side, DARWIN'S Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and HERBERT SPENCER'S works, and, on the other side, DAWSON'S works, — Fossil Men and their Modern Representatives, The Chain of Life in Geological Time, Life's Dawn, Nature and the Bible, The Beginning of the World according to Revelation and Science, — and MIVART, On the Genesis of Species, and Man and Apes.

II. Analogous to this there is evolution in the kingdom of heaven. Many interesting correspondences may be traced between the two kingdoms. In both there are old powers and new, leading to higher and higher products. The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, and which ferments there. It is a seed becoming a tree. There is first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear.

It is our privilege to live under the dispensation of the Spirit. There were anticipations of the operation of this blessed agent in the Old Testament, who converted and sanctified individuals. But these manifestations were only partial. "For the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified." But Jesus spake of "the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive." When Jesus was taken up into heaven and glorified, the disciples waited for the promised blessing, which was fulfilled when the day of Pentecost was fully come, and the Spirit was poured out from on high.

When the spiritual begins to act, we have now two powers tending towards development and progression. First there are the mental powers, which have been acting previously, and which we may call the old or natural powers. Then there is the higher or spiritual power superinduced.

When a new power comes in, it does not set aside the old ones: on the contrary, it acts with them. We have this in the geological ages; for instance, in the introduction of intelligence in the midst of animalism. The senses continued to work, and to supply information, which is received, shaped, and guided by the intellect. When, at a further stage, the moral power came in, it did not supersede the intellect, which still operates, and tells us what things are; and upon this representation the conscience proceeds. It is the same when the still higher power, the spiritual power, acts. It does not push aside the senses, the conscience, the intelligence; but it purifies and guides them, and devotes them to higher ends.

There is the fullest accordance between the old powers and the superadded ones. They work in concert, as the soul does with the body, as the higher reason does with the senses and the animal impulses. The inspiration of Moses, of the prophets and apostles, did not destroy their natural character: it only sanctified and elevated them. The spirits of the prophets were subject unto them. Religion does not eradicate the natural powers: it moulds and directs them.

The development goes on in eras or epochs, like the ages of geology, like the days of Genesis. The patriarchal dispensation grows out of the antediluvian, the Jewish out of the patriarchal, the Christian out of the Jewish. We may discover marked epochs, even in the Christian Church, — the time of the fathers (a time of establishing), the mediæval church, the reformation churches, the denominational churches, the missionary churches, to expand into the millennial church.

The issue of this joint action of the old powers and the new is progression. We have an example in the opening of Genesis, where new manifestations appear in successive days or epochs, the whole culminating in man, in the image of God. In the church there was first the shadow, and then the substance. There are first types, and then the archetype. There are promises and then performances, predictions and then fulfilments. "Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual (πνευματικόν), but that which is natural (ψυχικόν); and afterward that which is spiritual." "And so it is written The first man was made a living soul; the second Adam was made a quickening spirit" (1 Cor. xv. 44-46); where we may mark the advancement from the merely living soul (ψυχὴν ζῶσαν) to the quickening spirit (πνεῦμα ζωοποιόν).

There is undoubtedly progression, development if we properly understand it, in the revelation which God has been pleased to make of his will. In the antediluvian times there was light like that of the dawn. There were prefigurations under the Levitical dispensation more minute and specific than in the patriarchal dispensations. There is higher ethical teaching in the prophetic books than in the older Scriptures. There is more spiritual teaching in the New Testament than in the Old. Jesus, in the fulness of time, becomes the light of the world. There is the fullest revelation of specific truth in the Epistles of Paul and John. This progressive work goes on under the two sets of powers,—the old and the new. This does not entitle us to argue, with some rational divines, that the new supersedes or sets aside the old.

Earnest minds have never been satisfied with such distant views of God as we have in causation and development. They have longed for and aspired after immediate communion with God. They have such in the dispensation of the Spirit. Here there is provision made for God dealing with each individual soul. There is room for convictions and conversions, for getting grace and more grace, for seasons of revival and refreshing. See MAN.

JAMES McCOSH.

EWALD, Georg Heinrich August, one of the most learned Oriental scholars of the century; b. Nov. 16, 1803, in Göttingen; d. there of heart-disease, May 4, 1875. His father was a linen-weaver. In 1820 he entered the University of Göttingen, where Eichhorn was then teaching; but Ewald denied having been much influenced by him. After teaching in the gymnasium at Wolfenbüttel for two years, he began in 1821 to teach as Repetent at Göttingen, and was made professor in 1827. In 1837 he was expelled from his position for having signed, with six other Göttingen professors, a protest against the revocation of the liberal constitution of 1833; which Ernst August, king of Hanover, effected. This action made him famous. In 1829 and 1836 he had visited France and Italy, and now (in 1838) visited England. The same year he received a call to Tübingen. He was never contented during his stay there, and came into bitter feud with Baur and the Tübingen school. After laboring ten years in Tübingen, he was recalled in 1848 to Göttingen, where he continued until 1866, when his bitter attacks upon the Prussian government, and his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the king of Prussia, were punished with his exclusion from the faculty of philosophy; but he was still allowed his salary and the privilege of lecturing. This latter privilege was withdrawn in 1865 on account of utterances in his Praise of the King and the People (4th ed., Stuttgart, 1869). He continued the uncompromising foe of the Prussian monarchy, and in 1869, and twice afterwards, was sent as the delegate of Hanover to the Prussian Parliament. [In 1874 he was imprisoned for three weeks for libel against Bismarck, whom he accused of ruining religion and morality in the war against Austria, and of picking out the best time for plunder and robbery in the war against France.]

Ewald was a solitary man. He was married twice; but from his childhood up he stood aloof from his fellows, had no intimate friends, and was, in an ever-increasing measure, intolerant of all opinions which contradicted his own. He felt himself called upon to go beyond the mere duties of the student and professor. He became a violent political pamphleteer, first against Ernst Georg of Hanover, and then against Prussia. In overweening but naive confidence, he dared to advise courts and church consistories, and addressed the Pope and the prelates in Germany on Roman errors. Their silence he construed into a confession that they were in the wrong. [Being asked why the Pope never answered his letter in which he called upon him to resign, Ewald replied, "He dare not!"]

But the intemperate vehemence of Ewald the citizen is only an accident to the patient laboriousness of Ewald the student, and his eminent contributions to philology and history. In the departments of Oriental language and criticism he has not had a superior. [His genius is even more remarkable than his learning, and in absolute defiant independence he stands alone.] His Hebrew grammar inaugurated a new era in Hebrew learning; and Hitzig, in his Preface to Isaiah, calls the author the second founder of the science of the Hebrew language. His History of Israel, in spite of errors of judgment and unreasonable dogmatism, must long remain the standard work in its line, and always a storehouse of the most patient research. He was indefatigable as lecturer, and equally so as author. At the University of Tübingen he gave instruction not only in Hebrew and Arabic, but also in the Persian, Turkish, Armenian, Coptic, and Sanscrit languages. Whatever department he devoted himself to, he threw an almost vehement enthusiasm into it. His literary activity began in 1823 with a work on the composition of Genesis (Die Comp. d. Genesis kritisch untersucht, Braunschweig), and only closed with an autobiography written during the last months of his life, which has not been published. The following list comprises his more important works: De Metris Carminum Arabicorum, Brunsv., 1825; D. Hohelied Salomō's übersetzt u. erklärt, 1826, 3d ed., 1866; Krit. Grammatik d. hebr. Sprache, 1827, subsequently enlarged, and Ausführl. Lehrbuch d. hebr. Sprache d. A. T., 1844, 8th ed., 1870 [Eng. trans. by Nicholson, Lond., 1836, of the Syntax alone, from 8th ed. by Kennedy, Edinb., 1879], also Hebr. Sprachlehre f. Anfänger, 1842 [Eng. trans. from 3d ed. by J. Y. Smith, Lond., 1870]; Com. in Apocalypsin Johannis, 1828; Grammatica Critica Ling. Arab., 2 vols., 1831-33; D. poetischen Bücher d. A. B., 1835-39, 3d ed., 1868 [Eng. trans., Lond., 1880 sqq.]; Propheten d. Volkes Israel, 7 vols., 1843-59, 3d ed., 1868 [Eng. trans., corresponding to vol. i.-iv., History of Israel, Lond., 1867-74, 5 vols.]; D. Alterthümer d. Volkes Israel, 1848 [Eng. trans. by Solly, Antiquities of Israel, Lond., 1876]; D. drei ersten Evangelien übers. u. erklärt, 1850; *D. äthiop. [An incident in Ewald's life, related by Dean Stanley in the Preface to the third volume of his Hist. of the Jewish Church, deserves mention here. While an Oxford student, Stanley visited Ewald at an inn in Dresden. During conversation the great scholar, grasping a small copy of the Greek Testament, said, "In this little book is contained all the wisdom of the world."] BERTHEAU.

EWING, Alexander, Bishop of Argyll and the Isles, Scotland; b. in Aberdeen, March 25, 1814; d. May 22, 1873. He was elected bishop 1846, and represented the Broad-Church school on the episcopal bench. The characteristics of his theology have been thus presented: "He dwelt specially upon the illuminating power of Christianity as revealing the Fatherhood of God, and thus 'rolling back the clouds of human sin and sorrow,' so as even ultimately to 'exhaust hell of its darkness.' To him each attribute of God was equally light, and therefore he did not believe that any compromise had ever been effected between them. Christ was the supreme manifestation of that light, and the Bible was but the medium of its revelation, the means for enabling it to stream in upon the soul from sources beyond the mere letter of the truths which the written word contained. One of the chief of these external sources of light, specially welcomed by Ewing, was science, to the discoveries of which he looked forward as destined to lead to the manifestation of other and higher aspects of Christianity than were yet fully realized." These views will be found in his volume of discourses, Revelation considered as Light, London and N.Y., 1873. See also Memoir of Alexander Ewing, D.C.L., by A. J. Ross, B.D., London, 1877.

EWING, Finis, one of the founders of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church; b. in Bedford County, Virginia, July 10, 1773; d. at Lexington, Mo., July 4, 1811. From Virginia he early removed to Tennessee, and subsequently to Kentucky. His education was limited; but, under the influence of the revivalist preachers, he offered himself as a candidate for the ministry, and was licensed in 1802 by the presbytery of Cumberland. In 1810 he formed, with two others, the presbytery out of which grew the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He is the author of Lectures on Import. Subjects in Divinity, Nashville, 1824.

EXACTIONS, EXACTIONES, TALLIÆ, in ecclesiastical law, are taxes levied by the church on the congregation, either entirely new, or of an increased scale. They were forbidden already by the Council of Toledo, 589, and often afterwards.

EXARCH denoted a hierarchical title intermediate between patriarch and metropolitan. When the church adopted Constantine's civil division of the realm into dioceses and provinces, the prelate of a province became a metropolitan, and of a diocese an exarch; and it was declared legal to appeal from the metropolitan to the exarch. From the exarch, however, there could be no appeal to the patriarch; though the higher rank of the latter was generally conceded, and also indicated by the fact, that, for instance, the patriarchate of Constantinople was formed by the absorption of three dioceses, — Pontus, Asia, and Thrace. In the fifth century the title of exarch seems to have disappeared. At present it is applied only in the Greek Church, and to the deputy of the Patriarch of Constantinople when visiting and inspecting the provinces.

EXCLUSIVA, in ecclesiastical law, means the right, claimed by Austria, France, and Spain, to exclude each one candidate at a papal election. The right has never been formally acknowledged by the curia; but the claim has always, since the fifteenth century, been complied with by the conclave.

EXCOMMUNICATION. I. AMONG THE HEBREWS. — Any person or thing — man, animal, weapon, tool, or piece of ground — which to pious eyes seemed abominable, or dangerous, or incorrigible, the Hebrews used to set apart from common life, transforming it into a kind of ban-offering, and sacrificing it to God, for him to do with it what he pleased, — destroying it, or simply rendering it harmless, or perhaps forgiving it. This usage, of which traces are found both among the Gauls (Cæsar, De Bello Gallico, 6, 17) and the Germans (Tacitus, Ann., 13, 57), was very old among the Hebrews, and showed itself conspicuously in their relation to foreigners, to heathenism, and to any thing opposed to their own system of religion. Not only objects of heathen worship, such as altars, idols, temples, etc., but even the larger part of the booty made in war, such as chariots, weapons, horses, etc., were destroyed. Whole cities, with all their inhabitants, every thing breathing within their walls, yea, whole nations, such as, for instance, the Canaanites, were annihilated; and that not for political reasons, but on account of a religious principle.

Its most awful application, however, this principle obtained within the nation itself, as a weapon against any thing attacking the sacred institutions of the theocracy. It then became, not the fulfilment of a vow, but the execution of a punishment, and assumed the form of an excommunication. Thus a single person, or even a whole city, which broke the covenant with God, and fell into idolatry, was put under the ban, and with a curse abandoned to destruction. If a single person, he was killed (Lev. xxvii. 29); if a whole city, all that breathed within its precinct were killed, and the rest were burnt (Deut. xiii. 16). That which could not be thus destroyed, such as metal utensils, the soil, etc., became the property of the sanctuary (Lev. xxvii. 21-28).

As instances, may be mentioned the punishment of the people of Succoth and Peniel (Judg. viii. 1-17), of Jabesh (Judg. xxi. 10), of Benjamin (Judg. xx. 48), etc.

In the course of time the rigor of the law abated, and the punishment assumed the character of a simple ecclesiastical penalty; as in the time of Ezra, when those Israelites who would not send away their foreign wives were excluded from the synagogue, and their property confiscated. In the period of the New Testament there seems to have been two different kinds of excommunication, — one milder (the ἀφορίζειν of Luke vi. 22), and another more severe (the ἀποσυνάγωγον γίνεσθαι or ποιεῖν of John ix. 22, xii. 42, and xvi. 2). The Talmud and the Rabbins also distinguish between two kinds of excommunication, — the נִרְיָ, which was limited to thirty days, and to the most intimate relations, and which did not exclude from the service, though the excommunicated was compelled to enter the synagogue through a peculiar door; and the חֲרֵם, which should be pronounced by at least ten members of the congregation, and meant not only exclusion from the temple and the synagogue, but also from intercourse with co-religionists. See BUXTORF: Lex. Talm.; LIGHTFOOT: Horæ Heb. ad Joh., 9, 22.

II. IN THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. — On scriptural authority (Matt. xvi. 19, xviii. 18; John xx. 23; 1 Thess. v. 14; James v. 16; 1 John i. 8, v. 16; 2 Cor. v. 18) grave sins were punished in the ancient church with excommunication; and by the councils of Ancyra, 314 (c. 4, 6, 8, 9, 16), and Nicæa, 325 (c. 11, 12), the proceedings were completely systematized; only after a severe course of penitence the excommunicated was re-admitted into the bosom of the church. In the Western Church, however, this practice of doing public penance never obtained firm foothold, and soon disappeared altogether. But a double kind of excommunication developed, — an excommunicatio minor, excluding the culprit from the sacraments only; and an excommunicatio major, which also excluded him from the mass, from burial in consecrated ground, from ecclesiastical jurisdiction, and from all intercourse with other Christians, excepting a few cases, — utile, lex, humile, res ignorata, necesse. This last part, however, of the punishment, the Church could not enforce by her own power: she had to ask for the aid of the State, and she obtained it. The State declared the excommunicated infamous (c. 17, C. 16, qu. 1), all obligations to him, as, for instance, the feudal obedience, null and void (c. 4, 5, C. 15, qu. 6), etc. How completely the mediæval State submitted to the Church may be seen from the demands which the Pope made (1213 and 1219) to the Emperor Frederic II., and (1230) to his son King Henry VI., and to which these princes consented (Pertz, Mon., 4, 224, 231, 267). The canon law reigned supremely in most relations, and aspired to do so in them all.

With the Reformation a great change took place. In all Protestant countries where the State took the supremacy over the Church, the excommunicatio major was abolished as a secular punishment; but the excommunicatio minor was still retained as a point of church discipline, as a pœna medicinalis. Luther held, as did most of the Reformers, that, by admitting an impenitent to the Lord's Supper, the minister shared in the sin thereby committed. But he also held that this excommunication from the Lord's Supper should never be administered unless with the concurrence of the whole congregation. This last idea, however, was not carried out; and the excommunication itself gradually fell into disuse in the Reformed churches. The Roman-Catholic Church, which still pretends to maintain her social independence, and her supremacy over the State, continued to treat the precepts of canon law as valid theoretically. Practically she has found out long ago that modifications are necessary, since an excommunication pronounced by the Pope, but not enforced by the State, would have no civil effect whatever; and an enforcement by the State is not likely to take place any more. The present theoretical arrangement of the whole question is set forth in the constitution of Oct. 12, 1869, Apostolica sedis. See KÖBER: Der Kirchenbau, Tübingen, 1857; GOESCHEN: Doctrina de disciplina ecclesiastica ex ordinationibus, Halle, 1859.

EXEGESIS, EXEGETICAL THEOLOGY. I. DEFINITION. — One of the four leading departments of theological science, and lying at the base of the others, — historical, systematic, practical. It has to do with the interpretation of the scriptures of the Old and New Testaments, which in the Protestant churches are regarded as the only infallible rule of the Christian faith and life, and the ultimate tribunal in all controversies. The term ἐξηγησις (from ἐξηγέομαι, "to lead out," "to expound") is borrowed from classical usage: the expounders of the oracles of Delphi, and the sacred rites in Athens, were called "exegetes" (ἐξηγηταί). In the New Testament the verb occurs once, in John i. 18, where it is said of Christ that he declared or revealed (ἐξηγήσατο) the hidden being of God. Exegesis originated among the Jewish scribes, passed into the Christian Church, and is now most extensively cultivated in Protestant Germany, Holland, England, and the United States. Every theological school must, first of all, have a chair of exegesis or biblical literature: most of them have two or more, for the Old and the New Testaments.

II. BRANCHES. — Exegetical theology, in the widest sense, embraces, beside exegesis proper, the following auxiliary and supplementary branches of theological learning: 1. Biblical philology (Greek for the New Testament, Hebrew and Chaldean for the Old Testament); 2. Biblical geography (Egypt, Mount Sinai, Palestine); 3. Biblical archaeology or antiquities; 4. Biblical history (from the creation to the close of the apostolic age); 5. Textual criticism (the restoration of the original text of the sacred writers); 6. A literary history of the Bible, usually called Historico-Critical Introduction (including an account of the several books, their genuineness, integrity, authorship, time and place of composition); 7. History of the canon; 8. Biblical hermeneutics (the science of the laws of interpretation); 9. Biblical theology (the summing-up of the results of exegesis in systematic form). See those titles.

III. KINDS OF EXEGESIS. — 1. Translation; 2. Periphrase; 3. Commentary. Of commentaries proper we may distinguish again three kinds. 1. Philological or grammatico-historical exegesis brings out simply the meaning of the writer according to the laws of language and the usus loquendi at the time of composition, and according to the historical situation of the writer, irrespective of any doctrinal or sectarian bias. It implies a thorough knowledge of Greek and Hebrew, and familiarity with contemporary literature. 2. Theological exegesis develops the doctrinal and ethical ideas of the writer in organic connection with the whole teaching of the Scriptures, and according to the analogy of faith. 3. Homiletical or practical exegesis is the application of the well-ascertained results of grammatical and theological interpretation to the wants of the Christian congregation, and belongs properly to the pulpit.

IV. HISTORY OF EXEGESIS. — 1. Jewish Exegesis, confined to the Old Testament. It began soon after the age of Ezra, but was first carried on by oral tradition of the scribes or Jewish scholars. It was especially devoted to the law (the Thorah), i.e., the Pentateuch, and derived from it minute rules for the individual, social, and ecclesiastical relations. The body of these interpretations is called "Midrash." The prevailing method of exegesis was the rabbinical or literal. It excluded all foreign ideas, and was subservient to the strict legalism of the Pharisees. But among the Hellenist (Greek-speaking) Jews, especially in Alexandria, the allegorizing method obtained favor, especially through Philo (d. about 40 A. D.), who endeavored to combine the Mosaic religion with Platonic philosophy, and prepared the way for the allegorizing exegesis of Clement, and Origen of Alexandria. The Jewish rabbins of the middle ages cultivated grammatical exegesis at a time when the knowledge of Hebrew had died out in the Christian Church. The most distinguished among them are Ibn Ezra (d. 1167), R. Sal. Isaak or Rashi (d. 1105), David Kimchi (d. 1190), Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Their commentaries are printed separately, and also in the so-called Rabbinical Bibles (e.g., of Buxtorf, Basel, 1618, 3 vols. folio).

2. Patristic Exegesis. — The first use made of the Bible in the Christian Church was practical and homiletical. It was to the early Christians what it is still to the great mass of believers, and will be to the end of time, — a book of life, of spiritual instruction and edification, of hope and comfort. Scientific or learned exegesis began when the Bible was perverted by heretics, and made to serve all sorts of errors. The Greek Church took the lead. Origen (180–251), the greatest scholar of his age, a man of genius and iron industry, is the father of critical exegesis. He is full of suggestive ideas and allegorical fancies. He distinguishes three senses in the Bible corresponding to the three parts of man: (a) A literal or bodily sense, (b) A moral or psychic sense, (c) An allegorical or mystic, spiritual sense. Where the literal sense is offensive, he escaped the difficulty by adopting a purely spiritual sense. The greatest commentators of the Greek Church are Chrysostom (d. 407), who in his Homilies explained the principal books of the Old and New Testaments, Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 429), Theodoret of Cyrus (d. 457). Among the Latin fathers, Augustine (d. 430) is the profoundest and most spiritual, Jerome (d. 419) the most learned, expounder. The latter achieved the highest merit by his improved Latin version of the Bible (the Vulgate), which remains to this day the standard version of the Roman Church. The Council of Trent forbade the interpretation of Scriptures, except according to "the unanimous consent of the fathers." But this rule would prevent all progress in theology; and, besides, such a "unanimous consent" does not exist, except in the fundamental doctrines.

3. Medieval Exegesis was purely traditional, and consisted of brief glosses (glossaria), or extracts from the fathers (called Catena Patrum). The original languages of the Bible were unknown in the West; and even the first among the scholastics had to depend upon Jerome's version for their knowledge of God's word. The prevailing method distinguished four senses of the Scriptures: (a) The literal, or historical; (b) The spiritual, or mystic, corresponding to faith, teaching what to believe (credenda); (c) The moral, or tropological, which corresponds to love or charity, and teaches what to do (agenda); (d) The anagogical, which refers to hope (speranda). These senses are expressed in the mnemonic verse: —

"Littera gesta docet;
Quid credas, allegoria;
Moralis, quid agas;
Quo tendas, anagogia."

The principal patristic compilations are: (a) In the Greek Church, those of Eusebius (d. 309), Theophylactus (d. 1007), Euthymius Zigabenus (d. 1118), and Nicephorus (fourteenth century); (b) In the Latin Church, Wallfried Strabo (d. 849), Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274). The Catena aurea in Evangelia of Thomas Aquinas has been reproduced in an English translation by Pusey, Keble, and Newman.

Among the more independent biblical scholars of the middle ages who prepared the way for the Reformation must be mentioned Nicolaus à Lyra (d. 1340; "Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset"), and Laurentius Valla (d. 1465).

4. The exegesis of the Protestant Reformers of the sixteenth century marks a new epoch. It is full of enthusiasm for the word of God, and free from the slavery of ecclesiastical tradition. It went directly to the original Greek and Hebrew Scriptures, and furnished the best translations for the benefit of the people; while Romanism regards the Bible as a book for the priesthood, and discourages or prohibits efforts for its general circulation without note or comments. All the leading Reformers wrote commentaries, more or less extensive, on various books of the Bible, — Luther (d. 1546), Melancthon (d. 1560), Zwingli (d. 1531), Ecolampadius (d. 1531); the ablest of them are by Calvin (d. 1564) and his pupil and successor, Beza (d. 1603). Calvin combines almost all the qualifications of an expounder, in rare harmony; and his commentaries on Genesis, the Psalms, the Prophets, and all the books of the New Testament (except Revelation, on which he did not write), are valuable to this day. Beza, by his Greek Testament, his Latin version, and notes on the New Testament, had great influence on the English version of King James.

5. Protestant commentaries of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, by Hugo Grotius (d. 1645; Arminian); Vitringa (d. 1722; Dutch Calvinist); Hammond (d. 1660; Church of England); Matthew Poole (Presbyterian; d. 1679; Annotations upon the Whole Bible, an English synopsis from his Latin synopsis); Matthew Henry (Independent; d. 1714; the best homiletical commentator of England; many editions, from 3 to 9 vols., Lond. and N.Y.); Patrick, Lowth, Arnald, and Whitby (Lond., 1694 sqq., new ed., Lond., 1822, in 6 vols., Phila. and N.Y., in 4 vols.); Calovius (Lutheran; d. 1686; Biblia Illustrata, versus Grotius); A. Clarke (Methodist, Lond., 1810-23, in 8 vols., best ed., London, 1844, in 6 vols.); John Gill (Baptist; d. 1771; London, 1763, 9 vols.); Philip Doddridge (Independent; d. 1751; author of Family Expositor); J. A. Bengel (Lutheran; d. 1752; author of the Latin Gnomon of the New Testament, twice translated into English, and largely used by John Wesley in his Notes, an admirable specimen of mutuum in parvo); Thomas Scott (Family Bible, London, 1796, 4 vols., 11th ed., 1825, 6 vols.). Collective works: Critici Sacri (Lond., 1660, 9 tom., Amsterdam, 1698-1732, in 13 vols.), compiled from the principal commentators, as an appendix to Walton's Polyglot, under the direction of Bishop Pearson and others; Poole's Synopsis Criticorum aliorumque S. Scripture interpretum (London, 1669-76, 4 vols. in 5, fol.), a very useful abridgment from the Critici Sacri and other commentators.

6. Exegesis in the nineteenth century. It is exceedingly prolific, chiefly German, English, and American. The Bible is now more studied than ever before, and with a better knowledge of the languages, antiquities, geography, and history. We can only mention a small number of works.

(a) Commentaries on the whole Bible: Lange's Bibelewerk (Bielefeld and Leipzig, 1857-77, in 16 parts; English translation, with large additions, by Philip Schaff, aided by more than forty American contributors, New York and Edinburgh, 1864-80, in 25 vols. royal 8vo, including a separate volume on the Apocrypha and a complete index), a threefold commentary, critical, doctrinal, and homiletical, for the use of ministers and theological students; Chr. Wordsworth (Bishop of Lincoln), The Holy Bible with Notes and Introductions (London, 1869 sqq., 6 vols., several editions), High Church, devout, patristic, uncritical; a Commentary in French, by Professor Reuss, in Strassburg (Paris, 1875-81, in 13 parts, with an index), is independent and critical; Jamieson, Fausset, and Brown, A Commentary, Critical, Experimental, and Practical (Edinb., repub. in Phila., 1875, in 6 vols., and at Hartford, Conn., in 1 vol.); Henry Cowles (d. 1881) commentaries, N.Y., 1861-81, 16 vols.; The Speaker's Commentary, suggested by the speaker of the House of Commons, ed. by Canon F. C. Cook aided by a number of bishops and presbyters of the Church of England (London and New York, 1871-82, in 10 vols., 6 for the Old, 4 for the New Testament), less learned, but more popular, than Lange, and like the Church of England, eminently respectable and conservative; The Pulpit Commentary, ed. by Canon Spence and Rev. Joseph S. Exell aided by a large number of English divines (London, 1880 sqq.), to embrace many volumes; similar in plan to Lange's Commentary.

(b) On the Old Testament: Keil and Delitzsch, Eng. trans., pub. by Clark, Edinburgh, 1869 sqq.; Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Test., by Knobel, Bertheau, Dillmann, and others (new ed., Leipzig, 1880, etc.).

(c) On the New Testament: Olshausen (1837-56), trans.; De Wette (d. 1849), revised by Brückner and others; Meyer (d. 1874), revised in every new edition by Weiss and others, Eng. trans. pub. by Clark, Edinb.; Alford, The Greek Testament, etc. (in 4 vols., 6th ed., London, 1868 sqq.); J. B. McClellan (Lond., 1st vol., 1875). All these are for critical students of the Greek text. Popular commentaries on the New Testament: Albert Barnes (d. 1870) was one of the first, and had by far the widest circulation of any in America and England. More recent works: A New Test. Com. for English Readers, ed. by Bishop Ellicott (Lond., 1879, in 3 vols.); Illustrated Popular Com., ed. by Schaff, with English and American contributors (N. Y. and Edinb., 1879-83, in 4 vols., also issued since 1882 in small volumes, revised, under the title International Revision Com., based upon the Revised Version of 1881). Besides, there are many shorter and denominational commentaries. The Revision of 1881, and the International Lesson system, have greatly stimulated exegetical activity; and the market is now flooded with all sorts of helps for the study of the Bible.

(d) The present century has also produced a large number of exegetical works of the first order on separate books of the Bible, which it would be impossible here to enumerate. Among recent commentators on one or more books of the Old Testament, Gesenius (Isaiah), Ewald (the poetical and prophetic books), Hupfeld (the Psalms), Hitzig (Psalms, minor prophets), Hengstenberg (Psalms, etc.), Delitzsch (Psalms, Isaiah), Keil (historical books), Schlottmann (Job), Stuart (Daniel, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes), Joseph A. Alexander (Psalms and Isaiah) occupy the first rank.

Of New-Testament commentators on special books must be mentioned Winer (on Galatians), Fritzsche (Matthew, Mark, Romans; all in Latin), Tholuck (Romans, Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount), Lücke, Bleek, Harless, Stier, von Hofmann, Godet, Stuart, Hodge, Alexander, Stanley, Jowett, Ellicott, and Lightfoot. Among these, again, the following commentaries may be recommended as being very useful for a critical study of the Greek Testament: Tholuck on the Sermon on the Mount; Lücke on the writings of John; Luthardt on the Gospel of John; Keil on the four Gospels; Morison on Matthew and Mark; Tholuck, Forbes, Philippi, Hodge, Beet, and Shedd on Romans; Stanley on Corinthians; Wieseler on Galatians; Harless on Ephesians; Bleek on the Hebrews (especially the large work in 3 vols.); Beek on the Pastoral Epistles; Elliott on the Apocalypse; Ellicott on Galatians, Ephesians, Thessalonians, and Pastoral Epistles (republished in Andover); Lightfoot on Galatians, Philippians, and Colossians; Godet on Luke, John, and Romans (in French, and trans., in Clark's For. Theol. Libr.).

PHILIP SCHAFF.

EXEMPTION, in ecclesiastical law, means the transference of persons or institutions from the jurisdiction of their nearest regular superior to that of some special or higher superior. The most noticeable instance of exemption in the Roman-Catholic Church is found in the history of monasticism. The monks were originally subject to the jurisdiction of the bishop. See the Council of Chalcedon, 451. can. 4 (c. 12, Can. XVI. qu. I. : c. 10, Can. XVIII. qu. III.). But in course of time, first single monasteries, and then whole orders, succeeded in liberating themselves from the episcopal rules, and placing themselves immediately under the Pope. The change, however, did not take place without contest; and the acts of the Councils of Constance and Trent show the bitterness which prevailed on both sides. In the Reformed Churches there was no use for exemptions, except in cases in which the Lutheran and the Calvinistic or one of the Reformed and the Roman-Catholic Church met each other in the same parish. The first instance of exemption in the Reformed Churches was that of the prince, who placed himself outside of the regular ecclesiastical jurisdiction; then followed, in some countries, that of the royal officers, in others, that of the army, and in others, that of the whole nobility, etc.

EXERCISES, Spiritual (exercitia spiritualia), a term applied, in the Roman-Catholic asceticism, to certain exercises in meditation and mortification practices, both by ecclesiastics and laymen, generally under the guidance of the confessor, and partly as general penance, partly as a preparation for the Lord's Supper, ordination, etc. It was Ignatius Loyola who developed this institution of spiritual exercises to its highest and most elaborate form; and Pope Alexander VII. granted full absolution to any one, ecclesiastical or layman, who for eight days should practise these exercises in a house of the Jesuits, and according to the method of Loyola. See The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius of Loyola, trans. from the Latin by Charles Seager, Baltimore, 1819.

EXETER, chief town of Devonshire, Eng.; population, 31,650; on the Exe, ten miles from its mouth, in the English Channel; is on the site of the British stronghold Caer Ise, and the Roman town, Isea Damnoniorum. It was afterwards occupied by Britons and Saxons, and called Exancester, whence comes the modern name. In 1050 the episcopal see of Devonshire, founded at Crediton, 910, was removed to Exeter. Its cathedral dates from the twelfth century, and, although not as large as some others, is inferior to none in architectural beauty. It was restored 1877. The income of the see of Exeter is £1,200; and the present bishop is Dr. Frederick Temple, who was consecrated 1869.

EXODUS OF THE CHILDREN OF ISRAEL.

The Pharaoh of the exodus is Menephtah I., the son of Rameses the Great, the Pharaoh of the oppression. This is now so generally acknowledged, that it may be accepted as a settled fact. The other view—that Amosis I. was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Thothmes II. that of the exodus—has been given up by R. S. Poole, formerly its chief advocate, in his article upon Egypt, in the ninth edition of the Britannica. The date of the exodus may be set down as April 15, 1317 B.C. The other view mentioned would put it in 1485 B.C. A striking though strangely unnoticed passage in Herodotus seems to add confirmation to the accepted date. (See Schaff, Through Bible Lands, p. 102.) He says that the son of Rameses, whom the Greeks called "Sesostris," undertook no warlike expeditions, being struck with blindness, owing to the following circumstance. The river had swollen to the unusual height of eighteen cubits, and had overflowed all the fields, when, a sudden wind arising, the water rose in great waves. Then the king, in a spirit of impious violence, seized his spear, and hurled it into the strong eddies of the stream. Instantly he was smitten with disease of the eyes, from which, after a little while, he became blind, continuing without the power of vision for ten years" (I. c. 111). This reads like a confused reminiscence of Menephtah's overthrow in the Red Sea. It is no objection that the king is said to have lived ten years thereafter; for the Bible-account does not compel us to believe that the Pharaoh perished then. The monuments, as was to be expected, contain no account of the disaster.

The route of the exodus is thus described in Scripture language: "The children of Israel journeyed from Ramesis to Succoth" (Exod. xii. 37); from Succoth they went to Etham, in the edge of the wilderness (xiii. 20); there they turned, and encamped "before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-Zephon" (xiv. 2). In Numbers (xxxiii. 2-10) there is another account, which presents the same facts in a more condensed form. The identification of the localities mentioned is not yet settled; but that given by Ebers seems most probable. This is: Rameses was el Maskhuta, at the head of the Wady Tannilat; Succoth, Sechet (Taubastum of the Romans), north-east of Lake Timsah; Etham (fortress), a frontier fortress city; Pi-hahiroth, Ajrud, a fortress a few miles north-east of Suez ("Pi" is merely the Egyptian article); Migdol, Bir Suweis, about two miles from Suez; Baal-Zephon is Mount Atakah.

The collection of the great multitude—six hundred thousand men capable of bearing arms (i.e., between twenty and sixty years old), besides women and children, or in all between two millions and three millions—was the work of three or four days. The rallying-place was Rameses (el Maskhuta). To this point the Israelites streamed from different parts, as they had been directed to do. The existence of tribal organization explains the fact that they marched in some sort of order. Yet they had so recently been emancipated, and were so entirely unmixed, that it was, humanly speaking, impossible for them to stand an attack from the disciplined Egyptian army. Accordingly, when Moses had led them as far as Etham upon the highway to Palestine, the seat of a garrison, he abruptly turned to the south, and went south for fifty miles until they reached Pi-hahiroth, over against Baal-Zephon, in the neighborhood of the present Suez. But their sudden disappearance from Etham naturally led the garrison there to believe that they had become entangled in the wilderness; and word to that effect was sent to Pharaoh (Exod. xiv. 3). The explanation of the delay in their pursuit is, that the universal bereavement had centred the attention of the Egyptians upon their funeral-rites, which required some ten weeks (Gen. l. 3), and which were paramount in importance. Nothing could be done until they were over. At the end of the seventy days, active measures were taken to bring back the fugitive slaves; and to the Israelites came the dismaying intelligence that the host of Pharaoh was upon their track. Before them was the Red Sea, behind them the angry host. No wonder they murmured, and said to Moses in bitter irony, "Because there are no graves in Egypt [that land of graves] hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" (Exod. xiv. 11.) But man's extremity is God's opportunity. "Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong [north] east wind all the night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left" (Exod. xiv. 21, 22).

There are three chief explanations of these verses. 1. The Arab tradition locates the crossing a few miles south of Suez, where the sea is about ten miles broad, and supposes the host to have made the distance thither in the night. This view meets best a literal interpretation of the narrative; for then the waters would have been a veritable wall upon either hand, and is maintained by von Raumer (Zug der Is. aus Aeg. nach Canaan, Leipzig, 1837). But it would have required an accumulation of miracles to have brought them to the place in so short a time, especially as there is but a narrow footpath between the Atakah range and the sea. Besides, the mention of the wind suggests that God employed natural means. Hence this view may be dismissed for the second.

2. The crossing took place at the head of the gulf, near or north of Suez. The gulf is here horn-shaped, and is a mere channel about four miles long by less than a mile wide. At low water, small islands and sand-banks are visible in it, and it is fordable by those acquainted with it. The strong wind laid this stretch bare, and over it the Israelites crossed. The waters had been driven into the south-west bay; and there they were a wall on the one hand, while those of the open sea were a wall on the other. The miracle was, as Dr. Robinson says, a "miraculous adaptation of the laws of nature to produce a required result."

3. The theory now associated with Brugsch (L'exode et les monuments égyptiens, Leipzig, 1875, for trans. see below in LIT.), although it is older, having been advocated as early as 1726 by Hermann van der Hardt, and recently by M. J. Schleiden (Die Landenge von Suez, Leipzig, 1858).

Sayce adopted it in 1881. According to this, the Israelites assembled at San (Zoan); and the "crossing" was not over the Red Sea at all, but over the Serbonian bog. To this view there are so many objections, that, as Dr. Bartlett says, it "derives its chief importance from the eminence and ability of its latest advocate (Brugsch)." It requires a renaming and replacing of every locality,—in itself, be it granted, no insuperable objection. Yam Suph is the Serbonian bog; Mara is the Bitter Lakes; Elim is Thent-remu; Etham is just before one crosses the lowest part of Lake Menzaleh; Pi-hahiroth is at the hither side of the Serbonian bog; Baal-Zephon is Mount Casius, upon the Mediterranean Sea. There the Israelites crossed, and came south-west and south to Ain Musa. The theory turns upon the meaning of yam suph. The words mean literally the weedy or reedy sea. Surely they fit better the shallow, reedy lakes of North-eastern Egypt than the Red Sea; but the stubborn fact is, that they are uniformly applied to the latter by the Seventy, who had the best means of knowing what the Hebrew meant; and thus the argument upon which the theory rests is worthless, and all Brugsch's learning and enthusiasm cannot give it value. He derives his proofs mainly from the following letter, written, Geikie thinks, to recall the gendarmerie who had watched the wall at Takhu, a fortress on the eastern frontier of the Delta, when the Hebrews, prior to the exodus, were advancing toward it. It reads thus: "Notice! when my letter reaches you, bring the Madjai at once, who were over the foreign Sakkhi who have escaped. Do not bring all the men I have named in my list. Give attention to this. Bring them to me to Takhu, and I will admit them and you" (Hours with the Bible, vol. ii. p. 182).

That the Seventy were correct in interpreting yam suph by τὴν ἐρυθρὰν θάλασσαν ("the Red Sea") is very plain when another passage in Exodus is compared. Thus (Exod. x. 19) the locusts were east by a west wind "into the Red Sea" (εἰς τὴν θάλασσαν τὴν ἐρυθρὰν); but it would have required a south wind to have blown them into the Serbonian bog.

There are other objections to the Schleiden-Brugsch theory. Ebers contests the Egyptological proof. Dr. Bartlett (p. 171) urges that the identification of Rameses and Zoan "seems incompatible with the use of both names in the Scriptures and in the same book (e.g., Numbers), without a hint of their identity." Dr. J. P. Thompson, in the Bibliotheca Sacra for January, 1875, adds: (1) "This theory, locating Rameses at Zoan, would require the Israelites first to march a long distance away from their destination to the place of rendezvous, to cross the Pelusiac arm of the Nile, and to recross it next day,—a process sufficiently improbable; (2) That the supposed route would take them on the most direct way towards the Philistines, contrary to the express statement of Exod. iii. 17; (3) That the leading of an army into the treacherous Serbonian bog, when there was a military road and a great thoroughfare south of it, is a strategical blunder not supposable in Moses, much less in Egyptian generals who were accustomed to the whole region, having frequently led their armies to the east."

It is important to remember that the night of the crossing was a terrible one. In the language of the Psalmist, "The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows [the lightnings] lightened the world; the earth trembled and shook" (Ps. lxxvii. 17, 18). The pillar of fire was between the Israelites and the Egyptians: so where the latter, accustomed to see the flaming torches at the head of the host, supposed the van of the Israelites to be, there was really their rear. Misled, therefore, they forced their jaded horses onward, thinking they had already got into the very midst of the flying slaves. Under divine guidance, and perhaps miraculously hastened, the Israelites made the crossing in safety; but the Egyptians labored under unexpected difficulties. "At the morning watch the LORD looked unto the host of the Egyptians," and "troubled" (i.e., threw them into confusion), and "took off their chariot-wheels, so that they drave them heavily." The morning dawned. The Egyptians saw their slaves upon the bank, but saw also that the sea had broken its barrier, and was pouring in upon them. Amid groans and curses the pride of Egypt's army sank beneath the waves; while the Israelites sang their new song: "Who is like unto Thee, O LORD, among the gods? who is like unto Thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?" "Thus the LORD saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians, and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the seashore."

EXORCISM (ἑξορκισμός, "adjuration"), a solemn adjuration with the intent of expelling evil spirits. Our Lord cured many cases of demonic possession, and conferred the power to do the same upon his disciples (Matt. x. 8). They were, however, not always successful (Matt. xvii. 19). The Jews likewise professed to have the power of casting out evil spirits; and Josephus mentions that it was done in his day with the aid of roots and a ring, by which the demon was extracted through the nose.

In the early church, exorcism was regarded as a charism which belonged to all Christians. Tertullian (Apol. 23) lays it down as an indisputable fact that the simple command of a Christian was sufficient to expel evil spirits. Origen (Cont. Celsum, VII.) testifies to the same thing, and notices that no artificial incantations were used. At a later period the exorcist was one of the four inferior orders of the clergy, and received ordination (Apost. Const., VIII. 26). Bishop Cornelius of Rome (251) makes mention of this. The Roman-Catholic priesthood are still ordained exorcists before being ordained priests.

It was the practice to exorcise catechumens, on the principle that all who did not believe in Christ belonged to the Devil. In the case of children at baptism, the priest breathed upon the child. The name of Christ, or a simple passage of Scripture, was considered efficacious in exorcism.

The Greek and Latin Churches still use not only formulas of exorcism at baptism, but also practise it over those actually possessed. In the latter case the patient is first sprinkled with holy water, after which the priest says, "I exorcise thee, unclean spirit, in the name of Jesus Christ: tremble, O Satan, thou enemy of mankind," etc. The Calvinistic Churches, at the Reformation, renounced exorcism. But Luther and Melancthon favored its retention, and the other Lutheran theologians followed them. Heshusius, in 1583, was the first to propose its omission, but was answered by Menius, in a tract (De Exorcismo), 1590. At present exorcism is given up; and the catechumen in the Lutheran Church says, "I renounce the devil and his works," etc. [The English Church retained exorcism in the Prayer-Book of Edward VI., the priest saying, "I command thee, unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, that thou come out and depart from this infant," etc. It was, however, omitted in the revised Prayer-Book; and the seventy-second canon of the Church of England expressly forbids any priest attempting to expel demons.] See SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dict. Antiq. ALT.

EXPECTANCY (expectantia, expectiva, gratia expectiva), in canon law, means a prospective claim to an ecclesiastical benefice, granted before the benefice has actually fallen vacant. This curious custom, of giving a man a successor before he has died himself, developed very early in the mediæval church, and not altogether without some good reasons. It proved an effective means of preventing a benefice from being kept vacant, during which vacancy its revenues fell into the hands of strangers; and it might also be successfully applied as a check to too narrow provincial interest in the appointment of ecclesiastical officers, whereby the general interest of the church was made to suffer. But it soon developed into a hideous cancer,—an opportunity for the meanest speculation, for greed, fraud, and violence. Already the Lateran Council of 1179 forbade this custom, but in vain. It was restricted by the Council of Constance, again forbidden by the Council of Basel, and finally abolished by the Council of Trent. Only in one case the Council of Trent still acknowledged it (Sess. 25 de reform. c. 7),—in the case of the appointment of a coadjutor to a bishop with expectancy of succession.

EXSUPERIUS, Bishop of Toulouse in the latter half of the fourth and the beginning of the fifth century, distinguished himself by the noble charity he showed during the frightful depredations of the Alani, Vandals, and Suevi, neglecting his own sufferings in order to administer to the sufferings of others. Jerome dedicated his commentary on the Prophet Zechariah to him. See Act. Sanct., Sept. 28.

EXTREME UNCTION (the rite of anointing the dying with oil) is the fifth of the seven sacraments of the Roman-Catholic Church. It is based upon Mark vi. 13 and Jas. v. 14, 15. In both these cases the rite is applied for the purpose of healing the sick, not in order to prepare them for death; which is the principal meaning of the sacrament in the Catholic Church. As for the fathers of the Greek Church, it will suffice to say that John of Damascus treats only of baptism and the Lord's Supper under the mysteries of the Church. Among the writers of the Western Church, Irenæus has been appealed to as the first witness to the existence of the institution; but Irenæus (I. 21, 5) simply says that the Herakleonites, a Gnostic sect, anointed the dying with a mixture of oil and water to protect them from hostile spirits in the other world. This practice by no means implies, as Bellarmine and other Catholic theologians affirm, a church sacrament of which it was a perversion. Tertullian and Cyprian, who describe at length the customs of the Western Church, do not mention extreme unction, while they discuss the Lord's Supper and baptism at length.

The use of oil, however, for producing miraculous cures, is noticed by many of the Fathers. Tertullian (Ad Scap. 4) mentions that Proculus healed the Pagan Severus, the father of Antoninus, with oil. Popular superstition took hold of these cures, and went so far, that, as early as the fourth century, we find the people stealing the lamps from the churches in order to preserve the oil for miraculous cures (Chrysos., Hom. 32, in Matth. vi.). They did the same with the baptismal water. This superstition was the germ of the subsequent sacramental idea of the church. The transition is apparent in a letter of Innocent I. (416) to Bishop Decentius of Eugubium, which expressly calls anointing with oil a kind of sacrament (genus sacramenti). But the application of the oil was not confined to the priesthood: it was the prerogative of all Christians. From the close of the eighth century the rite is mentioned very frequently in the acts of councils. Theodulf of Orleans (798) and the first Council of Mayence (817) associate repentance and the Eucharist with it. The synod of Chalons (813) attributes spiritual as well as physical efficacy to the oil; and the synod of Regiaticinum (850) calls the rite a healthful sacrament (salutare sacramentum), of which one must partake by faith in order thereby to secure forgiveness of sins, and restoration of health. The question consequently arose in the twelfth century, whether the anointing could be repeated. Gottfried, Abbot of Vendome (1100), and Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, answered in the negative. The popular idea was, that those who recovered after receiving the rite ought never to touch the earth with bare feet, to eat meat, etc. Councils spoke out against this superstition; but it contributed not a little to give to the act the solemn significance subsequently attached to it. For the first time in the twelfth century do the expressions "extreme unction" and "sacrament of the dying" occur.

Hugo de St. Victor (d. 1141) was the first to introduce its treatment into a theological system; and Peter Lombard gave it the fifth place among the seven sacraments (Sentent., iv. 23). Thomas of Aquinas developed at length the doctrinal definition and significance of the rite. Eugenius IV., at the Council of Florence (1439) and the Decrees of Trent (Sess. xiv.), gave the final definition of the Church. The latter declare extreme unction to be a real sacrament instituted by our Lord, and revealed by James.

The purpose of the sacrament has been variously stated. The first idea was, that it healed the body. Peter Lombard says that it serves for the "remission of sins and the alleviation of bodily infirmity." Albertus Magnus (in Lib. iv. 23, 14) held that it removed the remainders of sin unexpiated by penance, or unwashed away by baptism; and Aquinas defined these remainders as spiritual weakness. He says that the physical restoration is only a secondary end. The Council of Trent states that the purpose of the sacrament is "to confer grace, and heal the sick."

The oil of anointing is consecrated by the bishop, and the act of anointing is alone performed by the priest. The Council of Mayence (847) limited its application to those in peril of death. The Roman Catechism confines it to the very sick, but denies it to children, and criminals condemned to death. Thomas of Aquinas held that the eyes, ears, nose, mouth, hands, reins, and feet should be anointed.

The Greek Church calls the sacrament euchelaion ("prayer" and "oil"), and gives it the seventh place among the sacraments. The consecration of the oil is the prerogative of the priest; and the rite, which may be repeatedly administered, is only in extreme cases applied in private dwellings. In all other points its practice and definition agree with those of the Latin Church. [The late Bishop Forbes of Brechin (d. 1875), in his exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles, calls "the unction of the sick the lost pleiad of the Anglican firmament."]

EZEKIEL (God will strengthen, or the strength of God), one of the prophets of the exile. He was the son of Buzi, and a priest (Ezek. i. 3). He lived in his own house (iii. 24, viii. 1), on the River Chebar, near Tel Abib, among the captives whom Nebuchadnezzar had deported with King Joiachim. He was married, as we learn incidentally (xxiv. 18). He prophesied from the fifth to at least the twenty-fifth year of the captivity (594-572 B.C.). The statement of Josephus (Ant. X. 6, 3), that he was only a boy when carried to Babylon, is rendered improbable by the date of the close of his prophetic activity, which we assume to have been the probable date of his death. This would have made him quite young at the time of his death. Although the exiles at times took offence at his prophecies (ii. 6), he was held in high esteem by them (viii. 1, xiv. 1 sqq., xx. 1, etc.). This is the extent of our reliable information concerning Ezekiel's life. Untrustworthy traditions speak of a meeting between him and Pythagoras, of various miracles, and a death of martyrdom. His pretended tomb was shown near Bagdad, where an autographic copy of the prophecies was said to be preserved.

EZEKIEL, Book of, without doubt the work of Ezekiel, is divided into two main divisions; chaps. i.-xxiv. closing with the inception of Nebuchadnezzar's siege of Jerusalem (589 B.C.), and chaps. xxxiii.-xlviii. beginning after the destruction of the city (587 B.C.). The intervening chapters contain denunciations against nations hostile to Israel. Both of the principal divisions are prefaced with a reference to the importance and responsibility of Ezekiel's prophetic office (iii. 16 sqq., and xxxiii. 6 sqq.). The first part is characterized by the announcement of judgment against Jerusalem; the second, by the promise of its re-edification. The first portrays God's wrath; the second, God's mercy.

The first main division is introduced by a vision of God in all his glory enthroned upon the cherubim, in which the prophet receives the prophetic mission to speak against Israel. He inaugurates his activity by a series of vehement predictions of the siege and consequent desolations of Jerusalem (iv.-vii.). In chap. viii. he has a vision of the idolatrous abominations in the temple. All, except those who mourned at this desecration, were to be destroyed (ix.); and fire from heaven was to fall upon the miserable city (x.). The people's trust in false prophets (xi.), and the captivity of Zedekiah (xii.), come under notice. The rejection of Jerusalem is pictured under the imagery of a barren vine fit only for the fire (xv.); and her immoralities, under the picture of a foster-child given over to whoredom (xvi.). In chap. xvii. David's royal house is presented under the allegory of a cedar, the top of which the Chaldean eagle plucks away; but God will plant again a twig therefrom. He justifies God's punishments (xviii.), and laments over the fall of Israel, which is compared to a robbed lion's lair and a burned vine. The rebellious people will be gathered together again (xx.); but the downfall of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar is at hand (xxi.). The division closes with a scathing rehearsal of its iniquities (xxii.-xxiv.). The chapters that follow (xxiv.-xxxii.) contain denunciations of the enemies of Israel, — Ammon, Moab, and Philistia (xxv.), Tyre (xxvi.-xxviii. 19), Sidon (xxviii. 20 sqq.), and especially Egypt (xxix.-xxxii.). These utterances are not arranged in chronological order, as those of the rest of the book are. The second main division (xxxiii.-xlviii.) is full of hope and promise. The prophet's mouth is again opened at the announcement of Jerusalem's fall (xxxiii. 21 sq.). After denouncing the mercenary shepherds of Israel, he passes over to a prophecy of the coming of the Lord, who will himself feed his flock (xxxiv.). Mount Seir (Edom) shall be punished (xxxv.), but new prosperity shall come to the mountain of Israel (xxxvi.). In the vision of the dry bones gathered together and revived, the prophet sees the new spiritual creation which the Lord will accomplish upon his people (xxxvii.). The final peril of Israel in the campaign of Gog is depicted (xxxviii., xxxix.). The last eight chapters give an account of the reconstruction of the temple, its holiness, and its priests, and conclude with a description of the stream of living waters flowing out from the temple, and the new parcelling out of the land among the tribes.

The peculiarities of Ezekiel are to be traced to the peculiar position of the author in Chaldaea. Separated as he was from Jerusalem and the excitement of passing events, his prophecies differ from those of the older prophets (Jeremiah, for example), in that they are not adapted to arouse to immediate action, display more care in preparation, and give evidence of retirement and reflection. The short stirring appeal is not often heard; but in its stead there is a calm treatment of the subject in hand. Compare, for example, the extended description of the vision in chap. i. with the brief outline of the analogous vision of Isaiah (vi.). Ezekiel delights to give perfect pictures. His symbolism and imagery are rich, but here and there so enigmatical as to have frequently discouraged both Jewish and Christian expositors, and to have led the Jews to forbid their people from reading it before they had reached their thirtieth year. But the prophet is a master in the description of the grand and sublime; and many passages are examples of the finest lyric and elegiac poetry; as, for example, the lamentation for the princes of Israel (xix. 1 sqq.), the description of the fall of Tyre (xxvi. 15-xxvii.), the dirge over Pharaoh, represented under the image of the crocodile (xxxii.), etc. Although he excels as an author, he is not to be regarded as never having spoken his prophecies. His popular eloquence is expressly attested in chap. xxxiii. 30 sqq. And, in the absence of immediate activity, there are many references to symbolical acts with which he used to emphasize his prophetic utterances, — eating and drinking (iv. 9 sq.), shearing his hair (v. 1 sqq.), stamping with his foot (vi. 11), etc. His own person was a type (xxxiv. 24, 27), and the circumstances of his life typical of his nation's destiny (xxiv. 15 sqq.). The prophecies are usually introduced with such formulas as "Thus saith the Lord," and "The word of the Lord came." The prophet is addressed by God and angels by the title "Son of man." These and like peculiarities attest the originality and unity of the composition. In common with Jeremiah, Ezekiel draws upon the earlier prophets, and, in a larger measure than Jeremiah, he shows the influence of the Mosaic legislation (comp. chaps. xliii.—xlvi.), and the history of Israel (comp. Gen. ii. 8 with Ezek. xxviii. 13, xxxi. 8 sq., xxxvi. 35, and Gen. i. 28 with Ezek. xxxvi. 11).

The spiritual and theological teachings of the book. The characteristic of Ezekiel is, that though an exile in a foreign land, and living in a period of disintegration, he points to a better time in the future for the theocratic kingdom. With Jeremiah, he predicts the fall of the Jewish State as unavoidable, and pronounces the hopes of the patriots, based upon treaties with Egypt, as altogether illusory. The minuteness and detail of these prophetic references must impress us all the more when we bear in mind the prophet's separation from Jerusalem (see xii. 12 sq., xxi. 23 sqq., xlii. 2, etc.). But Ezekiel restored again in the picture of his visions the old institutions of the temple, and in a pure form. In these descriptions his priestly training shows itself; but he did not, in his concern for the outward form, overlook the ethical and spiritual. In chap. xviii. he urges the double duty of honoring God, and loving our neighbor, and reminds his hearers of their individual and personal responsibility. He insists upon the necessity of a new heart (xi. 19 sq., xxxvi. 25 sqq.). God's glory is the ultimate end of the restoration of Jerusalem (xxxvi. 22), and his aim not to destroy, but revive, his sinful people (xxxiii. 11). It is the prophet's peculiarity that his eye is directed not so much to the personal representatives as to the kingdom itself, where the glory of God should dwell in the midst of a holy nation of priests, serving him (xlii. 7). The description is given in the last eight chapters, and stands alone in the Old Testament. The vision here recorded of the temple is not of a mere building, although the architectural proportions given are exact. He passes beyond the material edifice to an ideal temple with its waters of life (xlvii.). In the furniture and services of this temple he presupposes the Mosaic legislation (xlv. 7 sq.). But it was not his purpose to revise it, or he would have made some reference to the ark of the covenant, the highpriesthood, the day of atonement, etc. As of special significance for the times, he mentions the Sabbath (xx. 12 sqq.), refers to a more joyful celebration of the feasts in the future (xlv. 9 sqq.), insists upon the purification of the temple (xliii. 7, xlv. 9), and bases the new division of the land on the equal rights of the tribes, all of which were to receive portions west of the Jordan.

The book has given difficulty to the Jews, because its statements do not always agree with the ritual of Moses; and this gave rise to some dispute regarding its canonical dignity. But this very fact is a pledge that not the letter of the law, but God's will, which was therein only expressed in a way adapted to the time, is eternal. The Christian Church has also found difficulty in distinguishing between that which was merely Jewish in the prophecies, and that which is Messianic. Less clearly than in the other prophets can the distinction be made out between the spiritual contents and the temporary form; but the book is, nevertheless, a prophecy of the new covenant of grace in the language of the old covenant of the law. The complete consummation of the kingdom of God on earth, however, alone can reveal how far the form in which Ezekiel clothes it was mere shadow, how far an adequate picture of that perfect manifestation. (For the influence of Ezekiel on the Apocalypse, see REVELATION.)

E'ZION-GA'BER, or GE'BER (giant's backbone), a city in the neighborhood of Elath, mentioned as the last station of Israel before entering the Wilderness of Zin (Num. xxxiii. 35; Deut. ii. 8), and as the navy station of Solomon (1 Kings ix. 26; 2 Chron. viii. 17) and Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 48); but its precise site has not been identified.

EZ'RA (help), priest, scribe (Neh. viii. 1, 2), and reformer of the period succeeding the Babylonish captivity. The book which bears his name, and the latter part of Nehemiah, are the only reliable sources of his life. He was of high priestly descent (Ez. vii. 1). With Artaxerxes' consent he led an expedition to Jerusalem (458 B.C.). He must have been held in esteem at court; for the king intrusted him with authority to appoint magistrates and judges, and with the power of life and death in Jerusalem (vii. 12–26). At the River Ahava (viii. 15) he gathered the members of the expedition together, and ordered a fast and prayer for divine protection. Arriving in Jerusalem, he delivered up the gifts the king had sent to the temple and his commissions to the Persian officials (viii. 36). He was grieved to find that his countrymen had intermarried with women of other nationalities, and succeeded in inducing them to put away their "strange wives." The narrative is here suddenly broken off, and Ezra does not re-appear again for thirteen years (Neh. viii.). The conjecture has been made, that he returned to Persia during the interval; but nothing certain is known. He performed priestly functions after his return. The time of his death is not noticed. Ezra marks an epoch in the study of the Mosaic law. He made that study the employment of his own life (vii. 10), and was thus led to become a scribe of the law (vii. 11). He had about him a corps of helpers (Neh. viii.), with whose aid he read the law in public, and expounded it. The pulpit first made its appearance in connection with him (Neh. viii. 4), and became the original of those synagogical desks from which Jewish rabbins in succeeding centuries read and interpreted the history and sacred writings of Israel. He was afterwards looked up to with reverence by the scribes as the founder of their order. According to Kuenen and others, Ezra was the author of a large share of the Pentateuch, — the so-called priestly Torah. According to the somewhat modified view of Professor W. R. Smith (The O. T. in the Jewish Church, chap. ix), he at least "gave the last touches to the ritual" of the Pentateuch, which he calls the "Canon of Ezra." (See PENTATEUCH.) Tradition, which is rich in details of Ezra's life, once says that he restored the entire Pentateuch (which had been lost), either from memory, or by special inspiration. In another place it describes him as the president of the great synagogue, and the collector and editor of the canon. The latter is made very probable when we remember the intense interest he had aroused in the law. In this interest a desire to have the writings of the historians and prophets would certainly be begotten. According to Josephus (Ant., XI. 5, 5), he died and was buried in Jerusalem. According to other writers, he died on a journey to the king of Persia, in the hundred and twentieth year of his age; and Benjamin of Tudela mentions that his tomb was shown on the banks of the Tigris.

EZRA, Book of (a chronicle of events occurring between 536 and 456 B.C.), consists of parts, the first of which extends through chap. vi. Between these two sections lies an interval of fifty-eight years. The first section (i.-vi.) gives an account of a decree for the reconstruction of the temple, and its achievement by Zerubbabel. Chap. i. gives the decree of Cyrus, and relates the return to Jerusalem. Chap. ii. enumerates those who returned. Chap. iii. describes the arrangements for work upon the temple, and the laying of the corner-stone, amidst the mingled weeping and rejoicing of the spectators. Chaps. iv. and v. give an account of the efforts, on the part of adversaries who had been refused the privilege of participating in the work, to check its progress, and their subsequent success in securing a royal decree to that effect. But work is again resumed by order of Darius, and the temple completed (vi.). The second section (vii.-x.) has Ezra for its chief actor. Artaxerxes grants him permission to lead a company of the exiles to Jerusalem, and confers upon him considerable authority (vii.). The members of the expedition are mentioned, and their halt at the River Ahava, and arrival in Jerusalem, described (viii.). Ezra laments the domestic condition of his people (ix.), and rids Jewish homes of their "strange wives" (x.).

The authenticity of the history recorded in the Book of Ezra is generally conceded. The facts are such as might be expected, and there is no reference to the miraculous to arouse suspicion. The main questions are the authorship, and the relation of the Book to Nehemiah. The Jewish Church, and the church fathers, regarded Ezra and Nehemiah as a single work. They are followed in this view by many modern scholars (Ewald, Bertheau, Dillmann, Davidson, etc.), who hold, that, with the two Books of Chronicles, they formed parts of one great work. But the LXX. and the Vulgate separate them into two books. This division (defended by Keil, Schultz in Lange's Commentary, Rawlinson in the Speaker's Commentary, etc.) has in its favor the opening words of Nehemiah: "The words of Nehemiah," etc. Their union in the Hebrew canon may be explained by the fact that they are chronicles of one and the same general period of restoration.

The Authorship. — It is not disputed that Ezra wrote chaps. vii. 27-ix. He here speaks in the first person. The preceding portion of the book and chap. x. have been attributed to other authors. The reasons urged are the laudatory reference to Ezra in chap. vii. 6, and the use of the third person instead of the first (vii. 6, 11, x. 1). But examples of such transitions are found both in other portions of Scripture (comp. Isa. vii. 1-16 with viii. 1, etc., also Dan. vi. 4 with vii. 2) and in profane writers (e.g., Thucydides, comp. Hist., I. 1 with I. 20-22, etc.); and the notice of vii. 6 is not so laudatory but that a modest man might have written it. The second objection would be equally valid were Ezra only the general editor, which it is generally acknowledged he was. The reasons are not sufficient to overthrow the traditional view, which is defended by Keil (Einleitung), Lange, Rawlinson (Speaker's Commentary), — that Ezra was the author of the whole work. The text of Ezra is in a bad condition, and many variant readings exist. Portions of the work are in Chaldee (iv. 8-vi. 18, and the decree of Artaxerxes, vii. 12-26). The language bears a close resemblance to that of the Chronicles and Daniel.

FABER, Basilius, b. at Sorau, in Nether-Lusatia, 1520; d. at Erfurt, 1575 or 1576; studied at Wittenberg; was a teacher in Nordhausen, Tennstädt, and Magdeburg, and became rector of the school of Quedlinburg in 1560; but, being a strict Lutheran of the Flacian wing, he refused to sign the Corpus Doctrinæ Philippicum as a crypto-Calvinistic innovation, and was discharged in 1570. Next year, however, he was made rector of the gymnasium of Erfurt, where he remained till his death. Besides some writings of pedagogical interest, — Thesaurus eruditionis scholasticæ (1571) and Libellus de disciplina scholastica (1572), — he translated Luther's commentary on Genesis into German (1557), was a contributor to the Magdeburg Centuries (1557-60), and published some eschatological tracts. WAGENMANN.

FABER, or FABRI, Felix, b. at Zürich, 1441 or 1442; d. at Ulm, March 14 or May 15, 1502; studied theology at Basel; entered the Dominican order in 1472, and was made lector and preacher at the cloister of Ulm in 1478. Twice he visited the Holy Land (1480 and 1483-84); and his principal work is Evagatorium in Terræ Sanctæ, Arabiæ et Ægypti peregrinationem, edited by Hassler, Stuttgart, 1843-19, 3 vols. He also wrote a Historia Suevorum, edited by Goldast, Francfort, 1605, Ulm, 1727. He was bright, and a good observer, but very credulous, and too fond of curiosities. His Latin is of an exceptionally "canine" description. WAGENMANN.

FABER, Frederick William, a Catholic theologian, and distinguished hymn-writer, of Huguenot ancestry; b. June 28, 1814, at the vicarage of Calverley, Eng., of which his grandfather, Thomas Faber, was the incumbent; d. Sept. 26, 1863. He studied at Balliol College, Oxford, and became while there an ardent admirer of John Henry Newman. He was made fellow of University College in 1837, and ordained priest 1839. Much of the next four years he spent in travelling with a pupil on the Continent, during which a great change took place in his feelings toward the Roman-Catholic Church; so that, after being for two years rector of Elton, he passed over (Nov. 17, 1845) to that church. After a visit to Rome, he founded a religious society at Birmingham. In 1849 he was placed at the head of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri, in London, where he remained till his death. Father Faber's title to permanent fame will rest upon his hymns, several of which have already taken their place among our classics. They are marked by fervor of piety, and grace of language. The most beautiful, perhaps, are, "O gift of gifts, O grace of faith," taken from a larger poem, "Conversion," and "Workman of God, O lose not heart," from the poem, "The Right must win," and "Paradise, O Paradise." He was a prolific author of religious works: among them are Essay on Beatification and Canonization (1848), The Spirit and Genius of St. Philip Neri (1850), The Blessed Sacrament (1856), etc. In 1848 he published a small collection of hymns. It was enlarged in 1849 and 1852. The final edition of the author appeared in 1861, containing a hundred and fifty hymns.

FABER, George Stanley, D.D., an English divine, and uncle of the former; b. Oct. 25, 1773; d. Jan. 27, 1854. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow and tutor of Lincoln College. In 1801 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, which appeared under the title of Horæ Mosaicae. In 1803 he left the university, and was vicar at various places, till he was made prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral (1831), and master of Sherburn Hospital (1832). He was a man of varied erudition, and a voluminous author of theological works; among these the principal are, The Origin of Pagan Idolatry, 3 vols. (1816), Difficulties of Romanism (1826), Sacred Calendar of Prophecy, 3 vols. (1828), and Papal Infallibility (1851).

FABER, Johannes, is the name of several Roman-Catholic theologians of the sixteenth century, whose persons and writings are often confounded. — I. Johannes Faber of Leutkirch (called Malleus Hæreticorum, from the book named below), b. at Leutkirch, in Suabia, 1478; d. in Vienna, May 21, 1541; studied theology and canon law at Tübingen and Freiburg-im-Breisgau; and was minister, first of Lindau, then of Leutkirch; vicar-general of the diocese of Constance (1518); chaplain and confessor to King Ferdinand (1524); and Bishop of Vienna (1531). He belonged originally to the humanistic and liberal party, and maintained friendly relations to Erasmus, Ecolampadius, Zwingli, and Melancthon. In 1520 he corresponded with Zwingli in a cordial and familiar manner; in 1521 he openly disapproved of Eck and his manœuvres; but in the same year he made a journey to Rome in order to straighten some difficult money matters, and he returned as one of the busiest and most violent adversaries of the Reformation and the Reformers. He wrote against Luther Opus adversus nova quadam dogmata Lutheri (Malleus in hæresin Lutheranam), and, in defence of celibacy and the papal authority, Pro celibatu and De potestate pape contra Lutherum. He fought on the Roman side in the conferences and disputations; and he was active in burning people in Austria and Hungary (Kaspar Tauber and Balthasar Hubmeier). Of his works there is a collected edition in 3 vols. fol., Cologne, 1537-41, and a minor collection containing only his polemical writings, Leipzig, 1537. See C. E. KETTNER: De J. Fabri vita scriptisque, Leipzig, 1737. — II. Johannes Faber Augustanus, d. about 1530; was b. at Freiburg, in the latter half of the fifteenth century; entered the Dominican order, and was made prior of the monastery of Augsburg in 1515, professor of theology at Bologna in 1516, confessor to the Emperor Maximilian I., and afterwards court-preacher to Charles V. He was a friend of Erasmus, and in favor of lenient proceedings against Luther; but he afterwards changed his mind, and became a harsh adversary of the Reformation. His funeral-oration over Maximilian I. (Jan. 16, 1519) is the only work he has left. — III. Johannes Faber of Heilbronn was b. at Heilbronn, on the Neckar, 1504; studied theology and philosophy at Cologne; entered the Dominican order, and was made preacher at the cathedral of Augsburg, 1536. The date of his death is unknown. He was a bitter adversary of the Reformation, and wrote Quod fides esse possit sine caritate (1548), Enchiridion bibliorum (1549), Fructus quibus dignoscitur hæretici (1551), etc. WAGENMANN.

FABER, or FAVRE, Pierre François, b. at St. Barthelemi, in the canton of Vaud; was minister of Laudun, in Lower Languedoc; accompanied Francis de la Banne, Bishop of Halicarnassus, on his tour of visitation to Cochinchina, as his secretary and confessor; and published in 1746 his Lettres édifiantes et curieuses sur la visite apostolique de M. de la Baume à la Cochinchine en 1740, which gives a report of the abominable manner in which the Jesuits pushed the mission in those regions, and the infamous intrigues with which they tried to cover up their misdemeanors. The book was condemned by the Bishop of Lausanne, and publicly burnt at Freiburg; and the Jesuits bought up every copy they could reach. Large extracts of the work are found in SIMLER, Urkunden zur Beleuchtung der Kirchengeschichte, I., pp. 159-256. STEITZ.

FABER STAPULENSIS, Jacobus (Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples), b. at Étaples, a village in Picardy, 1450; d. at Nérac, 1536; studied in Paris; visited Florence, Rome, and Venice; and began, after his return to Paris, to lecture on Aristotle, and to publish Latin translations, and paraphrases of the Aristotelian writings. From 1507 to 1520 he lived in the Benedictine abbey of St. Germain des Prés, near Paris, where his friend Briçonnet was abbot; and while here he began to study the Bible. The first result of this study was his Psalterium quintuplex, 1508; then followed, in 1512, his commentary on the Pauline Epistles, in 1522, on the Gospels, and in 1525, on the Catholic Epistles. A critical essay (De Maria Magdalena) which he published in 1517 gave the authorities occasion for an accusation of heresy; and Noël Bédier, syndic of the theological faculty of Paris, had the book formally condemned by a decree of Parliament, Nov. 9, 1521. Bédier, who suspected a secret Lutheran in Faber, wanted to institute further proceedings against him, but was prevented by the interference of Francis I. and Marguerite of Navarre in his behalf. In 1523 Briçonnet, who in the mean time had become Bishop of Meaux, made him his vicar-general; and in the same year he published his French translation of the New Testament, which spread rapidly, not only in his own diocese, but all over France, and produced a deep impression. But after the battle of Pavia (Feb. 25, 1525), and the imprisonment of Francis I. in Madrid, the Parliament and the Sorbonne felt free to employ more vigorous measures against the reformatory movement. Several of the clergymen appointed by Briçonnet were accused of heresy; some of them recanted. Parvart was burnt; Faber fled to Strassburg. After the release of Francis I., he was recalled, and made librarian in the royal castle of Blois: but even there he was not safe: and, after publishing his translation of the Old Testament, he retired to Nérac, the residence of Marguerite of Navarre, where he died. He had, indeed, espoused all the chief principles of the Reformation, and he applied them with vigor in his writings; but he remained in the Roman Church, hoping that a reformation could take place without any violent concussion. For open fight with hostile powers he was completely unfit. He was not unlike Melancthon, but he had no Luther by his side.

FABIAN, the nineteenth bishop of Rome (236-250), was, according to Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VI. 29), incidentally present at the election after the death of Anteros, and was unanimously chosen, because a dove came down from heaven and rested on his head. Of his reign nothing is known with certainty. In Cyprian's Letters to his successor, Cornelius, he is often mentioned with respect.

FABRICA ECCLESIE, a technical term referring to the provision made for the maintenance of the fabric of the church.—its buildings, furniture, utensils, etc. In the latter part of the fifth century, Simplicius, and after him Gelasius, ordered that one-fourth of the whole revenue of a church should be put aside for this purpose, and afterwards the matter became the subject of a very varied and intricate, but wholly local, legislation. Thus, in the grand duchy of Baden, it is the rule that the nave and roof are kept in repair by the treasury of the church, the choir by the minister, the walls and outer buildings by him who enjoys the tithes, and the tower by the parish.

FABRICIUS, Johann, b. at Altorf, Feb. 11, 1644; d. at Helmstädt, Jan. 29, 1729; studied at Altorf and Helmstädt; travelled in Germany and Italy, 1670-77; and was appointed professor of theology at Altorf, 1677, and at Helmstädt, 1697. His principal work, besides his Amanitates Theologica (1699) and Historia Bibliotheca Fabriciana (4 vols. 4to, 1717-24), is his Consideratio variarum controversiarum (1701), in which he pursued the irenic principles of Calixtus, but carried them unto weakness. In the same year a Gutachten was published, in which he most decidedly recommended the Princess Elizabeth Christine of Brunswick to embrace Romanism in order to get married to Charles of Spain, afterwards the Emperor Charles VI.; but this Gutachten caused such a scandal, especially in England, that he was discharged from the university. See W. Höck, Anton Ulrich und Elisabeth Christine, Wolfenbüttel, 1845.

FABRICIUS, Johannes Albert, b. at Leipzig, Nov. 11, 1668; d. at Hamburg, April 3, 1736; studied theology at Quedlinburg, and was made professor of rhetoric and moral philosophy at Hamburg in 1698. He was a very prolific writer, especially on literary history and bibliography, in which branches his principal works are: Bibliotheca Græca (14 vols. 4to, Hamburg, 1705-28, reedited by Harless, 1790-1811); Bibliotheca Latina (3 vols, 1697), new edition, 1721, 1722, continued by the Bibliotheca Latina, medice et infimæ atatis (5 vols., Hamburg, 1734-36); and the Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica (1718). More special theological interest have his Codex Apocryphus N.T. (1703, 2 vols.) and Codex Pseudepigraphus V.T. (1713), which have not been made entirely superfluous by the labors of Thilo, Tischendorf, Volkmar, and Hilgenfeld. He also wrote a Hydrotheologie (1730) and a Pyrotheologie (1732), which now strike the reader as very curious, but suited the taste of his time, and were translated into other languages.

FACULTY usually means some power, inborn or cultivated, and, in the special sense, a body of men to whom is given the right to teach a particular science (thus we have the faculties of theology, law, medicine, and philosophy); but it is also a technical term of canon law denoting the transference of a certain power of ecclesiastical jurisdiction from the original holder to a subordinate officer for the purpose of speedier execution. The earliest cases in which such faculties were granted occurred in the middle ages, when the Pope transferred a certain measure of his power to the missionary on account of his necessary independence of papal oversight through his distance from Rome. Later on, in the sixteenth century, similar faculties were granted to the papal nuncios as a means of insuring a prompter enforcement of the canons of the Council of Trent, and of giving strength and energy to the Roman-Catholic mission in Protestant Germany. As, under these circumstances, conflicts would now and then arise between the papal nuncios and the bishops, the latter generally received the same faculties, though only for a certain length of time; as, for instance, five years (facultates quinquennales). Bishops may also grant faculties, transferring to their vicars-general, officials, deacons, or priests, some measure either of their own authority (auctoritas ordinaria or propria), or of that granted to them by the Pope (auctoritas apostolica). See PAPAL NUNCIOS. MEJER.

The word is used in England in the sense of a special dispensation to do what by law could not be done. Under the Archbishop of Canterbury there is a special court, called the "Court of Faculties," presided over by the "Master of Faculties," which has the power to grant these dispensations; usually for such purposes as marriages without previous asking of the banns, ordinations of deacons under age, the succession to a benefice on the part of the clergyman's son, etc. In this court are also registered the certificates of bishops and noblemen granted to their chaplains to qualify them for pluralities and non-residence.

FACUNDUS, Bishop of Hermiane, in the North-African province of Byzacena, was one of the bishops whom Justinian, in 544, summoned to Constantinople in order to get the Three Chapters condemned, and an agreement established with the Western Church. The emperor failed in his purpose. Facundus wrote his twelve books (Pro defensione trium capitulorum); and, when the African bishop broke off communion with the Roman bishop Vigilius, he wrote Contra Mosianum scholasticum in defence of their action. Of his later life nothing is known. His work, which was first edited by Sirmond, then in Gallandi (Bibl. Max., XII. 1-124) and Migne (Patrol. Lat., LXVII. 762), has more interest from an ecclesiastico-political than from a dogmatic point of view. He wrote not so much in order to justify Theodore and Theodoret, as in order to restrain the emperor from interfering in the affairs of the Church. C. HAGENBACH.

FACIUS, Paul (Büchlin), b. at Rheinzabern, in the Palatinate, 1504; d. at Cambridge, Nov. 13, 1549; studied at Heidelberg and Strassburg, especially Hebrew, under W. Capito, and afterwards under the celebrated Elias Levita; and was appointed rector of the school at Isny in 1537, and professor of theology, and preacher in Strassburg, 1543. But, when the Interim was introduced in Strassburg, he emigrated to England, where he was well received, and made professor in Hebrew at Cambridge in 1549. Most of his writings (Sententie sapientium Hebræorum, 1541; Annotationes in Targum, 1546; Isagoge in linguam Hebræicam, 1544, etc.) refer to his Hebrew studies; and as a teacher of Hebrew he exercised considerable influence in that direction of mediation which characterized the school of Strassburg. Under the reign of Mary his bones were dug up and burnt. His Life, in Latin, is found in PANTALEON, Prosographia, Basel, 1565. WAGENMANN.

FACNANI, Prosper, b. 1598; d. in Rome, 1678; practised as an advocate with great success in Rome; was for fifteen years secretary to the Congregatio Conc. Trid. Interpret., and afterwards professor in canon law at the academy of Rome. On the instance of Alexander VII. he wrote a commentary on the decretals, 1661, which has been often republished, and is frequently appealed to by the canonists. He was blind from his forty-fourth year.

FAIRBAIRN, Patrick, b. at Greenlaw, Berwickshire, Scotland, January, 1805; d. at Glasgow, Aug. 6, 1874. He was graduated at the University of Edinburgh, and after many years' pastoral experience was professor at Aberdeen, and, from 1856 to his death, principal, and professor of systematic theology and New-Testament exegesis, in the Free Church Theological College at Glasgow. Principal Fairbairn was one of the founders of the Free Church. His scholarship was respectable, and his books, especially the Typology, are useful. In person he was of commanding figure. His principal works, which are published in Edinburgh, are, The Typology of Scripture, 1847, 2 vols., 6th ed., 1880; Ezekiel and his Book of Prophecy, 1851, 4th ed., 1876; Prophecy viewed in its Distinctive Nature, its Special Functions, and its Proper Interpretation, 1856, 2d ed., 1866; Hermeneutical Manual, 1858; Revelation of Law in Scripture, 1868; The Pastoral Epistles, 1874; Pastoral Theology, with a Biographical Sketch of the Author, 1875. He also edited The Imperial Bible Dictionary, London, 1867, 2 vols. royal 8vo, and translated, in part, Schröder's Commentary upon Ezekiel, in the American edition by Lange, N.Y., 1876.

FAITH (πίστις). All personal relations in human life rest on faith. I can respect no one, unless I believe him possessed of some excellences of nature and character: I can love no one, unless I believe him possessed of some affinity to me, — naturally in the blood, or spiritually in the mind. In human life, faith is the connecting link between man and man. Thereby it becomes the latent source from which all individual development springs, mental and spiritual. Man was made for faith, and it is faith that makes the man. He who has lost his power of faith, his faculty of belief, is dead. But in no relation is this more true than in man's relation to God.

With respect to its form, faith is not a simple opinion formed by the intellect, and differing from cognition only by the subjective character of its evidences. The Church distinguishes between a fides historica ("historic faith") and a fides salvifica ("saving faith"). The latter is a movement of the heart, of all the fundamental powers of the soul, of the very roots of the personality; and hence it is propagated to all the branches: it involves knowledge, it stirs up the feelings, it acts upon the will. Knowledge, assent, and trust are all demanded in faith according to the doctrine of the Evangelical Church. None of them can be entirely missing; but their measure may be very different, according to the different stand-point of the individual.

The object of faith cannot be seen by the eyes, nor can it be grasped by the understanding: it belongs to the realm of the invisible, the spiritual, the divine (1 Heb. xi. 1, 6; 1 Pet. i. 8; 2 Cor. v. 16; John xx. 29). But this invisible, spiritual, divine, is not something unknowable: it proves itself to the inner man. The absolute object of faith is the revelation of God to mankind, originating in his love, and making his holiness manifest; and the centre of this revelation, the true fulfilment in relation to which all preceding preparations are only accommodations to the susceptibility of the race (Luke xxiv. 25, 26; Heb. i.), is the incarnation of God in Christ. Faith, in the absolute sense of the word, is therefore a personal and spiritual union with Christ, through which we become one with him, as he is one with the Father.

This union with Christ man cannot accomplish by his own efforts: God himself must awaken the new life in his soul (John vi. 29; 1 Cor. ii. 5). It is the Holy Spirit who works the faith in the heart; and the means by which he does this is the preaching of the word of God, the preaching of the grace of Christ (Rom. x. 17; 1 Cor. i. 21). But the soul can prepare itself for the coming of the new life by abandoning all confidence in itself and in the world, and by breaking all the selfish instincts under which it labors; and when, by repentance, it has made itself a fit receptacle for the work of the Holy Spirit, that movement of the heart will follow which is the faith, — the faith by which sins are forgiven (Acts xxvi. 18), and man is made just before God (Rom. iii. 26; v. 1; Gal. iii. 21).

The Roman-Catholic Church, proceeding from James, teaches that justification is by faith and works. But though it defines faith as meaning belief, not simply as an opinion, but as a conviction that "those things are true which God has revealed and promised, and this especially, that God justifies the impious by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus" (Conc. Trid., sess. VI. c. 6), it nevertheless confines faith to the sphere of the intellect, and only expects an influence from thence upon the feelings and the will. In its further development in the Roman-Catholic Church, this doctrine led to a direct deterioration of the idea of faith. From a living agency in the human soul, faith became a merely passive obedience to the authority of the Church; and such an emphasis was laid upon the merits of works, that morality itself was corrupted. This aberration has been happily corrected by the Reformed churches. Proceeding from Paul, they teach that justification is by faith alone; but faith they define, not as a merely intellectual process of acceptance, but as the true, vitalizing point of the whole life of the soul.

FAITH, Rule of. See REGULA FIDEI.

FAKIR (Arabic poor man), a class of Hindoo religious mendicants, numbering now perhaps two millions, and found in India from very early times. They are noted for their self-inflicted tortures, by which they excite pity, and obtain the reputation of "saints;" so that, although the people have little respect for them, they dread their curses, and the very rayah will rise up on his elephant to salute them. The British Government has greatly curtailed their liberty to injure themselves, and forbidden their going around perfectly nude. It is questioned whether there is any religious sentiment in their performances. According to the oft-quoted summary of Hassan al-Bassri, a fakir is like a dog in ten things: (1) he is always hungry; (2) he has no sure abiding-place; (3) he watches by night; (4) he never abandons his master, even when maltreated; (5) he is satisfied with the lowest place; (6) he yields his place to whoever wishes it; (7) he loves whoever beats him; (8) keeps quiet while others eat; (9) accompanies his master without ever thinking of returning to the place he has left; (10) and leaves no heritage after death. Fakirs go either singly or in companies. They were formerly a dangerous element in Hindoo life, for their fanaticism nerved them for deeds of great cruelty.

FALASHAS (exiles), a people in Abyssinia, who are either Jews, or, more probably, descendants of proselytes to Judaism, and whose belief and practice is a mixture of Judaism and Paganism. There is no authentic information when they came into the country. They pretend to belong to the tribe of Levi, but their appearance is not Jewish. That they were early converted to Judaism is manifest from their ignorance of both the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmud, of the fringed praying-scarf (talith), of phylacteries, and of the Feasts of Purim and Dedication. They are also entirely ignorant of Hebrew; yet they possess in Gees the canonical and apocryphal books of the Old Testament; a volume of extracts from the Pentateuch, with comments given to Moses by the Lord, upon Mount Sinai; The Laws of the Sabbath: the Ardit, a book of secrets revealed to twelve saints, which is used as a charm against disease; lives of Abraham, Moses, etc.; and a translation of Josephus, called Sana Aihud. They practise circumcision: fast every Monday and Thursday, every new moon, and on the Passover; keep the Sabbath with such strictness that they will not even put on their clothes upon it; and observe the Feasts of the Passover, the Ingathering, Tabernacles (although they do not build booths), the Day of Assembly, and Abraham's Day. But joined to these Jewish rites are Pagan ones, such as the shedding of the blood of a sheep or a fowl in a new house in order to render it inhabitable, the use of fire in purification of unchastity, and the worship of the goddess Sanbat, really the Sabbath personified. Monasticism exists among them: but the priests are free to marry once; if their wives die, they are prohibited, like the Greek priest, from a second union. Education, which is imparted only to boys, is in the priests' hands. No one can be a priest, who himself, or whose father or grandfather, has eaten bread with a Christian. The Falashas are superstitious, and believers in magic. They offer sacrifices for the dead on the third day, up to which time they believe these souls dwell in a place of darkness; but every morning for seven days they formally lament them. Prayers for the dead are offered in the synagogues.

The Falashas are industrious and peaceable, dwell in villages of their own, for the most part, which it is said can be easily recognized by the red clay pots on the tops of their synagogues. Their exact number is unknown, — perhaps about a hundred and fifty thousand. See FLAD: Falashas of Abyssinia (trans. from the German), London, 1869; J. HALÉVY: Travels in Abyssinia (trans. from the French), London, 1878.

FALK LAWS, The (also called the "May Laws"), is the name generally applied to a series of laws carried through the Prussian diet, in the period between 1872 and 1875, by Dr. Falk, at that time Minister of Cultus and Public Instruction and Sanitary Affairs in Prussia. In March, 1872, the first of these laws was passed, transferring the superintendence of the primary schools from the Church to the State, by ordering that the school-inspector should be a layman. In June followed a ministerial order, prohibiting the members of religious orders to teach in the schools, and thereby still further limiting the influence of the Roman-Catholic clergy on the school. Next, the laws of November, 1872, and March, 1873, materially narrowed the bishop's power over the inferior clergy, and the clergy's power over the laity, whereby the whole ecclesiastical law of the country was radically changed; and at the same time a royal ecclesiastical court was established, enabling the government to deal in an effective manner with refractory bishops. A law of March, 1874, made civil marriage obligatory; and another, of April, 1875; required the bishop and clergy to sign a declaration of obedience to the laws of the State, before entering upon office. At the same time laws were passed forbidding the religious orders living within the borders of the Prussian dominion to receive new members, and transferring the control of the church property of a parish to a board of trustees of laymen.

In the so-called Kulturkampf those laws played a most prominent part; that is, in the contest between the feeling of national independence so deeply roused in Germany by the Franco-Prussian war, and the ambitious aspirations of the Roman curia, so strongly pronounced by the council of the Vatican and the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility. They originated, as simple acts of self-defence, from the side of the State; and it was repeatedly declared, both by Dr. Falk and Prince Bismarck, that, within the State, every confession (church) should have freedom to move and develop, but none the opportunity of crippling the actions of the State, or using the secular power for particular denominational purposes, or of eluding its civil duties, under pretence of some religious prescript. "We will never go to Canossa" (Nach Canossa gehen wir nicht) said the chancellor, May 14, 1872. The Ultramontane party, however, among the Roman-Catholic clergy in Germany, was very far from viewing the Falk Laws as merely defensive measures. On the contrary, it considered them as evidences and means of an intolerable tyranny; and encouraged by the Pope, whose encyclical of 1874 declared the laws null and void, the party adopted a policy of bitter and unflinching opposition. Several bishops were banished from their sees; and other sees, which became vacant by death, remained vacant. A turn, however, took place in the course of affairs when Pius IX. died, in 1878. Prince Bismarck had observed more than once during the contest, that, as the so-called May Laws were merely defensive measures, it would be possible to abandon them, or at least to modify them, when once again there reigned a "peaceable pope" in Rome; and, indeed, immediately after the accession of Leo XIII., negotiations concerning a modus vivendi between Germany and the Pope were begun, and seem, on account of reciprocal concessions, likely to succeed. See LUDWIG HAHN: Geschichte des Kulturkampfes, Berlin, 1881; and the addresses by LEOPOLD WITTE and AUGUST DORNER, in Evangelical Alliance Conference, 1873, New York, 1874.

FAMILIAR SPIRITS (from the Latin familiaris, "a household servant") were the spirits supposed to be at the service of the necromancers, by which they divined, and wrought their spells (Lev. xx. 27; Deut. xviii. 11; 1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8, and many other places).

FAMILIARES is the name of certain lay members of monasteries, such as servants, mechanics, etc., generally admitted as members of the community through certain religious rites. As in the middle ages they often proved the very channels through which worldly tendencies were introduced into the monasteries, several popes insisted upon their complete separation from the monks and the monastic community.

FAMILIARS OF THE INQUISITION, the officers who arrested suspected persons. Their name came from the circumstance that they formed part of the inquisitor's family. They were often men of rank; and peculiar spiritual privileges, such as indulgences, were attached to the position.

FAMILISTS, Familia Charitatis, Huis de Liefde, a sect founded by a certain Henry Nicholas, a native of Münster, who, after living for some time in Holland, came to England under the reign of Edward VI. His efforts to make proselytes seem at first to have succeeded quite well: even theologians were found willing to listen to his ideas. But in 1580 Elizabeth ordered an investigation, and after that time very severe measures were taken against the sect, which disappeared during the reign of James I. The ideas of Henry Nicholas are often identified with those of David Joris, with whom he lived in close personal connection, as his followers were often confounded with the Anabaptists, though they acknowledged the baptism of infants, and showed no antagonism to the rituals of the churches. The predominant trait of the sect was its mysticism, which gave rise to very peculiar doctrines of Moses as the prophet of hope, Christ as the prophet of faith, and Henry Nicholas as the prophet of love, etc. In 1575 they published a confession of faith, in which they endeavored to prove themselves in harmony with the Reformed Churches. See JOHN ROGERS: The Displaying of a horrible Sect naming themselves the Family of Love, London, 1579; and KNEWSTUR: Confutation of the heresies of Henry Nicholas, London, 1579. J. KÖSTLIN.

FANATICISM (from Latin fanum, "temple"). The term "fanatici" was originally applied to all priests who pretended to receive divine revelations, and announced oracles, but more especially to the priests of Cybele and Bellona, who were noted for their wild enthusiasm. In the writings of the satirists, Horace, Juvenal, etc., the word gradually changed its sense, and came to imply something of a fraudulent inspiration, consisting of hollow excitement and empty visions. In this sense it was still used in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when applied, for instance, to Cromwell, Mohammed, the prophets of the Church of the Desert, etc. At present the term "fanaticism" denotes a state of the mind in which enthusiasm for an idea has been transformed into mere hatred of its opposite.

FAREL, Guillaume, b. at Gap, in Dauphiny, 1489; d. at Neuchâtel, Sept. 13, 1565; studied in Paris, and was appointed professor in the college of Cardinal le Moine on the recommendation of Lefèvre d'Étaples (Faber Stapulensis). His reformatory activity he began in the diocese of Meaux, under the auspices of Guillaume Briçonnet; but in 1523 he was compelled to fly by the beginning persecutions. He went to Basel, where he was cordially received by Ecolampadius; but his disputations, lectures, and preachings in that city, came to a sudden end in 1524; he was expelled, probably, on the instance of Erasmus. After a short stay in Strassburg and Mömpelgardt, he returned to Switzerland in 1525, and began to preach the Reformation in various places belonging under the authority of Berne, — Aigle, Morat, Grandson, Biel, etc., — often with danger of life, but generally, also, with eminent success. After a visit to the Waldenses, he came in 1532 to Geneva; and the first establishment of the Reformation in that city is his work. In spite of a bitter and protracted opposition, the religious edict of Aug. 27, 1535, was issued; and it was followed by the confession of Geneva (written by Calvin) and the settlement of Calvin in the city. By the victory of a short-lived re-action, both Farel and Calvin were expelled in 1538. Farel went to Neuchâtel, and thence to Metz; and in the latter city, as well as in the neighboring Gorze, he labored with great success for the establishment of the Reformation. But at Gorze the Evangelicals were surrounded in 1543 by the troops of the Cardinal of Lorraine; and a great number of them were massacred. Farel fled in disguise, visited Mömpelgardt and his native town, Gap, and continued to labor for the Reformation, preaching and writing to the very day of his death. As a theologian he does not occupy a place in the foremost rank; but practically he was one of the boldest, as he was one of the first, of the French reformers. Among his most noticeable works are: Sommaire, 1534, new ed. by Baum, Geneva, 1867; Des Actes de la dispute de Rive, 1535 (first ed., Dufour, Geneva, 1885); Du vrai usage de la croix de Jésus Christ, 1540, new edition, Paris, 1865; Traité de purgatoire, 1543; La glaive de la parole véritable, 1550; Traité de la Cène, 1555, etc. There is no collected edition of his works.

LIT. — His biography was first written anonymously (probably by Olivier Perrot; compare HALLER, Biblioth. d. Schweizergesch., III. No. 781), then by ANCILLON, Amsterdam, 1691 (French); KIRCHHOFER, Zürich, 2 vols., 1831–33 (German); SCHMIDT, Elberfeld, 1860 (German); JUNOD, Paris, 1865 (French); and GOGUEL, Neuchâtel, 1873 (French). FARFA, one of the most famous monasteries of Italy in the middle ages; situated on the Farfa, in Central Italy; was twice destroyed, — in the seventh century by the Lombards, and in the tenth by the Saracens, — but both times rebuilt. Shortly after its second rebuilding it became very notorious on account of the licentiousness and dissipation of its monks. In the eleventh century, however, order was thoroughly re-established, and to that time belongs the celebrated Chronicon Farfense, by the Abbot Gregory (d. 1100), edited by Muratori: Script. Rer. Ital., T. II. p. ii.

FARINDON, Anthony, b. at Sunning, Berkshire, 1596; d. in London, September, 1658. He was educated at Oxford; suffered much as a royalist during the civil war, until he came under the patronage of Sir John Robinson, an alderman of London, who secured for him the pastorship of St. Mary Magdalen's, London, in which position he died. Competent judges have pronounced him the best preacher in the Church of England of that age. He was the recognized preacher for preachers, and gave solid and edifying discourses. His Sermons appeared in 4 folio volumes, 1657–73; new ed., with Life, by F. Jackson, London, 1849, 4 vols.

FARMER, Hugh, a learned and able Dissenting minister; b. near Shrewsbury, Eng., 1714; d. at Walthamstow, in Essex, Feb. 6, 1787. He was pastor of Walthamstow for forty years. In 1761 he removed to London, to become afternoon preacher at Salter's Hall, and one of the Tuesday lecturers. His principal publications, which evince his independence and scholarship, and are still read, are: An Inquiry into the Nature and Design of Christ's Temptation in the Wilderness, Lond., 1761, 3d ed., 1776, new ed., 1822 (in which he contended that our Lord's temptation was subjective, a divine vision, and not real and objective); A Dissertation on Miracles, designed to show that they are Arguments of a Divine Interposition, and Absolute Proofs of the Mission and Doctrine of a Prophet, 1771, new ed., 1810; An Essay on the Demoniacs of the New Testament, 1775, 3d ed., 1818 (these were, he maintained, merely persons strongly affected by certain diseases. This work is a classic with those who hold this view); The General Prevalence of the Worship of Human Spirits in the Ancient and Heathen Nations asserted and proved, 1783. FARNOVIUS (Stanislaus Farnowski), one of the principal leaders of the Polish anti-trinitarians in the sixteenth century; studied in Heidelberg; became a disciple of Petrus Gonesius, and formed a Unitarian party, the Farnovians, which, however, amalgamated with the Socinians immediately after his death. See BOCK: Hist. Antitrinitariorum, Königsberg, 1774-84, 2 vols.

FASTIDIUS, a Christian writer of the fifth century, and one of the few literary representatives of the ancient Briton Church. What we know of his life we owe to a few critically uncertain notices in Gennadius (Catal. vir. ill., 56), which have given rise to many untenable and self-contradictory speculations. The only certain facts are, that he was a Briton by birth, and lived about 420. His book De vitu Christiana was originally printed anonymously among the works of Augustine, until Holstenius discovered the true author, and published the work separately, Rome, 1663. It shows a strong Pelagian tendency.

FASTING, among the Hebrews. Properly speaking, there was only one divinely-ordained public fast,—that of the Day of Atonement (cf. Lev. xvi. 29 sq., xxiii. 27 sq.; Num. xxix. 7). But it was quite in accordance with the will of God, and the spirit of the Old-Testament dispensation, that when great national calamities had overtaken Israel, or great national wants arose, or great national sins were to be confessed, a day of public fasting and humiliation should be proclaimed (cf. Judg. xx. 26; 1 Sam. vii. 6; 1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Chron. xx. 3). During the Babylonish captivity the Jews observed four other fasts,—the fasts of the fourth, the fifth, the seventh, and the tenth months (Zech. vii. 1-7, viii. 19). "The fast of the fourth month" took place on the 17th of Thammuz (about June or July), in memory of the taking of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, and the interruption of the daily sacrifice. According to tradition it was also the anniversary of making the golden calf, and of Moses breaking the tables of the law. "The fast of the fifth month," on the 9th of Ab, was kept in memory of the destruction of the first (and afterwards of the second) temple. "The fast of the seventh month," on the 2d of Tishri, commemorates the death of Gedaliah and his associates at Mizpah (Jer. xli. 2). "The fast of the tenth month" was on the 10th of Tebeth, when the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar commenced.

To these fasts has been added that of Esther, kept on the 13th of Adar (Esth. iv. 16). Besides these six fasts, the Jewish calendar at present contains other twenty-two fast-days. But that is not all. It was customary to fast twice a week (Luke xviii. 12); viz., on Monday and Thursday, because, according to tradition, Moses went up Mount Sinai the second time to receive the tables of the law on a Thursday, and came down again on a Monday. Very minute directions concerning fasting are contained in the Talmudical treatise Taanith. The Essenes regularly fasted as a means of subduing the flesh, often eating nothing for three days in succession. The present Jews fast on the Day of Atonement, wearing a white shroud and cap: hence the fast is called "the white fast." On other days, mourning is worn: hence they are called "black fasts." FASTING, in the Christian Church. Fasting appears as an established practice already in the primitive church (Acts xiii. 2, xiv. 23, xxvii. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 5, etc.), derived partly from the discipline of the synagogue, partly from spontaneous inspiration. By the Montanists it was considerably furthered (Tertullian, De jejuniis), and still more so by monasticism; but it developed differently in the different churches.

I. The Church of Rome.—The principal fast of the Roman Church is the so-called Quadragesimal Fast before Easter, which a later time has designated as an apostolic tradition relating to the precedence of Moses (Exod. xxxiv. 28), and to the circumstance of our Lord lying forty hours in the grave. Originally this fast lasted only forty hours, but it was gradually extended. In the fourth century it lasted three weeks in Rome, but six in Illyria, Achaia, Alexandria, etc.; and this latter term was finally adopted also by Rome. As, however, there was no fasting on Sundays, the six-weeks' fast comprised only thirty-six fast-days; and, in order to reach the symbolical number of forty, it became customary to begin the fast on the Wednesday (Ash-Wednesday) of the preceding week. An attempt was also made to introduce a quadragesimal fast before Christmas and the day of John the Baptist; but the practice never became firmly established. See H. Liemke, Die Quadragesimalfasten der Kirche, Munich, 1853.

Fasting on certain days of the week is also an old custom of the Roman Church. The Pharisees fasted twice a week,—on Thursday and Monday,—in commemoration of Moses ascending Mount Sinai, and again descending from it. The Christians adopted this practice, only the days and their signification were changed. Wednesday and Friday (feria quarta et sexta) were selected as the days on which our Lord was betrayed and crucified. These days were called dies stationum, the life of a Christian being compared to that of a soldier (Tertullian, De Oratione, XIV.). Wednesday, however, was afterwards dropped as a fast-day. The custom, prevalent among the Jews after the exile, of keeping a fast-day respectively in the fourth, fifth, seventh, and tenth months, in commemoration of the conquest of Jerusalem, the destruction of the temple, the murder of Gedaliah, and the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, was also adopted by the Christians; but, in this case too, both the days and their designation were changed. The days were put down as days of general fasting and prayers, and arranged so that the year thereby became divided into four seasons (quatuor tempora): hence the name of Quatenber-fast. (See EMBER-DAYS.) In former times these quarter-days were also days for the collection of taxes, and hence called angaria ("servitude"). The vigilia (which see) are also fast-days; and, besides these the ordinary fast-days, the Roman Church also appoints extraordinary fast-days on special occasions.

II. The Greek Church has on this field developed different practices in its different sections; but one characteristic mark is common to them all, — strictness in keeping the rules. The principal fasts are: 1. A quadragesimal fast before Easter, based on Matt. iv. 2; 2. A quadragesimal fast before Christmas (from Nov. 15 to Dec. 24), based on Exod. xxxiv. 28; 3. The Fast of Mary (from Aug. 1 to Aug. 15); 4. The Fast of the Apostles (from the day after Whitsuntide to June 29). The old dies stationum (both Wednesday and Friday) are still retained, except between Christmas and the Epiphany, during the third week after the Epiphany (in opposition to the Armenians), and in the weeks following Easter and Whitsuntide.

III. The Reformed Churches. — The reformers were by no means averse to fasts; but they returned to the original conception of them, as a means of self-discipline and a preparation for prayer. They rejected all compulsory regulations of the practice, and wholly discarded the idea of direct moral meritoriousness. To this purport Luther expresses himself in his commentary to Matt. vi. 16; and so does Calvin in his Institutiones, IV. 12, 14, 15: "Therefore let us say something of fasting, because many, for want of knowing its usefulness, undervalue its necessity, and some reject it as almost superfluous: while, on the other hand, where the use of it is not well understood, it easily degenerates into superstition. Holy and legitimate fasting is directed to three ends; for we practise it either as a restraint on the flesh, to preserve it from licentiousness, or as a preparation for prayers and pious meditations, or as a testimony of our humiliation in the presence of God when we are desirous of confessing our guilt before him." Accordingly we find ideas of this or a very similar character incorporated with all the confessional books of the Reformed Churches (Confessio Augustana, XXVI.; Conf. Helvetica Secunda, XXIV.; Conf. Bohem., XVIII.; Conf. Gall., XXIV.; Westminster Confession, XXI. 5), and carried out practically in Switzerland, England, the United States, etc. [During the civil war (1861-65), the President appointed days of national fasting, which were generally observed irrespective of denominations.]

FATALISM (Latin fatum) denotes the doctrine of an irresistible necessity, differing, however, from the idea of nemesis by being the effect of an external, arbitrary power, rather than the result of an inherent, inevitable law. In its sterner form, presenting itself as an irrevocable decree, it bears some resemblance to the Christian idea of predestination, but has found its only full expression in the fanaticism of Mohammedanism. In its more frivolous form, looking like a mere haphazard, it crept stealthily about in the Greek philosophy, and shows itself sometimes, too, in modern pantheism and materialism.

FATHERS OF THE CHURCH. The term is applied to several classes of persons, — to the patriarchs, to the rabbins, to the founders of churches or denominations, to venerable men in churches or denominations, but chiefly to certain orthodox teachers in the early centuries of the Christian Church. While Protestants refuse to accept the authority of any writer out of the sacred canon as conclusive and final in matters of doctrine and discipline, the other branches of the Church catholic appeal to many authors who lived prior to the eighth century. For the Latin Church the line of the fathers closes with Gregory I. (d. 604); for the Greek Church, with John of Damascus (d. 754). The High-Church party of the Church of England place particular stress upon the orthodox writers prior to and of the Nicene period, and consider them especially worthy of attention as expositors of Scripture. The study of these early writers is called PATRISTICS; which see.

FAUCHET, Claude (commonly known as Abbé Fauchet), b. at Dornes, in the department of Nièvre, Sept. 22, 1744; guillotined in Paris, Oct. 31, 1793; entered the service of the church, and was rapidly promoted. He was grand vicar of the Archbishop of Bourges, preacher to the king, and Abbot of Montfort-Lacarre, in Brittany; but his Discours sur les mœurs rurales, delivered at the festival of La Rosière, at Surènes, in 1788, gave such offence on account of its open sympathy with the revolutionary ideas of the time, that he was deprived of his office as preacher to the king. When, shortly after, the revolution actually broke out, he took his place in the foremost rank of its champions. He was one of the leaders of the people in the attack on the Bastille (July 14, 1789), and in the next year he delivered in the rotunda of the corn-market an Éloge civique on Franklin, which appealed in the strongest manner to the revolutionary passions. Having contributed to the re-organization of the church by his Discours sur la religion nationale, he was made constitutional Bishop of Calvados in 1791, and by his diocese sent to the legislative assembly and the convention. In the beginning he followed the Jacobins unhesitatingly; but the trial of the king alarmed him. He spoke against the proposal to put the king to death, voted for the appeal to the people, etc., and, after the execution, he joined the Girondins, with whom he fell accused, among other things, of having been privy to the assassination of Marat.

FAUCHEUR, Michel Le, b. at Geneva, 1585; d. at Charenton, 1657; was successively minister of the Protestant congregations of Dijon, Montpellier, and Charenton, and enjoyed a great reputation as a preacher. Besides a number of sermons, he published Traité de la Cène, Geneva, 1635, Traité de l'action de l'orateur, Paris, 1637, etc. His The Wages of Sin and the Reward of Grace is translated in COMBIX'S French Preacher.

FAUSTINUS, a presbyter of Rome; lived in the second half of the fourth century, and distinguished himself in the Athanasian controversy. As an adherent of Bishop Lucifer of Cagliari, he wrote against the Arians; but his works (De trinitate and Fides), first published in Rome (1575), circulated for a time under the name of Gregorius Bactiens, the Luciferian bishop of Eliberi, or Granada, in Spain, until Tillemont discovered the true author. In the contest between Damasus and Ursinus, Faustinus sided with the latter, and by his Libellus precum moved Theodosius to interfere. His collected works are given in Migne, Bibl. Patr. Magn., XIII. 38.

FAUSTUS REJENSIS, or REGIENSIS, also called Faustus the Breton, or of Riez, an ecclesiastical writer of the fifth century, and one of the most important literary representatives of the so-called Semi-Pelagianism; was b. in Britain, or Brittany, towards the close of the fourth, or in the beginning of the fifth, century; entered the monastery of Lerius as a monk; became its abbot in 434, and succeeded Maximus in 462 as Bishop of Reji or Regium, the present Riez, in Provence. In 481 he was expelled from his see by Eurich, king of the West Goths; but he returned in 484, and staid at Reji till his death, in 491. He wrote letters and tracts against the Arians and Macedonians (Responsio ad objecta quedam de ratione fidei catholica), against the Nestorians and Monophysites (Ad Gratum), on various dogmatical and ethical questions, especially on the nature of the soul, whose corporeality he asserted. He also wrote homilies and sermons, of which especially the Six Sermones ad Monachos are celebrated; but his principal work is the De gratia Dei et humane mentis libero arbitrio libri II. In 474 the Gallic presbyter Lucidus gave a rather coarse-grained exposition of Augustine's ideas of grace and predestination. Faustus answered, first in a Epistola ad Lucidum, and then in the above-mentioned work. In this book he refutes Pelagius, whom he calls pestiferus; but he also rejects Augustine, though he calls him quidam sanctorum. He attempts to take up an intermediate position, and he does it with great adroitness and no small acumen. The book proved a great success in Gallia; but in Constantinople and North Africa it met with bitter opposition, and Hormisdas afterwards declared that its author does not belong among those whom the church calls its fathers. A collected edition of Faustus' works does not exist; but most of them may be found in Bibl. Patr. Magna, T. V. Pars III. 500; Bibl. Lugd., VIII.; MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., LVIII., etc.

WAGENMANN.

FAUSTUS THE MANICHÆAN was an African by birth, a native of Milevis; settled in 383 in Carthage, but was in 386 banished by Messianus. He was the chief of the Manichæans of Africa, and wrote a work against Christianity; but he, as well as his book, is known to us only through Augustine, who at one time wanted his instruction (Confessiones, V. 3, 6, 7, etc.), and afterwards wrote against him, Contra Faustum.

FEAST OF FOOLS. The celebration of the Pagan Saturnalia on Jan. 1 was continued in the Christian Church, and almost without restraint, although the church tried to give the festival a Christian character by celebrating it in honor of the circumcision of Christ. From Italy the festival was introduced into the whole Western Church; and in the twelfth century it was everywhere celebrated in Spain, France, Germany, and England, and generally in a most wanton way. A boy-bishop was elected, and surrounded by boy-abbots, boy-deacons, etc. He conducted service in the church, generally on some day between Christmas and New Year, interspersing the liturgical acts with travesties and parodies of the coarsest description, but all to the greatest amusement of the congregation. In the thirteenth century the church tried seriously to stop this disturbance: council after council, pope after pope, forbade it, but in vain. It was, indeed, the Reformation and the secular authorities which finally put a stop to the scandal. In DUCANGE, Glossarium, is found a complete ceremonial for the whole feast, written out in 1369, at Viviers, in Southern France. See Du TILLIER, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la fête des fous, Lausanne, 1741.

FEATHERS' TAVERN ASSOCIATION, a society of three hundred English clergymen, and some laymen, in the latter part of the eighteenth century, demanding a revision of the Liturgy of the Church of England. Amongst other changes they sought the excision of the damatory clauses from the Athanasian Creed. The organization had a short existence, and accomplished nothing. The name was taken from Feathers' Tavern, the place where they met. See BAXTER, Church History of England (Lond., 1849), p. 668.

FEATLY, Daniel, D.D., the author of The Dippers Dipt; was b. at Charlton, Oxfordshire, March 15, 1582; d. at Chelsea, April 17, 1645. After graduating at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, he went as chaplain with the English ambassador to the court of France. Returning to England, he became rector of Lambeth, and in 1627 of Acton. In 1643 he became member of the Assembly of Divines, and was the last of the Episcopal members to remain, but was expelled and imprisoned for revealing its proceedings. He is now remembered by his work entitled The Dippers dipt, or the Anabaptists duckt and plunged over head & ears at a disputation in Southwark (5th ed., 1648). This work against the Baptists originated in a disputation he held with four Baptists at Southwark, in 1641. In the dedication to the reader, he says, "I could hardly dip my pen in any thing but gall." Other works by Featly are: Mystica Clavis, a key opening divers difficult & mysterious texts of Scripture in 70 sermons, etc., Lond., 1636; Ancilla pietatis, or the handmaid to private devotion, etc., 8th ed., 1676.

FELGENHAUER, Paul, b. at Putschwitz, in Bohemia, towards the close of the sixteenth century; d. at some unknown place, after 1660; studied theology at Wittenberg, and appeared, after his return to his native country in 1620, as a theosophic and mystical writer. In his Chronologie he demonstrated that the world would come to an end before 1765; in his Zeitspiegel he made a vehement attack on the corruption of the Reformed Church and the Lutheran clergy. Compelled to flee from Bohemia in 1623, on account of persecutions directed against all Protestants, he settled in Amsterdam, but continued his literary activity, which attracted much attention in Northern Germany, especially in the lower classes. The clergy began to be alarmed. They wrote against him. When he removed to Bederkesa, near Bremen, in 1636, they had him expelled. In 1657 he was imprisoned some time at Celle, but shortly after dropped out of notice. A complete list of his works is given in ADELUNG: Geschichte d. menschl. Narrheit, IV. 400 sqq.; STARK: Lübeckische Kirchengeschichte, p. 790. HAGENBACH.

FELICISSIMUS was appointed deacon in the Church of Carthage by the presbyter Novatus, without the assent of Cyprian, and belonged to that party which represented the aristocratical and presbyterian system of government in opposition to the monarchical and episcopal system, represented by Cyprian. Cyprian protested against the appointment, but did not depose Felicissimus; and when, shortly after, the Decian persecution broke out, he fled from the city, and left his see. During his absence the presbyters undertook to re-admit the lapsi into the church by virtue of the libellos pacis, which they procured from the martyrs. This, too, Cyprian considered as an encroachment upon his authority; and he sent an episcopal committee to the city. Felicissimus, however, supported by five presbyters, declared that he would admit none into the community of his church who appeared before the episcopal committee; and, when Cyprian returned (Easter, 251), he was formally excommunicated by the party of Felicissimus, which chose a certain Fortunatus for its bishop. Felicissimus himself repaired to Rome, to gain over to his side the Roman Bishop Cornelius; but, the Novatian controversy having at this time broken out both in Rome and Carthage, Cornelius and Cyprian were naturally allies, and Felicissimus' mission failed; after which nothing more is heard of him and his party.

KLAIBER.

FELICITAS is the name of two saints of the Roman-Catholic Church: one, a distinguished Roman lady, a widow, who, together with her seven sons, was martyred in Rome under Marcus Aurelius, and is commemorated on July 10; and another, a servant-girl, who was martyred under Septimius Severus, in Carthage, together with Perpetua, and is commemorated on March 7. See Act. Sanct. on the respective dates.

FELIX and FESTUS, the two governors of Judæa (procuratores provincie), appearing in the life of the apostle Paul, as told in the Acts, chap. 21-26. Other sources of information are: for Felix, JOSEPHUS (Ant., XX. 7: 1-8: 8, and Bell. Jul., II. 12: 8-13: 7), TACITUS (Ann., XII. 54, and Hist., V. 9), SUTONIUS (Claud., 28); for Festus, JOSEPHUS (Ant., XX. 8: 9-9: 1, and Bell., II. 14: 1).

The facts which the Acts give—that Felix at the time of Paul's imprisonment (58 or 59) had been "of many years a judge unto this nation" (xxiv. 10); that he had married a Jewess, Drusilla (xxiv. 24); and that, after the lapse of two years, he was succeeded by Porcius Festus (xxiv. 27)—are confirmed by the other sources, without being affected by their differences. Thus when Josephus calls Drusilla a sister of Agrippa II., while Tacitus calls her a grand-daughter of Anthony and Cleopatra; or when Josephus tells us that Felix was not sent to Judæa as procurator until after the deposition of Ventidius Cumanus (52 or 53) by Claudius, and at the instance of the high priest Jonathan, at that time present in Rome, while Tacitus says that he was for many years procurator of a part of the province Samaria, until by the deposition of Cumanus he was appointed procurator of the whole province by the Syrian prefect, Quadratus,—these differences have no effect on the report of the Acts. Among the additional facts derived from extraneous sources may be mentioned: that Felix was a brother of Pallas, the imperial favorite, and, like him a freedman; that Festus died in Judæa, holding office only a very short time, etc. The picture which the Acts give of the two men—of Felix as a vulgar ruffian, and of Festus as a frivolous cynic—also corresponds well with that which Josephus and Tacitus give.

LIT.—H. GERLACH: Die röm. Statthalter in Syrien und Jud., Berlin, 1865; SCHÜRER: Neutestamentliche Zeitgesch., Leip., 1871. K. SCHIMDT.

FELIX THE MANICHÆAN, one of the leaders of the sect in Africa, came to Hippo, and held a disputation with Augustine in the Christian Church, and in presence of the congregation. The disputation lasted in two days, and ended with the conversion of Felix. The acts, prepared by notaries, and signed both by Felix and Augustine, are still extant, and are found both in the Paris and the Benedictine edition of Augustine's works.

FELIX THE MARTYR, and his fellow-sufferer Regula, were, according to tradition, the first to bring Christianity to the city of Zürich, and are still venerated as its patrons. They were executed under Maximian, and gave rise to a very luxurious legend. See Mittheilungen d. ant. Gesellschaft zu Zürich, 1841, vols. I. and II.

FELIX OF NOLA became a confessor during the persecution of Decius. Legend tells us how he concealed himself in a fissure of an old building, and was saved by a spider drawing her web across the fissure, and thereby hiding him from the messengers. His fate was celebrated by Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, in a long poem of fourteen songs.

FELIX OF URGEL. See ADOPTIONISM.

FELIX is the name of five popes.—Felix I. (269-274), a Roman by birth, is said to have buried with his own hands three hundred and forty-two martyrs, and was probably martyred himself during the persecution of Aurelian. His day falls on the 30th of May. The fragment of a letter from him to Bishop Maximus of Alexandria, which Cyrillus gives in his Apologeticus, is of doubtful authenticity; but the letters ascribed to him by the pseudo-Isidorean collections are certainly spurious. See Act. Sanct., April, pars I.; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif. Rom.—Felix II. (355-358) was elevated to the Roman see by the Arian court party, without the concurrence of the clergy and the people, when Liberius refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, and consequently was driven into exile. After the lapse, however, of three years, Liberius, tired of his exile, submitted to the imperial will, returned to his see, and drove away Felix. Of the later fate of the latter nothing is known with certainty. According to Jerome, he tried to regain the see by force; according to Socrates, he was formally banished by the emperor; according to others, he lived in seclusion at Porto, and died in obscurity. Singularly enough, though his title is very dubious, he is a saint of the Roman-Catholic Church. His saintship was confirmed by Gregory XIII. in 1582. His day falls on July 29. See BARONIUS: Ann. eccl. ad an. 357; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom.—Felix III. (March, 483-Feb. 25, 492) was elected by the influence of Odoacer, and became noted for the vigor and decision with which he inter-ferred in the affairs of the Eastern Church. The Emperor Zeno issued the Henoticon on the instance of his patriarch, Acacius, and for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysites. But Felix placed himself at the head of the opposition against this measure, and deposed and excommunicated Acacius at a synod of seventy-seven bishops, thereby occasioning the first schism between the Eastern and Western churches. See Act. Sanct., Februar., III., and JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif. Rom. — Felix IV. (July 12, 526–September, 530) was elected by the influence of Theoderic the Great, an Arian. — Felix V. (Jan. 5, 1440–49), Duke Amadeus of Savoy, was b. 1383, and d. Jan. 7, 1451. In 1431 he abdicated, left the government of Savoy to his son, and retired to Ripaille, on the Lake of Geneva, as head of the knightly hermit order of St. Mauritius. The process which the Council of Basel instituted against Eugenius IV. roused his ambition; and when, through various intrigues, he was actually elected Pope by the council, he eagerly accepted, assumed the name of Felix V., and immediately formed a curia, mostly consisting of Frenchmen. But residing at Geneva, without any revenue, not in possession of the States of the Church, not acknowledged by any of the great powers, he presented a piteous spectacle. Even the cardinals he made declined the honor. When Germany and France recognized Nicholas V., Felix abdicated, and retired to Ripaille. His reign forms simply an interlude in the history of the Council of Basel, and is described in its acts.

G. VOIGT.

FELL, John, D.D., Bishop of Oxford, was b. in Berkshire, June 23, 1625; d. July 10, 1686. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, of which his father was the dean. He was a royalist, and after the restoration of the Stuarts was made dean of Christ Church, and in 1676 Bishop of Oxford. He was distinguished for learning, and munificent benefactions to the university. The following famous lines were written by a student to whom Dr. Fell had given the thirty-third epigram of Martial for translation:—

“I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,
The reason why, I cannot tell;
But this I know, and know full well,
I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.”

Among his works the more important were an edition of the Greek Testament, Lond., 1675 (which was the standard edition until Mill), and Paraphrase and Annotations upon the Epp. of St. Paul, Lond., 1675, 3d ed., 1703. See Hook, Eccl. Biogr.

FELLER, François Xavier de, b. at Brussels, Aug. 18, 1735; d. at Regensburg, May 23, 1802; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1754; went to Hungary after the expulsion of the order from France; returned to the Netherlands in 1770, and lived since 1796 at the court of the Bishop of Freysing, in Bavaria. He was an exceedingly prolific writer, publishing about a hundred and twenty volumes during his lifetime, among which are the Journal of Luxemburg, 1774–94 (a periodical, 70 vols., but chiefly written by him), Dictionnaire historique et littéraire (Liège, 1781, 8 vols.), etc. One of his most interesting productions is his Coup d'œil sur le congrès d'Éms, 2 vols., Dusseldorf, 1789.

FELTHAM, Owen, an author highly esteemed in his day, was b. in Suffolk about 1609. At the age of eighteen he published Resolves, divine, moral, political, giving pointed moral and religious maxims. The work was subsequently augmented, and passed through many editions. The edition of 1806 contains the little that is known about his life, written by James Cumming.

FELTON, Henry, D.D., a learned English divine; b. in London, 1679; studied at Oxford; made rector of Whitewell, 1711; principal of Edmund Hall, Oxford, 1722; and d. 1740. Among his works are: The Christ. Faith asserted against Deists, Arians, & Socinians, in 8 Sermons (with a long preface on the necessity of a revelation), Oxf., 1732; The Resurrection of the same Numerical Body, in which Mr. Locke's notions of personality & identity are confuted, 3d ed., Lond., 1733; Sermons on the Creation, Fall, and Redemption of Man, Lond., 1748.

FENCING THE TABLES, a Scotch-Presbyterian term for the address made before the administration of the Lord's Supper, because in it the character of those who should partake was described.

FÉNELON, François de Salignac de la Mothe, Archbishop of Cambrai, and one of the most brilliant and devout of French divines; was b. Aug. 6, 1651, at the castle of Fénelon, in Périgord; d. Jan. 7, 1715, in Cambrai. Brought up by pious parents, he was early set apart for the priesthood. In his twelfth year he was sent to the then flourishing university of Cahors, and passed from there to his uncle's in Paris, the Marquis de Fénelon, an able statesman. At his request, Fénelon, who was now eighteen, preached several times, and with great acceptance. He entered the college of St. Sulpice, where he remained for five years, applying himself assiduously to study and to spiritual exercises. The Archbishop of Paris, M. de Harley, recognizing his talents, appointed him the superior of the Nouvelles Catholiques,—an association of Catholic ladies of noble birth, for the instruction of Protestant girls. The experiences which he had at this post during ten years of service were embodied in his book De l'éducation des filles (“The Education of Girls”). Intended in the first instance for the Duchess de Beauvilliers, the pious mother of a large family, it unfolded the principles of education and heart-training as they are found in Scripture and suggested by a careful observation of child-nature, with a practical wisdom that can hardly be surpassed.

Fénelon's success as Superior of this association attracted the attention of the king, and brought him into contact with Bossuet, the eloquent Bishop of Meaux, with whom he entered into a close friendship. Louis XIV. determined to use his gifts for furthering a plan of bringing over the whole of France to one faith, and assigned him a mission in Poitou for the conversion of the Protestants. Fénelon accepted the duties, but declined the military escort which it was customary to send on such occasions, preferring, like the apostles, to use only the weapons of the Spirit. He secured, at least, the respect of the Protestants, if he did not succeed in bringing them over to the Roman Church. Returning to his old position, he was accused of holding Protestant principles,—an accusation which he sufficiently refuted in his Sur le ministère des pasteurs ("The Ministry"). This tract denies the divine authority of the Protestant clergy, on the ground that such authority depended upon regular episcopal ordination handed down from the apostles.

The year 1689 was an important epoch in Fénelon's life. The king appointed him tutor for his grandsons,—the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou (afterwards king of Spain), and Berri. For the duties of this office he was eminently adapted by the untarnished nobility of his own character, high sense of honor, magnetic power, patience, and gentleness of temper. The Duke of Burgundy was of a violent temper ["so passionate that he would break the clocks which summoned him to some unwelcome duty, and fly into the wildest rage with the rain which hindered some pleasure," as St. Simon says]. But the teacher succeeded not only in mollifying his disposition, and enriching his mind, but in securing the prince's respect and gratitude. The king presented him with the abbey of St. Valérie, and in 1695 with the see of Cambrai; Fénelon, much to the former's surprise, resigning the abbey at his elevation.

With his promotion to the archbishopric began a succession of hard conflicts and humiliations. In 1687 he had formed the acquaintance of Madame Guyon (see art.), which ripened into intimate friendship. It was a severe trial for him, when a theological examination of her devotional works was instituted, that he should have been placed on the commission. Bossuet, one of the commissioners, sought to secure his signature to the Instruction sur les états d'oraison ("Instruction about the States of Prayer"), which he had written in refutation of Madame Guyon's views. Fénelon's conscientious scruples forbade his assent; and Bossuet not only began to grow cold towards him, but to antagonize him. Fénelon never fully approved of Madame Guyon's tenets and language, but always defended her intentions as above suspicion. In 1697 he made public his views on the subject, in Maximes des Saints sur la vie intérieure ("Maxims of the Saints on the Life of the Soul"). The work was a defence of Madame Guyon's fundamental principles, and elaborated the two propositions,—that the love towards God is a disinterested love of him for his own sake, and independent of the reward; and that, in the most perfect Christians, love is the predominant grace. Others professed to find the principle laid down in it, that perfect sanctification, and absolute rest in God, were possible on earth, and that a state of contemplative quietism, rather than of watching and conflict, was recommended.

Paris was split up into two parties over this work. Bossuet opposed it with passionate bitterness. Fénelon observed an exemplary moderation and patience. The king decided for Bossuet, and Fénelon was ordered to leave the court, and proceed to his diocese. He was received with joy, and at once devoted himself, with a consecration seldom equalled, to the duties of his see. He was untiring in his visitation, preached in all the churches he visited, cared for the poor, removed clerical abuses, and became the father and friend to poor and rich. His sermons were not studied works of art, but flowed with evangelical simplicity from the fulness of his heart.

In the mean time the controversy with Bossuet went on. Fénelon had submitted his case to the Pope, and sought his judgment upon the Maxims of the Saints, which Bossuet insisted he should renounce. The latter drew the most severe logical consequences from Fénelon's work, and embodied them in an answer to his Explication des Maximes des Saints ("Explanation of the Maxims of the Saints"), which he likewise sent to Rome. Fénelon answered every criticism with ability. In 1698 Bossuet wrote his Relation du quietisme, a history of the controversy, to which Fénelon replied in his Réponse, which aroused a very favorable feeling towards him. But the Sorbonne had already condemned twelve articles of the Explication; and in 1699 a papal brief declared the Maxims of the Saints, and twenty-three articles drawn from it erroneous (not heretical). The general interest as to the archbishop's course was speedily put at rest. Fénelon submitted unconditionally, finding the papal sentence severe, but recognizing in it the "echo of the divine will;" and he believed only one course to be open to a true son of the church. He revoked the twenty-three articles, and forbade the circulation of the book in his diocese. Although, from the stand-point of the gospel, we cannot approve of Fénelon's course, we cannot help but admire the spirit of moderation and humility which guided him during the whole progress of the controversy. Bossuet, on the one hand, eulogized his submission: the people, on the other, throughout France, had learned to esteem him.

The leisure he could find in the administration of his diocese, Fénelon employed in furthering the education of the Duke of Burgundy. This he did by correspondence. In order to instil in him the principles of justice and goodness, he gathered together the fragments of the Télémaque, and revised the whole. He gave the manuscript to a copyist in order to secure a neatly-written copy for his ward. The copyist made a second copy, without the knowledge of Fénelon; and it was printed at Paris under the title Aventures de Télémaque ("Adventures of Telemachus"), but, being suppressed by royal order, was reprinted in Holland, June, 1699. The book was translated into every language of Europe, and had one of the largest circulations of any book after the Bible. The king thought he discovered in the work a satire against his administration, but without just ground.

In 1712 Fénelon wrote two other works for the Duke of Burgundy,—Dialogues des morts ("Dialogues of the Dead"), and Directions pour la conscience d'un Roi ("Rules for a King's Conscience"). The latter was first printed in Holland, 1731. It is full of sapient advice, and searching questions, such as only an experienced confessor could present. In 1713 appeared his Démonstration de l'existence de Dieu ("Proof of God's Existence"), and in 1718 a most excellent treatise on eloquence,—Dialogues sur l'éloquence. The latter is composed in the purest and most classic French, and full of healthy and inspiring thoughts. He lays down the threefold condition of an oration,—that it must prove, illustrate, and move. He holds up the Scriptures as the most perfect illustration of true eloquence, which the preacher cannot study too diligently.

The nobility of Fénelon's character was shown most conspicuously during the war of the Spanish Succession (1701-13), when his diocese was for a while the seat of war. In a general way he sought to mitigate the horrors and ravages of the war by wise counsels to the Duke of Burgundy, who was commander-in-chief. When, in 1709, Flanders, in which Cambray was located, was desolated, he opened the chambers of his palace to the wounded and the sick; and when a dearth of grain was felt he offered his whole income to the state. The French admired their archbishop for his self-denying interest in the suffering and wounded, and bowed before his piety. No less did the enemies of France esteem his virtues; and Prince Eugene and Marlborough not only treated him politely, but sent troops to guard his property.

He died of a fever. His last days were peaceful. The latter part of the fourth chapter of Second Corinthians and the fifth chapter were read and re-read to him, affording great comfort. After listening to the high-priestly prayer in Gethsemane (John xvii.), he blessed his attendants, and went to sleep, aged sixty-four. Fénelon's death was regarded as a loss, not only to the diocese of Cambray, but to all France. His virtues and talents were known throughout Europe, and recognized by all church communions. He was a strict son of the Roman-Catholic Church; but, above all, he was a genuine, believing, active Christian, liberal and charitable enough to sympathize with Protestants, who, in turn, revere his memory.

[The description of St. Simon, in his Memoirs (XXII.), deserves to be quoted. "He was a tall, thin man, well made, pale, with a large nose, eyes whence fire and talent streamed like a torrent, and a physiognomy the like of which I have never seen in any other man, and which, once seen, could never be forgot. . . . It united seriousness and gayety, gravity and courtesy; the prevailing characteristics, as in every thing about him, being refinement, intellect, gracefulness, modesty, and, above all, noblesse," etc.]

G. V. LECHLER.

FERGUSSON, David, one of the fathers of the Scottish Reformation, was b. not later, and probably some years earlier, than the year 1525 (see Wodrow MSS., vol. xvii. No. 16). He d. in 1598, "the auldest minister that tyme in Scotland" (James Melvill's Diary, Edin., 1842, p. 437). He seems to have been a native of Dundee, and by original occupation a glover (Fergusson's Tracts, ut infra, Introd., p. xiv). Though not a graduate of any university (Row, Hist., p. 418), he shows in his writings, and in the many wise and witty sayings which have been, doubtless truly enough, attributed to him, a familiarity with the classical languages and classical literature. In July, 1560, he was selected by the Parliament to be minister of Dunfermline, an important charge, as containing a royal palace, which afterwards became the favorite residence of James VI. But he had been one of six men, as he tells us himself, who began to preach the Reformed faith in Scotland some years before the Reformation; at a time "when" (to use his own words) "there was no stipend heard tell of; when the authority, both ecclesiastic and civil, opposed themselves; and when scarcely a man of name and estimation [was found] to take their cause in hand" (James Melvill's Diary, p. 357). As to the matter of stipend, indeed it must be here added, that, even after the establishment of the Reformation, there was for some years little change for the better in this respect. In one of the Tracts already referred to, and afterwards more particularly noticed, a tract published in the year 1563, Fergusson, speaking of himself and his brethren generally, says, "The greatest number of us have lived in great penury, without all stipend; some twelve months, some eight, and some half a year, having nothing to sustain ourselves and our families, but that which we have borrowed of charitable persons, until God send it to us to repay them" (Answer to Renan Benedict, p. 11). He proved an excellent minister, "preaching," says Row (Hist. p. 418), "with great boldness, wisdom, and holiness," and "bringing the people [of his charge] to very good order, knowledge of the truth, and obedience to the discipline of the Kirk." As a church-leader, he was characterized by firmness, sagacity, sound judgment, and also what Wodrow (Analecra, Glasgow, 1842, vol. I., p. 120) calls "pleasant and facetious conversation, by which," Wodrow adds, "he often pleased and pacified the king when he was in a fury." He was, accordingly, very frequently employed by the Church as a medium of communication with the king.

Fergusson published two tracts in his own lifetime. The first is a controversial work, entitled An Answer to Ane Epistle written by Renan Benedict, the French doctor, to John Knox, and the rest of the bretheren." This treatise was printed at Edinburgh, in the year 1563, and was reprinted for the Bannatyne Club in 1860, from a unique copy in the library of the University of Edinburgh. It contains an able discussion of the chief points at issue between the Romanists and Protestants at the period of the Reformation. His second publication appeared nine years afterwards, being a sermon preached before the regent and nobility at Leith (Jan. 13, 1571-72), during the meetings of the General Assembly. It relates chiefly to the inadequacy of the existing provision for the Reformed ministers, the schools, and the poor; and it condemns in no measured terms the neglect by the king and Parliament of objects regarded by the Church from the first as having paramount claims on their attention. The sermon was printed at the request of the General Assembly held at Perth in the year 1572, with the special approbation of five of the most eminent ministers of that day, to whom it had been submitted for revision; John Knox, then on his death-bed, giving his imprimatur in these words: "John Knox, with his dead hand, but glad heart, praising God, that, of his mercy, he leaves such light to his kirk in this desolation." Fergusson is also the author of a posthumous work, entitled Scottish Proverbs: Gathered together by David Fergusson . . . and put ordine alphabetico when he departed this life (Edin., 1641).

Among his descendants many well-known names occur, including Adam Fergusson, minister of Logierait, who took a prominent part in the controversies connected with the Scottish secession of 1733, and his much more distinguished son, Dr. Adam Fergusson, professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh, and the author of a history of the Roman Republic (Lond., 1783), and other standard works. Principal Robertson, the historian of America and of Charles V., and Henry, Lord Brougham, also alike claimed lineal descent from the first minister of Dunfermline.

LIT. — The few facts now known as to the life of this eminent Reformer will be found in the books and documents quoted above, and especially in Row's Historie of the Kirk of Scotland from the year 1558 to August, 1637 (Edin., 1812), and in the introductory notice to the Bannatyne Club's reprint of Fergusson's Tracts (Edin., 1869), also already mentioned. Many of the "Sayings" of D. Fergusson will be found in the Wodrow Manuscript Collections preserved in the library of the University of Glasgow. See, also, Encyclopædia Britannica (supplement), ed. 1824, s. v., Dr. Adam Fergusson, and Edinburgh Review for January, 1867 (vol. 125, pp. 48 sqq.).

FERMENTARIANS. See AZYMITES.

FERRAR, Nicholas, an English clergyman of ascetic tastes; b. in London, Feb. 22, 1592; d. Dec. 2, 1637. He studied at Clare Hall, Cambridge; in 1624 was elected to Parliament; and in 1626 was ordained deacon by the Bishop of St. David's (Laud). He consecrated himself to a life of retirement and devotion, and refused flattering offers to benefices. He turned his manor, Little Gidding, into a sort of conventual establishment, at which vigils and other formal religious exercises were scrupulously observed. Ferrar himself slept on the floor, and rose at one in the morning for religious meditation. He also did much good by providing a free school for the children of the neighborhood, and himself catechised them. See Lives of Ferrar by Dr. PECKARD (Camb., 1790), MACDONOUGH (2d ed., Lond., 1837), and by his BROTHER and Dr. JEBB (1 vol., Camb., 1855).

FERRAR, Robert, Bishop of St. David's, and martyr; b. at Halifax, Yorkshire; d. at the stake, in Caermarthen, Wales, March 30, 1555. He studied at Cambridge and Oxford, and was elevated to the see of St. David's, under Edward VI., in 1548. Bishop Burnet (Hist. of Ref., l. p. 151) describes him as "a rash and indiscreet man," and as having been arbitrary in his treatment of the canons of his cathedral. At the accession of Mary he was deprived of his see, and tried and condemned for heresy. To a young man who deplored his death-sentence he is reported to have said, "If you see me once stir while I suffer the pains of burning, then give no credit to those doctrines for which I die." He made good his assertion, and was felled to the ground by a blow on the head. See FOXE: Actes and Monumentes; HOOK: Eccles. Biogr., vol. v.

FERRARA-FLORENCE, Council of. The course of opposition to the Pope and the curia, which the Council of Basel pursued, was even more pronounced than had been anticipated. A breach became unavoidable; and the project of a union between the Eastern and Western churches, started for political reasons by the Byzantine emperor, and eagerly caught at by the Pope, gave the occasion. For many reasons, Eugenius IV. wished that these negotiations should be carried on in Italy; and he proposed to transfer the Council of Basel to some Italian city. But the council refused; and after the stormy meetings on March 6 and 7, 1437, the papal minority left Basel, and placed itself at the disposition of the Pope. Jan. 8, 1438, the council was solemnly opened at Ferrara; and in March, same year, the Eastern delegates arrived, numbering about seven hundred persons, and including, besides the emperor, Johannes VI. (Palæologus), all the highest dignitaries of the Greek Church,—the patriarch of Constantinople, Joseph II.; the archbishop of Nicæa, Bessarion; the archbishop of Ephesus, Marcus Eugenius; the metropolitan of Kiev, Isidore, etc. April 9, 1438, the debate of the union question began.

The principal points of the debate were, the procession of the Holy Spirit (Filioque), the intermediate state of the soul between death and judgment (purgatory), the use of unleavened bread in the Eucharist, the primacy of the Pope, etc. The debates were very copious; but though the union had several warm friends among the Greeks, as, for instance, Bessarion, and though the emperor, pressed as he was on all sides by the Turks, and well knowing that the union was the condition of help from Western Europe, did his utmost to dampen the ardor of his theologians, nothing seemed likely to come out of the attempt. Troubles of another kind were added. The Greeks were the guests of the Pope, but the Pope had no money. In this emergency he addressed himself to the rich Florentine bankers; but the Florentines demanded that the council should be transferred from Ferrara to Florence, and this transference frightened the Greeks. Nevertheless, Feb. 26, 1439, the council was opened at Florence; and, after some months of more discussion, an agreement was actually arrived at. An act of union was signed by thirty-three Greek and a hundred and fifteen Latin church-dignitaries; and July 6, 1439, the Pope celebrated a commemorative service of unity in the Cathedral of Florence. Unfortunately, this union, so pompously announced to the world, was in reality a mere illusion. With respect to the principal dogmatical question,—the procession of the Holy Spirit,—the Latin addition (Filioque) was recognized by the Greeks, but not adopted in their creed; with respect to the principal practical question,—the papal primacy,—the claims of the Pope were recognized by the Greeks; but at the same time the rights and privileges of the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, were renewed and confirmed. In the West this union produced no enthusiasm for the suffering Greeks; and in the East it intensified the hatred to the Latins. Several of the Greek ecclesiastics who had signed the act of union were made to suffer for it. Isidore was thrown into prison: Bessarion had to flee to Rome, etc. In 1472 the Greeks solemnly renounced the union.

LIT.—The authentic acts of the council are lost; but a documentary history of it, probably written by Archbishop Dorotheus of Mitylene, is found in vol. 9 of HARDUIN, and vol. 31 of MANSI. It is in favor of the union. From the opposite stand-point wrote Sylvester Syropulos, a Greek priest, whose work was edited by Creighton, London, 1660. FERRARA, Renata (Renée), celebrated for her relations to the Reformers, was the daughter of Louis XII. of France, and wife of Hercules of Este, Duke of Ferrara, whom she married in 1527; was b. at the castle of St. Blois, Oct. 25, 1510; and d. at Montargis, June 12, 1575. Brought up in the court of Francis I., she came into intimate relations with Margaret of Navarre, whose evangelical sentiments she imbibed. Her mind delighted in the pursuits of literature and art; and her court at Ferrara attracted the learned men of Italy. She remained true to evangelical sentiments, in spite of opposition and the forced separation of her children, and welcomed to her palace Ochino, Peter Martyr, Calvin, and other evangelical divines. Calvin, during his stay (in 1536) of several months, instructed her carefully in the Reformed doctrines, and afterwards maintained a correspondence with her. On the death of her husband (in 1559) she returned to France, and made profession of the Reformed faith, in which she died. See P. BAYLE (Dictionary), MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ (iv. 425-427, v. 420-423, Am. ed.), WEITZEL (Renée of France, New York, 1883).

FERRER, Vincentius, b. at Valencia, Jan. 23, 1357; d. at Vannes, in Bretagne, April 5, 1419; entered the Dominican order in 1374; studied at Barcelona and Lerida; wrote Tractatus de moderno Ecclesie schismate. Visited Paris; was appointed confessor to Queen Yolanda of Aragon; wrote Tractatus de vita spirituali, and other works, and was in 1395 called to Avignon by Benedict XIII., as Magister Sacri Palatii. But two years later on he gave up this position, and determined, in spite of the opposition of the Pope, to devote his life to missionary labors. Travelling on foot through France, Italy, Spain, and England, he preached, often twice a day, in the streets or on the road, to great crowds. Soon he was not alone any more. A wandering congregation formed around him, accompanying him everywhere, practising the severest asceticism, and filling the towns and the fields with their sombre songs. He was canonized by Calixtus III., June 29, 1455. See LUDWIG HELLER: Vincentius Ferrer, Berlin, 1830; HOHNENTHAL: De Vincentio Ferrerio, Leipzig, 1839. L. HELLER.

FERRIER, Jérémie, b. at Nîmes in 1565; d. in Paris, Sept. 26, 1626; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Congregation of Nîmes in 1601, and considered one of the most talented and courageous champions of the Reformation in France. He publicly defended the thesis that the Pope was Antichrist. He preached with such a violence against the Jesuits as to cause riots, etc. Nevertheless, some suspicion of his sincerity arose in 1611; and in 1613 he was forbidden to preach, because it was evident that he had sold himself to the Court and the Romanists. He went to Paris and abjured Protestantism in 1614. In the same year he wrote De l'Antchrist et de ses marques, contre les calomnies des ennemis de l'Eglise catholique. See BORREL, Hist. de l'Egl. réf. de Nîmes, 1856.

FERRIS, Isaac, D.D., LL.D., b. in New York, Oct. 3, 1799; d. at Roselle, N.J., June 16, 1873. He was graduated from Columbia College, 1816; a pastor in the Reformed Dutch Church over different charges (New Brunswick, N.J., 1821-24; Albany, 1824-36; New York, Market Street, 1836-51); and chancellor of the New York University, 1852-70, emeritus, 1870-73. His service to the university was long and faithful. By his efforts a crushing debt of a hundred thousand dollars was extinguished, four professorships endowed, and several new departments added to the course of instruction. He possessed great sagacity, common sense, and administrative ability. As preacher, pastor, and professor, he was beloved. His presence was majestic. He delivered the address at the Jubilee of the American Bible Society, New York, 1866, subsequently published, — Jubilee Memorial of the American Bible Society; being a Review of its First Fifty Years of Work, N.Y., 1867.

FERRY, Paul, b. at Metz, Feb. 24, 1591; d. there July 28, 1669; was pastor of the Reformed Congregation there for about sixty years. He was a very prolific writer; but most of his works still remain in manuscript, and those which have been printed are mediocre. He is noticeable, however, for his participation in the project of uniting the Protestants and Romanists of France. His correspondence with Bossuet on that occasion is found in vol. xxiv. of the works of the latter. His Lettre aux ministres de Genève, in defence of a poor lunatic who was burnt at Geneva for blasphemies against the Trinity, is found in vol. ii. of Bibliothèque Anglaise.

FERRY LAW, The, is the name generally applied to a law concerning public instruction, especially in the higher schools, which was laid before the Legislative Chamber of France, March 15, 1879, by Jules Ferry, at that time minister of public instruction, and passed by the Senate, July 19, same year. The tendency of this law is to exclude the influence of the Roman-Catholic Church from the school. Article VII. of the law, the centre of the debate, and the object of a very bitter contest, prohibits the member of a not recognized religious association to be the director of, or to teach in, a public school. In consequence of this article, twenty-seven Jesuit colleges were closed, and eight hundred and forty-eight Jesuit teachers were forbidden to work. But, besides the Jesuits, twenty-six other religious communities which could not obtain, or would not seek, the confirmation of the government, were affected by the law. See FRANCE, ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS OF.

FESCH, Joseph, b. at Ajaccio, Jan. 3, 1763; d. in Rome, May 13, 1839; was a younger stepbrother to Lætitia, the mother of Napoleon I., and was educated for the church in the seminary of Aix. After the outbreak of the Revolution, he entered the military service, and accompanied his nephew on his first Italian campaign as an army commissary. He took part in the negotiation of the concordat, returned to the church, and was made Archbishop of Lyons in 1802, and Cardinal in 1803. As ambassador to Rome, he succeeded in inducing the Pope to go to Paris to crown Napoleon; and the day before the crowning he gave the civil marriage of Napoleon and Josephine the consecration of the church. He was, however, not a mere tool in the hands of his nephew. He afterwards absolutely refused to annul the marriage which he had consecrated; and as president of the National Council assembled in Paris, 1810, he resisted the policy of Napoleon so persistently, that he entirely lost his favor. After the fall of the emperor, Cardinal Fesch sought refuge in Rome, and was very kindly received by the Pope. He joined Napoleon during the Hundred Days, but returned then to Rome, where he spent the rest of his life. His correspondence with Napoleon was published by DU CASSE, in 3 vols., Paris, 1855. See LYONNET: Le Cardinal Fesch, Lyons, 1841, 2 vols.; and La vérité sur le Cardinal Fesch, Lyons, 1842.

FESTIVALS OF THE JEWS. The festivals of the Jews may be divided into pre-exilic and post-exilic. They will be found described under their respective titles.

I. The Pre-Exilic Festivals. — There are (a) The Seventh Day, or the Sabbath; (b) The Feast of Trumpets, or New Year; (c) The Day of Atonement; (d) The Feast of Tabernacles, and (e) The Feast of Pentecost. Besides, each seventh year was observed as a sabbatical, and, after seven times seven years, the Feast of Jubilee was observed. On the holy seasons in general comp. Exod. xxiii. 10-17; Lev. xxiii. xxv.; Num. xxviii., xxix.; Deut. xvi. As these festivals are treated separately, we need not enter upon the mode of their observation.

II. The Post-Exilic Festivals. — After the exile, other holy seasons were added to those already enacted by Moses: thus the four fasts mentioned in Zechariah (for which comp. the art. Fasts), the Feast of Esther, or Purim, that of the Dedication of the Temple on its restoration by Judas the Maccabee, and that of Wood Offering, on which offerings of wood were brought for the use of the temple, and on which see the Mishna Taanith iv. 5, and Josephus, Jewish Wars, II. 17, 6. Comp. Delitzsch, in Herzog's Real Encyclop. (2d ed.), s. v. Feste.

FESTUS. See FELIX AND FESTUS.

FETICHISM, or FETISHISM (from the Portuguese feitico, fetisso, a "charm," denotes one of the lowest forms of religion, — the worshipping of fetiches. The fetich is not itself considered a deity by the worshipper, or even a symbol of a deity: it is simply supposed to be a vehicle through which a supernatural power makes itself felt in the world; and, as no logical connection is demanded between the power and the vehicle through which it acts, any object whatever, natural or artificial, animate or inanimate, may become a fetich. Entirely incidentally — by a dream, by some kind of delusion, by a mere whim — some one is induced to believe that a supernatural power exercises influence on his destiny through this pebble or that feather; and immediately he falls down and worships the pebble or the feather, and makes it his fetich. But just as incidentally the object may lose this dignity of being a fetich. If the worshipper discovers, or thinks he has discovered, that the influence is not so real as he supposed, he will withdraw his allegiance, and perhaps take vengeance. If the fetich is an animate object, it will be punished: if it is an inanimate object, it may be destroyed. The idea, however, of influencing, perhaps coercing, the supernatural power through the vehicle, is not altogether foreign to the fetich worshipper; for the fetich has, at least to some extent, the character of being a means of witchcraft.

This form of religion was observed and described for the first time, when, in the fifteenth century, the Portuguese boarded the coasts of Guinea. Afterwards numerous traces of it were found among the savages in America, Australia, and Siberia; and De Brosses, in his Du Culte des Dieux Fétiches (Dijon, 1760), brings it in connection with the religion of the ancient Egyptians. General attention was drawn to it by A. Comte, who, in his Philosophie positive (Paris, 1830-42), places it as the first stage in the logical evolution of religion, and defines it as a conception of nature, according to which all bodies are animated, in the same manner as the human body, and, like that, governed by a will. This definition depends upon a mistake; for fetichism is not pantheism, but just the reverse of pantheism, a very coarse dualism, as has been very ably shown by Sir JOHN LUBBOCK, in his Origin of Civilization, 1870, and by HERBERT SPENCER, in his Sociology, 1879. See FRITZ SCHULTZE, Der Fetichismus, Leipzig, 1871. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

FEUERBACH, Ludwig Andreas, b. at Landshut, Bavaria, July 28, 1804; d. at Bruckberg, near Ansbach, Sept. 13, 1872; studied at Heidelberg and Berlin, and began to lecture on philosophy at Erlangen, but spent most of his life in literary retirement at Bruckberg. In 1818, 1849, he once more began to lecture publicly at Heidelberg; but, when the revolutionary movement completely failed, he again retired to private life. In the last year of his life he was rescued from actual want only by a public subscription. He was originally a pupil of Hegel, but left the master in 1839 with a very bitter criticism, and attempted an independent development in the direction of naturalism, or rather materialism. In his principal work (Das Wesen des Christenthums, 1841) he defines God as a mere projection into empty space of the human ego, as an image of man, and religion as a simple psychological process, as an illusion. The book was translated into English with consummate art by George Eliot (Mrs. Cross), Essence of Christianity, London, 1853, new ed., 1881. See SCHALLER: Darstellung und Kritik d. Philosophie L. F., 1847; R. HAGEN: Feuerbach und die Philosophie, 1847.

FEUILLANTS, The, received their name from the abbey of Feuillans, about eighteen miles from Toulouse, and were originally a branch of the Cistercian order, subject to the authority of Cîteaux, but became an independent congregation by the reforms of Jean de la Barrière (b. 1544, d. 1600). He became abbot of Feuillans in 1574, and in spite of much opposition, and many difficulties, he succeeded in re-establishing the old discipline and order among his monks. As a consequence of the reform, the reputation of the monastery increased so rapidly, that the envy even of the mother-institution at Cîteaux was excited, and Barrière was compelled to ask support from the Pope. In 1586 the Pope not only confirmed the reforms, but also forbade the Cistercians to meddle with the affairs of Feuillans. Monks from Feuillans were invited to Rome; and monasteries on the reformed plan were founded in Rome, in Paris, and in Bordeaux. In 1595 the Pope entirely exempted the Feuillants from the authority of Cîteaux, and confirmed their constitution as an independent congregation. Under Henry IV. they obtained the right of electing their own general; and in the middle of the seventeenth century they numbered about thirty monasteries in France and Italy. Nunneries were also founded; the first by Barrière, in 1588, at Montesquion, in the diocese of Rieux, for fifteen inmates; a second, in 1599, at Toulouse; a third at Poitiers, in 1617, etc. See JOSEPH MOROTIUS: Cisterciü reforescentis . . . histor., Turin, 1690, fol.; Dom J. de la Barrière, Paris, 1699. FEW, Ignatius A., D.D., LL.D., b. in Augusta, Ga., April 11, 1789; d. in Athens, Ga., Nov. 28, 1845. After practising law for a few years, he was converted, and entered the ministry of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, 1828, and attained to great eminence. He was the founder and first president of Emory College, Oxford, Ga., and one of the leaders of the Methodist-Episcopal Church, South. His attainments, intellectual and spiritual, made him beloved and trusted.

FIACRE (Irish-Gaelic, raven or worth), d. 670; a saint of Gaul, and patron of the gardeners, who celebrate his festival on Aug. 30. He was most probably of Irish parentage, and went to Meaux, in France, where he erected an oratory to the Virgin Mary, which became a famous resort for pilgrims. Of his life little is known. Miracles are attributed to him, and his relics were believed to have retained the same power. Women were excluded from his chapel; and, according to Boece (Hist. Scotland, ix. 19), "All women that gangis in his chapell wil be other blind or mod [mad]." His name has been given to a carriage. In 1640 a merchant rented a building in Paris for his carriages, which he hired out. Over the building was an image of the saint, and the building itself was called "Hôtel de St. Fiacre." The name passed to the vehicles themselves. See BOLLANDIST: Acta SS., Aug. 30, vol. vi. p. 604 sqq.; A. J. ANSAIR: Hist. de St. Fiacre, Paris, 1782; SMITH: Dict. Christ. Biog., art. Fiacrus.

FICHTE, Johann Gottlieb, b. at Rammenan, in Upper Lusatia, May 19, 1762; d. in Berlin, Jan. 27, 1814; was educated at Schulpforta, and studied theology at Jena. The son of a poor ribbon-weaver, he was enabled to follow his intellectual ambition only by the aid of Baron von Miltiz; and, when this his benefactor died, he led for several years a very precarious life as a tutor in Zürich and Warsaw, and as a student in Leipzig and Königsberg. He came out, however, from those years of poverty and embarrassments of all kinds, a character of steel. His first strong intellectual impression he received from the writings of Lessing. Afterwards, in the course of his mental development, he successively moved from the freethinking of Lessing to the determinism of Spinoza, and again from the determinism of Spinoza to the criticism of Kant. In Kant's limitation of causality to the world of phenomena he found the starting-point for his own philosophy, — that audacious deduction of both nature and God from the human ego, as to whose true character (atheism, or not) people still disagree. In 1794 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Jena; and the following year he published his chief work, Die Wissenschaftslehre (translated into English by A. E. KROEGER, Science of Knowledge, Philadelphia, 1868), and the beautiful essay, Ueber die Bestimmung des Gelehrten (translated by W. SMITH, The Vocation of the Scholar, in his Popular Writings of J. G. Fichte, 2 vols., London, 1847-49, new edition, 1871). Both his writings and his lectures made a deep impression. But a suspicion of atheism was already abroad; and when, in 1799, in a little essay, On the Grounds of our Faith in the Divine Government of the World, he declared that the moral order of the world is God, and that there is no other God, he was formally rebuked by the government, and discharged. The rest of his life he spent in Berlin, where he lectured to great audiences, and took an active part in the foundation of the university. The effect of his lectures (as, for instance, his Reden an die deutsche Nation), was felt through all Germany, and can still be felt at this very day. In these his later writings, as, for instance, in The Destination of Man, 1800 (translated by Mrs. Sinnett, London, 1846), The Nature of the Scholar, The Characteristics of the Present Age, The Way towards the Blessed Life, etc., 1805-07 (all translated by W. Smith in the book mentioned above), he took great pains to clear up his relation to religion, especially to Christianity. In some points he succeeded. It is evident that he was very far from considering Christianity a mere code of morality: he recognized it as an agency of much deeper significance in the history of the human race. But the incarnation, for instance, seems to have been to him nothing more than a typical representation of what takes place in every man when he is converted. Of the historical facts on which Christianity rests, he seems to have grasped the typical signification only. His collected works were edited (Bonn, 1834-46, 11 vols.), and his life was written, by his son, J. H. Fichte, Sulzbach, 1830, 2 vols., 2d ed., Leipzig, 1862.

FICHTE, Immanuel Hermann, the son of the former; b. at Jena, July 18, 1797; d. at Stuttgart, Aug. 13, 1879; was professor of philosophy at Bonn (1836-42), and at Tübingen (1842-75). He was a very prolific writer on all branches of philosophy, and exercised considerable influence as a champion of Christian theism. In this respect his Die speculative Theologie, Heidelberg, 1846, and System der Ethik, Leipzig, 1850-53, are of special interest. He founded the Zeitschrift für Philosophie.

FICINUS, Marsilius, b. at Florence, Oct. 19, 1433; d. in his villa, at Careggi, Oct. 1, 1499; was a son of the body-physician of Cosmo di Medici, and grew up in the palace, enjoying the instruction of Gemistus Pletho, and the intercourse of all the leaders of the Renaissance. In time he became one of the leaders himself; and he, more than any one else, was instrumental in familiarizing the age with the ideas of Plato and the Neo-Platonists. It was an enthusiastic conviction of his, that the depraved theology of his time could be regenerated only by an infusion of Platonism. In that spirit he preached, having been consecrated priest in 1477; and in that spirit he wrote and lectured as president of the Platonic Academy. He gave a complete Latin translation of Plato and Plotinus, and published a number of original works, — Theologia Platonica, De Religione Christiana, De Immortalitate Animum, etc. Collected editions of his works appeared at Venice, 1516; Basel, 1561; Paris, 1641. Among his pupils were Pico di Mirandola, Reuchlin, Sixtus IV., etc. See SIEVEKING, Geschichte d. platonisch. Akademie zu Florenz, Göttingen, 1812.

FIDDES, Richard, D.D., a fertile theological author: b. at Humanley, Yorkshire, in 1671; and d. at Putney in 1725. He was educated at Oxford; became rector of Ilsham about 1694, but, losing his voice, resigned, and devoted himself with much industry to authorship. Among his works are: A Body of Divinity, Lond., 1718-20, in 2 vols. (the first discussing the doctrines of natural and revealed religion, — Theol. speculativa, the second, the duties, — Theol. practica); A Life of Cardinal Wolsy, Lond., 1724 (in which the writer disparages the Reformation); and 3 vols. of Discourses, Lond., 1713-15, vol. i. passing through three editions.

FIDELIS, St., properly Marcus Roy, was b. at Sigmaringen, 1577; studied law, and began to practise as a lawyer in Ensisheim, but suddenly changed career, entered the order of the Capuchins, and was consecrated priest, and appointed preacher at Feldkirch, in the Vorarlberg, 1621. His great aim was to re-establish the Roman-Catholic Church in these regions; and at the head of an Austrian regiment of dragoons he set out on a missionary trip. But the peasants rose in defence of their religious liberty, defeated the dragoons, and put Fidelis to death, April 21, 1622; for which Benedict XIV. declared him a saint. G. PLITT.

FIELD, Richard, an eminent divine of the Anglican Church; b. Oct. 15, 1561, in Hempstead, Hertfordshire; d. Nov. 21, 1616. He studied at Oxford; was made rector of Burghclere in 1598, chaplain in ordinary to Elizabeth, and in 1610 raised to the deanery of Gloucester. He was an intimate friend of Hooker, recognized as a good preacher and profound theologian, and esteemed by James I., who, after hearing him for the first time, expressed his sentiments in the pun, "This is a Field for God to dwell in." Fuller, in his Holy War, calls him "that learned divine, whose memory smelleth like a Field the Lord hath blessed." Field's fame rests upon his work entitled Of the Church, Five Bookes, by Richard Field, D.D., and sometime Deane of Gloucester, 1606-10. It treats of the nature, members, and government of the true church, and was occasioned, as he says in the dedication to the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the "unhappy divisions of the Christian world, and the infinite distractions of men's minds." It seeks to "discover the vanity of the insolent boastings of the Papists, that all men may know that we have not departed from the ancient faith, or forsaken the fellowship of the Church Catholic." In the fifth book, which discusses the ministry, he takes the moderate view of episcopacy. "When the Apostles had finished their course, they left none to succeed them . . . yet they authorized presbyters and deacons," etc. (Epistle to the Reader). Field's work has been republished by the Ecclesiastical History Society, 4 vols., Cambridge, 1847. For his life, see Some Short Memorials concerning his Life, by his son, NATHANIEL FIELD, London, 1716, 1717.

FIFTH-MONARCHY MEN, republican and millenarian enthusiasts of the Commonwealth period, who attempted to set up "the kingdom of Jesus," or the fifth monarchy of Daniel. Powell and Feake were the first leaders, and called Cromwell "the dissemblingst perjured villain in the world." They formed a plot in 1657 to murder Cromwell; but it was discovered by Secretary Thurloe, and some of the chief conspirators imprisoned. On Sunday, Jan. 6, 1661, a band numbering about fifty, and headed by Venner, a wine-cooper, rose again in insurrection. They carried a banner with the design of a lion couchant (the lion of the tribe of Judah). They were quickly dispersed, and Venner taken prisoner, and hung. The Independents and Quakers were unjustly accused of being in sympathy with the Fifth-Monarchy Men. See NEAL: Hist. of the Puritans, ii. 176, 220 (Harper's ed.); CARLYLE: Life of Cromwell; STOURTON: Rel. in England, new ed., Lond., 1881, vol. ii. pp. 57-69.

FIJI ISLANDS, a group of two hundred and fifty islands in the Southern Pacific, and comprising an area of nearly eight thousand square miles. The two largest are Vama Levu (Great Land), which is a hundred miles long, and has an average breadth of twenty-five miles, and Viti Levu (Great Viti, or Fiji), which is ninety by fifty miles. Eighty of these islands are inhabited. They are the result of coral and volcanic formation. The climate is delightful, the thermometer seldom rising above 90°. The islands were discovered by Tasman in 1643, and visited by Bligh in 1789, and by Wilson in 1797. The ethnological relations of the Fijians have given much difficulty. They combine characteristics of the Melanesian and Polynesian types. Physically they are an athletic, well-formed race, and mentally they are far above the Papuans. The population was divided up into tribes, and ruled by kings, until 1874, when the islands were annexed to Great Britain. The more powerful chiefs voluntarily proposed the cessation, and signed articles to that effect in October of 1874. Sir Arthur Gordon was appointed the first governor. The advantages accruing to the islands from the annexation have been signal. A code of laws has been adopted, and justice is now administered in courts. When the English governor arrived at the islands in 1875, they were in a state of almost hopeless poverty. A terrible pestilence had carried off, the year previous, one-third of the population. From that time the yearly revenue has rapidly increased from £16,000 in 1875 to £75,150 in 1879. The chief productions are yams, sugarcane, maize, copra (cocoanut), and bananas. The population in 1880 was 110,000 natives, 1,902 Europeans, and 3,200 Polynesians, imported to work on the plantations.

In no part of the world have modern missions had a more glorious triumph than in Fiji. The first missionaries were Messrs. Cross and Cargill, who went in 1835 to Fiji from the Friendly Islands, where Mr. Cross had been laboring for eight, and Mr. Cargill for two years. The religion of the islands was a degrading superstition, and witchcraft was widely practised. The tribes were in a constant state of war with each other. The people wore no covering, except a kilt, four inches wide, around the waist. Their ornaments were limited to whale-teeth: but they took great pride in the dressing of their hair, which was so trained as to form a large bushy covering for the head; and so careful were they to protect it, that, in the place of pillows, they substituted a narrow yoke, one or two inches wide at the top, on which they rested their necks. Polygamy was practised, and the condition of woman was a very inferior one. The wife or wives were strangled at the death of the husband. Life was cheap, the kings sacrificing men at the launching of a new canoe, or the inception of a campaign, or the erection of a house. Cannibalism was also practised on a large scale, although there were some whom the missionaries found averse to eating human flesh. The victims of war, and shipwrecked mariners, were invariably served up on the table. The treatment of women has undergone a complete revolution; and the practice of cannibalism has been entirely given up (except among a few mountain tribes), under the influence of the missionaries.

The English Wesleyans were left in undisputed control of the islands until recently by the other Protestant churches. Messrs. Cross and Cargill were re-enforced by Messrs. Lythe and Hunt in 1839, and by Mr. Williams and others in 1810. The work was carried on amidst great discouragements and perils during the first years, but was richly rewarded with extensive revivals, and the gradual conversion of nearly the whole population. Thokombau, the chief king, after resisting the missionaries for a number of years, was baptized January, 1857, after having given up all his wives but one. The language was reduced to writing; and the Bible, Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, a Fijian-English dictionary (by Rev. David Hazlewood), and other books, have been printed in the native language. There are at present fourteen hundred schools and nine hundred churches. Not only are the church services crowded by devout congregations, but the people seem to be thoroughly in earnest. They have given up polygamy; and most of those who had many wives have put away all but one, and been legally married by the missionaries. The Sabbath is strictly observed, and family-worship scrupulously held. Miss Cumming (governess in Sir Arthur Gordon's family) says, "The first sound that greets your ears in the morning, and the last at night, is the sound of family worship in the village" (p. 86). The same writer, referring to the change that has taken place in the habits of the population, says, "I often wish that some of the cavillers who are forever sneering at Christian missions could see something of their results in these isles" (p. 66). FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY. One of the principal differences between the Eastern and the Western Church is the addition by the latter of the word Filioque to its creed. The Apostles' Creed has simply, "And in the Holy Ghost," to which the Nicene Creed added, "Who proceedeth from the Father." But there the Greek Church stopped; while the Latin Church, without the sanction of an œcumenical council, or even consultation with the Greek Church, still further added, "and the Son" (Filioque). The Greek Church protested as soon as it discovered the addition; and every attempt which afterwards was made to re-establish union between the two churches, has been wrecked on this word.

The addition is met with for the first time in the acts of the third council of Toledo (589), in opposition to Arianism. From Spain it spread into France, where it seems to have been generally adopted at the time of Charlemagne. The councils of Constantinople (681) and of Nicaea (787) did not notice it. But in 809 two monks from the court of Charlemagne made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and were accused of heresy by the hermits of Mount Olivet for their use of Filioque. Charlemagne felt provoked; and the council which he convoked at Aix-la-Chapelle (809) sanctioned the use of the addition.

But Pope Leo III., whose confirmation of the decision of the council was asked for by Charlemagne, refused to formally incorporate the Filioque with the Creed, though he admitted the justness and soundness of its doctrinal bearing; and this attitude of cautious reserve the Pope endeavored to maintain so far as he could under the pressure of the steadily-growing impatience of the East and the all but universal practice of the West. Towards the close of the century, however, this attitude became impossible. Photius, in his encyclical letter, emphasizes the Filioque as one of the gravest errors of the Pope; and the Council of Constantinople anathematized it. Political circumstances compelled the Pope to take up the challenge. Nevertheless, the first time a pope actually used the addition to the Creed was in 1014, by Benedict VIII., at the crowning of Henry II. But from that moment the Pope himself appears as the defender of the practice of the Western Church, and at the Council of Ferrara-Florence he seemed to have entirely forgotten, that, at least historically, there was a flaw in his argument.

The doctrine in whose statement the word Filioque was destined to play so prominent a part is called the "Procession of the Holy Ghost." The term comes from John xv. 26, in which Christ speaks of the Spirit of truth who "proceedeth from the Father" (παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς ἐκπορεύεται). Inasmuch as nothing is said in this passage or in any other of the "double procession," i.e., from both the Father and the Son, the Greek Church holds to the single procession, and defends its position, not only by an appeal to the text of Scripture and to the original form of the Nicene Creed, but also to the "monarchy" (μοναρχία) of the Father as the sole fountain, root, and cause of the deity. It distinguishes sharply between the eternal metaphysical procession of the Spirit from the Father alone, and the temporal mission of the Spirit by the Father and the Son (John xiv. 26, xvi. 7). The former belongs to the trinity of essence, the latter to the trinity of revelation, and begins with the Day of Pentecost. The Latin Church defends the double procession on the grounds of the double mission of the Spirit and the essential unity of the Son with the Father; so that, if the Spirit proceed from the essence of the Father, he must also proceed from the essence of the Son, because they have the same essence. The Greek patriarchs declined to attend the Vatican Council of 1870, on the ground of the heresy of the Latin Church upon this point.

A compromise was suggested from the writings of John of Damascus, to say that the Spirit proceeds from the Father, through the Son. This was accepted by the conference held in Bonn (August, 1875) between the Old Catholics, Orientals, and Anglo-Catholics, in which the Filioque was surrendered as an unauthorized addition to the Creed.

FILLAN (the Scotch form of the Irish Faelan) is the name of two Iro-Scotch saints. The one whose festival falls on June 20 had his chief churches at Ballyheyland, Queen's County, Ireland, and at the eastern end of Loch Earn, Perthshire, Scotland. The other, whose festival falls on Jan. 9, had his chief churches at Cluain Maoscna, Westmeath County, Ireland, and at Strathfillan, Perthshire, Scotland. The legend of the latter is found in Act. Sancti, Jan. 9, Tom. I. p. 591, and in FORBES, Kal. Scot. Saints, 312.

FINLAND, The Christianization of, is the common story of the Roman-Catholic missions in the middle ages, — the conquest of the country, the forced baptism of the people, the building of fortresses, and the establishment of bishoprics. The Finns, a branch of the Uralo-Altaic family, and allied to the Magyars, lived in scattered settlements throughout Northern Europe at the time when the migration of the nations began. Pushed farther towards the North by the Germanic peoples and the Russians, they seemed in many places to melt away; and Finland, the large peninsula between the Bothnian Gulf and Gulf of Finland, is the only part of Europe in which a Finnish tribe succeeded in maintaining itself as a nation up to our time. The country comprises an area of 144,221 square miles, with 1,912,647 inhabitants, according to the census of 1875.

On account of their sombre and savage religious rites, the ancient Finns had the reputation, among their neighbors, of being a nation of sorcerers and magicians; and their passion for piracy and plunder was, of course, not suited to mend the reputation. Sweden was especially exposed to their attacks; and in the middle of the twelfth century the Swedish king, Eric the Saint, determined to put a stop to their disturbances. As the war was waged against heathens, the campaign became a crusade; and Archbishop Henry of Upsala, an Englishman by birth, accompanied the king. After landing in Finland (1157), Eric completely defeated the Finnish army, baptized those of the soldiers he did not slay, built the fortress of Abo, and established a bishopric at Rendameeki. Christianity, however, did not make great progress in the country. Some Finns came and paid their tithes, in ermine, at Rendameeki; but the great majority of them remained heathen, and Henry was killed. Even the political ascendancy of Sweden waned away; and small support for it was derived from the elevation of the slain Henry to a saint, and the patron of the country. But in 1248 Birger Jarl made a new campaign, and built the fortress Tavaste; and in 1293, under the reign of the young King Birger, the Swedish chancellor, Torkil Knutson, completed the conquest of the whole country, built the fortress of Wiborg, moved the episcopal see from Rendameeki to Abo, and made Finland a Christian province. It was found, however, when in the sixteenth century the Reformation was introduced in the country from Sweden, that most of the inhabitants, even such as regularly paid their ermine tithe, lived in utter ignorance of Christianity, and in open enjoyment of their heathen license. In Finland the Lutheran minister was a missionary rather than a reformer.

In 1809 the country came under Russia, but a considerable measure of national independence was granted to it. The Czar of Russia bears the title of Grand Duke of Finland; yet the government of all the interior, especially the ecclesiastical affairs of the country, is completely separated from that of Russia. Of the population, ninety-eight per cent belong to the Lutheran Church, and only two per cent to the Græco-Russian Church or other denominations; but there is complete freedom for other religious bodies. The Lutheran Church is represented by the Archbishop of Abo, the Bishops of Borgå and Kuopio, and an ecclesiastical assembly, consisting of thirty-four clerical and fifty lay members, and convened every ten years. The country has four hundred and forty-eight primary schools, besides a number of itinerant teachers in the more sparingly settled regions, three seminaries, and a university with a flourishing theological faculty. The official language is Finnish. Swedish is spoken only in a few parishes. See RUED: Finland und seine Bewohner, Leipzig, 1808; and Bishop REUTER-

FINLEY, James Bradley, a distinguished pioneer of Methodism in Ohio; b. in North Carolina, July 1, 1781; d. at Cincinnati, Sept. 6, 1856. Joining the Ohio Conference in 1809, he was made presiding elder 1816. In 1821 he was sent to the Wyandotte Indians, where his labors were attended with much success. From 1845 to 1849 he was chaplain of the Ohio Penitentiary. He was a man of rugged eloquence and large influence. His chief works are Wyandotte Mission, Sketches of Western Methodism (Cincinnati, 1857), Life among the Indians (Cincinnati, 1857), Memorials of Prison Life (Cincinnati, 1860).

FINLEY, Robert, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; b. in Princeton, 1772; d. at Athens, Ga., 1817. He graduated from Princeton College in his sixteenth year. After studying theology under Dr. Witherspoon, he became pastor at Basking Ridge, N.J., 1795. In 1803 a powerful revival was felt in his church, a hundred and twenty persons being admitted at one communion. He took a very prominent part in the organization of the Colonization Society (1816). In 1817 he accepted the presidency of the University of Georgia (Franklin College), located at Athens, where he died a few months after. Several of his sermons were published during his lifetime.

FINLEY, Samuel, D.D., a Presbyterian divine, and president of Princeton College; b. in Ireland, 1715; d. July 17, 1766. He came to America in 1734, and studied, so it is supposed, under Mr. Tennent in Log College. Licensed in 1740 by the presbytery of New Brunswick, he co-operated vigorously with the friends of revival preaching. In 1743 he was called to Milford, Conn., but was before many months expelled from the colony for preaching, in violation of the statute, in another pulpit than his own. In 1744 he was called to Nottingham, Md., where he established an academy which educated some prominent men. In 1761 he was chosen the successor of President Davies at Princeton College. Died and was buried in Philadelphia. Several of Dr. Finley's sermons were published during his lifetime, the principal of which were one on Matt. xii. 28, Christ triumphing, and Satan raging (1741), and The Curse of Meroz (1757).

FINNAN, a native of Ireland, and monk at Iona; was made Bishop of Lindisfarne 652, with charge of the whole of Northumbria, and d. there Aug. 31. 661. He was a very active and energetic man, and successful as a missionary also beyond the boundaries of Northumbria. He consecrated Cædmon, and baptized Peada, king of Mercia, and Siegbert, king of the East Saxons. But he belonged to the Culdee Church, and was strongly opposed to Rome, especially to the Roman manner of observing Easter. See BEDE: Hist. Eccl., III. 21-25.

FINNEY, Charles C., a powerful revivalist preacher, and president of Oberlin College; was b. at Warren, Litchfield County, Conn., Aug. 29, 1792; d. at Oberlin, O., Aug. 16, 1875. When he was only two years old, his parents removed to Western New York. This placed him beyond the reach of any thing more than a common-school education. At seventeen he began to teach, and in 1818 to study law at Adams, in Western New York. Neither of his parents was a church-member, nor did he up to his twentieth year enjoy any but the most meagre opportunities of hearing the gospel. His conversion in 1821 was remarkable for its suddenness, thoroughness, and the definitely marked stages of his experience. Feeling an immediate call to preach, he forsook the law, held prayer-meetings, was received under care of presbytery (1822), and licensed to preach 1824. He at once turned his attention to revival labors, which were continued, with few interruptions, until 1860, when he was forced to give up the work of an itinerant evangelist on account of age. These labors, beginning in Western and Central New York, were extended to Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and other cities of the East, and reached to England, which Mr. Finney visited in 1849 and 1858, preaching with much power. In 1832 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Second Free Church of New-York City, and, two years later, another to the recently organized Congregational Church known as the Broadway Tabernacle. In 1835 he went to Oberlin as professor, where he continued to labor till the time of his death as instructor of theology, pastor, and college president (1852). During his residence at Oberlin he still continued, as before, to hold revival meetings in Eastern cities until 1860.

Mr. Finney's career naturally falls under the two heads of revivalist preacher and theological teacher. His power as a preacher was very great; and his labors produced, in many places, wonderful effects. Wherever he went, extensive revivals prevailed. His manner was vigorous, direct, and personal. He used simple language and illustrations. His presentation was clear, and strictly logical. He directed his appeals to the conscience, rather than the affections, and made it tremble and quake by the most searching analysis of the motives of the heart. On one occasion he says, "Everybody was out at meeting, and the Lord let me loose upon them in a wonderful manner" (Autobiog., p. 100). He chose for themes those passages which delineate the sinner's condition as one of conscious alienation from God, and sinning against him. He dwelt upon the enmity of the carnal mind, the want of holiness, and the certain destruction of the impenitent. He called upon his hearers to come to an immediate decision, and submit to God. "Instead of telling sinners," he says, "to use the means of grace, and pray for a new heart, I called on them to make themselves a new heart and spirit, and pressed the duty of immediate surrender to God" (Autobiog., p. 189). These meetings were often accompanied by violent bodily manifestations; and Mr. Finney practised the methods of calling upon the audiences to go forward to the anxious-bench, or to rise in attestation of new resolutions. These attendant circumstances, and Mr. Finney's methods of preaching, early evoked criticism and strong opposition. Mr. Nettleton and Dr. Beecher were among the opponents of the "new measures:" and a convention was held in July, 1827, at New Lebanon, of prominent ministers (such as Dr. Hawes of Hartford, Edwards of Andover, Beecher of Boston, Beman of Troy, etc.), to take the whole matter into consideration. However, with better information, the opposition decreased. Mr. Finney's preaching reached all classes; lawyers and educated men being particularly convinced by it, as notably at Rochester.

As a teacher at Oberlin, Mr. Finney's influence was also great. He was an original thinker, and very positive in his convictions. His lectures on theology define his position as a theologian. It is here not necessary to do more than merely state some of the main and distinguishing views. He held to the plenary ability of the sinner to repent, regarded happiness as the chief aim, and explained regeneration (which he did not clearly distinguish from conversion) to consist of an act of the will, rather than an act of the Holy Spirit. He exerted a shaping influence over the minds of his students; and his theology, in a modified form, had a wide acceptance in his own denomination in the West.

LIT.—Mr. Finney's works are: Lectures on Revivals, Boston, 1835, passed through many editions (new and enlarged edition, Oberlin, 1868); Lectures to Professing Christians, Oberlin, 1836; Sermons on Important Subjects, New York, 1839; Lectures on Theology, Oberlin, 1846, new ed., 1878, republished in London. FINTAN, a native of Leinster, Ireland; was carried off by a swarm of marauding Northmen, but escaped, and spent two years on the coast of Caithness with a bishop; went thence to Rome, and from Rome to Switzerland, where he entered the monastery of Rheingaw, or Rheinau, in the canton of Zurich, as a monk. In 800 he retired from the monastery, and lived to his death (in 827) as a hermit in the neighborhood, practising the most austere asceticism. FIRKOWITSCH, Abraham, a Jewish archaeologist; b. at Lutzk, in the Crimea, 1786; d. 1871; deserves mention for his lifelong labors in collecting Hebrew manuscripts, biblical and other, fifteen thousand of which he deposited in the Imperial Library at St. Petersburg. He was a Carite, and it was his interest in the authors of his sect which determined him to devote his life to finding as much as he could about them. Many of his manuscripts have probably considerable critical value in determining the Hebrew text of the Old Testament.

FIRMILIAN, Bishop of Casarea in Cappadocia; d. at Tarsus in 269; was a friend of Origen, and one of the leaders of the Church of Asia Minor. According to Eusebius, he took a prominent part in the close of the Montanist controversy, in the opening of the Trinitarian controversies, and in the discussion of the validity of baptism by a heretic. The only literary monument of him which has come down to us relates to the last-mentioned point, — an elaborate letter to Cyprian, of which a Latin translation is found among Cyprian's letters (No. 75). As Firmilian in this letter shows himself very decidedly opposed to the Bishop of Rome, Roman church-historians have tried first to suppress the letter, afterwards to make its genuineness suspected; but in both they have failed.

KLAIBER.

FIRST-BORN (בְּכֹרִית, πρωτότοκος). The first-born males of human beings and animals were, according to the Mosaic law, to be sacred unto the Lord. The first-born of human beings was not to be killed, but was to be dedicated to the service of the sanctuary. This original institution was afterwards altered, since, in place of all the first-born, the whole tribe of Levi was appointed to assist Aaron and his sons in public worship (Num. iii. 12); whilst the male first-born among the other tribes were to be presented in the temple when one month old, and were to be redeemed according to the estimation of the priests (Exod. xiii. 13; Num. xviii. 16 sq.). The orthodox Jews still observe this law of redemption, with this difference, that the rabbi takes the place of the priest, who, having received the price of redemption, swings it round the head of the infant, in token of his vicarious authority, saying, "This is for the first-born, this is in lieu of it, this redeems it; and let this son be spared for life, for the law of God, and for the fear of Heaven. May it please thee, that, as he was spared for redemption, so he may be spared for the law, for matrimony, and for good works. Amen." The rabbi lays his hand upon the child's head, and blesses it, as follows: "The Lord make thee as Ephraim and Manasseh." When the first-born son is thirteen years of age, he fasts the day before the Feast of Passover. The redemption of the first-born of animals seems to have wholly disappeared after the destruction of the temple. The first-born of unclean animals, since it could not be offered, was either to be redeemed according to the valuation of the priest, with the addition of one-fifth of the value, and then remain with the owner, or be sold, and the price given to the priest (Lev. xxvii. 11–13, 27). The first-born of an ass had to be redeemed with a lamb, or, if not redeemed, put to death (Exod. xiii. 13; Num. xviii. 15). The first-born of every clean animal, from eight days to twelve months, provided it had no blemish, had to be taken to Jerusalem, and delivered to the priest, who offered it as a sacrifice to Jehovah, sprinkled its blood upon the altar, burned the fat, and ate the flesh (Num. xviii. 15–17); but, if it had any blemish, it was not to be sacrificed, but eaten up at home, whilst the blood was to be poured upon the ground (Deut. xv. 19–23). As among most nations, the male first-born among the Israelites enjoyed special prerogatives over the younger brethren, as is indicated in many passages of the Old Testament (comp. Gen. xlix. 3; 2 Chron. xxi. 3).

W. PRESSEL (B. PICK).

FIRST-FRUITS. From the very first pages of the Sacred Writings (Gen. iv. 3 sq.) we learn that a feeling of gratitude toward the Giver of all good was shown by the first men in offering the first-fruits, or the first and best which they had. What seems to have been at first a natural feeling was afterwards regulated among the Hebrews by the Mosaic law, which ordained the following first-fruit offerings. (a) On the morrow after the Passover sabbath (i.e., on the 16th of Nisan) a sheaf of new corn was to be brought to the priest, and waved before the altar. This offering was accompanied by a lamb as sacrifice, two tenth-deals of flour, and a drink offering of a fourth part of a hin of wine (Exod. xxix. 39 sq.; Lev. xxiii. 9 sq.). (b) Seven weeks from this time (i.e., at the Feast of Pentecost), an oblation was to be made of two loaves made of two tenth-deals of flour. They were accompanied by a burnt offering of seven lambs, one young bullock, and two rams, a meat and drink offering, a sin offering of one kid of the goats, and two lambs for a peace offering, which were waved with the loaves, but afterwards belonged to the priests (Lev. xxiii. 17 sq.). (c) The Feast of Ingathering (i.e., the Feast of Tabernacles), in the seventh month, was itself an acknowledgment of the fruits of the harvest (Exod. xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxiii. 39).

Besides these stated occasions, every Israelite was to consecrate to the Lord a part of the first-fruit of the land; as of oil, honey, dough, wool, — in fact, of every thing. The fruits of every newly-planted tree were not to be eaten or sold, or used in any way for the first three years, but considered "uncircumcised," or unclean. In the fourth year, however, the first-fruits were to be consecrated to the Lord, and in the fifth year became available to the owner (Lev. xix. 23 sq.). As the quantity of these offerings was not fixed by the law, but was left to the good will of the individual (Deut. xvi. 10), tradition has laid down rules and regulations, with such minuteness as only rabbinism is capable of; and the Talmudic treatises Biccurim and Therumoth (cf. art. Talmud) are especially full on this matter. For a description of a Biccurim procession, see DELITZSCH: Jewish Artisan Life at the Time of Jesus, Eng. trans., Lond., 1877, p. 94 sqq. (Ger. orig., p. 66 sqq.). RÜETSCH (B. PICK).

FISCH, George, D.D., b. at Nyon, Canton de Vaud, Switzerland, July 6, 1814; d. at Vallorbes, Switzerland, Sunday, July 3, 1881. He studied theology at Lausanne, and was for five years pastor of a small German church at Vevey; but in 1846 he was called to Lyons, France, to be assistant preacher to Adolphe Monod, of the Free Church, whom he subsequently succeeded. In 1855 he was called to Paris as the colleague of Pressensé. He was warmly attached to the cause of the Free churches, and took part in the Constitutional Synod of 1849, which formed the union of the Evangelical churches of France. From 1863 till his death he was president of the Synodal Commission, and thus directed the work of the Free churches. He was one of the founders of the Evangelical Alliance, and "the very soul of the branch of this society in France," an active member of different home and foreign missionary societies, particularly interested in South-African missions and in Mr. McAll's mission in Paris. But in every way he labored to advance the gospel. He was remarkably gifted, and used his powers to the utmost. Twice he visited the United States (in 1861 and in 1873), coming the last time as a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance Conference held in New York, Oct. 2-12. He was also a delegate to the First Council of the Presbyterian Alliance in Edinburgh, July 3-10, 1877.

FISH, Henry Clay, b. at Halifax, Vt., Jan. 27, 1820; d. in Newark, N.J., Oct. 2, 1877. He was graduated from Union Seminary, New York, in 1845; entered the Baptist ministry, and after a five-years' pastorate at Somerville, N.J., came to the First Baptist Church of Newark, 1850, and was its pastor when he died. He was very successful, attracting large audiences, and making a profound impression. His preaching was essentially revivalistic. He was an ardent and efficient worker in extending the Baptist Church. Notwithstanding his devoted pastoral labors, he found time to prepare several meritorious works: Primitive Piety Revived, Boston, 1855 (20,000 copies sold in two years); History and Repository of Pulpit Eloquence, N.Y., 1856, 2 vols., new ed. in 1 vol., 1877; Pulpit Eloquence of the Nineteenth Century, N.Y., 1857, new ed., 1875; Select Discourses from the German and French, N.Y., 1858; Heaven in Song, N.Y., 1874 (a poetical compilation); Handbook of Revivals, Boston, 1874; Bible Lands, Hartford, 1876 (based upon his visit in 1871).

FISHER'S RING. See ANXULUS PISCATORIUS.

FISHER, John, Bishop of Rochester; was b. at Beverley, Yorkshire, in 1459, and beheaded at Tower Hill, June 22, 1535. He was educated at Cambridge, where he subsequently became master of Michael House. Taking orders, he was appointed chaplain and confessor to Margaret, the mother of Henry VII.; in 1501 was elected Chancellor of Cambridge, and 1504 consecrated Bishop of Rochester. He took a deep interest in the revival of learning, and began himself the study of Greek in his sixtieth year. Among his friends were Reuchlin and Erasmus. He was by no means blind to the clerical abuses of the time, but had no sympathy with the Reformation ideas which began to prevail in the latter years of his life. Following the king's example, he published an able rejoinder to Luther's tract, De Babyl. Captivitate. He was one of the chief advisers of Henry VIII. until the divorce with Catharine began to be agitated. In 1531 he signed the formula constituting the sovereign the supreme head of the Church, with the limiting statement, "so far as the law of Christ permits," but resisted all further attempts to divorce the Church in England from the Pope. In the debate upon the suppression of the monasteries he showed himself the spirited champion of the clergy. He opposed the divorce of the king strenuously, and wrote a pamphlet against it. In 1533 Parliament found him guilty of treason for concealing prophetic utterances of the Maid of Kent, who, it was assumed, with accomplices, had entertained a plot against the king's life. Fisher was released from prison on payment of a fine of three hundred pounds. In 1534 he refused assent to the Supremacy Act, and with Sir Thomas More was sent to the Tower. The Pope sent him a cardinal's hat to protect him; but this served only to exasperate the king, by whose orders he was executed.

FISK, Pliny, a devoted American missionary in Syria; b. in Shelburne, Mass., June 24, 1792; d. at Beyrout, Oct. 23, 1825. He graduated at Middlebury College (1814) and Andover Seminary. On Sept. 23, 1818, the prudential committee of the American Board of Missions determined to establish a mission in Palestine, and the same day appointed Levi Parsons and Fisk missionaries. The latter was ordained at Salem, Nov. 5, 1818; and after spending a year in Georgia and South Carolina, collecting money for the Board, he embarked with Parsons for the East. The first years after their arrival were spent at Smyrna and the Island of Scio, seventy miles off. In January, 1822, he went to Alexandria, where Parsons soon after died. He finally settled down between Jerusalem and Beyrout, distributing tracts and Bibles, and preaching. He died at the age of thirty-three, in Beyrout, a few days after separating from Dr. King, but tenderly cared for by Dr. Goodell. Fisk was a man of much missionary enthusiasm; and, as one of the founders of the thriving missionary station at Beyrout, his work lives on. See ALVAN BOND: Memoir of P. Fisk, Boston, 1828; ANDERSON: Oriental Missions, Boston, 1872, i. 1-33.

FISK, Wilbur, D.D., first president of Wesleyan University; b. in Brattleborough, Vt., Aug. 31, 1792; d. at Middletown, Conn., Feb. 22, 1839. After graduating at Brown University, he gave himself up to the study of law, but soon changed his mind, and became an itinerant preacher in the Methodist Church. In 1826 he was made principal of the Wilbraham Academy, and in 1830 of the new university at Middletown, Conn. While travelling in Europe in 1835 he was elected bishop, but declined the office. Dr. Fisk was a saintly man and an enthusiastic educator. Among his works are The Calvinistic Controversy (N.Y., 1837), Travels in Europe (N.Y., 1838), Sermons and Lectures on Universalism. See HOLDICH, Life of W. Fisk, N.Y., 1842.

FIVE-MILE ACT (called also OXFORD ACT, the session of Parliament which passed it having met at Oxford), entitled "An Act to restrain Nonconformists from inhabiting Corporations," was promoted by Clarendon, Archbishop Sheldon, and others, and passed by Parliament in 1665. It enjoined upon all nonconformists an oath not to take up arms against the king, or attempt any "alteration of government either in Church or State." It forbade their approach within five miles of any corporation represented in Parliament, or any place where they had preachers, on penalty of a fine of forty pounds for each offence. A penalty of forty pounds was also enacted against those who, refusing to take the oath, taught school or kept boarders. Any offence against the act might be punished with six months' imprisonment. This legislation caused intense suffering among the nonconformists, only very few of whom took the oath. See NEAL: Hist. of Puri- tans, ii. p. 255 sqq. (Harper's ed.); GREEN: Hist. of Engl. People, iii. 375 sq. (Harper's ed.).

FIVE POINTS OF CALVINISM, a theological term indicating the five characteristic tenets of Calvinism as opposed to Arminianism. They were defended by the synod of Dort (1618, 1619) in answer to the Five Articles of the Arminians or Remonstrants, put forth in 1610. They are particular predestination, limited atonement, natural inability, irresistible grace, and the perseverance of saints. The best special discussions of the Five Points are by WHITBY (Lond., 1710) on the Arminian side, and GILL (Cause of God and Truth, 4 vols., London, 1735-38) and JONATHAN DICKINSON (Philadelphia, 1741) on the Calvinistic. See ARMINIANISM and CALVINISM.

FLACIUS (VLACICH), Matthias, b. March 3, 1520, at Albona in Istria (hence the surname Illyricus); d. at Francofort, March 11, 1575; was very early sent to Venice to study ancient languages, and was about to enter a monastery and become a monk, when a relative of his, Baldus Lupetinus, provincial of the Minorites, advised him to go to Germany, and study theology there. He visited first Basel (1539), then Augsburg, and came in 1541 to Wittenberg, where he was kindly received by Luther and Melancthon; and in 1544 was appointed professor in Hebrew. He also lectured on the Epistles of Paul and on Aristotle; but his activity was suddenly interrupted by the outbreak of the Smalcaldian war. He fled to Brunswick, where he lived by teaching school; but, though he was recalled by the elector Maurice, the establishment of the Leipzig Interim drove him away again, and he settled at Magdeburg (1549), where printing and publication were still free. The literary activity he there developed against the Interim, in the adiaphoristic controversy and in the Osiander, Schwenkfeld, and Major controversies, was very comprehensive, and of great influence; but it placed him in direct opposition to Melancthon. And when, in 1557, he was appointed professor at Jena, together with Musæus and Wigand, Jena became the headquarters of the strict Lutheran party, as Wittenberg was that of the Philippists. In the beginning he exercised great influence on the development of affairs in Saxony, but, having lost the confidence of the duke, he was discharged in 1561, and went to Regensburg. There he endeavored to found an academy, but his plans were frustrated by his enemies. In 1566 the magistrates of the city even withdrew their protection, and he was glad to accept an invitation to Antwerp. The progress, however, of the Spanish army, soon compelled him to leave that city; and he betook himself to Francofort. Meanwhile a somewhat hasty utterance of his raised the storm of persecution into a very whirlwind. In an essay accompanying his Clavis, he declared (1567) hereditary sin to be the very substance of human nature since the fall; and this untenable proposition was immediately made the basis for an accusation of Manichæism. Even his old friends from Jena, ultra-Lutherans like himself, attacked him in the harshest manner; and every thing he did in order to come to an understanding with them was in vain. Expelled from Francofort, he went to Strassburg; expelled from Strassburg, too, he returned to Francofort, but was hardly allowed to die there.

That there was something narrow and exclusive in his stand-point, something obstinate and bitter in his polemics, cannot be denied. The sad fate which overtook him may not have been altogether undeserved. But the great ability of the man, and the fundamental integrity of his character, are proven by his brilliant scientific performances, — the Catalogus testivm veritatis, answering the Romanist's objection to the Reformation as a mere innovation; the Magdeburg Centuries, of which he was the originator and leading spirit (see CENTURIES, MAGDEBURG); and the Clavis scripturæ sacræ, the basis of biblical hermeneutics. The antipathy which for centuries has clung to his name is unjust. W. Preger has recently vindicated his memory by his excellent work, Matthiæ Flaccius Illyricus und seine Zeit, Erlangen, 1859–61. [See also J. W. SCHULTE, Beiträge zur Entstehungsgeschichte d. Magdeburger Centurien, Niesse, 1877.] G. PLITT.

FLAGELLANTS (Flagellantes), Brothers of the Cross (crucifrates), Crossbearers (cruciferi), Brothers in White (so called because of their dress), and Independents (acephali, because they had broken with the hierarchy), are the names of morbid fanatics from the thirteenth to the fifteenth century. The prelude to the Flagellant pilgrimages was the fraternity brought into life by the preaching of Anthony of Padua [about 1210]. The men composing it went about in large bodies, singing, and scourging themselves. In 1260–61 many of the inhabitants of the Guelph city of Perugia began suddenly, as if vehemently moved by a mighty spirit of repentance, to flagellate themselves with leather thongs. High and low, old and young, went together in procession two and two, with bodies bared above the waist, through the streets. Their numbers increased like an avalanche. Some marched through Lombardy to Provence; others went to Rome. The Pope did not molest them, as they did not resist the ecclesiastical authorities; and a perceptible improvement in morals, the reconciliation of enemies, and generous gifts of alms, attested the sincerity of their penance.

In Italy the enthusiasm soon cooled; but beyond the Alps it broke out afresh, and in 1261 large bodies of Flagellants marched through Bavaria, Saxony, the Upper Rhine country, Austria, Bohemia, and Poland. They marched two or three abreast, with body bared above the waist, and face veiled. They were preceded by flags or crosses, and flagellated themselves twice a day for thirty-three days, in memory of the thirty-three years of our Lord's life. They accompanied the strokes of the scourge with the music of hymns (among which was the Stabat Mater of Jacopone da Todi). At first priests were found in the ranks. But the Flagellants soon came to be accused of opposing the hierarchy; and the clergy not only separated themselves from their company, but preached against them, and persecuted them, so that by the end of the year hardly a vestige was left in Germany of their existence.

The movement was at its height in the fourteenth century. They made their first appearance again in Italy. A mighty impetus was given by the terrible plague which in 1317–49 ran through Europe, carrying off 60,000 people in Florence, 100,000 in Venice, 1,200,000 in Germany, not to mention other cities and lands. While many gave full sway to their passions, and some sat down in despair, others gave themselves up to self-inflicted flagellations, in the hope of appeasing the divine anger, and with the purpose of preparing for the end of the world, which they regarded as being near at hand. On the 17th of April, 1349, the first Flagellant fraternity appeared in Magdeburg. This was quickly followed by others in Würzburg, Speier, and Strassburg. They were regarded with awe on all sides; and the movement spread throughout all Germany, and extended to Denmark and England. Women were also found in the ranks. There was a regular organization, and conditions of membership. The candidate had to have the permission of his wife, promise obedience, have at least four shillings and fourpence to defray expenses, as begging was prohibited, etc. When they came to towns, the bands marched in regular military order, and singing hymns. At the time of flagellation they selected a square, or churchyard, or field. Taking off their shoes and stockings, and forming a circle, they girded themselves with aprons, and laid down flat on the ground. The particular position or gesture of each signified his chief sin. ["They fell on their back, side, or belly, according to the nature of their sin" (Chron. Thuring.)]. The leader, then stepping over each one, touched them with the whip, and bade them rise. As each was touched, they followed after the leader, and imitated him. Once all on their feet, the flagellation began. The brethren went two by two around the whole circle, striking their backs till the blood trickled down from the wounds. The whip consisted of three thongs, each with four iron teeth. During the flagellation a hymn was sung. After all had gone around the circle, the whole body again fell on the ground, beating upon their breasts. On arising they flagellated themselves a second time. While the brethren were putting on their clothes, a collection was taken up among the audience. The scene was concluded by the reading of a letter from Christ which an angel had brought to earth, and which commended the pilgrimages of the Flagellants. The fraternities never tarried longer than a single day in a town. They gained great popularity, and it was considered an honor to entertain them.

The feeling, however, underwent a complete change. The Flagellants began to be a burden to the people. Nine thousand passed through Strassburg alone in three months. The clergy inveighed against their assumption. The arrival of a band at Avignon was finally the occasion for Clement VI. to issue a bull (Oct. 20, 1349) forbidding their pilgrimages, and commanding the authorities in Church and State to suppress them. This was efficacious; and only now and then did the enthusiasm break out again. The trial of a Flagellant in Anhalt, 1451, is the last vestige of the movement in Germany.

The fraternities which appeared at the end of the fourteenth century, in Italy, France, and Spain, were of a different character, but likewise pleaded a divine command. Christ and Mary appeared to a peasant, and revealed that the destruction of the world could only be averted on condition of a Flagellant pilgrimage. In 1398 large bands appeared in Genoa, clad in long white garments which covered the head, and had only two holes for the eyes. Priests and bishops joined them. But in 1399 Boniface IX. had one of their number executed, and the fanaticism disappeared. The Council of Constance took the matter under discussion [and Gerson wrote a tract against them, Contra Sectum Flagellantium]. Flagellating fraternities existed in France in the sixteenth century, were used by Henry III., and suppressed by Henry IV. [So late as 1820 a procession of Flagellants passed through the streets of Lisbon.]

HERZOG.

FLAVEL, John, an eminent English Nonconformist divine, the son of a minister; b. in Worcestershire about 1627; d. in Exeter, June 26, 1691. He was educated at Oxford, and became curate of Deptford. From there he went to Dartmouth in 1656. By the Act of Uniformity he was deprived of his living, with two thousand others, and retired to Hudscott Hall, in Devonshire, where he was liberally supported by the lord of the domain. He preached privately in the woods and remote places, until, at the expulsion of the Stuarts, he returned to Dartmouth, and labored as pastor of the Nonconformist Church. Flavel was a prolific writer on practical religion; and some of his works are eminently adapted to stimulate piety. His principal works are: Husbandry Spiritualized: The Fountain of Life Opened up (in forty-two sermons); The Soul of Man: Exposition of the Assembly's Shorter Catechism: Seaman's Companion (in six sermons), etc. Complete editions of his works, London, 1701, 2 vols., and London, 1826, in 6 vols. The American Tract Society publishes in cheap form his Fountain of Life, Method of Grace, On Keeping the Heart, etc.

FLAVIANUS, Patriarch of Antioch (381-401), sprung from a rich and distinguished family, but devoted himself from early youth to a life of severe asceticism. While still a layman, he and his friend Diodorus, afterwards Bishop of Tarsus, formed the centre of the opposition to the Arian tendencies of Bishop Leontius. By Meletius he was made a presbyter; and in 381 he accompanied the bishop to the Council of Constantinople. During the council, Meletius died; and Flavianus was chosen his successor, against the advice of Gregory Nazianzen, who understood that thereby the Meletian schism would be continued, and the difficulties of a reconciliation with Rome aggravated. Flavianus encountered, indeed, much opposition as a bishop, but showed great energy and decision, and was finally recognized by Rome. Chrysostom was a pupil of his. The Messalians he treated with great hardness. In 387, when the Antiochians, during a riot, had pulled down the statue of the emperor, Flavian made a voyage to Constantinople, and succeeded in appeasing the wrath of Theodosius. See SOCRATES: Hist. Eccl., V; SOZOMEN: Hist. Eccl., VIII; THEODORET: Hist. Eccl., II.

FLAVIANUS succeeded Proclus as Bishop of Constantinople, in 447, and played a prominent part in the Eutychian controversy. Deposed by the synod of Ephesus (449), he died, on his way into exile, at Epipa in Lydia. But on the accession of Marcian and Pulcheria a re-action set in. His remains were brought to Constantinople, and interred in the Church of the Apostles, with great solemnity; and his name was inscribed among those of the martyrs. See Act. Sanct. III., Feb., and the article EUTYCHES.

FLÉCHIER, Esprit, b. at Pernes, in the county of Avignon, June 10, 1632; d. at Montpellier, Feb. 16, 1710; was educated by the Jesuits, and studied theology in Paris, but devoted himself chiefly to poetry, and attracted some attention by a Latin poem on a grand tournament held by Louis XIV. Compelled to leave Paris on account of poverty, he lived for some time in the country, as a tutor and school-teacher, but returned again to Paris, and gained soon a high reputation as a preacher. Especially his funeral orations became very celebrated; and in 1673 he became a member of the Academy, together with Racine. In 1685 he was made Bishop of Lavaur, and in 1687 of Nîmes. As a bishop he was greatly beloved, even by the Protestants, who hid in his diocese on account of his mildness and great benevolence. A collected edition of his works appeared, in 10 vols., at Nîmes, 1782. His life was written by A. DELACROIX, Paris, 1865, 2 vols.

FLEETWOOD, John, the name, probably assumed, under which a Life of Christ, Lives of the Apostles, John the Baptist, and the Virgin Mary, usually found together, were issued. These have very frequently been printed. Before the modern elaborate Lives of Christ, which are far superior in point of scholarship, appeared, Fleetwood's was almost the only one found in Christian families. Two other volumes, The Christian Prayer-Book, Lond., 1772, and The Christian's Dictionary, 1773, are attributed to him.

FLEETWOOD, William, a learned English prelate; b. in London, Jan. 21, 1650; d. at Tottenham, Middlesex, Aug. 4, 1723. He was educated at Cambridge; became Canon of Windsor 1702, Bishop of St. Asaph 1706, and of Ely 1714. He was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. A complete collection of his Sermons, Tracts, etc., appeared at London, 1737; Complete Works, 3 vols., Oxford, 1851.

FLESH (σάρξ) Biblical Meaning of. The Bible has different representations of man's material nature. The term "flesh" is always used with reference to man's body; so that Chrysostom's comment on Gal. v. 16 is any thing but precise, — "The flesh (σάρξ) is not the body, nor the essence of the body, but the evil disposition, the earthly, lustful, and lawless reason." The same is true of Julius Muller's definition, — "The flesh is the tendency or inclination of human life turned away from God, the life and movement of man in the midst of the things of this visible world." The flesh is regarded as being enloured with mind, φρόνημα (Rom. viii. 6), desire, or lust, ἐπιθυμία (Gal. v. 16, 1 John ii. 16), will, θέλημα (Eph. ii. 3), etc. It cannot, therefore, stand for a disposition of the will. But as κόσμος ("world") designates, not a tendency of the world hostile to God, but the world with that tendency, so σάρξ ("flesh") designates, not a tendency or disposition of the flesh, but the flesh itself with that disposition.

Flesh is the substance of the body. It is sometimes used with the bones, as constituting the body (Luke xxiv. 39), or with blood (1 Cor. xv. 50). By synecdoche it is used for the body (Ps. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. x. 3). This use of the term is a Hebrew idiom, and is really foreign to the Greek; so that the LXX. often translate the Hebrew word בָּשָׂר ("flesh") by σῶμα ("body"). The expression "all flesh" is sometimes used for the race in its totality (Gen. vi. 17), but usually for the race as human (Gen. vi. 12; Luke iii. 6, etc.).

We are thus led to the peculiarity of the biblical use of the word. It designates man, because man appears through it, and manifests his nature by it. Thus, as flesh, he is weak and frail, "a wind that passeth away" (Ps. lxxviii. 39). Flesh is not spirit, nor vital power (Isa. xxxi. 3), but stands in living and moral contrast to spirit, the spirit of God (Deut. v. 26).

Flesh also indicates the peculiarity of man's visible or tangible nature. Thus it is opposed to πνεῦμα, or spirit (Col. ii. 1, 5); and a distinguishing characteristic of the earthly life is that it is a "life in the flesh" (Phil. i. 22). To boast of the flesh means to build on man's visible nature. The expression "The Word was made flesh" (John i. 14) gets its force from the contrast with (ver. 1) "The Word was God." The same contrast is brought out in Ps. lvi. 5, 2 Chron. xxxii. 8, 2 Cor. xiii. 4. The flesh then designates human nature as weak (Matt. xxvi. 41) and sinful in contrast to God.

The sinfulness of the flesh is specially brought out by Paul (Rom. viii. 3). In this sense he calls the body "a body of the flesh," σῶμα τῆς σαρκός (Col. ii. 11), and life a "walking in the flesh" (2 Cor. x. 3). But sinful flesh is not a disposition (Chrysostom and Müller), as above quoted, nor is it sufficient, with Neander, to define it as "human nature in its alienation from God," nor, with Holsten, to describe it as essentially finite and evil, so that in the Pauline theology sin was a necessity. The flesh is only the substance of the body, the seat of sin, but not originally evil: it is man's human or bodily nature, as Hofmann says (Schriftbeweis, I. 559), in the state in which it was left after the fall.

The flesh contains the germ of physical life (John i. 13, iii. 6); it is the essence: the body is the form. Sin now inheres in the flesh, and therefore all who are sons of Adam are sinners, because he was a sinner; and he who overcomes the flesh overcomes it by a conflict between the voûs ("mind") and the flesh, and thereby overcomes sin. Christ entered into the flesh with all the consequences of sin or the fall (Col. i. 22; Heb. ii. 14); but his own spiritual nature overcame, so to speak, at the very beginning, its disposition to sin.

FLETCHER, Giles, preacher and religious poet; b. in Cranbrook, Kent, about 1581; d. at Alderton, 1623. He was educated at Cambridge, where he remained till 1617, preaching with much acceptance from the pulpit of St. Mary's. He then became rector of Alderton, Suffolk. Fletcher is principally known by a poem published in 1610, — Christ's Victory and Triumph in Heaven, in Earth, over and after Death. It is one of the "most remarkable religious poems in the language," and furnished not a little material to the author of Paradise Regained. In 1623 he published The Reward of the Faithful, a theological treatise in prose. The latter has not been republished. See GROSART'S edition of the Victory and Triumph, Lond., 1869.

FLETCHER, John William, Vicar of Madeley, associate of John Wesley, and one of the most pious and useful men of his generation; was b. at Nyon, Switzerland, Sept. 12, 1729; d. at Madeley, Eng., Aug. 11, 1785. His original name was De la Flèche. He was a fine scholar in his youth, studying German, Hebrew, etc., and taking off all the prizes at the school in Geneva which he attended. He was designed by his parents for the ministry, but preferred the army. Against their wishes he went to Lisbon and enlisted, but was providentially prevented from going to Brazil, a servant spilling, the very morning of the intended embarkation, a kettle of boiling water on his limbs, which confined him for some time in bed. The vessel was lost at sea. Fletcher returned to Switzerland, but, not disheartened, went to Flanders at the invitation of his uncle, who promised to secure a commission in the army for him. But the sudden death of his relative, and the termination of the war, again providentially interfered with his plans. He now went to England, and, after acquiring a good knowledge of the language, became tutor in the family of T. Hill, Esq., of Shropshire, in 1752.

A new period soon began in Fletcher's history. His curiosity being aroused by a casual conversation, he went to hear the Methodists. Their language about faith was a new revelation to him, but it was not till two years had elapsed that he gained peace in believing. In 1757 he was ordained priest by the Bishop of Bangor. During the next few years he preached occasionally for John Wesley and others, and became known as a public supporter of the great religious revival. In 1760 he accepted the living of Madeley, after having refused the living of Dunham with much easier work and a much larger salary. He accepted this position against the advice of Mr. Wesley, with whom, however, he preserved a lifelong friendship, so that he is called by Tyerman (Life of Wesley, iii. 463) "Wesley's most valuable friend."

For twenty-five years, with the exception of the interval between 1776 and 1781, when the feeble state of his health forced him to take a respite from work, Fletcher labored at Madeley with singular devotion and zeal. The parish was very much run down, and the people knew little or nothing of vital religion, when he became vicar. He preached with great fervor the plain truths of the gospel, and labored incessantly during the week to awaken sinners. Now he rose at five o'clock Sabbath morning, and went through the neighborhood ringing a bell, that no one might be able to give as an excuse for non-attendance at church that he did not awake early enough. Now he appeared suddenly at vulgar entertainments, and with Knox-like fearlessness preached to the astounded revellers upon the folly of forbidden pleasures. "Those sinners," says John Wesley, "that tried to hide themselves from him, he pursued to every corner of his parish by all sorts of means, public and private, early and late," etc. Great and blessed results necessarily followed from such fidelity. In 1768 he was called to preside over Lady Huntingdon's College at Trevecca, Wales. He accepted the position, but did not leave his parish. Disagreements with the authorities on points of doctrine led him to resign in 1771, but no unpleasantness was connected with the resignation.

As a preacher, Fletcher directed his appeals to the conscience. He was well trained, and had a fine voice. J. Wesley said, that, if he had had physical strength, he would have been the most eloquent preacher in England. As a man, he was characterized by saintly piety, rare devotion to God, and blamelessness of life, which Wesley said he had not found equalled in Europe or America. In the judgment of Southey, "no age ever produced a man of more fervent piety, or more perfect charity, and no church ever possessed a more apostolic minister;" and, according to Bishop Ryle, "his devotion has been equalled by few, and probably surpassed by none."

In theology, Fletcher was an Arminian of Arminians. Most of his writings are directed against Calvinism, were written to defend Mr. Wesley, and grew out of controversies with Toplady and Mr. Rowland Hill. Some of these works are still extensively circulated, and are authorities in the Methodist churches. However, controversial as his writings are, Fletcher was not a polemic, but always treated his opponents with fairness and courtesy, and in this presented a marked contrast to Toplady. He was also a millenarian (see his letter to John Wesley, Nov. 29, 1755).

LIT. — His principal works against Calvinism are: Five Checks to Antinomianism; *Script. FLETCHER, Joseph, D.D., an Independent minister; b. at Chester, 1781; studied at Glasgow University; pastor at Blackburn 1807, and at Stepney 1823; d. 1843. His works were edited by JOSEPH FLETCHER of Hanley, in 3 vols., London, 1846. Vol. i. contains a Memoir, vol. ii., Lectures on Puseyism and Romanism (the latter being much admired, and, in separate form, running through a number of editions); vol. iii., Sermons. Some other discourses were published separately.

FLEURY, a town with a celebrated abbey (Floriacum), situated in the diocese of Orléans, on the right bank of the Loire, and founded by Leodebad, Abbot of St. Aniane, in the first years of the reign of Chlodorig II., 638-657. When the Lombards destroyed Monte Casino, Abbot Mummolus sent the monk Aigulf to Italy in order to bring the remains of St. Benedict to Fleury. The expedition succeeded; and the relics worked so many miracles, that the report of them filled four big volumes (Floriacensis vetus bibliotheca Benedictina, etc., Opera Joannis a Bosco, Lugduni, 1605); and Fleury became, as Leo VII. expressed it, caput ac primas omnium canobiorum. The Danes visited the place thrice. The first time the monks fled, and the vikings plundered the abbey; the second time the marauders were defeated and repulsed by the monks; and the third time St. Benedict himself appeared in person, and the heathen barbarians were converted to Christianity. Reformed by St. Odo, towards the close of the ninth century, the abbey rose to still greater distinction. Its library was one of the richest in the realm, and its school had at one time five thousand pupils; but it never produced any great scholars. During the Huguenot wars it suffered so much, that it lost its independence, and joined the Congregation of St. Maur.

FLEURY, Claude, b. in Paris, Dec. 6, 1640; d. there July 14, 1723; was educated by the Jesuits at Clermont; studied law in Paris, and practised as an advocate for nine years, but changed his career, was ordained priest in 1672, and lived from that time till his death at the court, as tutor, first to the Prince of Conti, then to the Count of Vermandois, and finally to the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, and as confessor to Louis XV. (1716-22). He was an ardent student and a prolific writer. He was made Abbé of Loc-Dieu (1684), member of the Academy (1696), prior of Argenteuil (1706), when he resigned his abbacy, and was throughout a friend of Fénelon. The results of his juridical studies came out in his Histoire du droit français (Paris, 1674, last ed., 1822) and Institution au droit ecclésiastique (1692, often republished). For his pupils he wrote Les mœurs des Israélites (1681, Eng. trans., Lond., 1756, 2d ed., enlarged, by Adam Clarke, Manchester, 1805, and New York, 1836), Les mœurs des Chrétiens (1682, last ed., 1810, trans. Newcastle, 1786), and several other historical sketches of a pedagogical tendency. But his principal work is his Histoire ecclésiastique (Paris, 1691 sqq. 20 vols., extending to 1414, but continued to 1584 by Claude Fabre, in 16 vols., 1722-36, with 4 vols. of indexes, 40 vols. in all), a work of considerable merit, designed for the educated public in general, and still read with satisfaction (Eng. trans. down to 870, Lond., 1727-32, 5 vols.; and by Cardinal Newman, with notes, from the Second Œcumenical Council (381) to 456, Oxford, 1812-14, 3 vols.). Of his minor works, Eméry gave a collected edition, Opuscules de l'Abbé Fleury, Paris, 1807.

FLIEDNER, Theodor, D.D., the founder of the institution of Protestant deaconesses, b. Jan. 21, 1800, the son of a clergyman, at Epstein, near Wiesbaden, and d. at Kaiserswerth, the scene of his labors, Oct. 4, 1864. He was a plain, unpretending German pastor, of great working power, indefatigable zeal, fervent piety, and rare talent of organization. Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, he studied at Giessen, Göttingen, and Herborn; was for one year tutor in a family at Cologne, and began to doubt his fitness for the ministry, when he received and accepted, in November, 1821, what he considered a providential call, with the promise of a salary of a hundred and eighty Prussian dollars, from a small Protestant colony at Kaiserswerth, a Roman-Catholic town of eighteen hundred inhabitants, on the Lower Rhine, below Düsseldorf. The failure of a silk manufactory, upon which the town depended largely for support, led him to undertake, in the spring of 1822, a collecting tour to keep his struggling congregation alive. By the end of a week he returned with twelve hundred thalers. This was the beginning of much greater things. By experience and perseverance he became one of the greatest beggars in the service of Christ. In the year 1823 he made a tour to Holland and England, which not only resulted in a permanent endowment of his congregation, but suggested to him the idea of his benevolent institutions. "In both these Protestant countries," he tells us himself, "I became acquainted with a multitude of charitable institutions for the benefit both of body and soul. I saw schools and other educational organizations, alms-houses, orphanages, hospitals, prisons, and societies for the reformation of prisoners, Bible and missionary societies, etc.; and at the same time I observed that it was a living faith in Christ which had called almost every one of these institutions and societies into life, and still preserved them in activity. This evidence of the practical power and fertility of such a principle had a most powerful influence in strengthening my own faith."

Fliedner made two more journeys to Holland, England, and Scotland (in 1832 and 1853), in the interest no more of his congregation, but of his institutions. He also visited the United States in 1849. Twice he travelled to the East, — in 1851 to aid Bishop Gobat in founding a house of deaconesses in Jerusalem, and again in 1857, when he was, however, too feeble to proceed farther than Jaffa. King Frederick William IV. of Prussia and his Queen Elizabeth took the most cordial interest in his labors for the sick and poor, granted him several audiences, furnished him liberally with means, and founded a Christian hospital, with deaconesses at Berlin (Bethany) after the model of Kaiserswerth. In the parsonage garden at Kaiserswerth there still stands the little summer-house, with one room of ten feet square, and an attic over it, which was the first asylum for released female prisoners, and the humble cradle of all Fliedner's institutions, the most important of which is the institution of Evangelical Deaconesses, founded in 1836 on the basis of the apostolic precedent, and with some resemblance to the catholic sisterhoods of charity, but without binding vows. At his death the number of deaconesses in connection with Kaiserswerth and its branch establishments exceeded four hundred. In 1873 there were thirty-four houses, with over seventeen hundred nursing and teaching sisters; in 1878 the number of institutions in Germany, Switzerland, France, Scandinavia, Russia, and Austria, rose to fifty-two, and the number of sisters to nearly four thousand, who labored on eleven hundred stations.

FLODOARD, or FRODOARD, or FLAVALDUS, b. at Epemay in 894; d. March 28, 966; was canon at the cathedral of Rheims, and wrote a poem in hexameter, and in three parts, on the life of Christ, the exploits of the first martyrs, and the history of the popes; a chronicle (Annales) of his own time, from 919 to 966, best edition in PERTZ, M. G. Script., III.; and a Historia Ecclesiae Remensis, first published by Sirmond, Paris, 1611. There is a collected edition of his works by LE JEUNE, Rheims, 1854, also in MIGNE, *Patrol. FLOOD. See NOAH.

FLORE, The Order of (Floriacenses, or Florenses, to be distinguished from Floriacum, the Latin name of the abbey of Fleury), was founded by Joachim, Abbot of Flore (Fiore), in Calabria (1111-30); which article see. The constitution of the order was confirmed by Cœlestine III. (1196), and its houses were richly endowed by Henry VI. and his wife Constantia. It spread rapidly, and numbered many monasteries, not only in Calabria, but throughout Italy. Originally it rose as a branch of the Cistercian order; but its rules were more severe, and this circumstance gave Gregory IX. occasion to forbid the Cistercians to receive any Floriacensian into their order. The Cistercians became infuriated at this slight, and did their utmost to ruin the privileged rival: they finally succeeded. In the beginning of the sixteenth century the order of Flore disappeared. Most of the members joined the Cistercians; others, the Carthusians or the Dominicans. See HELYOT, Histoire des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols.

FLORENCE, Council of. See FERRARA-FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.

FLORIAN, a martyr, and a saint in the Roman-Catholic Church, whose day falls on March 4. He was a soldier in the army of Diocletian (284-305), and was drowned in the Enns, because he openly confessed the Christian faith. On the spot where his corpse drifted ashore, a magnificent monastery was afterwards built. But his remains were brought to Rome, where they rested until 1183, when Pope Lucius III. presented them to King Casimir of Poland. Thus St. Florian became the patron saint of Poland.

FLORUS (not Drepanius, surnamed Magister, on account of his great learning; or Diaconus, from his ecclesiastical position), lived at Lyons in the ninth century, and took a prominent part in the dogmatical controversies of his time. A decided adversary of Paschasius Radbertus's doctrine of transubstantiation, he taught that there is no other participation in the body and blood of Christ than that through faith, and calls the bread the mystical body of the Lord. See his Expositio in Canon. Missæ, written before 834, and first printed in Paris, 1548, though without his name. In the controversy concerning predestination he wrote his Liber adversus Joh. Scoti erroneas definitiones (852) and Sermo de predestinatione, though without fully adopting the ideas of Gottschalk. He was present at the first synod convened in the case by Hincmar, at Chiersy, 849. In the controversy between Agobard and Amalarius he wrote a number of passionate letters, which made much noise in their time. They are found in Bibl. Patr. Max., XV., and, together with his other essays, in MIGNE, Patrol. Latin., 119. His most comprehensive work, a commentary on the Epistles of Paul, is a mere compilation from Augustine. It was formerly ascribed to Bede, and is found in the Basel and Cologne editions of his works; but Florus's authorship has been conclusively proved by Mabillon. [F. MAASSEN: Ein Commentar des Florus von Lyon zu einigen d. sogenannten Sirmond-schen Constitutionen, Wien, 1879.] G. PLITT.

FLORUS, Gessius, succeeded Albinus in 64 A.D. as Roman governor of Judæa, and caused by his rapine and tyranny that insurrection which led to the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem, and the annihilation of the national independence of the Jews. What finally became of Florus himself is not known; but vivid descriptions of his nefarious rule in Judæa are found in JOSEPHUS (Antiq., XX. 9, and De Bello Jud., II. 24, 25) and in TACITUS (Hist., V. 10).

FLÜE, Niklaus von, generally known under the name of Bruder Klaus, was b. at Flüeli, in the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland, March 21, 1417; and d. in his hermit's cell at Ranft, close by his native place, March 21, 1487. He grew up without receiving any other education than that which naturally resulted from active participation in the business of the home. Nevertheless, he served his country well, both in the army and as a judge. In 1450 he married. He had ten children in seventeen years; and he was known as an energetic, prudent, and tender house-father. Nevertheless the whole bent of his nature was towards a life of seclusion and devout contemplation. From early youth he practised a severe asceticism; and Oct. 16, 1467, he actually retired from his home and family, and settled in a lonely place up among the Alps, where he built a cell, and spent the rest of his life. To the great esteem and reverence which all who knew him felt for him, was soon added a tinge of the miraculous. People told of him that he never ate. Pilgrimages were made to his cell. Everybody wanted his advice; and he exercised great influence in the surrounding country, not only in general by his example, but in numerous special cases by his exhortations or warnings. At the diet of Stanz (1481) he actually saved the confederation from civil war, and brought about an agreement on that constitution under which Switzerland lived until the close of the eighteenth century. After his death, his countrymen made the greatest exertions to have him canonized. But a canonization is a very expensive affair; and in spite of subscriptions, heavy taxes, etc., nothing more than a beatification could be obtained from Clement IX., 1669.

LIT. — The literature concerning Bruder Klaus is very great. A complete list of it may be found in E. L. ROCHNOLZ, Schweizerlegende von B. K., Aarau, 1875, pp. 255–309. The best biography of him is that by JOH. MING, 3 vols., Luzern, 1861–71. JUSTUS HEER.

FONSECA, Pedro da, b. at Cortizada, Portugal, 1528; d. at Coimbra, Nov. 4, 1599; entered the order of Jesuits in 1548; studied at Evora, and became professor at Coimbra. Among his works are a Latin commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle (4 vols., Rome, 1577–89), and Institutiones dialecticæ (Lisbon, 1564), etc. He was the first who taught the doctrine of a scientia media Dei (i.e., what God might have done, but did not), which afterwards received its name, its due development, and its influence, under the hands of Molina.

FONT, The Baptismal, originally a cistern, rather beneath the level of the floor of the baptistery, surrounded by a low wall, and entered by steps; afterwards a vessel for containing water used at the administration of baptism. The form of the font, whether a cistern or a vessel, was generally the octagon, with reference to the eighth day, as the day of the resurrection of our Lord; though other forms, the circle, the hexagon, etc., are also found. In the Western Church the fonts were generally made of some fine marble, and often highly ornamented: in the Eastern Church they were made of metal or wood, and generally without any ornamentation. See art. Font, in SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dict. Chr. Antiq., and art. BAPTISM, in this Cyclopædia, p. 203.

FONTEVRAUD, The Order of (Ordo Fontis Ebraldii), was founded by Robert of Arbrissel (the present Arbresee), b. 1047; d. 1117. After acting for some years as administrator of the bishopric of Rennes, and teaching theology for some other years at Angers, Robert retired into the forest of Craon, and settled there as a hermit. Others joined him; and in 1093 he formed a community of regular canons, out of which afterwards grew the abbey De la Roc, or De rota. Selected by Urban II. to go through the country, and preach penance, the overwhelming impression he made, especially on women, led to the foundation of the great monastic institution of Fontévrard. It comprised, under the title of pauperes Christi, a male and a female division. The former was dedicated to St. John: the latter consisted of three subdivisions, of which the first was dedicated to the Holy Virgin, and contained three hundred virgins and widows; the second to St. Lazarus, containing a hundred and twenty lepers; and the third to Magdalene, containing a number of female penitents. The whole institution stood under a female head: its first abbess was Petronella of Craon-Chemillé. But the separation between the two sexes was complete, and the rules for both divisions very severe,—perpetual silence, total abstinence from flesh and wine, etc. In 1106 Paschalis II. confirmed the constitution of the order: in 1109 Calixtus II., in person, consecrated the church. At the death of Robert, the monastery numbered three thousand nuns; and the number rose still higher. Indeed, the institution was still flourishing when it was dissolved by the Revolution. The buildings were transformed into a jail; and the last abbess, Charlotte de Pardaillan, died in destitution, in Paris, 1799. See Règles et constit. de l'ordre de Fontevr., Paris, 1643; NIQUET: Hist. de l'ordre de Font., Paris, 1643; J. DE LA MAINFERME: Clypeus Fontebraldensis, Paris, 1684 (an apologetic work).

TH. PRESSEL.

FOOT-WASHING, an ancient act of hospitality (Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxv. 41, etc.), made necessary in Palestine by the dry climate, dusty roads, and the fact that sandals, covering only the sole of the foot, were worn. Our Lord, the night before his crucifixion, washed the feet of his disciples, and wiped them (John xiii. 1-17), and commanded his disciples to "wash one another's feet" (xiii. 14). This is usually interpreted to mean that they should emulate his spirit of ministration and humility. It has, however, been taken literally. Upon the basis of this passage and of 1 Tim. v. 10, in which one of the conditions of being admitted to the order of widows is that she had "washed the saints' feet," the Roman and Greek churches and the Tunkers still practise the rite.

Augustine (Ep. ad Januarium) refers to the ceremony of foot-washing as taking place on Maunday-Thursday (the Thursday before Easter). The synod of Toledo, in 694, went so far as to exclude from the communion-table those who refused to have their feet washed on this day. Bernard of Clairvaux even sought to have it recognized as one of the sacraments, but without success. The ceremony is still observed in some of the convents of the Roman Church, and very generally in those of the Greek Church. The czar of Russia, the emperor of Austria, and the kings of Spain, Portugal, and Bavaria, have observed, and perhaps do still observe, the custom of washing the feet of twelve beggars on Maunday-Thursday. The Pope at Rome, likewise, in illustration of Christian humility, sprinkles a few drops of water on the feet of thirteen poor men, attired in white tunics, and seated in the Clementine Chapel.

This ceremony Luther denounced as hypocritical, and not at all in the spirit of the Lord's command. He thought the people would "be far better served if they were given a common bath, where they could wash their entire body." And Bengel, in his Commentary, suggested that the Pope would "deserve more admiration, if, instead of washing the feet of twelve beggars, he would in real humility wash the feet of a single king." The Moravians practised foot-washing till 1818, when a synod at Herrnhut abolished the practice. The Tunkers and Winebrennarians are strenuous advocates of it. See TUNKERS.

FORBES, Alexander Penrose, D.C.L., Bishop of Brechin; was b. at Edinburgh, June 6, 1817; d. at Dundee, Oct. 8, 1875. He was educated at Oxford, and was powerfully influenced by the Tractarian movement. He was made bishop in 1847. He had decided Romanizing leanings, and was tried for heresy in 1857, and censured. His principal works are, A Short Explanation of the Nicene Creed (Oxford, 1852) and an Explanation of the Thirty-Nine Articles (Oxford, 1867).

FORBES, John, a Scottish divine, son of Patrick Forbes; was b. May 2, 1593; d. April 20, 1648. He was professor of divinity at Aberdeen 1619-40. He leaned to Episcopacy, and, refusing to sign the Solemn League and Covenant, was ejected from his position. He was a man of much learning; and his work, Instructiones Historico-Theologicae, etc. (Amst., 1645), had a considerable reputation, and is referred to by Baur as one of the two most important on the history of doctrine of the seventeenth century. See CHAMBERS, Biog. Dict. of Eminent Scotsmen.

FORBES, Patrick, a Scottish divine; was b. in Aberdeenshire, 1564; d. March 28, 1635. He was made Bishop of Aberdeen 1618. His principal work was, An Exquisite Commentary on the Revelation, Lond., 1613. See the Biographical Memoir prefixed to The Funeral Sermons, Orations, etc., on the Death of the Right Rev. Patrick Forbes, D.D. (1635), edited by C. F. SAND, Edinb., 1845.

FORBES, William, a learned Scottish divine; was b. at Aberdeen, 1585; d. April 1, 1634. Charles I., on a visit to Edinburgh (1633), was much pleased with his preaching, and made him First Bishop of Edinburgh, January, 1634. His work, Considerationes Modestæ de Justificatione, etc., first published in Lond., 1658, was reprinted in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1850-56, 2 vols.

FOREIRO, Francisco, b. at Lisbon, 1523; d. at Almada, Jan. 10, 1587; entered the Dominican order; studied theology in Paris; and was, after his return in 1540, appointed court-preacher in Lisbon. He distinguished himself as one of the Portuguese delegates to the Council of Trent (1561), and was appointed a member of the committee charged with the compilation of a Roman-Catholic Catechism, with the revision of the Missal, and with the compilation of the Index. Most of his writings—commentaries on the Books of the Old Testament, a Hebrew dictionary, etc.—still remain in manuscript.

FORMOSUS, Pope (Sept. 21, 891-April 4, 896), a native of Rome; was made Cardinal-Bishop of Porto in 864 by Nicholas I., and, both by him and by Adrian II., employed in many important missions, but was by John VIII. deprived of his ecclesiastical position, and even excommunicated, April 19, 876, on account, as it was said, of participation in a conspiracy against Charles the Bald and the holy father himself. By Marinus he was restored, however, to his former dignity; and at the death of Stephen VI. he succeeded to the papal chair, the first instance in the Western Church of the transfer of a bishop from one see to another. On account of the almost complete dissolution of the Frankish Empire, the Pope found it necessary at this period to lean upon some of the native Italian princes; and Wido, Duke of Spoleto, was crowned emperor, together with his son Lambert. But it soon became apparent that dependence upon a neighbor was too dangerous; and Formosus, therefore, called the German king, Arnulf, into Italy, and crowned him emperor. Immediately after Arnulf's return to Germany, Formosus died; and Lambert now entered Rome, and took his revenge by the aid of Formosus's successor. Stephen VII. The corpse of the late pope was dug up from the grave, and seated in the papal chair; and then a synod was held, accusing him of having intruded himself in St. Peter's see, etc. He was declared guilty; and his remains were atrociously mutilated and defiled, while all his ordinations and consecrations were cancelled. The confusion which arose herefrom was still further increased by the circumstances that some popes (Sergius III. and John X.) recognized the proceedings of the synod, while others (Theodore II., John IX., and Benedict IV.) declared them null and void; a circumstance which presents an embarrassing argument in the question of papal infallibility. See the writings of Auxilius and Vulgaris, in MABILLON (Analecta Vetera, Paris, 1723) and in DÜMMLER (Auxilius und Vulgaris, Leipzig, 1866). R. ZÖPFEL.

FORSTER, Johann, b. at Augsburg, July 10, 1495; d. at Wittenberg, Dec. 8, 1556; studied Greek and Hebrew at Ingolstadt, under Reuchlin, and theology at Leipzig and Wittenberg; became one of Luther's favorite pupils, aided him in translating the Old Testament, and was, on his recommendation, made preacher in Augsburg, 1535. But in Augsburg, as afterwards in Tübingen and in other places, his strict and exclusive Lutheranism brought him in conflict with his colleagues. In 1548 he was made professor in Hebrew at Wittenberg. His great work is his Dictionarium Hebraicum Novum, published at Basel, after his death, 1557.

FORTIFICATIONS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

In general each place was surrounded by a wall; but municipal places had fortifications containing garrisons, especially in times of war (2 Chron. xvii. 2). Thus Jerusalem was fortified by David (2 Sam. v. 7, 9), and the work of its fortification continued in later times (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). Solomon also built forts throughout the land (1 Kings ix. 15, 17 sq.; 2 Chron. viii. 5); and their number was increased as necessity required it, especially after the exile and during the Jewish war. Among them were Masada and Machærus.

Such fortified places were surrounded by one, sometimes by double or triple, walls (2 Chron. xxxii. 5), with bulwarks (xxvi. 15) and wall-towers. Over the gateways, which were closed by ponderous doors, and secured by wooden or metallic bars, were watch-towers, and around the walls was a ditch. Besides these large fortresses, there were also castles or citadels, as well as forts. In the forests and in the open fields watch-towers were also found.

During the war, in case a city thus fortified would not surrender voluntarily, a siege was laid against it, and operations began, whereby the wall could be approached (2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 Kings xix. 32; Jer. vi. 6, xxxii. 21; Ezek. xxvi. 8 sq.). After this the battering-rams were set against it. That the besieged did not remain idle, but endeavored to prevent the approach of the enemy, we see from passages like Isa. xxii. 10, Jer. xxxiii. 1, 2 Sam. xi. 21, 24, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; and thus it happened that strongly fortified places were not so easily taken. Thus Ashdod was besieged twenty-nine years, Samaria three years (2 Kings xvii. 5), Jerusalem a year and a half (xxv. 1, 2). But cities taken were razed to the ground, and their inhabitants killed, or sold as slaves. If they capitulated, they were more leniently dealt with (Deut. xx. 11 sq.; 1 Macc. xiii. 15 sq.). The Chaldeans were the most famous besiegers of antiquity.

RÜETSCHL.

FORTUNATUS, Venantius Honorius Clementianus, b. about 530 at Treviso; d. at Poitiers about 609; studied grammar and rhetoric at Ravenna; lived for some time at the court of Sigibert, king of Austrasia, whose favor he won by his poetry; repaired thence to Tours, and afterwards to Poitiers, where he settled in a monastery founded by the divorced wife of Clothaire I., the learned Radegunde; entered finally the service of the church, and became Bishop of Poitiers about 599. His fame, however, he acquired as a poet; and he is, indeed, the last great poet of the period before Charlemagne. He wrote epics (among which is the life of St. Martin, in hexameters, based on the works of Sulpicius Severus), lyrics (especially hymns), epistles, epigrams, didactic and descriptive poems, etc. The two most celebrated of his hymns are Fexilla regis prodeunt and Pange, lingua, gloriosi; of which Neale's translations are found in SCHAFF'S Christ in Song, New York, 1869. The best edition of his works is that by LUCHI, Rome, 1786, in 2 vols. 4to, incorporated with MIGNÉ, Patrol. Latin., vol. lxxviii., cols. 595 sqq. See EBERT: Geschichte d. latein. christ. Literatur bis zum Zeitalter Karls d. Grossen, vol. i., Leipzig, 1874, pp. 494-516.

FOSCARARI (Ægidius Foscherarius), b. at Bologna, Jan. 27, 1512; d. in Rome, Dec. 23, 1564; entered early the Dominican order; preached, and taught theology, in various cities of Italy; and was appointed Magister sacri palatii by Paul III. in 1546, and Bishop of Modena in 1550 by Julius III. In 1551 he was sent to the Council of Trent, and when (April 28, 1552) its meetings were suspended he returned to his episcopal see. Under Paul IV. (in 1558) he was accused of heresy, and imprisoned in the Castle St. Angelo. Though the Inquisition could prove no heresy against him, he was not released until after Paul's death. By Pius IV. he was once more sent to the Council of Trent, and made a member of the Committee on the Catechism and the Revision of the Missal.

FOSTER, James, D.D., an English dissenting minister; b. in Exeter, Sept. 16, 1667; d. Nov. 5, 1753. He became pastor in London in 1721. He was an eloquent preacher, and won the eulogies of Pope and others. Many of his sermons were published. Amongst his other writings the most important is The Usefulness, Truth, and Excellency of the Christian Revelation, etc., 1731, a defence against Tindal the deist.

FOSTER, John, a Baptist clergyman and eminent essayist; b. in Halifax, Yorkshire, Sept. 17, 1770; d. at Stapleton, near Bristol, Oct. 15, 1843. He engaged in weaving wool till he was seventeen. How he secured his primary education is unknown. Becoming a member of the Baptist Church at this time, he determined to study for the ministry; entered Brearly Hall, and subsequently passed into the Baptist College, Bristol. In 1792 he preached for three months at Newcastle-on-Tyne; passed from there to Dublin, and in 1797 was invited to become pastor of the Baptist Church, Chichester, where he remained till 1800, when he was called to Downend. From here, in 1801, he removed to Frome. A throat trouble obliged him to resign in 1806. The year before, he published his essays, and became contributor to The Eclectic Magazine. In 1817 he determined to take up pastoral work again, and went back to Downend, but remained only six months. He was frequently called upon to lecture, and preached at intervals, until his death in 1843. Foster was a man of very delicate sensibilities, reserved disposition, and humility of Christian character. He was not successful as a preacher; but as an essayist he excels in vividness of imagination, penetration of thought, and earnest sincerity. Writing was, however, a laborious task to him, and he is said to have spent several days in the elaboration of a single paragraph. His friend Robert Hall said of him, "His conceptions are most extraordinary and original." Foster's principal work is Essays on Decision of Character, which has passed through many editions. Other works are, Evils of Popular Ignorance (1818), Introductory Essay to Doddridge's Rise and Progress (1825), Lectures delivered at Broadmead Chapel (2 series, 1844-47), a hundred and eighty-five contributions to The Eclectic Review, and Observations on the Character of Mr. Hall as a Preacher. See RYLAND: Life and Correspondence of J. Foster, 1846, republished in Boston, 1851; W. W. EVERTS: Life and Thoughts of J. Foster, New York, 1849.

FOX, George. This great reformer, a man of original genius and deep spiritual discernment, was b. in July, 1624, at Drayton-in-the-Clay, now called Fenny Drayton, in Leicestershire. His father, Christopher Fox, was a weaver, called "righteous Christer" by his neighbors: his mother, Mary Lago, was, as he tells us, "of the stock of the martyrs." From childhood, Fox was of a serious, religious disposition. "When I came to eleven years of age," he says (Journal, p. 2), "I knew pureness and righteousness; for, while I was a child, I was taught how to walk to be kept pure. The Lord taught me to be faithful in all things, and to act faithfully two ways; viz., inwardly to God, and outwardly to man; . . . and that my words should be few and savory, seasoned with grace; and that I might not eat and drink to make myself wanton, but for health, using the creatures in their service, as servants in their places, to the glory of Him that hath created them." As he grew up, his relations "thought to have made him a priest;" but he was put as an apprentice to a man who was a shoemaker and grazier. In his nineteenth year he was grieved at the healths-drinking of two companions who were professors of religion, and heard an inward voice from the Lord, "Thou seest how young people go together into vanity, and old people into the earth; and thou must forsake all, both young and old, and keep out of all, and be as a stranger unto all." Then began a life of solitary wandering in mental temptations and troubles, in which he "went to many a priest to look for comfort, but found no comfort from them." Some of his friends advised him to marry, some to enter the army: "an ancient priest in Warwickshire" bade him "take tobacco, and sing psalms." At one time, as he was walking in a field, "the Lord opened unto" him "that being bred at Oxford or Cambridge was not enough to fit and qualify men to be ministers of Christ," but that a spiritual qualification was necessary. Not seeing this requisite in the priest of his parish, he "would get into the orchards and fields" with his Bible by himself. Regarding the priests less, he looked more after the dissenters, among whom he found "some tenderness," but no one that could speak to his need. "And when all my hopes in them," he says, "and in all men, were gone, so that I had nothing outwardly to help me, nor could tell what to do, then, oh! then, I heard a voice which said, 'There is one, even Christ Jesus, that can speak to thy condition.' And when I heard it, my heart did leap for joy. . . . Christ it was (who had enlightened me) that gave me his light to believe in, and gave me hope, which is himself, revealed himself in me, and gave me his spirit, and gave me his grace, which I found sufficient in the deeps and in weakness." Afterwards the hearts and natures of wicked men were revealed to him, that he might have a sense of all conditions, and thus be able to speak to all conditions; and he "saw that there was an ocean of darkness and death, but an infinite ocean of light and love which flowed over the ocean of darkness," and in that he saw "the infinite love of God." In 1648 he began to exercise his ministry publicly in market-places, in the fields, in appointed meetings of various kinds, sometimes in the "steeple-houses," after the priests had got through. His preaching was powerful; and many people joined him in professing the same faith in the spirituality of true religion. In a few years the Society of Friends had formed itself spontaneously under the preaching of Fox and his companions. Fox afterwards showed great powers, as a religious legislator, in the admirable organization which he gave to the new society. He seems, however, to have had no desire to found a sect, but only to proclaim the pure and genuine principles of Christianity in their original simplicity. In 1650 the name "Quakers" was first applied to the Friends in derision, by "one Justice Bennet," because Fox had bidden the justices to "tremble at the word of the Lord." Fox was often arrested and imprisoned for violating the laws forbidding unauthorized worship. He was imprisoned at Darby in 1650, Carlisle in 1653, London in 1654, Lancaster in 1656, Lancaster in 1660 and 1663, Scarborough in 1666, and Worcester in 1674, in noisome dungeons, and with much attendant cruelty. In prison his pen was active, and hardly less potent than his voice. In 1669 Fox married Margaret Fell of Swarthmore Hall, a lady of high social position, and one of his early converts. In 1671 he went to Barbadoes and the English settlements in America, where he remained two years. In 1672 he attended the Yearly Meeting at Newport, R.I., which lasted for six days. At the end of this meeting he says, "It was somewhat hard for Friends to part; for the glorious power of the Lord, which was over all, and his blessed truth and life flowing amongst them, had so knit and united them together, that they spent two days in taking leave one of another, and of the Friends of the island." In 1677 and 1684 he visited the Friends in Holland, and organized their meetings for discipline. He died in London, Nov. 13, 1690, having preached with great power two days before, and was buried on the 16th, in the Friends' Ground, near Bunhill Fields.

Fox is described by Thomas Ellwood, the friend of Milton, as "graceful in countenance, manly in personage, grave in gesture, courteous in conversation." Penn says he was "civil beyond all forms of breeding." We are told that he was "plain and powerful in preaching, fervent in prayer," "a discerner of other men's spirits," and very much master of his own. "skilful to "speak a word in due season to the conditions and capacities of most, especially to them that were weary, and wanted soul's rest;" "valiant in asserting the truth, bold in defending it, patient in suffering for it, immovable as a rock."

FOX (or FOXE), John, author of the Book of Martyrs; was b. in Boston, Lincolnshire, 1517; d. April 15, 1587. He was educated at Oxford, and became fellow of Magdalen College, where he applied himself to the diligent study of church history. He espoused Protestant sentiments, and for this was expelled from his college. He became tutor in Sir Thomas Lucy's family, and then to the children of the Earl of Surrey, but was obliged to seek refuge from persecution on the Continent. He went to Basel, where he laid the plan of the work which has given him fame. At the elevation of Elizabeth he returned to England, but never received higher position than that of prebend of Salisbury Cathedral. Called by Archbishop Parker to subscribe to the canons, he refused, and, holding up a Greek Testament, said, "To this will I subscribe." He was fearless in the avowal of his convictions, and petitioned the queen earnestly but unsuccessfully to spare the lives of two Dutch Anabaptists. Fox's title to fame rests upon the Book of Martyrs, in the compilation of which he had the assistance of Cranmer and others. It required eleven years of preparation, and appeared in its first form at Basel, 1554; the first complete Eng. ed., in 1563, 4th ed., 1583, etc. The original title was Actes and Monumentes of these latter perillous days touching matters of the churches . . . from the year of our Lorde a thousande to the time now present, etc. By order of Elizabeth this work was placed in the common halls of archbishops, bishops, deans, etc., and in all the colleges and chapels throughout the kingdom. It exercised a great influence upon the masses of the people long after its author was dead. The Roman Catholics early attacked it, and pointed out its blunders. Fox wrote other works; for these see a volume in British Reformers, published at London. The Book of Martyrs has appeared in numerous editions, the best of which are those of Rev. M. H. SKYMOUR (New York, 1838) and of Rev. GEORGE TOWNSEND, M.A. of Trinity College, Cambridge, with a Life of the Author, and Vindication of the Work, London, 1843. D. S. SCHAFF.

FOX, Richard, English prelate and statesman; b. at close of the reign of Henry VI.; d. Sept. 14, 1528. He was educated at Oxford. He was a great favorite of Henry VII., and filled the offices of privy counsellor, keeper of the privy seal, and secretary of state. In turn he was Bishop of Exeter, Bath and Wells (1491), Durham (1494), and Winchester (1500), and master of Pembroke College, Cambridge (1507-19). Wolsey was his protégé; and he was much mortified at that favorite's insults and superior influence. He founded Corpus Christi, Oxford (1516), and the free schools of Taunton and Grentham.

FRANCE, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. France comprises an area of 528,577 square kilometers, with 36,905,788 inhabitants (according to the census of 1876), of whom 35,387,703 belong to the Roman-Catholic Church, 467,531 to the Reformed, 80,117 to the Lutheran, and 33,109 to other Protestant denominations; 49,499 are Jews, and the rest belong to no confession. Thus the overwhelming majority of the French people are Roman Catholic, and there is no prospect of any change in the proportion at present; but liberty of conscience, and freedom of worship, are constitutionally guaranteed in the country, and a remarkable religious movement (headed by McAll) has been going on among the laboring and lower Roman-Catholic classes in Paris and other cities.

1. The Roman-Catholic Church.—In order to give a just representation of the state of the Roman-Catholic Church in France at this moment, it is necessary to consider (a) its organization and official relation to the State and the Pope, (b) the support it receives from the congregations and the religious associations, and (c) the influence it exercises on the school, and education in general.

(a) The French Church consists of 18 archbishoprics and 68 bishoprics; that is, of 86 dioceses: but it has no primate of its own. The primacy of Aquitania, or even that of the whole Gaul, is, like the pallium, which pertains to certain sees (for instance, to that of Autun), a distinction of rank only, not of dignity, still less of power. Though five of the archbishops are cardinals (Bordeaux, Cambrai, Paris, Rennes, and Rouen), they have as such no special authority in the country. Each bishop is the sole and proper chief of his diocese, and maintains direct communication with the State and with the Pope. Apostolical equality between the bishops is the first maxim of the French Church. The bishop governs his diocese independently, restrained only by the general ecclesiastical laws and the will of the Pope. He arranges the whole course of theological education, lays out the programme of study, selects the handbooks, chooses the professors: he ordains, appoints, and discharges the priests, founds or confirms all religious associations, calls or installs the ecclesiastics who teach in the State schools, excommunicates and re-admits, etc.

In the administration of his diocese the bishop is aided by vicar-generals, secretaries, a court, and a chapter. The number of vicar-generals varies with the size of the diocese. The government pays two, or sometimes three. Their title is vicaires généraux titulaires, and their number 187. Others are appointed by the bishop himself, but only for the internal affairs of the church. Their title is vicaires généraux honoraires, and their number may be larger. Of secretaries, the government pays 133. The episcopal court, whose competency, by Code Napoléon, is confined to matrimonial affairs and church-discipline, is composed of an official, a vice-official, one or more assessors, a promoteur, and a greffier; but all the members hold other offices at the same time. The chapter has also lost its former importance. It is divided into three classes, — chanoines d'honneur, titulaires, and honoraires; but only the second class is paid by the State, and has any practical signification. It takes care of the service, and numbers 763.

The lower clergy consists of curés, desservants, and vicaires. The curés are priests of the curés, or principal parishes, and are appointed by the bishop; though their appointment must be confirmed by the government. In 1876 they numbered 3,440. The desservants are priests of the succursales, or subordinate parishes, and are appointed and dismissed by the bishop alone (ad nutum amovibiles). Though they are only a kind of help to the curés, the latter have no authority over them, only a right of superintendence with report to the bishop. The number of desservants is 31,191. The vicaires, finally, who act only as assistants to the curés and desservants, number 11,679. As in the large cities the service of the mass requires a greater number of officials, the State pays 4,423 prêtres habituels for this purpose. Adding furthermore the almoners of the lycæums, colleges, normal schools, hospitals, and asylums (who are appointed by the respective administrations, but stand under the authority of the bishop), the clergy of the army, the navy, and the colonies, the teachers and pupils in the theological seminaries, etc., the total number of the clergy recognized and paid by the State amounts to 68,750. The budget of 1877 allowed 51,526,445 francs for the expenses of the Roman-Catholic Church, of which 1,640,000 francs were for the cardinals, archbishops, and bishops.

By the laws of Feb. 13, 1790, and Aug. 18, 1793, the religious orders were abolished in France. Napoleon, however, by a decree of Feb. 18, 1809, allowed the re-establishment of communities of female nurses; though reserving to himself the right of examining their statutes, fixing the number of members, etc. He also gave his consent to the re-establishment of female communities with educational purposes; and from that time the religious orders gradually crept into the country, half permitted, half tolerated. Though a decree of March 18, 1836, formally declared that the government would never allow the establishment of a community whose aim was a merely contemplative life, the congregations, nevertheless, contrived to set apart for this purpose a portion of their members. It is very difficult, however, to obtain complete and reliable statistics on this field. There is a general report from 1861, — Statistique de France, Strassburg, 1864, the result of the general census of 1861; and there is a more special report, — Etat des congrégations, communautés et associations religieuses autorisées ou non autorisées, laid before the legislative assembly in 1878. Both are valuable documents, but neither is complete. A comparison between these two reports reveals the interesting fact, that while, in 1861, the number of all the members, male and female, of the religious orders in France was only 108,119, it had in 1878 risen to 158,040. This last figure, however, is not correct any longer, since the law of 1879 made the confirmation by the State necessary to the legal existence of any association whatever; and disobedience to this law caused the expulsion of the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, etc.

The female associations which have been confirmed by the State comprise 224 Congrégations à supérieure générale proprement dites, organized for the whole country, namely, 11 for nursing, 58 for education, and 153 both for nursing and education, with 2,450 houses and 93,215 sisters; 35 Congrégations diocésaines à supérieure générale, organized only for some special diocese, namely, 6 for nursing, 6 for education, and 23 both for nursing and education, with 102 houses and 3,794 sisters; and 644 Communautés à supérieure locale indépendantes, namely, 312 for education, 159 for nursing, 157 both for education and nursing, and 16 for a contemplative life, with 16,741 sisters. The total number of members of these associations is 113,750, to which must be added, according to the report of 1878, 14,003 sisters belonging to religious orders not recognized by the State. The names of the principal orders of the first kind are, Filles de la Charité de S. Vincent de Paul, numbering 9,130 members, with 89 stations; Petites Sœurs des Pauvres, founded at St. Servan, in Bretagne, in 1840, by Abbé le Poilleur, and numbering 2,685 members, with 184 stations; Filles de Sagesse, numbering 2,588 members, with 105 stations; Sœurs de S. Joseph, numbering 2,520 members, with 155 stations, etc. See CALMETTE, Traité de l'administration des associations religieuses, 1877.

Only 32 male associations have obtained the confirmation of the State; the reason being, that according to the law of Jan. 2, 1817, the chief of the State can confirm a female association by a simple decree, while a male association must be recognized by the legislative assembly. Among the legalized associations two are devoted to work in the seminaries, — Congrégation de S. Lazare (numbering 1,195 members) and Compagnie des prêtres de S. Sulpice (numbering 200 members); and three are devoted to missionary work, — Congrégation des Missions étrangères (with 480 members), Congrégation de S. Esprit (with 515 members), and Congrégation de S. François de Sales (with 28 members). The total number of members belonging to these 32 associations is 22,843. In certain respects, however, the associations which never sought and never obtained the sanction of the civil government were of much more importance, — the Jesuits, Benedictines, Dominicans, Carthusians, Franciscans, etc. The Jesuits returned to France with the Bourbons in 1814, and from that time their influence has been steadily increasing up to 1879, in which year they possessed 58 houses, with 1,471 inmates. The Benedictines numbered 239 members, in 13 houses; the Dominicans 303, in 21 houses; the Trappists 1,158, in 17 houses, etc. But, as all these associations refused to seek the State's legalization of their existence, the houses were broken up in 1880, and the inmates expelled.

Among the lay associations, especially two have acquired great celebrity; namely, Société de St. Vincent de Paul and Société de St. François Régis. The former devoted itself, besides, to other kinds of charity, — to guarding the youth from temptation and seduction; and in 1852 no less than 131,000 young persons stood under its protection. The latter devoted itself to the regulation of unhappy matrimonial affairs; and from 1826 to 1865 it treated no less than 43,236 cases. In 1870 these two associations were united in one, which holds its annual convention in May or April, in Paris. The clergy exercises, of course, a great influence in the working of this great society; but the president's chair is always occupied by a layman. Another lay association of great importance is Société de Foi, in Lyons, devoted to missionary work. It has about six millions of francs a year at its disposal, and publishes Annales de la propagation de la Foi and Les Missions catholiques, which appear at Lyons, the former in eight, the latter in four languages. See Manuel des œuvres et institutions religieuses et charitables, Paris, 1877.

(c) From of old the Christian clergy has considered the education of the children of the Christian congregation their duty and their privilege: and the French clergy has, in the face of a strong opposition, steadily endeavored to bring this whole field under their authority. They were already near their goal, when the so-called Ferry Laws of 1879 entirely reversed the state of affairs. The effect of those laws cannot yet be exactly stated; but a fair estimate may be formed by considering the contents of the laws, and the state of affairs before their issue.

With respect to the primary schools (in which free instruction is given), the latest statistics are found in A. LEGOYT, La France et l'Étranger, études de statistique comparée, Paris, 1870. Of primary schools maintained by the State, 35,348 schools for boys, or for boys and girls, with 1,986,141 pupils, had lay teachers; while 2,038 schools with 412,852 pupils had teachers from the congregations. Connected with these schools were 4,848 supplementary schools for apprentices, Sunday classes, etc., of which 4,471 with 81,427 pupils were under lay, and 377 with 36,068 pupils under clerical leadership. Of 14,059 schools for girls, 5,998 with 317,312 pupils had lay teachers; while 8,061 with 697,195 pupils had teachers from the Congregations. Of 1,192 boarding-schools for girls, 181 with 1,662 inmates were under lay, and 1,008 with 15,065 inmates under clerical leadership. Of primary schools maintained by private support, 2,572 schools for boys with 125,779 pupils had lay, and 513 with 82,803 pupils, teachers from the Congregations, 7,637 schools for girls with 290,206 pupils had lay, and 5,571 with 417,825 pupils, teachers from the Congregations. Of 3,474 boarding-schools, 2,090 were under clerical direction.

In the middle and higher schools the clergy also had gained considerable ground. Especially in the middle schools the Jesuits exercised so great an influence, that the political leaders and state authorities became alarmed; and March 15, 1879, the then minister of public instruction, Jules Ferry, laid before the Chambers a law almost eliminating the influence of the clergy. As the law prohibits any member of a non-recognized association to be director of or teach in a school, the 27 Jesuit colleges which at that moment flourished in France were closed, and 848 teachers put out of activity. Twenty-six other communities, having 61 establishments and 1,089 teachers, fared no better. The teachers belonging to the recognized associations, and numbering 22,769, were as yet not interfered with; but they will in the future be subjected to the same examinations as lay teachers, instead of simply obtaining an episcopal certificate.

II. The Protestant Churches. The constitutions of the Reformed and Lutheran churches rest on the law of April 7, 1802, completed and somewhat modified by the law of March 26, 1852. Each congregation has its presbytery, whose lay members are elected by universal suffrage. Above the presbytery stands the consistory, one for each six thousand souls, and consisting of the ministers and representatives of the presbyteries. The consistory chooses its own president; but he must be a clergyman, and obtain the confirmation of the government. Five consistories were destined to form a provincial synod in the Reformed, and an inspection in the Lutheran Church. The provincial synods, however, were never formed, nor was the Reformed Church allowed to convene its general synod until 1872. The Lutheran Church was in this respect more fortunate. It formed its inspections, and obtained in its directory a centre of organization, to which the power of appointing the ministers was confided, without any restrictions from the side of the consistories or the congregations. The Reformed Church comprises 100 consistories (one for each 4,675 souls), and the Lutheran 6 (one for each 13,373 souls). The State pays 616 Reformed ministers (one for each 759 souls), and 64 Lutheran (one for each 4,675 souls). The budget of 1877 allowed 1,430,500 francs for the expenses of the Protestant churches; but this sum was overrun by 20,000 francs.

For the historical development of the French churches see the arts. FRANKS, GALLICANISM, GAUL, HUGUENOTS, etc.

The above article is a condensation of the articles by Alb. Matter and C. Pfender in Herzog, in some cases supplemented with more recent statistics.

FRANCE, Protestantism in, since the Revolution. At the outbreak of the Revolution the number of Protestants in France, including the Lutherans of Alsace, amounted to about eight hundred thousand; but their religion was not recognized by the State. They were excluded from all civil offices: as they mostly lived in small groups, dispersed all over the country, they were prevented from exercising any appreciable social influence, and had to submit to numberless petty chicaneries from the surrounding Roman-Catholic population; and, though the churches of the Desert were generally connived at, actual persecutions occurred now and then. In this state of affairs the edict of toleration brought a change in 1787; and, as the Protestants could not fail recognizing a movement towards liberation in the dawning Revolution, they joined it with eagerness: there sat nine Protestant pastors in the Constituent Assembly. A decree of Dec. 24, 1789, made the Protestants eligible to all civil offices, and another, of Dec. 25, 1790, restored the property confiscated by the revocation of the Edict of Nantes to the descendants of the exiles, on the condition that they should return home, and become French citizens. The real work of restoration, however, did not begin until after the conclusion of the concordat (July 15, 1801), when Napoleon undertook to re-organize the church affairs of France. The Protestants were placed on equal terms with the Roman Catholics; their churches were restored to them; their pastors were to be paid by the State; a Lutheran seminary was founded at Strassburg, a Reformed at Montauban, 1808, etc. All these reforms were, of course, received with gratitude by the Protestants, though it soon became evident that the new church constitution was very inferior to the old. In 1637 the Reformed Church in France had had eight hundred and six churches, served by six hundred and forty-one pastors; in 1806 she had only a hundred and seventy-one churches, and of these fifty had no pastors. This loss might be repaired; but how was the religious life of those times, the active piety, the fervent spirit, to be revived? In its new constitution the Church was wholly dependent on the State, and curtailed both in its freedom and in its authority. The congregation exercised no influence on the choice of its pastor, the most essential element of freedom; and Napoleon refused to revive the national synod, the most essential element of authority. Indeed, the prospects were not so very promising.

After Napoleon's fall, when a violent current of re-action set in, stimulated by the fiercest feelings of revenge, the hatred of the Roman Catholics to the Protestants also showed itself. Riots took place, especially in Southern France, and grew into actual persecution. Around Nismes more than one hundred homesteads were devastated, the houses burnt, and the fields laid waste, and more than two hundred persons were killed. The government seemed inclined to look on with indifference, until it was compelled by remonstrances from England to interfere, and maintain order. As soon, however, as the Protestant Church once more felt herself protected in her plain rights, she began to develop a very remarkable activity in the field of education. The consistory of Paris opened its first school Dec. 31, 1817, with three pupils. But at the same time the first Sunday school in France was founded by a Protestant pastor, and the method of mutual instruction was introduced by Protestant teachers. In 1819 the first Bible Society was founded in France, and met with great sympathy; a Tract Society (1821) and a Society for Evangelical Mission (1822) were also successful. The Society for the Development of Primary Instruction among French Protestants was formed in 1829, and developed rapidly. The first Protestant papers, Archives du Christianisme (1817), and Mélanges de Religion (1820), were established, and proved successful. Less encouraging was the aspect which the internal state of the Church presented. The old orthodoxy still found its firm defenders; but it soon became apparent, even to the staunchest among them, that it would be impossible to maintain a dogmatic system which was at variance with all the reigning ideas of the age, which, indeed, though none as yet attacked it, most had ceased to understand. Religion regained rapidly in the nineteenth century what it had lost in the eighteenth. But a crisis like the French Revolution cannot be gone through without making all the old forms more or less unfit for use. A movement was necessary; but it was a misfortune that it should come from without, and come at a moment when the Church was bereft of its principal organ of authority, the national synod.

The first who attempted the evangelization of France were disciples of Wesley. In 1790 they founded several small missionary stations in Normandy and Bretagne; but during the reign of Napoleon their activity almost ceased. After the battle of Waterloo, however, they immediately resumed work, and a church was built at Cherbourg. They labored with prudence and moderation; but it was, nevertheless, easy to see, that, if they succeeded, the result of their labor would be the establishment of a number of independent churches, and the breaking-up of the Reformed Church of France. In 1825 Guizot characterized the situation as merely involving a difference between those who looked at the primitive, and those who looked at the progressive, in the common religion. But the characterization was too mild: independent churches were at that moment formed or forming in Lyons, Havre, Strassburg, St. Etienne, etc. In 1834 the consistory of Paris took some steps in order to organize an authoritative representation of the Reformed Church of France, and thereby procure a revision of her organic law. In 1839 the minister of worship and public instruction made a similar attempt, but both in vain; and when, finally, an unofficial synod was assembled in 1848, the actual split took place. There were at that moment three parties within the Church: one, the Latitudinarians, whose principal object was the maintenance of the national Church; another, the Revivalists, who considered a separation unavoidable when the cause of true religion should be truly served; and a third, which considered it possible to reach the object of the Revivalists by the means of the Latitudinarians. The synod assembled Sept. 11, 1848; but when the assembly altogether refused to attempt the establishment of a clear and positive confession of faith, F. Monod and Count Gasparin retired, and invited, a month later, the Protestant Church to meet at a new synod the following year. At this synod, which assembled Aug. 20, 1849, thirteen churches perfectly constituted, and eighteen churches in process of formation, were represented; an explicit confession of faith was adopted, and the Union des Eglises évangéliques de France was constituted. The imperial decree of March 26, 1852, made considerable changes in the organization of the Reformed Church in France (thus it gave back to the parishioners the right to elect their pastor); but on the development of the internal life of the Church it had no influence. The last hope of healing the split was the convocation of a national synod such as had not met since the synod of Loudun, 1659.

June 6, 1872, the thirtieth national synod met in Paris, but not under the most favorable auspices. All relations had ceased for several years between the orthodox and the liberal; and the incessant polemics had caused many to entirely forget that they were members of the same church. A vehement debate arose on the question of the confession of faith. By a vote of sixty-one against forty-five, a short confession was adopted, and its subscription made obligatory on all young pastors. But the result of this vote was, that, when the synod assembled in a second session (Nov. 20, 1873), the seats of the left stood empty, and the liberal party was represented only by a protest laid on the table. There was, however, on both sides, among the orthodox as well as among the liberals, a strong feeling against a schism, even though it might be effected without the separating party losing any of the advantages which accrue to the Church from its connection with the State. In a circular of Nov. 12, 1874, the liberals declared that the difference between the orthodox and themselves was not a question of faith, but simply a question of authority in matters of faith; that though, on account of this difference, there had arisen factions within the Reformed Church, these factions were not sects, etc. Equally conciliatory are the orthodox in their expressions; but there is nevertheless very little hope at present that a new national synod will be able to bring about a full and thorough agreement.

FRANCIS OF ASSISI, St., was b. at Assisi, 1182; d. there Oct. 4, 1226. His true name was Giovanni Francesco Bernardone. His father was a rich merchant. Handsome, bright, and adventurous, with a keen relish of beauty in all its manifestations, but disinclined to serious work of any description, he grew up without learning any thing, became the leader of a club (corti) of the gay youths of Assisi, served in a campaign against Perugia, and was taken prisoner, etc. But a heavy sickness which befell him brought a change into his life. He retired into solitude; and when again he appeared in the world it was as a nurse to the sick, selecting such as suffered from contagious or disgusting diseases. He made a pilgrimage to Rome; and, while there, a voice from above seemed to say to him that he should go and restore the ruined house of God. He took the words in their literal meaning; and, with the money which he begged together, he rebuilt a small decayed church in his native city (the Portiuncula), which ever after remained his favorite residence. A sermon he heard on Matt. x. 9, 10, opened up a new channel to his energy. He determined to become a preacher, to restore the ruined house of God in a higher sense of the word; and fitted out like one of the apostles, without shoes, and with no staff (for he had already some time ago disinherited himself), he began to preach penitence in the streets of Assisi. He made an impression. Other young men joined him; and in 1210 he lived with ten followers in hermitages near the Portiuncula Church. For these ten followers he wrote a set of rules containing the common monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, but emphasizing the first point with particular stress. He then repaired to Rome, to have his rules confirmed, and his society recognized, by the Pope; but he obtained only the verbal assent of Innocent III. Shortly after his return from Rome, however, he was joined by Clara Sciffi, the foundress of the order of the Clarisses (which article see); and this circumstance threw great lustre both over his person and his enterprise. In 1212 he sent out the brethren, two and two, to reform the world by preaching penitence. He went himself to Tuscany. In Perugia, Pisa, and Florence he found many followers; in Cortona he was able to found the first Franciscan monastery; from the Count of Casentino he received Monte Albano as a present. But the five brethren he had sent to Morocco to preach the gospel to the Mohammedans were martyred; and he now determined to go thither himself. In Spain, however, through which he took his way, he was detained by sickness, and compelled to return. Meanwhile, the order grew steadily and rapidly in Italy. At the general assembly of the order, in 1219, no less than five thousand members came together; and brethren were sent to Spain, Egypt, Africa, Greece, England, and Hungary. Hitherto every attempt the order had made to penetrate into Germany had failed. But in 1221, Cæsarius of Spire, with twelve other brethren of German descent, went to Germany; and from that moment the order took root in the country. In the same year Francis himself set out for Egypt, and actually preached before the Sultan, though without any effect. The success of the order was now fully assured; and the Pope was consequently willing to transform his verbal assent into official acknowledgment. By a bull of 1223 Honorius III. confirmed the rules, and sanctioned the order, and Francis was made its first general. In the very next year, however, he left the government of the order to Elias of Cartona, and retired to the Portiuncula Church, where he died. He was canonized in 1228 by Gregory IX.

LIT. — His Opuscula were published by WADDING, Antwerp, 1623, and often afterwards. His life was first written by THOMAS OF CELANO, only three years after his death: this, together with that by Bonaventura, is found in Acta Sanctorum, Oct. II. Modern lives are by F. FRANCIS OF PAULA, St., b. at Paula, Naples, 1416; d. at Plessis-les-Tours, France, April 2, 1507; entered, when he was twelve years old, the Franciscan monastery of San Marco, in Calabria, and became in a short time a great virtuoso in fasting and other ascetic practices. When he was fourteen years old, he retired to a cave on the seashore, where he lived as a hermit; and when he was twenty, so great a number of hermits had gathered around him, that he could constitute them an order, and give them a rule. They were to outshine the Franciscans in austerity; and to the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience was added a fourth one, of perpetual fasting; that is, of refraining not only from all kinds of flesh, but also from milk, butter, cheese, eggs, etc. The order was confirmed in 1474 by Sixtus IV., under the name of the "Hermits of St. Francis," which by Alexander VI. was changed to that of the "Minims," and Francis was made its superior. His fame as a miracle-worker was so great, that Louis XI., on his death-bed, had him brought to France, and implored him to prolong his life; which, however, he refused to try. Charles VIII. also held him in great favor; and he remained in France, where he founded several monasteries. He was canonized by Leo X. in 1519. See HILARION DE COSTE: Le portrait de S. François de Paul, Paris, 1635; FR. GIRY: Vie de S. François de Paul, Paris, 1680; Act. Sanct., April; [ROLLAND: Histoire de Saint François de Paule, 2d ed., Paris, 1876]. See MINIMS. ZÖCKLER.

FRANCIS OF SALES, St., b. at Sales, Savoy, 1567; d. at Lyons, Dec. 28, 1622; studied law and theology in Paris and Padua; entered the church against the will of his parents; was ordained a priest in 1591, and appointed a member of the chapter of the Bishop of Geneva, who, since the victory of the Reformation in that city, resided at the neighboring Annecy. Very successful in re-establishing the Roman Church in the Chablais and the Pays de Gex, he acquired a great fame as a missionary among the Protestants. He even tried to convert Beza; and his Roman biographers assert that the number of his Protestant converts amounted to seventy-two thousand. He was, at all events, one of the most energetic and influential representatives of the Roman-Catholic re-action which set in immediately after the Reformation. In 1599 he was made co-adjutor to the Bishop of Geneva, and in 1602 he became Bishop of Geneva himself. In 1604 he founded, together with Madame de Chantal, the order of the Visitants. With Sister Angelica of Port Royal, he also maintained very intimate relations. As a writer he is a precursor of Molinos and Fénelon, the first representatives of the so-called Quietism. His collected works have often been published; e.g., in Paris, 1836 (4 vols.), again in 1874 sq. He was canonized in 1665, and made a doctor of the church in 1877 by Pius IX. His life was written by Marsollier, [Hamon (Paris, 1854), and Pérennés (Paris, 1864)]. FRANCIS XAVIER, b. at Xavier, in Navarre, April 7, 1506; d. in Canton, China, Dec. 2, 1552; was a teacher of Aristotelian philosophy in Paris when he became acquainted with Loyola; and was one of the original members of the Compagnia Jesu. Until the order was confirmed by the Pope, he labored in the hospitals of Northern Italy. He then went as a missionary to the East Indies. April 7, 1541, he left Portugal, and May 6, 1542, he landed at Goa. Seven years he spent in the Indies and the Malayan Archipelago. In 1549 he went to Japan, where he spent two years; and in 1552 he went to China, where he died. The immediate result of his missionary labor was, perhaps, not so very great, as he did not understand the languages, but was compelled to use an interpreter: at all events, it seems a great exaggeration to call him the apostle of the Indies, and to compare him with Paul. But indirectly he exercised a great influence by organizing and consolidating the Portuguese mission in the Indies, and by opening up Japan and China to the Christian missionaries. The principal source of his life is his Letters, the best edition of which is that of Bologna (1795). His life was written by Tursellini, 1596; Joar de Lucena, 1600; Bontours, 1682; Reithmeyer, 1846 (Roman-Catholic); and by Venn, 1862, and W. Hoffmann, 1869 (Protestant). G. PLITT.

FRANCIS, Convers, D.D., a Unitarian clergyman; b. at West Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 9, 1795; d. at Cambridge, April 7, 1863. He graduated at Harvard in 1815; was pastor of the Unitarian Church in Watertown from 1819 to 1842, and professor of "pulpit eloquence and pastoral care" at Harvard from 1842 until his death. He published some lectures, and wrote the biographies of Rev. John Eliot and Sebastian Råle for SPARKS'S Am. Biogr.

FRANCISCANS (Minorites, Gray Friars, in England and Ireland, sometimes also the Seraphic Brethren), The Order of the, was founded by St. Francis of Assisi in 1210, and confirmed by Honorius III. in 1223. In the middle of the thirteenth century it had eight thousand monasteries, with two hundred thousand monks.

This extraordinary success was due to various causes. Immediately after his death, the founder of the order was transformed into a kind of divinity in the eyes of the time. The story that Christ had appeared to him on Monte Alverno, and imprinted on his hands and feet the stigmata of the crucifixion, was universally believed. Pope Alexander IV. and St. Clara had seen the marks; Gregory IX., Nicholas III., Benedict XII., Paul V., vouched for the truth. When Bonaventura wrote his life of St. Francis, the most incredible fictions would be easily believed when told of the "seraphic" saints; and in 1399 Bartholomew Albizzi actually instituted a comparison between Christ and St. Francis, in his Liber Conformitatum. Of still greater effect were the enormous privileges which the popes granted to the order. Already in 1222 Honorius III. allowed the Franciscans to celebrate service, though with closed doors, in places which were under the ban. Soon after, they obtained the right to preach wherever they liked without first procuring the consent of the bishop or the parish priest. They were permitted to hear confession, and give absolution; and, in the same year they were constituted as an order, they received the Portiuncula indulgence; that is, every one who visited the Portiuncula Church on the anniversary of its consecration (Aug. 2) received absolution. But, beyond these and other favorable circumstances, the very idea on which the order was based, the very principle on which it worked, corresponded to the deepest wants of the time. Everybody felt that reform was necessary; and the humble, miserable Franciscan, clad in rags, but filled with holy enthusiasm, struck everybody as the reformer.

But success always engenders jealousy; and the Dominicans were the born rivals of the Franciscans. The two orders fought for a time cordially together, side by side, as long as they had a common object; namely, to get access to the universities. But hardly were Bonaventura the Franciscan, and Thomas Aquinas the Dominican, installed as doctores theologiæ at the university of Paris, before a strongly marked scientific difference between the two orders became apparent, and it continued to separate them during the whole period of the middle ages. The Franciscans were realists; the Dominicans, nominalists: the Franciscans leaned towards Semi-Pelagianism; the Dominicans were ardent disciples of Augustine: the Franciscans were Scotists; the Dominicans were Thomists: in the debate on the immaculate conception of Mary, the Franciscans said Yes, and the Dominicans, No. But the difference was by no means confined to the sphere of science: it came to many vexatious and sometimes ridiculous outbursts of rivalry between the two orders also in practical life.

Of much greater importance, however, was the difference which arose within the order itself almost immediately after its foundation. The absolute poverty which the founder had ordered seemed to some to be a mere impediment to the success of the order; while by others it was vindicated as the very character of the order. There thus arose two parties, — a milder, headed by Elias of Cortona; and a severer, headed by Casarius of Spire (see H. RYBKA, Elias von Cortona, Leipzig, 1874); and the contest between these two parties not only threw the order itself into confusion, but at times also involved the Pope and the kings in serious difficulties. Nicholas III. attempted a reconciliation by the bull Exiit, 1279, in which he explained, that though the Franciscans were not allowed to own things, they were, of course, allowed to use things; that the real owner of all the treasures, grounds, buildings, etc., which the order had amassed, was the Pope; and that the members of the order only had the use of these treasures by his permission, etc. This subtle distinction did not satisfy the severer party. Under the leadership of John of Oliva they raised a violent opposition to the bull and to the general of the order, Matthias of Aquas Spartas, who headed the milder party. The latter was victorious, however; and the Spiritualists, as the severer party was called, were cruelly persecuted. In Naples they were expelled; and in many places they were seized by the Inquisition, tortured, and burnt. Nevertheless, they continued their resistance, and under John XXII. the strife broke out with renewed vehemence; the general, Michael of Cesena, being this time at the head of the Spiritualists (see E. GUDENATZ, Michael von Cesena, Breslau, 1876). The result was a permanent split in the order. The Observants, the severer party, were formally recognized by the Council of Constance in its nineteenth sitting (Sept. 23, 1415); and Leo X., after an ineffectual attempt to gather the whole order under one observance, constituted the milder party, the Conventuals, an independent congregation, by a bull of 1517. Each division obtained its own superior; though that of the Observants (the minister generalis) took rank before that of the Conventuals (the magister generalis).

In another respect these internal differences contributed much to keep the order alive; and the frequent formation of more or less independent congregations proved the presence of an active principle of development and reform. By the Reformation the order lost heavily, and a great number of its convents were broken up. Nevertheless, at the beginning of the eighteenth century it still numbered about a hundred and fifteen thousand monks; and its monasteries are still flourishing, from the interior of Russia to the interior of America. It has produced five popes (Nicholas IV., Alexander V., Sixtus IV., Sixtus V., and Clement XIV.), a considerable number of theologians (Bonaventura, Alexander of Hales, Ockham, etc.), and of poets, Thomas de Celano, the author of Dies ira, Jacopone da Todi, the author of Stabat mater, etc. (See OZANAM, Les poètes franciscains en Italie, Paris, 1852.)

LIT. — The history of the order has been written by an Irish Franciscan, LUCAS WADDING (Annales minorum s. trium ordinum a. s. Francisco institutorum), 17 vols., Rome, 1731–41, reaching to 1540, and continued to 1553 by I. DE LUCA. See also the works of HELYOT (vol. vii.) and HENRIOT-FEHR and F. FRANCK, Sebastian, b. at Donauwörth, 1499; d. at Basel, 1542; was appointed evangelical preacher at Gastenfeld, near Nuremberg, 1525, but resigned this position in 1528, and followed for some time the Anabaptists. Dissatisfied with them, too, he separated from them, and determined to belong to no party-church, but to devote his life to a literary representation of the ideal, the truly spiritual church. Sustaining himself and his family, first by running a soap-factory, and afterwards by working a printing-press, he published Chronika, Zeitbuch und Geschichtsbibel, Strassburg, 1531, the first German world's-history; Weltbuch, Cosmographie, Tubingen, 1534, the first German geography; and a great number of mystico-theological books, — Paradoxa, Die güldene Arch, Das Kriegsbüchlein, etc. But as these books contained very sharp criticisms, not only of the Roman, but also of the Reformed, churches, the author was bitterly persecuted, and driven from place to place. Nevertheless, his books became popular in the true sense of the word, and many of them are still living among the people. See C. A. HASE, Sebastian Franck, der Schwarmgeist, Leipzig, 1869.

FRANCKE, August Hermann, b. at Lübeck, March 23, 1663; d. at Halle, June 8, 1727; studied theology at Erfurt, Kiel, and Leipzig, where, together with Paul Anton, he founded the famous Collegium Philobiblicum. The spiritual direction which he ever afterwards followed he received from Spener, whom he met in 1688; and the success he achieved, and the enmity he aroused, at the very beginning of his career, were due to his "Pietism." In 1689 he began to lecture on the Epistles of St. Paul in the university of Leipzig, and his lectures attracted extraordinarily great audiences; but in 1690 they were forbidden by the faculty. In that year he was called as preacher to Erfurt, and, when he preached, the church was crowded; but he was suddenly ordered to leave the city within twenty-four hours. In 1691, however, he was appointed professor at the newly-founded university of Halle, first in Oriental languages, and afterwards in theology; and there, the homestead of Pietism, he was allowed to develop all his energy undisturbed and in peace. [Of his works several have been translated into English, such as Manuductio ad Lectionem Scripture Sacre, Halle, 1693, by Jacques, London, 1813; Nicodemus, a Treatise against the Fear of Man, London, 1709; and Footsteps of Divine Providence, London, 1797.] But it was less as a writer than as a teacher and practical philanthropist that Francke exercised his great influence. On Nov. 5, 1695, he received an orphan into his house; but, before the month ran out, he had nine, and twelve before New Year. The number steadily increasing, a neighboring house was bought, and, as this also soon proved too small, the foundation was laid, on July 24, 1698, of the Orphan Asylum, — the first and one of the greatest establishments of the kind. In 1695 he also opened a small children's school in his house. In 1698 the school numbered five hundred pupils, eleven hundred in 1709, over two thousand at the death of the master. In the same manner developed the printing-press and publishing establishment, which he connected with the Orphan Asylum: it is now one of the greatest publishing establishments of Germany. For the various foundations of Francke, see Die Stiftungen A. H. Franckes, Halle, 1863. An important source for his life and character is KRAMER: Beiträge zur Geschichte A. H. Franckes, Halle, 1861, containing his correspondence with Spener; Neue Beiträge, 1875 [and a Life of Francke, Halle, 1880 sq.]. A good biography of him is that by GUERICKE, Halle, 1827 [Eng. trans., London, 1837]. There are numerous minor sketches. KRAMER.

FRANK, Jacob Joseph, a Hebrew sectary; b. in Poland, 1712; d. in Offenbach, Austria, Dec. 10, 1791. He acquired fame as an expounder of the Cabala, but accepted the doctrine of the Trinity, and founded a sect whose tenets are a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. He was compelled to declare himself a Christian, and was accordingly baptized into the Roman-Catholic Church at Warsaw, Dec. 25, 1759. A charge of heresy led to his imprisonment; and he was not released until 1773, when the Russians invaded Poland. He emigrated to Austria, was wonderfully successful in attracting followers, and by them was enabled to live in princely splendor. He pretended to be the Messiah, and his followers believed him to be immortal. See GRÄTZ: Frank und die Frankisten, Breslau, 1868.

FRANKENBERG, Johann Heinrich, was b. at Grossglogau, in Silesia, Sept. 18, 1726; d. at Breda, in Holland, June 11, 1804; studied theology in his native city and in Rome, and was made co-adjutor to the archbishop of Goertz 1749, archbishop of Malines 1759, and cardinal 1778. He was one of the most decided opponents against the church policy of Joseph II. The question was about the abolition of the episcopal seminaries, and the establishment of a general seminary, under royal superintendence, at Louvain. Frankenberg protested, and continued to protest, until the whole country was brought almost into open revolt. He also opposed the Revolution, and was by the Convent sentenced to deportation, but escaped by flight. See AUGUSTIN THEINER, Der Kardinal Frankenberg, Freiburg, 1850. KLÜPFEL.

FRANKFURT CONCORDAT. See CONCORDAT.

FRANKFURT, The Council of, was convened by Charlemagne, in 794, at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, and was attended, according to later writers, by three hundred bishops, from Germany, Gaul, England, Spain, and Italy, and two delegates of the Pope. Fifty-six canons are ascribed to it, the most important of which are, — the first, condemning Felix and Elipandus, the leaders of the Adoptionists; and the second, condemning the decisions of the second Council of Nicæa (787) concerning image-worship, which had been accepted by the Pope. See MANSI, Concil., XIII.

FRANKINCENSE (Hebrew, lebana), the odorous resin of trees of the genus Boswellia, which grew in India and Arabia (Isa. lx. 6; Jer. vi. 20), and perhaps also in Palestine (Song of Songs iv. 14); was not only used as perfume (Song of Solomon iii. 6), but also for fumigation in sacrifices (Lev. ii. 2, 16, v. 11; Isa. xliii. 23, lxvi. 3), and was one of the ingredients in the perfume which was to be prepared for the sanctuary (Exod. xxx. 34). It was offered both morning and evening (Exod. xxx. 7 sq.), and used as an accompaniment of the meat offering (Lev. ii. 1, 16, vi. 15, xxiv. 7; Num. v. 15). Being one of the daily necessities, frankincense was often given as a freewill offering (1 Chron. ix. 29; Neh. xiii. 5, 9; Jer. xvii. 26, xli. 5). From its fragrant odor when burnt, the incense came to be an emblem of prayer (Ps. cxli. 2; Luke i. 10; Rev. v. 8, viii. 3). From notices of ancient writings we see that frankincense was also used in the religious services of the heathen. On the plant, comp. BOYDWOOD, The Genus Boswellia, London, 1870. It is called frank, because of the freeness with which it burns, and gives forth its odors.

FRANKS, The, was the name of a wild, warlike, and cruel, but highly gifted Germanic race, which, divided into several branches (the Salian Franks, the Riparian Franks, etc.), lived, during the third century after Christ, on the right shore of the Rhine, along its middle and lower course. When Carausius conquered Brittany, and drew the legions away from Belgium, the Salian Franks crossed the Rhine; and though Roman historians tell us that they were often defeated by Constantius, Constantine, and Julian, they were never thrown back beyond the Rhine. In 406 they began to advance towards the west and the south; and in 486, Chlodwig, the son of Childeric, the son of Merowig, who in 481, when only fifteen years old, had succeeded his father as chief of the Salian Franks, defeated Syagrius, the Roman governor of Gaul, at Soissons, and extended the Frankish Empire to the Loire. In Gaul the Franks met with a remarkable after-bloom of the classical civilization; and though for centuries they remained rude and coarse and cruel to the very core of their being, yet so completely did they yield to the mental superiority of the conquered race, that, even before 490, Latin had become their official language, — the language in which their famous law, Lex Saliæ, was written down. In Gaul the Franks also met with Christianity; and though Chlodwig allowed his men to burn and plunder the Christian churches, he nevertheless stood in great awe of the Christian bishops. In 493 he married Chlothilde, a Burgundian princess, and a Christian. Their children were baptized; and Chlodwig, like many of his men, was hesitating with respect to this new and strange religion, when an incident decided his course. He was compelled in 496 to give battle to the Alemanni; and on the issue of this battle depended the very existence of the Frankish Empire in Gaul. But the Franks wavered; and in this emergency Chlodwig made a vow to the God of the Gauls, that, if he gained the victory, he would become a Christian. The victory he gained, and he and many of his men were baptized. But in this, as in so many other cases of conversion, the way from the baptism to a thorough Christianization was very long, a distance of several centuries.

FRATERNITIES (Fraternitas, Sodalitas) are associations formed in the Roman-Catholic Church for special religious purposes, such as nursing the sick, supporting the poor, practising some special devotion, etc., but of a less rigorous description than the monastic orders. They have their own statutes, religious exercises, privileges, etc.; but they stand under the authority of the bishops, and are only morally separated from the world. Such a fraternity, dedicated to Mary the Virgin, is mentioned by Odo, Bishop of Paris, about 1208; another, the so-called “Gonfalonieri,” was confirmed by Clement V., 1265–71. Among the most prominent were those of the Scapulary, the Rosary, Corpus Christi, etc. One, the Fratres Pontifices, was formed for the purpose of procuring good bridges across the water-courses. The fraternities may be divided into four classes. 1. Those which particularly relate to the worship of Christ, such as the fraternities of The Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, of The Most Holy Heart of Jesus, of The Most Holy Name of Jesus, The Holy Five Wounds, etc. 2. Those which pay particular honor unto the Virgin Mary. They are very numerous. The most famous one, and one of the most celebrated in modern times, is The Fraternity of the Most Holy and Immaculate Heart of Mary for the Conversion of Sinners, founded in Paris, 1837, by Abbé Dufriche Desgenettes. 3. Those formed for the honor of particular saints — very numerous. 4. Those that are charitable.

FRATRICELLI, FRATICELLI. Wishing to put an end to the split in the Franciscan order, which had prevailed for the larger part of the thirteenth century, Celestine V. authorized the brothers Petrus de Macerata and Petrus de Faro Sempronio, and some other Italian Spirituals, to form an independent congregation under the name of Pauperes Eremitæ Domini Celestini. This congregation was heavily persecuted by the rest of the Franciscans, and finally dissolved by Boniface VIII.; but, excited by Peter Olivi's apocalyptic prophecies and vehement invectives against the Pope, the hermits, now generally called “Fratricelli,” determined to resist. They declared that there had been no true pope since Celestine. They pushed the vow of poverty to the extreme, whence they were often called “Bizochi,” from the Italian bizochi, French besace, a “beggar's sack.” They entered into communication with the Beghards, and taught that they were possessed of the Holy Spirit, and exempt from sin; that they needed neither penitence nor sacraments, etc. An attempt of Clement V. to re-unite the Spirituals with the Franciscans failed in 1312; and meanwhile the Fraticelli grew more and more unmanageable. In 1314 they expelled by force the Franciscans from the monasteries of Béziers and Narbonne. This caused John XXII. to adopt severer measures against them. In 1317 the Inquisition was ordered to step in. In Italy, Sicily, and Southern France, where they had spread widely, a number of Fraticelli were seized by the Inquisition between 1318 and 1352, condemned, and burnt. Only a few were willing to recant. But after the middle of the fourteenth century they gradually disappeared. By later writers they, like all heretical sects, have been accused of various abominable vices; but there are no proofs.

C. SCHMIDT.

FRAYSSINOUS, Denys, b. at Curières, in Gascony, May 9, 1765; d. at St. Geniès, also in Gascony, Dec. 12, 1841; studied theology, and appeared, after the conclusion of the concordat of 1801, as one of the most zealous and most successful agitators for the Roman-Catholic Church, and against the reigning atheism and materialism. In 1809 he was forbidden to continue his conferences in the Church of St. Sulpice, in Paris; but he resumed his work after the Restoration, and was made grand-almoner to Louis XVIII., Bishop of Hermopolis in partibus infidelium, peer of France, and minister of public instruction from 1821 to 1828. He went into exile with Charles X., and after his return to France he lived in retirement. His principal works are, Les vrais principes de l'église gallicane, 1818 (in which he proves himself a staunch defender of the principles of Gallicanism), and Defense de Christianisme, 1828, translated into English, London, 1836, 2 vols.

FREDERICK III., THE WISE, Elector of Saxony 1486–1525; was b. at Torgau, Jan. 17, 1463; and d. at Lochau, May 5, 1525. He was a man of common sense, probity, and firmness, and much respected, both in the realm and among foreign princes. One of the most consequential of his acts as a ruler was the foundation, in 1502, of the university of Wittenberg, and the appointment of Luther and Melancthon as professors. It was by no means his intention, however, to make his new university a school of reform: on the contrary, he was as yet a true son of Rome. In 1493 he had made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and brought back five thousand pieces of relics for the church of Wittenberg. Nevertheless, when Luther, in 1517, nailed his theses on the church-door in Wittenberg, the elector kept quiet; and when the Roman curia, in 1518, demanded that Luther should be sent to Rome to be punished for heresy, the elector refused: yea, when Dr. Eck returned from Rome in 1519 with the bull of excommunication against Luther, the elector declined to lend his aid to its enforcement; and, when Luther publicly and solemnly burnt this same bull, the elector saw no reason why he should interfere. The greatest service, however, which Frederick the Wise did to the cause of the Reformation was the removal of Luther to the Wartburg after the Diet of Worms, probably the only means of protecting him against the Pope and the emperor. There was in this policy, — so firm, so consistent, and yet so cautious, — no doubt, a high political wisdom; but there was also something else. A spark of Luther's conviction had fallen into Frederick's soul; and shortly before he died he took the Lord's Supper under both forms. See TUTZSCHMANN: Friedrich der Weise, Grimma, 1848; G. SPALATIN: Fried. d. W., ed. by Neudecker and Preller, Jena, 1851; [CARL BECKER: Das edle sächsische Fürsten-Kleeblatt, Berlin, 1861; K. FREDERICK III., THE PIOUS, Elector of the Palatinate, 1559-76; was educated by Bishop Eberhard of Liège, and at the court of Charles V., but was, nevertheless, early impressed by the ideas of the Reformation. In 1537 he married the Lutheran Princess Maria of Brandenburg-Bayreuth, and in 1549 he openly embraced Lutheranism. On his accession he found the Lutheran Church almost fully established in the Palatinate; but, shortly after, a violent controversy broke out between the Lutheran and the Reformed theologians, concerning the Lord's Supper. Frederick asked Melancthon to interfere; but the memoir which Melancthon wrote approached the ideas of Zwingli or Calvin so closely, that Frederick himself became wavering. The religious disputation at Heidelberg (1560) completed his conversion; and, as his people also seemed inclined to Calvinism, the festivals of Mary and the saints were abolished; the altars, organs, baptismal fonts, images, etc., disappeared from the churches; Calvinists were appointed as teachers and preachers; the government of the church was confided to a council-board, consisting of three ecclesiastical and three lay members, etc. In 1562 appeared the Heidelberg Catechism, written by Ursinus and Olevianus, but under the eyes of the elector himself; and it found so much favor, that it immediately was translated into French, English, Dutch, and Latin, and adopted almost by the whole body of the Reformed Church. An attempt was made by the Lutheran princes of the empire to prevent the establishment of Calvinism in the Palatinate; and they even went so far as to threaten the elector with war and deposition. But at the diet of Augsburg (1566) he met them with such courage and straightforwardness, that the case was dropped. To the end of his life he was a great support to the Reformed Church, both in France and in the Netherlands. See his life, by

FREE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND. See SCOTLAND, FREE CHURCH OF.

FREE CONGREGATIONS (Friends of Light, Protestant Friends) were formed in Prussia during the fifth decade of the present century, as the result of a rationalistic re-action against the revival of positive Christianity. Under the presidency of Uhlich, pastor of Pömmelte, near Magdeburg, a number of pastors belonging to the old rationalistic school assembled in 1841, first at Gnadau, and then at Halle; agreed upon a platform of nine strongly pronounced rationalistic propositions; adopted the name of Friends of Light, afterwards Protestant Friends; and decided upon the publication of a periodical, — Blätter für christliche Erbauung. At their seventh meeting at Coethen (1844), a hundred and thirty theologians and about five hundred laymen were present. Uhlich delivered a lecture, in which he openly rejected the doctrines of hereditary sin, atonement, the trinity, the divinity of Christ, and the Church. He was followed by Wislicenus, pastor at Halle, and a rationalist of a younger stamp, but of a still deeper dye. The stand-point of Wislicenus was a popularized form of the pantheism of the young Hegelian school; and in his lecture, Ob Schrift? Ob Geist? he broke with the church of which he was a servant, and which establishes Scripture as the rule of faith. The authorities then interfered; and in 1845 Wislicenus separated from the Established Church of Prussia, and formed a free congregation at Halle. Other free congregations were formed by Uhlich at Magdeburg, by Rupp at Königsberg, and at other places, often accompanied with rather tumultuous expressions of enthusiasm. A combination was, however, brought about with the German Catholics in 1847; and in 1848 the leaders of the movement found themselves in the Parliament, and generally in the political arena as the leaders of the nation. But when the revolution was over, and the re-action set in, a great change took place. While Uhlich, Wislicenus, Rupp, and, indeed, most of the leaders, gradually moved onward from one negation to another, until at last they ended in complete nihilism, without any positive basis at all, teaching a religion without any God, and forming congregations without any faith, the government began to suspect the congregations as political instruments. In Saxony and Bavaria they were completely suppressed; and in Prussia they lived on, only under great difficulties, and affiliating themselves with atheists and materialists. In 1868, however, there were a hundred and twenty-one free congregations in Germany, with about twenty-five thousand members. In the United States of America there are also found some free German congregations, — in Philadelphia, St. Louis, Hoboken, — which mostly act in unison, more or less cordial, with the various free-thinker associations. KAHNIS.

FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION, established in Boston, Mass., May 30, 1867, aims at the emancipation of religion from all sectarian limits, the reconciliation of faiths, and the application of the scientific method to the study of theology. Mr. O. B. Frothingham was the first president. Each member holds and defends in their meetings those views upon the various subjects which come before the association which he deems truest. The utmost liberty of opinion is given. The elastic nature of the organization, for "any person desiring to co-operate" is "considered a member," renders exact statistics impossible. Up to this time (1882) the association has not attempted to organize local societies, but contented itself with holding conventions, and distributing publications. From 1867 to 1880 the Annual Report was issued in pamphlet form: since then it has been published in the Index of Boston, Mass.

FREE SPIRIT, Brethren of. See BRETHREN OF THE FREE SPIRIT.

FREETHINKERS, a general designation denoting a class of writers and thinkers who deny the truth of revealed religion. The term was applied primarily to the deists of England. A letter to Locke, in 1697, refers to Toland as "a candid freethinker." In 1713 Antony Collins published his work, entitled A Discourse of Freethinking, occasioned by the Rise and Growth of a Sect called Freethinkers. The term "free thought" is often used in a broad sense for all rationalism and infidelity. See A. S. FARRAR, Hist. of Free Thought (Bampton Lectures), Lond., 1863. See DEISM.

FREEWILL BAPTISTS, a denomination of American Christians who baptize by immersion, and are Arminian in doctrine.

History.—The first Freewill-Baptist Church was organized at New Durham, N.H., in 1780, by Benjamin Randall (1749–1808). Converted under the preaching of Whitefield, Randall joined the Baptist Church. In 1779 he was called to account for holding to an unlimited atonement and the freedom of the will, and was disfellowshipped. He was ordained in 1780, and at once began to propagate his views. A sect with similar tenets had been organized in 1751, in North Carolina, under the preaching of Shubael Stearns, and were called "The Separate Baptists." Randall's followers continued to claim to be Baptists; but the claim was repudiated by the original Baptists, who called them "Freewillers,"—a designation which they themselves subsequently adopted. In 1827 the first General Conference was held: and the body has extended to Canada, New Brunswick, and Nova Scotia.

Doctrine and Polity.—The Freewill Baptists agree in all the fundamental Christian doctrines with other evangelical denominations. With the regular Baptists they practise baptism by immersion. They differ from the Baptists on the questions of predestination, the extent of the atonement, and the ability of the sinner to repent. On these points their Book of Faith thus expresses the views of the denomination: "God has ordained man with power of free choice, and governs him by moral laws and motives; and this power of free choice is the exact measure of his responsibility. All events are present with God from everlasting to everlasting; but his knowledge of them does not in any sense cause them, nor does he decree all events which he knows will occur" (chap. iii. 2, 3). "The call of the Gospel is co-extensive with the atonement to all men, both by word and the strivings of the Spirit: so that salvation is rendered equally possible to all; and, if any fail of eternal life, the fault is wholly their own" (chap. viii.). While they hold to regeneration, they deny the doctrine of the perseverance of saints. The Freewill Baptists differ also from the Baptists in practising open communion.

The church has an ordained ministry, and heretofore individual churches have ordained ministers; but the Conference of 1880 deprecated this practice, and called upon the churches to proceed on such occasions with the advice of the Quarterly Meetings. The church adopts a form of government intermediate between the Congregational and the Presbyterian. The individual churches are independent organizations, governed by elders and deacons, and alone have authority over their members. There is no court of appeal for the member. There are three associate church bodies. The Quarterly Meeting is composed of two or more ministers voluntarily bound together. The Yearly Meeting is composed of two or more Quarterly Meetings, and the "General Conference of the Freewill-Baptist Connection" is composed of delegates from the Yearly Meetings, and assembles every three years, in the month of October. Each of these associations may "labor with" the next lower down to the church "as a body;" but neither has appellate jurisdiction.

Statistics.—The Freewill Baptist Register and Year-Book for 1886 (Boston, 1886) gives the following numbers: churches 1,490, ordained ministers 1,262, communicants 77,827. Almost one-half of their strength (or 36,000 members) is concentrated in New England. The denomination is much stronger in Maine, where it has 273 churches and 15,420 communicants, than in any other State. The denomination maintains flourishing institutions at Lewiston, Me. (Bates College), and Hillsdale, Mich.; also has colleges at Ridgeville, Ind., and Rio Grande, O.; and maintains a mission in India, with eight missionaries and four assistants. The Freewill or Free Baptists numbered in 1885 11,601 members in New Brunswick, and 3,600 in Nova Scotia. See STEWART: History of the Freewill Baptists (from 1780 to 1830), Dover, 1862; A Treatise on the Faith and Practice of the Freewill Baptists, Dover, 1871; Freewill-Baptist Register and Year-Book, 1886.

FREEMAN, James, D.D., pastor of the first Unitarian Church of New England; b. in Charlestown, Mass., April 22, 1759; d. at Newton, Mass., Nov. 14, 1835. Graduating at Harvard College in 1777, he was called to King's Chapel, then an Episcopal Church, Boston, as pastor, in 1782. He gave up the belief in the Trinity, and, being refused ordination by the bishop, was ordained pastor by his church (1787), which adopted his views. Thus the oldest Episcopal Church in New England became the first Unitarian Church of America. Dr. Freeman was a man of fine social qualities, and much power in the pulpit. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and in 1832 published a volume of Sermons and Addresses. See WARE: Unitarian Biog.; and SPRAGUE'S Theodore, viii. 162.

FRELINGHUYSEN, Hon. Theodore, b. at Millstone, Somerset County, N.J., March 28, 1787;

d. at New Brunswick, N.J., April 12, 1861. He was graduated with the highest honors at Nassau Hall 1804; called to the bar 1808. From 1817 to 1829 he was attorney-general of New Jersey; served a term in the United-States Senate, during which he delivered many eloquent speeches, and displayed in the highest stations his earnest Christian character. He heartily supported all acts tending to ameliorate the condition of the poor and oppressed, or to elevate their moral or religious character. He advocated bills for the improvement of the condition of the Indian tribes, and the suppression of Sunday mails. When his term was ended, he resumed his practice. In 1837 and 1838 he was mayor of Newark, N.J. In 1839 he became chancellor of the University of the City of New York, from which office he went in 1850 to the presidency of Rutgers's College, New Brunswick, N.J., and held it until death. In 1844 he was an unsuccessful candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States on the ticket with Henry Clay for President. At one time he was president of the American Bible Society, the American Tract Society, and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions. "His eloquent tongue was ever ready to plead for every good Christian or humane cause." He was one of the most distinguished Christian laymen of his day. See his Memoir, by the Rev. T. W. CHAMBERS, D.D., N.Y., 1863.

FRENCH CONFESSION OF FAITH. See GALILICAN CONFESSION.

FRENCH PROPHETS were Camisards (see art.), who appeared in England in 1706, and prophesied the speedy establishment of the Messiah's kingdom. For a time they produced a great impression, and won the allegiance of distinguished men, among whom was John Lacey, who, although previously a member of Dr. Calamy's congregation, "entered into all their absurdities, except that of a community of goods, to which he strongly objected, having an income of two thousand pounds per annum." But these prophets overreached themselves by their fanaticism, even going to the length of asserting that one of their number, lately deceased, would rise from the dead upon a certain day. Failure in this and other predictions weakened their hold even on the credulous, and their little day ended in disgrace. FRESENIUS, Johann Philipp, b. at Niederwieschen, near Kreuznach, Oct. 22, 1705; d. at Francfort, July 4, 1761; studied theology at Strassburg; and was appointed minister at Oberwieschen, 1727, court-preacher at Giessen, 1731, and preacher at St. Peter's in Francfort, 1743. The influence which he exercised as a preacher and as a minister in general was very great and beneficial. Several collections of his sermons are still living in the church; such as Die heilsamen Betrachtungen (1750, new edition, 1872), Epistelpredigten (1754, new edition, 1858), etc. He followed the Spener-Francke direction, but was strongly opposed to the Moravian Brethren, against whom he wrote many volumes. His Antiweislingerus against the Jesuits also attracted much attention (1731). His life was written (1743) by K. K. Griesbach, the father of the famous editor of the Greek Testament. Goethe describes him, in the fourth book of Wahrheit u. Dichtung, as a "mild man, of handsome and pleasing appearance, who was universally revered in Francfort as an exemplary minister and good pulpit-orator, but not relished by those who sympathized with the Moravians, because of his attacks upon them." FREYLINGHAUSEN, Johann Anastasius, one of the principal hymnists and leaders of the Pietistic movement in Germany; b. at Gandersheim, near Wolfenbüttel, in Hanover, Dec. 2, 1670; d. at Halle, Feb. 12, 1739. He received from his mother a strictly pious though legalistic education; studied theology at Jena, 1689; became acquainted with Augustus Hermann Francke, the founder of the Orphan House at Halle, married his only daughter, Anastasia, and succeeded him in 1727. In connection with him and Spener he labored for the revival of practical piety in Germany. He combined the activity of an academic teacher, pastor, and superintendent of the benevolent institutions at Halle, and exerted a very salutary influence upon the rising generation. His theological works, of which the Fundamental Theology (Grundlegung der Theologie, 1703) deserves to be mentioned, are not distinguished for any vigor or depth of thought, but for their piety and practical tendency, in opposition to the dry and cold scholasticism which then prevailed in the German universities. His most valuable productions are forty-four hymns, pregnant with Scripture truth, and fervent love to the Saviour. Some of them have passed into common use, and found a place in every good German hymn-book; as, "Wer ist wohl wie du, Jesu süsse Ruh," "Jesus ist kommen, Grund ewiger Freuden," "Mein Herz gieb dich zufrieden," etc. [See translations in Miss Catharine Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, first and second series.] Freylinghausen published also one of the best German hymn-books, in 2 vols., Halle, 1704 and 1713. The historical significance of this collection consists in its pietistic spirit, and the introduction of the element of subjective devotion as a supplement to the older, more objective, and churchly hymns of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

FRIDOLIN or FRIDOLD (also Tridolin or Trudelin, often styled the "First Apostle of Aemania," and still venerated as the patron of the Swiss canton of St. Glarus) was a native of Scotland, and preached Christianity to his heathen countrymen, but repaired afterwards to Poitiers, where he restored the church and congregation of St. Hilary (ruined and corrupted under the influence of Arianism) to their former splendor and purity. Moved by a vision of St. Hilary, he set out for Allemania, and received from Chlodwig an island in the Rhine (Säckingen), where he built a church, and founded a monastery, and where he died. All that is known of Fridolin is drawn from a Life of him written by Balther, a monk of Säckingen, and dedicated to Notker Labeo of St. Gallen, who died 1022; but as this Life is written four centuries after the time of Fridolin, as it presents several chronological difficulties, and is much embellished with legendary ornament, the historical foundation it furnishes is rather slim. The best edition of it is found in MONE: Quellensammlung d. badischen Landesgeschichte, Carlsruhe, 1845, vol. 1. See GELPKE: *Kirchengeschichte d. FRIENDLY ISLANDS. This group, discovered by Tasman, 1643, and named by Capt. Cook, on account of their friendly demeanor towards him, lies in the Southern Pacific, two hundred and fifty miles south-east of the Fiji group. It consists of a hundred and fifty islands with an area of four hundred square miles. The islands are mostly of coral formation, some of them, however, of volcanic origin. Tonga, the largest, is twenty-one by twelve miles, and Vava'u, the second in size, is forty-two miles in circumference. In 1847 the missionaries estimated the population to be fifty thousand. It does not now exceed twenty or twenty-five thousand. These islanders were excellent seamen, and frequently visited the Fiji group to procure wood for the manufacture of boats. They were superior in intelligence to the Fijians, but, with them, cannibals, and far sunken in iniquity. The first missionaries went to them in 1797, of whom several were murdered, and the rest retired in 1800. In 1825 the Wesleyan Missionary Society undertook missionary work amongst them in earnest. In 1834 a revival of great power passed over the islands. King George Tubon was converted, and became an active Christian worker, often occupying the pulpit himself. A great change took place in the habits of the people. Slavery has been utterly abolished, the language has been reduced to writing, schools are scattered through the islands, and education is compulsory. The Christians of the islands early sent missionaries to the Fiji group. In 1869 the contributions of the native churches were £5,689, £3,000 of which were devoted to benevolent and missionary purposes. One of the last reports gave 126 churches, 8,300 communicants, and 17,000 attendants on church.

FRIENDS, Society of. The rise of this body of Christians is one of the most noteworthy events in the religious history of England in the seventeenth century. In the midst of the efforts then made to rescue the Church from the corruptions which had grown up around it, there were men who felt that Luther and Cranmer had not gone far enough, and that there was still much sacerdotalism to be purged away, before the original simplicity of Christianity could be restored. Such men found a leader in George Fox. He and his followers announced as their aim the revival of primitive Christianity; and this phrase remains as the best definition of their work. The privilege of direct access to God, without the intervention of human priest or rite, was revealed to Fox's soul. Having found one, "even Christ Jesus, who could speak to his condition," he longed to impart his discovery of the spirituality of true religion to others, and in 1647 began his labors in public ministry, going forth through England on foot, and at his own charges. His message appears to have been mainly to direct the people to the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, who died for them, and had sent his spirit into their hearts, to instruct and guide them in the things pertaining to life and salvation. "I was sent," he says, "to turn people from darkness to the light, that they might receive Christ Jesus; for, to as many as should receive him in his light, I saw that he would give power to become the sons of God, which I had obtained by receiving Christ. I was to direct people to the Spirit that gave forth the Scriptures, by which they might be led into all truth, and so up to Christ and God, as those had been who gave them forth." To the illumination of the Holy Spirit in the heart he turned the attention of all, as that by which sin was made manifest and reprov'd, duty unfolded, and ability given to run with alacrity and joy in the way of God's commandments. He preached repentance towards God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and showed that one became a true disciple, not by a bare assent of the understanding to the truths contained in the Bible, nor by any outward rite, but by a real change of the heart and affections, through the power of the Holy Spirit. The soil was ready for the seed, and the rapid spread of Fox's doctrines was surprising. All classes flocked to his preaching; and among his converts were persons of the best families in the kingdom, priests of the Established Church, and ministers of other societies, and many men of wealth and learning. For four years Fox was the only minister of the society: the second preacher was Elizabeth Hooton. In the fifth year there were twenty-five preachers; in the seventh, upwards of sixty. Within eight years, ministers of Friends preached in various parts of Europe, in Asia, and in Africa, and heroically endured persecution in Rome, Malta, Austria, Hungary, and other places. Among the noteworthy preachers in the earlier years, Francis Howgill, John Audland, and Samuel Fisher had been clergymen; George Bishop, Richard Hubberthorn, and William Ames, officers in the army; Anthony Pearson and John Crook, justices of peace. The courtly and cultured Penn, and Barclay, a member of a noble family in Scotland, a near relative of the Stuart kings, and a man of thorough classical and patristic scholarship, joined the society about twenty years after its formation. In 1680 the number of Friends in Great Britain was not less than sixty-six thousand.

America was first visited by Friends in 1656,

when Mary Fisher and Anne Austin arrived in Boston from Barbadoes, to which island they had gone to preach the gospel the preceding year. They were charged with holding "very dangerous, heretical, and blasphemous opinions," and were kept in close confinement, at first on the vessel, and afterwards in jail. Their books were burned by the common executioner, and even their persons searched to discover signs of witchcraft. They were then sent back to Barbadoes. In 1660 this same Mary Fisher held an interview with Sultan Mahomet IV., at Adrianople, where he was then encamped with his army. Two days after the banishment of the first Friends from Boston, a vessel having on board eight other Friends arrived from London. They were at once imprisoned, and, eleven weeks afterwards, sent back to England. But, nothing daunted, others of the same faith continued to arrive in New England, to suffer scourging, imprisonment, banishment, and four of their number (William Robinson and Marmaduke Stevenson in 1659, Mary Dyer in 1660, and William Leddra in 1661), death by the gallows. Monthly Meetings had been established in New England before 1660, and in 1661 a Yearly Meeting on Rhode Island, which has been kept up regularly to the present date. New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas were visited very early; and, although there was much persecution, flourishing communities of Friends sprung up. George Fox himself made an extended journey in America in 1671-73. But the most important event in the early history of the society on this continent was the settlement of Pennsylvania by William Penn and a large number of his brethren in faith, beginning in 1682. In 1690 there were about ten thousand Friends in the American Colonies.

While no Friends in England suffered immediate martyrdom, the sum of their persecution was most severe. Between the years 1650 and 1689 fourteen thousand of them were fined and imprisoned; and three hundred and sixty-nine, including the majority of the first preachers, died in jail, "not to mention cruel mockings, buffetings, scourgings, and afflictions innumerable." Never were persecutions borne in a more heroic spirit of endurance, or in a more Christian spirit of forgiveness. Never, too, were the inalienable rights of conscience more bravely asserted, and the privileges of Englishmen more boldly claimed. "The trials of the Friends, and especially that of John Crook in 1662, and that of William Penn and William Mead in 1670, at the Old Bailey, will forever remain as noble monuments of their resistance to the arbitrary proceedings of the courts of judicature at that time, and the violent infringement of the privilege of jury." Soon after the Revolution of 1688, the persecution ceased on both sides of the Atlantic.

When the martyr age had passed, the society became less aggressive, and made fewer converts to its views; but it devoted itself to the quiet practice of all the Christian virtues, and to an active philanthropy, which have made its praise to be in all the churches. An exaggerated asceticism in some directions, and a rigid, though in most respects an admirable, discipline, visiting with excommunication even the offence of marrying a person not a member of the society, co-operated to keep it numerically small. But it has always exerted a power, in the church at large and in the community, far beyond what was to be expected from its numbers. In the recognition of the equal rights of women, in the abolition of slavery and the slave-trade, in the protection and instruction of the Indians and the weaker races of mankind, in the amelioration of penal laws and prison discipline, in the adoption of enlightened methods for the care and relief of the insane, in testimony against war, intemperance, oaths, corrupting books and amusements, extravagance, insincerity, and vain display, it has been in the fore-front of Christian reformers; while it has maintained the highest standard of integrity and practical virtue, and in the everyday charities of life its bounty has been unstinted.

About the year 1827 the society in America was divided into two bodies,—evangelical or "orthodox," and liberal or "Hicksite," each of which claims to be the true representative of the early Friends. The orthodox society is the one acknowledged as genuine by the London Yearly Meeting. A tone of thought similar to that prevailing in the evangelical section of the Church of England was fostered by the preaching and writings of Joseph John Gurney (1788-1847), and had great influence on both sides of the Atlantic. This school of opinion found an opponent in the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, which claims to maintain the truths taught by the founders, against perversion on either hand; but it has been very influential in the society at large. An earnest school is now arising, holding the essential doctrines of orthodox faith, and animated with an increased zeal for education and for the growth of the church, while discarding formalities of dress and speech, and all undue asceticism.

Distinctive Creed.—The creed of the Society of Friends may be described, as, from the first, one singularly free both from heresy and from exaggeration. Objecting to scholastic terms and "man-made" symbols, the Friends endeavor to confine themselves to scriptural words in defining their belief. One of the earliest authoritative statements of their views is found in a letter addressed by Fox and others to the Governor of Barbadoes in 1671. What is most distinctive of the society is its belief in the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit, and its expectation of the guidance of the Spirit in worship and all religious acts. This might degenerate into mysticism, were it not corrected by the society's full recognition of the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures, by which they admit it, in the words of Barclay, "as a positive certain maxim. That whatsoever any do, pretending to the Spirit, which is contrary to the Scriptures, should be accounted and reckoned a delusion of the Devil." Their belief in the spirituality of Christianity has led them, also, to the disuse of the outward rites of baptism and the Lord's Supper, while they fully believe in the necessity of spiritual baptism, and the privilege of spiritual communion with the Father and the Son, through the Holy Spirit. They do not find, in the texts ordinarily understood as establishing these rites, any indication of such intention, and regard the rites themselves as inconsistent with the whole spirit of Christianity, in which types have given place to the substance. Their views in regard to the ministry are also characteristic. They believe that no one should preach the Word without a direct call from God, and that this call may come to male or female, old or young. No high human learning and no course of theological study are necessary qualifications for a minister, who may be as unlettered as were most of the apostles, if plenteously endued with heavenly grace. But Friends do not deny the self-evident proposition, that learning and intellectual ability conduce to the usefulness of a preacher of the gospel, and that a church needs men possessing both, to assert and defend the truth. Any one who feels it laid upon him is allowed to speak in the meetings for worship, so long as he speaks things worthy of the occasion. If, after sufficient probation, he gives evidence of a divine call, he is formally acknowledged as a minister, and is allowed one of the seats at the head of the meeting. Besides ministers, the society appoints elders, whose especial duty is to sympathize with and advise ministers, and watch that they be sound in the faith; and overseers, as in the primitive church, who have a general care of the flock. In meetings for business, the society recognizes the presidency of the great Head of the Church, and strives to do all in his fear, and with his guidance. Decisions are not made by votes and majorities, but are recorded by the clerk, in accordance with what appears to be "the weight" of either side; or, if there is not a general spirit of acquiescence, action is postponed.

Worship and Ministry. — Believing that every act of divine service should proceed from an immediate impression of duty, prompted by the Holy Spirit, the meetings of the society for worship are held in silence, unless some one feels called upon to preach or teach, to offer prayer in behalf of the congregation, or to give praise to the Most High. But this silence is itself intended to be occupied with religious acts. Highest of these is the direct communion of the soul with its Maker and its Lord, in rapt devotion, in thanksgiving and prayer. But there are services, in these hours of silence, adapted to every degree of religious experience and every serious mood of mind. One of the most profitable of these is self-examination. As in the sight of the All-Seeing Eye, the humble worshipper recounts his thoughts and deeds, confesses his sins, supplicates for pardon for the past and strength for the future, and prays that he may be cleansed even from secret faults. Another exercise is religious meditation. At worst, every attender can force himself to think on profitable themes by repeating to himself texts of Scripture, or the verses of some suggestive hymn. "Sometimes a light surprises" the humble worshipper; his thoughts are led on and upward by a higher Power; new meanings of texts flash upon his mind, a new illumination is given to the path of duty, and in answer to the prayer breathed forth by his inmost soul he feels conscious of a closer union with God, and strengthened for his future warfare with the world, the flesh, and the devil. And, if some brother or sister is led to offer vocal service, it often happens that the word of exhortation or reproof or comfort, or the earnest petition to the throne of grace, harmonizes with the private exercise of mind which the hearer has passed through, confirming his faith, and invigorating his resolution.

The theory of the exercise of the ministry among Friends asserts the prompting and guidance of the Holy Spirit, both what to say, and when to say it. It does not, however, intelligently understood, claim any infallibility, or plenary inspiration, in the speaker. The treasure is borne in earthen vessels, and the imperfections of the instrument may sometimes appear. Yet he that lives daily near his Lord, and is careful not to assert more than he has tested in his own experience, or to utter words beyond those in which he feels a full consciousness of divine leading, seldom outruns his Guide, or fails to speak to the edification of the church.

Education. — The society provides that all its members shall receive a good practical education, and cherishes also the higher learning. It has colleges at Haverford, Penn., Richmond, Ind., Wilmington, O., and Oskaloosa, Io., and one for girls at Bryn Mawr, Penn. There are excellent boarding-schools in most of the Yearly Meetings.

Organization. — The congregations are grouped together to constitute Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings; the Monthly Meetings sending representatives to the Quarterly, and the Quarterly to the Yearly. Each Yearly Meeting is an independent body, but united with all the others by a common faith. There are two Yearly Meetings in Great Britain, and ten in America. The number of members is about twenty thousand in Great Britain, and eighty thousand on this continent. Besides these, there is a large number of regular attenders of Friends' meetings, sympathizing with their views.

Hicksites (so called). There are six Yearly Meetings of this body, all in America, with about forty thousand members. They have a flourishing college for both sexes at Swarthmore, near Philadelphia. (See HICKS, ELIAS.)

FRIENDS OF GOD, the beautiful name of a large brotherhood of mystics which existed in German-speaking lands during the fourteenth century. They did not constitute a sect: on the contrary, they attended the church-services assiduously, but gave novel interpretations to the ecclesiastical symbols. Their centres were at Cologne, Strassburg, and Basel: their teachers were mostly Dominicans. Their ideas and principles were drawn from the German mystics. They held more or less personal and epistolary communication with one another, especially with the members of the same local society. They protested against the corruptions of the times, and set an example of holy living. Their great leader, hero, and martyr was NICHOLAS OF BASEL: their preacher was JOHN TAULER. (See those articles.) In 1380 some of the more earnest of them assembled in the mountains, according to an agreement made the year before; but, being warned that the explosion of divine wrath would not come for three years, they disbanded, and no later meeting is recorded. See Essays upon the Gottesfreunde, by C. SCHMIDT (1854) and RIEGER (1879).

FRISIANS (Frisii, Frisones), The, inhabited, at the beginning of our era, the coast of Holland and Germany from the Scheldt to the Weser, the Islands of the German Ocean (Silt, Föhr, Heligoland, etc.), and the western coast of Sleswick. They were a rude and warlike people, not aggressive, but jealous for their nationality, and fanatic in their religion. Christianity entered the country, together with the Franks, in the seventh century; and for two centuries it rose and fell among the people together with the Frankish power. It was not Frankish missionaries, however, who converted the Frisians, but Anglo-Saxon. The Franks and the Frisians did not understand each other, but the Anglo-Saxons and the Frisians did. St. Amandus (626) and Eligius (641) met with only indifferent success; but Wilfred of York (677) made an impression: and Willibrord, the apostle of the Frisians (700-730), procured a footing for Christianity in the country. The conversion of the Frisians seems at that time to have been what we now would call a fashion among the Anglo-Saxons. One missionary followed the other. Winfred, too, made his first and his last attempt as a missionary in Friesland. Willibrord's successor, Gregory, founded at Utrecht a school, which, like those of Corbie and Fulda, became a fertile seed-plot for Christian piety and learning. Among his helpers were Lebuin and Willehad; among his pupils, Lindger, a native Frisian. In the latter part of the eighth century Christianity had advanced from the Scheldt to the Yesel, and it approached the same point from the Weser. Nevertheless, when the Saxons arose, under Wittekind, against Charlemagne, the Frisians followed the example; and Christianity was nearly driven out of the country together with the Franks. But Charlemagne treated the Frisians as he treated the Saxons. The country was made a province of the Frankish Empire; the people, a branch of the Christian Church. Bishops with liturgy, schools, jurisdiction, and tithes were settled in the country; and all became quiet, though remnants of rank heathenism were still glimmering among the dark, impenetrable forests of the country until the twelfth century. FRITH (or FRYTH), John, an English Reformer and martyr; b. at Sevenoaks, Kent, about 1503; d. at the stake, July 4, 1533. He studied at Cambridge, and was selected by Cardinal Wolsey to be a member of the college (now Christ Church) at Oxford, which he had recently founded from the spoils of several monasteries. In 1525 he became acquainted with Tyndale, and in his intercourse with him imbibed those evangelical sentiments for which he afterwards died. At Oxford he was imprisoned, with several companions, by the Romanists, for his attachment to the views of Luther and Zwingli. In 1528 he retired to the Continent, having escaped from prison, into which he had been thrown with the connivance of Wolsey. He remained abroad for two years. Returning to England, Frith was a marked man. Sir Thomas More had replied to a sharp attack against the ecclesiastical establishments of England (The Supplication of the Beggars) in a work entitled The poor seely (simple) souls peuled out of purgatorye. Frith published, in answer to More's work, Disputacyon of Purgatorye, in which he denies all efficacy to papal indulgences, and maintains that Christ's satisfaction is sufficient, and precludes the necessity of purgatorial cleansing. The author was forthwith confined in the Tower. The authorities were disposed, however, to deal leniently with him. But he not only persisted in his views on purgatory, but wrote in prison a treatise on the Lord's Supper, in which he denied transubstantiation. He was tried, and condemned by Dr. Stokesly, Bishop of London, to the stake. He was burned at Smithfield, in company with Andrew Hewet, a tailor's apprentice, who professed the same views of the Lord's Supper.

Frith was regarded as an able and learned man by his contemporaries. He was the first English martyr for the true doctrine of the Lord's Supper, and the first of the Reformers of England to write against transubstantiation. Besides the treatises already mentioned, he put forth a tract on Baptism, and A Mirror or Glass to know thyself. His writings are published in vol. iii. of the Writings of the Brit. Fathers, London (Rel. Tract Soc.). For his life, see that volume, and FOXE'S Actes and Monuments.

FRITZSCHE, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Steinbach, near Borna, Dec. 16, 1801; d. at Giessen, Dec. 6, 1846; studied theology at Leipzig; was appointed professor at Rostock, 1826, and removed to Giessen, 1841. A pupil of Gott. Hermann, he applied the philological principles of his master to biblical exegesis, and thereby promoted a more exact grammatical interpretation of the sacred documents. His principal works are Latin commentaries on Matthew (1826), Mark (1830), and the Epistle to the Romans (1836-43), 3 vols., all marked by great philological learning and acumen. He always lectured in Latin. He was by nature a controversialist, and gave stinging blows.

FROMENT, Antoine, b. at Triers, near Grenoble, 1509 or 1510; d. in Geneva at an unknown date, but after 1574; entered early into relations with Faber Stapulensis, Marguerite of Navarre, Farel, and the whole party of Reformers, and exercised considerable influence on the reformatory movement in its beginning. In 1529 he labored at Aigh, in 1530 at Tavannes, in 1531 at Bienne and Grandson. In 1532 he arrived at Geneva. As it was not possible to preach the Reformation there openly, he established a school, and advertised that he would teach everybody, young or old, man or woman, to read and write the French language in one month. People crowded to the school, where they were taught, not only reading and writing, but also the new religion; and in 1533 Froment preached publicly in the market-place. But he was immediately driven out of the city by the Roman priests. He returned, however, a month later, but caused a tremendous uproar by protesting in the very church against the invectives and slander of the priests, and was again compelled to flee from the city. This time, however, he returned, backed by an embassy from the canton of Bern; and in 1535 the council granted permission to preach the Reformation in the city. In the presence of Viret, Farel, and Calvin, Froment naturally retreated into the background; and the latter part of his life was much troubled. His wife proved untrue to him, and he was compelled to leave the clerical state. He became a notary, and even a member of the council; but his domestic troubles seem to have affected his moral character. His life became disorderly; and in 1562 he was dismissed from the council, and banished from the city. After ten years of exile and misery, the old man was allowed to return to Geneva, and in 1574 he was re-instated as a notary. His principal work is Les actes et gestes merveilleux de la cité de Genève (edited by Gustave Revilliod, Geneva, 1854), a work full of freshness and vivacity, but not fully reliable. There is no independent biography of him, but numerous sketches of his life in La France Protestante, GABEREL, Histoire de l'église de Genève, etc. THEODOR SCHOTT.

FRONTON LE DUC (Ducaus), b. at Bordeaux, 1558; d. in Paris, Sept. 25, 1621; entered the Society of Jesus in 1577; taught rhetoric and theology at Pont à Mousson, Bordeaux, and Paris, and was in 1601 made librarian at the royal library. Besides editions with notes, and Latin translation of Chrysostom, John of Damascus, Irenæus, Gregory of Nyssa, Basil, etc., he published a number of polemical and apologetical works, of which a list is given by BACKER, in Bibliothèque des écrivains de la Compagnie de Jésus.

FROSSARD, Benjamin Sigismund, b. at Nyon, in Switzerland, 1754; d. at Montauban, 1830; studied theology at Geneva; was appointed pastor of the Reformed Church at Lyons, 1777, and professor of morals in the Ecole Centrale of Clermont-Ferrand, 1792. In 1808 he was charged with the organization of a Protestant theological faculty in Montauban, of which he himself became dean, and professor of morals. Besides translations of Hugh Blair, Wilberforce, etc., he published La Cause des Esclaves Nègres (1788, 2 vols.), which attracted great attention in France.

FROUDE, Richard Hurrell, an ardent supporter of the Oxford movement; b. March 25, 1803, at Dartington, Devonshire; d. there Feb. 28, 1836. He was educated at Eton and Oxford; elected fellow of Oriel College, 1826; and ordained priest, 1829. During the last four years of his life he resided in Southern Europe and the West Indies. He was a man of fair talents and a love of the pure and good, but of gloomy temper and ungovernable will, as his mother's letters expressly testify. He fell in heartily with the Tractarian movement. "Really I hate the Reformation more and more," he says. And again: "I think people are injudicious who talk against the Roman Catholics for worshipping the saints, and honoring the Virgin and images." He was very bitter in his judgment of Milton and the Puritans. To a friend he writes, "Try to un-Protestantize and un-Miltonize Southey and Wordsworth." His Remains, consisting of sermons, letters, journals, etc., appeared in 2 vols., Lond., 1838, 1839. He was a brother of the well-known historian. See Newman's Apologia, also TRACTARIANISM.

FRUCTUOSUS, the apostle of the Suèves and Lusitanians, Archbishop of Braga, in Galicia, since 656; d. about 670; was educated in the episcopal school of Palencia, and sold his estates in order to get money for the foundation of monasteries, of which he had built no less than seven, in Lusitania, Asturia, and Galicia, up to 647; and he continued building to his death. There exist two sets of rules written down by him for his monks. The first (Regula Complutensis) is based on the rule of St. Benedict, and written for the monks of Complutum (not the famous place in Castile, the present Alcala, but a place of the same name, probably in Asturia or Leon). It fixes the life of the monks in the minutest details. Not only they should not walk about or speak without the permission of the superior, but they were even forbidden to turn their heads, or rise from their seats, unless on a given signal. The other (Regula Communis) regards cases in which a whole family entered a monastery. All family ties were immediately dissolved, and all the property appropriated by the monasteries. Both rules are given by HOLSTEN-BROCKIE, in Cod. reg. monasticorum, II. See MONTALEMBERT: Monks of the West, II. ZÖCKLER.

FRY, Elizabeth, an eminent philanthropist, daughter of John Gurney, a Friend; was b. near Norwich, Eng., May 21, 1780; d. at Ramsgate, Oct. 13, 1845. She was of fascinating manners, and manifested little interest in religious matters until her eighteenth year. At twenty she married Joseph Fry, a wealthy London merchant. At the death of her father, in 1809, she spoke for the first time in public, and was soon recognized as a minister among the Friends. Her attention being drawn in 1813, by a report of Friends, to the wretched condition of criminals in the jails, she visited the prison at Newgate. "The filth, the closeness of the rooms, the ferocious manners and expressions of the women toward each other, and the abandoned wickedness which every thing bespoke, are quite indescribable," were her own words in describing what she had seen.

Mrs. Fry at once instituted measures for the amelioration of prison morals and life, daily visiting the prison, reading to the prisoners the Scriptures, and teaching them to sew. A committee of ladies was soon organized to carry on the work on a larger scale. These labors effected a complete change in the condition of the criminals. Riot, licentiousness, and filth were exchanged for order, sobriety, and comparative neatness of person. Previously many who had entered the prison only comparatively abandoned, left completely debauched. Now the process was reversed, and many profligate characters went out of the prison renewed. The mayor and aldermen early took notice of these labors, and acknowledged their beneficence.

In 1818, in company with her brother, J. J. Gurney, Mrs. Fry visited the prisons of Northern England and Scotland, and in 1827 those of Ireland. Kindred societies for the help of female criminals were organized in other parts of Great Britain; and the fame of her labors attracted the interest, and stimulated the competition, of women in foreign lands. In 1839, 1840, and 1841 she visited the Continent, extending her travels as far as Hungary. She found the condition of the prisons lamentable. In Hungary many of the criminals slept in stocks, and whipping was universally practised, even to bastinadoing. Her example and immediate efforts secured remedial legislation, and the organization of prison-reform societies in Holland, Denmark, France, Prussia, and other Continental countries. In the mean while her efforts secured the organization of a society (1839) for the care of the criminals after their discharge from prison, and for the visitation of the vessels that carried the convicts to the colonies.

Mrs. Fry did not confine her labors to prison reform. She successfully prosecuted a plan to supply coast vessels and seamen's hospitals with libraries. A governmental grant was supplemented by liberal private donations which enabled her and the society to distribute 52,464 volumes among 620 libraries (report for 1836). After several years of growing feebleness, she died at Ramsgate, full of faith, and interested, to the very hour of her departure, in labors of charity for the seamen. A fitting memorial was erected to her in the Elizabeth Fry Refuge. Mrs. Fry was a woman of even temper, great practical skill, tenderness of heart, and deep knowledge of Scripture. Her maxim was "Charity to the soul is the soul of charity," and Sir James Mackintosh rightly characterized her as the "female Howard." See Lives of Mrs. Fry by TIMPSON (Lond., 1847) and CORDER (Lond., 1853), also Journals and Letters, edited by her daughter, London, 1847.

D. S. SCHAFF.

FULBERT OF CHARTRES, b. about 950; d. April 10, 1029; was educated by Bishop Odo of Chartres, and in Gerbert's school at Rheims; founded in 968 a school himself at Chartres, which soon rivalled even that of Rheims, and in which Berengarius of Tours was a pupil; and was elected Bishop of Chartres in 1007. He left, besides some hymns and minor essays, a hundred and thirty-eight letters, which are of great interest for the history of his time, and are found in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Lat., vol. 141.

FULCHER OF CHARTRES was chaplain to Baldwin, the second king of Jerusalem, and wrote Gesta peregrinantium Francorum, a history of the crusaders up to 1127. The best edition of it is that by DUCHESNE, in Script. Hist. Franc., Tom. IV.

FULCO, minister of Neuilly, near Paris, and one of the most popular preachers of his time; d. 1202; seems to have led a rather supercilious life of pleasure until a great change suddenly took place with him in 1192. He went every week-day to Paris to study under Peter Cantor; and the sermons he delivered on Sundays began to attract the greatest attention. Soon he preached, not only in the church, but also in the marketplace, not only in Neuilly, but also in Paris and all the great cities of France. In 1198 he was charged by Innocent III. with preaching the fourth crusade; and at the chapter-general of the Cistercians, in 1201, he asserted that more than two hundred thousand had received the cross from his hands. Of most importance, however, was, perhaps, the influence he exercised on his own colleagues, whom his words and example led to a more conscientious fulfilment of the duties of their office. See JACOB. A VITRIACO and OTTON DE ST. BLASIO, in Recueil des Historiens de la France, vol. xviii.; GEOFFREY DE VILLE-HARDOUIN: Chronique de la prise de Constantinople, and in BUCHON: Coll. des chroniques nationales françaises, vol. iii. FR. DIBELIUS.

FULDA, The Monastery of, was founded in 744, by St. Boniface, who lies buried there. The place was selected by Sturm, a pupil of Boniface; the ground was given by Duke Karlmann; the internal organization was adopted from Monte Casino and the rule of St. Benedict. In 754 the Pope sanctioned the institution, and exempted the abbey from episcopal authority, placing it immediately under the papal see. The first abbot was Sturm; and before his death, in 779, the number of monks had increased to four hundred. New donations were given by Pepin and Charlemagne; and under the leadership of Rabanus Maurus, himself a pupil of Fulda, the school became the centre, not only of learning, but of general progress and civilization in Germany. It gave instruction in theology, grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, mathematics, physics, and astronomy. Among its pupils were Walafrid Strabo, Servatus Lupus, Otfried, etc. It also cultivated the arts. Isambert, Rudolf, Candidus, Hatto, and others of its monks, were celebrated artists; and great numbers of well-trained artisans, weavers, tanners, carpenters, etc., spread from its rooms over all Germany. After the time of Rabanus Maurus, the school lost some of its lustre, though it continued to exercise a great and beneficial influence for several centuries. Under Abbot Werner (968-982) the monastery obtained the primacy among the abbeys of Germany and Gaul; and Otho I. gave the abbot the title and dignity of arch-chancellor of the realm. In the fourteenth century the abbey successfully resisted an attack of the burghers of the city of Fulda, and in the sixteenth it fortunately escaped the Reformation; but its significance as a social institution is of course lost long ago.

KLÜPFEL.

FULGENTIUS FERRANDUS, a friend or relation of Fulgentius of Ruspe, whom he followed into banishment under Thrasimund, king of the Vandals, and with whom he lived at Cagliari, in Sardinia, until 523, when he returned to Carthage, where he became a deacon, and died before 547. He left a Vita Fulgentii Ruspensis, a Breviatio Canonum (of great interest for the history of canon law), and a number of Letters, of which especially one addressed to the Roman deacons Pelagius and Anatolius, concerning the Three-Chapters controversy, is of great interest. His works were first edited by P. F. CHIFFLET, Dijon, 1649, afterwards often; as, for instance, in MIGNÉ: Patr. Lat., vol. 67.

FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE, b. at Telepte, a city of North Africa, 468; d. at Ruspe, in the province of Byzacena, Jan. 1, 533; belonged to a distinguished senatorial family, and was educated for a brilliant political career, but felt himself so strongly drawn towards a life of devotion, seclusion, and asceticism, that he entered a monastery, very much against the wishes of his family. After a journey to Sicily, Italy, and Rome, occasioned by the Arian King Thrasimund's persecutions of the Catholics, he was chosen Bishop of Ruspe in 508, but was shortly after banished, together with sixty other Catholic bishops, from North Africa. He settled in Sardinia, and remained there till 523, when the death of Thrasimund allowed him to return. A year before his death he retired from office, and spent his last days in a monastery. As well during his exile, as before and after, he developed a great literary activity; and his writings, among which the most prominent are Contra Arianos, Ad Monimum, Ad Petrum Diaconum de Incarnatione, De Veritate Prædestinationis, etc., contributed very much to stop the progress of Semi-Pelagianism, and establish a modified Augustinianism. They were first published by W. Pirkheimer (Nuremb., 1520), and most completely by Mangeant (Paris, 1684), also in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Lat., vol. 65. [See Mally's translation of his Life by a pupil, Wien, 1885.]

WAGENMANN.

FULKE, William, D.D., an able Puritan divine; b. in London some time before 1538 (as we learn incidentally from his own statements); d. August, 1589. Educated at Cambridge, he became fellow of St. John's College. He studied law for six years; but, turning his attention to the ministry, he espoused the Puritan cause and became a most zealous champion of Puritanism. A sermon preached in 1565 against popish habits in ecclesiastical establishments evoked the opposition of the university authorities. Removed from his office, he was made, in succession, rector of Warley and Kedington. After a trip to the Continent, he was chosen (1578) Master of Pembroke Hall and Margaret Professor of Divinity. On a tablet erected to his memory at Kedington are these two lines amongst others:—

“His works will show him free from all error, Rome's foe, Truth's champion, and the Remishes' terror.”

They indicate the general tenor of Fulke's life. He was a fearless opponent of Romanism, at different times being engaged in public disputations with Papists. In controversy he was one of the ablest divines of his day. His principal works are, Confutation of a libelle, etc. (1571), The Discovery of the Dangerous Rock of the Popish Church (1580), Defence of the sincere and true transl. of the Holy Scriptures into Engl. against the Cavils of Gregory Martin (1583, recently published by the Parker Society, Cambridge, 1843). He was also the author of some works against astrology. See Brook, Lives of the Puritans, I. p. 385 sqq., Lond., 1813, and the Memoir prefixed to the volume of the Parker Society.

FULLER, Andrew, a distinguished Baptist divine; was b. at Wicken, Cambridgeshire, Feb. 6, 1754; d. at Kettering, May 7, 1815. He received only a common-school education. Joining the church at sixteen, he exercised his gifts occasionally at religious meetings, and was ordained (1775) pastor of the Baptist Church in Soham. In 1782 he passed to the church at Kettering. He was honored with the degree of D.D. by Princeton and Yale Colleges, but never used the title. Mr. Fuller's reputation rests, not upon his pulpit achievements, but upon his services as a theological writer, and a promoter of Baptist missionary efforts. He stood in intimate relations with Carey, and contributed to awaken in his mind an interest in the heathen. He was one of the founders of the Baptist Missionary Society in a back-parlor at Kettering, Oct. 2, 1792, and was made its first secretary. As a theological writer, one of his biographers (Dr. Ryland) pronounces him “the most judicious and able theological writer that ever belonged to the Baptist denomination.” He shared with Robert Hall and John Foster a first place in the esteem of the Baptists of his day. His principal works are the following. The Gospel Worthy of all Acceptation, a work which involved him in a protracted controversy of nearly twenty years. In opposition to hyper-Calvinism, he here elaborates the principle that all may apply for the gospel, confidently expecting to receive its benefits. “No man is an unbeliever,” he says, “but because he will be so.” The Gospel its own Witness, an able criticism upon Deism, and reply to such writers as Thomas Paine. The Calvinistic and Socinian Systems Examined, pronounced by Robert Hall to be his ablest work. Expository Notes on Genesis, 2 vols. Dialogues and Letters between Crispus and Gaius, containing discussions of Total Depravity and other theological topics.

LIT. — Complete Works, Am. ed., 1833, 2 vols., with Memoir by his son, Andrew Gunton Fuller; Lives of Fuller, by his friend JOHN RYLAND, D.D. (Lond., 1816), J. W. MORRIS (Lond., 1830), and THOMAS ERKINS FULLER, his grandson (Lond., 1863).

FULLER, Richard, D.D., an eloquent Baptist preacher; b. in Beaufort, S.C., April 22, 1804; d. in Baltimore, Oct. 20, 1876, from a malignant carbuncle. After graduating at Harvard (1824), he practised law in his native town, where he soon secured a lucrative practice. In the meetings of the great revivalist Rev. Daniel Baker, in 1832, he was converted, and joined the Baptist Church. "His case was a very clear and delightful one," is an entry in Mr. Baker's journal, referring to him. He was ordained the same year, and began his ministry in Beaufort. In 1847 he became pastor of the Seventh Baptist Church in Baltimore, and in 1871 removed with a part of the congregation to the fine new edifice on Eutaw Place. Dr. Fuller was a man of fine presence of body, and endowments of mind. He was a born orator, and is said to have carried off, on several occasions, the honors with Webster and Clay on the platform. As a preacher he stood in the front rank of the most eloquent and scriptural of his generation. He was for a time co-editor of the Baltimore Herald, and published Letters on the Roman Chancery (Balt., 1840), Baptism and Communion (Balt., 1819), and a number of sermons in pamphlet form. See CUTHBERT: Life of R. Fuller, N.Y., 1879.

FULLER, Thomas, D.D., a learned and witty divine and church-historian; b. 1608, at Aldwinkle, Northamptonshire, where his father was rector; d. Aug. 16, 1661, in London. He was educated at Cambridge, and in 1631 was made fellow of Sidney College, and prebend of Salisbury. This year he issued his first publication, David's Hainous Sinne, Heartie Repentance and Heavie Punishment. In 1634 he was made rector of Broad Windsor, and, 1641, lecturer of the Savoy in London. The year before, he published at Cambridge The Hist. of the Holy War, an account of the Crusades, and in 1642 The Hist. of the Holy and Prophane States, an interesting collection of essays and biographies. Fuller was a Royalist; and in 1643 he entered the Royal army as chaplain, but kept a prudent silence during the Commonwealth period. During his service in the army, he began the investigations which resulted in a work, published after the author's death (1662), entitled History of the Worthies of England, Endeavoured by Tho's Fuller, D.D. The subject matter of this work is treated under the several counties of England and Wales, and includes the most varied information about their products, animals, buildings, battles, proverbs, eminent men, etc. In 1650 appeared his Pisgah sight of Palestine and the Confines thereof, with the history of the Old and New Testament acted thereon. Fuller was presented with the living of Waltham Abbey in 1648, and at the Restoration, in 1660, was re-admitted to his lectureship in the Savoy, and made chaplain in extraordinary to the king.

In 1656 Fuller published his great work, Church Hist. of Britain from the birth of Jesus Christ to the year 1648, to which was subjoined a Hist. of the University of Cambridge. This, as all of his works, abounds in quaint humor and epigrammatic sayings. He was an inveterate punster, and delighted in striking alliterations, but was also recognized by his contemporaries as a "perfect walking library." His memory is also reported to have performed almost incredible feats. He was able to repeat five hundred strange words after hearing them twice, and on one occasion undertook to repeat backwards and forwards in regular order all the shop-signs along the street from Temple Bar to Cheapside, after passing them once, and accomplished it. Coleridge says that "he was incomparably the most sensible, the least prejudiced, great man of an age that boasted a galaxy of great men."

LIT. — Amongst the works by Fuller not already mentioned are his devotional manuals, Good Thoughts in Bad Times (1615), Good Thoughts in Worse Times (1617), Mixed Contemplations in Better Times (1660); all bearing upon the vicissitudes of the Royalist cause, but containing thoughts for all times, and which to-day are read with delight and profit. Most of Fuller's works have been republished in this century. The best edition of his Church History is that of J. NICHOLS, 3 vols., Lond., 1868; Of the Worthies of England, by NUTTALL, 3 vols., Lond., 1840. See the biographies by RUSSELL (Lond., 1844) and of BAILEY (Lond., 1874), the latter an exhaustive work.

FUNCK, Johann, b. at Wöhrd, a suburb of Nuremberg, Feb. 7, 1518; beheaded at Königsberg, Oct. 28, 1566; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher in his native town in 1539, but was dismissed by the magistrate of Nuremberg in 1547, on the approach of the emperor. In the same year he entered the service of Duke Albrecht of Prussia; was made court-preacher in 1549; became one of Osiander's most ardent adherents, and after his death the leading representative of his ideas, and exercised, through his intimacy with the duke, a decisive influence on all affairs in Prussia, political as well as ecclesiastical. Though he in 1556 became reconciled with the Wittenberg theologians, and in 1563 actually retracted what he had written in defence of Osiander, he was, nevertheless, in 1566, put under the accusation of heresy, and disturbance of the peace, and condemned. Of his Chronologia ab orbe cond., the first part appeared in 1545, the rest in 1552. See C. A. HASE: Herzog Albrecht von Preussen u. sein Hofprediger [Funck], Leipzig, 1879. W. MÖLLER.

FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES OF CHRISTIANITY. The distinction between fundamental and non-fundamental doctrines is a useful one, as adapted, by bringing out in sharp outline the great cardinal articles of the Christian faith, to unify the various parts of the Christian Church, and to develop a spirit of tolerance towards each other with regard to the articles of lesser importance in which they disagree.

History. — The Roman-Catholic Church rejects the distinction (Wetzer and Welte, art. Dogma, III. pp. 195 sq.) on the ground that it resolves doctrines into essential or necessary, and unessential or incidental. Although it is not universally made by Protestant theologians, it early came into use. Humnius, in 1626, was the first to use the distinction in the Lutheran Church in his De fundamentalibus dissensu doctrinae Luth. et Calvin. (the fundamental difference in the Lutheran and Calvinistic theologies). He was followed by Quenstädt and others, and recently by Philippi (Glaubenslehre, i. 73 sqq.), who, starting from the atonement as the constitutive principle, defines as fundamental all articles which necessarily follow from it.

The distinction was urged by the younger Turretin, and in England by Chillingworth, Stillingfleet, Waterland, and others in the interest of ecclesiastical toleration; Lord Bacon having before, in his Advancement of Learning, insisted upon distinguishing "between points fundamental and points" which he calls "points of further perfection." The Parliament of 1653 voted indulgence to all who professed the "Fundamentals," and appointed a commission, consisting of Archbishop Ussher (who resigned, his place being filled by Baxter), Owen, Goodwin, and others, to define what these were. Baxter was for holding to the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments. But the commission drew up sixteen articles, which were presented to Parliament, and only missed ratification by its sudden dissolution. Neal (Hist. Puritans, II, pp. 143 sq., Harpers' ed.) gives a full account of this movement. The varying importance of the doctrines of the Christian system and the growing tolerance of this century have produced the conviction that it is desirable to emphasize the more important articles. The Evangelical Alliance, which was organized 1846, on the assumption that agreement in fundamentals is a sufficient foundation for Catholic communion, adopts a constitution of nine articles.

Definition.—The distinction of fundamentals and non-fundamentals is based upon the valid assumption that some articles are of greater importance than others. It is justified by the example of Paul in his teaching over against the Judaizing tendencies of his time. The following distinctions will help us in defining the term:—

1. Fundamental when applied to articles does not imply that they are the only articles which it is expedient or desirable for a church to teach, and the individual to believe. The apostasy of the angels, the eternal duration of future punishment, the single or double procession of the Holy Spirit (the Filioque clause being rejected by the Greek Church), may all be scriptural doctrines, and ought to be believed, but are not fundamental doctrines of Christianity (although some would so consider the endlessness of future punishment).

2. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not to be confused with the distinctive tenets of a denomination. Denominational differences may and often do embody the truth; but the mode of baptism, for example, or the particular theory of the decrees (however valuable a right view on this subject may be as a constructive principle in dogmatic theology), or the special form of ecclesiastical polity, cannot be regarded as fundamental. Christianity might not do as well with one class of opinions on these subjects (say, baptism by sprinkling, supralapsarianism, and the congregational principle of church government) as it would with another; but it would still remain radically unchanged, and continue to exert its beneficent influence.

3. The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are not synonymous with the doctrines essential to salvation. The latter depend upon the answer of the individual to two questions,—“What think ye of Christ?” and “What must I do to be saved?” A living faith in Christ as the Sent of God for the salvation of the world is essential to salvation, and sufficient for it (John vi. 47; Acts xvi. 31). The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are broader in their scope. They concern it as an objective system of truth.

4. Again: the term fundamental is not applied to doctrines which distinguish Christianity from natural religion. There is a distinction between the fundamentals of religion and those of Christianity. Religion is possible on the basis of the Five Articles of Lord Herbert of Cherbury; but the superstructure of the Christian religion needs a broader and deeper foundation. But some of the tenets which Christianity has in common with natural religion, as the existence of God, are fundamental to the former.

5. The Apostles' Creed, though a most venerable and excellent summary of the Christian's faith, is not a perfect statement of the fundamental articles of Christianity. On the one hand, it brings out only by implication the doctrine of atonement, passes over entirely the Scriptures, and on the other, as Waterland puts it, is in this connection "peccant in excess."

The fundamental doctrines of Christianity, then, are those which lie at the basis of the Christian system, and without which its professed and comprehensive aim (the glory of God and the highest welfare of man) could not, by logical necessity and with subjective certainty, be evolved. Waterland's definition is as follows: "Fundamental, as applied to Christianity, means something so necessary to its being, or at least its well-being, that it could not subsist, or maintain itself tolerably, without it" (v. p. 74). And again: "Whatever verities are found to be plainly and directly essential to the doctrine of the Gospel covenant are fundamental" (p. 103). According to Sherlock (Vindication, etc., p. 256), they are doctrines "which are of the essence of Christianity, and without which the whole building and superstructure must fall."

The most fundamental doctrine of Christianity is salvation by Christ; and the principle will hold good, that whatever doctrine stands in most necessary connection therewith is the most fundamental. The statement in Rom. i. 1-6 (the divine existence, Scriptures, incarnation, grace, faith, and resurrection) approaches nearest of any passage in Scripture to a comprehensive enumeration of the fundamental doctrines. Waterland enumerated seven; as follows: (1) The Creator, or Covenanter; (2) Covenant; (3) Charter of the Covenant, or Sacred Writ; (4) Mediator; (5) Repentance and a holy life; (6) Sacraments; (7) Two future states. The central principle from which he started was the Christian covenant. The sacraments, however, can hardly be regarded as a fundamental. We prefer the following statement: (1) The Fatherhood of God; (2) The Trinity; (3) The incarnation; (4) Atonement; (5) Faith or union with Christ, the condition of man's best being; (6) The immortality of the soul; (7) The Scriptures the summary of the divine purposes concerning man.

In defining what is fundamental in Christianity, it is equally desirable to avoid a narrow and a latitudinarian tendency. Certain communions insist upon regarding episcopacy and the authority of the church as fundamental. Individuals might insist upon particular views of original sin, the divine decrees, the inspiration of the Scriptures, or the duration and nature of future punishment. But few of these are touched upon in the Apostles' Creed, and none definitely answered. Divergence of view on these points is of inconsiderable importance in comparison with the cardinal doctrines of God's existence, the Messiah's work, saving faith, the soul's immortality, and the sufficiency of Scripture for human illumination and guidance, and cannot limit the perpetuity of Christianity. It is, however, not to be forgotten that a church may profess these fundamental doctrines, and yet so combine fundamental errors as to modify, if not to completely destroy their force. Of such errors, as held in the Roman Catholic Church, Sherlock says (p. 314) that "all the wit of man cannot reconcile them with the Christian faith." On the other hand, a religious communion (as the strict Unitarians or Universalists) may deny fundamental truths, and yet sincerely accept Christianity as the only and perfect religion, and Christ as the Lord and Saviour.

FUNERAL. See BURIAL.

FURSEUS (Fursey), b. of noble parents in Ireland, d. at Macerics or Mazeroëles (modern Mezières, in Ardennes), 120 miles n.e. of Paris, about 650. He was educated in the monastery of Inchiquin, an island in Lough Corrib, 3 miles north of Galway. He gathered a school at Rathmat (now, probably, Killursa), and there built a church. At some later period he removed to Munster to labor among his relatives, and while with them, in 627, he had his first visions, which occurred, however, when he was very seriously ill. The publication of these visions had a very important effect in developing and fixing the eschatological ideas of the Middle Age. Indeed, his visions lay at the basis of Dante's Divina Commedia. When he removed to England is uncertain, but on coming to East Anglia he was kindly received by King Sigebert, and preached successfully. He also, about 633, built a monastery at Cnobheresburg, i.e., Cnobher's Town (now Burghcastle, in Suffolk). Bede, in his Eccles. Hist., iii. 19, mentions his visions and gives particulars of one, in which he was in imagination lifted above the world and then told to look down, when he saw four fires in the air. These were explained to be respectively falsehood (when we do not fulfil that which we promised in baptism); covetousness (when we prefer the riches of the world to the love of heavenly things); discord (when we make no difficulty to offend the minds of our neighbors even in needless things); and iniquity (when we look upon it as no crime to rob and to defraud the weak). These were the fires appointed to consume the world.

When Penda, King of the Mercians, the pagan scourge, brought fire and sword around Cnobheresburg, Fursey and his brothers Faelan and Utan, likewise monks, fled to France, and, being honorably entertained by Clovis II., King of the Franks, built the monastery of Lagny, 6 miles north of Paris, on the Marne, on land given him by Erchinoald, mayor under Clovis. The fame of Lagny reached Ireland and attracted monks from thence. Shortly before he died Fursey had a great desire to revisit some of the churches he had founded in the different countries of his residence and labor. Accordingly he started and went in a northeasterly direction. At the modern Mezières he was taken ill and died. His body was brought to Perowne, about 65 miles to the west by north, and there buried. His tomb became a favorite place of pilgrimage from all parts of Gaul and Britain. Many miracles were said to have been wrought there.

His life was written between 670 and 675, and is still extant. See SURIUS, De prob. sanct. vit., i. 259-263. Cf. O'HANLON, Irish Saints, i. 224; also Act. Sanct., Jan. 16, vol. 3; Mabillon, Act. Sanct. O. S. B. ad a. 650.

FÜRST, Julius, Hebrew lexicographer; b. at Zerkowo, Posen, May 12, 1805; d. in Leipzig, Feb. 9, 1873. He studied at Berlin, Posen, and Breslau, and in 1864 became professor at Leipzig. He was of Jewish descent, and won fame by his Oriental researches. One of his theories was that trilateral should be reduced to bilateral roots. This idea is now generally discarded. In consequence of this and other philological notions, his great Hebräisches u. Chaldäisches Handwörterbuch (Leipzig, 1857-61, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1863, 3d ed. by Victor Ryssel, 1876, Eng. trans. by Samuel Davidson, Leipzig, 1865, 1866, 4th ed., 1871) is not generally considered as equal to Gesenius's. Probably his best work was upon his Concordantie Libr. Sacr. V. T. Heb. et Chäl. (Leipzig, 1837-40), in which he was aided by Franz Delitzsch, as he handsomely acknowledges. See CONCORDANCE. Among his other works (all published in Leipzig) are: Bibliotheca Judaica, 1849-63, 3 vols.; Gesch. d. Karäerthums (said to be very inaccurate), 1862-65, 2 vols.; Gesch. d. bib. Lit. u. d. jud.-hell. Schriftthums, 1867-70, 2 vols.; and Kanon d. A. T. nach d. Ueberlief. in Talmud u. Midrasch, 1868. Fürst's books evince great learning, but must be used with caution, for they are not reliable.

FUTURE PUNISHMENT. Belief in the punishment after death of sin committed in this life is well-nigh universal. It accords with instinctive justice, and is one of the bases of the doctrine of a future existence. But as to the nature and duration of that punishment there is great divergence. The Old Testament gives little information in its eschatological portions, although there was a belief in a future state and in some sort of punishment for the wicked. The New Testament is largely taken up with the affairs of the kingdom, and pays only passing attention to those who live outside of it, but the overwhelming majority of Christians have always believed, and their creeds have well-nigh unanimously maintained, that the New Testament plainly teaches that the punishment of those outside the kingdom is endless and conscious. This opinion was held by the early Fathers, who had, however, gross views on this subject. Conceiving that the life of the wicked after death was necessarily carried on in a place, they set forth that place as full of the cries of woe. Fire was commonly represented as the instrument of punishment. But to Origen (185-

254) the punishment was remedial or disciplinary, and when its end was accomplished the soul was freed from it. He, moreover, considered this punishment as mental, such as the sense of separation from God, remorse of conscience over committed sin, and the general loss of all peace of mind (De Principiis, ii. 10). When we come down to a later period we find increasing grossness in the conception of the pains of the damned, although Lactantius (4th cent.) and Gregory Nazianzen (330-390) are exceptions; and increasing outspokenness or conviction of their eternity. Arnobius (Adv. Gentes, ii., 36, 61) maintained that these pains would cease because the sufferer would be ultimately annihilated. Origenian restorationism was generally condemned. The great Augustine (353-430) taught that there were degrees in the punishment; the mildest degree he assigned to those who had died in infancy unbaptized. The Schoolmen mapped out the unseen universe, and made hell to consist of different departments. Its punishments were frightful, an endless repetition of the cruelties of the Inquisition. Dante borrowed his descriptions of them in large part from Thomas Aquinas. The modern Roman Catholic Church and the orthodox Protestant churches agree in maintaining the essential points of the historic creed upon this tenet—viz., the eternity and the severity of future punishment.

In opposition to this view there are three. First, the absolute denial of all future punishment. This was preached by the elder Ballou (1771-1852) as true Universalism; but it has few advocates to-day. Second, punishment is disciplinary and remedial, and therefore that when the divine purpose is accomplished, the sinner, purified by suffering, is restored to the divine favor. This is the doctrine of Restorationism or the Apokalastasis (q.v.). Third, eternal life is the gift of God; it is not given to those who die in wilful rebellion against God; such never live in any true sense, but are punished while they exist, and finally become extinct. This is the theory of Annihilationism or Conditional Immortality. See PUNISHMENT for literature and further discussion.

FUTURE STATE. See ESCHATOLOGY.

G.

GAB'BATHA (John xix. 13), an Aramaic word signifying "a hill, or elevated spot of ground." The Greek name, λιθόστρωτον, means "pavement;" and, as the two words occur together, we are probably to understand that Pilate's tribunal was erected in the open air, upon a rising ground, the top of which was laid with tessellated pavement. Ewald proposed to give to גבבא the same meaning as the Greek λιθόστρωτον, by deriving it from a root, גבב, with the meaning of קבע (Aramaic, to insert). But, as Weiss in Meyer in loco says, "This is too precarious a derivation."

GABLER, Johann Philipp, one of the prominent rationalists of his day; b. at Francfort, June 4, 1753; d. at Jena, Feb. 17, 1826; professor of theology at Altorf 1785, and at Jena 1804. His principal work is his edition of Eichhorn's Urgeschichte, to which he wrote an introduction and notes, Altorf, 1790-93, 2 vols. As editor of various theological periodicals, he wrote a great number of minor essays, of which a selection was made by his sons, Ulm, 1831, in 2 vols. A memoir was written by W. SCHRÖTER, Jena, 1827. He was a man of ceaseless activity, stainless life, and profound piety. His rationalism was of a sober and reverential type, like that of Herder's. HENKE.

GABRIEL (man of God), the angel who explained to Daniel the vision of the ram and the he-goat, predicted concerning the Seventy Weeks (Dan. viii. 16, ix. 21), announced the births of John and Jesus (Luke i. 19, 26), and was, according to Enoch (chap. ix.), one of the four great archangels (Gabriel, Michael, Uriel, and Raphael). He figures prominently in post-biblical Jewish literature. Pseudo-Jonathan declares that he was the man who directed Joseph to his brethren (Gen. xxxvii. 15), and also, with Michael, Uriel, Jophiel, Jephphiah, and the Metatron, buried Moses. The Targum on 2 Chron. xxxii. 21 names him as the angel who smote the host of Sennacherib. In the Koran he becomes the medium of divine revelation; and so Mohammedans call him the "Holy Spirit," and "Spirit of Truth." He is upon the calendar of the Greek, Coptic, and Armenian churches.

GABRIEL SIONITA, b. at Edden, a village on Mount Lebanon, 1577; d. in Paris, 1648; was educated in the Maronite college in Rome, and appointed professor of Oriental language at Collège de France in 1614; furnished the Syriac and Arabic versions to Le Jay's polyglot Bible, and wrote several works in Arabic, Latin, and Italian; as, for instance, Dottrina christiana ad uso de' fideli orientali (1668), and an Arabic grammar.

GAD, the name of a divinity only once mentioned in the Old Testament, in Isa. lxx. 11 [in the A. V., Gad is translated "troop"]; but it was evidently adored in Canaan, as the name Baal-Gad (e.g., Josh. xi. 17) testifies, as do also allusions in the Mishna, in Jacob of Sarug, and Isaac Antiochenus. The Hebrew word gad meant "luck;" and, as it was connected with the divinity, the latter must have been considered a friend to man, and therefore prayed to for luck. Perhaps a trace of its general use, in the sense of "luck," is in the exclamation of Leah (Gen. xxx. 11) and in the name Gaddiel (Num. xiii. 10). Some would, upon insufficient grounds, identify Gad with the planet Jupiter; cf. Baudissin, Jahve et Moloch, 1874, pp. 36 sq. More probably Gad was related to the Syro-Pheñician divinity 'At. See P. SCHOLZ: Götzendienst u. Zauberwesen bei den alten Hebräern, Regensburg, 1877, pp. 409-411, and the art. Gad, in WINER'S, in SCHENKEL'S, and in RIEHM'S Bible Dictionaries. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

GAD'ARA, the fortified capital of Peræa, stood on a hill south of the river Hieromax, or Yarmûk, the present Sheri'at el-Mandhûr, and southeast of the southern end of the Sea of Galilee, sixty stadia from Tiberias. The great roads from Tiberias and Scythopolis, to the interior of Petrea and to Damascus, passed through it. After a siege of ten months, it was taken by Alexander Jannæus, but was restored by Pompey (Josephus, Antiqu., XIV. 4, 4, Bell. Jud., I. 7, 7). On numerous coins which have come down to us the years are counted from this restoration. It became the seat of one of the five sanhedrins established by Gabinius, and was by Augustus presented to Herod, after whose death it was incorporated with the Province of Syria, though without losing entirely its autonomy. It formed part of the so-called Decapolis (Matt. iv. 25; Mark v. 20, vii. 31); and March 4, 68, it was captured by Vespasian (Josephus, Bell. Jud., IV. 7, 3). Most of its inhabitants were heathens; and the gods principally worshipped were Zeus, Heracles, Astarte, and Athene. Afterwards it became the seat of a Christian bishopric. The date and cause of its destruction are unknown. Its site was identified with the present village Umm Keis, by Seetzen and Burckhardt. The hot sulphur-springs in the neighborhood, famous in antiquity under the name of Amatha (Eusebius, Onomasticon, Αιμάθη), are still used. It may have been the scene of the miracle of our Lord healing the demoniac (Matt. viii. 28; Mark v. 1; Luke viii. 26); though the text is somewhat doubtful, varying between χωρα των Γαδαρηνων and Γεργεσηνων and Γεργεσηνων. As each of these readings has some weighty evidence in its favor, and a mistake either the one way or the other is easily explained, a final decision can hardly yet be pronounced. [Dr. William M. Thomson has clearly identified the biblical Gergesa with Chersa, or Khersa, on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, opposite Medjel, on the slope of a hill in Wady Samakh, within forty feet of the water's edge. The narrative of the evangelists corresponds precisely with the nature of the locality, while Gadara is too far distant from the sea. See W. M. THOMSON: The Land and the Book, II. pp. 34-38; and SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, p. 346.] RÜETSCHLI.

GALATIA, a Roman province occupying the central portion of Asia Minor, and bounded north by Bithynia and Paphlagonia, east by Pontus, south by Cappadocia and Lycaonia, and west by Phrygia. It was inhabited by Celtic tribes, which in 279 B.C. were brought as mercenaries from Macedonia into Asia Minor by Nicomedes, king of Bithynia. Afterwards they made war on their own account, and devastated the country in all directions. The pushing northwards of the Romans had at that time put the Celtic masses in motion; and new swarms continued to pour into Asia Minor, until in 229 B.C. they were utterly defeated by Attalus, King of Pergamus, and compelled to settle down in peace in the region which then received its name from them.—Galatia, Gaul. There they lived in three distinct tribes,—the Trocmi with the capital Tavium, the Tectasages with the capital Ancyra, and the Tolistobogii with the capital Pessinus, but united first under a kind of republican constitution, afterwards under a king. Augustus made the country a Roman province (25 B.C.); and its boundaries were afterwards several times changed. But in Galatia proper the inhabitants retained the stamp of their Celtic origin, both in language and customs, down to the time of Jerome. Paul visited the country twice,—on his second and on his third missionary tour (Acts xvi. 6, xviii. 23); and to the congregations founded there he addressed one of his most important epistles. See Introduction to the Commentaries on Galatians, by Meyer (6th ed. by Sieffert, 1880), Wieseler, Lightfoot, Schaff, especially Lightfoot.

GALBANUM, one of the ingredients of the sacred perfume prescribed in Exod. xxx. 34. It is the resin of a plant growing in Abyssinia, Arabia, and Syria, obtained by an incision. It is fat, sticky, of bitter strong smell and taste: at first white, it becomes yellow with white spots. When burnt, it gives out a disagreeable smoke, by which snakes and vermin are driven away. It is uncertain from what plant it is produced. The presence of such an unpleasant substance amid the ingredients of the incense typified that sincere sorrowful confession of sin was a necessary part of all prevailing prayer. W. PRESSEL.

GALE, Theophilus, a learned nonconformist divine; b. in 1628, at King's Teigmouth, Devonshire, where his father was vicar; d. at Newington, in March, 1678. He was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and became minister at Winchester, but lost his place at the Restoration for refusing to submit to the Act of Uniformity. He went abroad as tutor to the son of Lord Wharton; on his return was elected assistant to Mr. Rowe, pastor of a dissenting congregation in Holborn. He left his theological library to Harvard College. Gale is known by a curious and learned work, The Court of the Gentiles (Oxford, 1669-77, 3 vols.), which attempted to prove that Pagan philosophy and theology were a distorted reproduction of biblical truth, or, to use his own words, that "Pythagoras' College, Plato's Academy, Aristotle's Peripatium, Zeno's Stoa, and Epicurus' Gardens were all watered with rivulets, which, though in themselves corrupt, were originally derived from the sacred fountain of Siloam." Among his other works were, The True Idea of

GALE, Thomas, D.D., an eminent classical scholar and divine; b. at Scruton, Yorkshire, 1636; fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge; regius professor of Greek (1666); and Dean of York (1697), where he died April 8, 1702. His principal works were Opuscula, Mythol., ethica et physica, Gr. et Lat. (Camb., 1671), and Historiæ Britann., Saxon., Anglo-Dan. Scriptores XV. (Oxf., 1691), containing Gildas, Alcuin, etc.

GALL, The Monastery of St., was founded by St. Gall, an Irish monk, and pupil of St. Columban, on the Steinach, in Switzerland. He built his cell in the thick forest there about 613, and gathered around him a number of hermits, who lived together according to the rule of St. Columban; he died Oct. 16, 627, the date varies between 625 and 650. Under Otmar, who is considered the first abbot of St. Gall (720-759), the institution began to grow very rapidly. He substituted the rule of St. Benedict for that of St. Columban, erected a church in honor of St. Gall, founded a hospital for lepers, and organized the school, afterwards so famous; as early as 771 a monk of the monastery wrote a life of its patron. Under Gozbert (816-837) the monastery was exempted from the authority of the Bishop of Constance, and made a free, royal abbey, with right to elect its own abbot. He rebuilt the church, and parts of the monastery, in a magnificent style. Under Salomon III. (899-919) the prosperity of the institution reached its height. Under Notker Labeo and the Ekkehards the school became one of the great centres of learning and culture. The monks of St. Gall were especially famous as transcribers. The library was one of the greatest in the world. Many classical works have been preserved only through copies made by the monks of St. Gall; and in artistic respects their works were often masterpieces. They also excelled as musicians, probably started in both these directions by the Irish founders of the abbey. In 1413 the city of St. Gall, having acquired great industrial and commercial importance, revolted against the abbot, and obtained its freedom. The Reformation the abbey withstood without any great loss, but after that period its occupation was gone. In possession of enormous revenues, it lived on, quietly decaying, until the time of the Revolution, when in 1798 it was secularized; its estates were confiscated, and its territory formed into a bishopric. Sources to the history of St. Gall are found in the two first volumes of Monumenta Germaniæ, and in WATTENBACH, Deutsch. Geschichts-Quellen, I. See ILDEFONS VON ARX: Geschichte d. Kantons St. Gallen, 1810-13, 3 vols.; FRANZ WEIDMANN: Geschichte der Stiftsbibliothek St. Gallens, 1811. MEYER VON KNONAU.

GALLANDI, Andrea, b. at Venice, Dec. 6, 1709; d. there Jan. 12, 1779; was abbot of the congregation of the Oratorians, and published Bibliotheca veterum Patrum, antiquiorumque Scriptorum ecclesiasticorum, Venice, 1765-81, 14 vols. fol., containing the works of three hundred and eighty authors.

GALLAUDET, Thomas Hopkins, LL.D., the beginner of deaf-mute instruction in America; b. at Philadelphia, Dec. 10, 1787; d. at Hartford, Sept. 9, 1851. He was graduated at Yale College 1805, and at Andover 1814; became interested in deaf-mute instruction; superintended the organization of an institution at Hartford for the purpose, having visited Europe in 1815 to study existing methods. He began his instructions, with Laurent le Clerc (a deaf-mute taught by Abbé Sicard) as his assistant, April 15, 1817, with seven pupils, and labored assiduously on new lines, and successfully, receiving many honors, until 1830, when ill health compelled his retirement from the headship, although he continued to be one of the directors. He had the satisfaction of seeing similar institutions in different parts of the country, and the instruction greatly improved, owing to his investigations and those incited by him. From 1838 to his death he was chaplain of the Connecticut Retreat for the Insane at Hartford. Among his publications were six volumes of Annals of the Deaf and Dumb, Hartford. See his Biography by HEMAN HUMPHREY, N. Y., 1858. — Two of his sons, Thomas and Edward Miner, have also won an international reputation by their labors for deaf-mutes.

GALLICAN CONFESSION, The (Confessio Gallicana, La confession de foi des églises réformées de France, also called La confession de la Rochelle), was adopted by the first national synod of the Reformed Church of France, convened in Paris 1559, under the moderatorship of Chaudieu, and is based on a draft sent by Calvin to François de Morel. It was printed in Geneva, and generally attached to the French Bible. In 1561, during the Conference of Poissy, it was officially presented to the king, Charles IX., by delegates from all the Reformed congregations in France. By the seventh national synod, convened at La Rochelle 1571, under the moderatorship of Beza, and at which were present Jeanne d'Albret, queen of Navarre, her son Henry of Béarn, the Prince of Condé, Admiral de Coligny, and others, it received its final ratification. Three copies of it were inscribed on parchment, and subscribed by all present, — one for Geneva, one for Béarn, and one for La Rochelle. It was the symbolical book of the French Reformed Church; and, up to the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, every minister before entering his office, and every new member before entering the congregation, had to subscribe to it. The National Synod of 1872 did not restore its authority, but gave its general assent to it in a brief summary of the faith as now held by the Reformed Church of France. See SCHAFF: Creeeds of Christendom, vol. i. pp. 490 sqq.

GALLICANISM denotes that spirit of nationality, which, within the Church of France, developed a peculiar set of customs, privileges, maxims, and views, especially with respect to her relations to Rome. Not that there is any thing like a tendency towards heresy or schism in this spirit, not even towards independence in the sense of separation; but there is a feeling of freedom, a consciousness of individual development from an individual historical basis, which causes resistance to any attempt by Rome at absorption or amalgamation.

Started by Irenæus, there arose in Gaul, towards the close of the third century, a church community independent of Rome, but by no means indifferent to her authority, free, and yet in the most intimate connection with Rome. A number of great men distinguished for piety carried this development farther, in spite of the turbulence and barbarism of the times; and the monasteries with their flourishing schools aided the movement, until finally the Gallo-Frankish Church was moulded into perfect shape by the powerful hands of Charlemagne; and from that moment the independence of the French Church, meaning simply her national individuality, has been vindicated with energy and decision whenever an able king or parliament or bishop appeared upon the stage.

Very characteristic in this respect are the three decrees of Louis IX. (1226-70), issued 1229, 1239, and 1270. The first gives in its introductory part a general survey of the Libertés et Immunités de l'Eglise Gallicane; the second limits the bishop's power of excommunication, and places the clergy under the jurisdiction of the State in all civil affairs; the third, the pragmatic sanction, guarantees the independence of the episcopal authority against the encroachments of the Pope, secures the privilege of electing the bishop to the chapters and the diocesan clergy, and vindicates the right of the French Church to convene a French council. Still more precisely defined became the position of the Gallican Church by the controversy between Boniface VIII. and Philippe IV., the Fair, 1286-1314. The questions at issue were of the greatest importance, — to the nation, as Boniface VIII., in a public speech, declared France to be a dependency of the German Empire; to the state, as immense sums of money yearly crossed the Alps under the form of annats; to the king, as the Pope denied his right to tax the clergy for certain purposes of urgent necessity; and to the church in general, as the Pope attempted to introduce essential changes into the relation between the bishops and the curia. The moment for this controversy was very untimely chosen by the Pope. The king was most cordially supported, not only by his Parliament, but also by the clergy and the mass of the people, and he came out of the contest victorious. But though both the kings and the parliaments, the bishops and the universities, unanimously asserted that they would cling forever to the decrees of the Councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basel (which, indeed, were the dictates of Gallicanism), the Roman curia never let pass by unused an opportunity to preach the opposite doctrines. Strife occurred every now and then, though always with the same issue, — defeat to Rome. When in 1455 the Bishop of Nantes ventured an appeal from a royal decree to the Roman curia, the Parliament of Paris stepped in, and accused and condemned him for offence against the constitutional laws and ecclesiastical privileges of France.

There is, however, a famous exception to this rule; namely, the abolition, in 1516, of the pragmatic sanction of Bourges of 1440 by the Lateran synod, in consequence of the concordat concluded between Leo X. and Francis I., 1515-17. The reasons of this concordat are well known. The king expected to be invested with the fief of Naples; and his chancellor, Duprat, expected to be adorned with a cardinal's hat. But, however great this change was theoretically considered, practically it did not amount to much. The decrees of the above-mentioned three councils continued to regulate the feeling of the nation, the teaching of the university, the proceedings of the clergy, the measures of parliament; and, when the decrees of the Council of Trent (1545-63) were promulgated (which, if accepted in toto, would, indeed, have annihilated Gallicanism), only such of them were accepted in France as agreed with the privileges of the French Crown, the maxims of the French State, and the customs and laws of the French Church. If there ever had reigned in the French mind any doubt or hesitancy with respect to the true relation between the papal see and the national church, Pierre Pithou caused it to disappear. Not to speak of his Corpus juris canonici, Codex canonum, and Gallica Ecclesie in schismate status, in his Libertés de l'Eglise gallicane (1594) he gave in eighty-three articles a representation of the whole case, so clear and precise, that everybody could comprehend it.

From another point of view, but with equal clearness and pithiness, Bossuet gave a representation of the principles of Gallicanism in the Déclaration du Clergé, issued in the name of the Assemblée du Clergé, 1682. It declares that St. Peter, his successors, and the whole Church, have power only in spiritual things; that, however great may be the power of the apostolic see in spiritual things, it cannot overthrow the decrees of the Council of Constance, which it has itself confirmed: that consequently the laws and rules and customs of the Gallican Church, recognized by that council, must remain intact; and, finally, that the decisions of the Pope are not unchangeable, unless the whole Church agrees with him. Alexander VIII. declared this declaration null and void, and addressed a long memoir to the French clergy; and at one moment, in 1691, when no less than thirty-five episcopal sees were vacant in France, because the Pope refused to confirm those appointed by the king, it seemed as if Louis XIV. was going to yield. But the haughtiness with which, in 1713, he compelled the Pope to confirm Abbé de Saint-Aignan as Bishop of Beauvais, showed his true meaning; and in 1718 the Conseil de Régence simply declared that the papal confirmation of a French bishop was unnecessary.

To a great extent, however, Gallicanism lost its hold on the sympathy of the people by the events which took place between 1790 and 1800: they were considered, not as a victory of the Gallican Church over Rome, but as a victory of the Revolution over Christianity. By the concordats of 1801 and 1813 very little regard was paid to the principles of Gallicanism. The former made the Church entirely dependent upon the State: the latter made concessions only to the Pope. The current of political reaction which set in with the Restoration was accompanied by a similar current of religious reaction, led by Joseph de Maistre, Louis de Bonald, François de Lamennais, etc. The connection between Rome and the French clergy became more and more intimate: the Jesuits returned; the Gallican Liturgy gave place to the Roman; the textbooks of the seminaries were changed; and, shortly after the middle of the present century, Ultramontanism had completely superseded Gallicanism.

GALLIENUS, Publius Licinius (Roman emperor 260-268), b. 218 or 219; associated with his father, 253; acknowledged by the senate, 254; abolished, immediately after his accession, the decrees of his father Valerian, against the Christians, and made Christianity, if not a religio licita, at least tolerated. For this reason he appears in Eusebius' Hist. Eccl. (VII. 23), in the words of Dionysius of Alexandria, as the "restorer of the empire;" and the prophecy of Isa. xliii. 19 is applied to him, the first instance of a favorable Old-Testament prophecy being applied to an emperor; while the profane historians describe him as a supercilious and frivolous trifler. The edict itself is not extant, and the causes of it are unknown.

GAL'LIO, a brother of Seneca the philosopher, was proconsul of Achaia when Paul first visited Corinth (Acts xviii. 12). His true name was Marcus Annæus Novatus: the name of Gallio he assumed after being adopted by the rhetorician, Junius Gallio. The date and manner of his death are uncertain: it is probable, though, that, like his brother, he was put to death by Nero.

CALLITZIN, Demetrius Augustine, b. at the Hague, where his father was minister plenipotentiary, Dec. 22, 1770; d. at Loretto, Cambria County, Penn., May 6, 1841. He was the son of a Russian prince, and was sent to America by Catharine II., in 1792, as an officer of the imperial Russian guard, not only to study American institutions, but also to overcome a natural timidity of disposition. But, instead of pursuing his profession, he gave himself to the Roman-Catholic priesthood, and March 18, 1795, was ordained in Baltimore. In 1799 he was sent, at his own request, to Cambria County, Pennsylvania, and began the great work of building up Roman-Catholic settlements upon land in that county given and purchased. He won fame by charity and zeal, as "Father Smith," by which name he was naturalized (1802). In 1809 he was allowed by a special act of the Legislature to take his family name. His difficulties and pecuniary embarrassments, arising from his failure to pay for the extensive tract he had bought in the expectation of receiving his Russian fortune, were numerous; but, by unwearied diligence and unsparing self-denial, they were largely overcome. He wrote several good books, particularly Defence of Catholic Principles (Pittsburg, 1816), and Letters to a Protestant Friend on the Scriptures (Pittsburg, 1818). See his Life, by Thomas Heyden (Baltimore, 1869), and by Sarah M. Brownson (New York, 1873).

GALLUS, C. Vibius Trebonianus (Roman emperor 251-254), put an end to the persecutions of the Christians which Decius had instituted, but was afterwards led, probably by a horrible plague which terrified the people in Italy and Northern Africa, to adopt harsh measures. Cyprian, in a letter of 253 (Ep. 59), speaks of an edict which ordered all to sacrifice to the Pagan gods. Cornelius, the Bishop of Rome, was banished, and so was his successor, Lucius.

GAMA'LIEL (God is a rewarder), a Pharisee and distinguished rabbi of the first half of the first century, invariably called "the Elder" in distinction from his grandson, Gamaliel of Jabneh. He was the grandson of Hillel. The Talmudists are loud in his praise, and said, that, "since Gamaliel the Elder is dead, there is no glory of the law left." They state that he was president of the Sanhedrin during the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius; but this is doubtful. He appears only as a simple member of that body in the Acts. In the New Testament, Gamaliel is known as Paul's preceptor (Acts xxii. 3), and tolerant above his contemporaries in his attitude towards the Christian religion (Acts v. 34, 39). He wisely counselled moderation on the ground, that, if the new doctrine were of God, man could not overthrow it, or, if it were of man, it would perish of itself. Christian tradition represents that he was the cousin of Nicodemus, and, becoming a convert to Christianity, was baptized by Peter and John (Clem., Recogn., I. 65; Photius, Col., 171). This must be regarded as apocryphal, being entirely out of accord with the Talmud. See GRAUNIUS: Hist. Gamalielis, Vit., 1687; PALMER: Paulus u. Gamaliel, Giessen, 1806; SCHÜRER: N. T. Zeitgesch., p. 458 sq.; SMITH'S Bible Dict.

GAMALIEL OF JABNEH, or the Younger; d. about 115; was famous as a legislator, and head of the supreme judicial Jewish body which met at Jabneh. He visited Rome in 95; and the Talmud abounds in incidents of the journey. See DERENBOURG: Hist. de Palestine, chap. xx.

GAMES AMONG THE HEBREWS. The games enjoyed by the Hebrew youth were music, song, and dancing (cf. Ps. xxx. 11; Jer. xxxi. 13). Another amusement seems to have been the lifting of heavy stones (Zech. xii. 3), and target-shooting (1 Sam. xx. 20). After the exile, Grecian games were introduced in Jerusalem and in other cities of Palestine. Thus Herod created a theatre and amphitheatre at Jerusalem (Joseph., Ant., XV. 8, 1), as well as at Cæsarea (Ibid., XV. 9, 6; War, I. 21, 8); and even contests with wild beasts were celebrated. No wonder that the general body of the Jews hated him. In the Talmudic period other games were known; but in general gaming was interdicted, and a gambler's testimony was not admitted.

GANGRA, the metropolis of Paphlagonia, was the seat of a council which assembled there, at an uncertain date in the middle of the fourth century, against the Eustathians. This sect had pushed their asceticism to an extreme, rejecting marriage, not only for priests, but also for laymen, demanding complete abstinence from flesh, etc. They were condemned by the council; but as the council recommended marriage not only in general, but also for priests, it has caused great embarrassment to the Roman-Catholic Church in her propaganda for sacerdotal celibacy.

GARASSE, François, b. at Angoulême, 1585; d. at Poitiers, June 14, 1631; entered the order of the Jesuits in 1601, and made quite a sensation as a preacher by his smart allusions and the peculiar vivacity of his manner. To posterity, however, he is principally known as a polemical writer. He wrote, against the freethinkers of the age, La doctrine curieuse des beaux esprits de ce temps, 1623; against the Protestants, Elixir Calvinisticum, 1615, and Rabelais réformé, 1622, etc. But he lacks knowledge and dignity, often even truthfulness and simple decency. The Roman Catholics themselves were scandalized at his diatribes.

SUDHOFF.

GARDINER, James, Col., was b. in Scotland, Jan. 10, 1688, and killed at the battle of Prestonpans, Sept. 21, 1745. The interest of his life centres in his remarkable conversion. He led a career of licentiousness until July, 1719. At a midnight hour, just before the time he had appointed for an assignation with a married woman, as he was listlessly looking through a book called The Christian Soldier, "an unusual blaze of light" suddenly illuminated its pages. Looking up, he saw a "visible representation of the Christ upon the cross, and heard a voice," etc. The consequence was that he forsook his old courses, and thereafter led an exemplary Christian life, each day being inaugurated with two hours spent in devotion. These facts are narrated in DODDIDGE'S Life of Col. Gardiner. The edition of the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Philadelphia, is convenient in size.

GARDINER, Stephen, Bishop of Winchester, a conspicuous actor in the opposition to the English Reformation; was b. at Bury St. Edmund's, 1483; d. Nov. 12, 1555. He was the illegitimate son of Dr. Woodville, Bishop of Salisbury, and brother of Elizabeth Woodville, Edward IV.'s queen. He was educated at Cambridge, and attained great proficiency in the departments of canonical and civil law. After acting as Wolsey's private secretary, he came into the service of the king. He took a prominent part in the negotiations for the divorce with Catherine, and was sent on missions to Pope Clement VII. In 1531 his services were rewarded with the bishopric of Winchester. He defended the supremacy of the king in an able tract, De Vera Obedientia. But he was not in sympathy with the reforming tendencies, and, but for the royal intervention, would have fastened charges of heresy on Crammer. Under Edward VI. he was committed to prison for his opposition to the Reformation, where he remained, with the exception of a brief interval, for five years. The favor of Mary released him from prison, restored him to his bishopric, and made him lord-chancellor. He negotiated the marriage-treaty with Philip, for which he had, however, a personal repugnance. He was at first in sympathy with the persecution of the Protestants, but afterwards seems to have revolted from it, and retired, leaving the work to the more callous Bonner. Gardiner was an able man, as his influence in two administrations attests. He was probably neither so unscrupulous nor vindictive as some historians have contended.

GARISSOLES, Antoine, b. at Montanban, 1587; d. there 1651; was first pastor of Puy-laurens, and then, after 1628, professor of theology in the academy of his native city. He presided at the national synod of Charenton (1645), and published in 1648 Decreti Synodici Carentonensis, setting forth with impartiality and moderation the reasons why the synod condemned the book by Placeus. Among his other works are some sermons (La Voie de Salut, 1637), and some Latin poems in honor of Gustavus Adolphus and Queen Christina.

GARNET, Henry Highland, D.D., a prominent colored clergyman; b. in New Market, Kent County, Md., April 15, 1815; d. at Monrovia, Liberia, Feb. 13, 1882. His father was a slave in Maryland, and he was born in slavery; but his father's escape in 1834 to New York enabled him to get an education. He was graduated (1840) at the Oneida Institute, Whitetown, N. Y., a manual labor school; was licensed by the presbytery of Troy, 1842, and settled in Troy 1843. He had a distinguished career, being for many years a Presbyterian pastor in New York, where he was greatly esteemed for his high character, and abilities as a preacher and pastor and as a leader of the colored population there. He was the first colored man who on any occasion spoke in the National Capitol, where he preached on Sunday, Feb. 12, 1865, in the hall of the House of Representatives. In June, 1881, he was appointed United-States minister resident and consul to Liberia; and President Garfield's last official act (July 1) was to sign his commission. He staid, however, in this country, out of delicacy, until November, when, being a second time nominated and confirmed, he finally sailed Nov. 12, and arrived at his field of labor Dec. 28.

GARNIER, Jean, b. in Paris, 1612; d. at Bologna, Oct. 16, 1681; entered the order of Jesuits in 1628; was professor of theology at various colleges of the order, and produced a series of critical and historical works relating to the history of doctrines, which are still of great value: Juliani Eclanensis Libellus (1668), and Marii Mercatoris Opera (1673), editions with notes and introductions throwing new light on the history of Pelagianism; Libertus Brevariium (1675), a valuable contribution to the history of the Nestorian and Eutychiean controversies; Liber diurnus Romanorum pontificum, and a supplement to Theodoret, edited, after his death, by Hardouin.

GARNIER, Julien, b. at Commerai about 1670; d. in Paris, June 3, 1725; entered the congregation of St. Maur in 1683, and was, on account of his comprehensive knowledge of the Greek language and literature, charged in 1701 by his order with the edition of the works of St. Basil. Twenty years later the first volume appeared of Seti Patris nostri Basilii Opera omnia, in folio, and the next year the second; but the third and last was edited by Prudent Maran, after the death of Garnier.

CARVE, Karl Bernhard, b. in the neighborhood of Hanover, Jan. 4, 1763; d. at Herrnhut, June 22, 1811; was educated by the Moravian Brethren, and was successively preacher to the congregations of Brethren at Zeyst, Amsterdam, Ebersdorf, Norden, Berlin (where he rendered great services during the period between 1810 and 1816), and Nunsalz on the Oder, from which he retired in 1836 on account of old age. He published Christliche Gesänge, Gortitz, 1825, containing 303 hymns, and Brüdergesänge, Gnadau, 1827, containing 65 hymns, most of which are original, and occupying a prominent place in the hymnology of the present century on account of their clearness and tenderness. K. SUDHOFF.

CASPARIN, Agénor, Comte de, a distinguished layman of the French-Protestant Church; b. in Orange, France, July 12, 1810; d. at Geneva, May 8, 1871. In the early part of his life he took an active interest in French politics, and in 1842 represented Bastia in the House of Deputies. Religious subjects, however, engrossed a large share of his attention. In 1846 he published 2 vols. on Christianisme et Paganisme; and in 1848, at the synod of the Reformed Churches, he joined Frédéric Monod in advocating the necessity of a well-defined creed. The last twenty-three years of his life were spent in Switzerland, at Geneva. His eloquence did good service in the cause of evangelical religion and morality. He delivered lectures on many different subjects in the hall of the "Reformation," many of which were published. He was a pronounced enemy of slavery, and wrote, in advocacy of the Northern cause, two volumes, Un grand peuple qui se relève, 1861, and l'Amérique devant l'Europe, 1862 (Eng. trans., America before Europe, 3d ed., New York, 1862). A paper prepared by him on The Care of the Sick, for the Evangelical Alliance Conference, New York, 1873, was forwarded by his widow, and is published in its proceedings. He wrote also Schools of Doubt and Schools of Faith, Edinburgh, 1854. Madame Gasparin, his wife, was also a graceful author. Her Near and Heavenly Horizons (New York, 1864), and Human Sadness (Boston, 1864), have been translated. See A. NAVILLE: Le Comte Ag. de Gasparin, Genève, 1871; and BOREL: Le Comte Ag. de G., Paris, 1879 (Eng. trans., New York [1880]).

GATAKER, Thomas, a scholarly divine, and member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, was the son of the chaplain to Robert, Earl of Leicester; b. in London, Sept. 4, 1574; d. at Rotherhithe, July 27, 1654. In 1590 he went to St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1599 was chosen fellow of the newly founded Sidney College. In 1601 he became preacher at Lincoln's-inn, and in 1611 removed to the living of Rotherhithe, Surrey. He outlived four wives. In 1613 he was called by Parliament to sit as a member of the Assembly of Divines. He was offered and refused the mastership of Trinity College, Cambridge. Gataker was a man of much learning, and the author of a number of works. His first book, Of the Nature and Use of Lots (London, 1619, pp. 360), grew out of sermons preached at Lincoln's-inn, and was designed to vindicate the lawfulness of "ludicrous lots" (games of chance), and to condemn "divinatory or consultory lots." This work led to a controversy, and drew forth from him two more books on the same subject in 1623 (pp. 275) and 1638 (in Latin, pp. 61). A Discussion of the Popish Doctrine of Transubstantiation, and A Short Catechism, appeared in 1624, two volumes of Sermons, 1637 sq.; and in 1645 (3d ed., 1657) he published English Annotations upon Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations (a part of the Assembly's Annotations). Gataker also sent forth valuable critical works, among which was the edition of Marcus Antoninus, which Hallam says "was the earliest edition of any classical writer published in England with original annotations." These last were edited by the learned WIRSIUS in a large volume, Opera Critica, Utrecht, 1698. See CLARKE'S Genl. Martyrologic, Lond., 1677 (3d ed. pp. 248 sqq.); BROOKS: Lives of the Puritans, III. pp. 200-223.

GAUDEN, John, b. at Mayfield, in Essex, 1605; d. at Worcester, Sept. 20, 1662; educated at Cambridge; master of the Temple 1659; bishop of Exeter 1660, and of Worcester 1662. He claimed to have written the Eikon Basilike (Εἰκὼν Βασιλική, — The Portraiture of his Sacred Majesty in his Solitudes and Sufferings); but careful and protracted examination has decided against him, and in favor of Charles I., who was the king meant. The book itself appeared in 1648; was replied to by Milton (Eikonoclastes, 1649). It is a defence of the king's conduct, and an account of his misfortunes from the calling of the Long Parliament (1640) to his confinement in Carisbrooke Castle (1648), written throughout in the first person, divided into short sections, each of which is followed by a page or two of meditations and prayers; and at the end are more extended meditations upon death, and a proposed address to Parliament. The book is well written, and its piety is genuine. Gauden was a member of the Savoy Conference (see CONFERENCE, SAVOY); and according to Baxter, though he had a bitter pen, he was moderate in speech; "and, if all had been of his mind, we had been reconciled."

GAUDENTIUS, b. about 360; succeeded Philastrius as Bishop of Brixia (the present Brescia) in 387, and was still living in 410, in which year Rufinus dedicated to him his translation of the Recognitions of Clement. A number of sermons by him, among which are ten dedicated to a certain Benevolus who by sickness was prevented from attending service in the church, are still extant, and are found in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Lat., XX.

GAUL. Of the Christianization of Gaul there is a double report by the école légendaire, or antigrégorienne, and by the école historique, or grégorienne. According to the former, all the principal places of Gaul were Christianized by persons mentioned in the New Testament, or closely connected with it. Thus Lazarus and his two sisters and their servants were put in a small boat by the Jews, and abandoned to the winds and the waves. The boat drifted ashore in Southern Gaul; and Marseilles, Aix, Tarascon, etc., were Christianized by its crew. The three disciples of Paul (Trophimus, Crescens, and Sergius Paulus) preached at Arles, Vienne, and Narbonne. St. Aphrodisius, who for seven years rendered hospitality to the holy family in Egypt, founded Christianity at Béziers; Dionysius Areopagita, in Paris; Zacchæus the publican, at Cahors, etc. The only particle of historical foundation for all these legends is 2 Tim. iv. 10, where Paul says that Crescens had gone to Gaul; but the reading is uncertain. Tischendorf and the revised English translation have Galatia, instead of Gaul.

The école historique ascribes the conversion of Gaul to the energy of the papal see, and founds its view on the authority of Gregory of Tours, who certainly had the very best opportunity to learn the truth about it. In his Annales Francorum he says that in 250, under the reign of Decius, the Pope consecrated seven bishops, and sent them to Gaul; namely, Gatian to Tours, Trophimus to Arles, Paul to Narbonne, Saturnin or Sermin to Toulouse, Denis to Paris, Stremionius to Avernus, and Martial to Limousin. The progress of the undertaking was slow. At the opening of the fourth century there were very few Christians in the interior of the country; though at the beginning of the fifth century each of the hundred and twelve cities of Gaul enumerated in the Notitia provinciarum et civitatum Gallie had its bishop. Gregory corroborates his narrative by quoting the acts of the martyr St. Sermin; and his statement has, in its general outline, been confirmed by later historical and archaeological investigations, though the story of the contemporaneous arrival of the seven bishops presents some difficulties, and shows a somewhat legendary coloring.

There is one point, however, at which safe historical ground is reached as early as 177; namely, Lyons. In his Hist. Eccl. (V. 1) Eusebius transcribes a letter sent by the congregations of Vienne and Lyons to the congregations of Asia and Phrygia, and narrating the martyrdom of Pothinus, Bishop of Lyons, and a number of other Christians. Another letter, addressed by the same congregations to Bishop Eleutherus of Rome, and recommending to him Irenæus, at that time presbyter at Lyons, is found in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., V. 4). It is certain that this church of Lyons was founded by Greek missionaries from Asia Minor. It is probable that they, on their passage through Viennois and Narbonnais, founded Christian communities also in those places, but it is doubtful how far Christianity spread; though the peculiar development of the Gallican Church, and more especially the differences between the Roman and the Gallican liturgies, indicates the existence in Gaul of a powerful influence different from that of Rome. The complete literature on this subject has been given by E. RUELLE: Bibliographie générale de la Gaule, 1879. See the articles on DIONYSIUS AREOPAGITA, IRENÆUS, GREGORY OF TOURS, etc.

GAUSSEN, Étienne, b. at Nîmes in the beginning of the seventeenth century; d. at Saumur, 1675; was professor there, first of philosophy (1651), and then of theology (1665). The school of Saumur represented at that time a more liberal conception of French Protestantism than that represented by the schools of Sedan and Montauban; and Gausсен contributed much to propagate those views. His works were frequently reprinted both in Holland and Germany: as, for instance, his De Utilitate Philosophicæ ad Theologiam, Saumur, 1670, last edition, Halle, 1727.

GAUSSEN, François Samuel Robert Louis, b. at Geneva, Aug. 25, 1790; d. there June 18, 1863; was appointed pastor of Satigny in 1816, but dismissed in 1834; and from 1836 till his death taught dogmatics in the theological school of Geneva, founded by the Evangelical Society in 1831. Under the influence of Cellérier (his predecessor at Satigny) and the remarkable Scotch layman Robert Haldane, he became an ardent champion of the strict orthodox Calvinism; and, though he was very far from being an agitator, he soon came in decided opposition to the rationalistic compagnie des pasteurs of Geneva. In 1827 the compagnie tried to compel him to introduce their rationalistic catechism in his church; but he absolutely refused. A compromise was effected, however; but when the Evangelical Society, one of whose founders he was, established a new theological school in direct opposition to the old one taught by the Rationalists, and Merle d'Aubigné and Hävernick were invited to Geneva, he left Satigny, and became a professor there. Of his works several have been translated into English; as, for instance, Théopneustie, 1842; 14th ed., 1850 (a defence of verbal inspiration); Geneva and Jerusalem, 1844; Geneva and Rome, 1844; Lessons for the Young, 1860; Canon of Holy Scripture, 1862, abridged by Rev. Dr. Kirk, Boston, n.d.

GA'ZA (strong), the present Guzzeh, a city on the shore of the Mediterranean Sea, near the boundary-line between Egypt and Palestine; was a flourishing centre of Canaanite civilization in the time of Abraham, and fell by the division of the country to the lot of Judah (Josh. xv. 47). It afterwards formed one of the members of the Philistine Pentapolis, and figures prominently in the history of Samson, Solomon, the Prophets, Alexander the Great, the Ptolemies, the Maccabees, Herod the Great, and the Romans. Taken and almost destroyed in A.D. 634 by the Arabs, it was restored by the crusaders, but was again conquered by Saladin in 1170. At present it has about sixteen thousand inhabitants.

GEBHARD II. (Truchsess von Waldburg), b. at Waldburg, Nov. 10, 1547; d. at Strassburg, May 21, 1601; was elected Archbishop of Cologne, Dec. 3, 1577, and confirmed by the Pope, April 14, 1578. But a love-affair with Agnes of Mansfeld gave a sudden turn to his career in the service of the church. By an edict of Dec. 19, 1582, he established religious liberty and freedom of worship in his dominions; Jan. 16, 1583, he published a declaration acknowledging his own conversion to the Lutheran Church; and Feb. 2, 1583, he married Agnes of Mansfeld. But by a bull of April 1, 1583, Gregory XIII. deposed him, and declared the see of Cologne vacant; and May 22, 1583, Duke Ernst of Bavaria was elected archbishop by the chapter. The fight now began. Ernst held the metropolis of the diocese, but Gebhard was in possession of the strong fortress Bonn. The latter, however, did not receive the support he expected from the other Protestant princes of Germany. They had no sympathy for him. Toleration and religious liberty they hated and despised as heartily as did the Roman Catholics, and a suspicion of Calvinism hovered over the unfortunate Gebhard. In January, 1584, Bonn was taken, and thereby his cause was lost. He sought aid in Holland, in England, in Germany, but everywhere in vain, and retired finally to Strassburg, where he lived and died entirely forgotten.

GEDDES, Alexander, a Roman-Catholic scholar; b. at the farm of Arradoul, in the parish of Rathven, Banffshire, Scotland, Sept. 11, 1737; d. in London, Feb. 26, 1802. After studying in the Roman-Catholic seminary at Scalau, and later in Paris, he became chaplain to the Earl of Traquair (1765), pastor at Auchinhalrig (1769), deprived (1779) for attendance upon Protestant worship, after having been repeatedly blamed by his bishop for his intimacy with Protestants, and the next year he went with Lord Traquair to London. In 1792 he was able, through the munificence of Lord Petre, to publish the first volume (Genesis to Joshua) of a translation, with notes, of the Bible from the original text, and the second in 1797 (Judges to Ruth). The work was chiefly remarkable as that of a Roman-Catholic priest; for it boldly accepted the deductions of the critical school of Eichhorn, and unhesitatingly corrected the original text in accordance with the suggestions of Houbigant, Kemnicott, and Michaelis. Neither Protestants nor Roman Catholics could approve the work. He was suspended, and "the faithful" were warned against his translation. Undismayed, he issued in 1800 his Critical Remarks on the Hebrew Scriptures, corresponding with a New Translation of the Bible, containing the Pentateuch, in which he reiterated previous statements. At the time of his death he was engaged upon a critical-translation of the Psalms, and had reached the eleventh verse of the hundred and eighteenth. It was published, edited by Dr. Disney and Charles Butler, and completed by Dr. Geddes's corrections to Bishop Wilson's Bible, Lond., 1807. See Memoirs of his Life and Writings, by JOHN MASON GOOD, Lond., 1803.

GEDDES, Janet, or Jenny, a Scottish heroine. When it was proposed, in the reign of Charles I., by advice of Archbishop Laud, to introduce the English Liturgy into Scotland, it raised a storm of indignation. The dean of Edinburgh, however, made the experiment in the Cathedral Church of St. Giles, Sunday, July 23, 1637, in the presence of the privy council and the city magistrates. According to the usual story, an old herb-woman called Janet Geddes, hearing the archbishop direct the dean in finding the collect for the day (seventh Sunday after Trinity), confounded "cholic" and "collect," and exclaimed in indignation, "Villain, dost thou say mass at my lug?" (ear), and hurled the stool upon which she had been sitting at the dean's head. This was the signal for a riot in and about the cathedral. The people shouted through the streets, "A pope, a pope! Antichrist! the sword of the Lord and of Gideon!" the ultimate result of which was, because it was an outburst of popular feeling by no means confined to Edinburgh, the withdrawal of the Liturgy. Thus, as Stanley says, "The stool which was on that occasion flung at the head of the dean of Edinburgh extinguished the English Liturgy entirely in Scotland for the seventeenth century, to a great extent even till the nineteenth, and gave to the civil war in England an impulse which only ended in the overthrow of the Church and Monarchy." The disturbance was entirely unpremeditated. Some historians give Barbara Hamilton as the name of the heroine. GEHEN'NA is a word used in the New Testament for "hell." Comp. Matt. v. 29, 30, x. 28, xviii. 9, xxiii. 15; Mark ix. 43, 45; Luke xii. 5; and James iii. 6. It is used in distinction from "hades" when either the torments of hell itself, or the idea of a hellish torment, is to be expressed. The passages of the New Testament show plainly that the word "gehenna" was a popular expression for "hell," of which Jesus and the apostles made use; but it would be erroneous to infer that Jesus and his apostles merely accommodated themselves to the popular expression, without believing in the actual state of the lost. The word "gehenna" is the Greek representative of a Hebrew word denoting the "Valley of Hinnom," or "of the son," or "children of Hinnom," — a deep, narrow glen to the south of Jerusalem, where the Jews offered their children to Moloch (2 Kings xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 31, xix. 2-6). In later times it served as the receptacle of all sorts of putrefying matter and all that defiled the holy city; and thus it became the image of the place of everlasting punishment, especially on account of its ever-burning fires; and to this fact the words of Christ refer when he says, "and the fire is not quenched."

GEIBEL, Johannes, b. at Hanau, April 1. 1776; d. at Lübeck, July 25, 1853; studied at Marburg, and became pastor of the Reformed Congregation in Lübeck 1797; which position he resigned in 1847. He was an eloquent and impressive preacher, an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism, and exercised considerable influence also outside of the Reformed Congregation. One of his most remarkable writings, besides his sermons, is his Wiederherstellung der ersten christlichen Gemeinde, Lübeck, 1840, published under the pseudonym of Philalethes.

GEIGER, Abraham, Hebrew and Talmudical scholar; b. at Frankfort-on-the-Main, May 21, 1810; d. at Berlin, Oct. 23, 1874. He was rabbi at Wiesbaden, Breslau, Frankfort, and Berlin; belonged to the Reformed Jews, and in their interest founded, with some others, the Zeitschrift für jüdische Theologie (1835). His principal publications were an essay upon the Jewish sources of the Koran (Was hat Mohammed aus dem Judenthum aufgenommen? 1833), monographs (Studien) upon Maimonides (1850) and other Jews of the middle age, Uebersetzungen der Bibel in ihrer Abhängigkeit von der innern Entwicklung des Judenthums (1857), Die Sadducäer u. Pharisäer (1863), Das Judenthum und seine Geschichte (1864-71, Eng. trans. of vol. i., Lond., 1866). And posthumous are his Allgemeine Einleitung und Nachgelassene Schriften, 5 vols., edited by his son, 1875. Of these works that on the Urschrift was the chief, as it was the fruit of twenty years of study, and "marked a new departure in the methods of studying the records of Judaism."

GEIGER, Franz Tiburtius, b. at Harting, near Ratisbon, 1755; d. at Lucerne, May 8, 1843; entered the order of the Franciscans in 1772, and became professor of theology at Lucerne in 1792. Lucerne was the seat of the papal nuncios, and the centre of Roman-Catholic Switzerland, and from here Geiger exercised a considerable influence on the revival and consolidation of ultramontanist feelings and ideas, both by his lectures and by a great number of minor pamphlets, collected in eight volumes by RÄBER. See WIDMER: Franz Geiger, Lucerne, 1843.

GEILER, Johann, b. at Kaisersberg, near

Schaffhausen, March 16, 1445; d. at Strassburg, March 10, 1510; studied philosophy and the humanities at Freiburg, but was by Gerson's writings drawn towards theology; went to Basel in 1471, and became doctor theologie there in 1475; returned to Freiburg as professor of theology, but removed in 1478 to Strassburg, where he spent the rest of his life as preacher at the cathedral. Towards the end of the fifteenth century a tendency became apparent almost everywhere among the preachers to throw off the yoke of scholasticism, and to give to the sermon a freer course, a greater life, a deeper impressiveness. This tendency did not originate among the Humanists. It sprung from a feeling which the rapid progress of the printing-press, and the effect it had on the people, awakened within the church itself, that it was necessary to establish a much more intimate relation between the pulpit and the mass of the people, if the former should not entirely lose its hold on the latter. One of the most remarkable representatives of this tendency is Geiler von Kaisersberg. He took his texts not from Scripture only, but also from Gerson's works, from Brant's Narrenschiff; from a barber's song, from everywhere; and the text chosen he applied directly, without flinching, to the real life which presented itself before his pulpit, in form which our taste may now and then find somewhat coarse, but which on his time produced the deepest impression. His sermons were often taken down while he delivered them, then translated into Latin (often with omission of the facete which could not be translated), and then again into High German. Thus there exists a great number of collections of his sermons, more or less genuine; but all of them, even the tamest Latin renderings, show the same fundamental character. See works upon Geiler's life and writings by AMMON (Erlangen, 1826), AUGUST STOEBER (Strassburg, 1831), [DACHEUX (Paris, 1877), also by Dr. P. DE LORENZI, in his edition of GEILER'S Ausgewählte Schriften, vols. I., II., Trier, 1881.] C. SCHMIDT.

GELASIUS is the name of two popes. — Gelasius I. (March 1, 492–Nov. 19, 496) inherited the controversy with the Constantinopolitan see concerning Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, whom Pope Felix III. had excommunicated because he leaned towards Monophysitism, but whose name was still retained in the diptychs of the Constantinopolitan Church. In 495 Gelasius repeated the excommunication, and cursed all who did not accept it. The controversy became so much the more acrimonious as the real question at issue was one of precedence. It was not the orthodoxy of his predecessor, but the supremacy of his see, which Gelasius fought for; and, in the numerous letters he wrote during the controversy, he pushed his arrogance to an extreme, and set forth claims hitherto unheard of. He demanded the right to receive appeals from everywhere in the world, though he allowed no appeal from Rome to any other court; the right to confirm or cancel the decisions of other bishops, though none were allowed to question the decisions of Rome, etc. Besides his letters, he left several minor writings, of which the most remarkable is the Decretum de libris recipiendis et non recipiendis, the first Index librorum prohibitorum.

Its genuineness is contested; but though it may have been begun by Damasus, and finished by Hormisdas, the bulk of the work seems, nevertheless, to belong to Gelasius. Among the books forbidden are the works of Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Arnobius, Lactantius, and Origen. His writings are found in AND. THEL: Epist. Rom. Pontif., Brunsberg, 1867: his life, in Liber. Pontif., vol. i.; and in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 53.—Gelasius II. (1118–Jan. 19, 1119) was seized, immediately after his election, by the faction of the Frangipani, and liberated only by the rising of the people of Rome. But he had hardly escaped the Frangipani before a still greater danger began to loom up. As soon as Henry V. heard that a new pope had been elected without his consent being asked for, he hastened to Italy, and March 2, 1118, he entered Rome. Afraid of being compelled to make a compromise similar to that which his predecessor Paschalis II. had made, Gelasius II. fled to Capua, and April 7, 1118, he excommunicated the emperor, and the antipope whom the emperor had got elected in Rome under the name of Gregory VIII. Shortly after, he returned to Rome, but was once more driven away by the Frangipani and the imperial party. He fled to France, and died on the way to Cluny. His life by Pandulfus, is found in WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vita, Tom. II.; his letters, in MIGNE: Patrol. Latin., vol. 163; cf. JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., pp. 522 sq. R. ZÖPFEL.

GELASIUS OF CYZICUS lived about 475, and wrote a history of the first Council of Nicaea, which was published by Robert Balfour, Paris, 1599, and is found in the collections of councils by Labbé, Harduin, and Mansi. The work is of very little value, however, consisting mostly of fictitious speeches, and of debates between heathen philosophers and Christian bishops.

GELLERT, Christian Fürchtegott, b. at Haynichen, Saxony, July 4, 1715; d. at Leipzig, Dec. 13, 1769; studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor extraordinary there in 1751. He wrote comedies, fables, essays on morals and aesthetics, and hymns. His Fables was one of the most popular books which the German literature produced in the eighteenth century, and it is still read. His hymns made almost an equal impression; they were translated into Dutch, Danish, Bohemian, Russian, etc., and were praised even by the Roman Catholics. It is true that they have been severely criticised; but no disparagement has been able to take Gellert out of the hearts of the people, nor his poems out of the church. [One of his hymns, "Jesus lives, and I with him," is found in many English hymn-books.] His collected works have been frequently reprinted, as in 10 vols. at Leipzig, 1867. His Life was written by J. A. Cramer, Leipzig, 1771. A Gellertbuch was published in Dresden, 1851. HAGENBACH.

GENEALOGY.¹ The matter of pedigree was deemed of great importance by the Hebrews and ancient peoples generally, as at present among the Arabs. Genealogical lists are interspersed all through the historical books of the Old Testament. They are called "the book of the generation of," etc. They answer, also, a spiritual purpose. They prove the faithfulness of God in favoring the increase of the race, in accordance with his command, in keeping his promise to Abraham and his seed, in raising up priests to minister in his sanctuary, and, finally, in sending, when the set time had come and all things were ready, his Son into the world. As far as the Bible is concerned, the preservation of these genealogical lists was for the authentication of Christ's descent. But the historical use is by no means to be ignored: indeed, in proportion as we grasp its value shall we attain conviction of the perfect reality of the earthly descent of Christ from the seed of David, according to prophecy. "The genealogies of Scripture," says Professor G. Rawlinson, "dry and forbidding as is their first aspect, will well repay a careful and scholarly study. They are like an arid range of bare and stony mountains, which, when minutely examined, reveals to the investigator mines of emerald or diamond. Only let the searcher bear in mind that where all is dark to him it may be reserved for future inquirers to let in upon the darkness a flood of light" (The Origin of Nations, p. 166).

The first biblical genealogy is Gen. iv. 16–24. It gives the descendants of Cain. The following chapter gives the family of Seth. The tenth and eleventh chapters, though the ordinary reader might pass them over because they seem to consist of mere unimportant names, are regarded by ethnologists as invaluable, since they contain a history of the dispersion of the nations in prehistoric times. The first eight chapters of 1 Chronicles are devoted to genealogical accounts, beginning with Adam, because, as it is stated, "all Israel were reckoned by genealogies" (1 Chron. ix. 1). It is, however, to be observed that these several lists are not in all cases records of direct descent; though perhaps, in the majority of instances, they are unbroken. Still they are not sufficient to determine the length of any period, since, in many cases, the list the writer has transcribed contains only prominent names. Women are named occasionally, when there is something remarkable about them, or when any right or property is transmitted through them (see Gen. xi. 29; Exod. vi. 23; 1 Chron. ii. 4; Luke i. 5, etc.). Another feature is, that these records especially concern the line of the chosen seed and the tribe and family from which our Lord sprung. Seth's family is more fully stated than Cain's, Abraham's than Lot's, Isaac's than Ishmael's, etc. The lists are both ascending and descending. For the former see 1 Chron. vi. 33–43, Ez. vii. 1–5; for the descending see Ruth iv. 18–22, 1 Chron. iii. The descending scale is likely to take in the collateral branches. There are many clerical errors in these lists.

But, notwithstanding these alterations and abridgments, it is capable of proof that the Bible presents us transcripts from certain official records. They bear the evidence of substantial truth. That such records existed is indicated rather than proved. Thus the assignments of the temple-service by David were genealogical. In the reign of Rehoboam, Iddo wrote a book on genealogies (2 Chron. xii. 15). From 2 Chron.

xxx. 16-19 we learn that in Hezekiah's day there existed genealogies of the priests, at all events. The lists in Ezra and Nehemiah prove that such lists and others survived the captivity. It is a monstrous assumption to say that they were forged. Lord Hervey (in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible) points out an incidental allusion to these lists at the time of Christ, in proof that the census went upon them as a basis; since Joseph went to Bethlehem because he was of the house of David. Manifestly Joseph had, in the genealogy of his family, good grounds for this belief. Probably "the registers of the Jewish tribes and families perished at the destruction of Jerusalem, and not before; although some partial records may have survived the event." When the temple fell, there was no longer any special need of these lists. The Aaronic priesthood was no more; the nation was dispersed in captivity; the Messiah was come.

Genealogy of Jesus Christ (Matt. i. 1-17; Luke iii. 23-38). This is the only genealogy given us in the New Testament. "We have two lists of the human ancestors of Christ. Matthew, writing for Jewish Christians, begins with Abraham; Luke, writing for Gentile Christians, goes back to Adam, the father of all men. According to his human nature, Christ was the descendant of Abraham, David, and Mary: according to his divine nature, he was the eternal and only-begotten Son of God, begotten from the essence of the Father. John (i. 1-18) begins his Gospel by setting forth his divine genealogy. In him, the God-man, all the ascending aspirations of human nature toward God, and all the descending revelations of God to man, meet in perfect harmony. Matthew begins at Abraham (1) to prove to Jewish Christians that Jesus of Nazareth was the promised Messiah, (2) to show the connection between the Old and New Testaments through a succession of living persons ending in Jesus Christ, who is the subject of the Gospel, and the object of the faith it requires. Christ is the fulfilment of all the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, the heir of all its blessings and promises, the dividing-line and connecting-link of ages, the end of the old and the beginning of the new history of mankind. In the long list of his human ancestors we have a cloud of witnesses, a compend of the history of preparation for the coming of Christ down to the Virgin Mary, in whom culminated the longing and hope of Israel for redemption. It is a history of divine promises and their fulfilment, of human faith and hope for the desire of all nations. In the list are named illustrious heroes of faith, but also obscure persons written in the secret book of God, as well as gross sinners redeemed by grace, which reaches the lowest depths, as well as the most exalted heights, of society. Matthew's table is divided into three parts, corresponding to three periods of preparation for the coming of Christ."—Schaff.

The differences between Matthew and Luke have been variously explained. They prove the independence of the two evangelists, who drew from different but equally trustworthy sources. Both lists are incomplete, and names must be supplied (there are only nine names for a period of eight hundred and thirty-three years). They coincide until David; when Matthew takes the reigning line through Solomon, Luke the younger and inferior line by David's son Nathan. A more serious difficulty is, that names do not appear in the same place in the two lists. Luke gives twenty-one names between David and Zerubbabel, Matthew only fifteen; and all the names except that of Shealtiel (Salathiel) are different. Luke gives seventeen names between Zerubbabel and Joseph, Matthew only nine; and all the names are different. The greatest difference is, that Matthew calls Joseph the son of Jacob, while Luke calls him the son of Heli, or Eli. He cannot have been naturally the son of both; and it is not likely that the two names are meant for one and the same person. Hence the following theories:—

1. The oldest explanation assumes one, or perhaps two, levirate marriages in the family of Joseph; i.e., a marriage of a man to the childless widow of his elder brother; the children of the second marriage being reckoned as the legal descendants of the first husband. Heli and Jacob may have been brothers, or half-brothers (sons of the same mother, but of different fathers), successively married to the mother of Joseph, who, according to law, was registered by Luke as the son of Heli, though naturally the son of Jacob, as recorded by Matthew. But this view involves inaccuracy in one or the other of the two genealogies.

2. Matthew gives the legal or royal genealogy of Joseph; Luke, the private line of Joseph. The one gives the heirship to the throne of David and Solomon (the ius successionis); the other, the actual descent, through Nathan and private persons, from a collateral line (the ius sanguinis). This is the prevailing view of English divines; but then Matthew could not have properly used the verb "begat;" for the line of Solomon failed in Jeconiah (Jer. xxii. 30).

3. Matthew gives the genealogy of Joseph; Luke, the genealogy of Mary. Heli may have been the father of Mary and the father-in-law of Joseph, and consequently the grandfather of Jesus. Luke, writing for Gentiles, and proving that Christ was the seed of the woman, traces the natural or real pedigree of Jesus through his mother, Mary, in the line of Nathan, and indicates this by the parenthetical remark, "Jesus being (as was supposed) the son of Joseph [but in reality], the son of Heli," or his grandson by the mother's side. Mary is always called by the Jews "the daughter of Heli." Matthew, writing for Jews, gives the legal pedigree of Jesus (which was always reckoned in the male line) through Joseph, his legal father, in the line of Solomon. This explanation is the easiest, and has been adopted by Luther, Grotius, Bengel, Olshausen, Ehrard, Wieseler, Robinson, Gardiner, Lange, Plumptre, Weiss, Godet. It is supported by the fact that in Matthew's history of the infancy Joseph is most prominent; in Luke's account, Mary. The Davidic descent of Jesus is a mark of the Messiah, and is clearly taught in the prophecy, and also in Rom. i. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 8; Heb. vii. 14; John vii. 42; Acts xiii. 23. If we take this explanation, Jesus was in a double sense the son of David,—in law and in fact, from his reputed father, and from his natural mother.

GENESIS. See PENTATEUCH.

GENESIUS, a comedian, who, while acting the part of a candidate for Christian baptism, was suddenly converted, acknowledged his conviction, was put to torture, and beheaded (285), and then inscribed among the saints of the Roman Church. His festival falls on Aug. 25. See Act. Sanct., and BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, on date.

GENEVA (French, Genève; German, Genf), the largest city of Switzerland, numbering 68,165 inhabitants in 1876, and the capital of the canton of the same name; was, before the period of the Reformation, subject to the bishop of the diocese of Genevois, who, again, was an immediate fiefholder of the German emperor. There was, however, always dispute between the bishops and the counts of Genevois, later on between the bishops and the dukes of Savoy, concerning the possession of the city; and there was within the city itself, as within most mediæval towns of commercial and industrial consequence, a party which strove for liberty and independence. Backed by Freiburg and Bern, with which alliances were concluded respectively in 1519 and 1526, the party of liberty finally gained the ascendancy. The city constituted itself a republic, expelled the bishop, adopted the Reformation, and succeeded in vindicating its independence against the insidious attacks of the Duke of Savoy until 1798, when it was incorporated with France. In 1814, however, it regained its independence; and, its territory having been increased with some French and Savoy communities, it joined the Swiss confederacy as the twenty-second canton. The area of the canton comprises only 107 square miles, with 99,352 inhabitants in 1876.

The first seeds of the Reformation were sown in Geneva by the French translation of the Bible by Le Fèvre d'Étaples (Faber Stapulensis); and already in 1528 the bishop, the Duke of Savoy, and the Pope were busily engaged in punishing people who possessed or read le livre maudit; they were fined, or scourged, or beheaded. In September, 1532, Farel arrived at Geneva, preceded by Froment, followed by Viret; and in March, 1533, the Reformed doctrine was allowed to be preached and practised in the city. In July, same year, the bishop, Pierre de la Baume, removed his residence from Geneva to Annecy. A violent Roman-Catholic reaction took place in the following year; but it was of short duration. In 1535 the Reformation was adopted as the religion of the State; and in October, 1536, Calvin arrived. He soon found himself at the head of the whole movement, political as well as religious; and by his iron hand a theocracy of a very stern type was established. The Reformed doctrine became a civil duty, and dogmatical deviations were treated as treason. Ecclesiastical discipline was carried even into the routine of daily life, and a breach of its dictates was punished as a crime. The transition proved too sudden, however. A party was formed, not with any tendency towards Romanism, but for the purpose of sustaining a greater measure of liberty, and in 1538 Calvin was expelled. But it soon became apparent that his austere regimen was a necessity, if Geneva really should fulfil her mission as a frontier fortress against Rome. The city was crowded with refugees from Italy, Spain, France, and England. Each new-comer brought a new system of Protestantism along with him; and the liberty very soon degenerated into a laxity, which the Roman Catholics were not slow to avail themselves of. Calvin was recalled, and the severe order returned with the dictator. Under his rule, and, indeed, for a long time after his death, Geneva stood as the "Rome of Protestantism," the "moral capital of the half of Christendom," forming the strongest and loftiest characters, and sending forth the noblest and most vigorous impulses. It was not only a place of refuge to those who were persecuted, but also a centre of active labor. The English version, called the Geneva Bible, received its name from its being made in that city by English refugees. (See ENGLISH BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 735.)

Under such circumstances it was only natural that the Roman-Catholic Church should consider it one of her great objects to convert Geneva: and many attempts, insidious, daring, foolish attempts, were made, as, for instance, that by François de Sales. But none was more cunningly planned, and more patiently carried out, than that of which our own time has seen the issue. The inhabitants of the territory added to the city in 1814 in order to form the canton of Geneva were exclusively Roman Catholics, and the population of the whole canton was thus nearly equally divided between the two churches. Here was a chance for Rome, and she knew how to improve it. Disputes between the priests and the pastors were of frequent occurrence, and sometimes of great danger to the republic, as, after the fall of Napoleon, a strong current of reaction, both political and religious, had set in everywhere in Europe; and it proved easy for the Roman-Catholic party to bring the influence of France, Russia, and Austria, to bear against their Protestant adversaries. The dissolution of the Holy Alliance, however, and the revolution of 1830, gave the Protestants freer hands; but then the secret work of the Romanists in the social foundation of the State began to show its results. From the very day of the annexation of the rural territories, the Roman clergy exerted itself to prevent an amalgamation between the two denominations. Mixed marriages were prohibited; neighborly courtesy was discouraged; the two confessions seldom met each other, except when doing military service. At the same time a Roman-Catholic immigration was highly favored. Laborers, mechanics, retail dealers, etc., were imported in considerable numbers, and setbled in the city, a propaganda at Lyons furnishing funds; and the Roman Church was soon able to take up the contest with the Protestant party in the political field. The fight actually began, stirred up by the priests. But in the course of a generation the march of affairs took an unexpected turn. The young voters were sent to the polls by their confessors, and to the political meetings. Discussions began between the two confessions; and confessional matters could, of course, not be excluded. The result was that suddenly there appeared within the pale of the Roman-Catholic community a decided opposition to the ultramontanists. This new party, the Liberal-Catholics, invited in 1873 Father Hyacinthe to preach at Geneva; and, as the Genevese laws grant to every congregation the right of electing its pastor itself, many Roman-Catholic congregations chose Old Catholic priests, who rejected the dogma of papal infallibility, and were married.

The history, however, of the Church of Geneva, is by no means confined to her duel with the Roman Church: on the contrary, considerable changes of organization and a significant doctrinal development have taken place. The organization of the sixteenth century remained unaltered for a long time, or underwent only minor modifications, until, in 1846, a radical change was effected, amounting almost to a revolution. Up to 1846 the pastors were chosen by the Févérale Compagnie des Pasteurs, one of the institutions of Calvin, which also had in hand the administration of all religious affairs of the church, and exercised great influence on the academy and the schools. But from that year the authority of the compagnie was confined to questions of worship proper; while the other branches of the administration of the church were placed under the consistoire, composed of twenty-five lay-members and six pastors, and elected by the people; and the pastors were chosen by the congregations. At the same time began that doctrinal difference to develop, which finally led to the formation of the Evangelical Society, and the foundation of a new theological school; for which see the articles on GAUSSEN, MERLE D'AUBIGNÉ, SOCIÉTÉ ÉVANGÉLIQUE, etc.

GENEVÈVE, St., b. 419 or 425, at Nanterre; d. in Paris, Jan. 3, 512; became the patroness of Paris by averting the attack of the Huns, under Attila, from that city by her prayers; built the first church over the tomb of St. Denis; and lies buried in the Church of St. Geneviève, in Paris, which, however, twice (in 1792 and in 1830) has been for a time transformed into a national pantheon. The earliest life of her, written shortly after her death, was published in Paris, in 1687, by Charpentier. See Act. Sanet., and BUTLER, Lives of the Saints, Jan. 3.

GENEVÈVE, Canons of St. (also called Canons of the Congregation of France), a congregation of regular canons founded in 1611 by Charles Faure, from the abbey of St. Vincent de Senlis, who, by the Cardinal de la Rochefoucauld, was called to Paris, and successfully carried through a reform of the abby of St. Geneviève there. A female community of the order (the Daughters of St. Geneviève, or the Miramions) was founded in 1636 by Francisca de Blosset, and in 1660 united to the congregation founded by Marie de Miramion. See Constitutiones Canoniarum regularium Congregationis Gallicanae, Paris, 1676.

GENNADIUS MASSILIENSIS lived, according to notices drawn from his own works, in Gaul during the time of Bishop Gelasius of Rome (492-496) and the Byzantine Emperor Anastatius (491-518), and was a presbyter, not a bishop, at Marseilles. He understood Greek, was well versed both in Eastern and Western ecclesiastical literature, translated several Greek works into Latin, and wrote original works on all heresies, — against Nestorius, against Pelagius, — an Epistola de fide mea, and a catalogue of ecclesiastical authors (De viris illustribus), a continuation of Jerome's work on the same subject. Only the two last-mentioned works have come down to us. The former, if identical with the Liber de ecclesiasticis dogmatibus, seems to have undergone various extensions in the course of time. It was first printed among the works of Augustine, but separately edited by Elmenhorst (Hamburg, 1614) and by Oehler, in Corp. Harescol., 1. The De viris illustribus is valuable, both on account of the vast reading on which it is based, and on account of its impartiality. It was first printed in connection with the work of Jerome, and then edited separately by Fuchte (Helmstädt, 1612) and by S. E. Cyprian (Jena, 1703). Both works are found in MIGNÉ, Patrol. Latin., vol. 58. The dogmatical stand-point of the author is one of Semi-Pelagianism, such as this view prevailed in Gaul, and more especially at Marseilles, at his time. WAGENMANN.

GENNADIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople (1453-59), was one of the most prolific philosophical and theological writers of his age, and the last representative of Byzantine learning. Of his personal life very little is known. He seems to have been born in Constantinople about 1400. His true name was Georgios Scholarios. Having entered the court-service, he was made an imperial councillor, and accompanied in 1438 the Emperor Johannes to the Council of Ferrara-Florence. As a layman, he could not take part in the discussions of the council; but he presented to it three elaborate speeches in favor of the projected union between the Greek and Latin churches, and addressed also his own countrymen in a separate work on the subject. After his return to Greece, however, he entirely changed his views of the union, and became one of its most decided adversaries, speaking and writing against it with passionate obstinacy. This change also disturbed his relations with the emperor; and in 1448 he retired to the monastery of Pantokrator, and became a monk, though still continuing his literary activity. As Mohammed II. after the capture of Constantinople, demanded that the vacant patriarchal chair should be filled, Georgios Scholarios, who as a monk had assumed the name of Gennadius, was unanimously elected, and was duly installed by the Sultan, as had formerly been the patriarchs by the emperors. He presented to the Sultan a kind of confession or exposition of the Christian faith, written with admirable clearness and precision, translated into Turkish by Achmad, Judge of Beroea, and first printed by A. Brassicanus, Vienna, 1530; and he later on followed up the subject by a more elaborate disquisition, in the form of a dialogue between a Turk and a Christian, first printed by A. Brassicanus, Vienna, 1539. He found, however, the position as patriarch under a Turkish sultan so irksome, that in 1459 he abdicated, and retired to the monastery of John the Baptist, near Serræ, in Macedonia, where he died at an unknown date. The number of his works amounts to about a hundred; but most of them still remain in manuscript, and for many of them grave questions have been raised concerning their authenticity and integrity. What has been printed is found in MIGNÉ: Patrologia Græca, vol. 160. See GASS: Gennadius und Pletho, Berl., 1844; [SCHIAFF: Creeds of Christendom, l. 46 sqq.]. WAGENMANN.

GENNESARET is the name of a lake of Palestine, also called the "Sea of Galilee;" of a plain along the north-western shore of the lake, generally called the "Land of Gennesaret;" and of a town situated in the plain. The name is Chimmeroth, or Chimereth, in the Old Testament (Num. xxxiv. 11; Josh. xi. 2; 1 Kings xv. 20), and Gennesar in the Apocrypha (1 Macc. xi. 67), but Gennesaret in the New Testament (Matt. ix. 1; Mark vi. 53; Luke v. 1-11). The town was still in existence in the beginning of the fourteenth century. For the lake and the land, see PALESTINE.

GENOUDE, Eugène de, b. at Montélimart, 1792; d. in the Îles d'Hyères, 1849; played a part in the re-action, political and religious, after the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814, by the side of Chateaubriand, De Maistre, Bonald, and Lamennais; edited various political papers; was ordained a priest in 1835; published a translation of the Bible and of Thomas à Kempis' Imitation of Christ; and wrote La raison du christianisme (Paris, 1831-35, evidences drawn from all sources to the truth of Christianity, a huge compilation in 12 vols.), Sermons (1816), L'histoire d'une âme, a kind of confession, etc. A biography of him was published at Paris by a former colleague in journalism.

GENTILIS, Giovanni Valentino, b. at Cosenza, in Calabria, about 1520; beheaded at Bern, Sept. 10, 1566. He embraced the Reformation, fled from Italy, and settled at Geneva. Remembering the fate of Servetus, he signed the confession of faith which the magistrates demanded every member of the Italian community at Geneva to subscribe to, but continued, nevertheless, to propagate his antitrinitarian views. He was cited before the magistrates, and sentenced to do public penance. Shortly after, he fled from Geneva, and went to Poland, but returned once more to Switzerland, was seized at Bern, imprisoned for heresy, and beheaded. An account of his trial was published by Benedict Aretius. See TRECHSEL: Die protest. Antitrinitarier, Heidelberg, 1839-41, vol. ii. pp. 516 sqq.

GENTILLET, Innocent, was b. at Vienne in Dauphiné, but fled to Geneva on account of the persecutions against the Reformed. In 1576 he returned to France, and was at one time president of the Parliament of Grenoble; but in 1585 he was again compelled to flee, and died at Geneva at an unknown date. He wrote Apologia pro christianis Gallis religionis evangelica (1578), which is considered the best apology for the Reformation ever written, and Le bureau du concile de Trente (1586), an irrefragable argument against the Council of Trent. Both works have often been reprinted.

GENTILLY, Council of (767), was one of those mixed synods, composed of bishops and barons, which were frequently held by the Frankish kings. The occasion was an embassy from the Byzantine emperor, Constantine Copronymus, to King Pepin; and the subjects treated were, no doubt, the questions of image-worship and the procession of the Holy Spirit. But the acts of the council have not come down to us.

GEOFFREY OF MONMOUTH, a famous English chronicler; b. at Monmouth early in the twelfth century; created Bishop of St. Asaph, 1152; d. 1154. His fame rests upon a history of early Britain, entitled Chronicon sive Historia Britonum. The work has been a mine from which later chroniclers drew, and poets down to Tennyson. The first printed edition appeared at Paris, 1568. An English translation by A. THOMPSON, Lond., 1718, has been revised by J. A. GILES, Lond., 1842. See WRIGHT: Essays on Archæol. Subjects, Lond., 1861 (vol. 1).

GEORGE, St., descended from a distinguished family in Cappadocia; entered the Roman army, and rose rapidly, but left it with open protest when the persecution of Diocletian began; and was beheaded at Nicomedia, April 23, 303. According to some he was the person mentioned in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 5), who tore down the imperial proclamation, and was punished by being roasted over a slow fire. The acts of his martyrdom are evidently spurious. Baronius thinks that the Arians falsified them. Many features of the legends about him, as, for instance, the slaying of the dragon, show a decidedly mythical character, and indicate that they originated as symbols. For these reasons the very existence of St. George has been impugned, as, for instance, by Calvin and by Pegge in the eighteenth century. Nevertheless, the worship of him is very old, both in the Eastern and in the Western Church. In the Eastern Church he is first mentioned in an inscription in a church at Ezra or Edhra in Southern Syria, copied by Burckhardt and Porter, and explained by Hogg, who fixes its date at 316. In the Western Church he is first mentioned in the decrees of the Council of Rome (491), which condemned his acts as corrupted by heretics, though vindicating his honor as a true martyr of the church. The worship of him, however, is not only old, it is also extensive; and the legends grew luxuriantly, absorbing, as it would seem, very different elements. The story of St. George and the dragon occurs for the first time in a fully-developed form in the Historia Lombardica, or "Golden Legend," by Jacob de Voragine, Archbishop of Geneva 1280. At that time his connection with England was already firmly established. According to William of Malmesbury (Gesta Reg. Angl., II.), he appeared in the battle of Antioch (June 28, 1099), and aided the Franks to overthrow the Saracens. The Normans under Robert, the son of William the Conqueror, then adopted him as their patron. As he continued to appear in aid of the Norman crusaders, a Council of Oxford (1222) made his day a festival throughout England; and after the battle of Calais (1319) he came to be considered the patron saint of the country, and the order of the garter is said by some to have been instituted (1350) under his patronage. See HEYLYN: History of St. George of Cappadocia, Lond., 1631; MILNER: Inquiry into the History of St. George, 1792; J. HOGG: Notes on St. George the Martyr, Lond., 1862.

GEORGE III., Prince of Anhalt; b. at Dessau, Aug. 13, 1507; d. there Oct. 17, 1553. He studied at Leipzig; was ordained a priest in 1524, and appointed provost of Magdeburg in 1526. He was at that time a true son of the Roman Church, and considered the Reformation a mere innovation. But he considered it necessary to make a thorough study of the Bible and the history of the Church in order to meet successfully the "Lutheran sectarians;" and the result of this study was his conversion. In 1530 he subscribed to the Augsburg Confession; and in 1534 the Lutheran Church was established in the principality of Anhalt. At the instance of Duke Maurice, Prince George assumed in 1544 the administration of the diocese of Merseburg; and in the following year he was consecrated bishop by Luther. During the Sualcaldian war he defended himself in Merseburg; but, after the establishment of the Leipzig Interim, he retired to Dessau. See O. G. SCHMIDT: Georg von Anhalt, in MEURER: Leben der Ältester d. luth. Kirche, which also gives information about the writings of George III. G. PLITT.

GEORGE, Margrave of Brandenburg-Ansbach; b. at Onoldsbach, March 4, 1484; d. there Dec. 17, 1543; embraced early the Reformation, and maintained very intimate relations with Luther. In 1527 he became sole ruler of the margraviate, and immediately introduced the new doctrine in the country; and perhaps no other German prince contributed more than he to the success of the Reformation, partly by the boldness with which he spoke its cause in the diets, partly by the energy with which he labored for it under all circumstances. See SCHULINUS: Leben und Geschichte des Marq. G., Francfort, 1729, and Luther's Briefe an Marq. G.

GEORGE OF POLENTZ, b. in Saxony, 1478; d. at Balga, near Königsberg, April 28, 1550; studied canon law in Italy; was for some time secretary to Julius II.; entered the service of Maximilian I., and became acquainted with Margrave Albrecht of Brandenburg, grand master of the Teutonic Order in the imperial camp at Padua, 1509; was made a member of the order, and was in 1519 appointed Bishop of Sambia by the margrave. He was the first bishop who openly embraced the Reformation. In the summer of 1523 he allowed the evangelical doctrines to be preached in the Cathedral of Königsberg; in September, same year, he appointed Johannes Briesmann, a pupil of Luther, regular preacher at the cathedral; and Christmas Eve he publicly declared himself a convert. In 1525 the territory of the order was transformed into a dukedom; and Duke Albrecht charged the Bishop of Sambia with the organization of the Lutheran Church in his country. Shortly before his death the bishop retired from public life on account of ill health. His life has been written by GEORG VON POLENZ, Halle, 1858.

GEORGE, Duke of Saxony; b. at Dresden, Aug. 21, 1471; d. there April 17, 1539; was as a younger son destined for the church, and in 1484 made canon of Meissen. His older brothers died, however; and in 1500 he succeeded to the throne. His education, and a rivalry which sprung up between him, the representative of the Albertine line, and his cousins, the representatives of the Ernestine line, made him an adversary of the Reformation; and after the disputation of Leipzig (1519) he decided to do every thing in his power to keep it out of his own country. But he labored in vain. Luther's translation of the Bible was the favorite reading of his subjects, the clergy of his country married, his own family embraced the evangelical doctrines, and he was left alone in utter lonesomeness. See SCHULZE: Georg und Luther, 1834.

GEORGE OF TREBIZOND, b. in Creta, 1396; d. at Naples, 1486; took his surname, not from his native island, but from the city of his ancestors; came in 1420 to Venice; taught rhetoric and grammar in Rome, but lost the favor of Nicholas V. by his ill-natured polemics against Bessarion, Pletho, and the Platonic school, and was rescued from starvation only by a small pension from King Alphonse. His two essays against the Greek Church are found in LEO ALLATIUS: Græcia Orthodoxa, Rome, 1652. His translations of Plato and Eusebins are inaccurate and unreliable.

CILICIA
GEORGE OF CAPPADOCIA, likewise called George the Fuller, was appointed Bishop of Alexandria in 356, after the banishment of Athanasius, and entered the city at the head of a military force. In 361 he was most savagely massacred by the Pagans. He was a rank Arian, a grasping and peremptory nature, a character by no means without blemish; but the picture which the orthodox writers give of him is very exaggerated, and sometimes even self-contradictory.

GEORGE THE PISIDIAN lived in the middle of the seventh century, and was a deacon at the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople. He wrote a number of long poems of historical, philosophical, and religious contents; but, though he was much appreciated by the later Byzantine writers, most of his productions remain in manuscript. The Hexæmeron and De vanitate vite were published, with a Latin translation, by Morel, Paris, 1584, and are found in Bibliotheca Patrum, Paris, 1654, vol. XIV.

GEORGIAN VERSIONS. See BIBLE VERSIONS, p. 286.

GEORGIUS, Bishop of Laodicea in Phrygia, was born at Alexandria, and received orders there. In the controversy between Bishop Alexander of Alexandria and the Arians he tried to mediate, but was excommunicated by Alexander for Arianism. Made Bishop of Laodicea by the Arians, he could not agree with them, either, and became, together with Bishop Basil of Ancyra, founder of the Semi-Arian party. Under Constantius the doctrine of the Semi-Arians became the theology of the court; and when the third synod of Sirmium (358) confirmed this doctrine and the anathemas of the synod of Ancyra, the breach between the Arians and the Semi-Arians became complete. Among the works of Georgius are mentioned a life of Eusebius of Emesa, and an essay against the Manichæans.

GEORGIUS SYNCELLUS received his surname from his position as syncellus, or privy councillor, to Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, in the middle of the eighth century. He wrote a Chronographia, extending from Adam to the time of Diocletian, and valuable especially on account of the frequent extracts it gives from other writers. It was first edited by Goar, Paris, 1652, best by Dindorf, 1829, 2 vols.

GERBERON, Gabriel, b. at St. Calais, between Angers and Chartres, Aug. 12, 1628; d. at St. Denis, March 29, 1711; entered the congregation of St. Maur in 1649, and became not only one of the most prolific writers of that order (his works numbering a hundred and eleven), but also one of the most remarkable representatives of its critical tendency. He taught philosophy and theology in various schools, after 1675, at Corbie near Amiens. While there he published (in 1676, at Brussels) his Miroir de la piété chrétienne, which by several archbishops was considered a revival of the five condemned propositions of Jansen. On the instigation of the Jesuits an order was issued for his imprisonment; but he fled, first to the Netherlands, afterwards to Brussels, where he edited the works of Bajus, and Jansen's letters to St. Cyran. He was discovered, however, in 1703, and imprisoned in the citadel of Amiens till 1707, when he was brought to St. Denis, after having been compelled to recant, and sign the condemnation of the five propositions of Jansen. But he never yielded completely. Shortly before his death he dictated Le vain triomphe des Jésuites, whose publication was prevented, however, by his superiors.

GERBERT, Martin, b. at Horb, on the Neckar, Aug. 13, 1720; d. at Sanct Blasien, in the Black Forest, May 3, 1793; was educated in the Jesuit academy of Freiburg; entered the monastery of Sanct Blasien in 1737; was ordained priest in 1741, and elected abbot in 1761. From 1759 to 1762 he travelled in Germany, France, and Italy, and published a Latin description of his voyage, afterwards translated into German. He was a learned historian, and wrote, among other works, a Historia nigra sylva O. S. B., Cologne, 1783-88. But his specialty was sacred music, its history and theory; De cantu et musica sacra (2 vols., 1771); Scriptores ecclesiastici de musica sacra (3 vols., 1781). He was a friend of Gluck.

GERDES, Daniel, b. at Bremen, April 19, 1698; d. at Groningen, Feb. 11, 1765; studied at Utrecht; was appointed professor of theology at Duisburg 1726, and at Groningen 1735. His principal work is his history of the Reformation.—Historia Reformationis, 4 vols., Groningen, 1741-52. He wrote also specially about the Reformation in Italy, in the diocese of Salzburg, etc.

GER GESA. See GADARA.

GERHARD, Johann, b. at Quedlinburg, Oct. 17, 1582; d. at Jena, Aug. 20, 1637; studied, first medicine at Wittenberg, then theology at Jena and Marburg; was appointed superintendent of Heldburg in 1606, but removed in 1615 to Jena as professor of theology. He was one of the heroes of Lutheran orthodoxy, unquestionably the most learned, and, among the scholars of his age, certainly the most amiable. It is especially as a dogmatist and by his two works, Doctrina catholica et evangelica (1631, 3 vols.) and Locis communes theologici (Jena, 1610-22, 9 vols., modern edition, Leipzig, 1863-76, 10 vols.), that he gained his great fame. The progress he made beyond his predecessors Chemnitz and Hutter consists partly in a more perfect systematization, partly in deeper and more speculative argumentation of the dogmas, but especially in the completeness and comprehensiveness of the treatment. Of his exegetical works, which are distinguished by their patristic learning, his Comm. in Harmoniam hist. ev. de passione et resurrectione Christi (1617) is the most important. His commentaries on the Old Testament, published after his death, are not so much read. Of his devotional books his Meditationes Sacra appeared in 1606, and have been often reprinted and translated [3d ed. of German trans., Leipzig, 1876]; while his Schola Pietatis has fallen into oblivion. His Enchiridion Consolatorium was re-edited and translated into German by C. I. Bötcher, 1877. See E. R. FISCHER: Vita J. Gerhardi, Gotha, 1723. A. THOLUCK.

GERHARD, St., b. at Staves (Stablecellä), in the diocese of Namur, 890; d. in the monastery of Brogne (Bronium), Oct. 3, 959; retired early from the gay service of the Count of Namur, on account of a vision which came to him in a dream; and, having built a new church and a monastery at Brogne (918), he entered the monastery of St. Denis, and became a monk. Ordained a presbyter in 928, he returned to Brogne, and spent the rest of his life in reforming monasteries. He was canonized by Innocent II. See Act. Sanct., Oct. 3, and P. GÜNTHER, Das Leben d. h. Gerhard de Brogne, Halle, 1877.

GERHARDT, Paul, b. at Gräfenhainichen, in the electorate of Saxony, March 12, 1607; d. at Lübben, June 7, 1676. He studied at Wittenberg; was made preacher at Mittenwalde in 1651, and at the Church of St. Nicolai, in Berlin, in 1657, but was dismissed in 1666, because he refused to subscribe to the edicts of June 2, 1662, and Sept. 16, 1664, considering them as attempts to unite the Lutheran and the Reformed churches. In 1667, however, he was made Archdeacon of Lübben. He is generally considered as the greatest hymn-writer Germany has produced. In his sweet songs, Christianity does not appear as something opposed to or in conflict with human nature, but, on the contrary, as the strongest, soundest, purest, and truest form of humanity. His form is often artistically perfect; and yet the expression comes so naturally, and the rhythm flows so easily, that his verses remain in the memory after the first hearing. The first collection of his hymns are those by Crüger (in his Praxis Pietatis Melica, 1618) and J. G. Ebeling (Berlin, 1666); the last and best those by Wackernagel (Stuttgart, 1843, last edition, Guterslohe, 1876) and C. F. Becker (Leipzig, 1851). These last-mentioned collections also contain good biographies of him. [See also editions by Karl Golecke (Leipzig, 1877) and Karl Gerok (Stuttgart, 1878)], and Lives by WILDENHAHN

(Basel, 1844, 4th ed., 1877, 2 vols. [Eng. trans., Phila., 1881]), and by an anonymous writer (Hanover, 1876), and E. E. KOCH: Geschichte d. Kirchenlieds, Stuttgart, 3d ed., 1867, vol. iii. pp. 297-327.

[Many of Gerhardt's hymns have been incorporated in our collections of hymns or of devotional poetry; and one of them, O sacred Head, now wounded, is very widely known and frequently sung. Other familiar ones begin, Oh! how shall I receive thee; Commit thou all thy griefs, and Give to the winds thy fears. More than thirty of his hundred and twenty-three hymns are classical. His English translators include Rev. John Wesley, Miss C. Winkworth, Rev. Dr. James W. Alexander, and John Kelly. The latter has furnished a complete translation, Paul Gerhardt's Spiritual Songs, London, 1867.] PALMER.

GERHOCH, b. at Polling, in Bavaria, towards the end of the eleventh century; d. at Reichersberg, near Passau, 1169; frequented the schools of his native town, Mosburg, Freysing, and Hildesheim, and was appointed canon of Augsburg, and magister scholarum, but left this position, disgusted at the irregularities of the lives of the canons. He did not find the state of affairs better at Raitenbuch, whither he moved, and went to Rome, where Honorius II. officially charged him (1125) with the reform of the canonry. He had no opportunity, however, to try his own strength as a reformer as yet. In 1126 he entered the service of Bishop Kuno of Regensburg, and was ordained priest. But in 1132 Archbishop Conrad I. of Salzburg placed him at the head of the canonry of Reichersberg, and there he spent the rest of his life, an active and rigorous Reformer. As a writer he was strongly opposed to scholasticism, and accused even Peter Lombard of heresy. A list of his works he gives himself, in his Commentary on the Psalms; which work has been printed by B. Pez, in Thesaurus anecdotorum, 1728. Others of his writings have been edited by Scheibelberger, Vienna, 1871 and 1876. [See H. F. A. NOBBE: Gerhoch v. Reichersberg, Leipzig, 1881.] ALBRECHT VOGEL.

GER'IZIM, a mountain of Ephraim, opposite Ebal, with Shechem in the intervening valley; was one of the mountains on which Israel stood pronouncing blessings and curses (Deut. xi. 29; Josh. viii. 30-35). (See EBAL.) It is 2,895 feet above the level of the sea, and 800 feet above the bottom of the valley. It was the scene of the parable of the trees and the brambles (Judg. ix. 7-21), and the site of the Samaritan temple referred to by the woman at the well (John iv. 20). Samaritan tradition points it out as the place where Abraham offered Isaac; and the remnant of the Samaritan sect living at Nablus (Shechem) still performs the annual paschal sacrifices on its top according to the prescriptions of Exod. xii.

GERLACH, Otto von, b. in Berlin, April 12, 1801; d. there Oct. 24, 1849. He studied, first law at Heidelberg and Göttingen, then theology in his native city, and was appointed preacher at the Elizabeth Church there in 1834, and court chaplain in 1847. He and his equally distinguished brothers (Ludwig von Gerlach, a statesman, and Gen. von Gerlach, an aide-de-camp of King Frederick William IV.) were closely associated with Hengstenberg in the revival of orthodoxy and piety in Prussia. He translated Awake, thou that sleepest (by Wesley), the Reformed Pastor (by Baxter), and the Charity and the Church (by Chalmers), and wrote a very useful popular commentary on the Bible, of which a collected edition appeared in Berlin, 1847-53, 6 vols. RUD. KÖGEL.

GERLE, Christophe Antoine, b. in Auvergne, 1740; entered the order of the Carthusians; became prior of the convent of Port-Sainte-Marie; sat in the assembly of the States-generals (1789); became a follower of Robespierre, but was not beheaded after his fall. More remarkable, however, than his political career, was the part he played among the adherents of Catherine Théot, the old woman who pretended that she was about to bear the Word, etc. He occupies a prominent place in David's picture, Le Serment du Jeu de Paume. The date of his death is unknown. See MICHELET: Hist. de la Revolution française, vol. vii.

GERMAIN D'AUXERRE, St., b. at Auxerre, 380; d. at Ravenna, July 31, 448; was forced by the people of his native city to accept the nomination for bishop in 418; adopted immediately after the most rigorous ascetic practices; visited England in 429 to aid the orthodox against the Pelagians; and went in the year of his death to Ravenna to interfere in favor of the Armoricians. He enjoyed a great fame during his lifetime, and is still much revered in France. See Act. Sanct., July 31. G. PLITT.

GERMAIN DE PARIS, St., b. at Autun, 496; d. in Paris, May 28, 576; was made Abbot of St. Symphorian, near Autun, in 540, and Bishop of Paris in 550. He vindicated his episcopal authority with great intrepidity in his the worst period of Merovingian rule, and was greatly revered by the people. His life was written by his contemporary, Fortunatus Venantius. See Act. Sanct., May 28. G. PLITT.

GERMAN CATHOLICS (Deutsch Katholiken). Oct. 15, 1844, there appeared in the Sächsische Vaterlandsblätter an article in which the Bishop of Treves was openly accused of seducing his flock to idolatry by his exhibition of the holy coat; and an appeal was made to the lower clergy to leave a church in which such a thing could be done. The author of the article was an entirely obscure person, one Johannes Ronge, a Roman-Catholic priest, formerly a chaplain at Grottkau, in the county of Neisse, Saxony, but suspended on account of a previous article in the same paper, and now living at Lanrahutte, near the Polish frontier, teaching a children's school in a Protestant neighborhood. But the effect of the article was like that of a spark in a powder-mine. Fifty thousand copies of the article were immediately sold, and tokens of sympathy of every kind and description showered down upon the author.

Ronge's appeal of separation had already been anticipated and carried into effect in another place. At Schneidemühl, a small town on the northern frontier of Posen, one Czersky had formed a community, which on Oct. 19, 1844, broke off from the Roman Church, and constituted itself as an independent congregation, under the name of Christ Catholics, and with Czersky for their pastor. To lead these two currents into one common stream was a problem of the greatest importance, but not without peculiar difficulties.

The Christ Catholics rejected the celibacy of the clergy, the use of the Latin language in divine service, the doctrines of purgatory, transubstantiation, etc.; but they retained the seven sacraments, the Nicene Creed, etc. The German Catholics, who had formed their first independent congregation at Breslau, March 9, 1815, with Ronge as their pastor, went much farther in their deviation from Romanism, and had, for instance, made considerable changes in the Nicene Creed. A common council was held at Leipzig, Easter, 1845, and delegates were present from twenty-seven congregations. But at the council it soon became evident that the watch-cry of secession. "Away from Rome," was about the only thing common to all the seceders; and it was only by the highest degree of reciprocal forbearance that a very vague and very weak confession was agreed upon. The divinity of Christ was passed by in silence in this confession.

The work of the council was not received with enthusiasm by the constituencies. The congregation in Berlin protested against the rejection of the Apostolical Creed, dissolved its connection with the movement, and established itself as an independent congregation, July 15, 1846, under the name of Protest Catholics. The congregation of Schneidemühl was equally dissatisfied, but continued in outward communication with Ronge, on account of the weakness and timidity of its leader, Czersky. In other places the complaints went in the opposite direction. No confession was wanted at all; dogma in any form or shape should be avoided as a mere clog on the free movement of the church; irreligious and anti-Christian tendencies became apparent. From that moment, people of distinction and ability began to keep aloof from the affair, while recruits were enlisted from the ranks of the social and political radicals. The state-governments, having watched the movement all along with distrust and suspicion, now adopted energetic measures against it. Austria and Bavaria excluded the German Catholics altogether from their territories; Prussia, Saxony, and Baden, admitted them, but on conditions. This state of affairs was, of course, changed in 1818, and all interference from the side of the State ceased. But the impulse had already spent its force. In 1818 the German Catholics numbered about sixty thousand; in 1858 there were only about one hundred congregations still alive. In some districts they united with the Protestant free congregations; in others they clubbed together, even with the Reform Jews.

GERMAN TRANSLATIONS OF THE BIBLE. Many centuries elapsed after the Gothic version of Ulfilas, who d. in 381 (see BIBLE TRANSLATIONS), before the Bible was translated into High-German. In the eighth century the church began to put the German to use. (See R. v. Raumer, D. Einwirkung d. Christenth. auf d. althochd.

Sprache. Stuttgart, 1845.) In the manuscripts of that time there are many glosses in German; and German translations of single books of the Bible were attempted. Of the latter, there are preserved fragments of Matthew (eighth century, ed. Massmann, 1841), a translation of the harmony of the Gospels of Ammonius Alex. (ninth century, ed. Schmeller, Vienna, 1841), and a version of the Psalms in Low-German (ninth century, ed. Hagen, Breslau, 1816). A translation of the Psalms, with commentary, by Notker Labeo, who d. 1022 (ed. Heinzel u. Scherer, Strassburg, 1876), and of the Song of Solomon, by Willeram, Abbot of Ebersburg, Bavaria (ed. Hoffmann, Breslau, 1827), have also come down to us. In the centuries immediately following, the interest in the vernacular translation decreased, and the reading of the vernacular Scriptures was forbidden by the ecclesiastical authorities. (See Hegelmaier, Gesch. d. Bibelverbots, Ulm, 1783.)

The exact date of the translation of the whole German Bible cannot be ascertained; but it is certain that one was in existence at the beginning of the fifteenth century. Among the first publications of the printing-press were copies of it. Fourteen editions appeared before 1518, — at Mainz (by Fust and Schoeffer), 1462(?); Strassburg, 1466(?), 1485; Augsburg, 1470(?), 1475(?), 1477, 1477, 1480, 1487, 1490, 1507, 1518; and Nürnberg, 1470 (or Basel?), 1483. Four complete editions, but based upon the former, appeared in Low-German, — two at Cologne about 1480, one at Lübeck 1494, and one at Halberstadt 1522. In the two first the Song of Solomon is given in Latin to avoid any scandal among the young. This translation was made exclusively from the Vulgate, which in some instances was grossly misunderstood. It was quite literal, and made use of an older translation, of which we know nothing. The editions were small, and were not circulated among the people.

The great translator of the German Bible was Martin Luther. About the same time that he began the work of translation, others were engaged in the labor. Among them were Böschenstein (seven Psalms, and Ruth), Lange of Erfurt (Matthew, Mark, and Luke), Krumpach of Querfurt (John, Epistles of Peter, and the Pastoral Epistles), etc. Luther, who translated "not for scholars, but for the people," put forth in 1517 a version of the seven Penitential Psalms, with commentary, and before 1521 the Lord's Prayer, the prayer of Manasseh, the Ten Commandments, the Magnificat, etc. These were repeatedly reprinted. It was in the latter part of 1521 that he conceived the plan of translating the whole Bible into German, from the original languages. The year of his confinement at the Wartburg he spent upon the New Testament, which was printed, but without the name either of the printer or translator. Nor was the date given; but we know it was the year 1522, for a second edition, dated, appeared the same year. Luther at once began work on the Old Testament, which appeared in parts, — in 1523, part I. (Pentateuch); 1524, parts II. and III. (historical books and Hagiographa); 1526, Jonah and Habakkuk; 1528, Zechariah and Isaiah; 1530, Daniel; and in 1532 the remainder of the Prophets. The Apocrypha complete, "that is, books which are not of equal authority with the Holy Scriptures, but which it is useful and good to read," were first published in 1534. In subsequent editions Luther made many improvements in his version. The translation of the Psalms was much altered; so that he himself, in comparing the edition of 1531 with that of 1524, says the latter is nearer the Hebrew, the former the German. This is true of the version as a whole.

Luther lived to see ten original editions of his Bible, and, in order to make the work as perfect as possible, formed a committee on translation (collegium biblicum), consisting of Melancthon, Bugenhagen, Jonas, Cruciger, Aurogallus, and Rorarius, which met in his rooms one evening every week, for consultation. With the edition of 1544, 1545, Luther's work of emending came to an end.

Luther's Bible had a very extensive circulation. Between 1522 and 1533 it is almost certain that there were sixteen original editions of the New Testament; and the reprints amounted to fifty-four (fourteen in Augsburg, thirteen in Strassburg, twelve in Basel, etc.). Luther complained of the reprints; and in the edition of 1530, opposite the titlepage, is a warning against them as "careless and faulty" (unleissig und falsch), and an appeal to others who wanted a German Testament "to make one of their own." Many changes were introduced into these reprints. The Old Testament was also frequently reprinted, — the Pentateuch twenty-two times (seven in Wittenberg), the historical books nineteen times, and the prophetic books fourteen times. Single books were also reprinted. The Psalter went through seventeen editions. Before the completion of Luther's Bible, in 1534, editions had appeared with all the books, — four such in Zürich between 1525 and 1531, one in Worms 1530, two in Strassburg 1530, and one in Frankfurt 1534. These were made up of Luther's translation, so far as it went, and the missing books supplied by Haetzer (on the prophets), Leo Judaus (on the Apocrypha), and others. The four last of these editions also contained the Epistle to the Laodiceans in the old German translation.

Luther translated directly from the original, using for the Old Testament the edition of Brescia, 1494, and for the New Testament the Erasmus text of the edition of 1519. Although he was not the best philological scholar of his day, he was sufficient of a scholar to be independent; and what he lacked in philological penetration he made up by his accurate exegetical intuition, and by his spiritual understanding of the Bible. There are mistakes, especially in the harder passages of Job and the Prophets; but as a whole his translations are accurate. In the Apocrypha he was not so careful, and translated from the Vulgate. So far as the German itself is concerned, Luther was eminently fitted for his task. He was a German through and through, and possessed to a remarkable degree the gift of strong and pithy speech. He avoided being a "literalist" (Buchstabilist), and sought to "give the pure and clear German." His danger was to be too free; but his reverence for the letter of Scripture kept him from serious errors in this direction. Yet he does not at times shrink from adding to the text where he thinks the truth demands emphasis, as in Rom. iii. 28, where he adds alone, — "A man is justified by faith alone" (allein durch den Glauben). The language is clear, vivid and forcible, rich and melodious, noble and chaste. Often he sought diligently for the proper word. "We," he says, "that is, Melancthon, Aurogallus, and I, are working on Job, but so that sometimes we have been hardly able to finish three lines in four days."

Not only did Luther's Bible have an immense influence in extending the Reformation. It was a national work, and fixed the German language, making High-German the common dialect. Within a hundred years, through its influence, it had come into general use in the churches and schools, and Low-German had degenerated into the patois. But there were not wanting violent attacks upon it. One of his critics, Emser, in his Auss was grund und ursach Luther's dohmatschung dem gemeinen man billich verboten worden sey, Leipzig, 1523 ("For what cause and reason Luther's translation has been properly forbidden to the common people"), pronounced it to be full of heretical errors and lies. Wicelius (Annotationes, Leipzig, 1536) followed substantially in the same line, and the Roman Catholics (Traub 1578, Zanger 1605, etc.) Luther and his friends took little notice of these criticisms.

Luther's translation has never been regarded by the Lutheran Church as unsusceptible of improvement. Its need of revision cannot be questioned; but any revision must be accomplished in the spirit of Luther. Private revisions have been made by J. F. v. Meyer (3d ed., Frankfurt, 1855, revised by Stier, Bielefeld, 3d ed., 1867), Kraus (Tübingen, 1830), and Hopf (3d ed., Leipzig, 1854). The variations in the text of Luther finally led to a movement towards revision. It started at the meetings of the church diet at Stuttgart 1857, and Hamburg 1858; and in 1863 the meeting at Eisenach, at the advice of the church council (Oberkirchenrath) of Berlin, appointed a revision commission. They performed their labors, but did not attempt a thorough revision. The New Testament appeared at Halle, 1867, and the whole Bible, 1883.

The Roman Catholics could not remain idle spectators of the wonderful success of Luther's Bible. Beringer put forth an edition of Luther, with only a few changes (Speier, 1526), but was followed by Hieronymus Emser, "the scribbler of Dresden" (d. Sudler in Dresden), with a more extensively emended text (Dresden, 1527). It was often reprinted. Johann Eck also put forth a Bible (Ingolstadt, 1537), but it proved a failure. The New Testament was taken from Emser, and the Old Testament was a reprint of the pre-Luther version. Eck's German is beneath criticism. In 1534 appeared at Mainz the Bible of the Dominican Dr. Dietsberger, which is also not an original translation. It was afterwards revised by Ulenberg (Cologne, 1630) and the theologians of Mainz (Cologne, 1662), and has since, under the title Catholic Bible, been used by the German Catholics.

In the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries new translations or revisions were attempted. Of these the best was the Berleburg Bible (1726-42). One of the best translations is that of De Wette (Heidelberg, 1809-14, 4th ed., 1858), who for a time had the co-operation of Augusti. He combined extraordinary skill of brief and pungent expression with exegetical tact. Of the translations of parts of the Old Testament, the Prophetic Books of Ewald (Stuttgart, 1840) and Hitzig (Leipzig, 1854), and the Poetical Books of Ewald (Göttingen, 1835) and E. Meier (Stuttgart, 1854), deserve special mention. Of the New Testament many translations have appeared. Some of those of the neological school of the last century are curiosities; for example, that of Bahrdt (Riga, 1773), who renders Matt. v. 4, "Blessed are they who prefer the sweet sorrows (d. süssen Melancholien) of virtue to the intoxicating pleasures of vice; for they shall be abundantly comforted." Among the best of the translations of this century is that of Weizsäcker (Tübingen, 1875).

GERMANY, meaning the German Empire (constituted in 1871, after the brilliant victory over France), comprises an area of 208,000 square miles, with 42,727,360 inhabitants (according to the census of 1875), of whom 26,718,823 are Protestants, 15,371,227 Roman Catholics, 520,575 Jews, 100,608 Dissenters, and 16,127 of no religion stated. Thus about two-thirds (a little less) of the population of Germany are Protestant, and one-third (a little more) is Roman Catholic; and the relation between the two denominations was nearly the same two centuries ago, at the end of the Thirty-Years' War, in 1648. The Protestants have increased a little faster than the Roman Catholics; not on account of conversions, however, but because the population increases at a somewhat higher rate in the Protestant regions.

The location of the two denominations is also nearly the same now as two centuries ago. In Southern Germany the Roman Church prevails; in Northern, the Evangelical. Bavaria, Baden, and Alsace-Lorraine are predominantly Roman Catholic; Schleswig-Holstein, Mecklenburg, Hanover, Brandenburg, and Saxony are almost wholly Protestant.

In the Protestant Church attempts have been made to unite the Reformed and the Lutheran; and such a union was actually established in Prussia and Nassau 1817, in the Palatinate 1818, and in Baden 1822. Nevertheless, when, in 1866, Prussia annexed Hanover and Schleswig-Holstein, whose inhabitants are Lutheran, and Hesse, whose inhabitants are Reformed, the union was not introduced in those countries. The government of the Evangelical State Church of Prussia is consistorial: at the head of the whole church stands an ecclesiastical council (Oberkirchenrath), of each province a superintendent-general with a consistorial board, of each diocese a superintendent, of each parish a minister.

The Roman Church has six archbishoprics,—Breslau, Gnesen-Posen, Cologne, Freiburg, München-Freising, and Bamberg; and eighteen bishoprics, Ermeland, Kulm, Fulda, Hildesheim, Osnabrück, Paderborn, Münster, Limburg, Treves, Metz, Strassburg, Spire, Würzburg, Ratisbon, Passau, Eichstädt, Augsburg, and Rottenburg. An apostolic vicar resides in Dresden. The Jesuits were expelled in 1874. After the promulgation of the dogma of papal infallibility in 1871, the secession of the Old Catholics (see art.) took place. In 1878 they numbered about fifty-two thousand, divided into a hundred and twenty-two congregations. See Bühler, Der Altkatholicismus, Leiden, 1880, p. 49.

For further statistical details, and for the history of the Church in Germany, see the articles on the separate states (Bavaria, etc.), on the ancient tribes (Alemanni, Saxons, etc.), on the special periods, places, and sects (the Reformation, Cologne, Anabaptists, etc.) and, finally, biographies.

The German Empire is, like the government of the United States, a purely political union of the different German states, and has, as such, nothing to do with religion, which is left to the several states. But the emperor of Germany, who is at the same time king of Prussia, is at the head of the Evangelical Church of Prussia.

GERSON, Jean Charlier, a distinguished theologian, and one of the founders of Gallicanism, known as the Doctor Christianissimus ("Most Christian Doctor"); b. in the village of Gerson, in the diocese of Rheims, Dec. 11, 1363; d. at Lyons, July 12, 1429. His parents were peasants: his mother, according to his own statement, a "second Monica." In 1377 he entered the College of Navarre, Paris, and began, five years later, the study of theology, under Peter D'Ailli and Gilles des Champs. By 1387 he had attained so considerable a reputation as to be chosen by the university one of its representatives to plead before Pope Clement VII. for a sentence against the Dominican, John of Montson, who denied the immaculate conception of the Virgin. In 1392 he succeeded D'Ailli as chancellor of the University of Paris, then in the zenith of its fame. As a theologian, Gerson revolted against scholasticism, and in his many theological tracts uttered his voice against its untenable and useless subtleties. In his De Ref. Theol. ("The Reformation of Theology," 1400) he urged the study of the Bible and the Fathers. A nominalist in philosophy, he adopted a mystical type of theology. It was, however, not the German mysticism of the fourteenth century, which sought to lose the identity of the individual by a bold flight of the intellect in the Deity, and revelled in fanciful religious emotions. Following Hugo and Richard de St. Victor, he turned the gaze of the soul inward upon its own states, and sought in this way to derive a theory of its laws. He constructed a system consisting of two parts, — De Mys. Theol. Spec. ("Speculative Mysticism") and De Mys. Theol. Pract. ("Practical Mysticism"). The former is devoted principally to the discussion of questions in psychology, under the heads of vis cognitiva ("the intellect") and activa ("will and emotions"). Mystical theology is defined to be a theology of love. Love is the experimental apprehension of God (Experiment. Dei perceptio), and through the instrumentality of love the will becomes submissive to God's will, and lost in it. Among his many treatises on the mystical life, perhaps the most important is the De Monte Contemplat. ("The Mount of Contemplation").

But Gerson's main activity was his attempt to bring order and peace out of the ecclesiastical confusion of his day, and to define the relation of the Church to the Pope. In this latter regard he is the founder of Gallicanism, and the forerunner of Bossuet. The papal schism at one time oppressed him to such a degree, and attempts to heal it seemed to be so hopeless, that he retired from the office of chancellor and public life, and was only induced to return to Paris after five years of seclusion, about the time of the flight of Pope Benedict XIII. (1403). Gerson again devoted himself, by tracts and personal addresses before Benedict, to the task of healing the schism, and securing his submission to the laws of the Church. To his other labors he added those of preacher in 1408 as canon of one of the churches of Paris. At the Council of Pisa (1409) he and D'Ailli exerted a preponderant influence. Here, as well as at the Council of Constance (1414-18), he acted upon the principles laid down in some of his tracts, — that oecumenical councils are independent of the Pope, of superior authority, and may accuse and depose popes. He advised that the two rival popes should be cited before the body; but, as they refused to appear, the council deposed them both. In 1410 his work, De Motis Uniendi ac Ref. Eccles. in Conc. Gen. ("The Union and Reformation of the Church by a General Council"), appeared, in which are affirmed the superiority of the Church over the Pope, and the right, in case of his refusal, of the State or the Bishops to convene general councils. The Pope is indeed the vicar of Christ, but peccator et peccabilis ("a sinner, and liable to sin"), like all other Christians. At Constance, Gerson headed the French deputation. In an oration of great power he called upon the body to exercise its rightful authority as superior to the Pope. In his De Auferibilitate Papæ ab Ecclesia, written during the sessions, after re-asserting the authority of councils, he claims, that in matters of doctrine, as well as in other matters, appeal could be made to it, as the Pope was not infallible. A stain rests upon Gerson's record in the part he took in the condemnation of John Hus at this council. He was an active prosecutor, and presented the nineteen heretical propositions extracted from Hus's work. After the adjournment, he was precluded from returning to France by the bitter hostility of the Duke of Burgundy, and took refuge in Bavaria. He still continued active in authorship, and was called to the newly founded university in Vienna, but declined to go. At the death of the Duke of Burgundy (1419) he returned to his native land, and spent the last ten years of his life in Lyons. A gray-haired man, he devoted himself to the instruction of children, and, as his end approached, gathered them about him once again, that he might pray with them.

GERTRUDE is the name of several saintly women known to mediæval church-history, of which the most noticeable are, — St. Gertrude, also called "The Great Gertrude;" b. at Eisleben, Jan. 6, 1256. She entered the monastery of Helfta when she was only five years old, and studied the liberal arts with great eagerness. But Jan. 21, 1281, she had a vision which led her to the study of the Bible and the Fathers. She had afterwards many more visions, of which a kind of report has been given in the Insignationes divinæ pietatis, first printed in 1536, and afterwards often reprinted. — St. Gertrudis, a daughter of Pippin of Landen (major domus to Clothaire II.) and Itta. After the death of Pippin, in 639, Itta built a large double monastery for male and female recluses at Niviale, the present Nivelles, and made her daughter abbess of it. St. Gertrudis died in 659 or 664, and is still honored in Flanders as the patroness of cats, travellers, and pilgrims. She is represented with rats and mice at her feet, or running up her pastoral staff, or on her dress. See Act. Sanct., March 17.

GERVAISE, François Armand, b. at Paris, 1660; d. there 1751; entered the order of the Barefooted Carmelites, but left them, not finding their rules severe enough, and joined the Trappists in 1695. In the following year he was made Abbot of La Trappe, but resigned in 1698. He was a prolific writer. Of his works the most noticeable is the Histoire générale de la réforme de l'ordre de Cîteaux en France, Avignon, 1746, which is a sharp attack on the Benedictines, and was much resented by them.

GERVASIUS and PROTASIUS, two brethren who were martyred at Ravenna during the reign of Nero, and then entirely forgotten until a vision revealed to St. Ambrose the whereabouts of their remains. This vision and the miracles which the relics immediately performed were used as proofs of orthodoxy by St. Ambrose in his contest with the Arians; but the latter had good reason to doubt, and instituted a line of criticism, which, in spite of the emphatic assertions of St. Ambrose and St. Augustine, has found its followers down to our times. See Mosheim, Gibbon, Isaac Taylor (Ancient Christianity), and others. The fanciful legends of the two martyrs are found Act. Sanct., June 19.

GESENIUS, Justus, a Lutheran theologian; b. July 6, 1601, at Essbach; d. at Hanover, Sept. 18, 1673. He was court-preacher at Hanover. In 1648 (or 1647) he edited a hymn-book with Denicke, and was the first to change the text of German hymns. (See HYMNOLOGY.) He was the author of some hymns, one of which (Wenn meine Sünd'n mich kränken) is popular in Germany.

GESENIUS, Wilhelm, a celebrated Hebrew scholar; b. in Nordhausen, Feb. 3, 1785; d. at Halle, Oct. 23, 1842. He was educated at Helmstädt and Göttingen, where he received in Eichhorn's class-room the impulse to critical and philological studies. His public life began as docent at Göttingen, and in subsequent years he took pleasure in relating that Neander had been his first student in Hebrew. In 1810 he was called to Halle, where he continued during the remainder of his life, in spite of an invitation to become Eichhorn's successor at Göttingen. His lectures were very popular, more than four hundred students at one period crowding to hear them. He made two visits to England (1820, 1835) in the interest of his Oriental studies.

Gesenius' Hebrew Lexicon appeared in two volumes (1810-12). His Hebrew Thesaurus (3 vols.) began to be printed 1826, but was not finished till after his death, under the editorship of his pupil Rödigier. This great work is indeed a storehouse full of the richest materials in the department of the Hebrew of the Old Testament; but it is to be regretted, that, with his thorough Semitic erudition, he did not include the forms of post-biblical Hebrew. His Grammar appeared in 1813, his Gesch. d. heb. Sprache u. Schrift, 1815, and his Lehrgebäude d. heb. Sprache, 1817. These grammatical labors did not meet with the same general favor as the lexicographical. This was due both to the appearance of other works in this special line, and to the fact that the author did not pursue a strict and philosophical method in his treatment. In 1821 his Commentary on Isaiah appeared in three volumes. This was just at the close of the period during which the rationalistic mode of exposition had absolute sway. The work deserves to be regarded as one of the best products of that school, being distinguished for philological thoroughness, lucid presentation, and acquaintance with historical criticism, as well as for freedom from dogmatic and apologetic prepossessions. Gesenius belonged to the rationalistic school, but was no partisan. The philological element preponderates in his works. When rationalism began to wane at Halle, he was regarded, on account of his personal influence over the students and the fame of his scholarship, its chief representative. He was one of the principal persons aimed at in the attack against rationalistic teachers, which started in Berlin in 1830. But he held his position, and the complaints ceased. In addition to the works mentioned above, he published Versuch üb. d. maltesische Sprache (1810), De Pentateuchi Samarit. Origine, etc. (1815), De Samaritan. Theol. (1822), Carmina Samaritan. (1824), an Edition of Burckhardt's Travels (1823), Monumenta Phœnica (1837). Gesenius also made large contributions to ERSCH and GRUBER'S Encyclopædie and to the Hallische Literaturzeitung. For a well-prepared sketch of his life, see GESENIUS: Eine Erinnerung für seine Freunde (by Haym), Berlin, 1842.

[The 8th ed. of Gesenius' Lexicon (Heb. u. Chal. Handb.) appeared Leipzig, 1878, ed. by Mühlau and Volck; the 23d ed. of his Grammar ed. by Kautzsch, Leipzig, 1881. There are English translations of earlier editions of the Lexicon by TREGELLES (1846-52) and EDWARD ROBINSON (Boston, 1855). A thoroughly revised edition of Robinson's translation, on the basis of the 8th ed. of the German original, is preparing by Professors BRIGGS and BROWN of the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. There are English translations of Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, by MOSES STUART, Andover, 1826 (last ed., 1846), T. J. CONANT, Boston, 1839 (rev. ed., N.Y., 1855), and by B. DAVIES, London, 1869 (ed. by E. C. MITCHELL, on the basis of the 22d of the original, Andover, 1881)].

ED. REUSS.

GESTA ROMANORUM (Deeds of the Romans), a Latin collection of anecdotes and tales intended primarily for preachers to introduce into their discourses. It was probably of monkish origin. It has great literary interest, because it contains the germs of many famous tales: for the theologian it has value as a revelation of the morals of the times. The various stories are excellent in their tone, and the piety and zeal of the authors are noticeable. The date of the collection may be set down as about the beginning of the fourteenth century: author and nativity are equally unknown. Critical editions of the Latin text have been produced by A. Keller (Stuttgart, 1842) and Asterley (Berlin, 1872). There is an English translation by Rev. C. Swan, published in Bohn's Antiquarian Library, London, 1877.

GETHSEMANE (oil-press), a place at the foot of Mount Olivet, noted as the scene of our Lord's agony (John xviii. 1; Mark xiv. 26; Luke xxii. 39), is, by a tradition dating back to the fourth century, located about one hundred yards east of the bridge over the Kedron. It consists of a quadrangular spot some seventy paces in circumference, and surrounded with a wall, and contains a flower-garden, with eight very old and venerable olive-trees. As the Latin Church has control of the place, the Greeks have set up a Gethsemane of their own farther up Mount Olivet.

GFROERER, August Friedrich, b. at Calw, in the Black Forest, March 5, 1803; d. at Carlsbad, July 10, 1861. He studied at Tübingen, and was appointed librarian at Stuttgart in 1830, and professor of history at Freiburg in 1846. His first works, Gustav Adolf (Stuttgart, 1835-37, 2 vols.) and Geschichte des Urchristenthums (Stuttgart, 1838, 3 vols.), represent an independent rationalism and a good deal of original research. But with his Allgemeine Kirchengeschichte (Stuttgart, 1841-46, 4 vols.) he entirely changed position, and, though he did not actually embrace Romanism until 1853, he was long before that time considered one of the leaders of ultramontaniam in Germany. To the latter period of his life belong his Geschichte der Karolinger, Freiburg, 1818, 2 vols.; Papst Gregorius und sein Zeitalter, Schaffhausen, 1859-61, 7 vols., etc.

GIANTS. Like all nations of antiquity, the Hebrews had also their stories about giants. The word "giants" has different representations in the Hebrew. Thus (Gen. vi. 4) they are called (1) Nephilim. (Gen. xiv. 5) we find (2) the Rephaim. Of his race was Og, King of Bashan, whose "bedstead was nine cubits in length and four cubits in breadth, according to the cubit of a man" (Deut. iii. 11). (3) The Anakim (Num. xiii. 28, 32, 33; Deut. ii. 10). They were destroyed by Joshua (Josh. xi. 22; Judg. i. 20). Another race of giants (4), the Emim, is mentioned in Deut. ii. 10, who dwelt in the country of the Moabites. Another race, known (5) as the Zamzumim, is described Deut. ii. 20, 21. In Job xvi. 14 the authorized version reads, "like a giant;" but the Hebrew word here used is elsewhere translated "a mighty man;" i. e., champion or hero. GIBBON, Edward, the author of The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire; b. at Putney, Surrey, April 27, 1737; d. in London, Jan. 16, 1791. His early education was often interrupted by ill health. He entered Oxford University, 1752, but was expelled, after fourteen months, because of his (temporary) conversion to Roman Catholicism (June 8, 1753), due to reading Bossuet's Variations of Protestantism, when his mind had been unsettled by Middleton's Free Enquiry. Gibbon was sent by his father to live with a Calvinistic minister (M. Pavilliard) at Lausanne, Switzerland. There he remained five years in diligent study, and became remarkably intimate with the classic Latin authors, and also acquired such familiarity with French, that, when he began to write his History, he seriously contemplated whether he should write it in that language. Two events occurred during this period which affected his whole life. — his renunciation of Romanism (1754) without being reconverted to Protestantism, and his love for Mlle. Susanne Curchod (1757), who afterwards married Jacques Necker (1764), the famous financier. The result of his change of religion seems to have been indifference to all religion; the result of his disappointment in love, his resolution never to marry. He returned home in 1758, obedient to his father's summons, and for many years led an aimless, though scholarly and laborious life. An episode had an important bearing upon his career. For two years (1760-62) he was a militia captain; and this experience gave him not only robust health, but a knowledge of military matters which stood him in good stead when he came to write his History. It was in Rome (Oct. 15, 1764), while sitting amidst the ruins of the Capitol, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started in his mind; but he did not really begin his immortal work until 1772. In February, 1776, the first volume appeared; on the night of June 27, 1787, he wrote in his garden at Lausanne, whither he had removed in 1783, the last words of his History; and the last volume appeared April 27, 1788. The original edition was in six quarto volumes. Its sale was remarkable, indeed unprecedented. The remainder of the historian's life was brief. He had nothing to live for, now that his life-work was done. The loss of intimate friends, and a physical malady, saddened the close of his days.

Of his History it is superfluous to speak. It has been put in the first rank by universal suffrage. The historians of every land unite in its praise. Later researches have confirmed its judgments, and corrected but few statements. It probably never will be antiquated. Its period extends from the middle of the second century to 1453. The only charge which has been successfully brought against it is that it betrays an unfriendly animus to Christianity. He had so little sympathy with the aims of the Church, that it was not to be expected that he would throw the mantle of charity over the foibles and failings of churchmen. In regard to the famous fifteenth and sixteenth chapters, which relate to the rise and spread of Christianity, wherein its success is explained by reference to secondary causes, and the severity of its early trials declared to have been over-estimated, it may be remarked, that Gibbon himself admitted that his array of secondary causes left the question of the divine origin of Christianity untouched; and, now that the smoke of the battle against this portion of the History has cleared away, church historians allow the substantial justness of his main positions. It was, of course, not Gibbon's intention to write a church history; but, in spite of himself, he has traversed the ground, and also, however unwilling he might be, it remains true, that, "in tracing the gradual decline and fall of imperial Rome, he has involuntarily become a witness to the gradual growth and triumph of the religion of the cross." See SCHAFF: Church History, revised ed., vol. i. p. 47.

The best edition of The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire is that published by Murray of London, 1854 (again 1872), 8 vols. (reprinted by Harper and Brothers, New York, 1880, 6 vols.), edited by Dr. William Smith, who has incorporated the notes of Guizot, Weneck, and Milman. His Miscellaneous Works, with Memoirs of his Life and Writings, composed by himself, illustrated from his Letters, with occasional Notes and Narrative, appeared in new ed., 1837. His Autobiography, one of the best ever written, is prefixed to the editions of his History and Miscellanies mentioned above, and also published separately in the Choice Autobiographies, ed. by W. D. Howells, Boston, 1878.

GIBERTI, Giovanni Matteo, b. at Palermo, 1195; d. at Verona, 1543; was made bishop of the latter place in 1524. He was one of those Italian prelates, who, before the Council of Trent, showed a serious interest for the reform of the church, drawing his inspiration from Pietro Caraffa, and exercising considerable influence on Carlo Borromeo. His works (Constitutiones Giberlinae, Monitiones generales, Edicta selecta, etc.) were edited by Pietro Ballerini, who also wrote his life (Verona, 1733).

GIBSON, Edmund, D.D., b. at Bampton, in Westmoreland, 1669; d. at Bath, Sept. 6, 1748; was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln 1715, and of London 1723; ordered Dr. Mead's edition of Servetus' Restitutio Christianismi to be burnt 1723. He translated Camden's Britannia (1695), edited Sir Henry Spelman's posthumous works (1698), and compiled Corpus juris ecclesiastici Anglicani, or the statutes, constitution, canons, rubrics, and articles of the Church of England (1713, reprinted at Oxford, 1761, 2 vols. folio). He also compiled A preservative against Popery (1738, 3 vols. folio), consisting of writings on the subject by eminent English divines during James II.'s reign. Dr. John Cumming edited a revised edition, London, 1848-49, 18 vols., with supplement, 1849, 8 vols.

GICHTEL, Johann Georg, b. at Regensburg, May 14, 1638; d. at Amsterdam, Jan. 21, 1710; studied law at Strassburg; settled at Spire, and began a brilliant career as an advocate, but was by his acquaintance, J. E. von Wetz, led astray into a mist of fantastic mysticism and ascetic theosophy, from which he never escaped. Expelled from his native city on account of an open letter to the preachers of Nuremberg and Regensburg, he spent most of his time at Zwoll with Friedrich Breckling, and in Amsterdam with Antoinette Bourignon and the Labadists. His writings have been collected in seven volumes, under the title of Theosophia practica.

GIDEON (גִּדְעוֹן, hever), one of the more illustrious judges of Israel and of the tribe of Manasseh. His history is recorded in the sixth to the eighth chapters of Judges. The occasion of his public appearance as judge was the severity of the Midianitish oppression, which lasted seven years. He received a divine call under the terebinth in Ophrah (vi. 11), and built an altar there in commemoration of God's recollection of his people. He struck at idolatry by destroying the altar of Baal, for which he received the title of Jerubbaal, "Let Baal plead," etc. (vi. 32). His great achievement was the defeat of the Midianites, who had encamped in large numbers on the plain of Jezreel. The tribes of Manasseh, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali acknowledged him as leader. But Gideon first demanded a sign, and received the famous signs of the fleece, before undertaking the campaign (vi. 36-40). God was determined to show that it was His power which delivered Israel, and so reduced the army from thirty-two thousand to three hundred. The commander was encouraged by overhearing in the Midianite camp the story of the dream of the barley-cake (vii. 13); and the following night, by the stratagem of the trumpets and lumps, threw the enemy into a panic, and completely routed them. For similar instances see 2 Chron. xx. 23, Hag. ii. 22. In his pursuit of the flying army, the cities of Succoth and Penuel refused him provisions, for which, on his return, he severely punished them (Judg. viii. 13-17).

Of the subsequent forty years (Judg. viii. 28) of Gideon's official activity, little is recorded. He refused the title of king, but instituted a special worship at Ophrah (viii. 27). He was perhaps led to do this by the fact that the national place of worship was in the proud tribe of Ephraim. Gideon made an ephod, which he probably wore himself as priest. It proved a snare to his tribe and people, who were led thereby into an idolatrous worship (perhaps of the Urim and Thummim on the ephod). Gideon's heroism was long remembered after his death (Ps. lxxxiii. 9, 11; Isa. ix. 4, x. 26; 1 Heb. xi. 32). [See the Commentaries on Judges, and Canon FARRAR's article in SMITH'S Bible Dict.] OEHLER.

GIESELER, Johann Karl Ludwig, b. at Petershagen, near Minden, March 3, 1793; d. at Göttingen, July 8, 1854. He studied at Halle, fought in the war of liberation 1813, and was appointed director of the gymnasium of Cleve 1818, professor of theology at Bonn 1819, and at Göttingen 1831. His principal work is his Church-History, in its kind one of the most remarkable productions of German learning, distinguished by its immense erudition, accuracy, and careful selection of passages from the sources which constitute the body of the work in the form of footnotes, while the text is a meagre skeleton down to 1648. First volume appeared 1824; fifth and last (containing his lectures, and treating the period from 1814 to the present time) 1855, after his death. No less than three English translations have been published of this work.—one after the earlier editions, by Cunningham (Philadelphia, 1836, 3 vols.); and two after the last edition, by Davidson (Edinburgh, 1848-56, 5 vols.), and by H. B. Smith (New York, 1857-81, 5 vols.), completed by Miss Mary Robinson. Among his other works are, Dogmengeschichte (posthumous, 1855), Versuch über die Entstehung der schriftlichen Evangelien (his first book, 1818, and a death-blow to the theory of one primal gospel, Urevangelium); Unruhen in d. niederländ.-ref. Kirche (1840); Ueber die Lehnsinsche Weissagung (1840), etc. Redepenning wrote a Life of him in the last volume of the Church-History.

GIFTS, Spiritual (Charismata). The old Protestant theologians understood by this term the endowment to perform miraculous works.—such as the speaking with tongues, healing the sick, raising the dead,—and limited it to the primitive Church. This is still the view of the Protestant Church, which regards these gifts either as forfeited by the Church's guilt (Irvingism), or extinguished by God as no longer necessary. The Catholic Church regards the miracles of the saints as the result of their continuance. They are special endowments of the Holy Spirit, and not merely the characteristic faculties of the individual as they appear in various forms of activity subsequent to conversion, as Baur would have it.

Nothing definite as to the nature of the charismata is to be drawn from the etymology. The term outside of the Pauline Epistles is only used twice,—once by Philo (De Alleg. ii. 75), and once by Peter (1 Pet. iv. 10). It gets from charis (grace) the special meaning of a gracious gift in two cases, the pardon of sin (Rom. v. 15), and eternal life (Rom. vi. 23), or of the manifestations of divine grace in general (Rom. xi. 29). In all other cases the word signifies special gracious endowments of the Holy Spirit which exist in the believer as evidences and proofs of the experience of divine grace (1 Tim. iv. 14, etc.), and in such a way as to fit him for some special form of activity in which he can serve the Church (1 Cor. xii. 4). The capacity which each has to edify the Church is in consequence of a charisma which he must exercise, and in the exercise of which he exercises divine grace (1 Pet. iv. 10). These gifts are derived from the Holy Spirit, and are characteristic of the state of grace. Neander is right when he defines the charisma as a capacity in which the power and activity of the indwelling Spirit are revealed, be this capacity immediately imparted by the Spirit, or merely a natural capacity sanctified and enlarged by the principle of the new life. The comprehensive definition, then, would be as follows: charismata are capacities and aptitudes necessary for the edification of the Church, and produced by the Holy Spirit, in consequence of which individuals are enabled to use their natural endowments in the service of the Church, and are furnished with new powers to effect this end.

The charismata are the necessary preparation for the administration of offices in the Church; and Christians may themselves become charismata (1 Cor. xii. 28). Church offices are not something distinct from them (1 Cor. xii. 5), as Thiersch and others hold, but impossible without charismatic endowment. The question then arises, To what extent are the charismata permanent in the Church? Their number is as various as the needs of the church; and neither the enumeration of 1 Cor. xii., nor of Eph. iv., nor Rom. xii. can be regarded as exhaustive. But those are permanent which are necessary for the government of the Church, and those temporary which had a miraculous element, as the miraculous gifts of the apostles. But among the latter is not to be included the "gift of proclaiming the gospel so as to produce faith" (Weiss). The apostolic charismata bear the same relation to those of the ministry, that the apostolic office does to the pastoral office, and consist in the power to lay the foundations of the Church. They are therefore not repeated, as the Irvingites hold, for there are no circumstances calling for their repetition. [The fullest list of the charismata, or spiritual gifts, is given in 1 Cor. xii.,—speaking with tongues, working miracles, gifts of healing, knowledge, etc.] See DAVID SCHULTZ: D. Geistesgaben d. ersten Christen, Bresl., 1836; ENGELMANN: V. d. Charismen im Allgemeinen, etc., Regensb., 1818; The Histories of the Ap. Ch., by TRAUTMANN, Leip., 1818 [NEANDER and SCHAFF]. GIFTTHEIL, Ludwig Friedrich, son of an abbot in Würtemberg, and noted for his fanatical declamations against the State Church. The date of his birth is not known; but his literary activity belongs to the period of the Thirty-Years' War; and he died in Amsterdam, 1661. He stood in connection with Breckling and other persons of the same description, published letters of warning to the king of England (1643-44) and to Cromwell, whom he styled "field-marshal of the devil, street-robber, thief, and murderer," and wrote in 1647 Deklaration aus Orient, etc. See BÖHME: Acht Bücher von der Reformation der Kirche in England, Altona, 1734. GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE (Gilbertus Porretanus), b. at Poitiers, 1070; d. there 1154; studied philosophy in the school of Chartres; was afterwards a teacher there, and became bishop of his native city in 1142. He was a virtuoso in dialectics, and wrote commentaries on Plato, Aristotle, and Boethius; but to the mystics he naturally appeared as the champion of a dangerous rationalism. Walter of St. Victor called him one of the "four labyrinths of France," Abelard, Pierre of Poitiers, and Petrus Lombardus, being the three others; and on account of his commentary on Boetius de Trinitate, printed in the Basel edition of Boethius' works (1570), Bernard of Clairveaux accused him of heresy. The case was tried at the councils of Paris and Rheims (1148), in the presence of Eugenius III.; but, though the Pope accepted Bernard's counter propositions against Gilbert, he did not officially confirm them, and Gilbert returned unmolested to his see. See LIPSIVS: Gilbertus Porretanus, in ERSCH UND GRUBER, Allg. Encyclopaëdie; [HAURÉAU: Philosophie Scholastique, i. 296 sqq.]. PRESSEL.

GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM, founder of the order of the Gilbertines, or Sempringham canons (Ordo Gilbertinorum Canonicorum, or Ordo Sempringensis); b. about 1083, at Sempringham, Lincolnshire, of a Norman noble family; d. there Feb. 4, 1189. He was ordained a priest and pastor of Sempringham-Tirington, in 1123; in 1135 he built a convent for the shelter of seven destitute girls, and shortly after was called upon to establish others for women and for men in various parts of England. To the nuns he gave the Benedictine rule. In 1148 he was refused permission by Pope Eugenius III. to merge all these monasteries in the Cistercian order, and therefore they were per force independent. At the time of his death the order possessed eighteen hundred members (seven hundred males, eleven hundred females), thirteen double monasteries with hospitals, almshouses, and orphanages attached: when suppressed by Henry VIII., it possessed twenty-five monasteries. In the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum, Feb. 4, Gilbert appears as the author of the Gilbertinorum Statute and Exhortationes ad Fratres. He was canonized by Innocent III. 1202, and is commemorated Feb. 4. See HURTER: Gesch. des Innocenz III. u. seiner Zeitgenossen, Gotha, 1834-42, 4 vols. ZÖCKLER.

GIL/BOA (bubbling fountain), a mountain-range east of the plain of Jezreel, the present Jebel Fakû'a, bleak and bare, 1,717 feet high, and for the most part very steep, running east south-east for about ten miles; was the place where Saul and his three sons were slain in battle against the Philistines the day after his visit to the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 4; 1 Chron. x. 1; 2 Sam. i. 21).

GILDAS, the oldest and the only extant of the historians of the ancient Britons; wrote a Historia and an Epistola, in which he gives a record of the British history under the Romans, and from their withdrawal to his own time. Though these works have been quoted by Bede, Alcuin, William of Newbury, Geoffrey of Monmouth, and Giraldus Cambrensis, no reliable biographical notice of the author exists. The legends from the later middle ages are mere fiction. It seems, however, that he was born in 516, became a monk in the monastery of Bangor, and died 570. The best edition of his works is that by Stevenson, London, 1838. Translations have been made by Habington, London, 1638, and by Giles, London, 1841, republished, with additions, in Bohn's Six Old English Chronicles.

GILES, St. (the same as the Greek Αἰγίδιος; Latin, Ægidius; Italian, Egidio; Spanish, Gil; and French, Gilles), b. in Greece, 640; d. before 725, in a monastery on the Rhone. He came to the coast of Provence about 665, and lived a hermit's life till 670, when he went still deeper into the forest, where he was discovered by the king, Wamba (Flavius), under these circumstances: one day the hind upon whose milk the saint was nourished, wounded by an arrow, sought refuge from the king's dogs in the cavern occupied by the saint. The king on coming up was much struck by the sight of the saint kneeling, with the wounded animal by his side, and desired the holy man to attend upon him at court. St. Giles obeyed, but did not stay long; for in 673 he was again in the forest, and founded a monastery which bore his name. His reputation for sanctity was extraordinary. Miracles were likewise attributed to him. He once refused treatment for an accidental lameness, in order that his pain and inconvenience might be a trial to his flesh, and is therefore honored as the patron saint of cripples. He has churches in all parts of Europe, many in Great Britain. In art he is portrayed as an old man, with a long white beard, on whose lap, or at whose feet, is a hind wounded by an arrow through its neck. He is commemorated Sept. 1. His relics are in St. Sernin's, Toulouse. See SMITH and WACE: Dict. Chr. Biog., art. Egidius.

GILFILLAN, George, a popular writer of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland; b. at Comrie, Perthshire, Scotland, Jan. 30, 1813; d. Aug. 13, 1878. After study at Glasgow University, he was ordained pastor of a Secession congregation at Dundee, in March, 1836. Beginning with Five Discourses (1839), he issued many volumes of popular literary criticism, which have had a large circulation. His best work is Bards of the Bible (1851, 6th ed., 1874), which attempts to be "a poem on the Bible," with, however, questionable success; for he indulges too much in rhapsody, and lowers, while attempting to revivify, the heroes of the past. His life was laborious, spiritual, and useful. As a preacher and lecturer he was successful, not alone in attracting numbers, but in making a profound impression by his thrilling eloquence.

GILL, John, D.D., a learned Baptist divine and biblical expositor; b. Nov. 23, 1697, at Kettering, Northamptonshire, where his father preached to a mixed congregation of Dissenters; d. Oct. 11, 1771, at Camberwell. His school education was limited; but by private study he acquired much knowledge, and is said to have learned Hebrew without any assistance. After preaching for a time in Higham Ferrers, he was called in 1720 to the Baptist church at Horsleydown, near London. Dr. Gill was a profound theologian and a voluminous author. He was one of the leading advocates of his day of Hyper-Calvinism, but a vigorous opponent of infant-baptism (against Jonathan Dickinson and others). He published one of the ablest answers to Whitby's Five Points, under the title The Cause of God and Truth (1 vols., 1735-38). The same views are stated in his Body of Divinity, 2 vols., 1769 (new ed., Lond., 1839), to which he added a volume on Practical Divinity (1770). Like Dr. Dwight's Theology, it contained the substance of sermons preached from the pulpit. Of his advocacy of Calvinism, Toplady said, "Certainly no man has treated that momentous subject, the system of divine grace, in all its branches more closely, judiciously, and successfully." Dr. Gill's great work was his Exposition of the New Testament (1746-48, in 3 vols.) and of the Old Testament (1763-76, in 6 vols.). His first effort in this department was an Exposition of Solomon's Song, which he preached from the pulpit in 1724, and published in 1728. This commentary is enriched with the stores of rabbinical learning. Mr. Spurgeon calls it "invaluable in its own line of things." It is still useful for homiletic purposes, but pursues the allegorizing method to an extreme. The best edition of Gill's commentary is in 9 vols., Phila., 1811-19, with a full Memoir. GILLESPIE, George, one of the four Scotch commissioners to the Westminster Assembly of Divines; was the son of a clergyman; b. at Kirkcaldy, Jan. 21, 1613; d. at Kirkcaldy, Dec. 17, 1648. He studied at St. Andrew's, and in 1638 was ordained pastor at Wemyss, whence in 1642 he was translated to Edinburgh. In 1643 he was chosen a member of the Westminster Assembly. He was the youngest member of that body, but proved himself to be one of its closest reasoners, and one of its readiest and most able debaters. He was always listened to with attention, and opposed at times, with success, even the great learning of Lightfoot and Selden. The story is told, that when the Assembly came to the question in the Shorter Catechism, "What is God?" all declined to give a definition except Gillespie, who was hit upon as being the youngest member. He reluctantly consented, but called upon the body to unite with him in prayer before attempting it. His very first words of invocation were taken down, and incorporated as the best possible human answer. In 1648 he was moderator of the General Assembly of Scotland. His brilliant and meteoric career was cut short at the early age of thirty-five. In 1637 he put forth The English Popish Ceremonies obtruded upon the Church of Scotland (a work which attracted much attention), and in 1641 Assertion of the Government of the Church of Scotland (in which he brings keenness of argument and able learning to bear against the "Independent Scheme"). His ablest work, Aaron's Rod blossoming, or the Divine Ordinance of Church-Government vindicated (pp. 590), appeared in London 1646, and was directed against Erastianism. The best edition of these and Gillespie's other works is by HERRINGTON, 2 vols., Edinb., 1844-46, with a Memoir.

GILLESPIE, Thomas, b. in the parish of Duddingston, Midlothian, Scotland, in 1708; d. at Dunfermline, Jan. 19, 1774. In connection with Boston of Jedburgh, and Collier of Colinsburgh, he organized in 1761 the so-called "Presbytery of Relief" (i.e., "from the yoke of patronage and the tyranny of the church courts"), because, having been deposed for contumacy in refusing conscientiously to attend presbytery meetings called to ordain an unacceptable minister, his persistent efforts to be re-admitted were rejected. See Lives of the Fathers of the United Presbyterian Church, Edinburgh, 1849.

GILLETT, Ezra Hall, D.D., a distinguished American Presbyterian divine and historian; b. at Colchester, Conn., July 15, 1823; d. in New-York City, Sept. 2, 1875. After graduating at Yale College (1841) and Union Theological Seminary (1844), he became pastor of a Presbyterian church in Harlem (1845), which he left in 1868 to accept the chair of political economy, ethics, and history in the University of New York. Dr. Gillett was a man of great humility, and remarkable for his painstaking, patient research as an historian. His first large work was The Life and Times of John Huss (Boston, 1861, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1870). His Hist. of the Presbyterian Ch. in the United States of America (Phila., 1864, 2 vols., rev. ed., 1873), which he was selected by the New School branch of the Presbyterian Church to prepare, is the most comprehensive work on the subject. God in Human Thought (2 vols.) and the Moral System (New York, 1875), for the use of students, grew out of an attempt to prepare a historical and critical Introduction to Butler's Analogy, and are especially valuable for their treatment of English thought in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Dr. Gillett was also a frequent contributor to The Presbyterian Quarterly Review and to The New-York Evangelist.

GILPIN, Bernard (Apostle of the North), b. at Kentmere, Eng., 1517; d. at Houghton-le-Spring, to which he had been appointed about 1556, March 4, 1583. He was a fearless preacher against the clerical and lay vices of the times, and a practical philanthropist. "His life was a ceaseless round of benevolent activity. Strangers and travellers found a ready reception; and even their horses were treated with so much care that it was humorously said, that, if one were turned loose in any part of the country, it would immediately make its way to the rector of Houghton. He built and endowed a grammar-school at a cost of upwards of five hundred pounds, educated and maintained a large number of poor children at his own charge, and provided the more promising pupils with means of studying at the universities. Among his parishioners he was looked up to as a judge, and did great service in preventing lawsuits amongst them." See WILLIAM GILPIN: Life of Bernard Gilpin, with Introduction by Edward Irving, Glasgow, 1824.

GIRALDUS CAMBRENSIS (Girald de Barri), b. at Meador Pyrr about 1147; d. about 1220; studied theology and canon law in Paris, and was, after his return in 1172, sent by the Archbishop of Canterbury to St. David, to reform the Church of the diocese, and bring it into harmony with the Roman Church, by the introduction of celibacy, tithes, etc. It was the policy of the English crown at that moment to build up a support for itself in Wales and Ireland by establishing the Roman hierarchy there; and Giraldus' attempt in St. David was a brilliant success. Nevertheless, when in 1176 he was elected bishop of that diocese by the chapter, he failed to obtain the royal recognition, and went to Paris, where he lectured on canon law. In 1180 he returned to Wales, and was for several years administrator of St. David during the absence of the bishop. He once more gained the favor of the king, and accompanied Prince John on his campaign in Ireland 1185, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, when, in 1188, he went to Wales to preach a crusade. Nevertheless, when, in 1198, he a second time was elected Bishop of St. David, he again missed the goal by the opposition of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The rest of his life he spent in retirement. He was a very prolific writer; and his works — Topographia Hiberniæ, Itinerarium Cambriæ, Speculum Ecclesiæ, Expugnatio Hiberniæ, etc. — have their value, in spite of his credulity and vanity. They were best edited by Brewer and Dimock, Lond., 1860-77, in 7 vols. [Of his Itin. Camb. there is a translation, with a life of Giraldus, and notes, by R. C. Hoare, Lond., 1806, in 2 vols.] C. GIRDLE, among the Hebrews. One of the essential articles of dress in the East, worn alike both by men and women, was the girdle. There were different kinds of girdles, corresponding to their equivalents in the Hebrew. There was (1) the ezor, denoting something bound, which was worn by men of different states (comp. 2 Kings i. 8; Job xii. 18; Isa. v. 27; Jer. xiii. 1; Ezek. xxiii. 15); (2) the abnet, or the girdle of sacerdotal and state officers, especially worn by the priests about the close-fitting tunic (Exod. xxviii. 39, xxxix. 29); (3) the kishurim, mentioned Isa. iii. 20, which seems to have been a girdle worn by women. In general the girdle was made of leather (2 Kings i. 8; Matt. iii. 4). The nobles wore girdles of linen, four fingers broad, and embossed or studded with all kinds of precious stones, or pearls, or metals (Dan. x. 5). It was fastened by a clasp or buckle of gold or silver, or tied in a knot. Men wore the girdle about the loins; whilst the women, having generally their girdle looser than that of the men, wore it about the hips, except when they were actively engaged (Prov. xxxi. 17). The military girdle was worn about the waist: the sword or dagger was suspended from it (Judg. iii. 16; 2 Sam. xx. 8; Ps. xlv. 3). Here girding up the loins denotes preparation for battle (1 Kings xviii. 46; 2 Kings iv. 29); whilst to "loose the girdle" was to give way to repose and indolence (Isa. v. 27). It was a token of great confidence and affection to loose the girdle, and give it to another (1 Sam. xviii. 4). Girdles were used as a kind of purse (Matt. x. 9; Mark vi. 8); and inkhorns were also carried in them (Ezek. ix. 2). RÜETSCHL.

GLANVIL, Joseph, a philosophical divine of the Church of England; b. in Plymouth 1636; d. in Bath, Nov. 4, 1680. After graduation at Oxford he took orders, and was for a time chaplain to the king; in 1666 elected to the Royal Society, of which he was a vigorous defender, and in 1678 appointed a prebendary of Worcester. He was the leader of the philosophical sceptics, who "attacked all philosophy by denying the self-evident and authoritative character of its original categories and axioms, and resolved all trustworthy knowledge into the vague operations of experience, supplemented by the testimony of revelation, or into what could be verified by physical experiment." But his motive in favoring scepticism in science was to assure religion against all attacks. His principal work was Scep̄sis Scientifica, or Confess̄t Ignorance the Way to Science, an Essay of the Vanity of Dogmatizing and Confident Opinion (Lond., 1665), which was an enlargement of his first work, The Vanity of Dogmatizing (1661). He believed in witches, and wrote Philosophical Considerations concerning the Existence of Sorcerers and Sorcery (1666), and Sadducimus Triumphans, or a Full and Plain Evidence concerning Witches and Apparitions (ed. by Dr. Henry More, who gave an account of his life and writings, 1681, 2d ed., 1682).

GLAS, John, b. in Fifeshire, Sept. 21, 1695; d. at Dundee, 1773; minister of the kirk at Tealing, 1719; deposed by the General Assembly in 1728, in consequence of his publication, in the previous year, of a book in which he maintained that an Established Church was contrary to the gospel. He gathered a sect called in Scotland Glassites, but in England and America SANDEMANIANS (which see). His works appeared at Edinburgh, 1761, 2d ed., Perth, 1782, 5 vols.

GLASSIUS, Salomo, b. at Sondershausen, 1593; d. at Gotha, July 27, 1656; studied theology, especially the Shemitic languages, at Jena and Wittenberg, and was made professor of theology at Jena in 1637, and superintendent-general of Saxe-Gotha in 1640. His principal work was his Philologia Sacra, a combination of a critical and historical introduction to the Bible and a biblical hermeneutics. It appeared in 1625, was much appreciated at its time, and often reprinted. The general theological stand-point of the author forms a transition from the old orthodoxy to the pietism of Spener. THOLUCK.

GLEBE (church land), most commonly the land belonging to a parish church, besides the tithes. There are several important statutes in relation to glebes, dating from the reign of Henry VIII. Originally every church had a house for the minister, and a glebe: indeed, there could be no consecration where these were not.

GLOSSES, Biblical. The word "gloss," which is derived from the Greek glossa, denotes not only tongue and language, but was also used among grammarians to denote any note appended to a word or phrase for the purpose of interpretation or illustration. Works containing such notes were called "glossaries," and comprised not only the wide range of philology, but also science, medicine, geography, etc., and even the sacred literature of the Bible. Notes on the latter were called "sacred glosses." Before, however, such glosses were noted down, the text of the Bible had been the subject of exegetical studies; and the word "glosses," which among the Greeks denoted "the word to be interpreted," was used among the Latins for the "explanation itself." In the latter sense it was used among the Christian writers of the middle ages, and is still used in our own days.

Almost as old as writing itself is the habit of placing annotations in the margin, either explanatory or otherwise, of the text. This was especially the case with the Bible; partly because it was read more than any other book, partly because it was read by such who needed an explanation, or believed themselves fit for making explanations. At first very brief, often confined to a single word, these glosses grew finally into more extended remarks. In the Hebrew codices these glosses were the source of not a few of the keri readings; and the glosses on the margins of the codices of the Septuagint and the New Testament have given rise to many of the various readings which exist in both of these, an elimination of which requires sound and cautious judgment. The more difficult the understanding of the sacred writings was regarded, the longer were the marginal annotations (glossæ marginales), which were especially made on the text of the Vulgate,—some grammatical, some historical, some theological, some allegorical and mystical. The most famous collection of these glossæ marginales is that of Walafrid Strabo, made in the ninth century, which became the great exegetical thesaurus of the middle ages, and was known as the Glossa Ordinaria. Besides notes being written in the margin, there were also such as were written between the lines (glossæ interlineares); and a collection of the latter was made by Anselm of Laon in the beginning of the twelfth century. Both works were often printed together. In the last century special attention was given to these glosses: such is the work of Ernesti, entitled Glossæ Sacrae, Leipzig, 1785. REUSS.

Glosses, or, as they are usually denominated, marginal notes, are found in English Bibles, in different versions. Those made by the Geneva translators particularly excited the dislike of King James, and made him ready to second Dr. Reynold's proposition for a new translation of the Bible on the second day of the Hampton Court Conference (Monday, Jan. 16, 1604). His objection to them was their alleged seditious and traitorous character, because they struck at the doctrine of the divine right of kings. The Bishop of London, therefore, proposed, that, in the new translation, there should be no marginal notes; to which the King said, "That caveat is well put in." Nevertheless the King James Version has such notes, although of very limited scope,—mere various readings, in most cases. There was some complaint at the omission of the Geneva annotations. See Fuller, Church Hist., Bk. X., Cent. xvii., Sects. 1, 2, and 3, ¶ 41, Nichol's ed., vol. iii., pp. 203 sqq., 276. The revised version of 1881 has also glosses, in which the various readings of ancient manuscripts are given. Many of the marginal readings of the British revisers should be substituted for those in the text, in the judgment of their American fellow-laborers.

GLOSSES and GLOSSATORES. After the overthrow of the West Roman Empire in Italy, Roman law gradually lost its authority in practical life, and, as a natural consequence thereof, also its theoretical interest as a study; until at the end of the eleventh, or the beginning of the twelfth, century, both were revived by the foundation of the law-school at Bologna by one Irnerius (Warnerius, Guarnerius). The fame of this school soon gathered a great number of pupils from all parts of Europe; and thereby was not only the scientific treatment of the Roman law advanced, but its practical application was at the same time inaugurated. The teachers, however, did not confine themselves to lecturing: a literary activity also developed. Explanations of single words or phrases, and illustrations of positive facts or relations, were put down in the form of short notes, glosses between the lines (interlinear glosses) or in the margin (marginal glosses); and, besides such short notes, the glossatores also produced summa (or surveys of the contents of a chapter), casus (or fictitious cases illustrative of certain principles), questiones, distinctiones, etc. From the Roman law this method was transferred to canon law, and flourished among the canonists of the University of Paris no less than among the legists of Bologna. Several of the pupils of Gratian wrote glosses on his decretum, and in 1212 Johannes Teutonicus undertook to gather these glosses into a continuous commentary on the decretum, called an apparatus, or glossa ordinaria. Similar glossæ ordinariæ were also made to the decretals of Gregory IX., the Liber sextus, the Clementines, and Extravagantes, and are of great value, not only scientific, but also historical. See SARTI: De claris archigymnasii Bonon. professoribus, 1769.

GLOUCESTER, capital city of the county of the same name; situated on the Severn, 106 miles north-west from London; population 18,330; founded by the Romans under the name of Aulus Plautius; called by the Saxons Gleauanceastre; is one of the most famous cities of England. Here was the favorite residence of Edward the Confessor and the Norman kings; here Charles I. was repulsed by the Earl of Essex; and here the Sunday school was instituted, the first one being held by Robert Raikes, 1781. Its cathedral dates from the eleventh century, and the diocese of Gloucester from 1541. Among its famous bishops may be mentioned Hooper (1550-55) and Warburton (1759-79). Since 1836 it has been consolidated with Bristol. The present episcopal income is five thousand pounds per annum, and the incumbent (1882) is Dr. Charles John Elliott, who was consecrated in 1863.

GNAPHÆUS, Wilhelmus (Fullonius), b. at The Hague, 1493; d. at Norden, Sept. 29, 1568; a noticeable Dutch humanist; was rector of the gymnasium of his native city, but joined the reformatory movement; was twice imprisoned by the Romanists, and finally compelled to flee the country. He went to Prussia, first as rector of a school in Elburg, then as director of the pedagogium in Königsberg. But he found no more toleration among the Lutherans of Prussia than among the Romanists of his home. Though he was not a theologian, he was dragged from one theological disputation into another, condemned for heresy, as he belonged to the Reformed confession, excommunicated, and banished, 1517. He found a refuge in Friesland.

GNOSTICISM, an eclectic philosophy of the first Christian centuries, which constructed its systems out of Pagan, Jewish, and Christian elements, and clothed its ideas in mythological drapery. The term is originally derived from gnosis, or "knowledge," which Paul uses for a deep acquaintance with God's purpose in redemption (1 Cor. xiii. 21). Lipsius has shown that the Syrian-Ophite Gnostics first bore the name in a pre-eminent sense. Irenæus states, speaking of the whole sect, that the Carpocratians, one of the oldest sects, called themselves "Gnostics." This fact, and the early development of a Christian philosophy in Alexandria, lead us to the conclusion that it was used at a very early date in that city. Gnosis was used in contrast not only to pistis, or "faith," but also to the Pagan philosophia.

Gnosticism stands on the border-line between the Christian system and Paganism. It was the resultant of two processes, starting from different directions, — the contact of the Church, on the one side, with Pagan thought; and the attempt of philosophy, on the other, to harmonize Christian revelation with its own systems. It gave up the monotheism of the Scriptures, limited the canon, and allegorized away, in part or in whole, the great facts of Christ's work and person. Gnosticism drew largely from the Greek systems of Plato and the Stoics; but that which is characteristic was derived from Oriental religions. It incorporated their bald Dualism; while Greek philosophy, for the most part, favors the Pantheistic conception of the universe. As a rule, it represented individual life as the result of a process of emanation from the original essence; while Greek speculation taught a process of development by evolution in an ascending scale from chaos. Unlike Greek systems, its thought was not methodical, but poetical, and charged with Oriental imagery and freedom. The Gnostics, likewise, showed their preference for Oriental mythologies in the names of the angels. Parseeism with its fully-developed idea of God as light, Chaldean astrology (in Bardesanes and Saturninus), and Buddhism with its ascetic tendency, — all combined with the Syrian and Phœnician mythologies to give to Gnosticism its Oriental coloring.

The principal task which Gnosticism proposed for itself was to lead man by speculative knowledge to salvation. The chief questions which pressed upon it for solution were how the human spirit became imprisoned in matter, and how it might be emancipated. The former is almost synonymous with the question concerning the origin of evil; which Tertullian, with other polemical writers, regarded as the main subject of Gnostic thought. In the latter, the purification and deliverance of the soul, it agitated one of the profoundest thoughts of Christianity.

Influenced by Hellenic philosophy, the Gnostics subordinated the will to knowledge, and represented experimental Christianity as knowledge rather than faith, and made knowledge the standard of the moral condition. They would have changed the consecution of Christ's words in Matt. v. 8 to the statement, "They that see God are pure in heart." They were influenced by the aristocratic class-feeling of the Greek philosopher, who regarded himself as lifted above the religious creed and humiliating occupations of the multitude. It continued in a lower stage of knowledge characterized by faith. Upon the believer who held to the letter they looked down with contempt. Faith was in this way made a principle of separation by Gnosticism; while Christianity makes it the bond of union and brotherhood between all men. The Gnostic divided mankind into three classes. — spiritual (πνευματικοί), psychic, and carnal (ψυχικοί, σαρκικοί, etc.) beings. The last class are controlled by passion and instincts. Matter is the source of chaotic movement and sinful desire; God and the spiritual nature (πνεῦμα) are unmoved by instinct and passion. The spiritual beings become aware of their kinship with God, and will be completely delivered. This is the source of moral duty, and the law of life for the spiritual class. They must seek to lift themselves up to the divine kingdom, and thus bring to development the seed within them.

Different writers have endeavored to derive the various phases of Gnosticism from a single leading principle. Baur finds it in the idea of the absolute religion of which it treats when it discusses the agreements and disagreements of Christianity on the one hand, and Paganism and Judaism on the other. Lipsius finds it in the distinction between knowledge and faith. Without denying this antithesis, Neander and Hilgenfeld represent the person of the World-Creator as the point of departure. This mythological figure is called by Valentinus (following Plato), Demiurge; by Basilides, Archon; and by Ophitic sects, Jaldabaoth, or Son of Chaos. This is, at any rate, the most characteristic figure in Gnostic systems, and concentrates in itself its most important ideas. The introduction of this being between God and the visible universe grows out of the antithesis of God and matter. This speculative Dualism leads to a religious Dualism, which sets the God of the New Testament in sharp contrast to the God of the Old Testament. The Demiurge is almost invariably represented as having a very subordinate activity, compared with God (and Justinus is the only one who even ascribes to him a spiritual or pneumatic nature), and then he is devoid of the foreknowledge of God. The spirits which proceed from God are high above him. He belongs to the world, and marks the chasm between it and God. The description of his creative work draws largely from the first chapters of Genesis. He is the God of the Jews. But his kingdom is broken into by the kingdom of Satan and by that of spiritual or pneumatic life.

The classification of Gnostic sects offers much difficulty. Since the discovery of Hippolytus, the difficulty has become greater on account of the additional systems he brings to our notice. He also has made it apparent that the Pantheistic conception also had some currency, as well as the Dualistic, among the Gnostics. Geseler groups them into Alexandrian, in which Platonic influences are potent, and Syrian, in which there is a stronger Dualism. But, by his own confession, the system of the Syrian Marcion does not favor this division. The classification, on the basis of religious influence, which Hase makes into Oriental, Hellenic, Christian, and Jewish, is inexact. Lipsius, on the double basis of date of origin and characteristics, distinguishes three stadia: (1) Early Gnosticism, in which elements of Syrian mythologies were blended with the Judæo-Christian ideas; (2) Hellenic Gnosticism, beginning with the assumed transition of Basilides to Alexandria; (3) A stage in which speculation wanes, and the conflict of Gnosticism against faith ceases. Here belongs Marcion. The alleged transition from a Syrian to Hellenic Gnosticism in Basilides is not borne out by facts. The two developed contemporaneously. In Alexandria, Gnosticism was strong as early as the middle of the second century. Cerinthus began his career there; and, if we follow the account of Hippolytus, Basilides belonged there. Baur arranges the systems thus: (1) Such as combine Christianity with Judaism and Paganism (Basilides, Valentinus, the Ophites); (2) Such as oppose Christianity to both (Marcion); (3) Such as, identifying Judaism and Christianity, oppose them to Paganism (Clementine Homilies).

A better grouping than either of these is Neander's, who distinguishes two main classes, — the Judaizing and Anti-Judaistic. For ourselves we prefer a classification based upon historic development, and distinguish (1) The period of sporadic Gnosticism at the close of the first century, (2) The period of greatest fertility of speculation till the middle of the third, (3) The period of decay in which there is little of original thought (after the fifth century there are no new systems), (4) The revival of Gnostic ideas about the seventh century in the sect of the Cathari. We shall here concern ourselves only with the first two classes.

Gnosticism exerted a powerful reflex influence upon the Church. When the Church was about to sink into a stagnant literalism, and into formalism of life, the idealistic speculation of the Gnostics gave her an impulse towards thought, and a more comprehensive discussion of doctrine. The consequence was, that those points in which Christianity is distinguished from Judaism and Paganism were investigated and emphasized. The Alexandrian school of theologians, who more than equalled the Gnostics in depth of speculative thought, was one evidence of the new life. Not altogether free from the error of finding the essence of Christianity in knowledge, it was Christian in tone, both of doctrine and morality. It borrowed from the rich speculations of Greek philosophy, but held aloof from Oriental theosophy. The influence of Gnosticism was not only good in arousing the Church to a clearer definition of her fundamental doctrines; it gave also the stimulus to exegetical labors by itself leading the way. Basilides and Heracleon were the first to comment upon whole Gospels. The Gnostics also preceded in the department of religious poetry. Learning, as she did, from Gnosticism, the Church, on the other hand, gathered more closely about her bishops, and emphasized more strongly her distinctive doctrines, peculiar rites, and apostolic origin.

[Gnosticism was the Rationalism of the ancient Church. It was an effort of profound speculative thought to harmonize the Christian revelation with reason. It brought forward the distinguishing principles of Hellenic philosophy, Oriental theosophy, and the Jewish religion, and compared the great ideas of Christianity with them. Christianity was often clothed in fantastic drapery, and associated with grotesque images; but it was always declared superior to any thing that had preceded it. This movement of thought was perhaps inevitable; but the Gnosticism of the early Church is distinguished from the Rationalism of our century by having been confined to the speculations of scholars. Modern Gnosticism has gone among the people. The contrast may be accounted for by the circumstance that the people then saw more plainly the effects of non-Christian thought and life upon the world, and knew more clearly the superior merit and power of Christianity over all the systems that had preceded it.]

The first period of Gnosticism belongs to the close of the first century. The earliest proleptic signs of Gnosticism are to be looked for in Simon Magus. He was one of the numerous magicians of the East who pretended to have the power of working miracles. Judaistic Gnosticism is pre-figured by the false teachers against whom Paul contends in his Epistle to the Colossians. Without denying the Messianic office of Christ, they seem to have had a well-developed doctrine of angels, who, perhaps, were regarded as having participated in the creation. There are also traces of Gnosticism in the Epistles to Timothy. The First Epistle of John opposes Docetism. At the close of the apostolic age, Cerinthus was active in that part of Asia Minor where John labored. He retained some doctrines of the Old Testament, but placed at the side of God a World-Creator, the God of the Jews, who is also the head of the lower angels. Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary. The Redeemer descended upon him at his baptism, and left him just before the passion.

The golden period of Gnosticism closed about the middle of the third century. After the first decades of the second century, Gnostic speculation was fruitful of systems to an extent of which there is no parallel in the history of philosophy, either ancient or modern. Starting from Egypt and Syria, they extended themselves to the remotest part of the Church, even as far as Edessa and Lyons. The distinctive Gnostic features are more clearly outlined, and the various schools stand in relations of antagonism or friendship. We pass now to a description of the Gnostic systems in detail.

I. Judaizing Gnostics. BASILIDES.—Two divergent accounts of the system of Basilides have come down to us. Irenæus and Epiphanius describe it as teaching a bold Dualism, and drawing very largely from Parseeism. Hippolytus and Clement of Alexandria, on the other hand, represent it as monistic, and largely under the influence of Greek philosophy, especially the Stoic. The latter is evidently the true representation. Irenæus was poorly informed, and does not even mention Isidore, the son and disciple of Basilides. Clement and Hippolytus, on the other hand, seem to have had access to the writings of both.

The following is an outline of the Basilidean system. God is the Unnamable, and, in contrast to all other beings, he may be called the Non-Existent One; for he is so high above us, that we cannot affirm of him any predicates. He discards the doctrine of emanation commonly held by the Gnostics. Matter is not eternal, but the product of divine creation. Far beneath his throne, God deposits the seed, out of which, as from an egg, the world bursts and develops. The expression, "seed of the world," is Stoic; and the illustration of the egg, originally Oriental, was adopted extensively in the cosmogonic poetry of the Greeks. This seed is conceived of as a chaotic mixture of the three elements in the world,—the spiritual or pneumatic, the psychic, and the hylie. The spiritual or pneumatic first detaches itself; and the most subtle and ethereal portion of it swings itself aloft, with the rapidity of thought, to God. To it belong the highest spirits,—Mind, Word, Intelligence, Wisdom, Power, Justice, Peace,—which, with the Father, constitute the great Ogdoad, the type of the lower spheres. The second class of pneumatic beings exist beneath these. Out of the psychic element went forth the architect and ruler of the world, the ARCHON, who, without being conscious of it, is governed by the divine laws. With the aid of astronomical forces he forms three hundred and sixty-five heavens, the lowest of which stretches from the moon downwards. A lower Archon presides over this sphere. God uses both Archons for his purposes. The lower Archon appropriates to himself the Jewish people, reveals himself in the Old Testament, and also to the heathen world. Prophecy begets a longing for deliverance from the fetters of matter. When the fulness of time had come, the Redeemer was born of the virgin. At the baptism he was endowed with new spiritual powers, and, after preaching the higher knowledge of salvation, was put to death. Christ died on account of the remainders of sin left in him, but also to deliver the children of God from the fetters of matter. The process of deliverance is now going on, and will be completed when all pneumatic beings are gathered to God. Basilides and his son Isidore, who wrote a work on ethics, taught a moderate asceticism. The former appeals to the apostle Mathias, and used the Gospel of John, for which, and the Epistles to the Corinthians, Ephesians, and Romans, he is the first witness. See art. BASILIDES.

VALENTINUS.—All that we know of the life of this teacher is, that he came to Rome in the days of Bishop Hyginus (about 138), was at the height of his influence under Pius (about 155), and was teaching until the administration of Anicetus (about 166). It is certain that he hailed from the East. But Tertullian's statement, that he broke with the Church, and was repeatedly excommunicated, is suspicious. Valentinus was endowed with rich powers of mind. His system is the most artistic of all the Gnostic systems. It is an epic describing creation, apostasy, and redemption, in two spheres,—heaven and earth.

God is unfathomable profundity, and the most sufficient name for him is Abyss (βυθος). For endless ages he remains in silent, undisturbed contemplation of his own glory. His thought, denominated Ennoia ("conception"), or Sige ("silence"), is associated with him. From Bythos and Sige emanate pairs in a downward scale,—Nous ("mind") and Aletheia ("truth"), Logos ("word") and Zoe ("life"), Anthropos ("man") and Ecclesia ("church"). With eleven other pairs these four constitute the divine Pleroma, or fulness. These beings are called Æons. The further they are removed from the Bythos, or God, the greater the defect of divine life, and longing after it. The furthest off is Sophia ("wisdom"), which has a vehement desire to comprehend God. Her sinful passion disturbs the harmony in the Pleroma, and, being separated from herself, is placed outside of the Pleroma. This marks the transition to the world. Harmony is restored; and out of gratitude the Æons construct out of their best gifts the finest Æon of all,—the star in the divine fulness, the upper Christ, who is surrounded by hosts of angels. Valentinus seems not to be clear about matter. It is either identical with the expelled πάθος ("passion"), or exists, distinct from the Pleroma, as Kenoma, or the Void. But in Sophia matter is of one kind; in the world it is evil.

The second part of the system descends to the formation of the visible world. The separated part, or πάθος, still has pneumatic life. She is the product of Sophia, and called Ahamoth, from the Hebrew Chochmah ("wisdom"). From her proceed the fundamental elements of the world. She delegates the formation of the world and man to the Demiurge, who dwells in the seventh heaven. Man lives at first in paradise, the third heaven, but repeats the apostasy, and is cast down to earth. The Demiurge sends the Messiah, upon whom the Æon Christ descends. But only the human Messiah dies, the Æon leaving him before his passion. After the resurrection, the Messiah tarried eighteen months among the disciples, teaching them the mysteries of the divine Pleroma. All pneumatic beings will be completely delivered. The Demiurge, who humbled himself before the Æon Christ as he passed through his kingdom, will lift up the righteous psychic beings to a place where they will hear the jubilant echoes of the Pleroma. Then fire will consume matter and the psychic evil-doers. The most prominent representatives of this school were Heraclion of Alexandria, Ptolemy, and Marcus of Palestine. The correspondence of ideas makes it almost certain that Valentinus used the Gospel of John.

COLOBARSUS is inaccurately made by Irenæus the founder of a sect. The name is derived from the Hebrew kol arba, and designates the fourfold principle in which the original essence at first manifests itself.

BARDESANES, who gave the impulse to the Christian poet, Ephraem of Syria, enjoyed for a time the esteem of the Syrian Church, but was subsequently forced to emigrate. From the fragmentary notices that have come down to us, we gather that he drew largely from Valentinus and the Chaldean astrology. But in his Docetic view of Christ is implied a bold Dualism. See art. BARDESANES.

II. Anti-Judaistic Gnostics. SATURNINUS, or SATURNILUS, of Antioch in Syria, flourished in the early part of the second century. He taught the sharp antagonism of the unknown God and matter, which is dominated by Satan. Judaism and Paganism are hostile to Christianity; and Christ was sent to destroy the God of the Jews, and to bring deliverance to the pneumatic beings.

MARCION was the son of the Bishop of Sinope. He was a man of earnest temperament, and retained much moral Christian force. Tertullian states that he was excommunicated several times. The probable reason for his leaving Syria, and going to Rome, was the hope of finding a purer form of Christianity. He was acquainted with Polycarp. Christianity he regarded as incomparably superior to Judaism and Paganism. But the Church apologists opposed him with great vehemence; and Polycarp, at their meeting in Rome, treated him as the first-born of Satan. The tradition went, that he sought re-admission to the Church before his death.

The fundamental ideas in Marcion's system are the most high God, who is love; the Demiurge, whom he identifies with the God of the Old Testament, and represents as unmerciful; and Hyle, or matter, ruled by Satan. The Demiurge at first unites with Hyle to form the world and man, but, by deceiving her, appropriates man for himself. In revenge, Hyle fills the earth with polytheism and idolatry. The Demiurge continues to dominate in Judaism; but the history neither of Judaism nor of Paganism has any thing to do with the most high God. Taking pity upon man, God sends Christ. The Demiurge effects his crucifixion. Christ descends to Hades, and preaches redemption to the Jews condemned by the Demiurge and to the heathen idolaters of Hyle. He condemns the Demiurge himself to hell, and chooses Paul as his apostle. To him alone he imparts the pure gospel. Marcion accepted into his canon only ten Pauline Epistles and a mutilated Gospel of Luke. His most able followers were APELLES, PREPON an Assyrian, and LUCAIUS. The Marcionites were divided up into many sects, and in Epiphanius' time, by his own statement, were scattered from Persia to Rome. For the Doketists, who belong here, see art. DOKETISM.

III. Gnosticizing Paganism. CARPOCRATIANS.—Carpocrates was an Alexandrian, and taught in the first decades of the second century. His system was monistic. All life, by an ever-expanding procession, emanates from the monad. On the limits of the divine development is matter, wherein the spirits who are finally fallen away from God have their habitation. EPIPHANES his son, who wrote a work on Justice, followed closely his father's system. The Antinomianism of the Carpoeratiens gave occasion to the heathen world for accusations against the Christians, with whom it identified them.

SIMON MAGUS (Acts viii. 9, 10) was, as early as the second century, denounced by the Church as the arch-heretic, and founder of Gnosticism. Although he professed to be a believer (Acts viii. 13), he gave himself out as "the Great Power of God." A sect in the second century derived their origin from him, regarding his authority as co-ordinate with that of the apostles. The tradition ran, that he purchased a harlot at Tyre. He allowed her to be worshipped as his first conception (Ennoia), who created the angels. These form the world; but she maddens them by her charms, so that they indulge in lust, to which the Homeric poems refer. Simon appears to deliver Ennoia; and, like her, all Gnostics will be delivered.

Clement of Alexandria mentions a number of sects which belong here, and which he describes merely on the side of their moral teachings. Pantheism was common to them all. The ANTI-TACTES hoped to attain salvation by defiance of the moral law, thereby defeating the Demiurge. So, also, the followers of PROCLUS, who proudly applied to themselves the name Gnostics. The Nicolaitans appealed to the deacon Nicolas (Acts vi. 5) as their authority, and likewise taught the freedom of the flesh. They have no connection with the sect of the same name in the Apocalypse.

IV. The Ophites.—This class of Gnostics—called by Hippolytus Ophites, by Clement of Alexandria Ophians—give a prominent place in their systems to the serpent,—a demon now of evil, now of good. In doing this they were in the line of the mythologies of ancient Babylon (in which the seven-headed serpent fights against the powers of light), of Persia, and of Egypt. The apocryphal literature of the Jews also refers frequently to the serpent. The Ophites drew largely, also, from Greek philosophy. The sharp antithesis in which they set Judaism and Christianity, and the preponderance of the Pagan element, precludes the theory that they were of Jewish origin.

JUSTINUS, whose system Hippolytus has noticed, was more largely influenced by Old-Testament ideas than any other of the Ophites. From an original good and male being there proceeded a female being, Edem, whose upper part was human, lower, serpent. The Demiurge (called Elohim) emanates from God. He has intercourse with Edem, and begets two kinds of beings corresponding to her twofold nature. Forsaken by him, Edem fills the earth with evils. Elohim seeks to draw men upwards, loves the Jews, and reveals himself through Baruch, one of the angels, to Moses and the prophets. These are, however, traduced by Edem. Elohim then turns to the prophets of the heathen world. They share the same fate. Baruch finally finds in Jesus, the Son of Mary and Joseph, a firm opponent of Edem. He resists all temptations of the serpent, and his crucifixion is brought about by it. This opens the way for the complete separation of the earthly and the heavenly; Christ's spirit having gone to Elohim, and the body to Edem.

The Ophites of Irenaeus place Christianity in sharper antagonism to the Demiurge. Dualism is distinctly avowed. On the one side is Bythos, the divine being; on the other, matter, a desolate ocean, made up of water, darkness, chaos, and abyss. From the mingling of the light with matter proceeds Jaldabaoth, the Son of Chaos. He is the World-Creator. Looking down with grim hatred upon Hyle, his diabolic image is produced, — Ophiomorphus, or the "crooked serpent" (Isa. xxvii. 1). From him go forth all evil, sorrow, and death. He dominates Cain and the heathen; Jaldabaoth, the Jews, and inspires Moses and other prophets. But he crucifies Jesus, upon whom the heavenly Christ had descended, and does not share in the kingdom of light. But Christ brings salvation to all pneumatic beings.

The SETHIANI used a "Paraphrase of Seth," whence their name. Matter is an ocean, tempestuous, chaotic, dark. The light excites the serpent-soul in matter, which then becomes the Demiurge. The Logos descends from the light, deceives the Demiurge by assuming the form of a serpent, and lifts the soul up to the realm of light.

The NAASENI (serpent-worshippers) flourished in Phrygia. They taught that the serpent emanates from God, and is the soul of the world. Christ does not redeem men by his death, but by his gnosis and teaching.

The PERATEÆ, as their name signifies, looked upon themselves as belonging to another world, and as only in a state of transition in this. They thrived about 150; for Clement of Alexandria mentions them. The Archon of matter is a hylie demon, and his companions are the poisonous serpents of the desert. The serpent, as the apostle of wisdom, frees Eve from the bondage of the Archon. To it belong Cain, Nimrod, and, none the less, Moses, who lifts up the serpent in the wilderness. Like the CAINITES, they regarded Judas as the true apostle. Thus the whole story of the Gospels was completely inverted, the serpent being regarded as the symbol of intellect, who first gave true knowledge to our first parents, and the very betrayer of Christ declared to be the highest apostle.

The various Gnostic sects described by Epiphanius — the PHIBIONITES, STRATIOTIKES, etc. — were distinguished by a moral rottenness which almost staggers belief. On the one hand, theology and apologetics had shown the vast superiority of Christianity to Gnosticism; on the other, Gnostic sects, once with noble aims, had so degenerated, that no doubt was left that its time was past.

GOAR, St., settled, during the reign of Childbert (511-558), on the Rhine, at the present village of St. Goar; built a chapel, and spent his life there, in spite of the persecutions of a certain Bishop Rusticus of Treves, in ascetic practices, exercising hospitality, and working many miracles. Thus the legend. But there never was a bishop of Treves of the name Rusticus, and the legend itself (Act. Sanct., Julii, Tom. II. 327-346) cannot well be older than the ninth century. It probably had a basis in fact. G. PLITT.

GOBAT, Samuel, D.D., Bishop of Jerusalem; b. at Crémone, Bern, Switzerland, Jan. 26, 1799; d. at Jerusalem, May 11, 1879. He entered the mission house at Basel in 1821; in 1823 proceeded to Paris and London, where he learned Arabic, Ethiopic, and Amharic; and in 1826 was sent by the (English) Church Missionary Society to Abyssinia, but, owing to the unsettled state of that country, could not begin operations until 1830, and left in 1832. He returned in 1834, but sickness prevented his working; and so, in September, 1835, he came back to Europe. From 1839 to 1842 he was in Malta, superintending the translation of the Bible into Arabic, and taking charge of the printing-press there. In 1845 he was appointed vice-principal of the Malta Protestant College, and in 1846 nominated, greatly to his surprise, by the king of Prussia (Frederick Wilhelm IV.) to the see of Jerusalem. He was consecrated at Lambeth, Sunday, July 5, 1846.

His work in the Holy City was very successful and vigorous. Particularly worthy of mention is the Diocesan School and the Orphanage on Mount Zion. In November, 1847, he began with nine children in the former; when he died, there were in Palestine, under his care, 37 schools, with 1,400 children. He also had under him twelve native churches. He had an efficient helper in his wife. He wrote A Journal of Three Years in Abyssinia, Lond., 1847. See Samuel Gobat: Sein Leben und Werke, meist nach seinen eigenen Aufzeichnungen, Basel, 1884. English trans., London, 1884.

GOCH, Johannes, or properly Johannes Pupper; was b. at Goch, near Aix-la-Chapelle, in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and probably educated in one of the establishments of the Brethren of Common Life. Studied in Paris, and founded the priory of Thabor, for canonesses of St. Augustine, in Mechlin, which he governed himself till his death, March, 1475. His life seems to have passed along quietly and unnoticed; but when his De libertate Christiana was published in 1521, by Coru-Græphus, it attracted great attention, and its author was recognized as one of the true predecessors of the Reformation. See ULLMANN: Die Reformatoren vor der Reformation, I. p. 168.

GOD. I. NAME AND GENERAL IDEA. — Although the existence of God is the most certain of all facts for Christians and religious people generally, and although all moral and religious life depends upon him for its motives and aims, yet Christian theologians of every period have agreed that it is impossible to give an exhaustive definition of his being. This is due to the fact that God neither stands in a relation such as exists between genus and species, nor can be included in a class with other persons under a single genus. Yet all systems of religion have had positive notions of the Deity. Common to all has been the idea that he is a being superior to man and nature, and controls, to some extent, man's destiny. His will, which is regarded in the lowest religions as despotic and arbitrary, is defined in the higher religions as almighty, originating and controlling all things. Speculative thought takes a step higher when it represents this will, upon which all depends, as unconditioned by any thing outside of itself, and eternal. But it remains for the Christian revelation to add the most important feature; namely, that God is a moral being, absolutely good, and guiding the world to a perfect consummation. Of the two names for God which the Hebrews had in common with other Semitic peoples, El expresses the notion of power, and Elohim represents him as an object of awe and dread. But neither contains any allusion to God's redeeming love. Our God is not connected etymologically with good (Max Müller, 2d series, p. 118), but is probably derived from the Sanscrit jut or dyut, Gothic, gutha, meaning to shine. The same word is the root of the Latin Deus and the Greek Zeus.

II. GOD IN THE SCRIPTURES. — Characteristic of the Old-Testament revelation of God is the moral relation he sustains to the world. The Old Testament does not give theoretical definitions of the Divine Being, or arguments for his existence, but assumes the belief in him. The religious reverence and fear which are becoming in our relations to him are based upon his moral elevation, his absolute holiness, which cannot tolerate sin. Jehovah, the name which indicates God's covenant relation to Israel, designates the immutability and absoluteness of his being. God is a personal spirit, not a force of nature. He is separate from the world; yet his spirit is the creating and moving principle of all life (Ps. civ. 29 sqq., etc.), and particularly of man's life (Gen. ii. 7; Job xxxiii. 4, etc.). The earth is a monument revealing his glory (Num. xiv. 21, etc.). The plural form of the divine name Elohim points to his infinite fulness of life. Although the holiness of God is the predominant conception of the Old Testament, the thought of divine love and grace is not wanting. God in mercy chooses Israel to be his people, and desires to be called Father (Exod. iv. 22 sq.; Dent. xxxii. 6; Isa. lxiii. 16; Hos. xi. 1). He effaces guilt, purifies the heart, and imparts his spirit (Ezek. xxxvi. 22 sqq., etc.). It is this ethical and religious conception of God, and not the divine unity, or Monotheism, which is the distinguishing feature of the Old-Testament revelation.

The New Testament is characterized by the presentation of God as the Father of Jesus Christ and of those who belong to his kingdom. The relation is now strictly a personal one, the Old Testament representing God as the Father of a people. We are made God's children by a new birth (John i. 12; 1 John iii. 9). Thus, having become partakers of the divine nature (2 Pet. i. 4), we shall at last be filled with "all the fulness of God" (Eph. iii. 19). God himself lives and works in them (Eph. iv. 6). He is in a peculiar sense the Father of Christ, who was begotten before the worlds (John i. 1 sqq.), and possesses the divine fulness (Col. ii. 9). In the name Father the principle of love is contained. "God is love" (1 John iv. 8), and this love controls his use of all the other attributes. It leads God to reveal himself in the gift of his Son (1 John iv. 10, etc.), and to take men into communion with himself. God is also light or holiness (1 John i. 5) and spirit (John iv. 24), and has eternal life (Rev. i. 4, 8). Man derives from God's works the knowledge of his invisible being and power (Rom. i. 20). As the God of love and light, he is revealed to us through Moses and the Prophets, and perfectly in the person of his own Son (John i. 18, xiv. 9). This knowledge which the believer has of God depends upon God's own special agency through the Spirit (Matt. xvi. 17; John vi. 41, etc.). Our present knowledge, however, is imperfect. "We see through a glass darkly" (1 Cor. xiii. 12; 2 Cor. v. 7, etc.). But in Christ, who is his image (2 Cor. iv. 4), we see God's dearest purpose revealed, and from him derive all the knowledge necessary for salvation and for consummate communion with God.

III. GOD IN CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. — Theology cannot be entirely divorced from philosophy. And, fixed as the notion of God is which the Scriptures present, it was proper, as well as unavoidable, that it should be subjected to the scrutiny of reason. In its infancy Christian theology came in contact with the products of Greek philosophy, and was influenced by the definitions of Plato, the Neo-Platonists, and of Philo, who himself owed much, directly or indirectly, to Plato.

The general influence of these extra-Christian forces was in the direction of a negative and abstract conception of the Deity. In Gnosticism this abstractly conceived God is transformed into the dark background, which, according to Valentinus, is the first beginning and cause of all things, and has Silence (σῆν) for a consort. (See GNOSTICISM.) Within the Church, Justin Martyr and the apologetical writers who followed him, and especially the Alexandrine school, emphasized with Plato God's transcendence above nature; although the Scriptures always affirm, at the side of this, that he is a personal, holy, and loving Spirit. The more the influence of philosophy was felt, the more prominently did Christian theologians urge the negative and abstract element in God's nature. Origen defined him as simple being, without predicates, exalted above mind and matter, yet nevertheless as the Father, who eternally begets the Logos, and reveals himself through him. In contrast to this tendency was the anthropomorphic representation prevalent among the mass of Christians, which found its extreme expression in Tertullian, who associated a body with God. In this direction mention must be made of Dionysius Areopagita, whose theology was essentially Neo-Platonic. He taught that God's nature is absolutely undefinable, but at the same time speaks of a union with God which is nothing more than an ecstatic rapture, by which we become lost in the mystery of the Deity. The Areopagite's writings exerted an extensive influence upon the mysticism of after-periods in church history. Augustine was the first in the Western Church to concern himself with the scientific investigation of the divine nature. He laid stress, first of all, upon the self-conscious personality of God; but Platonic influence is evident in his further prosecution of the subject, when he defines God as the unity of all abstract perfections, as an absolutely simple essence, in which knowledge, volition, being, and all attributes, are one and the same.

The writings of Dionysius were given to the Western Church in the translation of Scotus Erigena. True being, says the latter, belongs only to God; so that whatever in finite things truly exists is nought else than God himself. This is Pantheism, from the charge of which he rescues himself by illogically teaching the doctrines of Creation and the Trinity. Scholasticism was under the immediate influence of Augustine, in its definition of God. Realism, if pressed, would have forced it to the conclusion that the Infinite only exists as it is found in the finite. But from this it held back. Thomas Aquinas and Albertus Magnus said God was not the essence of finite things, but their final cause and original moving principle. On the other hand, Duns Scotus insists that from the beginning God had will, and exercised volition; but this will was essentially absolute and arbitrary. Occam strongly emphasized this point: whence, from Abelard on, those protracted, and subtle discussions whether any thing was impossible for him. In the fourteenth century, Eckhart, as the representative of mysticism, finds the aim of life to be to lose one's self in God. His views were extensively adopted in pious circles; but pantheistic heretics, the so-called Brothers of the Free Spirit, taught that God was every thing, and man was God, and deduced an immoral Antinomianism from the doctrine. The popular mind, in the Middle Ages, demanded mediators and intercessors in its approach to God; so that Luther afterwards complained that he was no longer regarded as a being full of love and compassion, but as a stern governor.

Avoiding the metaphysical subtleties of scholasticism, the Reformers emphasized the proposition that God is the God of redemption, who threatens the sinner with the curse and death, but subordinates every thing to his purpose of saving the lost. The dogmatic divergencies of the Lutheran and Reformed confessions point back to different conceptions of God's nature. The latter emphasized more strongly God's sovereignty, and the eternal decree by which he rejects a portion of the race. Against this the Lutheran theology guards. However, it must not be forgotten that Luther, in his earlier writings, predicates the same decree of God, and that he never subsequently, in a systematic way, contradicted this position. The theology of the next period enumerated the divine attributes under the heads "natural" and "moral," and affirmed, that, though our knowledge of God cannot be exhaustive, it is real, and sufficient for salvation. Socinianism presented God in the aspect of a Ruler endowed with consummate power and justice, whose knowledge of the future, however, is conditioned by the free will of man, which acts independently of him.

At the side of the traditional doctrine of the Church, philosophy now began to work out independent metaphysical systems. Spinoza's pantheism was condemned by theologians as palpably unchristian, yea, godless. But the philosophy of Leibnitz and Wolff enjoyed wide favor. It treated at length the arguments for God's existence, and defined God as the "most perfect Being." Kant's criticism shook to the very foundation the great arguments heretofore employed for God's existence, but replaced them by the moral argument, based upon the intuitive facts of the conscience and the moral law. Fichte gets no farther than a moral order in the universe; and the speculations of Schelling and Hegel substitute for God the idea of the Absolute, from which all the forms of thought and matter are derived. The descent from this proud Idealism to a bleak Materialism was startlingly rapid.

A new period begins with Schleiermacher, who built up his system of theology upon the facts of Christian experience, instead of metaphysical speculation. The theologians who agreed with him on this point sought to confirm the definition of God from Scripture, and contended against the pantheistic conception and for the divine personality; e.g., J. Muller and Rothe. Philosophers like J. H. Fichte, K. Ph. Fischer, Chalybaeus, Ulrici, and Lotze, have likewise stood forth as champions of God's personality. On the other hand, Biedermann still insists that God is an absolute spiritual but an impersonal essence; and Strauss in his last period took the final step over to materialism. In conclusion, it may be said that theology must always be ready to confess the imperfection of its definition of God. But this can never justify that school of thought which turns the living God into an abstraction, called the Absolute, which neither explains any thing, nor is itself intelligible.

GOD. 1. ARGUMENTS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF GOD.—The statement of St. Paul, that the "world by wisdom knew not God" (1 Cor. i. 21), is strictly true in the light of the history of religious systems. No heathen religion ever embodied the true conception of God: some of them had the most monstrous conceptions of him. The highest achievements of the best human systems of philosophy, such as Plato's, need to be supplemented by revelation. For Christians, sufficient proofs of the divine existence will always be the person, words, and works of Christ. So-called rational arguments have by some been considered impossible, on the ground that God is incomprehensible to rational thought (Jacobi). Others, from Arnobius down to Watson, the celebrated Methodist theologian (Theol. Institutes), have regarded them as either improper or superfluous. While they are in no wise essential to Christian piety, yet they have their place as attempts to show the accord of reason and revelation, and as a demonstration of the inadequacy of the former as compared with revelation. Before Kant sent forth his disparaging criticism, philosophy and theology dwelt extensively on the arguments: since that time, they have met with a varying fate. Schleiermacher's example in excluding them from his system of theology has been followed by not a few theologians (Thomasius, Philippi, etc.).

The arguments may be grouped in two classes, — those derived from a contemplation of ourselves, or the ontological and moral arguments; and those derived from a contemplation of the universe, or the cosmological and teleological arguments.

1. The Ontological Argument. — This proof argues from the pure intellectual idea of God up to the reality of his existence. The first to give definite form to it was Anselm. He reasons as follows: There is Something than which nothing greater can be conceived. Even the fool who says, "There is no God," has this idea; for he understands what is meant when he hears the proposition. But this "Something," etc., must exist in reality (in re), as well as in the intellect (in conceptu); for, if it exist only in the intellect, then something greater than it could be conceived, viz., that "Something" having objective existence; which is contradictory. Therefore that "Something," etc., exists in reality, as well as in the intellect. Clean as this argumentation seems to be, it is not free from serious logical error. It may be fairly questioned whether the first statement does not itself posit as having objective existence what it sets out to prove to exist. However, leaving this aside, the great objection lies in comparing that which has objective existence with a conception considered as having mere subjective existence, and declaring the former to be greater than the latter. A thing in real existence is exactly equal to its correspondent conception in the mind, neither less nor greater than it. A number written out on the slate is just equal to, and not greater than, the conception of that number. Not a single quality is added to the "Something," etc., as an objective reality, which it does not have as an idea. Kant was the first to apply this criticism. "Objective existence," he said, "is not a real predicate."

Descartes restated the argument: We have the conception of a most perfect Being. He must be an existent Being, he proceeded to argue, or we should have a most perfect Being imperfect. Leibnitz added a new element. It is absolutely necessary that something should exist whose existence inheres in its very essence. God is such a being; and such a being, if at all possible, exists. Wolff in Germany, Dr. Samuel Clarke in England, and others, have made able and elaborate statements of the argument. Dr. Clarke's argument starts with the proposition that something has existed from eternity, which, he says, "is so evident and undeniable, that no atheist in any age has ever presumed to assert the contrary." The ontological argument will always have a fascination for the mind. It does not prove God's existence; but, to use the language of Professor Flint (Theism, p. 285), it "has at least succeeded in showing, that unless there exists an eternal, infinite, and unconditioned Being, the human mind is in its ultimate principles self-contradictory and delusive."

2. The Cosmological Argument. — This proof starts from the sequences or effects in the universe. Aristotle among the ancients, and Thomas Aquinas and Leibnitz among Christian philosophers, have been its ablest exponents. Dr. Samuel Clarke, Kant, and others have denied its validity. Aquinas' argument was threefold. He argued back from motion to a first Mover, himself unmoved; from effects to a sufficient Cause; and from that which is only possible, and may cease to be, to a Being who exists necessarily. The validity of this argument hinges upon the answer to the question whether an endless retrogression of causes and effects is conceivable (regressus in infinitum). If the answer is, that it is impossible for the mind to conceive such a retrogression, then it follows necessarily that there exists an Absolute Essence, uncreated and eternal. But it may, according to Kant, with equal probability be asserted (on the basis of our experience), that such a retrogression is conceivable, and involves nothing contradictory to human experience. We know that every consequence has its antecedent, and every phenomenon its sufficient cause, so far as a phenomenon involves the idea of change. But the world itself may be regarded as an eternally existent essence, containing inherent in itself the germinating and begetting energy to which all phenomena are to be traced. The theory of evolution makes this no more probable

(as some have ventured hastily to assert), but, on the other hand, no less so. The world itself, then, with its germinating energy, is that absolute essence. The argument, then, by itself seems to be inconclusive.

3. The Teleological Argument.—This proof is the oldest of the arguments. In modern times Paley and the Bridgewater Treatises have ably stated and illustrated it. It finds order and arrangement in the universe, and the adaptation of means to ends. From these facts it draws the conclusion of a wise Intelligence as their only explanation. The "reign of law" (Duke of Argyll) has been abundantly illustrated and insisted upon; the marvellous order which reigns in the sidereal heavens, the wonderful adaptation of the members of the human body, as the eye and the hand, for the needs of man, the adaptation of the lower creation to supply his wants have been dwelt upon at length, and used to establish the conclusion that they betray Intelligent Design. This is known as the "physico-teleological," in opposition to the "historico-teleological" argument, which concerns itself with the facts and development of human history. Objections have been urged against the argument from design on two grounds: (1) That what is called design may as justly be called haphazard nature (the exact adjustment, for example, of the parts of the eye to vision, is indisputable; but this adjustment is conceivable as the blind combination of nature); (2) A broad class of facts is overlooked by the argument, and proves with equal force the want of design. Blights, famines, diseases, prevail, which interrupt the order of the universe, and interfere with the physical and mental happiness of man, and the life of other creatures. The world has malformations and monstrosities. Men are even born into the world crippled, so as to be unable to reach physical happiness. This class of objections has been ably stated by Mr. Mill, in his Three Essays on Theism. These objections may not be lightly set aside. It may be urged, in refutation of them, that there is an outlying purpose which even these exceptions must serve; that these inconsistencies and discordances are apparent, and not real. But this is a mere assumption, which no one can prove without Revelation. On the other hand, if it be granted that there is a preponderance of design or adaptation in the universe, this would fall short of proving that the world is the product of an omnipotent and intelligent Mind. Kant, who rejects the teleological argument, has well urged that at best it would bring us to an Architect of the world, not to a Creator. Even if it be agreed that the teleological argument does not establish the certainty of a supreme creative Intelligence, it cannot be denied that illustrations of design will always be powerful aids to faith for those already religiously disposed. The Scriptures frequently use them. "He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?" (Ps. xciv. 9, etc.).

4. The Moral Argument.—This proof starts from the facts of man's moral and spiritual nature. Kant, Sir William Hamilton, and others who reject the other arguments, grant the force of this one. It has been stated in different forms. (1) God is a necessary postulate of our whole spiritual nature. The idea of God seems to be germane to the race. From Cicero down, stress has been justly laid on the prevalence among all nations of a belief in a superior being. Again: without God our spiritual natures remain unsatisfied. The personal sense of dependence which expresses itself in prayer is universal. Worldliness and education may lead men to overcome or ignore it; but the natural impulse comes out in its power, when, in times of shipwreck or other peril, man cries aloud for help, and, be it observed, not to the forces of nature, but to a supreme Will who exists behind them. (2) The existence of the moral law within us can only be explained on the supposition of a Lawgiver. The sense of right and wrong is universal. Conscience declares them radically antagonistic and irreconcilable: it speaks in defiance of the will, even when that is set against hearing it, and determined to disobey it; and it commands and threatens with authority. Its word is ought, which Kant calls the categorical imperative. (3) Merit and happiness do not always go together in this world. Our sense of right demands that this should be the case, and forces us to believe in a just God, who in another world will rectify the inequalities of this.

The objections urged against the moral argument are two. The first asserts that conscience is a product of education. History proves the very opposite,—that the degeneracy of conscience is due to an indurating process, which Paul compares to searing with a hot iron (1 Tim. iv. 2). The second objection denies the assumption of a spiritual nature.

The general conclusions from a discussion of the arguments for God's existence are two. (1) That the mind of man is a hopeless enigma, and full of intuitive delusions; and that the universe is a cavernous mystery, if God do not exist. The beliefs of the great mass of mankind, as well as the confident assertion of the best philosophies, have alike been groundless, and the most ennobling counsels and the finest moral achievements been built upon a falsehood, unless he rule and govern. The human intellect shrinks from these awful inferences, and is forced, in spite of the apparent contradictions, to bow with Revelation before an omnipotent Governor of the universe. (2) The second thought is, that, although none of these arguments (except the moral argument) is by itself valid and convincing, each one contains elements, the combination of which makes the divine existence very probable, if not necessary for the mind. Professor Diman (Theistic Argument, p. 247) has put the case well in the following language: "The argument for the divine existence is complex and correlative. Not from one, but from many sources is the evidence derived; and its force lies in the whole, not in any of its parts."

II. ATTRIBUTES.—The attributes or properties of God are the modes in which we conceive of his nature. The distinction aids our finite minds in their attempts to understand God. But the attributes do not exist apart and separate from one another. Each is in itself the being of God, and identical with it. Three methods, mentioned for the first time by Dionysius the Areopagite, may be pursued to rise to a determination of the attributes; viz., denying to God all human imperfections (via negationis), affirming of him all proper human qualities in their consummate perfection (via eminentiæ), attributing to him all properties logically belonging to a First Cause (via causalitatis). Various classifications of the attributes have been made into positive and negative, natural and moral, absolute and relative, immanent and emanant, etc. An excellent summary is found in the definition of God in the Westminster Shorter Catechism: "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness, and truth." They may be enumerated here as follows:—

1. Aseity. God has life in himself, underived and inexhaustible (John v. 26). 2. Invisibility. God is Spirit (John iv. 24). No man hath seen God (John i. 18). His nature is immaterial. 3. Eternity, or God's infinity with regard to duration. He always has been, always will be (Ps. xc. 2; 1 Tim. i. 17, etc.). 4. Immutability. He changes not, in his nature (it does not grow or decrease), or in his purpose (Mal. iii. 6; Jas. i. 17). 5. Omnipresence. God is everywhere,—in heaven in a special manner, in hell, on earth, in the heart of the believer (Ps. cxxxix. 7; Isa. lvii. 15, etc.). 6. Omniscience. God is cognizant of all things. This knowledge is accurate and prescient (Matt. vi. 32). 7. Wisdom. God realizes the best designs by the use of the best means (Rom. xi. 33). It is manifest in the kingdoms of nature and grace. 8. Omnipotence. God has infinite power, and governs all things according to his will. He cannot deny himself by acting contrary to the laws of his own being. But in the truest sense nothing is impossible to God (Ps. xcv. 3; Matt. xix. 26). 9. Holiness. God is absolute and stainless moral purity. Not only is sinning to him impossible, but also the toleration of sin (Deut. xxxii. 4; Hab. i. 13; 1 John i. 5). For this reason, God is absolutely reliable. 10. Justice. God demands of his creatures righteous action, and deals righteously toward them, according to the canons which he has laid down for the race. It is legislative, as implanting a moral nature and law, and judicial, as punishing the wicked (Rom. i. 32), and rewarding the good (Rom. ii. 7). 11. Love (1 John iv. 8). This is God's chiefest attribute, all the others being exercised in accordance with its dictates. It manifests itself as goodness towards all creation (Jas. i. 17), unmerited grace toward the sinner (Rom. iii. 24), mercy toward the suffering (2 Cor. i. 3), and long-suffering toward those who resist the calls of the Spirit (Rom. ii. 4). 12. Faithfulness. God is absolutely reliable. His words and promises will not fail (Num. xxiii. 19; Tit. i. 2).

CODEAU, Antoine, Bishop of Grasse (1636), and then of Venice; b. at Dreux, 1605; d. at Venice, April 21, 1672. He was a man of literary tastes and poetical gifts. Among his works were, l'ersion expliquée du N. Testament (2 vols.), Les psaumes de David, traduits en vers français (some of which are sung in French Protestant churches), and Histoire de l'Église depuis le commencement du monde jusqu'à la fin du neuvième siècle (Paris, 1653-78). The last work is written in a more vivacious style than Fleury's, but less exact.

CODEHARD, St., b. at Ritenbach, Bavaria, 961; d. at Hildesheim, May 5, 1038; was educated at the court of the Archbishop of Salzburg, but entered the monastery of Nieder-Altaich in 991, and became its abbot in 997. By Henry II. he was charged with reforming the monasteries of Hersfeld, Tegernsee, etc., and, having succeeded in this task, he was made Bishop of Hildesheim in 1022. As a bishop he developed a great building activity. He was also credited with having worked miracles; and in 1131 he was canonized by Innocent III. His life was written by a contemporary, Wolfhere. See LEIBNITZ: Script. Rerum Brunsvic., I. 482, and Act. Sanct., Maji, Tom. I.

GODFREY OF BOUILLON (Duke of Lower Lorraine, and King of Jerusalem), the beloved leader of the first crusade; b. at Baisy, in Belgium, about 1060; d. in Jerusalem, July 15 or 18, 1100. He took the cross 1095, pawned his lordship of Bouillon to the church of Liege for thirteen hundred marks, collected eighty thousand infantry and ten thousand horsemen, and, after many adventures, arrived with the crusaders at Jerusalem, and took it, after a five-weeks' siege, July 15, 1099. "A Christian kingdom of Jerusalem was then founded, of which Godfrey was unanimously elected sovereign; but he refused to wear a crown of gold where his Lord had worn a crown of thorns, and accepted, instead of the kingly title, the humbler designation of 'Defender and Baron of the Holy Sepulchre." His reign was very brief (only a single year), but full of brave deeds. He died lamented by both his Mohammedan and Christian subjects. Tasso has immortalized him in his Jerusalem Delivered, and history confirms his description of Godfrey as a pious, accomplished, and prudent knight. The only blot upon his record was his massacre of the Mohammedan defenders of Jerusalem; but even that is not inexcusable in view of the usages of the times and the circumstances of the siege.

GODWIN, Francis, Bishop of Llandaff, and church historian; b. 1561, at Hayington, Northamptonshire; d. April, 1633. He was the son of Thomas (d. 1590), Bishop of Bath and Wells, who fell into disgrace for marrying a second time. He studied at Christ Church, Oxford. His work, A Catalogue of the Bishops of England since the first planting of the Christian religion in this island (published 1601), secured for him a bishopric. Rerum Anglic. Henrico VIII., Eduardo VI., et Maria regnantibus, Annales, appeared 1616, and the posthumous work, The Man in the Moon, 1638, in which he advocates the Copernican system.

GODWIN, Thomas, a learned antiquarian; b. in Somersetshire, 1587; educated at Oxford; d. 1643. His work, Moses & Aaron: or the civil & ecclesiastical Rites used by the Ancient Hebrews, etc., Oxford, 1616 (12th ed., 1685), was a celebrated book for a century.

COEPP, Jean Jacques, b. at Heiligenstein, Alsace, April 6, 1771; d. in Paris, June 21, 1855; studied at Strassburg; made a campaign in the republican army; and was appointed pastor of the French Protestant Congregation in Strassburg in 1802, and of the Lutheran Congregation in Paris in 1809. In Paris he developed a great and beneficial activity, gathering and organizing the Lutherans living in the city, establishing schools for their children, asylums and mutual insurance associations for their poor, a mission society, a Bible society, etc. He published a volume of sermons, and various pamphlets at special occasions.

GOERRES, Johann Joseph, b. at Coblenz, Jan. 25, 1776; d. at Munich, Jan. 27, 1848; one of the most conspicuous names in modern German literature, and, if not a man of great influence, at all events a character of much significance. He was an enthusiast. His first enthusiasm was the French Revolution. Hardly out of school, he established a paper (Das rothe Blatt) preaching liberty, equality, republicanism, and radicalism of the deepest dye. The paper was soon interdicted; but he immediately established another (Rübezah! im blauen Gewande), which also was interdicted. In 1799 he went to Paris on a political mission to the Directory; but the sight of Napoleon, who had just returned from Egypt, and overthrown the Directory, fell like a chill on his enthusiasm. He gave up politics, and returned to his studies. His second enthusiasm was the philosophy of Schelling, at that time rising in its morning glory; and, like the master, he wrote on every thing, — art, faith, and reason, physiology, mythology, etc., — and always brilliantly. But it proved easier to make a sensation than to get followers: his attempts to make a university career failed. His third enthusiasm was the liberation of the fatherland. In 1814 he returned to politics, and published the Rhei- nischer Merkur, — a paper whose leading idea is nationality rather than liberty, and which contains the soundest thoughts and most powerful expositions he ever produced. Napoleon called it the "fifth grand power." But it was interdicted in 1816 by a Prussian cabinet-order; and when, in 1820, his Deutschland und die Revolution was followed by another Prussian cabinet-order, this time for his arrest, he fled to Strassburg, despairing of ever seeing the world saved by politics. His fourth and last enthusiasm was the Roman-Catholic Church. He had always been a member of the Romantic school; and he now became the leader of the extreme left wing of that school, — those who were marching straightway to Rome. But he wrote with the same enthusiasm for this ghost of the past as he had formerly written for the ideals of the future. In 1827 he was appointed professor of history in Munich; and there he published, both large scientific works (Geschichte der christlichen Mystik, 1836-42, 4 vols.), and small polemical articles for the occasion, in Historisch-politische Blätter (1838). He was, indeed, the literary champion of Ultramontanism in Germany; but as literature is no fit weapon for Ultramontanism, as Ultramontanism likes best to avoid literature, with its arguments and its publicity, he could not help feeling that he was merely writing on running water.

LIT. — His collected works were published in Munich, 1851-60, 8 vols.; his letters, 1858-74, 3 vols. His life was written by MORITZ BRÜNL (Aix-la-Chapelle, 1854) and JOSEPH GALLAND (Freib., 1876). GOESCHEL, Karl Friedrich, b. at Langensalza, Oct. 7, 1784; d. at Naumburg, Sept. 22, 1861; was educated at Gotha; studied law at Leipzig; held appointments, first in the superior court of Naumburg (1819-31), then in the Department of the Interior in Berlin (1831-45), and was in 1845 made president of the consistory of the province of Saxony, with residence in Magdeburg, from which position he was forced to retire by the revolution (1848). He was a very prolific writer, and published about thirty volumes, besides about three hundred articles in periodicals. His great object was to work out a reconciliation between Christianity and modern culture as represented philosophically by Hegel, and poetically by Goethe, and to that end tend his principal works: Unterhaltungen zur Schilderung göttlicher Dicht- und Denkweise, Leipzig, 1831-38, 3 vols.; Ueber Nichtwissen und absolutes Wissen, 1829 (referring to Hegel as the former to Goethe); and Zerstreute Blätter aus den Hand- und Hülf-acten eines Juristen, 1832-42, 4 vols. (relating to modern jurisprudence). H. E. SCHMIEDER.

GOEZE, Johan Melchior, b. at Halberstadt, Oct. 16, 1717; d. at Hamburg, May 19, 1786; studied at Halle, and was appointed pastor of the Church of the Holy Spirit at Magdeburg, 1750, and of the Church of St. Catharine in Hamburg, 1755. In 1777 he attacked Lessing on account of the publication of the Wolfenbüttel Fragments; and, of the many challengers who rose against him, Lessing selected Goetze for the combat, probably because he considered him the most important and the most dangerous. Goeze opened the controversy with an essay in the Freywilligen Beyträge, Dec. 17, 1777; then followed, in 1778, Etwas Vorläufiges gegen d. Herrn Hofrath Lessing, and Lessings Schwächen, in three parts. Lessing published in all eighteen pieces against Goeze, which are found in the collected editions of his works. See RÖPE: J. M. Goeze, eine Rettung, Hamburg, 1860; and A. BODEN: Lessing und Goeze, Leipzig, 1862. CARL BERTHEAU.

GOG AND MAGOG. In Gen. x. 2 the second son of Japheth is called Magog, i.e., the name of a people living between Armenia and Media, somewhere on the shores of the Araxes. Ezek. xxxviii. and xxxix. is a prophecy against Gog, who is the king of the land of Magog, which evidently was then much farther north, across the Caucasus. Ezekiel's description of the inroad of Gog reminds us of that of the Scythians (B.C. 630), which had the same characteristics (cf. Herod., i. 103 sqq.), and probably the Scythians were in his mind as he wrote the prophecy; but they are not really described. Rather by Gog, King of Magog, is meant the leader of the movement of the great world-power against the kingdom of God,—the attack mentioned by other prophets of Israel (Ezek. xxxviii. 17), especially by Joel (iii. 9 sqq.), Micah (iv. 11 sqq.), Zachariah (xii. 2 sqq., xiv.). But the sentence of condemnation is already spoken, and the world-power is to be overthrown. The interpretation of this prophecy is simple. The overthrow of Magog has nothing to do with the overthrow of the Chaldeans: rather it means, that, after judgment has fallen upon all those peoples brought into contact with the Jews, there will be left a remnant from whom will come the impulse upon the world-power to incite it to oppose the kingdom, and by so doing to seal its own fate. In the Revelation (xx. 7 sqq.) Gog and Magog appear as two peoples, and, as in Ezekiel, are similarly overthrown. The names are also separated in Jewish theology (Targum to Num. xi. 27) and among the Mohammedans (Koran, 18, 93). v. ORELLI.

The legendary interest in Gog and Magog is considerable. Thus in Astrakhan the story is told, that Alexander the Great overthrew these two great peoples, and drove them into the recesses of the Caucasus, where they are now in terror, because of the noise of twelve trumpets blown by the winds. But out of their captivity they are sure to come, and devastate the world. In Guild Hall, London, there are two effigies, fourteen feet high, of Gog and Magog, who, according to the legend, were the sole survivors of the race of giants descended from Diocletian's thirty-three bad daughters which Brute destroyed. These two were brought by him to London, and made porters at the royal palace's gate; and, when they died, their effigies took their place. The present figures were made in 1708; but similar ones can be proven to have existed as early as 1415, and probably much before. Geoffrey of Monmouth tells (Chron., i. 16) of a giant eighteen feet high, called Goëmagot (a corruption of Gog and Magog), who, with his brother Corineus, was the terror of Cornwall. See art. Gog and Magog, in Encyc. Brit., 9th ed., and BREWER'S Reader's Handbook.

GOGERLY, Daniel John, a Wesleyan missionary, b. in London, August, 1792; d. Sept. 6, 1862.

In 1818 he was sent to Ceylon to take charge of the Wesleyan mission press at Colombo; and by devoting his great talents to Pali, the sacred language of the Buddhists, he achieved an acknowledged mastership. He was the author, in large part, of the Cingalese version of the Scriptures, published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in that dialect issued Christiani Pragnyapti (Colombo, 1862), a treatise upon the evidences and doctrines of the Christian religion. Many of his studies appeared in the Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, of the Ceylon branch of which society he was the vice-president.

GOLDEN LEGEND (Legenda Aurea), a collection of legends of saints, without historical value, but very popular. It was compiled by the Dominican Jacobus de Voragine, in the thirteenth century, first edition, with date, but without place, 1474, seventy-one editions before 1500, new edition by Th. Graesse, Dresden, 1846. The book has great value for the student of middle-age superstition. See JACOBUS DE VORAGINE, and LEGEND.

GOLDEN NUMBER, the place of a given year in the lunar cycle, which cycle is equal to nineteen Julian years. The golden numbers were introduced into the calendar about 530, but arranged as if they had been introduced in 325 (the Council of Nicæa). They were usually marked in red or gold. But they are rejected from the Gregorian Calendar, as they fit only the Julian.

GOLDEN ROSE is made of wrought gold, and set with gems, blessed by the Pope on the fourth Sunday of Lent, and sent by him, as a token of his special regard, to some person, church, or community: if not sent, it is preserved in the Vatican. The first mention of the "rose" occurs in the eleventh century. Pope Urban V. decreed one should be sent every year. Among the recipients of this favor have been Joanna of Naples, Henry VIII. of England, Gonsalvo de Cordova, Napoleon III., Isabella II., Stephanie, Crown Princess of Austria (1882).

GOMARUS, Francis, b. at Bruges, Jan. 30, 1563; d. at Groningen, Jan. 11, 1641; studied at Strassburg, Neustadt, Cambridge, Oxford, and Heidelberg, and was in 1587 appointed pastor to the Flemish congregation at Frauefort. In 1594 he was called to Leyden as professor of divinity, but resigned this position in 1611, because Vorstius was made the successor of Arminius. In 1614 he accepted an invitation to Saumur as professor of theology, and in 1618 he removed to Groningen. He was the leader of the severe Calvinistic party, and the declared adversary of Arminianism, which he opposed with virulence and intolerance, and finally caused to be condemned at the synod of Dort, 1618. His collected works, mostly polemical, appeared in one volume fol., in Amsterdam, 1645. See the art. ARMINIANISM.

GOMER (גֹּמֶר Sept. Faqép) is, in Gen. x. 2 and 1 Chron. i. 5, the name of the first-born son of Japheth. In Ezek. xxxviii. 6 it designates, together with Togarmah, a northern tribe, which, in alliance with Magog, fought the last battle against Israel.

The question, What nation or race is meant by this designation? has been differently answered at various times. Josephus (Antiq., I. 6, 1) derives the Galatians from Gomer; and a gloss on Syncellus reads Γαμέρ, ἔξ ὧν Καππάδοκες. In the Targums, on the contrary (Jonath. and Jerush.), on Gen. x. 2, in the Targum on 1 Chron. i. 5, as well as in Breshit R., Gomer is explained by גרמניא ("Germania"), or אפריקא and אפריק ("Africa"). As the ancestor of the Germanic race, the Targums specially designate the third son of Gomer, Togamah; though later Jews also mention the first-born son, Ashkenaz. Africa—for אפריק can hardly be explained by Pityrgia, or some obscure place—they probably stumbled upon, because at one time a Germanic tribe, the Vandals, were settled there. Earlier Christian exegetes, as, for instance, Jerome, Nicholas of Lyra, and others, generally adopted the views of Josephus. Luther, however, arguing from Ezek. xxxviii. 6 and the striking similarity of names, explained Gomer by Cimmericians; and through Arias Montanus, J. A. Osiander (who identifies the Cimmericians with the Cimbrians), Calmet, and others, this view spread widely.

Which of these different interpretations is the true one is perhaps not so very difficult to decide. In spite of their various discrepancies, they all agree in the one point,—that Gomer designates a people native of Europe, living in the far-off north, and thence penetrating towards the south, even into Asia; and, if this the fundamental view is correct, the interpretation which explains Gomer by Cimmericians is the best. Nor is the view of Luther so completely at variance with that of Josephus. The Gauls, or Galatians, who, in the third century B.C., invaded first Thracia and Greece, and then Asia Minor, resembled the Cimmericians so much on account of their European origin, wide-sweeping campaigns, and terrible savagery (Livy, 38, 37; 1 Macc. viii. 2; 2 Macc. viii. 20), that it was quite natural to consider the one a continuation or revival of the other: indeed, the two peoples were often identified with each other (Diod. Sic., 5, 32; Isid. Hispan. Etyim., 9, 2, 26; Zouaras, Ann., 1, 5). That the above-mentioned Targums preferred to explain Gomer by Germania was the result of a simple wish to give a biblical origin and significance to this powerful race as soon as it had fairly entered the historical stage. How curiously historical events often affect ethnographical interpretations may be seen, for instance, from the explanation of Magog in the time of Jerome, as identical with the Goths. FR. W. CONDULF, b. near Rouen, 1023; d. at Rochester, 1108; became a monk in the monastery of Bec, 1059; accompanied Lanfranc to Caen, 1063, and to Canterbury, 1070, and became Bishop of Rochester 1077. He played an important part in the controversy between Lanfranc and William Rufus and Henry I.; but of his letters only two have been preserved. See his life in WHARTON: Anglia Sacra.

GONESIUS, Petrus, b. at Goniadz, 1525; began his public career in Krakau as a zealous adherent of the Roman Church, and was by the bishop and clergy of Samogitia sent to foreign countries for his further education, but returned from his visits to Wittenberg and Geneva, and from his study of the works of Servetus and the Moravian Anabaptist, not only a Protestant, but a champion of Antitrinitarian and Anabaptist views. He was condemned by the synods of Secemin (1556) and Brzesk (1558), but continued to labor for his ideas. Nevertheless, when a split actually took place in the Reformed Church of Poland (1565), between a Trinitarian and Unitarian party, Gonesius was not able to come to a thorough understanding with the latter. Of the later part of his life nothing is known. See SANDIUS: Biblioth. Antitrin., pp. 40 sqq.; LUBIENIECIUS: Hist. Ref. Pol., pp. 111 and 114; BOCK: Hist. Antitrin., vol. i. TRECHSEL.

GOOD FRIDAY, the anniversary of our Lord's passion and death. In the early Church it was also known as the "Festival of the Crucifixion" (πάσχα σταυρώσεως), the "Day of Salvation," etc. Its observance must date back to the earliest period of the Church. The early Church kept it as a rigorous fast and period of mourning; for, although the crucifixion was the last atoning act of Christ's life, yet it brought anguish to the Saviour, and removed him, for a time, from the disappointed disciples. The public services were conducted with deep solemnity and with the outward signs of sorrow. Constantine the Great (Enseb., Vita, I. 4) forbade the holding of judicial trials, markets, etc., on the day. In Spain they went so far as to close the churches, a procedure which the Council of Toledo (633) condemned. At the present day the Greek and Latin churches celebrate Good Friday with as strict severity as they do Easter with glad jubilation. The bells on the church-towers are silent, the light on the altars is extinguished, the altar furniture covered with black, and the usual communion omitted, the priest alone communicating. See EASTER.

GOODELL, William, D.D., eminent missionary of the American Board; b. at Templeton, Mass., Feb. 14, 1792; d. in Philadelphia, Monday, Feb. 18, 1867. He was graduated at Dartmouth College, 1817, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1820. Already in 1818 he had determined to become a foreign missionary; so after graduation, he studied medicine for a while, and then spent a year in visiting the churches as agent of the American Board. He sailed for Beyrout, Dec. 9, 1822, where he arrived Nov. 16, 1823, having stopped for several months at Malta. He expected to proceed thence to Jerusalem; but the disturbed state of the country, in consequence of the Greek Revolution, prevented him. Finally (1825) all the missionaries in Beyrout were compelled to leave Syria, owing to the withdrawal of all consular protection, and went to Malta. In 1831 he received instructions from the Board to begin a new mission to the Armenians at Constantinople, and there arrived June 9; and until 1865 he labored with fidelity, enthusiasm, and success. He was rarely gifted, full of genial humor, sanguine, simple, courageous, modest, above all, holy. He won hearts, and moulded lives. One of his most important labors was the translation of the Bible into Armeno-Turkish, which was begun in Syria; the New Testament finished Jan. 8, 1830, and the Old Testament, Nov. 6, 1841. See E. D. G. PRIME: Forty Years in the Turkish Em- pire, or, Memoirs of Rev. William Goodell, D.D., New York, 1876, 6th ed., 1883.

GOODWIN, Charles Wycliffe, linguist; b. at King's Lynn, in Norfolk, Eng., in 1817; educated at Cambridge; d. at Shanghai, Jan. 17, 1878. Although his life was that of a lawyer, yet his tastes lay in the direction of philology. He edited the Anglo-Saxon Life of St. Guthlac, Anglo-Saxon Legends of St. Andrew and St. Veronica. He wrote, for the Cambridge Essays of 1858, an exhaustive essay upon Hieratic Papyri, and, for Essays and Reviews, upon Mosaic Cosmogony. He contributed to Lipsius' Zeitschrift für ägyptische Sprüche, and prepared translations of the Egyptian monuments for Records of the Past. In the judgment of competent critics he occupied a first place among Egyptian decipherers.

GOODWIN, John, an able Arminian divine and controversialist; b. in Norfolk, 1593; d. 1665. He was a fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge; vicar of St. Stephen's, London, 1633; lost his vicarage (1545) by his literary efforts against the Presbyterians, and was restored by Cromwell, to whom he rendered services by his tracts, Right & Might well met (1648), a justification of the proceedings of the army against the Parliament in 1648, and The Obstructors of Justice (1649), vindicating the sentence of the High Court of Justice upon Charles I. At the Restoration, the latter tract, with several of Milton's, was publicly burned, and Goodwin himself declared incapable of holding any office, ecclesiastical or civil. Dr. Goodwin was an Arminian in theology, and has been called the Wiclif of Methodism. Mr. Wesley held his writings in high esteem, and published in an abridged form his Imputatio Fidei, or a treatise of Justification (Lond., 1642); and Watson, in his Theol. Institutes, quotes him extensively in chap. xiii., on Justification. His Redemption Redeemed, containing a thorough discussion of the great questions concerning election, reprobation, & the perseverance of the saints (Lond., 1651), is a monument of literary ability and diligence, and called forth replies from Dr. Kendall (1653), Robert Baillie (1656), and others, but especially Dr. Owen, in The Doctrine of the Saints' Perseverance (Oxf., 1651). Dr. Owen acknowledges his learning and controversial skill. In 1658 Goodwin replied to his critics in the Trimmiri, etc. (pp. 500). See Christian Theology selected from Goodwin, by S. DENN, Lond., 1836; Preface to Owen's Perseverance, etc.; and Life of Dr. Goodwin, by T. JACKSON, Lond., 1839.

GOODWIN, Thomas D.D., a "Patriarch and Atlas of Independency;" b. at Rollesby, Norfolk, Eng., Oct. 5, 1600; d. in London, Feb. 23, 1679. He was educated at the University of Cambridge, and was successively fellow and preacher and vicar of Christ Church; but, unable to stand Laud's interference, he resigned his preferments in 1631, left the university, and went to London, where he married. He lived in Holland as pastor of a small English congregation at Arnheim, 1639-41; but, when Laud was effectually silenced, he returned to London, and was one of the eminent Independent ministers there. From January, 1650, to the Restoration, he was president of Magdalen College, Oxford; afterwards he lived in London, preaching stately, and writing voluminously. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly (1643-49), and one of the "Dissenting Brethren." Calamy thus estimates him: "He was a considerable scholar, and an eminent divine, and had a very happy faculty in descanting upon Scripture so as to bring forth surprising remarks, which yet generally tended to illustration." He is supposed to be the Puritan president described by Addison in No. 494 of the Spectator. His learning was very great, his spiritual experience profound, his theology rigidly Calvinistic. During his lifetime only sermons of his were published; but his Works appeared in London, 1681-1704, 5 vols. fol., and were reprinted at Edinburgh, 1861-66, 12 vols. 8vo, with Memoir by Robert Hall, D.D.

GORHAM CASE, a case involving the tenets of the Church of England on the question of baptismal regeneration. In 1847 the Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Henry Phillpotts, an energetic and bold High-Churchman, refused to institute Mr. Gorham as vicar of Bramford-Speke, to which he had been appointed by the lord-chancellor. The ground was, that Mr. Gorham denied spiritual regeneration to be conferred by the sacrament of baptism, or that infants were made thereby members of Christ. The case was taken into the courts, and decided against Mr. Gorham by the Court of Arches (1849), on the ground that baptismal regeneration was the doctrine of the Church of England. The case being appealed to the privy council, this decision was reversed; it being held that a difference of opinion had prevailed amongst the English Reformers, and ever since among prelates. Mr. Gorham was consequently admitted to the vicarage. See Gorham versus the Bishop of Exeter. The Arguments, with the Judgments verbatim, before the Committee of Privy Council, the Court of Queen's Bench, etc. To which is added the Bishop of Exeter's Protest, and Mr. Gorham's Formal Institution. 5th ed., Lond., 1850.

GORIUN, an Armenian scholar from the fifth century; was a pupil of Mesrop, and by him sent to Constantinople to study Greek, and gather Greek manuscripts; partook with Esnik in the translation of the Bible and some works of the Greek fathers; was made bishop of a Georgian diocese, and wrote a life of Mesrop, which has been published by the Mekhitarists, Venice, 1833. See WELTE: Goriun's Lebensbeschr. d. h. Mesrop, Tübingen, 1844.

GORTON, Samuel, b. at Groton, Eng., about 1600; d. in Warwick, R.I., November or December, 1677. Before coming to America, he was in the employ of a linen-draper in London; but, desiring more religious liberty, he emigrated to Boston, 1636; removed to Plymouth because of religious troubles; was banished the Colony for heresy (winter of 1637, 1638); went to Aquidneck, R.I., with a few followers; was publicly whipped for calling the magistrates "just asses;" fled (1641) to Providence, but again got into difficulties, and went (September, 1642) to Shawomet, on the west side of Narragansett Bay, where he purchased land from the Indians. In 1643 Gorton and ten of his sect were tried in Boston for "damnable heresy," found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor in chains. In March, 1644, they were released, but ordered to leave the Colony in fourteen days. Gorton went to England, and returned (1648) with an order from the Earl of Warwick to the Massachusetts magistrates, that the Shawomet Colony should be free from interference; and so the last years of Gorton's life were peaceful. He named the Colony Warwick, out of gratitude to the earl. His sect, which quickly died out, was called the "Gortonians." Their belief has been thus given: "They contemned a clergy and all outward forms, held that by union with Christ believers partook of the perfection of God, that Christ is both human and divine, and that heaven and hell have no existence save in the mind." See Gorton's Simplicities Defence against seven-headed Policy (1640), reprinted in Rhode Island Historical Collections (1836), and in FORCE's Tracts (1846), vol. iv. no. 6; and Answer concerning Part of "New Englands Memorials," reprinted in FORCE's Tracts (1846), vol. iv. no. 7; also J. GOSPEL and GOSPELS. I. MEANING OF THE WORD. — Gospel (Anglo-Saxon, "god-spell," "good spell," from spellian, "to tell") is the English equivalent for the Greek εὐαγγέλιον (from εὖ, "well," and ἀγγέλλω, "to bear message," εὐαγγέλιον, "to announce good news"), and the Latin evangelium, which has passed into French, German, Italian, and other modern languages. The Greek means (1) Reward for good news, given to the messenger, or to God, a thank-offering or sacrifice (so in Homer, Xenophon, Plutarch, etc., but always in the plural, εὐαγγέλια); (2) Good news, or glad tidings of any kind; (3) In the Christian sense, as used in the New Testament, good tidings of salvation by Jesus Christ; (4) In the ecclesiastical sense, the historical record of this salvation, or of the life, death, and resurrection of Christ, or the gospel history, which we have in a fourfold form.

II. KINDS OF GOSPELS. — (1) Four Canonical Gospels, written by apostles and apostolic men, and recognized by the Christian Church as authentic and reliable. (2) A large number of Apocryphal Gospels, of later and obscure origin, and rejected as mere fictions. They serve, however, the good purpose of confirming the truth of the Canonical Gospels, and show, by their infinite inferiority and silliness, the utter incapacity of the human imagination to produce such a character as Jesus of Nazareth. They are counterfeits and caricatures of the inimitable original. See APOCRYPHA OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. We confine ourselves here to the Canonical Gospels.

III. GENERAL CHARACTER OF THE GOSPELS. — They are beyond all question the most important and the most popular books ever written. They contain the only authentic record of the history of all histories, which interests the whole world, and can never grow old. The very opposition to them, and the immense and ever-growing literature clustering around them, show their power and charm. And yet they were written by humble and unlearned fishermen of Galilee; but they were in the school of Christ, and filled with his Spirit. This, and this alone, explains the mystery. Without the miracle of Christ's person, the Gospels would be the most incredible of all miracles. They are properly only one and the same Gospel in its fourfold aspect and relation to the human race ("the fourfold Gospel," τετραμόρφον εὐαγγέλιον, according to Irenæus): hence they are styled in ancient manuscripts the Gospel according to (not of) Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. The first and fourth are by apostles; and the second and third, by pupils of the apostles, and thus indirectly apostolical. Mark is closely connected with Peter (as his "interpreter"), Luke with Paul (as his companion in missionary travel and work). The first three were written between A.D. 60 and 70, certainly before the destruction of Jerusalem, to which they point as a future event, though near at hand. "This generation [then living] shall not pass away till all be fulfilled." Had they been written after the terrible catastrophe of 70, they would have referred to it in some way. The attempt of the Tubingen school to assign them to a later date, even the second century, has utterly failed; and some of the most advanced critics of that school (as Hilgenfeld and Keim) have returned to the traditional view, at least as far as Matthew is concerned; while Mark has been vindicated by other unbiassed critics (Weisse, Wilke, Ewald, Meyer, Weiss) as the primitive Gospel, which faithfully records the oral preaching of Peter. The fourth Gospel was probably written towards the close of the first century, at Ephesus. Before the middle of the second century, all four were generally received and used in the churches as one collection. This is confirmed by the independent testimonies of the Ante-Nicene Fathers (Justin Martyr, Tatian, Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, etc.), by the Gnostics, and other heretics. They are not complete biographies of Jesus, but selections of characteristic features, as they seemed most important to each evangelist for his purpose. Justin Martyr (140) properly called them memoirs, or memorabilia (ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων). The common aim of the Gospels is to lead the reader to the faith that Jesus of Nazareth is the promised Messiah of the Jews, and the Saviour of all men (John xx. 30, 31).

IV. CHARACTERISTIC DIFFERENCES. — Each Gospel has a marked individuality, corresponding to the author's education, talent, taste, and mission. Matthew wrote in Palestine, and for Jews, to show them that Jesus is the fulfiller of prophecy, and the true King and Lawgiver of Israel; Mark, in Rome, for Roman readers, to exhibit Jesus as the mighty wonder-worker and Son of God; Luke, for Greeks and Gentiles, to set him forth as the merciful Saviour of all men; John, for Jewish and Gentile Christians combined, and for all future ages. Matthew (formerly a tax-gatherer, and accustomed to keeping accounts) follows the topical and rubrical order; Luke (an educated Hellenist and a physician), the chronological order; John (the trusted bosom-friend of Christ) combines both with an internal development of the growing antagonism between Christ and carnal Judaism; Mark gives (as from the first impressions of his master, the impulsive Peter) fresh, rapid, graphic sketches. The first three evangelists agree much in matter and language, and are consequently called "Synoptists;" their Gospels, the "Synoptic Gospels." John stands alone, as the ideal and spiritual evangelist, who introduces us into the holy of holies: his Gospel is the purest, deepest, and sublimest of all literary compositions, the Gospel of Gospels, "the one, true, tender, main Gospel," "the heart of Christ." Yet the first three are just as necessary, and give the historical basis, the divine humanity of Christ; while John, going back to the eternal Logos, presents to us the incarnate divinity of Christ. The poetry and pictorial art of the Church (since the time of Irenæus and Jerome) has represented the four Gospels under the four rivers of Paradise, and the four cherubic figures of Ezekiel (i. 15, x. 1, xi. 22), and the four living creatures (Zōa) of the Apocalypse (iv. 4-9, etc.), which reflect the Divine majesty and strength in the animal creation. To Matthew is assigned the figure of a man; to Mark, the lion; to Luke, the sacrificial ox; to John, the soaring eagle. Adam of St. Victor, the greatest Latin poet of the middle ages, has devoted two of his finest poems to this subject. His description of John is very musical and striking:—

"Volat avis sine meta
Quo nec vates, nec propheta
Evolavit altius.
Tam implenda quam impleta,
Numquam vidit tot secreta
Purus homo purius."

V. CREDIBILITY OF THE GOSPELS.—They make upon every unsophisticated reader the impression of absolute honesty and trustworthiness. They cannot possibly be the mythical or legendary production of a pious fancy (as Strauss and Renan would fain make us believe), or of a calculating adaptation to certain religious tendencies (Baur and the Tübingen school). It would take more than a Jesus to invent a Jesus. The evangelists tell with the utmost frankness and simplicity the story of Christ, without note or comment, without mentioning their name, without concealment of the errors and failings of the disciples (themselves included), even the denial of their leader, and the treason of Judas. The discrepancies in details only heighten the credibility, and exclude the suspicion of collusion and conspiracy. They show the independence of their witness to the essential facts. The genuineness and truthfulness of these books rest on stronger evidence than that of any other historical records, ancient or modern. This has been acknowledged by eminent writers who are free from all doctrinal or sectarian bias. Goethe says, "I regard the Gospels as thoroughly genuine; for we see in them the reflection of a majesty which proceeded from the person of Christ,—a majesty which is as divine as any thing that ever appeared on earth." Rousseau remarks that "the gospel history can be no fiction, else the inventor would be greater than the hero" (l'inventeur en seroit plus grand que le héros). And yet the Jesus of the Gospels is admitted by all competent judges to be the purest character conceivable. If there is no truth and reality in him, it is nowhere to be found. Take away the historical Christ, the life and light of the world, and history is as dark as midnight; but with him it is a revelation of the infinite wisdom and love of God in the salvation of mankind.—For particulars, see arts. HARMONY, SYNOPTISTS, MATTHEW, MARK, LUKE, and JOHN.

VI. LIT.—This has immensely increased in the last thirty years, in connection with the numerous Lives of Jesus, e.g., by Strauss, Keim, Weiss, Edersheim; see list under art. JESUS CHRIST. We mention here:—

(1) The critical introductions to the New Testament, by De Wette, Bleek, Davidson (2d ed., 1882), Reuss (5th ed., 1874), Hilgenfeld (1875).

(2) The general commentaries on the Gospels, by Olshausen, De Wette, Meyer, Lange, Nast, Keil, Alford, Wordsworth, also the Speaker's (with an able introduction to the Gospels, by Archbishop Thomson, 1878), and those by Elliott, Schaff (International Revision Commentary, 1882).

(3) Special commentaries on Matthew and Mark, by Morison and Alexander; on Luke, by Godet; on John, by Lücke, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, Luthardt, Westcott (in Speaker's), Milligan and Moulton, Godet (3d ed., 1881-85, 3 vols.), Weiss (6th ed. of Meyer, 1880).

(4) Critical discussions on the origin, genuineness, and inter-relationship of the Gospels began with Eichhorn, Marsh, and Schleiermacher, and were carried on chiefly by Gieseler, Baur, Hilgenfeld, Holtzmann, Ewald, Renan (Les Évangiles, 1877), Bleek, Wieseler, Ebrard, Weiss, Weizsäcker, the anonymous author of Supernatural Religion, reviewed and refuted by Lightfoot (in the Contemporary Review, 1875 sqq.).

(5) Special works on the Gospels. The most useful and accessible are THOLUCK: The Credibility of the Gospel History (against Strauss), Hamburg, 1838; DA COSTA: The Four Witnesses (also against Strauss), translated from the Dutch, London, 1851; TISCHENDORF: When were our Gospels written? 4th ed., Leipzig, 1866, translated into several languages; NORTON: The Evidences for the Genuineness of the Gospels, Boston, 1846-48, 3 vols., abridged ed., Boston, 1875; ROW: The Historical Character of the Gospels, London, 1865-67, The Jesus of the Evangelists, London, 1868; WESTCOTT: Introduction to the Gospels, London, 1860, 6th ed., 1881; SANDAY: The Gospels in the Second Century, London, 1876; D. S. GREGORY: Why Four Gospels? New York, 1877; HUDEROPER: Indirect Testimony of History to the Genuineness of the Gospels, New York, 2d ed., 1879; JOHN KENNEDY: The Four Gospels, their Origin and Authorship, London and Philadelphia, 1880 (American Sunday-School Union); FISHER: The Beginnings of Christianity, New York, 1877; EZRA ABBOT: The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, Boston, 1880. Of older works, LARDNER'S Credibility of the Gospel History (London, 1727-57) is still very valuable. The best synoptically arranged text is RUSHBROOKE'S Synopticon (Camb., 1880, 1881, 2 parts), where the differences in the narratives are marked by difference of type and color, which greatly facilitates the comparative study of the Gospels. PHILIP SCHAFF.

GOSPELLER, the word was formally used in four senses: (1) Of the followers of Wiclif, because they circulated the Scriptures; (2) Of evangelists; (3) Of the reader of the gospel at the altar during the communion service; (4) Of those in the sixteenth century, in the Church of England, who were given to Bible reading and preaching. These last, it would seem from the remarks of Latimer and Cranmer, were not always so pious as they pretended to be.

GOSSNER, Johannes Evangelista, b. at Hau-

sen, near Augsburg, Dec. 14, 1773; d. in Berlin, March 20, 1858; studied at Dillingen, where he, like Martin Boos and others, received the first strong impulse towards evangelical Christianity. Having been ordained priest in 1797, he was pastor of Dirlewang from 1801 to 1811, but changed this charge for a small benefice in Munich in order to gain leisure for literary pursuits. In 1817 he was dismissed, however, as his evangelical tendencies became more and more apparent, and in 1826 he actually left the Roman Church, and embraced Protestantism. From 1829 to 1846 he was minister at the Bethlehem Church in Berlin, and developed a great and beneficial activity, founding schools and asylums, and sending out missionaries to heathen lands. His institutions are continued. His preaching was very plain, popular, effective, and thoroughly evangelical. [The great church-historian, Neander, loved to hear him above all other preachers of Berlin.] His principal works, Schatzkästlein, Goldkörner, the Life of Boos, etc., were written just before his conversion was made public. His life was written by BETHMANN-HOLLWEG, Berlin, 1858, PROCHNOW, Berlin, 1864, and H. DALTON, Berlin, 2d ed., 1878. W. HOLLENBERG.

GOTHS, The, lived in the regions along the northern shore of the Black Sea, from the Danube to the Don, when, in the middle of the third century, it came to a sharp conflict between them and the Romans. They defeated and killed the Emperor Decius in 251. Ten years later on, they secured a fleet, conquered Trebizond, destroyed the Temple of Diana in Ephesus, and plundered Athens in 262. Again ten years passed, and, in spite of the severe reverses they had suffered in the mean time, they compelled (in 272) the Emperor Aurelian to cede to them the province of Dacia, situated between Mœsia and Sarmatia, and bounded by the Danube, the Theiss, the Carpathian Mountains, and the Black Sea. There they quietly remained for about a century, during which period a separation arose among the Ostrogoths, or East Goths, living to the east of the Pruth, and the Visigoths, or West Goths, living to the west of the Pruth. During this period they also became acquainted with Christianity.

They brought back from their campaigns in Mœsia, Thracia, and Asia Minor, Christian captives, and by those captives the first seeds of Christianity were sown among them. In a letter communicating the martyrdom of Sabas (Act. Sanct., April 12), the Christians among the Goths addressed the Cappadocian congregations as their mother-church; and what progress Christianity had made through this channel may be inferred from the fact that there was a Gothic bishop (Theophilus Gothicæ metropolis) present at the Council of Nicaea, 325. The complete conversion, however, of the Goths, was the work of Ulfilas (318-388); which article see. He labored among the Visigoths, but his influence reached also the Ostrogoths. But the Christianity which he established among the Goths was Arianism; and when, in the latter part of the fourth century, a great portion of the Visigoths, pushed beyond the Danube by the advancing Huns, came to settle within the boundaries of the Eastern Empire, conflicts arose with the Orthodox Church. The Emperor Theodosius (379-395) seems to have treated the matter with great delicacy. But his exertions to bring the Goths over to the Orthodox Church failed, and so did those of Chrysostom.

Immediately after the death of Theodosius the Visigoths arose, and began to wander. Under the leadership of Alaric they invaded Greece in 395, and took and sacked Athens. In 402 they broke into Italy, and in 410 they took and sacked Rome. But it was Paganism, and not Christianity, which suffered under this calamity. The Pagan inhabitants were scattered to the winds; while the Christians remained, and even enriched themselves by appropriating the Pagan temples, and transforming them into Christian churches. Alaric's son, Athaulf, married Placidia, sister to the Emperor Honorius, left Italy, and founded in Southern Gaul a Gothic empire, with Toulouse as his residence. Of the rulers of this empire Theodoric I. fought by the side of the Roman governor of Gaul, Aëtius, on the Catalaunian field (451), against Attila; and Theodoric II. invaded and conquered Spain (456). In the beginning the Arian Goths lived peaceably among the orthodox Romans and Romanized Celts in Gaul; but when their king, Euric (466-483), instituted persecutions, partly from religious and partly from political reasons, the orthodox made an alliance with the Frankish king, Clovis, who defeated the Goths at Vouglé, near Poitiers (507), and drove them beyond the Pyrenees. In Spain the Gothic Empire flourished until overthrown by the Saracens after the battle of Xeres de la Frontera (711). But in Spain the Goths were converted. At the Council of Toledo (581), the Arians under the king, Leovigild, and the Catholics under their metropolitan, Leander, met together, and a grand disputation was held, the result of which was, that, at the next Council of Toledo (589), King Reccared and most of his Gothic subjects abjured Arianism.

Meanwhile the Ostrogoths had first followed Attila, and fought with him against Aëtius and Theodoric; then, after Attila's death, they separated from the Huns, and settled in Pannonia; and finally, under their great king, Theodoric (475-526), they conquered Illyria and Thessalia from the Eastern Empire, defeated Odoacer several times in Northern Italy, captured Rome, and formed a great empire, bounded north-west and north by the Rhone and the Danube, and with Ravenna for its capital. The Ostrogoths were also Arians; but Theodoric's relations with the Catholic Church in Italy were most friendly. He protected and enriched it, which, perhaps, was due to the influence of his councillor, Cassiodorus. Only when the East-Roman emperor, Justin, issued edicts against the Arians among his subjects, and even raised persecutions against them, Theodoric was provoked, not to retaliation, but to a kind of self-defence. He sent the Bishop of Rome, John, to Constantinople, and, as this had no result, he felt suspicious of conspiracy; and the Pope was imprisoned, and the senators Symmachus, Albinus, and Boëthius were beheaded. But Theodoric died the very next year, and with his death began immediately the dissolution of the Ostrogothic Empire. During the next twenty-six years, or until the defeat of Tejas by Narses (552), the religious questions were completely at rest; and, with the death of Tejas, not only the Ostrogothic Empire, but the Ostrogoths themselves, disappeared from history.

GOTTSCHALK, a monk, and the originator of the predestination controversy in the ninth century; was, while yet a child, brought to the monastery of Fulda, but protested afterwards, when he grew up, that it had been done against his will. The synod of Mayence (829) declared in favor of releasing him from his vow; but his abbot, Rabanus, refused to do so, and Gottschalk was sent to the monastery of Orbais, in the diocese of Soissons, where he remained a monk. He studied with passionate energy, especially Augustine and Fulgentius; and the view he adopted or developed he took no pains to conceal. Already in 840 Bishop Noting of Verona told Rabanus, whom he met in the emperor's camp on the Lahn, of the confusion Gottschalk had caused on a visit to Italy by his views of predestination, according to which God was the author of evil, and forced the lost to sin. Afterwards, when Gottschalk visited Italy a second time, Rabanus, now Archbishop of Mayence, wrote to the Count of Friuli, and warned him against the heresies of the subtle monk. Gottschalk wandered, preaching, through Dalmatia and Pannonia, to Bavaria, and arrived at Mayence in the fall, while the general diet was sitting. Before a synod of German bishops, convened by Rabanus, he laid his confession of the double predestination, and accused Rabanus of Semi-Pelagianism. But his doctrines were condemned as heretical; and he was sent to Hincmar, Archbishop of Rheims and his metropolitan superior, to be imprisoned and punished. In the spring of 849 Hincmar convened a synod of French bishops at Quiercy; and not only were the doctrines of Gottschalk condemned, but his papers were burnt, and he himself was cruelly whipped, and then shut up half dead in the dungeon of the monastery of Hautvilliers. He remained, however, firm to the last. On his death-bed (868) the sacrament was offered him on the condition that he should recant; but he refused.

GOTTSCHALK, ruler of the Wends, and martyr; was educated in the monastery of St. Michael at Lunenburg, but left the monks, and abandoned Christianity altogether, as soon as he heard that his father Uto, ruler of the Wends, had been killed by a Saxon. For the sake of revenge he stirred up his countrymen to a frightful war against the Saxons; and, as Christianity was one of the most conspicuous institutions planted among the Wends by the Saxons, the war began with massacring the Christians, and destroying their churches.

But Gottschalk was finally defeated by Duke Bernard of Saxony, and taken prisoner, and in his captivity he returned to Christianity. After a stay of ten years at the court of Canute the Great, King of Denmark and England, he went back to Wendland, and by the aid of Canute he united (1047) Holstein, Mecklenburg, Pomerania, and the Brandenburg marches into one powerful Wendish empire. He became himself one of the most zealous missionaries Christianity ever had had in those regions. He translated the liturgical formulas into the Wendish tongue; he built schools, churches, and monasteries; and he preached himself to his subjects. But there was among the Wends an actual hatred to Christianity. It broke out once more; and June 7, 1066, Gottschalk was murdered by his Pagan countrymen.

GOUDIMEL, Claude, b. in Franche-Comté, 1510; killed in the Huguenot massacre at Lyons, 1572; lived in Rome as a music-teacher in 1540, when Palestrina studied there; kept a note-printing establishment in Paris, 1555; entered the Reformed Church in 1562, and composed the tunes to Clement Marot's and Beza's translations of the Psalms. It is often said that he was the composer of the Huguenot hymns, such as they are still sung this very day; but that is a mistake. They were composed by Louis Bourgeois and Maître Pierre, and Goudimel only added the accompaniment. See O. DOUËX: Clement Marot et le psautier huguenot.

GOUGE, Thomas, son of William; b. at Bow, Middlesex, Sept. 1, 1605; d. at London, Oct. 29, 1681. He was a fellow of King's College, Cambridge; obtained the living of St. Sepulchre's, London; was ejected at the Restoration for non-conformity (1662), after which time he devoted himself to charitable enterprises. He was particularly interested in evangelization and education in Wales, and travelled annually thither to preach, and visit the schools. Aided by friends, he had printed many Welsh Bibles and religious books for distribution gratuitously, or at a small price. He spent his fortune in good works. A collected edition of his Works, with a short account of his life, was published, London, 1706. His Surest and Safest Way of Thriving was reprinted, London, 1856, with biographical introduction by Thomas Binney.

GOUGE, William, D.D., b. in Stratford Bow, in Middlesex County, Eng., Nov. 1, 1575; educated in Paul's School, London, by his uncle Ezekiel Culverwell, a distinguished Puritan, and at Eton School prepared for King's College, Cambridge, which he entered in 1595, where he became fellow in three years, and subsequently lecturer of logic and philosophy. During his nine years at Cambridge he was never absent from morning prayers in the chapel, and was so strict and careful in all his life and studies as to earn the title "an Arch-Puritan." Reluctantly he was withdrawn from his studies to enter upon the active work of the ministry. He was ordained in June, 1608, in the parish of Blackfriars, where he remained until his death (Dec. 12, 1653), one of the most distinguished preachers and pastors of the metropolis, accounted "the father of the London divines, and the oracle of his time." In his early ministry he was brought into trouble with King James and the government by his publication of Henry Finch on The Calling of the Jews (1621), and was thrown into prison. After nine weeks he was released, having given a statement of his own opinions, which were entirely orthodox. He took his degree of doctor of divinity in 1628. Several volumes of his sermons were issued, The Whole Armour of God (1616, 4to, pp. 523), Domestic Duties (1622, 3d ed., 1631, 4to, pp. 704), Guide to goe to God (1626, 4to, pp. 310), God's Three Arrows (1631, pp. 176), The Saint's Sacrifice (1632, pp. 290), and others. He was also distinguished for his method of catechising, which was first published without his knowledge, but afterwards revised and edited by himself in many editions; the eighth (1637, 4to) containing a larger and lesser catechism, with prayers. In 1643 he was made a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and took an active part in their proceedings, in 1647, taking the place of Herbert Palmer, lately deceased, as one of the assessors. He was on the committee for the ordination of ministers, and was chosen with others to write the Assembly's Annotations on the Bible, his part being from 1 Kings to Job. He assisted in the preparation of the Westminster Confession of Faith and in the conflict with the separatists of the day. He was chosen prolocutor of the first Provincial Assembly of London, May 3, 1647, and was a recognized leader of the London ministers, uniting with them in protesting against the murder of Charles I. and the usurpations of Cromwell. His last work was his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, which he barely lived to finish, and which was published after his death, by his son, in 1655 (2 vols. folio), — a very able and useful work of exposition, and of permanent value to the Church. For further information, see his Life by his son, in the Introduction to the folio edition of the Commentary on Hebrews; also in CLARK'S Lives of 32 English Divines, 3d ed., 1677; REID'S Mem. of Westminster Divines, 1811; BROOK'S Lives of Puritans, vol. GOULART, Simon, b. at Senlis, 1543; d. at Geneva, 1628; was pastor, and, after the death of Beza, president of the clergy of Geneva. He was a learned man and a prolific writer, though most of his works (of which a list is given in SÉNEBIER, Histoire littéraire de Genève, II. 72) are collections; as, for instance, Mémoires de la Ligne, Geneva, 1590–99, 6 vols., re-edited and augmented by Goujet, Amsterdam, 1758; Recueil des choses mémorables sous Henri II., 1598, etc.

GO'ZAN (Heb. גִּזְאֵן; Assy. Gu-za-na; LXX. Γωζαν) is mentioned in the following passages of the Old Testament: 2 Kings xvii. 6, xviii. 11, xix. 12 (= Isa. xxxvii. 12); 1 Chron. v. 26. From these we learn that it was a place which Assyrian kings had subjugated, and that by the "river of Gozan" (= the Habor; Assy. Habor) the conqueror of Samaria (Sargon), and Tiglath Pileser, or Pul, before him, had made settlements of Israelitish captives. The cuneiform inscriptions locate Gozan between the Tigris and the Euphrates. Its proximity to the Habor, a large eastern tributary of the Euphrates, and its mention (2 Kings xix. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12) in connection with the Mesopotamian names Haran, Rezepth, and Bné Eden, are additional proofs of this location. Gozan was originally the name of a city, and always appears with the prefix "city" in the inscriptions; later the name seems to have been applied to a district. It is in all likelihood the Γωζαν of Ptolemy (Geogr., V. 17 (18), ed. Wilberg.), lying in Northern Mesopotamia.

GRAAL, The Holy (also called "St. Grail," "Sangreal," etc., and incorrectly spelled "Grail"), is the name of the bowl out of which our Lord, on the night of his betrayal, ate the Paschal lamb. It was removed from the upper room by Joseph of Arimathea, and used by him to catch the blood from Christ's wounds as the body was taken down from the cross. Joseph carried it with him to Britain, whither he was sent by Philip the Evangelist. The Holy Graal figures largely in the Arthurian legends, and is the subject of one of Tennyson's idyls. It had miraculous qualities. By it Joseph was kept alive, without food, for forty-two years while imprisoned by the Jews; and by it he was spiritually enlightened. One of Joseph's descendants, to whom the keeping of the Holy Graal had come, proved unworthy, and the cup was lost. Arthur's knights endeavored to recover it; but all save Sir Galahad failed, because it could not be found by any one who was not a virgin in body. Several churches in France and Italy claimed to have it; and there is now in Genoa a cup brought by the Crusaders of 1101, which was at one time considered the Holy Graal. The explanation of all this is, that by the Holy Graal is meant the holy wafer which has been transmuted into the veritable body of Christ. The legend is, therefore, a legend of the Eucharist. The "quest of the Holy Graal" is the attempt to see the Saviour as he is revealed in the Eucharist.

"The word 'grail' is a corruption of gradale, or graduale, the Latin name for a liturgical collection of psalms, and texts of Scripture, so called because they are sung as the priest is passing from the epistle to the gospel side of the altar. The author of the Graal conception meant by grail, or gradale, not the sacred dish (escuelle), but the mysterious book revealed to the supposed hermit of 717, in which he finds the history of the escuelle." The author of the legend was probably Walter Map, a canon of Salisbury, in the twelfth century. From England it spread all over Europe. Besides the derivation already given, there are others, as from the Old French grasal ("the sacramental cup"), a corruption of sanguis realis, corrupted to sangrasal, sangreal. England in 1697, and was made chaplain of Christ Church, Oxford, 1700. He is famous for his editions of the Septuagint (Oxford, 1707-20, 4 vols.), *Spicilegium SS. GRACE. The grace of God is the underlying principle and essential characteristic of the Christian religion. The doctrine has a place, and sheds a peculiar lustre, in all the five divisions of systematic theology. It is to a certain extent the crown of the divine attributes, appears in anthropology as the decree of salvation, is the fundamental idea of Christ's life and work, underlies the agency of the Spirit, and accomplishes its perfect work in the consummation of redemption in the life to come.

God shows himself gracious by hearing prayer (Exod. xxii. 27), foregoing wrath (xxxii. 12), and making his face to shine upon the good (Num. vi. 25). The Scriptures represent grace as the twin, now of truth (Ps. cxviii. 3; John i. 14), now of justice (Hos. ii. 19). John (i. 16), Paul (Rom. iii. 24), and Peter (1 Pet. i. 13) agree in defining the fundamental principle of Christianity by the one word "grace." Some of the older theologians connected it with the divine love; others, with the divine goodness. A distinction has been made between grace, mercy, and long-suffering in this way: grace is God's goodness to the sinner, who does not deserve it (Eph. ii. 5, 8); mercy, his goodness to the suffering (Ps. xxv. 2); and long-suffering, his goodness in delaying the punishment of sin, and affording the sinner further time to repent. Some of the modern theologians almost pass by grace in the discussion of the attributes; and Schleiermacher (§ 80) defines it as the power of the divine consciousness in the soul. Grace is the benevolence of God extended towards sinners, and overcoming their resistance by ethical means. It is its very nature to destroy the guilt of sin, and redeem the sinner. It was, however, not for the first time called into exercise at the fall, but was active in the eternal good pleasure (εὐδοκία) and fore-ordination (πρόγνῶσις) of God. It is the harmonious co-working of love and justice. The relation of grace to mercy is this: grace removes guilt, mercy removes misery from all creatures that suffer. But they not only remove, they make evil to work out the good. Grace transforms [imputed] guilt into a saving penalty; and mercy transforms death into the poison of death, or the effectual means of redemption.

But the grace of God is more than an attribute of his nature, it is the very soul of revelation. God's eternal decree of grace (Eph. i. 5) includes the foreknowledge and election of the sinner, and in its revelation founds the covenant of grace, and after the fall establishes the kingdom of grace. This distinction between the covenant of grace and the covenant of works has been most insisted upon by Reformed theologians, especially by Coccejus (Summa doct. de fœdere et testamentis Dei, Lugd. Bat., 1648). The purpose of divine grace which lies at the basis of the O. T. dispensation (Gen. iii. 15) is fully realized in the life of Christ (Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4). Christ's very nature is grace (Rom. iii. 25); and hence his life was a continuous agency of grace, and its consummation the atonement for the sin of the world.

The doctrine of grace finds its full development in the work of the Spirit and the application of the benefits of the atonement. The operations of grace which are designed to apply salvation are the victories of the sin-destroying and redeeming spirit of Christ over the consciousness of guilt in the human heart. The Holy Spirit is the mediator of grace, convincing the world of sin, etc. (John xvi. 8), teaching it (2 Tim. iii. 16), guiding it into the way of all truth (John xvi. 13), and helping it (Rom. viii. 26), and uses means of grace, such as the sacraments, prayers, the word, etc. The distinction has been made of universal and saving grace. Saving grace has, in turn, been distinguished into prevenient, which acts upon the sinner before repentance; converting, which effects conversion; and co-operant, or indwelling, which operates upon the believer as a sanctifying power. According to Calvinism, grace is irresistible; but the Roman Catholics, Arminians, and Socinians allow a co-operation of the human will before conversion. The Lutheran Church, on the other hand, attempted to take a middle course between strict predestinarianism (to which Luther assents in the De seruo arbitrio) and synergism. Differences also exist on the question of the possibility of falling from grace; the Arminian, and, less confidently, the Lutheran theologians, affirming, the Calvinistic denying it.

The grace of God in Christ has established a kingdom of grace which lies intermediate between the kingdoms of power and glory. This kingdom is the Christian Church, so far as Christ's word and spirit rule in her. Connected herewith is the idea of the duration of the period of grace. For the world, it is limited by the general judgment; for the individual, it reaches out through purgatory, according to the Roman-Catholic view; according to the Scriptures, however, it is measured by the obduracy of the sinner. But the Church properly regards the termination of the lives of the impenitent as a judgment, so long as this is not confused with the final judgment. The design of grace, however, is the perfection of man, and his glorification in heaven. The reward he will there receive will be in consequence of works of faith; but he will receive it upon the basis of grace, and from the hands of grace.

GRADUAL, a part of a psalm chanted in the mass between the epistle and the gospel; formerly called antiphonarium, or responsorium; received the name of "gradual" from its being sung from the steps (gradus) leading up to the altar.

GRAHAM, Isabella, an eminent Christian philanthropist; b. in Lanark, Scotland, July 29, 1742; d. in New York, July 27, 1814. She joined the Presbyterian Church at Paisley under Dr. Witherspoon, afterwards president of Princeton College. In 1765 she married Dr. Graham, a surgeon in the English army, with whom she went to Canada, and subsequently to Antigua, where he died (1774). Returning in poverty to Scotland, she taught school in Paisley and in Edinburgh. In 1789, at the advice of Dr. Witherspoon, she embarked for New York, where she established a successful seminary for young ladies.

Mrs. Graham was foremost among the women of her day, in New-York City, in all benevolent enterprises. She was a pioneer in "woman's work for woman" in America. In 1796 she formed the New-York missionary society for the Indians, and in 1797 helped to found the society for the relief of poor widows with small children, in 1806 presided at a meeting for the organization of the first asylum for orphan children in the city, and in 1811 of a Magdalene society. She was also widely known for her activity in the church (Dr. John Mason's) with which she was connected, and for distributing Bibles among the poor, long before the Bible Society was established. See Life and Letters, last edition, London, 1838; MASON (her pastor): Life of Isabella Graham, Tract Society, New York; Mrs. BETHUNE (mother of Dr. Bethune, and her daughter): Letters and Correspondence of Mrs. Graham, 1838.

GRAHAME, James, a religious poet; b. at Glasgow, April 22, 1765; d. at Sedgfield, Durham, Eng., Sept. 14, 1811. After practising law for many years, he took orders in the Church of England, and became curate of Shipton and Sedgfield successively. He is best known as the author of The Sabbath (1801), a poem in blank verse, descriptive of the sabbath of his native land, and "characterized by a fine vein of tender and devotional feeling, and by a happy delineation of Scottish scenery."

GRANDMONT, or GRAMMONT, Order of, one of the many religious orders arising in the latter part of the eleventh century; was founded in 1073 by Stephanus of Tigerno, whose life has been written by Gerhard, the seventh prior of Grandmont, and is found in MARTÈNE and DURAND (Ampliss. Collectio, VI. p. 1050). Born at Thiers (Tigerno), 1046, he was educated by Bishop Milo of Benevento, and returned to France in 1073, having obtained permission of Gregory VII. to found a religious order after the model of the Calabrian monks. He settled in Auvergne, at Muret, and found followers. After his death, Feb. 8, 1124, his disciples moved to the desert of Grandmont, after which they were called. The third successor of Stephen (Stephen of Lisias) put down the rules of the order in writing, and the eighth prior (Ademar of Frias) gave a new and still more rigorous set of rules. The order suffered very much from internal dissensions, and was finally dissolved during the revolution. See MABILLON: Annal. Ord. S. Bened., V.; and HELYOT: Histoire des ordres monastiques, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. (vii. pp. 470-493). ZÖCKLER.

GRANT, Asahel, M.D., an American missionary; b. in Marshall, N.Y., Aug. 17, 1807; d. at Mosul, Persia, April 24, 1844. He was practising medicine in Utica, when his interest was excited in missions, and he was commissioned in 1835 by the American Board to labor among the Nestorians of Persia. The chief seat of his labors was Oroomiah. He gained the confidence of the Persian officials, and, in the terrible war of the Khoords against the Nestorians, succeeded in mitigating the sufferings of the latter. Dr. Grant published The Nestorians, or the Lost Tribes, London, 1841, 3d ed., 1844. See LOTHROP: Memoir of A. Grant, M.D., New York, 1847; LAURIE:

GRATIAN, b. at Sirmium, 359; killed at Lyons, Aug. 25, 383; followed his father, Valentinian I., on the throne of the West-Roman Empire, 375, and his uncle Valens, on that of the East-Roman Empire, 378. In the last year he chose Theodosius as co-regent. The policy which he pursued with respect to the Church, and in which he was pushed still farther onward by Theodosius, was of decisive consequences. Religious liberty reigned; that is, Paganism, Arianism, and Catholicism were allowed to fight each other with what means they possessed. Under the influence of Ambrosius, Gratian made Catholicism not only the ruling, but the only tolerated Church. In 376 he forbade all heretics to assemble for any religious purpose, confiscated the property belonging to their churches, and transferred the buildings to the Catholics. In 377 he exempted all officers of the Catholic Church, down to the ostearius, from all municipal services and all personal taxes, and in 379 he even made the retail trade which the lower clergy was used to carry on in Illyria, Italy, and Gaul, free of duty. In 381 the Council of Constantinople spoke the anathema over all non-Nicæan denominations. After the accession of Theodosius, Paganism was treated with the same severity as heretical Christianity. In 381 apostates from Christianity to Paganism lost their right to make a will. In 382 all sacerdotal privileges, even those of the vestal virgins, and all state-support, were withdrawn from Paganism, and real estate belonging to the Pagan temples was confiscated. Edicts against sacrifices, haruspices, etc., followed. The altar of victory in the hall of the senate was removed; and the emblems of the office of Pontifex Maximus Gratian declined to accept, because they were to him, as a Christian, a scandal. Of course, for these measures, the Pagan historians compared him with Nero; while the Catholics almost deified him. ADOLF HARNACK.

GRATIAN, the composer of the Decretum Gratiani; was a monk, first in Closse, near Ravenna, afterwards in St. Felix, in Bologna; but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. About his work, which he finished in 1141 or 1151, see the art. on CANON LAW.

GRATRY, Father, b. at Lille, March 30, 1805; d. at Montreux, near Lausanne, Feb. 7, 1872; studied in Paris, but entered, after having determined to devote his life to the service of God, the convent of Buchenberg in the Vosges. After the revolution of 1830, the convent was dissolved, and Father Gratry was appointed teacher of theology and philosophy, first in the seminary of Strassburg (1830-42), afterwards in the Stanislas College, in Paris (1842-47). In 1852 he renewed the order of the Oratorians; and from 1868 he lectured on theology and philosophy in the Sorbonne. He followed a somewhat similar direction as that of Lamennais, Lacordaire, and Montalembert; but he was of a milder and more poetic disposition. During the Council of the Vatican he published four letters in opposition to the doctrine of papal infallibility; but, when the dogma was promulgated, he accepted it. Most of his works are half devotional, and half scientific. — La Connaissance de Dieu, Lettres sur la religion (against positivism), La morale et la loi de l'histoire (an exposition of his social ideas), Meditations, etc.

GRAUL, Karl, b. at Wörlitz, in Anhalt-Dessau, Feb. 6, 1814; d. at Erlangen, Nov. 10, 1864; studied theology at Leipzig; lived for some time in Italy as tutor, and teacher of French in an English family; published in 1843 a translation of Dante's Inferno, with theological explanations; and was in 1844 appointed director of the missionary society in Dresden. This institution he gradually raised from a very subordinate to a very prominent position, making it the missionary organ of the whole Lutheran Church, instead of a mere appendix to the missionary society of Basel. In 1848 he had it removed to Leipzig in order to give the students the benefit of the university. The point upon which he concentrated the energy of the institution was the Tamils, a nation of about twelve millions of souls in Southern India; and the object was not simply to make converts, but to convert the whole people. From 1849 to 1853 he made a visit to the country himself, published a description of his journey (in five volumes, Leipzig, 1853-55), wrote a Tamil grammar, and brought back some of the principal monuments of Tamil literature, which he edited, partly with German, and partly with English translations (Bibliotheca Tamulica, Leipzig, 1854-56, 3 vols.). His views of the attitude which the missionary ought to assume with respect to the question of caste, differed radically from those entertained by the English missionaries; which occasioned him to publish an English pamphlet at Madras (1852), and a German at Leipzig (1861), in their defence. In 1860 his failing health compelled him to retire. Among his other works are Unterscheidungslehren (1815, 9th ed. by Harnack, 1872), Indische Sinnpflanzen (1861), etc. LUTHARDT.

GRAVES, Richard, D.D., b. at Kilfinnan, Ireland, Oct. 1, 1763; d. March 29, 1829; Dean of Ardagh, and Regius Professor of divinity, Trinity College, Dublin, 1813; author of the Donnellan Lectures for 1797-1801, On the Four Last Books of the Pentateuch, London, 1807, 2 vols. His whole works were collected (London, 1840, 4 vols.) with a biography by his son.

GREECE, The Kingdom of, such as its boundaries were fixed by the great powers of Europe, July 21, 1832, comprises an area of 19,353 square miles, and has (according to the census of 1879) 1,679,775 inhabitants, of whom an immense majority belong to the Orthodox Greek Church. By the treaty of Berlin, Thessaly has been added to the kingdom. In 1870 there were in Greece 12,585 Roman Catholics, 2,582 Jews, and 917 belonging to other religious communities. In 1879 there were 16,081 persons in the country not belonging to the State Church.

At the beginning of the Christian era those territories which now form the kingdom of Greece formed the Roman province of Achaia. The proconsul resided at Corinth, which, politically and commercially, was the most important city of the country. As a place, however, of learning and art, Athens still held the first rank. It was almost indispensable for a Roman youth who wanted to distinguish himself in life to go to Athens and study. Her schools of grammar, rhetoric, dialectics, and philosophy, were crowded; though they had lost all productivity, and labored only as educational institutions. Christianity was first planted in these regions by Paul, on his second voyage (51). He first visited Philippi (Acts xvi. 12), then Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, and Corinth (xvii., xviii.); only the last two cities belonged to Achaia. But, while the congregation of Corinth became one of Paul's most brilliant and most important foundations, very little is heard of the congregation of Athens. Paul's stay there was very brief; but his address on Mars' Hill was one of the most remarkable speeches in history, whether we consider the speaker, the audience, or the theme (xvii. 22-31). Dionysius the Areopagite, converted on this occasion, is said to have been its first bishop. The reason why the first city in the world, in intellectual respects, showed itself so singularly backward in its relation to Christianity, was, no doubt, the presence of the above-mentioned schools, which made it the very centre of Paganism. They were closed by Justinian, A.D. 529. In the interior of Peloponnesus, Pagans were found as late as the fourteenth century. Leo the Isaurian, in the beginning of the eighth century, laid Achaia under the authority of the Patriarch of Constantinople; and there it remained for more than a thousand years.

During the war of independence (1821-27) the connection between the Church of Greece and the Patriarch of Constantinople gradually loosened: he received no reverence from the country, and the ecclesiastics he appointed and sent thither were not accepted. Capodistrias favored the separation; and (July 23, 1833) the regency took the decisive step, and declared, on the instance of thirty-six metropolitans assembled at Nauplia, that the Orthodox Church of Greece was independent of any foreign authority. The new church organization was moulded after the model of the Russian Church; but the union of Church and State is not nearly so intimate, because the present king is a Protestant (Lutheran), from Denmark, while the Czar is actual head of the Church in Russia. At the head of the whole Church was placed a permanent synod, consisting of two royal officials and five ecclesiastics, chosen annually by the king. This synod, in whose discussions the royal officials have a right to participate, though without voting, has full authority in all purely spiritual matters; but in matters also presenting a civil aspect, such as marriage, divorce, excommunication of laymen, appointment of feasts and fasts, etc., it shares its authority with the civil government. At the same time the ecclesiastical division of the country was made to correspond with the political, and the number of monasteries was reduced; that of male monasteries from 400 to 82, that of female to three, — probably with an eye to the fact that in Greece are more men than women (a majority of 82,385 in 1879). The country is divided into eleven archbishoprics and thirteen bishoprics. An archbishop's salary is a hundred and eighty pounds; a bishop's, a hundred and forty-five pounds: they are paid by the State. The lower clergy is not paid at all, but lives by fees for prayers, exorcisms, consecrations, purifications, and other spiritual services. The total number of ecclesiastics was 5,102 in 1861. There were 1,600 monks and 1,500 nuns in 1879.

In Greece the Church forms the strongest band around the nation.—much stronger than either blood or speech. During the war of independence the Moslems of Crete and the Latins of Syros sided with the Turks, though they were of the purest Greek descent, and spoke the Greek language. Under such circumstances it is not to be wondered at that the missions which have been established in the country by the Protestant Church, by the Episcopal Church, by the American Board of Missions, and, lately, by the Danish Church, have had very little success. In 1836 the Archbishop of Attica excommunicated all the families which allowed their children to be educated in the English and American mission schools, though the religious instruction was given there by a member of the Orthodox Greek Church. It was hoped that the university established at Athens in 1837 would have an influence on this stubborn narrowness. But of its twelve hundred and forty-four students in 1872, only twenty-six studied theology. Besides the theological faculty of the university, there are four theological seminaries, one in Athens, and three in the provinces; but they had in 1872 only a hundred and fifteen students in all. The lower clergy in Greece receives no education at all. The Anglican Church maintains five chaplains in Athens, Syros, Patras, Corfu, and Zante, who stand under the Bishop of Gibraltar.

Protestant Missions in Athens.—These are not extensive. 1. The pioneer missionary was the Rev. John Henry Hill, D.D., LL.D., b. New York, Sept. 11, 1791; sailed with his wife for Athens, September, 1830; d. there July 1, 1882. He was careful to avoid collision with the Greek hierarchy; did not attempt to organize a church, but confined himself to teaching. His school of six hundred pupils is still kept up. The children are taught, besides the usual secular branches, Bible history, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, and the Nicene Creed in its original form (i.e., without the Filioque clause). This mission is supported by the (American) Church Missionary Society.

2. The Southern Presbyterian Church has two missionaries in Athens,—Rev. Mr. Sampson and Rev. Mr. Kalopathakes, M.D. They have a fine church at the foot of the Acropolis. In connection with this mission is a union depot of the British and the American Bible societies.

3. Near the Presbyterian Church is a Baptist mission in a private house, conducted by another Americanized Greek, Rev. Mr. Sakellarios.

The hero of Protestant missions in Greece is Rev. Dr. Jonas King, who died in 1869 (see art.) The Woman's Union Missionary Society had a girl's school in Athens; but the government closed it because the teachers refused to teach the Greek Catechism and to hang up a picture of the Virgin Mary for adoration.

GREEK CHURCH, The. I. NAME.—The proper name is the Eastern or Oriental Church, which designates its origin and geographical territory; also the Orthodox Church, which expresses its close adherence to the œcumenical system of doctrine and discipline as settled by the seven œcumenical councils before the separation from the Latin Church. On this title she lays the chief stress, and celebrates it on a special day called "Orthodoxy Sunday," in the beginning of Lent, when a dramatic representation of the old œcumenical councils is given in the churches, and anathemas are pronounced on all heresies. The full official title is the Holy Orthodox Catholic Apostolic Oriental Church (ἡ ἁγία ὀρθόδοξος καθολικὴ ἀποστολικὴ ἀνατολικὴ ἐκκλησία). The Roman Church claims all these titles, except "Oriental," for which she substitutes Roman, and claims them exclusively. The popular designation Greek Church, though not strictly correct, refers to the national origin and to the language in which most of its creeds, liturgies, canons, theological and ascetic literature, are composed, and its worship mainly conducted.

II. EXTENT.—The Eastern Church embraces the Greek, the Russian, and other Slavonic nationalities. It has its seat in Western Asia and Eastern Europe, chiefly in Turkey, Serbia, Rumania, Greece, Russia, and some parts of Austria. Bulgaria was long a bone of contention between Constantinople and Rome, and one of the causes of separation, but is now an independent branch of the "Orthodox" Church, ruled by an exarch. In Western Europe and America there are only a few isolated congregations of Greek merchants and colonists, or in connection with the Russian embassies (at Vienna, Trieste, Geneva, Paris, London, New York, San Francisco). The Eastern Church is one of the three great divisions of Christendom, and numbers (according to the estimate made in 1881) between eighty and ninety millions; while the Roman-Catholic Church is credited with a membership of over two hundred millions, and the Protestant churches with one hundred and thirty millions. In Europe the Greek Church numbers 71,405,000; in Asia, 9,402,000; in Africa, 3,200,000; in America, 10,000; total, 84,017,000. Its chief strength lies in the vast empire of Russia, which was Christianized in the ninth and tenth centuries by missionaries from Constantinople, and matrimonial connection with the Byzantine court.

III. DIVISION.—The Greek Church is divided into several great branches. 1. The Orthodox Church in Turkey, under the Patriarch of Constantinople, with the subordinate patriarchates of Alexandria, Jerusalem, and Antioch. Constantinople, the city of the first Christian emperor (New Rome), though now in the hands of the Turk, is still the natural centre of the whole Greek Church, and may become for the Eastern world at some future day, in Christian hands, what Gregory Nazianzen eloquently described it to be in the fourth century, "the eye of the world, the strongest by sea and land, the bond of union between East and West, to which the most distant extremes from all sides come together, and to which they look up as to a common centre and emporium of the faith."

2. The Orthodox Church in Russia, which was at first subject to the Patriarch of Constantinople, then under a special Patriarch of Moscow (since 1582), and now (since 1721) under the permanent holy synod of St. Petersburg and the Czar, whose dominion stretches in an unbroken line across the two Continents of Europe and Asia. The Czar is the personal, as Constantinople is the local, centre of the whole Greek Church; and he keeps a lustful eye upon the city of the Bosphorus as his future capital, where, at no distant day, there must be a tremendous reckoning with Mohammedanism.

3. The National Church of the kingdom of Greece, which since 1833 is governed likewise by a permanent holy synod, but less dependent upon the State than the Russian Church. See GREECE.

4. The Greek Church in the formerly Turkish provinces of Servia, Roumania, and Montenegro, are now independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and ruled by their metropolitans and synods, more or less under the influence of Russia.

5. Distinct from these, and belonging to the Roman Church, are the united Greeks, scattered through Turkey, Hungary, Galicia, Transylvania, and Russia, but chiefly in Austria and Poland, and numbering in all about four millions and a half. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and adopt the dogma of the double procession of the Holy Spirit, but are otherwise allowed to hold to their ancient discipline, marriage of the lower clergy, communion under both kinds (communio sub utraque), leavened bread, their liturgy, and the use of the Greek language.

6. The Greek, or rather Oriental Schismatics, Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, Copts, and Abyssinians, are separated from the Greek and Latin Catholic Church, mostly on the dogma of Christ's person, and have independent organizations, which rise up, as the broken fragments of ancient national churches, from surrounding Mohammedanism and heathenism in Western Asia and Africa. The Maronites on Mount Lebanon were formerly schismatic, but were converted to the Roman Church during the middle ages. The Roman Church has made inroads also among the other Oriental sects, especially the Armenians. The dissenters from the Orthodox Church of Russia are divided into several sects: the chief of them are the Raskolniki, or Old Believers, who protest against all the innovations introduced by Patriarch Nikon and Peter the Great.

IV. HISTORICAL SURVEY.—The Greek Church has no continuous history, like the Latin or the Protestant. She has long periods of monotony and stagnation; she is isolated from the main current of progressive Christendom; her languages and literature are little known among Western scholars. Yet this Church is the oldest in Christendom, and for several centuries she was the chief bearer of our religion. She still occupies the sacred territory of primitive Christianity, and claims most of the apostolic sees, as Jerusalem, Antioch, and the churches founded by Paul and John in Asia Minor and Greece. All the apostles, with the exception of Peter and Paul, labored and died in the East. From the old Greeks she inherited the language and certain national traits of character, while she incorporated into herself also much of Jewish and Oriental piety. She produced the first Christian literature, apologies of the Christian faith, refutations of heretics, commentaries of the Bible, sermons, homilies, and ascetic treatises. The great majority of the early fathers, like the apostles themselves, used the Greek language. Polycarp, Ignatius, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Eusebius, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzen, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, Cyril of Jerusalem, and Cyril of Alexandria, the first Christian emperors since Constantine the Great, together with a host of martyrs and confessors, belong to the Greek communion. She elaborated the œcumenical dogmas of the Trinity and Christology, and ruled the first seven œcumenical councils, which were all held in Constantinople or its immediate neighborhood (Nicaea, Chalcedon, Ephesus). Her palmy period during the first five centuries will ever claim the grateful respect of the whole Christian world; and her great teachers still live in their writings far beyond the confines, nay, even more outside of her communion, as the books of Moses and the prophets are more studied and better understood among Christians than among the Jews, for whom they wrote. But she never materially progressed beyond the stand-point occupied in the fifth and sixth centuries. She has no proper middle age, and no Reformation, like Western Christendom.

We may distinguish three periods in the history of the Greek Church:—

1. The classical or productive period, the first five or six centuries, which has just been characterized. The last great divine of the East is John of Damascus (about 750), who summed up the scattered results of the labors of the preceding fathers into a tolerably complete system of theology; but he is an isolated phenomenon. The process of degeneracy and stagnation had already set in; and the former life and vigor gave way to idle speculations, distracting controversies, dead formalism, and traditionalism.

2. The Byzantine period, corresponding to the middle ages of the Latin Church, from the rise of Mohammedanism to the fall of Constantinople (A.D. 650-1453). Here we have the gradual separation from the West and from all progressive movements; dependence on the imperial court at Constantinople; continuation of a certain literary activity; philological and biblical studies in slavish dependence on the fathers; commentaries of Œcumenius (A.D. 1000), Theophylact (d. 1107), Euthymius Zigabenus (d. about 1120); large literary collections, classical and Christian, of Photius (about 890), Balsamon, Zonaras, Suidas, and Simeon Metaphrastes; the liturgical works of Maximus, Sophronius, Simeon of Thessalonica; the Byzantine historians; the image controversy (726-842); inroads and conquests of Mohammedanism (since 630), in Syria, Persia, Egypt, North Africa; temporary suspension of the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem; finally, the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, and the extinction of the Greek Empire (1453), which led to the emigration of Greek scholars (Chalcondylas, Chrysoloras, Pletho, Michael Apostolius, Theodore Gaza, George of Trebizond, etc.) to the West, the revival of letters, the study of the Greek Testament, and, aided thereby, the preparation for the Reformation. Yet, during this period of decline in her original home, the Greek Church made a great conquest in the conversion of the Slavonians (namely, the Bulgarians and Russians, in the ninth and tenth centuries); while the Latin Church converted the Celtic and Teutonic races.

3. The modern period may be dated from the downfall of the Greek Empire (1453). It presents in Asia stagnation and slavery under the tyranny of the Turks, but with great tenacity and independence as to all internal affairs; in Europe, rapid external growth through the rising power of Russia, with some reforms in manners, customs, and the introduction of Western culture, protests against Romanizing and evangelical movements, the orthodox confession of Peter Mogilas (1642), the synod of Jerusalem (1672), the Russian Church, the patriarchate of Moscow, the reforms of Patriarch Nikon (d. 1681) and of the Czar Peter the Great (d. 1725), the reaction of the Old Believers (Raskolniki), the holy synod of St. Petersburg (since 1721), the New Greek Church in Hellas (since 1833), modern influences from the West, prospects for the future, depending chiefly on Russia.

V. RELATION TO THE LATIN CHURCH.—No two churches are so much alike in their creed, polity, and cultus, as the Greek and Roman; and yet no two are such irreconcilable rivals, perhaps for the very reason of their affinity. They agree much more than either agrees with any Protestant church. They were never organically united. They differed from the beginning in nationality, language, and genius, as the ancient Greeks differed from the Romans; yet they grew up together, and stood shoulder to shoulder in the ancient conflict with Paganism and heresy. They co-operated in the early œcumenical councils, and adopted their doctrinal and ritual decisions. But the development of the papal monarchy, and the establishment of a Western Empire in connection with it, laid the foundation of a schism which has not been healed to this day. The controversy culminated in the rivalry between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Pope of Rome. It first broke out under Photius and Nicolas I., who excommunicated each other (869 and 879). Photius, the greatest scholar of his age, whom Pope Nicolas refused to acknowledge as patriarch, charged, in a famous encyclical letter, the Roman Church with heresy, for the unauthorized insertion of the Filioque into the Nicene Creed, and with various corrupting practices. The controversy was renewed under the Patriarch Cerularius (1053), and became irreconcilable through the Venetian conquest of Constantinople (1204), and the establishment of a Latin Empire (1204–61), and Latin rival bishoprics in eastern sees, with the sanction of Pope Innocent III. Attempts at a re-union were made from time to time, especially in the Council of Lyons (1274) and the Council of Ferrara (1439), but all in vain. The compromise formula of the latter council was rejected with scorn in the East, as treason to the orthodox faith. With the fall of Constantinople (1453) the political motive for seeking a union with the West ceased; and the schism continues to this day, even with increased force, since the Vatican Council in 1870 intensified the chief cause of separation by declaring papal absolutism and papal infallibility an article of faith. Popery knows no compromise; and the Greek Church can never submit to its authority without committing suicide.

The points in which the Greek Church differs from the Roman are the following: the single procession of the Holy Spirit (against the Filioque); the equality of the patriarchs, and the rejection of the papacy as an antichristian innovation and usurpation; the right of the lower clergy (priests and deacons) to marry (though only once); the communion under both kinds (against the withdrawal of the cup from the laity); trine immersion as the only valid form of baptism; the use of the vernacular languages in worship; a number of minor ceremonies, as the use of common or leavened bread in the Eucharist, infant communion, the repetition of holy unction (εὐχέλαιον) in sickness, etc.

On the fruitless negotiations for union between the Lutheran and the Greek Church, and the Anglican and the Greek and Russian Church, see Schaff, Creeds of Christendom, vol. I., pp. 50 sqq. and 74 sqq. The Reformation of the sixteenth century had no effect upon the Oriental Church. The reform movement of Cyril Lucar, who, as Patriarch of Constantinople, attempted to ingraft Calvinism upon the old trunk, failed completely: he was strangled to death, and his body thrown into the Bosphorus (1638); and his doctrines were condemned by several synods, in 1638, 1643, and 1672. (See Schaff, Creeds, I. 54 sqq.) In recent times, however, German universities are often frequented by Russian and Greek students; and the works of German divines have exerted some modifying influence. The Old Catholic movement was followed with interest; and the Old Catholic conferences in Bonn (1874 and 1875) were attended by several dignitaries from Greece and Russia. There has been also considerable intercourse between Greek and Anglican bishops. The Greek Church is not so strongly committed against Protestantism as the Roman, and may therefore learn something from it.

VI. CREED.—The Eastern Church holds fast to the decrees and canons of the seven œcumenical councils; i. e., of Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), Ephesus (431), Chalcedon (451), the second of Constantinople (553), the third of Constantinople (680), the second of Nicaea (787). Her proper creed is the Nicene Creed as enlarged at Constantinople (381), and indorsed at Chalcedon (451), without the Latin Filioque. This creed is the basis of all Greek catechisms and systems of theology, and a regular part of worship. The Greeks have never acknowledged in form the Apostles' Creed, which is of Western origin, nor the Athanasian Creed, which teaches the double procession, and is likewise of Western origin. Besides this œcumenical creed, the Eastern Church acknowledges three subordinate confessions, which define her position against Romanism and Protestantism; namely, (1) The Orthodox Confession of Peter Mogilas (metropolitan of Kieff), A. D. 1643, — a catechetical exposition of the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer and Beatitudes, and the Decalogue; (2) The Eighteen Articles or Decrees of the Synod of Jerusalem, A. D. 1672; (3) The Longer Russian Catechism of Philaret (metropolitan of Moscow), adopted by the holy synod of St. Petersburg (1839), and published in all the languages of Russia. (See these creeds and con-

VII. THEOLOGY. — The Greek Church is in doctrine substantially agreed with the Roman, but, upon the whole, more simple and less developed, though in some respects more subtle and metaphysical. The only serious doctrinal difference is that on the Procession of the Holy Spirit (see FILIOQUE CONTROVERSY). She holds to the leading principles, but rejects many of the consequences or results, of Roman Catholicism. She adheres to the theology of the Greek fathers down to John of Damascus, and ignores the succeeding scholastic theology of the schoolmen, who completed the Roman system. The Eastern theology is not properly systematized: it remains rigidly in the fragmentary state of the old councils. The resistance to the Western clause, Filioque, implied a protest against all further progress both in truth and in error, and meant stagnation, as well as faithful adherence to the venerable Nicene symbol. The Greek theology is most full on the doctrine of God and of Christ, but very defective on the doctrine of man and the order of salvation. The East went into all sorts of theological and christological subtleties, especially during the long and tedious Monophysite controversies, which found little or no response in the West; but it ignored the Pelagian controversies, the development of the Augustinian and later evangelical theology. It took the most intense interest in the difference between ousia and hypostasis, the homousion and homoiousion, the relations of the persons in the Trinity, the agennesia of the Father, the eternal genesis of the Son, the eternal exporeusis or procession of the Spirit, the perichoresis, the relation of the two natures in Christ, the Nestorian, Eutychian, Monophysite, and Monothelite heresies, but was never seriously troubled with questions about predestination, vicarious atonement, justification and imputation, conversion and regeneration, faith and good works, merit and demerit, vital union to Christ, and cognate doctrines, which absorbed the attention of Western Christendom. The cause for this difference must be sought in the prevailing metaphysical, rhetorical, and objective character of the Eastern Church. — inherited partly from Asia, partly from Greece, — as distinct from the practical, logical, and subjective tendency of the Western churches, which is derived from the Roman and the Teutonic nationalities. The difference is illustrated already by the Nicene Creed, with its metaphysical terms about the Son, as compared with the more simple and popular Apostles' Creed, which originated in the West, and is very little used in the East.

VIII. GOVERNMENT. — The Greek Church is a patriarchal oligarchy, in distinction from the papal monarchy. The episcopal hierarchy is retained, the papacy rejected. The Vatican decrees of 1870 have intensified the separation. Centralization is unknown in the East. The patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, are equal in rights, though the first has a primacy of honor. The Czar of Russia, however, exercises a sort of general protectorate, and may be regarded as a rival to the Pope of Rome, but has no authority in matters of doctrine, and can make no organic changes. The Eastern hierarchy resembles the Jewish type. The Greek priest within the veil of the sanctuary is concealed from the eyes of the people; but in social respects he is nearer the people than the Roman priest. He is allowed, and even compelled, to marry once, but forbidden to marry twice. Celibacy is confined to bishops and monks. Absolution is given only in the form of a prayer, "May the Lord absolve thee!" instead of the positive form, "I absolve thee." The confessional exists, but in a milder form, with less influence and abuse, than in Romanism. The laity are more independent; and the Russian Czar, like the Byzantine Emperor of old, is the head of the Church in his dominion. The unction of confirmation is made to symbolize the royal priesthood of every believer. The monastic orders, though including many clergy, are not clerical institutions. The community of Athos is a lay corporation with chaplains.

The administration of the churches as developed in the Byzantine Empire is most complicated, and involves, besides the regular clergy, an army of higher and lower ecclesiastical offices, from the first administrator of the church property (ὁ μέγας οἰκονόμος), the superintendent of the sacristy (ὁ σκευοφύλαξ), the chancellor or keeper of ecclesiastical archives (ὁ χαρτοφύλαξ), down to the cleaners of the lamps (οἱ λαμπάδαριοι), and the bearer of the images of saints (ὁ βασταγῦνος). These half-clerical officers are divided into two groups, — one on the right, the other on the left: each is subdivided into three classes, and each class has again five persons. Leo Allatius and Heineccius enumerate fifteen officials of the right group, and even more of the left. But many of these offices have either ceased altogether, or retain only a nominal existence.

IX. THE CULTUS is much like the Roman Catholic, with the celebration of the sacrifice of the mass as its centre, with an equal and even greater neglect of the sermon, and is addressed more to the senses and imagination than to the intellect and the heart. It is strongly Oriental, unintelligibly symbolical and mystical, and excessively ritualistic. The Greeks reject organs, musical instruments, and sculpture, and make less use of the fine arts in their churches than the Roman Catholics; but they have even a more complicated system of ceremonies, with gorgeous display, semi-barbaric pomp, and endless changes of sacerdotal dress, crossings, gestures, genuflections, prostrations, washings, processions, which so absorb the attention of the senses, that there is little room left for intellectual and spiritual worship. They use the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, which is an abridgment of that of St. Basil, yet very lengthy, and contains, with many old and venerable prayers (one of the finest is incorporated in the Anglican Liturgy under the name of Chrysostom), later additions from different sources to an excess of liturgical refinement. Stanley (Eastern Church, p. 32) characterizes the Greek worship as "a union of barbaric rudeness and elaborate ceremonialism."

The most characteristic features of Greek worship, as distinct from the Roman, are the three-fold immersion in baptism, with the repudiation of any other mode as essentially invalid; the simultaneous performance of the act of confirmation and the act of baptism, which in the West have been separated; the anointing with oil in cases of dangerous illness, which Rome has changed into extreme unction of the dying; infant communion, which the Latin Church has not only abandoned, but forbidden; the communion under two kinds (κατὰ τὰ δύο εἶδη, sub utraque); the use of leavened instead of unleavened bread in the Eucharist; the standing and eastward posture in prayer; the stricter separation of the sexes; the use of the screen or veil before the altar; and the withdrawal of the performance of the mysteries (sacraments) from the eyes of the people.

The worship of saints, relics, flat images, and the cross, is carried as far as, or even farther, than in the Roman Church; but statues, bas-reliefs, and crucifixes are forbidden. The ruder the art, the more intense is the superstition. In Russia especially the veneration for pictures of the Virgin Mary and the saints is carried to the utmost extent, and takes the place of the Protestant veneration for the Bible. The holy picture with the lamp burning before it is found and worshipped in the corner (the sacred place) of every room, in the street, over gateways, in offices, taverns, steamers, railway and telegraph stations, and carried in the knapsack of every soldier, not as a work of art, but as an emblem, a lesson of instruction, an aid to devotion. The vernacular languages are used in worship,—the Greek in Turkey and Greece, the Slavonic in Russia; but they have to a considerable extent become unintelligible to the people. The old Slavonic differs from the modern Russ about as much as Chaucer's English from our English. The Oriental sects hold to their native dialects,—the Syriac, Armenian, etc. The old Greek calendar, which is eleven days behind the new style introduced by Gregory XIII., is still retained in distinction from the Roman and Protestant churches.

X. As to Christian LIFE, it has the same general features as in the Roman-Catholic Church. The mass of the people are contented with an ordinary morality, while the monks aim at a higher degree of ascetic piety. The monastic system originated in the East (in Egypt), and continues to this day, but has not developed into great monastic orders, as in the West. There are three classes of monks,—the cenobites (κοινοβιταί), who live together in a monastery ruled by an archimandrite, who is often a bishop (ἀρχιμανδρίτης, ἡγούμενος); the anchorites (ἀναχωρηταί), who live in a cell apart from the other monks, or among the laity; and the ascetes (ἀσκηταί), or hermits. The monks usually follow the rule of St. Basil; some, the rule of St. Anthony. The bishops are taken from the monks. The principal convents are at Jerusalem, Mount Athos, Mount Sinai (where the celebrated Sinaitic manuscript of the Bible was kept for centuries, but not used by the inmates), and St. Saba, near the Dead Sea. Russia had in 1875 about six hundred convents and nunneries. The Greek monks are as a rule more ignorant and superstitious than the Roman-Catholic. The same may be said of the clergy. Many of them are merely mechanical functionaries. Religious life is supposed to originate in baptismal regeneration, and to be nourished chiefly by the sacraments. Prayer, fasting, and charitable deeds are the principal manifestations of piety. The observance of the Ten Commandments is strictly enjoined in all the Catechisms. The Greeks and Russians are very religious in outward observances and devotions, but know little of what Protestants mean by subjective experimental piety, and personal direct communion of the soul with the Saviour. They are liberal and deceitful in unmeaning compliments. The Greek Christians surpass their Mohammedan neighbors in chastity, but are behind them in honesty. What St. Paul says of the Cretans (Κρήτες ἀεὶ ψεύσασαι, Tit. i. 12) is still characteristic of the race, of course with very honorable exceptions. In Russia there is the same divorce between religion and morality. The towns are adorned with churches and convents. Every public event is celebrated by the building of a church. Every house has an altar and sacred pictures; every child, his guardian angel and baptismal cross. A Russian fasts every Wednesday and Friday, prays early and late, regularly attends mass, confesses his sins, pays devout respect to sacred places and things, makes pilgrimages to the tombs and shrines of saints, and has the phrase "Slava Boga!" ("Glory to God!") continually on his lips. And yet even the priests are grossly intemperate; and public officials, even to the highest dignitaries, are said to be open to bribery. The Nihilistic troubles, and the awful assassination of Alexander II., in 1881, reveal an abyss of corruption and danger beneath the glittering surface of Russian grandeur.

XI. THE GREEK CHURCH AND THE BIBLE. — Concerning the extent of the canon of the Scriptures the Eastern Church is not quite consistent, and stands midway between the Roman and the Protestant view concerning the Jewish Apocrypha. The Septuagint is used, which includes the Apocrypha. The Orthodox Confession repeatedly quotes the Apocrypha as authority; and the synod of Jerusalem (1672) mentions several apocryphal books (The Wisdom of Solomon, Judith, Tobit, the History of Bel and the Dragon, the History of Susanna, The Maccabees, and the Wisdom of Sirach) as parts of the Holy Scriptures. On the other hand, Metrophanes enumerates only twenty-two books of the Old Testament (according to the division of Josephus, who counts the twelve minor prophets as one, and combines several historical books), and eleven books of the New Testament (counting fourteen Epistles of Paul as one book, and so the two Epistles of Peter and the three of John), and then speaks of the Jewish Apocrypha as not being received by the Church among the canonical and authentic books, and hence not to be used in proof of dogmas. The Longer Catechism of Philaret likewise enumerates (with Josephus, St. Cyril, and St. Athanasius) only twenty-two books of the Old Testament and twenty-seven books of the New, and says that "the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach and certain other books" are ignored in the list of the books of the Old Testament, "because they do not exist in the Hebrew." The use of the apocryphal books is found in this, that "they have been appointed by the fathers to be read by proselytes who are preparing for admission into the church."

As to the circulation of the Scriptures among the laity, it is not encouraged; and certain portions, especially of the Old Testament, are declared to be unfit for general use. But the Greek Church has never expressly prohibited the reading of the Bible in the vulgar tongue to the people; and the Orthodox Church of Russia has always had a popular version of the Bible, first in the old Slavic, and now in modern Russ. Alexander I., by a ukase of Jan. 14, 1813, allowed even the British and Foreign Bible Society to establish a branch in St. Petersburg. Through the labors of this society nearly five hundred thousand copies of the New Testament and the Psalms were scattered, in thirty-two languages, all over the empire, and read with great avidity. A recent traveller says, "Except in New England and in Scotland, no people in the world, so far as they can read at all, are greater Bible-readers than the Russians" (HEPWORTH DIXON, Free Russia, p. 290). A priest told him, "Love for the Bible and love for Russia go with us hand in hand. A patriotic government gives us the Bible: a monastic government (Nicholas) takes it away." But it should be remembered that not more than one out of ten Russians can read at all. The Bible drove the Jesuits from Russia, who opposed it with all their might. In 1825 Nicholas, under the influence of the monks, or the black clergy, placed the Bible under arrest, and replaced it by an official Book of Saints. Alexander II., the emancipator of the serfs, has also emancipated the Bible, and restored, in part at least, the liberty of the Bible Society, but restricted it to the Protestant population. The printing and circulating of the Bible in the Russian language and within the Orthodox Greek Church is under the exclusive control of the holy synod of St. Petersburg. Agents of the Bible Society were allowed to circulate the Scriptures in the army during the recent war with Turkey (1877).

XII. MISSIONS.—The Eastern Church spreads, through Russian influence, in Siberia, the Aleutian Islands, and wherever the civil and military power of the Czar prepares the way; but, apart from the aid of government, she has little or no missionary spirit, and is content to keep her own. In Turkey she would not be permitted to approach the Moslems on the subject of religion. Her greatest mission-work was the conversion of Russia; and this was effected, not so much by preaching as by the marriage of a Byzantine princess and the despotic order of the ruler. In the midst of the Mohammedan East the Greek populations remain like islands in the barren sea; and the Bedouin tribes have wandered for twelve centuries round the Greek convent of Mount Sinai, probably without one instance of conversion to the creed of men whom they yet acknowledge with almost religious veneration as beings from a higher world (STANLEY, p. 34). If the Turks are ever to be converted to Christianity, it must be done by other churches. Mohammedans regard the Greek and Roman Christians as idolaters, and cannot but despise the monks who disgrace by their fights the traditional spot of the nativity and crucifixion, and have to be kept in order by Turkish soldiers.

The want of missionary spirit, however, accounts also for greater freedom from the curse of proselytism and persecuting intolerance. The history of the Greek Church is not disfigured by bloody tribunals of orthodoxy, like the Spanish Inquisition, or systematic and long-continued persecution, like the crusades against the Waldenses, Albigenses, Huguenots, with the infernal scenes of St. Bartholomew's Massacre. Yet the Greek Church of old has mercilessly expelled and exiled Arian, Nestorian, Eutychian, and other heretics, persecuted the Paulicians (835); and modern Russia rigidly prohibits secession from the orthodox national Church. Nobody can be converted in Russia from one religion or sect to another, except to the national orthodox Church; and all the children of mixed marriages, where one parent belongs to it, must be baptized and educated in it. The spirit of fanatical intolerance has manifested itself recently in the atrocious persecution of the Jews (1881), which excited the indignation of the civilized world; but it would be unfair to hold the Eastern Church responsible for these excesses. A church which has been wonderfully preserved through so many centuries, and allows the word of God to circulate among her people, justifies a hopeful view of its future mission and prospects.

LIT.—The chief sources are the acts of the first seven œcumenical synods; the writings of the Greek fathers, especially Athanasius, Chrysostom, John of Damascus, and Photius; the Confession of Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople (delivered to the Turkish Sultan, Mahomet II., 1453); the orthodox Confession of Peter Mogilas, metropolitan of Kiev (1643); the eighteen decrees of the synod of Jerusalem, or the Confession of Dositheus (1672, mainly directed against the Patriarch Cyril Lucar, and his attempt to Protestantize the Greek Church); the Russian catechisms of Platon, and especially of Philaret (metropolitan of Moscow, d. 1867). The Longer Catechism of Philaret, issued by authority of the holy synod of St. Petersburg, 1839, is used in all the churches and schools of the Russian Empire, and is by far the best modern exposition of the orthodox doctrine of the Eastern Church. It contains, in questions and answers, a Commentary of the Nicene Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Nine Beatitudes, and the Ten Commandments. GREEN, Ashbel, D.D., LL.D., an ecclesiastical leader in the Presbyterian Church of the United States, and president of Princeton College; b. at Hanover, N.J., July 6, 1762; d. at Philadelphia, May 19, 1848. He served as a sergeant in the Revolutionary war; graduated at Princeton 1783; and was successively tutor and professor at the college, and pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia from 1787 to 1812. He was one of the founders of Princeton Seminary, and president of the college 1812-22. He afterwards resided in Philadelphia, editing the Christian Advocate 1822-31. Dr. Green excelled as a leader, and was born to command. "In any sphere or calling he would have held a high rank. As a statesman, he would have shaped the policy of his party, if not of his country," etc. (Gillett, Hist. Presb. Ch., I. 566 sq.). He wielded great influence in the Presbyterian Church, and by his arraignment of Albert Barnes (first when the congregation appeared before the presbytery of Philadelphia, to get permission to present a call, in 1830) for holding fundamental errors, and by his subsequent course in the interest of purity of doctrine within the Church, contributed very largely to bring on the division in the Presbyterian body in 1837. He published a Hist. of Presb. Missions, Lectures on the Assembly's Catechism (2 vols.), and other works. His Life, begun by himself, was finished by J. H. JONES, and published New York, 1849.

GREEN, Joseph Henry, F.R.S., D.C.L., author of The Spiritual Philosophy; b. in London, Nov. 1, 1791; d. at the Mount, Hadley, Middlesex, Dec. 13, 1863. He was by profession a surgeon, and achieved the highest success; but he devoted much time to philosophical studies. In 1817 he made the acquaintance of Coleridge, and became at last his almost daily companion. Coleridge, who died July 25, 1834, made him his literary executor; and in 1836 Mr. Green resigned his professorship of surgery at King's College, London, retired from practice, and spent the rest of his life in studious seclusion. Shortly before his death he finished the work by which he will be remembered, — The Spiritual Philosophy, founded on the Teaching of the Late Samuel Taylor Coleridge (London, 1865, 2 vols.). The work was carried through the press by Mr. John Simon, who prefaced it with a brief Memoir. It is the best concatenated exposition of Coleridge's philosophy. Mr. Green was a man of lovely character.

GREENFIELD, William, a celebrated linguist; b. in London, April 1, 1799; d. there Nov. 5, 1831. He edited, for Bagster, the Comprehensive Bible (1826), the Syriac New Testament (1828, 1829), a Hebrew New Testament (1830), a lexicon of the Greek New Testament, and an abridgment of Schmidt's Greek Concordance. He was appointed in 1830 editor of foreign versions to the British and Foreign Bible Society.

was b. in Oxfordshire; entered Oxford 1601; became minister at Stepney before 1613; was cast out of his living by the Act of Uniformity; d. before 1677. His Exposition of Ezekiel, in five volumes (London, 1645-62, new edition by Sherman, London, 1839) of an average of 600 pages each, is one of the best Puritan commentaries. See REID: Memoirs of the Westminster Divines, 1811.

GREGG, John, D.D., b. at Cappa, County Clare, Ireland, Aug. 4, 1798; d. at Cork, Sunday, May 26, 1878. He was educated at the University of Dublin; after service in a country parish, was rector in Dublin, 1836-62; in 1857 was made Archdeacon of Kildare, and in 1862 Bishop of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross. In each capacity he did good service. His ministry in Dublin was memorable by reason of his spirituality, eloquence, and fidelity; while as a bishop he was wise in counsel, kind in manner, and firm in rule. See his Life of Faith (sermons and lectures), Lond., 1883, and his Life by his son, Dublin, 1879.

GREGOIRE, Henri, b. at Veho, a village near Lunéville, Dec. 4, 1750; d. in Paris, May 28, 1831; was educated in the Jesuit college at Nancy, and became teacher in the Jesuit school of Pont-à-Mousson, pastor of Emberménil, and Bishop of Blois from 1791 to 1801; after 1814 he retired altogether from public life. Sent as a delegate to the assembly of the States-General in 1789, he played a prominent part during the whole revolution, advocating the most advanced views with respect to social reforms, but opposing, often with great courage, the reign of terror. He was the first French priest who took the oath on the constitution (Dec. 27, 1790). His episcopal office he resigned, in consequence of the concordat of 1801. During the Restoration he was much persecuted by the ultramontanists; and Guillon had to suffer considerably because he administered the sacrament to him on his death-bed. He wrote Sur la régénération des Juifs (Metz, 1789, translated into English, London, same year), De la littérature des Nègres (Paris, 1808, translated both into English and German), Histoire des sectes religieuses (Paris, 1828, 5 vols.), Mémoires de Grégoire (Paris, 1837, 2 vols.). See his life, by KRÜGER, Leip., 1838; MAGGIOLLO, Nancy, 1885; C. RENÉ GREGORY: Grégoire, the Priest and the Revolutionist, Leip., 1876. CASPAR RENÉ GREGORY.

GREGOR VON HEIMBURG was b. in the beginning of the fifteenth century, probably at Würzburg, and descended from a noble family in Franconia. After studying law at the university of his native city, and obtaining the degree of doctor utriusque (1430), he repaired immediately to Basel, at that time the centre of public attention as the seat of the oecumenical council. He staid there till 1435, when he was made syndic of Nuremberg, and became acquainted, even intimately, with Enca Silvio Piccolomini. In Nuremberg he remained till 1460; and as syndic of this free city of the empire he immediately entered upon that protracted and bitter but never-interrupted contest with the curia, which filled his whole life. To break the influence of the Italian papacy on Germany, and stop that drainage by Rome of the very heart-blood of his fatherland, were the great objects of his life. In 1446 Eugen IV. deposed Archbishop Theodoric of Cologne, and Archbishop Jacob of Treves, on account of the reformatory tendencies their government evinced. The electors of the empire immediately assembled at Francfort; and, supported by the Emperor Frederic III., they sent an embassy to Rome to move the Pope to cancel the depositions. Gregor stood at the head of this embassy; and, when nothing came out of the negotiations, he published his Admonitio de injustis usurpationibus paparum, etc. (GOLDAST, Monarchia, I. p. 557), burning with indignation. In 1453 his friend Enea Silvio ascended the papal throne under the name of Pius II.; and in the very next year Gregor had an opportunity to plead before him, as the representative of Duke Sigismund of Austria, at the congress of Mantua. But Gregor spoke against the Pope's plans, and the friendship turned into a deadly hatred. Shortly after, the duke was put under the ban, because he had imprisoned Nicholas of Cusa, Bishop of Brixen; and when Gregor, in behalf of his client, appealed to an œcumenical council, he, too, was put under the ban. He sought refuge, first with George Podiebrad, king of Bohemia, afterwards with the Duke of Saxony; and he continued to harass the curia with his scornful and defiant denunciations. After the accession, however, of Sixtus IV., the ban was abrogated; and he died (1472) reconciled with the Church.

LIT.—Besides those of his writings which are found in GOLDAST (Monarchia), there is a collection, Scripta nervosa, etc., Francfort, 1608. His life was written by BALENSTADIUS (Helmstädt, 1737) and CL. BROCKHAUS (Leipzig, 1861). See also VOIGT: Enea Silvio Piccolomini, 1858-63, 3 vols. P. TSCHLACKERT.

GREGORIUS AGRIGENTINUS was Bishop of Agrigentum in the latter part of the sixth century, and wrote (in Greek) a commentary on Ecclesiastes, which, together with a life of him (also in Greek) by Leontius, was edited by Morcelli, Venice, 1791, with Latin translation and notes, and reproduced in Patrologia Græca, vol. 98. Though the sketch by Leontius is very full, the chronology of Gregorius' life is very uncertain.

GREGORIUS ANTIOCHENSIS, or THEOPOLITANUS, was first a monk in Constantinople, then abbot of the monastery of Mount Sinai, and finally patriarch of Antioch, or, as the city was then called, Theopolis (569-591). His life was very stormy. He was exceedingly unpopular in Antioch, and was compelled twice to defend himself against the most infamous accusations. A homily by him (In mulieres unguentiferas), and a speech he delivered to the rebellious soldiers on the Persian frontier, are still extant; GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., XII.

GREGORIUS NEO-CÆSARENSIS THAUMATURGUS, the enthusiastic disciple of Origen, and the apostle of Pontus; was b. at Neo-Cæsarea in Pontus, and destined for some kind of civil career, but happened to come to Cæsarea in Palestine, where Origen had settled down shortly before (in 231), and remained there, studying under his tutorship, for eight years. Before he returned home he wrote his panegyrics on his great teacher (specially edited by J. A. Bengel, 1722); and shortly after his arrival home he was consecrated bishop of his native city by Phædimus of Amisus. He found seventeen Christians in Neo-Cæsarea when he entered his office: there were only seventeen Pagans left when he died (about 270). Testimonies of the energy he developed and the influence he exercised are not only the legends which cluster around his name, but also the writings he left,—his so-called canonical letter on discipline, one of the most interesting documents of ancient Christianity; the confession he used for the catechumens of his church; his paraphrase of Ecclesiastes. They were edited by G. Voss, Mayence, 1604, in Paris, 1622; in GALLAND: Bibl. Patr., III.; and MIGNE: Patrol. Græca, X. His life was written by GREGORY OF NYSSA (utterly unreliable), PALLAVICINI (Rome, 1644), J. L. BOYE (Jena, 1703), and VICTOR RYSEL (Leipzig, 1880). W. MÖLLER.

GREGORY THE ILLUMINATOR. See ARMENIA.

GREGORY NAZIANZEN, one of the three celebrated Cappadocians of the fourth century who defended the Nicene faith, and one of the most eloquent orators of the early Church. Compared with his two other fellow-countrymen, he was neither an ecclesiastical leader, like Basil, nor a deep thinker, like Gregory of Nyssa, but surpassed both in rhetorical skill, and possessed a combination of talents such as neither of them had. A romantic interest attaches to his career, which moved to and fro between an active participation in the enterprises of the church, and the free leisure of a Christian philosopher and monk, as monasticism then allowed. Rich biographical notices are found in Gregory the Presbyter, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Rufinus, and Suidas. The most important sources of his life are, however, his own writings. He was b. 330, at Nazianzus in Cappadocia, or in Arianzas, a village near by, and d. 389 or 390. His mother, Nonna, was a woman of ardent piety and devotion. Brought into the Church by her persuasions, his father was made Bishop of Nazianzus. Gregory visited, in turn, the two Cæsareas, Alexandria, and Athens; devoting himself in the latter city to the study of grammar, mathematics, rhetoric, etc. Among his fellow-students was Julian, afterwards Roman emperor. In 360 he returned to Cappadocia, and was baptized. At the invitation of his friend Basil he went to Pontus, and shared with him common studies and diversions. One result of these mutual studies was the Philocalia, a collection of excerpts from Origen. His father, yielding to the pressure of imperial and ecclesiastical influence, had affixed his signature to a semi-Arian document of the synod of Rimini. Hearing of this, Gregory hurried to Nazianzus, and prevailed on him to retract. On this visit his father, as was frequently the case in those days, suddenly and without previous intimation to his son, ordained him presbyter. Gregory shrank from the duties of the office, and fled to Basil, but was soon prevailed upon to return, and assist his father in his old age. When Basil was consecrated Bishop of Cæsarea some years afterward, he intrusted to his friend the bishopric of Sasima, a squalid village. The office was forced upon Gregory against his will; and, though he allowed himself to be consecrated, he refused to serve, and continued to assist his father as coadjutor till his death (374). In 379 he was called to Constantinople to lead the Nicene party, which was so inconsiderable that it did not even have a church to worship in. But Gregory's eloquence and devotion soon attracted crowds, who, under the spell of his words, forgot his smallness of stature and sickly emaciation of face. Even such scholars as Jerome desired to be his pupils; and the little congregation soon passed into a church, which, with reference to the revival of the true faith, received the name Anastasia. In 380 Theodosius consummated the defeat of the Arian party; and Gregory was led in triumph into the principal church of the city. He was elected Bishop of Constantinople, and consecrated by the order of the second œcumenical council (381). But the Macedonian and Egyptian bishops on their arrival pronounced the act a violation of the canons of Nice, which limited a bishop to one diocese. Gregory resigned, too noble to have recourse to intrigue, as was then so frequently the case, and yet not without some regret. He returned to Cappadocia, where for a time he devoted himself to ecclesiastical matters, and then retired to his paternal estate at Arianzus.

Gregory's WRITINGS consist of orations, letters, and poems. In these he shows himself a skilful author: his diction is rich, and glowing with figures, his emotion ardent, his rhetorical gifts shedding a constant lustre. His letters, addressed to Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, etc., abound in beautiful thoughts. His poems contain some fine hymns, but are often wearisome and prolix. Most important are the orations, forty-five in number. Five are devoted to the exposition and defence of the Nicene doctrine of the Trinity, and won for Gregory the title of the "Theologian." The others are devoted to public events, or to the memory of martyrs, friends, and kindred. No one of them is a pure treatment of a biblical subject. In christology Gregory opposed Arianism and Apollinarianism: in anthropology he teaches original sin, and derives the mortality of man from the fall. But he held to the ability of the human will to choose the good, and to the co-operation of man with God in salvation. In these particulars he shows the influence of Origen, as, in his views of the Trinity, the influence of Athanasius.

GASS.

GREGORY OF NYSSA, one of the ablest defenders of the Nicene faith against Arianism and Apollinarianism, and a younger brother of Basil; was b. in Cappadocia about 332; d. about 395. He was indebted to his brother for his literary training. Under the influence of a dream he undertook the office of anagnost, or reader; but, the duties not being congenial to his tastes, he forsook it to become a teacher of rhetoric. Gregory Nazianzen remonstrating with him for seeming to prefer the fame of a rhetorician above the calling of a Christian, he returned to the service of the Church, and in 371 or 372 was made, by Basil, Bishop of Nyssa, an inconsiderable town of Cappadocia. Gregory was married to Theosebia, who was still living at the time of his promotion. The synod of Ancyra (375), convened by the Arian Demetrius, governor of Pontus, pronounced him, though unjustly, guilty of misuse of church-funds, and violation of the canons for the election of bishops. In the following year another synod deposed him from his bishopric. This was followed by his banishment by Valens. Crushed by these events, Gregory retired into solitude. The death of Valens (378) was the signal for his return to his diocese, which he entered amidst the acclamations of the people. The following year Basil died, and a few months later his sister Macrina, whom Gregory saw in her dying hours on his return from the synod of Antioch. In 381 we find him at the Council of Constantinople. At this meeting he read his work against Eunomius to Gregory Nazianzen and Jerome. Of the two discourses he pronounced during his stay in the city, — at the consecration of Gregory Nazianzen, Bishop of Constantinople, and at the death of Miletius of Antioch, — the latter only is preserved. The council appointed him, in conjunction with Helladius, overseer or patriarch of the churches of Pontus; but he seems to have been ignored by the latter. In obedience to an order of the synod of Antioch (or the Council of Constantinople), Gregory visited the church of Arabia (Babylon) in the interest of its reformation. He afterwards went to Jerusalem, where he found the church in a very unsatisfactory state. A result of this tour was the work De Euntibus Hierosolyma, which warns against the uselessness and evils of pilgrimages. He was in Constantinople in 383, and again in 385, when he delivered funeral orations over the young Princess Pulcheria and the Empress Placilla. We hear nothing more of him till 394, when he is in attendance at a synod of Constantinople, and delivered a sermon at the dedication of a church at Chalcedon.

Gregory of Nyssa was of a retiring disposition, and laid himself open, by his irresolute and pliant administration of his diocese, to the charge of weakness and incompetency from Basil. He lacked the practical gifts of a leader, which his brother possessed in an eminent degree, and was not endowed so richly with oratorical talents as Gregory Nazianzen; but he was a profounder theologian than either. In general, except on the doctrines of the Trinity and the Incarnation, he leaned upon Origen. In his vindication of the Nicene articles he makes a clear distinction between essence (οὐσία) and person (ὑπόστασις). The simplicity of the divine essence excludes all subordination of persons in the Trinity. The Son is equal with the Father by reason of an eternal generation. Sin has interfered with the realization of man's design, which was to participate in the divine fulness, and has antagonized the world to God. To enable man to realize this design is the object of the Incarnation. Man still retains free will and a love for the good, which is indestructible. Sin, which is departure from God, is overcome by God's approach to man; i.e., the union of the divine with the human nature. Christ assumed all of human nature—body, soul, and spirit—in order to redeem all. As the second Adam he restores to man his original love and longing after God, and enables him by the gift of the Holy Spirit to attain in an ever-increasing measure to his likeness. "Christianity is the imitation of the divine nature" (χριστιανισμός ἐστὶ τῆς θείας φύσεως μίμησις). All will be ultimately restored, for all possess a remainder of the divine nature; and this could not be destroyed without destroying the very soul itself. This doctrine of the apokatastasis, or universal restoration, which he taught in common with Origen, has given great trouble to the Eastern Church, some of their scholars holding the passages teaching it to be insertions by the hand of heretics.

LIT. — The most important of Gregory's dogmatical works are his twelve Books against Eunomius, Antirrhet. adv. Apollinarem (the most valuable refutation of Apollinarianism), and Oratio Catechet. Magna. Of his exegetical works the most important are his De Hominis Opificio, Apolog. de Hexameron, the Life of Moses, expositions of Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, the Beatitudes, the Lord's Prayer, etc. To these must be added his epistles, funeral orations, and ascetic writings, such as De Virginitate, in which he represents celibacy as the perfection of life, from which, however, he laments that he is himself debarred. GREGORY OF TOURS, b. at Arverna, the present Clermont, the capital of Auvergne, 510; d. at Tours, Nov. 17, 594; descended from one of the most distinguished Roman families in Gaul. His true name was Georgius Florentius, which he changed in honor of his maternal great-grandfather, Bishop Gregory of Langres. Having been educated for the Church, he was chosen Bishop of Tours in 573, and governed his diocese with great ability under very difficult circumstances, the wars between Sigebert and Chilperic, or rather between Brunehild and Fredegund. He owes his great celebrity, however, principally to his authorship. Besides a work on miracles, which is hardly read any more, he wrote the Annales Francorum, which is the most important, if not the only, source to the history of Gaul in that period. It was first printed in Paris, 1511, and critically edited by Ruinart, Paris, 1699. There is an excellent German translation by Giesebrecht, in Perlz, Geschichtsschreiber der deutschen Vorzeit, Berlin, 1851, 9th ed., 1873. GREGORY OF UTRECHT, the son of Alberic, who, through his mother, Wastrade, was related to the royal family of the Merovingians; met in 722 with Boniface in the monastery of Pfalz, near Treves, and became from that day his friend and companion. After the death of Boniface he was charged by the Pope with the conversion of the Frisians; and he labored with success for this object, both as a missionary, and as leader of the school of Utrecht. He died in the Church of St. Salvator, in Utrecht, Aug. 25, 775. His life, by his pupil, Liudger, is found in Act. Sanct., August V. G. PLITT

GREGORY is the name of sixteen popes; namely, Gregory I., the Great (Sept. 3, 590–March 12, 604), descended from a distinguished senatorial family, probably the Anicians, and was b. in Rome between 540 and 550. Educated in conformity with his social state, he was instructed in dialectics and rhetoric, studied law, entered the civil service, gained the confidence of the Emperor Justin, and received (about 574) the dignity of a praetor urbis. But he also studied the Fathers of the Western Church, — Augustine, Ambrose, and Jerome. His family was markedly religious: his mother, Sylvia, and his two paternal aunts, have been canonized. The deepest instincts of his own nature revolted against the luxury and ambition of his office. He determined to flee from the world, and become a monk. He employed the immense wealth left to him by his father's death to found six Benedictine monasteries in Sicily, and a seventh in his own house in Rome. In the latter he became a monk himself; and so severe were the ascetic exercises he practised, that his health became impaired, and even his life was in danger. At this moment the Pope, Pelagius II., interfered, dragged him out of the monastery by ordaining him a deacon (579), and sent him to Constantinople as apocriarius. The mission he fulfilled with great ability; and while in Constantinople he began his celebrated work Expositio in Job or Moraliu Libri XXXV. After his return to Rome (585) he continued to take a leading part in all the business of the curia; and after the death of Pelagius II. he was unanimously elected Pope, by the clergy, the senate, and the people, and compelled to accept.

The position of the Bishop of Rome was at that time by no means an easy one. Pressed on one side by the Arian and half-barbarian Lombards, he was not free on the other, but had to yield in many ways to the authority of the Byzantine emperor and his representative in Italy, the exarch of Ravenna. Nevertheless, the position was not without its opportunities; and Gregory knew how to utilize them. The Pope was the greatest landed proprietor in Italy. From his estates, not only in Campania, Apulia, Calabria, Sicily, and Sardinia, but also in Gaul, Dalmatia, and Northern Africa, immense sums flowed into his treasury; and Gregory proved an excellent administrator, strict, and with an eye for the minutest details. To this wealth was added a certain prestige not ecclesiastical. On account of the weakness and inability of the exarchs, the Pope became the real ruler of Rome; and this rôle was quite natural to Gregory, who had been prator urbis before he became Pope. Thus he stood almost as an independent power, mediating between the Lombards and the Byzantines. Through Theodelinde, a Bavarian princess, belonging to the Orthodox Church, and the wife of King Agilulf, he exercised some influence on the Lombards; though at one time (593), just while he was delivering his homilies on Ezekiel, he had to buy off Agilulf from the gates of Rome with an immense sum of gold and silver. In Constantinople, too, he could give his voice some weight; though his relations with the Emperor Mauritius became more and more troubled, especially after the controversy with John Jejunator.

John IV., Patriarch of Constantinople, liked to call himself the "œcumenical patriarch." But he was neither the first to assume this title, nor the only one to whom it had been applied: his predecessor, Menas, had borne it 536; and it had been given to Leo I. by the Council of Chalcedon 451, to Hormisdas by the Syrian monks 517, and to Boniface II. by the metropolitan of Larissa in 531. Gregory, however, who called himself servus servorum Dei (not as a rebuke to the Constantinopolitan patriarch, but simply in imitation of Augustine), took umbrage at this title, complained of it to Mauritius (595), and attacked John IV. with a somewhat extraordinary vehemence. John died in the same year; but his successor, Cyriacus, continued the title, and Gregory became more and more irritated, especially as Mauritius declined to interfere. In November, 602, Mauritius was overthrown by Phocas; and not only was he himself beheaded, but also his wife, his five sons, and his three daughters. The new emperor, however, the usurper, the murderer, was hailed by the Pope with letters of congratulation, whose fulsomeness and flattery and adulation can be explained only on the supposition that Gregory, when he wrote the letters, was ignorant of the wanton cruelty which had accompanied the usurpation, — a supposition which, in view of the times, by no means is improbable.

In a similar way his relation to Brunehild must be explained. Brunehild was simply a monster. The crimes she committed during the reign of her son, Childebert II. (575-596), and her two grandsons, Theudebert II. and Theuderic II., earned for her the name of the "Frankish Fury," the "new Jezebel." And to this woman Gregory wrote letters full of praise and flattery. But what did he know of her? Probably nothing more than what he learnt from her own letters; and in these she simply asked for some relics for a church, or the pallium for St. Syagrius of Autun, or a privilege for some monastery, or a papal legate to a Frankish synod; while she promised to support the English mission, to build churches and monasteries, to abolish simony, to introduce celibacy, to refrain from giving ecclesiastical offices and benefices to laymen, etc. To him Brunehild may have looked as he described her, — a very pious woman.

The two brightest points, however, in Gregory's relations with foreign countries, are Spain and England. Through the influence of Bishop Leander of Seville, an intimate friend of Gregory since they first met in Constantinople, Reccared, King of the Visigoths, was led to abandon Arianism, and join the Catholics. In a letter dated 599, the king communicated his conversion to the Pope; and at the same time he sent a goblet of gold as a present to St. Peter. Gregory answered most graciously, and sent abbot Cyriacus to Spain with the pallium to Leander. The synod of Barcelona, held in the same year under the presidency of the metropolitan Asiaticus of Tarragona, and treating the questions of simony and laymen's investiture with ecclesiastical benefices, was probably connected with the sending of Cyriacus. England had already attracted the attention of Gregory while he was yet a monk. The sight of the Anglo-Saxon boys exhibited in the slave-markets of Rome had moved him to pity, and he determined to go to England as a missionary. He actually started on the way, but was recalled by the Pope. When he became Pope himself, he sent (596) Augustine and forty other monks to King Ethelbert of Kent; and already the next year Augustine could report the baptism of the king and ten thousand of his subjects. How great an interest Gregory took in the English mission appears from his letters to Augustine, which are full of the most detailed instructions.

However successful Gregory was in extending the influence and authority of the Roman see throughout the Western countries, that which he accomplished for the internal organization and consolidation of the Church was, nevertheless, of far greater importance. The delicate question of the dependence of the Western metropolitan sees on the see of Rome, he handled with great adroitness. In North Africa, whose clergy were extremely jealous of their independence, he acted with great caution, and in strict conformity with the canons of the Council of Sardica (347). Gennadius the exarch, and the two most prominent bishops in the province, Dominicus of Carthage, and Columbus of Numidia, were firm friends of his; and many appeals were made to the Roman see. But the parties were never summoned to Rome: the cases were treated in loco, and by papal legates. Quite otherwise in the diocese of Ravenna. He forbade the Archbishop John, in a rather sharp manner, to wear the pallium, except when celebrating mass; and when a conflict arose between John's successor, Marinianus, and a certain abbot, Claudius, he summoned both parties to Rome to plead their cause before him personally. He attempted the same in Illyria, on occasion of a contested episcopal election at Salona (593); but in that case the Emperor Mauritius interfered, and to his great chagrin and humiliation he was compelled to make a compromise.

Gregory's ideas of a papal supremacy may have been somewhat vague; but his instincts were strong, and pointed all towards the loftiest goal. Very characteristic in this respect were his exertions to separate the monks from the clergy proper. He had been a monk himself, and he knew to what temptations and illusions human nature is exposed by monastic life: consequently he fixed the term of the novitiate at two years, and for soldiers at three. He forbade youths under eighteen years to enter a monastery, and married men, unless with the consent of their wives. He ordered all ecclesiastical officials to seize those monks, who, often in great swarms, roamed about in the country, and really were neither more nor less than tramps of the most indolent and impertinent description, and to deliver them up to the nearest monastery for punishment. Thus he did much for the reform of the monks, but he did still more for their emancipation. One monastery after the other was exempted from the episcopal authority; and at the synod of Rome (601) the power of the bishop over the abbeys was generally confined to the installation of the abbot. It was evidently his idea to form out of the monks a powerful instrument which might be wielded by the Pope independently of the clergy. On the other hand, he transferred some of the most marked characteristics of monastic life to the clergy, as, for instance, the celibacy, for whose introduction he was exceedingly anxious. For the clergy he wrote, shortly after his accession to the papal throne, his famous book, Regula Pastoralis, which for centuries was regarded as the moral code of the clergy. The Emperor Mauritius had it translated into Greek (Alfred the Great translated it himself into Anglo-Saxon), and Hincmar of Rheims states in 870 that every Frankish bishop took an oath on it at his consecration. Preaching he considered as the principal duty of the priest, and he gave in this respect a brilliant example himself. Besides the above-mentioned homilies on Ezekiel, forty homilies on the Gospels have come down to us.

As a theologian Gregory was without originality: nevertheless he exercised also in this field a beneficial influence by spreading the interest in Augustine. He is sometimes called the "inventor of purgatory;" but, though his doctrines of an intermediate state between death and doom are very explicit, they are hardly more than modifications of the ideas of Augustine. His dogmatical views he set forth in his Dialogorum de vita et miraculis patrum Italicorum et de aeternitate animarum. Otherwise, with his influence on the ceremonial side of Christianity, it amounted at some points to a complete revolution. It is doubtful how much of the Sacramentarium Gregorianum really belongs to Gregory, and how much has been borrowed from the Sacramentarium of Gelasius I. The case is somewhat similar with respect to his Liber Antiphonarius. Nevertheless, it is beyond doubt that he founded a singing-school in Rome, the effect of which was that the Gregorian Chant, the cantus planus, with its grave, solemn rhythm, all tones having equal length, superseded the Ambrosian Chant, the cantus figuratus.

Lit.—The principal source is, of course, found in Gregory's own works, especially in his letters, numbering eight hundred and fifty. The best editions are those by Dom Denis de Ste. Marthe (Dionysius Sanmarthanus, Paris, 1705, 4 vols. fol.) and by Galliccioli (Venice, 1768-76, 17 vols. 4to). Gregory II. (May 19, 715-Feb. 10, 731) was a Benedictine monk, and rebuilt Monte Cassino, which had been destroyed by the Lombards. He was the first Pope who addressed himself to the Franks for aid against the Lombards, but he did not succeed. His letters are found in JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont. Roman., his life, in VIGNOLI: Lib. Pont., II. — Gregory III. (Feb. 11, 731-Nov. 28, 741) was a Syrian by birth. He, too, asked the Franks for aid against the Lombards, but with as little success as his predecessor. A work he wrote, according to Anastasius, on the legitimacy of image-worship, seems to have been lost. —

Gregory IV. (827-844) was, by his ambition to act as a divinely appointed arbiter, led to interfere in the dismal family troubles of the Frankish dynasty, and became, perhaps unwillingly and unwittingly, the tool with which Lothaire accomplished his treachery on the fields of Colmar. His life is found in VIGNOLI: Lib. Pont., III. — Gregory V. (May 3, 996-Feb. 18, 999), a son of Duke Otho of Carinthia, and a near relative of Otho III.; was the first German pope. He was placed on the throne by Otho III.; but the emperor had hardly left Italy before the Roman nobility rose in rebellion, headed by Crescentius, and an antipope (John XVI.) was elected. But the emperor returned, the rebellion was quelled, Crescentius was beheaded, and John XVI. was dragged through the streets of Rome, mutilated, and imprisoned. JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Roman. —

Gregory VI. (1044-46) bought the papal crown from Benedict IX., and ruled for a year and a half with prudence and tolerable success. But he did not please the Roman nobility, and they allured Benedict IX. to return. The emperor, Henry III., was called in as arbiter; and Gregory VI. met him at Piacenza, and accompanied him to Sutri. There he openly confessed in the council that he had bought the papal dignity in order to save it; and, when all the bishops agreed in condemning such a measure, he laid aside the papal insignia, and went with the emperor to Germany, where he died at Cologne, 1048. — There was also an antipope of the name, Gregory VI., under Benedict VIII., but only for a short time. See THUETMARUS: Merseburg. Chron., in PERTZ: Mon. Germ. Script., III. G. VOIGT.

Gregory VII. (April 22, 1073-May 25, 1085). His true name was Hildebrand; and he was born of humble parentage, either at Saona or in Rome. He was chaplain to Gregory VI., accompanied him on his journey to Cologne, and entered, after his death, the monastery of Clugny. There Leo IX. became acquainted with him in the time of the synod of Rheims (1049). He returned to Italy, was made a deacon and cardinal, and soon he became the very soul of the papal government. A man of lofty spirit and inexhaustible energy, he knew how to avail himself of every chance in his favor, without ever deviating from his own plans on account of adverse circumstances. Though on many points the results of his labor did not show until years after his death, the ideas which in this period remodelled the Christian world sprung from his brain, and were set a-working by his hands.

He succeeded in breaking the influence of the Roman nobility and the German court on the papal election. When Stephen X. died (1058), the nobility chose Benedict X.; and the cardinals, headed by Hildebrand, Nicholas II. Aided by the Empress Agnes, Hildebrand got, by bribery and force, his candidate installed in Rome; and one of the first measures of Nicholas II. was a decree by which the papal election was put entirely into the hands of the cardinals and the German emperor, to the exclusion of the Roman nobility. Nicholas II. died in 1061. One party among the cardinals immediately sent the papal insignia to the Empress Agnes in order that she should appoint a new pope; while another party, headed by Hildebrand, assembled in a regular conclave, and chose Bishop Anselm of Lucca, who assumed the name of Alexander II., Oct. 1, 1061. The empress chose Bishop Cadalus of Parma, Oct. 21; and at the head of an imperial army he entered Rome. But in May, 1062, a revolution in Germany bereft the Empress Agnes of her power, and placed Archbishop Anno of Cologne at the head of the government during the minority of Henry IV. By the Councils of Augsburg (October, 1062) and Mantua (May, 1064), Alexander II. was recognized as the legitimate Pope.

Alexander II. died April 22, 1073; and the very same day Hildebrand was elected Pope. He assumed the name of Gregory VII., and was consecrated June 29, 1073. But the consent of the German emperor was not asked for: indeed, the relation between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. was from the very beginning strained, and fraught with danger to them both. The abbey of Reichenau, on the Lake of Constance, became vacant in 1071; and a monk (Robert of Bamberg) got himself appointed abbot by bribing the councillors of the King. But the monks of Reichenau denounced the new abbot in Rome, and Alexander II. put him under the ban. As now the royal councillors would not give up the estates they had received from Robert, they, too, were put under the ban; and, as the king would not dismiss his councillors, even he fell under the ban. Such was the state of affairs when Gregory VII. ascended the throne. By the mediation, however, of the Empress Agnes, a reconciliation was effected. Henry IV. humiliated himself, did penance, and was absolved; and peace reigned for some time while the contestants were gathering strength.

Gregory was very zealous for the establishment of celibacy. He saw the necessity of this measure for the consolidation of the Church in her contest with the State; and in 1074 he issued a decree that no layman should frequent the service, or receive the sacraments, when administered by a married priest: he even encouraged the laity to compel by force the priests to send away their wives. The decree was obeyed only with too much willingness; and in many places, especially in Southern Germany, the priests suffered unspeakably from the violence and wantonness of the knights and the rabble. But this extraordinary means of enforcing his authority over the clergy, by the aid of the laity, raised a great hatred against Gregory in the ranks of the lower clergy; and they addressed themselves to Henry IV. for aid. Among the king's most intimate friends was one of the Pope's bitterest enemies, Duke Gottfried of Lower Lorraine. In 1074 he had married Mathilde, the daughter of margravine Beatrice of Tuscany; but Mathilde refused to remain with him, and returned to her mother. On account of the intimate friendship which existed between Gregory on the one side and Beatrice and Mathilde on the other, and the absolute sway he bore over the minds of those two women, Duke Gottfried was not altogether wrong when he laid the blame of his disturbed marriage relations on the Pope: at all events, he hated him. Another cause of estrangement between Gregory VII. and Henry IV. was the law of investiture, which Gregory issued in 1075, though it was not generally enforced until 1078. According to this law, no prince or layman could make any appointment to an ecclesiastical office, nor could any ecclesiastical receive his office from a layman. The affairs of Milan finally brought the gathering storm to burst forth (1075). In 1071 the see of Milan became vacant, and in the same year Henry IV. appointed Gottfried, a priest of Milan, archbishop. In 1073 Gregory appointed Atto, another Milanese priest. Neither the one nor the other had any authority in the diocese; and, in order to put an end to the confusion, Henry IV. appointed a third archbishop, Tedald. But this measure was met by Gregory VII. with the most determined protest.

Henry IV. seems entirely to have miscalculated the strength of his adversary. Jan. 1, 1076, at Gosslar, he undertook to depose the Pope; and Jan. 24, a number of German bishops and priests signed at Worms a complaint that Gregory was not legitimately elected, since he had not the consent of the German emperor, which, according to the decree of Nicholas II., he should have. Gregory VII. answered simply by putting Henry IV. and his adherents under the ban. A number of the German princes at once withdrew their allegiance, and invited the Pope to be present at the diet of Augsburg (Feb. 2, 1077), to give judgment in the case. Henry, who understood that such a diet would not only be an humiliation and a danger to him, but complete ruin, hastened to Italy in December, 1076, found the Pope at Canossa (one of the castles of Mathilde), presented himself, clad in sackcloth, with bare feet, and ashes on his head, in the courtyard, and was, after three days' waiting, admitted to the Pope's presence, and absolved. The German princes, fearing the revenge of Henry IV., chose an anti-king, March 15, 1077; and a war began which lasted till 1080. During these years, Gregory VII. constantly urged the convocation of a diet, in which he himself would adjust matters; and, when he discovered that Henry never would consent to appear before such an assembly, he put him a second time under the ban, in the spring of 1080. But Oct. 15, in the battle on the Elster, he succeeded in defeating the anti-king, and suppressing the rebellion; and in the spring of 1081 he stood in Italy at the head of a great army, having in the mean time made Clement III. anti-pope. He besieged Rome four years in succession, occupied the Leonine part of the city, and shut the Pope up in the castle of St. Angelo; but he was finally driven away by Robert Guiscard, who rescued Gregory VII., and brought him to Salerno, where he died. Gregory VIII. (Oct. 21-Dec. 17, 1187). There was also an antipope of that name, Mauritius Burdinus, Archbishop of Braga, raised to the papal throne by Henry V., March 8, 1118, afterwards deserted by the emperor, deposed by Calixtus II., and dragged from one prison to another until his death, 1125. See Vita Burdini, in BALUZE: Miscellan., III.; and JAFFÉ: Regest. Pontif. — GREGORY IX. (March 19, 1227-Aug. 22, 1241) was eighty years old when he ascended the papal throne, but proved a match for Frederic II. of Hohenstaufen, both in courage and energy. Frederic had vowed a crusade, but seemed inclined to make light of his vow. Admonished by the Pope, he embarked at Brindisi, but landed a few days afterwards at Otranto, on account of sickness, as he said. Sept. 29, 1227, the Pope put him under the ban; and though he succeeded in expelling Gregory from Rome, first to Viterbo, then to Perugia, the ban was not removed. June 28, 1228, he embarked a second time, reached the Holy Land, made a brilliant campaign, and was crowned king of Palestine in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; but the ban still pursued him. After his return, however, Hermann of Salza, the grand-master of the Teutonic order, brought about a reconciliation (Sept. 1, 1230), and the ban was removed. But when, in 1238, he experienced some military and political reverses in Upper Italy, Gregory IX. again placed himself at the head of his enemies, and the ban was renewed (1239). Frederic II. immediately advanced against Rome; and the old Pope was a prisoner in his own capital when he died. His decretals were collected by Raymundus de Pennaforte, and published in five books in 1231. Of his letters, about 4,550 in number, 3,200 are found in POTTHAST: Regest. Pontif. Roman., I.; lives of him in MURATORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III. — GREGORY X. (Sept. 1, 1271-Jan. 10, 1276) was elected after a vacancy of three years, caused by the contention between the French and Italian parties among the cardinals. He tried to reconcile the Guelphs and the Ghibellines for the sake of a new crusade; and at the second Council of Lyons (1274) he labored to effect a union between the Eastern and Western churches: but in both respects he failed. His life is found in MURATORI: Script. Rer. Ital., III.; his letters, in POTTHAST: Reg. Ponti. Rom., II. — GREGORY XI. (Dec. 30, 1370-March 27, 1378) removed the papal residence from Avignon, and entered Rome, Jan. 27, 1377. Five lives of him are found in BALUZE: Vite Papar. Avenion., I. — GREGORY XII. (Dec. 2, 1406) was deposed by the Council of Pisa, June 5, 1409, but protested; resigned before the Council of Constance, July 4, 1415; and died, as cardinal-bishop of Porto, Oct. 18, 1417. — GREGORY XIII. (May 13, 1572-April 10, 1585) founded twenty-two Jesuit colleges; celebrated the Massacre of St. Bartholomew with processions and medals; supported Henry III. against the Huguenots, etc. In 1582 he finished that improvement of the Julian Calendar which the councils of Constance, Basel, and Trent, and many popes, had labored on; and in the same year he issued a new and improved edition in folio of the Corpus juris canonici. His works are found in EGGS: Pontific. doctum. His life was written by CIAPPI (1591), BOMPIANO (1655), MAFFEI (1742), DE VIDAILLAN (1840). — GREGORY XIV. (Dec. 5, 1590-Oct. 15, 1591) was entirely in the hands of the Spanish party and the leaguers of France. His bulls are found in CHERUBINI: Bullar. Magn., II. — GREGORY XV. (Feb. 9, 1621-July 8, 1623) was an old and sickly man, and left the business to his young and energetic nephew, Ludovico, who most heartily supported the Jesuits in their exertions to restore the Roman Church in Bohemia, Hungary, Austria, Bavaria, France, and the Netherlands. The congregatio de propaganda fide was founded, and some improvements were introduced in the organization of the conclave. His bulls are found in CHERUBINI: Bull. Magnum. III. G. VOIGT.

Gregory XVI. (Feb. 2, 1831-June 1, 1816) was an old monk when he ascended the throne; b. at Belluno, Sept. 18, 1765; since 1823 general of his order, the Camaldolensians; since 1826 prefect of the propaganda, and known as author of the Il trionfo della santa Sede, etc., 1799. He was very successful in his government of the church in general. Thirty new apostolic vicariates, fifteen new missionary bishoprics, and forty-three new colleges for the education of missionaries, were founded. Though in Portugal he took the side of Don Miguel, and in Spain that of Don Carlos, he knew how to change position before the critical moment came. In France, too, the power of the Roman Church and the influence of the Jesuits were steadily growing. But his government of the States of the Church was fatal. Rebellion broke out immediately after his accession, and was kept down only by a permanent occupation of Bologna by Austria, and of Ancona by France. The public debt increased to 38,000,000 scudi. A loan from the Rothschilds gave only 65 on 100. The annual deficit was about 500,000 scudi. One of the items of revenue was the lottery, which brought in 1,120,000, but cost 850,000 in management. GREGORY, Olinthus Gilbert, b. at Yaxley, Huntingdonshire, Eng., Jan. 29, 1771; became professor of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich, 1807, where he died, Feb. 2, 1841. He is noted religiously for his Lives of Robert Hall (prefixed to a collected edition of Hall's works, separately published 1833) and John Mason Good (1828), and for his Letters to a Friend on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Duties of the Christian Religion (1815, 2 vols., 9th ed., 1851, abridgment, 1853).

GRELLET, Stephen (Étienne de), b. at Limoges, France, Nov. 2, 1773; d. at Burlington, N.J., Nov. 16, 1855. Born in the French nobility, at seventeen he was one of the royal body-guard. After a variety of adventures, he landed in New York 1795, in which year he was converted, and joined the Society of Friends. His ministrations during the yellow-fever visitation in Philadelphia, 1798, revealed his rare qualities. He rose to great eminence, and acquired wealth. He felt called upon to preach, and to this end made long journeys through the United States, and even to Europe, which he visited several times. On one occasion, being presented to the Pope, he had the courage to preach even in such a presence; similarly he exhorted the Czar of Russia. See Memoirs of Stephen Grellet, by B. SEEBORN, Philadelphia, 1860, 2 vols.

GRESWELL, Edward, chronologist; b. at Denton, near Manchester, Eng., 1797; d. at Oxford, June 29, 1869. He was fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1823, and at the time of his death vice-principal. His works are very valuable. Those on chronology are Fasti Temporis Catholicici (1852), Origines Kalendarie Italice (1851, 4 vols.), Origines Kalendarie Hellenice (1862, 6 vols.). Those on the Bible are Dissertations on the Principles and Arrangement of a Harmony of the Gospels (1830, 2d ed., 1837, 4 vols., the 4th vol. in 2 parts), Harmonia Evangelica (1830, 5th ed., 1856), Exposition of the Parables (1834, 1835, 5 vols.), Prolegomena ad Harmoniam Evangelicam (1840), The Three Witnesses and the Threefold Cord (1862, a reply to Bishop Colenso on the Pentateuch).

GRETZER, Jakob, b. at Markdorf, near Constance, 1560; d. at Ingolstadt, Jan. 29, 1625; entered the Society of Jesu in 1577, and was appointed professor at the university of Ingolstadt, first in philosophy, then in morals, and finally in dogmatics. He was a learned man and a prolific writer. His works, of which a collected edition appeared at Ratisbon (1734-39, in 17 vols. fol.), number over one hundred and fifty. Some of them are valuable; as, for instance, De Sancta Cruce; also his Greek grammar was much used. But he acquired his great fame principally by his obstinate and somewhat rude opposition to Protestantism.

GRIESBACH, Johann Jakob, a distinguished textual critic of the New Testament; was b. at Butzbach, Hesse-Darmstadt, Jan. 4, 1745; d. at Jena, March 21, 1812. After studying in Tübingen, Halle, and Leipzig, he travelled extensively on the Continent and in England. In 1771 he settled at Halle as docent, residing with Semler, and two years afterwards was made professor. In 1775 a call attracted him to Jena, where, laden with titles and honors, he labored during the remainder of his life.

Griesbach's labors in the textual criticism of the Greek New Testament mark the beginning of a new period in that department. Bengel before him had introduced some changes into the Elzevir text from the Complutensian Polyglot; but all others he only placed in the margin. Griesbach was the first in Germany to edit a Greek Testament embodying in the text the results of critical study. Following, to some extent, the previous labors of Bengel and Semler, he grouped the manuscripts in three classes,—the Occidental, characterized by glosses; the Alexandrian, by grammatical corrections; and the Byzantine, combining the readings of the other two (a division recently adopted in Westcott and Hort's New Testament, Ed.). He only altered the Elzevir text when the arguments were imperative. His critical theory rested upon a combination of logical principles and historical facts; the agreement of Occidental and Alexandrian manuscripts being regarded as especially important, and frequently decisive. Griesbach's bold effort called forth violent criticisms from the advocates of the inviolability of the received text, among which may be mentioned a work by Hartmann, professor in Rostock, which appeared in 1775. But for once and all time, in Germany, he answered such objections in the second edition. The editions of Griesbach's text appeared in the following order: Libri N. T. Historici, Halle, 1774, 1775; principal edition, Halle and London, 1796, 1806, 2 vols., with extensive critical apparatus and important prolegomena; in elegant form, Leipzig, 1803-07, 4 vols.; small editions, Leipzig, 1805 and 1825; a new edition, by David Schulz, 1827, of which only the first part appeared. Other critical works by Griesbach: De Codd. Evv. Origenianis, 1771; Cura in Hist. Textus Epp. Paul., 1777; Synbolæ Criticæ ad Supplendas et Corrigenendas Varias N. T. Lectiones, 1785-93; Commentarius critic. in Text. Gr., 1794 sqq., only includes Matthew and Mark. His other writings were edited by Gabler, Jena, 1825, 2 vols. In theology Griesbach took a position midway between the conservative and radical schools. See AUGUSTI: Ueber Griesbach's Verdienste, Breslau, 1812. ED. REUSS.

GRIFFIN, Edward Dorr, a distinguished pulpit orator, and president of Williams College; b. Jan. 6, 1770, at East Haddam, Conn.; d. Nov. 8, 1837, at Newark, N.J. He graduated with the highest honors, at Yale, 1790, and studied theology under Dr. Edwards, afterwards president of Union College. In 1794 he accepted a call to the Congregational Church at Farmington; but the council having twice refused to ordain him, on account of alleged erroneous views on baptism and the doctrines of grace, he withdrew, with its consent, and in 1795 was installed pastor of a church in New Hartford. In 1801 he became colleague of Dr. McWhorter, in the First Presbyterian Church in Newark, and pastor in 1807. Here, as before in New Hartford, extensive revivals prevailed under his ministry. In 1809 he became the first incumbent of the chair of pulpit eloquence at Andover Seminary, which he exchanged for the pastorate of Park-street Church, Boston, in 1811. In 1815 he returned to Newark as pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, and in 1821 was elected president of Williams College, holding the office till 1836.

The institution at that time had only forty-eight students, and was in a critical condition. A powerful revival occurred in 1824. Dr. Griffin succeeded in putting the college on a firm basis.

Dr. Griffin was one of the most eloquent preachers of his day. To a commanding presence (he was six feet three inches tall) he added a vivid imagination and fine reasoning powers. His sermons are simple, fervid, and evangelical. In theology he opposed the "New Divinity," as it was called, of New Haven. He published Lectures delivered in Park-street Church, Boston, 1813; The Extent of the Atonement, New York, 1819. His Sermons, with Memoir of his Life, were edited by Dr. SPRAGUE, in 2 vols., Albany, 1838. See also COOKE: Recollections of E. D. Griffin, Boston, 1866.

GRINDAL, Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury; b. at St Bees about 1519; d. at Croyden, July 6, 1583. He was educated at Magdalen College, Cambridge, of which Dr. Ridley was master. In 1552 he was appointed chaplain to Ridley, who had become Bishop of London, and prebendary of Westminster. The year following he took refuge on the Continent, spending his exile at Strassburg and Frankfurt. Part of his time was occupied in labors tributary to Foxe's Book of Martyrs. Returning to England, in 1558 he became master of Pembroke Hall, and, in 1560, Bishop of London. In 1570 he was, by Archbishop Parker's influence, raised to the see of York, from which he was transferred, in 1575, to that of Canterbury. Grindal corresponded with the Reformers on the Continent, and was in sympathy with Puritanism (Dean Hook), at least so far as to be unwilling to discourage it by measures in the interests of uniformity in ritual. His bold refusal to put down "prophesyings" brought upon him the wrath of Elizabeth, who at first determined to depose him from his archbishopric, but was satisfied with suspending him. A few months before his death she opened negotiations with him to resign his see. Grindal was a man of courteous and conciliatory spirit. His literary remains, which are unimportant, appeared in Cambridge, 1843, in the Parker Society Series. STRYPE: Life and Acts of Abp. Grindal, 1710, Oxford, 1821; NEAL: Hist. of Puritans, vol. 1.; A Brief and True Account of Edm. Grindal, 1710; HOOK: Lives of Abpp. of Canterbury, vol. V.

GROEN VAN PRINSTERER, Guillaume, b. in The Hague, Aug. 21, 1801; d. there May 19, 1876; studied at Leyden; was appointed secretary to the king in 1827, and soon afterwards director of the royal archives; was, in the Dutch Parliament, the leader of the anti-revolutionary party, and opposed with great zeal the separation of State and Church, the emancipation of the school from the Church, etc. He was a Christian statesman, and occupied in Holland a position similar to that of Professor Stahl in Prussia. His idea that the Church ought to be the foundation and informing-power of the State is very apparent in his Handboek der Geschiedenis van het vaderland, Amsterdam, 1852. He also published Archives de la maison d'Orange-Nassau, 1840-55, 13 vols.; Maurice et Barneveldt, Utrecht, 1875.

GROOT, Coert. See BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE.

GROPPER, Johann, b. at Soest, February,

1502; d. in Rome, March, 1559; studied theology and canon law at Cologne, and was appointed, first canon, then archdeacon there. He was a reform friend of the Erasmian type; represented the conciliatory element at the deputations of Hagenau, Worms, and Regensburg, and encouraged the archbishop Hermann von Wied in his plans of reform, as long as these touched only points of doctrine. But when Butzer began to preach in Cologne (1542), and the archbishop seemed inclined to undertake a re-organization of the hierarchical system, Gropper denounced them to the Pope and the emperor; and when Hermann von Wied was deposed, and Adolf von Schaumburg put in his place, Gropper became a decided opponent to ecclesiastical reform in any shape. His principal work is Institutio catholica, 1550.

GROSSETESTE, Robert, called also GREAT-HEAD, Bishop of Lincoln, one of the most independent and distinguished English prelates in the middle ages; b. about 1175; d. at Buckden, Oct. 9, 1253. He was famous as a scholar, and, in the administration of his see, as a reformer of ecclesiastical abuses; and although, during the greater part of his career, a loyal and submissive son of Rome, he broke away in the last period, and not only spoke out boldly against the corruption of the papal court, but refused to obey its commands. He was of humble birth. The first we know of him is as a student of Oxford, from which he passed to the University of Paris. Returning to England, he entered the service of the Bishop of Hereford, at whose death, shortly after, he went to Oxford as a teacher.

The first period of his public life dates from this point. It is the period of scholarly activity, extending over a number of years. He was master of the schools (rector scholarum), or chancellor, and, to quote the chronicler Trivet, was "a man of excellent wisdom, and of most lucid power of teaching," etc. His attainments included an acquaintance of Greek and Hebrew. With the assistance of others he put forth translations of Aristotle, the De Orthodoxa Fide of John of Damascus, and other works. He also wrote original works, such as the De Cessatione Legalium (a book designed for the conversion of the Jews), a collection of theological Dicta, and the French poem, Le Chastel d'Amour. He also enjoyed, according to Roger Bacon, a great reputation for scientific attainments. On the arrival of the Franciscan friars in Oxford (1224), Grosseteste was chosen as their instructor in divinity and homiletics. During the Oxford period he held several preferments,—two prebends in Lincoln, the archdeaconries of Wilts (1214) and Northampton (1221), etc. Ascetic enthusiasm, perhaps the result of a severe attack of fever, induced him to resign them all, except a prebend in Lincoln.

The second period begins with Grosseteste's elevation to the see of Lincoln, in 1235, by the vote of its dean and chapter. His episcopal administration was marked by great zeal in advancing its spiritual interests, and not seldom by the use of arbitrary and high-handed measures. From the first he attacked the corruption, and condemned the incompetency, of the clergy. He instituted a systematic visitation of his diocese, and a careful scrutiny of the religious houses. With the monastic institutions he was especially severe, not only condemning the unclerical amusements and immoral lives of the monks, but endeavoring to do away with the evils of "farming" by endowing parishes, that they might secure pastors who would care for the souls of the people. To this end he used the revenues of the monasteries. Grosseteste, however, was not a foe to religious orders, but only to their abuses. He sought zealously to raise the standard, and increase the efficiency, of the ministry, by refusing to appoint to livings those whose youth, worldliness, or illiteracy made them unfit, and by removing corrupt and incompetent incumbents. Within a short time after his consecration, he deposed seven abbots and four priors. This vigorous administration aroused opposition. The bishop's life was even attempted by poison. Some of the monasteries endeavored to evade his visitation; but he was equal to such emergencies, and, as in the case of Hertford, placed the whole town under interdict, or, as in the case of the abbot of Bardney, deposed him in spite of the sentence of excommunication against himself, pronounced by the Convent of Canterbury (the see being vacant), to which the abbot had appealed.

Grosseteste's hottest conflict of this kind was with the dean and chapter of Lincoln, who denied him the right of visitation. He suspended the dean, excommunicated the proctor, and finally went to Lyons (1245) to secure a papal decision of the case. The bishop displayed an overbearing temper in this affair; and the abbot of Leicester had ground for blaming him, in a letter, for having "a heart of iron, and one lacking pity." He secured a judgment in his favor from the Pope, but, as it would seem, at the expense of his own independence; for he appears as a servile agent of papal designs in the period immediately following. He lent his name to a scheme for laying the English dioceses under tribute (ten thousand marks) to pay off the debts of the see of Canterbury, whose occupant at this time was the unscrupulous Boniface of Savoy, and also declared himself in favor of levying a special tax for the Pope, and, on his return, instituted measures for carrying it out. The former action he afterwards bitterly regretted. He returned to England "thoroughly committed to the extremest papal obedience," etc. (Perry, p. 183). But his mind, in the years that immediately follow, underwent a complete change in its attitude towards the papal claims.

Grosseteste's relation to the State was one of independence. He rebuked ecclesiastics for holding civil offices, and asserted that to St. Peter belonged both swords, and that a bishop did not in any sense derive his authority from the civil power. He not only dared to refuse to execute the royal commands in his diocese, as the one regarding the legitimization of children, but fearlessly told the king the plainest truths, and on more than one occasion refused to install his appointees in office, threatening even to excommunicate the royal offender if he did not withdraw. He was, in fact, a formidable antagonist for the king to grapple with.

The last period in the bishop's life dates from about 1248, and is marked by opposition to Rome as bold and defiant as his former vassalage had been loyal and unquestioning. Deeply resenting the corruption of the papal tax-agents and the abuse of clerical exemptions, he started on another visit to the Pope to Lyons in 1250. Here his eyes were fully opened to the corruption of the papal court. With characteristic intrepidity he delivered a sermon in which he arraigned "the Roman pontiff and his court for being the fountain and origin of all the evils of the Church, not only in that it does not put them away, but that by its dispensations, provisions, etc., appoints men who are not pastors but destroyers of their flocks." He urged that the work of a pastor did not consist merely in "celebrating the mass, but in teaching the living truth." Returning to his diocese, he assailed the Italian ecclesiastics that were fleecing English parishes. He found by computation that their revenues amounted to seventy thousand marks,—more than three times those of the king. But the present temper of Grosseteste was signally shown in his absolute refusal to induct Frederick di Lavagna into a stall at Lincoln, to which the Pope, his uncle, had appointed him. In a very plain letter the bishop tells the pontiff that it is his duty to make appointments for the edification, and not for the destruction, of the Church. Matthew Paris reports that the Pope was in high dudgeon on receiving this letter, and was only pacified by the cardinals, who reminded him of the fearless courage, the power, and popularity of the English prelate.

Like Luther, previous to the diet of Worms, so Grosseteste had trusted in the Pope, and hoped for relief from Rome against the ecclesiastical corruption of England. Once undeceived, he was drifting rapidly away from all veneration for the pontiff, when death overtook him. In a conversation on his death-bed with the scholarly cleric and physician, John de St. Giles, he gave a definition of heresy, and asked whether the Pope did not fulfil it. To those around him he lamented the doleful condition of the Church. He died uttering protests against the avarice, simony, lust, and worldliness of the papal court. "He was the open rebuker of both the Pope and the king, censor of prelates, corrector of monks, instructor of clerks, an unwearied examiner of the books of Scripture, a crusher and despiser of the Romans," so says the chronicler Matthew Paris. He was buried in great pomp at Lincoln; the Archbishop of Canterbury and several bishops being present at the funeral. This seems to disprove the statement that the Pope had excommunicated him. Miracles were reported to be performed at his grave; but in vain did prelates and King Edward I. (1307) apply for Grosseteste's canonization. The popular veneration was shown in the legend that the bishop appeared to the Pope on the night of his death, with the words, "Aryse, wretch, and come to thy done."

Grosseteste has been called a "harbinger of the Reformation." He certainly was a zealous reformer of ecclesiastical abuses in the diocese of Lincoln, and boldly protested against the corruptions of the papal court. In his large acquaintance with and constant appeal to the Scriptures he was in advance of his age. He was the first link in the chain of the Reformation in this sense, that Wiclif appealed to him, and quotes his protest against Rome, as, later, Luther quoted Hus, and Hus learned from Wiclif. In his impetuous and fearless temper he resembles Luther. Not only Wielif, but others, like Bishop Hall, delighted to find in the Bishop of Lincoln a support for their scriptural views, or, like Field, to use his name against the claims of the Pope to authority in the Church (Of the Church, vol. iv. pp. 354 sqq.).

GROTIUS, Hugo (Huig van Groot), a celebrated Dutch statesman, lawyer, and theologian; was b. at Delft, April 10, 1583; and d. at Rostock, Aug. 29, 1645. His career was intimately associated, and largely sympathized, with the fortunes of the Arminians. His contributions to exegetical and apologetic literature, to systematic theology and canon law, also give him an important place in the history of theological thought. His family was of noble extraction; his father a lawyer, who had occupied the positions of burgo-master and curator at the University of Leyden. Seldom has there been a more striking exhibition of precocity than that of Hugo. At nine he was making Latin verses; at sixteen he had edited Marcianus Capella; and at twenty-three was advocate-general of Holland. Joseph Scaliger was one of his professors. John of Barneveld early recognized his talents, and took him on a mission to France. Grotius devoted himself specially to the study of the law, but his tastes ran rather in the direction of literature. His earliest works, besides several editions of Latin authors, were three dramas (Christ Suffering, the Story of Joseph, and Adam Exiled), and a historical work on the Batavian republic (De Antiquitate Rep., Batavæ, 1610). But he soon became involved in the theological controversies which agitated Holland at that time. He espoused the cause of the Arminians. After the victory of the Gomarists (Calvinists), at the synod of Dort, he was condemned (1619) to perpetual imprisonment at Lowestein. During this imprisonment he composed several of his works. An ingenious artifice of his wife effected his escape. He concealed himself in a chest which had been frequently used to carry books and clothing to and from his cell. He was taken thus to the house of a friend, and escaped in the disguise of a mason to France. Louis XIII. granted him a pension of three thousand livres, and De Thou and others treated him kindly. The dislike of Richelieu obliged him to quit France, but the favor of Christina gave him a distinguished reception in Sweden. She sent him as ambassador to France, where he remained for ten years. He was recalled at his own request, intending to spend his remaining years in his native land. The vessel that bore him was driven out of its course by a storm. He became sick, got as far as Rostock on his journey, and there died, repeating the prayer,

"God be merciful to me a sinner." His body lies buried at Delft. — This is not the proper place to speak of the eminent services of Grotius as an expounder of the laws of nature and nations. He concerns us only as a theologian. His great exegetical work (Annotations upon the Old and New Testament) was for a considerable time unused, except by the Arminians. It became popular, however, on account of the author's manifest freedom from dogmatic prepossessions and his effort to get at the plain philological and historical sense. His apologetic work (De Veritate Rel. Christianæ) was projected in prison, but first published 1627. It was designed for seamen who came in contact with Mohammedans and heathens. It has been very popular down to a recent date, and was translated into French, English [Patrick; also by Clarke, reprinted, London, 1860], Chinese, Malay, Arabic (Pococke), and many other languages, as the best thing in its line. Grotius was an Arminian, but disclaimed Pelagianism, and, in his Defense of the Catholic Faith concerning the Satisfaction of Christ against Socinus (1617), denied any leanings toward Socinianism. Departing from the strict Anselmic theory, he substituted, in place of a real satisfaction on the part of Christ, a divine acquittal for Christ's sake. In Christ's death, which satisfied God's majesty, and exhibited his detestation of sin, he saw a terrible example of punishment designed to deter men from sin.

GROVES and TREES, Sacred. In the Hebrew Old Testament there is no mention of sacred groves, for the word so translated in the authorized version means properly an image to Asherah (see ASHERAH); but sacred trees are repeatedly mentioned. It will be only necessary to refer to the oak (A. V. "plain") at Moreh (Gen. xii. 6), at Mamre (xviii. 1), at Shechem, under which Jacob hid the "strange gods" of his family (xxxv. 4), at Bethel, under which Deborah was buried, and to the tree at Beersheba, which Abraham planted (xxi. 33), and where he and Isaac (xxvi. 25) and Jacob (xvii. 1) worshipped, in order to prove that from patriarchal times certain trees were regarded as holy, so that it was appropriate to worship under them; while to be buried beneath their spreading boughs was to lie in consecrated ground. The same phenomenon is observable in the later Israelitish history. Joshua set up a memorial-stone under the oak at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 26). The angel of the Lord appeared to Gideon under the oak at Ophrah (Judg. vi. 11), who built an altar there. Saul, under an oak (1 Sam. xiv. 2) and a tamarisk (xxii. 6), like Deborah under a palm-tree (Judg. iv. 5), held court. The inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead buried the ashes of Saul and his sons under the tamarisk-tree at Jabesh (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Worship under trees was commonly idolatrous (Dent. xii. 2; 1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvi. 4; 2 Chron. xxviii. 4; Isa. lvii. 4; Jer. ii. 20).

The Hebrews shared their veneration for trees with other Semitic races. Among them, however, trees were sacred to female divinities only, because the latter were the agents in transmitting to the earth the reproductive power of the male divinities; and the moon, as the seat of these female divinities, was considered as a star which dispensed dew, and was therefore the great help to the plant-world. See WOLF BAUDISSIN: Studien zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, Leipzig, 1876-79, 3 pts., II., 143 sqq., and his art. Haine, in Herzog, 2d ed., vol. 5, pp. 550-552.

GRUNDTVIG, Nicolai Frederik Severin, b. at Udby, a village in the Island of Sealand, Sept. 8, 1783; d. in Copenhagen, Sept. 2, 1872; studied theology in the university of Copenhagen, and was tutor in a private family in the Island of Langeland 1805-08, teacher of history in a school in Copenhagen 1808-10, vicar to his father at Udby 1810-13, and again teacher in Copenhagen 1813-21. He lived like a monk during those years of his youth and early manhood. For twenty years he never slept in a bed, and he slept only two hours in the night. He was not monkish, though: on the contrary, practical influence on real life was one of the deepest cravings of his nature. His powers as a poet and historian were the earliest to develop. From 1809 (Northern Mythology, and the grand drama, Fall of Heathenism in the North) to 1822 (the translations of Saxo Grammaticus, Snorre Sturleson, and Beowulf's Drapa) he published a series of poetical and historical works, most of them referring to the heroic age of Scandinavian history, and all of them pregnant with a peculiarly stirring life. Meanwhile the other side of his nature, his religious genius, was not altogether without manifestation. His occasional sermons attracted great attention; and his View of the World's Chronicle (1812, in one volume, 1817, in three) ran out in a vehement denunciation of the frivolity with which the age had eliminated Christianity from its life.

In 1821 Grundtvig was appointed pastor in Præstoe (a small town in Sealand), and in the next year he was called to the chaplaincy at the Church of our Saviour in Copenhagen. There he soon gathered a circle of friends and pupils around his pulpit; and day by day his position in the Danish Church became more and more strongly marked. In 1825 H. N. Clausen, professor in the university, and the noble and learned representative of the reigning rationalism, published his Catholicism and Protestantism, and Grundtvig answered with Kirkens Gjenmæle, a violent protest, an outburst of glowing indignation, a kind of volcanic eruption. Not the Scriptures, he declared, still less the theological expositions of them, form the foundation of Christianity, but the Church itself, such as it was founded by Christ and his apostles, and such as it has lived on, since that time, through its martyrs, confessors, and witnesses. His peculiar doctrines of baptism as the true foundation of the Church, of the Apostles' Creed as the true conditions of salvation, of the "living word" as the true vehicle of the Holy Spirit, he set forth in the most uncompromising opposition to what rationalism had to say about the axioms of reason, philosophical criticism, and grammatico-historical exegesis. The controversy occasioned a civil suit; and Grundtvig was sentenced to pay a fine, and to publish nothing without permission of the royal censor. He was finally suspended; but from that day there was in the Danish Church a party called "Grundtvigians," and a platform called "Grundtvigianism."

From 1826 to 1839 Grundtvig lived in literary retirement in Copenhagen. He visited England, and gave by his words and his writings a powerful impulse to the Anglo-Saxon study there; edited a theological monthly, in which his ideas found their proper exposition and suitable application; published True Christianity, his principal theological work, and an ornament to modern apologetics; the Sunday-Book, a collection of sermons which has found a larger circulation in Scandinavia than any other book of the kind; the Hymn-Book, a collection of hymns, partly original, partly translated, which gave to song in the Danish churches a new and very original character. Meanwhile his influence spread far beyond the capital, throughout the whole kingdom, and even to the neighboring countries, especially Norway, everywhere causing a spiritual revival, in which religion and patriotism, Christianity and nationality, are most happily blended together. In 1839 he was made pastor of the Varton in Copenhagen; and there he remained till his death, the head of a strong and well-organized party, which, especially in 1848, made itself felt in the church, in the school, and in politics, always bringing life and progress and reform with it. See DENMARK. In 1853 he was made a bishop. He was three times married, and over seventy years old when he baptized his youngest son.

GRYNÆUS is the name of a Suabian family which settled at Basel, and during two centuries produced several celebrated theologians there. — Simon Grynæus, b. at Vehrigen, 1493; d. at Basel, Aug. 1, 1541; was educated in the school of Pforzheim; studied theology, first in Vienna, afterwards at Wittenberg; was professor of Greek at Heidelberg (1524-29), and was called to Basel when Erasmus left that city on account of the introduction there of the Reformation. In 1531 he was made professor of theology; in 1534 he established the Reformation in Wurtemberg; in 1540 he partook in the disputation of Worms. His letters and a list of his works were published by W. Th. Streuber, Basel, 1847. — Johann Jacob Grynæus, b. at Bern, Oct. 1, 1540; d. at Basel, Aug. 13, 1617; studied at Basel and Tübingen, and was appointed preacher at Rötelen 1565, professor of the Old Testament at Basel 1575, at Heidelberg 1584, and professor of the New Testament at Basel 1586. Some of his letters were published by Scultetus 1612, others by Apinus 1720. A life of him, partly an autobiography, and containing a list of his numerous writings, appeared at Basel 1618.

GUALBERT, Giovanni, founded in the middle of the eleventh century the Cenobite order of Vallombrosa (callis umbrosa), in the Apennines, near Florence, in the diocese of Fiesole. He was the first to introduce lay-brethren (fratres conversi) in the monasteries, in order that the religious brethren (properly speaking, the patres) might be able to devote themselves entirely to contemplation and prayer. He died 1093, and was canonized by Celestine III. 1193. His life is found in Act. Sanct. O. B., II.

GUDULE, St., popularly called Goule or Er-goule, was a daughter of Duke Thierry of Lorraine and St. Amalberge; devoted her life to the severest ascetic practices; d. Jan. 8, 712, and was soon after canonized on account of the miracles wrought at her tomb. She is the patroness of Brussels; and the cathedral of that city is dedicated to her. See Act. Sanct., Jan. 8.

GUELF and Ghibelline are the Italianized forms of the German Welf (the ducal house of Saxony) and Waiblingen (the native castle of the Hohenstaufens). The German names were first used, it is said, as battle-cries at Weinsberg (1140), and then became party designations, — on the one side, the princes with their aspirations of independence; on the other, the emperor with his demands of authority. Transferred to Italy, the names were applied to the adherents of the emperor (the Ghibellines) and the adherents of the Pope (the Guelfs): though many other and very different elements might be introduced into the platform; as, for instance, when two city-republics, Pisa and Genoa, Ferrara and Mantua, etc., vied with each other, and immediately became Guelf and Ghibelline; or even when the rivalry existed only between two families, as the Montecchi and Capuletti in Verona, the Lambertazzi and Geremei in Bologna, etc.

QUÉNÉE, Antoine, b. at Etampes, Nov. 23, 1717; d. at Fontainebleau, Nov. 27, 1803; was successively professor of rhetoric, canon of Amiens, and tutor to the children of the Count of Artois; travelled much in Italy, Germany, and England; translated several books from English, and wrote, against Voltaire's attack on the Old Testament, Lettres de quelques Juifs, etc. (Paris, 1769, 4 vols.; republished six times in the lifetime of the editor, last edition, Paris, 1857; translated into English by Lefauv, Dublin, 1777), the only book of any account which the Roman-Catholic Church produced against the encyclopedists.

QUERICKE, Heinrich Ernst Ferdinand, b. at Wettin, Feb. 25, 1803; d. at Halle, Feb. 4, 1878; studied theology at Halle; was appointed professor there 1829, and wrote a biography of Francke 1827, a handbook of church history 1833 (9th ed., 1866; translated into English by W. G. T. Shedd, New York, 1857-63, 2 vols.), an Allg. christl. Symbolik 1839, etc. He was a very strict Lutheran, and opposed the exertions of the Prussian Government to effect a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches, and founded, together with Rudelbach, the Zeitschrift f. luth. Theolog. und Kirche, 1840.

GUIBERT OF NOGENT, b. at Clennont, 1053; d. at Nogent, 1121; entered in 1061 the Benedictine monastery of Flay or St. Germer, where he came under the influence of Anselm, at that time prior of Bee, and a frequent visitor in Flay, and was in 1104 made abbot of Nogent-sous-Concy, in the diocese of Laon. He was a man of great learning, and exercised considerable influence on the circle to which he belonged; but he knew it too well himself, and the impression which his writings make is not always so very agreeable, on account of his vanity and conceit. His works were edited by D'Achery (Paris, 1651), and reprinted in Migne (Patrol. Latin, 156 and 184). The most interesting of his works are: 1. De pignoribus sanctorum, occasioned by the exhibition, in the monastery of St. Medard, near Soissons, of one of Christ's teeth, and criticising with great frankness the worship of saints and relics which was the rage of the time; 2. Historia Hierosolymitana, a history of the first crusade, written about 1108, and a rich source of knowledge; 3. De vita sua sive Monachiorum Libri III., of which the first book contains an autobiography in imitation of Augustine's Confessiones, the second the history of the monastery of Nogent, and the third the history of the diocese of Laon. The two last works have been translated into French, in Guizot: Coll. de Memoires, Paris, 1825. WAGENMANN.

GUIBERT OF PARMA was by the Empress Agnes made chancellor of the kingdom of Italy, and was thus by the very nature of his office placed in opposition to Hildebrand. It was due to him that Nicholas II., in his famous decree concerning papal elections, admitted the influence of the king of Germany; and when Alexander II. was elected Pope, without the consent of Henry IV. or his mother, the Empress Agnes, Guibert caused Bishop Cadalus of Parma to be elected antipope, under the name of Honorius II. The measure proved a complete failure; but, by the exertions of Agnes, Guibert was reconciled to Hildebrand, and in 1073 he was made Archbishop of Ravenna. His opposition, however, to Hildebrand's policy, was not merely the result of his office as chancellor. He hated that manner in which Gregory VII. used the monks, the Patarini, and the mass of the people, to enforce his authority over the clergy; and, as Archbishop of Ravenna, he resisted this policy in every way possible. In 1075 he was suspended, but he did not yield. In the contest between Henry IV. and Gregory VII. he sided with the former; and in 1080 he was elected antipope at Brixen by thirty bishops, and assumed the name of Clement III. In 1081 he crowned Henry Emperor in Rome. But, though Henry never abandoned him, he was never able to vindicate himself against the fury of the Hildebrand party. Not only Gregory VII., but also Victor III., Urban II., and Paschalis II., cursed and excommunicated him. He died at Ravenna, 1100; and, after the death of Henry IV., Paschalis II. ordered his bones to be dug up, and thrown into the water. See JAFFÉ: Regest. Pontif. Roman., pp. 443-447. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

GUIDO OF AREZZO, monk in the monastery of Pomposa, in the diocese of Ferrara; distinguished himself as a music-teacher, and made a number of improvements in the method which he saw introduced, not only in Italy, but also in France and Germany. His activity falls between 1021 and 1037, but the dates of his birth and death are unknown. His inventions he has described in his Micrologus de Disciplina Artis Musicae, and Argumentum novi Cantus.

GUIDO DE BRES, b. at Mons, 1523; d. at Valenciennes, 1567; was educated in the Roman Church, but converted by the reading of the Scriptures. Expelled from his native city, he went to London, where a Walloon congregation had been formed in the reign of Edward VI., and where he prepared himself for the office of a preacher. In 1563 he returned to Flanders, labored there as an itinerant preacher, and founded the first evangelical congregation at Lille. But in 1566 this congregation was dispersed by armed force, and Guido was again compelled to flee. He repaired to Geneva, became an ardent disciple of Calvin, returned once more to Flanders, formed congregations at Tournay, Lille, and Valenciennes, wrote the Belgic Confession (which article see), but was taken prisoner at the capture of Valenciennes, in 1567, and hanged. His life and some of his letters are found in Histoire des Martyrs, Geneva, 1617.

GUILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM. See GILBERT OF SEMPRINGHAM.

GUILDS, voluntary associations for the promotion of religious and moral objects within the pale of the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, are of recent origin. The prototypes of the modern institution were the guilds of the middle ages, the last vestiges of which in England were swept away by the Reformation. These were merchant, craft, and religious guilds; and their object was to advance the temporal and eternal welfare of their members by mutual protection, support, and prayer. After a long interval, the name was revived, and given to a new organization in 1851, — the Guild of St. Alban of Manchester. The ends this league proposed to itself were wholly religious, and the membership composed of communicants in the Church of England. Previously, in 1844, the Brotherhood of the Holy Trinity was organized at Oxford, which is sometimes, but wrongly, represented as the first guild. In 1861 two other guilds were organized, — the Society of the Love of Jesus, Plymouth, and the Sisterhood of St. Peter, Kilburn. Since that time, the idea and the name have become very popular; and the number of organizations has largely increased, not only in England and her colonies, but also in the Episcopal Church of the United States. In 1873 a union of the guilds of Great Britain was effected under the title of the Church Guilds' Union, which holds an annual meeting.

The primary object of the guilds is to carry on more effectually parish-work, by inducing each communicant to exercise his own natural talents, and by pointing out the work proper for each to do. The special objects vary, and are such as the visitation of the sick, inducing persons to be confirmed, caring for the poor, providing healthy amusements, etc. They are essentially lay societies, and designed to "impart dignity to the layman's work now wanting to it." They assist the parish priest; but some of the guildsmen would go so far as to exclude the parish clergyman from the offices of the society. The guilds may direct their energies to the general interests of the parish. But they are also organized for special objects; as the medical Guild of St. Luke, the missionary Guild of St. Saviour, the Church and Stage Guild, All Souls' Guild for the reform of burial, etc. For a good account of the history and objects of guilds, see Guild Papers, contributed by Officers of Various Church Guilds, London.

GUILLON, Marie Nicolas Sylvestre, b. in Paris, Jan. 1, 1760; d. at Montfermeil, Oct. 16, 1817; was almoner and librarian to the Princess Lamballe, but fled from Paris, after her execution in 1792, and lived for several years in the provinces under an assumed name (Pastel), practising medicine. Having returned to Paris in 1798, he served Napoleon, the Bourbons, and the Orleanists successively, and with equal ease; accompanied Cardinal Fesch to Rome, and was made professor of rhetoric in the Lycée Bonaparte; was almoner to the Princess of Orleans; and became canon of St. Denis, Bishop of Morocco (in partibus infidelium), Dean of the Sorbonne, etc. He was a very prolific writer, and some of his works (Collection des brefs du Pape Pie VI., Paris, 1798; Bibliothèque choisie des Pères grecs et latins, Paris, 1822, 26 vols.; a translation of Cyprian with notes, Paris, 1837, 2 vols., etc.) are valuable.

GUISE, The House of, formed a younger branch of the house of Lorraine, and was founded in the beginning of the sixteenth century by Claude, the second son of René II. In 1508 he received all the French possessions of the family, — Guise, Elbœuf, Aumale, Mayenne, Joinville, etc., — the archbishoprics of Rheims, the bishopric of Metz, etc., which were family benefices; and in 1527 he was made Duke of Guise, and governor of Champagne and Bourgoyne. He died in 1550; but in the next two generations his sons (Duke Francis of Guise, and Cardinal Charles of Lorraine) and his grandsons (Duke Henry of Guise, and Cardinal Louis of Lorraine) played the most prominent part in the history of France as leaders of the Roman-Catholic party, heads of the League, supporters of the Jesuit movement, and cruel suppressors of the Huguenots.

Duke Francis of Guise, b. Feb. 17, 1519; d. Feb. 24, 1563; was a valiant soldier. In 1552 he stopped Charles V. at Metz; in 1558 he took Calais from the English. When Francis II., who had married his niece, Mary, Queen of Scots, ascended the French throne in 1559, the whole military command of the realm was intrusted to him, just as the whole civil administration was put into the hands of his brother, Cardinal Charles of Lorraine. — Charles, b. Feb. 17, 1524; d. Dec. 26, 1574; was made Archbishop of Rheims when he was fourteen years old, and cardinal when he was twenty-three. He held ten bishoprics, besides a great number of abbeys, and had an annual income of three hundred thousand crowns at a time when the total revenue of France was not more than five or six millions. He was supercilious and depraved, but cunning and eloquent. He began life as a pupil of the Renaissance and a friend of ecclesiastical reform; but, after his meeting with Cardinal Granvelle, he became a partisan of Philip II., and a champion of the Roman Church. A sudden turn took place in his fortunes and in those of his family by the unexpected death of Francis II. in 1560. He retired to Rheims, Francis to Guise; and the royal princes, the Bourbons, Condés, etc., returned to power. On the basis, however, of the defence of Romanism against Protestantism, Francis succeeded in forming an alliance at the court, and he was on his way to Paris when the massacre at Vossy occurred (1562).—the slaughter of a whole Protestant congregation, assembled at worship, by his retinue. The Huguenots arose, and the civil war began. Francis was placed at the head of the Roman-Catholic army, defeated the Huguenots at Dreux, and besieged their stronghold, Orléans, where he was shot dead by Poltrot de Méré. At the re-opening of the Council of Trent in 1563, the cardinal attempted to gather the whole opposition around himself, but he utterly failed; and he afterwards became very zealous for the introduction in France of the canons of the council. On his return, he was very coldly received by the court; but the particular friendship which Philip II. showed him, the brilliant military successes of his nephew, Duke Henry of Guise, and the lavish support he gave to literature and art, continued to give him a certain influence. He left a considerable debt when he died.

Duke Henry of Guise, b. Dec. 31, 1550; d. Dec. 23, 1588; a son of Duke Francis; inherited his father's valor and military ability, but exceeded him far in political ambition, and hatred to the Huguenots. If not the founder, he was at all events the head, of the League from its very beginning in 1576. He formed the closest alliances with Philip II. (who gave him an annual pension of two hundred thousand francs) and with the Pope, who, at his instance, excommunicated Henry of Navarre. After the death of the Duke of Anjou, in 1581, he actually aspired to the throne of France; and both the Pope and Philip II. considered it necessary to support him, if France should not become Calvinistic. But he seems to have lacked courage. He procrastinated; and when the king, Henry III., thoroughly understood the drift of affairs, he had him assassinated at Blois by his guardsmen, him and his brother, Cardinal Louis of Lorraine.—Louis, b. July 6, 1555; d. Dec. 23, 1588; was a wit, and played only a secondary rôle.

LIT.—Duke Francis left a kind of diary, which is found in MICHAUD ET PONJAULT: Nouvelle Collection de Mémoires, Paris, 1839. The best account of the destinies of this famous family is Récit de Bouillon, Histoire des Ducs de Guise, Paris, 1853, 1 vols.

GUIZOT, François Pierre Guillaume, b. at Nîmes, Oct. 4, 1787; d. at Val-Richer, Sept. 12, 1871; descended from a family of Huguenot pastors; was educated at Geneva, and studied law, history, and philosophy in Paris. The first period of his life (1812-30) was principally literary. He was during that time alternately professor of history at the Sorbonne, secretary-general in the department of the interior, journalist, etc., and wrote his brilliant historical works, of which the History of Civilization in Europe (1828), and History of Civilization in France (1830, 5 vols., unfinished), are of great interest to the church historian. The second period (1830-48) was principally political. He was minister of public instruction 1832-36, and prime-minister 1840-48. As minister of public instruction he thoroughly reformed the educational system of France from top to bottom; and many improvements were introduced, especially in the primary schools and in the higher gymnasiums. In the third period, from 1848 till his death, religion came more and more to the foreground in his works. In 1852 he was chosen president of the consistory, and in his government of the Reformed Church he applied the same principle of "resistance" as he had formerly applied in the government of the State. He was orthodox, and clung tenaciously to the Calvinistic system of the sixteenth century; but just thereby he made the difference between the various branches of the Reformed Church in France more apparent and decisive. His principal religious works are, L'Église et la Société chrétienne (1861), and Méditations sur l'essence de la religion chrétienne (1864), Eng. trans., New York, 1865; of a more popular character Les Vies de quatre grands chrétiens français. I. St. Louis, II. Calvin (1868, all published), Eng. trans., St. Louis and Calvin, London, 1868. In 1826 he founded the Société Biblique, in 1833 the Société d'instruction primaire protestante, and in 1857 the Société d'histoire du protestantisme français. See M. Guizot in Private Life, by his daughter, Madame DE WITT, London and Boston, 1880.

GUNDULPH. Bishop Gerhard of Cambrai and Arras discovered in 1025 a heretical sect in his diocese, whose members professed to have received their peculiar tenets from one Gundulph, an Italian by birth. As the bishop was very zealous for the purity of the faith, he had the heretics seized, and placed before a synod assembled in the Church of Mary at Arras. The doctrines, however, which the accused were willing to recognize as theirs, turned out to be perfectly innocent; and the whole affair threatened to become a mere triviality, when the bishop arose, and proved that he knew more about the sect than the sect itself, ascribing to it a multitude of hideous and dangerous heresies. As the excitement of the assembly reached a very high pitch under the bishop's speech, the accused deemed it most advisable to submit to every thing, recant every thing, and subscribe to every thing; so they did; and the acts of this towering stupidity are still extant (D'Achery, Spicil., I.; Mansi, Concil. XIX.). But outside of those acts nothing is known either of Gundulph, or his doctrines, or his followers.

GUNPOWDER PLOT, a conspiracy (1604-05) of some Roman Catholics for blowing up Parliament House with gunpowder while Parliament was in session, and killing the king, and thus securing advantages for their Church. The Roman Catholics, who had been held down under Elizabeth, expected concessions from James I., but were disappointed. Robert Catesby and Guy Fawkes were the leading conspirators. A building was rented next to Parliament House in 1604, and work begun in boring through the walls, which were nine feet thick, when an opportunity was afforded them of renting the cellar of the Parliament House itself. The conspirators deposited thirty-six kegs of powder there, covering them with stones and fagots. The plot was to be consummated the 5th of November, 1605, the opening day of Parliament. Lord Monteagle, a Roman-Catholic member of the House of Lords, was apprised of the danger by letter, and immediately communicated the matter to the king. The powder was discovered, and Fawkes taken in the cellar. Severe tortures were employed to draw from him confessions implicating others, but without avail. With three others he was put to death Jan. 31, 1606. The day previous four had suffered for the same crime.

The discovery of this plot was very disastrous to the cause of the Roman Catholics in England. The 5th of November was ordered to be kept as a national holiday by an act which was not repealed for two hundred years. One of the popular festivities of the day has been to dress up a figure in rags, parade the streets, singing rhymes, and at night burning it. See the Histories of England.

GÜNTHER, Anton, b. at Lindenau, in Bohemia, Nov. 17, 1783; d. at Vienna, Feb. 24, 1863; studied first law, then theology; was ordained priest in 1820, and lived mostly in Vienna, as teacher of philosophy. His works, of which the principal are Vorschule zur speculativen Theologie (1828), Süd- und Nord-lichter (1832), Thomas a Scrupulis (1835), Die Juste-Milieu (1837), do not present a finished philosophical system, but are only an attack on the reigning monism, and an attempt at reconciling the Roman-Catholic dogma and modern science. They attracted much attention, however, and found, like those of Hermes, many ardent students; but in 1857 they were put on the Index. See P. KNOODT: Anton Günther, Wien, 1881, 2 vols.; J. FLEGEL: A. Günthers Dualismus von Geist u. Natur, Breslau, 1882, pp. 42.

GURNALL, William, author of a quaint and popular book, The Christian in Complete Armour; b. at Lynn, 1616; d. at Lavenham, October, 1679. He graduated at Cambridge; in 1644 became rector of Lavenham, and at the Restoration signed the Act of Uniformity. The Christian in Complete Armour, or a Treatise on the Saints' War with the Devil, etc., is a series of sermons on Eph. vi. 6-20, abounding in epigrammatic sayings, and displaying great skill in applying Scripture. It was published in three volumes in 1655, sixth edition, 1679, and many times since; new edition, London, 1865, in two volumes, with Introduction by Bishop Ryle.

GURNEY, Joseph John, an eminent philanthropist, and minister of the Society of Friends; b. at Earham Hall, near Norwich, Aug. 2, 1788; d. Jan. 4, 1847. He attended lectures for a while at Oxford, and was recognized in 1818 as a minister by the Friends. The three years between 1837 and 1840 he spent in the United States and the West Indies, preaching. He was a man of rare piety and simplicity of character, and always foremost in enterprises of benevolence and humanity, using his large wealth with a liberal hand. He aided his sister, Mrs. Fry, in her measures for prison-reform, and was the associate with Clarkson, Wilberforce, and his brother-in-law, T. Fowell Buxton, in their efforts for the abolition of the slave-trade. The latter cause lay nearest to his heart. He was also a prominent advocate of total abstinence, having signed the pledge at Ipswich, April 8, 1843. His temperance tract, Water is Best, has been widely circulated.

Mr. Gurney issued quite a number of tracts and pamphlets, with some larger works. Of these the principal are, Essays on the Evidences, Doctrines, and Practical Operations of Christianity, Lond., 1827, trans. into Spanish and German; History, Authority, and Use of the Sabbath, Lond., 1831; Puseyism traced to its Root, 1845. These works passed through a number of editions. See Memoirs of J. J. Gurney, by BRAITHWAITE (Norwich and Phila., 1851, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1855) and HOBGSON (Phila., 1856).

CURY, Jean Pierre, b. at Mailleronecourt, Jan. 23, 1801; d. at Merceur, France, April 18, 1866; became a Jesuit, 1821; taught moral theology in Jesuit Colleges; and wrote Compendium theologiæ moralis (1850) and Casus Conscientiæ (1863), which, as specimens of the morals taught by the Jesuits, procured for their author an unenviable notoriety. See LINN: Das Handbuch Gury's und die christliche Ethik, Freiberg, 1869; and Vie (anon.), Paris, 1867.

GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS. See THIRTY-YEARS' WAR.

GUSTAVUS-ADOLPHUS-ASSOCIATION. The idea of this association was first conceived by Dr. Grossmann of Leipzig in 1832, when the second centennial of the death of the great Protestant hero was celebrated at Lützen, Nov. 6. Not simply a monument of brass or stone should be raised in his honor, but a monument of living men, doing the same work as he had done,—aiding and supporting Protestant families and congregations whenever aid and support were needed. An association was formed; and Oct. 4, 1834, its statutes were confirmed by the Saxon king. In the beginning the success was very slender. Though 10,000 thalers were sent from Sweden, the total capital of the association in 1841 was only 12,850 thalers. But in the same year Legrand, pastor of Basel, and Karl Zimmermann, court-preacher at Darmstadt, made most effective appeals to the public, setting forth the religious privations, chicaneries, and dangers to which evangelical families and congregations are exposed when living in the midst of a Roman-Catholic population. Branch societies were formed in various places in Germany, as also in foreign countries, and were brought in connection with the mother association; and at the general assembly in Stuttgart, 1845, the accounts of the association showed an income of 42,000 thalers for the last year. Aid had been given to 62 congregations. In several countries, as, for instance, in Bavaria, the association met with strong opposition from the Roman-Catholic government; and during the revolutionary years of 1848 and 1849 the interest slackened,—the revenue sank down to 21,000 thalers. But in 1850 matters began to improve, and since that time progress has been made every year. The association, comprising 43 minor associations, with 1,160 branch societies, 8 students' and 371 women's associations, owns now a capital of 336,401 marks. Since its foundation it has distributed 14,183,798 marks, and has built 1,068 churches, 639 schoolhouses, 42 cemeteries, and 358 parsonages. See K. ZIMMERMANN: Geschichte des Gustav Adolf Vereins, Darmstadt, 1877; W. PRESSEL: Bausteine zur Geschichte d. G. A. Vereins, 1878, 2 vols., and Der G. A. Vereins und das Volk Israel, Tübing., 1879. GUTHLAC, St., presbyter, and hermit of Crowland; b. 674; d. 714. The child of nobles, he early showed martial prowess, and attacked, at the head of his band, the hereditary British foe; but, in his twenty-fourth year suddenly experiencing a change of heart, he gave up his wild life, repaired to a monastery, and then, full of enthusiasm for a solitary life, crossed over to Crowland, a desolate island off the extreme south coast of Lincolnshire, and there lived as a hermit. But his fame for piety attracted many admirers, and the hermit became a teacher of righteousness, while "men of divers conditions, nobles, bishops, abbots, poor, rich, from Mercia, and all Britain," made up his congregation. He was ordained a priest by Hedda, Bishop of Lichfield. At first in his solitude he was plagued by carnal temptations, and tormented by visions; but he resisted vigorously, and found in the cultivation of the soil, and in the giving of spiritual counsel, abundant distraction. One day he made this beautiful remark to a visitor, "Who hath led his life after God's will, the wild beasts and wild birds have become more intimate with him, and the man who will pass his life apart from worldly men, to him the angels approach nearer." On the site of his cell and oratory Ethelbald erected a monastery. See article in SMITH and WACE, Dict. Chr. Biog., vol. ii. pp. 823-826.

GUTHRIE, Thomas, D.D., Scottish preacher and editor; son of David Guthrie; b. at Brechin, July 12, 1803; d. at St. Leonard's-on-the-Sea, Feb. 23, 1873. He was educated first at the schools of his native place, then at the University of Edinburgh, which he attended from 1815 to 1826; studied medicine in Paris in 1827; and conducted a bank agency in Brechin from 1828 to 1830. He was licensed to preach in 1825; ordained minister of the parish of Arbirlot on May 13, 1830; translated to collegiate charge of old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, Sept. 16, 1837; and appointed minister of the new parish of St. John's, in the same city, Nov. 19, 1840. At the disruption he joined the Free Church, and became minister of the Church of Free St. John's, which charge he held until disabled by illness in 1864, when he became pastor emeritus. After this he became editor of the Sunday Magazine, in the pages of which most of his later works appeared. He obtained the degree of D.D. from the University of Edinburgh in 1849; and was moderator of the Free Church of Scotland in 1862.

He was greatly distinguished as a preacher, though his peculiarities were not those which have usually been associated with the Scottish pulpit. Discovering, through his intercourse with the members of his Bible-class at Arbirlot, how much an illustration did to assist the understandings and memories of his hearers, he cultivated the pictorial and illustrative in his discourses; and by the charm of his figures, the simplicity of his style, and the dramatic power of his manner, he rose to the front rank of pulpit orators. He wrote his sermons, and committed them to memory so fully, that he could give with ease that which he had prepared with elaboration. His delivery was at first slow and measured; and, though he waxed warmer as he proceeded, he never lost his self-possession. He had nothing of the whirlwind of Chalmers, and rarely became impassioned; but he was always dramatic. Occasionally the drapery of his illustration rather overlaid the truth which he desired to illustrate; but generally "the story, like the feathers of an arrow, made it strike, and, like the barb, made it stick."

Guthrie was eminent also as a philanthropist. His pastorate of St. John's took him down into the dens of the Edinburgh Cowgate, and stirred him up to do his utmost for the elevation of the depraved. Thus began his labors for Ragged Schools, with which his name will be always associated; for, though Sheriff Watson of Aberdeen was in that field before him, it was Guthrie's plea that first roused public attention to the need for such institutions. He was also prominent in the temperance cause, and for years was one of the foremost advocates of total abstinence. In the same line he took up Chalmers's territorial system, and was instrumental in rearing, on that principle, several churches in Edinburgh, which are now prosperous and self-supporting.

He was the means of raising a large sum of money for the erection of parsonages for the ministers of the Free Church; and every cause which had for its object the righting of wrong, or the alleviation of distress, or the restoration of the fallen, found in him a noble advocate.

His editorial labors, while sustaining fully, did not increase, his reputation; but they furnished him with an opportunity of showing, that, while he was steadfastly attached to his own religious belief, he could stretch a brother's hand to all classes of Christians; and so, when he died, there was no man more generally lamented by men of every denomination.

GUTZLAFF, Karl Friedrich August, b. at Stettin, 1802; d. at Victoria, Aug. 9, 1851; went in 1823 to Singapore as a missionary in the service of the Netherland Missionary Society, thence in 1828 to Siam, and in 1831 to China, where he remained as secretary to the British ambassador since 1831, though occupying most of his time with missionary work. He wrote Sketch of Chinese History, London, 1834, 2 vols., China (topography, literature, religion, jurisprudence, etc.), London, 1838, 2 vols., besides several papers on China and East-Indian matters in the journal of the Geographical Society in London.

GUYON, Jeanne Marie Bouvier de la Mothe, a prominent representative of French mysticism; b. of noble and wealthy parents at Montargis, France, April 16, 1648; d. at Blois, June 9, 1717. Her childhood was spent in the Ursuline convent at Montargis and the Benedictine convent close by. She was of delicate constitution, and already in early childhood showed an inclination towards ascetic mysticism. The works of Francis de Sales and Madame de Chantal exercised a great influence on her mind. When she read that the latter had branded on her bosom the name of Jesus with a hot iron, she stitched a piece of paper bearing the same name, on the flesh of her own bosom, with a needle, and wore it there. Her parents thwarted her in her desire to take the veil, and in her sixteenth year (1664) espoused her to M. Guyon, who was then thirty-eight years old. Her married life was made wretched by the jealousy and severity of a mother-in-law. She bore her husband five children; but he had little sympathy with her religious enthusiasm. At this period she observed painful and prolonged ascetic practices, flagellating herself till the blood ran from the wounds, wearing a girdle studded with iron teeth, tearing her skin with thorns, walking with stones in her shoes, and depriving herself of food and sleep. The fashionable society in which her husband mingled she completely renounced.

In 1677 Madame Guyon was left a widow with three children, and, in spite of offers of marriage, remained a widow. A correspondence with Father La Combe, whom she had met in Montargis, and other circumstances, led her to devote herself to Christian activity in Gex, near Geneva. Thither she started secretly, in 1681, after securing the sympathy of D'Aranthon, Bishop of Geneva, then in Paris. At Gex she entered the institution for converts from Protestantism, and had La Combe for confessor. She, however, was not happy; and when the bishop proposed to her to become mother superior, and endow the institution with her wealth, she fled to the Ursuline convent at Thoune, where La Combe resided. Her life there was a series of visions, revelations, etc. When La Combe followed a call of the Bishop of Vercelli, in Piedmont, Madame Guyon went to Turin to visit the Marquis of Prunai. They took the journey in company, — a circumstance which gave occasion for scandal, as her removal to Thoune had done before. Soon after, La Combe ordered her to go to Paris, and accompanied her as far as Grenoble. While tarrying there, she began her commentary on the Scriptures, and wrote her Moyen court et très facile de faire oraison ("Short and easy method of prayer"), and Le Cantique des Cantiques ("The Song of Solomon"). Her mysticism, however, awakened opposition; and, leaving Grenoble, she journeyed over Marseilles and Nice, back to Turin. She was about to found a charitable institution there, when she was attacked by a violent fever.

In 1686 La Combe was cited by the general of the order of Barnabites to appear at Paris, and thither Madame Guyon accompanied him. The following year, at the instigation of her brother, Père de la Mothe, the former was charged with improper relations with Madame Guyon, and for being a follower of Michael Molinos, and thrown into the Bastille. Thenceforth, Madame Guyon's religious views were an object of suspicion, and she herself of harsh treatment.

In 1688 she was confined to the convent at Faubourg St. Antoine, but subsequently released through the influence of Madame de Maintenon. From 1688 to 1694 she lived mostly at Paris, and often went to Madame de Maintenon's training institute at St. Cyr, where she propagated her peculiar views, and became an object of admiration and reverence. There her first meeting with Fénelon occurred, which led to a cordial friendship. In 1694 a meeting was arranged between her and Bossuet, the most influential prelate of France at that time. The same year, in consequence of complaints, and at Madame Guyon's instance, a commission of three, consisting of Bossuet, Bishop Noailles, and Abbé Tronson, was appointed to examine her writings. Thirty articles were drawn from them, teaching errors, which Madame Guyon recanted, receiving, in return, a certificate from Bossuet of catholic orthodoxy. She continued to hold meetings in Paris for the advancement of the inner life, and was apprehended Dec. 28, 1695, and placed in confinement at Vincennes, and later in the Bastille, from which, by the intercession of Noailles, now Archbishop of Paris, she was removed to Vaugirard. But a letter of La Combe's (who died insane 1699), calling upon her to do penance for their mutual intimacy, falling into the hands of the king, led him to condemn her again to the Bastille. In 1699 Bossuet secured a complete victory over Fénelon by the condemnation of his Maximes des Saintes, in which he had given a defence of the views of Madame Guyon. The following year, a clerical council, under his presidency at St. Germain, pronounced the character of Madame Guyon above reproach. As a result, she was released from imprisonment, but directed to live at Dizières, near Blois, with her son. According to an eye-witness (De Labetterie), she lived there an exemplary Christian life until her death, fifteen years afterwards. No bitter word ever passed her lips. A constant sufferer, she heard mass daily from her bed, and took the communion every other day.

[Madame Guyon, and the school of Mystics or Quietists which she represented, laid great stress upon the inner life, and the union of the soul with God, and taught that our wills may be completely lost in the divine will, that we should strive after a disinterested love for him, and that entire sanctification is possible in this world. Outward exercises of devotion and prayer are a lower stage of Christian life; and the aim of every believer should be to rest entirely in God. It was the tendency of these views to disparage the external observances of religion, to substitute for the authority of the Church that of the individual, and thus to lead to Antinomianism, which aroused the opposition of Bossuet and others.]

Madame Guyon was a graceful writer; and, in addition to the writings already mentioned, she wrote Les torrens spirituels, Cologne, 1701 ("Spiritual streams"), in which she compares our souls seeking after God to streams of different degrees of rapidity, etc., flowing towards the ocean; Les livres de l'Ancien et de Nouveau Test. traduit, avec des explications et des reflexions qui regardent la vie intérieure, Cologne, 1713-15 ("The books of the Old and New Testament, translated with explanations and reflections concerning the inner life"). She also published religious poems (Recueil de Poésies spirituelles, Amsterdam, 1689), some of which were translated by Cowper, and are found in English hymn-books; as, "I would love thee, God and Father," and "My Lord, how full of sweet content." For her life, see her autobiography, La vie de Mme. Guyon écrite par elle-même, Cologne, 1720 (a work not entirely her own); UPHAM: Life, Religious Experiences, and Opinions of Madame Guyon, New York, 1847, London, 1862, 2 vols.; HEPPE: *Gesch. d. quiet. GUYSE, John, D.D., a dissenting minister; b. at Hertford, Eng., 1680; removed to London, as successor to Matthew Clarke, 1732; lost his sight toward the close of his life; d. Nov. 22, 1761. He is the author of The Practical Expositor, or an Exposition of the New Testament in the Form of a Paraphrase, with Occasional Notes, London, 1739-52, 3 vols., several times reprinted, formerly much esteemed, but now almost forgotten.

GYROVAGI is the name generally given to a kind of vagrant monks which was very numerous when monasticism was first introduced in Western Europe. They had no fixed domicile, but wandered from cell to cell, from hermitage to hermitage, from abbey to abbey, living on the hospitality of their brethren, but giving both to them and to the community at large a very bad example. Augustine and Cassianus wrote against them, and several synods in Gaul tried to suppress them; but they did not disappear until the time of Charlemagne and Louis the Pious, when the rules of Benedict became the rules of monasticism in general. HAAG (HAGUE) ASSOCIATION, for the Defence of the Christian Religion, The, or The Apologetical Society of the Hague, was founded in August, 1785, by a number of distinguished Dutch theologians. The occasion was the appearance, in 1782, of Priestley's History of the Corruptions of Christianity; and the object of the society was to take a firm stand against the anti-Christian tendencies of the age. During the first period of its life (1785-1810) its stand-point was strictly orthodox and supernaturalistic. In its publications the accommodation theory of Semler was absolutely rejected; the doctrines of vicarious atonement, the divinity of Christ, the personality of the Holy Spirit, etc., were strongly emphasized; and the inspiration of the Scriptures was considered an indisputable fact. During the second period (1810-35) the exegetical element was made more prominent, and the stand-point may be characterized as biblico-evangelical. The biblical angelology, the miracles of Elijah and Elisha, were vindicated; the dogmatics and ethics of the Gospel of John were examined; and the biblical idea of revelation was maintained in opposition to the rationalists. The character of the third period (1835-60) was principally determined by the writings of D. F. Strauss and the Tübingen school. The contest raged around the very fundamentals of Christianity; and the principles which the society fought for were strongly conservative, though it carried on the fight in a free, scientific spirit. But, from this critico-historical platform, the society, after 1860, gradually glided into the ethico-religious field; and, in spite of the truth and beauty they contain, its publications on slavery, war, capital punishment, woman's emancipation, and other questions of a similar import, lie far out in the periphery of Christian apologetics.

HAB'AKKUK (חַבְבְּקֻךְ, "embracing"), one of the Minor Prophets of the Old Testament. From the expression (iii. 19), "To the chief singer on my stringed instruments," the inference has with justice been drawn, that he was a Levite; for only Levites and priests could participate in the services of the temple. Nothing further is known of the prophet's life except what has been handed down by unreliable tradition. [The rabbins said he was the son of the Shunammite whom Elisha had restored. A "Habakkuk, son of Joshua, of the tribe of Levi," is reported to have been the author of Bel and the Dragon. He carried food to Daniel in the lions' den, etc.]

Book of. The prophecy of Habakkuk contains (1) The prophet's complaint against the corrupt state of society (i. 2-4); (2) The divine answer, announcing an irruption of the Chaldeans (i. 5-11); (3) The prophet's complaint of the unscrupulous greed and fierceness of the Chaldeans (i. 12-17); (4) The divine answer, promising their destruction (ii. 4-20); and (5) The prophet's response to these two divine announcements in a magnificent ode commemorating the majesty of God (iii.).

The time of composition is not indicated by any positive statement in the book itself. De Wette, Ewald, and others refer it to the reign of Jehoiakim, and regard the invasion of the Chaldeans alluded to as beginning with the battle of Carchemish (605 B.C.). This view is opposed by ch. i. 5, which represents that invasion as something incredible, and by the fact that Zephaniah (i. 7; comp. Hab. ii. 20) and Jeremiah (iv. 13, v. 6; comp. Hab. i. 8) draw from Habakkuk. Others place the prophet's activity under Manasseh. The third chapter, which presupposes the restoration of the old temple worship, makes against this view, and for a date after the twelfth year of Josiah's reign (630 B.C.), up to which time idolatry lasted. [This view is ably presented by Delitzsch in his Commentary.] The sentiments of ch. i. 2-4 are in accord with such a transition period to better things. The style of Habakkuk is classic. Expression and description are artistically rounded off, and less dependent upon older models than the other Minor Prophets. The author deserves a place among the greatest of the prophets; and the lyric poem of ch. iii. surpasses every thing of its kind in the Old Testament. It has with justice been said by Umbreit that he resembles Jeremiah in the combination of softness with lofty manliness, and Asaph in his lyric sensitiveness and warmth.

[With reference to the third chapter of Habakkuk, Isaac Taylor says (Hebrew Poetry, American edition, p. 255), "This anthem, unequalled in majesty and splendor of language and imagery, and which, in its closing verses, gives expression in terms the most affecting to an intense feeling, on this ground so fully embodies these religious sentiments as to satisfy Christian piety, even of the loftiest order." Of the same chapter Dean Stanley (Jewish Church, ii. 549) says, "The prophet seems to be transformed into the Psalmist; the ancient poetic fervor of Deborah is rekindled within him." Some of the most frequently quoted passages of Scripture are found in our prophet (i. 13, ii. 14, 15, 20, iii. 2, 18, etc.); and the great truth, "The just shall live by faith" (ii. 4), is used by Paul as the constructive doctrine of two of his Epistles (Rom. i. 17; Gal. iii. 11). Daniel Webster somewhere says that the imagery of Habakkuk is not surpassed in all literature. To be convinced of its grandeur one has only to refer to the description of the invading Chaldeans, whose "horses are swifter than the leopards, and more fierce than the evening wolves" (i. 5-11), and whose greed is as insatiable as death and hell (ii. 5); or to the magnificent description of the power and glory of God (iii. 2-15).

HABERKORN, Peter, b. at Butzbach, 1604; d. at Giessen, 1676; was first professor at Marburg, then court-preacher at Darmstadt, and finally professor at Giessen. He was one of the lights of Protestant polemics in the seventeenth century, and wrote against Romanism and syncretism: Disputationes ante Walenburgicas (1658), Enodatio errorum Syncretisticorum (1665), etc.

HABERT, Isaac, d. at Pont de Salors, near Rodez, 1668; was b. in Paris; studied at the Sorbonne; was appointed canon at the church of Nôtre Dame, and became Bishop of Vabres in 1645. He was the first to attack the Jansenists, and is said to have done so at the instigation of Richelieu. His principal writings are, De consensu hierarchie et monarchie (1640), De primatu Patri (1645), De gratia (1646), etc.

HACKETT, John, D.D., Bishop of Lichfield; b. in London, September, 1592; d. at Lichfield, Oct. 21, 1670. He was educated at Cambridge; was chaplain to James I., and made bishop 1661. His best known work is the life of Archbishop Williams, under the whimsical title, Scrinia referata, a memorial offered to the great deservings of John Williams, D.D., Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and Archbishop of York, containing a series of the most remarkable occurrences and transactions of his life in relation both to Church and State, folio, London, 1693; abridged edition, 1715. Darling says this life is "one of the most curious pieces of biography in our language, of great historical value, and full of rare quotations and quaint illustrations."

HACKETT, Horatio Balch, D.D., LL.D., eminent Baptist scholar, and one of the best American exegetes; b. at Salisbury, Mass., Dec. 27, 1808; d. in Rochester, N.Y., Nov. 2, 1875. He was graduated at Amherst College (1830) and Andover Theological Seminary (1833); studied in Germany; was for four years professor of Latin in Brown University; in 1839 became professor of biblical literature in the Newton Theological Institution, and in 1870 professor of New-Testament Greek in Rochester Theological Seminary. As a teacher he was full of enthusiasm and full of learning; he loved his work even in its driest details. In private life he was simple, modest, and humble, warm in his affections, tender in his sympathies, and unaffected in his piety. He was a member of the New-Testament company of the American Bible Revision Committee, as he had previously been of the American Bible Union. His works are very valuable, and include an edition, with notes, of Plutarch's De Sera Numinis Finita (1814); a translation, with improvements, of Winer's Chaldee Grammar (1815); an original Hebrew Grammar, with a Chrestomathy (1817); Commentary on the Acts (1851; revised edition, 1858, and again 1877); Illustrations of Scripture, suggested by a Tour through the Holy Land (1855; revised edition, 1868; new edition, 1882); Philemon, new annotated translation (1860); Christian Memorials of the War (1864); translations, with additions, of Van Oosterzee's Commentary on Philemon (1868), and Braune's on Philippians in Lange (1870), for the American edition of Lange; edition of Rawlinson's Historical Illustrations of the Old Testament (1873). In connection with Professor Ezra Abbot he edited the American edition of Smith's Bible Dictionary, New York, 1868-70, 1 vols. See G. H. WHITMORE: Memorials of H. B. Hackett, Rochester, 1876.

HA'DAD (הרר, also הרר), a word of doubtful etymology; was the name of a Syrian divinity. It was also the name of two Edomite kings (Gen. xxxv. 35, xxxvi. 39), — a son of Ishmael (1 Chron. i. 30), and a contemporary of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 14-22). The last-mentioned, who was of royal blood, fled as a child to Egypt at Joab's defeat of the Edomites. He married the daughter of Pharaoh, and at David's death made an attempt to reconquer his native land. The Hebrew text breaks off so suddenly at verse 22, and verse 25 is so evidently out of place, that we prefer to suppose that the conclusion of his history has, by an error of the copyist, been inserted in the wrong place, and to read at verse 25, with the LXX., "This is the evil that Hadad did, and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Syria." He is not to be confounded with the HADADEZER (or Hadarezer) of 1 Kings xi. 23. The latter was king of Zoba in the time of David, and exercised considerable power, as is evident from the fact that kings are called his servants (2 Sam. x. 19). See the Bible dictionaries of WINER, SCHENKEL, RIEHM [and SMITH]. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

HA'DAD-RIM'MON, or HA'DAR-RIM'MON (Zech. xii. 11), was either a person over whom the "mourning" was made, a locality at which the event bewailed occurred, or, as Hitzig and others hold, the name of a Syrian divinity, in which case the mourning would be a part of the worship offered to him. The best explanation refers the name to a locality which witnessed the death of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29 sqq.), whose memory was honored by songs of lamentation (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). Although the location has not been identified with certainty, it was probably at the site of the modern Rümmane, in the plain of Jezreel, about two miles south of Ledsehun (Legio), which is most probably the ancient Megiddo. The name of the town Hadad-Rimmon was, no doubt, originally the name of a deity; Hadad and Rimmon being both the names of gods. See the Commentaries on Zechariah, the works on Palestine by RELAND and ROBINSON, and the arts. in WINER, SCHENKEL, RIEHM [and SMITH]. WOLF BAUDISSIN.

HADDAN, Arthur West, b. in England, 1816; d. at Barton-on-Heath in England, Feb. 8, 1873. After a distinguished career at the University of Oxford, where he was a fellow of Trinity, he retired (1857) to his quiet country parsonage at Barton-on-Heath, and passed the remainder of his days in pastoral and literary labor. He was a scholar of tireless industry; and besides a thorough monograph upon Apostolical Succession in the Church of England (1869), and numerous articles in Smith's Dictionaries of Christian Biography and of Antiquities, he edited for the Anglo-Catholic Library the works of Archbishop Bramhall (Oxford, 1842-45, 5 vols.), and also those of Herbert Thorndike (Oxford, 1844-56, 5 vols.), and, in connection with Professor Stubbs, the Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents relating to Great Britain and Ireland (Oxford, 1869-78). See his Remains, edited by Bishop Forbes, London, 1876.

HA'DES (Greek, αἴδης, or ζῆδης, or, in the older Homeric form, Ἄϊδης, commonly derived from a privative and the verb idein, i. e., the unseen world) is used by Homer as a proper noun for Pluto, the god of the unseen or lower world, next brother to Zeus (hence ἐν or εἰς Ἅιδου, sc., οἴκῳ, or οἴκῳ, "in" or "into the abode of Hades"). In later writers it signifies a place and state; viz., the unseen spirit-world, or the realm of the departed, the abode of the dead. It occurs in the following passages of the Greek Testament: Matt. xi. 23, xvi. 18; Luke x. 15, xvi. 23; Acts ii. 27, 31; Rev. i. 18, vi. 8, xx. 13, 14; 1 Cor. xv. 55 (but here the true reading is θάνατος, "death"). It is always closely connected with death. The rider on the pale horse in the Apocalypse (vi. 8) is Death; and "Hades follows with him;" and at the judgment, Death and Hades will give up the dead who are in them, and will be cast into the lake of fire (xx. 13, 14.)

1. The ancient GREEK view of Hades, and the ROMAN view of Orcus or Inferna, is that of a place for all the dead in the depth of the earth, dark, dreary, cheerless, and shut up, inaccessible to prayers and sacrifices, ruled over by Pluto. But a distinction was made between Elysium and Tartarus in this subterranean world of shadows. So Æschylus, Sophocles, Plato, Plutarch. See NÄGELSBACH: Homerische Theologie, pp. 405 sqq.; PRELLER: Griechische Mythologie, 2d ed., I. 622; and Römische Mythologie, p. 452.

2. The HEBREW Sheol (שְׁאוֹל) is the equivalent for the Greek Hades, and is so translated in the Septuagint. It is likewise the subterranean abode of all the dead, but only the temporary abode till the final judgment, and is divided into two departments, called Paradise or Abraham's Bosom, for the good, and Gehenna or Hell, for the bad. In King James's Version, Sheol is variously rendered "hell," "grave," and "pit." In the rabbinical theology, Sheol seems to be nearly identical with Gehinnom, but with two distinct ends, — as a purgatorial fire for the Hebrews, and as a consuming fire for the heathen. See F. WEBER: System der altsynagogalen palæstinischen Theologie (1880), p. 327; also art. SHEOL.

3. In the NEW TESTAMENT, Hades does not differ essentially from the Hebrew Sheol; but Christ has broken the power of death, and dispelled the darkness of Hades, and revealed to believers the idea of heaven as the state and abode of bliss in immediate prospect after a holy life. The English (as also Luther's German) version translates Hades (which occurs ten times in the New Testament) and Gehenna (which occurs twelve times) by the same word, "hell" (except in 1 Cor. xv. 55, "grave"), and thus obliterates the important distinction between the realm of the dead (or nether-world, spirit-world) and the place of torment or eternal punishment; but in the Revision of 1881 the distinction is restored, and the term Hades introduced. Hades is a temporary jail or prison-house: heaven and hell are permanent and final. But Christ's descent into Hades no doubt created a revolution in that dreary abode. It is very different from what it was under the old dispensation. Christ has "the keys of Death and of Hades" (Rev. i. 18): they have lost their terrors for believers, who pass immediately into the presence of their Lord and Saviour after death (John xiv. 2, 3; Phil. i. 23).

4. In ECCLESIASTICAL THEOLOGY the idea of Hades has undergone several modifications. (a) In the ancient church, Hades was the transitory abode of all the departed between death and resurrection, except the martyrs, who pass directly into heaven. So Tertullian, Irenæus, Lactantius, Ambrose. The Gnostics taught a transplantation of the highest order (the pneumatics) into the world of the pleroma.

(b) In the Roman-Catholic Church, Hades has been, since Gregory I., transformed into the purgatory, or the abode of imperfect Christians, till they are pure enough to enter heaven. This purgatory is between heaven and hell, and takes the place of the limbus patrum in the old dispensation, which contained the Jewish saints waiting for Christ, and was emptied when he descended for their deliverance: so purgatory will be finally emptied at the day of judgment. Much pious superstition and fraud collected around this mediæval theory, which explains the radical re-action at the time of the Reformation. See PURGATORY.

(c) The Protestant churches rejected, with purgatory and its abuses, the whole idea of a middle state, and taught simply two states and places, — heaven for believers, and hell for unbelievers. Hades was identified with Gehenna, and hence both terms were translated alike in the Protestant versions. The same confusion gave rise also to misinterpretations of the article of Christ's descent in the Apostles' Creed, which was understood by Calvin (and the Heidelberg Catechism) figuratively, and identified with the sufferings on the cross; by the Westminster Catechism, as meaning simply that he continued in the state of death till he rose; by Luther, as a triumph over hell.

(d) In more recent times the idea of a middle state between death and resurrection, as distinct from the final state of heaven and hell, has been revived among Protestants, especially in Germany, though freed from the superstitions of the Roman purgatory, which has no foundation in the New Testament. To the believer (as to Lazarus in Abraham's bosom) this middle state is a state of beatitude in union with their Lord; to the unbeliever (as to the rich man in the parable) it is a state of punishment; to both a state of preparation for the final consummation at the day of judgment. Some assume a constant progress in that state in opposite directions, the good growing better, the bad worse, and both ripening for the final harvest. So Nitzsch, Lange, Rothe, Martensen, Rink. But all speculations on the future state beyond the limits of revelation are docta ignorantia.

HA'DRACH (הדרַח, probably the Pausal of הדרַח) is mentioned only in Zech. ix. 1: "Utterance of the word of Jahve concerning the land of Hadrach, and Damascus is its [the word's] place of rest." The connection seems to indicate that it was the country in which Damascus was situated, or a neighboring locality. The following explanations have been suggested: It is (1) the name of a king (comp. Mic. v. 6; Neh. ix. 22); (2) of a god worshipped there (Hitzig, Ewald, Reuss); (3) a symbolical designation meaning strong-weak, and refers to God (Jerome, hence Holy Land) or the Medo-Persian kingdom (Hengstenberg); (4) a designation of Cœlesyria, the word being taken as an adjective from הדרַח (Manner); (5) the name of a country, and is, on the basis of Assyrian inscriptions, to be identified with Hatarika (a city named in connection with Damascus and Hamath), but rather, as I think, with Chatracharta, near Ptolemaeus, which Strabo mentions (xvi. 1, 6) as the residence of Darius Hystaspis; and (6) a name of Hauranitis (v. Ortenberg, Olshausen), the word being corrected to הדרַח (Ezek. xlvii. 16, 18). See especially AUG. KÖHLER: D. Weissagungen Sacharjas, 1863, for the various older interpretations, and Hadrach, in the Bible Dicts. of WINKER, RIEM [and SMITH]. WOLF LAUDISSIN.

HADRIAN, P. Ælius, Roman emperor (117-138); was b. in Rome, Jan. 24, 76; of Spanish descent; a relative of Trajan, who adopted him on his death-bed. He was brilliantly gifted, and most carefully educated, a perfect soldier, ignorant of no art or science, possessed of a wonderful memory and a ready wit, handsome, and good-natured. But the elements of character were only loosely cemented; and, attracted in opposite directions, he finally lost himself in self-contradictions.

He began his reign with abandoning the conquests of Trajan, — Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, — a measure hitherto unheard of in the annals of Rome. But his policy was to consolidate, not to extend, the empire; and the first condition for the success of such a policy was to procure strong natural boundary-lines. The period from 121 to 134 he spent in travelling about, looking after every thing himself, restoring what was decaying, and starting new undertakings. The number of buildings erected during his reign was enormous; and his influence on Roman legislation, affecting the state of the slaves, military affairs, the methods of legal procedure, the administration, etc., is very remarkable. But he returned to Rome stricken by an incurable disease, and haunted by melancholy. He died at Baie, July 10, 138, a burden to himself and to his friends, and was entombed in the huge mausoleum, Moles Hadriani, the present castle of Angelo, which he had built for himself in Rome.

With respect to his relations to the Jews, see BAR-COCHA, and ISRAEL, Post-biblical History. With respect to his relation to Christianity, some writers describe him as a bitter foe, and speak of a fourth so-called Hadrianic persecution: others consider him a friend, and make him out the originator of the first edict of toleration. Both parties are no doubt wrong. The stories of the martyrdom of Bishop Dionysius Areopagita of Athens, of Bishop Alexander, and Bishop Telephorus of Rome, of St. Enstathius, St. Symphorosa, St. Cerealis, etc., are by no means reliable; in several cases the very existence of the person in question is doubtful. On the other hand, his rescript forbidding the execution of Christians on the mere demands of a tumultuous, frenzied Pagan mob, is very far from being an edict of toleration: it is simply the enforcement of the edict of Trajan, according to which no Christian could be executed except after legally instituted and conducted process. The truth seems to be, that Hadrian was ignorant of Christianity, and indifferent to it. In his letter to Servianus he identifies the Christians with the worshippers of Serapis. The two Christian apologies presented to him by Quadratus and Aristides would, no doubt, have thrown full light on this question if they had come down to us; but they are lost; and the praise which the apologists of the next generation lavished on his memory was probably merely intended to impress his successor.

HÆRETICO COMBURENDO was a writ for the burning of heretics by the secular power, abolished by Charles II.

HAETZER (or HETZER), Ludwig, b. about 1500 at Bischofzell, near St. Gall, Switzerland; studied at Freiburg in Breisgau, and acquired good knowledge of Hebrew; was for some time chaplain at Wädenschwyl on Lake Zürich; embraced the Reformation, and enjoyed the confidence of Zwingli, Oecolampadius, and other Reformers, but was successively expelled from Zürich, Augsburg, Strassburg, etc., on account of his Anabaptist views, and was finally beheaded for bigamy at Constance, Feb. 3, 1529. In Strassburg he became acquainted with Denck, and published together with him a translation of the Prophets (Worms, 1527), which was often reprinted. See KEIM: Ludw. Hetzer, in Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol., 1856, pp. 215 sqq. TH. KEIM.

HAFENREFFER, Matthias, a Lutheran divine, b. at Lorch, Würtemberg, June 24, 1561; d. at Tübingen, Oct. 22, 1619; was appointed pastor at Ehningen 1588, court-preacher in Stuttgart 1590, professor of theology at Tübingen 1598. His Loci Theologici (1600) was the generally used text-book in Tübingen during the seventeenth century, and also introduced at other universities, as, for instance, at Upsala. His Templum Ezechielis was still more celebrated in his own time. His correspondence with Kepler (in K. Opp., VIII., ed. Frisch) is very characteristic, and shows him as a quiet, cautious, but kind man. See THOLUCK: D. akad. Leben, i. 145; GASS: Gesch. d. protest. Dogm., i. 77 sqq. WAGENMANN.

HA'GAR (חַגָּר, "flight"), an Egyptian, and bondswoman of Sarah, whom the latter, being barren, and following an ancient custom, gave to Abraham for a concubine. Her pregnancy aroused the jealousy of her mistress, and became the occasion of such harsh treatment, that she fled into the wilderness of Shur. At the well Beer-lahai-roi (Gen. xvi. 14) she was induced by a theophany to return and submit. Hagar became the mother of Ishmael, but was again cast forth by Sarah, who in the mean time had given birth to Isaac (Gen. xxi. 9-11). She was again supernaturally visited in her distress (Gen. xxi. 11-21). Paul (Gal. iv. 21 sqq.), in an allegory, makes the slave Hagar the representative of the Law of Sinai, which "answereth to the Jerusalem that now is." Some, however, regard Hagar ("stone") in this passage to be simply a local name for Sinai, on which see Lightfoot, Galatians, pp. 190-195.

HAGARITES, or HAGARENES, a people dwelling in Northern Arabia, with whom the trans-Jordanic tribes made war in the reign of Saul (1 Chron. v. 10 sqq.). They appear again in Ps. lxxxiii. 6 as an Arabic tribe hostile to Israel. They were probably descendants of Hagar (perhaps by another child than Ishmael), although they are distinguished from the Ishmaelites (Ps. lxxxiii. 6). See arts. in Smith's and Winer's Dictionaries.

HAGENAU, Conference of, a politico-religious conference called by Charles V. to Spire, and convened at Hagenau on account of an epidemic raging in the former city; lasted from June 12 to July 16, 1540, but effected nothing with respect to the relation between Romanists and Protestants in Germany. The former were represented by Eck, Faber, and Cochlaus; the latter by Oslander, Brenz, Capito, Cruciger, and Myconius. Only some preliminary questions were discussed, and a conference, to be held at Worms, was agreed upon.

HAGENBACH, Karl Rudolf, a distinguished theological professor and church historian; b. in Basel, March 4, 1801; d. in the same city, June 7, 1874. After spending a year at the university of Basel, he went to Bonn and Berlin, where Schleiermacher and Neander exerted a large influence upon him in fixing his theological opinions. Returning to Basel in 1823 through the persuasions of De Wette, he taught as docent, and was soon made professor. In 1873 he celebrated the fiftieth jubilee of his connection with the university. During these years, besides his professorial duties, he exerted a wide influence as a preacher. His sermons appeared in nine volumes (Basel, 1858-75). He also published two volumes of poems (2d ed., Basel, 1863), in which his mild and childlike disposition is reflected.

Hagenbach's special department was church history. He represented a school in theology (Vermittlungstheologie) occupying an intermediate position between the old supranaturalists and the rationalists. He gradually departed from the position of Schleiermacher, which he had occupied in his early career, laid an increasing stress upon the independent objective reality of Christian facts, and emphasized the confessions of the Church. His first important work was the Encyclopädie u. Methodologie d. theol. Wissenschaften, Leipzig, 1833 [10th ed. by Kautzsch, 1880], which still holds its place as the most useful work of its kind. The Lehrbuch d. Dogmengeschichte first appeared in 1840; 5th ed., 1867 [English translation by Buch, Edinburgh, revised and enlarged by Dr. H. B. Smith, New York, 1861, 2 vols.; new edition, with preface by Plumptre, Edinburgh, 1880, 3 vols.]. This is still the most popular work in its department. His largest work is the Kirchengesch. von d. ältesten Zeit bis z. 19ten Jahrhundert, Leipzig, 1869-72, 7 vols. It was in part a reconstruction of three earlier works, — Geschichte d. Reformation (1834-43), Geschichte d. alten Kirche (1853), and Geschichte d. Mittelalters (1860). [The work has appeared in partial translations, — History of the Reformation, by Miss E. Moore, 2 vols., Edinburgh, 1878, and History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, by Dr. Hurst, 2 vols., New York, 1869.] These historical labors are not so much distinguished for originality of treatment, or novelty of discovery, as for their comprehensive views, amiable spirit, and clear and attractive style. Among his other writings are Oekolampad u. Myconius, Elberfeld, 1859; Grundzüge d. Homiletik u. Liturgik, Leipzig, 1863. He also edited a Swiss Church Magazine from 1845 to 1868. [He was a prominent contributor to Herzog's Encyclopædia.] See Erinnerung an K. R. Hagenbach, Basel, 1874, which contains a short autobiographical sketch, with other matter. An extensive Autobiography exists only in manuscript. [EPLER: Karl Rudolf Hagenbach, Gütersloh, 1875.] R. STAHELIN.

HAGGADAH (anecdote, legend) is a Talmudic and rabbinical term for traditional stories and legends illustrative of Scripture. Many of these stories are amusing, many are beautiful; but their critical value is small. See MIDRASH.

HAGGAI (חַגַּי, festive), one of the three prophets of the post-exile period. He prophesied at Jerusalem in the second year of the reign of Darius, or 520 B.C. (i. 1), and aroused the people to complete the second temple (Ez. v. 1, vi. 14). Bleek, Ewald, Stanley, and others have supposed, on the ground of ii. 3, that he had seen Solomon's temple, in which case he lived to a great age.

Book of. The Book of Haggai is an exhortation to complete the temple, work upon which had been begun in 534 B.C., but discontinued by a decree of Cyrus, and a prophecy of the blessing of the Lord which would follow its completion. It consists of four parts: the first (i. 1-15) attributes the curse resting upon the people to their listlessness in leaving the temple unfinished while they dwelt in "panelled houses," and exhorts them to begin work; the second (ii. 1-9) predicts for the new temple a glory greater than that of Solomon; the third prophecy (ii. 10-19) urges them to greater activity in view of the curse to be escaped, and the blessing to ensue; and the fourth (ii. 20-23) promises victory over the heathen, and an abiding glory to Zerubbabel.

Haggai, like Zechariah and Malachi, the two other prophets after the Captivity, does not equal the earlier prophets in language and poetry. He is not, however, deficient in enthusiasm and originality (De Wette). A prophet is not to be measured by his power of description, but by the inherent value of what he utters, and by the purpose he is to subserve. The prophecies of these three prophets are the grand voices of watchmen in the morning watch of the old covenant.

It was Haggai's special office to predict the connection of redemption with the second temple, and of the Davidic dominion with the house of Zerubbabel (ii. 23). God did "give peace in that place" (ii. 9), for Jesus walked and taught in its halls. Haggai prophesied of the new dispensation, and his words (ii. 9) are not applicable to a temple of stone. He was not a legalist; and the two legal questions (ii. 11-14) are put to bring out that the temple of stone does not exert any saving influence, and that it was the people that were sluggish in their work who corrupted every thing they touched. The period of Ezra and Nehemiah did not produce the law, but did inaugurate the discussion of it, which ultimately issued in the Talmud. The Old-Testament preparation for Christianity was negative, as well as positive. The legalism of the post-exile period was gradually transformed into Pharisaism, which brought death to Him whose advent the three post-exile prophets announced.

HAGIOGRAPHIA (holy writings), the name given to the third division of the Old-Testament canon. See CANON, p. 387.

HAHN, August, b. at Grossosterhausen, in Prussian Saxony, March 27, 1792; d. at Breslau, May 13, 1863; studied theology and Oriental languages at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor at Königsberg 1819, at Leipzig 1826, at Breslau 1833, and superintendent-general of Silesia 1843. He was one of the last representatives of the old supernaturalism, and an ardent adversary of the reigning rationalism; but his works (Lehrbuch d. christl. Glaubens, 1827, etc.) are distinguished more by their warmth than by their acuteness. He also wrote on the Gnostics, De quasi Marcionis (1820), Antitheses Marcionis (1823), De canone Marcionis (1826), etc.

HAHN, Johann Michael, was b. at Altdorf, in Würtemberg, Feb. 2, 1758, the son of a peasant. From early youth he received very deep religious impressions, and was given to meditations. He studied the Bible, also the works of Jacob Boehme, Oetinger, and others; but an education for the Church he declined. As he attracted great audiences whenever he spoke publicly, he was summoned before the consistory, but defended himself ably, and lived afterwards quietly and in peace on the estate of the Duchess Franzisea at Sindlingen, where he died in 1819. His writings were published at Tübingen, 12 vols., 1819 sqq. Many of his hymns have been incorporated with the hymn-book of the State Church. His followers, called "Michelians," are numerous in Würtemberg, and lay great stress on sanctification against an over-estimate of justification. They have never separated from the State Church, but live in scattered societies, and assemble now and then, mostly for purposes of charity. The colony of Kornthal, near Stuttgart, was organized after a plan of Hahn. [See PALMER: Vorlesungen ü. d. würt. Secten, 1880.] GRÜNEISEN.

HAIMO, or HAYMO, or AIMO, b. about 778; according to Trithemius, a German by descent; was monk in the monastery of Fulda, teacher in its school, and, from 810 to his death in 853, administrator of the bishopric of Halberstadt. His numerous writings (Expositio in Pauli Epis- tolus, Enarratio in 12 Prophetas minores, Historie sacre epitome, etc.) were published during the Reformation (1519-36) by the Romanists, but belong to a freer and less prejudiced age. He denies that the congregation of Rome was founded by Peter, rejects the doctrine of a universal episcopacy, and opposes the doctrine of transubstantiation, at least in the form given to it by Paschasius. Works in Migne, Pat. Lat., cxvi-cxviii.

HAIR, among the Hebrews, was regarded as an ornament of the man, if not worn too long. From time to time it was clipped; but in consequence of a vow it was suffered to grow (Num. vi. 5). To pluck off the hair (Ez. ix. 3) and let it go dishevelled (Lev. x. 6 [A. V., "uncover your heads"]), or cut it off, was a sign of sorrow (Jer. vii. 29) and of captivity (Isa. vii. 20). A bald head was an object of mockery (2 Kings ii. 23). The young people curled their hair (Song of Solomon v. 11 [marg.]), or made it into locks (Judg. xvi. 13, 19). Both sexes anointed the hair profusely with ointments (Ps. xxiii. 5; Matt. vi. 17). For a woman to have her head shorn or shaven was regarded as a shame (1 Cor. xi. 6; cf. ver. 15). Gray hair was an ornament of the aged (Prov. xx. 29). RÜETSCH.

HALACHAH (norm) is the traditional oral law, embodied in sententious form, contained in the Midrash; which see.

HALDANE, James Alexander, and Robert, brothers, eminent for Christian zeal. They studied at the High School and University of Edinburgh.—J. James was b. at Dundee, July 14, 1768; d. Feb. 8, 1851. In 1785 he entered the navy, but, becoming serious on the subject of religion, returned to Edinburgh. In 1797 and 1798 he travelled through Scotland and the Orkney Islands, preaching to large audiences, and with good results, and in 1799 was ordained pastor of a newly organized independent church in Edinburgh. In 1801 Robert built for the congregation a fine edifice, afterwards known as the Tabernacle. Here James labored for nearly fifty years with excellent success. In 1808 he made public avowal of his conversion to Baptist views. He wrote several tracts and an Exposition of Galatians, Edinburgh, 1848.—H. Robert was b. in London, Feb. 28, 1764; d. in Edinburgh, Dec. 12, 1812. He was in the navy from 1780 to 1783. Having inherited a large property, he settled in 1786 on his estate at Airthrey. From the year 1793, when he became deeply interested on the subject of religion, he was one of the most influential Christian philanthropists and writers of Scotland. Within fifteen years he distributed three hundred and fifty thousand dollars for charitable purposes, and during his life educated three hundred ministers at an expense of a hundred thousand dollars. The years 1816 and 1817 he spent in Geneva and Montauban. At Geneva he opened his parlors in the evening to the theological students of the University, and expounded the Epistle to the Romans. These meetings attracted large audiences of students; and such men as Merle d'Aubigné, Malan, Gausson, were led by them to adopt evangelical views. Mr. Haldane pursued the same course at Montauban. His lectures were embodied in his Comsur l'Épître aux Romains, which appeared in 1819. After his return to Scotland, Mr. Haldane continued to take a prominent part in church movements. In 1816 he published Evidence and Authority of Revelation, and 1828, On the Inspiration of Scripture. The Exposition of the Romans (a useful, and at one time very popular, practical commentary), an enlargement of the French Commentary, appeared in 3 vols., 1835-39; American ed., N.Y., 1853. See Memoirs of the Lives of Robert and J. A. Haldane by ALEXANDER HALDANE, Edinburgh, 1852, N.Y., 1851; and The Haldanes and their Friends, Philadelphia, 1858.

HALE, Matthew, Sir, Lord Chief Justice of England; b. at Alderley, Nov. 1, 1609; d. there Dec. 25, 1676. Graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, he was intending to enter the ministry, when he suddenly turned his attention to the study of law. He signed the Solemn League and Covenant, and was a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines (1643). He sat in Parliament several times; was appointed judge by Cromwell, and was knighted immediately after the Restoration (in 1660). He was a man of prodigious industry in the study of law, and an upright judge. Baxter says of him that he "was most precisely just, inasmuch that I believe he would have lost all he had in the world rather than do an unjust act." His name has a place here on account of its bearer's belief in witchcraft. In 1665, at Bury St. Edmund's, he condemned two prisoners to death on this charge. He was on intimate terms with Baxter, Stillingfleet, and other celebrated divines. His principal religious works are, Contemplations, Moral and Divine; Of the Nature of True Religion, 1684; Brief Abstract of the Christian Religion, 1688. An edition of his Moral and Religious Works, edited by THIRLWALL, appeared in London, 1805, 2 vols. (containing Bishop Burnet's Life). His Life was first written by Bishop BURNET, and since by J. B. WILLIAMS (Lond., 1835) and Lord CAMPBELL, in his Lives of the Chief Justices.

HALES, John, "the ever-memorable;" b. at Bath, April, 1584; d. at Eton, May 19, 1656. He was Greek professor at Oxford (1612), and canon of Windsor (1639). His works were posthumously published under the title Golden Remains, London, 1659, best ed., 1673, modern ed., 1765, 3 vols. They consist of sermons and miscellanies; but appended to the volume are his Letters from the Synod of Dort, 1618 (which he attended, and as the result of which he became an Arminian), together with the Acts of the Synod; so that the Appendix is of great historical value.

HALES, William, D.D., chronologist; d. as rector of Killeshandra, Ireland, Jan. 30, 1731. His New Analysis of Chronology appeared London, 1809-14, 4 vols., 2d ed., 1830, of which vols. 2 and 3 were occupied with Scripture chronology, in which department he is still an authority.

HALF-COMMUNION, when only the bread is given, as in the Roman-Catholic Church.

HALF-WAY COVENANT, an expedient adopted in New-England Congregational churches, between 1657 and 1662, of allowing baptized persons of moral life and orthodox belief to belong to the church so far as to receive baptism for their children, and all the privileges but that of the Lord's Supper for themselves. See CONGREGATIONALISM, p. 538.

HALL, Gordon, a Congregationalist, the first American missionary to Bombay; b. at West Granville (now Tolland), Mass., April 8, 1784; d. of cholera, Bombay, March 20, 1826. He was graduated from Williams College 1808, studied theology, was ordained as a missionary to India, and arrived at Bombay 1813. For thirteen years he prosecuted his labor with diligence and success. He had just finished the revision of the Mahratta version of the New Testament when he died. Besides a few pamphlets, he wrote, in connection with Samuel Newell, The Conversion of the World, or the Claims of Six Hundred Millions, Andover, 1818. See his Memoir by H. Bardwell, And., 1834.

HALL, John Vine, b. at Diss, Norfolk, Eng., March 14, 1774; d. at Maidstone, Sept. 22, 1860. He was a prominent advocate of total abstinence, and the author of The Sinner's Friend (1821). He lived to see 290 editions of the tract printed in 23 languages, and comprising 1,268,000 copies. He distributed 60,000 copies. See his Autobiography edited by his son, Rev. Newman Hall of London (New York, 1865).

HALL, Joseph, a learned divine, and eloquent preacher of the Church of England; b. in Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire, July 1, 1574; d. at Ilgham, near Norwich, Sept. 8, 1656. His mother was a pious woman, and dedicated him early to the ministry. Graduating at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, he was for two successive years lecturer on rhetoric, and became rector of Haldsted, Suffolk, in 1601, from which he passed in 1612 to Waltham Holy Cross. In 1616 he accompanied the Earl of Carlisle on his mission to France, and in 1617 James I. to Scotland. Upon this monarch he lavished, like many of his contemporaries, the grossest adulation. In the sermon on the anniversary of the king's inauguration (March 24, 1613, and printed under the title A Holy Panegyric) he exhausted the English language for laudatory epithets. In 1617 he was made Dean of Worcester, and in 1618 was sent by James, as one of his commissioners, to the synod of Dort. The Latin sermon is still preserved which he preached before that body (Nov. 29, 1618). He was a moderate Calvinist, and sought for a mean between Calvinism and Arminianism, and published a tract (1622) on the subject Via media, the way of peace. In 1627 Dr. Hall was promoted to the see of Exeter, having previously (1624) declined that of Gloucester, and in 1641 was transferred to Norwich. Under Laud he was accused of puritanical leanings, and he was so stung by these accusations that he threatened "to cast up his rocket." He abundantly proved his full attachment to the Church of England in his Episcopacy by Divine Right Asserted (1640). In this work he advocates episcopacy as a form of government recommended by the apostles. Under the Long Parliament he seems to have suffered severely, and was one of the eleven bishops to be imprisoned in the Tower. He was released after a confinement of six months in 1642, but the following year suffered the sequestration of the revenues of his see; an allowance, however, being granted him by Parliament. He has given an account of his trials during this period in his Hard Measure (1647). The latter years of his life he spent in retirement at Ilgham.

Bishop Hall was a man of broad and tolerant sympathies, much piety, and in the pulpit has had few equals for eloquence among English preachers of the Established Church. Of his manner in the pulpit he says, "I never durst to climb into the pulpit to preach any sermon whereof I had not before, in my poor plain fashion, penned every word in the same order wherein I hoped to deliver it," etc. He was a prolific author, and began his literary career by a volume of Satires (1597, 1598), which are among the first in the English language. He wrote several controversial works, among which, in addition to the one on episcopacy mentioned above, was a treatise exposing the corruptions of the Church of Rome under the title The Old Religion (1628). His most valuable works, however, are of a devotional character, and have suggested to Mr. Hallam the propriety of a comparison between their author and Jeremy Taylor. The Contemplations upon the N. Test. (1612-15), Meditations and Vowes (1624), and Explication of all the Hard Texts of the whole divine Scripture (1634), are his principal practical writings. Complete editions of his works by Rev. Josiah Pratt, London, 1808, 10 vols., and Rev. Peter Hall, Oxford, 1839, 12 vols. See Rev. JOHN JONES: Bishop Hall, his Life and Times, London, 1826, which contains the bishop's own Observations of some specialties of divine Providence in his life.

HALL, Robert, one of the most eloquent of modern preachers; b. May 2, 1764, at Arnsby, Leicestershire, where his father, known as the author of a work entitled Zion's Travellers, was pastor of a Baptist church; d. at Bristol, Feb. 21, 1831. He was the youngest of fourteen children; and, though at first of feeble frame, he very early showed his likings for severer studies than those common at such an age; for when he was nine years old he had made himself acquainted with Edwards On the Will, and Butler's Analogy. After attending some local schools, he was for eighteen months at Northampton, under the care of Dr. Ryland, and went in 1778 to the Baptist seminary in Bristol to prepare himself for the ministry. While still a student, he was ordained in 1780; and in 1781 he went to King's College, Aberdeen, where he studied for four years, and where, in 1785, he graduated as M.A. During the last two summer vacations of his Aberdeen course he acted as assistant pastor to Dr. Evans of Bristol; and on leaving the northern university he was appointed classical tutor in the Bristol seminary, an office which he held, in conjunction with his assistant pastorage, for five years. A misunderstanding between the two pastors decided him to resign both his positions in Bristol, and he accepted a call to the Baptist Church, Cambridge, in 1790. Here he remained for fifteen years, increasing in influence and reputation, and already recognized as one of the foremost preachers of his day. His first published sermon appeared in 1791, and was followed at intervals by others, which proved him to be not only an eloquent orator, but also an earnest advocate of liberty and education. But two attacks of insanity, with but a brief interval between them, caused him to leave Cambridge; and in 1806 he removed to Leicester, where he labored for twenty years, when, at the call of the Broadmead Church, he returned to Bristol to finish his ministry where it was begun, for there he died.

Throughout the greater part of his life Hall was a martyr to the severest physical suffering; and the spirit which he manifested under it, together with the work which he forced himself to do in spite of it, entitled him to be ranked among the heroes of his age. In theological opinion he was at first unsettled; but ultimately he became a Calvinist, after the type of Andrew Fuller, and was one of the ablest assailants of Socinianism. On the subject of communion he he was opposed to Fuller, and his treatise on it is among the ablest of his works. He was an earnest supporter of the missionary enterprise; and through the pages of the Eclectic Review, as well as by his published sermons on Modern Infidelity, Popular Ignorance, and Christianity Consistent with a Love of Freedom, he did much to liberalize the opinions of his generation. He was eminent as a conversationalist; and some able men have left accounts of their interviews with him, which remind us a little of the talk of Johnson as reported by Boswell. But though he had all the quickness, and some of the roughness, of the gruff lexicographer, he had little of his self-sufficiency, and had now and then a pathos that was all his own. His special pre-eminence, however, was in the pulpit. He spoke without notes, but not without preparation; for he admitted that most of his great sermons were first worked out in thought, and then elaborated in the very words in which they were delivered. He could repeat them verbatim after the lapse of years; and though it was affirmed by many that his perorations were impromptu, he declared that they were the most carefully studied parts of his discourses. In his printed sermons his style is characterized by energy clothed in elegance, and moving on in a certain rhythmic stateliness; in his spoken discourse there was a severer simplicity; but in both there was perfect clearness. His manner was that of one who was entirely absorbed in his subject, and was quite unconscious of his mode of utterance. At first his voice was so low as to be scarcely audible, and there seemed to be a little hesitation; but, as he proceeded, that was overcome, and he poured forth with wonderful fluency, and unsurpassed command of language, a continuous stream of eloquence. Now it was description, now it was argument, now it was apostrophe, and now it was appeal; but it was always quiet, always clear, and always cogent. He had very little action. His usual attitude was to stand with his chest leaning against the cushion, and his left arm resting on the Bible, while his right was slightly raised. But such was the impression produced by his words, that, before he had spoken many minutes, all thought of the man and his manner disappeared from the hearer's mind, and he felt himself face to face with the subject alone. His fame, great while he lived, has become a cherished tradition among English-speaking Christians, and his works are among the classics of the modern pulpit.

HALLEL (praise). Psalms cxiii.—cxviii. are so named because each of them begins with Hallelujah; also called the Egyptian Hallel, because "it was chanted in the temple during the slaughter of the Passover lambs, according to the enactment first made in Egypt." They were sung, according to rabbinical enactment, on the first of the month, and at the feasts of Dedication, Tabernacles, Weeks, and the Passover. On the last occasion, Psalms cxiii. and cxiv., according to the school of Hillel (Psalm cxiii. only, according to the school of Shammai), were sung before the feast, and the others at the close, after the last cup. The "hymn" which our Lord and his disciples sang after the Last Supper (Matt. xxvi. 30) was the second part of the Hallel (Ps. cxv.—cxviii.).

HALLELU'JAH (הלל יהוה, Ἀλληλούϊα, "Praise ye Jah"). It stands at the beginning, or close, or both, of many psalms in the Hebrew (e.g., civ. 35. cvi. 1. 48. cxvi. 19), and therefore naturally became a formula of praise, and was chanted as such on solemn days of rejoicing (cf. Rev. xix. 1. 3. 4. 6). The psalms in which it occurs are all in the last book of the collection, and apparently were intended for temple use. Hallelujah passed over into the Christian Church as a doxology, the more readily since it was a word adapted to singing. It was used especially at Easter. In the Greek Church it is used "not only on days of gladness, but more constantly on occasions of mourning and fasting and burials." In the Book of Common Prayer it is translated, and uttered by the minister, "Praise ye the Lord;" to which the people reply, "The Lord's name be praised." See HALLEL.

HALLER, Albrecht von, b. at Bern, Oct. 16, 1708; d. there Dec. 17, 1777; was professor of anatomy and botany at Göttingen from 1736 to 1753, and one of the greatest physiologists and botanists of his age. He was also a very pious man, and his Briefe ü. d. wichtigsten Wahrheiten d. Offenbarung (1772) and Briefe z. Vertheidigung d. Offenbarung (1775-77) made a deep impression on his contemporaries. See GÜDER: Albrecht von Haller als Christ, Basel, 1878 (20 pp.).

HALLER, Berthold, b. at Aldingen, Württemberg, 1492; d. at Bern, Feb. 25, 1536; studied theology at Cologne, and became teacher at the gymnasium of Bern in 1513, assistant preacher at the Church of St. Vincent in 1515, and preacher in 1519, after Dr. Th. Wyttenbach. In 1521 he became acquainted with Zwingli; but even before that time he had begun to preach the Reformation in Bern, and continued so doing, in spite of the assiduous resistance of the Roman-Catholic party. In 1525 he ceased reading mass; in 1526 he partook in the conference of Baden, not altogether without success; and in 1528 he was the leading spirit in the conference of Bern, which resulted in the edict of Feb. 7, 1528, establishing the Reformation in that city. Some of his letters are found in Zwingli's Works, edited by Schuler and Schulkess. vols. vii. and viii.; but else he left no literary monuments. See KIRCHNER: B. Haller, Zürich, 1828; PESTALOZZI: B. Haller, Eiberfeld, 1861. F. TRECHSEL.

HALLEY, Robert, a distinguished preacher and scholar among the Congregationalists of England; on his father's side of Scotch descent; b. at Blackheath, near London, Aug. 13, 1796; d. at Arundel, Surrey, Aug. 18, 1876. He received an excellent classical education at Bere Regis, afterwards at Greenwich, and concluded his theological instruction at Hamerton College, London. He was probably the last nonconformist minister who found it necessary, when preaching as a student, to receive a license from a magistrate under the provisions of the Toleration Act. He was ordained pastor of the church at "The Old Meeting," St. Neots, Huntingdonshire, June 11, 1822. Here he also taught a school. In 1826 he became classical tutor at Highbury College, London. While here he took active part in the anti-slavery movement and in the Unitarian controversy. His letter to Mr. Bates, entitled The Improved Version Truly Designated a Creed (London, 1834), led to his receiving the degree of D.D. from Princeton. In 1839 he was invited to succeed Dr. McAll as pastor of the Mosley-street Chapel, Manchester, whence, nine years later, he removed to the new building, which became necessary for the growth of the church, in Cavendish Street of the same city. In 1843 and 1850 he delivered his two courses of Congregational Lectures on the Sacraments,—a very able, learned, and candid work. In 1847 he published a small volume on Baptism. In 1857 he was invited to the chair of professor of theology, and the position of principal in New College, London, which he occupied for fifteen years. Here he published his History of Puritanism and Nonconformity in Lancashire,—one of the most graphic and interesting pictures of Puritan life. He retired from the college in 1872. He was one of the ablest platform-speakers of his time. Ardent, witty, exceedingly fair to opponents, he produced most wonderful effects upon general audiences. His eulogium upon Abraham Lincoln at a meeting of the Congregational Union of England and Wales was an extraordinary instance of oratorical power and polemical effect. LEWELYN D. BEVAN.

HALLOCK, William Allen, b. in Plainfield, Mass., June 2, 1794; d. in New-York City, Saturday, Oct. 2, 1880. He was graduated at Williams College 1819, and at Andover Theological Seminary 1822; entered the service of the New-England Tract Society at Boston, and in 1825 took a prominent part in organizing the American Tract Society, of which he was the first secretary, and for forty-five years served the society in this capacity with rare fidelity and ability. Under his fostering care its publications year by year increased in number and usefulness. He edited the American Messenger for many years, and wrote Lives of Rev. Dr. Justin Edwards and Harlan Page, besides several excellent tracts. It has been calculated, that, of his own publications, nearly a million and a half copies have been circulated. See his Memorial, by Mrs. H. C. KNIGHT, New York, 1882.

HALSEY, Luther, D.D., LL.D., b. at Schenectady, N. Y., Jan. 1, 1794; d. at Norristown, Penn., Friday, Oct. 29, 1880. He was professor of theology in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, Allegheny, Penn., 1829-37, and in the latter year went to the chair of ecclesiastical history and church polity in Auburn Theological Seminary, but resigned in 1844. From 1847 to 1850 he acted as professor of church history in the Union Theological Seminary, New-York City. For several years before his death he lived in retirement.

HALYBURTON, Thomas, b. at Duplin, near Perth, Dec. 25, 1674; professor of divinity at St. Andrew's, 1710; d. there Sept. 23, 1712. He wrote, The Great Concern of Salvation (published by the Presbyterian Board, Philadelphia), Natural Religion Insufficient, etc., also an Autobiography (Edinburgh, 1715), which has been several times republished (e.g., London, 1824). See the edition of his works by Rev. Robert Burns, D.D., London, 1835.

HAMANN, Johann Georg, b. in Königsberg, Aug. 27, 1730; d. at Münster, June 20, 1788; received a somewhat desultory education; studied ancient literature and languages, philology and belles-lettres, at the university of his native city 1746-51; went to Courland as tutor in a private family; became acquainted with the great mercantile house of Berens in Riga, began to study national economy, and made, in the service of the house and for some mercantile purpose, a journey to England. In London he fell in with bad company, and was cheated of his money. In his destitution he took to the Bible; and a conversion followed, deep and complete. After a short visit to Riga, he settled in Königsberg 1759; held first a small office in the administration, afterwards a better one in the custom-house, and devoted himself to literature. His books (Biblische Betrachtungen, Gedanken ü. meinen Lebenslauf, Golgotha, und Scheblimini, etc.) are mostly small pamphlets; but they made a deep impression, and procured for him the name of the "Magus of the North." They are queer, dense obscurity and lightning-like clearness, fugitive allusions and powerful thoughts of universal import, alternating with each other; but they are full of stirring suggestiveness. His last years he spent in the circles of Jacobi and the Princess Galitzin. A collected edition of his works, in eight volumes, by F. Roth, appeared in Berlin, 1821-43. Selections from his works were made by A. W. Möller, Münster, 1826. See GILDEMEISTER: Hamanns Leben u. Schriften, 1857-68, 5 vols.; J. DISSELHOF: *Wegweiser zu J. G. HA'MATH (חַמָּתַי, "fortress," Ἐμὰθ, now Hamah) has from the oldest times, and down to our days, been one of the most important cities of Syria. Situated among the northern spurs of the Libanon (Josh. xiii. 5; Judg. iii. 3), in the narrow but well-watered and exceedingly fertile valley of the Orontes, and having easy connections to the south with Damascus (Zech. ix. 2; Jer. xlix. 23), and the east with Zobah (1 Chron. xviii. 3, 9; 2 Chron. viii. 3), it very early formed one of the principal stations on the commercial and military road from Phœnicia to the Euphrates. It was originally a Canaanite colony (Gen. x. 18), but was afterwards taken by the Syrians. With a small territory comprising the city of Riblah (2 Kings xxiii. 33, xxv. 21), it formed an independent state under a king, and maintained at various periods various relations with the Jewish state. In the time of Hezekiah it was taken by the Assyrians (2 Kings xviii. 34, xix. 13; Isa. x. 9, xxxvi. 9); and "men from Hamath" were carried to Samaria, and settled there in place of the Israelites (2 Kings xvii. 24, 30). In the middle ages it was again the capital of a small independent state. The celebrated historian and geographer Abulfeda (d. 1331) lived there. At present it has about thirty thousand inhabitants. Not to be confounded with this Hamath is that belonging to the tribe of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). Four stones covered with as yet undeciphered inscriptions were found at Hamah. The writing is probably Hittite. See HITTITES. RÜETSCH.

HAMBURG, with a territory comprising an area of 138 square miles, contained, according to the census of 1877, a population of 406,014, of which about 89 per cent were Lutherans, 13,796 were Jews, 7,771 Roman Catholics, and 5,585 belonged to other evangelical denominations. When Hamburg, in 1529, adopted the Reformation, the church constitution excluded all who were not Lutherans from the city and its territory. In 1567 members of the Anglican Church, in 1605 members of the Dutch Reformed Church, and in 1648, by the peace of Westphalia, Roman Catholics, were allowed to live in the city; but they could not become citizens, nor could they celebrate worship in public. By the new civil constitution of Sept. 28, 1860, religious liberty was introduced, and all civil disqualifications from religious regard abolished. The Lutheran Church is governed by a synod consisting of fifty-three members; namely, thirty-five laymen, sixteen ecclesiastics, and two senators, and elected by the congregations. The ecclesiastical council, consisting of nine members, four laymen, three ecclesiastics, and two senators, and chosen by the synod, has the executive power, and carries on the whole administration.

HAMELMANN, Hermann, b. at Osnabrück, 1525; d. in Oldenburg, June 26, 1595; was educated in the Roman-Catholic religion, and curate of Camen, but embraced the Reformation 1552, and labored with great success for its progress as superintendent-general in Brunswick 1568-72, and Oldenburg 1573-95. Of his works (forty-five in number) his Opera genealogico-historica de Westphalia et Saxoniam inferiori (edited by Wasserbach, Lemgo, 1711) are of great interest. His Life was written by KAUSCHENBUSCH, Schwelm, 1830, and CLEMEN: D. Einführung d. Ref. zu Lemgo, Lemgo, 1847.

HAMILTON, James, D.D., eminent Presbyterian divine; b. at Lonend, Paisley, Scotland, Nov. 27, 1811; came to London, 1841, as pastor of the National Scotch Church, Regent's Square; d. there Nov. 24, 1867. He was an acknowledged master of pulpit oratory, and author of some of the most widely circulated books of his day. Of his Life in Earnest (1844), sixty-four thousand had been sold before 1852, and, of his Mount of Olives, sixty-four thousand before 1853. Besides these, he wrote The Royal Preacher (1851), an excellent homiletical commentary upon Ecclesiastes; The Lamp and the Lantern (1853), later title The Light upon the Path; The Prodigal Son (1866). A collected edition of his works was published, London, 1873, 6 vols.; his select works, New York, 1875, 4 vols. See his Life by WILLIAM ARNOT, New York, 4th ed., 1871.

HAMILTON, Patrick, the proto-martyr of the Scottish Reformation; b. about 1503-04, at Stanehouse, Lanark, or Kincavel, Lullithgow; burned at St. Andrew's on Feb. 29, 1528. His father was a natural son of the first Lord Hamilton, knighted for his bravery, and rewarded with the above lands and barony, by his sovereign, James IV. His mother was a daughter of Alexander, Duke of Albany, second son of James II.; so that he was closely connected with some of the highest families in the land. His cousins, John and James Hamilton, before the Reformation, rose to episcopal rank in the old church; and several others of his relatives attained high promotion. Destined himself for such promotion, Patrick was carefully educated, and, according to the corrupt custom of the times, was in his fourteenth year appointed to the abbacy of Ferne in Ross-shire, to enable him to maintain himself in comfort while studying abroad. Like many of his aristocratic countrymen at that period, he went first to the University of Paris, and probably to the College of Montaign, where John Major, the great doctor of his country, was then teaching with so much clat, and gathering round him, as he did afterwards at St. Andrew's, an ardent band of youthful admirers, who in the end were to advance beyond their preceptor, and to lend the influence of their learning and character to the side of the Reformers. Before the close of 1520 Patrick Hamilton took the degree of M.A. at Paris, and soon after left that university for Louvain, to avail himself of the facilities for linguistic study provided there, or to enjoy personal intercourse with Erasmus, the patron of the new learning. At this date he was probably more of an Erasmian than a Lutheran, though of that more earnest school who were ultimately to outgrow their teacher, and find their home in a new church. We know he made great progress in the languages and philosophy, and was specially drawn towards the system of Plato. With "the sophists of Louvain" he had no sympathy. But there were some there, as well as at Paris, whose hearts God had touched, to whom he could not fail to be drawn. He may even have met with the young Augustinian monks of Antwerp, whom, so soon after his departure, these sophists denounced, and forced to seal their testimony with their blood. In the course of 1522 he returned to Scotland, going first, we can hardly doubt, to visit his widowed mother and his relations, whom he loved so well, but proceeding soon to prosecute his studies at St. Andrew's. He matriculated there on June 9, 1523, the same day that his old preceptor Major was incorporated into the university and admitted as principal of the Pædagogium, or, as it came afterwards to be called, St. Mary's College. Probably he heard there those lectures on the Gospels which Major afterwards published in Paris. But his sympathies were more with the young canons of the Augustinian priory than with the old scholastic; and possibly it was that he might take a place among the teachers of their college of St. Leonards, that on Oct. 3, 1524, he was received as a member of the Faculty of Arts. He was a proficient, not only in the languages and philosophy, but also in the art of sacred music, which the canons and the alumni of their college were bound to cultivate. He composed "what the musicians call a mass, arranged in parts for nine voices," and acted himself as preceptor of the choir when it was sung. He is said also to have taken on him the priesthood, that he "might be admitted to preach the word of God;" but Mr. David Laing questions if he was in holy orders at all, as no mention is made of his degradation before his martyrdom. In 1526, while James Beatoun, the primate, disguised as a shepherd, was tending a flock on the hills of Fife, the New Testament of Tyndale's translation was brought over from the Low Countries by the Scottish traders. A large proportion of the copies are said to have been taken to St. Andrew's, and circulated there. Hamilton seized the opportunity to commend the holy book and its long-forgotten truths to those over whom he had influence. His doings could not long escape the notice of the returned archbishop. He was not naturally cruel, or likely, after his recent misfortunes, to desire to embroil himself in a quarrel with the powerful Hamiltons. But he had those about him, particularly his nephew the future cardinal, who were more relentless, and less careful of consequences, and so far he yielded to their wishes. Still he was anxious to perform the ungrateful task in the least offensive way; and by issuing, or threatening to issue, a summons charging him with heresy, he got rid of the Reformer, for a time, without imbruing his hands in his blood. Hamilton, yielding to the counsels of friends and opponents, made his escape to the Continent. His original intention had been to visit Luther and Melancthon at Wittenberg, as well as Frith, Tyndale and Lambert, at Marburg. But Dr. Merle d'Aubigné says that the plague was then raging at Wittenberg, and that he went straight to the newly opened university of Marburg, over which Lambert presided, and that he publicly disputed there those theses as to the law and gospel which fully set forth the main doctrines which he taught, and for which at last he suffered. He had much profitable intercourse with Tyndale, as well as with Lambert, and was urged to remain in that quiet refuge. But he yearned over his native land, still in darkness and the shadow of death; and, late in the autumn of 1527, he returned to it, determined to brave death itself, rather than prove faithless to his Master where before he had shrunk from an ordeal so terrible. Nor was it long ere his resolution was put to the test. After he had labored for a very short time in his native district, gained over to the truth several of his relatives, and won the heart of a young lady of noble birth, to whom he united himself in marriage, he was invited by the archbishop to a conference with the chiefs of the church "on such points as might seem to stand in need of reform." At first all displayed a conciliatory spirit, and appeared to recognize the evils existing in the church: some even seemed, in some points, to share his sentiments, and for nearly a month all possible freedom in making known his views was allowed to him. At length the mask was thrown aside. On Feb. 28 he was seized, and on the 29th brought out for trial in the cathedral. Among the articles with which he was charged and the truth of which he maintained, the more important were, "that a man is not justified by works, but by faith; that faith, hope, and charity are so linked together, that he who hath one of them hath all, and he that lacketh one lacketh all; and that good works make not a good man, but a good man doeth good works." On being challenged by his accuser, he also affirmed it was not lawful to worship images, nor to pray to the saints; and that it was "lawful to all men that have souls to read the word of God; and that they are able to understand the same, and in particular the latter will and testament of Jesus Christ." These truths, which have been the source of life and strength to many, were then to him the cause of condemnation and death; and the same day the sentence was passed, it was remorselessly executed. But, through all his excruciating sufferings, the martyr held fast his confidence in God and in his Saviour; and the faith of many in the truths he taught was only the more confirmed by witnessing their mighty power on him. Nay, "the reek of Patrick Hamilton infected all on whom it did blow."

LIT. — The older authorities for the facts of Hamilton's life are the notices in the Commentary of ALESIUS on Ps. xxxvii., and in the Introduction to LAMBERT'S Commentary on the Apocalypse, in the Actes and Monuments of FOXE, in the Histories of KNOX, CALDERWOOD, SPOTTISWOODE, and in the Chronicle of LINDSAY of Pitcottie. The only formal biography of the martyr is that published in our own day by the late principal Lorimer, and intended to form the first of a series on the "Precursors of Knox." Its title is Patrick Hamilton, the First Preacher and Martyr of the Scottish Reformation: a Historical Biography, collected from original sources, etc., Edinburgh, 1857. The story of the martyr has since been told, in his own dramatic way, by Dr. Merle d'Aubigné, in vol. vi. of his Reformation in Europe in the Time of Calvin. Still more recently it has been made the subject of a veritable drama by Rev. T. P. Johnston, Patrick Hamilton, a Tragedy of the Reformation in Scotland, Edinburgh, 1882.

A. F. MITCHELL

(Professor of the University of St. Andrews).

HAMILTON, Sir William (Baronet), professor of logic and metaphysics, University of Edinburgh, was b. March 8, 1788, at the College of Glasgow, where his father was professor of anatomy and botany. He studied first in Glasgow University, afterwards in Edinburgh University, and finally in the University of Oxford. He at first devoted himself to medical studies; but during residence at Oxford he concentrated upon classics and philosophy, at which period he is described as a "solitary student" (Veitch's Life, p. 42). When passing his examination, he professed the whole works of Aristotle, and results showed that his study of the Stagirite had been careful and minute. Hamilton turned to the legal profession, passing for the Scotch bar in 1813. Shortly after, he established his claim to the baronetcy of Hamilton of Preston, and was thenceforth known as Sir William. He twice visited Germany during the years following, but does not seem by these visits to have made the acquaintance of any noted philosophers. In 1820 he became a candidate for the chair of moral philosophy in Edinburgh University, vacant by the death of Thomas Brown. He was supported in his candidature by Dugald Stewart, the senior professor, incapacitated for the active duties of the chair. John Wilson ("Christopher North" of literature) was, however, the successful candidate, and became professor of ethics; while Hamilton waited for the more congenial sphere of teacher of logic and metaphysics. In 1821 Hamilton was elected professor of history in the University of Edinburgh. From 1826 he gave himself for two or three years to the study of the functions of the brain, which resulted in pronounced antagonism to phrenology. For summary of results, see Lects. on Metaphysics, vol. I., Appendix, pp. 404-441. In 1829 appeared his celebrated article on The Philosophy of the Unconditioned (Edinburgh Review, No. 99, Hamilton's Discussions, p. 1). This was the first of a series of important articles which extended over a period of sixteen years. In 1836 he was elected to the chair of logic and metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh, which chair he held till his death, in 1856.

Hamilton was the learned and vigorous expounder of the Scotch philosophy of common sense, or knowledge of first principles common to all men, and incapable of being either proved or doubted. He was conspicuous as the defender and expounder of Thomas Reid, and was the first of the Scottish school who felt the influence of Kant, whose theory of knowledge he critically handled. Hamilton's contributions to philosophy may best be grouped under these heads: 1, His analysis of consciousness and his treatment of external perception in psychology; 2, His philosophy of the unconditioned in metaphysics; and, 3, His analytic of logical forms in pure logic. We must restrict here to a brief account of the two first named.

His treatment of consciousness (Lects. on Metaphysics, XI.-XVI., especially the first and two last) involves a contribution to philosophy of great value. It includes analysis of the act of consciousness, the relation of consciousness to the special faculties, the phenomena of external perception, and the ultimate facts of consciousness essential to its exercise. Excepting the debatable question of external perception, the whole discussion is of the first importance, involving much that is now universally accepted in mental philosophy. Under the last division great service is done for an intuitional theory, while he prepares much critical work for sensationalists. Consciousness, he says, is the "essential element" or "necessary condition" of all experience, — "knowledge that I exist in some determinate state," "the recognition by the thinking subject of its own acts or affections." It is an immediate knowledge, involving discrimination, that is, judgment and memory, as its conditions. This detailed treatment of consciousness was a very marked advance on the work of Reid and Stewart, vindicating the fundamental position of Descartes, giving greater breadth and clearness of exposition to the Scotch philosophy, gaining the assent of the leaders of the experiential school, — such as J. S. Mill (Exam. of Hamilton's Philos., chap. VIII.)

and Herbert Spenceer (First Principles, chap. IV., § 24),—and presenting an insuperable difficulty to the opponents of introspection. In the midst of the conflict connected with interpretation of consciousness, consciousness itself is certainty,—the province within which scepticism is impossible.

Hamilton's law of the conditioned, with correlative philosophy of the unconditioned, is that which comes into nearest relation with theology. His law of the conditioned is, "that all that is conceivable in thought lies between two extremes, which, as contradictory of each other, cannot both be true, but of which, as mutually contradictory, one must" (Metaph., II. 368. Lect. 38). "The law of the mind, that the conceivable is in every relation bounded by the inconceivable. I call the law of the conditioned" (p. 373). This involved his position as to the Infinite,—that the Infinite is "incognizable and inconceivable." This doctrine on its philosophic side is a protest against Kant's sceptical result affirming that reason lands in hopeless contradictions: on its theological side it proclaims the impossibility of knowing the Absolute Being. Only by taking first the philosophic aspect can we correctly interpret its theological relations. Kant had made a priori elements only forms of the mind; and accordingly the ideas of self, the universe, and God, became only regulative of our intellectual procedure, and in no sense guaranties of truth. Accordingly Kant has dwelt on "the self-contradiction of seemingly dogmatical cognitions (thesis cum antithesi) in none of which we can discover any decided superiority." These were that the world had a beginning, that it had not; that every composite substance consists of simple parts, that no composite thing does; that causality according to the laws of nature is not the only causality operating to originate the world, that there is no other causality; that there is an absolutely necessary being, that there is not any such being. Hamilton's object was to maintain that such contradictions are not the product of reason, but of an attempt to press reason beyond its proper limits. If, then, we allow that the conceivable is only of the relative and bounded, we recognize at once that the so-called antinomies of reason are the result of attempts to push reason beyond its own province, to make our conceptions the measure of existence, attempting to bring the incomprehensible within the limits of comprehension. Thus far a real service was rendered by Hamilton in criticising the sceptical side of Kant's Critique of Pure Reason. He estimated this result so highly as to say of it, "If I have done any thing meritorious in philosophy, it is in the attempt to explain the phenomena of these contradictions" (Append. Metaph., I. p. 402). At this point Hamilton ranks Reid superior to Kant; the former ending in certainty, the latter in uncertainty. But there remains for Hamilton's philosophy the question, If we escape contradiction by refusing to attempt to draw the inconceivable within the limits of conception, what is the source of certainty as to the Infinite? how are knowledge and thought related to the existence and attributes of the Infinite Being? Here Hamilton is entangled in the perplexity of affirming that to be certain which is yet unknowable. That there is an Absolute Being, source of all finite existence, is, according to him, a certainty; but that we can have any knowledge of the fact is by him denied. Reid had maintained the existence of the Supreme Being as a necessary truth (Intell. Powers, Essay IV. chap. 3); and Hamilton affirms that the divine existence is at least a natural inference (Metaph., Lect. 3); but he nevertheless holds that the Deity cannot by us be known. This is with him an application of the law of the conditioned,—a conclusion inevitable under admission that all knowledge implies the relative, the antithesis of subject and object. This doctrine of ignorance was developed by Mansel (Limits of Religious Thought), and eagerly embraced by the experientialists, J. S. Mill (Exam. of Hamilton's Philos., chap. IV.) and Herbert Spenceer (First Principles, Pt. I.; The Unknowable, chap. IV.; The Relativity of all Knowledge). This gave an impulse to agnosticism, the influence of which must be largely credited to Kant, who reduced the a priori to a form of mental procedure, and to Hamilton, who rejected Kant's view, yet regarded the absolute as incognizable. See Agnosticism. For an understanding of Hamilton's position the following references may suffice: "Mind rises to its highest dignity when viewed as the object through which, and through which alone, our unassisted reason can ascend to the knowledge of God" (Metaph., Lect. II.). "The notion of a God is not contained in the notion of a mere First Cause," nor is the notion completed by adding "the attribute of omnipotence." "Not until the two great attributes of intelligence and virtue are brought in" have we "the belief in a veritable Divinity;" to which statement it is added, by way of exposition, "that virtue involves liberty" (Ib.). "The assertion of theism" is "the assertion that the universe is created by intelligence, and governed not only by physical, but by moral laws" (Ib.). From these passages it is obvious, that, when Hamilton is discussing the rational explanation of the universe, he speaks unreservedly of "the knowledge of God," "mediately through his works," interchanging "knowledge" and "belief" in his statements. But when he treats of the limits of knowledge, the law of the conditioned, the inconceivability of the unconditioned, he denies the possibility of knowledge, and makes faith the only possible exercise. "The infinite God cannot by us, in the present limitation of our faculties, be comprehended or conceived" (Metaph., Lect. 38). He adds, however, "We know God according to the finitude of our faculties;" but "faith—belief—is the organ by which we apprehend what is beyond our knowledge." In judging of this, two things are to be noticed: that he reasons from conception to knowledge, not vice versa,—"The mind can conceive, and consequently can know, only the limited" (Discussions, Essay I.),—and that he makes faith a cognitive power.

HAMMOND, Henry, D.D., a learned divine; b. at Chertsey in Surrey, Eng., Aug. 26, 1605; d. at Westwood, Worcestershire, April 25, 1660. He was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, 1625, rector of Penshurst 1633, D.D. 1639, canon of Christ Church 1645, and chaplain to Charles I. 1645-47, sub-dean of Christ Church 1648, but shortly expelled for his loyalty to the Stuarts, and imprisoned in Oxford, freed, and lived out his days in privacy. He was a man of the very highest character. Dr. Fell expatiates at great length, but very entertainingly, upon his many virtues. He never married, although, according to Dr. Fell, he twice felt strongly inclined that way. He was nominated one of the Westminster Assembly of divines, but never sat among them; and his nomination was soon afterwards revoked because of his loyalty to the king's cause. Among his works the best are A Practical Catechism (1644), Paraphrase and Annotations upon the New Testament (1653, reprinted Oxford, 1845, 4 vols.), upon the Book of Psalms (1659, reprinted Oxford, 1850, 2 vols.), and upon the Ten First Chapters of Proverbs. His Catechism appeared anonymously in a small edition at Oxford, and did not attract much notice until the appearance of the second edition (1646), when it suddenly leaped into such popularity that fifteen editions were printed before 1715: it covers 175 pages of the folio edition of Hammond's works. But of more importance is his Paraphrase, in which he reveals genuine exegetical tact and learning. That on the New Testament was translated into Latin, and annotated by LeClerc, Amsterdam, 1698. His Life was written by Bishop JOHN FELL, London, 1661. His complete Works were published London, 1674-84, 4 vols. folio; his Miscellaneous Theological Works, in the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, Oxford, 1817-50, 3 vols. Svo. Both these editions of his Works contain Fell's Life.

HAMPDEN, Renn Dickson, an English prelate; b. in the Barbadoes, 1793; d. in London, April, 23, 1865. He was educated at Oriel College, Oxford; became fellow there with Keble and Newnan; filled, in succession, the curacies of Newton, Faringdon, and Hackney; was tutor in Oriel 1828, and principal of St. Mary's Hall 1833. In 1832 he delivered the Bampton Lectures, choosing for his subject The Scholastic Philosophy considered in its Relation to Christian Theology (3d ed., 1848). These lectures exposed him to the charge of Arianism; but in spite of this he was chosen Regius Professor of Divinity in 1836. In 1848 he was promoted to the see of Hereford, and consecrated, in spite of the remonstrance of thirteen bishops. The question of the bishop's orthodoxy was the subject of a heated pamphlet discussion, for the literature of which see ALLIBONE. Among Hampden's writings are Philosophical Evidence of Christianity (1827), Parochial Sermons (1826), The Fathers of the Greek Philosophy (Edinburgh, 1862).

HAMON, Jean, b. at Cherbourg, 1618; d. in Port-Royal, Feb. 22, 1687; studied medicine in Paris, and began to practise with great success, but sold in 1651 all his property, distributed the money among the poor, and became a hermit in Port-Royal. Of his numerous ascetic writings the principal are, Traité de piété, Pratique de la prière continue, an autobiography in imitation of Augustine's Confessiones, Lettres et opuscules, etc. The best life of him is found in BESOIGNE: Histoire de l'abbé de Port-Royal, vol. iv.

HÄNDEL, Georg Friedrich, b. in Halle, Prussia, Feb. 24, 1684; d. in London, April 13, 1759; received his musical education in his native city, Berlin, and Hamburg; visited Italy 1706-09, and was chapel-master to the elector of Hanover 1709-12, but settled in the latter year in England, and soon became thoroughly nationalized. His Italian operas, of which he produced about fifty, are now forgotten, with the exception of some detached arias; but, under the influence of the strong religious feeling of the English people, he composed about twenty oratorios, — Esther (1720), Israel in Egypt (1738), Messiah (1741), Judas Macabæus (1746), Jephthah (1751), — and thereby exercised an influence on English taste and English art which is paralleled only by that of Shakespeare's dramas.

HANDICRAFTS AMONG THE HEBREWS.

That the first craftsman mentioned in Scripture, Tubal-Cain (Gen. iv. 22), was a worker in metals, indicates that metal-working was one of the earliest crafts among the Hebrews; and the circumstance becomes so much the more significant, as the general Hebrew expression for an artisan (מְחַיָּב) primitively denotes a worker in metals, or, at least, a worker in some hard material. All such kinds of labor as required less strength and skill, and administered only to the necessities of every-day life (baking, weaving, tailoring, house-building, etc.), were in the oldest time performed by the householder, the women, and the slaves, and continued to be performed in that way even after each kind had developed into a specific trade (1 Sam. ii. 19; 2 Sam. xiii. 8; Prov. xxxi. 22; Acts ix. 39). Corporations organized in the form of castes, or monopolies belonging exclusively to certain families, did not exist among the Hebrews; and when we hear of a certain place where artisans of the tribe of Judah were working, or of certain occupations, such as byssus-weaving, which were inherited in certain families of the tribe of Judah, these are only insulated occurrences, probably incidental remembrances from the time the people lived in Egypt. Nevertheless, in the cities the members of the same trade generally lived together in the same neighborhood: there were in Jerusalem a bakers'-street (Jer. xxxvii. 21), a square near the gate leading into the valley of Ben-Hinnom, where the potters had their shops (Jer. xix. 2), a quarter occupied mainly by the noisy iron-industry and metal-works (Joseph., Bell. Jud., v. 8. 1), etc. When the Hebrews left Egypt, they had among them skilled workmen in gold, silver, brass, wood, leather, textile fabrics, cut stones, etc. But, when the generation of artists educated in Egypt died out in the desert, the development of the mechanical arts seemed to come to a standstill; and during the confusion of the period of the Judges, and under the heavy pressure of enemies, who often carried away as prisoners of war the artisans, especially the metal-workers, in order to weaken the conquered people (Judg. v. 8; 1 Sam. xiii. 19), many arts became lost among the Hebrews, or fell into decay. If a steady development had taken place from the exodus of Egypt to the period of the kings, David and Solomon would have needed no foreign masters. As it was, the Phœnicians became the teachers of the Hebrews (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Ez. xiv. 1, xxii. 15; 1 Kings v. 1 sqq., vii. 13 sqq.). A little later we find, especially in the larger cities, many kinds of work, which formerly were left to the domestic industry, organized into specific trades, such as baking, fulling, cheese-making, hair-cutting, etc. (Hos. vii. 4; Jer. xxxvii. 21; 2 Kings xviii. 17). To pursue a trade was, at least in later times, not considered degrading among the Jews: on the contrary, the Mishna censures the exclusive occupation with studies, and puts it down as a duty to learn a trade. "It is better to make the Sabbath a working-day than to be dependent on other people. Do the meanest work, if it can support you, and do it publicly, and without saying, 'I am a priest and a great man, for whom such work is unbecoming.'" Like Paul, the most celebrated rabbis earned their livelihood by some handicraft; Jochanan was a sandal-maker; Isaac a smith; Abin a carpenter; Hillel is said to have earned his bread by cutting up wood. Some trades, however, such as had to deal with unclean things, or brought the workman in contact with women, were considered less honorable: the weaver, barber, tanner, fuller, etc., could not become king or high priest. With respect to wages, the law said that the day's work should be paid at the day's end (Lev. xix. 13; Deut. xxiv. 15). HAN'NAH (sweetness, a common female name among the Hebrews and Phœnicians, cf., in Virgil, Dido's sister Anna) was one of the wives of Elkanah of Ramathaim-Zophim (1 Sam. i. 1, 2). She was barren for many years; but, in answer to her earnest prayer, Jehovah sent her a son, whom she called Samuel (see art.). Her magnificent song of praise at his birth (1 Sam. ii. 1-10) is the prototype of the Magnificat, the song of Mary the mother of our Lord (Luke i. 46-55).

HANSIZ, Mark, b. at Völkermarkt, in Carinthia, April 23, 1683; d. in Vienna, Sept. 5, 1766; was educated in the Jesuit college of Eberndorf; studied at the university of Vienna; and was for many years a teacher of philosophy in the Jesuit college of Gratz. His ambition was to produce for Germany a Gallia Christiana, Anglica Sacra, or Italia Sacra; and in 1727 appeared the first volume of his Germania Sacra, devoted to the church of Lorch and the diocese of Passau; in 1729 the second (Salzburg); and from 1731 to 1754 the third (Ratisbon). But the freedom with which he treated local legends (on St. Rupert and others) roused such an opposition to him, that he felt compelled to renounce literary work. The work has been continued by Ussermann and others, but was never completed.

HAPHTARAH, plural HAPHTAROTH, were reading-lessons or paragraphs taken from the prophets for use in the synagogues on the Sabbath and feast-days, in connection with sections from the law. Cf. Acts iii. 15; and PERICOPES.

HA'RAN (the Greek and Latin Καρχαί, Carra), a city and territory in Northern Mesopotamia, on the road from Ur of the Chaldees to Canaan. It was probably the fertility of the region which caused Terah and Nahor to stop there while Abraham and Lot pushed forwards to Canaan. To the Assyrians the place was of great importance as a military station when campaigns were made in Cilicia. Ezekiel (xxvii. 23) speaks of it as carrying on a considerable trade with Tyre. In Roman history it is famous as the scene of the defeat of Crassus and the assassination of Caracalla. It flourished also under the Arabs, but Abulfeda mentions it as lying in ruins. — Haran (Greek, Ἀρράν) is the name of the youngest son of Terah (Gen. xi. 26).

HARBAUGH, Henry, D.D., a genial and scholarly divine of the German Reformed Church, and of Swiss descent; b. near Waynesborough, Penn., Oct. 28, 1817; d. in Mercersburg, Penn., Dec. 28, 1867. He worked on his father's farm till his nineteenth year, and then engaged in other employments until 1840, when he entered Franklin and Marshall College, Mercersburg, and, after spending three years there, was successively pastor of the Reformed Church, Lewisburg, Penn. (1843), Lancaster (1850), and Lebanon (1860). In 1863 he became the successor of Dr. Wolff in the chair of theology at Mercersburg. Dr. Harbaugh was a prominent representative of the Mercersburg school of theology. He possessed poetical gifts; wrote poems in the so-called "Pennsylvania German," which appeared in the Guardian, and after his death in a volume under the title Harbaugh's Harfe (Philadelphia, 1870), which enjoyed a wide popularity. He also wrote some hymns, one of which, Jesus, I live to thee, has passed into hymnological collections. Of his larger works the more important are, Heaven, or the Sainted Dead, 1848-53, 3 vols. (Heavenly Home, Heavenly Recognition, Future Life); Life of Michael Schlatter (German), 1857; and Falkers of the Reformed Church in Europe and America, Lancaster, 1857, 2 vols. He was for seventeen years editor of the Guardian, and the last year of his life of the Mercersburg Review.

HARDING, Stephen, English Cistercian monk; b. in Sherborne, Devonshire; abbot at Cîteaux 1109; received Bernard there 1113; d. there March 28, 1134. See his life by Mr. Dalgairns, in the Lives of the English Saints; also CISTERCIANS.

HARDWICK, Charles, b. at Slingsby, Yorkshire, Sept. 22, 1821; d. Aug. 18, 1859, while ascending the Pyrenees, near Bagnères de Luchon. He was successively fellow of St. Catharine's Hall, Cambridge, professor of theology in Queen's College, Birmingham (1853), divinity lecturer at Cambridge (1855), and archdeacon of Ely (1859). He is the author of several valuable works displaying thorough scholarship. These are, A History of the Articles of Religion, Camb., 1851, revised edition, 1859; A History of the Christian Church (I. Middle Age; II. Reformation), Camb., 1853-56, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1861-65, 3d ed., revised by W. Stubbs, Lond., 1872, 1873; and particularly the unfinished elaborate treatise, Christ and other Masters, an Historical Inquiry into some of the Chief Parallelisms and Contrasts between Christianity and the Religious Systems of the Ancient World, Lond., 1855-57, 4 parts, 3d ed., with prefatory memoir by Rev. F. Proctor, 1873, 1 vol.

HARDOUIN, Jean, b. at Quimper, in Brittany, 1646; d. in Paris, Sept. 3, 1729; entered early the order of the Jesuits, and devoted himself to literature. His editions of Themistius (Greek and Latin, Paris, 1684) and of Pliny (1685, in usum Delphini, 1723, complete in 3 vols. folio) are still considered the best ever made of those authors. His Conciliorum Collectio (Paris, 1715, 12 vols.) also enjoys a great reputation. But his own writings are full of whims and fancies. He held that the Æneid, the odes of Horace, etc., were written by some monks in the thirteenth century, that Christ and the apostles spoke Latin etc., and such paradoxes he defended with exorbitant arrogance and coarseness.

HARDY, Robert Spence, English Wesleyan missionary and Buddhist scholar; b. at Preston, Lancashire, July 1, 1803; d. at Healdingly, Yorkshire, April 16, 1868. For twenty-three years he was a faithful missionary in Ceylon, and subsequently a preacher at home, but found time to become profoundly read in Pali, and to attain a very wide culture. His books are authoritative. He wrote The British Government and the Idolatry of Ceylon, 1841; Eastern Monachism, an Account of the Origin, Laws, Discipline, Sacred Writings, etc., of the Order of Mendicants, founded by Gotama Buddha, 1850; A Manual of Buddhism in its Modern Development, translated from Singhalese MSS., 2553, 2d ed., 1880; The Legends and Theories of the Buddhists compared with History and Science, 1867, 2d ed., 1881.

HARE, Augustus William, a devoted and model rural clergyman of the Church of England; b. in Rome, Nov. 17, 1792; d. there Feb. 19, 1834. After a distinguished career at New College, Oxford, of which he was a fellow, he became rector in 1829 of Alton-Barnes, a country parish, where his plain and fervent preaching and consecrated life not only won the hearts of the people, but came to be regarded as a model for a rural pastor's imitation. In company with his brother Julius he edited Guesses at Truth, and published Sermons to a Country Congregation, 6th ed., Lond., 1845, 2 vols. See Memorials of a Quiet Life, by A. J. C. HARE.

HARE, Julius Charles, one of the most influential of modern English theologians; b. Sept. 13, 1795, at Herstmonceux, Sussex, in the pale of the Episcopal Church; d. there Jan. 23, 1855. He was educated at the Charter House school, with Grote and Thirlwall, the distinguished historians of Greece. A considerable portion of his youth was spent on the Continent. In 1811 he visited the Wartburg, Luther's Patmos, and there, as he playfully remarked, he "saw the marks of Luther's ink upon the wall, and there took his first lesson in the art of throwing inkstands at the devil's head." In 1812 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, and distinguished himself by thorough classical and general culture. In 1818 he was made fellow and tutor of Trinity, and gathered around him a number of admiring students, among them John Sterling, Archbishop Trench, and Frederick Maurice (subsequently his brother-in-law).

Hare's first introduction to the public was as joint translator, with Bishop Thirlwall, of Niebuhr's Roman history (1828). His love for German scholarship was intensified by his intimacy with Thomas Arnold of Rugby, and with Bunsen, as also by his study of Coleridge's works, whom he profoundly esteemed as a Christian philosopher. In 1832 he went to the Continent, and spent several months in Rome. This visit forms an epoch in his life. Rome, the seat of archæology, history, and art, had a powerful attraction for him; Rome, the centre of religious life and ecclesiastical institutions, repelled him, and confirmed him in his Protestant convictions, notwithstanding his romantic enthusiasm for the middle ages. In Rome he made the personal acquaintance of Dr. Bunsen, who was then ambassador of Prussia to the Vatican, afterwards to England.

On returning to England in 1834, he was made rector of Herstmonceux, and, later, archdeacon of Lewis in the diocese of Chichester, and chaplain to the Queen. In this village, not far from the southern coast of England, he labored until his death, surrounded by a large circle of friends, and held in universal esteem for his noble character and attainments. His last words were, "Upwards, upwards!"

Archdeacon Hare combined thorough scholarship, original thought, noble character, harmless wit, and manly piety. He was as familiar with Luther, Schleiermacher, Neander, Olshausen, Nitzsch, Tholuck, Lücke, etc., as with Cranmer, Hooker, Leighton, Pearson, and Tillotson. He collected one of the most valuable private libraries, of twelve thousand volumes, which completely occupied every wall in the house. He presented it to Trinity College in Cambridge. In the department of philosophy he was an independent disciple of Coleridge. In theology he had most sympathy with Dr. Arnold, but excelled him in the extent of his scholarship. He was one of the founders of the evangelical broad-church school, which seeks to liberalize the Anglican communion by keeping it in friendly intercourse with Continental thought and learning. He was a sturdy champion of Protestantism against the encroachments of Romanism and Tractarianism; but he never exposed himself to the charge of disloyalty to the Church, nor forgot the personal regard due to his opponents. He was especially pained at the transition of Archdeacon, now Cardinal, Manning, his former colleague and intimate friend, to Romanism.

As an author, Hare had some peculiarities of spelling (forst for forced, preacht for preached, etc.), and embodied the most valuable part of his works in notes, which occupy a much larger space than the text. His strength lay in his combination of theological attainments with purity of character, and in his talent for stimulating others to further study and investigation.

His ablest theological work is The Mission of the Comforter, with Notes, 3d ed., 1876 (republished in Boston). It contains five sermons preached at Cambridge from the words of our Lord (John xvi. 7-11) on the office of the Holy Spirit. More than the half of the work consists of learned notes and excursions. His defence of Dr. Luther, originally the tenth note of the above work, afterwards separately issued in an enlarged form shortly before his death, is the ablest vindication of the Reformer against the attacks of Bossuet, Hallam, Sir William Hamilton, and the Oxford Tractarians. "The breadth and energy of Luther's genius," says Stanley, "the depth and warmth of his heart, and the grandeur of his position and character, amidst whatever of inconsistencies or imperfections of expression, are brought out with a force and clearness which must often be as new to his admirers as to his detractors." Hare also contributed the text for the English edition of König's illustrations of the life of Luther. We must next mention The Victory of Faith, a series of most instructive and inspiring sermons on I John v. 5, 3d ed. by Plumtre, London, 1874. The sixth sermon contains the most eloquent description of the conquering power of faith in the English language (pp. 225 sqq.). The Contest with Rome (1842) is one of the most trenchant of the Anglican writings called forth by the controversy with Romanism and Puseyism. A collection of his Charges was published 1856, a year after his death. We conclude with a characteristic passage from a charge in the spring of 1850, where he addresses the two contending parties of his diocese as follows: "With both sides I feel that I have many bonds of common faith and love and duty; with both of them I heartily desire to work together in the service of our common Master. With each of the two parties on sundry points I differ in opinion more or less widely. But why should this cut me off from them, or why should it cut them off from me? May we not hold fast to that whereon we are agreed, and join hand to hand and heart to heart on that sure, unshakable ground, which cannot slip from under us, and wait until God shall reveal to us what we now see dimly and darkly? Shall the oak say to the elm, 'Depart from me, thou hast no place in God's forest, thou shalt not breathe his air, or drink in his sunshine'? Or shall the ash say to the birch, 'Avaunt! thou art not to stand by my side; cast thyself down and crawl away, and hide thyself in some outlandish thicket'? O my brethren! the spring is just about to clothe all the trees of the forest in their bright, fresh leaves, which will shine and sparkle rejoicingly and thankfully in the sun and rain. Shall it not also clothe our hearts anew in bright, hopeful garments of faith and love, diverse in form, in hue, in texture, but blending together into a beautiful harmonious unity beneath the light of the Sun of righteousness?"

HARLAY, François de, b. in Paris, Aug. 14, 1625; d. at Conflans, Aug. 6, 1695; was made Archbishop of Rouen in 1651, and of Paris in 1670. He was unprincipled and vain, frivolous and intolerant; and his influence at the court he used against the Huguenots. He was one of the principal promoters of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes. He edited the Synodicon Parisiense.

HARMER, Thomas, b. in Norwich, Eng., 1715; pastor of the Independent Church at Wattersfield, Suffolk, 1735; d. there Nov. 27, 1788. The work of his lifetime was Observations on Various Passages of Scripture, placing them in a new light, and ascertaining the meaning of several not determinable by the methods commonly made use of by the learned, compiled from relations incidentally mentioned in books of voyages and travels into the East, Lond., 1761, 2 vols., in 1787 2 additional vols., 4th ed. by Adam Clarke, LL.D., 1808, 4 vols., with large additions and a life of the author. Mr. Harmer also wrote Outlines of a New Commentary on the Book of Solomon's Song, London, 1768.

HARMONY OF THE GOSPELS. We shall consider in this article the relation of the Gospels to each other, both in point of form and their choice of matter, and whether it is possible to construct a harmony. At the very outset the striking difference between the Gospel of John and the other three Gospels must be noticed, both in respect to the choice of matter (John alone relating the visits of Jesus to the feasts in Jerusalem, and, on the other hand, describing few of the events which happened in Galilee) and in respect to the kind of matter; the discourses of our Lord which John gives having a peculiarly elevated character as compared with those of the other three Gospels. The first three or synoptic Gospels likewise often differ. Mark gives hardly any of our Lord's discourses, and contains an exceedingly small amount of matter not found in Matthew and Luke; while these two Gospels, when compared, are found to have much which is peculiar to each. Matthew gives sixteen miracles, Luke fifteen (eleven being common), and Mark fifteen, twelve of which are found in Matthew, and ten in Luke. Then, again, the consecution of the same discourses and events is different in the three synoptists; and while the descriptions of the same events often present remarkable agreements in language, even to striking and unusual words, they also present disagreements, not only in the language, but also in the matter, so as to sometimes even give the appearance of contradictory statements.

1. Choice and Arrangement of the Matter in the Synoptists. — Even if we had no patristic accounts of their origin, the study of the Gospels would convince us that their authors had not the least intention of giving a complete daily journal of the life of Christ. Of the first half of his public activity they confined themselves to only a few fragments, and by their own confession they passed over a great deal. Thus it appears from Matt. xi. 21 sqq. that Jesus performed many miracles in Chorazin; but the synoptists do not give a single detail of his activity there. Even the Introduction to Luke's Gospel does not militate with this statement; for he might well call his work "systematic and complete" in comparison with the sporadic attempts of other Christians, without its being arranged like a journal, but only giving that which was essential and important in systematic arrangement. But each synoptist had a plan of his own. Matthew wrote for Jews, and sought to prove that Jesus fulfilled the Messianic prophecies concerning the seed of Abraham (Matt. i. 1). Luke, who belonged to the Pauline circle, relates, for the most part, those events in the life of our Lord, and those discourses, which go to confirm the principle that all mankind, so far as it thirsts after salvation, shall participate in the benefits of it. For this reason he presents Christ as the second Adam (comp. Luke iii. 23-28). Mark, on the other hand, as John the Presbyter (Euseb., iii. 39) long ago said, follows no particular plan, but wrote down from memory what Peter related to him from time to time. None of the synoptists, then, follow a chronological arrangement. Luke arranges his Gospel according to the matter (x. 25-xiii., discourses; xiv.-xvii., parables; etc.); and so does Matthew (iii., iv., the beginning of his activity; v.-vii., laws of the kingdom; viii., ix., miracles; ix. 36-xi., the disciples; xiii., xiv., parables; etc.). Notwithstanding this general principle, however, they do often relate events in the order of their occurrence (comp. Matt. ix. 27, 32, xiii. 1, etc.; Mark i. 29, etc.; Luke iv. 38, etc.). The investigation of the extent of the agreements of the synoptists in these cases is one of the tasks of the harmonists.

Such labors were carried on from early times, at first with the purpose of forming a complete narrative of all the events and discourses of our Lord. (See DIATESSARON.) In modern times they have been conducted for the purpose of constructing a chronology of Christ's life. Prominent amongst the workers in this department [see below] are Gerson (d. 1429), Calvin (d. 1564), Andreas Osiander (d. 1552), Chemnitz (d. 1586), and Bengel (d. 1751). Osiander (Harmonia Evangeliorum, Basel, 1537) is only to be mentioned for the curious circumstance, that, starting from the most irrational theory of inspiration, he adopted the principle that the evangelists, in order not to write that which was false, dared not depart from the chronological arrangement. To carry the principle out, he was obliged often to suppose that the very same event, occurring under the very same circumstances, was repeated two or three times. Peter's wife's mother, for example, was healed three times! Gerson (Concordia evangelistarum sive monotessaron, Col. c. 1471) proceeds on the theory that the synoptists did not intend to follow a chronological order; and so Calvin (Harmonia evangelistarum tribus composita, Geneva, 1553), and especially Chemnitz (Harmonia evangelica, Frankfurt, 1593 sqq.), who makes such events and discourses to follow each other which are definitely placed in chronological order by the evangelists. It is as clear as sunlight that every healthy attempt in the direction of a harmony must proceed upon this principle. Bengel (Richtige Auffassung der Evangg., Tübingen, 1736) marks no progress; but he rightly recognized that Luke did not mean to follow a chronological arrangement. Wieseler, in his Chronological Synopsis [Hamburg, 1843], started from the principle that Luke follows a chronological order; but the writer of this article, in his Kritik d. evang. Geschichte, returned to the principles of Chemnitz, and believes he has proved that the sequence of single events of one Gospel never contradicts that of another, and that their statements enable us to restore a chronological harmony of the larger part of Christ's public career. The following case, which we choose because it is the most difficult and complicated, will serve as an illustration of our method. In Matt. ix. it is related, that, as Jesus on a certain day sat at meat, the Pharisees asked him why he did not fast. The exact day is not given; but it is definitely stated in ix. 18 that Jairus came to him "while he spake these things;" and in ix. 27, that, as "Jesus passed by from thence," two blind men followed him; and in ix. 32, that, "as they went forth," a dumb man was brought to him. Here the sequence of four events is given. The preceding section definitely gives the sequence of four other events (viii.-ix. 9), — the stilling of the tempest (viii. 23), the healing of the Gadarene (viii. 28), the cure of the paralytic (ix. 1), and the call of Matthew (ix. 9). Again, we have the following sequence: the healing of the blind and dumb man (xii. 22), the charge of collusion with Beelzebub (xii. 28), the announcement of his mother and brethren (xii. 46); and on the same day that these things occurred he spake many parables (xiii. 1). Mark, however, in the most emphatic way says that Jesus spake these parables at the seashore (iv. 1), on the same day stilled the tempest (iv. 35), then healed the Gadarene (v. 1), and, after his return to the western shore, met Jairus (v. 22). Thus the conclusion is forced upon us by Mark that the three groups of events which Matthew places in sections, where they properly belong in point of matter, belong together in point of time. While Jesus was staying at Capernaum, the blind and deaf man is brought, whose cure affords the occasion for the charge of collusion with Beelzebub. During the conversation the Pharisees demand a sign; and, while Jesus is replying, his mother arrives. Towards evening Jesus utters the parables on the seashore; then follows the stilling of the tempest. The following morning the Gadarene was healed. After his return, the question concerning fasting was put; and at the same hour Jairus came. As he left his house, the dumb man is brought, and (perhaps a day or two afterwards) the paralytic is healed. Mark got the events from Peter, an eye-witness of them, and had the sequence impressed upon his memory; but Matthew, who was called after their occurrence, heard them from several of the disciples; and he remembered most distinctly that the healing of Jairus' daughter was a special topic of conversation: hence he put it down immediately after the account of his call.

This example is a crucial test of the Chemnitzian principles; but attempts to find the original place of every sententious utterance of our Lord will fail. A great probability exists that Jesus repeated the same sayings at different times. Matthew has given us an unmistakable illustration of this (vii. 17, xii. 33). He even repeated a parable, but with changes in detail (Luke xix. 12 sqq.; Matt. xxv. 14 sqq.).

2. The Language. — The synoptists in their accounts of the same events often fully agree in the language, and again differ widely in this regard (comp. Matt. ix. 15, Mark ii. 20, Luke v. 35). But the points of agreement are far more numerous than the points of disagreement. According to Norton, one-sixth of Matthew's Gospel is in verbal agreement with the other synoptists, and seven-eighths of this are from discourses; one-sixth of Mark's Gospel agrees with the other synoptists, and nearly four-fifths of this are from the discourses; Luke only agrees to the extent of one-tenth with Matthew and Mark, but more than nineteen-twentieths of it is from the discourses. Various theories have been suggested to account for these agreements and disagreements in language, and they are as follows. (1) A primal or germ gospel (Ureangelium) from which the evangelists drew. It has been defined as an Aramaic Matthew (Corrodi, Schmidt), a "Hebrew Gospel" (Lessing, Niemeyer, Weber), or a record composed by a company of apostles (Eichhorn, Marsh); but all these various forms have been outlived. Holtzmann has advocated the hypothesis of a primal Mark and an original collection of discourses by Matthew; but that the λόγιο (discourses), which Papias attributes to Matthew, included other matter, even Strauss granted. (2) The theory that one evangelist used the other, there being one original one. But it is comical to observe that each of the possible combinations has its zealous defenders. But why should men who had the best opportunities of getting details from the very eye-witnesses of Christ use each other's works? The theory, on the other hand, begets many difficulties, as, for example, Why did the evangelist who used his predecessor omit so much of his matter, alter the language of the Lord's discourses (often quoting half a verse word for word, and then suddenly breaking off), and alter the chronological sequences? (3) The evangelists drew from a common tradition. This is the theory of Gieseler (Hist.-krit. Versuch u. d. Entstehung d. schriftl. Evangelien, Leipzig, 1818), and the only tenable one. In the repeated narration of the events of Christ's life, certain points were always emphasized, and these the evangelists have in common; the very expressions being impressed upon the memories of the hearers. But the individuality of the writers also asserted itself.

3. John's Gospel (see JOHN. GOSPEL OF) was written (96) at a time when the altered circumstances of the Church, and the first indications of Gnosticism, made a new point of view necessary. For this reason he supplemented the accounts of the synoptists both in respect to the outward details of Christ's life and his personality (in opposition to the false Gnosis).

This Gospel differs largely from the others, but not to the prejudice of the harmony. The more elevated style of the Lord's discourses which it records has furnished a difficulty to some; but as they "shine with a more than earthly glow and brilliancy" (as De Wette himself acknowledges), as it is improbable that the disciple should have surpassed the Master, and as the synoptists here and there rise to the same strain (Matt. xi. 25-30, xiii. 16, 17, etc.; Luke x. 21-23), the difficulty completely disappears for those who have an ear for the light-born excellency of Christ's words. The only real difficulty which John's Gospel offers to the harmonist is the date of the Last Supper. The discussion over this extremely complicated and prickly question is not yet closed. The apparent contradictions in the accounts of the resurrection are easily solved; John narrating what Mary Magdalene saw, the synoptists combining in one account her experiences and those of the other women. Mark indicates a difference between the two (xvi. 8, 9).

EBERARD.

[Continuous narratives of the life of Christ, combining details of all the evangelists, are called in another and special sense Harmonies. The Diatessaron of Tatian, the ἀρμὴνία of Ammonius, the German Heliand, and Otfried's Harmony, are the most important examples of these. For accounts of them see DIATESSARON, AMMONIUS, HELIAND, etc. Harmonies in addition to those mentioned in the body of the article have been published by STEPHENS (Paris, 1553), G. CALIXTUS (Halberst., 1624), T. CARTWRIGHT (Amst., 1627, 1647), LIGHTFOOT (Lond., 1644, and in English, Lond., 1655), CLERICUS (Amst., 1699), MACKNIGHT (Lond., 1756, and often), J. PRIESTLEY (in English, Lond., 1777), NEWCOME (Dublin, 1778, ed. by Dr. ROBINSON, Andover, 1814, 1834), TOWNSEND (Lond., 1825, Bost., 1837), ROBINSON (Bost., 1815, revised edition, 1851, and often), STROUD (Lond., 1853), STRONG (N.Y., 1854), GRESWELL (Oxon., 5th ed., 1856), GARDINER (Andover, 1876); Harmonies of the Synoptists by PLANCK (Götting., 1809), DE WETTE and LÜCKE (Berol., 1818, 1842), RÆDIGER (Halle, 1829, 1839), ANGER (Leip., 1852). For more complete list, see ROBINSON'S and GARDINER'S Harmonies; and for general literature on the subjects treated in the article, see GOSPELS; also SCHAFF'S Church History, revised ed., 1882, vol. I, pp. 575-597.]

HARMS, Claus, a powerful champion of the religion of faith in a rationalistic age; b. at Fahrstedt, Schleswig-Holstein, May 29, 1778; d. in Kiel, Feb. 1, 1855. Prevented, at first, by lack of means from securing a higher education, he labored in his father's mill until he was nineteen. After his father's death he entered a classical school, and subsequently passed into the university of Kiel. The teaching at the university was predominantly rationalistic; but, influenced thereto largely by the perusal of Schleiermacher's Discourses on Religion, Harms turned away from rationalism as vanity, and gave himself up to faith in Christ as the only hope of the sinner. In 1806 he became assistant pastor in Lunden, and in 1816 was transferred to Kiel, where he remained during the rest of his life, in spite of calls, as Schleiermacher's successor, to Trinity Church, Berlin, in 1831, and to other places. He was obliged in 1849 to give up his positions on account of blindness. In 1878 the hundredth anniversary of his birth was celebrated in Kiel, and a tablet placed on the house which he had occupied.

Harms exercised a very decided influence upon the religious faith of his day by his bold denunciation of rationalism. As a preacher he was much sought after, the university students flocking to hear him. After Twisten's advent in Kiel as professor, it was said, "Twisten converts his hearers, and Harms baptizes them." He was a man of the people, and his style was no less popular than it was fresh and trenchant. In 1817, at the three hundredth anniversary of the Reformation, Harms took occasion to speak out his mind against rationalism, and did it by publishing, side by side with Luther's theses, ninety-five of his own. He utters bold words against reason, which he calls the "pope of our time," and the religion of reason, which has "run mad in the Lutheran Church, dismisses Christ from the altar, throws God's Word from the pulpit, creates God, whereas God used to be regarded as having created man," etc. These theses went through Germany like a tempest. Rationalists railed against the author; and, as Von Ammon has said, they were indeed a bitter medicine for the then prevailing weakness of faith. They went, however, with his writings in their defence, with healing and converting power to homes throughout the entire land. Harms also wrote hymns, some of which have passed into German hymn-books.

LIT. — Among his volumes of sermons are Winterpostille, 1808; Sommerpost., 1811, 6th ed. of both, Leipzig, 1846; Neue Winterpost., 1824; Neue Sommerpost., 1827; D. heil. Passion, 1857; D. Vater Unser, 1838; Bergpredigt, 1841; D. Bibel, 1842; D. Offenb. Johannis, 1844; Trostpredigten, 1852. He also wrote a Life of Henrik von Züphen den Bloottügen für unsern Globen (1817), in Low-German, and Pastoraltheologie (Kiel, 1830, 3d ed., 1878), a book which ought to be on every pastor's table. See Autobiography, 2d ed., Kiel, 1852; Dr. M. BAUMGARTEN: Ein Denkmal f. C. Harms, Braunsch., 1855 [and memorials by G. BACHMANN, LÜDEMANN, and NEELSEN, all Kiel, 1878, and the volume Die Gedächtnissfeier für Claus Harms an seinem hundertsten Geburtstag, Kiel, 1878].

CARSTENS.

HARMS, Georg Ludvig Detlev Theodor (commonly known as LUDWIG HARMS), a most original and successful German Lutheran pastor; b. May 5, 1808, in Walsrode, Lüneburg; d. at Hermannsburg, Nov. 14, 1865. After studying at the university of Göttingen, and spending several years as private tutor, he became in 1814 his father's assistant as pastor of the church at Hermannsburg, a town of thirty-five hundred inhabitants, near Hanover. His father belonged to the rationalistic school, but was a man of strong and robust character. Ludwig, on the other hand, had undergone a thorough conversion at the university. He labored at Hermannsburg as few have done, not only in the pulpit, the services filling up the entire Sabbath, but as a pastor among the people. His popular and winning manners, his sympathy with the poor and the sorrowing, secured for him the love of all. On Sunday afternoons he held a catechetical class, which lasted three hours, and was attended by a thousand people. These labors led to a religious awakening such as North Germany had never witnessed before. Harms's chief source of power was his sermons. He understood as few, if any, since Luther have understood, how to preach to the people. His manner was, before every thing else, popular. His sermons were simple; his thoughts expressed in terse language and concretely. He followed out the advice which he gave to a brother minister in these words: "Call every thing by its right name, so that others may grasp with their hands what you mean, and present truth as concretely as possible, so that it may not pass away over people's heads." [Professor Park, in a very interesting article on Harms, in The Congregationalist (Feb. 23, 1866), says in this connection, "He preferred the concrete to the abstract, did not speak of holiness so often as of God, nor of sin so often as the devil. He was terrific in his denunciations of popular sins, and exhibited the tenderest concern for his people," etc.] Harms drew his sermons from every-day life, and preached to life. The interest of his immediate hearers, the Lüneburg peasants, was to him matter of supreme concern. He spoke their dialect. His themes were the necessity of a thorough conversion, justification by faith, and the evidence of faith in a consistent life. He denounced sin unsparingly, so that there was no back-door left for the sinner, and in vivid realness painted the condemnation of the ungodly and the blessedness of the believer. He dealt not in general delineations and exhortations, but pictured before his hearers each specific step and duty.

But in the mere gifts of body Harms was sadly lacking. His voice was shrill, his manner in the pulpit somewhat stiff; and his bodily strength, which was never great, in his last years seemed hardly sufficient to carry him through a sermon. But with all these defects he riveted the attention of his hearers, and gave the impression of absolute sincerity.

Under these labors the life of the community underwent a radical change. Sunday was strictly observed, and family prayer regularly maintained. Swearing and excessive drinking were given up. No beggar was known in the place; and the yearly contributions of the church to benevolent objects were very large, amounting in 1854 to twenty-four thousand marks for missions alone. [Professor Park relates the following incident: "I met a carpenter going to his day-labor. 'How do you do?' I asked. 'I cannot but be well,' he replied, 'having so many religious privileges as I enjoy here,'" etc.]

But these were not the extent of Harms's enterprises. After his father's death (in 1849), he organized a seminary for the training of missionaries, and was led to it by the frequent applications by young people who wished to become missionaries. This institution was very successful, and, besides sending out missionaries to different parts of the world, colonized the town of Hermannsburg in Africa. [The funds for erecting the buildings, as well as the funds for other enterprises, were regarded by Harms as direct answers to prayer. In 1851 he established a missionary journal, which became very popular in Germany. As characteristic of his independence, Professor Park relates the following incident: "On one occasion, when Harms was in Hannover, the king despatched one of his officers with the state carriage to bring him to the palace. 'Give my regards to the king,' said Harms, 'and say that I would obey his order if my duty allowed; but I must go home and attend to my parish.'"]

Harms published a number of volumes of sermons, which are among the most widely circulated in Germany. Among these are Evangeliumpredigten, Hermannsburg, 8th ed., 1877; Epistelpredigten, 2d ed., 1872; Ausleg. d. Psalmen, 2d ed., 1870. See his Life by his brother, THEODORE HARMS.

HARRIS, Howel, a Welsh revivalist; b. at Trevecca, 1714; d. there July 21, 1773. He was "the first lay preacher in the great Methodist movement,"—a year and a half ahead of Whitefield and Wesley. He had to encounter great opposition, but persevered. With the Wesleys he held life-long intimacy. He was a layman, and all his repeated efforts to obtain ordination were vain. His success in preaching was wonderful. See Tyerman's Wesley.

HARRIS, John, independent minister; b. at Ugborough, Devonshire, March 8, 1802; became principal and professor of theology, New College, Cheshunt, 1850; d. there Dec. 21, 1858. He was the author of the widely circulated and able prize essays, Mammon (1836), of which more than a hundred thousand copies have been sold, and The Great Commission (1842); also of The Great Teacher (1835), The Pre-Adamite Earth (1847), Man Primeval (1849).

HARRIS, Samuel, the "Apostle of Virginia;" b. in Hanover County, Jan. 12, 1724; date of his death is uncertain. For many years he was a soldier; but after his conversion (in 1758) he devoted more and more time and strength to religious duties, until in 1769 he was ordained, and then left all secular occupations. In 1774 the General Association of Separate Baptists chose him "apostle," and ordained him by the laying-on of the hands of every minister in that body. He was much persecuted.

HARVARD, John. See HARVARD UNIVERSITY.

HARVARD UNIVERSITY. 1. Constitution.—At present Harvard University comprehends the following departments: Harvard College, the Divinity School, the Law School, the Medical School, the Dental School, the Lawrence Scientific School, the Museum of Comparative Zoology, the Bussey Institution (a school of agriculture), the College Library, and the Astronomical Observatory. The Peabody Museum of American Archaeology and Ethnology is a constituent part of the university; but its relations to the university are affected by peculiar provisions. The university has grown out of Harvard College, which was founded in 1636 (six years after the settlement of Boston, and sixteen after the landing of the Pilgrims), by a vote of the General Court of Massachusetts, which appropriated "towards a school or college" the sum of four hundred pounds, "equal to a year's rate of the whole Colony." The next year the General Court fixed the site of the college at Newton (lying across the Charles River from Boston), the name of which place was changed to Cambridge in commemoration of the English university, where many of the first emigrants received their literary training; and in 1638 the college took its present name from John Harvard (who was born in England, graduated at Cambridge University, and died in Charlestown, Mass., Sept. 24, 1638), a clergyman of Charlestown, who left it a large bequest in money (about eight hundred pounds) and books (about two hundred and sixty volumes). The same year the first class was formed under two instructors. In 1640 the proper career of the college began, with the appointment of a president (Rev. Henry Dunster); and in 1612 the General Court established the Board of Overseers, composed of the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Colony, the magistrates of the jurisdiction, and the teaching elders of Cambridge and the adjoining towns, with full governmental powers over the college. This body being found to be unwieldy, the charter of 1650 assigned the control of the college (disposition of money and other property, election of officers, and establishment of laws and rules) to a self-perpetuating "corporation," consisting of the president, five fellows, and a treasurer, to be responsible to the overseers. The charter of 1650 was re-affirmed by the Massachusetts State Legislature, and made a part of the State Constitution in 1780, and remains in force at the present day (1882); and the corporation, whose legal style is "The President and Fellows of Harvard College," is the governing power of the whole university, and not of the college alone. The overseers (thirty in number), who exercise a general supervision over the acts of the corporation, are now elected, without restriction of place, profession, or creed, by those persons who have received from the college a degree of bachelor of arts, or master of arts, or any honorary degree. In each department of the university the internal affairs (discipline, studies, degrees) are administered by the faculty of the department (consisting of all its instructors, at whose head is a dean, or director). The control of general university matters, particularly of the degrees of master of arts and doctor of philosophy, is in the hands of the Academic Council, composed of all the professors and assistant professors of the university. The only honorary degrees conferred are doctor of divinity, and doctor of laws. The conferring power in all cases is the corporation, with the consent of the overseers. Officers of instruction are of various classes,—professors, appointed by corporation and overseers, for life; assistant professors, instructors, tutors, appointed for definite periods; instructors and lecturers, appointed annually; and demonstrators and assistants, appointed by the corporation for various terms. During the two first periods of its existence—the colonial (1636-92) and the provincial (1692-1780)—the college was under the control of the State, and so remained to some extent after the Revolution, up to 1865, when the last bonds of union were severed; and the university is now absolutely independent of the State. Among the eminent men who have been instructors in Harvard may be mentioned John Winthrop, John Quincy Adams, Henry Ware, Andrews Norton, J. G. Palfrey, James Walker, E. T. Channing, Jared Sparks, Joseph Story, Simon Greenleaf, Theophilus Parsons, Edward Everett, George Ticknor, H. W. Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, Benjamin Peirce, Jacob Bigelow, J. T. Cogswell, Louis Agassiz, Jeffries Wyman, Asa Gray, John C. Warren, James Jackson, Benjamin Waterhouse, C. C. Felton, and W. C. Bond.

2. Instruction.—Beginning as a seminary for preachers, with a limited academical course, Harvard has become a university, in which all branches of science are represented, and the libertas docendi exists in its fullest extent. During its first century the instruction was given by the president and several tutors. The first professorship (one of divinity) was established by Thomas Hollis, an English Baptist layman, in 1721, who also endowed the second chair (of mathematics and natural philosophy) in 1726; and in 1764 was created the first professorship endowed by a native New-Englander,—that of Hebrew and other Oriental languages, by Thomas Hancock. The college now advanced rapidly to university proportions. The Medical School was begun in 1783, the Botanic Garden in 1805, the Divinity School in 1815, the Law School in 1817, the Astronomical Observatory in 1846, the Agassiz Museum of Comparative Zoology in 1859, the Peabody Museum in 1866, the Dental School in 1868, and the Bussey Institution in 1871 (to which was added in 1872 the Arnold Arboretum, for the open-air culture of trees, shrubs, and herbaceous plants). During the past thirteen years (administration of President C. W. Eliot) there has been a marked expansion in the instruction, both in the teaching force and in the general apparatus (buildings, etc.). The course for the degree of bachelor of arts extends over four years, in the first of which the studies are prescribed; in the others, elective. In the three upper classes (in which about a hundred and seventy courses are offered by over fifty instructors) the student may select for his degree any studies in which the class-instruction amounts on an average to not less than twelve hours a week. The elective system, with its specializing tendencies, has grown steadily in favor; and prescribed studies seem likely soon to disappear altogether. Here, as in the discipline, the theory of the college is that the largest possible liberty is to be given to the student, and the appeal made to his sense of responsibility. In the professional schools the courses for degrees are fixed. In all departments, except the Medical School, special students not candidates for degrees are admitted without examination, may take such studies as they choose, receive certificates for what work they do, and are subject to the same regulations as regular students.

3. Religious Character.—The university is now wholly unsectarian. Sectarian control of its general government had practically ceased by the middle of the last century. In the movement which divided the Congregationalists of Massachusetts at the beginning of the present century, the greater part of the prominent friends of Harvard sided with the Unitarians, and the college was popularly identified with that body. But, if any sectarian coloring then attached to the direction of the academic instruction, it has now entirely disappeared. Officers of instruction and government are chosen without regard to their religious creeds. The Sunday services and morning prayers in the college chapel are this year (1882) conducted by different clergymen, belonging to various ecclesiastical communions. The students are distributed among a number of religious bodies. According to the latest calculation the Episcopalians come first in point of numbers, next the Unitarians, then the Congregationalists, Baptists, and several others. In the Divinity School the chairs were, up to a year or two ago, all filled by Unitarians; but since that time, men belonging to other bodies have been elected to professorships. A series of lectures on theology has been delivered by a Trinitarian cler-gyman, and it is announced, that, so soon as the funds permit, a Trinitarian professor of dogmatic theology is to be appointed. The theological professors sign no articles, and are under no doctrinal restraint in respect to creed or instruction. The college has retained up to this time the old system of official religious exercises. All students are required to attend morning prayers, and all but members of the senior class to attend one service Sunday (the place being selected by them). A strong party in the faculty favor the abrogation of this enforced attendance on religious exercises, on the ground that it is not promotive of, but unfavorable to, the growth of religious life. They would have services maintained, if necessary, by the college, but better by voluntary subscriptions of persons interested, and attendance voluntary. Among the students several private organizations devoted to the cultivation of piety are maintained. As might be supposed in so large a body of men, there exists a great variety of philosophical and religious opinions among the instructors. The perfect liberty of thought and utterance that prevails secures a hearing for all sides, and the university cannot be put into any one category or school of thought; it may be said to represent all the philosophical and religious tendencies of the times. In the department of theology and biblical criticism, the publications of instructors have generally been marked by a conservative tone; as, for example, the works of Professors Norton, Hedge, and Abbot; and the same thing may be said of the department of philosophy (publications of Professors Walker, Bowen, and James).

4. Funds and Collections.—The invested funds of the university amount to about four million dollars, and the property in lands, houses, etc., not paying interest, to about two million. The number of books in all the libraries of the university is over two hundred and fifty thousand, and there is about an equal number of pamphlets. The Museum of Comparative Zoology is reckoned among the greatest natural-history collections of the world: it is especially rich in insects. The botanical collection ranks high in some departments, especially the compositæ. The Museum of American Archaeology, though young, has a respectable collection of antiquities, and other departments are similarly well represented. The number of instructors in the university is over a hundred and fifty; the number of students, over thirteen hundred and fifty.

HARVEST AMONG THE HEBREWS. The season of gathering grain or fruits generally commenced about the middle of April (John iv. 35). In some parts, as in Jericho, it commenced a little earlier. On the second day of the Passover feast (i.e., on the sixteenth day of the first month, Abid, or Nisan) a sheaf of the first-fruits was brought unto the priest (Lev. xxiii. 10); and thus the harvest season was inaugurated. The beginning was made with barley and with the Passover festival (Lev. xxiii. 9-14; 2 Sam. xxi. 9; Ruth i. 22), and with the wheat and the Feast of Ingathering (Exod. xxiii. 16, xxxiv. 22) it was concluded. The reapers were mostly hired men, over whom a servant was set (Ruth ii. 5). The maidens generally put the sheaves in bundles; but the owner, together with his children, assisted the reapers, especially in carrying away the sheaves (Gen. xxxvii. 7). The passers-by saluted the reapers (Ruth ii. 4). Refreshments, especially drink, were provided for the reapers (Ruth ii. 9). The harvest was a season of great rejoicing, especially when the crops had been plentiful (Isa. ix. 3; Ps. cxxxvi. 6). The corners of the field were not reaped, but left to the poor; and so also any sheaf that was forgotten in the field belonged to the poor and the stranger (Lev. xix. 9, xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19).

HASENKAMP is the name of three brothers, who, belonging to the same circle as Lavater, Jung-Stilling, Tersteegen, and Kollenbusch, spoke with great energy and impressiveness for the idea of a divine revelation, and against the flat rationalism prevailing in Germany during the latter half of the eighteenth century. — Johann Gerhard, b. July 12, 1736; d. June 10, 1777; was appointed rector at Duisburg in 1766, but was several times, both before and after his appointment, forbidden to preach on account of the mental excitement under which he suffered. His Life, begun by himself and finished by his son, is an interesting and instructive book, and gives the list of his works, mostly of a polemical and apologetical description. — Friedrich Arnold, b. Jan. 11, 1747; d. 1795; succeeded his brother as rector of Duisburg, and wrote Ueber die verdunkelnde Aufklärung, 1789, Briefe über wichtige Wahrheiten der Religion, 1794, 2 vols., etc. — Johann Heinrich, b. Sept. 19, 1750; d. June 17, 1814; was pastor of Dahle, near Altona, from 1779. His Christl. Schriften, 3 vols., were published after his death by his nephew.

HASSE, Friedrich Rudolf, b. at Dresden, June 29, 1808; d. at Bonn, Oct. 14, 1862. He studied at Leipzig and Berlin; was successively privat-docent at the latter university (1834), professor extraordinary of church history at Griefswald (1836) and then at Bonn (1841), and professor ordinary (1843). His fame rests upon his masterpiece, Anselm von Canterbury, Leipzig, 1843, 1852, 2 vols. He began his studies upon Anselm as early as 1832, when he chose him as the subject of his dissertation. Up to that time the scholastic period of church history had been very little studied. Hasse developed extraordinary gifts in exploring it. His dissertation was upon the Anselmic conception of the divine image, and proved the presence of a master historian. This impression was confirmed by his lectures on church history. In Bonn he completed (1843) the first volume of his monograph upon Anselm of Canterbury, containing the life. This was the fruit of the most thorough work, and answers every demand of a monograph; for Anselm stands forth in all his individuality, and at the same time in his relation to the movements of his age. In 1852 Hasse issued his second volume, the theology of Anselm, presented in a form at once complete, objective, and clear. One is able to follow the development of the theology step by step to its rounded whole.

Hasse possessed great ability as a teacher, and was held in high esteem for his solidity of character, his childlike piety, and his great modesty, which led him not only to think little of himself, but to rejoice in the success of others. He took an intelligent interest in church matters, and especially in foreign missions. Besides his masterpiece, Anselm von Canterbury, he is the author of two posthumous volumes of lectures, Geschichte des alten Bundes, Leipzig, 1863, and Kirchengeschichte, Leipzig, 1864, 3 vols., 2d ed., 1872. See W. KRAFFT: Dr. F. R. Hasse, eine Lebensskizze, Bonn, 1865.

HATTEMISTS, a Dutch sect founded by Pontianus van Hattem, who was pastor in Zealand, but was deposed in 1683. He was a disciple of Spinoza; and his doctrines rest on a mystical pantheism, in which the moral distinction between good and bad disappears. The sect was never of great consequence, and soon vanished.

HATTO, Bishop of Basel; b. in 763; was educated in the monastery of Reichenau; became director of its school, and abbot, 806; was made Bishop of Basel in 807, by Charlemagne, and in 811 sent as ambassador to the Emperor Nicephorus; resigned his position as abbot and bishop in 823, and died as simple monk in Reichenau 836. Two works by him have come down to us, — l'isio Wettini, a description of a walk through heaven, hell, and purgatory, which made a deep impression on his contemporaries, and was put into Latin verses by Walafried Strabo; and Capitulare Hattonis, twenty-five statutes which he issued as bishop. Both works are found in MIGNE: Patrol. Lat., vol. 105.

HATTO, Archbishop of Mayence; b. in the middle of the ninth century, probably in Suabia; d. May 15, 913; was educated at Ellwangen, or Fulda; became Abbot of Reichenau 888, and of Ellwangen 889, and Archbishop of Mayence 891. Twice he accompanied King Arnulph to Italy (894 and 896), and received the pallium from Pope Formosus. After the death of Arnulph, during the reign of Louis the Child (900–911), he and his friend, Bishop Adalbero of Augsburg, the tutor of the young king, actually governed the realm; and his influence did not essentially decrease when Conrad I. ascended the throne. As in that period the unity of the German Empire mainly rested on the Christian episcopacy, in which the kings found their best support against their vassals' revolts, and attempts of independence, it is quite natural that so powerful a representative of this tendency as Hatto should be very variously judged by his contemporaries; and, indeed, while some extolled him as a prudent and patriotic statesman, others told how Satan himself came to fetch him, and threw him down into the crater of Ætna. See J. FR. BÖMMER: Regesta archiepiscoporum Maguntinensium, edited by C. Will, Innsbrück, 1877.

HAUC, Martin, famous Orientalist; b. at Ostendorf in Württemberg, Jan. 30, 1827; d. at Ragatz, Switzerland, June 3, 1876. He studied at Tübingen, Göttingen, and Bonn, for three years (1856–59); assisted Bunsen on his Bibelwerk; was professor of Sanscrit in Poona college (1859–63); made a successful journey under British appointment through the province of Guzerat, for the purpose of collecting manuscripts of Zend and Sanscrit; returned to Germany in 1866; and from 1868 till his death he was professor of Sanscrit and comparative grammar at the university of Munich. His large collection of Zend, Hebrew, Sanscrit, and Persian manuscripts, was purchased by the Bavarian Government, and is in the Royal Library at Munich. His best known work is Essays on the Sacred Language of the Parsees, Bombay, 1862, 2d ed., revised and enlarged, London, 1878.

HAUGE, Hans Nielsen, a powerful lay preacher and revivalist in Norway; was b. on the Hauge farm, in the county of Smaalenene, April 3, 1771; and d. on the Bredtvedt farm, in Aker County, March 29, 1824. He received only the common peasant education, but he was from early youth a zealous student of the Bible. In 1796 he began his missionary work, walking from place to place, and often preaching twice or thrice a day. He made a deep impression; but as he spoke rather slightly of ordination, creed, etc., he stirred up the hatred of the rationalistic clergy, and in 1804 he was arrested. He was kept in prison till 1811; and in 1814 he was finally sentenced to two years' hard labor for having held conventicles, and spoken disrespectfully of the Established Church. His followers, very numerous, spread over the whole country, and known under the name of "Haugians," or "Readers," did not separate from the State Church; they simply kept aloof until finally the rationalistic ice itself began to thaw. HAUSMANN, Nicolaus, one of Luther's dearest friends; b. at Freiburg, 1479; d. there 1538. He introduced the Reformation into Zwickau (1521), and subsequently into the duchy of Anhalt (1532). Luther heard of his death on Nov. 6, 1538, and lamented him greatly. He praised him for his exemplary piety, which did so much to commend the Reformation. "What we teach, he lives," he said of him. HAVELOCK, Henry, Sir, a distinguished English general and Christian layman; b. April 3, 1795, at Bishop-Wearmouth, Sunderland, where his father was a rich ship-builder; d. Nov. 25, 1857, at Lucknow, India. He studied law under Clitty, but, preferring a soldier's life, entered the army as second lieutenant (1815), and after eight years of service in Great Britain went to India in 1823. In 1829 he married the daughter of the eminent missionary, Dr. Marshman, and soon after united with the Baptist denomination. He proved himself a brave commander, and gradually rose in command. He served with honor in the Afghan war (1810-12), the record of which he preserved in the Memoirs of the Afghan Campaign, the Sikh Campaign, etc., and was made adjutant-general in 1851. In the Sepoy rebellion (1857) he commanded a column, and won a series of brilliant victories. He equally showed his military skill by moderation and prudence. Gen. Outram, his superior in command, arriving before Lucknow was taken, chivalrously left to Havelock the supreme command. Lucknow was taken by a daring and gallant assault; but the victor, known subsequently as the "hero of Lucknow," died three days afterwards, of dysentery brought on by the excessive exertions of the campaign. He was created major-general and baronet by Parliament, and a pension settled on him of a thousand pounds; but the news did not reach India till after his death. Havelock stands out in the annals of the modern English army, as Commodore Goodenough does in those of the navy, as one of the finest specimens of a Christian soldier. He was scrupulous about his conduct, and practised two hours of devotion every morning, whether in the camp or on a campaign. His exemplary Christian character is the best illustration that Christian devotion is not incompatible with warlike bravery. See MARSHMAN (his father-in-law): Memoirs of Sir Henry Havelock, London, 1868.

HAVEN, Erastus Otis, D.D., LL.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Boston, Mass., Nov. 1, 1820; d. at Salem, Oregon, Tuesday, Aug. 2, 1881. He was graduated at the Wesleyan University 1842; took up the profession of teaching; was ordained 1848, and, after holding various positions, was professor in the University of Michigan 1853-56; editor of Zion's Herald, Boston, 1856-63; president of the University of Michigan 1863-69, of the North-western University, Evanston, Ill., 1869-72; corresponding secretary of the board of education of the Methodist-Episcopal Church 1872-74; chancellor of the Syracuse University 1874; elected bishop 1880. His best known publication is Rhetoric for Schools, Colleges, and Private Study, New York, 1869.

HAVEN, Gilbert, D.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. near Boston, Sept. 19, 1821; d. at Malden, Mass., Jan. 8, 1880. After graduation at the Wesleyan University (1846), he taught for several years. In 1851 he joined the New-England Conference of the Methodist-Episcopal Church. In 1861 he was appointed chaplain of the Eighth Massachusetts Regiment, the first commissioned chaplain after the breaking-out of hostilities; but he only was one year in service. He was editor of Zion's Herald 1867-72, when he was elected bishop. He was a vigorous advocate of the cause of the colored people, and also of Protestantism. He was quite an extensive traveler; and his journey to Mexico he recorded in an interesting volume, Our Next-Door Neighbor; recent Sketches of Mexico, N.Y., 1874.

HAVERGAL, Frances Ridley, a beloved and gifted religious writer; b. at Astley, Worcestershire, Eng., Dec. 14, 1836; d. at Caswell Bay, Swansea, South Wales, June 3, 1879. She was the daughter of a clergyman of the Church of England, and was carefully educated. Her own love of study led her to take up unusual lines; and so she acquired some acquaintance with Greek and Hebrew, in order that she might read the Bible in the original. She was a devoted Christian woman, neglecting no opportunity to speak for the Saviour. She issued many volumes of prose and poetry, which have been blessed to many hearts. Of these perhaps the best known are the three collections of her poetry under the titles, Ministry of Song, Under the Surface, and Under His Shadow; and in prose Morning Bells and Little Pillows (devotions for children, published 1874), My King (1877), Kept for the Master's Use (1879), and Swiss Letters (1882). See her interesting Memorials, by her sister, London and New York, 1880.

HÄVERNICK, Heinrich Andreas Christoph, b. at Kropplin, Mecklenburg, Germany, 1805; d. at Neu-Strelitz, 1816; a learned member of the school of Hengstenberg, and author of commentaries upon Daniel (Hamb., 1832) and upon Ezekiel (Erlangen, 1843), Handbuch der historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Erlangen, Parts I. u. II., 1836-39; 2d ed. of Part I. by Keil, Frankfurt, 1854-56; Part III. edited by Keil, 1849, English translation), A Historico-Critical Introduction to the Pentateuch (Edinburgh, 1850), and A General Historico-Critical Introduction to the Old Testament (1852).

HAWES, Joel, D.D., b. Medway, Mass., Dec. 22, 1789; d. at Gilead, Conn., June 5, 1867. He was graduated from Brown University 1813; studied at Andover; and from 1818 till his death was pastor of the First Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn. He wrote several religious works, of which the best known is Lectures to Young Men on the Formation of Character, Hartford, 1828; repeatedly reprinted, and widely circulated, in the United States and Great Britain.

HAWKER, Robert, D.D., an "evangelical;" b. at Exeter, Eng., 1753; educated at Oxford; vicar of Charles-the-Martyr in Plymouth for fifty years; d. in that town April 6, 1827. He was a popular divine, and author of The Poor Man's Commentary, covering the entire Bible (London, 1816-22, 10 vols.), and The Poor Man's Morning and Evening Portion, which passed through many editions. An edition of his Works, mostly sermons, exclusive of his Commentary, appeared in 10 vols., London, 1831. Rev. Dr. John Williams prefaced the edition by a brief memoir.

HAWKER, Robert Stephen, the grandson of the preceding; b. at Stoke Damerel, Eng., Dec. 3, 1804; d. at Plymouth, Monday, Aug. 16, 1875. After education at Oxford, in 1834 he was presented by the Bishop of Exeter to the vicarage of Morwenstow, on the north-west coast of Cornwall, in "a wild district, which with its ecclesiastical remains, its traditions, its scanty untaught peasantry, and its wreckers, was well adapted to the independent, eccentric, and mystical character of Mr. Hawker." He was passionately fond of animals, and numerous stories are told of his strange doings with them,—how he had a pet pig which accompanied him on his walks; how he conducted service while his nine cats careered about the chancel; how he drove his cows on the cliffs, etc. As a poet he is likely to have a place in English literature. The best known of his collections of poetry are Ecclesia (1841), Quest of the Sangreal (1864), Cornish Ballads (1869). He had a stroke of paralysis, Aug. 9, 1875; and, while thus incapacitated for mental action, he was received, apparently without any conscious personal co-operation, into the Church of Rome. His biography was written by Rev. S. Baring-Gould (London, 1876, American reprint, N.Y., 3d ed., 1882), and also by Rev. F. G. Lee, D.C.L. (London, 1876).

HAWKS, Francis Lister, D.D., LL.D., b. at Newbern, N.C., June 10, 1798; d. in New-York City, Sept. 26, 1866. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina 1815; practised law for a while with great success, but in 1827 entered the ministry of the Protestant-Episcopal Church; served churches in New Haven, Philadelphia, New York (1831-43, 1849-62, 1865-66), and New Orleans (1844-49). In 1835 he was appointed historiographer of his denomination, and prepared Contributions to the Ecclesiastical History of the United States (embracing Virginia and Maryland), New York, 1836-39; Documentary History of the Protestant-Episcopal Church in Connecticut, New York, 1863, 1864, 2 vols. He was a brilliant and impressive pulpit orator, and was three times elected to the episcopate, first as missionary bishop of the South-West (1835), then as bishop of Mississippi (1844), and finally as bishop of Rhode Island (1852). But he declined these positions.

HAWLEY, Gideon, missionary to the Indians; b. at Stratford (now Bridgeport), Conn., Nov. 5, 1727; d. in Mashpee, Mass., Oct. 3, 1807. He was graduated at Yale College (1749), and conducted missions among the Mohawk, Oneida, Tuscarora, and Iroquois. He had great influence among these tribes.

HAYDN, Joseph, b. at Rohran, on the frontier between Austria and Hungary, March 31, 1732; d. in Vienna, May 31, 1809; received his musical education at Hainburg and Vienna, and was in 1760 appointed chapel-master to Prince Esterhazy. He twice visited London (1790-92 and 1794, 1795); and the result of these visits to the land of Handel was his grand oratorio, The Creation (1799). In the history of music, however, it is his hundred and eighteen symphonies to which he owes his fame.

HAAZ' AEL (חֶזְאֵל, חֶזְאֵל, "God has seen"), king, for at least forty-five years, of Damascene Syria in the first half of the ninth century B.C. Sent by King Benhadad to consult Elisha concerning his cure from sickness, he received the announcement from the prophet of the king's death, and his own elevation to the throne. The day after his return, Benhadad died a violent death (perhaps drowned in his bath), and, as it would seem, by Hazael's hand (though Ewald calls this in question). Joram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah of Judah, leagued themselves against him, but were defeated (2 Kings viii. 28, ix. 15); and from Jehu, Joram's murderer and successor, Hazael took all his trans-Jordanic provinces, and treated the inhabitants with ferocious cruelty (Amos i. 3 sqq.); nor did he spare Judah, and was only diverted from marching against Jerusalem by a handsome tribute (2 Kings xii. 18). Hazael is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as having been twice attacked by Shalmaneser II. See the Bible Dicts. of WINER, RIEM [and SMITH], and EWALD'S Hist. of Israel (iii.). HEAVEN is (1) the upper part of the created world, which is mentioned before the earth, on account of its being nobler and more capacious than it (Gen. i. 1). The name is of divine origin, and designates the firmament which God set between the upper and the lower waters: that is, the space which extends above the earth (Gen. i. 6-8). It has been supposed by Delitzsch (Com. on Genesis) that the stars of the fourth day of creation were developed out of the upper waters, just as the solid earth was developed out of the lower waters; and the facts of astronomy seem to favor this view, the density of Jupiter being no greater than that of water, and the density of Saturn being only half as great. But it is opposed by other representations (Gen. vii. 11; Ps. cxlviii. 4), according to which the "waters" still continue to exist above the heavens. We are not, therefore, surprised to be told, that, like the earth, so the created heavens will pass away (Matt. xxiv. 29, 35; Mark xiii. 25, 31; 2 Pet. iii. 10).

(2) Heaven also designates the place where God specially manifests his glory. It is his throne (Isa. lxi. 1). "The heaven of heavens is the Lord's: the earth he has given to the children of men" (Ps. cxv. 16). After the flood, sacrifices ascended to it (Gen. viii. 20). Heaven is in this case supermundane, as well as superterrene, distinct from the earth, and high above all created objects. God has revealed himself from heaven, since the time of Noah, through a covenant of grace, whose ultimate aim is the union of heaven and earth. In time the Hebrew nation was chosen as the representative of God's kingdom on the earth, and the temple erected at Jerusalem which contained the mercy-seat, where the invisible God was always present. But these were only shadows of good things to come (Heb. x. 1). When the fulness of time was come, God revealed himself in Christ, who descended from heaven (John iii. 13), and announced the establishment of the kingdom of heaven amongst men. He made repentance the condition of membership in it, and taught men to pray to the heavenly Father that this kingdom might come, and so God's will be done on earth as in heaven.

(3) The Epistle to the Hebrews gives us a deeper insight into the mystery of heaven. The "holy place" into which Christ entered when he ascended from the earth (Heb. ix. 11, 12) is nothing else than the holy of holies of heaven, the place of the glorious presence of God. This is heaven in its fullest, its real sense (Heb. ix. 24, "heaven itself"). There Christ, as the eternal high priest, is always advocating our cause, but in such a way that he makes the world the scene of his saving presence (Eph. i. 23). He himself sits on the throne, whence such language as that "he was made higher than the heavens" (Heb. vii. 26), and "hath passed through the heavens" (Heb. iv. 14). "When the departure of Jesus from the world was in question, it was sufficient to say 'into heaven;' but when the idea was to be expressed that all earthly limitation was removed, and every possible barrier between Jesus and God taken away, then the expression is used, 'far above all the heavens' (ὑπεράνω πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν), or one like it" (Hofmann, Schriftbeweis, ii. 1, p. 535). It is this superspatial heaven, above the cloudy and the stellar heavens, both of which are transient, to which Paul refers when he speaks of the "third heaven" (2 Cor. xii. 2).

Those who partake of the benefits of Christ's death and resurrection have their citizenship in heaven (Phil. iii. 20); and, on the other hand, those who are already in heaven continue to have an interest in the progress of Christ's kingdom on the earth (Luke xv. 7, etc.). But the created heavens (Gen. i. 1) and earth will pass away, and be replaced by new heavens and a new earth (2 Pet. iii. 13). Upon this new earth the heavenly Jerusalem will be let down (Rev. xxi.), which will be distinguished for holiness, and will be resplendent with glory (Rev. xxi. 11 sqq.).

The doctrine of heaven offers a large field for the fancy; and a spiritualistic tendency is to be avoided, which resolves the heavenly realities into mere ideas and unreal ideals, as well as a gross realism such as is represented by Swedenborg and Oberliu, and in works like Uranographie oder Beschreibung d. unsichtbaren Welt (Uranography, or a Description of the Invisible World, Ludwigsburg, 1856). It must be admitted that there is something real to correspond to the figures, and the one bears a relation to the other similar to that which exists between the glorified and natural body. BUCHRUCKER.

HEBER, Reginald, a distinguished bishop and hymn-writer; b. at Malpas, Chester, April 21, 1783; d. at Trichinopoly, India, April 3, 1826. He was delicate in constitution, but precocious in intellect, at an early age writing poems (Ishmael, etc.) which were retained side by side with his maturer compositions. In 1800 he went to Oxford, and three years afterwards produced the prize-poem, Palestine, which takes highest rank among productions of its kind, and was set to music by Dr. Crotch. In 1804 he was fellow of All Souls. After travelling through Northern Europe he became rector, in 1807, of Hodnet. His kind and charitable disposition won the affections of his people. In 1815 he delivered the Bampton Lectures on the Personality and Office of the Christian Comforter. In 1817 he was made canon of St. Asaph, and, 1822, preacher at Lincoln's Inn. Soon after, the see of Calcutta was offered to Heber. After much hesitation, he accepted the position, and was consecrated at Lambeth, June 16, 1823. At that time Calcutta was the only diocese in India. Heber threw himself eagerly into the work which had been begun by his predecessor, Dr. Middleton. He sought to build up educational institutions, as well as increase the missions. His excessive and useful labors were brought to a sudden termination by his death, from apoplexy, while taking a bath.

Bishop Heber continues to be known, not only as the laborious and devoted prelate of India, but also as the author of some of our most polished and devout hymns. Among these are "Brightest and best of the sons of the morning," "Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty;" and of all missionary hymns his "From Greenland's icy mountains" is the most inspiring and œcumenical. Heber was a High-Churchman, and held to the doctrine of apostolical succession. He carried out these views in India strictly, and yet he was recognized as a man of catholic and liberal spirit. Upon the Thirty-nine Articles he put an Arminian interpretation. He combined learning, and refinement of manners, with humility, and consecration to his work.

LIT. — Heber's works not already mentioned are, Works and Life of Jeremy Taylor (1822, 15 vols.), Hymns for the Weekly Church Service of the Year (1827), A Journey through India (1828, 2 vols.), Sermons Preached in England (1828), Sermons Preached in India (1829), Parish Sermons (1837, 3 vols., 5th ed., 1844). — Life of Reginald Heber, D.D., by his widow, London and New York, 1830, 2 vols.; ROBINSON: Last Days of Reginald Heber, London, 1830; CHAMBERS: Bishop Heber and Indian Missions, London, 1846.

HEBREW LANGUAGE, The, is the language of the Hebrews, the descendants of Eber, or Heber, the ancestor of Abraham (Gen. xi. 14). In the Old Testament they called themselves "The Children of Israel," "Israel," "The House of Jacob," "Jacob;" but by the non-Israelites they were called "Hebrews" (Gen. xxxix. 14, xl. 12; Exod. i. 16, ii. 6; 1 Sam. iv. 6, xiii. 19). and so they called themselves in contradistinction to non-Israelites (Gen. xl. 15, xliii. 32; Exod. i. 15, 19). Apparent exceptions are 1 Sam. xiii. 3, 7, xiv. 21; but here the text may be corrupt, for the Septuagint reads, "Let the slaves revolt," "And those that crossed, crossed the Jordan," in the first two cases respectively. We are therefore naturally led to suppose that the designation "Hebrew" for the speech of the Israelites came from the non-Israelites, or from Greek-speaking Jews, since the expression ἑβραϊκή occurs first in the Apocrypha and in the Prologue to Sirach (i.e., about 130 B.C.), to describe not only the old Hebrew language, but that of the later popular Aramaic of the Jews. The same phrase occurs in the New Testament (John v. 2, xix. 13, 17; cf. ἑβραῖς διαλέκτος Acts xxi. 40, xxii. 2, xxvi. 14). The Old Testament never applies the term "Hebrew" to the language: on the contrary, in Isa. xix. 18 it is called the "language of Canaan" when distinguished from that of the Egyptians. — an expression which indicates that it was the speech not only of the Israelites, but also of the other inhabitants of Canaan as well. In 2 Kings xviii. 26, 28, Isa. xxxvi. 11, 13, Neh. xiii. 24, the speech of the Judaites is called "Jewish," in distinction to the Aramaic.

As the Hebrews belonged to a family of nations, so their tongue was a member of a widely spread family of languages, usually denominated, since Eichhorn, "Shemitic." It is impossible to describe exactly its boundaries; but suffice it to say, its northern limit was the table-lands of Armenia, its eastern was the Tigris, its southern the Persian Gulf, and its western the Mediterranean Sea. [For the relations of the languages within these limits, see SEMITIC LANGUAGES.]

The Hebrew occupied a middle position between the Aramaic and the North Arabic, and displayed the linguistic peculiarities of such a position. If it lacked the richness of expressions, the variety of forms, the completer vocalization, and the fulness of inflections, of the North Arabic, and displayed in many particulars the poverty of the Aramaic, it still had, on the other hand, a rich possession which the Aramaic had lost by attrition. At the time when Hebrew comes to our knowledge in literature, it was the oldest of the Shemitic languages, Aramaic was next, and North Arabic last. But this does not imply that the Shemitic family passed through three stages to be so denominated: rather, these three tongues existed side by side. The age of the literature and that of the literary language is not the same as the age of the language. It does not, therefore, follow, from the great age of the Hebrew literature, that the language itself is the provably most original form of the Shemitic; for this conclusion could only be reached when the development of the other languages of this family had proceeded under the same conditions and influences, and, above all, in the same time. But so far is this from the case, that it is certain that Aramaic, in less time than Hebrew, became a more degenerate language; that Hebrew in many respects resembles Aramaic, and more and more as we trace its influence in the successive books of the Old Testament; that Arabic presents really the oldest form of the language in spite of its late literature; and, finally, that Hebrew had already declined when its earliest books were written.

When and where Hebrew arose is unknown. Two conjectures are admissible. — Hebrew was the language of Abraham, brought with him from "Ur of the Chaldees" (Gen. xi. 31), i.e., Mugheir, south of Babylon, on the right bank of the Euphrates; or it was the language of the original inhabitants of Canaan. In favor of the latter is the distinction between Hebrew and Aramaic, which dates from patriarchal times (Gen. xxxi. 47).

Since the proper names of the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, are Hebrew, and since Old-Testament tradition declares these peoples to be closely related to the Israelites, these must have spoken Hebrew, as is strikingly shown by the Moabite stone, which dates from the first half of the ninth century B.C. (see art.). Differences of pronunciation and expression in different parts of Palestine are proven by the Shibboleth incident (Judg. xii. 6) and by Deborah's ode (Judg. v.). Dialectical differences are alluded to in Neh. xiii. 23, 24, and Matt. xxvi. 73.

It stands to reason that the Hebrew language must have undergone changes during the more than twelve centuries we are acquainted with it by books, inscriptions, and coins; yet the proof of this fact is difficult, and the result of all investigations to this end most meagre, for the following reasons. 1. No one period is fully represented; only fragments of its literature remain, as is proved by allusions in the books themselves: hence what is set down as peculiar to the age may be only a peculiarity of a writer. 2. It follows that it is impossible to decide certainly how old any particular book or other writing is, and therefore there can be no strict chronological arrangement. 3. In one book there may be quotations, more or less altered, from older books. In proof, compare the parallel passages in Kings and Chronicles. 4. From the time of Moses to the seventh century B.C., so secluded, and in the main peaceful, was the life of Israel, that their language would naturally undergo little change. Even when under tribute to Assyria, the Hebrews were not as a people molested. 5. In linguistic changes the vowels suffer most; but the fact that in Hebrew writing only consonants are employed renders it well-nigh impossible to discover these vowel changes. The present Hebrew points are of comparatively late origin, and, although preservative of an old tradition, are uniformly applied to all portions of the earlier and the later Old Testament alike.

Aramaic exercised a decided influence upon Hebrew from the end of the seventh century B.C. Its presence, therefore, is one note of time. Accordingly, in the history of Hebrew, it is customary to make the exile the dividing line. The first period extends to the exile. Attempts have been made to prove the greater age of the Pentateuch, as compared, e.g., with the other historical books, principally by citing the use in the former of the pronoun הוּא for the feminine הִיא (which also occurs in eleven places in the Pentateuch), the word נַעַר in the sense of "young one" and "girl," the word הָאֵל for הָאֵלֹהִים (found only in the Pentateuch and in Chronicles). But, as these cannot be proven to be archaisms, they do not prove the antiquity of the language of the Pentateuch. Equally indecisive are the so-called antique forms in these books; because it would be easy, from any other number of books having the same number of words, to pick out an equal number of unusual forms, which with equal reason might be called "antique." As to the words and word-forms which occur only in the Pentateuch, or, if outside, only sporadically, it should be remembered that the Pentateuch constitutes one quarter of the whole Old Testament, and of each other quarter precisely the same thing is true, and, further, that the Pentateuch deals with matters not treated of in the remaining books. In the words peculiar to the Pentateuch there is not such a number of grammatical peculiarities as to prove the words archaic, or from which to argue the age of the writing. So much depends upon the individuality of the writer, upon his methods of work, upon his subject and his purpose, that it is impossible to trace a development of the language in this period from age to age by a study of words. Thus, within the books and within sections of the same book, a mere increase in liveliness of tone leads to the introduction of poetic words; e.g., in the Pentateuch are sections which in this way differ from other sections and from other books, yet are they not on that account proven to belong to a different time. The same is the case in the historical books. The historic, the poetic, and the prophetic books have quite distinct purposes, and, in consequence, different vocabularies. The poets, further, were compelled, by their mode of writing by parallels, to make use of out-of-the-way expressions, because they needed a larger stock of expressions than, say, the historians, who found the ordinary speech ready to their hand, and ample for their wants. The prophets used longer sentences, and these had a freer swing than the poets'; otherwise, they have linguistically much in common. But, in spite of these differences, the laws of the language remained throughout the same.

The second period extends from the exile to the present day. It is characterized by the introduction of Aramaisms. In the time of Ezekiah

Aramaic was a foreign tongue (Isa. xxxvi.). In 720 B.C. the Northern Kingdom fell under the Assyrians; and, as the result of its troubles, Aramaic corrupted the language there. The Kingdom of Judah, until the end of the seventh century, remained linguistically Hebrew; yet Aramaic idioms were found, as Jeremiah and Ezekiel testify. It was not, indeed, until the end of the exile, that Hebrew lost its pristine purity and vigor. Then came a great change. The returned exiles naturally used Persian names for their rulers; by marrying "strange women," they further corrupted their speech; and, exposed as they were to broads of strangers, it is not wonderful that their language was no longer pure Hebrew. Ezra and Nehemiah tried to stem the tide; they ordered that the sacred book of the law should be read in Hebrew (Neh. viii. 8); and Nehemiah was particularly indignant with those Jews who spoke the speech of Ashdod (Neh. xiii. 23 sqq.). These two wrote Hebrew, which does not differ substantially from that of Kings. But by the downfall of the language is meant rather the downfall of the literature; for certain writings of this period, in point of purity, resemble those of the pre-exilic period. These proceeded from the strict Jews, who jealously guarded their diction. The mass of the people quickly came to speak Aramaic. But still Hebrew did not become exactly a dead language, nor one understood only by the learned. On the contrary, the reading of the original holy writings in the synagogues, and their explanation, trained the Jews generally in Hebrew. Hence it came, that, when the learned had occasion to use writing to instruct their fellow-believers, they wrote in Hebrew. In the Mishna (about the second century A.D.) and in other Jewish compositions of a somewhat later date, we find Hebrew which is no servile imitation of the old speech, but a genuine development in the path struck in the later biblical books.

Quite different is the Hebrew written since the eleventh century, generally called the rabbinic. This is pedantic, imitative, a book-language, yet full of words, technical expressions, and particles, which are partly Aramaic, and partly borrowed from the language of the country in which the writer lived. E. BERTHEAU.

HISTORY. — The history of the critical study of the Hebrew begins with the Jewish grammarians and scribes, the Talmudists, and Masoretes, who carefully collected all that pertains to the text of the Hebrew Scriptures. The Christian fathers, with the exception of Origen, Epiphanius, and especially Jerome (who learned the language from a Jewish rabbi, and utilized it for his translation of the Vulgate), were ignorant of the Hebrew language, and derived their knowledge of the Old Testament from the Greek Septuagint and the Latin Vulgate. During the middle ages the Hebrew was almost exclusively cultivated by learned Jews, especially in Spain during the Moorish rule, such as Eben Ezra (d. 1170), David Kimchi, Moses Maimonides (d. 1204). Even the greatest scholastic divines knew nothing of Hebrew. After the revival of letters, some Christians began to learn it from Jewish rabbis. Reuchlin (d. 1522), the uncle of Melancthon, is the father of modern Hebrew learning in the Christian Church. He wrote a Hebrew grammar (1505), coined most of the technical terms which have since been in use in Hebrew grammars (status absolutus, affirmum, verba quiescentia, etc.), and introduced the pronunciation that prevails in Germany. The Reformers cultivated and highly recommended the study of Hebrew; and the Protestant translations of the Bible were made directly from the original languages, and not from the Vulgate. During the seventeenth century, Buxtorf (father and son) of Basel, Louis Cappel of Saumur, and Salomon Glassius of Jena, were the most prominent Hebrew and Talmudic scholars. In the present century, Wilhelm Gesenius, professor in Halle (1786-1842), and Heinrich Ewald, professor in Göttingen (1803-73), created a new epoch in the study of Hebrew. Rödiger, Hupfeld, Hitzig, Fürst, Delitzsch, and others are prominent in this department of learning. In our own country, Moses Stuart of Andover (d. 1852), Edward Robinson of Union Seminary, New York (d. 1863), James Addison Alexander of Princeton (d. 1859), Bush, Conant, and Green deserve special mention as Hebrew scholars. HEBREW POETRY will be considered in this article in three aspects,—the national, biblical, and technical. The first two have to do with the contents, character, and history of Hebrew poetry; the last with its form.

I. NATIONAL.— As with other peoples, so among the Hebrews, poetry precedes prose. In the Bible we have record of many events which previously were embodied in popular songs. In this way the national heart was fired by the stories of Samson and the Philistines (Judg. xv. 16) and of David and Goliath (1 Sam. xviii. 7). But there were longer poems which described battles and victories, such as Num. xxi. 27-30, and, above all, Deborah's ode (Judg. v.), the crown of the patriotic poetry of Israel, and the oldest long Hebrew poem which has come down to us. Domestic histories furnished descriptive poems: so the sad fate of Jephthah's daughter was commemorated by the virgins of Gilead (Judg. xi.), the rape by the Benjaminites of the virgins of Shiloh (Judg. xxi.). The finding of a fountain was the occasion of a new song (Num. xxi. 17). Abandoned women used singing to promote their ends (Isa. xxiii. 15). Singing, and playing upon instruments of music, formed prominent parts of public worship (2 Sam. vi. 15; Ps. lxxviii. 25). The art of poetry was taught in the schools, and the orators and prophets were poets. Thus all times and occasions—love and beauty in peace, skill and daring in war—yielded materials to the poet, and naturally told their tale in verse. When the history of Hebrew literature comes to be written, the many beautiful poems will be properly estimated.

Many attempts have been made to divide Hebrew poetry into varieties, according to its peculiarities; but all such attempts must necessarily be uncertain, because we have but a single species in sufficient quantity to be a standard, and the judgment can never be general. Still less successful must ever be the attempt to subject Hebrew poetry to the classifications usual with classic and modern poetry. The chief characteristics of Hebrew (or, more generally, of Semitic) poetry are these. 1. Subjectivity. The Hebrew poet deals only with what concerns him personally: hence there is no epic or drama, because these require objectivity. 2. Sententiousness. There is properly no beginning or end, no progress; so that the stanzas might be arranged differently without affecting the meaning of the poem in any way. 3. Sensuousness. In proof recall the imagery from the animal world,—the symbolism, the personifications, the very anthropomorphisms, which we find at times offensive, but which were innate with the Hebrew. Hebrew poetry was at first, of course, composed and repeated without recourse to writing; but after a time anthologies were compiled. Two such collections must have been very early made; for we find in Num. xxi. 14 an allusion to the "Book of the wars of Jehovah," and in Josh. x. 13 one to the "Book of Jasher." Cf. 2 Sam. i. 18.

II. BIBLICAL. — It is grossly wrong to call the Old Testament a "codex of Hebrew national literature;" but it is certainly a reading and school book of religion, compiled with this design from the extant literature. In the collection, Jewish scholars name three books as poetical, — Job, Psalms, and Proverbs, and have given these a peculiar accentuation. But, besides these, the Song of Solomon and Lamentations should be so designated; and in the other books are frequent passages of poetry; e.g., Gen. xlix.; Judg. v.; Isa. xxxviii. 10 sqq. [This fact is obscured from the reader of the Authorized Version by the faulty method of printing. See the proper method in the Cambridge Bible or the Revised English Bible, published by Eyre and Spottiswoode.]

Hebrew poetry is of two kinds, the lyric and the didactic, called by the words שיר and משל respectively. The first is a song, joined inseparably therefore with music; but it is impossible for us, in our profound ignorance of Hebrew music, to tell how any of the Bible lyrics were sung; and the blind directions found in the headings to many of the Psalms do not help us a particle. These lyrics are written in every key, and run the gamut of feeling. Joy and sorrow, defeat and victory, personal and national emotions, find in them expression. Often, however, the lyric shades off into the didactic; e.g., in Job and in many of the Psalms. Other lyrics, e.g., the Song of Deborah, appear to be attempts at an epic. It lies in the very nature of a lyric to be individual, — the ego in song; and the Hebrews, judging from the specimens preserved, took the lead in antiquity as respects tenderness, depth, and nobility: in grace, however, they came short.

The word משל, which we translate "didactic poetry," comes from a root meaning "to compare." Hence משל is primarily a comparison of any sort. It designates in the Bible (1) a fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.; 2 Kings xiv. 9 sq.). (2) A parable (2 Sam. xii. 1 sqq.; Isa. v. 1 sqq.), and also an allegory (Ezek. xvii. 2 sqq., xxiv. 3 sqq.). (3) An apothegm, maxim, and proverb, three species which the Hebrews did not clearly distinguish. In the majority of cases, there are in these real comparisons expressed in parallel clauses: for this phenomenon in regard even to proverbs, see 1 Sam. x. 12; Ezek. xviii. 2. (4) A riddle which rests upon a comparison. (5) A satire (Isa. xiv. 4 [cf. marg.]; Hab. ii. 6). (6) A didactic poem proper (cf. Ps. xlix. 1, lxxviii. 2). To this last classification belong many of the Psalms which treat of personal and national events in a meditative rather than lyrical fashion, and which therefore are to be read rather than sung. So, also, the first part of Proverbs, as well as Job and Ecclesiastes. In regard to Job it should be said, that it is in outline an epic, in form a dialogue

(not a drama). In poetic beauty it rivals the best Hebrew lyrics; but in intention it is a didactic poem, wherein a private history is related, whose teachings are brought out. Ecclesiastes has far less claim to be called poetical on account of its proverbial character.

III. TECHNICAL. — Hebrew poetry, as was to be expected, contains many words not found in prose, but is distinguished from the latter chiefly, of course, by its structure. 1. Modern Jewish poetry proves the capacity of Hebrew for rhyme; but there are no rhymes, properly speaking, in the Hebrew Scriptures: what appear to be such (cf. Gen. iv. 23 sqq.; Ps. viii. 5; Isa. xxxiii. 32) are not intentionally so. It is, however, to be remarked in this connection, that assonance is an occasional feature of Hebrew poetry (cf. Ps. cxxiv.; Lam. v.), but no law of the poetry any more than alliteration, which is also found (cf. Isa. v. 7, xxi. 2, xxix. 6; Hos. viii. 7; Nah. ii. 11).

2. The text of the poetry is divided into short sections (verses) and longer sections (strophes). The verses are independent parts of speech, and the chief characteristics of Hebrew poetry. They are regularly two lines, occasionally three. Several verses make up the strophe. Homogeneity in form and number of verses is essential to a strophe's construction. Externally it is simply marked by the refrain, or the repetition of the concluding verse (cf. Ps. xlii.-xliiii., lvii.; Isa. ix. 7 sqq.; Amos i., ii.); or the alphabetical beginning, which is, however, not exactly technic, so that either verse and strophe fall together (Ps. xxv., xxxiv., cxlv.; Prov. xxxi. 10 sqq.; Lam. i., ii., iv.), or not (Ps. ix.-x., xxxvii.); or inside the strophe the alphabetic order is repeated (Ps. cxix.), or even within the verse (Ps. cxi., cxii.; Lam. iii.). Internally, however, the strophe rounds itself off with the thought, and by means of the mutual reference of the particular parts of the poem (Exod. xv.; Ps. ii., lxviii., civ., cxiv.).

3. Parallelism, or the regular placing side by side of symmetrically constructed clauses, is not so much a feature of Hebrew poetry as its very nature. The symmetry is, however, ideal rather than external, lying in the relation of the expression to the thought; so that the last furnishes in its various applications additional matter for versification. The same thought is repeated several times synonymously in different words, or else antithetically by two opposite sentences. So each line of verse forms either a sentence in all its members parallel to the one set over against it, or the doubling relates only to one or two elements of the sentence, while the remainder are divided upon the two lines without parallel. The parallelism also extends to two or three lines in the last case, either three times synonymously (cf. Ps. i. 1), or only twice, and then completes the thought with an introductory or concluding line. It can, however, include four members, if the repetition be simple and fourfold, although this is seldom the case, and by carrying it too far (cf. Ps. xix. 8 sq.) it becomes tedious; or it may found, as is more frequent, in connecting the lines two and two, ab-cd (Isa. xliiii. 4), or, more elegantly, ac bd (cf. Ps. xxxiii. 13). Antithetic parallelism is seldom met with, and generally consists of two members, sometimes of four, and intricate (comp. Canticles, i. 5). All these otherwise infinitely diversified forms are interchanged in most poems, and are arbitrarily mingled, and it is just this mingling which contributes to the poetic gradation. In the first four elegies of Jeremiah's Lamentations, and in many of the later Psalms, the elaborate structure is best seen.

Hebrew poetry does not admit of scanning, and the assertion of Josephus that it was written in metre was wide of the truth. There was, however, more to it than parallelisms and strophes; viz., rhythm. But, as we have no knowledge of the ancient Hebrew pronunciation, we cannot read Hebrew poetry rhythmically.

HEBREWS, Name and History. See ISRAEL.

HEBREWS, Epistle to the. Title.—This simple name, which does not signify much, must always serve as the designation of one of the most important doctrinal writings of the New Testament. Neither the tradition of the early Church, nor the results of critical investigation, are of such a nature as to justify us in ascribing it with certainty to any definite author. Nor has there come down any notice of the circle of readers for whom it was written, which is worthy of much consideration beyond the superscription and closing designation πρὸς Ἑβραίους ("to the Hebrews"). This title dates back to the time of its first circulation in connection with the other books of the New Testament; and about the year 200 it was used equally by churches which held different views about its authorship and its relation to the canon; as, for example, by the Alexandrine Church and the African Church (Tertullian, De pudic., 20). The assertion has been made that the Epistle sometimes bore the title πρὸς Λαοδικαίους ("to the Laodiceans"). It is based upon the very insufficient ground, that, in the Codex Bernerianus, the text breaks off at the close of Philemon with the words, "Here begins the Epistle to the Laodiceans." Philaster, who states that an Epistle to the Laodiceans was ascribed to Paul, has been appealed to for this view, but wrongly; for he distinctly says that the Church read thirteen epistles by Paul, and at times the Epistle to the Hebrews. The supposition that in the West the Epistle to the Hebrews was regarded as identical with the Epistle to the Laodiceans, is made all the more improbable by the fact that the Western Church did not regard the former as of Pauline origin, and, on the other hand, possessed an Epistle to the Laodiceans, under the name of Paul. It has also been regarded by some as being identical with the Epistle to the Alexandrians, mentioned in the Muratorian canon; but the erroneousness of this view has been fully exposed by Hesse (D. muratorian. Fragment, pp. 201-222). The title πρὸς Ἑβραίους ("to the Hebrews") is therefore to be looked upon as having been associated with the Epistle from the very earliest times.

Readers, and Date of Composition.—The term "Hebrews" does not limit the persons addressed to Hebrew-speaking Jews, in contrast to Hellenists, or the Jews that spoke Greek. The fact that the Epistle was written in Greek is evidence against this view; but the persons addressed were evidently of Hebrew birth. It is probable that it was not directed to the whole body of Jewish Christians, but to a particular congregation living in a definite locality; and the fact that the title refers, not to a place, but to the nationality of the readers, is to be explained by a distinction between the Hebrew and Gentile Christians in the locality where the persons addressed lived.

The opinion that the Epistle was addressed to Jewish Christians does not rest upon such passages as i. 1 (comp. 1 Cor. x. 1) or ii. 16 (comp. Rom. iv. 11-18), but upon the circumstance that the author regards his readers as the successors of pre-Christian Israel (iv. 1-9, vi. 12 sqq., viii. 7 sqq.), and that, while recognizing the universal efficacy of Christ's death (ii. 9, 15), he speaks only of its atoning power for sins left unatoned for under the old covenant (ix. 15, xiii. 12). This also follows from the exhortation to the Jews in xiii. 13, and, above all, from the opinions and tendencies which the whole Epistle combats. Its aim is not to present the "advantages of Christianity over Judaism" (Reuss, etc.), but to serve as a practical exhortation (xiii. 22). This design becomes apparent in the solemn warning of ii. 1-4, which is based upon the doctrinal discussion of chap. i. Throughout the Epistle the doctrinal treatment is merely made the basis of practical exhortations. The readers who are in danger of a complete apostasy from the Christian faith are warned against the destruction which would follow upon a disregard of the proclamation of salvation (ii. 1-3, xii. 25), and exhorted to hold fast to the profession of their faith (iii. 1, iv. 14) and to the hope of the final glory (iii. 6, etc.). Those Israelites who believed in Jesus gain incomparably more than they lose by giving up Judaism; for Christ does perfectly, by his death and ascension, the work which the high priests of the Old Testament only typified (iv. 14-x. 18). The opinion which regards the readers as still taking part in the ordinances of the temple, and believing these were necessary to the forgiveness of sins (Bleek, Lünemann, Riehm), is at variance with the assertion that they had proved their faith by sufferings and works of charity (iii. 14, vi. 10, x. 22, 32). If this were true, and the author had wished to divert them from the observances of the Mosaic ritual, he would not have spoken of the original purity of their faith (xiii. 7), but have emphasized the necessity of a departure from the temple ritual, which he does not do, not even in xiii. 13. There is no trace of evidence in the Epistle for the view that the readers were observing the temple ritual, or were in danger of falling back again into such observance.

As regards the locality in which the readers resided, four places have been specially thought of,—Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, and Rome. The following considerations tell against the first three suppositions, and in favor of the last. The Epistle could not have been written to the Church in Jerusalem, for it had been from the beginning the teacher of others (Acts viii. 4, xi. 19; Rom. xv. 27); but of these "Hebrews" this is particularly denied (v. 12). Nor did the Christians of Jerusalem "minister unto the saints" by works of charity (vi. 10), but, on the contrary, were the recipients of charity. The "Hebrews," then, of the Epistle, were such as aided the Church of Jerusalem by contributions. The hypothesis of an Alexandrine circle of readers has been vigorously defended by Wieseler, who has attempted to show that the temple at Leontopolis satisfied the descriptions of the temple ritual as given in the Epistle, even in those points where they seem to be inconsistent with the ritual of the temple at Jerusalem. These inconsistencies, such as the high priest's offering up of daily sacrifices (vii. 27), are assumed, but cannot be made out. But the main support of the hypothesis is based upon the assumption that Philo gives an account of the schismatic temple services at Leontopolis. But this is not only at variance with his known reverence for the temple at Jerusalem, but with the fact that he describes in enthusiastic language the ritual of the temple prescribed by the law, as being observed in his day. On the other hand, the Epistle itself (viii. 5, ix. 1-8) speaks of the ritual of Moses, but not of a temple and ritual existing and observed at the time of composition. The Antioch hypothesis has been revived by Hofmann, and is based upon historical coincidences (ii. 3, v. 12, vi. 10; comp. Acts xi. 19 sqq., xii. 25, xiii. 1). But it cannot be shown that a Hebrew Christianity existed there within sixty years after Paul's triumphant conflicts with Jewish assailants, and such as is described in our Epistle.

The most probable theory was first proposed by Weststein, and places the readers of the Epistle in Italy, or, more definitely, in Rome. The expression, "they of Italy salute you" (xiii. 24), is not a proof of the author's having written from Italy (comp. Pseudoign. ad Her., 8, in my edition, p. 270, 12), but is entirely consistent with the other supposition that he was not in Italy when he wrote. It is hardly probable that an exclusively Jewish congregation existed in Italy; but there must have been a large number of Hebrew Christians in the Roman Church (comp. Col. iv. 11; Phil. i. 14 sqq.), to whom the title "Hebrews" might properly be applied. The supposition that the Epistle was addressed to this smaller circle explains the double use of the word "all" in xiii. 24. Rom. xiv. is directed against substantially the same tendencies as Heb. xiii. 9; and in Rom. ix. 1-11 views are controverted which might easily develop into such as are brought to our notice in the Epistle to the Hebrews. This theory agrees well with the fact that the oldest Christian authors of Rome, as Clement and Hermas (comp. my Hirt des Hermas, pp. 439 sqq.), were largely influenced by the perusal of our Epistle. The readers themselves are described as having passed through a "great conflict of sufferings" (x. 32); which refers to the persecution of Nero (54-68), and not to that of Domitian (98-117). In the latter case, the composition of the Epistle would fall far down in the second century ("former days," x. 32),—a date utterly inconsistent with the use Clement and Hermas made of it, and with its theological character. But if the letter was written to the Hebrew Christians of Rome, and the persecution of x. 33 is identical with that of the year 64, the date cannot, on account of the expression "former days" (x. 32), be placed before 70, but may with tolerable accuracy be set down in 80. The use of the present tense in referring to the temple ritual (v. 1 sqq., viii. 4, ix. 6 sqq., etc.) proves nothing, as it was natural to use this tense for a theoretical description of the temple, based upon the description of the law, and as it is used in the same connection by Josephus, Clement of Rome (ad Cor., 40, 41), and in the Talmud. The consideration which has been frequently urged, that, had the author written after the destruction of Jerusalem, he would have used that event as an argument in viii. 13, would only be of value if it were proved that the readers were in danger of reverting to Judaism.

[Those who hold that the Epistle was written before the destruction of Jerusalem, in the year 70, emphasize, and justly, the constant use of the present tense in referring to the temple (v. 1, viii. 4, ix. 6, etc.) as still standing, and its ritual as being still observed. The past tense is otherwise frequently employed when the contrast is between the law and Christ (vii. 19, ix. 1, 18, etc.). The date is placed by Lardner, Davidson, and Schaff, in 63; Lange (Herzog, Real-Encyclopädie, 1st ed.), Stuart, Tholuck, and Wieseler, in 61; Dr. Kay (Speaker's Commentary), in 65; De Wette, Riehm, and Ewald, in 65-67; Conybeare and Howson, in 68 or 69.]

Author.—Less can be determined definitely about the author than about the persons addressed. All that can be derived from the Epistle itself is that the writer was a Hebrew convert to Christianity, who was indebted for his conversion to the disciples of Jesus (ii. 3), was associated with Timothy (xiii. 23), and spoke with the authority of a teacher to a congregation among whom he had resided for a while (xiii. 14). The tradition about the authorship is not uniform. According to the Alexandrine tradition, reaching back to the second century, Paul was the writer, and Clement of Alexandria attempts to explain his reasons for not introducing himself to his readers, as was his usual custom. Origen likewise assumes the Pauline authorship; but he recognizes that only a few churches besides the Alexandrine accepted this view. Irenæus (Eus., v. 26) and his pupil Hippolytus (Phot. Cod., 232, comp. 121), and the whole Church of the West, until after the beginning of the fourth century, denied the Pauline authorship. The tradition of the African Church (also reaching back to the second century) was that Barnabas was the author; and this view is expressly advocated by Tertullian (Exstat enim et Barnabæ titulus ad Hebræos, etc.; De Pudic., 20).

In view of these differences, the opinion widely prevails that the name of the author was early lost, and that the names of Paul and Barnabas were mere conjectures. For this reason, Luther, Bleek, Lünemann, Hilgenfeld, and [Alford] have associated Apollos with the Epistle; but the latter is purely conjectural, and has far less in its favor than the names of Barnabas or Paul. Of these two Barnabas is to be preferred, and for the following reasons. (1) The hypothesis that Paul was the author was as easy for the Church of Alexandria as that of Barnabas was difficult for the Church of Africa. As the name of Paul had been inserted before the Epistles from πρὸς Ῥωμαίους to πρὸς Φιλιππηνα ("to the Romans," "to Philemon"), it was natural to insert it after the next Epistle, which was πρὸς Ἑβραίους ("to the Hebrews"). Clement's second Epistle to the Corinthians experienced a similar fate. (2) The Barnabas tradition might have been more easily lost in the other parts of the Church than in the African, especially in the Alexandrine Church, which possessed a letter of similar import, which wrongly went under the name of Barnabas. This latter fact may easily be explained if we assume that there still remained a dim recollection of the tradition that Barnabas was the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews. (3) The style, the statement in ii. 3, 4, where the author speaks of himself as having heard the gospel of salvation from the disciples of Jesus (cf. Gal. i. 7; Rom. xvi. 25), and the absence of the usual salutation, all are against the Pauline hypothesis. (4) If the Epistle itself was addressed to Rome, then the Occidental tradition is to be preferred, and the supposition becomes probable that the African Church, always dependent upon the Roman as regards tradition, received the opinion that Barnabas was the author, from Rome itself. It becomes probable that Barnabas visited Rome (comp. Heb. xiii. 19), not only from the statement in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 7-11), but especially from the fact that Paul found Mark in Rome (Col. iv. 10), whither Barnabas may have accompanied him from Cyprus (Acts xv. 39).

HEBRON (friendship), a town of Palestine, situated about midway between Jerusalem and Beersheba, at an elevation of about three thousand feet above the sea, is one of the oldest cities in the world, built seven years before Tanis in Egypt (Num. xiii. 22). It is often mentioned in Old-Testament history, from the time of Abraham to the period of the Maccabees. By the Romans it was destroyed, but rebuilt during the middle ages, and the seat of a Christian bishop from 1167 to 1187, when it fell into the hands of Saladin. At present it numbers about ten thousand inhabitants, and is a hotbed of Mohammedan fanaticism. Its mosque stands over the cave of Machpelah, the burial-place of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; but it is closed against non-Mohammedans. There is not a Christian family in the town, but about five hundred Jews.

HECKEWELDER, John Gottlieb Ernestus, Moravian missionary; b. in Bedford, Eng., March 12, 1743; d. in Bethlehem, Penn., Jan. 31, 1823. He emigrated to America, 1754, and labored for many years among the Indians in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Michigan, in connection with David Zeisberger (see art.). From 1788 till 1810 he was agent of the Society of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen. From 1810 till his death he lived quietly in Bethlehem, preparing his two books, An Account of the History, Manners, and Customs of the Indian Nations who once inhabited Pennsylvania and the Neighboring States (Phila., 1818), and A Narrative of the United Brethren among the Delaware and Mohegan Indians (1740-1806), Phila., 1820. HEDIO, Kaspar, b. at Ettlingen, in Baden, 1494; d. at Strassburg, Oct. 17, 1553; studied at Freiburg and Basel, and was appointed court-preacher to the elector of Mayence in 1520, and in 1523 preacher at the Cathedral of Strassburg, where he labored assiduously for the introduction of the Reformation. He translated Eusebius and parts of Ambrosius, Augustine, etc.; edited the Chronicon Urspergense, and continued it from 1230 to 1537; and wrote a Chronicon Germanicum till 1545. His proper name was Heid.

HEDWIG, St., the wife of Duke Henry of Silesia and Poland, to whom she bore six children, devoted the last forty years of her life to the severest asceticism, and entered, after the death of her husband (in 1238), the convent of Trebnitz, where she died Oct. 15, 1243. She was canonized in 1266, and her festival is celebrated in the Roman Church on Oct. 17.

HEERBRAND, Jakob, b. at Giengen, in Suabia, Aug. 12, 1521; d. at Tübingen, May 22, 1600; studied at Ulm and Wittenberg, and was appointed preacher in Tübingen, 1544, but discharged in 1548, as he refused to accept the Interim. In 1550 he was made superintendent of Herrenberg, and in 1557 professor of theology at Tübingen. His principal work is his Compendium Theologicum (Tübingen, 1573), which was widely used in Germany as a text-book, and translated into Greek on account of the negotiations then going on between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the University of Tübingen.

HEERMANN, Johann, b. at Ranten, Silesia, Oct. 11, 1585; d. at Köben, Feb. 17, 1647; a Protestant pastor, who in 1630 published a volume of hymns (Devoti Musica Cordis), of which many are still in use in Germany, and some have been translated into English in Miss Winkworth's Lyra Germanica, and Schaff's Christ in Song, New York, 1869.

HEGEL, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich, b. at Stuttgart, Aug. 27, 1770; d. in Berlin, Nov. 14, 1831. He studied theology at Tübingen 1788-93; and lived as a private tutor, first at Bern 1793-96, then at Frankfurt 1797-1801. In 1801 he settled at Jena as lecturer on philosophy in the university, and Schelling's co-editor of the Kritische Journal der Philosophie. He was at that time fully agreed with Schelling. Their journal, of which he wrote the larger part, was the organ of the system of identity, — a philosophy which attempted to represent matter and mind, nature and spirit, world and God, as identical. But a closer acquaintance showed him, that, in the system of Schelling, this identity was a play of the imagination rather than a logical ratiocination. "shot from a pistol," rather than developed with spontaneous necessity; and when Schelling went to Würzburg in 1803, and the charm of the personal intercourse faded away, Hegel left the track and chose his own way, though the general direction of his thought continued the same. After the battle of Jena (1806), he removed to Bamberg, where for some time he edited the Bamberger Zeitung. The occupation was exceedingly modest, but at the same time he published his Phänomenologie des Geistes, a book which in wealth of ideas has no equal. From 1808 to 1816 he was a schoolmaster, director of the Aegidien gymnasium at Nuremberg, and there he married in 1810, and published his Philosophische Propädeutik and Wissenschaft der Logik; which latter work forms the foundation of his whole system, and is as deep and as forbidding as any cellar can be. In 1816 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Heidelberg, and in 1818 he was removed to Berlin; but in Berlin he published only his Philosophie des Rechts (his weakest work) and essays in the Jahrbücher für wissenschaftliche Kritik. After his death, his works were edited, in eighteen large volumes, by an association of friends, after his own notes and those of his hearers. Translated into English are The Subjective Logic (by Sloman and Wallon, 1855), Philosophy of History (by Sibree, 1857), the Logic, from the Encyclopædia (1871), large selections from his works in the Journal of Speculative Philosophy (edited by W. T. Harris, I.-V., St. Louis, 1867-71). His masterpieces are Phenomenology of Spirit, Science of Logic, Esthetics, and History of Philosophy, in second line stand Natural Philosophy, Philosophy of Right, Philosophy of History, and Philosophy of Religion.

The impression which Hegel made in Germany was at one time almost overpowering. His philosophy swept away all other philosophies as if they were mere dust, and before he died it began to make itself felt as an actual power both in State and Church. Nevertheless, immediately after his death a split took place in the school he had formed; the two divisions (the right represented by Gabler, Erdmann, Gans, Rosenkranz; the left, by Feuerbach, Bruno Bauer, Michelet, and Arnold Ruge) moving in diametrically opposite directions both in politics and religion. The fact is surprising, but not inexplicable. There was in Hegel personally a fund of religious, moral, and poetical sentiment, as rich as his power of intellect was grand. In his system of strongly pronounced pantheism, both these elements are perfectly fused together into one mass; but it was not to be wondered at, that, by further development, they should separate, each pursuing its own course. The method offered no resistance. Formally Hegel defined truth as the mediation between two opposites. His thought always moves from thesis, through antithesis, to synthesis, from the positive, through the negative, to the absolute. But this method is as acceptable to ecstatic mysticism as to radical rationalism. In the dispute which was caused by the split, the style came to play a curious but significant part. Hegel's style is an almost noiseless, almost colorless stream of molten steel, dangerous to touch. Racy expressions, pithy sayings, even bursts of lofty eloquence, occur; but they have no value as quotations. The word which stands for an idea, and not merely runs an errand in the sentence, never means the same in Hegel's writings as it means in other people's writings. Hegel said himself, "If you will understand my ideas, you must first understand my system." In the same sense it may be said, that while in other people's writings the reader begins by understanding the words, and thence reaches to the understanding of the book, in Hegel's writing you must understand the book before you can understand the words. Hence the reason why no amount of interpretation and explanation has been able to decide any thing with respect to what Hegel really meant. The whole dispute between the two fractions of his school has been a mere waste, more liable to confound the student than capable of illustrating the author.

The right wing of the Hegelian school is in theology represented by Daud, Marheineke, Göschel, Martensen; the left, by D. F. Strauss, F. C. Baur, Schwegler. Religion, Hegel defines as truth, but in the lowest form in which truth can be held by the human mind. In Christianity this form of truth has found its highest, its absolute expression, having passed through the stages of one-sided objectivity and one-sided subjectivity in the ante-Christian religions. On the first stage God is considered an object, a part of nature, a natural being (Lamæism, Buddhism, Braminism); on the second he is considered as subject, wholly distinguished from nature (Judaism, Greek and Roman polytheism); but only in Christianity he becomes true spirit. The Hegelian idea, however, of God as spirit, is somewhat ambiguous (for instance, with respect to the question of personality); and the specifically Christian question, whether the appearance of Christ in the history of mankind is a natural event, to be explained like any other event, or whether it is a miracle, the divine incarnation by which creation is saved, is left unanswered. Both views have been developed from Hegelian premises; and the great boast of Hegel's earliest pupils, that in his philosophy faith and science had become fully reconciled, proved empty as soon as the actual application began. It is a very characteristic circumstance, that his Philosophy of Religion has been twice edited; first by Marheineke, and then by Bruno Bauer, that is, first as evidence of the author's conservative orthodoxy, and then as proof of his revolutionary radicalism.

HEGESIPPUS, an ecclesiastical writer of the second century, of whose work, Πέντε βιογράμματα, fragments have come down to us in Eusebius (Hist. Eccles., 2, 23; 3, 11, 16, 19; 20, 32; 4, 8, 22) and in Stephanus Gobarus in Photius (Bibl., c. 232); which fragments have been collected in Grabe (Spicilegium, I.), Routh (Rel. Sacr., I.), and Schulthess (Symbolæ ad internam criticam lib. can., I., Turin, 1833).

Eusebius says nothing about the country and birthplace of Hegesippus; but from the circumstance that the latter in his book gives extracts from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, inserts Syriac and Hebrew phrases in his text, and quotes from an oral Jewish tradition, he infers that he was born a Jew; and he must have resided in the Orient, since he went to Rome by sea, making a visit by the way to Corinth. With respect to the time of his life, Eusebius fixes three points, — the reigns of Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius; and these three points fit well together with the notices by Jerome that he was born not long after the apostolic age, and, in the Chron. Pasch., that he died during the reign of Commodus.

As all the fragments which have come down to us are of a historical character, some have inferred that the work itself was a kind of church history; but as the death of James is told in the fifth and last book, what can the preceding four books have contained? and where was the history after the death of James to be told? Others have supposed that the work gave ecclesiastical statistics; others, again, that it was a sort of itinerary. With respect, however, to the general purpose of the book, there can be no doubt it was polemical against the Gnostics; and a closer examination of the fragments themselves, as well as the notices which Eusebius gives of the general subjects of the paragraphs from which he quotes, points to a book of polemico-apologetical description.

Still greater differences of opinion have arisen with respect to the true spiritual bearing of those fragments. Eusebius thinks that Hegesippus was a converted Jew, and his opinion may be right; but on the basis of this assumed Jewish descent, and certain assumed Judaizing tendencies in the narrative about Simeon and James, Hegesippus has been set forth as the representative of a Christianity not only Judaizing, but Jewish.

From a notice in Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., 4, 22) it has been inferred that he considered the Mosaic law as an indispensable part of Christianity. From another notice in Photius (Bibl., c. 232) it has been inferred that he did not recognize the apostle Paul; and from these inferences still further and very far-reaching inferences have been drawn by Schwegler, and, in a more considerate way, by Hilgenfeld, with respect to the Jewish character of the primitive Christian Church. But these propositions are untenable. The first notice does not speak of the Mosaic law in particular, but of the general unity of the Old and New Testament revelation. The second notice does not speak of the apostle Paul, but of a whole party; viz., the Gnostics. To recognize the congregation of Corinth and the Epistle of Clement in the manner in which Hegesippus recognized them, and then reject the apostle Paul, would be an inexplicable self-contradiction.

He was an adherent of Cartesius, who, in spite of his great caution and circumspection, escaped the censure of the Reformed Church as little as the papal index. From the appearance of his Meditationes (in 1642) an opposition began to form against him in Leyden, and Heidanus finally became its victim. He was discharged in 1675.

He drew up the Formula Consensus, which was adopted by the city of Zurich, March 13, 1675; and besides his Corpus Theologicæ Christianæ, which was several times reprinted, he published a number of polemical works, Anatome Concilii Tridentini (1672), Historia Papatus (1684), etc.

HEIDELBERG CATECHISM. The Reformation was rather slow in penetrating into the Palatinate. In 1516 service was celebrated for the first time according to the Lutheran ritual, in the Church of the Holy Spirit at Heidelberg. But in 1522 Otto Heinrich, who was intimately connected with Melancthon, issued a decree which at once put an end to all papal superstitions. The confession of Augsburg was established as the norm of faith: but the forms of worship were regulated after the Reformed rather than the Lutheran type. Under his successor, Friedrich III. (1559-76), one of the noblest princes of that period, a complete and consistent reform was carried out; and, as the basis of the new organization, the Heidelberg Catechism was adopted.

Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar Olevianus were charged by the elector with drawing up the catechism. The former was professor of systematic theology at the university, the latter preacher at the electoral court of Heidelberg: but both had lived in Geneva and Zürich, and were strongly influenced by the Swiss reformation. As basis for their work they used the catechisms of Calvin (edition of 1541), of Lasky (1548), of Monheim (1560), and of Bullinger (1559); though of the last mentioned only very little is utilized. Towards the close of 1562 the draft was laid before the Heidelberg synod, or, more correctly, before the convention of superintendents assembled at Kaiserslautern. It was unanimously adopted, and immediately printed, accompanied with an introduction by Friedrich III. himself, dated Jan. 19, 1563, and serving as an edict of promulgation. The Latin translation done by Joseph Lagus and Lambert Pithopöns, but far inferior to the German original in pithiness and vigor, was published at the same time.

Outside of the Palatinate, the catechism met with many bitter adversaries. Maximilian II. immediately remonstrated against it (April 25, 1563) as an infringement of the peace of Augsburg. On May 1 followed a joint address from the count-palatine, Wolfgang of Zweibrücken, Duke Christof of Würtemberg, and Margrave Karl II. of Baden, accompanied with a piece of sharp criticism inscribed Verzeichniss d. Mängel. Meanwhile the elector issued a second edition of the catechism with the addition of the famous eightieth question, "What is the difference between the papal mass and the Lord's Supper as instituted by Christ himself?" And on Sept. 14, 1563, followed his answer, probably written by Bullinger, to the Verzeichniss d. Mängel. The three princes assembled Oct. 4 at Ettlingen, and proposed to Friedrich III. to arrange a theological conference; but he declined. After the appearance, however, of the attacks of Flacius, Hesshusen, Laur. Albertus, Fr. Baldwin, Brenz, Andrea, and others, and the answers by Ursinus (Gründlicher Bericht vom heil. Abendmal) against Flacius, and Antwort auf etlicher Theologen Censur against Brenz and Andrea, and by Olevianus (Predigten), the elector decided to accept the invitation; and the conference took place at Maulbronn, April 10-15, 1564. The last attack on the catechism was directed against the elector personally at the diet of Augsburg, 1566. He was even threatened with deposition; but he defended himself with such a nobleness, that the matter was dropped.

Having gone through this ordeal, the success of the book began. It was introduced in Jülich, Cleve, Berg, and the Mark, where, from 1580, every ecclesiastic was compelled to take the oath on it. It was also introduced in Hesse, Anhalt, Brandenburg, and Bremen; but its home it found in the Netherlands, where it was formally adopted in 1588. The Reformed Churches of Hungary, Transylvania, and Poland, also adopted it; and in 1619 the synod of Dort officially declared it one of the symbolical books of the Reformed Church in general. From Holland, and afterwards also from Germany, it was brought to America, and so recently as 1870 the Presbyterian Church of the United States authorized its use. It has been translated into all European languages, also into Hebrew, Arabic, Malay, Singalese, and others. It is one of the three historic and most widely used catechisms of Protestantism (the other two being the Smaller Catechism of Luther and the shorter Westminster Catechism). A tercentenary celebration was held by the German Reformed Church in the United States at Philadelphia, 1863, and in several places in Germany and Holland.

LIT.—The text of the catechism is found in the collections of symbolical books by Niemeyer (Leipzig, 1840), Heppé (Elberfeld, 1860), and Philip Schaff (New York, 1877). Special additions have been published by Philip Schaff: D. Heidelberg Catech. nach d. ersten Ausg. von 1563 (of which only two copies are known to exist), Philadelphia, 1863 (2d ed., 1866), accompanied with critical notes and an historical survey; *The Heidelberg Catechism in German, Latin, and English, with an Hist. Gloucester in England, Naissus in Upper Mesia, and Drepanum on the Gulf of Nicomedia, claim to be her birthplace. A church in Rome, another in Venice, and the monastery of Hautvilliers, near Rheims, claim to possess her remains. Some say she was a British princess; others, a servant-girl in a wayside inn. She was repudiated for political reasons by her husband, but held in great honor by her son. HELIAND, sometimes known as the "Old Saxon Harmony of the Gospels," is a poetical life of Christ, composed in the first half of the ninth century, apparently at the request of Louis the Pious, who desired to effect the peaceable conversion of the Old Saxons by substituting religious poems for the warlike lays previously in vogue. It may be described as a Christian epic, containing nearly six thousand lines, and based on the Diatessaron, or Harmony of the Gospels, compiled by Tatianus, and to a less degree upon the commentaries of Hraban, Bede, and Alcuin. Though the author, whose name is unknown, must have been a man of learning, and in all probability an ecclesiastic, the composition is distinctly popular in tone; and its rendering of the gospel history, while adhering closely to the statements of the evangelists, is strongly colored by the Teutonic imagination. Christ is represented as a beneficent ruler, to whom his apostles stand in the relation of thanes, or earls, to their king: he possesses the titles, and discharges the functions, of the ideal Germanic chieftain; and it is through his person, as the central figure who occupies our attention from the beginning to the close, that the stamp of unity is impressed upon the poem. The style is vigorous, at times picturesque, and always abounding in the formulæ and epithets of the older poetry.

The Heliand may be but a fragment of a larger whole, comprising extended portions of the Old and New Testaments, paraphrastically rendered into alliterative verse; and indeed Professor Sievers of Jena has advanced strong arguments to prove that vers. 235-851 of the Genesis attributed to Cædmon are nothing but a translation from an old Saxon original by the author of the Heliand.

However that may be, the Heliand has much in common with the Anglo-Saxon religious poetry. The Anglo-Saxon missionaries who labored on the Continent doubtless disseminated a knowledge of Cædmon's poems among their converts and ecclesiastical brethren: and it would be unavoidable, that, when one of the latter undertook the composition of a religious epic, he should respect not only the poetical traditions of his own country, but those current among his teachers and spiritual guides.

In this connection it is significant that of the two manuscripts, one of which is preserved in the British Museum and the other in the Munich Library, the former is believed to have been copied by an Anglo-Saxon scribe.

LIT. — The poem was first published by J. A. SCHMELLER, Munich, 1830; and his edition is still of great value; other editions are by KÖNE (Münster, 1855), HEYNE (2d ed., Paderborn, 1873), RÜCKERT (Leipzig, 1876), and SIEVERS (Halle, 1878). There are translations into German by SIMROCK (3d ed., Berlin, 1882) and GREIN, improved ed., Cassel, 1869. Among the essays of most interest may be mentioned the following: H. ALBERT S. COOK.

HELIODORUS, minister of the Syrian king, Selencus IV. Philopator, 187-175 B.C.; was sent to Jerusalem to enforce the surrender of the temple-treasure. In spite of warning given, he entered the temple, but was, according to 2 Macc. iii. 6-10, thrown to the ground by a fearful apparition, and restored only on the intercession of the high priest Onias. † Macc. iv. 4, which narrates the same event, mentions Apollonius, Syrian governor of Coelestria, instead of Heliodorus.

HELIODORUS, Bishop of Tricca in Thessaly, originated, according to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., 5, 22), the custom, prevailing in Thessaly, of deposing any ecclesiastic, who, after receiving consecration, did not abstain from his wife. He was also the author of the celebrated Greek romance Æthiopica (comp. E. Rohde: Der griechische Roman, 1876); and Nicephorus adds (in his Hist. Eccl., 12, 34), that a provincial synod, taking offence of this authorship, gave Heliodorus the choice between condemning his book, or resigning his position as a bishop. He preferred the last. It is not certain when he lived; probably before the fifth century.

HELIOGABALUS, Roman emperor 218-222; was probably b. in 201; a son of the senator Varius Marcellus. His true name was Varius Avitus Bassianus. He was educated at Emesa in Syria; and by his mother, Julia Soëmis, and grandmother, Julia Mœsa, initiated in all the religious fanaticism of the Orient. Elected high priest of the sun-god of Emesa, he assumed his name (Elagabal, 𐤇𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤃); and by his beauty, his magnificence, and his supposed sonship to Caracalla, he made a deep impression in the Roman camp. By the intrigues of his mother he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers, and in 219 he entered Rome. But such an accumulation of debauchery, cruelty, fanaticism (every passion having been stimulated into frenzy), Rome had never seen; and in 222 he and his mother were thrown into the Tiber by the Prætorian guard. During his reign the Christian Church had peace: for his idea of establishing a one-god worship, of mingling all the deities of the Roman Empire together in the worship of the one god El-gabal (God the Creator). — an idea very characteristic of the religious condition of the age. — he had not time to carry out. The principal sources to his life are Dio Cassius, Lampridius, and Herodian.

HELL. 1. In the Old Testament. — The Hebrew word for "hell" is sheol (see art.), to which "Hades" (see art.) in the New Testament corresponds. Our modern word "hell" is not the equivalent for sheol; for, while we associate with "hell" endless suffering, the Hebrew associated with sheol merely ideas of terror and repulsiveness, arising mainly from the mystery and uncertainty which attended the life after death (cf. Job xi. 8; Prov. i. 12; Isa. xxxviii. 10).

2. In the New Testament.—"Hell" is the translation in the authorized version of three words in Greek, — Hades, Gehenna, and Tartarus. Hades has been already considered. Gehenna was properly the "hell" of Hebrew conception, and is uniformly so rendered in the revised version. The rebellious angels, and the finally impenitent of men, are cast into it (Matt. v. 22; Luke xii. 5). Once the word "Tartarus" is employed (2 Pet. ii. 4), and also rendered "hell." It is noticeable that neither Paul nor John uses either Hades, Gehenna, or Tartarus, and also, that, of the twelve recurrences of Gehenna, eleven are in our Lord's speeches. Scripture mercifully hides the condition of the lost, and by example forbids prurient curiosity. The way of life is luminous from earth to heaven: the way of death is lost in darkness. See GEHENNA; HADES; SHEOL; PUNISHMENT, FUTURE.

HELL, Christ's Descent into (κατάβασις εἰς ᾗδου), one of the clauses in the Apostles' Creed, was treated as a doctrine of the Church in the East as early as Marcion's time, and is found in the formula of the fourth synod of Sirmium (359). Towards the latter part of the fourth century it formed, according to the testimony of Rufinus (Expos. Aquilej., 18), a part of the baptismal confession of the Church of Aquileja. But, in the great majority of the baptismal formulas until the sixth century, it was wanting. By the eighth, however, it was universally accepted. Its insertion, therefore, into the creed, was a matter of gradual development. The Greek Church regards the descent into hell as a voluntary passage of Christ's human soul into Hades in order to offer through the preaching of the gospel, redemption to such as were held under the dominion of Satan on account of original sin, and to transfer believers to paradise, especially the saints of the Old Testament (Conf. orth., 1. 49). The Roman-Catholic Church holds that the whole divine-human personality of Christ descended to the Limbus patrum, or the place where the saints of Israel were detained, in order to deliver them into the full enjoyment of blessedness (Cat. Rom., § 100-105). According to the Lutheran theology, Christ descended with body and soul on the early morning of the resurrection, just before his appearance as the risen one on the earth. The interval between the crucifixion and that time he had spent in paradise. He went to the realm of the damned, not to preach the gospel, but to proclaim the legal sentence upon sin (Form. Conc., I. II. 9). The Reformed theologians taught that Christ spent the three days following the crucifixion in paradise, and regarded the descent into hell as a figurative expression for the unutterable sufferings of his human soul, which he endured in the last moments of his vicarious dying (Calvin, Iust., II. 16, 8-12). It was therefore a part of his humiliation; while, according to the Lutheran view, it was the first stage of his exalted state (status exaltationis), proving his victory over death and the devil. [The Westminster Catechism (q. 50), however, explains the expression, "He descended into hell," as simply meaning his death, and continuance in that state for three days.] At the side of these views other views have been held concerning the meaning of the clause. It was only another way of saying that Christ was buried (Beza, Drusus, etc.), or denoted the state of death regarded as an ignominious one for the Prince of life (Piscator, Arminius, Limborch, etc.). In more recent times it has been explained of Christ's life on earth amongst the demons who had taken up their temporary abode here (Marheineke, Ackermann), of the universal efficacy of redemption (De Wette, Hase), or the doctrine has been entirely given up as without biblical foundation (Schleiermacher, A. Schweizer). Long before, Wesley had for the same reason omitted it from the articles of faith of the Methodist Church.

The following may be regarded as the teaching of the New Testament on the subject. (1) Christ appeared among the departed in hades, while his body was lying in the grave. This is presupposed by Paul in Rom. x. 6-8 (Meyer), and implied in Christ's own words to the thief on the cross (Luke xxiii. 43). (2) Christ went as spirit (πνεῦμα) to the realm of the dead (1 Pet. iii. 18 sq., cf. Acts ii. 27), and (3) there preached the gospel (1 Pet. iii. 19) (4) to all the dead, and with the more particular purpose of awakening spiritual life (1 Pet. iv. 6). It is true that Christ's preaching to the contemporaries of Noah has been explained to refer to an activity before he became flesh (Augustine, Beza, A. Schweizer); but the representation of these persons as being spirits in prison as well as other considerations, render this view improbable. If it be true that man spends the interval between death and the final resurrection in the intermediate state, hades, it follows as a necessary consequence from the real humanity of Christ, that he also participated in this lot. This descent into hades was, therefore, a distinct stage in the final process through which the theanthropic personality of Christ passed to the glorified body (σῶμα τῆς δόξης). Christ appeared in hades in his own special character of redeemer, and imparted the saving vital energy of God to those who were lifted into communion with himself by faith: of the results of this activity, we know nothing certainly. But the analogy of this world leads us to expect that he was there the savor of life unto life to some, and of death unto death to others, as hades consists of two domains, — paradise, or Abraham's bosom, and the place of torment. [The second part of the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemus, which belongs probably to the fourth century, is known also by the title Descent of Christ to the Underworld, and contains a most curious and fantastic account of Christ's experiences in hades. Hades is represented as resisting the entrance of Christ; but the news of Christ's coming produces a joyful commotion among the inhabitants of his realm. These cry out, with David and Isaiah among them, in the language of Ps. xxiv., to Hades to lift up the gates of his kingdom. The bright light from the advancing Son of man then strangely floods the realm of death. He calls his saints to him, and followed by them, Adam being in the number, he ascends from the underworld. Arrived at the gates of paradise, he gives them over to the hand of Michael, who introduces them to its glorious fellowship.] See HADES.

HELL, Punishments of. See PUNISHMENT.

HELLENISTIC IDIOM is the prevailing designation of that mode of speech in use among those Jews who lived among the Greeks, or that peculiar form of the Greek language which it took in the thought and mouth of the Semitic Orient when the two spheres of life began to act upon each other. The former of these definitions, though narrow and historically insufficient, suits our purpose, since we know of the matter only as related to the Jews, and this relation is the point of interest. The interest of the subject is not purely philological nor psychological. Similar phenomena can be found elsewhere to instruct in these directions. The influence of religious ideas upon a language unprepared for them may be noticed again and again in the history of Christianity. This particular combination of Jewish thought and Greek language created the form in which the gospel has been made known to the world at large. Thus it is connected with the highest and holiest treasures of human knowledge in a manner which gives it a theological significance, and secures it greater attention than is usually accorded to what is in itself so external.

In the next article [HELLENISTS] it will be shown that the acquaintance of the Jews with the Greek language was not gained through education or literary study, as was the case, e.g., among the Romans, but resulted from immediate contact in practical life, especially in trade. The main object of those thus learning is not to know the peculiar spirit of the foreign tongue, but to gather such a vocabulary as serves their practical purpose of making themselves intelligible in conversing about material and social matters. They seek to obtain readiness in speech, and are more concerned to express themselves definitely than to use correctness of form. Nor should it be forgotten that those who have this aim are not likely to be well educated, and hence are quite content with the imperfect form of their means of communication. Two other weighty circumstances must be noticed. Not only did the Jews rapidly learn the new language, but at the same time they, at least in foreign countries, as quickly forgot their own, and ceased to use it even in the household. In a few generations at most, the Greek language was learned, not from the Greeks, but in the Jewish families, as if it had been the mother-tongue. Thus the imperfections, to a certain extent, became parts of this form of Greek, taught by Jews to their children. In later times, learned Jews, such as Philo and Josephus, sought to adopt the classic forms; but we should not class these, or some of the Christian authors of the first century, with the representatives of the Hellenistic idiom, properly so called.

A point often misunderstood in this discussion is the state of the Greek language itself at the time when the Jews adopted it. It was, in consequence of the conquests of Alexander and their results, in process of change; so much so, that attention was aroused, and studies fostered, out of which the science of philology arose. The mass of foreign words introduced in consequence of the geographical extension of the language, affected it very little. Such things rarely do. But the new political organizations, which threw into the background the limited forms of Greece, had also the effect of fusing the provincial dialects into one common universal Greek language, which always occurs when national life triumphs over narrower separating tendencies. In Greece itself the common people still used their own dialect, as in Germany to-day; but in the newer cities, where the population was not of the same origin, the so-called common (ἡ κοινή) dialect prevailed. The basis of this was the Attic. But a common dialect is of necessity a mixed speech, retaining much that is of local origin, and adding much that is new. The old grammarians have collected for us all these phenomena; and the results are given in our better lexicons, especially those of the New Testament. A Macedonian element is also discoverable: at least, we find certain things appearing in the language for the first time during the Macedonian supremacy.

But the influence of Alexandria on this form of the Greek language was most potent. In that city were combined social culture, trade, art, science, literature, so as to found an intellectual supremacy which continued for centuries. Hence we may speak of an Alexandrian dialect, which belonged not only to literature, but to social life in general. This is known to us from the manuscripts of the New Testament prepared there, and is held by many of the modern critics to be the very form of speech used by the apostles in composing their writings. From this it would follow that the printed Greek text of modern times is of more recent origin in its forms. But into this discussion we cannot enter.

The chief matter to be considered is what the Greek language became in the hands of these Orientals, especially in its application to religious thought. As is well known, the Pentateuch was translated into Greek at Alexandria, during the reign of the second Ptolemy; that is, at a time when a race of Jews flourished whose fathers had been the first to whom the use of the Greek language became a necessity. Despite the fables which have been attached to the story of this version, we may be confident that it originated in an ecclesiastical necessity which was already felt, and not on the literary whim of a prince, as is generally represented. Grecian literati would have been engaged upon it, if the latter view were correct. In fact, the fables alluded to point to an origin deemed sacred, rather than to one of interest mainly to learned librarians. The king's name can be regarded as that of the patron saluted by the Jews and their rabbins; and a dedication copy was naturally placed in the royal library by these faithful subjects. Be this as it may, the first glance shows with how little knowledge of the Greek this translation was attempted. Even the parts made after an interval, the length of which cannot be exactly determined, show in general the same character. Aside from blunders due to faulty hermeneutics or a corrupt text, we find numberless examples of the misuse of Greek terms, of Hebraistic constructions, such as could be fully understood only by those who thought in Hebrew. It is true that adequate Greek expressions were wanting for many ideas of religion and ritual: for others, these unread translators knew of none among the linguistic material collected in the market and the shop. They chose the nearest equivalent, without reference to usage, just as beginners in a foreign tongue are wont to do. We are familiar with such Hebraisms: what must a Greek have thought when he heard them for the first time? Of course it was intelligible to the Jew. He knew the ideas: the form of speech concerned him little. The particles were almost entirely Hebrew: the oath took the form of an elliptical hypothesis; the "construct state" served its common Hebrew purposes; and the entire complex of Greek syntax was smoothed out into the clear, simple, naïve Old Testament structure of clauses. But, despite all this, such a theory and practice of translation was for Judaism itself an inestimable benefit not yet sufficiently recognized. We affirm that the formation of this Judæo-Grecian Bible language was the first and most indispensable prerequisite for the maintenance of the religion of the people. The Hebrew spirit so completely dominated the Greek form, that to-day we are often compelled to seek the Hebrew original to understand the Septuagint.

What was done without purpose became an effective agent for important results. The Septuagint had its influence on all Hellenistic literature, which was mainly religious. It was, to a certain extent, for the Hellenists what Luther's Bible has been for the Germans. But there were variations in this literature, the causes of which we must indicate. The chief cause is, that not all of the authors possessed the same linguistic training. Some were more gifted than others, and the difference in the style of the books composing the so called Old-Testament Apocrypha is very great, although all of them have the Hellenistic coloring. The same difference exists in the New Testament also. Compare the style of the Epistle to the Hebrews and that of the Apocrypha, which is Hebraistic through and through.

But another cause must be named. The frame of a language is the words which form it. A change of vocabulary was continually going on in Hellenistic usage. On one side it kept pace with the transformation of the newer Hebrew, and on the other it was enriched from purely Greek sources. Of the latter fact we have abundant evidence in the New Testament, in which words occur that were unknown to the Alexandrian translators, and these are often used with more Hellenic than Hebraistic signification. But the influence of the language of Palestine was constant. There the classical Hebrew had given place to an Aramaic form of speech, which not only had its grammatical peculiarities, but included expressions and figures not found in the Old Testament. A large number of these occur in the New Testament, and they must have been familiar to the Hellenists. So, too, old words received new forms and new senses. But the greatest influence in producing this change was that of Christianity itself. It demanded expressions for its new ideas and their manifold applications, and sought them in the Greek vocabulary. Hundreds of significant terms and phrases now naturalized in all modern languages received the stamp of the first disciples who spoke Greek. Among these are some of the most important of our theological terms. To sum up: in the Jewish period the Hellenistic idiom slavishly translated, in the Christian it freely formed, a speech, without, however, denying its cradle.

It is evident that the authors of the New Testament differ in their use of the art of speech. John, for example, does not represent the coarser Hellenism in his choice of words; but how entirely Hebraistic is his syntax! The sentences follow each other, the connection appearing, not from grammatical analysis, but from theological reflection. This reiteration of "and" and "then" is not Greek. On the other hand, what rhetorical periods are found in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in the preface of Luke, in some of the discourses in the latter part of the Book of the Acts! In Paul's language we plainly see two partially antagonistic tendencies, — that of the Jewish dialectics, with its incomplete syllogisms, its interjected quotations, producing obscurity and harshness; and by the side of this that transporting rhetoric of the heart, the true issue of a new fountain of life, representing wealth of feeling in a corresponding wealth of synonymes and figures.

The discussions of the Hellenistic idiom have been confined too much to lexical and grammatical questions, and have failed to recognize the profound connection between it and the mental history of the people who produced it. The hints given in this article will enable the reader, with the help of the Bible in his own tongue, to understand the matter from a psychological and historical point of view.

The details of grammar and lexicography do not belong to an encyclopædia, but we conclude with some critical and historical remarks on these topics.

At the time of the Reformation, philological learning had not reached an accurate knowledge of the Hellenistic idiom and its history. H. Stephanus and Beza took the right view; but their investigations were too imperfect to guide public opinion. In the middle of the seventeenth century there began an interminable squabble over the Hebraisms of the New Testament, the point at issue being a dogmatic one; namely, what kind of a style might be ascribed to the Holy Spirit, whether it could be deemed less pure than the classic style of profane authors. The discussion was mechanical and unscientific on both sides, but lasted for more than a century. (See the Introduction to WISER's Grammar of the New Testament). Fortunately during this century a truer method has been adopted; and the lexical and grammatical results are not only accessible, but have influenced all the recent commentaries on the New Testament, irrespective of theological opinion. But comparatively little has been done in the study of the Hellenistic literature which preceded Christianity.

The complete literature on this subject will be found in the author's Geschichte des Neuen Testaments, 5th ed., § 41, etc. ED. REUSS.

The phrase "Hellenistic Diction" is frequently substituted by English and American scholars for "Hellenistic Idiom;" since the latter is in English applied to single peculiarities of speech, rather than to a collection of such peculiarities having an organic character. In the main the positions of Professor Reuss are now generally accepted. Too little emphasis is laid by some authors on the providential aspect of the subject. On the theory that Christ is the centre of history, a main task of all the nations about the Eastern Mediterranean was to assist in the preparation of this form of Greek, as best adapted to express the universal revelation. Properly held, this view stimulates the study of the historical and psychological causes which resulted in the formation of Hellenistic Greek. To recognize God in history does not hinder investigation.

The lexical questions have in recent years been treated from a philological and historical point of view, and the a priori dogmatic method lost ground. Many of the results are contained in the larger commentaries, and in special essays on words. The American edition of Lange's Commentary is a thesaurus in this respect. (See the Index in vol. X., New Testament.) The New-Testament lexicons of Wahl, Bretschneider, and Robinson, have all served a useful purpose. That of WILKE (rewritten by C. L. W. GRIMM, Leipzig, 1868; last ed., 1877-78) will shortly appear in an English translation by Professor J. H. Thayer, Andover. A special lexicon on New-Testament theological terms is that of H. CREMER, Gotha, 1866-68, 2d ed., 1872, 3d ed., 1882; translated into English, Edinburgh, 1869, 3d ed., 1880. On synonyms of the New Testament see TITTMANN and TRENCH (the latter originally appearing in two parts; a new edition in one volume, London, 1865).

Of New-Testament grammars, that of WINER has long been the standard. The first accurate English translation was that of Professor Thayer, 1869 (from the seventh German); also one by Professor W. F. Moulton (Edinburgh, 1870), containing numerous additions. A. BUTTMANN'S (Berlin, 1869) has also been translated by Thayer, with numerous corrections and additions by the author (Andover, 1876). In England the New-Testament grammar of T. S. GREEN (London, 1862; 1st ed., 1812), and Syntax and Synonymes of the Greek Testament, WILLIAM WEBSTER (London, 1864), deserve mention. The former is very convenient and suggestive. The progress made in the knowledge of Greek grammar in general has contributed greatly to the excellence of modern helps for study in this special field.

The most valuable list of works bearing on the Hellenistic diction will be found in the supplementary volume of Lange's Commentary on the Old-Testament Apocrypha, by Professor E. C. BISSELL. The volume itself is among the most valuable American contributions in this field.

Much remains to be done in two directions: first, in securing for the LXX. proper recognition as the basis of the peculiarities of the Hellenistic diction; secondly, in giving proper place to New-Testament stylistics and rhetoric. The latter subject has been discussed and rediscussed in connection with the questions of the genuineness of the various books of the New Testament; but very little has been done from any point of view other than the polemic one. The rhetoric of the Pauline Epistles deserves more thorough treatment.

The numerous works which have appeared in recent years on the life of Christ, on the history of the New-Testament times, have made great use of the material which belongs to a thorough discussion of the Hellenistic diction; and the same remark holds true of the treatises on New-Testament hermeneutics. For a general discussion of the language of the Greek Testament and the idiosyncrasies of the evangelists and apostolic writers, we refer to the first chapter of SCHAFF'S Companion to the Study of the Greek Testament, New York, 1882. M. B. RIDDLE.

HELLENISTS was the name applied by the Greeks to those foreigners who became like themselves in habits or speech. The term had a special application to those Jews who were brought under Greek influences, and is of importance in connection with the early history of Christianity. The usual view of the word is not incorrect, but too often superficial.

In the time of Alexander the Hellenizing of foreign nations, which until then had been limited, began to be extensive. His successors, the Seleucidæ and the Ptolemies, advanced it, sometimes by force. Even more than the sword was this influence the defence of the new dynasties.

The tendency to emigrate, and engage in foreign trade, was not, however, confined to the Greeks. About the time of the spread of Hellenic civilization in the East, various political causes fostered among the Jews the same tendency, which has now become, so to speak, the ground tone of their life as a people. The two streams, Hellenic and Hebrew, met at first in the young Macedonian cities. Soon the Jews were found everywhere manifesting the same commercial spirit, the same fondness for portable salable property, which is to-day the most obvious trait of their character. But the two streams did not mix. The Mosaic law had sought to fasten the Jewish people to the soil of Palestine. From this external regulation they now broke away; but the same law had stamped upon them, not only a higher religious and ethical culture, but also a personal abhorrence of foreigners. All that pertained to their religious belief made between them and the Greeks an impassable gulf, thus guarding their religion from every danger and temptation, maintaining their peculiar type of morality, while at the same time all the evil passions which can divide races were permitted to arise and to operate. We are to inquire, How far, under these conditions, did the Jewish element yield to or withstand the foreign influence it encountered? In other words, What spheres of public and private life, what phases of national character, were affected or unaffected by this Hellenizing tendency?

With household life we need not here concern ourselves. In art and science the foreigners might have furnished a welcome instructor to the Jews, so far as these troubled themselves about such things. The warlike spirit was gone, or what little remained was connected with religious ideas in a way to remove it from the usual political spheres. Moreover, trade is essentially cosmopolitan; and every advance in this direction was at bottom a removal from the spirit of the law and the prophets, all the more so because the Jews did not recognize it as such. The two opposing dynasties on either side of Palestine sought at the same time to obtain entrance into the land and the heart of the Jewish people. Assuring them of material advantage, encouraging their love of money, these rulers succeeded in dulling entirely the conservative national feeling, though without winning any affection in return. Without the mighty restraint of their religion, the Jewish people would at once, and more rapidly than any, have given way to Hellenism. The strongest proof of this, aside from the affectation of adopting Greek names, is to be found in the fact that they sacrificed what is most precious and peculiar to a people,—their language, and this with an unexampled readiness and rapidity. This remarkable revolution in speech has been discussed in the preceding article [HELLENISTIC IDIOM].

But, though the language of their fathers was forgotten, their religious faith remained, as it still remains. This conserved their nationality; and one cannot fail to admire not only the reorganization after the return from Babylon, with its effect upon the people, but also the Pharisaism, which, with its separatism, contributed so largely to the maintenance of the undying national feeling. An edifice that has lasted for thousands of years, that has proved stronger than the Roman Empire, itself praises the builders. However far removed from home, among the Jews apostasy was a rare exception. Wherever they went, they soon established synagogues (now Grecian) as fortresses of the national spirit, and targets of foreign antipathy,—in both directions the upholders of Judaism in its peculiar position.

Here is that phase of our subject which is of most importance for the history of Christianity; here the providential ordering of the relations of peoples is most evident. The transformation of Hebrew Jews into Hellenists is of more than statistical and philological interest: its results were far-reaching. It was more than the acceptance of the Greek language and customs on the part of the Jews: it brought the Jewish faith and life close to the Greek population, and that, too, at the very time when heathenism was moving toward a remediless catastrophe. Its power was broken: in some cases a tasteless, unpoetic, foreign superstition had taken its place. Here and there were individual souls that could not find satisfaction, either in the intoxication of sense, the abstractions of philosophy, or the prevalent mysteries and occult sciences. These often found their way to the synagogue, and learned to know the God of Israel, and to join in the worship of him. Especially was this true of the women. No one was hindered from sharing these privileges. The relations of commercial and social life favored the custom. Certain general rules of a religious and domestic character were observed in the introduction of these proselytes [see PROSELYTES]: otherwise the fellowship was without hindrance from either side.

But an important counter-influence was thus exerted upon the Hellenistic Jews. It could not be otherwise. The Greek-speaking Jews were brought into the closest contact with the Greeks, and inevitably they learned to judge the aliens less unfavorably, to recognize what was common to humanity, and, while holding fast to their monotheism as their most precious possession, to cease to identify it with all the details of their religious forms. Their worship, it should be remembered, was, insensibly to them, less and less associated in their thoughts with the temple at Jerusalem and its sacrificial rites. The Hellenist, without wishing or knowing it, was more and more released from the bonds of the Levitic-Pharisaical institutions. He had preachers, but no priest. This change was not caused by antagonism or indifference, but was the natural result of circumstances. All of the Greek-speaking Jews did not become less exclusive; the Book of the Acts furnishes proof to the contrary: but the same history shows how greatly the circumstances sketched above prepared the way for the gospel. Those things made prominent by the gospel, that, too, by Jesus himself,—the distinction between what was essential and unessential in religion, the recognition of true faith outside of Israel, and of salvation designed for all nations,—these things, to say the least, were intelligible to the Hellenistic ear, if not at once acceptable. In Palestine, where the Jew wished to be master, the foreigner was doubly unwelcome, was called sinner, godless, unrighteous, because he was a foreigner. These national prejudices helped to create antagonism to the gospel. But elsewhere the Jew was the foreigner. He soon felt that there was room in the world for many kinds of people, and this feeling had its influence within the sphere of Christianity. In Jerusalem many would not hear of a gospel that they should have in common with the uncircumcised. In Antioch, not only the market, but the synagogue, to a certain extent, had been occupied together with the latter class. The depth of the gulf between these two elements of the Jewish people at the time of the establishment of the Church may be learned from the first mention of them in the Book of the Acts (chap. vi.). The unfriendly collusion was occasioned, it is true, by a trivial external matter; but the true cause was the national division. The further application of the positions here taken belongs more properly to exegesis.

HELVETIC CONFESSIONS. I. First Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica Prior, also called Second Confession of Basel, Confessio Basiliensis Posterior). Though in the fourth decade of the sixteenth century the Reformed churches of Switzerland could point to the writings of Zwingli and the first confession of Basel (1531) as expressions of their beliefs, a common confession, formally adopted, was still lacking. For the purpose of drawing up such an instrument, delegates from Zurich, Bern, Basel, Schaffhausen, St. Gall, Muhlhausen, and Biel, assembled at Basel, Jan. 30, 1536. Bullinger and Leo Juda from Zürich were present, Megander from Bern, Myconius and Grynaeus from Basel, and others. Soon after, Butzer and Capito from Strassburg arrived; for there were also other motives at work. The moment was considered favorable for the effecting of a union between the Reformed and the Lutheran churches, and such a union was the great idea of Butzer's life. Nor was the council called by Paul III. to Mantua left out of view. It was the intention of the Swiss Reformed churches to lay their confession before that council. The instrument was first drawn up in Latin, and then translated by Leo Juda into German. The German version was immediately adopted by all the delegates; but the Latin encountered some difficulties from the side of the Zürich delegates, who found the phraseology approaching the Lutheran too closely. It was revised and altered by Myconius and Grynaeus; and both versions, the German and the Latin, were then formally adopted on Feb. 26, 1536.

II. The Second Helvetic Confession (Confessio Helvetica Posterior) is the work of Bullinger. The first sketch of it he made in 1562. During the plague, in 1564, he revised and elaborated this sketch, and laid it beside his will, to be presented, in case of his death, to the magistrates of Zürich, as a testimony of his faith. An incident brought it before the public. Maximilian II. called a diet at Augsburg, Jan. 14, 1566. As the elector-palatine, Friedrich III., who had seceded from the Lutheran, and joined the Reformed Church, was afraid, that, for this very reason, he should be put under the ban of the realm, he addressed himself to Bullinger (after the death of Martyr and Calvin, unquestionably the first theologian of the Reformed Church), and asked him to draw up a confession showing that the Reformed Church in no point differed from the true apostolical doctrine. Bullinger sent him the above-mentioned memoir; and it pleased him so much that he asked permission to have it translated into German, and published. The interest which Bullinger's work thus awakened naturally attracted the attention of the Swiss to it. They had for some time felt the need of such a confession as a bond of union. The first Helvetic confession was too short, and was suspected of having yielded somewhat to a Lutheran influence. Bullinger's, on the contrary, seemed satisfactory in every respect; and in the course of 1566 it was adopted by Zürich, Geneva, Bern, Schaffhausen, Mühlhausen, Biel, St. Gallen, the Grisons, Glarus, Appenzell, Thurgau, and elsewhere. In the same year it was adopted in Scotland, in 1567 in Hungary, in 1571 in France, in 1578 in Poland. It is also the creed of the Reformed Church in Bohemia. The first edition of the Latin text appeared at Zürich 1566; at the same time appeared also a German translation by Bullinger, and a French by Beza. It is, next to the Heidelberg Catechism, the most generally recognized confession of the Reformed Church.

HELVETIC CONSENSUS, Formula Consensus Ecclesiarum Helveticarum. The severity with which the synod of Dort (1618–19) defined the doctrines of absolute election and reprobation gave rise to a re-action in France, where the Protestants lived surrounded by Roman Catholics. Saumur, the home of Amyraut, Cappel, and Placæus, became the centre of this movement. Amyraut taught a hypothetical or conditioned universalism; Cappel denied the verbal inspiration of the Hebrew text of the Old Testament; Placæus rejected the immediate imputation of Adam's sin as arbitrary and unjust. These ideas found much favor, both in France and in Switzerland; but in the latter country they also met with a very decided opposition. F. Spanheim wrote against Amyraut: the city of Zürich called her sons home from Saumur, and sent them to study at the orthodox Montauban. In 1649 A. Morus, the successor of Spanheim, but suspected of belonging to the liberal party, was compelled by the magistrates of Geneva to subscribe to a series of articles, in the form of theses and antitheses, the first germ of the Formula Consensus. As the movement continued to spread, the idea naturally occurred to stop the further invasion of such novelties by the establishment of a formula obligatory to all teachers and preachers. After considerable discussion between Gernler of Basel, Hummel of Bern, Ott of Schaffhausen, Heidegger of Zurich, and others, the last-mentioned was charged with drawing up the formula. In the beginning of 1675 it was laid before the ministers of Zürich; and in the course of the year it was adopted, not only by Zürich, but also by Basel, St. Gall, Glarus, Appenzell, Mühlhausen, Neuenburg, the Grisons, etc. It consists of a preface and twenty-six canons, and gives a clear statement of the difference between strict Calvinism and the school of Saumur. Though a product of the reigning scholasticism, and hence styled a "symbolical afterbirth," it is by no means so exclusive as might be suspected: it disapproves the ideas of the school of Saumur, but does not directly declare them to be heretical. Outside of Switzerland it never acquired authority; and, even in Switzerland itself, it gradually dropped out of use in the course of half a century. In 1722 Prussia and England applied to the respective magistracies of the Swiss cantons for the abolition of the formula for the sake of the unity and peace of the Protestant churches. The reply was somewhat evasive; but, though the formula was never formally abolished, it gradually fell entirely into disuse.

LIT. — The formula was first printed as an appendix to the Second Helvetic Confession at Zürich 1714, then 1718, 1722, etc., and in NIEMEYER: Coll. Conf., pp. 729–739. HELVETIUS, Claude Adrien, b. at Paris, January, 1715; d. there Dec. 26, 1771; was the son of a farmer-general; a farmer-general himself, a rich man, and an idler, solely occupied with the idea of making a sensation. He succeeded. His hook, De l'esprit (Paris, 1758), was burnt by the hangman of Paris on the instance of the Roman-Catholic clergy, translated into all European languages, and read more than any other book of its time. It has interest, however, only as having reached the nethermost bottom of atheistic materialism, the point where stupidity turns into perversity. The Pagan virtues the author describes as conventionalities; the Christian, as vicious faucies.

HELVICUS, Christoph, b. at Sprendlingen, Hesse, Dec. 26, 1581; d. at Giessen, Sept. 10, 1617; studied at Marburg; and was appointed professor of Hebrew at Giessen in 1605, and of theology in 1610. He held a disputation in Hebrew with the rabbis of Francfort, and wrote Chronologic Systema Novum, 1610, which was translated into English.

HELVIDIUS, a layman, living in Rome in the time of Bishop Damasus, 366-384; published about 380 a book against the spreading Mariolatry and the ascetic over-estimation of the celibacy. Jerome wrote against him Adversus Helvidium (comp. his letters to Pammachius, to Eustochium, and Contra Jovin., I. 495), but in an excited tone, and with forced sophistical argumentation. Gennadius, who recognizes his piety and good intention, but criticises his lack of erudition, states that Helvidius was a pupil of the Arian Auxentius from Milan, and an imitator of the Pagan rhetor Symmachus. Of his book nothing is left but quotations in Jerome.

HÉLYOT, Pierre, b. in Paris, 1660; entered the third Franciscan order (1683) in the convent of Picpus, Paris, under the name of Père Hippolyte, and d. there Jan. 5, 1716. He immortalized himself by writing a Histoire des ordres monastiques, religieux, et militaires, et des congrégations séculières de l'un et de l'autre sexe, Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. The idea of the work occurred to him while in Rome on business of his order. In its composition he was assisted by such eminent scholars as Hardouin, Mabillon, and Ruinart; the last three volumes were edited by Maximilien Bullot. This great work has been repeatedly reprinted, notably with large additions, as part of Migne's Encyclopédie théologique, in 5 vols., Paris, 1817.

HEMMERLIN, Felix, b. at Zurich, 1389; d. in the dungeon of the Franciscan monastery at Lucerne, 1457; studied at Bologna; was present at the Council of Constance; visited Rome, and was appointed provost of St. Ursus at Soleure 1421, and cantor at the cathedral of Zurich 1427. He was a bright and learned man; and his writings, numbering thirty-nine, most of which, however, are only pamphlets, give a very vivid picture of ecclesiastical affairs in his time. But he was a critic only, not a reformer, and his criticism made him many enemies. By his De nobilitate he became mixed up with politics, was imprisoned (1451), and never released. He is not, however, to be classed among the martyrs to the cause of the Reformation. See B. REBER: Felix Hemmerlin, Zurich, 1846. GÜDER.

HEMMINGSEN, Niels (Nicholaus Hemmingius), b. in the Danish island of Lolland, 1513; d. at Helsingore, 1600; studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of theology in Copenhagen, but was dismissed in 1579, on suspicion of Crypto-Calvinism. His works, Opuscula (Geneva, 1583), have of late attracted considerable attention both in Denmark and Germany, especially his book against J. Andreae, on the doctrine of ubiquity, not published until after his death, 1615.

HENDERSON, Alexander, b. in the parish of Creich, Fifeshire, in 1583; d. in Edinburgh, Aug. 19, 1646. He entered St. Salvator's College, St. Andrew's, in December, 1599, and took the degree of M.A. in 1603. He taught philosophy in St. Andrew's University till early in 1612, when he was presented to the church of Leuchars. So unpopular was his settlement there, that the people fastened the church-doors on the day of his ordination, and he had literally to enter by the window. A year or two afterwards he went, perhaps out of curiosity, to hear Robert Bruce preach in the adjoining parish of Forgan. In order to be hid, he sat in a dark corner of the church; and there the sharp arrows of the King pierced his heart as Bruce read for his text, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." Soon after this he gave up Episcopacy for Presbytery, and in 1618 opposed "the five articles" in Perth Assembly. Next year he was summoned, with other two ministers, before the High Commission; but they answered for themselves so wisely, that they were dismissed with threatenings. He seems to have spent the next eighteen years in Leuchars in comparative peace, storing his mind with useful knowledge, doing good work among his people, and educating young men boarding with him. Many of those in the neighborhood who loved "the good old way" resorted to his ministry; and the Presbyterial meetings he attended were precious and refreshing, and helped to unite the faithful ministers. He bought a house and some land, which, with a thousand pounds Scots, he gave as an educational endowment to the parish. To the school of his native parish he bequeathed two thousand merks.

Instigated by Laud, Charles I. sent down to Scotland in 1636 a book of ecclesiastical canons and a book of ordination, which were followed by the Book of Common Prayer for the Church of Scotland. The arbitrary manner in which it was sought to impose these on the Scottish Church was perhaps even more offensive than their matter. Most of the bishops raised letters of horning, charging the ministers in their diocese to buy two copies of the Book of Common Prayer for the use of their parishes within fifteen days; but the ministers supplicated the Privy Council to suspend the charge. Henderson's petition was much esteemed by the people. Soon the body of the nation was embarked in the cause; and four committees were appointed to represent the noblemen, gentlemen, burgesses, and ministers. These committees, each of which contained four members, were called "The Tables," and met in the Parliament House. On their meetings being prohibited by royal proclamation, they resolved to renew the National Covenant. Henderson wrote the bond, adapting it to the time; and Warristoun prepared the portion known as "the legal warrant." On the 28th of February, 1638, it was sworn and subscribed by thousands in the Greyfriars Church and Churchyard, Edinburgh. This was a day, as Henderson said, in which the people offered themselves in multitudes to the service of Heaven, like the dewdrops in the morning, wherein the arm of the Lord was revealed, and the princes of the people assembled to swear allegiance to the King of kings. Copies were circulated through the country; and almost everywhere it was sworn with zeal and alacrity by all ranks and classes. All the shires subscribed by their commissioners, and all the towns but Aberdeen, St. Andrew's, and Crail. Henderson preached at St. Andrew's, and gained it, not a burgh refusing to sign, though no threatenings were used, except of the deserved judgment of God, nor force, except the force of reason. Henderson, Dickson, and Cant were sent to the north, and preached to great crowds in the open air at Aberdeen, securing several hundreds of subscriptions. But with the doctors of divinity they had only a fruitless controversy. The king had to call a General Assembly and Parliament to consider the national grievances. Henderson was unanimously chosen moderator of the former, which met on the 21st of November, 1638, in the High Church or Cathedral of Glasgow. Though the royal commissioner dissolved it in the king's name, it continued its sittings, condemned the spurious assemblies from 1606 to 1618, as well as the Service Book, excommunicated eight of the bishops, deposed the other six, and prohibited episcopacy and the articles of Perth. Despite his arduous duties by day, Henderson spent the greater part of the night in prayer and conference. At its close, on the 20th of December, he said, "We have now cast down the walls of Jericho: let him that rebuildeth them beware of the curse of Hiel the Bethelite." Though anxious to remain in Leuchars, Henderson was translated by this assembly to Edinburgh, and was inducted into the Greyfriars Church on the 10th of January, 1639.

The Remonstrance of the Nobility, etc., which Henderson drafted, strongly impressed the English with the justice of the covenanted cause. He accompanied the Scotch army to Dunse Law, and took part in the treaty at Birks in June 1639. Next year he was appointed rector of Edinburgh University. On the king refusing to carry out the stipulations of the pacification, denouncing the Covenanters as rebels, and preparing again to invade the country, the Scotch army entered England in August, 1640, and the king was fain to treat a second time. For this treaty Henderson was appointed a commissioner. While in London, he wrote several pamphlets, held service according to the Scottish form, and preached in St. Antholine's Church to crowded audiences, and heartily concurred with William Castell's petition to the English Parliament for propagating the gospel in America as "most pious, Christian, and charitable." Toward the end of July, 1641, he returned to Edinburgh, and was chosen moderator of the assembly then sitting. The king having come to Scotland to preside in Parliament, Henderson was appointed royal chaplain, and dean of the Chapel Royal. By his exertions the revenues of the bishopric of Edinburgh were secured for the university of that city, and probably he helped to secure for the university of St.

Andrew's a grant of a thousand pounds per annum from the revenues of the archbishopric. In January, 1642, he was translated to the East Kirk, and the same year gave "willingly and of his own accord a thousand pounds Scots for perfecting the house appointed for the library" of St. Andrew's university. As he was anxious to reconcile the king and the English Parliament, he was sent with the Scotch commissioners to Oxford. There he perceived that there was no hope of accommodation consistent with the liberties of England. On his return he had a conference with Montrose, and, seeing that he was determined to support the king, cautioned his friends against him. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1643, when commissioners were present from the English Parliament; and he drafted the Solemn League and Covenant, which was cordially adopted by the Assembly and Convention of Estates. The assembly renewed the commission's appointment of members to assist at the Westminster Assembly. Henderson accordingly sailed from Leith for London on the 30th of August. He addressed the English House of Commons and the Westminster Assembly, when met in St. Margaret's Church to swear the Solemn League and Covenant on the 25th of September. He was of great service in Westminster Assembly, and often took a leading part in its debates. Early in 1645 he was appointed to assist the commissioners of both Parliaments in their treaty with the king at Uxbridge. On this treaty being broken off without success, he returned to his duties at Westminster, though his health was now failing him.

In the spring of 1646 the king threw himself into the Scottish army, who retired with him to Newcastle. The Independents were now supreme in the English army, which had crushed his forces; and his only hope lay in speedily coming to terms with the Presbyterians. He sent for Henderson as the fittest man to remove the difficulties of his mind. Though unfit for the journey, he complied, and reached Newcastle in May. But he soon found that there was little hope of Charles agreeing to abolish prelacy in England. It was arranged that the conscientious scruples of Charles should be discussed in a series of papers between him and Henderson. Of these there are eight, five being by the king. Henderson prepared four; but, perhaps to let the king have the last word, only three have been printed. The object of Charles seems to have been to gain time; and, as the discussion lasted fully six weeks, he was not altogether unsuccessful. As Henderson's health had grown much worse, he returned to Scotland, arriving in Edinburgh on the 11th of August, sick and exhausted. To Sir James Stewart, provost of Edinburgh, he said, "I am near the end of my race: in a few days I am going home, and I am as glad of it as a schoolboy when sent home from the school to his father's house." Eight days after his arrival he entered into his rest. When dying, he opened his eyes, and looked up with a pleasant smile. The company were amazed, for his eyes shone and sparkled like stars; and immediately he expired. He was undoubtedly, after Knox, the greatest of Scottish ecclesiastics, and has been held in universal honor for his tact, statesmanship, and patriotism, as well as for his attachment to the faith and polity of the Reformed Church.

LIT. — Life, in M'CRIE'S Miscellaneous Writings, and Life and Times by AITON, Edin., Svo, 1836. Most of the principal public papers of the Presbyterians from 1637 to 1646 were drafted or polished by Henderson. In 1641 he published The Order and Government of the Church of Scotland, 4to, preface of 5 leaves, and 68 pp. The Platform of the Presbyterian Government, published by authority in 1644, is substantially the same without the preface. He seems to have published a pamphlet against Episcopacy and another against Independency. Several of his sermons have been printed separately; and a volume of Sermons, Prayers, and Pulpit Addresses, from the notes of a hearer, was issued in 1867, Svo, 529 pp. His speech before the Solemn League and Covenant was sworn at Westminster is in the Appendix to REID'S Memoirs of the Westminster Divines. The papers which passed between him and the king are in AITON'S Appendix, and are printed with Charles's Works. D. HAY FLEMING (of St. Andrew's, Scotland).

HENDERSON, Ebenezer, D.D., b. Nov. 17, 1784; d. May 16, 1858; an eminent linguist and biblical scholar, and a devoted Christian missionary, whose labors in this capacity were carried on chiefly in connection with the British and Foreign Bible Society. He was the son of humble parents; and his birth took place, as his youth was passed, in the landward part of the parish of Dunfermline, in Fifeshire, Scotland, where, owing to distance from schools, he had few educational advantages; most of his scholarship, which, besides the classical languages, is said to have included Hebrew, Syriac, Ethiopic, Russian, Arabic, Tartar, Persian, Turkish, Armenian, Manchoo, Mongolian, and Coptic, having been acquired in the midst of the engrossing duties of a singularly active professional life. He was originally intended for a mechanical trade, and apprenticed to a watchmaker; but more suitable prospects opened up for him. Though his parents were members of the Scottish Secession Church, which had indeed found its birthplace in the immediate neighborhood of his native parish, it was not in connection with that dissenting body, but with the communion which numbered among its members James and Robert Haldane, — names well known in the religious annals of Scotland in the beginning of the nineteenth century, — that young Henderson received those decided religious impressions which led to his choice of the ministry as a profession; and it was in the seminary in Edinburgh, instituted and supported by one of these brothers, that he received his theological training. The course extended over only two years, and appears to have been every way inadequate. Before he had completed his studies at this theological seminary, his future work was determined; and in the year 1806 he left Scotland in company with the Rev. John Patterson, with whom he continued to be associated in missionary labor and in friendship for a great part of his life. His original destination was the East Indies; but difficulties connected with the then existing policy of the East India Company led Mr. Henderson, who with his colleague Mr. Patterson had gone to Denmark with the view of a passage to India in a Danish ship, to alter his plans, and confine his future labors to the northern countries of Europe, including Denmark, Sweden, and portions of the Empire of Russia. Iceland and Finland, where, for various reasons, Christianity, or at all events the Bible, had almost ceased to exist, especially engaged his attention. His linguistic powers were of great use to him in his work, both in the publication of new versions of the Bible, and also in preaching the gospel among men whose languages were scarcely known, even by name, outside their own territories.

Mr. Henderson was led, chiefly by family reasons, to return to England in the year 1823, from which time he exchanged directly missionary labor for the not less important duty of training missionaries for the same work in which he had himself so long engaged, and in which he never ceased to take a lively interest. Thirty years of usefulness in academical labor at home followed his twenty years of foreign service. His first home employment was the theological tutorship in the seminary for the training of missionaries at Hoxton, which he held for five years with much acceptance. In 1830 he was appointed to the theological lectureship at Highbury. In 1850 he practically retired from public life, though still discharging occasional duties in connection with his profession as a minister of the gospel, till his powers failed him, and the end came. In addition to a number of popular reprints which appeared under his editorship, the works of Mr. Henderson (who in 1840 had received the degree of D.D. from the University of Copenhagen) comprise the following: Translation of Roos on the Prophecies of Daniel, Edin., 1811; Two Dissertations on Hans Mikkelsen's (Danish) Translation of the New Testament, Copenhagen, 1813; Iceland, or the Journal of a Residence in that Isle in 1814, 1815, Edin., 1818; Biblical Researches, and Travels in Russia, Lond., 1826; The Great Mystery of Godliness, 1813; An Appeal to the Members of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 1824; The Turkish New Testament Incapable of Defence, 1825; Divine Inspiration, 1836; Translation of Isaiah, with Commentary, 1810; Translation of Ezekiel, 1855; Translation of Jeremiah and Lamentations, 1851; and Translations of Minor Prophets, 1858. HENGSTENBERG, Ernst Wilhelm, a distinguished German theologian; b. Oct. 20, 1802, at Fröndenberg, where his father was pastor of the Young Ladies' Institute; d. in Berlin, May 28, 1869. He was of delicate constitution, and educated in his father's house till 1819, when he entered the University of Bonn. He there devoted himself more particularly to the study of Aristotle under Brandis, and Arabic under Freytag. Fruits of these studies were an edition of the Arabic Moallakah of Amru'l Kais (Amrulkesi Moallakah cum scholiis, etc.), Bonn, 1823, which won the prize in philosophy, and a German translation of Aristotle's Metaphysics, Bonn, 1824. Lack of means preventing him from carrying out a desire to sit under Neander and Tholuck, he went to Basel in the capacity of tutor to J. J. Stählerin, afterwards professor of Oriental languages at the University of Basel. The death of his mother, and the comfort which he received from the Scripture in his bodily sufferings and mental gloom, awoke in him a strong faith in the gospel, and determined him to study theology, an intention which he once had had, but subsequently, at least in part, relinquished. He belonged to the Reformed Church; but, finding in the Augsburg Confession the best expression of his own views, he united with the Lutheran Church.

In 1824 he was teaching as privat-docent at the University of Berlin. From the very start he advocated the truth of the Old and New Testaments, and entered a protest against rationalism, especially in its attitude toward the Old Testament. These views brought him into disfavor with the ministry of worship, which endeavored, but in vain, to tempt him away from Berlin with offers of extraordinary professorships at Königsberg (1826) and Bonn (1828). In 1828 he became ordinary professor in Berlin; and his influence for nearly half a century over his students, as teacher and adviser, was exceeded only by that of Tholuck. He was married in 1829, and his home life was very pleasant; but all his children and his wife preceded him to the grave.

In 1827 Hengstenberg became editor of the Evangelische Kirchen-Zeitung ("Evang. Church Journal"), through which he perhaps exerted even a greater influence upon the theology and religious opinion of the age than through his critical and exegetical works. The plan of this journal was conceived by Le Coq, who communicated it to the brothers Von Gerlach. They selected Hengstenberg for editor; and for forty-two years he continued to edit the paper in the interest of evangelical truth, with fearless daring, and undaunted by the attacks of critics. Hardly a man of the century has been the object of so much bitter opposition and vituperation as he. He was accused of pietism, dead orthodoxy, fanaticism, Jesuitism, on the one hand, and of demagogism and servility to the State on the other. The main foe against which the paper contended was rationalism, "the born and sworn enemy of Christ and his Church." Without fear it condemned it as the "theology of the natural man," and held up its teachings and legitimate consequences before the people. One instance was its sharp and unsparing participation in the agitation for the removal of Wegscheider and Gesenius, professors in Halle, and rationalists, in 1830. "God's Word and the Confession of the Church" was its motto; and every real or supposed principle subversive thereof was condemned.

No less prominently did Hengstenberg stand forth as the champion of evangelical Christianity and as the opponent of rationalism in his critical and exegetical works. Of these the first was D. Christologie d. A. T. ("Christology of the Old Testament"), 3 vols., 1829-35, 2d ed., 1854-57 (English translation by Keith, 1835-39, and in Clarke's For. Theol. Lib., 1854-58). In this work the author proposes "to restore to the Old Testament its ancient and well established rights;" and according to Delitzsch he is acknowledged to have been "the one who again for the first time, and with a truly heroic enthusiasm of faith, uttered the word of the Lord over the Old Testament, which had been cut up into parts by a despiritualizing rationalism and a critical school bent on destruction, and vindicated for the Old Testament an exegesis from the Church's stand-point, without denying a real progress under divine leadership." Although he did not distinguish sharply enough between the Old and the New Testaments, and often carried spiritualizing too far, there can be no doubt, as Kalmis has said, that the work contributed largely to revive the recognition of the divine revelation of the Old Testament.

Hengstenberg's next most important exegetical work was his Commentary on the Psalms, 4 vols., 1842-47, 2d ed., 1849-52 (English translation, Edinburgh, 1844-48). In this department he also published Gesch. Balaams u. s. Weissagungen ("History of Balaam and his Prophecies," Edinburgh, 1848), Berlin, 1842; D. Hohelied Salomonis ("Song of Songs"), Berlin, 1855; D. Prediger Salomo ("Ecclesiastes," English translation, Philadelphia, 1860), Berlin, 1859; Weissagungen d. P. Ezechiel ("Ezekiel"), 2 parts, Berlin, 1867, 1868; D. Buch Hiob ("Job"), Berlin and Leipzig, 2 parts, 1870-75; Offenb. Johannis ("Revelation") 2 vols., 1849-51, 2d ed., 1862; Evang. Joh. ("Gospel of John"), 3 vols., 1861-63, 2d ed., 1867; Vorlesungen ü. d. Leidengesch. ("Lectures on the Passion"), Leipzig, 1875. His historical-critical works are Beiträge z. Einl. ins A. T. ("Contributions to the Introduction of the Old Testament," English translation, Edinburgh, 1847, 1848), 3 vols., Berlin, 1831-39, in which he vindicates the Messianic character of Daniel's and Zechariah's prophecies, and the authenticity of the Pentateuch; Gesch. d. Reiches Gottes u. d. A. B. ("History of the Kingdom of God under the Old Covenant"), Berlin, 1869-71; D. Bücher Moses u. Aegypten ("The Books of Moses and Egypt"), Berlin, 1841, which Diestel calls his most meritorious work. He also published a number of smaller treatises (Freemasonry, 1854; Duelling, 1856, etc.), some of which had before appeared in the Church Journal. See BACHMANN: Hengstenberg u. s. Leben u. Wirken, 2 vols., Gütersloh, 1876-79. BACHMANN.

HENHÖFER, Aloys, b. at Volkersbach, Baden, July 11, 1789; d. at Spöck, near Carlsruhe, Dec. 5, 1862; was educated in the school of Rashatt; studied in the university of Freiburg and the seminary of Meersburg; received the lower orders by Dalberg, the higher by Hohenlohe; and was appointed pastor at Mühlhausen in 1818. Suspected of heresy, he was tried, convicted, and excommunicated from the Roman-Catholic Church in 1822: but the larger part of his congregation entered with him the evangelical church; and in 1823 he was appointed minister at Spöck, where he labored for the rest of his life with great effect. Of his numerous works, polemical against Romanism and rationalism, the principal are Christliches Glaubensbekenntnis und Der Kampf des Unglaubens mit Aberglauben und Glauben. His life was written by K. F. Ledderhose (Heidelberg, 1863) and by E. Frommel (Carlsruhe, 1865).

HENKE, Heinrich Philipp Konrad, b. at Hehlen in Brunswick, July 3, 1752; d. at Helmstädt, May 2, 1809; studied at Helmstädt; and was appointed professor there in philosophy (1777) and in theology (1780). He was a pupil and representative of the rationalism of his time; and even his best work (Allgemeine Geschichte der christlichen Kirche, Brunswick, 1799-1808, 6 vols.)

was written by K. F. Ledderhose (Heidelberg, 1863) and by E. Frommel (Carlsruhe, 1865).

has lost its interest. His life was written by Bollmann and Wolff, Helmstädt, 1816. — His son, Ernst Ludwig Theodor Henke, b. at Helmstädt, Feb. 22, 1804; d. at Marburg, Dec. 1, 1872; studied at Göttingen and Jena; was professor of theology at Marburg from 1839 to his death; wrote Georg Calixtus und seine Zeit, Halle, 1853–60, 2 vols., and published, together with Lindenkohl, the first complete edition of Abelard's Sic et Non, Marburg, 1851. His Neuere Kirchengeschichte (1871, 1878, and 1880, 3 vols.) and Nachgelassene Vorlesungen über Liturgie u. Homiletik (1876) were published in Halle. See MANGOLD: Ernst Ludwig Henke, Marburg, 1879. MANGOLD.

HENOTIKON, The, a "deeree of union" or "instrument of union," probably drawn up by Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and issued by the Emperor Zeno (482), for the purpose of reconciling the Monophysite and Orthodox divisions of the Church. Neither party was satisfied with it, however. The Monophysites demanded a more explicit condemnation of the Council of Chalcedon, while the Orthodox were scandalized at the least shadow of disparagement. In the East, however, the Henotikon was made obligatory on all bishops and teachers. In the West it was anathematized by Felix II., and a schism of forty years followed, until the death of Anastasius (518); his successor, Justin, belonging to the Orthodox side, and suffering the Henotikon to fall into disuse without formally repealing it.

HENRY OF CLUGNY. See HENRY OF LAUSANNE.

HENRY OF GHENT (Henricus de Gandavo), b. at Muyden, a suburb of Ghent, 1217; d. as archdeacon of Tournay, June 29, 1293; was a pupil of Albertus Magnus; taught philosophy and theology in Paris; obtained the surname of doctor solennis, but formed no school, as he followed Plato in a time completely ruled by Aristotle. His principal works are Summa questionum ordinariarum and Quodlibeta theologica, a commentary on the metaphysics of Aristotle. See K. WERNER: Heinrich von Gent als Repräsentant des christlichen Platonismus im 13. Jahrhundert, Berlin, 1878. G. PLITT.

HENRY OF CORCUM (Henricus Corcomius), b. at Goreum, Holland, in the beginning of the fifteenth century; was vice-chancellor of Cologne; and wrote De ceremoniis ecclesiasticis, Commentaries on Aristotle, Thomas Aquinas, etc., besides several works (Contra Hussitas, etc.) which still remain in manuscript.

HENRY OF HUNTINGDON, canon of Lincoln, afterwards archdeacon of Huntingdon, wrote in the middle of the twelfth century a Historia Anglorum, from Cæsar to 1154, printed in Savile's Scriptores post Bedam, London, 1596, and translated into English by T. Forester, London, 1583. In D'Achery, Spicilegium, is found a Libellus de contentu mundi, by him.

HENRY OF KETTENBACH. See KETTENBACH.

HENRY OF LANGENSTEIN (Henricus de Hassia), b. in Hesse, 1325; d. in Vienna, 1397; studied in Paris, where he afterwards taught philosophy, theology, astronomy, and mathematics, and was one of the leaders of the opposition to the prevailing materialism; and went in 1390 to Vienna as rector of the newly founded university. His principal works are Consilium pacis de unione ecclesie, in Hardt's Mognum Occum. Const. Consil., T. II., and Secreta sacerdotum, in Fabricius: Bibliotheca medicæ et infirmæ latinitalis. See HARTWIG: Heinrich von Langenstein, Marburg, 1858.

HENRY OF LAUSANNE, also called HENRY OF CLUGNY, was born in Switzerland or Italy towards the close of the eleventh century, and became a monk in Clugny, but left the monastery, put off the cowl, and began, starting from Lausanne, to wander from place to place, barefooted, carrying a cross in his hands, and preaching penitence, with singular effect. In 1116 he came to Mans, and was received with enthusiasm. But his attacks on the corruption of the Church and the depravity of the clergy caused a tremendous popular excitement; and Bishop Hildebert drew him away. For some time he wandered together with Peter of Bruys, whose heretical opinions, however, he did not share. But Peter was burnt at the stake; and in 1134 Henry was arrested by the Bishop of Arles, and brought before the Council of Pisa. The details of his trial are not known; but he was soon set free, and repaired to Southern France, where he continued his reformatory labor with great success. Whole congregations left their churches, and joined him; and in 1148 Pope Eugene III. sent Bernard of Clairvaux to Toulouse, to preach against him. He was again arrested, and condemned to lifelong imprisonment, but seems to have died shortly after. About his doctrines, only very little is found in the Acta Episcoporum Cennanensium (Mabillon: Veterum Analectorum, T. III.); and what the letters of St. Bernard contain bears so strong an imprint of passion that it cannot be accepted without restrictions. See NEANDER: Der hl. Bernhard und sein Zeitalter, Berlin, 1813.

HENRY IV., king of France (1589–1610), was b. at Pau, in Béarn, Dec. 15, 1553; a son of Antoine de Bourbon-Vendôme and Jeanne d'Albret, Queen of Navarre, and was educated in the Reformed faith. From early youth he stood as the acknowledged head of the Huguenot party in France, not only on account of his high rank, but also on account of his brilliant military talent. On the death of his mother he ascended the throne of Navarre (1572), and in the same year he married Marguerite of Valois. But he escaped from the Massacre of St. Bartholomew only by abjuring his faith; and, during the three next years which he spent at the court of Catherine of Medici, he seemed to have become entirely lost to the Protestant cause. Suddenly, however, he left the court (1576), re-entered the Calvinist Church, took the lead of the Huguenot party; and then followed a long series of inextricable intrigues, violent feuds, and regular campaigns, until at the death of Henry III. (in 1589), he found himself, according to the Salic law, the legitimate heir of the French crown. In order to gain the Roman Catholics, who formed the great majority of his subjects, he abjured a second time the Reformed faith, and solemnly entered the Roman Church, July 23, 1593. In order to satisfy the Protestants, his old friends and comrades, he signed the Edict of Nantes April 15, 1598; and from that time he reigned in peace and with great success.

That the conversion of Henry IV. was sincere, it is impossible to believe: he was one of the clearest heads of his age, and he was educated a Protestant. It was simply a political measure, an act of shrewdness, a stage-trick set in scene with all the circumstantiality which the intended effect demanded. More than once he confessed, with his usual incurable open-mouthedness, that he had joined Rome only to make sure of the French crown. But, even if his words had been silent, his acts would have told the truth. His internal policy was conciliatory, tolerably impartial, though rather in favor of the Roman Catholics. But his foreign policy was from the first to the last moment, in its highest aims and in its smallest details, so invariably, so steadily, so decidedly, set against Rome, Spain, the Catholic League in Germany, and for England, the Netherlands, the Protestant Union of Germany, that it soon became evident to the opposite party that there was only one means of preventing France from placing herself at the head of Protestant Europe against the Pope; namely, the death of the king. Consequently he was assassinated in his carriage in the streets of Paris, May 14, 1610, by Francis Ravaillac, a former Jesuit.

LIT.—The letters of Henry IV., and other documents relating to his reign, have been published by Rabanis, Galitzin, Rommel, Pierre d'Estoile, and Xivrey. Contemporary or nearly contemporary information may be found in the works of Sully, Palma Cayet, Du Plessis-Mornay, and De Thou. Monographs have been written by Poirson, Philippson, Mercier de Lacombe, Carné, Wolowski, etc. See especially E. HENRY VIII. OF ENGLAND. See ENGLAND, CHURCH OF.

HENRY, Matthew, a distinguished nonconformist divine and biblical commentator; b. Oct. 28, 1662, at Broad Oak, Flintshire; d. June 22, 1714, at Nantwich. He received his education under his father's (Rev. Philip Henry) roof, and in an academy at Islington. On account of the severe laws against the nonconformists, he began the study of law in London, 1685. It was, however, his strong desire to enter the ministry, and he preached from time to time, while pursuing the study of law, until 1687, when, toleration being granted to the nonconformists, he was ordained, and became pastor at Chester. In 1712 he accepted a call to Hackney, near London. The first Sunday of his settlement he expounded in the morning Gen. i., and in the afternoon Matt. i., intending to take up the whole Bible, chapter by chapter. On the return journey from a visit to Chester, he was seized with apoplexy, and died.

Mr. Henry is said to have been a good preacher; but his reputation rests upon his celebrated commentary, The Exposition of the Old and New Testaments. It was begun in 1704, and the Pentateuch was published 1706. He lived to complete it only as far as to the end of the Acts. This work is justly celebrated as the best of the English commentaries for devotional purposes. The author betrays a remarkable fertility of practical suggestion; and, although the work at first sight seems diffuse, it will be found on closer study to contain rich stores of tersely spoken truths, which hold the attention by their quaint freshness and aptness, and feed the spiritual life by their scriptural unction. It has no critical value; and Mr. Henry in the Preface expressly says, that, in this department, he leaves the reader to Poole's Synopsis. His object is thus stated in the Preface: "Some complain, after the stone is rolled away from the well, that the well is deep, and they have nothing to draw with. . . . Some such, perhaps, may find a bucket here, or water drawn to their hands; and pleased enough shall I be with this office of the Gibeonites to draw water for the congregation out of those wells of salvation." It is commendation enough for Henry's Commentary, to remember that three of the greatest preachers have used it incessantly, and commended it heartily, — Robert Hall, Whitefield, and Mr. Spurgeon. Whitefield read it through four times, the last time on his knees. Mr. Spurgeon says (Commenting and Commentaries, p. 3), "Every minister ought to read it entirely and carefully through once at least." The work has been republished many times since its author's death. The most accessible editions are Carter's, New York, in five and nine volumes, with Prefatory Remarks by ARCHIBALD ALEXANDER and Rev. EDWARD BICKERSTETH.

Mr. Henry published other works, such as a Life of Rev. Philip Henry (1696), Catechism for Children, and Scripture Catechism in the Method of the Assembly's (1702), etc. These are published in two volumes, under the title Miscellaneous Works of M. Henry, New York, 1855. His life has been written by TONG, London, 1716, Sir JOHN B. WILLIAMS, London, 1850. See also Memoir in Carter's edition.

HENRY, Paul Emile, b. at Potsdam, March 22, 1792; was pastor of the French Huguenot Church at Berlin; d. there Nov. 24, 1853. He wrote Das Leben Johann Calvin's, Berlin, 1844, 3 vols., afterwards abridged in 1 vol. (1846). It is rather a valuable collection of materials for a life than a good biography.

HENRY, Philip, a Presbyterian divine of much holiness of life, and father of Matthew Henry; b. at Whitehall, London, Aug. 24, 1631; d. at Broad Oak, June 24, 1696. He was educated at Westminster school, under Dr. Busby, graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, and in 1659 was presented with the living of Worthenbury. He refused to conform in 1662, and fell under the Five Mile Act (1665). He is remembered for the purity and exemplariness of his life. Bishop Wordsworth says he "could nowhere find nonconformity united with more Christian graces than in him." His Memoir was written by his son, MATTHEW HENRY, and is printed in the latter's Miscellaneous Works (New York, 1855, 2 vols.), and separately by the Tract Society, New York. See also Diaries and Letters of Philip Henry, edited by Matthew Henry Lee, London, 1882.

HENSCHEN, Gottfried, the associate of Bolland in the preparation of the famous Acta Sanctorum; b. at Venrad, in Flanders, Jan. 21, 1600; d. at Antwerp, 1681. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1619: in 1635, Bolland, whose pupil he had been, summoned him to his aid; and upon the Acta Henschen gladly spent the rest of his life. The present scope of the work was his idea, for Bolland had contemplated one much less elaborate. See the art. BOLLANDISTS; also, in Wetzler u. Welter (ed. I., vol. xii. 554, 555), art. Henschen, Gottfried.

HEPPE, Heinrich Ludwig Julius, Reformed theologian; b. in Cassel, March 30, 1820; d. at Marburg, July 25, 1879. He studied at the university of Marburg, 1839-43, in which, in 1850, he became professor extraordinary, and 1864 professor ordinary, of theology. Although not a man of first-class ability, he produced a number of useful works, which evince great industry and competent scholarship. His writings may be thus classified: Theological. — Die Dogmatik des Protestantismus im 16. Jahrhundert, Gotha, 1857, 3 vols.; Ursprung u. Geschichte d. Bezeichnungen "reformirte" u. "lutherische" Kirche, Gotha, 1859; Die Dogmatik d. evangelisch-reformirten Kirche, Elberfeld, 1860. Historical. — Geschichte d. hessischen Generalsynoden von 1568-82, Cassel, 1847, 2 vols.; Geschichte d. deutschen Protestantismus in d. Jahren 1555-85, Marburg, 1852-59, 4 vols., 2d ed., Frankfurt-a.-M., 1865, 1866; Zur Geschichte d. evangelischen Kirche Rheinlands u. Westphalens, Iserlohn, 1867; Geschichte d. theologischen Facultät zu Marburg, Marburg, 1873; Geschichte d. quietistischen Mystik in d. katholischen Kirche, Berlin, 1875; Kirchengeschichte beider Hessen, Marburg, 1876-78, 2 vols. Miscellaneous. — Gebetbüchlein, Marburg, 1852, 4th ed., 1876; Die confessionelle Entwicklung der hessischen Kirche, Frankfurt-a.-M., 1853; Die confessionelle Entwicklung d. alt. protestantischen Kirche Deutschlands, Marburg, 1854; Die Bekenntnisschriften d. reformirten Kirchen Deutschlands, Elberfeld, 1860; Philipp Melancthon, Marburg, 1860, 2d ed., 1867; Theodor Beza, Elberfeld, 1861; Die presbyteriale Synodalverfassung d. evangel. Kirche in Norddeutschland, Iserlohn, 1868, 2d ed., 1871; Die Verfassung d. evang. Kirche in chem. Kurhessen, Marburg, 1869; Christliche Ethik and Christliche Sittendehre, both Elberfeld, 1882.

HERACLAS, Bishop of Alexandria (232-247); was a Pagan by birth; studied philosophy under Ammonius Saccas; was converted to Christianity by Origen, whom he succeeded as director of the catechetical school. His stand-point was probably identical with that of Origen; but he was adroit enough to avoid giving offence, and after the death of Demetrius he was chosen bishop. He left no literary monuments.

HERACLEON. See GNOSTICISM.

HERBERGER, Valerius, b. at Fraustadt, Prussian Poland, April 21, 1562; d. there May 18, 1627; was school-teacher in his native city since 1581, and pastor of the evangelical church since 1598, and acquired a great name as a preacher. He published several collections of sermons, and his Postille is still read. See S. F. LAUTERBACH: Vita, Fama et Fata V. H., 1708.

HERBELOT, Barthelémy d', Orientalist; b. in Paris, Dec. 4, 1625; d. there Dec. 8, 1695. His life was spent upon the composition of his invaluable thesaurus of Oriental learning, — Bibliothèque orientale, ou dictionnaire universel contenant généralement tout ce qui regarde la connaissance de peuples de l'Orient, edited by A. Galland, Paris, 1697. It is mainly an abridged translation of the immense biographical and bibliographical cyclopædia of Hajji Khalfa, but enlarged from various sources. In spite of its occasional inaccuracies and inconsistencies, it is "the one available source for much information to others than Oriental scholars; and as such it retains its importance." It was reprinted, unaltered, Maestricht, 1776, and, with additions by Galland, The Hague, 1777-79, 4 vols.; reprinted in Maestricht, 1780; German translation, Halle, 1785-90, 4 vols.

HERBERT, Edward. See DEISM.

HERBERT, George, one of the quaintest but holiest poets of England; b. at Montgomery, Wales, April 3, 1593; d. at Bemerton, Eng., February, 1633. He was a fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge (1615), and public orator of the university (1619-27), in which capacity he came in contact with King James, and was for a time more or less a courtier; but in 1625 he took holy orders, and was in 1630 made rector of Bemerton. His life as a minister was so exemplary and so devoted, that he was called "Holy George Herbert." His fame rests upon his poems, The Temple, Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations, Cambridge, 1633. They abound in oddities of expression, but breathe so pure and holy a spirit that they are religious classics, and give Herbert claim to be, with Keble, the poet of Anglican theology. Herbert's prose-work, The Priest to the Temple, or the Character of a Country Parson, is an excellent treatise upon pastoral theology. It has doubtless helped Herbert's reputation that Izaak Walton was his biographer (1670). There are many editions of Herbert. Perhaps the best is that by Professor Nichol, London, 1863. Coleridge edited his complete works, London, 1846.

HERDER, Johann Gottfried, b. Aug. 25, 1744, at Mohrungen, East Prussia; d. at Weimar, Dec. 18, 1803; studied theology, philosophy, languages, and literature, at Königsberg, where he acquired the friendship of Kant and Hamann, and was in 1761 appointed teacher in the cathedral-school of Riga, and in 1767 afternoon-preacher in one of the suburban churches. In Riga he first distinguished himself as a pulpit-orator, drawing larger and larger audiences; and at the same time he also attracted the attention of literary Germany by his Fragmente über die deutsche Literatur und Kritische Wälder. In 1769 he left Riga, accompanied the Prince of Holstein-Eutin for some time, made in Strassburg the acquaintance of Goethe and Jung-Stilling, and was in 1771 appointed court-preacher and superintendent at Bückeberg. To this period of his life belong, of his theological writings, the Provinzialblätter, Älteste Urkunde des Menschengeschlechts, Erläuterungen aus einer neueröffneten morgenländischen Quelle, and Briefe zweier Brüder Jesu, which made a deep impression, and established it as an axiom in biblical exegesis, that the Bible is not simply a doctrinal code, a dogmatical system, but a whole literature, which must be viewed in the light of its time, its place, and its historical surroundings, in order to be fully understood. In 1776 he moved to Weimar as court-preacher and superintendent-general, and there published the ripest and most important of his works, philosophical as well as theological. To the former class belong his Ideen zur Philosophie der Geschichte, Gott, etc.; to the latter, his Lieder der Liebe (1778), half a paraphrase of, half a commentary on, the Canticles, Vom Geist hebräischer Poesie (1782), which remodelled the whole conception, popular and scientific, of Hebrew poetry, and especially his so-called Christliche Schriften, which gave the first impulse to that immense literature generally known under the name of The Life of Christ. Not belonging to any special theological school, Herder formed no school himself; but, by his wide historical horizon and vivid psychological intuition, he exercised an elevating and ennobling influence on almost all departments of theological science and Christian life. Of the common edition of his collected works, his theological writings occupy the first twelve volumes.

HEREFORD, an English bishopric, the cathedral of which is situated in the town of this name. The see was detached from Lichfield in 673. Hereford is situated on the left bank of the Wye, has a population of nineteen thousand. The cathedral was founded 825, rebuilt 1030, burnt by the Welsh 1055, again rebuilt 1079-1115: the great western tower fell 1786. There have been two modern restorations, — 1842 and 1864. The cathedral is three hundred and forty-two feet long. "But for the fall of the western tower, the consequent curtailment of the nave, and other solecisms, few cathedrals could offer so complete a field of progressive architecture, from Early Norman to latest Perpendicular." The present (1882) incumbent of the see of Hereford is John Atlay, D.D., and the income is forty-two hundred pounds.

HERESY (αἵρεσις, "a selection") designates in the New Testament a party or school; and the Pharisees (Acts xv. 5, xxvi. 5), the Sadducees (Acts v. 17), and even the Christians (Acts xxiv. 14, xxviii. 22), are called "heresies." The use of the term, however, in connection with schisms, proves that it did not exclusively designate dissent in matters of doctrine (1 Cor. xi. 19; Gal. v. 20). At a later period the term was employed principally in the sense of doctrinal departures from revealed truth, or erroneous views (Tit. iii. 10; 2 Pet. ii. 1).

The apostles treated very seriously all departures from their doctrine. We need only think of such expressions as "grievous wolves" (Acts xx. 29), "dogs" (Phil. iii. 2), and the terms in which Paul speaks of the Judaizing teachers in the Galatian Church, and of the Gnostic teachers referred to in the Epistle to the Colossians and the Pastoral Letters. With no less severity did the fathers of the first three centuries treat departures from the catholic doctrine. Polycarp regarded Marcion as the first-born of the Devil. Ignatius sees in heretics poisonous plants, or animals in human form. Justin and Tertullian condemn their errors as inspirations of the Evil One;

Theophilus compares them to barren and rocky islands on which ships are wrecked; and Origen says, that as pirates place lights on cliffs to allure and destroy vessels in quest of refuge, so the Prince of this world lights the fires of false knowledge in order to destroy men. [Jerome calls the congregations of the heretics synagogues of Satan (Ep. 123), and says their communion is to be avoided like that of vipers and scorpions (Ep. 130)]. They included under heresy all dissent from the fundamental doctrines of salvation, attributed it to insubordination to the apostolic faith, and regarded pride and ambition as its ultimate causes.

The apostles and fathers could not have tolerated all possible construction of its doctrine without being guilty of treason toward the Church of Christ. The same is true, in a smaller measure, of the Reformation period. Luther could not have tolerated the Zwinglian view of the Lord's Supper without doing violence to his own convictions of the meaning of Scripture [?]. But, while the fathers were justified in insisting upon the fundamental truths of Christianity, it ought not to be overlooked that they knew how to distinguish between doctrines subversive of Christianity (such as Ebionism, Gnosticism, and Manichæism) and dissent in unessentials (as in the case of the Montanists, Novatians, Donatists, etc.). The baptism of Novatians, Donatists, Arians, etc., was recognized as valid (Augustine, De Bapt., l. 13, etc.). Heresy disturbed the unity of doctrine and of fellowship in the early Church. The Church was, therefore, forced to exclude heretics from its communion. Once excluded, they formed societies of their own. This was the case with the Novatians, Gnostics, Manichæans, Donatists, Nestorians, etc. But, relatively justified as the Donatists and others were, all these heretical organizations lacked vital power, and soon succumbed to disintegration, or dragged out a lingering existence. On the other hand, the Church was represented by such figures as "the pillar of truth," "the body of Christ." "No one can have God as a father, who does not accept the Church as his mother," says Cyprian; or "Christ for head, who does not belong to the Church as the body," says Augustine. Notwithstanding this sharp distinction, Augustine and the early Church generally regarded only such false doctrine heresy which is persistent, and prompted by animosity to the Church (perniciosa animositate).

In the middle ages the Latin Church pronounced the Eastern Church schismatic, and itself the catholic or universal Church. The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son (Filioque), adopted as a doctrine at the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), has never been accepted by the Eastern Communion. But the Latin Church has never pronounced the Greek doctrine heretical. The dualistic errors of the Cathari, however, it did; and, when the Reformation came, it pursued the new sects with fire and sword.

If the visible Church be the body of those who confess Christ, then the Latin, Eastern, and Protestant churches are parts of the one Church. The Latin Church, however, appropriating to itself the appellation "catholic," calls the Greeks "schismatics," and the Protestants "heretics." If it be the Church, then the congregations outside of its pale do not belong to the Church, or participate in salvation: for the Church is the channel of salvation. Roman-Catholic theologians have avoided this conclusion by distinguishing between two kinds of heretics, — material heretics, or those who hold to error in ignorance, and are free from guilt, and formal heretics, or those who wittingly and resolutely put themselves in antagonism to the Church (Perrone, Prolectiones, § 265). The Protestant Church does not pretend to be the Church, but only a part of it. Its confessions never declared either the Roman or the Eastern Church heretical, nor did the Lutheran Church call the Reformed doctrine of the Lord's Supper a heresy.

What, then, is the fundamental idea of heresy? Heresy is erroneous doctrine which has grown up in the Church, but denies its essential teachings as they were formulated by early Christianity. If that which is peculiar to and essential in Christianity is the confession in the Apostles' Creed of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, — three persons in a unity of essence, — then Tritheism, Eblionism, Monarchism, and Arianism are heresies. If Christ is the God-Man, then Docetists, Samosaitians, Monophysites, and Nestorians are heretics; and if it be the office of the Holy Spirit alone to apply the benefits of redemption, and to regenerate, then the Pelagians belong in the same category.

Among the mistakes of the visible Church, which for many centuries disturbed the spiritual vision of Christians, and led to horrible crimes in the name of religion, must be counted the delusion that heresy ought to be punished by the civil power. While Luther raised his voice in indignation at the blood of the first heretic, Augustine found in the words of our Lord (Luke xiv. 23), "compel them to come in," a justification of the interference of the State to check the growth of heresy. Could he have read the commentary which the persecutions of the Albigenses, the holocausts of the Inquisition, and the St. Bartholomew's Night, wrote to his words, he would not have been content, as he was, with simply saying that he did not desire that heretics should be put to death. But even Protestants have been guilty of holding the doctrine that heretics should be put to death. Not only was Servetus burned at Geneva, but Calvin defended the right of the civil power to punish heretics with death by the sword in a tract published 1544: Defensio orthodoxæ fidei . . . ubi ostenditur hæreticos jure gladii coercendos esse, etc. ("A defence of the orthodox faith . . . wherein is shown that heretics should be coerced by the punishment of the sword," etc.). Luther's words speak the truth: "To burn heretics is contrary to the will of the Holy Ghost" (Grund u. Ursache aller Artikel, so durch d. röm. Bulle unrechtlich verdammt worden, 1520). For a discussion of the treatment of heretics see INQUISITION.

HERIGER, h. in Flanders, in the first half of the tenth century; came in 965 to Lobbes or Lobach, a monastery situated on the Sambre in Hainanx, and at that period the seat of a famous school; became teacher in the school, and in 990 abbot of the monastery, and died there Oct. 31, 1007. Besides some historical works (Gesta episcoporum Tungrensium, etc.), and a mathematical work (Regula de abaco), he wrote a work in defence of Paschasius Radbertus, from which it appears that the doctrine of transubstantiation had not yet become generally adopted by the Church. HERLE, Charles, b. at Prideaux Herle, Cornwall, Eng., 1598; d. Winwick, Lancashire, September, 1659. He entered Exeter College, Oxford, in 1612, and took his master's degree in 1618. He settled as a minister, at first in Devonshire, but soon after became rector of Winwick in Lancashire, where he remained until his death. He was appointed one of the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643, and, after the death of Dr. Twisse, as prolocutor of the same; in which position he continued to the close. He was a generous-minded Puritan and Presbyterian, with an irenic spirit, and took an active part in the organization of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire, and in providing a learned and faithful ministry for the churches, and excluding the scandalous and ignorant, for which he received much ill-deserved reproach. His principal works are of a practical character: Contemplations and Devotions, pp. 516. London, 1631; Independency on Scriptures of the Independency of the Churches, 4to, pp. 44, London, 1613 (irenic towards the Independents); Wisdom's Tripas, London, 1655, in which he shows the excellency of Christian wisdom above that of worldly policy and moral prudence. He also delivered several sermons before Parliament, of which we would mention A Pair of Compasses for Church and State, November, 1612, and David's Song, June, 1643. For further information see WOOD: Athenæ Oxoniensis, III, 477; and REID: Memoirs of Westminster Divines, Paisley, 1811. C. A. BRIGGS.

HERMAN, Nicolaus, one of the earliest evangelical hymn-writers; was cantor at Joachimsthal in Bohemia, and died there May 3, 1561. His hymns, intended for the school and the home, rather than for the church, appeared originally single on fly-leaves, and then in two collections, 1560 and 1562. Some of them are still in use. His "Mine hour appointed is at hand," was translated by Massie, and was sung at the funeral of Prince Albert in 1861. His life was written by

K. F. Ledderhose, Halle, 1855, and by E. Pfeifer, Berlin, 1858.

HERMANN or HERIMANN CONTRACTUS (the lame), b., of noble descent, July 18, 1013; entered, when he was only seven years old, the monastery of Reichenau, situated on an island in Lake Constance; took the vows when he was thirty; and d. in 1051. He was a man of vast learning and varied authorship; but his principal work is his chronicle, from the birth of Christ till 1054, and specially valuable for the time of Henry III. It was first printed at Basel, 1529, afterwards often. See PERTZ: Monum., V.; HANS JACOB: Herman der Lahme, Mainz, 1875.

HERMANN OF FRITZLAR, a mystic from the middle of the fourteenth century; was probably a rich layman, who, after travelling in France, Italy, and Germany, retired from the world, and devoted himself to study and authorship. His Die Blume der Schauung is lost; but his Heiligenleben, a compilation from sources now mostly lost, is printed in PFEIFFER: Deutsche Mystiker d. 14. Jahrhunderts, I.

HERMANN VON DER HARDT, b. at Melle, Westphalia, Nov. 15, 1660; d. at Helmstädt, Feb. 28, 1746; studied at Jena; became in 1686 a member of the Collegium Philobiblicum in Leipzig; staid for some time in Dresden in the house of Spener; and was in 1690 appointed professor of Oriental languages at Helmstädt. There he developed a very comprehensive literary activity, his writings numbering about three hundred; but he entirely abandoned his pietistic tendency, and pursued a strongly pronounced rationalistic course until in 1727, on account of his Enigmata Prisci Orbis he was dismissed from his office, and forbidden to publish any thing without special permit. His principal works are Authographa Lutheri (1690), Magnum Œcumenicum Constantiense Concilium (1697-1700), Historia literaria Reformationis (1717), etc.,—all more or less unreliable on account of the author's passion for the paradoxical. P. TSCHACKERT.

HERMANN VON WIED, or HERMANN V., b. Jan. 15, 1477; d. Aug. 15, 1552; was elected Archbishop of Cologne by the chapter in 1515, and confirmed by Leo X. In 1536 he convened a provincial synod, and introduced a number of reforms in his diocese, though without causing any conflict with Rome. But in 1542 he invited Butzer from Strassburg to preach the Reformed faith in the cathedral of Bonn; and at once began the attacks of the Roman curia and the opposition of his own chapter. When the contest became critical, the emperor, Charles V., stepped in; and, as the Protestant princes were unwilling to interfere, the archbishop was deposed, and retired to his estates at Wied. See C. VARRENTAPP: Hermann v. Wied u. sein Reformationsversuch in Köln, Leipzig, 1878.

HERMAS ["the Pilgrim's Progress of the Church of the second century," Dean Stanley], a name under which a book has come down to us, called the Shepherd (pastor, ποιμήν), and held in high esteem by the early Church [quoted by Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, etc.]. The title Shepherd evidently was derived from the first words of the angel to the author, "I am the shepherd" (Ἐγὼ εἰμὶ ὁ ποιμήν).

Text.—We are now in possession of two Greek copies,—the one in the Sinaitic manuscript, discovered 1859 (not complete); the other in the Leipzig manuscript, together with three pages found on Mount Athos. Editions appeared at Leipzig by RUD. ANGER (1856), TISCHENDORF (1856), DRESSSEL (1863), HILGENFELD (1866), [2d ed. 1881]. There are two Latin translations,—the Vulgata and the Palatina (in the Vatican Library). The Vulgata was first edited by Faber Stapulensis, Paris, 1513; since then many times. Hilgenfeld's edition (Leipzig, 1873) is critical. D'Abbadie issued an Ethiopic translation, Leipzig, 1860. Its probable date is 543. The edition of Gebhardt and Harnack (Patres Apost., Leipzig, 1877), based upon the Sinaitic manuscript, is the best.

Contents.—The book contains a number of visions accorded to Hermas. Their intent is to arouse Hermas, and the Church through him, to repentance. The time of repentance is limited, and will soon be at an end. The uniformity of style stamps the whole as one composition. The author divides the book into two parts; an aged woman explaining the visions of the first part, an angel those of the second. The visions contain revelations, commandments (to believe in the one God, practise alms, avoid falsehood and fornication, etc.), and similitudes. Hermas was neither a Judaizing Christian (Schwegler, Lipsius), nor an intense Paulinian, but a member of the orthodox church of his day.

Authorship.—The opinions may be reduced to four: (1) Relying upon the testimony of the Muratorian canon, a real Hermas, the brother of Bishop Pius (139-154), was author (Heyne, Gebhardt, Harnack); (2) Relying upon the statement in the book itself (Vis. II. 4, 3), that Hermas delivered the book to Clement, assumed to be Clement of Rome, the author is regarded as having been his contemporary (Gaab, Caspari, Alzog, Zahn); (3) Hermas wrote his book under Pius, but gave himself out for a contemporary of Clement, or for the Hermas of Rom. xvi. 11 (Behm, Ewald, Credner, Ritschl, Hefele, Dorner, Thiersch); (4) an unknown author of the second century who simulated the old Hermas (Schwegler, Lechler, Hilgenfeld, Lange, Donaldson). We hold to the first view, on the ground of the explicit statement in the Muratorian canon. The Clement referred to in the book is not necessarily Clement of Rome. The condition of the Church represented is that of the first half of the second century, with its Gnostic errors and its hypocrites. The work was probably written about 130, for we are not shut up to the period between 139-154, which, according to Lipsius, was the term of Pius' administration. Pius was not bishop in our sense, but a prominent presbyter. The book of Hermas speaks only of presbyters in the Roman Church (comp. Vis. II. 2, 6; III. 8, etc.).

HERMENEUTICS, Biblical. I. DEFINITION.—The term "hermeneutics" is derived from ἑρμηνεύω (from Ἑρμῆς, the messenger of the gods), and allied with εἰρω ("to inquire"), and has the broader meaning of explaining the thoughts of another (Xen., Mem., I. 2. 52; Thuc., II. 60), and the narrower meaning of translation (John i. 38, etc.). Hermeneutics differs from exegesis as the theory differs from practice, and has for its object the definition of the laws by which the meaning of the Scriptures is to be ascertained and communicated. Augustine spoke long ago of two qualifications of an interpreter of Scripture,—the capacity to find out the author's meaning, and the capacity to express it ("Modus invenienti quæ intelligenda sunt et modus proferendi, quæ intellecta sunt,"—De Doct. Chr., I. 1); and Ernesti speaks in the same way ("Subtilitas intelligendi et explicandi").

II. PLACE.—There was an exegesis of the Bible before there was a science of exegesis; and hermeneutics cannot make an exegete, any more than homiletics can make a preacher, or rhetoric an orator. Notwithstanding this, however, hermeneutics has its own place, and trains up the natural talent, and lays down laws for its exercise. "The same considerations," as Landerer has said, "which make theology, or the science of the true religion, necessary, make also hermeneutics necessary as a special theological discipline." It is a branch of historical theology, or more especially of exegetical theology, which investigates the historical origin of Christianity, and expounds its records. It regards the canon as fixed, and rests upon the shoulders of the science of biblical introduction, as well as upon those of biblical criticism, which is concerned with the integrity of the text. But on the other side, without the aid of hermeneutics, the occasion of the biblical writings and their design cannot be fully known; and even textual criticism depends to some extent upon the exposition of the text. The relation of hermeneutics, therefore, and biblical criticism and introduction, is one of mutual dependence.

III. METHOD.—The method which hermeneutics pursues is twofold,—the ascertainment of the meaning of Scripture, and its communication. The ascertainment of the author's thoughts is conditioned upon the accurate study of the language in which he has clothed them. The laws of grammar are to be strictly followed, and all the results of lexicographical learning to be applied. But it must not be forgotten that the man himself is the style, and that the thoughts of the author regulate the language; so that the letter of the grammar is by no means an infallible guide. In the interpretation of the Psalms and the Epistle to the Philippians, for example, it is necessary that the mood of the writer, and his peculiar environments, should be taken into consideration. Schleiermacher well says, "No biblical book can be perfectly understood, except as it is studied with reference to the whole environment out of which it grew, and in connection with the position of author and readers" (Kurze Darstell., § 140). There is also a subjective qualification; namely, that the interpreter is able to enter into the thoughts of the author, and is willing to do it. Experience teaches that only kindred souls can understand each other; or, as Luther says, "He only understands Virgil's Eclogues who has lived with the shepherds; and he who will understand a poet must travel to the poet's country." The interpreter must have religious feeling, but under no circumstances approach his work with dogmatic prepossessions. Bengel says, "A living faith is the first qualification of a biblical interpreter;" and Landerer says, "The interpreter must be led by the spirit of truth which rules in the Bible." Absolute freedom from prepossessions is as impossible as it is uncalled for. Indifferent to the truth of the Scripture he can not and ought not to be.

The communication of the meaning of the biblical writer may be effected in three ways,—by simple translation, by paraphrase, and by commentary. Paraphrases have their justification in the pregnancy and fulness of Scripture. As for the commentator, he should not merely give grammatical criticisms, but give a clear insight into the organism and aim of the book upon which he is commenting.

IV. PRINCIPLES OF INTERPRETATION.—Departures from the true method of interpretation result from a failure to appreciate all the requirements of the exegete, and from a purpose, voluntary or involuntary, to put into the author's words a meaning which is not there. The first in point of historical origin is the allegorical method. The word comes from ἀλληγορεῖν, which means to say something else than is expressed in the language. The allegorist therefore seeks to uncover a meaning which is not apparent on the surface; the presumption being, that the Spirit has concealed a sense behind the words, of which the human writers were not even conscious. According to this principle, there is a simple meaning, but also another, which the interpreter is to detect. This method was carried to ridiculous extremes in the ancient church and during the middle ages; and Luther says, "When I was a monk, I allegorized every thing; but now I have given up allegorizing, and my first and best art is to explain the Scriptures according to the simple sense (simplici sensu); for it is in the literal sense that power, doctrine, and art reside." The dogmatic method led to about the same results as the allegorical. The interpreter approaches the Bible with a rule of faith which is the norm of interpretation. In a special sense is this true of Roman-Catholic interpreters, who may not depart from the ecclesiastical tradition and the decrees of councils. Löhmis well expresses it, when he says (p. 151), "As a diplomat must explain and look at every thing in the spirit, and with an eye to the interest, of his prince . . . so must the Catholic expositor follow the instructions, and interpret in the spirit, of the Catholic Church." Interpretation is thus made in a true sense of the word impossible.

The so-called rational method, according to which the interpreter is to approach the Bible with a mind absolutely devoid of prepossessions, did the very thing which its advocates professed to deprecate. The last method is the so-called emphatic method, by which the meaning of every special word is emphasized, and, as far as possible, enlarged.

V. HISTORY.—The interpretation of Scripture flourished long before hermeneutics was reduced to a science, just as preaching was practised before there was a science of homiletics. Not only the rabbins, but also Christ and the apostles, interpreted the Old Testament; the only difference being that the latter nowhere prove a religious and ethical principle which is false (Landerer). The rabbins and Philo both practised the allegorizing method; the former using it as a bridge to the ceremonial laws and false Messianic hopes which we meet in Christ's time; the latter, to Neo-Platonism. The apostolic fathers likewise applied it to extract from the Old Testament that which was specifically Christian. This was the case with Clement of Rome, Barnabas, and Justin Martyr, who speaks of the gift of interpretation as a special grace, but derives the capacity to allegorize from this. The real home of this method was Alexandria. Clement, who spoke of all Scripture as being uttered, as it were, in a parable (Strom., V. 575), was followed by Origen, who vigorously pursued this method, and found three senses in Scripture, corresponding to the three divisions of man's nature, — body, soul, and spirit. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) carried allegorizing to a great excess in his commentaries on the Old Testament.

The Antiochian school was the birthplace of a principle of interpretation opposed to that of Origen. It sought to do justice to the literal sense, and to the historical environment of the biblical authors, and found its principal advocate in Theodore, Bishop of Mopsuestia (d. 429). His somewhat jejune method did not pass over to Chrysostom (d. 407), who, however, practised allegorizing in moderation, and more moderately than Theodoret (d. 457), in his commentaries on the Old Testament.

The contemporary exegetical productions of the Western Church were neither as extensive nor as important as those of the East. Jerome (d. 420) deserves the first mention, on account of his philological attainments. He not only advocates the triple sense of Origen, but even speaks of a "forest of senses" (silva sensuum, Ep. 64). Augustine (d. 430), in his rules for the treatment of the Scriptures (De Doctr. Christ., III.), gives some valuable hints, and emphasizes the importance of the literal sense. Gregory the Great (d. 604), in his exposition of Job, does almost every thing else but explain the literal meaning of the text. Isidore of Seville (d. 636) only made a collection from the works of his predecessors. Walafrid Strabo's (d. 849) Glosses (Glossa ordinaria in biblia) continued to be used for a long time, and were cited by Petrus Lombardus (d. 1164) as the authority (auctoritas dicit). More valuable contributions were offered in the Orient by Ecumenius (tenth century), Theophylact (d. 1107), and Euthymius Zigabenus (twelfth century). Nicolaus of Lyra in Normandy (d. 1310) dealt more honestly with the text in his Postilla Perpetua, but shows the influence of the humanism which later affected Laurentius Valla (d. 1457), Faber Stapulensis (d. 1536), and especially Erasmus (d. 1536), in their Annotationes.

The Reformation marks a new period in the history of biblical interpretation. Luther and Melancthon only cursorily give hints of their exegetical principles; but both wrote extensive commentaries, and avoid the allegorical method except where it may serve the purpose of illustration. Zwingli also wrote commentaries, and made it his main end to get at the grammatical sense. But the great commentator of the Reformation was John Calvin, whose principles of interpretation are enlarged upon in his Prefaces to the Psalms and Romans. He was strongly opposed to allegorizing, and sought to reproduce the author's train of thought.

Hermeneutics was first treated as a special science in the Lutheran Church by Flacius, in his Clavis Sac. Script. (Basel, 1567), Franz, in his Tract. philol. de interpr. Sac. Script. (Wit., 1619), and especially by Glassius, Philol. Sacra (Jena, 1629, ed. Buddæus, 1727). The intense dogmatism which followed in the Lutheran Church was opposed by the historical method which the Arminian Grotius (d. 1645) pursued in his Annotationes on the whole Bible. But of more influence upon exegesis was the Pietism of the latter part of the seventeenth century, which regarded it more as an exercise of worship than a work of science. Spener (d. 1705) interpreted several of the New-Testament writings under the influence of this theory; but Bengel (d. 1752) followed with the keen and suggestive notes of his Gnomon (Tüb., 1742); and a few years later Ernesti (d. 1781) became the eloquent champion of a strictly philological and grammatical exegesis in his Institutio interpretis N. T. (Lips., 1761, 5th ed., 1809, Eng. trans. by Terrot, 1843). Without denying its divine character, he held that the Bible should be interpreted by the same rules as any other book. Semler (d. 1791), on the other hand, advocated the so-called historical method, according to which the interpreter places himself in the environment of the writers. Ernesti's principles were followed by Beck (Monogrammata herm. libr. N. T., Lips., 1803) and Keil (Lehrb. d. Herm. d. N. T., Leip., 1810); Semler's, by Bretschneider (Hist.-dogm. Ausleg. d. N. T., Leip., 1806), and, to a greater or less extent, by the exegetes of the rationalistic period, — Paulus (d. 1851), and others. In this century criticism has seen itself forced by the works of Strauss, and the historical investigations of the Tübingen school, to pursue a strictly historical method. But in the mean time Winer, by his Grammar (Leip., 1822), had laid the "sure foundation of New-Testament exegesis." Thus the exegesis of the last two generations has been built up on a grammatical-historical foundation. See EXEGESIS and INTRODUCTION.

HERMES and the HERMESIANS. Georg Hermes, b. at Dreyerwalde, Westphalia, April 22, 1775; d. at Bonn, May 26, 1831; studied theology and philosophy in the academy of Münster; was ordained priest in 1799, and in 1819 appointed professor of theology at Bonn. His writings are few (Ueber die innere Wahrheit des Christenthums, 1805; Einleitung in die christkatholische Theologie, I. 1819, II. 1829; Christkatholische Dogmatik, edited after his death by his pupil, J. H. Achterfeld, 1834); but the influence he exercised personally and as a teacher was both wide and deep. Not only the theological faculty of Bonn — Achterfeld, professor in morals and practical theology; Braun, in church history and exegesis; Vogel-sang, in dogmatics; and Müller, in exegesis — was wholly devoted to his ideas, but also the episcopal seminaries throughout the whole Rhine region; and in many places, as, for instance, in the diocese of Cologne, as long as Spiegel was archbishop, his pupils were openly and avowedly preferred. Nevertheless, as his power and influence increased, his relation to the Roman-Catholic Church was questioned. There was no dogma which he did not accept fully and without qualification; but his assertion, that, even if the dogmas of the Roman-Catholic Church had no other authority, reason would, when rightly applied, be compelled by itself to accept them, indicated a principle of speculation incompatible with the maxims of the Roman-Catholic Church; and the bold application of this principle to the development of their dogmatic system naturally appeared very dangerous in the eyes of the hierarchy. In September, 1835, a papal brief suddenly and unexpectedly met the movement with a detailed and unconditional condemnation. The Hermesians tried to avoid the blow by declaring that the views condemned by the papal brief were indeed abominable, but they were not theirs, nor were they to be found in the writings of Hermes; and two of the most prominent pupils of Hermes — Braun of Bonn, and Elvenich of Breslau — repaired to Rome to urge a new investigation. In this they failed, however; and at home a strong reaction set in against the Hermesians, especially in the diocese of Cologne, where Droste-Vischering had succeeded Spiegel. In a short time the movement died out, or was suppressed.

HERMIAS, the author of a satire on Greek philosophy (διασυρμός των έξω φιλοσόφων), written from a Christian stand-point, not without wit and adroitness, though without scientific interest, and probably belonging to the close of the second or the beginning of the third century. Neither the book nor the author is mentioned in ancient literature. The book was edited by Seiler (Zürich, 1553), Dommerich (Halle, 1764), and Otto in Corpus Apolog., vol. IX. (Jena, 1872, with ample introductory notes. WAGENMANN.

HERMOGENES, an African heretic, a painter by profession, and probably a resident of Carthage, against whom Tertullian wrote his Adversus Hermogenem, between 199 and 207 (cf. BONWETSCH: Die Schriften Tertullians, Bonn, 1878). His principal tenet, the root of all his errors, was the eternity of matter. He seems to have written books, and he had pupils; but he formed no school. Theodoret, Origen, and Theophilus of Antioch, also wrote against him; but the notices of him found outside of Tertullian are often difficult to reconcile with each other. G. UHLHORN.

HER'MON (peak), the present Jebel-resh-Sheikh (the chief mountain), the highest point of Anti-Lebanon, situated forty miles north-east of the Sea of Galilee, and thirty miles south-west of Damascus; rises 9,033 feet above the Mediterranean, and about 11,000 feet above the valley of the Jordan. It consists of three distinct peaks, and is covered with ice and snow all the year round, though in summer time only in the ravines. It formed the north-eastern boundary of Israel (Deut. iii. 8; Josh. xii. 1), and is often mentioned in the Old Testament. In the New Testament it is not mentioned, unless it be the scene of the transfiguration (Matt. xvii.; Mark ix.). In many points it fits the narrative of the Gospels better than Tabor.

HER'OD. — [1. The Herodian Family, a family which for a century played a most conspicuous part in Jewish history, and witnessed the birth and career of Jesus of Nazareth, and the progress of the Apostolic Church; came in conflict with, used, intermarried with, and finally exterminated, the once noble Asmonean family (see MACCABEES); catered at any cost to the Roman power, and in more than one instance won the warmest friendship of its emperors; ascended the throne of Judæa, rebuilt the temple, and gave to the kingdom an external glory and importance which were never excelled, except in the reigns of David and Solomon. It gave birth to men of fine intellects, strong wills, and unusual talent for ruling. — a talent, which, as exhibited in Herod the Great, as has been well said, might, with other environments, have won for him a name amongst the great rulers of nations. But, with these natural endowments of intellect, they combined an unscrupulousness in securing the ends of their ambition, and a licentiousness, which have seldom been equalled in history. Herod the Great's throne was bathed in the blood of his relations; and the intermarriages within the family were so numerous, that their genealogy becomes a problem no less complicated than astounding. But in the now violent, now loathsome deaths of some of their number, one may be permitted to see the nemesis of defied law.

The founder of the family was Antipas, an

Idumean (Joseph., Antiq., XIV. 1, 3), who was made governor (στρατηγός) of Idumea by Alexander Jannæus (d. 78). He was succeeded in this position by his son Antipater (d. 43), the father of Herod the Great. He was an ambitious man, and saw in the weak will of the Asmonean prince, Hyrcanus II., a handle for his plans. When the latter was forced by his brother Aristobulus (in 69) to renounce his royal claims and high priestly office, Antipater's artifice succeeded in inducing him to escape from Jerusalem, and assert his rights. The close friendship between them continued. They together espoused Pompey's cause (64 B.C.), and, after the battle of Pharsalus, Cæsar's (48 B.C.). Cæsar rewarded both, confirmed Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, but made the wily Idumean procurator of Judæa (47). The object of his ambition was probably gratified. It remained for his son to win the name and dignities of the royal office.]

2. Herod the Great, king of Judæa from 37 to 4 B.C.; of Idumean descent, and second son of Antipater. He was a man of restless ambition, strong will, and keen intellect, but cruel and unscrupulous. When, in 47 B.C., Antipater was rewarded for his services to Cæsar with Roman citizenship and the procuratorship of Judæa, Herod, who was then twenty-five (the πέντε καὶ δέκα of Josephus, Antiq., XIV. 9, 2 is probably a mistake of the copyist), was intrusted with the governorship of Galilee, and soon afterwards with the procuratorship of Cœlesyria. He soon displayed his ability by ridding the territory of dangerous bands of robbers, and winning, by a rapid collection of tribute-money, the favor of Cassius (after Cæsar's assassination 44 B.C.). In order to secure the confidence of his Jewish subjects, he put away his wife Doris, and married Mariamne, the grand-daughter of the high priest Hyrcanus. In 41 B.C. he was appointed tetrarch by Anthony, whose favor he had purchased with rich gifts. Forced the following year, by an irruption of the Parthians, to abandon Jerusalem, he fled to Rome. By a generous use of money he secured the favor of Anthony and Augustus, and through their influence was named king of Judæa by the senate. This, however, did not relieve him of the necessity of winning his kingdom by arms. After defeating Antigonus, the Asmonean king of Judæa, in a pitched battle in Galilee, he besieged Jerusalem, and took it in 37 B.C.

Herod's reign divides itself into three periods. During the first period, stretching from 37 to 28 B.C., he firmly establishes his throne; the second, from 28 to 14 B.C., is marked by a brilliant patronage of architecture, and close intimacy with the Roman government; the third, from 14 to 4 B.C., is the period of domestic troubles, cruelty, and growing melancholy.

The First Period (37-28 B.C.). — With great shrewdness and boldness Herod proceeded to remove the influences hostile to his power. Antigonus was executed, and forty-five of his more eminent supporters. Hyrcanus, who was living at Babylon, was recalled, that he might be under his eye. A Jewish priest of Babylon was appointed high priest; but, to appease his step-mother Alexandra, Herod soon after substituted in his stead her son Aristobulus, then seventeen years old. His Maccabean descent and popularity aroused the king's suspicion, and paid the forfeit of a violent death by drowning. Herod simulated sorrow before the Jewish people, but, being summoned to answer for the crime before Anthony, was acquitted. Before setting out to meet Anthony, he provided that Mariamne should be killed, in case of his being found guilty. His plea was, that she might not come into the embraces of Anthony. But her love for her husband was from thenceforth changed into hatred. Another of Herod's enemies was Cleopatra. Anthony, whom she was then ruling by her charms, compelled Herod to surrender the territory of Jericho into her hands, and to institute a campaign against the Arabian king to compel him to pay the tribute he owed her. In 31 B.C. he ordered the execution of Hyrcanus, and, after Anthony's defeat at Actium, went to meet the victor Augustus at Rhodes, and had his royal title confirmed. His brilliant hospitality to Augustus at Ptolemæus (30 B.C.), and his generous treatment of his army on its way to Egypt, were rewarded by the addition of Gadara, Gaza, Samaria, and other cities, to his kingdom. In 28 Mariamne was accused by Herod of infidelity, and executed. He vainly endeavored to drown his remorse, and forget his passionate love in a tumult of lust. He was only aroused from his depression by the suspicion of plots against his throne. Alexandra was murdered, and the sons of Babas, who were of Maccabæan descent.

The Second Period (28-14 B.C.). — Once firmly established on his throne, Herod inaugurated a period of architectural splendor and munificence. He erected a theatre in Jerusalem, and an amphitheatre outside of its walls, introducing the Greek games in honor of Augustus. He built fortresses in Galilee and Perea, and also in Jerusalem. The old city of Samaria he reconstructed, calling it Sebaste, and erected the new city of Casarea on the site of Straton's tower. Twelve years were consumed in this last work: a theatre and an amphitheatre, with a temple dedicated to Augustus, and overlooking the city, were among its more magnificent buildings. The introduction of heathen games, and the construction of heathen temples, enraged the Jews to the highest pitch. They plotted the king's death; but the plot was betrayed, and the guilty parties, executed. Herod endeavored to win their affection by munificent charities and by politic accommodation to their religious prejudices. In the year 25 B.C. his generous gifts alleviated the misery of a widespread famine; and five years afterwards he began the reconstruction of the temple. It was built with a lavish outlay; and, in deference to Jewish scruples, a thousand priests were employed as workmen upon the temple proper.

In the mean time Herod was winning more and more favor with the Roman emperor by timely aid to the army of the proconsul of Egypt in 21 B.C., and other evidences of loyalty. He sent his sons Alexander and Aristobulus to Rome to be educated. Augustus invited them to his palace, added to the king's dominion Trachonitis, Batanea, and Auranitis, and regarded Herod as his best friend after Agrippa.

The Third Period (14-4 B.C.). — The last years of Herod's life were darkened by suspicion, and made wretched by domestic troubles. His activity in building extends over into this period. He built Antipatris on the site of the Kapharsaba, the fortresses of Cypros and Phasaelis near Jericho, and beyond the confines of Palestine he adorned Ascalon, Tyre, Sidon, Damascus, Tripoli, Ptolemais, and other cities, and even Athens and Lacedæmon. The activity, however, which made him famous outside of his kingdom, im-bittered his own subjects, the Jews, against him.

Herod's court, with his many wives and eunuchs and hætere, was a scene of jealousy and plots. The first to be struck by the tempest were Herod's two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus, whom he sentenced to be executed 7 B.C. It was their murder which drew from Augustus the remark that he would rather be Herod's hog than his son. Then followed suspicion against Antipater, Herod's son by Doris, whom his father recalled from Rome, and executed. The restless discontent of the Jews, breaking out in continual acts of violence, added to the unhappiness of the monarch. A loathsome disease set in, his feet swelling, and his bowels being afflicted with ulcers. He went to the baths of Callirrhoe, at Jericho, for relief; and there he died, suffering great pains, but not before he had ordered the elders of the chief cities of the land to be confined in the amphitheatre, and to be executed at his death, that there might be some tears over his grave. This order the officers dared to disobey.

Herod was a man of fine physical powers, rare force of intellect and will, keen insight, calm presence of mind in the midst of difficulties, and daring courage. The combination of these qualities fitted him to be a general and a ruler. Nor did he lack generosity and noble magnanimity. But a bad environment and a passionate nature turned him into a heartless, despotic, and suspicious tyrant.

[It was in Herod's reign that Christ was born. The adroit invitation to the Wise Men from the East to return to Jerusalem and tell about the whereabouts of the child Jesus, under the plea of desiring to go and worship him, is in exact accord with Herod's shrewd cunning, as the destruction of the children of Bethlehem was in harmony with the otherwise suspicious and cruel policy of his last years.] SIEFFERT.

3. Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa (Luke iii. 1) from 4 B.C. to 39 A.D., and son of Herod the Great, by his fourth wife, Malthace. Like his father, he was ambitious, and lavished large sums on public buildings. He built Tiberias, which he named in honor of the emperor. His first wife was the daughter of King Aretas; but he put her away, in order to marry Herodias, the wife of Herod Philip, his brother (not the tetrarch Philip, who married Salome). Instigated by Herodias, he went to Rome, to secure the title of king. Her ambition was his ruin. He was charged with crimes by the emissaries of Agrippa, and banished by Caligula to Lyons. Antipas is mentioned several times in the New Testament. He was openly rebuked by John the Baptist for adultery, and, at the instigation of his enraged wife Herodias, put the prophet to death (Mark vi. 16-25). Jesus was sent to Antipas by Pilate, at his trial, on the ground that he belonged to his jurisdiction.

The king had been desirous of seeing Jesus (Luke xxiii. 7-12). The Gospels represent him as superstitious, cunning, and depraved.

4. Archelaus, ethnarch (4 B.C.-6 A.D.). See ARCHELAUS.

5. Philip, tetrarch of Gaulonitis, Auranitis, etc. (4 B.C.-34 A.D.), and son of Herod the Great, by his fifth wife, Cleopatra. Unlike the rest of the Herodian family, he was distinguished for moderation and justice, and seems to have kept aloof from the intrigues of his house. He married Salome, the daughter of Herod Philip. He is mentioned Luke iii. 1.

6. Herod Philip, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, daughter of Simon. He occupied a private station. His wife was Herodias, whom Antipas seduced. In Mark vi. 17 he is called simply Philip.

HERODIANS are mentioned in association with the Pharisees as enemies of Jesus (Matt. xxii. 16; Mark iii. 6, xii. 13), and were probably followers of Herod Antipas, or the Herodian family generally. As such, they favored the Roman Government, and opposed the Jews, who were hostile to the Roman Government. Some of the fathers represent them as a separate Jewish sect (the fourth), whose peculiarity consisted in this, that they regarded Herod the Great as the Messiah (Epiphanius, Hær., XX.; Tertullian, De præscript. Append.). But, as neither Josephus nor Philo mentions such a sect, we are justified in regarding this view as based upon a misunderstanding of the name, which confused a school of political opinion with a religious sect. See STEUCH: Dissert. de Herodianis, Lund., 1706; LEUSCHNER: De secta Herod., Hirschberg, 1751; and [SCHÜRER: *N. HERODIAS, the grand-daughter of Herod the Great, through his son Aristobulus and Berenice, the daughter of Herod's sister, Salome. Following the wish of her grandfather, she married his son Herod (Matt. xiv. 3; called Philip in Mark vi. 17), who lived as a private man. Herod Antipas, on a visit to her husband and his brother at Rome, was enamoured of her, and seduced her to become his wife, putting away his former wife, the daughter of King Aretas. This relation was denounced by John the Baptist as adultery; and the latter was put to death by the offended jealousy of Herodias (Mark vi. 25). Her ambition precipitated her husband's deposition, but she followed him into exile. SIEFFERT.

HERRNHUT, a town of Saxony, about fifty miles from Dresden, at the foot of Mount Hutberg; was founded by Zinzendorf in 1722 for the Moravian Brethren, who are sometimes called Herrnhutters, after it.

HERVÆUS, b. in Maine; entered, about 1160, the Benedictine monastery of Bourg-Dieu in Berry, and wrote commentaries, of which those on Isaiah and the Epistles of Paul have been printed (the former in 1721, the latter in 1541) among the works of Auzelm, both in MIGNE, Patrol. Lat., vol. 181.

HERVÆUS, Natalis (Hervé de Nedellec), b. at Brittany, whence surnamed Brito; entered the Dominican order; studied in Paris, and lectured there on theology 1307-09; became general of his order in 1318, and died at Narbonne 1323. His Quodlibeta were printed in Venice, 1486; his tractate, De potestate ecclesie et papali, in Paris, 1500; and his commentaries on Petrus Lombardus, in Venice, 1505.

HERVEY, James, popular religious writer; b. at Hardingstone, near Northampton, Feb. 26, 1714; d. rector of Weston-Favell, Dec. 25, 1758. He was educated at Oxford, there came under the influence of John Wesley, and was for a time inclined to follow him, but finally adopted a strongly Calvinistic creed. He is remembered for his Meditations among the Tombs, a treatise nowadays often quoted by title, but seldom read. This, with others of a similar character, was printed under the caption Meditations and Contemplations, London, 1746. 1747, 2 vols. Once these volumes were side by side with Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress and the Whole Duty of Man, constituting the entire library of many a cottage in Great Britain. An edition of his works with Memoir was published in London, 1797, 7 vols. See TYERMANN: Oxford Methodists, New York, 1873.

HESS, Johann Jakob, b. at Zürich, Oct. 21, 1741; d. there May 29, 1828; was appointed preacher in his native city 1777, and antistes (that is, president of the clergy of the canton) in 1795. He was a very prolific writer, but his most remarkable works are his Geschichte der drei letzten Lebensjahre Jesu (Zürich, 1768-73, 6 vols.), and Jugendgeschichte Jesu (Zürich, 1773), which he afterwards combined and condensed into his Leben Jesu, Zürich, 1781, 2 vols. He also wrote Die Apostelgeschichte (Zürich, 1775, 3 vols.), and Die Geschichte der Israeliten (Zürich, 1776-88, 12 vols.), etc. He was a man of solid though not brilliant talents, a pillar of the church of his native canton for thirty-three years, universally esteemed, and a champion of historical and scriptural Christianity. His life has been written by Dr. H. Escher (Zürich, 1837), Gessner (1829), and Zimmermann (1878). JUSTUS HEER.

HESSE. On account of the great and frequent changes which have taken place, not only in the political organization of the country, but also in its boundary-lines, especially in 1803, 1805, 1815, and 1866, the history of the Hessian Church cannot be told, unless a great number of details are set forth which have no general interest. The state-church is evangelical, and according to the census of Dec. 1, 1875, it contains 602,850 members, divided into 418 congregations, with 445 ministers. It was organized by law of April 23, 1875, and is an imitation of the Prussian Church establishment. The Roman-Catholic inhabitants, numbering 250,130, divided into 146 parishes, belong under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Mayence. The relation between the Roman curia and the Hessian government was established by the bulls Provida solersque (1821) and Ad dominici gregis custodiam (1827), and the edicts of Oct. 2, 1829 and Jan. 30, 1830, but proved unsatisfactory to both parties. A secret convention was made in 1854 with Bishop Ketteler of Mayence, but repudiated by the curia. Since 1866 all ecclesiastical relations have been arranged by secular legislation, to which the Roman curia, of course, has opposed its Non possumus. See MÜNSCHER: Geschichte d. Hess. ref. Kirche, Cassel, 1850; VILMAR: Geschichte d. Confessions-bestandes in Hessen, Marburg, 1860. [II. HEPPE: Kircheng. beider Hessen, Marburg, 1876.] K. KOEHLER.

HESSHUSEN, Tilemann, b. at Wesel, in the duchy of Cleve, Nov. 3, 1527; d. at Helmstädt, Sept. 25, 1588; studied theology at Wittenberg; travelled in England and France; and was in 1553 appointed superintendent and pastor primarius at Goslar. That office he resigned in 1556. 1557 he was expelled from Rostock, where he had become professor in the university, and pastor of the Church of St. James. 1559 he was discharged as professor at Heidelberg, and superintendent-general of the Palatinate. 1562 he was by an armed force driven out of Magdeburg, where he had been appointed first preacher at the Church of St. John. 1569 he resigned his position as court-preacher at Neuburg. 1573 he fled from Jena, where he had become professor of theology. 1577 he was deposed as bishop of Samland. Fate had overtaken him. He who triumphantly had represented Flacius as teaching that the Devil was a creator as well as God, was now proved to teach that there were two divine beings, both omnipotent. Defending himself, the old gladiator retreated from the episcopal seat of Samland to a professor's chair at Helmstädt; and, though wounded, he succeeded in raising new whirlwinds of strife. He could hold peace with none. Censure, condemnation, excommunication, persecution, were, if not his heart's desire, his conception of duty; and in his will he accuses himself of having been too lenient in denunciation, too slow to attack. Nevertheless, Heppé's judgment of him is too hard, calling him "one of the most odious Lutheran popes of the time, overbearing to one side, and crouching to the other, — a zealot and a weather-cock." He was a consistent representative of that stand-point which makes no distinction between Christianity and theology, between the purity of faith and denominational loyalty, between church discipline and police discipline.

HESYCHASTS, The, a mystic and quietistic sect which originated in the Greek Church, among the monks of Mount Athos, in the fourteenth century, and caused the last great doctrinal controversy, within the Byzantine period, of that church. At the time when Mount Athos had reached the very acme of its fame and influence, during the reign of Andronicus the Younger, when Symeon was abbot, the monks began to speak of a divine light, uncreated, and yet capable of being communicated, — the same as surrounded the Lord on Mount Thabor, but approachable by a process of complete seclusion from the world, and persistent introspection; whence the name of the sect, ἡσυχασταί, "quietists." Such ideas were by no means strange among the Greek monks. Pseudo-Dionysius speaks of some extraordinary means of devotion by which men are drawn nearer, intellectually, to God. Similar hints may be found in the writings of Maximus. Most probably the movement started on Mount Athos would have run its course unnoticed, if it had not been mixed up with the political and politico-ecclesiastical fermentation of the time, especially with the question of union with Rome. At the head of the Hesyachasts stood Palamas, afterwards archbishop of Thessalonica. Their great adversary was Barlaam, a learned monk, who, during the reign of Andronicus the Elder, had come from Calabria to Constantinople. Barlaam protested that the divine light which the Hesyachasts felt diffused through them when they sat quietly in a secluded corner and looked at their navel (whence their name, ὀυαλόσφραγχοι) must belong to the essence of God, if it is uncreated, and cannot without blasphemy be said to be communicable, if it belongs to the essence of God. Palamas explained that a distinction must be made between the essence of God (οὐσία) and the activity of God (ἐνεργεῖν); that the activity of God as a mere movement of his essence cannot be said to be created, and yet it is most certainly communicable. But Barlaam rejoined that this was simply to teach the existence of two gods; and now the case went before the "first" synod of Constantinople (1341), presided over by the Emperor Andronicus himself. Barlaam, however, got frightened when he stood before the assembly. People suspected him of being willing to sacrifice something of the famous Greek orthodoxy for the sake of his unionistic aspirations, and he felt that they suspected him. He recanted, and returned to Italy. A friend of him, Gregorius Acindynus, continued the controversy, but was condemned by the "second" synod. On the "third" synod the course seemed to have turned: the Barlaamites succeeded in condemning and deposing the Patriarch John. But the "fourth" synod, presided over by the Emperor Cantacuzenus (1351), finally settled the matter in favor of the Hesyachasts.

HESYCHIUS is a name of frequent occurrence in the history of ancient ecclesiastical literature. We notice: (1) The editor or reviser of the Greek text of the Bible, that is the Septuagint and the New Testament, mentioned by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., VIII. 13) as bishop of Egypt, and martyred under Maximinus. Jerome knew his work, but rejected it. Historically, however, it has some interest to notice that a revision of the text of the New Testament should have been deemed necessary already in the third century. (2) The presbyter of Jerusalem who died 428 or 433, and of whose writings some have been published in Greek or Latin version (Explanations in Leviticum, Basel, 1527, etc.), while others still remain in manuscript. (3) The else unknown grammarian of Alexandria, who, probably in the fourth century, wrote the famous Greek dictionary, invaluable to the philologists, and also of some use to theologians, though the biblical glossæ are mostly later interpolations. Last and best edition by Schmidt, Jena, 1858-68, 5 vols. quarto. See WACHSMUTH: De fontibus Suidæ, Leipzig, 1863.

HETÆRIÆ denotes, in the terminology of the Roman jurisprudence from the time of the emperors, any association or assembly for purposes not recognized by law; and it was as heteriæ that the Christian assemblies were first interfered with by the Roman authorities. See PLINIUS: Epist. X.

HETHERINGTON, William M., D.D., LL.D., b. near Dumfries, Scotland, June 4, 1803; d. at Glasgow, May 23, 1865. Educated at Edinburgh, ordained in the Church of Scotland, he joined the Free Church, and died as professor of apologetics and systematic theology in the Free Church College, Glasgow. He is favorably known by his History of the Church of Scotland, Edinburgh, 1841, last ed., 1853, 2 vols. (reprinted in 1 vol., N.Y.), and his History of the Westminster Assembly, Edinburgh, 1843. Dr. Alexander Duff edited a course of his Lectures, and prefaced it with a biographical sketch. Apologetics of the Christian Faith, Edinburgh, 1867.

HEUMANN, Christoph August, b. at Alstädt, Thuringia, Aug. 3, 1681; d. at Göttingen, May 1, 1764; studied at Jena; traveled in Germany, Holland, and France, and was appointed inspector of the theological seminary of Eisenach in 1709, inspector of the gymnasium of Göttingen in 1717, and professor of theology at the university of Göttingen in 1754, from which position he retired in 1758. He was an extremely prolific writer on historical, theological, and philosophical topics. Of his theological writings, the principal are his translation of the New Testament (Hanover, 1748), his commentary to the New Testament (Hanover, 1750-63, 12 vols.), and his Erweis dass die Lehre der reformirten Kirche von dem heil-Abendmale die rechte sei, published after his death.

HEUSSER, Mrs. Meta, the best female songwriter and hymnist in the German language; b. April 6, 1797; d. Jan. 2, 1876. She was the fourth daughter of pastor Diethelm Schweizer, a relative and friend of Lavater, and spent her quiet life in Hirzel, a beautiful Swiss mountain village, in sight of Mount Righi and the Lake of Luzerne. She married Dr. Heusser, an eminent physician, and became the mother of a large family. But her household duties did not prevent her from singing, "as the bird sings among the branches," to express her love of Nature and Nature's God, and the joys and sorrows of her heart. She never dreamed that her lays would be given to the world; but her friends, after many vain efforts, obtained her consent to publish anonymously some of them in Albert Knapp's Christoterpe (1834). They made a deep impression, and passed into many collections and German hymn-books of Europe and America, especially the Easter hymn, Lamm das gelitten, und Löwe der siegreich gerungen, and the Jesus hymn, O Jesus Christ, mein Leben. In 1857 Albert Knapp edited a volume of her poems, under the title Lieder einer Verborgenen. It was followed by a second series (Leipzig, 1867), under her real name, which at last became generally known. A selection from both volumes was translated into English by Miss Jane Borthwick of Scotland (well known as the translator of Hymns from the Land of Luther), under the title Alpine Lyrics (Edinburgh and London, 1875). Mrs. Heusser was a woman of rare genius, piety, and loveliness of character. Her memory was stored with the choicest poetry, secular and religious. Knapp says that her "tender, spiritual lays far surpass those of former German poetesses;" and Koch, in his History of German Hymnology (3d ed.), calls her "the most eminent and noble among all the female poets of the whole Evangelical Church. Her poems flow freely from the fresh fountain of a heart in constant, holy communion with God." Mrs. Heusser wrote, at the request of her children, a chronicle of her family, but strictly forbade its publication.

HEWIT, Nathaniel, b. at New London, Conn., Aug. 28, 1788; d. at Bridgeport, Conn., Feb. 3, 1867. He was graduated at Yale College 1808, and pastor of the Old School (Presbyterian) Church, Bridgeport, 1853-67. He took a leading part in the early temperance agitation.

HEYLYN, Peter, church historian; b. at Burford, near Oxford, Nov. 29, 1600; d. in London, May 8, 1662, and buried in Westminster Abbey. He graduated at Magdalen College, Oxford, and lectured there on geography. These lectures were published in 1621, passed through eight editions, and appeared in an enlarged form, under the title Cosmography, 1662. He was appointed chaplain to the king in 1629, at the recommendation of Laud; in 1631 prebend of Westminster, and afterwards subdean; and was presented with several other livings. In 1631 appeared his History of St. George. He was a high Anglican, and very bitter against the Puritans. At the accusation of Prynne, whose Histriomastix he had analyzed for Charles, he was deprived by the Long Parliament of his livings, worth eight hundred pounds. He afterwards was plundered of his library, and obliged to go about in disguise to save himself from further hardships. At the restoration he preached a jubilant sermon to a large audience in Westminster Abbey. Heylyn was a patient investigator of history, and his learning was held in high esteem by Charles I.; but his writings display violent prejudices and controversial rancor. The Presbyterians were the special objects of his spleen; but even the witty churchman, Thomas Fuller, at the publication of his Church History of Britain (1655), did not escape his attacks. The latter, in an elegant epistle, however, quaintly asked, "Why should Peter fall out with Thomas, both being disciples of the same Lord and Master?" The Aërius Redivivus, or History of the Presbyterians, containing the Beginnings and Successes of that Active Sect, their Opposition to Monarchical and Episcopal Government, etc. (from 1536 to 1647), 2d ed., 1672, is a violent arraignment of the Presbyterians for being actuated with the spirit of the Devil, and the promoters of sedition, murder, and other crimes. In 1660 appeared his Historia Quinquarticularis, or a Historical Declaration of the Judgment of Western Churches, and more particularly of the Church of England, in the Five Controverted Points reproached with the Name of Arminianism, reprinted (1681) in the work named below. Of his many other writings, the best is Eccles. Restaurata. The History of the Reformation of the Church of England (from Edward VI. to 1566), 1661, reprinted in 2 vols. by the Ecclesiastical History Society, Cambridge, 1849. This work is written in a good style, and, in spite of Bishop Burnet's disparaging criticisms (Preface to Hist. of the Reformation), is in the main reliable, although strongly biased in the direction of High Anglicanism. In London, 1681, there appeared a reprint of several of his Historical and Miscellaneous Tracts. To this volume was prefixed his Life, written by his son-in-law, Dr. BARNARD, London, 1681, reprinted in the Cambridge edition, 1849,—a quaint and bombastic work. The alleged mistakes of this Life led to the preparation of another by VERNON, 1682. On pp. ceviii sqq. of the Cambridge edition will be found a list of Heylyn's writings.

HEYNLIN DE LAPIDE, Johannes, one of the last eminent representatives of scholasticism; a native of Germany; studied at Leipzig, Basel, and Paris, and settled in 1473 at Basel, as teacher of philosophy and theology. He was a decided realist, and caused, first in Basel, afterwards at Tübingen, whither he moved in 1477, so violent a contest between realism and nominalism, that he finally determined to retire altogether from the world. From 1487 till his death in 1496 he lived in a Carthusian monastery in Basel. His commentary on Aristotle was written during his stay in Paris, but not published until many years later, by his pupil, Amerbach. See his Life, by F. Fischer, Basel, 1851.

HEZEKIAH (חֶזְקִיָּהוּ, חֶזְקִיָּה, or abbreviated חֶזְקִיָּה, חֶזְקִיָּה, "Jehovah strengthens"), son of Ahaz, and at the age of twenty-five his successor on the throne of Judah; reigned twenty-nine years, or, according to the usual chronology, from 725 to 696 B.C. But he seems to have begun his reign before 725; for the fall of Samaria (in 722) happened in its sixth year (2 Kings xviii. 10). The biblical sources of his life are 2 Kings xviii.—xx., Isa. xxxv.—xxxix., 2 Chron. xxix.—xxxii., and the contemporary utterances of Isaiah, and the Book of Micah, which was written in the first six years of Hezekiah's reign. He had no sooner ascended the throne than he entered upon a twofold policy; on the one side seeking to elevate his subjects by abolishing idolatry, and restoring the theocratic worship, and on the other to re-establish the independence of the kingdom by shaking off the yoke of Assyria. He began his reformatory activity by cleansing the temple, destroying the high places, and breaking in pieces the brazen serpent "that Moses had made" (2 Kings xviii. 4). Then followed the restoration of the worship of Jehovah. A great passover was celebrated, to which all the members of the remaining tribes living in Palestine were invited. It was celebrated at an unusual but not illegal time (Num. ix. 10-11), and lasted fourteen days. Idolatry continued to be prevalent in Judah during the first year of the reign, and was never wholly abolished by Hezekiah (2 Kings xxiii. 13; Isa. xxx. 22, xxxi. 7); but, by the irrefutable testimony of Isaiah (xxxvi. 7; comp. 2 Chron. xxx. 14, xxxi. 1), it was he, and not Josiah, who centralized the worship at Jerusalem, and destroyed the high places.

A great injury to the state was done by the aristocratic party, which perpetuated the unhealthy policy of Ahaz, and instead of bearing with resignation the Assyrian yoke, as Isaiah advised (x. 24, 27, xxx. 15 sqq.), clamored for an Egyptian alliance, which would enable them to shake off the Assyrian power. It was formerly thought that an alliance with Egypt was made soon after the beginning of Sennacherib's reign; and it would seem, from Isa. xxxvi. 1, that he combined with his campaign against Egypt one against Judah in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah's reign. But monumental records have shown that Sennacherib did not ascend the throne till 705 B.C.; so that his campaign against Egypt and Judah did not occur till the last period of Hezekiah's reign; and the false date of Isa. xxxvi. 1 is to be attributed to a wrong arrangement of the four incidents in Isa. xxxvi.—xxxix. Hezekiah purchased, as he thought, a permanent peace by the payment of an immense tribute (2 Kings xviii. 13 sqq.), but wrongly; for the king, after receiving the money, broke his word, and continued his march against Jerusalem. The city seemed to be hopelessly doomed (Isa. xxxvii. 1-3); but Isaiah predicted supernatural succor, which came in the descent of "the angel of the Lord, who smote the camp of the Assyrians" (Isa. xxxvii. 36). In the monumental records of Sennacherib's campaign against Hezekiah, this terrible calamity is not referred to; but a striking gap occurs in the account. After stating, "I shut him up in Jerusalem, the place of his residence, like a bird in a cage. I raised up walls against him, and closed up the exits of his city door," it suddenly breaks off, and does not speak of the city's having been taken. Herodotus (ii. 141) relates the remarkable story, that, when Sennacherib advanced upon Egypt, armies of mice, in answer to the prayer of the Egyptian king, Sethon, invaded the Assyrian camp by night, and gnawed away the quivers, bows, and the handles of the shields of the Assyrians, so that they fled the next morning in terror. He also mentions a stone statue of Sethon holding a mouse in his hand, which was preserved in the temple of Hephaestus. Ewald refers these two records to two different calamities, and supposes, with Josephus, that the angel of the Lord spread a virulent plague in the Assyrian army. However, the account of Herodotus points to this very thing (for mice were symbolical of plagues; 1 Sam. vi. 4), and is to be regarded as based upon a false reproduction of the causes of Sennacherib's disaster in Judah. The profound impression which this calamity made is seen in Ps. xlvi., lxxv., lxxvi., and in the honor in which Hezekiah was held by surrounding nations (2 Chron. xxxii. 23). The miraculous deliverance is also referred to in 1 Mace. vii. 41; 2 Mace. viii. 13; 3 Mace. vi. 5.

Hezekiah was taken ill after this event; but fifteen years were added to his life in answer to prayer (Isa. xxxviii. 5). The meaning of the sign on the sun-dial, which vouched for Hezekiah's recovery, is clear (Isa. xxxviii. 8). The life of the king, which was regarded as being at an end, was, as it were, put back fifteen years. As in the case of the sun standing still over Gibeon, there was, in this instance, no change of the usual relations of the sun and the earth. As at Gibeon the reference is only to an extraordinary continuance of the daylight, so here the reference is to a remarkable shining of the sun's rays, which stood in a relation of cause and effect to the prophet's knowledge and desire.

Hezekiah was one of the restorers of the שִׁירָה (that is, the instrumental and vocal music of the Levites), and revived the use of David's and Asaph's psalms. He also appointed a commission to edit the second collection of the Solomonic proverbs. [See the Histories of Israel by EWALD (vol. iii.) and STANLEY, who devotes a whole chapter (xxxviii.) to Hezekiah, and the art. Hezekiah in Smith's Bible Dictionary by Canon FARRAR.] OEHLER (DELITZSCH).

HICKS, ELIAS, a prominent minister of the society of Friends; b. at Hempstead, L.I., March 19, 1748; d. in Jericho, L.I., Feb. 27, 1830. He was a mechanic in the early part of his life, but later devoted himself to agriculture. When he was twenty-seven, to use his own words, he began to have "openings leading to the ministry," and subsequently became a noted preacher, and travelled extensively among the Yearly Meetings of American Friends, preaching. When the more liberal element of the society of Friends, in the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia in 1827, broke off from the more conservative wing, they were called Hicksites. They became Unitarians; but, although Mr. Hicks used ambiguous language concerning the Trinity, it can hardly be made out that he promulgated views subversive of the doctrine. He published Observations on Slavery, (N.Y., 1811), Extemporaneous Discourses (Phila., 1825), Journal of Religious Life and Labors (N.Y., 5th ed., 1832). See art. FRIENDS, etc.

HIERAPOLIS (Ἱεράπολις, "holy city"), a city of Phrygia, situated a few miles north of Laodicea, in the basin of Mæander, owed its name to its thermal springs. It received Christianity at the same time as Laodicea and Colosse, and is mentioned by Paul (Col. iv. 13). A council was held there in 173, under presidency of Apollinarius, its bishop; and the Cataphryges, a Montanist sect, were condemned.

HIERARCHY (from ἱερός, "sacred," and ἄρχων, "ruler") denotes a form of government in which the governing body claims to hold its power by divine injunction, and to transmit it through a sacramental act. The Roman Church probably presents the most perfect instance of a hierarchy which history ever saw, organized monarchically, the whole power centring in the Pope, and most minutely graded, both with respect to orders, — bishops, priests, deacons (the ordines juris divini), and subdeacons, acolytes, exorcists, lectors, doorkeepers, etc. (the ordines juris ecclesiastici), and with respect to jurisdiction, — archbishops, metropolitans, exarchs, patriarchs, deans, vicars, cardinals, legates, etc. In the Greek Church the hierarchical organization is oligarchical: above the several patriarchs there is no pope. In the evangelical churches, where the State rules the Church, more or less of the hierarchical apparatus may be retained, as may be noticed by comparing the Church of England and the Prussian Church; while, when the Church is established on the principle of universal priesthood, and the congregation rules itself, as in the American churches and many free churches in Europe, all hierarchy disappears. See CHURCH, CLERGY, JURISDICTION.

HIERACAS, or HIERAX, was born about 275 A.D.; lived at Leontopolis as a copyist; acquired a vast knowledge of Greek and Egyptian lore, medicine, the exact sciences, philosophy, literature, etc.; wrote commentaries on the Old and New Testaments in Greek and Egyptian, and a work on the creation in six days; formed an association of pupils or friends, which combined study with ascetic exercises, and seclusion from the world, and exercised thereby a considerable influence on the development of monasticism. He is known, however, only from EPIPHANIUS: Her., 67. ADOLF HARNACK.

HIEROCLES, governor of Bithynia 303, of Alexandria 306, and afterwards of Syria and Phœnicia; took an active part in Diocletian's persecution of the Christians, and wrote a work against Christianity, which has become lost, but is tolerably known to us through Eusebius' answer, Contra Hieroclem. According to Eusebius, the only thing new and original in the book was a parallel drawn between Christ and Apollonius of Tyana; else the work was only an imitation of Celsus and Porphyry. Not to be confounded with this Hierocles is the Neo-Platonist philosopher of the same name, but of a much later date.

HIEROGLYPHICS (from the Greek ἱερός, "sacred," and γλύφειν, "to carve") are pictures of animate or inanimate objects which are intended to convey ideas and words. They are found in all parts of the world, but the term usually relates to the Egyptian variety. For many years these latter hieroglyphics were a puzzle to the curious, but now they are perfectly intelligible. The key to them was the Rosetta Stone, now in the British Museum. One of Napoleon's officers discovered it in 1798 among the ruins of Fort St. Julien, near the mouth of the Rosetta branch of the Nile; but by the treaty of Alexandria it was given up to the English (1802). It has upon it a decree in honor of Ptolemy V. (B.C. 195), written in Greek, hieroglyphic and demotic. The first clew was the discovery, that the name Ptolemy occurred in the Greek, and that, in a corresponding part of the hieroglyphics, there were characters enclosed in a ring, and these, it was conjectured, might be the hieroglyphics for Ptolemy. De Sacy announced the phonetic character of the name; Young and Champollion simultaneously (1817) announced the union in the characters of ideographic and phonetic elements. The Egyptian hieroglyphics are for the most part engraved: in old temples they are found in high relief. They are generally written from right to left, but are read either vertically or horizontally. They ceased to be written about 300 A.D. See for their decipherment, etc., the elaborate article by R. S. Poole, in the ninth edition of Encycl. Brit., vol. xi. 794-809. The great dictionary of Egyptian hieroglyphics is by HEINRICH BRÜGCH: Hieroglyphisch-demotisches Wörterbuch, Leipzig, 1867-82, 7 vols.

HIERONYMITES, or HERMITS OF ST. JEROME, is the name of several independent orders which chose St. Jerome for their patron saint, and flourished in Spain, Portugal, and Italy. The most remarkable of those orders was that founded in 1370, in the diocese of Toledo, by Vasco and Ferdinand Pecha, chamberlains to Peter the Cruel of Castile. It was confirmed by Gregory XI., and spread in Spain, Portugal, and America. It had its principal seats at Guadalupe, St. Jnst, whither Charles V. retired, and the Escorial in Spain, and at Belem in Brazil. It is now extinct. As a branch of this order, Lupus Olivetus, the third general, or, according to others, Lupus d'Almeda from Seville, founded the Congregation of St. Jerome of Lombardy, which was confirmed by Martin V. in 1426, and still has some monasteries in Lombardy. See HOLSTEN-BROCKIE: Cod. reg. monast., Tom. VI. and Tom. III.; REINKENS: Die Einsiedler des heiligen Hieronymus, Schaffhausen, 1864.

HIGH CHURCH is the designation of a school in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, which lays stress upon the apostolic origin of ministerial orders, and the sacerdotal view of the sacraments, and the propriety of an elaborate ritual in worship. These views were not represented among the Reformers of England, and did not show themselves among the theologians of the Anglican Church until after the controversy with the Puritans in the mid part of Elizabeth's reign. Their highest representative was Archbishop Laud (1633-45). The distinction became more sharp and definite in the early part of the present century. The tendency culminated in the so-called Tractarian movement, which carried Dr. Newman and a number of the best spirits of the Anglican communion over to the Church of Rome. Keble and Dr. Pusey (d. Sept. 16, 1882) were among the leaders of this movement. A wing of the High-Church party is known as the Ritualists. While High-Churchmen differ among themselves, they hold, in general, to baptismal regeneration, a real sacramental though not necessarily a corporeal presence in the Eucharist, and to the apostolic succession of the bishops, and the sole validity of episcopal ordination. They practise an elaborate ritual, and often introduce into the service articles (as candles and crucifixes) and practices (as the confessional) which the majority of the Reformers of the Elizabethan period condemned. The High-Church party in England includes at the present time much piety, and has displayed an extraordinary amount of zeal in introducing daily services, building churches and charitable institutions. The late Dr. Pusey, Regius professor of Hebrew at Oxford, was long their leader. In the U. S. the party has grown rapidly within the last twenty years. The late eloquent Dr. De Koven of Racine College was its most advanced advocate. See BLUNT: Dict. of Sects, etc., and LOW: CHURCH.

HIGH PLACES is the usual translation in the Old Testament of the Hebrew bamah (בָּמָה see Ezek. xx. 29). 1. MEANING. — Bamah was at first a designation of any eminence, and is used of the "heights of the clouds" (Isa. xiv. 14), the "waves of the sea" (Job ix. 8, see margin), but especially of hills and mountains (Deut. xxxii. 13; 2 Sam. i. 19, 25; Ps. xviii. 33; Isa. lviii. 14, etc.). The term came to be applied in a technical and limited sense to eminences on which worship and sacrifices were offered both to idols (Num. xxii. 41, etc.) and to Jehovah (1 Sam. ix. 12, etc.). There was still another step in the progress of the meaning of the term. It became the specific designation of a sanctuary, or any place where sacrifice was offered. The idea of elevation was perhaps still retained, but attached to the altar rather than the ground. Altars of sacrifice in the valley, as those of Baal in the Valley of Hinnom, were called "High Places" (Jer. vii. 31, xix. 5, 6, xxxii. 35, etc.), as also altars in cities (2 Kings xvii. 9; 2 Chron. xiv. 5, etc.). The high places were of the nature of buildings, and are described as having been built (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 3), removed (2 Kings xviii. 4), thrown down (2 Chron. xxxi. 1), broken down (2 Kings xxiii. 8), and burned (2 Kings xxiii. 15). These activities point to elaborate structures; and express mention is made of the "houses," on the high places (1 Kings xii. 31, xiii. 32; 2 Kings xxiii. 19). From the isolated notice in Ezek. xvi. 16, it is to be inferred that in some cases they were richly furnished. Altars seem to have been invariably associated with the high places (2 Chron. xxxi. 1, etc.), and frequently groves also (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, etc.). The worship at the high places seems to have consisted mainly of sacrifice (1 Sam. ix. 12) and the burning of incense (2 Kings xiv. 4, etc.). They were served by priests, who were, for the most part at least, not Levites (1 Kings xii. 31; 2 Chron. xi. 15).

II. HISTORY OF THE WORSHIP ON THE HIGH PLACES. 1. From Abraham to Solomon. — It was a natural and at first an innocent impulse which led men to resort to the hills for worship. There the worshippers were brought near to the heavens, and the separation of those retired eminences from the scenes of the usual routine of daily occupation suggested the idea of sacredness. The Trajans sacrificed to Jupiter on Mount Ida. The Greeks placed the habitation of the gods on Mount Olympus, and the Persians on Alborzsch. The custom prevailed to a large extent among the neighbors of Israel, — the Moabites (Isa. xvi. 12, etc.) and the Canaanites (Deut. xii. 2, etc.). The Moabites set apart special hills or mountains for the worship of Baal. To these high places of Baal, Balak conducted Balaam (Num. xxii. 41). Baal-Peor was a mountain sacred to him (Num. xxiii. 28, 29). Nebo was probably also sacred to the divinity of that name (Isa. xlvi. 1).

The patriarchs built altars wherever they pitched their tents (Gen. xxvi. 25, xxviii. 18), but they seem also to have frequently chosen eminences. Abraham went to a mountain in the land of Moriah to sacrifice Isaac (Gen. xxii. 2), and Jacob offered sacrifice on Mount Gilead (Gen. xxxi. 51). At a later period Mount Sinai was regarded as especially sacred; and Moses invested Eleazar with the garments of the high priesthood on Mount Hor (Num. xx. 25). It is altogether likely that the Hebrews were strongly influenced by the example of the Moabites and Canaanites, and adopted some of the sites of their religious observances (comp. Judg. vi. 25); but they were commanded to "pluck up" the high places of these peoples, as they were seats of idolatry (Num. xxxiii. 52; Deut. xii. 2, xxxiii. 29). At the entrance to the Holy Land an altar was erect-
