ed on Mount Ebal (Deut. xxvii. 5; Josh. viii. 30). Of the period prior to Samuel, the term "bannah" is only used three times of high places where worship was offered, and only six times in all. Only in one of these cases is there reference to their use by the Hebrews (Lev. xxvi. 30). The words in this verse "I will destroy your high places," are proleptic, and announce the punishment to follow upon disobedience. In the time of the judges the high places are not once mentioned by name. In that period of anarchy, sacrifices were not confined to the tabernacle (Judg. ii. 5, vi. 26, xiii. 19): the more primitive custom of the patriarchs still prevailed. It was a period of transition; and, although the tabernacle was no doubt held in honor, the tribes were isolated from it by the constant warfare of the times. In the time of Samuel one high place is made prominent as a place of sacrifice (1 Sam. ix. 12, 19, 25). It is to be particularly noticed that only a single high place is referred to, and also that the prophets, as it would seem, had their dwelling-place there (1 Sam. x. 5). Of the reign of David, the term is not used; but it is evident that David worshipped on Mount Olivet (2 Sam. xv. 32), and offered sacrifices at local altars (1 Chron. xxi. 26). The survey of the history of Israel from Moses to the time of Solomon shows that the notices of high places are remarkably few: in fact, there is reference only to a single high place as being used for worship, and that under the rule of Samuel, if we leave out the isolated passage Lev. xxvi. 30, whose meaning is doubtful.

2. From Solomon to Hezekiah. — In the reign of Solomon we are suddenly confronted by an unusual development of the worship on high places. It was accounted as one of the sins of this king, that he burnt sacrifices on high places (1 Kings iii. 3). The "great high place" was at Gibeon (1 Kings iii. 4), where, however, the tabernacle was also deposited (1 Chron. xvi. 39; 2 Chron. i. 3). Bethel was another of the principal of these sanctuaries (1 Kings xii. 32). In order to satisfy his foreign wives, Solomon built high places for "Ashtoreth, the abomination of the Zidonians, for Chemosh, the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom, the abomination of the children of Ammon" (1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13). In spite of the construction of the temple, this idolatrous worship introduced from foreign nations, and the worship of Jehovah on high places, went on increasing under Rehoboam (1 Kings xiv. 23) and Jeroboam in the two kingdoms. Elijah complains that the altars of God are thrown down, and himself burns incense on the reconstructed altar on Mount Carmel (1 Kings xviii. 19 sqq.). Both Asa (1 Kings xv. 14) and Jehoshaphat (1 Kings xxii. 43) allowed some of the high places to remain (presumably those on which sacrifice was offered to Jehovah), but destroyed the idolatrous shrines (2 Chron. xv. 17, comp. xiv. 5; xx. 33, comp. xviii. 6). Under Jehoash (2 Kings xii. 3), Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 4), Azariah (2 Kings xv. 4), and Jotham (2 Kings xv. 35) it is also stated that they were allowed to remain untouched; but in each of these cases the fact is stated as derogating from their religious reputation. The number of these shrines greatly increased in "every city" (2 Kings xvii. 9-11; 2 Chron. xxviii. 25); and the people very generally participated in the worship. It is very difficult to determine how far this worship was idolatrous (1 Kings xviii. 2; 2 Kings xvii. 9-11), and how far it was rendered to Jehovah. The notices refer now to the one, now to the other, but leave the impression that the high places were regarded (after the construction of the temple) as illegitimate (1 Kings iii. 2-4), and the result of foreign and heathenish innovation (2 Kings xvii. 11, xxiii. 13, etc.).

3. From Hezekiah to Ezra. — With Hezekiah a new period begins in the history of the worship on high places. This king, so zealous in the cause of ecclesiastical reformation, sought to centralize the sacrifices of Israel at one altar. He declared war against the local shrines on high places (2 Kings xviii. 4, 22; 2 Chron. xxxii. 12; Isa. xxxvi. 7), which had tended so much to detract from the honor of the temple, and to make popular idolatrous rites. He was only partially successful. Under his successor, Manasseh, his policy was overthrown, and the worship on high places was again in full swing. But the fatal blow had been given. Hezekiah had acted out the determined voice of the prophets (Isa. lvii. 7; Jer. vii. 13; Ezek. vi. 3; Hos. x. 8, etc.); and it only remained for Josiah, under the pious impulse which the discovery of the book of the law had inspired (2 Kings xxiii. 2), to complete the work his great predecessor had inaugurated (2 Kings xxiii. 8). After the exile, the high places were not revived; and the need of having some places of worship subordinate to the one single altar of sacrifice was later supplied by the synagogues (Riehm).

III. RELATION OF THE HIGH PLACES TO THE TEMPLE. — It has been urged that there is no place in the Pentateuch for any other place of worship than the one central altar of sacrifice (tabernacle and temple). Such worship, however, was practised not only on the high places (bannah), but at Bochim (Judg. ii. 5), upon a rock by Manoah (Judg. xiii. 19), at Mizpeh (1 Sam. vii. 10) and Bethlehem (1 Sam. xvi. 23) by Samuel, on the threshing-floor of Ornan by David (1 Chron. xxi. 26), by the priest of Nob (1 Sam. xxi. 2 sqq.), on Carmel (1 Kings xviii. 30, 38), and at other places of which we have distinct notice. On the basis of the prevalency and apparent legitimacy of such worship, and the prior assumption that the Law permits only one altar, the conclusion has been confidently drawn, that parts of the Pentateuch (Deuteronomy and the so-called priestly Torah) must belong to Josiah's reign, or a later date (Wellhausen, Professor W. R. Smith, Baudissin, etc.). The discussion of the bearing of this fact upon the date of the Pentateuch does not belong here (the supposition of a late origin of the Pentateuch makes it difficult to understand why the references to Hebrew worship on high places are confined to a solitary passage); but it is the place to consider the relation of these local shrines to the pentateuchal commandments and to the central altar of sacrifice. The above survey indicates that the state of the case after the construction of the temple, and before that event, when the tabernacle was shifted from place to place, is not the same, and the two periods must be discussed separately.

It has been urged that the worship at the local altars was practised in ignorance of the commandment in Deut. xii. 1-11, enjoining one central altar, or in deliberate disobedience of it, or out of a misunderstanding of its meaning. The rabbis supposed that the rule was superseded by a special divine intimation. But none of these considerations sufficiently present the case as it existed before the erection of the temple; and none of them are necessary for the explanation of the apparent anomaly.

1. It is quite doubtful whether the Mosaic ordinance (Deut. xii. 10, etc.) was meant to absolutely exclude all other places of worship (De Wette, Riehm, etc.). In Exod. xx. 24 a plurality of altars is presupposed, and the mode of erecting them definitely defined by Moses. These altars, so far as they were erected to Jehovah, were not necessarily a breach of the Mosaic law (Professor Smith, chap. ix.) before the erection of the temple (1 Kings iii. 2).

2. The necessities of the case demanded local shrines. The history of the times, as well as special events, is in favor of this view. The anarchy of the period of the Judges, the rivalries between the tribes, and the constant instability of affairs to the time of Solomon, made it impossible for the tribes to go up regularly to the tabernacle. An altar was erected on Ebal by Joshua (Josh. viii. 30), while the tabernacle was close by at Gilgal, and it was not felt to be an anomaly. Local shrines were a necessity of the case, and as natural to the instincts of the people as they were consistent with the Jehovah-worship. The whole land was the sanctuary of Jehovah (Riehm).

3. The commandment centralizing worship and sacrifice at one altar was prospective (Lev. xvii. 3-9; Deut. xii. 10), and not to be enforced till a later date (Farrar, Riehm, etc.). The law was proleptic; and the menace of Lev. xxvi. 30 had an eye to the Moabite idolatries, as is evident from the connection. The people were to be trained up to that idea, and principally by the subsequent construction of the temple itself; and the absence of notices of the principle of a single shrine in the time of the Judges argues as little against the priority of the injunction in Deuteronomy and the "Priestly Torah," as the absence of all notices of the Sabbath argues against its previous institution, or the almost complete ignorance of the Bible among the people in the dark ages against its existence. Nor may it be forgotten that the tabernacle held a conspicuous place in the eyes of the nation, and became more conspicuous as the affairs of Israel became settled, and the troublous anarchy of the period of the Judges was composed.

4. It is hard at this time to distinguish how far the sacrifices at local altars were genuine Jehovah-worship, and how far the practices followed the fashions of the surrounding nations. The people not only did not fully obey the command of Moses and Joshua to destroy the altars of the Canaanites (Judg. ii. 2, etc.), but adopted the idolatries of their neighbors (Judg. ii. 11, 12, etc.).

5. The principle of the local worship of Jehovah was preserved, long after the high places were destroyed, in the synagogues.

Of the continuance of the high places and their altars of sacrifice after the construction of the temple, the following is to be said. (1) The worship on high places increased enormously under Solomon, and was largely the result of contact with foreign nations. Solomon increased the shrines in proportion to the diffusion of his affections. The people, always inclined to idolatry, were not slow in following their king's example. (2) Under the worst kings (Rehoboam, Jeroboam, Ahaz) the high places were most numerous. Later and better kings seem to have made a distinction between idolatrous and Jehovistic shrines; but it is said of at least five of them (see above), to their disparagement, that they allowed them still to stand. (3) It is plain, that, after the temple was built, the worship at the high places was largely idolatrous. In proportion as the temple was forgotten, the sacrifices on local altars increased, and the people did "as the heathen did" (2 Kings xvii. 11, xxiii. 13, etc.). (4) It is evident that there must have been some development in the minds of the people in favor of the central temple, and against all high places, before Hezekiah's reign. (5) In general, the ritual and worship at these local altars, after Solomon's accession, must be regarded as having degenerated from the old and better standard. It has been said that the "temple of Solomon never stands contrasted with the popular high places as the seat of the Levitical system" (Professor Smith, chap. ix.). But the very construction and existence of the temple were a protest against the local worship. The statement also ignores the fact that the priests at the local shrines were, for the most part at least, not Levites, and stood in antagonism to the priesthood of the temple (1 Kings xii. 31; 2 Kings xxiii. 9; 2 Chron. xi. 15). They seem to have been a distinct order. Moreover, the same books of the Kings and Chronicles give the account of the temple, its building and furniture, which describe the development and flourishing condition of the worship on the high places; so that violent injustice must be done to the narrative as a whole in order to evade the conclusion that the temple was meant to be the central shrine, and that the sacrificial worship at the local altars was thenceforth illegitimate.

As in the case of so many other truths of divine revelation, the people in this one likewise failed for a while to comprehend its spirit, and to obey the letter, but afterwards were led to fall in with the providential design. Not only was the temple ignored by the erection of many local altars, but the very temple itself was despoiled by kings heathen in practice, like Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 21 sq.), and made the receptacle for heathen altars and heathen rites.

HIGH PRIEST. The high priest was the spiritual head and representative of the theocratic people before Jehovah. In him was concentrated the mediatorship between God and people; and in him the people could draw nigh to God. As in his person the people was represented, his sin offering and that of the congregation, which was to be brought for certain sins, as prescribed Lev. iv., were the same. His sin was the people's sin (Lev. iv. 3), and God's good will towards the high priest also belonged to the people. The high priest was in the midst of a holy people, "the saint of the Lord" (Ps. cvi. 16). In him the highest degree of purity had to be found, and only in exceptional cases (Lev. xxi. 1-6) could he defile himself. otherwise he had to avoid every thing whereby he could be defiled. He had even to keep away from his dead father or mother (xxi. 10-12). His wife was to be a virgin of his own people (xxi. 14). Aaron's consecration to the priesthood was in connection with that of his sons and the priests generally (Exod. xxix.; Lev. viii.). The ritual commenced by washing Aaron and his sons before the tabernacle of the congregation. Aaron was then invested with the sacred garments, and anointed with the holy oil, which was prepared according to Exod. xxx. 22-25. Aaron's successor was not anointed, but received only the high priest's garments. Without these garments, the high priest was only a private person, who could not represent the people, and incurred the penalty of death by appearing before Jehovah without them (Exod. xxviii. 35). His dress was peculiar, and passed to his successor at his death. The articles of his dress consisted of the following parts: (1) The breeches, or drawers, of linen, covering the loins and thighs; (2) The coat, a tunic or long shirt; (3) The girdle, also of linen: these three articles he had in common with the other priests. Over these parts he wore (4) the robe, or the ephod, being all of blue. The skirt of his robe had a remarkable trimming of pomegranates in blue, red, and crimson, with a bell of gold between each pomegranate alternately. The bells were to give a sound when the high priest went in and came out of the holy place (Exod. xxviii. 35). Over the robe came (5) the ephod, one part of which covered the back, and the other the front: upon it was placed (6) the breastplate. The covering of the head was (7) the mitre, or upper turban, which was different from (8) the bonnet. The mitre had a gold plate, engraved with "Holiness to the Lord," fastened to it by a ribbon of blue. For the functions to be performed annually on the day of atonement, dresses of white linen were prescribed (Lev. xvi. 4). The office of the Old-Testament priesthood was twofold,—that of mediatorship and that of a teacher or messenger of the Lord (Mal. ii. 7). The functions of the high priest were the same as those of the common priests. He had oversight over the service of the temple and the temple treasury (2 Kings xxii. 4 sq.). The succession in the high priesthood was probably regulated in the manner of the right of succession,—that the first son, provided there were no legal difficulties, succeeded his father; and, in case he had died already, his oldest son followed. The number of high priests from Aaron to Phannias was, according to Josephus (Antt., XX. 10) eighty-three; viz., from Aaron to Solomon, thirteen; during the temple of Solomon, eighteen; and fifty-two in the time of the second temple. Aaron was succeeded by Eleazar (Num. xx. 28), who was followed by Phinehas (Judg. xx. 28). Who the successors of Phinehas were till the time of Eli, we do not know. To enter into the different theories of who they were, or were not, is not our object. From Shallum, the father of Hilkiah, the high priest in Josiah's reign, we can again follow up the succession of high priests. According to Josephus, Hilkiah was followed by Seraiah, who was killed by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kings xxv. 18 sq.). His son was Jehozadak, who went into the captivity (1 Chron. v. 41; A. V., vi. 15), and who was the father of Jeshua, who opens the series of high priests in Neh. xii., which ends with Jaddua, who was high priest in the time of Alexander the Great. Jaddua was followed by Onias I. his son, and he again by Simon I., the Just; then followed Onias II., Simon II., Onias III. The last high priest was Phannias, who was appointed by lot by the Zealots (Josephus, War, IV. 3, 8). With him the Old-Testament high priesthood ignominiously ended. DELITZSCH.

HILARION, St., b. at Thebathar, near Guza, 290; d. in the Island of Cyprus, 371; studied in Alexandria; embraced Christianity; visited St. Anthony; gave away all his wealth to the poor on his return to his native place in 307; retired to the desert near Magum to live as a hermit; gathered a great number of pupils, whom he settled in various places, and became thus the founder of monasticism in Palestine. He also visited Libya, Sicily, and Dalmatia; and, according to legend, he everywhere performed a great number of miracles. His life was written by St. Jerome. He is commemorated by the Roman Church on Oct. 21.

HILARY OF ARLES (Hilarius Arelatensis), St., b. 403; d. 449; entered very early the monastery of Lerinum, where his uncle, Honoratus, was abbot. Honoratus afterwards became Bishop of Arles; and on his death (429) Hilarius succeeded him in the episcopal chair. He was very enthusiastic for the ideas of monasticism, and lived together with the clergy of his church as monks in a monastery. In spite, however, of his personal humility, he was rather haughty when exercising his official authority. As Bishop of Arles he was metropolitan of the provinces of Viennensis and Narbonnensis; and as such he came into conflict with Leo I., who, however, compelled him to yield. He wrote a Vita S. Honorati, a poem on the creation, etc., which have been edited by Salinas, Rome, 1731, who, however, ascribes several works to him which are not by him, and are found in Max. Bibl. Patrum., T. VIII. See BÄHR: Christlich-römische Litteratur. HERZOG.

HILARY THE DEACON (Hilarius Diaconus), a deacon of the Church of Rome; lived about 380; partook in the schism of Lucifer of Cagliari, and wrote, according to Jerome, a baptism in defence of his opinions on heretical baptism. The so-called Ambrosiaster and the Quæstiones V. et N. Test., in the works of Augustine, are also often ascribed to him. See RICHARD SIMON: Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du N. T., p. 232.

HILARY (Hilarius), Bishop of Rome 461-468; the successor of Leo I.; was a native of Sardinia; and was present at the Robber Synod of Ephesus (449) as papal legate. As pope he showed himself very zealous for the maintenance of the metropolitan system, for the establishment of annual provincial synods, etc.

HILARY, Bishop of Poitiers (Pictavium), the place of his birth, was b. early in the fourth century; d. 366. He shone like a clear star alongside of the great champions of the Nicene Creed, — Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregories. Among the teachers of the West of his day he was beyond dispute the first, and bore a strong resemblance to Tertullian, both in disposition and scientific method. He employed an elegant Latin style. His parents were Pagans, and of high social standing. Hilary enjoyed fine facilities for education. In the introduction to his treatise on the Trinity he describes the stages a Pagan passes through in reaching the knowledge of God, which heathen philosophy reveals dimly, Christianity clearly. This description evidently depicts his own experience. He had reached the years of manhood when he professed Christianity. A statement of uncertain value speaks of his wife and daughter as following him. About the year 350 the popular voice called him to the bishopric of Poitiers.

The times were times of conflict. The Emperor Constantius determined to make Arianism the prevailing creed of the West, as it had become of the East. This end he endeavored to secure by intimidating the bishops. Hilary placed himself in antagonism to the emperor, and devoted all his energies to resist the spread of Arianism. His persuasions induced a number of the Gallic bishops to refuse communion with the Arian bishop of Arles, — Saturninus; and in a letter to the emperor (355) he calls upon him to desist from his policy of coercion. At the Council of Beziers (356), presided over by Saturninus, the Arians were in the majority, and silenced Hilary by their tumult when he arose to defend the Nicene faith. A few months afterward he was banished to Phrygia, where his leisure was employed in studies of the Greek language and literature, and in making himself acquainted with the parties and doctrines of the Eastern Church. In 359 he wrote his work on synods (De Synodis), — an historical survey of the confessions of the Eastern Church, with a definition of his own position. The best product of the exile (359 or 360) was a treatise on the Trinity (Lib. XII. de Trinitate). Aroused by the Arian decrees of the Council of Constantinople (360), he wrote a second letter to Constantius, offering to defend his faith publicly before him and a synod. The court did not grant his proposal, but, deeming that he was doing more mischief in the East than he could do in Gaul, ordered him back to Poitiers.

On his return, Hilary was regarded as the champion of the Nicene faith. The Council of Paris (361), under his lead, excommunicated Saturninus. He now sought to clear Italy of Arianism, and appeared suddenly at Milan, to prefer charges against its bishop, Auxentius. The latter, however, stood in high favor with the emperor; and Hilary was driven out of the city. He explained his course in this matter in a work against Auxentius (365). According to Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 45), he died the following year.

Hilary was one of the most conspicuous and original characters of early Christianity. His distinguishing characteristics were fidelity to the church creed, acuteness in argument, and resolution in action. He knew no fear. He wielded a keen sword when he defended apostolic truth against heretics, or vindicated the prerogatives of the Church against the encroachments of the civil power. Yet, when the differences concerned non-essentials, he displayed a conciliatory disposition. His power lay essentially in his thorough acquaintance with the Scriptures. His earliest literary labor was a Commentary on Matthew, and one of the latest an Exposition of the Psalms. His other exegetical works are lost. Much to be regretted is the loss of his collection of hymns which the Spanish churches used.

His work on the Trinity is a scriptural confirmation of the philosophic doctrine of the divinity of Christ, and is of permanent value. It was not a mere restatement of traditional orthodoxy, but a fresh and living utterance of his own experience and study. In the discussion of the co-essentiality of the Son, Hilary lays emphasis on the Scripture titles and affirmations, and especially on his birth from the Father, which he insists involves identity of essence. In the elaboration of the divine-human personality of Christ, he is more original and profound. The incarnation was a movement of the Logos towards humanity in order to lift humanity up to participation in the divine nature. It consisted in a self-emptying of himself, and the assumption of human nature. In this process he lost none of his divine nature; and, even during the humiliation, he continued to reign everywhere in heaven and on earth. Christ assumed body, soul, and spirit, and passed through all stages of human growth, his body being really subject to pain and death. Redemption is the result of Christ's voluntary substitution of himself, out of love, in our stead. Between the God-man and the believer there is a vital communion. As the Logos is in the Father, by reason of his divine birth, so we are in him, and become partakers of his nature, by regeneration and the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

The christology of Hilary is full of fresh and inspiring thoughts, which deserve to be better known than they are. He was created a doctor of the Catholic Church by Pius IX., at the synod of Bordeaux, 1851.

HILDA, St., a grand-niece of Edwin, king of Northumbria; b. about 617; devoted herself to a religious life from her thirteenth year; became abbess of Heorta (now Hartlepool) in 650, and founded the celebrated abbey of Whitby, where she died 680. HILDEBERT, b. at Lavardin, in the department of Loir-et-Cher, 1055; d. at Tours, Dec. 18, 1134; was, according to some, a pupil of Berenger; according to others, a monk of Clugny; superintended the cathedral-school of Le Mans from 1079 to 1092, and was in 1096 or 1098 chosen bishop of that diocese. In this position he encountered much trouble from his own chapter, from William Rufus of England, from the revival preacher Henry of Lanesme, and others. At one time he even went to Rome, demanding to be relieved from his duties; but Paschalis II. would not give his consent. In 1125 he was chosen Archbishop of Tours; and there, too, he met with difficulties, though in the mean time he had raised himself to one of the foremost places among the ecclesiastics of his time. His works were first edited by A. Beaugendre (Paris, 1708), and then by J. J. Bourassé, in MIGNÉ: Patr., 171. They consist of Epistole to Bernard of Clairvaux, Anselm, William of Chaupeaux, and others, Diplomata, Sermones (a hundred and forty-three in Migné), Opuscula (among which are Libellus de quatuor virtutibus, strongly influenced by Cicero, and Tractatus theologicus, probably nothing but a fragment of the summa of Hugo of St. Victor), and finally Poemata. His life was written by Hebert-Duperron (1858) and Deservillers (1877). Full information as to the literature is found in CHEVALIER: Repertoire, 1878. WAGENMANN.

HILDEGARDE, St., b. in the castle of Böckelheim, 1098; was educated in the Benedictine nunnery of Disibodenberg, by Jutta von Sponheim, whom she succeeded as abbess in 1136; and founded in 1147 the monastery of Rupertsberg, where she died in 1178. She received prophetic visions; and, as these were recognized by the Church, she came gradually to occupy a very exceptional position, and to exercise a very extraordinary influence, in the German Church. She is commemorated on Sept. 17, but she was never canonized. Her writings, Scivias (first printed in Paris, 1513, and Cologne, 1628), Liber Divinorum Operum, *Explanatio Regule S. HILL, Rowland, an eccentric and popular English preacher; b. at Hawkestone, Aug. 23, 1744; d. in London, April 11, 1833. In 1764 he entered St. John's College, Cambridge; and during his university course he came under the influence of Mr. Whitefield and the Methodists. He aroused opposition by preaching without a license, and by following the methods of the Methodists, and only secured ordination after six bishops had refused to perform the service. In 1773 he obtained the parish of Kingston, Somersetshire, but continued to indulge his favorite taste for open-air preaching. In 1783 he built Surrey Chapel, London, having fallen heir to a considerable fortune. He continued to preach almost up to the very day of his death, attracting immense audiences wherever he went. In the summer months he went off on preaching-tours through Great Britain. He was an eccentric man, and gifted with wit, and rare powers of drollery, which he used in the service of religion. Sheridan used to say, "I go to hear Rowland Hill, because his ideas come red-hot from the heart." In the Arminian controversy he espoused the Calvinistic side, and wrote some bitter pamphlets against John Wesley, the tone of which he afterwards regretted. His principal work was the collection of Village Dialogues (1810, 34th ed., 1839), in which he treats of current religious abuses, and general religious topics, in a homely and familiar, but terse and often sarcastic way. See Life, by SIDNEY, London, 1833 (4th ed., 1844); Memoirs, by Rev. W. JONES, London, 2d ed., 1840; and Memoirs, by SHERMAN, London, 1851.

HILLEL, the most distinguished rabbi of the century just preceding the Christian era, was the son of a poor Jewish family living in Babylon; d. in Jerusalem late in the reign of Herod the Great,—according to Delitzsch, about 4 B.C. Our knowledge of his life is drawn exclusively from the Talmud, which gives an admiring picture of his acuteness of mind, and suavity of disposition. The whole narrative is exaggerated, but, according to Delitzsch, is to be accepted in its general outline. In many cases it is evidently unreliable; and such statements as that Hillel reached the age of Moses (a hundred and twenty), etc., will be received, in spite of the Jewish writer Geiger, with some grains of allowance by a critical age.

At an early age Hillel went to Jerusalem, where he worked as a day-laborer, using half of his wages, a victoriatius (twelve cents), for the support of his family, and the other half to gain admission to the Beth-ha-Midrash, where Shemaiah and Abtalion were teaching. On one occasion, unable to pay the admission-fee, he clambered up to a window, where he sat the night through, listening to the discussions, and unmindful of the snow, which was falling, and gradually covered him up. There he was espied the next morning by the teachers within. This incident opened to the day-laborer the way to fame; and he became the founder of a school which was rather more liberal than that of his contemporary, Shammai. Hillel's memory has been only recently rescued from oblivion. He was no doubt a pure moralist; but the little we know of him is wholly inconsistent with the claim which has been made for him as the teacher and peer, and even the superior, of Christ. Geiger says, "Hillel presents us with the picture of a genuine reformer. Jesus uttered no new thought." And Renan, in his Life of Christ, calls Hillel "Christ's real teacher, from whose example Christ had learned to bear poverty with patience, and to oppose priests and hypocrites."

It only requires, however, a careful reading of the stories handed down of Hillel's mental acuteness, to become convinced that he moved in the circle of Pharisaism, and never got beyond the narrow prejudices of his class. He was simply a rabbi (perhaps the best and purest of his order), a man of the school, following precedent; but he was in no sense a reformer for the race, nor do any of his sayings live as sources of power and influence in the world. Over his tomb the words were uttered, "Oh the gentle, the pious, the scholar of Ezra!" They were no doubt appropriate, but it would be preposterous to apply them to Christ. He is the author of the saying, "What is unpleasant to thyself, do not to thy neighbor. This is the whole law, and all the rest is commentary upon it." This has been highly praised, and it is no detraction of its beauty to say that Jesus gave a better summary of the law when he made a statement of its positive requirements (Mark xii. 30). The Talmudic illustrations of Hillel's intellectual adroitness betray, if not a want of veracity, at least the spirit of rabbinism and hair-splitting casuistry which Jesus so fearlessly rebuked. Of those incidents which place him in an unenviable light, the most striking, perhaps, is the one which relates how, at the sacrifice, he passed off an ox for a cow by swinging the animal's tail to and fro, and so concealing its gender.

The centuries have judged both the Jewish rabbi and the world's Redeemer. Hillel, says Delitzsch, "is dead, and has his place as the representative of a system of outlived ceremonies of the past: Jesus lives, and all the progress of civilization is the advancing victory of the light that goes out from him."

In 1751 he lost his voice; and, being thus excluded from the pulpit, he devoted himself to hymn-writing. He wrote more than a thousand hymns and religious songs, of which many are still living in the German Church. A complete collection, together with a life by C. Ehmann, appeared at Reutlingen, 1844. HINCKS, Edward, D.D., b. in Cork, Ireland, August, 1792; d. at Killeleagh, Comty Down, Dec. 3, 1866. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1826 became rector of Killeleagh. His father was T. D. Hincks, LL.D., professor of Oriental languages in the Belfast Academical Institution, and he inherited a great fondness for languages. He occupies an honored place among the early scholars of Egyptology and Assyriology, and to him much of the brilliant progress in these directions is owing. His success is the more remarkable as his straitened means precluded the purchase of many books, or residence at the centres of such studies.

HINCMAR OF LAON was made Bishop of Rheims; but opposing the king in the most wilful manner, refusing obedience to his metropolitan, and finally excommunicating his own chapter, he governed his diocese with such an arbitrariness, that he was deposed by the synod of Douzi (871), presided over by his own uncle. The king took him prisoner, and had him blinded. Adrian II. interfered in vain, in his behalf. John VIII. gave him permission in 871 to read mass. He died in 882. A few of his letters have come down to us, and are found in Sirmond's edition of the works of Hincmar of Rheims.

HINCMAR OF RHEIMS, b. about 806; d. at Epernay, Dec. 21, 882; was educated in the monasteries of St. Denis and Corwey; came to the court during the reign of the Emperor Louis, and formed the most intimate relation with his son, King Charles the Bald. At the synod of Verneuil (844), the king recommended him for the archiepiscopal see of Rheims, which had stood vacant since the deposition of Ebo in 835, and in the following year he was regularly elected and consecrated. He ruled his diocese with great firmness, and was generally successful in maintaining his metropolitan authority over his suffragan bishops, even in the face of the Pope; but, though he actually was the most prominent representative of the French Church, he failed in securing for himself the primacy of France; this dignity being conferred on Archbishop Ansegisus of Sens. Very remarkable is the use which Hincmar made of the Pseudo-Isidorean decretals in his administration. He evidently considered them fraudulent, and strongly opposed the introduction of this new law in the church, except in cases in which the law spoke in his favor; then he appealed to it himself. In the theological movements of his time Hincmar also played a conspicuous part, though as a theologian he was without originality. In the predestination controversy with Gottschalk (which article see) he stood alone. Rabanus left him in the lurch. John Scotus Erigena, Ratramnus, Prudentius, Servatus Lupus, and others, declared against him. But he never gave in. In the transubstantiation controversy he sided with Paschasius Radbertus. One of his best literary performances is his Annals of Rheims continued by Flodoard. Shortly before his death he was driven away from Rheims by the Normans.

HINDS, Samuel, b. in the Island of Barbadoes, 1793; d. at Notting Hill, London, Feb. 7, 1872. After graduation at Oxford, he went (1819) as missionary to Barbadoes, but returned to England, and became successively vice-principal of St. Alban's Hall, Oxford (1827), vicar of Yardley, Hertfordshire (1834), chaplain to Archbishop Whately, and rector and prebendary of Castleknock, Dublin Cathedral (1843), dean of Carlisle (1848), and bishop of Norwich (1849). He resigned his bishopric in 1858. His principal works are The History of the Early Rise and Progress of Christianity, London, 1829, 3d ed., 1850; An Inquiry into the Proofs, Nature, and Extent of Inspiration, and into the Authority of Scripture, Oxford, 1831.

HINTON, John Howard, b. at Oxford, March 24, 1791; d. at Bristol, Dec. 17, 1873. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; entered the Baptist ministry, and was for many years one of the most intellectual preachers of London. "He shared with Binney the honor of the designation 'the students' preachers.'" His best known work was History and Topography of the United States (1832, American edition, enlarged, N. Y., 1853). Among his theological works may be mentioned The Harmony of Religious Truth and Human Reason (1832), Treatise on Man's Responsibility (1840). There is a complete edition of his works, in seven volumes. — James Hinton, son of the preceding; b. at Reading, 1822; d. at St. Michael, Dec. 16, 1875. He was the foremost aural surgeon in London; at the same time he was greatly interested in philosophy, and wrote those remarkable works, Man and his Dwelling-place (1858), Life in Nature (1871, 2d ed., 1875), The Mystery of Pain, Philosophy and Religion (1882). See his Life and Letters, London, 1878, 4th ed., 1881.

HIPPO (the present Bona), a Roman colony on the northern coast of Africa; was the seat of two councils (393 and 426), of which the former is interesting, because it gave the first express definition of the New-Testament canon, in the form in which it has ever since been retained. Augustine was bishop there from 396 to 430. See PETIT: Voyage à Hippone au commencement du Ve siècle, 6th ed., Paris, 1876.

HIPPOLYTUS, a distinguished ecclesiastical writer; b. in the second half of the second century; d. about the year 240. Greek was his native tongue; and, although this may point to an Oriental birth, he was in Rome at an early age. He heard Irenæus lecture (Photius). The vivid minuteness with which he relates the fortunes of Callistus leads to the conclusion that he was in Rome under Victor (189-199). At the beginning of the third century he was a presbyter, conspicuous for learning, eloquence, zeal, and moral earnestness. He dissented, in matters of doctrine, from Victor's successors (Zephyrinus and Callistus), holding the view that heretics should not be received back into the Church, and favoring the subordination theory of the Trinity; while they were inclined to Patripassianism. He seems to refer to himself as bishop, and stood at the head of a schismatic body in Rome (so also Prudentius). Thus much is extracted from the author's own work, the Philosophoumena. The other notices of his life are few. Eusebius (Hist., vi. 20, 26) calls him bishop, and puts his life in the reign of Alexander Severus (222-235); and Prudentius (400) designates his bishopric as Portus, the port of Rome. Jerome (Cat. Vir. Illustr., 61) gives nothing more about him than a few of his writings. An ancient catalogue of Roman bishops, which Mommsen puts in 354, states that Yppolitus presbyter, with the Roman Bishop Pontianus, was banished by Severus to the unhealthy Island of Sardinia (about 235). It does not say that he died there; and so the account of his death by Prudentius can be harmonized with this statement, but is not corroborated by any other testimony. He says Hippolytus was regarded as a martyr by the Roman Church, and suffered martyrdom at Portus, being torn to pieces by horses. The authenticity of this account is justly denied by Dollinger, on the ground that this mode of punishment was not practised by the Romans. In 1551 a marble statue was exhumed at Portus, which represents Hippolytus in a sitting posture, with beard and high forehead. On the chair are inscribed the titles of his works.

Writings. — In 1842 a learned Greek, Minoides Minas, employed by the French Government, found at Mount Athos, and brought to Paris, a number of manuscripts. Among these was one which E. Miller published at Oxford in 1851, under the title Origen's Philosophoumena; or, Refutation of all Heresies. The first book of this work was known before, and was generally ascribed to Origen. Of the original ten books, the second, third, and a part of the fourth, are still wanting. It is almost universally agreed by critics that this work is by the hand of Hippolytus, and not Origen. Baur (Theol. Jahrb., 1853) regarded the presbyter Caius as the author; but he has no followers in this opinion.

Hippolytus displays in this work wise judgment, large information, a wide acquaintance with the writings of philosophers, and acuteness in bringing out the relation of the ancient philosophies to the Christian heresies. He was as harsh and uncompromising a foe of philosophy as Tertullian. The Refutation of all Heresies (κατὰ πασῶν αἱρέσεων ἔλεγχος) is a polemical work whose main object is to refute the doctrines (and especially the secret doctrines) of the Gnostics, and to abash heretics by showing that their views were taken from Pagan philosophy and Oriental theosophy. Book i. gives a summary of the Greek, Druid, and Indian philosophies. Books ii. and iii. are lost. Book iv. begins in the middle of an account of Chaldaean astrology, and gives an account of the magic practised at that time, etc. Books v.-x. contain the account of the heresies. In v. the Ophites (Naaseni, Peraticæ, Sethites, Justinus) are treated; in vi., the followers of Simon Magus, and Valentinus and his disciples; in vii., Basilides (whose views appear to us in an altogether new phase) and Marcion; in viii., the Doketæ, an Arabian Monoïmos, the Quartodecimani, and the Montanists; in ix., Patripassianism, the author giving a valuable picture of the congregation in Rome at that time, and in x. he summarizes the contents of books i. and iv.-ix. It was from this summary that Theodoret drew. From the fact that Hippolytus looks back upon the administration of Callistus (217-222) as belonging to the past, the date of composition may be assigned pretty confidently to the year 234.

Other writings of Hippolytus are mentioned on the statue discovered at Pontus, to the number of thirteen. The greater number of these are entirely lost, and only fragments of others remain. Other works ascribed to him (as the κατὰ Βήρωνος καὶ Ἰλίου, πρὸς Ἰουδαίους, etc.) are so different in style from the Refutation as hardly to be genuine. The same is true in regard to the exegetical works which are ascribed to him on the basis of notices in the fathers, manuscripts, etc. The fragments on Daniel, however, edited by Bardenhewer (D. heil. Hippol. Commentar z. Buch Daniel, Freiburg, 1877), we may confidently regard as genuine.

HIRSCHAU, or HIRSAU, a Benedictine monastery, now destroyed, but once very famous, in the diocese of Spire, was founded in 830 by Count Erafried of Calw, and his son Bishop Notting of Vereelli. The first monks, numbering fifteen, and the first abbot, Lindebert, came from Fulda; and the traditions of that flourishing seat of learning seemed to take root at Hirschau. But about a thousand internal dissensions, the avarice of the counts of Calw and the plague, completely ruined the institution. For half a century the monastery stood empty, until Leo IX., in 1019, compelled the counts of Calw to repair the buildings, and revive the institution. By its new abbot, Wilhelm der Selige (1069-91), it was brought into a very flourishing condition; and through his Constitutiones Hirsauigienses, a close imitation of the Constitutiones Cluniacenses, it exercised a great influence on other German monasteries. During the Reformation it was transformed into a theological seminary, and in 1692 it was destroyed by the French. Its history has been written by Johann Trittenheim, abbot of Spanheim (d. 1516), whose Chronicon II. was printed, Basel, 1559, and the Annales II., at St. Gall, 1690.

HIRSCHER, Johann Baptist, b. at Altermgarten, Wurtemberg, Jan. 20, 1788; d. at Freiburg, Sept. 4, 1865; was appointed professor of morals and practical theology at Tübingen 1817, and at Freiburg 1837, but retired into private life 1863. In spite of a certain innate, aristocratic conservatism, which prevented him from adopting a truly liberal platform, he belonged to the reform party within the Roman-Catholic Church, and took an active part in public life both before and after 1848. Several of his books, as, for instance, On the Mass (1821), Die kirchlichen Zustände der Gegenwart (1849), etc., were put on the Index, and he submitted.

HITCHCOCK, Edward, D.D., LL.D., b. at Deerfield, Mass., May 24, 1793; d. at Amherst, Feb. 27, 1864. He was an eminent scientist, and from 1825 to 1854 was professor in Amherst College, during the last ten of which years he was its president. By his geological labors he won great fame; but his scientific attainments served as proofs of Christianity, and he delighted to present science as the handmaid of religion. Besides strictly professional works, he wrote The Religion of Geology and its Connected Sciences (1851), and Religious Truths Illustrated from Science (1857).

HITTITES, The. Sons of Heth, the second son of Canaan. Only scattered references to the Hittites (Ἰτιτι) occur in the Old Testament, from which we could not at all gather a true idea of them at the time of their power. Generally, it is only scattered families that are mentioned, like those of Ephron, Abimelech, or Urial; or small communities, such as may have led to their being included in the lists so often repeated of the Canaanite tribes. Of these were the families of Elon and Beeri, with whom Esau intermarried. In Judg. i. 26, however, the land of the Hittites is at a distance from Palestine; and the same is the case in the history from the time of David. His census extended as far as the Hittites at Kadesh (if we may so correct "Tahtim-Hodshi," 2 Sam. xxiv. 6, as suggested by the LXX. Alex.). Solomon married Hittite women (1 Kings xi. 1); and the kings of the Hittites are mentioned (1 Kings x. 29; 2 Chron. i. 17; 2 Kings vii. 6) as parallel with the kings of Egypt and of Syria. They are the same as the "kings on this side Euphrates" (1 Kings iv. 24).

From the Hebrew Scriptures we could only gather, then, that the Hittites were of a Hamitic race, and regarded as aliens; that, from the time of Abraham to David, they had communities or families in Palestine; and that, from the time of Solomon, they had kings and territory to the north-east of Palestine. Here the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, with those of the Hittites themselves, discovered within the last few years, greatly add to our knowledge.

The Egyptians called the Hittites "Khita." They appear in the reign of Thothmes III., about 1500 B.C. (Rawlinson), as inhabiting a "great land," but only as one among other peoples. Later they became predominant, and were the chief enemy met by Seti I. and Rameses II.; the former of whom captured their western capital, Kadesh, on the Orontes, and the latter of whom gained a victory over them at the same place (about 1350 B.C.), entered then into a treaty with them, and married the daughter of Khitasar, their king, as described in the poem of Pentaur. The allies of the Hittites are mentioned by Pentaur; and De Rougé identified them with tribes as distant as the extreme west of Asia Minor. This is not now credited; although we do know that their influence and arms must have extended, at one time, as far as Smyrna.

The Assyrians knew the Hittites as "Khatti." Like the Egyptians, they found them their chief rivals and most dangerous enemies. They are mentioned by the Babylonian Sargon in the sixteenth century B.C., before the Assyrian Empire had risen. Tiglath-pileser I. (B.C. 1120) found the Hittites inhabiting the region extending westward and southward from Carchemish, and exercising a wide suzerainty north, almost, if not quite, to the Euxine Sea. His successors engaged in constant wars with them, until Sargon extinguished the Hittite power by the capture of Carchemish (717 B.C.), and its incorporation into the Assyrian Empire. The Khatti are mentioned by Sennacherib and Esarhaddon; but their name is merely applied to all the peoples of Syria and Phœnicia.

The monuments of the Hittites themselves have been identified since 1876, chiefly by the labors of Professor A. H. Sayce. The first known were four hieroglyphic inscriptions from Hamath, first faithfully copied in the Second Statement of the American Palestine Exploration Society in 1873. Since that time Hittite monuments with inscriptions have been found at Carchemish on the east, at Aleppo, at Ibreez in Lycœonia, at Marash, at Boghaz Keui, and Eyuk in the Valley of the Haly, and as far east as Karabel, between Smyrna and Sardis. The inscriptions have not yet been deciphered; although a hopeful key has been found in a silver boss, which contains the figure of a king, with his name of "Tarrik-timne, king of the land of Erme," in cuneiform characters of the date of Sargon, and with presumably the same legend in Hittite characters. As yet, however, no well-verified identification of any character with its sound or meaning has been made, unless it be in the case of one character used as an ideograph for "a god." The characters are, with the probable exception of a few determinatives, almost certainly syllabic, but have not wholly lost the hieroglyphic form. They are written in boustrophædon manner, with the syllables of a word one above another, and the characters raised, instead of incised. The monuments accompanying the inscriptions show a people generally beardless, with the pointed hat, a loose tunic, and boots turned up at the toes. They prove that the Hittites penetrated and conquered the whole of Asia Minor at a period before any history known to us of that region, and that they possessed a high civilization, such as could construct the famous statue of "Niobe," or Cybele, in Mount Sipylus. It is probable that from them, quite as much as from the Phœnicians, the Greeks drew the rudiments of their art; while the Cypriote and Lycian letters, and so the supplemental letters of the Greek alphabet, came very probably from the Hittites. Theirs was the primitive civilization, so far as we know, of Syria, and of Asia Minor from Smyrna to Lake Van.

Their language is not yet certainly known, as their writing is still undeciphered. They were almost certainly not Shemitic, as the hundreds of names that have come to us, except a few in the Bible which were easily borrowed from their Phœnician and Hebrew neighbors, do not easily yield a Shemitic etymology. Such Scripture names as Ephron, Zohar, Joram, Uriah, Elon, Beer, Judith, and Basemath, are plainly Shemitic, and may be either adopted or translated names; but such names as Khita-sar and Khilip-sar (king of Khita and king of Helbon?), with the word "sar" (if it means king; which is a loan word, and not originally Shemitic) following its noun, show a non-Shemitic construction. It is, besides, difficult to see how a really inflecting language could invent or use syllabic characters. It is probable that the Hittites had their origin in the mountainous region of Central and Eastern Asia Minor, and spoke a Proto-Armenian or Alarodian language.

Of their religion we know little. Ashima is mentioned (2 Kings xvii. 30) as a god of Hamath. At Ibreez we have a figure of the great Hittite god, Sandan, — a god of agriculture. At Boghaz Keui are found nearly twenty figures of male and female deities. The Syrian god Adad, or Hadad, may have been originally Hittite. With the softened aspirate we seem to have the name in Hadoram, son of King Toi of Hamath, another form of whose name is given (2 Sam. viii. 10) as Joram; the writer in 1 Chron. xviii. 10 choosing a form meaning Adad is exalted, rather than one meaning Jehovah is exalted. It is remarkable, however, that, on the Assyrian monuments, the element Jehovah enters into the name of the King Jaubihid, who is also called Ilu-bihid. This, however, belongs to a late period, when the Syrians were replacing the Hittites.

HITZIG, Ferdinand, a learned and bold exegete and critic of the Old Testament; the son of a rationalistic preacher; was b. at Haningen in Baden, June 23, 1807; d. at Heidelberg, Jan. 22, 1875. He pursued the study of theology at Heidelberg under Paulus, at Halle under Gesenius, and at Göttingen under Ewald, to whom he afterwards dedicated his Isaiah as the "founder of a new science of the Hebrew language and Old-Testament exegesis." In 1830 he became docent at Heidelberg; and in 1832 was called to Zurich, where he remained till 1861, when he was chosen as Umbreit's successor in Heidelberg. At Zurich Hitzig publicly announced himself in favor of calling Strauss. He was a man on the one hand without fear or hypocrisy, and on the other of a polemic temperament and caustic wit, which seemed to exclude personal piety and gentleness. Notwithstanding this, however, he was of pious nature, and not only loved the Old Testament, but sought to serve the kingdom of God by his investigations. He enjoyed the esteem of his colleagues and friends. We can adopt the words of Keim, in the dedication of his History of Jesus (January, 1875, 2d ed., etc.): "To the memory of F. Hitzig, the honest man without fear, the faithful friend without deceit, the pride of Zurich and Heidelberg, the bold, restless architect of biblical science."

As an exegete and critic Hitzig was distinguished by untiring industry, acute penetration, uncorruptible love of truth, and thorough scholarship. He often succeeded, as in the department of textual criticism; but the number of confident but untenable assertions preponderate. The Commentary on Isaiah is his best work. We agree with Hupfeld, that the translation shows the hand of a master, but with him must regret the author's failure "to understand the religious spirit of the prophet, and his apparent resolution to detect the most improbable, and to overlook the most natural sense." This is especially true of the second part of The Psalms (Heidelberg, new and enlarged edition, 1863-65), wherein the author, in all earnestness, not only puts the larger number of the psalms in the century just before Christ, but gives the circumstances under which each was written as exactly as though he could hear the grass growing under his feet (Bleek: Eint. ins A. T., p. 619). In 1869-70 the History of the People of Israel appeared (Leipzig). It comes down to 72 B.C.; but it was not the author's intention to give a history of the religion of Israel. Its assumptions are, as might be expected, numerous and arbitrary. The sojourn in the wilderness, for example, is put down at four years. He hazarded many conjectures where none were needed. In 1855 Ewald espied in his old pupil a real intellectual brother of Hengstenberg.

It was a want of what the English call common sense which prevented this gifted and truth-loving investigator to such a remarkable degree from becoming an exemplary exegete and a trustworthy historian. Ewald was fully justified when he complained that Hitzig made that which was beautiful, and tender in Solomon's Song disagreeable and repulsive; that he, in an almost incredible manner, declared the first nine chapters of the Proverbs to have been the last composed, etc. But, in spite of this, he will always have a place of prominence among his contemporaries, and his works will for a long time remain a fountain of quickening to many.

LIT. — Besides the works already mentioned Hitzig wrote Begriff d. Kritik, aus A. T. praktisch erörtert (Heidelberg, 1831), Commentaries on Jeremiah (1811, 2d ed., 1866), Ezekiel (1817), Ecclesiastes (1817), Daniel (1850), Song of Solomon (1855), Proverbs (Zürich, 1858), Minor Prophets (3d ed., 1863), Job (Heidelberg, 1874). Also on the New Testament, Joh. Markus u. s. Schriften, Zürich, 1843; Zur Kritik paulinischer Briefe, Leipzig, 1870; Ostern u. Pfingsten. Zur Zeitbestim. im A. u. N. T., Heidelberg, 1838; Grabschrift d. Darbus, Zürich, 1840; and d. Eschlummezar, Leipzig, 1855; Bibl. Theologie und messian. Wissag., ed. J. J. KNEPCKER, Karlsruhe, 1880, etc. Hitzig was also a contributor to SCHENKEL'S Bibel-Lexikon and many periodicals. KAMPHAUSEN.

HOADLY, Benjamin, a distinguished Low-

Church divine and controversial writer of the Church of England; b. at Westerham, Kent, Nov. 14, 1676; d. at Winchester, April 17, 1761. He was a student and fellow of Catherine College, Cambridge; became rector of St. Peter-le-Poor, London, 1704, and Streatham, 1710; Bishop of Bangor, 1715; was soon translated to Hereford, to Salisbury (1723), and to Winchester (1734). Hoadly was one of the most able and influential prelates of the eighteenth century, and one of the earliest representatives of the principle of ecclesiastical toleration in the Church of England after the Restoration (1660). He was a typical Broad or Low Churchman. His name is more intimately associated than any other with the so-called "Bangorian Controversy," which engaged the pens of fifty writers, some of them, like Law and Sherlock, among the ablest of their day, and produced an intense excitement among all classes. It arose from a sermon preached by Hoadly in 1717 from John xviii. 36 ("My kingdom is not of this world"); in which he declared for political toleration irrespective of church connection, and asserted, as against the crown and clergy, that Christ was the only authoritative lawgiver, etc., in the Church. He deprecated in the strongest language "men's suffering in their temporal rights upon account of any differences in those points in which the reason of mankind permits them to differ" (Preface to The Common Rights of Subjects). This sermon was brought up for consideration in convocation (1717); and its discussion threatened to lead to such disastrous consequences, that the body was prorogued by the crown, and did not sit again till 1852. Hoadly's chief work on this controversy was his Common Rights of Subjects defended, and the Nature of the Sacramental Test considered: an Answer to Dr. Sherlock's Vindication of the Corporation and Test Acts, London, 1719. Among his other writings were an Essay on Miracles (1702), A Brief Vindication of the Ancient Prophets (1709), and Sermons (2 vols., 1754-55). Collected edition of his works, with a Life, in 3 vols., London, 1773. See also STOUTON: Religion in England, v. 412 sqq.

HOBART, John Henry, Protestant-Episcopal Bishop of New York; b. in Philadelphia, Sept. 11, 1775; d. at Auburn, Sept. 10, 1830. He graduated at Princeton 1793, and was tutor there from 1796 to 1798. After holding several parishes, he became assistant minister of Trinity, New York, assistant bishop of the diocese of New York 1811, and bishop in 1816. He took a deep interest in the General Theological Seminary, New-York City, and was made professor of pastoral theology and pulpit eloquence in 1821. In 1823 he travelled in Europe on account of his health, and was one of the first Protestants to preach in Rome. He was a zealous advocate of episcopal ordination, and engaged in a controversy with Dr. John M. Mason (Presbyterian) of New York on that subject. Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., preserves in its name the memory of the bishop. Among Dr. Hobart's writings were Companion to the Altar, New York, 1804, 13th ed., 1840; Apology for Apost. Order, New York, 1807, new ed., 1811; Sermons on Redemption, 2 vols., London and New York, 1824. See Posthumous Works, with a Memoir by Dr. BERRAN (New York, 1833, 3 vols.), and Memoir of Bishop Hobart by SCHROEDER (New York, 1833).

HOBBS, Thomas, b. at Malmesbury, in Wiltshire, April 5, 1588; d. at Hardwick Hall, in Devonshire, Dec. 4, 1679. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and spent the first part of his life, up to 1637, as tutor in various noble families, often travelling on the Continent with his pupils, and the last, after 1637, in a comprehensive and vigorous literary activity, first in Paris (1641-52), then in London, or in the country with the Hardwick family. His principal works are Elementa Philosophica de Cive (1642), Human Nature and De Corpore Politico (1650), Leviathan (1651, new ed., Oxford, 1881, London, 1882), Liberty and Necessity (1654), etc. His moral and political works were first collected in 1750; all his works in 1839-45, by Molesworth. The Vita Hobbianæ Auctorium gives full information concerning early editions, translations, etc. The philosophical stand-point of Hobbes may be described as an application to the study of man of the method and principles of the study of nature; and the results of this process were a psychology and a morals utterly antagonistic, not only to Christianity, but to religion in general. On account of the merely preliminary stage which the science of nature had reached in the time of Hobbes, his conception is premature; but he carried it out with great vigor; and it happens, not unfrequently, that the materialistic psychology and utilitarian morals of to-day return to his writings, and adopt some modification of his paradoxes. There is no comprehensive monograph on Hobbes. See the art. by G. CROOM ROBERTSON, in Encyclopædia Britannica.

HOCHMANN, Ernst Christof, surnamed Hochenaу, b. 1670; d. 1721; studied law at Halle, but was relegated from the university on account of his participation in the extravagances of the Pietists. In 1697 he entered into relation with Arnold and Dippel, and repaired to Francofort with the aim of converting the Jews. But riots arose; and he retired to the estates of Count Wittgenstein, the refuge of all separatists and mystics. From 1700 to 1721 he wandered about, preaching in public, conducting worship in private, denouncing the lukewarmness of the clergy, etc. He was often arrested,—at Detmold 1702, Hanover 1703, Nuremberg 1708-09, Halle 1711, etc.; but he found also many adherents, especially at Crefeld, Duisburg, Muhlheim, Wesel, Enmerich, and other places in the Rhine-region. Full account of his views, influence, writings, etc., is found in M. GÖBEL: Geschichte des christlichen Lebens in der rhein-westfäl. Kirche, Coblenz, 1852, vol. ii.

HODGE, Charles, D.D., LL.D., of Scotch-Irish ancestry on his father's side, and through his mother related to the French Huguenots; b. Dec. 18, 1797, in Philadelphia, where his grandfather, a Christian merchant from the north of Ireland, had settled in 1735, and where his father, a godly physician, died when the subject of this sketch was only six months old; d. in Princeton, N.J., June 19, 1878. He matriculated at the College of New Jersey in 1812, and after graduation entered in 1816 the theological seminary in Princeton, having among his classmates his two life-long friends,—John Johns, afterwards bishop of Virginia, and Charles P. Melvaine, afterwards bishop of Ohio. In 1822 he was appointed by the General Assembly professor of biblical and Oriental literature. In 1822 he married Sarah Bache, great-grand-daughter of Benjamin Franklin. Soon after, he went abroad (1826-28) to prosecute special studies, and in Paris, Halle, and Berlin attended the lectures of De Sacy, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, and Neander. In 1825 he founded the Biblical Repository and Princeton Review, and during forty years was its editor, and the principal contributor to its pages. He received the degree of D.D. from Rutgers College in 1831, and that of LL.D. from Washington College, Pennsylvania, in 1864. In 1840 Dr. Hodge was transferred to the chair of didactic theology, retaining still, however, the department of New Testament exegesis, the duties of which he continued to discharge until his death. He was moderator of the General Assembly in 1846. Fifty years of his professoriate were completed in 1872, and the event was most impressively celebrated on the 23d of April. A large concourse, including four hundred of his own pupils, assembled to do him honor. Representatives from various theological institutes, at home and abroad, mingled their congratulations with those of his colleagues; and letters expressing deepest sympathy with the occasion came from distinguished men in all quarters of the land and from across the sea. Dr. Hodge enjoyed what President Woolsey, at the jubilee just referred to, hoped he might enjoy,—“a sweet old age.” He lived in the midst of his children and grandchildren; and, when the last moment came, they gathered round him. “Dearest,” he said to a beloved daughter, “don't weep. To be absent from the body is to be present with the Lord. To be with the Lord is to see him. To see the Lord is to be like him.” Of the children who survive him, three are ministers of the gospel; and two of these succeed him in the faculty of Princeton Theological Seminary,—Dr. C. W. Hodge, in the department of exegetical theology, and Dr. A. A. Hodge, in that of dogmatics. The latter wrote his father's biography (1880).

Dr. Hodge was a voluminous writer, and from the beginning to the end of his theological career his pen was never idle. In 1835 he published his Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans, his greatest exegetical work, and one of the most masterly commentaries on this Epistle that has ever been written. Other works followed at intervals of longer or shorter duration,—Constitutional History of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, 1840; Way of Life, 1841, republished in England, translated into other languages, and circulated to the extent of thirty-five thousand copies in America; Commentary on Ephesians, 1856; on First Corinthians, 1857; on Second Corinthians, 1859. His magnum opus is the Systematic Theology (1871-73), of 3 vols. 8vo. and extending to 2260 pages. His last book, What is Darwinism? appeared in 1874. In addition to all this, it must be remembered that he contributed upwards of one hundred and thirty articles to the Princeton Review, many of which, besides exerting a powerful influence at the time of their publication, have since been gathered into volumes, and as Princeton Essays, Hodge's Essays (1857), and Hodge's Discussions in Church Polity (ed. Rev. William Durant, 1878), have taken a permanent place in our theological literature.

This record of Dr. Hodge's literary life is suggestive of the great influence that he exerted. But, if we would properly estimate that influence, we must remember that three thousand ministers of the gospel passed under his instruction, and that to him was accorded the rare privilege, during the course of a long life, of achieving distinction as a teacher, exegete, preacher, controversialist, ecclesiastic, and systematic theologian. As a teacher he had few equals; and, if he did not display popular gifts in the pulpit, he revealed homiletical powers of a high order in the "conferences" on sabbath afternoons, where he spoke with his accustomed clearness and logical precision, but with great spontaneity, and amazing tenderness and unction.

Dr. Hodge's literary powers were seen at their best in his contributions to the Princeton Review, many of which are acknowledged masterpieces of controversial writing. They cover a wide range of topics, from the apologetic questions that concern our common Christianity, to questions of ecclesiastical administration, in which only Presbyterians have been supposed to take interest. But the questions in debate among American theologians during the period covered by Dr. Hodge's life, belonged, for the most part, to the departments of anthropology and soteriology; and it was upon these, accordingly, that his polemic powers were mainly employed.

Though always honorable in debate, we should nevertheless not be likely to have a correct idea of his character, if we judged him only by the polemic relations in which his writings reveal him. Controversy does not emphasize the amiable side of a man's nature. Dr. Hodge was a man of warm affection, of generous impulses, and of John-like piety. Devotion to Christ was the salient characteristic of his experience, and it was the test by which he judged the experience of others. Hence, though a Presbyterian and a Calvinist, his sympathies went far beyond the boundaries of sect. He refused to entertain the narrow views of church polity which some of his brethren advocated. He repudiated the unhistorical position of those who denied the validity of Roman-Catholic baptism. He gave his sympathy to all good agencies. He was conservative by nature, and his life was spent in defending the Reformed theology as set forth in the Westminster symbols. He was fond of saying that Princeton had never originated a new idea; but this meant no more than that Princeton was the advocate of historical Calvinism in opposition to the modified and provincial Calvinism of a later day. And it is true that Dr. Hodge must be classed among the great defenders of the faith, rather than among the great constructive minds of the Church. He had no ambition to be epoch-making by marking the era of a new departure. But he has earned a higher title to fame, in that he was the champion of his Church's faith during a long and active life, her trusted leader in time of trial, and for more than half a century the most conspicuous teacher of her ministry. The garnered wisdom of his life is given us in his Systematic Theology, the greatest system of dogmatics in our language. FRANCIS L. PATTON.

HODY, Humphrey, b. at Odcombe, Somersetshire, Jan. 1, 1659; d. at Oxford, Jan. 20, 1706. In 1684 he became fellow of Wadham College, Oxford, in 1698 Regius Professor of Greek, and in 1704 archdeacon of Oxford. In reward of his support of the ruling party in their treatment of the bishops, who had been deprived for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, he was appointed (1693) chaplain to Archbishop Tillotson and Tenison successively. But he lives as author of a classic work, De bibliorum textibus originalibus versionibus Græcis et Latina Vulgata, libri iv., Oxford, 1705.

HOE VON HOHENECC, b. at Vienna, 1580; d. at Dresden, 1615; studied at Wittenberg; and was appointed third preacher to the electoral court of Saxony 1602, superintendent of Plauen 1603, and first court-preacher at Dresden 1612. In this position he exercised an almost absolute influence on the elector's relations with Gustavus Adolphus and the emperor. But his hatred of the Calvinists made him a friend of the Roman Catholics; and he lent a willing hand to the machinations of the Jesuits in Bohemia, simply out of rancor against the Reformed creed. Besides some polemical essays, he wrote Commentar. in Apocalypsin, 1610-40, 2 vols. THOLUCK.

HOFACKER, Ludwig and Wilhelm, two brothers of rare piety and ministerial usefulness. Their father was pastor and dekan in Stuttgart. Ludwig was b. at Wildbad, April 15, 1798; was vicar in Stuttgart, and d. Nov. 18, 1828, as pastor in Rielingshausen, Württemberg, after a short ministry of four years, and with the words "Saviour, Saviour!" Wilhelm was b. in Gärtringen, Feb. 16, 1805; pastor at Waiblingen 1833, and of St. Leonard's Church, Stuttgart, 1835, where he d. Aug. 10, 1848, "a prince of God, with words of eternal life on his lips." Thousands flocked to hear both the brothers. The former appealed directly to the conscience; destroying the sinner's confidence in the righteousness of works, and presenting the atonement by Christ's blood as the only hope of the soul. He said, "I attack souls as with the approach of a storm." He was a popular orator, who is sometimes startling, but always rugged, positive, and powerful. Wilhelm likewise preached only on the fundamental themes of grace and guilt, but his rhetoric was more artistic and finished than his brother's. The former, those would prefer who would rather drink from a fresh, rushing, forest-brook; the latter, those who would rather kneel at the clear, placid, deep waters of a lovely lake. The Hofackers exerted a lasting influence upon the religious life of Württemberg, and thousands of copies of their sermons have been distributed.

HOFFMANN, Andreas Gottlieb, b. at Welbsleben, near Magdeburg, April 13, 1796; d. at Jena, March 16, 1861; studied theology at Halle, more especially Oriental languages, under Gesenius, and was appointed professor of theology at Jena in 1821. His principal works are Grammatica Syriaca, Halle, 1827, twice translated into English by Day and Harris Cowper; and Entwurf d. hebräischen Alterthümer, Weimar, 1832.

HOFFMANN, Daniel, b. at Halle, 1540; d. at Wolfenbüttel, 1611; studied theology at Jena; and was appointed professor at Helmstädt in 1576, but dismissed in 1601. The occasion of his dismissal was a controversy with his colleague, Caselius, which brought much disturbance into the working of the university. Hoffmann was a pupil of Ramus, and held that there were two kinds of truth, — the philosophical and the theological; that the former absolutely contradicted the latter; that philosophy could not be studied without great harm to the student, etc. Caselius was a humanist, and protested that there were not two kinds of truth, but only two means of grasping it, — reason and revelation; that philosophy and theology were perfectly agreed when truly understood; that philosophy was an indispensable aid to the study of theology, etc. In the heat of the controversy Hoffmann was led to make more than one doubtful assertion; and the theologians of the strict Lutheran school, who probably held the same views as he, left him alone in the field, provoked as they were by his previous attacks on the doctrine of ubiquity. The principal questions were, nevertheless, well put and well debated; and the controversy has some interest for the study of the relation between philosophy and theology. See THOMASIVS: De Controv. Hoffmanniana, Erlangen, 1844; SCHLEE: Der Streit des D. H., Marb., 1870. WAGENMANN.

HOFFMANN, Ludwig Friedrich Wilhelm, court-preacher in Berlin, and general-superintendent of Brandenburg; b. Oct. 30, 1806, in Leonberg, Württemberg, the birthplace of Schelling and Paulus; d. of heart-disease, Aug. 28, 1873, in Berlin. His father was a thoughtful pietist, and founder of the religious colony of Kornthal (1819). His brother Christoph was the originator of a movement for the colonization of Palestine. After passing through a theological course at Tübingen, where he had David Strauss for a fellow-student, he became vicar of Heunaden, and in 1834 pastor in Stuttgart. In 1839 he was made superintendent of the Institution for Missions in Basel. There he remained for twelve years, giving himself up with great enthusiasm to his duties and the study of the history of missions. During this period he published a number of works on missions, as Missionsstunden u. Vorträge ("Missionary Talks and Discourses"), Stuttgart, 1847, 1851, 1853; D. Epochen d. Kirchengesch. Indiens ("Epochs in the Church History of India"), 1853, etc. From Basel he passed to Tübingen as professor; and from there, in 1852, he followed the call of Frederick William IV. as court-preacher to Berlin. He exerted a greater influence over the king of Prussia than any other man, in favor of ecclesiastical union. He was strongly in favor of a union of the Reformed and Lutheran churches on the basis of the Augsburg Confession, so that there might be "one evangelical Protestant Church with two confessional types." Hoffmann was an indefatigable worker, and exerted a powerful influence as an evangelical preacher who sympathized with the theology of Bengel. But more attractive and imposing than his literary attainments was the frank and magnanimous personality of the man. [He was chosen a delegate to the conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York in 1873, but died before it met.] He published a number of volumes of sermons under the titles Ruf zum Herrn (Berlin, 1851–58), D. Posaune Deutschlands (1861–63), etc. See Leben u. Wirken d. Dr. Hoffmann, by his son, Berlin, 1878–80, 2 vols. RUDOLF KÖGEL.

HOFFMANN, Melchior, one of the most prominent Anabaptist leaders, a furrier by trade; was b. at Hall in Suabia; worked in Livonia when the Reformation reached those regions; threw himself with the native enthusiasm of his character into the movement; began to preach, met with great opposition; repaired to Wittenberg (1525), and returned with recommendations from Luther; caused great excitement in Dorpat and Reval, and was finally expelled from the country. On his return to Germany he was very coldly received by the Reformers, but obtained, nevertheless, an appointment as preacher at Kiel, in Holstein, 1527. Soon after, however, he began an attack on Luther's doctrine of the Lord's Supper. A commission was formed to investigate matters; and he was convicted of heresy, and expelled from Holstein 1529. His divergence from Luther made him at first well received at Strassburg, but it soon became apparent that he inclined towards the Anabaptists. He began to publish prophecies, and soon placed himself openly at the head of the party. In Emden he caused sore disturbances in 1536; and on his return to Strassburg he was arrested, and kept in prison for the rest of his life. He probably died in 1542. See lives by HERRMANN, Strassb., 1852 [ZUR LINDEN, Leiden, 1885]. CUNITZ.

HÖFLING, Johann Wilhelm Friedrich, b. at Drossenfeld, near Bayreuth, 1802; d. in Munich, April 5, 1853; studied theology at Erlangen, 1819–23, and was appointed pastor of St. Jobst, near Nuremberg, 1827; professor of theology at Erlangen, 1833; and member of the consistory in Munich, 1852. His principal works are Das Sakrament der Taufe (1846–48, 2 vols.) and Grundsätze evangelisch-lutherischer Kirchenverfassung (1850), occasioned by the movement of 1848, which also called forth a debate of the question of church constitution. His Liturgisches Urkundenbuch (1854) was published after his death, by Thomasius and Harnack. HERZOG.

HOFMANN, Johann Chr. Karl, afterwards honored by Bavaria with the title von Hofmann; was b. Dec. 21, 1810, in Nürnberg, where, under the tutelage of a poor but pious mother, he was trained up in profound respect for religion; d. Dec. 20, 1877, in Erlangen. In 1827 he went to the university of Erlangen, and in 1829 to Berlin, walking on foot. Hegel, Schleiermacher, Neander, and Hengstenberg were lecturing side by side at the time. But Hofmann gave himself up almost exclusively to historical studies, under Ranke and Von Raumer. After teaching several years at the gymnasium in Erlangen, he became repent at the university, and in 1835 writes: "The more I occupy myself with Scripture exegesis, the more powerfully am I convinced of the certainty that the divine Word is one single work, and the more am I stimulated with the glad hope that our generation will witness the victory of the truth of inspiration. . . . It is a sheer impossibility that the prophecies of the prophets and apostles are false, while their doctrines are true; for here form and contents, fact and doctrine, are one; and this is the distinguishing characteristic of revealed truth. . . . I pray God to permit me to see the Christ, now crucified by his enemies, lifted up by Himself, that I may place my hands in the print of the nails, and may know him, in the glory of his victory, whom I have heretofore loved in the humility of his conflict and suffering." In 1841 he was made professor at Erlangen; the year following, accepted a call to Rostock, exchanging a lecture-room with one hundred hearers, for one with only three; and returned in 1845 to Erlangen, a new period of prosperity for the university dating from that time. While at Rostock he took a deep interest in ecclesiastical matters, laboring zealously with Karsten, Wichern, and others, in the interest of missions. He was also interested in political affairs, and represented Erlangen and Fürth at several sessions of the Bavarian Parliament.

Among Hofmann's first publications were two historical works. — Gesch. d. Aufbruchs in d. Sieben-ten (1837) and Weltgesch. f. Gymnasien (1839, 2d ed., 1843). His first effort in theology was D. 70 Jahre d. Jeremias u. d. 70 Jahre d. Daniel (1836). The 70 weeks of Daniel he counts in the order 62+1+7 (see DANIEL). The 62 extend from 605 to 171 B.C.; the single week, from 171 to 164. The other 7 mark the intervening period before Christ's coming. Weissagung u. Erfüllung im A. u. N. Test. (1841-44) appeared at a time when two views of prophecy prevailed. Hengstenberg petrified it into simple prediction; speculative criticism dissipated it into presentiment, and placed the prophecies after events. Hofmann brought prophecy into closest connection with history, and treated it as an organic whole. History itself is prophecy; and each period contains the germ of the future, and pre-figures it. The entire scriptural history is a prophecy of the final and eternal relation between God and man. The incarnation marks the beginning of the essential fulfilment; for Christ is the new man, the antitype of the old; but it marks only the beginning of this fulfilment; for the head is only the realization of the intended perfect communion with God, when it is joined with the body of believers. Prophecy in the Old Testament becomes ever richer and richer in its forms, but points only to one goal,—the God-man. He is then, in turn, the starting-point for new prophecy and hope; his appearance being the prefigurement of the final glorification of the church of believers. The permanent worth of this work consists in the proof that the Old and New Testaments are parts of a single history of salvation; displaying the gradual realization, by divine interpositions, of redemption for the race.

Hofmann's second great work, D. Schriftbeweis (1852-56, 2 vols., 2d ed., 1857-60), is an attempt to prove the authenticity and divine origin of Christianity from its records. He lamented the usual method of doing this from single passages of Scripture; and himself sought to use the biblical record in its entirety, as one organic whole. He started from the idea, that, to understand Christianity, it was not necessary to describe religious experiences, nor rehearse the doctrines of the Scriptures and the Church, but to develop the simple fact that makes us Christians, or the communion of God with man, mediated by Christ. Herein he differs fundamentally from Schleiermacher, who starts out from the sense of absolute dependence in the Christian's experience. Hofmann starts with the new birth. The results at which they arrive in their systems are likewise different. With Hofmann, all is historical; with Schleiermacher, nothing. This work aroused opposition. The author had denied the doctrine of vicarious atonement, and the charge was made against him of denying the atonement altogether. To this he replied in Schutzschriften (1856-59).

Hofmann's other works were D. heil. Schrift. N. T.'s (1862-81, 9 parts), Theol. Ethik (1878), Vermischte Aufsätze (Erlangen, 1878), Encyclopädie der Theologie (1879), and Biblische Hermeneutik (1880), both published in Nördlingen. [See GRAU: Erinnerungen an J. C. K. v. Hofmann, Gütersloh, 1879.] ALBERT HAUCK.

HOFMEISTER, Sebastian, whose true name was Wagner, hence his learned colleagues called him sometimes Economus (a translation of the first-mentioned name), or Carpentarius (a translation of the last); was b. at Schaffhausen, 1476; studied in Paris, under Faber Stapulensis, and was, after his return to Switzerland, appointed lector in the Franciscan convent at Zürich. Having adopted the ideas of the Reformation, he was soon removed from Zürich to Lucern; but, as he caused great disturbance there too, he returned in 1522 to his native city. In Schaffhausen he found a better reception; and, after the two conferences at Zürich (January and December, 1523), the Reformation was introduced, and he was made pastor of St. John. He was suspected, however, of inclining towards Anabaptism, and was in 1525 sent by the magistrate to Basel, to have his orthodoxy examined and verified. As the examination did not result in the certificate needed, Hofmeister went to Zürich, where he became Zwingli's trusted collaborator, and pastor of the Fraumünster. In 1528 he went for a short time to Berne, as professor of Hebrew, and was finally appointed preacher at Zofingen, where he died 1533. See M. KIRCHHOFFER: S. Wagner, genannt Hofmeister, Zürich, 1808.

HOGE, Moses, b. at Cedar Creek, Va., Feb. 15, 1752; d. in Philadelphia, July 5, 1820. He was ordained in the Presbyterian Church 1782, president of Hampden-Sidney College 1807-20, and professor in the seminary there 1812-20. He was much admired as a preacher. By his widely circulated Christian Panoply (1799), in reply to Paine's Age of Reason, he exerted a great influence. A volume of his sermons appeared in 1821.

HOHENLOHE-WALDENBURG-SCHILLINGS-FÜRST, Alexander Leopold Franz Emerich, Prince of, b. at Kupferzell, near Waldenburg, Aug. 17, 1794; d. at Vöslau, near Baden, Nov. 17, 1849; received a very desultory education at Vienna, Berne, and the seminaries of Tyruau and Ellwangen; was ordained priest in 1816; visited Rome, and then settled in Bavaria, where he labored in Munich, Bamberg, and Würzburg, preaching and writing. After making the acquaintance of Martin Miell, a peasant who cured sick people by prayers, the prince also began to work miraculous cures. The sensation he produced was enormous; but the police interfered, and the Pope dared not recognize the miracles. In 1825 he quietly retired to a canonry in Grosswardein in Hungary. In 1844 he was made bishop in partibus. In 1848 he was expelled from Hungary by the revolutionists. See his life by A. FEUERBACH and by SCHAROLD, treating at length the question of the miraculous cures, the one pro, the other contra.

HOLBACH, Paul Heinrich Dietrich, Baron d', b. at Heidelberg, in the Palatinate, 1723; d. at his estate of Grandval, Jan. 21, 1789; lived mostly in Paris, and acquired a kind of celebrity by gathering around his table the "philosophers" of that time, and by writing, or causing to be written, some of the most characteristic books of the age. As those books were printed in foreign countries, and published anonymously, the authorship is in many cases doubtful. The most remarkable of them is the Système de la nature (London, 1770), which found nothing, either in nature or in history, but matter and motion. Le bon sens (1772) is a popularization of the Système de la nature, and did much harm by penetrating into the lower social classes. Le christianisme dévoilé, L'imposture sacerdotale, L'esprit du clergé, etc., are of less importance. HOLINESS. See SANCTIFICATION.

HOLINESS OF GOD is, as Quenstedt substantially defined it, God's perfect and essential purity, and freedom from all defect and blemish (summa omnique labis expers in Deo puritas). The Hebrew word קֹדֶשׁ ("holy," to "make holy") etymologically referred, not to the moral but the material nature; but there are no instances of its use in the latter sense. It was only used in the department of religion among the Hebrews; and, although the application of the term to the external relations of persons and things to religious purposes is the oldest, it is undeniable that the word derived its meaning alone from the idea of God which prevails in the Old Testament. The term seems to come from קָדַשׁ, which suggests the notion of separation, and especially separation of that which is defective or diseased. The latter is the meaning of the Assyrian kadistu. This word is found in an Assyrian oath (see Cuneiform Inscriptions of Western Asia, II. p. 17) at the side of its Sumerian equivalent nugig, which is compounded of nu ("not") and gig ("diseased").

The central idea of holiness is not unapproachableness, or exaltation above the earth, as Schultz thinks (A. P. Theologie, p. 517); nor is it an aesthetic quality, and synonymous with the glory which surrounds Jehovah in his revelation to Israel (Dumm, Theol. d. Propheten, pp. 169 sqq.). God is glorious because he is holy (Exod. xv. 11); and his glory is only the outward expression, as it were, of his holiness. Holiness is absolute freedom from evil and all defect, absolute perfection of life, especially of ethical life (Oehler). God is said to be holy, not in such a way as to exclude all other beings from holiness, but because he is so in a peculiar manner (1 Sam. ii. 2). Absolute holiness is an essential attribute of his nature. It is from this centre that the ideas of his unapproachableness, incomparableness, and glory irradiate.

Special objects and rites were by the law of Sinai invested with the quality of holiness. God likewise desires men to be holy, and is himself approachable for all such as he calls and sanctifies (1 Sam. vi. 20; Ps. xxiv. 3, etc.); his holiness is no barrier to them. His Spirit is called holy, because its work is to awaken and promote religious life in the soul (Ps. cxliii. 10); and the fallen and penitent man of God beseeches that it may not be taken away from him (Ps. li. 11). Human holiness in the New Testament is represented as starting at the centre of man's being,—his heart,—and as extending outwards to his acts and words. The representation of the Old Testament represents it as starting at the surface (Deut. xiv. 21), and penetrating inwards to the heart. That of the Old Testament is more ceremonial, but by no means exclusively so. The law also made the holiness of Israel conditional on obedience to the divine will (Exod. xix. 5 sq.; Lev. xx. 7 sq.), that is, upon a moral qualification; and the exhortations of the Old Testament are everywhere based upon moral considerations and a moral aim. See the Theologies of the Old Testament, of SCHULTZ and OEHLER [and the discussion of the subject under Attributes, in the works on systematic theology]. DELITZSCH.

HOLLAND. The inhabitants possess full religious liberty. All the adherents of the different creeds have equal civil and political rights and privileges, and enjoy entire freedom of administration in every thing relating to their religion and its exercise. The various denominations, which were avowed by the constitution of 1815, are subsidized by the State. The total thus expended in 1883 was about eight hundred thousand dollars. In the north-east the Protestants preponderate; in the south, the Roman Catholics; while in the central provinces both are fairly represented. In the last fifty years there has been amid the entire population a slight but steady increase in the proportion of Protestants and Jews, and a corresponding decrease of Roman Catholics.

The census which follows is that of the year 1879; but in some of the following paragraphs, figures of a later date have been obtained, and are so stated.

By the authorities the population is classified thus as regards religion:—

I. THE PROTESTANT CHURCHES. (a) The Netherlandish Reformed.—In 1617 Carleton, the English ambassador, stated, that, in Olden Barne-veldt's opinion, the greater part of the inhabitants of the United Provinces, and especially of the Province of Holland, were Roman Catholics. Yet in 1648, when the eighty-years' war was concluded by the Peace of Westphalia, the Reformed Confession alone was acknowledged as rightful. Its adherents, therefore, became the State Church, and so continued to be until the revolution of 1795, when all confessions were put on an equality. This relation to the State led to the formation of many Reformed churches, and that even in places where the small number of Protestants forbade the hope of a permanent organization. To this is due the fact, that many of these churches, especially in North Brabant, Zeeland, and Guelderland, ceased to exist when the connection with the State was broken off; and that the number of parishes, notwithstanding an increase in certain places after 1815, on the whole made small progress during the last hundred years. In the year 1784 there were about fifteen hundred congregations. Through the fall of the State Church these were reduced, in 1815, to about fourteen hundred and fifty; while now they have recovered, and number sixteen hundred and eleven. In the places where almost the whole population became Protestant, we observe a pretty regular increase, as, for example, in Friesland, which in 1604 had a hundred and eighty congregations, in 1784 two hundred and ten, and now has two hundred and thirty-six.

When the Church became free from the State, it felt the lack of a proper independent organization; and all efforts to remedy this evil fell through amidst the troubles of the times. In the year 1816 King William I., who went back not only to the traditions of the earlier period, but even beyond them, gave a constitution to the Church just as if it still, even in its inner working, was under governmental direction. In the general joy at the termination of the long period of confusion, this measure met with no opposition except in the classis of Amsterdam; and it is still to-day the basis of the existing church order, since it gave shape to "the general regulations of the Reformed Church" made in 1852. But, while these gave to the body greater independence than it had in 1816 (e.g., in relation to the choice of officers), they obtained the royal sanction, which at that time was indispensable, only under "eleven conditions," which, however, so far as they had not already become invalid, were withdrawn by the royal decree of July 22, 1870.

The body now forms one whole; and instead of being called, as of old, "The Reformed churches," its legal name is "The Reformed Church." It embraces all the reformed in the Netherlands, not only the Low-Dutch, but also the Walloons, the English Presbyterians, and the Scotch. The Walloon or French congregations are mainly composed of the refugees driven by persecution from France and Flanders. As the descendants of these gradually blended with the Netherlanders, their numbers as a distinct body decreased. In 1781 they had more than sixty ministers, in 1815 forty-seven ministers, with thirty-five congregations, but now have only seventeen congregations, with twenty-six ministers. The Presbyterian-English churches were formed only in those places where commercial intercourse, or the presence of an English garrison during the eighty-years' war, gave occasion for them. At present there exist only the one at Amsterdam, and that of the united Middleburg-Vlissingen. The only Scotch Church now remaining is that of Rotterdam, founded in 1613.

The Reformed Church (1884) numbers 1,345 congregations, with 1,611 ministers. Twenty years ago there were about two hundred candidates for the ministry at command for vacant charges; while now candidates are lacking for more than 280 vacancies. The congregations are divided into a hundred and thirty-eight smaller circles, or "Ringe," and into forty-four large circles, or "Classes." These classes constitute ten provincial bodies, to which is added an eleventh, called the "Walloon Commission." The organization culminates in the synod, which consists of nineteen members, thirteen ministers, and six elders, who are named by the provincial authorities, who, in turn, are chosen by the classes. The classical assemblies are the characteristic feature of the organism. They meet yearly for the election of officers and the consideration of such matters as are laid before them by the synod; and while, in the other assemblies, the ministers are twice as many as the elders, the classes are composed of all the ministers in their bounds, and an equal number of elders. The local congregation is governed by the consistory, which consists of an equal number of elders and deacons. Since 1867, in most cases, these, as well as the minister, are chosen by a college of representatives; these representatives being themselves chosen by the whole body of adult members, excepting such as are supported by the poor-funds of the church. This direct participation of the people in elections has in most of the churches, especially in the large cities, placed the power in the hands of the orthodox.

The management of the church property was in like manner directed by decrees of King William I., issued in 1819 and 1823; but these were reversed in October, 1869; and since that time most of the congregations have placed themselves under a general "Committee of Control," while the rest are altogether autonomous, and enjoy a so-called free administration.

From the beginning of the Reformation, the ministers were trained at the State universities, where theological faculties had been formed for this purpose. Although almost all candidates for the ministry took this method of preparation, it was not positively obligatory. The most recent law concerning the universities (in 1877) has released the professors from the duty of teaching the theology of the confessions; while in each university two professors, named by the synod of the Reformed Church, are charged with the duty of lecturing on dogmatic and practical theology. In 1883 the three State universities (Leyden, Utrecht, and Groningen), and that of the city of Amsterdam, together contained two hundred and twenty-eight students of theology.

Neither foreign nor domestic missions are carried on by the Church or its officers as such. And although the work finds little sympathy amid the growing materialism of the people, still, in later years, it has shown considerable activity, notwithstanding the divisions that prevail; which divisions, however, prevent the possibility of complete and accurate statistics. Besides the Moravian Society, which labored in the West Indies, there was until 1859 only the Netherlandish Missionary Society, which was founded in 1797. Now there are ten societies which send missionaries to the heathen and the Mohammedans, and one which confines itself to the Jews. In the year 1883 the receipts of these amounted to three hundred and fifty thousand gulden; and they employed a hundred and fifty-two missionaries, of whom sixty-six belonged to the Moravians, and twenty-five to the Rhenish union. The church-members are about a hundred thousand, and two hundred schools are attended by fourteen thousand scholars.

The public schools are "confessionless;" but there are hundreds of private schools, supported by Roman Catholics and Protestants, which base their teaching on Christianity. There are two considerable associations formed—one in 1860, the other in 1868—for the purpose of supporting and extending these schools.

Evangelistic work is carried on by several associations of believers, who together have forty-five evangelists in the field. Activity in this direction, as well as in work for lost children, fallen women, the blind, etc., is ever on the increase; although confessional differences hinder the desired co-operation among those who are of the same faith.

(b) The Christian Reformed.—In the third and fourth decades of this century there arose a reaction against the tendency to strip off from Christian faith all the peculiarities of the old confessions. This was supported by such men as DaCosta and Groen van Prinsterer, who never forsook the old church. In 1834 the first departure took place; but it was embarrassed by the law which forbade more than twenty persons to assemble for worship. In 1836 a royal decree, which was renewed in 1841, confirmed the law, but pointed out a way in which new congregations could be legally constituted. The first one thus formed was at Utrecht in 1839. But new decrees in 1849, 1852, and 1868, abrogated all restrictions; and the "Separatist Church" stood before the law like all the others, save that it drew no support from the treasury. In 1869 the synod at Middleburg united this body with certain other scattered congregations of like tendency, who had taken the name of "Churches under the Cross;" and henceforth the whole was known as the "Christian Reformed Church." It adheres in all essential points to the polity of the synod of Dort. Their general synod meets biennially. The ministers are trained at the theological seminary in Kampen, which has seven professors and seventy-nine students (1884). The number of churches rose from two hundred and twenty-six in 1860 to three hundred and seventy-one in 1884. The body has exerted a very happy influence upon the church from which they separated, by developing the power of the old faith, even when deprived of all support from the State.

(c) The Lutheran Church.—The Reformation entered the Netherlands under the form of Lutheranism. But this was soon supplanted, at first by the Baptists, and then by the Reformed; so that, from the middle of the sixteenth century, it has been of subordinate importance. The first congregation was formed at Woerden, and in the year 1566 it adopted the Augsburg Confession; but there was no bond between it and other like assemblies, until in 1605 seven ministers agreed upon a system of faith and worship. This ripened in 1612 into the so-called "Brotherhood," which had a synod which met at first at indefinite intervals, and afterwards every five years. The last one under the republic sat in 1696. In 1818 King William I. gave a new organization to the "Evangelical Lutheran Church," which, however, was modified in 1855 and 1859, so as to render the Church independent of the State. Since 1819 the synod meets yearly, consisting of fifteen members, of whom eight are ministers. The local church is governed by the consistory. During the past century the increase of the body has been slow. In 1784 there were forty-five churches and fifty-seven ministers; in 1815 forty-six churches and sixty ministers; in 1877 fifty churches and nine chapels, with sixty-two ministers. At first, ministers were educated abroad; but in 1816 a seminary was founded at Amsterdam, which now has two professors and six students.

Like all other Protestant bodies, this one felt the influence of rationalism. A re-action against this tendency appeared, in Amsterdam and elsewhere, in 1791, and led ultimately to an open break between the great majority and those who insisted upon maintaining the Augsburg Confession, Liturgy, etc. The latter, being excluded from the "Brotherhood," formed what was called the "Old Lutheran Church," which obtained legal sanction in 1835, and again in 1866. Its concerns are directed by a General Ecclesiastical Assembly, which consists of seventeen persons, of whom nine are clergymen. Candidates for the ministry were formerly educated at different schools in Amsterdam, but, since 1877, in the university, where one of the Lutheran ministers teaches dogmatics. The Old Lutherans now number eight churches and eleven ministers against four churches and seven ministers in 1815.

In course of time the sharp differences between the two bodies gradually became modified; and in 1874 the barriers which hindered the call of a minister of one church to a vacant pulpit in the other were done away.

(d) The Baptists.—These are often called "Menonites," from the famous Menno Simons, who died in 1559. They were distinguished from other Protestants, not only by the rejection of infant baptism, but also by the lack of any central organization. Hence the stringent discipline introduced by Menno led to various divisions, known as "Waterlanders" and "Flandrians," from the districts in which they lived; but these were finally adjusted in 1650. Not long afterwards, doctrinal differences produced a new division, in which the orthodox took the name of "Zonists," and the liberals that of "Lamists;" both being derived from the armorial bearings of their respective localities. In 1801 both bodies were re-united, and the old party names passed out of use. The great peculiarity of the church is its confessional freedom. There is no common standard of doctrine. Whoever makes sincere confession of sin, and engages to lead a holy life.

is admitted to membership, without regard to his views of the person and work of Christ. As a rule, only educated persons were from the beginning chosen to the ministry; but, in cases of necessity, men without any theological training were allowed to serve, taking the name of liefliepreekers, or exhorters. This custom was gradually abandoned in later years, and now the instances of its occurrence are rare. In 1811 they all united in forming a general society for the encouragement of theological education and the maintenance of the ministry among the poorer congregations. At the same time they enlarged the support and the curriculum of the theological seminary which had been established at Amsterdam in 1731 by the Lamists. Their members are found chiefly in Friesland, North Holland, Groningen, and Overijssel. In each province there are assemblies, usually called "rings," or circles. The local church is governed by the minister or ministers with the wardens, the latter being chosen by the male members, although in some cases the females have a vote. In few congregations there are also deaconesses. The seminary contains fifteen students, and its two active professors belong to the university of Amsterdam.

(e) The Remonstrants. — This body dates its existence and its name from the early portion of the seventeenth century, when a number of ministers of the Reformed Church, in a paper called a Remonstrance, demanded a revision of the Belgic Confession and the Heidelberg Catechism. After long preparation, a national synod was called to consider the matter, which met in 1618, 1619, and was attended by delegates from various foreign churches. This body decided the points at issue by issuing the well-known canons of Dort, maintaining Calvinistic views. All ministers who did not accept these articles were deprived of their office, and, in case they refused to subscribe a promise of obedience to the ecclesiastical authorities, were banished. But after the death of Maurice, Prince of Orange, in 1625, they began gradually to return; and a few years later a decree authorized them to build churches and schools. A system of government and discipline sketched by Uitenbogaard was adopted, and in 1631 a theological seminary was established at Amsterdam. In their church order they stated that they steadfastly adhered to the Holy Scripture, and that they held fast to their confession (drawn up by Episcopius in 1621) not as a rule of faith, but as an explanation of their views. But in the course of time a great alteration ensued. In 1861 they described themselves as a community in which the gospel of Jesus Christ, according to the Scriptures, was confessed and proclaimed with all freedom and toleration; and in 1879 the revised regulations set forth the aim of the society to be, to further the Christian life on the basis of the gospel, while at the same time holding fast to freedom and toleration. The control of the body is vested in the Great Assembly, which meets yearly, and is composed of the professors, all the ministers, delegates from all the congregations, and some other persons. A permanent committee of five members cares for the execution of the assembly's resolutions, and supervises the administration. The body was declining. In 1869 they had thirty-four congregations, with forty preachers; in 1881 only about twenty-three congregations, with twenty-three preachers, but it has grown since. The largest society is in Rotterdam, and numbers about 1,600 members.

II. THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. — At the commencement of the Reformation the greater part of what is now the Netherlands was attached to the bishopric of Utrecht, which in 1559 was made an archbishopric. But the Roman curia supposing that the spread of the Reformation had put an end to episcopal government, after the death of the last archbishop (Fred. Schenk van Tontenburg) in 1580, administered ecclesiastical affairs by apostolic vicars, who, despite their episcopal character, were never deemed literal bishops of the province of Utrecht. After 1717 papal legates took the control. These were called "vice-superiors," were appointed with the co-operation of the chapter, and dwelt at Cologne or at Brussels. Afterwards other vicariates were constituted; but in 1840 these were reduced to three, so that from that time the direction of affairs was under a papal internuncius at The Hague, and apostolic vicars at Herzogenbush, Breda, and Limbursch. The fall of the State Church in 1796 led to new activity among the Roman Catholics; and the re-establishment of the hierarchy by Pio Nono in 1853 was followed by a great increase of priests. In 1781 there were 350 parishes with 400 priests; in 1815, 613 parishes with 979 priests; in 1881, 1,000 parishes and rectorates, with 2,202 priests, including those occupied in schools and in the administration.

In the reconstituted hierarchy the kingdom forms one province, which contains five dioceses; viz., the archbishopric of Utrecht with the suffragans of Haarlem, Herzogenbush, Breda, and Roermond. Each diocese has a chapter, consisting of a dean and eight canons, who are the bishop's council, and meet monthly. In case of a vacancy they name three persons, from whom the Pope selects the successor. Each diocese has a seminary for priests under the bishop, who names all the professors. The dioceses are divided into deaneries, the presiding officers of which are the connecting link between the bishop and the lower clergy. The temporal affairs of each parish are under the direction of a board named by the bishop. Notwithstanding the relative decline previously noticed, it is evident, that, under the new arrangement of affairs, there has been a considerable increase in the schools and charitable foundations, as well as in the social and political influence of the body.

The Old-Catholic Church. — This body owes its existence to the conviction that the canon law forbade the suspension of the hierarchy at the time of the Reformation; and therefore the apostolic vicars appointed after 1580 were legitimate archbishops of Utrecht, although the state of the times did not allow them to bear the title. The authority of these officers rests not upon their appointment by the Pope, but upon the choice of the chapter. It is well known what a ferment was produced in the seventeenth century by Jansenism in matters of doctrine, and Gallicanism in relation to the independence of national churches. When this agitation was at its height, the Pope cited to Rome the vicar Petrus Codde (who was suspected of Jansenism), and of his own motion appointed Theodor de Koek in his place. A great number of the clergy rose in opposition, and as many as three hundred priests ranged themselves on the side of Codde. But the new vicar introduced many new priests, and the opposing party began to weaken. At last the chapter chose another archbishop, Cornelius Steenoven, who was consecrated by Varlet, bishop of Babylon in partibus, and thus preserved the succession. Excommunication followed; but the province maintained its position, and to this day has filled each vacancy made by death with a new election. In 1742 a suffragan bishop for Haarlem was appointed, and 1757 one for Deventer. The Old-Catholic, or, as it is popularly called, Jansenist Church, acknowledges the authority of the general councils and of the Tridentine decrees, but rejects the Vatican Council, with the dogmas of the immaculate conception and the papal infallibility.

III. THE JEWS. — All that is certainly known of the condition of these prior to the sixteenth century is that there were found here and there some from Southern Europe who had become Christians to escape persecution, and others from Middle Europe who still held their old faith. But the number largely increased when the close of the eighty-years' war made the Netherlands a place of refuge for all victims of persecution. They were of two classes,—one called Portuguese, the other German,—whose mutual relations were not very friendly. The former, though fewer in number, were richer and more cultivated; the latter were, for the most part, poor and ignorant, and there was but little intercourse. But this soon changed; since the Germans steadily grew in property and culture, while the others stood still, if they did not retrograde. Some differences in ceremonial, and especially in the pronunciation of the Hebrew, have prevented a complete fusion of the two; although from 1814 to 1870 they were joined in a common organization, and a rabbinical vacancy in one division could be filled by a person called from the other. The increase of the numbers from 32,000 in 1815 to 82,000 in 1882 shows the effect of this reunion.

(a) German Jews. — These incorporated with themselves their brethren already domiciled in the Netherlands, and subsequently the refugees from Poland and Lithuania, and now form the "Netherlandish-Israelite Society." They began to enter the country about the year 1615; although they were neither so much esteemed, nor enjoyed so many privileges, as the Portuguese. The congregation at Maarsse is considered the oldest, but the date of its origin is unknown. The one organized at Amsterdam in 1636 soon became the central point of all the rest. Permission to build a public synagogue was refused in 1648; but after an influx of Polish refugees in 1654, and an immigration of three thousand Lithuanians in 1656, there came finally in 1671 the erection of the still existing Great Synagogue in Amsterdam, in which all parties gradually united to form one congregation. Political equality was not attained until 1796. The first decree respecting the conduct of their affairs was issued in 1808. This established one supreme consistory for the Netherlandish-German Israelites. When the country became a French province in 1813, the Jews were made subordinate to the central consistory in Paris; but the next year King William I. appointed a "General Commission of Advice" for all the Jews in the kingdom. From 1862 a strenuous endeavor was made to attain a definite organization, which, however, did not succeed until 1870; since which time the direction of the Netherlandish-Israelite Society, which is no longer united with the Portuguese, is in the hands of a central board, which meets yearly, while a permanent committee of three, sitting in Amsterdam, attends to the current business of the society. The whole body consists of a hundred and seventy-three congregations, which are divided into various circles and branches. Each local society is autonomous; and its spiritual interests are controlled by rabbis, instructors, and teachers. These are trained in a seminary which was founded for this purpose at Amsterdam in 1711, and was reorganized in 1862.

(b) Portuguese. — In 1492 the Jews were banished from Spain, after they had become wealthy and refined. Many fled to Portugal, where they were again persecuted, especially after the introduction of the Inquisition, in 1532. When Brielle fell into the hands of the Prince of Orange (1572), many of the refugees from Portugal were attracted toward North Netherland, and, becoming esteemed for their activity and success in trade, found little difficulty in settling there. They increased in number in Amsterdam until 1597, when they secured their first synagogue, which was soon followed by many others. In The Hague, also, there was early formed a synagogue of rich and influential Israelites. In 1639 they established at Amsterdam a school, from which proceeded the rabbinical seminary of to-day. Since 1870 affairs are managed by a central board. The society at The Hague has one rabbin, while that at Amsterdam has a college of three associates. J. A. GERTH VAN WIJK, T. W. CHAMBERS.

HOLLAZ, David, a Lutheran theologian; b. at Wulkow, Pomerania, 1618; studied at Erfurt and Wittenberg; successively pastor in Putzlin, Stargard, Colberg, and Jakobshagen, where he died 1713. He is specially known by his work on systematic theology, Examen theologicum acroamaticum universam theologiam theticopolemicam complectens, 1707 (7th ed. by Teller, 1750). The great popularity of this work was not due to its originality of thought, but to the clearness and terseness of its definitions, and especially to the genial and irenic tone and the living scriptural character of its theology. He is the last of the strict Lutheran theologians, but in that period of transition took an intermediate position between Lutheran orthodoxy and pietism; the latter, though it is not mentioned by name, exerting a subtle influence upon his views. In his explanation of the so-called "theology of the unregenerate" he shows its influence; in the distinction between fundamentals and non-fundamentals, that of Calixtus. WAGENMANN.

HOLMES, Robert, D.D., b. in Hampshire, 1749; d. at Oxford, 1805. He was educated at Oxford, took holy orders; became Dean of Winchester 1804. His great service to biblical literature was Vetus Testamentum Græcum cum Variis Lectionibus, Oxford, 1798-27, 5 vols., edited after his death by Rev. J. Parsons, B.D. See the description in the Bibliographical Appendix to HORNE'S Introduction.

HOLSTE, or HOLSTENIUS, Lucas, b. in Hanburg, 1596; d. in Rome, Feb. 2, 1661; studied at Leyden; visited England; settled in Paris, 1624, as librarian to President de Mesmes; was converted to Romanism; accompanied Cardinal Barberini, in 1627, to Rome, where he was made librarian of the Vatican, member of the Congregation of the Index, etc. Most of his works were left unfinished; but his labors were, nevertheless, of great importance for the Liber pontificalis, Liber diurnus pontif. Rom., the martyrologies, etc. His collection of monastic rules (Codex Regularum) appeared first in Rome, 1661, afterwards, much enlarged, at Augsburg, 1759, 6 vols. folio. His letters were published by J. F. Boissonade, Paris, 1817.

HOLY FIRE, a ceremony symbolizing the resurrection of Christ, of very old date, and still observed in the Greek and Roman churches on Holy Saturday. On Good Friday all the lights and lamps of the church are extinguished, and the following day they are re-lit at a new fire kindled by sparks from a flint. In the Church of the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, where a Greek and an Armenian bishop officiate in unison on that day, the priests claim that the new fire is brought miraculously from heaven; and the fraud gives rise to much scandal. See SCHAFF: Through Bible-Lands, p. 241. The spiritual significance of the pretended miracle is, however, beautiful; for the holy fire, the symbol of the Spirit, proceeds from the sepulchre of Christ, and is carried by disciples to the ends of the earth.

HOLY LEAGUE. I. An alliance concluded between Philip II. of Spain, the Pope, the Guises, and the Parliament of Paris, in 1576, for the purpose of destroying the Reformation in France. II. The Holy League of Nuremberg, concluded between Charles V., the archbishops of Mayence and Salzburg, and the dukes of Bavaria, Saxony, and Brunswick, in 1538, for the purpose of counteracting the League of Smalcald.

HOLY SEPULCHRE, The. According to John (xix. 41) there was a garden close by the spot where our Lord was crucified; and in the garden was a new sepulchre, in which he was laid, because it was nigh at hand, and it was the Jews' preparation-day. Otherwise the locality of the tomb is not indicated in the Gospels; nor is Golgotha, the spot where the crucifixion took place, located with any more definiteness. From Matt. xxvii. 32, John xix. 17, and Mark xv. 29, and more especially from Heb. xiii. 12, it is apparent that it lay outside the city; and from Matt. xxvii. 39, and Mark xv. 29, it may be inferred that a public road ran by it: indeed, the Romans used to select such localities for places of execution in order to make the punishment more impressive to the people. But this is all. The name gives no certain clue. The Hebrew Golgotha has by some — Jerome in old times, Krafft and Hengstenberg in modern times — been translated the "Hill of Death," the name denoting a public place of execution; but both linguistic and archaeological reasons speak against this derivation. The evangelists translate the "place of a skull"

(John xix. 17; Matt. xxvii. 33; Mark xv. 22), or simply the "skull" (Luke xxiii. 33), probably referring to some topographical feature. — a rock protruding through the soil in the form of a skull, or bare as a skull. Whether Golgotha was a slight elevation, or a hill, or a mountain, they leave undecided, and so does Eusebius. The pilgrim of Bordeaux, however, and Rufinus, speak of Monticulus Golgotha, or Golgothana Rupes, whence the Mount Calvary of so frequent occurrence in the Roman-Catholic Church; that is, a hill with a chapel on its top, to which leads a pilgrim's path, with stations indicative of the various events of the passion.

In direct contradiction, as it would seem, to the above passages (Matt. xxvii. 32; John xix. 17; Mark xv. 20; and Heb. xiii. 12), the places which tradition points out for the crucifixion and sepulchre of our Lord lie a good distance within the wall of the present city. From the tower of David, at the Jaffa gate, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is descried, situated to the north-northeast, and rising on a hill between two minarets. But as early as in the eighth century, and again in the thirteenth, doubts were felt about the identity of the locality; and in the middle of the eighteenth century the tradition was formally rejected by Korte, Reise nach dem gelobten Lande, Altona, 1741, with three supplements, Halle, 1746. He was followed by Clarke (Travels in Palestine, London, 1811), Robinson (Biblical Researches, Boston, 1841, and Topography of Jerusalem, in Bibliotheca Sacra, 1846), Tobler (Golgotha, St. Gall, 1851), Wilson (The Lands of the Bible, London, 1847), and Schaff (Through Bible Lands, New York, 1879). The tradition has been defended by Chateaubriand (Itinéraire de Paris à Jerusalem, Paris, 1811), Scholz (Comm. de Golgothæ situ, Bonn, 1825), Williams (The Holy City, London, 1815; 2d ed., 1849), Schultz (Jerusalem, Berlin, 1845), Krafft (Die Topographie Jerusalems, Bonn, 1846), Lord Nugent (Lands Classical and Sacred, London, 1815), Tischendorf (Reise in den Orient, Leipzig, 1846), George Finlay (On the Site of the Holy Sepulchre, London, 1847), Schaffter (Die echte Lage des heiligen Grabes, Bern, 1849), De Vogué (Les Églises de la Terre-Sainte, Paris, 1860), Sepp (Jerusalem, 2d ed., 1873), Clermont-Ganneau (L'Authenticité du Saint-Sépulchre, Paris, 1877).

It would not be altogether impossible, however, to reconcile the Gospels and the tradition, as the site of the city-wall was so considerably altered by Hadrian that many places formerly outside of it came to lie inside of it, and vice versa. But new difficulties arise from the circumstance that the tradition gives no perfect certainty with respect to the identity of the localities it points out. Of course the first Christians knew the places where Christ was crucified and buried; but they evidently did not give much attention, or ascribe much value, to such externalities. Then, when the Jewish war broke out, towards the close of 67, the Christians left Jerusalem for Pella; and when they, later on, returned, the capture and destruction of the city must have wrought such changes as to make the identification of special localities of no strongly marked external distinction very difficult. Then, again, when Hadrian rebuilt the city on an entirely new plan, and with the avowed purpose of obliterating the distinctive character of the old city, new changes took place, which must have made the tradition less and less reliable. It has been argued that the unbroken list of bishops of Jerusalem which Eusebius gives from James, the brother of the Lord, to Macarius, is a guaranty of the continuity of the tradition living in the congregation; but Eusebius says himself (Hist. Eccl., 4, 5) that the list is not based on documents: he had it from hearsay. It has also been argued that the frequent pilgrimages to the holy places of Jerusalem, which, according to Cyril (Catech., 17, 16), were made from the time of the apostles, testify in favor of the tradition; but the earliest visitors to Jerusalem—Alexander of Flavius, in Cappadocia, and Origen—do not give the impression that at their time the holy places were specially frequented for the sake of devotion.

The first who thought of architecturally adorning the Holy Sepulchre was Constantine the Great. He erected a rotunda over the grave, and close by, on the spot of the crucifixion, a magnificent basilica, consecrated in 336. Those buildings stood till 614, when, during the invasion of Chosroes II., they were burnt down. Two years later on (616) the abbot Modestus, of the monastery of Theodosius, began the erection of new buildings. The Patriarch of Alexandria, Johannes Eleeman, supported the undertaking by sending a thousand workmen and a large sum of money to Jerusalem. In 626 the new buildings, consisting of three separate churches, were finished. Modesta's churches were burnt down by the Mohammedans in 936, and not restored until 1048, when the cathedral was built into which the crusaders, in 1099, made their entrance on bare feet, and singing hymns of praise. The buildings were then partly rebuilt, partly extended; and the structures thus reared stood, though often partially disturbed by the Mohammedans, till the great conflagration of 1808. In 1810 the erection of the present buildings was begun. The Greeks and the Armenians gave the money; Komnenos Kalfa, a Greek architect in Constantinople, the plan.

HOLY SPIRIT, the third person of the Trinity, is also known in Scripture as the Spirit (Matt. iv. 1), the Spirit of God (1 Sam. x. 10), the Spirit of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), the Spirit of grace (Heb. x. 29), the Spirit of truth (John xvi. 13), the Paraclete, or Comforter (John xv. 26), etc. The trinitarian relation of the Spirit is discussed under TRINITY, and the Procession of the Spirit under FILIOQUE. Here we shall briefly consider the personality and work of the Spirit.

1. Personality.—Although there was some indistinctness in the teachings of Justin Martyr and others of the early fathers concerning the Spirit, his personality has been generally accepted, except amongst the Sabellians, Arians, and the Socinians. The Socinians represent the Spirit as an energy or power of God. The personality is proved by the following considerations. (1) The personal pronoun he is used of him, as in John xvi. 13: "When he (ἐκεῖνος) the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide," etc. (2) He is expressly distinguished from God (the Father). He is sent by the Father (John xiv. 26), and "searcheth the deep things of God" (1 Cor. ii. 10).

(3) Acts of will and intelligence are attributed to him, such as belong only to a personal agent, as guiding into all truth (John xvi. 13), testifying (John xv. 26), convincing (John xvi. 8), interceding (Rom. viii. 26), speaking (Acts xiii. 2), etc. (4) He is directly contrasted with Satan (Acts v. 3), and may be the object of blasphemy (Matt. xii. 31), falsehood (Acts v. 3), and grievance (Eph. iv. 30). (5) He occupies a position in the formula of baptism (Matt. xxviii. 19) and the apostolic benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14), at the side of the Father and the Son, and is distinguished from them. He is also distinguished from the Son as the "other (ἄλλος) Comforter" (John xiv. 16).

2. Office and Work.—The Apostles' Creed contented itself in the doctrine of the Holy Spirit with the article, "I believe in the Holy Ghost;" but the Creed of Constantinople (381) contains the fuller statement, "And [we believe] in the Holy Spirit, the Lord and Giver of life, who proceedeth from the Father, and with the Father and the Son is to be adored and glorified, who spake by the holy prophets." As of the Father and the Son, so of the Spirit, we cannot think of a time when he was not active. He appears as the executive of God at all times, but is brought forward prominently in the New Dispensation as the efficient agent in the renewal of the soul and its advancement in holiness. In the Old Testament he seems to have been active from the moment of creation, when the "Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters" (Gen. i. 2), and God said that his "Spirit should not always strive with man" (Gen. vi. 3). He is said to have fallen upon God's agents (1 Sam. x. 10). He was the author of the light which the Old-Testament prophets had of Christ (1 Pet. i. 11), and of their inspiration (2 Pet. i. 21). In many of the cases in the Old Testament, it is doubtful whether a distinct person is meant by the designation "Spirit," or merely the power of God. But in the New Testament the uncertainty vanishes; and not only is his distinct personality made prominent, but a definite work assigned to him. He had a part in the life of Christ, was active in his generation (Luke i. 35), descended upon him at the baptism (Matt. iii. 16), and led him into the desert of temptation (Matt. iv. 1).

In his last discourses our Lord referred repeatedly to him, and made the promise that he should come upon the disciples (John xvi. 7; Acts i. 8, etc.). In these passages the Holy Spirit is declared to be the representative of Christ after his removal from the earth, and the dispenser of the benefits of Christ's life to the souls of believers. He was the "other Comforter" (Paraclete), who should take the place of Christ in leading the disciples into the way of all truth (John xiv. 16, xv. 26, xvi. 13). He is the permanent companion and guide of the Church, in contrast to the earthly Christ, who dwelt only temporarily on the earth (John xiv. 16). The Spirit is called the Spirit of Christ (Rom. viii. 9), because he holds the relation of a dispenser to the benefits of Christ's salvation. The Spirit, therefore, has a relation to Christ similar to that which the Son has to the Father. As the Son reveals the Father to the world (John

i. 18), so the Spirit reveals the grace and meritorious atonement and promises of Christ to the heart of the believer (John xvi. 15).

This special work in the history of redemption was inaugurated ten days after the Lord's ascension, on the Day of Pentecost, when the disciples were endued with power, and spoke in unknown tongues. As the historic birth-night of Christ was celebrated by attendant supernatural phenomena, such as the anthems of the angels, and the heavenly glory, so the historical birthday of the Holy Spirit in the Church was accompanied by strange external manifestations, — tongues like as of fire, and a sound from heaven as of the rushing of a mighty wind (Acts ii. 2, 3). Since that time he has been active in the Church, the source of all spiritual enlightenment, and without whose agency man neither knows Christ as his Saviour, nor can call him Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3). He is the originator of convictions of sin, that is, of the sinfulness of refusing to believe in Christ (John xvi. 9), and the author of regeneration (John iii. 5). He promotes the sanctification of the soul (1 Cor. vi. 11), and imparts to the Church his special gifts (1 Cor. xii. 4). The agency of the Spirit is, however, not completed with this activity, but extends to assuring the believer of his union with Christ, and participation in the promises of eternal life (Rom. viii. 16). All spiritual blessings, righteousness, peace, and joy, come to the believer by reason of his reception of the Holy Spirit (Rom. xiv. 17; Eph. ii. 18). For this reason the unbeliever is warned against rejecting the knowledge and convictions of the Spirit, which is called "grieving" (Eph. iv. 30), "quenching" (1 Thess. v. 19), and "doing despite unto" the Spirit (1 Heb. x. 29). All kinds and degrees of sin may be forgiven, except the sin of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit (Matt. xii. 31, 32). This sin is absolutely unpardonable, because it is the final rejection of him without whom a saving knowledge of Christ and regeneration are impossible.

This dispensation has been called the dispensation of the Spirit. The designation is true so far as it brings out the promineney of the Spirit's agency, and differentiates his work, from the Day of Pentecost on, as of a kind which he did not perform under the old dispensation. But the Spirit's work is in no sense an atoning work, or a substitute for that of Christ. It is mediatorial between the Saviour and the saved, and makes concrete in the lives and experiences of individuals the salvation which was achieved through Bethlehem, Golgotha, and the open tomb. The manifestation of the Spirit on Pentecost was a manifestation of power (Acts i. 8), — the power of a new life and a spiritual energy, and continues to be so. The early apostles and Christians were full "of faith and the Holy Ghost" (Acts iv. 8, vi. 5), and in the power of this endowment spake in council-halls, wrote epistles, and suffered violent deaths, in hope and amidst rejoicing. There is nothing in the New Testament to indicate that this manifestation of power was to be confined to apostolic times, although it is not unreasonable to suppose that the methods of his manifestation may be different in kind at different epochs.

HOLY WATER, the use of, i.e., water blessed by a priest or bishop for religious purposes, is an old Oriental, more especially Jewish, custom, which was adopted by the Christian Church, and is still retained in the Greek and Roman Church. In the Greek Church pure water is used; in the Roman, a little salt is added, which by the Greek is considered a scandalous and dangerous novelty. In both churches the practice has given rise to much superstition.

HOLY WEEK (Hebdomas Magna, or Sancta, or Nigra), the last week of Lent, commencing at midnight on Palm Sunday, and ending at cock-crow on Easter Day, including, besides Palm Sunday and Holy Saturday, Maundy Thursday, the anniversary of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and Good Friday, the anniversary of the Crucifixion. The earliest mention of the celebration of Holy Week, as generally prevailing throughout the Church, occurs in the Apostolical constitutions, and in the writings of Dionysius of Alexandria, from the middle of the third century. The whole week was kept as a strict fast; that is, the diet was restricted to bread, salt, vegetables, and water, and total abstinence was practised on Friday and Saturday, or at least on the last day. At the time of Theodosius, all private and public business was suspended, even the courts were closed. Prisoners for debt or minor misdemeanors were released, slaves were manumitted, etc. All work was, so far as possible, laid aside; and special opportunities of instruction in the elements of faith were offered. The history of the Passion was recited on successive days, beginning with the narrative of St. Matthew, on Palm Sunday, and ending with that of St. John, on Good Friday. In the Roman-Catholic Church, Holy Week is still celebrated by rigorous penitence (fast and almsgiving), by suspension of work in the family, by increased solemnity of the services (no instrumental music, veiling of the statues and pictures, etc.), and by special services (the consecration of the chrism, the blessing of the fire by which the paschal light is lighted, etc.). Several Protestant churches, such as the Church of England and the Lutheran churches in Scandinavia, also commemorate Holy Week. HOMER, William Bradford, b. in Boston, Jan. 31, 1817; d. at South Berwick, Me., March 7, 1841. His father was a merchant, distinguished for Christian philanthropy. His mother was a lineal descendant of William Bradford, a passenger in "The Mayflower," and the second governor of Plymouth Colony. At the age of five years, young Homer began to attend school; and, from that time until six months before his death, he was a constant attendant at schools of different gradations. In 1827 he became a member of the Mount Pleasant Classical Institution at Amherst, Mass. Here he remained three years. Under the instruction of Mr. Gregory Perdicari he acquired such familiarity with the modern Greek that he was able to speak as well as read it with facility. He passed the year 1831-32 as a member of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass. He was the youngest member of his class, but was selected to deliver the valedictory addresses at his graduation. He was also, perhaps, the youngest member of his class at Amherst College; and, although his class was noted for scholarship and general excellence, yet at his graduation in 1836 he received the valedictory honors. At the age of nineteen he entered the Theological Seminary at Andover. Here he remained four years. Leaving the institution in 1840, he accepted a call from the Congregational Church in South Berwick, Me., to become its pastor. He was ordained Nov. 11, 1840. He won the esteem and affection of his people to an unusual degree. His love for the ministerial work was a passion; still he was intending, should Providence permit, to spend his life as a professor of the Greek language. Before his ordination he had written many articles for the press, and collected materials for three courses of lectures on the Iliad, Odyssey, and the Orations of Demosthenes. From his early childhood to the hour of his death he was noted for the purity of his character and for his enthusiasm in study. About four months after his ordination, he died, at the age of twenty-four years. An impressive sermon was preached at his funeral, by Professor B. B. Edwards of Andover Theological Seminary. Fourteen of Mr. Homer's sermons, and two of his literary addresses, were published in 1842, in a duodecimo volume of four hundred and twenty pages. To these sermons was prefixed a Memoir, containing one hundred and thirty-six pages, by E. A. Park, who edited the volume. A second edition of it was published in 1848. EDWARDS A. PARK.

HOMILETICS (from the German Point of view). I. NAME AND SCOPE. — The definition of homiletics depends, to some extent, upon the meaning of "homily." Homily (ὁμιλία, from ὅμοι, "together," and εἶλη, "company," 1 Cor. xv. 33; comp. Luke xxiv. 14, 15; Acts xx. 11; etc.) designated in the early Church the addresses at private gatherings for Christian worship, and especially the exhortation with which the leader followed the Scripture-reading (Justin, Ap. Maj. lxvii.). At a later period, when these addresses had taken on a more elaborate form, it was applied to public discourses addressed to believers, in distinction from the public proclamation of the gospel to the unconverted (κήρυγμα). The plain and homely structure of the homily distinguished it from the finished rhetorical productions of classical antiquity.

In the Western Church the terms "sermon" and "homily" were at first used interchangeably; but in time each came to designate a special kind of discourse. The sermon was a discourse developing a definite theme; as, for example, Augustine's discourse on the "Love of God and the Love of the World" (De amore Dei et amore sæculi). The homily pursued the analytical method, and expounded a paragraph or verse of Scripture; as, for example, Augustine's discourses with the heading De eo quod scriptum est. Abiding by this radical idea of the homily, we shall be forced to define homiletics as the science of preaching to believers. In this narrower sense the subject has been treated by Schleiermacher, Schweizer, Palmer, Harnack, Oosterzee, and others. For this reason some have treated evangelistics, or missionary preaching, as a separate department; while others, in order to avoid the separate discussion, have discarded the term "homiletics" altogether, and substituted in its stead, as more comprehensive, "keryktics" (from κηρύσσω, "to preach," Acts viii. 5), or "halieutics" (from ἀλιεύω, "to fish," John xxi. 3). Both of these designations are objectionable, because they take into consideration mainly those unacquainted with the gospel.

The scope of the science of homiletics is found in the New-Testament idea of bearing witness for Christ (μαρτυρεῖν, Matt. xxiv. 14; Acts i. 8, 22; etc.). This expression includes both classes as the subjects of preaching, — believers and non-believers. Homiletics is, therefore, to be regarded as having a scope larger than the strict etymology and historical use of the term "homily" would warrant. It is the scientific treatment of preaching considered as a witnessing for Christ in public worship. This definition does not include missionary preaching; that is, preaching to those who have never heard the gospel. The use of the term "homiletics" dates from the latter half of the seventeenth century (BAIER, Comp. Theol. Homil., 1677; KRUMHOLZ: Comp. Homil., 1699).

II. HOMILETICS AND RHETORIC. — The first Christian preachers did not trouble themselves about the rules of classical rhetoric, and cared little for the "enticing words of man's wisdom" (1 Cor. ii. 4, 5). But, as preaching became more studied and elaborate, the pulpit could not ignore the rules of Greek and Roman eloquence. The time came when the most prominent pulpit orators — like Basil, the two Gregories, Chrysostom, and Augustine — were those who had themselves been teachers of rhetoric. The result has been, that from that time to this, to a greater or less extent, sacred oratory has been regarded as a branch or species of general rhetoric. Erasmus, Melancthon, Herder, Thoremin, Vinet, are among those who represent this view. Others, however, like the Pietists of the eighteenth century (Spener, etc.) and Stier in this, demand the absolute divorce of the pulpit from the rules of rhetoric, opposing all union with "the strange woman that speaks smooth words," and all accommodation to æsthetic prejudices. No such divorce can be admitted; and yet the higher sphere to which the pulpit belongs, and the nature of the topics discussed, make it necessary for homiletics to treat of the preparation and delivery of the sermon as subjects peculiar to itself. There is much that sacred and forensic eloquence have in common. A mind charged with the subject, dialectic training, lucid arrangement, fluency of utterance, keen psychological perception, lively imagination, — such qualities as these all constitute the spring from which both kinds of eloquence alike flow, as is proved from the lives of sacred orators from Basil and Chrysostom down to Krummacher and Spurgeon. Likewise, in the structure of the discourse, the same logical and æsthetic rules of grouping, the use of oratorical figures, etc., apply to both. But the features in which they differ are more numerous than those in which they agree. Sacred eloquence is distinguished by its subject-matter, its definite moral and religious purpose, and the means proper to be used to secure conviction. Forensic rhetoric seeks to secure objects confined to this life, whether personal or disinterested. The aim of preaching reaches out beyond the confines of this world, and concerns the soul's eternal blessedness and God's glory. Again: the sacred orator may never resort to artificial devices; nor may he place reliance, in his efforts to convince the soul, upon his manner, or diction, or argumentation. He must depend upon the vitalizing power of the truth (Isa. lv. 11; John vi. 63; Heb. iv. 12, etc.) and the direct influence of the Holy Spirit; for, as Luther says, "the speaker convinces no man to believe aright: it is the word of God itself that must lead him to accept the truth to be the word of God" (Op., xiii.). Rhetoric has, therefore, no place in preaching as an end in itself. It may only be used as a means for the effective presentation of the gospel which is laid upon the preacher. And all artistic structure of the sermon is to be discarded which prejudices the simplicity and power of the Word. In this connection it is well to remember that preachers, as they grow in experience of the truth, discard the rhetorical arts which they practised when they began to preach, and use a more direct and plain mode of utterance.

III. DESIGN OF PREACHING. — The most important designations in the New Testament for preaching determine its character as the joyous proclamation of salvation through Christ. In κηρυσσῶν ("to preach," Matt. iv. 23, etc.) the emphasis is upon the novelty of the message; in εὐαγγελίζεσθαι ("to preach the gospel," Matt. xi. 5, etc.), upon its joyous contents; and in διδάσκων ("to teach," Matt. xi. 1, etc.), the reference is to its lucid explanation. All these elements are combined in μαρτυρεῖν ("to bear witness," Acts i. 8, etc.), where the emphasis is upon the vouching for the truth on the ground of personal experience. The object of preaching, then, is none other than to direct the world to the way of blessedness, to call the unconverted to repentance, and to confirm believers in their faith. To secure this result, the most essential thing is the energizing power of the word of God itself. The next, and not less important, factor is the power of a personal witness filled with the Holy Ghost. The matter of preaching everywhere and at all times must be salvation through Christ. But, while this is true, the distinction must not be overlooked between the preaching addressed to believing congregations on the one hand, and apostolic and missionary preaching on the other. The apostles limited themselves to the demonstration that prophecy had been fulfilled in Christ. Missionary preaching is designed to convince and convert alone. Preaching addressed to congregations of believers, however, analyzes and explains passages of Scripture, and seeks in this way to edify and enlarge the experience of divine things. This is its main object. However, in the present mixed condition of our congregations, the preacher must combine with the edificatory element the effort to reach unbelievers.

There have been other theories of preaching. The rhetorical theory of Theremin and others transforms the preacher into an orator. The didactic theory (Nitzsch, etc.) lays an undue stress upon the preacher's relation as a public teacher, who instructs the intellect, but has little to do with the affections and wills, of his hearers. The theory of mere awakening (Stier) treats all listeners, even believers, as mere sinners, and addresses its message to the natural man exclusively. Then there is the edification theory, which, making a sharp distinction between evangelistic preaching and preaching addressed to congregations in Christian communities, regards preaching as designed exclusively to edify. According to it, the sermon should be a finished production, presenting a delineation of Christian truth, but designed, in the first instance, neither to instruct nor to convert. All these theories are one-sided: neither of them presents more than one aspect of the ideal preacher. The design of preaching is at once awakening and edificatory, and becomes so by being didactic, and in some cases rhetorical. The most efficient preachers have always aimed to arouse as well as edify, and, never satisfied with merely presenting the truth, have sought to enforce it, that it might become a living, energizing force in the lives of their hearers. If Germany wishes to avert the catastrophe which befell the Anglican Church a hundred years ago, in the loss of so many of its members to the Methodists, it must hasten to realize this ideal of preaching. [Dr. Christlieb has here in mind the evangelistic efforts of the Methodists and of other foreign denominations in Germany.]

IV. HISTORY OF HOMILETICS. 1. The Fathers. — A few scattered directions for preaching are given by Origen, Cyprian, Lactantius, and Arnobius. Chrysostom and Augustine were the first to go elaborately into the subject. Both drew upon their own personal experiences as rhetoricians and preachers. In his work the Priesthood (De Sacardotio, books iv., v.), Chrysostom defines as some of the personal qualifications of the preacher, eloquence, dialectic skill in the use of Scripture, readiness in the defence of the faith, diligence in preparation, and regard for the praise of God rather than man. For similar rules, see also Basil (Sermo Ascetica de Fide) and Gregory of Nazianzus (Carmen de Episcopis). Augustine, in his Christian Truth (De Doct. Christ., iv.), which might almost be called a treatise on homiletics, makes a sharp distinction between the design of preaching and the rhetoric of Rome and Greece. In the fourth book of this work he discusses the subject under two heads, — the matter of preaching, and the manner of its presentation. He does not deny that eloquence may be used to advantage, but insists that the preacher must derive his wisdom, and the very form of his utterance, from the Scriptures. He urges Cicero's threefold purpose of public speech, — to instruct (docere), to please (delectare), and to persuade (flectere), laying, however, special emphasis upon the last. He also urges the necessity of an accord between the preacher's life and words, of prayer as a preparation for the sermon, etc.

2. The Middle Ages magnified liturgical forms and ordinances as constituent parts of worship, to the prejudice of the sermon, which in time was almost entirely neglected. In the first half of this period there are three writers on the general subject. Rhabanus Maurus (De Clericorum Institutione) directs attention again to Augustine's rules. Guibert of Nogent (d. 1124; Liber quo ordine sermo fieri debeat) insists that no more should be put into a sermon than can be carried away in the memory; that the pulpit should practise the textual rather than the allegorical method of interpretation, and seek to lift men up to better lives, rather than indulge in the refinements of theological discussion. The third, Alanus of Ryssel (twelfth century), wrote a work entitled Summa de Arte Prædicatoria. In the second half of this period we meet first with Bonaventura's work Ars Concionandi. He was followed by Humbert de Romanis (d. 1277; Tract. de Erudit. Concinatorum). But the period furnishes nothing of importance till near its close, when Reuchlin (Liber Congestorum de Arte Prædicandi, 1501) seeks to revive pulpit oratory, which had fallen into almost total neglect, by insisting upon the presentation of proper and practical subjects, and the rules of rhetoric.

3. The Period since the Reformation.—During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries homiletics was built up into a science, but placed in the closest relations to the rhetoric of antiquity. The revival of preaching by the Reformers led naturally to a fresh and more profound study of the nature and purpose of preaching. The systematic development of the science of homiletics followed. The Ecclesiastes, sive Concinator Evangelicus of Erasmus forms the link between the older treatises and Protestant homiletics. The keen satirist of the vain and vague platitudes of the preaching of his day (Laus Stultitiæ) here exalts the calling of the preacher above that of the priest and monk. In book i. he lays down the personal qualifications of the preacher,—knowledge of the Scriptures and the Fathers, faith, fluency of speech, etc. In book ii. he adduces illustrations from Pagan and Christian writers, bearing on pulpit oratory, and passes over in book iii. to apply the rules of dialectics and rhetoric to the structure of the sermon, concluding in book iv. by discussing the preacher's material. Melancthon, in his De Rhetorica (1519) and De Officiis Concinatoris (1535), follows Erasmus very closely in urging the rules of classic rhetoric. He exerted a profound influence upon the writers who followed him. The pulpit of the succeeding period, following his precepts rather than the example of Luther, pursued the synthetic method, preaching upon themes, in contrast to analyzing a text. The principal contributor, however, to the science of homiletics in the Reformation period, was Hyperius, professor at Marburg. His work De Formandis Concionibus Sacris (1533) distinguishes him above Erasmus, as the founder of the science of homiletics. He discusses more sharply and elaborately than had ever been done before the relation of homiletics to rhetoric, and adopts as applicable to the former only the second, third, and fourth of the five classic divisions (inventio, dispositio, docutio, memoria, pronuntiatio). He distributes sermons under the six heads of doctrine, instruction, reproof, correction, consolation, and mixed, and treats of their division into exordium, statement of subject, proof, refutation of objections, and conclusion. Important as this work was, the writers who followed, such as Chytraeus, M. Chemnitz (Methodus Concionandi, 1583), and others, almost without an exception, leaned upon Melancthon's De Rhetorica, and insisted upon the rules of rhetoric and a formal structure. In vain did Osiander (Ratio Concionandi, 1584) and Andreæ (Method. Concionandi, 1595) urge greater fidelity to Scripture, and more regard for the spiritual needs of the people, in the choice of subjects and mode of expression. The pulpit became in the seventeenth century an arena for theological disputation; and homiletics was shrivelled up into a mere discussion of the form and structure of the sermon, while the question of the subject matter was almost entirely overlooked.

A new period (1700-1830) opens in the eighteenth century, when, under the influence of the Pietistic movement, homiletics began to be emancipated from rhetoric and the tyranny of artificial refinements. This was, however, followed by a philosophical re-action. Spener introduced the revolt against the artificial method, and insisted that the pulpit should present the verities of faith, and present them in direct and simple statement. Other writers, like Rambach, in his Præcepta Homiletica, a work which deserves still to be used, follow Spener's leadership, and insist upon spiritual preparation for the sermon, prayer, the unction of the spirit, the simple delineation of the truth, etc. Contemporary authors in other lands—Gausson, professor at Saumur (De Ratione Concionandi, 1678), Claude (Traité de la Composition d'un sermon, 1688), and Vitringa (Animad. ad Method. homil. Eccles., 1712)—emphasized the personal qualifications of the preacher, the independence of sacred rhetoric, and the analytic over against the synthetic method. But, by the middle of the eighteenth century, philosophy arose in revolt against the exclusive treatment of such themes as regeneration and repentance, and asserted a place for itself in the pulpit. Mosheim's work, Anweis., erbaulich zu predigen (1763), marks the transition. He shows the influence of English and French infidelity by insisting upon the use in the pulpit of the historical evidences for Christianity. Preaching was from this on to be addressed more particularly to the understanding; and even the spiritually minded Fénelon, in his Dialogues sur l'Eloquence (1718), defines the most essential quality of a sermon to be that it should "give instruction" (d'être instructif). The new philosophizing method excluded more and more biblical matter from sermons. The pulpit ceased its efforts to convert: it sought alone to instruct. It resorted no longer to Scripture for proofs: it found them in "rational ideas." The things of eternity gave way to the things of time. Spalding (Die Nutzbarkeit d. Predigtamts, 1772) and other writers excluded from preaching all that did not contribute to immediate well being in this world; and Marezoll (Bestimmung d. Kanzelredners, 1793) lays down the proposition that the pulpit should discuss, not what Christ once taught, but what he would teach if he were now on earth. The protests of believing theologians like Bengel and Oetinger against this intellectual assumption found only a small audience. At the close of the century the Kantian philosophy re-deemed the pulpit from the bald utilitarianism into which it was fast sinking. Schulderoff (Kritik d. Homiletik, 1797) again demanded for the sermon the character of a discourse on religion, but not necessarily on the Christian religion. A new tendency appeared early in this century, and the old question of the relation of preaching to rhetoric again came into the foreground. Among the many treatises, those of Theremin (D. Beredtsamkeit, eine Tugend, 1814) and Schott (Theorie d. Beredtsamkeit, etc., 1828-32) are the most important. But all agreed in making preaching a branch of general rhetoric. The very term "homiletics" was in danger of being discarded for "pulpit eloquence." With Schleiermacher and Claus Harms a new period begins, which is marked by the treatment of homiletics as a department of practical theology. Marheinecke's work on homiletics (1811) contends for the introduction of the fundamental doctrines of Christianity into the pulpit, and, with Schleiermacher, insists upon edification as the aim of preaching. Claus Harms followed with his essay on Speaking with Tongues, which fell like a bombshell under the lamps of those students who were seeking to copy after strictly logical and rhetorical models. With great freshness and originality he declared war against the artificial pulpit productions of the schools. Stier, in his Keryktik (1830), and to some extent Sichel (Homiletik, 1829), insist upon the biblical character of preaching. The most important works since then are PALMER: Homiletik, 1842, 5th ed., 1867; G. BAUR: Grundzüge d. Homiletik, 1848; GAUPP: Homiletik, 1852; HARNACK: Prakt. Theol., 1878. All these writers agree in presenting the evangelical view, that the "sermon is God's word to the Church." See also NESSELMANN: *Uebersicht üb. d. Entwicklungsgesch. d. christ. HOMILETICS (from the Anglo-American point of view) may be defined as the application of the general principles of rhetoric to the specific department of preaching. It is the science which treats of the analysis, classification, preparation, composition, and delivery of sermons, viewed as addressed to the popular mind, on subjects suggested by the word of God, and designed for the conversion of sinners and the edification of believers. Hence it has been sometimes styled "sacred rhetoric;" and it bears to rhetoric in general the same relation which rhetoric itself, according to Whateley, bears to logic. One must approach it, therefore, through both of these other sciences, and carry with him all which they have taught him; so that he may apply it all, and utilize it all, in the particular work of preaching. It gives directions for the choice of subjects, and the relation of these to texts of Scripture, as the passages by which they are suggested, or in which they are implied. It analyzes the sermon founded on such a text into its different parts,—of introduction, proposition, argument, division, and application or conclusion,—and lays down rules regarding each of these, so that they may be natural, simple, proportionate, and effective. In particular it insists that the discourse should be a unit, aiming at one result, and rising by climactic stages toward its attainment. It classifies sermons under different heads, as expository, hortatory, doctrinal, practical, and occasional; though it ought not to be forgotten that the ideal discourse should be all of these in one, as founded on biblical exposition, illustrative of scriptural doctrine, and devoted to the enforcement of some practical duty, which needs at the time to be insisted upon. It has much to say also on the formation of a pulpit style which should be characterized by clearness, purity, precision, and energy; and it gives important counsels as to the choice of arguments and the use of illustrations. It has to do, besides, with the delivery of sermons, and brings the rules of elocution to bear upon the work of the pulpit, so that the words of the preacher may not be marred, but rather made more effective, by the manner of their utterance. In all these departments it seeks to illustrate the value of its rules from the history of preaching in ancient, mediæval, and modern times, and to discuss the questions regarding them on which different views have been maintained. Thus, for example, in almost every treatise on homiletics, one expects to find an examination of such inquiries as these,—whether the division of a subject should be announced beforehand; whether the proposition mainly enforced should be formulated at the beginning, or at the end, of the discourse; whether a sermon should be read from manuscript, or delivered memoriter, or preached extemporaneously, etc. On these and kindred questions, the opinions maintained depend on the predilections or practices of the authors; and the fact that such differences exist may be taken as a proof that a definite course regarding them is not essential to homiletic efficiency; and every preacher may be left to do regarding them that which he has found he can do most successfully.

As a science, there can be no doubt whatever of its helpfulness to those who are engaged in the work of the ministry; but, unless two or three cautions are observed, it is exceedingly apt to become a hindrance, rather than an assistance. 1. It should be so thoroughly mastered before entering upon the practical work of the pulpit, that its rules shall be unconsciously observed. Whatever takes the attention of the preacher away from the main purpose of his sermon to some technical detail does thereby inevitably mar the sermon itself. Hence all such things as style and structure must be acquired so thoroughly, that no attention is abstracted by them from the thought. In like manner, every thing that in the pulpit draws the mind of the preacher away from that which he is saying, and the object which he has in view in saying it, to the manner in which he says it, takes just so much away from the force of his utterance. It does not follow, however, that no attention should be given at any time by him to these things. On the contrary, the correct inference is, that he should have so mastered them, that he can use them without thinking of them, just as one has so mastered spelling, that he is not conscious of any such act when he is writing. The moment one hesitates in spelling, and becomes conscious that he has to spell, he is very apt to make a mistake; and that simple illustration may help to show the importance of the caution which we are now giving. Rules are valuable; but their highest value is when we have ceased to be conscious that they are rules, and act upon them spontaneously. To do that, however, we must give early attention to them, and master them fully, before we need to practise them in public. The place of homiletics in learning to preach is thus analogous to that of spelling in learning to write. It should come at the very beginning, and it should be mastered so completely, that we act upon its maxims without thinking of them.

2. The preacher must never let himself be tempted to make the sermon an end in itself. It must be confessed, that, after one has studied the rules of homiletics, he is strongly tempted to think that his work is to consist in making good sermons that shall stand the test of the strictest homiletic scrutiny. But the object of the preacher is to convert sinners, to edify believers, and in general to help his fellow-men to live lives of faith and joy in Christ. The sermon ought to be designed for that. By all means let it be according to rule; but let the observance of the rules be made subservient, and kept subservient, to the main purpose. The surgeon seeks to save the patient; and, if he put the brilliancy of the operation above that, he is no true surgeon. In like manner, the preacher's great design ought to be to help men unto Christ and up to Christ; and, if he degenerate into the sermon-maker or the pulpiteer, he has lost the true ideal of his office. Whenever the producing of great sermons becomes an aim in and of itself, the production may be what many people will congratulate the preacher for making, — a splendid effort; but it is not a sermon in the right use of the word, inasmuch as that seeks something else than the admiration of the hearers, even their salvation and edification. Every student of homiletics, therefore, must be on his guard against allowing himself to think of the sermon as an end in itself.

3. The observance of rules will not of itself make an effective sermon. One man may keep every regulation laid down regarding the preparation and delivery of a discourse, and yet be only "faultily faultless, icily regular, splendidly null." Another may break many of the rules, and yet be most successful in converting, strengthening, and stimulating his hearers. The man is greater than the sermon; and the touch of his individuality thrills his hearers, though his division should be faulty, and his style uncouth. Even the heathen orator said that one must be a good man to be really eloquent; and so the personality of the preacher has more to do with his efficiency in the pulpit than the perfection of his sermon. He must be seen to be sincere. He must have "the accent of conviction." He must be earnest, — not with the earnestness of rant or roaring, but with that of fervid incandescence. He must know the hearts of other men through his acquaintance with his own. He must be familiar with their "businesses," as well as with their "bosoms," and preach to them, not because the Sabbath comes round, and he must say something to them, but because he has something which he must say to them at that particular time, and which mightily concerns their welfare. It is this "I cannot but" speak in the preacher himself which is the secret, next to the agency of the Holy Ghost, of pulpit-power; and no homiletic rules, however faithfully observed, will compensate for its absence. But if that be in him, and he has mastered the rules of this science so that he can obey them automatically, he will be the ideal preacher, and men will gladly listen to his words.

LIT. — In recent years there has been increased attention given to homiletics, owing to the formation of such lectureships as the "Lyman-Beecher" course at Yale; and many valuable works have appeared upon the subject. In addition to those named by Dr. Christlieb, the following works are all of value, and deserve mention. WILLIAM G. BLAIKIE: For the Work of the Ministry, London, 1873; WILLIAM S. PLUMER: Hints and Helps in Pastoral Theology, New York, 1874; PATRICK FAIRBAIRN: Pastoral Theology, Edinburgh, 1875; WILLIAM ARTHUR: The Tongue of Fire, New York, 1880; JOHN A. BROADUS: The Preparation and Delivery of Sermons, last edition, Philadelphia, 1880, Lectures on the History of Preaching, New York, 1876; E. PAXTON HOOD: Lamps, Pitchers, and Trumpets, new edition, New York, 1872; ROBERT T. DABNEY: Sacred Rhetoric, New York, 1870; STEPHEN H. TYNG, sen.: The Office and Duty of a Christian Pastor, New York, 1871; SAMUEL McALL: Delivery, Lecture-Room Hints, London, 1875; STORRS: Conditions of Success in Preaching without Notes, New York, 1875; CHARLES J. BROWN: Preaching, its Properties, Place, and Power, 1870; JOHN C. MILLER: Letters to a Young Clergyman, New York, 1878; Bishop BEDELL: The Pastor, Philadelphia, 1880; Bishop ELLICOTT: Homiletical and Pastoral Lectures, 1880; J. J. VAN OOSTERZEE: Practical Theology, New York, 1880; AUSTIN PHELPS: Theory of Preaching, 1881; FISKE: Manual of Preaching, 1884. For an exhaustive list, see the appendices in the works of Blaikie and Kidder. Attention should be given to The Preacher's Lantern (4 vols.), and such periodicals as The Homiletic Quarterly, The Preacher's Monthly, and the biographies of such preachers as Robert Hall, Thomas Chalmers, John Leitch, Summerfield, the Alexanders, etc., and especially SPRAGUE'S Annals of the American Pulpit. HOMILIARIUM denoted, from the beginning of the middle ages, collections of homilicæ and sermones for the whole ecclesiastical year, from the works of the fathers, made by private persons for reading in the church on Sundays and holidays, or introduced by official authority among the clergy as models of the art of preaching. Such collections existed before the time of Charlemagne, both in the Gallican and in the Anglo-Saxon Church; but the most celebrated and the most widely used collection of the kind was the homiliarium of Charlemagne. The unsuitableness of many of the selections from the fathers, and, still more, the frequent mistakes and corruptions which occurred in the common collection, caused Charlemagne to charge Paulus Diaconus with the collection of a new homiliarium, under the superintendence of Alcuin. Between 776 and 784 the work was finished. Manuscript copies of it are found in the libraries of Heidelberg, Darmstadt, Frankfort, Giessen, Cassel, Fulda, etc. The first printed edition, without title, date, or place, was probably made at Cologne, 1470. A comparison between the various editions shows that the contents of the book increased with the increasing number of festivals and saints' days. New sermons by later teachers — Alcuin, Haimo, Andbertus, Hericus, Bernard, and others — were added. The bulk, however, of the contents, as well as the original plan of the arrangement, was retained. On the development of the art of preaching, and on the final establishment of the system of pericopes, this collection has exercised a great influence; and it was, no doubt, instrumental in carrying the Roman system of pericopes into the evangelical churches. The Book of Homilies of the Church of England is the nearest approach in the Protestant Church to the homiliarium. CHRISTLIEB.

HOMILY. See HOMILETICS.

HOMOLOGUMENA (generally accepted) and ANTILEGOMENA (disputed) are the two terms which Eusebius applies to the authorship of the books of the New Testament, placing the four Gospels, the Acts, the fourteen Epistles of Paul, the first Epistle of Peter, and the first Epistle of John, under the former, and the Epistle of James, the second Epistle of Peter, the second and third Epistles of John, and the Epistle of Jude, under the latter. The Apocalypse he gives a place by itself, though, according to his own definition, it belonged to the Antilegomena. See CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

HOMOIOUSIAN (of similar substance) and HOMOOUSIAN (of the same substance) are the two terms on which the whole Arian controversy turned; the former representing the semi-Arian view; the latter, the orthodox. The term of Arius was heteroousian ("of different substance"). See ARIANISM.

HONE, William, b. at Bath, June 3, 1780; d. at Tottenham, Nov. 8, 1842; was a bookseller and miscellaneous writer in London, and is mentioned here for his Apocryphal New Testament (1820) and Ancient Mysteries (1823). These works were suggested in the course of his researches for his own successful defence against a charge of libel, Dec. 18–20, 1817. In the latter part of his life he frequently preached in Weigh-House Chapel, Eastcheap, London.

HONEY. See BEE-CULTURE AMONG THE HEBREWS.

HONORIUS, Roman emperor from 395 to 423; was only ten years old, when, under the tutorage of Stilicho, he succeeded his father, Theodosius I., in the Western Empire, while his brother Arcadius inherited the Eastern. Honorius was a weak character. He made the laws of Theodosius against Paganism still harder. In 399 he ordered all Pagan temples to be destroyed at once; but he was unable to enforce such a law. In North Africa, where, in many places, the Pagans outnumbered the Christians, the Christians were made to suffer for the laws against Paganism. In 409 the emperor suddenly changed his mind, and a decree placed the Pagans on an equal footing with the Christians; but in 416 they were again excluded from all offices in the army and in the administration. Somewhat more consistent he showed himself in his relations with the Donatists, whom he pursued with steadily increasing severity. But he never succeeded in suppressing the heresy: he only drove the heretics into the wildest fanaticism. See DONATISTS.

HONORIUS is the name of four popes and an antipope. — Honorius I. (625–638) sided, in the monothelitic controversy, with the emperor and the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria, that is, with the Monothelites, and set forth his views in two letters, still extant, to the Patriarch of Constantinople. In consequence he was anathematized by the sixth œcumenical council (Constantinople, 680), together with the other leaders of the Monothelites; and the verdict, which was given with the assent of the papal legates, was confirmed by his successor, Leo II. This grim fact, that the papal infallibility has once been in the possession of a heretic, was in the middle ages generally passed over in silence by Roman writers; and when, afterwards, Rome was reminded of it by the Greek Church, the most audacious shifts were attempted to deny it, or to cover it out of sight. Baronius and Gretser declared that the acts of the council were false; Bellarmin and Assemani, that the verdict was a mistake by the council; Garnier and Pagi, that the condemnation touched only the policy of the Pope, not the doctrine. When, in 1870, the papal infallibility was established as a dogma of the Church, the literature on the question swelled into a library. See HEFELE: Causa Honorii Papæ, Naples, 1870; MARGERIE: Le pape Honor., Paris, 1870; J. PENNACHI: De Honorii I. causa, Rome, 1870; RUCKGABER: Die Irrlehre d. H., Stuttgart, 1871; [E. F. WILLIS: Pope Honorius and the New Roman Dogma, London, 1879]. — Honorius II. (Cadalus, antipope 1061–64) was Bishop of Parma when Nicholas II. died, and was elected Pope by the Lombard bishops (Basel, 1061), under the influence of the Empress Agnes, in opposition to Alexander II. The German bishops, however, sided, not with the empress and her candidate, but with Hildebrand and Alexander II.; and May 31, 1064, a council was convened at Milan to decide upon the double election. Alexander II. appeared before the council, but not Honorius II., who was formally deposed. He did not give up, however, his claim upon the papal crown, though it was recognized only by the Lombard bishops. He died 1073. See WATTERICH: Pontif. Rom. Vita, T. I. — Honorius II. (Dec. 16, 1124–Feb. 14, 1130) concluded, while still Cardinal-Bishop Lambert of Ostia, the concordat of Worms with Henry V., and was raised to the papal throne chiefly by the influence of the Frangipani, on account of his peaceable character. He failed in his policy towards Duke Roger of Sicily, to whom he was compelled to give Apulia as a fief. See JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 549; WATTERICH: Pont. Rom. Vita, T. II. p. 157. — Honorius III. (July 18, 1216–March 18, 1227) confirmed the order of the Dominicans in 1216, and that of the Franciscans in 1223, and crowned Pierre de Courtenay emperor of Constantinople, and Friedrich II. emperor of Rome. In his relations with the latter he was very yielding and obliging, while he showed himself extraordinarily hard against Count Raymond of Toulouse. His Opera omnia are found in HOROY: Med. Æv. Bib. Patr. (Paris, 1879, T. I.), and his letters in BOUGNET, Recueil des Historiens de Gaules et de la France, XIX. p. 610. See the works on Friedrich II. by KESTNER (Göttingen, 1873) and O. LORENZ (Berlin, 1876). — Honorius IV. (April 2, 1285–April 3, 1287) showed himself, in spite of his age and bodily debility, very energetic, both in internal administration and in foreign policy. See MURATORI: Rev. Ital. Script., III. p. 6115.

HONTER, Johann, b. at Cronstadt, Transylvania, 1498; d. there Jan. 23, 1549; studied at Vienna; was a teacher at Cracow and Basel, and returned to his native city in 1533, bringing with him the Renaissance and the Reformation. From the printing-press which he established in his house, he issued a number of books of education, and was instrumental in the foundation of the gymnasium of Cronstadt. But of still greater importance were his Formula reformationis ecclesie Coronensis (1542), and his Apologia reformationis, (1543). In 1544 he became the minister of an evangelical congregation in Cronstadt. See G. D. TEUTSCH: Ueber Honterus und Kronstadt zu seiner Zeit, Hermannstadt, 1876.

HONTHEIM, Johann Nicolaus von, b. at Treves, Jan. 27, 1701; d. there Sept. 2, 1790; studied history and canon law in his native city, at Louvain, and Leyden; visited Rome 1726; entered the service of the Church, and was appointed suffragan bishop of Treves in 1748. He wrote Historia Trevirensis (Augsburg, 1750, 3 vols. fol.) and Prodromus Historia Trevirensis (Augsburg, 1757, 2 vols. fol.), — two works of unquestionable merit. But his most remarkable literary performance was his De statu Ecclesie et legitima potestate Romani Pontificis (Frankfort, 1763), — a bold and almost unanswerable criticism on the Roman curia, and the position which it has usurped in the Christian Church. The book ran through many editions, and made a tremendous sensation. As it was published under the pseudonyme Justinus Febronius, Febronianism became the name of the views which it sustained. It was, of course, immediately put on the Index; and, when the real author was discovered, persecutions began which finally compelled him to recant. Hontheim's correspondence with the elector Clemens Wenzeslaus of Treves was published at Frankfort, 1813. See MÜLLER-MASSIS: Disquisit. de J. N. II., Treves, 1863.

MEJER.

HOOGHT, Eberhard van der, Reformed minister in Nieuwendam, Holland; d. 1716; is celebrated as the editor of a widely used edition of the Hebrew Bible, which first appeared in Amsterdam and Utrecht (1705), and has been reprinted very frequently; e.g., by Tauchnitz, Leipzig, since 1835. He wrote several books on Hebrew and Greek studies.

HOOGSTRATEN, Jacob van, b. at Hoogstraten, near Antwerp, 1454; d. at Cologne, Jan. 21, 1527; studied at Louvain; entered the Dominican order; was made prior of the Dominican convent of Cologne, and inquisitor of the provinces of Mayence, Treves, and Cologne, and became noted by his attacks on Erasmus, Reuchlin, and Luther. He was a full-blooded specimen of the monkish obscurantism and fanaticism of his time. When he lost his case against Reuchlin, the Pope himself could not compel him to keep silent. His works appeared at Cologne, 1526. See REUCHLIN.

HOOK, Walter Farquhar, D.D., F.R.S., b. in London, March 13, 1798; d. at Chichester, Wednesday, Oct. 20, 1875. He was educated at Oxford; took holy orders; was vicar of Leeds from 1837 to 1859, when he was appointed dean of Chichester. He was a sober High-Churchman. His long service in Leeds was singularly successful; for he was instrumental in erecting twenty-one churches, thirty-two parsonages, sixty schools, besides rebuilding the parish church at a cost of twenty-eight thousand pounds. In the midst of engrossing labors he found time to prepare a number of volumes, of which may be mentioned A Church Dictionary (12th ed., 1872), An Ecclesiastical Biography (1845–52, 8 vols.), Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury (1860–76, 12 vols.).

HOOKER, Richard, an eminent divine of the Church of England, and its most distinguished writer on ecclesiastical polity; b. near Exeter, about 1553; d. at Bishopsborne, Nov. 2, 1600. He was the son of poor parents, was educated by an uncle, and while at Oxford received aid from Bishop Jewel. An interesting incident in his life is his last meeting with the bishop. The latter lent Hooker his horse to carry him to Exeter, and gave him money for the journey. He acted as tutor at his university, in 1579 was appointed to deliver the Hebrew lecture, and in 1581 took orders. In his marriage, which occurred about this time, he was unfortunate. With characteristic lack of worldly wisdom, he confided to a Mrs. Churchman of London the care, which she had solicited, of selecting for him a wife. "Fearing no guile," says Walton, "Hooker did give her such a power as Eleazer was trusted with (you may read it in the Book of Genesis) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac," etc. We may not blame Mrs. Churchman for hitting upon her daughter Joan; but we shall pity Hooker none the less for that. He was appointed to the living of Drayton Beauchamp, in the diocese of Lincoln, 1584, and the following year, at the recommendation of Archbishop Sandys, to whose son Hooker had acted as tutor at Oxford, master of the Temple, London. He shared the pulpit with Travers, a Genevan divine. Of the preaching of the two, Fuller says, "The congregation at the Temple ebbed in the forenoon [when Hooker preached], and flowed in the afternoon." He, however, suggests that Mr. Hooker "was too wise to take exception at such trifles." In 1591 Hooker went to Boscombe, and was made a minor prebend of Salisbury, and in 1595 was transferred to Bishopsborne, three miles from Canterbury, where he died.

Hooker was rather a tedious preacher, having an embarrassed manner, and his sentences being too prolix, and sometimes involved, for the pulpit. Yet Fuller quaintly says, "He may be said to have made good music with his fiddle and stick alone, without any rosin, having neither pronunciation nor gesture to grace his matter."

Hooker's great reputation rests upon his Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. It consists of eight books, four of which were written in Boscombe, and published 1594, and the fifth in 1597. The last three books have an interesting history, which is given in full by Keble (pp. xii-xxv). Hooker's widow was accused of having burned the manuscript; but, whether justly or not, it was irrecoverably gone (Keble). The rough draughts, however, were preserved. The sixth and eighth were published in 1648, and the seventh in 1662. Of these the sixth is, according to Keble, probably not genuine. The other two contain the substance of what Hooker wrote. The immediate occasion of the Ecclesiastical Polity seems to have been an attack of Travers upon Hooker for extending salvation to Roman Catholics, and his lack of sympathy with Calvinism. With Jewel's Apology it is the most important original contribution to English ecclesiastical literature of the sixteenth century, and the first great ecclesiastical work written in English. Its style has been highly praised; and Green (History English People, iii. 30) speaks of "its grandeur and stateliness, which raised its author to the highest rank among English prose-writers." Written in a temperate spirit, and with vigor of thought, it is free from the multitudinous and often unsifted quotations which deface the pages of the theological works of the period; e.g., Jewel's Apology.

The contents are rather more philosophical than theological, and the work more valuable for its broad and fundamental principles than for exactness of definition, or clearness of argument. It is in effect an answer to Puritanism, which had been bitterly attacking the episcopal system through a generation. Conceived in an admirable temper, and free from the heat and vituperation which characterized the controversial writings of the period, it makes no attempt to discredit the Presbyterian system. Its object is to assert the right of a broad liberty on the basis of Scripture and reason. He expressly denies that the practice of the apostles is a rule to be invariably followed, but that a change of circumstances warrants a departure from the governmental policy and discipline of the early church. He seeks to prove that things not commanded in Scripture may still be lawful, and he does it by appealing to the practice of the Puritans themselves (as in the case of the wafer which they used in common with the Roman Catholics, etc.). The assertion of this fundamental prerogative of reason is one of the most valuable contributions of the work. Hooker has been claimed as a champion of the High-Anglican doctrine of episcopacy, and, hardly less confidently, by the other side as the advocate of the view that church government is a matter of expediency. Isolated expressions can be found in favor of both, as even Keble qualifiedly admits (p. xxxviii). But neither view is true. Hooker holds a position intermediate between the school of the English Reformers, Archbishop Grindal (d. 1583) and most of Elizabeth's bishops, and the school which grew up in the contest with Puritanism, and had its extreme representative in Archbishop Laud (1633-45). Had he been more exact in his definitions, it might be possible to place him more confidently on the one side or on the other. As it is, he stands as the representative of toleration in the sphere of ecclesiastical polity and the advocate of the claims of reason against that narrow scripturalism which assumes to tolerate nothing which the Scriptures do not expressly command.

Besides the Ecclesiastical Polity, we are in possession of several of Hooker's Sermons. The first complete edition of his Works was by GAUDEN, London, 1662; the best is by KEBLE, Oxford, 1836, 4 vols., and often since. It contains an Introduction and valuable Notes by the editor, and the genial Life of Hooker by IZAAK WALTON, which first appeared in 1665 to correct the errors in GAUDEN'S Life (1662). D. S. HOOPER, John, bishop and martyr, b. in Somersetshire, 1495; d. at the stake Feb. 9, 1555, in Gloucester. He was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and entered the Cistercian order. A diligent study of the Scriptures and the works of Zwingli and Bullinger on the Pauline Epistles, convinced him of the errors of the Papal Church, and made him an ardent advocate of the Reformation. When, in 1539, the VI. or (so called) Bloody Articles were enforced, he retired to the Continent, meeting at Strassburg the lady he subsequently married. Returning to England to secure funds from his father, he went back again in 1547 to the Continent, tarrying at Zurich, where he was received by Bullinger, and carried on a correspondence with Bucer, concerning the sacraments.

In 1549 Hooper returned to England, and immediately threw himself into an arduous activity, preaching at least once every day, and with great power. Foxe says of him, "In his sermons he corrected sin, and sharply inveighed against the iniquity of the world and the corrupt abuses of the church. The people in great flocks and companies came daily to hear him, insomuch that the church would oftentimes be so full, that none could enter further than the doors. In his doctrine he was earnest, in tongue eloquent, in Scripture perfect, in pains indefatigable." In 1550 he preached before the king once every week during Lent, and soon after was nominated to the see of Gloucester. But unexpected impediments interfered with his acceptance. Hooper had fully imbibed the spirit of the Continental Reformation, so that Canon Perry feels justified in calling him the "first Puritan confessor" (History of the Church of England, ii. 205). He had a strong aversion to clerical vestments, which he described as Aaronical and superstitious, and absolutely refused to take the oath of consecration, in which the candidate had to swear by the saints. The king removed the latter obstacle by erasing with his own hand the obnoxious clause. The former gave more trouble. Crammer and Ridley both attempted to relieve Hooper's mind of its scruples. But the controversy became so heated, and Hooper was so denunciatory from the pulpit against those who used vestments, that he was sent to the Fleet. Bucer and Peter Martyr were both appealed to on the subject by both parties. They recommended Hooper to submit. Following their advice, he was consecrated March 8, 1551. It was prescribed that he should wear the vestments on public occasions, but at other times might use his own discretion.

In the administration of his episcopal office, Hooper was so indefatigable in preaching and visitation as to call forth the friendly council of Bullinger and other friends to practise a prudent moderation. Foxe calls him "a spectacle (pattern) to all bishops." In 1552 he was appointed Bishop of Worcester in commendam.

Hooper and Rogers were the first to be cited under Mary. On Aug. 29, 1553, the former was thrown into prison, where he received harsh treatment, and contracted sciatica. In January, 1555, he was condemned on three charges, — for maintaining the lawfulness of clerical marriage, for defending divorce, and for denying transubstantiation. He called the mass "the iniquity of the Devil." He was sentenced to die at the stake in Gloucester, whither he was conveyed. He met his death firmly and cheerfully. To a friend bewailing his lot, the martyr replied in the oft-quoted words, "Death is bitter, and life is sweet, but alas! consider that death to come is more bitter, and life to come is more sweet." In another conversation, he said, "I am well, thank God; and death to me for Christ's sake is welcome." His martyrdom was witnessed by a large throng of people. The martyr was forbidden to address the crowd. A real or pretended pardon being promised if he would recant, he spurned it away, saying, "If you love my soul, away with it." His agony was greatly prolonged and increased by the slow progress of the fire on account of the green fagots, which had to be rekindled three times before they did their work.

LIT. — Hooper's works have been edited by the Parker Society (with a biography) in two volumes, Cambridge, 1843-52, and by the Religious Tract Society in one volume. The more important are A Brief and Clear Confession of the Christian Faith; A Declaration of Christ and his Office; A Declaration of the Ten Commandments; Seven Sermons on Jonah; and An Answer to Bishop Gardiner, being a Detection of the Devil's Sophistry wherewith he robeth the unlearned people of the true belief in the most blessed Sacrament of the Altar. FOXE, in the Book of Martyrs, gives a minute and impressive account of Hooper's life, and dwells at length upon his martyrdom.

HOORNBEEK, Johannes, b. at Harlem, 1617; d. at Leyden, 1666; was appointed minister at Utrecht 1644, and professor of theology at Leyden 1654, and wrote Socialismus confutatus (1650), Examen bullæ papalis, etc. (1652), Epistola de Independentismo (1659), etc.

HÔPITAL (Hospital), Michel de L', b. at Aigueperse, in Auvergne, 1505; d. on his estate of Vignay, near Etampes, March 13, 1573; studied law at Padua, and was successively auditor of the Rota, French plenipotentiary at the Council of Bologna, chancellor to the Duchess of Berry, and finally Chancellor of France (1560-70), in which position he exercised a great and beneficial influence. Although he remained a member of the Roman Church, his great aim was to find a modus vivendi at once acceptable to the Romanists and the Reformed; and in the pursuit of this aim he arranged the conferences of Poissy (1561) and St. Germain (1562), drew up the January edict (1562), mediated the peace of Amboise (1563), labored for the rejection of the canons of the Council of Trent, negotiated the peace of Longjumeau (1568), etc. His letters were published at Liège, 1585; his Latin poems, in Amsterdam, 1732; his collected works, in Paris, 1824-26, 5 vols. See the sketch of his life, by VILLEMANN, in Études d'Histoire moderne, Paris, 1862; GEUER: Die Kirchenpolitik M. d. L'H., Duisburg, 1877.

HOPKINS, Albert, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., July 14, 1807; was graduated at Williams College 1826; became a tutor in the college 1827, professor of mathematics and natural philosophy 1829-38, and of natural philosophy and astronomy 1838, till his death; d. in Williamstown, May 24, 1872. The events of his life were of a wholly ordinary grade, and leave no record behind them. His character only was extraordinary. In 1832 he established in college a noon prayer-meeting of a half-hour, held on four days of the week; and he maintained it for forty years. Although licensed to preach the gospel in 1838, and preaching frequently since, it was not until Dec. 26, 1869, that he was formally ordained. His last days were largely devoted to pastoral work, but not to the neglect of his college duties. His monument is the Church of Christ in the White Oaks (a district in the north-east part of Williamstown), which was the result of his efforts, and which was organized Dec. 20, 1868; but previously he had led the way to, and efficiently aided in, the erection of a chapel there, which was dedicated Oct. 25, 1866. Acquaintance with Professor Hopkins was a means of grace. He was pre-eminently a man of faith, and impressed all he met by his unworldly life. At the same time he was an excellent teacher, and a man of enterprise and push. See his Life by ALBERT C. SEWALL, New York [1879].

HOPKINS, John Henry, D.D., D.C.L. (Oxford), Protestant-Episcopal Bishop of Vermont; b. in Dublin, Jan. 30, 1792; came to this country when he was eight years old; d. at Rock Point, Vt., Jan. 9, 1868. In 1817 he was admitted to the bar, but in 1823 entered the ministry, and became rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburg, the year following. In 1831 he went to Boston, and in 1832 was elected Bishop of Vermont, accepting at the same time the rectorship of St. Paul's, Burlington. Bishop Hopkins was a zealous High-Churchman, and refused to sign a protest of the majority of the American bishops against Romanizing tendencies. He was an advocate of slavery, and in 1863 published Indication of Slavery. Among his other many writings are History of the Confessionals (New York, 1850). and Refutation of Milner's End of Controversy, in a Series of Letters to the Roman Archbishop of Baltimore (Kenrick), 2 vols., 1854.

HOPKINS, Samuel, D.D., b. in Waterbury, Conn., Sept. 17, 1721; d. in Newport, R.I., Dec. 20, 1803, in the eighty-third year of his life, and the sixty-second of his ministry. As a child he was remarkable for his purity and ingenuousness. He entered Yale College in September, 1737. Here he devoted himself specially to logic and mathematics. Here he began his Christian life, during the religious interest attending the services of Whitefield and Gilbert Tennent at New Haven. In 1741 he commenced his theological studies, under the care and in the family of President Edwards, then of Northampton, Mass. He was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Great Barrington, Mass., Dec. 28, 1743. When he was ordained, the church consisted of only five members: a hundred and sixteen joined it during his pastorate. After a ministry of twenty-five years, he was dismissed Jan. 18, 1769. His ministry was sometimes interrupted by the French and Indian wars, which compelled him to flee with his family to other towns for safety. He preached often to the Housatonic Indians in his neighborhood. His hundred and sixtieth written sermon to them is still preserved in manuscript. He was so successful in his ministry among them, that he was invited to become their missionary. With all his fondness for study, he was never happier than when preaching to the poor. While at Great Barrington, he remained intimate with President Edwards so long as Edwards was at Northampton, and became still more intimate with him when Edwards removed to Stockbridge. At this time he was better acquainted than any other man with the peculiar views of Edwards. He also held frequent and fraternal intercourse with Dr. Bellamy of Bethlehem, Conn. He exerted a marked influence on several men who afterwards became eminent; as on Dr. Jonathan Edwards, the son of the president, and on Dr. Stephen West of Stockbridge, Mass. He spent commonly fourteen, and occasionally eighteen, hours a day at his study-table. So thorough was his theological training that he was named as a candidate for a professorship of divinity in Princeton College, and afterward for the presidency of the college.

He was installed pastor of the First Congregational Church in Newport, R.I., April 11, 1770, and continued in this pastorate thirty-three years. Soon after his installation he was gratified with a visit from his friend, George Whitefield. As the French and Indian wars had interfered with his parochial success in Great Barrington, so the Revolutionary War interfered with it in Newport. The town was captured by the British in 1786, and remained in their possession more than three years. During these years the church of Dr. Hopkins was impoverished, the church edifice was nearly ruined, and he himself was compelled to seek refuge in other towns. He spent the years of this banishment in supplying destitute churches in Connecticut, and in assisting his friend and pupil, Dr. Samuel Spring in Newburyport. Here he gained a noticeable influence over Moses Brown, Esq., and Hon. William Bartlett, parishioners of Dr. Spring. He made frequent visits to his brother, Dr. Daniel Hopkins of Salem, Mass.; and here he gained a noticeable influence over Hon. John Norris, a parishioner of that brother. These three laymen cherished through life a deep reverence for Dr. Samuel Hopkins; and it is interesting to reflect that they became founders, as Dr. Spring became a father, of the Andover Theological Seminary. (See ANDOVER THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.) On returning to Newport in 1780, Dr. Hopkins resumed a work which had already exposed him to severe persecution. Newport had been a principal slave-mart of North America. As early as 1770 Hopkins began to preach against the slave system. He afterward published numerous essays against it in the newspapers of Newport, Providence, Boston, Hartford. From 1780 onward he wrote elaborate letters on the subject to men of wealth and influence in this country, and to John Erskine, Granville Sharp, Zachary Macaulay, and other abolitionists in Great Britain. As early as 1773 he had united with his friend Dr. Ezra Stiles of Newport, in issuing a circular plea for aid in educating two colored men for an African mission. In 1776 he had united with Dr. Stiles in a second circular for the same object. Some time after 1780 he formed a more comprehensive plan for colonizing American slaves. His plan was followed by visible results. Two liberated negroes, who in their youth had been affected by his colonizing scheme, retained for about forty years their desire to go as colonists and missionaries to their native land; and in January, 1826, they sailed from Boston to Liberia with sixteen other Africans, all formed into a church, of which these two aged men were deacons. The merits of Dr. Hopkins as a pioneer in the cause of African emancipation and colonization will be more fully recognized hereafter than they are at present. Dr. William E. Channing, who was in early life a friend and admirer of Hopkins, has rendered a fitting tribute to his philanthropy. The poet Whittier and other eminent laymen have done the same. (See Memoir of Hopkins prefixed to his works, vol. i. pp. 112-165.)

Dr. Hopkins was a very unattractive speaker; he was more successful as a writer. By his love of investigation, his patient and unremitting thought, the independence, strength, and comprehensiveness of his mind, by his honesty, humility, benevolence, his deferential study of the Bible, and his habit of communion with God, he was eminently fitted to be a theologian. He left his theological system with just those faults which might be expected from an original thinker, with just those faults which might be expected from a positive thinker. His faults were a want of completeness and symmetry, also a bold and positive style where caution and reserve were more apposite. His system was essentially Calvinistic, but was distinguished by the epithet "Hopkinsian." (See HOPKINSIANISM.)

He is said to have spent six years in studying the writings of President Edwards, all of whose manuscripts, by the president's request, were committed to the care of Hopkins. He superintended the publication of Edwards's Treatise on Original Sin, 1758. He edited and published seventeen of Edwards's Sermons (1764), the two dissertations on The End for which God created the World and on The Nature of True Virtue (1765); and he prepared for the press several other of the president's works. The theological writings of Hopkins himself were (titles abbreviated), The Wisdom of God in the Permission of Sin (1759), An Inquiry concerning the Promises of the Gospel (1765), The True State and Character of the Unregenerate (1769), Animadversions on Mr. Hart's late Dialogue, which was in opposition to Dr. Hopkins's writings (1770), An Inquiry into the Nature of True Holiness (1773), An Inquiry concerning the Future State of those who die in their Sins (1783), A System of Doctrines contained in Divine Revelation (2 vols. 8vo, 1793), A Dialogue between a Calvinist and a Semi-Calvinist (1805), published after the author's death. Among his printed sermons were one on The Divinity of Christ (1768), two on Law and Regeneration (1768), a Volume of Twenty-one Sermons, edited by Dr. Daniel Hopkins (1803). The biographies published by Hopkins were The Life and Character of President Edwards, prefixed to Edwards's seventeen sermons (1764), The Life and Character of Miss Susanna Anthony (1796), Memoirs of the Life of Mrs. Sarah Osborn (1799). His political writings were chiefly anonymous. In 1766 he published his noted Dialogue concerning the Slavery of the Africans, together with his Address to Slaveholders. It is estimated, that if his essays and letters on African emancipation, and his elaborate letters to Andrew Fuller, John Ryland, Drs. Davies and Bellamy on religious themes, were printed, they would form a large volume. Many of his printed works were republished in 1854 by the Doctrinal Tract and Book Society (now Congregational Board of Publication) at Boston, in three octavo volumes, containing over two thousand pages. In 1805 appeared the Autobiography of Dr. Hopkins with an Introduction by Dr. Stephen West: in 1830, a Memoir of Dr. Hopkins by Rev. John Ferguson; in 1843, Reminiscences of Dr. Hopkins by Rev. Dr. William Patten; in 1854, a Memoir, containing 266 pages, 8vo, by the undersigned.

HOPKINSIANISM. The roots of this theological system lie embedded in the published and unpublished writings of the elder Jonathan Edwards: hence it has been called the "Edwardean Divinity." The main principles of it are either taught or implied in the writings of Dr. Samuel Hopkins of Newport, R.I., the earliest of whose publications were sanctioned by the elder Edwards and Dr. Bellamy. Those principles which are merely implied in his system have been unfolded and somewhat modified by his three friends, Dr. Stephen West, Dr. Nathanael Emmons, and Dr. Samuel Spring. As logically connected with each other, and as understood by the majority of its advocates, the system contains the following principles. (1) Every moral agent choosing right has the natural power to choose wrong, and choosing wrong has the natural power to choose right. (2) He is under no obligation to perform an act, unless he has the natural ability to perform it. (3) Although in the act of choosing, every man is as free as any moral agent can be, yet he is acted upon while he acts freely, and the divine providence, as well as decree, extends to all his wrong as really as to his right volitions. (4) All sin is so overruled by God as to become the occasion of good to the universe. (5) The holiness and the sinfulness of every moral agent belong to him personally and exclusively, and cannot be imputed in a literal sense to any other agent. (6) As the holiness and the sin of man are exercises of his will, there is neither holiness nor sin in his nature viewed as distinct from these exercises. (7) As all his moral acts before regeneration are certain to be entirely sinful, no promise of regenerating grace is made to any of them. (8) The impenitent sinner is obligated, and should be exhorted, to cease from all impenitent acts, and to begin a holy life at once. His moral inability to obey this exhortation is not a literal inability, but is a mere certainty, that, while left to himself, he will sin; and this certainty is no reason for his not being required and urged to abstain immediately from all sin. (9) Every impenitent sinner should be willing to suffer the punishment which God wills to inflict upon him. In whatever sense he should submit to the divine justice punishing other sinners, in that sense he should submit to the divine justice punishing himself. In whatever sense the punishment of the finally obdurate promotes the highest good of the universe, in that sense he should be submissive to the divine will in punishing himself, if finally obdurate. This principle is founded mainly on the two following. (10) All holiness consists in the elective preference of the greater above the smaller, and all sin consists in the elective preference of the smaller above the greater, good of sentient beings. (11) All the moral attributes of God are comprehended in general benevolence, which is essentially the same with general justice, and includes simple, complacential, and composite benevolence; legislative, retributive, and public justice. (12) The atonement of Christ consists not in his enduring the punishment threatened by the law, nor in his performing the duties required by the law, but in his manifesting and honoring by his pains, and especially by his death, all the divine attributes which would have been manifested in the same and no higher degree by the punishment of the redeemed. (13) The atonement was made for all men, the non-elect as really as the elect.

The epithet "Hopkinsian" was invented in 1769 or 1770 by Rev. William Hart of Saybrook, Conn., and was applied, not to the whole system of Dr. Hopkins, but to the principles marked 7 and 8 above. As a whole, Hopkinsianism has been distinguished by the prominence which it gives to the sterner class of truths; as the decrees and sovereignty of God, the eternity of future punishment, etc. It has prepared the way for giving this prominence by introducing a different class of principles; as the equity of God in adapting his law to the natural ability of men, his infinite worthiness in making benevolence the sum of all his moral attributes, the beauty of holiness as consisting in the choice of the greater above the smaller good of the universe, etc. On account of the prominence which it gives to the former class of principles, it has been criticised as Hyper-Calvinism: on account of its adopting the latter class, it has been criticised since 1772 as Arminian and Pelagian. By combining the two classes, and developing their consistency with each other and with the uses of the pulpit, it has claimed the title of "Consistent Calvinism." The substance of it has been now incorporated with what is termed "New-England Theology" (see art.).

HOR, Mount (the mountain). There are two mountains of this name in Scripture. The first, called by the Arabs Jebel Nēby Harun ("the mountain of the prophet Aaron"), is on the boundary-line of Edom (Num. xx. 23), midway between the Dead Sea and the Gulf of Akabah, and is forty-eight hundred feet high. It has two peaks; and on one of these, or, as some suppose, on the level space between them, from whence he could be seen by all the people, Aaron died (Num. xx. 27, 28). The tomb (Kabr Harūn) now shown to travellers as his is a small building twenty-eight by thirty-three feet, surmounted by a white dome,—the usual mark of a saint's resting-place. The interior of the tomb consists of two rooms, one above the other. The upper one has in it a stone sarcophagus; the ceiling is supported by four pillars. The lower room is reached by a flight of steps, and is perfectly dark. At one end, through a grating, is shown what purports to be the real tomb.

The second Mount Hor (Num. xxxiv. 7, 8) was between the Mediterranean and the "entrance of Hamath," but has not been further identified.

HORBE, Johann Heinrich, b. at Colmar, in Alsace, June 11, 1635; d. at Steinbeck, near Hamburg, Jan. 26, 1695; studied theology at Strassburg, where, among others, he also had Spener for his teacher; visited afterwards the universities of Jena, Leipzig, Wittenberg, Helmstädt, and Kiel; travelled in Holland, England, and France, and was in 1671 appointed pastor at Trarbach on the Mosel. The boldness with which he expounded and carried out into practice his pietistic views brought him into collision with his colleagues, and in 1678 he was dismissed. In the following year he was appointed pastor of Windsheim in Franconia, and in 1681 pastor of St. Nicholas in Hamburg. In the latter place he found many adherents, but also many adversaries; and the distribution of Die Klugheit der Gerechten, a translation of a pamphlet by the French mystic Pierre Poiret, raised such a storm against him that he was dismissed November, 1693. He retired to Steinbeck, where he died. A list of his writings is found in J. MÖLLER: Cimbria literata, II. pp. 355-372. See also J. GEFFCKEN: Johann Winkler und die Hamburgische Kirche, Hamburg, 1861.

HORCHE, Heinrich, b. at Eschwege, Dec. 12, 1652; d. at Kirchhain, Aug. 5, 1729; studied at Marburg, and was appointed court-preacher at Kreuznach 1685, and pastor of Herborn 1690, from which latter position he was dismissed in 1698. Gradually his pietism developed into separatism, his enthusiasm into insanity. The last part of his life he spent wandering about, preaching in public, and holding conventicles. He was several times arrested, and twice detained in a lunatic-asylum. But his relations with all the separatists and enthusiasts of his time continued to the last. See H. HOCHMUTH: II. II. und die philadelphischen Gemeinden in Hesse, Gütersloh, 1876.

HORMISDAS (Pope July 20, 514-Aug. 6, 523) demanded, as a condition of the re-establishment of union between the Eastern and Western churches, the formal acknowledgment of the anathema spoken by the Bishop of Rome over Anasius. The Emperor Anastasius refused the demand, but his successor, Justin I., complied with it; and in 519 the schism, which had lasted for thirty-five years, was healed. Hormisdas' letters are found in MIGNE, Patrol. Lat., 63; his life, in JAFFÉ, Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 65.

HORNE, George, an eminent English divine and commentator: b. at Otham, Kent, Nov. 1, 1730; d. at Bath, Jan. 17, 1792. He was educated at University College, Oxford, and made fellow of Magdalen, 1749. He rose to very high distinction as a scholar, became president of Magdalen in 1768, vice-chancellor of the university 1776, dean of Canterbury 1781, and was consecrated Bishop of Norwich June 7, 1790. He enjoyed the friendship and esteem of Dr. Johnson. Bishop Horne was an evangelical divine, a polished preacher, and a genial writer. He early entered into a controversy with Dr. Kennicott, who proposed to make a collation of Hebrew manuscripts, fearing the results, or at least denying the claims, of a scientific criticism of the Bible. His Commentary on the Psalms (2 vols., 1776) has passed through many editions, and is his best work. It is characterized by unction and fertility of devotional counsel. Editions have appeared with an excellent Introductory Essay by Edward Irving. Among his other works was a volume of Letters on Infidelity (1784), in which he criticises Hume's arguments. See The Works of B. Horne, with his Life, by WILLIAM JONES, London, 1795-99, 6 vols., and 1831, 4 vols.

HORNE, Thomas Hartwell, b. in London, Oct. 20, 1780; d. there Jan. 27, 1862. He was educated at Christ's Hospital (1789-95), and then was a barrister's clerk; but in 1809 he became sub-librarian to the Surrey Institution, in 1814 librarian; was admitted to holy orders 1819; was senior assistant librarian in the British Museum 1824-60, made B.D. by Cambridge 1829, prebendary of St. Paul's 1831, and in 1833 was appointed rector of the united parishes of St. Edmund the King, and St. Nicolas Acons, in London. He gave early evidence of his literary ability in his Brief View of the Necessity and Truth of the Christian Religion (1800, 2d ed., 1802), and wrote very many pamphlets and volumes; but the work by which he is remembered is An Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1818, 3 vols., 10th ed., vol. 2 revised by Rev. Samuel Davidson, D.D., and vol. 4 by Samuel Prideaux Tregelles, LL.D., 1856, 4 vols. in 5. But Dr. Davidson's "rationalism" led to the rejection of his work, and the substitution of the revision of vol. 2 by Rev. John Ayre. The fourteenth edition of the work appeared 1877; there is also an American reprint of a former edition. Horne's Introduction is the most famous book of its class. It covers the entire field of biblical learning, — not only general and special introduction proper, but hermeneutics, apologetics, biblical geography, natural history, etc. It has been of incalculable value in the Church, and the means of turning many persons unto profound Bible study. The Bibliographical Appendix to the Introduction is the best thing of its kind as yet published in English.

HORNEY, or HORNEJUS, Conrad, b. at Brunswick, Nov. 25, 1590; d. at Helmstädt, Sept. 26, 1649; studied philosophy and theology, first in his native place, afterwards at Helmstädt, where he was appointed professor of philosophy in 1619, and of theology in 1628. His Compendium dialecticæ (1623), Philosophiæ moralis (1624), Theologiæ, and Hist. Eccles. (the two last published after his death), were much used as text-books, not only at Helmstädt, but also in other universities.

HOROLOGIUM (ὥρολόγιον, "a dial"), an office-book of the Greek Church, corresponding to the Latin breviary, and containing the office for the day and night hours of the Church, from matin to compline, with the variable antiphons and hymns, and various short offices, prayers, and canons, for occasional use.

HORSLEY, Samuel, a learned and eloquent prelate of the Church of England; b. in London, 1733; d. at Brighton, Oct. 4, 1806. His father was a minister, and personally supervised his education till he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated LL.B. in 1758. His first charge in the ministry was Newington in Surrey. In 1767 he was elected to the Royal Society, and was secretary of that body from 1773 to 1784, when he resigned his membership, on account of difficulties with the president. He was an able classical scholar and mathematician, published works in both departments, and edited the Works of Sir Isaac Newton, in 5 vols., 1779-85. His ministerial career was a brilliant one. After filling other positions, he was appointed in 1781 archdeacon of St. Alban's. Whilst holding this position, he entered (1783) upon his famous controversy with Dr. Priestley. His Letters (see Horsley's Tracts in Controversy with Dr. Priestley, with Notes by Rev. H. Horsley, 3d ed., Dundee, 1812) on this subject are full of learning and keen argument. In clear and solid reasoning he was more than a match for his opponent; and Gibbon describes his achievements by saying that "his spear pierced the Socinian's shield." The dispute was carried on with great heat, and not a little acrimony on both sides. For his services in stopping the tide of Socinianism, he was rewarded by Thurlow with a prebend's stall in Gloucester, and with the see of St. David's, in 1788. In Parliament, Bishop Horsley was an energetic supporter of Mr. Pitt. In 1793 he was translated to the see of Rochester, and rewarded with the deanery of Westminster for a famous sermon preached there on the anniversary of the execution of Charles I., and a few days after Louis XVI. was guillotined. In 1802 he was transferred to the see of St. Asaph.

Bishop Horsley was a man of overbearing temper, but a keen reasoner, sound scholar, and eloquent orator. His sermons are among the very best specimens of English pulpit eloquence. Among his works not already referred to may be mentioned a Commentary on Hosea (1801, 2d ed., 1804), the posthumous work on the Psalms translated from the Hebrew, etc. (1815, 2 vols., 4th ed., 1845), Biblical Criticism of Fourteen Historical Books of the Old Testament, etc. (1820, 1 vols., 2d ed., 1844, 2 vols.), a collected edition of Horsley's Theological Works (London, 1830, 9 vols.), and his Sermons, complete in 1 vol. (London, 1839). See STANLEY: Memorials of Westminster Abbey; and STOUGHTON: Religion in England, vi., 179 sqq.

HOSE'A (הוֹשֵׁעַ, "help"), a Hebrew prophet, was the son of Beeri. Of his life nothing further is known than what may be inferred from his prophecy. Tradition is singularly reticent concerning him. The prophet was married, and had three children. His marriage is not to be explained as an allegory [some of the fathers, Horsley, and others], nor resolved into a vision [Hengstenberg, etc.]. He belonged to the kingdom of Israel, as is evident from vii. 5, where he calls the king of Israel "our king," and from the contents of the prophecy, which display a familiar acquaintance with the affairs of the Northern Kingdom.

The Book of Hosea is divided into two parts, — i.-iii. and iv.-xiv. In chapter i. it is told how, in obedience to the divine command, the prophet married a "wife of whoredoms" (Gomer), who bore him a daughter ("Not having obtained Mercy") and two sons ("Jezreel" and "Not my People"). These three names are plainly symbolical of God's displeasure. Chapter ii. promises reconciliation with the people, notwithstanding their alienation from him. The new and pleasanter names are substituted, — "My People," and "Having obtained Mercy." But between the displeasure and reconciliation a period was to intervene (iii.) in which Israel should be punished for its spiritual adultery, and be led by sorrows to seek again the Lord.

The second part (iv.-xiv.) contains a series of punitive and threatening discourses. The first of these (iv.) describes the deep moral fall of the land, in which the leaders and priests were also involved. In the second (v.-vi. 3), the prophet urges the responsibility of the priests for the spiritual declension and the divine punishment, in spite of the help sought from foreign nations, and closes with the scene of the people's returning wounded to the Lord for healing. This section belongs to the reign of Shallum, which lasted only one month (v. 7). If this be granted, then the former section belongs to the reign of Zachariah. The third discourse (vi. 4-vii. 16) contains a reproof of Ephraim, who is unstable, wanders off from God, and seeks aid from Egypt and Assyria. As Hitzig has rightly pointed out, vii. 7 enables us to fix the time of this discourse pretty accurately in the reign of Menahem. The fourth discourse (viii. 1-ix. 9) again lays bare the spiritual adultery of Israel, and lifts a warning voice. It evidently belongs to the reign of Menahem, who leaned upon Assyria (viii. 4). The fifth discourse (ix. 10-xi. 11) three times shows how Israel had returned God's goodness by turning to idols. If, as is very probable, x. 14 refers to Shalmaneser, then this prophecy was spoken under King Hoshea. The last discourse (xii. 1-xiv. 9), which closes with an earnest exhortation to the people to repent, and the announcement of a divine promise, belongs also to the reign of Hoshea, and before the fall of the Northern Kingdom.

To sum up, we have here a series of prophecies reaching from the last years of Jeroboam II., king of Israel, into the reign of Hoshea; so that there is no good reason for denying the genuineness of the superscription (i. 1), as some have done [or from about 784 to 726 B.C.]. That the prophecies of Hosea have been handed down to us in their integrity, has with reason been emphasized by Ewald.

Hosea is closely related to Amos, his older contemporary, as is evident by a comparison of Hos. iv. 3, and Amos viii. 8; Hos. iv. 15, and Amos v. 5; Hos. v. 7, and Amos vii. 4, etc. But, closely related as the prophets are, the differences in their language and manner of representation are marked. Hosea's style is full of rare words (ii. 4, 12, viii. 6, etc.), verbal forms and expressions (iv. 4, ix. 1, etc.). In other respects, also, they differ. Amos is more gentle, Hosea more robust. His mind, as Umbreit says, "moves, profoundly agitated, under the burden, divinely imposed, of preaching against the sins of his people, and announcing their fall. Hence the abruptness of his discourse, the disconnectedness of the sentences, and the peculiar character of the figures, which follow each other rapidly, and without being rounded out; so that Jerome was right when he said Hosea was concise, and spoke, as it were, in detached, unconnected sentences (commaticus est et quasi per sententias loquens). Notwithstanding, however, the dark flood of ire which the book reveals to our gaze, it also unveils a light of reconciling love of surpassing beauty, which ever and anon shines upon the adulterous people. And in this combination lies the peculiar splendor of our prophet."

Hosea is referred to three times in the New Testament.—Rom. ix. 25, 26, 1 Cor. xv. 55, and Matt. ii. 15.

HOSHEA (God is help), the son of Elah, and the last and best of the kings of Israel, headed a conspiracy against Pekah, slew him, and seized the throne (2 Kings xv. 30). But he was unable to stay the fall of his kingdom. At the very beginning of his reign he was compelled to pay tribute to Assyria (2 Kings xvii. 3); and in his ninth year he was invaded by the Assyrian king, because he had attempted an alliance with Egypt. Samaria was taken, after a three-years' siege, and a large part of the people carried away to Assyria (xvii. 6), and their land was newly peopled (xvii. 24, cf. Hos. xiii. 16, Mic. i. 6). It would seem that the king who began the siege of Samaria was Shalmaneser; the king who took it was Sargon; the Egyptian king, who is called So, was Sevechus, the second king of the twenty-fifth Ethiopian dynasty. RÜETSCHL.

HOSIUS, generally called Osius by Latin writers; b. 256; d. 359; was Bishop of Corduba (Cordova), in Spain, for over fifty years. He was present at the synod of Elvira (305 or 306), and agreed in its severe canons concerning the lapsi, the marriage of ecclesiastics, and other points of discipline. Some years later on he appears at the court of Constantine the Great as a man of great influence. He brought personally the emperor's letter to Bishop Alexander of Alexandria, and Arius, exhorting them to refrain from disturbing the Church by their disputes; and he was, no doubt, instrumental in the convention of the first œcumenical council of Nicæa (325), where he played a prominent part. Of the details of his administration of his diocese, nothing is known; but he remained the firm friend of Athanasius and his cause in the Western Church; and when Constantius, in 353, endeavored to establish peace in the Church by openly favoring the Arians, Hosius refused not only to condemn Athanasius, but also to enter into communion with the Arians. The demand was made by the emperor; and Hosius refused again in a dignified letter, reminding the emperor, that, though the realm belonged to him, the Church belonged to the bishops. Hosius was then banished to Sirmium; and, by a synod held there in 357, he was induced to subscribe the second Sirmian formula, involving communion with the Arians, but not the condemnation of Athanasius. After his return to Corduba, he retracted, however. Of his writings, only the above-mentioned letter has come down to us. ATHANASIUS: Ad Monach.; DALE: Synod of Elvira, 1882. W. MÖLLER.

HOSIUS, Stanislaus, b. in Cracow, May 5, 1501; d. at Capranica, near Rome, Aug. 5, 1579; studied law at Padua and Bologna; entered the service of the Church, and was made Bishop of Culm 1549, Bishop of Ermeland, 1551, and cardinal 1561. He was a most decided and energetic enemy of the Reformation, intimately connected with the Jesuits, rejoicing over the murder of Coligny, and anxious that Poland also should have its Massacre of St. Bartholomew. He drew up the Confessio fidei christiana catholica, adopted by the synod of Petrikau 1551, and founded in 1565 the college and seminary of Braunsberg, which for centuries formed the centre of the Roman-Catholic mission among the Protestants. He was not a great theologian. The Bible he considered the "property of the Roman Church;" and, that one quality left out of view, it had, he thought, no more worth than the fables of Æsop. His writings, passionately polemical, are full of logical blunders. But he was a great administrator and a great diplomatist, and successfully carried through many very difficult negotiations. A collected edition of his works appeared at Cologne, 1584. See KRASINSKI: The Reform. in Poland, Lond., 1838–40, 2 vols.; and his life written by RESCIUS and A. EICHMORS, Mainz, 1855, 2 vols. SÜDHOFF.

HOSPINIAN, Rudolph, b. at Altorf, Nov. 7, 1547; studied at Marburg and Heidelberg, and was appointed, first director of the gymnasium, then pastor at Zürich, where he died March 11, 1626. He was a very prolific writer, mostly polemical. The principal of his works are De ori- gine et progressu rituum (1585), De templis (1587), De monachis (1588), Historia sacramentaria (1603), Concordia discors (1617), which was vehemently attacked by Hutter, Historia Jesuitica (1619). A collected edition of his works appeared at Geneva, 1681, 7 vols. folio, with life by J. H. Heidegger.

HOSPITALITY AMONG THE HEBREWS.

This virtue was practised and held in the highest esteem among Israel and throughout the East. When a stranger appeared, he was invited into the house or tent. As soon as he arrived, he was furnished with water to wash his feet, received a supply of needful food for himself and his beast, and enjoyed courtesy and protection from his host (Gen. xviii. 2 sq., xix. 1 sq., xxiv. 25, 31 sq.; Exod. ii. 20; Judg. xiii. 15, xix. 20 sq., 23). To leave a stranger outside in the street was a disgrace to the whole community (Judg. xix. 15), and to refuse him admittance was considered discreditable (Job xxxi. 32). The religious hatred existing between Jews and Samaritans destroyed the mutual relations of hospitality (Luke ix. 53; John iv. 9); and only in the greatest extremity would the Jew partake of Samaritan food, and if possible he avoided passing through Samaria on his journeys. On his departure, the traveller was not allowed to go alone or empty handed (Gen. xviii. 16). Where modern tourists have not spoiled the East, this custom of hospitality is still prevailing.

HOSPITALLERS, or HOSPITAL BRETHREN, is the common name of all those associations of laymen, monks, canons, and knights, which devoted themselves to nursing the sick and the poor in the hospitals, while at the same time observing certain monastic practices, generally according to the rule of Augustine. Most of those brotherhoods were connected with some regular monastic order, and stood under the authority of the bishop. When they were large, they had a general of their own; but even the smaller ones had their superior or major, and a steward to take care of the finances. Some of them, as, for instance, the Hospitaliers of St. Jean de Dieu in France, were exempted from episcopal authority, and stood immediately under the Pope. Only a few of them took the regular monastic vows.

The first of this kind of brotherhood was formed in Italy in the ninth century. During the crusades their number increased immensely, and they spread over all Europe. The religious orders of knights, as, for instance, the Knights of St. John and the Teutonic Knights, originated from the same movement. One of the oldest associations bearing the name of Hospitaliers was that of the Hospital Brethren of the Holy Spirit, founded in 1190 at Montpellier, by Count Guido, and confirmed in 1198 by Innocent III.: it had its mother-house in the Hospitale S. Spiritus in Saxia in Rome. Then followed the Hospitaliers of Burgos (1212), the Frères de la Charité de la bienheureuse Marie (founded at Boucheraumont in the diocese of Chalons 1280, and having its mother-house in the hospital Les Billets in Paris), the Brethren of Love, the Good Brethren, etc.

There were also hospital sisters; and the female associations originating in the twelfth century achieved a still greater success than the male ones. They united to the duty of nursing the sick and the poor, also that of educating young girls, especially orphans, and rescuing fallen women. The principal sisterhoods were those of St. Gervasius (1171), St. Catharine in Paris (1222), St. Martha of Pontarlier (1687), etc. See HELYOT: Histoire d. ord. mon., Paris, 1714-19, 8 vols. ZÖCKLER.

HOSPITALS. The idea of honoring and serving Christ in the person of the unfortunate and diseased has manifestly deeply impressed the Church. From the beginning, Christians have been proverbial for the care they have displayed for the weak. The deacons and deaconesses of the early Church visited the sick in their homes, but not they alone; and, even in times of persecution and of pestilence, all Christians joined in such pious duties. Care of the sick was unremitting. When the ban of the State was lifted from the Church, then buildings for the reception of the sick, the needy, and the stranger, began to be erected in all parts of the empire. And these came directly under the care of the bishops, who, of course, employed others to manage the details. Indeed, the Code of Justinian made their employment of superintendents obligatory. Basil the Great (330-379) seems to have built the most complete institution of the kind. In it there were accommodations even for lepers. The Emperor Julian was stirred up by the example of the Christians to provide on a generous scale for the sick. Later Placilla, the wife of Theodosius the Great, is mentioned by Theodoret (Hist. Eccl., v. 19) as devoting much time to hospital service, doing even menial duties. The first person to build a hospital in Rome was Fabiola, one of Jerome's converts, who, out of penitence for a constructive sin (a second marriage after divorce on the ground of her husband's adultery, which was contrary to church law), gave all her property to charitable uses. Jerome himself had previously built a hospital in Bethlehem. There is notice of hospitals in Gaul in the fifth century; in Germany in the eighth or ninth century. The Irish missionaries of the latter period built them in different parts of Northern Europe in connection with their monasteries: hence they were called "Hospitalia Sctorum;" i.e., Irish Hospitals.

It is a striking fact, mentioned by Martigny, that "hospitals were in ancient times commonly dedicated to the Holy Spirit, which was represented under the form of a dove, either on the façade, or on some other conspicuous part of the building." The principal hospital in Rome bears this designation, and has borne it from a very remote period.

HOSSBACH, Peter Wilhelm, b. at Wusterhausen, in the province of Prussia, Feb. 20, 1784; studied theology at Halle and Francfort-on-the-Oder, and was appointed pastor, first of Pläntz, near his native town, then at the military academy, and finally at the Church of Jerusalem, in Berlin, where he died April 7, 1846. Besides several collections of sermons (1822-48), he published Das Leben J. V. Andreäs (1819) and Spener und seine Zeit (1828), both of which hold a high rank among historical monographs.

HOTTENTOTS, Christian Missions among the, were begun by George Schmidt, a Moravian missionary, who arrived at Cape Town in 1737. Although he spoke through an interpreter, his success was great, and therefore the colonial government interfered. In 1744 he returned to Europe in order to have his grievances removed; but in this he was not only unsuccessful, but the Dutch East India Company, which governed the colony, did not even allow him to return. It was not until 1792 that the mission was resumed by three other Moravian missionaries, and, until 1795, carried on amid formidable opposition on the part of the colonists. Since 1806 the colony has been under British government; and the mission has not been disturbed, and is now in a flourishing condition. But the Moravians have not been alone upon the field. The London Missionary Society, in 1798, sent thither two missionaries,—Dr. Vanderkemp and Mr. Edmonds. The Wesleyan Missionary Society began operations in 1814; and other societies have since come in. The success of their work refutes the Portuguese notion that the Hottentots were a race of apes, incapable of Christianization. Low as they are in the scale of civilization, they are still soil for the gospel-seed, and bear precious increase. The gospel of Christ makes of the Hottentot a hero and a saint. For a full account of the language, history, and geographic and ethnographic relations of the Hottentots, see art. in Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xii. 309-313. For their religion, see T. HAIX: Tsuní (Goam, the Supreme Being of the Khoi-Khoi, London, 1882).

HOTTINGER is the name of a Swiss family which has produced several notable theologians.—Johann Heinrich Hottinger, b. in Zurich, March 10, 1620; d. there June 5, 1667; studied theology and Oriental languages in Geneva, Gröningen, and Leyden; was appointed professor of theology in his native city 1611; and wrote, among other works, Exercitationes Anti-Moriniane de Pentateucho Samaritano (1641), and Historia Eccles. Novi Test. (1651-67, 9 vols).—Johann Jacob Hottinger, son of the preceding; b. in Zurich, Dec. 1, 1652; d. there Dec. 18, 1735; studied in Basel and Geneva; was appointed professor of theology in his native city in 1698, and wrote Helvetische Kirchengesch. (1698-1729, 4 vols. quarto).—Johann Jacob Hottinger, a relative of the preceding; b. in Zurich, May 18, 1783; was professor of history there, and died there May 18, 1860. He continued Johann von Müller's work on the history of Switzerland, and gave a valuable representation of the introduction of the Reformation in Switzerland.

HOUBIGANT, Charles François, b. in Paris, 1686; d. there 1783; entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1701; served as teacher in various colleges, but retired in 1722 on account of complete deafness, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His principal works are Racines Hébraïques (1732), in mnemonic verses, and Biblica Hebraica, with a Latin translation and critical notes (1753, 4 vols.), published at the expense of the Oratory.

HOUSE AMONG THE HEBREWS. See ARCHITECTURE, HEBREW.

HOUSE-COMMUNION, or PRIVATE COMMUNION, particularly in the case of the sick, cannot claim apostolic precedent, but came in very early; for the deacons were accustomed to carry the consecrated elements immediately after service to the sick, to prisoners, and to strangers. Tertullian, in the third century, testifies to the practice of private communion on the part of well persons (Ad ux., 2, 5, de or., 19 [Eng. trans. in Ante-Nicene Library. Tert., vol. i. pp. 193, 298]). In Greek churches there was private communion under both kinds. In Tertullian's time it would seem the bread alone was used at home, and eaten in the family-circle at morning-prayer. Later on, we find consecrated bread carried upon journeys, and used as an amulet; so much so, that councils protested against the practice. On the development of the doctrine of transubstantiation, the cup was withdrawn from the laity, and the present form of communion for the sick introduced.

The Reformed and the Lutheran churches differ upon this point of private communion; the former repressing, and the latter freely allowing it. The Protestant pastor is oft-times confronted with practical difficulties when asked to dispense communion to the sick, and should therefore act cautiously, inquiring carefully into the condition of the sick person, so as to be assured that the service is intelligently and reverently participated in, and not superstitiously as a preservative against future woe.

ROBERT KÜBEL.

HOWARD, John, the eminent apostle of prison-reform; b. at Hackney, near London, Sept. 2, 1726; d. at Cherson, on the Black Sea, Jan. 20, 1790. He was apprenticed to a grocer; but falling heir at the age of nineteen, by his father's death, to an ample fortune, he turned his back on commercial pursuits, and started on a tour to the Continent. On his return he was married to a lady much older than himself, who, however, lived only a few years after the event. In 1756 he took passage to Lisbon; but the vessel was captured by a French privateer, and Howard cast into a dungeon at Brest. The accommodations were wretched, and the provisions scant and ill-served, the meat being thrown in amongst the prisoners for them to tear it to pieces as best they could. He was transferred to Morlaix, but, released on parole, returned to England. The same year (1756) he was made fellow of the Royal Society for some communications on meteorology. About this time he married again, and spent a quiet life at his seat in Cardington (where he instituted laudable measures for the improvement of the condition of his tenants) until his wife's death, in 1765. He was a member of the Baptist Church of Bedford. In 1769 he made an extensive tour through Italy and other countries of the Continent, and, returning, was elected sheriff of the county of Bedford in 1773.

A new period of Howard's life dates from this time. He now began a series of investigations into the condition of prisons, which extended over a number of years, led him to travel through every country in Europe, and to pursue with a perseverance and consecration rarely equalled in any department of life his inquiries in the prisons of almost every city of considerable size on the Continent or Great Britain. These unselfish labors brought him into the presence of crowned heads and parliaments, and have won for his name a place, with those of Wilberforce and Mrs. Fry, among the noblest philanthropists of his country. The office of sheriff was the occasion of his visiting the jails of Bedford County; and the state of his mind in regard to them is summed up in his own words: "I beheld scenes of calamity which I grew daily more and more anxious to alleviate." Not only were the accommodations miserable, but the prisoners exposed to the mercy of unsalaried jailers, who drew their support from the fees of their wards, and had power to detain them till these were paid. In November, 1773, he began visiting the jails of the adjoining counties in order to find a precedent for putting the jailers of Bedford upon salaries, — a measure which he strenuously urged upon the authorities. These investigations, which were gradually pushed further and further, till he had visited the most of the county jails in England and in Ireland and Scotland (1775), strengthened in his mind the conviction of the urgent call for remedial measures. The rooms were, in part, underground and damp, and, as a rule, gloomy and filthy; in one case the common sewer of the city running directly under one of the prisons, and uncovered. The bedding, if any, was usually confined to straw, and the rations unhealthy and insufficient. Jail-fever, and small-pox in its most virulent form, were common diseases. In 1774 he was called to testify before the committee of the House of Commons. That body passed a resolution "recognizing the humanity and zeal which had led him to visit the several jails in this kingdom," and the same year passed two bills for the better treatment of prisoners, and care of jails. In the spring of 1775 Howard visited Paris, where, after much perseverance, he succeeded in getting admission to the jails, which he describes as "beyond imagination horrid and dreadful." He also travelled through Switzerland, Germany, Belgium, and Holland, finding in the last two countries the prison accommodations in a comparatively good state. On his return to England he published a work on the State of the Prisons in England and Wales, with Preliminary Observations, etc. In the years which immediately followed, he extended his visits to Sweden, Russia, Hungary, and every other country in Europe, everywhere pursuing the one philanthropic passion of his life.

The last five years of Howard's life were spent in measures for the mitigation of the horrors of the plague. With this design he visited, in 1785, the lazarettos of various cities of Italy, went as far as Smyrna, and travelled unknown on vessels infected with the plague in order to be able the better to find out the character of the treatment of the disease, and the nature of the quarantine regulations. In 1789, on his last sojourn in England, he published an Account of the Principal Lazarettos in Europe, etc. These latter years were saddened by the wild course of an only son, who lost his reason; but once again he started on a journey to the Continent, reached Cherson on the Black Sea, caught the plague from a lady whom he tried to cure, and died. A monument to his memory was placed in St. Paul's Cathedral, containing a well-deserved eulogy. To his efforts are due the improved system of prison accommodation and that discipline which seeks to reform the criminal, not only in Great Britain, but, to some extent, throughout a large part of Europe. Of the animating principle of his career, Dr. Stoughton has said that "religious principle developed in simple and unostentatious, almost puritanical, forms, constituted the strength and inspiration of Howard's world-known character." Mr. Howard's Life has been written by AIKEN (London, 1792), BROWN (London, 1818), HERWORTH DIXON (London, 5th ed., 1854), TAYLOR (London, 1836), JOHN FIELD (London, 1850), STOUGHTON (London, 1853), and his Correspondence edited by FIELD (London, 1855).

HOWE, John, an eminent Puritan divine and author; b. May 17, 1630, at Loughborough, Leicestershire, where his father was minister; d. April 2, 1705, in London. The elder Howe was thrust out of his position by Laud for espousing the cause of the Puritans, and went to Ireland when the subject of this sketch was five years old. He afterwards returned to England, and settled in Lancaster. John Howe was educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and made fellow of Magdalen College in the latter university, of which Dr. Thomas Goodwin was at the time the president. About 1652 he became pastor at Great Torrington in Devonshire. In this place, according to his own statement, the order of his services on fast-days was as follows: Beginning at nine in the morning, he made an invocation a quarter of an hour in length, spent three-quarters of an hour in expounding a chapter, prayed for an hour, preached for an hour, then prayed again for half an hour. Here followed a recess, in which Mr. Howe took some refreshment. Returning in a quarter of an hour (the people singing all the while), the services were resumed with a prayer of an hour, continued with a sermon of another hour, and concluded at four in the afternoon with a final prayer "of about a half an hour or more." Mr. Howe was a successful pastor; but his biographer, Edmund Calamy, without doubt has the sympathy of the present age when he closes this description by exclaiming, "A sort of service that few could have gone through without inexpressible weariness, both to themselves and their auditories."

In 1654 Howe went on a visit to London, and was an auditor in the chapel at Whitehall, when he was espied, and recognized from his garb, by Cromwell, to be a country minister. Attracted by his fine appearance, the Protector despatched a messenger after him at the conclusion of the services, and pressed him so hard to remain over the following Sabbath and preach before him, that in vain he pleaded one excuse after another. The result was that Howe, much against his private preferences, became one of Cromwell's chaplains. Elevated to this position, he showed a tolerant spirit, and helped more than one of the Episcopalian clergymen, as, notably, Thomas Fuller and Dr. Ward, afterwards Bishop of Exeter. Upon Richard's deposition, he returned to his former parish at Torrington. When the Act of Uniformity was passed, he quitted his church, but continued for some time in the neighborhood, preaching in private houses. In this period he was called to Exeter to see the bishop, who proposed to him to be re-ordained. Howe answered, "The thought is shocking, my lord: it hurts my understanding. It is an absurdity, for nothing can have two beginnings. I am sure I am a minister of Christ, and I can't begin again to be a minister." In common with Dr. Bates and others, he accepted the Five-Mile Act, which was passed in 1665, with the limiting clause, "so far as the laws of man are agreeable to the Word of God." In 1671, having preached privately at houses in the mean while, he accepted an invitation to Antrim, Ireland, as chaplain to Lord Massarene. In 1675 he accepted a call to London, and was allowed to preach by the king's indulgence. He was several times approached by persons high in position, in the hope that he might be led to conform. In 1685, on account of the greater severity shown to the dissenters, he accepted an invitation to accompany Lord Wharton to the Continent, and the year following settled at Utrecht. When James II. issued his declaration for liberty of conscience (in 1687), Howe returned to his old position in London. From this time till his death he took an active interest in the theological discussions of the day (as that on the Trinity), and preserved the respect of all parties.

Mr. Howe is described as tall in person, graceful in manner, and of a piercing but pleasant eye. He was a ready offhand preacher, and never used notes. He was conciliatory in disposition, catholic in spirit, anxious to promote Christian unity, and more than once put his opponents in controversy to the blush by his moderation and fairness.

Howe's works, in spite of being somewhat prolix and tedious, are among the most suggestive and profound of the Puritan writings. "I have learned more from John Howe than from any author I ever read," said Robert Hall. "There is an astonishing magnificence about his conceptions" (edition of his works, Lond., 1853, vi. 120). His principal works are the treatise, Delighting in God, 1671; The Living Temple, 1st part, 1676, 2d part, 1702, in which he discusses the questions naturally suggested by the idea that man is the temple of God; The Redeemer's Tears over Lost Souls, 1681. His Complete Works were first issued (with a Life by EDMUND CALAMY) Lond., 1721, 2 vols., then by HUNT, Lond., 1810-22, 7 vols. The most accessible edition (containing the Life by Calamy). N.Y., 1869, 2 vols. See also ROGERS: Life of John Howe, Lond., 1836.

HOWIE, John, a Scotch Presbyterian layman; b. at Lochgoin, Nov. 14, 1735; d. there September, 1791. He wrote that famous book, The Scots Worthies, or, as the full title reads, Bibliotheca Scotica; or a brief historical account of the most eminent Scots worthies, etc., 1503-1688, Glasgow, 1771 and often; new ed., revised, corrected, and enlarged, with a preface and notes by William McGavin, Edinburgh and New York, 1853. The book is still in print, and read.

HOYLE, Joshua, D.D., b. at Sorby, near Halifax, Yorkshire, Eng.; d. Dec. 6, 1654. He was educated in Magdalen Hall, Oxford, but became fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, and took his degrees of divinity, and became professor of divinity, in that university. He devoted himself to biblical studies and the Roman-Catholic controversy, and was a friend and warm admirer of Archbishop Fessher. He fled from the Irish massacre and returned to England, and became vicar of Stepney near London. In 1643 he was appointed a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines. He labored on the committee on the Confession of Faith. In 1648 he was appointed master of University College, Oxford, and Kings Professor of Divinity in the university. His two published works are, A rejoinder to Mr. Malone, Jesuit, his reply concerning Real Presence (4to, pp. 662, Dublin, 1641), and Jehoiadah's justice against Mattan, Baal's Priest, a sermon (London, 1645).

HRABANUS. See RABANUS.

HROSWITHA, a nun of the convent of Gandersheim in the duchy of Saxony; wrote, in the latter part of the tenth century, a series of legends in leonine verses (Maria, Ascensio Domini, Passio S. Gongolphi, etc.), an epic (Gesta Oddonis), and six religious comedies (Gallicanus, Duleitius, Callimachus, Abraham, Pajnutius, and Sapientia), to counteract the influence of Terence on the students of the cloister-schools. Her works were edited by K. Barach, Nuremberg, 1858. See KOEPKE: Hrotsvit von Gandersheim, Berlin, 1869.

HUBER, Johannes Nepomuk, b. in Munich, Aug. 18, 1830; d. there, March 20, 1879. He was extraordinary professor of philosophy (1859), and then ordinary professor (1864), in the university of Munich, one of the most fearless opponents of Ultramontanism, and later a leader in the Old Catholic movement. His principal writings are Philosophie der Kirchenväter (München, 1859, put on the Index in 1860), Johann Scotus Erigena (1859), Das Papstthum u. d. Staat (1870), Geschichte des Jesuitenordens (1873). He also took part in the composition of Janus (1869), and wrote Quirinus (1870). See his Life by ZIRNGEBL, München, 1881.

HUBER, Samuel, b. at Burgdorf, near Berne, 1517; d. at Osterwiek, in Hanover, March 23, 1621; studied theology, and was appointed pastor of his native parish. He inclined very strongly toward Lutheranism; and, being of a very combative temperament, he caught at every opportunity of attacking Beza, Musculus, and the other leaders of the Reformed Church, especially on the question of predestination. The result was, that he was deposed from his office, and banished from the country, June 28, 1588. At Tübingen, whither he repaired, he openly embraced Lutheranism; and in 1592 he was made professor of theology at Wittenberg. But there, too, he fell out with his colleagues. He would make no distinction between dilectio and electio, but taught a universalism which scandalized the Lutherans. Jan. 18, 1595, he was once more deposed, and banished from the country. The rest of his life he spent wandering from place to place, in very depressed circumstances. A complete list of his works, among which his Anti-Bellarminus (1607) occupies the principal place, is found in J. A. SCHMID: Dissert. de S. H., Helmstädt, 1708. See also Acta Huberiana, Tübingen, 1597, and Acta Huberiana, ed. Goetze, Lübeck, 1707.

HUBERINUS, Caspar, b. at Wilspach, Bavaria, Dec. 21, 1500; d. at Oehringen, Oct. 6, 1533; was a monk, when in 1525 he began to preach the Reformation in Augsburg, and became evangelical pastor there in 1528, and in 1544 superintendent at Oehringen. He published several collections of sermons.

HUBERT, St., son of Bertrand, Duke of Guienne, and a passionate hunter; was converted by meeting a stag which bore a cross between his antlers, and became bishop of Liège in 708. He died in 727; and his remains were afterwards deposited in the monastery of Audoin, which bears his name. See GRANGES: Vie de saint Hubert, Moulins, 1873.

HÜBMAIER, or, as he used to write the name himself, HÜBMÖR, Balthasar, b. at Friedberg, near Augsburg, 1480; d. in Vienna (burnt at the stake) March 10, 1528; studied theology and philosophy at Freiburg under Eck, and was appointed professor of theology at Ingolstadt in 1512, and preacher at the cathedral of Ratisbon in 1519. From the latter position he was removed in 1522, suspected of favoring the Reformation; and, as soon as he had become settled as preacher of Waldshut, he entered into communication with Zwingli, and openly embraced the reformed faith. At the same time he made the acquaintance of Th. Münzer; and when, in 1525, he published his Von dem christlichen Tauf der Gläubigen, it became apparent that he had adopted the Anabaptist views. Expelled from Waldshut by the Austrians, he fled to Zürich, but was imprisoned there, and compelled to recant April 6, 1526. He afterwards retracted the recantation, and settled in Moravia, where he found many adherents, and developed a great activity, preaching and writing; but when, after the death of King Lewis of Hungary, Moravia fell to Ferdinand of Austria, Hübmaier was dragged to Vienna, and executed. Calvary, in his Mit. aus dem Antiquariate (vol. i., Berlin, 1870), gives a picture of the man and a complete list of his works. CUNITZ.

HUC, Evariste Régis, b. at Toulouse, Aug. 1, 1813; d. in Paris, March 31, 1860; entered the Congregation of St. Lazarus, and went in 1839 to China as a missionary. In 1849 he returned, and published Voyage dans la Tartarie, le Thibet et la Chine (Paris, 1850; translated into English, London, 1851, New York, 1853), L'Empire Chinois (Paris, 1854; translated into English, New York, 1855), and Le Christianisme en Chine, en Tartarie, et au Thibet (Paris, 1857).

HUCARIUS. See CANON LAW.

HUCBALD, b. in the middle of the ninth century; d. 930; was director first of the cloister-school of St. Amand in Flanders, then of the cathedral-school of Rheims. He wrote two treatises on music, which occupy a prominent place in the history of music, some biographies of saints, which are of historical value, and a poem. See G. NISARD: Hucbald, Paris, 1867.

HUET, François, b. at Villeau, in the department of Eure-et-Loir, Dec. 26, 1814; d. in Paris, July 1, 1869; was for several years professor of philosophy at Ghent, but lost that position by the persecutions of the Ultramontanists; became tutor to Prince Milan of Servia, and published Recherches sur la vie et les ouvrages d'Henri de Gaul, 1838; Le Cartésianisme, 1813, 2 vols.; Le règne social du Christianisme, 1853; Essais de réforme catholique, 1856, in connection with Bordas-Demoulin; La Révolution religieuse au 19me siècle, 1866.

HUET, Pierre Daniel, b. at Caen, Feb. 8, 1630; d. in Paris, Jan. 26, 1721; was one of the teachers of the young dauphin, and was in 1689 made bishop of Avranches, but resigned in 1699, and devoted himself for the rest of his life exclusively to literature. He published a celebrated edition of Origen, 2 vols. folio, 1668. Of his original works, the principal are Demonstratio evangelica, 1679; Censura philosophiæ cartesianæ, 1689; Quæstiones Aluctanæ, 1690; etc. See BARTHOLMESS: Huet, ou le scepticisme théologique, 1850.

HUG, Johann Leonard, Roman-Catholic biblical scholar; b. at Constanz, June 1, 1765; d. at Freiburg, South Germany, March 11, 1846. After a brilliant career in the university of Freiburg, he became (1787) superintendent of the studies in the seminary for the training of priests in connection with the university, and in 1791 professor of the Oriental languages of the Old Testament, and (1792) of the New Testament. The remainder of his life was laboriously spent in the service of his beloved university; although his great reputation induced calls to Breslau, Cologne, Tübingen, and Bonn (three times). It was Hug's great service to oppose the Semler school of New Testament, particularly of gospel, interpretation. Hug held firmly to the historicity of the New-Testament writings, and on this basis vigorously defended them. He is chiefly remembered by his Einleitung in die Schriften des neuen Testaments, Stuttgart n. Tübingen, 1808, 2 vols., later editions, 1821, 1826, 1847, French (partial) translation by J. E. Cellierier, Geneva, 1823, English translation by Wait, London, 1827, and by Fosdick, with notes by Moses Stuart, Andover, 1836. In this work he advocates the theory, that up to the middle of the third century the New-Testament text existed only in a common edition (κοινὴ ἐκδοσις), which was subsequently revised by Hesychius, Lucian of Antioch, and by Origen. (See the discussion of this theory by Tregelles, in Horne's Introduction, 14th ed., vol. iv. pp. 78-87, and by Scrivener, Introduction, 2d ed., pp. 458-460.) Among other noteworthy writings by Hug is his new interpretation of the Canticles, given in Das hohe Lied in einer noch unversuchten Deutung (Freiburg, 1813) and Schutzschrift für seine Deutung des hohen Liedes und derselben weitere Erläuterung (Freiburg, 1818). According to him, the bride is of the kingdom of the ten tribes; the bridegroom is King Hezekiah; the brothers of Shulamith are a party in the house of Judah; the whole is "a representation, clothed in idyllic form, of the longing felt by the kingdom of the ten tribes for re-union with Judah, but which those 'brothers' opposed." (See Zöckler, in Lange's Commentary, American edition, Introduction to the Song of Solomon, p. 32.) For a full account of Hug, see AD. MAIER: Gedächtnissrede auf Hug, Freiburg, 1847.

HUGHES, John, first archbishop of New York; b. at Annalaghan, Ireland, June 24, 1797; d. in New-York City, Jan. 3, 1864. He emigrated in 1817; entered the Mount St. Mary's Catholic College at Emmitsburg, Frederick County, Md., 1820; ordained priest 1826, and settled in Philadelphia, where he remained until 1837, when he was appointed co-adjutor bishop of New York, and consecrated Jan. 7, 1838. In 1842, on the death of Bishop Dubois, he became titular bishop; in 1850 the see of New York was raised to metropolitan rank, and he went to Rome to receive the pallium at the hands of the Pope. In 1847 he delivered before both houses of Congress, and at their request, a discourse upon Christianity, the only source of moral, social, and political regeneration. On Aug. 5, 1855, he laid the corner-stone of the cathedral on Fifth Avenue, which was dedicated May 25, 1879. In November, 1861, in company with Mr. Thurlow Weed, he made a semi-official journey to Europe, at the request of Secretary Seward, in order to secure the friendly neutrality of European nations, especially of France. In July, 1863, he addressed, as he supposed, the rioters, from the balcony of his house, Madison Avenue, corner 36th Street; but the great crowd which had collected, although Roman Catholic and Irish, was probably not riotous. Bishop Hughes played a more prominent part in America than any other Roman Catholic of his day, and enjoyed a great deal of general respect and popularity. He was, however, a determined Romanist, bent upon securing the destruction of the public schools and the support by the public money of Roman-Catholic schools. He was ever ready to defend himself and his church. He had memorable encounters with Dr. John Breckinridge in 1833 and 1835 (subsequently published, Philadelphia, 1833 and 1836), before the Common Council of New-York City (1839), in 1847-48 with Dr. Nicolas Murray (Kirwan), whose letters were published and widely circulated in several languages, and with Erastus Brooks, editor of the New York Express, 1855. One of his acts as bishop was to remove the lay trustees of church property, and to secure the titles in his own name. In this way he stopped litigation, which had brought Romanists into disrepute. He established (1841) St. John's College at Fordham, Westchester County, N.Y. See his Works, edited by L. Kehoe, New York, 1864-65, and his Life by J. K. G. Hassard, New York, 1866.

HUGHES, Joseph, D.D., a Baptist minister, b. in London, Jan. 1, 1769; d. there Oct. 12, 1833. He proceeded M.A. at Aberdeen, 1790; he participated in the formation of the Religious Tract Society (1799), and of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1804); was the first secretary to each of these organizations, and faithfully and ably discharged his duties. See his Memoir, by LEITCHFIELD, London, 1834, and BIBLE SOCIETIES, p. 260.

HUGO OF AMIENS, b. at Amiens, towards the close of the eleventh century; d. at Rouen, Nov. 11, 1164; entered the monastery of Cluny in 1113; was elected Archbishop of Rouen in 1129; took a prominent part in political and ecclesiastical life, and wrote Dialogi Theologici (printed in MARTENE, Thesaurus, vol. ii.), and Contra Hæreticos, printed as an appendix to the works of Guibert de Nogent, in the edition of D'Achery.

HUGO OF LINCOLN, b. about 1135, at Avalon, Burgundy; d. in London, Nov. 19, 1200; entered the monastery of the Grande Chartreuse; was afterwards invited to England by Henry II. to establish the first Carthusian monastery in England, at Witham, and was made Archbishop of Lincoln in 1186. He was canonized about twenty years after his death. See PRYER: Life of St. Hugh of Avalon, 1879.

HUGO OF ST. CHER (De Sancto Caro), also called Hugo de St. Theodorico, was b. at St. Cher, a suburb of Vienne in Dauphiné; studied theology and canon law in Paris; entered the Dominican order in 1224; was made a cardinal by Innocent IV. in 1245; and d. at Orvieto in 1263. He was a learned man, took an active part in the controversy between William of St. Amour and the mendicant orders, and was a member of the committee formed to examine the Introductorius in Evangelium æternum by Gerhard. His own works, however, are those of a collector rather than those of an author. His Postilla in universa Biblia gives short explanations—literal, allegorical, mystical, and moral—of the single words, and contains many curious things. But his Sacrorum Bibliorum Concordantie, also called Concordantia S. Jacobi (because he was aided by monks from the Dominican monastery of St. Jacob), or Concordantie Anglicanæ (because the quotations were afterwards written out by English monks residing in Paris), became the model for all following works of the kind. Many works bearing his name are still extant in manuscript; but it is doubtful whether they belong to him. See QUÉTIF ET ECHARD: Scriptores ordinis prædicatorum, I, 194 sq. C. SCHMIDT.

HUGO OF ST. VICTOR, with his contemporaries Abelard and Bernard, one of the most influential theologians of the twelfth century; was b. about 1097; d. Feb. 11, 1141. He gave himself up to a contemplative conventual life, and shone in consequence of piety and speculative thought, rather than of active participation in the ecclesiastical affairs of his day. He must be regarded as the real founder of the mediæval mysticism of France, for Bernard of Clairvaux is dependent upon him for the essential features of his mystical speculations. The same may be affirmed of Peter Lombard. After-generations gave him the title of Didascalus ("teacher"), or Alter Augustinus ("the second Augustine"). Two localities claim the honor of being Hugo's birthplace,—the vicinage of Ypres in Flanders, and Saxony. The Benedictines, in vol. xii. of the Hist. litt. de la France, bring forward three testimonies from old authors in favor of the former. But there are weightier testimonies for Saxony. His tombstone declared Hugo to be of Saxon birth (origine Saxo). This view easily explains his attendance upon the cloistral school of Hamersleben in 1115. To these must be added the testimonies of early Saxon writers who speak of Hugo as belonging to the families of Von Blankenburg and Regenstein in the Hartz Mountains. After passing through the school at Hamersleben, he went with his uncle, archdeacon Hugo of Halberstadt, to France, and entered the famous cloistral institution of St. Victor, near Paris. Fifteen years afterward he was made preceptor of the school,—a position which he continued to fill for eight years. Among his scholars were the afterwards celebrated Adam and Richard of St. Victor. Hugo stood in intimate relations with Bernard, but took no prominent part in the public affairs of Church and State. He was of delicate and sickly constitution.

Hugo's writings are quite numerous. Those of a more mystical tendency belong to his earlier period. Among these are the three tracts,—De Arca Morali, De Arca Mystica, and De Familitate Mundi,—in which he compares Noah's ark with the church, the soul in this world with the soul at peace with God, etc. His exegetical works are confined to no single period of his life. They have only a homiletical interest, and are the least original of his writings. They include a short Introduction to the Scriptures, Commentaries on the Pentateuch, and the other historical books of the Old Testament, on the Psalms and Lamentations, and nineteen Homilies on Ecclesiastes. The other commentaries ascribed to him (Luke, John, etc.) are of very doubtful authenticity. To the last period of Hugo's life belong his three most valuable works. The Eruditio Didascalica is encyclopedic, and treats in three books of the natural sciences, and in an equal number gives a sort of introduction to church history and the Scriptures. Leaning upon the authority of Jerome, he distinguishes in this second section sharply between the canon and the Apocrypha, but nevertheless seems to give to the writings of the church fathers an equal authority with the canonical books.

The other two works of the last period (the Summa Sententiarum and the De Sacramentis Christ. Fidei) give the outline of Hugo's theological views. In the latter he defines his relation to Abelard, to whom, and Anselm, he is under obligations for some of his speculations. The works of God he treats under Works of Creation, and Works of Restoration. He discusses the Trinity and the three fundamental divine attributes,—power, wisdom, and love. In the treatment of the origin of evil, he is far from the superfluous subtleties of the scholastics of a later period. Original sin he agrees, with Melancthon, to consist in ignorance and concupiscence. He mentions five sacraments,—baptism, the Eucharist, confirmation, extreme unction, and marriage. They confer grace. In the three sections on eschatology he commends prayers to the saints.

HUGUENOTS, a designation given to the Reformed, or Calvinists, of France. The origin of the word is involved in great obscurity. The French Protestants received at different times a variety of names, applied, for the most part, in derision; such as Lutherans, Sacramentarians, Christandins, Parpailots, "those of the pretended reformed religion," or simply "those of the religion," "religionnaires," etc. It was not until the time of the Tumult of Amboise, 1560, that the term "Huguenot" came into general use. Among the many explanations of the word that have been offered, only three need be mentioned. It has been derived from the German Eidgenossen ("confederates"),—a designation borne by the patriotic party in Geneva a quarter of a century earlier. This view was naturally a favorite one with those writers who represented the Huguenots as secret conspirators against the crown. Against it may be urged the difficulty of accounting for the transfer of the name from Geneva to the Valley of the Loire, the length of time that elapsed before the alleged re-appearance of the word, and the preference given by Beza, in the history written by him or under his supervision, in Geneva, for another derivation. Less plausible is the explanation offered by some of the Reformed themselves, who maintained that they were called Huguenots because they loyally advocated the cause of the descendants of Hugh (Hugues) Capet, as against the pretensions of the Guises, who claimed descent from Charlemagne. A sufficient answer to this is that the word "Huguenot" was unquestionably, in its origin, a term of reproach, the application of which was resented as a gross insult, and that the king was petitioned to forbid its use. A third explanation is given by Etienne Pasquier, in one of whose letters the word first occurs, and who may be regarded as our best authority. It arose, he says, in Tours, from a popular superstition that a hobgoblin, known as le roy Hugon, or Huguon, nightly roamed the streets of the city; whence the Protestants, who, from fear of persecution, dared not to meet save under cover of the darkness, came to be called Huguenots. It is an additional point in favor of this interpretation, that Pasquier affirms that he heard the Protestants called Huguenots, by certain friends of his living at Tours, eight or nine years before the Tumult of Amboise.

The history of the Huguenots in the kingdom of France may be considered under five periods, the period of persecution under the forms of law until the first recognition of the Reformed religion in the edict of January (1562); the civil wars under Charles IX., culminating in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (1572); the struggle to secure full toleration in the reigns of Henry III. and Henry IV., down to the proclamation of the Edict of Nantes (1598); the period that closes with the disastrous revocation of that edict by Louis XIV. (1685); and the period of the entire proscription of Protestantism, ending with the publication of the Edict of Toleration by Louis XVI. (1787), just before the first French Revolution.

I. THE PERIOD OF PERSECUTION UNDER THE FORMS OF LAW (1512-62). — The Reformation in France may be regarded as dating from 1512, when a professor in the University of Paris, the learned Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples, in a Latin commentary upon the Epistles of St. Paul, clearly enunciated the doctrine of justification by faith. In 1516 William Briçonnet, a patron of letters and an advocate of a moderate reformation, was appointed Bishop of Meaux. He soon gathered about him a group of scholars, including Lefèvre and his pupil William Farel, Martial Mazurier, Gérard Roussel, and others, by whom the gospel was preached with much fervor in the churches of his diocese. In 1523 Lefèvre published a French translation of the New Testament, and in 1528 a translation of the Old Testament. This version, made from the Latin Vulgate, served as a basis of the subsequent version of Olivetanus, the first French translation from the original Greek and Hebrew. The resolution of Bishop Briçonnet having given way before threats of persecution, the open reformatory movement of Meaux was brought to an end by the dispersion of the teachers whom he had invited, although the seeds of truth they had scattered lost none of their vitality.

At first, under the influence of his sister, the cultivated Margaret, Duchess of Angoulême, Francis I. showed a disposition to favor the Reformation. This arose, however, rather from a taste for learning, and ambition to earn distinction as a patron of the revival of letters, than from any hearty sympathy with the doctrinal views of the reformers. Moreover, the immense ecclesiastical patronage which he secured by means of the concordat entered into with Leo X., made it important to his material interests that he should remain on good terms with the Papacy. The active participation of Francis I. in the persecution of the Protestants dates from the "affair of the placards" (1534), when a violent handbill against the papal mass was found posted upon the door of the king's bed-chamber in the Castle of Amboise. In connection with the great expiatory procession, soon after instituted (January, 1535), six Protestants were burned alive before the king's eyes, and Francis declared his purpose to extirpate heresy from his dominions. He would, he said, cut off his own arm were it infected with this poison.

The executions that followed for some months were the first serious attempt at persecution; although some distinguished victims, such as the learned and noble Louis de Berquin, had suffered earlier. Legislation became more systematically severe. In 1545 took place the Massacre of Mérindol and Cabrières. Twenty-two towns and villages on the River Durance, inhabited by French Waldenses of the same stock with the Waldenses of Piedmont, were destroyed by an armed expedition fitted out at Aix with the sanction of the Parliament of Provence. The next year witnessed the martyrdom of the "Fourteen of Meaux."

During the reign of Henry II., the bigoted and licentious son of Francis (1547-59), Protestantism grew steadily, despite the most earnest attempts to destroy it. The centre of the reformatory movement was Geneva, whence John Calvin exerted, by means of his books and his immense correspondence, as well as indirectly through his former pupils, an influence that was almost incredible. Stringent laws against the importation of any books from Geneva accomplished nothing. In 1555 an attempt to introduce the Spanish Inquisition failed in consequence of the enlightened and determined resistance of the Parliament of Paris, with President Séguier at its head. In the same year an expedition, under the patronage of Admiral Coligny, set sail for Brazil, where it was hoped that a home for the persecuted might be found; but the scheme failed through the treachery of Villegagnon.

The Protestants increased greatly in numbers during the last years of Henry's life. Of this fact a proof was given in the public psalm-singing by great crowds in Paris itself. One of the chief motives of the king in concluding a disgraceful peace with Spain was avowedly that Henry might have leisure to devote himself to the extermination of the Protestants. Six weeks before the fatal tournament in which the monarch lost his life, the first national synod of the French Reformed churches met secretly in Paris (May 26, 1559). It adopted a confession of faith which was thereafter the standard of the Protestant French-speaking communities. It also established, in its "ecclesiastical discipline," a representative form of church government, with its courts, consistory, provincial colloquy or synod, and national synod. During the succeeding hundred years twenty-eight more national synods were held. After 1659, the government refused to permit any further national synods to be convened.

The brief reign of Francis II., a youth of only sixteen years of age (1559-60), was eventful. The execution of Anne du Bourg, a counsellor of Parliament, distinguished for ability and for singular purity of character, contributed more to advance Protestantism in France, and to exasperate liberal-minded men with the prevailing tyranny, than any previous acts of cruelty. Through the pusillanimity of Antoine of Bourbon, King of Navarre, the first prince of the blood, the entire control of affairs had been suffered to fall into the hands of the two uncles of the young Queen of France, Mary of Scots, — Charles, Cardinal of Lorraine; and Francis, Duke of Guise. The Protestants had borne persecution with exemplary patience, so long as it was inflicted by their legitimate sovereign. They were less inclined to submit to the usurped power of the Guises, who abused the authority of a king as immature in mind as he was feeble in body. Their impatience was shared by a large number of patriotic Frenchmen, not Protestants, who refused to bear the rule of a family regarded by them as foreign. The Tumult of Amboise (1560) was the result of an attempt to seize the obnoxious ministers, and to give the king more constitutional advisers. The Prince of Condé, youngest brother of the King of Navarre, was the secret head of the movement, which, though unsuccessful, led the Guises, in the terror of the moment, to consent (March, 1560) to an edict of amnesty for the past, with no provision for the toleration of Protestantism in future. At the assembly of notables at Fontainebleau (August, 1560), Admiral Coligny presented, in behalf of the Huguenots, petitions for liberty of worship; and two prelates, Archbishop Marillac and Bishop Monthieu, openly advocated the assembling of a national council to heal the malady of the church.

The opportune death of Francis II. (December, 1560) not only saved the life of the Prince of Condé, whom the Guises had succeeded in enticing to Orleans, and who had been tried by a commission, and sentenced to be beheaded, but frustrated a larger plot for the extermination of the Huguenots. Under Charles IX., a boy of ten, the tolerant policy of Chancellor L'Hôpital for a time prevailed. The Colloquy of Poissy was held (September, 1561), at which the Huguenots for the first time enjoyed the opportunity of vindicating their religious views in the presence of the king. Theodore Beza and Peter Martyr were the chief speakers on the Protestant side, and the Cardinal of Lorraine was the most prominent advocate of the Roman Catholics. On the 17th of January, 1562, the famous edict known as the "Edict of January" was published. It embodied the first formal recognition of the Protestant religion, to whose adherents it conceded the liberty to meet for worship, without arms, in all places outside of the walled towns.

The Edict of January was the Magna Charta of Huguenot rights. Its violation was the fruitful source of a long period of civil commotion: for a whole generation the exertions of the Huguenots were directed almost solely to the maintenance or recovery of its provisions.

II. THE CIVIL WARS UNDER CHARLES IX., AND THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY (1562-74). — Scarcely had the edict been signed, when the unprovoked Massacre of Vassy, perpetrated by the Duke of Guise upon an assembly of Protestant worshippers, gave the signal for the first civil war (1562-63). Admiral Coligny and the Prince of Condé were the Huguenot leaders: Constable Montmorency, the Duke of Guise, and Marshal Saint André were the principal Roman-Catholic generals. The war raged over a great part of France, with various successes on both sides. Both Montmorency and Condé were taken prisoners; and St. André was killed at the battle of Dreux, where the Huguenots met with defeat. The murder of Duke Francis of Guise, by a fanatic named Poltrot, was closely followed by the conclusion of the Peace of Amboise. Instead of unrestricted worship outside of town-walls throughout France, the Huguenots were now allowed to meet in the suburbs of a single town in every bailiwick, and in certain cities that remained in their possession at the conclusion of the peace. A few noblemen had the right to have service in their own castles.

In 1565 the Conference of Bayonne was held between Catharine de' Medici, and the king her son, on the one side, and the Duke of Alva on the other. At this meeting it has been generally, but erroneously, supposed that the plan of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day, executed seven years later, was traced or even agreed upon. A second civil war (1567-68) soon broke out, but it was of short duration. The third civil war (1568-70) was a more sanguinary struggle. The Huguenots were defeated in the two pitched battles of Jarnac and Moncontour, in the former of which, Louis, Prince of Condé, was killed. But the admirable generalship of Coligny not only saved the Huguenots from destruction, but enabled them to secure favorable terms of peace.

Two years of quiet followed, and there seemed to be a fair prospect that the wounds inflicted by the internecine contest might soon heal. Henry, King of Navarre, was married to Margaret of Valois, youngest sister of Charles IX. In the midst of the festivities attending the occasion, Coligny was wounded by an assassin. This event was followed within forty-eight hours by the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day (Sunday, Aug. 24, 1572). By this blow the attempt was made to annihilate the Huguenots, whom their enemies had been unable to destroy in honorable combat. Coligny and many of the most distinguished leaders, together with multitudes of their brethren in the faith, were mercilessly butchered. The number of victims in Paris and throughout the rest of the kingdom has been estimated variously at from twenty thousand to one hundred thousand. (See BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY, MASSACRE OF ST.)

defended La Rochelle with success against the king, but obtained honorable terms of peace.

III. THE STRUGGLE TO SECURE FULL TOLERATION, IN THE REIGNS OF HENRY III. AND HENRY IV., TO THE EDICT OF NANTES (1574-98). — A fifth civil war, begun a few weeks before the accession of Henry III., lasted until the new king became convinced that it was a hopeless undertaking to reduce his Protestant subjects, re-enforced as they were by a strong German auxiliary army. The peace now conceded, commonly known as "La Paix de Monsieur" (Edict of Beaulieu, May, 1576), was ostensibly more advantageous than any previously granted to the Huguenots; since it authorized the celebration of their worship everywhere in France outside of Paris, without exception as to time or place, unless the nobleman upon whose lands it was proposed to hold it should object.

The very liberality of the new pacification led to its speedy overthrow. At the instigation of the Roman-Catholic clergy and of the Guises, the Holy and Christian League sprang up in various parts of France, having for its avowed object the extirpation of heresy. At the meeting of the States-General at Blois, the king was induced to proclaim himself head of the league. Hence arose the sixth civil war, which lasted only a few months, since the king found the states unwilling to supply him the means of carrying on hostilities. The new peace (Edict of Poitiers, September, 1577) re-introduced discriminations as to the cities wherein Protestant worship might be held, and the noblemen entitled to have services in their castles. As in the previous peace, eight cities were placed in Protestant hands as pledges of its faithful execution, and mixed courts were instituted to adjudicate cases in which the parties belonged to different religions.

For eight years, with the exception of a few months covered by the unimportant seventh civil war, otherwise known as "La Guerre des Amoureux" (1580), the peace was unbroken; although there was no lack of surprises of cities and other infractions of the treaty.

In 1584 the king's only brother died. As Henry III. was childless, Henry of Bourbon, the Huguenot King of Navarre, became heir to the throne of France. The prospect that a "heretic" might succeed gave new life to the league. The Guises, with the support of Philip II., made war upon Henry III., and after a struggle, in which the Huguenots took no part, compelled the reluctant monarch to proscribe the Protestant religion by the Edict of Nemours (July, 1585).

The eighth civil war followed (1585-89). The most noted action was the battle of Coutras (1587), in which the Roman Catholics, under the Duke of Joyeuse, were defeated by the Huguenot troops of Henry of Navarre; the duke himself being killed in the engagement. This was the first pitched battle ever won by the Huguenots; and it made so deep an impression upon their enemies, that the very sight of the Protestant soldiers kneeling before joining battle, as they had done at Coutras, struck terror into the hearts of the Roman-Catholic soldiers in subsequent engagements. The murder of Henry, Duke of Guise, and of his brother, the Cardinal of Guise, at the second States of Blois (December, 1588), was followed, a few months subsequently, by a truce between Henry III. and Henry of Navarre. The assassination of Henry III. (August, 1589) brought Henry of Navarre, a Protestant prince, to the throne of France, under the title of Henry IV.

In the wars in which this king was engaged for years against the League, backed by the money and troops of Philip II., he enjoyed the hearty support of the Huguenots. After his insincere abjuration in 1593 (see HENRY IV.), their position was in some respects less favorable than it had been under the Valois kings; since they had lost their nominal leader and the "protector" of their churches. After a long and vexatious delay, the king fulfilled his promise, and undertook to determine the civil status of the Protestants by a law which was declared to be "perpetual and irrevocable." The Edict of Nantes (April, 1598) secured freedom of conscience throughout the kingdom, and recognized the right of the Protestants to meet for worship on the lands of noblemen entitled to exercise haute justice (there were about thirty-five hundred such), and in the places where Protestant worship had been conceded by the edict of 1577 and subsequent interpretative declarations. These and other concessions respecting the admission of the Reformed to civil offices, and to universities and schools, on equal terms with the Roman Catholics, the establishment of mixed courts, etc., made the edict the most important bulwark of Protestant rights.

IV. THE PERIOD FROM THE PUBLICATION TO THE REVOCATION OF THE EDICT OF NANTES (1598-1685). — The edict of Henry IV. was, after his assassination (1610), solemnly confirmed by the successive declarations of the regent, Marie de' Medici, of Louis XIII. and Louis XIV. None the less had the Huguenots soon reason to complain of infractions of a vexatious character, for which no satisfaction could be obtained. The ruin of the Protestant churches of Bearn (1620), whither Louis XIII. proceeded in person, and violently re-established the supremacy of the Roman-Catholic hierarchy, led to a Huguenot uprising. This was of brief duration; but in 1625 hostilities were renewed. The Protestants being no match for the forces of the king, the fall of La Rochelle (1628), after a vigorous siege conducted by Cardinal Richelieu, marked the close of the war and the end of the political importance of the Huguenots as a power in the State.

Meantime never were the Huguenots intellectually more active. Their worship in the neighborhood of Paris, after having been fixed at the village of Ablon, a spot both distant, and difficult of access (see ABLON), had been brought to the nearer and more convenient Charenton. This place became the centre of a powerful religious and philosophical influence that made itself felt in the capital of the kingdom and at the royal court. The number of eminent writers and preachers was great. In different parts of the kingdom not less than six theological seminaries, or "academies," had been instituted, of which those of Saumur, Montauban, and Sedan, were the most important.

Although the violations of the spirit and even the letter of the Edict of Nantes had been frequent, it was not until after the death of Cardinal Mazarin (1661), that the process of restriction, whose logical conclusion could only be the complete repeal of Henry IV.'s ordinance, may be said distinctly to have begun. From this time forward, the Huguenots, although they had been highly praised by the monarch himself more than once for their loyalty to the crown at the time of the troubles of the "Fronde," were allowed little rest. Vexatious regulations successively deprived them of their places of worship, excluded them from one employment after another, or, under the forms of law, robbed them of their property, and even the possession of their children. As the time for the last act approached, the terrible dragonnades were set on foot to compel the abjuration of those whose constancy rational persuasion had been powerless to shake. At length (October, 1685), on the pretence that his measures had proved successful, and that the reformed religion no longer existed in his dominions, Louis XIV. signed the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. No exercise of the Protestant religion was to be tolerated in France. All ministers of the gospel were to leave the kingdom within a fortnight. No other persons could emigrate, under penalty of the galleys for men, of imprisonment and confiscation of property for women. More cruel than the infamous "League" itself, the Edict of Revocation shut up the French Protestants as in a prison, punishing inexorably all attempts at escape.

V. FROM THE REVOCATION TO THE EDICT OF TOLERATION (1685-1787). — In spite of the prohibition contained in the Edict of Revocation, the immediate effect was a great increase in the number of French Protestants that fled into foreign lands. The total number cannot be definitely ascertained. It has been estimated as high as eight hundred thousand; but this figure is undoubtedly excessive, the number probably not being over three hundred thousand to four hundred thousand. The exodus included the most industrious and thrifty part of the population. For a hundred years the Protestants that remained in France enjoyed only such rare and precarious means of edification as were afforded by the so-called "Assemblies of the Desert," — meetings in secluded spots remote from the towns, or in the bleak region of the Cevennes Mountains. Attendance on these gatherings was a grave offence; and the venturesome minister incurred, if apprehended, the punishment of being broken upon the wheel. So late as Feb. 19, 1762, a minister named Rochette was beheaded, by authority of the Parliament of Toulouse, for the sole crime of having preached, performed marriages, and administered the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. In 1767, for the same offence, another minister, Berenger, was condemned to death, and executed in effigy.

The episode of the war of the Camisards, which lasted from 1702-5, has been treated elsewhere. (See CAMISARDS.)

At length, yielding to the force of public opinion, Louis XVI. published (November, 1787) the Edict of Toleration. This document still declared that "the Catholic, Apostolic, and Roman religion alone shall continue to enjoy public worship." But it authorized the registry of Protestant births, marriages, and deaths, and forbade that the Protestants should in any way be disturbed because of their faith.

The National Assembly, in 1790, took steps for the restoration of the confiscated property of Protestant refugees. The law of the eighteenth Germinal Year X. (1802) organized the Reformed and Lutheran churches, whose pastors were henceforth paid by the State.

The Huguenot Refugees. The Huguenots, driven from France by persecution, were welcomed by all the countries to which they turned their steps. All the Protestant lands of Europe were glad to enrich their trade and manufactures by the accession of the most intelligent and industrious class of the French population. The very name "Huguenot," having acquired an honorable association, became a passport to favor.

Switzerland, "destined by Providence to be a land of refuge," had been the resort of persecuted Frenchmen from the beginning of the Reformation. The Huguenot fugitives increased greatly after the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Day; while the persecution culminating in the Revocation brought in so large a number, that the resources of the hospitable cantons were taxed to the utmost to provide for their sustenance. Many of the fugitives from the earlier persecutions returned to France when the storm had partially spent its fury: others, particularly after the Revocation, made Switzerland only the first stage in their retreat. These passed on, after a time, to Württemberg, Hesse, Brandenburg, and other parts of Germany, whose rulers saw in the Huguenot peasants and artisans the very persons whom they needed for the regions depopulated by the Thirty-Years' War.

In the very month in which Louis XIV. signed at Fontainebleau the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the elector, Frederick William of Brandenburg, signed at Potsdam an edict by which not only was warm sympathy expressed, but great inducements were held forth to all Huguenots that might desire to settle in his dominions. Provision was made both for the safety and for the expenses of the refugees in reaching their destination. Despite strenuous efforts on the part of the French Government to suppress or discredit it, copies of the Potsdam edict were circulated in every part of France, and crowds of Huguenots found their way to Frankfort-on-the-Main. Here they were met by agents of the elector, and were generously helped on their way. An important French colony sprang up in Berlin, which still maintains a distinctive existence. Many families of Huguenot origin have, however, become thoroughly German in character, even the names having been translated or modified to suit the German ear. It has been remarked, that, in the Franco-German war of 1870-71, many of the officers of the victorious army of invasion were descendants of those whom the intolerant policy of Louis XIV. compelled to expatriate themselves.

In Holland the Huguenot refugees were treated with great kindness. Not only was a public fast instituted when the tidings of the Revocation came, but valuable political concessions were made. Utrecht conferred on the refugees the freedom of the city, and exemption from imposts for twelve years. Middleburg in Zealand relieved them of the burden of taxation for ten years.

General collections were made for their relief, in which Lutherans, Anabaptists, and even Roman Catholics, took part. The exiled pastors, two hundred and fifty in number, were specially cared for. Military men secured positions in the army, with ample pay, and promise of promotion. But all the fugitives were not poor. Some brought to their adopted country large fortunes; for as early as the last months of 1685 it was reported that twenty million livres had been carried out of France by those who were regarded as among the wealthiest merchants of the land. Holland was greatly enriched intellectually, as well as in a material point of view. Basnage, Benoit, DuBosc, and Martin were among the scholars she gained from France. The refugees settling on Dutch soil alone were estimated by Caveyrac at fifty-five thousand, and another Roman-Catholic source places them at seventy-five thousand, in the first year after the Revocation. In 1709, the same year that Queen Anne gave letters of naturalization to all the refugees in England, the States of Holland and West Friesland took the same step. Other provinces followed the example, and in 1715 the States-General extended the same blessing to all the republic.

Northern Europe opened its doors to the fugitives. Despite the strong Lutheran sentiments of Denmark, the king, on hearing of the cruel dragonnades, in 1681 published a declaration offering the French refugees an asylum, the right to build churches, exemption from taxation for eight years, etc. In 1685 a new edict conferred upon French noble refugees the same distinctions that they had enjoyed at home, to officers a corresponding rank, and great inducements to manufacturers. Several flourishing colonies were established at different points. Sweden was less hospitable; but in Russia a ukase, signed by Peter and Ivan (1688), opened to the refugees all the provinces of the empire, and gave to officers employment in the army. Voltaire maintains that one-third of the regiment of twelve thousand formed by the Genevese Lefort for Peter was composed of French refugees.

While all the countries mentioned received a great accession of wealth from the industries brought with them by the fugitive Huguenots, it was England that profited most by the ill-judged act of Louis XIV. From the time of the pious Edward VI., the monarchs of that country, with the single exception of Mary, had been their allies and protectors. The French Church of London owed its origin (1550) to the kind offices of the Duke of Somerset and Archbishop Crammer. In 1561, under Queen Elizabeth, a French church was founded at Canterbury for the Walloons, meeting in the crypts of the cathedral, as it continues to do to the present day. In 1676 it had a membership of twenty-five hundred communicants. Soon after, the French refugees proper went off and formed a new church. Before the Revocation, there had also arisen French churches at Sandwich, Norwich, Southampton, Glastonbury, Rye, and six or seven other places; while the old French church at the capital had been re-enforced by the Savoy, Marylebone, and Castle-street churches.

On the outbreak of the dragonnades, Charles II. issued (July 28, 1681) the proclamation of Hampton Court, welcoming the Huguenot refugees, promising to them letters of naturalization, and privileges for carrying on trade and manufactures. After the Revocation, James II. extended to them a similar invitation. M. Weiss estimates the number of Huguenots that fled to England, during the decade in which the Revocation fell, at eighty thousand persons, of whom about one-third settled in London. To the five earlier French churches of the metropolis there were added twenty-six new churches, almost all during the reigns of William and Mary, of Anne, and of George I. Eleven or twelve more sprang up in other parts of England. An order of council enjoined a general collection in favor of the refugees, from which a fund of about two hundred thousand pounds resulted. Nor were the services rendered by the Huguenots slight. In the army of William of Orange, when he marched against his father-in-law, there were three regiments of foot and a squadron of horse, composed exclusively of French Protestant refugees. To these troops, and to a strong element of French officers, — veterans of Condé and Turenne, seven hundred and thirty-six in number, — scattered through the rest of the army, the overthrow of the last Stuart king was in great part due. Schomberg, Ruvigny, and others distinguished themselves in the fresh warfare to which they were called, and both honored and benefited their adopted country. More important and lasting was the service done by the introduction of a number of new manufactures, until then but little known in England. For the first time, thanks to the Huguenots, the finer kinds of paper, of hats, and of glass, were made on British soil. Silks and satins were produced north of the Channel such as had previously come only from the looms of Lyons: in a word, the manufactures of England were built up at the expense of France. Even in an intellectual point of view, the influence of the refugees was great. We need only mention the names of Denis Papin, the first investigator of the principles of steam, and Rapin-Thoyras, whose History of England was without a rival until the appearance of the work of David Hume. Although, with the lapse of time, the refugees have become thoroughly merged in the population of the United Kingdom, there remain many historic traces of interest; such as the Hospital for Poor French Protestants and their Descendants residing in Great Britain, whose new and elegant building attracts the eye of the visitor.

The Huguenots in the United States. — The unfortunate attempt at colonization in Brazil has already been referred to. Equally fruitless was the undertaking, under the patronage of Admiral Coligny, to found a French Protestant settlement in Florida (1562). Greater success attended the subsequent emigration of the Huguenots, which, if it did not lead to the acquisition by France of an American empire, added much to the prosperity of the English colonial system. The Dutch in America were the first to profit by it. Long before the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the stream of Huguenot emigration set in toward New Netherland. The first band of settlers sent over (1623) by the Dutch West India Company consisted of thirty families, chiefly Walloons. These were the founders of the city of New Amsterdam (New York), where French was spoken, and the Huguenot faith was professed from the outset. Other Walloons and French settled at an early day on Long Island and Staten Island, and upon the banks of the Delaware, and in 1660 founded New Paltz on the Hudson. As the severities visited upon the Protestants in France increased, large numbers of refugees came to this country, establishing themselves in New York, in Boston, in Maryland, and Virginia, and in Charleston, S.C. Detachments from these bodies of immigrants settled in Oxford, Mass., Kingston, R.I., New Rochelle, N.Y., and on the Cooper and Santee Rivers, South Carolina. In all these places churches were organized, and ministers of the French Reformed Church officiated. The French settlements in Oxford, Mass., and Kingston, R.I., were soon broken up: the others continued for several generations to maintain a distinct character. The French church in Boston lasted until the year 1748, having for its pastors Pierre Daillé (1696-1715) and André Le Mercier (1716-48). The French congregation in New York, long flourishing and influential, had a succession of Reformed pastors, the last of whom submitted to Episcopal ordination in 1806, when the church adopted the Episcopal rite, and took the name of "L'Église du Saint Esprit." In New Rochelle, N.Y., two churches were maintained almost until the outbreak of the American Revolution, — the French Reformed Church, founded in 1688, and a French Episcopal Church, organized in 1709. In New Paltz the Dutch language superseded the French in public worship about the year 1735. Three of the four Huguenot congregations of South Carolina went out of existence, or became merged with neighboring English-speaking churches: the French church in Charleston alone survives to the present day, and uses an excellent liturgy.

No precise statement can be ventured as to the numbers of Huguenots that came to America; but it is certain that they must have reached several thousands. The influence of this element in moulding the character of the American people has been considerable, and out of all proportion to the extent of the immigration; and the prominence of Huguenot names in the roll of patriots, statesmen, philanthropists, ministers of the gospel, men of note in every calling in the United States, is a noticeable and significant fact.

HUISSEAU, Isaac d', b. in Paris towards the close of the reign of Henry IV.; d. in England after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes; studied at Sedan, and became pastor of Saumur. He published La discipline des églises réformées de France (1650), which has run through many editions, and is still of great value; and La réunion du christianisme (1670), which was violently attacked by the rigid Calvinists.

HULSÉ, John, Rev., b. at Middlewich, Cheshire, Eng., 1708; d. there Dec. 11, 1790. He was educated at Cambridge, and bequeathed all his property to that university for the purpose of founding two scholarships, a Prize Essay, and the offices of Christian Advocate and Christian Preacher, or Hulsean Lecturer. The latter's duties, according to Mr. Hulse's will, were to deliver and print twenty sermons yearly, either upon the evidences of Christianity, or upon the difficulties of the Bible. But several changes have been made in the execution of this will. The Hulsean professorship was by statute substituted in 1860 for the Christian advocateship; in 1830 the number of annual lecture-sermons was reduced to eight, and again, still later, to four; and of the annual revenue (between eight hundred and nine hundred pounds) eight-tenths goes to the Hulsean professor, and one-tenth to the Hulsean prize man and lecturer respectively. See, for list of lectures, the art. LECTURES in the APPENDIX.

HÜLSEMANN, Johann, b. in Ostfriesland, 1602; d. at Leipzig, 1661; was appointed professor of theology at Wittenberg, 1629, and at Leipzig, 1646. His principal works are Calvinismus irconciliabilis, 1646, and Breviarium theologie (which appeared in an enlarged form in 1655, — Extensio brevii theologie), and gives an interesting representation of orthodox Lutheran dogmatics.

HUMANIST, a term derived from the Ciceronian expression literæ humaniores, was adopted as a name in the sixteenth century, and probably not without a side-glance at such terms as scholasticism, scientia sacra, etc., by those who, in the field of literature proper, represented the powerful movement of the Renaissance. Bursting forth everywhere, this movement produced everywhere a revolution. A new poetry, a new art, new methods of science, new maxims of morals, new political tendencies, followed in its steps; but its influence was, perhaps, nowhere more strikingly apparent than in the sphere of belles-lettres.

The humanists were literati, not theologians; teachers, not priests. The task with which they originally started was simply to restore the Latin language. Under the hands of the Roman-Catholic Church, and treated as badly by the barbarous subtlety of the schoolmen as by the barbarian ignorance of the monks, the Latin language had become a thing unspeakable; and it was as much indignation at its pitiful state, as enthusiasm for its former glory, which fired the Italians to attempt its restoration. The attempt succeeded; but, though other and quite different tasks presented themselves, the humanists never lost the character of being the philologists, grammarians, exegetes, and critics of their age; and their best work lies in that line. They made the study of Greek an indispensable element of scholarly education; they introduced the study of Hebrew; yea, even the development of the vernacular tongues received a powerful impulse from them. The Italian language was first written by its Latin scholars. Lebrija wrote the first Spanish grammar. In the schools of the Brethren of the Common Life and in the preaching of the German mystics, that language grew up which Luther fixed as the German. The inventor of the French style, Rabelais, was a humanist.

So far, no autogonism arose between the Church and the humanists, though it could not be long concealed that their greatest philological achievements—the Complutensian polyglot, the printing of the Greek text of the New Testament, etc.—were seized upon by the adversaries of Rome, and used as weapons against her. But after the language followed the authors, and after the authors their ideas. Gradually the humanist grew from a philologist into an historian, and from an historian into a philosopher. He studied not only classical language and literature, but also classical life and spirit. He claimed to know what belongs to man by nature (his faculties and his failings) and what concerns man by nature (his rights and his duties). His criticism of words became criticism of facts; and Laurentius Valla laughed at the donation of Constantine. His knowledge of history became political demands, and Reuchlin could not be made to submit to the Inquisition. A spirit got abroad extremely dangerous to the Roman Church, if not directly antagonistic.

Not to overrate, however, the influence which the humanists have exercised on the history of the Church, it must be noticed, that though they furnished the Reformers with arms, and seemed personally very favorably disposed to the Reformation, only few of them actually took part in the work. Erasmus retreated before the task; and, even with Melancthon in full sight, it is safe to say that the humanists would never have made the Reformation.

HUMANITARIANS, a name applied both to that school of Unitarians, or those anti-Trinitarians in general, who consider Christ a mere man (homo), and to such parties as profess the "religion of humanity," whose fundamental dogma is the spontaneous perfectibility of the human race without any superhuman aid.

HUME, David, b. at Edinburgh, April 26, 1711; d. there Aug. 26, 1776. He was the son of a member of the Faculty of Advocates, who passed his life as a country gentleman at the family-seat of Ninewells in the border country of Scotland. He entered Edinburgh University before he was twelve years of age, and was introduced to studies beyond the powers of one so young. He tells us, "I was seized very early with a passion for literature, which has been the ruling passion of my life." We have admirable accounts of his life: the one, My Own Life, calm as philosophy itself; the other by Mr. Hill Burton, who had access to the papers collected by Baron Hume, and deposited with the Royal Society of Edinburgh. The latter has published a remarkable letter written to an eminent physician by the young man at the very crisis of his being. It appears, that, for a time, he labored to find security and peace in philosophy. "Having read many books of morality, such as Cicero, Seneca, and Plutarch, and being smit with their beautiful representations of virtue and philosophy, I undertook the improvement of my temper and will, along with my reason and understanding. I was continually fortifying myself with reflections against death and poverty, and shame and pain, and all the other calamities of life." But in this attempt he utterly broke down.

Hating the study of law, to which he was destined by his friends, he was sent to Bristol to engage in business; but, finding the employment unsuitable to him, he went, at the age of twenty-three, to France, to engage in the observation of mankind and in the study of his favorite subjects. After living there for three years, he brought back with him his Treatise of Human Nature, the two first volumes of which were published in London in the end of 1738. "Never literary attempt was more unfortunate than my Treatise of Human Nature. It fell dead-born from the press, without reaching such distinction as even to create a murmur among zealots." But with indomitable perseverance, which was one of his most marked characteristics, he persevered in his life-work. Next year he published the third volume of his treatise, that on ethics, with no better success. In 1748 he cast the first part of his unfortunate treatise in a new form, Inquiry concerning Human Understanding. He now broke down his great work into smaller essays, which in due time commanded attention, such as his Essays, Moral and Political, and in 1752 his Political Discourses, which immediately attracted much attention, and his Inquiry Concerning the Principles of Morals, which he regarded as likely to be the most influential of all his works. [Our space does not admit of our giving a detailed account of his further life.] He held for five years the office of librarian to the Advocates' Library in Edinburgh, and here he commenced writing his History of England. In 1763 he was sent on the English embassy to Paris, where he was received with acclamation by the highest circles, literary and fashionable. He afterwards settled in Edinburgh, where he passed his remaining days, the centre of an eminent literary circle, and everywhere showing good nature. He left a posthumous work (Dialogues on Natural Religion), undermining all religion, natural and revealed.

He is usually called Hume the sceptic or atheist: had the word been coined in his day, he would have been called an agnostic. He does not avowedly deny any thing; he simply shows that we have no proof of its existence. It will be necessary to give a compend of his whole philosophy, as his scepticism can be met only by exposing it throughout. He thus opens his Treatise of Human Nature: "All the perceptions of the human mind resolve themselves into two distinct kinds, which I call impressions and ideas. The difference betwixt them consists in the degrees of force and liveliness with which they strike upon mind, and make their way into our thought or consciousness. Those perceptions which enter with most force and violence we may name impressions; and under this name I comprehend all our sensations, passions, and emotions, as they make their first appearance in the soul. By ideas I mean the faint images of these in thinking and reasoning: such, for instance, are all the perceptions exerted by the present discourse, excepting only the immediate pleasure or uneasiness they may occasion." In assuming these impressions, he does not assume a perceiving mind, or a thing perceived. Hume is to be met as Reid met him at this early stage. "I never catch myself at any time without a perception, and never can observe any thing but the perception." This very language implies more. He speaks of "mind" and "soul," and of the perceptions "striking on the mind," and of catching himself. What is this self which he catches? We never do observe a perception alone: we always observe it as perceiving. We should maintain that we are cognizant of a self perceiving and a thing perceived. He next treats of memory, in which the impressions come forth in their original order and position, and are now ideas. But in memory we have more than a mere reproduction of a sensation: we recognize it as having been before us in time past, and have thus a knowledge of ourselves in the past and the present, and an idea of time as a reality. He has a subtle discussion as to our ideas of space and time, and of points, lines, and surfaces, and argues that they have no objective reality. There follows a criticism of existence and knowledge; and he maintains that it is "impossible for us so much as to conceive or form an idea of any thing specifically different from ideas or impressions." He reaches the conclusion that we know nothing but phenomena or appearances, a conclusion unfortunately allowed by Kant. He is to be met by showing that we know not mere appearances, but things appearing.

He has an admirable sevenfold classification of relations, which he says may be divided into two classes,—into such as depend entirely on the ideas which we compare, and such as may be changed without any change in the ideas. In the first he places resemblance, contrariety, degree, quantity, which can never go beyond our impressions. The other three, identity, space and time, cause and effect, may seem to carry us farther; but this is an illusion. In identity, and in time and space, we can never go beyond what is immediately present to the senses, and so can never discover the real existence of the relation of objects; and so "tis only causation which produces such a connection as to give us assurance from the existence or action of one object that was followed or preceded by any other existence or action." He devotes the whole energy of his mind to showing that we know nothing of the relation of cause and effect; that we know their conjunction and not their connection. The relation is merely that of invariable antecedence and consequence within our experience, and might have no place in other worlds, or in regard to world-making, of which we have no experience. In this way he undermined the proof of the existence of God. He is to be met by showing, that, looking at the nature of things, we are led to believe that every effect must have a cause, and that there is power in the object acting as the cause to produce the effect.

In these discussions he started the questions which have ever since been agitated as to belief, which he says "joins no new ideas to those which compose the idea of the object;" and argues that the only difference between belief and incredulity consists in the liveliness of belief which constitutes its essence. But surely we have at times imaginations as lively as our beliefs; and in all cases of belief we have a conviction, whether right or wrong, to be determined by evidence of the existence of an object. He uses this theory to account for our belief in the existence of mind and matter. "What we call mind is nothing but a heap or collection of different impressions, united together by certain relations, and supposed, though falsely, to be endowed with a perfect simplicity and identity. Again: as to matter we can never, on the mere ground of a conjunction which we have witnessed, argue from our perceptions to the existence of external continued objects." He thus undermines the usual arguments for the immateriality and immortality of the soul. "Identity is merely a quality which we ascribe to perceptions, because of ideas in the imagination; and the identity which we ascribe to the mind is merely a fictitious one." He is to be answered by showing that I know myself to be the same person to-day that I was at any other time remembered by me.

In his Essay on Miracles he assails supernatural revelation,—not its possibility, but the evidence of it. He shows that there has been an invariable experience in favor of the uniformity of nature; and that a miracle, being "a violation of the laws of nature," cannot be established by as strong proof as that which can be advanced against it. He exerts his ingenuity in disparaging the evidence usually advanced in favor of miraculous occurrences, by showing how apt mankind are to be swayed on these subjects by fear, wonder, fancy, and the like. I allow, that, in the present advanced state of science, there is ample proof that there is a uniformity in nature; but let us place alongside of this the counterpart fact, that there is sufficient evidence of there being a supernatural system. Let the cumulative proofs, external and internal, in behalf of Christianity, be adduced,—those derived from testimony and from prophecy; those drawn from the adaptation of the revelation to our nature, from the character of Jesus and from the unity of the doctrine and morality,—and we shall find in their consistency and congruity evidence of equal value to that which establishes the existence of system in nature.

People commonly shrink from Hume's negations on the subject of natural religion; but he has had a large following in his utilitarian theory of morals. He holds that the mind has an original instinct, which tends to unite itself with the good and the evil. He maintains that virtue consists in the agreeable and the useful: "Vice and virtue may be compared to sound, color, heat, which, according to modern philosophy, are not qualities of objects, but perceptions of the mind." Virtue is distinguished by the pleasure, and vice by the pain, that any action, sentiment, or character gives us by the mere view and contemplation. He is to be opposed by showing, first that the moral power in man is more than an instinct, that it is a cognitive power, and it perceives and knows the distinction between good and evil; and, secondly, that the good, say piety, or justice, or benevolence, is perceived to be good in itself. It is to be shown specially that the conscience claims supremacy over all our voluntary states, and that the good implies obligation to perform it.

Hume's Treatise of Human Nature contains the substance of all his philosophy. The publication of it (1738-39) constitutes an era in the history of philosophy. He tore down the old and venerable edifice, and henceforth men have had to build anew, and from the foundation. His earliest opponents were Thomas Reid (1763-64) and Immanuel Kant (1781). As his principles undermined all religion, natural and revealed, theologians have to examine them.

There is an edition of Hume's Philosophical Works, in 4 vols., Edinburgh, 1826 (A. Black), and an edition of his Treatise of Human Nature, by T. H. GREEN and T. H. GROSE, with Dissertations and Notes on the principles of Hegel, London, 1878. I may be permitted to add that I have an article on Hume in my Scottish Philosophy.

HUMERALE. See VESTMENTS.

HUMILIATI was the name of an association formed by some Milanese noblemen, on their return from German captivity, in the eleventh or twelfth century. In the middle of this laymen's association a religious order grew up, bearing the same name, and confirmed by Innocent III. in 1201. The members of the lay association afterwards fell in with the Arnoldists and the Waldenses, and the religious order also degenerated. In 1569 Cardinal Borromeo attempted to reform it, but nearly fell a victim to the violence of the monks; after which Pius V. dissolved the order, in 1571. A female order of Humiliati, also called the "Nuns of Blassoni," was founded by Clara Blassoni of Milan in 1150, and still exists. See HIERONYMUS TIERABOSCHI: Vetera Humiliatorum monumenta, Milan, 1766-68, T. III. ZÖCKLER.

HUMILIATION OF CHRIST. See CHRISTOLOGY.

HUMILITY, a virtue opposed to pride and self-conceit, by reason of which a man thinks of himself no more highly than he ought to think (Rom. xii. 3), and places himself in subjection to him to whom he owes subjection. This person is primarily God; so that humility is, first of all, the sense of absolute dependence upon him. In the strict sense of the term, humility is proper only in man's relations to God, and modesty in man's relations to man (De Wette). It is not merely the sense of God's infinitude over against human limitation, but of God's holiness over against man's moral deficiency and guilt. Sophocles came nearest to the true conception of humility in classical antiquity. It runs like a thread through all the piety of the Old Testament (Gen. xvii. 1; Mic. vi. 8) down to John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 2). Christ, although without sin, was imbued with childlike humility (Matt. xix. 17; John v. 30), and made it a condition of entrance into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. v. 3, xviii. 2). It must actuate the Christian at all times, and remind him to work out his salvation with fear and trembling (Phil. ii. 12). Love, which is the pulse-beat of the Christian life, is influenced by it, and held back from the errors of mysticism and quietism, and converts it into adoring reverence for God, trust in and obedience to him, even in sufferings (1 Pet. v. 6). A sham humility betrays itself in its behavior to mankind (Luke xviii. 13 sqq.). It is free from all vain self-conceit, but at the same time is conscious of man's dignity in the sight of God, and may be said to ascend upwards on the six steps of patience, meekness, kindness, friendliness, peaceableness, and placability (Arndt).—virtues which the apostles so urgently insist upon. See the various works on Christian ethics.

HUMPHREY, Heman, D.D., b. in West Simsbury, Conn., March 26, 1779; d. at Pittsfield in 1859. He graduated at Yale College in 1805; was a Congregational pastor at Fairfield, Conn., at Pittsfield, Mass.; then president of Amherst College for twenty-three years (1823-45). He was one of the best and weightiest men of his day, and exerted a wide influence in shaping its religious movements, especially in the Congregational and Presbyterian churches. He contributed largely to the religious press, wrote able pamphlets against intemperance and slavery, and was the author of a number of books, among them a Tour in France, Great Britain, and Belgium, in two volumes. (See TYLER'S History of Amherst College.) Zephaniah Moore, D.D., son of the preceding; b. at Amherst, Mass., Aug. 30, 1824; d. in Cincinnati, Nov. 13, 1881; graduated at Amherst College and at Andover Theological Seminary; pastor of churches at Racine and Milwaukee, Wis., 1850-59, of First Presbyterian Church, Chicago, 1859-68, of Calvary Church, Philadelphia, 1868-75; professor of ecclesiastical history and church polity in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati, 1875-81; and moderator of the General Assembly at Chicago in 1871. He was a gifted preacher, and a faithful servant of Christ.

HUNDESHAGEN, Karl Bernhard, b. in Friedewald, Hesse, Jan. 10, 1810; d. in Bonn, June 2, 1873; was one of the most prominent and original theologians which the Reformed Church of Germany has given in this century to the service of the Evangelical Church. His peculiar importance consisted in this, that in his own way he showed how certain features of the Reformed Church might be advantageously applied to the living Christianity of the day. He emphasized the ethical principle in Protestantism over against a mere dogmatic or critical intellectualism, and laid stress upon the social element in the Church, which was languishing by reason of its amalgamation with the State. He entered the University of Giessen at fifteen, and passed from there to Halle, where he became a favorite pupil of Uhlmann. In 1830 he went back to Giessen as repentant, and in 1831 accepted a call to a professorship in the newly founded university of Bern. In 1816 his anonymous work, D. deutsche Protestantismus, s. Vergangenheit u. s. heutigen Lebensfragen, etc., appeared, and fell like a flash of lightning in that troubled period. Two more editions were called for in 1817 and 1850. With an intense earnestness of tone, here and there relieved by flashes of humor, the author showed the intimate connection of the religious and national condition of Germany, and held up the central act of the Reformation as an act, not of science, but of conscience, and as calling for imitation. From this he passed over to the ecclesiastical questions of the day. This work made Hundeshagen's reputation, and he was at once called to the chair of New-Testament exegesis and church history at Heidelberg, where he continued to labor for twenty years (1847-67). In 1861 he published his great contribution to the literature of the relations of the State to the Church, — Beiträge zur Kirchenverfassung u. Kirchenpolitik, insbesondere d. Protestantismus. But the last years of his stay in Heidelberg were made unpleasant by the relations of the Church to the government of Baden, which were entirely at discord with his own views, and by the isolated position of the faculty in which Umbreit's death left him. He gladly accepted a call to Bonn in 1867, where he spent his last years in peaceful and friendly relations with his colleagues, although a great sufferer in body. He rejoiced in the restoration of the German Empire in 1870, and greeted the hour of his departure with Christian fortitude and joyfulness. A collection of his shorter writings was edited in 2 vols. by Dr. Christlieb, Gotha, 1874. See CHRISTLIEB: K. B. Hundeshagen, Eine Lebensskizze, Gotha, 1873.

WILLIBALD BEYSCHLAG.

HUNGARY, The Kingdom of, consists of Hungary Proper, the principality of Transylvania, the provinces of Croatia, Slavonia, and the Military Frontier, and comprises an area of 124,234 square miles, with 15,509,455 inhabitants, of whom 7,558,558 are Roman Catholics; 1,599,628, Greek Catholics; 5,133, Armenian Catholics; 2,589,319 belong to the Greek Church; 1,113,508 are Lutherans; 2,031,243, Calvinists; 54,822, Unitarians; 553,611, Jews, etc.

When the Magyars first crossed the Carpathian range, and settled in the plains of the Danube and the Theiss, they were still heathens. They believed in a greatest god, who had created heaven and earth, and whom they worshipped in groves under the open sky. They had no idols, no temples, no priests. Sacrifices, especially of horses, were presented at certain occasions. The oath was sacred to them, and marriage was accomplished with religious ceremonies. A century later (972) they became acquainted with Christianity, when their duke, Geyza, married a Christian princess, Sarolta, a daughter of the Transylvanian prince Giula, who had been converted to Christianity during a stay in Constantinople. It was, however, not the Greek, but the Roman Church, which finally converted the Magyars. The lively political relations which soon sprang up between the Magyar duke and the German emperor made it easier for the German missionary to penetrate into the country; and it was Adalbert of Prague who in 994 baptized Geyza's son Voik, and gave him the name of Stephen. Stephen, afterwards known as St. Stephen of Hungary, changed the constitution from a tribal union to a kingdom, and accomplished the christianization of the people, travelling from one end of the country to the other, preaching, baptizing, building churches and monasteries, founding schools, organizing governments, and establishing authorities. From Pope Sylvester II. he received a golden crown and the title of apostolic king; and in 1000 he was solemnly crowned by the Archbishop of Gran. At a diet held shortly after, he made the clergy the first state of the people, gave the bishops rich donations, introduced the tithe, enforced the celebration of Sunday, the Friday fast, etc. In no other country the Roman Church attained such a power and such a wealth as in Hungary. A curious testimony of her influence is found in the circumstance that the Latin language became the official language, not only of the church, the university, and the school, but also of the government, the administration, and the court, and continued so till the beginning of the present century.

When the Reformation arose in Germany, and became known in Hungary through the writings of the Reformers, the Hungarian Church seemed to be singularly well prepared for the encounter. A diet of 1523 decreed that Protestantism should be stamped out; that all Lutherans, and even their abettors, should be seized and burnt, etc. But Aug. 29, 1526, the battle of Mohacz was fought. The King, Louis II., fell, the last scion of the native dynasty, and around him most of the chiefs of the great families. The Turks occupied one part of the country; and two pretenders, Zapolya, and Ferdinand of Austria, fought about the other. Under such circumstances the religious affairs were for some time entirely lost sight of; and the Reformation was allowed to spread, as it caused no disturbance. It quietly took possession of the ground, priest and congregation compromising with each other; and when, in 1549, Leonhard Stöckel drew up the new confession, King Ferdinand accepted it, and confirmed it. The first forebodings of coming troubles appeared within the Protestant camp itself. The Lutherans and Calvinists hated each other worse than they hated the Romanists; and when Rudolph I. ascended the throne in 1577, and the Jesuits were recalled, and formally installed at Thuróc, intrigues, violence, and soon actual persecution, began. The Protestants rose in revolt, led by Prince Boesckaj of Transylvania, and compelled the king to the so-called "peace of Vienna" (1606), which granted freedom of conscience, and liberty of worship. The articles of this treaty were incorporated with the laws of the land by the Diet of Pressburg (1608), in spite of the protest of the Roman-Catholic bishops; and, when Rudolph made an attempt at cancelling the whole treaty, he was deposed, and his brother Matthias raised on the throne. In Peter Pazmáni, however, who, though born of Protestant parents, entered the order of the Jesuits, and finally became Archbishop of Gran, the Roman-Catholic Church found the right tool to work with. More than fifty noble families he succeeded in bringing back to the Roman faith; and with the magnates followed their whole retinues. Thus re-enforced, and strongly supported by the court, the Roman Church began a warfare of open attack. The Protestants were deprived of their church-buildings, prevented from making complaints at the diets, compelled to pay for the support of the Roman clergy, forced to participate in processions in honor of the Virgin and the saints, accused of the most horrible crimes, — conspiracy with the Turks, seditions against the king, etc. Twice they rose in open rebellion, under the lead of the Rákoczys, father and son; and both times they were successful. By the peace of Linz (1615), and by that of Szathmár (1711), the rights which they had obtained by the peace of Vienna were recognized and confirmed. But the treaties were made only to be broken; and the state of the evangelical churches in Hungary was very precarious, when the Edict of Toleration of Joseph II.

(Oct. 29, 1781) at once effected a radical change. The Protestants were in all essential points placed on an equal footing with the Roman Catholics; and in this arrangement the legislation of Joseph's successor, Leopold, especially the law of 1791, made no material alterations.

At present the Roman-Catholic Church has seventeen bishops in Hungary, and four archbishops, — Zagrab (Agram), Eger (Erlau), Kalocsa, and Esztergom (Gran), of whom the last is the primate of the whole Church, and bears the title of prince. The Greek Catholic Church (Greek in confession and rite, but under Roman jurisdiction) has six bishops; the Armenian Catholic Church two. The Greek Church has a metropolitan at Carlowitz with five suffragan bishops, and an archbishop at Nagyzeben (Hermannstadt) with two. In the evangelical churches each congregation elects its own eldership, which appoints the pastor, and governs all the affairs of the congregation. Several congregations form a seniorate; several seniorates, a superintendency. There are five Lutheran and five Calvinist superintendencies. Of the forty-five theological institutions, which in 1878 labored with 284 professors and 1,534 students, twenty-five belonged to the Roman-Catholic Church, four to the Greek Catholic, three to the Greek Church, seven to the Lutheran, and five to the Calvinist. HUNNIUS, Ægidius, b. at Wimmenden, Württemberg, Dec. 21, 1550; d. at Wittenberg, April 4, 1603; studied at Tübingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Marburg 1576, and at Wittenberg 1592. He was a staunch champion of Lutheran orthodoxy. During his stay in Marburg he opposed, in preaching and writing, the reigning Calvinistic tendency, and succeeded in forming a party which finally effected an ecclesiastical split between Upper and Lower Hesse. In Wittenberg he was a member of the Committee on Visitation, and contributed much to suppress all Phillipistic traditions. A collected edition of his Latin works, among which are De persona Christi, Cabimus judaizans, etc., appeared at Wittenberg, 1607-09, in 3 vols. fol.

HUNNIUS, Nicolaus, b. at Marburg, July 11, 1585; d. at Lübeck, April 12, 1643; studied theology at Wittenberg, and was appointed superintendent of Eilenburg 1612, professor of theology at Wittenberg 1617, and pastor of the Church of St. Mary in Lübeck 1622. He followed the same theological direction as his father, inherited his temper and talent as a polemist, and was, like him, possessed of great learning. He wrote against the Roman Church, Demonstratio Ministerii Lutherani and Capistrum Humio paratum, etc., 1617; against the Photinians, Examen errorum Photinianorum, 1620; and, against the enthusiasts of his time, Christliche Betrachtung, 1622; Ausführlicher Bericht von der neuen Propheten, 1631; etc. In Lübeck he revived the Ministerium tripolitanum, an association between the clergy of Lübeck, Hamburg, and Lüneburg; and by his Consultatio (1632) he gave the idea of a Collegium irenicum, or Collegium Humianum, which was intended to form a kind of supreme court for all theological controversies. His biography was written by HELLER, Lübeck, 1843.

HUNTING AMONG THE HEBREWS. In the Bible we find hunting connected with royalty as early as in the days of Nimrod, who "was a mighty hunter before the Lord" (Gen. x. 9). The patriarchs were rather herdsmen than hunters: only Ishmael was an archer (Gen. xxi. 20), and Esau a cunning hunter (Gen. xxv. 27). That beasts of the chase were plentiful in the land of promise we see from Exod. xxiii. 29. From the provision made in Lev. xvii. 13, it is manifest that hunting was practised after the settlement in Canaan, and was pursued with the view of obtaining food (Deut. xii. 22). That birds were also shot we may infer from 1 Sam. xxvi. 20; but the law provided for their protection (Deut. xxii. 6 sq.). Quiver and bow (Gen. xxvii. 3) were generally used as hunting utensils. Various missiles, pitfalls, snares, and gins were made use of in hunting (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ps. xci. 3; Amos iii. 5). That hunting continued to be followed till toward the end of the Jewish state we see from Josephus, War, i. 21, 13. LEYRER.

HUNTINGDON, Selina, Countess of, a distinguished supporter of evangelical piety and the Methodist movement; b. Aug. 24, 1707, at Stanton Harold in Leicestershire; d. June 17, 1791, in London. She was the second daughter of Washington Shirley, Earl of Ferrers, and in 1728 married the Earl of Huntingdon. Under the influence of the earl's sisters and a severe illness, she became deeply interested in religion, and with her husband attended the meetings of the Methodist Society in Fetterlane, London, from its organization, in 1738. She lost all her children, and in 1746 the earl died. From this time on, Lady Huntingdon devoted herself uninterruptedly to the advancement of religion. Among her friends in the ministry were Doddridge, John Wesley, and Fletcher; and Whitefield and Romaine acted as her chaplains. Her house in Park Street, London, she opened for preaching-services, to which her social connections, and the estimation in which she was held, drew many persons of high rank, among whom were Bolingbroke and Chesterfield. She built numerous chapels, — the expenses of the first, at Brighton (1761), being met by the sale of her jewels, amounting to seven hundred pounds, — and in 1768 founded the theological seminary of Trevecca in Southern Wales, which, after her death, was removed to Chestnut Herts. When the breach occurred between Wesley and Whitefield, Lady Huntingdon took sides with the latter, and at his death (1777) became sole trustee of his institutions in Georgia. But she did not leave the Church of England till 1779, and then she was forced to it in order to avoid the injunction against her chaplains' preaching in the Pantheon. Lady Huntingdon superintended her chapels in person, and at the time of her death there were sixty-four belonging to what was called "the Countess of Huntingdon Connexion." These congregations were in polity Congregationalist, in doctrine Calvinistic, and in worship used the Book of Common Prayer. According to Whitaker's Almanac for 1882, the "Connexion" now only has thirty-four chapels. See Life and Times of Selina, Countess of Huntingdon, London, 1840, 2 vols.; A. H. NEW: The Coronet and the Cross, or Memorials of Selina Countess of Huntingdon, London, 1857.

HUPFELD, Hermann (Christian Karl Friedrich),

a scholar of the first rank among the exegetes of the Old Testament, and son of an evangelical pastor; b. March 31, 1796, at Marburg; d. April 24, 1866, at Halle. He studied theology at Marburg, and, soon after completing his course, became assistant to one of the pastors in that city. After a brief service in this capacity, he was appointed teacher in the gymnasium at Hanau, where he remained three years. Returning to his home with the intention of devoting his life to the ministry, his feelings suddenly underwent a change, and determined him in favor of an academic career. In 1824 he placed himself under Gesenius at Halle, "habilitated" in philosophy, and began lecturing on Hebrew grammar. In 1825 he was appointed professor of theology in Marburg, and published his Exercitationes Ethiopticae (Leipzig), which placed him at the side of the ablest investigators of the day. In 1843 he became Gesenius' successor at Halle. As a teacher, Hupfeld's manner was not attractive; but he interested his hearers deeply by clearness of presentation, thoroughness of treatment, and his love of truth. In 1865 he was accused by certain theologians, before the minister of worship, of disparaging the divine element in the Old Testament. But he easily disproved the charge; and all his colleagues, Julius Müller and Tholuck included, rose up in his defence. He did not belong to the strict evangelical school (Vermittlungs-theologie); but he was the friend of a living biblical Christianity, the foe of all impiety, and a strict lover of truth and justice. Tholuck pronounced his funeral oration.

Hupfeld once said of himself, that his literary activity had diffused itself over too wide a range, and lacked a well-defined plan. His writings are very valuable, but appeared, for the most part, in periodicals and religious journals. His greatest work was the translation and Commentary on the Psalms, Gotha, 1855-61, 4 vols., 2d ed. by Riehm, 1867-71. The translation is prosaic, but in textual criticism it is unsurpassed among the works on that portion of Scripture. Die Quellen d. Genesis u. d. Art ihrer Zusammensetzung, von neuem untersucht (Berlin, 1853) has also a permanent value, [and analyzes Genesis into an original Elohist document amended by a younger Elohist and a Jehovistic editor]. Hupfeld began in 1828 the publication of an Ausführliche Hebr. Grammatik, which he never completed. His contributions to periodicals were frequent and valuable; nor did he confine himself to theology, but took also a deep interest in the political agitations of his day, which often exercised his pen. This pious scholar could well say of himself, "To be true, that has always been my endeavor; and to remain an honorable man in the face of the grimaces of this world, that has seemed to me to be the highest praise." For further particulars of Hupfeld's life, and an admirable criticism of his professorial and literary activity, see the justly appreciative biography by RIEHM, Halle, 1867. KAMPHAUSEN.

HURD, Richard, Bishop of Worcester; b. of humble parents at Congreve, Staffordshire, Jan. 13, 1720; d. May 28, 1808; in 1739 graduated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and was elected fellow 1742. He became rector of Thurcaston 1757, preacher of Lincoln's Inn 1766, archdeacon of Gloucester 1767, and bishop of Lichfield and Coventry 1771, from which he was translated in 1781 to the see of Worcester. In 1783 he was offered the see of Canterbury, which he declined on the ground of its being a "charge not suited to his temper and talents, and much too heavy for him to sustain, especially at this time." Bishop Hurd was a man of much polish and elegance of manner, and was pronounced by George III. "the most naturally polite man he had ever known." He kept up a sumptuous retinue, but with these tastes combined literary ambitions. Among his other works are a Commentary on Horace's Ars Poetica, 1749, 4th ed., 1763; a volume of Moral and Political Dialogues (sincerity, retirement, etc.), 1759; 3 vols. of Sermons, 1776-80. He edited the Works of Warburton, 7 vols., 1788. His most ambitious theological work was Introduction to the Study of the Prophecies, 1772 (1778, 2 vols.). His collected Works with an Autobiography appeared in 8 vols., 1811. See KILVERT: Life and Writings of Bishop Hurd, London, 1860.

HURTER, Friedrich Emanuel von, b. at Schaffhausen, Switzerland, of Protestant parents, March 19, 1787; d. at Graz, Aug. 27, 1865. He studied theology in Göttingen; in 1824 was chief pastor in Schaffhausen, and in 1835 dean of the synod, but was converted to Roman Catholicism through his historical studies, and in 1844 entered that church. He was called to Vienna in 1845 as imperial counsellor and historiographer, and in 1851 ennobled under the title Von Amann. Besides controversial writings, he was the author of the famous Geschichte d. Papstes Innocenz III. u. seiner Zeitgenossen, Hamburg, 1834-42, 4 vols.; and an account of his conversion, which is said to be one of the best books of its class: Geburt u. Wiedergeburt, Erinnerungen aus meinem Leben u. Blicke auf die Kirche, Schaffhausen, 1845, 4 vols., 4th ed., 1867, 2 vols. His life was written by one of his sons, Graz, 1876, 2 vols. Two of his sons have taken prominent places in the Roman Church.

HUS, John, Bohemian reformer and martyr; b. in 1369 [according to Gillett, July 6, 1373], at Hussinetz, Bohemia, not far from the Bavarian line; d. at the stake, in Constance, Germany, July 6, 1415. Hus is an abbreviation of Hussinetz, and was used by him from 1396. His parents were Czechs, in comfortable circumstances. John studied at Prague, taking the degree of Bachelor of Theology in 1394, and Master of Arts 1396. In 1398 he delivered his first lectures, in 1401 was made dean of the philosophical faculty, and in 1403 rector of the university. He was a constant student of Wiclif's works; and it is altogether likely, that in following the rule that a bachelor might only lecture upon the treatises of a Prague, Parisian, or Oxford master, Hus took up Wiclif. It is, at any rate, a noticeable coincidence that a manuscript containing five of Wiclif's philosophical writings, preserved at Stockholm, was written by Hus in 1398.

In 1402 Hus was made pastor of the Bethlehem Church, which was founded (1391) to afford preaching for the Czechs. This position brought him into close contact with the common people, and stimulated him to a closer study of Scripture, as well as to the study of Wiclif's theological works.

In the period from 1402 to 1410 Hus hoped to effect a religious reformation, with the aid of his ecclesiastical superiors. A disputation of the year 1403 led the authorities to forbid the promulgation of forty-five theses of Wiclif at the university; but, five years later, the interdiction was confirmed only to the extent that no one should give to them an heretical construction. Hus had the full confidence of the archbishop, Dr. Shynko, and was appointed synodical preacher by him. At the opening of the provincial synod, he repeatedly took occasion to lay bare the errors, and denounce the sins, of the clergy. With two others, he was appointed by the archbishop to investigate the alleged miracles performed by the blood of Christ in the church at Wilsnack. They were pronounced a deception, and formed the occasion of Hus's pamphlet, All the Blood of Christ is Glorified. He here bids Christians seek, not for signs and miracles, but search the Scriptures. But his relations to the archbishop changed, and in 1408 he was prohibited from exercising priestly functions within the diocese. The complete rupture was still to come.

In 1409 the University of Prague lost all its foreign students in consequence of a royal decree giving the Bohemian students three votes, the others only one. Leipzig University was founded; but in Prague an intense national spirit henceforth prevailed, which demanded ecclesiastical reforms. Hus was made rector, and was very popular, not only among the students, but at court. This freedom of inquiry excited the apprehension of the archbishop, who accused Hus to the Pope, apprising him, at the same time, of the wide prevalence of the doctrines of Wiclif. A papal bull of Dec. 20, 1409, prohibited the use of the English Reformer's writings, and forbade preaching at places where the practice was not an ancient one. When the bull was announced (March 9, 1410), it aroused much opposition; but the archbishop executed it, burning on July 16 two hundred volumes of Wiclif, in spite of the adverse decision of the university. But Hus continued to preach, and the opposition increased. Verses lampooning the archbishop were sung on the streets, and even the lives of the priests menaced. Hus and his friends openly defended Wiclif's writings at the university; while the archbishop, in a synodical edict, condemned them as heretical. The congregations at the Bethlehem Church grew to a vast size. Hus became bolder and more outspoken; and his audiences frequently showed their approval by applause. On March 15, 1411, he was excommunicated by the archbishop, and the city laid under an interdict. Both sentences were ignored; and the prelate was attempting to arrange a compromise, when death overtook him (Sept. 28).

In 1412 Hus and his sympathizers were roused to indignation by the preaching of a crusade against Naples, and of indulgences commanded by Pope John XXIII., and commended by the king. The university was divided; but in a public disputation (June 7, 1412) it was emphatically affirmed that neither Pope nor bishop had the right to draw the sword, for it was said to Peter, "Put up thy sword." As for indulgences, it was declared that not money, but true repentance, was the condition of forgiveness. The Pope does not know who are the elect, and they only can be saved; and the doctrine that he cannot err is blasphemous.

The populace sympathized with these utterances of the university, went in contemptuous procession in front of the archbishop's palace, and made a bonfire of the papal bulls in the market-place. The king, Wenceslaus, forbade all popular insult to the Pope, and executed three young men who declared the indulgences to be a humbug. But Hus, attended by a number of students, took up their bodies, and buried them in the Bethlehem Church. Cardinal Peter of St. Angelo now determined to use more decisive measures, interdicted Hus's place of residence, and threatened him with the civil ban. This was effective. At the king's request he left the city (December, 1412), but not until he had written a work (the Appellatio), in which he appeals from the Roman curia to Christ the righteous Judge. He passed his exile at Kozihradek and Krakowetz, near Prague, preaching to large concourses of people, and writing his principal work, De Ecclesia, which only reproduced Wiclif's De Ecclesia.

The religious agitation of Bohemia had become matter of European notoriety, and King Sigismund (of Hungary) decided that the case ought to be brought before the General Council about to be assembled at Constance. Hus cheerfully agreed to appear: three of the Bohemian nobility (at the king's command) and two personal friends attended him, starting on their journey Oct. 11, 1414. The party was well received on the way, and arrived Nov. 3 at Constance. Four weeks afterwards the cardinals trumped up a charge of attempted flight, and placed him in confinement in a Dominican convent. A commission of three bishops made the preliminary investigation; the accused being denied a hearing. The articles of accusation were concerned principally with Hus's errors about the Church. Only later was the distribution of both the elements at communion added.

The flight of John XXIII. rendered the work of his commission invalid; and the council appointed another, of four members, including d'Ailly. They were to sit in judgment upon Wiclif's doctrines, as well as upon those of the Bohemian reformer, for both were set in the same key. On May 1, 1415, the council adopted their report so far as it concerned Wiclif, damning his person, his writings, and his doctrines.

On the 5th of June, Hus had his first public hearing in the Franciscan convent. The heretical articles extracted from his writings were read; but his attempt to vindicate them was interrupted by tumultuous cries. The second public hearing occurred on June 7. Sigismund himself was present. The question was upon his relation to Wiclif and his book on the Church. He boldly affirmed his esteem for the English Reformer as a pious man, but denied that he had adopted his views against transubstantiation. At the third session (June 8) he defended some of the articles drawn from his work on the Church.

The condemnation of Hus to the stake was a foregone conclusion. He himself knew it. His letters bear the stamp of approaching death. During the four weeks that followed, efforts were made to induce him to retract, but in vain. On Saturday, July 6, 1415, the sentence of the council was pronounced in the cathedral, condemning him as a heretic, and condemning his books to be burned. Hus fell on his knees, and, lifting up his hands, appealed to Heaven, and prayed for his enemies. Thereupon followed his degradation from the priestly office, and all cried out together, "Thy soul we deliver up to the Devil." Hus answered, "And I commend it to the holy Lord Jesus." Then a paper cap a yard high was placed on his head, with the writing, "Heresiarcha!" He was then led forth to the judgment-square, his neck bound by a chain to a stake. As the flames rose around him, he refused again to recant, and died singing, "Christ, thou Son of the living God, have mercy upon me." His ashes were thrown into the Rhine.

Valid ground for the sentence of condemnation, even according to the canons of that day, there was none. Hus denied holding to Wiclif's views against transubstantiation, and his views upon the Church he founded upon Augustine. He then died because he based his reform of the Church upon conscience and Scripture, and not upon ecclesiastical authority. Judged by the canons of law then prevailing, Hus's death was a judicial murder.

Hus regarded the Scriptures as an infallible authority and the supreme standard of conduct. The other main subject of his teaching was the nature of the true Church, which, with Wiclif, he defined to be the body of the elect. Church-membership or ecclesiastical dignities were no infallible sign of election. He approved the communion under both kinds to the laity, but did not oppose the doctrine of transubstantiation as was charged by the council.

John Hus was not an original, creative mind. As a thinker, he had neither speculative talent nor constructive faculty. In comparison with Wiclif, he is a moon with borrowed light. Nor was he by nature a strong character, twice hardened, and keen as steel. Rather was he a feeble and tender spirit, more sensitive than designed for heroic deed. But with his tenderness there was combined moral tenacity, indomitable constancy, and inflexible firmness. If we add to these characteristics his purity and humility, his manly fear of God, and tender conscientiousness, we have in Hus a man to love and admire. Seldom have the power of conscience and the imperial strength of a faith rooted in Christ asserted themselves in so commanding and heroic a manner.

HUSSITES, the Bohemian followers of John Hus. The execution of Hus excited intense feeling in Bohemia and Moravia; and it was no wonder that some of the reformer's enemies among the priests were stabbed, or thrown into the Moldau, and that the archbishop himself barely escaped the wrath of the infuriated populace. The king, Wenceslaus, tried to maintain a neutral attitude between both parties. But in September, 1415, a large assembly was held, at which four hundred and fifty-two of the nobility signed a protest to the Council of Constance, and approved the doctrines of Hus. On the 5th they formed a league for mutual aid in religious concerns, binding themselves to protect the free preaching of God's Word on their estates, and to recognize the edicts of prelates only so far as they accorded with the Scriptures.

The ecclesiastical party entered into a counter league; and the Council of Constance cited the nobles to appear before it, and even threatened (Feb. 24, 1416) Bohemia with a crusade. But the Hussites could not be so easily intimidated. Pope Martin V. inaugurated more energetic measures, and, after dissolving the council (April 22, 1418), determined to destroy the Bohemian heresy root and branch. Wenceslaus was persuaded in 1419 to move against it, and the Hussites at court were obliged to leave. On Aug. 16 the king died, but civil war had already begun.

What was the character of this Bohemian movement? First of all we are struck with the intense veneration for Hus. His followers, however, disavowed the name "Hussites," and wanted to be known as Catholic Christians. They were unanimous in regarding the Scriptures as the supreme authority in doctrine and life, but they split into two parties in the application of this principle. The radical wing, accepting only that which was expressly commanded in Scripture, rejected the doctrines of purgatory, the worship of saints, the use of a foreign tongue in public services, etc. The moderate wing accepted all ecclesiastical customs the Scriptures did not expressly forbid. They put forth the famous Four Prague Articles in Latin, Czech, and German, in July, 1420. These called for (1) the free preaching of God's Word, (2) the distribution of the sacrament under two kinds, (3) the deprivation of the clergy of secular power and possessions which they used to the injury of their office and the state, and (4) the repression of mortal sins and public scandals. The moderate party was called the Praguers, and, later, Calixtines (from calix, "cup"), or Utraquists. They had at their head Baron Czenko of Wartenberg. The radicals acknowledged Nicholas of Pistna and John Zizka as leaders, and were called Taborites, from the fortress of Tabor, sixty miles south of Prague, which they occupied.

From 1420 to 1425, Catholic Germany marched in crusades against the Hussites; but the latter were victorious, and, from 1427 on, took the offensive against their enemies under the generalship of Procopius the Great. Cardinal Julian Cesarini, after the ignominious defeat of the last crusade, which he led Aug. 14, 1431, concluded, as president of the Basel Council, that the only way to put down the heresy was by conciliatory treatment. In October the council invited the Bohemians to appear before it. They refused until the delegates had conceded their main conditions at Eger. This was the first instance in the whole history of the Church for a council to treat upon an equal footing with a party demanding reforms. On Nov. 30, 1433, articles were agreed upon fully granting the administration of the communion in both kinds, and conceding the other points of the Prague Articles, but in a somewhat illusory manner.

The moderate party was satisfied, the Taborites not. Civil war broke out afresh; and the army of the latter was defeated in a decisive battle May 30, 1434. The Taborites gradually disappeared, or were lost, a generation or two later, in the Bohemian Brethren.

The articles of the Basel Council were confirmed by the National Bohemian Assembly at Iglau, July 5, 1436. But Pope Pius II., on March 31, 1462, declared them void, threatening with excommunication all who administered the cup to the laity. The Utraquist party was not intimidated. In 1485 the king signed an agreement confirming the articles of Basel, and in 1512 the Bohemian Parliament granted to the Utraquists equal rights with the Catholics.

The Utraquists sent words of cheer to Luther (July 16, 1519), and with them Hus's works, in which he was surprised to find his own doctrines taught. A portion only of the party fell in with the Reformation. In 1575 the Bohemian Parliament passed the Confessio Bohemica on the basis of the Augsburg Confession.

HUTCHINSON, Anne, a religious enthusiast of New England; was b. in Lincolnshire, Eng., 1591; emigrated to Boston 1634, and murdered by the Indians in Westchester County, New York, in August, 1643. She was a member of Dr. Cotton's church; but, holding some peculiar doctrines of her own, she "set up weekly meetings at her house, whereto three or four score people would resort" (Mather), and at which she criticised Dr. Cotton's sermons. "It was wonderful to see," continues Mather, "with what a speedy and spreading fascination these doctrines did bewitch the minds of the people," etc. She was excommunicated from Dr. Cotton's church for antinomian errors; and, the court ordering her to leave the Colony, she went first to Rhode Island, and then to Hebgate (probably Hell-Gate) Westchester County, N. Y. Cotton Mather uses very strong language against her doctrinal errors. See his Magnolia, vii. 3 (vol. ii. pp. 516 sqq.), and SPARKS: American Biography, vol. vi.

HUTCHINSON, John, a layman who represented peculiar views concerning biblical interpretation; b. in Spennithorne, Yorkshire, 1674; d. Aug. 28, 1727. He was steward in several families, and last to the Duke of Somerset, who procured for him a sinecure appointment worth two hundred pounds. In 1724 he published part i., and in 1727 part ii., of his Moses' Principia,—a work in which he attacked Newton's theory of gravitation. He held that the Hebrew Scriptures contained the elements of all rational philosophy, natural history, and true religion. He laid great stress upon the typical sense, and held that all parts of our Saviour's character and work are symbolized in the Old Testament. His views were adopted by such men as Bishop Horne, Jones of Nayland, etc. His collected works were edited in 12 vols. by SPEARMAN and BATE, 1748: An Abstract from the Works of J. Hutchinson, containing a Summary of his Discoveries in Philosophy and Divinity, London, 1753. See Life by SPEARMAN in the edition of 1765.

HUTTEN, Ulrich von, b. at Steckelberg, in Hesse-Cassel, April 22, 1488; d. in the Island of Ufnau, in the Lake of Zurich, Aug. 19, 1523; descended from a noble Franconian family, and was, when eleven years old, placed in the monastery of Fulda. But monastic life was very much against his nature. In his sixteenth year he fled from Fulda, and began, aided by some friends of his family, to study humaniora at Erfurt, scholasticism at Cologne, and philology and belles-lettres at Francfort-on-the-Oder. After some wild adventures at Greifswald and Rostock, he visited Wittenberg in 1510, and Vienna in 1512. In order to be reconciled to his father, he went in the latter year to Italy, and began to study law at Pavia and Bologna. But the principal result of his Italian journey was a satirical poem. He returned to Germany in 1517 as a common soldier in the army of Maximilian. An incident suddenly brought him into prominence. The Duke of Wurtemberg, stirred up by an adulterous passion, assassinated Hans von Hutten, his equerry, and the head of the Hutten family; and Ulrich then stepped forth as the avenger of the family, and depicted in a number of satirical pamphlets the duke as a monster of a tyrant. The satires were good. The educated world became attentive; and as the books contained numerous social and political allusions, all pointing in the direction of freedom and nationality, the author became at once very popular. The great aim of Hutten's life was to free Germany from the yoke under which it was held by Rome, by the Pope and the curia; and for this cause he wrote and fought with great valor. The Epistole obscurorum virorum are, at least in part, his work. His Römische Dreifaltigkeit (1519) contains a more direct attack. At the diet of Augsburg (1518) and the crowning of Charles V. (1520) he spoke openly of a union between the German princes against the Pope. But the motive-power in this plan was political and social, rather than religious. Though often working in unison with the Reformers, Ulrich von Hutten was not a Reformer himself: he was only a humorist and a knight-errant. When it proved impossible to bring about such a union between the German princes against the Pope, he formed an idea of uniting the German nobility and free cities against the princes, calculating that the emperor hardly would oppose such a movement with any great vigor. He joined Franz von Sickingen, and the latter began a feud against the elector of Treves. But the undertaking miscarried completely. Hutten fled to Switzerland, suffering frightfully from a disease he had contracted in his early youth. Erasmus refused to see him. The magistrates of Zurich forbade him the city. Only by Zwingli's mediation he was allowed to go and die in peace in the house of an evangelical minister.

HUTTER, Leonhard, b. at Nellingen, near Ulm, in January, 1563; d. at Wittenberg, Oct. 23, 1616; studied philology, philosophy, and afterwards theology, at Strassburg, 1581-91; visited also the universities of Leipzig, Heidelberg, and Jena, and was in 1596 appointed professor of theology at Wittenberg. He was a typical representative of Lutheran orthodoxy in its older form, before its scholastic development, while it still confined itself to reproduction and polemics; and his Compendium locorum theologicorum (1610), written at the instance of the Elector Christian II. of Saxony, and destined to supersede the Loci of Melancthon, ran through many editions, and was translated into German and Swedish. It has recently been republished by Twesten (Berlin, 1855 and 1863), and brought into fresh attention by Hase's Hutterus redivivus. The Loci communes theologici, published after Hutter's death (1619), is simply a further elaboration of the Compendium. No less distinction he gained as a polemist, chiefly directing his attacks against the Calvinists: Calvinista aulico-politicus, 1610; Calvinista aulico-politicus alter, 1614; Concordia concors, 1614; Irenicum, 1614; etc. A Life of him, and a complete list of his Works by Ambros. HYDE, Thomas, Orientalist; b. at Billingsley, Yorkshire, Eng., June 29, 1636; d. at Oxford, Jan. 18, 1703. His taste for languages was so carefully nurtured by his father, that he made extraordinary progress, as is evinced by his assisting Walton upon his Polyglot when only seventeen years old. He became successively Hebrew reader at Oxford (1658), under-keeper of the Bodleian Library (1659), prebendary of Salisbury (1660), principal Bodleian librarian (1665-1701), archdeacon of Gloucester (1678), doctor of divinity (1682), Laudian Professor of Arabic (1691), Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church (1697). He was a master of Turkish, Arabic, Syriac, Persian, Hebrew, and Malay; he even studied Chinese. His principal work is Historia religionis veterum Persarum eorumque Magorum, Oxford, 1700, reprinted by Hunt and Costard, 1760. His miscellanies (Latin) under the title Syntagma dissertationum quas olim . . . T. Hyde sep. edidit appeared in 2 vols., Oxford, 1767, with a Life of Hyde prefixed.

HYGINUS was, according to Irenæus, the successor of Telesphorus, and reigned, according to Jaffé, from 139 to 142,—the eighth or ninth pope. The martyrologies give the 10th or 11th January as the date of his death. During his reign, the gnostics Cerdon, Valentine, and Marcion, appeared in Rome. See MURATORI: Rec. Ital. Ser. iii.; JAFFÉ: Reg. Pont. Rom., p. 3; Act. Sanct., Jan. 11.

HYLÉ (ὕλη), in the dualistic systems of religion, the realm of darkness, the principle of evil, the lower element of existence, matter. See GNOSTICISM and MANICHEANS.

HYLOZOISM (ὕλη, "matter," and ζῶη, "life"), the doctrine of the eternity of matter, and also that special tenet of materialistic philosophy which defines life as a spontaneous evolution of matter.

HYMNOLOGY. Definition.—A hymn is a spiritual meditation in rhythmical prose or verse. Its chief constituents are praise and prayer to God. The definition of Augustine is too narrow for our modern conception, when he says a "hymn must contain praise, must praise God, and be sung" (oportet, ut sit hymnus, habeat hæc tria, laudem et Dei et canticum: Ps. lxxii.). On the other hand, the definition of the Greek and Latin churches is too comprehensive when it includes praises to saints among hymns. The writers of the New Testament use three terms (Eph. v. 19, etc.) for Christian songs,—psalm (ψαλμὸς), hymn (ὕμνος), and spiritual ode (ὠδὴ πνευματικὴ). The word "hymn" was a common one among the Greeks, who with the Romans sang songs to their divinities and in honor of famous men. Such "hymns" are found in the poems of Homer, and Hesiod begins his Works and Days by invoking the Muses to sing "hymns" to Zeus, and speaks of them in his Theogony as singing "hymns to all the gods." Pindar expressly calls his odes "hymns." Paul, in his sermon on Mars Hill, quotes the words (Acts xvii. 28), "For we are his offspring," from a "hymn" of Aratus of Cilicia (third century B.C.). The Christian hymns differ from the hymns of heathen antiquity in their spirit and the object of worship, but not necessarily in form. It is addressed to God, or one of the three persons in the Trinity, and admits nothing unchaste. It is the communion of the soul with God.

Hymns have from the earliest times entered as an important element into the services of the sanctuary, and have contributed at all periods to the piety of the Church. At the creation "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy" (Job xxxviii. 7). Heaven itself is choral with anthems; and the angelic host sings, "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory" (Isa. vi. 3). The best periods of Hebrew history were vocal with sacred song: and the fresh fervor of the early Christians found vent in singing. From the sixth century to this day, in the Greek and Latin churches, with some recent exceptions, the singing of hymns in the church has been restricted to the choir and clergy. The Flagellants of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries on the Continent (hymnos in latina vel vulgari lingua, "they sung hymns in the Latin or vulgar tongue," Summa hist., Antoninus Florentinus (d. 1450), and others), the Lollards of the fourteenth in England, and also the Hussites of Bohemia in the fifteenth, revived the use of sacred songs amongst the people. The Protestant Reformation, under the lead of Luther, himself a devoted singer and vigorous hymnist, vindicated the right of the people to the use of hymns, and again identified congregational song with the exercises of worship. The second Reformation in England in the last century was marked by great fertility in the production of hymns, in which the members of the Establishment (Toplady, Newton, etc.) vied with the leaders of the Methodist movement. Hymns, as Bishop Nicetius of Treves (c. 563) said (De Psalmodie bono), "have consoled the sad, checked the joyful, subdued the enraged, refreshed the poor." They have been on the tongues of believers in the first ardor of their faith, and have ascended as the last fervid utterances of martyrs at the stake, from Polycarp (Martyr. Polyc., § 14) to Hus, and Jerome of Prague, and are chanted by the church triumphant in the presence of the Redeemer (Rev. v. 9, xiv. 3, etc.). They are the common heritage of all believers, and bind together all ages. In them denominational distinctions are lost sight of; and it is made plain that Christian faith, hope, and love exist, in their purity, in all communions of the Church. The hymns of Ambrose, and John of Damascus, Luther and Tersteegen, Wesley and Toplady, Muhlenberg and John Henry Newman, stand side by side in our hymn-books, and are consentient in praise to the one God, and love for the one Saviour.

Hebrew Hymns. — From very early times the Hebrews sang hymns commemorating the might and excellency of Jehovah. The songs of Miriam (Exod. xv. 21), Moses (Exod. xv. 1-19; Deut. xxxii. 1-43), Deborah (Judg. v. 1 sqq.), and Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1-9), are sacred hymns, full of sublime imagery, and inflamed with a fervid devotion to Jehovah. The Book of Psalms is the oldest hymn-book in existence. Although sung by the shepherd of Bethlehem and other Psalmists, many centuries before Christ, it has been in all ages of the Christian Church, and continues to be, a fresh and living fountain of devotion and praise. Even in captivity the Hebrew people did not forget to sing, but mingled praises with their laments, although it was hard to sing "the Lord's song in a strange land" (Ps. cxxxvii. 4). The Psalms were sung to musical accompaniment (1 Chron. vi. 31; 2 Chron. xx. 21, etc.). Under David, and subsequently, the Jews had organized choirs; and there returned with Zerubabel more than two hundred "singing-men and singing-women" (Ez. ii. 65; Neh. vii. 67). See art. PSALMS.

Early Christian Hymns. — At the threshold of the Christian dispensation we have the sublime songs of Mary, called the Magnificat, from the first word of the Latin translation (Luke i. 46-55); of Zacharias, called the Benedictus, likewise from the Latin translation of the first word "blessed" (Luke i. 68-79); of the angels, called the Gloria in Excelsis, "Glory in the highest" (Luke ii. 18); and of Simon, called the Nunc Dimittis, "Now lettest" (Luke ii. 29-32). Other portions of the New Testament have so much the form of hymns as to give the impression that they are actually fragments of hymns (Acts iv. 24-30; Eph. v. 14; 1 Tim. iii. 16, vi. 16; Jas. i.

17; Rev. xv. 3, etc.). The Saviour, at the conclusion of the last passover, sang a hymn (a part of the Hallel, Ps. cxv.-cxviii.) with his disciples (Matt. xxvi. 30). The early Christians used hymns as a means of edification (1 Cor. xiv. 26; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16), and interrupted the monotony, and checked the depression, of imprisonment by alternating prayer with song (Acts xvi. 25). It seems probable that the hymn in the public assembly was, like the prophecy and the discourse, sometimes the spontaneous product of the moment (1 Cor. xiv. 26).

There is evidence from heathen as well as Christian sources, that singing formed an important part of the Christian services in the post-apostolic age. Early in the second century, Pliny writes to Trajan that the Christians were in the habit of meeting before daylight, and of singing songs to Christ as God among themselves alternately (statu die ante lucem convenire carmenque Christo quasi Deo dicere secum invicem). Lord Selborne finds in the last words a reference to responsive singing. None of the hymns of the second century have been preserved. The hymn Light of Gladness, Beam Divine (φῶς ἱεραρόν), which is still sung in the Greek Church, has been attributed to Athenagenes (d. 169), but without sufficient reason. Basil (d. 379) refers to it as an ancient composition, but denies that Athenagenes was the author. The oldest Christian hymn in existence is Shepherd of Tender Youth (σὸμῶν πώλων), which Dr. Schaff, in Christ in Song, p. 547, characterizes as a "sublime but somewhat turgid song of praise to Christ." It is a free transfusion of a hymn of Clement of Alexandria, composed about the year 200. After the third century, it is convenient to distinguish between the hymnody of the Eastern and Latin churches.

Hymns of the Eastern Church. — So general and popular was the custom of singing hymns in the third century, that one of the charges put forth by the second council of Antioch (269), in its letter to the Bishops of Rome and Alexandria against Paul of Samosata, was that he had put a stop to it. In the fourth century, according to Theodoret (H. E., ii. 24), antiphonal singing was introduced into Constantinople, which in this respect followed the lead of the church of Antioch. While Chrysostom (d. 407) was archbishop of Constantinople, the Trinitarian party was accustomed to gather in the open spaces of the city, and marched in midnight processions, singing sacred music as an effective means of defeating the Arians, who had hymns of their own. According to Cardinal Pitra, the number of Greek hymns is very large; and, if those that have been published were collected, they would fill fifteen or twenty volumes, while the number that exist only in manuscripts is equally large.

Ephraem Syrus (d. about 378) is the father of Christian hymnody in the Syrian Church. He wrote in Syriac, and seems to have gotten the impulse to write hymns from the religious songs of the Gnostic poet, Bardesanes. He was a fertile writer. Theodoret speaks of Ephraem's hymns as sweet, and contributing much to the solemnity of festal occasions in his day. They commemorated some of the great facts in the Saviour's life from the nativity to the ascension, — the deaths of pious persons and the lives of martyrs.

Gregory Nazianzen (d. 390) and Anatolius (d. 458) are the two greatest hymn-writers of the period of formation (as Dr. Neale calls it) in Greek sacred poetry. From the latter we have the solemn hymn in three stanzas, beginning Fierce was the wild billow (Ζοφερὰς τρικυμίας). The best hymns of the Eastern Church were produced in the next period, which Dr. Neale dates from 726 to 820. Among its hymn-writers were Romanus (d. about 720), to whom Cardinal Pitra ascribes twenty-five hymns, which excel in originality and vigor of expression; Cosmas (d. 780), surnamed the "Melodist;" John of Damascus (d. before 787), the great theologian of the Eastern Church, whose Tis the Day of Resurrection (ἡσπάρσεως ἡμέρα) has passed into many English hymn-books; and Stephen of St. Sabas (d. 794), a convent in Palestine, near the Dead Sea, whose Art thou weary, art thou languid (κόπον τε καὶ κάματον) is the most simple and restful lyric in any language upon the words of Christ, "Come unto me. all ye that labor," etc. Still later than these are three other writers, whose names have made the convent of the Studium in Constantinople famous for all time. Theodore of the Studium (d. 826) and Joseph (d. about 830) are the most voluminous of all the Greek hymnists. A good specimen of the hymns of Theodore is the judgment-hymn, That Fearful Day, that Day of Dread (τὴν ἡμέραν τὴν φοβερὴν), and of Joseph, the hymn to Christ, Jesus, Lord of Life Eternal (Ἰησοῦς ὁ ζωοδότης). The third, Theoctistus of the Studium (d. about 890), is best known by the hymn, Jesu, Name all Names above (Ἰησοῦ γλυκίστατε).

Hymns of the Latin Church.—The founders of Latin hymnology were Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers (d. 366), and Ambrose, Bishop of Milan (d. 397). Hilary was banished from Gaul to Asia Minor on account of his energetic advocacy of Trinitarian doctrines. He came into close contact with the Eastern Church, and on his return to his diocese was fitted to make the Book of Hymns, of which Jerome (d. 420) speaks. Daniel gives six hymns under his name, but it is doubtful whether a single one by him is in our possession. In the church at Milan, of which Ambrose was bishop, the singing of hymns was very popular. Augustine, speaking of the church music in that city, exclaims, "How have I wept at thy [Ambrose] hymns and canticles, bitterly moved by the voices sweetly resounding through thy church! Those strains flowed into my ears, and the truth distilled in my heart. My feelings of piety were enkindled, and tears fell from my eyes," etc. Ninety hymns are attributed to the Ambrosian school. At least twelve of these are by Ambrose himself. They combine vigor with simplicity, and tersely render the great facts and doctrines of Christianity. Good specimens are, Redeemer of all Nations, come (Veni, Redemptor), and Maker of all Things, Glorious God (Deus Creator).

Hymn-writing also flourished in Spain in the fifth century; and some of the finest Latin hymns are by Prudentius, a Spanish layman, who died in 405. His hymns, about fifteen in number, are taken from larger poems, and, according to Lord Selborne, are "full of fervor and sweetness." That on the birth of Christ, Bethlehem of Noblest Cities (O sola magnarum urbium) is one of the most finished and chaste on that event; and the hymn on the martyrs of Bethlehem, Hail, Infant Martyrs (Salvete flores martyrum), is justly admired. Sedulius, a native of Scotland or Ireland, of the fifth century, also wrote some fine hymns.

Gregory, Bishop of Rome (d. 604), and Fortunatus, Bishop of Poitiers (d. 609), mark the transition to the mediæval period of Latin hymnody. The Ambrosian music, which had held undisputed sway for two centuries, was supplanted by the Gregorian. The recitative was introduced, and public song in the church restricted to the choir of priests, the congregation being limited to the responses. The two best hymns of Fortunatus are, The Royal Banner is unfurled (Vexilla Regis), and Sing, my Tongue, the Saviour's Battle (Pange, lingua).

The hymns of the middle ages have their own peculiar characteristics. The joyful, jubilant tone of the Ambrosian and Prudentian hymns is no longer so prominent: they are set in the key of mystic fervor. Begotten in the cloister, they ring with the soft and subdued but ardent tones of contemplative devotion. The singers linger near the cross, and gaze upon the suffering agonies of its scenes, rather than breathe the clear air of the resurrection morning, or celebrate the triumphant exaltation and reign of Christ. Some of these hymns were by the most subtle theologians and devout saints, and, with some of the great theological ideas of Anselm, are the most precious legacies of the mediæval Church. Some of them have never been surpassed.

Amongst others we pass by, with simple mention, the Venerable Bede, the monk of Yarrow (d. 735), who was not only the father of English learning, but the first English hymn-writer; and Notker of St. Gall (d. 912), who was led by the sound of a mill-wheel to compose a new kind of hymns known as "sequences." One of the sweetest hymns of this period is ascribed to Robert, king of France (d. 1031), and has been appropriated by all hymn-books,—Come, Holy Ghost, in Love (Veni, Sancte Spiritus). Adam of St. Victor (d. 1172), whom Archbishop Trenchard and Dr. Neale agree in pronouncing "the greatest of mediæval poets," made the monastery of St. Victor, just outside the city of Paris, no less famous by his hymns, than his teacher, Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1135), had done by his writings, which founded the mysticism of mediæval France. In the judgment of Dr. Neale, his best hymn is Be the Cross our Theme and Story (Laudes crucis). Two other mediæval convents will always be associated with church hymnody. Clairvaux, through Bernard (d. 1153), the greatest man of his age, and one of the purest saints of any age, gave to the Church the hymn Hail, thou Head, so bruised and wounded (Salve, Caput cruentatum), and a poem of two hundred lines, from which have been taken the three hymns,—Jesus, the very Thought of thee (Jesu, dulcis memoria), Jesus, thou Joy of Loving Hearts (Jesu, dulcedo cordium), and

O Jesus, King most Wonderful (Jesu, rex admirabilis). Cluny, through another Bernard, gave to the Church a long poem of three thousand lines, from which have been extracted several hymns breathing an ardent longing for the heavenly country, of which Jerusalem, the Golden (Urbs Syon aurea) is the most familiar.

The grandest hymn of the middle ages, and perhaps of all ages, is the Dies Irae of Thomas of Celano (d. about 1250), the friend and biographer of Francis d'Assisi. It has never been equalled as a sublime and reverential description of the awe and terror of the last judgment, and has exercised the skill of many translators. Walter Scott, without translating the letter, has preserved the spirit, of the original in the three verses beginning,—

“That day of wrath, that dreadful day,
When heaven and earth shall pass away!”

Dr. Schaff says (Christ in Song, p. 290), “This marvellous hymn is the acknowledged masterpiece of Latin poetry, and the most sublime of all uninspired hymns. It is one of those rare productions which can never die, but which increase in value as the ages advance. The secret of its irresistible power lies in the awful grandeur of the theme, the intense earnestness and pathos of the poet, the simple majesty and solemn music of its language,” etc. If the Dies Irae exceeds all other hymns in grandeur, then another hymn of the middle ages—the Stabat Mater (“At the Cross her station keeping”) of Jacopone da Todi, or Jacobus de Benedictis (d. 1306)—stands unapproached for pathos. Its deep tone of sorrow charms the ear, and melts the heart, in spite of its Mariolatry. Among other hymn-writers of the middle ages the greatest are Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) and Bonaventura (d. 1274). To the former belong four sacramental hymns,—Sing, my Tongue, the Mystery telling (Pange, lingua gloriosi), etc.; to the latter, Jesus, thy Holy Cross and Dying (Recordare sanctæ crucis). To this class of hymns, though later in time, belong the hymns of Francis Xavier (d. 1552), the famous missionary to China (Jesus, I love thee, not because), and of Saint Theresa (d. 1582); and in general it may be said that the best hymns of the Roman-Catholic Church since, like those of Madame Guyon, the Lead, Kindly Light of John Henry Newman, and the hymns of Faber, are set in the key of mediæval hymnody.

German Hymns.—Germany possesses not only a more voluminous but a richer hymnology than any other country. In 1786 Ludwig von Hardenberg prepared a list of 72,732 German hymns, arranged in alphabetical order. The number now cannot be far from a hundred thousand; and among these are many of the choicest pieces of religious poetry, overflowing with devotion, and praise to the Redeemer. The introduction of hymns and congregational singing into the public services was one of the first results of the Reformation in Germany, and that country had a fine supply of hymns long before any were composed in English.

The father of German hymnody, as of German church music, was Martin Luther (d. 1546). Among the works of Hus (d. 1415) which the Bohemian Brethren sent to Luther were that martyr's hymns; and he subsequently made a free translation of Hus's Jesus Christus, nostra Salus. In 1523 Luther published eight hymns of his own, which had increased to a hundred and twenty-five in 1545. These hymns were carried by travelling singers from village to village, and sung into the hearts of the German people. Coleridge's statement was exaggerated, namely that “Luther did as much for the Reformation by his hymns as by his translation of the Bible;” but his hymns were effective agencies for spreading the Reformation. The Roman-Catholic theologian Conzenius (1620) wrote that the “hymns of Luther have destroyed more souls than his writings and sermons.”

Luther's hymns were joyful and confident outbursts of a manly and unwavering trust in God. His whole personality breathes through Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott, translated by Carlyle “A safe Stronghold our God is still.” It was the triumphant trumpet-blast of the Reformation, and bade defiance to satanic and human foes. It is as much the great popular song of the German nation as Luther himself is the hero and typical representative of German life. His other hymns are pregnant with Christian thought and joyfulness; as, Nun freut euch, liebe Christeng'mein (“Dear Christian people, now rejoice”). Luther had co-laborers in this field. Among these were Justus Jonas, Eber, and Michael Weiss (d. 1540). The latter, in 1531, edited German translations of the hymns of the Bohemian Brethren, to which he added some of his own.

The Lutheran Church was not only in advance of the Reformed Church of Germany in the department of hymnody, but its contributions have continued to be much the more numerous. The best hymn-writer of the sixteenth century was Philip Nicolai (d. 1608), a pious preacher. During a violent pestilence in 1597, he wrote one of the grandest and also one of the sweetest hymns in the German or any other language, Wachet auf! ruft uns die Stimme (“Wake! the startling watchery pealeth”), and Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern (“How lovely shines the Morning Star!”).—two hymns which rise up side by side like twin peaks. The period of the Thirty-years' War (1618–48) was fruitful in fine hymns, among which are the battle-song of Gustav Adolph (d. 1632), before the fatal day of Lützen, Verzage nicht, du Häuflein klein (“Fear not, O little flock, the foe”), and the very rugged thanksgiving hymn of Rink-art (d. 1649), which is so popular in Germany, Nun danket alle Gott ("Now thank we all our God"), and has been called the national Te Deum. Among the most fertile hymn-writers of this period was Johann Heermann (d. 1647), a pastor who hardly knew what it was to have a day free from pain, and whose hymns are the products of a rich Christian experience. The hymns of Scheffler (d. 1677), better known as Angelus Silesius, from his native province, Silesia, are full of pathos, and devotion to the Master, which his transition to the Catholic Church (in 1661) did not change. One of his sweetest hymns is Ich will dich lieben, meine Stärke ("Thee will I love, my Strength, my Tower").

German hymnology reached its culminating point in Paul Gerhardt, a Lutheran pastor (d. 1676). Knapp calls him "beyond dispute, the first of German church poets." More than thirty of his hundred and twenty-three hymns are classical. Among his finest are O Haupt voll Blut u. Wunden ("O sacred Head now wounded"), Wie soll ich dich empfangen ("Oh! how shall I receive Thee"), and Befiehl du deine Wege ("Give the winds thy fears"); but it is difficult to make a selection where so many are so uniformly excellent.

The first hymn-writer of the Reformed Church was Joachim Neander (d. 1680), who died, as pastor in Bremen, at the early age of thirty. He came under the influence of Spener. His hymns are "full of spiritual depth and unction." His Lobe den Herren den mächtigen König der Ehren ("Praise to Jehovah! the Almighty King of Creation") is a jubilant song of thanksgiving, and one of the most popular in Germany. The school of Pietists, of the latter part of this and the beginning of the eighteenth century, was fertile in the production of hymns: Spener (d. 1705), Franke (1727), and Freylinghausen (d. 1739) were the most prominent. Schmolke (d. 1737), a pastor in Silesia, was a copious author of hymns. They are pervaded with Christian warmth and devotion, and some of them are of perpetual value. His Mein Jesu wie du willst has passed into many English collections in the translation, "My Jesus, as Thou wilt." One of the most voluminous writers of hymns in this century was Hiller (d. 1769), a pastor in Wurtemberg. Albert Knapp, who gives twice as many (two hundred and sixty-four) of his hymns as of any other author, speaks with enthusiasm of the powerful influence which they have exercised upon the spiritual life of Southern Germany.

Allied in devotional, almost mystical fervor, are the hymns of Count Zinzendorf (d. 1760) and Tersteegen (d. 1769.) The former was the founder of the Moravian community at Herrnhut, and produced many fine hymns, two hundred and five of which have passed into the Moravian hymn-book in the English language. Wesley translated and freely transfused some of them. Christi Blut und Gerechtigkeit ("Jesus, thy Blood and Righteousness") is a good example of his style. Tersteegen was a layman in the Reformed Church, and published a hundred and eleven hymns, some of which are very fine and very popular. Gott ist gegenwärtig, lasset uns anbeten ("Lo, God is here, let us adore"), is one of the best. Novalis, whose real name was Hardenberg, died prematurely, at the age of twenty-nine (1801), but left behind him some glowing hymns, of which the best are Ich sage jedem dass er lebt ("I say to all men far and near"), and Wenn ich ihn nur habe ("If I only have Thee"). Lavater, who died the same year, also left behind some excellent hymns, of which Jesus Christ, wachst du in mir ("Jesus Christ, grow thou in me"), is much sung.

The early part of the present century witnessed a great revival of interest in church hymnody in Germany. It was led by Schleiermacher, Claus Harns, Arndt (v. Wort u. Kirchenlied, 1819), and others, and was contemporary with, if not a product of, the great national Luther tri-centennial of 1817. The hymns of the old writers had been subjected to ruthless treatment at the hands of the rationalists and literati of the eighteenth century. Even such a man as Schlegel felt justified, in order to avoid the elision, to alter the first line of Luther's great hymn to "Ein starker Schutz." This movement was inaugurated by Justus Gesenius in his hymnological collection (1647). The better taste of the early part of the present century demanded the restoration of hymns to their original form. In this direction Bunsen, Stier, Daniel, Knapp, and others did good service by their hymnological collections.

Many fine hymns have been added during the present century to the already rich and well-filled stores of Germany. Arndt (d. 1860), Friedrich Rückert (d. 1867), Meta Heusser (d. 1876), a Swiss poetess, and others, have made their offerings. But the two most copious contributors have been Spitta (d. 1859) and Albert Knapp (d. 1864). The former's Psalter und Harfe ("Psalter and Harp"), a collection of sacred lyrics, had a very wide circulation, and contains some very fine hymns. One of his best is Alles schwindet; Herzen brechen ("All is dying, hearts are breaking"). One of the best of Knapp's is Eines wünsch ich mir vor allem andern ("More than all, one thing my heart is craving"). The first living hymnist of Germany is Prälat Karl Gerok, formerly court-preacher to the king of Wurtemberg, and author of some choice collections of sacred lyrics.

French Hymns. — Calvin, like Luther, advocated congregational singing; and quite recently a hymn by him was found in an old Genevese prayer-book. It was printed in 1868. The opening line is Je Te salue, mon certain Rédempteur ("I greet Thee, who my sure Redeemer art.") See Christ in Song, p. 549. While Calvin was at Strassburg he came into possession of some of Clement Marot's versions of the Psalms without knowing they were his, and had them set to music. These with five original versions of Ps. xxv., xxxvi., xlvii., xli., cxxxviii., the Apostles' Creed, and the Song of Simeon, and the Decalogue in verse (by his own hand), he published at Strassburg, 1539, under the title Aulcuns Pseaumes et Cantiques mys en chant. This book, consisting of twenty-one pieces, with the tune at the beginning of each psalm, but without preface or the name of the author, was the first collection of psalms in the French Reformed Church. Marot (d. at Turin, 1544) in 1541 received permission to publish the Trente Psaumes ("Thirty Psalms"), which appeared the following year with a dedication to Charles V. In 1543 he published Cinquante Psaumes ("Fifty Psalms"). After Marot's death, Beza added translations of other psalms; but it was not till 1562 that a complete collection of the whole Psalter appeared. Marot's versions are felicitous, and with few changes continue to be sung to the present day in the French churches. Claude Goudimel set them to music.

The hymnology of the French churches is meagre. To César Malan (d. 1864), according to Vinet, belongs the honor of restoring the hymn to them. In connection with Bost (d. 1874) he published in 1824 a collection of French hymns, under the title Chants de Sion, which appeared in an improved form in 1841, under the title Chants Chrétiens. Malan wrote more than a thousand hymns. The hymn for the dying, Non, ce n'est pas mourir ("No, no, it is not dying"), is familiar to English ears. The Chants chrétiens has incorporated some fine hymns and psalms from Roman-Catholic writers, as Bishop Godeau (d. 1672), who published a collection of elegant translations of the Psalms (Les psaumes de David traduits en vers français), Corneille (d. 1684), Racine (d. 1699), Madame Guyon (d. 1717), and others. Madame Guyon's hymns are distinguished by graceful composition and devotional fervor. A number of them were translated by Cowper, who could fully sympathize with the mystical temper of their author, and some are found in English hymn-books.

HYMNOLOGY, English and American. Notwithstanding the great antiquity of religious poetry, English hymnology is one of the latest fruits of the English mind. A hymn is defined in the dictionaries to be a sacred lyric, or a song of praise to God; but this would include psalms, which are now distinguished from hymns proper. The word "psalm" does not differ materially in its etymological signification from the word "hymn," each meaning "a sacred song or hymn." But by a psalm we now mean, either one of the Psalms of David, or a version of one; while a Christian hymn is a song of praise to God, generally based upon some thought or form of words found in the Bible. The propriety of using in Christian worship any metrical compositions except versions of the Psalms of David, was not readily conceded by our conservative forefathers; and a century, almost, had elapsed after the Reformation before hymns were looked upon with favor.

By far the greatest portion of the most ancient English literature was founded upon the Bible, and at a very early date large portions of the Scriptures were put into a metrical form. There is no evidence that these compositions were intended to be used in worship; though as late as the reign of Edward VI. it was contended that all Scripture should be versified and sung; and the first fourteen chapters of the Acts of the Apostles were actually so used in the royal chapel, and the Books of Genesis and Kings were done into metre with a like intent.

In the same reign a zealous reformer, Thomas Sternhold, who had been groom of the robes to Henry VIII., and held the same office under Edward, "became so scandalized at the amorous and obscene songs used in the court, that he, forsooth, turned into English metre fifty-one of David's Psalms, and caused musical notes to be set to them, thinking thereby that the courtiers would sing them, instead of their sonnets; but they did not, only some few excepted" (WOOD: Athene Oxonienses).

This was the beginning of the version of the Psalms still known under the names of Sternhold and Hopkins. The first edition (1548 or 1549) comprised but nineteen psalms; but others were added in successive editions, until in 1562 all the Psalms had been translated, and annexed to the prayer-book.

The year after this publication, Sir Philip Sidney was born. His name is associated with a metrical version of the Psalms made in connection with his sister, the Countess of Pembroke; but it remained in manuscript until the present century. The version of Sternhold and Hopkins stood the test of use for nearly a hundred years; but, at about the middle of the seventeenth century, complaint was made of its "obsolescence;" and in 1646 there appeared a new version, printed under authority of the House of Commons, by Francis Rons, a member of Parliament, who afterwards became one of Cromwell's privy council, and was privileged to sit in the Westminster Assembly among the few laymen there.

A half-century later the version of Tate and Brady appeared. In the mean time a number of singers had enriched the religious literature of our tongue. Herbert and Vaughan, Southwell and Milton, Jeremy Taylor, and Richard Baxter, all wrote elevating poetry, which has not yet lost its power to lift up the spiritual mind; but their productions can hardly be called hymns. In 1683 John Mason, grandfather of the author of the Treatise on Self-knowledge, published thirty-three Songs of Praise, which obtained some popularity, and were, perhaps, the first hymns actually used in public worship. That none of these writers had succeeded in firmly establishing this use of hymns is evident from the fact, that, when Isaac Watts presented his hymns to the public, he entered into a long prefatory argument, as a "bold and determined innovator," in favor of the right to found hymns on "any portion" of Scripture. The practice of doing this was, however, an ancient one. The old Latin and Greek hymns, largely produced during the so-called "dark ages," have of late come back into use, to the great enrichment of our collections; and they, we know, were used in public worship. Still, so strong was the attachment of the people to psalmody, that they were unwilling to countenance the use of words, though expressing scriptural thoughts and aspirations, which were not also simple versions of the psalms used in the service of the Jewish temple.

To Watts — the orthodox dissenter, though overflowing with Christian love for members of all denominations — it was given substantially to create English hymnology. Bishop Ken had preceded him, and had fixed his Doxology in English hymn-books forever; the persecuted Romanist, John Austin, had given the church the hymn, Hark, my Soul, how Every thing; Joseph Addison had written, The Spacious Firmament on high, and other hymns now found in our hymnals; and John Byron had written his then unpublished hymns: but none of these had made any determined attempt to supersede the Psalter. English hymnology may, therefore, be said to have begun in the year 1707, when Isaac Watts published his first hymns, — hymns that were so much superior to all that had gone before them as to force their way into acceptance, and to live to the present day among those most loved and most often used.

Watts was followed by imitators, many of whom produced hymns that are still found in all collections. Among these were Simon Browne, who wrote Come, Holy Spirit, Heavenly Dove; Thomas Gibbons, author of Now let our Souls, on Wings sublime; Benjamin Beddome, who wrote Did Christ o'er Sinners weep? John Fawcett, author of Blest be the Tie that binds; Thomas Haweis, author of From the Cross uplifted high; Thomas Stennett, who wrote Majestic Sweetness sits Enthroned; Thomas Scott, author of Angels, roll the Rock away, and others.

Before the peaceful life of Dr. Watts had closed, the next great leader in English hymnology had arisen. He was an outgrowth of the stirring scenes in the midst of which grew up the Wesleyan body. There had been meetings at Oxford in 1729, meetings in Savannah (Ga.) in 1736, and in 1739 the formation of the United Society of Methodists. There had been spiritual struggles, opposition to the apathy that the members of the new reform saw in the Established Church, protests against the want of enthusiasm in religious life which marked the times; and the new hymnology reflected all of it. A body of Christians so enthusiastic as the early Methodists could not live without the service of song, and they needed more stirring lyrics than those of Watts and his school. The demand insured the supply. All of the Wesleys were able to give metrical utterance to feeling; but the singer among them was Charles, who produced seven thousand hymns.

The first were published in 1739, and the last after the writer's death. They illustrate his experience, and for that reason appeal to all hearts. The hymn Glory to God, and Praise and Love (usually beginning "Oh for a thousand tongues to sing") was written in commemoration of Wesley's "witness of adoption," which occurred, he states, on Whitsunday, May 21, 1737. Among Charles Wesley's hymns are, Come, Thou Almighty King: Hark, How all the Welkin rings! Thou God of Glorious Majesty (usually beginning "Lo, on a narrow neck of land"); Love Divine all Love excelling; Blow ye the Trumpet, blow; and Jesus, Lover of my Soul.

Wesley was followed by Thomas Olivers, author of The God of Abraham praise; John Cennick, who wrote Children of the Heavenly King; Augustus Montague Toplady, the doctrinal opponent, though the poetical child, of Wesley, who wrote A Living and Dying Prayer for the Holiest Believer in the World (which begins "Rock of Ages, cleave for me"), and Your Harps, ye Trembling Saints.

Among the hymn-writers who followed, before the present century, were William Hammond (Awake, and sing the Song of Moses and the Lamb), Joseph Hart (Come, ye Sinners, Poor and Wretched), William Cowper (What Various Hindrances we meet), Samuel Medley (Mortals, awake, with Angels join), William Williams (Guide me, O thou Great Jehovah), John Ryland (Sovereign Ruler of the Skies), Joseph Griggs (Behold! a Stranger's at the Door), Edward Perronet (All hail the Power of Jesus' Name), Robert Seagrave (Rise, my Soul, and stretch thy Wings), and Robert Robinson (Come, thou Fount of every Blessing). Philip Doddridge was one of the most successful hymn-writers of the period. He was a warm friend of Dr. Watts, though much his junior. He wrote nearly four hundred hymns, among which were To-morrow, Lord, is Thine; Do not I love thee, O my Lord? Ye Servants of the Lord; Hark! the Glad Sound, the Saviour comes; Grace, 'tis a Charming Sound: and Awake, my Soul, stretch every Nerve.

Two women who lived in the latter half of the last century — Mrs. Barbauld and Anne Steele — mark the beginning of the line of hymn-writers of the gentler sex that has so greatly enriched English hymnology during the present century. Mrs. Barbauld is known as a writer of considerable repute beyond her hymns, but Miss Steele was a hymn-writer only. She wrote from experience gained in a life of suffering and bereavement; and it has been said that no woman, and but few men, have written so many hymns that have had general acceptance in the Church. Of her productions (a hundred and forty-four in number) the following are familiar: Father, whate'er of Earthly Bliss; He lives, the Great Redeemer lives; Father of Mercies, in thy Word; and Far from these Narrow Scenes of Night. Among the hymns of Mrs. Barbauld are, Come, said Jesus' Sacred Voice; Praise to God, Immortal Praise; and How blest the Righteous when he dies!

To this period belongs Henry Kirke White, the youthful genius in whom Southey was so much interested. His When marshalled on the Nightly Plain, Oft in Danger, oft in Woe, and Through Sorrow's Night and Danger's Path, reflect his personal experience, and hold a prominent place in many hymn-books. The last to be mentioned in this period is John Newton, whose remarkable experience was much more phenomenal than that of White, and has left its mark on his hymns. Among his productions that are well known are, By Faith in Christ I walk with God; One there is above all Others; How Sweet the Name of Jesus sounds! Safely through another Week; Amazing Grace, how Sweet the Sound! Come, my Soul, thy Suit prepare; Approach, my Soul, the Mercy-seat; and Glorious Things of thee are spoken, Zion, City of our God. Few hymns are more explicitly records of experience (and the writer said plainly that they were such) than those of Newton.

English hymnology has been enriched during the present century from two chief sources besides natural growth. The so-called "Oxford" movement, and the contributions of writers belonging, like Edward Caswall, J. H. Newman, and Frederick W. Faber, to the Roman-Catholic communion, have both given us many hymns that are accepted by Christians of every name as true outpourings of the pious heart. John Keble, the poetical leader in the Oxford movement, published in 1827 the most extensively circulated book of religious poetry of modern times,—The Christian Year. J. H. Newman wrote, Lead, kindly Light. John Mason Neale, a practical philanthropist, as well as a scholar and a poet, opened to modern Christians the wealth of mediæval Greek and Latin hymnology, and enriched our collections with such translations as Fierce was the Wild Billow; The Royal Banners forward go; Safe Home, Safe Home, in Port; The World is very Evil; Jerusalem the golden; and a number of others that the Church will not willingly let die. We mention also Earl Nelson (O Wisdom, spreading mightily), Sir Henry Williams Baker (How Welcome was the Call), John S. B. Mousell (Birds have their Quiet Nest, Soon and Forever, such Promise our Trust), William Chatterton Dix (As with Gladness Men of Old), Francis Turner Palgrave (Star of Morn and Even), Dean Henry Alford (Saviour of them that trust in thee), Mrs. Cecil Frances Alexander (When wounded sore, the Stricken Soul), Christopher Wordsworth (O Day of Rest and Gladness).

The Moravian, James Montgomery, was one of the early hymn-writers of the century; and, though he was a poet of but mediocre talent, he has fixed his name in the collections by certain hymns, such as Songs of Praise the Angels sung; Go to Dark Gethsemane; Oh! where shall Rest be found? Hark! the Song of Jubilee; Forever with the Lord; and What are these in Bright Array? In spite of their want of poetic fire, these hymns have proved, as the author himself says, "acceptable vehicles of expression of the experience of his fellow-creatures during the pilgrimage of the Christian life."

There remain to be mentioned among the women of the present century Harriet Auber (Our Blessed Redeemer, ere he breathed his Last Farewell), Charlotte Elliott (Just as I am, without one Plea), Sarah Flower Adams (Nearer, my God, to thee), and Frances Ridley Havergal (I gave my Life for thee).

Reginald Heber, the saintly bishop of Calcutta (d. 1826), was author of Brightest and Best of the Sons of the Morning, By Cool Sileam's Shady Rill; Thou art gone to the Grave, but we will not deplore thee; and other hymns of merit. Later in the century the number of hymn-writers greatly increased. Among them were Henry Francis Lyte, who wrote Jesus, I my Cross have taken, and that almost faultless hymn, Abide with me, fast falls the Eventide. Sir John Bowring (1792-1872) was author of some of the best hymns of our day, among which are God is Love, his Mercy brightens; In the Cross of Christ I glory; and Watchman, tell us of the Night. Sir Robert Grant (1785-1838) wrote Oh! worship the King, all Glorious above; When Gathering Clouds around I view, and Saviour, when in Dust to Thee,—showing a deep spirituality that marked his character while he was involved in the responsibility of public affairs. Among the later writers of this century are Josiah Couder (1789-1855), a friend of Montgomery and Chalmers (The Lord is King, lift up thy Voice), James Edmeston, 1791-1867 (Saviour, breathe an Evening Blessing), a London architect, Thomas Toke Lynch, 1818-71 (Gracious Spirit, dwell with me), Joseph Anstice, 1808-36 (When came in Flesh the Incarnate Word), Horatius Bonar, b. 1808 (I heard the Voice of Jesus say), and Thomas Hornblower Gill, b. 1819 (Father, thine Elect who lovest). Of the last, Professor F. M. Bird, the hymnologist, has said that his hymns were destined to a long life, though they were scarcely less innovations at the time they appeared than those of Wesley were in 1739.

Hymnology has not developed in America as it has in England, chiefly, perhaps, because we have had the riches of the mother-country to make choice from, and needed only such lyrics as a few different circumstances rendered necessary; still, American poets have made considerable contributions to this department of letters. Timothy Dwight (1752-1817), president of Yale College from 1795 to 1800, wrote I love thy Kingdom, Lord, and other hymns that still live. James Waddell Alexander (1804-59) translated from the German of Gerhardt the hymn which the latter had derived from the Latin of St. Bernard, O Sacred Head, now wounded. Bishop George W. Doane (1799-1859) wrote Softly now the Light of Day. Bishop Henry Ustick Onderdonk (1789-1858) wrote The Spirit in our Hearts, and When, Lord, to this our Western Land. The saintly William Augustus Muhlenberg (1796-1877) wrote Like Noah's Weary Dove, and I would not live away. The poets, William Cullen Bryant (1794-1879), John Pierpont (1785-1866), and Phœbe Cary (1824-71) wrote respectively, Oh, deem not they are blest alone; The Winds are hushed, the Peaceful Moon; and One Sweetly Solemn Thought. Samuel Davies (1724-61) wrote at an earlier period, Lord, I am Thine, entirely Thine; and Edward Hamilton Sears (1810-76), Calm on the Listening Ear of Night, and It came upon the Midnight Clear, that Glorious Song of Old. Among the latest American hymn-writers are Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe, b. 1818 (Oh! where are Kings and Empires now?), Ray Palmer, b. 1808 (My Faith looks up to Thee), and Oliver Wendell Holmes, b. 1809, who wrote O Love Divine, that stooped to share, and Lord of all Being, throned afar.

The progress of English hymnology has been from rugged style and gross conceptions to elegance and strength of style, and spirituality of conception. The hymns of the present day are superior in almost every respect to those that satisfied our ancestors, though we cull from earlier compositions many a gem to adorn our books of sacred lyrics, and often sing their rugged psalms, and read their sacred poems, to arouse our sometimes dull spirituality. The best hymn-books of to-day unite the mediæval productions of the Greek and Latin Church with the hymns of Watts and Wesley, and the sweet expressions of the experience of a Lyte or a Muhlenburg. There has been a steady growth; but we cannot leave the past behind, with its rich experiences and consecrated expression of a living Christianity.

HYPATIA, b. in Alexandria, about the middle of the fourth century; a daughter of the philosopher and mathematician Théon; stood, in the beginning of the fifth century, as the recognized head of the Neo-Platonic school; attracted large audiences to her lectures in Athens and Alexandria by her learning and eloquence; and was generally beloved and esteemed in her native city on account of her beauty and virtue. One day she was assailed in the streets by a Christian mob, which dragged her from her chariot into a neighboring church, cut her into pieces by oyster-shells, and burnt her. According to Socrates (Hist. Eccl., vii. 15), the fury of the mob was due to the fanaticism of the Nitrian monks; according to Suidas, to the intrigues of Cyril. A Latin letter addressed to Cyril, and found in Baluze (Concil., i. 216), is ascribed to her; but it is spurious. Several letters, however, addressed to her by Synesius, once her disciple, and afterwards bishop of Ptolemais, are still extant. Traces of her life re-appear in the legend of St. Catharine, according to Mrs. JAMESON: Sacred and Legendary Art. She forms the subject of a kind of historical romance: Hyppatia, by CHARLES KINGSLEY, London, 1853.

HYPERIUS, Andreas Gerhard, b. at Ypres (whence Hyperius), May 16, 1511; d. at Marburg, Feb. 1, 1564; studied in Paris 1528-35; travelled in Germany; embraced the Reformation; visited England 1537-41; and was in 1542 appointed professor of theology at Marburg. He was a man of a mild and conciliatory temper,—a representative of that school of theology which endeavored to mediate between the different Protestant parties, and soften down the theological ire. On the formation of the evangelical theology he exercised a considerable influence. He is the father of homiletics; and his De formandis concionibus sacris (1553) and Topica theologica (1561) were extensively used, even by Roman-Catholic preachers. His exegetical works, partly published among his Opuscula (two collections, 1570 and 1580), and partly edited independently by I. Mylius (1582-84), are among the best productions of the kind which the time presented. His Methodus theologica remained unfinished. HYPOSTASIS (ὑπόστασις, substantia, or subsistentia), a term occurring in the Trinitarian controversies, and used in various dialectical combinations with οὐσία (essentia) and πρόσωπον (persona). The Council of Alexandria, however (362), finally defined hypostasis as synonymous with person.

HYPHISTARIANS, a religious sect living in Cappadocia in the fourth century. It was a singular mixture of Paganism and Judaism. It retained the worship of fire and light, but rejected all image-worship. It retained the Sabbath, the regulations of diet, etc., but rejected the circumcision. All we know of this sect is derived from Gregory Nazianzen (Orat., xviii. 5), who belonged to it before his conversion to Christianity, and Gregory of Nyssa (Adv. Eunomium, 2. 2). See ULLMANN: De Hypps., Heidelberg, 1833; and BÖHMER: De Hypps., Berlin, 1834.

HYRCANUS I., John, a member of the Asmonæan family; king and high priest of the Jews; d. 105 B.C. He was a son of Simon Maccabæus, and, at the murder of his father and two brothers, fell heir to the two highest dignities of his nation (135 B.C.). The same Ptolemy who had murdered his father intended to put him out of the way likewise; but Hyrcanus escaped, and afterwards established himself firmly in the possession of his power by arms against Ptolemy, and by a tribute of five hundred talents to Antiochus VII. After the latter's death (128 B.C.) he extended his kingdom over Samaria and Idumea, and strengthened his throne by a treaty with the Romans. In the latter part of his reign the antagonism between the Pharisees and Sadducees began to show itself. Hyrcanus followed the traditions of his house, and favored the former party (Joseph., Antiq., xiii. 10, 5), until they clamored for his resignation of the high priestly office, when he went over to the Sadducees. Schürer says of his reign, that "it was the most glorious Israel had seen since the days of Solomon." See WERNER: Johann Hyrcan, Wernigerode, 1877; SCHÜRER: N. T.liche Zeitgeschichte, pp. 107-117, Leipzig, 1874; EWALD: History of Israel, vol. iv.; STANLEY: History of the Jewish Church, iii.

HYRCANUS II., grandson of Hyrcanus I., and high priest of the Jews; was executed 30 B.C. He was a weak character, easily deceived, and the dupe or tool of others for forty years. At the death of his mother Alexandra (69 B.C.), who had succeeded to the throne at her husband's death (78 B.C.), his younger brother disputed his rightful accession to power by arms, defeated him, and forced him not only to renounce the kingly office, but even the high priestly dignity, to which he had been elevated at his father's death. He was, however, induced by the artifice and ambition of Antipater, the founder of the Herodian family, to repent his action, and, escaping from Jerusalem by night, fled to Petra. When Pompey advanced upon Damascus (in 64 B.C.), he sought his favor, and the year following was restored by him to the high priesthood. In this office he was confirmed by Cæsar (47 B.C.), and received a nominal civil jurisdiction at the side of Antipater, the procurator of Judæa. When the Parthians overran the land, and plundered Jerusalem (40 B.C.), they took Hyrcanus prisoner, cut off his ears in order to unfit him forever for the high priesthood, placed his son Antigonus in that office, and took him into captivity. He returned to Jerusalem in 36 B.C., but was put to death by Herod the Great, who had married his beautiful daughter Mariamne in order to avoid the possibility of his royal claims being recognized by the Romans, and to annihilate the influence of the name "Asmonæan" upon the Jews, his subjects. See SCHÜRER: N. Tliche Zeitgesch., pp. 173-183; EWALD: Hist. of Israel, iv.; STANLEY: History of the Jewish Church, iii., pp. 453-475; art. MACCABEES.

HYSTASPES, or HYDASPES. Among the Christians of the first century, there circulated a prophetic-apocalyptic book, pretending to be the work of the Persian or Median wise man and king, Hystaspes, and to contain prophecies of Christ and his kingdom. It was one of those pseudepigraphous compositions which at that time were made in great number, and of various forms, for apologetic purposes. Generally they were ascribed to some person of the old covenant; but, as soon as Christianity penetrated into the Pagan world, the attempt was made, not only to interpret real dicta of elder Pagan seers and poets with a Christian intention, but also to manufacture heathen prophecies of Christianity. The most remarkable productions of this kind were the so-called "Sibylline books," much used by the apologists and fathers from the second to the fourth century; and they found their Oriental counterpart in the Vaticinia Hystaspis.

The book is spoken of by three of the fathers, — Justin (Apolog., i. 20 and 44), Clement of Alexandria (Strom., v. 6, § 43), and Lactantius (Instit. div., vii. 15, 18; Epitom., T. ii. p. 69). Of the author, Justin and Clement say nothing; but Lactantius adds that he was an ancient Median king, living before the Trojan war. In spite of the chronological confusion, it is probable that Lactantius here thinks of the father of King Darins I., of whom Ammianus Marcellinus (xxiii. 6) tells us that he had learnt much wisdom and many secret arts from the Brahmins of India, and again taught them to the magians. Cyathius, a Byzantine historian from the sixth century, speaks (Hist., ii. 24) of a Hystaspes, a contemporary of Zoroaster, without deciding whether or not he was identical with the father of Darius. It is evident that we here meet with traces of the Persian myths about the Bactrian king Vistaspa, or Gustasp, a contemporary of Zoroaster; and we may safely assume that the Vaticinia Hystaspis were founded on Persian reminiscences, though the scanty notices of the book which have come down to us do not allow us to form any explicit opinion of its form, contents, or tendency.

IBAS succeeded Rabulas as bishop of Edessa in 435, though he had previously opposed him very strenuously in his endeavors to have the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia condemned as heretical. But when he undertook, in connection with two other residents of Edessa (Cumas and Probus), to translate these writings into Syriac, he was accused, before the patriarch Proclus and Emperor Theodosius II., of propagating the Nestorian heresies, and was deposed by the Robber Synod of Ephesus, Aug. 22, 449. He was reinstated, however, by the synod of Chalcedon (451), and died Oct. 28, 457. Parts of his epistle to Mares of Beth-Hardashir (Seleucia) on the Tigris, of great interest as an authentic document from the very time of the Nestorian controversy, have been preserved in a Greek translation among the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, and are found in MANSI: Concil., VII. ICELAND, an island belonging to Denmark, situated in the North Atlantic Ocean, just south of the polar circle, 130 miles south-east of Greenland, and 850 miles west of Norway, comprises an area of 39,200 square miles, with about 70,000 inhabitants. In the latter part of the eighth century the country was visited by Celtic monks from Ireland: in the middle of the ninth century it was settled by Norwegian emigrants. The settlers were Pagans; but, through their intercourse with the mother-country, they became acquainted with Christianity during the tenth century, and in 1000 Christianity was officially established as the religion of the country. In 1055 an episcopal see was founded at Skalholt, and in 1106 another at Holar. The title was introduced in 1096, and an ecclesiastical code was promulgated in 1125. The country belonged first to the archiepiscopal see of Hamburg-Bremen, then to that of Lund (1106), and finally to that of Nidaros (1237); but the connection was rather loose, as the bishops were elected by the people. In 1550 the Reformation was introduced with armed force by the Danish king, though without effecting any great change in the religious state of the people. In 1801 the bishopric of Holar was abolished, and in 1825 the whole island was laid under the authority of the episcopal see of Reykyawick. See G. J. THORKELIN: Jus ecclesiasticum, etc., Copenhagen, 1776; HARROW: Om Reformationen i Island, Copenhagen, 1843.

ICHTHYS (Greek ἰχθύς, "a fish;" the acrostic of the sentence Ἰησοῦς Χριστός, Θεοῦ Υἱός, Σωτήρ, "Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour") forms one of the earliest and most frequently used Christian symbols. The name "ichthys," or the picture of a fish, is often found on rings, gems, utensils, tombstones, etc.; and numerous metaphorical expressions or elaborate allegories in the writings of the Fathers were occasioned by this acrostic. Clement of Alexandria (Pædag., III. 11) mentions the fish as one of the Christian symbols, though without making any allusion to its origin. The first who, in speaking of the symbol, also thinks of the acrostic, is Tertullian (De Baptismo, I.). See F. BECKER: D. Darstellung J. C. unter d. Bilde d. Fisches, Leipzig, 1866, 2d ed., 1876.

ICO'NIUM, the present Koniyyeh, a city of Asia Minor, at the foot of Mount Taurus, on the road from Antioch in Pisidia to Derbe, was at one time the capital of Lycaonia, and through many centuries a flourishing place. Paul visited it three times (Acts xiii. 51, xiv. 1, 19, 21, xvi. 2), and it is the scene of the legend of Paul and Thecla.

ICONOCLAST, "image-breaker," and ICONODULIST, "image-server" (from εἰκών, "an image," and κλάζειν, "to break," or δουλεύειν, "to serve"), are the Greek names of the two opposite parties in the great controversy concerning IMAGE-WORSHIP; which article see. In modern usage, the word "iconoclast" is applied to one who destroys shams or impositions of any kind.

ICONOSTASIS, a piece of furniture in the Eastern Church, corresponding, not to our rood-screen, which separates the choir from the nave, but to our altar-rails, forming a holiest of the holy. It developed, indeed, from the simple, open altar-rails which were in use in the Christian churches from the earliest date, into a solid panel, completely concealing the altar by degrees, as the service in the Greek Church assumed the character of a great liturgical drama. Its name it received from its being highly ornamented with pictures (εἰκόνων), and it probably reached its present form in the eighth century.

IDOL and IDOLATRY. In classical Greek the word εἰδωλον is used of any kind of representation, bodily or ideal, pictorial, sculptural, or mimical; and it has no reference at all to the question whether the representation is to be recognized as an object of worship, or simply looked at as a product of art. The idea of an idol did not exist in the Greek civilization. It originated among the Jews, under the first covenant: and, though the Septuagint uses εἰδωλον to translate no less than sixteen different Hebrew words, it applies it, nevertheless, exclusively to such representations as are destined for worship, leaving entirely out of consideration whether the subject of the representation be the true God or a false one; as, according to the Second Commandment, any bodily representation of any deity, when worshipped, is an idol.

The word εἰδωλολατρεία is of Christian origin, and occurs for the first time in the writings of the New Testament (1 Cor. x. 14; Gal. v. 20; 1 Pet. iv. 3; Col. iii. 5). As at the time of Christ the Jews had ceased long ago to use any bodily representation of God in their service, while all the Pagan religions found within the boundaries of the Roman Empire worshipped their gods under some kind of bodily representation, it was quite natural that the apostolic writers, and after them the Fathers, should apply the word in a general way as meaning simply the worship of false gods. But in course of time, when the worship of false gods had been stamped out (a law of 392 declared sacrifice and divination treason, and punishable with death), it was discovered that idolatry might be found also in the worship of the true God, as it really means the worship of any bodily representation of any deity. IGNATIUS EPISTLES. See IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH.

IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH. The only sources from which any information can be drawn about this celebrated person are the epistles circulating under his name. Eusebius knows nothing more of him than what can be extracted from the epistles, with the exception of a few short notices by Irenæus (Adv. Hæres., V. 28, 4) and by Origen (prologue to the Canticles, and in Hom. 6, on Luke), which he also knows. But the list he gives of the bishops of Antioch is doubtful with respect to its chronology. Compare A. ИАКХАКК: Die Zeit des Ignatius, Leipzig, 1878. He places Ignatius as the second bishop after Peter. As nobody knew any thing about the intervening Euodius, he gradually dropped out of attention, and a new tradition formed, placing Ignatius immediately after Peter (Chrysostom, the Paschal Chronicle, Theodoret). Between these two traditions the Const. Ap. (VII. 46) tries to mediate by making Peter consecrate, first Euodius, and then Ignatius. What tradition else has preserved concerning Ignatius—the story that he was the child spoken of in Matt. xviii. 5, and other fictions by Simeon Metaphrastes and Vincentius—is completely worthless. Nor are the various Acta Martyrii of any historical value. We have two which are completely independent of each other. I. Martyrium Colbertinum, first published by Ussher, 1647, in a barbarous but literal translation, then in a Greek version by Ruinart, in Act. Mart., 1689, and finally in a Syriac translation by Mösinger, in Supplem. Corp. Ign., Innsbruck, 1872. II. Martyrium Vaticanum, edited by Dressel, in Patr. Apost., p. 368. The Latin Vita Ignatii, in Act. Sanct. Feb., I., 29, the Armenian Martyrium, edited by Petermann, and the Vita, by Symeon Metaphrastes, may be considered as mere compilations from the two first mentioned. This whole literature has been collected and edited by Zahn, in Patr. Ap. Oper., Leipzig, 1876 [F. X. Funk, Op. Patr. Ap., Tübingen, 1881, and J. B. Lightfoot, London, 1885]. But all these Acta Martyrii are spurious; they contradict the epistles; they swarm with unhistorical statements; they were not known to any old writer, not even to Eusebius; they date, probably, from the fifth century. Thus the epistles are the only source of information left to us. They claim to have been written by Ignatius, on his journey from Antioch (where he had been condemned to death) to Rome, where he was to suffer the punishment of being torn to pieces by wild beasts.

The total number of epistles bearing the name of Ignatius is fifteen, but they are of very different date and worth. Seven of them, namely, those Ad Ephesios, Magyesios, Trallianos, Romanos, Philadelphenos, Smyrnicos, and Polycarpum, are extant in a double Greek version,—a shorter and a longer. The latter contains five more epistles; namely, those Ad Mariam Cassobolitani, Tarsenses, Antiochenos, Heronem, and Philippenses; and finally we have three more epistles, but only in a Latin translation; namely, two Ad S. Joannem, and one Ad S. Mariam Virginem, to which is added a Responsio B. Marie V. ad Ignatium. The three last-mentioned letters were probably originally written in Latin, and are completely worthless. They are found in ZAHN l. c. Of the shorter Greek version, G¹, we have two manuscripts, — Codex Mediceo-Laurentianus, and Codex Casanatensis, of which, however, the latter is a transcription of the former. There also exist a Latin translation, first published by Ussher, 1644, a Syriac translation, extant only in fragments, and a complete Armenian translation of the Syriac translation, published by the Armenian Bishop Menas of Constantinople, 1783. The epistle Ad Romanos is also found in the Codex Colbertinus, and has been published by Mösinger l. c. The whole shorter version was first published by Ussher in Latin, 1644, and then in Greek by Isaac Vossius. Later editions are very numerous, the best by Zahn l. c. Of the longer Greek version, G², containing twelve epistles, there exist nine manuscripts, and a Latin translation. The above-mentioned Armenian translation also contains the five additional epistles of the longer version. The whole longer version was first edited by Paccæus, 1557, then by And. Gessner, 1559, and afterwards often, best by Zahn l. c. Lately the three epistles Ad Ephesios, Smyrnicos, and Polycarpum, have been discovered in a version still shorter than G¹. This version, however, exists only in a Syriac translation. It has been published by Cureton, The Ancient Syriac Version of the Epistles of S. Ignatius, London, 1845, and still better in Corpus Ignatianum, Berlin, 1849. A very rich collection of materials belonging to the subject, especially of Oriental versions, is found in PETERMANN: S. Ignatii Epistole, Leipzig, 1849.

On account of the great importance which the epistles of Ignatius have for the older church history, the question about their genuineness gave rise to a very lively debate, the more as a preliminary question about the authenticity of the versions had to be settled in advance. The history of the debate falls into three periods. The first period ends with the discovery of the shorter version, G¹; and its principal result was the general recognition of the spuriousness of those three epistles Ad S. Joannem and S. Mariam Virginem, which exist only in a Latin translation: even Baronius gave them up. With respect to the remaining twelve epistles, most Roman-Catholic theologians (Hartung, Baronius, Bellarmin) accepted them; while most Protestant theologians (the Magdeburg Centuries, Calvin) rejected them. Among the former, however, Martialis Mastræus acknowledged that the text was interpolated; and among the latter Nic. Vodelius recognized the only seven epistles mentioned by Eusebius. With the publication of the shorter version, G¹, the second period opens. The version G¹ was soon generally accepted as authentic, and the version G² rejected as interpolated; and lately Zahn has fixed the date of this interpolation to the latter half of the second century (Ignatius von Antiochia, Gotha, 1873). The question of the authenticity of the text thus settled, the question of the authorship was again taken up. The five epistles not mentioned by Eusebius, and not contained in the shorter version (Ad Mariam Cassobolitam, Tirsenses, Antiochenos, Heronem, and Philippenses), were immediately excluded as spurious. With respect to the remaining seven epistles, the question was answered in the affirmative by Rothe, Huther, Düsterdieck, and others; in the negative, especially by Baur, who fixes their date at the middle of the second century. The third period begins with the discovery of the shortest Syrian version, S, of the three epistles Ad Romanos, Ephesios, and Polycarpum. Cureton, who first edited this version, asserted without hesitation that the original and genuine epistles of Ignatius had now been found; that the versions G¹ and G² were nothing but interpolations and expansions in support of a later state of ecclesiastical development; that the four epistles Ad Magnesios, Smyrncos, Philadelphenos, and Trallianos, were mere fictitious compositions, etc. Bunsen exerted himself much to introduce these views in Germany (D. drei echten u. vier unechten Briefe d. Ignatius, Hamburg, 1847, and Ignatius von Antiochien u. s. Zeit, Hamburg, 1847). They found also many adherents (Ritschl, Weiss, Böhringer, and Lipsius); but they met with still stronger opposition, both among those who rejected the Ignatian epistles in any version, such as Baur (Die ignatianischen Briefe und ihr neuester Kritiker, Tübingen, 1848), and among those who accepted them in version G¹, such as Denzinger (Ueber d. Aechtheit d. bisherigen Textes d. ignatianischen Briefe, Würzburg, 1849), Uhlhorn (Zeitschrift f. d. hist. Theol., 1855, I.-II.), Petermann, Merx (Meletemata Ignatiana, 1861), and Zahn. In the course of the debate, conclusive evidence was produced, partly from a logical analysis of the contents of the epistles, partly from a comparison of the various Syrian translations, that S is nothing more than an extract from G¹. Some of the staunchest champions of S, as, for instance, Lipsius and Lightfoot, fell off; and the whole period passed off as an episode, leaving the debate at the old dilemma: either we have the genuine epistles of Ignatius in the version G¹, or we have no epistles at all by Ignatius, but only spurious compositions bearing his name.

A decision in the matter has not yet been reached, though it may not be so very far off. The objections to the genuineness of the epistles are: (1) That the fact on which they rest is unhistorical. When, however, the fact is read out of the epistles themselves, and not, as Baur did, out of the spurious Acta Martyrii, it fits in very well with the actual state of affairs. That Christians suffered martyrdom under Trajan is well known; and it need cause no hesitation that Ignatius was condemned ad bestias by the governor of Antioch, as instances of such condemnations occur even in Irenæus, and soon after become very frequent. Nor is it strange that he should be brought to Rome to be executed. The law forbidding the governor to send convicts from one province to another dates from the time of Severus and Antoninus; and the law regulating the transference of such prisoners to Rome is still later. The route of the journey has nothing improbable about it, as little as the circumstance, that, on the road, Ignatius was at liberty to converse with the congregations, and write letters. Similar instances occur in Lucian (De morte peregrini), and in the acts of Perpetua and Felicitas. The whole situation, finally, presupposed by the Epistle Ad Romanos, the anxiety of Ignatius that the Romans might take some step in order to secure his liberation, is easily explained by the legal right which any one concerned had to appeal in behalf of another, even against his will. (2) When next it has been said (by Baur) that the character of Ignatius, such as it appears in the epistles, looks more like a fiction than a reality, that his forced humility and strained heroism are downright offensive, etc., the mere subjectivity of this objection, and consequently its insufficiency as an argument, is proved by the circumstance that others (e.g., Rothe) find a strong evidence of the genuineness of the epistles in the picture they give of the character of Ignatius. (3) Of much more weight is the objection that the heresies attacked in the epistles belong to a later period than the beginning of the second century. It has been doubted whether the epistles speak of two distinct heresies, — a gnosticodocetic and a judaizing, — or only of one, combining both these elements; and it has been asserted that such a combination would be an impossibility. But we know too little of the earlier stages of Gnosticism to make such an assertion; and a cautious criticism must, no doubt, arrive at the conclusion that the epistles were written before Gnosticism reached that form under which it presents itself between 130 and 140. A decision with respect to the genuineness of the epistles cannot be reached from this point; and, should from some other point an irrefragable evidence of their genuineness be produced, we would have to change our ideas of the historical development of Gnosticism. (4) It has also been alleged that the church constitution mirrored by the epistles, especially the episcopacy, belongs to a later time. It is true that the epistles distinguish sharply between the bishop, the presbyter, and the deacon; that they represent the episcopate as superior to the presbytery; that they never weary of extolling the bishop, and exhorting the faithful to rally around him as the visible representative of the unity of the congregation, etc. But, though the epistles doubtless show an advance beyond Clemens Romanus and Irenæus, they certainly fall behind Irenæus. Ignatius knows nothing about an apostolical establishment of the episcopate, nor does he connect with it those ideas of a priesthood which afterwards were borrowed from the Old Testament. The episcopate is to him an office in the congregation, not an office in the church. The bishop is to him not the successor of the apostles, nor is he the bearer of the doctrinal tradition. To sum up the whole, though not every difficulty presented by the above objections can be said to have been successfully solved, the collective mass of internal evidence against the genuineness of the epistles would, nevertheless, be insufficient to counterbalance the testimony in its favor of one single external witness; and there is such a testimony in the Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians. He who will prove the epistles of Ignatius to be spurious must begin by proving the Epistle of Polycarp to be spurious, or at least very heavily interpolated; but such an undertaking will hardly ever succeed. IGNATIUS, Patriarch of Constantinople, b. in 790 or 796; a son of the emperor Michael I.; was seized, mutilated, and shut up in a monastery by the usurper, Leo V., the Armenian, but rose gradually in the service of the Church, and was made Patriarch of Constantinople in 847. He could not agree, however, with the emperor, Michael III.; and by the intrigues of his uncle, Cæsar Bardas, he was deposed in 858, and banished to the Island of Terebinthus. Photius was put in his place. But Ignatius could not be made to give up his claims, and thus a schism arose. The Pope, Nicholas I., was called in as a mediator; but he came as a judge, and his verdict went against Photius. Photius, however, succeeded in vindicating himself in the patriarchal chair until 867, when Michael III. was dethroned and murdered by Basilus Macedo. Basilus recalled Ignatius, who remained in possession of his office to his death in (878). Between Ignatius and Adrian II., the successor of Nicholas I., there arose a vehement controversy concerning Bulgaria, which each bishop demanded as belonging to his diocese. See MANSI: Concil. Coll. xvii., p. 62. Besides his letters, also a Vita Tarasii by Ignatius has come down to us. See PHOTIUS.

IGNATIUS LOYOLA (Don Inigo Lopez de Recalde), b. in the Castle of Loyola, Guipuzcoa, Spain, 1491; d. in Rome, July 31, 1556; was educated at the court of Ferdinand the Catholic, — a knight in the full romantic sense of the word. In 1521, when defending the fortress of Pamplona against the French, he received an extremely painful wound in the foot, and was brought to the paternal castle to be nursed. While on his sick-bed, he asked for books; and as his favorite reading, the fantastic and voluptuous romances of chivalry, could not be procured, he plunged himself into the legends of the Church, — the lives of the saints. The effect was most wonderful. — a complete conversion, an unquenchable passion. From the sick-bed he immediately repaired to the monastery of Montserrat, hung up his armor before the image of the Virgin, exchanged his gay and splendid attire for the rags of a beggar, and retired to a cavern at Manresa, where he spent some time practising the severest ascetic exercises, but also visited and comforted by glorious visions. At Manresa he drew up the first sketch of his famous Exercitia Spiritualia, which, by the members of the order he founded, is considered a work of divine inspiration.

In 1523 he made a pilgrimage to Palestine; and on his return he began to study, first grammar at Barcelona, and then philosophy at Alcalá. While studying, he lived on alms; and at the same time he devoted himself to the nursing of the sick. But as he also appeared among the students and in the hospitals, as a curer of souls, he became suspected of belonging to the Alombados. Though acquitted when placed before the Inquisition, he was continually watched; and when, at Salamanca, he was condemned to keep silent for four years on all topics of theology, he left Spain (1528), and went to Paris. In Paris he succeeded, by his innate power of attracting and commanding men, and by the instrumentality of his Exercitia Spiritualia, in gathering a small circle around himself, consisting of Pierre Favre the Savoyard, Simon Rodriguez the Portuguese, and the Spaniards, Francis Xavier, Alphons Salmeron, Jacob Lainez, and Nicolaus Bobadilla. Aug. 15, 1534, these men met in the Church of Montmartre, formed an association, took the vows of chastity and poverty, and promised furthermore, that, after finishing their studies, they would either go to Jerusalem and devote themselves to missionary work, and work in the hospitals, or place themselves unconditionally at the disposal of the Pope, — a characteristic alternative.

In 1537 the association, increased by three new members, met in Venice; but the war between the republic and the Turks prevented them from continuing the journey to Jerusalem. While laboring in the hospitals, they met with the Theatines, and the meeting was pregnant with great consequences to them. They were all ordained priests, and started for Rome, preaching along the road, in the public squares, in the universities, in the hospitals, etc., and preaching with great effect, though they could speak only broken Italian. In Rome they soon acquired the confidence of the Pope, and were intrusted with important missions to Parma, Piacenza, Calabria, and other places. Ignatius had new visions; and on March 14, 1543, Paul III. confirmed the association under the name of Societas Jesu. Ignatius was unanimously elected general of the new order; and, when he died, the order counted thirteen provinces, — seven in Spain and Portugal, three in Italy, two in Germany, and one in France. Only a short time elapsed before the eminent usefulness of the new instrument became quite apparent; and on March 13, 1623, Gregory XV. canonized its founder, together with Francis Xavier.

For its external organization the order is, in some respects, as deeply indebted to its second as to its first general; but its informing spirit it received from Ignatius Loyola, and in his Exercitia Spiritualia that spirit found a most characteristic expression. The book may be described as the personal experience of the author transformed into rules, which the reader must follow in order to reach the same goal as he reached. And what is that goal? To be able, through prayers and fasts, through ascetic and spiritual exercises of the severest description, through absolute seclusion from the world and concentrated meditation, to take an irrevocable vow of obedience, — the obedience of the dead body, which has no will and no motion of its own, — the obedience of the stick, which one may take, or leave standing, just as one pleases. The obedience goes from the members to the general, and from the general to the Pope; and when the Pope says that black is white, and white black, it is the great moral glory of the order that it is able to repeat the lie (Regule ad sententiam cum Ecclesia). See JESUITS.

IGNORANTINES (Fratres Ignorantia, Frères ignorantins, Frères des écoles chrétiennes) is the name of the members of an institution founded in the beginning of the eighteenth century, in France, by the abbot Baptiste de la Salle, and energetically supported by the Jesuits. Its purpose was to give free instruction to people, not only in religion, but also in the elements of secular education, and thereby prevent any idea inimical to the Roman Church entering or taking possession of the young mind. It developed a great activity in France, and represented, so to speak, the Jesuits, when (in 1764) that order was banished from the country. In 1790, when the institution was dissolved by the revolutionary government, it numbered no less than a hundred and twenty-one schools and colleges. Its members sought refuge in Italy, and were recalled in 1806 by Napoleon, who acknowledged their usefulness for popular education. [In 1878 they numbered 9,818, teaching in 1,064 public schools and in 385 free schools.] NEUDECKER.

I. H. S., an inscription dating far back in the history of the Christian Church, but whose interpretation is somewhat doubtful. Some explain it as In Hoc Signo, silicet, vinces ("with this token thou shalt be victorious"), the words accompanying the vision of the radiant cross appearing to Constantine and his army: others, as Jesus Hominum Salvator ("Jesus, Men's Saviour"), the motto of the Jesuits. The most probable explanation, however, is that which derives the inscription simply from the Greek ΙΗΣΟΥΣ ("Jesus"), as the transformation of the Σ into the Latin S presents no difficulties. See Argument for the Greek Origin of the Monogram I.H.S., published by the Cambridge Camden Society, London, 1841.

ILDEFONSUS, St., b. at Toledo, 607; d. there Jan. 23, 667; was a pupil of Isidore of Sevilla; entered the monastery of Agli, against his father's will; became a monk, and afterwards abbot; founded a nunnery near Toledo, and was made archbishop of his native city in 657. According to the testimony of Julian, his successor, he was a prolific writer, though he left most of his works in an unfinished state. Still extant are Libellus de virginitate S. Marie, first edited by Carranza, 1556, and found in MIGNÉ, Bib. Patr., 96, the first impulse to that enthusiastic worship of the Virgin which characterized the early Spanish Church; Annotationes de cognitione baptismi et de itinere deserti (Migne l. c.), a complete dogmatic and moral system, but probably only an imitation of an older Spanish work; two letters (Migne l. c.); and his continuation of Isidore's work De viris illustribus, often published with an appendix by Julian, Vita Ild. Tolet. (Migne l. c.), and containing the lives of Gregory the Great and fourteen Spanish churchmen. The Adoptionists of the eighth century claimed him as one of their forerunners. His life was written by Carranza (1556), Salazar de Mendoza (1618), Mayans y Siscar (1727). See also Act. Sanct., Jan. 23;

ILLGEN, Christian Friedrich, b. at Chemnitz, Sept. 16, 1786; d. at Leipzig, Aug. 4, 1844; studied in the University of Leipzig, and was appointed professor there of philosophy in 1818, and of theology in 1823. Besides other works, he wrote Lilius Socinus' Leben, Leipzig, 1811, and founded the Historisch-Theol. Gesellschaft in 1814, and the Zeitschrift f. hist. Theol., 1832, which was afterwards continued by Niedner and by Kahnis, and contains many valuable contributions to the clearing up of obscure points of church history.

ILLUMINATI was the name adopted by the members of a secret society of half-political and half-religious character, which was founded May 1, 1776, at Ingolstadt, by Adam Weishaupt, professor in the university. The founder's object was simply to form a tool for the gratification of his own ambition; and the model after which he worked was the Society of Jesu. Aided by the singular passion for secret societies which characterized the rationalism of the eighteenth century, he succeeded in forming classes of novices in Ingolstadt, Freising, Munich, in Tyrol, Westphalia, Saxony; and by means of an inexhaustible talent for charlatany, and a well-planned system of espionage, he also succeeded in keeping his novices in due submission. But what about the further development and final organization of the society? Weishaupt was near his wit's end, and confessed that he really did not know what to do with his novices, when Baron Adolf von Knigge entered the society in 1780, and brought speed and order in its development. A firm connection was established with the Freemasons of Munich, Freising, Francfort, etc. Three classes were formed, — one of novices or minervals, one of Freemasons or Scotch Knights, and one of the pupils of the small and great Mysteries; and the society spread so widely that even the greatest names in Germany were mentioned as members. But in 1784 Weishaupt and Knigge fell out with each other, both wanting to become the Magus or Rex of the society; and in the same year a decree was issued in Bavaria, forbidding all secret societies. The Illuminati felt safe, possessed as they were of a considerable political, social, and moral power; but they overlooked that the manner in which they wielded that power had already made them many enemies; and in 1785 began a sharp persecution, which, within a year or two, brought the whole institution to collapse. [They do not appear ever to have numbered more than two thousand.] The literature of the affair is enormous. As the principal documents may be considered the writings of WEISHAUPT: Gesch. d. Verfolgung d. Illuminaten, 1786; Apologie der Illuminaten, 1787; D. verbesserte System, 1787, Kurze Rechtfertigung, 1787, etc. KLUCKHOHN.

IMAGE OF GOD. The conception of the image of God is a fundamental one in the department of Christian anthropology. Man is declared (Gen. i. 26) to have been created in God's image (אֱלֹהִים, tselem) and after his likeness (כְּדֹמְיוֹ, d'muth). There is no other difference between these two terms than the difference between a concrete and abstract designation (comp. Gen. v. 3, ix. 6). The use of different prepositions, however, indicates that the former was inalienable: the latter might be lost. The dominion over the creatures which is ascribed to man in Gen. i. 28 is not to be regarded as of the essence of the image of God, but as a consequence of it. In the New Testament, sinful man is on the one hand recognized as still possessing the image of God, as in Luke iii. 38 (where Adam, as the founder of the race, is called the son of God); 1 Cor. xi. 7; Jas. iii. 9, etc.: on the other, he is urged to put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge (Col. iii. 10), righteousness, and holiness (Eph. iv. 24), after the divine image. Christ is the perfect image of God (2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15); and we become renewed after the image of God when we become conformed to the image of Christ (Rom. viii. 29).

We find a variety of utterances in the fathers on this subject. They agree, however, in ascribing the divine image to qualities differentiating man from the rest of the creation, and define them as reason and freedom (GREG. NYSSA, De hom. opif., iv., v). Irenæus, Tertullian, and Melito of Sardis included under it a physical similarity to God, which the Alexandrians and Augustine denied. The fathers also referred it to the moral nature, and defined it as righteousness. The scholastics made a sharp distinction between imago ("image") and similitudo ("likeness"); including under the former the intellectual powers of reason and freedom, and under the latter moral righteousness, which was lost at the Fall. This distinction is preserved by the theologians of the Roman-Catholic Church, who declare man's original righteousness (justitia orig.) to have been a superadded gift. The Protestant Church, ignoring this distinction, places the image of God in the religious and moral nature, and defines it as the original righteousness with which man was created. Socinianism defined it as man's dominion over the animal creation.

In order to rightly understand the meaning of the divine image, we must start from the nature of God, who created man for communion with Himself, and the world for man's well-being. Man alone received the spirit of life, and is a spiritual being, a personal soul. Man as a person is the image of God, and in the totality of his being (body and soul). This may be termed the essential element in the image of God in man, and is indestructible. To it corresponds the habitual element. Man as the creature of God is designed for a life of love, which manifests itself in the intellect as knowledge and wisdom, and in the will as freedom and holiness. The likeness to God further shows itself in the immortality of the body and the dominion over nature. This habitual element was lost at the Fall, when love for God was displaced by selfishness. The Son of God in the flesh was the concrete personal restoration of the divine image; and through his vicarious death and victorious resurrection we become partakers of his righteousness, and by the Holy Spirit poured out in our hearts are restored to the divine image.

IMAGE-WORSHIP. 1. IN THE EASTERN CHURCH.—The greatest difficulties which the Emperor Leo III., the Isaurian (717-741), experienced in his endeavors to make the Church co-extensive with the State, and perfectly uniform, arose from the image-worship, which, since the fifth century, had become general among the Christians. Especially the Mohammedans hated the practice as a Pagan abomination; and Leo himself looked upon it as idolatry. From regard, however, for the Patriarch Germanus, the emperor proceeded with caution in his attempt to destroy it. The edict of 726 simply forbade prostration before the images, and ordered them to be hung so high on the walls that people could not reach and kiss them. But to some bishops this manner of proceeding was too slow: on their own account they removed the images from the churches. A great fermentation immediately took place, and dangerous riots occurred in various places. Pope Gregory II. and John of Damascus, the most celebrated theologian of the Greek Church, declared against the emperor, and in favor of the images. Leo did not yield, however. An edict of 730 ordered all images to be removed from the churches, or painted over. The refractory patriarch was deposed; and, as an answer to the synod which Gregory III. convened against the iconoclasts, the papal revenues from Sicily and Calabria were confiscated, and Illyria was incorporated with the patriarchate of Constantinople. Leo's son, Constantine V., Copronymus (741-775), inherited his father's views of image-worship. In 754 he convened an œcumenical synod in Constantinople. The three hundred and thirty-eight bishops assembled—none of the patriarchs were present, nor had the Pope sent any delegates—ascribed the re-introduction of idols and idol-worship among men to the influence of the Devil, and decided, on the basis of the first six œcumenical synods, that he who painted or worshipped an image of Christ must be either a Nestorian or an Eutychian; that the Eucharist is the only legitimate image of Christ, as it alone contains the whole Christ, both according to his human and according to his divine nature; that image-worship is forbidden by Scripture (John iv. 24, xx. 29; Deut. v. 8, 9; Rom. i. 23; 2 Cor. v. 7; Rom. x. 17), and by the fathers (Epiphanius, Gregory Nazianzen, Chrysostom, Eusebius of Cæsarea, and others); that, consequently, any one who makes or worships images shall be excommunicated and cursed, etc. All the clergy were compelled to subscribe these decisions, and the monks who refused were cruelly persecuted. A conspiracy was suppressed by the emperor with fearful severity; even the Patriarch of Constantinople was decapitated. The popes, however, rejected the canons of 754, and a synod of the Lateran condemned the iconoclasts in 769. Under Irene, who after the death of her husband, Leo IV. Chazarus (780), was made regent during the minority of her son (Constantine VI.), a change took place in the policy of the imperial government. Images were tolerated. The monks, iconodulists by profession, again stepped forward; and their zeal and influence increased rapidly, as did their number. An œcumenical council was thought of as the proper means of carrying out a reversal of the legislation of 754. But the Oriental patriarchs refused to be present, from a regard to the Saracens; and Pope Adrian I. demanded, as a conditio sine qua non, the immediate surrender of the revenues of which Leo III. had despoiled him. A common council was then resorted to, convened in Constantinople 786. But the number of iconoclastic bishops was too great, and the attitude of the army (the soldiers being iconoclasts by training since the days of Leo III.) was too dangerous: nothing could be done. Next year, however, a well-managed Council of Nicaea (787) proved successful. A shrewd distinction was made between the full worship (ἀληθινὴ λατρεία), which ought to be offered to God alone, and the tokens of honor and veneration (ἄσπασιος καὶ τιμητικὴ προσκίνησις) which are due to the holy images; and on the basis of this distinction the iconoclasts were condemned. In the West the decisions of 787 were refuted by the Libri Carolini, and rejected by the Council of Frankfurt (794); but in the East they were enforced without causing any disturbance, as, indeed, they represented the views of the great mass of the people. But when, in 813, Leo V., the Armenian, ascended the throne, the soldiers again got the ascendancy over the monks; and on their peremptory demand the emperor issued a decree against image-worship in 814. The patriarch and the monks, who labored secretly and openly against the emperor, were punished. A new patriarch, presiding over a council in Constantinople (815), cancelled the canons of 787; and Theodore, abbot of the monastery of Studium in Constantinople, and the head of the iconodulists, was banished. Leo's successor, however, Michael II., Balbus (820-829), again yielded to the iconodulists, and allowed image-worship in private; and though his son (Theophilus, 829-842) forbade people to have images in their houses, and persecuted the monks with cruelty, his wife Theodora was a zealous image-worshipper; and when she became regent, during the minority of her son (Michael III.), the laws of 787 were once more enforced, and the iconoclasts were persecuted. On Feb. 19, 842, the orthodox, that is the image-worshippers, celebrated their victory with a great festival, and the images were solemnly brought back into the churches. The iconoclasts never more came into power, and thus image-worship continued an orthodox doctrine of the Greek Church [though only flat pictures are worshipped, while raised images are forbidden. See art. GREEK CHURCH, p. 902]. ALBRECHT VOGEL.

II. IN THE WESTERN CHURCH. — The Roman-Catholic Church has a peculiar talent for denying in principle what she admits in practice. She does not forbid people to read the Bible, but she prevents them from doing it. She does not deny that it is the merit of Christ which makes man's works meritorious, but she inculcates that it is his own works which save a man. She does not teach image-worship, but she allows it. The Council of Trent (Sessio XXV. de invocatione Sanctorum) says that images of Christ, the Virgin, and the saints, ought to be retained in the churches, and shown the honor and veneration due to them . . . not because they are themselves the harbingers of any divine power to which man can pray, or in which he can confide . . . but because they image forth to man such a divine power, and because the honor and veneration which he shows them refer to the reality they represent. But history shows both how utterly unable the great mass of the people are to make such a distinction, and how very little the Roman-Catholic Church cares about having it made. Indeed, the very same arguments which she once rejected when the Pagans presented them in favor of their idol-worship, she now urges in favor of her own image-worship. The primitive Christians condemned all use of images in the church. (See the acts of the synod of Elvira, 305, c. 36.) They evidently feared that somehow the representation might be taken for the reality. But when, in the fourth and fifth centuries, the whole uneducated mass of the people was admitted into the congregations, the images began to invade the churches, and the common plea for them was their power of teaching. Gregory the Great, in a letter to Bishop Serenus of Marseille (Lib. IX., Ep. 105), recommends their use in the churches, on the ground that they enable those who know not their letters to read on the wall what they cannot read in the books. But the danger connected with the use of images is apparent from the very same letter; for the reason why Serenus had destroyed a number of images was just that his congregation adored them. When the Council of Nicaea (787) legitimized not only the use, but the worship, of images, the Libri Carolini appeared as a refutation; and the author emphasizes the fact (III. 16), that though images might be used as memorials of the great events of the history of the Church, and as adornment of the walls, without harm to the educated, who worship only the reality behind the representations, they cannot help seducing the uneducated, who worship only what they see. The Frankish Church was strongly opposed to the introduction of images. The synod of Frankfurt (794) rejected the decisions of the Second Council of Nicaea (though the Pope, Adrian I., had accepted them), and condemned the iconoclasts. The opposition was continued through the ninth century. A synod of Paris (825) repeated the rejection of the decisions of the Pope and the Council of Nicaea in a rather emphatic manner; and Claudius of Turin, Agobard, Jonas of Orleans, and other bishops, were decided enemies of images. At last, however, Rome prevailed; and the peculiar tendency the Roman-Catholic Church has to ascribe divine character to the various mediators she places between God and man, showed itself also in this field. What Thomas Aquinas teaches concerning images and their use is, to say the least, somewhat equivocal (Summa Quest. 23, art. 4, 5), and so are the expositions of Bonaventura. But Belarmin is completely unequivocal. Without any remonstrance from the side of the Church, he teaches, in his De Imaginibus Sanctorum, that images of Christ and the saints shall be worshipped in the proper sense of the word, so that the devotion does not stretch beyond the image towards the object which it represents, but remains at rest in the image itself, such as it is. Thus the difference between the honor due to God and the honor due to the image is one of degree only, not of kind; one of quantity only, not of quality.

IMAM, the priest who leads the prayers of a Mohammedan congregation, and in Turkey also performs the rites of circumcision, marriage, and burial. The name comes from the Koran (Sura II., "The Cow," v. 118: "When his Lord made trial of Abraham, by commands which he fulfilled, he said, 'I am about to make thee an Imam [priest] to mankind"). The title "Imam" is borne by the caliphs, or successors of Mohammed, and thus has the secondary meaning of "the head of the faith." The present Osmani dynasty of Turkish sultans arrogates the title on the ground that the last legitimate caliph, El Mutawakkel, in 1517 ceded his right to it to Selim I., the first sultan, and his heirs. But the Shi'ahs, or Shi'ites, the so-called heretical Mohammedans, deny the right of the sultan to this title, and limit it to twelve persons. Eleven Imams have already appeared; the twelfth is announced. Indeed, they look for his appearance at any time.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION OF THE VIRGIN MARY, a modern dogma of the Roman Church, which exempts the Virgin Mary from all personal contact with sin, and in this respect puts her above all other descendants of Adam, and on the same scale of sinless purity as Christ. It was proclaimed by Pope Pius IX., on the Feast of the Conception, Dec. 8, 1851, in the Church of St. Peter and in the presence of more than two hundred cardinals, bishops, and other dignitaries, in these words: "That the most blessed Virgin Mary, in the first moment of her conception, by a special grace and privilege of Almighty God, in virtue of the merits of Christ, was preserved immaculate from all stain of original sin" (ab omni originalis culpæ labe preservatam immunitam). This the papal bull Ineffabilis Deus declares to be a divinely revealed fact and dogma, which must hereafter be constantly believed by all Catholics, on pain of excommunication. The dogma was not sanctioned by any œcumenical council; but since the Vatican Council of 1870 declared the Pope infallible, independent of a council, the decree of 1851 must be received as an infallible utterance, and cannot be changed. Pius IX. had previously, by an encyclical of Feb. 2, 1849, invited the opinion of the Catholic bishops on the subject, and received more than six hundred affirmative answers. Only four dissented from the Pope's view; and fifty-two, while agreeing with him in the dogma itself, deemed it inopportune to define and proclaim it. This shows that the tendency of the Roman Church was strongly in this direction. The dogma of the immaculate conception, and the Vatican dogma of papal infallibility, are the characteristic features of modern Romanism, as distinct from the Romanism of the Council of Trent, and widen the breach between it and the Greek and Protestant churches. By the decree of 1854 the Virgin Mary is taken out of the family of the redeemed, and declared absolutely free from all complication with the fall of Adam and its consequences. The definition of such a dogma presupposes a divine revelation; for God omniscient alone knows the fact of the immaculate conception; and, as the Bible nowhere informs us of it, God must have revealed it to Pius IX. in 1854, either directly, or through the voice of the six hundred bishops assenting to his view. But, if he was really infallible, he did not need the advice of others.

From the Roman stand-point, this dogma completes the Mariology and Mariolatry, which, step by step, proceeded from the perpetual virginity of Mary to her freedom from actual sin after the conception of the Saviour, then to freedom from sin after her birth, and at last to her freedom from original or hereditary sin. The only thing left now is to proclaim the dogma of her assumption to heaven, which has long since been a pious opinion in the Roman Church. To this corresponds the progress in the worship of Mary, and the multiplication of her festivals. Her worship even overshadows the worship of Christ. She, the tender, compassionate, lovely woman, is invoked for her powerful intercession, rather than her divine Son. She is made the fountain of all grace, the mediatrix between Christ and the believer, and is virtually put in the place of the Holy Ghost. There is scarcely an epithet of Christ which devout Roman Catholics do not apply to the Virgin (see St. Liguori's Glories of Mary); and Pope Pius IX., who was himself an intense worshipper of Mary, sanctioned the false interpretation of Gen. iii. 15, that she (not Christ) "crushed the head of the serpent."

As to the history of the dogma, no passage in its favor can be found in the Old or New Testament; for the interpretation of the Protœvangelium just alluded to is clearly ruled out by the Hebrew text. On the contrary, the Bible declares all men to be sinners, and in need of redemption, and exempts Christ alone, the sinless Redeemer, from this universal rule. Mary herself calls God her Saviour (Luke i. 47), and thereby includes herself in the number of the saved; which implies her sense of personal sin and guilt. With this corresponds also the predicate given her by the angel (i. 28),—"endued with grace, highly favored" (κεχαριτωμένη, which the Vulgate has mischievously changed into the active gratia plena, "full of grace"). The Christian fathers, though many of them (even St. Augustine) exempted Mary from actual transgression, know nothing of her freedom from original sin, but always imply, and often expressly teach, the contrary. Some (as Irenæus, Tertullian, Origen, and Chrysostom) interpret Christ's words at the wedding of Cana (John ii. 4) as a rebuke of her unseasonable haste and immoderate ambition. The origin of the dogma must be sought in the Apocryphal Gospels, which substituted mythology for real history, and nourished superstition rather than rational faith.

The doctrine crept into theology through the door of worship. The first clear trace of it is found in the twelfth century, in the south of France, when the canons of Lyons introduced the festival of the conception of the immaculate Mary, Dec. 8, 1139. This proves that the belief then existed as a pious opinion, but by no means as a dogma. On the contrary, St. Bernard, the greatest doctor and saint of his age, opposed the new festival as an unauthorized innovation, derogatory to the dignity of Christ, the only sinless being in the world. He asked the canons of Lyons whence they discovered such a hidden fact. On the same ground they might appoint festivals for the conception of the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother of Mary, and so back to the beginning. The same ground is taken essentially by the greatest schoolmen, as Anselm, Bonaventura, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas. But during the fourteenth century, through the influence chiefly of Duns Scotus, "the subtle doctor," the doctrine of the immaculate conception became a part of the theology of the Franciscans or Scotists, and was a bone of contention between them and the Dominicans or Thomists. They charged each other with heresy, for holding the one view or the other. The Council of Trent did not settle the question, but rather leaned towards the Franciscan side. Soon afterwards the Jesuits took up the same side, and defended it against the Jansenists. To their zeal and perseverance, and their influence over Pope Pius IX., the recent triumph of the dogma is chiefly due. The whole Roman-Catholic world quietly acquiesced until the Vatican Council roused the "Old Catholic" opposition against papal infallibility, which extended also to the dogma of the immaculate conception.

IMMORTALITY. The motives for belief in immortality, which are to be found in men's hopes and fears, are of a subjective nature; and there lies in such motives doubt of the truth of immortality: hence, from of old, men have sought for purely objective grounds for this belief. Christian faith finds them in the resurrection of Christ. But this belief possesses objective worth only to those who stand in the Christian faith. Moreover, belief in immortality is a great help and support to, if not one of the conditions of, Christian faith: hence not only ancient, but also Christian, philosophy searches for objective grounds for belief in immortality without the religious province. Such ground is sometimes supposed to be found in the nature of the soul, in the difference between psychical and physical appearances, in the opposition of body and soul as two distinct substances. But this would only show that the soul may continue in existence, not that it must. To prove from the nature of the soul its necessary existence, it must be assumed that the soul is a simple substance, immaterial and indivisible, and therefore not to be dissolved, like the body, into its elements. But Kant objected, that, even though the soul appears to be one and simple, it cannot, therefore, be assumed that it is so. No psychology, at least, has succeeded in reducing the different activities of the soul to one simple power. The soul may be a unity; but it cannot be conceived as a simple substance which should exclude all inherent manifoldness of powers. The separation between the material and the immaterial should not in our conceptions be carried so far as to threaten to tear body and soul apart, and to make their union an incomprehensible miracle. Nothing is gained by referring to the self-conscious activity of the soul as evidence of an indestructible power. Self-consciousness may be lost through disturbances of the brain, and narcotics; but the reason, according to its nature and idea, may be thought to require its own continuance and lordship. It is unreasonable to suppose the loss of reason, its dissolution in unreason. But the continued existence of the individual is not secured by the dominion of reason in general. Finally, it has been affirmed that the soul could not form the ideas of eternity and infinity, the idea of truth, and the true ideas (axioms, etc.), which it holds to be eternally true, absolutely unchangeable, if the soul did not carry eternity within itself; for the temporal cannot possibly conceive the eternal, the finite the infinite. We must, alas! deny to this argument all validity; for these ideas are, upon their part, controverted conceptions. And, moreover, all conscious conception involves the distinction of the object from the subject, and by no means involves the possession by the soul of all that it can conceive. We see, then, that the question concerning the relation of soul and body in respect to self-consciousness presses into the foreground of the examination, and must be answered before we can come to any result. Besides, it is the whole man, the whole being of man only, from which objective reasons for belief in immortality can be derived. In this relation it stands physiologically and psychologically fast, that, until now at least, it seems impossible to derive psychological phenomena from the general physical and chemical powers of nature. But every power appears united to some substance. Upon what substance, then, is the psychical power bound?—upon the body, or some special substance? Nothing prevents us from supposing that the soul is a centre of those particular powers which lie at the ground of psychical appearances; i.e., that these powers are not bound up with the atoms of the body, but form a centre for themselves; and they are united with the substances and powers of the body only in an intimate relation of action and re-action. The unity of consciousness is the pledge of the unity of the soul; i.e., the unity of psychical powers in one centre. The hypothesis that this centre of the soul is a single atom is contradicted by the facts, and is no longer tenable. There is no trace in the brain of that centralization of elements and activities which is the indisputable characteristic of the soul; and it follows, therefore, from the science of the human body, that the soul is not a simple function of the brain, but a special centre of special powers, and therefore is to be regarded as a peculiar existence distinct from the body. It does not follow, from the fact of the constant co-working of body and soul, that consciousness is a product simply of the nervous system: as certainly as the physical appearances in general can be explained only from the working of special physical powers, so consciousness in itself can be only a product of the soul. But since the soul does not produce consciousness, or individual sensations, perceptions, etc., independently by itself alone; since, rather, both the origin and continuance of consciousness, as of particular perceptions, etc., appear to be conditioned through the co-working of the nervous system,—we must, therefore, admit absolutely, in view of scientific facts, that a continued existence of self-consciousness without a bodily organism cannot be considered. Natural science is therefore right when it steadfastly denies immortality as an isolated continuance of the soul separated from all embodiment. But this is not the only possible or generally believed form of immortality.

Christianity affirms not only the continuance of the soul, but also the resurrection of the body, i.e., the restoration of the body, or the re-union of the soul with a new, similar (more perfect) embodiment. This Christian faith is not contradicted by physical or psychical facts: on the contrary, it seems to be required even by them. Consciousness is restored after interruptions of it through bodily injuries, and with its previous contents unchanged; in like manner, not only may consciousness be restored after separation of the soul and body; but it must be restored so soon as the soul enters into union with the same or a similar organization. Absolutely the same body cannot be restored. The only question, then, is whether the re-union of the soul with a new, equal, or similar body, is physiologically conceivable. We affirm that it is not only tenable, but is required, because it lies wholly in the consequence of the principles which rule nature, and are proved by natural science; for nature everywhere tends to give to conditioned forces the possibility also of their exercise, the sphere for their activity. All powers of nature find without themselves continually the means and conditions under which to manifest their activity. In this consists the very order and regularity of nature. Consequently natural science must suppose, that, for the soul also, there shall be preserved room, not only for the temporary and passing play of its powers, but also for their enduring activity; that the force of consciousness, although temporarily robbed of its power of manifestation, is destined to make itself availing again in re-union with a body corresponding to it. According to analogies of natural science, this process may be regarded as constantly repeating itself, and, with that, natural science may stop. But it cannot deny the possibility that this process may come to an end in a last act through the union of the soul with a body no more separable from it; and reason demands such a conclusion, because an endless, aimless circling is unreasonable.

Therefore real science cannot conflict with the belief in immortality; but, in consistency, it must allow it, and affirm, if not its truth, at least its probability. Now, after we have won such objective grounds for this belief, it receives higher importance from religious, natural, and moral motives. It is a postulate of the ethical belief in God as love. Reason leads to the same result; for reason which obtains throughout the creation requires the conception of the highest end, and, therefore, the passing from temporal becoming into eternal being. So, also, the ethical ideas of the true, good, and beautiful, lead to the same conclusion. These are ideals whose perfect realization involves immortality.

[The scientific argument for the probability of immortality has recently been presented with much force by Professors Tait and Balfour Stewart, in a volume entitled the Unseen Universe, published in London in 1875. They argue that immortality is the natural consequence of modern ideas of the conservation of force and the principle of continuity. The moral argument receives additional force when immortality is conceived of as the necessary perfection of society. All the reasons for the continued life of the individual are enhanced when taken up into the hope of social immortality, or the perfection of the kingdom of God.]

IMMUNITY. Canon law makes a distinction between immunitas ecclesie, which simply means the right of asylum once enjoyed by the Church, and immunitas ecclesiastica, which denotes a general exemption from civil obligations. When the Church was recognized by the Roman State, great privileges were conferred upon her by the emperors. The clergy was exempted from assuming office, either in the State or in the commune,—at that time the heaviest duty of a Roman citizen,—the ruin of the rich, the perdition of the honest. They were furthermore exempted from public taxation, drafting, quartering, and every kind of menial service. These immunities the Church succeeded in vindicating for herself, also, when she became established among the barbarians. She carried the Roman law along with her into Germany, into France, into every country whither she went, and its ecclesiastical part she developed more and more in her own favor. Ecclesiastical persons were gradually exempted from the common law, and subjected only to their own special courts; ecclesiastical property was gradually based on other claims, and held on other conditions, than secular property; finally, the principle of immunity was declared a divine ordination, and acknowledged as such, for instance, by the emperor Frederic II. in his Authentica (Pertz: Mon., 4, 243). These advantages were not gained, however, without contest with the secular powers; and the whole church organization began to weaken in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. The victories of former days were sorely reversed. It was in vain that the Council of Trent (Sess. 25, c. 20) undertook to defend the principle of immunity, that the bull In cæsa Domini excommunicated any one who should infringe upon the immunities of the church, that Urban VIII. in 1626 established a special department of the curia as Congregatio Jurisdictionis et Immunitatis Ecclesiasticæ. The absolute State was by its own principle compelled to destroy such privileges and particular rights, and the constitutional State followed in its track. While the syllabus of Dec. 8, 1864, still clings to the principle of ecclesiastical immunity as a divine ordination, the military laws of Germany and France (1871-73) grant only a partial exemption from military service to the clergy. [See F. CHAMARD: De l'immunité ecclésiastique et monastique, Paris, 1878.] MEJER.

IMPANATIO (from in and panis, "bread") denotes one of the many modifications of the doctrine of the real presence of the flesh and blood of Christ in the Eucharist, which arose in opposition to the doctrine of transubstantiation. Ruprecht of Deutz, who died in 1135, is the father of this idea. In his Comm. in Exod., ii. 10 (Opera, i. p. 267, Cologne, 1602) he explains how God connects the real flesh and blood of Christ with the real bread and wine in the Eucharist, without disturbing the substance of either, just as, in the womb of the Virgin, he connected the Word and the human nature without changing the character of the latter. The word impanatio, however, is first used by a contemporary of his, Alger of Liège, who died in 1131, and wrote against him, in defence of transubstantiation, In pane Christum impanatum, sicut Deum in carne personaliter incarnatum. In the period of the Reformation Carlstadt accused Osiander of holding the view of impanation; and the same accusation was preferred by the Romanists in general against Luther, who denied it. L. PELT.

IMPOSITION OF HANDS (impositio manuum, χειροτονία). This custom is as old as the race, and rests upon the significance of the human hand in the bodily organism and in social life. Thus we speak of the hand of peace, the hand of war, the helping, protecting, needy, cruel hand, and distinguish between laying hands on, laying hands upon, raising hands over, raising hands to, a person. The biblical custom of laying on of hands rests upon the conception of the hand as the organ of mediation and of transference. So the priest laid his hand upon the head of the bullock or the goat to indicate that he had transferred to it his guilt or the guilt of the people (Lev. i. 4, iii. 2, viii. 14, xvi. 21, 24). The Old-Testament imposition of hands can be divided into three stages, — the patriarchal (typical and benedictory), the prophecy of the continuance of the hereditary blessing (cf. Gen. xlviii. 14); the legal (symbolical and officially consecrating), an investiture of the authority of office, and promise of the blessing attached (cf. Exod. xxix. 10; Num. xxvii. 18); and the prophetic (dynamic and healing), a miraculous power to heal and to restore life (cf. 2 Kings iv. 34). The New-Testament instances do really what the Old Testament's do only typically, and admit of a similar classification into the spiritual-patriarchal laying-on of hands by Christ and his apostles, the spiritual-legal and official by the Church, and the prophetic-healing, a New-Testament charisma, of a mysterious character. Our Lord healed at first by laying on of hands (Mark vi. 5; Luke iv. 41), but gradually passed over to the exclusive use of the word of power in order that he might not encourage the popular idea that there was a necessary connection between the laying-on of hands and the cure. He transferred his spirit to his disciples, when he raised his hands in blessing over them as he ascended (Luke xxiv. 50). This act, in connection with the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, is the source of the apostolic laying-on of hands. With the withdrawal of the miraculous gift of the Holy Ghost, ordination was developed as a legal and symbolical form out of the ecclesiastico-official laying-on of hands. But in the Roman Church the latter continues as a practice, in connection with the consecrating of catechumens, the preparation for baptism, confirmation, and particularly ordination, where the laying-on of hands constitutes the specific visible sign of the sacrament. See ORDINATION. J. P. LANGE.

IMPOSTORIBUS, De Tribus. In his encyclica (May 21–July 1, 1239) Gregory IX. accused Frederic II. of having said that the world had been deceived by three impostors, — Jesus, Moses, and Mohammed; that he who thought that God, the Creator of the world, could be born of a woman, was a fool; that nothing ought to be believed but that which is self-evident, or can be proved, etc. The emperor peremptorily denied ever to have used such expressions; but when we remember how well he liked to be called the precursor of the Antichrist, how infatuated he was by Arab philosophy, and how anticlerical was the whole atmosphere of the Hohenstaufen court, it seems not improbable that he may have entertained very sceptical views, though there is no direct proof. So much for the origin of the phrase. With respect to the book having this or a similar phrase for its title, there circulated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the most singular and contradictory rumors concerning its date and author, and even concerning its contents; for the book itself seemed to have disappeared. See GENTHE: De impostura religionum, Leipzig, 1833. The text edited by E. Weller in 1846, and again in 1876, is derived from a copy found in the Royal Library of Dresden, and dated 1598. But there must have been earlier editions, as the book is mentioned by Wilhelm Postel in 1563; and Campanella, who was accused of being its author, says that it was published thirty years before he was born, consequently in 1538. The contents of the book are sceptical throughout: even the ideas of the existence of God and the necessity of worshipping him are undermined. But the argumentation shows often a glaring lack of religious sense and theological knowledge, and has probably never led any one astray. W. MÖLLER.

IMPUTATION OF SIN AND OF RIGHT-EOUSNESS. I. THE WORD IN ITS SCRIPTURAL USAGE.—It is represented in the Old Testament

by the Hebrew צדק, and in the Septuagint and New Testament by the Greek word λογίζομαι. These words occur frequently in Scripture, and are variously translated in the authorized version; e.g., 'to think' (Job xxxv. 2; Rom. ii. 3), to regard (Isa. xxxiii. 8), to esteem (Isa. xxix. 16, 17; Rom. xiv. 14), to reckon (2 Sam. iv. 2), to be reckoned for or among (Rom. iv. 4, Luke xxii. 37), to impute (Lev. vii. 18; Rom. iv. 6-8), to lay to one's charge (2 Tim. iv. 16), to count (Rom. iv. 5). Liddell and Scott define λογίζομαι equivalent to "to count, deem, consider that any thing is." Cremer (Bib. Theo. Lex. of New-Testament Greek) says, λογίζεσθαι τι τίνι is equivalent to "to reckon any thing to a person; to put to his account, either in his favor, or as to what he must be answerable for."

II. THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMPUTATION OF ADAM'S FIRST SIN TO HIS DESCENDANTS.—The foregoing citations make it plain that the "imputation of sin" cannot be a physical act, or the making any one subjectively sinful, but that it is always a forensic act, or a charging to one the guilt of any sin as a ground of punishment. To "impute sin" is punitatively to lay it to one's charge (2 Tim. iv. 16): "not to impute sin" is to remit the punishment, or to acquit or to justify the person.

The entire historical church from the first has equally repudiated the two antithetic heresies of Manichæism and Pelagianism. In denying Manichæism, or the doctrine that sin is a substance, eternal and self-existent, the whole church has maintained that sin could have originated only in an apostatizing self-decision of an intelligent and free creature. In denying Pelagianism she has uniformly held that all infants come into the world with their moral natures depraved and guilty, and therefore needing redemption before they have individually done either good or evil. This problem involves, therefore, three distinct though related questions. (1) If all men, except the first, come into existence with natures morally corrupt anterior to personal agency of whatever kind, then how can Manichæism be avoided, and their sin be shown to originate in an act of personal self-decision? (2) How can God be justified in bringing (whether directly or mediately through natural law, it makes no difference) this root of all evils upon new-created creatures at the beginning of their careers? (3) How can this natural depravity be regarded as guilt, and not as disease and misfortune?

Origen, followed only by a few individuals, has answered all these questions at once by maintaining that all human souls had a personal probation in a pre-existing state; that the sinful character of each infant is a righteously imposed penal consequence of his own personal apostasy in that state (De Principiis, II., IX.). Dr. Julius Muller (Christian Doctrine of Sin, vol. ii. p. 157) in like manner refers this natural depravity to a transcendental and timeless personal self-decision of each soul.

But the historical church in all its branches has answered these three questions at once by teaching that this natural depravity, which infects each human soul from birth, is, in every case, a penal consequence of Adam's apostatizing act. Augustine (De Civ. Dei, lib. xiii. c. 3 and 14; Op. imperf. c. Jul. lib. iv. § 104); Dr. G. F. Wiggers (Augustinianism and Pelagianism, chap. 5, 2, § 2); Anselm (Cur Deus Homo? lib. ii. cap. 8; De Conceptu Virg. et Orig. Pec., caput x.); Thomas Aquinas (Summa Theol., i. quæ. 100, and ii. quæ. 81 and 82); Council of Trent (Sess. v. 1 and 2); Bellarmin (Amiss. Grat., iii. 1); Philip Melancthon (Apol. Aug. Conf., 46, 47; Expli. Symb. Nicen., in Corp. Refor., xxiii. 403, 583; Formula Concordiæ, Pars II. 1; De Pec. Orig., 27); Quenstedt (Quæ. Theo. Dict., Pol. I. 994); Calvin (Instit. Theol., bk. ii. chap. 1, §§ 4-7; Second Helvetic Conf., cap. viii. § 1); Zacharias Ursinus (Summe of Christian Religion; Lectures on Heidelberg Catechism; Origin of Sin; What are the Causes of Sin?); Amesius (Medul. Theol., lib. i. cap. 17); H. Witsius (Eccon. of Coven., bk. i. chap. 8, §§ 33, 34); J. Arminius (Public Disputations, Disp. 7, and Private Disputations, Disp. 31); Robert Watson (Institutes of Theology, pt. ii. chap. xviii.); President Witherspoon (Works, vol. iv. p. 96).

But, while the entire church has been thus far agreed, different schools have widely differed as to the true answer to the question. On what ground the descendants of Adam are held legally responsible for, i.e., punishable on account of, his first sin? The tendency at the first was to ascribe it to the natural relation of Adam alone, and sin was regarded as propagated ex traduce. Thus Tertullian taught that Adam is fons generis et princeps, and his soul matrix omnium (Dorner's System of Christian Doctrine, pt. ii. § 74). This obviously accounts for the fact of innate pollution, but not of guilt: it shows how sin descends, but not how the permission that it should thus descend consists with the justice of God. Therefore Augustine strove to introduce a moral ground for our sharing in the penal consequences of Adam's sin by showing that our wills were in some way represented in his will. "Omnes enim fuimus in illo, quando omnes fuimus ille unus" (De Civ. Dei, lib. xiii. cap. xiv.).

This conception of Augustine was repeated in various forms, but with virtual identity, until the appearance of the "federal theory," about the age of the Reformation. Sometimes it has been illustrated and re-enforced by realistic philosophy, but oftener it has stood alone as a revealed fact; or as a necessary inference from revealed facts. The federal view presupposes the natural headship of Adam as the progenitor of the entire human race, and builds upon it the further idea of moral representation under the analogy of a covenant, including all mankind in their first parent. Dr. Charles P. Krauth says, "The technicalities of the federal idea are late in appearing; but the essential idea itself comes in from the beginning in our (the Lutheran) theology." It was first prominently advanced by Catharinus in the Council of Trent (F. Paul Sarpi's History of Council of Trent, translated by Sir N. Brent, London, 1676, pp. 162-166), and by Hyperius, Olevianus, and Raphael Eglin (Dorner's History of Protestant Theology, vol. ii. pp. 31-45). Melancthon said (Expli. Symb. Nicen., in the Corp. Refor., xxiii. 403 and 583), "Adam and Eve merited guilt and depravity for their posterity, and in this trial they represented the whole human race."

This view was generally adopted among all the churches, Arminian as well as Reformed, and has prevailed almost universally until the appearance of the modern school of German speculative theologians. The "federal theology," as a method of exhibiting the whole plan of God's dealings with men in creation and redemption, under the forms of the two covenants of works and of grace, is generally attributed to Coccejus, professor in Leyden (d. 1669); but it is certain that this conception had taken hold of the British Reformed churches from the first. This is proved from the Method of the Christian Religion, compiled by Ussher in the second decade of the seventeenth century; from N. Byfield's (father of the clerk of the Westminster Assembly) Principles, or the Pattern of Wholesome Words, first edition, 1618; from Treatise of the Covenant of Grace, by J. Ball, published 1615, after his death; and from the Mysterium et Medulla Bibliorum, by Francis Roberts, London, 1657, a complete system of divinity on the method of covenants.

III. THE DOCTRINE OF THE IMPUTATION OF CHRIST'S RIGHTEOUSNESS TO HIS PEOPLE. — As Adam's apostatizing act is the guilty ground of the condemnation, alienation, and consequent depravity of the race, so the obedience and sufferings of Christ in their stead is the meritorious ground of the justification, reconciliation, and consequent regeneration of the beneficiaries of his redemption. This has virtually been the faith of the historical church from the beginning; although, from the prevalent confusion of the ideas of justification and sanctification, the ground of justification in imputed righteousness was not explicitly set forth before the Reformation, yet it was in essence involved in what the better schoolmen (as Anselm and Thomas Aquinas, etc.) taught as to the nature of the atonement, as to the headship of Christ, and as to the distinction between satisfaction and merit (Summa, pt. iii. quæ. 48, 49). While the thought of Luther is fully expressed in the language of St. Bernard (Tract. c. err. Abelardi, cap. vi. 15), the most evangelical of the schoolmen, "ut videlicet satisfactio unius omnibus imputetur, sicut omnium peccata unus ille portavit." This doctrine, in its strictest definition, was the characteristic of all the Reformers, and of the confessions and classical theology which has proceeded from them (Apol. Aug. Conf. de Justif.; Form. Concord, pt. ii. 9, 17; Calvin's Institutes, bk. iii. chap. 11, § 2; Heidelberg Catechism, Ques. 60; Westminster Confession, chap. xi.).

LIT. — In addition to the sources above cited, SCHAFF'S Creeks of Christendom, and Doctrinal and Historical Excursus, in his edition of Lange's Commentary on Romans (pp. 191-197), Decretum Syn. Nation. Eccle. Ref. Gal. (1645), de imputatione, etc. (RIVET: Opp., tom. iii.); essays of Dr. C. NINGHAM'S The Reformers and the Theology of the Reformation, Edinburgh, 1866, essay vii. § 2.

A. A. HODGE.

INABILITY in theology means want of power to do God's will. It may be natural, when the cause is extrinsic to the will; moral, when the cause is inherent in the will. The New School Calvinistic theologians contended that man has not natural, but merely moral, inability: consequently he can serve God if he will. The Old School denied him ability of any kind. The Arminians do the same, but affirm gracious ability, whereby man is enabled to be saved. See A. A. HODGE: Outlines, chap. xx.; C. HODGE: Sys. Theol., ii. 257-277.

INCAPACITY, as an ecclesiastical term, denotes absolute unfitness for ordination. The Roman-Catholic Church has established two cases of incapacity: women cannot be ordained, and men who are not baptized. In the latter case the incapacity is self-evident: in the former it is based on 1 Tim. ii. 12, 1 Cor. xiv. 34-35, and has never been doubted by the Church. The Protestant churches followed originally the same rules as the Roman Church, until lately some exceptions have been made with respect to women's incapacity.

INCARNATION. The doctrine of the incarnation, in its biblical elements and historical development, has already been treated in the art. CHRISTOLOGY. Its present relation and importance, in view of modern conceptions of the creation, require distinct mention. Three points should be noticed as specially significant.

I. The present tendency among many theologians is to lay increased stress upon the ethical necessity of the incarnation. It is to be conceived of as an immanent necessity of the love of God, and as involved in the purpose of the best possible creation. It is necessary to the complete self-revelation and self-impartment of God to the creation, and also for the perfection and consummation of the creation. The incarnation is that full and final outgoing of God into his creation which satisfies God's own moral perfection. It is, therefore, ideally necessary, involved, that is, in the idea of a perfect God and a perfect creation. The purpose of creation may be said, therefore, to include the purpose of incarnation; and the incarnation may be regarded as an eternal counsel of God, irrespective of the contingency of sin, and purpose of redemption. This conception of an incarnation as the consummation of the creation, even had there been no sin, is not to be confounded with the conception of a pantheistic self-development of the divine nature. There was no metaphysical necessity, but a purely ethical necessity, of incarnation for the perfect God. Therefore this view of it does not diminish the glory of free grace; rather redemption through the Son of God is seen to be no afterthought, or expedient of grace, but to be provided for, and made possible, in the eternal purpose of creation. Not only in the divine idea of creation was sin rendered possible, but also redemption through Him who is the completion and goal of the creation. The world was made capable of redemption in the same thought and purpose by which it was made capable of sinning. The incarnation, then, becomes a central and essential fact in our theodicy. All God's ways from the beginning lead up to Christ.

2. More stress is laid in recent theology upon the cosmical relations of the incarnation. The old truth of the natural headship of Christ receives new significance in view of modern theories of the origin and unity of the creation. If a theistic evolution be assumed, the Christ is not dethroned, but exalted, as the goal of the whole ascent of life, the end and completion of all conceivable development, the perfect Man beyond whom there can be none higher, the Head over all, in whom humanity is raised to the throne of divinity, the second Man, who is the Lord from heaven. The whole universe is thus seen to be created for Christ, through whom all things shall at last be made subject unto the Father, that God may be all, and in all.

3. These conceptions and tendencies of modern theology are proving themselves helpful, also, in relation to the problem of the two natures in the person of Christ. This has been, from the beginning of Christian theology, its great transcendent problem; and no thought of man can be great enough to comprehend the mystery of God in Christ. But any conception which brings this miracle of history into new light, or more apparent harmony with reason, is a welcome contribution to theology. So far as any progress in this doctrine has been made since the Protestant confessions were worked out, it has been by applying to the incarnation the idea of development (as Professor Dorner has done); so that the incarnation may be conceived as a process of union of two natures in one person. "The Word became flesh." This becoming flesh was real at the nativity. The birth of Jesus was the first moment of an actual, real incarnation. But it was not completed in the manger: the union of the two natures required the mediation of a life, as well as birth. It was a process begun at the nativity, and completed in the ascension of the Christ to the right hand of the Majesty on high. Room is thus found in this conception for the growth of the human nature, the coming to itself of the human soul; and, as far and as fast as the growth of the human nature permitted, it was made one in immutable union with the higher nature of the second man, the Lord from heaven. Christ was made perfect through suffering, and the life of Jesus was necessary to the perfection of the person of the Redeemer. Modern theology may be able to bring in this manner the fact of the incarnation into more hopeful relation to modern tendencies of thought; but imperfect as any conception of the mode of it must be, inadequate as are all human definitions of the method of God's love in the incarnation, the fact of it is the key to the creation and to history. This is the mystery of God, in whose light other mysteries are made plain. The incarnation, itself transcending reason, is the one sufficient, rational explanation of the universe. NEWMAN SMYTH.

INCENSE. The burning of incense entered, as a symbolical act, very largely into the religious rituals of Judaism and Græco-Roman Paganism. The Christian Church at first rejected the custom. See Tertullian: Apolog., 30; De cor. milit., 10; Athenagoras: Legat. pro Christ., 43; Arnobius: Adv. Gent., 7, 25. Later on, however, the Church adopted it. In the very minute descriptions of the administration of the Lord's Supper, in the Catecheses of Cyril and the Apostolical Constitutions, it is not mentioned. It occurs for the first time in the Apostolical Canons (can., iii.). Evagrius (sixth century, Hist. Eccl., vi. 21) speaks of a golden θυμιατήριον, or censer, presented to the Church of Jerusalem by Chosroes. At that time it had become common in the Eastern Church to fume with incense the elements of the Lord's Supper,—a ceremony which is found at the beginning of the middle ages in the Frankish Church. See Capitul. i. 6, in Harduin: Cone. Coll., v. In the evangelical churches the custom was never adopted. See FRANKINCENSE. G. E. STEITZ.

INCEST means carnal intercourse between persons within the degrees of relationship forbidden by law. Canon law followed in this field in the track of the Roman law, though with various modifications. Thus it distinguishes between incestus juris divini and incestus juris humani; the former being an offence against the precepts of Lev. xviii. and xx., the latter an offence against the precepts of some other law. It furthermore ascribes the same effect to relationship by affinity as to that of consanguinity, and it establishes an entirely new description of relationship by the so-called spiritual affinity, the effect of having been baptized or confirmed together. The inceste conjunctiones are specially treated by Concilium Aurelianense, iii. (538) c. 10, and Turonicum, ii. (567), c. 20. See also the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals (c. 4, C. III. q. 4; c. 2, C. XXXV. q. 2; c. 12, C. VI. q. 1). During the middle ages incest was cognizable only in the ecclesiastical courts, which had the power to annul incestuous marriages, and compel the offender to do penance. MEJER.

INCHOFER, Melchior, b. 1584, in Vienna, or, according to others, at Günz in Hungary; d. at Milan, Sept. 28, 1648; entered the Society of Jesus in 1607; taught philosophy and theology at Messina till 1636; lived for ten years in Rome, an intimate friend of Leo Allatius, and member of the Congregation of the Index; and was in 1616 appointed professor of the college of Macerata. Of his Epistola B. Mariæ V. ad Messanenses veritas vindicata (1629), the first edition was put on the Index, and suppressed. In his Historia sacre latinitalis (1635) he makes Latin the language of the blessed in the kingdom of heaven. In his Annales ecclesiastici regni Hungariæ (1644) he has invented a bull to prove the dependence of Hungary on Rome. He was at one time considered the author of the remarkable satire on the Jesuits, Monarchia Solipsorum, which, however, Audin has proved to belong to Scotti.

IN CŒNA DOMINI, the famous bull fulminating curses and excommunications, not only over all heretics and those who in any way support them, but also over all who oppose or wrong the church by taxing the clergy, appealing to a general council, etc., was the work of several popes, and was, with various modification, published every year on Holy Thursday or Easter Monday, from the fourteenth century till 1770, when Clement XIV. discontinued the publication from a regard to the temporal powers, which could not help feeling offended by the tone and spirit of that document.

INCORPORATION of an ecclesiastical benefice means that some ecclesiastical corporation, for instance, a monastery, takes possession of the benefice, enjoying its revenues, but also performing the spiritual duties for the sake of which it originally was founded. From the ninth century such incorporations became very frequent as a means by which the ecclesiastical corporations endeavored to increase their revenues. But, as they were always connected with more or less glaring abuses, the councils tried to regulate the proceedings (see Conc. Trid. sess., 7, c. 7); and, when the monasteries and other ecclesiastical institutions were secularized, they ceased altogether.

INDEPENDENTS. See CONGREGATIONALISM.

INDEX LIBRORUM PROHIBITORIUM is a list of books which the Roman-Catholic Church forbids its members to read, under penalty of excommunication. As a formally established institution, the Index dates back only to the sixteenth century; but the practice of forbidding the reading of books antagonistic to the interests of the Church is very old. The books of Arius were condemned and burnt; and, in the course of the fifth century, condemnations, with accompanying conflagrations of books deemed heretical, became very common. A Council of Carthage (400) even went so far as to forbid the reading of Pagan books. It was, however, not so much the purity of the doctrines which the Roman Church meant to defend by those proceedings, as her position as a power in the world. Consequently, when, by reading the Bible, people became aware of the huge discrepancy between the ideal and the actual church, the Bible itself was made a forbidden book; translations into the vernacular tongues were prohibited; and a Council of Toledo (1229) forbade laymen to have in their possession any of the books of the Old or New Testament. With the Reformation and the invention of the printing-press, the number of dangerous books attacking the Church, both her doctrines and her practices, increased in such a degree that a systematization of the old measures of prohibiting and forbidding became necessary; and in 1557 Paul IV. published in Rome the first official Index. In its eighteenth session the Council of Trent took the question under consideration, and a special committee was formed; but in its twenty-fifth session the council determined to place the whole affair under the direct authority of the Pope; and in 1564 Pius IV. issued a new Index, generally known as Index Tridentinus. Sixtus V. finally organized a special congregation of the Index, which is still in operation, and which, besides the Index librorum prohibitorum, also prepares an Index librorum expurgandorum; that is, a list of books which may be read after being expurgated, and freed from certain offensive passages. See Index librorum prohibitorum Rome, 1876; REUSCH: D. Index d. verbotenen Bücher, Bonn, 1883-85, 2 vols.

INDIA, Religions of. See BRAHMANISM, BRAHMO SOMAJ, BUDDHISM.

INDIA, or Hindustan, is one of the most extensive empires of the world, possesses an august history, has given birth to two of the most prevalent religions of mankind, has preserved venerable works of literature and art, and for the last two generations has furnished the most violent opposition to, as well as enjoyed the most earnest labors of, Christian missionary endeavor.

COUNTRY. — India comprises an area of 1,474,000 square miles. Lying between the Himalayas on the north — the most sublime mountain peaks in the world, rising, at their highest elevation (Mount Everest), twenty-nine thousand feet above the sea — and the Bay of Bengal and the Indian Ocean on the south, it possesses a great variety of climate and scenery. The country, for the most part, is poorly watered; but the Brahmaputra and Ganges are two mighty rivers, the latter more than thirteen hundred miles in length. The present population is two hundred and forty millions, of whom a hundred and twenty-one thousand are Europeans. There are eighteen cities with a population of over one hundred thousand; and of these Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, and Lucknow are the largest.

PEOPLE. — The people are of mixed descent. The old aboriginal races, which inhabited the country before the time of Alexander the Great, still preserve their identity. The most ancient is the so-called Dravidian stock, which includes those speaking the Tamil, Telugu, Malayalam, etc. These natives are dusky in complexion. With them have been intermingled the conquering races from the north, the more noble Aryans (who have imposed their literature upon the country), and the Mahometans, coming from Persia, Arabia, and other Asiatic countries. The most recent intermixture has come from Europe, and more especially through the English, who approached India from the sea, and are now the dominant factor in Indian society, although insignificant in point of numbers. The population is divided, as to religion, amongst various forms of worship. Brahmanism, or Hinduism, is the most venerable in point of age, and goes back several centuries before the advent of Christ. Buddhism came next in point of time, threatened to efface the Brahman worship, but was itself almost exterminated by the revolt of the Brahmans. Then came Mahometanism, and finally Christianity, which is the youngest and last. See BUDDHISM and BRAHMANISM. The people are divided as follows: —

Hindus	139,000,000
Mahometans	40,000,000
Buddhists	3,000,000
Sikhs	1,000,000
Christians	900,000

The people speak nearly a hundred languages, of which the principal are the Hindustani (and Hindi, which is, strictly speaking, the proper term for the modern dialect), Bengali, Mahratta, Telugu, Tamil, Punjabi.

HISTORY. — The history of India reaches far back into dim antiquity, and has its chief interest to us as a history of invasions and the domination, in turn, of the foreign invaders over the native populations. Alexander the Great crossed the Indus in 327 B.C., but was forced, by the discontent of his troops, to forego the ambition of waving his victorious sword over the peninsula. In 661 the first invasion of the followers of Mahomet occurred. The invaders were repelled, but returned in greater force in 711, and subdued the Hindus of Sindh, but were driven back again. The great Mahometan invasion is connected with the famous name of Sultan Mahmud of Ghazni (997-1030), fourteen of whose descendants sat on the throne of India. The name of that fierce warrior Timur (Tamerlane) also has a place in Indian history. He was crowned at Delhi in 1398. Of Indian sovereigns, the greatest has been Akbar the Great, whose reign lasted from 1556 to 1605. He ruled over a large part of India, and his name is famous as that of a conqueror and an administrator.

The connection of modern Europe with India dates from the latter part of the fifteenth century. The history of the land is closely connected with the Portuguese, Dutch, and English, and also, to some extent, with the French. Columbus, when he set sail from Europe in 1492, steered his vessels, as he thought, towards India, or the East Indies as the country was then called. In 1498 Vasco da Gama cast anchor off the Indian city of Calicut; and the Portuguese at once began to establish trading-posts, and continued to have a monopoly of the trade during the whole of the sixteenth century. In 1509 the Portuguese governor, Albuquerque, seized Goa, which has ever since been the capital of the Portuguese possessions in India. The avowed object of the Portuguese was to promote the spread of Christianity, and conquer the land. They retain control of only a thousand and eighty-six square miles, with a population of four hundred thousand. In 1602 the Dutch East-India Company was organized. The Dutch were the first to disturb the undisputed possession of the Portuguese. During the sixteenth century, vessels from Holland had traded with Indian ports; and, in the first half of the seventeenth, the Dutch rapidly extended their possessions, expelling the Portuguese before them.

The first foundation of British empire in India was laid by the English East-India Company, which received a charter in 1600 from Queen Elizabeth. Its capital stock amounted then only to the modest sum of seventy thousand pounds. The wealth of this corporation grew with astonishing rapidity, and its power almost kept pace with its wealth. Lord Clive and Warren Hastings may be said to have been the architects of the British empire in India, which is usually dated from the battle of Plassey (June 23, 1757), in which Clive won a decisive victory. The influence of the Portuguese, Dutch, and French, henceforth waned before the dominant power of the English. He was appointed, in 1758, first governor of all the company's settlements in Bengal; and, after a visit to England, he filled the office for a second time, — from 1665 to 1667. Warren Hastings arrived in India in 1772, and organized the administrative government of the empire which Clive had founded. From that time on, till the present, the British dominions in India have been extending, until, at the present time, there are eight provinces under the administration of England, stretching from the waters of Cape Comorin to the shadows of the Himalayas. The British power has since been seriously threatened only once (in 1857), by the Indian mutiny, which, spreading from an apparently insignificant cause, but really rooted in the aversion to the rulers, spread rapidly among the people, and entailed a series of quick and thrilling horrors upon the English residents. Until 1858 the East India Company, under various restrictions, exercised supreme sway over India, its power culminating in the "governor-general in council." In this year it was abolished, and India was placed under the immediate administration of the English Government. Its highest officer is called "viceroy," and a secretary for India sits in the cabinet. The Earl of Ripon has been viceroy since 1880. On Jan. 1, 1877, the Queen of England was proclaimed Empress of India.

During the century great changes have been effected in the condition of the population of India. It is not possible to separate these reforms from the direct influence of the missionaries. But there have been distinguished Christian governors-general of India, such as Lord Bentinck (1828-35), the Earl of Dalhousie (1848-56), and others, whose enlightened statesmanship has effected permanent and most salutary reforms in the administration of the courts, the abolition of revolting social customs, the promotion of education, and the extension of commercial benefits, such as the construction of railways, of which there were 8,215 miles in operation in 1878. To Lord Bentinck is due the honor of having suppressed the suttee, or the practice of burning widows alive on the graves of their husbands. In 1817 no less than seven hundred widows were committed to the flames in Bengal alone. By the decree of 1829 all who abetted suttee were declared guilty of "culpable homicide." It was this same enlightened administrator who suppressed the Thugs, a large and secret association of assassins, who spread terror through the land. To the government are also due measures for the suppression of infanticide, which once was practised to an enormous extent; female infants being particularly chosen as the victims.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS. — India has been the chief seat of missionary endeavor for the last two generations. Nearly all the missionary organizations of Europe and America have made it a basis of operations; and with it will always be associated some of the purest names in the proud annals of modern missions, — Ziegenbalg, Schwartz, Henry Martyn, Carey, Marshman, Reginald Heber, and others. There Christianity was struggling through trials and discouragements, while the islands of the South Seas were rapidly emerging from darkness into the light. But, although the results were slow in showing themselves, the recent current towards Christianity has been strong, and has surpassed the most sanguine expectations. Although the proportion of Christians to the whole population is still small (one-half of one per cent), it must be remembered that the influence of the gospel cannot be accurately measured by numbers. Christian influences are, by the testimony of all parties, gradually undermining superstitious practices, and working a reform in the social life. "Missions," said Lord Lawrence, "have done more to benefit India than all other agencies combined." Sir Bartle Frere said, "Missions have worked changes more extraordinary for India than any thing witnessed in modern Europe." Other testimonies from civilians, to the same import, might be added if necessary. An ancient tradition represents that St. Thomas planted Christianity in India. We come to solid ground when Francis Xavier (d. 1552) was sent out as a missionary by the king of Portugal. In 1531 Goa was made the first (Catholic) bishopric of India. One of the professed objects of the Portuguese occupation of India was the spread of the gospel. After various vicissitudes, Roman Catholicism continues to flourish; but its influence in elevating the tone of the moral and social life of the people is hardly perceptible. The earliest Protestant mission to India was founded by Frederick IV. of Denmark in 1705; and in 1706 Ziegenbalg arrived at Tranquebar, and began his devoted labors. The translation of the Scriptures into Tamil was begun by him. This Danish mission passed, in 1825, over to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. In 1751 Christian Friedrich Schwartz (venerabile et præclarum nomen), having been ordained at Copenhagen, arrived at the mission. He died in 1798, but had lived long enough to win the confidence of the native princes, and to secure for his name an undying fame. At the present time, thirty-five Protestant societies have missionaries in India. There are six hundred and eighty-nine ordained European and American ministers, two hundred and forty-four of whom are from England. It will be possible here only to give a brief account of the labors of the principal of these societies, and we shall arrange them according to the date of their beginning operations.

The English Baptist Missionary Society began its work in India in 1793, when William Carey arrived (Nov. 7) in Bengal. He established himself thirty miles from Calcutta; then at Mudnabatty, two hundred and sixty miles north of Calcutta, where he opened a school (1798), and put up a printing-press; and finally at Serampore, which became a distinguished centre of light for all India, and from whose printing-presses issued translations of the Scriptures into many of the languages of the land. In 1799 this mission was re-enforced by those devoted laborers, Ward and Marshman. In 1800 the first part of the New Testament had been translated into Bengalee; and on Feb. 7, 1801, the entire New Testament was finished. In 1809 the translation of the entire Bible into Bengalee, and of the New Testament into Sanscrit, was completed. Carey died June 9, 1834. His example, heroism, and missionary devotion will ever stamp him as one of the apostles of India. Statistics of 1881: English missionaries, 37; evangelists, 131; native communicants, 3,467; day schools, 104; scholars, 2,225.

The London Missionary Society sent three missionaries to India in 1804, who established themselves at Vizagapatam, five hundred and fifty miles south-west of Calcutta. In 1819 its agents had translated the whole New Testament into the Telinga language. In 1805 it established itself at Madras; in 1806, in Travancore; 1816, at Calcutta, etc. Statistics of 1882: 48 English missionaries, 271 native ordained ministers and preachers, 5,210 communicants, 378 schools, 5,928 scholars.

The American Board began its labors in India in 1812, when Judson, Rice, Nott, Newell, and Hall sailed for there. The opposition of the government forced them all to retire. Hall and Nott went to Bombay, but were not fairly settled in their work till 1811. The following year they were sufficiently proficient in the Mahratta language to begin preaching. In March, 1816, they introduced the first printing-press in Bombay, and at once set to work to translate and print the New Testament. In 1818 there were eleven schools under the care of the Board, with an attendance of six hundred scholars. On May 12, 1823, the chapel was dedicated in Madras, "the first Christian temple on the western side of the Indian peninsula." In 1821 Newell died, Hall following him in 1826. In 1831 occurred the first Christian marriage of a Brahman. The missionaries established a native temperance society in 1832, binding its members to abstain from strong drink, opium, and tobacco. In 1839 there was strong opposition against the missionaries on account of their success; and a legal process was instituted to force them to abstain from the work of making converts, but in vain. In 1843 the opposition took the form of printing native books and papers at Bombay, and refuting Christianity from the writings of Paine, Voltaire, and other infidel authors. The translation of the entire Scriptures into Mahratta was completed in 1847, the New Testament having been finished in 1826. The American Board has two centres of missions in India Proper.—Maratha in Western India, and Madura in Southern India; and in 1881 employed 52 missionaries and assistant missionaries, and 563 native helpers. Its churches had 3,931 members, and 5,669 scholars in its schools. In Ceylon it employs 16 missionaries, 172 native helpers, and has 972 church-members, and 8,981 scholars.

The Church Missionary Society (English) began its labors in India at Agra in 1813, and at Madras in 1815. It had encouraged the Danish missions before. It directed its efforts at the first mainly to Tranquebar and Tinnevely. In 1853 it had 5,815 communicants, and 17,000 scholars in its schools. Statistics of 1882: 103 European and 121 native missionaries, 20,439 communicants, 1,157 schools with 32,853 boy and 11,452 girl scholars. In Ceylon it employs 18 European and 14 native missionaries, and has 1,636 communicants.

The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (English) began its Indian mission in 1818, at Calcutta. In 1853 it had 48 missions, with 166 assistants, 4,629 communicants, and 5,500 scholars. Its missions in the Punjab and Sindh in Northern India are making rapid progress. Since 1877 the accessions of this society in Tinnevely alone amount to 20,000, and it has 60,000 adherents in that district. These two societies of the Church of England have the largest number of adherents in India. The Church of England has at present four Indian episcopal sees.—Calcutta (Metropolitan), Bombay, Madras, and Lahore, with six bishops, Drs. Sargent and Caldwell being assistants to the Bishop of Madras.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society (English) began its work, through the Rev. Mr. Lynch, in Madras, in 1817. In 1830 the number of missionaries was nine, and of schools twenty-five. Mysore and Calcutta have been their two most important strategic centres. In the former place their schools are in a very prosperous condition. The society in 1881 had 100 missionaries in India, 129 schools, 9,148 scholars, 1,497 communicants, and 3,081 communicants in Ceylon.

The Church of Scotland sent out its first missionary to India in 1829, in the person of Dr. Duff, who arrived in Calcutta in 1830. During his long and eminently useful career he secured the respect of all classes; and his eloquent voice on his visits to Scotland and the United States aroused the deepest interest in the general cause of missions. He established a collegiate institute in Calcutta, which has been attended by hundreds of Hindus. Dr. John Wilson, about the same time, inaugurated the work of the Church of Scotland at Bombay. The disruption of 1843 in the Scotch Church led to a division of the work in India; and both the Established and Free churches support their own missionary force. Narayan Sheshadri, the converted Brahman who has made two visits to America (in 1873 and 1880), is connected with the Free Church. In 1882 it had 142 schools, 10,444 scholars, 1,286 communicants.

The American Presbyterian Mission in India was started in 1834 by the arrival of William Read and John C. Lowrie. These missionaries chose as the scene of their labors the northern provinces, whither no missionaries had, up to that time, penetrated. Lodiana was the first centre of operations (1834). The Gospel of John was translated, in 1840, into the Punjabi, the language of the Sikhs. The mission has been very successful. In 1842 three presbyteries were constituted,—Lodiana, Furrukhabad, and Allahabad; and in 1845 the first meeting of the synod of Northern India convened at Futtehgurh. Kolapore is now a fourth centre of missionary operations. According to the report of 1882, the mission has 5,870 boys and 2,341 girls in its schools, and carries on its work through 30 American, 15 native preachers, and 52 American female, and 171 native lay missionaries. The number of communicants connected with the mission is 1,019, and its annual expenditure $102,982.

The Basel Missionary Society opened a mission on the west coast of India in 1834. In 1850 it had 28 missionaries and the same number of native assistants, with 187 communicants. It now has 1,100 communicants.

The American Baptist Mission was begun in 1835; is interested more especially in the Telugus, of whom there are 15,000,000, whose district lies on the eastern coast, and stretches nearly eight hundred miles,—from the northern borders of the Carnatic to Orissa. In 1854 this society had one station, two missionaries, nine communicants, and two schools, with sixty-three pupils. The history of this mission is one of the most inspiring single episodes in recent church history. Twenty-seven years ago it was proposed, at the anniversary meeting of the Baptist Foreign Missionary Society in Albany, to abandon the mission among the Telugus as a hopeless enterprise. It was called the "Lone Star Mission." After a protracted discussion, it was decided to continue the work; and a hymn which Dr. F. S. Smith had retired to compose was read, containing the verse which now seems like a prophecy:—

"Shine on, 'Lone Star!' the day draws near
When none shall shine more fair than thou;
Thou, born and nursed in doubt and fear,
Wilt glitter on Immanuel's brow."

In 1879 a remarkable movement took place among the people, which would have justified even more patience than the missionaries had exercised. 8,691 were baptized in Nellore in two months, and 2,222 in a single day. Statistics of 1882: American missionaries, 29; native, 91; communicants, 18,992.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist-Episcopal Church (American) began operations in Northern India in 1856, and in Southern India in 1872. The North India Conference was organized in 1866, and consists of the Rohilkund, Oudh, and Kumaon districts. According to the report of 1882, the Conference employs 21 foreign missionaries and 16 assistants, has 19 ordained native preachers and 68 unordained native preachers, with 1,916 church-members and 1,307 probationers. Its day schools number 242, with an attendance of 8,500 scholars. The Conference of South India was organized in 1876, and is composed of four districts,—Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, and Allahabad. In 1881 it employed 27 foreign missionaries and 38 native preachers. The total number of communicants was 1,253, and of probationers 726. It carries on 14 day schools, with an attendance of 600.

The Gossner (1838), Berlin (1843), and Leipzig (1853) societies also carry on an important work in India. The Quakers (four missions), General Baptists (1827), Freewill Baptists (1836), Irish Presbyterians (1841), American Lutherans, Moravians, Scotch and American United Presbyterians, the Reformed Church in America, and other denominations, have missions.

Turning away from the missionary agencies, it remains to present a general view of the difficulties of missionary effort in India, and the results which have been secured.

The first missionaries to India not only had the opposition from the native population to contend against, but also the hostility of the East-India Company, which at one time absolutely forbade all missionary effort, prohibited Judson and the other missionaries from laboring at Calcutta, and for many years greatly restricted the freedom of the missionaries. But in 1813 a resolution by the English Parliament was passed, by which the company was forced to accord to all British subjects the right to establish schools and missions in India; and in 1833, at the renewal of its charter, full liberty of missionary operations was granted, and the privilege accorded to foreigners to settle in India. These privileges were immediately taken advantage of by several American societies. For the character of the religions which the natives of India profess, it must suffice to refer the reader to the arts. BRAHMANISM, BUDDHISM, and MOHAMMEDANISM.

One of the peculiar obstacles, as well as one of the most serious ones, to the success of missions in India, has been the system of caste. By it the people are divided off into classes, of which the Brahmans are the highest. These classes are fixed; and the dignity of the one, and the degradation of the other, pass down from generation to generation unalterably. Opposed to one of the fundamental ideas of the New Testament, that "God is no respecter of persons," the missionaries have almost unanimously and uniformly refused to acknowledge any such distinction among the converts. But this principle is deeply rooted in the Brahman's mind. "It is difficult for us Europeans," said Professor Monier Williams of Oxford, in 1879, "to understand how the pride of caste as a divine ordinance interpenetrates the whole being of a Hindu. He looks upon caste as his veritable god; and those caste-rules which we believe to be a hindrance to his adoption of the true religion, are to him the very essence of all religion; for they influence his whole life and conduct." Henry Martyn said, "If I ever see a Hindu Brahman converted to Jesus Christ, I shall see something more nearly approaching the resurrection of a dead body than any thing I have ever yet seen." Up to the year 1849 converts were subjected, not only to exclusion from the society of the caste, but to confiscations of property. But in that year a law was established, giving equal rights to all subjects, and protecting converts against confiscations. Not a few Brahmans are active and influential Christians; but the great mass of the converts have been, as was to be expected, from the lower classes. The other obstacles to missionary progress have been of the same general character as those met with in other lands.

The progress of the gospel in India for the first fifty years was slow, when we look at the number of native baptisms; but within the whole period remarkable changes have been effected in the habits of thought and social condition of the people; and, within the last few years, evidence has been furnished, in the large accessions to the churches, that the patient and faithful labors of the missionaries had been laying deep and permanent foundations. In 1851 there were 17,000 baptized and 128,000 native nominal Christians in India, with 357 foreign missionaries. In 1861 the number had increased to 48,000 baptized and 213,000 nominal Christians; in 1871, to 78,000 baptized and 318,000 nominal Christians. In 1882 there were not less than 800,000 or 900,000 nominal Christians, with 689 foreign missionaries, and many self-supporting native churches. The additions to the churches within the last several years have been exceedingly numerous. The great famine which prevailed in 1879, and which, according to the London Times, carried off 3,000,000 in the province of Madras alone, afforded an occasion for the display of Christian charity. The bountiful distributions of aid won the hearts of the natives, who flocked to the churches; and 16,000 were added in Tinnevely alone. In this period (1877-79) the number of converts under the care of the five Lutheran societies rose from 3,000 to 42,000. The ten Presbyterian missions of Scotland, Ireland, America, and England, from 1850 to 1878, increased their native constituency from 800 to 10,000; the London Missionary Society, from 20,000 to 48,000; and the Church Missionary Society and Propagation Society, from 61,000 to 164,000 (Christlieb: Foreign Missions, p. 153). The early progress was amidst discouragements, but the recent accretions more than atone for them. In 1850 there were four baptized converts among the Kohls; and for five years six German missionaries (Gossner Society) had labored among them with only one convert, and five of their own number falling at their post. There are now at least 4,000 baptized converts under the care of the English and German societies. The London and Propagation Societies labored for thirty years at Cuddapah in the Telugu district, with only 200 converts, and now they have 11,000. These, with the case of the American Telugu mission above referred to, are but illustrations of the discouragements and encouragements of the work.

The beneficent influence of missions is apparent in the abolition of superstitious and cruel customs, the increase of intelligence, the diffusion of a literature in almost all the native languages, and in a general leavening process, which has affected a large part of the Indian society of the upper classes. In the work of suppressing superstitious and cruel customs, the government has done much; but even this activity can be clearly traced to the influence of missions in India. The abolition of the suttee by Lord Bentinck has already been referred to; and to this same class of reforms belong the suppression of the annual holocausts under Juggernaut's car, and the practice of infanticide, and the throwing of infants into the Ganges, as a religious service. On the other hand, the change which is slowly taking place in the position of woman is due entirely to the missionaries, especially to the efforts of female missionaries. These gain admittance to the seclusion of the zenanas, and give instruction to the superstitious and unfortunate women of India. The government does not directly give the weight of its influence on the side of missions; but rather, on the contrary, it impedes the progress of the gospel by the rigid exclusion of religious instruction from the government schools. The printing-press has been introduced by missionary enterprise into almost every large centre of influence. The first newspaper established was the Sámáchar Durpan at Serampore, in 1818, by the Baptist mission. Not only have the papers under the control of the missionaries and the English multiplied greatly, but a native periodical literature has grown up, which owes its origin to a feeling of the necessity of combating Christianity in this way. The Bible has been translated entire into many of the languages, and ponderous libraries have already been printed in them.

The promotion of education as a means of reaching the people has been vigorously pushed. It may be a fair question whether the missionaries have not devoted relatively too much time to the schoolroom. Be that as it may, however, there is to-day a cordon of schools in the cities and larger towns of the Indian Empire. The government now conducts an extensive plan of education; but it got the impetus from the large advantages which it was apparent were accruing from the mission schools (art. India in Encyc. Britan.). In 1854 it established universities in Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. The government schools are divorced from religion. The mission schools directly or indirectly teach the gospel. The education of women has progressed slowly. In 1861 there were 60,600 boys and 16,008 girls in the mission schools of India. In 1871 the numbers had risen to 95,500 boys and 26,600 girls. The writer in the Encyclopædia Britannica (p. 775), above referred to, says, "In a few exceptional places, e.g., Tinnevely, Madras, and the Kháisi hills of Assam, female education has a real existence; for in these places the missionaries have influence enough to overcome the prejudices of the people." In 1878 there were 66,600 girls attending schools for girls, and 90,900 boys and girls attending the mixed schools.

The power of Christian missions in India has been further demonstrated by the new religious movements which have been begun to check its progress, or at any rate to find a mean between the superstitions of the native religions and the supernatural element of Christianity. The Brahmo Somaj (see art.) inaugurated by Keshub Chunder Sen is the principal of this class. These movements betray the unrest of the people, their growing discontent with their native religions, and longing for something purer and more rational to supply their place, and to counteract the advance of Christianity. But as Dr. Christlieb (p. 188) says, "The Hindus themselves feel and know that the downfall of their faith is inevitable. The dissolution of the Brahmo Somaj has already begun; and Keshub Chunder Sen was obliged long ago to acknowledge that 'native society is being roused, enlightened, and reformed under the influence of Christianity.'" In a public speech at Calcutta he has said, "Our hearts are touched, conquered, overcome, by a higher power; and this power is Christ. Christ, not the British Government, rules India. No one but Christ has deserved the precious diadem of the Indian crown, and he will have it." These words of this remarkable man may be regarded as prophetic of the issue of the movement which was begun by Schwartz, Carey, and Martyn. Christianity—which rings the death-knell to caste, suppresses infanticide, abolishes child-marriages, takes woman out of the degrading seclusion of the zenana, promotes culture, and builds up homes—has commended itself as the power for the regeneration of the land by the testimony of English civilians and native scholars, as well as in its fruits in the changed lives of its converts, and will prevail.

INDIANS. North-American. See Appendix.

INDUCTION denotes, as the term is used in the Church of England, the formal installation, in accordance with the mandate of the bishop, of a clerk, already instituted, in possession of a benefice. The act is generally performed by the deacon, who accompanies the clerk to the church, places his hand on the key or the ring of the church-door, and says to him, "By virtue of this mandate I do induct you into the real, actual, and corporal possessions of this church of Christ, with all the rights, profits, and appurtenances thereto belonging." The clerk then opens the door, enters the church, and tolls a bell, to make his induction known to the parishioners, after which the inductor indorses the certificate of induction on the mandate of the bishop.

INDULGENCES (Indulgentia), an institution peculiar to the Roman Church, originated from confession. In order to make the absolution effective, the sacrament of confession must comprise, besides contritio cordis and confessio oris, also satisfactio; and this satisfaction consists chiefly in so-called good works, — penances, by which the wrongs done are paid for. In the old church the amount of satisfactio was measured by the time alone during which the state of penitence should last. But gradually the custom grew up of substituting specific good works, such as pilgrimages, alms, etc., for the general state of penitence; and an elaborate scheme of accounts was drawn up, by which the penances were transformed into money-payments, varying according to the wealth or poverty of the sinner. On the basis of this practice the scholastic theology developed its doctrine of indulgentia: it was completed by Thomas Aquinas, and retained unchanged by the Council of Trent.

With respect to the natural consequences of sin, such as disease, infamy, etc., the Roman Church does not pretend to possess any power; but with respect to those punishments which God inflicts on sinners, either in this world or in purgatory, she claims to have absolute jurisdiction conferred upon her by Christ, with the power of the keys; and the Council of Trent fulminated its anathema against any one who should venture on a denial. If, now, the Church should remit those punishments from mere mercy, and without any satisfactio, she would violate the divine justice, which demands that every sin shall be balanced by a good work. But how, then, does the indulgentia of the Church enter into the transaction? Partly through the doctrine of good works as opera operata, that is, as values which can be transferred from one to another; and partly through the doctrine of communio sanctorum, or the co-ownership of the Church in the inexhaustible fund of good works which Christ and the saints have left, and of which they have no need themselves. The trustee of these funds — this thesaurus meritorum, thesaurus supererogationis perfectorum — is the Pope; and he can give or sell from these funds to any one just such an amount of good work as is necessary to counterbalance a certain quantity of sin. See ALEXANDER HALESIUS: Summa, p. 4, quæst. 23, art. 2, number 5; and THOMAS AQUINAS: Summa supplement, p. 3, quæst. 25, c. 28 N.

As a reminiscence of the discipline of the ancient Church, indulgences are still granted for days, months, and years. They are either complete (indulgentia plenaria) or partial (indulgentia minus plena): either general, for the whole church; or particular, for a special diocese. The most general indulgence granted by the Roman Church is that of her jubilee. The whole department of indulgences is administrated by a special congregation of cardinals; but the Questiones Eleemosynarum, or travelling agents, have been abolished.

It was the sale of indulgences in Germany, by Tetzel, which first roused the indignation of Luther, and opened the Reformation. See LUTHER, REFORMATION, TETZEL. See AMORT: De Origine, Progressu, etc., Indulgentiarum, Augsburg, 1735; and I. B. HIRSCHER: D. Lehre vom Abluss, Tübingen, 1844.

INFALLIBILIST, one who believes in and defends the official infallibility of the Pope of Rome, or his freedom from error when giving a decision on matters of faith or morals. The term is of scholastic or recent origin, from the Latin infallibilis, which is likewise modern, and found neither in classical nor patristic writers. Lewis and Short, in Harpers' Latin Dictionary, wrongly quote Augustine (Præd. Sanct., 15, 2) for infallibiliter: the word there used is ineffabiliter. The designation was prominently brought into use in 1870, during the Vatican Council, which was at first divided between infallibilists and anti-infallibilists, but at last decided in favor of infallibility. The anti-infallibilists were divided again into two parties, — those who opposed the doctrine of papal infallibility from principle, as false (Bishops Hefele, Maret, Kenrick, Darboy, Strossmeyer), and those who opposed it only from expediency, deeming it inopportune, or untimely and unwise, to define and to declare the dogma: hence the latter were called also *inopportunist*s, as distinct from the *opportunist*s. See INFALLIBILITY and VATICAN COUNCIL.

INFALLIBILITY OF THE POPE, the doctrine that the Bishop of Rome in his official character, i. e., whenever he speaks ex cathedrâ on a question of Catholic doctrine or morals, is free from error, and that his decisions must be accepted as final, without needing confirmation by an œcumenical council. Personally the Pope may be a heretic and a bad man, or an ignorant; but as the head of the Church he is supposed to be divinely protected from error. The fathers, the ancient creeds and councils, know nothing of this doctrine; and the Greek Church rejects it as a blasphemous assumption. It arose in the middle ages, in connection with the pseudo-Isidorian decretals, and was defended by able schoolmen (even Thomas Aquinas), but stoutly denied by the reformatory councils of Pisa, Constance, and Basle, which asserted the superiority of a council over the Pope. After the Council of Trent, it became a bone of contention between the Gallicans and the Jesuits. The latter triumphed in the Vatican Council, which brought the controversy to a close, and formulated the new article of faith by the decree of July 18, 1870, in these words: "Therefore, faithfully adhering to the tradition received from the beginning of the Christian faith, for the glory of God our Saviour, the exaltation of the Catholic religion, and the salvation of Christian people, the Sacred Council approving, we teach and define that it is a dogma divinely revealed, that the Roman pontiff when he speaks ex cathedrâ — that is, when, in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals to be held by the universal church, by the divine assistance promised to him in blessed Peter (Luke xxii. 32) — is possessed of that infallibility with which the divine Redeemer willed that his Church should be endowed for defining doctrine regarding faith or morals; and that therefore such definitions of the Roman pontiff are irreformable of themselves, and not from the consent of the Church. But if any one — which may God avert! — presume to contradict this our definition, let him be anathema."

Papal infallibility was the chief topic of the Vatican Council: it was discussed under powerful opposition for several months. When the vote was first taken in secret session (July 13, 1870), six hundred and one members being present, four hundred and fifty-one bishops voted in the affirmative (placet), eighty-eight in the negative (non placet), sixty-two voted with a qualification (placet juxta modum), and over eighty, though present in Rome, abstained from voting. On the evening of the same day the minority, which included the ablest and most influential prelates (as Darboy of Paris, Schwarzenberg of Prague, Rauscher of Vienna, Dupanloup of Orléans, Förster of Breslau, Ketteler of Mayence, Strossmayer of Bosnia, Hefele of Rottenburg, Kenrick of St. Louis), sent a deputation to the Pope, and begged him on their knees to modify the proposed decree, and to make some concession for the peace and unity of the Church. But Pius IX. surprised the deputation with the assurance that the Church had always believed in the unconditional infallibility of the Pope ("I am the tradition"). In the secret session of July 16, on motion of some Spanish bishop, an addition was inserted, declaring the Pope infallible before and without the consent of the Church (non autem ex consensu ecclesie). On the 17th of July, fifty-six bishops, opposed to the dogma, sent a written protest to the Pope, declaring their firm adherence to their conviction, but also their reluctance to vote against him on a matter affecting him personally, and asking leave to return home. On the evening of the same day, the signers of this protest, and sixty additional members of the opposition, left Rome (taking advantage of the rumors of war), and thus gave an easy victory to the majority. In the public session, held July 18, there were but five hundred and thirty-five members present, and all voted placet except two (Bishop Riccio of Sicily, and Bishop Fitzgerald of Little Rock, Ark., who dared to protest against the Big Rock of Rome); but these two changed their vote before the close of the session. After the vote, the Pope, amidst a fearful thunderstorm and flashes of lightning, read by candlelight, in St. Peter's Cathedral, the decree of his own infallibility. The day after, Napoleon III., his chief political support, declared war against Germany. This war in a few weeks swept away both his throne and that of the Pope, and resulted in the unification of Italy, with Rome for its capital, and the establishment of the German Empire under the lead of Protestant Prussia. The proclamation of this new dogma is the cause of the secession of the "Old Catholics," under the lead of Dollinger (heretofore the pride of the Roman Church in Germany) and other eminent Catholic scholars. It is also the cause of the renewal of the serious conflict between the Pope and the Emperor (the Culturkampf, the Falk-Laws, Bismarck's refusal to go to Canossa, etc.), and of a similar conflict between the Pope and the French Republic, which arose on the ruins of the empire.

The Vatican dogma is the apex of the pyramid of the Roman hierarchy. Logically it is more consistent than the Gallican theory, as an absolute monarchy is more consistent than a constitutional monarchy. It teaches an unbroken and ever-active infallibility; while Gallicanism secures only a periodic and intermittent infallibility, which never reveals itself except in an œcumenical council. But neither theory can stand the test of history, and is a mere pretension. The sixth œcumenical council (held in Constantinople 680) condemned and excommunicated Pope Honorius I. (625-638) "as a heretic (Monothelite), who, with the help of the old serpent, had scattered deadly error." This anathema was solemnly repeated by the seventh and by the eighth œcumenical councils (787 and 869), and even by the popes themselves, who, down to the eleventh century, in a solemn oath at their accession, indorsed the sixth œcumenical council, and pronounced "an eternal anathema" on the authors of the Monothelite heresy, together with Pope Honorius, "because he had given aid and comfort to the perverse doctrines of the heretics." This papal oath was probably prescribed by Gregory II. at the beginning of the eighth century, and was found in the Liber diurnus and Liber pontificalis down to the eleventh century. Even the editions of the Roman Breviary, before the sixteenth century, reiterated the charge of heresy against Honorius. Pope Leo II. strongly confirmed the decree of the council against his predecessor Honorius, and denounced him as one who "endeavored by profane treason to overthrow the immaculate faith of the Roman Church" (qui hanc apostolicam ecclesiam non apostolicæ traditionis doctrina lustravit, sed profana proditiōne immaculatam fidem subvertere conatus est). See Mansi, Concilia, Tom. XI. p. 731. Now, either the council, or the Pope, or both, must have erred. The stubborn case of Honorius, which alone is sufficient to upset the dogma (for si falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus), was strongly urged before the passage of the decree by learned members of the council, as Bishops Hefele and Kenrick; and their arguments have never been refuted. But a dogma triumphed over history. If facts are against opinion (it was said by the infallibilists), all the worse for the facts.

History knows of other heretical popes. Zephyrinus (201-219) and Callistus (219-223) were Patripassians; Liberinus (358) signed an Arian creed, and condemned Athanasius, "the father of orthodoxy," who mentions the fact with indignation; Felix II. was a decided Arian; Zosimus (117) at first indorsed the heresy of Pelagius and Cælestius, whom his predecessor, Innocent I., had condemned; Vigilius (538-555) vacillated between two opposite decisions during the Three Chapter Controversy, and thereby produced a long schism in the West; John XXII. (d. 1331) denounced a certain opinion of Nicholas III. and Clement V. as heretical; several popes taught the universal depravity of men in a manner that clearly includes the Virgin Mary, and is irreconcilable with the recent dogma of the immaculate conception; Sixtus V. issued an edition of the Latin Bible with innumerable blunders, partly of his own making, and declared it the only true authentic text. Bellarmine, the great Roman controversialist and infallibilist, could not deny the facts, and advised the printing of a new edition with the bold statement in the preface, charging the errors of the infallible Pope upon the fallible printer, though the Pope had himself corrected the proofs. Pius IX., who proclaimed his own infallibility, started out as a political reformer, and advocate of Italian unity, but afterwards detested and condemned it as the worst enemy of Christianity. But since 1870 Gallicanism is dead, and the Roman Church must sink or swim with an infallible pope.

INFANT BAPTISM. See BAPTISM OF INFANTS.

INFANT COMMUNION, or the dispensing of the elements to actual babes and to very young children. The first trace of this custom is found in Cyprian (third century), who, in his treatise On the Lapsel, represents infants as saying, on the day of judgment, "We have not forsaken the Lord's bread and cup" (De lapsis, c. ix.); and in the same book he tells a striking story, how an infant refused the cup, and, when the deacon forced some of the wine down her throat, she was seized with vomiting. The explanation was, that the child, unknown to her parents, had previously, while under the care of her nurse, eaten bread soaked in wine which had been poured out at an idolatrous ceremony (De lapsis, c. xxv.). The custom of infant communion was indeed universal at that time: communion followed baptism. The so-called Liturgy of St. Clement, in the Constit. Apost., viii. 13, prescribes, in the order of communicants, the place of the little children (παιδιά). Augustine (fifth century) uses this language: "They are infants; but they are made partakers of His table that they may have life in themselves (Serm. 74, § 7). Again: he argues, that, if infants were not born in sin, Christ's words, "Except ye eat the flesh," etc. (John vi. 53), would not be true of them (Contra datus epp. Pelag. i. xxii. § 10). The practice is also proved by regulations respecting its execution; e.g., Gennadius of Marseilles (495), in his De Eccl. dogm., c. 22. The sixth canon of the Council of Macon (585) decrees that the remnants of the consecrated bread, moistened with wine, be distributed every Wednesday or Friday to innocent children, who must receive it fasting (see Hefele: Concilgesch., iii. 36); and the Gregorian Liturgy, in its earliest form, enjoins, "If the bishop be present, it is fit that the infant be forthwith confirmed with chrism, and, after that, communicated. And, if the bishop be not present, let him be communicated by the presbyter" (Liturgia Rom. Vet., Murat., Tom. ii. col. 158). The Ordo Romanus prescribes, that, where possible, the infant be not suckled from the time of its baptism to its communion, i.e., when the two rites were performed on the same day; and the Capitularies of the Frankish kings (i. 161), of Walter of Orleans (ninth century, c. 7), and of Regino, demanded that the priest should be provided at all times with the holy bread, so that no child might die without the sacrament. The sacrament was dispensed in both kinds, though "there is little clear evidence to that effect." One of the most striking proofs is in can. 14 of the Council of Toledo (675), which, "after mentioning the occasional rejection of one element by the sick, 'because, except the draught of the Lord's cup, they could not swallow the Eucharist delivered to them,' proceeds to the case of others 'who do such things in the time of infancy.'" The inference appears good that the Eucharist was offered to both, in bread as well as wine" (Smith and Cheetham, Dict. Chr. Antiq., vol. i. p. 837).

The early practice in the East, of giving the consecrated elements to blameless young persons, was paralleled in the West by the distribution of the so-called eulogia, i.e., that portion of the Eucharist which was conveyed by the hands of the deacons to those who were absent, and, later on, by the practice of giving children the bread and wine before consecration. The custom of infant communion died out in the West; and the Council of Trent, in its twenty-first session, declared, "Little children are not by any necessity obliged to the sacramental communion of the Eucharist. . . . Not therefore, however, is antiquity to be condemned, if, in some places, it at one time observed that custom; for, as those most holy fathers had a probable cause for what they did in respect of their times, so, assuredly, is it to be believed, without controversy, that they did this without any necessity thereof unto salvation" (see Schaff, Credentials, vol. ii. p. 174). The Roman Church has now abandoned both infant communion and its shadow,—the giving of the unconsecrated elements to children. The Greek Church to-day, and also the Nestorians, Jacobites, Armenians, and Maronites, persist in the practice, using generally only the wine, and giving it either by a spoon or by the finger. All Protestant churches unite in rejecting infant communion.

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

INFANT JESUS, The Congregation of the Daughters of the, was founded in Rome, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, by Anna Moroni, as an institution in which poor girls received free instruction in some useful arts, and shortly after transformed into a regular order of the Church by Pope Clement X. The novitiate lasts three years; and the novice, when entering the order, takes the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. They wear a dark-brown dress with a white hood.

INFANT SALVATION, or the salvation of those who die in infancy. The doctrines of infant damnation and of non-elect infants were unknown to the early Church. The fact that the baptism of infants was so commonly postponed to Easter Week proves that it was even not considered any loss to the child to die unbaptized. But, as sacerdotal and ecclesiastical ideas spread in the Church, baptism was more and more emphasized, until Gregory of Nazianzus and Ambrose (fourth century) could say that unbaptized children could not be saved. The first, however, argued, that since they had suffered, and not caused, the loss of baptism, the righteous Judge would not punish them; and Ambrose, while claiming that there could be no exception made for them on account of their infancy, yet thought they would be free from pain. It was left to Augustine to teach the damnation of infants. But their sufferings, though eternal, are bearable, being of the mildest character (De pecc. merit., i. c. xvi.). He also opposed the idea of an intermediate state in which these infants were. Pelagius, whom Augustine so vigorously opposed, expressed no decided opinion upon this point, but said, "Whither they may not go, I know: whither they may go, I do not know." Their punishment must, he thought, be of the mildest sort, since they had not committed any actual transgression, and had no original sin: indeed, he was ready to confess it seemed to him doubtful whether they were punished at all. The Roman Church, accepting Augustine's conceptions of the necessity of baptism to salvation, and of the mildness of the punishment of those infants who died unbaptized, agreed with him that they were sent to hell, and assigned to them a separate place in it, the limbus infantum, or puerorum. (See Thomas Aquinas's Sum. Theol., pt. iii. q. lxxviii. 2; Suppl., q. lxxi. 7; also Dante: Inferno, canto iv.). There is, however, a difference of opinion in this Church as to the character of their sufferings, whether it is actual (paua sensus), or only a deprivation of the vision of God (carentia visionis Dei). In the Council of Trent the Dominicans and Franciscans contradicted each other. The former held that these lost infants were in a dark subterranean region without fire; the latter, that they were above the earth and in the light. Others spoke yet more cheerfully of their condition, supposing them to be occupied with the study of nature, and to be occasionally recipients of the visits of angels and saints. The council refused to commit itself to a decision, though affirming the necessity of baptism (Sess. v. 4); and, since then, some theologians have followed Peter Lombard in the supposition that they suffer some sort of misery in punishment of original sin (Bellarmine: De amiss. grat., 6, 6). Others, like Cardinal Sfondrani (Nodus predest. dissol., 1, 1, 25), have maintained that they enjoy as much happiness as they are capable of. Perrone represents, probably, the prevalent view when he says (5, 275) that they suffer only the lack of the beatific vision: they are in "a condition of pure nature." And, further, Roman-Catholic theologians teach that the desire for baptism, even on the part of unborn children, is accepted for the baptism itself: therefore, there need be no fears for children of Christians who die in infancy.

The first one to enter the lists against the Roman theory of the necessity of baptism to infant salvation was Zwingli. He taught that all elect children who die in infancy are saved, whether they are baptized or not, whether Pagan or Christian; and, further, that all who die in infancy are elect, since their early death is a token of God's peculiar mercy, and therefore of their salvation. Luther, on the other hand, taught the necessity of baptism to salvation; and this doctrine is part of the Lutheran creed, involving baptismal regeneration. Calvin held to election in regard to infants, and speaks thus:—

"As to infants, they seem to perish, not by their own fault, but by the fault of another. But there is a double solution. Though sin does not yet appear in them, yet it is latent; for they bear corruption shut up in the soul, so that before God they are damnable." "That infants who are to be saved (as, certainly, out of that age some are saved) must be previously regenerated by the Lord is clear."—Institut., iv., xvi. 17.

We find this doctrine of infant salvation through election expressed in the Calvinistic symbols. The Canons of the Synod of Dort (1619) declare:—

"Since we are to judge of the will of God from his word (which testifies that the children of believers are holy, but by nature, but in virtue of the covenant of grace, in which they, together with the parents, are comprehended), godly parents have no reason to doubt of the election and salvation of their children whom it pleaseth God to call out of this life in their infancy."—First Head of Doctrine, art. XVII.

And the Westminster Confession:—

"The grace promised [in baptism] is not only offered, but really exhibited and conferred, by the Holy Ghost, to such (whether of age or infants) as that grace belongeth unto, according to the counsel of God's own will, in his appointed time."—XXVIII., vi.

And

"Elect infants dying in infancy are regenerated and saved by Christ, through the Spirit, who worketh when and where and how he pleaseth."—X. III.

But, in the Second Scotch Confession (1580), it says,—

"We abhor and detest the cruel judgment against infants dying without baptism."—See SCHAFF: Creeeds, vol. iii. p. 482.

Since Calvinists distinguish between elect and non-elect infants, it is not strange that some of their theologians have spoken of elect and reprobate infants. Thus Musculus says,—

"Since, therefore, this discrimination of elect and reprobate in new-born infants is hidden from our judgment, it is not fitting that we should inquire into it, lest by ignorance we reject vessels of grace."—Loci Communes, 336.

And the Swiss theologians at the Synod of Dort said,—

"That there is an election and reprobation of infants, no less than of adults, we cannot deny in the face of God, who loves and hates unborn children."—Acta Synod. Dort. Judic., 40.

A proof of the existence of this stern view in Calvinistic New England in the seventeenth century is the passage in that curious poem, The Day of Doom, written by Rev. Michael Wigglesworth, which was published in 1662, ran through many editions, and was reprinted as a curiosity, New York, 1867. Among the classes of sinners who make their plea for mercy are the "reprobate infants" who died in infancy,

"And never had or good or bad effected pers'nally;
But from the womb unto the tomb were straightway carried (Or at the least ere they transgress'd)."

But they are answered like the rest. However, in recognition of their innocence, they are allowed "the easiest room in hell." Calvinism, by its doctrine of election, rids itself of the stigma of infant damnation; for surely it is allowable to hope, at least, that the grace of election extends to all who die in infancy.

In the seventeenth century, the Arminians resumed Zwingli's position, and, consistently with their theory that original sin was not punishable apart from actual transgression, taught the general salvation of infants: so do the Methodists and Baptists to-day. On the other hand, the Lutherans, and all others who teach baptismal regeneration, are logically shut up to the view that all who die unbaptized are lost. Also the Rev. John Henry Blunt, in his Diet. Doc. Theol., p. 346, note, speaking, doubtless, for High-churchmen generally, says,—

"It can hardly, I think, be doubted that they do sustain a loss, of whatever kind. In the Institutions of a Christian Man, the Church of England declares, 'Inasmuch as infants, and children dying in their infancy, shall undoubtedly be saved thereby (i.e., by baptism), else not.' In the last revision of the Prayer-book we read, 'It is certain, by God's word, that children which are baptized, dying before they commit actual sin, are undoubtedly saved:' in other words, we are certain of the future happiness of the baptized, but have no assurance of the salvation of the unbaptized infant. The question must thus be left in obscurity, as we have no sufficient warrant to go beyond the cautious statement of our Church."

But the heart is stronger than logic. The tendency is towards milder views; and it may well be questioned if there be a single living Lutheran theologian of high standing who confines the grace of salvation to baptized infants. So, also, the Calvinists speak. Thus Dr. Charles Hodge, whose orthodoxy is unquestioned, teaches emphatically the salvation of all infants who die in infancy, and asserts that this is the "common doctrine of evangelical Protestants" (Systematic Theology, i. 26).

It will thus be seen, from this review of opinions upon this subject, that there has been recent progress. We now believe that God's grace has been extended to all lands, and are ready to say that infants of heathens, no less than of Christians, enter heaven through the blood of Christ. Surely, He who said, "Suffer the little children, and forbid them not, to come unto me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven," shuts the kingdom of heaven in no infant's face.

INFANTICIDE, the practice of murdering newborn children, has been known from early times, and amongst cultivated as well as barbarous nations. It has taken the form of a religious custom, as among the worshippers of Moloch, "horrid king," who threw their children as sacrifices into his molten arms, and the Hindus, who cast their children into the Ganges. We first meet with the practice of abnormal or murderous infanticide at Sparta, where it was enjoined by the laws of Lycurgus. Weakly or deformed infants were exposed to die on Mount Taygetos, on the ground that they would never be of service to the State. In Rome the practice prevailed to a large degree during the imperial period, when the marriage-vow was not regarded as binding, and Roman ladies counted their years by the number of their divorces (Seneca). Some of the first men of antiquity commended the practice, as Aristotle (Repub., vii. 16) and Pliny the elder. Seneca and other Roman satirists bear witness to the wide extent of its prevalence. The custom has also prevailed among the peoples of Hindustan, the Chinese, the Society and other groups of islands in the Pacific, some of the Indian tribes (Alaska), and in other parts of the world. The Mahometans also practise the custom of murdering girls at their birth. The motives which have impelled parents to murder their children have been considerations of civil obligation (Sparta), shame, disinclination to rear children, and poverty.

Christianity early set itself against the practice; and Christian emperors, beginning with Constantine, provided statutes looking to the care of children exposed by their parents to death. In the fifth century the custom was in vogue of laying such children at the church-doors (Conc. Arles II. can. 51, 451). By the eighth century, asylums were established in Trèves, Milan, and other cities, for the care and training of deserted children; and the Church granted to them hypothetical baptism (Si non es baptizatus, etc., "If thou art not baptized," etc.). At a much later period in the seventeenth century, St. Vincent de Paul directed his energies to the relief of this class of persons, with great zeal. The last century and the early part of this have witnessed the establishment of many foundling asylums in the different countries of Europe. In England severe laws have been passed, punishing with penal servitude and other penalties the murder of children after and before their birth. In France a great increase in the number of foundlings is supposed to have followed upon the use of the tour, or revolving box, which was so arranged that the depositor might leave the infant in the box without himself becoming exposed. By a simple turn of the box from within, the child was drawn inside the building. In 1833 this arrangement was abolished, and the number of foundlings decreased from thirty-five thousand in 1832 to twenty-six thousand in 1838. A hospital in Dublin, also, used a box of this description till 1826, when it was ordered removed by Parliament. All the nations of Southern Europe, except Greece, and including Austria, have permitted the use of the box. According to Von Oettingen (Moralstatistik) the number of foundling asylums in France is a hundred and one, Spain forty-nine, Austria thirty-six, etc. In the United States such asylums are comparatively rare. The principal Roman-Catholic institution of the kind is the New-York Foundling Asylum, at the corner of Lexington Avenue and Sixty-eighth Street, New-York City. There are two Protestant (undenominational) institutions in New-York City,—the New York Infant Asylum, and the Infants' Home and Day Nursery (established 1851). Both of these institutions give shelter to the mothers during their confinement, and urge them to remain for a period with their children. The results have been satisfactory, both in saving the mothers from a continued life of shame, and in preserving the lives of the children (about eighty per cent).

INFIDELITY. In this article, infidelity is used to denote the denial of the claims of Christianity as a divine revelation. In this sense it is not quite the same with unbelief; for unbelief equally takes in other negative positions, such as atheism: and it is not quite the same with scepticism, as this involves the deeper philosophical principle that nothing is or can be known. Still unbelief may be used to include infidelity, all the more that negative views as to God's existence, or personality, or character, also tend to cut off faith in a revelation of his will; and in like manner scepticism, having the same result, may with proper distinction be used as a synonyme. It is to be added that the word "infidelity" carries with it a shade of censure. It is not ignorance, or simple non-acceptance of Christianity, that is asserted, but rejection; which the Christian Church holds to be sinful. As faith is a duty, and as those nominal Christians who come short of it, in not personally accepting Christ as a Saviour, are condemned, so those who carry their repulsion farther, even to denial of his mission and of the authority of his word, must be still more blameworthy.

The causes of infidelity, though manifold and subtle, may be briefly indicated. They are of two kinds.—subjective and objective. The former lies in the prejudices against Christianity that are found within; the latter, in the scandals and hindrances that come from without. Of prejudices, the chief are moral, being found in the lusts and passions which the gospel condemns, or, where these do not rule, in the pride and self-righteousness which cannot be renounced, or in the want of that loving and tender spirit without which Christianity is only a name; so that even the better class of unbelievers find uncongenial to them the lofty devotion to the glory of God, and the humbling sense of sin, in which the very soul of Christianity consists. With these moral prejudices intellectual ones may concur, such as a sceptical temper, or a philosophy that excludes the supernatural, or a bias against some cardinal doctrine of Christianity,—such as the trinity, or the atonement, or the influence of the Holy Spirit. Under the head of scandals fall all the misrepresentations of Christianity which exist in doctrine and life.—the corruptions and divisions of churches, the sins of Christian nations, the slow progress and limited success of the gospel through the fault of its supporters, and even the mistakes of Christians in dealing with infidelity itself. With these causes at work amidst a race, which, as Christians believe, is ungodly and fallen, it is not wonderful, that, as there has been always so much practical unbelief in the world, a portion of this should take the form of open denial of the divine character and claims of Christianity.

In sketching the history of infidelity, it will be necessary to divide it into two great periods, the ancient and the modern, which are found to differ not only in time, but in character. The ancient infidelity meets the Christian religion at its birth, and continues till the fall of Paganism, opposing the gospel from the ground of false religion, or professed revelation of some kind or other; whereas the modern infidelity has more and more detached itself, since the Reformation, from all belief in the supernatural, or at least in any revelation of which the claims can be upheld against Christianity. This classification, indeed, is not strictly correct; for there were earlier opponents of Christianity, like Lucian, who anticipated the more negative and anti-supernaturalist style of more recent centuries, as, indeed, this necessarily followed from the sceptical and Epicurean philosophy. But the most influential antagonists of Christianity all wrote in the interests of the popular religion, however spiritualized, and did not reject Christianity because it was a revelation, but because it set aside other and better-warranted revelations, like those of Paganism. It is only on the mission-field that Christianity now finds similar resistance; but this is hardly called infidelity. The only form of opposition which is the same all through is that of the Jews; Justin Martyr encountering Trypho in the second century; and Limborch, Orobio, in the seventeenth in the same way, each upholding one revelation against another as professed. But, as the Jewish controversy hardly belongs to infidelity, this exception may be also disregarded.

Without entering into the whole field of ancient apologetics, it is sufficient to notice the principal writers on the unbelieving side. We need not dwell on Lucian, who satirizes the credulity of the Christians, which laid them open to impostors like the adventurer Peregrinus; nor the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, who, in his Meditations (XI. 3), condemns their martyr-spirit as “mere obstinacy.” But there are four writers between the second and fourth century who bring out the whole spirit of early infidelity, and in the replies to them by leading Christians (though in some cases most of the attack or defence has perished) the controversy is exhausted. These are Celsus, Porphyry, Hierocles, and Julian. Of these by far the most important is the first, Celsus. He is probably to be placed in the last thirty years of the second century; and his work was entitled The True Word (ἄληθης λόγος). We know it almost entirely from the reply of Origen, the masterpiece of ancient apologetics, which, however, was not written till seventy or eighty years later. The value of the work of Celsus is very great, not so much from the ability and learning of its author, though these are considerable, as from the fulness with which it reflects early hostility to Christ, and from the confirmation which it gives to the early reception of the Christian books, and to the truth of the Christian history. It is not easy to reduce Celsus to any category; and, though he is repeatedly charged by Origen with being an Epicurean, there are large Platonic elements in his philosophy. He assumes even the tone of a Jew, and under that character reproaches, in the beginning of his work, first Christ, and then those Jews who had gone over to Christianity. He is, however, most at home as a Pagan, accepting in the gross the polytheism of his age, without seeking much to spiritualize it, and inculcating adherence to tradition, faith in demons, and worship of images. He has, to begin with, a very low idea of human destiny, as little distinguishable from that of the beasts, which makes him resent the pretensions of Christians, and ridicule their hopes of the resurrection as the “hopes of worms.” His philosophical pride makes him recoil from their blind faith; and his self-righteousness leads him to repel a sect that opened the door to “sinners.” His greatest stumbling-block is the incarnation of Christ, to which he perpetually returns, with the humiliation of the Saviour’s life and death; and it is curious to see, that, while attacking the Jews, he has all the contempt of the Jew for the absence of signs, and of the Greek for the neglect of wisdom. There is also the offence in Christianity, beyond Judaism, of a larger spirit, averse to national ties, of a more enthusiastic hope, and of a proselytism strong enough, with all its alleged childish weakness, to shake the empire, and to turn contempt into anger and fear. The more special doctrines of Christianity, such as the atonement and the new birth, Celsus hardly sees, and therefore he hardly assails them. It is still to him the exitiabilis superstitio of Tacitus, brought a good deal nearer, and in proportion more hateful. Still it is wonderful, within his own range, that Celsus sees so much, and has anticipated so much, of the coarser style of attack on Christianity. The contradictions of Scripture, and its plagiarisms from Plato and the philosophers; the divisions and strifes of Christians; the want of patriotism and public spirit, with a general ridiculous narrowness and fanaticism, — these are his characteristic contribution to the reproaches of ages. Nor has he made one single concession, or written one redeeming sentence; so that his great services to Christian apologetics, in his admissions as to the dates of sacred books, and other facts, are wholly involuntary. It has been the function of Christianity to train even its opponents to seize something of its own point of view. But to this Celsus is the ideal opposite; and the contrast is most complete in his great antagonist Origen, who, in meeting Celsus, has met the best who have followed him, and has made this first still the most fruitful and suggestive of all apologetic controversies.

Porphyry, though a much abler man than Celsus, and a more voluminous writer against Christianity, exists in much scantier fragments; so that little is added from him to the stock of argument. He was a native of Tyre, born about 233 A.D., and was the companion, biographer, and expositor of Plotinus, the founder of the Neo-Platonic philosophy. In him and in his party this system of mystic idealism, opposed to Christianity by its radical exclusion of the incarnation, was further bent into hostility by its effort to spiritualize the current Paganism, and maintain its influence. This, doubtless, lent a color to the elaborate work of Porphyry against the Christians (κατὰ χριστιανῶν), in fifteen books, which was written about the year 270. But as the lengthened replies to this work, including that of Eusebius the church historian, have perished, we cannot trace its sequence, or even its characteristic features. He seems more than Celsus to have gone into detailed criticism of the Old and New Testament Scriptures; and hence the attacks on the prophecies of Daniel, as written after the event, which are replied to by Jerome and other writers; and also on Paul, whom Celsus does not notice. As an example of his more philosophical manner, there is the question, why the gospel was not sent earlier to nations like the Britons, that so greatly needed it. But altogether the materials for an account of Porphyry's polemic against the Christians are disappointingly meagre; and the difficulties are increased by his work on The Philosophy of Oracles, in which, though after Eusebius generally accepted, there is much not easy to reconcile with the more spiritualizing strain of his philosophy; e.g., in the oracle on Christ, as eminent in piety, and admitted to heaven, which is not such as would have been expected from an author who passed as one of the most strenuous opponents of Christianity.

Hierocles was Governor of Bithynia during the last persecution, which began under Diocletian, in 303. In a work addressed to Christians, with other attacks he drew a parallel, to the disadvantage of Christ, between his life and miracles and those of Apollonius of Tyana. This Pagan hero, half philosopher, half magician, had lived from the days of Nero to those of Domitian, and wandered over much of the world. His life had been written a century after his death by Philostratus, a rhetorician of Lemnos; and now Hierocles turned this biography into a weapon of invidious contrast. Eusebius, in a very able reply, shows how loose the historical foundation was, how ludicrous or ill-attested the miracles were (professedly wrought in Ephesus, Rome, and elsewhere), and how void the whole career was of moral greatness and significance. The attempt of Hierocles is only interesting as a type of similar efforts, even to our own day, to meet the claims of Christ by a general naturalist theory of hero-worship or of founders in religion; but the modern theories, though far more refined and extended, are even more helpless, as they wholly deny the supernatural, and so reduce the possible dimensions of the hero, that Christ, if at all drawn after the Gospels, still leaves every parallel behind.

The last name, Julian, is more important as a figure in history than as a writer against Christianity. His public career does not need to be noticed here. The admirable sketch of Gibbon, supplemented on its religious side by that of Neander, meets all necessities. It is only requisite to notice his work against the Christians, written in the winter of 362, in Antioch. Of this we have numerous fragments preserved in the interesting reply of Cyril of Alexandria, in ten books, who, though inferior to Origen, meets Julian with a Greek learning and dialectical skill worthy of his cause and his opponent. Of this work of Julian a large part was occupied with charges against the Old Testament, which he endeavored to show that Christians had no authority for relaxing in any of its ordinances, while at the same time he took the side of the Jews against them; and similar attacks were made on the New Testament, as, for example, that John alone had asserted the Saviour's deity. None of the concessions which Julian had practically made to Christianity in borrowing from it are hinted at in this treatise; but the whole strain is satirical and derisive, as towards a religion which boasted such great things, and yet shut itself up in a corner of the world.

From the fall of Paganism to the Reformation the conflict with infidelity ceases, or is only prolonged by other weapons than those of controversy. Mohammedanism comes on the scene, retorting on its opponents the reproach of being infidels; but this leads to no collision of argument, but of sterner combat. At length the Reformation in the Western Church appears, and this, from a Roman-Catholic point of view, might be regarded as unbelief; but Protestantism disowns the name, and though cut off from the Christian pale, yet, by its witness for the Bible and for the authority of Christ, hinders even Rome from branding its career as the same with that of infidelity. It is not till a century after the Reformation, that in lands professedly Christian, whether Catholic or Protestant, a phenomenon truly entitled to the name of infidelity arises, and that with such new features as to stand distinct from the Pagan unbelief of the early centuries. Of this, as already stated, the marked feature, though it comes slowly and hesitatingly to light, is the denial of all revelation, and the confinement of whatever religion is still retained, be it much or little, to reason as its origin and sovereign rule. This, accordingly, — the modern infidelity from the seventeenth century to our own days, — has now to be sketched.

In its earlier shapes this unbelief is less national; afterwards it concentrates itself in different lands, and passes through successive national phases. To the earliest period belong Herbert and Hobbes, who, though English, have by education and character a cosmopolitan element; Spinoza, who as a Jew belongs to all literature; and Bayle, whose wandering life, and studies in universal criticism, abate his otherwise French individuality. It is only in the nineteenth century that unbelief, after the national phases of the eighteenth, — deism, encyclopedism, rationalism, — has returned to its earlier type.

Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581-1648), whose life as that of a soldier-philosopher is a kind of reduced image of Descartes, holds, like him, to spiritualism, and, though unhappily never recovered to the faith of his brother George the poet, still retains many Christian elements, and in his five principles — God, worship, virtue, repentance, rewards and punishments — advances nothing hostile to Christianity, though he ignores it. His De Veritate (1624) was followed after his death by his De Religione Gentilium (1663), which fails to establish these principles as the sum of Paganism, though it begins, amid much awkwardness, modern inquiries into comparative religion in a spirit out of sympathy with Christianity.

Hobbes (1588-1679) is even less an avowed unbeliever than Herbert; and his scheme might in strictness be called heresy rather than infidelity. He seeks in his other works, and especially in the Leviathan, to build up a system that may support his political philosophy as one of despotism, from the Bible. But the foundations of materialism, selfishness, and agnosticism, on which the whole rests, are such that the walls of the structure are pressed out of their place, even had the style of Bible interpretation not been so arbitrary and paradoxical as to forfeit identity in the structure with all ordinary Christianity. A Christ whose other offices are subordinated to his kingly, and whose kingly office is practically absorbed in that of the civil magistrate, is about all of Christianity that Hobbes, with his elaborate deductions and expositions, retains.

Spinoza (1632-77) departs entirely from Herbert in renouncing theism, and resting on a pantheistic basis (Ethica, 1677); but, so long as he professed theism (Tractatus Theologico-Politicus, 1670), he recalls Hobbes at least in his founding of right on power, and in his free and rationalizing strain of Scripture criticism. Many of Spinoza's hypotheses in excluding the miraculous are as arbitrary as those of Hobbes; and it was certainly uncauld for him to argue against miracles as a theist, while keeping his pantheism in reserve; but his schemes and theories have been still more influential, and are to this day widely current. His pantheism does not require to be here noticed, as lying beyond our definition of infidelity. It is important, however, to consider how much there is of lingering sympathy with the Christian view of the exalted character of Christ, all the more remarkable as coming from a Jew, though the radical pantheism and anti-supernaturalism of his system bar the just influence of this tendency.

The sceptical side of this early period is represented by Bayle (1647-1706), whose Huguenot extraction, and temporary conversion to Romanism, so far determine the type of his hostility to Christian faith. A professor in Protestant seminaries like Sedan and Rotterdam, void of all sympathy with the Reformed creed, save on the side of culture and liberty, his life becomes one long critical process without earnestness or fruit, save only as the debates of all systems with each other are recorded. This is the work of his Dictionary, published in 1697, and for the next century a storehouse of negative criticism and a forerunner of the French Encyclopédie; only that Bayle is more fair in dealing out doubts and difficulties all round, so that orthodoxy merely shares in the general weakness of the human mind.

It is apparent that this earliest period of modern doubt contained all the internal conflicts and discords that were afterwards to be developed, and which have made it strong for attack on Christianity, but feeble in supplying its place. All comes more to light in the next century, when infidelity gains more full expression and power. This brings with it the three national and mutually related movements in England, France, and Germany.

English deism springs up on the soil of religious decay and latitude and of political freedom, not without help from the Socinian tendency which had clung as a shade to the Reformation, and with its waning light gained in influence. The deistic movement stands out as the first combined protest of educated thought in Europe against Christianity; and therefore its history is all the more instructive, and its failure confirmatory of faith. It fills up the space from the Revolution to the rise of Methodism and the reawakening of religious life in England. Its earlier struggles are more desultory and miscellaneous; its later, more concentrated and definite.

To the former belongs Charles Blount, whose Oracles of Reason, published in 1695, after his death, discloses the fact that the name "Deists" had been taken by the party which traced itself to Herbert, and who, in an earlier work (1680) on Apollonius of Tyana, had, apparently without knowing it, renewed the effort of Hierocles to account on natural principles for the career of Jesus Christ. Another miscellaneous writer, of Irish birth, is Toland (1670-1722), who, in his Christianity not Mysterior, touches without real depth the nature of mysteries, then maintains in his Amyntor the looseness of the canon, drawing forth the masterly work of Lardner, and after other fugitive pieces, still professing something of Christianity, ends in 1720 by publishing anonymously a confession of pantheism in his Pantheisticon, though balanced by another work of a contrary tenor in the same year. We may perhaps include here also Lord Shaftesbury, whose Characteristics (1711) contain strictures on the moral aspects of Christianity hardly consistent with his profession of belief, and certainly Anthony Collins (1676-1729), whose first appearance in connection with this controversy, in his Discourse on Freethinking (1713), is little more than a clever burlesque, designed, without any scientific method, to put Christians on the same ground of ultimate dependence on reason with the rising sect of free-thinkers, though this manifesto more than met its match in the learning, argument, and wit of Bentley.

The most important period in the deistic movement, that which deals more with definite topics, falls under the Hanoverian dynasty; and this is led in by Collins, whose work on prophecy, The Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion (1724), is more solid and serious than his first, though marked also by a one-sidedness and controversial art above which he never rose. The aim of this treatise was to show that prophecy had only been meant, and only fulfilled, allegorically, that is, not at all; and the conflict between him and Bishop Chandler and his many other opponents turned on the criticism of texts, and the evidence of their accomplishment. He replied to the bishop in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered (1727), but somewhat changed his ground without acknowledging it. He has anticipated modern criticism as to Daniel, but is out of harmony with it in denying all early Messianic hopes and traditions.

The discussion on prophecy gave birth to that on miracles, which was conducted by Thomas Woolston, an ex-fellow of Sidney College, Cambridge (1667-1733). As Collins had reduced prophecy, so Woolston reduced miracle, to allegory, and denied the literal facts. His Discourses on the Miracles of our Saviour (1727-30), though reaching a sale of thirty thousand copies, are now generally discredited for their violent and uncritical spirit, which may be judged of by his asserting a compact between the disciples and Jewish rulers, which the former violated by stealing the Saviour's body. It would have been well had Woolston been replied to only in works like Bishop Sherlock's Trial of the Witnesses, but, unhappily, he was fined and imprisoned, and died in some degree of restraint.

The central passage of this controversy was the debate on the possibility and credibility of revelation. This arose with Matthew Tindal (1656-1733), an ex-fellow of All Souls', Oxford, who had in his youth gone over to Popery, and then recoiled to a different extreme. His work, Christianity as Old as the Creation (1730), was mainly designed to set aside revelation by building on the law of nature, or equal relation of God to his creatures at all times. This was answered best of all by Conybeare (1732), that the law of nature left room for the progressive light of nature, and that, especially where sin had entered, this might take the form of revelation, and attest itself to the inward eye, without being absolutely the same with natural data. To this writer also, more than to any other, Butler, in his Analogy (1736), replied, without naming him, by showing that objections to the limited area or defective evidence of revelation struck equally at natural religion. With the defeat of Tindal, the deistic conflict slackened, and no equal work appeared.

Thomas Chubb (1679-1747), glove-maker in Salisbury, with considerable force of untrained faculties, mingled repeatedly in the controversy, though at first more as a Socinian, till in his last work he assails the morality of the New Testament, and seems to give up all Christ's historic claims. With his assault on morality in its Christian shape might seem to agree the work published in 1737, The Moral Philosopher, known to be by Thomas Morgan, a dispossessed dissenting minister, who died in 1743. But Morgan only assails the Old Testament, allows the sinlessness of Christ, and acknowledges the greatness of Paul; though, like the Tübingen school, he separates between him and the Jewish apostles, and even regards the Apocalypse as a protest against him. Morgan's antipathy to the Old Testament has been supposed to have called forth Warburton's Divine Legation of Moses; but this was meditated and partly written before.

The English deism, as Lechler has well shown, had a tendency to scepticism, though he is probably wrong in supposing that our next writer created any epoch. This was Henry Dodwell, the son of the celebrated non-juror of that name, whose Christianity not Founded on Argument (1742) is a pretended defence of the gospel as resting on inward light; which, however, is pushed so far as to be caricatured. The necessary limitation, and the vindication of the self-evidencing power of Christianity, was ably given by Philip Doddridge.

A still more sceptical writer, though a professed theist, was Lord Bolingbroke (1678-1751). This eminent statesman had no radical principles in theology; and, without any theory of scepticism, his views as to the divine attributes are radically contradictory, and change whenever Christianity is to be assailed. His posthumous book, in 5 vols. (Philosophical Works, 1754), which is largely an attempt to trace Christianity to Platonism, of which he has a dark idea, is a total failure from want of learning (the Platonic authorities being quoted in Latin) and of fairness; and his attacks on the Old Testament are equally violent. There is here the origin of much in Voltaire; but no intelligent opponent could now write in this strain.

The greatest name on the sceptical side, beyond all question, is that of Hume (1711-76). But Hume's scepticism, if more, as he said himself, than a play of the intellect, would not be fair; and Theism and Christianity might still be as practical as the necessary biases of human motive and character. Hume has not thus held the balance even; and his famous argument on miracles (1748) would, as Mill has conceded, be recalled by restoring the idea of God, not to mention, that, in seeming to argue against the credibility of testimony, he has argued equally against the credibility of sense, and so far begged the question, that miracles are only matters of testimony, and never of experience. Other exceptions are taken, in the best reply to Hume,—that by Campbell, On Miracles (1762); and Hume has not been generally followed, except by those who deny miracles, not merely as incognizable, but as impossible.

With Hume, though lying outside of the deistic controversy, we may rank his great, even greater, fellow-historian, Gibbon (1737-94). Gibbon, like Bayle, loses all the earnestness of belief with his return from Romanism; and his Decline and Fall shows how deeply insensible he was to the divine power of Christianity. Yet the work is an involuntary tribute to its greatness; and the attempt, far beyond any thing in deism, to account for it by secondary causes, is an anticipation of more recent efforts, while recognizing its world-historical importance, to bring it within the laws of natural development. Gibbon, however, here lies beyond even the position of French encyclopedism, of which he was a sympathetic witness, and of this we must now speak.

The national unbelief of France in the last century has been called, from its Encyclopédie (1751-65), "Encyclopedism;" but to Voltaire (1694-1778), more than to any other writer in that work, it is due. The way had been prepared by the immense abuses and corruptions in Church and State, by the quarrels between Jesuitism and Jansenism in the bosom of Rome, and by the absence of Bible knowledge and of living piety. Voltaire, borrowing his materials from England, where he had resided from 1726 to 1728, and favored by high influence with great personages, like Frederick the Great (at whose court he resided from 1750 to 1753), gave, by his dexterity and wit, to unbelief a European prominence, to which also his struggles for toleration, as in the case of Calas (1762), contributed. But there is in Voltaire no accurate learning, or sustained argument, or even consistent scheme of natural religion; and his criticisms on the Bible, as on Shakspeare and Milton, have been set aside as superficial and inadequate. Yet his works, issued from his retreat at Ferney, and those of his associates (like D'Alembert, one of the editors of the Encyclopédie), while those of others (like the still more important editor, Diderot) went on to atheism, produced a universal agitation, and undoubtedly contributed much to the French Revolution, with its temporary overthrow of Christianity.

In this work of antichristian propagandism it has been common to unite with the name of Voltaire that of Rousseau (1712-78); but this has been shown by more careful inquiries to be a mistake. The Swiss writer, no doubt, in his Contrat Social (1762), had struck a democratic note deeper than any thing in Voltaire; and in his Emile (1762) he had, in the "Profession of Faith" put into the mouth of a Swiss vicar, seemed to share the prevailing doubts as to the evidences of revelation. But, though these and other facts linked Rousseau with revolution, there was a discord with Voltaire more than personal. He eloquently protested against the atheism by which Voltaire suffered himself to be surrounded, strove to explain his own liberties in harmony with belief in Christianity, and in his tributes to the Bible and to the character of Christ, however unhappy the tenor of his life, separated himself from every writer of that school. As it was, the encyclopedic movement was only powerful for destruction; and infidelity, in submitting to the return even of Romanism to fresh ascendancy, had openly to confess its own weakness.

The movement in Germany called rationalism was largely derived from English and French sources, but probably as much from the decay of Christian faith and life among the German people. The revival, under Spener and Francke, in the beginning of the century, had failed to arrest the downward course of all the old churches of the Reformation; and a cold and scholastic orthodoxy gave way to doubt and negation, as carrying with them apparently more of freshness and interest. A threefold tendency has been here remarked: First, The popular philosophy movement, which, no longer met by the speculative element (as in Leibnitz, and less strictly in Wolff), reduced philosophy to empiricism, and religion to naturalism. Of this school an exaggerated example was C. F. Bahrdt (1741-92). Secondly, The critical school, which, developing the concessions of Baumgarten, Ernesti, and J. D. Michaelis, passed—in the hands of Semler in Halle, Eichhorn in Göttingen, and Paulus in Heidelberg, with many others—to a denial of all distinctive inspiration in the sacred books, and of all special Christian doctrine in their contents, while still exalting Christ as a great Example and Teacher. In one who belonged partly to the popular and partly to the critical school—Reimarus (1694-1768), teacher in the Gymnasium of Hamburg—this minimum of doctrine was not retained; and in his work, published after his death by Lessing as Fragments from the Library of Wolfenbüttel (1774-78), the Saviour, though not without excellent morality, is treated as a political enthusiast who failed in setting up by his triumphal entry a temporal kingdom, and his disciples as schemers who adapted their theology to the altered circumstances, and stole the body of Jesus to countenance the fraud of a resurrection. Lessing, in publishing these fragments, disclaimed all sympathy with them, as, indeed, his Education of the Human Race (1777-80) is based upon a different principle; but in his replies to Pastor Goetze of Hamburg, and others, who resented his act, he showed himself so much an apologist of Reimarus, and an assailant of the letter of the gospel history, while professing to uphold its spirit, that his relation to Christianity is rendered uncertain. The third school is that of ethical rationalism, represented by Kant and his followers, which finds expression in that philosopher's Religion within the Limits of Mere Reason (1792). Here the weakness of Kant's philosophy, in making the infinite and absolute mere regulative ideas that could not come within the grasp of the finite, is seen; for the incarnation, the keystone of Christianity, is misunderstood, and the historical Christ becomes the mere ultimatum of ethical teaching, whose so-called offices are to be idealized into subjective processes in the heart of the individual, while also connected with a society in which moral results can alone be achieved, but who stands upon the footing of reason and moral law, rather than of redemption and grace in the ordinary Christian sense of these terms. Hence, while Kant is the highest summit of rationalism, and even so far the prophet of a return to faith, including in a sinless Christ miracle and the basis of incarnation, it remained for another century, under Schleiermacher and his followers, not without their own inconsistencies, to escape from mere nature, and to restore an historical Christianity to its true place.

Such was unbelief at the end of the last century; and, as the present advanced, the demonstrated failure of scepticism to organize revolution, with the reaction in favor of belief, compelled it to assume a more respectful attitude towards Christianity, and at the same time to attempt more earnestly, on naturalist principles, to solve its origin and history. To this latter task the movement in philosophy and science also urged; and hence unbelief has grappled with this problem under one or other of the reigning tendencies that have divided the century: first, speculative pantheism, and, secondly, materialistic or evolutionist agnosticism. These types appear successively in the most prominent unbeliever of the nineteenth century, David Friedrich Strauss: in others they are more or less traceable. Strauss passes through three periods, publishing the first edition of his Leben Jesu in 1835, in which he gathers up the hints of earlier critics, like Eichhorn and Gabler, as to a mythical element in the life of Jesus, and explains the facts as stated in the Gospels as unhistorical reflections of the disciples' love and admiration, fashioning their Christ after Messianic traditions and their own fancies, the only truth being the embodiment in him of the Hegelian idea that God and man are one; then, in his recast of this work in 1864, dropping altogether the Hegelian frame, and in the old deistic way treating Jesus as a great personality who realizes the fatherhood of God, while from the school of Baur tendency is called in to help out the myth; then, lastly, in his Old and New Faith of 1873, not long before his death, going over to the theory of evolutionism in its atheistic shape, and striking out many of his concessions to the character of Jesus; for which, indeed, the way was prepared by his admiring biographies of Reimarus (in 1862) and of Voltaire (in 1872). Such a career refutes itself, notwithstanding the great acuteness of the criticism of this author; for the only thing common to its successive philosophic schemes is the unbounded confidence with which each is upheld.

Similar is the failure of Ernest Renan, whose Vie de Jésus (1863) reveals less of a philosophic and theologic basis; the chief thing of this kind being an immoral deism, which builds the universe upon the mixture of good and evil, and makes the spurious miracles of Jesus necessary to his success. Here there are less of the critical dissections of Strauss, and more of pictorial efforts to give the career of Jesus a lifelike reality, which, however, break down through the moral incongruities blended in the character, and the deviation of the history from its professed sources. Renan, in conformity with the tendency of recent criticism, even that of the Tübingen school, has in his work on the origin of Christianity, of which the life of Jesus is the first part, carried up the date of the gospels, much higher than Strauss, believing as he does that time was not needed for the transformation of history; and, though this must be denied, the admission as to these dates and facts of authorship is valuable on the side of Christian faith.

These works probably exhaust the struggles of Continental unbelief to deal with the Christian problem: the schemes of Schenkel in his Charakterbild (1869), and of Keim in his Jesus von Nazara (1873), belonging to the history of Unitarianism rather than of infidelity. Nor in England has much been added; the work of Mr. W. R. Greg (Creed of Christendom, 1850, new ed., 1877) relying largely on dates of Strauss and others, which have now been abandoned, and presenting no coherent image of Christ's life and death; Supernatural Religion (1877, 7th ed.) being mainly a reproduction of Tübingen criticism as to the late reception of the Gospels, with arguments against the supernatural, rather than any positive system of the life of Jesus; and Mill's posthumous Three Essays on Religion, while leaving room for the supernatural as a possibility and a hope, not going fully into the question of the origin of Christ's character and greatness, though granting him a transcendent place in history, and allowing that "religion cannot be said to have made a bad choice in pitching on this man as the ideal representative and guide of humanity." Even the evolutionist philosophy has not in England openly lunged itself, in any of its representatives, into the same abyss with Strauss. The agnosticism of Herbert Spencer has not led him to any attempted solution of Christ's development in history; and the work of Huxley on Hume (1879), while reproducing his argument on miracles, does not go beyond his (Hume's) own silence on the difficulty thus arising as to the career and influence of the Founder of Christianity.

It is remarkable that American literature has not produced any material addition to European unbelief, but either imported or slightly recast it. The Age of Reason of Thomas Paine, written in Paris in 1793, under the agis of American citizenship, and addressed to the protection of the United States, was but the repetition of English deism in its lowest form, which he had brought from his own country, and exalted by the boastful strain of France, which now contrasts with the oblivion into which the work has fallen. The extremes of Theodore Parker and other writers from the left side of Unitarianism are but the exaggerations of German criticism and negative theory. America has been more productive on the side of excesses of faith than of denials of it; and the progress of Christianity, from the formation of the republic onward, in an age, when, as everywhere, unbelief was so wide-spread, to the present day, when, however still existing and active, it is comparatively so outnatched and restrained, is a hopeful augury, that, on the Western Continent, the time will come, when, through the preventive and healing influence of the gospel, the struggles of the Old World against infidelity may be less and less reproduced. JOHN CAIRNS.

INFRALAPSARIANISM (from infra, "after," and lapsus, "a fall") is the doctrine, that God for his own glory determined (1) to create the world, (2) to permit the fall of man, (3) to elect from the mass of fallen men an innumerable multitude as "vessels of mercy," (4) to send his Son for their redemption, (5) to leave the residue of mankind to suffer the just punishment of their sins. This is the common doctrine of Augustinians, and is taught in the Calvinistic symbolical books. It is to be distinguished from supralapsarianism, the theory of some Calvinist, and is the same as sublapsarianism: which articles see.

INFULA means, in classical Latin, the band of red and white stripes which the priest and the victim wore around the brow at a Pagan sacrifice: hence it was quite early introduced into Christian usage, and applied to the priest's head-dress, afterwards to that of the bishop.

INGHAM, Benjamin ("the Yorkshire Evangelist"). b. at Osset, in Yorkshire, Eng., June 11, 1712; d. at Aberford in 1772. He was educated at Queen's College, Oxford, where he was one of the "Holy Club." On June 1, 1735, he was ordained by Bishop Potter, and soon after went on a sort of ecclesiastical itinerancy of great usefulness among the villages about London, and then settled down as curate in Matching, Essex; but scarcely three months elapsed (Oct. 14) before he was induced to accompany John Wesley and others on his expedition to Georgia. He landed there Feb. 5, 1736; re-embarked for England, Feb. 26, 1737, in order to obtain help for the colonists, having accomplished almost nothing, except the composition, in Dr. Byrom's shorthand, of a list of half the words in an Indian language. On his outward voyage he had been brought in contact with Moravian bishops, and thus his life was affected. He and Wesley joined their London Society in Fetter Lane; and in 1738 he accompanied Wesley on his journey of inspection to Herrnhut, and was freely admitted to communion. On his return he preached in Yorkshire with singular effect; and, when prohibited (June 6, 1739) from the pulpits of the Established Church, he imitated John Wesley, and preached in the fields, barns, anywhere he could, and so successfully, that in 1740 he could say that fifty societies had been formed, and that he had two thousand hearers. In 1740 Wesley was expelled from the Fetter Lane Moravian Society; but Ingham remained in it, and thus virtually seceded from the Church of England, and became the head of the Yorkshire Moravians. On Nov. 12, 1741, he married in London, Lady Margaret Hastings, sister of the Earl of Huntingdon. On July 30, 1742, he formally transferred his Yorkshire and Lancashire societies to the Moravians, and immediately began forming others; for his special work was that of an evangelist at large. In 1744 he gave up open-air preaching. In 1753, owing to the state of the Moravians in England, he withdrew from them, and established a sect of his own. Members were received by laying on of hands. They had elders, and the love-feast and the Lord's Supper monthly. The chief governing power was in the hands of the general overseer, who was chosen and appointed by the trustees, with the consent of the societies. In 1755 Ingham was admitted to Wesley's conference at Leeds, although there is no clear evidence that he wished to unite his societies with Wesley's. After Ingham had been made general overseer, or, as Lady Huntingdon used to call him, "bishop," of his own sect, he ordained two of his fellow-laborers. In 1759 Ingham became in theology a Sandemanian (see art.) by reading Sandeman's Letters on Theism and Apatasio (Edinburgh, 1757),—a reply to the work of that name by James Hervey (London, 1755, 3 vols.),—and also Glas's The Testimony of the King of Martyrs concerning His Kingdom (Perth, 1727). He sent two of his assistants to Scotland to see the leaders, and the result of their mission was their conversion to the Sandemanian tenets. A split in the Ingham sect followed. Out of the eighty societies so energetically gathered and ruled, only thirteen remained faithful to him. Many of them became Wesleyans, or dissenters: others joined the Daleites, or Scotch Independents,—a small sect established in Glasgow by David Dale, a wealthy cotton manufacturer, whose views, in general, were Sandemanian, only they were not so strict upon the question of intercourse with other denominations, and laid more stress upon practical holiness. The Inghamites never recovered the ground they lost. Sorrow over the defection probably hastened Ingham's death. The only publication of his known to Tyerman is A Discourse on the Faith and Hope of the Gospel, Leeds, 1763, which contains his doctrinal views. His sect still survives, but in 1873 numbered only six societies. See TYERMAN: The Oxford Methodists, New York, 1873, pp. 57-154.

INGLIS, David, D.D., LL.D., b. at Greenlaw, Berwickshire, Scotland, June 8, 1824; d. in Brooklyn, N.Y., Dec. 15, 1877. He was graduated from the university of Edinburgh 1841; entered the Presbyterian ministry; emigrated to America 1846, and was pastor of several churches in the United States; called to Montreal 1852, and thence to Hamilton, Ont., 1855. From 1871 to 1872 he was professor of systematic theology in Knox College, Toronto. In the latter year he became pastor of the Reformed (Dutch) Church on the Heights, Brooklyn, L.I. Dr. Inglis was of commanding presence, and a remarkably fine preacher, riveting the attention, notwithstanding the monotony of his delivery, and his incessant pacing back and forth in the pulpit.

INGULPHUS, or INGULF, abbot of Crowland, or Croyland; b. in London, 1030 (?); d. at Crowland, Lincolnshire, Eng., Dec. 16, 1109. In 1051 he became secretary to William of Normandy; in 1064 he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and on his return entered the monastery of Fontenelle in Normandy; but in 1076 was made abbot of Crowland by his former patron, who had meanwhile become king of England, and through whom he secured many privileges for the abbey, besides the enlargement and adornment of the building itself. His name has long been famous for his supposed authorship of the Historia monasterii corylandensis, from the reign of Penda (d. 655) to 1091. A continuation of the History to 1117 was issued by Peter of Blois, archdeacon of Bath, who died 1220; and by three other continuations it was brought down to 1486. Fulman printed the work, as continued by Peter of Blois, in the first volume of Rerum anglicarum scriptores veteres, Oxford, 1681. But the History is now pronounced by competent judges, especially since Sir Francis Palgrave attacked it in the Quarterly Review, September, 1826, to be so largely interpolated, that it is without much historical authority. The Charters in it are plainly forgeries of a later date than Ingulf. The continuations have more value. The original work was probably of monkish origin, and dates from the thirteenth or fourteenth century. A translation of it by H. T. Riley forms a volume of Bohn's Antiquarian Library. See HARDY'S Rerum Britannicarum mediæ ævi scriptores, vol. ii. (1865).

INHERITANCE AMONG THE HEBREWS. Jehovah was acknowledged to be the owner of the land of Israel; and therefore, although it was formally divided among the twelve tribes, it was understood that the right to dispose finally of the property was vested in him (Lev. xxv. 23). Accordingly, there could be no irrevocable parting with the birthright. The Year of Jubilee restored all property to its original owner or his heirs (Lev. xxv. 10). This fact explains Naboth's refusal to part with his vineyard, even to the king (1 Kings xxi. 3 sq.). Along with real estate, other things, such as slaves, came, at the death of the father, to his sons by his wife or wives. The sons by concubines received only presents (Gen. xxv. 5 sq.), while the sons of harlots got nothing (Judg. xi. 2). The first-born son received a double portion of the entire inheritance, even in cases where a son of a favorite wife had the father's preference (Deut. xxi. 15-17). The cases of Esau and Reuben show that this right of primogeniture might be forfeited (Gen. xxv. 31 sqq., xlviii. 17, xlix. 3). Daughters inherited only when there were no sons; and in these cases they must marry in their own tribe, lest the patrimony be alienated (Num. xxvii. 1-11, xxxvi.). In cases where there were no children, the brother, the paternal uncle, or the nearest kinsman, inherited (Num. xxvii. 9 sqq.). Sometimes a faithful slave inherited his master's property in cases where he had married the daughter (1 Chron. ii. 34, 35), or had been adopted (Gen. xv. 2, 3), or was guardian of an imbecile son (Prov. xvii. 2). [or even in case of misconduct of the heir (2 Sam. xvi. 4)]. The Mosaic law so exactly defined the deposition of estates, that wills, in our sense of the term, were plainly superfluous; and so the word does not occur in the Hebrew Bible. The phrase "to set one's house in order" (in 2 Sam. xvii. 23 and Isa. xxxviii. 1) refers to household affairs merely. But wills necessarily became common among the Jews of the Dispersion, and they are referred to in the New Testament (Gal. iii. 15; Heb. ix. 17). The Hebrew word for them was commonly קְדוּשָׁה, a transliteration of δαθήκη; but the rabbis used instead the non-biblical נְזִיכָה, from נָזַח, "to command." Occasionally there was a partial ante mortem distribution of property (cf. Luke xv. 12); and sometimes, at least, as might be expected, property occasioned disputes (cf. Luke xii. 13 sq.). RÜETSCHL.

INNER MISSION, The, an agency for promoting the spiritual and bodily welfare of the destitute and spiritually indifferent in Germany. Its ultimate object is to evangelize the classes that have fallen away from Christian truth and faith. The movement developed out of the conviction that the Protestant Church of Germany was not accomplishing all it might. Fliedner was the first to embody this conviction in practical institutions; and the various charities he organized and carried out into successful operation at Kaiserswerth have done much towards the revival of Christian benevolence throughout the land. But it remained for Wichern to determine the character, and secure the success, of the work of the Inner Mission. The very name is due to him, although Dr. Lueke of Göttingen had previously used it in a publication printed in Hamburg, 1843. It occurred to Dr. Wichern, that a movement was necessary, within the limits of Germany, as well as among the heathen, to stem the tide of irreligion, and to build up the kingdom of God. It was this conviction which led him to refuse the appeal of some friends to turn the Rauhe Hans at Hamburg [which he had founded in 1833] into an institution for training missionaries for the heathen. There was a sufficiently large field at home, and the two agencies were of sufficient importance to be kept separate. The term "Inner Mission" became the universal designation for this peculiar domestic work after Wichern's stirring appeal to the Protestant Church at the Kirchentag [a voluntary ecclesiastical synod: see art.], held in Wittenberg, 1848.

The Inner Mission directs itself to those classes which have become indifferent to Christ, or, out of ignorance, have remained far from him. [The term and work of the Inner Mission are more comprehensive than Home Missions, and include, not only efforts to spread the gospel by preaching, but also various other agencies for the spiritual, as well as physical, welfare of the destitute.] It employs as its means the preaching of the gospel and efforts to relieve the victims of disease, and those who have been led astray. The Inner Mission is not a combination of a variety of associations and institutions devoted to different forms of benevolent Christian work. It uses such agencies, but is itself a force behind them, which also works through the instrumentality of individuals. Nor is it a mere philanthropic agency, but a distinctly evangelistic agency, whose ultimate aim is to win men to the gospel.

Since the organization of the movement at the Wittenberg Kirchentag, in 1848, the necessity for its existence has been made more apparent by the socialism, nihilism, humanitarian culture, and other evils, of the land. At that conference was formed the Central Committee of the Inner Mission of the German-Protestant Church. Its design was not to control the work, but to give suggestions and impulses for the organization of efforts in different parts of the land. It originated a conference which has had twenty-two meetings, the last being held at Bremen, in September, 1881. The movement passed through a period of much opposition, but gradually won the sympathies of a large constituency from all schools of Christian thought and activity. Since 1848 the sphere of effort has become more comprehensive, and now includes schools for children and cripples, houses of refuge, the care of the sick and poor, the conduct of Sunday schools, the organization of Young Men's Christian Associations, the training of servants, the various forms of city missionary activity, the promotion of sabbath observance, and other forms of Christian work. There are central committees in different parts of the land, and under their influence a body of specially trained evangelists, colportors, and other officers, has been educated. To these specific agencies of the Inner Mission must be added the Institution of Deaconesses [which was founded by Theodore Fliedner, in Kaiserswerth, 1836], which now numbers nearly four thousand sisters. [The work of the Inner Mission is not dependent upon State control. It is not an organization, but an impulse or movement, which, working itself out in various channels and parts of the land, seeks to advance the cause of true religion. The various institutions representing the idea are supported by voluntary contributions. There is no central power upon which they are dependent.]

F. OLDENBERG.

INNOCENT I., Pope A.D. 402–417. According to Jerome, he was the son of his predecessor, Anastasius I., on whose death he was elected to the papal chair (in 402). A fundamental principle it was with him never to neglect an opportunity for extending the authority of the Roman see. On sending to Victricius, Bishop of Rouen, rules of discipline for use throughout Gaul, he inserts the injunction, “Si majores causæ in medium fuerint devolvæ, ad sedem apostolicam, sicut synodus statuit, et beata consuetudo exigit: post judicium episcopale referantur.” If the reference here is to the edict of the Council of Sardica (344) on the subject, he certainly goes far beyond the somewhat general concessions here made; since he insists that all bishops in all weightier matters should report to Rome. Exuperius, Bishop of Toulouse, he highly compliments (405) for referring his inquiries to the Roman chair, without first attempting to decide them for himself. The Macedonian bishops he severely rebukes (414) for daring to consult him the second time on a point on which he had already given a decision. To Alexander of Antioch he explains (415) that the prerogatives yielded to his see were not on account of the greatness of Antioch, but simply because that city had been, though but for a brief while, the first seat of Peter; while at Rome, on the contrary, Peter had dwelt until his death. Yearly his claims for power grew more and more exorbitant. In 416 he writes to Bishop Decentius, “Who does not know that what has been handed down to the Roman Church by Peter, the prince of the apostles, must be held fast by all, especially since all the churches throughout Gaul, Spain, Italy, and Africa, owe their existence to priests ordained by Peter and his successors?” A particularly favorable occasion presented itself for expatiating on the plenary authority of Rome, when in 417 he confirmed by letter the resolutions against the Pelagian heresy, adopted and sent to him for sanction by the synod of Carthage.

It was in accordance with these lofty conceptions of papal prerogative, that Innocent conducted himself in the case of Chrysostom, when that famous man was persecuted by Theophilus of Alexandria. After his deposition, Chrysostom appealed to the Bishop of Rome (for his words addressed to Innocent can be understood in no other light), and invoked the papal interference as that of a higher court. And even Theophilus shows his deference to the Pope by reporting to him the course which Chrysostom's case had taken, and seeking to enlist him on his own side, though it was only to be coolly told that the Pope would continue to recognize Chrysostom as bishop until convicted by a regular tribunal. Failing, however, in his efforts to have the cause adjudicated before him in a council composed of Eastern and Western bishops, the Pope renounced fellowship with Theophilus and his associates. To the afflicted Chrysostom in his exile, the conduct of the Pope was full of consolation and support, as he gratefully testifies.

Trying days befell Innocent when Alaric besieged Rome. Pending the negotiations with this invader, he went, by order of the senate, to Honorius, at Ravenna, to induce him to accept the proposals of the Goth. By this journey he was spared the sight of the cruelties inflicted on Rome. In 410 Alaric sacked the city.

Among the dogmatic decisions of Innocent I. must be mentioned his condemnation of Pelagius, and his order to the synod of Mileve (417), that Pelagius and Celestius be excommunicated until they delivered themselves from the snares of Satan. Inasmuch as these men had grossly maltreated Jerome at Bethlehem, and John, Bishop of Jerusalem, had taken no steps against the criminals, Innocent sent Jerome a consoling letter, but to John a vigorous remonstrance. Especially strenuous was he in enforcing the ordinance of Siricius, forbidding the married clergy all marital intercourse, and deposing such as should beget children as unworthy of the sacred office. Innocent died March 12, 417, and was reckoned among the saints of the Catholic Church.

INNOCENT II. (Gregorio de' Papi, or Papareschi), Pope 1130–43. Having taken orders from Guibert of Ravenna, and afterwards filled important positions under Popes Paschal II., Gelasius II., and Calixtus II., we find him in 1123, in company with his after-opponent, Cardinal Peter Pierleoni, as papal legate in France.

While Pope Honorius lay dying, Gregory's practical tact, his friendly relation to the imperial court, and his pure life, attracted to him the favorable notice of those of the cardinals who were under the lead of the chancellor, Hamericus; and these, at most fifteen in number, ere yet the Pope had been interred, and without information of his decease having been sent to the absent cardinals, hurriedly elected Gregory to the chair (Feb. 14, 1130). But his dread of the Roman nobles, who were mostly hostile to him, forced him to take refuge in a cloister occupied in common by the troops of the Cenci and Frangipani, his chief friends in the city. Meanwhile Peter Pierleoni was chosen as his rival in an orderly election by a majority of the cardinals who were entitled to vote, and mounted the papal throne under the name of Anacletus II. (see art.). Impelled now by fear, Innocent II. fled to Pisa, and thence to Genoa, where Bernard had prepared for his reception by influencing the French court and clergy in his favor. Also, at the synod of Etampes, this same all-powerful champion secured the rejection of Anacletus II. and the formal recognition of Innocent II. Then followed a long conflict between the partisans on both sides. In October, 1130, a synod held at Würzburg declared for Innocent; and a stately embassy was sent to inform him of his recognition by the German sovereign, Lothair, and the German bishops. In January, 1131, Henry of England, at a personal interview, presented him with a thousand marks of silver. Encouraged by this support, Innocent demanded of Lothair that he march to Rome in force, expel his rival, and put him in his seat. In return, Lothair asked the surrender of those privileges which had been extorted by the Concordat of Worms, and was only dissuaded from insisting on his request, by the eloquent appeal of Bernard. In August, 1133, Lothair marched to Italy; and, after some futile attempts at negotiation by Anacletus, he compelled the latter to shut himself in St. Peter's Church, and had himself crowned emperor in June, at the Lateran, by his chosen pope. As a requital for such success, Lothair once more pressed on the Pope his former request, but was again dissuaded from it, this time by Norbert; and he was obliged to content himself with some small concessions. During the festivities of the coronation, the Pope invested the emperor with the goods of Mathilda of Tuscany, on condition of an annuity of a hundred marks of silver. From this act was afterwards deduced the right of regarding the emperor as the vassal of the Roman see. On leaving Rome, Lothair committed his pope to the care of the Frangipani; but, distrusting his guardians, Innocent removed (1133) to Pisa; and there (in 1135) assembling a numerous council, he hurled excommunication afresh against Anacletus and his party. Though inclined at first to scorn the impotent decree, the latter soon learned his full danger when Bernard went to Milan, and in a few days drew over to Innocent's side the whole population of the city, which had been hitherto devoted to him. His last prop was removed when Roger of Sicily was expelled from Italy by Lothair, who died, however, on his return from the expedition, without completing the full establishment of his ward in St. Peter's chair. But Innocent still possessed in Bernard an ally mightier than the emperor's sword. Then, just as this support, too, seemed likely to fail, Anacletus died, leaving him master of the situation. The peace of the church thus effected was proclaimed in the Lateran Council (1139), and Roger of Sicily put under the ban. Thereupon Innocent led an army in person against the king, but, falling into an ambush, was captured. The result was the purchase of his freedom by recognizing Roger as king. On his return to Rome, he undertook to heal the wounds which the long schism had inflicted upon the Church and people, and to restore the authority of Rome over the smaller states which had formerly been under its rule. The result was a long war with Tivoli, concluded by a peace favorable, indeed, to the Church, but exasperating to the Romans, who desired the utter demolition of the city. In consequence, the Romans renounced obedience to the Pope, chose their own rulers, and called into life again the old republican senate. In addition to this misfortune, the good understanding had with Louis of France was ruptured, because of the king's refusal to accept a candidate whom the Pope had recommended to the bishopric of Bruges. The strife proceeded so far, that the Pope is said to have suspended an interdict over the kingdom. In the midst of these contentions Innocent died (Sept. 23, 1143). The most notable of his dogmatic decisions was his condemnation of the doctrines of Abelard and his of Arnold of Brescia (see those arts.).

INNOCENT III., Antipope to Alexander III. from 1179 to 1180; by name Landus of Sezza; from one of the oldest Lombard families, and not from the Frangipani. He was chosen pope by the Roman nobles, and those of the clergy who were hostile to Alexander, on Sept. 29, 1179 (not 1178). The relatives of Octavian (Victor IV.), the first antipope, supported him; and Octavian's brother received him into a stronghold between Palombara and Rome. By bribery Alexander succeeded in getting him into his hands, and sent him to the convent of La Cava, January, 1180. See MURATORI: Rer. Ital. scr. VII. p. 874.

INNOCENT III. (Lothair, or, in full, Giovanni Lotario Conti), Pope 1198-1216; a member of the distinguished family of the Scotti; b. 1160. His education, begun in Rome, was completed at Paris and Bologna. Returning to Rome, he was made canon of St. Peter, and, by the aid of his relatives among the cardinals, rapidly mounted the ecclesiastical stairs. Appointed a sub-deacon by Gregory VIII., he in 1190 exchanged this position for that of cardinal-deacon at the wish of his uncle, Clement III., in order, that, as the Pope's nephew, he might act a distinguished part among the cardinals, while as yet not thirty years old. Owing, probably, to family jealousies, he was, under Celestine III., seldom called to the business of the curia. The leisure thus afforded he employed in composing various treatises, — one in three books (De contemptu mundi, sive de miseria humane conditionis), another in six books (Mysteriorum evangelicæ legis ac sacramenti eucharistia), another, on ecclesiastical law (De quadrupartita specie nuptiarum). The first two only are extant.

At the death of Celestine III. (Jan. 8, 1198) Lothair was elected pope, in the thirty-seventh year of his life; then, rapidly passing through priestly and episcopal orders, he was crowned

Feb. 22. Before entering on the world-wide problems of his position, it devolved on him to restore the papal seat to Rome, secure the respect of the Italians, induce the city prefect to recognize his superiority, and secure the resignation of the senator chosen by the people, and hitherto independent of papal authority. He then stepped forth as the deliverer of Italy from the dominion of the German princes appointed by Henry VI. He plundered Spoleto, subjected Perugia, took a commanding position in Tuscany, placed his rectors in patrimonies, and soon became the acknowledged defender of national independence. Sicily, too, contributed to his good fortune. Here ruled Constance, the widow of Henry VI., as guardian of her minor son Frederic. Pressed by contending factions, she renounced the privileges of the Norman rule in relation to the Church, and took the oath of allegiance to Innocent as his feudatory. Dying in 1198, she by will named Innocent regent of the kingdom, and protector of her son. At once the Pope entered with zeal upon his new duties, subjecting the German princes to his young ward, and taking care of his education.

In Germany affairs were most favorable for the extension of the papal power there. Two claimants were contending for the imperial crown, — Philip of Swabia, and Otto IV. The latter at once sought the favor of Innocent by renouncing the rights of the empire in Italy, and surrendering the exarchate of Ravenna, the Pentapolis, and the kingdom of Spoleto. Philip's followers, on the contrary, showed a strong suspicion of the Pope. While promising him due respect as the head of the Church, they at the same time begged him not to interfere with the rights of the empire. Though naturally inclined to prefer the Guelph to the Hohenstaufen, yet, in a letter of reply to the German princes, the Pope assumed the appearance of an impartial umpire, desirous of preserving the independence of the electoral college, and fearful only, lest, by the choice of Philip, Germany became the hereditary possession of a ruling house. His hope was, that both claimants would submit their pretensions to a tribunal composed of German princes, and that Otto would be elected. In this he was disappointed. His next step was to issue a memorial on the subject, setting forth the superior claims of Otto as descended from a family long devoted to the Roman see, and a friend to the Church. On this ground Guido of Preneste was instructed to go to Germany as legate, and operate. In March, Innocent, by letter, recognized Otto as emperor, and in July secured the excommunication of all members of the opposing faction at an assembly of Otto's partisans. But this was done only after a renewed pledge given by the Guelph, dated Neuss, June 8, 1201, to concede to the Roman chair all the territories belonging to it, both those "which it now holds and which it may yet hold, and to assist it in obtaining those which it does not now occupy." The significance of this document is evident, furnishing as it did a foundation for the wider extension of the Church state. In the fortune of arms Otto was at first successful; and Philip was induced to try negotiations with the Pope, but on terms which could not be granted. In 1201-05, however, affairs took a decided turn. Several of the strongest partisans of Otto deserted to Philip.

The king of France, too, as Philip's ally, vanquished King John of England, Otto's confederate, in battle. Thus put in the ascendant, Philip directed a letter to Innocent, offering to submit the matters in debate to a tribunal composed of cardinals, and princes of the empire. The Pope was forced to take account of the changed condition of affairs, and bade Otto resign. But, as the latter remained unmoved, Innocent urged the victorious Hohenstaufen to accede to a tribunal to be constituted by himself at Rome, assuring him at the same time of a decision in his favor. To this both rivals at last yielded; and the consummate statesmanship of Innocent triumphed at last in having the contest referred to Rome. Whether the tribunal was ever held, is uncertain. One thing, however, is known: in spite of all his political shrewdness, the Pope was prevailed upon to pledge the restoration to the empire of all possessions unjustly obtained in Central Italy, provided Philip's daughter should be given in marriage to his nephew, and the latter, as Philip's son-in-law, should be made Duke of Tuscany. Even the great Innocent could not withstand the temptation to nepotism. Just at this juncture, Philip was assassinated by Otto of Wittenbach (June 21, 1208), and Otto became the undisputed sovereign of Germany. Innocent again dexterously shifted his tactics. He held up before Otto the imperial crown, and wrote him, "We demand of thee, dearest son, the thing which thou canst not but grant, because it accords with thy view, and serves for thy soul's salvation." Otto replied, undoing all his former pledges. He acknowledged the bounds of the States of the Church as drawn by Innocent, promised help in rooting out heresy, renounced interference in church elections, and, in short, surrendered every thing which had been secured to the empire by the Concordat of Worms. At such a price did Otto purchase his coronation as emperor. In the summer of 1209 he began his march over the Alps with a mighty host, and met the Pope at Viterbo. The interview was one which hardly sustained the Pope's first greeting, "This is my beloved son, in whom my soul is well pleased." Yet he deemed it not prudent to postpone the coronation, which took place at St. Peter's, Oct. 4, 1209. Once crowned, Otto ignored all his promises and obligations, and proceeded to deal as best he could for his own and the empire's advantage. He declared war against the Pope's protégé, Frederic of Sicily, and seized a part of the patrimony of Peter, and for these acts of violence was put under the papal ban. Nor was Innocent content with anathema alone. He proceeded to stir up against his quondam pet the Italian nobles and German princes, and treated with the king of France for his dethronement. In these measures he was so far successful as not only to rescue his ward, Frederic, from imminent peril, but also eventually to see him elected to the German throne by the princes of the empire (1212), in place of Otto, and crowned at Mainz. On July 12, 1213, the emperor elect guaranteed to his protector and benefactor, the Pope, all the realms, rights, and concessions which Otto had formerly pledged. On July 27, 1214, the great battle of Bouvines was fought, which ended in the utter defeat of Otto, and decided the conflict in Frederic's favor; and in an imposing council held at Rome in 1215, he was duly proclaimed emperor elect, and his rival once more anathematized. Death spared the Pope the discovery of the enormous blunder, which, from an ecclesiastical point of view, he had committed in thus exalting Frederick II. to the throne.

A worthier triumph was achieved by Innocent, over Philip (II.) Augustus of France, in forcing him to the correct maintenance of his marriage relations. Under the pretext of a too close connection in blood, but really on the ground of a conceived aversion, this prince had obtained from his bishops a divorce from his wife Ingeburga, and had married Agnes, daughter of Duke Berthold III. Against such proceedings Celestine III. had already entered his protest, and now Innocent took up the cause of the rejected queen. His remonstrance being unheeded, he put the whole of France under interdict, stirred up against the king a large portion of the clergy, the nobles, and the common people, and at last, on Sept. 7, 1200, compelled Philip to pledge the restoration of Ingeburga to her position as queen and wife. It was, however, to little purpose. The separation which the king could not effect by law, he sought to accomplish by subjecting his wife to constant vexations and humiliations, which might eventually compel her to leave him of her own accord. In all these trials the Pope remained her friend; and though he relaxed somewhat in the energy of his measures for her relief, when the aid of the king was needed in some of his projects, yet he persevered in refusing his consent to the divorce, and had the satisfaction of knowing at last that the queen, who for seventeen years had been watched and harassed as a prisoner, was received back into full honor by her penitent husband. With like success the Pope interfered in the domestic affairs of Alphonso IX. of Leon, whose wife he constrained to depart from him by the force of an interdict, because of a too close consanguinity; and also in those of Peter of Aragon, whose contemplated espousal of Bianca of Aragon he prevented for the same reason; and then, when, after Peter's marriage with Maria of Montpellier, the royal libertine wished to put her away, and scorned the papal prohibition of that act, Innocent, by ecclesiastical weapons alone, soon brought the offender to terms, and humbled him even to the surrender of his kingdom, which he accepted back as a papal fief. King Sancho of Portugal, also, he compelled to pay the tribute promised to the papal see by his father, though much against his will; and Ladislaus of Poland, when guilty of robbing the church and bishops of goods and rights, he soon subjected to his requirements. The extent to which Innocent asserted to himself the sole right of putting princes under ban, and of releasing them from it, may be seen in his dealings with Hakon of Sweden. When this king, upon atonement made for his father's wrongs, was released from the ban which had been put on the kingdom by Archbishop Eric, the Pope wrote to Eric that he had imitated him ape-fashion, and reminded him that such release was valid only when granted by the vicar of St. Peter. In 1204 Innocent succeeded in uniting the Bulgarians, who formerly belonged to the Greek Church, with the Church of Rome by consenting to Prince John's request for coronation, who desired it for the sake of papal protection against foreign and domestic foes.

But it was in his treatment of John Lackland, the king of England, that Innocent's assumption of universal power as the "vicar of Christ" fully culminated. The quarrel was occasioned by the king's interference in the election of a superior over the monks of Canterbury. The Pope, refusing to sanction his choice, made a countermove by convening some members of the convent, who happened to be at Rome, and securing, through them, election of Stephen Langton, a cardinal priest, to the contested position. This step enraged the king. When threatened with an interdict, he swore, "by God's teeth," that he would hunt every ecclesiastic who dared to proclaim it, out of the land. The interdict fell, and John sought to make good his oath. A ban followed; and, in spite of all John's efforts to hinder its publication, it became known. The nobles, who hated his tyranny, rose against him; and fierce the conflict grew, until at last Innocent declared the throne vacant, and instigated Philip Augustus of France to take possession of it, promising to all who engaged in the attempt the title and privilege of crusaders. This extreme measure frightened the king into abject submission; and on May 13, 1213, he concluded a convention with ten papal plenipotentiaries at Dover, pledging the acknowledgment of Stephen Langton as archbishop, and the restoration to the church of all its property which had been seized, and also of all exiles to their homes. Nor was this humiliation sufficient. To secure himself against the threatened invasion of Philip, although under the pretext of atoning for his sins, on May 18 John surrendered his realms "to God and the Pope," and received them back as a papal fief, bound to an annual payment of seven hundred marks for England, and three hundred for Ireland. Then it was, when prostrate in the dust at the feet of the archbishop as a suppliant for mercy, that he was released from the ban. The interdict was not lifted until July 2, 1214, on the fulfilment of the conditions pledged. But, though now reconciled with the Pope, the quarrel with the barons went on, until by force of arms they extorted from the king the famous Magna Charta, and thus laid the foundation of the English political constitution. No sooner did Innocent learn of these transactions than he pronounced the terms of the charter null and void. It touched too closely upon the royal prerogatives, and indirectly upon the feudal sovereignty of the Pope. But neither declaration nor excommunication had any effect on the nation. One only who took part in the uprising of the barons fell a sacrifice under the power of the Pope: this was Langton. By reason of his refusal to put the insurgents under the ban, he was, while attending a council at Rome in 1215, suspended from his archbishopric. But nothing so damaged the papal cause in England as this opposition of Innocent to the Magna Charta. Here it was where the Pope had at last fully realized his ideal of the true relations between Church and State, and here it was where the papacy began to encounter its most effective opposition.

What Innocent's ideal was may be learned from what he wrote to King John: "Jesus Christ wills that the kingdom should be priestly, and the priesthood kingly. Over all, he has set me as his vicar upon earth, so that, as before Jesus 'every knee shall bow,' in like manner to his vicar all shall be obedient, and there shall be one fold and one shepherd. Pondering this truth, thou, as a secular prince, hast subjected thy realm to Him to whom all is spiritually subject." Accordingly, in entertaining this view of his position, Innocent naturally felt, when defending the rights of the Roman chair before princes and peoples, that whatsoever he did was wrought in and through the influence of Him whose vicar he was. Moreover, he applied to himself the word of Jesus: "All power is given unto me in heaven and earth." Peter's miraculous walk upon the sea was to him a sign of how the nations of the earth were to be subdued under the feet of himself and his successors. Like Melchizedek, the Pope, he conceived, united in one person the offices of king and high priest. And as, in the ark of the covenant, the rod was placed beside the tables of the law, so he considered, that, in the heart of the Pope, there resided together both the fearful power of destruction and the right to bestow grace. The parallel already drawn by Gregory VII., comparing the Church and State to the sun and moon severally, Innocent expanded into an illustration for showing how the State was actually dependent on the Church for its true lustre and glory. A frequent declaration of his was it, that the priesthood alone (i.e., the Church) sprang from the divine appointment, while the State originated "from human extortions." Hence, in all cases where a heinous sin was in question, he claimed the right to test the decisions of the secular tribunals, and if necessary to quash them. Both the secular and the spiritual swords, he affirmed, belonged to the Pope; and, while he reserved to himself the latter, the former he gave over to the princes.

In discharging his duty as the vicar of Christ, Innocent now, as at the beginning of his pontificate, felt it obligatory on him to summon the kings and peoples of the earth to a holy war for the recovery of Palestine. In this movement he was largely aided by the rare eloquence of two men,—Fulk of Neuilly, who wrought effectually among the French nobles, and Abbot Martin, who was no less influential with those of South Germany. But the crusading host encamping near Venice was early turned aside from its undertaking by the craft of the Doge Dandolo, who employed it for the recovery of Zara from the king of Hungary. In vain did Innocent use warning and threatening to divert them from this attempt. The doge's work was done. Hardly was this difficulty adjusted, when the crusaders engaged in another enterprise, equally foreign to their original purpose, and no less contrary to the will of the Pope. Influenced by the persuasions of Philip of Germany, they lent their assistance to his brother-in-law, Alexius Angelus, in his project of regaining his ancestral inheritance from the usurper, Alexis III. Constantinople was captured. But by this event the relations between the Greeks and Latins became so disturbed, that, in a popular insurrection, Alexius was caught, imprisoned, and finally strangled. Thereupon the crusaders took possession of the city, and set up there a Latin empire. On May 16, 1204, Baldwin of Flanders was crowned emperor. This event, opening as it did to the Pope a prospect of uniting the Greek and Latin churches, reconciled him to the course pursued by the crusaders, and in a letter to them he expressed the joyful hope that henceforth there would be but one fold and one shepherd. And now was vouchsafed to him that which his predecessors had sighed for in vain; viz., the nomination of a Catholic patriarch for Constantinople.

On Oct. 12, 1204, Innocent issued a bull for raising a crusading expedition into Livonia. The leader of the several enterprises which followed was Albert, Bishop of Livonia, who succeeded in baptizing the Livonians in 1206, and also the neighboring Letti in 1208, and subjecting both to the chair of Peter. In reward for this, Albert was released from the control of his metropolitan at Bremen, and made, in a measure, independent. But, on his becoming involved in a conflict with the "Knighthood of Christ in Livonia," Innocent sought to adjust the difficulty by a compromise, the conflicting terms of which soon made it evident how impracticable it was for a church power centralized at Rome to manage wisely the conditions and relations of remote ecclesiastical provinces.

It is not so creditable to Innocent, that he first employed the crusades for the extermination of heresy. In 1207 he enjoined on the French king the duty of annihilating the heretics of Toulouse. The cruelties inflicted on the Albigenses, in consequence, are not to be charged so much on Innocent himself as on his system, which may be traced back to Augustine (see art. CATARI). The orders of the Pope against heretics were approved at the twelfth general synod (1215), and incorporated in the canon law. They were, in substance, that all rulers should be exhorted to tolerate no heretics in their domains: if a ruler refused to clear his land of heretics at the demand of the Church, and should persist in his refusal, he should be deprived of his authority, and even ejected from it by force: to every one who joined in the expeditions against heretics, like favors should be granted as were granted to crusaders. At the same council the severest enactments were issued against the Jews. Rulers were forbidden to trust them with public offices. In order to be known as Jews, they were to clothe themselves with a peculiar garb. During Holy Week they were not to appear on the streets, lest, in that season of sorrow, Christians should be scandalized by their decorated attire. At this council, also, condemnation was pronounced upon the doctrine of Anselm of Bena (see art.), and on a treatise against Peter Lombard by Joachim of Fiore (see art.). Moreover, the formation of new monastic orders was discouraged; and alike on Dominic and on Francis, both of whom prayed to have their orders confirmed, was the command of the council imposed, that they should subject their societies to existing rules. The last deliverance of the council was to summon Christendom to a new crusade to the Holy Land, in 1217. At this council, held near the close of Innocent's pontificate, the Pope showed himself as the unlimited ruler of the great ones of the world and of the church. Emperors, kings, and princes had sent to it their plenipotentiaries; and fifteen hundred archbishops, bishops, and abbots took part in its transactions, or, rather, were present to listen to and record the decrees of Innocent. Deliberations, properly speaking, there were none. Consent followed at once on the reading of the Pope's decree. But, while the ecclesiastics thus exalted their superior, they virtually voted their own abdication. None of Innocent's predecessors had so cut down the privileges of bishops and metropolitans as he had done, and none had so largely assumed the right of patronage belonging to local church officers. He was the first to assert the Pope's right to grant benefices; and he issued countless commissions in order to secure a productive living for the papal servants and the Romish clergy, and even to his own relatives and intimates. And he did this at the cost of the country clergy, and to the disparagement of the authority of the bishops in the regions where these commissions were executed. This centralization of power was still furthered by a claim laid to the bishops' chairs, in case any overstepped canonical regulations and privileges. The right to depose bishops was also declared to belong to the Pope alone, who, as the vicar of Christ, had the sole power to annul the marriage between the bishop and his congregation. Large as all these claims were, they were sustained, on the part of Innocent, by rare discernment and profound knowledge. Even during his reign, his bulls and decretals were collected and published at three several times; and a fourth collection, comprising those of the last six years, was issued shortly after his death. But, though thus crowded with work, this Pope found leisure for literary labors. We have from his pen an exposition of the seven penitential Psalms, evincing a tone of sincere piety. Moreover, he preached frequently, not only at Rome, but also upon his journeys; and those of his sermons which have come down to us bear testimony to his earnest piety and deep humility. Once and again did he utter a sigh for rest from occupations which wore out body and soul. And this rest he found in death (July 16, 1216) at Perugia. Pride can hardly be said to be the ruling element of his character. When he burns, excommunicates, binds, and loosens, he is not seeking his own honor, but the honor of Him whose vicegerent he believed himself to be. The high office of the Papacy, so repugnant to Protestant feeling, he spiritualized and ennobled. In his blameless walk, his brotherly love, his readiness for self-sacrifice, he showed the devoted Christian. We can hardly call him covetous, since he devoted his whole income to the good of the Church. The only spot that stains his name is that he did once and again endow his relatives and trusted servants with ecclesiastical livings; but this is a spot which cleaves almost to the entire Papacy.

INNOCENT IV. (Senibaldi de Fieschi), Pope 1243-51. Celestine IV. died suddenly, and was followed, June 25, 1243, after the interval of a year and a half, by Innocent IV., whose choice was secured through the influence of the emperor. The new pontiff was an eminent jurist belonging to one of the first families of Genoa; and it was hoped that his election would terminate the long strife which had been waged between the Church and the emperor, inasmuch as the new Pope, while cardinal, had been the constant friend of the latter. To this end a settlement was proposed, highly advantageous to the Pope, but which failed of success by reason of the mutual distrust entertained by the parties. The Pope, pending negotiations, fled suddenly to Lyons, whither he called a general council, for the ostensible purpose of correcting abuses in the Church, of carrying aid to the Eastern Christians, and of settling the difficulties between the Church and the empire. The emperor, on the other hand, issued, in his own interest, a letter to the princes of Christendom, unveiling the real purpose of the Pope, and promising to organize a crusade, provided Innocent would remove the ban that had been put on him, and would quiet the rebellion in Lombardy. But, at the third session of the papal council, Frederick II. was deposed and excommunicated, and the electoral princes called upon to choose a new emperor. Notwithstanding the mediation of Louis IX., and the orthodox confession made by the emperor before the Bishop of Palermo, the Pope remained obdurate, and the strife waxed bitter. Innocent fomented rebellion in Sicily, and had Henry Raspe, landgrave of Turingia, proclaimed emperor of Germany. The princes of the empire, however, for the most part remained true to Frederick; and his rival soon fell, fighting against the imperial forces, led by Conrad, son of Frederick. His death left Frederick's influence in Germany paramount. The Pope could find no one willing to accept the gift of the crown, save Count William of Holland, whose supporters had to be bought with gold. Frederick died Dec. 13, 1247, transmitting his feud with the Pope to his son Conrad, whose hereditary crown of Sicily Innocent had bestowed upon the English prince, Edmund. Sudden death, which so often had favored the popes, carried off Conrad while in the act of asserting his rights. His infant heir, the ten-year-old Conradin, was left under the guardianship of Manfred, natural son of Frederick, who made terms with the pontiff, on condition that the claims of his ward to the Sicilian crown should be respected. The Pope proving faithless, Manfred took the field, and succeeded in compelling the entire papal army to surrender. Innocent died five days later, at Naples, where he lies buried in the cathedral. In the midst of a busy and stormy life Innocent found time for grand missionary enterprises to the East. He ceded to Conrad, Grand Master of the German order, his proprietary right over Prussia, which he had divided into four bishoprics. To him, also, is due the custom of decorating cardinals with the red hat. He is, moreover, the author of a work entitled Apparatus in quinque libros decretalium, highly prized as an authority on canon law, and also A Defence of the Papal Prerogative against Peter de Vineis, the chancellor of Frederick II. He died at Naples, Dec. 7, 1254.

INNOCENT V. (Pietro de Tarantasia), Pope 1276, was chosen to succeed Gregory X. Jan. 21, 1276. He had been Archbishop of Lyons, Cardinal Bishop of Ostia, and grand confessor. His first aim was to reconcile the warring factions of the Guelph and Ghibelline, which had embroiled the Italian states; and he succeeded so far as to bring Lucca and Pisa into friendly relation, and give peace to Tuscany. Whilst preparing to send a numerous embassy to the Greek emperor, Michael Palæologus, in the interest of the union of the two churches east and west (to which the Greek ambassadors at Lyons had previously consented), Innocent died (June 22), after a brief pontificate of five months. He was a voluminous writer. Besides his postils and quodlibets, he composed a number of philosophic and other works, most noteworthy of which were commentaries on the Pauline Epistles and on the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard. A hundred propositions drawn from his writings, and condemned by learned contemporaries, were defended by Thomas Aquinas.

INNOCENT VI. (Étienne d'Albert), Pope 1352-62. On the death of Clement VI. the cardinals assembled, and, before making choice of his successor, proceeded to limit the prerogatives of the papal chair as follows: (1) The Pope shall appoint no new cardinals until the existing number shall have been reduced to sixteen. The whole number shall never exceed twenty, and none shall be appointed without the consent of at least two-thirds of the cardinals. (2) The Pope shall not imprison, depose, place under the ban, or suspend a cardinal, without the consent of all his peers. (3) The Pope shall neither alienate the lands of the Church, nor invest any one with the same, without the consent of two-thirds of the cardinals. (4) The revenues of the Church shall be equally divided; one half going to the support of the Pope, the other to the cardinals. (5) No relative of the Pope shall be appointed governor of any of the provinces of the Church. (6) The Pope shall not receive tithes of ecclesiastical livings, nor any subsidies, without consent of two-thirds of the cardinals. These propositions the cardinals were compelled to subscribe under oath, some doing so with the reservation "Si jure niterentur." Thereupon the votes were taken; and the choice fell upon Stephen Albert, Bishop of Ostia, Dec. 18, 1362. He took the title of Innocent VI., and his first act was to declare the propositions which he subscribed with the reservation above specified null and void. Deeply versed in canon law, and severe in morals, he at once set about correcting abuses. Unlawful grants were recalled; grievous taxes were abolished; the clergy who had flocked to Avignon on the occasion of his coronation, in the hope of preferment, were ordered to return within five days to their benefices, on the pain of excommunication; and by precept and example the luxurious living of the cardinals was rebuked. That the judges of the Rota might be the more impartial, they were assigned a competent support. Charles IV., who was crowned at Rome April 5, 1355, was compelled by the Pope to leave for Germany that selfsame day. Bologna was wrested from Bernardo Visconti, the powerful and unscrupulous ruler of Milan. The new Pope, moreover, sought to mediate between Edward of England, and John of France, and to unite the Venetians and Genoese, then at war with each other, against the Turks. He also put Peter of Castile under the ban for poisoning his wife, and undertook to fortify Avignon against the hordes of mercenaries which were plundering the south of France; but, ere he could complete the latter work, the city was invested, and the withdrawal of the besiegers had to be purchased by a large sum of money and a plenary pardon. At the instance of Charles IV. the festival of the Sacred Lance was instituted, to be celebrated yearly, on the Friday following Easter, throughout Germany and Bohemia. The Mendicant Friars, whose reputation for sanctity had greatly suffered in the popular estimation, found a powerful champion in Innocent, who restored them to all former privileges. He died Sept. 12, 1362, leaving behind him the reputation of a just and upright man. Of his writings there have come down to us only a few letters and some bulls. See E. WERUNSKY: Italienische Politik Papst Innocent VI. u. König Karl IV. in J. 1353, 1354, Wien, 1878.

INNOCENT VII. (Cosimo de Migliorati), Pope 1404-06. On the death of Boniface IX., the cardinals bound themselves by oath to do their utmost to secure the healing of the great Western schism, mutually pledging their willingness to resign even the papal chair, in case such a step should be deemed necessary to the furtherance of an end so desirable. The new Pope (elected Oct. 17, 1404) was distinguished alike for the purity of his character and the extent of his learning, particularly in the provinces of civil and canon law. He had been previously appointed to several responsible positions, and employed in a number of delicate missions, by Urban VI.; nominated also chamberlain of the Church and cardinal by Boniface IX.; and was sixty-five years old when elected Pope. He assumed the title of Innocent VII. Shortly after his accession, a tumult broke out in Rome between the Guelphs and Ghibellines; a nephew of Innocent heading the former. In it a number of citizens were slain, and the Pope was compelled to flee the city. His exile, however, was brief. The people, as soon as they were convinced of his freedom from all complicity in the murderous act, restored him in triumph. Since the party opposed to the Pope was openly encouraged by Ladislaus, king of Naples, and Neapolitan troops were employed by it in attacks upon the city, and raids into the country, Innocent was compelled to put the king under the ban, and declare his kingdom forfeited. The king, however, fearing an attack from his rival, the Duke of Anjou, soon submitted to the conditions of the Pope. About this time the antipope, Benedict XIII., came as far as Genoa, desiring safe conduct from Innocent to Rome, under the pretext of holding conference with him in reference to harmonizing the Church. The wily request of Benedict was denied, and the conduct of each in the matter gave occasion for mutual reproach and recrimination. Innocent died suddenly of apoplexy (Nov. 6, 1106), giving rise to the groundless suspicion of having been poisoned. This Pope, otherwise simple, genial, and ingenious, cannot wholly escape the charge of nepotism. His relatives were advanced to the most considerable places, and loaded with riches. His sole literary relic is a speech, of little merit, on the re-union of the Eastern and Western churches.

INNOCENT VIII. (Giovanni Battista Cibo), Pope 1484-92; chosen Aug. 29, 1484. He sprang from a Genoese family of Greek origin. We find him first as a youth at the Neapolitan court, then at Rome, in the service of Cardinal Philip of Bologna. After having held successively the bishoprics of Savona and Melfi, he was made cardinal 1473: on his accession he vainly sought to unite the princes of Christendom in a crusade against the Turks. He became involved in war with Ferdinand of Naples, whose crown he offered to Renaldus, Duke of Lorraine. A peace favorable to the Pope was effected Aug. 12, 1486. It was, however, shortly after violated by Ferdinand, who was excommunicated, and kept under the ban until peace was declared (1492). While urging the princes and people to arm against the Turk, the Pope shamelessly entered into treaty with the Sultan Bajazet, according to which he agreed—for the sum of forty thousand ducats per year, and the gift of the sacred spear which was said to have pierced our Saviour's side—to keep Zezim, a brother of the sultan, and a pretender to his throne, who had fallen into his hands, a close prisoner. Thus he thriftily turned to advantage his relations to both Christian and Pagan. The reputed wizards, witches, and soothsayers with which Germany was at this time filled, were by him prosecuted with great severity. The processes which his judges employed against these wretched creatures have been preserved in a book, which is remarkable alike for its learning, superstition, and vulgarity (see Witches and Processes against Witches). He strove also to arrest the progress of the Hussites in Bohemia, canonized the Margrave Leopold of Austria, and passed the closing years of his reign in creating new places, that by their sale he might enrich his treasury. Innocent died July 25, 1492. His sixteen children bear witness to the fidelity with which he kept his vow of chastity. These he was constantly and shamelessly seeking to enrich and advance. One of the eight cardinals he created was the son of Lorenzo de Medicis, whom he elevated to the office before he had passed his thirteenth year.

INNOCENT IX. (Giovanni Antonio Facchinetti), Pope 1591; elected Oct. 30, 1591. He was b. at Bologna 1519. Previous to his elevation to the papal chair, he had held, together with other dignities, the office of patriarch of Jerusalem, president of the Inquisition, and cardinal. His pontificate lasted two months, and was distinguished by a number of judicious and laudable enterprises undertaken by him. He forbade the alienation of church property, interdicted debt, and reduced burdensome taxation. He also improved the harbor of Ancona, and dug a canal in the neighborhood of St. Angelo to protect Rome from the overflow of the Tiber. Dying Dec. 30, 1591, he left behind him a considerable number of writings (as yet unprinted) and the character of a true and ingenious man.

INNOCENT X. (Giovanni Battista Pamphili), Pope 1644-55; was chosen Pope (Sept. 15, 1644) in his seventy-second year, chiefly because he had said little and accomplished less. He owed alike his ill fortune and ill fame to Donna Olimpia Maidalchini, his brother's widow, with whom, even during the life of her husband, he held questionable relations. On the sudden death of the husband, she became the absolute mistress of the prelate, and the inspiration of his whole life; so that caricaturists were in the habit of representing the vicegerent of Christ as arrayed in a frock, styling him another Johanna, with the keys of St. Peter. Though he owed his elevation to the family of the Barberini, he was no sooner seated than he called upon them to give an account of their stewardship, in hopes of transferring their vast wealth into his own hands. Fleeing to France, they succeeded in enlisting the French king in their cause, which led to a rupture with the Pope, and a seizure, by the French, of Piombino and Portolongano. The result was a restoration of the Barberini to their offices and estates. The Duke of Parma, having, in defiance of the Pope, invested a certain infamous Theatine monk with the bishopric of Castro, the papal authorities took possession of the bishopric and earldom, and razed the fortifications of the city. The Peace of Westphalia, concluded in opposition to the vigorous and repeated protests of the papal nuncio (October, 1648), seriously impaired the papal prerogative. In anticipation of the Pope's bull, declaring the articles of peace null and void, it was stipulated that no spiritual or secular rights, nor decree of council, privilege or indulgence, edict or inhibition, no papal concordat, dispensation, absolution, or remonstrance, made in contravention of the treaty, or of any of its separate provisions, would either be heard or entertained. The papal protest, however, was not to be without its significance in the future. For the present, its only influence was to damage the prestige of the Pope. The papal nuncio, having boldly published the pontiff's bull at Vienna, was expelled from the city with a scurrilous message to his Holiness. Innocent's zeal for the purity of doctrine was shown in his formal condemnation (1653) of five propositions taken from the works of Jansenius. Guided by the counsel of Donna Olimpia, he succeeded in devising means for enriching the papal coffers, which he had found burdened with a debt of eight million scudi. The most shameful system of bribery and corruption prevailed in every rank of the papal hierarchy: offices were openly bought and sold. Two thousand of the smaller cloisters were closed, and their revenues sequestered. Amongst the more extraordinary measures taken to bring money to Rome was the Pope's letter, Universales maxime jubilei, 1650. The most injurious was the monopoly of the corn-trade by the papal exchequer, by means of which flour was retailed to the baker at an increase of one-third in price, and a reduction of one-third in measure, resulting, as is alleged, in the ruin of agriculture in Italy. Innocent died Jan. 5, 1655. His pontificate covers a period of deep degeneracy in the Church, marked by a commingling of things profane and sacred, and by the domination of parasites and mistresses, the Church all the while contending for her ancient prerogatives in all their fulness. See ROSSTEUSCHER: Hist. Innoc. X. Wittenberg, 1671; and RANKE: Hist. of the Popes.

INNOCENT XI. (Benedetto Odeschalchi), Pope 1676-89. He was b. at Como, May 16, 1611; educated by the Jesuits; and studied law at Genoa, Naples, and Rome. After having distinguished himself for his integrity and ability in various high positions, he was created cardinal (1647) through the influence of Donna Olimpia, and subsequently nominated legate of Ferrara, and Bishop of Novara. He owed his elevation, Sept. 21, 1676, to the French party in the College of Cardinals. On his accession, he set about the furtherance of a stricter morality in Church and State. He rebuked by his example the prevailing extravagance, rigidly limiting his own expenses, and abolishing all cardinalships and benefices whose services could be dispensed with; revived the stringent laws regulating the examination of candidates for consecration; enjoined upon the clergy the leading of holy lives, the catechising of the children, and the opening of schools for their instruction; forbade the use of dialectic sophistries and fables in the pulpit, bidding the priest proclaim only the crucified Christ; dismissed the eunuchs from the papal chapel; interdicted the luxurious habits of dress prevalent amongst the women, forbidding them the study of music; condemned the morality of the Jesuits in his bull March 2, 1679; and came into collision with France on account of the so-called "Privilege of Asylum" claimed by foreign ambassadors for criminals, not only within their palaces, but also in the precincts adjacent. This privilege Louis XIV. would not consent to have abrogated; and his ambassador De Lavardin, who entered Rome with a retinue of a thousand soldiers and servants, was accordingly put under the ban. Neither party would yield, and the question remained open until after the death of the Pope. It was finally settled in his favor. The so-called "Regal Right" was another apple of discord between the Pope and the French king. Louis had insisted upon appropriating the revenues of certain vacant churches and benefices, even in cases where they had not been planted by the crown. This attempt was resisted by the bishops; and the Pope sustained them, even to the extent of threatening the king with the extreme censure of the Church. As a countermove, the latter called a council of the French clergy (Nov. 9, 1681), who not only confirmed the disputed claims of the throne, but made a solemn deliverance consisting of four fundamental propositions (Quatuor propositiones Cleri Gallicani). A copy of these, by order of the Pope, was openly burnt at the hands of the public executioner, and confirmation refused to all such as were nominated to livings. In consequence, at his death, the bishops of no less than thirty dioceses were without papal consecration. Though the cruel persecution of the Jesuits, and the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, by the French king, subsequently drew from the Pope the very highest commendation of the king, he never, to the day of his death, halted in his opposition to the so-called "Regal Right, or Freedom of Quarters." Innocent died Aug. 12, 1689. The French king and the Jesuits alike sought to blacken his memory after death; and his canonization, urged by Philip II., encountered opposition chiefly from these quarters. Without doubt he was an ecclesiastical prince of pure and noble virtues, and one of the most illustrious men that had ever filled the chair of St. Peter. He was compelled by the Inquisition to condemn, by a bull, the writings of Molinos (Nov. 20, 1687), although he was very friendly to Molinos. The efforts of James II. to convert England to Catholicism were, by Innocent, not only considered rash, but as calculated to increase the power of the king and lead to an alliance with France, rather than to advance the Church. The fall of James was therefore not mourned; and his plea for the papal help was answered by a cool rejection, on the ground of the Pope's absorption in his struggle with France. See GÉRIN: Le pape Innocent XI. et la révolution anglaise de 1688, Paris, 1876 [also BIGELOW: Molinos the Quietist, N. Y., 1882, which gives, pp. 113-127, a translation of Innocent's bull, and MOLINOS].

INNOCENT XII. (Antonio Pignatelli), Pope 1691-1700, was chosen Feb. 12, 1691, after a five-months' conclave. Born March 13, 1615, he was in his seventy-seventh year when elected. He entered public life early. After holding many important offices, was made cardinal bishop of Faeenza, and archbishop of Naples by Innocent XI., whose title he took, and whose example he strove to imitate. He had no sooner taken his seat than he set his face sternly against nepotism. The poor were his beneficiaries: the Lateran, his hospital. He declared it unlawful for any pope in the future to invest his relatives with any of the offices or revenues of the Church. He sought to reform cloister discipline and the lives of the secular clergy; interdicted the lottery; brought to a close the controversy with the French king, on the condition of limiting the exercise of "Regal Right" to vacant benefices lying within the territory of Old France. The Pope was several times involved in controversy with Leopold I. of Germany in reference to questions of precedence; but, through mutual concessions, these, as they arose, were amicably settled. Friendly relations with Charles II. of Spain were interrupted by a question concerning the Inquisition in Naples. Pending its solution, both king and pope died; the latter Sept. 27, 1700. In the controversy between Bossuet and Fénelon, the Pope decided for the former, condemning some twenty-three propositions, which he affected to find in Fénelon's writings, as contrary to good morals and sound doctrine. He bequeathed a large sum of money to a hospital which he had founded, and ordered that the money accruing from the sale of his personal effects should be given to the poor. His reputation is that of a just, charitable, unselfish, and beneficent man.

INNOCENT XIII. (Michel Angelo Conti), Pope 1721-21. He was born May 13, 1665. Alexander VIII. had made him a member of his court family, and Clement XI., cardinal. He was elected May 8, 1721, after a stormy session of the conclave, during which the cardinals came to blows, and inkstands were hurled. His accession was hailed as promising rest to the Church, and peace to Christendom. His nomination of his brother as cardinal aroused fears of nepotism, which, happily, proved groundless. Italy prospered under his reign. Like his predecessor, he espoused the cause of the Pretender to the British throne under the title of James III. Charles VI. of Germany he invested with the kingdom of Naples. He also wrested Castel Palo, on the Mediterranean, from its unwilling proprietor, and, under French influences, clothed a contemptible profligate with the office of cardinal. These two last acts are spots on a character otherwise fair. When Malta was invested by the Turks, after issuing a call to Christendom, he himself hastened to the rescue with men and money. He had serious thoughts of abolishing the order of the Jesuits on account of their opposition to the Chinese mission, and took under his protection the so-called "Constitutio Unigenitus," which had been wrung from his predecessor. His death occurred March 7, 1724.

INNOCENTS' DAY, a church festival in honor of the children slain by Herod in Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 16), and who thus were in a sense the first Christian martyrs. It was very early celebrated; for it is mentioned by Irenæus and Cyprian, at first, in connection with Epiphany. Later, in the Western Church, Innocents' Day came on Dec. 28; in the Eastern Church, on Dec. 29. It is not known when the festivals were given different days. Peter of Ravenna (Chrysologus), a bishop of the fifth century, has left two sermons upon the Massacre of the Innocents, considered quite apart from the Epiphany; and the fact would seem to indicate that the separation was made in his day. At present, in the Roman, Anglican, and Episcopal churches, Innocents' Day is Dec. 28. The Roman priest celebrates the mass on this day in a blue gown. The Armeno-Gregorian calendar gives the number of infants slain by Herod at fourteen thousand; the true number was probably less than thirty.

INNS AMONG THE HEBREWS. In one sense of the term, inns did not exist in antiquity; but there were enclosures which afforded some protection, and in which there was a fountain. In later times there were built "khans," or "caravanserais," which are large square buildings containing rooms enclosing an open court (Jer. ix. 2). But no food for man or beast was provided, as the traveller was expected to carry it with him. In the parable of the Good Samaritan, mention is made (Luke x. 34) of another sort of caravanserai, which had a keeper, and where personal care, besides food, could be obtained. The "inn" to which Joseph and Mary went (Luke ii. 7) was probably a caravanserai. RÜETSCHL.

INQUISITION (Inquisitio hereticæ pravitatis), or the "Holy Office" (Sanctum Officium), is the name of the spiritual court of the Roman-Catholic Church, for the detection and punishment of those whose opinions differed from the doctrines of the Church. It was the abnormal outgrowth of the ancient ecclesiastical discipline which charged the bishops with the duty of searching out the heresies in their dioceses, and stemming the progress of error. [The Church fathers treated all departures from the creed of the Church with great severity, and the early councils forbade all relations of the members of the Church with heretics.] From the reign of Constantine the Great the laws against heretics became more and more rigorous. [In 316 Constantine issued an edict condemning the Donatists to the loss of their goods.] But the first Christian emperor to pronounce the sentence of death against them was Theodosius, who, in 382, condemned the Manichæans. Eminent Church fathers, however, like Chrysostom (Homil. 29, 46, in Matth.) and Augustine (Ep. 93 ad Vicentium, etc.), pronounced against the death penalty; but Jerome (Ep. 37 ad Riparium) found a justification of it in Deut. xiii. 6 sqq., and Leo the Great openly advocated it (Ep. 15 ad Turribium). The civil arm executed the penalty, but bishops and clergy were often lukewarm in searching out heresies. The see of Rome was not content with decrees of councils, or the capitularies of Charlemagne commanding the bishops to check error, and gave full powers into the hands of legates, who, backed by the edicts of councils (Toulouse, 1119; Oxford, 1160; Tours, 1163; the Third Lateran, 1179; Verona, 1184), relentlessly pursued the Cathari and the Poor Men of Lyons in Southern France, and the Catareni in Northern Italy. Finally it was Innocent III. [1198-1216] who developed the organization for the detection and punishment of heretics which for several centuries conducted the Inquisition, in the technical sense of the term. By the Fourth Lateran Council every bishop was instructed to visit his see in person, or to appoint visitors of irreproachable character to do it, and, where the exigencies of the case demanded it, to take an oath of the inhabitants to inform against heretics, and to reveal their places of meeting. The refusal to take the oath was regarded as an evidence of heresy.

The measures of Innocent III. were revised by the Council of Toulouse (1229). It passed forty-five articles, instructing the bishops to bind by an oath a priest in every parish, and two or more laymen, to search out and apprehend heretics and those who sheltered them. Heresy was to be punished with the loss of property, and the house in which a heretic was found was to be burned. Heretics who repented were to wear two crosses, — one on their back, and one on their chest. But if the repentance seemed to be a result of the fear of death, the guilty person was to be shut up in a convent. Every two years, males from fourteen years upwards, and females from twelve years upwards, were obligated to repeat an oath to inform against heretics. The neglect of the annual confession was a sufficient ground of suspicion, as also the possession by laymen of the Scriptures, especially in translations. In spite of these measures and the rigorous execution of them, especially in Southern France, the desired result was not secured. The bishops were accused of apathy, and were themselves made subject to the Inquisition by the papal chair. In 1232 and 1233 Gregory IX. appointed the Dominicans a standing commission of inquisitors in Austria, Germany, Aragon, Lombardy, and Southern France. At the same period was organized the so-called "soldiery of Jesus Christ against heretics." Louis the Pious, in his famous edict of 1228 (ad cives Narbonnæ) made it the special duty of the civil power to root out heresy, and to punish without delay those who were condemned. The suspicion of heresy was made a sufficient ground for apprehension; and, by a bull of Innocent IV., in 1252 (ad extirpanda), resort was to be had, if necessary, to torture, to extract a confession.

The notion of heresy was enlarged so as to comprehend not only the slightest deviation from the creed of the Church, but also usury, sorcery, contempt of the cross and clergy, dealings with Jews, etc. [The case of Galileo Galilei shows how heresy was understood. This distinguished astronomer (b. Pisa, Feb. 18, 1564; d. in the Villa Martellini, at Arceti, near Florence, Jan. 8, 1642) was tried by the Inquisition in Rome (June 21, 1633). The charge against him was, that he held the Copernican theory, and had written in advocacy of its doctrines condemned in the decree of 1616; viz., that the sun is fixed in the centre of the world, and that the earth rotates. In reply, he said, that, since the Congregation of the Index had condemned it, he had not held the Copernican theory. The published documents of the trial do not sustain the charge that he was tortured. He made public recantation the next day. The famous legend, that, on rising from his knees after his recantation, he exclaimed, "E pur si muove!" ("And yet it does move!") seems to have no adequate foundation. See WOHLWILL: Ist Galilei gefoltert worden? (Leipzig, 1877); GEBLER: Galileo (Stuttgart, 1876, 77, 2 vols.); DE L'ÉPIVOIS: Les pièces du procès de Galilée (Rome, 1877); REUSCH: D. Prozess Galileis u. d. Jesuiten (Bonn, 1879)]. The punishments were loss of civil and ecclesiastical privileges; rigorous confinement; and death, either by a simple execution, or by incarceration and the flames, often preceded by cruel tortures. The property of the condemned party fell to the Inquisition, from whose sentence there was no appeal.

The people in many places rose up against the inquisitors, as in Albi, and Narbonne (1231), and Toulouse; and in France, where the Inquisition had first been put in force, it was first abolished. In Germany, the Dominican Konrad Drosio, and especially Konrad of Marburg (1231-33), were the most active agents of the Inquisition; but both were murdered, the latter at Marburg. The Emperor Frederick II., as a means of clearing himself of the charge of heresy, issued from Ravenna, in 1232, orders for carrying out the regulations of the Inquisition; but so determined was the resistance of the people, that its power was felt only in a few rare cases in the century that followed. About the middle of the fourteenth century, Urban appointed inquisitors to proceed against the Beghards in Constance, Speier, Erfurt, and Magdeburg. In 1372 Gregory XI. placed the number at five for all Germany, and in 1399 Boniface IX. appointed six for Northern Germany alone. Many were put to death, even during the progress of the Reformation, in consequence of the famous Malleus maleficarum ("The Witches' Hammer," Cologne, 1489), which was put forth by the Pope at the instance of two inquisitors (Heinrich Kramers and Jacob Sprenger). The Jesuits sought to restore the Inquisition in Bavaria (1599), and during the Thirty-Years' War it found an occasional victim; but Maria Theresa abolished it in her kingdom, and it soon afterwards disappeared in Germany.

The Inquisition had no hold in England, Sweden, Norway, or Denmark; but in Spain, Portugal, and the Netherlands it enjoyed a luxuriant growth. In the thirteenth century it was introduced into Aragon against the Moors and Jews. Nicolaus Eymericus (d. 1399) was inquisitor-general for forty-four years, and wrote the Inquisitor's Manual (Directorium Inquisitorum), which states with appalling distinctness the rules regulating the methods of procedure. They were first put into full practice by Cardinal Ximenes, at the union of Castile and Aragon by the marriage of Ferdinand and Isabella. Hefele, in his Life of Ximenes, and in the art. Inquisition, in Wetzer and Welte, has shown that the methods of the Inquisition were in some respects less cruel than those of the criminal courts of the day; but he fails to prove that the Spanish Inquisition originated with the State rather than with the Church. The one to give complete organization to the movement in Spain was the bloody Domingo de Torquemada, who [in 1483] was appointed inquisitor-general. His associates received the most definite instructions, and surrounded themselves with spies, the so-called "Familiars of the Holy Office." The most noble in the land offered themselves for this service in order to secure their own persons. The terror which the horrible punishments of the Inquisition produced was the occasion of revolts and occasional assassinations of the inquisitors; but it continued to rage, the king himself using it to extend his authority, and fill his treasury. In 1492 all the Jews who refused to become Christians were compelled to emigrate; and a similar edict was passed upon the Moors under Torquemada's successor, Diego Deza (1499-1506). Under the third inquisitor-general, Ximenes (1507-17), according to Llorente, 2,536 were put to death, 1,368 burned in effigy, and 47,263 punished in other ways. Each tribunal consisted of three inquisitors, besides assessors, secretaries, familiars, and other officers. The place of meeting was called the "holy house" (casa santa). If the accused appeared, he was carefully examined, and placed in a dark prison. His head was shorn; his property, especially his books, inventoried; his income usually confiscated; and so terrible was the fear the tribunal inspired, that not even the accused's nearest friends dared to appear in his defence. Immediate avowal and renunciation of heresy secured to the party immunity from the sentence of death, but seldom averted the loss of property and confinement. In spite of his renunciation, the accused was obliged, for a certain period, to wear the San benito (a shirt without sleeves, and bearing a red St. Andrew's cross on the back and on the breast). On the other hand, the denial of the charge of heresy seldom secured the release of the prisoner; and extreme tortures were applied to extort a confession. If these failed, artifice was used to entrap the accused; and, where all means were exhausted, the victim was put to death at once, or condemned to a miserable life in prison. The sentence of death was enforced by the civil arm, and the accused was usually burnt alive. He was taken, in a solemn procession, to the public square, where the Auto da f  (act of faith) was consummated.

Under Charles I. the Cortes sought for a modification of the laws of the Inquisition; but under Philip II. the flames burned brightly again, at first in Seville and Valladolid (1559 sq.). But by the end of the seventeenth century all vestiges of the Reformation were effaced, and the activity of the Inquisition became limited to the destruction of prohibited books, of which an Index had been prepared in 1558. Under Charles III., in 1770, an edict was passed, securing an accused party from arbitrary imprisonment; and other regulations were passed, curtailing the powers of the Inquisition, until, in 1808, Joseph Napoleon abolished it entirely. In 1814 Ferdinand VII. restored it; but the popular rage in 1820 destroyed the inquisitor's palace at Madrid, and the Cortes again abolished it. But in 1825, by the efforts of the clergy, another inquisitorial commission was appointed. It continued till 1834, when it was finally abolished, and its property applied to the payment of the public debt. But it may be a long while before the country will revive from the effects of the court, which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, extinguished her active literary life, and placed this nation, so richly endowed, almost outside of the circle of European civilization. Spain, it is true, remained free from heresies and religious wars; but her rest was the rest of the grave, so far as religious vitality was concerned.

The fortunes of the Inquisition in Portugal were similar to those which it had in Spain. In the reign of John VI. (1818-26) it was finally abolished. The last relics of the Italian Inquisition disappeared at the unification of the nation. The Congregation of the Inquisition at Rome, appointed by Sixtus V. in 1587, is all that remains of it. In its day it likewise had crushed out the Reformation, and had raged the most fearfully in Venice; but there its activity seems to have ceased in 1781, and in 1808 Napoleon abolished it. Restored under Pius VII. in 1814, it directed its energies to prevent the diffusion of the Italian Bible, and to check the introduction of evangelical truth. In the Netherlands, where the Inquisition was first introduced in the thirteenth century, it became a terrible weapon in the time of the Reformation. In 1521 Charles V. passed a rigorous edict against heretics, and appointed Franz van der Hulst inquisitor-general. In 1525 three inquisitors-general were appointed, in 1537 the number was increased to four, and in 1545 one was appointed for each of the provinces. According to Grotius, a hundred thousand victims died under Charles V.; according to the Prince of Orange, fifty thousand. Both computations are probably too large. Under Philip II. the inquisitors developed the most zeal; and the Duke of Alva, in 1567, appointed the Bloody Council, which proceeded with unheard-of cruelty against those whose wealth excited their avarice, or whose heresy aroused their suspicion. In 1573 Alva was recalled; and three years later the provinces concluded the League of Ghent, whose fifth article abolished the edicts against heresy.

NEUDECKER (BENRATH).

INSPIRATION designates the influence of the Holy Ghost upon the writers of the Scriptures, by which they have become the expression of God's will to us. The term comes from the Vulgate translation of 2 Tim. iii. 16: Omnis scriptura divinitus inspirata ("All scripture divinely inspired"). The Greek word θεόπνευστος, of which "inspired" is the translation, does not occur in classical or profane Greek, — its occurrence in Plutarch (De placit. phil. 5, 2) being in all probability an error of the copyist, — but seems to have been used for the first time, in writing, in 2 Tim. iii. 16. The word sometimes had the passive meaning of "endowed with God's Spirit" (Sibyll. 5, 406; Vita Sabae, 16); but here, after the analogy of ἀπνευστος ("breathing ill"), etc., the meaning seems to be "breathing the divine Spirit," and not, with the Vulgate, "given by the divine Spirit." The latter interpretation has in its favor that the word has that meaning when joined with άνθρωπος ("man"); but the former suits better with the context "profitable for instruction," etc. (v. 15), and the usual mode of speaking of the Scripture as the word of the Holy Ghost (Acts xxviii. 25, etc.). Origen seems to have understood it in this sense when he said the "holy volumes breathe the fulness of the Spirit" (sacra volumina spiritus plenitudinem spirant, Rom. 21 in Jerem.). The Peshito, on the other hand, and the Ethiopic versions, understand it as meaning "inspired by God," the former translating it "Every scripture which is written in the Spirit" ( ν πνεύματι).

A well-defined doctrine of inspiration cannot be said to have existed until after the Reformation. The earliest views on inspiration in the Church leaned upon the Alexandrian theology much more than upon the Jewish. The Talmudic and Alexandrian Judaism agreed in ascribing a peculiar authority to the Old Testament. The former held that the Thorah, or Law, was of immediate divine origin. God wrote it with his own hand, or dictated it to Moses as his amanuensis. Although some teachers were inclined to regard Joshua as the author of the account of Moses' death (Deut. xxxiv. 5), others held that Moses was the author, and wrote it with tears. The other writers of the Old Testament were not inspired in the same degree; and the Jewish theologians of the middle ages taught that the prophetic books were written by the spirit of prophecy, and the Hagiographa by the spirit of holiness, and that the writers of the latter exercised their individuality to a larger extent than the former. Josephus held that the canonical books were all written before the close of the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus, 425 B.C. (c. Ap. I, 8); but both he and Philo speak of a continuance of the gift of prophecy, the latter ascribing it to every pious and wise man. All the writers of the Old Testament were prophets, and, as such, interpreters of the divine will, and unconscious of what they spoke. They were in an ecstatic condition, or trance (θεοφόρητος μανία), both when they spoke and wrote, and were simply the passive organs of the Spirit of God.

The Scriptures recognize an ecstatic condition; but it is something different from the ecstasy of Philo, except, perhaps, in the case of Balaam, who prophesied against his will. It is not, as Augustine has rightly said, a suspension of the mental faculties (alienatio a mente), but an "alienation of the mind from physical sense-perception" (alienatio mentis a sensibus corporis). The Hellenistic or Philonic theory, therefore, was not derived either from Scripture or from Jewish theology proper, but rather from heathen sources. Heathenism alone knew of an ecstasy (θεοφόρητος μανία), as Philo defined it. He got it, undoubtedly, from Plato, who regarded a divine enthusiasm (ἐνθουσιασμός) or ecstasy as the primal fount of philosophy where the inspiration was drawn, but differed from Plato in holding that the individual consciousness was entirely lost.

These are the views we meet with in the writings of the early Church. The apostolic fathers presupposed the fact of inspiration; but the apologetic writers of the second century, such as Justin Martyr (Coh. ad Græc. 8, 10; Apol. I, 36) and Athenagoras (Leg. 9, 42), emphasized the divine origin of the Scriptures, and give the impression that they held not merely to the mechanical, but to the autistic theory. This view was advocated by the Montanists; and it is to the opposition of the Church to them that we are indebted for the prevalence of sounder views of inspiration. Miltiades, an apologetic writer, wrote a work against Montanism, opposing the view that the prophets spoke in an ecstatic condition, or trance (πρὸς τοὺς μηδὲν προφήτην ἐν ἐκστάσει λαλῶν, Euseb., H. E., 5, 17); and Clement of Alexandria regarded such a condition as an evidence of false prophets and an evil spirit (Strom. I, 311). After Origen, the Church teachers emphatically denied that the prophets were in a state of unconsciousness when they spoke. They did not limit the influence of the Holy Spirit upon the biblical authors, but admitted their independence, to which more than form and style are attributed. But they did not attempt to reconcile the divine and human factors; and both Irenæus (Adv. hæc. III, 16, 2) and Augustine (De cons. evr. II., 12), while speaking of the apostles as writing down what they remembered, at the same time compared them to the hands which wrote down what Christ dictated. Jerome discovers solecisms in Scripture (Ep. ad Eph. II, ad 3, 1); and Origen goes farther, when he distinguishes between the contents of Scripture, which are always true, and its language, in which the writers, who carefully elaborated their style, sometimes made mistakes. Origen gave more attention to the discussion of the nature of inspiration than any of the other fathers; and, according to him, it included an elevated activity of the human faculties and the activity of the Spirit calling the former forth. In the Church of Antioch the human side was made prominent; and Theodore of Mopsuestia held that Job was a poem which had sprung up on heathen soil; but in the Western Church the councils, as well as the Church itself, came to be regarded as being in a certain sense inspired. At a later period, when Agobard of Lyons (d. 840) affirmed that the biblical writers did not always observe the laws of grammar, the abbot Fredegis of Tours went so far in his reply as to say that the Holy Ghost formed the very words themselves in the mouths of the apostles (etiam ipsa corporalia verba extrinsecus in ore apostolorum).

Scholasticism manifested no special interest in the doctrine of inspiration, although Anselm laid awake many nights, meditating how the prophets could look upon the future as though it were the present; and Thomas of Aquinas made a distinction between revelation and inspiration. The latter recognized different grades of inspiration among the prophets of the Old Testament; so that David knew more than Moses. The principle was, that, the nearer they lived to the advent of Christ, the greater was their illumination. The Holy Spirit used the tongue of the speaker, but did not destroy his independent activity. The authority of the Scriptures was universally acknowledged; and only Abelard thought of asserting that the prophets and apostles were not always free from error, quoting Gal. ii. 11 sqq. in support of the assertion.

The Reformation emphasized the authority, and encouraged the use, of the Scriptures. No one thought of denying their authority. The only question was as to their meaning and application. This explains the absence of all discussion of the nature of inspiration by the Reformers. Luther, on the one hand, regarded the Bible as a book on "a letter or title of which more hung than upon heaven and earth," but, on the other hand, speaks of it as containing hay, straw, and stubble, of an insufficiency in Paul's argument (Gal. iv. 22 sqq.), etc. He regarded the Holy Spirit as the author of Scripture, but recognized the writers by their peculiar characteristics, and asserts that they poured out their whole heart into their words. Calvin held the same views. In the Scriptures we hear, as it were, the very voice of God; but he does not shrink from speaking of inaccuracies (as in Matt. xxvii. 9). The Confessions emphasized the supreme authority of Scripture, but did not investigate the nature of inspiration; nor did Gerhard (d. 1637), even in his rich chapter De script. sacra. Calovius was the author of the theory which is usually denominated the Orthodox Protestant theory. According to him, inspiration is the form which revelation assumes, and nothing exists in the Scriptures which was not divinely suggested and inspired (divinitus suggestum et inspiratum). Quenstedt, Baier, Hollaz, and others followed, affirming that the writers were dependent upon the Spirit for their very words, and denying that there were any solecisms in the New Testament. The Buxtorfs extended inspiration to the vowel-points of the Old Testament. This view was adopted in the Formula Cons. Helv., and Gisbert Voëtius extended inspiration to the very punctuation. This doctrine was an absolute novelty. The Pietists, especially Spener, in the interest of the direct influence of the Holy Spirit upon the heart, denied that the biblical writers were absolutely passive. The theology of the Church gradually assumed a more liberal form, and the divine contents of the Bible were sought for in vain by the rationalists; while the supernaturalists, lowering the theory of inspiration to that of a divine superintendency, held that only to be inspired which the ordinary reason could not discover.

The more recent development of the doctrine of inspiration has proceeded, in part, upon the principles of Schleiermacher, and in part upon those of the school of Bengel. The former, pursuing an original treatment, ascribed inspiration to the spirit pervading the Church (Gemeingeist der Kirche), and made it to consist of two essential elements — a receptivity and an activity — awakened by Christ. It therefore extends, not only to the writings, but to the entire activity, of the apostles. The Old Testament proceeded from the spirit of the Israelitish Church, and therefore has not the dignity of the New Testament. He laid the principal stress upon the human factors in the composition, who are, by reason of their relation to Christ, the accredited and trustworthy witnesses of Christian truth. The spirit which controls them is not the Holy Spirit, the third person of the Trinity. Far as he departed from the theory of inspiration which prevailed in the seventeenth century, it is Schleiermacher's merit to have emphasized the human element in the composition of the Scriptures. Twisten renewed the supernatural theory of the seventeenth century, without its exaggerations; and Beck regarded it as an essential element in the "organism of Revelation," and not to be confounded with revelation. Both he and Philippi conceived of it as illumination; the latter defining it as "that influence of the Spirit by which the mind is wholly transferred into the sphere of revelation, and is fitted to report the special subject exactly, or as that communion of the human mind with the mind of the Spirit by which the revelation of the latter becomes, without adulteration, the thought of the former." Rothe defined inspiration as the momentary condition of the soul by which it is enabled to understand and to infallibly interpret revelation. The inspiration of the apostles was only the increased measure of the Spirit indwelling in them, and the Scriptures are simply the outflowing of the divine life of their authors.

As we said at the beginning, inspiration means something different from the Greek θεόπνευστος ("breathing the divine Spirit"). It refers to the origination, the latter to the contents, of the Bible. But, if the Bible breathes the Spirit of God, then it must have received this characteristic from God. If it breathes his Spirit in a peculiar manner, then it must have received it in a peculiar way. We are therefore justified in speaking of a special influence of the Spirit upon the authors of the Scriptures. For this idea the Church has coined the term "inspiration." The first question is, whether the Scriptures do really breathe the Holy Spirit in a peculiar manner. This is a matter of experience (an experience of faith), just as God's nature is a matter of experience; but this experience must be of the nature of a universal one for all religiously disposed persons, and such we find it to be. It is and has been the experience of the Church with reference to the Scriptures as a whole; and the Church has regarded them as the infallible standard of a religious life, and the absolutely pure spring of all religious convictions derived from them. The Scriptures, however, contain the revelation of salvation: their authors, therefore, must have stood in peculiar relations to the Holy Spirit. Of what nature this relation was can only be ascertained from the history of salvation as it is found in the Scriptures themselves. This relation varies at different times, and is modified by the relative nearness of the parties to God. The distinction between the inspiration of the Old and New Testaments is brought out by the words used in the two cases. It is uniformly said of the prophets, that the "word of the Lord came to," or the "word of the Lord which . . . saw" (Isa. ii. 1; Amos i. 1, etc.). In the New Testament the word of the Lord was revealed through Christ (Acts x. 36; Rom. x. 5-8; Tit. i. 3, etc.). Here, in order to apprehend the revelation of God in Christ, only a relation of faith to Christ is necessary (Luke x. 24; 1 Pet. i. 10; Matt. xi. 25, xvi. 17). The preparation to be a witness for Christ is a fruit of a personal relation to him (Matt. x. 27; John xv. 15).

The attestation of the gospel is conditioned upon the indwelling of the Holy Spirit in the heart of the witness; but it is a special calling, and, like every ecclesiastical service, requires a special preparation by the Holy Spirit. Every one who is regenerated is not inspired, but every one who is inspired is regenerated. Inspiration, therefore, is the charism which fitted the apostles, in spite of their personal imperfections (comp. Gal. ii. with 1 Cor. ix. 16 sqq.), to announce authoritatively, and for all time, the facts of salvation and their meaning. If a special preparation was necessary under the new dispensation, much more so was it under the old. Here the influence of inspiration might be exerted upon persons in whom the Spirit did not dwell as a vital and constant principle. Again: the inspiration, at least of the prophets, was a temporary endowment; that of the apostles, an abiding one; and the former suffered from the same defects of spiritual experience as their contemporaries (John vii. 39; 1 Pet. i. 10, 11). Under the old covenant the writers had to be prepared to interpret the meaning of history with reference to salvation. The knowledge of historical facts they got in the usual way: and if it be true that the preparation of the Spirit extended only to the interpretation, and not to the acquisition, of historical facts, then we can easily explain their divergences in matters of chronological sequence, the attendant circumstances, etc.

The activity of the Holy Spirit is, therefore, neither limited nor made impossible by the independence and peculiarities of the biblical writers, as was thought in the seventeenth century, but made possible and advanced by it. Inspiration is the very opposite of a suspension of human independence. It rather confirms and sanctifies it. The gift of inspiration does not stand out of relation to the facts of Christian experience, but belongs among the charisms of the Church; was a preparation for giving the testimony of the gospel, and not merely for writing the Scriptures; and was confined to the earliest period of the Church.

HERMANN CREMER.

In view of the great importance of the subject discussed in this article, it is desirable, without repeating what has already been said, to bring out some of its aspects a little more sharply, and to emphasize some further considerations. In general, it may be said that the theory of the mode and degree (as distinct from the fact) of inspiration, although of great importance, is "not fundamental to the truth of Christianity" (Professor A. A. HODGE: Presb. Rev. for 1881, p. 227).

I. Inspiration and the Canon. — Our present canon does not necessarily measure the extent of inspiration. Both must be determined by the same process, upon the basis of the contents of the books, the statements of their authors, their relation to Christ (in the New Testament), and the judgment of the Church. It is evident that a book belonging to our present canon may not be inspired. Seven books of the New Testament were disputed in the Church of the first four centuries, and are hence called Antilegomena by Eusebius, as distinct from the Homologumena, which were universally accepted as canonical. The Roman-Catholic canon of the Old Testament still includes the Apocrypha, which are rejected by Protestants. Luther doubted the inspiration of Esther (see art.), and held an unfavorable view of the Epistle of James and the Apocalypse. Calvin expressed doubts about 2 Peter. The Bible is an organism; and, though to one part inspiration be denied, the inspiration of the whole is not thereby of necessity affected. The question of the inspiration of the Gospel of John, for example, may be independent of the proof that the Books of the Chronicles are inspired.

II. Theories. — Canon Farrar (Bible Educator) has grouped the theories of inspiration held in the Christian Church under five heads. Morell, Westcott, A. S. Farrar (Crit. Hist. of Free Thought, p. 475 sqq.), Dorner, and others include all the views under two heads, — the mechanical ("doctetic," Dorner) and the dynamical. Against this division is the serious objection, that under the former head are placed all who hold to verbal inspiration; while many of the advocates of this view (Dr. Charles Hodge, Shedd, etc.) expressly deny that the writers of the Scriptures forfeited their individuality, and became mere machines. The most popular distinction is that of plenary and partial, or verbal and partial. These terms are apt to be misleading, unless it is carefully borne in mind to what the inspiration is applied. One, for example, may hold to the plenary inspiration of the authors, and yet deny the verbal inspiration of their writings. The following classification will represent the different views: —

1. The writers of Scripture had the immediate influence of the Spirit to such an extent, that they could not err in any point. Every statement of Scripture is accurate and infallible. "Inspiration extends to all the contents of the several books, whether religious, scientific, historical, or geographical" (CHARLES HODGE: Theology, i. p. 163). "They were preserved from error of fact, doctrine, and judgment" (PATTON: Inspiration, p. 92). In the seventeenth century this view was held in such a way, that inspiration became synonymous with dictation, and the writers were compared to pens (calami Spiritus S. dictantis), or to a flute (Carpzov, Quenstedt, etc.). Others, while denying this mechanical view, hold to the plenary verbal inspiration theory (Gaussen, Dr. Charles Hodge, Shedd, Patton, Given, etc.). The very words are the words of the Spirit, because "the thoughts are in the words, and the two are inseparable" (HODGE: Theol., i. p. 164). Inspiration has also been described as an influence of superintendence. This word, first used by Doddridge in this connection, has recently been made prominent by Drs. Hodge and Warfield (Presb. Rev.), who say, "The essence of inspiration was superintendence" (p. 226). "The Holy Spirit elevated and directed the faculties of the writers, when need be, and thus secured the errorless expression in language of the thought designed by God" (p. 231). They admit, however, that there may be errors in Scripture as we now possess it, and assert infallibility "only for the original autographic text" (p. 245).

This class of views has in its favor (1) the difficulty of conceiving how the thought could be suggested by the Spirit without the language; and (2) the support it gives to the authority of the Scripture as a system of truth and a guide of action. Against this class of views the following objections are urged: (1) It is hard, on this general theory, to account for the individual peculiarities of the writings. The style of Milton in Paradise Lost is the same, whether he dictates to one daughter or to another. But in the Scriptures there is a marked difference between the style of Hosea and Isaiah, John and Paul, although the same Spirit suggested the language of each. It is urged, however, that the Spirit accommodated himself to the peculiarities of the writers. (2) There are differences of statement in the Scriptures concerning the same facts. To instance a single case, Paul says twenty-three thousand died in the plague (1 Cor. x. 8) in which Moses reports twenty-four thousand to have died (Num. xxv. 9). (3) It is hard to explain the divergences (not contradictions) in the Gospels when the narratives refer to the same facts or to the same discourses of our Lord. Compare, for example, the four forms in which the superscription on the cross is given, or the words of our Lord to the disciples on the lake. Matthew (viii. 25-27) reports the latter as, "Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?" Mark (iv. 39-41), "Why are ye fearful? have ye not yet faith?" The force of this consideration led Osiander (Harm. Ecc., Basel, 1537), who held a high theory of inspiration, to assume that Peter's wife's mother was healed of the fever three times! (4) It is very difficult to understand why the New-Testament writers usually quote the Septuagint translation, and not the original Hebrew of the Old Testament (comp. Acts. ii. 16-21, etc.). In many cases the divergence from the Hebrew text is great; as in the quotation which James made at the Council of Jerusalem, in other passages of the Acts, and in many passages of the Epistle to the Hebrews (which always quotes from the Septuagint). (5) The autographs of the sacred writers are lost. For the Hebrew Scriptures we have to depend upon Jewish manuscripts not older than the eighth century. In the Greek New Testament we have an ever increasing number of variations (now exceeding a hundred thousand), which, indeed, do not affect any doctrine or precept, yet seem to be inconsistent with this theory; for, if a literal inspiration were necessary for the Church, God (so we should expect) would have provided for the errorless preservation of the original text. Moreover, the great mass of Christians has to depend upon vernacular translations, for none of which infallible accuracy is claimed.

2. The second general theory of inspiration is, that the writers of Scripture enjoyed the influence of the Spirit to such an extent, that it is the Word, and contains the will, of God. This view is the prevailing view to-day, and has been held by Luther, Calvin, Baxter, Doddridge, Wm. Lowth, Baumgarten, Neander, Tholuck, Stier, Lange, Hare, Alford, Van Oosterzee, Plumptre (Com. on Acts, ch. vii.), F. W. Farrar, Dörner, etc. It admits mistakes (or at least the possibility of mistakes) in historical and geographical statements, but denies any error in matters of faith or morals. Baxter said, "We may doubt some of the words of the Old Testament and circumstances of the New, and yet have no reason to doubt the Christian religion" (Cat. of Families). Our conviction of the truth of Scripture "is not shattered, if the holy men could err in things about which it was not necessary to receive certainty, and certainty in regard to which is unimportant from a religious point of view. It is sufficient that they received unadulterated, and present without error, the infallible spiritual truth, to witness which to mankind they were appointed," etc. (DÖRNER: Glaubenslehre, i. 635). This view lays stress upon the sense of Scripture as a revelation of God's will, and leaves room for the full play of human agency in the composition. It preserves the spiritual marrow, and does not imperil the whole by an appeal to our ignorance to explain unessential variations.

This theory (1) admits of the highest respect for the Scriptures as the Word of God. Luther accused Paul in one instance of false logic, and spoke disparagingly of Esther; but no one has ever magnified Paul or the Scriptures more than he. The fine word of Athanasius (ad Marc.) would still hold, ἔστι γὰρ ἐν τοῖς τῶν γραφῶν ῥήμασι ὁ κύριος ("The Lord is in the words of Scripture"). (2) It helps us to understand the divergences in the accounts of our Lord's life, and the inconsistencies in historical statement of different parts of the Bible. An instance is found, in the report of Stephen's speech, where it is stated that "Abraham purchased the field from the sons of Hamor in Shechem" (Acts vii. 16). In Genesis, Jacob is reported to have purchased the field. (3) This theory is more in accordance with the method of the Spirit's working in general. The apostles were not perfect in their conduct and judgment as rulers and teachers of the Church (Acts xv. 39; xxiii. 3; Gal. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xiii. 12; Phil. iii. 12). The grace of God was in them as earthen vessels. The same may be said of the Scriptures. They are a human vase in which the divine revelation is contained. They are God's book, and yet man's composition; and the subtle inter-relation of the human and divine elements is as difficult of explanation as that of God and man in the work of salvation (Phil. ii. 12, 13), or that of the soul and the body. (4) It removes a hindrance out of the way of many who would gladly believe the Bible to contain the word of God, if it were not necessary to give their assent to all its historical statements. (See excellent remarks by Morell, p. 169.) Many can believe the discourses of our Lord in John (xii. sqq.) to be divine who cannot so regard the list of the Dukes of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 15-43), or all the tables of the Books of Chronicles, or the exact number killed for looking into the ark,—50,070 (1 Sam. vi. 19). It may be said that we would thus be embarrassed to know what is and what is not inspired. The objection is to some extent well founded; but in this case, as in men's individual relations to Christ, they are left to exercise their judgment, guided by the Holy Spirit. (5) This view makes the absence of an absolutely pure text intelligible. The autographs of the apostles do not exist; and we may speak reverently in saying that this might have been expected, if the letter of Scripture were the work of the Spirit.

III. Proofs of Inspiration.—The passage "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God" (2 Tim. iii. 16) is often quoted as a proof of the inspiration of all the canonical books. The meaning of the term θεόπνευστος has been discussed above. Here it is sufficient to say that the passage has reference to the books of the Old Testament, and that the translation making it a dogmatic statement is probably incorrect. The Revised Version gives the true rendering: "Every scripture inspired of God is," etc. The proofs of inspiration are as follows: (1) The statements of Scripture itself. In the Old Testament the authors testify to the divine origin of their message by such expressions as the "word of the Lord came," or the "Lord spake by his servant." The prophets were specially called (Jer. i. 9, etc.). The inspiration of the writers of the Old Testament is also proved by the terms applied to their writings in the New Testament (Rom. i. 2; 2 Tim. iii. 16, etc.), the explicit statements of our Lord (Matt. iv. 4, xxii. 29; Luke x. 26) and his apostles (Heb. i. 2), their frequent quotations from it, and our Lord's proof of his claims from its utterances (John v. 39; Luke xxiv. 27, etc.). The inspiration of the New Testament is likewise proved by its own testimony, the apostles insisting upon the infallibility of their words (1 Cor. ii.

13; 1 Thess. ii. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 13), and by the Lord's promise to them of a special endowment of the Spirit (John xiv. 26, xvi. 13; comp. 1 Cor. vii. 40, etc.), and a supernatural supply of wisdom and words (Matt. x. 20; Luke xxi. 15). Christ, it is true, did not appoint scribes; but he appointed witnesses, and promised to them a miraculous presence and power. (2) The nature of the contents. The inherent excellences of Scripture (as in the case of the person of Christ) are sufficient witnesses to its heavenly origin. The unity of the book, unfolding a single purpose; its elevated tone; the faultless character of Christ; the nature of the facts revealed of God, the soul, and the future,—all stamp it as a work of more than ordinary human genius or insight. This testimony is, for most minds, the strongest of all. It is the testimony of the Holy Spirit in the experience. "The more familiar," says Doddridge, "one becomes with these books, the more will one be struck with this evidence;" and Van Oosterzee well says, "He who will acknowledge in Scripture no higher than a purely human character comes into collision, not only with our Lord's word and that of his witnesses, but also with the Christian consciousness of all ages," etc. (Dogmatics, p. 199). (3) The à priori proof. This argument is hardly less strong than the previous ones, for minds which hold that God has given to men a revelation of his will. If God has made such a revelation, he would make special provision for its infallible communication.

INSPIRED, The, is the name of a sect which was formed in Germany about 1700, under the influence of the prophets of the Camisards. Driven out of France, those enthusiasts went first to England, then to the Netherlands, and finally to Germany, where they found many adherents, not only among the French refuges, but soon also among the natives. Congregations were formed in Halle (1713) and Berlin (1714); and a number of German prophets arose, the most prominent among whom were E. L. Gruber and J. F. Rock. Especially in the neighborhood of Wetterau, Wittgenstein, and Wied, where the country swarmed with separatists of all kinds, the movement gained strength; and in the second decade of the eighteenth century congregations of the Inspired were found in Hesse, the Palatinate, Württemberg, and Saxony. In doctrine they differed not so very much from the evangelical churches, though they believed in continuous inspiration; but their ideas of discipline and organization separated them completely from any established church. In their congregations there was no office of teacher or preacher. Their service consisted of free prayers, singing, and recital of Gruber's Die 24 Regeln der wahren Gottseligkeit und heiligen Wandels, and prophecies, if any were given. Rock was the last medium of inspiration among them; and after his death, in 1749, they lived very quietly until the second decade of the present century, when new prophets arose among them. The Hessian and Prussian governments, however, saw fit to interfere with the prophets; and in 1841 a considerable emigration (about eight hundred souls) took place. The emigrants went to America, where they formed a flourishing colony at Ebenezer, in the State of New York. They afterwards left that place, and settled in Iowa. See M. GOEBEL: Gesch. d. wahren Inspirationsgemeinden, in Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1854, II. III.; 1855, I., III.

INSTALLATION denotes generally the ceremonial act by which a person ordained and appointed is formally put into possession of an ecclesiastical benefice, but is in the English Church sometimes applied specially to the office of a canon or prebendary, or the enthronization of a bishop, and the induction of a minister.

INSTITUTION, in canon law, denotes the final act by which a person elected by the chapter, or nominated by the government, is appointed by the proper authority to an ecclesiastical benefice, more especially a bishopric.

INTERCESSION, the act of one who endeavors to reconcile persons at variance, or of one who pleads for another. The act is often performed among men, and constitutes one of the good traits of our fallen humanity. But theologically it is used of the work of Christ, and improperly of deceased saints. Christ is set forth in Scripture as our intercessor. It is his function as high priest; and therefore, in his wondrous prayer before his death, he remembers us all (John xvii. 11, 20). He appears in the presence of God for us (Heb. ix. 24), and makes intercession for us (Rom. viii. 34; Heb. vii. 25); he is therefore denominated our advocate (1 John ii. 1). The ground of his intercession is his atoning work. He pleads the shedding of his blood, and thus obtains the pardon of our sins. His intercession is authoritative (he intercedes not without right: John xvii. 24), wise (he understands the nature of his work and the wants of his people: John ii. 25), righteous (for it is founded upon justice and truth: 1 John iii. 5), compassionate (Heb. ii. 17, v. 8), unique (he is the only intercessor: 1 Tim. ii. 5), perpetual (Heb. vii. 25), efficient (1 John ii. 1, 2)." It follows, from the above, that there is no such thing as the supposed intercession of saints. The arguments against such erroneous teaching may be thus stated: (1) It supposes the existence of a class of beings who do not exist,—canonized departed spirits, who have been officially declared to be such by the Church. (2) It leads to practical idolatry. The saints, and particularly the Virgin Mary, are prayed to, instead of God. (3) It is derogatory to Christ. It makes him share the work of intercession with others, as if he were incompetent to do it alone. (4) It supposes that some have sufficient merit of their own to have a claim upon God. (5) It is superstitious, because there is no evidence in Scripture of any such intercession; and degrading, because it calls the attention of the worshipper from God to a creature, and teaches him to lean upon an arm of flesh. See HODGE, Systematic Theology, ii. 592–595. See MEDIATOR.

INTERDICT, a punishment which the Roman Catholic Church inflicts upon its members, forbidding the celebration of service, the administration of the sacraments, the performance of ecclesiastical burial, etc., developed from the excommunication, and occurs under a triple form,—personal, local, and mixed. The first traces of it are met with in the times of Gregory of Tours; but it did not develop into a well-defined institution in the practice of the Church until the eleventh century. During the middle ages it was often used with great effect. Innocent III., in 1208, put England under an interdict. The last instance of a local interdict occurred in 1606, pronounced by Paul V. over the republic of Venice; though a milder form of it (the so-called cessatio in divinis, by which the Church is put into a state of mourning, and no bells or organs are used) was pronounced in the diocese of Posen-Gnesen in 1839. The right of pronouncing an interdict devolves upon the Pope, the councils, and the bishops: the right of revoking it devolves upon him who has pronounced it, or his superior. See KOBER, in Archiv f. kath. Kirchen., vol. xxi. SCHEURL.

INTERIM, a provisional establishment, or modus vivendi, imposed upon the German reformers by Charles V., until a general council should have decided between them and the Pope. There were three such interims, named after the places where they were issued; namely, RATISBON, AUGSBURG, and LEIPZIG, which see.

INTERSTITIA TEMPORUM. Canon 13 of the Council of Sardica (347) demands that a clerk shall remain for some time in each order; so that a certain interstitium temporis elapses before he is promoted from a lower to a higher order. As long as the lower orders were still connected with clerical functions, the above maxim was applied also to them; but when, in course of time, they became merely preparatory steps towards the higher orders, it became customary to confer them all in one day. The Council of Trent (Sess. 23, can. 17) attempted to correct this practice, but in vain. For the higher orders it decided that the interstitium should comprise a whole year. The bishops obtained, however, a certain power of dispensation. WASSERSCHLEBEN.

INTINCTION denotes the peculiar mode in which, in the Greek Church, the Eucharist is administered to the laity; the consecrated bread being broken into the consecrated wine, and both elements given together in a spoon. Greek writers on liturgy claim that this custom dates back to the time of Chrysostom. In the Western Church it never gained foothold. It was forbidden by Julius I. (337–352) as unscriptural.

INTONATION, the modulation of the voice, in the act of reading a liturgical service, so as to produce a musical accentuation and tone. It is practised in the Greek and Roman churches, and in some Episcopal churches. It adds to the impressiveness of the service, if it be really finely done; but it mars its intelligibility.

INTRODUCTION. I. Old Testament.—Widely different opinions exist respecting the idea and treatment of this branch of the theological study. On the one hand, J. G. Carpzov (Introductio, Leipzig, 1721), and at a much later date De Wette, even in the last edition of his Introduction, which he edited (7th edition, Berlin, 1852), maintained that it properly concerned all that helped to make the Scriptures intelligible. On the other hand, Reusch (R. C.) includes under the term only the origin of the several books, their collection (canon), inspiration, and preservation; and Keil defines Old-Testament Introduction as the knowledge of those underlying historico-critical principles of the Old-Testament canon which explain and justify its theological use by Jew and Christian. Franz Kaulen (R. C.), in the logical wake of Keil, assigns Introduction to dogmatic theology as a branch of apologetics. Richard Simon expressed the right idea in his Histoire critique du vieux testament (Paris, 1678), that it was an historical science, and accordingly he treats of the history of the text, etc.; but unhappily he was not faithful to his own principles. Hupfeld (1844) suggested making Introduction a history of the Old-Testament writings. Such a history would not necessarily be the same as a biblical Hebrew literary history, although Hupfeld, J. J. Stahelin, and Delitzsch would so consider it; for the latter properly is a history of the literary development of the old Hebrews, as displayed in their literature, while the former has to do with the origin and history of that collection of books we style the "Old Testament."

The idea, of course, directly affects the treatment. When Old-Testament Introduction is considered as a collection of important facts bearing upon the interpretation and estimation of the Old Testament, it is divided into two parts, general and special. General Introduction treats of the original languages of the Old Testament, the versions, the history and criticism of the text, the history of the canon; special Introduction, of the contents, origin, and credibility of the separate books. But if Old-Testament Introduction be looked at as a history of the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament, then it comprises the origin of the single writings, the history of their collection, of their canonicity, and, finally, of their transmission and spread with a canonical authority. A historico-critical treatment of the matter is throughout obligatory.

As an independent discipline, Old-Testament Introduction is comparatively recent; for the ancient Church had no interest in merely scientific questions respecting the Scriptures. Jerome gives some valuable materials, and Adrianus' tract, εἰσαγωγή εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς (fifth century, published first by Höschel, 1602, and in Critici sacri, London), probably gave the name to the science; but hermeneutics, rather than introduction, was served. The nearest approach in this period was made by Cassiodorus (sixth century), in his Institutiones divinarum literarum, in which he enumerates the different books, and mentions the most important commentaries upon them, gives hermeneutical rules, and then passes on to speak of the biblical divisions, canon and criticism. The only work on Introduction produced in the middle ages was that of Nicolaus of Lyra (d. 1310), Postilla perpetua s. brevis commentarius in universa biblia, published in Antwerp, 1634. But the revival of learning, and the mighty impetus given by the new art of printing, prepared the way for independent investigations of the Bible; although at first the Protestants were more interested in dogmatic than in critical questions. The Roman-Catholic Church has the honor of producing the first work in Introduction proper: it was by Santes Pagninus Lucensis (Sante Pagnino of Lucca, d. 1511), and entitled Isagogæ ad sacras literas, liber unicus (Lyons, 1536). Then came Sixtus of Siena (d. 1599), Bibliotheca sancta ex precipuis catholica ecclesie auctoribus collecta, et in octo libros digesta (Venice, 1566, and often; last edition, Naples, 1742). The contest between Buxtorf and Capellus (see those arts.) over the vowel-points called forth quite a literature from the Protestants, who have since kept the field. In biblical criticism two works of this period deserve especial mention, — Brian Walton, In Biblia polyglotta Prolegomena, London, 1657 (ed. Heidegger, Zürich, 1673; by J. A. Dathé, Leipzig, 1777; and by F. Wrangham, Cambridge, 1828, 2 vols.); and Humphry Hody, De librorum textibus originalibus, versionibus græcis et latinæ vulgatae libris IV., Oxford, 1705. General Introductions were written by Andr. Rivetus (Leyden, 1627), Abr. Calov (Wittenberg, 1613), J. H. Heidegger (Zürich, 1681 and often), J. Lensden (Utrecht, 1656). The scepticism which from England and France spread all over Europe, naturally laid violent hands upon the Bible, as was done by Hobbes, in his Leviathan (London, 1651; modern edition, London, 1882), and particularly by Spinoza (Tractatus theologico-politicus, Hamburg, 1670 [ed. by van Vloten and Land, The Hague, vol. i., 1882, pp. 377-610], chapters viii.-x.). A much nearer approach to the traditional treatment was made by Richard Simon (Histoire critique du Vieux Testament, Paris, 1678), who first established Introduction's claim to be an historical science. The tendency of the time was, however, towards negative criticism; and in this direction were the works of Semler (Abhandlungen von freier Untersuchung des Kanons, Halle, 1771-75, 4 parts; and Apparatus ad liberalem V. T. interpretationem, Halle, 1773). After him, holding more or less nearly his views, came Eichhorn (Leipzig, 1780-83, 3 parts), G. L. Bauer (Nürnberg, 1791), Augusti (Leipzig, 1806), and L. Bertholdt (Erlangen, 1812-19, 6 parts). But most completely the negative criticism was exhibited by De Wette, Lehrbuch d. hist.-kritisch. Einleitung in d. alte Testament (Berlin, 1817), remodelled, and changed in opinion, in its eighth edition by Eberhard Schrader (Berlin, 1869). Of works of a mediating tendency may be mentioned (Friedrich Bleek) Einleitung in das alte Testament, orig. ed., Berlin, 1860, 4th ed. by J. Wellhausen, 1878 [English trans., London, 1869, 2 vols.]; (J. J. Stäbelin) Specielle Einleitung in die kanonischen Bücher des alten Testaments, Elberfeld, 1862; (A. Kuenen) Historisch Kritisch onderzoek naar het ontstaan en de verzameling van de Boeken des Ouden Verbonds, Leiden, 1861-65, 3 parts [2d ed. much altered, 1885 sqq.; English trans., London, 1886 sqq.]; (S. Davidson) An Introduction to the Old Testament, London, 1862, 3 vols. Jewish scholars have contributed to Introduction, such as J. Fürst (Der Kanon d. A. T. n.d. Uebersetzung in Talmud und Midrasch, Leipzig, 1868) and J. S. Bloch (Studien z. Gesch. d. Samml. d. altheb. Lit., Leipzig, 1875); and Roman-Catholic scholars, such as Jahn (Wien, 1793; later ed., 1805; new ed. by Ackermann, 1825 [Eng. trans. by S. H. Turner and W. R. Whittingham, New York, 1827]), J. G. Herbst (Karlsruhe, 1840-42, 2 parts), J. M. A. Scholz (Köln, 1845-48, 3 parts), F. H. Rensch (Freiburg-i.-B., 1859; 3d ed., 1868), and Franz Kaulen (Freiburg-i.-B., 1876-82). From the Evangelical Church have proceeded the Introductions of J. D. Michaelis (Hamburg, 1787, unfinished), E. W. Hengstenberg (Berlin, 1831-39, 3 vols.), H. A. C. Hävernick (Erlangen, Parts I. and II., 1836-39; 2d ed. of Part I., by C. F. Keil, Frankfurt, 1854-56; Part III. ed. by Keil, 1849 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1852]), and C. F. Keil (Frankfurt, 1853; 3d ed., 1873 [Eng. trans., Edinburgh, 1869, 2 vols.]). [Recent works. — F. W. WEBER: *Kurtzgefasste Einleitung in die heiligen Schriften Alten u. II. New Testament. — What we mean by Introduction was not studied in the Early Church. There was no felt necessity to learn about the origin, the inducing causes, the immediate designs, and the histories of the New-Testament books. Even the presence of the apocryphal books, and of the heretics who had composed them, or who had departed from the canon, while it increased the reverence of the Church for those books known to be the genuine writings of the apostles and evangelists, led to very little work in this department in the first two centuries. Dionysius of Alexandria (third century) may be called the father of New-Testament historical criticism; for he contested the claim of John the apostle to be the author of the Revelation, while formally granting its canonicity. The incitement to critical consideration of the books of the New Testament had, however, been previously given by the discovery, when the Church came into more active intercourse, that some of these books had experienced different treatment in different places. For instance, the Epistle to the Hebrews, which the Alexandrian Church had accepted as Pauline, was found to be little known in other equally orthodox churches, and, indeed, in most was considered un-Pauline and even uncanonical; and the Shepherd of Hermas, it was found, was greatly valued in some churches, while in others it was little esteemed. Local tradition was thus robbed of its value; and the necessity of a critical comparison of these ecclesiastical traditions was felt by the Palestinian branch of the school of Origen. Eusebius' study of the primitive Christian literature was displayed in a comprehensive collection of the older witnesses for and against the not uncontested portions of the New Testament; and by so doing he rendered a valuable service, although his intention to substantiate certain prejudices respecting the limits of the canon destroys the objectivity of his information. From him, however, we have received pretty much all we know of the older tradition concerning the origin of the universally accepted books. Jerome followed in his steps, but added nothing, except a little about the difference between the Oriental and Occidental canons and the Gospel of the Hebrews. The dogmatic controversies of the fourth and following centuries diverted attention from critical questions; and what had been previously gained was merely repeated in the introductions to commentaries, catenas, and similar works.

But from the Revival of Learning began a better day for New-Testament Introduction. The works of Santes Pagninus (1536), Sixtus of Siena (1566), and A. Rivetus (1627), contained much information in this department, along with dogmatical considerations, and the new study of textual criticism gave great impetus. Richard Simon (1638-1712) published his three works upon the critical history of the New Testament (Histoire critique du N. T., Rotterdam, 1689-93), and thus won his place as the father of New-Testament Introduction. By critique he understood the investigations for the establishment of the original text; and, by his history from the sources, he disproved not only the Protestant claim of "a witness of the Spirit," but also the scholastic treatment, which, resting upon imperfect acquaintance with antiquity, could not prove that Christianity was a religion based on facts, and that the Bible was the record of those facts. But in the effort to establish the New-Testament text, he traversed a large part of the province of Introduction.

The next name to be mentioned is Johann David Michaelis (1717-1791), who wrote the Einleitung in die göttlichen Schriften des Neuen Bundes (Göttingen, 1750). He disclaimed dependency upon Simon; and yet (as only in textual criticism, by Mill, Bengel, and Wetstein, had much been done) his work was, in its first shape, based upon Simon. With each succeeding edition it was greatly improved; but, even in the fourth and last edition (1788), its stand-point was a strongly rational supernaturalism. The differences to be noted between the editions are mainly, that his attacks on the "doubters" became milder, and that he preferred at last to give up the inspiration of the historical books, denied also the inspiration of the non-apostolic books (among which he reckoned apparently the Epistle to the Hebrews), and, indeed, flatly declared that the "inner witness of the Spirit" was of as little worth as the witness of the Church, in proof of the inspiration of any book.

Johann Salomo Semler (1725-1791) made the next contribution of importance (in his Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Kanons, Halle, 1771-75, 4 parts), when he distinguished between the word of God, which contained the doctrines of directly spiritual value, and the Holy Scriptures, which contained them only sporadically. There is, however, no historical proof that any particular passage was the word of God: the inner witness for the truth was the only source of proof. The Church had the right, exercised by the ancient Church and by the reformers, to say what books should constitute her canon. One cannot say that Introduction was influenced permanently by Semler: rather we must give the palm to Michaelis, who was followed by J. E. Chr. Schmidt (1804), Eichhorn (1808), and Hug (1808). Schmidt applied the phrase "historico-critical" — since so widely used — to his Introduction; Eichhorn started his "original gospel" theory; Hug, in an unexcelled manner, investigated the relations of the synoptists. Schleiermacher (1811) called attention to the need of a reconstruction of this branch of study, declaring that its object was a history of the New Testament, so that its present readers might be, in their knowledge of the origin of the books and their text, on a level with the first. This idea — to write a history of the New Testament — has been carried out by Credner (1836), Reuss (1842), and Hupfeld (1844); so also by Davidson (1868) and Hilgenfeld (1875), under the old name "Introduction."

Ferdinand Christian Baur (1792-1860) has had by far the most influence upon New-Testament studies of any man of modern times. He attempted nothing less than a reconstruction of all apostolic and post-apostolic history and literature, in the face of all ecclesiastical and scholarly tradition, from the four Pauline Epistles (Galatians, 1 and 2 Corinthians, and Romans), which alone he considered genuine. Starting with the idea that the difference between Paul and the rest of the apostles was fundamental, he declared that those New-Testament writings which either put the relations of the apostles in a more favorable light, or seemed to ignore their differences altogether, were either forgeries, or the products of a later time. But his historical considerations were derived from Hegel's philosophy, and his criticism rested upon dogmatic convictions. These four points may be made against him: (1) He reasoned in a circle; for he examined critically, first the sources of the history, and then the history of the sources. The reasoning which reduced the genuine Pauline Epistles to four reduces the four to none; so that Paul is robbed of his title to have produced any writing which lasted. (2) Baur certainly was extraordinarily familiar with the old Christian literature; but he read it with prejudice, and not with a desire to learn any thing different from his preconceptions. (3) He was lacking in the sense of the concrete and the value of the individual, and therefore could not grasp complicated relations and their results. (4) If it is self-evident that one must understand what he criticises, and that his criticism must rest upon thorough exegesis, then Baur surely was unfitted for his labor; for he was any thing rather than an exegete, and his school has done nothing in exegesis. It should, however, be added, that these defects in Baur's method of work were supplied by others; and the result of the operations of friend and foe is a much better understanding of the New Testament.

INTROIT, the name, in the Roman Church, for the anthem sung at the beginning of the communion service. Its origin is obscure. According to the Liber Pontificalis, it was introduced by Celestine in 423. See the art. by W. E. Scudamore, in SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dict. of Chr. Antiq., vol. i. pp. 865-867.

INVENTION OF THE CROSS. See CROSS.

INVESTITURE. In the Frankish monarchy the idea gradually became prevalent, that the ruler of the realm had the right to appoint bishops; and in Germany the kings clung so much the more tenaciously to this idea, as, in course of time, the bishoprics and abacies there entirely changed their original character of being merely ecclesiastical organizations, and became, to all intents and purposes, political divisions, with rights of coinage, toll, jurisdiction, etc., and with corresponding duties, especially of a military description. When a bishop died, his staff and ring were brought from his residence to the king; and, when the king had made up his mind with respect to the choice of a successor, he put the new bishop or abbot into possession of the temporalities of the fief by investing him with the staff and the ring, and receiving his homage, or oath of fealty. After the investiture, there followed, as the last act in the installation, the consecration by the metropolitan; but that the latter should exercise more than an advisory influence on the whole transaction was out of the question.

Meanwhile, during the first half of the eleventh century, the ideas of the reform party in the Roman curia, concerning the perfect freedom of the Church from any secular power, began to assume definite shape. As the bishops and abbots used to offer great presents to the king on the occasion of their investiture, it was easy to throw a shadow of simony over the whole transaction; and the statutes of the ecclesiastical law concerning simony were very severe. As yet, however, no direct application was made. The curia spoke only in general terms when it forbade ecclesiastics to accept their offices from the hands of laymen; but in 1068 it came to an actual clash. The king appointed a bishop of Milan in the usual way,—by investiture; while the people, instigated by the curia, demanded a bishop canonically elected and instituted. As the king would not yield, a Roman synod of 1074 aggravated the severity of the laws concerning simony; and the next year Gregory VII. officially denied the king's right of investiture, and admonished the people to oppose, in all their ecclesiastical functions, such bishops as had obtained their office in an uncanonical, simoniacal manner.

This meant for Germany the complete overthrow of its constitution. The bishops and abbots were princes of the empire, holding the larger mass of the imperial fiefs; and, as no dynastical claims could be put forward with respect to these fiefs, the king wielded an immense power through his right to give them to whom he pleased. It was evident that he would immediately break down before the Pope if he lost this right, — if the bishops and abbots of his realm should be canonically elected, that is, elected by a clergy, which, by the law of celibacy, was completely severed from the interests of the State, and transformed into mere tools of the Church. The contest was long, extremely bitter, and at times doubtful with respect to its issue. The final settlement, however, by the concordat of Worms (1122), was in favor of the Pope. The emperor gave up altogether his right of investiture with ring and staff; and though he retained a certain influence on the elections, and the right of investiture with the so-called regalia, in its golden days the Church knew very well how to elude these latter obligations. The concordat of Worms continued in active operation until the dissolution of the German Empire in 1806.

In no other country did the controversy concerning the right of investiture reach such a pitch of intensity as in Germany, — partly because the popes knew that victory on one point would be victory all along the whole line, and were too shrewd to engage in an unnecessary warfare with the whole world at once; partly because the question nowhere else affected the political constitution so deeply. In France, where the bishops and abbots, though large fief-holders, were not princes of the empire, the kings renounced their right of investiture with ring and staff towards the close of the eleventh century; but no elections could take place without their permission, nor was it valid until it received their confirmation, — two points which secured to them a considerable influence. In England it came to a compromise between Paschalis II. and Henry I. (1107), by which the king retained his right of nomination and of demanding an oath of fealty. Stephen, however, Henry's successor (1135-54), gave up his right of nomination; and in 1215 John repeated the renunciation. Nevertheless, practically the English chapters never obtained freedom in their elections.

INVOCATION OF SAINTS. See IMAGE-WORSHIP, INTERCESSION.

IONA, HY or HII, I or IA, IOUA, from which, by a mistake of a transcriber, the present name of Iona has come. It gets also the name of Icolumbkill, or the Island of Columba of the Cell, and occasionally Innis van Druidheach, or Island of the Druids. It is one of the Outer Hebrides, lying north-east and south-west, and separated from the Ross, or south-western promontory of the Island of Mull, by a shallow channel about a mile in breadth. It is about three miles and a half in length, and one and a half in breadth; the rocks of igneous formation; the surface generally low, but rising into a number of irregular cones or knolls, not usually exceeding a hundred feet in height; the highest of them, which bears the name of Dun-i, or Dun-ii, and is situate on the north of the island, being about three hundred and thirty feet above the level of the sea. It has been variously estimated as containing from sixteen hundred to two thousand acres, much less than half of which are arable, and not more than six hundred actually under cultivation. The pastures on the sides of the knolls and ravines afford sustenance to about six hundred sheep, and from two to three hundred larger cattle. The population, according to the latest census, was two hundred and forty-three, and maintains itself partly by agriculture, and partly by fishing; the large flounders in the neighboring seas being accounted unusually fine. The coast is diversified by a number of small rocky bays and headlands, and three or four landing-places, — Port-na-Curraich, on the south-west, where Columba is supposed to have first landed; Port-na-Muintir on the south-east, the usual starting-point in crossing from Iona to Mull; and Port-na-Marbh, at which the bodies brought for burial in the island were landed. The island at the time of the Reformation appears to have constituted a distinct parish, but afterwards to have been united to the parish of Kilfinnichen in Mull, and only in our own day to have been re-erected into a parish quoad sacra. Besides the parish church and the school, there is also a Free Church.

That which for ages has attracted visitors from all quarters to this little island, and still holds them captive by a spell more powerful than the neighboring Staffa does by its grander scenery and greater scientific interest, is that it was once "the luminary of the Caledonian regions, whence," as Dr. Johnson says, "savage clans and roving barbarians derived the benefits of civilization and the blessings of religion." But though its attractions arise chiefly from its history, and it must yield to its neighbor in respect of the grandeur of its scenery and the marvels of its geological structure, it is by no means so destitute of physical attractions as Montalembert has represented it to be. Mr. Skene, who knows it far better, has said, "No one who pays merely a flying visit to Iona in an excursion steamer, and is hurried by his guide over the sights, that he may return by the steamer the same day, can form any conception of the hidden beauties, — its retired dells, its long reaches of sand on shores indented with quiet bays, its little coves between bare and striking rocks, and the bolder rocky scenery of its north-western and south-western shores, where it opposes wild barren cliffs and high rocky islets to the sweep of the Atlantic waves." The Duke of Argyll fully concurs in the views of Mr. Skene. Even he who is most impressed with its higher claims, and feels most the force of Dr. Johnson's noble words, need not fail to own that Columba could hardly have found a spot combining more of the natural beauty he loved with the security he sought, and in all respects so well adapted for an island monastery designed "to form the centre of a great missionary work, and to exhibit the Christian life in contrast with the surrounding Paganism." These beauties seem to have been felt by him, especially those of the south-western corner, which Mr. Skene pronounces to be "the very perfection of rocky scenery," where was the Cullnan Erin. From its summit the saint could look out on the wide ocean without catching a glimpse of the land of his birth, and might have had suggested to his mind the glowing imagery of the poem in which he revels on the delight of gazing from a pinnacle of rock on the face of ocean, with its heaving waves chanting music to their father, or more hoarsely thundering on the rocks.

It was in 563 that the island became the home of the saint, being given to him either by the king of the Dalriad Scots, or by the Picts, its more ancient possessors. It was well suited for a Celtic monastery, no less by its own limited size than by its proximity to larger islands and to the mainland, and it became not only the usual abode of Columba, but the head of all his monasteries and missions. From it as a centre he went out on many evangelistic tours, both to the islands and the mainland, till the kingdom of the Northern Picts was brought over to the Christian faith, and the faith as well as the fortunes of his own Scotie race were revived. From it missionaries went forth, or were sent, to more distant tribes and nations, and particularly to the Angles of Northumbria, to the Continent, to Iceland, and other hyperborean regions; and the blessings of civilization, learning, and religion, were extended far and wide.

The remains of the ancient church, nunnery, and monastery, now found in the island, belong to a much later age than that of Columba. The buildings erected by him, being, according to Scotie custom, of wood or wattles, have all disappeared many centuries ago, and their very site can now be but indistinctly pointed out. They were surrounded by a rampart, some portions of which can still be traced, and were not far from the Port-na-Muintir, or portus insule of Adamnan, facing a similar landing-place on the coast of Mull. Adamnan makes mention of a kiln and barn, and gives us reason to infer there was also a mill. He mentions the monasterium with its refectory; the hospitium, or guest-chamber, which was wattled; the cells of the monks; the little court in the centre; and the church or oratorium, which is supposed to have been of oaken planks or beams. The domus, or cell of Columba, was built of planks, and occupied the highest part of the ground, not far from the Tar (an Abb, from which he took his last survey of his community and their agricultural operations. There would seem also to have been a library, which Mr. Cosmo Innes supposes at a considerably later period still to have had manuscripts, which had probably been in its possession from these early times, and was of great value.

In the ninth and tenth centuries the island was repeatedly ravaged, the monastery destroyed, and part of its inmates slaughtered by the Danes and other northern rovers, and the primacy of the Scottish Columban churches was removed to Dunkeld. In the end of the eleventh century, when the Western Isles were formally ceded to Norway, the seat of the bishopric of the Isles was transferred from Iona to Man, and the diocese incorporated into the Norwegian archbishopric of Drontheim. In 1266, when the isles were restored to Scotland, the patronage of this bishopric was restored also, but with reservation of the rights the Church of Drontheim could legitimately claim over it. In the following century the Island of Man was seized by Edward III., and its bishop swore allegiance to him. After 1380 the English appointed a bishop of Man, and the Scotch a bishop of the Isles; but no regular division of the diocese appears to have taken place. The later ecclesiastical buildings, of which remains still exist in the island, date mostly from the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The most ancient, the temple or chapel of Oran or Odhrain, may possibly be even of the time of Queen Margaret. It is built of red granite, and has for its western doorway a Norman arch, with beak-headed ornament. Near it is the Reilig Oran, an ancient cemetery and sanctuary, said to have formed the burial-place of the Scottish and Pictish kings till the time of Malcolm the Third, and anciently to have contained three tumuli, appropriated respectively to the kings of Scotland, Ireland, and Norway, and in which forty-eight Scotch, four Irish, and eight Norwegian kings were buried. North of this cemetery are the remains of the mediæval monastery of the thirteenth century, erected for the Benedictine monks who had succeeded the Celtic. In connection with the cloisters is a Norman arcade of somewhat older date. The abbey or cathedral church is supposed to have been erected also in the thirteenth century. It is built of red granite, and in cruciform shape, with nave, transept, and choir, and with central tower rising to the height of seventy-five feet. The tower is said to have contained a fine peal of bells, two of which were carried off to Raphoe in Ireland, by Bishop Knox, when transferred to that see by James I. King Charles I. ordered Knox's successor to restore them; but whether this was actually done is not now known (Transactions of Iona Club, p. 187, Edinburgh, 1824).

IRELAND. I. THE COUNTRY. — Ireland is situated to the west of Great Britain. Its greatest length is three hundred miles, and greatest width two hundred; its area, 32,535 square miles. The surface is an undulating plain, with a rim of low mountains round the coast. The climate is moist, variable but temperate, and better adapted to cattle-raising than to the cultivation of cereals. The manufactures are not important, except that of linen in the north. The country is divided into the four provinces, Ulster, Leinster, Munster, and Connaught, and subdivided into thirty-two counties, comprising 316 baronies, with 2,532 parishes.

II. HISTORY. 1. To the Union of the Irish Church with Rome. — Ireland was at an early date settled by Celtic tribes, differing considerably among themselves, and maintaining constant warfare with each other. Christianity was introduced into the country, certainly early in the fifth century, through intercourse with Irish colonies formed in Wales and Cornwall on the decadence of the Roman power in Britain; but the founding of an organized church is usually admitted to be due to St. Patrick. The Patrician Church was independent of Rome, and, although agreeing in doctrine with the Western Church of that time, differed widely in organization. At first we find no diocesan bishops with definite territory, and clergy under them, much less metropolitans in their turn overseeing the bishops. The early Irish Church was essentially monastic, and adapted to the state of society then existing among the Irish Celts. The former religion was what is vaguely known as "Druidism;" and the so-called "schools of the Druids" may have accustomed the Irish to the monastic idea. The tribal system was in full force; and, owing to this, a chief could not make an absolute gift of land to the Church: he could only make over his own rights, the clansmen retaining theirs. Such religious communities were called "monasteries," though only a few members may have taken vows of celibacy. The heads of such bodies were the real ecclesiastical rulers of Ireland; and we find presbyters, laymen, and (in one famous instance, that of St. Brigit) a woman, filling such positions, and in authority over bishops. That the bishops were not territorial in early times is shown by the facts that St. Patrick himself is traditionally reported to have ordained between three hundred and four hundred bishops for a population of probably not half a million persons, and that St. Mochta is said to have had one hundred bishops in his monastery. The history of the Irish Church for the next six centuries is the history of its gradual conformation to that of Rome. As a rule, the higher and more educated of the clergy, impressed by the greatness and splendor of the Roman Church, were in favor of such changes as looked towards the establishment of the Roman graded hierarchy. In 633 part of the Church adopted the Roman method of reckoning Easter; in 716 the rest followed. The stricter Benedictine rule was introduced into the monasteries; and the tribe bishops approximated in time to diocesans. An apparent exception to the non-hierarchical constitution was the arch-bishop of Armagh, who bore this title at a comparatively early date. But a little examination shows that the title "arch" was applied very loosely, and that the so-called early bishops of Armagh were sometimes laymen, and were, in fact, abbots rather than bishops. The Irish Church of the seventh and eighth centuries was honorably distinguished for its missionary enterprise and its schools: the latter gave Ireland a literature two centuries in advance of the other barbarous nations of Europe.

Jealousy of the power of the northern bishop of Armagh led to the calling of the synod of Rathbreasail, in 1110, at which the first papal legate in Ireland, Gillebert, bishop of Limerick, presided. This synod was in the hands of the Romanizing party. The archbishop of Cashel was acknowledged as a rival to Armagh, and the country placed under twenty-three diocesans; but so imperfectly were these arrangements carried out, that we find similar measures introduced at the subsequent synods of Kells and Cashel. At this period a frightful state of anarchy prevailed; and, as was natural, the Church suffered fearfully. At this juncture St. Malachy, a man of great power, began his labors. As the fruit of his efforts, a great synod was held at Kells in 1152 (four years after his death), where true diocesan jurisdiction was set up, two new archbishoprics were established in Dublin and Tuam respectively, and the authority of Rome was formally acknowledged.

We now reach the period of the Norman Invasion. Adrian IV., the only English Pope, granted to Henry II., in 1155, a bull conferring on him the sovereignty of Ireland; the condition being the complete submission of the Irish Church. The expulsion of Dermot MacMurrough, a Leinster chieftain, gave the desired opportunity. Dermot applied to Henry for aid, and received letters-patent authorizing English subjects to assist him.

Richard de Clare, since known as Strongbow, agreed to reconquer Leinster for Dermot, receiving in marriage Eva, Dermot's only child, and with her the reversion of Dermot's lands, which, according to tribal law, Dermot had no right to give. In 1169 and 1170 the Norman knights landed in Ireland, and succeeded in firmly establishing themselves. In 1172 Henry visited Ireland, and received the country from Strongbow. A synod assembled at Cashel formally united the Church of Ireland to the Church of Rome; and so the last of the western national churches surrendered. And from this time until the Reformation, the history of the Irish Church is the history of the Roman-Catholic Church in Ireland.

2. From the Union of the Irish Church with that of Rome to the Reformation. — At first the advent of the Norman rulers was an unmixed benefit. To the tillers of the soil any strong rule was better than subjection to the exaction of every captain of banditti who could muster twenty men. But the Normans rapidly assimilated themselves to the Irish; and in a short time the only difference between the old and the new state of affairs was, that some of the clansmen now fought under Norman instead of Celtic leaders. In 1367, less than two hundred years from the landing of Strongbow, the Anglo-Irish Parliament assembled at Kilkenny passed a statute treating the old English settlers with almost as much severity as the Irish. Near the beginning of the fifteenth century considerable bodies of Celtic-Scotch invaded Ulster. Like other invaders of Ireland, they found allies, and made permanent settlements.

During the wars of the Roses in England, Ireland was left almost to herself; and on the accession of Henry VII., although the most powerful families were of Anglo-Norman name, the authority of the king extended only to the country immediately surrounding Dublin. Henry, an able and astute monarch, sent over Sir Edward Poyning. A Parliament assembled by him in 1495 made all English statutes law in Ireland, and subjected the Irish Parliament to the English privy council, — an arrangement which remained in force until within eighteen years of the union of the two countries.

Under the strong rule of Henry's deputy, the Earl of Kildare, — the head of the great family of the Geraldines, — the English authority was extended, the turbulence of the barons and native chiefs was checked, and the unhappy country enjoyed probably a greater degree of quiet than at any time since her history opened. This state of things continued through the early part of the reign of Henry VIII., broken only by the mad rebellion of "Silken Thomas," which ended in the ruin of the Kildare family.

3. From the Reformation to the Period of Protestant Ascendency, and of the Penal Laws. — A new and all-important factor is now introduced into Irish history. Henry VIII. extended his reformation to Ireland. Up to this time the Irish Church had been directly under the control of Rome. The Pope appointed the archbishops, and the king of England was seldom able to enforce his claim to any authority in ecclesiastical matters. At the time of the Reformation the Irish Church was as corrupt as any in Europe. Simony, lawlessness, and sexual immorality characterized the clergy. Nowhere was reform more needed; but unfortunately the worst side of the Reformation was turned to Ireland, and it could scarcely have happened otherwise than that it should be rejected by the mass of the people. The Irish were now beginning to realize that the power of England was real, and was to be exerted to crush out their tribal institutions, and substitute the common law of England for that of the Brehon lawyers. Northmen and Danes, Norman barons and Celtic Scotch, had all been welcomed as allies by some Irish power, and had been absorbed till they became "more Irish than the Irish." But under Henry VII. the Celt was made to feel that there was a force he could not mould or bend, — a force that must either bend or break him, and would, if possible, compel him to order. Hence the Reformation appeared to the Irish simply as an arbitrary act of the power they had learned to hate. Henry VIII. called a Parliament, which passed whatever acts he wished. Most of the bishops and clergy acquiesced in the supremacy of the king; but so unpopular was the change, that O'Neill was able to raise an insurrection in Ulster to oppose it, which was vigorously suppressed. It was not, however, until 1551, that Protestantism was formally established by law. Queen Mary restored the old order, of course; but her power in Ireland was so weak, that the country gave asylum to English Protestant refugees. In 1560, after the accession of Elizabeth, a Parliament was held, in which sat three archbishops and seventeen bishops. This Parliament restored the ecclesiastical order of Henry VIII. and Edward VI., but it is not certain how many of the bishops actually conformed. The Reformation made no real progress among the people. At the beginning of the reign of James I. the condition of the established Church was deplorable. The clergy were largely illiterate, and drawn from the lowest orders, and, although often pluralists, were almost beggars; the revenues being absorbed, under corrupt agreements, by those in authority. During the reigns of Queen Mary and Elizabeth the civil history presents a succession of rebellions and ferocious internal feuds. Exhaustion brought peace, and King James I. took advantage of the desolation of Ulster to introduce Scotch settlers. These settlers were strongly opposed to prelacy, and formed a basis for the Presbyterian Church of Ireland.

Charles I. tried the ruinous policy of using Ireland as a power against his Parliament. The Protestants were systematically disarmed, and the frightful outbreak of 1641 was the result. The Parliament sent some Scotch troops to Carrickfergus, attended by chaplains; and among them, in 1642, was organized the first presbytery of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland. The misery of the country for the next few years was such as can hardly be equalled, even in her dismal annals. When Cromwell came, he found five hostile armies ranged against each other, and all preying on the wretched peasantry. His sharp and decisive treatment is well known. He proceeded to parcel out the forfeited and almost depopulated lands among English settlers, mostly Baptists and Independents. For a few years Ireland enjoyed prosperity, but the policy of the Restoration undid much of the work. Cromwell's settlers were displaced, and many of them emigrated to the New World. Up to this time it does not appear that the penal laws against Roman Catholics had been seriously enforced, although Cromwell refused liberty to celebrate the mass. The effect of Protestantism showed itself in a marked way on the Roman-Catholic clergy. From this time we hear no more of illegitimate children of bishops, nor of scandalous lives among the priests. Those who see most clearly the mischief the Roman-Catholic Church does in Ireland admit, that, with regard to purity of life, the Irish priesthood stands pre-eminent among the Roman-Catholic clergy of Europe.

When the Revolution of 1688 took place, and James II. landed in Ireland, the Protestants of the North saved a footing in Ireland for King William. After the battles of the Boyne (1690) and Aughrim (1691) had ruined the cause of James, peace was concluded by the treaty of Limerick, which guaranteed to the Roman Catholics all rights which they had enjoyed under Charles I. In Ulster large districts which had been forfeited were bestowed on owners who leased them for terms of thirty years to Scotch Presbyterian settlers.

4. From the Protestant Ascendency to the Union of Ireland to Great Britain. — The government now fell entirely into the hands of a few great Protestant-Episcopal land-holders: the treaty of Limerick was disregarded; and Ireland became the worst governed country in Europe. During the reign of Queen Anne, penal laws which bore almost as heavily on Presbyterians as on Roman Catholics were vigorously enforced. The state of religion was deplorable. The Established Church had gained no hold on the people, and, indeed, had made no adequate effort to do so. The richer bishoprics and deaneries were occupied by men who were chosen for quite other reasons than spiritual fitness. Most of the clergy were poorly paid, and were content to perform mechanically the duties required of them. The Roman-Catholic priests were, for the most part, very uneducated; and the penal laws were enforced with such severity, that in many places the sacraments were left unadministered. Cromwell's Baptists and Independents, who at one time were computed to have formed one-half of the Protestant population, had almost disappeared, in a way hard to account for. The Presbyterian Church presented a brighter aspect. It was felt that the strong Presbyterians were needed; and even the bigoted Irish Parliament had to provide for their admission to the army, and in 1719 passed an act of toleration in spite of the hysterical protests of the bishops.

In 1727 the Presbyterian Church was weakened by the secession of the synod of Antrim, — a body sympathizing so much with latitudinarian views as to the divinity of Christ, as to make a subscription to the Westminster standards distasteful, — and still further by the emigration of her members to America. As the leases granted under William III. fell in, the landlords raised the rents, charging the tenants for their own improvements. The enterprising Ulster farmers would not submit; and this, with the policy towards dissenters from the Established Church which England had sanctioned, sent many of the race which had fought for her cause in Ireland in 1688 to fight against her in America in 1776.

In 1747 Wesley preached in Ireland with success. The good he did must not be measured only by the number of his converts: his movement infused life, in many places, into the existing organizations.

In 1746 the first seceding Presbyterian minister had settled in Ireland, and in 1750 the first presbytery of this body was organized. In Ulster the system of lay patronage had never existed; but the rigidly orthodox secession church found a reason for being in the prevailing latitudinarianism of the synod of Ulster.

The rest of the eighteenth century may be passed over rapidly. The penal laws with regard to the Roman Catholics were gradually relaxed. Fear of French invasion caused the arming of the volunteers. The efforts of Grattan and Flood, backed by the strength of the volunteers, obtained in 1782 the independence of the Irish Parliament. Ireland, for eighteen years, had home rule; but, under the system of parliamentary representation then in force, this meant only the tyranny of a land-holding minority. The rebellion of 1798, with its frightful outrages on both sides, took place. Pitt, then at the head of the English Government, resolved to do away with the farce of Irish independence. He was resolved on union. The Roman Catholics favored the measure as promising them some relief, and it was carried by direct bribery.

5. From the Union to the Present Time. — In the first years of the nineteenth century, the state of religion in the Protestant churches in Ireland was not encouraging; but a better day soon dawned. In 1827 the synod of Ulster, under the leadership of Henry Cooke, freed herself from Arianism, which had obtained some foothold; and, as a result of this movement, the remonstrant synod of Ulster was formed of a few ministers who felt they could not remain in the Church.

In 1829 important reforms were carried out in the administration of the Roman-Catholic Church, in particular with regard to the appointment of bishops.

In 1833 the anti-tithe demonstrations led to a reform of the Established Church, by which it was arranged that the archbishoprics of Cashel and Tuam, and eight bishoprics, were to be left unfilled on their becoming vacant. This measure was vigorously opposed by the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, and there were dismal prophecies of the results. The actual loss of spiritual light due to the extinction of these ecclesiastical stars was, however, less than was expected. In fact, we have entered on a period of progress and success in both the Established and Presbyterian churches. The clergy of the former showed an earnest and faithful interest in the spiritual and temporal welfare of their charges, in strong contrast to their predecessors of the eighteenth century; while among the Presbyterians new congregations were rapidly organized, and increased life shown in those already existing.

In 1840 a union was effected between the synod of Ulster and the secession synod. The 292 congregations of the synod of Ulster united with 141 seceding congregations to form the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

In 1869 the act of Parliament was passed, disestablishing and disendowing the Episcopal Church of Ireland. This bill went into effect Jan. 1, 1871.

The principal events of the secular history since the union were the Catholic emancipation (1829), which gave political enfranchisement to the Roman Catholics; the fearful famine of 1846, which, with emigration, reduced the population by more than a million and a half in five years; the abortive rising of 1848; the home-rule agitation, begun in 1874; and the passing of a land bill in 1881, securing to the tenant rights to any improvements he may make, in a manner that to some seems to infringe on the commonly accepted rights of property.

III. PRESENT CONDITION. — The population, after desolating wars such as the Elizabethan, has been estimated at much less than one million. At the end of the last century it had increased to nearly five millions, and in 1845 reached the astonishing maximum of 8,295,061. Then came the famine and emigration, and in 1851 the population was only a little more than six millions and a half. Emigration has kept up the decrease ever since, but at a slower rate. The census returns of 1881 showed a total of 5,159,839.

At the census of 1881 there were 3,951,881 Roman Catholics, 635,670 Protestant Episcopalians, 485,503 Presbyterians, and 47,669 Methodists; forming respectively, 76.6, 12.3, 9.4, and .9 per cent of the whole population. All other religious bodies, including about 4,500 Independents (or Congregationalists), about the same number of Baptists, about 4,000 Quakers, 453 Jews, and 1,144 persons who refused information, numbered only 39,109, or .8 per cent.

The Roman-Catholic Church is under the four archbishops of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam, and twenty-three bishops. On the death of a bishop, the clergy of the diocese nominate a successor to the vacancy; and the bishops of the province also name two or three persons. Usually the new bishop is chosen from the latter number, by the cardinals composing the congregation De Propagandâ Fide. There are nearly 1,000 parish priests, and 1,750 curates; and the total number of the clergy in all capacities is given as 3,198. The parishes number 1,084, and churches and chapels nearly 2,500.

The Maynooth Roman-Catholic College, founded in 1795, formerly received annual government grants, which in 1871 were commuted for the sum of £372,331. Although the Roman-Catholic Church in Ireland is in most things ultramontane, in national questions it has sometimes shown a strong spirit of independence.

The Protestant-Episcopal Church includes most of the land-holding class. It is under two archbishops and ten bishops. There are 33 dioceses, divided into groups of two, three, or four each, and about 1,300 benefices. There are 364 curates. The commissioners appointed for the purpose have paid over more than seven million and a half sterling in commutation of life-interests existing at the time of the disestablishment. Although the disestablishment has in some ways weakened the Protestant-Episcopal Church, principally with regard to the social standing of candidates for orders, yet, on the other hand, a spirit is making itself felt among the laity which promises much good for the future.

The strength of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland is chiefly in Ulster, where there is a large population of Scotch descent. Before the disestablishment, the Presbyterian Church received £10,000 annually, from the government. In 1880 the Church embraced 36 presbyteries, nearly 600 congregations, 79,214 families, and 104,769 communicants. The revenues were £139,840, of which £41,922 was paid to ministers, whose salary is made up in part in this way, and in part by their congregations. The Presbyterian College, Belfast, and the Magee College, Londonderry, are the "theological seminaries" of the Presbyterian Church.

The other Presbyterian bodies are inconsiderable. They are, the remonstrant synod of Ulster (1830), with 23 ministers; the presbytery of Antrim (1727), with 8 ministers; the northern presbytery of Antrim (1862), with 6 ministers; the remnant of the secession church in Ireland (which refused to unite in 1840), with 10 ministers; a branch of the United Presbyterians of Scotland, with 13 ministers; and two branches of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, or Covenanters, with about 31 ministers. The synod of Munster (1660), with 5 ministers, though in connection with the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, is kept up for legal convenience with regard to certain properties held by it.

The Methodist Church in Ireland was formed in 1878, by the union of the Wesleyan Methodists with the Primitive Wesleyan Methodists. Its hundredth annual conference, held in Cork in June, 1881, had under its care 10 districts and 116 stations. The Methodist New Connection Church has only 7 stations.

The Congregational churches in Ireland have 21 ministers, and the association of Baptist churches 25. The Moravians have 8 congregations.

The oldest Irish university is that of Dublin, established 1591. The Queen's University, soon to be superseded by the Royal University, has colleges in Belfast, Cork, and Galway.

In 1880 the national school system maintained 7,590 schools, having on their rolls 1,083,020 pupils. In 1841, 53 per cent of the population could neither read nor write. In 1871 this percentage was reduced to 33 for the whole country, and to 27 for Ulster.

IRELAND, John, b. at Ashburton, Devonshire, Eng., Sept. 8, 1761; d. in London, Sept. 1, 1842. He was graduated at Oriel College, Oxford, 1780; took orders, and was made dean of Westminster 1816. He was the author of Five Discourses; containing Certain Arguments for and against the Reception of Christianity by the Ancient Jews and Greeks, London, 1796; Nuptiæ sacræ, or An Inquiry into the Scriptural Doctrine of Marriage and Divorce, London, 1821; The Plague of Marseilles in the Year 1720, London, 1834. Besides other benefactions, he left ten thousand pounds to establish at Oxford a professorship of biblical exegesis. This professorship has been held by Canon H. P. Liddon, D.D., since 1870.

IRENÆUS, Bishop of Lyons (Lugdunum), one of the most distinguished authors and theologians of the early Church; was b., probably in Asia Minor, about 115; d. in Lyons about 190 [usual date 202]. As the facts of his life are drawn to a large extent from his own writings, we will begin with a survey of the latter.

1. Writings. — The only work of Irenæus which has come down to us entire is his treatise against Gnosticism, Ἐλεγχος καὶ ἀνατροπὴ τῆς ψευδοκρίσεως ["Disproof and Refutation of the Gnosis falsely so called"]. It was written in Greek, but is preserved only in a Latin translation and some fragments of a Syriac version. A portion of the original Greek text has, however, been preserved by Epiphanius, who transcribed verbally the first book, to 21, 4, in his work on Heresies (31, 9-31), and quotes largely in other places without, however, mentioning the source. Hippolytus likewise drew from the Greek original of Irenæus in his Refutation of all Heresies (vi. 38, 42-52, vii. 32-37). This work of Irenæus was usually quoted by the shorter titles, πρὸς τὰς αἰρέσεις, or κατὰ αἰρέσεων ("Against the Heresies"), and Adv. hæreses, or Adv. hæreticos ("Against Heretics"). Irenæus may have found occasion, in the prevalence of Gnostic errors in his own diocese, for composing this work, as some of the disciples of the Gnostic Marcus had come to that vicinity (i. 13, 7), and the writings of Florinus, an apostate to Valentini- anism, were circulated in the congregations along the Rhone. But the primary occasion of the work was the request of a friend to be supplied with more definite information in regard to the doctrines of Valentinus. See Gnosticism.

The work itself consists of five books. In the first the author gives a description of the Gnostic heresies, and in the remaining four a refutation of them by summarizing the teachings of the evangelists and the Pauline Epistles. The work shows clearness of thought, but is somewhat discursive. He makes no pretension to literary finish, or elegance of Greek diction (i. Præf.), but eagerly pursues the one object in view. While it is his primary purpose to analyze and refute the Valentinian heresy, he takes in all heresies, inasmuch as it is only a "recapitulation of all heresies," and has its roots back in Simon Magus. He was acquainted with older treatises against heresies (iv. Præf.), but draws largely upon the writings of Valentinus and his personal contact with that Gnostic's disciples. The third book (iii. 21, 1) was written while Eleutherus was bishop of Rome (175-189). The Latin translation must have been made soon after the original was written, as Tertullian, in his treatise against the Valentinians (about 202-207), speaks of Irenæus as one of his authorities, and as the most "studious explorer of all doctrines" (omnium doctrinarum curiosissimus explorator).

Irenæus wrote at least two other works on the heresies, both addressed to Florinus, — ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς μοναρχίαν ἢ περὶ μὴ εἶναι τὸν θεὸν ποιητὴν κακῶν ["A Letter concerning the Divine Sovereignty, or whether God is not the Creator of Evils"], and σπούδασμα περὶ ὀγδοῦδος ["Zeal concerning the Ogdoad"]. Both these works are quoted by Eusebius. The latter is preserved in a Syriac translation. Irenæus took an active interest in the Easter controversies of his day (see EASTER), and wrote on this subject a letter to Victor, bishop of Rome, and probably his treatise addressed to the Roman Blastus, περὶ σχίσματος ["The Schism"]. Eusebius (v. 26) and Jerome refer to a Book of Various Discussions, which was probably a collection of homilies; and Eusebius (v. 26), to an apologetic work (πρὸς Ἕλληνας, etc.), probably on the rule of faith. Other works attributed to him, as a Commentary on the Canticles, are of doubtful authenticity.

2. Life. — Irenæus spent the earlier years of his life in Asia Minor, and was probably born there early in the second century. He speaks (v. 30, 3) of the Apocalypse of John as "having been seen almost in our own generation at (or near) the close of Domitian's reign" (96). Irenæus' painstaking accuracy leaves no ground for extending this period to fifty years, and putting the date of his birth so late as 140 (Massuet) or 147 (Ziegler). These late dates are also incompatible with other positive testimonies in regard to his relations to Polycarp and other disciples of the apostles in Asia Minor; although it is doubtful whether Papias was among them, as Jerome states (Ep., 75, 3 ad Theodoram). He speaks in such a way of those "who had seen John face to face," and "of some who had not only seen John, but others of the apostles" (ii. 22, 5; v. 5, 1; 30, 1; 33, 3; 36, 2), as to leave no doubt that he had been the recipient of verbal communications from them. Polycarp suffered martyrdom Feb. 23, 155. Of his relations to him he says (iii. 3, 4), ὃν καὶ ἡμεῖς ἐωράκαμεν ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ ἡμῶν ἡλικίᾳ ἐπιπολὺ γὰρ παρέμεινε καὶ πάνν γεραλέος, ἐνδόξως καὶ ἐπιφανέστατα μαρτυρήσας, etc. ["whom we also saw in our early years, for he remained a very long time, and at a great age was put to death, testifying most gloriously," etc.]. The period expressed by "early years" must evidently be used in the usual sense among the Greeks, for the years of early manhood, eighteen to thirty-five, especially as Irenæus himself reckons the thirtieth year to the "first period of life" (prima ætas), and extends it to the fortieth year (ii. 22, 5). As Polycarp was about a hundred years old when he suffered martyrdom at Smyrna, he would have been an aged man in 130, when we may think of Irenæus as having first seen him. Another evidence that Irenæus was born about 115, and lived in or near Smyrna between 130 and 140, is his acquaintance with Florinus. He reminds Florinus, in his letter to him, of having met him in Asia Minor, in company with Polycarp, while he (Irenæus) was still a boy (παῖς). Florinus was a court official. Lightfoot (Contemp. Rev., 1875) ventures the doubtful explanation that this does not mean that he was at the court of the then ruling emperor, but belonged to the household of Antoninus Pius, who afterwards became emperor, and was proconsul of Asia about 135. Rather must we think of one of the two visits of the Emperor Hadrian to Asia Minor, and of these the second, when he tarried for some time. Both visits occurred between 122 and 130, and the second about 129. Our assumption, then, of the year 115 as the date of Irenæus' birth falls in well with the description that he was still a boy (παῖς) at the time of his meeting with Florinus (129). The term παῖς ("boy"), however, is sometimes extended to an older period of life. Eusebius, for example, calls Origen a boy when he was a theological teacher, and certainly above eighteen (H. E., vi. 3, 3; 8, 1-5); and Constantine speaks of himself in the same way at the outbreak of the Diocletian persecution, when he was almost thirty (Euseb.: Vita Const., ii. 51, 1; comp. i. 19, 1).

Another evidence for the year 115 as the date of Irenæus' birth is the fact that he was resident in Rome as a teacher at the time of Polycarp's death (155). The account of Polycarp's martyrdom (Martyrium Polyc.), written, at the latest, before the close of the fourth century, is our credible authority on this point. In this case it draws from one of Irenæus' own works; and as, in other cases where it draws from Irenæus' great work, it is accurate, so we may expect it to be in this. This residence in Rome explains the lively interest Irenæus afterwards took in the Roman Church, and his accurate acquaintance with its traditions, as the short sojourn in 177 scarcely can. He speaks of details of the pontificates of Anicetus (d. 166) and his immediate predecessors (i. 25, 6; iii. 4, 3); and his double account of Polycarp's visit to Rome leaves upon us the impression that he accompanied him on that visit, — an impression which is confirmed by the account of Pionius.

What it was that led Irenæus to Gaul is not known. In 177 he is a presbyter at Lyons, whom the confessors then lying in prison there chose as their representative before Eleutherus, bishop of Rome (d. 189). During the persecutions at Lyons, therefore, he went to Rome (Euseb.: H. E., v. 3, 4). At his return he was elected bishop, to succeed the martyred Pothinus. He took an active part in the Quarto-deciman, or Easter controversies of the day, and wrote to Victor, bishop of Rome, in the interest of peace and liberty. Jerome (Com. in Es., xvii.) mentions cursorily that he died a martyr. Ziegler and Harvey (ii. 454) have mentioned other authorities on this point, but they are of little value. Hippolytus, Tertullian, Eusebius, and others do not speak of it. [Irenæus occupies a prominent position as a theologian, and "is the first of all the church teachers to give a careful analysis of the work of redemption, and his view is by far the deepest and soundest we find in the first three centuries" (SCHAFF: Ch. Hist., i. 297). He also occupies a very important position as a link in the chain of evidence for the authenticity of John's Gospel, himself being the disciple of Polycarp, who, in turn, was the disciple of John, as well as for the whole canon of the New Testament.]

IRENÆUS OF TYRE represented the Emperor Theodosius II. at the Council of Ephesus, 431, and espoused the cause of Nestorius, but was, for that very reason, banished from the court; and, when the Oriental bishops made him bishop of Tyre (415), he was deposed and banished by an imperial decree. Of his Greek work on the Nestorian controversy, only some fragments of a Latin translation are still extant: Variarum Patrum Epistolæ ad Concilium Ephes. pertinentes, ed. Christian Lupus, Louvain, 1682.

IRENÄUS, Christoph, b. at Schweidnitz, Saxony, d. at Horn, Austria, at unknown dates; was appointed pastor at Eisleben in 1562, and afterwards court-preacher at Weimar, but was discharged and banished in 1572, as one of the noisiest champions of Flacius; emigrated to Austria, and published a pamphlet against the first article of the Formula Concordia, 1581; and another. Vom Bilde Gottes, 1585.

IRENE, b. at Athens, 752, in very humble circumstances; d. in destitution, in the Isle of Lesbos, 803; was married in 769 to the Emperor Leo IV., and ruled over the Eastern Empire with great vigor and adroitness, from his death in 780 to her banishment in 802. Her passion was power; and for its gratification she dared any thing, from the most hideous crimes to the most ridiculous absurdities. She had her own son, Constantine VI., blinded in order to make him unfit to reign; and she proposed marriage to Charlemagne in order to unite the Eastern and Western empires. But, in spite of all her crimes and cruelties, she is a saint of the Greek Church; for she overthrew the iconoclasts, and re-established image-worship; which article see. At last, however, she was over-reached by her own treasurer, Nicephorus, deposed, and banished to the Isle of Lesbos, where she earned her living by spinning.

IRENICAL THEOLOGY, or IRENICS (from εἰρήνη, "peace"), presents the points of agreement among Christians with a view to the ultimate unity, if not organic union, of Christendom. It is the opposite of polemics, yet its legitimate successor, heir by divine right to its territory. It seeks to show how large is the common ground, and how comparatively unimportant are the points in dispute. In every age of the Church there have been peace-loving spirits; such as Gregory of Nazianzus and Chrysostom in the Nicene age; Melancthon and Butzer in the sixteenth century; Calixtus, Grotius, Baxter, Dury, Spener, Zinzendorf, and Neander in later times. The union of the various denominations in Christian work proves the existence of the irenical temper, and, so far as it is the result of a recognition of the common Christianity, it is to be applauded; but there is a sort of irenics which results from indifference, and such a temper is reprehensible.

The noble sentence of Rupertus Meldenius (often falsely attributed to Augustine) — "In necessary things, unity; in unnecessary things, liberty; in all things, charity" — has probably contributed as much as any treatise to bring about brotherhood among Christians. But there is quite a literature on the subject, of which we may mention ERASMUS: De amabili ecclesia concordia; JOHN DURY: Irenicorum tractatum Prodromus, Amsterdam, 1662; J. C. KÖCHER: Bibliotheca theologica irenica, Jena, 1761. Die Irenik is the fourth part of LANGÉ'S Dogmatik (Heidelberg, 1832); but the word is used in a broad sense, and applied to the common ground between Christian and Pagan religious thought. The existence of the Evangelical Alliance, of the Kirchentag in Germany (see art.), and the family gatherings among those holding the same polity, — such as the Pan-Presbyterian, Pan-Anglican, and Pan-Methodist councils, — are so many indications that the days of fiery debate among Protestants are over. But whether there can be peaceful, self-respecting intercourse between Protestants and Roman and Greek Catholics is a different matter. In these latter churches the elements of truth are deeply buried under sad and destructive errors; nevertheless it is sincerely to be desired that there might be more kindly feeling than now exists. Protestants cannot afford to denounce unsparingly those who hold to the distinguishing doctrines of Christianity. The Catholic is still a Christian. See HERZOG, ed. i., vol. vii. 60 sqq.; also H. G. HASSE: Grundlinien christlicher Irenik, Leipzig, 1882.

IRREGULARITIES denote, in canon law, such defects as prevent a person from receiving ecclesiastical orders. The statutes are based on 1 Tim. iii. 2 sqq., Tit. i. 6 sqq., Lev. xxi., and comprise irregularities of two kinds,—irregularitates ex defectu and irregularitates ex delicto. To the first class belong illegitimate birth, bodily deformity, uncanonical age, lack of education, the pursuit of certain professions which may make a person instrumental to the death of his fellow-men (soldiers, judges, though not physicians), etc. To the second class belong all crimes which have become public, and also some crimes, such as heresy and apostasy, though they have not become public. The Pope, however, and, in certain cases, also the bishops, have the right of giving dispensation from these irregularities. There is nothing corresponding to them among Protestants.

IRVING, Edward, an original and distinguished preacher, and the real founder of the Catholic Apostolic Church, was b. in Annan, Scotland, Aug. 4, 1792, and d. in Glasgow, Dec. 7, 1834. His father was a tanner. At the age of thirteen he went to the University of Edinburgh, and, graduating four years afterward, he took a school at Haddington, and in 1812 one at Kirkealdy. At the former place he was the tutor of Jane Welsh, afterwards the wife of Carlyle. In 1815 he was licensed to preach, and in 1818 he left the school-room to seek a pastoral settlement. After long waiting, he was thinking seriously of offering himself as a foreign missionary, when Dr. Chalmers invited him to become his assistant in Glasgow (1819). There he remained till 1822, when he was called to the Caledonian Church, London. The audience, which was at first small, grew rapidly, until it completely filled the church. A reference to Irving's eloquence by Canning on the floor of Parliament, is thought to have contributed to this result. Two years later a new church was built on Regent Square. Irving was a man of commanding form and stature (six feet two inches tall), with pale, meagre, but interesting face, coal-black hair reaching down to his shoulders, eyes from which he looked forth somewhat obliquely, but with an expression of severe, holy earnestness, not unminged with self-consciousness. His utterances were pregnant with original thoughts, but florid, and adorned by the figures of a rich imagination. Walter Scott said he missed in his sermons the chaste simplicity which is seemly in a sermon. They were unusually long.

Irving's mind was especially moving in the realm of eschatological problems, and in 1823 he published an Argument for the Judgment to come. Then he gave himself up to the study of a work on the second coming of Christ, which had appeared in Spanish under the name of Ben Ezra (1812), and which influenced him so powerfully that he published a translation of it [with an original Introduction in 1827]. In his thought upon these subjects, in which he became in an increasing measure engrossed during the remainder of his life, he found a kindred spirit in Henry Drummond, a rich banker, who afterwards took a prominent part in the Irvingite movement. Irving was in the mean time departing in some particulars from the received doctrine of the Scottish Church, and preached that the decree of salvation was a universal one; that Christ assumed human nature as it was,—corrupted by sin,—without, however, himself sinning. He also adopted the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. His theological opinions were largely influenced by Richard Hooker [“the venerable companion of my early days”]. In 1830 he was accused before the presbytery of London for his views on the humanity of Christ, and condemned; but he appealed to the General Synod.

In 1830 the news was spread abroad of the strange speaking with tongues which had occurred in widely separated parts of Scotland. Mr. Cardale, a Scotch lawyer, brought the news to London, and in 1831 his wife and a Mr. Taplin began to “prophesy,” and speak in an unknown tongue, in Irving's church. Irving fell in with the movement, heartily convinced of its scriptural basis and divine authority. Forsaken by a large part of his congregation, he began to hold services, on May 6, 1832, with eight hundred communicants, in a new place of worship. To the Scotch presbytery of Annan the synod had referred Irving's appeal, and before it he appeared. But his plea was in vain; and in 1833 he was condemned, and excluded from the Church. On his return to London, Cardale, who had been before recognized as an apostle, forbade his administering the sacraments, until, instructed by a prophecy of Taplin, he ordained Irving bishop, or “angel” of a special congregation. His health, however, was plainly undermined. In 1831 he went to Scotland, in obedience to a prophecy which predicted that he would labor there as a great prophet, and convert the masses; but he almost immediately fell a victim to consumption in Glasgow at the age of forty-two [fully convinced of the truth of his views, and confiding in the prophecy that God had a great work for him to do in Scotland, and repeating as his last words, “In life and in death I am the Lord's.” Of him his friend Thomas Carlyle, a kindred nature in the originality of his mind, imposing impressiveness of personality, and strength of will, writing in 1835 said, “His was the freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul mine ever came in contact with. I call him, on the whole, the best man I have ever found in this world, or hope to find.” This admiration suffered no abatement with years, and in 1867 he again took up his pen to commemorate Irving's strong personality. He regarded his friend as having been the victim of hallucination, but passed a high tribute (as far as he could do so in his atrabilious temper of mind) upon his purity of motives, straightforward honesty, and that “style of modesty and friendly magnanimity which no mortal could surpass.” See Mrs. OLIPHANT'S Life of Edward Irving, London (3d ed., 1865); EDW. ISAAC (יִצְחָק or יִצְחָק, "laughter"), the son of Abraham and Sarah, is a much less conspicuous and energetic personality than his father. He was an occasion to Abraham for the display of faith and obedience, in his circumcision (Gen. xxi. 4), and his willingness to offer him up as a sacrifice (Gen. xxii.). Isaac shows his dutifulness by marrying Rebekah, as Abraham wished him to do, and this when he was already forty years old. He was generous to his friends, and always yielded to his neighbors (Gen. xxvi. 20 sqq.), but won the respect of more powerful chiefs, who considered it advisable to be on good terms with the "blessed of the Lord" (Gen. xxvi. 28 sqq.). Isaac's importance consists mainly in the fact that he was the link extending the blessing of the covenant from Abraham to Jacob. Two sons were born to him late in life (Gen. xxv. 21); and although he preferred the older, Esau, he was deceived into conferring the blessing upon Jacob, the younger. A feud broke out, in consequence, between the two brothers: but the death of the father, in his hundred and eightieth year, was the occasion of their reconciliation. Isaac bowed submissively to the dispensations of Providence; and, although the weakest of the three patriarchs, he represents the pious fidelity which quietly preserves the inherited blessing. The later Jews regarded him as the prototype of the martyrs.

[Josephus says that Isaac was twenty-five years old when Abraham led him into the land of Moriah, to sacrifice him. There is no other authority for this statement. But it is evident that Isaac was at least a lad, as the father placed the wood of sacrifice on his back for him to carry (Gen. xxii. 6). He was not only a dutiful son, but a constant and gentle husband, and in all his trials seems to have been a pattern of resignation and humility. Tertullian and others of the fathers, and Fairbairn and others in modern times, regard him as a type of Christ in this respect. The discussion of the sacrifice of Isaac belongs most properly under ABRAHAM; but this much may be said here: (1) The ancient idea, universally prevalent, that the son was the property of the father, pervades the whole account of the event, as Professor Mozley specially insists. (2) It was God who commanded the deed. (3) The whole circumstance was designed to try and to strengthen the faith of Abraham. (4) It was a vivid object-lesson, warning the Hebrews for all future time against human sacrifices.] See the Histories of Israel, of Kurtz, Ewald, Hengstenberg [Stanley]; Bernstein: Ursprung d. Sage v. Abraham, Isaac, u. Jakob, 1871; [Maurice: Patriarchs and Lawgivers; and, on the sacrifice of Isaac, the excellent treatment by Professor Mozley: Ruling Ideas in Early Ages (ch. ii., iii.), New York, 1879]. v. ISAAC OF ANTIOCH. The question whether there was one or several Syriac church-writers of the name Isaac, the Monophysite, Jacob of Edessa, of the seventh century, answers by mentioning three (Wright: Catalogue ii., 603 sq.), — two "orthodox," and one "a Chalcedonian heretic;" namely (I.) Isaac of Amid, who was a pupil of Ephraem Syrus, and went to Rome during the reign of Arcadius, to see the Capitol, but was imprisoned for a long time in Constantinople, while on his return; (II.) Isaac of Edessa, who in the reign of the Emperor Zeno, and during the patriarchate of Petrus Fullo, came to Antioch, and preached against the Nestorians, deriving his text from a parrot, which could screech the trisagion, with the addition, ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς; and another (III.) Isaac of Edessa, who was orthodox in the time of Bishop Paul (512), but a Nestorian in the time of Bishop Asclepius (522).

Gennadius knows two Syriac church-writers of the name Isaac. The latter of them he calls a "presbyter of the Church of Antioch," and ascribes to him a very long life, during which he wrote much in Syriac, and finally, during the reign of Leo and Majoranus, a great elegiac poem lamenting the destruction of Antioch (459).

Bickell identifies the two first Isaacs of Jacob of Edessa with the second Isaac of Gennadius, and considers him to be orthodox; though his sermons contain no direct recognition of the synod of Chalcedon, but, on the contrary, a number of passages of rank Monophysitism, which Bickell can explain away only by assuming very large interpolations. One point, however, may be considered as settled: the book De contemptu mundi (Magna Bibl., VI., 2, 688, Col. 1618; Lugd., XI. 1019; Gallandi XII. 2) does not belong to Isaac of Antioch, but to Isaac Ninivita, who lived a century later on, and to whom it is ascribed both by the Greek edition of Nicephorus Theotokius, Leipzig, 1770, and by the Syriac and Arabian manuscripts.

ISAAC LEVITA, b. at Wetzlar 1515; studied rabbinical lore, and filled for several years the office of a rabbi, but was by the study of the Messianic prophecies led to embrace Christianity; assumed the name of Johann Isaac Levi; and was appointed professor of Hebrew and Chaldee languages at Louvain 1546, and at Cologne 1551. He wrote several works on Hebrew grammar, which were much valued in their time, also a defence of the trustworthiness of the Old Testament: Defensio Veritatis II. Sac. Script., Cologne, 1559.

ISAIAH (יְשַׁעְיָהוּ, or יְשַׁעְיָה) was the greatest of the Hebrew prophets. His name has been derived from יִשַׁע [in which case it means "Salvation of Jehovah"]. But I prefer the derivation from יִשָּׂה (="to look"), and the pronunciation יְשַׁעְיָהוּ ("Yishāyahu"), or יְשַׁעְיָה ("Yishaya"). There are only two notices of Isaiah in the Bible outside of the prophecy itself and 2 Kings xviii. sqq. In 2 Chron. xxvi. 22 it is said, "The rest of the acts of Uzziah did Isaiah the son of Amoz write." This may refer to a special work of Isaiah not preserved, or to a portion of the Book of the Kings, or to the first six chapters of the prophecy. It has afforded ground for some critics to maintain that the first five chapters date, in whole or in part, from the early years of Uzziah's reign. But it is evident that nothing definite can be drawn from the words. The second notice (2 Chron. xxxii. 32) reads, "The rest of the acts of Hezekiah . . . are written in the vision of Isaiah," etc. This undoubtedly refers to the prophecy of Isaiah, which is called the "vision of Isaiah" (i. 1). But from very ancient times many have found here a trace of another work of Isaiah. An attempt to imitate or restore such a work has come down to us in the so-called Vision of Isaiah, which is combined with an account of the prophet's martyrdom. This work was cited by Origen, and has been edited from Ethiopic manuscripts by Laurence (1819) and Dillmann (1877), under the title Ascensio Isaie. A Christian was undoubtedly its author (Dillmann); but the matter was a subject of Jewish tradition, and we meet with it in other places. It states that Isaiah suffered a violent death in the reign of Manasseh, being sawn asunder with a wooden saw (see Justin: Dial. c. Tryph., ed. Otto, p. 430), after an iron one had been tried in vain (see v. Gebhardt's edition of the Greek account of the martyrdom in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr., 1878, p. 341). Origen says the condemnation was based upon the prophet's blasphemous utterances concerning God and Jerusalem (iii. 6-12). The Gemara also says that Manasseh put Isaiah to death, but goes on to narrate that he was encompassed by a cedar, which they sawed through until Isaiah's blood flowed out like water (see also Targum in Cod. Ruchlin, at Isa. lxvi. 1). The Roman Church celebrates his martyrdom July 6; the Greek, May 9. One fact, at least, may with certainty be derived from these traditions; namely, that Isaiah died in the reign of Manasseh. Combining this fact with the statement that Isaiah prophesied "in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah" (i. 1), we conclude that his public life began some time in Uzziah's reign, and extended into that of Manasseh. More definitely (according to vi. 1) it began in the fifty-second year of Uzziah's reign, which was the year of his death. Uzziah died 758 B.C.; and, if we suppose that Isaiah was twenty years old at that time, he would have been eighty-one at the beginning of Manasseh's reign (in 696 B.C.); so that it is not necessary at all to assume that Isaiah lived to an unusually great age.

These years of Isaiah's prophetic activity (758-690 B.C.) were years of the most varied events and decisive changes. Here belong the protracted attempts of the Assyrian kings to become masters of Palestine and Syria. In the realization of this design they were hampered by the Medes and the repeated attempts of the Babylonians to throw off the Assyrian yoke, as well as by the Egyptians, whose foreign policy had begun to be aggressive. The Jews of Jerusalem were kept informed of the movements in the political world by communications from their exiled brethren in Assyria, and by the various expeditions which passed through the land; so that it is not to be wondered at that the prophet's vision took in, not only the small neighboring peoples, but also tribes living at a distance. At this period the northern kingdom was torn by tribal jealousy, and sought an alliance, now with Assyria, and now with Egypt. Uzziah, king of Judah, and his successor Jotham, seem to have essayed to hold the kingdom aloof from political complications by strengthening the defences, and accumulating war materials. But Ahaz pursued a different policy, and depended more upon the Assyrian monarch than upon Jehovah. Hezekiah, however, felt that he held his kingdom only in trust, and that Jehovah exercised supernatural agency to preserve it. The lesson these circumstances were meant to teach the people of Israel was, that they should not renounce the old faith; that Jehovah, as the God of Israel, was working out his purpose, which was to be honored everywhere on the earth, and to establish a kingdom which should not be limited to Jerusalem or Israel. The carnal hopes of those who looked for external glory for the kingdom, in spite of their sins and unrighteousness, were declared to be fallacious. The Jerusalem which opened its doors to heathen luxury, and ignored mercy, was not the Jerusalem from which the light of the knowledge of God was to beam forth to all peoples. God could, without denying his promise to Abraham, lead the people into foreign bondage, and desolate the land of Israel. The national catastrophe meant disappointment for such carnal hopes; but a remnant was to be preserved, which should be animated by a new life, and enjoy an undying glory. The house of David, which had disappeared in the darkness, was to revive again in the royal son of a virgin; and the tree of Jesse, which had been cut down, to flourish again in a new scion. To this remnant belong only those who in humble faith recognized the hand of God in the calamities of the nation, and obeyed his will. It was the invisible church, known only to God, and pervaded by moral life. For the prophet himself, the supreme idea was the separation of a congregation of the Spirit, of faith and righteousness of life.

Isaiah was led to this train of thought by his own experiences and the events narrated in his prophecy. He was a citizen of Jerusalem, had at least two sons (vii. 3, viii. 1), treated his wife and children as living pictures, and emblems of what he announced, and looked back to the vision of vi. 1 as the turning-point of his thought and life, which made it possible for him to stand firm, without distrust or fear, where all was unstable and dark (viii. 11 sq.). He regarded it as his duty to train up a body of disciples to retain their trust in God, but with resignation looked forward to the destruction of Jerusalem as an unavoidable event, and counselled unreserved submission to the Assyrian power. It becomes a matter of no surprise that a prophet who identified himself so closely with public affairs should have gathered about him a body of disciples. For these disciples, as well as for future generations, he wrote down his utterances; and there can be no doubt that he wrote much. The only question that arises is, whether the book which goes by his name has come down in its original form. In the consideration of this question, it will help us little to trace out evidences of the style and spirit of Isaiah in different parts of the book (for what was that style and spirit?) or to fall back upon certain prepossessions of what God is able to reveal through prophecy concerning the future.

All historical investigation about the authenticity of the prophecy must start from the account of Isaiah in chaps. xxxvi.-xxxix. It was placed by the editor between two series of anonymous prophecies, of which the preceding one relates the transformation of the Assyrian, and the succeeding one the transformation of the Babylonian, oppression into salvation for Judah. It is un-scholarly and arbitrary to make a break at the end of chap. xxxv. and at chap. xxxix., as though one had reached, in chap. xl. 1, the coast of an unknown land. These portions all belong together. He who has read chap. xxv. 3, 4, finds nothing strange in xl. 1; and only he who has read chaps. xxviii.—xxxix. understands xlviii. 3–11, and appreciates that one and the same prophet (xlviii. 16) distinguishes two periods in his prophetic activity, whose utterances run along parallel lines, and who, on the basis of their fulfilment in the first period, can demand obedience in the second. He who consents to recognize chaps. xxviii.—xxxv., as a whole, as Isaiah's, has no scientific ground for denying that chaps. xl.—lxvi are essentially his also. The main difficulties have been, that Cyrus is predicted by name, the overthrow of the Babylonian power, and the liberation of the Jews. But if the description of the servant of Jehovah, which suits Jesus of Nazareth best, was fulfilled, why not the prediction concerning Cyrus? The freer from prejudices the student is, the more certainly will he conclude that chaps. xl.—lxvi. contain prophecies of Isaiah, although arranged in their present form by another hand than his.

In the narrative of chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. we learn, that from the thirteenth year of Hezekiah's reign, until after Sennacherib's campaign, Isaiah stood in high esteem at court, and his word was accepted as authority. In the six prophecies of chaps. xxviii.—xxxv. the author takes the same position that the author of chaps. xxxvi.—xxxix. does concerning the invasion of Sennacherib. Chaps. xxxiv. and xxxv. have been denied to Isaiah, and been referred to the time of the exile; but this certainly would never have been done if the wilderness (xxxv.) had not been arbitrarily explained to be the wilderness lying between Babylon and Judah, and the Book of Jehovah (xxxiv. 16) been explained to be the Book of Isaiah.

The other two portions of Isaiah (ii.—xii. and xiii.—xxvii.) bear Isaiah's name. Here we find many parallels with chaps. xxviii.—xxxix. (comp. ii. 20 with xxx. 22, iii. 8–iv. 1 with xxxii. 1–20, etc.); but the plan of chaps. ii.—xii. agrees remarkably with the plan of chaps. xxviii.—xxxv. We may, it seems to me, confidently assert that all of this section belongs to Isaiah, although parts of it (v.—xii.) may not be preserved in the order in which they belong. The prophetic utterances of the second portion (xiii.—xxvii.) are distinguished by being the expression of the mind immediately under the influence of its ecstatic emotion. In the first part, the ruling thought is the preservation of David's throne and city by Jehovah, and their restoration to a position of glorious prosperity. In the second, the ruling thought is the universal kingdom of Jehovah arising out of his judgments upon the peoples, and the humiliation of all human greatness. The whole consists of prophecies of Isaiah with older fragments.

ISH'BO'SHETH (יִשְׁבֹּשֶׁת, "man of shame") was that son of Saul who survived the ruin of his father's family in the battle of Gilboa. His real name was Esh-baal (1 Chron. ix. 39), which a later generation gave up in order to avoid the use of the name Baal. Abner, Saul's captain, espoused the claims of Ishbosheth after the death of his father and three brothers, and he was proclaimed king of the trans-Jordanic tribes and all Israel, the house of Judah alone remaining true to David (2 Sam. ii. 8–10). He was about forty years old at the time. He was a timid man, and depended very largely upon Abner. The latter was called to account for his intimate relations with the king's concubine, Rizpah, but in turn reproached the king for his ingratitude, and declared he would espouse the cause of David. Ishbosheth gave up his sister Michal to David, at his request. Abner now plotted to deliver up the northern tribes to David, but was murdered by Joab (2 Sam. iii. 2–39). Ishbosheth himself was murdered by two of his officers. They cut off his head, and carried it to David. But David gave it honorable burial, and put the assassins to death (2 Sam. iv. 1-12). H. GUTHE.

ISH'MAEL (יִשְׁמָעֵאל, "God hears") was the son of Abraham and Hagar (an Egyptian slave). He was circumcised at the age of thirteen (Gen. xvii. 25), but was sent away with his mother, reluctantly, by Abraham, to satisfy Sarah, who had become jealous of the playful (wrongly translated mocking) lad (Gen. xxi. 9). The rabbins falsely explained the word, of malicious bantering treatment of Isaac. In the desert of Beersheba, Hagar received a revelation, when she and her son seemed to be destined to die for want of water. The narrative (Gen. xxi. 9 sqq.), which represents Ishmael as a tender lad, seems to be inconsistent with Gen. xvii. 25, according to which he was circumcised at thirteen, and must have been at least fifteen when he was sent away by Abraham. But the passages xxi. 14, 15, 18, do not imply that he was carried on his mother's arm, which is the popular idea. Ishmael united with Isaac in burying his father (xxv. 9), and died at the age of a hundred and thirty-seven (xxv. 17). The descendants of Ishmael were not heirs of the covenant promise, but became very numerous. Twelve Arab tribes looked back to him as their ancestor (xxv. 12-18). The general character of these descendants was indicated in the words spoken of Ishmael: "He will be a man like a wild ass, his hand against every man, and every man against him" (xvi. 12). This is a masterly characterization, to which the wandering life of those tribes, shunning every place of civilization, accurately corresponds. They have ever since lived by their flocks and their bow, in the use of which they became skilful, like their ancestor (Gen. xxi. 20; Isa. xxi. 17). They inhabited the desert east of Palestine, and stretched in a southerly direction to the Persian Gulf and over Northern Arabia. The Moslem Arabs, who speak with pride of their descent from Ishmael, say that he and his mother, Hagar, lie buried in the Caaba at Mecca. v. ORELLI.

ISIDORE MERCATOR, a fictitious person, a mere name, gotten up and put into circulation by a mistake. In the introductory matter to the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals, there occur a quotation from Isidore of Seville, and another from Marius Mercator. By a combination of those two quotations, an Isidore Mercator was made up; but he never existed. See HINSCHLUS: Decretales Pseudo-Isidorianæ, Leipzig, 1863.

ISIDORE OF MOSCOW, d. in Rome, April 27, 1463; was a native of Thessalonica; entered the Church at Constantinople, and was in 1437 made metropolitan of the Russian Church. As such he attended the Council of Florence, and labored, together with Bessarion, zealously for the union of the Eastern and Western churches. The czar, however, was dissatisfied with the result of the negotiations, imprisoned him, and condemned him to be burnt alive. But he escaped, sought refuge in Rome, and was afterwards employed by Nicholas V. as ambassador to Constantinople.

ISIDORE OF PELUSIUM, b. not after 370; d. not before 431; was a native of Alexandria, and spent most of his life as presbyter and abbot of a monastery at Pelusium. He left about two thousand letters, which represent him as one of the noblest religious characters of the age, in intimate connection with all the most prominent men of his time. In dogmatics he is orthodox, so far as an orthodoxy was established in the Greek Church at that period. But he is much more interesting as an exegete than as a dogmatist. Many of his letters are devoted to the exposition of Scriptures; and, though he does not altogether abstain from allegory, principally he places isotopia far beyond theopia. The greatest interest, however, he yields as a practical moralist. Monastic life he represents as the true ideal of Christian life; but he is by no means blind to the many peculiar dangers, illusions, and vices which may be engendered in a monastery. Collected editions of these letters appeared in Paris, 1638, 5 vols., folio, and in MIGNÉ: Patrol. Græca, vol. 58. See P. B. GLÜCK: Isidori P. Summa Doctrinæ Moralis, Wirceb., 1848. W. MÖLLER.

ISIDORE OF SEVILLE (Isidorus Hispalensis, also called Isidorus Junior, in contradistinction to Isidore of Cordova), b. 560, at Carthagena, or Seville; d. in the latter city April 4, 636; descended from a noble Roman (not Gothic) family, and was, after the early death of his parents, educated by his elder brother, Leander, Bishop of Seville, whom he succeeded in 600. For thirty-six years he governed his diocese with unflagging vigor and great dignity, presided over the synods of Seville (619) and Toledo (633), founded several institutions for the better education of the clergy, and exercised a lasting influence on Spanish legislation, civil as well as ecclesiastical. But it was as an author that he achieved his greatest fame. He wrote on nearly every branch of science then known; and, though his books are distinguished by industry and learning rather than by genius and originality, they are far from being mere compilations, and in the dark ages they were almost the only light shining. We have two old lists of his works, — one by his friend and colleague, Bishop Braulio of Saragossa; and another by his pupil, Ildefonsus of Toledo; and all the works enumerated in these lists are still extant. The principal ones are: Officiorum Libri II., a kind of ecclesiastical archæology, the first book treating of the institutions and their working-materials, the second of the officers and their functions, the whole dedicated to his younger brother Fulgentius, Bishop of Astigi; De Natura Rerum, a compendium of natural philosophy, specially edited by G. Becker, Berlin, 1857; Sententiarum sive de Summo Bono Libri III., his most important theological work, the first book treating of dogmatics, the two last of ethics; De Viris Illustribus, a continuation of Jerome and Gemadius, containing biographies of forty-six authors, — fourteen Spaniards between Hosius of Cordova and his own time, and thirty-two foreigners between Pope Xystus and Gregory the Great; Etymologia sive Origines, his most famous work, a kind of theological encyclopædia, and still of great value. Besides the works mentioned in the above lists, several of his letters have come down to us, and there circulate under his name a large number of spurious works, even poems; thus the so-called Isidorian Decretals have no connection whatever with him. The best collected edition of his works is that by Faustinus Arevalus, Rome, 1797-1803.

ISRAEL, Biblical History of. Israel's history commences with the call of Abraham, who, as the rock whence Israel was hewn (Isa. h. 1), was not only at the head of the people of the old covenant, but also of the people of the new covenant in consequence of the organic connection (Gal. iii. 29). Whilst the nations of the earth went their own ways, in which they developed their natural characteristics, in the seed of Abraham a people were to be raised, which, in their particular formation, were to be, not the result of natural development, but the product of the creative power and grace of God (Deut. xxxii. 6); thus not only forming a contrast to the nations of the world, but also containing the germ of removing this contrast, since all nations of the earth were to be blessed in the seed of Abraham (Gen. xii. 3, xviii. 18). The character and future of the people of God are depicted in the life of his patriarchs and in the promises given to them by God, who calls himself the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob (Gen. xii. 2-7, xiii. 15 sq., xv. 5, xvii. 6 sq., xviii. 18, xxii. 17, xxvi. 2 sq., xxviii. 14, xxxv. 11 sq.; Exod. iii. 6, 15).

The patriarchal period closes with the migration of Jacob and his family into Egypt, where Israel was to become a people. Here, it seems, the people were ruled by elders and other officers, who, again, were under Egyptian masters. The great mass was given to idolatry (Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7 sq., xxiii. 3, 8, 19); and the remembrance of the God of the fathers, and of the promises given to them, had to be revived first in the people. The deliverance of Israel is narrated in Exodus. To stop the rapid increase of the people, heavy tasks were laid upon them by the Egyptians. At last a royal edict was issued to kill all newly-born male children. At the point of this deepest humiliation, when the people were like a helpless child cast out in the open field, and polluted in its own blood (Ezek. xvi. 5, 6), the promise given to the fathers was to be inaugurated, and El-Shaddai was to be revealed as Jehovah. Moses is born, and raised up as a deliverer of the people. In the ten plagues the battle of the living God with the national deities is victoriously fought (Exod. xii. 12; Num. xxxiii. 4), thus foreshadowing the triumph of the kingdom of God over heathenism (Exod. xv. 11, xviii. 11). Moses leads the people, who were not yet ready for the battle with the nations of Canaan, not by the way of the land of the Philistines to Canaan (Exod. xiii. 17), but through the desert of the Sinaitic peninsula. Here they are persecuted by the Egyptians. The people are told to go on. A heavy gale drives the water back. Israel in the noise of the elements is led by its God like a flock (Ps. lxxvii. 16-20; Isa. lxiii. 11) through the Red Sea; but the Egyptians were buried by the water. "And the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord and his servant Moses" (Exod.

xiv. 31). To prepare the people for their theocratic calling, they had to remain in the desert (Deut. viii. 2-5, 14-18). The law was given by which the tribes of Israel became a holy communion, and thus "he was king in Jeshurun" (Deut. xxxiii. 5). The sacrifice of the covenant sealed the entrance of the people into the communion of the holy God. The manner in which the covenant of the law is made shows both the electing love of that God who here enters into a covenant with his people (Ezek. xvi. 8), and the holy zeal of the Holy One of Israel and of his law (Amos iii. 2). As for grace and judgment, Israel is now the privileged people.

By means of the covenant, Jehovah was to dwell among his people. But, before the laws concerning the building of the sanctuary were given, the people, in the absence of Moses, make a calf, and break the covenant. Moses causeth the idolaters to be slain, the tribe of Levi showing especial zeal for the honor of Jehovah. Moses intercedes for the people, till at last pardon is granted. The first breaking of the covenant leads to the new revelation of Jehovah as the merciful and gracious (Exod. xxxiv. 6). During the first year's residence at Sinai, the holy tabernacle is erected and dedicated, and such laws were given as would distinguish the people from the Egyptians and the Canaanitish tribes (Lev. xviii 3 sq., xx. 23 sq.). A census is then taken; and the encampment is ordered, and regulations about the tribe of Levi are made. In the second year, on the 20th of the second month, the journey from the wilderness of Sinai to the wilderness of Paran began. Moses sends spies to Canaan. Their evil report causes a general murmuring (Num. xiv. 1 sq.). As a punishment, the people had now to remain forty years in the wilderness, where Moses also died, after having appointed Joshua his successor. Joshua, by divine direction, waged a successful war against the inhabitants of the promised land, and distributed the conquered territory among the tribes of Israel. The people are warned, that, by transgressing the law of God, the same punishment will be inflicted upon them as was upon the Canaanites (Deut. viii. 19 sq.; Josh. xxiii. 15 sq.). After the death of Joshua, the people were ruled by the so-called "Shopheta," or judges. During this period, the Israelites were steeped in idolatry, for which they were punished: though, on their repentance, they were always re-instated in the divine favor through the judges whom God raised up for them. Towards the end of the so-called "time of the judges," the temporal and spiritual supreme power seems to have resided in the high priest Eli, at Shiloh; but his administration was sullied by such sins, that God allowed the Philistines to be victorious over his people, and even to capture the holy ark (1 Sam. iv.). The loss of this great national treasure seems to have at last awakened throughout all the tribes the consciousness of their forming one nation; and when, at last, the ark was recovered, Samuel, who had succeeded Eli as high priest and judge, obtained a hold upon the nation which seemed to have recognized his authority. In Samuel's time the tribes renewed their wish, formerly expressed to Gideon (Judg. viii. 22 sq.), for a king. Samuel yielded to the request in such a manner, that the theocratic principle was preserved; the Lord being now, as before, the real king of the people, whilst the king as his anointed was subject to him. Saul having been made king, Samuel retired from his activity as judge, to act solely as prophet, and preserver of the theocracy.

The history of Israel during the time of the undivided kingdom may be divided, according to the three kings, into three characteristic parts. Saul, whose endeavor it was to emancipate the kingdom from the prophetic superintendence, and hence from the subjection under the theocratic principle, succumbs in this endeavor. David, being fully alive to the idea of a theocratic king, gave his nation a capital and a religious centre, — Jerusalem, the city of God (Ps. xlv. 4), the city of the great King (Ps. xlviii. 2), which, with her mountains round about, was in itself a symbol of the divine kingdom (Ps. cxxv. 2 sq.). The institutions of the theocracy were especially developed by David by his instituting the order of the Levites and priests. As David was a type of the theocratic kingdom, he was also destined to be its bearer by means of the divine promise given to him by the prophet Nathan, according to 2 Sam. vii., which forms one of the most important turning-points in the history of the theocracy. David was succeeded by Solomon, who was destined to build the temple, from which the knowledge of the true God was to go to all nations (1 Kings viii. 11). After the death of Solomon, the decline of the Jewish nation begins. Under Rehoboam, Solomon's successor, ten tribes revolted, leaving him but Judah and Benjamin to reign over, whilst Jeroboam became king over the ten tribes. The history of the ten tribes, the kingdom of Israel, or, as it is called according to its main tribe, the kingdom of Ephraim, forms, from a theocratic stand-point, the history of a continual apostasy from Jehovah, until at last, notwithstanding all means to save it, "the sinful kingdom" (Amos ix. 8) is given to destruction, and, after an existence of two hundred years, its people are carried away as captives in 722 B.C. During these two hundred years, there reigned in Israel nineteen kings, belonging to nine different houses. The last king was Hosea, who after Samaria, "the crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim," was trodden under feet (Isa. xxviii. 3), was carried away with his people by Salmanser.

Different was the history of the kingdom of Judah, which, although smaller, was more powerful, because it was in the possession of the true sanctuary with its priests and Levites, and because its kings belonged to the royal lineage of David, which was hallowed by the memory of the glorious ancestor David, and the promise given to his posterity. Thus it happened, that of the nineteen kings who reigned during three hundred and eighty-seven years (from the time of Rehoboam to the downfall of the kingdom), there were some excellent men, in whom the idea of a theocratic kingdom was alive. Such were Asa, Jehoshaphat, Joash, Josiah, Hezekiah, who revived the religious state of the people. In the end, however, the people of Judah, too, had to submit to the divine punishment for their many backslidings, and to go into captivity to Babylon (588 B.C.).

In Babylon the people enjoyed the guidance of the prophets Ezekiel and Daniel; and the pious among them never resigned the hope of regaining their country, as predicted by Jeremiah (1.). For this future, Israel was to be preserved in the exile. In accordance herewith, we see the people settled in Babylon, forming, as it were, a nation within a nation, and not in the least amalgamating with their Gentile neighbors. After the overthrow of the Babylonian Empire by the Persians, Cyrus permitted the Jews (536 B.C.) to return to their own land, and to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple (2 Chron. xxxvi. 22 sq.; Ez. i. 1 sq.). The return from Babylon took place under the guidance of Zerubbabel, of the house of David, and Joshua the high priest. A second colony followed under Ezra, who with Nehemiah restored the law, and constituted the Jews into a compact religious community. Under them the sacred books of the Old Testament were collected, and such reforms were introduced as to make the Jews again a people of God. In the twelfth year of his administration, Nehemiah returned to the Persian court (433 B.C.). During his absence of many years, affairs fell into disorder; but on his return, after a long residence in Persia, Nehemiah reformed all these disorders, and even expelled a grandson of the high priest, Eliashib, on account of his unlawful marriage with the daughter of Sanballat (Neh. xiii. 28). This expelled priest is undoubtedly one and the same person with Manasseh, who built a rival temple on the mountain of Gerizim. Before or during the second absence of Nehemiah, the prophet Malachi lived and labored.

From the administration of Nehemiah to the time of Alexander the Great, one atrocious crime, committed in the family of the high priest, appears as the only memorable transaction in the uneventful annals of Judæa. Eliashib was succeeded in the high priesthood by Judas; Judas, by John. The latter, jealous of the influence of his brother Jesus with Bagoses, the Persian governor, and suspecting him of designs on the high priesthood, murdered him within the precincts of the sanctuary. The Persian came in great indignation to Jerusalem; and, when the Jews would have prevented his entrance into the temple, he exclaimed, "Am I not purer than the one who has been murdered in the temple?" Bagoses laid a heavy mulct on the people, — fifty drachms for every lamb offered in daily sacrifice.

At length the peace of this favored district was interrupted by the invasion of Alexander. While he was at the siege of Tyre, he sent to demand the surrender of Jerusalem. The high priest answered that he had sworn fealty to Darius, and was bound to maintain his allegiance to that monarch. After the taking of Gaza, the conqueror advanced against Jerusalem, and was met by the high priest Jaddua, himself clad in his pontifical robes, the priests in their ceremonial attire, the people in white garments. No sooner had Alexander beheld the high priest, than he was reminded of a vision he once had, and in which he saw a figure, in that very dress, exhorting him to pass over into Asia, and achieve the conquest of Persia. Alexander even worshipped the God of the Jews, entered the city, and offered a sacrifice in the temple, whilst the high priest communicated the prophecies of Daniel concerning the Greeks. Whatever truth there is in that story, certain it is, that the Jews enjoyed great liberties and privileges. Palestine now became subject to the Macedonian rule. On the death of Alexander, Judæa came into the possession of Laomedon. After the defeat of Laomedon (B.C. 320), Ptolemy, the king of Egypt, attempted to seize the whole of Syria. He advanced against Jerusalem on the sabbath, carried a great many Jews away as captives, whom he settled in Egypt. Under the Ptolemies, the Jews enjoyed great liberties and prosperity. In the time of Antioch the Great (223-187), Palestine was again the seat of war between Syria and Egypt, till at last, under Seleucus IV. (187-175), it came under the Syrian sway.

The plan of Alexander, to imbue the nations of the East with Greek culture, was continued under his successors, and by degrees Grecian influence was felt in Palestine. Thus Antigonus of Socho, the first who has a Grecian name, is said to have been a student of Greek literature. In opposition to these Hellenists, whose Judaism was of a very lax nature, there developed itself, in a quiet manner, the party of the pious, or Chasidim, which rigidly adhered to the laws of the fathers, and openly showed itself afterwards in the struggle of the Maccabees. Under Seleucus IV., as has been stated, the Jews had come under the Syrian sway. The people were governed by the high priest, and thus their condition was tolerable. When, however, the effort was made to hasten the process of Hellenizing the people, and to destroy altogether the Jewish nationality, new troubles began, which resulted in the rise of the Maccabees. Seleucus was succeeded by Antiochus (IV.) Epiphanes (175-161 B.C.). When he ascended the throne, there were at Jerusalem two parties, — a national one, adhering to the laws of the fathers; and the Greek, which endeavored to introduce Grecian manners, vices, and idolatry. Joshua, or Jason, the brother of Onias III., the high priest, by the offer of four hundred and forty talents annually as tribute, and a hundred and fifty more for permission to build a gymnasium, obtained the priesthood from Antiochus, who deposed Onias (2 Macc. iv. 7-10). Now the Greek party made rapid progress in Judæa. But Jason soon lost his high office. Menelaus, another devotee of the new ideas, simply offered Antiochus a higher tribute than Jason was paying, and got the office. The latter, however, did not leave him long in peace. While the king was absent on his second expedition against Egypt (170 B.C.), he took possession of Jerusalem for a time, with his retainers, and compelled his rival to flee to the citadel. Antiochus, professing to look upon this act of Jason as a rebellion on the part of his Jewish subjects, on his return took fearful vengeance on temple and people (1 Macc. i. 16-28; 2 Macc. v. 11-23; comp. Dan. xi. 28). In the year 168 a royal edict was issued, according to which the exercise of the Jewish religion and circumcision was interdicted, and the temple at Jerusalem was converted into one to Jupiter Olympius (1 Macc. i. 43 sq.; 2 Macc. vi. 1 sq.; Dan. xi. 30). At last the patience of the people was exhausted, and gave rise to the Maccabean struggle, which ended in the independence of Judæa. The Maccabean successors of Judas united in their own persons the offices of king and high priest (1 Macc. xiv. 28 sq.); but, though they proved valiant defenders of the country against foreign enemies, they could not prevent Palestine from being torn by interior factions. At that time the two religious factions known as Pharisees and Sadducees stood in opposition to each other. Hitherto the Maccabees had sided with the Pharisees; but the third successor of Judas Maccabæus, named John Hyrcanus, being offended by the Pharisees, broke with them, and prepared great troubles for his descendants. His eldest son's (Aristobulus) reign was but short; but, when his second son (Alexander Jannæus), ascended the throne, he was so annoyed by the popular party of the Pharisees, that, before his death, he felt obliged to advise his wife Alexandra to join the Pharisees, and abandon the Sadducees entirely. Through this policy, peace was restored, and Hyrcanus II. was made high priest while Alexandra occupied the throne. After Alexandra's death (70 B.C.) a deadly strife began between the two sons (Hyrcanus and Aristobulus) for the sovereignty. In the course of this struggle both parties appealed to Pompey, who at once invaded Palestine, and, after having taken Jerusalem and its temple, appointed Hyrcanus high priest, limiting his dominion, however, to Judæa alone, and taking his brother Aristobulus, with his two sons, as captives to Rome. Alexander, one of the sons of Aristobulus, managed to escape, and tried to raise the standard of revolt against Hyrcanus, but with no success. Hyrcanus was recognized as high priest; and Antipater, for services rendered to Julius Cæsar, was appointed procurator over Judæa. Cæsar also granted the Jews many privileges, and at his death they were among the first to mourn for him (Suetonius: Cæsar, c. 84.). Antipater made his son Phasael governor of Jerusalem, while he placed his son Herod over Galilee. The latter soon succeeded, by the help of the Romans, in becoming king of the Jews (39 B.C.). Under him Aristobulus, the last of the Maccabæans, acted as high priest; but he was put to death. Herod was succeeded by his son Archelais, who, after a few years' reign, was deposed (6 A.D.), and Judæa became part of a Roman province with Syria, but with its own procurator residing at Cæsarea. When Quirinius took the census, he succeeded in quelling a general revolt; but the fiercer spirits found a leader in Judas the Galilean, who, fighting for the theocratic principle (according to the notions of the Pharisees) against the Roman yoke, kindled a fire in the people, which, though often quenched, was not extinguished. Side by side with the deeds of God, who now sent to his people the promised Messiah to build up the messianic kingdom, we now see, as if caricaturing God's word and promise, a wild, demagogical power, which leads the people, after having rejected the invitation of the Good Shepherd, to utter destruction. In quick succession the Roman governors follow each other. In quicker succession followed the high priests, with the exception of Caiaphas, who retained his office during the long reign of Pontius Pilate (26-36 A.D.). The principle of interfering as little as possible with the religious liberty of the Jews was rudely assailed by the Emperor Caligula, who gave orders that his image should be set up in the temple of Jerusalem, as in others elsewhere. It was entirely through the courage and tact of the Syrian governor Petronius, that the execution of these orders was temporarily postponed until the emperor was induced by Agrippa I. to withdraw them. Caligula soon afterwards died; and under the rule of Agrippa I., to whom the government of the entire kingdom of his grandfather Herod was committed by Claudius, the Jews enjoyed much prosperity. In every respect the king was all they could wish. At the time of his death (in 44 A. D.: compare also Acts xii. 23), his son Agrippa being too young, Judæa was again ruled by Roman governors; viz., Cuspius Fadus (from 44, under whom Theudas played his part: Joseph., Ant. XX. 5, 1), Tiberius Alexander (the nephew of Philo, till 48), Cumanus (48-52), and Felix (52-60). Felix, who has the honor to be pilloried in the pages of Tacitus (Hist. 5, 9), contrived to make the dispeace permanent (Joseph., Wars II. 13). He was followed by Festus (60-63). At the death of the latter, the high priest Ananus, a cruel Sadducee, caused the death of James the Just, and of other Christians. Festus' successor, Albinus (64), caused great dissatisfaction; and, under Florus, disturbances in the streets of Jerusalem and Cæsarea were of frequent occurrence, and massacre followed upon massacre, until Cestius Gallus, the prefect of Syria, moved his troops towards Jerusalem. In Jerusalem a war party, called "Zealots," prepared for the defence of the temple. The peace party tried in vain to pacify the insurgents, and in vain also were all attempts at peacemaking on the part of Agrippa II. Judæa was at open war with the Emperor Nero, who sent the first general of the empire, Vespasian, to subjugate Palestine. Into all parts of Palestine prominent men were sent to manage the affairs; and thus Josephus, the Jewish historian, was intrusted with the defence of Galilee. While Galilee and other provinces fell into the hands of Vespasian, Jerusalem awaited the enemy, but not with the whole united strength, but torn up into three factions, under John of Gischala, Eleazar, and Simon, son of Gioras. At length, however, Vespasian, who in the mean time had become emperor, sent his son Titus to reduce Jerusalem. Titus besieged Jerusalem, took the temple, and burned it to the ground Aug. 10, 70 A. D. The history of the world knows of no other catastrophe so mortal as was the combat of the Jewish people with the Roman power. The presentiment of the heathen Titus, that a special divine judgment had taken place, was but the fulfilment of the word of the Lord. Jerusalem fell, because it knew not the time of her visitation (Luke xix. 41). Since these last words were spoken by her rejected Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 37 sq.), Jerusalem and the defiled temple are dedicated to destruction: the kingdom of God shall be taken from the Jewish people, and given to the heathen (Matt. xxi. 43). From that time on, till the final ruin, the elected residue is gathered from the ancient covenant people, which is to form the root of the new congregation of salvation, the branch into which the believing Gentiles were to be grafted. This congregation is now the Israel of God, which assumes all the prerogatives of the latter, becoming "the chosen generation, the royal priesthood, the holy nation, the peculiar people" (1 Pet. ii. 9), to which belong the divine promises. And yet Israel according to the flesh, in whom God has shown, before all nations, how he loves and how he punishes, is not yet excluded from the realm of promise. Concerning the same, the old law remains in force, that it cannot perish, even in the banishment and dispersion, but is spared rather to an induction into the divine kingdom. Israel's captivity and Jerusalem's destruction shall last until the times of the nations of the earth are full. And when the fulness of the Gentiles has come in (Rom. xi. 25), Israel as a whole shall receive the gospel, and see his Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 39); "for the gifts and calling of God are without repentance" (Rom. xi. 29).

ISRAEL, Post-Biblical History of. With the destruction of Jerusalem, Israel, or the Jews as this people is generally called since the return from Babylon, were without metropolis and without temple. For a time Jamnia was chosen as the seat of the college of learning, and Gamaliel II. was chosen its spiritual head. The religious life of the Jews was re-organized, and the decisions of Jamnia were carried to the Jews of the diaspora. On the ruins of the city and the temple, the Pharisaic Judaism, which rests upon the law and the school, celebrated its triumph. National fanaticism, indeed, was not yet extinguished; but it burnt itself completely out in the vigorous insurrection led by Bar-Cocheba, the pseudo-Messiah, in which nearly six million Jews lost their lives, together with the famous Rabbi Akiba, one of the pseudo-Messiah's most ardent adherents (135 A.D.). Hadrian, to annihilate forever all hopes of the restoration of the Jewish kingdom, accomplished his plan of establishing a new city on the site of Jerusalem, which he called Elia Capitolina. An edict prohibited any Jew from entering the new city, on pain of death. More effectually to keep them away, the image of a swine was placed over the gate leading to Bethlehem. The seat of the spiritual head, or patriarch, was now transferred from Jamnia to Tiberias, where it remained till the year 129. When, in the fifth century, Palestine ceased to be the centre of Judaism, Babylonia took her place. From the period of the exile a numerous and coherent body of Jews had continued to subsist there. The Parthians and Sassanids granted them self-government. At their head was a native prince, or Resh Galutha, who, when the Palestinian patriarchate came to an end, was left without a rival. The schools there at Pumbeditha, Sora, and Nahardea, prospered greatly, vied with those of Palestine, and continued to exist after the cessation of the latter, when the patriarchate became extinct; thus they had the last word in the settlement of doctrine, which was embodied in the celebrated Babylonian Talmud, compiled about the year 500.

In the Roman Empire, after the reign of Vespasian and Hadrian, the position of the Jews was not only tolerable, but in many respects prosperous. Their position changed entirely after the conversion of Constantine. The Jews, who formerly had taken a great share in the persecutions of the Christians by Pagan Rome, became now a condemned and persecuted sect. A gleam of hope shone upon them in the days of Julian the Apostate; but they were only the more ill treated under his Christian successors, especially by Justinian.

At the beginning of the seventh century, with the rise of Mahomet, better times were ushered in for the Jews, notwithstanding the fact that they were expelled from Arabia by Omar; but outside of Arabia, in Mauritania and Spain, they thrived especially well. In the latter country their prosperous condition lasted so long as the Catholic Church did not dominate the State. In the Germanic states which arose upon the ruins of the Roman Empire, the Jews fared well on the whole, especially under the Frankish monarchy. The Carolingians helped them in every possible way, making no account of the complaints of the bishops.

Meanwhile the Church was not remiss in seeking constantly repeated re-enactments of the old laws which she enacted in former years. Gradually she succeeded. The feudal system, and the crusading spirit of the middle ages, only tended to lower the position of the Jews in Christian society. Not only was intercourse with them shunned; they were also obliged to wear a little wheel upon their dress as a mark. Outbreaks against the Jews were of repeated occurrence; and though popes and other prelates set themselves against such persecutions, yet the popular aversion against the Jew was too strong. It was not only religious hate, which was accompanied by repeated deadly outbreaks, — especially when the Black Death, in 1348, was raging, and Jews were blamed for it, on the notion they had poisoned the wells and rivers, — but also worldly considerations. The Jews, having at that time the control of financial affairs in their hands, used it without scruple, and thus made themselves still more repugnant to the Christians than they previously were by means of their religion. Thus it came about, that, where the spirit of toleration was exhausted, the Jews had to leave the country. England was the first kingdom in which this occurred, under Edward I. in 1290; France followed in 1395; Spain and Portugal, in 1492 and 1495. In this way it happened that Germany, Italy, and adjoining districts became the chief abode of the Jews. In the German Empire the Jews, as Kammerknechte, or servants of the imperial chamber, enjoyed protection of person and property for a tax paid to the emperor. In some respects they maintained a kind of autonomy, and settled civil affairs among themselves by the dicta of their rabbins. And though they had repeatedly to suffer from the popular rage, which often marked its course by bloodshed and desolation, yet the Jews maintained their ground on account of the political confusion then prevailing in Germany; and, if they were expelled from one locality, they readily found refuge in some other.

At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Western Europe was almost depopulated of Jews. Most of them lived in Germany, Italy, Poland, and in the Osmanic and African states. In small numbers they were found in India, Malabar, Cochín-China, Bokhara, China, and Abyssinia. Very great was their number in Turkey, where many European exiles sought refuge, especially from Spain, on account of persecution under Ferdinand and Isabella. Very large congregations were soon formed at Constantinople, Smyrna, Damascus, and other places.

The Reformation opened a new and better era to the Jews. Not that the Reformers personally were much more tolerant towards them than the Roman-Catholic hierarchy; but the very fact that the boasted unity of the Church had received a serious blow made people more inclined to toleration. The fury of persecution, formerly directed against the Jews, was now directed against heretics in the bosom of Christianity itself; and whilst the Jews were left alone, yet the anathema of public contempt, humiliation, and exclusion from every public or private connection, still lay heavily upon them. The period which intervened between the Reformation and the French Revolution was of a monotonous character to the Jews, with the exception of a few instances which attracted public attention. Thus in 1677 rose the pseudo-Messiah, Sabbathai Zevi, born at Smyrna in 1625, and died at Belgrade, as a Mohammedan. Notwithstanding the apostasy of this pretender, there were some who upheld his claims even after his death, and asserted that he was still the true Messiah, and that he was to return from the dead. A few years later, this heresy appeared under a new form, and under the guidance of two Polish rabbis, who travelled extensively to propagate Sabbathaism, which had its followers from Smyrna to Amsterdam, and even in Poland. In 1722 the whole sect was solemnly execrated in all the synagogues of Europe. In 1750 Jacob Frank, a native of Poland, made his appearance, and caused a schism in the synagogues of his native country, and founded the sect of the "Frankists." The most extraordinary movement which occurred among the Jews in the eighteenth century was that of the sect termed the "Chassidim" (see art.).

Contemporary with the rise and progress of this sect, there lived in Germany the famous Moses Mendelssohn (see art.), b. in 1729 at Dessau, d. at Berlin, 1786,—a man whose remarkable talents and writings constituted an era in the history of the modern Jews. He destroyed all respect for the Talmud and rabbinic writings among the Jews who approved his opinions, and thus rendered them dissatisfied with their religion, and drove them, on the one hand, either to the adoption of total infidelity, or of Christianity, on the other, as in the case of his own children.

Six years before Mendelssohn's death, Joseph II. ascended the throne of Austria, and issued in 1782 his edict of toleration, which marked for the Jews the beginning of a new era in the German Empire, as well as in the other Austrian countries. A century before, the Elector of Brandenburg, Frederick William, had already paved the way for this change. Peter the Great admitted them into Russia; England received them again; the Netherlands, Denmark, and Hamburg were opened to them; whilst in North America and Brazil they built colonies. The example set in 1783 by the American Union, which allowed to her citizens the free exercise of their religion, without respect of creed, was followed by the French Revolution, which in 1791 declared the Jews French citizens. In 1796 they were emancipated in the Netherlands; in 1848, in Germany. At present the Jews occupy the most prominent positions everywhere. As for the Jews in general, they divide themselves into the Chassidim, or strict rabbinic Jews; the Karaites (see art.), or the Protestants of Judaism, who took their rise in the eighth century, rejecting entirely the authority of tradition; the orthodox Jews; and the reformed, or liberal Jews. All these parties are separated from Christendom by their religion. The emancipation of the Jews, it is true, has brought about many changes among them. They imitate the manners of the Gentiles, not only in their social position, but also in religious matters. Their synagogue choirs are mostly composed of Christian singers. They have the rite of confirmation; they use organs; and the service, with a few exceptions, is held in the language of the country. But all these imitations bring them not nearer to the Church, the founder of which they regard as an Essene, and not as the Christ, the promised Messiah. Whatever the destinies of this people in the hands of Providence may be, certain it is that God has great things in store for the Jews, for whose conversion the Church has to pray till Jesus is all in all.

According to calculations published in 1881, there are 5,166,326 Jews in Europe, 402,996 in Africa, 182,847 in Asia, 307,963 in America, and 20,000 in Australia; or 6,080,132 Jews in the world, exclusive of 200,000 Falashas (Appletons' Annual Cyclopaedia for 1881, p. 456). ITALY, Ecclesiastical Statistics of. The kingdom of Italy comprises an area of 113,000 square miles, with a population of 28,000,000, of which 100,000 are Greek Catholics, 96,000 Evangelical Christians, 36,000 Jews, and 25,000 Mohammedans, while all the rest belong to the Roman-Catholic Church.

The Roman-Catholic Church.—Sept. 20, 1870, the temporal power of the Pope glided quietly out of existence; but May 13, 1871, the legislative assembly of the kingdom of Italy passed a law guaranteeing the independence of the Pope and the holy see. The person of the Pope is sacred and inviolable, like that of the king. The honors of sovereignty are due to him, and he is allowed to keep a body-guard. The State pays him annually a pension of 3,225,000 liras, which, however, he has hitherto declined to receive; and the palaces of the Vatican and the Lateran, and the villa of Castle Gandolfo, with their libraries and collections, are declared to be the property of the holy see, inalienable, free of taxation, and exempted from expropriation. The Italian Government furthermore guarantees the freedom and independence of the conclave, and of all ecclesiastical officers in the execution of their official functions. In the city of Rome, all seminaries, academies, and colleges for the education of the clergy, remain under the special authority of the Pope; and the State has renounced its right of appointment and nomination to the higher ecclesiastical benefices. No Italian bishop is compelled to take the oath to the king, and no royal placet is necessary to the execution of a purely ecclesiastical act. The law is very liberal, and ought to be so on account of the anomalous character of the situation. Meanwhile the Pope resides in the Vatican, keeping a court of about eighteen hundred persons, and working a huge machine (see CURIA) for the government of the Roman-Catholic Church at large.

Another question presenting nearly as great difficulties as that of abolishing the temporal power of the Pope, though preserving his spiritual sovereignty, arose from the monastic orders. In the kingdom of Sardinia the law of May 29, 1855, dissolved all religious orders not engaged in preaching, teaching, or nursing the sick, abrogated all chapters of collegiate churches having no cure of souls, and abolished all private benefices for which the holders paid no service; and thus 274 monasteries with 3,733 monks, and 61 convents with 1,756 nuns, were closed, and 2,722 chapters and private benefices were disestablished. As the union of Italy progressed, the same principles were applied in Umbria, the Marches, Naples, and Rome, by the laws of July 7, 1866, Aug. 15, 1867, and June 19, 1873. When the census of 1866 was taken, there still existed in Italy, outside of the city and province of Rome, 32 orders of monks, with 3,874 brethren in 625 monasteries, and an annual income of 6,714,371 liras; 31 orders of nuns, with 8,264 sisters in 537 convents, and an annual income of 7,008,624 liras; 10 mendicant orders, with 10,818 brethren in 1,209 monasteries; and 3 orders of mendicant nuns, with 876 sisters in 43 convents. When the census of 1871 was taken, there were in the province and city of Rome 474 monasteries (311 for monks and 163 for nuns), with 8,151 inmates (4,326 male and 3,825 female), and an annual income of 4,780,891 liras. An idea of the benefit which the State or the people derived from these institutions may be formed by observing, that, of the thirty-two monastic orders having an independent fortune, ten were devoted to teaching, one to nursing the sick, and the rest to a contemplative life; but of the annual revenue of 6,714,371 liras, only 451,732 liras were spent for educational purposes, and 151,401 liras on the sick, while the rest was eaten up by contemplation. The legislation since 1855 has disestablished about fifty thousand ecclesiastical foundations, which rendered no other service than supporting idleness, ignorance, and vice. From the closed monasteries the monks and nuns returned into society with the full rights and duties of citizens; but each of them received a pension varying from one hundred to six hundred liras, according to age and other circumstances. The confiscated estates became State domains, but were gathered into a special fund, from which the ecclesiastical pensions, the expenses of public education, etc., are paid. The capital value of the property which has thus accrued to the domain since 1855 is estimated at 839,776,076 liras, yielding an annual revenue of 30,969,165 liras.

The Roman-Catholic Church in Italy numbers 265 episcopal dioceses (of which eleven archiepiscopal and sixty-three episcopal sees are independent of any metropolitan authority, and stand immediately under the Pope); and 21,980 parishes, which vary very much in size, from fourteen thousand to one hundred souls. The parish priest is always landholder, and derives his principal income from his parochi; but the State spends yearly about one million liras in augmentation of the parochial stipends. The rite employed is the ordinary Latin rite, though other rites are recognized. Thus the Albanians in the southern provinces use the Greek rite and the Greek language in their worship, and their priests are allowed to marry. Other differences of rite occur among the Armenians in Venice and in the church of Milan.

The Evangelical Church is represented in Italy by the old and celebrated Church of the Waldensians, the Free Italian Church, and various more or less successful endeavors by the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Episcopalians, and other denominations.

By a decree of Feb. 17, 1818, religious liberty was established in the kingdom of Sardinia. The Church of the Waldensians consisted at that time of fifteen congregations up among the mountains, and one in Turin. But it immediately took on a considerable missionary activity, and afterwards formed 39 new congregations in various parts of Italy, with 31 ordained pastors, 23 evangelists, 41 teachers, 2,813 communicants, and about 400 catechumens, 1,684 pupils in the primary schools, and 1,636 in the Sunday school. It has a theological school, with three professors and eighteen students, founded in 1855 at Torre Pellice, but removed in 1862 to Florence. Before the establishment of this school the Waldensian ministers were educated at Lausanne or Geneva.

The Free Italian Church was founded in Milan (1870) by twenty-three congregations, which had been formed independently of the Waldensian evangelization. It numbers (report of 1881) now 36 congregations, with 13 ordained ministers, 16 evangelists, 21 teachers, 1,750 communicants, 284 catechumens, 1,250 pupils in the week-day schools, 657 pupils in the Sunday schools, and a theological school with four professors and ten students in Rome. [Gavazzi is one of the leading spirits in this church.] The Methodists have in their northern missionary district 28 congregations, and 15 in their southern district, and in all 22 ordained preachers. [The American Methodists who began missionary efforts in Italy in 1873, have 15 Italian preachers, one American missionary (Dr. Vernon), 708 church-members, and 311 probationers. The Presbyterians work in Italy through the Waldensian and Free churches. The Church of England has three congregations in Rome. Dr. Robert Nevin is rector of the American Episcopal Church in Rome, which has the largest Protestant house of worship, built by his own exertions. The American Baptists have had an Italian mission since 1870, and now have nine preachers, and 175 communicants, with congregations at Milan, Rome, Naples, Venice, etc. The English Baptists have eleven preachers, and began their mission in 1871.]

ITALY, Protestantism in. Every now and then the noblest and loftiest spirits produced by the Italian people—Dante, Petrarca, Laurentius Valla, Savonarola, Ægidius of Viterbo, Picus de Mirandola—burst out in open denunciation of the corruption of the Church of Rome, and demanded reforms. Councils, such as those of Pisa and Constance, supported the movement; and popes, such as Adrian VI. and Paul III., took the lead of it, or at least made people believe that they did. The reforms demanded were purely moral, however, not doctrinal: it was a reform of the clergy, rather than a reform of the Church, which was intended. Thus the order of the Theatines was founded in 1521 by Cajetan of Threne and Bishop Caraffa of Theate (afterwards Paul IV.), for the express purpose of reforming the clergy; but at the same time the Theatines were the bitterest enemies, the most furious persecutors, of the Reformation; and, as soon as it became apparent that a moral reform could not be accomplished, unless on the basis of a doctrinal reform, the council and the Pope, the monk and the prelate, at once agreed in calling in the Inquisition for the purpose of stamping out "heresy." In Italy all the necessary materials for a moral reform were absolutely lacking. The revival of letters, which had been more vigorous there than in any other country, turned out to be essentially a revival of Paganism, and resulted in a religious indifferentism and cynical scepticism, which might have a great talent for railing at vices, but certainly showed very little power to correct them. But, where such a spirit is reigning, no moral reform is possible: there the reform must begin with the spirit, the idea, the doctrine. In the case of Italy, evidences were plenty and striking. The consilium novemvirale, consisting of Contarini, Pole, Caraffa, Sadolet, Fregoso, Giberti, Badia, Cortese, and Alcandre, which Paul III. organized in 1536 for the purpose of reforming the chancery, the episcopacy, the morals of the clergy, the penitential, the administration of the rota, etc., barely escaped having its report put on the Index; for it was, indeed, impossible to explain the causes of the reigning evils, and indicate remedies against them, without touching upon questions of doctrine. But a doctrinal reform the Church of Rome neither would nor could consent to; for it surely meant a revision and consequent alteration of her whole social and political position. As soon, therefore, as Paul III. came to understand that this cry for reform, which had arisen spontaneously in Italy, and earlier there than in any other country, was in principle identical with the Reformation in Germany, he handed over the whole case to the Inquisition (established by a bull of June 21, 1842); and, two generations later on, every trace of Protestantism was wiped off from the face of Italy.

In Northern Italy the transition from a moral to a doctrinal reform took place under the influence of the Reformation in Germany. The works of the reformers—Luther, Melancthon, Zwingli, and Butzer—were early introduced into Venice, often under fictitious names. Thus the Loci communes of Melancthon circulated under the name of Hippophilo de Terra Negra. In 1520 the writings of Luther were seized and burnt by the Patriarch Contarini, which, however, did not prevent them from being clandestinely reprinted, and widely read. In 1543 Luther was in actual correspondence with the Venetian Government through Baldassari Altieri, secretary to the English embassy in Venice. The rapid spread of Protestantism in the territory of the Republic during the period 1520–42 was, to a great extent, due to the indefatigable exertions of Altieri, supported by the fervent preachings of a number of monks, and the translation of the Bible by Bruciolini, a disciple of Savonarola. Of course the Roman curia protested in the most vehement manner. But the Venetian ambassador, Tiepolo, had the cynical frankness to tell Pius V. to his face, that toleration or intolerance with respect to heretics was to the Republic merely a question of policy. And so it was. As soon as the Republic needed the friendship of the Pope, the Inquisition was established, Altieri was banished, fifteen hundred and forty-five processes were instituted against Protestants of the higher classes, while those of the lower were tracked like game on the Lido. The archives of the Inquisition contain the acts of two hundred and forty-three processes instituted between 1541 and 1592, some against members of the first families,—the Giustiniani, Dandolo, Falieri, etc.,—twenty-six against ecclesiastics; but thousands of persons were quietly burnt, drowned, decapitated, tortured, or exiled. The same proceedings were enacted throughout the whole territory of the Republic, in Vicentia, Padua, Berganso, Treviso, Udino, etc. Into Lombardy—bounded north by Switzerland, and west by Piedmont—Protestantism penetrated in a double stream; and in the beginning of the sixteenth century several of the Lombard cities maintained connections with Geneva, Zürich, and Wittenberg. In 1521 verses were composed and sung in Milan in honor of Luther; and Gerdes tells us, that in 1524 the Reformation was preached there with great success. In 1530 Curio fled from Piedmont, and found refuge in Milan, though he had openly embraced the Reformation; and in 1555 Paleario could still write his Actio in Pontifices Romanos undisturbed in Milan. The year previous, Archbishop Arcimboldi forbade the reading of the Scriptures in his diocese, and stipulated that a part of the confiscated property of heretics should be given to the informers and spies of the Inquisition. But Arcimboldi was a contemptible person: he could be cruel, but he could also be cowed. Quite otherwise with his successor, Carlo Borromeo (1539–84). He was as sincere as he was passionate. His merciless severity has something noble in its motives, which commands respect. He was able, chiefly by the aid of the Inquisition and the Jesuits, not only to cleanse Milan thoroughly from heresy, but also to make it a barrier against all influence from Germany. In Piedmont there existed at the beginning of the sixteenth century numerous evangelical congregations founded by missionaries of the Waldensian Church (which see). But also the influence from Geneva and Wittenberg was considerable. When Calvin, in 1536, passed through the valley of Aosta, he found many adherents; and in 1560 it was said, even of the Princess Margaretta, that she was a secret Calvinist. But in Piedmont, as in Venice, political regards compelled the government to yield to the Pope's demands. The Inquisition was established; and in cases in which it was found impossible to apply this instrument,—namely, when the question was not about individual persons, but about whole families, towns, districts,—the children were by force taken from the parents, and placed in convents, to be educated in the Roman-Catholic faith.

In Southern and Central Italy the movement was started by the circle of eminent men which formed in Naples (1535–40) around the Spaniard

Valdez; but it was in many ways nourished, both through direct communication with the German reformers, and by the existence of evangelical congregations founded by Waldensian missionaries. Valdez fled from Spain on account of a satirical dialogue he wrote against the clergy. In Naples he lived very quietly, and he died before the persecutions began. But he exercised a considerable influence, both by his writings, and still more through his friends.—Bernardino Ochino from Siena, general of the Capuchins, a celebrated preacher, who formed congregations at Venice, Florence, Siena, and Perugia, but fled to Geneva, Aug. 23. 1542; Peter Martyr Vermigli, professor of theology, first at Naples, afterwards at Lucca, strongly influenced by the reformers of Geneva, whither he fled a few days later than Ochino; Carnesecci, who had been secretary to Clement VII., and twice escaped from the grip of the Inquisition (1546 and 1559), but finally fell a victim to the unconquerable hatred of Pius V.; and the loose policy of Cosmus of Medici (1567); Flaminio, author of the beautiful book, Del Benefizio di Gesù Christi confesso, which the Inquisition hunted after with nearly as much appetite as after the Bible; and Caraaciolo, who became the founder of the Italian congregation at Geneva. When the Inquisition began its work, it found large congregations formed by these men in nearly all the great cities of Central and Southern Italy; and, what was still worse, in many cases it found the very officers of the Church most strongly affected by the disease it was sent to extirpate. In the environs of Naples the bishops of Chironia, Sorrente, Isola, Caiazzo, Mola, Civita di Penna, Policastro, Reggio, etc., read the works of Luther, and were more or less infected with Lutheranism. Most of them recanted immediately; but some of them it was necessary to punish. Yea, at some places the Inquisition had to supplement itself with laymen in order to be sure of having no heretics among its own members. With the chiefs, however, the Inquisition had comparatively easy work. They often succeeded in escaping to foreign countries. Geneva, London, and Craeow swarmed with Italian Protestants. In such cases the Inquisition had only to burn their books,—Florence was especially prominent by its autos-da-fé of that kind,—and to prohibit all further communication with the mother-country, in which respect Lucca proved herself most sagacious. But the task became rather difficult when the question was about whole congregations. In Calabria the Waldenses had occupied the villages of Guardia, San Sisto, Vaccarizzo, Rosa, Argentina, San Vincenzo, and Montalto since 1315. What was to be done in such a case? Well, the villages were razed to the ground, and sixteen hundred persons were carried into the donjons of Naples, whence some of them were exported to the Saracen slave-markets, while others were removed to the rowing-banks of the Spanish galleys (1558–60). In Rome new prisons had to be built; but the attendance which the Pope could spare for the inmates was not sufficient to prevent them from being occasionally starved to death. No day passed away without its sacrifice of human flesh. On one occasion eighty-eight victims were despatched in one day by one executioner and with one knife. After working in this manner for about half a century, the Inquisition succeeded in completely silencing Protestantism in Italy; and nothing further was heard from this movement until the fourth and fifth decade of the present century. See arts. WALDENSAINS, and ITALY, ECCLESIASTICAL STATISTICS OF.

ITINERANCY. Our Lord had no settled place of abode and no fixed congregation. The apostles similarly went from place to place, at least during a portion of their ministry. Methodists thus find Scripture precedent for their peculiar system of ministerial appointments. The ministers of this denomination, in the settled parts of this country, are assigned to churches by the bishops, but are not allowed to hold the same charge more than three consecutive years; then they are put over another church in the same conference. In this way they move from place to place in the conference. In England and upon our frontiers, the circuit-system prevails; i.e., a number of churches or preaching-places are served by the same set of preachers in rotation. There can be no question of the immense value of this itinerant system in the past history of the Methodist Church. It was started by John Wesley, who, as early as his third conference (May, 1746), assigned the lay-preaching to certain fields of labor called then and now "circuits." But, owing to the altered circumstances of the church, the question of abolishing the system, or greatly modifying it, has been of late very earnestly debated. The weight of opinion seems to be against any essential change. See METHODISM.

ITURÆA, the country of the Ituræans, was at one time identified with Aurantis, or Trachonitis (Eusebius, Jerome, and others), in direct contradiction of Luke iii. 1. Modern archæologists have placed it in the plains of north-eastern Galilee, or on the eastern spurs of the Hauran Mountains; but neither of these locations agrees with the notes of ancient writers. As the Ituræans were a nomadic tribe, they may have lived at various places in various times. They descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31), and, together with other Arabian tribes, they fought with the Israelites settled east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 18-22). Aristobulus I. conquered them (105 B. C.); but Pompey was the first who really succeeded in subduing them. Afterwards they are often mentioned as excellent soldiers, serving as archers in the Roman army. Their country often changed dominion, until Claudius definitively incorporated it with Syria. IVES, Rt. Rev. Levi Silliman, D.D., LL.D., b. at Meriden, Conn., Sept. 16, 1797; d. at Manhattanville, New-York City, Oct. 13, 1867. He came of Presbyterian stock; but in 1819 he became an Episcopalian, and in 1823 he was ordained priest, and settled over Trinity Church, Philadelphia. In 1831 he was consecrated bishop of North Carolina, and displayed zeal and ability in the religious education of the slaves. He was a High Churchman, and sided with the Oxford Tractarians. In December, 1852, he visited Rome, and there joined the Roman Church. His friend and confessor, Dr. Forbes, went with him, but returned again to the Episcopal Church. Ives was deposed from his bishopric (Oct. 11, 1853), but made professor of rhetoric in St. Joseph's (R.C.) Theological Seminary at Fordham, N.Y. Among his last labors was the founding of the Protectory for Roman-Catholic children at Westchester, N.Y., and of the Manhattanville College, where he taught. He published an apology for his secession, The Trials of a Mind in its Progress to Catholicism, London and Boston, 1854.

IVO OF CHARTRES (Yvo Carnotensis), b. about 1040 in the diocese of Beauvais; d. at Chartres, Dec. 23, 1116; studied humaniora and philosophy in Paris, and theology in the monastery of Bec, where he had Lanfranc for teacher, and Anselm for a schoolmate, and was appointed director of the monastery of St. Quentin in 1075, and bishop of Chartres in 1090. He was implicated in grave controversies, first with his predecessor, Gaufrid, who had been deposed by the Pope on account of simony, but still found many adherents in France, and afterward with Philippe I., who had repudiated his legitimate spouse, Bertha, and entered into an adulterous connection with Bertrade of Anjou. But the most interesting point in his life is the stand-point he occupied in the great contest concerning the right of investiture (see his letters 63, 232, 236, and Baronius ad ann. 1106 and 1111). He denounced with great frankness the faults and failings of the Roman curia, and is often represented as one of the principal champions of Gallicanism. On the other hand, when the extreme hierarchal party, indignant at the concessions which Paschalis II. had made to the emperor, tried to have these concessions condemned by a general council as heretical, Ivo interfered, and defended Paschalis. Moderation and a deep sense of equity distinguished his views, and governed all his actions. Of his works the two most important are his collections of canons: Decretum or Decretorum Opus in seventeen books, and Pannormia in eight books. His letters, numbering two hundred and eighty-seven, have also great interest for the history of his time. Whether the Breve chronicon de rebus Francorum is by him is uncertain; but the Historia ecclesiastica was written by Hugo of Fleury. A collected edition of his works (except the Pannormia), Paris, 1647, has been reprinted by Migne, Patr. Latin., tom. 157, 161. Biographies of him were written by I. Fronteau (Hamburg, 1720), Abry (Strassburg, 1841), and Ritzke (Breslau, 1863). WAGENMANN.

JAB'BOK, the present Zurka, a stream which rises in the plateau east of Gilead, cuts through Gilead in a narrow defile, and empties itself into the Jordan, about midway between the Sea of Galilee and the Dead Sea. It formed the northern boundary of Ammon, and separated the kingdoms of Sihon and Og (Num. xxi. 24; Deut. ii. 37, iii. 16; Josh. xii. 2; Judg. xi. 13, 22). On the south bank of the Jabbok the interview took place between Jacob and Esau (Gen. xxxii. 22).

JABLONSKI, Daniel Ernst, b. at Nassenhuben, near Dauzig, Nov. 20, 1660; d. in Berlin, May 25, 1741; studied theology and Oriental languages at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder and Oxford, and was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation in Magdeburg in 1683, pastor of the Polish congregation in Lissa in 1686, court-preacher at Königsberg in 1671, and court-preacher at Berlin in 1697. He sprung originally from the Bohemian diaspora, and was consecrated bishop in 1699. In 1737 he consecrated Count Zinzendorf bishop, and thus he formed the transition from the old stock of the Moravian Brethren to the younger branch of the Herrnhuters. In the church-history of Prussia he distinguished himself by his exertions to bring about a union between the Lutheran and Reformed churches. But his long negotiations with Leibnitz, who represented a similar tendency in Hanover, came to a sudden end in 1706, chiefly on account of the indiscretion of superintendent Winkler of Magdeburg. He published several collections of sermons, and an annotated text of the Hebrew Bible, which is still of value. See KAPPE: Sammlung vertrauter Briefe Leibnitzens und Jablonskis, Leipzig, 1747; SACK: Relation des mesures . . . pour introduire la liturgie anglicaine dans le royaume de Prusse, Lond., 1760; Über die Vereinigung der Kirchenparteien, Berlin, 1812. JACKSON, Arthur, b. at Little Waldenfield, Suffolk, 1593; d. in London (?) Aug. 5, 1666. He was educated at Trinity College; became lecturer of St. Michael's, Wood Street, London; afterwards obtained the living of St. Faith's, under St. Paul's, but was ejected in 1662. He was no friend to Cromwell, and was imprisoned for refusing to testify in the trial of Love (1651). He wrote A Help for the Understanding of the Holy Scriptures (or annotations on Genesis to Canticles), Cambridge, 1613-58, 3 vols.; Annotations on the whole Book of Isaiah, with Memoir of the Author, published by his son, London, 1682.

JACKSON, John, b. at Lensey, Yorkshire, April 4, 1686; educated at Cambridge, appointed master of Wigston's Hospital, in Leicester, 1726, where he d. May 12, 1763. He was an Arian, and engaged in many a theological controversy now forgotten. For a list of his many publications, see Darling's Cyclopædia Bibliog., 1623-25. Dr. Sutton of Leicester published a memoir of his life and writings, London, 1764.

JACKSON, Thomas, D.D., b. at Willowing, Durham, 1579; d. 1640. He was educated at Oxford; was made president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, 1630, and dean of Peterborough 1638. He was originally a Calvinist, but became an Arminian. His valuable works were published in 3 vols. folio, 1673, and in 12 vols. 8vo, Oxford, 1844. Each of these editions is prefaced by his Life. His Commentaries upon the Creed have been particularly admired.

JACKSON, Thomas, b. at Sancton, Yorkshire, Dec. 12, 1783; d. at Richmond, March 11, 1873. He became an itinerant in the Wesleyan connection, 1804; in 1824 was chosen by the British Conference "connectional editor;" in 1833 was appointed tutor in the Richmond Theological Institution, resigned in 1861, on account of age. His principal publications are Centenary of Methodism (London, 1839), Library of Christian Biography (1837-70, 12 vols.), Life of Charles Wesley (1841, 2 vols.), Journal of Charles Wesley (1849, 2 vols.), Lives of Early Methodists (1849, 3 vols.), Curiosities of Pulpit Literature (1868), and The Institutions of Christianity (3 vols.).

JACOB (heel-holder, or supplanter), or IS'RAEL (prince of God, or warrior of God), the son of Isaac and the direct ancestor of the Israelites. His life is plainly divisible into three parts, — (1) his birth, youth, and early manhood (Gen. xxv. 22-xxviii. 22); (2) His mature years (xxix. 1-xxxv. 29); (3) His old age (xxxvii. 1-xlix. 33). (1) The characteristic feature of his early years was his desire to get the birthright from Esau. He began the struggle before he was born (xxv. 22), took advantage of his twin-brother's momentary despair to buy it from him for a mess of pottage (xxv. 33), and finally got the blessing by fraud (xxvii.). For this act of perfidy he had to flee, and went to Haran, where his uncle (Laban) lived. On his way thither he had a vision at Luz, in consequence of which he called the place Beth-el. (2) Kindly received by his uncle, he fell in love with Rachel, and served seven years for her, only to be cheated by the substitution of the older daughter, Leah, for Rachel, on the wedding-night, — a proceeding which the Eastern marriage-customs render comparatively easy. He had therefore to serve another seven years for his chosen wife. Leah bore him four sons successively, — Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah; while Rachel remained childless. By Rachel's maid, Bilhah, Jacob had Dan and Naphtali; by Leah's maid, Zilpah, Gad and Asher; by Leah herself, Isaachar, Zebulun, and his only daughter mentioned, — Dinah. At length God remembered Rachel, and she bore Joseph. Not only in children but in all his possessions, manifestly favored, it is no wonder Laban desired him to stay; but Jacob had become weary of the long subordination and the frequent trickery (xxxi. 7), and, knowing that Laban would not willingly let him go, he departed secretly, was pursued, overtaken, came to an understanding with Laban, and so in peace started once more for Canaan. The news of the approach of his brother with his band alarmed him. But, ere he met his brother, a change was wrought in him. He wrestled at the Jabbok with God all night, until the breaking of the day, and, in reward of his persistency, received the blessing he so earnestly desired, and a new name, — Israel. But, ere granting his request, the "man" touched the sinew of Jacob's thigh, and it shrank, putting his thigh out of joint. To his surprise, Esau was very friendly; and the brothers separated peaceably, to meet once more at the funeral of their father. Jacob settled first at Shechem, but was compelled to leave in consequence of Simeon's and Levi's conduct, and went to Beth-el, and thence to Hebron. On this latter journey, Rachel died at Bethlehem, shortly after bearing Benoni, or Benjamin. (3) In Hebron the patriarch lived quietly, passed through heavy sorrows in the supposed death of Joseph, the pressure of famine, and the reluctant separation from Benjamin. But the night of weeping was followed by the morning of joy. He left Hebron at the summons of Joseph, was personally honored by the Pharaoh, and in prosperity and tranquillity passed his last days in the land of Goshen. When he felt the hand of death upon him, he gathered his sons about him, prophesied the fortunes of their respective descendants, and died at the age of a hundred and forty-seven years. His funeral was attended with royal pomp.

The character of this remarkable man is best expressed by his double name. Jacob was he; for he was naturally adroit and sly, and thus got the better of the physically stronger, more warlike Esau, and the egoistical, calculating Laban. Yet he was not sordid in his aims. He sought something higher than mere earthly possessions, and so he was Israel: for he wrestled for the divine blessing as the most valuable thing one could have; to win it, he summoned all his energy, and underwent every deprivation. It was the ambition of his life. He began the struggle in his mother's womb, and kept this end steadily in view, until, in the maturity of his powers, he received it. It is true he was far from being perfect. In him the lower nature was in conflict with the higher, and often victorious; but, in the course of a life much more troubled than that of his father's, he was purified. He was punished by a personal experience of the treatment he had given others. The deceiver of his father was deceived by Laban and by his own sons. The loving God of Jacob was by no means blind to the faults of his favorite, but approved his humble, hearty, undaunted desire after salvation.

JACOB'S WELL is mentioned in John iv. 5 as a well near the city of Sychar, in Samaria, on the parcel of ground which the patriarch Jacob gave to his son Joseph (compare Gen. xxxiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32). There the Lord sat down once while travelling from Judæa to Galilee, wearied from the journey, and then occurred the wonderful conversation related in John iv. 7-28. The place can still be identified with certainty, as situated one mile and a half to the south-east of the town of Nablus, the ancient Shechem, close by the highway from Jerusalem to Galilee, at the eastern base of Mount Gerizim. The well, which is lined with masonry, is now only seventy-five feet deep, and mostly dry, it having been filled up with débris of the adjacent ruined buildings; but in 1838, when Robinson visited it, it was a hundred and five feet deep. Jerome, in his Onomasticon, tells us that at his time a church built over the well occupied the site. That church was destroyed during the crusades; but in the twelfth century it was replaced by a chapel, which now also has fallen into ruins. See CONDER: Sychar and Sychem, in Statements, 1877, p. 149; [SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, 1879, p. 312.] RÜETSCH.

JACOB BARADÆUS, b. at Tella; was educated in the monastery of Phasilita, near Nisibis, and lived for fifteen years in Constantinople as a monk, when, in the year 513, he was consecrated bishop of Nisibis by Theodosius, the Monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, who was held a prisoner in Constantinople. In this position he labored with great energy and success for the reorganization and consolidation of the scattered Monophysite party in the East. "Light-footed as Asahel" (2 Sam. ii. 18), and clad in rags (whence Baradai, "a coarse horse-blanket"), he wandered from the boundary of Egypt to the banks of the Euphrates, preaching during the day, and often walking thirty or forty miles in the night, thus escaping his persecutors. He consecrated two patriarchs, twenty-seven (according to another reading, eighty-seven) bishops, and a hundred thousand priests and deacons. No wonder, therefore, that the whole party was called, after him, the Jacobites. Of written monuments he left very little. An anaphora, translated into Latin by Renaudot (Lit. Or. Coll., ii. 333), is ascribed to him; also a Confession, of which an Ethiopian version is extant in several manuscripts, edited and translated by Cornill, in Zeitschrift d. Deut. Morgenl. Gesellschaft, 1876. A number of his encyclical letters are in a Syrian manuscript in the British Museum. D. July 30, 578. E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF EDESSA (Syriac, Orrhoënus), b. in the middle of the seventh century, at 'Indaba, near Antioch; studied in Alexandria, and was in 687 appointed bishop of Edessa, but resigned in 688, on account of disputes with his clergy, and lived eleven years in the monastery of Eusebona, then nine years in the great monastery of Tell 'eda. When his successor in the see of Edessa, Habib, died, in 708, he was invited to resume office. He consented, but died while on the journey to Edessa, June 5. He wrote on theology, history, philosophy, and grammar. He was master of three languages, — Syriac, Greek, and Hebrew. He corrected the Syriac version of the Old Testament, and translated books of Aristotle, Porphyry, the two Gregories, and others, into Syriac: his literary accomplishments were, indeed, of the very highest order. Of his works much has come down to us, and is found in the libraries of London, Paris, Florence, and Rome. See the respective catalogues of Syriac manuscripts. Something has also been published: his Syriac grammar, edited by Wright, London, 1871; several of his letters in ASSEMANI: Bibliotheca Orientalis, i. 468-494; and by WRIGHT: Journal of Sacred Literature, 1867. See also BARHEBRAUS: Chronicon Ecclesiast. (1872, i. 289). E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF JÜTERBOCK, b. at Jüterbogk, in the Prussian province of Brandenburg, 1381; d. at Erfurt, 1465 or 1466; entered the Polish monastery, the Paradise, and was by its abbot sent to Cracow to study; found the rules of the Cistercian order too lax, and adopted those of the Carthusian order, 1441; removed to the monastery, ad montem St. Salvatoris, in Erfurt, and labored in the university there as professor of canon law. He has a special interest on account of his reformatory zeal. Not that he in any way felt himself at variance with the doctrines of the Church; but he fully realized the corruption of her morals, and spoke with great frankness of the necessary reforms in Petitiones religiosorum pro reformatione sui status; De negligentia prelatorum; Arsamentum ad papam, addressed to Nicholas V.; and De septem statibus ecclesie. In his works he calls himself variously Jacobus de Jüterbock, de Paradiso, de Polonia, Cisterciensis, Carthusiensis, de Erfordia, etc. See ULLMANN: Reformatoren vor d. Ref., 1866, vol. i. PAUL TSCHACKERT.

JACOB (Aphraates) OF MAR MATTAI. See APHRAATES.

JACOB OF MISA, also called Jacobellus, from his small stature; b. at Misa, in Bohemia, in the latter half of the fourteenth century; studied theology at Prague, and was appointed pastor, first at Tina, afterwards of the Church of St. Michael in Prague, where he d. Aug. 9, 1429. His study of Scripture and the Fathers showed him that the withholding of the cup in the administration of the Lord's Supper to the laity was an arbitrary and completely unwarranted measure of the Roman Church. He first propounded and defended his views in a public disputation (1414); and when Hus, at that time in jail in Constance, accepted them, he published his Demonstratio, and began to administer the cup to his parishioners, in spite of the remonstrances of the bishop and the university. The fathers of the council were much alarmed; and in the thirteenth session (June 15, 1415), they issued a curious decree, admitting in theory as truth what in practice they condemned as heresy. Jacob answered in his Apologia; and, though he would by no means submit, he was not removed from his office, perhaps because in other points, as, for instance, in the doctrine of purgatory, he agreed with the Roman Church.

JACOB OF NISIBIS, also called Jacob the Great, lived for some time, together with Eugenius, the founder of Persian monachism, as a hermit in the Kurdistan Mountains, but was in 309 chosen bishop of Nisibis (Zobai); built the famous church there (313-320), of which ruins are still extant; was present, together with his disciple, Ephraem Syrus, at the Council of Nicaea, 325; and d. 338. None of his writings have come down to us. See art. APHRAATES, and EPHRAEM: Carmina Nisibena, ed. Bickell, 1866. E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF SARÜG, b. at Curtamm, on the Euphrates, towards the close of the year 451; d. at Sarüg, Nov. 29, 521, where he had been chosen bishop in 519. He was a very prolific writer, keeping no less than seventy scribes busy with copying his works. Besides other works, seven hundred and sixty-three homilies or orations, in the common Syriac metre, are ascribed to him. Barhebraeus knew a hundred and eighty-two; the Library of the Vatican contains two hundred and thirty-three; that of London, a hundred and forty; that of Paris, one hundred. Most of his works still remain in manuscript. Some have been printed in Breviarium feriale Syr., and Officium Dominicale; ASSEMANI: Act. Sanct. Mart., ii.; CURETON: Ancient Syriac Documents, 1864; Monumenta Syriaca, i.; ABBELOOS: J. B. de vita et scriptis S. J. Bat. Sar., Louvain, 1867. His memory is greatly revered by the Jacobites and Maronites, and even by the later Nestorians; though, according to documents published by Abbé Martin, in Zeitschrift d. Deutsch. Morgenländ. Gesellschaft, 1876, he remained a Monophysite to his death. A Life of him was written by Jacob of Edessa, Bibl. Orient., i.: another (anonymous) is found in Act. Sanct. Oct. 12, 929, and in ABBELOOS, l.c. See ABBÉ MARTIN: Un Evêque-Poète, in Revue des Sciences Ecclésiastiques, 4 ser. t. iii., October, November, 1876. E. NESTLE.

JACOB OF VITRY (Jacobus Vitriacus, or de Vitriaco), b. at Vitry-sur-Seine, 1170; d. in Rome, April 30, 1240; was appointed presbyter parochialis, at Argenteuil, near Paris, 1200, but gave up this position in 1210, and removed to the monastery of Oignies, in the diocese of Liège, attracted by the sanctity of the Belgian nun Mary, whose life he wrote (ed. by Fr. Moschus, Arras, 1660, and in Act. Sanct., June 23). At the instance of the Pope he began in 1213 preaching a crusade against the Albigenes; and so great was the impression his eloquence produced (Sermones, Antwerp, 1575; compare LE COY DE LA MARCHE: La Chaire française au moyen âge, 1868), that in 1217 he was elected bishop of Ptolemais. In Palestine, where he remained for ten years, he made himself well approved, especially by the care he bestowed upon the children of the Saracen captives. But, shortly before the death of Honorius III., he seems to have returned to Oignies. Gregory IX., however, used him in many important diplomatical missions, and made him bishop of Frascati, and a cardinal. His principal work, Historia orientalis et occidentalis, was first edited by Fr. Moschus, Douay, 1597; then by Martène and Durand, in Thes. Nor. Anecd., iii., Paris, 1717. His letters have also great interest; MARTÈNE, l.c., and BONGARSIS: Gesta Dei per Francos, i. See MATZNER: De J. Vitri., Münster, 1864. WAGENMANN.

JACOBI, Friedrich Heinrich, b. at Düsseldorf, Jan. 25, 1743; d. at Pempelfort, an estate he possessed near his native city, March 10, 1819; was educated, at Francfort and Geneva, for a commercial career, but showed from early youth great inclination towards literature and philosophy. In 1763 he took the lead of the mercantile concern his father had established at Düsseldorf; and in 1770 he was made a member of the council for the duchies of Jähiers and Berg. In 1779 he was invited to Munich to take a similar position; but, not finding circumstances there after his taste, he retired to Pempelfort, where he remained until the war drove him away, 1793. He went to Holstein, and staid there for ten years. In 1801 he was again invited to Munich, as president of the academy; and he remained there till 1812. His first literary productions were Allwill's Brief-Sammlung (1771) and Woldemar (1779), two philosophical novels, of which especially the latter gives an easy outline of his philosophical speculations. In 1785 his Briefe über die Lehre Spinozas implicated him in a controversy with Moses Mendelssohn and the Berlin philosophers; and in 1787 a similar conflict with Kant and the critical school ensued from his David Hume über den Glauben. In 1801 he published one of his most important works, Ueber das Unternehmen des Kriticismus die Vernunft zu Verstande zu bringen, and in 1811 his last great book, Von den göttlichen Dingen, which called forth a very bitter rejoinder from Schelling. Jacobi's philosophy is not a system: on the contrary, his fundamental principle—the limitation of thought, its incapability to explain the existence of facts, to do any thing more than connect them with each other—places him in direct opposition to any purely demonstrative system. All thought, when applied alone, and carried resolutely to its last consequences, ends in atheism and fatalism. It needs to be supplemented with faith, which is the only organ of objective truth. Nevertheless, though Jacobi, as the "philosopher of faith," rests his speculations on intuition as their proper foundation, he is very far from the romantic fancifulness of Schelling. He was a sharp critic; and Schelling, as well as Kant, felt the penetrating power of his searching eye. In this point, as in many others, he resembles Sir William Hamilton, who, indeed, owed not a little to him. His works were collected by himself, and provided with very instructive prefaces and appendixes. His letters were edited by Roth, 1825-27, 2 vols. His life was written by KUHNS: Jacobi und die Philosophie seiner Zeit, 1834, and ZIERNGIEBEL: Jacobi's Leben, Dichten, und Denken, 1867.

JACOBITES was, from the middle of the sixth century, the name of the Syrian, and sometimes also that of the Egyptian Monophysites. Originating in the middle of the fifth century, Monophysitism spread among the Syrians, Copts, Abyssinians, and Armenians; and indeed, with the exception of some minor modifications, these four churches agree in all fundamental doctrines. The name, however, derived from Jacob Baradaeus, and not from the apostle or the patriarch, is generally confined to the Syrian Monophysites. The Egyptian Monophysites called themselves, in older times, Theodosians, or Severians, or Dioscorians.

Most of the Byzantine emperors were hostile to the Monophysites. Only Zeno and Anastasius favored them. Justinian's attempt at reconciling them with the Catholic Church failed. From the later emperors the Syrian Jacobites suffered very much, while their Egyptian brethren seemed to get along tolerably well with the Mohammedans. In the time of Gregory XIII. (1572-85) the number of Jacobites in Syria appears to have decreased. It was estimated, that in Syria, Mesopotamia, and Babylonia, there lived only about fifty thousand families scattered about, mostly in the villages and small towns. Their patriarch resided at Caramit: under him ranged five metropolitans,—at Amid, Mosul, Maadan, Haleb, and Jerusalem,—and six bishops, at Maradin, Edessa, Gezira, Gargara, Tagrit, and Damascus. The Dutchman, Kootwyk (Itiner. Hierosol. et Syriamen, Antwerp, 1619), describes them as very poor. Richard Pococke (Descriptions of the East, London, 1743-45) estimated, that, out of twenty thousand Christians in Damascus, there were only two hundred Jacobites. Niebulr (Reisebeschreibung, Copenhagen, 1770) found a small congregation at Nisibis, and tells us that at Mardin they had three churches; at Orfa, a hundred and fifty houses; in Jerusalem, a small monastery, etc.; while they occupied the whole district of Tor, where they also had an independent patriarch besides the one residing at Caramit. Buckingham, who travelled in Mesopotamia in 1816, estimated the number of Jacobites in Mardin at two thousand out of a population of twenty thousand; and in the neighborhood of the city he found two Jacobite monasteries. In Diabekr he counted four hundred, and in Mosul three hundred families. In these figures no considerable change seems to have taken place later on. See E. ROBINSON: Biblical Researches in Palestine, Boston, 1841; J. L. PORTER: Five Years in Damascus, London, 1855. Sadad, where they number about six thousand souls, is now the headquarters of the Jacobites in Syria.

The peculiar doctrines and institutions which distinguish the Jacobites are, the conception of one nature in Christ, resulting from a perfect blending of the divine and human in him, according to the formula, ex duobus naturis, non in duobus; the rejection of the canons of the council of Chalcedon, while those of the second council of Ephesus, the so-called "Robber Synod," are accepted; the veneration of Jacob of Sarûg, Jacob of Edessa, Dioscorus, Severus, Petrus Fullo, and Jacob Baradaeus as teachers and saints, while Eutyches is condemned; the use of leavened bread in the Lord's Supper; the making of the sign of the cross with one finger; the frequent application of the lot at elections of bishops and patriarchs. The Jacobite patriarch is styled "Patriarch of Antioch;" but the Greeks, who consider the Jacobites as heretics, have never allowed him to reside there. In the latter part of the ninth century it became customary for the patriarch to change his name on his election; and in the fourteenth Ignatius became the fixed name of the Jacobite patriarch, as Peter is that of the Maronite, Joseph that of the Chaldean, and Simon or Elijah, that of the Nestorian patriarchs. The Jacobite Church has produced quite a number of distinguished men, scholars, authors, etc. See Assemani: Bibl. Orient., ii. The various attempts of the Roman-Catholic Church to bring about a reconciliation with the Jacobites have not led to any remarkable results.

JACOBUS DE VORAGINE, b. at Viraggio, 1230; d. in Genoa, 1298; entered the order of the Preaching Friars in 1244, and was made archbishop of Genoa in 1292. His great fame he owes to his collection of legends,—Legenda Sanctorum, Legenda Aurea, also called Historia Longobardica, from the short Lombard chronicle attached to the life of Pope Pelagius. The materials of which the book is composed were derived partly from apocryphal gospels, acts of apostles, acts of martyrs, and partly from mediæval traditions of the wildest description; but just this made it acceptable to the time. It was translated into all European languages [into English by William Caxton, in the fifteenth century], and reprinted over and over again. He also wrote a number of sermons (Sermones de Sanctis, Lyons, 1494; Mariale, Venice, 1497, etc.) and a book in defence of the Dominican order. His chronicle of Genoa is found in MURATORI: Scriptores Rerum Italicarum, ix.

JACOBUS, Melancthon Williams, D.D., LL.D., b. at Newark, N.J., Sept. 19, 1816; d. at Allegheny, Penn., Oct. 28, 1876. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1834, and at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1838; taught in the Hebrew department for a year; was pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, 1839-50; and from 1851 till his death was professor of Oriental and biblical literature in the theological seminary at Allegheny, Penn. In 1869 he was moderator of the General Assembly (Old School), the last assembly before the re-union. He was the author of a popular series of Notes on the New Testament, of which there appeared Matthæw, with Harmony (New York, 1848), Mark and Luke (1853), John (1856), Acts (1859), and in 1864-65 Notes on the Book of Genesis, 2 vols. His Notes on the New Testament were republished in Edinburgh, 1862. See sketch of his life in Presbyterian Re-union Memorial Volume, pp. 530-532.

JACOMB, Thomas, b. at Burton Lazars, Leicestershire, 1622; educated at Cambridge; pastor in London: ejected in 1662 for nonconformity; d. at Exeter, March 27, 1687. He was one of the continuators of Poole's Annotations; but his fame rests upon his Several Sermons preached on the whole Eighth Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans: Eighteen of which, on the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th verses, are here published [all published], London, 1672, republished, Edinburgh, 1868.

JACOPONE DA TODI, the author of the Stabat mater, b. at Todi, Italy, about 1210; d. Dec. 24, 1306, in the convent of Collazone. His real name was Jacopo de Benedetti, or Jacobus de Benedictis (the Latin form), Benedetti being the family name. He spent the years of early manhood in revelry and carousing. His talents, however, won him both degrees of the law at Bologna. He gave himself up with enthusiasm to the practice of law, when the whole tenor of his life was suddenly changed by the violent death of his wife, from the falling of a gallery in a theatre. He decided to become a monk, and one morning appeared in the market-place, on his hands and knees, harnessed like a beast of burden. He submitted to painful asceticism for ten years, when he was admitted, in 1278, to the Franciscan order of Minorites. He was led by the corruption of the Church to compose poems arraigning Pope Boniface VIII. (1291-1303), and in 1297 entered into a confederacy of Roman nobles to compass his deposition. For this he was placed in close confinement, and limited to bread and water, until the death of Boniface, in 1303. He spent his last days at Collazone, and lies buried at Todi, where the following inscription was placed over his remains in 1569: Ossa Beati Jacoponi de Benedictis Tudertini Fratris ordinis Minorum, qui stultus propter Christum nova mundum arte delusit et cælum rapuit ("The remains of the blessed J. d. B. T., a brother of the order of Minorites, who, becoming a fool for Christ's sake, deluded the world by a new art, and carried off heaven"). The expression "fool" refers to the tradition that he was partially insane. His last hours were consoled by his own hymn, Giesu nostra fidanza ("Jesus our confidence"); and his last words are reported to have been, "Into thy hands I commit my spirit."

Jacopone wrote poems in Latin and Italian. The Florentine edition of 1490 contains a hundred Italian pieces; and the Venetian of 1614, two hundred and eleven. These poems consist of odes, satires, penitential psalms, etc. He wrote for the people, and reached the heart of his nation. His two most important Latin hymns (if the second be his) are the Stabat mater dolorosa ("At the cross her station keeping"), and its companion-piece, recently discovered, Stabat mater speciosa ("Stood the glad and beauteous mother"). The former hymn depicts the sorrows of the mother of Jesus at the foot of the cross (John xix. 25); the latter, her joys at the manger. The Stabat mater has been attributed to Gregory the Great (d. 606), Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), and Innocent III. It is anonymous in the copies of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but the uniform tradition attributes it to Jacopone, and there is no sufficient reason why we should not hold to it. The Flagellants, who marched through Italy in 1398, sang it [Summa historialis, by Antoninus Florentinus (d. 1450); Annals of Detmar of Lübeck and Georg Stella (d. 1420)].

The Stabat mater is the most pathetic hymn of the middle ages or any other age. It is defaced by Mariolatry, but its soft melody and tender pathos will always delight and soothe the ear. It has frequently been set to music; first by Nanini (about 1620), and since by Astorga (about 1700), Palestrina, Pergolesi (about 1736), Haydn, Rossini, and others. It is sung to Palestrina's music on Palm Sunday, at Rome. [LISCO gives fifty-three German translations of the Stabat mater; and it has often been translated into English by Lord Lindsay, Caswall, Coles, Benedict, etc. The Mater speciosa has been translated by Dr. Neale, Coles, Benedict, etc.]

JÆ'EL (גַּ'עַל), "wild goat"), the wife of Heber, the chief of a nomadic Arab tribe, was a heroine whose patriotic deed Deborah magnified in her triumphant song of victory (Judg. v. 21-26). In the precipitate flight of the Canaanites, after their defeat by Barak and Deborah, Sisera was induced, by the invitation of Jael, to stop in at her tent, whose seclusion might be expected to effectually conceal him. After refreshing himself with buttermilk, he fell asleep. While in this condition, Jael took a tent-pin, and drove it through his temples. The impassioned eulogy of Deborah expressed the gratitude of the nation for its deliverance from its enemy. Jael's deed was prompted by patriotic motives, and was a bold act; but the deed was carried out by a resort to treachery and a disregard of the laws of hospitality. The best treatment of the general subject of the justification of the deed will be found in Mozley's Ruling Ideas in Early Ages.

JAFFÉ, Philipp, b. at Schwerzenz, Posen, Feb. 17, 1819; d. in Berlin, April, 1870. He studied first medicine, but afterwards devoted himself to literature and history; was the collaborator of Pertz in the publication of the Monumenta Germanie, 1851-63, and was in 1862 appointed professor of history in the University of Berlin. His principal works are, History of the Empire under Lothair the Saxon; History of the Empire under Conrad III.; Regesta Pontificum Romanorum, 1851 (2d ed., 1881 sq.); and Bibliotheca Rerum Germanorum, 1864-69.

JAHN, Johann, b. at Tasswitz, Moravia, June 18, 1750; d. in Vienna, Aug. 16, 1816; entered the Premonstratensian order in 1774, and was appointed professor of Oriental languages and exegesis at the gymnasiums of Olmutz in 1784, and in the University of Vienna in 1789; but, as on several points of exegesis his views deviated from those maintained by the theologians of the curia, he was removed from his chair in 1805, and made canon of St. Stephen. His Introduction to the Old Testament and Arch. Biblica were even put on the Index. His grammars and textbooks were much used by students of the Syriac, Arab, and Chaldee languages. In English are his Biblical Archaeology, Andover (U. S.), 1823, 5th ed., N. Y., 1849; and his History of the Hebrew Commonwealth, Andover (U. S.), 1828, 2 vols., 3d ed. rev., Oxford, 1840.

JAINS, The name of a very numerous and wealthy sect among the Hindus, founded in the fifth or sixth century B. C., by Vardhamana (commonly called Maha-vira), a contemporary of Gautama, the Buddha. Their belief resembles Buddhism in some particulars, as in their reverence for life in all its forms, which leads them to scrupulously avoid destroying even insects. They are, too, accounted heretics by the orthodox Brahman. But in most respects they differ from Buddhists; as (a) in the use of the word "nirvana," by which they mean immortality, and the delivery of the soul from the bondage of transmigration, in consequence of "the practice of the four virtues,—liberality, gentleness, piety, and remorse for failings,—by goodness in thought, word, and deed, and by kindness to the mute creation, and even to the forms of vegetable life;" (b) in their theism, indeed almost monotheism; and (c) in their customs. They reject the Vedas, and appeal to their own sacred books, called Agamas, which are now written in Sanscrit, though formerly in Prakrit. They worship twenty-four immortal saints, and deny the sacredness of caste. They are divided into two parties,—the Digambaras, the "sky-clad" (i. e., naked), and the Svetambaras, the "white-robed." Vardhamana and his immediate followers went naked; but the custom is now abandoned, although the idols in the Jain temples are still always naked. Their priests are celibates, and their widows are not allowed to remarry. The Jain temples and caves are remarkable. The series of temples and shrines on Mount Abu is "one of the seven wonders of India," and presents most striking evidence of the wealth and importance of the sect. Some of their idols are enormous in height.

JAMES, the name of three important characters of the New Testament.

I. JAMES THE SON OF ZEBEDEE. — His mother, Salome, was a follower of Jesus (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 41). He was the brother of John, and older than he, as is very probable from the fact that his name is almost always mentioned before John's (Matt. x. 2; Mark iii. 17, etc.). It is likely, though not certain, that he became a follower of Christ immediately after the baptism in the Jordan (John i. 32 sqq.). He and his brother were surnamed Boanerges, i. e., "sons of thunder" by Christ (Mark iii. 17). The reason for giving this designation is not recorded. He certainly did not intend an allusion to their eloquence, as the fathers supposed. The more probable view is, that the surname had reference to their passionate and vehement nature, both in thought and emotion, which sometimes showed itself in ambitious aspirations (Mark x. 35 sqq.) for a place of honor in the Messianic kingdom, but also in an ardent attachment to the person of Christ. James belonged, with John and Peter, to the narrower circle of Christ's more intimate disciples, was admitted into the chamber of Jairus' daughter (Mark v. 37), to the vision of the transfiguration (Mark ix. 2), and to the scene of the agony in Gethsemane (Matt. xxvi. 37). In the history of the early apostolic church nothing further is recorded of him than his death by the sword, under Herod Agrippa I. (Acts xii. 2). He was the first of the apostles to suffer martyrdom; and thus, in a more pronounced measure than in the case of John, the prediction of Christ was fulfilled in his experience, that the brothers should indeed drink of his cup, and be baptized with his baptism (Mark x. 39); and, at least in point of time, he received the second place of honor in the kingdom of heaven. Ecclesiastical tradition says that the accuser of James confessed Christ, and, after receiving the apostle's pardon, himself suffered martyrdom (Clem. Alex., in Euseb., H. E., ii. 9). The Church of Spain boasts that he shared in its foundation, but its fables are in conflict with the statements of the New Testament.

II. JAMES THE SON OF ALPHEUS, one of the twelve disciples of Jesus. He is so designated in four places,—Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13. No other passage can with certainty be regarded as referring to him or his family, and nothing further is known definitely of his life. The alleged blood relationship of his family with the house of Jesus lacks all evidence. This hypothesis identifies his father Alphaeus with Clopas, and makes "Mary the wife of Clopas" (John xix. 25) a sister of Mary the mother of Jesus, or Clopas a brother of Joseph (Hegesippus). These suggestions are pure assumptions; for it is not at all certain that Μαρία ἡ τοῦ Κλωπᾶ means the wife of Clopas. It may mean the mother, or the daughter, of Clopas. Nor has the identification of the name Alphæus with Clopas any thing in its favor. A further objection is, that sisters would not be apt to have the same name, Mary. It is possible that he is the James whose mother is called Mary (Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xvi. 1), and who is styled "James the Less," and the brother of Josès (Mark xv. 40). The title "the Less" contained an allusion to his stature, and was not given to distinguish him from James the son of Zebedee (Meyer). But it is possible that another James is here mentioned, as we would rather expect the expression, "James the son of Alphæus." Of his further experiences we know nothing, except that, according to tradition, he labored in Egypt, where he suffered martyrdom by crucifixion, in the city of Ostrakine (Niceph., ii. 40).

III. JAMES THE JUST, THE BROTHER OF THE LORD, the head of the Church at Jerusalem, is distinguished from the two apostles of the same name in Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 7; Gal. i. 19, ii. 9, 12; Jas. i. 1; Jude 1; and is mentioned by Josephus (Ant., XX. 9, 1), Hegesippus (Eusebius: H. E., ii. 33), and the Church fathers. In the early Church the existence of our James as a distinct person was denied by some; he being identified with one of the two apostles of that name, and more generally with James the son of Alphæus. The fraternal relation reported to have existed between James and Jesus was explained as a relation between cousins. But Tertullian is a witness to the fact that the distinction between James and the apostles was still held in his day. He speaks of the consummation of Mary's marriage with Joseph after the birth of Jesus, and of the brothers of Jesus (De carne Christi 7, adv. Marc. 19), to prove the reality of the incarnation over against Gnostic objections. At a somewhat later date the Apostolic Constitutions (ii. 55, vi. 12, 13) declare for the same view, when they mention as the representatives of Catholic doctrine the twelve apostles, Paul, and James the brother of the Lord, who is also placed among the seventy disciples. That a fraternal relation is here meant is vouched for by another passage (vii. 46): "I James, a brother of the Lord according to the flesh." The testimony of Eusebius is also very important. He clearly distinguishes James, the brother of the Lord, from the twelve apostles, places him among the seventy disciples, and counts fourteen apostles in all, Paul being the thirteenth, and James the fourteenth (Com. Jes. xvii. 5; H. E., i. 12, ii. 1, vii. 19); and the passage (H. E., ii. 1) in which he speaks of him as the "so-called" brother of the Lord does not refer to a more distant relationship, for he prepares the way for this expression by stating that Jesus was born before the consummation of the marriage between Mary and Joseph.

Gradually the presumption of the perpetual virginity of Mary gained currency, and the fraternal relation of James was resolved into the relation of a step-brother. It is a matter of doubt whether this was done by Hegesippus, and in the pseudo-Clementine writings; but it is certain that there is not a trace in either of an identification of the brother of the Lord with an apostle. Hegesippus clearly makes this distinction (Euseb.: H. E., ii. 23). In the Protevangelium Jacobi, which originated in Essenian Christian circles, Joseph is represented as having been an aged man, surrounded with grown-up sons, before his espousal with Mary. It was only with hesitation that some learned Fathers, under the influence of a growing devotion to Mary, adopted this fable. The first trace of it occurs in Clement of Alexandria, — whom Origen followed, leaning upon Josephus and some others (τῶν), — Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Alexandria, Eusebius, Hilary, and others.

From this hypothesis, which was entirely wanting in historical confirmation, it was natural to proceed farther, and resolve the fraternal relation into that of cousin, and identify the so-called brothers of our Lord with the apostles of the same name. It is quite possible that Clement of Alexandria identifies James the brother of the Lord with James the son of Alphæus; for he speaks of only two men by this name, — the one thrown from a tower, the other executed with the sword (Euseb.: H. E., ii. 1). But the first to declare himself distinctly for this identification was Jerome, who wrote a work against Helvidius, advocating the doctrine of Mary's perpetual virginity. He speaks of the theory that James was a son of Joseph by a former marriage as an ungrounded fancy taken from the Apocrypha, and tries to prove that our James was the same as James the son of Alphæus by identifying Mary of John xix. 25 ("Mary the wife of Clopas"), the sister of Jesus' mother, with the wife of Alphæus. He seems afterwards to have renounced this theory; for in his Commentary on Isaiah (xvii. 6) he mentions fourteen apostles, — the twelve, James the brother of the Lord, and Paul. Augustine spoke of James as the son of Joseph by a former marriage, or as a relation of Mary. To the latter view he gave the preference.

These various views have all had their advocates among modern divines. The theory that James the Just was a son of Mary and Joseph, and is to be distinguished from the apostles, has been held by Herder, Stier, Credner, De Wette, Wieseler, Neander, Schaff, Lechler, Reuss, Luther, B. Weiss, Bleek, Keim [Alford, Farrar], and others; Stier and Wieseler, however, referring Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18, Gal. ii. 9-12 to James the son of Alphæus. Semler, Hug, Schneckenburger, Hofmann, Lange, and others identify our James with James the son of Alphæus. And Thiersch and [Lightfoot] hold that he was a son of Joseph by a former marriage.

The statements of the New Testament emphatically favor the first view. The expressions in Matt. i. 25 and Luke ii. 7 most naturally imply that the marriage between Joseph and Mary was consummated after Christ's birth; and the expression "first-born son," by the analogy of the other cases in the New Testament (Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18; Heb. xi. 28; Rev. i. 5), indicates that other children were born to Mary. The subsequent close relation in which the so-called brothers of our Lord stand to Mary (Matt. xii. 47 sq., xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; John ii. 12; Acts i. 14) likewise strongly favors this view. The word "brother" (ἀδελφός) is never used in the New Testament of any other than the fraternal relation; and the few cases adduced from the Old Testament are indefinite; and special terms are employed for kindred (συγγενής) and cousin (ἀνέψιμος, Mark vi. 4; Luke i. 36, ii. 14; Col. iv. 10). To these arguments must be added the fact that James the brother of the Lord and the Lord's "brethren" are distinguished from the apostles (John ii. 12; Acts i. 13; 1 Cor. ix. 5). In John vii. 5 it is stated, that, in contrast to the disciples, the brethren of the Lord had not believed; and in Matt. xii. 46 Christ institutes a comparison between his brethren by blood and by moral affinity. Paul's expression in Gal. i. 19 — "Other of the apostles saw I none save James the Lord's brother" — refers back to Peter, and not forward to James. He afterwards (Gal. ii. 9) calls James a "pillar" of the Church, avoiding the expression "apostle;" but in 1 Cor. xv. 7 he is as little distinguished from "all the apostles" as Peter is from the twelve (1 Cor. xv. 5). The expression "servant of the Lord" (Jas. i. 1) does not prove any thing at all against the view; for the appellation "the brother of the Lord," which was given to him by others as a mark of distinction, would have been out of place in his own mouth. The objection that the names of the four brothers of the Lord correspond to the names of four of the apostles ought to be of little weight when we remember that Josephus mentions no less than twenty-one different persons by the name of Simon, and sixteen by the name of Judas. James was, therefore, the full brother of Jesus, and a different person from the two apostles of that name.

James was the representative of the conservative Jewish party at the council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.), and stood at the head of the local church. The party of the Ebionites took him for their patron; and Hegesippus described him as a Nazarite, who from his childhood had drunk neither wine nor strong drink, had never been anointed with oil, never bathed, never worn any but linen garments, and whose hair had never been cut. He was surnamed the Just, and represented as having prayed constantly at the temple for the forgiveness of his people. According to Hegesippus, he suffered martyrdom in 69, by being thrown from a pinnacle of the temple by the Pharisees; but according to Josephus he was stoned to death by the Sadducees in 62 or 63. The latter passage is of doubtful authenticity, and the former statement is to be preferred.

JAMES, The Epistle of, was written by James, a servant of Jesus Christ, and addressed to the Jews of the Dispersion (Jas. i. 1). The readers are the Jewish people as a whole, not in the foreign country of this world (Hofmann), but outside of Palestine, only in so far, however, as they recognize the authority of a servant of Jesus (comp. i. 18; ii. 1; v. 7). They are not all classes of Jews, Christian and non-Christian (Grotius, Credner, etc.), nor Christians without reference to birth and nationality (De Wette, Schwegler, Hilgenfeld), nor Jews both in and out of Palestine (Thiersch, Hofmann), but Jewish Christians of the Diaspora. They belonged not to a single district, but to foreign lands generally. There are no references to any personal relations between the writer and his readers; no greetings or requests, as in the Epistle to the Galatians, for example, which was addressed to a special locality. The Epistle of James is a circular-letter directed for a general class of readers. That which he finds as a universal characteristic of the condition of the Jewish Christians at that time, was the secularization of Christian truth, and its reduction to a system of external observances. Influenced by exposure to trial (i. 2), and the delay of the Second Coming (v. 7, 8), men had begun to lose patience, and to divide their hearts between God and the world (i. 8). The "friendship of the world" (iv. 4) displays itself in the disregard of the poor, and the preference given to the rich (ii. 1 sqq.), in petitions to God for means to gratify lusts (iv. 3), or in the temporary forgetfulness of God (iv. 13 sqq.). They were also attempting to substitute external professions and ceremonies for piety of heart, and appealed to their creed (ii. 14) rather than to their deeds.

The object of the Epistle is to check these tendencies by warnings and exhortations; and for this reason the contents are, for the most part, of a parenetic and practical character. The exhortation (1) to steadfastness under temptation (i. 2-12) is followed by (2) the teaching that temptation originates with the heart, and not with God (i. 13-18), and the exhortation (3) to be obedient to the word of the divine truth (i. 19-27). Hereupon follow special exhortations against partisan preference for the rich (ii. 1-13), a dead faith (ii. 14-26), pride of wisdom (iii. 1-18), and the pursuit of worldliness, carnal security, etc. (iv. 1-v. 11). The Epistle is brought to a close by some briefer exhortations (v. 12-19).

The ethical nature of the Epistle is due not merely to the tendency towards laxness and worldliness which called it forth, but to the general conception of the gospel in the mind of the writer. It is characteristic that he calls the gospel the "law of liberty" (i. 25). He, however, recognizes the distinction between it and the law of the Old Testament, that it is not a servile yoke on the neck of man, but, implanted in his heart, it produces new motives and divine inclinations. And yet the word of Christ is in the last resort also a law, a revelation of God's will bearing upon human activity. The words of Christ are brought out more prominently than his person; and no writer of the New Testament lays so much stress on the discourses of Christ which developed the idea of the righteousness of the kingdom of heaven as he (comp. i. 2, 4, 5, 9, 20; ii. 13, 14; iii. 17, 18; iv. 4; v. 10, 12, etc.). For this reason he stands farthest away, of all the apostolic laborers, from Paul. Some have asserted that these two writers expressly contradict one another (Baur, Schwegler, Holtzmann, etc.); others, that there is a contrast between them which cannot be reconciled (Luther, Kern); while there are others still who hold that there is entire agreement (Thiersch, Hofmann, Lange, Philippi, Huther, etc.). Weiss and Beyschlag have recently tried to remove the whole difficulty, on the basis of the early date of James. There is no direct antithesis between the two men, for James was writing for those who held the works of faith to be unnecessary. Paul, on the other hand, wrote to show the incompetency of the works of the natural man to justify. James agrees with Paul in his main point, that faith without corresponding works is insufficient (comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 2; 2 Cor. v. 10).

There are indications that the Epistle was written at a comparatively late date in the apostolic period. Schneckenburger, Thiersch, Hofmann, Schaff, B. Weiss, Bleek, Beyschlag, [Alford, Plumtre, Lumby], and others hold to an earlier origin; and some regard it as the first of the New-Testament writings. Their reasons do not seem to us sufficient. The synagogue (ii. 2) is not a Jewish synagogue, but a place of Christian worship, controlled by Christians (ii. 3). The expectation of the second coming is also appealed to (v. 8 sqq.); but this expectation prevailed during the whole of the apostolic period. As the First Epistle of Peter seems to have made use of James, and itself was written in the year 65 or 66, we conclude that James was written a few years before.

The author designates himself as "James a servant of Jesus Christ." This was the brother of the Lord, who stood at the head of the Church at Jerusalem, and took such a prominent part in the council of Jerusalem (Acts xv.). Notices confirming the genuineness of the Epistle are not found till the close of the second century, and Origen is the first to quote him by name; but he did not regard the work as authentic. Eusebius also placed it among the antilegomena. In the Syrian Church, however, the Peshito version received it, and Ephraem quoted it. In the Latin Church, Jerome accepted it as canonical, and so, likewise, Augustine. This difference of opinion is to be regarded as due to the fact that James the brother of the Lord was not an apostle. (See preceding article.) But the whole tone, as well as the special injunctions, of the book, are in exact accord with the character of James as it is brought out in the New Testament and by Hegesippus. He looked at the gospel in its legal aspect, and insisted upon righteousness of life. Both these features are prominent in the Epistle. The comparatively good Greek style of the composition is no argument against its genuineness; for Galilee in the first century was completely hellenized.

JAMES, John Angell, an English Congregational pastor; b. at Blandford, June 6, 1785; d. at Birmingham, Oct. 1, 1859; educated in the theological academy conducted by Rev. David Bogue, D.D., at Gosport; ordained pastor of Carr's Lane Chapel at Birmingham, May 8, 1806, when barely twenty-one, and continued in that office till his death, over fifty years, Rev. R. W. Dale becoming his co-pastor in later years, and afterwards his biographer. Mr. James was a very laborious, earnest, and successful pastor, not remarkable for scholarship, but with fine talents for practical service, a good person and voice, a ready flow of language, and a constant aim at religious impression. As an author he is best known by The Anxious Enquirer after Salvation Directed and Encouraged, which has had so wide a circulation in Britain and America, and has been translated into several languages. But a collected edition of his works numbers fifteen volumes. They consist of sermons and addresses on practical subjects, — the ministry, the family, revivals, Christian graces, duties of young men, young women, and church-members. Mr. James cultivated a warm friendship with American ministers, — Dr. W. B. Sprague, Dr. S. H. Cox, Dr. C. G. Finney, and others, — and was a chief promoter of the formation of the Evangelical Alliance in 1846. See DALE: Life and Letters of John Angell James, Lond., 1862. F. H. MARLING.

JAMESON (Anna Murphy), Mrs., b. in Dublin, May 19, 1797; married Robert Jameson, 1823, but soon after ceased to live with him; d. at Ealing, London, March 17, 1860. She is mentioned here because of her familiar Sacred and Legendary Art (London, 1848, 2 vols.), Legends of the Monastic Orders (1850), Legends of the Madonna (1852), History of our Lord and of his Precursor as represented in Art (vol. i. 1860, vol. ii. finished by Lady Eastlake, 1864). These works have all been republished in America.

JANES, Edmund Storer, D.D., LL.D., b. at Sheffield, Mass., April 27, 1807; d. in New-York City, Sept. 18, 1876. From 1824 to 1830 he taught school in New-York State and New Jersey, when he entered the Methodist ministry; in May, 1840, he was elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society, and in 1841 resigned to accept the episcopate, having already impressed the whole church with his piety, eloquence, and wisdom. Henceforth for thirty-two years he was to be a wanderer over the earth, travelling longer distances, enduring longer absences from home, and performing more official work, than any of his colleagues. There was hardly a single successful measure of his denomination which did not bear the trace of his wisdom in council, and the vigor of his hand in execution. He greatly excelled as a preacher. See his Life by Henry B. Ridgeway, D.D., New York, 1882.

JANEWAY, Jacob Jones, D.D., a Presbyterian divine; was b. in New-York City, 1776; d. at New Brunswick, N.J., June 27, 1858. He graduated at Columbia College, 1794; became co-pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, in 1799; was chosen professor of theology in the Western Theological Seminary at Allegheny in 1826; and spent the last years of his life at New Brunswick, where he acted as pastor of a Dutch Reformed Church from 1830 to 1832, and as vice-president of Rutgers College from 1833 to 1839. He was one of the founders of Princeton Seminary, and took an active part in the theological controversies of the day. He wrote Commentaries on Romans and Hebrews (Philadelphia), Internal Evidence of the Bible (1845), Review of Schaff on Protestantism, etc. See his Life, 1861.

JAN'NES AND JAM'BRES, spoken of in 2 Tim. iii. 8 as opposing Moses, are often referred to in Jewish tradition under different spellings. The names are evidently phonetically paired. They are Hebrew, not Egyptian, names. 'יָנֵס, also written יָנִיס and יָנוּס, also called יָנֵן, comes from the root נָס ("to seduce"); 'יאָבְרֵס, with the Greek ending 'ης, and with β inserted (written in the Targum יַמְבְּרוּס, יַמְבְּרוּס, but in the Talmud מַמְרֵי or מַמְרֵי), comes from the root מָרָא ("to be obstinate;" in Hiphil, "to rebel"). So the names mean "the seducer" and "the inciter" respectively. Jewish tradition has much to say about them. They two evidently stand opposite the two leaders, Moses and Aaron, whose miracles they imitated in the presence of Pharaoh. They were sons of Balaam, killed the Israelitish children on Pharaoh's order, opposed that people, carried on debates with Moses (whose teachers they had previously been), prepared a model of the golden calf, and finally accompanied Balaam. There is nothing remarkable in Paul's mention of them: their names must have been often heard in Gamaliel's school, and they were current among the heathen. Pliny apparently borrowed (Hist. nat. xxx. 2) from an apocryphal writing upon them mentioned by Origen (Tract. xxv. in Matth.) and Ambrose (on 2 Tim.). The Pythagorean Numenius in the second century knew of them (Origen: c. Celsus., iv. 51, and Eusebius: Præp. evang., ix. 8), as did Apuleius (Apol. II.) and the author of the Gospel of Nicodemus (c. 5). The comparison between them and the teachers described in the context (2 Tim. iii. 8 sq.) rests upon the similarity of their wilful resistance to the heralds of the divine truth and their lack of genuine faith-power. For the original passages concerning them, see Fabricius: Codex Pseudepigraphus, ed. 2, I. 813-825. v. ORELLI.

JANOW, Matthias von, d. in Prague, Nov. 30, 1394; descended from a noble Bohemian family; studied theology in Prague and Paris, whence he was often called Magister Parisiensis; was appointed canon in the Cathedral of St. Vitus in 1381, and stands in the history of the Bohemian Church as one of the predecessors of Hus. He was not a great preacher, but exercised influence through his practical care of souls, and through his writings,—treatises, which in 1392 he collected under the title Regulæ veteris et novi testamenti. The principles of reform which he propagated were the abolition of any merely human addition to Christianity (doctrinal or ceremonial) and the return to the simple foundation on which rested the Apostolical Church. In 1433 Johann Rockycana asserted before the council of Basel that Janow used to administer the cup to the laity in the Lord's Supper; but there is nothing in his writings which confirms that statement. See JORDAN: Die Vorläufer des Hussitentums in Böhmen, Leipzig, 1846. G. LECHLER.

JANSEN, Cornelius, b. in the village of Acquoy, North Holland, Oct. 28, 1585; d. in Ypres, May 6, 1638. After completing his preliminary studies at Leerdam and Utrecht, he went to Louvain in 1602, and studied for a short time at the Jesuit college; but, becoming dissatisfied with the doctrines taught there, he removed to the College of Adrian VI., and came under the influence of Jacobus Jansenius, a follower of Michael Bajus, and a disciple of Augustine. Here he made the acquaintance of M. du Vergier de Hauranne, afterwards Abbé de St. Cyran. Having graduated in philosophy at Louvain in 1604, he went to Paris, and subsequently accompanied Du Vergier to Bayonne, where they remained together for six years, devoting themselves to the study of Augustine's writings. Returning to Louvain in 1617, he declined the offer of a chair of philosophy, and was made director of the newly founded College of St. Pulcheria, which was completed, and its regulations instituted by him. He did not long retain this position, desiring to devote himself to theology. In 1619 he became doctor in that faculty. By incessant study of Augustine he became convinced that Catholic theologians had departed from the doctrine of the ancient Church. On a visit of St. Cyran to Louvain, in 1621, they divided their work for the reformation of the Church, Jansen taking the department of teaching, and St. Cyran that of organization. Intimate relations were formed with distinguished priests in Ireland. In 1623, and again in 1627, Jansen, deputed by the university, travelled to Spain in order to oppose the Jesuits, who had attempted to establish professorships of their own at Louvain. He was successful, the Jesuits in the Low Countries being ordered to continue to observe the restrictions which had been laid upon them in 1612. Notwithstanding their hostility, he was appointed in 1630 to the Regius Professorship of biblical exegesis at Louvain. In the same year he engaged in a controversy about Protestantism with Voetius, in which he was scouted. He secured the favor of the Spanish court by his opposition to France and its recent alliance with the Protestant Gustavus Adolphus. He also attacked the pretensions of France, in his pseudonymous work entitled Alexandri Patricii Armacani, Theologi, Mars Gallicus, seu de Justitia Armorum et Fœderum Regis Gallie Libri Duo. For this service to Spain he was rewarded with the bishopric of Ypres in 1636. Here he died of the plague two years after, just as he had completed his great work, the Augustinus, embodying the results of twenty-two years' study of the writings of Augustine. These writings he declared that he had read through ten times, pen in hand, and the portions relating to sin and grace thirty times. The manuscripts of his work were bequeathed to Lamaeus, Fromundus, and Calenus, for publication; but he declared his obedience to the Roman see, if any alterations should be desired. The work was published under the title Cornelii Jansenii Episcopi Iprensis, Augustinus, seu Doctrinæ Sti Augustini de Humana Naturæ Sanitate, Ægritudine, Medicina, adversus Pelagianum et Massilienses. It consists of three parts. In the first he gives an historical account of the Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian (Massilian) heresies. In the second he sets forth the Augustinian doctrine as to human nature in its primitive and fallen states. The third part, in ten books, expounds Augustine's ideas concerning grace, and also the predestination of men and angels. The fundamental proposition of the work is, that, since Adam's fall, free agency no longer exists in man, pure works are a mere gratuitous gift of God, and the predestination of the elect is not an effect of his presence of our works, but of his free volition. The Augustinus struck at the Jesuits, who wished to conciliate the doctrine of salvation by grace with a certain amount of free agency; and its sting lay mainly in the epilogue, which draws a parallel between the errors of the Massilians and those recentiorum quorundam, the Jesuits being referred to.

JANSENISM. See JANSEN. — The printing of the Augustinus was completed in 1640, notwithstanding the efforts of the Jesuits to suppress it. In 1641 the reading of it was prohibited by the Inquisition, and in 1643 by the bull In Eminentissimum of Urban VIII. Though opposed in France and Belgium, the bull was finally accepted in 1651, subscription not being insisted on. Jansen's friends urged that the bull specified no particular doctrines as heretical; accordingly eight heretical propositions, afterwards reduced to five, were submitted to the Pope as contained in the Augustinus: (1) There are some commandments of God which just men, although willing and anxious to obey them, are unable with the strength they have to fulfil, and the grace by which they might fulfil them is also wanting to them. (2) In the state of fallen nature, inward grace is never resisted. (3) In the fallen state, merit and demerit do not depend on a liberty which excludes necessity, but on a liberty which excludes constraint. (4) The Semi-Pelagians admitted the necessity of an inward prevenient grace for the performance of each particular act, and also for the first act of faith, and yet were heretical, since they maintained that this grace was of such a nature that the will of man was able either to resist or obey it. (5) It is Semi-Pelagian to say that Christ died, or shed his blood, for all men without exception.

In 1653 Innocent X., in the bull Cum Occasione Impressionis Libri, pronounced the five propositions heretical. The Jansenists declared their readiness to condemn the propositions in the heretical sense, but not as the sense of Jansen. Therefore, in 1654, the Pope declared the condemned propositions to be in the Augustinus, and that their condemnation as the teaching of Jansen must be subscribed. Arnauld and the Port Royalists refused (see PORT ROYAL), maintaining that the Pope's infallibility extended only to the doctrine of the faith, and not to a question of fact. He was expelled from the Sorbonne, and eighty others withdrew with him. The same year a general assembly of the clergy adopted a formula condemning the five propositions as contained in the Augustinus, and declaring that Jansen had perverted Augustine's meaning. A bull of Alexander VII., Oct. 16, indorsed the decision of the assembly. This document was sanctioned by the king in 1661; and the clergy, and all inmates of conventual establishments, were required to sign it on penalty of being treated as heretics. The leading Jansenists went into hiding, and the Port Royal nuns were imprisoned and cruelly treated. (See PORT ROYAL.) Four bishops refused to subscribe to more than the promise of a "respectful silence" concerning the question of fact. At the solicitation of the king, the Pope named two archbishops and seven bishops as a tribunal to try the four, and with authority to suspend or excommunicate. Before they met, Alexander VII. died, and was succeeded by Clement IX. Nineteen bishops who had subscribed the condemnation now addressed the Pope on behalf of the four, asserting their orthodoxy. This they followed by a letter to the king, declaring that the sentence of the four would be an invasion of the liberties of the Church, and would make the bishops no more than vicars of the Pope. In September, 1668, instructions came from Rome to make up with the four on any terms which would save the credit of the holy see. The result was the compromise known as "The Peace of Clement IX.," by which assent was not required to the declaration that Jansen had taught the five propositions in a purely heretical sense. This was a virtual defeat of the holy see. The conditions of the peace were kept secret.

The quiet was of short duration. Louis XIV. was won over by the Jesuits. The old question of subscription was revived by M. Eustace, confessor of Port Royal, who threw into the form of a Case of Conscience the question whether one who condemned the incriminated doctrine of

Jansen, yet maintained a respectful silence as to the question of fact, could sign the formulary with a good conscience. A violent controversy ensued, resulting in the bull of Clement XI. (1705), Vineam Domini, confirming and renewing all preceding condemnations of the five propositions. The refusal of the Port Royal nuns to subscribe this bull was punished by the suppression of the convent in 1709, and the complete destruction of the buildings in 1710. The demand for a new edition of Quesnel's Réflexions Morales sur le Nouveau Testament stimulated the Jesuits to secure its condemnation by the papal see. They obtained an edict of Clement XI. in 1712, condemning it as a text-book of undisguised Jansenism. This was followed, in 1713, by the bull Unigenitus, in which a hundred and one propositions from Quesnel's New Testament were condemned as Jansenistic. Upon this bull the French Church divided into two parties. The king finally decided that the bull should be binding on Church and State. On the death of Louis XIV. the Jansenists appealed to a general council, claiming that the bull was an attack upon the Catholic faith and morals. They were called, therefore, Appellants; their opponents, Acceptants. The Appellants were at last forced to submit. The bull was formally registered in 1720 as the law of the kingdom, with a reservation in favor of the liberties of the Gallic Church. From this time forward the Jansenists were rigorously repressed, and during the eighteenth century Jansenism degenerated in France. A temporary revival was stimulated by the reported miracles wrought in the cemetery of St. Medard, in Paris, at the grave of François de Paris, a Jansenist deacon of St. Medard, and afterwards a recluse, who died in 1727. The spot became a shrine of pilgrimage, and a scene of fanatical excesses, which weakened the cause of Jansenism in intelligent minds. The grave of François became the grave of Jansenism. After the middle of the eighteenth century the Jansenists of France ceased to attract public attention. Driven from France, they took refuge in Holland, in Utrecht, and Haarlem, which remained faithful to Rome when the rest of the United Provinces embraced Calvinism on their liberation from the Spanish yoke. In 1702 Peter Codde, vicar of the the chapter of Utrecht, was suspended by Clement XI. for holding Jansenistic principles, and was detained at Rome for three years, while Theodore de Cock, a Jesuit, was appointed in his stead. The chapter of Utrecht refused to acknowledge him, and joined themselves with the Appellants. The government of Holland, in 1703, suspended the papal bull, and deposed De Cock. Codde and his friends in 1723 elected an archbishop, Cornelius Steenhoven, for whom episcopal consecration was obtained from Vorlet, a Jansenistic bishop. In 1742 Meindarts, Jansenist bishop of Utrecht, established Haarlem, and in 1758 Deventer, as his suffragan sees; and in 1763 a synod was held which sent its acts to Rome in recognition of the primacy of that see. Since that time the formal succession has been maintained; each bishop on his appointment notifying the Pope of his election, and asking for confirmation. This has uniformly been refused, except on condition of accepting the bull Unigenitus. In 1856 the Jan-senists issued a protest against the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, which was answered by a formal anathema from Rome. The Jansenists are Roman Catholics, but deny the papal infallibility, and recognize the Pope only as head of the bishops, and place the highest authority of the Church in a general council. They style themselves "The Roman Catholics of the episcopal clergy." They number about five thousand, and are divided into twenty-five parishes in the dioceses of Haarlem and Utrecht. They have a seminary at Amersfoort, founded in 1726.

JANUARIUS, St. (San Genuaro), the patron saint of the city of Naples, was bishop of Benevento when the persecution of Diocletian broke out, and was decapitated at Puteoli. His head and two phials containing his blood are preserved in a chapel of the cathedral of Naples, and exhibited twice a year, — May 1 and Sept. 19. When the phials are brought within sight of the head, the blood becomes liquid, and begins to bubble up; and this miracle, when happening promptly and in a vigorous manner, is considered a good omen for the city and people of Naples. There are no less than thirteen other saints and martyrs of the name Januarius, which at one time was very common in Africa and Southern Italy. See Act. Sanct. Sept. 19.

JAPAN, Christianity in. No seeds of the religion of Jesus are known to have been planted in Nihon until the arrival at Kagoshima, in Satsuma, of Francis Xavier, in 1549. The "black ships" of Europe visited Japan as early as 1542, when a lucrative commerce at once sprung up with Portugal. Anjiro, a Japanese refugee, assisted by Mendez Pinto, in 1545 reached Malacca on one of these ships, and there met Xavier, accompanying him to Goa, north of Calcutta, where he embraced Christianity, was baptized, and educated in the Jesuit College. In July, 1549, Xavier, with Cosmo Torrez his principal assistant, Joan Fernandez a layman, and "Brother Paul of the Holy Faith" (Anjiro), sailed from Goa, reaching Ximo (Shima, "the island," or Kiushiu), and landing at Kagoshima Aug. 12. The first converts were the wife and relatives of Anjiro; and, after a year's stay, one hundred believers were numbered. Obligated to leave on account of the irritation of the daimio (feudal lord) of Satsuma at the conduct of the Portuguese merchants, the missionaries went to Hirado Island, making a hundred converts in a fortnight, and thence crossing over to Yamaguchi, in Nagato province. Meeting with little success here, they set out to Kiôto, the miako, or capital. Owing to the chronic civil war, amounting almost to anarchy, which afflicted Japan during the middle of the sixteenth century, nothing could be done in Kiôto. So, returning to Yamaguchi, Xavier presented his gifts and credentials, and, in place of a return in kind, received permission to preach in public, and, later, the gift of ground for a church and college. Within two months, five hundred converts were gathered, when Xavier (with his characteristic restlessness) went to Bungo province, and shortly after left Japan, dying on an island on the coast of China. In 1553 new missionaries arrived, and Bungo became the centre of Christianity in Japan. In 1566 there were two thousand converts at Yamaguchi, when, a feudal revolution having broken out, the church was burned, Torrez fled, and the church was for eighteen years without a pastor. In 1558 Villela visited Kiôto and Sakai, securing two converts among the feudal nobility, — the holder of the fief of Omura, and one Arima no Kami. The violent excesses and ostentatious destruction of temples and idols practised by the former aroused the hostility of the Buddhist priests, who henceforward became the relentless foe of the new faith. Portugal sent new re-enforcements of Jesuit priests in 1560; but the civil war, and the bitter enmity of Mori (then lord of ten provinces), drove them from Kiôto and Omura, and finally to Nagasaki. At this stage there were already many thousands of Christians.

We may here glance at the condition of Japan and the methods of propagation employed. Politically it was that period known in Japanese history as the epoch of civil war, when learning and the arts of peace were at a low ebb, and fighting was the chief pastime. The power of the mikado, or emperor, was a mere shadow. The family of the Ashikaga shôguns, or military regents (1335-1573), had so decayed that their rule was nominal; so that the country was parcelled out among the feudal barons, or daimios, all jealous of, and fighting with, each other. Leger for the advantages of foreign trade, the daimios of Kinshiu especially favored the missionaries, and in several instances compelled their subjects to become Christians by proclamations; the alternative being banishment, or confiscation of goods.

Religiously, Japan was ripe for a new faith. Shinto, the indigenous cult, had been so overlaid by Buddhism, that it had fallen away into a mere matter of archæology for the scholar, and mythology for the people.

On the other hand, the peasantry, reduced to poverty and misery by centuries of war, found little comfort in the faith of India. The simple tenets of Shaka Muni had swollen to a sensuous system of worship and of commercial prayers and masses. Except the gorgeous magnificence of altars and temples, and the plethora of monasteries and bonzes, there was little to show of vitality in Buddhism. Further, the monks were really a clerical militia, capable of equipping and leading to battle whole armies of adherents, both in tonsure and topknot, and were thus an organized and dangerous political power.

At such a time, and among such an imaginative people as the Japanese, the Portuguese Jesuits landed. With crucifix and painting, medal and cross, vestment, incense, lights, altars, and abundant gold, they outdazzled the scenic displays of the Buddhists. With eloquence, fervor, and devotion, with their new doctrines and morality, they won thousands of enthusiastic converts.

In Nobunaga, the hater and crushing persecutor of the Buddhists, who had also deposed Ashikaga, and wished to unify all Japan for the mikado, missionaries found a friend who needed a counterpoise to the bonzes. Organtin, under his protection, labored in Kiôto from 1568 to 1578. In 1582 the three Christian nobles sent a mission to the Holy See. In company with Valignani, they reached Rome, making a lengthened stay in Europe; but in the year of their return, in 1585, Nobunaga their friend was assassinated. Hidéyoshi (Faxiba), his successor, though from the first opposed to Christianity, masked his policy, since his prime necessity was to win the friendship of the southern daimios, among whom were the Christian nobles and gentry, in order to bring them to his side and under his control. Colleges were planted at Ôzaka and Sakai; churches were built in many provinces; and the illustrious converts, Kuroda ("Kondera") and Konishi ("Don Austin") professed their faith.

In 1587 Hidéyoshi, unmasking his purpose, ordered all the foreign priests to proceed to Hirado, and leave the country. The measure not being urged, they left Hirado, and, under the protection of the Christian princes, pursued their work in private. Organtin and Rodriguez returned to Kiôto; and in 1591 Martizen, the first bishop of Japan, arrived. Three thousand Japanese were baptized between 1587 and 1590, and the literary activity in the interest of the propaganda went on.

Hitherto the only foreigners in Japan were Portuguese, and the only phase of Christianity Jesuitism. In 1590, in an embassy sent from the governor of the Philippine Islands, were four Franciscan friars, who trespassed on the Jesuits' ground, on the plea that they came as attachés to the embassy. By the bull of Pope Gregory XIII., dated Jan. 28, 1585 (confirmed by Clement III. in 1600), Japan had been assigned exclusively to the Jesuits. The Franciscans, violating their promise made to the Japanese ruler, not to preach, began to do that very thing, thereby rousing the wrath of a man who was never trifled with.

Hidéyoshi having reduced all Japan to unity, and been made kuambaku, or regent, had now to face the double problem of finding employment for a host of warriors bred to arms from infancy, and of ridding Japan of a foreign priesthood whom he suspected of political designs. On a frivolous pretext he declared war against Corea, and in 1592 sent an army of a hundred and fifty thousand men, composed largely of converts, led by Christian generals, to invade that country, and the next year arrested six Franciscans and three Jesuits, who were publicly burned to death at Nagasaki. Nevertheless, more Spanish mendicant friars entered Japan, and the Jesuits explained Hidéyoshi's act as an excess of zeal in his lieutenants. They also ably seconded the efforts of the Japanese ruler to break up the slave-trade then cursing the country. The wretchedness and poverty brought on by the Korean war caused many of the Japanese poor people to sell themselves to the Portuguese slave-traders, who also bought Korean captives, and sold them in China and the Philippines. Even the Malay and negro servants speculated in human flesh. Hidéyoshi died Sept. 19, 1598; the Christian leaders came back from Corea; and in 1600 one hundred Jesuit priests arrived to stimulate the propagation of the faith. The hopes of the Christians now gathered around Hidéyori, the son of Hidéyoshi; but in the battle of Sekigahara (October, 1600), the southern army, in which the Christian generals fought against Iyéyasū, was defeated. Iyéyasū became master of the country, and from Yedo issued a decree of expulsion against the foreign priests. In 1602 large numbers of new missionaries of various orders arrived; and although Organtín, Kuroda, and Konishi were dead, the Christians were said to number a million eight hundred thousand. In 1608 Japan was declared a missionary field, open to all missionaries of the Roman-Catholic Church by the bull of Pope Paul V.; while in 1611 Dutch, Spanish, and Portuguese embassies came to Japan, and in 1613 the English established a factory at Hirado. To the intrigues of the English and Dutch traders, the Jesuit writers attribute the open hostility manifested by Iyéyasū. In 1614 Christianity was declared a religion dangerous to the State; and this time the decrees were rigidly enforced. The churches were destroyed; and a hundred and thirty-nine Franciscans, Dominicans, and Jesuits, with several hundred Japanese priests and helpers, were arrested, put on board three large junks at Nagasaki, and sent out of the country. When many of these secretly returned, they were ferreted out, and put to death. The Christians, mostly of the peasantry, were thus wholly deprived of teachers and leaders. In 1617 all foreign commerce was confined to Nagasaki; in 1621 Japanese were forbidden to leave the country; and in 1624 the empire was closed to all aliens, except Dutch and Chinese. Fire and sword were now used to annihilate Christianity, and to Paganize the people. Trampling on the crucifix became the sign and proof of apostasy. Thousands of native Christians fled to China, Formosa, and the Philippines; and in 1637 thousands more rose in armed rebellion, and, seizing an old castle at Shimabara in Kiushiu, resisted for two months the assaults of the government troops. Once captured, the thirty-seven thousand Christians were given over to massacre, and drowning in the sea. After this, persecution, inquisition, and torture went on so successfully, that, when the eighteenth century opened, there were no known believers in "the Jesus doctrine" in Japan, except some gray-headed prisoners. In 1709 Jean Baptiste Sidotti, an Italian priest, reached Japan by way of Manila, but was at once seized, brought before the Inquisition at Yedo, and imprisoned until his death. In 1829 several Christians were seized at Ozaka, and crucified, on the suspicion of communicating with foreigners. In spite of two centuries and a half of vigilant repression and supposed extirpation, the roots of the faith still kept their vitality.

When, after long isolation from the rest of the world, Japan was opened to foreign trade and residence, in 1859, the three great branches of the Christian Church at once sent their missionaries into the field at Nagasaki, Kanagawa, or Hakodaté. The Roman Catholics had the advantage of historic continuity in their labors; for, almost as soon as they landed, they found in the villages near Nagasaki thousands of believers, descendants of the martyrs of the seventeenth century, still secretly practising their faith. At intervals, however, until 1872, when the government ceased persecution, many of these Christians were seized, imprisoned, and exiled among the northern provinces. Statistics of Roman Catholicism in Japan are not easily accessible.

"The Holy Orthodox Catholic and Apostolic Church" of Russia has a mission whose imposing buildings are in Tōkiō; and its founder, the archimandrite Nicolai, with his assistants, has trained up a large native ministry, whose following numbers several thousands.

Protestant missionary operations were also begun in 1859 by the London Missionary Society and four American churches—Reformed (Dutch), Episcopal, Presbyterian, and Baptist—at Nagasaki and Kanagawa. Owing to the jealous hostility of the government, no disciples, except those "who came by night," were made for ten years. Profession of the outlawed religion was at risk of life or limb. Meanwhile the mastery of the language, and the work of healing, teaching, and translation, went on. The first Protestant Christian Church was organized at Yokohama, on the Perry treaty-ground, in 1852, by the Rev. James Ballagh of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America; and the fourth, in Tōkiō, the capital, in 1873, in which year the anti-Christian edicts were removed. The Reformed churches holding the presbyterial order formed themselves into an alliance for mutual help: other native bodies of believers were organized on an independent basis. In Great Britain and the United States increasing interest was manifested in this most promising missionary field; and all the important evangelical bodies soon had representatives at one of the open ports, which, since 1868, have been Nagasaki, Yokohama, Hiogo, Hakodaté, Niigata, besides Tōkiō. Since 1874, Christians have organized churches, and worshipped unmolested in many places in the interior; and now every large island has flourishing churches of the Protestant, Roman, and Greek communions. The methods of propagation used by the brethren of the Mission Apostolique of Paris are in the main those of Papal Christianity everywhere, and not differing greatly from those of the sixteenth century in Japan. They claim a following of many thousands. The mission of the Holy Synod of Russia makes liberal use of Protestant versions of the Holy Bible, but is otherwise rigidly faithful to traditional mediævalism. All Christian bodies make use of the press, secular and religious schools. The literary opposition is in general not very severe, nor of a character to inspire respect for the Japanese intellect. The vigorous native newspapers may be said to be as friendly as hostile. Buddhist priests and rabid patriots are the chief opponents; and the products of the infidel writers and lectures of Christendom are diligently translated into Japanese.

The statistics of the work of Protestant evangelicals for the year 1881 are as follows:—

The Bible societies—American, National (Scotland), and British and Foreign—have agents, who in 1881 disposed (by sale only) of eighteen million printed pages of the Bible (in whole, or in parts), at sixteen thousand dollars; one society reporting an increase of business, in one year, of a hundred per cent. Two tract societies—the American and London Religious—disposed of a hundred and twenty thousand books and tracts, or two and a half million pages. The Japanese Christian associations and native religious press help in diffusing Christian leaven. A high moral standard of character is insisted upon by all the Protestant churches; and in no other respect, except in the constant use of the Holy Scriptures in the vernacular, does the Reformed Christianity of to-day differ more from that known during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries in Japan. The influences of the religion of Jesus are penetrating deeply into the social life of the people, and rooting themselves in heart and intellect alike. Undoubtedly the way has been prepared and made smooth for the rapid success of missionary operations by the wondrous assimilation of modern civilization by the Japanese. By a series of political movements, which began during the century preceding the arrival of Commodore Perry, and which culminated in the revolution of 1868 (which destroyed the duarchy of which Yedo with the “tycoon,” and Kioto with the mikado were foci), the nation was prepared to adopt the civilization to which Christendom has given birth, and which she has nourished. The government of the mikado, when restored to supreme authority in Tōkiō, in 1868, at first persecuted, but later, under pressure of diplomacy at home, and of shame in Europe, abandoned coercion in religious matters, suffered Shintō to fall into abeyance, and, nominally at least, granted toleration. Now, in friendly rivalry, the national common school and the missionary educational systems flourish together, male and female in both having equal privileges. There also prevails increasingly among the people of Japan the belief that righteousness exalts a nation, and that pure religion and morals, such as Christianity offers and demands, furnish the surest ground of progress and national longevity. Licentiousness, intemperance, and lying are the moral cancers of the national character; but the ideals of Jesus, once grafted upon the affectionate, filial, loyal, courteous spirit of the Japanese, will heal the scars of sin, and produce one of the noblest types of redeemed humanity.

Not the least tokens of the zeal and consecration which characterize Protestant missionaries in Japan are the fruits of their laborious scholarship. The various translations, grammar, and phrase-book of the Rev. S. R. Brown, D.D., the superb dictionaries of J. C. Hepburn, M.D., the linguistic helps, scholarly and religious works, of Imbrie, Amerman, Stout, Knox, Eby, N. Brown, and others, have not only shed lustre upon American scholarship, but have greatly enriched native and foreign Christian literature, especially the former. The medical, literary, and pedagogic work of others have borne fruit in a mighty harvest of good to the nation at large. Like some of the enormous blocks of stones that form the foundation-wall of their fortresses, defying war, time, and earthquake-shock, are the works of Christian missionaries in the edifice of Japan's new civilization.

JAQUELOT, Isaac, b. at Vassy, Dec. 16, 1647; d. in Berlin, Oct. 20, 1708; was a pastor in his native town, when the revocation of the Edict of Nantes compelled him to leave France; and settled, first at The Hague (1686), afterwards in Berlin (1702), as pastor of French congregations of exiles. Besides two volumes of sermons, and several philosophical treatises, he published Avis sur le tableau du socinianisme de M. Jurieu (1692), against the dogmatism of Jurieu, and Conformité de la foi et de la raison (1705), against the scepticism of Bayle, following up both of these tracts with several other polemical works.

JARVIS, Samuel Farmer, D.D., LL.D., historiographer to the Episcopal Church in the United States of America; b. at Middletown, Conn., Jan. 20, 1786; d. there March 26, 1851. He was graduated at Yale College 1805; entered the ministry of the Episcopal Church 1810; was minister in New-York City until 1819; from 1820 to 1826 was minister in Boston; then spent nearly ten years in Europe. On his return, in 1835, he was appointed professor of Oriental literature in Washington (now Trinity) College, Hartford; from 1837 to 1842 minister in Middletown, Conn.; and 1838, historiographer. He published A Chronological Introduction to the History of the Church, London and New York, 1844; The Church of the Redeemed, or the History of the Mediatorial Kingdom, vol. i. (all published), Boston, 1850.

JASHER, Book of. The volume itself has perished; but two allusions to it are found in the Bible, — Josh. x. 13 and 2 Sam. i. 18. The word "Yashar" (Jasher) means upright; and therefore the title is probably a description of the book's contents, — a collection of lyrics setting forth the glorious deeds of the nation's heroes. We have no knowledge when the collection was made, nor how much ground it covered; yet interest in this lost book has been excited by our very ignorance, and conjecture has been rife. There have also been several books written which pretended to be the Book of Jasher, or, at all events, bore this title. Three of these are of Jewish origin. One is a moral treatise, written in A.D. 1394 by Rabbi Shabbatai Carmuz Levita, and exists in manuscript in the Vatican Library. Another, by Rabbi Tham (d. 1171), is a treatise on the Jewish ritual. It was published in Hebrew in Italy (1544), at Cracow (1586), and Vienna (1811). The third is a fabulous history of the events of the Hexateuch, was probably written by a Spanish Jew of the thirteenth century, and has been published at Venice (1625), Cracow (1628), and Prague (1668), in German, in Frankfurt-on-the-Main (1674), and in English (New York, 1840). A fourth Book of Jasher was a palpable and malicious fraud, perpetrated by Jacob Ilive, an infidel printer and type-founder of Bristol, Eng., who wrote, secretly printed at Bristol, and published at London, in 1751, The Book of Jasher, translated into English from the Hebrew by Aicuin of Britain, who went on a Pilgrimage into the Holy Land, reprinted at Bristol, 1827, and published in London, 1829 (2d ed., 1833, by Rev. C. R. Bond). The forgery owes its reputation to Horne's demolishing exposure, Introduction, iv. 741-747. For Dr. J. W. Donaldson's attempt to reconstruct the book of Jasher out of the Bible, see art. DONALDSON. See also art. The Book of Jasher, in EMANUEL DEUTSCH'S Literary Remains, New York, 1874, and in SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible.

JASON is the name of several Jews who figure largely in history during the period of the Maccabees. — I. Jason, son of Eleazar, was by Judas Maccabæus sent as ambassador to Rome to renew the alliance with the Romans (1 Macc. viii. 17). He was perhaps father of that Numenius who by Jonathan was sent to Rome to have the treaty renewed (1 Macc. xii. 16, xiv. 22). — II. Jason of Cyrene, a Hellenistic Jew, who shortly before the time of Christ, or perhaps in the beginning of the Christian era, wrote the history of Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, the purification of the temple, the wars against Antiochus Epiphanes and Eupator, the restoration of the law, and the liberation of the Holy City (175-160 B.C.). The work was in five books, but the original has perished. The present Second Book of the Maccabees, however, is an extract from it (2 Macc. ii. 19). — III. Jason, brother of the high priest Onias III., who, from sheer personal ambition, forgot his religion and fatherland so far as to buy the dignity of high priest for a considerable sum of money from Antiochus Epiphanes, and then prostitute the office for the purpose of introducing Hellenism among his countrymen, and despoiling them of their old national liberties (2 Macc. iv. 7; comp. 1 Macc. i. 13). His own name he changed from Jesus into Jason (Josephus: Antiq., XII. 5, 1). Under the castle in Jerusalem he established a gymnasium for the propagation of Hellenic culture. To the games at Tyre in honor of Herakles he sent ambassadors with presents, and Antiochus he received in the Holy City with great magnificence (2 Macc. iv. 22). But after the lapse of three years, in 172 or 171 B.C., he was supplanted in the favor of the king by a certain Menelaos, a brother of the Benjamite Simon (2 Macc. iv. 23). Menelaos made a higher bid for the high-priestly office, and Jason was compelled to fly to the Ammonites. Soon after, however, when a rumor arose that Antiochus had perished on an expedition against Egypt, Jason returned, at the head of one thousand men, laid siege to Jerusalem, and conquered the city, with the exception of the castle. He took a bloody revenge on his enemies, but was in the long-run unable to maintain himself. Once more he fled to the Ammonites; and afterwards, pursued by the Arabian King Aretas, he wandered about from place to place, until he finally perished miserably in Sparta (2 Macc. v. 5). Josephus, however, gives quite another account of his life and character (Antiq., XII. 5, 1; XX. 10, 3). According to that report, he succeeded his brother Onias III. in a legitimate way, but was himself expelled by a younger brother, Menelaos; and it was Menelaos, and not Jason, who labored to propagate Hellenism among the Jews. But we have no means to decide between the two accounts. See SCHÜRER: Neuest. Zeitgeschichte, p. 74. — IV. Jason, a Christian, in whose house Paul lived in Thessalonica (Acts xvii. 5-9). Whether he was identical with the Jason mentioned in Rom. xvi. 21 as a relative of Paul is not known. RÜETSCHL.

JAUFFRET, Gaspard Jean André Joseph; b. at La Roque-Brussane, Provence, Dec. 13, 1759; d. in Paris, May 13, 1823; studied at Toulon, Aix, and Paris; founded in 1791 the Annales de la Religion; became in 1801 attached to Cardinal Fesch as private secretary and vicar-general, and was appointed bishop of Metz in 1806, and archbishop of Aix in 1811. Many congregations of monks and nuns, both in Paris and in his dioceses, owe their re-organization to him. His principal writings are, De la Religion à l'Assemblée Nationale, 1791, and Du Culte Public, 1795.

JA'VAN designates in Hebrew, as in the other Oriental languages, — Syriac, Arabic, Coptic, and Persian, — the Greeks, and is derived from "Ionians" (Ἴωνες). In the table of nations (Gen. x. 2-4) Javan is mentioned as a son of Japheth, and father of Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim. The cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria contain the same notices. The Hindoos also call the people of the farthest West Javana (juvenis, "young"), because the Western nations were the youngest branches of the Indo-Germanic race. There was also a city of Javan in Arabia, alluded to in Ezek. xxvii. 19. [See B. STADE: De Populo Javan patergon patrio sermone conscriptum, Giesesen, 1880, 20 pp.]

JAY, William, an English clergyman, for nearly sixty-two years pastor of the Congregational Church at Argyle Chapel, Bath, Somersetshire; b. at Tisbury, Wiltshire, May 6, 1769; d. at Bath, Dec. 27, 1853; educated by Cornelius Winter at the dissenting academy at Marlborough. Began to preach at sixteen, and in 1788 became preacher to a small church at Churhan Malford, near Chippenham; thence he removed to Hope Chapel, Clifton, in 1789, and was ordained pastor at Bath, Jan. 30, 1791. Jay's preaching attracted hearers of all classes. John Foster said he was the "Prince of Preachers." Sheridan declared him to be the most manly orator he had ever heard. His published sermons have been widely circulated. His chief works are, An Essay on Marriage, Memoirs of the Rev. Cornelius Winter, Memoirs of the Rev. John Clark, Lectures on Female Scripture Characters. His Morning and Evening Exercises (4 vols.) have been very popular. His Autobiography, with a supplement by Bedford and J. A. James, was published in 1854. His ministry was distinguished by its directness, simplicity, scriptural and evangelical character, and was attended and maintained with marked success.

LEWELYN D. BEVAN.

JEALOUSY, The Trial of, is clearly and minutely described in Num. v. 11-31; but, as Jewish tradition modified and interpreted the legal statements, the following explanations will be of interest. "The tenth part of an ephah of barley-meal" — the "offering of jealousy, an offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance," because it had the object of bringing the wife's guilt before God, so that he might uncover it — (v. 15) was an offering of the suspected wife, and taken out of her hand (v. 25); yet, since wives had no personal property, it really came from him, and very appropriately too, since he instigated the trial, without the assent of his wife. It was a bloodless offering, because in no case was there in it any atonement; yet it was necessary, because no one dare appear empty before Jehovah (Exod. xxiii. 15, xxxiv. 20). It introduced the proceedings, and, as far as the wife was concerned, had no prejudicial value: it merely signified that she was suspected, not condemned, and consisted of barley, the food of the poor and of cattle, to indicate this suspicion; and, lastly, it was prepared without oil or frankincense, so that it might have no sweet-smelling savor. The woman's head was uncovered, and her hair unloosed, to indicate her asserted immodesty. The vessel used to hold the bitter drink was earthen, and therefore worthless. Dust — the sign of the deepest humiliation and contumely — from the floor of the tabernacle was mixed with the water taken from the laver in the holy place. The source indicated the holiness, which imparted, even to the dust of the tabernacle, a holy character, and thereby increased the strength of the drink. It was the water which wrought the curse (cf. Ps. cix. 18). The underlying idea was, that God dwelt in the midst of his people, and would come, according to his promise, and render efficacious his own appointed ordinances. In the working of the water of jealousy lay the punishment of the adulteress; and therefore the convict was not liable to the punishment for adultery enjoined in Lev. xx. 10, Deut. xxii. 22.

The Talmudic tract Sota (i.e., the dissolute wife) adds certain particulars to the Bible account. Before the trial of jealousy, warning must have been given by the husband. This being disregarded, the wife was taken before the local authorities, and then before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem. By the latter she was kindly but warningly exhorted to confession. If she confessed, then her marriage-certificate was destroyed, and she lost all claim upon her husband's property, but was otherwise unpunished. If she refused to confess, she was taken to the Nicanor Gate of the temple, which was between the Court of Israel and the Court of the Women, and there the solemn rites were performed. Her veil and her ornaments were removed, she was dressed in black garments, given the waters of jealousy to drink, and then the meal was thrown upon the altar. If innocent, she suffered no harm: if guilty, she felt its disastrous effects. These traditional ceremonies were designed to lessen the number of trial-cases, and certain whole classes of women were debarred ever drinking the waters of jealousy; e.g., those who by nature or age were incapable of bearing children. Moreover it was decided, that, if the jealous husband had himself been unchaste, the waters would have no effect; and so in other cases. Again: the good conduct of the woman, especially her zeal in teaching and practising the law, debarred such a trial for a certain length of time, even as long as three years. The school of Hillel abolished it entirely.

[It is important to observe the striking difference between the divine test of conjugal fidelity and human tests. In the former case the innocent woman certainly escaped, since there was really nothing given her but a little pure water and a few pinches of dust. But in the ordeals of the middle age, and among heathen nations, the result of the test was certain to be either death or great suffering, entirely irrespective of the moral status of the suspected wife. JEANNE D'ALBRET, Queen of Navarre, mother of Henry IV., of France, and the faithful friend of French Protestantism; b. in Pau, Jan. 7, 1528; d. in Paris, June 9, 1572. She was the eldest child of Henry d'Albret, King of Navarre, and Margaret d'Angoulême-Alençon, sister of Francis I. of France. By the death of her only brother she became in 1530 heir-presumptive of the kingdom Navarre-Béarn, which, though small in area, attained a large importance by its strategic location on the boundary between France and Spain. Jeanne was a feeble child, but possessed a clear and discerning mind, strong will, indomitable energy, and an unusual aptitude for diplomacy. In 1548 she was married to the Duke Antoine de Bourbon Vendôme, a man of elegant manners, but profligate habits. Their third child afterwards became Henry IV. of France. In 1555 the kingdom of Navarre, by the death of her father, passed into her hands.

This princess played a very prominent part in the Protestant Reformation of France. She had breathed the atmosphere of the new religious movement at the court of her mother, and in 1560 publicly renounced Catholicism, and accepted the confession of the Reformed Churches. Her subsequent bold advocacy of Protestantism won for her the title of the "Deborah of the Huguenots." Upon the death of her husband, in 1562, who had assumed an unfavorable attitude towards Protestantism, she began in earnest the introduction of the Reformation in her realm. The New Testament was translated by John de Licarrague de Briscours, and published at Rochelle, 1571, under the title, Jesus Christ Gure Jaunaren Testamentu Berria; and a church discipline (Discipline ecclési. du pays de Béarn) was drawn up after the model of the Genevan, by Raymond Merlin. In 1568 an army invaded her territory; but, warned beforehand, she made good her escape to La Rochelle, the common refuge of the Huguenots. During the troublous period that followed, down to the time of her death, she manifested the most ardent attachment to the cause of the Reformation. She remained at Rochelle three years; and her name and that of her son appear at the head of the list of those who were present at the third general synod of the Reformed Church held in that city. She died of a fever, at Paris, whither she had gone to make preparations for the marriage of her son with Margarete of Valois.

Jeanne contributed much to the cause of the Protestants in France. She is a representative type of the Huguenot, — full of faith, and animated by lofty purposes and indomitable courage. She will always remain one of the foremost figures of French Protestantism, as she was one of the noblest queens of the century.

His principal work is Sacred Literature (London, 1820, several editions), which was intended to be a review of Lowth on Hebrew Poetry and Isaiah, but has much independent value as a scholarly contribution to Bible exegesis. JE'BUS and JE'BUSITES (dry place, or trodden-down place, i. e., perhaps, for a threshing-floor). The Jebusites were a Canaanitic tribe (Gen. x. 16), belonging to the Amoritic branch (Josh. x. 5). They are always mentioned last among the Canaanites (Gen. xv. 21; Josh. ix. 1, xxiv. 11), probably because they formed only a small tribe.

But they were brave. When the Israelites entered the promised land, the Jebusites occupied the southern part of the mountains of Judah, and were called, after their chief stronghold, Jebus, the later Jerusalem (Josh. xi. 3, xviii. 28). Their land was allotted to Benjamin; but Jebus, or Jebusi, successfully resisted Aoshua and later sieges, and was conquered only by David (2 Sam. v. 6; 1 Chron. xi. 4), who made it his capital, as it had been that of the Canaanites for many centuries; probably so as early as the time of Abraham, if, as is likely, it was identical with the Salem of Gen. xiv. 18. It was at that time very small, covering only the hill of Zion. It owed its strength simply to its situation. In the division of the land, Jebus fell to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28).

JEHOI'ACHIN (whom Jehovah has appointed), the son and successor of Jehoiakim; king of Judah (2 Kings xxiv. 8–16). He reigned only three months and ten days; for Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, carried him and ten thousand captives, including the nobles and artisans, to Babylon, and he remained in captivity thirty-seven years, until Evil-merodach released him, and put him at the head of all the captive kings (Jer. lii. 31–34).

JEHOI'ADA (whom Jehovah knows), high priest, and husband of Jehosheba, the aunt of Joash, who alone of the family of Ahaziah escaped the murderous hand of Athaliah (2 Kings xi. 1–xii. 2). Jehoiada was the guardian of the young king, put him upon the throne, killed Athaliah, and, so long as he lived, so wisely directed Joash that all things went well. In recognition of his eminent services to Church and State he was buried "in the city of David, among the kings" (2 Chron. xxiv. 16). The chronicler states his age at death to have been a hundred and thirty years.

JEHOI'AKIM (whom Jehovah sets up), the eldest son of Josiah, and the brother and successor of Jehoahaz upon the throne of Judah. He reigned wickedly for eleven years, when he was killed or murdered, and "buried with the burial of an ass, drawn, and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (Jer. xxii. 19). His original name was Eliakim (2 Kings xxiii. 34); and he owed his elevation in his twenty-fifth year to Pharaoh-nechoh, whose tributary he became. But after four years he was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar, and compelled to pay tribute to him. After three years he rebelled, was taken prisoner, but ultimately released, and allowed to reign as a vassal. It was he who murdered the prophet Urijah (Jer. xxvi. 23), and so impiously cut up and burnt Jeremia's roll of prophecies (Jer. xxxvi. 23). His history is given briefly in 2 Kings xxiii. 34–xxiv. 6 and 2 Chron. xxxvi. 4–8; but many details are supplied by Jer. xxii. 13–19, xxvi., xxxvi.

JEHO'RAM or JO'RAM (whom Jehovah has exalted), the name of two kings. 1. The eldest son of Jehoshaphat, and his successor, as king of Judah, B. C. 892–885. His history is given in 1 Kings xxii. 50, 2 Kings viii. 16–24, 2 Chron. xxi. 8. His wife was Athaliah, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel; and under her baneful influence he slew his brothers on coming to the throne, and led a bad life, full of misfortunes for himself and his kingdom, until a terrible disease of the bowels terminated his career, after two years of bodily suffering. He died unwept, unsung; and, although buried in the city of David, it was not in the sepulchres of the kings. To him Elijah sent a warning letter, foretelling his end. Under him the Edomites and Libnah successfully revolted.

11. The son of Ahab and Jezebel, and therefore brother-in-law to the preceding; king of Israel, B.C. 896-884. His history is given in 2 Kings i. 17, iii. 4-27, vi. 8-viii. 24. He was weak, rather than positively bad; although he followed the traditions of his house in the Baal worship. With Jehoshaphat he contracted friendship, and seems also to have been liked by Elisha. For his union with the former in war upon Moab, see JEHOŠAPHAT. Elisha acted as his counsellor in his war with Syria, revealing prophetically the plans of the foe; but subsequently, when Benhadad besieged Samaria, and produced a grievous famine in the city, Jehoram laid the blame upon Elisha, and sought to kill him. The prophet, however, foretold the plenty which quickly came, and the king's friendship returned. When Hazael revolted in Damascus, in consequence of Elisha's prediction (2 Kings viii. 12), Jehoram attempted, by the help of Ahaziah, king of Judah (his nephew), to take Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians, thinking to profit by the confusion of that kingdom. The project failed, and Jehoram went to Jezreel to recover from his wounds. When thus invalidated, Jehu rebelled against him, in obedience to the Lord's order through Elisha (2 Kings ix. 6), attacked him in Jezreel, met him in his chariot, and shot him through the heart with an arrow on the plat of ground which Ahab had wrested from Naboth the Jezreelite. And thus Elijah's prophecy was literally fulfilled (1 Kings xxi. 17-29). Jehoram was the last king of the dynasty of Omri.

JEHOSHAPHAT (Jehovah does justice), the son and successor of Asa; King of Judah for twenty-five years, — 914-889 B.C. according to the common reckoning. The sources of his history are 1 Kings xxii. 41-50; 2 Chron. xvii.-xxi. 1. He succeeded in raising Judah to a position it had not occupied since Solomon, and thus made it seem very desirable to Ahab to have him as an ally against Syria. The proposition was received with only too great readiness on Jehoshaphat's part; and the brother-kings fought against Syria at Ramoth-gilead, notwithstanding the solemn warning of the Jehovah prophet Micah. For this conduct he was reproved by Jehu on his return home. Some time after this, the Ammonites and Moabites attacked Judah. The intelligence was received with great apprehension, but laid before the Lord in prayer by the king. In answer, Jahaziel, a Levite, was inspired to announce that the Lord would fight for them on the morrow: so upon that day Judah went out preceded by singers, and found that their enemies had turned their swords against one another, and fled in great confusion. Again; still later, Jehoshaphat showed his weakness by joining Jehoram, the son of Ahab, in an expedition against Moab. Elisha accompanied them, and by his interposition averted a water-famine (2 Kings iii. 16-20). He told them to dig trenches, which, when filled with the water which Jehovah sent, seemed to run with blood when the sun shone upon them. Thus the Moabites were deceived to their destruction as they came up to the camp of Israel, supposing that they had smitten one another, and were themselves slain. The king of Moab, Mesha, straitly besieged in Kir-haraseth, offered up his eldest son upon the wall. "And there was great indignation against Israel; and they departed from him, and returned to their own land." These mysterious words imply some sort of a panic. A third co-operation with Israel was with Ahaziah on an unfortunate commercial enterprise.

But the greatness of Jehoshaphat was certainly not displayed in his wars, but in his government. He was a pious king, and ruled in the fear of the Lord; yet the high places were not removed, and the amount of permanent good he did was small, not through any fault of his, however. In his zeal he sent five of his princes — nine Levites and two priests — to teach in all the cities of Judah the law of the Lord (2 Chron. xvii. 7-9). He also arranged a system of appellate jurisdiction, culminating in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xix. 5-11). A priest judged in spiritual, and a prince in temporal affairs. It was no wonder that Jehoshaphat waxed great exceedingly, and that the land rejoiced in its prosperity (2 Chron. xvii. 12 sqq.). But Jehoram, the son of this pious and prosperous king, married the daughter of Ahab, and reigned wickedly; so that the kingdom rapidly lost position.

JEHO'VAH, יהוה [Jhvh] is the name of God which is characteristic of and peculiar to the Old Testament, and for that reason called by the Jews the peculiar name (שם הַכְּבוֹדִים), and the name which does not express an attribute of God, like Elohim, but his whole being.

1. Pronunciation and Etymology. — The tetragrammaton יהוה was not pronounced by the Jews, and the Masorites gave to it the vowel-points of another divine name, אֲדֹנָי (Adonai); but, where these two names occur side by side, they gave to it the vowels of Elohim (Isa. xxii. 12, 14, etc.). The Jews based the rule prohibiting the pronunciation of the name on Lev. xxiv. 16, where the translation "blaspheme" is proper; but the LXX. translated it "naming the name of the Lord" (ὀνομαζων τὸ ὄνομα). The first trace of the feeling which shunned the pronunciation of the name is found in some of the later books of the Old Testament, which use the word Jhvh comparatively seldom; and in the LXX., which always translates it by Lord (κύριος). Josephus says he was not allowed to utter the name (Ant. H. 12, 4), and Philo relates that it was heard and uttered in the Holy of holies (Vit. Mos., iii. 11). The Mishna Barachoth (ix. 5) says, in commenting upon Ruth ii. 4, Judg. ii. 16, that its use was permitted in greetings. Abba Schaul (Sanhedrin x. 1), on the other hand, includes amongst those who have no part in the future life all who pronounce the divine name as it is written. According to Maimonides (More, i. 61), the name might only be uttered in the temple by the priests in pronouncing the blessing, and by the high priest on the day of atonement; but even this privilege was taken away after the death of Simeon. Among the Jews the opinion prevailed, that the knowledge of how the name was pronounced was lost at the destruction of Jerusalem; but many Christian theologians (Gataker, Leusden, etc.) have held that Jehovah (יהוה) is the original pronunciation. The data for the determination of the pronunciation and the etymology are found in Exod. iii. 14. There the name of God is revealed to Moses as אֲהִיָּה אֲהִיָּה ["I AM THAT I AM"] . . . אֲהִיָּה [I AM] "hath sent me to you." This makes it clear that יהוה [Jhvh] is formed from the third person of the imperfect of הָוָה [Havah], an older form of הָיָה, and is to be pronounced either יהוה [Jahve], or יהוה [Jahaveh], from יהוה, which is the more natural and rhythmical. According to Theodoret, the Samaritans read the name, יאבֶּה [Jabe]; the Jews, אִיאָ [Aia]; according to Clement of Alexandria, יאֹו [Yaou]. The first and the last, perhaps, point to the use of יהו [Jahu] as a name for God in common conversation.

II. Meaning. — According to Exod. iii. 14, the meaning of יהוה is He, that is who he is. But, as the verb originally signifies to become, the name signifies that the being of God has a progressive manifestation or development. It points to God's relations to man in history. The heathen regarded the revelation of their gods almost exclusively as a thing of the past; but this name shows that God was revealing himself constantly and progressively: in other words, it witnessed to the Hebrew people that their God was a God of the future. The word distinctly expresses the two ideas, (1) of the divine free will and self-determination, and (2) of God's absolute self-consistency and unchangeableness (Mal. iii. 6), remaining and revealing himself through all eternity as one and the same. But the name (Exod. xxxiii. 19; 2 Kings viii. 1; Ezek. xii. 25) means more. It means the all-powerful one, who is determined by nothing else than his own will, and rules in history,—the Lord of the future, the God of the plan of salvation. (See Delitzsch: Trost d. Gottesnamens, etc., 1876, pp. 77 sqq.) Compared with Elohim and El, Jahve brings out the historical revelation of God, and his reign in his kingdom on the earth. Elohim refers to God's transcendence above the world, and his activity in its creation (Gen. i. 1). The difference is brought out in Ps. xix., where God is called El when his revelation in nature is referred to (1), but Jehovah when the reference is to his revelation in the Law (8 sqq.). Jehovah is the living God, who does all that he pleases (Ps. cxv. 3),—hears prayer, etc., in contrast with the gods of the heathen. For this reason there is no stronger oath than "Jehovah lives;" "Elohim lives" never being used. And, as it is Jehovah who reveals himself to men, anthropomorphisms (hands, eyes, mouth, etc.) are usually ascribed to Jehovah, and not to Elohim. Very striking is the juxtaposition in Gen. vii. 16.

III. Origin. — The origin of the name "Jehovah," at least in the meaning above given, is to be looked for only in the Old Testament. Some have urged an Egyptian or Indian derivation; but these derivations have all been proved to be without foundation. (See especially Tholuck: Verm. Schriften.) But it is possible, as some proper names seem to indicate, that the word existed in another form, Jahu, amongst Shemitic peoples, before it became current in Israel, although Baudissin says that this fact is due to the adoption of the God of the Hebrews as one of their gods by other peoples. The principal question is when the name was first revealed. Josephus explained Exod. vi. 3 ("by my name Jehovah was I not known to them") to mean that the patriarchs were not acquainted with it; but this view flatly contradicts Gen. iv. 26, xii. 8, and other passages. Another and the better explanation of the passage is, that the patriarchs did not fully understand its import (comp. Exod. xxxiii. 19, xxxiv. 6). The name is, then, to be regarded as having been known before the time of Moses, as is also plain from the fact that the name of Moses' mother [Jochebed, to Jehovah is the glory] contains it (Exod. vi. 20). See RELAND: Decas exercit. phil. de vera pronunt. nominis Jehovah, 1707; THOLUCK: Verm. Schriften, i. 377-405; [EWALD: *D. Compos. d. JE'HU (יהוּ), "Jehovah is he"), King of Israel, exterminated the house of Ahab, and executed the priests of Baal, whom Jezebel had introduced into the kingdom. He was anointed king of Israel (2 Kings ix. 6) by a messenger of Elisha, in accordance with previous directions of Elijah to Elisha. He must have been a man of influence, and perhaps known as a foe of the reigning dynasty (2 Kings ix. 20). Shutting off all communication between Ramoth-gilead and Jezreel, he set out in his chariot for Jezreel, the capital city. Joram, the reigning king, and Ahaziah, the king of Judah, who was on a visit in Jezreel, after some delay went out in their chariots to meet him, and inquire his mission. Arrows from Jehu's bow killed them both. On entering the city, he gave the word to some officers of the royal palace, who threw Jezebel out of the window at which she was standing. The prophecy of the young man who anointed Jehu king was fulfilled in her death (2 Kings ix. 10). With ruthless cruelty Jehu exterminated the house of Ahab, and put to death forty-two members of the family of Ahaziah, king of Judah, and Ahab's grandson. He gathered the priests of Baal into Baal's temple, until it was densely crowded, and then treacherously ordered his guard to slay them. He, however, himself was not faithful to the worship of Jehovah (2 Kings x. 31). His kingdom was harassed and diminished by the armies of Hazael. He was buried in Samaria, after a reign of twenty-eight years. An inscription has been found reading, Jahua habal Hu-umri, which has been translated, "Jehu, son (or successor) of Omri." The reference to the king of Israel, however, has been questioned.

JEHUDAH (HA-LEVI) BEN SAMUEL, called by Arabic writers Abul Hassan, the greatest Jewish poet of the middle age, and father-in-law to the greatest Jewish grammarian of that age, Aben Ezra; b. in Castile, Spain; at his prime, 1140 A.D.; d. at Jerusalem about 1150; according to tradition, trampled to death by a Mohammedan horseman, because he lamented so loudly over the desolation of the city. At once poet, philosopher, grammarian, scholar, he taught the faith of Judaism, to the wondering delight of his nation. To later ages he is known as the author of The Book of Cosari, or, in full, The Book of Evidence and Argument in Apology for the Despised Religion (i.e., Judaism), written in Arabic, first published in Hebrew translation at Fano, 1504, and at Venice, 1547; with an Introduction and Commentary by Muscato, Venice, 1594; with Latin translation by the younger Johannes Buxtorf, Basel, 1660; with a German translation by David Cassel, Leipzig, 1853. It is considered the ablest presentation of the superiority of Judaism to Heathenism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. In its rabbinical learning and poetic beauty unite. See D. KAUFMANN: Jehudah Halewi, Breslau, 1877, and art. Kosri, in Herzog, ed. i., viii. 32-36.

In that city he founded the first seamen's church, the parent of similar institutions in the country. From 1826 to 1845 he was pastor of a Congregational church in Green Street. During this period he compiled his Comprehensive Commentary on the Holy Bible, with Scott's References and Practical Observations, Matthew Henry's Commentary Condensed, Explanatory, Critical, and Philological Notes from Various Authors, Brattleborough, Vt., 1834, 5 vols., with supplementary vol.; now published in Philadelphia. It has been very extensively sold, and even "adapted to the views of Baptists, by Rev. J. A. Warne." Dr. Jenks was one of the founders of the American Oriental Society.

JEPHTHAH, a judge and towering tragic hero of Israel, the illegitimate son of a man of Gilead. His history is told in Judg. xi., xii. He was driven out of his father's house by the legitimate children, and went to the land of Tob, in Eastern Hauran, where he gathered about him a band of men. When the Ammonites invaded Israel, the chiefs of Gilead had recourse to Jephthah, who, complying with their appeal, undertook the office in the fear of God. He was not merely a fierce warrior, for he sent a delegation to the Ammonites in the interest of peace; but when they demanded a large tract of territory bounded by the Arnon, Jabok, and Jordan, on the ground of possession prior to the Israelitish conquest, Jephthah sent back a gallant reply, to the effect that the territory was God's gift, and had been the lawful possession of Israel for three hundred years. The war broke out; but the Gileadite leader made a vow to dedicate to God, in case of victory, whatever he met, on his return, first coming towards him from his house. Jephthah, in his vow, did not think of his daughter, for daughters remained in the inner part of the houses, but of the triumphal procession that would be prepared for him on his return, with its presents to the victor, and the spoils of gold, weapons, etc., of the war.

As he returned from his triumph, the first to meet him was his own and only daughter with timbrels. His heart breaks, but a veritable offering will be made. It will cost a pang to give up that which is dearest to him. And he does not hesitate, or seek for excuses in the letter of his vow; for a person was not included in the "whatsoever cometh forth" (Judg. xi. 31). It is a tragedy solitary in its pathos and contrasts. All is jubilation; only the author of it is not jubilant! The trumpets ring with the joyous strains of victory; and only the victor, crowned with glory, has a broken heart! He came to place the crown of the first citizen on his daughter's head, and he must offer her up! But how great a faith do not his words presuppose (Judg. xi. 35), and how grand does he not appear beside that Roman who offers up his son, only out of respect for military discipline! He was not right in thinking that God would be well pleased with such an offering; but he did not want to appear before the people as only willing to keep his vow when it demanded any thing else but his child.

The spirit of the daughter is not beneath that of her father, and she is ready to be the sacrifice. This sacrifice did not consist, as some have urged, in the death of his daughter. The Jewish commentators have done well in insisting upon the meaning of or for ("and") in the words of the vow, running, "shall surely be the Lord's, or (and) I will offer it up for a burnt offering" (Judg. xi. 31). If Jephthah had thought only of the burnt offering, the first clause would have been superfluous. Again: Jephthah knew the history of Israel too well (xi. 15-26, etc.) to have forgotten God's refusal to permit the sacrifice of Isaac. Further: such expressions as "she knew no man," and "let me bewail my virginity" (xi. 39) indicate the very nature of the sacrifice; and the daughters of Israel in after-years did not lament her death, but her virginity. It was in this that the offering consisted, and the virginity only has a meaning on the supposition that she continued to live. It is interesting to remember that the maidens of the virgin Greek goddess Artemis celebrated a festival like that which the maidens of Israel celebrated over Jephthah's daughter.

Jephthah's last soldierly deed was the defeat of the Ephraimites (Judg. xii.), — a tribe which on several occasions raised claims after the danger was over. He judged Israel six years. His name, which does not occur in connection with any other person, may be connected with יָמִי ("mighty"), or with יָפִי ("beautiful"), with which word many Greek female names — Iphigenia, Iphigone, etc. — seem to have a connection. The older expositors regarded Jephthah as a type of Him who said, "Not my will but thine be done." JEREMIAH (יֵרֵמְיָהוּ, or יֵרֵמְיָה, from יָרָה, "Jehovah throws"), one of the great Hebrew prophets. I. Life. — Jeremiah was the son of Hilkiah, a priest of Anathoth of the tribe of Benjamin (i. 1, etc.), who, however, is not to be identified with the high priest (2 Kings xxii. 4) of that name (Clem. Alex., Jerome, Eichhorn, Umbreit), as the high priest belonged to the house of Eleazar, and only the priests of the line of Ithamar resided at Anathoth (1 Kings ii. 26; 1 Chron. xxiv. 3). He was called at an early age to the prophetic office (i. 6), and in the thirteenth year of Josiah's reign (i. 2, xxv. 3), — 629 or 627. Josiah had already begun his reformatory activity (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3); but the prophet was not deceived by the auspicious outlook. It is probable that he prophesied for a time at Anathoth (xi. 21), but then in Jerusalem. The first twenty-two years of his prophetic career seem to have passed without any notable personal incident, and probably only the quaintness of his prophecies during this period are preserved (iii. -x.). The year 605 B.C., in which the battle of Carchemish was fought, marks a turning-point in his life. Before this event, he had prophesied the downfall of the theocracy; but now for the first time (in chap. xxv.) he announces the name of the people (the Chaldeans) by whom it was to be effected. Four years after Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar made Judaea tributary to his kingdom (2 Kings xxiv. 1). Jeremiah laid out a definite sketch of the immediate future (seventy years), not only of the theocracy, but also of the Chaldean monarchy, and the nations to be conquered by it, — Egypt, Uz, Edom, etc. (xxv. 19-25). All resistance would be in vain (xxvii. 8), and the only means of escaping total destruction would be voluntary submission (xxvii. 11). At the end of seventy years the land was to be delivered. Immediately after the victory of Carchemish, he regards Nebuchadnezzar's supremacy over Judaea and the nations mentioned in xxv. 11 sqq. as not only assured, but a matter of divine right. This period of seventy years begins with 605 B.C., and closes with 536 B.C., — the last year of the exile. Another fact marking the progress of Jeremiah after the turning-point just mentioned is, that, in obedience to a divine command, he commits his prophecies to writing in the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign (xxxvi.). What we read in the twenty-fifth chapter and the chapters belonging with it is the kernel and heart of the prophecy. Jehoiakim, after being subject to Nebuchadnezzar for three years, was put to a horrible death (2 Kings xxiv. 1-6), and succeeded by his son Jehoiachin, who reigned only three months (Jer.

lii. 31-34). Then Nebuchadnezzar deported a large portion of the people. Zedekiah followed Jehoiachin (xxxvii. 1), but the position of the prophet was a very painful one in consequence of the callousness of the people and stolid indifference of its leaders (xxi.-xxiv.). The king broke his oath promising fealty to Nebuchadnezzar, in the expectation of aid from Egypt. The Chaldeans besieged Jerusalem; but their expedition against the Egyptians excited hopes which Jeremiah showed to be fallacious (xxxvii. 6-11).

From this time dates the period of the prophet's severe afflictions. He was thrown into prison (xxxvii. 11-16). The king had recourse to him for counsel; but the prophet, persisting in prophesying the downfall of the city, was east into a "dungeon where there was no water, but mire" (xxxviii. 6), from which he was only rescued by the intercession of a royal eunuch (xxxviii. 1-13). This was the culmination of his sufferings; but it is noticeable, that, just at this time of personal suffering, the prophet utters his most glowing prophecies as that of the Lord our Righteousness (xxxiii. 16). In the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, Jerusalem was taken. The prophet was released, and betook himself to Mizpeh, the residence of Gedaliah, the Chaldean governor (xl. 1-6). The latter was soon afterwards murdered, and Jeremiah was forced by the people to accompany them to Egypt, although he had advised against the expedition, as displeasing to God (xli. 17-xliii.). At Tahpanhes, where the Jews encamped, he again lifted up his prophetic voice against Egypt (xliii., xlv.); and this is the last we hear of him in the Bible. Jerome (Adv. Jovin., ii. 37), Tertullian, and others relate that he was stoned to death in Egypt. His grave is shown at Cairo. The estimation in which Jeremiah was held by his people after his death was as great as his persecution had been severe during his lifetime. His prophecies were diligently studied by the Jews in exile (Dan. ix. 2; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21; Ez. i. 1). He was turned into an ideal hero (2 Macc. ii. 1, xv. 14, etc.), and he gradually came to be regarded as the prophet (ὁ προφήτης) who should re-appear again (Deut. xviii. 15); and in the New Testament there are references to this expectation (Matt. xvi. 14; John i. 21).

II. Character and Style. — Jeremiah had the most painful and difficult task of any of the prophets. By nature timid and sensitive, resembling John the Evangelist, rather than John the Baptist, in temperament, he was, nevertheless, called upon to carry on a life-and-death struggle with powerful and embittered enemies. And not only had he to utter warning words against his own nation, but also against other nations. He was in constant danger of his life (xi. 21, xx. 10 sqq., etc.). Like a second Job, he cursed the day of his birth (xx. 14), and longed to be free of his office (xx. 9). The recollection, however, of his official responsibilities was "in his heart as a burning fire shut up in his bones." Every one was against him. He stood alone, at least in the period of greatest national misery. Ezekiel and Daniel lived with him after the great catastrophe; but they lived in exile. Jeremiah, therefore, in the period of Israel's deepest humiliation before Christ, stood alone, as a rock in the sea, resisting, by the help of God, the assaults of hostile forces, and represents in his own personal life and attitude the servant of God in the highest stage of his development in the history of the Old Testament. He was a type, not of John the Baptist, as Hengstenberg holds, but of Christ himself. The first destruction of Jerusalem corresponds to the second; and, as Jeremiah was the prophet of the former, so Christ was the prophet of the latter (Matt. xxiii. 29-32; Luke xiii. 34, etc.). And, as the former was despised and persecuted for telling unwelcome tidings, so was Christ; and in his crucifixion the people filled up the measure of their fathers' hatred (Matt. xxiii. 32), which culminated upon Jeremiah. If Jeremiah be the author of Ps. xxii. (a view I would unconditionally adopt, but for the heading), then the comparison becomes even more striking.

When we come to Jeremiah as an author, we may apply the saying, Le style c'est l'homme ["the style is the man"]. As a writer he is like a brazen wall, inasmuch as no influence can change the fundamental tone of his prophecy, and like soft wax, for his mighty words come forth from a tender and broken heart. His sentences are long rather than sententious; and often the contents of the prophecy seem to be meagre compared with the multitude of words. He presents a series of tableaux, each of which portrays the same principal figures and the same scene of action, only in the most varied groupings. This method explains the author's apparent repetitiousness, and relieves him of the charge of a disregard of logical connection. Jeremiah breathes the atmosphere of the Pentateuch, and especially of Deuteronomy. Umbreit (Com. on Jeremiah) ascribes to him the most poetic nature among the prophets. Jerome speaks of his style being more rustic than that of the other prophets (sermone aliis prophetis videtur esse rusticior).

III. Prophecy. — Chapter i. forms an historical preface, and chap. ii. an introduction. Between chaps. ii. and lii. (the authenticity of lii. being doubtful) the book falls into two parts. Part I. (iii.-xlv.) contains prophecies referring to the theocracy; part II. (xvi.-li.), prophecies referring to foreign peoples. According to chap. xxxvi., Jeremiah, in obedience to a divine command, wrote down his prophecies in a book. It was finished in the sixth year of Jehoiakim's reign; but the book that we have in our hands is larger than that book was, and contains things which happened down to the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign (i. 2, 3). But even this date is overleaped, as we see from the events narrated in chaps. xl.-xlv. The prophet must either have himself embodied these discourses in his book, or another have done it. But it is highly probable that the present arrangement of the parts was not the original one; for not only do the statements in i. 2, 3, and xxxvi. 2 indicate a chronological arrangement in the original work, but we find in the arrangement as we now have it a combination of methods employed, — an arrangement according to subject-matter and according to the dates of the events. This intermingling is apparent in xxi.-xxxvi.

The Alexandrine (or Septuagint) and Masoretic texts differ not inconsiderably in their arrangement of the chapters and in readings. In Egypt, where the prophet spent his last days, he was specially revered and diligently studied by the Jews; and it is not unlikely that the Greek text contains interpolations. The Hebrew text (Michaelis to the contrary, notwithstanding) is to be regarded as the more accurate; and all the differences are to be explained on the ground of the imperfection of the Greek translation. But the unity of the prophecy has seldom been questioned; and even Ewald admits it with the exception of chaps. l., li., whose genuineness, however, I have tried to prove in my Jerem. und Babylon. The passage xxxix. 1-14 seems to be, in part, interpolated. As for chap. lii., which Lowth regards as an introduction to Lamentations, it seems to me that it was not written by Jeremiah, or at least that he did not place it in its present position.

JEREMIAH, Lamentations of. See LAMENTATIONS.

JEREMIAH II., b. in 1536 at Anchialus, an old episcopal see on the Black Sea; d. in 1591 at Constantinople; was, while still very young, made metropolitan of Larissa in Thessalia, and in 1572 patriarch of Constantinople. Twice he was expelled from his see by the violence and intrigues of his competitors, and he finally succeeded in vindicating himself only by paying his rivals annual pensions. In this way the patriarchal treasury became completely exhausted, and in 1589 Jeremiah made a journey to Moscow to ask for a pecuniary support from the czar. He obtained what he demanded, but was induced to recognize Russia as an independent patriarchate, and consecrate Job, the metropolitan of Moscow, patriarch, — a measure for which he was afterwards severely criticised by his own bishops. Of still greater interest are his dealings with the German Protestants. In 1573 Stephen Gerlach went to Constantinople as preacher to the German ambassador, and brought with him letters of recommendation to the patriarch from Jacob Andrea, chancellor of the university of Tübingen, and Martin Crusius, the celebrated Hellenist and historian. The letters were well received; and the Tübingen professors, at that moment the chief representatives of Lutheranism, were not slow to avail themselves of the proffered opportunity of establishing an intercommunication between the Greek Church and the Reformation. They sent a second letter, dated Sept. 15, 1574, and accompanied with a Greek translation of the Confessio Augustana, and a third letter, dated March 20, 1575, and accompanied with a Greek translation of two sermons by Andrea. The patriarch's answer, dated May 15, 1576, consists of an elaborate treatise, in which he goes through the whole confession, part by part. Now and then he praises, as, for instance, the articles on the church, the ecclesiastical office, the marriage of priests, etc.; but generally he censures, especially the introduction of Filioque in the creed, the depreciation of good works, etc. The treatise, however, induced the Tübingen theologians to give a systematical representation of the principles on which their confession rested; and a new letter was sent, dated June 18, 1577, and written by Lucas Oslander and Crusius. But it took two years before the patriarch's answer arrived (May, 1579), and it read more like a rebuke than an answer. Nevertheless, Andrea, Schnepf, Bidembach, and Heerbrand determined to try once more, and sent, in the spring, 1580, a defence to Constantinople; but the patriarch's answer of June 6, 1581, was curt and final. In 1582 the Roman canon, Stanislaus Socolovius, published a report of these negotiations, and a Latin translation of the respective documents, under the title, Censura orientalis ecclesie, etc.; but, as the purpose of that undertaking simply was to hurt the Protestant cause, the Tübingen theologians gave themselves a report with the documents in Latin and Greek, Acta et scripta theologorum Wirtembergensium et Patriarche Constantinopolitani D. Hieremsie, etc., 1584. GASS.

JER'ICHO, the City of, stood in the valley of the Jordan, five miles west of the river, and six or seven miles north of the Dead Sea. Between the craggy and barren mountains of Judah on the one side, and the lofty but equally barren mountains of Moab on the other side, the valley of the Jordan is sunk about nine hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean, the climate thereby becoming completely tropical. Scorched by the heat, the plain stretches along, yellow and desolate, until about Jericho, where a number of springs, among which is the Fountain of Elisha (2 Kings ii. 19-22), form small streams, and at once, as if by magic, transform the desert into a luxuriant garden. Even in the times of Joshua, Jericho was spoken of as "the city of the palm-tree" (Deut. xxxiv. 3; Judg. i. 16; 2 Chron. xxviii. 15). The wheat ripened there several weeks earlier than in other places of the country (Lev. xxiii. 10). Flax and hemp were cultivated there (Josh. ii. 6), and the place was celebrated for its roses (Ecclus. xxiv. 14), its sycamores (Luke xix. 4), its balsam, grapes, etc. When the Israelites entered the promised land, the city was flourishing, strongly fortified, and the residence of a king (Josh. ii. 3, vi. 2). It was taken by Joshua, and allotted to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21). In the Old Testament it is mentioned sixty-three times, and in the New Testament, seven,—the meeting with Zaccheus (Luke xix. 1-9), the healing of the blind men (Matt. xx. 21-31; Mark x. 46-52; Luke xviii. 35-43). When the Romans conquered the country, they built an excellent road from Jericho to Jerusalem. Anthony presented the balsam-gardens to Cleopatra, who sold them to Herod. He fortified the city, adorned it with a palace and a circus, and chose it for his winter residence. Destroyed by Titus, it was restored by Justinian, who built a church and a hospice there. Again destroyed by the Arabs, it was once more restored by the Crusaders, though not exactly on the same site. New Jericho occupied the same place as the present village of Riha, or er-Riha. The creation, however, of the Crusaders, did not prosper. At present the palm-trees have disappeared; the roses, the grapes, the balsam, have gone; and of the splendid old city nothing is left but a heap of ruins. The site is now inhabited by a degraded race, scattered about in some miserable huts. For pertinent literature, see PALESTINE. FR. W. SCHULTZ.

JEROBOAM (whose people is many), the name of two kings of Israel. I. (1 Kings xi. 26-39, xii. 1-xiv. 20; cf. 2 Chr. x.-xiii.) The son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, raised by Solomon, on account of his superior capacity, to be superintendent of the levies furnished by the house of Joseph. Some time after this the prophet Ahijah met him in a field near Jerusalem, and, tearing his mantle into twelve pieces, gave him ten, to indicate that the kingdom was to be dismembered, and he was to rule ten tribes. Perhaps Solomon heard of this prophecy; but at all events Jeroboam thought it prudent to flee to Egypt, where he remained until Solomon's death. On his return he headed the disaffected ten tribes in their revolt, and was chosen their king. (See REHOBAM.) In order to strengthen his hold, he revived the ancient calf-worship at Bethel and Dan, the southern and northern limits of his territory respectively, and with his sons officiated at the altars. While thus engaged at Bethel, a nameless prophet from Judah predicted in his presence the birth of King Josiah, who should destroy that altar, and sacrifice its priests upon it. Jeroboam stretched forth his hand to order the prophet's arrest, when he found it so stiff he could not move it: meanwhile the altar was miraculously rent, in confirmation of the prophet's authority, and he had to implore the prophet's prayer for his restoration. The king, however, persisted in his calf-worship; and since the Levites had refused to obey him, and gone to Judah, he made a new priesthood, irrespective of tribal ancestry. He reigned for twenty-seven years, and waged unremitting warfare with Judah.

II. (2 Kings xiv. 23-29.) The son of Joash, and great-grandson of Jehu; was king of Israel for forty-one years, and enjoyed a reign of extraordinary splendor and success. He recovered the full extent of the northern kingdom, having reduced all the revolted countries on the east of the Jordan. Yet Hosea and Amos (ii. 6-16, v. 6) show plainly that during his long reign vice was rampant.

JEROME (HIERONYMUS) SOPHRONIUS

EUSEBIUS, the most erudite and scholarly among the Fathers of the Latin Church; b., as we gather from his letters, at Stridon, on the border-line separating Dalmatia and Pannonia, between 340 and 342; d. at Bethlehem, Sept. 30, 420. After studying with his father Eusebius, a Christian, he went to Rome, where he was introduced into Greek philosophy and Roman literature. Christian Rome also exerted an influence over his mind; and he speaks, in the Introduction to his Commentary on Ezekiel, of the feelings of reverence with which he had visited the catacombs. He was baptized by Bishop Liberius in 360. In a journey to Gaul (about 372) he made the acquaintance of Rufinus, subsequently his rival and opponent. About the same time he started on a tour to the East, and tarried till 374 in Antioch. A dream changed the tenor of his literary life. Christ appeared to him with the words, "Jerome, thou art not a Christian, but a Ciceronian." This led Jerome to give himself up almost exclusively to ecclesiastical studies. His works, however, abound in references to the classics.

A fever which attacked him at Antioch gave to his mind a powerful impulse to asceticism, and he retired to the wastes of Chalcis, south-east of Antioch. His constitution, however, could not bear the severe habits of abstinence and penance; so that he returned to Antioch, where he was ordained presbyter in 379, against his will. He went to Constantinople to sit at the feet of Gregory Nazianzen, and from there back to Rome (382). The Roman bishop, Damasus, respected his scholarship, and secured his assistance in ecclesiastical writings (in chartis eccles. adjuvare); which has led some writers to the opinion that he occupied the post of papal secretary or librarian. A company of Christian women gathered around him to listen to his expositions of Scripture, and to be influenced towards a conventual life. With two of their number, Paula and her daughter Eustochium, he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 385. On his way he stopped in Egypt, where he heard the blind Didymus interpreting Hosea.

In the Holy Land he retired to a cell in the vicinity of Bethlehem. A convent, over which Paula presided, was soon erected, and an inn for pilgrims. Here Jerome remained till his death, engaged in devotions and literary labors, but finding, also, time to participate in the ecclesiastical disputes of the day.

The scholarly or literary activity of Jerome was far more prominent than the theological; but he was intensely solicitous to be known as orthodox; as, for example, when he submitted himself blindly to the bishop of Rome in the Miletian dispute. Once an enthusiastic follower of Origen, whose writings he had translated, he appeared as his opponent in later years. About 391 he became acquainted with Augustine, whom, in spite of some differences, he profoundly respected (Ep. cxxxiv., Te amare, te suscipere, colere, mirari, etc.). He agreed fully with Augustine in the Pelagian controversy. Jerome zealously advocated the perpetual virginity of Mary (Adv. Helvidium), the meritoriousness of fasting and celibacy (Adv. Jovinianum), and the worship of martyrs and relics (Adv. Vigilantium).

These extravagances must not blind our eyes to Jerome's great services to the Church in the translation of the Vulgate, which was a revision of the Itala. (See VULGATE.) His exegetical labors also deserve respectful notice on account of their author's acquaintance with Oriental languages. One healthy product of his critical method was the distinction between the Canon and the Apocrypha; which latter he says the "Church reads for the edification of the people, not for confirming the authority of ecclesiastical doctrines" (Prolog. Galeatus). His writings on geography and antiquities (De Nominibus Hebraeor. and De Situ et Nominib. Locorum hebraic.) laid the foundation of the Science of Biblical Antiquities. His work, De Viris illustribus s. de Scriptoribus eccles., was the first attempt in the department of Patrology. Jerome's Letters are also very important: they answer questions of conscience, commend monastic life, comfort the sorrowing, flatter friends, condemn the vices and follies of the day, etc. They were extravagantly admired in the ancient church; but Luther, with characteristic penetration, in his Table-Talk said in regard to them, "I know no teacher to whom I am so hostile as Hieronymus; for he writes only of fasting, meats, virginity, etc. If he only had insisted upon the works of faith, and performed them! But he teaches nothing either about faith, or love, or hope, or the works of faith."

JEROME OF PRAQUE, Bohemian reformer and martyr; of a noble family of Prague; b. about 1365; d. at the stake, in Constance, May 30, 1416. He studied at Oxford, probably in 1396, and returned to Prague with Wiclif's theological writings. In 1398 he took the degree of bachelor of arts at Prague, and subsequently that of master in Paris. He did not return to Prague till 1407, when he entered into hearty sympathy with the plans of Hus. In 1410 he went, on the invitation of the king of Poland, to assist in putting the university of Cracow on a secure basis, and from there to Ofen to preach before Sigismund, king of Hungary. He was suspected of heretical doctrines, however, and fled to Vienna, but was put in prison, from which he was only released on the requisition of the university of Prague.

When, in October, 1411, Hus was about to leave for Constance, Jerome encouraged him to fortitude, and promised to go to his assistance if necessary. On April 4, 1415, he fulfilled his promise, but, on the advice of the Bohemian nobles, fled from Constance the day after his arrival. He was recognized at Hirschan by his denunciations of the council, taken prisoner, and sent back in chains to Constance. After Hus' death, the council attempted to induce Jerome to retract, and succeeded Sept. 10; but the day following he withdrew his retraction. The council instituted a second trial, but not until the following May (1416) was he granted a public hearing. All attempts to move him again were unavailing. On May 30 he was condemned by the council as a heretic. As the flames crept about him, he sang the Easter hymn, Salve festa dies, etc. ("Hail, festal day"), and repeated the three articles of the Apostolic Creed concerning God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Compared with Hus, Jerome was, perhaps, his superior in intellectual endowments and learning, but his inferior in nobility of soul, and strength of will. The unalloyed joyfulness and heroism with which he died atoned for the weakness he had before shown in retracting.

JERUSALEM (abode of peace). I. SITUATION AND PRESENT CONDITION. — The city is built upon high ground in the midst of a semi-desert. It is thirty-two miles east of the Mediterranean Sea, and eighteen miles north of the Dead Sea. Above it tower the surrounding hills, and around it lies the dry, rough country. The atmosphere is wonderfully clear. The temperature in summer is sometimes as high as 102° Fahr., and in winter as low as 25°; but on the average the highest mean temperature, according to observations extending over five years, is 77° in July, and the lowest 42°.8 in January. Snow often falls in January and February, even to the depth of a foot; but the ground never freezes. On the east is the Mount of Olives, which has three principal summits. The middle one is the Mount of Ascension, 2,640 feet: the most southerly is the Mount of Offence, so called from its having been the seat of Solomon's idol-worship (1 Kings xi. 7, 8). South of the city is the Hill of Evil Counsel, separated from the Mount of Offence by the Kedron Valley (which see), and so called from the monastic tradition, that upon it Caiaphas had his house, and held the deliberations spoken of in Matt. xxvi. 3, 4, John xi. 47-53. Between it and the city is the Valley of Hinnom. On the west stretches the monotonous range which constitutes the watershed between the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea. Nearer the city is the Valley of Gihon. On the north is Mount Scopus.

The ground of the city rises from east to west: so, as Josephus has already remarked, the city lies in the manner of a theatre (Antiq., XV. 11, 5); but it is much evener than it was, for in the course of centuries many of the inequalities have been filled up, and among them the Tyropœon Valley, or Valley of the Cheesemongers. The excavations carried on by the British Ordnance Survey have revealed the enormous substructure built by Solomon to support the broad levels of his temple and its courts. In the eastern wall of the present Haram enclosure is the Golden Gate, covered in by débris, and walled up externally. The Haram wall was in one place originally a hundred and twenty feet above the ground. Here, doubtless, issued a south-easterly valley, of which at present there are no traces. Between the east and west parts of the city, from north to south, there runs a depression, which in places is filled by débris to the depth of a hundred feet. Between the southern and northern parts of the western half of the city there is a cut from west to east. In consequence of this cut, the city is divided into three parts, — the holy part, which included the temple, on the east; on the south-west, Zion; and on the north-west the business part, in which is the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. As a fourth part may be reckoned the hill Bezetha.

The view of Jerusalem from Olivet or Scopus is imposing. Around the present city is a wall, thirty-eight feet and a half high, having thirty-four towers and seven gates, and with a total circumference of two miles and a fifth. Within it one sees the innumerable domes upon, and the balustrades around, the flat roofs of the houses; the minarets, like tapers against the clear sky; the mosques and the churches, of which the chief are the Mosque of Omar and the Church of the Holy Sepulchre respectively; the cloisters and the public buildings; and, highest of all, that reminder of the Turkish rule, the Citadel. Nor does entrance entirely dispel the pleasing impression. The streets are, it is true, narrow; but they are cleaner, and the houses are better built, than those of Smyrna or Constantinople. Damascus Street divides the Christian or Greek quarter (the north-west part) from the Moslem quarter; and Bazaar Street, running at right angles, divides the Armenian quarter from the Greek.

II. THE ORIGIN OF THE DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE CITY. — Jebus (see art.), Jerusalem, Ælia Capitolina, El-Kuds ("the sanctuary"), by these names successively has the city been known. When David took Jebus, giving rise to the term "city of David," the city was on Mount Zion, which was neither the north-west, nor the south-east, or the southern part of the temple hill, but the south-west part of the city, extending to the Jaffa Gate. Reasons for this view are: (a) Neither in the north-west nor in the south-east has there ever later been a citadel; (b) Micah (iii. 12) very clearly distinguishes Zion from the temple hill; (c) Too much building is spoken of in Neh. iii. for Zion to be part of the temple hill; (d) Although Zion and the temple hill are identical in the mouths of psalmists and prophets, uniform tradition identifies the city of David with the hill in the south-west part of the city; cf. 1 Macc. i. 33, Josephus (J'ar, V. 4, 1; Antiq., VII. 3, 2), Eusebius, and Jerome.

David materially enlarged Jebus, and made it the political and religious capital of the nation; but to Solomon it owed most. Besides the temple upon Mount Moriah, he built his great palace upon Ophel, as is proven by (a) the circumstance that the daughter of Pharaoh "came up out of the city of David (1 Kings iii. 1) unto her house which Solomon had built for her" (ix. 24); (b) the "ascent by which he went up unto the house of the Lord" (x. 5); (c) Micah (iv. 8), who brings the "tower of the flock," in connection with Ophel, and Isaiah (xxxii. 14), who brings in the same connection the "watch-tower," by which he probably means the same tower of the palace; (d) the entire narrative in Neh. iii.; and (e) especially the mention of the Horse Gate in verse 28, which shows that the king's palace and its tower were south of the temple. The temple, with its courts, did not nearly cover the present Haram enclosure; and there were about it many private houses. A third important building of Solomon was Millo (1 Kings ix. 15, 24), not to be confounded with the Millo mentioned in 2 Sam. v. 9, which had probably fallen down, but a new fortress on the north-west corner of Zion.

In the post-Solomonic time the city grew in the neighborhood of the temple, as was quite natural, inasmuch as it was the centre of so much life. Isaiah (vii. 3) speaks of Fuller's-field Street, running north from Zion, and Jeremiah (xxxvii. 21), of Bakers' Street, in the same locality, where were also, in after-time, the quarters of the smiths and the cheesemakers, the fish and the sheep markets. The lower city was in the same direction, and particularly inhabited by merchants and capitalists (Zeph. i. 10). "The city of David" extended, probably, as far as Siloah; and upon Ophel also there were many houses. After the exile Jerusalem took a long time to recuperate. In Nehemiah's time the old walls were far removed from the dwellings (Neh. vii. 4). Eventually, however, it even overran its ancient limits: so that a new suburb, Bezetha, was built up (Josephus: War, V. 4, 2). The number of inhabitants of Jerusalem is not easily calculated: twenty thousand is probably too low an estimate for the pre-exilian time. Josephus says that at the passover there were two million seven hundred thousand in the city (War, VI. 9, 3).

III. THE WALLS, GATES, AND TOWERS. The Walls. — There were three walls on the north of the city, while on the other sides there was only one. The course of the northern walls is disputed, and hence individual opinion alone can be stated. When it is said that Solomon built the wall of Jerusalem round about (1 Kings iii. 1), it is meant that he built higher and stronger, and provided with towers, walls already existing. Who built the wall about the second city is unknown: but this was the wall of which four hundred cubits were broken down by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 Kings xiv. 13), and restored by Uzziah (Josephus: Antiq. IX. 10, 3). Wall-building is also attributed to Jotham (2 Chron. xxvii. 3), Hezekiah (xxxii. 5), and Manasseh xxxiii. 11). The First Wall, according to Josephus, ran from the Tower of Hippicus, on the north side of Zion, to the temple, on the west side to the Gate of the Essenes, on the south to the Fountain of Siloah, and thence, making a bend, around to the east side of the temple. The Second Wall began, says the same authority, at the Gennath, or Garden Gate, which belonged to the first wall, and, compassing the northern quarter, reached as far as the Tower Antonia. The interpretation is disputed. Robinson puts the Garden Gate in the extreme north-west corner of Zion; so that, according to him, the second wall ran first north-west, and then north-east, somewhat in the course of the present walls, to the inside of the Damascus Gate, then either south-east to Antonia, or east to the Kedron. This puts the Church of the Holy Sepulchre entirely inside the walls, and destroys its claim to be the true site. But against this view may be urged, (a) When Cestius, in the year 66, had broken through the third wall, he burnt Bezetha and the wood-market, and, without being hindered by the second wall, pressed upon the upper city, — i.e., to the north-west, — and opposite to it pitched his tent (Josephus: War, II. 19, 4). (b) In explanation of the determination of Titus to open his attack at the monument of John the high priest, which stood in the north-western New City, Josephus expressly states, that there "the first fortification was lower, and the second not joined to it [i.e., to the outermost wall, so that a part of the New City was enclosed by it]; the builders neglecting to build the wall strong when the New City was not much inhabited. Here, also, was an easy passage to the third wall, through which he (Titus) thought to take the upper city, and, through the tower of Antonia, the temple itself" (War, V. 6, 2). (c) When Titus had carried the second wall, and torn down its northern part, he erected two banks for the capture of the upper city, and two for that of Antonia. The first two were outside of the second wall, by John's monument; the second two, by the Pool Amygdalon, which was also outside the second wall. The second wall may be considered to have started at the present bazaar, and run, first northwards, then eastwards, from the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, gradually bending towards the east, and then somewhere upon the ridge, which is visible to the east from the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, extending to the Antonia Tower. The Third Wall (Josephus: War, V. 4, 2), which took in the New City in the north-west and north, was begun by Herod Agrippa I. about A.D. 42; but, out of fear of Claudius Cæsar, he stopped with the foundations, and it was finished after a lighter pattern by later Jews. Its entire height was twenty-five cubits, with battlements of two cubits, and turrets of three cubits. It was defended by ninety towers, of which the strongest was Psephinos, at the north-western angle, west from the Latin convent, upwards of a hundred feet high, and upon the highest ground of the city (twenty-five hundred and ninety feet above the sea). The course of this third wall was probably, in general, that of the present walls.

The Gates. — There were four gates to the temple enclosure. On the north, the Upper Gate of the House of Jehovah, also called the Upper Gate of Benjamin (Jer. xxxviii. 7), or the New Gate (xxxvi. 10); on the east, the King's Gate (1 Chron. ix. 18), called the Gate of the Inner Court (Ezek. xvi. 1), and the East Gate (Neh. iii. 29); on the west, the Gate Shallecheth (1 Chron. xxvi. 16); on the south, the Gate Miphkad (Neh. iii. 31); and, besides these, the Gate Sur (2 Kings xi. 6), or Gate of Foundation (2 Chron. xxiii. 5), and the Gate behind the Guard (2 Kings xi. 6). City gates mentioned are the Corner Gate (2 Chron. xxvi. 9), probably on the north-west corner of the second city; the Valley Gate (ibid.), on the north-west corner of Zion, the site of the present Jaffa Gate. The following gates are not spoken of after the pre-exilian period: (1) the Gate of Joshua, the governor of the city (2 Kings xxiii. 8), apparently in the north wall of Zion near the citadel; (2) the Pottery Gate (A. V., the East Gate, Jer. xix. 2), in the south wall of Zion, leading to the Valley of Hinnom; (3) the Middle Gate (Jer. xxxix. 3), in the royal palace, leading to the middle city; (4) the gate between the two walls (2 Kings xxv. 4; Jer. xxxix. 4), in the south end of Ophel, where the west and east walls of these hills meet. For learning the gates of the post-exilic period, Nehemiah (particularly chap. iii.) is the best guide. Beginning with the Sheep Gate in the east, north from the then temple area, and south of the present St. Stephen's Gate, and going west, there came in order the Fish Gate, where the Tyrian fish-market was held; the Old Gate; the Gate of Ephraim or of Benjamin; the Valley Gate, on the north-west corner of Zion; southward, the Dung Gate, near the present Birket es Sultan; the Fountain Gate, close to the Pool of Siloam; then came the Stairs that go down from the city of David. The next gate mentioned is the Water Gate, on the south end of Ophel, through which the water used for libations in the feast of tabernacles was drawn. Next and last came the Horse Gate, through which the king's horses were taken to their stalls in the substruction of the temple area.

Three Towers are spoken of: (1) the Tower of Meah, (2) the Tower of Hananeel, — both near together, between the Sheep Gate and the Fish Gate, (3) the Tower of the Furnaces, between the Gate of Ephraim and the Valley Gate.

The walls were almost entirely destroyed, along with the city, by Titus, A.D. 70, but rebuilt by Hadrian, A.D. 132–136, who probably restored the old citadel built by Herod; for in 1099 the crusaders found at the spot a fortress which long resisted their attacks. They called it the Tower of David, and this name it has retained until the present day. It is now the most prominent object as one enters the Jaffa Gate, and consists of five square towers originally surrounded by a ditch. The foundations of the towers are manifestly ancient. It is probably the Tower of Phasaelus. The present walls are of Arabic construction, and date from Sultan Soleyman I. (1536–39). Both these and those of Hadrian, in unintentional but apparent literal fulfilment of Mic. iii. 12 ("therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field"), do not circumvent the southern part of Zion, thus shutting it off from the city. But in general the new walls rest upon the old foundations.

IV. THE MOST IMPORTANT BUILDINGS AND SITES. — Akra was situated near the temple. It is called by Josephus, our only informer, "the Lower City," and corresponds to the present Christian quarter upon the rocky ridge between the Tyropæon and the "broad" valley. It took its name from the fortress Akra, built by Antiochus. (See Joseph. : Antiq., XII. 5, 4.)

Baris, or Antonia as Herod called it, was a citadel belonging to the temple, and on its north-west corner, mentioned by Nehemiah (ii. 8, cf. vii. 2 [A. V. "palace" = fortress, in Hebrew Birah, which corresponds to the Greek βάρεις]), called by Josephus the Acropolis (Antiq., XV. 11, 4), fortified by Simon (1 Macc. xiii. 52), but especially by Herod (War, I. 3, 3). It commanded the temple, and interiorly was fitted up like a palace.

The Palace of the Asmonæans was on the north-east side of Zion, opposite the south-west corner of the temple (Antiq., XX. 8, 11).

The Palace of Herod was upon the site of the old tower of David (War, V. 4, 4).

The Palace of the High Priest, built by Herod, was in the Upper City.

The Theatre was also built by Herod (Antiq., XV. 8, 1); perhaps it was identical with the Hippodrome on the southerly part of the Upper City. His Amphitheatre was north of the city (Antiq., XV. 8, 1). The Xystus, for gymnastic exercises, and a place for popular assemblages, was on the extreme north-east corner of Zion (War, V. 4, 2; VI. 3, 2; 6, 2; 8, 1). The Town-hall was between the Xystus and the temple, probably by the side of the western hall of the temple.

The Connection between the City and the Temple. — According to Antiq. XV. 11, 5, there were in the west side of the temple enclosure four gates, of which one led to the king's palace, and went to a passage over the intermediate valley; two led to the suburbs of the city; and the fourth led to the Lower City, where the road descended into the valley by a great number of steps. The first evidently led to the bridge between the temple and Xystus (War, II. 16, 3). The "suburbs" were called Akra. Many traces of old gates and bridges have been discovered on the west side of the Haram; but these can scarcely be identified with those mentioned by Josephus. For instance, the Bab es Silseleh, or Gate of the Chain, the principal entrance to the Haram on the west, stands upon an arch discovered by Capt. Wilson; but the road over this bridge apparently did not lead to the Upper City, but to the suburb lying immediately to the north. About midway between the Bab es Silseleh and the south-west corner of the Haram, somewhat south of the Jews' Wailing-Place, Barclay discovered the so-called "Gate of the Prophet." Robinson's Arch, so called because discovered by him, is thirty-nine feet north of the south-west end of the Haram. It consists of three courses of huge stones projecting from the wall, forming the segment of an arch, which extends fifty feet along the wall.

Places connected with the Passion and Ascension of our Lord. — The house in which the Last Supper was eaten, and, later, the miraculous tongues of fire of Pentecost were seen, is traditionally placed on the southern brow of Zion, not now within the walls. It is the Cenaculum of the present day, the "upper room" of the Evangelists, and was probably the Church of the Apostles spoken of by Cyril of Jerusalem in the fourth century. It is in the group of buildings over the pretended tomb of David, and is fifty feet long by thirty wide. The Palace of Caiaphas, between the Cenaculum and the Zion Gate, is an Armenian cloister. The Prætorium, or Judgment-hall of Pilate, was probably in Antonia. (See GABBATHA.) The Via Dolorosa proper, along which Jesus is supposed to have been led, bearing his cross, runs from Antonia to the Church of the Sepulchre, passing the Ecce Homo Arch near the Church of the Flagellation. The name is, however, now given to the whole street running from St. Stephen's Gate to the street of the Gate of the Column, of which the traditional Via Dolorosa is part. At the foot of the Mount of Olives, opposite St. Stephen's Gate, was Gethsemane. The present site so called is a little garden, with eight olive-trees of great age, though scarcely as old as Christianity, in charge of Franciscan monks. It is probably rightly placed. About a hundred paces distant is the Grotto of the Agony (antrum agonizæ), a dark, irregular cave, hewn in the rock. The place of the ascension is fixed by Luke xxiv. 50 ("he led them out until they were over against Bethany") between the Mount of Olives and the Hill of Offence, where the road winds towards Bethany. But tradition puts the spot on the top of Olivet, and there Helena built a church, now destroyed. A small chapel, under the charge of the Mohammedans, occupies the traditional spot; near it is the place where, according to monastic tradition, Jesus taught his disciples the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles composed the Creed. Bethphage lay nearer to Jerusalem than Bethany (which see), and rather off the direct road. In the Talmud it is often mentioned as within the city limits. The name was probably given to several successive places, which would account for the conflicting traditions as to its site. Schick puts it between the Kedron and Bethany.

V. THE WATER-SUPPLY. — Since Jerusalem lies in a rocky limestone region, it is to be expected that it would be destitute of springs; but this natural lack was formerly supplied by an extensive system of aqueducts, pools, and cisterns; so that in no one of her numerous sieges do we read of any suffering for water on the part of the inhabitants, while the besiegers have often suffered severely. At the present day rain-water is exclusively used; and the better class of houses have three or four cisterns, from five to thirty feet long by the same in breadth, and ten to twenty feet deep, generally vaulted, with a small opening on top, surrounded by stone-work, and provided with bucket and wheel. But formerly there were aqueducts from north, west, and especially from the south. That from the north can be identified with the subterranean canal which has an opening under the Convent of the Sisters of Zion, and flows thence southwards to the west side of the Haram. That from the west can be traced from the Russian colony into the city. These contain only rain-water, drained off the neighboring hills. But from the south came two which were supplied with spring-water. (1) An upper and straighter aqueduct, only partially traceable, which went from the Wady el Biyar, on the road to Hebron, south-west of Urtas and Bethlehem, up the Valley of Hinnom to Zion, and so into the city. In places, e.g., by Rachel's Tomb, the water flows through a tube fifteen inches in diameter, formed of huge perforated blocks of stone cemented together. (2) A lower and much more winding aqueduct from Wady Arrub, south of Tekoa, following the valley by Bethlehem, so to the Valley of Hinnom, which it crosses upon nine low arches north of the Birket es Sultan, then it turns southward, then eastward, sweeps around Zion, passing under Wilson's Bridge, through the Tyropæon Valley, into the Haram. The Lower Aqueduct was repaired and used in 1856 and 1860, but stopped up by the Bethlehemites in 1863. Very probably this aqueduct formerly watered the gardens upon Zion by means of a network of canals, and to this fact Ps. xlv. 4 ("there is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God") alludes. The Upper and Lower Aqueducts were each two feet wide, and at least that deep, and constructed of well-cemented masonry. They draw from the great reservoirs at Urtas (Etham), which are commonly, though erroneously, called Solomon's Pools. [There are three of them, three hundred and eighty feet, four hundred and twenty-three feet, and five hundred and eighty-two feet long respectively, and so arranged that the bottom of each pool is higher than the top of the one below it, in order that as much water might be collected as possible. The water in them comes from "a subterranean fountain some distance up the valley to the north-west. The only visible mark is an opening like the mouth of a well, generally covered by a large stone. The water springs up at four places, from which little ducts carry it into a basin: it then flows through a subterranean passage to a place at the north-west corner of the upper pool. Here the stream is divided, a portion flowing into a vault twenty-four feet by five, and thence through a duct at the side into the upper pool. The remainder of the water is carried by an aqueduct along the hillside, but so arranged as to send a portion off into the second and third pools: it then descends till it meets the lower end of the lower pool, and runs by Bethlehem in a winding course to Jerusalem." — J. L. Porter, in Murray's Handbook for Travellers in Syria and Palestine, 1875, p. 107]. The builder of this aqueduct was probably Pilate. Cf. Joseph.: Antiq., XVIII. 3, 2; War, II. 9. 4.

There are two fountains on or by the temple: hence the allusions in Joel iii. 18, Ezek. xlvi. 1-12, Zech. xiv. 8. The principal one is Siloam, mentioned in Neh. iii. 15, Isa. viii. 6, and John ix. 11, and called by Mohammed "a Fountain of Paradise." Its name, "Sent," indicated that its water was conveyed to some pool; and this pool, according to Neh. iii. 15 (cf. War, V. 4, 1, 2), was opposite the south-east end of Zion, in the lower part of the Tyropæon Valley, on the west side of Ophel. All the conditions are met in the present Pool of Siloam, — a reservoir fifty-three feet long, eighteen wide, and nineteen deep, about two hundred and fifty-five feet from the end of the Tyropæon, — but even better in the somewhat larger Birket el Hamra, farther down in the Kedron, now filled with earth. The present so-called "Pool of Siloam" then corresponds to the "pool that was made" (cf. Neh. iii. 16), but probably receives its water from the same spring as the real Pool of Siloam. The Fountain of the Virgin (Ain sili Miriam) is on the west bank of the Kedron, three hundred yards south of the Haram, on the other side of Ophel from the Pool of Siloam: it is now called "Ain um ed Deraj" (the Fountain of the Mother of Stairs), because one must go down thirty steps to reach the water. The peculiarity of the fountain is the intermittent flow of the water. Often two or three times a day, except in summer, when this happens only two or three times a week, the water rises suddenly several feet during a quarter of an hour, and then flows out with a gurgling sound through a channel leading to the Pool of Siloam, until its ordinary level is reached. The connecting canal between the Fountain of the Virgin and the Pool of Siloam has been explored by Robinson (April, 1838), Tobler (March, 1846), and Warren; and the rise and fall of the water — vulgarly explained by the movement of a dragon, flowing when he awakes, and stopping while he sleeps—has been found to be due to the intermittent character of its source, as was noticed by Jerome in regard to the Pool of Siloam, but not now visible in it, owing to the slower and smaller flow of water. The water in the Fountain of the Virgin is now unpleasant to the taste. [In June, 1880, one of the pupils of Herr Schick, German architect long resident in Jerusalem, accidentally fell into the Pool of Siloam, and thus discovered some letters in the wall of the conduit from the Fountain of the Virgin. By the united efforts of Herr Schick, Professor A. H. Sayce, Dr. Guthe, and others, the inscription has been almost entirely copied. It consists of six lines in a space twenty-eight inches long by eight inches in height. It is thus translated upon page 403 of The Presbyterian Review, April number, 1882: "The excavation. Now this is the story of the excavation. While . . . the pick, one toward the other. While three cubits . . . the voice of one called to the other that there was an overflow (?) in the rock, water. . . . And on the day of the excavation the excavators struck each to meet the other, pick over against pick, and the waters flowed from their outlet in the pool 1,200 cubits, and 100 cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the excavators." Various dates have been assigned to the inscription, from Solomon to Hezekiah. Its archaeological importance is slight. But its discovery will be a stimulus, and many far more important inscriptions will doubtless be found. Another aqueduct, two or more feet deep by three feet and a half wide, leading down the Kedron from the Pool of Siloam, in the direction of, and probably to, Bir Eyub (En Rogel), was discovered in the spring of 1882. The channel is rock cut, and roofed over with slabs.]

En Rogel is a well of living water below the city, in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, famous as the site of Adonijah's feast (1 Kings i. 9), now called by the Arabs Bir Eyub (the Well of Jacob), and by the Franks "the Well of Nehemiah," because Nehemiah there found the holy fire (2 Macc. i. 19, 22). It is a hundred and twenty-five feet deep, with fifty feet of sweet water.

Besides these fountains, there are several pools. The Lower Pool (Isa. xxii. 9) is identified with the Birket es Sultan (sc. Soleyman), in the Gihon Valley, below the south-eastern angle of the city's wall. The Old Pool (Isa. xxii. 11; cf. 2 Chron. xxxii. 30, "upper watercourse of Gihon," and 2 Kings xviii. 17; Isa. vii. 3, "Upper Pool, in the highway of the Fuller's Field") is identified with the Birket el-Manilla (so called from St. Manilla's Church), in the upper end of Gihon. It is filled with rain-water in winter, but empty and dry in summer and autumn. The water of this pool is conducted into the Pool of Hezekiah, or of the Patriarchs (Birket Hammam el-Batrak), inside the city, near the Jaffa Gate. For the Pool of Bethesda, see BETHESDA.

VI. THE TOMBS. — It is doubtful whether any one of the tombs pointed out around the city is really very old. David was buried in the city of David (1 Kings ii. 10), and his tomb was well known in Christ's day (Acts ii. 29). Hyrcanus (Joseph. : Antiq., VII. 15, 3) and Herod (Antiq., XVI. 7, 1) robbed it of its treasures. The tombs of the kings were on the south-east corner of Zion (Neh. iii. 16); and there lay almost all the Judaic kings, as well as the high priest Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv. 16). But the Tombs of the Kings now shown to the traveller lie ten minutes north from the Damascus Gate, and probably were constructed by Helena, queen of Adiabene, for herself, son, and his twenty-four children. [It is properly a catacomb, and contains a remarkable contrivance,—an inner door, made of "a massive slab of stone, fitting exactly into a deeply recessed opening, and so hung upon pivots that it yielded to pressure from without, but immediately fell back into its place on the pressure being removed. Should any one be so unfortunate as to enter, and leave the door for an instant, his fate was sealed; for it fitted so closely that he had no means of pulling it open again."—Porter.] South of it, and only two or three minutes from the Damascus Gate, is the so-called Grotto of Jeremiah, where the Lamentations are said to have been composed, and the prophet buried; but it really is a section of an old quarry. The Tombs of the Judges, also called the "Tombs of the Prophets" and "of the Sanhedrin," are fifteen minutes north-west from the Tombs of the Kings, and elaborately finished. On the opposite side, south-east from Jerusalem, is the little labyrinth called the Tombs of the Prophets,—certainly very old. Farther down is the Tomb of Zacharias (cf. 2 Chron. xxiv. 21, Jewish reference; or Matt. xxiii. 35, Christian), and somewhat to the north the Tomb of Absalom. The first of the two last-mentioned is a monolith throughout; the second, only so below, its upper part being of masonry. Between them is the Tomb of St. James, so called because in it the apostle James hid himself after our Lord's capture, and fasted there until his resurrection. North of the Tomb of Absalom is the Tomb of Jehoshaphat, whose principal chamber was used as a Christian chapel. North of Gethsemane is the Tomb of Mary, where also her parents and husband are said to be buried.

Jerusalem is fairly surrounded by graves. The oldest necropolis is in the Valley of Hinnom, by the Hill of Evil Counsel. Lately the Christians have buried upon Zion, from Zion Gate southward; the Mohammedans, in the Kedron by St. Stephen's Gate; and the Jews, principally upon the west slopes of Olivet.

VII. THE CHURCHES, MOSQUES, AND ECCLESIASTICAL AFFAIRS. — Hadrian (117–138) profaned the holy city, and called it Ælia Capitolina; forbade the Jews, a few of whom had returned after its destruction by Titus (70), to enter it, on pain of death; and built upon the ruins of the temple to Jehovah a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus, ornamented with statues of the god and of himself (cf. MÜNTER: Der jüd. Krieg unter Trajan u. Hadrian, Altona, 1821). Upon the site of the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre stood a temple to Venus. But this triumph of heathenism was short lived. Constantine (308–337) allowed the Jews to return once a year, and pray upon the sites of their holy places. Julian (361–363) ordered them to rebuild the temple; but the work was stopped by an earthquake.

There seem always to have been Christians in Jerusalem, who had a church on Zion (the Cenaculum, or Church of the Apostles); and from Constantine and his mother Helena they received substantial support. The former built the Church of the Holy Sepulchre; the latter, the Church of the Ascension, on the Mount of Olives. The patriarchate of Jerusalem (see art.) was erected in 451. Justinian built the Church of the Virgin, or Theotokos ("mother of God"), upon the southwestern part of the temple area, and ten or eleven convents, besides a hospice, in the city; for from the third century pilgrimages were made thither.

In 637 the Mohammedans, under Omar, took the city, which had already been venerated by Mohammed, called El Kuds ("the Sanctuary"), and considered by his followers second only to Mecca in holiness. Omar took the Church of the Virgin, which was a basilica, and transformed it into the Mosque El-Aksa. Later caliphs restored and remodelled it to its present condition. But the whole temple area has been altered by the Mohammedans. It is now called the Haram esh Sherif, and is an irregular parallelogram, on the west 1,601 feet, on the east 1,530, on the north 1,042, and on the south 922. In the middle stands the Kubbet es-Sakhara ("the Dome of the Rock"), also called the Mosque of Omar, built by Abd el-Melek (A.D. 686),—a large, stately octagonal building, sixty-seven feet each side. The interior is a hundred and forty-eight feet in diameter; entrance is by four doors. Under the dome is the famous rock, rising above the floor, surrounded by a railing. The Mohammedans suppose it to be suspended in the air, but it is merely the top of a cave. Many hold that the great altar of burnt-offering was built upon it. It is not mentioned in the Bible.

Jerusalem is ruled by the Turks, and is the seat of a mutassarif under the waly of Syria. Its present population consists of about twenty-four thousand, thus divided: Mohammedans, thirteen thousand; Christians, seven thousand; Jews, four thousand. The latter are supported by the charity of their co-religionists. Baron Rothschild's hospital, near the south wall, built in 1855, and Sir Moses Montefiore's almshouses, west of the Birket es-Sultan, are their principal institutions. Every Friday at four P.M., and on festivals, many of the Jews gather to mourn the fall of the city, and to pray for its restoration, at the Wailing-Place, just outside the enclosure of the Mosque El-Aksa, and near Robinson's Arch, where a portion of the old temple wall is still uncovered.

The Christians belong to the Greek, old Armenian, and Latin, and a few to Protestant churches. The Greeks are the most numerous and powerful. They have over them a patriarch. The Russian czars have done much for them. There is a Russian colony outside the walls, near the Jaffa Gate, with a cathedral, hospital, and accommodations for a thousand pilgrims. The Armenians have a large convent inside the Jaffa Gate, where their patriarch and a hundred and eighty monks and brothers live: adjoining is the largest and finest garden in Jerusalem. They have also a printing-press and a photographic establishment. The Latins have only been numerous there since 1847. They number now fifteen hundred, have churches, convents, schools, and a printing-press, whence issue Arabic school-books. The Protestants are very few. Besides the church and school, which belong to the bishopric of Jerusalem (see next art. and GOBAT), there are German hospitals and an orphanage. There is also a lazaret-house.

JERUSALEM, The Episcopal See of St. James in. In 1818 the American Board of Foreign Missions sent two missionaries to Palestine to work among the Palestinian Jews, who, in the course of time, had sunk into utter spiritual degradation. After the occupation of the country by Mehemet Ali, in 1832, the London Association for Missionary Work among the Jews also entered the field; and in 1833 the celebrated Orientalist Nicolayson permanently settled in Jerusalem. Yet while the Greek, the Latin, and the Armenian churches had legally established organizations in Jerusalem, the Protestant churches were still without any official representation, until, by the joint expedition of the European grand powers in 1840, Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia opened negotiations with Queen Victoria for the establishment of a Protestant episcopal see in Jerusalem under the patronage of the two Protestant states,—England and Prussia. The Prussian propositions were most cordially accepted by the prelates of the Anglican Church, who spoke of the establishment as a great advantage for the missions among the Jews, and a propitious introductory to a union between the Protestant churches in Germany and England. The dotation of the see was fixed at thirty thousand pounds, in order to insure a yearly income of twelve hundred pounds, of which England paid one half, and Prussia the other. With respect to jurisdiction, it was placed under the metropolitan authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury. The right of appointment was to be alternative between the two states, though the Archbishop of Canterbury retained a veto also in case of a Prussian appointment. The first bishop, Michael Sal. Alexander (b. in 1799 at Schönlanke in Posen), a converted Jew, professor of Hebrew in King's College in London, was appointed by England, and entered Jerusalem Jan. 21, 1842, but died Nov. 23, 1845, near Cairo. The second bishop, Samuel Gobat (see art.), was appointed by Prussia. He occupied the see until his death, May 11, 1879, and founded twelve minor Protestant congregations in Palestine, with churches in Jerusalem, Nazareth, Jaffa, Bethlehem, and Nablus, and with thirty-seven schools frequented by fifteen hundred children. The third bishop, Joseph Barclay, was appointed by England, and died Oct. 22, 1881. The fourth, G. F. P. Blyth, the present bishop, was appointed in 1887.

Chevalier Bunsen was the chief adviser of King William IV. in the scheme of founding the bishopric of St. James. The High-Church party in England was opposed to it on the ground that it interfered with the jurisdiction of the Greek Patriarch. The bishopric has disappointed the sanguine union-schemes of its founders, but is doing a good missionary work, especially in the education of youth, and in Christian charity to the poor and sick. Protestant services are held in English, German, and Hebrew. The English Church is near the Jaffa Gate and the Mediterranean Hotel, and is well filled during the Easter season.

JERUSALEM, The Patriarchate of, owes its interest to the memories connected with the name and the place, rather than to the influence it has actually exercised on the history of the Church. Eusebius gives a list of the "bishops" from the origin of the congregation to his own time; but it contains only a few names of prominence. During the reign of Constantine the Great, the city began to attract the general attention of Christendom, especially by its relics. Magnificent churches were built within its precincts, and the Council of Nicæa (can. 7) conferred on it a precedence of honor as the true cradle of Christianity. The see remained, nevertheless, under the metropolitan authority of Cæsarea until Theodosius II. elevated it into a patriarchate. Some difficulties arose with the patriarchs of Antioch and Alexandria concerning the boundaries of the new diocese; but they were solved by the Council of Chalcedon, 451. By the successive Persian, Arabic, and Turkish conquests of the Holy Land, all connection was broken off between the patriarchate and the rest of Christendom until the crusaders took possession of the country in 1099. The victors found the patriarchal throne vacant, the last patriarch having fled to Cyprus, where he died. In spite of the opposition of the clergy, they established Arnulph, a mean character, as the first Latin patriarch of Jerusalem. Arnulph's successor, Dagobert, who, as archbishop of Pisa, had accompanied Urban II. on his voyage through France in 1095, tried to give a thoroughly hierarchical character to the constitution of the new kingdom; but the relations between the patriarch and the Pope soon became disturbed, and these disturbances again affected the relations between the patriarch and the king. In 1138 the Patriarch William thought of separating from Rome altogether, and in 1187 the Patriarch Heraclius surrendered the city of Jerusalem to Saladin. Saladin expelled the Latins: only some members of the Franciscan order were allowed to settle in a monastery on Mount Zion. In the negotiations concerning a union between the Greek and Latin churches, the patriarchs of Jerusalem played only a very small part. At the Council of Florence (1438) the see was represented; but in 1443 the agreement arrived at there was rejected in Jerusalem, as well as in Alexandria and Antioch. The relations with the Russian Church were very friendly: the Russian confession of 1643 was signed by Paisius of Jerusalem. The most conspicuous point in the later history of the patriarchate is the synod of Jerusalem, 1672 (which see). After that time it gradually dwindled down into insignificance. It once comprised sixty-eight episcopal dioceses, with twenty-five suffragans: it now comprises only fourteen, — Cæsarea, Palestina, Scythopolis, Petra, Ptolemais, Bethlehem, Nazareth, Lydda, Gaza, Sinai, Joppa, Nablus, Sebaste, and Philadelphia; and these fourteen dioceses number only seventeen thousand souls. The last patriarch, Athanasius, resided in Constantinople, and administered the patriarchate by a synod. The present one resides in Jerusalem, in a newly built magnificent palace. See GEORGE WILLIAMS: The Holy City, London, 1845, 2d ed., 1849, 2 vols., i. 195 sq.; WILSON: The Lands of the Bible, Edinburgh, 1847, 2 vols., ii. 569 sq.; [SCHAFF: Through Bible Lands, New York, 1880, chapter xxiv.].

GASS.

JERUSALEM, Synod of, 1672. The doctrines of Cyril Lucar were condemned by his successor at the Council of Constantinople, 1638, and again by the next patriarch of Constantinople, Parthenius, at the Synod of Jassy, 1642. The metropolitan of Kjew, Petrus Mogilas, also found it necessary to protest against those doctrines; and his confession was sanctioned, 1643, by the patriarchs of Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Moscow. Thus an effective barrier seemed to be raised against the Calvinistic invasions of the Orthodoxy of the Eastern Church. Nevertheless, both the Reformed and the Roman-Catholic theologians continued to hint that the Greek Church had given up its insulated attitude, and was leaning respectively either this or that way. In the controversy between the Reformed minister, Jean Claude, and the Jansenists Nicole and Arnauld, concerning the Eucharist and transubstantiation, the former alleged, in support of his views, the dogma of the Eastern Church such as it appeared in its oldest form, and such as it had been revived by Cyril Lucar; while the latter appealed to the dogma of the Eastern Church in its œcumenical form. In 1660 the Patriarch of Jerusalem, Nectarius, published a book against Claude; and in 1672 his successor, Dositheus, convened a synod at Jerusalem for the purpose of still further defending the Orthodoxy of the Eastern Church. The synod was frequented by sixty-eight representatives, and resulted in the so-called Shield of Orthodoxy (ἀσπίς ὀρθοδοξίας), March 20, 1672, — one of the most important confessional works of the Eastern Church. The first part is historico-critical, and contains a strong condemnation of the views ascribed to Cyril Lucar, and at the same time an adroit vindication of him personally, flatly denying that he ever held such opinions, ever wrote the books containing them, etc. The second part is critico-dogmatical, and presents a full confession of the Orthodox Greek faith in the form of a refutation of the theses of Cyril.

RUD. HOFMANN.

JERUSALEM, Johann Friedrich Wilhelm, b. at Osnabrück, Nov. 22, 1709; studied at Leipzig, Leyden, and The Hague; resided for some time in London; and was in 1742 appointed court-preacher to the Duke of Brunswick, in 1743 provost of the monasteries of St. Crucis and St. Egidius, in 1749 abbot of Marienthal, in 1752 abbot of Riddagshausen, and in 1771 vice-president of the consistory of Wolfenbützel, where he died Sept. 2, 1789. Besides several collections of sermons, he published Betrachtungen über die vornehmsten Wahrheiten der Religion, 1768–79; which was translated into several foreign languages, and is considered one of the best apologetical works produced in the latter half of the eighteenth century. He was the father of that Jerusalem who by his suicide at Wetzlar, in 1775, gave the occasion to Goethe's Leiden des jungen Werther.

JERUSALEM CHAMBER, where met the Westminster Assembly in the seventeenth, and the revisers of the Authorized Version in the nineteenth century, is a large hall in the deanery of Westminster, London, hung with tapestries, mostly from Henry VIII.'s time, representing the circumcision, the adoration of the magi, and the passage through the wilderness, and furnished with a long table and chairs. It was built by Abbot Littleton, between 1376 and 1386, as a guest-room for the abbot's house. In it Henry IV. died (March 20, 1413) when on the eve of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and thus the prophecy that he should die in Jerusalem was supposed to be fulfilled (cf. Shakspeare: Henry IV., 2d part, act iv. sc. 4). Here Addison (1719) and Congreve (1728) lay in state before burial in the Abbey. The origin of the name is obscure. Some derive it from the pictures of Jerusalem on the tapestries; others (e.g., Dr. John Stoughton), from its adjoining the sanctuary, "the place of peace." The Westminster Assembly adjourned thither at the close of September, 1643, because the room was well heated from its huge fireplace. The Lower House of Convocation now meets in the Jerusalem Chamber. See Dean STANLEY: Memorials of Westminster Abbey.

JESUITS. 1. CONSTITUTION AND CHARACTER.—The Society of Jesus consists of four classes, — novices, scholastics, coadjutors, and professed. Novices are admitted only after a minute and searching examination of their character and social circumstances. The novitiate lasts for two years, which are spent in houses established for the special purpose. Time is there regulated from hour to hour. Reading, meditation, prayer, and devotional exercises, alternate with nursing in the hospitals, travels as beggars, menial services, and ascetic practices. A course of training is gone through which enables the novice to completely break his individual will, and prepares him to be a fit instrument for the will of the society. The term of probation ended, the novice takes the three monastic vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, and enters one of the colleges of the society as a scholastic. There he studies grammar, rhetoric, and literature for two years, and philosophy, physics, and mathematics for three; teaches these subjects through all the classes of the college for five or six years; studies theology for five or six years, and finally completes his education by going through another novitiate of spiritual exercises. The whole course of studies is very minutely prescribed. The oldest ratio studiorum dates from 1586. That agreed upon by the fifth congregation, and published in 1599, was in use until Roothaan, in 1832, introduced a new and reformed plan. After the second novitiate, the scholastic is ordained a priest, and becomes an active member of the society, either as coadjutor or professed, adding to the three common monastic vows, in the former case, that of zealous devotion to the education of the young, in the latter, that of undertaking any task which the Pope might see fit to confide to him. There are, however, besides the regular professi quatuor votorum, also some professi trium votorum; though it is not clear what thereby is meant, unless the expression refers to the so-called secret Jesuits.

At the head of the society stands a general (praepositus generalis), who is represented in each province by a provincial (praepositus provincialis), and in each individual establishment by a superior (praepositus, or magister novitiorum, or rector). The general is elected for lifetime by the congregation; that is, the assembly of the professed, which meets ordinarily only for the purpose of electing the general. He holds in his hands the whole administration, jurisdiction, and government. He appoints the provincials and all other officials, generally only for a term of three years; he decides about admission to or expulsion from the order; he receives at fixed times reports from all the provincials and superiors; and he investigates the state of the various establishments by special inspectors; he can give dispensation from the rules just as he sees fit, etc. His power is absolute. He is to the order what the Pope is to the Church, — the representative of God. Indeed, the cement which holds the whole fabric together is implicit obedience. To the inferior his superior is the Christ, before whose commandment he must cancel his own will, his own intellect, his own natural mode of feeling. Every trace of individuality must be obliterated, unless the superior chooses to develop and use it for purposes of the order. All Jesuits should at all times, and under all circumstances, show the same physiognomy. No tossing of the head, no impatient movement of the hand, perfect composure, unimpeachable dignity. Slowly he raises his eyes from the ground when spoken to, and fixes them calmly on the lower part of the face of his interlocutor. Never a frown, still less a sneer.

The informing idea of this finely articulated organism is not the perfection of the inner life, but simply the performance of some external task. All that the order does for the education of its members and the elevation of their souls is done merely with an eye to some practical end. Science and art, religion and morals, are considered and employed only as so many tools or weapons for the rehabilitation of mediæval catholicism and the establishment of the reign of the Church over the State. The order has produced quite a number of reputed scientists, though hardly any of first, or even second rank. Science has an aim of its own, and so has the Jesuit. Whenever these two aims do not coincide, the Jesuit is compelled to leave science alone. He has succeeded best in those sciences which are most foreign to his own purpose, such as mathematics, chronology, interpretation of classical authors and ancient inscriptions; though in this last field he has been far surpassed by the Benedictines. On theology the order has exercised considerable influence. Mediæval dogmatics developed in different directions: not only scholasticism and mysticism presented sharply opposed views, but also, within the pale of the former, various schools were formed. With the Reformation arose quite a number of expositions concerning the great question, — justification by faith, or justification by good works, forming a transition between Protestantism and Romanism. All these stand-points had their representatives at the Council of Trent; but it was the Jesuits Lainez and Salmeron who finally succeeded in deciding the debate, and driving the dogmatics of the Roman Church back into the stiffest and most barren scholasticism. The dogmatical stand-point of the order may be characterized as that most directly opposed to Protestantism. The general outlines are derived from Thomas Aquinas; but the details are evidently treated with the conscious aim of producing a contrast to Protestantism. An inclination towards Pelagianism is apparent, and everywhere prevailing. Luis Molina went even so far as to ascribe to the natural will of man the power of fitting itself for actions which all were used to consider as the effects of divine grace; and justification he defined as the result of the equal co-operation of grace and free will. Still more characteristic is the Jesuitical system of morals. By its audacious unscrupulousness it finally became the rock on which the fortunes of the order were wrecked; and very early its limitation of sin to conscious and voluntary transgressions; its doctrines of probabilism; of methodus dirigendæ intentionis, which leads directly to the maxim, the end justifies the means; of reservatio mentalis, which destroys all faith between man and man; of amphibology, which may be made to cover any kind of falsehood, — made its adepts suspected, and even hated.

II. EARLY HISTORY, AND ACTIVITY DURING THE PERIOD OF RELIGIOUS RE-ACTION. — According to the ideas of the founder (see IGNATIUS LOYOLA), missions should be the true field of activity for the order, — foreign missions among the heathens, domestic missions within the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church, and missions for the conversion of the Protestants. The functions to which the members of the order had to adapt themselves were consequently preaching, teaching the young, and confession; and great privileges were conferred upon them to aid them in the fulfilment of their task. Paul III. gave them a right to preach everywhere, — in the churches and in the streets, — to administer the sacraments, to hear confession, and to give absolution in all cases except those mentioned in the bull In cæna Domini. By a bull of 1545 they were exempted from keeping the canonical hours, and afterwards, also, from participating in processions, and from other regulations infringing upon their time. Great obstacles, however, were also thrown in their way.

In Portugal they rapidly took root during the reign of John III. At Coimbra they founded their first college (1542), and Simon Rodriguez became its rector. The second they founded at Goa; and Francis Xavier made the Indian mission a great exploit. Under Sebastian, Rodriguez and the Jesuits actually governed the country. But in Spain they met with decided opposition from Melchior Canus, from the royal chaplain and librarian, Arias Montanus, and from others. Even Philip II. declared that the Society of Jesu was the only ecclesiastical institution he did not understand; and he continued maintaining a reserved attitude towards them, even after seeing them at work in Belgium. The country was half Protestant when they entered it in 1542: it was exclusively Roman Catholic, when, half a century later on (in 1592), they pushed their outposts farther on into the United Netherlands.

Still greater difficulties they encountered in France, where for a long time they were looked upon with suspicion and antipathy. In 1540 Ignatius sent some young men to Paris to study; but in 1542, when the war with Spain broke out, they were compelled to leave the country. In the Cardinal of Lorraine the order found an energetic patron, but all his exertions in its behalf were baffled by the decided opposition of the Parliament of Paris and the Sorbonne. At the convention of Poissy, where he was present in person (1561), Lainez succeeded in getting admission for the order, but only on very precarious conditions. Thus it had to change its name, and call itself, after its residency in Paris, Collège Clermont. Its first stable and flourishing establishment in France it founded at Lyons. One of its priests, Edmond Angier, produced by his preaching such an excitement in that vicinity, that all Reformed ministers were expelled, all Reformed churches destroyed, and all Reformed books burned. As a monument of this great victory, the Roman-Catholic population built the order a magnificent college in the city. As the great task of the Jesuits in France was to stamp out the Reformation there, and rid the country of the Huguenots, they were naturally opposed to Henry IV., and intrigued against him, even after his conversion to Romanism. The result was, that they were expelled by the Parliament of Paris. They succeeded, however, in maintaining themselves in the circuits of the two southern parliaments, and they soon came to understand that they could do nothing, unless in alliance with the king. From that moment they labored zealously for a reconciliation between the king and the Pope; and afterwards, during the embroilments with Spain, they even espoused the interests of France. As a reward, Henry IV. gave, in spite of the reclamations of the university, the Collège Clermont permission to teach, not only theology, but also the other sciences (1610), and he chose a Jesuit, Father Cotton, for his confessor. This was a great victory. At the same time, however, they suffered a great loss in a neighboring country. In Venice they were bitterly opposed by Fra Paolo Sarpi; and when, in 1606, Paul V. placed the republic under the interdict, they left the territory, together with the Theatines and Capuchins. But, when a reconciliation was brought about between the Pope and the republic, the latter made it a condition that the Jesuits should not be allowed to return, and even the Spanish ambassador had not a word to say in their favor.

The two countries, however, in which they achieved their greatest successes, and suffered their greatest losses, were England and Germany. The biographies of William Allen, Perron, Campian, and others, give an idea of their exertions in England. Under James II. they were established in a magnificent college at the Savoy, London, and Father Edward Petre was made the private secretary of the king. But the result was the loss of the crown of England to the House of Stuart. In Germany, on the contrary, they really succeeded in producing a re-action which actually turned back the current of the Reformation. The first Jesuit, Le Jay, appeared in Germany in 1550, at the diet of Augsburg. He obtained permission from King Ferdinand to found a college in Vienna, and in 1551 fifteen Jesuits entered the Austrian capital. In 1552 Ignatius founded the Collegium Germanicum, for the education of German youths as missionaries; and in 1556 similar establishments were founded at Cologne and Ingolstadt, together with a school for young noblemen at Prague, to which the king sent his pages. In 1559 the Jesuits arrived at Munich, which city they soon transformed into a "German Rome;" and during the next years they spread rapidly along the Rhine and the Main, — Treves, Mayence, Spire, Aschaffenburg, Wurzburg, etc. The influence of their universities began to be felt as a counterpoise to that of the universities of Wittenberg and Geneva, and their schools were greatly admired on account of the consistent method of the teachers and the sure progress of the pupils. Even Protestants sent their children thither; and through his pupils the teacher noiselessly penetrated into the Protestant family, with fasts, rosaries, prayers to the Virgin, etc., following in his step. Very soon the order felt prepared to use force as a means of conversion, and consequently force was used. Duke Albert V. of Bavaria gave his Protestant subject the choice between returning to the Church of Rome, or leaving the country: as a ward of the Margrave of Baden, a minor, he extended the measure also to that country. Thus supported, the Jesuits accomplished the "reformation" of the two countries in 1570 and 1571. The example was followed in Cologne, Munster, Hildesheim, Paderborn, Wurzburg, and other places. In Austria the counter-reformation began in 1578. Confiscation, exile, torture, etc., were the instruments. In 1603 the task was completed, and the workmen went to Bohemia and Hungaria. The former country was entirely lost to Protestantism: in the latter, the progress of the Reformation was stopped.

III. DECAY AND DISSOLUTION. — After Ignatius Loyola, followed, as generals of the order, Jacob Lainez (1558-65), Francis Borgia (1565-72), Eberhard Mercurian (1572-81), Claudius Aquaviva (1581-1615), etc. During this period various attempts were made by the popes to alter the constitution. The monarchical organization of the society gave to the general a tremendous, and, as it would seem, even dangerous power. Paul IV. demanded that the general should be elected, not for life, but only for three years; and Pius V., that the number of professed should be increased; and a steady influence on the government consented to the congregation. Foreign monarchs, the kings of Spain and France, had the same misgivings with respect to the order, and remonstrated with the Pope for an alteration of its constitution. Yea, denunciations of tyranny arose even from among its own members. (See MARIANA.) It required all the power, wealth, cunning, and discipline of which the order was possessed, to escape from these dangers. But, what the Pope had not been able to effect came gradually by itself. After Aquaviva, followed a number of incompetent generals. Unable to wield the tremendous power they held, they lived in comfort and splendor; and gradually the weakness of the centre transfused itself through the whole body. The professed followed the example of the general. From a phalanx of heroes, ready at any time to any sacrifice, they changed into a swarm of intriguing diplomats, beset with all the vices of ambition and debauch. The ecclesiastical and educational functions of the order were left to the performance of young and inexperienced people; and the schools, once admired as model institutions of their kind, became dens of disorder and vice. Novices were admitted without due discrimination, mostly with an eye to their fortune; and when dotations grew scarce, while at the same time the needs and expenses of the order greatly increased, the order decided to engage in business. Commercial houses were established, and factories built, in all the most productive regions of the earth. Every college was transformed into a kind of banking-house, and undertakings of unparalleled magnitude were begun.

Thus the order changed character, and so did the world around it, but on the opposite principle; so that, the less the order was ready to give, the more the world insisted upon having. In their controversy with the Jansenists, in the middle of the seventeenth century, though the Jesuits succeeded in silencing their adversaries, they nevertheless suffered a severe defeat; for it was the ideas of the Jansenists which kept the ground when the battle was ended; and the odium and ridicule which had been thrown upon the Jesuits went on increasing, though fed by no visible hand. In the Chinese mission affair their moral reputation was much damaged. It seemed doubtful whether it was the Jesuits who had converted the Chinese, or the Chinese who had converted the Jesuits, to such an extent had the missionaries modified Christianity, and amalgamated it with heathen elements. Europe stood scandalized, and it came to an open breach with the Pope. Still worse fared their intellectual fame under the attacks of the Encyclopedists. They were represented as the true type of obscurantism, and condemned as the most dangerous and most contemptible remnants of an entirely antiquated and inadequate state of affairs; and they had nothing to say in defence. Under such circumstances, they were at once implicated in the most vehement contests with the governments of Portugal, France, Spain, and Italy.

In 1750 Portugal and Spain made an exchange of certain territories in South America; but the inhabitants, who were known to walk blindly by the strings of their Jesuit priests and teachers, offered resistance, and met in the field, provided with European arms. It took eight years to put down the rebellion. Moreover, the great mercantile privileges and monopolies which the Jesuits held in Portugal caused continuous disturbances and losses to the commerce of the country; and as the complaints of Marquis Pombal in Rome had no effect, but were answered with an assault on the life of the king, the order was expelled Sept. 3, 1759. Its property was confiscated, and its members were shipped to the States of the Church. In 1760 Father Lavalette, procurator of the order, director of all its factories and mercantile establishments in the Island of Martinique, and a resident of France, made a heavy failure, of two million four hundred thousand livres; and the order refused to pay the debt, laying all responsibility on the shoulders of its procurator. The case was brought before the Parliament of Paris; and the examination of the constitution of the order, thereby occasioned, showed, that, in many points, it came in conflict with the constitution of France. For this reason the Parliament declared the society dissolved Aug. 6, 1762; and, after some haggling between the king and the Parliament, a royal decree of December, 1764, enforced the dissolution. On account of participation in conspiracies against the Spanish Government, all Jesuits, not only in Spain, but also in the Spanish colonies, were arrested during the night of March 31, 1767, and sent to Italy. Neither the Pope nor the general would receive them. After wandering about for several days on the open sea in overcrowded vessels, they were allowed to land in Corsica. Similar measures were introduced in Naples, Nov. 5, 1767, and Parma, Feb. 7, 1768; and when Pope Clement XIII. tried to come to the rescue of the order, and launched a bull of excommunication against its weakest enemy, the Duke of Parma, the French ambassador in Rome declared, Dec. 10, 1768, in the name of France, Spain, Portugal, Naples, and Parma, that, if the Pope did not retract, war would immediately be waged against him. This declaration literally killed Clement XIII.; but his successor, Clement XIV., dissolved the society by the bull Dominus ac Redemptor noster, July 21, 1773. The general, Lorenzo Ricci, was imprisoned in the Castle of St. Angelo, where he died in 1775. Clement XIV. died in 1774 from poison. — At the moment when the catastrophe of its dissolution began, the order had 41 provinces, 22,589 members (of whom 11,295 were priests), 669 colleges, 176 seminaries, 61 houses for novices, 273 missions in foreign countries, 335 residences, and the controlling influence over 80 theological faculties.

IV. ATTEMPTS AT RESTITUTION. — After the dissolution of the order, some of its members joined the Fathers of the Faith, or the Clerks of the Sacred Heart, or the Redemptorists; while others, on the plea that a papal bull has no authority in a dominion which lies outside of the jurisdiction of the Pope, retired into Prussia and Russia, and continued the society in its old forms, and after its old rules. Friedrich II. favored them: he hoped in them to find the best and cheapest schoolmasters for Silesia. Catharine II. even flattered them: she needed them for her further designs with respect to Poland. She confirmed their deeds of property in Russia, and in 1782 they chose a Pole to be their vicar-general. In 1800 they received the Roman-Catholic cathedral in St. Petersburg, and permission to found a college there; and by a brief of March 7, 1801, Pius VII. officially recognized the restitution of the order in Russia, and conferred the dignity of general on its chief. In 1801 King Ferdinand IV. of the Two Sicilies asked the Pope for the restoration of the order in his kingdom, and Pius VII. was only too glad to grant the request; but, as Naples was occupied by the French from 1806 to 1815, only the Island of Sicily could avail itself of the advantage. Finally, when, after the fall of Napoleon, Pius VII. returned to Rome, he summoned back the Jesuits, opened the Church of Gesù to them, and completely restored the order, "in accordance with the unanimous wishes of Christendom," as he said in the bull Solicitude omnium ecclesiarum, of Aug. 7, 1814.

This "unanimity," however, proved a mistake. In Russia, where Alexander I., in 1812, gave their college at Polotzk the rank of a university, and bestowed other great privileges on them, the Jesuits began to make proselytes among the members of the Russian Church, and to intrigue against the Bible Society, one of the emperor's favorite institutions. As a warning, they were banished from St. Petersburg and Moscow, Jan. 1, 1815. But they heeded not the warning; on the contrary, they tried their proselytizing talent even on the Russian army; and March 25, 1820, they were banished from the country "forever." Into Spain they were admitted by Ferdinand VII.; but when, in the civil war which broke out after his death (1833), they sided with Don Carlos, their college in Madrid was stormed by the people, July 17, 1834; and they were expelled by the regent, Queen Christina, July 4, 1835. In Portugal they sided with Dom Miguel, and were expelled (May 24, 1834) by Dom Pedro. In France they never obtained a legal position; but they were tolerated and even favored by Louis XVIII. and Charles X. At Lyons they founded a very flourishing college. They made their influence strongly felt on the whole middle stage of education, — that is, the stage between the elementary and the scientific education; and their number rose to four hundred and thirty-six, when the revolution of 1830 suddenly swept them out of the country. Under Louis Philippe they returned, and Father Ravignani became the most fashionable preacher in Paris; but the popular animosity against them — brought to its highest pitch by É. Sue's romance, The Wandering Jew — compelled, in 1845, their own general, Roothaan, to recall them. Indeed, the only country which they really succeeded in bringing under their sway was Belgium. They were among the most prominent agents in the revolution which separated Belgium from Holland; and, when the former was constituted an independent kingdom, they took possession of it as a conquered province, and domineered for some time, not only in the Church and the school, but even in the civil administration and the court.

One of the ideas of the revolution of 1848 proved very favorable to the Jesuits, — the separation of the Church from the State; and they were not slow in availing themselves of the circumstance. In 1849 the Roman-Catholic bishops of Prussia demanded, in the name of the revolution, free communication with Rome, full power of discipline within their Church, right of appointing priests and other ecclesiastical officers, unconditional power over the administration of the property of the Church, superintendence of all religious instruction in the schools, the seminaries, and the universities, etc. Friedrich Wilhelm IV. yielded in nearly all the points, and through the breach thus opened the Jesuits stole into the country. By the concordat of Aug. 18, 1855, between Austria and the Pope, the order came into possession of the colleges of Linz, Leitmeriz, and Innsbruck, and in 1857 also of the academy and university of Vienna, whose students and professors were forced to hear sermons by the Jesuits every Sunday. In 1858 they directed a hundred and seventy-two out of the two hundred and fifty-six gymnasiums in Austria. But in these great successes the declaration of the dogma of papal infallibility made a fearful havoc. July 31, 1870, Austria cancelled the concordat; and there, as in Italy, the influence of the Jesuits is steadily on the wane, though they have not yet been expelled. In Germany the papal infallibility dogma caused the Kulturkampf; and by the law of July 4, 1872, the Jesuits were banished. A similar fate overtook them in France, where they had played a conspicuous rôle during the second empire: the Ferry laws drove them out of the country. In 1878 the order had 10,033 members, of whom 4,660 were priests, 2,679 scholastics, and 2,694 coadjutors. In England, where Thomas Weld of Sulworth Castle established them (at Stonyhurst, in 1799), they have several establishments, also in Scotland and Ireland. In the United States, whither they first came with Lord Baltimore, in 1634, they have 1,400 fathers, 6 establishments for novices, and 20 larger educational institutions.

JESUS CHRIST. Our purpose in this article is to give a brief abstract of the history of the earthly activity of God our Saviour, with which we will combine a short consideration of the sources of this history, its chronology, and the literature.

I. DOCUMENTARY SOURCES. — The sources of the history of Jesus are usually distinguished into biblical and extra-biblical, but in truth we can only speak of biblical sources. The notices of Tacitus, Suetonius, Pliny, and of the later authors, Laupridius, Lucian, and Celsus, afford little matter, and hardly deserve a place in this category; and the Syriac letter of the Pagan Mara to his son Serapion, written about 73 A.D. (ed. by Cureton, in Spicilegium Syriacum, Lond., 1855), is at best an interesting witness to the spiritual power of Christianity at the end of the apostolic age. The letters of Abgar of Edessa, and the reply of Jesus, preserved by Eusebius (II. E., I. 13), would be exceedingly valuable, were they not ungenune. Turning to the extra-biblical sources of Christian origin, we have the apocryphal Gospels. The oldest and best of these, the so-called Hebrew Gospel, is very deficient in originality, compared with Matthew, and contains a profusion of historical inventions (Keim). The apocryphal Gospels were written between the second and seventh centuries, and were fantastic attempts to fill up the gaps in the life of our Lord, especially in the periods of his infancy, childhood, and passion, and are only valuable for the contrast they present to the canonical Gospels. The attempts of Lentulus to describe the appearance of Christ, and the brass statue of Christ and the woman with the issue of blood at Paneas, described by Eusebius, belong to a still lower plane. Of more value are the descriptions some of the Fathers of the first two centuries give of Christ's experiences and words; as particularly the account which the Epistle of Barnabas gives of the call of the apostles (5), the resurrection and ascension (15), etc. Extra-biblical accounts of Jewish origin might be expected in the writings of Philo and Josephus. The former, an Alexandrian Jew, completely ignores Christ and John the Baptist. The celebrated passage of Josephus (Antiq., XIII. 3, 3) hardly deserves to be regarded as genuine, although it is found in all the manuscripts, and is noticed by Eusebius (H. E., II. 11). At all events, it is not genuine as it now stands. The references to Christ's superhuman nature, resurrection, etc., betray the hand of an early Christian interpolator. Paulus, Olshansen, Gieseler, Hase, Reuss, Ewald, and others, hold this view, — that the passage has been tampered with, but is in part from the hand of Josephus. After the middle of the second century, the Jewish writings took notice of Jesus, but only to malign his character. Celsus and Porphyry both drew from these sources. He was described as the child of an adulterous connection of his mother with the soldier Panthera, as having been trained by Egyptian sorcerers in all kinds of magical arts, etc. These malicious falsehoods were collected in the Talmud and in the Book of the Origins of Jeschu Hannozi.

The student of the life of Jesus of Nazareth is, therefore, almost exclusively shut up to the New Testament, especially the four Gospels. In spite of the attacks of modern criticism, these four biographies are generally acknowledged to be genuine, the first three dating from the period preceding the destruction of Jerusalem (70). Each has its own characteristics. Matthew depicts Christ as the promised Messiah and the son of David. Mark portrays him as the Son of God, who established his Messianic mission by miraculous deeds. Luke describes him as the Saviour and revealer of truth, sent from God to save and enlighten all peoples. John differs very materially from the other evangelists, by exhibiting more of the inner life and thoughts of Christ. The other writings of the New Testament are very valuable as witnesses to the truth of the gospel narratives and their picture of Christ which they presuppose. They corroborate many individual traits, the Acts giving an account of the ascension (i. 4-11) and an otherwise unrecorded saying of our Lord (xx. 35); while Paul makes a valuable addition to the history of the days succeeding the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 3-8). The writers of the New Testament agree in their testimony to the reality of the revelation of God in Christ; and their narrative lays claim to our respect in proportion as it can stand alone, and does not need any illustration from the dull and flickering light of the apocryphal inventions.

II. LIFE OF JESUS. 1. Pedigree, Birth, and Infancy. — Jesus was descended from David (Matt. i. 6; Luke iii. 31). His contemporaries recognized this pedigree (Matt. xv. 22, xx. 30); and Paul (Rom. i. 3) and the Epistle to the Hebrews (vii. 14) assume it as a thing generally acknowledged. Both Matthew and Luke agree in representing him as being conceived by the Holy Ghost. He was born, not in the town of Nazareth, where Joseph and Mary resided, but in Bethlehem. Thus the prophecy of Micah (v. 2) was fulfilled. There was no room in the inn; and Jesus, the priestly King of Israel, and the world's Redeemer, was born, probably, in a cave or grotto, and laid in a manger. Shepherds, led by angels, were the first witnesses of his birth. The child was circumcised on the eighth day, according to the Mosaic custom. Witnesses soon appeared to the divine mission of the child, in those who were waiting for the kingdom of God, such as Anna the prophetess, and Simeon at the temple. Wise men from the East (Matt. ii. 1-12), led by a startling sign in the heavens, also came to adore the child. King Herod regarded with suspicion the young scion of royal descent, and by his murderous plans his parents were led to flee into Egypt, from which, when they returned, they went to live in Nazareth. These narratives of the infancy have been discredited by the modern critical school; but they stand in the strongest contrast to those of the apocryphal Gospels; and much in the accounts both of Matthew and Luke, instead of being of the nature of legendary reminiscences (Beyschlag), seems to have come from eye-witnesses.

2. Development, Baptism, and Temptation. — During the years spent at Nazareth, Jesus "advanced in wisdom, and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Luke ii. 52). In all this development he remained absolutely without sin, and was triumphant over every temptation (John viii. 46; 2 Cor. v. 21, etc.). He in whom dwelt "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col. ii. 9) lived and learned as the son of a carpenter, and was himself called "the carpenter" (Mark vi. 3). The religious arrangements of the synagogue must have contributed to his religious development. In the synagogues the influence of the Pharisees was supreme; but it is evident that Jesus in no wise became identified with them, or their instructions, or he could not have subsequently directed so many scathing rebukes against the "Pharisees and scribes." But he must have studied the Old-Testament Scriptures. When he began his ministry, he was able to teach with authority, and not as the scribes (Matt. vii. 29). His baptism by John also contributed to prepare him to inaugurate his public activity in the spirit of a divine consciousness. He who was without sin submitted to the water-baptism of repentance (Matt. iii. 11), in humble obedience to the law (Matt. iii. 15) and voluntary condescension. But he received at the Jordan the unction of the Holy Spirit, and was declared by God to be his well-beloved Son. John, who up to this time had not known Jesus as the Messiah, now instructed of the heavenly voice, recognized him as the "Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29). Jesus here became fully conscious of his Messianic mission, but was immediately led by the "Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted of the devil" (Matt. iv. 1, etc.). He resisted, one after the other, the three temptations, of which he, at a later period, spoke to his disciples, and was ministered to by angels. It was not till after this conflict with the prince of this world that he inaugurated his public activity in the world, for the purpose of establishing his kingdom in it. From this time forth he manifested forth his higher gifts and powers, and in the first instance with the design of establishing the nucleus of the Church.

3. Plan and Methods of the Messianic Activity of Jesus. — The hypothesis that Jesus had a definite plan before his mind when he began his public activity has been given up by some modern theologians (Schleiermacher, Ulmann, Kahnis, etc.); but, if it be allowed that the purpose of his life was revealed to Jesus by the Spirit at his baptism, then it is proper to speak of his having had a definite Messianic plan. Our Lord himself seems to declare this, in an indirect way, in parables (Luke xiv. 28-33), and in discourses to his disciples of his hour, which had not yet come (John ii. 4), of the bread of life (John vi. 51), etc. The majority of the parables about the kingdom of heaven show a progress of ideas, and indicate the same thing. The main periods of his public activity are the Galilean ministry, lasting more than two years; a ministry of four months, beginning with the mission of the seventy, and spent between Galilee and Judæa; and the last fifty days, lasting from the beginning of the passion-week to the ascension. The methods which Jesus used during these three periods were substantially the same. A distinction is justly made between his miraculous and teaching activity; but it must not be overlooked that many of the miracles had a deep symbolical meaning (as the restoration of the blind to sight), and that Jesus frequently followed the working of a miracle with words of instruction. The miracles must be regarded as sustaining an intimate connection with his divine-human personality. They were not mere evidences for overcoming unbelief, but were signs of the higher Messianic life of Christ, and prophetic pledges of the glorious future of the kingdom of heaven. From this point of view the miraculous activity was a necessary accompaniment of all the three periods of his life. The form and contents of the teaching of Jesus changed to this extent, that, in the earlier part of the Galilean ministry, there was more of legal precept, but later more of prophecy and promise. The discourses preserved by the synoptists are predominantly parabolic and gnomic; those preserved by John, allegorical and symbolic. The synoptists contain more of teaching about Christ (doctrina de Christo); John, more of the teaching of Christ (doctrina Christi).

4. The Galilean Ministry. — (a) Co-operation with John the Baptist. The ministry of Jesus was not yet concentrated in Galilee. John alone gives an account of the incidents of this period before the imprisonment of the Baptist, which Mark (i. 14) and Matthew (iv. 12) mention as the occasion for his going to Galilee. The main incidents belonging here are the choice of some disciples from the body of John's followers (John i. 35-51), the purification of the temple, in which he for the first time manifested his opposition to the leaders of the Jewish people (John ii. 13-25), and the conversation with Nicodemus. Here, also, belong the first exhibition of his miraculous power at Cana of Galilee (John ii. 1-11), and a short visit to Capernaum (John ii. 12). At the end of this period he turned again to Galilee, holding on the way the conversation at Jacob's well with the Samaritan woman (John iv. 4-12). Harmonists differ as to whether this conversation precedes or follows the miracle at the pool of Bethesda (John v. 1-17), as well as John's imprisonment. In the former case, Jesus must have returned yet once again to Judæa before John's imprisonment. (b) To the Death of John and the Miracle of the Loaves. — The characteristic of this period, which includes the most of the Galilean miracles, consists in the gradual selection of the twelve disciples, and the large masses of people who gathered about him at the Lake of Galilee.

The length of this period cannot be determined with certainty, on account of the difficulty of deciding whether the miracles of John iv. 47-54 and v. 1 sqq. belong here, and because it is somewhat doubtful whether the passover of John vi. 4 is the only one that fell in this period. The main incidents were as follows: after being rejected at Nazareth, Jesus passed to Capernaum (Luke iv. 16 sqq.; Matt. iv. 13), where he performed a number of miracles. Here belongs the choice of the disciples in the stricter sense (Matt. iv. 18-22, etc.), followed by the solemn instructions of Matt. v.-vii. (Mark iii. 13; Luke vi. 17 sqq.). Between this Sermon on the Mount and the mission of the twelve (Matt. x. 1 sqq.) occurred many remarkable cures, such as the centurion's servant (Matt. viii. 5-13; Luke vii. 1-10), and other miracles, such as the stilling of the storm on Lake Galilee. Here, also, belongs the raising of Jairus' daughter (Matt. ix. 23-27), and that of the widow of Nain's son (Luke vii. 11-17), which must have occurred soon afterwards. Matthew places at this time the discourses and parables of chaps. xii., xiii., which Mark and Luke break up into parts, and give in other connections. But the three synoptists agree again in their accounts of the miracle of the five loaves, and the walking on the lake, which they put in connection with the news of the Baptist's decapitation. John also joins in with the synoptists at this point. (c) The Last Summer in Galilee. — This period is marked by a growing conflict with the unbelieving Galileans, who have forgotten their once enthusiasm, and especially with the Pharisees. This opposition obliges Jesus to retire frequently to desert-places, and even to pass at times beyond the confines of Galilee. The period lasts from the passover of John vi. 4 to the feast of tabernacles (John vii. 2); that is, through the summer and fall. Among the main incidents were the condemnation of the Pharisees (Matt. xv. 1-20), the visits to the regions of Tyre and Sidon and Cæsarea Philippi, the confession of Peter, the first definite announcement of the crucifixion (Matt. xvi. 13-23), the transfiguration, the journey to the feast of tabernacles (John vii. 8-10), and the presentation of the child as an illustration of fitness for the kingdom of heaven (Matt. xviii. 1 sqq.).

5. The Extra-Galilean Ministry. — During the winter months previous to the passion. Luke (ix. 51-xviii. 33) gives the most elaborate account of this period; but all three synoptists (Mark x. 1, 32; Matt. xix. 1) agree in describing the last departure of Christ from Galilee as a particularly important and solemn event. Jesus set his face towards Jerusalem, but first touched upon Samaria (Luke ix. 52-55), and labored in Perea (Matt. ix. 1; Mark x. 1). The mission of the seventy belongs here (Luke x. 1-20). Much that Luke narrates in these chapters may not be put in chronological order; but it is likely that Jesus repeated some of his discourses, as the model prayer (Luke xi. 1 sqq.). John mentions some of the journeys of Jesus to Jerusalem at this period, to the feast of dedication in December (x. 22-29), to Bethany at the death of Lazarus (xi. 7 sqq.), and to the last passover (xi. 54). We do not pretend to be able to arrange in more definite chronological sequence the incidents and discourses of Luke ix.-xviii. Besides running parallel with Luke at this point, in some cases Matthew and Mark add, towards the close of the period, the reply of the Master to the question about divorce (Matt. xix. 1-12; Mark x. 2-12), the parable of the laborers in the vineyard (Matt. xx. 1-16), and the conversation with the mother of John and James (Matt. xx. 20; Mark x. 35). On the other hand, John narrates the raising of Lazarus from the dead (xi. 1 sqq.), and the retirement of Jesus to Ephraim to escape the murderous plans of the rulers of the people (xi. 54 sqq.).

6. The Passion and the Resurrection. — The Pharisees and chief priests, who had been enraged, by the resurrection of Lazarus, against the Galilean prophet, now witnessed a growing enthusiasm on the part of the people in his favor. In Jericho he healed Bartimeus, and was the guest of Zacchens. At Bethany he was anointed by Mary with costly nard, which was the occasion for Judas to murmur, and for our Lord to predict his speedy death (John xii. 1-11, etc.). On the following day, Sunday, he entered Jerusalem, amidst the hosannas of the people, who hailed him as the Messianic King (John xii. 12-19, etc.). He spent the following nights at Bethany, and the days in teaching at the temple or by the wayside, or in disputing with the representatives of Phariseism and Sadduceism. After spending Wednesday at Bethany, he despatched Peter and John to Jerusalem to prepare the passover, which he partakes of with his disciples on Thursday (see below). In the account of this general scene, the synoptists linger upon the institution of the Lord's Supper, while John dwells upon the introductory act of the foot-washing and the consolatory discourses and prayer which followed the institution. All four evangelists detail the recognition and departure of the traitor, and the prediction of Peter's denial. Then followed the departure to Gethsemane and the agony (narrated only by the synoptists), the approach of the traitor, and the apprehension of the Saviour. Jesus was in turn brought before Anas, Caiaphas, — who condemns him to death for blasphemy, — and Pontius Pilate, in the prætorium, that he might confirm the death-penalty of the Sanhedrin. Pilate hoped to escape the necessity of so doing by sending him to Herod Antipas (Matt. xxvii. 12-14, etc.), but on his return yielded, though reluctantly, to the demand of high priests and people for his crucifixion. Jesus was then scourged, and nailed to a cross outside the walls of Jerusalem, on which he hung for six hours, giving up the ghost at three in the afternoon, amidst a darkening of the sky, the rending of the veil of the temple, and the confession by the centurion that he was the Son of God. After his death he was laid in a new tomb by Joseph of Arimathea, from which he rose in the early morning of the third day. He appeared first to Mary Magdalene, then to Peter, and during the afternoon to two disciples on their way to Emmaus, and in the evening to ten of his disciples. Eight days later, on the first day of the week, he appeared again to the disciples, Thomas being present, who was forced to make a remarkable confession of his faith in the risen Lord and his divinity (John xx. 24-29). Four other appearances are narrated (the appearance of 1 Cor. xv. 7 being, as is probable, the same as that described in Matt. xxviii. 16-20), at the last of which, on the Mount of Olives, near Jerusalem, he was received up into heaven (Acts i. 3-9; compare Luke xxiv. 51; Mark xvi. 19).

III. CHRONOLOGY OF THE LIFE OF CHRIST.

1. Day and Year of Birth. — There are six dates in the Gospels which are of greater or less value in fixing the time of our Lord's birth. (a) Jesus' age at his baptism, which, according to Luke iii. 23, was "about thirty years," when compared with the notice of the Baptist's public appearance in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius (782 or 783 of Rome), would give 753 or 754 of the city of Rome as the year of the birth. Basing his calculations upon a comparison of these notices, Dionysius Exiguus, in the sixth century, fixed the chronology of Christ's life, which has since had general currency in the Church; and the 25th of December has been accepted since the fourth century as the day of the birth. The precariousness of this calculation becomes, however, apparent, when we remember that Christ is only said to have been "about thirty years of age," and the difficulty of determining the point from which the reign of Tiberius is to be reckoned as having begun. (b) The notice of John ii. 20, that the temple had been forty-six years in building, has also been used, but does not give any exact results. (c) The same may be said concerning the enrolment under Quirinius (Luke ii. 2), which was the occasion of Joseph's journey to Jerusalem. (d) We get a better datum from the service of the priestly course of Abijah, to which Zacharias belonged (Luke i. 5). This was the eighth of the twenty-four courses which served in the temple a week at a time. We know that the evening before the destruction of Jerusalem (9th Ab, 823 of the city of Rome), the first course began its service. This would give us the 17th to the 23d of April, or the 3d to the 9th of October, of 748, as the time when Zacharias had the vision of the angel. Jesus' birth, occurring fifteen months thereafter, would have happened in 749, or five years before the beginning of our present era. This calculation is based upon the supposition that there had been no interruption in the regular sequence and ministration of the priestly courses from the time of Judas Maccabæus to the destruction of Jerusalem. (e) Of most value is the calculation which starts out with the date of Herod's death in 750 of Rome (Josephus). The king died soon after the command to destroy the children of Bethlehem (Matt. ii. 19). This would give us 749, or 4-5 B.C., as the year of Christ's birth. (f) Another calculation has been based upon astronomical facts compared with the star of the magi. Kepler, in his De Jesu Christi vero anno natalitio (1606), took up this method, and found that a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn had occurred in 747 of Rome. Made curious by this phenomenon, the magi, some time later (748 according to Kepler, or 749-750 according to Wieseler, etc.), directed by a new stellar appearance at the time of Christ's birth, started towards Jerusalem. Kepler and Ebrard regard this as a fixed star, appearing for the first time, like that in Cassiopeia, in 1572, or in Ophiuchus, in 1604. Wieseler and others looked upon it as a comet. This calculation would also give us 4 or 5 B.C. as the year of Christ's birth. The date cannot be fixed with absolute definiteness; but it may be regarded as reasonably certain that it fell about halfway between 747 and 753 of the city of Rome.

2. Duration of the Public Ministry.—John expressly mentions two passovers as occurring during Christ's life. The first (John ii. 20) happened in 780 of Rome, Jesus having begun his ministry the autumn before. The second passover is mentioned in connection with the feeding of the five thousand (John vi. 4). The synoptists speak of only one passover for the whole period of the ministry, and would seem, for this reason, to regard it as having lasted only one year. This was the view of many of the early Fathers, who adduced in confirmation the expression, "the acceptable year of the Lord" (Isa. lxi. 2; Luke iv. 19). Keim has recently revived this theory; but it is inconsistent with some expressions in the synoptists themselves, as the last words over Jerusalem ("how often," etc., Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 31), the intimate relations with the family at Bethany, which seem to call for frequent visits to it (compare Luke x. 38 sqq. with Mark xi. 11 sq.), etc. Two passovers, then, occurred during the Lord's public ministry, and a third at its close, which therefore lasted from two years and a half to three years. This conclusion rests upon the view that the feast of John v. 1 was not a passover, as Irenæus, Luther, Grotius, Tholuck, etc., held, but one of the other Jewish feasts. Jesus began his ministry in the summer or fall of 26 A.D. (779 R.), and was crucified in the spring of 29 A.D. (782 R.).

3. Day of the Crucifixion.—The evangelists agree in describing the crucifixion as having occurred on Friday. The universal tradition of the ancient Church followed this view. The synoptists seem to indicate that this Friday was the first day of the passover, or the 15th of Nisan. John, on the other hand, describes it as the eve of the passover, or the 14th of Nisan, and clearly distinguishes the Lord's Supper from the usual paschal meal which took place on the evening of the 11th (xiii. 1-29) states that the passover was to follow the crucifixion in the evening (xviii. 28), and mentions that the crucifixion took place on the "preparation of the passover" (xix. 14, 31). The conclusion can hardly be avoided, that the accounts of the synoptists and John are divergent, and that John's date is to be preferred. Jesus was crucified on the 14th of Nisan. Some incidents in the synoptists seem to confirm this result; as the return of Simon of Cyrene from the country (Mark xv. 21; Luke xxiii. 26), and the preparation of the women for the embalming of the body (Luke xxiii. 56), which indicate that it was a work and not a feast day. [Lightfoot, Wieseler, Robinson, Lange, Milligan, Plumptre, Schaff, and others, deny that there is any real divergence between the accounts of the synoptists and John, and hold that Jesus was crucified on the 15th of Nisan. See, for the arguments, ROBINSON'S Harmony of the Gospels, note 8, pp. 212-223; SCHAFF'S Church History, vol. i. (revised edition) pp. 133 sqq.]

4. The Period after the Resurrection.—Neither the arrangement of Paul in 1 Cor. xv. 3-8, nor those of the evangelists, are to be regarded as decisive. Jesus had intercourse with his disciples for forty days after the resurrection (Acts i. 3). At first sight we might conclude, from Luke xxiv. 50 sqq., that Jesus ascended on the evening of the day of the resurrection. The whole passage, however, is to be regarded as a summary statement of the history of the resurrection and ascension. But on the basis of it and other passages (John xx. 17), an early Church tradition (Ep. of Barnabas, c. 15), Kinkel, Greve (D. Himmelfahrt unseres Herrn, etc., Hanover, 1868), and others, have assumed that there were repeated ascensions.

LIT.—(Compare especially the extensive treatment of Hase, in his Geschichte Jesu, pp. 110-174). 1. The early Church did not attempt an historical treatment of Christ's life in the real sense, but contented itself with poetical representations and labors on the Harmony of the Gospels. The oldest Harmonies are those of TATIAN (about 170), AMMONIUS of Alexandria (about 220), and the later imitations of Bishop VICTOR of Capua (about 550). The poetic representations were either lyrical, as the Apotheosis of PRUDENTIUS, and the Hymnus acrostichus, etc., of SEDULIUS; dramatic, as the ἱστορία πάσχω of GREGORY NAZIANZEN; or epic, as the Hist. evangelica of the Spanish presbyter C. VETTIUS AQUILINUS JUVENCUS (about 330), the Greek paraphrase of the Gospel of John by the Egyptian NOXNUS (fifth century), and the heroic poem of the miracles (Mirabilia divinatorum . . . Carmen paschale) of CÆLIUS SEDULIUS (about 450).

2. The middle ages produced harmonies of the Gospels, in the old High German rendering of the Harmony of VICTOR of Capua in the ninth century (ed. SCHMELLER, Vienna, 1841), and the Monotessarion of GERSON (Cologne, 1471), which was based upon thorough investigations, and almost inspired by a critical spirit. They also produced poetical treatments at the beginning of the period in epic verse, like that of the Saxon CÆDMON (about 680), the Heiland (about 820), and the one by OTFRIED (in rhyme), and, towards the close, in dramatic verse,—the passion plays. The middle ages gave birth to the first Lives of Christ for practical purposes, and enriched with legendary matter,—BOXAVENTURA: Vita Christi, first printed about 1480 [English translation by Hutchings, London, 1881]; LUDOLPHUS DE SAXONIA (a Carthusian in Strassburg about 1350): Vita J. Chr. e quatuor Evr. et scriptoribus orthodoxis concinnata, Strassburg, 1470, last edition, Brussels, 1870; SIMON DE CASSIA (an Augustinian in Florence): De gestis Domini, Italian, Florence, 1496, Latin, Basel, 1517; XAVIER (nephew of Francis Xavier): Hist. Christi, first written in Portuguese, then translated into Persian for missionary purposes, Latin translation, Lugd., Batavia, 1639.

3. Modern Times (down to the beginning of this century).—The literature of Harmonies of the Gospels [see HARMONY] and of poetic representations continues. Of the latter we mention here HUGO GROTIUS: Christus patiens, last edition, Tübingen, 1712; KLOPSTOCK: Messias, 1748; LAVATER: Jesus Christus [1783-86], and Pontius Pilatus [1782-85, 4 vols.]. Lives of Christ for purposes of edification were published within the pale of the Roman-Catholic Church by MARTIN V. COCHEM (3d ed., Regensburg, 1862), and the nun CATHARINE EMMERICH (d. 1824), D. bitte Leiden uns. Herrn J. Christi, new edition, Regensburg, 1858; and within the Protestant Church, in English, by JEREMY TAYLOR (London, 1653), READING (London, 1716; new ed., 1852), [JOHN FLEETWOOD (about 1770)]; and in German by CREUTZBERG (1714), BOGATZKY (1753), etc. A large number of works of this class in the latter part of the century by SCHULER, NÜSSELT, MARHEINECKE, V. AMMON (the last two in the form of sermons), etc. The critical method, which began to be practised at the beginning of the eighteenth century, was first used in the interest of sheer negations of the historical credibility of the Gospel history by the Deists of England,—Woolston, Chubb, and others. Introduced into Germany, it was applied by REIMARIUS (d. 1768): Fragmente eines Ungenannten (edited by Lessing), 1777; BAHRT: Briefe ü. d. Bibel, etc., Halle, 1782, and Ausführung d. Planes Jesu, 12 vols., Berlin, 1781 sqq. (less hostile to Christianity); VENTURINI: Natürliche Gesch. d. grossen Propheten v. Nazareth, Copenhagen, 1800–02. Bahrt and Venturini to some extent apply the principles of the so-called naturalistic method of explaining the miracles; but it afterwards found its chief representative in PAULUS (d. 1851), in his Commentaries on the Gospels, and in his Life of Jesus, Heidelberg, 1828, 2 vols. These hostile tendencies were opposed by LARDNER, STACKHOUSE, PALEY, etc., in England, and DÖDERLEIN (Nürnberg, 1778, 2 vols.), SEMLER (Beantwortung d. Fragmente e. Ungenannten, Halle, 1780), REINHARD (Wittenberg, 1781, 5th ed., 1830), HERDER (Von Erlöser, etc., and Von Gottes Son, etc., 5 vols., Riga, 1796 sqq.), JACOB HESS (Lebensgesch. Jesu, Leipzig, 1768; 7th ed., Zürich, 1823, 3 vols.).

4. Recent Times.—The studies of the life of Christ of the last fifty years, both on the part of the negative (denying Christ's divinity) and the positive and believing schools, have been conducted upon critical principles, and with freedom from doctrinal prepossessions. This period may be denominated the critical and scientific period. SCHLEIERMACHER'S Lectures, delivered in Berlin for the first time in 1819 (published 1864), and K. HASE'S Lectures, delivered for the first time at Tübingen, 1823 (published 1829; 5th ed., 1865; and, under the title Gesch. Jesu, Leipzig, 1876), may be regarded as respectively the starting-points for the two schools, although both treatments lean strongly in many points towards rationalism (Schleiermacher assuming some of the incidents of the infancy to be legends, etc.). We shall divide the literature into two groups:—

(a) The negative method has passed through three stages. The mythical hypothesis left little remaining in the Gospels as beyond all doubt reliable. It was developed by DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS: D. Leben Jesu (Tüb., 2 vols., 1835; 4th ed., 1840) [English translation from 3d ed. by George Eliot, Lond., 1846, 3 vols.; republished N.Y., 1850], and D. Leben Jesu f. d. deutsche Volk bearbeitet (Leip., 1864; 3d ed., 1875) [English translation, Lond., 1865, 2 vols.]; WEISSE: D. Leben Jesu kritisch u. philosoph. bearbeitet, Leip., 1838, 2 vols.; SALVATOR: Jesus Christ, etc., Paris, 1838, 2 vols.; GFRÖRER: Gesch. d. Urchristenthums, Stuttg., 1868. The Tübingen school, or so-called Tendenzkritik, which discredited the sources of the life of Christ, and directed its attacks especially against the Gospel of John, which it put in the second century, was represented by BRUNO BAUER: Kritik d. evang. Gesch. d. Johannes (Bremen, 1840), Krit. d. evang. Gesch. d. Synoptiker (Leip., 1841, 2 vols.), Krit. d. Evangelien u. Gesch. ihres Ursprungs (Berlin, 1850, 3 vols., etc.); F. CHR. V. BAUR (more moderate and scholarly): Krit. Untersuchungen ü. d. kanon. Evangelien (1847) and D. Christenthum u. d. christl. Kirche d. drei ersten Jahrhunderte (1853); HILGENFELD: D. Evangelien, etc. (1851); G. VOLKMAR (more radical): D. Religion Christi, etc. (1857), [Jesus Nazarenus und die erste christliche Zeit (Zür., 1882)]. The eclectic principle has been employed by RENAN: Vie de Jésus, Paris, 1863 [16th ed., 1879; English translation, N.Y., 1863], who resolves the life of Christ into romance; SCHENKEL: D. Charakterbild Jesu (Wiesb., 1864; 4th ed., 1873), and D. Christusbild d. Apostel, etc. (Leip., 1878); the same: Das Christusbild der Apostel u. der nachapostol. Zeit (Leip., 1879); KEIM: D. Geschichtl. Christus (Zür., 1865; 3d ed., 1866), Gesch. Jesu von Nazara (Zür., 1867–72, 3 vols.) [English translation, Lond., 1873–82, 6 vols.], Supernat. Religion (Lond., 1874, 3 vols.; 7th ed., 1879); WITTICHEN: Das Leben Jesu (Jena, 1876).

(b) These tendencies have been opposed by a large literature advocating the credibility of the Gospel history, and presenting a picture of the theanthropic character of Christ. Against Strauss's Life of Christ have appeared THOLOCK: D. Glaubwürdigkeit d. evang. Geschichte, Hamb., 1837; NEANDER: Life of Christ, Hamb., 1837 (7th ed., Gotha, 1873) [English translation, N.Y., 1848]; EBRARD: *Wissenschaftl. Kritik d. evang. [English translation, Edinb., 1864, 6 vols.; new ed., Phila., 1872, 4 vols.]; HAIN: Leben Jesu, Bresl., 1844; also the Catholic theologians SEPP: D. Leben Christi, Regensb., 1843 sqq., 4 vols. (2d ed., 1865); BUCHER: D. Leben J. C., Stuttg., 1859; Bishop DUPANLOUP: Histoire de notre Sauveur Jésus Christ, Paris, 1870. Against the criticism of the Tübingen school (Tendenzkritik) have appeared EWALD: Gesch. Jesu u. seiner Zeit (vol. v. of his History of Israel), 2d ed., 1857 [English translation, Camb., 1865]; RIGGENBACH: Vorlesungen über d. Leben Jesu, Basel, 1858. Against Renan, Schenkel, Keim, etc., have appeared LUTHARDT: D. modernen Darstellungen d. Lebens Jesu, Leipzig, 1864; WEIZÄCKER: Untersuchungen über d. evang. Geschichte, etc., Gotha, 1864; PRESSENSÉ: Jesus Christ, son temps, sa vie, son œuvre, Paris, 1865 [English translation, Lond., 1866; 7th ed., 1879]; WIESELER: Beiträge zur richtigen Würdigung der Evangelien, Gotha, 1869. JESUS CHRIST, Three Offices of. A threefold office of prophet, high priest, and king, was ascribed to Jesus long ago by Eusebius (H. E., I. 3); Calvin, in his Institutes (II. 15), introduced it as a doctrine into systematic theology. It passed over into the Heidelberg Catechism (31); and from that time the theologians of the Reformed churches treated the work of Christ under this threefold aspect. The principle was first indorsed in the Lutheran Church by John Gerhard. This division of Christ's redeeming work was a natural one; and nothing is more certain than that the Old Testament depicts him as the perfect prophet, and then as the servant of Jehovah, to whom the functions of prophet, priest, and king, belong, and finally as the royal seed of David, and the priest-king. All three of these offices branch out from the idea of the Messiah, or the Anointed; for Christ was unointed prophet to preach to the poor (Isa. lxi. 1), King of righteousness (Heb. i. 8, 9), and High Priest "after the power of an endless life" (Heb. vii. 16).

The prophets spoke of the Redeemer as the future and perfect Prophet. This was first done in Deut. xviii. 15. Moses in the wilderness was sent up to Mount Sinai to hear (Deut. v. 27), and there it was revealed that God would send down a Prophet to whom the people would listen. Here is the dawning of the contrast between the law and the gospel. The prophecies of Isaiah xl.-lxvi. do not in the first instance concern a prophet, but the "servant of Jehovah." Isaiah works (xlix. 4) in vain; but a future Servant of Jehovah will carry out the destiny of Israel by being a prophet, and more than a prophet,—by bearing the punishment of our sins (liii.). He is also represented in this section as the King of kings, before whom the kings of the earth bow. A radical principle of the Messianic prophecies is the royal dominion of Christ. He was promised as the seed of David, whose throne should last forever (2 Sam. vii. 18 sqq.; Ps. ii. 6, 7, ex.); and not only was he to be a king, but a priest-king, after the order of Melchizedek (Ps. cx. 4; Zech. vi. 12, 13). Thus the faithful Israelite was taught to expect a Messiah who should unite the priestly and prophetic offices, and at the same time establish a throne of peace. The carnal Israelite, however, looked for a Messiah who should found a worldly kingdom, and not exercise prophetic or priestly functions.

Jesus attested his threefold office by his activity, suffering, and final end. When he announced the near approach of the kingdom of God, and confirmed his word by signs (σημεία), he was acting as the prophet, and was so acknowledged by his disciples (Luke xxiv. 19) and others (Luke vii. 16, ix. 8; John iv. 19, etc.). Not only his activity, however, but his very person, was prophetic. It was the revelation of the Father (John xiv. 9), and he made known the fulness of his nature and will (Heb. i. 1 sqq.). For this reason he is designated the Word (John i. 1 sqq.), which was in the beginning, and became flesh (John i. 14). He was the living eternal law of God, because he was a man as God would have man (Matt. iii. 17; John iv. 31, v. 19, etc.). He was at the same time the gospel as embodying the gracious will of the Father (Luke iv. 17 sqq.; John i. 29, etc.). Jesus is depicted as a priest, or rather as the high priest, by the Epistle to the Hebrews (vii. sqq.). He offered up himself as a sacrifice. It is the clear teaching of Scripture that Christ, on the one hand, fulfilled all the laws of God to man, and that his life was a holy and spotless sacrifice, and, on the other, that he submitted himself to death, which was the punishment of sin. He, therefore, was the substitute for our guilt and punishment; for the fundamental idea of the atoning sacrifices of the Old Testament was that of vicarious substitution. Christ's death had not a whit of the nature of a suicide. It was his priestly and holy life which caused his death. His sacrifice was a priestly one, just because he remained faithful where fidelity led him into the jaws of death.

But from Christ's death the crown of thorns is inseparable, and from the crown of thorns his royal dignity. He did not refuse, in the day of his humiliation, the title of "Son of David" (Matt ix. 27, xxi. 9 etc.); for he was really so, and he declared himself to be such (John iv. 26; Matt. xxii. 42 sqq.). He did not exercise his royalty as the masses wanted him to do, but he manifested it in his acts. As a reward for the royalty of his priestly self-abnegation, he was crowned with the crown of glory (Phil. ii. 9, 10; Heb. ii. 9), and has a right, as king, to his people (1 Pet. ii. 9); for all who come to him are given to him (John xvii. 6), and shall partake of his glory (John xvii. 22, 24, 26).

From the above considerations it will be seen that the threefold division of Christ's work is essential to the scriptural representations of him. But, apart from the fall and redemption, this threefold office develops out of the very idea of a mediator. If man had not sinned, there would have been a development. In this case, would there not have been an incarnation? To deny this would mean nothing more nor less than that the fall was an absolutely indispensable stage in the development towards perfection, which could not have happened without sin. If the proposition be true, — no apostasy, no Christ, — then sin is an advantage, a conclusion which would be the grave of all the first principles of Christian ethics. God would have revealed himself to the race, even if there had been no apostasy. He would have then revealed himself through a prophet to lead men to higher stages of knowledge, through a priest who would offer himself up a living offering to the good of every individual, and through a king as the leader of men.

Christ combined these three offices, and, as the Word, led sinful man out of his error, darkness, and falsehood, and revealed to him the law and the grace of God. As the holy, priestly offering, he removed the curse of sin from the world by himself bearing it in our stead. As the king, he reigns in heaven. The exercise of these three offices were not confined to any special periods in Christ's public life on earth, nor is it limited to any special period in his glory; for he continues at all times to be the exponent of the Father to the world, the world's intercessor with the Father, and the head of his Church. EBRARD.

JESUS, Society of the Sacred Heart of. The devotion to the sacred heart of Jesus was the work of the Jesuit La Combière, who reared the institution on the visions of Maria Alacoque, a nun in the monastery of Paray le Monial in Burgundy (d. in 1690, canonized in 1864). Afterwards the Jesuits were very zealous for the formation of brotherhoods of the Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, whose number in 1726 increased to three hundred and ten in France, Germany, the Netherlands, Italy, and Poland; and it was on the basis of these brotherhoods, that, towards the close of the eighteenth century, a number of societies was organized, in which the Jesuits hoped to continue the existence of their order. Thus the ex-Jesuits, De Tournely, De Broglie, and others, formed in 1794, at Louvain, the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. By the advancing French armies the society was compelled to flee, first to Augsburg, then to Passau, and finally to Vienna. In 1798 they had a college at Hagenbrunn, a novitiate-house at Prague, etc.; but in the following year they united with the Baccamarists, according to the wish of the Pope.

Of much more importance is the female society of the same name, The Ladies of the Sacred Heart (Dames du Sacré Cœur). It was organized at Paris in 1800, and in 1866 it numbered about ten thousand members. Its organization and rules are those of the order of the Jesuits, only with such modifications as the difference of the sex of the members makes necessary. Its object is female education. The association has been expelled from all countries from which the Jesuits have been excluded. G. E. STEITZ.

JETER, Jeremiah B., D.D., b. in Bedford County, Va., July 18, 1802; d. in Richmond, Feb. 25, 1880. He entered the Baptist ministry in 1822, and occupied a very prominent position. He was, perhaps, more widely known in the United States than any other Baptist minister; but the greater part of his ministry was spent in Richmond.

JEW, The Wandering. The legend of the Wandering Jew appeared for the first time in German literature in a small pamphlet, Kurze Beschreibung und Erzählung von einem Juden mit Namen Ahasuerus, 1602. Before that time no trace can be found of it in Germany; and it is quite evident, that, for instance, neither Luther nor Hans Sachs knew any thing about it. The pamphlet pretends to be a report of an interview between Paulus von Eitzen, bishop of Sleswick, and the Wandering Jew, which took place in Hamburg, 1542. According to Von Eitzen's report, Ahasuerus is the name of the Wandering Jew; and he was a shoemaker in Jerusalem at the time of Christ. When Jesus, on his way to Golgotha, passed by his house, he stopped for a moment, and leaned against the door-post; and when Ahasuerus pushed him aside, and bade him to move on, Jesus said to him, "I will stand here and rest, but thou shalt go on until the last day." From that moment Ahasuerus found rest nowhere. Wandering about from place to place, he has been seen in Spain, Germany, and other places, as later editions of the Kurze Beschreibung report.

In the English and French literatures the legend appeared about four centuries earlier, though in a somewhat different shape. Matthew Paris, an English monk who lived in the monastery of St. Alban in Paris, and died 1259, tells a story about a certain Cartaphilus, which he claims to have heard from an Armenian bishop who visited London. According to this story, Cartaphilus was a door-keeper in the palace of Pilate; and, when Jesus was led out to be crucified, he struck him, and said to him, "Go, Jesus: go on faster." To which Jesus replied, "I go, but thou shalt wait till I return." Afterwards Cartaphilus was baptized by Ananias, assumed the name of Joseph, and settled in Armenia, where he was still living when Matthew Paris wrote his Historia Major. The same story is repeated in the Chronique Rimée, by Philippe Mouskes, who was bishop of Tournay, and died in 1283.

Against the identity of these two representations, it has been argued that Cartaphilus was not a Jew, but a Christian, and probably, before baptism, a Pagan; that he was not perpetually wandering, but comfortably fixed in Armenia, etc. [But transitions as comprehensive and vital as this, from the door-keeper of the thirteenth, to the shoemaker of the sixteenth century, are often met with in legends and popular tales, in their wanderings through several centuries and from one people to another; and the explanations which Karl Blind has given of several features of the transition (Gentleman's Magazine, July, 1880) are at least suggestive. He derives the name Ahasuerus from the Teutonic As-Uidar, the only god who should survive the destruction of the world, and who should avenge the fall of the Asers by thrusting his foot, well beshod, down into the throat of the wolf Fenris.]

JEWEL, John, Bishop of Salisbury; the foremost apologetical writer of the English Church, and its literary representative in the first years of Elizabeth's reign; was b. in Buden, Devonshire, May 22 [24], 1522; d. at Monkton Farleigh, in his diocese, Sept. 23, 1571. He entered Merton College, Oxford, at the age of thirteen, and was placed under the tuition of Parkhurst, afterwards bishop of Norwich, from whom he received the principles of the Reformation [and who directed him to compare Tyndale's translation with that of Coverdale]. He was an excellent Greek scholar, and in 1540 graduated from Corpus Christi College. [He was in the habit, as a student, of rising at four in the morning, but suffered, during his university career, from a rheumatic affection, which left him lame for life.] He acted as Reader in Humanity and Rhetoric [and after 1551 cared for the cure of Sunningwell, near Oxford]. In 1549 he heard Peter Martyr, and became an advocate of the Reformation. When Mary ascended the throne in 1553, he was expelled from his college as a diligent hearer of Peter Martyr, as having taken orders according to the liturgy of Edward, and preaching heretical doctrines. In spite of this, however, he was chosen university orator, and in this capacity had to pen a letter congratulating Mary on her accession. In a moment of weakness he gave his consent to Romish articles, but, repenting, fled to the Continent in 1555. Arriving at Frankfurt, he made a public recantation on the first Sunday after his arrival ["so far was this saint of God from accounting sophistry any part of the science of salvation, or justifying any equivocating shifts which are daily hatched in the school of antichrist." — Featley, Life of Jewel, 1609]. Most of his time on the Continent, Jewel spent at Strassburg and Zürich, in the most intimate intercourse with his old teacher and friend, Peter Martyr.

On the death of Mary, in 1558, Jewel returned to England [in January, 1559, was appointed preacher at St. Paul's Cross]; and in March we find him at Westminster, with seven other representatives of the new views, engaged in debate with eight representatives of the old views. He was afterwards appointed to visit the churches in the western part of England, and on Jan. 21, 1560, was consecrated Bishop of Salisbury. He was at first reluctant to assume the canonical vestments, which he called "theatrical" and "ludicra ineptia," but overcame his scruples at the advice of Bullinger and Peter Martyr.

Soon after returning from the Continent, he issued a challenge from the pulpit of St. Paul's Cross, in which he denied that any of the papal errors could be found in the writings of the Fathers. This precipitated controversies with Dr. Cole and Mr. Harding, to which we owe his distinguished apologetical work, Apologia Ecclesie anglicana, which appeared in 1562 ["to the abundant establishment of this Reformed Church upon antiquity." — Strype]. This work, which was one of the most learned and important contributions of the sixteenth century to theology, was soon diffused throughout Europe, and translated into Italian, Spanish, French, German, Dutch, Greek, and Welsh. The English translation (1564) was made by Lady Anna Bacon, the wife of Sir Nicholas. It was considered of such importance, that the Council of Trent appointed two bishops to answer it. The most able of Jewel's opponents in controversy was Thomas Harding, who had been professor of Hebrew at Oxford, under Henry VIII. Jewel replied to his attacks in several writings, the principal of which appeared in 1567, under the title Defence of the Apology [which appeared in an enlarged form in 1570]. Harding found in it a number of errors, falsehoods, evasions, etc., and replied in the Detection of sundry foul errors. Jewel died, on a tour of visitation, in the fiftieth year of his age; [and Thomas Fuller, speaking of the event, quaintly says, "It is hard to say whether his soul or his ejaculations arrived first in heaven, seeing he prayed dying, and died praying"].

Jewel's Apology is the most perfect expression of the peculiar position of the English Church. It is divided into six parts, and refutes the charges of heresy, godlessness, libertinism, apostasy from the Church, etc. In the doctrinal treatment he shows the influence of Calvin and Peter Martyr; and in the articles on the Person of Christ, the Power of the Keys, and the Sacraments, he is in perfect agreement with them. On the other hand, the doctrine of predestination is wanting; and in regard to justification, he says that our salvation depends entirely upon Christ, and not upon works. He makes no distinction between the visible and invisible Church. He teaches that there are three orders, but defines their functions in a Calvinistic sense, and grants to laymen the exercise of ministerial duties in cases of necessity. The statement is repeated again and again, that the English Reformation was only a return to the old true Catholic Church of the first centuries; and the charge of innovation he repels by affirming it of the Roman-Catholic Church, which had forsaken Christ and the Apostles and Fathers. The Scriptures are the ultimate rule of faith; and the Fathers are not our spiritual "lords, but our leaders" (non sunt domini, sed duces nostri).

Among Jewel's other works, were A View of the seditious Bull sent into England by Pius V. in 1569 [excommunicating the queen, 1582], Sermons, an Exposition upon the Two Epistles to the Thessalonians [1583], and many Letters to Peter Martyr. [Jewel had, perhaps, no superior in the realm of patristic scholarship among the English clergy of the Elizabethan period. His works are a thesaurus of quotation, "his margin being painted with many authorities." Richard Hooker, who had experienced kindness from him, says that he was "the worthiest divine that Christendom had bred for some hundreds of years."]]

JEWISH CHRISTIANS, JUDAIZERS. The primitive form of Christianity was Jewish Christianity. The Christians at first appeared to be simply a part of Israel. Like Israel, they had their centre in Jerusalem; and the church there, at the head of which was the College of the Apostles, was not only the chief, but in a sense the only one, of which the other gatherings of Christians were branches. The introduction of the diaconate, to which followed the presbyterate, caused the first loosening from Judaism. Yet the Law held the Christian and his Jewish brother alike; while the confession that the crucified and risen Jesus was the Son of God was the dividing mark. Both, however, took part in the temple-worship; and even the separate services of the Christians, as they did not involve any change of life, seemed to be merely additional. But when a Gentile Christian Church sprang up, and the hatred of the unconverted Israelites increased, the question of the real relation of Judaism to Christianity claimed discussion. This caused a split among the Jewish Christians. Some of them maintained that the whole Law was binding upon the converted heathens; others, and they were the majority in the Council of Jerusalem (see APOSTOLIC COUNCIL), that it was binding only upon the Jewish Christians. The minority organized a counter-mission to that of Paul, opposed him vigorously, decried him, and strove to bring the Gentile Christians to their views. These were the Judaizers, who gave Paul so much trouble. They claimed the countenance of James, and with some show of reason.

Doubtless there were churches of the liberal Jewish believers in Palestine and the adjacent parts. At their head were, first, the "pillar apostles,"—James, Peter, and John; later, James the Lord's brother, who wielded almost episcopal authority. This mild Jewish-Christian standpoint is represented in the Epistles of James, Jude, and 1 Peter, and the Revelation, to which also may be reckoned the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. Characteristic of them is the absence of dogmatics, and the stress laid upon practice. Facts are held, but principles are not evolved. Another characteristic is their immediate grasp upon the person of Christ, without entering at all upon the reason for his appearance, or upon the grounds of his being and work. Christology is in the background: on the other hand, eschatology is in the front. They emphasize the kingship of Christ in fulfilment of Old-Testament prophecy, and look for his second coming in glory. In these books, however, we may see progress. James most exactly represents the Jewish-Christian standpoint; Jude forms the transition to Peter; Peter to Paul; and the Revelation is the connecting link between the Jewish-Christian and the Johannean types of doctrine.

The whole position of Jewish Christianity at this time was provisional. The council had not settled its relation to Christianity in general. It was plain that it must either enter the stream, and lose its individuality, or else narrow into a mere sect; for, even in Paul's lifetime, the supposition that the Gentile Christians would gradually accept the Mosaic law became untenable. Two causes hastened the decisive change,—the increasing speed of conversions among the Gentiles, and the increasing hardness of the Israelites against the gospel. But exactly when the Jewish Christians were forbidden the temple is not determinable: they would scarcely be tolerated in it down to the destruction of the city. It must have been a trying time for the converts, and many, doubtless, chose to give up the Messiah rather than their people and the old religion. The Epistle to the Hebrews, written at this period, gives us a hint of this perplexity. The final separation between Jewish Christianity and Israel may be set down as taking place when Hadrian ordered all Jews to leave Jerusalem; for, after the destruction of the city by Titus (A. D. 70), many had returned, and a Jewish-Christian episcopacy had been established. For the after-history of these believers see ERONITES. See also JERUSALEM and the cognate articles. JEWS, Missions amongst the. Although the kingdom of God was designed, according to the predictions of the prophets, to be co-extensive with the whole earth, nevertheless, Jesus confined his activity to Israel, and enjoined on his disciples not to go in the way of the Gentiles (Matt. x. 5). It was not till he was about to depart from the earth that he commanded them to go into all the world (Matt. xxviii. 19). The Twelve, however, directed their efforts, in the first instance, to the Jews; and the earliest Christian congregations were composed entirely of Jews, and proselytes to Judaism. Apostolic missions among the Jews were so successful, that Paul could speak [about 58 A. D.] of myriads of converted Jews (Acts xxi. 20); and we are safe in computing their number at twenty-five thousand at least. A large number of priests were also obedient to the faith (Acts vi. 7); and in the congregations which Paul founded in Asia Minor and Greece the nucleus was Israelites. Wherever he went, whether to Cyprus, Macedonia, or Corinth, he proclaimed the gospel first in the synagogues.

The conversion of the Jews was not lost sight of in the second or third century, as is proved by the dialogue of Justin Martyr with the Jew Trypho, and Tertullian's work Adversus Judæos. But Jewish Christianity had long since followed a heretical tendency by insisting upon Jewish peculiarities of religion and nationality, and by submitting to the rankest Gnosticism. Deprived of their political power and national autonomy, the Jews concentrated their whole spiritual life upon the study of the law, and produced the Talmud. As long as the temple stood, Judaism still preserved much of its Mosaic cast, although leavened by Pharisaism. But the transition from Mosaism to Talmudism opened a chasm between Jews and Christians, which made an impartial examination of Christianity on the part of the Jews impossible. From the very beginning, the spirit of the Talmud drew a veil over their eyes (2 Cor. iii. 13-16), and will continue to hold it there until it itself disappears. The whole history of Jewish missions confirms this. They are successful only among such Jews as break with the Talmud.

I. ROMAN-CATHOLIC MISSIONS AMONG THE JEWS. — The ancient Church did not institute special measures for the conversion of the Jews, although it was always inspired by a wish to win them for Christianity. The love of Christ, and other motives, led to this activity. Cassiodorus, when he became a monk, felt called upon to urge the Jews to repent in his Exposition to the Psalms (comp. Ps. lxxxii.). The Emperor Justinian, on the other hand, did not conceal the fact that the reason he had in ordering the synagogues to use the Greek or Latin translation of the Old Testament, and to abstain from the Talmudic exposition of the same, was to lead them to Christianity. His were political motives. Bishops did not hesitate to resort to acts of violence to compel the Jews to become Christians. Bishop Avitus of Clermont Ferrand having preached to the Jews without any results, the Christians destroyed the synagogues. Jewish blood was spilled, and five hundred Jews declared themselves ready for baptism. The day of baptism was a festival of joy, and Venantius Fortunatus commemorated the event in verse. Such conversions, unfortunately, occurred only too often. Justice, however, demands the remark that the popes have always been protectors of the Jews (Grätz: Gesch. d. Juden, v. 41). Gregory I. condemned forced baptisms, but endeavored to win the Jews to the Church by rewards and favors. "If we do not win the parents," he said, "we shall have their children," — a remark which experience proved to be ill founded, especially in Spain. There is hardly a century that works were not written to bring about their conversion, hardly one in which rewards were not offered to secure them for the Church, but also not a century in which numbers of proselytes, thoroughly convinced, did not pass over to Christianity, many of whom became ornaments in the Church.

It has been especially proselytes who in all ages, inspired by missionary zeal, have sought to influence their brethren. Thus the proselyte and bishop Julian of Toledo (d. 690) wrote a work (De secta atatis comprobatione contra Judæos) in order to refute the Jewish notion, then asserting itself, that Jesus could not be the Messiah, as he was not to appear until the year 6000 of the world's history. About the same time Isidore of Seville wrote two books proving Christianity from the Old Testament. The activity of the great Dominican Raymund of Pennaforte must also be mentioned, who introduced into his order the study of Hebrew and the Talmud in order to promote missionary activity amongst the Jews. A disciple of this order, Pablo Christiani of Montpellier, a Jew by descent, was the first real missionary preacher. He travelled in Southern France and elsewhere, preaching, and disputing with the Jews, and proving the Messiahship of Jesus from the Bible and the Talmud. In 1273 he held a debate, lasting four days, in the royal palace at Barcelona, with the most illustrious rabbi of Spain, Moses Nachmani. At the same time the Dominican Raymund Martin, a born Christian, thoroughly acquainted with the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, put forth his learned work, Pugio fidei contra Mauros et Judæos. Abner of Burgos, a learned Jewish physician, known as a Christian, by the name of Alphonso, and sacristan of a church at Valladolid, wrote several Hebrew and Spanish works for the conversion of the Jews. Cardinal Pedro de Luna, known later as Benedict XIII., himself had a debate in Pampeluna with Rabbi Schem Tob ben Schaprut, and took a life-long interest in the conversion of the Jews. He was the first patron of Rabbi Solomon Halevi (1353-1435), later known as Paul of St. Maria, archbishop of Burgos, and interchanged letters with Joshua of Lorea, until he finally became a Christian. Amongst the thousands who at that time, from fear and force, entered the Church, there were a large number of earnest disciples of Jesus. Even Grätz must confess that "Judaism was deprived of much talent in the transition of learned and cultured men — physicians, authors, poets — to Christianity, many of whom, however, were possessed of proselyting zeal, as though they were born Dominicans" (viii. 83). Astruc Raimuch and John Baptista, both physicians and proselytes, demonstrated their missionary zeal by words and pen. Leading to the most results was the great disputation at Tortosa (February, 1413, to Nov. 12, 1414), which held sixty-eight sittings, and was carried on by eight of the most learned rabbis of Spain, with two proselytes, under the chairmanship of Benedict XIII. Contemporaneously the Dominican Vincentius Ferrer developed his extensive missionary activity amongst the Jews, preaching repentance in Italy, France, and Germany; so that at least twenty thousand five hundred Jews in Castile and Aragon (the exaggerated Jewish accounts even speak of two hundred thousand) were baptized.

The case was quite different in France. With the exception of Nicholas of Lyra (1300-40), born a Christian, but by descent a Jew, there is hardly a name of any importance. In Italy, on the other hand, both popes and monks interested themselves in the conversion of the Jews. Laurentin of Brundisium (d. 1619), general of the Capuchins, preached with great power, and travelled through Italy, with Hebrew Bible in hand, converting rabbis and laymen. In Rome many Jews, at all periods, accepted Christianity. In 1550 Paul III. founded an institution for their conversion. Gregory XIII. enlarged it, and Pius V. is said to have led one hundred learned and rich Jews to baptism. The Council of Constance concerned itself with the general subject; and the proselyte Theobald, professor of theology, delivered in 1116 a discourse before it. The Council of Basel (1431) and Milan (1565) all took up the subject. Very numerous have been the proselytes, learned noble and rich, who since the sixteenth century, in Italy, have accepted the faith, and held high offices in the Church.

The history of missions among the Jews in England is singular. It happened, that, under William Rufus, the Jews complained because so many of the brethren became Christians. The king wanted to force them to return to Judaism, but the fidelity of the proselytes withstood him. About 1200 Richard, prior of Bermondsey, built a hospital of converts. The Dominicans in Oxford opened a similar institution. [The great Bishop of Lincoln, Robert Grosseteste (d. 1253), wrote a work (De Cessatione Legnium) to promote the conversion of the Jews.] Henry III. set apart in London a house for the reception and care of proselytes. Under Edward I. five hundred proselytes, according to a list still existing, received baptism in it. Notwithstanding this, sixteen thousand five hundred Jews were banished from the land by this element prince in 1290.

More recently Roman-Catholic missions among the Jews have been represented by the two brothers Ratisbonne and the two brothers Lehmann. The last two, priests in the diocese of Lyons, were commissioned by Pius IX., and have since labored in France among the Jews. The proselyte Abbé Bauer also employed his brilliant oratorical gifts for the Jews in Paris and Vienna. The most extensive work, however, is carried on in Palestine by the proselyte Maria Alphonso Ratisbonne, a man of a rich French family, who in 1842 accepted Christianity. With his brother he established the order of Nuns of our Lady of Sion for the education of Jewish girls. In 1862 this order completed the imposing convent Ecce Homo in Jerusalem. It also has institutions in several places, in France, England, Chalcedon, on Mount Lebanon, etc.

II. PROTESTANT MISSIONS AMONG THE JEWS.

— In the work Dass Jesus ein geborner Jude war ("Jesus was a born Jew") Luther expressed the assurance, "that if the Jews were kindly treated, and decently instructed from the Scriptures, they no doubt would become Christians, and return to the faith of their prophets and patriarchs, from which they are only driven away by those who condemn their peculiarities, and treat them with haughty contempt. As they conducted themselves fraternally with us Pagans, we should treat them so in return." Unfortunately, Luther expressed himself differently in his tracts, Von d. Juden u. ihren Lügen ("the Jews and their Lies") and Vom Schem Hamphoras. "To convert Jews it is as impossible as to convert the devil. A Jewish heart is stubborn, and hard as stone and iron; so that it cannot be moved at all. Summa: they are young devils condemned to hell, so demonized, and pervaded with poison and Satan, that for fourteen hundred years they have been our plague, pestilence, and every thing that is evil." But even worse are his unmerciful counsels for their extermination. Notwithstanding these sentiments, however, there were numerous proselytes to the Lutheran and Reformed churches, among whom Immanuel Tremellius of Ferrara was the most prominent, who aided Ursinus in the preparation of the Heidelberg Catechism. In the seventeenth century it was Esdras Edzard in Hamburg, a student of Buxtorf, who especially interested himself in the conversion of the Jews, and established a fund for this purpose. Similar funds seem to have existed in other cities; as, for example, in Geneva, where a part of the ecclesiastical revenue is still called Fond des Proselytes.

It remained for the Pietists and Moravians to show a special interest in missions among the Jews. Spener, who received many Jews into the Church, declared it the duty of the State to provide for their conversion. Zinzendorf wrote an open letter, calling upon the Jews to become like children, and accept Christianity. In Halle, Professor Callenberg, encouraged thereto by Francke, established in 1728 an Institutum judaicum, which continued in operation till 1792, and sent out twenty missionaries, by whose labors many Jews were converted.

The French Revolution brought about a change in the condition of the Jews; and a new spiritual life was aroused amongst them by the influence of Lessing and Mendelssohn. The Jews were led to renounce the Talmud, the immediate results of which, in Germany, were, that large numbers turned to Christianity. "In thirty years the half of the Berlin community passed over to the Church" (Grätz, xi. 171). Between the years 1816 and 1843, 3,984 Jews, and these the richest and most cultured, were baptized in eight Prussian provinces. About the same time a new zeal for the conversion of the Jews manifested itself in Christian lands, — a consequence, in part, of the expectation of the near end of the world. It was Lewis Way, a rich clergyman of England, who was the first to give his time and means for the promotion of this object. With Professor Simson of Cambridge, Leigh Richmond, the proselyte Fry, and others, he founded, in 1808, the London Society for the Promotion of Christianity among the Jews. In 1815 it came exclusively under the patronage of the Church of England. Way travelled through Holland, Germany, and Russia, to improve the social, political, and religious condition of the Jews; and he was successful in influencing the czar, Alexander I., to promise, in 1817, his special protection, as well as lands, to baptized Jews. In 1814 the Duke of Kent laid the cornerstone of a church for the Jews, with which was afterwards associated a school for the children of proselytes, a college for the training of missionaries, etc., which gave the block the name of Palestine Block. In London and other places there were many baptisms: so that some proselytes were in 1832 seriously thinking of a Hebrew Christian Church, which, fortunately, was not founded. In 1880 this society had twenty-eight stations in Europe, three in Asia, six in Africa, with a hundred and thirty-six missionary teachers, etc., of whom eighty-four were proselytes. Its income was thirty-five thousand pounds. Since the opening of the chapel in the Palestine Block, 698 adults and 729 children have been baptized. At all English stations, in seventy-two years, 3,959 Jews have been baptized, and 78 in 1879. Its principal organ is Dibre Emeth, or "Words of Truth," edited by Hartmann, and more recently by Le Roi.

Among the other missionary societies for the conversion of the Jews are the following:—

(1) The Mission of the Church of Scotland, established in 1840, with twenty-six laborers, amongst whom are seven proselytes, laboring at six stations in Turkey and Egypt. (2) The British Society, established in 1842, and made up principally of dissenters. All its laborers are proselytes, twenty-seven in number, working at nineteen stations in England, Hungary, Russia, Turkey, etc. Its organ is the Jewish Herald. In 1879 fifteen Jews were baptized. (3) The Mission of the Free Church of Scotland, established in 1843, laboring at five stations, and employing twenty-seven workers. (4) The Presbyterian Church of Ireland (twelve workers), the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland (in Spain and in Algiers), and the Presbyterians in England (two stations in London), carry on missions. (5) The London City Missionary Society employs three missionaries for the Jews. (6) The German societies are four. The Berlin Society, established in 1822, and greatly encouraged by Professor Tholuck, now employs four missionaries, and in 1879 six Jews were baptized. The Westphalian Society, established in 1844, employs four laborers. The Lutheran Society, established at Leipzig, 1849, has one missionary. Professor Delitzsch is the soul of this society, and has done much for its work by his masterly translation of the New Testament into Hebrew. The Würtemberg Society was established in 1874. (7) There are also societies in Basel (1831), Norway (1846), Amsterdam (1861), Stockholm (1874), etc. [(8) In the United States there is only one society for the prosecution of missions among the Jews. It is connected with the Episcopal Church, with Rev. C. Ellis Stevens (32 Bible House) as its secretary, was organized in 1878, and has an income of seven thousand dollars. There are, however, some independent workers among the Jews, as Rev. Jacob Freshman, himself a convert, who holds weekly services in New York (1882)]. These societies, which number in all more than twenty, employ about 270 workers, of whom about one-half are of Jewish extraction. The average yearly number of baptisms is 626, of which 165 occur in the Protestant Church, and 461 in the Greek. A hundred thousand is a fair estimate of the number of Jews who have accepted Christianity since the beginning of the century.

JEZEBEL (זִיזָן, "chaste"), a daughter of Ethbaal, king of the Zidonians (1 Kings xvi. 31), was the wife of Ahab, king of Israel, and one of the most unscrupulous, and at the same time energetic, queens of history. She was the first Canaanitish woman to share the throne of Israel. She seems to have swayed the mind of her husband; and where he was weak and vacillating, like Lady Macbeth, she supplied courage and resolution. She established the Phœnician worship in the kingdom, and supported eight hundred and fifty of the priests of Baal and of the groves at the royal table. With unflagging energy she persecuted the prophets of Israel (1 Kings xviii. 4), and vowed vengeance upon Elijah (1 Kings xix. 2). When her husband despaired of getting Naboth's vineyard, she was not at a loss for measures, and plotted and perpetrated Naboth's ghastly murder (1 Kings xxi. 5). She survived Ahab fourteen years, but continued to have great influence at court, under her son, and saw her daughter Athaliah married to the king of Judah (2 Kings viii. 26). But the day of retribution predicted by Elijah came at last. When Jehu drove into Jezreel, with the design of extirpating the house of Ahab, Jezebel stood, attired in the fashion of the day, at the window of the palace. At a word from Jehu, she was thrown out by several chamberlains, and was dashed to death on the stones beneath. Her body was subjected to being crushed by Jehu's chariot-wheels, and devoured by the dogs (2 Kings ix. 30-35).

JEZREEL, The City of, stood in the plain of the same name, between Gilboa and Little Hermon. It was of very little importance until Ahab chose it for his residence. His palace was on the eastern side of the city, forming part of the wall, the gateway of the city being also that of the palace (2 Kings ix. 30); and near by was a temple, and grove of Astarte, with four hundred priests, the whole establishment supported by Jezebel (1 Kings xviii. 19). After the fall of the house of Ahab, the city again sank into insignificance. Now it is represented by a small village, Zerin.

JIMENES, Cardinal. See XIMENES.

JO'AB (יֹאָב), "whose father is Jehovah"), one of the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister (2 Sam. ii. 18), and one of David's most valiant captains; contributed very materially to establish the Davidic dynasty. He was a bold and intrepid soldier, but never rose above the level of the wild chieftains of his day, as David did. He won a brilliant victory at Gibeon, over Abner, Ishbosheth's lieutenant (2 Sam. ii. 18-24). At a later period, when Abner was arranging for a revolt to David, Joab, in order to avenge his brother Asahel, and perhaps from motives of jealousy, murdered him in cold blood (2 Sam. iii. 27). David was incensed at the deed, but did not feel strong enough to punish his captain. In a campaign against Edom he put the inhabitants to death without mercy (1 Kings xi. 15-17). He fought against the Syrians (2 Sam. x. 6-14), and in the following year besieged Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites (2 Sam. xi. 1). About this time Joab became an accessory to the murder of Uriah, whom David's improper relations to his wife induced him to put out of the way. Obedient to his king, he stationed Uriah in the most exposed part of the army, where he was shot down by the enemy (2 Sam. xi.). When Absalom was caught in the oak, Joab murdered him in spite of the king's order that he should be spared (2 Sam. xviii. 14). The last deed of blood which is recorded of Joab was his treacherous murder of Amasa, Absalom's captain (2 Sam. xx. 10). He remained faithful to David till the last years of his reign, when he espoused the cause of Adonijah. Solomon, however, ascended the throne. He at first spared Joab, but subsequently was led to change his mind, and, when he fled to the altar of the sanctuary, had him murdered (1 Kings ii. 28-34).

JOACHIM OF FLORIS. Very little is known with certainty of the life of this remarkable man. The biography which Jacobus Græcus Syllanæus, a monk of the monastery of Flore, published in 1612, is very little reliable, in spite of the author's appeal to elder documents; and the notes of his friend and secretary Jacobus have not come down to us in their original form. He is said to have been born at Cælicum, a village near Cosenza, in 1145, and to have been brought to the court of Roger II. of Sicily when he was fourteen years old (Roger II., however, died in 1154). After a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he became monk, and afterwards abbot, of the Cistercian monastery of Corace in Calabria. (See Janauscheck: Origin. Cisterc., Vienna, 1877, i. p. 168.) But he afterwards left that place, and retired, with his friend Rainerius, to the mountain solitudes of Sylæ, near Cosenza. There he built a new monastery (St Joannis en Flori), of which he became abbot, and into which he introduced a set of rules more severe than those of the Cistercians. The monastery was confirmed as an independent institution by Cælestine III., and became the mother of several other similar establishments. Three popes — Lucius III., Urban III., and Clement III. — took an interest in his prophetic-apocalyptic studies; and in a document drawn up in 1200, and containing the names of his works, — Concordia utriusque testamenti; Expositiones in Apocal., Psalterium; Contra Judæos; Contra Cathol. Fid. Adversarios, of which the two last have perished, — he admonished his brother-abbots to lay his works before the Pope, and obtain his sanction. He died between September, 1201, and June, 1202.

The first point in which Joachim drew down upon himself the censure of the Church, though not until after his death, was his polemics against the scholastic exposition of the doctrine of the Holy Trinity by Petrus Lombardus. The Lombard's definition of the divine essence seemed to him to lead to a quaternity; but, in his attempt to escape from this error, he himself fell into a kind of tritheism, which was severely censured by the Fourth Council of the Lateran, 1215 (Mansi: Concil., xxii. 981). Of still graver import were those speculations which developed from his eschatological views, and which finally assumed a decidedly anti-Roman and anti-churchly tendency. Joachim taught that there had been a reign of the Father from the creation to the birth of Christ, and a reign of the Son, which should come to an end in 1260, and be followed by a reign of the Holy Spirit. These views were adopted by certain groups of the Franciscan order, and gave rise to the idea of an everlasting gospel, which should supersede both the Old and the New Testament. The Introductorius in Evangelium æternum, written by Ghehardinus de Burgo Sancti Domini, and published in Paris, 1254, made an immense sensation, and caused a still further development of the apocalyptic ideas of Joachim. See GERVAISE: Histoire de l'Abbé Joachim, Paris, 1745, 2 vols; RENAN: Joachim de Flore et l'Évangile éternel, in the Revue des Deux Mondes, 1866; and PRÉGER: Evangelium æternum

JOAN, Pope, a fable in which hardly anybody now believes, and whose whole interest consists in its origin. It is first mentioned by Stephen of Bourbon, a French Dominican, who died in 1261; but it did not spread among people until it became inserted (for in the oldest manuscripts it is not found) in the Chronicle of Martinus Polonus, a much used text-book. According to this interpolation, she reigned for more than two years, and died in 855, from bearing a child while walking in a procession through the streets. See DÖLLINGER: Die Pabstfabeln des Mittelalters, Munich, 1863; English translation, Fables respecting the Popes in the Middle Ages, New York, 1872, pp. 3-74. G. VOIGT.

JOAN OF ARC, "the Maid of Orleans" [whose name was properly Joanneta Darc, or d'Arc; but probably "d'" did not at that time imply nobility]; b. at Domremy, which was then partly in Champagne, and partly in Lorraine [now part of Germany, and called, in honor of its illustrious daughter, Domremy-la-Pucelle], Jan. 6, 1411; burned at the stake, in Rouen, May 30, 1431. Her life may be divided into three periods: (1) her development, and call to her departure for Vaucouleurs in her eighteenth year; (2) her career of victory and glory to the coronation of the king at Rheims, July 17, 1429; (3) her career of fighting and defeat, until her death. In all these periods she is one of the greatest heroines in history; in the second a recognized seer, unmistakably called of God; in the third an enthusiast, but genuinely pious and noble, whose exit constitutes a tragedy most thrilling and elevated.

In order to understand her work, a word must be spoken upon the then state of the country now called France. By the help of Philip of Burgundy, the English had overrun all the country north of the Loire, as well as Guienne. France had fallen to pieces. The queen-mother Isabella had the Duke of Burgundy upon her side, and the two had taken Paris. She had disinherited the dauphin (Charles VII.) in favor of Henry V of England; and when he was succeeded by his son (1422), his brother, the Duke of Bedford, came over to France as English regent, was received by the Parisians, and besieged Orléans (1428). Meanwhile Charles VII., who had been crowned at Poitiers, was idly looking at the destruction of his kingdom; but, unknown to him, God was preparing a deliverer.

1. In the little village on the Maas, amid beautiful scenery and under favorable parental auspices, a girl was growing up. She learned from her mother the traditional creed, and forms of prayer. She drank in the tales of fairies and saints and devils which the simple folk so often told. One saying, attributed to Merlin, made quite an impression upon her. — France should one day be destroyed by a woman, and be saved by a virgin from the borders of Lorraine. The people about her had decided that the destroyer was the queen-mother Isabella, and at last she believed herself to be the restorer. She grew up to womanhood skilful in woman's work, especially in needlework, shy, shunning, indeed, all amorous looks and words, ignorant of reading and writing, but wise in divine things, loving the Church and its services, tender toward the poor and toward children.—a maiden pious, brave, obedient. It should be remarked that her village was for the dauphin, while the neighboring village was for Burgundy. One day, in her thirteenth year, she was fasting in her father's garden (it was about noon), when suddenly she heard a voice which she learned was that of St. Michael. She then saw him and the angels who attended him. At a subsequent time she heard the voices of the archangel Gabriel and the saints Catherine and Margaret. These all urged upon her one duty,—to help the king to save France. She shrank in terror from their command. For five years she was visited almost daily, and often more than once a day. At last the news came of the siege of Orléans. She could no longer refuse obedience. Impelled by an overmastering sense of duty, she broke through the lines of paternal authority, left Domremy, and repaired to Vaucouleurs. Thus ended the first period of her existence.

2. Then followed the epic of her life. By persistency she secured from Robert de Baudicourt, the governor of Vaucouleurs, an introduction to the dauphin, at Chinon. The journey thither was perilous; and, for safety's sake, Joan wore male attire. But the hardest part of her work remained for her to do. She grandly succeeded, however, overcame the doubts of the king, removed all prejudices, filled the troops with her courage, and started the king and his army towards Orléans. She rode by the king, clad in armor, carrying an ancient sword, which she had found by revelation hidden near the altar in the Church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and a banner of her own design, under the guidance of St. Catherine, on one side of which was a representation of God seated upon his throne, and holding the world in his hand; on the other side a picture of the annunciation. Arrived at Orléans, she was able to enter it April 29, 1429; and the siege was raised May 8. Other victories followed. The English were driven beyond the Loire. Then the king was induced by her to go to Rheims, and there be crowned. On the way thither, Troyes was captured. Rheims was entered July 16, and the coronation took place the next day. The maid's work was now accomplished. The heavenly voices ceased to speak to her, and well had it been if she had gone quietly back to her father's flocks. But it could not be. She was now the idol of the army, the savior of her country; and king and council would not hear of her going.

3. Thus, amid shouts of victory, the final period of her life was ushered in. But she was altered. Her head was turned. She had become an enthusiast. The court and the army had also changed respecting her. They obeyed no longer her guiding voice. They deified her. She was not now a leader, but a god,—sure sign that her mission was over. She went with enthusiasm on martial expeditions; but she was no longer personally invulnerable, nor a synonyme of victory. On the contrary, she fell, wounded in the thigh, while unsuccessfully attacking Paris, Sept. 8; later she was wounded again before Orléans, and the army sustained another defeat. On Dec. 29, 1429, she and her family were ennobled with the surname of Du Lis. About this time she wrote a threatening letter to the Hussites to repent of their heresy, or else she would draw sword against them. She also announced her ambitious dreams of releasing the Duke of Orléans, freeing the Holy Land from its usurpers, ending the papal schism, and giving the Papacy to its rightful claimant. But, while such visions floated before her eyes, her "voices" told her that she would be taken prisoner. In her distracted frame of mind she mistrusted the voices. She went in March, 1430, to defend Compiègne against the English and the Duke of Burgundy. On May 21 she was captured on a sortie. Great was the triumph of the English, and Paris broke out in rejoicing. The sorceress had been caught. Joan was taken to the fortress of Jean de Luxembourg. Contrary to the warning of St. Catherine, she leaped from the tower. Stunned, severely wounded, she was picked up and carried back, and, on coming to, the saint upbraided her for her disobedience. Her further troubles came heavy and fast. A disreputable traffic was carried on between the Duke of Luxembourg and the English, at the instigation of the university of Paris, resulting in the sale of Joan, in November, to the latter for ten thousand livres; Normandy paid the money. On her recovery from her injuries, she was carried to Rouen, put in chains, guarded by rude soldiers, insulted in various ways, and finally accused of heresy and sorcery. Upon these charges she was tried by the Inquisition. It was a shameful travesty of justice. Verdict was given against her on the following counts: that she had worn men's clothing, contrary to the law in the Old Testament (Deut. xxii. 5); that she had allied herself with evil spirits under the enchanted trees of her native province; and that her revelations were machinations of the Devil, or sorcery (in proof whereof her departure from her home was cited). She was sentenced to be burnt as a witch. Terrified at the prospect of such a frightful death, she recanted, saying, that since the churchmen had found that she had not received visits from saints, as she had previously asserted, she would not make the assertion any more. It is said that she smiled when uttering the sentence of recantation, and signed the formula with a naught, but then, under guidance, with a cross. Both these phenomena were considered suspicious. In consequence of the recantation, her sentence was mitigated to imprisonment for life. The English were furious, but were consoled by the assurance that she would yet be burnt. A trap was cunningly laid for her destruction. A suit of men's clothes was hung in her cell. She put it on, thinking thus to be better protected from the soldiers' insults. But the action was interpreted as a relapse into her former sinful disobedience to divine command, and she was again tried and condemned. This time she could not escape. The sentence of death, after the first outcry, was patiently borne. She appealed from the bishop (Pierre Cauchon) to God; stood at the stake, the heretic's cap upon her head, pressing to her heart a rude wooden cross which a pitiful Englishman had made for her; spoke a word of sympathy for Rouen; cleared the king of all responsibility for her enterprise; called upon her saints and her Saviour; and perished amid the flames. Her ashes were thrown into the Seine.

The king whom she had crowned made no effort to free her, thinking, perhaps, he was well rid of her. But it was not long, before her death, under sentence of the Inquisition, was considered a veritable martyrdom. It was said that a white dove flew towards heaven from her scaffold in witness of her virgin innocence. When Rouen was taken in 1449, the king ordered a revision of her trial. Calixtus III., on demand of France, had the proceedings examined by the bishops and the inquisitor. Before this tribunal, Joan's mother pleaded for justice to the memory of her injured child; and the sentence was reversed by the Pope, July 7, 1456. Her name is now reverently spoken everywhere. [A fine statue of her was unveiled in the Place des Pyramids, Paris, Feb. 25, 1873.]

And what about her visions? They were real, were sent from God to incite and strengthen her for her great mission. In them and in the general tenor of her life we see the providence of God. Since God had chosen her to be the savior of France, he chose also the means of inducing her to play the part. The persons beheld are proof of this. Why did she not see the Virgin Mary, St. Dionysius, and St. Mary Magdalene, the guardian of France? And whom did she see? The archangel Michael, who was the victorious angel of the covenant, the guardian of the people of Israel, and, in the middle age, the guardian of Christian nationality; St. Margaret, the dragon conqueress, who was the guardian of Christian virginity; and St. Catherine, who was the guardian of the university of Paris, and had been successful in converting learned people and rulers generally. Now, nationality, purity, and power to convert royal persons, scholars, and soldiers, were exactly what was needed to restore France to honor. Joan resembled, somewhat, Swedenborg and other seers. But her saints punished her, and she did penance. They came back after her recantation, and then she no longer resisted them, but died in testimony of their reality.

[A curious phenomenon, which proved the reversal of feeling in favor of Joan, was the appearance, in 1436, of a false Joan, who told the story that some other woman had been burnt for her. Many believed the impostor. She married Robert des Armoises about 1439, and died about 1441, having previously confessed her imposture.]

[Joan of Arc is thus described: "She was of medium height, stoutly built, but finely proportioned; and her frame was capable of enduring great fatigue. The most authentic testimonies represent her as less comely than many in her own station. Her features expressed rustic honesty and innocence rather than mental power; but her eyes were large, melancholy, and, lit up with her enthusiasm, indescribably charming. Her voice was powerful, but sweet; and her manner possessed a fine natural dignity and grace, which, while it repelled familiarity, softened and subdued even the rudest of the soldiers."

JOB. The Book of Job is a product of the Chochma literature of the ancient Hebrews. All the features which distinguish the Proverbs, the Song of Solomon, and Ecclesiastes, from the prophetic books, are found in it. It is the product of an age of reflection and of art, and does not lay claim to being an historical work. It contains, however, an historical tradition which the author worked over. The proper names do not contain a trace of a symbolical purpose; and pure invention of stories was not a custom of antiquity. Luther said, "I hold the Book of Job to be a record of facts; but, that every thing happened just as it is recorded, I do not believe," etc. The author does not once refer, even indirectly, to the law, religion, or history of Israel; but he does not ignore his Hebrew stand-point. In the narrative portion, God is called Jehovah; but in the rest of the book he is, for the most part, called Eloah, or by the patriarchal designation Shaddai. It is noticeable, that only the most ancient form of heathen worship, the worship of the stars, is referred to (xxxi. 26-28), and that he intentionally avoids the divine name, Lord of Hosts, which was characteristic of the period of the kings. The book discusses a theme which has interest for the race without regard to nationality, and is the Melchizedek among the books of the Old Testament.

Job lived in the land of Uz (probably the Hauran); but the time is not indicated. The high age (a hundred and forty years) to which the patriarch attained (xlii. 16) points to a very early period; and this explains why only one kind of money (xlii. 11; comp. Gen. xxxiii. 19), and only the three most ancient musical instruments are mentioned (xxi. 12, xxx. 31; comp. Gen. iv. 21, xxxi. 27). A hero of pre-Mosaic times suited the author's purposes best, as ignorance of the God of Israel after the possession of the land by Joshua, would have been regarded as a sad deficiency. Job was a just man, who was plunged from great prosperity into the depths of suffering. He was himself unable to solve the mystery of this sudden change. The attempt was made by his friends, who only increased his trials. They sought to console him by insisting that suffering is invariably the punishment of transgression; but he continued to assert his innocence, which Jehovah himself finally confirmed (xlii. 8). The mistake of the comforters was, that they failed to distinguish between different kinds of suffering and its cause. Job's sufferings were not punitive, but a trial which he was called upon, as the servant of Jehovah, to endure. His friends cannot think of suffering without sin, and, instead of offering words of sympathy, heap up exhortations to repentance. But there is a kind of suffering which does not proceed from God's anger, but from his love, and has the design to test and perfect the piety of a righteous man. This is the lesson the Book of Job is meant to teach.

After Job's conversation with his three friends, and the renewed protestation of his innocency, Jehovah himself appears on the scene to solve the problem. But, before this occurs, a certain Elihu, the Buzite, appears, and interjects four discourses (xxxii.-xxxvii.). He was a young man, who had up to this time been restrained by considerations of modesty from entering into the conversation. He now censures Job for justifying himself at the expense of God, and the three friends for having had only words of condemnation for Job. Elihu does not get beyond the thoughts of these friends, and regards Job's sufferings as a divine course of discipline, which will issue in his destruction unless he repents. The thought is the same as that which Eliphaz had before expressed (v. 17). Instead of treating Job as a righteous man, he treats him as one who deserved his sufferings, and whom only blasphemous pride and ignorance deterred from repentance. He has no word of sympathy. He does not make any reference to Job's patience. His answer is no less frigid and formal than that of the three friends. Jerome and Gregory the Great had the same unfavorable impression of Elihu's speeches. The former saw in him a representative of a false and irreligious philosophy; the latter, a self-confident and vain babblers. Herder shared the same view when he said, "Elihu, a young prophet, assuming, audacious, wise in his own conceit, he heaps up figures without meaning, and appears as an empty shadow. For this reason no one replies to him." These discourses did not originate with the author of the rest of the work. Their diction, and method of thought, are against this supposition. Every reader of æsthetic sensibility must feel, when he comes to chap. xxxii., that he has entered a different atmosphere. There is a striking contrast between the assumed pathos of this portion of the book and the massive strength of the rest. The language affords no proof that it belongs to a later period of composition than the book as a whole; but there is a fundamental difference in the style, and the impression cannot be avoided that the poet is far behind the writer of the rest of the book in ability. We miss the bold and sublime figures and the ideal thoughts which well up in the rest of the book in inexhaustible fulness. With this single exception, the Book of Job is the work of one author, and bears the stamp of a single genius. This is now almost universally acknowledged, except in the case of xl. 15-xli. 26. It is urged that the passages about the crocodile and leviathan are inappropriate here; but the very opposite is true, for these two fierce monsters are introduced to prove to Job how weak he is compared to the other creatures over which God rules.

We turn now to the skilful construction and form of the composition. What I have to say under this head has been, for the most part, said before by Hupfeld (Deutsche Zeitschr. f. christl. Wissensch. u. christl. Leben, 1850). With him, I regard Job as a drama, and, in the narrower sense, a tragedy. In the prologue (i.-iii.) the problem is presented. In the three stages of the discourse (iv.-xiv., xv.-xxi., xxii.-xxvi.) it becomes more and more intricate and mysterious. In the fifth part (xxvii.-xxxi.) Job's monologues prepare the way for the solution. This follows in the sixth part (xxxviii.-xli. 6). And in the last part the servant of God, who has remained faithful, is crowned with the benediction of Jehovah. To be sure, it is not a perfect drama in every particular. It is true, also, that there is no interchange of action, nor contest with the fist or the sword; yet there is a contest of thought and words. The book is distinguished by its full and clear outlines of character. Satan, Job's wife, Job himself, the three friends, stand out distinctly. Each of the three friends has his individual characteristics. The poet shows his dramatic skill in gradually developing the contrast between Job and his friends, and in such a way as to make us feel incensed with the latter, in spite of some truths they utter, and in sympathy with Job. But the culminating feature in the dramatic art consists in this, that, while the book nowhere defines the central idea, it makes it vivid and lifelike. The Book of Job was not intended for the stage: for the Jews got the theatre for the first time at a much later period, from the Greeks and Romans; and dramatic representations were out of accord with the spirit of the Jewish religion. But a drama is possible without a stage. Brentius, in the dedication of his Commentary on Job, calls it a tragedy, and justifies the designation from the fact that persons are represented in it as talking, that their speeches are characterized by outbursts of passion, and accusations, of longing for death, and justification before God. The Job of the Hebrew poet is, in fact, no less a tragic hero than the Oedipus of Sophocles. Here Jehovah takes the place of immutable fate. The hero is overwhelmed with mysterious afflictions. He contends with God like a Titan; though, to be sure, all is only the ghostly creation of his mind. The true God finally declares his innocence. But in the mean time his friends prove merciless judges; and nature and grace, fancy and faith, defiance and humility, fill Job's heart. The book does not end with the destruction of the hero by fate, but the end of the hero forever destroys the notion of fate. In the development of this train of thought, the author uses the most elevated style possible. Figure follows figure: all that nature and man can present of the sublime and the massive here passes before us. The contents are draped in the garments of the night, yet flash forth with glory. "The diction of this book," says Luther, "is magnificent and sublime as no other book of Scripture." The greatest poets of all times, especially Shakespeare and Goethe, have drawn from it. Jacobi well said, that, whether the work be history or invention, the poet was a seer of God. [Thomas Carlyle, in his chapter on Mahomet in his Heroes and Hero-Worship, says, "I call the Book of Job one of the grandest things ever written with pen. One feels, indeed, as if it were not Hebrew, such a noble universality, different from noble patriotism or sectarianism, reigns in it. A noble book, all men's book! It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending Problem, — man's destiny, and God's ways with him here in this earth. . . . There is nothing written, I think, in the Bible or out of it, of equal literary merit." Mr. Froude calls it a "book which will one day, perhaps, when it is allowed to stand on its own merits, be seen towering up alone, far above all the poetry of the world."] The masterly composition cannot be placed before the reign of Solomon. Oehler, Riehm, Dillman, and others, put it after the reign of Solomon. But I cannot agree with them; for no work belonging to the Chochmah literature can compare with Job in classic style, except the Song of Songs, and this is Solomonic. The abundant references to natural history and scientific knowledge in general in Job are explained by the broad, extensive relations of Judæa to other parts of the world under Solomon,—to Phœnicia, Egypt, Ophir, Tarsus, etc. The relation of the book to the other books of the canon also points to this date. The utterances concerning the future are not only the same in tenor, but also often identical in form, with those of the psalms of David's and Solomon's reigns. (Compare Ps. xvii. 15, lxxxviii. 10 sq.) In the telling language of Friedrich von Schlegel, Job belongs to the Old-Testament books of longing after the future. The doctrine about wisdom in Proverbs (i. 1-9, viii.) declares for the priority of the treatment of the subject in Job (xxviii.). Both authors speak of the preciousness of wisdom and its co-operation in the creation, and sometimes in the same words; but the treatment of Proverbs shows a development upon that of Job, and wisdom appears personified. The agreement between Ps. lxxxviii. and lxxxix. and parts of Job (vii. 7, xiv. 14, xvi. 19, xxx. 10, xxxi. 34) is striking; and, while it does not prove an identity of authorship, it does indicate that Job was written by one of the wise men who assembled in Solomon's court. This view is held by Rosenmüller, Hävernick, Vaihinger, Schlottmann, Keil, and Hofmann; but the prevailing opinion at present is, that it belongs to a later period,—the period between Isaiah and Jeremiah, that is, between the Assyrian and Babylonian exile. This view is mainly based upon the author's acquaintance with the leading of nations into captivity (xii. 23). But as for ourselves, we feel confident that Job was a much read work in the eighth century, and that Amos, Isaiah, and Hezekiah were well acquainted with it.

[Those who hold that the Book of Job was written in a very early age, in the time of Moses, or even earlier, urge its un-Jewish tone and its general spirit, which indicate an early period of the race. The absence of all references, direct and indirect, to the Mosaic law, the temple, the priesthood, and the sacrifices, as well as to Jewish history, is very striking, and is justly emphasized. The difficulty of conceiving of a Jew in the reign of Solomon transferring himself to a pre-Mosaic condition of affairs, and ignoring entirely his own religion, cannot be easily set aside. This view was held largely among the Jews, by the Fathers (Origen, Jerome, etc.), and by many modern commentators, including Bertholdt, Eichhorn, Lowth, Taylor Lewis, Canon Cook, etc.]

JO'EL (יְהוֹאֵל, "Jehovah is God"), the second of the Minor Prophets. From the contents of his prophecy we are led to conclude that he belonged to the kingdom of Judah, and was in Jerusalem at the time of his prophetic activity. He prophesied in the first thirty years of the reign of Joash (877-847 B.C.). The usual reasons given for this view are the following: (1) Amos had Joel's prophecy before him (comp. Amos i. 2 with Joel iii. 16); (2) Joel had the hard fate of Jerusalem and Judah under Joram fresh before his mind, and makes no mention of the Syrians, which he certainly would have done, had he lived after Hazael's campaign against Jerusalem at the end of the reign of Joash (2 Kings xii. 18 sqq.); and (3) he refers to the temple services and priests (i. 9, 13, ii. 14, 17), which points to the worship of Jehovah, which was restored under Joash, and retained for thirty years of his reign. This is the view of Hitzig, Ewald, Keil, Delitzsch, and others. Hengstenberg, Knobel, and others place his activity under the reigns of Jeroboam II. and Uzziah (when Amos prophesied). Merx regards the prophecy as a Midrash written after 445 B.C.; [and Professor W. Robertson Smith, in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, puts it in the period after Ezra, and finds a confirmation of this view in Joel's reference to the walls of Jerusalem, chap. ii. 7, 9]. The pre-exile date rests, above all, on "the freshness and originality of Joel's description," "the classical form of the prophecy," the fact that it was in the hands of Amos, and the general character of its contents, which not only do not refer to the Syrians, but presuppose a healthful religious condition for Judah.

The occasion of Joel's prophecy was a terrible locust scourge, which combined with a drought to completely devastate the land. In the first part (i.-ii. 17) the prophet describes the devastation and the locusts, and exhorts the people to repent and fast. This call must have been heeded (ii. 18, 19). In the second part (ii. 19-iii. 21) he predicts prosperity and blessing. This prediction refers to the near future in the destruction of the enemy, etc., and to the far future in the outpouring of the Spirit of Jehovah and the judgment of the world. At the time of the latter, all nations will be gathered to the Valley of Jehoshaphat. The scourge of locusts is to be interpreted literally, and not allegorically, as Jerome, Hengstenberg, Hävernick, [Lowth, Pusey] do. The main argument for the allegorical interpretation is the name which is given to the army of locusts (ii. 20). It is designated as the "northern." The locusts usually start from the deserts of Asia and Africa, and pursue a northerly course; and it might seem at first more accurate and natural to explain it of nations. But locusts are also found in the Syrian desert, and might well be blown in a southerly direction without passing over Mount Lebanon. However this may be, the remainder of the description militates against the allegorical interpretation, and also the fact that not a trace of a reference can be found to a hostile invasion before or afterwards in the book. There is no ground for calling in question the Joelic authorship. Peter quotes Joel (ii. 28, 29) in his sermon at the temple (Acts ii. 17, 18), and applies the prophecy to the outpouring of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost. Its complete fulfilment we may expect at the revelation of Jesus in glory. The vision of the day of the Lord in Rev. xix. 11 sqq. draws upon the descriptions of Joel and Zechariah (xiv.). JOHN THE APOSTLE and his Writings. The peculiar and prominent place which John holds among the twelve disciples and the authors of the New Testament, and the critical assaults upon the writings that bear his name, make desirable a comprehensive presentation of his character, activity, and literary remains.

I. LIFE AND CHARACTER OF JOHN. — Among the apostles, by far the most prominent are John, Peter, and Paul. Compared with Peter, impulsive and quick of action, John was of a quiet, thoughtful, and receptive temperament. He treasured up the words of the Lord in his heart, and lost himself in the contemplation of his glory. When Jesus speaks and acts, he does not ask, like Peter, "What shall I do? Shall I draw the sword against Malchus? Shall I build three tabernacles?" but rather, "What does He do? what does He speak?" It is due to this attitude that his memory, like a mirror, reflected the inner life of the Lord, and retained whole discourses entire. The peculiar majesty and glory of Christ was certainly not hidden from the eyes of the other disciples; but John alone was competent to reproduce them in a vivid description. The other evangelists preserve those discourses and acts of Jesus which produced greater visible effects at the time, — the miracles, the Sermon on the Mount, which brought together a large throng. John preserves incidents, which, though equally important, were not accompanied with so much display, — the conversations with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman, and the discussions in the temple. There is more resemblance between John and Paul. They are both of thoughtful, reflective disposition; but Paul's mind assumes a logical and dialectic form. John is contemplative only. Paul dwells upon the sinner's appropriation of salvation, John upon its author; Paul upon conversion, John upon the fulness of life in Christ.

John has been called the "Apostle of Love," because love is a controlling conception in his system. This word, however, occurs as frequently in Paul's writings, only he uses it in connection with faith. John employs it as the opposite of hatred and iniquity. From Luke ix. 54, where he would punish the Samaritan villagers, the opposite conclusion might be drawn, that he was a man of violent temperament. Neither of these views may be held in isolation. He was a man of mild disposition, but of strong, ardent convictions.

John received a religious training. His mother, Salome (Mark xvi. 1; Matt. xx. 20), was a true Israelite, and afterwards a devoted follower of Christ (Mark xv. 40). Tradition points to Bethsaida as the place of his birth. Chrysostom and others speak with confidence on this point. He had some means (John xix. 27), and seems to have been of better connection than the other disciples, for he knew the high priest (John xviii. 15). It is probable that he was a disciple of the Baptist before he was called of Christ. He apprehended the spirit and meaning of that prophet's preaching better than any of the other disciples (John i. 26-36). As a disciple of Christ, he leaned upon Christ's bosom, and is called "the disciple whom Jesus loved." He gave himself up unreservedly to him.

This decision, which marked his attachment to Christ, likewise distinguishes his conception of Christ's work. Paul depicts the struggle of the believer in appropriating salvation; John portrays salvation as a victory of the light already won over darkness. Paul treats of sin largely as weakness; John treats of it as iniquity. It was not possible for John to do the work which Paul did; but it was his high mission to keep the Church, already established, pure, and to purify it. It was not his mission to extend the Church, but to supplement the activity of the other apostles by contending against the corruption within its pale and the rising Gnosticism.

John's apostolical activity for the first thirty years after the resurrection was in harmony with his nature, — a quiet and retiring one. After the resurrection he occupied no prominent official position. If it were not for Gal. ii. 9, we would not even know that he was held in peculiar esteem at the side of Peter and James by the Church at Jerusalem. In the earliest period of apostolic activity he is found in company with Peter. But the latter is always the spokesman; and even in the year 50, at the council in Jerusalem (Acts xv.) it is Peter and James, not John, who are in the foreground. In the year 58 James and the presbyters alone are left in the city (Acts xxi. 18). In the interval the other apostles seem to have been scattered. An old tradition has it (Clemens Alex.: Strom., vi. 5) that John left Jerusalem twelve years after the resurrection. He spent the latter part of his life in Ephesus; but he could not have gone there long before Paul's death (A.D. 64), or there would have been some reference to him in the Epistle to the Ephesians, or at the leave-taking with the elders of Miletus. The testimony of the Fathers agrees that he presided over the churches of Asia Minor from Ephesus as a centre. Irenæus states that he lived there till the times of Trajan. His testimony is of peculiar value, for his teacher Polycarp had been a pupil of John.

It is unanimously agreed that he was banished to Patmos. Irenæus says that this occurred under Domitian; and Jeromè gives the more particular date as the fourteenth year of his reign (94-95). [But another tradition assigns the exile to the reign of Nero (68).] He was permitted by Nerva to return the year following. These are all the data we have of John's life. The exact date of his death is unknown.

II. THE WRITINGS of John divide themselves into two classes. The first includes the Gospel and the Epistles; the second, the Apocalypse.

(1) The Gospel of John is seen at first sight to differ from the first three Gospels. He omits very much that they contain, and adds much new and characteristic matter. It is obvious that he supplements the narratives of the synoptists; and there can hardly be a doubt that it was his design to do so. But in a deeper sense does he supplement their narratives. He delineates with special care the divine nature of Christ, opening his Gospel with a narrative of his divine antecedents, and reporting frequent discourses in which Christ speaks of his eternal relation to the Father. He also portrays the vital union of Christ with believers (John iii. 8, xiv. 16 sqq., xvii. 21-23). John's individuality was not the sole factor leading him to give to his Gospel its supplemental character. He was led to do this by the special needs of the Church, and the dangers to which it was exposed.

He awoke to the realization of his special mission in the last years of the first century. At the death of Paul and the destruction of Jerusalem, the Church entered upon a new stage. The Hebrew nation, rejecting the witness of the apostles, had become the Diaspora. Christianity now had to do only with Heathen Rome and with individual Jews as they opposed the Christians in the Roman Empire. The period was past in which Paul was called upon to contend against Judaizing tendencies in Christian congregations. The destruction of Jerusalem had sealed his teaching.

But, in spite of this event, there was a Jewish party in the Church, which so little understood its meaning, that they continued to cling to the forms of the old dispensation. They were called the sect of the Nazarenes, and in its ultimate form their system was known as Ebionitism. They saw in Christ only a lawgiver and a man. This tendency did not reach its full development in John's time; but his keen foresight discerned it in the future, and he was aroused by it to give his testimony to the eternal Sonship of Christ.

Contemporary with this, the first indications of Gnosticism began to make themselves felt. At the bottom a Heathen philosophy, it incorporated some of the doctrines of Christianity, but ignored faith and the atonement. Cerinthus, the first important expounder of this school, taught that the world was not created by God, but by a power distinct from him; that Jesus was the son of Mary and Joseph; that at his baptism he received the aion Christ into union with himself, and, enlightened by it, taught more exalted doctrines concerning God than had ever been taught before. This aion withdrew from Jesus before the passion, so that only the man Jesus suffered on the cross. According to Polycarp, John met Cerinthus in the baths, and it is quite probable that he was obliged to contend against his errors. We are thus led to the conclusion that the Cerinthian Gnosis was the principal cause which induced John to believe that the time had come for him to make known his peculiar gift, which he had hitherto kept concealed. It was his mission, by testifying more emphatically than had been done to the incarnation and divinity of Christ, to lay the last stone in the structure of apostolical teaching. He emphasizes faith in Jesus the Son of God (xx. 31) over against a bare gnosis. To the false speculations which denied now the divinity, now the humanity, of Christ, he opposed his utterances about his eternal relation with the Father, and the revelation of the Father through him. To the mere intellectual striving after knowledge without holiness, he opposes the mystical life of the union with Christ. The best evidence that this is the design of the Gospel is found in the statement of chap. xx. 31: "These are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye may have life in his name." No sharper antithesis to Cerinthian speculations could be conceived.

(2) A further proof that this was the purpose of the evangelist is found in his First Epistle. This work resembles the Gospel in language, style, tone, and ideas. In chap. ii. 12-14 the writer speaks six times of the object for which he had written, and was then writing. Must not these statements, then, beyond a doubt, refer to something else than the Epistle, — to the Gospel itself? If this point be well taken, then the Epistle assumes the character of an accompanying document, as J. P. Lange and Hug have held in common with myself. Be this granted or not, it may with certainty be deduced from 1 John iv. 2 sqq. that the apostle had to contend with such as denied that Jesus was the Christ. It was for the purpose of convincing of this that he wrote his Gospel (John xx. 31).

(3) The Apocalypse is the second division of John's literary labors. Here is revealed to the seer the contrast between light and darkness, truth and falsehood, which is the underlying theme of the Gospel, to its final consummation. John alone, whose mind had been occupied with these contrasts, was capable of receiving these revelations. In chap. i. 1 he declares himself definitely as the author of the book. Polycrates pronounces him who leaned on the Saviour's bosom to have received the revelation, like a priest of the Old-Testament dispensation, by means of the Urim and Thummim. [Dr. Ebrard assigns Revelation to the traditional date A.D. 95; but most critics now assign it to A.D. 68-70.]

(4) The Genuineness of the Fourth Gospel and the First Epistle is established by incontrovertible proofs. There can be only the choice between genuineness and designed fraud; for the writer announces himself to have been an eye-witness of Christ's life (John i. 14, xix. 35; 1 John i. 1).

Undesigned evidence in favor of the Johannean authorship is to be found in the Gospel itself, in the evident determination to avoid the mention of the sons of Zebedee (John i. 35, xiii. 23, xviii. 15, xix. 26, xx. 2), in constantly referring to himself as the "disciple whom Jesus loved," in giving to Thomas his cognomen (xi. 16), etc. But to this indirect testimony comes a strong and unbroken chain of external testimonies. In the early part of the second century we find a number of reminiscences and echoes of John which cannot fail to be recognized. Ignatius must have reference to him when he compares the Spirit with the wind, and speaks (Philad. 9; Rom. 7) of Christ as the "door of the Father," and the "bread of heaven." Justin Martyr (b. about 89) is charged with Johannean conceptions. He calls Christ the "living water," the λογος του θεου, the μονογενης, speaks of the incarnation (σαρκοποιηθηναι) and the new birth, and refers, time and again, to such passages as John xiv. 2, 3. Melito of Sardis (150) quotes John vi. 51, xii. 24, xv. 5, with the words, "Christ says in the Gospel."

Marcion's polemics against the Gospel show that it was at that time acknowledged in the Church to be genuine and canonical (Tertul.: Adv. Marc., VI. 3). Valentinus, no longer questioning its genuineness, sought to establish his Gnosticism by an allegorical exposition of it; and his pupil Heracleon, from this stand-point, wrote a Commentary upon it, of which Origen has preserved numerous fragments. Basilides (125) cited John i. 9, with the words, "That is what is said in the Gospels." Theodotus cites John i. 9, vi. 51, etc.; and Ptolemaeus (Ad Floram), John i. 3. Tatian (about 170) wrote a Harmony of the four Gospels, and Theophilus of Antioch (about 169) a Commentary upon the four Gospels, which Jerome himself had read. Theophilus (Ad Autol., II. 22) designates it by name. Here belongs Irenaeus (b. about 115), who cites the Gospel at length. Hippolytus, Apollinarius, and Papias, all three are to be added as witnesses to the genuineness. These testimonies and other facts cannot be explained on the supposition that the Gospel is post-apostolic. Fifty or sixty years after John's death we find it generally received, and held in highest esteem. The concurrence of evidence is so strong, that it was not till late in the history of rationalism, that its genuineness was attacked. It remained for the Tübingen school to do this, who hold that the author of the Gospel cannot be the same as the writer of the Apocalypse. But, whatever differences of idiom there may be, the spirit that pervades the two writings is the same; and the variations of language are explained by the difference of the theme and the time of their composition.

The Appendix (chap. xxi.) of the Gospel is also to be taken into account as evidence for its genuineness. This chapter bears marks of being written by the apostle himself (ver. 24). It was written by him after the first composition, and added to the Gospel, not by his own hand, but by the hand of another, perhaps by the presbyter John (vers. 24, 25). He bore witness to the authorship; and this Appendix must have been added very soon after the composition of the Gospel, as it is not wanting in a single manuscript.

[Lit. — The Johannean literature has grown very rapidly during the last twenty years, especially in consequence of the assaults made on the genuineness of the fourth Gospel by Strauss, Baur, Keim, Renan, and their sympathizers. JOHN THE BAPTIST, son of the priest Zacharias and Elisabeth; born six months before Jesus, and probably in the early part of the second half of the year 749 A.U.C. (B.C. 5), in a city of Judah, according to a Jewish tradition, Hebron or Jutta. His birth was announced by an angel of the Lord (Luke i. 13), who prophesied that he should be anointed with the spirit and power of Elijah. For thirty years we hear nothing of him, except that he was in the deserts (Luke i. 80). He suddenly appeared, at the end of this interval, as a reformer and prophet. His appearance was that of an ascetic. His clothing consisted of a garment of camel's hair bound by a leathern girdle; his food, locusts and wild honey (Matt. iii. 4, etc.). The angelic announcement that he should drink neither wine nor strong drink seems to indicate that he took the vows of a Nazarite. John stands out in sharp contrast to the manners of his age; and his message, to its ways of thinking. The central doctrine of his preaching was in opposition to the righteousness of works, — repentance in view of the near approach of the kingdom of God. With his preaching he associated a baptism of repentance looking to the forgiveness of sins (Matt. iii. 11; Luke iii. 3; Acts xiii. 24). It was a confession of personal guilt (Matt. iii. 6), and an invitation into the circle of those who were expecting the kingdom of heaven. It was, however, a baptism only of water, as opposed to the baptism of the Spirit and fire, which was introduced by Christ (Matt. iii. 11; John i. 26, etc.)

John's fame extended far and wide through the land, and spread among all classes. Throngs came to his baptism at Bethabara, of publicans and soldiers, as well as Pharisees and Sadducees (Matt. iii. 7, xi. 7, etc.). There was a prevalent expectation that he might prove to be the Messiah; and the Sanhedrin sent out a delegation to question him about it (Luke iii. 15; John i. 20; Acts xiii. 25). His influence over the masses was very great; and it was dangerous, in their presence, to deny that he was a prophet (Matt. xxi. 26, etc.). John was more than reformer: he was the forerunner of Christ. He represented himself, in accordance with Isa. xl. 3, as a "voice crying in the wilderness," etc. (John i. 23). With ingenuous humility he rejected all claims of Messianic dignity, and points to the Greater One, whose shoes' latchet he was not worthy to unloose (Matt. iii. 11; John i. 27; Acts xiii. 25). He designated Christ more particularly as pre-existent to himself, though his junior in birth (John i. 15, 30), as the Son of God (John i. 34), and, with reference to Isa. liiii. 7, as the "Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world" (John i. 29, 36). His public activity did not last more than two years at the most. He was cast into the prison of Machærus for his bold arraignment of Herod Antipas for his adulterous connection with Herodias (John iii. 24, etc.), and was subsequently beheaded, in obedience to an oath the king, in a moment of voluptuous festivity, made to Salome, Herodias' daughter (Matt. xiv. 3 sqq., etc.). According to Josephus, the reason for the beheading was jealousy at John's preponderant influence with the people (Antiq., XVIII. 5, 2). The mission of the deputation to Christ from his prison is not to be attributed to any doubt that he was the Messiah, but to a feeling of discontent with his slow and unexpected method of procedure (Matt. xi. 2; Luke vii. 19, etc.). Christ pronounced John the Baptist to be the greatest among the prophets, although less than the least in the kingdom of heaven (Luke vii. 28). He was a "burning and shining light" (John v. 33, 35), and the Elijah whose coming prophets had predicted (Mal. iii. 1; John i. 21, etc.). He did no miracle (John x. 41); but he prepared the way of the Lord, and stands on a lofty plane of pre-eminence, for his self-denial, intrepid courage, and childlike humility. He represents the completion of the old dispensation, which, like the morning star, was paling before the rising sun of the new economy (John iii. 30).

JOHN is the name of twenty-three popes. — John I., Saint, b. in Siena, and made Bishop of Rome, Aug. 13, 523. He was sent by Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, to Byzantium, to represent the cause of the Arians, against whom the emperor, Justin II., had issued an edict. Tradition says he was received with much honor at the Eastern capital. Returning to Ravenna, he was thrown into prison, where he died May 18, 526. — John II. (Dec. 31, 532–May 27, 535) had to make many queer shifts between the dogmatical precepts of the Emperor Justinian and the dogmatical decisions of his predecessor, Hormisdas. — John III. (July 14, 560–July 13, 573). — John IV., b. in Dalmatia, and consecrated Pope, Dec. 25, 640; d. Oct. 12, 642. He was zealous in establishing monasteries. In the debate on the Monothelitic confession of the Patriarch Sergius, he placed himself at the head of the opposite party, and defended the orthodoxy of his predecessor, Honorius. His synod in Rome of 641 condemned Monothelism. — John V. (May or July, 685–Aug. 2, 686) was a Syrian by birth, and spent most of the time of his reign in bed. His alleged letters are probably spurious. — John VI. (Oct. 30, 701–Jan. 10, 705). — John VII. (March 1, 705–Oct. 18, 707) received from Justinian II. the canons of the Council of Trulla, but dared not pronounce upon them. — John VIII., a Roman by birth, and made Bishop of Rome, Dec. 11, 872. He was a bold spirit, of restless ambition, and skilled in statecraft. He conceived large plans of extending the territory of the Pope over all of Central and Southern Italy, and of using the emperors in the interest of the papal power in Italy. They were all shattered. He crowned King Charles the Bald as emperor, 875. The king made him large donations of territory. In 881 he crowned his successor, Charles the Fat, expecting to get aid against the Saracens. In this he failed. He recognized Photius as Patriarch of Constantinople in the hope of securing the aid of the Byzantine emperor to further his schemes in Italy. Finding himself disappointed, he retracted the recognition. He confirmed Methodius as bishop among the Slavs. He was murdered with a hammer, Dec. 15, 882. Three hundred and eight of John's letters are extant. See MANSI: Concil., T. xvii. — John IX. (June, 898–July, 900) held two synods, — one in Rome, which gave Formosus redress, and another at Ravenna, against robbery of church property. MANSI: Concil., xviii. — John X., raised, by the influence of the profligate Theodora, to the sees of Bologna and Ravenna, and in 911 to the bishopric of Rome. He gave himself up to worldly amusements, and was the first of the popes to enter armed into the camp. He led a successful campaign against the marauding Saracens. He was suffocated in prison in 929. — John XI. (March, 931–January, 936), a son of Marozia and Sergius III., was at one time imprisoned by his half-brother, Alberic. — John XII. (Octavian) followed his father as Prince (Patricius) of Rome, from which position he was suddenly called, in his sixteenth or eighteenth year, to the papal office, Dec. 16, 955. Like his predecessors, he was ambitious to secure the supposed temporal rights of the Pope, and called in Otto I. across the Alps to his aid against King Berengar and the Greeks. Although Otto promised safety for the person of John, and continuance in the inheritance of Peter, yet the struggle between the Papacy and the emperors began with him. He secured from John an oath never to conclude a treaty with Berengar and the Greeks. John forgot his pledge, and in 963 was forced to flee before Otto as he returned in triumph to the city. The Romans were compelled to take an oath never to elect or consecrate a pope without the consent of the emperor or his son. John led a wanton life, and the Lateran rang with sounds of impure revelry and Pagan oaths over games of chance. He was convicted, by a synod held in St. Peter's in 963, of various crimes, — such as murder, fornication, perjury, — and deposed. After the departure of Otto, he returned to the city, was re-instated by a second synod, but died suddenly, on May 14, 964, in an adulterous bed, of apoplexy. See GIESEBRECHT: Gesch. d. deutsch. Kaiserzeit, and DÜMMLER: Otto d. Grosse, Leipzig, 1876. — John XIII. (Oct. 1, 965–Sept. 6, 972) was expelled from Rome by the nobility, but was restored and upheld by the Emperor Otto, who, at a synod of Ravenna, guaranteed to the Roman see the possession, not only of the city and circle of Ravenna, but every estate which it had ever held. Lives of him in MURATORI: Script. rerum Ital., T. iii. pt. ii. — John XIV. (November or December, 983–Aug. 20, 984) perished in a dungeon of the Castle of St. Angelo, where he had been confined by Boniface VII. — John XV. (September, 985–April, 996) was expelled from Rome by John Crescentius, but managed to return, and to fill his private coffers with the wealth of the Church. — John XVI. (May, 997–March, 998), a Greek by birth, was made Pope by John Crescentius, but overtaken by Gregory V., and fearfully mutilated by him. — John XVII. (June 13–Dec. 7, 1003). — John XVIII. (Dec. 25, 1003–June, 1009) was, like his predecessor, a mere tool in the hands of the Roman Patrician, the son of John Crescentius. — John XIX. (July, 1024–January, 1033) was a layman when he grasped the tiara, by force and by bribery, after the death of his brother, Benedict VIII., and received on one day all the ecclesiastical orders. — John XXI. (Sept. 8, 1276–May 20, 1277) ought to be counted as John XX., but called himself John XXI. The confusion begins with John XVII., who is also called John XVIII., some antipope of the name John being counted John XVII. It is not altogether certain whether John XXI. is identical with Petrus Hispanus, the noted author of several medical and philosophical treatises. POTTHAST: Reg. Pontif. Rom., vol. ii. — John XXII., a Frenchman, b. in Cahors, of humble parentage, and elected, by the conclave, Pope at Lyons, Aug. 7, 1316. He had his residence at Avignon. In 1324 he showed himself the slave of the French king by the excommunication of Louis of Bavaria, who, in turn, called a general council, declared

John a heretic, secured, through a synod in Rome, his deposition and the election of Nicolaus V. to his place. John sanctioned the custom of saluting the Virgin with three Ave Marias in honor of the Trinity, deprived the towns of the right of electing their bishops, and left behind an immense sum of money, which he had secured by annats, and otherwise. He died Dec. 4, 1334. — JOHN XXIII., a Neapolitan of fine talents, but corrupt morals; d. Dec. 22, 1419. He secured, by bribes and threats, his election, on May 17, 1410, to the papal throne. He was deposed, and imprisoned in Heidelberg; but, escaping, he fell at the feet of Martin V., and was made cardinal-bishop of Tusculum. G. VOIGT.

JOHN IV., Jejunator (the FASTER), Patriarch of Constantinople 582-595; had a high reputation for piety. He became involved in difficulties with Popes Pelagius II. and Gregory I., by following the precedent of some of his predecessors in assuming the title of Œcumenical Patriarch. Gregory was intensely aroused by this assumption, declaring it to be a suggestion of Satan, and an indication of the near advent of Antichrist. John soon died, and the Greek Church placed his name on the calendar of the saints. A later and untrustworthy tradition states that Gregory had excommunicated him before his death.

The writings attributed to John (Libellus pœnitentialis and Tractatus de Confessione et pœnitentia) are of very doubtful authenticity. See Life of John, by Patriarch NICEMORUS, and the Church History of SCHRÖCKH. WAGENMANN.

JOHN X., Patriarch of Constantinople, known for his connection with the measures of the Emperor Michael Paleologus, looking to the union of Christendom. He at first refused his aid, and declared the Latins heretics, for which he was thrown into prison. He there had leisure to investigate the history of the dissensions of the Greek and Latin churches, and to change his mind. He was released, and made patriarch, but, after the death of the emperor, retired to a cloister in 1283. He was again restored, and again exiled, dying 1298. The Greek Church excludes his name from the number of the orthodox. GASS.

JOHN OF ANTIOCH, surnamed Scholasticus; b. at Sirimis, in the neighborhood of Antioch; practised as an advocate in the latter city, and was a presbyter of the Church, when, during the reign of Justinian, he was sent as apocrisiarius to Constantinople. In the Monophysite controversies the emperor opposed the orthodox; and, as he could not compel Eutychius the patriarch to submit to his views, he had him deposed by a synod of 564, and John placed in his stead. John, however, is chiefly known to us through his Collectio Canonum, which he made while presbyter of Antioch. It contains eighty-six so-called apostolical canons. The Nomocanon, containing some additional capita ecclesiastica and a number of civil laws, is also ascribed to him. Both collections are found (Greek and Latin) in H. JUSTELLI: Bibliotheca Juris Canonici, Paris, 1662, t. ii. The date of his death is generally fixed at 578.

JOHN OF AVILA, the modern apostle of Andalusia; b. at Almodóvar del Campo, in the diocese of Toledo, 1502; d. at Montilla, May 10, 1569, began to study law at Salamanca, when he was fourteen years old, but retired soon after to his home, where for three years he led a life of the severest asceticism. After studying theology at Alcalá, under Domingo de Soto, he began to preach at Seville, Cordova, Granada, everywhere producing the deepest impression. He was summoned before the Inquisition, but refused to answer. He was offered the highest preferments in the Church, but declined to accept. His health failed, however; and the last twenty years of his life he had to confine himself to teaching in a monastery. Several of his works, De los malos lenguages del Mundo, Epistolario espiritual, were translated into French, English, and German. A collected edition appeared in Madrid, 1757, in nine volumes quarto. His life has been written by Luis de Granada and Nicolas Antonio (Bibliotheca Hispana Nova, l.). BENRATH.

JOHN OF CHUR (Coire), surnamed Rütberg. The term "Friends of God" is applied to the mystics and pietists in the latter part of the fourteenth century, who yearned for a more vital type of religion than they found in the Church. Here and there they formed brotherhoods, and not infrequently laymen were their leaders. They flourished especially in the Rhineland, Cologne, Strassburg, and the Netherlands. Eckart (d. about 1329) and Tauler (1290-1361) belonged to their number, and also the author of the work called The German Theology.

John of Chur, the son of a rich merchant, was one of the "Friends of God." Suddenly arrested in a wild career, he gave himself up entirely to mystical contemplations. He renounced all his fortune, to which he had fallen heir by the death of his father, and distributed it for benevolent purposes. He regarded suffering as a special gift of divine grace; and even evil thoughts, doubts, and impure desires, he believed were to be patiently endured, rather than striven against, for they were dispensed by God. He taught that the perfect man "has become one with God when he wants nothing else except what God wills." About 1357 he sought to unite his friends who were of the same spirit into a society. From indications in his writings, we conclude that Chur, or Coire, in the canton of the Grisons, Switzerland, was his native city. In 1365 he determined to separate himself from the bustle of the town, and led with two companions, in a miraculous manner, by a black dog, he wandered to a mountain, where he built a chapel. He died about the year 1380. Little is known definitely about his life; but I am led by my investigations to conclude that he built his chapel on a mountain in the canton St. Gall, near the castle Rütberg. For this reason I have given him the distinguishing surname of Rütberg. Among the printed writings of John of Chur the principal one is The Book of the Five Men (D. Buch von d. 5 Mannen).

JOHN OF DAMASCUS, surnamed Chrysorroas (gold-pouring) on account of his eloquence, and called, among the Arabs, Mansur, is the last of the Greek Fathers, and the most authoritative theologian in the Oriental Church. The main facts of his life are taken from John of Jerusalem, who wrote in the middle of the tenth century, and in a legendary style. He was born in Damascus (then under Saracenic rule), at the close of the seventh or the beginning of the eighth century. His father, Sergius, placed him under the instruction of the Italian monk Cosmas. At the death of his father, he was raised to high official position by the caliph. About the year 730 the Emperor Leo the Isaurian, out of revenge for a book John had written in defence of images, the use of which he was seeking to abolish, convicted him, by the aid of a forged letter, of treason to the caliph, who ordered one of his hands to be cut off. John prostrated himself before the Virgin, who restored the maimed part. Out of gratitude to her, whom he calls the "Mother of God, and mistress of all creation" (De Fide Orthod., iii. 12, iv. 14), he renounced his office, to which he had been recalled, distributed his goods amongst his relatives and in alms, and entered the convent of St. Sabas, near Jerusalem. He was subsequently ordained presbyter of Jerusalem. In the last period of his life he defended with great zeal, against the Emperor Constantine Capronymus, the use of images, travelling through Syria, and even going to Constantinople, in this interest. It is probable that he returned to the convent, where he died some time between the years 754 and 787.

John's principal work is the Fountain of Knowledge (πηγή γνώσεως), which consists of three parts,—an application of Aristotle's Dialectic to theology, a Treatise on Heresies, and An Accurate Exposition of the most Orthodox Faith (ἐκδοσις ἀκριβῆς πίστεως ὀρθόδοξου). He developed a system of theology, using philosophy in the service of theology, comparing the latter to a princess who is waited upon by maids. In this, as also by his confessed dependence upon tradition, he shows himself to be the forerunner of mediæval scholasticism. In the department of theology proper he affirms that God's nature is unknowable, and that therefore negative attributes only can be predicated of him; e.g., infinity, incomprehensibility, etc. But, in his relations to that which is not himself, we may speak of him as good, just, etc. He vindicates the arguments for God's existence, instancing the cosmological proof, and that which argues from imperfect being to the idea of a perfect personal God. He investigates the Trinity, and finds in it a union of the fundamental ideas of Heathenism and Judaism, in that the plurality, as well as unity, is preserved. He finds an analogy to the trinitarian persons in the mind, word, and breath. In consonance with the Oriental Fathers, he teaches the subordination of the Second and Third Persons. His doctrine of the procession of the Holy Spirit is a modification of theirs, and approaches nearer that of the Latin Fathers: "The Spirit proceedeth from the Father through the Son" (De Fide Orthod., i. 8). With reference to the decree of predestination, he says that God foresees our acts of free will, but does not fore-ordain them. In the department of Christology, John presses the reality and full validity of the two natures. The person of Christ is, as it were, the common meeting-ground of the humanity and the divinity. He affirms full liberty of both natures, but denies to Christ all spiritual growth, and that his prayer was in the true sense prayer; it being only a means to teach men by example, or to honor God. The work of Christ was to restore what sin had ruined. Sin has its origin in the freedom of the will. By the Fall, man forfeited his immortality, but did not entirely lose the freedom of the will. God had made provision beforehand for the contingency of sin, creating woman, as well as man, that the race might be continued by propagation, and forming him with the capacity of suffering, and through it, after the Fall, he might be chastened (ii. 28). Punishment is an act of justice, but has also an educational purpose. Christ suffered death as a ransom to redeem us from the Devil (iii. 18, 27). God hereby asserts his justice, and manifests his love. Satan had a just claim to the race, which had to be paid off. The benefits of the atonement are appropriated through the choice of our own free will and the continued activity of Christ through the Spirit in the heart. In baptism the Spirit unites itself with the water at the prayer of consecration, and works, in believers, regeneration. In the Lord's Supper the elements are changed into the body and blood of Christ, and become part of the essence (συστάσις) of our souls and bodies. Although he gives no fully developed theory of transubstantiation, yet he teaches it rhetorically, and also that the sacrament is a bloodless sacrifice.

In addition to his great work, a number of smaller writings have come down to us under his name. He commented upon the Pauline Epistles, wrote homilies, and composed some fine hymns [of which one of the most beautiful is the resurrection hymn found in many English hymn-books, "The Day of Resurrection, Earth, tell it out abroad," ἀναστάσις ἡμέρα]. The interesting romance of Barlaam and Joasaph, in which monastic life is held up to admiration, may have been edited by him.

JOHN, Monophysite bishop of Ephesus; lived in the sixth century. He is the author of a Church History, in three parts, from the time of the earliest Roman emperors to 585. A part of it was discovered in 1853, among some Syriac manuscripts, and edited by Cureton, under the title The Third Part of the Ecclesiastical History of John, Bishop of Ephesus, Oxford, 1853; English translation by R. Payne Smith, Oxf., 1860. NESTLE.

JOHN OF MONTE CORVINO, the apostle of the Mongols; b. in Monte Corvino, Southern Italy, about 1250; d. 1332. He went into Persia, and proved very successful in winning the Mongols to Christianity. He was summoned back to Italy in 1288, to report in person about the great work. In 1291 he was commissioned to labor amongst the people of China, whose emperor, Kublai, had expressed a desire to have Christian teachers. He dwelt utterly alone for eleven years, surrounded by Pagans and unfriendly Nestorians, and suffering violent persecution. He baptized six thousand heathen, translated the Psalms and New Testament, and gathered a school of boys. In 1305 seven assistants were sent to his aid, who carried to him the title of Archbishop of Pekin.

JOHN OF SALISBURY (called also Parvus, the Little), b. of Saxon parentage, between 1110 and 1120, in Salisbury (Sarum); d. in France, Oct. 25, 1180. He went to France, as the custom then was, and studied under Abelard and other teachers. He became eminent for his attainments in philosophy and theology. In 1148 he returned to England, with letters of recommendation from Bernard of Clairvaux, and Peter the Cistercian abbot. Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, appointed him his chaplain and secretary. The responsibility of the ecclesiastical concerns of Great Britain largely devolved upon him. He stood in relations of close intimacy with popes Eugenius III. and Adrian IV. By his influence, the claims of Alexander III. were recognized in England as against those of Victor IV. He was the intimate adviser of Thomas à Becket, and shared his misfortunes, going into exile with him to France. After that prelate's murder, he zealously interested himself in his canonization. In 1176 he was chosen bishop of Chartres, and lived to administer its affairs four years. One of the last acts of his life was a speech at the Lateran Council (1179), in which he warned against ecclesiastical assumption, and urged the gospel as the rule of life.

John's writings consist of many Letters to popes and other dignitaries, a work on ancient and Christian philosophy, entitled Entheticus, and two works on ecclesiastical and political ethics, designed for princes and statesmen, and entitled Politicus and Metalogicus. He also wrote Lives of Anselm and Thomas à Becket, whose latter sufferings he does not hesitate to compare with the passion of our Lord. His complete works were edited, in 5 vols., by GILES (Oxford, 1848), and MIGNÉ (Patrol. Lat., vol. xcix.). See H. REUTER: Joh. v. Salisbury, Berlin, 1842; SCHAAR-SCHMIDT: Joh. Salisbury nach Leben u. Studien, Leipzig, 1862. WAGENMANN.

JOHN, Patriarch of Thessalonica at the close of the seventh and the beginning of the eighth centuries; was noted as a defender of image-worship; and wrote on that subject a dialogue between a Jew and a Christian, of which an extract was read aloud at the second council of Nicæa. See MANSI: Counc., XIII. p. 156.

JOHN (Eleemosynarius, the Almsgiver), so called because of his extraordinary benevolence; Patriarch of Constantinople from 606 to 616, when he died in the Island of Cyprus, whither he had fled before the persecution of the Persians. It is pleasing to add that benevolence was not his only virtue. He was a great lover of peace, forgiving towards his enemies, and willing to bear patiently his own ills, while he helped others to bear theirs. He is commemorated upon Jan. 23, and under that date the Bollandists tell many edifying tales about him.

JOHN FREDERICK, son of John the Constant, and elector of Saxony 1532-1547; b. at Torgau, June 30, 1503; d. March 3, 1554. Brought up in the lap of the Reformation, he became its unwavering advocate. Like his father, he was on terms of most intimate friendship with Luther, with whom he carried on an uninterrupted correspondence. He increased the endowment of the university of Wittenberg from the sequestered revenues of convents, and in 1518 founded the university of Jena. His relations to the imperial court were unpleasant. In 1536 he entered into a re-affirmation of the Smalcald league, by which the Protestant princes bound themselves to mutual protection for ten years. In 1544 Charles was left free to give his whole attention to affairs in Germany. A war broke out. Frederick was finally defeated, and taken prisoner, at Mühlberg, April 24, 1547. He remained in prison till 1552; and the electoral office was conferred upon his nephew, Moritz. He lived as a subject for two years after he was set at liberty. His fidelity under many vicissitudes has confirmed the waning courage of thousands. See BURKHARDT: D. Gefangenschaft Joh. Fr. d. Grossmüthigen, 1863; and the Histories of the Reformation.

JOHN, surnamed Lackland, king of England, May 26, 1199-Oct. 19, 1216; was born Dec. 24, 1167; the youngest son of Henry II. In 1205 his quarrel with the Church and the Pope began. The see of Canterbury was vacant. The monks elected their sub-prior, Reginald; and the king nominated John de Gray, bishop of Norwich. Neither the one nor the other pleased the suffragan bishops. All parties appealed to the Pope; and Innocent III. appointed Stephen Langton archbishop of Canterbury. As the king refused to recognize this appointment, the Pope laid interdict on his whole kingdom 1208, and excommunicated him personally 1209. John, however, who did not seem to care much about the Pope, went on his own way, very successful in curbing the refractory clergy, and suppressing occasional revolts. Innocent then determined to burst the last bomb. In 1211 he deposed John, and charged Philippe II., king of France, with the execution of the decree. This took effect. John, a loose, cowardly character, sometimes made audacious by his cruelty, or stubborn by his sensuality, immediately submitted, and not only accepted Stephen Langton, but even consented to hold his own kingdom as a fief of the papal see, and took an oath of fealty to Innocent. Utterly disgusted at this humiliation, and generally irritated by his irregularities, the barons rose against him, and compelled him to sign the Magna Charta, the basis of English freedom, at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. Innocent, now his ally, tried to come to his rescue, and condemned the charter. But a large national party was formed, comprising not only the barons, but also the clergy and the cities; and, in the war which ensued, John lost one part of the country after the other, until at last he became a true lackland. Having nearly escaped being drowned by fording the Wash, he died at Newark Castle, from dysentery, the result of gluttony and fatigue.

JOHN NEPOMUK, the most popular national saint of Bohemia; canonized by Benedict XIII. in 1729; b. between 1330 and 1340, in Pomuk; suffered martyrdom at Prague, March 20(?), 1393. The facts of his life are involved in obscurity. According to the Jesuit Bohuslav Ballbinus (1670), he studied at the university of Prague, and afterwards became preacher at the cathedral. He was the confessor of Queen Johanna. Her husband, King Wenzel, sought in vain, by tempting promises, to induce him to reveal the matter of her confessions. He subsequently resorted to imprisonment and torture to gain his end. Finding himself still unsuccessful, and incensed by a sermon which John preached in the cathedral, and in which he yielded to himself the words, "In a little while ye shall not see me," the king ordered him to be apprehended, under cover of the night, and thrown from the bridge into the Moldau (1383). According to the same authority, miracles were performed in connection with his body. Thousands of lights appeared on the river, and his corpse was thrown upon a sand-bar. A heavenly odor issued from it, and the sick were cured at his shrine. Much of this account must be regarded as legendary. The facts are probably these: a John of Pomuk did live in the fourteenth century, was raised to high ecclesiastical dignity, and afterwards thrown, by command of the king, into the Moldau. But the most authentic sources put the date ten years later, in 1393 (March 20?), and know nothing of his being the confessor of the queen. They give conflicting reasons for the violent treatment of the king. These differences led, as early as 1541, to the supposition of Hajek of Lobocan, that there were two Johns of Pomuk, dying within ten years of each other. The Jesuit Bohuslav (1670) followed this supposition, and fully developed the legendary details. But an able investigator, John Dabrowsky (1787), refuted the hypothesis, and has finally settled it that there was only one. The tradition that Johu was the queen's confessor can be traced back to the year 1471, and no farther.

JOHN PHILOPONUS (called also Alexandrinus and Grammaticus), who lived in the latter part of the fifth, and first part of the sixth century, won a place among the philosophical and theological writers of his age. The chronology of his life is very uncertain, and no details are known. He was an Aristotelian in philosophy, and, in the Christological controversy of the time, allied himself to the Egyptian party, and was a Monophysite. His principal theological work, the Διασητής, is lost, and known only by quotations. He held, that, if Christ had more than one nature, he had more than one person. He was unjustly reported by Leontius to be the founder of the Tritheists. He sought in another work, De Eternitate Mundi, to establish the Christian doctrine of the creation without the aid of the Bible. He also wrote works on the six days of creation, and on the date of the Paschal Supper, putting it on the thirteenth day of the month, one day before the Mosaic passover. He was a prolific author. There is no complete edition of his works extant. See SCHARFENBERG: De Johanne Philop., Lips., 1768. GASS.

JOHN SCHOLASTICUS, a monk of the latter part of the sixth century, and a zealous advocate of the monastic life; became abbot of a convent on Mount Sinai, and died, at the age of one hundred, in 606. He received the name of Climachus, from a work entitled κλίμαξ του παραδεισου. He here gives a sketch of the conditions of the soul through which men pass in their progress to the perfect life. This course begins with the forsaking of the world, and mortification of the passions, and ends with a composed state, in which one enjoys already here the blessings of paradise.

JOHN THE CONSTANT, Elector of Saxony 1525–32; one of the most zealous of the princely supporters of the Reformation; b. in Meissen, June 30, 1468; d. Aug. 16, 1532. He early imbibed a love for a military life, and in several campaigns under Maximilian I., against the Hungarians and Venetians, he displayed great decision and courage. At the opening of the Reformation struggle he was already fifty years old. He followed it with interest from the very beginning, and early laid down an evangelical confession. He was an intimate friend and admirer of Luther, of whose sermons he frequently took notes. His prudence, probity, and firmness contributed not a little to the progress of the Reformation; and he bade the priests in his realm preach the gospel, and administer the sacraments according to the institution of Christ. He was threatened by a league of Catholic princes, formed at Breslau 1528, with exile from his land and people, unless he delivered up Luther, and restored the old order of things. He expressed his refusal to comply by marshalling his troops, which, however, it did not become necessary to use. At the second diet of Spire he signed a protest against the action of the majority, forbidding all religious innovations, or discussions of the mass, until the convention of an œcumenical council. He acknowledged obedience to the emperor, except where it conflicted with the honor of God and his soul's welfare. At the diet of Augsburg, in 1530, his conduct was heroic. In spite of the slighting treatment of Charles V., he did not retreat a step from his evangelical position, but determined to stand "by the imperishable Word of God." On Feb. 27, 1531, he entered into a league of defence with Protestant cities and princes for six years, which forced upon the emperor the religious peace of Nürnberg of July 23, 1532. On the 16th of August he was suddenly attacked with apoplexy on returning from a hunt, and died. Luther preached the funeral sermon from I Thess. iv. 14–18; and Melancthon pronounced a memorial address soon after, in Latin. John had not the gifts of statesmanship his brother Frederick possessed; but he was a man of fearless courage, deepest evangelical convictions, and unsullied life. Luther regarded him as a "pious, upright prince, without gall." He was a man of peace, but a good soldier of Jesus Christ. JOHN THE LITTLE (Jean Petit), b. in Normandy; d. at Hesdin, July 15, 1411; was professor of theology in the university of Paris; and made, on the instance of the Duke of Burgundy (who had assassinated the Duke of Orleans, the brother of the king), a speech, in which he defended that murder with twelve reasons, — one in honor of each of the twelve apostles. The speech was condemned, not only by the university, but also by the Council of Constance (sess. 5), and the orator was expelled from the university; but he was magnificently rewarded by the duke. Compare BARANTE: Histoire des ducs de Bourgogne, 1824, tom. iv. pp. 108 sqq. TH. PRESSEL.

JOHN THE PRESBYTER, a half-mythical character of the twelfth century, whose fame aroused an intense curiosity, but whose very identity is a matter of uncertainty. The report spread through Europe, that, beyond Persia and Armenia, a powerful Christian was ruling, who had routed the Mohammedans in a great battle. He combined with his royal functions the consecration of a priest. Pope Alexander III. sent his physician, Philip, as legate, with letters addressed to John as the "King of the Indies, and most holy of priests" (Indiorum regi, sacerdotum sanctissimo). A second epoch in the reports and fables concerning him begins in 1245, with the mission of the Franciscans and Dominicans for the evangelization of Eastern Asia. They carried instructions from Innocent IV. to search for the kingdom of the Presbyter John. Rubruquis, one of their number, reported that John was dead, but that "he had been a Nestorian, lived as a shepherd, and, after the death of Coirkhan, was made king." A third epoch in this legendary history begins with the account of Marco Polo, who reported the existence of a powerful Christian kingdom in Middle India which was named Abascia. The similarity of the names soon led to the inference that he referred to Abyssinia. The Catholic bishop, Jordanus of Quilon, in Southern India, called it king John. He was identified with the Presbyter; and this continued to be the universally received view of scholars till the seventeenth century. The present phase of the question is, that a certain King John did rule in Central Asia. The name had been corrupted from Jorkhan, which, in turn, was a corruption of Coirkhan. He was a Buddhist himself, but had Nestorians among his subjects. His daughter became a Christian, as did some of his descendants. See OPPERT: Der Presbyter Johannes in Sage und Geschichte, Berlin, 2d ed., 1870; [G. BRUNET: La légende du prêtre Jean, Bordeaux, 1877; F. ZARNCKE: Der Priester Johannes, Leipzig, 1879]. W. JOHN, St., Eve of, was, like Christmas Eve, formerly celebrated among all Germanic nations with merry-makings of various descriptions, — lighting of bonfires on the hilltops, dancing around the fires with garlands and songs, jumping through the fires, partly as sport, and partly as a protection against witchcraft, etc. It is of Pagan origin, and refers to the summer solstice, falling on June 24. The Christian Church, however, adopted it very early, and interpreted its peculiar features in her own way. The fire was put into relation with John i. 8, explained as a symbol of baptism, and blessed by the priest; but in the nineteenth century this, as so many other popular customs, has nearly disappeared. JOHNSON, Samuel, D.D., first president of King's (now Columbia) College, New York; b. in Guilford, Conn., Oct. 14, 1696; d. in Stratford, Conn., June 6, 1772. He was graduated at Yale College 1714; in 1720 was ordained a Congregational minister, but in 1723 was re-ordained in the Church of England; returned to America as missionary of the S. P. G., he settled in Stratford, Conn. In 1753 he was chosen first president of King's College, but resigned 1763. He was the author of Elementa Philosophica and Elementa Ethica, Philadelphia, 1752 (both anonymous, and printed by Benjamin Franklin), a Hebrew Grammar, 1767, besides minor theological works. Dr. Johnson was the most prominent American influenced by Bishop Berkeley while in America. See his Life by BEARDSLEY, N. Y., 1874; and UEBERWEG'S History of Philosophy, vol. ii. p. 450.

JOHNSON, Samuel, b. in Salem, Mass., Oct. 10, 1822; d. at North Andover, Mass., Sunday, Feb. 19, 1882. He was graduated at Harvard College 1842, and at the Divinity School 1843, but never associated himself with any religious denomination, although his views were more nearly Unitarian than any other. In 1853 he became pastor of a Free Church of Lynn, Mass., and held the position for some twenty years. He was prominent in the antislavery agitation, but rather as a sympathizer and pulpit advocate than as platform speaker. He was a man of very lovable disposition, of great modesty, industry, and kindness. He issued, in connection with Rev. Samuel Longfellow, A Book of Hymns (Boston, 1846); in 1868 The Worship of Jesus; and for many years before his death he had been at work upon a series, Oriental Religions, and their Relations to Universal Religion, of which India (Boston, 1872) and China (1877) have appeared. Although these two books are compilations, and not drawn from the sources, they have won a high place for their reliable and interesting contents, and appreciative spirit.

JOK'TAN was the son of Eber, the brother of Peleg, and father of thirteen sons (Gen. x. 25; 1 Chron. i. 19). According to the genealogical table of Genesis, the Shemitic race was, long before the emigration of the Abrahamites, divided into a northern branch (Peleg) and a southern (Joktan). The names of the thirteen sons of Joktan point towards Southern Arabia. Several of them have been identified with those of existing tribes, and the rest are probably identifiable in the same manner. The distinction which Genesis makes between the old Joktanite Arabs and the younger Ishmaelite Arabs is, indeed, an ethnographical fact well understood also by the Arabic ethnographers. KAUTZSCH.

JONAH (יֹנָתַן, ["dove"]), one of the Minor Prophets, was the son of Amittai, who, according to 2 Kings xiv. 25, uttered a prophecy concerning Jeroboam II. The Book of Jonah is distinguished from the other prophetic books by the fact that it is not the prophecy, but the personal experiences of the man, in which the interest centres. In order to escape the divine summons to preach repentance to Nineveh, he embarked from Joppa for Tarshish, but during a storm was, at his own advice and by the issue of a lot, thrown overboard, and swallowed by a great fish (i. 17). Three days afterwards he was thrown up upon the land, and, after a second summons, began preaching to the Ninevites. When both king and people began to repent, Jonah became indignant at the divine compassion, but was convinced by God of his foolishness by a gourd (iv.). Such are the contents of the book; and many have regarded it as an allegory, or a poetic myth. The prevailing view at present among the representatives of modern criticism is, that it was a national prophetic tradition designed to serve a didactic aim, and with some elements of historic truth. The historical view appeals to the geographical and historical notices in the prophecy; as, for example, the evident accuracy of the description of Nineveh, the fitness of Jonah's mission at that particular period, when Israel was for the first time coming into contact with Assyria, etc. Those who deny the credibility make much of the miraculous story of the great fish; but this very incident is attested by our Lord's use of it (Matt. xii. 39, xvi. 4; Luke xi. 29). He here, in the most emphatic manner, compares himself with Jonah, whose deglutition by the whale typified his burial. But Christ was greater than Jonah. The latter escaped only from the peril of death: the former overcame death. If this be the right interpretation of our Lord's words, then the miraculous preservation of Jonah gets its significance from the fact that it happened to him as a prophet. The central purport of the book is not that repentance was preached to the heathen, but that the prophet of God must do whatever the Lord commands, that not even death can frustrate his calling, and that the prophet must leave the fulfilment to God. Following the line of these three thoughts, the book details historical facts which were a prophecy of Him in whom the prophetic calling culminated. As for the prophet's prayer (ii. 3-10), we may say, with Luther, that Jonah in the fish's belly did not utter these words with the mouth, in their present form; but he thereby indicates how he felt, and what the thoughts of his heart were while he was engaged in such a fearful contest with death.

It cannot be proved that the prophet left his work in its present form. The abruptness of the record leads us to suppose that it was originally one of a series of similar accounts. An old Haggadah calls Jonah a prophet of Elisha's school, and it is possible that it originated in one of these schools. Opinion has been divided about the date, some putting it as late as the period of the Maccabees. This view is entirely ruled out by the fact of its reception into the prophetic canon, and there can be no doubt that it was written before the Babylonian captivity. Jonah's tomb is still shown near the site of ancient Nineveh.

JONAS, bishop of Orleans 821-844, played an important part in the controversy concerning image-worship. In his work De cultu imaginum he assumes a position intermediate between the rationalistic argumentation of the iconoclast Claudius of Turin, and the superstitious instincts of the multitude. His De institutione laicali has considerable interest for the history of Christian ethics. The former work is found in Bibliotheca Maxima, xiv.: the latter, in D'ACHERY: Spicilegium, i. pp. 258 sqq.; MIGNE, CVI. HAGENBACH.

JONAS, Justus, b. at Nordhausen, June 5, 1493; d. at Eisfeld, Oct. 9, 1555; studied canon law at Erfurt, and took his degree, but devoted himself after 1519 to theology, led to do so by Luther's proceedings in 1517, and encouraged by Erasmus. In 1521 he was appointed provost of Wittenberg, and became one of Luther's principal co-workers and one of his most intimate friends. In 1541 he removed to Halle; but in 1546 he was expelled from that place by Duke Maurice; and, though in 1548 he was allowed to return, he was not allowed to preach, and left again. After participating in the foundation of the university of Jena, he was made court-preacher at Coburg in 1551, and pastor of Eisfeld-on-the-Werra in 1553. His original writings are mostly polemical: De conjugio sacerdotali, 1523; Wiltch die rechte Kirch, etc., 1537. A great number of Luther's and Melancthon's works he translated from Latin into German, or from German into Latin. His friendship with Luther is the most interesting fact concerning Jonas. He was one of the witnesses of Luther's marriage, carried on an intimate correspondence with him for twenty-five years, accompanied him on his last journey to Eisleben and stood at his bedside, and, an hour later, wrote a particular account of his decease to the elector, and finally had the melancholy privilege of preaching the funeral sermon upon the great Reformer, both at Eisleben and Halle. Jonas was rather a fiery character, but enjoyed the fullest confidence of friends and foes. His letters, of great interest for the history of the Reformation, have been collected and edited by GUSTAV KAWERAU, Halle, 1881-85, 2 parts, cf. Corp. Ref. His life was written by REINHARD (Weimar, 1731), KNAPP (Halle, 1814), HASSE, in MEURER: Leben d. Altväter d. Luth. Kirche, 1861. OSWALD SCHMIDT.

JONCOURT, Pierre de, b. at Clermont in the middle of the seventeenth century, was appointed pastor of Middelbourg in 1678, and in 1686 at The Hague, where he died in 1715. In his Entrée sur les différentes méthodes d'expliquer l'Écriture (Amsterdam, 1707) he violently attacked the allegorical method, and happened to use some expressions about Cocceius, who had carried this method to its extreme limits, which the synod of Nimeguen, 1708, compelled him to retract. He also published a revision of the translation of the Psalms by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, Amsterdam, 1716.

JONES, Jeremiah, b. in the north of England, about 1793; minister of a dissenting congregation at Forest Green, Gloucestershire, where he d. 1721. Author of A New and Full Method of settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament, London, 1726-27, 3 vols.; 3d ed., 1827.

JOPPA, sometimes called Japho (Josh. xix. 46), the present Yāfa, or Jaffa, is a very old city, standing on a promontory jutting out into the Mediterranean, thirty-five miles north-west of Jerusalem. Originally a Phœnician colony, it was allotted to the tribe of Dan (Josh. xix. 46); and under the reign of Solomon it became the port of Jerusalem (2 Chron. ii. 16). Jonah started from there (Jon. i. 3). Several times taken and lost by the Maccabees, the city was a Roman possession in the time of the New Testament, when it was the scene of the raising of Tabitha to life by Peter (Acts ix. 36-43), and of Peter's vision on the housetop (Acts x. 11). In the fifth and sixth centuries it was the seat of a bishop. In the period of the Crusades it was several times destroyed. At present it has eighteen thousand inhabitants, and a Greek, a Latin, and an Armenian convent.

JORDAN, The (Hebrew, Yarden, from a root signifying "to descend"), called by the Arabs Esh-Sheriah, rises among the mountains of Anti-Lebanon, from four different sources; descends 1,434 feet, and forms the lake El-Huleh; descends again 897 feet in a course of nine miles, and enters the Sea of Galilee 682½ feet below the Mediterranean; forms the "upper" and the "lower" plain; and finally empties itself into the Dead Sea, 1,292 feet below the Mediterranean, having descended 2,999 feet in a distance of 136 miles. It is mentioned a hundred and eighty times in the Old Testament, the first time in Gen. xiii. 10, where Lot beheld the plain of the Jordan as the garden of the Lord,—and fifteen times in the New Testament,—the first time in Matt. iii. 6, where John baptized the multitudes. As two and a half tribes of Israel were settled on the other side of the Jordan, the river must have been well known to the people. It was frequently crossed and recrossed; as, for instance, by Jacob (Gen. xxxii. 10), by the Israelites when entering the promised land (Josh. iii. 14), by Gideon pursuing Zebah and Zalmunna (Judg. viii. 4), by the Ammonites invading Judah (Judg. x. 9), by Abner (2 Sam. ii. 29), David (2 Sam. xvii. 22, xix. 15), Absalom (2 Sam. xvii. 24), Elijah and Elisha (2 Kings ii. 6-11), etc. The Jordan is not, and never was, a navigable stream. It has, however, been navigated in a boat in modern times by Costigan (1835), Molyneux (1847), Lynch (1848), and McGregor (1869). See art. on PALESTINE.

JORIS, Johann David, one of the most curious characters among the Anabaptist fanatics of the period of the Reformation; was b. at Bruges, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and educated at Delft, where he married in 1524, and settled as a merchant. Having become acquainted with the Reformation, he adopted its ideas; but the ostentatious and expostulating manner in which he professed his faith caused him to be put in the pillory, and expelled from the city, with his tongue pierced by a red-hot iron. While roving about homeless, he fell in with the Anabaptists, was solemnly recognized as the anointed of the Lord by one of their martyrs, received visions and divine revelations, etc. After returning to Delft, he began to form an Anabaptist-Chiliasm-Adamic sect, whose messiah he was. The government tried in vain to stop this nuisance by catching the author. He always escaped, and sometimes in a manner so surprising, that people were led to believe that he could make himself invisible. One of the characteristics of the sect was the absolute confidence which the members put in the head. For this messiah they were willing to sacrifice every thing, even life. Many of them were burnt at the stake, or perished in the dungeon. This confidence Joris used to gather a considerable fortune; and, with his family and his money, he removed, in 1544, to Basel, where he settled, under the name of Johann of Bruges, no one suspecting that the new, rich, and pious citizen had any thing to do with the notorious David Joris, whose pamphlets—peculiar mixtures of unintelligible mysticism and the coarsest sensuality, of which he published half a dozen every year—continued to cause grave disturbances. The truth oozed out, however, after his death (Aug. 25, 1556); and the magistrate of Basel instituted an investigation, after which his body, portrait, and books were burnt by the hangman, in the presence of an immense crowd, and all the survivors of his household were compelled to make public penance, June 6, 1559, in the cathedral. His sect did not die out till more than a century afterwards. See his Life, by NIPROLD, in Zeitschrift f. hist. Theologie, 1863, i., and 1864, iv. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

JORTIN, John, D.D., b. in London, Oct. 23, 1698; d. there Sept. 5, 1770. He was graduated at Cambridge; took holy orders 1724; became archdeacon of London 1764. He was an admired preacher and a learned man. He wrote, Remarks upon Ecclesiastical History, London, 1751-51; reprinted, together with Discourses concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion, 1805, 3 vols.; Life of Erasmus, 1758-60, 3 vols.; reprinted 1808. JOSEPH (יֹסֵף), "may he [God] increase!" was the oldest son of Jacob by Rachel, whom Jacob loved above all his other children. Stirred up by jealousy and hatred, his older brothers sold him, in his seventeenth year, to a caravan of merchants. He was taken to Egypt, where he acted as the faithful servant of a court official, but was falsely accused by his master's wife, who had sought in vain to seduce him, and was thrown into prison. He secured his release by the happy use of the gift of interpreting dreams, and more especially the dream of Pharaoh (Gen. xli.). He was elevated to the most dignified position in the kingdom next to the throne, and developed a rare statesmanship in the measures he pursued, during the seven years of plenty, to prepare for the years of dearth. The famine of seven years was the occasion for Joseph's brothers coming down to Egypt. Joseph recognized them, and ultimately gave them and his father Jacob a cordial reception. He received a double blessing at his father's death, and extracted the promise from his brethren, that, at the return of the Israelites to Canaan, they would take his bones with them. The promise was kept, and the remains were buried at Shechem (Exod. xiii. 19; Josh. xxiv. 32).

Joseph's character justified Jacob's warm affection. He displayed throughout his entire life a profound fear of God and the marked influence of the divine Spirit. He won all hearts. As a statesman, he developed an exceedingly comprehensive, wise, and energetic activity, but always remained true to his own people. In his life divine providences are very prominent. God's wisdom used and overruled the base projects of men (Gen. i. 20). Joseph's sale was the occasion of the transplanting of Israel to Egypt, the best administered state of the ancient world. God did not send them in vain to that school, where they adopted much of its better culture, and likewise suffered the enmity of the world, that they might be taught the saving deeds of Jehovah.

The references to Egyptian customs and manners are of great importance in their bearing upon the authenticity of the story of Joseph's life. There was a time when scholars (von Bohlen, Knobel, etc.) adduced many contradictions to Egyptian customs; but the researches of modern Egyptologists (Ebers, Brugsch, etc.) have confirmed in a remarkable manner the notices of Genesis. Commerce by caravans has been carried on between Syria and Palestine and Egypt from time immemorial; and the three species mentioned in Gen xxxvii. 25 have always been amongst the principal objects of commerce. The name Potiphar ("dedicated to Phra," or Ra, the god of the sun) is a real Egyptian name. Great stress was laid upon dreams in Egypt. The title "chief of the bakers" (Gen. xl. 2) has been found on monuments by Ebers. Wine, the use of which at this time in Egypt has been denied, has been proved to have been in use; and a baker carrying a board with loaves of bread on his head has been discovered on the monuments. Even the title "father to Pharaoh" (Gen. xlv. 8) has been found in several places on the rolls, in the sense of counsellor, or minister. These, and many other details, have been abundantly corroborated; and the impression cannot well be avoided which Ebers embodies in the following words: "The whole history of Joseph must be declared, even in its details, to correspond throughout with the real state of affairs in ancient Egypt."

The chronological question is more difficult of satisfactory solution. Did Joseph's administration occur under the Hyksos kings, or later? We hold to the former view; and taking four hundred and thirty years (Exod. xii. 40) as the period of bondage, and regarding Rameses II. as the Pharaoh of the oppression, we are led back to the Hyksos dynasty, and perhaps to King Apopi, whom G. Syncellus also identified with the Pharaoh of Joseph. Brugsch justly lays stress upon the fact that a famine occurred about the time of his reign. It is to the destruction of the monuments of the Hyksos kings by a later dynasty that the absence of all records of Joseph and his family is due. The Mohammedans linger with peculiar delight over the story of Joseph's life, which Mohammed called the prettiest of all stories.

JOSEPH II. (Roman emperor 1780-90) introduced into his hereditary Austrian possessions a series of ecclesiastical reforms, which, in many respects, remind one of those established in England by Henry VIII. Though touching the Church at very different points, — worship, inner organization, education of officers, relation to the State, etc., — they all point in the same direction, and reveal a common tendency, which, in church history, has received the name of "Josephinism."

It was evidently the emperor's object to form a national Austrian Church, congruent with the territory of the State, closely connected with the strongly centralized, secular government, and as far as possible independent of Rome. As, on many points along the boundaries, Austrian dominions ranged under the authority of foreign bishops, a new circumscription of the dioceses was necessary; and it was carried out with very little ceremony. A new oath of subjection to the temporal ruler was demanded of the bishops. All imperial decrees were sent to the bishops, and again by them to the pastors, who had to make them known to their flocks from the pulpit. Papal bulls and briefs, on the contrary, whether referring to dogmatics or jurisdiction, could not be published in the country without an imperial placet. Petitions to Rome for indulgences, for the establishment of new festivals, etc., were absolutely forbidden; and all rights of absolution or dispensation were vested in the bishops. The oath of obedience to the Pope, and the professio fidei Tridentina, usual at the distribution of degrees, were abrogated. The bulls In cæna Domini and Unigenitus were torn out of the books of liturgy. All relations were broken off between the religious orders and their brethren in foreign countries, or even their generals, unless resident in Austria. The theological students were forbidden to visit the Collegium Germanico-Hungaricum in Rome, which institution was replaced by a Collegium Germanicum et Hungaricum in Pavia. The philological and theological schools in the monasteries were closed, and diocesan seminaries were opened under the superintendence of an imperial committee, etc.

No less comprehensive, and evincing the same character, were the reforms relating to the internal life of the Church. The Latin language was abolished, and the German introduced into the services. Pilgrimages outside of the country were forbidden. Rules were given with respect to the luxuriant ornamentation of the churches, the magnificent processions, the brilliant illuminations, etc. All religious orders not engaged in preaching, teaching, or nursing the sick, were dissolved. Between 1780 and 1786 the number of monasteries sank from 2,136 to 1,125, and that of monks and nuns from 64,800 to 44,280. An edict of Oct. 13, 1781, established religious toleration. The evangelical churches obtained a limited freedom of worship. Civil disqualifications arising from denominational differences were abolished. Even the position of the Jews was improved. The Roman curia became, of course, very alarmed at these proceedings; and in 1782 Pius VI. determined to go himself to Vienna, and pay the emperor a visit. But he was received with cold politeness, and returned, after a month's stay, humiliated and in despair. The early death of the emperor, however, prevented his reforms from taking root; and during his immediate successors much was again reversed. JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA, a rich and pious Jew, who accorded burial to the body of Jesus in a tomb of his own. He was probably a member of the Sanhedrin (Luke xxiii. 50), and refused his consent to the sentence of Jesus to death. All the four evangelists (Matt. xxvii. 57-60; Mark xv. 43-46; Luke xxiii. 50-54; John xix. 38-42) refer to the part he took in the burial of Jesus. He asked the body of Pilate, and, in conjunction with Nicodemus, wound it in linen clothes, with spices, and deposited it in a rock-hewn tomb, in a garden, which had never been used. A wholly untrustworthy tradition makes him the apostle of England; and guides still show a thorn-bush at Glastonbury which purports to have sprung from a staff he stuck in the ground. See GRAAL.

JOSEPHINISM. See JOSEPH II.

JOSEPHUS, Flavius, b. in Jerusalem 37 or 38 A.D.; belonged to a rich and distinguished family; received a careful education, and joined, after living three years with a hermit, Banus, the sect of the Pharisees, when he was nineteen years old. In 64 he made a journey to Rome in order to effect the release of some Jewish priests who had been imprisoned; and through the instrumentality of Alitryus, a Jewish actor, he obtained access to the Empress Poppæa, and successfully fulfilled the mission. Shortly after his return to Palestine, the Jewish revolt against the Romans broke out (66). Like most of the wealthy men among the Jews, he was opposed to the revolt; but he was compelled to participate in it, and was chosen governor of Galilee. Besieged in the fortress of Jotapata by the army of Vespasian, he surrendered, after the lapse of a month and a half, and was taken prisoner; but when, two years later on (69), Vespasian was proclaimed emperor by the Syrian and Egyptian legions, he not only obtained his liberty, but accompanied the emperor to Alexandria, and received dotations and an annual pension. Living in Rome, he devoted himself to studies and literary pursuits, continuing to enjoy the imperial favor as long as the Flavian dynasty reigned. During the reign of Trajan he died, but the exact date of his death is not known. See HOËVELL: Commentatio de F. J. vita, Traj.-ad-Rh., 1835; TERWOGT: Het leven van den joodschen geschiedschrijver, F. J., Utrecht, 1863; BAERWALD: Josephus in Galilæa, Breslau, 1877.

Josephus wrote in Greek. I. His first work, however, History of the Jewish War, was originally written in Aramaic, but translated into Greek by the author himself. It was sent to Vespasian, Titus, Agrippa II., and other distinguished persons, and received many compliments. It is written with care; and, though it bears the marks of the taste of the time in its fictitious speeches and other rhetorical ornaments, it is generally trustworthy. Less careful is II., his Jewish Antiquities, finished in 93 or 94, and containing a history of the Jews from the beginning to 66. For the biblical part, the Bible is, of course, the principal authority of the author, though he does not hesitate to modify details which he fears might give offence. He also incorporates various elements of traditions, and extracts from earlier Greek treatments of Jewish history (Demetrius and Artapanus). Concerning his whole method of treating biblical history, and more especially his method of using the Septuagint and the original text, see ERNESTI: Exercitat. Flav., in Opuscul.; SPITTLER: De usu versionis Alexandrinæ apud Josephum, Göttingen, 1779; SCHARFENBERG: De Josephi et versionis Alexandrinæ consensu, Leipzig, 1780; BURGER: Essai sur l'usage que F. J. a fait des livres canoniques de l'A. T., Strassburg, 1836; GERLACH: Die Weissagungen d. A. T. in den Schriften d. F. J., 1863; DUSCHAK: J. F. und die Tradition, Vienna, 1864; PLAUT: F. J. und die Bibel, Berlin, 1867; TACHAUER: Das Verhältniss d. F. J. zur Bibel und zur Tradition, Erlangen, 1871. The post-biblical part is treated with great unevenness. The period between Alexander the Great and the Maccabees is nearly a blank, only filled out by a lengthy extract from Pseudo-Aristeus. For the history of the Maccabees the author had an excellent authority in the First Book of the Maccabees, but he has not taken great pains in utilizing it. The later history of the Asmoneans and of Herod is extracted from Strabo and Nicholas of Damascus. The relations of the Jews to foreign nations form the principal part of the narrative, and the representation of the inner history of the people has a rather legendary character. See NUSSBAUM: Observationes in Flavii Josephi Antiquitates, Göttingen, 1875; BLOCH: Die Quellen d. F. J. in seiner Archäologie, Leipzig, 1879. The eighteenth book of the work contains (3, 3) a short report of Christ, in which the author openly confesses that he believes in Jesus as the Messiah; but, though this famous testimony has been quoted by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. i. 11), it is evidently spurious. See EICHSTAEDT: Flavianii testimonii authenticia, Jena, 1841; Question. super F., Jena, 1845; GERLACH: Die Weissagungen d. A. T. in den Schriften d. F. J., Berlin, 1863.

A curious work is III., his so-called Autobiography, written after the death of Agrippa II.; that is, after 100. It is not so much a biography as a plea for his activity in Galilee in the winter of 66-67, or a polemic against Justus of Tiberias. The latter had written a work in which he represented himself as the decided opponent of the rebellion, and Josephus as the true instigator of it. Of course, the former revolutionary leader, now living as a pensioner at the imperial court, could not let such an accusation pass by unnoticed. But Josephus seems to have become very much excited, and his book swarms with patent perversions of facts. IV. Quite otherwise with his apology of Judaism, generally known under the title Contra Apionem. It is a careful and conscientious work. See the monographs by ZIPSER (Vienna, 1871) and J. G. MÜLLER (Basel, 1877), the latter containing both the text and explanations. Besides these four works, about whose authenticity there can be no doubt, the so-called Fourth Book of the Maccabees is ascribed to Josephus, but by a mistake. See the monograph by FREDENTHAL, Breslau, 1869. Another book, Περὶ τοῦ παντός ("On the all"), is quoted by Photius. John Philoponus, John Damascenus, and John Zonaras, as a work of Josephus; but it probably belongs to Hippolytus.

The first printed edition of Josephus's works, by FROBENIUS and EPISCOPIUS, appeared at Basel, 1544. Much improved texts were published by HUDSON (Oxford, 1720) and HAVERCAMP (Amsterdam, 1726). More recent editions have been published by OBERTHÜR (Leipzig, 1782-85), RICHTER (Leipzig, 1826-27), DINDORF (Paris, 1845-47), BEKKER (pocket edition, Leipzig, 1855-56), best by B. NIESE (Berlin, 1885 sq.). The Jewish War, ed. by CARDWELL, Oxford, 1837; and the Vita, ed. by HENKE, Brunswick, 1786. Several English translations have appeared: the most commonly known is that by WHISTON, London, 1737 (many editions). The Jewish War was translated by R. TRAILL, London, 1862. JOSH'UA (יְהוֹשֻׁעַ, "God, his help"), a brave and God-fearing Hebrew warrior of the tribe of Ephraim, who led the armies of Israel across the Jordan, conquered the promised land, and distributed the territory among the tribes. He was neither a prophet nor law-giver, like Moses, but completed the work which he had begun, of turning a people of slaves into a nation with a country. The Lord appeared to him appropriately in the form of a soldier with drawn sword (Josh. v. 13). Joshua makes his first appearance in the battle of the Amalekites, when he routed the enemy (Exod. xvii. 9). We next find him among the twelve spies sent to spy out the land (Num. xiii. 8, 16). It was at this time that Moses changed his name from Oshea ("help") to Joshua, which, in King James's version, is written in two places Jesus (Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8). He was consecrated by Moses as his successor just before the close of the wilderness period (Num. xxvii. 18; Dent. xxxiv. 9).

The second period of Joshua's career began at the death of the great law-giver, which marked the termination of the wanderings in the wilderness. With the freshness of spring life the people prepared, under their new leader, to fight for the possession of the land promised to Abraham. Joshua seems at first to have hesitated, but, once fully assured of the divine command and aid (Josh. i. 5, 9), displayed great energy in preparing for the campaign, and skill and intrepidity in prosecuting it. Circumspect and careful in his precautions, as in the despatch of the spies (ii.), he was no less bold in conception, and rapid in his movements (x. 9, xi. 7, etc.). The undertaking was no easy one. The Canaanites were at this time in their most flourishing period (Ewald, ii. 340). The kings were bound together by treaties, the land protected by fortresses and walled towns, and the armies provided with horses and chariots. But Joshua was backed by a people enthusiastic to enter into the land which they regarded as their own, and who fully recognized their leader's authority (Josh. i. 16).

The Jordan being crossed, Joshua took up a position at Gilgal. From there he fell upon Jericho, after which, with the single exception of the repulse at Ai, he swept over the land in an unbroken succession of victories, spreading consternation among all the tribes (ii. 9, 24, etc.). The battle of Gibeon, or Beth-horon, was the decisive one. So great was the victory, that Jehovah is described as having fought on the side of Israel (x. 12-15); and, with poetic license, the Book of Jasher boldly represents the Almighty as halting the sun in its course over Gibeon, and the moon over Ajalon. The kings gathered for a last resistance at Merom (xi.), but were utterly routed. During the war, which lasted five or six years, thirty-one kings had been slain, and six nations overthrown (xii. 24); and, if the land was by no means all subdued, enough had been conquered to insure to the Israelites safety of possession.

The third period of Joshua's career extends from the close of the war till his death. In the delicate work of distributing the territory among the tribes, he seems to have been no less discreet and successful than he had been brave and victorious on the battle-field. He acted in accord with Eleazar (xvii. 4, xxi. 1), and, with characteristic modesty, was himself content with a small portion (xix. 49, 50).

Like some modern soldiers, as Gustav Adolf, Cromwell, and Havelock, Joshua did not allow the confusion of the camp to interrupt the exercises of religion. He was a God-fearing commander, who made prayer and renewed consecration a preparation for battle and danger (iii. 5, etc), regarded the observance of the law as a condition of divine favor (xxiii. 6), and built altars in commemoration of the divine guidance and victories (iv. 6, 7, viii. 30, xviii. 1, etc.). He was a devout hero, who combined mildness with strength, and composure with daring. His closing words to the congregated elders and people (xxiii, xxiv.) contained no self-laudation, but directed their thoughts to the divine Helper, and urged them to cleave to Him, and keep the law (xxiii. 8). He died at the age of one hundred and ten. Joshua is a type of the greater Joshua (Jesus), the Captain of our salvation, who leads his people into the rest of the heavenly Canaan (Heb. iv. 8, 9).

No records exist for Joshua's life outside of the Bible, except one. Procopius, who flourished in the sixth century, relates that a Phœnician inscription existed in Tingis, Mauritania, with the words, "We are they who fled from the face of Joshua the robber, the son of Num." Rawlinson accepts it as genuine (Bampton Lect., 91); but Ewald gives reasons for denying its genuineness in the second volume of his History.

The dates of Joshua's life may be assigned with comparative certainty. From Josh. xiv. 7-10 we learn that Caleb was forty at the time he was sent out as a spy, or thirty-eight at the time of the departure from Egypt, and eighty-five when Hebron was assigned to him. As the wilderness period lasted forty years, he was seventy-eight or seventy-nine at the time of the crossing of Jordan. This would give five or six years for the duration of the war. Supposing that Joshua was about the same age as Caleb, and regarding 1490 as the date of the exodus, then he crossed the Jordan (1450) at the age of seventy-eight, and concluded the war (1415) at the age of eighty-three. This would leave twenty-seven years until his death at one hundred and ten,—a period corresponding well to what is called a "long time" in Josh. xxiii. 1. See the Histories of Israel by EWALD, STANLEY, etc., and, for his typical significance, PEARSON: On the Creed (art. ii.).

JOSHUA, Book of, so called because he was the hero of it, begins the list of those historical books in the Old Testament (Josh.—2 Kings) which relate to the time between the death of Moses and the exaltation of King Jehoiachin at the court of Babylon, and which are put together in the Hebrew canon under the title Former Prophets. It falls naturally into three parts. 1 (purely historical). The history of the conquest of Israel (chaps. i.—xii.). 2 (geographical and legislative). The partition of the country among the tribes (chaps. xiii.—xxi.). 3 (historical). The dismissal of the transjordanic tribes, Joshua's exhortation to the assembled tribes, their renewal of the covenant, deaths of Joshua and Eleazar (chaps. xxii.—xxiv.). Joshua is by modern critics declared of composite origin, because the same peculiarity in the use of two names for the Divine Being (Jehovah and Elohim), which occurs in the Pentateuch, is found in it, and is considered to prove difference of authorship between the portions in which one or the other is uniformly used, and also the literary unity of Joshua with the Pentateuch, of which it is indeed a veritable and avowed continuation, or the existence of a Hexateuch, as the sixfold book is called. The writers were probably contemporaries, or else had access to contemporary documents; for the narrative is fresh and vivid, and the information throughout is that most likely to proceed from eye-witnesses. The very defects of the book in its geographical portion—e.g., no lists of the towns of Ephraim and Manasseh, imperfect lists for Zebulon and Asher—indicate the composition of these sections before the final settlement of the country. On the other hand, accounts of events which took place after Joshua's death, as the capture of Hebron by Caleb, of Debir by Othniel (xv. 13-20), and of Leshem by the Danites (xix. 47); such phrases as that the Jebusites "dwelt with the children of Judah at Jerusalem" (xv. 63), and the oft-repeated "unto this day" (e.g., iv. 9, v. 9); the mention of Rahab as still living when the author wrote (vi. 25); and other literary phenomena,—seem to show that the book, as a whole, is later than Joshua. That Joshua himself furnished materials for it is probable: indeed, he may have written large portions of it. But, although our present book bears traces of more than one hand in its materials, it has been unified and revised by some unknown editor; so that, as it comes before us to-day, it is a consistent narrative.

The two difficulties often urged against the book, on the score of science and of morals, are of little importance. The first relates to the sun standing still upon Gibeon (x. 13). But this passage is avowedly poetical, and no such violent change in the universe as the supposed miracle would involve was dreamed of by the writer, who merely incorporated in his narrative a few lines from a justly celebrated historical poem. The second difficulty relates to the extermination of the Canaanites. It is sufficient to say, that the hopeless corruption of the Canaanites, and the religious interests of Israel and of humanity, demanded it. And as much of the later trouble of Israel came from their disobedience in stopping before the conquest was really concluded, and in allowing the idolatrous and licentious Canaanites to remain in any portion of the promised land, the wisdom of the divine command is manifest. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Besides, the Israelites under Joshua were hardy warriors, and carnage to their eyes was not shocking, and they rightly considered the Canaanites as foes to Jehovah, and unworthy to live.

JOSHUA, Spurious Book of, a compilation made among the Samaritans, but not recognized by them. It relates the history of Joshua, with numerous departures from the Hebrew text, mere Samaritan fables, and continues the Jewish history down to Alexander Severus. The only manuscript copy of it in existence belonged to Jos. Scaliger, and is now in the Leyden Library. It was reprinted by T. G. J. JUNYBOLL: Liber Josue Chronicum Samaritanum, Lud. Batav. [Leyden], 1848. It is written in Arabic in Samaritan characters. Another reproduction of Joshua's history is the Samaritan Chronicle of Abul Phetach. See ABULFATHI Annales Samaritani, edited by Ed. Vilmar, Gotha, 1866 (with Latin translation).

JOSIAH (whom Jehovah heals), king of Judah, son and successor of the murdered Amon; was put on the throne, at the age of eight years, by the people, who frustrated the designs of his father's murderers, and reigned thirty-one years (B.C. 641-609). The account of his reign is given in 2 Kings xxii.—xxiii. 30, 2 Chron. xxxiv.—xxxv. Nothing is told us, however, about the early history of the king, nor of the influences under which he grew up. The narrative in Kings begins with his repair of the temple in the eighteenth year of his reign; and that in Chronicles, with the beginning of his destruction of idolatry in the twelfth. But that these acts were not the first evidences of his pious character, which made him one of the best of Judah's kings, is manifest from the high praise of 2 Kings xxii. 2, xxiii. 25. The great event in his reign occurred in his eighteenth year, referred to above. During the repairs, which apparently had not been made since Jehoiada's day (2 Kings xii. 11 sq.), the book of the law was found in the house of the Lord by Hilkiah the priest. Hilkiah gave it to Shaphan the scribe, who read it before the king. (The "book" was probably Deuteronomy: if it was the whole Pentateuch, then it must have taken at least ten hours to read it through aloud.) The king was so much terrified by the "book," that he rent his clothes, and immediately sent Shaphan and three others to Huldah the prophetess to learn the will of the Lord. She replied, that the Lord intended to punish the people for their long-continued disobedience, according to the warnings of the book; but, in consequence of Josiah's ready and sincere humiliation, the strokes were to be delayed until after his death. The king gathered together all the elders of Judah and Jerusalem, the priests and the prophets, and all the people, and read to them the "book of the law," and with them entered into a solemn covenant to keep all its words. Then began a vigorous cleansing of the city and the land of all traces of idolatry (2 Kings xxiii. 4-19). The "high places" (see art.) were also destroyed from Geba to Beer-sheba; i. e., from the northern to the southern boundary of the land of Israel. The reference to the high places at the gate of Joshua, "which were on a man's left hand at the gate of the city" (xxiii. 8), shows that this is the recital of an eye-witness. Josiah's destruction of Jeroboam's altar at Bethel was a fulfilment of prophecy (cf. 1 Kings xiii. 2). The great work of purification ended, the king returned to Jerusalem, and celebrated the passover so exactly according to the "book," that the sacred historian says, "Surely there was not holden such a passover from the days of the judges that judged Israel, nor in all the days of the kings of Israel, nor of the kings of Judah" (xxiii. 22). So Josiah's passover exceeded Hezekiah's in pomp and solemnity (cf. 2 Chron. xxx.). Some suppose that the reason of the remark quoted was twofold, — the union of all the celebrants in one place, and the joint offering of sheep and bullocks, according to the requisition of Deut. xvi. 2, 5; cf. Exod. xii. Upon the last point 2 Chron. xxxv. 7 sqq. seems to lay particular weight.

Josiah lost his life in battle. Judah may have been at this time tributary to Assyria, or Josiah may have asserted his power over all Israel, as would seem indicated by his journey through the former northern kingdom to destroy idolatry, and therefore would repel any invader; but at all events, when Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt, entered Judea on his way to Assyria, Josiah gave him battle at Megiddo, and was so sorely wounded that he died in Jerusalem. His death was the occasion for an outburst of popular grief so great as to become proverbial (Zech. xii. 11). Jeremiah wrote an elegy over him (2 Chron. xxxv. 25).

The newness to Josiah of the book of the law found in the temple is no proof of its recent origin, as some claim; much less that it was the product of a "pious fraud," and palmed off upon the king as a genuine work of Moses. Rather was it probably a genuine temple copy of a portion of the Pentateuch, most likely of Deuteronomy, which in those days of idolatry, and ignorance of the Jehovah worship, had been mislaid and forgotten. It need occasion no surprise that the king heard it with astonishment.

Even he may well have been little instructed in religion.

During his reign a nomadic horde of Scythians overran Asia (Herod., l. 104-106), of which no mention is made in the Bible, although we know they must have crossed near the lower portion of Judah. Jeremiah and Zephaniah were the prophets of Josiah's reign.

JOST, Isaac Marcus, b. at Bernburg, Feb. 22, 1793; d. at Francfort-on-the-Main, Nov. 20, 1860; was educated in a Jewish orphan-asylum at Wolfenbüttel; studied at Göttingen and Berlin; and was director of a Jewish school, first at Berlin, afterwards at Francfort-on-the-Main. He was a prolific writer; but his principal work is his Geschichte der Israeliten (1820-28, 9 vols.), of which a continuation, a tenth volume, appeared 1846-47.

JO'THAM (Jehovah is upright). — 1. The youngest son of Gideon, and the only one of his family who escaped the massacre of Abimelech, at Ophrah. He is chiefly remembered for his famous parable of the trees, by which he rebuked the Shechemites for their treachery. After he had delivered his warning, he disappeared from history. (See Judg. ix. 5-21.) — 2. The son and successor of Uzziah, or Azariah, king of Judah (2 Kings xv. 32-38). The date and length of his reign cannot be exactly determined. It was, however, prosperous; and he showed his piety by building, or rebuilding, "the higher gate" of the temple (2 Kings xv. 35), called in Jer. xx. 2 the "Benjamin Gate," and described by Ezek. viii. 3 as the gate towards the north, near the great altar; and the chronicler (2 Chron. xxvii. 3, 4) relates, that, "on the wall of Ophel he built much. Moreover, he built cities in the mountains of Judah, and in the forests he built castles and towers." He led a successful campaign against the Ammonites (2 Chron. xxvii. 5). Isaiah prophesied under him. KAUTZSCH.

JOVIANUS, Flavius Claudius, was commander of the imperial life-guard when Julian died (June 27, 363), and was proclaimed emperor by the army the following day. He was a kind and prudent man, but neither a great mind nor a perfectly pure character. A Christian himself, he immediately cancelled the laws of Julian against Christianity, revived the monogram of Christ on the imperial standards, and restored to the Christian clergy their privileges and revenues. But at the same time he showed perfect toleration with respect to Paganism, defended the Neo-Platonic philosophers against Christian fanatics, re-opened those temples which had been shut on the death of Julian, etc. He was a decided adherent of Athanasius, and invited him to Antioch to confer with him; but he showed himself perfectly impartial in his dealings with the Arians. He might have exercised a beneficial influence on the turbulent development of the Church; but he died suddenly, after a reign of only eight months, at Dadastana, on the road from Antioch to Constantinople, Feb. 17, 364. See DE LA BLETERIE: Histoire de l'empereur Jovien, Amsterdam, 1710. WAGENMANN.

JOVINIAN, a Roman monk and "heretic," from the second half of the fourth century; d. probably before 406. Of his life very little is known. About 388 he lived in Rome, dressed poorly, went barefoot, ate nothing but bread and water, and remained unmarried. He knew the Scriptures well, and wrote several pamphlets which attracted attention. His "heresy" consisted principally in his opposition to the ascetic tendencies then reigning. Between virginity, widowhood, and the married state, there is no moral difference, he said: between abstinence from food, and eating it properly, there is no difference. He especially protested against the establishment of a scale of virtue and a corresponding scale of blessedness, asserting that the divine element in human life is one and the same under all external circumstances; that all who are baptized to Christ, and born anew, have morally the same calling, the same dignity, the same grace, and the same blessedness. How deep an impression he made may be inferred from the fact, that in 390 Pope Siricius found it necessary to convene a synod in Rome, and have him condemned. This decision was communicated to other bishops, more especially to Ambrosius of Milan, in whose diocese Jovinian and his adherents had sought refuge; and in 395 Ambrosius convened a synod in Milan, where the condemnation was repeated. Augustine wrote against Jovinian (Hæres., 82; De Bono Conjugali; De Virginitate), especially against his denial of the perpetua virginitas Mariæ, and his doctrine of the equality of all sins. But it is more specially Jerome's Adversus Jovinianum which throws light on this whole subject, though it is written with so much acrimony that it cannot be used without great caution. By modern church-historians — Flavius, Basnage, Mosheim, Walch, Neander, Baur, and others — Jovinian has generally been recognized as a representative of the true principle of Protestantism. See G. B. LINDNER: De Joviniano et Vigilantio, Leipzig, 1840. WAGENMANN.

JUBILEE, Year of, among the Hebrews. See SABBATICAL YEAR.

JUBILEE, or JUBILEE YEAR, one of the meanest institutions of the Roman-Catholic Church; has no connection whatever, either historically or typically, with the jubilee-year of the Old Testament. It originated incidentally. In the last days of 1299 a rumor sprang up in Rome that every one who visited the Church of St. Peter on Jan. 1, 1300, would receive full absolution. As, in consequence of this rumor, immense crowds thronged the church on that day, — not only citizens of Rome, but also foreign pilgrims, — the attention of the Pope was aroused, and investigations were made in the papal archives concerning any probable foundation for the rumor. Nothing was found. Nevertheless, when an old peasant of one hundred and seven years told the Pope, that, one hundred years ago, his father had gone to Rome to obtain the jubilee absolution, and that an indulgence valid for a whole century was to be had in Rome at any day during that year, Boniface VIII. issued a bull (April 22, 1300) inviting all to come to Rome and receive absolution. The influx of pilgrims was enormous, swelling the power of the Pope and the pockets of the citizens. In 1343 the latter petitioned Clement VI. to shorten the term between each two jubilees, and celebrate the festival every fiftieth year. The Pope was merciful, and granted the petition. Other popes were still more merciful. Urban VI.

shortened the term to thirty-three years, April 8, 1389; Paul II., to twenty-five years, 1470. It was even determined that a pilgrimage to Rome should not be necessary in order to obtain the jubilee indulgence: it could be had in the nearest church by paying a sum of money equal to the expenses of the pilgrimage. After the Reformation, however, the institution lost its dignity, even in the eyes of the Roman Catholics themselves. Nevertheless it has not been abrogated. G. PLITT.

JUD (pronounced Yude), Leo (Latin, Leo Judæ), in every-day life called Meister Leu, which name his descendants adopted; b. at Genar in Alsace, 1482; d. at Zürich, June 19, 1542; studied at Basel, 1499-1506 (first medicine, afterwards, on the instance of Zwingli, theology), and was appointed pastor of Einsiedeln in 1518, and of the Church of St. Peter in Zürich in 1522. He was an intimate friend of Zwingli, and his true and steady assistant in the carrying-out of the Reformation in Zürich. In literary respects he was mostly active as translator. Of the so-called Zürich Bible he did the Old Testament. He also translated the New Testament into Latin. His Life was written by C. PESTALOZZI, Elberfeld, 1860. His was the German Bible used by Coverdale. See WESTCOTT'S History of the English Bible, pp. 213, 214.

JUDÆA was the name given to the lowermost of the three divisions of the Holy Land in the Saviour's time. It lay south of Samaria, and west of the Jordan. It was occupied, after the exile, by the captives from Assyria and Babylonia, but was made a portion of the Roman province of Syria A.D. 6, after Archelaus was deposed, and was ruled by a procurator under the governor of Syria, and whose residence was in Cæsarea, not in Jerusalem. The word first occurs in Dan. v. 13 (A. V., "Jewry"); and the "province" of Judæa is first mentioned in Ez. v. 8, and alluded to in Neh. xi. 3 (Hebrew and A. V., "Judah"). In the Apocrypha, Judæa and "country of Judæa" frequently occur. In New-Testament times the term was loosely used to include the transjordanic provinces (Matt. xix. 1, etc.).

The hill country of Judæa (Luke i. 65) was the central ridge of mountains stretching from north to south through Palestine.

The wilderness of Judæa is a wild, desolate, uninhabited region, extending from the hill country, near Jerusalem, south-east to the Dead Sea, with an average width of fifteen miles (Matt. iii. 1). Here John preached, and our Lord was tempted.

JU'DAH (praise; Greek form, Judas), a common name among the later Jews, particularly the Levites. Judah, the son of Jacob and Leah, although in age the fourth, virtually supplanted Reuben, the first-born, and enjoyed the respect of all his brothers by his energy of character. It was he who advised the selling of Joseph to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 26, 27), and who became surety for Benjamin (xliv. 9), and made that touching speech before Joseph (xlv. 18-34). In the matter of Tamar (xxxviii.) he does not appear in a favorable light; but even then his sense of justice and his inherent nobility came out. These traits characterized his descendants; and the prophecy of Jacob was fulfilled according to which the right of primogeniture was given to him by his brethren, and he held the sceptre until Shiloh came (xlix. 8-12).

JU'DAS, one of the twelve apostles, carefully distinguished by the evangelists from Judas Iscariot; called also Lebbæus and Thaddæus (Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 16; John xiv. 22; Acts i. 13). His surnames Lebbæus and Thaddæus mean the same thing. The first comes from לב ("heart"), and the second from תר ("a mother's breast"); hence they mean beloved child. We know nothing about his history before or after his connection with Jesus. Tradition is also late and contradictory. According to Abdias he preached and was martyred in Persia: according to Nicephorus, he died naturally at Edessa, after laboring for a period in Palestine, Syria, and Arabia. The Syrian Church first distinguishes him from Thaddæus the missionary of Syria, then confounds him with the latter, and puts his martyrdom in Phœnicia.

SIEFFERT.

JU'DAS ISCARIOT, one of the twelve disciples, and the betrayer of Jesus; was the son of a certain Simon. The name Iscariot, it is now generally agreed, is a derivative of Kerioth, a town in the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 25). If it be true that this was the native place of Judas, then he was the solitary Judæan among the disciples, who otherwise were from Galilee. The references to Judas in the New Testament are as follows: (1) Mention of his name in the list of the disciples (Matt. x. 4; Mark iii. 19; Luke vi. 16); (2) Occasional allusions (John vi. 64, 70, 71, xii. 4 sq., xvii. 12); (3) History of the betrayal (Matt. xxvi. 14-16, 21-25, 46-50; Mark xiv. 10, 11, 18-21, 42-46; Luke xxii. 3-6, 21-23, 47 sq.; John xiii. 2-11, 18 sq., 21-30, xviii. 2-9); (4) Account of his death (Matt. xxvii. 3-10; Acts i. 16-25). The name of Judas is always mentioned last in the lists of the disciples, and probably with reference to the infamy, which, ever after his betrayal, rested on his name. Matthew and Mark add after the name the defining clause, "who also betrayed him:" and Luke, "who was the traitor." John also adds the same information when he mentions his name; and, in the high priestly prayer of our Lord, Judas is called the "son of perdition" (John xvii. 12). The few notices which John gives of his career as a disciple previous to the events of the last night of Christ's life represent him as the treasurer of the Twelve, who carried the bag, and probably dispensed their charities, and purchased their provisions. He is also described as having been displeased with the self-sacrificing act of Mary, who poured the contents of the box of nard upon Christ's head, on the ground that it was a useless waste, and that the money it would have brought might do good to the poor. John represents this as the hypocritical plea of a "thief" (xii. 6) who had no sympathy with the poor.

Judas' treachery was the first act directly leading to the crucifixion of the Son of man. He was present at the Last Supper, partook, at least in part, of the sacred meal, and, with the rest of the disciples, his feet were washed by the descendension of the Lord. While the disciples were still at the table, Jesus announced that one of them should betray him; and, recognizing the one who was to do the act, he bade the traitor consummate his work with despatch, — an injunction which the rest of the company did not understand at the time (John xiii. 27). Some time before this, Judas had entered into a conspiracy with the Jewish authorities, who promised to pay him thirty pieces of silver for delivering Christ up into their hands. Going out from the upper chamber into the night (John xiii. 30), he consummated his treachery, and, returning with a band of soldiers, found Christ in the garden, and pointed him out. The synoptists in the account of this event agree in all the details. John's narrative presents an apparent divergence. According to the synoptists, Judas, stepping forward, gave the Master a kiss, which, by arrangement, was a signal for the band. Jesus then replied to the traitor, "Friend, do that for which thou art come" (Matt. xxvi. 50). According to John, Jesus was not recognized at first, but, on the approach of the soldiers, asked them who they were seeking, and, after their amazement, repeated the question. It must not be forgotten, in reading the accounts, that it was night. It is inherently probable that Jesus first addressed the soldiers, and that Judas, whom we are to conceive of as having at first not seen him, then went forward and kissed him. The manner of Judas' death is related by Matthew, whose account is supplemented by the references of Peter in his address after the ascension (Acts i. 16-25). Disappointed, perhaps, with the ultimate issue of his deed, and remorseful at having been the cause of Christ's death, he threw his ill-gotten silver upon the floor of the temple, went forth and hanged himself. It was probably at the edge of a precipice; and falling headlong, as Peter adds, his body was broken asunder. Dr. Hackett discovered a spot which seemed to him to be the probable scene of this tragedy (Commentary on Acts, Notes on i. 18), and satisfied the details of both accounts. A ragged, weather-beaten, forlorn-looking tree near Jerusalem is called the Judas tree, and is pointed out to the traveller as the one from which the disciple committed suicide.

Two questions force themselves upon the attention in the study of the character of Judas: What was Christ's purpose in admitting him to the number of the twelve disciples? and what motives had Judas in betraying Christ?

I. THE ADMISSION OF JUDAS TO THE COMPANY OF THE DISCIPLES. — The difficulty of arriving at satisfactory results in the discussion of this question arises from the theanthropic personality of Christ, and the meeting in him of a divine and human knowledge. Different theories have been urged to account for Christ's admission of Judas. (1) Christ made the choice with the provision that Judas would betray him. He knew that he was a thoroughly depraved man. He selected Judas because he knew he would betray him (Calvin, Hengstenberg, Plumptre, and others), or in obedience to the Father (Luther, Godet, etc.). If the words of John, "Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who it was that should betray him" (vi. 64), admit only of the interpretation that he knew it from the very first choice of the disciples, then this view is the only tenable one. (2) Jesus admitted Judas into the college of the disciples, recognizing his good qualities, and hoping to train him into a devoted follower, as he did Peter. He did not foresee his treason, just as he did not know the day of judgment. Judas was led by his Messianic hopes, and a certain admiration of Jesus, to join himself to his followers. Jesus gradually became familiar with the inveterate depravity of his nature, as it expressed itself in hypocrisy, an inordinate love of money, etc. This is the view of Neander, Lange, Ebrard, Weiss (Com. on John, Note on chap. vi.), and others. In Christ's presence, men became either better or worse. Judas might have become better; but in reality he became worse.

II. MOTIVES OF THE BETRAYAL. — The treachery of Judas stands out in the sharpest contrast to the goodness of Christ. It perhaps represents the culmination of human ingratitude, as the cross represents the culmination of divine love. Luke and John both ascribe Judas' deed to the influence of Satan entering into him (Luke xxii. 3; John xiii. 2, 27). The evangelists do not give us an exhaustive analysis of the motives of his deed. (1) The immediate motive advanced by them was avarice. Thirty pieces of silver was not much, but great crimes have been committed for sums more paltry. There were, no doubt, other motives mixed up with this. A grave crime is often the resultant of many motives. (2) He desired to save himself. He felt that Christ could not go on much longer as he had been going. The bitter enmity of the Jews would inevitably burst upon him, and the disciples might share the destructive consequences of the storm. Motives of self-interest led him to secrete himself with the chief priests. (3) He was actuated by malice. His character threw a shadow across the pathway of Christ. He recognized the purity of the Master, and in the presence of it he felt himself condemned. He shrank from that pure and benevolent eye. Such words as "Ye are clean, but not all," the commendation of Mary (John xii.), and the reproof of miserliness, festered in his bosom. Vice, as it often does, in his case became vindictive, and, in the hope of excusing itself, struck at virtue. Other motives have been assigned for Judas' action. (1) He betrayed Christ from motives of patriotism. (2) He was carrying out a subtle plan by which he expected to force Christ to manifest his Messianic power, and realize the triumph of the Messianic kingdom. This, the view of Archbishop Whately, supposes that Judas had confidence in Christ, and believed he would not suffer himself to be put to death. Both these views are at variance with the accounts in the Gospels.

The crime of Judas some have attempted to extenuate on the ground that he was the executive of a divine and irresistible purpose to bring about Christ's death, which was necessary to the salvation of the race. The Perate and Cainites, two Gnostic sects of the second century, went so far as to represent him as the true apostle, whose deed liberated Christ from the bondage of matter. All representations of this kind founder on the words of Christ, "Woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! It had been good for that man if he had not been born"

(Matt. xxvi. 24). Dante places Judas, together with Brutus and Cassius, in the lowest apartment of hell. The last words of Judas, "I have sinned in that I betrayed innocent blood" (Matt. xxvii. 4), were not words of repentance, but of remorse and despair. They were uttered in the spirit of Macbeth after he had murdered Duncan, —

"I am afraid to think what I have done.
Look on't again, I dare not."

Peter's denial differed from Judas' crime by being a sin of "sudden lapse." Judas was deliberate in his planning, and malevolent in his intent.

JUDAS MACCABÆUS. See MACCABEE.

JUDE, The Epistle of, one of the seven Catholic Epistles of the New Testament; was written by "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James" (ver. 1). The author does not call himself an apostle, nor does any thing in the Epistle indicate that he was known by that title. He distinctly indicates that he was not an apostle in verse 17, where he speaks of the "apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ." For this reason it is more than probable that the author was a different person from Judas Lebbæus, one of the Twelve. This is made certain by his fraternal relation to James (ver. 1), who can be none other than the brother of our Lord, and the head of the Church in Jerusalem. (See JAMES, THE BROTHER OF OUR LORD.) Jude was, therefore, one of the Lord's brothers (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3), and the son of Mary. Jude addressed his letter, not to any local congregation, but to the Church at large. Its circle of readers was even larger than that addressed by James, including not only the believing Jews outside of Palestine, but all believers, without distinction of birth or locality. It is true, however, that certain local perversions of the truth, and moral decay, formed the occasion of the Epistle. It contains references and warnings to those that had given themselves up to fornication (ver. 8), and were walking after their own lusts (ver. 16). But they were not simply practical libertines (De Wette), but combined with their moral laxness errors of doctrine. They were, in fact, false teachers (Dorner, Doctr. of the Person of Christ, i. p. 104), as is evident from verse 4, which speaks of "certain men who had crept in," and had perverted the teaching of the "common salvation" (ver. 3). These teachers were still in communion with the Church (ver. 12); but their doctrines tended to derogate from the honor of Christ. They engaged in dreamy speculations (ver. 8), and from them proceeded their immoral conduct, and the depreciation of Christ and the angels.

These teachers, however, are not to be identified with the Gnostics of the second century. The descriptions in the Epistle are too general in their character to warrant this view. Nevertheless, the false teaching described in the Epistle of Jude belongs to the germ-period of Gnosticism. Hegesippus (Euseb., H. E., IV. 22) was not without authority for saying, that, after the death of James, difficulties manifested themselves in the Church, which he associates very closely with the Gnosticism of a later period. The errorists of Jude resemble the Nicolaitans of the Apocalypse; and Thiersch, Ewald, and Huther find the resemblance so strong as to regard their errors as a later form of the Nicolaitan heresy. Whether these tendencies were really prevalent over the whole Christian Church, or not, Judas writes as though they were, and exhorts the believers to hold fast to the teaching of the Apostles (vers. 3, 17).

The date at which Jude wrote his Epistle cannot be determined with definiteness from the use it made of other writings, and the use they made of it. The Book of Enoch is not only referred to in verse 6, but is also quoted (ver. 14 sq.). This work in its original form was certainly written in the time of the early Maccabean princes (Lücke, Ewald, Dillmann, Hilgenfeld, Langen), and probably in the reign of Jonathan (Siefert, De Apocryphi libri Henochi origine et argumento, 1867). The Assumptio Mosis, which seems to be referred to in verse 9, was probably written before 41 A. D. Jude also betrays a knowledge of Paul's writings. The Second Epistle of Peter, on the other hand, shows an acquaintance with Jude (Guericke, Wiesinger, Bleek, Weiss, etc.). We have, however, no right to conclude, because the destruction of Jerusalem is not mentioned among the examples (cf. ver. 5 sqq.), that that event had not already occurred before the Epistle was written. There was no good reason for Jude to have mentioned it. The fact that he, the brother of James, feels himself called upon to warn against the false teachers, indicates that he wrote after that brother's death (69 A. D.). The date of composition may therefore be pretty confidently set down between 70 and 80 after Christ.

The genuineness of the Epistle has been called in question by Luther, Grotius, Semler, the Tübingen school, etc. It is true that the testimonies of antiquity in regard to it are vacillating. The Muratorian Canon mentions it, but denies that Jude was the author. Tertullian and Clement of Alexandria are acquainted with it, and so likewise Origen, who, however, mentions doubts about its genuineness. The Peshito did not originally contain it, and Eusebius placed it among the Antilegomena. Jerome, through whose influence it came to be generally accepted, says that it was rejected by the majority on account of its apocryphal quotation. These testimonies unfavorable to the genuineness are to be explained by the fact that the author was not an apostle, and that he quoted from the apocryphal Book of Enoch, but are not a sufficient argument against it.

JUDGES OF ISRAEL. (This article treats of the persons so named in the Book of Judges: for the use of the word in a wider sense see COURT.) Three facts characterized the period of the judges. (1) Israel shared the land with the heathen peoples; because, through laziness, fear, and other reasons, it had failed to carry out the divine command to exterminate the latter. The consequence was successive relapses into idolatry, and successive subjections to the idolaters, lasting until the Lord in his mercy raised up the successive deliverers. (2) A lack of unity. The people kept together during Joshua's life and the lives of the elders that outlived Joshua, and who had seen all the great works of the Lord that he did for Israel (Judg. ii. 7); but the connecting bonds were lax, and it was not long before jealousy between the tribes kept them asunder. Judah was at first the leading tribe (i. 1, 2), and to her belonged Othniel, the first judge; then the leadership passed to Ephraim, first under Deborah, until Jephthah had his break with the tribe. After him no tribe gained especial ascendancy. It was not, indeed, until Eli, at the end of the period, uniting in himself the priestly and the judicial elements, drew the people together, that a nation was evolved. In consequence of this lack of unity, we read in Judges of individual undertakings only and conquests. Twice, indeed, under Othniel and Ehud, "all Israel" joined in the struggle; but Deborah seems to have collected only Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh, Zebulon, Issachar, and Naphtali; Gideon ruled over only Manasseh, Asher, Zebulon, and Naphtali; Jephthah fought the Ammonites with the assistance of only Gilead and Manasseh; and Samson ruled only Judah and Dan. Thus the repeated remark of the historian is strikingly true: "In those days there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes" (Judg. xvii. 6, xxi. 25). Of course from such a state of things one would expect no security for life or property; and for proof that there was none see Deborah's statement, v. 6. Nor would religion prosper. Israel was a theocracy, and the holy place was where the tabernacle was. Accordingly there the people assembled to learn Jehovah's will, so that they might follow his direction (xx. 18, xxi. 2; cf. i. 1, x. 10). But the book plainly shows, that, after all, the influence of the tabernacle was slight. It is a striking fact, that from Phinchas, at the beginning of the period, to Eli, at its close, not a single high priest is named, — a sure proof of their small importance. On the other hand, the repeated apostasies, and such unions of idolatry and the Jehovah worship as in the case of Gideon's ephod (viii. 27) and Micah's house of gods (xvii. 5), speak volumes on the real state of religion. The ark itself was an object of superstitious reverence (1 Sam. iv. 3).

(3) The third characteristic was the change in the divine revelations (cf. 1 Sam. iii. 1). In the beginning, God dealt personally with men, then through angels, then through prophets, until finally even these ceased after Malachi. The period of the judges marks the transition from the second to the third species of divine revelations. The angel of the Lord appeared at the beginning of the period with what read like farewell words (Judg. ii. 1-3); but, besides the passing allusion in Deborah's song, only two important actions are done or announced by angels, — the call of Gideon (vi. 11 sqq.) and the birth of Samson (xiii. 3). In 1 Sam. no angel is mentioned; in 2 Sam., only one (xxiv. 16 sqq.). In the days of the judges, on the other hand, the prophetic office was developed. Deborah was a prophetess (Judg. iv. 4); two unnamed prophets are spoken of (vi. 8; 1 Sam. ii. 27 sqq.); and at the close of the period appears Samuel, a prophet in the full meaning of the term. By him the schools of the prophets, or, more correctly, unions of prophets, were established (1 Sam. x. 5, 10).

In general, the period of the judges was both a close and a beginning. It closed the nomadic, unsettled life of the wandering and the conquest; it prepared the way for the orderly and regulated life of the monarchy. In Egypt, Israel had become a people without a country; in the period of the judges the people took root in the territory God gave them. It was a time of personal heroism; but these heroes of Israel are not to be confounded with the heroes of mythology, as some would do. It was a time of noble words, as well as deeds. Deborah's ode is a masterpiece, and a model for all time; Jotham's fable (Judg. ix. 7 sqq.) equals any, although it is the oldest of all; the speeches of Gideon and Jephthah are fine specimens of rugged eloquence; and, finally, Samuel was a teacher sent from God, faithful, fearless, fertile, from whose lips dropped pearls of wisdom. It was the time of the strongest theocracy in form, but the weakest in power; for only while the accepted representative of Jehovah, the judge, lived, did the people worship Jehovah.

The name Judge (שׁוֹפֵט) implies chiefly, but not only, judicial activity in the strict sense. Some of them, e.g., Samson, were probably not judges at all; but, on the other hand, others were, e.g., Deborah (Judg. iv. 5), Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 15-17), and his sons (viii. 1-3). Again: the "judge" was not hereditary ruler, not king (hence Abimelech, who, on the strength of his father's [Gideon's] authority, claimed kingship, cannot be reckoned among the Judges); but he was divinely appointed ruler, and had the piety of the people in charge. But the "judge" was always the savior of his country.

The following was the order of the judges: 1. Othniel, who delivered Israel from Chusan-rishathaim, the king of Mesopotamia, their lord for eight years, and judged forty years; 2. Ehud, from Eglon, king of Moab, with his allies Ammon and Amalek, masters eighteen years, "and the land had rest eighty years;" 3. Shamgar, from the Philistines; 4. Deborah; and 5. Barak, from Jabin, king of Canaan, "and the land had rest forty years;" 6. Gideon, from the Midianites, Amalekites, and "the children of the East," judged forty years; 7. Tola judged twenty-three years;

8. Jair judged twenty-two years; 9. Jephthah, from the Ammonites, judged six years; 10. Ibzan judged seven years; 11. Elon judged ten years; 12. Abdon judged eight years; 13. Samson, who began to deliver Israel from the Philistines, judged twenty years; 14. Eli judged forty years; 15. Samuel; 16. His sons, Joel and Abiah.

The chronology of the period is confused. If the successive dates are added, the result is four hundred and ten years from Othniel to Samson. To this add the forty years of Eli's administration, and there result the four hundred and fifty years of Paul's statement (Acts xiii. 20). But that this sum is too large is proved by Jephthah's statement, that from the conquest to his day was three hundred years (Judg. xii. 26), and by the statement in 1 Kings vi. 1, — that from the exodus to the fourth year of Solomon's reign was four hundred and eighty years. The simplest explanation of this manifest discrepancy is that several of the judges were contemporaries. Proof of the supposition is derived from the juxtaposition of Shamgar and Ehud (Judg. iii. 31, iv. 1), without statement of the length of Shamgar's judgeship, both coming in the eighty years of iii. 30; and from x. 7, which recounts a simultaneous oppression by Philistines and Ammonites. We may therefore consider the period divided into six forty years: i. e., from Othniel to Samson were two hundred and forty years, which harmonizes with Judg. xi. 6, 1 Kings vi. 1. The other numbers are then parallel numbers. [BALDEWEG: Das Zeitalter der Richter, Zittau, 1877.] E. NÄGELSBACH.

JUDGES, Book of. The book falls into three divisions. 1st, Chaps. i. 1-iii. 6. In regard to this division, three queries have been raised, — whether it should embrace more or less matter; whether the events of chap. i. are contemporary with, or earlier than, those of ii.-iii. 6; and whether chap. i. is written by the author of the greater part of the book. In answer, we state that the division should be considered introductory to the book, even if i. 1-ii. 5, and ii. 5-iii. 6, are derived from different sources; for the whole Book of Judges treats of the alternation of infidelity and punishment, repentance and delivery. Of this history, ii. 11-iii. 6 is a summary, while i. 1-ii. 5 is, in turn, an introduction to the summary, setting before us the obedience or disobedience of the respective tribes to the divine command to drive out the Canaanites, upon which the subsequent fate of Israel depended. In this struggle with Canaan, Judah and Simeon were particularly faithful; and to Judah was given the leadership (i. 2), although, later on, Ephraim, not so faithful in extermination (i. 29), seems to have obtained it. This entire first section joins directly on to the Book of Joshua, and shows how badly Israel fulfilled the task plainly set before them at Joshua's death, — so badly, that the angel of the Lord rebuked them severely, and prophesied that the remaining Canaanites should be adversaries, and their gods a snare (ii. 1-5). The author explains the failure, in part, on the idea that the generation which arose after Joshua, and the elders that outlived him, "knew not the Lord, nor yet the works which he had done for Israel" (ii. 10). In order to set forth this point clearly, the author recurs again to the last official act of Joshua recorded in Josh. xxiv. 28, and retells the succesive deaths of the fathers, and then summarizes the history of the period of the judges. Chap. iii. 1-6 contains these two ground thoughts of the book, gives a list of the nations left to prove Israel, and adds the new ideas that these nations taught the Israelites how to war (iii. 2), and that they lived peaceably together, even to the extent of intermarriage.

2d, Chaps. iii. 7-xvi. This division, the main part of the book, contains the six great periods of the history, with their subdivisions: (1) Othniel (iii. 7-11); (2) Ehud (iii. 12-30), with allusion to Shamgar (iii. 31), a contemporary judge; (3) Deborah and Barak (iv. and v.); (4) Gideon (vi. 1-viii. 35), with the history of Abimelech (ix.), and allusion to Tola and Jair (x. 1-5), contemporary judges; (5) Jephthah (x. 6-xii. 7), and allusion to Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (xii. 8-15), contemporary judges; (6) Samson (xiii.-xvi.).

3d, Chaps. xvii.-xxii. The third division contains a local history, — Micah the Ephraimite and his house of gods (xvii.-xviii.); and a tribal history, — the destruction of Benjamin (xix.-xxi.). That these two histories were put at the end of the book is proof that the author had a plan for his work. They throw a flood of light upon the moral and religious condition of the people, and thus serve his purpose, and are a vital part of the book. The stories fall in the earlier part of the period: in proof cf. xviii. 1 with i. 34; and, for the second, cf. xx. 27 sq. with Josh. xxii. 13, xxiv. 33.

The book of Judges is of single authorship, although the materials may have been derived from various sources. The only note of time of composition is given in xviii. 30. "Jonathan . . . and his sons were priests to the tribe of Dan until the day of the captivity of the land." This doubtless refers to the Assyrian captivity, either under Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xv. 29), B.C. 742, or Shalmaneser, or Sargon (2 Kings xvii. 6), B.C. 721; and therefore the book was written after that occurred.

JUDGMENT, The Divine. The word "judgment" is in the Bible used in three senses: 1st, Pictorially as the place of judgment, inclusive, however, of the act (Ps. i. 5, cxix. 81, cxliii. 2; Eccl. xi. 9, xii. 4); 2d, Condemnation (Mark iii. 29; John v. 29; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6); 3d, The single acts of judgment upon individuals or nations, particularly punishments (Ps. x. 5, cxix. 75). Such judgments as are executed upon earth through miracles, or in the ordinary course of God's providence, are only relative, and look forward to a future absolutely right and absolutely complete divine judgment which is appointed to every soul after death (Eccl. xi. 9; Heb. ix. 27), and to the whole race at some future definitely fixed time called "The [judgment] day of Jehovah," or "the day of judgment" (2 Pet. ii. 9, iii. 7; 1 John iv. 17; cf. Rev. xiv. 7). So the prophets declare. Thus Joel, after describing the plague of locusts which would visit Judah, passes on to speak of the judgment which was to come upon all nations (iii. 1 sqq.); and so Amos (v. 18 sqq.); and from that time Isaiah speaks of the exile as an imminent judgment upon Israel (iii. 14), after which there would be a deliverance through the Messiah, and finally Jehovah would come to judge all those who had not accepted the Messiah (xxxiv. 1 sqq., lxvi. 15 sqq.; Dan. vii. 22 sqq.).

Thus it is shown that the idea of a world's judgment was familiar to the Old Testament; but its aim was not to show God's desire to reward every man according to his work, but rather to display his love towards those who accept his grace. Since man can refuse this grace, God would separate the sinners from the righteous, and thus render it possible to have his will done on earth as in heaven. The motive to this separation is simply the saving and perfection of the Church upon the earth.

The doctrine of the divine judgment is completed in the New Testament. That it is by no means in its idea a manifestation of abstract distributive justice is proved by the person chosen to be the judge, who is none other than the Son (John v. 22), and who judges, as the Son of man, the head and redeemer of his Church, and for his Church's sake. He judges his Church, in the first place, in order that it may be holy, calling upon it to suffer persecution and trial so that its virtues may increase. But when the world threatens to destroy his Church, then he comes to avenge her (Luke xviii. 7, xxi. 22; Rev. vi. 10, xix. 2). Hence it follows that the persons who are to be judged on the last day are those who do not belong to Christ's Church, those who are his living or dead enemies (John v. 24). Those who have fallen asleep in Christ live with him in heaven (1 Thess. v. 10), and are awakened in the first resurrection (Rev. xx. 11 sqq.), and are in the second resurrection, i.e., to judgment, active participants (Matt. xix. 28; Luke xxii. 30; cf. 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3). What Paul says (2 Cor. v. 10; Rom. xiv. 10) does not contradict this view; for he is speaking of a manifestation of the works of the body, not of a judgment of the doers. The Old-Testament saints, also, although they had tenanted Sheol with the unbelievers (e.g., Samuel with Saul, 1 Sam. xxviii. 19, cf. xvi. 19 sqq.), are not the objects of the judgment; for they have been delivered from Sheol by Christ, and are now in heaven (Matt. xxvii. 57; cf. John viii. 56).

The judgment falls naturally into two parts, — that of the living and that of the dead, or those upon the earth and those in Sheol. The first part is in two acts: First, immediately upon Christ's second coming he will "cast alive into the lake of fire" the antichrist and the false prophet (Rev. xix. 20; cf. Isa. lxvi. 24): the rest of the people will be allowed to live under favorable spiritual influences exerted by the children of God among them (Rev. xx. 1 sqq.). After an aeon has passed, the wicked will be destroyed by fire from heaven (xx. 9). There thus will be no more living. Then the second act begins the judgment of the dead. Sheol gives op her dead (xx. 12). All descendants of the first Adam who have not been regenerated, consequently all heathens, all merely nominal Christians, and all unbelieving Jews, will all be judged according to their works (Matt. xvi. 27, xxv. 31 sqq.; Rom. ii. 6-8; Rev. xx. 12 sqq., xxii. 12). And herein lies a great hope. The judge is the Son of man, the Saviour. The object of the judgment is not abstract distributive justice, but the completion of his Church. The question he asks is, therefore, Who has shown himself by his works savable? who by patience in well doing has sought for glory and honor and incorruption? (Acts x. 35; Rom. ii. 7.) And those who stand this test, though they never heard the gospel preached, shall be saved through the blood of the Lamb, and to these sick souls the leaves of the tree of life will bring health (Rev. xxii. 2). But those who cannot stand this test are forever lost.

JUDITH. See APOCRYPHA, OLD TESTAMENT.

JUDSON, Adoniram, the Apostle of Burmah, and one of the first and most devoted of the foreign missionaries of the American churches; b. Aug. 9, 1788, at Malden, Mass.; d. on board of a vessel off the coast of Burmah, April 12, 1850. His father was the pastor of the Congregational Church at Malden at the time of his birth. He graduated first in his class, at Brown University, in 1807. He then taught school for a year at Plymouth, during which time he published Elements of English Grammar and The Young Ladies' Arithmetic (both, Boston). In the fall of 1808 he entered Andover Seminary, although "not a professor of religion, or a candidate for the ministry, but as a person deeply in earnest on the subject, and desirous of arriving at the truth" (Wayland). The following May he made a profession of his faith in the Third Congregational Church at Plymouth, of which his father was then pastor.

Mr Judson's attention was first drawn to the subject of missionary effort in heathen lands by the perusal, in 1809, of Buchanan's Star in the East; and in February, 1810, he finally devoted himself to that work. About this time he entered into intimate relations with that illustrious band of young men — Mills, Nott, Richards, etc. — who had previously formed their foreign missionary association. On Jan. 1, 1811, he was sent to England, by the American Board of Missions, to promote measures of affiliation and co-operation between it and the London Missionary Society. He returned unsuccessful in the immediate design of his journey, but was appointed, with Nott, Newell, Hall, and Rice, a missionary to the Indian Empire. He was ordained, with these four men, on Feb. 6, 1812, at Salem, Mass. Mr. Judson sailed on the 19th, from New York, with Mrs. Judson and Mr. and Mrs. Newell, for Calcutta, where he arrived June 17. On the voyage his views on the proper mode of baptism underwent a change; and, after his arrival in India, he and Mrs. Judson were baptized by immersion in the Baptist Church of Calcutta. In consequence of this change of views, he at a subsequent period passed under the care of the American Baptist Missionary Union. The East India Company forbade his prosecution of missionary labors in India; and, after various vicissitudes, he landed in July, 1813, at Rangoon, Burmah, taking up his residence at the Mission House of Mr. Carey. Mr. Judson at once devoted himself with assiduity to the acquisition of the language, in which he afterwards became a proficient scholar. After six years of labor, the first convert, Moug Nau, was baptized at Rangoon, June 27, 1819. He was the first Burman accession to the Church of Christ. From 1824 to 1826, during the war of England against Burmah, Mr. and Mrs. Judson suffered almost incredible hardships. He himself was imprisoned for seventeen months in the jails of Ava and Oung-pen-la, being bound during nine months of this period, with three, and during two months with no less than five, pairs of fetters. His sufferings from fever, excruciating heat, hunger, repeated disappointments, and the cruelty of his keepers, form one of the most thrilling narratives in the annals of modern missionary trial. Mrs. Judson suffered no less than her husband, although not subjected to imprisonment. Her heroic efforts to relieve the sufferings of the English prisoners received the tributes of warmest gratitude and praise at the time. In 1826 Mr. Judson transferred the headquarters of the mission to Amherst in the Tenasserim provinces.

On Oct. 24, of that year, Mrs. Ann Hasseltine Judson died. She was born in Bradford, Mass., Dec. 22, 1789, and had been married on Feb. 5, 1812. She entered with great enthusiasm into missionary effort, and established a school at Rangoon for girls. In 1821 she paid a visit to America. Her health was never robust; but she combined with strong intellectual powers a remarkable heroism and fortitude. During the imprisonment of her husband she was unremitting in her self-sacrifice, and walked fearless and respected from palace to prison among the excited Burman population.

In 1830 Mr. Judson began preaching to the Karens. In 1835 he completed the revision of the Old Testament in the Burmese language, and in 1837 that of the New Testament. In the latter year there were 1,114 baptized converts in Burmah. After an absence of more than thirty years, the now worn missionary returned, in 1845, for a visit to his native land. On the voyage his second wife died (Sept. 1) at St. Helena. She was the widow of the missionary, Dr. Boardman, and was married to Mr. Judson in 1834. Mr. Judson's arrival in the United States was the signal for an enthusiastic outburst of admiration for the missionary, and interest in the cause he represented. Everywhere crowded assemblies gathered to see and hear him. He, however, shunned the public gaze, and was diffident as a speaker. As early as 1823, Brown University had honored him with the degree of D.D. On July 11, 1846, he again set sail for Burmah, having married, a few days before, Miss Emily Chubbuck of Eaton, N.Y., who afterwards wrote under the name of "Fanny Forester." He arrived safely at Rangoon, and spent much of the remaining period of his life in editing a dictionary of the Burmese language. His health, however, was shattered; and he died while on a voyage to the Isle of Bourbon, in its interests. His body was buried in the ocean.

Mr. Judson was a man of medium height and slender person. He was endowed with strong intellectual powers, and sought in his Christian life, by the perusal of the works of Mme. Guyon and others, a fervent type of piety. His confidence in the success of missionary effort was peculiarly strong. Being asked, on his visit to America, whether the prospects were bright for the conversion of the world, he immediately replied, "As bright, Sir, as the promises of God." Adoniram Judson was one of the most heroic and devoted, as well as one of the earliest, missionaries which America sent forth to heathen lands. His name will ever continue to shine amongst the galaxy of apostolic laborers. He has merited, and will ever continue to be known by, the proud title of the Apostle of Burmah. See J. D. JUGGERNAUT (more correctly Jagannatha), a town on the seacoast of Orissa, in Bengal, India, famous for its temple with its idol, and formerly for disgusting human sacrifices. It is the holiest of Hindoo shrines, and annually visited, it is said, by upwards of a million pilgrims. The temple may be described as a city of temples; for most of the Hindoo divinities have temples within the enclosure. Krishna (one of the incarnations of Vishnu) is, however, honored by the principal idol, bearing the epithet Jagannātha, "the lord of the world," whence the name Juggernaut; and with it are Siva and Sudhadra, each a block of wood, six feet high, surmounted by a hideous representation of a human face. Krishna is painted dark blue, Siva white, and Sudhadra yellow. Each idol has a special chariot; but Krishna's is the largest, forty-three feet and a half high, thirty-four feet and a half square, rolling on sixteen wheels, each six feet and a half in diameter. Every March the great festival of Juggernaut is celebrated. On this occasion the famous idols are drawn one mile and a half out of the city, to their country-house, by means of ropes pulled by thousands of pilgrims. It is said that formerly many of these threw themselves beneath the wheels, voluntary sacrifices to the great Jagannatha. But nothing of the kind happens now. The worship of the idol is characterized by obscenity; yet the British, who took the town in 1803, down to 1855, actually supported it; at first by a tax upon the pilgrims, and then by direct grant. But this disgrace is now no more.

JULIAN (Flavius Claudius Julianus), Roman Emperor 361-363; b. 331; was a son of Constantius, the younger half-brother of Constantine the Great. When Constantine's sons succeeded their father (in 337), Constantius was put to death, and Julian and his older half-brother were spared only because they were considered harmless. Julian was educated in the Christian faith. Eusebius of Nicomedia was his tutor; and when, after the death of the great bishop (in 312) he was removed from Constantinople to Macellum in Cappadocia, his every-day company were the Christian clerks of the place. He copied religious books, built a chapel, and participated, as a lector, in conducting the service, though he was probably not baptized. Nevertheless, that one of his teachers, who, according to his own words, exercised the deepest influence on him, was Mardonius, a man whose whole mental development was based on the ideas of Greek Paganism, though externally he was a Christian. The grammarian Nicocles and the rhetorician Ecebolius, under whom he studied when (in 350) he was recalled from Macellum to Constantinople, were Christians of the same description: hence the explanation of his so-called apostasy. In 351 he was again banished from Constantinople. While sojourning in Nicomedia, Pergamum, and Ephesus, he became acquainted, through Libanius and Maximus, with the highest form of Pagan civilization,—Neo-Platonism; and on the instance of Maximus he formally abandoned Christianity, and embraced Paganism. But his cousin, the emperor, was a fanatic adversary of Paganism. He had closed the temples, forbidden the sacrifices, and all but destroyed the whole worship. Julian was consequently compelled to conceal the change which had taken place within him, and this compulsory hypocrisy made the young enthusiast passionate and bitter. In 355 he was again called to the court, made Cæsar, married to the emperor's sister Helena, and appointed governor of Gaul. In this position he developed an unsuspected military and administrative ability; and when (in 360) the emperor ordered the best part of the army of Gaul to the East, the soldiers refused, and proclaimed Julian Augustus. He managed this delicate affair with great tact. He asked the emperor to sanction what had taken place, and only when the emperor threateningly refused to do so did he march towards the East at the head of the whole army. On the frontier of Thracia the news of the emperor's death reached him (October, 361), and in December he entered Constantinople sole ruler of the Roman Empire. In March, 363, he departed from Antioch, where he had resided for nearly a year, and entered upon the campaign against the Persians. The first encounters with the enemy were successful; but on June 26, 363, while fighting in the midst of the battle, without armor, he was deadly wounded by a spear,—Persian or Roman, Pagan or Christian, nobody knows. Of his last hours, legend gives us very different reports. The most widely known, because of its glittering dramatic point, is that contained in Theodoret's Hist. Eccl., iii. 25, according to which he cried out, while in the agonies of death, "Thou hast conquered, Galilee."

The most conspicuous feature of the short reign of Julian is his attempt at restoring Paganism. As soon as he was proclaimed Augustus, he threw off the mask. On his way towards the East he re-opened the temples, which had been closed. On entering Constantinople, he dismissed the Christian officers from the palace, the Prætorian guard, and the administration. The cross was removed from the military standards, the courtroom, the imperial statue, etc., and Pagan emblems were substituted. A decree ordered all decaying temples to be put in repair, all destroyed ones to be rebuilt at the cost of the destructors. Confiscated temple estates or temple treasures should be restored by the despoilers. Paganism should once more be made the religion of the State, and enjoy all the preferences and privileges of a State establishment. It must be noticed, however, that the restoration thus attempted was not simply a re-action against Christianity, but much more — a fundamental reform of Paganism itself. It was not the old, naïve, popular worship which Julian wished to revive: it was a new, subtle, theological system, based on the philosophy of the Neo-Platonists, which he wanted to establish. All the practical lines of his plans run back to the mysteries as the model. The Paganism which Julian labored to restore was the mystery transformed from an esoteric science into a popular education, from an exclusive institution to a general social function. The return to Paganism was to be made dependent upon a kind of inauguration, with peculiar ceremonies. A priesthood was to be created, not only hierarchically organized, with the emperor at the head as pontifex maximus, but also socially distinguished from the mass of the people. A priest should be a man of philosophy and asceticism, shunning the inns and the theatres, and occupied in prayers, and caring for the poor; for Julian was not afraid of borrowing from Christianity itself. Charity is a specifically Christian virtue, entirely unknown to antique civilization; and Julian admired the relations which Christianity had created between rich and poor. He consequently wanted to ingraft the new principle on his restored Paganism; but this character of his work — its being a reform, rather than a restoration, of Paganism — explains the singular coldness with which it was met by the Pagans themselves. While residing in Antioch, he must have noticed many indications, not only of lack of sympathy with his plans, but of direct aversion to them; and he must have received some impression from them, coming as they did from those among his subjects to whom he wanted to appear as a liberator.

The question, what Julian finally meant to do with Christianity, is not easy to answer. He despised it, perhaps he hated it: at all events his hand fell heavy upon it. Not only were the Christians excluded from all public offices, but the Church lost all its privileges. It was bereft of the support from the State, and in some cases even compelled to pay back what it had received in earlier times. It lost its right of jurisdiction, of legalizing wills, of receiving donations, etc. The clergy was again made subject to taxation and conscription. The hardest blow, however, was the school law of June 17, 362. It ordered that all candidates for positions as teachers should obtain the confirmation of the secular authorities, that is, indirectly from the emperor himself; and such a law could not fail, in the course of time, practically to exclude the Christians from the schools and from all higher education. With respect to the internal affairs of the Church the emperor refrained altogether from interfering with them. He treated all parties in the same manner. Immediately after his accession he allowed the orthodox bishops, who had been exiled by the Arian Constantius, to return, and gave them back their confiscated property. But it is more than probable that he looked with great satisfaction at the internal dissensions which tore the Church. Actual persecutions he did not institute, but he connived at injustice and violence. While riots began to take place in the provinces, and mobs to fall upon the Christians, the emperor remained silent and passive; and in some cases he openly applauded government officers, though they had actually overstepped their instructions in their chicaneries against the Christians. Before he left for the Persian war, a rumor sprang up, that, on his return, he had decided to change his policy of indifference with respect to Christianity, and open a direct attack on the Church. This rumor is often referred to by contemporary Christian writers, and specially spoken of by Ephraëm Syrus in his four poems against Julian (written in 363; edited by Overbeck, Oxford, 1865). It is probably not altogether fictitious, but its substance is not recognizable any more. Julian's Epistle to Basilus, dated some days before he went away to the camp, and containing open threats, is, no doubt, spurious.

LIT. — The principal source for the life of Julian is, of course, found in his own works, edited by C. Hertlein, Leipzig, 1875-76, two volumes, and containing eight orations, an address to Themistius, and another to the Athenians, a Symposium held in Olymp by the deceased emperors, Misopogon, "the beard-hater," a satire, and eighty-three Letters. Of his work against the Christians, only fragments have come down to us. Among Pagan writers, Ammianus Marcellinus, Eutropius, Zosimus, are the most important; among Christian writers, Gregory Nazianzen, Ephraëm Syrus, Rufinus, Socrates, Sozomenus, and Theodoret. JULIAN CÆSARINI, or CÆSARINI, belonged to a distinguished Roman family, and attracted the attention of the curia by his successive activity as a teacher of humaniora and canon law in the university of Padua. Having entered the papal service, he was made a cardinal in 1426, and used in many difficult affairs. The Hussite question was confided to him, and he entered Bohemia at the head of a crusading army; but the army was defeated, and the cardinal fled (1431). From 1431 to 1438 he presided over the Council of Basel with great distinction. In 1438 and 1439 he was active in Florence and Ferrara, and in 1440 he went to Hungary to stir up a war against the Turks. He succeeded; but in 1444 the Hungarians were defeated at Vama, and the cardinal perished on the flight, probably assassinated.

JULIUS is the name of three popes. — Julius I. (337-April 12, 352) sided with Athanasius in the Arian controversy, and sent his legates to the Council of Sardica, which, "from regard to the memory of the apostle Peter," conceded to the Pope the right of accepting appeals from bishops who had been deposed by a provincial synod. His letters are found in MIGNÉ: Patr. Latín, viii.; his life, in MURATORI: Rer. Ital. Script., iii. 1. See FRIEDRICH: Geschichte des Primates, Bonn, 1879. — Julius II. (Oct. 31, 1503–Feb. 20, 1513), b. at Albizola, near Savona, 1443, in humble circumstances; was educated to become a merchant, but entered the service of the Church, when his uncle, Francesco Rovere, became a cardinal; and was made a cardinal himself (1471) when the uncle ascended the papal throne. Under Sixtus IV., however, he was not much used. Under Innocent VIII, he exercised more influence. Alexander VI. was his deadly enemy. He fled to France; and, though he afterwards condescended to conduct the negotiations for the marriage of Cæsar Borgia, a reconciliation never was effected. During the last year of the reign of Alexander VI. he was compelled to keep himself concealed in order to escape the dagger and the poison of the Pope. After the short reign of Pius III., he himself ascended the papal throne. His great object was the aggrandizement of the States of the Church, the formation of an independent state of military and political consequence in Central Italy under the Pope; and he partially succeeded. But the means he employed — the most unscrupulous diplomacy, the fiercest and bloodiest wars — were such that people turned away from him with horror. To wrench the Romagna from the Venetian, he formed the League of Cambray with Germany, France, and Spain; but, when he had reached his goal, he wheeled around, and formed the Holy League with Venice and Spain against France, and for the purpose of obtaining Ferrara. At one moment his position was very dangerous. Lewis XII. stood in Italy; Maximilian thought of making himself pope; even the cardinals abandoned his cause. But he succeeded in drawing, first England, afterwards even Germany, into the Holy League; the result of which was that the French left Italy; and Ferrara, Parma, and Piacenza were incorporated with the Papal States. In the fields of science and art he was as ardent and energetic as in those of politics and war. He built the largest part of the Church of St. Peter, founded the Museum of the Vatican, undertook extensive excavations in Rome, etc. He kept Bramante, Michel Angelo, Raffaello, and others, in his service, and paid them well. Nevertheless, when he died, he left a treasure worth half a million of ducats. His bulls are found in CHERUBINUS: Magnam Bullarium, Lyons, 1655, tom. i. See M. BROSCHE: Papst Julius II., Gotha, 1878. — Julius III. (Feb. 7, 1550–March 23, 1555), b. in Rome, 1487; was made a cardinal in 1536, and acted as papal legate at the opening of the Council of Trent, 1545. In this position he did every thing in his power to thwart and frustrate the plans of Charles V. Nevertheless, as soon as he had ascended the papal throne, he became the emperor's willing follower almost in every case. He lacked power of will, and capacity for action. In the events then occurring, both in Germany and England, he took very little part. His bulls are found in CHERUBINUS: Magnam Bullarium, Lyons, 1655, tom. i. See RAINERIUS: De creatione Julii III., Rome, 1550; the works of VERGERIUS, and the diaries of MASSARELLI, in DÖL-

JULIUS AFRICANUS, Sextus, one of the most prominent ecclesiastical scholars from the first half of the third century; was an older contemporary of Origen; wrote during the reign of Heliogabalus and Alexander Severus, and died after 240. The date and place of his birth and death are unknown; but Suidas says he was a native of Libya. He lived in Emmaus (Nicopolis), in Palestine; went once to Alexandria to hear Heraclius; was another time sent on a mission to Heliogabalus to work for the rebuilding of the city; maintained friendly relations with that Abgar whose name is connected with Bardesanes; and used the archives of Edessa. The circumstance that he was sent to Heliogabalus, and afterwards dedicated one of his works to Alexander Severus, indicates that he was a distinguished person. His principal work was his Chronographia, a world's history, beginning with the creation, 5499 B.C., and ending with the third year of the reign of Heliogabalus. It is first mentioned by Eusebius, who appears to have used it very largely in his Chronicle. Only fragments of it have come down to us, the most complete collection of which is that by Routh, in Reliq. Sacr., ii. Two epistles of exegetical import are still extant, — one to Origen, on the genuineness of the story of Susannah in the Book of Daniel; and another to Aristides, on the genealogies of Christ in Matthew and Luke. Of the latter we have only fragments, collected by F. Spitta (Der Brief des Julius Africanus an Aristides, Halle, 1877). Of the work Κεσσοί, "embroiderings," a large compilation in many books, dedicated to Alexander Severus, two books on military matters have come down to us. Besides these, quite a number of other works are ascribed to Julius Africanus. See MIGNÉ: Patrol. Græc., x.; [and H. GELZER: Sextus Julius Africanus u. d. byzantinische Chronographie, I.: Die Chronographie, Leipzig, 1880, II., 1885].

JUMPERS, a designation applied to some Welsh religionists of the last century, who introduced into their worship the practice of dancing and jumping. Under date of June 27, 1763, John Wesley wrote from Wales, "There is here [at Lancroyes] what some call a great reformation in religion among the Methodists; but the case is really this: they have a sort of rustic dance in their public worship, which they call religious dancing, in imitation of David's dancing before the ark." This practice started with the Welsh Methodists, and was confined to a small circle. It was at first simply one of the bodily manifestations which followed the fervent preaching of the Methodists. In favor of the more formal practice two passages were quoted, "David danced before the Lord with all his might. . . . Michal saw David leaping and dancing before the Lord" (2 Sam. vi. 14–16), and "Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy" (Luke vi. 23). William Williams, the famous Welsh hymn-writer, and for many years a devoted pastor in Wales, advocated and adopted the practice. The jumping usually followed the sermon, and was preceded by the singing of a verse of some hymn, which was repeated again and again, sometimes forty or even more times. The jumping was accompanied with all kinds of gestures, and often lasted for hours. Mr. Wesley regarded these religionists as sincere men, with the love of God in their heart; but "they have little experience of the ways of God or the devices of Satan" (Tyerman, Life of John Wesley, ii. pp. 480, 481). It is doubtful whether this practice has any followers now in Wales. In the middle ages the sect called the Dancers (see art.) indulged in the same odd religious rite; and the Shakers (see art.) still perpetuate it. See EVANS: Nominations of the Christian World, London, 1811; and TYERMAN: Life of John Wesley, vol. ii. pp. 480, 481.

JUNILIUS, a native of Africa, a contemporary of Cassiodorus; lived in Constantinople, where he held a high position in the civil administration under Justinian. In 551 he published a book (Instituta regularia divine legis) generally but erroneously called De partibus divine legis, after the heading of the first chapter. The work, which is one of the first attempts in the field of biblical introduction, is dedicated to Bishop Primosius; and in the dedication the author states that he has derived the contents of his work from a certain Paulus, a native of Persia, and a pupil of the famous school of Nisebis. The work is found in Migne, Patr. Lat., lxxviii., and has recently been edited by Kihn, Freiburg, 1880. See G. A. BEEKER: Das System des Kirchenrechts, i., Lübeck, 1787; KIHN: Theodor von Mopsuestia und Junilius Africanus, Freiburg, 1879. W. MÖLLER.

JUNIUS, Franciscus (Du Jon), b. at Bourges 1515; d. at Leyden 1602; studied theology in Geneva; was appointed pastor of the Walloon congregation in Antwerp 1565; accompanied the Prince of Orange as camp-preacher in the campaign of 1568; settled in 1573 at Heidelberg, on the invitation of the elector, and worked with Tremellius on the translation of the Old Testament; and was in 1582 made professor of theology at Leyden. Besides his translation of the Old Testament, he wrote exegetical, philological, and polemical treatises, which have been collected in two volumes folio, also containing his biography, Geneva, 1613, republished under the editorship of Abraham Kuypers, Amsterdam, 1882 sqq.

JUNKIN, George, D.D., LL.D., a prominent Presbyterian clergyman and educator; b. near Kingston, Penn., Nov. 1, 1790; d. in Philadelphia, May 20, 1868. He graduated at Jefferson College; studied theology under Dr. John M. Mason in New York; was pastor of the churches at Milton and McEwensville, Penn.; and in 1832 became president of Lafayette College. He occupied this position till 1841, when he accepted the presidency of Miami University, which he resigned in 1844 to return to his old place at Lafayette, which he filled till 1848, when he became president of Washington College at Lexington, Va. Here he remained till 1861, when his loyalty to the Union forced him to return to the North. Dr. Junkin exercised a large influence upon the Presbyterian Church; was a keen and logical debater, and one of the leaders and warmest adherents of the Old School branch after the division. He appeared as the accuser of Albert Barnes, although belonging to a different presbytery. He was moderator of the Old School Assembly in 1841. Among his works are Treatise on Justification, Philadelphia, 1839, The Little Stone and the Great Image, or Lectures on the Prophecies, etc. (delivered before Lafayette College, 1836-37), Philadelphia, 1844, Commentary on the Hebrews, Philadelphia, 1873, etc.

JURIEU, Pierre, b. at Mer, Dec. 24, 1637; d. at Rotterdam, Jan. 11, 1713; studied theology at Saumur and Sedan; travelled in Holland and England; and was appointed professor of theology at Sedan, 1675, and, after the suppression of that institution in 1681, at Rotterdam. Even his first works, Examen du livre de la réunion du Christianisme, 1671, Traité de la Dévotion, 1674 (translated into English), etc., as well as his lectures at Sedan, gave him a prominent position in the Reformed Church; and his fame and authority were greatly enhanced by his Apologie pour la morale des Réformés, 1675 (against Bossuet), Lettres Pastorales, 1686-87, etc., as well as by his zeal and disinterestedness in aiding his persecuted brethren of the Reformed Church. But the miseries and calamities he witnessed after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes led him, as so many others, to seek for consolation in the apocalyptic prophecies of Scripture (Accomplissement des Prophéties, 1686); and this circumstance, in connection with the great vehemence which he exhibited in his controversies with Bayle and others, made him many enemies; and at one time even his own orthodoxy was impugned. His Histoire critique des Dogmes et des Cultes, 1704, translated into English (London, 1715, 2 vols.), was his last great work. A. SCHWEIZER.

JURISDICTION, Ecclesiastical. Occasioned by the admonition of Paul, that Christians should not bring their cases of litigation before unbelieving judges (1 Cor. vi. 1 sqq.), and modelled after the practice of the synagogue, which had received the sanction of the State (Josephus: Antiq., 14, 10), there early developed among the Christians a form of ecclesiastical jurisdiction devolving upon the head of the congregation, and comprising not only ecclesiastical, but also civil affairs. As, no doubt, most, if not all, of the judges of the State, were Pagans at the time when Christianity was publicly recognized by the government as the reigning religion, it was simply a measure of due protection, when, by a decree of 331, Constantine formally legalized the institution, and extended its compass so far that the ecclesiastical court became competent, even in cases in which only one of the litigant parties chose to go before it. Half a century later on, when the judges of the State had become Christians themselves, it was found undesirable, because unnecessary, to give the ecclesiastical jurisdiction so wide a scope; and, by a decree of Arcadius and Honorius (398), the competence of the ecclesiastical court was made dependent upon the agreement of both parties. Its general definition by the Roman law may be summed up in this way. With respect to the laity,—all common crimes were to be punished by the civil courts, the Church simply following after with the penance; but all infringements of the order of the Church, doctrinal or disciplinary, were to be punished by the Church herself (c. 17, 23, 41, 47, Cod. Theod. de episc. et clericis, XVI. 2; and c. 1, Cod. Theod. de relig., XVI. 11). With respect to the clergy, — originally all common crimes committed by the clergy were reported to the bishop, who then deposed the culprit, and surrendered him to the civil courts for punishment; but by Justinian (Nov., LXXIX., LXXXIII. princ. CXXIII. cap. 8, 21, 22) the clergy was made amenable, even in civil cases, to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction only.

As Christianity became established in the Frankish Empire and Germany, the principle of ecclesiastical jurisdiction was introduced; but the institution developed very slowly. With respect to civil suits, the State, or rather the ruler, granted, first, that no clerk should be bound to appear before a secular court, either as plaintiff or as defendant, without the consent of his bishop (Concil. Aurelian., III. a. 538, can. 32; IV. a. 541, can. 20); second, that, when both parties belonged to the clergy, the case should always be decided in an ecclesiastical court (Concil. Matiscon., I. a. 581, c. 8; Concil. Toletan., III. a. 589, c. 13); third, that, whenever a clerk was implicated in a case, a mixed court should be formed, of which his bishop was a member (Capit. Francofurt., a. 794, c. 30; Caroli Magni leges Langobard., c. 99); and, finally, that the clergy could be cited only before the ecclesiastical courts (the principle of Justinian recognized by the Constit. Frederici II. a. 1220, c. 4). With respect to criminal cases, all jurisdiction belonged originally to the State, both among the Franks and the Germans. For all common crimes, not ecclesiastical, such as murder, theft, adultery, etc., the clergy were punished by the secular courts. Only the bishops formed an exception: they were judged by the synods, though the State had a right to take part in the prosecution. But in 614 an edict of Clotar II. (Pertz: Monum. German., iii. 14) granted that only the lower clergy, inclusive of the subdeacon, and only the minor and patent crimes, were amenable to the secular jurisdiction, while under other circumstances a mixed court should be formed, with the bishop for its president. Finally, towards the close of the eighth century, the clergy was completely exempted from the secular jurisdiction, also in criminal cases (Capit. Francofurt., a. 789, c. 38, a. 791, c. 39; Capit. Longobard., a. 803, c. 12): the police authorities could only arrest the criminal monk or priest, not prosecute, and still less punish him. It must be observed, however, that practice did not in this field keep step with theory. Even in Italy, those cities which did not belong immediately to the papal dominion continued to assert their right of jurisdiction over the clergy in all criminal cases, though synod after synod, and pope after pope, from Urban II. to Leo X., continued to fulminate their curses against them.

From an early date the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction developed along a double track, conquering new territory both through the cases and through the persons that it succeeded in bringing under its authority; and, such as it once for all stands defined by canon law, it is indeed fully equipped to supersede at any given opportunity, the right of secular jurisdiction altogether. According to canon law, the cases subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction are: 1. Causæ mere, pure, intrinsece spirituales, belonging to faith, doctrine, sacraments, liturgy, ceremonies, etc., most of which fall entirely outside of the competency of a civil court; while others — as, for instance, marriage cases — contain one or more elements, which, being defined as of sacramental nature, — such as prohibited degrees of kinship, divorce, etc., — necessarily bring them before the ecclesiastical court; 2. Causæ ex pure spiritualibus dependentes, extrinsece spirituales, such as vows, oaths, wills, engagements to marriage, patronage, ecclesiastical benefices, burial, tithes, etc.: and, finally, 3. Causæ civiles ecclesiasticis accessoria mixtæ, such as pecuniary questions arising from marriage, inheritance, legitimate birth, etc. But, as canon law includes under the last head all that can be brought under ecclesiastical jurisdiction by the so-called denunciatio evangelica, there is, indeed, no case imaginable which the ecclesiastical court is incompetent to decide. The persons, who, according to canon law, are subject to ecclesiastical jurisdiction, are ecclesiastics of all degrees and orders, any one who by the tonsure is designated as belonging to the clerical state, monks and nuns, ecclesiastical institutions of all descriptions, schools and universities, with their teachers and pupils, pilgrims and crusaders, and, as it is the duty of the Church to take care of all personæ miserabiles, also poor people, widows, orphans, and penitents. Of course, all persons not belonging under "this head" have a right to prefer a secular court in all secular affairs; but if a question should arise, whether or not a certain person belongs under "this head," it is the ecclesiastical court which gives the answer.

As above mentioned, this idea of an ecclesiastical jurisdiction superseding or absorbing the jurisdiction of the State was nowhere fully realized. But, on the other hand, the Church of Rome never ceased to fight for its realization; and, when the modern State began to develop, sharp conflicts arose. Already, during the first half of the thirteenth century, the encroachments of the ecclesiastical courts called forth determined protests in France; and in that country they never attained competency in cases about real estate, even though there were a will in the case. As the controversy between Philip the Fair and Boniface VIII. ended favorably to the liberty of the Gallican Church, several edicts were issued during the fourteenth century, circumscribing the competency of the ecclesiastical courts; and the parliaments were not slow in enforcing those edicts against the refractory clergy. By the edict of 1539 the Church was practically deprived of all jurisdiction over lay people, except in purely spiritual cases, such as vows, oaths, etc.; and the fundamental maxim from which the whole French process developed during the seventeenth century, Toute justice émane du roi, was in direct opposition to that on which canon law was founded. During the Revolution, finally, by the Civil Constitution of the clergy, Aug. 24, 1790, all ecclesiastical courts were suppressed; and the bishop retained a kind of jurisdiction only over the inferior clergy of his diocese and in purely ecclesiastical affairs. The legislation of the first empire and the Restoration did not materially alter this state of affairs, though the Code Napoleon laid matrimonial cases under ecclesiastical jurisdiction. In 1820, however, the Bishop of Metz established, on his own account, a court, to which he invited his flock to resort for advice and judgment. The example was followed in other dioceses; and such courts still exist in France, neither forbidden nor recognized by the State.

In Germany the opposition to the jurisdiction usurped by the Church also began in the thirteenth century. Laymen were forbidden, under severe penalties, to cite other laymen before an ecclesiastical court (Sachsen spiegel Landrecht, Buch iii. art. 87, § 1: Hamburger Statuten 1270, ix. 15); and in real actions ecclesiastics were demanded to appear before the secular judge (Schwäbisches Landrecht, art. 95). Nevertheless, the principle of denunciatio evangelica continued in active operation till the middle of the fifteenth century, and a well-marked boundary-line was not drawn between the jurisdiction of the Church and that of the State until the middle of the sixteenth century. In consequence of the Hundert Beschwerden der deutschen Nation, 1522, all causæ mixtæ and a great number of causæ extrinsecæ spirituales were referred to the courts of the State; and since that time a re-action against the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction has been steadily at work in Germany. In Austria the ecclesiastical courts are, at present, competent only in cases concerning faith, sacraments, and discipline. Even marriage cases belong exclusively under the civil courts. In Prussia, where, according to the reigning idea of the State, all jurisdiction ought to belong to the State, it is only a regard to the conscience of the Roman-Catholic part of the population which has prevented the government from abolishing the ecclesiastical jurisdiction altogether. Even in purely disciplinary affairs, the so-called "Falk Laws" have confined the ecclesiastical authority within very narrow bounds.

In the various countries in which the Reformation took root, various lines of policy were pursued, though the general principle seems to be nearly the same. With respect to all civil affairs, Luther said, "With the burgomaster's business I will not meddle;" and he consequently surrendered this whole field of ecclesiastical jurisdiction to the State. Nevertheless, when a consistorial constitution was established, the consistory stepped adroitly into the shoes of the bishop, and the forum ecclesiasticum personarum et rerum again flourished in many Lutheran countries until the replacement of the principle of territorialism by that of toleration, and still more the separation of the Church from the State, gradually caused it to disappear. The development was very unequal, however, in the various countries. In Prussia all marriage cases were referred to the civil courts in 1715; in Hanover, not until 1869. The Presbyterian churches also exercised some kind of jurisdiction in civil affairs through their synods, but only in some countries (as, for instance, Holland) and for a short time. In England the ecclesiastical court is still competent in marriage cases, will cases, etc. With respect to purely spiritual and ecclesiastical affairs, the Lutheran churches were often so closely united with the states to which they belonged, that the minister of worship and public education changed their catechisms and text-books according to his ideas; while a police-officer counted the persons present at service in the church, and fined the absent. But by degrees, as the idea of separating the Church from the State gains ground, they have succeeded in regaining control over their own affairs, — a point in which the Presbyterian churches always have excelled them.

MEJER.

JUSTIFICATION. The doctrine of justification by faith, and by faith alone, was the one in which the churches of the Reformation, especially the Lutheran Church, recognized their essential and central teaching. It was known as the article of the standing or falling church (articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesie), the one upon which hung the very existence of evangelical Christianity. This was expressed by one of the German princes, a most faithful confessor of the gospel, when he told one of his theologians just starting out for a disputation with the Catholics, that that which lay nearest to his heart was that they should return with the little word sola, referring to the proposition, "Man is justified by faith alone" (sola fide justificari hominem). It is not surprising, that, in the development of this doctrine over against the attacks of the opposing party, various shades of distinction should have manifested themselves. We shall first direct our attention to the teaching of the Scriptures, and to the conception of that teaching in the Church prior to the Reformation.

The classic and biblical use of the Greek word δικαιοῦν ("to justify") differs in a remarkable manner. In the first case it designates the re-action of offended justice upon the offender, — to make righteous; i. e., to remove the offence against justice from the offender, by his condemnation or punishment (Herodotus, Thucydides, Plato). In the second it means the very opposite; namely, to exculpate, to declare righteous, be it that the individual himself is blameless, or that, having offended justice, he is exculpated, made free of guilt, by the divine goodness, and thereby is declared and treated as having satisfied the divine demands, and as being righteous. The Old-Testament use of the term prevails in Matthew (xi. 19, xii. 37) and Luke (vii. 29, x. 29, xvi. 15). Its first use in the strict New-Testament sense occurs in the account of the penitent publican (Luke xviii. 14), who is said to have been regarded as just by God (δικαιοῦσθαι). It is, however, in the Pauline writings, especially the Epistles to the Romans and Galatians, that the word occurs in the specific sense. After describing, in the Epistle to the Romans, the law and its works as incapable of justifying, or making righteous, inasmuch as the law only serves to give a knowledge of sin (iii. 20, vii. 7 sqq.), the apostle takes up a righteousness of God with which the law has nothing to do, and which is mediated by faith in Christ, and extends to all believers. This righteousness is described as passing over to offending humanity by reason of grace on God's part, and of the redemption of Christ, on account of whose atoning death God had determined that there should be no contradiction between his own justice and the justification of believers (iii. 26). Then, after having established the proposition of justification by faith in chap. iii., Paul passes over, in the next chapter, to show that this idea does not contradict God's revelation in the Old Testament. The believer is the object of justification, and becomes so, not on account of his own deeds, or in the way of a debt, but on account of grace, he renouncing all trust in meritorious works of his own, and putting his confidence alone in God. To justify is also termed to reckon for righteousness (iv. 22, λογίζεσθαι δικαιοσύνην). Faith is joined with this conception as that which is reckoned for righteousness. The faith which is attributed to Abraham is described as trust in the divine power and purpose to perfect the divine promises. While here a comparison is instituted between Abraham and his spiritual children, the usual New-Testament expression is, that it is faith in Christ which is reckoned for righteousness. Christ is represented as the one who makes this possible (Gal. ii. 16). He is also represented as being made by God righteousness unto us (1 Cor. i. 30), and as having been made sin on our behalf, that we might become the righteousness of God in him (2 Cor. v. 21). We are righteous by reason of communion with Christ. He died and rose; so that we are regarded as having died and risen with him (Rom. vi. 11; 2 Cor. v. 14; Col. ii. 11 sqq.). This communion is achieved on our part by faith in Christ, or the faith of Jesus. The divine act of justification leans upon the divine purpose (πρόθεσις), which excludes absolutely all condemnation (Rom. viii. 28-33). Hereby the righteousness of God (Rom. i. 17, iii. 21) is made manifest. From this justification, which marks the entrance of the sinner into the condition of salvation, that active justification is to be distinguished which constitutes the conclusion of the entire work of salvation, and which is the object of Christian hope (Gal. v. 5). Here belong such passages as Rom. ii. 13, 16; 1 Cor. iv. 5; 2 Cor. v. 10. At this point we are brought in contact with the activity of faith in love and constancy and the works of faith (Gal. v. 6, etc.). The simplest solution of the apparent contradiction between Paul and James (Jas. ii. 14 sqq.) is, that James does not refer to the entrance into the state of salvation, as Paul so frequently does (Rom. iii. 4; Gal. iii.), but has in view the conduct of the believer after entering this state.

Turning, now, to the post-apostolic conception, we find the Greek expositors explaining δικαίωσιν as δικαίον ἀποφαίνεσθαι, so that the New-Testament use of the term is understood; but the distinction of declaring "righteous" as the foundation and as the consummation of the state of grace is not sufficiently indicated. In the Latin Church the term justificare is used, now in a narrower sense, and now in a broader, the imputation of "righteousness" including an impartation of it. Augustine gives the norm for the doctrine of the middle ages when he says, "God justifies the ungodly, not only by remitting the evil he has done, but also by imparting love, which rejects the evil, and does the good," and "the ungodly is justified by the grace of God; i.e., from being ungodly, is made righteous."

Here begins the confusion of justification with sanctification, which is apparent in the teachings of the scholastics and mystics. It remained for the Reformers to make a sharp distinction between them; justification being defined simply as the gracious act of God, who for the sake of Christ, and by the imputation of his righteousness, declares or regards the sinner just. Man only receives, and does not give; is passive, and not active, according to the Reformers. The Roman Church, on the other hand, regards justifying faith as fides formata, i.e., faith which is inspired by love; so that this love, active in faith, is really that whereby and on account of which man is justified, or whereby man renders himself worthy of forgiveness and sanctifying grace. Love is an act of free will. The evangelical doctrine of justification, on the other hand, which has its roots in the sense of sin as guilt, regards such a feeling of love in the heart for God as being a consequence of God's act, removing guilt, and drawing him to himself. This justifying activity of God presupposes nothing in man except a sense of sin, which is a product of divine grace, or the divine Spirit operating upon man's conscience, and implanting a knowledge of God's holiness and of his own violation of that holiness in his conduct. This frame of heart is a receptive condition for justifying grace: hence arises faith, which proceeds from knowledge implanted by the Holy Spirit (notitia), and passes on to assent (assenus) and trust (fiducia). Here love for God is for the first time felt (1 John iv. 10, 19); and from it proceeds sanctification, or the fruits of righteousness. Thus faith works through love (Gal. v. 6). Thus the Scripture distinctly renders to God all the glory, depriving man of all meritoriousness. Man, like an empty vessel, is filled more and more by God, and assumes likeness with Christ.

There was a danger of regarding faith more as a theoretical assent, and unduly emphasizing justification by putting sanctification in the background. The imputation of Christ's merit was made prominent in such a way that vital union with Christ was more or less lost sight of. There was a peril of the old man, with its sinful lusts, being lulled to sleep without having been sanctified. To resist this evil, Andreas Osiander appeared against the school of Melancthon, which was inclined to modify the Lutheran view. He substituted a real impartation of Christ's righteousness for the judicial imputation. Christ is righteous so far as he is the essential righteousness of God; and man is made righteous by laying hold of it by faith, and thereby receiving the divine nature of Christ to reside in him. God regards him as righteous, therefore, because he sustained the relation to Christ of the branch to the vine. But in this view the humanity of Christ and his ethical mediation are not properly brought out. The Formula of Concord, on the other hand, emphasizes that Christ is our righteousness in his entire divine-human personality, and redeems us by his perfect obedience.

The distinction between the Lutheran and Reformed doctrines of justification becomes apparent from another stand-point. Schmeckenburger brought out this difference with great acuteness. It arises, in part, from a difference of view about man's natural state and the relation of the divine decree of predestination to human freedom. The theologians of the Reformed Church regard the natural condition of fallen man from the stand-point of misery and want, and consequently look upon salvation as that which effects their removal, and imparts a positive benefit. The divine election is the all-efficient principle in this process, and reveals itself in the call which excites faith. By this faith the sinner apprehends Christ, and is made one with him, a new man (Eph. iv. 21). He thus becomes conscious of justification as a divine justifying decision. In the Lutheran system, on the other hand, the justification of the sinner as sinful is the principle, the first step, from which all else proceeds. It is the divine decision, based upon the satisfaction of Christ for sin, by which God declares the sinner righteous, and adopts him as his child. In this case the divine decision of justification is the efficient force which engenders faith in the heart of the subject. This work is completed by the participation in the sacraments. Justification does not insure the permanent continuance of the subject in the state of grace: he may fall away from it. A renewal of repentance on his part insures the renewal of justification. This is the doctrine of the Lutheran Church. According to the Reformed doctrine, however, the sinner cannot fall away from this state.

It is apparent that the difference in the two conceptions is owing to the different place which the doctrine of election has in the two systems, it being the all-determining principle in the Reformed system.

The doctrine of the Reformed Church is logically the more perfect, as it starts from the divine decree of election, and passes on, by logical necessity, to the absolute efficiency of the act of justification, which nothing can overthrow. For this reason, some Lutheran theologians, as Nitzsch, Von Hofmann, Philippi, and Dorner, have shown a leaning to the Reformed view. But it may be questioned whether the freedom of man's will is not cramped by the Reformed doctrine. In the Lutheran system it has more room to exert itself. And this relation of man to God in justification admits, to a greater extent, of the voluntary activity of the soul. In this respect the Lutheran view seems also to be more in accordance with Christian experience.

[The (German) editors desire to supplement the statement about the relations of the Lutheran and Reformed doctrines of justification by referring to the art. LUTHER, and by the following definition of the Formula of Concord (see JACOBS: Book of Concord, p. 657). "Thus far is the mystery of predestination revealed to us in God's Word; and if we abide thereby, and cleave thereto, it is a very useful, salutary, consolatory doctrine; for it establishes very effectually the article that we are justified and saved without works and merits of our own, purely out of grace, and only for Christ's sake. For before the ages of the world, before we were born, yea, before the foundation of the world was laid, when we, indeed, could do nothing good, we were, according to God's PURPOSE, chosen, out of grace in Christ, to salvation (Rom. ix. 11; 2 Tim. i. 9). All opinions and erroneous doctrines concerning the powers of our natural will are thereby overthrown; because God, in his counsel before the ages of the world, decided and ordained that he himself, by the power of his Holy Spirit, would produce and work in us, through the Word, every thing that pertains to our conversion," etc. We must call attention to the difference which exists between the views of the Lutheran Church as embodied in its symbols, and the views which were subsequently developed, for which see SCHWEIZER:

Centraldogmen, and JULIUS MÜLLER: D. evangelische Union, 1854.] KLING.

JUSTIN MARTYR, the first Christian apologist whose works have come down to us; suffered martyrdom under Marcus Aurelius, as we gather from the Acts of his Martyrdom, preserved by Metaphrastes (tenth century), which seem to be reliable. The Chron. paschale places the martyrdom in 165. He is mentioned for the first time by Tatian as the "most wonderful Justin" (Or. c. Gr., 18), and quoted by Tertullian as the "philosopher and martyr" (Adv. Val., 5), and by Hippolytus as "the martyr" (Philos., viii. 16), and is the first Christian after the apostles, the notices of whose life are sufficiently numerous, and enough of whose writings are preserved, to enable us to form a clear picture of the man and his system, both of which are of unusual value for church history. Irenæus mentions a work against Marcion (σύνταγμα κατά Μαρκίωνος) as by Justin; and Eusebius (H. E., IV. 17, 26) ascribes quite a number of writings to him. The oldest manuscripts are the Regius Parisinus (1364) and Claramontanus, in England (1541), both of which contain eleven of Justin's writings, arranged in the same order. The only genuine works are the two Apologies, the Dialogue with Trypho (all of which are mentioned by Eusebius), and a few fragments. The exact date of these works cannot be determined. Eusebius ascribed the larger Apology to the year 140-141, and the smaller one to the reign of Aurelius. Recently the former has been put between 144 and 160; but it seems to have been written in the reign of Antoninus, and before 147. The Dialogue with Trypho also belongs to the reign of Antoninus (138-161). Those who favor a later date are influenced by the presumption that Marcion's activity in Rome occurred in the last years of Anicetus (150-155, Keim, Gesch. Jesu).

From Justin's own mouth we learn the following details (Ap., i. 1): He was born in Neapolis (the ancient Shechem), in Palestine, of heathen (Greek?) parentage. He grew up as a "disciple of Plato" (Ap. ii. 12). His attention was drawn to Christianity by the pious conduct of the Christians and the steadfastness of their martyrs. In the Introduction to the Dialogue he relates the stages through which he passed before becoming a Christian. He was successively a Stoic, a Peripatetic, a Pythagorean, and a follower of Plato, and hoped to have finally reached the goal of intellectual contentment in the Platonic philosophy. His delusion was laid bare by an aged Christian, who showed him that human investigation could at best reach the true idea of God, but not the living God himself. He must be heard and seen to be known. He was then pointed to the Old Testament, especially to the prophets. Justin devoted himself to the study of their prophecies, was convinced, and at once consecrated his life to the diffusion of the Christian faith. In Rome he debated with Marcion, publicly disputed with the cynic Crescens, and took up the cause of his persecuted fellow-Christians in his Apology, which he addressed to the emperor. In this work he portrays the "doctrines and lives of the Christians," and exonerates them from the charges of atheism and secret criminal practices. Christianity is derived from God, and proves its divine origin by the fulfilment of prophecy, and the fact that it was made known by prophets and the Son of God. The Christians were not mad in worshipping the crucified Christ; for he was the Son, the Logos of God in the flesh. He has shown the way to righteousness and God. As the teachings of Christianity are pure and wholesome, and agree with that which had been recognized to be good before Christ's appearance, and as they are at variance only with idolatry and vice, the hatred against Christians is unreasonable, and their persecution due to the agency of demons, whose kingdom Christ came to destroy.

Justin went from Rome to Asia Minor. After this visit he wrote the Dialogue with Trypho, to show that the God of the Jews was the God of the Christians likewise, and that the authority of the Old Testament was recognized by Christians. He labored further to prove that Jesus was the prophesied Messiah, sent by the God of Abraham for the salvation of the world, and that his followers were the true Israel. In these works Justin professes to present the system of doctrine as it was held by all Christians, and seeks to be orthodox (ὀρθοδόξων) on all points. The only difference he knows of as existing between Christians concerned the millennium. Thus Justin is an incontrovertible witness for the unity of faith in the Church of his day, and to the fact that the Gentile type of Christianity prevailed. According to him, Christianity consisted in faith in God, the Father of the world, in Jesus Christ his Son, and in the prophetic Spirit, or, in one word, faith in Christ, the Son of God. This was the rule of faith. His attitude towards the Scriptures is important. The Old Testament he regarded as the "Holy Scriptures," inspired by the Holy Ghost. He, however, nowhere mentions a collection of apostolic writings. The accounts of the life of the Lord he calls ἀπομνημονεύματα τῶν ἀποστόλων ("Memorials of the Apostles"), but never mentions the authors by name, and quotes almost exclusively Christ's words. From these quotations it is evident that he had the Gospels of Matthew and Luke before him. He only quotes one passage from Mark, and not a single one from John; but it is now pretty generally agreed that he was acquainted with John's Gospel. He says that these writings "were also called Gospels," were written by apostles or their companions, and were read in the services of the Christians. They were God's word, because they contained Christ's utterances and doctrine. The unity and apostolic character of the faith of the Christians at that time are the sufficient reasons why Justin was not concerned about the question of the canon.

Justin does not mention Paul by name. This fact, and the stress he lays upon the Old Testament, have been used as evidence by Credner, Schweigler, Baur, and Hilgenfeld, that he represented the Ebionitic or Jewish type of Christianity. This view is sufficiently contradicted by Justin's failure to understand how God could choose one nation from among the nations as especially his own, and the juxtaposition in which he places Abraham and Socrates. The Mosaic law was given on account of the godlessness and wickedness of the Jews, who in the future have no part to play. Finally Justin's Chiliasm is thoroughly unjewish.

Justin's doctrine of the justification of the sinner is not the Pauline doctrine. He adopts the moral or legal view of Christianity. He goes back to the will and its freedom. Reason and freewill are not only of divine origin, but the reason is a part, or seed, of the creative reason. All men, like Socrates, are free to choose between the evil and the good. This notion determines his conception of grace and salvation. Baptism cleanses from previous sins, but it is only offered to the penitent. In the Eucharist we "receive a nourishment which is the flesh and blood of the Christ, who became flesh; and by it our flesh and blood by a change (κατὰ μεταβολήν) are fed" (Ap. i. 66). This is the earliest notice of the doctrine of the eucharist.

In the doctrine of the Logos, Justin has been represented as the author of new views; but he was not altogether original. It was customary before his day to call the Son of God the Logos. He used the idea to prove that God had a son who became flesh, and placed the material in the hands of the Church to formulate that doctrine clearly. But he also gave the occasion, by his use of the doctrine, for the subordinationism of a later period. This is clear when we remember that he did not use it to prove the equality of the Son with the Father, but only to justify faith in the Son of God, who alone was fitted to assume human nature. The deity of Christ, and the propriety of prayer to him, he proved from the Old Testament alone.

v. ENGELHARDT.

JUSTINIAN I. (Roman emperor, Aug. 1, 527-Nov. 14, 565), b. at Tauresium in Illyrium, May 11, 483; was a Slav by descent; his original name was Upranda. The good fortunes of his uncle, Justin I., — a Dacian peasant who served in the Imperial Guard, owed his advancement to the size of his body and the strength of his limbs, and in 518 saw fit to snatch the imperial crown, — brought him early to Constantinople. He received an excellent education; and, though he never learned to speak Greek without a foreign accent, he was well prepared when he succeeded to the throne.

The most brilliant feature of the reign of Justinian I. was his legislation, or rather his codification of the already existing Roman law, executed by several committees, of which Trebonius was the inspiring soul, and resulting in the so-called Corpus Juris Justiniani. By this work he conferred a great and lasting benefit, not only on the Roman Empire, but on civilization at large. Of a questionable value, however, were his conquests of Africa, Southern Spain, and Italy, by his two famous generals, Belisarius and Narses. He was unable to preserve these conquests; and, what was still worse, he was unable to give the conquered countries a better government than that they had enjoyed under their barbarian rulers. Altogether objectionable, finally, was his ecclesiastical policy, — that part of his activity on which he bestowed the greatest amount of industry and care.

Justinian I. was a Christian, orthodox, full of zeal for the purity of the faith, and waging a perpetual war against Paganism and heresy. The lower classes of the population were still Pagan in many places, as, for instance, in Peloponnesus and the interior of Asia Minor; and in the upper strata of society there reigned a wide-spread religious indifference. The latter, Justinian I. compelled to conform, at least externally, to Christianity; and with respect to the former he boasted of conversions by the thousands. The philosophical schools of Athens he closed in 529, and banished the teachers. They went to Persia; but, by the intercession of Chosroes, they were afterwards allowed to return. Less leniently he treated the Christian heretics, — the Montanists, Nestorians, Eutychians, and others; and the marvellous success of the Mohammedan invasion of Egypt and Syria half a century later is generally ascribed to the total disaffection of the population, which resulted from the ecclesiastical policy of Justinian.

The inhabitants of Egypt, Syria, and parts of Asia Minor, were Monophysites, and rejected the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (451) as tainted with Nestorianism. Between orthodoxy and Monophysitism a compromise was brought about by Zeno's Henotikon (482); but that document, which the bishops of the Eastern Church had been compelled to subscribe to, was absolutely rejected by the Western Church, and formally anathematized by Felix II. In order to heal the schism thus established between the Eastern and the Western Church, Justinian repealed the Henotikon immediately after his accession. But then something had to be done with the Monophysites in order to prevent a schism within the Eastern Church. The empress Theodora, who was a secret Monophysite, persuaded her husband that the true reason why the Monophysites refused to accept the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon, was that the writings of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas, had not been condemned; and that non-condemnation the Monophysites considered as implying a positive confirmation. The emperor then issued a decree condemning the above writings, and the condemnation was repeated by the fifth œcumenical Council of Constantinople (553). The Monophysites were satisfied; but what was won in the East was lost in the West by the breaking-out of the Three Chapter controversy, so called because, in Justinian's decree of condemnation, there were three parts, or "chapters," relating to Theodoret's writings and person, to Theodoret's treatise, and to Ibas' letter respectively. See art. THREE CHAPTERS.

At last the old emperor himself lapsed into heresy. He adopted the Aphthartodocetic views of the incorruptibility of the human body of Christ, and issued a decree to force them upon the Church. But Aphthartodocetism is simply Monophysitism, and thus his principal dogmatical labors met with a somewhat similar fate to that which has overtaken his chief architectural monument. He built the Church of St. Sophia in Constantinople; and this church, once the most magnificent cathedral of Christendom, is now a Turkish mosque.

JUVENCUS, Cajus Vettius Aquilius, a Spaniard by birth, and presbyter of his native church; wrote, about 330, a Historia evangelica, or Versus de quatuor Evangeliiis, a poetical transcription of the gospel history, in 3,233 Latin hexameters. The text which he used, and to which he kept very closely, was partly the Greek original, partly the oldest Latin translation, the so-called Itala. The contents thus derived, he moulded in forms borrowed principally from Virgil, but also from Lucan, Lucretius, and Ovid, and generally arranged with adroitness. The result has, at all events, interest, as the first Christian epic: in its own time, and during the middle ages, it enjoyed a great reputation. It was first printed at Deventer, 1490; afterwards often, as, for instance, in MIGNÉ: Patr. Lat., vol. xix. Several other poems, especially, the Liber in Genesim, have been ascribed to Juvencus, but erroneously, as it would seem. See A. R. GEBSER: Diss. de J. Vita et Scriptis, Jena, 1827. WAGENMANN.

KAABA (square house), the sacred shrine of the Mohammedans, in which is the Black Stone. It stands within the court of the great mosque at Mecca; is oblong in shape; built of large, irregular, and unpolished blocks of stone; is about forty feet in height; has no windows, and only one door, which is raised seven feet above the ground. The (reddish-) Black Stone is a fragment of volcanic basalt, sprinkled with colored crystals. According to Mohammedan tradition, it was originally white, but was blackened by the kisses of sinful mortals. It is inserted in the north-east corner of the building, some five feet above the floor; is an irregular oval, and about seven inches in diameter. It has a band of silver around it. The Kaaba may be called the centre of the Mohammedan world. All Moslems turn toward it in prayer. It is, however, far older than Mohammed; the worship of the Black Stone being well-nigh primitive with the Arabs, who came to kiss it, and make seven circuits of the Kaaba. The keep of the sacred stone was in Mohammed's family long before his birth; and it was to his uncle, Abu Talib, the guardian of the Kaaba, that he owed his protection for years. Arab tradition attributes the Kaaba's first erection to Adam and Eve, and its second to Abraham and Ishmael, to whom Gabriel brought from heaven the Black Stone. Its actual age is unknown; but it was rebuilt in Mohammed's thirty-fifth year (605 A.D.), and he is said to have put the Black Stone in its place. For an interesting description of the Kaaba, see RICHARD F. BURTON'S Pilgrimage to El Medinah and Mecca, London, 1855, 3 vols. (vol. iii.).

KA'DESH (En-mish'pat, Ka'desh-bar'nea, Mer'ibah-Ka'desh). Scarcely any biblical site has proved a more vexed question than this. Some have unnecessarily inclined to look for two sites to meet the conditions of the text. Later investigations have freed the question of many difficulties, and tended to fix the location at an oasis about ninety miles southerly from Hebron, bearing the name Qadis, the Arabic equivalent of the Hebrew Kadesh.

Kadesh is first mentioned (Gen. xiv. 7) as on the route of Chedorlaomer, from the wilderness of Paran northward; again as a boundary limit eastward for locating the homes of Hagar (Gen. xvi. 14) and of Abraham (Gen. xx. 1). Later it appears as a city in the southern boundary of the Negeb, or south-country, southward of the hill country of the Amorites, northward of the Wilderness of Paran, in the Wilderness of Zin, westward of the territory of Edom. (Cf. Num. xiii. 17, 26, xx. 11, 16, xxvii. 14, xxxiii. 36, xxxiv. 4; Deut. i. 19, 20.) A notable fountain, called the "Well of Judgment," was at Kadesh (Gen. xiv. 7), proceeding from a cliff (Num. xx. 8). A wilderness about it bore its name (Ps. xxix. 8). It was a suitable abode for the host of Israel (Deut. i. 46). A mountain was just north of it toward Canaan (Num. xiii. 17; Deut. i. 20, 21). It was distant from Mount Sinai an eleven-days' journey (Deut. i. 2).

Kadesh was an objective point of the Israelites when they left Sinai for the borders of the promised land (Deut. i. 6, 7, 19-21). Thence the spies were sent into Canaan (Num. xiii. 17, 26). There the people rebelled, through fear and a lack of faith, and were sentenced to a forty-years' stay in the wilderness (Num. xiv.). Kadesh seems to have been the headquarters or rallying-place of the Israelites during their wanderings (Deut. i. 46). They re-assembled there for a final move toward Canaan (Num. xx. 1). There Miriam died and was buried; the people murmured for lack of water; the rock gave forth water miraculously. Moses, having sinned in spirit and act at this time, was sentenced to die without entering Canaan (Num. xx. 1-13). Thence Moses sent messengers to the kings of Edom and Moab, requesting permission to pass through their territory (Num. xx. 14-21; Judg. xi. 16, 17). Being refused this permission, the Israelites journeyed to Mount Hor, and thence made a circuit around Edom and Moab toward the Jordan (Num. xxi. 4; Deut. ii. 1-8). Kadesh is named prominently as a landmark in the southern boundary-line of the promised land (Num. xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3; Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28). Its location is admitted to be a key to both the wanderings of the Israelites and the boundary of their domain.

All the conditions of the Bible-text are met in Qadis, as in no other suggested site. A Wady Qadis, a Jebel Qadis, and an 'Ain Qadis are there. Wady Qadis is an extensive hill-encircled region of sufficient extent to encamp and guard a host like Israel's. Large portions of it are arable. Extensive primitive ruins are about it. Springs of rare abundance and sweetness flow from under a high cliff. By name and by tradition it is the site of Kadesh. Just north of it is a lofty mountain, over which is a camel-pass toward Hebron. It lies just off the only feasible route for an invading army from the direction of Sinai, or from east of Akabah, and is well adapted for a protected strategic point of rendezvous prior to an immediate move northward. It is at that central position of the southern boundary-line of Canaan which is given to Kadesh in its later mentions in the Bible-text. Its relations to the probable limits of Edom and to all the well-identified sites of Southern Canaan, and its distance from Mount Sinai, conform to the Bible record.

Rowlands, in 1842, was the first modern traveler to visit 'Ain Qadis, and identify it with Kadesh. His identification has been accepted by Ritter, Winer, Kurtz, Tuch, Keil, Delitzsch, Fries, Kautsch, Knobel, Bunsen, Menke, Hamburger, Muhlan and Volck, Wilton, Palmer, Wilson, Alford, Wordsworth, Tristram, Edersheim, Geikie, Bartlett, Lowrie, and many others. Trumbull visited this site in 1881, and added confirmatory evidence of its identity with Kadesh.

Dean Stanley, resting on ambiguous references in the Talmud, Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome, advocated Petra as the site of Kadesh; but that, being in the heart of hostile Edom, is clearly inadmissible (Dent. ii. 5, 8). Burekhardt proposed the entire 'Arabah as the site; and, after him, others suggested various points in or near the 'Arabah; e.g., Robinson, 'Ain el-Weibeh; Von Raumer, 'Ain Hasb; Olin, Wady el-Fikreh; Berglans, Reuss, and Buddæus, a point near Ezion-geber; Laborde, Emsdash in Wady Jerāfeh; Dr. William Smith, 'Ain esh-Shehābeh; Bertou, Kadessa on Jebel Mādūra. Rabbi Schwarz named Wady Gaian, not far from Wady Qadis; Henry Crossley made an ingenious argument for Elusa, or El Khalaseh; but only 'Ain el-Weibeh has had any considerable support against 'Ain Qadis among scholars.

Dr. Robinson presses the claim of 'Ain el-Weibeh; and he is followed by Hitzig, Von Gerlach, Clark, Hayman, Espin, Porter, Stewart, Payne Smith, Fausset, Durbin, Coleman, and others. For this site are urged its proximity to the supposed but disputed borders of Edom and the traditional Mount Hor, and the fact that it is a much frequented watering-place of caravans to-day. The chief objections to this identification are, that it would have brought the Israelites into a defenceless position in the face of their enemies; that it is not on the route otherwise indicated as taken by them toward Canaan; that it would be counted on the eastern, rather than the southern, border-line of Canaan, according to the description of that boundary; that it occupies no such central position in the southern border-line as the text gives to Kadesh; that it shows no such cliff as the narrative indicates; that in name, traditions, or neighboring ruins, there is no trace of its conformity with the requirements of the text; moreover, that the arguments employed in its favor as against 'Ain Qadis by Robinson and his followers are largely based on the strangely erroneous assumption that 'Ain Qadis is located in Wady el-'Ain.

KAFFRARIA (from the Arabic, Kafir, "infidel"), the common but not official name of those regions of south-eastern Africa which are inhabited by the Kaffres. One part is under English rule, and was in 1866 incorporated with the Cape Colony; another is still independent. The Kaffres form the handsomest and best gifted tribe of the negro type. They have developed a remarkable political organization, but in religion they are very backward. They seem hardly to have any idea of a Supreme Being; their whole religion being confined to a kind of ancestry-worship. Various forms of superstition, however, have grown luxuriantly among them; and, as, for instance, belief in witchcraft, the medicine-man, etc. The Moravian Brethren sent the first Christian missionaries to them 1798; in 1820 followed the Wesleyans. At present the Anglican Church, the Dutch Reformed Church, the German Baptists, and others, labor with success among them. See I. SHOOTER: Kafirs of Natal, 1857; L. GROU: Zulu-land, 1867; W. KALDI, Georg, b. at Tyrnau, Hungary, 1570; d. in Presburg, 1634; entered the Society of Jesus; taught theology at Ohmütz, and was finally appointed director of the College of Presburg. He translated the Bible into Hungarian (Vienna, 1626), in opposition to the translation by the Reformed Caspar Karoly, 1589. A volume of his sermons appeared at Presburg, 1631.

KALTEISEN, Heinrich, b. at Ehrenbreitstein; d. at Coblentz 1465; was educated in the Dominican convent of Coblentz; studied in Vienna and Cologne; and was successively appointed inquisitor-general of Germany, magister sacri palatii (1443), and bishop of Tronhjem (1452). He owed most of his reputation to his dispute with the Hussites at Basel (1433). The speech he delivered on that occasion lasted three days, and is found in H. CANISIUS: Lect. antiq. He was a prolific writer, but most of his works have remained unprinted.

KANT, Immanuel, was b. at Königsberg, April 22, 1724; lectured in Königsberg from 1755 till his death; and d. in Königsberg Feb. 12, 1804. He never travelled away from the centre of his activity, where he had been introduced into life, and did his life's work; but he read books of travel, and conversed with travellers, thereby obtaining exact acquaintance with the features of many parts of the world. He lived the life of the philosophic recluse, concentrating his attention on abstract study; and yet he gathered around his table men of all classes, so keeping up a large degree of intercourse with the society of Königsberg. There is no more marked example of concentrated philosophic thought than is afforded by this even-going life spent in this town in Northern Prussia. The thinker was the greatest of abstract thinkers the world has yet seen. Kant was of Scotch descent, his grandfather having emigrated from Scotland at the end of the seventeenth century. The family name was written "Cant," and is still common in Scotland; but German pronunciation turned it into "Sant," and that was certain to become "Zant;" to guard against which calamity the philosopher changed the spelling to "Kant." He was the child of honest, industrious, religious parents; his mother having been a woman of lofty ability and character, whose influence for good over him Kant acknowledged in the most explicit terms. In early years Kant was devoted to the study of classics and mathematics. He entered upon study for the ministry, and completed his theological course, and occasionally preached, but did not give himself to the professional career. His first efforts in preparation for the press were concerned with the structure of the universe; and in 1755 he published A General Theory of the Heavens, a fact which may be noted by those who recall the enthusiasm with which he spoke of the starry heavens and the conception of duty as the two things which most overawed his spirit. This work he described as an Essay on the Mechanical Origin of the Structure of the Universe, in which he seeks to explain the origin of worlds by the forces of attraction and repulsion. So much was he addicted to physical research, that he afterwards lectured on physical geography and fortification, and for a time gained a considerable part of his support by teaching the latter subject. In the same year he published, in Latin, A New Elucidation of the First Principles of Metaphysical Knowledge. This he publicly defended as his thesis when supporting his application to be allowed to teach in the university in the rank of privat-docent, or non-professorial teacher. This essay contains the ground of his theory, afterwards elaborated in the Critique of Pure Reason. From this time onwards, he taught in the university, lecturing on a great variety of subjects, including, besides the two named, philosophy, natural theology, and anthropology. In 1770 he was appointed professor of philosophy in his own university, and this fixed his sphere for life. As a lecturer he was very attractive, clear in style, varied in the range of illustration, exceedingly suggestive and stimulating. The most important autobiographic remark he made — and it has found general currency in consequence — was, that by Hume he was awoke from dogmatic slumber. He was by natural bias a metaphysician, and had been deeply pondering metaphysical questions from his early years; but the sceptical assault of Hume on the experiential philosophy convinced him that something more was required than a dogmatic scheme, if philosophy was to maintain its position. In this way he entered upon the critical method with the view of distinguishing the products of experience from the elements in consciousness which are given by the mind. His aim was a thorough-going discrimination between the a posteriori and the a priori elements in knowledge. It thus became a search for the transcendental in consciousness, or the forms of knowledge which transcend experience. These two words, “critical” and “transcendental,” naturally describe the Kantian philosophy as a scheme of knowledge.

According to Kant, the forms of the mind are the native and necessary conditions of knowledge. Our knowledge is of phenomena, or appearances possible to us under the forms which our mental constitution imposes. It follows that we do not know things in themselves, but only such appearances as are possible to us under the conditions of knowledge to which we are limited. The sensory involves recognition of an outer world, and the forms of the sensory native to mind are space and time. These two impose their formal conditions on all experience: accordingly we know only appearances under these forms peculiar to us as intelligent beings. In reducing all knowledge of the outer to the phenomenal in this way, he seems only to help Hume, instead of refuting him. Kant does not, however, affirm that external things do not exist, or that there can be any rational ground for such an affirmation: he maintains only that our knowledge through the senses is knowledge of appearances under recognized mental conditions, — an unsatisfactory theory of external perception, however true in what it affirms. With this beginning, the lines of development for the theory are fixed. When the understanding or reasoning power proceeds to work up into systematized order the multifarious facts recognized through the senses, the categories or pure conceptions of the understanding — unity, plurality, totality, etc. — “prescribe laws a priori to phenomena.” In this higher region, also, all that is known is determined by phenomena and the forms which the understanding imposes. When we rise still higher, to contemplate the universe as a whole, there cannot be any thing but a further illustration of our subjection to the forms which the mind imposes. The reason gives us the ideas of God, the universe, and self. These are the forms prescribed by the highest faculty we possess; but we are not able to say more of them than that they are forms of the reason regulative of intellectual procedure, but not criteria of truth. Thus the idea of God is in our mind; but we have not thereby any knowledge of God, or certainty of his existence. The argument which was all in all to Descartes was nothing to Kant. The error appearing in Kant’s theory at the outset clings to it throughout, leaving us still to seek an adequate theory of knowledge. Kant leads to a sceptical result, if we are content to treat his intellectual scheme, developed in the Critique of Pure Reason, as a complete theory, and do not advance to his moral philosophy or practical reason as a necessary part of it. The direct historical result of his Critique has been the development of a succession of transcendental theories in Germany which have rapidly worked themselves out of favor, and of a theory of Agnosticism which has been eagerly embraced and defended by the experiential school. See AGNOSTICISM.

The ethical scheme of Kant may, however, be taken as part of his theory of knowledge, and in strict justice ought to be so regarded; in which case it appears that the requirements of practical life give us certainty as to the divine existence and government, under which liberty is the birth-right of the moral agent. From pure reason he passes over to treat of practical reason, which is given “for the government of will, to constitute it good.” Here we become familiar with the categorical imperative, whose formula is, “Act from a maxim at all times fit for law universal.” This makes universality the test of moral law; and though the formula is too abstract, and needs to have its application expounded, it concentrates on an essential characteristic of moral law, and makes the destruction of the self-seeking spirit essential to the moral life. This implies an ideal of moral excellence in the human mind, to which, indeed, Kant had made reference in the Critique of Pure Reason (Transcendental Dialectic, bk. I., sect. 1), and which is treated as a grand certainty in human knowledge, as it is the imperative requirement of human life. From this follows freedom of will as involved in the imperative “thou shalt,” implying “thou canst.” With these things follow the divine existence and government as certainties, and the recognition of a supersensible world, to which man belongs, and in which he is free from the dominion of physical law. Thus the ethical scheme is the completion of the theory of Kant, and in some sense a rectification of the whole, even while it must be admitted that a reconstruction of the intellectual side is needful, if a true harmony is to be made out.

After every deduction has been made which rigid criticism seems to require, Kant's name stands out as the most noted in the roll of modern philosophy. He is decidedly the most powerful and rigid thinker, whose work must influence the whole future of mental philosophy. Enthusiastic admirers have claimed for Hegel precedence; but all the signs of recent years are against the claim, showing that Hegel is abandoned, and that the return is upon Kant for a new start. Whatever judgment men may incline to form of the comparative merits of Kant and Hegel, moral conceptions cannot be left out of account in judging of a theory of knowledge.

KAPFF, Sixt Karl, the most perfect representative of the type of piety prevailing in Würtemberg in the last generation; the son of a minister; b. in Güglingen, Würtemberg, Oct. 22, 1805; d. in Stuttgart, Sept. 1, 1879. From earliest childhood he was religiously disposed; and at the university of Tübingen he engaged in daily prayer with his intimate friend William Hofacker. After filling the positions of [vicar at Tuttlingen] teacher at Hofwyl, and Repentent in Tübingen, he became, in 1833, pastor of the colony of Pietists at Kornthal [seven miles from Stuttgart]. In 1843 he was made Dekan at Münsingen, and in 1847 at Herrenberg; in 1850 was transferred to Reutlingen, and two years afterwards to Stuttgart, where, for the remainder of his life, he was Prälat and the greatly beloved and influential pastor of the Stiftskirche.

Kapff was a genuine Suabian, and combined the genial manners, trustfulness, and sympathetic warmth of the Suabian character. He was a friend to ministers all over Würtemberg, and attracted all classes to him who had an interest in religion. As a preacher, he did not represent any sharply-defined theological or ecclesiastical tendency. His sermons had much in them of the supernaturalism of the old Tübingen school, but more warmth and sympathy than belonged to it. He had an eye to the domestic and social wants of his people, and drew largely upon his everyday intercourse with them for his subjects. He was not eloquent, but spoke in an earnest, conversational tone, that won the heart. His influence as pastor was very great, his annual pastoral calls amounting to three thousand. He also took the warmest interest in the ecclesiastical affairs of Würtemberg, and in foreign missions as advanced by the missionary institution in Basel. Thus, for more than a quarter of a century, he was the centre of the pious circles of the land.

He published quite a number of collections of sermons and smaller works. Of these the principal are, 83 Predigten ü. d. alten Evangelien, Stuttgart, 3d ed., 1875 [10,000 copies]; 80 Predigten ü. d. alten Episteln, 6th ed., 1880 [14,000 copies]; Communionbuch, 19th ed., 1880 [70,000 copies]; posthumously published, Casualreden, Stuttgart, 1880, etc. See his Lebensbild, by his son CARL KAPFF, Stuttgart, 1881]. KARAITE JEWS. The name "Karaité" is from the Hebrew kara ("to read" or "recite"), and denotes the radical difference of the Karaites from the Rabbinites. While the latter adhered to tradition, the former rejected the same, and strictly adhered to the letter of the Bible: hence they were called also "Textualists." The founder of Karaism was Anan, the son of David. His uncle Solomon, who was patriarch of the exiled Jews, died childless in 761 or 762 A.D.; and thus Anan was the legitimate successor to the patriarchate. He was, however, prevented from obtaining the dignity on account of his rejecting the traditions of the fathers; and his younger brother, Chanaja, was elected in his stead. Anan, not being willing to submit to such a slight, appealed to the caliph, Abujafar Almansar, who was at first disposed to favor his claim; but the rabbinic party succeeded at last, and Anan was obliged to flee. He retired to Jerusalem, where he built a synagogue, and where he soon was recognized as the legitimate prince of the captivity. The schism became formal, and anathemas and counter-anathemas followed. Anan's works are unfortunately lost, and his doctrinal system is only known from statements and allusions in the works of Arabic historians. His advice to his followers was to "search the Scriptures deeply." Of Christ as the founder of Christianity Anan spoke in the terms of the highest respect. He declared Jesus of Nazareth was a very wise, just, holy, and God-fearing man, who did not at all wish to be recognized as a prophet, nor to promulgate a new religion in opposition to Judaism, but simply desired to uphold the law of Moses, and do away with the commandments of men. And Anan therefore condemns the Jews for having treated Jesus as an impostor, and for having put him to death without weighing the justice of his pretensions. (Comp. DE SACY: Christomathie Arabe, i. 326; WOLF: Bibl. Hebraica, i. p. 1086.) Anan's death is commemorated in a prayer, which his followers offer up for him every sabbath to the present day. After his death (765-780) his son Saul was elected, who was succeeded by Benjamin ben Moses Nahavendi (about 800-820), the greatest luminary among the Karaites. He introduced many reforms amongst his co-religionists, which were so highly appreciated by the followers of Anan, that they deserted the name Ananites, and henceforth called themselves Karaites. i.e., Scripturalists, or E'ne and Baale Mikra, followers of the Bible, in contradistinction to Baale Ha-kabala, or followers of tradition.

After Nahavendi, the next conspicuous Karaite was Daniel ben Moses el-Kumassi (820-860). We may also mention Eldad ha-Dani (about 880-890), the famous traveller: Chawi-el-Balchi, the Karaite freethinker and first rationalistic critic of the Bible, who flourished after 880. About the year 900, Karaism was finally fixed, both in its opposition to Rabbinism and in the fundamental articles of faith by which its followers demand to be judged. These articles are thus expressed in their confession of faith as translated by Rule:—

"1. That all this bodily (or material) existence, that is to say, the spheres and all that is in them, is created; 2. That they have a Creator, and the Creator has his own soul (or spirit); 3. That he has no similitude, and he is one, separate from all; 4. That he sent Moses, our master (upon whom be peace!); 5. That he sent with Moses, our master, his law, which is perfect; 6. For the instruction of the faithful, the language of our law, and the interpretation,—that is to say, the reading (or text) and the division (or vowel-pointing); 7. That the blessed God sent forth the other prophets; 8. That God (blessed be his name!) will raise the sons of men to life in the day of judgment; 9. That the blessed God giveth to men according to his ways and according to the fruit of his doings; 10. That the blessed God has not reprobated the men of the captivity, but they are under the chastisements of God, and it is every day right that they should obtain his salvation by the hands of Messiah, the Son of David."

The British Museum acquired in the summer of 1882 a large number of Oriental manuscripts, some containing Arabic commentaries on the Bible, with the Hebrew text written by Karaite Jews. One of these is dated 959 A.D. The Hebrew is not written in the square character, as the Talmud required, and as has hitherto been supposed to have been the case among the later Hebrews. The commentaries are in Arabic, but contain large quotations from Anan's commentaries in Aramaic, thus proving that Anan, the founder of the Karaites, wrote in Aramaic.

The number of Karaite Jews is not very large at present. We find them in the Crimea (where they number six thousand), Constantinople, Damascus, Jerusalem (where they number only ten families). They have a printing establishment at Eupatoria. Everywhere their morality is unexceptionable: their honesty and general probity are proverbial.

KARENS, a race of people widely scattered over Burmah, and dwelling in temporary villages. Their origin has been a subject of much discussion; some regarding them as the aborigines of the land; others, as immigrants from Thibet. Up to the time of their conversion, they were severely oppressed by their Burman masters. They afford an interesting study to the student of foreign missions. About the year 1828-30, Drs. Boardman and Judson for the first time came in contact with the Karens, found them a shy and wild people, but very susceptible to the influences of the gospel. This susceptibility was, perhaps, due in some measure to the absence of any very definite forms of religion, and any priesthood among them. Dr. Boardman's attention was attracted to them more especially by his acquaintance with a Karen slave, Kho-Thah-byu, whose freedom had been purchased by the missionaries. He had been a man of flagitious life, and had committed no less than twenty-four murders. But, converted to the Christian faith, he became a veritable apostle to his countrymen, and for many years was indefatigable in his efforts to win them to Christ. In 1878 the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the mission was celebrated by the dedication of a beautiful hall to this noble man's memory. Schools were at once planted; and the preaching of the gospel has met with wonderful success amongst this people, completely transforming their modes of life. In 1832 Mr. Wade made an alphabet of the Karen language, which differs from the Burmese. Portions of the Scripture, and tracts, were soon printed. A writer in the Madras Observer, in October, 1868, states, that, on a journey through the Karen districts, on foot, "he found himself, for seventeen successive nights, at the end of his day's journey through the forest, in a native Christian village." There were, in 1882, 21,889 native church-members, and 432 Karen Baptist churches, with 91 ordained and 293 unordained preachers. There is a Karen theological seminary at Rangoon with 31 students. See KING: Life of Boardman; WAYLAND: Life of Judson; F. MASON: The Karen Apostle, Boston; and the Reports of the American Baptist Missionary Union.

KARC, GEORGE (Parsimonius), b. at Heroldingen in Saxony, 1512; d. at Ansbach, 1576; studied theology at Wittenberg, but fell in with some Anabaptists, and was for a short time even incarcerated. Nevertheless, in 1539 he was appointed pastor of Öttingen on the recommendation of Luther. Expelled from that place in 1547 by the Interim, he found refuge in Brandenburg, and was in 1551 made pastor of Schwabach, whence, in 1556, he was removed to Ansbach as pastor and superintendent-general. Once more, however, he fell into error. He set forth some curious speculation with respect to the value of the obedience which Christ had rendered to the law during his life on earth, and these views caused much confusion and strife. He was suspended, but retracted, and was restored. He wrote a catechism, which was in use in Ansbach in the beginning of the present century. See Luther's Briefe, ed. De Wette, 5, 94, 97, 200; Lauterbach's Tagebuch, ed. Seidemann, pp. 1, 5, 8, 14, 44. G. PLITT.

KATERKAMP, Johann Theodor Hermann, b. at Ochtrup, Westphalia, Jan. 17, 1761; d. at Münster, July 8, 1834; was educated in the gymnasium of Rheine; studied theology at Münster; was ordained a priest 1787; spent ten years (1787-97) in the family of Droste-Vischering as tutor, and travelled through Germany, Switzerland, and Italy with his pupils; lived then from 1797 to 1809 in the house of the Princess Gallitzin; and was in 1809 appointed professor of church history at the university of Münster. His principal work is his Church History, of which the introductory volume appeared at Münster, 1819, the five following (to 1153) between 1823 and 1834. He also published Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. Leben d. Fürstin Amalia von Gallitzin, Münster, 1828.

KAUTZ, Jakob (Cucius), b. at Bockenheim about 1500; settled at Worms as Reformed preacher in 1524, but came soon in conflict, not only with the Roman-Catholic clergy, but also with his colleagues of the Evangelical Church: they sympathized with Wittenberg, and he with Strasburg. He openly joined Deuck and Haetzer; and June 9, 1527, he published a number of Anabaptist theses as a challenge to the Lutheran preachers. The disputation did probably not take place. The magistrate interfered, and Kautz was expelled from the city. From that moment he was a fugitive, wandering Anabaptist preacher of the common kind. In 1528 he once more visited Strasburg, and nearly succeeded in seducing his old friend Capito. But in 1529 he was again expelled on account of tumultuary behavior, and soon after he disappeared from history. The date of his death is unknown. B. RIGGENBACH.

KAYE, John, D.D., b. at Hammersmith, London, 1783; d. at Lincoln, Feb. 19, 1853. He was graduated at Cambridge, 1804, at the head of both the classical and philosophical honor lists; made master of Christ's College, 1814; D.D., 1815; regius professor of divinity, 1816; bishop of Bristol, 1820, transferred to Lincoln, 1827. He wrote The Ecclesiastical History of the Second and Third Centuries, illustrated from the Writings of Tertullian, Cambridge, 1825 (5th ed., 1815); Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Justin Martyr, London, 1829 (3d ed., 1853); Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria, London, 1835; The Council of Niceæ in Connection with Athanasius, London, 1853; External Government and Discipline of the Church during the First Three Centuries, London, 1855.

KEACH, Benjamin, b. at Stokehaman, Bucks, Feb. 29, 1640; d. at Horsleydown, Southwark, London, July 18, 1704, where he was pastor from 1668. He belonged to the Particular or Calvinistic Baptists, and was esteemed for piety and knowledge, although "cruelly persecuted for his bold advocacy of his opinions." Besides many other books, he wrote Tropologia, a Key to open Scripture Metaphors and Types, London, 1681 (the first book was written by Thomas Delaune), reprinted 1853 and 1856; Travels of True Godliness, 1683 (reprinted, with Memoir, by Dr. H. Malcom, New York, 1831, and in London, 1816 and 1819); Progress of Sin, or the Travels of Ungodliness, last edition, London, 1819 (these two books are in the Bunyan manner, and were once popular); A Golden Mine opened, 1694 (contains portrait of Keach); Gospel Mysteries unveiled, or an Exposition of all the Parables, and many Express Similitudes contained in the Four Evangelists, 1701, 2 vols. folio, best reprint, 1856; War with the Devil, 1776. For Memoir, see above.

KEBLE, John, M.A., a saintly divine and poet of the Church of England; was b. April 25, 1792, at Fairford, Gloucester; d. March 29, 1866, at Bournemouth. He has been called the George Herbert of the century. His father, who was a clergyman, conducted his education until he entered Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in 1806. After a brilliant collegiate career, he was made, in 1811, fellow of Oriel, at that time the "centre of all the finest ability in Oxford" (including Whately, Arnold, Pusey, Newman, etc.); was ordained priest in 1816; became curate of East Leach and Burthorpe (near Fairford), and tutor at Oriel, 1818. In 1823 he gave up his tutorship, and retired to his curacy, from which he removed in 1825, to assume the curacy of Hursley, Hampshire, where he remained during the remainder of his life, becoming vicar in 1835. He held the lectureship of poetry in Oxford from 1831 to 1841.

Keble's reputation rests upon his contributions to devotional poetry, and the share he took in the spread of sacramentarian views in the Church of England, and the development of the Oxford, or Tractarian, movement. In 1827 he published his Christian Year (Oxford, 2 vols.), a collection of sacred lyrics, which appeared at first anonymously. This work, which has been very widely used, is imbued with a spirit of rare spiritual fervor,—a characteristic which has been sufficient to render of little effect the not unjust criticisms, that the author is frequently careless of the forms of poetry, and not always felicitous in diction. "Some of the poems," says Principal Shairp, "are faultless after their kind, flowing from the first verse to the last, lucid in thought, vivid in diction, harmonious in their pensive melody." Many of the originals of the poems were written on the backs and edges of letters, in old account-books and pocket-books. The first edition was five hundred copies. Between 1827 and 1873, when the copyright expired, a hundred and forty editions appeared, and 305,500 copies were sold. During the following five years the original publishers alone sold 70,000 copies. In 1839 appeared his Metrical Version of the Psalter, and in 1846 another volume of sacred lyrics entitled Lyra Innocentium, a collection of poems for childhood, its weaknesses, troubles, temptations, religious privileges. Mr. Keble's most important literary work was the edition of the Works of Richard Hooker, which he prepared at the request of the University Press, and which, after six years of labor, appeared at Oxford in 1836. It is justly considered the best edition of Hooker. Several of Keble's hymns have been introduced into English hymn-books, of which the best are "O God of mercy, God of might," and the devout and restful evening song, "Sun of my soul, thou Saviour dear," taken from the second poem in the Christian Year, entitled "Evening."

Mr. Keble adopted very high views on the sacraments and the apostolical constitution of the Church. He held to the doctrine of the apostolical succession, the high sacramental view of the Lord's Supper, and the usefulness of the confessional, which he regretted that circumstances did not justify him in introducing into his own church. At Oxford he was a close and intimate friend of Newman, Pusey, and Hurrell Froude, who had once been his pupil. With him and several others, the notion started of issuing brief and pointed tracts promulgating High-Church principles, and raising the standard of piety in the Church. The result was the so-called Tracts for the Times, which reached the number of ninety, created a profound impression in England, and the studies spent in the preparation of which, or the stimulus of them, led to the defection to the Roman-Catholic communion of Newman, and others of the best spirits of the Church of England. Keble himself wrote eight of the series, Nos. 4, 13, 40, 52, 54, 57, 60, 89; the first (No. 4) being on apostolical succession. On July 14, 1833, he preached a sermon, in Oxford, on National Apostasy, the occasion of which was the suppression of ten Irish bishoprics, and which Cardinal Newman heard with the deepest interest, and has characterized as the starting-point for the Romeward tendency. Mr. Keble saw Dr. Newman's famous tract, No. 90, before it was published, and approved of it; but, though much dissatisfied with the state of the English Church, he did not leave its communion, and regarded the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception (1854) as an insuperable barrier to ecclesiastical union. He was not eloquent as a preacher, but scriptural and impressive. He had a wonderful magnetic power of attracting very closely to himself both the old and the young. It is characteristic of the genial type of his piety, and his simple spirit, that for thirty years he was scrupulous in his attendance upon the sabbath school twice a day. Although he took such a deep interest in children, he was himself childless. Shortly after his decease, his friends and admirers raised a large fund, and erected to his memory the beautiful structure of Keble College at Oxford.

In addition to the works above mentioned, Keble contributed to the Lyra Apostolica, and published his Oxford Lectures on Poetry, under the title, Prælectiones Academicæ (2 vols., Oxford, 1844), a Life of Bishop Wilson (Oxford, 1863, etc.). There have appeared since his death a volume of Occasional Papers and Reviews (Oxford, 1877), and eleven volumes of Sermons (Oxford, 1876-80). See Sir J. T. COLERIDGE: Memoir of John Keble, M.A. (2 vols., Oxford, 1869, and since), and art. Keble in Encyclopædia Britannica by Principal Shaip.

KECKERMANN, Bartholomæus, b. in Dantzic, 1571; d. there Aug. 25, 1609; studied at Wittenberg; was a teacher in the pædagogium; afterwards professor of Hebrew in the university of Heidelberg, and accepted in 1602 a call as rector of the gymnasium in his native city. Though he was only thirty-eight years old when he died, his Opera Omnia, which appeared at Geneva, 1614, touch almost every important point of philosophy and theology, and have exercised considerable influence on the internal organization of these two sciences. In their common aversion to scholasticism, the Reformers pursued various paths. Some of them (such as Luther) rejected, together with the scholastic theology, also the scholastically developed philosophy of Aristotle; while others (such as Melancthon) retained philosophy as a great science, but distinct from theology. It could not fail, however, that, after a little while, also the former party came to feel the need of a philosophy; and they gradually adopted the method and ideas of Petrus Ramus, or, in general, of the new philosophical school of Paris. In direct opposition to this movement, Keckermann urged the indispensableness of the works of Aristotle and Plato; but at the same time he established a sharp and decisive distinction between philosophy and Christian theology. Especially in the field of ethics this distinction became of paramount importance. Ethics, together with politics, he treated as the practical division of philosophy, though without denying that there might be a Christian ethics, just as there was a philosophical ethics; since theology, like philosophy, fell into two great divisions, — theoretical and practical theology. ALEX. SCHWEIZER.

KE'DRON, or KID'RON, a small stream which rises a mile and a half north-west of Jerusalem, strikes the north-eastern corner of the wall of the city, forms a deep gorge in the Valley of Jehoshaphat, between Mount Moriah and Mount Olivet, cuts its way through the Wilderness of Judah, and finally empties itself into the Dead Sea. Its name, from a Hebrew root which signifies "gloom," probably refers to the gloom of the surroundings, deepened by various historical associations (1 Kings xiv. 13; 2 Kings xi. 16; 2 Chron. xv. 16, xxix. 16, xxx. 14). In the New Testament it is mentioned (Mark xiv. 26; Luke xxii. 39; John xviii. 1), Christ crossing it on his way to Gethsemane.

KEIL, Karl August Gottlieb, b. at Grossenhain, Saxony, April 23, 1754; d. in Leipzig, April 22, 1818; studied theology at Leipzig, and was appointed professor there, of philosophy, in 1785, and of theology in 1787. As an exegete he tried to combine the historical principle of Semler with the grammatical principle of Ernesti. His views he has set forth in his Hermeneutik des Neuen Testament (Leipzig, 1810), translated into Latin by Emmerling (1812). His minor treatises, relating to the exegesis of the New Testament, appeared at Leipzig, 1820, under the title Opuscula Academica.

W. SCHMIDT.

KEIM, Carl Theodor, D.D., b. at Stuttgart, Dec. 17, 1825; d. at Giessen, Nov. 17, 1878. He studied at Maulbronn and at the universities of Tübingen (where he came under Baur's influence) and Bonn (1843-47); was tutor in the family of Count Sontheim (1848-50); Repetent at Tübingen (1851-55); pastor in Esslingen, Württemberg, from 1856 to 1859; from 1860 to 1873 he was ordinary professor of historical theology at the university of Zürich; from 1873 until shortly before his death, when ill health compelled his resignation, in the corresponding position at Giessen. Keim's life was, on the whole, sad. He was an invalid; and he chafed under the comparative obscurity of his academical position, for he felt himself fitted for a higher post. His theological stand-point may have hindered his promotion; for, while a rationalist, he was singularly candid and moderate, so that he pleased neither the orthodox nor the radicals. From 1851 he was the victim of an incurable brain trouble, which rendered him nervous and irritable. And this fact is the explanation of his resentment at adverse criticism; for at heart, like many another misjudged man, he was tender and lovable. The three years of preaching and pastoral labor at Esslingen, of which the memorial is Freundesworte zur Gemeinde. Eine Sammlung Predigten aus den Jahren 1857-60 (Stuttgart, 1861, 1862, 2 vols.),—a collection of sermons which put the great critical scholar in a new light, and show him to have been an eloquent and edifying preacher,—were delightful to him; and the way in which he performed his work evinced both his earnestness and his spirituality. But he was essentially an historian. At first, and for many years, the history of the Reformation in Swabia occupied him; and during this period he produced his masterly volumes: Die Reformation der Reichsstadt Ulm (Stuttgart, 1851), Schwäbische Reformationsgeschichte bis zum Augsburger Reichstag (Tübingen, 1855), Ambrosius Blarer (Stuttgart, 1860), Reformationsblätter der Reichsstadt Esslingen (Esslingen, 1860). When he accepted the chair of theology at Zürich, he turned his energies into another part of the field of church history. Henceforth, to his death, he studied the beginnings of Christianity, and it was in this department he won his universal fame. He chose as the theme of his inaugural (Dec. 17, 1860) Die menschliche Entwicklung Jesu Christi (The Human Development of Jesus Christ), Zürich, 1861. The address raised high expectations. It was evident Keim had a message. Die geschichtliche Würde Jesu (The Historical Dignity of Jesus), Zürich, 1864, came next. He then republished the two just named, with a new lecture, under the caption, Der geschichtliche Christus (The Historical Christ), Zürich, 1865, 3d ed., 1866. At last came the first instalment of the great work for which scholars had impatiently waited: Die Geschichte Jesu von Nazara in ihrer Verkettung mit dem Gesamtleben seines Volkes, Zürich, 1867-72, 3 vols.; English translation, Jesus of Nazareth, and the National Life of Israel, London, 1873-82, 6 vols. Nothing like it had hitherto appeared. Immense learning, tireless energy, nervous force, deep convictions, cautious judgment, reverence, these united to give the work a lasting importance. It was, and remains, the Life of Jesus from the rationalistic stand-point. In order to give his views a wider currency, Keim published Die Geschichte Jesu nach den Ergebnissen heutiger Wissenschaft für weitere Kreise übersichtlich erzählt (The History of Jesus in the Light of the most Recent Researches, told in condensed form for General Circulation), Zürich, 1873, 2d ed., 1875. In this latter work Keim altered his position upon some points. In the second edition he made important additions, particularly of a critical Appendix. His last work was Aus dem Urchristenthum, Geschichtliche Untersuchungen in zwangloser Folge

(Miscellaneous Essays upon Points connected with Primitive Christianity), Zürich, 1878. Only one volume has appeared up to this time (1882). Besides these, he issued an important essay upon the edicts of toleration of Christianity issued by Roman emperors (Die römischen Toleranzedictie für das Christenthum, 311-343, und ihr geschichtlicher Werth, in the "Theologische Jahrbücher," 1852), in which he prepared the way for the final explosion of the idea, accepted by Mosheim, Neander, and others, that there were three edicts of toleration, while as a matter of fact there were only two. See MASON: The Persecution of Diocletian, pp. 327, 328. Keim also wrote on the conversion of Constantine, Der Uebertritt Konstantins des Grossen, Zürich, 1862; and on Celsus, Wahres Wort, Zürich, 1873 (a reproduction, by piecing together Origen's quotations of Celsus' attack upon Christianity, to which Origen replied, and an elaborate and ingenious study of the same). After his death, H. Ziegler, his literary executor, carefully edited and carried through the press another book found among his papers, Rom und das Christenthum, Berlin, 1881. This last volume was written by Keim during 1855 and 1860, but, owing probably to his change of occupation, never finished. It is a masterly analysis of the conditions under which Christianity took its rise, and a clear and engrossing sketch of its early struggles with Paganism.

Keim was an intense man. He threw his whole soul into whatever he took up. In his student days he studied, with great zeal, Oriental languages under Ewald, and then philosophy under Reiff. When he turned from Reformation studies to early church history, he turned completely. Theologically he belonged to the school of Baur; but he was no blind follower of the great master; rather a fearless, independent student. Therefore he gave up such positions as he had satisfied himself were untenable. In his great book upon the life of Christ, he put opposite to Paul, upon whom the Tübingen school dwelt so forcibly, the majestic figure of Christ; and, while agreeing in the main with their conclusions, he emphasized the paramount importance of the Master. He unfortunately rejected the fourth Gospel, and minimized the miraculous element: but he refuted the hypothesis of a vision, and assumed revelations of the glorified Lord to his disciples to explain the story of the resurrection; and, compelled by his fairness, admitted the superhuman character of Christ, saying, "The person of Jesus is not only a phenomenon among the many phenomena of God, it is a special work of God, the crown of all the divine revelations." He calls Jesus "the sinless one, the Son of God," and says he "makes the impression of a superhuman miracle."

Keim never married. His sister kept house for him, and he had a canary bird and a cat to keep him company. His style of composition is a frequent subject of complaint. He endeavored to say too much in a single sentence. His handwriting was almost illegible. (See the sketch of his life by H. Ziegler, prefixed to Rom und das Christenthum, from which this article is mainly taken.)

SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

KEITH, Alexander, D.D., author of several works on prophecy, b. at Keith Hall, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 1791; d. in Buxton, Feb. 7, 1880; and ordained minister of the parish of St. Cyrus, Kincardineshire, in 1816. In 1824 he published in Edinburgh, where his subsequent books also appeared, his first work, Evidence of the Truth of the Christian Religion, derived from the Literal Fulfillment of Prophecy. The book had a great run, nearly forty editions having been printed in the author's lifetime. Its most original feature was the use it made of the testimony of modern travellers as to the present condition of Palestine and other Bible countries, the truth of the prophecies being unconsciously attested by them. At various times Dr. Keith followed up this work by The Signs of the Times (1832, 2 vols., 8th ed. 1847, — an exposition of symbolical prophecies in Daniel and Revelation), Demonstration of the Truth of Christianity (1838), The Land of Israel (1843), The Harmony of Prophecy (1851), History and Destiny of the World and of the Church (1861), Reply to Elliot's Horæ Apocalyptica, Reply to Stanley's Remarks on Prophecy, etc., in his Sinai and Palestine. In 1839 Dr. Keith, with Dr. Black of Aberdeen, Rev. R. M. McCheyne, and Rev. Andrew Bonar, went out to Palestine, Eastern Europe, etc., by appointment of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on a mission of inquiry as to the state of the Jews preparatory to the establishment of a mission among them. In 1843, on the occurrence of the disruption, he gave up his connection with the Establishment, and helped to found the Free Church of Scotland. For a number of years he was convener of the committee for the conversion of the Jews. Though he lived to a great age, he was always somewhat of an invalid, and at a comparatively early period he retired from active service in the ministry, and devoted himself to literary work. W. G. BLAIKIE.

KEITH, George, a distinguished Quaker, who, in the latter period of his life, joined the Church of England; b. in Aberdeen, Scotland, about 1610; d. in Edburton, Sussex, about 1714. He was designed for the Presbyterian ministry, but adopted the principles of the Quakers about 1664. He suffered imprisonment for preaching in England, and emigrated to America, where he was surveyor-general in East New Jersey, 1685-88, and taught a school in Philadelphia, 1689. He travelled in New England, and defended the principles of the Quakers against Increase and Cotton Mather. Returning to Philadelphia, he became involved in a controversy with his own sect, chiefly upon the atonement. He also accused the Friends of being infected with deistic notions. Returning to England, he met Penn himself, who, on hearing one of his sermons on the atonement, rose in his seat, and pronounced him an apostate. Keith was condemned by the Annual Meeting, but formed a body of his own, known as the "Christian Quakers," or "Keithians." Still restless, he united with the Church of England, and was sent out to America as a missionary. In 1706 he returned to England, and was settled at Edburton, where he died. Burnet, in his History of our own Times, says that Keith "was esteemed the most learned man that ever was in that sect, and was well versed in the Oriental tongues, philosophy, and mathematics." He engaged in a controversy with Robert Barclay, against whom he wrote his principal work, The Standard of the Quakers examined; or, an Answer to the Apology of Robert Barclay, London, 1702. In this work he tries to prove the seemingly "impregnable bulwark" of Barclay "defective, unsound, and erroneous," and considers a variety of subjects, from immediate revelation and man's fall, to recreations, oaths, and defensive war. See JANNEY'S History of the Friends, Philadelphia, 1867.

KELLS, the Synod of, was convened, in 1152, by Cardinal Paparo, the legate of Eugenius III., for the purpose of re-organizing the Church of Ireland after the Roman model. Only the south-eastern part of the country, inhabited by Danish settlers who had received Christianity from their kinsmen in England, stood in active communication with Rome, through the archbishop of Canterbury. In the rest of the country the old Keltic Church was still living, though insulated, and now rapidly falling into decay. The synod effected the ecclesiastical division of the country into the four archbishoprics of Armagh, Cashel, Dublin, and Tuam, the establishment of a hierarchy, the introduction of tithes and the Peter's-pence, the acknowledgment of the papal supremacy, etc.

KELLY, Thomas, the author of some excellent hymns; b. near Athy, in Queen's County, Ireland, 1769; d. May 14, 1855. Graduating with honor at Dublin University, he devoted himself to the study of law, in London, until his mind being aroused on the subject of religion, he consecrated himself to the ministry, and was ordained in the Established Church in 1792. His preaching was more fervid and evangelistic in character than was usual at that day. He was encouraged by the visit of Rowland Hill to Ireland, in 1793, to preserve this style, but was, after a time, inhibited, by the archbishop of Dublin, from preaching in the diocese. He then began preaching in dissenting chapels in Dublin, soon became a dissenter himself, and from his ample means built a number of Congregational churches at Athy, Wexford, Waterford, etc. In 1801 Mr. Kelly published a volume of ninety-six Hymns on Various Passages of Scripture. In subsequent editions (7th ed., Dublin, 1853) the number was greatly increased. Mr. Kelly's best hymns are "On the mountain-tops appearing," and "We sing the praise of Him who died," which is distinguished by fervor and strong Christian confidence.

KELTIC CHURCH. This title may be said to apply primarily to the early Christian communities among the aboriginal tribes of Great Britain and Ireland, — the Britons, the Picts, and the Scoti, or Irish, — as well as among the kindred tribes of Brittany and Galicia. Notwithstanding many feuds, they were bound together by affinities of race and language, and by certain customs and peculiarities of church organization to which they tenaciously clung long after they had been abandoned elsewhere. Secondly the term may be held to embrace those missions among other nationalities — Saxon, Frank, Burgundian, German, Swiss, and Lombard — which originated in the zealous and self-denying labors of Keltic missionaries from Ireland or Iona.

The history of the Keltic Church has been appropriately divided into three periods: (1) The period of its rise and growth in the countries which were its home, extending from the third to the fifth century, (2) That of its full maturity of Christian life and culture at home, and of missionary activity abroad, extending from the sixth to the eighth century; (3) That of its gradual decay or violent suppression from the ninth to the twelfth century. It will be evident, that, in the compass of this article, we can give only the barest outline of the history, and but the briefest account of the doctrine, ritual, and organization, of the Keltic Church.

A. History. I. PERIOD OF RISE AND GROWTH IN THE COUNTRIES WHICH WERE ITS HOME.

I. South Britain.—When and how Christianity was first introduced into Britain is a question we cannot fail to ask, and one to which as yet we must be content without a very definite answer. But the little we know of British Christianity in pre-Saxon times—of the doctrine, rites, and constitution of the Church—seems rather to favor the idea of its origin from, and close connection with, the half-Oriental, half-Keltic churches of Gaul than more directly with the Church of Rome, or, as was once supposed, that of Asia Minor. It is only at the close of the second century, or beginning of the third, that we reach firm standing-ground in the brief but significant statement of Tertullian: “Britannorum inaccessa Romanis loca Christo vero subdita.” This is a very significant testimony, even if we translate, as we probably should, not THE places, but only indefinitely places, i.e., some places of the Britons inaccessible to the Romans, but subdued to Christ; and shows that the soldiers of the cross, even at that early date, had succeeded in extending the Master's sway beyond the limits which the Roman legions had reached, or at least had been able to hold in permanent subjection. Hardly less significant is the testimony of Origen, that there were those in Britain who believed in the name of the Saviour, and with joy called upon the Lord; and its significance is not diminished by his further statement, that there were still very many, in Britain and other distant lands, who had not yet heard the word of the gospel. The triumphs of the cross were still very limited in those regions; but there were certainly Christians who believed in the one God, and in our Lord Jesus Christ, and, perhaps, meetings of Christians who worshipped with joy the Father and the Son. True, they may have continued for a time but a “feeble folk,” not many wise, not many noble, may have been called, whose names would have been blazoned while they lived, or graven in brass or stone when they died. But, through the whole of the third century, there were those in Britain who in truth gave themselves to Christ, and did not dishonor his name, and who, when the day of trial came, proved faithful unto death. This was in the Diocletian persecution, the longest and bloodiest the Christian Church had to endure, during which Gildas, the native historian, speaking somewhat vaguely, tells us, “The whole Church seemed under execution, and charging bravely through an ill-natured and inhospitable world, marched, as it were, in whole troops to heaven.” Some maintain that he should have excepted his own country, and Gaul from the range of the persecution; but the latest British historian of these troubles throws his shield over the earliest, and shows that he was neither so ignorant nor so credulous as some have imagined him to be. “Some doubt,” says Mr. Mason, in his historical essay on the Diocletian persecution, “has been entertained on the question whether Constantius did not hinder the persecution from being universal by refusing to take any part in the work at all. It is difficult to discover how far Constantius really participated in the persecution; but that he did so is plain, not only from the fact that the edicts were now the law of the empire, to which he must needs conform, but also because some positive statements in the Acts of St. Crispina . . . prove, that, in Maximilian's part of the empire, the name of the Cæsar, Constantius, was officially quoted as countenancing the promulgation of the edict. Even the second edict, ordering the arrest of the clergy, must have been promulgated by Constantius; for that, at least, is needed to explain the one circumstantially related martyrdom of that time to which the British Church can lay claim.” This is that of Alban, commonly accounted the proto-martyr of Britain. Required to make his choice between sacrificing to the gods, and submitting to the punishment which would have been allotted to the presbyter whose escape he had aided, he adhered to his confession, and, after being scourged, was ordered to be beheaded. The same evening the sentence was executed on the hill outside the Roman town of Verulamium, where the city now stands which commemorates the martyr's name and fame.

From the cessation of the persecution we may date a more flourishing era of the British Church. It increased considerably in numbers, and was more fully organized; though it was yet far from fulfilling its mission, and gathering into its fold the majority of the British tribes. Three of its bishops (those of London, York, and of Colonia Londinensium, which some identify with Colchester, others with Lincoln or Caerleon) are registered among those who attended the synod of Arles held in 314, and are held as assenting to certain canons not in harmony with the later usages of the Keltic Church. It is possible that some of them were present at the Council of Sardica in 347; it is certain that some were at the synod of Ariminum in 359, and that three of them were so poor as to be obliged to accept the allowance offered by the emperor to defray their expenses. They were as yet, in all probability, like the Gallic and African bishops,—but the pastors of single congregations, or of a small circle of congregations.

The British churches and their bishops, like most of those in the West, sided, with Athanasius and the Council of Nicæa, against Arius; though, like many others, they were more concerned about the substance of the faith than about the particular terms used to express it. This gave occasion to Hilary to exhort them, as well as their brethren in Gaul and Germany, to take care, not only that they were orthodox in the substance of their belief, but also that they were in agreement with the Council of Nicæa as to the terms in which they expressed it. But, though the general orthodoxy of the British churches and their pastors is unquestionably established by the statements of Athanasius and Hilary, it seems to me that they push these statements too far who seek, on the ground of them, to cast discredit on the testimony of the native historians Gildas and Bede, that Arianism did, to some extent, make its presence known, and its power felt. The two sets of statements are not inconsistent. The churches, as a whole, may have been steadfast in the faith, while individuals here and there were carried away for a time by Arian or semi-Arian speculations.

From Pelagianism, in the beginning of the fifth century, the British churches confessedly suffered far more severely than they had done from any previous heresy. Indeed, Pelagius, from whom it took its name, is supposed, on good grounds, to have been a native of Britain. It was not in Britain, however, that he first promulgated his errors; but after he had vented them in the chief centres of Christian thought, and they had been refuted and condemned there, some of his partisans, perhaps his fellow-countrymen (Fastidius, and Agricola, son of Severianus, are the only ones mentioned by name), found their way into Britain, and promulgated their views there, at least with temporary success. The British bishops, being unable to cope with the intruders, sought an antidote from the same quarter from which, probably, the poison had come. At their request, Germanus of Auxerre, and Lupus of Poitiers, were, in 429, deputed by a Gallic synod (and, as Prosper has it, by direction of Pope Celestine) to give the assistance desired. Received with joy, they preached in the churches and in the fields; and so enthusiastic was the re-action they stirred up, that for a time the teachers of the new opinions hesitated to confront them in public. At length they summoned up courage to accept the challenge of the foreign bishops. A great meeting was held near Verulamium to hear the questions in dispute discussed. According to Bede, the Pelagians came forward in all the pride of wealth, and advocated their cause with the most inflated rhetoric. But Germanus and Lupus, when it came to their turn to reply, so overwhelmed them with arguments and authorities in support of their doctrine, and so forcibly urged the objections to the Pelagian theory, that the heresiarchs were silenced for the time, and the whole assembly triumphed in their discomfiture. Having thus, to all appearance, fulfilled their mission, Germanus and Lupus returned to Gaul. The Pelagians, freed from the presence of their foreign antagonists, speedily set to work to seduce once more the inconstant Britons; and with such success did they work, that in 447 Germanus was again entreated to come over and oppose them. He came, attended by Severus of Treves, and once more he conquered; but, not again content with refuting his opponents, he procured the banishment of their leaders from the island. On the final withdrawal of the Romans from the island, the feeble Britons, harassed first by the Picts and Scots, and then by the Saxons, whose help they had invited against the others, were in the end dispossessed by them of the larger part of their country, and enslaved or massacred without mercy, till the historian of their troubles could find no words adequate to express the extremity of their misery but those of the Hebrew Psalmist in the time of his people's sorest distress.

2. Britain between the Roman walls, i.e., the British kingdom of Cumbria or Strathelyde.—Here some would place the loca Romanis inaccessa Christo verò subdita, of which Tertullian speaks. Two famous missionaries are supposed to have been born here in the fourth century, both of Christian parents. St. Patrick is still, by the best authorities, held to have been born near Alcluaith, or Dumbarton; and as his father was a deacon, and his grandfather a presbyter, we seem warranted to infer that Christianity, and some organization of Christians, was not unknown in the district before the close of the previous century. The various dedications of churches, etc., to Patrick in the district, seem, according to Keltic usage, to show that he had labored there, as well as in Ireland. Two who did much for the continuance or revival of his work in Ireland are said to have been born in Cumbria; viz., Mochta, or Machutus, and Gildas.

Ninian, or Ninyas, is supposed to have been a native of the same region, born of Christian parents soon after the middle of the fourth century. After such training as he could get at home, he is said to have gone to one or more of the great centres of Christian thought and life; and, if his visit to Rome is somewhat doubtful, his training under St. Martin of Tours is more unquestioned. From him he probably received his mission, and had that enthusiasm which was to fit him for it kindled or quickened. To him he dedicated the stone church, which, with the help of masons from Gaul, he built at Caudida Casa, or Whithorn. Like him, he not only acted as bishop of the region, but became the head of a great monastic school. By his missionary labors he spread the gospel among the inhabitants of Galloway and Strathelyde, as well as among the Picts between the Grampian Mountains and the Firth of Forth. No doubt his work was, to a large extent, but temporary and partial; so that St. Patrick, soon after his death, could speak of the Picts as apostate. Still the memory of it lived, and gave an advantageous foothold to Kentigern, Serf (?), Terman, and the companions of Columba, who afterwards brought these various regions more thoroughly under the influence of Christianity. His greatest and most permanent work, undoubtedly, was that effected through his monastic school, where, under himself and his like-minded successors, youths (many of them of noble birth) from the surrounding tribes and from Ireland were trained in Christian living, and stimulated to active Christian work, and in due time largely helped on the revival of religion in Ireland, as in Scotland.

3. Ireland.—This was the earliest home of the Scoti, and is, undoubtedly, the Scotia of the earlier middle ages. Christianity is supposed to have come to it from France, with which there was pretty close intercourse during the third and fourth centuries; but, if it met with any success, it must have been of a very limited kind. Celestius, the companion of Pelagius, is supposed by some to have been Scotie, i.e., Irish origin, and is said to have kept up correspondence with the land of his birth after he left it. Under the year 431—the year of the famous Council of Ephesus—we read in the Chronicon of Prosper of Aquitaine, "Ad Scotos in Christum eredentes ordinatur a Papa Celestino Palladius et primus episcopus mittitur." There were, then, already Scots who believed in Christ; and, according to the Irish legends, Palladius was not honored greatly to enlarge their number, and after a short time he left the country, and died in the land of the Picts. The Scottish legend is, that he lived there for many years, and carried on his mission with more success than in Ireland. The true apostle of Ireland was that Patricius to whom we have already referred as born near Dumbarton, in the kingdom of Strathclyde, who, being carried captive in his youth to Ireland, served there for six years as a slave, and who, after a second and very brief captivity, felt an inward call to devote himself to the work of converting the barbarous tribes among whom his lot, when a slave, had been cast. Some suppose that he had begun his missionary work before Palladius set foot in the country; others, that he only began it after Palladius had retired from it in despair. If there is much that is legendary and untrustworthily in the accounts that have come down to us regarding him, there can be little doubt that he began his work about that time, and that he prosecuted it with great perseverance, and with a large amount of success. According to the old Irish tradition, the saints of the first order were all bishops. St. Patrick is said to have ordained three hundred and fifty or three hundred and sixty-five of them, and to have founded as many churches. They were, therefore, of a very humble grade,—such village or tribal bishops as were to be found in Keltic Brittany, and such they appear to have continued to a comparatively late date in Ireland. Two writings attributed to St. Patrick have been preserved,—his Confessio and his Epistola ad Coroticum; the former of which is certainly, and the latter is probably, genuine. Both exhibit him as a humble, simple-minded, self-denying, and devoted Christian missionary, holding by the great truths generally held by the worthies of the ancient church, and apparently unacquainted with, or averse to, several erroneous opinions which were coming into favor elsewhere. The hymn attributed to him, and translated in Dr. Todd's life of the saint, shows, that, to some extent, superstitious notions still mingled with his simple faith. Neither the style nor the contents of his confessio are in harmony with the opinion that he spent several years in Rome, or sought or got any confirmation of his mission from it.

II. PERIOD OF REVIVED CHRISTIAN LIFE AT HOME, AND OF MISSIONARY ACTIVITY ABROAD. —The clergy of the earlier period, even in Ireland, seem to have been mainly a secular clergy, and had to deal with people scattered among their heathen kindred, and in strict subjection to their secular chiefs. Monastic institutions, so far as they were present at all, formed but a subordinate feature in the Church of that time. But in this second period, and under the second order of saints, these institutions held a more important place in Wales and Ireland, and in Scotland became the most distinctive feature of the Church,—nay, with their dependencies and missionary colonies, may be said to have constituted the Church. These houses, however, were rather missionary institutes, like those of the Moravians, for the conversion of surrounding tribes, and the training and protection of the converts, than monasteries in the later sense. Whence the new life and organization came,—whether from the magnum monasterium of Ninian at Whithorn, or from the source from which the founder of that monastery had got it,—the monastery at Tours, or some affiliated institution in Brittany, or whether, as Gildas says, it was the result of the deep penitence of the Britons under the terrible chastisements they suffered at the hands of the Saxon invaders—it were not easy now to determine. All we know with certainty is, that, in the sixth century, it specially manifested itself in the monastic schools of Wales, was conveyed from them to Ireland through Finnian of Clonard, and from Ireland was brought back in intensified form to Scotland. This century, Bishop Forbes tells us, in his Introduction to the Life of St. Kentigern, "was, in Wales, a century of national life, of religious and mental activity. It was the age of Sts. David, Illutus, Sampson, Teilo;" it sent missionaries to Ireland and to Brittany. Indeed, Brittany, which had suffered from various invaders almost as severely as England itself, was to a large extent repopled from Britain. It was at this epoch that the celebrated monastic college of Bangor—Iscoed on the Dee—was founded. It was from the Welsh saints, especially David, Gildas, and Cadoc, that the impulse to the new movement in Ireland came. The traditions as to the second order of Irish saints, almost all of whom were presbyters and monks, point to a great revival and spread of religion through a new and living agency based on monastic institutions, in which the population which gathered round the more strictly ecclesiastical nucleus, separated from heathen relations, and freed from the arbitrary control of secular chieftains, could be more fully instructed in Christian truth, more carefully trained in Christian living, and guarded from contamination with the pollutions of heathenism. In these institutions attention was given to various departments of learning and culture, as well as to more simple instruction in Christian truth and the practices of Christian devotion. That and the two succeeding centuries are spoken of as the "golden age of Ireland," when, within these monastic sanctuaries at least, there was contentment, prosperity, zealous study, and earnest Christian life; when they were the resort of students from Britain and the continent of Europe; and when the land was known as the "home of learning," as well as the "island of saints." This mission-work was especially carried on by twelve of Finnian's disciples, who covered their native land with such institutions, and became known as the "twelve apostles of Ireland." Two of the band were, like their master, descended from the Irish Picts; and one of them, at least, found scope for his missionary activity among the Picts of Scotland, as well as among their brethren in Ireland. But the chief of all the twelve was Columba, who united in himself the training of both the great monastic schools, having been the pupil of Finnian of Moville, who had the training of Whithorn, as well as of Finnian of Clonard, who had the training of the Welsh school. The details of his romantic career and marvellous success are given in the article on Columba (vol. i. pp. 515, 516), and need not be here repeated. The work begun by him and his twelve companions at Iona was carried on by their successors till all Pictland and the Scotie kingdom of Dalriada, as well as part of their native country, were covered with institutions subject to the mother-house of Iona and its presbyter abbot, the coarb of Columba; and evangelists were sent out thence to many of the outlying islands, and to the great Anglie kingdom of Northumbria.

It is said to have been but a few years before the death of Columba, that the last of the British bishops in England abandoned their sees, and, with the remnant of their flocks, sought refuge from the cruel oppression of their heathen invaders in the mountain fastnesses of the west and south, which yet remained in the hands of their kindred. It was in the very year of Columba's death, that Augustine and his companions — the emissaries of Pope Gregory I. — commenced in Kent their mission for the conversion of the Saxon tribes, and made various but fruitless efforts to bring the British Church to adopt their usages, and aid their work. Their labors, at first, were attended with partial success, both at the court of the ruler of Kent and at that of Edwin of Northumbria; but, on the defeat and death of the latter, his successors and their subjects returned to heathenism. The ultimate conversion of the tribes between the Forth and the Humber, as even Dr. Hook has acknowledged, was far more largely due to influences proceeding from Iona than from Rome or Canterbury. The family of Edwin's predecessor had taken refuge among the Scots, had been educated by the monks of Iona, and some of them, at least, had sincerely embraced the Christian faith. When Oswald succeeded his elder brother on the throne, and finally defeated the British champion who had triumphed both over Edwin and his brother, he was desirous that all his people should be brought over to the Christian faith. He accordingly sent to "the seniors of the Scots," among whom he and his followers had received the sacrament of baptism, and requested that they would send him a bishop to instruct his people in the faith. They sent, first, Cormac; and, on his proving too stern to gain the rude Angles, they commissioned Aidan, a man, according to Bede, of singular meekness, piety, and moderation. The king assigned to Aidan, as his residence, the Island of Lindisfarne, or the Holy Island, on the east coast of Northumberland, not far from the royal Castle of Bamborough. There he established a monastery, after the model of that of Iona, bringing, at least, twelve companions with him, and taking in training several bands of young Saxons, some of whom afterwards became missionaries, and aided in the evangelization of their Saxon countrymen. Aidan and his companions preached the gospel zealously, travelling from place to place, and pressing their message on the acceptance of all. The king often acted as their interpreter till they became familiar with the language of his subjects. All commended their doctrine by their holy, humble, self-denying lives. Oswin, the brother of Oswald, and the ruler of Southern

Northumberland, or Deira, also welcomed the Scottish missionaries, who thus had free course, as evangelists, from the Forth to the Humber. Aidan died in 651, and Finan, or Finnian, was sent from Iona as his successor. He was honored, not only to carry forward the work which Aidan had so nobly begun in Northumbria, but also to extend it to the south, gaining an entrance for the faith into the Pagan kingdom of Mercia, and also recalling to it the East Saxons, formerly won over partially by one of the Roman missionaries. An Irish missionary also is said to have been the first to preach the gospel to the East Angles. Thus, from Keltic Iona and Ireland "the gospel was carried among the Pagan tribes from the Forth to the Thames; and the Jutes and Angles of Northumbria, the Middle Angles of Mercia, the East Angles and the East Saxons, were won over to the Christian faith." In 661 Finan was succeeded by Colman. In his time occurred the famous synod, or conference, at Streaneschaleh, or Whitby, at which it was determined by Oswy that the Saxon churches should conform to the Roman, in the time of observing Easter, and in the form of the clerical tonsure. Colman, who could not bring himself to abandon the customs of the Church of Iona, thereupon retired from England; but several of his and of Aidan's pupils remained, and, while conforming in these external things to the new régime, continued with vigor their evangelistic work. In the course of the sixth century many earnest and able men went forth from the Scoto-Irish monasteries to labor as missionaries on the continent of Europe, and win over to Christianity, or the trinitarian form of it, the Teutonic tribes who had broken up and overspread the western part of the Roman Empire. Chief among these, towards the close of the century, was Columbanus, or Columba, jun., the pupil of Comghall and Finnian of Clonard. Setting out, like his elder namesake, with twelve companions, he attempted to carry the gospel to some of the heathen tribes in England. Meeting with no success among them, he passed on to the Continent, and settled first in Burgundy, at Luxovium, or Luxenil. There, amidst the forests, he constructed a monastery in Scotie form, which soon became famous as a nursery of piety, a centre of Nicene orthodoxy, and a school for the training of Christian youth. Two other institutions of a similar character were set up in the surrounding districts, and occupied by his disciples, remaining, according to the custom of his native land, subject to his jurisdiction. He and his disciples soon succeeded in gaining the confidence of the people among whom they had settled; but their popularity at length roused the jealousy of the native clergy who had remained in that part of Gaul after it passed into the hands of the Burgundians. In particular, their adherence to the custom of the Irish Church, as to the time of observing the Easter festival, and their claim to a separate organization, exposed them to much trouble. Columbanus wrote boldly in defence of his views, both to Gregory I. and to one of his successors. He wrote in similar terms to a French synod, assembled to determine the matter in dispute, resolutely contending for the custom of his own church, and earnestly pleading to be allowed "to live quietly in those woods, beside the bones of his seventeen departed brethren," as hitherto. By his stern faithfulness in rebuking the shameless excesses of Theodoric, or Thierry, he also incurred the displeasure of that Burgundian monarch, and was ordered to leave the kingdom. After laboring for a short time in various German cities on the banks of the Rhine, he made his way into Switzerland, where he was successful in reclaiming many who had relapsed into Paganism. He preached the gospel on the shores of Lake Constance and in the Rhetian territory; and leaving behind him Gallus, the disciple whose name has been permanently associated with the district, to complete his work, he passed over the Alps into Italy. By permission of the king of the Lombards, he settled in his dominions, and raised at Bobbio that monastery which was to preserve to future generations his name and fame, and many of his writings. It is to these writings that Dr. Ebrard is mainly indebted for the account he has given of the teaching of the Columban missionaries, and they certainly present it in its most favorable aspect. Columbanus died in 615.

Under Theodoric's successor, the monastery of Luxovium revived, and became the mother of a considerable number of similar institutions in various parts of France. Eustasius, who presided over it, also carried the gospel to Bavaria; Kilian, to Thuringia; Fiacre, Fursey, Ultan, and others, to various parts of France, Belgium, etc. Less known Irish missionaries in the eighth century introduced Christianity into the Faroe Islands, and even into Iceland. "Thus, between the fifth and eighth centuries, the Keltic Church extended, with intermissions, north and south from Iceland to Spain, east and west from the Atlantic to the Danube, from westernmost Ireland to the Italian Bobbio and the German Salzburg, — catholic in doctrine and practice, and yet with its claims to catholicity ignored or impugned; with a long roll of saints, every name of note on which is either that of one, like Columbanus, taking a line wholly independent of Rome, or, like Colman at the synod of Whitby, directly in collision with her; having its own liturgy, its own translation of the Bible, its own mode of chanting, its own monastic rule, its own cycle for the calculation of Easter, and presenting both internal and external evidence of a complete autonomy." "It brought religion straight home to men's hearts by sheer power of love and self-sacrifice. It held up before them, in the unconscious goodness and nobleness of its representatives, the moral evidence of Christianity, and made them feel what it was to be taught and cared for in the life spiritual by pastors, who, before all things, were the disciples and ministers of Christ" (like Aidan, Columbanus, and Gallus).

III. PERIOD OF ITS GRADUAL DECAY OR VIOLENT SUPPRESSION. — As already stated, the Columban Church of Northumbria was required by Oswy, in 664, to conform to certain customs of the Roman Church. Bishop Colman and some of his clergy, who refused to do so, returned to their native country. Others, who complied, were allowed to remain; though some had to submit to a ceremony which implied that their Scotie ordination was imperfect. Wilfrid, who had been the chief advocate of Roman usages at Whitby, was promoted to the vacant bishopric; and, declining to own the mission of the Scotie prelates, he sought and obtained consecration on the Continent. The British churches in Wales did not conform to the Roman rule for determining the Easter festival till a century after the synod of Whitby, nor were they brought fully under the English metropolitan see till the twelfth century. The churches of Devonshire and Cornwall conformed to the Roman Easter about the beginning of the eighth century, but were not completely brought under the archbishop of Canterbury till the Norman times. The see of St. Ninian at Whithorn was revived by the Saxons when masters of that part of North Britain, and continued for several centuries to be subject to the archiepiscopal see of York. The see of St. Kentigern, by persuasion of Adamnan, conformed to the Roman usages in 688, and for a time also was brought into subjection to the see of York. Nechtan, the imperious king of the Picts, who turned the tide of Saxon conquest in Scotland, on the suggestion of Saxon or Irish emissaries, required his clergy to conform to the Roman customs. But part of them, if they yielded for a time, did so against their convictions: and in 717 he took the strong step of expelling from his dominions the Scotie monks, or "family of Hii, or Hy." They were not restored to their old foundations till the time of Kenneth Mac Alpin; and immigrants were brought from various quarters to supply their places, — some from Saxon England, more from the south of Ireland. These were disciples of the third order of Irish saints, and are supposed to have been mainly Culdees. (See art. on CULDEES, vol. i pp. 579–581.) The Church of South Ireland accepted the Roman reckoning of the Easter festival in 634, that of North Ireland about 710; but no doubt there continued for a time, in several of the smaller monasteries, adherents of the older custom. Iona is said to have conformed in 717: but in 729 Mr. Skene tells us but one festival is mentioned on which the new custom had been observed; and till 771 it is said there was a schism in the island, — rival abbots, and probably rival celebrations of the festival. The final extinction of the old Keltic Church, both in Scotland and Ireland, was due, in part at least, to internal decay, and was not completed till the close of the eleventh century, under St. Margaret in Scotland and St. Malachy in Ireland. The Keltic bishopric in Galicia seems to have been brought into conformity with the Church of Spain in the seventh century. The peculiar usages of the Church in Brittany were not abandoned till the ninth century, nor was it till the close of the twelfth century that it was finally brought under the archbishopric of Tours. The suppression of the Keltic Church in Germany was brought about mainly through the labors of the Anglo-Saxon Winfred, or St. Boniface, and in the first half of the eighth century.

B. Doctrine, Ritual, and Constitution. 1. Doctrine of Keltic Church. — The general orthodoxy of its great teachers is shown by the professions of faith contained in the writings of St. Patrick and Columbanus, by the statements of Gildas, Bede, and others in early times, and the acknowledgments of Montalembert and other Roman "Catholics" in our own time. In the controversy as to the "Tria Capitula" in connection with the fifth general council, Baronius admits that the Irish Church took a different view from that of Rome. But what mainly separated it and the British churches, in the second period of their history, from the Church of Rome, was the difference of their usages as to the reckoning of the Easter festival, the tonsure, etc., their claim to independence in their own lands, and assertion of the right to send missionaries elsewhere without authority from Rome. Ebrard and some others seem still to regard them as a sort of premature protestants. We think it would be nearer the truth to say, that, as the twilight lasts so much longer in these northern regions, so also the after-glow of the primitive day was lengthened out there, when darkness was coming on apace elsewhere, and that the great teachers there retained a singularly living hold of the central doctrines of the gospel, and, above all, of the evangelistic commission given by the great Head to his Church, and of the supremacy of his Holy Word. We doubt if, anywhere in the early literature of the Christian Church, more emphatic reference will be found to that commission than in the confession of St. Patrick, or a more touching and hearty vindication of the supremacy of Scripture than in Columbanus's letters to Gregory the Great and Boniface IV. Even Adamnan says that they were wont to support their doctrines "by referring to the testimony of Holy Scripture;" and the Saxon Bede testifies that they "only observed those works of piety and chastity which they could learn in the prophetic, evangelical, and apostolical writings." The teaching of their great doctors, from Patrick to Columbanus, concentrated itself round the person and work of our divine-human Redeemer,—"Christ before, Christ behind, Christ above, Christ beneath, Christ in the heart, Christ in the eye, Christ at home, Christ abroad."

2. Ritual.—No fragment of a liturgy or missal in any ancient Keltic dialect has yet been brought to light. Mr. Skene, however, the most careful and impartial investigator in our day, does not hesitate to affirm, that, from the account of the Culdee service at St. Andrews, given in the life of St. Margaret as being contra totius ecclesie consuetudinem ritu barbaro, it is a not unnatural inference that there was a vernacular service-book. On the other hand, it is maintained by Mr. Haddan that the earliest converts to Christianity in Britain were Romans or Romanizing Britons; that Latin was understood by most of them for a long time after; that most of the writings of British and Scoto-Irish authors of the first six centuries, all the extant psalters and books of the Gospels, and the few liturgical fragments which have survived, are written in Latin; and that the ecclesiastical use of the Keltic did not commence till the Church began to include among her members and ministers persons who were ignorant of Latin, and that even then it was confined to rubrics and sermons, or addresses, and translations into the vernacular of Scriptures read in Latin. A detailed and interesting account of these Keltic liturgical fragments has been given by F. E. Warren, B.D., in his Liturgy and Ritual of the Keltic Church (1881). The Scottish fragment in the Book of Deer, the Irish fragments in the Books of Dimma, Mulling Armagh, and in certain St. Gall and Basle manuscripts, he and other careful students of liturgiology hold to be of distinctly Ephesine character, and in far closer agreement with the ancient Gallican than with the Roman offices, though having various distinctive characteristics. The Stowe Missal, of which he gives a fuller account than we had before, he holds to be of a more composite character, and to belong to that later time when the Irish saints diversas regulas et missas habebant. Warren, as well as Westcott, Haddan, and Stubbs, says, that, though there was no vernacular translation of the Scriptures, there was a special British and Irish recension of the old Latin text of the Bible for use in the Keltic Church.

3. Church Constitution.—There can be no doubt that originally the constitution of the Keltic Church was that of other churches of the age. In South Britain there were bishops, and with distinct sees. There were at least seven in Wales at the time of the conference at Aust with Augustine of Canterbury. There was no lack of them in Ireland, apparently, in the time of St. Patrick and the first order of Irish saints; though they seem to have been but tribal bishops, and at times located in groups of seven near each other. According to the ancient tradition, they were greatly diminished in number under the second and third orders of saints, when the Church assumed more distinctively its monastic and missionary form. Some will have it, that, in North Britain, they were wanting for a time altogether as a distinct order: others say this is an invention of ignorant and prejudiced Presbyterians; but, whether it be true or not, it was certainly no invention of theirs, any more than the sham catalogues of bishops at Armagh, and down from the time of St. Patrick, were the invention of their Anglican opponents. Both statements came from Roman-Catholic sources; and the worst that can be said of the respective parties is, that each may have received too credulously that statement which seemed to favor their own views. The abbot—generally a relative of the chieftain, who endowed the religious house—was certainly the most important dignitary in it, and, with his council of seniors, not only managed its concerns and those of affiliated houses, but (according to Mr. King, who is himself an Episcopalian) presided in church councils, and decided controversies "in connection with matters of religious opinion and practice." Whether further research shall confirm the conclusions of Drs. Killen and M-Lauchlan, or shall clearly show (what the facts as yet alleged by Drs. Reeves and Skene seem to me hardly sufficient to show) that there were from the first in the monasteries of Scotland, as there were in several of the monasteries of Ireland, persons bearing the name of bishops; whether it shall confirm the opinion of Ebrard, that the Columban bishops were like the abbots and the lectors (simply presbyters appointed to a special work), or that of the learned Irish and Scottish antiquaries, who contend that they had some distinct ordination,—the fact remains uncontroverted and incontrovertible, that for centuries they were, in Ireland and Scotland, and the missions on the Continent, subordinate to the presbyter-abbot and his council. This fact, admitted by Bede, and in harmony with many others recently brought to light by Ritschl, Lightfoot, and Hatch, is capable of explanation on the hypothesis that bishop and presbyter were originally but different names for one office, and that the distinction between them was a matter of human arrangement, and that the superiority of the former over the latter was developed after the days of the apostles "by little and little," and in some countries more slowly than in others. But on the hypothesis that the bishop, under that name or any other, was by divine appointment distinct from the presbyter, and superior to him, the facts now admitted as to the constitution of the old Irish and Scottish monastic Church seem to me all but inexplicable. The analogy sometimes drawn between the position of such a bishop and that in which a bishop may sometimes find himself in a college or university still, — under a presbyter president or vice-chancellor, — fails in a most important respect; for neither the college nor university is the church in which quâ bishop he is to discharge his function. But in the second period of the Keltic Church the monastery and the Church were one; and the special sphere in which the bishop as bishop had to work was the mother-house, or its affiliated institutions. In all he did he was directed by the abbot and his council, and that even in the act of ordination. If the word ordinantes, which Bede (in Book iii. 5) uses of the presbyter-abbot and his seniors at Iona, is not to be taken in its natural sense of an act done by themselves, then it can only be taken causatively, i.e., of an act ordered or caused to be done by them. That interpretation is hardly less fatal to any claim of the bishop to an office jure divino higher than the presbyter's.

KEMPIS, Thomas à, the author of the De Imitatione Christi ("The Imitation of Christ"); b. in 1379, or 1380, in Kempen, a town forty miles north of Cologne; d. July 26, 1471, at Zwolle, in the Netherlands. His paternal name was Hamerken, or, Latinized, Malleolus. He was brought up with care by his parents, and sent in 1395 to a famous school in Deventer, then under the charge of Florentius Radewijns and the Brothers of Common Life. In 1400 he was admitted to the Augustine convent at Mount St. Agnes, near Zwolle, received priest's orders in 1413, and was chosen subprior in 1429. In consequence of a papal interdiction, he left the convent for a season, sojourning at Arnheim. On his return he was again, in 1448, made subprior.

The life of Thomas was an uneventful one, and he seems to have taken no prominent part in the public movements of his day. It was while he still lived that the papal schism, the condemnation of Hus and Jerome, and other important ecclesiastical events, transpired. His piety was of a mystical type, and his contemplative nature delighted (so we gather from his ascetic and devotional writings) in analyzing the motives and feelings of the soul, and directing the gaze of the soul to Christ. He confined himself to the retirement of the convent, where he sometimes preached, and devoted much time to making copies of manuscripts, amongst which was the Bible. Underneath an old portrait of him are the words, which no doubt fitly characterize his life, "Everywhere I sought quiet, and found it nowhere else than in solitude and amongst books." He left behind him a number of works, all written in Latin, most of which are of a devotional character. Some of the titles of these are, The Garden of the Roses (Hortulus rosarum), The Valley of the Lilies (Vallis liliorum), The Soliloquy of the Soul (Soliloquium animæ), The Three Tabernacles (De tribus tabernaculis; i.e., poverty, humility, and patience), Sermons to Novices, Sermons and Meditations (Conciones et meditationes) on the life and death of our Lord, and a biography of Florentius Radewijns. These works, however, not of themselves have made their author famous, and given to his name a title of the interest which attaches to it. The immortality of his name is derived from the De Imitatione Christi. This work, consisting of four books, derives its name from the heading of the first chapter of the first book. It contains meditations upon the spiritual estate of the soul, and the ways of drawing into a closer and more personal union with Christ, and overcoming the evil tendencies of the natural man. It would be superfluous to say any thing in praise of this book, although it must be confessed that its quietistic instructions need to be supplemented by counsels for active work amongst men to make it fully adapted to the wants of Christians. It is calculated to promote personal piety in retirement, rather than to fit men for engaging in the public battles and work of life. Next to the Bible it has perhaps been the most extensively used manual of devotion in Christian lands. The first printed edition appeared at Augsburg, in 1486; and there were at least twenty editions before the close of the century. Since then it has been translated into many languages, including the Hebrew (Frankfurt, 1837). A polyglot edition appeared at Sulzbach in 1837, comprising the Latin, Italian, Spanish, French, German, English, and Greek translations. Some conception of the number of editions which have since appeared may be secured from the Büllingen collection of editions, which was donated, in 1838, to the Cologne municipal library, and contained at that time four hundred copies.

The authorship of the Imitation of Christ, although now pretty generally ascribed to Thomas à Kempis, has been the subject of one of the most heated discussions in the history of literature, and one in which not only individuals took part, but also two celebrated monastic orders, — the Augustinians and Benedictines. Even the honor of whole nations was deemed wrapped up in the settlement of the dispute. This discussion was introduced in 1604 by Padre Mauriquez, who asserted, on the basis of an alleged quotation of the Imitation of Christ by Bonaventura, in his Colloquies, that the author must have lived before Bonaventura. About the same time, Rossignoli, superior of the Jesuit College at Arona, near Milan, found a manuscript which was undated, but bore the title Ineipiunt capitula primi libri Abbatiss Joh. Gersen or Gesen. As the establishment had originally belonged to the Benedictines, it was supposed the manuscript was very old; but it was proved to have been brought from Genoa in 1579. It was natural to suppose that the famous chancellor of Paris, John Gerson, was here intended. But the Benedictine Cajetan, secretary of Paul V., sought to turn the discovery to the advantage of the Benedictine order, and had an edition printed in Rome, in which the work was ascribed to the "venerable man John Gersen, abbot of the order of St. Benedict." About the same time he announced the discovery of a Venice edition, in which the statement occurred, "Not John Gerson, but John, abbot of Vercelli, wrote this book." Advocates now arose defending the view that the work was written by Thomas à Kempis, which had been the most current view up to the beginning of the century. In 1638 Cajetan won a victory, when the congregation of the Index allowed it to be printed under the name of Gersen. But the dispute became more involved, and the advocates of the different views more intense in their convictions. The Italians claimed that it must have been written by an Italian; the French, by the great Paris chancellor; and the Germans, by a German. In 1640 Richelieu ordered a splendid edition, but being urged, on the one hand, by the Benedictines to ascribe it to Gersen, by the Augustinians, on the other, to Thomas à Kempis, he allowed it to go forth as an anonymous work. A number of works were written on the subject, and Du Cange and Mabillon, among others, espoused the Benedictine side; while Carré (Th. à Kempis a seipso restitutus, Paris, 1651), Hefer, and others, insisting upon the Germanisms of the style, and other arguments, urged the view that Thomas was the author. The dispute has been carried on down to the present time. The most important of the more recent advocates of the Gerson authorship are Grégoire, and the Italian Bartolomeo Veratti; and, of the Thomas view, Malou, Ullmann, Bishop Hefele, and Kettlewell. On the other hand many editors, like De Sacy (Paris edition, 1853) and Caro (preface to Paris edition, 1875), leave the matter undecided.

The weight of argument is decidedly on the side of Thomas à Kempis. Leaving out of view the evidence drawn from the contents of the De Imitatione, and the alleged Germanisms in the style, we will briefly sum up the historical proofs. (1) The anonymous life of Thomas à Kempis, a copy of which, in the British Museum, bears the date 1494, but which was probably written about ten years before, states that Thomas wrote The Interior Speaking of Christ to the Faithful Soul, which is the third book of the De Imitatione. It adds a catalogue of thirty-eight of Thomas's writings, among which are the four books of the De Imitatione. Buschius (Adrien de But) of Windesheim, in his Chronicles of Windesheim, written six years before Thomas's death (1464), and Hermann Ryd (b. 1408), expressly attribute it to Thomas, the latter speaking of him as a brother at Mount St. Agnes. Further: Peter Schott, who in 1488 edited Gerson's works, does not include it amongst them, but expressly ascribes it to Thomas. (2) By far the larger number of manuscripts before 1500 bear his name, as well as of the printed editions.

There are no contemporary witnesses to the view that Gerson was the author: on the contrary, the lists of Gerson's writings given by John, prior at Lyons, in 1423, and by Caresius in 1429, do not mention the De Imitatione. It is true that some of the manuscripts give his name; but this can easily be explained on the ground that Gerson's reputation as a theologian and mystical writer was constantly increasing, while Thomas à Kempis was comparatively unknown. As for Gersen, or Gesen, it is not even proved that a distinct person of this name ever lived; and the most tenable theory is, that the name was a misspelling for the chancellor of Paris.

D. S. SCHLAFF.

KEN, Thomas, a devout poet and bishop of the Church of England; b. at Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, July, 1637; d. at Longleat, Somersetshire, March 19, 1711. He studied at Winchester school and Oxford; was fellow of Winchester College in 1666, and prebendary of the cathedral in 1669. In 1675 he visited Rome, and on his return was accused of leanings towards the Roman-Catholic Church, but falsely. In 1679 he was made chaplain to Mary, at the court of William of Orange, at The Hague, but soon returned to England. In 1683, when he was again residing at Winchester, he showed the metal he was made of by refusing to give up his apartment to Nell Gwynn, the mistress of Charles II., who was visiting the city. When called upon to vacate his room, he replied, "Not for the king's kingdom!" Charles respected his refusal, and soon afterwards, when the see of Bath and Wells became vacant, made him bishop, exclaiming, "Odds fish! who shall have Bath and Wells but the little fellow who would not give poor Nelly a lodging." He was with the king during his last hours, and urged him to beg the pardon of his wife for his miserable treatment of her, pronounced absolution over him, and offered him (though in vain) the sacrament. He was loyal to James II., but refused to read the Declaration of Indulgence which that sovereign ordered (May 4, 1688) to be read in the churches, and was one of the seven bishops thrown into the Tower. At the accession of William and Mary he continued to be loyal to the fortunes of the exiled king, and, refusing to take the oath of allegiance, was in 1691 deprived of his see. He retired to Longleat in Somersetshire, where he spent the remainder of his days, and, for the greater part of the time, preserved from want by an annuity from Queen Anne, of two hundred pounds. He declined to be reinstated in his bishopric at the death of his successor, in 1703.

Bishop Ken was a man of rare piety and sweetness of spirit, and of fearless independence. He was a Non-juror from conscientious convictions. Macaulay speaks of his "moral character, when impartially reviewed, as sustaining a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and as approaching, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of Christian virtue." Of his ability in the pulpit, no testimony remains, except that of Evelyn, who speaks of "the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher." His sermons are no longer read. Ken has a conspicuous place in our church hymnology as the author of the doxology, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow." Two of his hymns—the morning hymn, "Awake, my soul, and with the sun," and the evening hymn, "Glory to thee, my Lord, this night," or, as it is usually written, "All praise to thee, my God, this night"—are among the purest, as well as most genial, hymns in the English language. The Doxology forms the last stanza of the evening hymn. His sacred lyrics went under the title, Morning, Evening, and Midnight Hymns; and, according to Bowles, many of them (including the Morning and Evening Hymns) were written for the boys of Winchester College, and during his incumbency as fellow. During the last years of his life this devout man carried his shroud in his portmanteau, and was accustomed to say that "it might be as soon wanted as any other of his habiliments." He was buried at Frome, near Longleat, and, at his request, just as the sun was rising,—a circumstance appropriate to the first line of his morning hymn, which was sung.

Ken's Poetical Works were published in 4 vols., London, 1721, with a Life prefixed by W. HAWKINS, which had previously appeared separately in 1713. His Prose Works were edited by ROUND, London, 1838. Other Lives, by BOWLES, 2 vols., London, 1830; A LAYMAN (J. L. ANDERDON), London, 1851, 2d ed., 1854 (the best); DUYCKSHANK, New York, 1859.

KEN'ITES, The, were a small tribe belonging to the Midianites. They are first mentioned in Abraham's time, as living, in part at least, in Canaan (Gen. xv. 19). In the time of the wandering they are found about Sinai; for to them Hobab, Moses' brother-in-law belonged (cf. Judg. i. 16; Num. x. 29), and with the Israelites they made the journey to Palestine. Their encampment, apart from the latter's, was noticed by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 21, 22). At a later period some of them were living in the northern part of Canaan (Judg. iv. 11), and some in the extreme south, near Judah (Judg. i. 16); and there they were in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 6). The kindness they had showed to Israel in the wilderness was gratefully remembered; and so they were not only spared by Saul, but David allowed them to share in the spoil he took from the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 6, xxvii. 10, xxx. 29). They then lived in cities. RÜETSCHL.

KENNET, White, antiquary, b. at Dover, 1660; d. at Westminster, Dec. 19, 1728. He was graduated from Oxford, where he was, a few years later, tutor and vice-principal of St. Edmund's Hall, and excited great interest in antiquities. He was made dean of Peterborough, 1707, and then bishop of the diocese of that name, 1718. His most valuable work is Parochial Antiquities of Oxford and Buckshire, Oxford, 1695. He was a vigorous upholder of the Low Church party.

KENNICOTT, Benjamin, Hebraist, b. at Totnes, Devonshire, April 4, 1718; d. at Oxford, Sept. 18, 1783. He studied at Oxford, and was elected fellow of Exeter College, 1747, in consequence of Two Dissertations: the First on the True of Life in Paradise, and the Second on the Oblations of Cain and Abel, Oxford, 1747. Soon after, he formed the design of collating the Hebrew manuscripts of the Bible; and, in order to excite interest in his plans, he published The State of the Printed Hebrew Text of the Old Testament considered, Oxford, 1753–59, 2 vols. The expenses of the collation were borne by a subscription of ten thousand pounds. Very many persons at home and abroad were employed: chief of these was Professor Paul Jakobus Bruns of Helmstädt (d. 1814), who collated Hebrew manuscripts in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland. The work lasted from 1760 to 1769 inclusive. Annual reports were made. Six hundred and fifteen Hebrew manuscripts and sixteen manuscripts of the Samaritan Pentateuch were collated. As the result of this long labor, he published his Hebrew Bible, Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum cum variis Lectionibus, Oxford, 1776-80, 2 vols. Meanwhile, in 1761, he took his doctor's degree; in 1767 was made Radeliffe librarian; and in October, 1770, canon of Christ Church, and rector of Culham, Oxfordshire.

The various readings noticed in his Hebrew Bible, and which were printed at the foot of the page, relate only to the consonants. The text is Van der Hooght's, pointed. To the second volume, Kennicott prefixed a Dissertatio generalis in V. T. Hebraicum (separately published by Brunns, Brunswick, 1783), in which he described and justified his undertaking, and gave a history of the Hebrew text from the Babylonian captivity. De Rossi supplemented the labors of Kennicott in his Variæ lectiones V. T., etc. (Parma, 1784-88, 4 vols.; supplement, 1798). The whole number of manuscripts collated by these two was thirteen hundred and forty-six. Kennicott's work was affected adversely by his preference for the Samaritan Pentateuch, his deliberate neglect of the Massorah, and disregard of the vowel-points, his lack of uniformity, and occasionally of accuracy, and his defective judgment. But, on the other hand, his service to textual criticism was immense, and he deserves the highest praise. See HORNE: Introduction, 14th ed., p. iv. 674; DAVIDSON: Biblical Criticism.

KENRICK, Francis Patrick, American Roman-Catholic prelate; b. in Dublin, Dec. 3, 1797; d. in Baltimore, July 8, 1863. He was educated at the Propaganda, Rome; came to America 1821; was consecrated coadjutor-bishop at Bardstown, Ky., June 6, 1830; became full bishop 1842; made archbishop of Baltimore 1851; presided as "apostolic delegate" over the first plenary council of the United States, convened at Baltimore, May, 1852; and in 1859 the Pope conferred upon him and his successors the "primacy of honor," which puts the see of Baltimore at the head of the Roman-Catholic clergy of the United States. As a writer he was highly esteemed. Besides polemical works, he wrote Theologia dogmatica (Philadelphia, 1839-40, 4 vols.; 2d ed., Mechlin, 1858, 3 vols.) and Theologia moralis (Philadelphia, 1841-43, 3 vols.; 2d ed., Mechlin, 1859). These volumes are in Latin, and constitute a complete body of divinity, and are considered classical in the Roman-Catholic seminaries of America. He likewise rendered a service to Bible study by issuing an annotated and revised translation of the entire New Testament (New York, 1819-51, 2 vols.), and of the Old Testament, the Psalms, Book of Wisdom, and Canticles (Baltimore, 1857), Job and the Prophets (1859), and the Pentateuch (1860), Historical Books (1862). This revised translation ranks with the best of the Roman-Catholic versions, and is far superior to that in ordinary use.

KENTIGERN (head master), St., a Scottish saint, "the apostle of Strathclyde, and the restorer of Christianity among the Cumbrians;" b. at Culcross about 516; d. at Glasgow 603. He is supposed to have been the child of a nun; but little certain is known respecting his life. Tradition makes him the foster-child of a man who lived two hundred years after him, and to have wrought many miracles. According to the stories told about him, which may have elements of truth in them, his early home was Culcross (Culcross). His popular name, Mungu, or Mungo (dearest friend), was a proof of his amiability. The jealousy of his fellow-pupils drove him to Cathures (Glasgow); there he lived with two brothers, ever increasing in fame on account of his sanctity and miracles. He attracted the notice of the King of Cumbria, and was consecrated bishop of Glasgu (the dear family). Owing to the feuds and wars, he was some time afterwards compelled to flee into South Wales, where he founded the Monastery of Llanely, afterwards St. Asaph's. But in 560 he returned, and died in his see. His day is Jan. 13. See Bishop FORBES, in vol. v. of The Historians of Scotland, Edinburgh, 1871, who gives the legendary lives of the saint; also SKENE'S Celtic Scotland, London, 1876-80, 3 vols.

KERCKHAVEN, Jan van den (Polyander), b. at Metz, March 26, 1568; d. at Leyden, Feb. 4, 1646; studied at Heidelberg and Geneva, and was appointed pastor of the French congregation in Dort, 1591, and professor of theology in the university of Leyden, 1611. As a member of the synod of Dort, he sided with Gomarus, and was charged with the drawing-up of the canons. He was also a member of the committee on the revision of the Bible and a prolific writer of polemics.

KERI and KETHIBH, better, K'ri and K'thibh. The margin of the Hebrew Bible exhibits numerous various readings, i. e., variations from the text, of an early date, which have been preferred by Jewish critics to the readings in the text. These are called קִרְי ("to be read"); and the text-readings, כְּתִיב ("written"), — words corresponding to our text (Kethibh) and margin (Keri). The Keri is the most valuable eritico-exegetical legacy from the ancient Jewish critics. Dr. Ginsburg states that there are 1,353 Keris in the rabbinic Bibles. The Keri is always printed without points; but the points which properly belong to it are given to the word in the text. To indicate the Keri, a small circle or asterisk is put over the word in the text; e. g., Jer. xlii. 6: Kethibh is כְּתִיב; Keri is אֶחָד; transferring the vowels in the text to the margin gives אֶחָד, while, if the text had its proper vowels, it would read אֶחָד. See GINSBURG, art. in KITTO'S Cyclopedia of Biblical Literature.

KERO, said to have been a monk of St. Gall in the time of Abbot Othmar, 720-759. Melchior Goldast (d. 1635) and Jodocus Metzler (d. 1639) ascribe to him the oldest German translation of the rules of the Benedictines, the Glossarium Keronis, and several other works. But the only Kero we know of as monk in St. Gall during the eighth century, is mentioned in a document dated Oct. 28, 799; and internal reasons forbid to consider him the author of the above works. Kero seems, indeed, to be a purely fictitious name under which a number of works were gathered in the catalogues. See SCHÜRER: Verzeichniss d. Handschriften d. Stiftsbibliothek von St. Gallen, 310-313.

KESSLER, Johannes (Chesselius, Ahenarius), b. at St. Gall; d. there March 15, 1574; studied theology at Basel, and went in 1522 to Wittenberg, but determined, on his return, in 1523, to go into business, and not to take orders. He became a saddler. Nevertheless, he soon after began to preach, and hold meetings in private houses; and the impression he made was so strong, that the magistrate became alarmed, and interfered. After a short interruption, however, he began again; and in 1535 he became, with the consent of the magistrate, the regular preacher to the evangelical congregation of St. Margaret. In 1537 he was appointed teacher of classical languages in the gymnasium, and in 1542 regular pastor of St. Gall, whose evangelization he successfully carried through. He wrote the history of the reformation of St. Gall, Sabbata, edited by Ernst Götzinger, 1866-68, and a Life of Vadian. See J. J. BERNET: Johann Kessler, genannt Ahenarius, St. Gall, 1826.

BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

KETTELER, Wilhelm Emanuel, Baron von, b. at Münster, Dec. 25, 1811; d. at Burghausen, in Upper Bavaria, July 13, 1877; was educated by the Jesuits at Brieg, in Valais, Switzerland; studied law at Göttingen, Berlin, Munich, and Heidelberg; and received an appointment in the Prussian civil service, but gave up this position in 1837; studied theology at Münster; entered the service of the Church; was ordained priest in 1844; and appointed bishop of Mayence in 1851. To restore the Church of Rome to its old power and splendor was the great idea of his life; and, as the acknowledged leader of the Ultramontane party in Germany, he fought for this idea with as much adroitness as audacity. At the Council of the Vatican he belonged to the minority (see his Das allgemeine Concil, 1869), and he left Rome before its close; but, as soon as the dogma of papal infallibility was promulgated, he accepted it, published it in his diocese, and employed every means at his disposal for the suppression of opposition to it. Well aware of the danger to the realization of his ideas, which arose from the establishment of a German empire under the Protestant house of Hohenzollern, he resisted the consolidation of the new organization in every possible way: he even forbade the celebration of the anniversary of the battle of Sedan in his diocese. In his opposition to Prince Bismarck's policy of placing the Roman-Catholic Church, in its relation to the State, on an equality with other social institutions, no measure seemed to him too mean, if it promised to prove effective. He fomented the Socialist movement, and even made an alliance with Ferdinand Lassalle. (See his D. Arbeiterfrage und d. Christenthum, 1864.) His writings consist mostly of minor pamphlets destined for certain occasions, such as Freiheit, Autorität, und Kirche (1862), Hirtenbrief über d. Syllabus (1865), etc.

KETTENBACH, Heinrich von, succeeded, in 1521, Johann Eberlin von Günzburg, who was discharged for holding evangelical views as lector in the Franciscan monastery of Ulm, but fled from the city the next year, having delivered a series of sermons, in which he held up both the Pope and the Church of Rome to contempt and ridicule. In 1523 he wrote in behalf of Sickingen, and, after Sickingen's death, in his defence; and in 1524 he published an apology for Luther, less passionate, but still very effective. After that time he disappears: perhaps he fell in the Peasants' War, which, with or against his will, he had contributed much to stir up. The circumstance that in 1530 Eck cites him, together with Luther and Blaurer, shows that he had made a considerable impression, as also that he wrote more than what has come down to us. See KEIM: Reform. d. Reichstadt Ulm. BERNHARD RIGGENBACH.

KEYS, The Power of the, a symbolical term, which in a more extended sense denotes the whole range of the power of the Church, while in a narrower sense it simply means the power of granting or refusing absolution. In the history of the Church the meaning of the term has undergone a most significant development, and it still forms one of the chief points of difference between the different parts of Christendom.

I. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT. — The expression "the keys of the house of David" (Isa. xxii. 22) refers to the power which the steward of the king exercised in the royal household; and, by a somewhat extended symbolism, the expression "the key of David" (Rev. iii. 7) refers to the power which Christ exercises in his own kingdom, especially with regard to admission and exclusion. When Jesus solemnly gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven to Peter (Matt. xvi. 19), he thereby simply introduced him into the apostolical office, authorizing him to found the Christian Church; and the commission to the apostles in general (John xx. 23) must be understood in the same sense. At all events, there is in the New Testament no trace of an apostle forgiving sins in the same personal, categorical manner as Jesus did it (Matt. ix. 2); and, even if there were, it would still be doubtful whether such a power — by its very nature a personal charisma, and not by any means an attribute of an office — ever was transferred to the later Church.

From this power of the keys, signifying the general apostolical authority, must be distinguished the power to bind and to loose, which Jesus conferred first on Peter (Matt. xvi. 19), and then (Matt. xviii. 18), not only on the other apostles, but on the whole congregation. The expression "to bind and to loose," which, according to New-Testament usage, requires an impersonal and not a personal object for its completion, means in rabbinical language simply to allow and forbid, to confirm and abolish (LIGHTFOOT: Hore Hebraice in ev. Matth., xvi. 19; VITRINGA: De syn. vet., 754; BOEHRER: Diss. jur. eccl., p. 83; RITSCHL: Altkath. Kirche, 2d ed., p. 372), and refers in the above passages of the New Testament exclusively to the social sphere of the life of the Christian Church. The apostolical writings know no other power of forgiving sins as active in the congregation, but the preaching of the gospel (2 Cor. v. 18) and the prayers of the faithful (1 John v. 16; Jas. v. 16); and, when the later Church undertook to rear a different opinion on the basis of 1 Cor. v. 3-5, it erred, as is shown by Ritschl, l. c., p. 337.

II. AMONG THE FATHERS. — Misconceptions of the power to bind and to loose arose very early. The Clementine Homilies, representing a Judæo-Christian stand-point, know very well the original meaning of the two verbs, "to bind" and "to loose," and correctly supplement them with impersonal objects; but at the same time they extend the sense so as to encompass the whole power of the episcopal office as a continuation of the apostolic office (iii. 72). On the other hand, the Gentile-Christian churches of the second century interpreted the power to bind and to loose as an authority to retain and remit sin, and supplemented the two verbs with personal objects. But while thus identifying the power of the keys, and the power to bind and to loose, making no other distinction between them than that between the more general and the more special expression, the Gentile-Christian churches did not consider the bishop the bearer of this power: it rested with the congregation as a totality.

It is not to be wondered at, however, that some vagueness and confusion should prevail in the ancient Church concerning these ideas. In the further development, Montanism forms an important link. Tertullian teaches that the power to forgive sins belongs to the Church; but, as it belongs to the Church only so far as she is identical with the Holy Spirit, the right to exercise the power belongs exclusively to her truly spiritual members, — the homo spiritualis. In his work De pudicitia he sets forth this idea in opposition to the bishop of Rome, who taught that the power to forgive sins was vested in the whole episcopate (numerus episcoporum). The latter view was then taken up and carried farther by Cyprian. As the bishop, he says, is the heir of the apostolical power, and the seat and organ of the Holy Spirit, he — that is, not the whole episcopate, but every single bishop — has the power to forgive sins. Optatus of Mileve finally formulates the argument in this way: Christ gave the keys to Peter, and it was Peter who then gave them to the other apostles.

In the works of Cyprian, the phrase "to bind and to loose" always means to retain and to remit sin. Excommunication and reconciliation are identical with anathema and absolution, only that the words have not yet that fulness and explicitness of meaning which they attained during the middle ages. The atoning power of penance still depends upon the activity of the penitent, rather than upon the activity of the Church. All the Church can do is to prescribe the medicine for the wounds which sin has made; and wound and sin, medicine and penance, physician and priests, are ever recurring similitudes. Nevertheless, the Church is not altogether without some kind of a mediating office. Extra ecclesiam nulla salus ("outside of the Church no salvation"), says Cyprian; and he repeats it with great emphasis. The nature of this office begins to show in the writings of Augustine. The similitudes change. Sin does not make a wound any more: it kills. The sinner is not a sick man who needs to be cured, but a dead man, who needs to be restored to life. The resurrection of Lazarus is woven into the whole argument. This restoration to life the Church, of course, cannot perform; but Augustine asserts (Serm., 99, 9) that it is done through the Church, by means of the Church. In the writings of Leo the Great, finally, the Roman-Catholic idea of the priesthood as a special power mediating between God and man, and without whose mediation no divine grace can take effect, becomes definitely formed: without the intercession of the priest, sin cannot be forgiven, — ut indulgentia Dei nisi supplicationibus sacerdotum nequeat obtineri (Ep. 108, ad Theod., cap. ii.).

III. DURING THE MIDDLE AGES, AND IN THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC DOGMATICS. — The primitive Church distinguished between three classes of members, — the faithful, the catechumens, and the penitent. The power of the keys was established chiefly for the third class, though in some respects also for the second; but there is nothing which indicates that the faithful ever made a confession of sin to the priest, even not before partaking of the Lord's Supper. Early in the middle ages, however, and among the newly converted German peoples, a tendency arose to make penance, which originally was a special institution for special occasions, a general characteristic of the whole Church, and to establish the power of the keys, which originally dealt with the penitents only, as a general court of judicature above all the faithful. The first germ of that tendency may be discovered in the circumstance, that, through the monastic discipline, sins in thought gradually became subject to the power of the keys, which in the primitive Church they were not. (See WASSERSCHLEBEN: Bussordnungen der abendländischen Kirche.) In the monasteries it was considered a rule of discipline to confess to the brethren even the slightest occurrences of sinful emotions. The penitential of Vinnian, an Irishman who flourished in the old Briton Church towards the close of the fifth century, prescribes for sins in thought a rigid fast for half a year, and abstinence from wine and meat for a whole year. The Anglo-Saxon penitential, which bears the name of Theodore of Canterbury, prescribes from twenty to forty days' fast for feeling lust. Columban (d. 615) brought this whole system to the Continent; and so rapidly did it take root there, that Abbot Othmar of St. Gall (d. 761) sets it forth as a maxim, — no confession, no forgiveness of sin; and Regino of Prüm (d. 915) demands that every member of the congregation shall confess at least once a year. The first provincial synod which makes confession a general duty is that of Aenham, 1109. Innocent III. (1198–1216) finally introduced confession throughout the Church in spite of the opposition which the penitentials produced, especially in France.

With regard to the theological definition of absolution, and the part belonging to the priest in its administration, two different views run almost parallel with each other during the first part of the middle ages. According to the one view represented by Jerome and Gregory the Great, the priest is simply judge in foro ecclesie: he declares that forgiveness has taken place, but takes no part himself in the act of forgiving. The divine forgiveness takes place before the absolution by the priest, even before the confession by the sinner, in the very moment the heart repents. How prominent this view was, even in the twelfth century, may be seen from the manner in which Gratian treats the subject (caus. xxxiii. qu. iii.). He raises the question whether or not a sinner can satisfy God by repentance only, and secret penance without confession, then states the arguments and authorities on both sides, but finally leaves the reader to decide the question for himself. Petrus Lombardus, the contemporary of Gratian, defines (lib. iv. dist. 17) the priest's power to bind and to loose as a power merely of declaration, just as the disciples could not free Lazarus from his bands until Christ had revived him. Still more explicit are Cardinal Robert Pulleyn (d. 1150) and Peter of Poitiers, chancellor of the university of Paris (d. about 1204). According to the other view, represented by Leo the Great and Alcuin, the priest is not simply judge in foro ecclesie, but in foro Dei,—a true and indispensable mediator between God and the penitent. It found its full development in the De vera et falsa penitentia, a work belonging to the eleventh or twelfth century, but ascribed to Augustine, and in the school of the Victorines. The priest appears as the representative of God, or as a kind of God himself; and, in his De potestate ligandi et solvendi, Richard of St. Victor explains how God transforms the eternal punishment into a transitory one, and how the priest transforms the transitory punishment into a penance.

These views were dialectically reconciled, and combined with each other, by the great schoolmen of the thirteenth century, especially by Thomas Aquinas. He starts from the propositions on which the first of the above-mentioned views is based,—that it is God alone who can forgive sin, and that he does so solely for the sake of the sinner's repentance. But he considerably modifies the bearing of these propositions by adding that no repentance can be full, or fully effective, unless it involves a desire for the sacramental confession and absolution. And he finally reaches the second, the opposite view, by defining the part belonging to the priest in the sacrament of penance in analogy with that belonging to the water in the sacrament of baptism: the priest is the instrumentum animatum, as the water is the instrumentum inanimatum. He consequently defends with great ardor the formula, Ego te absolvo, etc. (Opusc., xxii.). The view of Thomas was dogmatically fixed, and officially adopted as the doctrine of the Roman-Catholic Church by the Council of Trent in its fourteenth session, Nov. 25, 1551.

IV. DURING THE REFORMATION, AND IN THE PROTESTANT DOGMATICS. — With the Reformation, all those ideas which are covered by the expression, "the power of the keys," entered a new stage of development. From the Roman-Catholic Church, Luther retained confession and absolution, though both were unknown to the primitive Church. Confession he considered an institution valid throughout Christendom, and the sacramental character of absolution he never entirely abandoned. But, pervaded by the spirit of the Reformation, these ideas assumed new forms and new significations. To Luther, absolution is not a verdict based on the conviction that the sinner has repented and is in a state of grace, but simply a means by which to strengthen his faith, analogous to the sermon, and, indeed, a mode of preaching the gospel. It has no sacerdotal character whatever. It can be refused to no one; and it can be given by every one, layman or priest, with the only difference, that in the former case it is private, while in the latter it may be public. Only when the sinner places himself in open opposition to God, the Church assumes the office of a judge, and excommunicates him. Thus, to Luther, absolution has the triple character of preaching, jurisdiction, and sacrament.

Calvin refers the power of the keys partly to the preaching of the gospel, partly to the maintenance of church discipline; but he entirely excludes the idea of its being a sacrament. His views may be summed up in the following propositions: (1) There is a double absolution, one serving the faith, the other belonging to church discipline; (2) Absolution is by itself nothing else but the promise of forgiveness of sin such as is contained in the Gospels; (3) Absolution is conditional, and its conditions are penance and faith; (4) Whether or not these conditions have been fulfilled, no human being can know, and consequently the certainty of the binding and loosing can never depend upon the verdict of a human court; (5) That absolution, which forms part of church discipline, has nothing to do with secret sins,—it deals only with open scandals; but, in censuring such acts, the Church simply follows the unerring rules of the Scriptures, pronouncing that adulterers, thieves, murderers, and misers have no part in the kingdom of heaven.

It was the views of Calvin which finally conquered the Protestant world. In the Lutheran churches the threefold signification of the power of the keys underwent a number of violent changes. Chemnitz was the first who denied that absolution is a sacrament in the same sense of the word as baptism and the Lord's Supper; but he found many followers. When the fresh and vivid spirit of the Reformation gradually lost its vigor, the private confession and absolution became empty forms, more apt to foster a false self-sufficiency than to strengthen the faith. The church-ban was early taken out of the hands of the clergy, on account of the misuses they made of it; but, in the hands of the consistories, it entirely lost its religious character, and became an appendix to the police-institution. The first powerful attack on the reigning state of affairs was made by the Pietists, but it was renewed by the Rationalists. And when, in the contest, the orthodox of the old Lutheran school attempted to represent the power of the keys as a divinely established institution, they not only failed utterly, but had to look on in idleness while the institution was crumbling into pieces. In Protestant theology the power of the keys has been neglected as a merely symbolical expression, and the various ideas comprised by the expression have been treated, in dogmatics, under the head of grace and justification; in practical theology, among the preparations to the Lord's Supper; and in canon law, under discipline.

KHLESL, Melchior, b. in Vienna, 1553; d. there Sept. 18, 1630. His parents were Lutherans, and he was educated in the Protestant faith; but in 1569 he embraced Romanism, studied under the Jesuits, and was ordained priest in 1579. His ambition, however, forbade him to enter the order; but he was made administrator of Neustadt 1588, bishop of Vienna 1598, and cardinal 1616. Though his own faith does not seem to have been of the safest description, he placed himself at the head of the counter-reformation in Austria, and spared neither cunning nor violence in his labor. He was deeply implicated in the intrigues which cost, first Rudolph II., and then Matthias, the crown. Under Matthias he was president of the privy council; but under Ferdinand he was imprisoned, 1618, and not released until 1627, through the intervention of the Pope. See HAMMER-PURSTALL: Leben des Cardinal K., Vienna, 1847-51, 4 vols.

KIEF, one of the oldest cities of Russia, stands on the western bank of the Dnieper, and contains about sixty thousand inhabitants. It was the cradle of the Russian Church. In 988 Vladimir, who had recently been baptized himself, and espoused a Byzantine princess, ordered the whole population of the city—men and women, young and old—to descend into the Dnieper, while some Byzantine priests, standing on the cliffs of the bank, read aloud the baptismal formula. Thus the city was Christianized. A metropolitan see was founded there, and it was the seat of two important councils: (1) in 1147, when Clement of Smolensk was elected bishop, in spite of the protest of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and consecrated by the dead hand of St. Clement of Rome (a relic of the cathedral of Kief); and (2) in 1622, when Archbishop Meletius of Polotsk was compelled to retract, and do public penance. He afterwards fled to Rome.

KIERKEGAARD, Sören Aaby, b. in Copenhagen, May 5, 1813; d. there Nov. 11, 1855; studied theology, and spent his whole life in his native city, devoting himself to a literary activity of enormous dimensions and a very striking character. He was rich and a bachelor. In 1843 he published pseudonymously his first large work, W'ether—Or? in two parts, representing respectively the æsthetical and the ethical type of life, and placing indirectly before the reader the question: Which of these two types ought to be chosen? But on the same day he also published, over his name, a small collection of sermons, thus answering the question himself: Neither; for religion alone contains the truth of life. This double track of production—one line of critical analysis published pseudonymously (Bits of Philosophy; Stations along the Road, etc.), and another, of positive construction, published over his name (Training for Christianity; Deeds of Charity, etc.)—he then continued to follow, as it would seem, according to a preconceived plan; and the plan he executed with complete mastery of the subjects chosen, with such a richness and originality of productivity, and with so consummate dialectical skill, that all criticism grew silent. His positive construction, however, of Christianity, did not seem to find many adherents. Dogmatically he defined Christianity as the paradox; ethically, as unmixed suffering; psychologically, as a "passionate leap" away from the world. The ideas of creed, church, priest, etc., he altogether rejected. A Christian is, according to him, an insulated individual, alone with God, and in contact with the world only through suffering. Nevertheless, when he was through with the theoretical representation of his views, and began the practical application, attacking the Danish Church with merciless sarcasm and open denunciation, it was evident that at least something of his Christianity had sunk deeply into the people, and was silently fermenting. Several of his books have been translated into German; e.g., by A. BÄCKSTRÖM at Halle, Die Lilien auf dem Felde u. die Vögel unter dem Himmel. Hoherpriester, Zöllner, Sünderin (1877), Lessing u. objective Wahrheit (1877), Einübung im Christenthum (1878), Die Krankheit zum Tode (1881); by H. C. KETELS, at Erlangen, Furcht u. Zittern (1882); but there is no biography of him (except his Diaries, 9 vols.), nor any satisfactory representation of his philosophical and religious stand-point. CLEMENS PETERSEN.

KILHAM, Alexander, founder of the "New Connection of Wesleyan Methodists," frequently called the "Kilhamites;" b. at Epworth, Eng., July 10, 1762; d. in 1798. In 1785 he was admitted by Wesley into the regular itinerant ministry; rose to prominence; was, even before Wesley's death, an outspoken advocate of separation of the Methodists from the Church of England. After Wesley's death he was expelled from the London Conference (1796). This action resulted in the formation of the "New Connection." See METHODISM IN GREAT BRITAIN AND IRELAND.

KILIAN, St. Rabanus Maurus (from the middle of the ninth century) tells us, in his Martyrologium, that Kilian and his companions, Coloman and Totnan, all natives of Hibernia Scotorum, came to Franconia in the middle of the seventh century, preached Christianity in the country, more especially in Würzburg, and were put to death by an unjust judge of the name Gozbert. Notker Balbulus of St. Gall (from the end of the ninth century) knows much more of Kilian, and tells us, in his Martyrologium, that Kilian was the first bishop of Würzburg, and preached on a license from the Pope; that Gozbert was Duke of Franconia, and was by Kilian compelled to divorce his wife Geila, because she was the widow of his brother; that Geila, from revenge, had Kilian and his companions assassinated, but afterwards became insane; that heavy punishments for the murder of the saint were inflicted upon all the descendants of Gozbert, etc. In the biographies of the tenth and eleventh centuries the legend develops still further, until it finally loses all historical elements in its versified forms. KIMCHI (or KIMHI) is the name of a Jewish family which flourished at Narbonne, Southern France, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and produced several learned rabbis. The most celebrated member of the family was David Kimchi, b. in 1160; d. about 1240. Of his personal life nothing is known; but he must have enjoyed a great reputation among his co-religionists, as he was chosen arbiter in the controversy which the doctrines of Maimonides caused between the Spanish and the French Jews. He was a prolific writer; and his principal works are, a Commentary on the Psalms (first printed in 1477, at Bologna, and translated into Latin by Janvier, Constance, 1511), a Hebrew grammar (generally called Mil'lot, perfection, edited, with notes, by Elias Levita, Venice, 1545, and by M. Hechim, Furth, 1793, and translated into Latin by Guidocier, Paris, 1540), and a Hebrew dictionary, The Book of Roots, Naples, 1491, edited by Elias Levita (Venice, 1546) and Biesenthal and Lebrecht (Berlin, 1847), and translated into Latin in 1535. The Hebrew Grammar of F. E. König (1st part, Leipzig, 1881) is professedly based upon Kimchi; and all Hebrew grammarians have drawn more or less from him. For six hundred and fifty years he has been the acknowledged greatest Jewish grammarian, lexicographer, and biblical commentator. Besides the Commentary on the Psalms mentioned above, he wrote upon Genesis and all the prophets. His work upon Zechariah was translated by McCaul, London, 1837. See art. Kimhi, in Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xiv.

KING, John, D.D., b. at Wornall, Buckinghamshire, about 1559; d. in London, March 30, 1621. He was graduated at Oxford, and was successively chaplain to Queen Elizabeth, archdeacon of Nottingham (1590), dean of Christ Church (1605), and bishop of London (1611). James I. called him the "king" of preachers; others, "the bishop with the royal name." His fame rests upon his Lectures upon Jonas, delivered at Yorke 1594, Oxford; 1597, 5th ed., 1618; reprinted in Nichol's Series of Puritan Commentaries, London, 1861. It was in its day the book upon Jonah. There are forty-eight lectures in all.

KING, Jonas, D.D., b. at Hawley, Mass., July 29, 1792; d. at Athens, Greece, May 22, 1869. He was graduated at Williams College, 1816, and at Andover Seminary, 1819; entered the Congregational ministry; labored as missionary in Syria (1823-26), and in Greece from July, 1828, to his death. He published there several volumes of translations, and original works in modern Greek. His work in Athens was at all times disliked by the ecclesiastical authorities; and in 1844 efforts were made to induce him to leave. He was brought into controversy, in one of the principal newspapers, upon the subject of Mariolatry, and published a book upon it, made up principally of extracts from Greek saints who taught as Dr. King did. In 1845 this book was condemned by the Greek synod; "every orthodox Christian" was prohibited from reading it; and Dr. King's prosecution was demanded of the government. The request was granted. The case was carried up to the Areopagus. But at last Dr. King was cited to appear at Syra on a criminal charge; but the trial was postponed, and he returned to Athens, and, under the protection of the British and American representatives, he resumed his work. In the spring of 1850 he was again prosecuted for proselyting, but his work was not seriously affected until 1851. On Sept. 7 of that year he was informed that the Council of Judges in the Criminal Court of Athens had directed him to be tried for preaching, in his own house, "doctrines, principles, and opinions contrary to the basis of the religion of the Oriental Church." Appeal was taken to the Areopagus, which decided that the penal law forbidding the expression of sentiments and opinions contrary to the basis of religion and morals did not apply to the case of Dr. King. Trial began March 5, 1852, and lasted six hours. He was condemned on the very count which the Areopagus had declared had no bearing upon his case, sentenced to imprisonment for fifteen days in the city prison, to pay the expenses of the trial, and then to banishment from the kingdom. On the 9th of March he went to the prison in Athens, a vile place; so that he was glad to be removed the next day to the police-office, where he was kindly treated. On March 13 he fell ill, and was taken home, where he was guarded. The Areopagus decided adversely to him, but reduced his imprisonment to fourteen days and to banishment. But he was, in reality, imprisoned only the one day mentioned above; and the latter part of the sentence was never executed; indeed, in 1854 he was officially informed that it had been revoked. As might have been expected, the case excited great interest, and the Protestant world demanded his protection. He was never free from petty persecution; was anathematized in 1863 by the Holy Synod of Athens; but his liberty was not taken away. See the reports of the American Board for the years cited; also the Missionary Herald, June, 1852, for the trial. Among his numerous publications may be mentioned The Oriental Church, and the Latin, New York, 1865. See his Memoir, New York, 1879.

KING, Thomas Starr, a Unitarian clergyman, son of a Universalist clergyman; b. in New-York City, Dec. 17, 1824; d. in San Francisco, Cal., March 4, 1864. His education was desultory; but he made the most of his advantages, and acquired a knowledge of many literatures. When fifteen, his father's death compelled his earning his own living, and he was in business for some six years. But the call to preach was his, and in 1845 he began his life-work. In 1846 he was settled in Charlestown, over a Universalist Church; from 1848 to 1860, in Boston, over the Hollis-street Unitarian Church; from 1860 to his death, in San Francisco, in the same denomination. By his eloquence and energy he did more than any other man to save the State of California to the Union; for in the early days of the civil war there seemed to be some danger that it would secede. He also was the prime mover in the branch of the United-States Sanitary Commission organized there. His reputation was national, for his popularity as a lecturer had carried him everywhere. Personally he was most lovable: intellectually he was one of the most brilliant speakers America has produced. One peculiarity in his preparation for the pulpit was, that he dictated his discourses to an amanuensis as he walked up and down his room. He published only one book, The White Hills, their legends, landscape, and poetry (Boston, 1851); but there have been several collections of his lectures and sermons published in Boston since his death: Patriotism, and other papers (1861), Christianity and Humanity [sermons] (1877), Substance and Show, and other lectures (1878). See A Tribute to Thomas Starr King, by RICHARD FROTHINGHAM, Boston, 1864; and the Memoir, by E. P. WHIPPLE, prefixed to Christianity and Humanity, pp. vii-lxxx.

KING, William, Archbishop of Dublin; b. in Antrim, May 1, 1650; d. at Dublin, May 8, 1729. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, 1667-73; ordained, 1674; became dean of St. Patrick's, 1688, as a reward for his staunch Protestantism; which very fact led to his dual imprisonment that same year, in Dublin Castle, by James II. In 1691 he was made Bishop of Derry, and in 1702 Archbishop of Dublin. He was a profound metaphysician and theologian. He wrote The State of the Prot- estants in Ireland under the Late King James's Government (London, 1691; 3d and best ed., 1692). Divine Predestination and Foreknowledge consistent with the Freedom of Man's Will; a Sermon (London, 1710): but his principal work is De origine mali (London, 1702, translated by Bishop Edmund Law, Cambridge, 1731: 4th and best ed., 1758; 5th ed., 1781), in which he endeavors to show that the existence of evil can be reconciled with the goodness of God, and explained without resort to the supposition of an evil principle.

KINGDOM OF GOD, The. The idea of the kingdom of God is the central idea of the whole dispensation of revelation. The kingdom of God is the end and motive of all divine revelations and institutions of the old and new covenants; yea, of the creation and promise from the beginning. The general foundation of this idea is the all-inclusive power and dominion of God (1 Chron. xxix. 11; Ps. ciii. 19; Dan. iv. 34). But the real aim and centre of revelation is the moral kingdom of God, which is called the kingdom of grace, and, with reference to its consummation, the kingdom of glory. This kingdom (Eph. i. 10) includes the heavenly angels, who do God's will (Ps. ciii. 20), and mankind. The latter come especially under the cognizance of the Scriptures. At the fall, man defaced the divine image, became disobedient to the divine will, and passed outside of the kingdom of God. His restoration begins with self-humiliation. In Paganism the light of God in man became more and more darkened, and the faith which gives God all the glory, more and more indistinct. God chose to establish his kingdom by the separation of a peculiar nation, and of an individual (Gen. ix. 26), who should become the recipient of a promise for all nations. God revealed himself as the one, who, in human impotency, can do all that he wills. Weak, and nothing in themselves, but strong and mighty in God, such is the progressive experience of the people of God, from the patriarchs down. This people was chosen to be God's kingdom, his property above all the peoples of the earth, — a kingdom of priests (Exod. xix. 6). On account of its sinful incompetency, Israel was only the adumbration of the kingdom of God, which, however, was to some extent realized in believing individuals, pious kings, and prophets. The idea of this kingdom came out more fully in Jacob's prophecy of the prince out of Judah. It became more distinct in David's prophecy of the everlasting kingdom, and of a king of righteousness and peace (Ps. xxii., lxxii., ex.). In Daniel the eternity of this kingdom, and its superiority over the kingdoms of the world, are strongly brought out.

To this kingdom of promise and prophecy the people of Israel looked forward with ardent longing. In contrast with the pomp and ostentation of the world, its beginning was inconspicuous. The promised One came into the world in circumstances of poverty. He, the eternal Son, to whom the kingdom belongs, because all things are made by him and consist by him, desired to come into the actual possession in no other way than by the complete emptying of his Godhead in order that he might atone for man's original guilt through his own self-dominion. Seeking nothing but God's glory, manifesting and imparting absolute love, taking upon his own pure consciousness the guilty feeling of the race, and bearing its due and severe punishment in patience, he has been elevated above all things with supreme power in heaven and on earth (Phil. ii. 5 sqq.; Matt. xxviii. 18). His sacrifice of love was the basis of the new covenant, or kingdom of God, in which the redeemed submit to the divine will, as did the Redeemer himself. This is the kingdom which is righteousness, peace, and joy (Rom. xiv. 17).

In an earlier period this kingdom was identified with the Church. The Roman Catholics regarded it as the visible Church, ruled by a visible representative of Christ (the Pope). The Protestants, looking upon its ideal side, regarded it as the Christian institution of salvation. But the more recent theology has given to the idea a broader significance; namely, that it designates redeemed humanity with its divinely revealed destiny manifesting itself in a religious communion or the Church, a social communion or the State, and an aesthetic communion, expressing itself in forms of knowledge and art.

According to Scripture, the kingdom of God in its real and ultimate constitution does not belong to the present age, is not the result of a simple, natural, process of cosmic development. It is a kingdom from heaven, manifesting itself in a world of sin, — a fountain of life gushing out into the desolation of death; and its object is to shape human life according to the divine image in Christ. It develops itself in conflict with a false kingdom and religion, whose head is the prince of this world. Before Christianity or Christ finally overcomes the false and opposing elements, a consummation of the kingdom of God cannot be said to have taken place. This will happen in consequence of a great crisis, — the destruction of the false church, the anti-Christian power of this world. Then a kingdom of righteousness and peace shall be established, all the powers of darkness being dispelled, and Satan bound; and the millennial kingdom (see MILLENNIUM) will begin, which is only the prelude of the absolute consummation of the kingdom of God, when God shall be all in all (1 Cor. xv. 28).

Everywhere the Scripture points to the kingdom of God as a thing of the future (Dan. vii. 27; Matt. xix. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 9; Gal. v. 21; 2 Thess. i. 5; Rev. xx. sqq.). The kingdom of God is already here (Luke xi. 20, xvii. 21), and is in a process of evolution or development, as some of the parables of Matt. xiii. teach. In the Old Testament we have merely the shadow of this kingdom, a preparative economy. In the New Testament it is embodied, in its very essence, in the divine-human king, who shows perfect subjection to the divine will, and establishes the kingdom amongst men, first by his redeeming activity, and then by the establishment of a redeemed church. Jesus is the embodiment of the kingdom of God, the ideal of human life; and religion, state, and culture must be governed by his law. It is the task of this evangelical period of Christianity to restore the right relation between the Church on the one hand, and human conduct and the State on the other, and to establish the freedom of the Church and the primacy of religion as a moral force with the right to control the life of the State and the department of culture, as well as individual conduct. The complete consummation of the kingdom of God can only be realized here in part, and presupposes the emancipation of the Church from all admixture with the spirit of the world. Then it will appear in its power and glory. Its consummation belongs to the hereafter, and will be the product of the life-giving energy concentrated in the divine-human person of Christ, who, in the midst of the natural development of this world, is separating for himself a distinct kingdom of God, and, after his decisive victory over the satanic power which is concentrated in anti-Christ and his kingdom, will establish it in its visible and complete perfection. KINGO, Thomas, b. at Slangstrup, in the Island of Sealand, 1634; d. at Odense, in the Island of Funen, 1703; studied theology in Copenhagen, and was appointed pastor of his native parish in 1668, and bishop of Funen in 1677. He was a poet born, and a powerful Christian character, and he has given the Danish Church some of its very best hymns. Of his Andelige Sjunge-Chor, the collection of his hymns, first part appeared 1674, second, 1681. Charged by the government with the compilation of a new hymn-book, he edited the so-called Kingo's Psalmebog, 1699, which is still used in many places in Jutland and Norway. See BRANDT and HELWEG: Den Danske Psalmedigtning, Copenhagen, 1847.

KINGS OF ISRAEL, The. Israel was a theocracy; i. e., God was the real ruler. The king was only God's vicegerent (1 Sam. x. 1; Judg. viii. 23), and from God proceeded all authority (Isa. xxxiii. 22). As this idea was conceived by the Israelites, it was limited to the chosen people. God was not, in this especial sense, the king of the whole world; he would only become so when he came in his final kingdom: and the nations of the Gentiles bowed to him as the God of Israel (Exod. xv. 18; Ps. x. 16, lxxxix. 19, xciii., xcvii., xcix.; Isa. xxiv. 23, xliii. 15; Obad., 21; Zech. xiv. 9). The Mosaic legislation did not provide any one central earthly organ for the divine authority: still it plainly declared the eventual rise of a king, and therefore laid down rules for the contingency (Deut. xvii. 14-20). Some critics have pronounced this section a composition of Samuel's; but the mention of horses and of a possible return to Egypt in verse 16 is a weighty argument against the opinion.)

The rise of the Israelitish kingdom is related in 1 Sam. viii. The reason given was a desire to be like the nations round, but the occasion of the vigorous expression of the wish was the unfitness of Samuel's sons to rule. Once before in the history of Israel had there been a "king;" for Abimelech, the son of Gideon by a concubine, was proclaimed king by the Shechemites, and ruled for three years; but his power was local. The way in which the elders asked for a king was really blasphemous, since it was a virtual rejection of Jehovah's supremacy; and so the Lord regarded it (1 Sam. viii. 7). Notwithstanding, the Lord told Samuel to heed the request. To show the utter independence of the divine action, the king chosen (Saul) by the Lord was a member of the least family of the least tribe (Benjamin); and his meeting with Samuel was unexpected (ix., x.). The consecration was by solemn anointing (x. 1). Since anointing is only spoken of in the cases of David, Absalom, Solomon, Joash, and Jehohaz of Judah, and only of Jehu of the northern kingdom, the rabbins maintained that it was not employed, except upon the foundation of a new dynasty, or when there was some exceptional circumstance attending the succession. [This conclusion is poorly supported. It is far more probable that anointing, both in Judah and Israel, was invariable, and only the mention of it occasional.] The oil used on these occasions was "holy oil" (1 Kings i. 39), and it was poured by the high priest. It made its recipient "Jehovah's anointed," and this was the ordinary designation of the theocratic king (Ps. xx. 6, xxviii. 8, etc.). The anointing was the symbol, partly of the divine consecration, and partly of the divine equipment for the office through gifts and graces. After it, the person of the king was sacred; and it was sacrilegious to kill him, even at his own request (1 Sam. xxiv. 6, 10, xxvi. 9, 16; 2 Sam. i. 14). Among the other ceremonies connected with an anointing was the coronation with the crown-diadem, in sign of kingly dignity (2 Kings xi. 12). This diadem was worn by the king as part of his uniform (2 Sam. i. 10).

In the case of Saul some little time elapsed between his consecration and his establishment over the kingdom. The latter was the direct act of Samuel, who assembled the people at Mizpeh, showed them the chosen king, and then told them the "manner of the kingdom, and then wrote it in a book, and laid it up before the Lord" (1 Sam. x. 25). This writing was not, however, a constitution in the modern sense, but a covenant between king and people, like David's (2 Sam. v. 2, 3), and such as Jehoiada subsequently composed in the case of Joash (2 Kings xi. 17). That this covenant should not become a dead letter, but really check the action of the king, was the care of the prophets. The idea of theocracy was nearest realized in the reigns of David and Solomon.

The theocratic king was declared to be the "son of God," the first-born among all the kings of the earth (2 Sam. vii. 14; Ps. lxxxix. 27, 28; cf. ii. 7). Since his divine sonship and election were correlative terms, there was, on God's part, an expression of the tenderest love for the king as the prince of the chosen people. And, because the king stood in this relation, his glory was a reflection of the divine; his judgship, also, was a divine act: he was, in short, the earthly representative of the heavenly king, and sat upon the throne of Jehovah (1 Chron. xxix. 23). David's psalms sufficiently show how thoroughly he entered into the theocratic idea (cf. Ps. xxiv. 7-10, xlviii. 2, xx. 6, cx. 2). The theocratic kingdom was to last forever (2 Sam. vii. 16). The kingship, under David and Solomon, took on a priestly character, for the king prayed in the name of the people (1 Kings viii.); yet there was no infringement of priestly rights and privileges, for not simply the chronicler [as the authorized version, 2 Sam. viii. 16, see margin], but president of the council, and first minister of the crown; (1) The secretary of state; (5) "The officer," i.e., who had charge of the levies; (6) Priests; (7) Courtiers. To these Solomon (1 Kings iv. 5, 6) added; (8) The officer over the twelve officers who in turn for a month provided victuals for the king and his household; (9) The officer over the household. In addition, there were the usual subordinate court servants. "Eunuchs" appear first to have been employed in the northern kingdom (1 Kings xxii. 9 marg.), but later in Judah (2 Kings xxiii. 11 marg.). By the term, perhaps often only an office is meant.

The royal revenue seems at first to have been derived from the spoils of war (2 Sam. viii. 11 sq., xii. 30), and from presents more or less voluntary (1 Sam. x. 27, xvi. 20, etc.), not only by his subjects, but by strangers; and these, in the case of Solomon, amounted to a good deal, and were regularly given (1 Kings x. 25). The king also had private property (cf. 1 Chron. xxvii. 25-31). He also exercised the right to levy a tribute of bond-service, not only from the remnants of the conquered peoples (1 Kings ix. 20, 21), but also from the Israelites (1 Kings v. 13, xii. 4), and on two occasions collected a sort of tax from the men of wealth in order to buy off an invader (Pul, 2 Kings xv. 20; Pharaoh-nechoh, xxiii. 35).

OEHLER. (VON ORELLI.)

KINGS, First and Second Book of. The two books were originally one. The separation was first made by the LXX. (followed by the Vulgate, and so in modern versions), which joined them with First and Second Samuel under the general caption Kings; so that the four together constituted four books of Kings. Daniel Bomberg transferred this nomenclature into our Hebrew Bibles.

Our Kings may be divided into three parts: 1. The history of Solomon (1 Kings i.-xi.), with the subdivisions; (a) His ascent of the throne (i.-ii.); (b) His brilliant reign (iii. 1-ix. 9), under which come (a) his marriage, prayer, and judicial wisdom (iii.), (β) his court and officers, might, splendor, and wisdom (iv.-v. 16), (γ) his building operations with help of Hiram, king of Tyre, and consecration of the temple (v. 17-ix. 9); (c) His foreign affairs, great reputation and revenue, his degeneracy through polygamy and idolatry, its consequences, and his death (ix. 10-xi. 43). 2. The synchronous history of the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah (1 Kings xii. 1-2 Kings xvii. 41), with the subdivisions; (a) The history of the separation, and the hostile position of the kingdoms until Ahab's reign (xii. 1-xvi. 28); (b) The dynasty of Ahab, the fatal league of the two royal houses, to the slaying of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah by Jehu (xvi. 29-2 Kings x. 36); (c) The history of the dynasty of Jehu to the overthrow of Israel (xi. 1-xvii. 41). 3. The history of the kingdom of Judah from Hezekiah to its overthrow and the Babylonian exile (xviii. 1-xxv.). With the release and elevation of Jehoiachin at the court of Evil-merodach the history ends.

But Kings is no mere chronicle, but a work governed throughout by a single purpose, which was to show the fatal effect of disobedience upon the chosen people. This is expressed in 2 Kings xvii. 7 sqq., which in few words tells how Israel, in both kingdoms, had transgressed the plain divine commands communicated through prophets, especially by idolatry, and thus prepared their fall; but further, that for Judah there was hope of restoration, if it would listen to the prophets. Of the fulfilment of this promise the elevation of Jehoiachin was a pledge. Agreeably to the purport of the history, the position of each successive king, from Solomon down, towards the high places, is clearly stated. In Kings are no less than nineteen prophetic words and speeches. Another proof of the unity of the history is the regular recurrence of identical, synonymous, and analogous expressions to express the beginning, duration, and close of each reign, the death and burial of each king, and the theocratic value of his work. E.g. in 1 Kings cf. xi. 43, xiv. 20 sq.; cf. xv. 3, xxii. 43; cf. xiv. 9, xv. 26; cf. viii. 16, ix. 4; cf. viii. 61, xi. 4. It links itself immediately on Samuel, and thus closes the great history which begins with Gen. i.

It is characteristic of Kings to make continual references to the original sources. Up to 1 Kings ii. 46 it draws from Samuel's source for the history of David. For the history of Solomon it refers to the "book of the acts of Solomon," xi. 41; for that of the kings after Solomon, it refers fourteen times to the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah," and seventeen times to a similar "book" for Israel. Such references are lacking only in the cases of Ahaziah, Amaziah, and Jehoahaz of the southern, and in that of Jehoram of the northern kingdom. The books were doubtless official records. Of a quite different character was the "commentary of the book of the kings," referred to in 2 Chron. xxiv. 27. The histories of Elijah and Elisha rest upon an independent, prophetic, Ephraimitish source.

The age and authorship of the Book of Kings cannot be exactly determined. While throughout the book the kingdom of Judah and the temple are spoken of as standing (to which period, and not to the exile, the recurrent formula, "unto this day," refers), the closing verses (2 Kings xxv. 27-30) set us in the middle of the exile; and so, while the book as a whole was written before the exile, it was revised and brought down to date by some one of the exiles. The Talmud ascribes the book to Jeremiah (Baba bathra 15*), and surely the verbal and mental relationship between it and his writings is striking (2 Kings xxiv. 18-xxv. 30, and Jer. lii. are almost word for word identical); but the first arises from their being written at the same time, and from the familiarity of the author of Kings with Jeremiah's writings; while the second relationship merely shows the dependence of one upon the other, not their common origin. All that can be said upon the matter is, that the Book of the Kings was substantially written in the days of Jehoiakim, and the redaction took place after B.C. 561, and before B.C. 536, the close of the exile.

The historicity of the book is universally recognized. The acknowledged difficulties in chronology result from textual errors and corruptions.

KING'S EVIL, as scrofula was called, from the belief, which prevailed for many centuries in France and England, that scrofula could be cured by the touch of the king; the power to work this miracle being "part of the religion attached to the person of the king." In the English Prayer-Book down to 1719, there was a special service (part of the Liturgy) to give due solemnity to the act. (See Hook's Church Dictionary.) Edward the Confessor (1042-66) was the first English sovereign, and Anne (1702-14) the last, to "touch" for the disease. It is said that the famous Dr. Samuel Johnson was the last child "touched." Charles II. (1660-84) "touched" more persons than any other monarch, averaging four thousand a year. Prince Charles Edward, the Young Pretender, tried in 1745 to curry favor by "touching" at Holyrood Palace. Among the French kings who practised the act may be mentioned Louis XI. (1461-83) in 1480, Charles VIII. (1483-98) at Rome and Naples in 1495, Francis I. (1515-47) in 1527, and Louis XVI. (1774-93) at Rheims in 1775.

KINGSLEY, Calvin, D.D., LL.D., Methodist-Episcopal bishop; b. at Annsville, Oneida County, N.Y., Sept. 8, 1812; d. at Beirut, Syria, April 6, 1870. After graduation at Alleghany College, Meadville, Penn. (1841), he entered its faculty as professor of mathematics, and, with the exception of two years of pastoral labor, continued in it until 1856, when he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate. In 1864 he was elected a bishop; in May, 1869, started upon an episcopal tour around the world, visited the conferences on the Pacific coast, those at Foochow, China, at Bareilly, India, and was passing through Syria when he died. Besides controversial works, he published Resurrection of the Human Body, Cincinnati, 1845; Round the World, Cincinnati, 1870, 2 vols.

KINGSLEY, Charles, b. at Holne Vicarage, Devonshire, Eng., June 12, 1819; d. at Eversley, Jan. 23, 1875. He entered Magdalen College, Cambridge, in 1840, where he distinguished himself as a classical and mathematical student. Eversley in Hampshire was his first and last charge; originally as curate, finally as rector. It was a spot which above all others he loved, and in the providence of God its rustic beauty bound the two ends of his life together. He no sooner began to preach than he began to publish; and his village sermons, which at once made a mark on English homiletic literature, appeared in 1811. Poet as well as preacher, he wrote, four years afterwards, The Saint's Tragedy, or True Story of Elizabeth of Hungary, in which, with a keen appreciation of mediæval life and sentiment, he brought out the idea of true wedded love in its simple purity, contrasted with the falsities of a superstitious asceticism. His own wedded life furnished one of the most charming instances of the kind on record. Not, however, in poetical sentimentalism, or in domestic felicity, did he allow his time to be absorbed; but looking on the state of society in England, especially amongst men of the working-class, he steadfastly set before himself the task of a social reformer, in company with his friend Mr. Maurice, and other like-minded persons. He laid a foundation for manifold improvements in the condition of working-men, intellectually, morally, and religiously: classes for mental instruction, and unions for pecuniary benefit, sprung out of his efforts at a period when such efforts were by no means popular. He studied the condition of people in London workshops and in rural districts, and, after revolving in his mind the problem of their elevation, wrought out his ideas on the subject by composing two memorable works of fiction, Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet, published in 1849, and Yeast, a Problem, published in 1851. Letters on university reform speedily followed, with Lectures on Agriculture, and at the same time he found himself involved in a controversy on social doctrines, occasioned by the novels he had written, especially the last. Hyppatia, or New Foes with an Old Face, appeared in 1853, in which he drew the liveliest picture ever seen of the social condition of Alexandria in the fourth century, as Greek philosophy and Gothic Paganism came into conflict with the advancement of Christianity, already deteriorated by asceticism and superstition. In all those works, under a clothing of fiction he sought to exhibit lessons of the greatest importance in their bearing on his own age, and the evils which surrounded him in Church and State. With this work may be coupled Alexandria and her Schools, and within the historical class of his productions we must not overlook his lectures on The Roman and the Teuton; but it is only just to say that his philosophy and his imagination too much influenced his reading of facts. He was fond of North Devon, and pitched his tent there for a time, and, amidst the inspiring scenes and traditions of the neighborhood, sat down to write Westward Ho! painting in vivid colors the adventures of the grand old sea-kings of Elizabeth's times, when they made their daring expeditions to the New World. This book, issued in 1855, touched a chord in English hearts which has never ceased to vibrate; and men and women, boys and girls, found and still find enchantments in these brilliant pages. The same year saw his Heroes, or Greek Fairy-Tales, relating the story of the Golden Fleece and other classical legends with exquisite simplicity and skill. The Water Babies, a wild fairy-tale, full of incredible dreams; Glaucus, or the Wonders of the Seashore, Hereward the Wake, last of the English, Prose Idyls, New and Old, — these are all full of imagination, wreathed around facts in nature and facts in history. Kingsley had a keen eye for scientific inquiry, as well as a poet's taste for beauty everywhere; or, to use the language of his loving friend Dean Stanley, "that listening ear, like that of the hero in the fairy-tale, seemed almost to catch the growing of the grass, and the opening of the shell." He published a number of sermons, The Good News of God, Sermons for the Times, Discipline, The Water of Life, and All-Saints' Day; and though he was at home in poetry and fiction, he found a more desired home in the Christian pulpit, where, with the outspokenness of a Hebrew prophet, he rebuked the sins of the age, and called on high and low to live lives of righteousness in the fear and love of God and Christ. He was much more of a practical than a theoretic theologian, and seems to have known and cared very little about the history of opinion, or about systems of divinity. And he did not bring out in his ministry all the truths which are precious to Evangelical Christians. He was not only rector of Eversley, but canon of Chester, to which he was appointed in 1870, thence he was transferred to a canonry in Westminster Abbey. He was a royal chaplain. The Prince of Wales as a youth listened to his lectures, and with the younger branches of the Queen's family he was a great favorite. His preaching at the abbey attracted great crowds; and, when he died, the loss was keenly felt by those who only for a few months flocked round his pulpit. The visit he paid to America, and the lectures he delivered there, made a deep impression, and he returned from his Western travels in 1874 to die the following year. Individuality and earnestness to an extraordinary degree were exemplified in his life. He was a great deal more than he ever did, having in him a genius and a spiritual force which no words or deeds could ever exhaust. His letters and memoirs of his life, in two volumes, are edited by his wife, London, 1876; abridged edition, in one volume, New York, 1877. JOHN STOUGHTON.

KIPPIS, Andrew, D.D., F.R.S., F.A.S.; b. at Nottingham, March 28, 1725; d. in London, Oct. 8, 1795. He was educated for the Presbyterian ministry by Dr. Doddridge, but from 1753 was a Unitarian pastor in London, and teacher in Unitarian theological institutions. His reputation rests upon his editorial work, upon five volumes of a revised edition of the Biographia Britannica, London, 1778-93 (down to "Fastolf": a part of vol. vi. — Featley-Foster — was printed; but Dibdin says only two copies of this part are known), upon the Works of Dr. Nathaniel Lardner (London, 1788, 11 vols.; last edition in 1827, 10 vols.), and upon the Lectures of Dr. Philip Doddridge. He also wrote Lives of Lardner, Capt. Cook (1788), and others.

KIR, mentioned (2 Kings xvi. 9; Amos. i. 5, ix. 7) as the place whence the Syrians came before they settled in the regions north of Palestine, and to which Tiglath-pileser sent the prisoners after the conquest of Damascus. It has not yet been possible to identify the place.

KIRCHENTAG (church diet) is the German name of a periodical convention of delegates from the various evangelical churches of Germany, — the Lutheran Church, the Reformed, the United, and the Moravian (Unitas Fratrum), — on the basis of the common evangelical principle of their confessions, and for the purpose of establishing a common organization of their denominations. The conventions took their beginning in 1848. It was quite natural that the passionate demand for political unity which at that moment swayed most men's minds in Germany should call forth the idea of ecclesiastical unity. Moreover, it seemed as if the State were going to dissolve its old connection with the Church, and leave her to take care of her own organization; not to speak of the danger which threatened the Church from the peculiar coloring of infidelity with which the political movement was tainted. In April, 1848, Bethmann-Hollweg, professor of law in the university of Bonn, published a Vorschlag einer evangelischen Kirchenversammlung im laufenden Jahre 1848, proposing that representative men of the various evangelical churches in Germany should meet together, and discuss the situation. In May, same year, at the annual conference of Sandhof, near Francfort, the idea obtained a more definite form by the efforts of Philipp Wackernagel of Wiesbaden. A committee was appointed, and charged with inviting representative men of the various evangelical denominations to meet at Sandhof, June 21, and discuss the question how the various evangelical State churches could be organized into one common confession church. Eighty-eight men were present, among whom were Bethmann-Hollweg and Dorner from Bonn, Ullmann and Hundeshagen from Heidelberg, Zimmermann and Pahner from Darmstadt; and the first Kirchentag was convened at Wittenberg, Sept. 21, 1848. More than five hundred delegates met, and the assembly agreed, (1) That the evangelical church communities of Germany should form a unity; (2) That the unity should not have the form of a union, abolishing the differences of confession, but only the form of a confederacy; (3) That the confederacy, based on the common evangelical principle of the confessions, should leave to each Church to arrange its relations to the State, its constitution, its ritual, and doctrinal system, as it pleased; while (4) The confederacy as such should represent the unity, bear witness against the non-evangelical churches, administer advice and support, defend the rights and liberties which belong to every evangelical church, etc. The confederacy was never established, and no Kirchentag has been convened since 1871. Nevertheless, the movement exercised a great and beneficial influence, both spiritual and material. From it sprang the Kongress für innere Mission, which holds its annual meetings at various places in Germany, and has greatly extended its activity during the last ten years. Its leading genius was Dr. Wichern till his death (1881). See the transactions of the several sessions of the Kirchentag at Wittenberg, Berlin, Stuttgart, etc., published by Hertz, Berlin.

WILHELM BAUR.

KIRCHER, Athanasius, b. at Geyssa, near Fulda, 1601; d. in Rome, 1680; was one of the most learned and most prolific writers of his time. In 1618 he entered the order of the Jesuits, and taught mathematics at Würzburg (whence he was expelled by the Swedes), and afterwards in Rome. Among his works, most of which treat mathematical and physical subjects, are Ars magna lucis et umbræ, Mundus subterraneus, Arca Noë, Turris Babel, etc. He founded the first museum of natural history (in Rome). His autobiography and letters were edited by Lougenmahtel, Augsburg, 1684.

KIRCHHOFER, Melchior, b. Jan. 3, 1775, at Schaffhausen; d. Feb. 13, 1853, at Stein, in the canton of Schaffhausen, where he was appointed minister in 1808, after studying at Marburg, 1794-96. He is one of the ablest church-historians Switzerland has produced, wrote monographs on S. Hofmeister (1810), Oswald Myconius (1813), Werner Steiner (1818), Berthold Haller (1828), Guillaume Farel (1831), and continued Hottinger's Helvetische Kirchengeschichte. [He is not to be confounded with Johannes Kirchofer, who composed the able book, Quellensammlung zur Geschichte des Neutestamentlichen Canons bis auf

Hieronimus, Zurich, 1844, upon which Professor A. H. Charteris, D.D., based his book, Canonicity, Edinburgh, 1880.] HAGENBACH.

KIRK, Edward Norris, D.D., b. in New York Aug. 14, 1802; d. in Boston, March 27, 1874. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1820, and, after a brief study of law, at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1825. From 1829 to 1837 he was pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church in Albany, N.Y.; the years from 1837 to 1842 were spent in Europe, and in travelling in the United States, in the interest of the Foreign Evangelical Society, of which he was secretary. From 1842 to 1871 he was pastor of the Mount Vernon Church (Congregational), Boston, Mass. During his last years he was almost entirely blind. Dr. Kirk was one of the first members of the Evangelical Alliance, and a vigorous advocate of the evangelization of the Roman-Catholic countries of Europe. He published Memorial of Rev. John Chester, D.D. (Albany, 1829), Lectures on Christ's Parables (New York, 1856), two volumes of Sermons (New York, 1840, and Boston, 1860); translations of Gausson's Theopneusty (New York, 1842), and Canon of the Holy Scriptures (abridged, Boston, 1862), and of J. F. Astié's Louis Fourteenth, and the Writers of his Age (Boston, 1855). His Lectures on Revivals, edited by Rev. D. O. Mears, appeared Boston, 1874. See D. O. MEARS: Life of Edward Norris Kirk, D.D. Boston, 1877.

KIRKLAND, Samuel, b. at Norwich, Conn., Dec. 1, 1744; d. at Clinton, N.Y., Feb. 28, 1808. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1765; ordained in the Congregational ministry, 1766; was a famous missionary among the Six Nations, and, after serving as an army chaplain in the Revolutionary War, returned to his work among the Indians. He founded at Whitestown, N.Y., in 1793, the Hamilton Oneida Academy, from which sprang Hamilton College. See his Memoir in Sparks's American Biography. — John Thornton, D.D., LL.D., son of the preceding; b. at Little Falls, N.Y., Aug. 17, 1770; d. at Boston, April 26, 1840. He was graduated at Harvard College, 1789; pastor of the Summer-street (Congregational) Church, Boston, 1794-1810; and president of Harvard College, 1810-28. His presidency marks a brilliant period in the history of the college. He wrote a life of Fisher Ames, and edited his works, Boston, 1809.

KIRK-SESSION is the lowest court in the Presbyterian churches of Scotland, the same that is called the "session" in America, consisting of the minister and elders.

KIRWAN, Walter Blake, b. at Galway, Ireland, 1750; d. in 1805. Educated in the English Jesuit College of St. Omer, he was ordained a priest, and became professor of natural and moral philosophy at Louvain; but in 1787 he entered the Protestant ministry, held various charges, and died, as dean of Killala, 1810. He enjoyed extraordinary popularity as a preacher, and was particularly noted for his charity sermons. Some of these have been published, with a sketch of his life: Sermons, London, 1814; 2d ed., 1816. It will be remembered that "Kirwan" was the pseudonyme of Dr. Nicholas Murray.

KI'SHON, or, in Ps. lxxx. 9, Ki'son, the present Nabr Mukntta, rises on Tabor and Little Hermon, and flows through the plains of Esdraelon and Acre, into the Mediterranean, — a torrent in the winter time, but almost dry during summer. See Judg. iv. 7, v. 21; 1 Kings xviii. 40.

KISS OF PEACE, The, occurs very early, both in the life and in the worship of the Christian Church, as a symbol of brotherhood and love (Rom. xvi. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xiii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 26; 1 Pet. v. 14). It became, indeed, the common form of greeting each other, especially when people met in the church; and it was given unrestrictedly, without regard to sex, rank, or age, as a natural expression of that community of spirit which bound together all the members of the church. It is apparent, however, that such a custom involved many inconveniences, and was liable to degenerate. Tertullian (Ad Uxor., 2, 4) speaks of the annoyance it must be to a heathen husband to see his Christian wife exchange the kiss of peace with her religious brethren. Origen (In Rom., x. 33) inculcates that the kiss shall be holy, that is, chaste and sincere, and not like the kiss of Judas, but expressive of peace and simplicity unfeigned. And Clement of Alexandria even goes so far as to censure those shameless kisses which made the churches resound, and occasioned foul suspicions and evil reports (Pædog., 13, 11). Thus certain restrictions soon became necessary. The Apostolical Constitutions (8, 2), prescribe that when the deacon says, "Salute ye one another with the holy kiss," the clergy shall salute the bishop, and of the laity the men the men, and the women the women; and similar restrictions were made by contemporary and later councils. But in that, or in a somewhat similar form, the custom has survived down to our time in the Eastern Church; and in the Western it was not wholly superseded until the thirteenth century, when a plate of wood or metal (osculatorium), stamped with a representation of the crucifixion, was kissed, first by the priest, and then by all the communicants in succession, as a token of their mutual love in Christ. With respect to the special use of the kiss in the worship of the ancient church, at communion, baptism, wedding, etc., see the elaborate article by Edmund Venables, in SMITH and CHEETHAM: Christian Antiquities, ii. 902.

KITTO, John, b. at Plymouth, Eng., Dec. 4, 1804; d. at Cannstadt, Württemberg, Germany, Nov. 25, 1851. His father was a poor mason and a drunkard, who could afford him only three years' schooling; and so, in his twelfth year, he began to earn his own living as a barber's apprentice, but was dismissed for supposed connivance at theft. On Feb. 13, 1817, he was assisting his father at his trade; but, "when in the act of stepping from the top of the ladder to the roof of the house, he lost his footing, and fell, a distance of thirty-five feet, into the court beneath." By this fall he was severely injured bodily, and totally and permanently deprived of the sense of hearing. On recovering his strength, he resorted to various expedients to gain a few pennies whereby he might buy books; for reading was his passion. His pitiable condition — "pinched with hunger, shivering in rags, crawling about with exposed and bleeding feet" — led to his being put in the Plymouth workhouse, Nov. 15, 1819; and there he remained until July 17, 1823, with the exception of a few months (1821-22) of indentureship to a shoemaker in the place, who cruelly treated him. In 1823 he attracted the attention of the famous scientist Harvey, and ultimately of other educated persons who were interested in the articles he wrote for the Plymouth Weekly Journal; and he obtained through them the post of sub-librarian of the Plymouth Public Library. The tide had turned with him. From this position he passed, in 1824, into the service of a Mr. Groves, a dentist at Exeter. In 1825 appeared his first volume, Essays and Letters, with a Short Memoir of the Author, Plymouth. Through Mr. Groves's mediation, he was engaged by the Church Missionary Association as printer; and in July, 1825, he went, to learn that art, to the Missionary College at Islington. By this time he had acquired some knowledge of Latin and Greek, and now began Persian. Owing to an unhappy misunderstanding, he resigned December, 1826. The fault was equally his and the committee's. Kitto was too much given to literature to be an efficient printer; and as he never brooked control, and the committee did not deal properly with his sensitive and extraordinary nature, never supposing that the man whom they hired as a mere printer had such lofty pretensions to authorship, a rupture was inevitable. He repented of the step he had taken; and, by the solicitation of friends, he was restored a few months afterwards, and sent to Malta, where he lived for eighteen months. But, owing to the same absorption in literary matters, he broke his rash pledge to abstain from literary pursuits, and so was supposed by the society to be unable to do as much printing as was required. Nothing remained but for him to leave their employ. Arrived in London, he met with Mr. Groves, and engaged to go with him as tutor to his family upon his missionary journey to the East. The party sailed from Gravesend, June 12, 1829, and arrived at Bagdad, Sunday, Dec. 6, 1829. On Sept. 19, 1832, he left that city for England, having practically exhausted his usefulness to Mr. Groves, and arrived at Gravesend in June, 1833. He obtained employment, as a literary hack, with Charles Knight, and wrote industriously for the Penny Magazine and the Penny Cyclopædia. On Sept. 21, 1833, he married. In 1835 he began, and in May, 1838, he finished, for Mr. Knight, the Pictorial Bible, which had an immense and long-enduring popularity. The first edition was in three large octavo volumes, and was reprinted the first year. The standard edition was begun in 1847, and finished in 1849 (4 vols., imperial 8vo). The work appeared at first anonymously; but the real author was soon known. He had at last found his place, and produced in succession the following works: Uncle Oliver's Travels in Persia, 1838, 2 vols.; Pictorial History of Palestine and the Holy Land, including a Complete History of the Jews, 1841, 2 vols.; Gallery of Scripture Engravings, 1841-43, 3 vols.; History of Palestine from the Patriarchal Age to the Present Time, Edinburgh, 1843; Cyclopædia of Biblical Literature (which he edited and largely wrote), Edinburgh, 1843-45, 2 vols. (3d ed. greatly enlarged by W. L. Alexander, D.D., London, 1866, 3 vols.); The Pictorial Sunday Book, London, 1845; The Lost Senses, Deafness and Blindness, 1845, 2 vols.; Ancient Jerusalem, 1846; Modern Jerusalem, 1847; The Court of Persia, 1849; The People of Persia, 1849; The Tabernacle and its Furniture, 1819; The Bible History of the Holy Land, 1849 (6th ed., 1867); Daily Bible Illustrations, Morning Readings, 1849-51, 4 vols., and Evening Readings, 1851-53, 4 vols. (new edition by J. L. Porter, D.D., Edinburgh, 1866, 8 vols.),—his most popular, and, next to his Cyclopædia, his most valuable production. On Jan. 1, 1848, he began the issue of the Journal of Sacred Literature, and was by far the most voluminous contributor; but the Journal had not a sufficient pecuniary basis, and involved him in heavy loss; so that at last, in 1853, after eleven volumes had been issued, he abandoned it to the hands of Dr. Burgess. By these works he won a distinguished position among the popularizers of Bible science. In 1844 the university of Giessen, Germany, made him a doctor of divinity. In 1845 he became a fellow of the Royal Society of Antiquaries. On Dec. 17, 1850, he was put upon the civil list, and received a grant of a hundred pounds a year "on account of his useful and meritorious works." He had been all his life subject to severe headaches; but in 1851 he manifested decided indications of cerebral debility, and was more or less of an invalid from that time on. In February, 1854, he was forced to stop work. Generous friends raised eighteen hundred pounds for his support. On the 9th of August he left for Germany, and there he died.

Kitto was a layman, although a doctor of divinity. His life was full of vicissitudes, but steadily progressive. The contrast between its beginning and its close was remarkable: in fact, in the entire range of religious biography there is scarcely a parallel case. The totally deaf boy, who in poverty and misery, in cold and nakedness, wandered upon the streets of Plymouth, won for himself a name honored in thousands of homes. The secret of his success, apart from his literary gifts, lay in his indomitable perseverance, buoyed up by his great self-confidence. He never put a low estimate upon himself. His ultimate position was only the realization of the expectations of his boyhood. Much of his success may be explained on the score of his deafness; for, as he was totally cut off from ordinary society, he gave all his time to study. It is a curious fact in this connection, that for some years he scarcely spoke a word; but, by the kindly stratagem of friends upon his voyage to Malta, he was compelled to speak, and recovered the use of his vocal organs. His voice and pronunciation were peculiar, but he ever afterwards was intelligible. Having been all his life a voracious and multifarious reader, and a student whose day was sixteen hours long, it is no wonder that he acquired much learning; yet, owing to his irregular education, it would be perhaps wrong to call him a scholar. "He had as much knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, Latin, and the modern tongues, as sufficed for his purpose." Dr. Kitto was a member of the Church of England, and very catholic and liberal. Every Christian was considered by him a brother. His piety was genuine and genial, permanent and pervasive. His life reads like a romance; but his influence was real and most helpful in his day, and is likely to be in some ways permanent. He consecrated his energies to the better understanding of the Bible, and under his directions a multitude explored the mine of divine truth.

KLARENBACH, Adolf, b. at a farm near Lennep, in the duchy of Berg, towards the close of the fifteenth century; was educated at Münster; studied at Cologne; embraced the Reformation, and participated in the reformatory movements at Wesel, at Büderich (where he worked together with the minister, Johann Kloppeis), at Osnabrück, and in his native place. In 1528 Kloppeis was arrested at Cologne, and summoned before the Inquisition. Klarenbach immediately went to the city to aid him in his defence, but was also arrested. Cologne was at that moment the principal outpost of Rome in Germany. Reformatory tendencies had shown themselves in the city; but the clergy, the university, the magistrate, and the majority of the burghers, were zealous Romanists. Kloppeis escaped; but Klarenbach was kept in prison for eighteen months, in spite of the remonstrances of his friends and his native city. Together with Peter Fliesteden, he was finally convicted of heresy by the Inquisition, and delivered over for punishment to the secular authorities. Sept. 28, 1529, he was burnt in the square outside the gate. In 1829 the third centennial of his martyrdom was celebrated throughout his native country, and a monument erected in his honor.

KLEE, Heinrich, b. at Coblenz, April 20, 1800; d. in Munich, July 28, 1841. He was educated in the Roman-Catholic seminary of Mayence, and was appointed professor of theology there in 1825, at Bonn in 1830, and in Munich in 1839, having been ordained priest in 1823. At Bonn his position was in the beginning somewhat difficult, as he was a decided adversary of Hermes and the Hermesian school. He represented the old traditional stand-point of the Church of Rome. To him revelation, Christianity, and the Church formed the one undivided fact of objective reason, which presents no other problems to subjective reason but those of its historical development. But he was an able representative of this stand-point; and, after the accession of Clemens August to the archiepiscopal throne, the lecture-rooms of the Hermesians soon became empty. Klee's principal works are, System d. Kathol. Dogmatik, 1831; Die Ehe, 1833; Die Kathol. Dogmatik, 1834-35, 3 vols.; Dogmengesch., 1835-37, 2 vols. LANGE.

KLEUKER, Johann Friedrich, b. Oct. 21, 1719, at Osterode, in Hanover; d. at Kiel, May 31, 1827. He studied philosophy and theology at Göttingen, and obtained in 1773 a position as private tutor in Bückeberg, where he made the acquaintance of Herder. In 1778 he was appointed rector of the gymnasium of Osnabrück, and in 1798 professor of theology at Kiel, from which position he retired in 1826. He was a staunch adversary of the ever-increasing rationalism of his time, and developed an astounding literary activity, which testifies, not only to his industry, but also to his erudition, especially in Oriental languages and classical literature. See RATJEN: J. F. Kleuker und Briefe seiner Freunde, Göttingen, 1842.

KLING, Christian Friedrich, b. at Altdorf, Württemberg, Nov. 4, 1800; d. at Marbach-on-the-Neckar, Schiller's birthplace, in April, 1861. He studied at Tübingen and Berlin, and was appointed pastor at Waiblingen, 1826; professor of theology at Marburg, 1832, and at Bonn, 1842; pastor at Ebersbach in Württemberg, 1849; and dean of Marbach, 1851. He was a pupil of Schleiermacher and Neander. In his writings, as in his lectures, instructive, sound, and winning; a man of fine discrimination and independent judgment. In 1831 he edited the sermons of Bertholdt, a Franciscan revival preacher of the twelfth century; and in the last years of his life he prepared for Lange's Bibelwerk the Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians, translated into English by Drs. D. W. Poor and Conway P. Wing, in Schaff's edition of Lange's Commentary, New York, 1868. He also contributed numerous minor essays to the leading theological reviews of Germany, and articles for Herzog's Encyclopædia.

KLOPSTOCK, Friedrich Gottlieb, b. at Quedlinburg, Saxony, July 2, 1724, d. at Hamburg, March 14, 1803. He was educated at Schulpforte. When he left that institution (in 1745), he made a Latin valediction on epic poetry, which shows, that, though only twenty-one years old, he had fully made up his mind to become a poet, to write an epic, and to use Christ for his hero. (See Freybe: Klopstocks Abschiedsrede, Halle, 1868.) He studied first at Jena: but the mode of life which prevailed there among the students displeased him; and in 1746 he removed to Leipzig, where he remained until after the appearance of the three first songs of his Messias, published in Bremische Beiträge, 1748. (See D. F. Strauss: Klopstocks Jugendgeschichte, in Kleine Schriften, Berlin, 1866.) After staying for two years as a private tutor in the house of a relative at Langensalza, he went in 1750 to Zürich to visit Bodmer. (See Moerikofer: Klopstock in Zürich, 1750-51, Zürich, 1851.) In 1751 he went to Copenhagen, where he lived, somewhat retired, but highly honored, at the court of Frederick V., who gave him a pension of four hundred thalers. After the death of the king (in 1766) he removed to Hamburg, but he retained the pension. In Hamburg he lived in the same style as in Copenhagen. His house gradually became a pilgrim's shrine. (See Klamer-Schmidt: Klopstock und seine Freunde, Halberstadt, 1810.) He died after a long illness, and was buried at Ottensen with great pomp. (See Meyer: Klopstocks Gedächtnisfeier, Hamburg, 1803; Klopstocks Todtenfeier, Hamburg, 1804.) He was twice married.—first time (1751) to Margareta Moller, who died in 1758; second time (1791) to Mrs. Winthem, a niece of his first wife. He had no children.

The great event, which, during the youth of Klopstock, filled the history of German literature, was the controversy between Gottsched and Bodmer. Gottsched stood at the head of the French school. The drama was to him the highest artistic form; and the rules, with the elegance of expression and clearness of movement which they produced, he considered as the very essence of poetry. He and his wife translated French tragedies, and wrote original pieces after the same model. Bodmer stood at the head of the English school; and the epic, with national picturesqueness and sublime plasticity, was his art-ideal. Homer and Milton were his favorites. He published the first edition of the Nibelungen. Klopstock was, so to speak, awakened by Bodmer. He fully adopted his ideas; and the great work of his life was the Messias, an epic poem, written in hexameters, published in parts between 1748 and 1780, and translated into English, French, Dutch, Polish, Swedish, and Latin. He wrote also dramas, but with Shakespeare, not Racine, as his model. Die Hermannschlacht (1769), dedicated to Joseph II., is a very characteristic composition. His Oden und Elegien (1771) were translated into English by W. Nind, 1847. The first collected edition of his works appeared at Leipzig, 1798-1810, in seven volumes. The most complete is that of Leipzig, 1844-45, with letters and biographical supplements by Herman Schmidlin.

The two fundamental ideas on which Klopstock's poesy is based are nationality and religion; and though his Germanenthum is somewhat affected, and his Christenthum somewhat sentimental, the power with which he forced these two ideas into the spiritual life of his time made him a turning-point in the history of German literature. Modern German poetry begins with him. His literary influence was enormous, decisive; and, besides this, he exercised, both by his Messias and by his Oden and Geistliche Lieder, a purely religious influence. In a time in which Lutheran orthodoxy had transformed religion into a mere system of doctrines, Klopstock made people feel that Christianity is something more,—that it speaks as well to the imagination and the sentiment as to the intellect. More especially he was the singer of the resurrection and the coming kingdom of heaven; and numerous proofs of the deep impression he produced can be found in the German literature. See C. F. CRAMER: Er und über ihn, Hamburg, 1780; and DÖRING: Klopstocks Leben, Weimar, 1825.

A. FREYBE.

KLÜPFEL, Engelbert, b. at Wipfelda, Lower Franconia, Jan. 18, 1733; d. at Freiburg, in Breisgau, July 8, 1811. In 1750 he entered the order of the Augustinians at Würzburg; studied philosophy at Erfurt, theology at Freiburg, and was ordained priest at Constance in 1756; taught philosophy in the gymnasiums of Männerstadt and Oberdorf, theology at Mayence and Constance; and was in 1767 made professor of theology at Freiburg. This appointment roused the jealousy of the Jesuits, who had hitherto held the chair; but Klüpfel was supported by the Austrian court, and allowed to continue his activity unmolested. With the Protestant rationalists, especially Semler, he also carried on a hot controversy in his Nova Bibliotheca Ecclesiastica,—a periodical which he founded in 1775, and continued to 1790 (7 vols.). His principal work is his Institutiones theologie dogmaticæ (1789), which was used as text-book in many universities, but has been materially altered in its fourth edition by Ziegler. His De vita et scriptis Conradi Celtis, containing some autobiographical notes, was published after his death. See JOHANN L. HUG: Elogium Klüpfel.

KLOSE.

KNAPP, Aibert, the most distinguished writer of spiritual songs in Germany in the first half of this century; was b. in Tübingen, July 25, 1798; d. in Stuttgart, June 18, 1864. In his second year his parents removed to Alpirsbach in the Black Forest, where they remained till 1809. The beauties of the scenery exercised a lasting influence upon the fresh imagination of the young poet. He studied at the theological seminary in Tübingen; but the years were fuller of poetry than of theology. In 1820 he became vicar at Feuerbach, and afterwards at Gaisburg,—two villages near Stuttgart. His intercourse at this period with Wilhelm Hofacker gave to him a new insight “into his own corruption and into Christ's grace and majesty, which became the beginning of an entirely new life, and conception of the world.” After passing to Sulz (1825) and to Kirchheim (1831), he was transferred to Stuttgart in 1836, and in 1845 was made pastor of St. Leonhard's Church. He endeared himself to his people; and although he was not fitted, like Ludwig Hofacker, by an impressive emphasis of sin and grace, to become a pattern as an awakening preacher, his sermons were noted for a remarkable richness of spiritual thought. He was a man of decided evangelical sentiments, and clung to the Divine Word. “Then is the soul joyful,” he says, “when it passes from the confusion of a capricious, dry, and limited human wisdom, into the clear light of the Divine Word.”

Knapp's claim to permanent fame rests upon his peculiar gift of spiritual poetry. He was an original poet and a hymnologist. His first efforts appeared in two volumes, under the title Christliche Gedichte (“Christian Poems”), and were published, by the generosity of some friends, at Basel, in 1829. Most of Knapp's hymns, which were afterwards incorporated in hymn-books, appeared in this edition. Other volumes of poems appeared under the titles, Neuere Gedichte (“New Poems”), 1834, 2 vols.; Christenlieder (“Songs for Christians”), 1841; Gedichte (“Poems”), 1854, 1868; and Herbstblüthen (“Autumn Flowers”), 1859. These volumes contain more than twelve hundred original hymns and poems. Although they are not always classic in form, they are rich in thought. The subjects are drawn from every department. Men of war, poets, musicians, as well as the beauties of nature and the praises of Christ, are sung. For, as he says, “the whole world belongs to the Christian; and his mind and heart may tarry everywhere except in the domain of sin and vanity, and everywhere seek the vestiges of his God.” But he always returned with joy to the Word of God. “Here there is an endless store. Though one may have composed a hundred poems on it with careful labor, yet he has done no more than does a fly when it has walked over the keys of a piano full of music. Especially do I look upon the Old Testament as a real gold-mine of the highest style of poetry.” It was his glory, as Fr. Krummacher said, that he laid all his talents at the feet of Christ; and some of his hymns will always continue to be fountains of blessing; as, An dein Blüten und Erblichen; Eines wünsch ich mir vor allem andern [“More than all, one thing my heart is craving,” Schaff's Christ in Song, p. 497]; Einer ist's, an dem wir hangen; Hallelujah, wie lieblich stehn!

Knapp also did a great work by editing a collection of hymns, Evangelischer Liederschatz für Kirche und Haus (“Treasury of Hymns for the Church and Home”), Stuttgart, 1837; 3d ed., 1865. He here gives an admirable selection of 3,590 out of the 80,000 German hymns. In the first edition he made many corrections in the hymns, but afterwards confessed he had gone too far in this direction. [Its notices of the hymn-writers are written with skill, and are very valuable.] This work contributed very materially to sharpen and satisfy the taste for good hymns. Knapp also edited the Christoterpe from 1833 to 1853, a Christian almanac, and published some biographies. See Lebensbild v. A. Knapp (memoirs begun by himself, and completed by his son, Joseph Knapp) [and a lecture of thirty-seven pages by KARL GEROK: Albert Knapp, Der schwäbische Dichter, Stuttgart, 1879], Stuttgart, 1867. PALMER. (LAUXMANN.)

KNAPP, Georg Christian, b. at Glaucha, 1753; d. at Halle, Oct. 14, 1825. He studied at Halle and Göttingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Halle in 1777, and director of the Francke Institution in 1785. Surrounded on all sides by the prevailing rationalism, he represented the influence of Spener; and the impression he made was both deep and wide, though a natural timidity, which made him shrink from any direct conflict, prevented him from forming a school. He published a valuable edition of the New Testament (3d ed., 1824); and his Scripta varii argumenti (2 vols.; 2d ed., 1823) contains several excellent essays. After his death, his Lectures on Christian Theology was published by Thilo (1827-28, 2 vols.), [and translated into English by Leonard Woods (Andover, 1831-39, 2 vols.)]; and his Biblische Glaubenslehre zum praktischen Gebrauch, by Guericke, 1810. See NIEMEYER: Epicædien zum Andenken auf Knapp, 1825. THOLUCK.

KNATCHBULL, Sir Norton, b. in Kent, 1601; d. 1681. He wrote Annotations upon some Difficult Texts in all the Books of the New Testament (Cambridge, 1693), a translation, with improvements of his own, — Animadversiones in libros N. T. paradoxæ orthodoxæ (London, 1659). It was once highly esteemed, and frequently reprinted.

KNEELAND, Abner, b. 1771; d. at Farmington, Io., Aug. 27, 1841. He was first a Baptist, and then a Universalist minister, but ultimately became a deist. In 1836 he was tried for blasphemy before the Supreme Court at Boston. He published The Deist (1822, 2 vols.), Lectures on the Doctrine of Universal Salvation (Philadelphia, 1821), Review of the Evidences of Christianity (1829). But his most notable publication was a translation of the New Testament, with a Greek text, Philadelphia, 1822, 2 vols.

KNEELING (Genuflexion, Prostration). The Jews prayed standing or kneeling (Neh. ix. 2-1; Matt. vi. 5; Luke xviii. 11, 13; 2 Chron. vi. 13; Dan. vi. 10; Ez. ix. 5, etc.). Among the Christians, however, the kneeling posture very early became the most common. Compare Acts vii. 60, ix. 40, xx. 36, xxi. 5; Eph. iii. 14, not to speak of frequent allusions by Clemens Romanus, St. Ignatius, Irenæus, and others. See art. Genuflexion in SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, i. 723 sq.

KNIPPERDOLLING, Bernard. See MÜNSTER.

KNIPSTRO (not Knipstrow, though in Latin Knipstrovius), Johann, b. at Sandow-in-the-Mark, May 1, 1197; d. at Wolgast, Oct. 4, 1556. He early entered the Franciscan order, and was, on account of his mental brightness, sent to study in the university of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, where he greatly distinguished himself by defending the theses of Luther against Tetzel in a public disputation, Jan. 20, 1518. In order to prevent his embracing the Reformation, he was by his superiors sent to the Franciscan monastery at Pyritz in Pomerania; but in a short time he converted all the monks to Protestantism. The bishop of Cammin interfered; and Knipstro fled to Stettin, where he married, and thence to Stralsund, where he was made assistant preacher at St. Mary, and afterwards superintendent. At the synod of Treptow, 1534, the dukes of Pomerania agreed to introduce the Reformation in their possessions; and Knipstro was made superintendent-general over the Wolgast dominions. His activity was, on the whole, more practical than theoretical. His writings (Epistola ad Melancthonem, Wiederlegung des Bekenntnisses A. Osiaundi, etc.) are not many. His life is found in J. H. BALTHASER: Sammlungen, Greifswald, 1723, 1725, 2 vols., i. 93, and ii. 317-386. G. PLITT.

KNOBEL, Karl August, one of the greatest Hebrew exegetes of our age; b. at Tzschecheln, in Lower Lusatia, Aug. 7, 1807; d. at Giessen, May 25, 1863. He was educated at Sorau, studied at Breslau; was appointed professor extraordinary of theology there in 1835, and, after the publication of his Prophetismus der Hebräer (Breslau, 1837, 2 vols.), ordinary professor of theology at Giessen, 1839. To Hirzel's Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum Alten Testament he contributed the Commentaries on Isaiah (which involved him in a controversy with Ewald, and occasioned him to write his Exegetisches Vademecum für Herrn Ewald in Tübingen, Giessen, 1844), 1843. 3d edition, 1861; Genesis, 1852, 2d edition, 1860; Exodus and Leviticus, 1857; and Numbers, Deuteronomy, and Joshua, 1861; and his contributions are distinguished by their learning and acuteness, originality of view, and solid argumentation, though the decidedly rationalistic bent of his mind prevented him from thoroughly appreciating the poetical and theological value of the works commented upon. He also wrote Commentar über das Buch Koheleth, 1836, and Völkertafel der Genesis, 1850. ZÖCKLER.

KNOLLYS, Hanserd, an eminent English Baptist minister; b. in Chalkwell, Lincolnshire, 1598; d. in London, Sept. 19, 1691. He was educated at Cambridge University, and ordained priest by the bishop of Peterborough. Changing his views on infant baptism, he was recognized as a non-conformist, and subjected to much persecution for preaching. In 1638 he left the country, and sailed for America. Arriving in Boston, he became involved in a controversy with the authorities. Cotton Mather called him "Mr. Absurd Knowless." He was the first minister of Dover, N.H. He returned to England in 1641, where the remainder of his life was spent in varying vicissitudes, a part of the time as a fugitive on the Continent. Mr. Knollys was a learned scholar and an able preacher, and, before his departure for America, is said to have had a regular audience of one thousand persons when he preached in London. He published Flaming Fire in Zion (1616), Rudiments of the Hebrew Grammar (1618), and his Autobiography (1672). The last work was continued by KIFFIN, 1692, and reprinted 1813. See also BROOKS: Lives of the Puritans, vol. iii. The Hanserd Knollys (Baptist) Society was organized in England in 1815 to republish early Baptist writings.

KNOWN-MEN, a designation for Lollards, and, later, for Puritans, in Henry VIII.'s time; used among themselves to mark the fact of their acquaintance with the New Testament. They considered themselves to be "known men" of God, because they knew God's Book.

KNOX, John, the Scottish reformer; b. 1505; d. Nov. 24, 1572; was the son of William Knox, a small landed proprietor of fair though not distinguished descent, in the county of Lanark. His mother's name was Sinclair; and his birth-place (Works, edited by D. Laing, vol. vi. p. 16) appears to have been, not Gifford village, as usually represented, but a suburb of the town of Haddington, known as Giffordgate. It was likewise in Haddington that he received the elements of a liberal education. Haddington early enjoyed the advantage of possessing an excellent grammar-school, — one of those schools originally monastic, and due to the public spirit, which, at least as regards education, animated the Scottish Church even antecedently to the Reformation. In these schools, if not, except in rare instances, Greek, at least the Latin language was taught, along with the more ordinary branches of popular instruction. The schools of Aberdeen, Perth, Stirling, Dumbarton, Killearn, and Haddington, are particularly mentioned in contemporary writings, as, in the beginning of the sixteenth century, celebrated for the skill of their masters, and the attainments of the often numerous pupils — including sons of the principal nobility and gentry — who were educated within their walls.

From Haddington school he appears to have proceeded to the University of Glasgow, then not so well equipped as it has since become, being, in the words of its distinguished principal, John Major, "parum dotatum, parumque celebrem," and chiefly adorned by the presidency of a man who was one of the greatest scholars of his times. How long Knox remained at college is uncertain. His name occurs among the Incorporati in the Annales of Glasgow College for 1522. It is not to be found in any subsequent year, either in the Glasgow registers, or in those of the other Scottish universities. He may have been a student, however, without matriculating. Knox certainly never made any pretence to be such a scholar as his contemporaries George Buchanan or Alesius; nor is there evidence that he even graduated. That he was a fair Latinist, and accustomed to study, appears, however, from the fact, which seems to be well attested, of his familiarity with the writings of Augustine and Jerome. He acquired the Greek and Hebrew languages after middle life, probably when on the Continent. Knox is said to have been ordained to the priesthood before the year 1530. The fact of his ordination is admitted both by friends and foes; but neither for the date of this event, nor for almost any other incident in the reformer's career, between his matriculation in Glasgow in 1522 and the time when he renounced the errors of Romanism, and professed his adherence to the Protestant faith, have we authentic evidence. The principal authority for the facts of his life at this period is an article in Beza's Icones Virorum Illustrium (1580); but the details given in this curious series of contemporary biographies are not by any means always reliable. One fact, whatever its value, is ascertained. It appears, from evidence adduced by Mr. Laing, that in the year 1544 Knox had not yet divested himself of Romish orders; in so far, that, in his character of a priest, he signed a notarial instrument dated March 27 of that year, the original of which is still to be found in the Charter-room at Tynninghame Castle. Up to this time, however, he seems to have employed himself in private tuition, rather than in parochial duties; and, at the moment when he last signed his name as a priest, he was probably already engaged in the office — which he held for several years — as tutor or pedagogue in the family of Hugh Douglas of Longniddry, in East Lothian, with the further charge of the son of a neighboring gentleman, John Cockburn of Ormiston: both of them persons, who, like himself, had even at this time a leaning to the new doctrines.

Knox was forty years of age when he first publicly professed the Protestant faith. His mind had in all probability been directed to that faith for some time before the change was avowed. According to Calderwood, Thomas Guillaume, a native of East Lothian, and provincial of the order of Blackfriars, was the first "to give Mr. Knox a taste of the truth." Beza attributes his original change of opinion to the study in St. Andrews, in early manhood, of the writings of Augustine and Jerome. But the immediate instrument of his actual conversion was the equally learned and amiable George Wishart, who, after a period of banishment, returned to his native country in 1544, to perish, in the following year, at the stake, as the last and most illustrious of the victims of Cardinal Beaton. Among other places where he preached the Reformed doctrines in these years, Wishart had come to East Lothian, and there made Knox's acquaintance. The attachment which the latter formed for the person as for the doctrine of Wishart, must, notwithstanding his mature years, be described as of the nature of a youthful enthusiasm. He followed him everywhere, and constituted himself his body-guard, bearing, it is said, a two-edged sword, that he might be prepared to defend him against the cardinal's emissaries, then known to be seeking Wishart's life. And, on the night of the martyr's apprehension, he was hardly restrained from sharing his captivity, and consequently, in all probability, his fate. The terms of Wishart's remonstrance are well known: "Nay, return to your bairns (pupils). One is sufficient for a sacrifice."

His first call to the Protestant ministry took place at St. Andrews, a picturesque city, rich in ecclesiastical traditions from the Culdee period, which was throughout his life intimately associated with the reformer's career. There appears to have been no regular ordination. Of course, he was already ordained as a priest in the Church of Rome. But imposition of hands, and other forms in constituting the ministerial character, were (as appears from the Book of Policy for the Church of Scotland, which he afterwards assisted to draw up, and at all events sanctioned) not regarded by Knox as at most of more than secondary importance. A graphic account of the whole proceedings connected with his call to the ministry, together with a report of his first sermon in St. Andrews, will be found in Knox's History of the Reformation.

At this time he was residing in the Castle of St. Andrews. After Beaton's death, this stronghold became a place of refuge for many of the Protestants. Along with his pupils, the sons of the lairds of Longniddry and Ormiston, already mentioned, he passed there some comparatively peaceful months. His repose was rudely interrupted by the investiture and capitulation of the castle in the end of July, 1547, succeeded, as regarded Knox and some of the rest of the refugees, by imprisonment in the French galleys. He now spent no less than nineteen months as a galley-slave, amongst hardships and miseries which are said to have permanently injured his health, and which he never cared to refer to, so painful was the recollection. "How long I continued prisoner," he said in a sermon preached in St. Andrews, in 1569, "what torments I sustained in the galleys, and what were the sobs of my heart, is now no time to recite." He adds, however, that he always continued to hope for a return to his native country. In the History (vol. i. p. 228), the same confidence of a return is referred to as never having forsaken him; and he gives a curious testimony to the fact, by mentioning how, on one occasion, "lying betwixt Dundee and St. Andrews, the second time that the galleys returned to Scotland, the said John [Knox] being so extremely sick that few hoped his life, Maister [afterwards Sir] James [Balfour, one of his fellow-prisoners] willed him to look to the land, and asked if he knew it. Who answered, 'Yes, I know it well; for I see the steeple of that place where God first in public opened my mouth to his glory; and I am fully persuaded, how weak soever I now appear, that I shall not depart this life, till that my tongue shall glorify his godly name in the same place.'"

On his release, which took place early in 1549, through (as is supposed) the mediation of Edward VI., Knox found, that, in the existing state of the country, he could be of little use in his beloved Scotland. For nearly ten years we accordingly find him submitting to voluntary exile, like so many of the worthiest of his countrymen in those troublous times. All these years, however, he devoted himself to ministerial labors in connection with the Reformed Church. His first sphere of duty was provided for him in England, as a minister of the English Church. For a full account of this period (extending over about five years) of the life of Knox, the reader must be referred to Dr. Lorimer's work, mentioned below. That the father of the Presbyterian Church of Scotland should have been from 1549 to 1551 a minister of the Church of England will appear the less remarkable, when it is remembered, that, during the whole reign of Edward VI., the Church of England was in a transition state; some of its most marked peculiarities (which Knox himself and others in Scotland and abroad afterwards objected to) being then in abeyance, or at least not insisted upon as terms of communion. Thus, the Prayer-Book was not obligatory, neither was kneeling at the communion. Episcopal government was of course acknowledged; but Knox, when himself offered, in the year 1552, the bishopric of Rochester, declined the preferment, on the same grounds on which he afterwards objected to the re-introduction of Episcopacy into Scotland. The offices he held in the Church of England are roughly indicated in the History, which says, "He was first appointed preacher to Berwick, then to Newcastle; and last he was called to London and to the southern parts of England, where he remained till the death of Edward VI." (Works, I. p. 280). From other sources it appears that in 1551 he was appointed one of the six chaplains in ordinary to the king; and that in this capacity he had submitted to him, and, after revision, joined the other chaplains in sanctioning, "The Articles concerning an Uniformity in Religion" of 1552, which became the basis of the "Thirty-nine Articles" of the Church of England.

From England, at the death of Edward, Knox proceeded to the Continent, travelling for a time from place to place in some uncertainty. In September, 1554, having reached Geneva, where he saw Calvin, he accepted a call to the English Church at Frankfurt. At Frankfurt controversies in connection with vestments, ceremonies, and the use of the English Prayer-Book, met him, and, notwithstanding the great moderation which he showed from first to last, led, in March, 1555, to his resignation of his charge. On this subject the reader is referred to his treatise, reprinted in Laing's edition of Knox's works, entitled A Briefe Narrative of the Troubles which arose at Frankfurt (1554). From Frankfurt, Knox passed a second time to Geneva, where he was at once invited to become minister of the English Church; and to that charge he was formally elected in December, 1556, on his return from a visit which he paid to Scotland on the occasion of his first marriage. The church in which he preached at Geneva was called the "Temple de Notre Dame la Neuve," and had been granted, at Calvin's solicitation, for the use of the English and Italian congregations, by the municipal authorities of that city. Knox continued to officiate in Geneva till January, 1559, when he finally left for Scotland.

He arrived in Edinburgh on the 2d of May of that year. The time was a critical one; but the life of Knox from this period belongs to the history of his country, and only those particulars need be noticed which have a strictly personal interest.

When the Reformed religion was, in 1560, formally ratified by law in Scotland, Knox was appointed minister of the Church of St. Giles, then the great parish church of Edinburgh. He was at this time a man of fifty-five years, and in the full vigor of his powers, as appears abundantly in the style of his History of the Reformation, — a work which appears to have been begun about 1559, and completed in the course of the next five or six years. The History, if sometimes rough and even coarse in language, and not always defensible in temper and spirit, is written with a force and vigor not surpassed by any of his other writings: of all of which it may here be said, that, whatever their faults, they are works of true genius, and well worthy in their character, upon the whole, of the great leader and statesman who wrote them. At the very beginning of his labors as minister of Edinburgh, he had the misfortune to lose his much-loved wife, Marjory Bowes, then only in her twenty-seventh or twenty-eighth year. She was the daughter of Richard Bowes, captain of Norham Castle, and a scion of a family of distinction in Northumberland. He had secured her affections during his early ministry at Berwick, and had returned from Geneva in 1555 to marry her. In 1563 Knox made a second marriage, which was greatly talked of at the time, not so much for the difference of rank, as the disparity in age, between the parties, but which, notwithstanding these circumstances, appears to have been a happy one. The young lady was Margaret Stewart, daughter of Andrew Lord Stewart of Ochiltree. At this time our reformer lived not only a very laborious life,—being much engrossed with the public affairs of the nascent church, and at the same time devoted to his work as a parish minister, to say nothing of his continual, and perhaps, in his position, unavoidable controversies, more or less personal, with the ecclesiastical and political factions of the day, whom he regarded as his own and his country's enemies,—but a life not without its social and family enjoyments. He had a fair stipend of four hundred merks scots, equal to about forty-four pounds of English money of that day, and the value of which may be computed when it is stated that the amount was considerably higher than that of the salaries of the judges of the Court of Session in Scotland, and not much lower than those of the English judges of the same times. Then he had a good house, which was provided and kept in repair by the municipality,—a house previously occupied by the abbot of Dunfermline. The house is still preserved, with little change, and forms a memorial—hitherto the only memorial—of the great reformer in the scene of so many of his labors. From his will, too, it appears that he had sometimes as much as a hoghead of wine in his cellar. Nor was he, with all his severity and even fierceness of temper, a man indisposed in those days to exchange friendly and kindly relations with his neighbors, many of whom, in every rank, were among his intimate friends, or to give way, when the occasion fitted (perhaps even sometimes when it did not fit), to mirth and humor, of which, as of other traits of his character, his writings furnish abundant evidence.

An interesting description of Knox's appearance, and especially of his style as a preacher, in his later years, is furnished in the Diary of James Melville (Bannatyne Club, 1829, pp. 26, 33). Melville was at the time a student in St. Andrews, and the period he refers to is the year 1571, when Knox, for his personal security, had, not for the first time in his life, taken refuge in that city. "Of all the benefits I had that year" (writes Melville) "was the coming of that most notable prophet and apostle of our nation, Mr. John Knox, to St. Andrews, who, by the faction of the queen occupying the castle and town of Edinburgh, was compelled to remove therefrom, with a number of the best, and chose to come to St. Andrews. . . . Mr. Knox would sometimes come in, and repose him in our college-yard, and call us scholars unto him, and bless us, and exhort us to know God and his work in our country, and stand by the good cause; to use our time well, and learn the good instructions, and follow the good example, of our masters. . . . He was very weak. I saw him every day of his doctrine go lullie and fear, with a furring of martriks about his neck, a staff in the one hand, and good godly Richard Ballantyne, his servant, holding up the other oxtar, from the abbey to the parish church, and by the said Richard and another servant lifted up to the pulpit, where he beloved to lean at his first entry; but or he had done with his sermon, he was so active and vigorous that he was like to ding that pulpit in blads and fly out of it."

John Knox died on Monday, the 24th of November, 1572, in the sixty-seventh year of his age. He died as he had lived,—full of faith, but always ready for conflict. He found a devoted nurse in his young wife; and all the noblest and best men of Scotland hung about his house for tidings of the progress of his malady, in the vain hope of his being longer spared. Two brief estimates of his character, both of them contemporary, may be here added. One is found in the account of his last illness and death by his servant, Richard Ballantyne, who, after detailing the incidents of his last hours, says, "Of this manner departit this man of God, the lycht of Scotland, the comfort of the Kirke within the same, the mirrour of Godliness, and patrone and exmple to all trew ministeris, in puritie of lyfe, soundness in doctrine, and in bauldness in reproving of wicketness, and one that caired not the favore of men (how great soever they were) to reprove thair abuses and syues. . . . What dexteritie in teiching, bauldness in reproving, and hatred of wickedness was in him, my ignorant dulness is not able to declair."

But the highest testimony to the worth of a man not without faults was that pronounced at his grave in the churchyard of St. Giles by the Earl of Mortoun, the regent of Scotland, in the presence of an immense concourse, who had followed him to his last resting-place: "Here lyeth a man who in his life never feared the face of man, who hath been often threatened with dagge and dagger, but yet hath ended his dayes in peace and honour."

WILLIAM LEE.

KNOX, Vicesimus, b. at Newington Green, Middlesex, Dec. 8, 1752; d. in Tunbridge, Kent, Sept. 6, 1821. He was educated at St. John's College, Oxford; succeeded his father as master of Tunbridge School, and held the position with honor for thirty-three years. He is well known as the author of Essays (London, 1777; more than twenty editions published), and as the compiler of Elegant Extracts in Prose (1783), Elegant Extracts in Verse (1790), Elegant Epistles (1792) (the three volumes reprinted, Boston, Mass., 6 vols.), and of Family Lectures, 1791. He was an admired preacher, impassioned and flowery. His Works, with biographical preface, were published, London, 1824. 7 vols.

KOHATH (assembly), second son of Levi (Gen. xlv. 11), founder of the Kohathites (1 Chron. xxiii. 12), who were Levites of the highest rank. According to the account in Num. iii. 29-31, iv. 2 sq., the Kohathites pitched their tents on the south side of the tabernacle while in the wilderness, and had charge of "the ark and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they minister, and the hanging, and the service thereof." In later times they helped to bring the ark to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 5). They had twenty-three cities assigned to them at the conquest (Josh. xxi. 4, 5). They occupied the proudest positions in the land, being judges and officers (1 Chron. xxvi. 20-26), also temple-singers (2 Chron. xx. 19). See LEVITES.

KOHLBRÜCQE, Hermann Friedrich, the founder of the Dutch-Reformed (Niederländisch-Reformirte) congregation at Elberfeld; b. in Amsterdam, Aug. 15, 1803; d. at Elberfeld, March 5, 1875. His parents were Lutherans; and, after studying theology, he became preacher to a Lutheran congregation in Amsterdam. But between the cold rationalism of his colleagues and his own hot enthusiasm, a conflict was unavoidable, and he was deposed. After living for several years in retirement, he joined the Reformed Church; and in 1834, while travelling through the Rhine regions, where just at that time a kind of revival took place, he preached often, and made a deep impression. But the Prussian Government, considering him a dangerous enemy of their plans of uniting the Lutheran and Reformed churches, finally forbade him the pulpit. Meanwhile the act of union produced a great fermentation, especially among the Reformed congregations; and that of Elberfeld finally separated from the State establishment, and chose Kohlbrügge for its minister (1847), constituting itself as a member of the Church of the Netherlands. There he labored with great success till his death. Besides a considerable number of sermons, he published, Das siebente Kapitel d. Briefes Pauli an die Römer; Betrachtung über d. erste Kapitel d. Evangeliums nach Matthäus, etc. CALAMINUS.

KOHLER, Christian and Hieronymus, two brothers, natives of Brügglen, a village in the canton of Bern, and founders of the so-called "Brügglen" sect, which flourished about the middle of the eighteenth century. Badly educated, but not without considerable natural gifts, sensuous, shrewd, with an inclination towards the marvellous and mystical, Christian supported himself as a common day-laborer, and Hieronymus as a wagoner. Neither of them seems to have led a blameless life: nevertheless, when, in 1743, a revival movement reached the country in which they lived, they succeeded in placing themselves at the head of the movement. They left off working, and began to preach and exhort. They had visions and revelations. They represented themselves as the two witnesses of the Revelation. They asserted that Christian was the temple of the Father; Hieronymus, that of the Son; and Kissling, a woman of not altogether irreproachable reputation, that of the Holy Spirit, destined to bring forth the Saviour of the world. Their doctrines, so far as they had any doctrines, were a mere maze of wilful distortions, intended to justify the immorality of their own lives. But they, nevertheless, succeeded in seducing quite a number of people in Brügglen and the neighboring parishes. Jan. 2, 1750, they were banished from Bern; but they secretly returned, obtained money to release deceased souls from purgatory, allured people into idleness and debauchery by predicting the near end of the world, etc. Oct. 8, 1752, Hieronymus was arrested; and Jan. 16, 1753, he was sentenced to death, and executed. At the same time Christian was arrested at Neuenburg; but his final fate is unknown. Kissling was locked up in a house of correction. Shortly after, the sect disappeared, though it is noticeable that afterwards the Antonians found ready acceptance in the very parishes in which the Brügglen sect had flourished. KOLLENBUSCH, Samuel, b. at Wichlinghausen, near Barmen, Sept. 1, 1724; d. at Barmen, Sept. 1, 1803. He studied medicine at Duisburg and Strassburg, and practised as a physician, first at Duisburg, afterwards in his native city. As a mystic, he stands between Tersteegen and Jung-Stilling. But he was a biblical realist, believing in the literal truth of every word of the Bible, and a zealous churchman; and this same character the circle of adherents retained, which gradually formed around him, and which afterwards was considerably widened by the exertions of G. Menken at Bremen. For his peculiar doctrines, see Erklärung biblischer Wahrheiten (Elberfeld, 1807), and Goldene Äpfel in silbernen Schalen (Barmen, 1854); for his life, see Mittheilungen aus d. Leben u. Wirken S. Coltenbusch in Barmen (Barmen, 1853). See also Fr. W. KRUG: Die Lehre d. Dr. Kollenbusch (Elberfeld, 1846) and *Kritische Geschichte d. protest.-relig. Schwärmerie im Grossherz. KOL NIDRÉ (כֹּל נִדְרֵי), "all vows"), a formula uttered three times, with increasing loudness, by the official leader of worship in the Jewish synagogues, upon the evening of the Day of Atonement, as part of the service. Each time it is pronounced, the congregation repeat it softly. It is to this effect: "All vows, renunciations, prohibitions, and obligations of every kind, which we have made, sworn, and bound upon us, from this Day of Atonement to the next, we now repent of, and pronounce them broken, and of no efficacy. Our vows are no vows; our oaths are no oaths." As might be supposed, this liturgical formula has been turned against the Jews, as if by it they absolved themselves from all obligations, and therefore could not be bound by an oath. But the charge is unjust; for the Kol Nidré applies only to vows, — i. e., what the speaker binds upon himself, — and not to oaths, which would bind him to others. The latter are regarded by them as inviolable, except by the personal consent of the individual who had received the oath. A general release from future vows can be made on New Year, or between New Year's and the Day of Atonement, in the synagogue, if three individuals unite in the request.

Kol Nidré dates from about the ninth Christian century. At first it referred to congregational and not to individual vows. In the manuscripts, the formula varies considerably. Although not so in design, it is easily made an instrument of unrighteousness. Bad men use it to escape obligations. See OATH AMONG THE HEBREWS.

KOMANDER (DORFMANN), Johann, was probably born at Chur; early became acquainted with Zwingli; and in August, 1524, was appointed parish-priest at St. Martin-in-Chur. The state of affairs in the Grisons was at that moment almost desperate. The population — belonging to various races, and in the different valleys speaking different languages (Italian, Romance, French, and German) — was sunk into utter ignorance. Only a limited number of grown-up persons knew any thing of the Decalogue and the Lord's Prayer. The clergy was debauched beyond description. The monks lived in the monasteries with wife and children. The bishops and abbots, and even the priests, were foreigners, who could not understand the language spoken by their flocks. Under such circumstances, Komander, an intimate friend of Zwingli, planted the Reformation in the country, and vindicated its cause with great energy and success till his death, in 1557. April 4, 1524, the union diet issued the so-called Artikelbrief, which, among other things, demanded that the holder of an ecclesiastical office should be able to perform its duties himself; and, as the parish priest of St. Martin-in-Chur declared himself unable to preach, the government deposed him, and gave his office to Komander. The Roman-Catholic clergy, roused by these proceedings, began intriguing against Komander, and tried to make him responsible for the troubles caused by the Anabaptists. The intrigue failed, however; and when the diet, in June, 1526, issued twenty new "articles of reformation," the bishop fled. Tolerably undisturbed, Komander then went on holding public disputations, establishing a regularly convened synod, drawing up a catechism, founding a seminary at Chur, etc. See DE PORTA: Historia reformationis eccles. Rhaetic., Chur, 1772, vol. i.

KARL PESTALOZZI.

KÖNIG, Johann Friedrich, b. at Dresden, Oct. 16, 1619; studied at Leipzig and Wittenberg, and was successively Swedish court-preacher, professor of theology at Greifswald (1651), superintendent of Meklenburg and Ratzeburg (1656), and professor of theology at Rostock (1659); in which position he died, Sept. 15, 1664. He was prominent among the "virtuosos in dogmatics" of the seventeenth century; and his Theologia positiva acroamatica (Rostock, 1664) was often republished, and widely used as a text-book, and forms the foundation of Quenstädt's famous work. See GASS: Geschichte d. protest. Dogmatik, i., 321 et seq.

HAGENBACH.

KÖNIG, Samuel, b. at Gerzensee, in canton of Bern, 1670; studied at Bern and Zürich; visited Holland and England, in which latter country he was initiated in the mystic and chiliastic ideas of Jane Leade; returned home in 1698, and was appointed preacher in the hospital of the city of Bern while preparing himself for an academical career. In the beginning, he kept aloof from the Pietists, then spreading rapidly in the canton of Bern; but later on he changed his mind, and became one of their principal leaders. Accused before the Grand Council, he defended his chiliastic and pietistic views with great vigor, but was, nevertheless, banished from the country, 1699. For several years he went from place to place, until, in 1711, he was appointed court-preacher to the court of Isenburg. In 1730 he was allowed to return to Bern; and a chair in Oriental languages and mathematics was established for him in the university. That activity, however, did not satisfy him, and he continued to labor for the cause of Pietism, preaching and holding meetings to his death, May 31, 1750. Among his numerous works are Theologia mystica (Bern, 1736), Etymologicon helleno-hebraicum (Frankfurt, 1722), an attempt to derive the Greek language from Shemitic roots, a prophecy about the fall of the Turkish Empire, etc. See TRECISEL: König und d. Pietismus in Bern, in Berner Taschenbuch, 1852.

TRECISEL.

KONRAD OF MARBURG, one of the most notorious names in German church history; was b. at Marburg in the second half of the twelfth century; and killed there July 30, 1233. Of his personal life very little is known. It is doubtful whether he ever studied in any university, though he bore the title of magister, and it cannot be ascertained whether he was a secular priest, or belonged to one of the religious orders. When he first appeared in history, at the court of landgrave Ludwig IV. of Thuringia and Hesse, during the reign of Pope Honorius III., he was highly praised for his zeal and disinterestedness. But during the latter part of his life, after the death of Ludwig IV. and Honorius III., when the widowed landgravine Elizabeth made him her spiritual guardian, and Gregory IX. appointed him inquisitor-general of Germany, his virtues, if ever he had any, turned into so many vices. The treatment to which he subjected the landgravine, in order to produce a saint, is utterly disgusting and revolting. He succeeded, however. She died in 1231, twenty-four years old, and was canonized in 1235. Equally revolting, and utterly detestable, were the methods he employed as inquisitor-general, — espionage and denunciations, no procedure and no appeal, immediate execution by the aid of the secular power, or by his own tools, generally chosen among robbers and incendiaries. None escaped him, neither priest nor knight, neither bishop nor king. On July 25, 1233, King Henry convened a great assembly of princes and bishops at Mayence; and the assembly insisted upon the organization of a regular procedure. Konrad refused, and the bishops addressed themselves to the Pope. On his return to Marburg, Konrad was killed; and the Pope fulminated. But so great was the hatred which Konrad had produced, that at the diet of Francfort, in February, 1234, none dared to take up his cause or that of the Pope; and though heavy penances were imposed upon his murderers, and his remains were buried beside those of St. Elizabeth, the papal inquisition was not re-established in Germany any more. The punishment of heretics was again laid under the jurisdiction of the bishops. See ELIZABETH, ST., and INQUISITION.

KOOLHAAS, Kaspar, b. at Cologne, 1536; d. at Leyden, 1615. He studied at Düsseldorf, but embraced the Reformation in 1566, and was in 1574 made professor of theology at Leyden; from which position, however, he afterwards retired. His De jure Christiani magistratus circa disciplinam et regimen ecclesie gave great offence; and the synod of Mittelburg (1581) demanded that he should retract, and subscribe to the Belgian Confession. When he refused, and appealed to the states-general, the provincial synod of Holland excommunicated him, 1582; but the magistrate of Leyden supported him, and he lived undisturbed in the city as a private teacher. He held with respect to church government, predestination, etc., nearly the same views as afterwards Arminius.

KOPPE, Johann Benjamin, b. at Dantzig, Aug. 19, 1750; d. at Hanover, Feb. 12, 1791. He studied theology and philology at Leipzig and Göttingen, and was appointed professor of theology at Göttingen in 1776, superintendent-general of Gotha in 1784, and court-preacher at Hanover in 1788. As a pupil of Ernesti and Heyne, and transferring their grammatico-historical principle to the exegesis of the New Testament, he began the publication of his Novum Testamentum Gr. perpet. annotat. illustr. in 1778, but he finished only the Epistles to the Galatians, Thessalonians, and Ephesians. The work was continued by Tychsen, Ammon, Heinrichs, and Pott.

KORAH, a son of Izhar (Exod. vi. 18, 21, 24), and leader of the rebellion against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi. xxvi. 9, xxvii. 3). See MOSES. Jude (11) couples Korah with Cain and Balaam in his warnings against false and self-seeking teachers.

KORAHITES, sons, i.e., descendants, of Korah; part of the Kohathite family of the priests, the descendants of Kohath, a son of Levi (Exod. vi. 16, 18, 21). Some of them were noted singers (2 Chron. xx. 19). Eleven of the psalms (xl., xlv.–xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.) are headed, "For the sons of Korah;" so that probably the "sons of Korah" became, in course of time, a descriptive term for the temple-singers. Others of the Korahites were door-keepers (1 Chron. ix. 17–19); while one, Mattithiah, "had the set office over the things that were made in the pans" (ix. 31), i.e., the minchah, or meat-offering of the temple, offered daily in the morning and evening (cf. Lev. ii. 5, 6, vi. 14).

KORNTHAL, a religious community in Würtemberg, seven miles from Stuttgart, was founded by, and became the rallying-point of, Würtemberg Pietists in the early part of this century. The Pietism of Würtemberg, which had among its principal advocates J. A. Bengel (d. 1752) and Oetinger (d. 1782), developed, and was in turn affected by, the original and energetic mind of a peasant, Michael Hahn. The latter had a following [of at least fifteen thousand people]; and when, in 1810, the government determined to introduce a new hymn-book and a rationalizing liturgy into the churches, in spite of the opposition of the Pietists, many of them emigrated to Southern Russia. Soon after his accession, King Wilhelm sought to stem the tide of emigration, and in 1818 called upon Gottlieb Wilhelm Hoffmann, the mayor of Leonberg, to draw up a plan of pietistic communities such as Hoffmann himself, a year before, had proposed, in a document addressed to his Majesty. The king fell in with the general idea, and on Sept. 8, 1818, published an edict granting toleration to a colony such as was proposed. The following year a number of families, taking advantage of the edict, purchased the Görtitz estate of Kornthal (a thousand acres for a hundred and thirteen thousand gulden, or fifty thousand dollars); and on Nov. 7, 1819, the church was dedicated. Michael Hahn was chosen as the first president (Vorsteher), but died a few days after his election, and was succeeded by Hoffmann, who, after a very successful administration, died in 1846. It soon called a pastor, Friedrich von Winzerhausen, who was succeeded in 1833 by Dr. v. Kapff, who subsequently became one of the most eminent preachers of the land, and pastor of the Stiftskirche in Stuttgart. He was succeeded by Pfarrer Staudt, who is still active. The colony sought to realize the ideal of a corporation of Christians; and Hoffmann, who was largely influenced by the institutions of the Moravians, determined to make it also a model of agricultural and mechanical thrift and educational institutions. It did not become schismatic, but adopted the Augsburg Confession, with only a few omissions. However, it was stipulated, in the royal act of incorporation, that it should be independent of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Würtemberg, and enjoy the absolute right to manage its own church-matters. It also secured the power to banish any person from the community, the corporation purchasing back his tract of land. The original statutes also extend the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the corporation to matters of dress, food, etc. Chiliastic views were very prevalent in the community, and the second coming was expected to occur in 1836. After that date, the town assumed a more permanent aspect. In 1824, at the request of the king, Kornthal founded an offshoot in Northern Würtemberg, Wilhelmsdorf, which enjoyed the same privileges as the mother, but was not so successful, and in 1852 voluntarily resigned its charter.

The community has served its purpose well, and stands forth as a model corporation. There are no lawsuits, no children born out of wedlock, no drinking-bouts, no intemperance, no blasphemers, [Church-attendance is universal, and the two services on the sabbath are always crowded. The church then presents a singularly interesting appearance. The pastor sits in the centre of the bench, behind the pulpit, with the elders of the town on each side of him. The little children all sit on the steps of the pulpit-platform, facing the congregation.—the young women on the right of the pulpit, and the young men on the left. Each, from the smallest child up to the young men, has a paper and pencil in hand, with which they make notes of the sermon, and on which they are examined during the week by the pastor. The young people are obligated to attend the services; and, after the sermon, the pastor passes down on one side, and the chief magistrate on the other, and call out the roll of the young men and women. Absences must be accounted for during the week. A beautiful Easter custom is in vogue among the Kornthalers, by which they meet at six o'clock in the graveyard, and, after music from trumpets, sing a hymn, and engage in prayer. Nothing to jar the repose of the community occurs. Even petty crimes are unknown, and the whole atmosphere is freighted with the calm of a serious and devout religiousness. There is only one inn in the place; and that is patronized but very seldom by the people, who constitute one of the ideal temperance societies in the world. The contrast which Kornthal presents to the neighboring communities is very marked, both in point of piety and intelligence of the people and their general thrift and diligence. The town has been celebrated for its schools; and a number of English and American boys have received their German education in the Knaben-Institut, until recently presided over by Professor Pfeleiderer. Kornthal is prettily located in the midst of vineyards and richly cultivated fields, and has a population of about nine hundred.] For further information see *Hoffmännische Tropfen g. d. KORTHOLT, Christian, b. at Borg, in the Island of Femern, Jan. 15, 1632; d. at Kiel, March 31, 1694. He studied at Rostock, Jena, Leipzig, and Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of Greek at Rostock in 1662, and professor of theology at Kiel in 1666. His great reputation as a church historian he owes, not so much to his Hist. Eccl., Leipzig, 1697, as to his monographs, — De persecutionibus eccl. prim., Jena, 1660; Paganus obtrector, Kiel, 1598; Disquisitiones Anti-Baronice, Kiel, 1700; De canone (against Bellarmine), Rostock, 1665, etc. HAGENBACH.

KRAFFT, Johann Christian Gottlob Ludwig, b. at Duisburg, Dec. 12, 1784; d. at Erlangen, May 15, 1845. He studied theology at Duisburg, and was for several years a private tutor in Franckfort-on-the-Main. In 1808 he became pastor of the Reformed congregation at Weeze, near Cleve; and in 1817 he was appointed pastor of the Reformed congregation at Erlangen, and, in the following year, professor of theology in the university. His works consist of several collections of sermons, an essay, De sermo et libero arbitrio (Nuremberg, 1818), and Chronologie und Harmonie der vier Evangelien, edited, after his death by Dr. Burger, Erlangen, 1848. The great influence, however, which he exercised, was due less to his writings than to his lectures, and, again, less to his teaching than to his person. He was "a truly apostolical character;" his very appearance, "a silent sermon on the strength of God within him." He imparted new life to the Protestant Church in Bavaria, which had sunk into insipid rationalism; and, long before the name of "inner missions" ever was heard of, he performed the work far and wide. He was the first German professor who delivered a course of lectures on the history of missions. See THOMAS: D. Widerewach. d. evang. Lebens in d. Luth. Kirche Bayerns, Erlangen, 1867. K. GOEBEL.

KRALIZ, a castle in Moravia, celebrated as the place where the first Bohemian translation of the Bible was made from the original text, the preceding ones having been made from the Vulgate. This translation (the Bible of Kraliz) was issued in six volumes in folio, 1579-93, and is still reprinted by foreign Bible societies. But specimens of the original work are very scarce; as, during the counter-reformation in Bohemia, the Jesuits destroyed every copy they could lay their hands on.

KRANTZ, Albert, b. at Hamburg about 1445; d. there Dec. 7, 1517. He studied theology, philosophy, and history at Rostock and Cologne; travelled in Germany and Italy; lectured on philosophy and canon law in the university of Rostock, whose rector he was in 1482; and settled in 1489 in his native city, first as lector primarius theologie at the cathedral, then as dean of the chapter. He was often employed by the magistrate of Hamburg in diplomatical negotiations, and in 1500 he was chosen arbitrator between King Hans of Denmark and Duke Frederick of Holstein. During his lifetime he published several theological works, — Ordo missalis secundum ritum ecclesie Hamburgensis (Strassburg, 1509), and Spirantissimum opusculum in officium misse (edited, after his lectures, by Bertold Moller, 1506); but his literary fame he owes to his historical works, — Vandalia (1519), Saxonia (1520), Dania (1546), and Metropolis (1548), published after his death, and containing many precious materials to the church history of his time. When, on his death-bed, he read the theses of Luther, he exclaimed, "Alas! my good brother, you had better go back to your cell, and sing a miserere. The thing is too big. It cannot be done." Clement VIII. put his historical works on the Index. See Leben d. Albert Krantz, Hamburg, 1722, 2d ed., 1729; JOHANNES MOLLER: Cimbria Literata, iii. pp. 376-391. CARL BERTHEAU.

KRASINSKI, Count Valerian, b. about 1780; d. Dec. 22, 1855. A Protestant by faith, he held a position in the department of public instruction when the insurrection of 1830 took place in Warsaw, and was, by the provisory government, sent to England as a member of its embassy to St. James. The speedy suppression of the rebellion prevented him from ever returning home. He remained in England, residing, first in London, and afterwards in Edinburgh, and occupying himself with literary pursuits. He wrote, among other works, The Rise, Progress, and Decline of the Reformation in Poland (London, 1838-1840, 2 vols.), and Lectures on the Religious History of the Slavonian Nations (Edinburgh, 1851).

KRAUTH, Charles Philip, D.D., American Lutheran divine; b. in Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, May 7, 1797; d. in Gettysburg, May 30, 1867; entered the ministry 1819; was called to Philadelphia 1827, and elected professor of biblical and Oriental literature in the theological seminary at Gettysburg 1833, and president of Pennsylvania College, in the same place, the next year; discharged the duties of these two positions simultaneously until 1850, when he gave up the presidency. He edited the Evangelical Quarterly Review from 1850 to 1861.

KREBS, John Michael, D.D., Presbyterian; b. at Hagerstown, Md., May 6, 1804; d. in New-York City, Sept. 30, 1867. He was graduated at Dickinson College 1827, and at Princeton Theological Seminary 1830, from which year till his death he was pastor of the Rutgers-street Presbyterian Church, New-York City. From 1837 to 1845 he was permanent clerk of the General Assembly (O. S.), and in 1845 moderator. He was a director of the Princeton Theological Seminary from 1842, and president of the board in 1866, also an original member, and for some time president, of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church.

KRELL, or CRELL, Nikolaus, b. at Leipzig in the middle of the sixteenth century, between 1550 and 1553; beheaded at Dresden, Oct. 9, 1601. He was educated at Grimma, studied jurisprudence at Leipzig, entered the civil service in 1580, and was in 1589 made chancellor by the young elector, Christian I. Saxony was at that moment strictly Lutheran. The attempt of the professors of Wittenberg to smuggle into the country the Calvinistic Philippism (as it was called, after Philip Melancthon), under the covering of genuine Lutheranism, was successfully baffled in 1574; and all who had supported it—such as the chancellor Cracau, the body-physician Peucer, the court-preacher Schutz, and the superintendent Stössel—were discharged and imprisoned. Krell, however, who, on his travels in France and Switzerland, had often enjoyed the intercourse of Beza, was much in favor of the so-called Crypto-Calvinism; and, as soon as he came into power, he began to prepare the way for it. Subscription to the Formula Concordiæ was not demanded any more. The preachers were requested to abstain from all polemics in the pulpit. The superintendent Selnecker of Leipzig, an intractable champion of Lutheranism, was replaced by the Calvinistic Wolfgang Harder. The court-preachers Salmuth and Steinbach were busy in writing and speaking for Calvinism; the former publishing a new edition of the German Bible, with Calvinistic notes on the margin, the so-called "Krell's Bible;" the latter drawing up a new catechism of the same character. The supreme consistory at Dresden was abolished, and a severe censorship of theological books was established. Finally, July 4, 1591, the exorcism was erased from the baptismal formula, but thereby the popular conscience was touched; and a citizen of Dresden, a butcher, met at the baptismal font, and demanded, with the axe raised over against the neck of the minister, to have his child baptized with exorcism. The chancellor's religious predilections also made themselves felt in his foreign policy. He supported the Huguenots in France, but the campaign was disastrous; and when, in the summer of 1591, the troops returned, he had no money to pay them. At that moment the elector died (Sept. 25, 1591); and the unhappy chancellor was immediately dismissed by Duke Friedrich Wilhelm of Saxe-Altenburg, guardian of the infant heir, and imprisoned in the Königstein. A process was instituted against him, which lasted for ten years, but which has no religious interest. Many of its details are very obscure. It ended with his condemnation; and, long before that time, every vestige of his propaganda for Crypto-Calvinism had been completely obliterated. See RICHARD: Dr. Nicholas Krell, Dresden, 1859, 2 vols.; ROBERT CALINICH: Zwei sächs. Kanzler, Chemnitz, 1868. OSWALD SCHMIDT.

KRÜDENER, Barbara Juliane, Baroness von, b. at Riga, Nov. 21, 1764; d. at Karasu-Bazar, Dec. 25, 1824. A daughter of a Russian statesman (Von Wietinghoff), she was married to another Russian statesman (Von Krüdener) when she was fourteen years old. The marriage proved unhappy, and in 1792 she separated from her husband. She settled in Paris, and led a very frivolous life, which she has described in a novel, Valerie. An accident, the sudden death of one of her lovers, converted her. She became religious. She was no doubt sincere, but an enthusiast without self-control. In 1815 she became acquainted with the Emperor, Alexander I., and their intercourse in Paris was very intimate. She exercised great influence on him. She gave the Holy Alliance its name. During the two years of famine, 1816-17, she was a great support to many poor people in Switzerland and Southern Germany. But even her charity showed so peculiar and so eccentric a character, that it gave offence, and in 1818 she was actually transported home to Russia by the police. Meanwhile the friendship of Alexander I. had grown rather cold; and, when she openly denounced his lukewarmness in the affairs of Greece, he ordered her to leave St. Petersburg. She was on her way to the Crimea, with the Princess Gallitzin and a number of German colonists, when she died. See CH. EYNARD: Vie de Mme. de Krüdener, Paris, 1849, 2 vols.; STERNBERG: Leben d. Frau von Krüdener, Leipzig, 1856; M. ZIETHE: Juliane von Krüdener, New York, 1867. See also SAINTE-BEUVE: Portraits de femmes and Derniers Portraits.

KRUC, Wilhelm Traugott, b. at Radis, near Wittenberg, June 22, 1770; d. at Leipzig, Jan. 13, 1842. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed professor of philosophy there in 1794, at Francfort-on-the-Oder in 1801, at Königsberg in 1805, and at Leipzig in 1809. He was a very prolific writer on philosophy and theology. His principal theological works are Ueber d. Perfectibilität d. geoffenbarten Religion, Leipzig, 1795; Pisteologie oder Glaube, Aberglaube, u. Unglaube, Leipzig, 1825; Rationalismus und Supranaturalismus, Leipzig, 1826. See Meine Lebensreise in sechs Stationen, an autobiography.

KRUMMACHER, Friedrich Adolf, the eldest of a celebrated group of Reformed pastors of this name; b. at Tecklenburg, July 13, 1767; d. in Bremen, April 4, 1815. After studying theology at Halle, he taught school until 1800, when he was called, as professor of theology and rhetoric, to the seminary at Berg, whose star had already begun to descend to its setting. While here, he published, in 1805, his Parabeln (Parables), 8th ed., 1848,—a work which won for him a permanent place in German literature [English translation, London, 1844 and often]. In 1807 he exchanged his professorial chair for the pulpit of Kettwig, and in 1812 accepted a call to Bernburg as general superintendent and pastor. During these years he was a fertile writer; and some of his books for children, especially his catechisms, Bibelkatechismus (1810, 12th ed., 1843), had a wide circulation. In 1820 he refused a call to the university of Bonn, but in 1824 went to Bremen as the pastor of the Ansgar Church. Although he could not compete with his colleague Dräseke in the pulpit, he was highly esteemed as a Christian counsellor, and was revered by a large circle as a father (Väterchen). Krummacher was also a poet, and wrote some good hymns. See A. W. MÖLLER: F. A. Krummacher u. s. Freunde., Bremen, 1849, 2 vols.

H. MALLET.

KRUMMACHER, Friedrich Wilhelm, a son of the former; one of the most eloquent and influential preachers of Germany in this century; was b. Jan. 28, 1796, at Mörs on the Rhine, the birth-place of the fervid German hymn-writer, Terstegen; d. Dec. 10, 1868, at Potsdam. He studied at the university of Halle from 1815 to 1817 (where he heard the lectures of the extreme rationalist, Wegscheider, and the modest but devout Knapp), and at Jena. In 1819 he became the assistant pastor of the Reformed congregation at Frankfurt, where he remained till 1823, when he accepted a call from the village of Ruhrort. Two years subsequently, in 1825, he removed to Barmen in the Wupperthal. It was here, at a weekday evening service, that he delivered his lectures on Elijah and Elisha. Crowded congregations listened to them, large numbers coming from the neighboring city of Elberfeld. In 1834 he was called for the second time to Elberfeld, and accepted. During his residence in this city, he received a delegation from the synod of Pennsylvania, of the German Reformed Church, consisting of Dr. Hoffeditz and the Rev. Dr. Schneck, extending to him a call to a chair in the theological seminary at Mercersburg. He finally decided to decline the position, but directed the attention of the delegation to Dr. Schaff, then a privat docent at Berlin, who accepted the call (in 1844).

Krummacher exerted a wide and beneficent influence upon Elberfeld and the Wupperthal, and his affections became deeply rooted in its soil; and in 1847 he followed with reluctance a call, as Marheinecke's successor, at the Trinity Church, Berlin, to which position he had been appointed by King Frederick William IV. He continued to labor there, entering heartily into the religious circles of the city, and preaching the gospel of repentance and faith, undaunted by the wide diffusion of rationalism, until 1853, when he was appointed court-chaplain at Potsdam. He sustained a relation of great intimacy with the king. Dr. Krummacher took a lively interest in the Evangelical Alliance; was present at the conference in London, 1851, and at every succeeding conference, till his death. From the conference of Paris he wrote, "I became in Paris young again as an eagle. . . . It was the kingdom of God in blessed concentration." He was one of the most earnest promoters of the conference in Berlin, 1857. In 1862 he accepted the invitation of Queen Victoria, as one of the ministers to preach in their own language at the London Exposition.

Dr. Krummacher was a fervid and bold preacher of the gospel, and takes his place among the most faithful and powerful witnesses of the truth from the pulpit of his day in Germany. He was on intimate terms with the Hofackers and Albert

Knapp, the fervent evangelical preachers of Southern Germany, as well as with the pious men in the pulpits and at the universities of Northern Germany; had a broad interest in the cause of evangelical religion in other lands; and numbered among his friends Adolphe Monod and others of the best spirits of France and Great Britain. Dr. Schaff, in a letter to The New-York Observer (Feb. 4, 1869), says, "Krummacher was endowed with every gift that constitutes an orator, — a most fertile and brilliant imagination, a vigorous and original mind, a glowing heart, an extraordinary facility and felicity of diction, perfect familiarity with the Scriptures, an athletic and commanding presence, and a powerful and melodious voice, which, however, in latter years, underwent a great change, and sounded like the rolling of the distant thunder. . . . He will always shine as one of the brightest stars in the galaxy of those great and good men, who, in the present century, have fought the good fight of the evangelical faith against prevailing rationalism and infidelity, and have entitled themselves to the gratitude of the present and future generations." Thorwaldsen, the great sculptor, meeting Krummacher in Frankfurt at the seventieth anniversary of Goethe's birth, was attracted by his noble forehead and appearance, and asked, "Are you an artist?" — "No, a theologian," was the reply. To which the sculptor answered, "How can one be only a theologian!"

Krummacher is better known in England and America than any other German preacher: in fact, is the only one who is well known. He published a number of volumes of sermons, some of which have been translated into the English, and widely read. Of these volumes the principal are, Salomo und Sulamith, 1827, 9th ed., 1875; Elijah the Tishbite ("itself baptized with the fire of Elijah," as Heubner characterized this work), Elberfeld, 1828, 6th ed., 1874 (English translation, London and New York, 1838, and many editions); The Prophet Elisha, Elberfeld, 1835 (English translation, London); Das Passionsbuch, der leidende Christus, Bielefeld, 1851, 3d ed., 1878 (English translation, The Suffering Saviour, Edinburgh and Boston, 1870); David, the King of Israel, Berlin, 1867 (English translation, Edinburgh and New York, 1870). See Autobiography edited by his daughter (English translation by M. G. Easton, 2d ed., Edinburgh, 1871), and art. in Herzog by Rud. Kögel.

KRUMMACHER, Gottfried Daniel, a younger brother of Friedrich Adolf; b. in Tecklenburg, April 1, 1774; d., as pastor of the Reformed Church, in Elberfeld, Jan. 30, 1837. After studying theology at Duisburg, he was successively pastor in Baerl (1798), Wülfrath (1801), and Elberfeld (1816). He was a man of some eccentricities, but a strong and robust Christian character and preacher. He was a most zealous champion of the theology of the synod of Dort. His removal to Elberfeld occurred at a time of the universal awakening of religious thought in Germany, and aroused new life in his congregation. He drew the extreme conclusions from the doctrine of predestination; and some of his ardent followers disturbed the meetings of other Christians by loud laughing, and other demonstrations of ridicule or dissent. Krummacher for a while upheld this course of his followers, but gradually retreated from this position. However, under his influence, a strong predestinarian party was formed in Elberfeld and the Wupperthal. He was strongly opposed to the efforts at church union, and in this was out of sympathy with the spirit of the Reformed Church. Among his printed volumes of sermons the most celebrated is a volume about the names of the camping-places of the Israelites in the desert: D. Wanderungen Israels durch d. Wüste nach Kanaan, 1834.

KUINÖL (KÜHNÖL), Christian, one of the most widely learned of the rationalistic supernatural school of the closing part of the eighteenth century; b. at Leipzig, Jan. 2, 1768; d. at Giessen, Oct. 23, 1841. He studied theology and philology in his native city, and was appointed professor of philosophy there in 1790, and professor of theology at Giessen in 1799. His Commentaries on the Old Testament, Hosea, the Psalms, etc., are now antiquated; but his Commentarius in libros Novi Testamenti historicos (Leipzig, 1807-18, 4 vols.) is, in spite of the somewhat dry and pedantic method, still a valuable work. [It was reprinted, along with the Greek text, in London, 1835, 3 vols.] ZÖCKLER.

KUNZE, John Christopher, D.D., one of the most learned among Lutheran theologians of this country; b. at Artern, Prussian Saxony, Aug. 4, 1744; d. at New York, July 24, 1807. Having finished his education as a student of theology at Leipzig, he was for three years employed as teacher of the higher branches in the reputed school at Closter-Bergen, near Magdeburg, and for one year as inspector of the Orphans-Home at Graiz, when, through the Rev. Dr. J. G. Kuapp, superintendent of the Francke Institution at Halle, a call came to him from the Lutheran St. Michael's and Zion's congregations at Philadelphia, Penn. Setting sail for the New World, June 29, 1770, he entered his office as the third collegiate pastor of that congregation, Sept. 27 of the same year, and married, July 23, 1771, Margaret Henrietta, daughter of Rev. H. M. Mühlenberg, D.D., rector of the congregation, patriarch of the Lutheran Church in this country, whose successor in the office of rector he became A.D. 1779. Conscientious in the performance of his pastoral duties, he had an eye to the wants of the Church at large, opened a theological seminary, which the War of Independence brought to an untimely end, influenced the board of trustees of the College (before 1755 Academy, since 1779 University of Pennsylvania) in behalf of the special interests of the German language and students, and took a lively interest in the German Benevolent Society. A.D. 1781 he followed a call to the Lutheran congregation at New York, assisted in establishing the New-York University, served as one of the regents, and as professor of Oriental languages and literature. He belonged to the later Pietists, leaning to the so-called Supernaturalistic School. He was of very studious habits, and continually gathering solid information, whereof his diaries give ample evidence. He excelled in Arabic and Hebrew and in higher mathematics. He published A Table of a new construction for calculating the great Eclipse, expected to happen on the 16 of June, 1806; also a Hymn and Prayer Book for the use of such Lutheran Churches as use the English language, probably the first Lutheran English hymn-book ever edited. He also published historical essays, sermons, occasional addresses, etc.

KURTZ, a family of American Lutheran ministers. — John Nicholas, D.D., b. at Lutzelinden, Nassau, Germany, about 1720; d. at Baltimore, Md., 1794. He was the first Lutheran minister ordained in the British colonies of America; labored from 1745 to 1790 as a missionary in Pennsylvania, often at the risk of his life. — John Daniel, D.D., son of the preceding; b. at Germantown, Penn. 1763; d. at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 29, 1865. He was pastor of the principal Lutheran Church of Baltimore (1786-1832), and one of the founders of the general synod of the Lutheran Church. — Benjamin, D.D., LL.D., nephew of J. D. Kurtz; b. at Harrisburg, Penn., Feb. 28, 1795; d. at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 29, 1865. He edited the Lutheran Observer from 1833 to 1862; was one of the founders of the Gettysburg Theological Seminary (for which he collected funds and books in Germany), and in every way prominent in his denomination.

KYRIE ELEYSON. The prayer which in the Septuagint reads ἐλέησον με, ὁ Θεός, "God, have mercy upon me!" (Ps. li.), or, ἐλέησον ἡμῶς κυριε, "Lord, have mercy upon us!" (Ps. exxiii.), and which in the New Testament (Matt. ix. 27, xv. 22, xx. 30; Mark x. 47) always is addressed to Jesus, the Son of David, very early became a fixed formula in the common church-prayer of the Greek Church. The Constit. Apost. (viii. 6) prescribes that the laity, especially the children, shall respond with a kyrie eleyson to each single prayer of the litany recited by the deacon. At the time of Basil the Great the custom was generally adopted throughout the Greek Church, and it is still customary in all Oriental churches, to repeat the kyrie eleyson over and over again, the choir singing it in Latin, the laity in the vernacular tongue. In the Roman Church, Pope Sylvester I. (314-335), is said to have first introduced the use of the Greek words. At the time of Felix V., when the council was held at Vaison (in 529), they were generally used throughout the Western Church. A Christe eleyson was added, and the triple exclamation, Kyrie-christe, Kyrie eleyson, was given in reference to the Holy Trinity. In 910 Pope Sergius ordered in his will, that, in those churches to which he had given donations, the priests should every day sing one hundred kyries and one hundred Christe eleysons. In the later middle ages, great pains were taken to expand the kyrie. In his Christliche Cultus, 2d ed., p. 493, Alt quotes, from a Roman missale of 1631, such an expanded kyrie, destined for the great festivals. After the Reformation, the kyrie eleyson was retained in many Protestant churches. H. MERZ.

LABADIE, Jean de, b. Feb. 13, 1610, at Bourg, near Bordeaux; d. Feb. 13, 1674, at Altona. He was educated in the Jesuit college at Bordeaux; studied theology and philosophy, the Bible and the mystics, especially Augustine and St. Bernard; entered the order, but left it again in 1639, and began his practical career as a popular preacher in Bordeaux, Paris, and Amiens, where he was made a canon, and teacher of theology, in 1640. He made a deep impression by his preaching; but his passionate demands of reform, his sermons on freewill and predestination, on grace and good works, and his administration of the Lord's Supper in both forms, roused the hatred and persecutions of the Jesuits. Richelieu, however, protected him; but under Mazarin he was expelled from Amiens, and retired to the Carmelite hermitage at Gravelle. While there, he read Calvin's Institutiones; and in 1650 — what has been told of his joining the Brethren of the Oratory, and afterwards the Jansenists, is unhistorical — he embraced the Reformed faith, and was appointed preacher, and professor of theology, at Moutauban. He carried, however, his vivid reformatory instincts with him from the old into the new church; and though as pastor in Geneva, and afterwards at Middleburg, he contributed very much to the spiritual purification and moral elevation of the Reformed congregations, a separatistic tendency became more and more apparent in his activity. Like all separatists, he dreamed of forming a congregation of saints. In 1666, when moving from Geneva to Middelburg, he formed a secret union with Pierre Yvon, Pierre Dulignon, and François Menuret, which was separatistic in its very character, and became the nucleus of the later Labadist sect. In Middelburg he refused to subscribe to the Belgian Confession, and recognize the authority of the synod. He was suspended from his office in 1668, and shortly after expelled from the city. On the invitation of the countess-palatine, Elizabeth, he settled at Herford with his followers, who already formed a completely organized body, separate from Church, with doctrines and a disciplinary system of their own, practising community of property, etc. At Herford a peculiar outburst of enthusiasm took place in the congregation; and, in spite of the intercession of Maurice of Orange and the elector of Brandenburg, the alarmed magistrate banished them from the city 1672. They removed to Altona, where they lived in peace for some time, and where Labadie died. Of his writings, many of which were translated into German, and much read among the Pietists and the Moravian Brethren, the principal are, La Prophétie (1668), Manuel de piété (1669), Protestation de bonne foi et saine doctrine (1670), Brève déclaration de nos sentiments touchant l'Église (1670).

Shortly after the death of their leader (1674) the war between Denmark and Sweden induced the Labadists to leave Altona. They settled at Wiewert in West Friesland; and while there they achieved their greatest success, in spite of the ill-will and chicaneries of the Frisian clergy. Their number increased from a hundred and fifty to about four hundred between 1675 and 1690. In 1680 they received an invitation from Cornelis van Sommelsdyk, the governor of Surinam, to found a colony in his dominions. The invitation was accepted with great enthusiasm. But in 1688 the governor was assassinated; and the colony, which had already been founded, soon died out. A similar attempt at New Bohemia, on the Hudson River, New-York State, U. S. A., also failed. It was, however, not so much these misfortunes, as internal difficulties arising from the abolition of community of property, which brought the sect to fall into decay. In 1703 only about thirty persons remained at Wiewert under the rigid discipline of Yvon.

LABARUM (probably from the Basque, labarva, "a standard") is the name given to Constantine's modification of the ordinary cavalry standard (vexillum). The latter was a square piece of cloth stretched on top by a cross-bar, and suspended from a gilt spear surmounted by an eagle of victory. Before his victorious battle with Maxentius (312), in consequence of his vision of the cross, Constantine adopted the vexillum as the standard for the entire army; and he attributed his success to the fact that the battle was fought under this sign. In place of the eagle he put the monogram of Christ (see CHRIST, MONOGRAM OF), and on the banner, Christian emblems. He also appointed fifty of the "stoutest and most religious" of his soldiers to carry it by turns, and together constitute its special guard. It was a very happy inspiration on Constantine's part to take as the imperial ensign the labarum, — whose cruciform framework the Christians already regarded as emblematic of the cross of Christ, and which at the same time was greatly revered in its Pagan form by the soldiery, — and transform it into a religious symbol, "the saving sign of the Roman Empire;" for by this means he united enthusiastically the Christian and the Pagan elements in his army. Constantine's successors, except, of course, Julian, likewise adopted the labarum as their ensign. The word "labarum" was subsequently applied to the monogram, and even to the cross by itself. It is interesting to know that neither the word nor the thing dates from Constantine. See SMITH and CHEETHAM, Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, s. v.

LABAT, Jean Baptiste, a French Dominican missionary and historian; b. in Paris 1663; d. there Jan. 6, 1738. He passed ten years in the West Indies, and wrote the valuable work, Nouveau voyage aux îles de l'Amérique, Paris, 1722, 6 vols.

LABBÉ, Philippe, b. at Bourges, July 10, 1607; entered the Jesuit order 1623; was for some time a teacher of philosophy and theology, but devoted the latter part of his life exclusively to literature, and d. in Paris, March 25, 1667. He wrote seventy-five different works, and is consequently the great boast of his order. The greatest and most valuable of his productions is his Concilia (Paris, 1672, 18 vols.), of which, however, only the eight first were edited by him, the rest, after his death, by Cossart. The work was reprinted at Venice, in 1728, by Nic. Colletti.

LA CHAISE, François de, b. in the castle of Aix, in the province of Forez, Aug. 25, 1624; d. at Versailles, Jan. 20, 1705. As a younger son of a noble family, he entered the order of the Jesuits; taught philosophy and theology with great success at Lyons and Grenoble; and was in 1673 appointed confessor to Louis XIV., in which position he exercised a great influence on all the affairs of the French Church.—the revocation of the Edict of Nantes and the dragonades, the controversy between Bossuet and Fénelon, the difficulties between the Pope and the king, etc. A man of polite manners and easy morals, cunning and patient, he managed the conscience of the king just as the king wished to have it managed, and was rewarded with great donations to himself, and great privileges to his order. The ground near Paris which was given to him by the king, and on which he built his sumptuous villa, was afterwards transformed into a cemetery, which still bears his name, Père La Chaise. See R. DE CHANTELAUZE: Le Père de La Chaise, Lyons, 1859.

LACHISH (invincible), a Canaanitish city, was conquered by Joshua, and allotted to Judah. Jeroboam fortified it, and made it a place of great strength (2 Chron. xi. 9). On his way to Egypt, Sennacherib besieged it (2 Kings xviii. 13; Isa. xxxvi. 1); and a slab found in one of the chambers of the palace of Kouyunjik has been explained by Layard as representing Sennacherib laying siege to Lachish (comp. 2 Chron. xxxii. 1; 2 Kings xix. 8; Jer. xxxiv. 7).

LACHMANN, Karl, b. at Brunswick, March 4, 1793; d. in Berlin, March 13, 1851. He studied at Leipzig and Göttingen, and was professor of philology, first at Königsberg (1816), and afterwards in Berlin (1827). The restoration of old texts was the special object of his studies; and his editions of Lucretius, Propertius, and other classics, are celebrated. His editions of the Greek text of the New Testament (1831, 2d ed., 1812-1850, 2 vols.) show the experience and the principles of a master of classical criticism. His object was purely historical or diplomatic; namely to restore the oldest attainable text, the text of the fourth century, and that not as a final text, but simply as a sure historical basis for further operations of internal criticism. See his Life by HERTZ, Berlin, 1851; SCHAFF'S Companion to the Greek Testament, pp. 253-256, and art. BIBLE-TEXT, p. 274.

LACORDAIRE, Jean Baptiste Henri, b. at Recey-sur-Orce, in the department of Côte d'Or, March 12, 1802; d. at Sorreze, in the department of Tarn, Nov. 21, 1861. He studied law at Dijon and Paris, and began to practise as an advocate in the latter city. But roused by Lamennais' Essai sur l'Indifférence, and rapidly arriving at the conviction that Christianity (or, more precisely, the Roman-Catholic Church) is necessary for the social development of the human race, he entered the ecclesiastical seminary of St. Sulpice in 1821, and was ordained a priest in 1827. Together with Lamennais and Montalembert, he placed himself at the head of the peculiar movement, which, under the device "God and liberty," demanded a close union between ultramontaniam and radicalism, hierarchy and democracy, papal infallibility and universal suffrage. But the school which they opened in Paris, immediately after the outbreak of the revolution of 1830, in defiance of the privilege of the State university, was soon after closed by the police; and in 1831 their paper, L'Avenir, was condemned by the Pope. Lacordaire went to Rome, and submitted unconditionally. On his return from Rome, he opened a course of lectures (conférences) in defence of the doctrinal system of the Church of Rome, and these lectures produced an enormous sensation. In 1835 he was appointed preacher at the Cathedral of Notre Dame; and, whenever he preached, the vast building was filled to the utmost of its capacity. He was generally acknowledged as the most eloquent man who had ever been heard in a French pulpit. In 1838 he again visited Rome; and, after a novitiate, he entered the Dominican order, April 6, 1840. The revival of this order in France then became one of his great objects, but his success was small. As a preacher, however, he continued to command the widest popularity. In 1848 he was elected a member of the National Assembly, and took his seat among the radicals; but having, in a speech, declared himself a Republican, he received a rebuke from his ecclesiastical superior; in consequence of which he retired from politics. The extreme sharpness with which he, in a sermon (1852), expressed himself about the coup d'état, had the result that he some time after also retired from the pulpit, and settled at Sorreze as director of the school. His collected works — Conférences, Considérations, Correspondance avec madame Swetchine, Lettres à un jeune homme, etc. — were published in Paris, 1872-73, 9 vols. [His Conférences delivered in the Cathedral of Notre Dame were translated into English by Henry Langdon, New York, 1870; others have also been translated, — Jesus Christ (1870), God (1870), God and Man (1872), Life (1875).]

LIT.—The best characterizations of Lacordaire (his character and his talent) were given by SAINTE-BEUVE, in his Causeries de Lundi, and by CHARLES DE MAZADE, in Revue des Deux Mondes, of May 1, 1861. His life has been written by MONTALEMBERT, 1863, [by CHOCARNE (6th ed., 1880; translated into English by Father AYLWARD, London and New York, 1867, 2d ed., 1878), by H. L. SIDNEY LEAR (London, 1882), and by RICARD, Paris, 1882].

LACROIX, John Power, b. of French parents, farmers, at Haverhill, O., Feb. 13, 1833; d. at Delaware, O., Sept. 22, 1879. He was graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University, 1857. For two years afterward he taught in New Orleans, and there began his contributions to the periodical literature of the day, which he continued to his death. Besides translations and original articles in the monthlies and reviews, he averaged an article weekly for the religious press. In 1859 he entered the ministry of the Methodist-Episcopal Church in the Ohio Conference. In 1863 he became tutor in the Ohio Wesleyan University; soon after he went abroad, and studied sixteen months in the German universities. From 1861 to 1879 he filled the chair of modern languages in the Ohio Wesleyan University. He translated De Pressensé's Religion and the Reign of Terror, New York, 1868; Naville's Problem of Evil, 1871; Abelous' William the Taciturn, 1872; Wuttke's Christian Ethics, 2 vols., 1873. He wrote Life of Rudolf Stier, 1874, Outlines of Christian Ethics, 1879, and numerous articles in McClintock and Strong's Cyclopædia. He was a modest man, of wide information, sober views, and exalted Christian life.

LACTANTIUS FIRMIANUS (to which names some old manuscripts add those of Lucius Cæcilius, or Cælius) was probably a native of Italy, and, according to Jerome (De vir. ill., 80), a disciple of Arnobius. By Diocletian he was called to Nicomedia as teacher of Latin rhetoric; but, as the city was entirely Greek, he found very few pupils, and devoted most of his time to authorship. Having embraced Christianity, he resigned his professorship when the persecution of Diocletian broke out; and he seems to have lived in very humble circumstances until Constantine the Great called him to his court in Gaul as tutor of his son Crispus. The date of his death, like that of his birth, is unknown.

The most important and most celebrated of the Christian works of Lactantius is his Divinarum Institutionum Libri Septem, written during the persecution of Diocletian (between 307 and 310), and afterwards, in a second edition, dedicated to Constantine the Great, between 318 and 323. It is an apology of Christianity, opening with an attack on heathen religion and philosophy, and then turning into a positive exposition of the truths of Christianity. It was intended for people of education; and the author took special pains to satisfy even the most fastidious taste with respect to style and composition, in which he also succeeded so well, that he is generally called the "Christian Cicero." According to Jerome, he himself made an abridgment of the work, of which a complete copy was found in the library of Turin, and published in 1712 by Pfaff. In close connection with the Institutiones stands the book De ira Dei, in which Lactantius attacks the various philosophical schools, especially the Epicureans and Stoics, because they represent God as incapable of anger, as without affections. An earlier work by him, De opificio Dei, was meant to form a supplement to the fourth book of Cicero's De Republica. Among his other works are De mortibus persecutorum (written at Nicomedia in 314; first published by Baluze, Paris, 1679; latest edition by Dubner, Paris, 1879), and De ave Phœnice, a poem consisting of eighty-five distichs, and treating the fabulous bird as a symbol of the immortality of the soul.

LIT. — Collected editions of the works of Lactantius have been given by Conrad Sweynheim and Arnold Panarz (Rome, 1465), Bünemann (Leipzig, 1739), Le Brun and Longlet du Fresnoy (Paris, 1748), and Fritzsche (Leipzig, 1842). See J. G. THEO. Buches de mort. pers.*, Dresden, 1870; KEHREIN: Quis scripsit libellum de mort. pers., Stuttgart, 1877.

LACTICINIA (literally "milk-dishes") denotes all those kinds of food which are derived from the mammalia in a more or less indirect way; such as milk, butter, cheese, etc.: eggs are placed in the same class of food. The Council of Laodicea, 351, and the Trullan Council of 692 ordered complete abstinence from all lacticinia during fasting; and such is still the custom in most Eastern churches. In the Western Church the abstinence from lacticinia was generally confined to the quadragesimal fast before Easter, and dispensations were not difficult to procure.

LÆTARE SUNDAY, the fourth Sunday of Lent, thus called from the first word of the introit of the mass, laetare, "to rejoice;" is also called Dominica de rosa, because being the day selected by the Pope for the blessing of the golden rose.

LAFITEAU, Joseph François, a French Jesuit and missionary; b. at Bordeaux, 1670; d. there July 3, 1746. He labored in the Iroquois Indian Mission at Sault St. Louis, Can., from 1712 to 1717. He published Mœurs des sauvages américains comparées aux mœurs des premiers temps (Paris, 1723-24, 2 vols.), in which he maintained, from a study of Indian character, that they are descendants of the "barbarians" who inhabited Greece at an early period.

LADLIE, Archibald, D.D., b. in Kelso, Scotland, Dec. 4, 1727; d. at Red Hook, N.Y., Nov. 14, 1779. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh; ordained 1759, and settled over the Scotch Church at Flushing, Holland; thence he was called in 1763 to New-York City to preach in English in the Collegiate Church, — the first English preacher in the denomination. He was eminently successful as preacher and pastor, although at first called upon to endure great opposition from many of the Dutch denomination.

LAINEZ, Iago, the second general of the order of the Jesuits; b. at Almaraz, Castile, in 1512; d. in Rome, Jan. 19, 1565. He studied at Alcalá; joined Ignatius Loyola in Paris; was one of the six who made the vow of a spiritual crusade in the Church of Montmartre, Aug. 15, 1534; and succeeded Loyola as general, June 19, 1557. He completed and consolidated the despotic constitution of the order, awakened and developed its great faculty for education, initiated and trained its wonderful talent for intrigue, and made it that frightful instrument of ambition which it afterwards proved to be. He exercised, also, a direct influence on the history of the Roman-Catholic Church by the activity he developed at the Council of Trent. He actually suppressed every attempt to modify the old doctrine of justification in favor of the ideas of the Reformation; and his violent assertions of the supremacy of the papal power in its relation to the bishops, the councils, etc., had at all events the effect of embarrassing his opponents. See MICHEL D'ESNE: Life de Lainez, Douai, 1597; RIBADENEIRA: Life of Loinez, Madrid, 1592; translated into Latin by A. Schott, Antwerp, 1598.

LAITY. In the Primitive Christian Church there was theoretical and practical parity of all believers. It was not only taught (1 Pet. ii. 9, 10, v. 3), but acted upon. Laymen had the right to and did preach, baptize, administer the Lord's Supper, and exercise discipline. The distinction between clergy and laity was not sharply drawn. The former were chosen by the people to be their governors and leaders in worship, because they had the requisite gifts; but they formed no priestly caste, nor did they pretend to impose laws upon the churches. As Hatch says, "Church officers were originally regarded as existing for the good government of the community and for the general management of its affairs: the difference between [them] and other baptized persons was one of status and degree. Respecting the spiritual life, the two classes were on the same footing; and the functions which the officers performed were such as, apart from the question of order, might be performed by any member of the community." These functions were, however, open only to the male members (1 Cor. xiv. 34 sq.); except prophesying, which was the privilege of either sex (1 Cor. xi. 5). How long this parity of members lasted, it is impossible to say. The growth of the Church pushed the officers into greater prominence, for their offices increased in importance; and gradually those "who did not hold office were excluded from the performance of almost all ecclesiastical functions." The enforced celibacy of the clergy kept them aloof from the common interests of the laity. They were at last considered priests in a peculiar sense. The Lord's Supper became the mass, and the cup was withdrawn from the laity. Portions of the churches, and entire houses, were set apart for clerical use. The breach widened; and so, in spite of an occasional protest, the Christian world was divided into two camps, — one lay, the other clerical. Priestly arrogance and corruption wrought their own cure. The heart of Europe became sick of pretence and tyranny. The Reformation broke out. Then the laity recovered, in a measure, their lost rights. To-day in Protestant churches, specially the non-Episcopal, the laity have every fitting privilege granted them, and theoretically the priesthood of all believers is granted. Nevertheless, lay administration of the sacraments is probably very rarely practised, and would not in many instances be allowed. For further information, see arts. LAMAISM is a peculiar development, half religious and half political, of Buddhism. It took place in Thibet, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and presents the most extreme form of a hierarchy, the realization of the very ideal for which the mediæval popes fought. From Thibet it spread both into India and Chiua: but Lhassa is still its Rome, and Thibet its patrimonium Petri.

In the primitive Buddhism, such as was taught in India by Gautama in the sixth century B.C., the two principal points are, theoretically, the successive, but not continuous, revelation of the truth that saves, through a Buddha; and, practically, the embracing of that truth by a converted heart, and a systematical method of ethical and mental self-culture. But in the Buddhism which was introduced in Thibet in the sixth century A.D. both these points had been much corrupted. The idea of a Buddha had entirely changed. Instead of "a man, who, by self-denying efforts continued through many hundreds of different births, had acquired the ten cardinal virtues in such perfection that he was able, when sin and ignorance have gained the upper hand throughout the world, to save the human race from ruin," there presented itself a phantasm, hovering between heaven and earth, and surrounded with a host of fictitious beings. As completely man's relation to the Buddha had changed. A tricky priesthood, playing upon the superstitious of the mass, had taken the place of the heart's conversion and the severe practice of self-training. In the ninth century the old Thibetan worship of evil demons, the Bumpa religion, suddenly arose again; and for a time the Buddhist priests were banished from the country. In the fourteenth century a monk, Tsoukapa, attempted a reform of Buddhism. Nevertheless, in the fifteenth century, the transformation of Buddhism into Lamaism began.

In its highest form a hierarchy cannot rest satisfied with an infallible pope: it must have an incarnate pope. In the fifteenth century, Gedun Dub, the head of the Thibetan priesthood, declared himself an incarnation of that Buddha who appeared for the last time in the sixth century B.C., assumed the title of Dalai Lama ("the priest-ocean"), and took up his residence in the celebrated monastery Chabroung, in Lhassa. In spite of the opposition of princes and the army, which was overcome by the aid of the Mongols, the Dalai Lama gradually succeeded, during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in usurping the whole civil power; so that at present he is not only the highest, but the only, power in the country. Under him is arranged a graduated series of ecclesiastical officers, ending with the monks, whose number is almost incredible. In Lhassa there are eighteen thousand: in Thibet, in general, every seventh man is a monk. The large bulk of the annual revenue is used to sustain the monasteries, though the monks are the most obstinate beggars in the world, and the priests exceedingly shrewd in extracting money from their flocks. The office of Dalai Lama is not hereditary. When he dies, another incarnate Buddha is established by election; and the Chinese Government is said to exercise not small influence on the election. See SCHOTT: Ueber d. Buddhismus in Hoch-Asien [n. d.].

LAMB OF GOD. See AGNUS DEI.

LAMBERT OF HERSFELD became a monk at Hersfeld, March 15, 1058, and was ordained priest at Aschaffenburg, Sept. 15 same year. He afterwards made a journey to Jerusalem; and on his return he visited the monasteries of Siegburg and Saalfeld, to make himself acquainted with the severer rules there introduced. He came, however, to the conclusion that the rules of St. Benedict would suffice, if rigidly held. His literary career he opened with a poem on the history of his time; which seems to have perished, though Giesbrecht supposes it to be identical with the Gesta Henrici imperatoris metricæ, edited by Waitz, in Abhandlungen der Göttingen Gesellsch. der Wissenschaften, 1870. His second effort was a history of the monastery of Hersfeld: Libellus de institutione Hersfeldensis ecclesiæ, of which only a few fragments have come down to us. His principal work is his Annales, and it has been preserved whole. It begins with Adam, and is at first a mere chronological outline; but with the year 1040 the narrative becomes ampler, and from 1073 to 1077 it is the history of the time. The author combines simplicity and naturalness with learning and education; and, though he cannot be said to be impartial, his views are not without elevation, and his judgment is always moderate. The book was edited by Hesse, 1843 and 1874, and several times translated into German. See the dissertations by Lefarth (1871), and H. Delbrück (1873).

LAMBERT, François, b. at Avignon, 1486; d. at Marburg, April 18, 1530. In his fifteenth year he entered the Franciscan order, and worked, later on, with great success, though without fully satisfying himself, as an itinerant preacher. Luther's writings made a deep impression upon him; and when they were taken from him, anathematized, and burnt, he made up his mind to leave his monastery and his native country. Over Geneva and Zurich he went to Wittenberg, where he arrived in 1523, staid a whole year, married, lectured on the prophets, and translated several of the Reformers' books into French and Italian. In 1524 he went to Strassburg, where he published his Commentaries on the Prophets, and several treatises, — De arbitrio hominis vere captivo (against Erasmus), De causis executionis multorum seculorum, Furrago omnium fere rerum theologiarum, etc. But in Strassburg he also gradually turned away from the strict Lutherism, and adopted the views of the Swiss Reformers. In 1526 he was appointed professor of theology in the university of Marburg; and, enjoying the confidence of Landgrave Philipp of Hesse, he took a prominent part in the establishment of the Reformation in that country. He drew up the famous Reformatio ecclesiarum Hassiæ, which, though never carried out, forms one of the most interesting documents of its kind from the period of the Reformation (printed in F. C. SCHMUNCKE: Monumen. Hassiaca, ii.). See his biographies by J. W. BAUM (German, Strassburg, 1840), F. ST. STEVE (Latin, Breslau, 1867), and LOUIS RUFFET (French, Paris, 1873). WAGENMANN.

LAMBRUSCHINI, Luigi, b. at Genoa, May 6, 1776; d. in Rome, May 8, 1854. He entered the order of the Barnabites; was made Archbishop of Genoa in 1819; and was in 1823 sent as papal nuncio to Paris, where, by the advice he gave Charles X., he is said to have contributed not a little to the fall of the Bourbons. Made cardinal in 1831, and secretary of state in 1836, he was the true father of that policy which characterized the reign of Gregory XVI., and which finally conjured up the revolution in the very dominions of the Pope. With the death of Gregory XVI. his public career was ended; but he was so hated, that, when the Revolution broke out in 1848, he was compelled to flee, disguised as a groom. His Opere spirituali were published in Rome, 1836. His celebrated memoir in the Droste-Vischering affair was translated into German, Ratisbon, 1838. KLÜPFEL.

LAMENNAIS, Hugues Félicité Robert de, b. at St. Malo, July 19, 1782; d. in Paris, Feb. 27, 1854. He entered the seminary of St. Malo in 1811, was ordained a priest in 1816, and published in 1817 the first volume of his Essai sur l'Indifférence en matière de Religion, of which the fourth and last volume appeared in 1824. The book made a great sensation. It at once rallied and consolidated the Ultramontanist party, and in the Church in general it produced a kind of revival. The bishops, the Sorbonne, and the Jesuits were strongly opposed to it; but Leo XII. offered the author a cardinal's hat, which, however, he declined. With Gallicanism he broke still more decidedly in his De la religion considérée dans ses rapports avec l'ordre politique et civil (1826); and soon after he abandoned the Bourbons, whose fall he predicted in his Des progrès de la révolution (1829). In order to make the Church perfectly free, he demanded to have it separated from the State, and rebuilt on completely democratic principles; but these ideas, which he propagated in his paper, L'Avenir, — founded in 1830, when the revolution had established the liberty of the press, — did not find favor with the Pope. By an encyclical of Aug. 15, 1832, Gregory XVI. condemned them, L'Avenir ceased to come out, and Lamennais retired from public life. He did not submit, however. By his Paroles d'un Croquant (1836) he definitely broke with Rome, and pursued his course independently, showing more and more of the social radicalism which he combined with his religious radicalism: Livre du peuple (1837), L'Esclavage moderne, Le pays et le gouvernement, etc. His last great works were his Esquisse d'une philosophie (1841-46), and a translation, with notes, of the Gospels (1846). In 1848 he was elected a member of the National Assembly, but was unable to carry through any of his plans, and, after the coup d'état of 1852, he retired altogether from public life, deeply disappointed. LAMENTATIONS is the name of five elegies, in which is bewailed the mournful lot that came upon Jerusalem in the Chaldaean invasion of 588 B.C. The name in the Hebrew text is Echal (עֲחָלָה, "How"), — the word with which the first, second, and fourth chapters open; but the Jews, according to Jerome, also used the designation "Lamentations" (Kinoth, קִנּוּתִים), which was likewise employed in the LXX. (Θρήνοι) and the Vulgate (Threni). It was counted in the LXX. as one book with Jeremiah's Prophecy, just as Ruth was counted as a part of Judges; but in the Hebrew Bible it was placed among the Hagiographa. So far as the structure of the elegies is concerned, four of them are acrostic [the twenty-two verses in the Authorized Version corresponding to the twenty-two letters of the Hebrew alphabet]. In chap. iii., which represents the culmination of the author's feelings, each letter is repeated three times. In chap. v. the acrostic arrangement is ignored. A striking fact meets us in chaps. ii., iii., iv., where י follows ב; whereas in chap. i. the usual order of the alphabet is followed. The contents of the five poems concern the national sorrow, but each brings out a distinct phase of the calamity. Chap. i. depicts Zion weeping, — the once rich and happy, but now desolate city. Chap. ii. is more vivacious, and describes the destruction as the deed of the Lord. In chap. iii. an individual relates his own personal sufferings, though not exclusively. In chap. iv. the mournful condition of the people is brought under view, who, during the siege and after it, suffered so fearfully from the ravages of the sword and famine. Chap. v. portrays the present miserable condition of the people. If there is no real progress in the thought, this will be attributed to the acrostic method. That the five pieces were cast in the same mould is psychologically improbable, but the unity of style points to a single hand. The scene is throughout the same, and was vividly before the mind of the writer, who wrote after the siege.

Who is the author of these songs? Tradition with unbroken uniformity speaks of Jeremiah; and the LXX. distinctly declares for the same view, and introduces the first chapter with the words: "And it came to pass, that after Israel was carried into captivity, and Jerusalem was laid waste, Jeremiah sat weeping, and made this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said." Jerome wrongly identifies our book with the elegies sung by Jeremiah at Josiah's death (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). But this passage shows how well fitted Jeremiah was to write the Lamentations (comp. Jer. viii. 18-22, xiv. 17 sq.). They also have much in common with the Prophecy, both in language, and line of thought. It is only in quite recent times that the Jeremianic authorship has been denied in whole (Ewald, Nöldeke, Schrader, Nägelsbach [Professor W. R. Smith], etc.) or in part (Thénis, etc.). The lexicographical differences in the Prophecy and Lamentations have been urged (Nägelsbach), but the difference of contents of the compositions is in this connection to be taken into account. No striking difference in the spiritual tone can be made out. In general, we must remember that Jeremiah here appears exclusively as the patriot, and not at all as the divinely-sent advocate, as in the Prophecy. Chap. iii. strongly favors the current and traditional view. We cannot get rid of the impression that it is Jeremiah who is relating his own personal experiences. In later times the Lamentations were sung by the Jews on the 9th of Ab, the anniversary of the burning of the temple; and in the Catholic Church they are incorporated in the liturgical service of Passion Week.

LAMI, Bernard, b. at Mans, June, 1640; d. at Rouen, Jan. 29, 1715. In 1658 he entered the Congregation of the Oratory, and taught philosophy and mathematics at various places; but his enthusiasm for the Cartesian philosophy made him many enemies among the Aristotelians, and in 1676 he was banished to Grenoble. Recalled to Paris in 1686, he was banished once more, and finally settled at Rouen. His Apparatus Biblicus (Lyons, 1696) was twice translated into French under the title, Introduction à l'Écriture sainte, by Bellegarde and by Boyer, and also into English by R. Bundy (London, 1723). Among his other works are Harmonia sive Concordia quatuor Evangelistarum (1689) and De Tabernaculo faderis, etc. (1720), on which he is said to have worked for thirty years.

LAMMAS-DAY, or LAMMAS-TIDE, Aug. 1, celebrated by the Roman Catholics in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment, is probably an old Pagan festival dating back to the days of Druidism. The derivation of the name (whether from lamb-mass or from loaf-mass) is uncertain, though the latter seems preferable, as it was an old Saxon custom to make sacrifices of grain on the 1st of August.

LAMPE, Friedrich Adolf, one of the most distinguished Calvinistic divines of the eighteenth century; b. Feb. 18, 1683, at Detmold; d. at Bremen, Dec. 6, 1729. He was educated in the academy of Bremen, 1698-1702; studied theology at Franeker; was professor of dogmatics at the university of Utrecht, 1720-27, and finally pastor of St. Ansgar, and professor at the academy of Bremen. The revival of the federal theology, and the advancement of Bible study in the Reformed Church, are his great merits. His principal works are, Gehemmiss des Gauenbundes (6 vols.); Milch der Wahrheit, an exposition of the Heidelberg Catechism; Theologia activa seu practica, a very full commentary on the Gospel of John (3 vols.); and a number of excellent hymns, etc. See O. LANCE, The Holy, was, according to the report of Bishop Luitprand of Cremona, presented by King Rudolph of Burgundy to King Henry I. of Germany. According to the original tradition, it was made from the nails with which Jesus was fastened to the cross; but a later tradition identified it with the spear with which the Roman soldier pierced the side of Jesus. Under Charles IV. it was brought to Prague, and in 1351 Innocent VI. established a festival (de lancea) in its honor. Another holy lance was discovered by the Empress Helena, and preserved in the portico of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It was afterwards brought to Antioch, where it was discovered, in 1093, by the French monk Peter Bartholomew, who exhibited it to the crusaders, and thereby fired their courage in their great battles with the Saracens. Afterwards it travelled from Antioch to Constantinople, from Constantinople to Venice, from Venice to France, and thence back to Constantinople. The iron with which it was inlaid was brought to Rome under Innocent VIII., and is preserved in the basilica of the Vatican. Neither of these lances, however, has been formally recognized as genuine by the Church of Rome.

[In the Greek Church the "holy lance" is the name given to the knife with which the officiating priest pierces the bread of the Eucharist, in symbol of the piercing of the side of Jesus by the Roman soldier when upon his cross. See LORD'S SUPPER, FORMS OF CELEBRATION.]

LANCELOTT, Joannes Paulus, was professor of canon law at Perugia, where he died (1590), and is noted as author of the Institutiones juris canonici, which are often printed as an appendix to the Corpus juris canonici. In 1557 Paul IV. charged him with writing a text-book of canon law after the model of Justinian's Institutiones, and two years afterwards he handed in the finished work to the papal censor. The committee appointed to examine it recommended it very highly; but, on account of certain passages which the author was unwilling to change, it did not obtain the approbation of the Pope. It was published at Perugia (1563), with a dedication to Pius IV.; and, as it found a very extended use as a text-book, Paul V. allowed it to be printed as an appendix to the Corpus juris canonici, though without formally authorizing its use. Later editors have carefully noted the differences which canonical legislation after the Council of Trent has introduced. A French translation by Durand de Maillane (Lyons, 1710) notes the difference of Italian and Gallican practice. See VON SCHULTE: Geschichte d. Qucl. u. Lit. d. röm. Rechtes, vol. 3, pp. 451 sqq.

H. F. JACOBSON.

LANDERER, Maximilian Albert von, one of the most learned and able, though not one of the best known, representatives of the school of theology occupying an intermediate position between the old supranaturalism and modern rationalism (Vermittlungstheologie): b. Jan. 14, 1810, in Maulbronn, Würtemberg; d. April 13, 1878, in Tübingen. He was a man who shunned the public gaze; and his literary activity was carried on in quiet, unostentatious retirement. After studying at Tübingen, where Dorner was his fellow-student, he became his father's assistant in the pastorate of Walddorf, then tutor at Maulbronn, and repetent at Tübingen. In 1839 he became pastor in Göppingen; but a growing deafness and a poor address made him ill fitted for the pastoral office, and in 1841 he returned to Tübingen as professor. Here he continued during the remainder of his life, refusing in 1862 a call to Göttingen. In 1875 he sustained a serious injury from falling down stairs, never was able to lecture again, and in 1877 resigned his professorship. At Tübingen he occupied an intermediate position between Baur and J. T. Beck. Rejecting the Hegelian principle of absolute knowledge, he emphasized the religious experience in the department of systematic theology. He did not, however, forcibly separate it from the revelation of the Scriptures. The central doctrine in systematic theology he regarded as the perfect union of God and man in Jesus of Nazareth; and he laid special emphasis on the humanity of Christ, insisting, however, upon his supernatural birth and absolute sinlessness.

He was a faithful lecturer, but had a decided Suabian accent, which sometimes made it hard for students from other parts of Germany to understand him. He was not as imposing in presence as Baur or Beck, and yet, as we have said, he was one of the most influential of the theologians of his school; and the student learned to respect him more highly, the more intimately he came in contact with him. Yet we look almost in vain for any fruits of his literary activity in published works. In fact, these were confined, during his lifetime, to thirteen articles in the first edition of Herzog, and an article on the relation of grace to the freedom of the will in the application of salvation, in the Jahrbücher f. d. Theol. The articles in Herzog, especially that on Melancthon, were excellent. The small number of his publications was the result of a conscientious disinclination to neglect the utmost elaboration of his lectures, and a want of self-confidence. He shrank from appearing before the public with his lectures on theology; and he was, in fact, unusually sensitive to all criticism. But he combined all the best qualities of the Suabian character, was strictly honest, and despised sham.

Since his death there have been edited from his manuscripts Zur Dogmatik. Zwei akad. Reden (by BUDER and WEISS), with his Gedächtnissrede auf F. C. Baur, Tübingen, 1879; a volume of Sermons (by LANG), Heilbronn, 1880; and Neueste Dogmengesch. (by PAUL ZELLER), Heilbronn, 1881, which takes up the period from Senler to the present time. See Worte d. Erinnerung an Dr. M. A. Landerer, Tübingen, 1878. H. SCHMIDT.

LANDO (Pope, from November, 913, to May 914) succeeded Anastasius III., and was succeeded by John X. Nothing is known of his personal life or his reign.

LANE THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY, Cincinnati, O., was founded in 1829. Its original endowment consisted of four thousand dollars donated by Ebenezer Lane and brother, and of sixty acres of land on Walnut Hills, given by members of the Kemper family. It was at first proposed to establish an academic and collegiate as well as theological institution; and a preparatory school was first opened Nov. 18, 1829. After an experiment of five years, the academic and collegiate departments were finally closed. The theological department went into operation in December, 1832, when Drs. Lyman Beecher and T. J. Biggs were formally inducted into office. Professor Calvin E. Stowe, D.D., entered upon his duties in the following July, and Baxter Dickinson, D.D., in October, 1835.

Among those who have served the seminary since its organization, next to Dr. Beecher, the name of D. Howe Allen, D.D., is especially conspicuous. He was professor of sacred rhetoric from 1840 to 1851, and from that date till 1867

(when he resigned) the professor in systematic theology. Like Dr. Beecher, he continued to be professor emeritus till his death, which occurred in 1870. George E. Day, D.D., was professor of biblical literature from 1851 to 1866. Henry A. Nelson, D.D., was professor of theology from 1867 to 1874; and Thomas E. Thomas, D.D., professor of New-Testament literature from 1871 to his death, in 1875. Jonathan B. Condit, D.D., and Elisha Ballantine, D.D., served the seminary for shorter periods. Henry Smith, D.D., LL.D., was professor of sacred rhetoric from 1855 to 1861. In 1865 he returned to the same department, and remained in the discharge of its duties, with the addition of pastoral theology, till his decease, in 1879. Zephaniah M. Humphrey, D.D., was professor of church history from 1875 till his death in 1881.

The faculty at present (1882) consists of five professors: occasional lectures and instructions are given by others. The average number of students in attendance is about forty, but increasing annually. The institution has a fair endowment, some scholarship and library funds, and a theological library of thirteen thousand volumes. Its buildings are new and commodious.

The whole number of graduates is about seven hundred, of whom probably five hundred and fifty are still living. The large majority of these brethren have been, or still are, engaged in the missionary work of the Presbyterian Church, in the region between the Alleghanies and the outlying territories of the West, whilst nearly forty have gone into the foreign field. Many of them have signalized themselves as capable and effective preachers, and as earnest and practical laborers in every department of ministerial service. The actual work done by them, their unquestioned orthodoxy, and their unsullied Christian character, have been the best possible witness to the faithfulness, the completeness, and the practical nature, of the training they have received at the seminary.

E. D. MORRIS.

LANFRANC, thirty-fourth Archbishop of Canterbury, one of the most prominent instruments in the revival of church and theology in France and England in the eleventh century; the defender of the doctrine of transubstantiation against Berengar of Tours; and the assistant of William the Conqueror in the conquest of England; was the son of Hambold, a senator of Pavia; b. at Pavia, 1005; d. at Canterbury, May 28, 1089. Destined for the study of law, he secured his education at Bologna, and became a teacher of jurisprudence in Pavia. His position not satisfying his ambition, he went to Normandy in 1039, and opened a school at Avranches, which became widely celebrated. In consequence of a sudden change of sentiment, he renounced the world (1042), and entered the Benedictine convent of Bee, where he was kindly received by the abbot, Herluin. There he spent three years in absolute retirement; so that, when he appeared again, the world was surprised that the great master was still living. In 1045 he was made prior of the convent, and used his position, not only to promote discipline, but also the study of theology and the sciences. Among his scholars were Anselm (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury) and Anselm of Lucca (afterwards Pope Alexander II.). His most famous opponent during his priorship was Berengar of Tours, whose discussion of the doctrine of transubstantiation began to awaken interest in 1046. Berengar was at first his friend; but their friendship was broken off about the close of 1049, when Berengar wrote to Lanfranc, expressing regret that he should regard as heretical the views advocated in the work of Ratramnus, which then was ascribed to John Scotus. This letter was the ground of the charge of heresy against Berengar in the year 1050, at the Easter synod, Rome.

Of not a little importance is Lanfranc's literary activity, to which he was incited by this discussion. Berengar, although in 1059, at the Lateran synod, he had laid down his arms, attacked the synod, and especially Cardinal Humbert, the author of the articles of faith which he had been forced to subscribe. Lanfranc answered him in his Liber de corpore et sanguine Domini. When this appeared, he was abbot of St. Stephen's convent in Caen, his reputation having risen in the interval. He had also attracted the attention of William, Duke of Normandy, who solicited his advice, before the conquest of England, in ecclesiastical and civil matters, as well as after. He seems to have been the very soul of this bold enterprise, which William carried out in alliance with Rome, and under the plea of being a savior of the needy Church in England. It was because he was indispensable to the organization of the English Church, and had an understanding with William (Freeman, vol. iv. p. 95), that he refused the archbishopric of Rouen in 1067, and three years later accepted the archbishopric of Canterbury. With this view his reluctance to assume the latter office is quite compatible; the rudeness of the clergy, and especially the revolt of the Anglo-Saxons against the dominion of foreigners in the Church, offering not inconsiderable difficulties. He contributed much to the establishment of the Norman dominion by the concentration of the hierarchy in Canterbury; the metropolitan of York being made, by the synods of Winchester and Windsor (1072), subject to Canterbury. With diplomatic skill he gradually displaced the native prelates and abbots; so that at last Wulfstan was the only Anglo-Saxon occupying a bishopric. Otherwise he was an enlightened prelate, insisting upon the reformation of conventual life, and the pursuit of literature.

In his relation to Rome, Lanfranc advocated the reforms of Hildebrand, to whom he offered, upon the whole, loyal obedience; but he insisted upon the king's independence, even in ecclesiastical affairs. The decree of celibacy was enforced by him (at the synod of Winchester, 1076) for the higher clergy; the parochial clergy being allowed to retain their wives, but all clergymen being forbidden to marry in the future. In some instances he espoused the side of his sovereign against the Pope, and even refused to appear at Rome when (1081) the Pope demanded his presence, with the threat of suspension if he did not comply. He outlived the Conqueror (d. 1087), and reluctantly acquiesced in his request to crown William Rufus king.

Lanfranc was more prominent as an ecclesiastical administrator than as a writer. But the succeeding generations were loud in their praises of his literary achievements; and we cannot doubt, that, so long as he remained in Normandy, he took a prominent place as a teacher and author. Milo Crispinus says that Athens appeared again at Bec under his influence; and William of Malmesbury describes the convent there as a great and famous literary gymnasium, and calls him the most learned man of his time (De Gest. regg. Angl., i., iii.). It is not necessary to give other testimonies of a like intent. To him we must, at any rate, accord a foremost place among those who contributed to the revival of learning in the eleventh century. He was a skilled dialectician, and proposed an emendation of the Vulgate, which probably was meant to extend only to the correction of the copies. But there are no evidences of speculative ability in his writings.

The most important of Lanfranc's works is the Liber de corpore et sanguine Domini ("The Body and Blood of Christ"), which is composed of twenty-three chapters, written in an epistolary form. It teaches the doctrine of transubstantiation, and was meant to be a defence of it against Berengar. He goes even beyond Paschasius Radbertus, when he says that those who unworthily partake (indigne sumentes) of the bread and wine receive the essence of the body and blood of Christ, without, however, being salutarily affected thereby. He proves the doctrine by the omnipotence of God (c. 18), miraculous phenomena (c. 17), the proposition that the sacraments of the New Testament must be distinguished from those of the Old Testament by a superior dignity and the common consent of Christians (c. 22). He also answers the specific objections of Berengar, such as the impossibility of Christ's body being at the same time in heaven and on earth. Lanfranc also wrote Libellus de celanda confessione, LV. Letters, Statuta pro ordine s. Benedicti. Others ascribe to him, but unjustly, a Commentary on the Pauline Epistles (see Giles, ii. 17-147) and Elucidarium sive dialogus de summa totius christ. theol. (considered genuine by Prantl and Ueberweg). His Exposition of the Psalms, Church History, and Panegyric of William the Conqueror, are lost.

LANG, Heinrich, b. at Frommen in Württemberg, Nov. 14, 1826; d. in Zürich, Jan. 3, 1876. He studied theology in Tübingen, under F. C. Baur, and was appointed pastor of Wartau in the canton of St. Gall, in 1848, of Meilon on the Lake of Zürich, in 1863, and of St. Peter in Zürich, in 1871. He edited the Zeitstimmen (1859-72), and published Versuch einer christlichen Dogmatik, a popular representation of the dogmatics of the school of Tübingen, 1857; Stunden der Andacht, 1862-65, 2 vols.; Ein Gang durch die christliche Welt, Religiöse Charaktere, Das Leben des Apostels Paulus, etc. See E. LANG, John Dunmore, D.D. This extraordinary man, whose influence on the political and moral, as well as on the ecclesiastical, history of Australia, has been very great, was born at Greenock, Scotland, in 1799, and died at Sydney, New South Wales, in 1878. Educated at the parish school of Largs and the University of Glasgow, he was ordained by the presbytery of Irvine, and proceeded in 1823, as the first minister of the Church of Scotland, to Australia. At a time when every increase to the population was of the utmost consequence, he was the means of bringing out many thousands of excellent emigrants from Great Britain to the new colonies, as also ministers and teachers for the work of the Church. He represented Port Philip, Moreton Bay, and Sydney successively in the Legislative Assembly, and was chiefly instrumental in securing the separation and independence of Victoria and Queensland from New South Wales. He also carried other useful measures in Parliament, including the repeal of the act imposing a poll-tax on Chinamen. Besides a lengthened connection with the newspaper press, in which he strove to advance the moral and political welfare of his countrymen, he published several works, the chief of which is the History of New South Wales. He took an active interest in the union of the Presbyterian churches, and in establishing the Presbyterian college. The large place he filled in Church and State was evinced by the presence of seventy thousand people at his funeral, including the most distinguished men in the community of different denominations.

LANGE, Joachim, b. at Gardelegen in Altmark, Oct. 26, 1670; d. at Halle, May 7, 1744. He was educated at Quedlinburg and Magdeburg, and studied theology at Leipzig, where he became intimately acquainted with A. H. Francke, whom he followed to Erfurt (1690) and Halle (1691). In 1693 he settled in Berlin, first as private tutor, afterwards as rector of the Friederichswerdersche college. In Berlin he conversed much with Spener; and when, in 1709, he was appointed professor of the theology at Halle, he became the literary representative of the Pietists. He was an exceedingly prolific writer. In his controversy with the orthodox, represented by Löscher, he wrote Idea theologiæ pseudorthodoxæ (1706), Aufrichtige Nachricht (1707-11, 5 vols.), Antibarbaras orthodoxiæ (1709-11), Richtige Mittelstrasse (1712-14, 4 vols., etc.). In his controversy with C. Wolff, the philosopher, he wrote Causa Dei (1723), Modesta disquisitio, Nova anatome (1726), etc. Though he succeeded in having Wolff expelled from Halle, he could not prevent him from returning triumphantly, while he himself was ordered to stop writing against him. He also published a number of historical, dogmatical, and exegetical works, and an autobiography (incomplete). Leipzig, 1744.

LANIGAN, John, Irish Roman-Catholic priest; b. in Cashel, 1758; d. at Finglas, near Dublin, July 7, 1828. He was educated at the Irish college at Rome, where he took a doctor's degree. Subsequently he was professor of "Hebrew, divinity, and the Scriptures" in Pavia, but in 1796 appointed to a position in the record tower, Dublin, to the original duties of which, in 1799, were added those of librarian, editor, and translator for the Dublin Society. In 1821 he had to be removed to a private insane-asylum at Finglas. He was the author of the valuable works, Institutionum biblicarum (Pavia, 1794), Protestant's Apology for the Roman-Catholic Church (Dublin, 1809), Ecclesiastical History of Ireland to the Thirteenth Century (Dublin, 1822, 4 vols.; 2d ed., 1829). He also published an Irish translation of the Roman Breviary.

LANGRES, Synod of (Concilium Lingonense). Early in June, 859, a council was held at Langres, a city of Burgundy. Sixteen canones (referring to dogmatics, church polity, and discipline) were agreed upon. Annual provincial and biennial general synods were established. The right of the people, still existing in some places, to elect their bishop, was severely attacked; and so was the exemption of certain monasteries from the episcopal authority. In dogmatical respect the synod of Langres was merely a preparation for the synod of Toul, for the campaign against the semi-Pelagian views represented by Hincmar, as was soon shown. See MANSI, xv. 537; HARDUIN, v. 481.

LANGTON, Stephen, Archbishop of Canterbury, and a distinguished statesman; d. at Slindon, July 9, 1228. The date of his birth is unknown; and there is much uncertainty about the locality, Lincolnshire having most claim to the honor. There is no doubt, that, unlike many of his predecessors, he was born in England. He was educated at the university of Paris, and seems to have held a position of influence in connection with it. He there contracted a friendship with Lothario, afterwards Innocent III. In 1206 he went to Rome, and was made cardinal-priest of St. Chrysogonus. At the death of Hubert, archbishop of Canterbury, Reginald appeared before the Pope with some monks, claiming to have been elected by the chapter to the vacant see, and demanding recognition. Soon after, an envoy of priests from King John arrived, desiring the Pope to confer the pallium on the bishop of Norwich. Innocent, ignoring both these nominees, on the ground of alleged irregularities in their election, ordered the priests from England to proceed to an election in his presence, and, at his suggestion, chose Langton. He was consecrated by the Pope's own hand, at Viterbo, June 17, 1207, and in spite of the king's protests. A better choice could not have been made; for Stephen was not only a man of learning and piety, but advanced, at a later period, to the front rank of English patriots. For six years he was obliged to wait at Pontigny, in France, before coming into the possession of his see. In the mean time his election became the occasion of one of the most spirited contests in the history of the relations of the papal see with princes. John prosecuting the priests who had elected Stephen, and refusing to receive the archbishop, England was put under an interdict.

The bells ceased to ring, and the churches were closed. John, after a period of resistance, at last gave in a most ignoble submission to Innocent, and Stephen Langton was admitted to the realm. He met and absolved the king at Winchester, the latter falling prostrate before him.

From the first, Stephen was a champion of the old English customs and law, as against the personal despotism of the sovereign. "As Anselm," says Green, in his History of the English People, "had withstood William Rufus, as Theobald had rescued England from the lawlessness of Stephen, so Langton prepared to withstand, and rescue his country from, the tyranny of John." He helped to unite the barons in a confederation, produced the old charter of Henry I. at the meeting held in St. Paul's, London (Aug. 25, 1214), and shared in the preparation of the Magna Charta. Pandolph, the papal legate, secured a sentence repealing from the Pope this document; and, when Langton refused to allow it to be read in the churches, he was suspended from his archiepiscopal office by the papal commissioners. He went to Rome, but the Pope confirmed the sentence. He did not return to England till 1218, remaining a state prisoner in Rome for at least a part of the interval. He crowned Henry III. in 1220, and maintained a firm attitude during his reign. A stone coffin is still exhibited in Canterbury Cathedral, which is said to contain his remains.

There are few materials for the history of Stephen Langton's life, but the little that we do know shows him to have been a man of statesmanlike energy and abilities. He left a number of writings; e.g., a Commentary on most of the books of the Old Testament, a Hexameron on the six days of the creation, and is said to have written a Life of Richard I., etc. Stephen's brother, Simon Langton, was also a man of much influence in his day, and was chosen archbishop of York, but not permitted by John to occupy the see. The principal authority for the events of Stephen's life is the Chronicle of Roger of Wendover. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, ii. 657-761, the various histories of England and the Church of England, and art. INNOCENT III.

LANGUET, Hubert, b. at Viteaux, near Autun, in 1518; d. in Antwerp, Sept. 30, 1581. He studied theology, canon law, history, and natural science, in Poitiers, Padua, and Bologna; visited also Spain, and was, by the reading of Melancthon's Loci Theologici, induced to go to Wittenberg, where he lived in Melancthon's house from 1549 to 1560, making frequent journeys in Germany and Scandinavia. At what period he definitely embraced the Reformation is not known. In 1560 he entered the service of the elector of Saxony, and acted as his diplomatical agent till 1577, in Paris, Vienna, and other places. The last years of his life he spent in the Netherlands, in intimate connection with William of Orange. His letters, which are of the greatest interest for the history of his time, have been published in several collections; but the work which gives him a place in ecclesiastical history is his Indicæ contra tyrannos, published pseudonymously in 1579, and treating in an elaborate manner the question whether subjects (for instance, Protestants) have a right to revolt, when suppressed for their reli-gion's sake by their princes. The book made a great sensation, and was translated into all European languages. See his biographies by PHILBERT DE LA MARE (Halle, 1700) and H. CHEVREUIL (Paris, 1856), and TREITZSCHKE, prefixed to the latter's edition of the Vindicie, Leipzig, 1846.

LAODICEA was the name of several cities in Syria and Asia Minor, of which one — generally called "Laodicea-ad-Lyeum," and situated near the boundary-line between Phrygia and Lydia, on the Lyeus — is mentioned in the New Testament. During the latter part of the republic of Rome and the first period of the empire, the city was the capital of Greater Phrygia, and a flourishing commercial place; and an important Christian congregation was early formed there. Having suffered much at various times from earthquakes (e.g., A.D. 64), it was finally destroyed by the Turks, and is now only a heap of ruins. A council was held there between 343 and 381; and the sixty canones agreed upon there are still extant. They are exclusively of disciplinary interest. In the enumeration of the books contained in the Bible, the Apocrypha of the Old Testament and the Book of Revelation of the New Testament are left out. See HARDUIN, i.; MANSI, ii.; HEFELÉ, i. pp. 721-751; and LIGHTFOOT, On Colossians, pp. 1-72.

LAODICEA, the Epistle from. The allusion of Paul to an epistle from Laodicea (Col. iv. 16) has given rise to much speculation. Bishop Lightfoot, in his Commentary on the Colossians (pp. 340-366), presents an exhaustive excursus upon the subject. He thus tabulates the various theories. The epistle in question was (1) An epistle written by the Laodiceans to (a) Paul, (β) Epaphras, (γ) Colossæ; (2) An epistle written by Paul from Laodicea, identical with (a) 1 Timothy, (β) 1 Thessalonians, (γ) 2 Thessalonians, (δ) Galatians; (3) An epistle addressed to the Laodiceans by (a) John, — 1 John, (b) some companion of Paul, — Epaphras or Luke, (c) Paul himself, — (i) a lost epistle; (ii) one of the canonical epistles, (a) Hebrews, (β) Philemon, (γ) Ephesians; (iii) the apocryphal epistle. Lightfoot discusses briefly but sufficiently these theories, and decides for the identification of the epistle with the canonical Ephesians. This is doubtless the true solution of the problem. The other views are either contradicted by the Greek, or actuated by a desire to withdraw from the apocryphal epistle, or else mere speculation. But, for the identification with the Epistle to the Ephesians, there are the tenable arguments that the words ἐν Ἐφέσω ("in Ephesus") (Eph. i. 1) are wanting in some of the best manuscripts, and are bracketed by Westcott and Hort; but, if they were omitted by the apostle, then he meant to make the epistle an encyclical; in which case it might be sent to Laodicea, and by the Laodiceans forwarded to Colosse. Again: this explains the absence of personal allusions in Ephesians, and obviates the supposition that an epistle, to which particular attention was called, has been lost.

As for the apocryphal Epistle to the Laodiceans, it is "a cento of Pauline phrases strung together without any definite connection or any clear object . . . taken chiefly from the Epistle to the Philippians. It is quite harmless, so far as falsity and stupidity combined can ever be regarded as harmless." It was probably originally written, or rather compiled, in Greek, and translated into Latin at a very early period. It was widely known prior to the close of the fourth century, condemned emphatically by Jerome, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Theodoret, yet read in the eighth century; for the second Council of Nicæa (787) warned against it. It was in the Latin translation that it attained circulation; and, in the Latin Church, Gregory alluded to it as genuine, — not by name, however, — and subsequent writers followed him. It is found in Pauline manuscripts from the sixth to the fifteenth centuries, in one of the two most ancient copies of the Vulgate, and frequently in the versions, even in English, in the fifteenth century, though Wielif and Purvey excluded it. At length the revival of learning dealt its death-blow to this, as to so many other spurious pretensions. See ANGER: Ueber den Laodiceenerbrief, Leipzig, 1843; and LIGHTFOOT: St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians and to Philemon, London, 1875.

LAOS, an Asiatic people inhabiting the eastern portion of Siam. They have all the characteristics of the Siamese, by whom their country, which up to that time had been independent, was subjugated in 1828. They number about one million five hundred thousand. The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church (United States) established a mission among the Laos in 1867. The chief station is Chieng-Mai, five hundred miles north of Bangkok. There were in 1882 two clerical, one medical, and one female missionary connected with the mission, with a hundred and twenty-seven native communicants, fifty of whom were added in 1881.

LÃO-TSZE, the reputed founder of the Chinese religion called "Taoism." He was born about 601 B.C., near the present Kwei-te, in Ho-nan province, China; d. at an unknown place and time, probably at a great age. In 517 B.C. he met Kung-fu-tsze (Confucius), and the brief account of their interview is the only fact of interest concerning him. He was keeper of the archives at the court of Châu, and it was to learn something about the ancient rites and ceremonies of Châu that Confucius came to him. Foreseeing the downfall of Châu, Láo retired to a far country, stopping, however, long enough with Yin Hsé to write for him the remarkable volume, in five thousand characters, on the subject of Tào (the Way) and Teh (Virtue), called Tào Teh King. Láo was a philosopher, as his name ("the Old Philosopher") implies. His great work, Tào Teh King, is translated in Legge's Chinese Classics, and in Chalmer's The Speculations of the "Old Philosopher" Lau-tsze. It is, however, not throughout intelligible even to native Chinese scholars, much less to other readers. It may be briefly described as an ethical treatise, in which the duties of the individual and the State are set forth. Láo lays great stress upon humility and upon gentleness, and, in one sentence at least, approaches Christian ethics. "It is the way of Tào not to act from any personal motive, to conduct affairs without feeling the trouble of them, to taste without being aware of the flavor, to account the great as small, and the small as great, to recompense injury with kindness." Láo was a theist, although he is not explicit on this point. "There is hardly a word in his treatise which savors either of superstition or religion." It is now agreed that the word "Jehovah" does not occur in it, as was fancied; and so the supposition that Láo was inspired, or else had contact with the true religion in some shape, is baseless.

Táoism is to-day one of the Chinese religions, ranking with Confucianism and Buddhism; but it is only in small measure based upon Láo's teachings, and is so vastly inferior in its conceptions, that Dr. Legge says "he ought not to bear the obloquy" of being its founder. Táoism did not come up until five hundred years after Láo's death. At first it was little more than a belief in magic. In the first century before Christ, the head of the sect was a wonderful magician; and the present acknowledged "pope" of Táoism is one of this magician's descendants. In the first Christian century, Táoism took on more of the outward semblance of a religion, borrowing from Buddhism its temples, monasteries, liturgies, and forms of worship. In its present form it is a system of the "wildest polytheism," and of base and dangerous superstitions,—alchemy, geomancy, and spiritualism. The morals of its priests and nuns are notoriously low. Professor Douglas says, "Every trace of philosophy and truth has disappeared from it; and in place of the keen searchings after the infinite, to which Láo-tsze devoted himself, the highest ambition of his priestly followers is to learn how best to impose on their countrymen by the vainest of superstitions, and to practise on their credulity by tricks oflegerdemain." LAPSE, the slip or omission of a patron to present a clergyman to a benefice within six months after it becomes void.

LAPSED, The (lapsi), were those baptized and catholic Christians (under certain circumstances, also catechumens) who, in periods of persecution, either disavowed their faith publicly and explicitly, or, by means not recognized by Christian morals, eluded their duty of profession. There were, however, in the ancient Church, different opinions, both with respect to the definition of the fact itself, and with respect to its disciplinary treatment. The question ran through a long development, and did not arrive at a final answer until long after the time of Diocletian. Nevertheless, in the third century, and more especially in the years of the Decian and Valerian persecutions, the controversy reached its point of culmination.

Open profession is demanded in the Gospels, and a verdict of condemnation pronounced against such as disavow their faith (Matt. x. 33; Mark viii. 38; Luke ix. 26, xii. 9). The Epistle to the Hebrews and the First Epistle of Peter exhort to constancy under the sufferings of persecution. During the first century, however, the general state of affairs was quite favorable to the young congregations. The danger of relapses into Paganism or Judaism was not great; and, when it first showed itself, the congregations appeared to have courage to brave it. In the time of Trajan, the Roman officials knew very well that the true Christian could not be forced to participate in the Pagan sacrifices. (See the Letter of Pliny to Trajan.) The Christian apologists after Justin state, that, in general, the Christians continued faithful; and Roman and Greek writers of the second century—such as Marcus Aurelius, Lucian, Celsus, and others—speak often of the fanatical contempt of death evinced by the Christians. Indeed, a passion for martyrdom grew up in the congregations, looked upon with dissatisfaction by the more sober and self-controlled members. That martyrdom could become a duty was generally accepted throughout the Church: people only differed with respect to the point at which the duty entered. Some considered it legitimate to flee from persecution and martyrdom, while the Montanists declared that every true Christian should seek martyrdom. Nevertheless, it must not be overlooked, that, during the second and third centuries, the danger of relapse was really great. Many fell away, and their number increased with every new persecution. Pastor Hermas contains many striking illustrations of the effect which the persecutions of Trajan and Hadrian had on the congregation of Rome. He enumerates the various motives of apostasy, and notices that relapses occurred also in perfectly quiet times. What a disorganizing and almost dissolving influence the Decian and Valerian persecutions exercised is apparent from the letters of Cyprian, and his treatise, De lapsis. Eusebius throws a veil over the whole affair; but that which can be seen through the veil is sufficient to show that the number of apostates was fearful, and yet the amount of open apostasy was probably small in comparison with that of defection more or less concealed.

After 250, different classes of lapsi were distinguished,—sacrificati, who had sacrificed; thurificati, who had burned incense before the images of the gods; libellatici, who by bribery had procured a passport, or ticket, or letters-patent, exempting them from any further interference from the side of the officials; and traditores, who had delivered up their sacred books. At the same time a change took place in the disciplinary treatment of the lapsi. In the second century it was generally accepted throughout the Church that a Christian who had relapsed into idolatry could under no circumstances be re-admitted to the congregation. Repentance and penitence were not sufficient: only open profession under a new trial, and martyrdom, could blot out the guilt. But in the middle of the third century, milder views were adopted. In 250 Cyprian and the Roman clergy still felt uncertain about the question; but gradually the milder practice prevailed in the churches of Carthage, Rome, Alexandria, and Antioch, and between 251 and 325 a complete system of penitential rules was elaborated by the bishops. Not only was a distinction made between sacrificati and libellatici, etc., but regard was paid to the individual circumstances of each case, thus gradually transforming the penitential into a system of casuistry. The oldest and most important of such penitential decisions are the Liber de penitentia by Petrus Alexandrinus, the canones, 1-4 of the synod of Elvira (306), 1-9 of the synod of Ancyra (314), and 10-14 of the synod of Nicea (325). ADOLF HARNACK.

LARDNER, Nathaniel, b. at Hawkhurst, Kent, June 6, 1684; d. there July 24, 1768. He was educated at an academy in Hoxton Square, and at Utrecht, where, in 1699, he continued his studies. He then removed to Leyden for six months, and returned to London in 1703. He devoted himself for six years longer to those studies which made him so eminently learned. He was for a time chaplain to Lady Treby; and under her roof, after travelling in the Netherlands, he resided until the time of her death. Here he had ample opportunities for pursuing those researches which qualified him for the work he afterwards accomplished. No orator (indeed, very defective in elocution), he was unfitted to make an impression in the pulpit; and consequently the only charge he had in early life was an assistantship to his father, Mr. Richard Lardner. What still further incapacitated him for ministerial work was his extreme deafness; for he said, "When I sit in the pulpit, and the congregation is singing, I can hardly tell whether they are singing or not." His learning, however, eminently qualified him for lecturing; and in this important employment we find him engaged in 1723, when a course of lectures was "set on foot, on a Tuesday evening, for the purpose of stating and defending the evidences of natural and revealed religion." These lectures no doubt contained the germs of his great work on The Credibility of the Gospel History, which he published by degrees in two unequal parts. The first part appeared in 1727; the first volume of the second part, in 1733; the second volume of the second part, in 1735; the third volume of that part, in 1738; the fourth, in 1740; the fifth, in 1743; the sixth, in 1745; the seventh, in 1748; the eighth, in 1750; the ninth, in 1752; the tenth, in 1753; the eleventh, in 1754; and the twelfth, in 1755. The dates are interesting. Oaks do not grow like larches; and such a work as Lardner's was the work of a lifetime. There can be no doubt that the treasures of learning in reference to Christianity contained in these volumes have supplied capital not only for Paley, but a good many more. Indeed, Gibbon owed much to this author. Lardner published many other books besides his magnum opus, and particularly unfolded his views of the person of Christ in his True Doctrine of the New Testament on that subject, in which he says that the Logos who is "the divine power and wisdom," marvelously dwelt in the humanity of Jesus; that he was miraculously conceived, and possessed "divine qualities or perfections." We have not space to enumerate all which Lardner published; but it will be found in the handsome edition of his works in ten volumes, edited by Kippis in 1829. The history of his books is the history of his life; but it should be added that they attracted toward him learned men of all sorts, who, provided with pen and ink and paper, laboriously communicated with the poor deaf scholar. As to ecclesiastical government, he ranks with English Presbyterians. A life of him is prefixed to his works.

JOHN STOUGHTON.

LA SALLE, Jean Baptiste de, founder of the Ignorantines (see art.); b. at Rheims, 1651; d. at Rouen, 1719. He entered holy orders, took the degree of doctor of theology from the university of Paris, and became a canon at Rheims. In 1681 he began his free schools for youth; and so great was the success of his rules, that he founded a teaching order of religions. Benedict XIII. approved his design; and the order adopted the name Freres des Ecoles chrétiennes, otherwise known as Ignorantines. La Salle was canonized in 1852 by Pius IX. See his Life by Abbé Ayma, Aix, 1858.

LA SAUSSAYE, Daniel Chantepie de, Dutch theologian, b. at The Hague, Dec. 10, 1818; d. in Groningen, Feb. 13, 1874. He was educated at the university of Leyden. He was pastor at Leenwarde (1842-48), at Leyden (1848-62), at Rotterdam (1862-72), and in the latter year was appointed professor of biblical and dogmatical theology at Groningen. He received the degree of D.D. from Bonn, in 1858. His fame rests upon his distinguished services in combating the negative and rationalistic views of the Leyden school, especially its founder, J. H. Scholten. He was a fervent orator, impressed with the supernatural origin of Christianity, and eager in its defence. His works are not, however, of permanent value. See list in Lichtenberger's Encyclopédie des sciences religieuses, vol. xii. p. 692.

LASITIUS, Johannes (Jan Lasicky, or Lasicky), b. in 1534; d. about 1600. Of his personal life very little is known. Several years he spent in foreign countries, — as a student at the universities of Basel, Bern, and Zurich; as a tutor to young noblemen; and as a diplomatic agent. During his youth the Reformation reached Poland; and, though not a theologian, he devoted his life to the cause. He took a special interest in the Bohemian Brethren, settled since 1518 in Poland. He wrote an outline of their history, — De origine et institutis fratrum christ., etc. (1567-69), — and, afterwards, an elaborate work on the subject, De origine et rebus gestis Frat. Bohem., which, however, has never been published complete. Only a part of it has been printed by Amos Comenius, 1649.

WAGENMANN.

LASCO, Johannes à, or Jan Laski, b. in Warsaw, 1499; d. on his estate, near Krticic, Jan. 13, 1560. Descending from one of the oldest, richest, and most distinguished families of the Polish nobility, but a younger son, he was educated for the Church, and went, when twenty-five years old, abroad, to finish his education. He visited Louvain, Zurich (where he made the acquaintance of Zwingli), and Basel, where he lived in the house of Erasmus. Returning home in 1526, he was rapidly promoted; but when the king, in 1536, offered him the episcopal see of Cujavien, he declined, proclaimed his adoption of the Reformation, and left his native country. Frisia became his first field of labor in the cause of his new faith. In 1542 he was appointed pastor of Emden, and superintendent of the whole country. The situation was difficult: on the one side, the Roman Catholics with their intrigues; on the other, the sectarians with their violence. But A Lasco was possessed of a great talent for administration and organization; and in the course of a few years he succeeded in founding and consolidating the Frisian Church on Reformed principles, and with a strongly marked system of discipline. In 1549 the Interim drove him away, and he went to London, where he founded the Foreign Protestant Congregation, whose constitution—Forma ac ratio tota ecclesiastici Ministerii, etc., London, 1550—is an exceedingly interesting document. After the death of Edward VI. (in 1553) and the accession of Mary, that congregation was not allowed to live in London any longer. A Lasco hoped to find a safe refuge for his flock in Denmark; but having arrived at Elsinor in October, 1553, he learned that his congregation was even not permitted to stay in the country during the winter. Under unspeakable sufferings, they were ordered to proceed farther; and when they finally, at Christmas, landed at Rostock and Lübeck, new and still harder persecutions were raised against them from the side of the Lutheran clergy and magistrates. Not until Easter, 1554, A Lasco succeeded in bringing his flock in haven at Emden. While preparing himself to spend the rest of his life at Emden, an invitation arrived from Poland, calling him home. King Sigismund August was favorably inclined towards the Reformation, and in 1556 A Lasco was settled at Krtic as superintendent of the Reformed congregations of Little Poland. The principal fruit of his labors during those years was the Polish translation of the Bible, undertaken by a number of scholars under his supervision.

LIT.—The collected works of A Lasco were edited by A. Kuyper, Amsterdam, 1866, 2 vols. His life was written by Bortels (Elberfeld, 1861) [and Dalton (Gotha, 1881)]. See also KRASINSKI: Sketch of the Reformation in Poland, London, 1838, 2 vols.]. O. THELEMANN.

LATERAN CHURCH AND COUNCILS. The term "Lateran Councils" denotes generally all synods convened in the Lateran basilica in Rome, but refers more especially to those five which are recognized by the Church of Rome as œcumenical,—1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, and 1512. The name of the place points back to old Rome, one of whose most magnificent palaces was the Domus Lateranorum (Juvén. Sat., 10, 17), which Nero confiscated because a member of the family, Plautius Lateranus, had taken part in a conspiracy against him (Tacit. Annal., 15, 49, 53). Afterwards it was often inhabited by the emperors. Fausta, the second wife of Constantine, resided there. On the removal of the court to Constantinople, the emperor presented the Domus Fausta to the Bishop of Rome; and the successors of Sylvester lived there for nearly one thousand years,—until the emigration to Avignon. During that long period the structure was, of course, much altered: several chapels and basilicas were added. The old basilica, built by Constantine the Great, was originally dedicated to Christ the Saviour (Salvator), but came in the sixth century to bear the name of St. John the Baptist. It was also called "Basilica Constantina," after its founder; or "Basilica aurea," on account of its magnificence. It burnt down in the tenth century, and was rebuilt by Sergius III. The present structure dates from the middle of the seventeenth century. The Church of the Lateran is considered the mother-church of Christendom (Omnium Urbis et Orbis Ecclesiarum Mater et Caput). It is the Papal cathedral, and every new Pope takes possession of it with great solemnity.

The first Lateran council (in the narrower sense of the words) took place in 1123, under Calixtus III. (Mansi: Concil. Collect., xxi. 49). The concordat of Worms was confirmed; the indulgences granted to the crusaders by Urban II. were renewed; the consecrations performed by Burdin, the antipope, were annulled; the decrees against simony, marriage of the clergy, etc., were repeated. The second (1139), under Innocent II., laid the interdict upon King Roger of Sicily, excommunicated the Petrobrusians, and ordered Arnold of Brescia to keep silent (Mansi, xxi. 525). The third (1179), under Alexander III., decreed that a vote of two-thirds of the total conclave should be required to legitimately elect a pope (Mansi, xxii. 213). The fourth, convened by Innocent III. in 1215, is the most important of all the Lateran councils. Besides representatives of many princes, two Oriental patriarchs were present, four hundred and twelve bishops, and eight hundred abbots and priors. Seventy decrees were issued. The first, directed against the Cathari and Waldensians, contains a confession of faith, in which the term transubstantiatio occurs for the first time. The second decides the Trinitarian controversy between Petrus Lombardus and Joachim of Floris (in favor of the former). The thirteenth forbids the foundation of new monastical orders. The twenty-first demands that every faithful one shall confess at least once a year to his sacerdos proprius (Mansi, xxii. 953–1086). The fifth (1512–17), which is not recognized as œcumenical by the Gallican Church, abrogated, on the command of Julius II., the decrees of the council of Pisa.

LATHROP, Joseph, D.D., b. at Norwich, Conn., Oct. 20, 1731; d. at West Springfield, Mass., Dec. 31, 1820, where he had been settled since Aug. 25, 1756. He was a famous ecclesiastical arbiter, and a clear, simple, edifying preacher. He published seven volumes, mostly sermons, between 1796 and 1801, accompanying the series with an autobiography. Since then, there has been separately published his Exposition of the Epistle to the Ephesians, with Memoir by Dr. Sprague, Philadelphia, 1861.

LATIMER, Hugh, one of the most influential preachers, heroic martyrs, and foremost leaders of the English Reformation; b. at Threaston, Leicestershire, in 1490 or 1491; d. at the stake, in Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. His father was a yeoman, who, by Latimer's own testimony, "brought up his children in godliness and the fear of God" (First Sermon before Edward VI., Parker Society edition of his Sermons, p. 101). Entering Cambridge at the age of fourteen, he became fellow of Clare Hall in 1509. According to Strype, he was remarkable during his university career for the "sanctimony of his life." He was at that time a bitter opponent of the Reformation, and his bachelor's oration was directed against the views of Melancthon. Of this period he at a later time said from the pulpit, "I was as obstinate a Papist as any in England." Coming in contact, however, with Bilney, who heard his bachelor's oration, he was impressed with his confession of the faith of the Reformers, and finally accepted their views himself. As soon as his change of opinion became known, whole "swarms of friars and doctors," as Foxe puts it, "flocked against Master Latimer on every side." At Christmas, 1529, he delivered his famous sermons On the Card, in which he represents himself and congregation as playing at triumph,—a game of cards something like whist. These and other sermons attracted so much attention, and were so full of keen hits against the then state of the clergy in England, that the Bishop of Ely forbade him preaching in his diocese; but the Augustine friars opened their church to him, which was exempt from episcopal authority. The Papists appealed to Wolsey, who held a court at York to decide the case, but acquitted the accused. He was appointed by his university one of its representatives to examine into the lawfulness of the king's divorce, and was in favor of it. In 1530 (Dec. 1) he wrote to the king, pleading "for the restoring again of the free liberty of reading" the Scriptures. He was made a royal chaplain, and preached often in London, but was soon offered the rectory of West Kington, Wiltshire. While incumbent of this parish, he was cited to London, where he submitted to convocation. But Stokesly, the bishop of London, was so little satisfied, that he forbade his preaching in his diocese. In 1535 he was raised, through the influence of Anne Boleyn and Cromwell, to the see of Worcester, which he, however, administered only for four years. When the Six or Bloody Articles were passed (in 1539), which show a rebound of Henry's mind to Catholicism, he refused his assent, resigned his bishopric, and retired to the country. At a later time (1646) he was committed to the Tower, where, as he writes, he was "kept without fire in the frosty winter." Released, at the accession of Edward VI., he became a most ardent advocate of the principles of the Reformation from the pulpits of London. The offer of returning to his bishopric he refused, and became an occupant of the archiepiscopal palace as an adviser of Cranmer. After the accession of Mary, he was again committed to the Tower (September, 1553). With his fellow-prisoners, Archbishop Cranmer and Bishop Ridley, he was transferred to Oxford (April, 1554), where they were to hold disputations with representatives of the old views. Latimer was convicted of heresy, excommunicated, and committed to Bocardo, the common jail. Another trial, for the sake of formality, was had, and they were sentenced to death; the sentence hinging upon their denial of transubstantiation and the sacrifice of Christ in the mass. On Oct. 16, 1555, he was led forth, with Ridley, to the stake, in front of Balliol College. He met his fate with great heroism; and his manly words to his companion will always be remembered, with those of Tyndale at Vilvorde, as the most striking utterances of the English martyrs who suffered for their faith. "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley," he said: "play the man. We shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as, I trust, shall never be put out." His sufferings were soon brought to a close, while Ridley lingered for a considerable time.

Hugh Latimer was not a man of great learning; but his practical and bold advocacy of the principles of the Reformation made him one of the coryphæi of that movement; while his noble bearing in prison, and in the face of the flames, will forever enshrine him in the affections of his countrymen. With Hooper he was one of the most powerful preachers of his day in England. This power was derived from his bold temper, directness of statement, fearless denunciation of the extravagances of doctrine and immoralities of life of the clergy, and his sense of humor. Perhaps he approaches nearer than any of the English Reformers to Luther in the earnestness of his manner, the bluntness of his style, and the keen tone of his practical exhortations. "He spake nothing, but it left, as it were, certain pricks and stings in the hearts of his hearers, which moved them to consent to his doctrine. None but the stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart went away from his sermons without being affected with high detestation of sin," etc. (Becon: Jewel of Joy). He was plain of speech, and spared not the abuses of the Church of his day. He held, in general, to all the fundamental views of the Reformation,—the distinction of the Roman and the Catholic Church, the use of the vulgar tongue in worship, the abolition of the confessional, the spiritual conception of the sacraments, etc. One of the elements of his character upon which Dr. Tulloch lays just stress is his cheerfulness of temper. Mr. Froude, in an animated sketch of his trial and martyrdom, takes occasion to exclaim, "So stood the greatest man, perhaps, then living in the world, a prisoner on his trial, waiting to be condemned to death," etc.

LIT. — Latimer wrote no treatises, but has left behind some sermons, which are valuable as giving us an insight into his character. A complete edition of his works has been published by G. E. CORRIE, in 2 vols., Cambridge, 1844, 1845. LATIN LANGUAGE, Use of the, in the Christian Church. Because it is the universal religion, Christianity cannot, like Judaism and Mohammedanism, confine itself to one language. In the East, the Greek, Coptic, Armenian, Arabic, Slavonian languages are used. In the West, however, the Roman-Catholic Church protested against the introduction of the vernacular tongues in the service as a danger and a profanation. The Council of Trent (Sess. IV.) recognizes only the Vulgate, the Latin translation of the Bible, as the authentic text of Holy Writ in questions of doctrine, in cases of canon law, and in every-day use for devotional purposes and the cure of souls. Less exclusively the council expresses itself with respect to the use of the Latin language in the administration of the sacraments. It says, "Although the mass contains great instruction for the faithful people, nevertheless, it has not seemed expedient to the Fathers that it should be everywhere celebrated in the vulgar tongue." It enjoins, however, the explanation of the mysteries to the people, but anathematizes those who say "that the mass ought to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue only." (Sess. XXII. c. VIII. and can. ix. Compare Schaff, Creeeds, ii. 183, 186.)

It was quite natural that the Church of Rome should adopt the Latin language, and carry it with her wherever she went. And during the early middle ages, when the modern European languages did not exist, but had barely entered into the process of formation, it was, no doubt, a great boon to European civilization, that there was a common language in which all public business could be transacted. Into the dark and chaotic fermentation, Latin brought the necessary light and cohesion. But there came a change. The languages gradually ripened into maturity, and the nations began to demand to have their most sacred interests served in the most effectual way. At first the popes seemed willing to assent. No objection was made to the use of the vernacular tongue when Cyrillus and Methodius converted Bohemia. But it was soon discovered, that, in the exclusive use of the Latin language, the Church of Rome possessed one of her most effective means of consolidation, and consequently she immediately became very imperious in its defence. The reasons with which she vindicated her protest are often curious, sometimes cynical, seldom just: they have been aptly summed up by Bellarmin: Oper. iii. 119.

With the Reformation, the popular demand for the vernacular tongue in divine service became more general: it was heard even in regions whither the Reformation had not penetrated. In the Church of England the abrogation of the Latin language in the administration of the Lord's Supper was one of the first acts of the Reformers (see art. 24 in the Thirty-nine Articles). In the Lutheran churches, Latin liturgies were still used for some time, but gradually disappeared. Towards the close of the eighteenth century and in the beginning of the nineteenth, a movement arose among the Roman Catholics in Germany, for the introduction of German into their service; but it was speedily quelled by the clergy. LATITUDINARIANS, the designation of a school of opinion within the Church of England, which arose in the seventeenth century. It is applied, somewhat indefinitely, to men who differed quite widely in their theological opinions, and yet agreed in manifesting a spirit of toleration towards the Dissenters, and were willing to admit liberty in the use of the forms of the Episcopal Church, and even a revision of the Liturgy, in the hope of winning the Dissenters. They were thus at the opposite extreme from the High-Churchmen. In the doctrinal part of religion they laid emphasis upon the fundamentals. Hales and Chillingworth, Cudworth, Theophilus Gale, Whichcot, Tillotson, and perhaps Stillingleet, are among those who were classed as prominent representatives of this school. After the Restoration (1660) the school gained influence; some of its representatives being raised to high positions in the Church. The spiritual apathy and indifference in the Church of England in the eighteenth century has been pronounced as due to the influence of the Latitudinarians by Canon Perry (History of the English Church, student's edition, vol. ii. 514 sq.) and others, but without good reason, unless it is fair to class in the same school with Archbishop Tillotson and Cudworth men who approached very close to the Socinians and Deists. The modern representative of the Latitudinarians is the so-called "Broad Church" party in the Church of England. Those who are classed in this school are regarded as laying great stress upon the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and the Christian temper of the daily life, as opposed to that view which emphasizes unduly a rigid conformity to a ritual, and are consequently tolerant towards members of other communions. S. T. Coleridge, Dr. Arnold, Jul. Ch. Hare, F. W. Maurice, Charles Kingsley, and Dean Stanley have been among the distinguished representatives of the Broad Church party. See TULLOCH: Rational Theology and Christian Philosophy in England in the Seventeenth Century, Edinburgh, 1872, 2 vols., vol. ii. pp. 6 sqq.; CURTON: Latitudinarians from 1671 to 1787, London, 1861; and arts. LATOMUS is a name of frequent occurrence among the scholars of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Two have special theological interest. — Jacobus Latomus (JACQUES MASSON), b. at Cambrai, Hainault, in 1475; d. at Louvain, May 29, 1544. He studied theology in Paris, and was in 1514 appointed teacher of theology in the university of Louvain, and dean of St. Peter's. He was a zealous champion of scholasticism, more especially of the theology of Thomas, and attacked both the Humanists (especially Erasmus) and the Reformers, — Luther, Ecolampadius, Melancthon, and Tyndal. A collected edition of his works was published by his nephew, Jacobus Latomus, Louvain, 1550. — Bartholomæus Latomus, b. at Arlon, Luxemburg, in 1485; d. at Coblenz in 1566. He taught Latin at Treves; rhetoric at Cologne, Freiburg, and Paris; visited Italy in 1539; and was in 1541 appointed counsellor at the electoral court of Treves, residing at Coblenz. He was a philologist, but took also part in the theological controversies of the day, and wrote against Bucer, Andrea, and others: Briefe an J. Sturm über Kirchenspaltung u. Kircheneinigung, etc. WAGENMANN.

LAUD, William, Archbishop of Canterbury, and chief minister of state, in the reign of Charles I.; was b. Oct. 7, 1573, and d. (by the hands of the public executioner, under a bill of attainder, for high treason) Jan. 10, 1644. He was a native of Reading, Berks, where his father was a master cloth-weaver in good circumstances. His mother (by name, Lucy Webb) belonged to the same social class; and he could boast of an uncle, on the mother's side, who became lord-mayor of London, and received the honor of knighthood. Some of his enemies (among them William Pryune, the well-known Puritan, who early became a victim of Laud's implacable persecution) were used to say that he was born of "obscure parents,"—a charge, which, strangely enough, seems to have been peculiarly obnoxious to his feelings. Heylin, his chaplain and biographer, tells us, that, after Laud had attained to the primacy, he one day found him in his gardens at Lambeth, with more than ordinary trouble in his countenance, and was told by him that the cause was a printed sheet, which he had just received, reproaching him with "so base a parentage as if he had been raked out of a dunghill." The archbishop "added, withal, that, though he had not the good fortune to be born a gentleman, yet he thanked God he had been born of honest parents, who lived in a good condition, employed many poor people in their way, and left a good report behind them" (Cyprianus Anglicus, p. 43).

It was, however, chiefly to himself, rather than to any adventitious circumstances like those of birth, that William Laud owed the splendid success, no less than, it must be added, the grievous errors and terrible disasters, both personal and public, of one of the most remarkable careers in the history of England.

He received the elements of his education in the free grammar-school of his native town, under a "very severe schoolmaster," who, however, already found in him the promise of future distinction. At the age of sixteen he was entered as a commoner at St. John's College, Oxford, at which same college he obtained a scholarship in 1590 and a fellowship in 1594.

At college he was not only remarked for his ability, combined, it is said, with not a little self-confidence, but, under the most unfavorable circumstances, assumed the position in church policy which characterized his whole after-history. In no part of England had Puritanism, at the period now referred to, taken deeper root than at Oxford; what Heylin describes as the ultra Protestantism of that university having been chiefly due to the influence of Mr. Laurence Humphrey, president of Magdalen College, and professor of divinity. Laud was, Heylin says, of too stubborn a nature to give way to common opinions merely because they were common; and his studies in divinity had been "founded," as the same author states, "on the Holy Scriptures according to the glosses and interpretations of the ancient Fathers and other godly bishops of the primitive times." Accordingly, even in his college life, we find him asserting High-Church principles on every occasion, and already suspected of a leaning to Popery. When he was ordained, in 1601, by Young, Bishop of Rochester, the bishop "found his study raised above the system and opinions of the age, upon the noble foundation of the Fathers, councils, and ecclesiastical historians; and presaged, that, if he lived, he would be an instrument of restoring the Church from the narrow and private principles of modern times." It was not, however, in this spirit that his protests against the Church principles then in fashion were generally met. For some time after his admission to orders, a series of collisions with the university authorities followed every one of his public appearances in the university. A sermon delivered in 1606, in the pulpit of St. Mary's, is especially noted as having brought down upon him a vehement attack from the vice-chancellor, and a trial in the vice-chancellor's court, which, in some of its circumstances, is said to have presented, at the commencement of his life, a counterpart to the more public event of the same nature in which that life closed.

At this time Laud was without friends, or power, or influence; but, as regards his public position, a great change was in prospect. He had to wait longer for preferment in the Church, and especially at the hands of the court, than many men less able and less ambitious. Even after he became a royal chaplain, the influence of Abbot, his predecessor at Canterbury (who always distrusted him, chiefly owing to a suspicion of Romanist tendencies), long stood between Laud and the confidence of the king. Indeed, he had already reached his forty-third year before the attention of the court was directed towards him. Upon the whole, however, no man in the same position by native rank, ever received, from first to last, more numerous and more valuable appointments than Laud. In the University, the Church, and the State, he alike rose to the highest honors attainable by any English subject. Thus he became president of his own college of St. John's, Oxford, in 1611; and in 1628 he was appointed to the high office of chancellor of the university, in which latter capacity it was his duty and his pride to entertain, in 1636, the king and queen as his guests during a royal visit to Oxford. In the Church, as appears from entries in his diary, he must have early enjoyed large revenues from numerous benefices, many of them held in commendam, and retained even after he had been raised to the episcopal bench. But his principal preferments included the deanery of Gloucester (1616), the bishopric of St. David's (1621), the bishopric of Bath and Wells (1626), the deanery of the Chapel Royal (1626), the bishopric of London (1628), the deanery of Westminster, and the archbishopric of Canterbury and primacy of all England (1633). He was a statesman no less than a churchman, and in the State his advancement was equally signal. He became a privy counsellor in 1627, and from that time held various high appointments in the administration of civil affairs, culminating in his selection, in the year 1628, for the office of chief minister of the state; the death of the famous Duke of Buckingham by the hands of the assassin Felton having paved the way for an elevation unprecedented in the case of any English ecclesiastic since the fall of Wolsey.

At the height of his fortune, the position of the son of the clothier of Reading must have transcended the most daring aspirations of his youth. As primate he was the first peer of the realm, being next in dignity to royalty; and in his case the high honors always appertaining to the chief minister of the Church were greatly augmented by the secular offices, hardly less lofty, which he sustained at court. "English nobles and foreign ambassadors," says Dean Hook (p. 228), "paid their court to him at Lambeth. The interior courts of his palace were filled with men-at-arms and horsemen; and while holding a levee, or granting an interview, the archbishop himself held a court second only in grandeur to that of the king."

Above all, Laud reached an eminence, as regards power and influence, which could not fail to be peculiarly dear to him. It does not anywhere appear, that eager as he was for place, wealth, and honors, and indefatigable (perhaps not always very scrupulous) in their pursuit, he ever cared for them for their own sakes. He seems to have been altogether free from the sordid ambition of vulgar place-hunters. He spent most of his large revenues during his life in splendid benefactions to the Church and his own university. It is to his honor that he died comparatively a poor man, and that, as appears from his will, such money or lands as remained to him at his death he bequeathed, not for the enrichment of his own family, but chiefly for the encouragement of religion and learning. He sought honors and high place as the means of accomplishing public benefits, and more especially for the accomplishment of what he regarded as the true interests and welfare of the Church. In a great degree he gained the power of realizing, at least for a time, the dream of his college days. It is true that the results were disastrous, on the whole, at the moment at least, if not (for this is disputed) even in relation to the future; but, full of a great idea, he contrived to reach a place in the Church and in the State which enabled him for a time to make his will law.

What was his great aim throughout life can only be briefly indicated.

He had various projects apart from that pre-dominating design, and many of these he accomplished. Among them was the erection of new buildings at St. John's College, Oxford; the repair of St. Paul's Cathedral Church, London; the annexing, in perpetuity, some commendams to ill-endowed bishoprics; the increase of the income of poor curates; the setting-up a Greek press in London and in Oxford for the purpose of printing the library manuscripts (many of them his own munificent gifts); and the erection of an Arabic lecture at Oxford.

His great aim, however, was the re-organization of the Church of England as a whole, or its restoration, in doctrine and worship, to what he regarded as the purity of primitive times. It is not difficult to determine what was understood by Laud by primitive or patristic purity of worship and doctrine. He always disclaimed disloyalty to the Reformed Church of England, and any wish to restore Popery. At his trial he said, "I will die with these words in my mouth: that I never intended, much less endeavored . . . the bringing-in of Popish superstitions upon the true Protestant religion established in this kingdom." Nor have we any sufficient reason to impeach his honesty in this explicit disavowal of deliberate treachery. Neither, however, on the other hand, can it be reasonably questioned that the doctrines and usages, which, under the name of primitive or patristic Christianity, it was his great aim to introduce in the Church of England, were doctrines and usages unknown to the fathers of the English Reformation, and which in every case tended in one direction, and that direction Romanism. If not a Papist at heart, as so many (probably, in the strictest sense of the term, without warrant) suspected, it is at least very evident that all his predilections, as all his actual changes in church policy, were in favor of the sacramentarian principles and ceremonial observances of the Church of Rome, — a church he always regarded, as, in his own words, "a true Church," "a Church which had never erred in fundamentals," "a true, but not an orthodox Church." All his innovations showed the same tendency. His own friends acknowledged that there was some difficulty in reconciling some of his proceedings with his professed character. "I would I knew where to find you," wrote Joseph Hall from Cambridge. "To-day you are in the tents of the Romanists, to-morrow in ours, the next day between both, against both." The truth appears to have been, that, while disavowing the authority of the Pope, the Church for which, under the name of the Church of England, Laud labored and suffered, would, if his own ideal had been fully carried out, have been Romanist in almost every thing but the name.

That some, at least, of the ceremonies and other innovations introduced by him, were at all events contrary to, or an advance upon, Protestantism, is, though denied by himself (Troubles and Trial, — Porks, iii., 437), both admitted and insisted on by the modern representatives of the school of which he is the chief founder. "Laud's immediate acts and aims," writes Canon Moseley, in his able sketch of the life of Laud, "were most practical; and a great practical rise of the English Church was the effect of his career. . . . The Holy Table in all our churches, altar-wise, at the east end, is a visible memorial of Laud, which none can escape. It was not so before his time. it is not necessarily so by the rubric of our Church at this moment. . . . That any one of Catholic predilections can belong to the English Church is owing, so far as we can see, to Laud."

But it is for the means he employed to carry it out, much more than for the aim he set before him, which was in itself, from an English Churchman's point of view, legitimate enough, that Laud will be generally condemned. The attempt to restore the Church by silencing Puritans and all nonconformists, as the indispensable condition of such a restoration, was the first principle of the Laudian policy. "The holy Church," wrote Wren, bishop of Norwich, "subsists not without the communion of saints. No communion with them, without union among ourselves. That union impossible, unless we preserve a uniformity for doctrine and a uniformity for discipline." (See Gardiner: Fall of the Monarchy, vol. i. p. 2.) The fact now referred to is of itself sufficient; and it is hardly necessary to go into the question, how, under Laud's rule, the repression of the nonconformists was carried out. He is said to have preferred persuasion to force; but it is not denied, that, when necessary, the most horrible severities were employed under his sanction to enforce conformity. The cases of Leighton, Prynne, Bostwick, and Burton, are well known, with hundreds of cases of dissenters, who, if not shockingly mutilated, and condemned to perpetual imprisonment, were silenced, and compelled to seek liberty of conscience beyond seas, or, worse than all, to violate their own sense of duty, and lose their spiritual, in seeking to save their bodily, life and well-being. Nor is it disputed, that of the Star Chamber and Court of High Commission, by which these men were condemned, Laud was the moving spirit; nay, that if, in these courts, any voice was for more than ordinarily severe measures, it was sure to be his (Gardiner: Personal History, i. 6). But perhaps the worst charge against Laud in this connection is the alleged fact, that to gain the power of suppressing the non-conformists, and otherwise securing the restoration of a pure and catholic church according to his own ideal, Laud did not hesitate to encourage in the king those absolute principles, which, if he had prevailed, instead of the Parliament, would have been fatal to the liberties of the English people.

It need only be here further noted, that Laud's prudence and sagacity were not by any means equal to his zeal as a statesman. Good intentions and bad management were said to be his characteristics. His whole life's dream as to a united church in England was visionary and impracticable. But perhaps his unfitness for public affairs was never better illustrated than in his disastrous attempt to bring Scotland into the scheme of uniformity. The history of the Scottish canons of 1636 and the Scottish liturgy of 1637 cannot here be told at length. It was a delicate undertaking to introduce episcopacy into Scotland, and could only have been accomplished warily. But no prudence was exercised by Laud. The new canons and the new liturgy were open to two insuperable objections. In their subject-matter they were opposed to all the prepossessions of a people brought up in Presbyterianism; and, as regards the way in which they were introduced, they were especially obnoxious, having been founded on the royal prerogative alone, without consent of any of the national judicatories, who had, indeed, not been consulted. In Scotland, defeat and disgrace attended the policy of the archbishop, and by reasonable men nothing else could have been expected. It is an instructive fact, that, twenty years before the fatal Edinburgh riots of 1637, the same course, which, unhappily for himself, was adopted by Charles I., had been recommended by Laud to James I., who, however, had, with all his foolishness, too much sagacity to follow it, and afterwards expressed his judgment of its adviser. "The truth is," he said when an appointment to a vacant bishopric was in question, "that I keep back Laud from all place of rule and authority, because he hath a restless spirit, and cannot see when matters are well, but loves to toss and change, and to bring things to a pitch of reformation floating in his own brain, which may endanger the steadfastness of that which is in good pass, God be praised! I speak not at random. He hath made himself known to me to be such a one; for when, three years since, I had obtained of the Assembly of Perth to consent to five articles of order and decency in correspondence with this Church of England, and gave them promise . . . I would try their obedience no further ament ecclesiastical affairs, nor put them out of their own way, which custom had made pleasing to them, with any new encroachments, yet this man hath pressed me to invite them to a nearer conjunction with the liturgy and canons of this nation; but I sent him back again with the frivolous draught he had drawn" (Bishop Hacket's Memorial of John Williams, D.D., p. 64).

The circumstances attending the death of Laud will be found fully detailed in his Troubles and Trial, as written by himself in the Tower of London, and in the Appendix, printed along with that narrative, by its editor, H. Wharton, which also includes his speech on the scaffold. These documents form two volumes of the last and most complete edition of his works. His death was every way worthy of one, who, whatever may have been his faults, was unquestionably a great, and in many respects a good man. His last words avouched his loyalty to the Church of England. "The last particular, for I am not willing to be too long, is," he said, "myself. I was born and baptized in the Church of England, established by law, and in that I come now to die." After he had laid his head upon the block, he cried aloud, "Lord, receive my soul." This was the signal agreed upon with the executioner; and, as the words were spoken, his head was separated from his body at a single blow. It was his wish that he might be buried in his own college; and though first interred in the Church of All Hallows, near the Tower, his remains were, after the Restoration, transferred to the Chapel of St. John's, Oxford, and there deposited beneath the altar.

He was a little man, of staid and cold manners, but in temper hasty and arrogant. He never married. His life, impeached by Prynne on the authority of some ambiguous expressions in his Diary and Private Devotions, appears to have been pure. Judging him by the prayers which he had composed for his secret use, he must have been a man of singular devoutness of spirit. As has already appeared, he was often rash and precipitate in public affairs: though otherwise his capacity for high office, whether in Church or State, was very great. How far he deserved well of his Church and country as regards, if not the results, at least the intentions, of his policy, is a question on which there will always be difference of opinion.

His principal writings are: a Conference with Fisher, a Jesuit, published in 1628; Answer to the Speech of Lord Saye and Seale touching the Liturgy, 1635; Seven Sermons preached on Public Occasions, 1651; A Summarie of Devotions, compiled and used by Dr. William Laud, now published according to the Copy written with his own Hand, 1667; History of the Troubles and Tryal of the most Reverend Father in God and Blessed Martyr William Laud, written by Himself, 1695; several Speeches, and his Letters [very important, especially those to Lord Strafford].

WILLIAM LEE.

LAUNAY, Pierre de, b. at Blois in 1573; d. in Paris, June 29, 1661. He held an important position in the civil service of his country, but retired in 1613 into private life, and devoted his whole time to the study of the Bible. He wrote paraphrases of the Epistles of Paul, the prophet Daniel, etc.; carried on a long controversy with Amyraut concerning Chiliasm, of which he was an ardent adherent; and partook with great zeal in the general life of the Reformed Church in France. His principal work, however, was not published until after his death, — Remarques sur le texte de la Bible, Geneva, 1667. This work cost him twenty years of labor. It is intended to explain the difficult words, phrases, and figures of the Bible by grouping them together under appropriate heads, and translating them with their context, without commenting, or giving grammatical explanations. It has its uses still, although, of course, largely superseded.

LAUNOI, Jean de, b. at Valognes, in Normandy, Dec. 21, 1603; d. in Paris, March 10, 1678. He was ordained a priest in 1633, and took his degree as doctor of divinity in 1636; but he never held a benefice. He lived in retirement, and devoted himself exclusively to literature. His principal works treat of historical subjects, and were written partly in defence of the liberties of the Gallican Church, partly in pursuit of general critical principles, attacking titles to sainthood, apostolical foundation, etc. His method he defended in his De autoritate negantis argumenti, 1653. A list of his works is found in E. DU PIN: Nouvelle Bibliothèque des Auteurs Ecclésiastiques, xviii. p. 58.

LAURA, like cœnobium, denotes a monastic community, but with the difference, that, in the laura, the cells are separate structures, and the inmates live in solitude, meeting each other only on the first and last days of the week for common services in the chapel. Thus the laura, which was found only in Egypt, Syria, and Palestine, forms a transition between the hermitage and the cœnobium, or monastery. The etymology of the word is uncertain. The most probable derivation is from labra (λάβρα), a term frequently used in Alexandria for an alley or small court.

LAURENTIUS, St., a pupil of Sixtus II., deacon of the Church of Rome: was martyred in the Valerian persecution (258) a few days after his master. The Roman prefect, having heard that the Christian Church was in possession of great treasures, demanded that Laurentius should surrender them. Laurentius seemed willing to comply with the demand, was released, and returning with a host of old, poor, and sick people, paupers and cripples, said, "There are our treasures." The prefect felt insulted, and sentenced Laurentius to be roasted to death over a slow fire; and the Christians of Rome actually saw and heard how "his living limbs hissed over the coals." His festival is celebrated on Aug. 10. See AMBROSE: De offic. ministr., i. 41, ii. 28; and PRUDENTIUS: Hymn. in Laur.

TH. PRESSEL.

LAURENTIUS, antipope to Symmachus (498). He was an arch-presbyter in Rome, and the choice of the imperial party, and was actually ordained by the Bishop of Rome (Nov. 22, 498) as successor of Anastasius II. The Roman party chose Symmachus. The decision was left to Theodoric, king of the Ostro-Goths, who decided in favor of Symmachus; and Laurentius was made bishop of Nocera (498); but, principally in consequence of his machinations against Symmachus, although the charge of Eutychanism was brought against him, he was deposed (501), and died in exile about 520.

LAURENTIUS VALLA (Lorenzo della Valle), humanist, philologist, exegete, and critic; b. in Rome, 1406 or 1407; d. there Aug. 1, 1457. He received a very careful education; was ordained priest in 1431; published in the same year his first book, Dialogi III. de voluptate, which attracted much attention; and was appointed professor eloquentiæ at the university of Pavia, where he published the two famous books, Quæstiones dialecticæ and De elegantia Latini sermonis, — open denunciations of the logic taught in the schools and of the style employed in literature. The professors became furious, not only the theologians, but also the philosophers and the jurists. Valla left Pavia, and for some time he led a rather erratic life in Milan, Genoa, and Florence, until, in 1436, he entered the service of King Alfonso V. of Aragon, as his secretary. As the king sided with the Council of Basel against Pope Eugenius IV., Laurentius saw fit to publish his book, Declamatio de falso credita et ementita Constantini donatione. In 1442 Alfonso took possession of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, and Laurentius took up his abode in Naples. But his denial of the genuineness of the correspondence between Christ and King Abgarus, and of the Epistola Lentuli, and his further denial of the apostolical authorship of the Symbolum apostolicum, and of the identity of Dionysius of Athens with the author of the "areopagitical" writings, exasperated the monks and priests and professors to such a degree, that he was summoned before the Inquisition. The king saved him. No process was instituted; and Laurentius went on increasing the scandal by furnishing a list of errors found in the Vulgate, of mistakes made by St. Jerome, of heresies picked from the writings of St. Augustine. Nevertheless, he wished to quit Naples, and live in Rome. The first attempt he made of settling there, in 1444, when Eugenius and Alfonso had been reconciled, failed, as the lower clergy incited the mob against him; and he was compelled to flee. But in 1447, after the accession of Nicholas V., he succeeded in getting a foothold in Rome; and he remained there to his death, translating the Iliad, Thucydides, etc., and carrying on his controversy with Poggio, — Invectiva in Vallam, Antidoti in Poggium (two books so rude, so coarse, so indecent, that it is rather hard to understand how such things could be written and published at the papal court; and yet Antidoti in Poggium was dedicated to the Pope, and its author was appointed Secretarius apostolicus). Among the Italian humanists, Laurentius Valla occupies a place of his own. He was not only a philologist or an archaeologist, he was a critic, and an excellent critic; and it is not altogether without reason that Bellarmine designates him as a præcursor Lutheri. His works were among the first which the newly invented printing-press spread over the world. His Declamatio was first printed without date or place, and then, in 1517, by Hutten, with a dedication to Leo X. Erasmus edited his Annotationes in N. T., Paris, 1505. Collected editions of his works (though not complete) appeared at Basel, 1540-43, and Venice, 1592.

LAVATER, Johann Kaspar, a distinguished Swiss divine, poet, physiognomist, and philanthropist; the twelfth child of a physician; b. in Zürich, Nov. 15, 1741; d. in Zürich, Jan. 2, 1801. As a child he was awkward, dreamy, and misunderstood. He early displayed a decided religious nature, and devoted much time to the study of the Bible. After studying theology in Zürich, he became widely known by his spirited denunciation of the landvoegt, Felix Grebel, for malversation of office; which resulted in the latter's laying down his office. In 1763 he went, in company with two friends, to Germany, and studied with Spalding in Pomerania, — the best representative of the Pietistic revival. It was not till 1768 that he received his first appointment as deacon of the church at the Orphan-house at Zürich. In 1786 he became pastor of the great St. Peter's Church. He was very popular as a preacher, effective as a pastor, and beloved as a man; so that no inducement — not even the flattering call to the Aungar Church, Bremen, 1786 — was strong enough to lure him away from Zürich. His sermons, many of which were published, are not models, but are characterized by earnestness, biblical unction, and clear testimony to Jesus Christ. He attracted a large circle of friends, both at home and abroad. Not to speak of others, we mention Goethe, Herder, Hamann, Fr. Stolberg, Oberlin, and Hasenkamp, with whom he maintained a regular correspondence; and that with Goethe, Herder, and Hasenkamp, has been published. Goethe once said of him, "He is the best, greatest, wisest, and sincerest of all the men that I know." But after Lavater's visit to him in Weimar, in 1786, their friendship cooled.

Lavater was a voluminous writer, but his greatness does not depend upon his literary achievements. He wrote far too much and too superficially. He is himself guilty of the gossipy, "night-gown style" (Schlafrockmanier) which he condemned in others. Nevertheless, many a rich gold vein glitters from the dull quartz of his composition. He made his début as a poet, and continued to write poetry till his dying hour. He composed many hymns; the best-known collection of which appeared under the title, 200 christl. Lieder ("Two Hundred Christian Hymns"). [One of his best, which is very popular where German congregations meet, is O Jesus Christus, wach in mir ("O Jesus Christ, grow thou in me").] With Klopstock for a master, he composed the Apocalypse (1780), and paraphrases of the Gospels and Epistles in epic verse [Jesus Messias, oder d. Evangelien u. Apostelgesch. in Gesängen, 1783-86]. He was engaged for a long time over a philosophical poem on the future life, but published in its stead four volumes under the title Aussichten in d. Ewigkeit ("Outlooks into Eternity"), in which he gives his imagination the rein, and pictures a good many things about which the Bible is silent. He excelled most, however, as a composer of brief proverbial lines, and published several volumes of this kind, — Solomon (or doctrines of wisdom), 1785, and Vermischte unphysiognomischen Regeln zur Menschenkenntniss, 1787-88 ("Miscellaneous Unphysiognomic Rules for judging of Men"), which have not been surpassed. Lavater wrote extensively in the department of the practical philosophy of life. In this connection it is interesting to note his relations with Mendelssohn the philosopher. Lavater had translated Bonnet's Palingenesis, and, regarding his arguments for God's existence irrefutable, he dedicated the book to Mendelssohn, with the demand that he should either refute the arguments, or honorably acknowledge the truth, and become a Christian. To this the philosopher very coolly replied, that his religion, philosophy, and civil relations, alike obliged him to avoid controversies about the merits of particular religions. His greatest work, and the one by which his name is best known to the world, was the Physiognomische Fragmente z. Beförderung d. Menschenkenntniss u. Menschenliebe ("Physiognomic Fragments to advance the Knowledge of Men and Love amongst Men"), which appeared in four large volumes (1775-78), enriched with innumerable pictures and silhouettes. The author here seeks to build up a science of physiognomy from the judgments which men form from the lineaments of the face. He started from the principle that these correspond to the feelings of the heart. The manuscript was sent to Goethe, who added some sections; as, for example, the one on the physiognomies of animals. Lavater was confident that his work would contribute to the welfare of mankind, and spent not only much labor, but much of his income, upon it, and in gathering a collection of engravings, silhouettes, etc., of celebrated men, which is said to be preserved to this day in Vienna. Of his other writings, Pontius Pilatus (1782-85, 4 vols.) and Nathanael (1786) are to be mentioned. Both are apologetic. The former answered Pilate's question, "What is truth?" from the teachings of Christ about God, the Devil, the Son of God, the forgiveness of sins, etc.: the latter, directed to persons of honest hearts, adduces those who believed in Christ as the witnesses for the power of his gospel. Besides these works, he wrote a great number of smaller works of a devotional character, some of which are used to this day.

Lavater was a strictly evangelical divine, and became the object of ridicule from some quarters by his strict views of inspiration, the gifts of the Spirit, the value of prayer, etc. He avoided dogmatic forms of expression, and laid far more stress on biblical than on theological orthodoxy. He was also an ardent patriot, and, during the French Revolution and the subsequent wars, took a bold course against the rule of the French in Switzerland. He was taken prisoner, for a patriotic sermon, to Basel. His return to Zürich, on the 16th of August, 1799, was hailed by a general jubilation; but, after the battle with Massena in Zürich (Sept. 25), he was shot through the breast by a French grenadier, without provocation and while engaged on an errand of mercy. He lingered on for more than a year, suffering the most acute pains, but active with his pen almost up to the day of his death. Different judgments were passed upon Lavater during his life: but, with all his faults, he was a religious genius of the first order, and, in a time of religious dearth, scattered the seed of life with apostolic zeal. Mörkofer, who knew most about him, could honestly say, that, from the beginning to the end, he was a man of strong individuality, strong will, and undaunted courage, and, as a living embodiment of Christian truth and temper, the most important man of his century. Lives of Lavater have been written by GESSNER (Zürich, 1802, 3 vols.), HERBST (Ausbach, 1832), BODEMANN (Gotha, 1856; 2d ed., 1877 sq.), and especially MÖRKOFFER, in his Schweizerische Literatur d. 18. Jahrhunderts, pp. 322-400, Leipzig, 1861. Von Orelli edited a selection from his works in eight small volumes, Zürich, 1845. JUSTUS HEER.

LAVER. The laver which stood in the court of the Israelitish sanctuary, between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, was a round brass vessel, with open top, and stood on feet of brass. It served for the washing of the hands and feet of the priests when they went into the tabernacle, or when they came near to the altar to minister, "that they die not." This symbolic ceremony of purification was to remind them always that they were to come before the Lord cleansed from all defilements which occur in the daily transactions of life, and that they were not to enter the tabernacle with un sanctified feet, nor were they to minister with unholy hands, which would be a sacrilege of the most holy, worthy of death (comp. Exod. xxx. 17 sq., xxxviii. 8, xl. 7, 11, 30). On the anointing and sanctification of the laver, see Exod. xxx. 28; Lev. viii. 11. According to Exod. xxxv. 24 sq., xxxviii. 8, the women who served in the sanctuary furnished the material by dedicating the brass of their brazen looking-glasses. Such glasses were fastened somewhere to the laver, to serve the priests as an admonishing symbol that purification and sanctification must be preceded by self-examination. The Septuagint and Samaritan Pentateuch have in Num. iv. 14, an additional passage, which prescribes that the laver was to be packed in a purple cloth, protected by a skin covering. In Solomon's temple there were ten lavers (1 Kings vii. 38). LEYRER.

LAW, William, b. at King's Cliffe, Northamptonshire, 1686, d. there April 9, 1761; one of the most eminent English writers on practical divinity in the eighteenth century. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, of which he became fellow, and in 1711 received holy orders. He was a fearless non-juror, and, in consequence of his refusal to take the oaths of allegiance and abjuration on the accession of George I., forfeited his fellowship, and all prospects of advancement in the Church. His days were passed chiefly in retirement and meditation, in literary labors, and in good works. He died, in full vigor of mind, and in raptures of holy joy, at the age of seventy-five. Law was a man of genius, a saint, and a writer of great power. He was also a genuine mystic, although he lived in a very worldly and rationalistic age. He seemed, indeed, strangely out of place in the eighteenth century. "To come across such a man in the midst of his surroundings is like coming across an old Gothic cathedral, with its air of calm grandeur and mellowed beauty, in the midst of the staring red-brick buildings of a brand-new manufacturing town," says Mr. Overton, his latest and best biographer.

Law is best known by his Serious Call, a work of singular power. With the exception of The Pilgrim's Progress, no book on practical religion in the language has, perhaps, been so highly praised. Gibbon, Dr. Johnson, Doddridge, and John Wesley, vie with each other in commending it as a masterpiece. At one time, Law was a kind of oracle with Wesley, and his influence upon early Methodism was of an almost formative character. Afterwards a rupture occurred between these two great and good men. In his later years, Law became an enthusiastic student of Jacob Behmen, the pious, simple-hearted Teutonic theosophist; but his strong churchly feeling and his sound English sense kept him from the wild errors and extravagances into which some of Behmen's disciples fell. In The Spirit of Prayer and The Spirit of Love, Law unfolds his mystical views, and answers the objections which had been made to them. They are remarkable works, and abound in passages of uncommon spiritual force and beauty. Law died, as he had lived, urging upon all Christian men, especially upon the clergy, his favorite doctrine, that "nothing godly can be alive in us but what has all its life from the Spirit of God living and breathing in us." See J. H. OVERTON: William Law, London, 1881. G. L. PRENTISS.

LAY BAPTISM. See BAPTISM.

LAY BROTHERS. See MONASTICISM.

LAY COMMUNION, as a technical term, denotes reduction to the state of a layman, as a punishment inflicted upon clergymen for certain offences, which in laymen would be punished by suspension. As has been amply shown by Rev. W. E. Scudamore, in Smith and Cheetham's Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, it has "no immediate reference to the reception of the Eucharist:" it does not mean communion in one kind; it simply means to be deprived of office, to be forbidden to exercise clerical functions, to be reduced to the state of a layman.

LAY PREACHING. Since the original and proper status of every Christian is that of a priest, there was primitively no such distinction between clergy and laity as afterwards prevailed. Hence it is inaccurate to speak of lay preaching in the apostolic age, as if there was any other kind. The truth is, that, in the primitive Christian Church, the obligation to preach the gospel was felt by every member. Our Lord sent seventy of his disciples "before his face, into every city and place whither he himself would come" (Luke x. 1); and the Church believed that it had the same duty of preparing his coming to perform. Accordingly, when the Jerusalem Church was dispersed by the persecution which arose after Stephen's death, "they that were scattered abroad went about preaching the word" (Acts viii. 4, xi. 19). Without any explicit mention of the fact in the New Testament, it is evident that the believers did not wait for the apostles to precede or accompany them. One church (Antioch), at all events, probably did not receive an apostolic visit until it had been several years in existence (Acts xi. 19-26). The same, in all probability, was true of the church at Rome and at many other places. Doubtless, the greater simplicity of primitive church worship encouraged unofficial effort in their assemblies, which resembled our prayer-meetings more than our Lord's Day worship; and the energy of their faith and the fervor of their love sent them forth to preach the Saviour. Hatch says, "It is clear, from both the Acts of the Apostles and St. Paul's Epistles, that 'liberty of prophesying' prevailed in the apostolic age. It is equally clear that [it] existed after the apostolic age. In the first place, one of the most interesting monuments of the second century consists of a sermon or homily [the so-called Second Epistle of Clement], which was preached, probably, by a layman at Rome. In the second place, the Apostolical Constitutions [8, 31], which are of even later date, expressly contemplate the existence of preaching by laymen. 'Even if a teacher be a layman, still if he be skilled in the word, and reverent in habit, let him teach'" (Organization of the Early Christian Church, pp. 114, 115). But "little by little those members of the Christian churches who did not hold office were excluded from the performance of almost all ecclesiastical functions. At first a layman might not preach if a bishop were present, and then not if any church-officer was present, and finally not at all" (Hatch, p. 124). Here and there one was found who asserted his right to be heard. Origen (d. 254), while a layman, preached before the Bishop of Casarea. Tertullian (d. 245) maintained in its fullest sense the priesthood of all Christians, and their consequent right to teach; for he says, "Are not we laics priests? It is written, 'A kingdom also, and priests to his God and Father, hath he made us.' It is the authority of the Church, and the honor which has acquired sanctity through the joint session of the order, which has established the difference between the order and the laity. Where three are, a church is, albeit they be laics" (De Ex. Cast., vii.). Lay preaching was likewise defended by Augustine and Chrysostom. It seems to have been first prohibited by Leo the Great, in the interests of ecclesiastical order. (See Hatch, p. 115 n.) But preaching died out in the Catholic Church, until the preaching orders, such as the Dominican and Franciscan (which were composed of laymen), revived the practice in the thirteenth century. In the various sects which from time to time broke loose from the trammels of the Catholic Church, lay effort in promulgating their tenets was rehcd upon; and when the Protestant, especially the Calvinistic, churches arose, lay preaching was again sanctioned. Martin Chemnitz, Johann Arndt, and Johann Gerhard, among the Lutherans, defended it; and they were by no means alone. Pietism in the seventeenth century took it up, and thus in some quarters threw it into disfavor. Wesley was the great restorer of lay preaching. The wonderful movement he inaugurated would have completely failed, had he trusted entirely to an ordained ministry. But he wisely allowed great liberty to all who were piously inclined, and gifted in speech; and the consequence was, that Methodism marvellously spread. (See LOCAL PREACHERS.) In quite modern times several lay preachers (e.g., Moody, Brownlow North, Murphy) have achieved good celebrity.

The lay preacher has the amplest scriptural warrant; and he has several manifest advantages over the regular minister, as that the reproach of being paid to uphold a certain doctrine does not lie against him, and that he will naturally be more in sympathy with those whom he addresses, for he will be more or less practically acquainted with their businesses or occupations. But to offset these advantages are certain disadvantages, such as an uncritical, and therefore probably defective, knowledge of the Bible, causing him to trust implicitly to the letter of his vernacular Scriptures, even when the translation is confessedly inaccurate; a lack of systematic training in logic and rhetoric, leading to undue emphasis upon popular, and yet, it may be, flimsy arguments in defence of Christianity; a lack of appreciation of scholarship, followed, probably, by resentment at views differing from the traditional. The lay preacher is, of course, beset by the same temptations as the ordained minister. If he is successful in attracting attention, he is tempted to attribute too little to God, and to be puffed up by his success. On the other hand, if he is not successful, he is tempted to attribute the failure to malign influences, rather than to his lack of ability.

Lay preaching is an adjunct to clerical preaching, not a substitute for it. In the hands of wise and devout ministers, the lay preacher can be a powerful agent for God; but, if ill directed, he becomes a power for the spread of bigotry, fanaticism, and cant.

LAY REPRESENTATION. The right of the laity to a voice in the government of the church was recognized in apostolic times; for lay elders and deacons were chosen in and by each congregation, subject to the approval of the apostles. In the apostolic council of Jerusalem the entire church participated. But, with the rise of sacerdotalism, the laity declined in power, until they were entirely ignored in the church councils; indeed, the Council of Trent anathematizes the Scripture idea of the priesthood of all believers. Luther broke the string which tied the tongue of the laity, and introduced the novelty of lay representation. It is not yet realized in all denominations; although all, or at least nearly all, the churches in America provide for it. In Germany and other Lutheran countries, the Lutheran Church is governed by boards (consistories), composed of clergy and laymen. In England, the church is governed by laymen, so far as its affairs are controlled by the Crown and Parliament. In Ireland, laymen are regularly sent to the church convocations. In the Episcopal Church of the United States, three lay delegates are sent from each parish to the annual diocesan convention. In the general convention, which meets every three years, there is, in the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies, an equal number of clerical and lay delegates, elected by the diocesan conventions.

In the Presbyterian churches throughout the world, the laity have representation in (1) the Session, composed of the pastor and the elders, both elected by the congregation; (2) in Presbytery, composed of the ministers, and one elder from each congregation in a certain district; (3) in Synod, composed of all the ministers and one elder from each congregation, in a larger district embracing several presbyteries; (4) in General Assembly, composed of ministers and elders in equal numbers, elected by Presbytery. In the Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, similar courts exist; but they are named differently, being called Consistory, Classis, Particular Synod, and General Synod respectively. The constitution of the first two is similar to that just described. The two last are delegate bodies, and so the laity have less numerous representatives; but, as the number of ministers and elders is equal, they have more equable representation.

In churches of the Congregational order (Congregationalists, Baptists, Universalists, Unitarians) the laity have full representation. In the Wesleyan-Methodist Church of England there is no lay representation; but in the Methodist-Episcopal Church in the United States there are one or two lay delegates for each annual conference, chosen by an electoral conference of laymen, composed of one layman from each circuit or station within the bounds of the annual conference; such laymen being chosen by the preceding quarterly conference. The lay and ministerial delegates sit together, but may vote separately.

LAZARISTS, a congregation of the Roman-Catholic Church, founded in 1624 by St. Vincent de Paul, authorized to reside and labor in France in 1627, and confirmed as an independent religious order by Urban VIII. Their original name was "Priests of the Mission." The name of "Lazarists" originated from the house in Paris, Collège de St. Lazare, which they obtained in 1632. Their objects were to do mission-work among the rural population and in foreign countries, especially Barbary, and to educate young priests. At the time of the outbreak of the revolution, the congregation numbered eleven hundred and ninety-five members, and had sixty-three establishments in France, and as many in foreign countries, especially in Poland. Dissolved by the Convention, the congregation was restored by Napoleon in 1804; again dissolved in 1809, it was again restored in 1816.

LEADE, Jane, founder of the Philadelphian Society; b. in Norfolk, Eng., 1623; d. in London, Aug. 19, 1701. Her maiden name was Ward; but she married William Leade, her first cousin, in 1644. Her conversion took place in her sixteenth year; and she at once gave herself up to a life of prayer and meditation. Her married life was happy and blessed. But in 1670 her husband died, her fortune was lost to her by treachery, and thus her mystical tendency was confirmed by poverty and loneliness. She joined a congregation of mystics in London (among whom was Dr. Pordage), in obedience to visions, as she claimed, and became their leader. In 1670 she founded the Philadelphian Society (see art.), and in 1680 she began to publish her revelations, and interpretations of Scripture. In 1699 she became blind, but her visions continued. When she perceived her end drawing near, she dictated her own funeral sermon. Her numerous writings are in the line of Bohme's, — very chiliastic (she prophesied the coming of Christ would take place about 1700), very mystical, often obscure. She labored by means of them to form a society of true Christians gathered from all sects. Her writings are at present very scarce. Perhaps the best of them are The Wonders of God's Creation manifested in the Variety of Eight Worlds, as they were made known experimentally to the Author (London, 1695), and The Tree of Faith (1696). See PHILADELPHIAN SOCIETY, and, for a complete list and analysis of her writings, see HOCUTTU: Jane Leade und die philadelphische Gemeinde in England, in Zeitschrift für die hist. Theologie, vol. xxxv. (1865), pp. 171-290.

LEADERS, AND LEADERS' AND STEWARDS' MEETINGS. A "leader," in Methodist parlance, is one who has charge of a "class," composed of a certain section of the communicants of the congregation. The leader meets them stately, and examines into their spiritual condition, and, if any are absent, ascertains the cause; in short, acts as a pastor to them. It is evident that piety and common sense are indispensable requisites in a good leader. The leaders are appointed by the persons in charge of the respective circuits, and are responsible to them. These persons also examine the leaders at least once a quarter, and, as often as practicable, meet the leaders and stewards in what is known as "leaders' and stewards' meetings." See METHODISM.

LEANDER, St., b. at Cartagena in the middle of the sixth century; d., probably, March 13, 597, at Ferrara. He was an elder brother of Isidore, and entered very early into a monastery. As instrumental in the conversion, from Arianism to Catholicism, of Hermenegild, a son of Leovigild, king of the Visigoths, he was banished, and went to Byzantium, where he made the acquaintance of Gregory the Great. On his return to Spain, he was made archbishop of Seville, 584; in which position he continued to labor zealously in the interest of the Catholic Church. He seems to have been instrumental, also, in the conversion of Reccared, the second son of Leovigild, and his successor, 587. At all events, he presided over the national council of Toledo (589), at which the whole Visigothic nation abandoned Arianism, and entered the Catholic Church. It was also at this synod that the Filioque first was introduced in the creeds of the Western Church. Of the works of Leander, mentioned by Isidore, — De vir. illustr., 41, — only his Regula seu de institutione virginium (HOLSTEN: Cod. reg., iii.) and Homilia de triumpho ecclesie (MANSI) are still extant. See the arts. by GÖRRES, in Forschungen zur deutschen Geschichte (1872) and Zeitschrift f. hist. Theologie (1873). ZÖCKLER.

LEAVEN. The use of leaven is very old, certainly as early as Abraham's day; for the reason why Lot offered his angel guests unleavened bread was his haste (Gen. xix. 3). Its general use in Egypt is proved by Exod. xii. 34, 39. Different articles were used for leaven, — yeast, wine-lees, etc. Leaven must not be used in the cakes used in divine service among the Jews (Exod. xxix. 2; Lev. ii. 4, 11, vii. 12 sqq.), except in the two wave-loaves of the Feast of Pentecost, the representatives of the ordinary daily bread (Lev. xxiii. 17). During the Passover no leaven must be found in any house (Exod. xii. 15, 19; cf. 1 Cor. v. 7). The explanation of these enactments is easy. The bread of Passover is the bread of oppression, a reminder of their sufferings in Egypt, and of the haste of their exodus, and also of the truth that the old leaven of wickedness must be put out of the heart of those who would serve God in newness of spirit: there must not be left the least trace of the old, lest it should lead to a return to the old bondage. The etymology of the word in Hebrew and Greek favors the idea, that, symbolically speaking, the primary idea of leaven was its intense, permeating, and transforming power, while that of wickedness is secondary. In our Lord's use of the figure in the parable (Luke xiii. 21) the primary signification is that seized upon.

LEYRER.

LEAVITT, Joshua, b. in Heath, Mass., Sept. 8, 1791; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 16, 1873. He was graduated at Yale College, 1810; studied law; after two years' practice, abandoned it for theology in Yale Divinity School, 1823, and was ordained in the Congregational ministry; was pastor in Stratford, Conn., 1825-28; secretary of the Seamen's Friend Society, New-York City, 1828-31; editor and proprietor of the New-York Evangelist, 1831-37; an organizer of the New-York Antislavery Society. In 1837 he edited the Emancipator; removed to Boston 1841, and there started the Daily Chronicle, — the first daily antislavery paper. In 1848 he became managing editor of The Independent, and wrote for it until his death. "He was the first lecturer sent out by the American Temperance Society. He edited the Christian Lyre, the first hymn-book published in America with the notes attached."

LEB'ANON probably received its name, "the white mountain," from the circumstance that several of its peaks are covered with snow for the larger part of the year (Jer. xviii. 11), though Robinson derives the name from the whitish or gray color of the Jurassic limestone, which forms the bulk of its mass. The system consists of two ranges, — Lebanon proper and Anti-Lebanon, — enclosing the plateau of Coelesyria, the present El-Bûkâ'a. Lebanon proper, the western range, begins in the south at the River Litâni, the ancient Leontes, and ends in the north at the River Nahr-el-Kebir, the ancient Eleutheros. Gradually rising in terraces from the shore of the Mediterranean, it reaches an average height of from six thousand to eight thousand feet. Its highest peak, Jebel Mukhmel, is ten thousand two hundred feet; Sannin, nine thousand feet. The line of cultivation runs at an elevation of about six thousand feet. The descent towards El-Bûkâ'a is abrupt. Anti-Lebanon, the eastern range, begins in the south at Mount Hermon, and runs north-east, nearly parallel with Lebanon, gradually losing itself east in the plains of Palmyra, north in the steppes of Homs. Anti-Lebanon is barren and forbidding, while Lebanon is exceedingly fertile and fascinating.

The country covered by these mountains never belonged to the Israelites, though it is mentioned (Josh. xiii. 5) as a territory which should be conquered, and though parts of Southern Lebanon really seem to have been subjugated during the reign of Solomon (1 Kings ix. 19; Cant. iv. 8). It is generally mentioned simply as the northern boundary of Judæa (Deut. i. 7, xi. 21; Josh. i. 4, ix. 1); but Lebanon proper is often spoken of with admiration as a fertile land with thick forests (Ps. lxxii. 16; Isa. x. 34), charming by its fresh fragrance (Cant. iv. 11), its wine (Hos. xiv. 7), its abundance of water (Cant. iv. 15), and rich in game (2 Kings xiv. 9; Isa. xl. 16). Its beauty evidently made a deep impression on the imagination of the Israelites. To the mind of the prophets, it presented itself as a symbol of the sublime (Isa. xxxvii. 24), or the firm and steady (Ps. xxix. 6; Hos. xiv. 5). They praise its "glory" (Isa. xxxv. 2), and to their eyes its seasons depict the desolation of the days of evil (Isa. xxxiii. 9) and the restoration at the coming of the Messiah (Isa. xxix. 17). In the oldest times these regions were inhabited by the Hivites and the Giblites (Josh. xiii. 5, 6; Judg. iii. 3). Lebanon belonged to Phœnicia; Anti-Lebanon, to Damascus. In the fourth century before Christ the whole country was incorporated with the kingdom of the Seleucidae, and later on it ran the gauntlet through the Roman, Saracen, and Turkish rule. At present, Lebanon is inhabited by Christians (Maronites and Druses); Anti-Lebanon, by Mohaumedans. A list of the whole literature pertaining to the subject is given in RITTER: Erdenkunde, vol. 17. See especially ROBINSON: Biblical Researches, Boston, 1841; PORTER: Five Years in Damascus, London, 1855; FRAAS: Drei Monate im Libanon, Stuttgart, 1876, 2d ed., 1877. ARNOLD.

LEBRIJA, Ælius Antonius de, generally called Nebrissensis, from Lebrixa, or Lebrija, the old Nebrissa on the Gaudalquivir; b. 1412 or 1414; d. July 2, 1522. Allured to Italy by the revival of classical studies, he staid for ten years. After his return to his native country, he was teacher, first at Salamanca, afterwards at Aleala, fighting for the cause of the humanists against the schoolmen, and even against the Inquisition, from whose grasp Cardinal Ximenes had to rescue him. He wrote a Latin grammar and dictionary, a historical work on the reign of Ferdinand the Catholic, etc., and was one of the principal contributors to the Complutensian Polyglot. See J. B. MUÑOZ, in Memorias de la real academia de la historia, 3, 1-30.

LEBUIN, or LIAFWIN (Latin, Livinus, not to be confounded with another Livinus, who, a century earlier, preached Christianity in Flanders, and is the patron saint of Ghent), was a missionary among the Frisians and Saxons during the first years of the reign of Charlemagne. He was an Anglo-Saxon by birth, but left his English home, and offered his services to Gregory of Utrecht. Gregory sent him, together with Marchelm, or Marcellin, into Friesland, where he built two churches, — one in Wulpen, on the western shore of the Yssel, and another in Deventer, on the eastern. He also penetrated into the land of the Saxons. The church of Deventer was twice burned down, the last time, as it seems, by the Saxons (776). Lebwin is the patron saint of Deventer, and he is commemorated on Nov. 12 or July 25. See SURIUS: Vite Sanctorum, vi. 277; and MABILLON: Acta Sanctorum, v. 21 and 36. ZÖCKLER.

LECÈNE, Charles, b. at Caen, 1647; d. in London, 1703. He studied at Sedan, Geneva, and Saumur, and was appointed pastor of Nonfleur, 1672, and of Charenton, 1682, but was denounced as a Pelagian before the consistory. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, he retired into Holland, and afterwards to London. He wrote, besides some theological treatises, Projet d'une nouvelle version française de la Bible (Rotterdam, 1696); and after his death his translation of the Bible was published by his son (Amsterdam, 1741). "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness," he translates, Faisons les hommes sur le dessin et sur l'idée que nous en avons formée, and "the sons of God" (Job i. 6), personnes de qualité, and so throughout the version is bizarre and inexact, poor in style, and paraphrastic rather than literal. The synod of Brille (1742) condemned the translation.

LE CLERC, Jean. See CLERICUS.

LECTERN, or LECTURN, the reading-desk in the choir of a church. The commonest form at present is that of an eagle with outstretched wings. They are commonly made of brass, though primarily of wood. In Scotland, a generation ago, the precentor's desk was so named; but the word was pronounced lectern.

LECTIONARIES. In its liturgical sense, lectio (ἀνάγνωσις, or ἀνιγνώσκειν) denotes the reading, which, besides singing, prayers, preaching, and the administration of the sacraments, forms part of the divine service. The custom dates back to the first days of the Church (Justin: Apol., i. 67; Tertullian: Apoloq. 39), and was borrowed from the synagogue. In the oldest time the lessons were, of course, taken from the Old Testament alone, afterwards also from the New Testament. And at one time it was quite common to use sermons by celebrated preachers; the Acta Martyrum and other writings not belonging to the canon (as shown both by the very existence of the so-called Libri ecclesiastici, that is, uncanonical books used in divine service, and by the decrees of several councils, Laodicea, 360, can. 59; Hippo, 393, can. 36; Carthage, 397, etc.) forbidding the use of such books. The number of lessons varied. The Gallican Church of the fifth and sixth centuries, that is, before the introduction of the Roman ritual, had three lessons, and so had the Spanish, —one from the Old Testament, one from the Gospels, and one from the Epistles. The Greek and Roman churches, which the Lutheran and Anglican churches follow, have only two lessons, of which the second is always taken from the Gospels, while the first may be taken from the Epistles, the Acts, or the Old Testament. Originally the lessons were continuous (lectio continua); that is, one began where the other had stopped. But soon it became customary to appoint certain lessons for certain days (as, for instance, the narrative of the resurrection for Easter Day); and from this custom gradually developed a complete system of lessons for the whole ecclesiastical year. (See the art. PERICOPÆ.) Such a list of lessons was called Lectionaria (sc. volumina), or Lectionarii (sc. libri), or, with reference to its special contents, either Evangelistaria or Epistolaria. The oldest Lectionaria are the so-called Comes, which, however, is not the work of Jerome (see Opp. Hieron., ed. Vallars., xi. p. 526), the Lectionarium Gallicanum (discovered by Mabillon in the monastery of Luxeuil, and edited in his De liturg. Gall.), Lectionarium Romanum (found in the Calendarium Romanum, ed. Froulo, Paris, 1652), and Lectionarium Alamanicum, edited by Gerbert, in Monum. vetera liturgiæ Alaman., 1777.

NITZSCH.

LECTOR (ἀναγνώστης), an officer of the ancient Church, whose duty it was to read the lessons in the divine service, and to keep the sacred books. At what time this part of the public service became connected with a special office is uncertain; but Tertullian and Cyprian speak of the lector as a regular church officer, and of his ordination as a grave and solemn ceremony. As his duty, however, consisted in the merely mechanical reading of the lessons, without any exegetical or homiletical exposition, his office belonged to the lower clerical orders, and gradually disappeared altogether. In the fifth century the deacon was charged with the reading of the Gospels, and, later on, the subdeacon, with that of the Epistles. At present the Church of Rome has no lectors at all, and the ordination as lector is only a preparation to the priestly ordination. See J. A. SCHMIDT: De primitivæ ecclesiæ lectoribus, Helmstädt, 1696. F. NITZSCH.

LEE, Ann, foundress of the sect of Shakers in America; b. in Manchester, Eng., Feb. 28, 1736; d. at Watervliet, N. Y., Sept. 8, 1784. Her father was a blacksmith, and she received no education, but was sent to work in a cotton-factory; afterwards, was a cook in the Manchester Infirmary; and then, while yet young, married Abraham Standley, a blacksmith, by whom she had four children, who died in infancy. In 1758 she joined the Manchester society of Friends, who were called the "Shaking Quakers," and were headed by James Wardley. Being naturally excitable, she was quickly affected by the so-called "religious exercises" of the society, and began to practise austerities, and to have visions, and make revelations. But it was not until 1770 that she had the epoch-making revelation against marriage, and began her "testimony against all lustful gratifications as the source and foundation of human corruption and misery." Her course led to her imprisonment in Manchester. It was then that Christ appeared to her in a vision, and revealed to her that she was the second incarnation of Christ, and thus the head of all women, as he was the head of all men. From that time forth, she has been called by her followers, "Mother Ann," and believed to be perfectly righteous. At this time she separated herself from her husband. Henceforth she claimed to be directed by revelations and visions. In 1774 she came with her followers to America, and finally settled, in the spring of 1776, at Watervliet, near Albany, N. Y. During the Revolutionary War she was accused of treasonable correspondence with the British, and cast into prison, but was released by Gov. Clinton, 1777. At a later period (1780) she was again imprisoned for refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the State of New York, which she could not conscientiously do, but was released without trial by the same governor. Persecution had the usual effect, — of increasing the numbers of the persecuted. Taking advantage of a revival of religion (1779), she gathered many converts, and in 1780 removed the community to New Lebanon, Columbia County, N.Y. From 1781 to 1783 she went through New England on a missionary tour. Her influence is still felt by the Shakers, who revere her memory, and she is entitled to fame as a remarkable woman. See SHAKERS.

LEE, Jesse, "the apostle of Methodism in New England;" b. in Prince George County, Va., March 12, 1758; d. in Baltimore, Md., Sept. 12, 1816. He was received into the conference, 1783. After three years' labor in North Carolina, Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey, he was sent to New England, where, in Stratfield, Conn., Sept. 26, 1787, he formed the first Methodist "class" (consisting of three women); and the first in Boston, Mass., July 13, 1792 (his first sermon there was preached on the Common, July 9, 1790). In 1796 he became assistant to Asbury. After 1800 he returned to the South, leaving behind him in New England fifty Methodist preachers and six thousand members, as the fruit of his toil. In 1807, 1812, and 1813, he was chaplain of the United-States House of Representatives, and from 1814 until his death, chaplain of the United-States Senate. He was a fearless, plain, and successful preacher. As an organizer and founder, he ranks next to Asbury. In the field of denominational reform, in which he was greatly interested, he distinguished himself by suggesting, in 1792, the delegated general conference of the Methodist Church; but the idea was not carried out until 1808. He published a valuable History of Methodism in America, Baltimore, 1807. See LEROY M. LEE: Life and Times of Jesse Lee, Richmond, Va., 1848.

LEE, Samuel, D.D., Orientalist, b. at Longnor, Shropshire, Eng., May 11, 1783; d. at Barley, Somersetshire, Dec. 16, 1852. The rudiments of his education were received at a charity school; but he was apprenticed to a carpenter at the age of twelve. While working at his trade, he studied especially languages; and before he was twenty-five he had acquired, without a teacher, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, and Syriac, to which he subsequently added Arabic, Persian, Hindustanee, French, and German. In 1810 he became master of Bowdler's School, Shrewsbury. In 1813 he entered Queen's College, Cambridge; took his degree of B.A., 1817; entered the ministry; was made professor of Arabic in his university, 1819, and regius professor of Hebrew, 1831; at his death he was also rector of Barley. He received the degree of D.D. from Halle in 1822, and from Cambridge, 1833. His publications evince learning and ability of a high order. The chief are, Prolegomena in Biblica Polyglot. Lond. Minor. (London, 1828); Travels of Ibn Batuta, translated from the Arabic (1829); Grammar of the Hebrew Language, compiled from the Best Authorities, principally from Oriental Sources (1830, new ed., 1844); The Book of the Patriarch Job translated, with Introduction and Commentary (1837); A Lexicon, Hebrew, Chaldee, and English (1840).

LEGATES AND Nuncios IN THE ROMAN-CATHOLIC CHURCH. At first, legati, nuncii, missi, were synonymous expressions designating the papal representatives at the eight first councils held in the Orient. The position which those representatives occupied varied according to circumstances; and general canonical regulations concerning their office there were not. In the latter part of the fourth century, and in connection with the papal jurisdiction in the so-called causæ majores, we meet both with missi, or legati apostolici, appointed for the investigation of some special case of the kind, and with vicarii apostolici, generally exercising the papal authority in a certain territory. The latter were generally archbishops, who entered into a closer connection with Rome, giving up something of their independence, and thereby acquiring a higher rank. Their authority often extended over a whole country, and was then generally connected with the title of primate; but real, practical importance the institution never attained. As the Papacy developed, especially during the reign of Gregory VII., the institution of legati and nuncii also developed. See PETR. DE MARCA: De concord. sacerdotii et imperii, l. 5, c. 19; and THOMASSIN: Vetus ac nova discipl. eccl. T. 1, l. 2, c. 107.

In a thoroughly systematized form the institution presents itself in the decretals, more especially in the collections of Gregory IX. (x. 1, 30) and Boniface VIII. (vi. 1, 15), where it is treated under the head De officio legati. A distinction is made between two kinds of legates, — nati and dati, or missi. The former, the legati nati, whose office was once for all connected with an episcopal see, had originally the same rights as the other kind of legates. But in the sixteenth century their power became much circumscribed. Their jurisdiction was completely suspended by the presence of a legatus a latere: they were not allowed to have the cross carried before them in public; they retained, indeed, not much more than the title and its rank. See SCHOTT: De legatis natis, Bamberg, 1788; and SARTORI: Geistliches und weltliches katholisches Statswohl, Nuremberg, 1788. The second kind of legates consisted of Delegati (Legati missi, properly speaking) and Legati a latere. The Legati missi, afterwards generally called Nuncii apostolici, appeared in red robes, on white horses, with gold spurs on, etc. But their power, defined by a mandatum speciale, was limited to that special case for which they were sent. The Legatus a latere, "from the side," of the Pope, always a cardinal, is in the full sense of the word the representative of the Pope. His power is subject only to a very few limitations. He cannot remand a bishop; he cannot divide a bishopric, or unite two, etc. He is allowed to have a cross carried before him through the street, and to sit on a throne, under a canopy. See P. A. GAMBARDUS: Tractatus de officio leg. a latere, Venice, 1571; S. F. DE LA TORRE: De auctoritate legati a latere, Rome, 1656; G. WAGENSEIL: Diss. de legato a latere, Altdorf, 1696.

As the legates often misused their power, and the secular governments complained, and in many special cases compelled the Pope to make concessions, the whole institution underwent some slight changes during the reign of Leo X. But of much greater importance were the alterations which resulted from the German Reformation. By the peace of Augsburg (1555) the German Empire declared that its army should not be used for the suppression of Protestantism. In Northern and Western Germany, however, as also in the Spanish Netherlands, there were evangelical territories in which the Roman-Catholic bishops and archbishops could not be maintained. In order not to abandon those territories altogether, it became necessary to establish fixed nunciatures. Such fixed nunciatures already existed, — one in Vienna, and another in Warsaw, — but both those nunciatures were of political origin and of pre-eminently political character. The three new ones — established at Cologne, 1582, Lucern, 1586, and Brussels, 1600 — had for their principal object to do missionary work in the evangelical territories. It soon became apparent, however, that the institution was unable to work in unison with the episcopacy; and great troubles ensued. See the art. EMS, CONGRESS OF. MEJER.

LEGEND. In mediæval language Legenda, or Legendarii (sc. libri) denotes such collections of extracts from the lives of saints and martyrs as were authorized to be used as lessons in divine service on their memorial days. A more exact expression distinguishes between Passionarii and Legendarii, referring the former specially to the martyrs, and the latter to the saints in general. The custom, however, of reading the lives of martyrs and saints in the divine service on their memorial days is much older than the mediæval name indicates. The thirty-sixth canon of the synod of Hippo (393) allows the passions of the martyrs to be read on their anniversaries; and from Augustine's sermons (Nos. 273 and 315) it appears, that, at his time, the custom was general in the North African churches. The Lectioarium Gallicanum contains lessons from the Acta Martyrum, and Avitus of Vienne states that the passion of the holy martyrs of Agannum was read ex consuetudinis debito. The Gelasian decree, De libris recipiendis, forbade the use of the Acta Martyrum as lessons, because their authors were unknown; but Adrian I. again allowed it.

The liturgical use, however, which was made of the legends, by no means exhausts their theological significance. They originated without reference to liturgy; they would also have developed without connection with it. A congregation could never fail to take an interest in its own saints and martyrs, nor could it ever fail to find edification in the reading of their lives. Thus legends became a literature. In the first century this literature had a historical character. Legends form a historical source, though a source which must be used with caution. The Acta Martyrum and Acta Sanctorum (following the Calendaria, Diptycha, and Martyrologia), the Vita Patrum and Passionalia of the old Church, were not mere story-books. Eusebius' book on the martyrs of Palestine, Palladius' Historia Lausiaca, even Theodoret's φιλότητος ἱστορία, and J. Moschus' Λαύσιον, contained true historical information, as well as the De Viris Illustribus by Jerome, Colla- tiones Patrum by Cassianus, Vita Patrum by Gregory of Tours, etc.

But there came a time, about the ninth century, when a regard to edification, an inclination towards fantasticalness, and even less excusable motives, got the better of the historical sense, and transformed the legends into a maze of fiction. This tendency is represented in the Greek Church by the lives of saints, by Simeon Metaphrastes, and in the Latin Church by the Legenda Aurea of Jacobus a Voragine. The exaggerations, however, and, in many cases, the frauds, were so palpable, that no amount of credulity was sufficient to bear them for a long time. Even in the fifteenth century the historical conscience stirred up Mombritius; and in the seventeenth century the whole mass of legendary matter was subjected to an often very acute criticism by the Bollandists. In the eighteenth century, on the instance of Herder, the legends were once more taken up, but from a merely literary or æsthetical point of view. See MARY: Les Légendes pieuses du Moyen Age, Paris, 1813; HORSTMANN: Altenglische Legenden, Paderborn, 1875. F. NITZSCH.

LEGER, Jean, b. at Villa Sana, in Piedmont, Feb. 2, 1615; studied at Geneva; was appointed pastor of the churches of Prali and Rodoreto in 1639, and in 1643 of the Church of St. Giovanni among the Waldenses; fled in 1655, on account of the barbarous persecutions instituted by the Duke of Savoy, and sought aid for his flock from Louis XIV. and Cromwell, on whose recommendation the Patentes de grâce were granted, but became afterwards the subject of a special persecution; fled once more, and found rescue at Leyden. The exact date of his death is unknown. His Histoire générale des Églises évangéliques du Piedmont, one of the principal sources of information concerning the Waldenses, appeared at Leyden, 1669, 2 vols. EMILIO COMBA.

LEGIO FULMINATRIX. See LEGION, THUNDERING.

LEGION, The Theban. According to the legend, — such as it occurs, in its oldest and simplest form, in the Passio ascribed to Bishop Eucherius of Lyons, — a legion consisting of sixty-six hundred men, and called the "Theban," was sent from the Orient to Northern Italy to re-enforce the army of Maximian. He intended to use his army to persecute the Christians; but the soldiers of the Theban Legion, being Christians themselves, refused to obey his orders. Exasperated at the refusal, he had the legion twice decimated; and as the soldiers, exhorted by their commander Mauritius, continued firm, he had the whole legion massacred. In later versions this legend appears much extended, and adorned with many more or less fabulous features.

The Magdeburg Centuries declared Mauritius, though he is the patron saint of Magdeburg, an idol, and the whole legend a fiction. Its untenableness was still more elaborately demonstrated by J. A. du Bordieu (Dissertation critique sur le Martyre de la légion Thébaine, Amsterdam, 1705) and Hottinger (Helvetische Kirchengeschichte, Zürich, 1708). On the other hand, its historicalness was defended by De l'Isle, canon of St. Maurice (Défense de la vérité de la légion Thébaine, Nancy, 1711), by the Bollandists (who gave a very careful collection of all pertaining materials), and De Rivaz (Éclaircissements sur le Martyre de la légion Thébéenne, 1779). Among modern authors, Rettberg rejects the legend, and Friedrich supports it, in their respective works on the church history of Germany.

Between the alleged event and the first report, about a hundred and fifty years passed away, — time enough for such a legend to grow up. Still worse, none of the contemporary authors, or of those nearest to the event (Eusebius, Lactantius, Orosius, Sulpicius Severus), speak of it; and it would, at least for Lactantius, seem very singular to say nothing, if he knew any thing about it. The worst of all is, that it has not been possible to place the event properly, or even probably, in history: neither time nor place will fit. Generally, therefore, the legend must be declared unhistorical, which, however, does not forbid to assume that some kind of real fact underlies the fiction. G. UULHORN.

LEGION, The Thundering (Legio Fulminatrix). The event — a Roman legion shut up in a dismal valley among the Alps, surrounded on all sides by heathen enemies, and almost suffocated by thirst, but saved at the culminating moment of the danger by a timely shower of rain — is recorded both by Christian and Pagan authors, as also by the reliefs of the Column of Marcus Aurelius in Rome. The Christian authors Tertullian (Apologet., 5) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl., 5, 5) recognize in this event a miraculous interference of Providence, and ascribe it to the prayers of the Christian soldiers. The Pagan authors are inclined to view the event in the same light, but ascribe it either to the prayers of the emperor (Capitolinus: Vita Marci Aureli, 24), or to the art of an Egyptian sorcerer, as, for instance, Dio Cassius does. The reliefs on the imperial column represent the fact, but attempt no explanation. The letter from Marcus Aurelius to the Senate, printed in the appendix to Justin's Apology, is a forgery.

LEIBNITZ, Gottfried Wilhelm, b. at Leipzig, July 3, 1646; d. at Hanover, Nov. 14, 1716. He studied jurisprudence, mathematics, and philosophy at Leipzig and Jena, and entered in 1666, through the recommendation of Baron von Boineburg (a Protestant convert to Romanism), the service of the Elector of Mayence, in which he held various positions, and was chiefly occupied with jurisprudence: Methodus nova discentie doctentree jurisprudentie (1667); though his Confessio naturæ contra atheistas (1669) and Defensio Trinitatis (1669) show a much wider range of studies. In 1672 he went to Paris as tutor to Boineburg's sons, visited London, returned to Paris, and staid there till 1676, principally engaged in the study of natural science and mathematics. His great mathematical discovery, the differential calculus, dates back to 1676, though it was not published until 1684. As, in the mean time, the Elector of Mayence had died, he accepted in 1676 an offer from the Duke of Brunswick to settle at Hanover as librarian. Charged with writing the history of the house of Brunswick, he made various journeys in Germany and Italy, and gathered together an immense amount of materials, — Codex juris gentium diplomaticus (1693–1700) and Scriptores rerum Brunsvicensium (1701–11). But his Annales Brunsvicenses were never completed, and not published until a century and a half later on, by Pertz. Along with those historical studies he wrote, however, a great number of mathematical, philosophical, and theological treatises, mostly published in Acta eruditorum Lips. and Journal des Savants. But a complete systematic representation of his philosophical doctrines he never gave. The best exposition of his monadology is a mere summary, which he prepared for Prince Eugen during his stay in Vienna, 1714.

That of Leibnitz's works which has the greatest interest to the theologian is, of course, his Essais de théodicée sur la bonté de Dieu, la liberté de l'homme et l'origine du mal, 1710. It originated as a polemic against the dictionary of Bayle, and was occasioned by the request of Queen Sophia Charlotte. In many ways his metaphysical doctrines, his optimism, his determinism, etc., mirror themselves in the book. His doctrine, that this world is the best world which could possibly exist, leads him to a conception of the evil which is essentially different from that held by the religious consciousness. Evil is to his mind the simple and natural result of the necessary limitation of every thing created: it is consequently something metaphysical, and not ethical. In a similar way, his doctrine of the pre-established harmony leads him into a kind of determinism, in which the freedom of the will becomes lost in the metaphysical necessity, or at least loses its true ethical point. In general he considers Christianity only as the purest and noblest of all religions, as the religion of the wise made by Christ the religion of all, as the natural religion raised by Christ into a law. Nevertheless the book is written with great vigor and warmth, nor did it fail to make a wide and deep impression.

Another interesting side of Leibnitz's theological activity is his participation in the endeavors then made for the purpose of uniting the different Christian denominations. The general feeling prevalent after the end of the Thirty-Years' War was favorable to such plans; and the subject was ably broached by Bossuet's Exposition de la foi de l'église catholique, — a defence of the Church of Rome, but conciliatory in its spirit, and very guarded in its expressions. Rojas de Spinola, a Franciscan monk of Spanish descent, and confessor to the Emperor Leopold, was a zealous champion of the project. He visited Hanover several times, on the instance of the emperor; and, as Duke Ernst August was willing to enter into negotiations, a conference was arranged between Rojas de Spinola on the one side, and Molanus and Leibnitz on the other. The results of the conference were received with great hopes, both in Hanover and in Vienna and Rome. A couple of years later on appeared Leibnitz's Systema theologicum, which has made the truth of his Protestant faith suspected by many. Again a couple of years passed on, and in 1691 the correspondence began between Bossuet and Leibnitz. But the authority of the Council of Trent, absolutely insisted upon by Bossuet, and absolutely rejected by Leibnitz, proved the rock on which all the plans and negotiations for a union between Romanism and Protestantism were wrecked. In the attempts of uniting the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches, carried out by the courts of Berlin and Hanover, Leibnitz also took part. A conference was held, in Hanover between the Prussian court-preacher, Jablonski, on the one side, and Molanus and Leibnitz on the other. A Collegium irenicum was established in Berlin 1703; but the only result of the negotiations seems to have been the term "evangelical" as the common designation of the different Reformed churches, in contradistinction to the Church of Rome.

LIT. — The philosophical works of Leibnitz have been edited by ERDMANN (Berlin, 1839-40), JACQUES (Paris, 1842), JANET (Paris, 1866). Complete editions have been published by PERTZ (Hanover, 1813) and FOUCHER DE CAREIL (Paris, 1860). His German works were edited by GUN-RANER (Berlin, 1838-40), who also wrote his Life (Breslau, 1842, 2 vols). See also CLASS: *D. metaphysischen Voraussetzungen des Leibnitz. LEIGH, Edward. Puritan writer; b. at Shawell, Leicestershire, March 24, 1602; d. in Staffordshire, June 2, 1671. He proceeded M.A. at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 1623, and entered the Middle Temple. In 1636 he sat in Parliament as member for Stafford, and was expelled with his brother Presbyterians in 1648. He gave much attention to theology and biblical studies, and published several useful works, among which may be mentioned Critica sacra, containing Observations on all the Radices of the Hebrew Words of the Old, and the Greek of the New Testament, London, 1639, 4th and best edition, 1662, Latin translation, Amsterdam, 1696 (formerly much used, now supplanted); A Body of Divinity in Ten Books, 1654; Treatise of Religion and Learning, and of Religious and Learned Men, 1656; and a compilation, Annotations upon the New Testament, 1650 (Latin translation, Leipzig, 1732).

LEIGHTON, Robert, successively minister of Newbattle, principal of the university of Edinburgh, bishop of Dunblane, and archbishop of Glasgow; b. (place unknown) 1611; d. in London, June 25, 1684. He was graduated from the university of Edinburgh, 1631, and then spent several years on the Continent, especially in Douay, France. His father, Alexander Leighton, was a Presbyterian clergyman and physician, who was cruelly handled by the Star Chamber, and imprisoned ten years in London for "sedition," because he had defended Presbyterianism. The son was licensed by the presbytery of Edinburgh, July, 1611, and settled in the parish of Newbattle (formerly Newbotle, "botle" meaning hamlet), four miles long by two wide, in the presbytery of Dalkeith, Dec. 16, 1611. Leighton was then in his thirtieth year, with a mind enlarged by years of study and travel, thoroughly disciplined for thinking clearly, and expressing his ideas with persuasive force and beauty. He was a ripe scholar; a theologian who had a firm grasp of the gospel verities, in which his own heart found repose; a Christian man, whose inner life breathed the air of habitual fellowship with God. As a preacher, he eschewed the habit of his time in multitudinous divisions of his subject; and Burnet testifies to the "impressiveness, majesty, and beauty," of his sermons. The current account of his life, after Burnet, is singularly inaccurate, as if for eleven years he had worn an Anglican cassock under his Geneva gown. The records of the session of Newbattle and of the presbytery of Dalkeith during his incumbency, printed in 1862 by the Rev. Dr. Gordon, the present minister of the parish, dispel many hitherto accepted opinions concerning him. Instead of "scarce ever going to the meetings of presbytery," he was one of the most faithful and regular in his attendance, taking his share in all the business, preaching often before the presbytery, the synod, the assembly, and sometimes before the Scottish Parliament. If he "disliked their covenant, particularly the imposing it," he nevertheless signed it himself in 1643, along with his hearers and parishioners, and so late as 1650 administered it to a parishioner who had been twelve years in Germany. He was a member of the assembly which met at St. Andrews on July 28, 1642, and was one of the commission which met on Oct. 18 of that year, when the commissioners were nominated for the Westminster Assembly. So far from being estranged from his brethren, "living in great retirement, minding only the care of his own parish," no minister seems more active or trusted. In 1651 he was unanimously selected by the synod of Lothian to repair to London "for negotiating the freedom of brethren imprisoned there." He was one of a commission appointed by the synod, in November, 1648, "for trying of any Members of the Assemblée that had been active promoters of the last sinfull ingadgement, or had accession thereto." And he often comes prominently forward on the side of the prevailing party. The tradition of his replying to a question in the synod, "whether he preached the times," by asking another, "Who does so?" and, when he got the rejoinder "that all the brethren did so," his saying "that they might permit one poor brother to preach Jesus Christ and eternity," may be set opposite a statement in the minutes of his presbytery, under date April, 1652, regarding "the union and harmonie wherein this presbytery are so singularly happy in this distracted time." But he became weary of the increasing contentions and "anxious to be left to his own thoughts."

On Dec. 16, 1652, he offered to demit his charge, and the presbytery refused to accept of the demission. The reasons Leighton gave for his request were "the greatness of the congregation far exceeding his strength for discharging the duties thereof, especially the extreme weakness of his voice, not being able to reach the half of them when they are convened, which had long pressed him very sore, which he formerly had often expressed to us [the presbytery]." ¹ But in January, 1653, the town council of Edinburgh having elected him to be principal of the college there, the presbytery, on the 3d of February, "transported him to that charge." Leighton held this high office till the Restoration.

As principal and primarius professor of divinity he gave a lecture in theology to the students once a week, and preached in the college church every third sabbath. His Prælectiones Theologicae, along with his Paræneses and Meditationes ethico-criticæ in Psalmos, written in Latin of Ciceronian purity, were read in the college, and are given with his published works. According to Dr. Tulloch, "they are the most interesting of his works;" though that which has chiefly endeared him to earnest Christians is his Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter. Of his writings, Bishop Jebb has said, "His commentary is a treasury of devotion; his theological lectures are the very philosophy of the New Testament; and his meditations on some of the psalms raise us to those purer and sublimer heights where it was his delight and privilege habitually to dwell." All were composed while he was a minister or professor in the Covenanting Church; and that he was able to continue in it till it was overthrown, while he was allowed, or felt constrained, to resign his place in that which succeeded, is the best proof, that, with all superficial differences there were deeper and more essential harmonies between him and the best of his Puritan contemporaries than have been yet acknowledged. Many of his finest gems have a genuine Puritan tinge.

He succeeded in obtaining from Cromwell's government a better revenue for the university; and, in order to elevate academical training, he recommended, as Knox had done, the establishment of grammar-schools in various parts of Scotland. In the recess of the college session he made visits to the Continent, and kept up correspondence with some of the Jansenists, which gave rise to a suspicion of his becoming a Catholic, and probably, along with the contentions of his time, developed that quietism, and indifference to externals, which prepared the way for a change in his ecclesiastical relations. This change occurred in 1661, on the establishment of episcopacy in Scotland. He decided to remain in the reconstituted church, became bishop of Dunblane, and was consecrated to that see, along with Sharp and other two, in Westminster Abbey, Dec. 15, 1661.

It was an immense gain to the new order to have a bishop with the endowments, learning, and eminent piety of Leighton, in their ranks. The purity and sincerity of his motives in making the transition are above all question. Dr. Flint has said, "A purer, humbler, holier spirit than that of Robert Leighton never tabernacled in Scottish clay;" and he might have added, "nor in any other clay." "He was accounted a saint from his youth," and his days were "linked each to each by natural piety." That gentle, loving, and devout student, as he comes before us in his letters to his parents, gradually increased in learning, in culture, in spiritual insight and practical devotion, till he became the "angelic man" whom Burnet so lovingly portrayed,—"that true Father of the Church of Christ," whose noble thoughts Coleridge has delighted to unfold. He was, as Bishop Jebb says, "a human seraph, uniting the solar warmth with the solar light, unde ardet unde lucet." He was, in fact, the Scottish Hooker and

Howe in one, and "will not suffer by comparison with any divine in any age." Even Scotchmen, who thank God for the noble men who "preached to the times," and sacrificed life and all they held dear to carry on the struggle in which Leighton's father suffered so cruelly, will not fail to thank God that there was one noble man in those unquiet days who kept so much apart from the strife of tongues, fixed his gaze so steadily beyond passing controversies, preached and lived for eternity, and whose voice is still "a continual reminder that . . . the celestial mountains are before us, and thither lies our true destiny."

Very soon after his alliance with Sharp he began to discover how hard a task he had undertaken; and, as Burnet says, "he quickly lost all heart and hope, observing such cross characters of an angry Providence as seemed to say that God was against them." He entered his see in 1662, and discharged its duties in a loving and tender spirit till 1672. His diocese consisted of the two presbyteries of Dunblane and Auchterarder, comprising more than thirty parishes in the western part of Perthshire. These presbyteries continued their meetings as before; and the synod over which Leighton presided, as its records published by Dr. John Wilson in 1877 fully show, met twice a year, and each member had "full liberty of voting, and debating their assent and dissent, as ever they had in former times." There were only three or four nonconformist ministers. The ritual of the church was unchanged, neither liturgy nor surplice being used. Externally the frame-work was the same, but a new motive-power had been introduced into the machinery. As Sharp's and other bishops' views were not in accordance with his, Leighton's modified episcopacy, and the spirit of conciliation he tried to infuse into the counsels of the king and his ministers, were thwarted. Leighton, both in Parliament and in presence of Charles II., pleaded for milder measures, and got the "Indulgence." Archbishop Burnet of Glasgow, having opposed this clemency, was superseded, and Leighton was appointed commendator of Glasgow in 1670, and archbishop of Glasgow in 1672. In the wider sphere in which he was thus placed, he launched a scheme of "Accommodation," so as to bridge over the gulf that yawned between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians; and along with Dr. Gilbert Burnet, then professor of divinity in Glasgow University, and afterwards bishop of Salisbury, he labored hard to gain his object. The bridge broke down. He was disheartened with the remorseless measures of the government against the Covenanters, and the stern resolution of the anti-prelatists to admit of no surrender. He accordingly went to London, and tendered his resignation, as, indeed, he had done more than once when in Dunblane. Charles II. persuaded him to continue one year longer; and he was permitted to retire in September, 1674. For a short time he lived within the college of Edinburgh, and afterwards found a home of peace under the roof-tree of his sister, Mrs. Lightnaker, at Broadhurst in Sussex. In 1679 he was invited by the king to go down to Scotland, after Sharp's assassination, to pour oil on the troubled waves; but he remained in his loved retreat. He went up to London to meet the Earl of Perth in 1684; and Burnet, who met him, congratulated him on his healthy looks. He in reply stated "that he was near his end, and his journey almost done." Next day he was seized with pleurisy, and in two days more, on the 25th of June, 1684, died at the Bell Inn, Warwick Lane, thus realizing a fond wish of his life, that, like a pilgrim, he might die in an inn. He was buried in the south chancel of the Church of Horsted Keynes, Sussex, the parish in which he had resided for some years. He bequeathed his library to the diocese of Dunblane, where it still continues. His works consist of Sermons and Charges to the Clergy, Prelectiones Theologicæ et Paræneses, and Commentary on the First Epistle of Peter. Coleridge has based his work, Aids to Reflection, on some of the choicest pieces of Leighton's rich mind, and has brought them as much into favor among the cultured as they had long been among humble, earnest Christians.

LIT. — Leighton is said to have published nothing during his lifetime, and before his death to have signified to his relatives his wish that his papers should be destroyed. Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 in the subjoined list, which may be said to constitute the editio princeps of his works, were published with the sanction of these relatives, and edited by Dr. James Fall, principal of Glasgow University before the Revolution, and afterwards canon of York. Their titles are, (1) Sermons Preached by Dr. Robert Leighton, late Archbishop of Glasgow. Published, at the desire of his friends, after his death, from his papers, written with his own hand, etc. London, 1692, 8vo. (2) A Practical Commentary upon the Two First Chapters of the First Epistle General of St. Peter, by the Most Rev. Dr. Robert Leighton, some time Archbishop of Glasgow. Published after his death at the request of his friends. York, 1693, 4to. (3) Prelectiones Theologicæ, etc., 4to. London, 1693. (4) Practical Commentary upon the First Epistle General of St. Peter. Part ii., London, 1694. The principal subsequent editions of his works are those of Wilson (Edinburgh, 1716-63), of Middleton (London, c. 1750), of Foster (London, 1777), of Jerment (London, 1808 and 1814), of Baynes (London, 1823 and 1829), of Pearson (London, 1825, and again in 1855), and, above all, that begun in 1869, and still proceeding with such learned pains and loving care, but yet with such a strong High-Church bias, by the Rev. W. West, B.A., and published by the Longmans, London. The volume which is to contain the life and letters of the archbishop is expected to be published soon, and cannot fail to cast much fresh, if not always quite uncolored, light on his history and that of his father. In Wilson's edition (vol. i) we have the first attempt at a biography, and also a preface by Dr. Doddridge. The former was appropriated by Middleton, and the latter by most subsequent editors. The life by Jerment is a decided advance on Wilson's; and Pearson's, no less decided advance on his.

The following are the other materials for illustrating his biography: Life of Archbishop Leighton, Edinburgh [n.d. by Dr. Thomas Murray]; the same, in IRVING'S Lives of Scottish Writers, Edinburgh; the same, by Dr. (now Cardinal) MANNING, in The Wisdom of our Fathers, Tract Society, London; Life of Archbishop Leighton, with Brief Extracts from his Writings, New York, 1840; Extracts from the Presbytery Records of Dalkeith, relating to the Parish of Newbattle during the Incumbency of Mr. Robert Leighton, 1641-1653. Communicated by the Rev. Thomas Gordon, Minister of Newbattle. With some Introductory Remarks by David Laing, Esq., V.P., of the Society of Antiquaries, Edinburgh. Printed in Proceedings of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland, 1862, pp. 459-489, and substance of them embodied in letter to editor of Notes and Queries (vol. i., 1862, pp. 441-445). Several letters of Leighton, recovered from State-paper office, or drawn from the Lauderdale correspondence now in the British Museum, will be found in same volume of Notes and Queries, pp. 106, 121, 143, 165, 244. Three papers entitled Archbishop Leighton are to be found in The United Presbyterian Magazine (Edinburgh), 1865, pp. 397, 493, and 1866, p. 15, by the present writer; also Four papers in the same serial by the same writer, 1869, entitled The Bishop of Dunblane, pp. 304, 355, 400, 448; Two papers, by the writer of this article, in the British and Foreign Evangelical Review (London), 1869, — the first entitled A Scottish Presbytery of the Seventeenth Century, p. 22; the second, Scottish Prelacy after the Restoration, p. 331; — Register of the Diocesan Synod of Dunblane (1662-88), with an Introduction and Biographical Notes, by JOHN WILSON, D.D., clerk to the synod of Perth and Stirling, Edinburgh, 1877, 4to; An Account of the Foundation of the Leightonian Library, by ROBERT DOUGLAS, bishop of Dunblane [with introduction by D. Laing, Esq., and notes, etc.], in the third volume of The Bannatyne Miscellany, printed at Edinburgh, 1855 (pp. 229-272), 4to; Robert Leighton; or, the Peacefulness of Faith, from Lights of the World, or Illustrations of Character drawn from the Records of Christian Life, by the Rev. JOHN STOURTON, D.D., London, Religious Tract Society, pp. 37-60, n.d.; Aids to Reflection, by SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, London, 1824; Scotichronicon, vol. ii., by I. F. S. GORDON, D.D., Glasgow, 1870; articles in various encyclopædias and biographical dictionaries. The writer of this notice issued in London, 1881, selections from the writings of Archbishop Leighton, with a life of the author. W. BLAIR, D.D. (of Dunblane).

LEIPZIG, The Colloquy of, between the Lutheran and Reformed theologians in 1631, was occasioned by the assembly, in that city, of the Protestant princes for the purpose of protesting against the Edict of Restitution. The elector of Brandenburg was accompanied by his court-preacher, Johann Bergius; and the landgrave of Hesse, by his court-preacher, Theophilus Neuberger, and Professor Johann Crocius. These theologians, who all belonged to the Reformed faith, invited the Saxon theologians (belonging to the Lutheran faith, and headed by Matthias Hoe von Hohenegg, court-preacher to the elector of Saxony) to a colloquy on the various points of difference between them. The colloquy began March 3, and continued till March 23. As basis, was chosen the Confessio Augustana. An agreement was soon arrived at with respect to articles 1-2, 5-9, 11-28; and the tone of the colloquy was friendly, also, in cases in which concord could not be attained. As the colloquy was private, only four copies of the protocol were taken, — one for each of the princes, and one for the faculty of Leipzig; but general reports were soon after published in Germany, Holland, France, and England. The protocol may be found printed in AUGUSTI. Corpus libr. symbol., Elberfeldt, 1827, and in NIEMEYER: Collectio conf. in eccl. reform., Leipzig, 1840.

LEIPZIG DISPUTATION. See ECK, CARLSTADT, LUTHER.

LEIPZIG INTERIM, The, was drawn up by Melancthon, Paul Eber, Bugenhagen, Hieronymus Weller, Antonius Lauterbach, Georg Major, and Joachim Camerarius, and was issued at Leipzig, Dec. 22, 1518. It made great concessions to the Roman-Catholic Church with respect to baptism, penance, ordination, mass, fast, etc., and met with great opposition from the Lutherans, especially Flæcius. In 1552 it was revoked.

LELAND, John, b. at Wigan, Lancashire, Oct. 18, 1691; d. at Dublin, Ireland, Jan. 16, 1766. He was educated at the University of Dublin, and from 1716 to his death was pastor of a Presbyterian church in that city. He wrote in 1733 A Defence of Christianity, in reply to Tindal's Christianity as Old as the Creation; in 1738, The Divine Authority of the Old and New Testaments asserted, in reply to Morgan's Moral Philosopher; and in 1766, The Advantage and Necessity of the Christian Religion. After his death, his Discourses on Various Subjects (1768-69, 4 vols.) was published, with his life. All these works are now forgotten. But one of his books still lives, A View of the Principal Deistical Writers that have appeared in England in the Last and Present Century, London, 1754-56, 2 vols.; best edition, London, 1837, 1 vol. This work is valuable for its industrious collection of facts about the deistic writers, but its arguments are not adapted for present use.

LELONG, Jacques, b. in Paris, April 19, 1665; d. there Aug. 17, 1721. He entered the Congregation of the Oratory in 1686; and was in 1699 appointed librarian at the Oratoire St. Honoré in Paris. His principal work is his Bibliotheca Sacra, (Paris, 1709), of which enlarged editions were published by C. F. Börner, Leipzig, 1769, and by A. G. Masch, Halle, 1778-90. He also published Discours historiques sur les principales éditions des Bibles Polyglottes (1713), Supplément à l'histoire des dictionnaires Hébreux de Wolfius, 1707; and Nouvelle méthode des langues Hébraïque et Chaldaïque, 1708.

LE MAITRE, Louis Isaac, better known under the name DE SACY, b. in Paris, March 29, 1613; d. at Pomponne, Jan. 4, 1684. After studying theology, he entered the service of the Church; was ordained a priest in 1648; and was appointed director of Port-Royal. As a decided Jansenist, he could not escape the hatred of the Jesuits. In 1666 he was imprisoned in the Bastille, and not released until 1668. Though he returned to Port-Royal in 1675, he was in 1679 compelled to give up his position, and retire to Pomponne. He was a very prolific writer, especially an industrious and successful translator. His principal work is his translation of the Bible, of which Les Psaumes de David appeared in 1666, Le Nouveau Testament, at Amsterdam, printed by Elzevir in 1667; while the larger part of the Old Testament was done in the Bastille.

LENFANT, Jacques, b. at Bazoches-in-the-Beauce, April 13, 1661; d. in Berlin, Aug. 7, 1728. He studied theology at Saumur and Geneva, and was appointed preacher to the French congregation at Heidelberg, 1684, and at Berlin, 1688. He was a prolific writer, especially on church history, — Hist. du Concile de Constance, Amsterdam, 1714; Hist. du Concile de Pise, Amsterdam, 1724; Hist. de la papesse Jeanne, etc. He translated the New Testament, and wrote a commentary to it. Noticeable is also his polemical work, Préservatif contre la réunion avec le Siège de Rome, 1723. C. PFENDER.

LENT, from the Anglo-Saxon lencten ("spring"). The German Lenz denotes the fast preparatory to the celebration of Easter. Through Irenæus and Tertullian, the existence of such a fast can be traced back to a very early date in the history of the Church; but it also appears that great uncertainty and arbitrariness prevailed, both with respect to its duration and its strictness. Originally it seems to have lasted only forty hours, referring to the time between the crucifixion and the resurrection, during which Christ was under the power of death. But gradually those forty hours became forty days, referring to the forty-days' fast of Moses, Elijah, and our Lord. Gregory the Great speaks of Lent as lasting six weeks; that is, thirty-six days, as the Sundays were not fast days. When the four days were added (by Gregory the Great or by Gregory II.) is not known; but from the number of forty is the Latin name derived, — quadragesima (French, câreme). The fast consisted, in some places and at some times, in total abstinence from all kinds of food until evening on all days except Sundays; in other places and at other times, in abstinence from flesh and wine. But generally the fast was accompanied with the cessation of every thing having a festal character, such as public games, theatrical shows, etc. Even the courts were closed. At the same time the service in the churches assumed a more sombre character. The pictures were veiled, the organ grew silent, etc. In the English Church the celebration of Lent was introduced in the latter part of the eighth century by Ercambert, king of Kent. Lent, when observed to-day, retains its ancient features.

LENTULUS, Epistle of. See CHRIST, PICTURES OF.

LEO is the name of thirteen Popes; namely, Leo I., the Great (440-461). Very little is known of his earlier life; though, for some years previous to his election, he occupied a prominent position in Rome. It was to him that Cyril of Alexandria, in his controversy with Juvenal of Jerusalem, addressed himself in 431; and in the moment of his election he was absent in Gaul, sent thither by the emperor as mediator between Aëtius and Albinus. Singularly enough, also, his death is uncertain; the date varying between April 11, June 28, Oct. 30, and Nov. 10: while otherwise his reign stands out in full light, both with respect to its general bearing, and with respect to its details. It denotes the foundation of the Papacy. Leo I. is the true inventor of the theory of an ecclesiastical monarchy under the headship of the Pope. The two propositions on which that whole theory hangs — the primacy of Peter among the apostles, on account of which all pastors are subject to his supreme authority (Serm., iv. 2); and the transference of that primacy to his successors, the bishops of Rome, on account of which Peter himself speaks whenever a Pope speaks (Serm., iii. 2) — found, both for the first time, their full and exhaustive exposition in the sermons and letters of Leo I.; and he added (Ep. 10), to revolt against this primacy is to precipitate one's self into hell.

His success in carrying out his theory into practice was various. In proconsular Africa the Christian Church had, to a large extent, lost its importance. Only Mauritania Cæsariensis still belonged to the empire, and remained true to the Confession of Nicæa. But that insulated remnant of the orthodox Church in Africa needed support from without, and was consequently easily made subject to the authority of the supporter. Leo sent Bishop Potentius thither to investigate the state of affairs; and when Potentius reported, that, through intrigues and riots, many unworthy persons had been installed into the first offices of the Church, there followed a very severe rebuke from the Pope. Appeals to Rome, which, a decade before, had been absolutely forbidden by an African synod, were now regularly instituted; and the Pope demanded that all synodal decisions should be sent to Rome for confirmation (Ep. 12). More complicated proved the affairs of Illyria and Gaul. In Illyria the contest was standing between the Patriarch of Constantinople and the Bishop of Rome. Innocent I. had conferred a kind of apostolical vicariate on the metropolitan of Thessalonica; but the Illyrian bishops continued, nevertheless, to be drawn towards Constantinople, as if by a natural force. Leo I. conferred the vicariate on the metropolitan Anastasius (Ep. 6), and was in the beginning very much pleased with his behavior (Ep. 13), but found occasion afterwards to administer some sharp rebukes (Ep. 15). The issue, however, of the affair is not known. In Gaul, Pope Zosimus had conferred the primacy on Bishop Patroclus of Arles in 417; and on account of the peculiar position of the Gallican Church, the weakness of the Roman power, the establishment of Arian kingdoms in the country, and the general confusion caused by the unintermittent invasion of barbarous nations, such a measure of centralization seemed quite expedient. But the successor of Patroclus, Hilarius, came into conflict with Celdonius, metropolitan of Besançon; and, when Celdonius was deposed by a Gallican synod, he appealed to the Pope, and repaired to Rome. Hilarius also went to Rome, but fled in haste from the city, fearing the worst. It was, indeed, the policy of the Roman bishops to favor the appellant, in order to encourage appeals; and this policy was followed also in the present case. A Roman synod of 415 restored Celdonius, and strictly confined the power of Hilarius to his own diocese; and, in order to secure the enforcement of these decisions, Leo I. sought and obtained the support of the secular government. June 6, 445, Valentinian III. issued the famous law, which, from regard to the merits of the apostle Peter, the dignity of the city of Rome, and the decisions of the Council of Nicæa (the spurious sixth canon), recognized the Bishop of Rome as the head of the Christian Church, established his ordinances as general laws, defined opposition to them as a kind of crimen læsæ majestatis, and ordered all secular authorities to arrest and surrender any person, who, summoned by the Pope, neglected to appear. Less effective was his interference in the affairs of the Church of Alexandria. In the fourth year of his reign he addressed that church (Ep. 9) concerning certain ritual and liturgical differences. The Church of Rome, he argues, is built exclusively on Peter, the prince of the apostles; but how is it possible that his disciple Mark should have deviated from his master in founding the Alexandrian Church? The Alexandrian Church, however, seems to have had too lofty a self-consciousness to heed the anxious questions of the Pope.

The most brilliant part of the reign of Leo I. is his relation to the Eastern Church and the christological controversies then taking place there. Eutyches first addressed him, complaining of the re-appearance of Nestorianism; and after his condemnation by Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, he wholly threw himself upon Leo, protesting his willingness to acquiesce in any decision he might make in the case. As the entreaties of Eutyches were supported by the Emperor Theodosius, Leo was at once drawn into the very midst of the controversy; and, as was natural, he at first assumed a very cold attitude towards Flavian. Nevertheless, after receiving the acts of the synod which had condemned Eutyches, together with all other materials pertinent, he confirmed the condemnation, and accompanied the confirmation with a positive exposition of the doctrine of the two natures united in Christ. — the celebrated Letter to Flavian of June 13, 449 (Ep. 28). In consequence, the synod of Ephesus (449) excommunicated him; but the only result of the excommunication was, that the ill-used and maltreated minority of the Eastern Church rallied so much the more closely around him. A synod of Rome of the same year rejected all the canons of the synod of Ephesus, which it characterized as a latrocinium ("a den of robbers"); and when, shortly after, Pulcheria and her husband Marcian ascended the imperial throne, a complete re-action took place. The acceptance of the doctrinal letter of Leo by all the bishops of the Eastern Church was commanded by the emperor. At the œcumenical synod of Chalcedon (451) his legates presided, his doctrinal letter was made the basis of the confession, and the canons of the synod were sent to Rome for his confirmation. There was, however, one of those canons (c. 28) which aroused his displeasure in the highest degree. It defines the relation between the Bishop of Rome and the Patriarch of Constantinople. It gives the former the first rank; but it gives the latter an equal power, placing Asia, Pontus, and Thrace under his jurisdiction. When the canon was put under debate, the papal legates refused to be present; and, when it was voted, they dictated their solemn protest to the protocol. Leo approved of the proceedings of his legates, and confirmed only the doctrinal canons of the synod. He even induced the emperor to cancel the obnoxious canon by a law of 451; but, though his triumph thus seemed complete, the Patriarch of Constantinople exercised jurisdiction in Asia, Pontus, and Thrace after the Council of Chalcedon, just as he had done before.

The meeting between Leo I. and Attila, the king of the Huns, has been the subject of much legendary embellishment. After the battle of the Catalaunian fields (452), Attila broke into Italy, and Rome lay like a hapless prey between his claws, when, according to the report of Prosper of Aquitania, a contemporary of the event (see Roesler: Chronica mediæ ævi, p. 325), on the instance of the emperor, Leo went to meet him, and made such an impression upon him, that he concluded peace, and retreated behind the Danube. According to the Historia miscella (from the tenth century, edited by Eyssenhardt, 1869), Leo I. was not alone when he approached Attila, but was preceded by St. Peter himself, who, with sword in hand, compelled the Huns to submit to the demands of the bishop. There is, however, an entirely different version of what took place. According to an ordinance issued by Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and found in Cassiodorus' Varia, i. 4 (Opera, edit. Garetius, 1679), it was the elder Cassiodorus who went as ambassador to Attila, and induced him to retreat in peace. Which of these two reports is the true one, it is impossible to decide: probably they contain some truth, both of them. As Attila's position in Italy was very precarious, and we know the price he was paid for his retreat,—the sister of Valentinian III. and her dowry,—the event seems to have taken place in a very simple and natural way: most probably there were many embassies, and very various negotiations. Under somewhat similar circumstances Leo I. had to meet Genseric, the king of the Vandals, in 456; but at this occasion, at which history speaks of no other mediator, the result was, that the city was given up to plunder for two weeks, and many thousands of its inhabitants were carried away, and sold as slaves.

LIT.—The works of Leo I., consisting of letters and sermons, were collected and edited by QUESNEL (LYONS, 1700), BALLERINI (Venice, 1755–57), and MIGNÉ: Patrologia, 54–56. His life was written by ARENDT (Mayence, 1835), PERTHEL (Jena, 1843), and SAINT-JÉRON (Paris, 1845). See also HINSCHIUS: Das Kirchenrecht der Katholiken und Protestanten in Deutschland, 1868, i. 583–588 (Illyria), 588–591 (Gaul).

LEO II. (682–683), a native of Sicily; a good Greek scholar, and well versed in music. His short reign devolved upon him a duty of whose full meaning he was hardly conscious. The sixth œcumenical council (held in Constantinople, 680) condemned the Monothelites and their leaders, among whom was the former Pope, Honorius; and the Emperor Constantine Pogonatus confirmed the condemnation to its whole extent. In July, 682, the papal legates brought the acts of the council, with a letter from the emperor, to Rome; and between September and December, same year, Leo II. answered, accepting the canons, and, recognizing the condemnation, included Honorius, qui hanc apostolicam sedem non apostolicæ traditionis doctrina lustravit sed profana proditiōne immaculatam fidem subvertere conatus est (MANSI, II, 725; HARDUIN, 3, 1470). He afterwards repeated the condemnation of Honorius in a letter to the bishops of Spain (MANSI, II, 1050), and in another to Herweg, king of the Visigoths (MANSI, II, 1051). See the literature to HONORIUS I.

LEO III., elected Dec. 26, 795; buried June 12, 816. His first act was to send the keys of the tomb of St. Peter and the standard of the city of Rome, together with many presents, to Charlemagne, asking him to send some of his nobles to Rome to receive the oath of allegiance from the people. Shortly after, he again addressed the Frankish king, but this time as a suppliant. There was a party in Rome strongly opposed to his election; and one day, during a procession, they attacked him. He was rescued by the Duke of Spoleto, and from Spoleto he repaired to the court of Charlemagne at Paderborn, where he was received with great ceremonies. Meanwhile, his adversaries raised very grave accusations against him; and, after his return to Rome (which city he entered Nov. 29, 799, accompanied by many archbishops, bishops, and counts), the plenipotentiaries of the king instituted an investigation, which, however, ended with the banishment of Leo's enemies. The following year (800), Charlemagne himself arrived at Rome; and a new investigation was instituted, which ended with the Pope clearing himself from any guilt in the crimes alleged, by a solemn oath. Two days afterwards (Dec. 25), the crowning of Charlemagne as Roman emperor took place in the Church of St. Peter. The internal springs active in this event are still somewhat obscure. It is evident, however, that the idea put into circulation by the bull Venerabilen, of Innocent III.,—and according to which the Pope transferred the Roman Empire to the Franks in virtue of a divine authority,—was completely foreign to the actors themselves. Generally, the elevation of Charlemagne to Roman emperor was considered an elective act of the Roman people; and, in the performance of this act, the Pope played no other part than that of the first man of the people,—its representative. The relation between the new emperor and the Pope gives ample evidence. In the will of Charlemagne, signed by Leo himself, Rome is mentioned as one of the metropolitan sees of his realm, besides Ravenna, Milano, etc. The imperial Missus in Rome held court in the name of the emperor, and was the sole administrator of criminal justice. He had, also, a kind of superintendence over the papal officials, and received appeals from them. After the death of Charlemagne, a conflict immediately arose between his successor, Louis the Pious, and the Pope. As soon as the report of the death of the emperor reached Rome, the opposition party renewed its attack on Leo III.; but the high-handed manner in which he put down the rising caused much displeasure at the Frankish court, and an investigation was instituted, whose proceedings, however, were stopped by the death of the Pope. For the part which Leo took in the Adoptionist and the Filioque controversies, see those articles.

LIT.—The letters of Leo III. are found in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif.; his correspondence with Charlemagne, in Monumenta Carolina in JAFFÉ: Bibl. rer. Germanicæ, tom. iv.; his life, in the Liber Pontificalis, ii. (though much distorted).

Leo IV. (April 10, 847–July 17, 855) restored and extended the fortifications of Rome, admonished by the frightful invasion of the Saracens in 846, by which the Church of St. Peter (at that time situated outside of the wall) was plundered, and immense treasures carried away by the enemy. By the extension of the wall originated the so-called “Civitas Leonina.” He also improved the fortifications of Portus, where he settled a number of Corsicans; but Leopolis, which he founded, instead of the destroyed Circumcellæ some miles inland, did not thrive. Though the dependence of the Pope on the emperor still is strikingly illustrated by many events of the reign of Leo IV., a tendency towards independence now becomes noticeable. He begins his bulls with his own name, not with that of the person addressed. He gives the title of Dominus to no one, even not to the emperor. The acts of the synod of 853 are dated, not only from the year of the emperor, but also from that of the Pope, etc. His letters are found in JAFFÉ: Reg. Pontif.; his life, in Liber Pontificalis, iii. — Leo V. (903) reigned only between thirty and fifty days. He was imprisoned, and compelled to abdicate by his presbyter, Christophorus. The few notices of him still extant are found in WATTERICH: Vita Pontificum, i. 32. — Leo VI. (928–929) reigned for seven months, and five or fifteen days; but nothing is known of him. See WATTERICH, i. 33. — Leo VII. (January, 936–July, 939), a quiet and pious man, who left the government of Rome to Alberic II., the son of Marozia. He was very partial towards the monastery of Cluny, and made Archbishop Friedrich of Mayence papal vicar, and legate and primate of Germany. See his life by FLODOARDUS, in MURATORI: Script. rer. Ital., III^o, 324; sources by JAFFÉ and WATTERICH. — Leo VIII. (963–965) was elected by the synod which deposed John XII. (Dec. 4, 963) under the influence of Otho I., but met with such an opposition from the Roman people, that he fled from Rome, and was deposed by a synod convened by John XII. (February, 964). John XII. died shortly after, in the bed of an adulteress; but the Romans elected Benedict V. Pope. Otho I. once more re-instated Leo VIII. by armed force; but between February and April, 965, he died. Two bulls are ascribed to him,—the one returning the donations of Charlemagne, Pepin, Justinian, etc., to the emperor; and the other surrendering to the emperor the right of appointing popes, archbishops, and bishops. But both bulls are evidently spurious, belonging to the period of the investiture-contest. The sources are found in JAFFÉ (Reg. Pont.) and WATTERICH (Vita Pontif.). — Leo IX. (Feb. 12, 1049–April 19, 1051) descended from a noble family in Alsace: his father was a cousin to the emperor, Conrad II. He was bishop of Toul, when, in December, 1048, the emperor, Henry III., and the emissaries of the Roman people, at a meeting at Worms, agreed upon him as the successor of Damasus II. He accepted the offer, however, only on the condition that he should be unanimously elected by the clergy and people of Rome; and in February, 1049, he entered the city in a plain pilgrim's garb, accompanied by the young monk Hildebrand. His reign had great importance for the internal organization of the church. The reform which was started at Cluny, and thence spread widely among the monks, reached, through him, the church in general. The means he employed was the synod. With the exception of the period between 325 and 381, that vital organ of the church never was in greater activity than during the reign of Leo IX. Always on the road,—travelling from southern Italy to northern Germany, from the centre of France to the centre of Hungary,—he everywhere convened the clergy into synods, discussing the affairs of the church; and by consecrations, ordinations, etc., he everywhere knew how to awaken in the mass of the people an interest in what was going on in the church. The abolition of simony and the establishment of celibacy were his great aims. At one time he thought of deposing every clergyman who had obtained his benefice by simony; but he had to abandon so sweeping a measure, as it would strike more than two-thirds of the officers of the church. The celibacy he extended to the orders of subdeacon; and people already began to speak of unchaste priests, thereby meaning priests who were married. In his external policy he was not so very successful. The Normans had taken possession of Benevent; and, as the emperor proved unwilling to come to the defence of the holy see, the Pope himself marched against the intruders, at the head of an army of Italian mercenaries and Suabian volunteers. But he lost the battle at Astagunne, was taken prisoner, and held in captivity at Benevent, from June 23, 1053, to March 12, 1054. He was treated with the utmost respect by his Norman conquerors, but he was not released until he left them what they had taken in the form of papal fiefs. See the articles on BERENGAR OF TOURS and CERULARIUS, and his biographies by HUNCKLER, 1851 (German) and SPACH, 1864 (French).

Leo X. (April 11, 1513–Dec. 1, 1521), b. at Florence, Dec. 11, 1475; the second son of Lorenzo the Magnificent and Clarissa Orsini; received the tonsure when he was seven years old, and was in the very next year made Archbishop of Aix by King Louis XI. of France. Pope Sixtus IV., however, had some scruples with respect to his age; and he had to content himself with the rich abbey of Passignano, and a number of other benefices. In 1488 (that is, in his thirteenth year) he was made cardinal deacon of Santa Maria in Dominica; and the only reservation which Innocent VIII. took was, that he should not put on the insignia of his dignity, nor take part in the business of his office, until he was sixteen years old. Meanwhile, his education was carried on without the least regard to the position he was going to occupy in the church. Politician was his teacher in Latin; Johannes Argyrophilus, in Greek; Marsilius Ficinus, and Pico of Mirandola, in philosophy. The Humanists, with their refined Paganism, were his daily converse: the Renaissance, with its elegant sensuality, was the atmosphere in which he breathed. In 1492 he was solemnly introduced into the College of Cardinals, and intrusted with the government of Tuscany as papal legate. During the reign of Alexander VI. he was in the eclipse. The Mediceans were expelled from Florence, and he himself found it advisable to keep aloof from Rome, journeying in Germany, Flanders, and France. But under Julius II. he was again in favor; and his luxurious residence in Rome swarmed with poets, philosophers, artists, and litterateurs of all descriptions. In the battle at Ravenna he held the supreme command, but was defeated, and taken prisoner. He was to be transported to France; but in Milan he escaped, and returned to Florence. While there, he heard of the death of Julius II. (Feb. 21, 1513). He was sick from a disease which cannot be spoken of, and which was never cured (GREGOROVITZ: Geschichte der Stadt Rom, viii. 197). Nevertheless, he hastened to Rome, and arrived in time to make a bargain with a party of the cardinals (HÖFLER: Zur Kritik und Quellenkunde, etc., in the Memoirs of the Imperial Academy of Vienna, Philos.-Hist. Classe, vol. xxviii.). He was elected and enthroned under the loud applause of the people.

His foreign policy, always ambiguous, and often false, had in reality no other aim than the aggrandizement of the house of Medici, — the throne of Naples for his brother Julian, and Tuscany, with Ferrara and Urbino, for his nephew Lorenzo. For this purpose he connived at the French plans against Milan, and formed a secret alliance with Louis XII. On the accession of Francis I. he offered to renew the alliance, on the condition of the surrender of the crown of Naples to Julian; and, when Francis declined, he immediately joined the anti-French league. But the brilliant victory at Marignano (Sept. 13, 1515) compelled him to throw himself on the mercy of Francis I.; and at their meeting at Bologna, in December, he had to consent to the abolition of the Pragmatic Sanction and the establishment of a concordat, which gave the king, within his realm, the right of ecclesiastical jurisdiction (except in a few cases) and the right of ecclesiastical appointment, only that the annats were paid into the papal treasury. The crown of Naples should go to the house of Valois; and compensation to the house of Medici was spoken of only in very vague terms. In 1516 Julian died, and all his plans now centred in Lorenzo. By a series of abominable intrigues and atrocious wars, he was established as Duke of Urbino, and married to a princess of the royal house of France; but in 1519 he, too, died. And, in the mean time, the hatred of the great Roman families had been roused to such a pitch, that a conspiracy was formed against the Pope, among whose members were the cardinals Alfonso Petrucci (who was charged with killing Leo), Bandinello de Sauli, Soderini, Castellesi, and Riario. The conspiracy was discovered. Petrucci was decapitated; and the other cardinals escaped, only by paying enormous sums. As Leo at the same time created thirty-one new cardinals, each of whom had to pay a considerable fee, a rumor arose, that the conspiracy was a mere fiction, a device for making money, a financial operation. The creation, however, of the thirty-one new cardinals, was a necessity. He needed a college which he could trust, or at least manage; for the affairs became more and more complicated. He wished neither Charles V. nor Francis I. to be elected king of Germany in 1519: either of them was too powerful. Nevertheless, he supported both; and when Charles V. was elected, and a secret alliance was concluded with him, Leo continued to negotiate with Francis until Charles, exasperated by his double-facedness, compelled him to make his choice, and stick to his words.

The finances were, indeed, the sore point of the reign of Leo X. Though the revenues of the Holy See were enormous, they were insufficient by far to meet the prodigality of the Pope. The taxes had been raised to the highest possible point in the papal dominions; a tithe had been levied on all Christendom for the purpose of a crusade; loans were made in Italian banking-houses at forty per cent; every benefice of the church was sold and resold in Rome: and yet every day the same question arose, — how to procure money. The sale of indulgences seemed to be a good idea, but it stirred up Luther in Germany. Leo instituted a process against him, though probably without understanding the whole bearing of the question. Meanwhile, the golden spring stopped running, however much its waters were needed. It cost money to keep Raphael and Michelangelo busy, to buy manuscripts, form libraries, and found universities, to make all his friends and favorites happy; and yet the sums spent in those ways were very small indeed when compared with what he squandered on frivolous luxury, or sunk in ambitious schemes. When he died — to the despair of his creditors — there was not money enough in the treasury to pay for the funeral candles.

Leo XI. (elected April 1, consecrated April 10, d. April 27, 1605) belonged to the family of Medici. See PETRUCELLI DELLA GATTINA: Hist. diplom. des conclaves, ii. 404-452.

Leo XII. (Sept. 28, 1823-Feb. 10, 1829), Annibale della Genga; b. Aug. 22, 1760; descended from a noble family in the Romagna; was ordained priest in 1783, and made archbishop of Tyre in 1793, and cardinal in 1816. After the death of Pius VII., he carried the conclave, principally because he was a decided adversary of Consalvi. Nevertheless, all the principal acts of his reign — the close approach to France, the strict measures against the Carbonari, the jubilee of 1825, the organization of the church in the South-American republics, the assertions for the emancipation of the Roman Catholics in England, etc. — were due to the direct influence of Consalvi. In spite of his encyclical of May 3, 1824, which condemned the maxims of tolerance as identical with indifference, and contained some very harsh invectives against the Bible societies, the general character of his reign was moderation. See ARTAUD DE MONTOR: Histoire du pape Léon XII. (Paris, 1843, 2 vols.), of which SCHERER's Leo XII. (Schaffhausen, 1844) is only a miserable compilation. LEON, Luis de, b. at Belmonte, in Southern Spain, 1527; d. at Salamanca, Aug. 23, 1591. When sixteen years old, he entered the order of the Augustinians, and in 1561 he was appointed professor of theology at Salamanca. As he always, in his studies, went back to the sources,—the Scriptures and the Fathers,—his enemies succeeded in making him suspected of being connected with the Reformation; and he spent five years in the dungeons of the Inquisition, but was finally acquitted in 1571. The acts of his process were published in Madrid, 1847. See also JOSÉ GONZALES DE TEJADA: Vida de Fray Luis de Leon, Madrid, 1863. He also distinguished himself as a poet. His poetical works were published in a collected edition in Madrid, 1804–16, 6 vols. See TICKNOR: History of Spanish Literature, Boston, 1864, 2d ed., ii. 75–87. BENRATH.

LEONTIUS OF BYZANTIUM. Great confusion has gathered around this name. A number of books bearing it on the titlepage were certainly written by the same man; but the relation between him and one or two other authors is very doubtful. He is styled "Byzantinus," as a native of Byzantium; or "Hierosolymitanus," as an inmate of the monastery of St. Saba, near Jerusalem; or "advocatus," and "scholasticus," probably because he was a lawyer or a rhetorician, before he became a monk. The identification of these surnames, however, is not altogether without difficulties; and Basnage distinguishes, though unnecessarily, between Byzantinus and Hierosolymitanus. Nor are the dates of his life easy to fix, though, as he speaks of the tritheistic controversy (about 564), he must have written towards the close of the sixth century. The works which with certainty belong to him are, De sectis, a valuable contribution to hæresiology, first printed (the Greek text with the Latin translation of Lennelavius) at Basel, 1578, and afterwards incorporated with the collections of Morell. (xi.), Galland. (xii.), and others; Contra Nestorianos et Eutyphianos, a polemical treatise, somewhat unreadable on account of its lengthy and hair-drawn dialectics, but serviceable as an introduction into the subtleties of the Monophysite controversies (first edited in Latin by Canisius, in Lectio. antiquar., iv., and then in Greek by Angelo Mai, in Spicileg. Rom., xii.); Adversus Aphthartolocetes and Adversus fraudes Apollinaristorum, both in Spicileg. Rom.; finally Dubitationes hypotheticæ (Latin, by Canisius; Greek, by A. Mai), in Script. vet., vii.

To be distinguished from this Leontius is another, who, in the beginning of the seventh century, was a bishop of Neapolis, or Hagiapolis, in Cyprus, and wrote homilies, which have been published by Combefis in Auct. nov. Bibl., Paris, 1618. He is sometimes identified with the preceding, but without sufficient reason. See F. SARTORIUS: Homilia Leontii in Jobum, Dorpat, 1828. In the beginning of the tenth century, about 920, the chronographer Leontius of Byzantium wrote, on the instance of Constantine Porphyrogenetus, a life of the Emperor Leo Armenius, which has found a place among the works of the Byzantine historians, as a continuation of Theophanes. Fabricius names other authors of the name Leontius, but they have no importance. GASS.

LEPROSY. This disease—one of the most fearful of ancient and modern times, slow and insidious in its onset, but generally keeping steadily on its destructive course, in spite of all the skill of medical art—has existed from times preceding the ages which history takes cognizance of in its backward sweep, has spread widely over the civilized and barbarous world, and still exists endemically in some regions. The Hebrews were sorely afflicted with it before leaving Egypt (indeed, the banks of the Nile, with their humid atmosphere, seem to have been a cradle of the disease); so much so, that, according to the historian Manetho (Josephus: Cont. Ap., I, 26), the Egyptians drove them out on account of this plague of leprosy. It probably existed in Syria before the Hebrews came, bringing it with them into that country. From Egypt and Palestine it spread to Greece and Italy, and other countries bordering upon the Mediterranean. It appears to have been introduced into Central and Western Europe somewhere between the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, probably through the agency of the returning crusaders, and spread with alarming rapidity. Towards the end of the fifteenth century, it had almost disappeared from those sections of Europe, and somewhat curiously, as it disappeared, syphilis appeared, thus giving ground for the opinion of some authors, that syphilis is a debased form of leprosy; but this view is no longer held. At present, leprosy, or Elephantiasis Grecorum, is found on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean, Black, and Caspian Seas, in Norway, Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine, on the coasts of the Indian and China Seas, in the islands of the Australian Archipelago, in South and Central America, and in Iceland.

By almost all peoples and races, leprosy has been regarded as a visitation of God on account of some sin, and the lepers have been kept apart from the rest of the people. The Jews were told that it came upon a man for idolatry, blasphemy, unchastity, theft, slander, false witness, false judgment, perjury, infringing the borders of a neighbor, devising malicious plans, or creating discord between brothers. Lepers were considered unclean (Lev. xiii. 44–46), had to rend their garments (excepting in the case of the women), cover their faces, go with unkempt hair, and cry, "Unclean, unclean!" They had to live without the camp or city; had a special part of the synagogue reserved for them; and any thing they touched, or into whatsoever house they entered, was declared unclean. An elaborate ceremonial was prescribed for the cleansing of the leper when the disease had left him; for which see Lev. xiv. Amongst the Jews, not only was leprosy considered as attacking human beings, but also it was declared to be in garments, houses, and vessels (Lev. xiii. 47–59 and xiv. 33–53); and ceremonials were prescribed for their cleansing. The exact nature of this leprosy of garments and houses is not known. Its distinctive signs were, in a garment, greenish or reddish spots, which spread; in a house, greenish or reddish streaks lower than the surface of the wall, which spread. This was, probably, in either case, a species of mildew, or else indicated the presence of some fungus, which, by contact, would generate disease in the human. The Targum of Palestine regarded it as a visitation on a house built with unjust gains.

The Persians went even farther than the Jews, and excluded foreign lepers from their country. The Greek writers thought leprosy was a punishment for some sin against Phœbus. The Arabs will neither sleep near, eat with, lepers, nor marry into families known to be leprosy. By the Church of Rome in early ages, lepers were regarded as dead, and the last rites of the church were said over them. In 757 A.D. it was declared a ground for divorce, and the sound party could marry again. In France, at different times, laws were passed forbidding lepers to marry. The leper lost all control of his property, and could not inherit any: he could not act as a witness, nor challenge to a duel. Oddly enough, while, in general, leprosy was regarded as a punishment, in some parts of Europe it was held to be a sign of divine preference for those attacked; as, in a woman, it was to preserve her chastity. They were regarded as saints, and rendered much honor and alms. All over Europe the lepers had to live apart, and had special churches, priests, etc. In the fifteenth century a special dress was prescribed for them. The houses in which these unfortunate ones lived were called "lazar-houses." They were generally located just outside the gates of the cities, in close proximity to some body of water; so that the inmates could bathe. They were usually religious in character. The inmates had to be silent, and attend morning prayer and mass; and in some of the houses they had to say so many prayers each day, that they had very little time for any thing else. No woman was allowed to enter the male lazarus-houses, excepting the washer-woman; and she had to be of sober age and good manners, and must enter the house at a fixed time of day, when she could be seen of all. A female relative had to obtain special permission before she could speak to a male leper. These houses were supported largely by begging, entirely by alms.

Frequently leprosy is hereditary, the disease lying dormant in the system for a number of years, to break out at or after the age of puberty. By proper hygiene the outbreak may be prevented. Often the etiology is obscure, and various conjectures have been formed as to it. Doubtless it is due to some poison in the blood. It is seen mostly in localities where air and earth are humid, as upon the coasts of seas, banks of rivers, and on islands; and the climatic is probably the largest factor in its production. Thus, during the forty-years' wandering of the Jews in the desert, with its dry atmosphere, it is likely that fewer cases occurred than when in the land of Egypt. That food has any great influence upon the development of the disease is questionable; though it would seem that bad water, salt or decayed fish, salt meat, etc., aggravate the disease. It has been thought by some commentators that the Jews were forbidden to eat pork on account of its tendency to produce leprosy. Violent outbreaks of passion have been assigned as a cause, as in the case of Uzziah, who, in a fit of passion, performed a priestly office (2 Chron. xxvi. 21). By the ancients it was thought to be contagious, but this theory has recently lost ground. By some, the disease is thought to be of nervous origin. As to sex, more males are attacked than females. Neither rich nor poor are exempt. Some authorities now claim to have found a parasite peculiar to leprosy.

Between what is called "leprosy" in our version of the Bible, and the leprosy as described by the best authorities on skin diseases, there is very little correspondence: indeed, the writer is inclined to adopt the theory advanced in the article on leprosy in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible (American edition, vol. ii. p. 1630), that the leprosy of the Mosaic dispensation (Lepra Mosaica) is not one disease, but an enumeration of certain symptoms, which, on account of their frightful character, and tendency to spread, would render the individual an object of aversion, and demand his separation. It is certainly but in few points akin to Elephantiasis Græcorum, the modern leprosy. The symptoms of leprosy, as in Lev. xiii., and the expression used there and elsewhere,—leprosy, "white as snow,"—lead one to conjecture that the Lepra Mosaica is analogous to the Lepra vulgaris, more commonly called Psoriasis. For the sake of clearness we will give briefly the biblical leprosy, and then the modern form. It must be remembered that diseases have a tendency to change their form as they move from land to land, and this may account somewhat for the marked difference in the diseases now presented.

Lepra Mosaica (Heb. Tzara'ath), leprosy of Lev. xiii. and xiv. Its most marked symptoms were "a rising, a scab, or a bright spot," "in the skin of the flesh" (Lev. xiii. 2), with a hair turned white in the rising, scab, or bright spot, these being deeper than the scarf-skin (xiii. 3), and spreading of the scab, etc. (xiii. 7. 8). As a more advanced case we have "quick raw flesh in the rising" (xiii. 10). In verse 18 we find that the disease may take its origin in a boil, with the same symptoms. In verse 29 we have the disease appearing in the beard, or hair of the head.—a great calamity to the Jew, who was so proud of his beard; and here it comes in the form of a scall, with thin yellow hairs in the patches. These are all the symptoms we have; and they are probably given merely as initial symptoms, so that the priest should recognize the onslaught of different diseases in their earliest stages. The "rising" may correspond to the tubercles of Lepra tuberculosa, or the bulles of Lepra anæsthetica of the most recent authors. The scall of the head may be the Morphæa alopeciata, or Formange, placed by Kaposi (Hautkrankheiten, Wien, 1880) as a subdivision of the second form of leprosy,—the Lepra maculosa. In verses 12-17 we read, that if the patient is white all over, he is clean, no doubt because the disease had then run its course. In this case it is probably a general Psoriasis.

Modern leprosy, the Elephantiasis Græcorum, is divided into three varieties: (1) Lepra tuberosa, the tubercular form; (2) Lepra maculosa, the spotted or streaked form; (3) Lepra anæsthetica, the anæsthetic form. For months or years before the outbreak of the disease, the patient may have vague prodromal symptoms, as weakness, loss of appetite, sleeplessness, lassitude, slight fever, diarrhoea, and sometimes pemphigus blebs (little blisters). In the Lepra tuberosa the disease begins with the outbreak, on the general surface of the body, of irregular or round shaped spots, in size from a finger-nail to the palm of the hand; at first red, and disappearing under pressure; soon becoming gray to sepia brown or bronze color. Over the spots the skin is smooth and glistening (as if painted with oil), or bronzed and thickened, or slightly prominent, and painful on pressure. The spots are distributed over the trunk and extremities,—face, hands, and feet. In some situations they become confluent: in some disappear; in others disappear in the centre, while the peripheries extend, thus forming ring shapes. The tubercles, the distinctive type of this form, appear after the disease has lasted months, or may be years; are of various sizes, up to that of a hazel-nut at the surface of the skin, or somewhat protruding; dirty-brown-red and glistening; hard-elastic to soft to the touch, covered with epidermis scales; diffuse, or closely pressed together, and forming, either irregular uneven plaques, or regular circles. They are principally located on the face and ears. On the eyebrows they form thick parallel rows, projecting over the eyes; on the cheeks, nose, and chin they are massed into irregular heaps. The lips become thick, swollen, and protruding; the under-lip hangs down; and this, with the prominent, overhanging, knotty eyebrows, and the deeply-wrinkled forehead, gives the countenance a morose and stupid appearance. Sometimes the eyelids are everted, and the lobes of the ears hang down in thick masses. Consequent upon the eversion of the eyelids, disease of the eye sets in. The extremities also become tuberculated, though not so much as the face; and the presence of tubercles in the palms of the hands and soles of the feet render handling and walking very painful. Tubercles appear in the mucous membrane of the mouth, pharynx, and upper part of larynx; the tongue becoming thick and cracked, with loss of taste ensuing; the larynx becoming narrow, with loss of voice; the breath becoming sweetish. After many months, these tubercles may be absorbed, leaving behind dark pigmented atrophic places: sometimes they soften centrally, and spread out peripherally; sometimes break down, and form leprosy ulcers, which tend to skin over, only to break down again. Sometimes the ulceration goes deeper; necrosis joins itself to it; a diffused inflammation sets in, leading, in the under extremities especially, to deep excavation, and finally opening of joints, and self-amputation of entire members (Lepra mutilans). Earlier or later anaesthesia develops in different parts of the body, and the ulnar nerve will be found enlarged and cordy. The disease is generally chronic, lasting some eight to ten years, the patient dying of specific marasmus, or some complicating disease of internal organs. Or the disease may be more acute, with high fever, and reaching in a few months to a state which in other cases is not reached in years. This disease is supposed to have been the one with which Job was afflicted, though this is questioned. The Lepra maculosa is characterized by the appearance on the skin of a large number of red or brown glistening spots, or by diffuse dark pigmentation, intermixed with which are white points, spots, or stripes; so that the body seems streaked. This frequently changes into the former variety, or into the

Lepra anaesthetica, in which anaesthesia is the marked feature. It succeeds to the preceding forms, or else begins with an outbreak of pemphigus bullae (water-blisters), which, on healing, leave white, glistening, and anaesthetic places, or, breaking, leave ulcerations. Sometimes anaesthesia appears on fully normal places: sometimes the spot has been red and hyperaesthetic for months before. Over the anaesthetic spots the skin often becomes wrinkled, the wrinkled places being bounded by a red, hyperaesthetic border; the wrinkling only taking place where the anaesthetic spots have become stable, for at first they tend to change their location. The anaesthesia is complete, the patient not feeling a needle thrust deep into the muscles. The chief nerve-trunks become swollen, and painful to pressure. Sometimes hyperaesthesia precedes anaesthesia to such a degree, that the patient is not able to sit or lie for any length of time in one place, cannot take any thing in his hands, and walking and standing give him the greatest pain. The anaesthesia is followed by atrophy of muscles, and wrinkling; the sphincter muscle of the eye becomes lamed; the under eyelid and the under-lip hang down; the tears flow over the cheeks; and the saliva runs dribbling out of the mouth; and thus the face oftentimes, already swollen and out of shape by the presence of the tubercles, assumes a peculiar, old, idiotic, foolish expression. The flexor muscles of the hand not being atrophied so much as the extensor, the fingers become half bent, the hollow of the hand becomes convex and pressed forward, the back of the hand bent in; the finger-ends become clubbed, finger-nails thinned; the hair falls out. Ulceration finally sets in in the anaesthetic places, or the tissues gradually atrophy away till the skin, fasciae, tendons, disappear, one or another joint is laid bare, when suddenly a whole foot, hand, or extremity falls off. Patient grows foolish and apathetic, and dies after a lapse of eighteen to nineteen years.

The tubercles are composed of a granulation membrane rich in cells, which follows the walls of the vessels, and spreads out from them through the whole thickness of the skin, setting up, by the pressure caused by its presence, a disturbance of circulation and function of the skin; and, extending into the deeper parts, gives rise to a painless suppuration of the joints. The tubercles are also deposited in the main nerve-trunks, at first only in their sheaths, but ultimately pressing in between the fibrillae.

Treatment is only symptomatic. The best is to remove the patient from leprosy regions.

The lepers whom our Lord healed were probably not afflicted with Elephantiasis Grecorum, but with Elephantiasis vulgaris (Psoriasis).

Outside of Jerusalem is a hospital for lepers, managed by a Moravian couple, who, in a truly Christ-like spirit, care for these wretched and disgusting sufferers.

Leprosy is biblically regarded as an emblem of sin, because of its loathsomeness, its affecting every part, and its incurability, save upon divine intervention. Again, as leprosy excluded one from the abodes of mortals, sin excludes us from heaven, the abode of God.

LERINS, Convent of. When, in the latter part of the fourth century, the enthusiasm of asceticism, after the model of the Egyptian anchorites and monks, began to spread in Western Europe, the islands strewn along the coasts of Dalmatia, Italy, and Southern France became the favorite abodes of the votaries of the new spiritual life. The two islands in front of Cannes — Lero, the larger, the present Sainte Marguerite, and Lerinum, the minor, the present Saint Honorat — were also peopled with anchorites; and about 400 St. Honorat settled with his followers on the latter. A cœnobium was formed, a monastery was built; and from the middle of the fifth century the convent of Lerins exercised for several centuries a decisive influence on the church of Southern France. In course of time, the discipline became weakened. At the close of the sixth century Gregory the Great (Ep., V. 56, IX. 8) admonished the abbot Bonon, or Conon, to introduce reform. A little later Attala left Lerins, and joined Columbanus at Luxovium (JONAS BOBE: Vita Attalæ, in MABILLOX: Act. Sanct., ii. 123). In the middle of the seventh century, the attempt of Aigulf to introduce the rules of St. Benedict resulted in his assassination (ALDECRALDAS: Vita Aigulfi, in MABILLOX: Acta Sanct., ii. 629). Nevertheless the moral standing of the institution was generally commendable; and though the monastery was plundered in the eighth century by the Arabs, in the tenth by the Saracens, and afterwards by Genoese pirates, it gradually grew immensely rich. In the fourteenth century the monks refused to be called fratres, and demanded to be called domini; and a chapter-general of 1319 decided that the monks should be allowed to hold private property, and do with it as they liked. But the real decay of the institution began with the removal of the papal residence to Avignon. After discovering how wealthy the abbey was, John XXII., Clement VI., Innocent VI., in order to get hold of a part of that wealth, gave away the abbey in commendam, that is, sold it. In the second half of the fifteenth century the institution partially lost its independence, and was united to the Benedictine Congregation of St. Justina of Padua, generally called the Congregation of Monte Cassino. Hence resulted a great deal of haggling between the Italian congregation and the French government, until, in 1732, Fleury simply dissolved the union. In 1788 the abbey was secularized and the monastery closed; and in 1791 the island was sold.

LESLEY, John, b. in Scotland, 1527; d. in a monastery at Gurtenburg, near Brussels, May 31, 1596. He was educated at the university of Aberdeen, where he became canon in 1547. He was a vigorous champion of the Roman faith and of Mary Queen of Scots. He appeared against Knox in the disputation at Edinburgh (1561), and, as one of the commissioners, brought Mary to Scotland. In 1565 he was made Bishop of Ross. He shared the misfortunes of the royal cause, and participated in, indeed originated, some of the innumerable intrigues Mary connived at. For this conduct he suffered imprisonment. But he made good use of his enforced leisure by gathering materials for his De origine moribus et rebus gestis Scotorum, a history of Scotland, in ten books, down to 1561, published at Rome, 1578; reprinted in Holland, 1675. Upon this work his fame rests; but he also wrote much in defence of Mary, and for her benefit composed Piæ afflicti animi consolationes et tranquillæ animi munimentum, Paris, 1574. He was released in 1573, went to the Continent, endeavored to enlist foreign princes in behalf of Mary. In 1593 he was made Bishop of Coutances in Normandy, but soon after, wearied with life, retired to a monastery. See his Life, London, 1885.

LESLIE, Charles, author of A Short and Easy Method with the Deists; b. at Raphoe, County Donegal, Ireland, 1650; d. at Glaslough, Monaghan, April 13, 1722. His father (d. 1671) had been bishop of the Orkneys, of Raphoe, and of Clogher successively. Charles was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1671; removed to England, and studied law at the Temple, but in 1680 took orders in the Church of England. He returned to Ireland in 1687; became chancellor of the Cathedral of Connor, but lost his position in consequence of his refusal to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary. In this he was true to his family traditions (for his father had been privy councillor to Charles I.) and to his declared preferences. In 1689 he went to England, and for twenty years lived unmolested, carrying vigorously on his controversies against Quakers, Socinians, Roman Catholics, Jews, and, above all, Deists. In 1710 he published The Good Old Cause; or, lying in Truth, — a pamphlet against Bishop Burnet, with whom he had had previously a controversy on the doctrine of passive obedience, to which he as a non-juror held; and soon after fled to the Pretender, at Bar-le-Duc. He staid faithfully in the Pretender's service, tried to win the latter to Protestantism, shared his hopes and misfortunes; but in 1721 he obtained permission to return home, where he soon after died.

Leslie is now remembered principally by one book, A Short and Easy Method with the Deists, wherein the Certainty of the Christian Religion is demonstrated by Infallible Proof from Four Rules, which are Incompatible to any Imposture that ever yet has been, or that can possibly be, London, 1697 (often reprinted, e.g., in Bohn's Christian Evidences, London, 1867, pp. 367-387). In Bohn's edition it is stated that the rough draft of it was written in three days, in response to a request for a simple proof of the truth of Christianity, from Thomas, first Duke of Leeds, who said, on perusing it, "I thought I was a Christian before, but now I am sure of it." The argument has been thus given: "The Christian religion consists of facts and doctrines, the one depending on the other; so that, if the facts are true, the doctrines must be true. The truth of a matter of fact may be certainly known, if it be attended with certain marks such as no false fact can possibly have." These marks, as stated by Leslie, are four: "1st, That the matter of fact be such as that men's outward senses, their eyes and ears, may be judges of it; 2d, That it be done publicly, in the face of the world; 3d, That not only public monuments be kept up in memory of it, but some outward actions be performed; 4th, That such monuments, and such actions or observances, be instituted, and do commence, from the time that the matter of fact was done." Leslie endeavors to prove that the facts of Christianity have these marks, therefore Christianity is the true religion. Besides this work, he wrote many others: A Short and Easy Method with the Jews (1698); The Truth of Christianity demonstrated in a Dialogue betwixt a Christian and a Deist, wherein the Case of the Jews is likewise considered; The Snake in the Grass (1696, against the Quakers), etc. Dr. Johnson said he "was a reasoner, and a reasoner who was not to be reasoned against." Bishop Horne mentions that he (Leslie) "is said to have brought more persons from other persuasions into the Church of England than any man ever did." Leslie was an intense High-Churchman, and applied to the Dissenters the same rough-shod logic he did to the Deists; declaring, that, since they had not possession of the ground, they must show cause why they should exist. His activity as a politician was quite as great as a theologian. For nearly seven years (1704-11) he maintained a paper entitled Rehearsals, or a View of the Times, their Principles and Practices (2d ed. 1750, 6 vols.), "published at first once, and afterwards twice, a week; written in the form of a dialogue, and entirely confined to the state of public affairs." He collected and published his Theological Works himself, London, 1721, 2 vols. folio. They have since been republished (Oxford, 1832, 7 vols. 8vo), with a Life prefixed.

LESS, Gottfried, b. at Conitz, West Prussia, Jan. 31, 1736; d. at Hanover, Aug. 28, 1797. He studied theology at Jena and Halle; travelled in Holland and England; and was appointed professor of theology in Göttingen, 1763, and court-preacher at Hanover in 1791. He was a very prolific writer. Influenced by the Pietism reigning in Halle, and by the lectures of Baumgarten, Wolff's most prominent disciple, he stands in literature as a transition from orthodoxy, through Pietism and Wolffianism, to rationalism. His principal works are: Beweis der Wahrheit der christlichen Religion, Bremen, 1768, 5th ed., 1785 [part of which has been translated into English under the title, Authenticity, Uncorrupted Preservation, and Credibility of the New Testament, London, 1804; reprinted in Bohn's Christian Treasury, London, 1863]; Handb. d. christl. Moral, 1777, 1th ed., 1787.

Even his dogmatical works, Handbuch d. christl. Religionstheorie, etc., have a decidedly practical and apologetical character. See his biography by Holscher, Hanover, 1797. WAGENMANN.

LESSING, Gotthold Ephraim, b. at Kamenz in Upper Lusatia, Jan. 22, 1729; d. at Brunswick, Feb. 15, 1781. His father, a Lutheran minister, took him out of the school of Kamenz, because the rector, in an opening address, had called the theatre a school of eloquence. Nevertheless, when in 1746 young Lessing was sent to the university of Leipzig to study theology, it was the stage, where just at that moment the famous actress Neuber shone her brightest, which occupied the larger portion of his attention. He studied theology, philosophy, and philology; and in each of these departments of science he, in course of time, not only accumulated a vast amount of knowledge, but acquired real insight. Nevertheless, æsthetics, literature, and more especially the drama, formed the true field of his genius. In 1748 Neuber brought out Lessing's first play (Der junge Gelehrte) on the stage; and in the same year Lessing removed to Berlin, where, with various incidental interruptions, he resided till 1760. In Berlin he exclusively occupied himself with literary work, though for some time he still wore the title of Studiosus medicinae. He made the acquaintance of Voltaire, whose pleas in the notorious suit against Hirsch he translated into German. He also made the acquaintance of Mendelssohn and Nicolai, with whom he edited the Briefe, die neueste Litteratur betreffend. Many of his criticisms attracted attention. His new drama, Miss Sara Sampson (1755), produced a sensation. He began to make a name for himself. In 1760 he accepted a position as secretary to Gen. von Tauentzien at Breslau, and there he remained till 1765. The life in the barracks did not displease him; and he found time to continue his studies, and write Laokoon and Minna von Barnhelm. The prospect of a position as librarian in Berlin allured him away from Breslau, but deceived him. In 1767 he went to Hamburg as a kind of artistic director of the theatre of the city; and there he staid till 1770, to which period belong his Dramaturgie and his archaeological controversy with Klotz. In 1770 he was appointed librarian at Wolfenbüttel; and while there he published Emilie Galotti (1772) and Nathan der Weise (1779, translated into English by Ellen Frothingham, New York, 1871), Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts (1780), and the Fragmente eines Ungenannten (1774-78) [partially translated into English, Fragments from Reimarus, London, 1879], together with the whole Goeze controversy.

The influence which Lessing exercised on German literature, through his criticism and through his dramas, was decisive, and is unmistakable with respect to its character. More obscure is his relation to theology. If those who still make a distinction between the religion of Christ and the Christian religion are right, then they may point to Lessing as their predecessor and the founder of a new theological school. If, indeed, this so-called religion of Christ is the true Christianity, then Lessing was certainly a true Christian, a Protestant in the full sense of the word; and he has carried farther the work of Luther. But if, on the other side, those are right, who, on the instance of Schleiermacher, consider the personal relation to the person of the Saviour, and not the doctrinal system, as the essence of Christianity, then Lessing was, in spite of the deep veneration which he always nourished for Jesus of Nazareth, not a Christian man. His theological stand-point is very difficult to define. First, as he confesses himself, he often spoke as a learner, not as a teacher. Next, he evidently went through no important development during the latter part of his life, for he remained pretty much as he was before. F. H. Jacobi has published a conversation which he held with Lessing at Wolfenbüttel, July 6 and 7, 1780; but it does not show that Lessing ended a confirmed Spinozist; while Wackernagel, Stirn, and others think that they have discovered in his Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts a decided progress towards Christianity. Both these opinions are probably somewhat exaggerated. The truth seems to be, that, even at the end of his life, Lessing's theological stand-point was still in the process of formation; that is, unfinished, unsettled. See also arts GOEZE, and WOLFENBÜTTEL FRAGMENTS.

LESSIUS, Leonhard, b. at Brecht-in-Brabant, Oct. 1, 1554; d. at Louvain, Jan. 5, 1623. He was a member of the Society of Jesu, and teacher of philosophy and theology at Louvain. He owed his reputation principally to his work on morals, Libri IV. de Justitia, 1605 (afterwards often reprinted), though it shows the same marks of sophistry as most works on morals by Jesuits. At present he is remembered chiefly on account of the part he took in the Augustinian controversies. The Pope having condemned seventy-six propositions in the writings of Bajus (1567), Lessius went so far in his polemics that the faculty of Louvain, in 1587, found occasion to condemn as Pelagian thirty-four propositions drawn from his works and those of Hamel, another Jesuit. LESTINES, Synod of. At Liftina, or Léstines, a royal villa near Binche in Hainault, the second Austrasian synod during the reign of Carloman was held, probably in 743. The acts of that synod are in many respects nothing but a confirmation of the acts of the first Austrasian synod of 742. At some points, however, the tendency of modelling the ecclesiastical organization of Austrasia after that of the primitive Church stands out quite prominently, and with respect to immense secularization, under the Carolingians, of the estates of the Church, which almost amounted to a formal divisio between Church and State, the acts are of great interest. LEUSDEN, Johannes, b. at Utrecht, April 26, 1624; d. there Sept. 30, 1699. He studied theology, and especially Oriental languages, in his native city and in Amsterdam, and was appointed professor of Hebrew at Utrecht in 1650. His lectures, distinguished by clearness and learning, were much frequented; and his elementary Hebrew grammar and dictionary (1688) were much used. He edited the Hebrew Bible (1617), the Greek Testament (1675 and often), the Septuagint (1683), and the Syriac New Testament, and wrote valuable philological treatises and commentaries. A complete list of his works is found in BURMANN: Traject. erudit., pp. 187-191. See also J. FABRICIUS: Hist. Bibl. Fabr., i. p. 244.

LE'VI. See TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

LEVI'ATHAN, described in a highly poetical, but not a legendary or hyperbolical, manner, in Job. xli. is probably, in that passage, the crocodile, which Tristram thus describes: "The whole head, back, and tail are covered with quadrangular horny plates or scales, which not only protect the body, a rifle-ball glancing off from them as from a rock, but also serve as ballast, enabling the creature to sink rapidly, on being disturbed, by merely expelling the air from its lungs." The crocodile is now rarely seen, even in Upper Egypt, although once common up to the very mouth of the Nile. The "leviathan" of Ps. lxxiv. 14 and Isa. xxvii. 1 is also the crocodile; but in Ps. civ. 26 the word is probably used of the whale. By "whirlpool," in the margin of Job xli. (A.V.), is probably meant a sperm-whale. See EASTWOOD and WRIGHT: Bible Word Book.

LEVIRATE MARRIAGE. This is the name applied to an ancient usage of the Hebrews (Gen. xxxviii.), and re-ordained by Moses (Deut. xxv. 5-10), that, when an Israelite died without leaving male issue, his brother resident with him was compelled to marry the widow (cf. also Matt. xxii. 24). The first-born son issuing from this marriage was to continue the deceased brother's family, that his name be not put out of Israel. In case a man only left daughters, and no brother to marry his widow, then the daughters were married to men belonging to the same tribe, who had to keep up the name and patrimony of the deceased. In case a man left children, the brother was not allowed to marry the deceased's wife (Lev. xviii. 16, xx. 21). In case of a brother living in a far distance, he was dispensed from the levirate law. When there was no brother alive, the levirate law, as we see from the case of Ruth, extended to the nearest relative of the deceased husband. As sometimes damages were connected with another marriage, a good many tried to get rid of the levirate law. There existed no legal objection, but a moral one, in a certain sense. In case of unwillingness, the brother's wife could cite him before the elders. If he there insisted upon his intention, and the court did not regard his reasons as satisfactory, the widow had to "loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, saying, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed" (Deut. xxv. 9 sq.). Different is the case in Ruth iv. 7, where the nearest kinsman who resigned the right or duty (being neither the brother-in-law of Ruth nor Mahlon's brother) drew off his shoe. This plucking off the shoe was an ancient symbol of ceding a property. The widow was not to marry another man so long as she thought it possible that her brother-in-law would fulfil his duty: if she did, such a connection was regarded as adultery, and the offender was burnt (Gen. xxxviii. 24). High priests (Lev. xxi. 14) were not bound to adhere to this law. That this law was yet in full power in the time of Jesus, we see from Matt. xxii. 24 sq.

LEVITES. The Levites are the descendants of Levi, the third son of Jacob, by Leah (Gen. xxix. 34, xxxv. 23). This name was given to him by his mother, with the assurance, "This time will my husband be joined unto me." One fact only is recorded of him, the deed perpetrated with his brother Simeon upon the Shechemites (Gen. xxxiv. 25 sq.), in consequence of which, Jacob has no blessing for these two sons, but rather, "cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel. I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel" (Gen. xlix. 5 sq.). Levi died in Egypt, aged a hundred and thirty-seven years; left three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (Gen. xlvi. 11; Exod. vi. 16), from whom went forth eight branches (Exod. vi. 17-19; Num. iii. 17-39 [comp. 1 Chron. vi. 1 sq., and xxiii.]). — two from Gershon, Libni (for which 1 Chron. xxiii. 7 reads Ladan) and Shimei; four from Kohath, Amram (to whom belonged Moses and Aaron), Ishar, Hebron, and Uzziel; and two from Merari, Mahali and Mushi. When, after the making of the golden calf, Moses called upon those who were on the Lord's side, the Levites gathered themselves together unto him, and slew those who had sinned (Exod. xxxii. 26 sq.). In them the zeal of their progenitor was revived, but not for their own, but for God's honor; and for this cause the curse resting upon them is changed into a blessing.

From this time they occupy a prominent position: they become consecrated unto the Lord. According to Exod. xiii. every first-born of man or cattle is dedicated unto Jehovah since the exodus from Egypt. In place of the first-born of all the children of Israel, Jehovah now takes the Levites (Num. viii. 16), and, instead of their cattle, that of the Levites (iii. 15). Since, according to verse 13, all the first-born males were 22,273, the number of the Levites, however, only was 22,000, the surplus is equalized by a redemption money of five shekels apiece, to be paid to Aaron and his sons (iii. 46-51). As to the significance of the representation of the first-born by the Levites, the following is to be borne in mind. As the Egyptians, on account of their sinfulness, were judged in their first-born ones, who thus became vicariously a sacrifice for the whole, which was to be destroyed; so, likewise, Israel, on the contrary, whom Jehovah has elected, and redeemed from human slavery, in testimony thereof that its very existence and possession was owing entirely to the divine grace, was to bring vicariously the first-born of his domestic blessing for the whole, as a payment to God. But the offering of men is not effected by killing, but by their dedication to a continual service in the sanctuary

(1 Sam. i. 22, 28). Since, however, the people, on account of its impurity, cannot approach God in the holy place, and consequently cannot appoint from its midst the servants for a continual service, in place of the first-born, one tribe is by divine election permanently taken away from its usual avocation, and is placed in a near relationship to Jehovah, to perform the service in the holy place, thus mediating to the people the communion of the sanctuary. The Levites are thus, in the first place, the living sacrifice with which the people pays Jehovah what it owes unto him; in the second place, they are the substitute for the first-born. In their first relation the Levites are given as a gift to the priests (Num. xviii. 6): they were, with reference to their name, to join themselves to the priest, and to serve him. In their second relation the Levites take part of the mediatorial position which belongs to the priesthood. The tribe of Levi forms the basis of a gradually advancing representation of the people before God. As Israel as a whole has a priestly character over and against the nations of the earth (Exod. xix. 4-6), so is this character in a higher degree stamped upon the tribe of Levi (Num. xvi. 9). As to the functionary duties of the Levites, they are to keep the charge of the sanctuary with the priests in general, yet distinctly separated from the latter. The priests shall keep their office for every thing of the altar and within the veil (Num. xviii. 7); but the service of the Levites is called service of the tabernacle of the Lord (comp. Num. i. 53, xvi. 9, xviii. 4). In the journey through the wilderness the Levites had to bear the tabernacle and all the vessels thereof (Num. i. 50 sq.), especially, also, the ark of the covenant (Deut. xxxi. 26): the latter had to be first covered by the priests (Num. iv. 5 sq.); but the Levites were strictly forbidden to look at it (Num. iv. 17 sq.). The different duties were assigned to the three tribes (Num. iii. 25-37, and iv.). The Gershonites had charge of the coverings and curtains; the Kohathites, of the holy vessels; the Merarites, of the boards, bars, pillars. The latter and the first were under the charge of Itamar; the Kohathites, under that of Eleazar. The age required for such service was, according to Num. iv. 3, 23, 30, from thirty to fifty, whilst in Num. viii. 24, 25, it is said to commence at twenty-five. This contradiction is easily solved by the assumption that the former passages refer to the service at the transport of the tabernacle; the latter, to the Levitical service in general.

The act of consecration of the Levites is recorded Num. viii. 5-22. The first act was to sprinkle them with the water of purifying. They had, in the next place, to shave off all the hair from their body, and then wash their garments. After this, they were brought before the door of the tabernacle, along with two bullocks, and fine flour mingled with oil, when the whole congregation, through their elders who represented them, laid their hands upon the heads of the Levites, and set them apart for the service of the sanctuary, to occupy the place of the first-born of the whole congregation; whereupon the priests waved them before the Lord. Thus consecrated to the service of the Lord, it was necessary that the tribe of Levi should be relieved from the temporal pursuits of the rest of the people to enable them to give themselves wholly to their spiritual functions. For this reason they were to have no territorial possessions, but Jehovah was to be their inheritance (Num. xviii. 20; Deut. x. 9). Therefore it was ordained that they should receive from the people the tithes of the produce of the land, from which the Levites, in their turn, had to offer a tithe to the priests (Num. xviii. 21-24 sq.). The Levites could eat the tithes everywhere. As if to provide for the contingency of failing crops, or the like, and the consequent inadequacy of the tithes thus assigned to them, the Levite, no less than the widow and the orphan, was commended to the special kindness of the people (Deut. xii. 19, xiv. 27, 29).

As an abode, the Levites, according to Num. xxxv. 6, received forty-eight cities, together with their suburbs, six of which were to be cities of refuge. This provision includes also the priests. Afterwards, however, thirteen of the forty-eight cities were assigned to the priests (Josh. xxi. 4 sq.) in the territories of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon. Of the remaining thirty-five cities belonging to the Levites, ten were in the territories of Ephraim, Dan, and Half Manasseh (West), thirteen in Half Manasseh (East), Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali, and twelve in Zebulun, Reuben, and Gad. But the Levites were by no means the sole occupants or proprietors: they were simply to have in them those houses which they required as dwellings, and the fields necessary for the pasture of their cattle. This is evident from the fact that the Levites were allowed to sell their houses: otherwise Lev. xxv. 32 sq. would have no meaning, unless it is presumed that other Israelites lived together with the Levites.

That the Levites in the time of the Judges did not occupy all the cities allotted to them, may be seen from the fact that Ajalon (Josh. xxi. 24; Judg. i. 35) and Gezer (Josh. xxi. 21) were, like many other cities, not in the possession of the Israelites. The very fact that not all Canaanites were driven out from the land made it impossible to carry out the provisions for the Levites; and thus many of them sought refuge in cities not belonging to those allotted to the Levites (comp. Judg. xvii. 7, xix. 1). That, in spite of these troublesome times, the office of the Levites was known among the people, may be seen from Judg. xvii., xviii.: otherwise we could not understand why Micah (Judg. xvii. 13) should rejoice for having a Levite to his priest.

The activity of David in behalf of the cultus included also the re-organization of the Levitical order. When the ark was carried up to Jerusalem, their claim to be the bearers of it was publicly acknowledged (1 Chron. xv. 2). The Levites engaged in conveying the ark were divided into six father's houses, headed by six chiefs, four belonging to Kohath, one to Gershon, and one to Merari (1 Chron. xv. 5 sq.). Of special import is the Levites being employed for the first time in choral service (1 Chron. xv. 16-24, xvi. 4-36): others, again, were appointed as doorkeepers (1 Chron. xv. 23, 24). Still the thorough re-organization of the whole tribe was effected by David in the last days of his life, when he thought of building the temple. The Levites, from thirty years of age and upward, were, first of all, numbered, when it was found that they were thirty-eight thousand (1 Chron. xxiii. 2, 3). Of these, twenty-four thousand were appointed to assist the priests in the work of the sanctuary, six thousand as judges and scribes, four thousand as gate-keepers, and four thousand as musicians. Like the priests, the first class, or the assistants, were subdivided into twenty-four courses, of which six belonged to Gershon, nine to Kohath, and nine to Merari. The second class, or the musicians, were subdivided into twenty-four choirs, each headed by a chief (1 Chron. xxv.), and assisted by eleven masters belonging to the same family. Four of the chiefs were sons of Asaph, a descendant of Gershon (1 Chron. xxv. 2); six were sons of Jeduthun, also called Ethan, a descendant of Merari (1 Chron. xxv. 3); and fourteen were sons of Haman, a descendant of Kohath (1 Chron. xxv. 4). The third class, or gate-keepers, too, were subdivided into twenty-four courses, and were headed by twenty-four chiefs from the three great families of Levi: seven were sons of Meshelemiah, a descendant of Kohath; thirteen were from Obed-edom, a descendant of Gershon; and four were sons of Hosah, a descendant of Merari. These families had to supply the temple daily with twenty-four sentinel-posts. For the fourth class, or judges and scribes, see 1 Chron. xxvi. 29 sq. This re-organization effected by David was adopted by his son Solomon when the temple was completed (2 Chron. viii. 14 sq.).

Different from the Levites were the Nethinim, who performed the menial work for the Levites: hence they are mentioned along with the Levites (1 Chron. ix. 2; Ez. vii. 24 sq.). The original stock of the Nethinim were probably the Gibeonites, whom Joshua made "hewers of wood, and drawers of water" (Josh. ix. 27). The Nethinim of 1 Chron. ix. 2, Ez. ii. 43, were probably sprung from captives taken by David in the later wars, who were assigned to the service of the tabernacle, replacing possibly the Gibeonites, who had been slain by Saul (2 Sam. xxi. 1). Undoubtedly these Nethinim were obliged to keep the Mosaic law. From Neh. x. 29 sq. we know that such was the case in the post-exilic period.

But to return to the Levites. The revolt of the ten tribes, and the policy pursued by Jeroboam, obliged the Levites to leave the cities assigned to them in the territory of Israel, and gather round the metropolis of Judah (2 Chron. xi. 13 sq.). In the Bible history of Judah the Levites are scarcely mentioned: yet when they are, it is in a way which presupposes the existence of Levitical institutions. They are sent out by Jehoshaphat to instruct and judge the people (2 Chron. xix. 8-10). Prophets of their order encourage the king in his war against Moab and Ammon, and go before his army with their loud hallelujahs (2 Chron. xx. 21). They became especially prominent under Hezekiah, as consecrating themselves to the special work of cleansing and repairing the temple (2 Chron. xxix. 12-15); and the hymns of David and of Asaph were again renewed. Their old privileges were restored, and the payment of tithes was renewed (2 Chron. xxxi. 4). The prominence into which they had been brought by Hezekiah and Josiah had apparently tempted the Levites to think that they might encroach permanently on the special functions of the priesthood; and thus the sin of Korah was renewed (Ezek. xlv. 10-14, xlvi. 11). After the Captivity, the first body of returning exiles had but few Levites (Ez. ii. 36-40). Those who did come took their old parts at the foundation and dedication of the second temple (Ez. iii. 10, vi. 18). In the next movement under Ezra their reluctance was even more strongly marked. None of them presented themselves at the first great gathering (Ez. viii. 15). According to a Jewish tradition (Mishna, Sota, IX. 10), Ezra is said to have punished the backwardness of the Levites by depriving them of their tithes, and transferring the right to the priest; but Neh. x. 38, xiii. 10, is against this tradition. Under Nehemiah the number of the Levites had greatly increased.

Among those who returned from the exile were the Nethinim also. Their number was six hundred and twelve, of whom three hundred and ninety-two returned with Zerubbabel (Ez. ii. 58; Neh. vii. 60), and two hundred and twenty with Ezra (Ez. viii. 20), under the leadership of Ziha and Gispah (Neh. xi. 21). Some of them lived in the proximity of the temple (Neh. iii. 26); others dwelt with the Levites in their own cities (Ez. ii. 70). They were exempted from taxation by the Persian satrap (Ez. vii. 24), because of belonging to the temple. With the destruction of the temple, the order of the Levites, as well as of the priests, lost its significance: the synagogue is not in need of it; although there are up to this day among the Jews some who claim to be descendants of Levi, and as such enjoy some prerogatives in the synagogue cultus.

LEWIS, Taylor, LL.D., L.H.D., b. in Northumberland, Saratoga County, N.Y., March 27, 1802; d. in Schenectady, N.Y., May 11, 1877. He was prepared for college by Dr. Proudfit of Salem, N.Y.; was graduated from Union College, Schenectady, in 1820; studied law with Judge S. A. Foot at Albany; commenced practice at Fort Miller in 1821; married, and became principal of the academy at Waterford, in 1833; professor of Greek and Latin in the University of the City of New York in 1838; professor of Greek in Union College in 1849, and afterwards of Oriental languages and biblical literature; which position he retained till his death. In early life he became a member, in full communion, of the Reformed

Dutch Church, and so continued till the last. He was an eager and lifelong student, and of such versatility, that no subject repelled him. He delighted to work out problems in the higher mathematics, and was enthusiastic in the study of astronomy and music. But his preference was for linguistics and philosophy. He was at home not only in Latin and Greek literature, but in the Semitic languages, being more familiar with Arabic than any other scholar in America.

Being early accustomed to the use of the pen, he poured forth during forty years a constant stream of articles in newspapers, magazines, and reviews, touching every theme which interests the Christian, the patriot, or the scholar; and in no case could the treatment be said to be careless or superficial. Although he wrote so much, he wrote nothing that was not worth reading. His larger publications were Plato contra Atheos (in Greek, being the tenth book of the Dialogue on Laws, with luminous notes and discussions), New York, 1844; The Six Days of Creation, Schenectady, 1855 (new edition, New York, 1879); The Bible and Science, Schenectady, 1856; The Divine Human in the Scriptures, New York, 1860; State Rights, a Photograph from the Ruins of Ancient Greece, 1862; additions to the Notes on Genesis in LANGE'S Bibel-Werk, edited by Dr. Schaff, New York, 1868; Metrical Version of Ecclesiastes, with Notes, in SCHAFF'S LANGE, 1870; Metrical Version of Job, with Notes, in same, 1874; The Light by which we see Light; or, Nature and the Scriptures (Vedder Lectures), 1875. Dr. Lewis had nearly every quality requisite for the successful handling of the subjects he took up. He had a keen and subtle intellect, a fertile imagination, and a quick perception of recondite relations. His style was fresh, incisive, and eloquent. His vast learning never overpowered his native force, but simply furnished the materials for comparison and illustration. He had a profound reverence for God and his word, and a supreme devotion to truth. And although, by conviction and lifelong experience, a humble believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, he would never advocate his cause by an argument which he thought unsound or even doubtful. He did nothing by halves. His whole soul entered into every discussion; and this made his words stimulating, even when not conclusive. His chief if not only defect was the lack of a lucidus ordo. There are several of his volumes in which the chapters might be largely transposed without injuring the general effect. Notwithstanding this disagreeable fact, his writings will long perpetuate his name and influence as a profound and brilliant Christian scholar, and be a source of instruction and of helpful suggestions to succeeding generations. His ruling principles of action are well expressed in the motto in Hebrew and Latin, given by him to be placed upon the dome of Memorial Hall at Schenectady:—

LEYDECKER, Melchior, b. at Middelburg, 1642; was appointed professor of theology at Utrecht, 1679; and died there in 1721. He was an ardent champion of the Reformed system of doctrines in its traditional form. — De veritate fidei Reformate (1694), De œconomia trium personarum, etc. (1682), Historia ecclesie Africanae (1690); and from that stand-point he wrote polemically against Balthasar Becker, the Coccejians, the Cartesian philosophy, Herman Witsius, and others. His works against the Coccejians — Fax veritatis (1677), Vis veritatis (1679), and Synopsis controversiarum (1690) — are still of interest to students of those times.

LEYSER, Polykarp, b. at Winnenden, Württemberg, March 18, 1552; d. at Dresden, Feb. 22, 1610. He studied theology at Tübingen; and was appointed pastor at Gellersdorf in Lower Austria in 1573. In 1577 he was called, as superintendent and professor of theology, to Wittenberg, where the Crypto-Calvinists had been overthrown in 1574. They gained the ascendancy again, however; and in 1587 Leyser removed as superintendent to Brunswick. Recalled to Wittenberg in 1591, he was finally appointed court-preacher at Dresden in 1594. His principal works are his edition of Chemnitz's Loci theologici (1592), and his continuation of the same author's Harmonia evangl. (1593). But most attention he attracted by his polemical writings against the Calvinists: Why it is better to keep Company with Papists than with Calvinists, etc. His life was written by L. HUTTER (Wittenberg, 1610), H. HÖPFNER (Leipzig, 1610), and P. LEYSER, his grandson: Officium pietatis, etc., Leipzig, 1706.

LIBANIUS, the most prolific and the most important of the sophists of the fourth century; b. at Antiochia, on the Orentes, 314 or 316; d. there after 395; studied in Athens; taught in Constantinople, but was in 346 expelled from that city, accused of magic; taught then for some time in Nicomedia; returned once more to Constantinople, and settled finally in his native city. He was a great admirer and also a friend of the Emperor Julian, on whose death he wrote a poem, still extant. He was a teacher of Basil the Great and Chrysostom, and maintained friendly relations with them throughout life. Of his works, his discourse in defence of the Pagan temples (addressed to Theodosius, edited by Sinner, Paris, 1842), his moral treatises, and his letters (about two thousand) have great interest. There is no collected edition of his works, many of which still remain in manuscript.

LIBER DIURNUS ROMANORUM PONTIFICUM, a collection of formulas used by the Church of Rome at certain important occasions, such as the installation of a Pope, the ordination of a suburbicarian bishop, the bestowal of the pallium, the granting of privileges, etc. The collection, which was chiefly made from the briefs of Gelasius I. and Gregory the Great, and for the use of the papal chancery, originated between 685 and 751, and was in use till the eleventh century. Some of its formulas still occur in the collections of canons from the twelfth century. But at that time the changed position of the Papacy had gradually made its formulas antiquated; and it was entirely forgotten, when, in 1650, Holstenius discovered a manuscript copy of it in the monastery of S. Croce in Gerusalemme in Rome, which he prepared for publication. The publication, however, was forbidden by the censor, as the book, besides other disagreeable things, contained the confession of faith, which the Pope had to subscribe at his accession; and that confession, accepting the canons of the sixth œcumenical council, condemned Pope Honorius I. as a heretic. Meanwhile the attention had been drawn to the curious book, and in 1680 the Jesuit Garnier published it in Paris. Other editions were made by MABILLON, in his Museum Italicum, by G. HOFFMANN, in his Nova collectio scriptor. et monumentor. (Leipzig, 1733), by RIEGGER (Vienna, 1762), and finally, fully satisfactory in scientific respect, by ROZIERE (Liber diurnus, ou recueil des formules usitées par la chancellerie pontificale du V. au XI. siècle, Paris, 1869). Later collections, from the period between John XXII. and Gregory XII., and collections of formulas for the use of bishops and abbots, exist in manuscript.

LIBER PONTIFICALIS (in the older manuscripts also called Gesta Pontificum Romanorum, or Gesta Summorum Pontificum, or Liber Gestorum Pontificalium) is a history of the bishops of Rome from the apostle Peter down to the second half of the ninth century. Following Onuphrio Panvini, the first editors considered Anastasius (abbot of a monastery in Rome, librarian to the Church of Rome during the reign of Nicholas I., 858–867, and translator of several Greek works on church history) to be the author of the whole book; but later investigations have proved this supposition untenable. Differences, both formal and material, between the various biographies, show that the book must be the work of more than one writer; and this view is still further corroborated by the circumstance that passages of the Liber pontificalis are found quoted before the time of Anastasius. A more correct conception of the origin of the work was developed in the latter part of the seventeenth century, and set forth by E. von Schelstrate, librarian of the Vatican, in his Dissertatio de antiquis Romanorum Pontificum catalogis (Rome, 1692), by Joannes Ciampini (Magister Brevium Gratia), in his Examen libri pontificalis (Rome, 1688), and by Franc. Bianchini, in the preface to his edition of the Liber pontificalis. (See MURATORI: Rerum Italicarum Scriptores, iii. 1, 33, 55.) Further results were gained, partly by the examination of manuscripts which were made in behalf of the new edition of the book in PERTZ: Monumenta Germaniæ (comp. Lipsius: Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe bis zur Mitte des 4. Jahrhunderts, Kiel, 1869), partly by the studies of L. Duchesne, also preparatory to a new edition (Étude sur le Liber pontificalis, Paris, 1877). (See G. WAITZ: Ueber die verschiedenen Texte des L. p., in Neues Archiv, ii.; LIPSIIUS: Neue Studien zur Papstchronologie, in Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie, 1879; and DUCHESNE: La date et les recensions du L. p., in Revue des questions historiques, 1879.)

The oldest of the sources still extant from which the Liber pontificalis has drawn its contents is a catalogue of popes (Catalogus Liberii), reaching down to Liberius, and probably made up during his reign (352–366), since it does not mention his death. The original manuscript of this catalogue is lost; but there exist three transcriptions of it, which have been published in Origines de l'église Romaine, par les membres de la communauté de Solesmes, Paris, 1826, i. (Comp. MOMMSEN: Ueber den Chronographen vom Jahre 354, in the Memoirs of the Royal Scientific Society of Saxony, Philolog.—Histor., Class I.) A second catalogue (Catalogus Felicianus) reaches down to Felix IV., who died in 530. It was first published, as far as Sylvester, by Henschen and Papebroch. in the Prolegomena to the first volume of Acta Sanctorum April., not after the original manuscript, which is lost, but after a transcript presented by Queen Christine of Sweden to the Vatican Library. It is also found in the above-mentioned Origines de l'église Romaine. A third catalogue, finally (Catalogus Cononianus), reaches down to Conon, 687. It was first discovered in the archives of the cathedral of Verona, and published by Bianchini, l. c., vol. iv. But, beyond the latter part of the seventh century, none of the existing catalogues reaches; and it is evident, from a comparison of the manuscripts, that those earlier catalogues which form the basis of the Liber pontificalis have not come down to us in their original form, but have been subjected to many kinds of additions and alterations.

The notices which the Liber pontificalis gives of each pope are at first very spare; but, after Sylvester, they become more ample, and give much information concerning the single churches of Rome and their property, concerning liturgy, archæology, etc.; drawing materials, not only from the catalogues, but also from the ecclesiastical archives, the acts of those popes who were venerated as martyrs, lists of papal decrees, buildings, grants, etc. From the close of the Catalogus Cononianus, the various manuscripts—that of Lucca, that of Milan, etc.—continue with various modifications; and it is evident that Anastasius Bibliothecarius is simply one of the continuators. Schelstrate even thinks that only the biography of Nicholas I. can with certainty be ascribed to him. As the first edition of the Liber pontificalis, Schelstrate designates the Concilia, by P. Crabbe, Cologne, 1538; but that work gives only extracts. The real editio princeps is that by Busæus, Mayence, 1602. Continuations beyond the second half of the ninth century also exist, though not as parts of the Liber pontificalis. One stops at Gregory VI.; another (Codex Vaticanus) gives notices about the popes of the eleventh and twelfth centuries; a third treats the period from Leo IX. to Honorius II.; a fourth (Acta Vaticana) stops at Alexander III., etc. G. LIBERIA, a negro republic in Western Africa, founded in 1820 by the American Colonization Society, declared independent Aug. 21, 1817, and at present in treaty relations with all the great powers of the world. It has a coast-line of nearly six hundred miles, and extends inwards toward the heart of the continent to an average distance of three hundred miles. The territory has been secured at different times by purchase. The colony owed its origin to the philanthropic impulses of the American Colonization Society to provide a home in their native country for American negroes. The idea of sending negro missionaries to Africa, and associating a colony with them, occurred first to Dr. Samuel Hopkins of Newport in 1773. He agitated the subject, and secured funds for the education of two negroes in Yale College. In 1815 Dr. Robert Finley, pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Basking Ridge, N.J., Rev. Samuel J. Mills, and others, combined in the thought of establishing a society for African colonization. The issue was the American Colonization Society, which was finally organized, with regularly elected officers, on Jan. 1, 1817. The same year it despatched the Rev. Samuel J. Mills and Rev. Mr. Burgess to explore the western coast of Africa and Sierra Leone, with reference to securing a tract suitable for the society's purposes. Mr. Mills died at sea on his return journey; but Mr. Burgess made a report, the first results of which were seen in the despatch of a colony of eighty-nine persons, on Jan. 21, 1820, from New York. It purchased Cape Mesurado, near the present city of Monrovia. In 1882 the colony numbered eighteen thousand civilized Africans, mostly of American origin, and an indefinite number, of a million or more, of half-barbarous natives. The government of Liberia is a republic, electing a President and Vice-President every two years, and a Legislature of two houses. The capital is Monrovia. A system of public schools is in vogue, with a central university, of which Dr. Blyden is now the president.

Missions to Liberia began in 1821, with the arrival of Lot Cary and Colin Teage, and their families, who were sent out by the African Missionary Society, established in Richmond in 1815, and largely through the efforts of Cary. This man had purchased his own freedom from slavery, and, at the time of his departure for Africa, was pastor of a Baptist Church in Richmond of eight hundred members. The mission of the Methodist-Episcopal Church of the United States was commenced in 1833. In 1836 a conference was organized, which in 1882 was divided into four districts, with one foreign missionary, 21 native ordained preachers, 24 native local preachers, 1,383 communicants, and 20 Sunday schools. The Episcopal Church of the United States supports a mission, which in 1882 included one bishop (Dr. Penick), two white and six colored presbyters, six deacons and other helpers, 356 communicants, and ten day, five boarding, and seven Sunday, schools. The mission of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, established in 1842, employed in 1882 three American missionaries and six helpers, and had 276 communicants, and 111 children in its day schools. In close connection with this mission are the Presbyterian churches of Gaboon and Corisco, with their seven American and five native preachers, and 374 communicants. See STOCKWELL: The Republic of Liberia, New York, 1868; and the Reports and Documents of the American Colonization Society.

LIBERIUS, Bishop of Rome from May 22, 352, to Sept. 21, 366. As the successor of Julius, the staunch ally of Athanasius, he became for a moment the centre of the Arian controversy. Constantius, after his victory over Magnentius in 353, also possessed of the Western Empire, sided with the Eusebians, and sought to establish peace in the Church by sacrificing Athanasius, and abandoning the confession of Nicæa. Liberius, however, took a firm stand against him, and sent Bishop Vincentius of Capua, and Marcellus, to the imperial court at Arles, asking for an œcumenical council convened at Aquileia. But the emperor preferred to hold the council at his own residence, under the direct influence of the court; and at the synod of Arles the whole orthodox party, with the exception of Paulinus of Treves, gave its assent to the verdict of the Oriental bishops against Athanasius. Paulinus was banished. A second time Liberius addressed the emperor, and sent Bishop Lucifer of Calaris, the priest Pancratius, and the deacon Hilarius, to him. Bishop Eusebius of Vercelli also remonstrated. But the synod of Milan in 355 only completed the defeat of Athanasius. Eusebius of Vercelli, Lucifer of Calaris, and Dionysius of Milan were banished. The subscription of Liberius to the condemnation of Athanasius was now peremptorily demanded, but he refused to give it. From fear of the strongly pronounced sympathy of the Romans, he was secretly arrested, and then banished to Beroea in Thrace. The deacon Felix was appointed bishop in his stead, and installed in spite of violent opposition. Two years later on, however, when Constantius visited Rome, and the Roman ladies petitioned him for the return of Liberius, he graciously granted the petition, adding that the bishop would return "a better man." And, indeed, a great change had taken place with Liberius during his exile. "Better instructed by the Oriental bishops," he laid a declaration before the emperor, that he now agreed in the condemnation of Athanasius; he supplicated the court theologians, Ursacius, Valens, and Germinius, as men of peace; he renewed communion with Epictetus and Auxentius, the most decided enemies of Athanasius, and asserted that the latter had long ago been excluded from communion with the Church of Rome, as the Roman presbytery could testify. Summoned before the synod of Sirmium (358), he entirely abandoned the cause of Athanasius, condemned the expression ὁμοούσιος, and was allowed to return to Rome, where, according to the arrangement of the emperor and the synod, he and Felix should reign in common. But the Romans, indignant at this arrangement, drove Felix out of the city under the cry, "One God, one Christ, one bishop!" and he was compelled to live in retirement at his country-seat for the rest of his life. Felix died Nov. 22, 365. Once more in quiet possession of his chair, Liberius returned to his original orthodox standpoint; and, though he had returned by the aid of the Semi-Arians, he received the emissaries of the "Macedonians" as true brethren, because of their firm adherence to the confession of Nicæa. Nevertheless, when, after his death, a severe struggle ensued between his party, represented by Ursinus, and that of Felix, represented by Damasus, and when the latter came out victorious, a tradition gradually grew up in Rome, representing Constantius and Liberius as furious persecutors of orthodoxy, and Felix as a martyr, — a circumstance which has caused much inconvenience to the Roman Catholics.

LIT. — The letters of Liberius are found in COUSTANT: Epist. Rom. Pont., i. 422-468. The attempt of Hefele to impugn their authenticity is a piece of rather frivolous criticism. Other LIB'ERTINES. I. In Acts vi. 9, members of the synagogue of the Libertines are mentioned among the opponents disputing with Stephen. Attempts have been made of explaining the name as designating some country or city in Africa, like the two other names connected with it, — Cyrenians and Alexandrians; but the attempts have failed. It seems necessary to retain the plain meaning of the Latin word Libertini ("freemen," descendants of emancipated slaves); the more so as it gives a satisfactory explanation. During the wars of Pompey, numerous Jews were carried to Rome, and sold there as slaves. They were soon emancipated, however; and though most of them remained in Rome, settled in the regio Transiberina, many of them or of their descendants returned to Jerusalem, where, under the name of Libertines, they maintained a synagogue of their own. F. SIEFFERT.

II. Libertines, or, as they called themselves, Spirituals, is the name of a pantheistic-rationalistic party which arose in the Netherlands during the Reformation, thence spread into France, and finally attempted to gain a foothold at Geneva. Nothing is known with certainty of the origin of the party, nor of its internal development. One Coppin of Lille seems to have been the first to promulgate its doctrines (about 1529); but he was soon eclipsed by Quintin from Hainault, who again was followed by Bertram des Moulins, Claude Perseval, Antoine Pocquet, or Pocques, and others. They seem to have had an esoteric and an esoteric teaching. In public they admonished people to refrain from finding any thing to blame or condemn with one another. In private they added, because there is, indeed, nothing which is bad by itself, except the very distinction between good and bad; and privatissime they explained how God is all, and all is God, so that the natural passions are in reality the voices of the spirit, — impulses from God. In France they found many adherents. They were at home at the court of Marguerite of Valois at Nérac. In Strassburg they obtained a cordial acknowledgment of communion from Butzer; but when, in Geneva, they solicited a similar favor from Calvin, they suddenly struck a rock. In 1531 Calvin met with Quintin in Paris at a public disputation, and pursued him hotly. Later on he became thoroughly acquainted with Pocquet in Geneva; and in 1545 he completely unmasked the party by his Contre la Secte phantastique et furieuse des Libertins, which in 1547 was followed by the Épître contre un certain cordelier suppost de la secte des Libertins. After that the sect disappeared.

III. Libertines is the name of the party in Geneva, which, mostly consisting of native burghers of the city, first arose against the rule of the bishop and the Duke of Savoy, and, having established the independence of the city, invited Calvin to consolidate their new constitution by introducing the Reformation, but which, when the Ordonnances Ecclésiastiques came into operation, and the moral reforms were carried through with great severity, turned around against Calvin, bitterly complaining of the new tyranny. It is possible, though it cannot be proved, that they were directly influenced by the Libertines II. See STÄHELIN: Calvin, i. pp. 382 sqq. TRECHSEL.

LIBERTY, Religious. Religious liberty consists in the right guaranteed by the laws of a country to each one of its citizens to maintain and propagate any religious opinion, and to celebrate any form of worship, he may think proper, provided those opinions and that worship do not conflict with the fundamental ideas upon which the civil community is based. It includes protection of worship, and of property devoted to religious purposes, and recognizes the principle of religious association. It has been called a natural right, but a man can have no natural rights in opposition to his social duties. In its principle it is only an extension of the maxim of the Roman Code, Sic utere tuo ut non alienum lædas.

The latest authority on this subject, that of the Supreme Court of the United States (Reynolds vs. the United States, 98 Sup. Co. Rep., the Mormon marriage case), thus lays down the general principle: "Laws are made for the government of actions; and, while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with the practices. Suppose one religiously believed that human sacrifices were a necessary part of religious worship, would it be seriously contended that the civil government under which he lived could not interfere to prevent a sacrifice? To permit this would be to make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land. Government could exist only in name under such circumstances."

The practice of religious toleration, based on the doctrine of religious liberty, is one of recent growth. It has been called "the noblest innovation of modern times." In primitive antiquity the laws of all communities, at least of the Aryan race, derived authority from two religious ideas: either these laws were supposed to come direct from the gods themselves, or they conformed to the customs of the ancestors of those who observed them. Religion was wholly tribal or ethnic. The family was the unit under this system. Its head was not only paterfamilias, but king and pontiff also. Religion was wholly a family concern. It had no relations whatever to persons outside. Religion and civil law were convertible terms; and no act of human life was performed, and no relations between the different members of the same society established, without the supposed religious sanction of the household divinities. This type of the relations of religion to civil law was retained for ages, amidst all the revolutions and conquests of history, and until it came into conflict with the Christian system. Although, in the course of time, the family was developed into the phratría, or curia, and from this came the tribe, and out of a confederation of tribes grew the civitas, or polis, still each one of these political divisions always preserved its own special divinities, and the principle was constantly maintained, that no one who was not bound to one of these divisions by a blood tie, or, in other words, who had not a birthright therein, could offer sacrifice or acceptable worship, either to the gods of the particular family or tribe of which the civitas was composed, or to the divinities which guarded the civitas itself. All outside the community thus made up were strangers. They had not a common religion, and therefore they had no common civil rights. They were regarded, for the most part, as enemies, and were called by the Greeks Barbaroi, or Aglossoi.

In this strange system there was a certain religious liberty with well-defined bounds. In regard to the worship of the household divinities there was no uniform rule nor common ritual. The father of the family was the only priest, and the family ritual or worship was such as he made it. The Pontiff of Rome, or the Archon of Athens, might, it is true, ascertain whether the father of a family performed the household religious rites; but they had no authority to modify them in the slightest degree. Suo quisque ritu sacrificia faciat was the absolute rule. So, in regard to the gods of the city, the ritual of their worship was prescribed solely by those over whose safety they watched, and whose independence that worship was supposed to secure. In this worship the minute observance of the ritual was the important thing. The expression of religious opinion, so long as there was outward conformity, was in many respects unchecked. A man might speak with contempt of the gods of a neighboring city; as to those of a more general jurisdiction, such as Jupiter, Juno, or Cybele, he might believe in them or not, as he thought proper: but it was dangerous to treat disrespectfully the city gods, such as Athene, or Erectheus, or Cecrops. For such an offence, indeed, it is well known Socrates was condemned to death: and a law existed at Athens, punishing severely any one who did not observe with the prescribed forms the national festivals; for such an act was an offence not only against religion, but against the State, whose safety and independence were supposed to be dependent upon it. The Romans and the Greeks, in their early conquests at least, always measured the power of resistance of an invaded district by the supposed power of its city gods: hence, when they conquered, they dethroned the gods, and by that means destroyed the political existence of the city. Although, of course, as time went on, religious opinions, especially among the educated classes, became more rational and comprehensive, yet the old beliefs in regard to the power of the divinities, both of the household and of the city, and the necessity of propitiating them by means of the ancient ritual, remained among the masses a very active principle of action, not only to the time of Christ, but for three hundred years afterwards. Whatever, during this time, may have been the private opinions of the governing class, all ancient writers show, that, in their conduct of affairs, it was found necessary to respect the popular superstitions in regard to the close relation between the observance of the rites of the primitive religion and the safety of the State. This must be borne in mind, so that we may understand why Christianity alone, of all the innumerable forms of religious belief and worship introduced into the Roman Empire during the first three centuries of our era, was persecuted by the State, and especially why the best emperors in the Roman sense — the Antonines, Decius, and even Diocletian — appear in history as the most bitter persecutors, while the worst, Thracian peasants and Oriental sun-worshippers, are not found among its most active enemies, simply because the Roman traditions formed no part of their religious belief.

Christianity brought into the Roman world totally different ideas. It was not the domestic religion of any one family, nor the national religion of any city or race. The other religions had taught hatred of the stranger. Christianity taught, with the unity of God, the unit of the human race: justice, and even kindness towards both strangers and enemies, formed the very basis of its system. Christianity was a universal religion, asserting not only supreme, but exclusive sway; and therefore the barriers between different peoples were broken down, and the pomerium disappeared. These principles were so novel and unexpected, that we are not surprised to find those whose conceptions of religion were wholly limited to the exclusive tribal or ethnic form shocked when it was proposed to give up deities with whose worship the prosperity and safety of the State were inseparably associated in the minds of the Romans. Hence the Ten Persecutions (so called) under the Roman rule were probably due as much to the novel claims of a religion which aimed to destroy the old gods, as to the revolt against the pure morality and lofty self-denial taught by the Christians.

The conflict between the two systems was inevitable; and it was not brought to a close, so far as the legal sanction of persecution was concerned, until A.D. 313, when the celebrated Edict of Toleration was issued at Milan by Constantine and Licinius. This has been called the "Magna Charta" of the liberties of Christianity; but, strictly, it gave only toleration to the worship of the Christians, and not exclusive domination, or even liberty. The Arian disputes, the meeting of the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325), and the adoption of the creed at that council, since known as the "Nicene Creed," form an epoch in the history of religious liberty. At this time were introduced into the Church two principles, which, whatever other results they may have produced, were the prolific sources, for many centuries, of persecution and intolerance of the religious opinions of those who differed from the dogmas of the Church as by law established. These were the union of Church and State, as witnessed by the participation of the emperor as president of a council which settled fundamental Christian dogmas; and the other, the punishment by the civil power of those convicted of the ecclesiastical crime of heresy. Heretics are defined in the Theodosian Code to be those "Qui a Catholice religionis dogmate deviare contendunt." Their punishment was intended to enforce uniformity of belief; mere disbelief having previously been, under the Pagan system, not punishable. The first civil proceeding against heretics began with Constantine's edict against the Donatists (A.D. 316); and, before the close of the fourth century, the edicts against heresy formed an important part of the jurisprudence of the empire. By these edicts, heretics were deprived of all offices of profit or dignity in the State; they could neither receive nor bequeath property; no contract with them was binding; and they were fined, banished, and even sentenced to death. See Theodosian

Code, published Feb. 15, 438, bk. xvi. tit. 5, De Hæreticis.

From the time of Constantine to a period long after the Reformation, the principle that heresy was a crime to be punished by the civil magistrate, as well as an ecclesiastical offence to be visited by church discipline, is found embodied in the codes of all the nations of Western Europe. During the middle age, however great may have been the jealousy of many of the sovereigns of Europe of encroachments on their authority by the Pope, yet all of them were obedient sons of the Church, so far as to profess the utmost zeal for the extirpation of heresy within their dominions. Persecution of heresy rested on the same principle as crusades against the infidel, and these grew out of the one common impulse which moved Europe in those days. The civil disabilities attaching to heresy were inflicted, as time went on, upon vast masses of people in different parts of Europe. The great anti-sacerdotal movement of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, in which the actors were variously called Albigenses, Waldenses, Cathari, Lollards, Hussites, etc., was repressed, for the most part, by an armed force, whose proceedings were characterized by the most savage cruelties and wholesale confiscations. Such, indeed, was the horror of heresy felt by Innocent III., and his zeal to extirpate it, that, supported doubtless by the church opinion of Europe at the time, he established during the Albigensian crusade an order of monks (the Dominicans), whose twofold duty it was to instruct the people in the true doctrine, and to seek out and punish heretics by means of a tribunal called the "Inquisition," of which these monks were the judges, to the exclusion of the ancient and ordinary jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese. (See INQUISITION.)

Vast as were the changes made by the Reformation, it did not introduce into any Protestant country in Europe the principle of religious liberty, or even of toleration. Dissenters from the religion established by law suffered from grievous civil disabilities in England and Scotland, in Germany, Holland, and Switzerland; while in Spain the Inquisition, and in France the League, during the civil wars of the sixteenth century and the policy of Louis XIV. during the seventeenth, were directed to the advancement of the orthodox belief by exterminating in those countries obstinate heretics. In England heresy was an offence punishable by death before the Reformation, and it continued to be so for one hundred and thirty-five years afterwards. It was not until 1677 that an act was passed (29 Car. ii.) abolishing the use of the writ De heretico comburendo by the civil authority. Two things, however, are to be noted: 1st, That, as time went on, penalties for heresy were not so strictly nor so often enforced as they had been; and, 2d, That penal laws against dissenters in England were maintained, not so much from zeal for orthodoxy as from a fear lest the Catholics should gain the control of the government. This is admirably illustrated by the terms of the "Act of Toleration," so called, passed in 1689, from which it clearly appears, that, in the persecution of dissenters, political objects and motives had at that time usurped the place held by blind zeal for the Church in the middle age. (See Macaulay's History of England, chap. xi., for an excellent illustration of this change.)

In Germany the Reformation was followed by wars between the Imperial Catholic authority and that of many of the rulers of different portions of the country who had long been practically independent of the emperor, and had become Lutheran Protestants. In these wars the principle contended for on both sides was cujus regio, illius religio. The question was, to which regio the people of Germany, for the purposes of religious legislation, belonged. This principle was settled at the Peace of Augsburg (1555), by giving to each prince the power of establishing within his own dominion his own religion. The Protestant dissenters from Lutheranism—that is, the Calvinists, Zwinglians, and Anabaptists—were not included in this peace, because no sovereign in Germany then held to their form of belief. By the Peace of Westphalia (1648), which closed the terrible Thirty-Years' War, free exercise of their religion, and civil rights, were accorded in each of the states of Germany to Catholics, as well as to Protestants, both Lutherans and Calvinists, but to no others.

Up to the period of the French Revolution, the principle established by the Peace of Westphalia, although it was never formally adopted by the other powers, gradually acquired throughout Europe almost the force of an international code. There were no more religious wars, and very little of the old forms of persecution of heresy; yet the civil disabilities of dissenters, Catholic or Protestant, as they happened to be, consisting generally in exclusion from public office and employment, were everywhere jealously maintained.

Since the French Revolution there has been throughout Europe a vast change in opinion, not only as to the true relation of religion to government, but also as to the policy of the exclusion of any one from public employment in consequence of his religious belief. In England, one after another of the old strongholds of intolerance has fallen, until the Catholic, the Protestant dissenter, and even the Jew, now stand upon a footing of perfect equality with the members of the Established Church, so far as their political and civil rights, and their admission to public office, are concerned. In France, this principle of equality has been carried so far, that each form of what is called a "recognized religion" is supported from the funds of the State. Even in Spain and in Italy, Protestant sects are now permitted to worship publicly, and their church property is secured to them. Denmark and Sweden still require that all public officers shall conform to the established Lutheran religion. The general tendency at present is towards the absolute separation of the exercise of religious liberty from the restraint of State legislation. The ideal seems now to be "a free Church in a free State;" the two spheres being kept as wholly distinct from each other as the general well being will permit. The present attitude of Germany towards the Catholic Church is thought by many not to be in the direction of modern thought and modern practice in this matter. Shocked by the decree of the Vatican Council of 1870, declaring the infallibility of the Pope, and by the condemnation of the most deeply cherished principles of modern society as errors, by the syllabus of 1864, the Prussian Government adopted in 1873 a series of laws known as the "Falk Laws." By these laws it is provided, among other things, that no man shall be allowed to become a minister of worship in Prussia, unless he shall receive his education in a public school and State university. Ecclesiastical discipline, where it involves fine, imprisonment, or corporal punishment, is made subject, also, to revision on an appeal to judges appointed by the State.

The English sectaries who founded colonies on this continent brought with them a no larger spirit of toleration than they had professed at home. They came, as Bancroft says, "to plant a church in the wilderness." Dissent from the doctrines and worship of that church was punished, in all but one of the New-England Colonies, as heresy; while in Pennsylvania no man could hold office who did not acknowledge the divinity of Christ; and in Maryland, as early as 1659, Quakers were fined, and otherwise punished, because they conscientiously refused to bear arms in the service of the Colony. But the principle of perfect toleration grew rapidly in this country, side by side, strange to say, with a practice, which had become almost universal at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, of encouraging, in various ways, the maintenance of Christianity, so far as it was possible to do so without infringing the rights of conscience and the freedom of religious worship. The Constitution provides that "no religious test shall be required as a qualification for office;" and the very first amendment to that instrument which was demanded by public opinion in order to set at rest forever the relations of the national government to religion, was in these words: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This is one of the very few provisions of the Constitution which no one has ever sought to change; and its adoption forms, not only an epoch in the history of religious liberty, but an example, also, which, during the last hundred years, all civilized nations have striven to imitate.

LICENSE, applied to preaching, means the right to preach, given by a regularly constituted body, such as a presbytery, a conference, or a council. The candidate is examined upon his theological studies, and, if thought worthy, is licensed to preach as an accredited teacher of the denomination. But the licentiate has no authority to dispense the sacraments, nor to sit as member of an ecclesiastical court: these are consequent upon ordination. In the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, the word "license" is applied to the permission to preach given by a bishop to a deacon, or to read sermons given to a candidate.

LICHFIELD, the seat of the episcopal see of that name, is a city of 8,360 inhabitants (1881), sixteen miles north of Birmingham, Staffordshire, Eng. The name is taken to mean "field of the dead," and to have been given to the locality in consequence of the massacre there, in the reign of Diocletian (A.D. 303), of several hundred Christians. Lichfield Cathedral is in the early English style, is four hundred and three feet long, dates from the twelfth century, and has recently been extensively restored. The see dates from 669. St. Chad was its first bishop. From 785, in the reign of Offa, to 799, it was made an archbishopric; in 1078 the see was removed to Chester, and again to Coventry in 1102, but restored to Lichfield in 1129. Lichfield was made a city by Edward VI. in 1549. The famous Dr. Samuel Johnson was born there Sept. 18, 1709. The episcopal stipend is forty-five hundred pounds. See W. BERESFORD: Lichfield, London, 1883.

LIEBNER, Karl Theodor Albert, a distinguished evangelical theologian, and preacher of the Lutheran Church of Germany; b. March 3, 1806, in Schkölen, near Naumburg; d. June 21, 1871, of apoplexy, in Switzerland. He entered the university of Leipzig, where he spent four years, then passed to Berlin, and from there to the seminary at Wittenberg, and was appointed by the Prussian ministry of education to arrange the Wittenberg library, and during his residence in that city put forth his first important work, on Hugo de St. Victor and the theological tendencies of his day (Hugo von St. Victor und d. theol. Richtungen seiner Zeit, 1831). This work was received very kindly by the theological public; and its author was called in 1832 to the church in Kreisfeld, near Eisleben. In 1835 he accepted an invitation from Göttingen to become the successor of Julius Müller, as professor of theology, and university preacher. Two of the results of his study there were a volume of sermons (1841, 2d ed., 1855), which Palmer, Baur, and others characterized as models, and another on Richard de St. Victor (Rich. a St. Victore de contemplatione doctrina). Refusing a call to Marburg, he became Dörner's successor in the chair of theology in Kiel. Here Leibner published his system of theology (D. christl. Dogmatik aus dem christologischen Prinzip dargestellt, 1849). Mücke, in his Dogmatik des 19. Jahrhunderts, places this work at the side of Dörner's.

The calls to Heidelberg and other universities, which this volume secured for him, Liebner declined in favor of an invitation to a professorship in Leipzig in 1851, where he soon added the duties of university preacher to those of professor. In 1855 he made his last change, going to Dresden in the capacity of first court-preacher, and vice-president of the Supreme Church Council, where he continued to labor, in spite of calls to Berlin (1861) and Göttingen (1862). Amongst his other published works were two volumes of sermons (Dresden, 1864).

MICHAEL.

LIGHTFOOT, John, one of the greatest Hebrew scholars in history; b. at Stoke-upon-Trent, Staffordshire, March 19 (29), 1602; d. at Ely, Dec. 6, 1675. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he greatly distinguished himself by his oratory and classical attainments, but where he learned no Hebrew. On taking his bachelor's degree (1621), he became assistant master at Repton, Derbyshire. Two years afterwards he was ordained, and obtained the curacy at Norton-under-Hales, Shropshire. There Sir Rowland Cotton heard him preach, and thus he became a domestic chaplain at Bellaport, Sir Rowland's home. His patron was an amateur Hebraist of some attainments; while he, the chaplain, knew nothing of the language. Shame at this state of things fairly drove him to study Hebrew; and so zealous was his toil, and so great aptitude did he evince, that he quickly made himself the greatest Hebraist in England, and was only excelled in Europe by the younger Buxtorf. For some reason he ultimately left his patron, and was for two years in a charge at Stone in Staffordshire; then, for the sake of nearness to Sion College, London, he removed to Hornsey, and in 1629 published his first work. In 1630 Sir Rowland Cotton presented him to the rectory of Ashley, Staffordshire. In 1642 he left it for London, where he became minister of St. Bartholomew's. He sat in the Westminster Assembly of Divines; and although an Erastian, and therefore in the minority, along with Selden and Coleman, he yet exerted, by his philological and archæological learning, a decided influence, especially in the recognition of the laity, the order of deaconesses, and the right of the congregations to choose their ministers. He had the honor of preaching twice before the Assembly, — on two fast days, March 29, 1643, and Aug. 26, 1645. In the latter discourse he urged the thorough revision of the Authorized Version. In 1643 he was made master of Catherine's Hall, Cambridge, and rector of Much Munden, Hertfordshire. In 1652 he took his degree of doctor of divinity; in 1655 he was chosen vice-chancellor of the university of Cambridge, retaining, however, his other positions, and living at Much Munden. The Restoration did not affect his official relations. He was one of the Presbyterian commissioners at the Savoy Conference, 1661, but conformed, 1662. In 1675 he was made a prebend of Ely. He took part upon Poole's Synopsis, Walton's Polyglott (especially the Samaritan Pentateuch), and Castell's Lexicon. He was twice married, and had six children by his first wife.

Lightfoot enjoys to-day a universal fame. Much of his laborious writing is now antiquated, much, indeed, useless; but enough remains of useful matter to make his books imperishable. Few Christian scholars now study the Talmud; and all are satisfied that Lightfoot, Selden, and Schöttgen have ransacked that great garret, and brought all its valuables to light. Lightfoot's repute as a scholar has overshadowed his other titles to fame; so that his contemporary reputation for eloquence, fidelity, and spirituality, for his ardent defence of Erastianism, and for his many admirable qualities in private life, which rendered him a beloved pastor and friend, has been well-nigh forgotten.

His principal works appeared in the following order, Erubbin, or Miscellanies, Christian and Judaical, and others; penned for recreation at vacant hours, London, 1629; A few and new Observations upon the Book of Genesis: the most of them, certain; the rest, probable; all, harmless, strange, and rarely heard of before, 1642; A Handful of Gleanings out of the Book of Exodus, 1643; The Harmony of the *Four Evangelists among themselves, and with the Old Testament; with an explanation of the chiefest difficulties both in language and sense. Part I. from the beginning of the Gospels to the baptism of our Saviour; 1644. Part II. from the baptism of our Saviour to the first Passover after: 1647. Part III. from the First Passover after our Saviour's baptism to the second; 1650 (so this laborious work remains unfinished); A Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles, Chronical and Critical; the Difficulties of the Text explained, and the Times of the story cast into Annals. From the beginning of the Book to the end of the Twelfth Chapter. With a brief Survey of the contemporary Story of the Jews and Romans (down to A. D. 41), 1645; The Harmony, Chronicle, and Order of the Old Testament, 1647; The Harmony, Chronicle, and Order of the New Testament, 1655; The Temple, especially as it stood in the Days of our Saviour, 1650; but the work by which he immortalized himself was, Horæ Hebraicæ et Talmudicæ; Hebrew and Talmudical exercises upon Matthew, 1658, Mark, 1663, Luke, 1674, John, 1671, Acts, and some few chapters of Romans, 1676, and First Corinthians, 1664. This last work appeared first in Latin, and was reprinted in Leipzig under the editorial care of Carpzov, 1675-79, 2 vols., but has been translated into English, and in this language is found in vols. xi.-xii. of the Pitman edition mentioned below, also separately, edited by R. Gandel, Oxford, 1859, 4 vols. Lightfoot's Works have been four times published, first, edited by Bright and Strype, London, 1684, 2 vols. folio, second, by Texelius, Rotterdam, 1686, 2 vols. folio, third (first 2 vols., reprint of the second), edited by J. Leusden, Franeker, 1699, 3 vols. folio, fourth and by far the best edition, by J. R. Pitman, London, 1822-25, 13 vols. 8vo. This last edition incorporates the volume of Remains, 1700, contains a Life by the editor, and the emendations of former editions.*

LIGHTS, The Ceremonial Use of, in the Christian service, is of very old date. In spite, however, of the "many lights" of the "upper chamber" at Troas (Acts xx. 8), the Christian custom does not seem to be a simple continuation of a similar Jewish custom; nor is it likely that the Christians first adopted the practice from Paganism: on the contrary, Tertullian and other Fathers often ridicule the heathens for their superstitious and idolatrous use of lights at daytime. When, in the beginning of the fourth century, the custom became a generally adopted part of the Christian ritual, — such as it appears, according to Vigilantius, who attacked it, and according to Jerome, who excused it, if he did not defend it, — it looks most like a reminiscence from a former period of the history of the Church, when it had been, not a sacred rite, but a practical necessity. In the first three centuries the Christians were often, not to say always, compelled to worship in secrecy, in the darkness of night, or in some hidden place; as, for instance, the catacombs. And, under such circumstances, lights — candles or lamps — were indispensable. But what are the so-called "gospel-lights," which are first spoken of by Jerome in 378? — the bishop entering the church preceded by seven carofrarii, each of them carrying a lighted wax taper in his hand, and two of them taking up their position beside the ambo, while the gospel is read aloud, — what are those lights but a reminiscence from the catacombs? And the same may be said of the paschal lights, the baptismal lights, etc.; only that, in each individual case, the custom received a special symbolical explanation of its own. Especially at funerals, lights of all kinds were profusely used throughout Christendom. Innumerable candles on golden stands were lighted all around the body of Constantine when it lay in state. When the remains of Chrysostom were brought to Constantinople from Comana, the waters of the Bosphorus were covered with the lamps of the faithful. When Queen Radegund was buried at Poitiers, all the free-women of the country stood around the grave with lighted tapers in their hands. From such customs the transition was very easy to keeping the lights always lighted in the sepulchre, or before the relic and the image, and to presenting them as a sacrifice to the saint. But, with the Reformation, the whole custom, in all its various forms, was completely broken up; only one small remnant of it, the Eucharistic light, still remaining in the Lutheran churches and in the Church of England. The injunction of Edward VI., of 1547, allowed two lights to be lighted on the high altar during the celebration of the Lord's Supper, to signify that Christ is the true light of the world.

LIGUORI, Alfonso Maria da, the most popular and influential author of devotional works and ethical theologian in the Roman-Catholic Church of the last century; was b. Sept. 27, 1696, at Marianella, a suburb of Naples; d. at Nocera, Aug. 1, 1787. His parents were of noble antecedents and pious inclinations; his father, an officer in the Neapolitan army. He was educated by the priests of the oratory of Philip Neri; studied law, and took his doctor's degree in his seventeenth year. The loss of a case determined him to enter the church, and he was consecrated priest in 1726. He became an earnest preacher, and devoted much time to the relief of the poor. In 1731, while in Foggia, Apulia, he had the first of his visions. As he was kneeling before a picture of the Virgin, she appeared to him in all her beauty. During a sojourn at Scala, where he was holding religious services with the nuns, one of the sisters, Maria Celeste Costarosa, revealed to him at the confessional that the Saviour had chosen him to organize a new ecclesiastical order. Following this revelation, he founded in 1732 the Congregation of our Most Blessed Redeemer. (See REDEMPTORISTS.) The Cardinal Archbishop of Naples disapproved of the movement, which also met with opposition from other quarters. But the order grew; and in 1742 Liguori was chosen general superior (rector major) for life, and the order was approved in 1749 by a papal brief. In 1762 Liguori was elevated, against his will, by Clement XIII., to the bishopric of St. Agatha of the Goths in Naples, from which, in 1775, he was allowed to retire, at his own request, by Pius VI. He retired to a house of the Redemptorists at Nocera. His latter years were embittered by physical sufferings, and a division in his order in consequence of a breach between the Pope and the Neapolitan administration. Nine years after his death, he was pronounced Venerable by Pius VI.; was beatified by Pius VII. Sept. 15, 1816; and on May 26, 1839, was canonized by Gregory XVI. Pius IX. added, July 7, 1871, to these honors the dignity of Doctor of the Church; thus placing him beside Thomas Aquinas, Bernard of Clairvaux, etc. The decree was based upon the "scholarly and devotional character" of his works, and especially the circumstance that they "teach in the most excellent manner the truths relating to the immaculate conception of the blessed mother of God, and the infallibility of the Roman bishop speaking from his throne." It ordained that "his works should be cited as of equal authority with those of the other doctors of the church, and should be used in schools, colleges, controversies, sermons, etc., as well as in private."

No complete edition of Liguori's writings has been published. The most of them appeared in Italian, at Naples and Bassano, and have been translated into Latin, French, German, and other languages. His more important works are, Theologia Moralis, Naples, 1753, 2 vols., with additions, Bologna, 1763, 3 vols.; History and Refutation of the Heresies, Venice, 1773, 3 vols.; The Truth of the Faith, or Refutation of the Materialists, Deists, and Sectaries, Venice, 1781, 2 vols.; La vera sposa di Gesù Cristo, Venice, 1781, 2 vols., last ed., Naples, 1876; Le glorie di Maria, Venice, 1784, 2 vols., last ed., Rome, 1878; [Eng. trans., The Glories of Mary, New York, 3d ed., 1852. The last is the best known of Liguori's works. It breathes an intense devotion to Mary, and indulges in the most exaggerated praises of her beauty, moral innocency, power of representing the sinner's cause to the Saviour, if not directly of saving him. "Mary is truly our mother, not according to the flesh, but the spiritual mother of our souls and of our salvation" (i. 2). "She is omnipotent . . . because she obtains in her prayers whatever she wishes" (vi. 1). "I invoke thy aid, O my great advocate, my refuge, my hope, my mother Mary! To thy hands I commit the cause of my eternal salvation. To thee I consign my soul. It was lost, but thou must save it," etc. (vi. 3). These passages fairly represent the exaggerated Mariolatry of the work, and the distance to which the sinner is removed from Christ. Mary is addressed as the "refuge of sinners," "our life and hope," "queen of angels," "queen of heaven," "queen of the whole world," "queen of mercy, as Christ is King of justice," etc. Well might Keble exclaim, when the decree of the Immaculate Conception was promulged in 1854, that it made the ecclesiastical union of Christendom impossible so long as it continued to be enforced. Liguori appeals to ecclesiastical writers, especially John of Damascus, Peter Damiani, and Abelard. His quotations from Scripture are confined almost entirely to the Song of Solomon, the Shulamite of which he looks upon as the type of Mary, and the apocryphal book Ecclesiasticus.]

LILLIE, John, D.D., b. at Kelso, Scotland, Dec. 16, 1812; d. at Kingston, N.Y., Feb. 23, 1867. He was graduated with the first honors at the University of Edinburgh, 1831; studied theology, and taught, until 1834, when he emigrated to America. He then finished his theological studies at New Brunswick, and was ordained, and installed minister of the Reformed Dutch Church at Kingston, N.Y., where he labored ably and faithfully until August, 1841, when he accepted the presidency of the grammar-school of the University of the City of New York. From 1843 to 1848 he had charge of the Broadway, afterward Stanton-street, Dutch Church, and, in addition, edited the Jewish Chronicle on behalf of missions among the Jews from 1844 to 1848. From 1851 to 1857 he labored upon the Revised Version of the American Bible Union; but in the latter year he re-entered the pastorate, being installed over the Presbyterian Church of Kingston, N.Y., and in that relation he died after a four-days' illness. Dr. Lillie was acknowledged to be one of the best biblical scholars in the United States. He has left permanent evidence of his learning, not only in his individual publications, but in the new versions and philological commentaries upon Thessalonians, John's Epistles, 2 Peter, Jude, and the Revelation (also on 1 Peter and James; but these were never printed), prepared for the American Bible Union. He was a spiritually minded and edifying preacher and a faithful pastor. His works, all printed in New York, were, Perpetuity of the Earth (1842), Lectures on the Epistles to the Thessalonians (1860), Translation, with additions, of Anberlen and Riggenbach upon Thessalonians (in the Lange Series, 1868), also posthumous Lectures on the First and Second Epistles of Peter, with a Biographical Sketch by Dr. Schaff and James Inglis (1869).

LILY. The only true lily now found in Palestine is the scarlet martagon; but it is likely, that by the term in Scripture is meant the scarlet anemone, which in color and abundance fills the requirements (Caut. v. 13; Matt. vi. 28-30). But, as the Arabs now use the word of many flowers, it may be that in Scripture similar laxity prevails.

LIMBORCH, Philipp van, b. in Amsterdam, June 19, 1633; d. there April 13, 1712. He studied theology, philosophy, philology, and mathematics in his native city, Leyden, and Utrecht, and was appointed pastor at Gouda in 1657, pastor in Amsterdam in 1667, and in the next year professor of theology at the Remonstrant college in Amsterdam. What Episcopius began, and Curcellaus continued, he completed. His Institutiones Theologiae Christianae (1686) was translated into English by William Jones, London, 1702. Prominent among his other works are De Veritate Religionis Christianae (1687) and Historia Inquisitionis (1692), translated into English by Samuel Chandler, London, 1731. See A. DES ARMORIE VAN DER HOEVEN · De J. Clerico et P. a Limborch, LIMBUS, or LIMBO. The Roman-Catholic Church fixes the eternal end of human life in a double existence in heaven and hell, and so far she is in full accord with the Greek and Protestant churches; but, in her farther development of these fundamental ideas, she pursues a course of her own. The Roman Catechism teaches that there are a hell, in which infidels and such as die in a state of reprobation are shut up forever under unspeakable sufferings; a purgatory, in which the souls of the faithful go through a certain amount of pain in order to be thoroughly purified from sin; and, finally, a third place,—the bosom of Abraham, or, as it is generally called in common ecclesiastical parlance, the limbus patrum,—in which the pre-Christian saints, the saints of the Old Testament, were retained in an intermediate state between blessedness and punishment until the descent of Christ into Hades. To these three ablita receptacula taught by the symbolical books of the Church, her theologians, the schoolmen, have added a fourth one for children who die without baptism,—the limbus infantum. The chorography of the infernal region then becomes as follows: in the centre of the earth, hell; in the sphere around hell, purgatory; in the sphere around purgatory, limbus infantum; and then, somewhere between heaven and hell, the bosom of Abraham. With respect to the detailed description of these localities, most poets and theologians agree as to the first, second, and fourth; while the third, the limbus infantum, has given rise to very diverse opinions. [See the art. on INFANT SALVATION.] The word limbus is Latin, means "border," and was probably first employed by Thomas Aquinas, who rapidly brought it into common use. GÜDER.

LINCOLN (Linnum, "hill fort by the pool," and Colonia), the capital of the county of the same name, is situated on the Witham, a hundred and thirty-two miles north-west from London, and is one of the oldest and most interesting of English cities: present population, 37,312. The glory of the place is the minster, of which Mr. C. H. Coote, in the Encyclopædia Britannica, says, "As a study to the architect and antiquary, it stands unrivalled, not only as the earliest purely Gothic building in Europe, but as containing within its compass every variety of style, from the simple massive Norman of the west front to the Late Decorated of the east portion. The building material is the volite and calcareous stone of Lincoln Heath and Haydon, which has the peculiarity of becoming hardened on the surface when tooled. In former days the cathedral had three spires, all of wood, or leaded timber. The spire on the central tower was blown down in 1547. Those on the two western towers were removed in 1818. The ground plan of the first church was laid by Bishop Remigius in 1086, and the church was consecrated May 2, 1092." The cathedral, as at present standing, dates from 1150. The see of Lincoln is said to have been established in 1078. The dimensions of the cathedral internally are: nave, 250 × 79.6 × 80 feet; choir, 158 × 82 × 72 feet; main transept, 220 × 63 × 74 feet; choir transept, 166 × 11 × 72 feet. From the central tower booms the new "Great Tom of Lincoln," which weighs five tons, eight hundred-weight. Among the famous bishops of Lincoln are St. Ingo (d. 1200); Grosseteste (d. 1253); William Wake, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1737); and Edmund Gibson (d. 1748). The present incumbent is Christopher Wordsworth, D.D., LL.D., who was consecrated in 1869; and the yearly income is five thousand pounds.

LINDSEY, Theophilus, b. in Middlewich, Cheshire, June 20, 1723; d. in London, Nov. 3, 1808. He became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, 1747; and vicar of Catterick, 1764; but, leaning towards antitrinitarian views, he was confirmed in them by Priestley: so he resigned his living in 1773, and on April 17, 1774, began Unitarian services in London, and continued them until 1793, when he gave up his charge. His chief work is An Historical View of the State of the Unitarian Doctrine and Worship from the Reformation to our Own Times, London, 1783. His Sermons appeared in 1810, and Memoirs, by Thomas Belsham, in 1812.

LINDSLEY, Philip, D.D., b. at Morristown, N.J., Dec. 21, 1786; d. at Nashville, Tenn., May 25, 1855. He was graduated at the College of New Jersey, 1804; was tutor there, 1807–09, 1812; professor, 1813; vice-president, 1817; declined the presidency, 1823; in 1824 became president of the University of Nashville; resigned, 1850; for the next two years professor of ecclesiastical polity and biblical archaeology in the New Albany Seminary, Indiana. He was moderator of the General Assembly, 1834. His Works were edited, with a memoir, Philadelphia, 1865, 3 vols.

LINEN. As the finest flax was grown in Egypt, the finest linen of antiquity came from there; and linen was there the material of which the priestly and state robes were made (Gen. xli. 42), and in which mummies were wrapped. Among the Hebrews, linen was similarly used; thus the veil of the temple and the curtain for the entrance were made of it (Exod. xxvi. 31, 36), and priestly and royal persons wore it (Exod. xxviii. 6, 8, 15, 39, xxxix. 27; 1 Chron. xv. 27). Several Hebrew words are interpreted "linen." See SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, sub voce.

LINGARD, John, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S., Roman-Catholic historian, b. at Winchester, Feb. 5, 1771; d. at Hornby, near Lancaster, July 13, 1851. He studied at the English College, Douai, France, from 1782 to 1793; but, anticipating the breaking-up of the college in the spring of that year, went to England as tutor in the family of Lord Stourton, and remained in this capacity until, in October, 1791, he went to Crook Hall, near Durham, where some of those driven from Douai had gathered, and completed his theological studies. He was ordained priest in 1795; and, having declined a flattering call to London, taught natural and moral philosophy in Crook Hall, and was vice-president and general director of the studies. In 1808 the college was removed to Ushaw, Durham, and he accompanied it, and in 1810 was chosen president; but in 1811 he retired to Hornby, a very small charge, in order that he might give himself up to historical studies undistracted. There he spent his life in laborious research. In 1817 he visited Rome, partly on business connected with the English college, and partly to study in the Vatican Library; again, he was there in 1821, and was received with great distinction. The Pope, Pius VII., conferred upon him the degrees of doctor of divinity and doctor of laws. In 1821 he was elected a member of the Royal Society. In 1825 Leo XII. offered him a cardinal's hat; but he declined, preferring, characteristically, quiet and study, to cares and authority. For some little time prior to his death he received a pension from the government, of three hundred pounds. Lingard was an "able and intense" Roman Catholic, ever ready to defend his church. His principal controversial writings will be found collected under the title, A Collection of Tracts, or Several Subjects connected with the Civil and Religious Principles of Catholics (London, 1820): besides these may be mentioned his oft-published Catechetical Instructions on the Doctrines and Worship of the Catholic Church (1840), and his scholarly New Version of the Four Gospels (1836). But it is as an historical writer that he lives. He wrote, The Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1806 (3d ed. greatly enlarged, under the title, The History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, 1845), and the really great History of England, from the First Invasion by the Romans to the Commencement of the Reign of William III., London, 1819-30, 8 vols.; 5th and best ed., revised thoroughly by the author, 1849, 10 vols.; 6th ed. (reprint), 1854-55. It has been translated into German, French, and Italian. It should always be consulted for the Roman-Catholic view of its period, but cannot be relied upon implicitly; for the author keeps back, sometimes, part of the truth. (Compare ADAMS: Manual of Historical Literature, pp. 440, 441.) A Life of Lingard is prefixed to the sixth edition of his history.

LINUS is, by all lists of Roman bishops, placed as the immediate successor of St. Peter (IRENÆUS: Adv. om. hæc., III., 3, 3; Catalogus Liberii, ed. MOMMSEN, in his Über den Chronographen von 354, EUSEBIUS: Hist. Eccl., III., 2, 13, and Chronicle, p. 156, ed. Schöne; AUGUSTINE: Epist. 53; OPTATUS: De schis. Donat., II., 3). The length of his reign is differently determined. Eusebius counts twelve years in his church history, but fourteen in his chronicle; the Catalogus Liberii counts twelve years, four months, and twelve days; Jerome, eleven years. The date of the beginning of his reign is also differently fixed according to the different calculations of the death of St. Peter. As the Roman congregation knew nothing about an episcopal constitution in the beginning of the second century, Linus was consequently simply a presbyter of the church; but when it afterwards became of interest to present a continuous succession of bishops from the apostle Peter, he was made a bishop, and identified with the Linus of 2 Tim. iv. 21. His alleged epitaph has no interest whatever (comp. KRAUS: Roma sotteranea, 2d ed., p. 69). See LIPSIVS: Chronologie d. römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869, p. 146. HAUCK.

LINZ, The Peace of, was concluded, Dec. 13, 1645, between Georg Rakoczy, Prince of Transylvania, and the Emperor Ferdinand III. as King of Hungary, and forms the foundation of the constitution of the evangelical church in Hungary. The Protestants obtained freedom of worship; the churches which the Roman Catholics had taken from them were restored to them; and a punishment was fixed for any one who interfered with their service, or annoyed them on account of their religion.

LIONS of the Asiatic species, smaller, with a shorter mane, and less formidable, than the African species, were found in Palestine down to the twelfth century, but have disappeared, together with the forests. Towns derived their names from the lion, e.g., Arieh and Laish; while Lebaoth means "lioness." The lion's favorite abode seems to have been in the jungles of the Jordan (Jer. xlix. 19, l. 44). It was sometimes attacked by the shepherds single-handed (1 Sam. xvii. 36); but generally it was itself the attacking party, devoured men, and even ravaged villages. How deep an impression the Hebrews had received from this animal, the "king of beasts," may be judged, not only from the characteristic descriptions which the Bible contains of its habits and appearance, its roar and movements, but also from the innumerable symbolical and metaphorical expressions derived from it (Gen. xlix. 9; 1 Chron. xii. 8; Isa. xxix. 1, marg.; Rev. v. 5).

LIPTINES. See LESTINES.

LITANY (λίτάνια) The term originally meant a prayer for protection (comp. λασσομαί), but later was used of the processions in which such prayers were offered (comp. Sophokles, Glossary of later and Byzantine Greek, in Memoirs of the American Academy, vii. 407), or of the Kyrie Eleison. Since the Reformation, it is usually employed to designate a special form of prayer in which the minister announces the objects of petition, and the congregation responds with an appropriate supplicatory ejaculation. From of old the ministerial announcement has been called the prosphephesis. There are proofs, that, at a very early period, the congregation at public service not only gave the response "Amen" to the eucharistic prayers (Justin: Ap., i. 65; comp. Apost. Constt., viii. 12), but also other responses in the general prayer of the church. When, for example, the prosphephesis for the emperor was recited, all responded, "Christ, help!" (Χριστὲ βοήθει. See Daniel: Cod. liturg., iv. 1, 71). The call to repeat a Kyrie Eleison ("Lord, have mercy upon us") first occurs in the special prayers for penitents (Ap. Constt., viii. 8). In the so-called liturgies of James and Mark,—the oldest of the Oriental liturgies,—provision is made for responsive worship, as when the prayer was opened on the part of the minister with the words, "Let us all say, Kyrie Eleison." The other Oriental liturgies, those of Chrysostom and Basil, the Armenian, etc., referred their responses to the deacon or the choir. The Greek expression, Kyrie Eleison, was introduced in the churches of the West by a decree of the Council of Vaison, in 529, at the side of the Latin Domine miserere ("Lord, have mercy upon us"); and, by the rule of Benedict, Kyrie became another designation for "litany."

Mamertus, Archbishop of Vienne (460), influenced by earthquakes and other calamities, instituted rogationes, or processional litanies, for the three days preceding Ascension Day. The Council of Orleans (511) called these processions "litanies" (litaniae), and prescribed them for all Gaul. Avitus of Vienne (d. about 525) describes them in a homily. Leo III. (795-816) introduced these processions on the same days in Rome (Muratori: Liturgia Rom., i. 78). Notices of these processionals go back no farther than Mamertus; but it is related that Pelagius I. in 555, after the litany was said in a certain church in Rome, had a processional from there to St. Peter's (Muratori: Rer. Ital. script., iii. 1323). This was probably a development of the usual processionals at Easter, at which the litany was repeated thrice. The prayers of the litany were already at this time concluded with the words, "Lamb of God, have mercy upon us" (Muratori, i. 564). In addition to these processionals, the 25th of April was fixed in Rome as the day for a public processional with the litany. This—the so-called litanía major—Gregory the Great found in use. In its observance, it was the custom to march from one of the churches to St. Peter's in order to say the "litany which is called by all the 'larger'" (comp. Martène: De antiq. eccl. rit., i. 514 sq.). The litanía septiformis,—so called because it was performed by seven choirs,—which Gregory established, is not to be confounded with this one. It was occasioned by a desolating pestilence which followed upon an inundation of the Tiber in 590, and became the model of the Gallic rogationes, which were called litanía minores.

The "larger litany," as it is found in the Gregorian Missal, appealed to the saints; but such petitions had grown very much by 887, at which date the Paris form was certainly in use. After the Kyrie Eleyson and "Christ, hear us" had been repeated three times, a hundred petitions were offered, containing appeals to Mary, the angels, and the apostles. These were closed with the petition, "All ye saints, pray for us." In the middle ages, litanies were also said at the dedication of churches, the coronation of the Roman emperors, etc.

By the rule of Benedict, the litany came to be frequently used in the convents; and a short litany was said every Saturday at the celebration of the mass. The frequent use of the Kyrie in song and on all festal occasions, by the Germans in the middle ages, is a proof of the frequent use of the litany by the priests.

The number of litanies increased to such an extent, that Clement VIII. saw fit to limit it. Of those originating in the latter part of the middle ages he chose only the Litany of our Lady of Loretto. It belongs to the thirteenth or fourteenth century, and praises Mary with every conceivable title of honor. By papal decree in 1616, the Litany of the Name of Jesus was also sanctioned. This does not date, even by the confession of Roman-Catholic scholars, beyond the fifteenth century. It is, however, the Litany of All the Saints which ranks highest in the Roman-Catholic Church. The Reformation was a fresh occasion for new litanies against the Reformers; and of these we will only mention the Litanía et preces ad opem adv. hereticos . . . jussu P. Gregorii XIII. dicenda ("Litanies and Prayers against the Heretics," etc.).

Luther compiled both a Latin and a German litany, which were in use at Wittenberg, at any rate, in 1529, as a letter of Nicolaus Hausmann proves (De Wette, iii. 423). The old chords for the Latin litany may be found in the old Lutheran hymn-books of Kenchenthal and Lossius. Amongst the other petitions which Luther introduced was that against the Turks and the Pope (Wider des Türken und des Papstes Mord u. Lästerung), inserted in 1546. Luther declared this congregational form of prayer to be "most useful and salutary." The Moravians, also, use the litany with some special petitions.

[Augustine and the monks that were with him, according to Bede, entered Canterbury chanting a litany. The litany of the English Book of Common Prayer was originally intended to be a distinct office. A rubric in the first prayer-book (1549) ordered it to be said on Wednesdays and Fridays, before the communion-office. It was then placed after the communion-office, and in 1552 put in the place it now occupies, with the direction that it was to be "used upon Sundays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and at other times when it shall be commanded by the ordinary." The clause in Edward's Prayer-Book, "From the tyranny of the Bishop of Rome and all his detestable enormities," was omitted in the copy printed by royal sanction, 1559. See BINGHAM: Antiquities; MARTÈNE: De Antiquis ritibus, etc.; BLUNT: Annotated Prayer-Book, 6th ed., London, 1875; PROCTER: History of the Book of Common Prayer, pp. 249 sqq., 11th ed., Lond., 1874; STANLEY: *Christ. LITERÆ FORMATÆ. The custom of furnishing travelling Christian brethren and sisters with letters of introduction is very old in the Church (Acts xviii. 27; Rom. xvi. 1; 2 Cor. iii. 1), and originated naturally from the lively intercommunication between the congregations, and their great hospitality. In 2 John 10 it was even forbidden to receive a person who did not hold the true doctrine; so that it soon became necessary for a traveller to legitimize himself on that point by a letter from the head of the congregation to which he belonged. Such letters were called literæ communicatoriæ, and must not be confounded with the official epistles by which one congregation commonly communicated with another, or with the so-called literæ pacis, testifying to the legitimacy of the purpose for which the bearer was travelling.

Already Dionysius of Corinth, at the time of Marcus Aurelius, complains that literæ communicatoriæ which he had issued had been counterfeited (Eusebius: Hist. Eccl., iv. 23); and Cyprian says in his ninth epistle (ed. Hartel) that he had received a letter from Rome which looked very suspicious. In the period of the great councils, from the fourth to the seventh century, numerous instances occurred of forgeries of this description; and, in order to counteract that vicious tendency, it was prescribed that the letters should be issued according to certain rules. Thus the old literæ communicatoriæ became literæ formatae, or literæ canonicæ, or simply formatae. But it is doubtful whether the name formata was derived from a certain fixed form prescribed for the letters, or from the seal (forma) with which they were furnished. LITURGY. The authority of Christ as distinctly requires common prayer as it requires prayer in secret. If he said, "Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet," he also said, "After this manner pray ye, Our Father who art in heaven." The last as clearly implies a social act as the first implies a solitary act; and, in enjoining the duty, he also gave the form of words to be made use of. The liberty which is often usurped, of interpreting this as merely or chiefly the model on which prayer is to be formed, and discarding the use of the very form itself in social prayer, must be regarded as due to a purely subjective interest. The command, "Go ye and teach all nations," is not more peremptory than the command, "When ye pray, say, Our Father who art in heaven." The first devotional utterance, therefore, of the disciples, was common prayer. Their voices blended together in that divine oration which in all ages since has been found equally suited to express the adoring sentiment of the great congregation and the simple aspiration of the child at its mother's knee. With this example and lesson of Jesus himself before them, it is natural that the early church should have incorporated in all their public and all their private worship the Lord's Prayer as the legitima et ordinaria oratio. The illustrations of this fact lie so plain on the face of Christian archæology, that we shall waste no space in citing them. It was also equally natural, that, regarding the Lord's Prayer as a warrant for that method of praying, the early church teachers should so far consult for the edification of the simple and untaught disciples, as to add also other forms, repeating the same prayers, for example, again and again, till they became fixed in the memory of the people, who thus learned when to ejaculate the "Amen" which had been handed down to them from the practice of the apostolic churches. In this way a simple but continually augmenting service of prayer would be growing up in the Church, varying, in various parts, according to the taste and the devotional gifts of the several bishops. These would soon become so familiar, that the people would be able to join in every prayer without waiting for the prompting voice of a "monitor." As these forms, from including at first only the Legitima et quotidiana oratio and certain familiar ejaculations, became enlarged to embrace a more complex sacramental service, it would be found convenient to reduce them to writing. The construction of these liturgies would be a gradual process. Neither Chrysostom, nor Leo, nor any other of the Fathers, sat down to compose a form of public prayer. They compiled it from existing sources, adding something of their own, and arranging the whole according to their discretion. A complete service of prayer as certainly implies long previous tentative essays towards it as a complete modern dictionary implies numberless imperfect attempts at lexicography. A Webster or a Worcester adopts the body of English words he finds already catalogued, and adds new ones. The dictionary, however, exists in the language before the vocabulary is arranged and defined; and a liturgy exists as soon as forms of prayer are employed, whether they are written down or not. The two great families of the early liturgies are the Eastern and the Western. In general it will be admitted that the Oriental Church, which took the lead in every thing relating to worship, possessed forms of prayer sooner than the Latin, and that some of the Greek liturgies date back, in their elements, to a very early period. The most primitive of these, by the universal consent of critics, is that body of prayer found in the eighth book of the pseudo-Clementine Apostolical Constitutions. It does not, indeed, amount, in the strict sense, to a liturgy; since its forms are designed, not so much for the people as for the officiating minister. They were never used in any church. Probably they were never "published," but only privately circulated; but, viewed even in this light, they possess, for their character and the indications in them of a high antiquity, a marked value of their own.¹

The clumsy device by which the various parts of the diataxeis ("Constitutions") are ascribed to the several apostles is not to be understood as seriously meant to deceive. It was merely a rhetorical contrivance for giving authority and emphasis to the instructions, like the speeches in Thucydides and Sallust. But this apparent fraud, and the pseudo-epigraphic title, have thrown, upon the eighth book at least, an unmerited degree of discredit. It is the oldest body of prayer we have inherited from the primitive church, and exhibits the simplicity, the tenderness, the adoring reverence, with which believers in the earliest ages drew near the mercy-seat of God.

A few characteristic features of this liturgy may here be mentioned. —

1. The prayers extend continuously to a great length. They are not broken up into parts, with an intermediate "amen;" and there is no appearance yet of the "collect."

2. The length of the prayers consists mostly in their taking the character of historical reviews of God's providence towards his church under the old dispensations. From this is drawn an argument for his continued watchful care over his people in all times.

3. Whoever may have been the author or authors of these prayers, they include passages of as great sublimity and beauty as have ever entered into public devotion in any later times.

4. The fact of an elaborate hierarchy being implied, with ascertained rules for their ordination, the appointment of tithes for their support, the use of a certain apparatus in the sacramental service, the lighting of candles on the altar, prayers for the pious dead, etc., are no disproof of the ante-Nicene origin of these Constitutions. Contrariwise they only illustrate the early period at which such usages found their way into Christian worship. Two hundred years are a long period in human history, and afford room for great changes in human institutions, for the better or the worse; and there is evidence enough that changes of various kinds went on somewhat rapidly in the obscure twilight of the first centuries.

5. This early origin of the "Constitutions" is confirmed by various allusions to a condition of things prevailing in the church before the time of Constantine the Great: as, e.g., the still formidable power of heathenism, and the sufferings of Christians in mines and prisons.

6. The attribute of φιλάνθρωπε, by which God is apostrophized as the "lover of human kind," and which is so characteristic of the Greek liturgies, appears first in these "Constitutions," reminding us of the invocation in the familiar hymn, "Jesus, lover of my soul."

7. The conclusion is, that these "Constitutions" exhibit the devotional spirit and method of the Oriental Church not later than the end of the third or beginning of the fourth century, with elements derived from the second and first.

In proceeding now to describe the early Christian liturgies, properly so called, we may notice (1) That the number of them is very large, the far greater part Oriental; (2) That they are found alike in all parts of the church, from the Malabar coast to the Spanish peninsula; (3) That through all this broad extent of Christendom, Eastern and Western, in the various languages of Europe, Asia, and Northern Africa, the liturgies show a sufficiently close resemblance to indicate a common origin.

1. They are all "sacramentaries." The Christian sacrifice is the central object about which all the parts of the service are gathered. In this respect the Protestant liturgies differ from them, since these may be said rather to be gathered about the sermon, and to relate to the whole worship of God, both regular and special; while the early liturgies neither include any forms for special occasions, nor make any reference to the preaching of the gospel.

2. They all include the element of prayer for the dead. This practice is so irreconcilable with the Protestant doctrine of probation as to be generally classed among the characteristic corruptions of the Church of Rome. It must therefore be with a certain sensation of surprise that the Protestant finds this usage, not merely in a few of the early liturgies, but in all of them without exception; from which it would follow that we have to take our choice between admitting that the practice is so in harmony with the yearnings of our nature as to spring up sporadically wherever there were Christian worshippers, or else that it was the common inheritance of the churches derived from the earliest times, before they were separated from each other. The Protestant finds a considerable relief, however, in discovering that these prayers imply no belief in the existence of a purgatory. Not the faintest allusion to any such place or state occurs in the early liturgies. The prayers "for the whole Catholic Church" include the departed saints as being in a state, not of purgatorial suffering, but of incomplete happiness; as being in paradise, and not yet in heaven.

3. There are many minor features, not requiring to be particularly dwelt upon, found alike in all these liturgies; such as the division of the service into two parts,—that preceding the consecration of the elements (pre-anaphoral) and the anaphora, or sacramental service,—the use of the Lord's Prayer, the secret prayer of the minister (oratorio rebi), the mingling of water with the wine, the invocation of the Holy Spirit, and various rubrical directions, everywhere substantially the same.

4. It remains to be added that these were all true liturgies: they were adapted to the use of the congregation. The service is not all performed by the minister, but the people have their vocal share. The worship was responsive throughout: the people reply at all the appropriate places.—Habemus ad Dominum, Domine Miserere, Miserere Nostri, Deus Salvator Noster, etc. They repeat aloud the oratio dominica (the Lord's Prayer), they resound the creed and the doxology, and, at the end of all the prayers, swell the chorus of "the Amen." This made a true service for the people (a Λειτουργία), and justified the concluding prayer of thanksgiving, "O God, who hast given us grace with one accord to make these our common supplications unto thee," etc.

These remarks premised as to the harmony of the whole body of the liturgies, we proceed to a more particular description of the details of the service. We suppose ourselves to be writing, not for professional scholars, who will go to the original sources themselves, but for the benefit of popular readers. We shall take, therefore, a single representative Oriental liturgy to furnish a brief sketch of the mode in which the church of the fifth and sixth centuries conducted its sacramental service. Leaving out the Clementine Liturgy,—improperly so called, which, as already observed, was never employed in any church,—there were three principal and most venerable forms in use in the Syrian and Egyptian churches; viz., those of Basil of Casarea, Gregory "Theologos," and Cyril of Alexandria. Of these we may take the first as a pattern liturgy, an analysis of which will set the whole sacramental worship of the early Eastern Church before us. Under it we include the Basilian Liturgy of the Alexandrian Church, and the liturgy of Chrysostom, which are only variations of it. It was the original type on which the others were formed, and was more widely in use throughout the East than any other; everywhere, indeed, except in Jerusalem, where the so-called "Liturgy of St. James" was used, and in Alexandria, which naturally clung to the pretended liturgy of St. Mark. At this day, after the lapse of near fifteen hundred years, the liturgy of Basil prevails, without any substantial variety, from the northern shore of Russia to the extremities of Abyssinia, and from the Adriatic and Baltic Seas to the farthest coast of Asia. Basil was Bishop of Casarea from A.D. 370 to A.D. 379,—the time of his death. His title of "The Great" indicates the admiration of his own age, and explains the readiness with which the Eastern churches in subsequent times all adopted a form of worship which he was believed to have sanctioned. Following, then, the order of Basil's liturgy, we find, first, that the priest begins with the apostolic benediction, to which the people respond, "And with thy spirit," followed by other responsive sentences. Second, then follows a prayer of praise and adoration to God as Creator, Ruler, Saviour, and Spirit of truth, ending with the trisagion, "For all things do serve thee,—angels, archangels, thrones, dominions, principalities, powers, the many-eyed cherubim and seraphim, crying, one to another incessantly and with uninterrupted praises, saying" [here the people all join in the acclaim]. "Holy, holy, holy Lord God of Sabaoth, heaven and earth are full of thy glory. Hosanna in the highest! Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the Lord!"

The deacon then arranges the sacramental vessels; and the minister proceeds with a prayer adoring the justice of God as illustrated in the creation and the fall of man, and his mercy as shown in the incarnation, life, ministry, atoning death, resurrection, ascension, mediatorial reign, and second coming, of the Lord Jesus Christ. This constitutes the pre-anaphoral service. The prayer ends with the words, "But he has left us a memorial of his saving passion; for when he was just going out to his voluntary, glorious, and life-giving death, in the same night wherein he gave himself up for the life of the world, taking bread into his holy and immaculate hands, and presenting it to thee, his God and Father, he gave thanks, blessed, sanctified, and brake it, and gave it to his holy apostles, saying" [and here begins the anaphora], "This is my body which is broken for you for the remission of sins." The consecration of the cup immediately follows in the same scriptural terms, concluding with "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink this cup, ye do show forth my death, and confess my resurrection." To the various parts of this service the people respond, "Amen. We praise thee, we bless thee, we give thanks to thee, O Lord, we make our supplications unto thee, O our God." An invocation to the Holy Spirit follows, and then a commemoration of the pious dead. A full prayer is then offered for all sorts and conditions of men, — for "our most religious emperors;" for "enemies and persecutors;" for the "afflicted and persecuted in deserts, mountains, dens, and caves of the earth;" for "our brethren in court and camp;" for "those absent on just occasions," and a great number of other classes of persons. This long prayer is followed by a brief litany, in which the people continually respond to the various suffrages, "Lord, have mercy upon us," etc. At the close of all this, the sacramental emblems, the bread and the wine, are distributed at once to the people without further words. It is to be remembered that all this was the sacramental part of the service, at which none but the initiated or believers were permitted to attend, and that the missa catechumenorum, including the reading of the Scriptures and the bishop's sermon, at which all might be present, had preceded it.

The question now recurs as to the age to which this form of prayer belongs. Was it the composition of the great bishop of Caesarea? or was it merely compiled by him from earlier sources? Or, again, was it the production, as some of its contents might seem to indicate, of a considerably later time, sought to be passed off under so illustrious a name?

We begin with the testimony of Basil himself. He was the most illustrious light among the constellation of brilliant men that adorned the church of the fourth century, eminent alike as theologian, pulpit orator, church leader, and saint. No one could have known better than he the history and usages of the church. In the twenty-seventh chapter of his work De Spiritu Sancto, he is arguing, in defence of a certain form of trinitarian confession, against the objection that no such precise form was found in the Scriptures. Many things are lawfully practised in the church, he says, for which no written authority can be found in the "saints;" such as making the sign of the cross, worshipping towards the east, standing in prayer on Sundays, trine immersion, etc. But these are all warranted by tradition. So, he adds, the method of consecrating the elements at the Eucharist is nowhere found set down in the writings of "the saints," but is regulated in accordance with the traditional doctrine of the church. This implies that there was a well-known and fixed form of sacramental liturgy sanctioned by long usage. It was not new, any more than the practice of making the sign of the cross, which we know was universal in the time of Tertullian, nearly two hundred years earlier, and therefore presumptively had been in use for a long period before him.

But it has been generally argued from the phrase employed in this passage, "the saints," that no forms for the sacramental service had ever been reduced to writing before Basil's own time, regarding "saints" as equivalent to "fathers." Bingham and others of the earlier writers, and even so careful a scholar as the author of the article Liturgie, in the new Herzog's Real Encyclopädie (von Zeitschitz), have too hastily admitted this; whereas the whole extent of Basil's dictum is, that no such forms are found in the writings of the apostles. The context shows that he is referring only to the absence of scriptural authority for certain usages, which he maintains were notwithstanding lawful, anticipating in this the argument of Richard Hooker in his Ecclesiastical Polity. For aught that appears in this passage, therefore, there may have been already extant various less perfect sacramental liturgies, differing in different churches. What Basil effected was to reduce them all to one common form, to which his great name gave a currency that enabled it soon to swallow up the rest.

This is the meaning of a passage in the funeral oration of Gregory Nazianzen for his illustrious friend (In laudem Basilii, Orat. 43). Recounting the manifold activities of the Bishop of Caesarea, he says, that besides the erection and care of his almshouse and hospital, his unsleeping vigilance over his flock, his codes for the government of convents and monasteries, and his general regulation of the lives and duties of the clergy, he had also effected a compilation of the prayers of the church into a regular service (descriptions precum). This descriptio precum ("order of prayer") was merely a new and improved edition of the sacramental service already in use, just as the symbolum Romanum was not an original creed, but only an accurate and perfected summary of the various regulae fidei current among the churches. In both cases a competent authority sanctioned the new form, to which the others soon gave place. That this Basilian Liturgy was afterwards successively enlarged, modified, "interpolated," etc., is unquestionable; but these later "interpolations" are merely signs of its greater relative antiquity. They are not properly interpolations at all, since they merely record the successive changes in the doctrinal or the devotional system of the church.

Beginning, then, from this work of Basil's, and following the footprints backward, we may find some ground for an opinion as to the period from which a liturgy was actually in use in the church.

About the year 347, Cyril, Bishop of Jerusalem, preached at the Easter festival those discourses which are known under the name of Catecheses mystagogicæ, or instructions to candidates preparatory to communion. The fifth of these lectures includes a commentary on the Lord's Prayer. It is directed to explaining to the catechumens the reasons for the various parts of the service, — the washing of hands, the kiss of peace, the prayers, the responses of the people, and the administration of the Eucharist.

Now, it is to be observed here that Cyril is not proposing any new forms or rites, but takes the whole routine of the service for granted, and is merely giving to the catechumens, in a plain and simple way suited to the stage of their religious education, the reasons for the various parts. It is not different from a short sermon to Sunday-school children at the present day, explaining the nature of the church service. It may be safely assumed, then, that the forms thus expounded had been in use for a length of time; that they were the same in which Cyril himself had been trained in his childhood before the Council of Nice, and the same in which his parents and teachers had been educated during the long peace preceding the last persecution.

When we have reached this point, we come upon the trail of the pseudo-Clementine Liturgy; and this, in the same way, may be believed to exhibit the worship of the church as it was in the first half of the third century, reaching back, quite probably, to the time of Tertullian. That the worship of the church in his day was, to a considerable degree, simple and spontaneous, may be easily admitted; but that it may not have been, to some extent, conducted according to an ascertained ritual, is far from being decided, as is often assumed by his well-known phrase sine monitore quia de pectore (Apologeticus, 29). If the prayer was extemporaneous, the people certainly did not pray sine monitore, since the minister went before them, and dictated the words they were to adopt; and if an accustomed form was used, as would seem far the most likely in regular prayer for magistrates, it might still be equally de pectore. The natural meaning of this much-buffeted phrase would seem to be that Christians prayed for their rulers, as for others, without needing any command or summons, because they prayed cheerfully, and from the impulses of their own hearts.

We are not concerned to attempt tracing the growth of liturgical forms amid the dim twilight of the second century. The conclusion will be, that in the simple worship described by Justin Martyr, in which nothing more appears of a liturgical nature than a certain order of service, with common prayers, the regular administration of the Lord's Supper on "the day called Sunday," the kiss of charity, the vocal amen, etc., we have the germs that were gradually developed into the full liturgies of the fourth and fifth centuries.

To this must be added the positive conclusion, drawn from all experience, that no great change in the religious usages of a people is made in a day, or by the authority of any individual. Religious usages are above all others persistent, and while admitting, without serious difficulty, of immaterial modifications, remain for substance the same from generation to generation. We infer, therefore, that, when Basil compiled his descriptions precum, he presented nothing to startle the church of his time as new, but only an arrangement of their old familiar liturgy, with such new prayers as any bishop was at liberty to add. We infer the same thing of the form of worship illustrated by Cyril, and of the Clementine Liturgy. When we have reached that far, we have no doubt got back among the origines liturgicæ of the Christian Church, and may well be excused from groping any farther in the dark.

The other great family of liturgies, though much smaller in numbers, is the Western. In tracing the process of their development, the baseline from which to work backward would be the Gregorian rite of the year 600 A.D. In the same way as before, it might be shown that this was only a new and improved edition of the sacramentary of Gelasius of A.D. 492, as that was of the Leonian Liturgy of A.D. 451; and that the descriptions left us by Innocent I. (A.D. 404) and other of the Fathers, imply regular forms of prayer in the Church of Rome at still earlier periods. This deduction, as well as a particular account of the Roman service, our limits oblige us to dispense with.

We only add, that, omitting certain superstitious usages which had grown up in the church, these liturgies, containing as they do all the elements of the evangelical doctrine, and embodying a large part of the divine word, were admirably adapted to nurse the sentiment of religion among the people, and prove the vehicle for Christ's promise that the gates of hell should never prevail against his church. It must be regarded as unfortunate that their prejudice against popery and prelacy should have led Presbyterians so generally to cut themselves off from these rich sources of devotional culture, which have no necessary connection with either the one system or the other.

Protestant Liturgies. — Luther, Calvin, and the other Protestant leaders, who eliminated out of the worship of God the corrupt usages of the Church of Rome, found nothing objectionable in the mere fact of a regular form of prayer. They lost no time in providing suitable liturgies for the various countries that embraced the Reformation, each having its own national service. In 1523 Luther published his Lateinische Messe, and in 1526 the same, with improvements, in German. In 1538 Calvin issued his liturgy for the church of Strassburg, and in 1541 that for the church in Geneva, containing both ordinary and special services. In 1554 John Knox published a form of worship for the Scottish Kirk, modelled on that of Geneva. These liturgies all left room, in some part of the service, for the exercise of free prayer. The English Book of Common Prayer was compiled in 1549, by Cranmer and Ridley, from several Roman missals in use in various parts of England, portions of it being adopted from Butzer's liturgy, particularly the forms of confession and absolution. The noble simplicity of this service is due to its having been compiled, to a great extent, from the Latin sacramentaries of Leo and Gelasius, with additions made in the devout spirit and refined taste of Cranmer. A hundred years later, the growing alienation between the adherents of episcopacy and of presbytery in England caused the latter to discard liturgical services altogether, and to depend on the gift of extemporaneous prayer in their ministers. Eventually the two usages came to be characteristic of the two forms of church government; the Episcopalians all worshipping by means of a liturgy, and the Presbyterians by means of free prayer, though there is no reason in the nature of things why they might not both worship in the one way or the other; or, better still, why both methods should not be united in all public worship.

In the progress of the nineteenth century a general liturgical revival took place in various non-Episcopal churches in Germany, where a new form of service — the Agende — was drawn for the Evangelical Union, under the patronage of the king of Prussia. In 1858 a committee of the General Assembly of the Scottish kirk reported a collection of forms of worship for the use of soldiers, sailors, etc., which received the unanimous sanction of the Assembly. A few years since, the Church Service Society issued their Ευχολόγιον, or Book of Common Order, which has reached a fourth edition, and is working a marked but silent change in the public Presbyterian worship of Scotland. The Liturgy of the Catholic Apostolic Church (Irvingite), based on the Anglican Book of Common Prayer, is of a highly rich and elaborate character, corresponding with the hierarchical development in that enthusiastic communion. The daily prayer offered in every Irvingite Church gives thanks for the restoration of the order of the apostles, and for the warning, announced through them, of the nearness of the day of Christ's appearing. It contains, also, in the sense of the early liturgies, an intercession for the pious dead.

In the United States, except in the Episcopalian, Lutheran, German and Dutch Reformed, and Moravian churches, liturgical prayer has been almost wholly disused; but from the middle of the present century a marked tendency has developed itself in favor of increased dignity and variety in Presbyterian public worship. In 1855 Dr. Baird published anonymously his Eutaxia, or the Presbyterian liturgies. The Presbyterian Book of Common Prayer, by Professor Shields of Princeton, is merely a republication of the Anglican Prayer-Book, with the exceptions offered by the Presbyterians at the Savoy Conference. The litany and the ancient prayers are freely but judiciously altered, and many excellent new prayers are added. In 1857 the German Reformed Church issued a new Order of Worship, which is based upon a careful study of the liturgies of the ancient Church and the Reformation period, and resembles in many respects the Anglican liturgy. Its use is left optional with the ministers and congregations. The Dutch Reformed Church follows the old Palatinate Liturgy. The Lutherans in America use partly the German Lutheran Agenda, or new church books based upon them. The Moravians have a very rich evangelical liturgy in German and English, with responses and congregational singing.

and of free prayer. In favor of the latter it is claimed that this is the natural method, and alone corresponds to the impulses of the devout mind; that prayer by means of prescribed forms cramps the free expression of the desires to God, and tends to spiritual torpor and poverty. To this it is replied, that the objection is urged only by such as are unaccustomed to liturgical worship; that those familiar with it find it promotes attention and devotion in prayer; that it corroborates the sentiment of the communion of saints in all times and all ages, since the church, from a very early period till now, and throughout the larger part of Christendom, has worshipped, and continues to worship, by means of the same forms; that it would be as reasonable to insist that the minister should make his own hymns as his own prayers; and that, if a prayer-book in the hands of a worshipper is unfavorable to spirituality of worship, a hymn-book should be equally so; that David's written prayers are used with eminent profit by Christians as the expression of their religious sentiments; that worship, being the common act of the whole congregation, may properly be conducted by forms common to all; while preaching, being the work of the minister for the instruction of the people, is necessarily the act of one; and other similar arguments. On the other hand, it is admitted that occasions may frequently arise in the history of every congregation, calling for mention in public prayer, — as dangers, afflictions, spiritual prosperity, or decay, — for which a liturgy cannot provide. The conclusion reached by eminent members of both liturgical and non-liturgical churches is, that a system which should unite the propriety and dignity of venerable forms with the flexibility and adaptation of occasions of free prayer, would be superior to any existing method.

LIUDGERUS, or LUDGERUS, St., b. about 744; d. March 26, 809. He descended from a Frisian but Christian family; was educated in the school of Utrecht; studied at York, under Alcuin; labored for seven years as a missionary among the Frisians; visited Rome, and was by Charlemagne, to whom he was recommended by Alcuin, first sent as missionary among the Frisians; and then, after the subjugation of the Saxons, bishop of the newly founded see of Münster. Of his activity as bishop very little is known. He founded the monastery of Werden, and wrote a life of Gregory, his teacher at Utrecht. The sources for his life have been collected by W. Diekamp, in the fourth volume of his Geschichtsquellen d. Bistums Münster (Münster, 1881), who has separately published, in the same place and year. Die Vita sancti Liudgeri. His biography has been written by BEHREND, Neuhaldensleben, 1843; [LÜSING, Münster, 1878]; and PINGSMANN, Freiburg, 1879.

LIUDPRAND, or LUITPRAND, whose works form one of the principal sources for the history of the tenth century, was born in Italy, of a distinguished Lombard family, and was educated at the court of Pavia. He served first King Berengar, and then Otho I., who made him bishop of Cremona. His works are, Antapodosis (887-949), Liber de rebus gestis Ottonis (960-964), and Relatio de legatione Constantinopolitana (968-969). They were edited by Pertz, in Mon. Germ. iii. 264-363; new ed. by Dümmler, 1877.

LIVERPOOL, the famous commercial city on the Mersey, with a population of 552,425, was made the seat of a bishopric in 1880; and John Charles Ryle, D.D., was made first incumbent. The income of the see is thirty-five hundred pounds; and St. Peter's was constituted the pro-cathedral, pending the construction of a more suitable building.

LIVINGSTON, John Henry, D.D., "the father of the Reformed Dutch Church in America;" b. at Poughkeepsie, N.Y., May 30, 1746; d. in New Brunswick, N.J., Jan. 20, 1825. He was graduated at Yale College, 1762; studied law for two years; was converted, and, on advice of Archibald Laidie (see art.), sailed for Utrecht, Holland, May 12, 1766, there to study theology. He was "the last of the American youth who went thither for education and ordination." He was licensed by the Classis of Amsterdam, 1769; was called by the New-York Consistory, May 30, 1769; took the degree of doctor of divinity the next year; and on Sept. 3, 1770, arrived, and took his place as second English preacher in the Reformed Dutch Church in New York. The Revolution drove him from the city. He settled first at Kingston (1776), then at Albany (November, 1776-79), at Livingston Manor (1779-81), Poughkeepsie (1781-83). But on the close of hostilities (1783) he returned to the city. In 1781 he was appointed by the general synod professor of didactic and polemic theology; and in 1810 the synod called him to New Brunswick to open a theological seminary there, and at the same time he was elected president of Queen's (now Rutgers) College. These two offices he held until his death. It is said that his reason in entering the Dutch Church ministry was his desire to heal its sad dissensions. (See REFORMED (DUTCH) CHURCH.) Ably he fulfilled his design. By his education, his learning, his piety, and his dignity, he won the respect of both parties in the church; and under his skilful management "the Conferentie" and "the Coetus" were united (1771); and thus the credit of forming the independent organization of the Reformed Dutch Church in America must be given to him. It was he, also, who principally shaped the constitution of this church, and prepared its first psalm and hymn book (1787). As a preacher he was much admired. Notice is particularly taken of his animation and of his colloquial style. "His gesticulation would have been extravagant in any one but himself." "His theological lectures still form the basis of didactic and polemic instruction in the theological seminary of which he was the founder and father." They are preserved in manuscript in the Sage Library, New Brunswick; an abstract of them was published in 1832. See GUNN'S Memoirs of Rev. John H. Livingston, D.D., S.T.P., New York, 1829, condensed by Dr. T. W. Chambers, New York, 1856; also SIRAGUE'S Annals, vol. ix.

LIVINGSTONE, David, LL.D., D.C.L., F.R.S., F.R.C.S., missionary and explorer in Southern and Central Africa; b. at Blantyre, seven miles from Glasgow, in Scotland, March 19, 1813; d. April 30, 1873, in Itala, Africa. His father and mother were of the working-class, but of the highest moral and Christian worth. The father was a great reader, and deeply interested in the cause of Christian missions, then just beginning to attract attention. After a very short time at school, David was sent, at the age of ten, to a cotton-mill, where he spent the next twelve years of his life. The reading of Dick's Philosophy of a Future State led to his conversion; and an appeal from Gutzlaff, for missionaries to China, determined him to be a medical missionary. After attending theological and medical classes for two sessions at Glasgow, he offered his services to the London Missionary Society; and, being provisionally approved, he spent a further period in study at Ongar in Essex, and at London. In 1840 he passed at Glasgow as Licentiate of the Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons, and in November of the same year was ordained a missionary, under the London Missionary Society. His desire had been to go to China; but the opium war, in which, unhappily, England was then engaged, put a stop to that project. In London he had met with the Rev. Robert Moffat, who was then on furlough in England; and, having become greatly interested in what he told him of Africa, he received an appointment as a missionary there.

For a time he was occupied in work at Kuruman (Dr. Moffat's station) and in missionary tours to the north, undertaken to gain knowledge of the state of the people, and to find out a suitable locality for a new station. Already Livingstone had shown a fixed determination not to labor in the more accessible regions, but to strike out beyond. He early acquired a great liking for the plan of native agency; and his ambition was to scatter native agents far and near. He was remarkable for the influence he obtained from the very first,—partly through medical practice, and partly by his tact, and the charm of his manner over both chiefs and people. He also, from the first, took a lively interest in the natural productions of the country and in its structure and scientific history. After a time he settled at Mabotsa (in 1843) among the Bakhatla. While there, he had a wonderful escape from being killed by a lion; and while there, likewise, he married Mary Moffat, eldest daughter of Dr. Moffat of Kuruman. From Mabotsa, circumstances led him to remove to Chouane, and from that again to Kolobeng, where he lived till 1852. His people were a tribe of Bakwains, whose chief, Sechele, became a convert to Christianity. In his desire to plant native missionaries, he had oftener than once made an excursion into the Transvaal Republic,—a large territory that had been taken possession of by Boer emigrants from the Cape of Good Hope; but the Boers were no friends of missions, and, instead of encouraging him, did their utmost to thwart his plans.

Baffled in this direction, Livingstone determined to make explorations on the north; but a serious obstacle was the great Kalahari Desert, which at times could not be traversed for want of water. Three times Livingstone got to the north of it. On the first of these occasions he discovered Lake 'Ngami and the Rivers Zouga and Tamunak'le. His great desire was to find a suitable spot for a mission-station in the territories of a great chief, Sebituane, who received him with great cordiality, but died a few days after his arrival. The locality was infested by an insect called the tsetse-fly, fatal to cattle, and was, moreover, unwholesome from the prevalence of fever. It seemed to Livingstone that it would be of great importance for Sebituane's people to have a way to the sea, by which means legitimate commerce and Christianity would both be greatly advanced.

Livingstone sent his wife and four children home to England, and prepared for a great journey in fulfilment of this object. Before he set out, his house at Kolobeng was attacked by the Boers, and, along with all his property, utterly destroyed. Livingstone set out from Linyanti toward the western coast, with twenty-seven attendants, and after incredible hardships, including twenty-seven attacks of fever, at length reached the abodes of civilization at Loanda. Instead of making for Britain, Livingstone resolved to go back with his attendants to Linyanti, and then cross to the opposite shore of the continent. After a long time of labor and difficulty, in which his tact, his patience, and his faith were exposed to the severest strain, he reached Quilimane on May 26, 1856; the whole time of his journey since he left the Cape, in 1852, being almost four years. Livingstone made many important discoveries during these years; the most important being the existence of a tableland in Central Africa, depressed in the centre, with two ridges flanking it, which were free from the unhealthy influences prevalent in the lower-lying localities.

Dr. Livingstone now visited his native land, and showers of honors were poured upon him. Everywhere he was received with enthusiasm; and an extraordinary interest began to prevail on Africa, hitherto an unpopular continent. He wrote and published his first book, Missionary Travels. He saw it his duty to sever his connection with the London Missionary Society, believing that he could be more useful, alike for exploring, civilizing, and missionary purposes, in another capacity. He accepted an appointment as commander of an expedition sent by government to explore the River Zambesi, and to report on the products and capabilities of the region. This expedition was attended by extraordinary difficulties. The greatest of them lay in the conduct of the Portuguese traders, who had various settlements in the neighborhood of the Zambesi. These traders carried on an iniquitous traffic in slaves, encouraging chiefs to seize slaves from rival tribes in order to send them to the coast for sale. This expedition was signalized by the discovery of the Lake Nyassa, and much important territory in its neighborhood. Livingstone was very desirous to see missions and colonies planted in this neighborhood, which he rightly deemed to be the key of Central Africa. A Universities' Mission, named by missionaries from Oxford and Cambridge, was planted near Nyassa. But it was very unfortunate; the bishop who was its head, and several of the missionaries, being cut off very early. The death of Mrs. Livingstone was another great trial and discouragement. At last the expedition was recalled; but Livingstone, who had spent most of the profits of his book on a steamer of his own, remained for a time, trying to explore the country more fully. At last he, too, saw it desirable to return. He wished to expose the atrocious proceedings of the Portuguese in the matter of the slave-trade, and to find means of establishing a settlement at the head of the River Rovuma, beyond the Portuguese lines. Writing a short book might help both projects.

Home he accordingly went, via Bombay, in 1864; spending a great part of his time at Newstead Abbey, where he wrote The Zambesi and its Tributaries. While in England, it was suggested to him by an old friend, Sir Roderick Murchison, that it would be a great geographical feat to ascertain the watershed of Central Africa, and fix on the true sources of the Nile. Livingstone refused to make geography his chief object, but was willing to take up the inquiry as subordinate to his other aims, which were making known Christ to the natives, and promoting lawful commerce in place of the atrocious slave-trade. In the early years of this expedition, Livingstone was most unfortunate in the men he had for attendants. This, added to the difficulties thrown in his way by natives, who would not believe that he was not connected with the slave-trade, baffled and hindered him in every way. The loss of his medicine-chest, starvation, poverty, and very distressing attacks of sickness, brought him to the lowest ebb. The discoveries he made were very important: Lakes Moero and Bangweolo were added to the list. But his revelations of the unparalleled horrors of the slave-trade thrilled every humane heart. For a long time he was unheard of, and the utmost anxiety was felt concerning him. At Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, Henry M. Stanley, of The New-York Herald, came upon him, in 1871, in a state of great destitution, caused by the rascality of the men who had been sent up with stores for his relief. As he was believed to be dead, the business was attended to very negligently, and the stores were actually stolen by those in charge. Stanley amply relieved his wants. On parting, Livingstone determined to make a concluding effort to find out the watershed, and was encouraged to do this by the much better quality of the men whom Stanley had sent to attend him. But illness came on him, and at last, in Ilala, on the banks of Lake Bangweolo, overcame him. On the morning of May 1, 1873, he was found dead, kneeling at his bedside, in the attitude of prayer. His faithful and loving attendants, having buried the heart and other viscera, brought his remains to the seaside, at an incredible cost of danger and exertion. Borne to England, these remains were buried in Westminster Abbey, on April 18, 1874, amid the profound grief and reverence of the nation.

Amid all the vicissitudes of his career, Livingstone remained faithful to his missionary character. His warmth and purity of heart, his intense devotion to his Master and to the African people for his Master's sake, his patience, endurance, trustfulness, and prayerfulness, his love of science, his wide humanity, his intense charity, have given to his name and memory an undying fragrance. After his death, church after church hastened to send missionaries to Africa; and it would take a long space, even to enumerate all the agencies that are now at work there. His death, that seemed the death-blow to his plans, gave a new impulse to the cause of African evangelization and civilization, which bids fair, with God's help, to accomplish great results.

LLORENTE, Don Juan Antonio, b. at Rincondel Soto, Aragonia, March 30, 1756; d. in Madrid, Feb. 5, 1823. He studied canon law at Saragossa, was ordained a priest in 1779, and was in 1782 appointed vicar-general to the bishop of Calahorra. In literature he first made himself known as a successful play-writer, but he was soon drawn towards more serious occupations. His decided opposition to the policy of the Roman curia, and, indeed, to all sacerdotal authority, he himself dates back to the year 1784. Nevertheless, in 1789 he was made secretary-general to the Inquisition in Madrid. His exertions for the re-organization of that institution, especially for the introduction of public procedure, failed; and he was dismissed in 1801. In 1805 he obtained a canonry; and in 1806 he published Noticias historicas sobre las tres provincias vascongadas, 5 vols. During the revolution he sided with King Joseph, and was in 1808 made a member of the council of state, and head of the committee on the abolishment of the monasteries in Spain. When, in 1809, the Inquisition was abolished in Spain, he was charged with writing the history of the Spanish Inquisition; but the work, Histoire critique de l'Inquisition d'Espagne, was not published until 1817, in French, and at Paris, whither he in 1811 had followed King Joseph. It made a great sensation, and was immediately translated into English, Dutch, German, and Italian; but it also raised severe persecutions against its author; and when, in 1822, he published Portraits politiques des Papes, he was ordered to leave France within three days. He returned to Madrid, but died soon after. See Revue Encycl., xviii., where is also found a complete list of his works. BENRATH.

LLOYD, William, Bishop of Worcester, b. at Tilehurst, Berkshire, 1627; d. at Hartlebury Castle, Aug. 30, 1717. He was graduated at Oxford, and became fellow of Jesus College. He was successively prebend of Sarum (1667); vicar of St. Mary's, Reading, and archdeacon of Merioneth (1668); dean of Bangor (1672); vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Field (1676); bishop of St. Asaph (1680); lord-almoner (1689); bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (1692); and bishop of Worcester (1699). He is memorable in English ecclesiastical history as one of the most indefatigable opponents of Romanism under James II. When this king renewed his Declaration of Indulgence of 1687, in April, 1688, and ordered it to be read in all the churches, making the bishops responsible for the obedience to the order, he, with six other bishops and the archbishop, refused to obey. For this conduct the seven were imprisoned in the Tower of London (June 8-15), and tried for sedition, but acquitted. Bishop Lloyd was the author of many pamphlets, and of one valuable production, An Historical Account of Church Government as it was in Great Britain and Ireland when they first received the Christian Religion, London, 1684, reprinted, Oxford, 1842.

LOBO, Jeronimo, b. in Lisbon, 1593; d. there 1678. After entering the order of the Jesuits, he taught for some time in their college at Coimbra, but went in 1624 to Abyssinia as a missionary. After staying there for several years, he returned to Portugal in 1634. In 1640 he went to Goa as a missionary, and staid till 1656. After his second return to Portugal, he published, in 1659, a History of Abyssinia, which, together with the continuation by Legrand, and other additions, was translated into English by Samuel Johnson, in 1735.

LOBWASSER, Ambrosius, b. at Schneeberg, Misnia, April 4, 1515; d. at Königsberg, Nov. 27, 1585. He studied law at Leipzig; visited the universities of Louvain, Paris, and Bologna; and was in 1558 appointed chancellor of Misnia, and in 1563 professor of jurisprudence in Königsberg. In 1573 he published at Leipzig a German translation of Beza and Marot's French translation of the Psalms. The work was, in literary respects, quite mediocre: but the translation was made to fit the tunes of Goudimel; and thereby the book became the generally accepted hymn-book of the Reformed Congregations in Germany, and continued so for nearly two centuries. The library of Stuttgart contains no less than sixty editions of the book. It was translated into Latin, Danish, and Italian. LOCAL PREACHERS are laymen, members of the Methodist Church and of the district and quarterly conferences, by which bodies they are licensed to preach, and to which they are amenable. As a class they stand opposite to the "travelling" preachers, who are members, also, of the annual conferences. They are independent of episcopal appointment, or of appointment by stationing committees. They are required annually to make a report, and have their licenses renewed. After four consecutive years' service, they are eligible to the office of local deacon, and then, after four years more of service, to the office of local elder. They may have a regular pastoral charge. The Methodist Church owes much to the fidelity and zeal of her local preachers.

LOCI THEOLOGICI is the name which Melancthon gave to his representation of evangelical dogmatics, in opposition to the sententie of the schoolmen. In classical language, loci means the fundamental conceptions of any department of knowledge. The name was thus very appropriate, and was retained by the theologians of the Lutheran Church down to the middle of the seventeenth century. It was also adopted by some theologians of the Reformed faith, such as Musculus, Peter Martyr, J. Maccov, and Daniel Chamier.

E. SCHWARZ.

LOCKE, John, was born at Wrington, Somersetshire, Aug. 29, 1632. His father was a lawyer, possessed of moderate landed property, and a firm adherent of the parliamentary and nonconformist party. His father exacted great respect from him when a child, but, as he grew up, allowed him greater familiarity, — a practice which the son recommends. He was educated at the famous Westminster school; and 1651 he entered Christ Church, Oxford (in the grounds of which is still shown the mulberry-tree which he planted), where he was a diligent student, and devoted himself specially to the branches requiring thought. He did not follow any profession; but he was particularly addicted to the study of medicine, in which Sydenham declares that he acquired great knowledge and skill. He gave himself, by turns, to politics and philosophy. In 1664, during the Dutch war, he accompanied, as secretary, Sir W. Vane, the king's envoy, to the elector of Brandenburg; and there is much humor in the account he gives of his journey. In 1666 he became acquainted with the statesman Lord Ashley, afterwards Lord Shaftesbury, and became his medical adviser, counsellor, and friend. Henceforth his life is partly in Oxford, and partly with Shaftesbury, who appointed him to various public offices. Though very prudent, he became an object of suspicion to the royal party. Sunderland, by the king's command, ordered his expulsion. He was not expelled from Oxford, but deprived of his studentship by the dean and chapter of the college. He retreated to Holland, and lived in Amsterdam and Utrecht, where he had close intercourse with a number of eminent men, who met in each other's houses for discussion, — with Le Clerc, Guenilon the physician, with Limborch, and with the Remonstrant or Arminian party. The revolution of 1688 enabled him to return to his own country, bringing with him his Essay on Human Understanding, which he had been engaged in writing since 1671, and which he published in 1690. Henceforth his literary activity was very great. He carried on an extensive correspondence (afterwards published) on philosophic subjects with his admirer, William Molyneux of Dublin, who introduced his essay into Dublin university, where it held sway down to the second quarter of this century. He carried on a keen controversy with Stillingfleet, bishop of Worcester, who objected to his doctrine of substance as undermining the doctrine of the Trinity. He wrote three letters on Toleration, on which his views, perhaps derived in part from John Owen at Oxford, were very liberal for his day, though much behind the opinions now entertained. He would give no toleration to atheists or papists. In a constitution he drew out for the Carolinas, he allowed slavery to exist. He wrote very valuable papers on Currency and Coin, which saved the country from very serious evils.

He had all along an implicit faith in the Bible and in Christianity. He published in 1695 the Essay on the Reasonableness of Christianity as delivered in the Scriptures. He wrote a Commentary consisting of paraphrases and notes on the Epistles to the Galatians, Corinthians, Romans, and Ephesians, together with An Essay for the Understanding of St. Paul's Epistles by consulting St. Paul himself. His expositions are clear, but are throughout strongly rationalist, and opposed to the atonement and to what is usually characterized as evangelistic.

His health had never been good, and latterly became worse. From 1691 he resided with Sir Francis and Lady Masham (daughter of Ralph Cudworth) at Oates. On Oct. 27, 1701, he told Lady Masham that he never expected to rise again from his bed. "He thanked God he had passed a happy life; but that now he found that all was vanity, and exhorted her to consider this world as a preparation for a better state hereafter." Next day he heard Lady Masham read the Psalm, apparently with great attention, until, perceiving his end to draw near, he stopped her, and expired a few minutes after, about three o'clock in the afternoon of Oct. 28, 1701, in his seventy-third year.

He tells us what was the occasion of the production of the Essay on Human Understanding. "Five or six friends meeting at my chamber, and discoursing on a subject very remote from this, found themselves quickly at a stand by the difficulties that rose on every side. After we had a while puzzled ourselves, without coming any nearer a resolution of those doubts which perplexed us, it came into my thoughts that we took a wrong course, and that, before we set ourselves upon inquiries of that nature, it was necessary to examine our own abilities, and see what objects our understandings were or were not fitted to deal with." He defines idea, "whatsoever is the object of the understanding when a man thinks," "whatever is meant by phantasm, notion, species." But surely external things may be the object of the understanding when it thinks; and yet they seem to be excluded by the definition, which lands him logically in idealism. He maintains that we get all our ideas from experience, through the two inlets, or windows, sensation and reflection.

The Essay is divided into four books. In the first he shows that we have no innate ideas, speculative (such as it is impossible for the same thing to be and not to be at the same time) or practical (moral) maxims; and that the ideas (such as that of God) often supposed to be innate are not so. I believe he is right in saying that there are not in the mind any innate mental images, or abstract or general notions, or a priori forms as is maintained by Kant; but he has not thereby shown that there are not in the mind native fundamental laws, such as that of cause and effect, which regulate our thinking.

In the second book he makes an elaborate attempt to show that all our ideas are derived from the materials supplied by sensation and reflection, always by the faculties which the mind possesses; viz., perception, retention, discernment, comparison, composition, abstraction, to which he adds volition. He divides the qualities of matter into primary and secondary; the former being those in all matter, in whatever state it be, and the latter resulting from the operation of the others.

He divides ideas into simple and complex. The former are perceived at once. Among these, the idea of space is given by sight and touch; of time, from the reflection on the succession of our ideas,—as if succession did not imply the idea of time. Complex ideas are divided into modes (such as gratitude), substances, and relations. He holds that substance exists as an unknown thing, standing under qualities. From his two sources he derives our idea of infinity, making it simply negative, and our very idea of moral good, deriving it from the sensation of pleasure and pain, with the law of God rewarding certain actions, and punishing others. It was in regard to this latter idea that the defects of his system were first seen by British thinkers.

In the third book he treats of the relation of words to ideas, and has very shrewd but often extreme remarks on the evil influence exercised by language on thought.

In the fourth book he treats of knowledge, which he defines as "the perception of the connection, and agreement or disagreement, and repugnancy, of any of our ideas; holding that the mind hath no other immediate objects in all its thoughts and reasonings but its own ideas." Knowledge is usually represented as consisting in the agreement of our ideas with things. Locke's definition keeps us away from things, and issues logically in idealism. In the same book he treats of such subjects as intuitions, faith, and reason. He believes in intuition, but confines it to judgment, or the comparison of ideas, thus still keeping us away from things. Under reason he examines and condemns the syllogism, which he regards as a new mode of reasoning, whereas it is merely an analysis of the process which passes through the mind in all valid reasoning.

The publication of the Essay was hailed with acclamation by the rising generation. Written in a clear, somewhat loose, and conversational style, characterized throughout by profound sense, free from all technicalities, and appealing, as the rising physical science of the day did, to observation, it was felt to be novel and fresh by all who were wearied of the scholastic distinctions of the middle ages and of the abstract metaphysical discussions of the seventeenth century. Locke's system continued to be the most influential philosophy in England, Ireland, France, and America, the whole of the last century and the first quarter of this, being modified, however, so far by the Scottish school.

His principles, however, were soon followed out to consequences which he would have repudiated. His essay was introduced into France by Voltaire, and was professedly carried out to its consequences by Condilliac, who reduced the original inlets of ideas to one, sensation; urging that Locke's reflection looked merely to the sensations, and could produce nothing new. For ages Locke was spoken of in France and Germany as a sensationalist. He is certainly not liable to this charge, as he everywhere insists on reflection as a source of ideas.

Bishop Berkeley drove his philosophy to a different issue. As Locke represented the mind as percipient only of ideas, we have no proof that any thing else exists. I believe this to be a consequence which might be drawn from his principles. But Locke was a determined realist. Reid and the Scottish school acted wisely in correcting his idealism, and in maintaining that we primarily know things, and not mere ideas.

The grand objection taken to Locke by our higher philosophers, is, that, by deriving all our ideas from experience, he has undermined the defences of truth. He is charged by Kant and his school with starting with principles which issued historically and logically in the scepticism of Hume. First, Berkeley proved, that, according to his philosophy, we have only ideas; and then Hume showed that these can be reduced to impressions and the faint copies of these in ideas. Locke's fundamental and most injurious error is the account which he gives of moral good and evil, which he represents as nothing but pleasure and pain drawn on us as a reward and punishment by the Lawgiver. He was met on this point by the third Lord Shaftesbury, the grandson of his friend and patron. His omissions on these points have been supplied in one way by the Scottish school, who bring in primary reason, common sense, and intuition, and in another by Kant, who calls in a priori principles in the shape of forms of sense, understanding, and reason.

Leibnitz wrote a review of Locke's essay, book by book, and chapter by chapter, in his Sur l'Entendement Humain, which, in consequence of Locke dying when he was writing it, was not published till 1761. Cousin also wrote a criticism in his Système de Locke. Professor Green has a sharply critical examination on Hegelian principles, in his Introduction to Hume's Treatise. LOCUST, an insect belonging to the order Orthoptera, the group Saltatoria, the family Acridites, and living, in several species, in Egypt, Arabia, Syria, Persia, and other Eastern countries. The common Syrian locust looks very much like the grasshopper. It is two inches and a half long, and grayish-green with black spots. These insects live in immense swarms, and are extremely voracious. Darkening the sky with their multitude, they suddenly sweep down on the country with a noise as of rain or hail; and in an extremely short time they completely denude it, eating up every flower and fruit, every grass and leaf. As always they move with the wind, they are often carried to the ocean, and drowned by the ton. In some regions they are gathered, and used for food, being prepared in various ways,—boiled with butter, preserved with salt, dried, and ground to a powder, etc.

The Bible has no less than ten different Hebrew names for locust, which are rendered by "locust," "grasshopper," "palmer-worm," "beetle," etc. It may be that some of those ten names designate various stages in the development of the locust; but it seems more probable that they simply designate various species. As the locusts actually form one of the greatest scourges of the East, they are very graphically described in the Bible. Their multitude,—Exod. x. 15; Judg. vi. 5; Jer. xlv. 23; Joel ii. 10; their voracity,—Joel i. 4, 7, 12; Ps. lxxviii. 46; Isa. xxxiii. 4; the noise of their flight,—Joel ii. 5; Rev. ix. 9. Their being used as food is also mentioned; Lev. xi. 22; Matt. iii. 4; Mark i. 6.

LODENSTEIN, Jodokus von, b. at Delft, in Holland, 1620; d. at Utrecht, 1677. He was appointed minister of Zoetner, in Holland, 1644, of Sluys, in Flanders, 1650, and at Utrecht in 1652; and he occupies in the church history of the Netherlands a position somewhat similar to that which Spener occupies in the church history of Germany: he was a reformer of practical life, not of doctrine. The Netherlands had at that time reached the culminating point of its prosperity, and the popular mind seemed to be entirely absorbed by secular pursuits. Lodenstein, however, made a deep and widespread impression, both by his preaching, by his writings (Verfallenes Christenthum, Reformationsspiegel, etc.), and by his beautiful spiritual songs. M. GOEBEL.

LOËN, Johann Michael von, b. at Francfort, Dec. 21, 1691; d. July 26, 1776. He studied law at Marburg and Halle; travelled in Holland, France, Switzerland, and Italy; and lived for many years as a private gentleman in his native city, until, in 1753, he accepted a position in the Prussian civil service as president of the county of Lingen and Teklenburg. The reconciliation of all the various denominations into which Christendom is split up, and the establishment of a united Christian Church, one and undivided, was the great idea of his life, in behalf of which he wrote, Evangelischer Friedenstempel, 1724; Höchst bedenkliche Ursachen, etc., 1727; Bedenken von Separatisten, 1737; Vereinigung der Protestanten, 1748. His principal work, Die einzige wahre Religion (1750), has the same tendency. It is a singular blending of rationalism and pietism, reducing Christianity to a religion among other religions, and its essential truth to that which it has in common with all religions. It made a great sensation, however, and was translated into foreign languages. WAGENMANN.

LOGAN, John, b. at Soutra, East Lothian, Scotland, 1748; d. in London, Dec. 28, 1788. He was educated at Edinburgh University, licensed in 1770, and ordained and installed in South Leith, 1773. He had already evinced considerable poetical talent by the publication of original poems in connection with those of Michael Bruce, whose poems he edited 1770. In 1775 he served on the committee of the general assembly to revise the Translations and Paraphrases, and adapt them for public worship. The collection is still in use. Eleven of the paraphrases are his. In 1781 he published a collected edition of his poems, and a tragedy (Runnemele) in 1783. In 1786 he resigned in consequence of his theatrical labors, and went to London, where he led a literary life. His View of Ancient History (1788), attributed to a Dr. Rutherford, and two volumes of his Sermons (1790-91), which are much admired, were posthumously published. A complete edition of his poems, and a memoir, appeared in 1812. His most famous poem was Ode to the Cuckoo.

LOGOS (from the Greek λόγος, which means "reason" and "word," ratio and oratio; both being intimately connected) has a peculiar significance in Philo, St. John, and the early Greek Fathers, and is an important term in the history of Christology.

I. THE DOCTRINE OF PHILO.—Philo, a Jewish philosopher of Alexandria (d. about A.D. 40), who endeavored to harmonize the Mosaic religion with Platonism, derived his Logos view from the Solomonic and later Jewish doctrine of the personified Wisdom and Word of God, and combined it with the Platonic idea of Nous. The Logos is to him the embodiment of all divine powers and ideas.—the ἀγγελοι of the Old Testament, the δυναμεις and ιδεαι of Plato. He distinguished between the Logos inherent in God (λόγος ἐνδιάπυτος), corresponding to reason in man, and the Logos emanating from God (λόγος προφορικός), corresponding to the spoken word which reveals the thought. The former contains the ideal world (the κόσμος νοητός): the latter is the first-begotten Son of God, the image of God, the Creator and Preserver, the Giver of light and life, the Mediator between God and the world, also the Messiah (though only in an ideal sense, as a theophany, not as a concrete historical person). Philo wavers between a personal and an impersonal conception of the Logos, but leans more to the impersonal conception. He has no room for an incarnation of the Logos and his real union with humanity. Nevertheless, his view has a striking resemblance to the Logos doctrine of John, and preceded it, as a shadow precedes the substance. It was a prophetic dream of the coming reality. It prepared the minds of many for the reception of the truth, but misled others into Gnostic errors.

II. THE DOCTRINE OF ST. JOHN.—John uses Logos (translated "word") six times as a designation of the divine pre-existent person of Christ, through whom the world was made, and who became incarnate for our salvation, John i. 1, 14; 1 John i. 1 (v. 7 is spurious); Rev. xix. 13; but he never puts it into the mouth of Christ. Philo may possibly have suggested the use of the term (although there is no evidence of John's having read a single line of Philo); but the idea was derived from the teaching of Christ and from the Old Testament, which makes a distinction between the hidden and the revealed being of God, which personifies the wisdom of God and the word of God, and ascribes the creation of the world to the same (Ps. xxxiii. 6, Sept.). There is an inherent propriety of this usage in the Greek language, where Logos is masculine, and has the double meaning of thought and speech. Christ as to his divine nature bears the same relation to God as the word does to the idea. The word gives form and shape to the idea, and reveals it to others. The word is thought expressed (λόγος προφορικῶς): thought is the inward word (λόγος ἐνδιάθετος). We cannot speak without the faculty of reason, nor think without words, whether uttered or not. Compare the Hebrew expression "I speak in my heart" for "I think." The Christ-Logos is the Revealer and Interpreter of the hidden being of God, the utterance, the reflection, the visible image, of God, and the organ of all his manifestations to the world (John i. 18; comp. Matt. xi. 27). The Logos was one in essence or nature with God (θεὸς ἦν, John i. 1), yet personally distinct from him, and in closest communion with him (πρὸς τὸν θεόν, John i. 1, 18). In the fulness of time he assumed human nature, and wrought out in it the salvation of the race which was created through him (John i. 14). The incarnation of the eternal, divine Logos is the central idea of the theology of John, who was for this reason emphatically called "the theologian;" and the confession or denial of this truth is to him the criterion of genuine Christianity or Antichrist (comp. 1 John iv. 2, 3).

III. THE PATRISTIC DOCTRINE. — The Johannean Logos doctrine was the fruitful germ of most of the patristic and Gnostic speculations on the divine nature of Christ. Justin Martyr (d. 166) started the patristic development which culminated in the homoousion of the Nicene Creed. He, first among the Fathers, used the term "Logos" as applied to the prehistoric Christ in the double sense of divine reason and creative word. Christ is to him the primitive reason or wisdom of divine essence, yet distinct from the Father, begotten of the will of the Father before all creatures, the first-begotten and only-begotten of God (πρωτοτοκος θεου, ὁ μονογενής, ὁ μόνος υἱός, ὁ λόγος πρὸ των ποιημάτων και συνων και γεννώμενος). Through him the world was made. He is the organ of all revelations in history which are not confined to the Jewish people. He scattered seeds of truth and virtue among the nobler heathen (λόγος σπέρματικός). All that is true and beautiful in Socrates, Plato, Homer, must be traced to the activity of the Logos before his incarnation (the λόγος ἄσαρκος). This Logos was incarnate in Jesus of Nazareth, was born, baptized, suffered, died, and rose for us men and our salvation. There is no doubt that Justin Martyr considered Jesus Christ as a single person, in whom the pre-existent divine Logos and humanity were blended in the unity of life. Tatian and Theophilus of Antioch teach essentially the same Logos theory, but Tatian with a leaning to Gnosticism, which separated the ideal Christ from the historical. Athenagoras very clearly ascribes to the Logos the creation of all things, and likewise takes the word in the double sense of the immanent reason of God and the creative word of God. Irenaeus of Lyons (d. 202), the profoundest and soundest among the ante-Nicene Fathers, views the Son of God as the essential, hypostatic Word, eternally spoken or begotten by the Father, uncreated, the Creator of the world, the Interpreter of God. As regards the essential unity of the Son and Father, the human nature of Christ, and its relation to the divine nature, he comes nearest to the Nicene standard of orthodoxy. The Alexandrian school was alike affected by Johannean, Philonic, and Platonic ideas. Clement of Alexandria views the Son as the Logos of the Father, the eternal Intelligence and Wisdom, the Fountain of all truth and knowledge, the Revealer of the Divine Being, the Creator of the world, the Educator of men. He removes all idea of subordination, and hence dislikes the term λόγος προφορικῶς, as he regards the Logos as the creative and speaking, not the spoken, Word. Origen (d. 252) emphasizes on the one hand the eternity (eternal generation) of the Logos, and on the other his subordination to the Father; so that he gave aid and comfort both to the orthodox and the Arian schools in the Nicene age, and was quoted by both. He even applies the term ἡμοούσιος to the Son, declaring him equal in substance with the Father; but, on the other hand, he speaks of a difference of essence (ἐτερότης τῆς οὐσίας, or τοῦ ὑποκειμένου), and calls the Logos "a second God" (δευτερος θεός), and "God" (θεός without the article); while the Father is "the God (ὁ θεός) and "God himself" (αὐτόθεος). In the Nicene age, through the influence chiefly of the great Athanasius, Basil, and the two Gregories (of Nazianzus and of Nyssa), the development of the Logos-doctrine ended in the triumph of the homoousian or Nicene view of the essential unity and personal distinction of the Son and the Father. Gregory of Nazianzus was called "the theologian" in the narrowest sense of that word, as the defender of the divinity of the Logos (ὁ λόγος = θεός, John i. 1), on account of the famous sermons which he preached in the Church of the Resurrection at Constantinople. (Comp. CHRISTOLOGY.)

LÖHE, Johann Konrad Wilhelm, one of the most remarkable of the workers in the department of practical Christianity in our century; was b. Feb. 21, 1808, in Fürth, near Nürnberg; d. Jan. 2, 1872, in Neudettelsau.¹ He studied at the University of Erlangen, where he was much influenced by the pious professor, Kraftt, and spent a term in Berlin. In 1831 he became vicar at Kirchenlamitz, and attracted large congregations from the surrounding country by his original and fervent preaching. The ecclesiastical authorities, regarding his fervor as religious mysticism, removed him from his position. Shortly afterwards he was appointed assistant pastor of St. Egidia in Nürnberg. Here he had a brilliant career as preacher, and, like a prophet of old, denounced sin without fear. In 1837 he was made pastor in Neuendettelsau, an inconsiderable and unattractive place. Löhe, however, learned to admire it, and transformed the town into a busy Christian colony,—a city set on a hill, the rays of whose Christian and philanthropic fervor have gone out over two hemispheres. At this period his mind was much concerned about his relations with the Bavarian Church, which he felt did not understand, much less care for, the religious wants of the people. He thought seriously of separating himself from its communion; but other counsels prevailed, and he became a strict Lutheran. His Drei Bücher von der Kirche ("Three Books on the Church"), which were published in 1845, represent the severest Lutheran orthodoxy.

Löhe was a philanthropist of remarkably fertile and creative talent. His special work he began about the year 1840, by interesting himself in the condition of the Germans in the United States. He helped to found the Missouri synod, and afterwards organized the Iowa synod on a different basis. He erected in Neuendettelsau two spacious buildings for the training of missionaries for the Germans in foreign lands. In 1849 he founded the Lutheran Society of Home Missions, and in 1853 an institution of deaconesses, which was the eighteenth in point of date, but has the third position in regard to numbers, in Germany. The following year the building for the deaconesses was dedicated. Around this centre there grew up with wonderful rapidity a number of institutions, such as an asylum for idiots, a Magdalen asylum, hospitals for men and women, etc. These institutions are all accomplishing a good work. Löhe represented a most genial type of piety. Sin and grace, justification and sanctification, were the central points of his theology. As a preacher, he was among the greatest of the century. Originality of conception, vivid imagination, and prophetic fervor, were his chief characteristics in the pulpit; to which he added in his later years a profound knowledge of, and a rare fertility in, the application of Scripture. Perhaps his best collections of sermons are Sieben Predigten (1836), Predigten ü. d. Vaterunser (1837), Sieben Vorträge ü. d. Worte Jesu am Kreuze (1859, 2d edition, 1868). Löhe was a man of striking appearance. His head was large, his forehead high; his mouth made the impression of great decision of character; his voice was powerful, and his eye bright and searching. He was a diligent author, and wrote some liturgical and other works, one of which, Samenkörner, has seen twenty-nine editions. See Wilhelm Löhe's Leben, Gütersloh, 1873 sqq., by DEINZER (the inspector of the missionary institution in Neuendettelsau), in three volumes.

ADOLF STÄHLIN.

LOLLARDS, a title applied to the followers of Wiclif in England, though the term was previously used of sectaries in Germany. Hoese of Liege (1318) speaks of "quidam hypocritagyrovagi qui Lollardi sive Deum laudantes vocabantur." His derivation, which would connect the word with the root which we have in lullaby, and makes the term equivalent to cantors, is probably correct. Wiclif during his lifetime sent out itinerant preachers, who met with considerable acceptance among the people. The chief centre of Wiclif's teaching was the University of Oxford; and, after the condemnation of Wiclif's doctrine of the sacraments in 1382, Archbishop Courtenay proceeded to silence the Wiclifite teachers in the university. A strong academical party resisted the archbishop's interference, but the crown supported the archbishop. The chancellor of the university was forced to submit to the publication by the archbishop's commissary of the condemnation of Wiclif's doctrines. The chief Lollard teachers—LAWRENCE BEDEMAN, PHILIP REPINGTON, and JOHN ASTON—were driven to recant. The more famous NICOLAS HEREFORD, who worked with Wiclif in the translation of the Bible, made his escape from England. Archbishop Courtenay in the space of five months reduced to silence the Lollard party in Oxford, and secured the orthodoxy of the university.

This result was largely due to the re-action against novelties which was produced by the Peasants' Rising, under Wat Tyler, in 1381. Wiclif's political opinions were expressed somewhat crudely, and lent themselves to a socialistic interpretation, though Wiclif himself had no such views. Moreover, John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, patronized Wiclif through political antagonism to William of Wykeham, Bishop of Winchester, and other prelates who acted as ministers of Edward III. Hence the Lollard movement wore at the beginning a political aspect, which it never lost, and which weakened its religious significance. After Wiclif's death, HEREFORD resumed his office as itinerant preacher, and was assisted by ASTON and JOHN PURVEY. The party of the Lollards grew in numbers and in boldness. In 1387 one Peter Pateshull, an Augustinian monk, abandoned his order, joined the Lollards, and openly preached in London against monasticism.

Still the Lollard party owed much of its strength to powerful courtiers who were willing to use it as a means of striking at the political power of the prelates; and during the absence of Richard II. in Ireland, in 1394, a petition of the Lollards, attacking the Church, was presented to Parliament. This document must be regarded as the exposition of their opinions (cf. Fasciculi Zizaniorum, 360-369). Its twelve articles set forth that the Church of England, following its stepmother, the Church of Rome, was eaten up by temporal pride; that its clergy had deviated from the example of Christ and the apostles; that the celibacy of the clergy occasioned moral disorder, and that the belief in transubstantiation caused idolatry. It protested against exorcisms and benedictions of lifeless objects, against the holding of secular office by priests, against special prayers for the dead, pilgrimages, auricular confession, and vows of chastity. To these points concerning ecclesiastical polity were added a protest against war as contrary to the gospel, and against unnecessary trades which were exercised only for the satisfaction of luxury. There is in these proposals a crude scheme for the reform of Church and State; but no definite basis is laid down, and the points insisted on are arbitrarily chosen. Richard II. considered the petition as dangerous: he returned from Ireland, and exacted from the chief men of the Lollard party an oath of abjuration of their opinions. Again there was no basis of belief strong enough to resist, and the movement collapsed as suddenly as it began.

This was the highest point of Lollardism in England; and its influence is seen in such literary productions as The Plowman's Tale, and Pierce the Plowman's Crede, both of which were written about this time. It was, however, only natural that the ecclesiastical authorities, who had been so openly menaced by the petition to Parliament, should think of retaliation and repression. Thomas Arundel, who succeeded Courtenay as archbishop of Canterbury in 1396, showed himself a decided opponent of the Lollards. In 1397 he laid before a provincial synod eighteen articles taken out of the writings of Wiclif, and they were all formally condemned. The condemnation of the council was further supported from a literary side by a polemical tractate (Contra errores Wicleji in Triologio) from the pen of a learned Franciscan, William Woodford. But the political troubles of the end of the reign of Richard II. threw religious controversy into the background. In 1398 Archbishop Arundel had to flee from England; and when he returned it was as the chief adviser of Henry of Lancaster, who came to the throne under many obligations to Arundel and to the Church.

Accordingly the convocation of 1399 petitioned Henry IV. to proceed against the Lollards. Archbishop Arundel had not much difficulty in raising feeling against them. The popular hatred of Richard II.'s rule was still strong, and the chief favorers of the Lollards had been amongst Richard's courtiers. Henry IV. was fervently orthodox, and was bound by many ties to the clerical party: he probably was not sorry to dissociate himself from his father's intrigues with the Lollard party. The convocation of 1401 framed a strong petition against the Lollards. It pointed out that the episcopal jurisdiction was powerless to suppress the itinerant preachers, unless supported by the royal power. It besought the royal assistance against all who preached, held meetings, taught schools, or, without episcopal license, disseminated books contrary to the doctrines of the Church. The petition was granted by the king with the assent of the lords, and a short petition of the Commons declared also their assent. A clause ("de heretico comburendo") was inserted in the statute for the year: it empowered the bishops to arrest any unlicensed preacher or heretic, and imprison him for three months, during which time proceedings were to be taken against him. If he were convicted, he might be imprisoned further, or fined for his offence; if he refused to abjure, he was to be given over to the sheriff to be burned.

Thus the punishment of death for matters of opinion was for the first time introduced into the laws of England. But, while this statute was being passed, WILLIAM SAUTRE, a priest of the city of London, who had previously abjured Lollardy, but relapsed, was brought to trial before convocation, and was condemned. As the statute was not yet law, Sautre was put to death under the king's writ, which was issued on Feb. 26, 1401. Sautre was the first Lollard martyr. John Purvey was brought to trial about the same time; but he recanted, and read a public confession of his errors at St. Paul's Cross.

Public opinion had now turned against the Lollards, and the bishops proceeded with their inquisitions against them. But little results followed; and the growing discontent against Henry IV. gave the Lollards again a political color, and brought their social opinions into greater prominence. In the Parliament of 1406 a petition was presented by the Commons, and was supported by the Prince of Wales. It set forth that the Lollards were threatening the foundations of society by attacking the rights of property, while they stirred up political discontent by spreading stories that Richard II. was still alive: it asked that all officers possessing jurisdiction should arrest Lollards, and present them to Parliament for punishment. The king assented; but, for some unknown reason, the petition never became a statute, probably owing to the jealousy existing between spiritual and secular courts. The bishops do not seem to have exercised their statutory powers with harshness. WILLIAM THORPE was arrested by Archbishop Arundel in 1407, and was several times examined by him; but we do not find that he was condemned to death. Thorpe wrote accounts of his examinations; which were collected by his friends, and form an interesting record of this phase of English ecclesiastical history (printed in Foxe's Acts and Monuments).

In 1409 Archbishop Arundel issued a series of constitutions against the Lollards, with the object of enforcing in detail the provisions of the statute of 1401: still the Lollards seem to have had some influence. In the Parliament of 1410 a petition was presented by the Commons, which, however, they afterwards asked to withdraw, praying for a modification of the statute of 1401, and asking that persons arrested under it should be admitted to bail. In the same Parliament the Lollard party submitted a wild proposal for the confiscation of the lands of bishops and ecclesiastical corporations, and the endowment out of them of new earls, knights, esquires, and hospitals. Whenever the Lollards had an opportunity of raising their voice publicly, they gave their enemies a handle against them by the extravagance of their political proposals.

During the session of this Parliament the first execution of a Lollard, under the statute of 1401, took place. JOHN BABBY, a tailor of Evesham, was examined by the Bishop of Worcester for erroneous doctrine concerning the Eucharist. He was brought to London, and was further examined by the archbishop and several suffragans. In spite of all their persuasions, he remained firm in his statement that the bread and wine of the sacrament of the altar remained bread and wine after consecration, though they became a sign of the living God. On March 5, 1410, he was condemned as a heretic, and was led to Smithfield for execution. The Prince of Wales, who was present, tried at the last moment to induce Badby to recant: his efforts were in vain. But it would seem that this first execution under the act was regarded with regret even by those who thought it absolutely necessary.

Meanwhile the triumph of orthodoxy in the University of Oxford was complete. Its theologians exercised their ingenuity by a close examination of Wiclif's writings; and in 1412 no fewer than two hundred and sixty-seven conclusions drawn from his works were condemned as erroneous. This condemnation was important; as it provided materials ready to hand for the theologians of the Council of Constance, who struck at Wiclif as the first step towards striking at Hus.

On the accession of Henry V. (1413), Archbishop Arundel was relieved of his office of chancellor, and had more time to proceed against the Lollards. Before the convocation of 1413 he laid a proposal to root out Lollardy from high places, and it was resolved that measures be taken to reduce to obedience the chief favorers of heresy. As the first victim of this new policy, a Herefordshire knight, Sir JOHN OLDCASTLE, was selected. Oldcastle had considerable possessions, which he increased by marriage with the heiress of the barony of Cobham, who held large lands in Kent. After his marriage, Oldcastle was summoned to the House of Lords as Lord Cobham. Oldcastle was an earnest Lollard. He sheltered itinerant preachers, attended their services, and openly spoke against some of the church ritual. In 1410 his chaplain was suspended by Arundel for irregularities in the conduct of church services. Oldcastle was formally presented by convocation to the king as a heretic; and Henry V. first tried by personal solicitations to win back Oldcastle to orthodoxy. When this failed, he was summoned to appear before the archbishop. He refused to do so, and fortified his castle of Cowling. After disobeying a second citation, he was taken prisoner, and brought before the archbishop on Sept. 23, 1413. He read a confession of faith, with much of which the archbishop expressed himself well pleased; but he pressed Oldcastle for his opinions on transubstantiation and auricular confession. When Oldcastle declined to be explicit, he was given two days during which he might consider the orthodox opinions, which were given him in writing. In his second audience he refused to sign these declarations, and openly avowed Lollard opinions. He was condemned as a heretic, but was allowed a respite of forty days in hopes of a recantation. During this period he made his escape from the Tower, and thereby caused a panic. It was believed that a hundred thousand Lollards were ready for a rising; and a scheme seems to have been set on foot to seize the king at Eltham during the festivities of Christmas, 1413. Henry V. returned to London, and obtaining information of a nocturnal meeting of conspirators, which was to be held on Jan. 12, 1414, resolved to put them down at once. Closing the city gates to prevent the presence of the Londoners, he went to the ground, made many prisoners in the darkness, and crushed the conspiracy at once. Some thirty-seven of the prisoners were afterwards executed on the charge of heresy. Oldcastle himself escaped, and was declared an outlaw. He is said to have tried to raise a rebellion in 1415, and his machinations certainly embarrassed Henry V. in his French campaigns. At last, in 1417, Oldcastle was captured on the Welsh marches, was brought to London, tried for treason before Parliament, and condemned to death as a traitor. The history of Oldcastle is somewhat obscure, and his character is the source of much controversy. He seems to have been a man of genuine piety, but without much discretion. His fate is typical of that of the Lollard party. Beginning from high enthusiasm and lofty moral aims, they went astray in the by-paths of political intrigues till the religious significance of the movement is lost in its tendencies towards anarchy. Instead of continuing to struggle for ecclesiastical reform, Lollardy became an expression of the passing phases of political discontent.

The attempt at revolution in which Oldcastle was involved decided Henry V. to take stronger measures against the Lollards. In the Parliament of 1411 an act was passed which went far beyond that of 1401; for it laid down the principle, that heresy was an offence against the common law, as well as an offence against the canon law. Besides re-enacting with greater severity the provisions of the statute of 1401, it ordered all justices to inquire after heretics, and hand them over for trial to the spiritual courts. This was the final statute against the Lollards, and under it the religious persecutions of the next century were carried out. From this time forward, we find the Lollards deprived of any influential leaders. The French war of Henry V. provided occupation for the classes who were willing to use the help of the Lollards in attacking the prelates, and the universities were peaceful. The Lollards could no longer claim to be a party within the English Church: they had become a sect outside it.

The teaching of Wiclif, meanwhile, had taken deeper root in Bohemia than in England; and the sturdiness of the party that gathered round Hus contrasts markedly with the indecision of the English Lollards. From Oxford went Lollards to Bohemia; some bearing a letter which purported to be a defence of Wiclif, signed by the chancellor and an assembly of masters. There can be little doubt that the letter was a forgery. Most famous amongst these Hussite-Lollards was PETER PAYNE, who also bore many other names. He was the son of a French father, had some reputation in Oxford, and rose to eminence amongst the Bohemians. He was one of the disputants on the Hussite side at the Council of Basel in 1433, and his polemical cleverness often degenerated into sophistry. He died in Prague in 1455.

The statute of 1414 seems to have answered its purpose of checking the open dissemination of Lollard doctrines. The itinerant priests no longer preached openly; though conventicles were sometimes held secretly, and Lollard books were circulated. Persecutions were frequent, but executions were rare. Besides the thirty-eight who were put to death after Oldcastle's rising in 1414, we only know the names of twenty-eight others who suffered death. The great majority of the accused made a recantation, and submitted to penance. In 1427 Pope Martin V. ordered the Bishop of Lincoln to carry out the decree of the Council of Constance against Wiclif's remains as those of a condemned heretic. They were accordingly dug out of the churchyard at Lutterworth, and thrown into the Avon. In 1431 an attempted rebellion of the political Lollards was made under a leader called JACK SHARP, who revived the petition of 1410 for the confiscation of the temporalities of the Church. Sharp was captured, and put to death at Oxford. This was the last attempt to enforce the Lollard principles in politics, and the disturbed state of England in the dynastic struggle between the rival houses of York and Lancaster diverted political discontent to other objects. After 1431 we hear less of the Lollards, and the prosecutions against them became rarer.

It is not very easy to determine with precision what were the religious tenets of the Lollards. The results of their examinations before the bishops show us a number of men discontented with the existing ecclesiastical system, but the points to which each attaches importance tend to differ in individual cases. We find, however, in all of them, a reverence for the Bible as superior to the traditions of the Church and all other authorities. They object to many points in the ritual or practice of the Church as unnecessary or misleading; they deny transubstantiation, protest against the worship of saints, pilgrimages, and other usages; they object to the temporal lordship of the clergy, to the monastic orders, and to the supreme authority of the Pope. Some of them wish to approximate as closely as possible to the church doctrine, laying aside only superfluities: others dream of a plan of reconstituting Church and State alike on a scriptural basis.

The chief polemical writer against the Lollards was THOMAS NETTER OF WALDEN, a learned divine of the University of Oxford, who was confessor of Henry V., and died in 1430. His chief work (Doctrinale antiquitatum fidei ecclesie Catholice) is a storehouse of polemical learning, which was largely used in the next century by Romish writers against the Lutherans. Another controversialist against the Lollards was somewhat unfortunate in his zeal. REGINALD PEOCK, Bishop of Chichester, distinguished himself in 1417 by a sermon preached at St. Paul's Cross, in which he maintained that the duty of bishops was to rule their sees, to acquaint themselves with the more abstruse parts of theology, and to undertake public business: they were not bound to preach, or themselves discharge spiritual functions. This defence of episcopacy was somewhat too sophistical for the ordinary understanding, and Peock had to soften it by explanations. But a few years later he published a work against the Lollards, called The Repressor of over much Blaming of the Clergy. In it he attacked the Lollards for their exclusive attention to the Scriptures, but he did so in a way that created alarm by its rationalistic spirit. He set up "the doom of reason" as supreme; he criticised the Fathers, besides quoting them; he doubted the apostolic origin of the Apostles' Creed, and questioned the article of Christ's descent into hell. Many accused him of setting the law of nature above the law of Scripture, and probably political motives contributed to his overthrow. In 1457 Peock was degraded from his office, his books were burned, and he retired to a monastery, where he ended his days. He is an example that repressive measures tend to spread on all sides. The re-action against the Lollards created a new standard of orthodoxy, and Peock is the first man in English history who was persecuted by the clergy for free thought.

The activity of the Lollards during the succeeding period can only be slightly traced in isolated cases of protest against the system of the Church. Conventicles of "Bible men" were still held in secret, the Wiclifite translation of the Scriptures was still read by some, and Wiclif's works were circulated. There were still persecutions, and from time to time a victim displayed by his death a testimony of England's orthodoxy. The spirit of Lollardy survived, to some extent, amongst the people; and the spark was readily kindled by the flame of Luther's rising against the Pope. Yet the absence of any definite system amongst the Lollards is clearly seen by the fact that the reformed doctrines took their shape, even in England, from Luther and Calvin, and that there was no recurrence to Wiclif or his followers for a basis of belief. Even the translation of the Scriptures was begun anew; and the version of Tyndale (1526), not that of Wiclif, was the foundation of the English Bible.

Thompson, London, 1874), KNIGHTON (De eventibus Anglie, in Twysden's Historie Anglicane Scriptores Decem, London, 1652). Still more important is the collection of documents concerning the Lollards entitled Fasciculi Zizaniorum Magistri Johannis Wyclif cum Trites, ascribed to THOMAS NETTER OF WALDEN, ed. Shirley, London, 1858. The documents relating to ecclesiastical action against the Lollards are to be found in WILKINS: Concilia Magnae Britanniae, vol. 3, London, 1737. The parliamentary proceedings are given in Rotuli Parliamentorum, vols. 3 and 4, London, 1808-34. Accounts of the Lollard martyrs are given by FOXE: Acts and Monuments of the Christian Martyrs, best edited by Cattle and Townsend, London, 1811, revised, 1813-49, 8 vols. Other interesting information is to be found in GASCOIGNE: Liber Veritatum, written from 1433 to 1457, a vast theological encyclopaedia, of which extracts have been published under the title of Loci e Libro Veritatum, ed. Rogers, Oxford, 1881. Of literature illustrating the opinions of the Lollards may be mentioned The Complaint of the Plowman in WRIGHT, Political Poems and Songs relating to English History (vol. i., London, 1859), also Pierce the Plowman's Crede (first printed, London, 1533, edited by Skeat, London, 1868). Polemical writings against the Lollards are WOODFORD: Contra Johannem Wiclefium Decertationes, in Brown's Fasciculus Rerum expetendarum et fugiendarum, i., 191, London, 1690; NETTER: Doctrinale Antiquitatum Fidei ecclesie Catholicae, 3 vols., Venice, 1571 and 1757; PEOCK: Repressor of overmuch Blaming of the Clergy, ed. Babington, London, 1860, 2 vols. In modern times the Lollards have not been specially treated by any writer, though they occupy a place in all political or ecclesiastical histories of England and in works on Wiclif. The fullest account from the ecclesiastical side is to be found in LECHLER: Johann von Wiclif und die Vorgesichte der Reformation, 2 Bde., Leipzig, 1873. The first volume has been translated with additional notes by LORIMER: John Wiclif and his English Precursors, London, 1878, 2 vols., new edition, 1882, 1 vol. The fullest account from the political side is given by STUBBS: The Constitutional History of England, vols. 2 and 3, Oxford, 1875-80.

M. CREIGHTON

(Chathill, Northumberland, Eng.).

LOMBARDS (Lombardi, or Langobardi, "the long-bearded"), THE, a Teutonic tribe, seem to have come from the northern part of Jutland, and were settled on the left shore of the Lower Elb, when, in 5 A.D., they were attacked by the Romans. They were reputed brave, but the tribe was small. Towards the close of the fourth century they moved through Upper Silesia, Bohemia, and Moravia; and towards the close of the fifth century they were settled on the left bank of the Danube, from the mouth of the Em to Vienna. In 526 they crossed the Danube, and penetrated into Pannonia; and in 568 they entered Italy. The conquest of the country took many years, and was carried out in a most cruel and merciless manner. It was never completed, however. The regions around Rome and Naples, Sicily and the southern part of the peninsula, the Venetian islands, and the coast from the mouth of the Po to Ancona, remained in the possession of the Byzantines. The advance was repeatedly checked by the intrigues of the Pope, whose policy during that period it was to keep Italy weak and divided in order to increase his own power. The Lombard Empire was finally destroyed by Charlemagne in 774, and all its dominions incorporated with the Frankish Empire.

When the Lombards entered Italy, they were, to some extent, Pagans. The Christians among them were Arians. It seems, however, that the Catholic Church did not suffer any thing from them; and very soon her successful exertions for their conversion began. Theodolinde, a Bavarian princess, — married first to King Autharis, and then to King Agilulf, — belonged to the Catholic Church, and maintained an intimate friendship with Gregory the Great. She built the magnificent basilica at Monza, and dedicated it to St. John the Baptist, who afterwards became the patron saint of the Lombards. In 612, still in the reign of Agilulf, the monastery of Bobbio was founded in the Cottian Alps by Columbanus, and munificently endowed by the king and his son Adoloald. Under Gundeberge, the daughter of Theodolinde, and, like her, married successively to two Lombard kings, — Ariowald, who died in 636; and Rothari, who died in 652, — all traces of Paganism and Arianism disappeared from among the people; and the Lombards now showed themselves as energetic in their religious faith as formerly in their warlike enthusiasm. In the eighth century numerous churches and monasteries were built, and all ecclesiastical institutions were magnificently provided for.

Meanwhile the political relations between the Lombard kings and the Roman popes became more and more strained. Gregory III. (731-741) addressed himself to Charles Martell, major domus at the Merovingian Court, and asked for aid against Liutprand; but at that moment the relations between the Franks and the Lombards were very friendly. Stephen III. (753-757) went in person to Gaul, anointed Pepin, and his sons Charles and Carloman, kings of the Franks; and in 754 and 755 Pepin made two campaigns in Italy, and compelled Aistulf to surrender his conquests. Under Desiderius an alliance was formed between the Franks and the Lombards, which seemed likely to prove fatal to the plans of the Pope. But when Charlemagne repudiated the daughter of Desiderius, and the latter gave support to Carloman's widow and children, the alliance turned into a bitter feud; and in 773 Adrian I. found a willing ear when he asked Charlemagne for aid. LOMBARDUS, Petrus, called Magister Sententiarum ("Master of Sentences"), from being the author of the Books of Sentences, was b. in the early part of the twelfth century, in Novara, Lombardy; d. in Paris, July 20, 1160. He was of obscure birth. After studying at Bologna, he went to Rheims, where he continued his studies, his maintenance being provided for by Bernard of Clairvaux. From there he went to Paris, with letters from Bernard to the convent of St. Victor. He became a distinguished teacher, and most probably a canon of St. Victor. In 1159 he was elevated to the see of Paris, which he lived to administer only a single year. Of the facts of his life nothing further is known. An incident is told to illustrate his humility, to the effect, that, on the day of his consecration as bishop, his mother was induced by some noblemen to appear, against her wishes, in finer attire than she was accustomed to wear at Novara; but her son refused to recognize her till she had exchanged it for her usual rustic dress.

Peter's fame rests upon his literary works, and more particularly upon his Four Books of Sentences (Libri quatuor sententiarum). In this work he places himself in sympathy with the ruling tendencies of the time. — the ecclesiastical and positive, and the speculative. The former was concerned with the teachings of the Church and the Fathers: the latter — represented by Anselm, Abelard, and others — sought to justify the doctrines of the Church by subtle processes of reasoning, and refinement of argument. Peter wished to represent both tendencies, — to make known the teachings of the Fathers, and to establish their truth against error. He presents a contrast to Abelard, who, in his work Sic et non, placed side by side contradictory statements of the Fathers, not with the purpose of reconciling them, as did Peter, nor of confirming the authority of the Fathers, which was one of the principal objects of Peter's work. Peter's main authority is Augustine. He differs from Abelard, likewise, in seeking to arrange his matter systematically. His was not the first collection of sentences. Hugo of St. Victor (d. 1135), Robert Pulleyn (d. 1150), and others had preceded him in this department. Nor can his work be regarded as the most valuable of its kind.

The first book of the Sentences treats (in forty-eight distinctiones, or chapters) of God. The author's definition of the Trinity exposed him to the charge of heresy. Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202) declares he had taught a quaternity. The matter was brought before the Lateran Council of 1215; and Lombard was acquitted, it being shown that he had simply distinguished between the divine essence and the three persons, but had in nowise constituted a fourth person in the Godhead. The second book discusses (in forty-four chapters) created things. Of man's original state (dist. 24), Peter teaches that the gift of eternal life was a superadded gift; and that, by the apostasy, man not only lost this, but suffered an injury (not a deprivation) of his good gifts received at creation (naturalia bona). In the third book (forty chapters) the author discusses the incarnation, redemption, and the virtues of human character. In the doctrine of the work of Christ he contents himself with presenting the different views, but shows a leaning to the theory of Abelard, according to which we are made free from sin by the love to God which the manifestation of God's love in the death of Christ excites. In the fourth book (fifty chapters) he takes up eschatological subjects and the sacraments, declaring for seven as the proper number.

The Books of Sentences of Petrus Lombardus belongs to that class of useful writings whose continued circulation depends not so much upon their absolute merit as upon their adaptation to give information in an accessible form, which the reader otherwise would be obliged to search for with much pains. It contains no profound original thoughts, and many difficult problems are suggested which the author does not solve. A comparison, however, of the Sentences with the works of his successors, as well as predecessors, reveals the fact that Peter is more moderate in his scholastic casuistry than they. The work did not at first meet with a universally favorable reception. Parts were attacked as heretical; and in 1300 the professors of theology at Paris announced sixteen articles derived from it which contained error. Notwithstanding this opposition, the work was used for many years as a text-book at the universities, and was extensively commented upon. Commentaries continued to be written upon it after the Reformation, especially in Spain. The most celebrated is by Dominicus Soto (d. 1560); the most scholarly, by the Dutch theologian Estius (d. 1613), the distinguished commentator of the Pauline Epistles.

Two other works have been published under the Lombard's name, and are regarded as genuine, — a Commentary on the Psalms (first printed at Paris in 1533, and most recently in Migne), and Commentaries upon All the Pauline Epistles, first printed in Paris, 1535, and by Migne, 1851.

LIT. — The editions of the Sentences are exceedingly numerous: the oldest appeared at Nürnberg, 1174; an improved text, under the editorship of ALEAUME, Loewen, 1516, of which Migne's edition is a reprint. LONGFELLOW, Henry Wadsworth, the poet, b. at Portland, Me., Feb. 27, 1807; d. at Cambridge, Mass., March 24, 1882. After graduating at Bowdoin College in 1825, he became a law-student in the office of his father, an eminent jurist, but soon gave up law for letters. In 1826 he went abroad, and spent three years in France, Spain, Italy, and Germany, preparing himself for the chair of modern languages at Bowdoin. From Bowdoin he was called in 1835 to succeed George Ticknor as professor of modern languages and literature at Harvard University. After another year passed in study and travel abroad, he entered upon his duties at Cambridge. From this time his career was as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day. Voices of the Night (1839), especially the Psalms of Life, may be said to have struck the keynote of his poetical fame, and at once made him known wherever the English tongue was spoken. Hyperion, a prose romance, appeared in the same year. Among his principal works that followed are Balloads and other Poems, and Poems on Slavery (1842), The Spanish Student (1843), Evangeline, a Tale of Acadie (1847), The Seaside and the Fireside (1850), The Golden Legend (1851), The Song of Hiawatha (1855), The Courtship of Miles Standish (1858), Tales of a Wayside Inn (1863), a translation of The Divine Comedy, and New-England Tragedies (1869), The Divine Tragedy (1871), The Hanging of the Crane (1874), and Moriturus Salutamus, a very touching poem read at the fiftieth anniversary of his college class. Not long after settling at Cambridge, he purchased the Craigie house, celebrated as the headquarters of Washington; and here he continued to reside until his death, the centre of a domestic and social circle known far and wide for its virtues, refinement, and literary attractions. In 1854 he resigned his professorship, and in 1868-69 travelled again in Europe, everywhere meeting with friends and admirers. The University of Oxford conferred upon him at this time the degree of D.C.L.

Longfellow's poetical works have had a very wide circulation in Great Britain, as well as at home: numerous translations of them have also been made into other languages. He endeared himself to the public not less by his character than by his genius. The man was quite as much honored and beloved as the poet. Nor is this strange. He touches the chords of human feeling and sympathy with such skill, because he touches them with the hand of a brother. Having himself taken deep lessons in the school of life, — lessons of great sorrow and suffering, as well as of joy, — he knows how to help and cheer others who are learning the same lessons.

"Such songs have power to quiet
The restless pulse of care,
And come like the benediction
Which follows after prayer."

LORD, as a term of address to a divinity, is the rendering of the Authorized Version for four Hebrew and two Greek words. (1) יהוה, and ה', ("Jehovah"); which see. (2) אדון ("Adon"). The term is exactly translated "lord," and is only rarely applied to God (Ps. viii. 1); usually to an earthly master, as a husband (Gen. xviii. 12), ruler of slaves (Gen. xxiv. 14), or a king (Gen. xlv. 8). It is often used with the possessive pronoun, "my lord." (3) אֲדֹנָי ("Adonai," plural of "Adon"); not usually applied to God in the historical books, for it is used therein only fourteen times alone (e.g., Gen. xviii. 3), and thirteen times in connection with "Jehovah" (e.g., Gen. xv. 8); nor used at all in Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles. (4) מָרֵא ("Maré"), used only in the Book of Daniel, addressed to a king, but also to God (ii. 17. v. 23). (5) Κύριος ("Kurios"), is the Septuagint and New-Testament translation of Jehovah, also applied to Christ. (6) Δεσπότης ("Despotēs"), a master (Luke ii. 29). In regard to these it should be remarked that they differ too widely to admit of one translation in common. Especially should Jehovah be uniformly used of the Supreme Being wherever such term occurs in the original. Mr. Wright (art. Lord, in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible) thus speaks of the typographical arrangement in the English Bible: "The difference between 'Jehovah' and 'Adonai' (or 'Adon') is generally marked in the Authorized Version by printing the word in small capitals (LORD) when it represents the former (Gen. xv. 4, etc.), and with an initial capital only when it is the translation of the latter (Ps. xvii. 5, etc), except in Exod. xxiii. 17, xxxiv. 23, where 'the Lord God' should be more consistently 'the Lord Jehovah.' A similar distinction prevails between יהוה (the letters of 'Jehovah,' with the vowel-points of 'Elohim') and אֱלֹהִים ('Elohim'); the former being represented in the Authorized Version by 'GOD' in small capitals (Gen. xv. 2, etc.), while 'Elohim' is 'God' with an initial capital only. And generally, when the name of the deity is printed in capitals, it indicates that the corresponding Hebrew is יהוה, which is translated 'LORD,' or 'GOD,' according to the vowel-points by which it is accompanied."

LORD, Nathan, D.D., LL.D., b. at Berwick, Me., Nov. 28, 1793; d. at Hanover, N.H., Sept. 9, 1870. He was graduated at Bowdoin College, 1809, and at Andover Theological Seminary, 1815; entered the Congregational ministry; and after twelve years of pastoral labor at Amherst, N.H., was president of Dartmouth College from Oct. 25, 1828, to July, 1863. His presidency was able, dignified, and successful. His publications were mostly articles in periodicals. Two published Letters to Ministers of the Gospel of all Denominations, on Slavery (1854-55) deserve mention for their defence of slavery on biblical grounds. They occasioned much debate.

LORD'S DAY, the oldest and best designation of the Christian Sabbath; first used by St. John, Rev. i. 10 (ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα). See SABBATH, SUNDAY.

LORD'S PRAYER, The. Our Lord, at the request of his disciples, imitated the Baptist, and taught them a prayer, which was to be the pattern of all prayer in his name. This prayer should not be allowed to degenerate into a mere formula, nor be frequently repeated in service, — a practice contradictory to the substance and object of the prayer. The Lord's Prayer is twice given in the New Testament (Matt. vi. 9-13; Luke xi. 2-4), in slightly differing words.

It has frequently been discussed whether Matthew or Luke has the correct form, or whether Jesus did not really teach it twice. The last supposition is improbable. It is, however, likely that Matthew inserted the prayer in his report of the Sermon on the Mount. Equally profitless are the discussions relative to the sources of the prayer. John Lightfoot and others maintain that it was extracted, petition for petition, from rabbinical prayers. But the proof adduced reduces itself to this, that, in these latter prayers, God is sometimes called "Father" (as he is, indeed, in the Old Testament: cf. Deut. xxxii. 5; Job xxxiv. 36, marg.; Isa. lxiii. 16; Jer. iii. 4, 39; Mal. i. 6); the restoration of the kingdom of Israel is pleaded for; and the petition occurs, "Hallowed be thy name through our works." The remaining petitions have been found in a prayer-book in use among Portuguese Jews of the middle ages, and in another composed by a rabbi, Klatz, about 1500 A.D. Surely our Lord did not borrow from these. The best refutation of the idea of compilation is the Lord's Prayer itself, so symmetrical in arrangement, so progressive in its thought, and so inexhaustible in its depth.

"Our Father who art in heaven," so the prayer begins. For the first time is God called the Father of particular persons. In the Old-Testament parallels he is the Father of the people of Israel; and Elihu alone (Job xxxiv. 36, marg.) calls him "Father" in the personal sense. In the New Testament, God appears as our Father in Christ; for, since he is the Father of Christ, he is the Father of those who are in Christ (John i. 12). "Our Father" is thus the express opposite to the heathen idea of "the father of gods and men," an epithet frequently applied; e.g., by Homer to Zeus. "Heaven" is the residence of God, that part of his creation wherein neither sin nor death is found, wherein his will is perfectly fulfilled: in short, where live the unfallen angels and the perfectly holy, in sight of the uncovered glory of God. The clause "in heaven" reminds us of the holiness of God to whom we pray; the epithet "Father," of his condescending grace.

The first petition is, "Hallowed be thy name." This properly comes first, because to give God the glory which is his due is the first and supreme desire of the Christian. God does not exist for us, but for himself: we are the creatures of his bounty. His "name" is Jehovah, — the sacred name by which he revealed himself. This name expresses his Godhead. To "hallow" it means to declare that he is God from all eternity, that he is holy, and demands holiness in his creatures, and that we are what we are in consequence of his grace. The Christian prays, not only for power himself to glorify God, but that the glory of God may be acknowledged by the whole world.

The second petition is, "Thy kingdom come." The "kingdom" is that which the Lord will set up on his return. The petition is, therefore, not for personal fitness to enter the kingdom, but for the completion of the work of redemption. Implied is, of course, the request that the kingdoms of this world may not hinder the progress of Messiah's kingdom. It is true they cannot, yet God means that we should pray that they may not.

The third petition is, "Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth." It brings us face to face with the contrast between the perfect obedience of heaven and the repeated rebellion of earth.

That the latter may cease, the Christian desires. In this petition he repents sincerely, first his own disobedience, and then that of the whole earth, and implores God to give strength to him, and grace to his fellows, to do the will of God.

These first three petitions contain a reference to the triune nature of God. God, whose name is to be hallowed, is the Father of Jesus Christ, the Lord and Creator of all things. His future kingdom is also the kingdom of the Father, but set up through the instrumentality of the Son. And, that God's will may be done, the Father and Son work together through the Holy Ghost.

Parallel with the first three are the last three petitions. The present is a time of waiting for the children of God, through which they must needs be maintained. The latter petitions recognize this. The fourth is, "Give us this day our daily bread." For, first of all in this present state, we need bodily sustenance. The word ἐπιούσιος ("daily") occurs only in this prayer. Three derivations have been proposed,—that from ἐπιών (sc. χρόνος), or from ἐπιούσα (sc. ἡμέρα), i.e., "bread for the coming time or day," which would not necessarily imply impatience, as the request might be made without the forbidden "anxious thought;" yet the words "this day" seem to indicate that the petition refers to the present, and therefore it is better to derive it from ὀυσία, i.e., the "necessary" bread, and give the phrase the meaning, the bread that is necessary for us to live upon. There is here no reference to spiritual sustenance, such as the word of God, or the Lord's Supper, as, e.g., the Fathers maintained. [Compare the elaborate Appendix by Bishop Lightfoot, "On the words ἐπιούσιος, περιούσιος," attached to his treatise, On a Fresh Revision of the English New Testament, London, 1871, reprint by Dr. Schaff, New York, 1873. In the Revised New Testament "our daily bread" is kept in the text; but the English Committee put in the margin "Gr. our bread for the coming day," while the American Committee present, as an alternative reading, "our needful bread."]

The fifth petition is, "And forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors,"—another recognition of our condition. As the fourth appealed to God as the Creator, this appeals to him as the Saviour in Jesus Christ. The second referred to the future completion of the kingdom; this to the riches of grace in the kingdom as at present constituted, viz., to the present deliverance from guilt, the forgiveness of sins. What separates us from the kingdom of Christ is our sins: this wall of partition must be daily removed by renewed supplication for the forgiveness once for all effected by Christ. The "as" in the petition is not "because:" our forgiveness of others does not merit God's forgiveness of us; rather it points to the conduct we must show, if we really would enjoy God's grace.

The sixth petition is, "And bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one." Augustine and the Lutheran divines divide this petition into two: Chrysostom and the Reformed divines consider it a unit. The first clause does indeed express positively what the second does negatively: so one is at liberty to consider them separately, but they are closely connected. Ὁ πονηρός is in Scripture the Evil One, Satan. The adjective πονηρός never means simple sinfulness as such, much less "evil" generally, but always that wickedness which is Antichrist, working directly against the salvation which is in Christ Jesus. The adjective is either always connected with some substantive, or else, if absolute, is the masculine, and specifies a person, namely, Satan (cf. Matt. v. 37). The word "temptation" means both trial, and also actual temptation to sin. But God tempts no one to sin. Yet he does place his children in circumstances of trial; and these trials are wholesome, and no Christian seeks deliverance from them. The temptation in them arises from our sinful hearts. The petition therefore means, from such temptations above that we "are able" may God deliver us. He surely will (1 Cor. x. 13); but he wants to be asked to do so. The petition is a recognition that we contend, not against flesh and blood, but against the Evil One, and therefore stand in dire need of the divine help. We pray to be delivered from all temptations to leave our Saviour, or to decline in our faith and love (in this way the sixth is parallel to the third petition), and also that the church may be finally delivered, and the victory of Christ be made complete.

The doxology is decidedly spurious; yet it is beautiful and fitting: it would even better correspond to the double triadic arrangement of the prayer, if the "power" were made to precede the "kingdom."

Liturgical use of the prayer can be traced as early as the end of the third century, in Tertullian and Cyprian; and then the doxology was in use, giving it a better liturgical close.

LORD'S SUPPER. I. Roman and Greek Catholic View.—See TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

II. The Lutheran View.—The four times repeated account of the institution of the Lord's Supper (Matt. xxvi. 26-28; Mark xiv. 22-24; Luke xxii. 19, 20; 1 Cor. xi. 23-25) is the basis of the doctrine; and the Lutheran Church insists that the words shall be taken in their simple, primitive meaning, and not figuratively. Nor must the passage on the bread from heaven (John vi. 35 sq.) be considered explanatory by anticipation; for, although our Lord may well have had in mind the supper he knew he should institute (comp. vi. 53-56), he did not speak of it, and could not have spoken of it, if, as is evident, he desired to present something which faith, if not reason, could grasp.

The four accounts reduce themselves substantially to two; for Matthew's and Mark's stand together opposite to Luke's and Paul's, yet their differences do not affect the doctrine. We take by preference Paul's account, because he received it from Christ (1 Cor. xi. 23): "The Lord Jesus in the night in which he was betrayed took bread; and when he had given thanks, he brake it, and said, This is my body, which is for you [i.e., is given to death for you]: this do in remembrance of me. In like manner also [he took] the cup, after supper, saying, This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do, as often as ye drink it, in remembrance of me." The first question concerns the words, "in my blood." Do they refer to the "cup," or the "covenant"? Should we read, The new covenant in (by means of) my blood? or, This cup is in my blood the new covenant? Plainly the latter. The cup is the new covenant, because it contains the blood of Christ poured out for us. It is further to be borne in mind, that the cup was given after the Passover meal (so Luke and Paul); so that it was not a part of the Jewish ceremony, but a new institution. It is an open question whether the giving of the bread and that of the wine were separated by an interval: at all events, the two actions are parts of one ordinance.—The words, "This do in remembrance of me," do not express the object of the sacrament, but the meaning: it is a memorial of the death of Jesus, as Paul himself says: "For as often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come."

The accounts of Matthew and Mark add little. Peculiar to Matthew is the connection between the shedding of the blood and the forgiveness of sins (xxvi. 28). Matthew and Mark relate that all present drank of the cup; the first, that it was done at the request of Jesus. All four unite in declaring, that, through the blood of Christ, a new covenant has been made. This blood was not, however, shed for all, but "for many" (περὶ πολλῶν); although the expression implies that the number thereby blessed is very large.

The decisive question, after all, is, Are the words, "This is my body," "This is my blood," literal, or symbolical? Was there an actual presentation of the body and blood of Christ? or was there only one in simile? The decision rests upon the parallel position of subject and predicate. No emphasis should be put upon "is," for Luke omits it in respect to the cup, without thereby altering the sense; nor is it appropriate to quote passages in which such a parallelism exists, and where predicate or subject is figurative (e.g., Matt. xiii. 38, 39; John xv. 1, 5); because for the Lord to introduce illustrations and similes into his instruction or discourses is one thing, and quite another to use them in a solemn hour when he established a new ordinance through the presentation of gifts which he named. In the latter case there was no instruction, or explanation of a subject, through an illustration, but a description of what the disciples took from his hand, and should eat and drink. To suppose that our Lord at such a time spoke in metaphor is contrary to the solemnity of the occasion, the meaning of the institution, and the short, precise phrases employed. Problematical and mysterious the words were, doubtless; but the disciples were used to this, and their faith would not be shaken thereby, but rather deepened and strengthened through the expectation of a fresh experience of his might. Nay, our Lord called what he gave them his body and his blood; and no circumstance leads us to suppose they were any thing else. The question now arises, whether, upon the utterance of these words, the bread and the wine were changed into the body and blood of Christ. The answer is found in 1 Cor. x. 16: "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion of the blood of Christ? The bread which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ?" Paul plainly says these three things: (1) The bread and wine are not changed into other substances, but they are a veritable communion of the body and blood of Christ; (2) This communion is given with the bread and wine, and is inseparable from it; (3) The means of enjoying this communion is the partaking of the elements; so that the communion follows whatever may be the state of mind or intention on the part of the recipient. It is, therefore, the same with the Lord's table as with the table of demons: if one sits at an idolatrous, sacrificial feast, he partakes of the table of the idol, whatever may be one's opinion of the idol. By reason of our eating one bread, "we who are many are one bread, one body." But the bread which possesses this unifying effect is that described in the sixteenth verse; namely, that which is the communion of the body of Christ for all who partake of it: therefore the unifying band of the communicants with one another is the equal share of all in the bread in and by means of which the Lord shares his body with them.

But the Lutheran Church rejects transubstantiation, while insisting that the body and blood of Christ are mysteriously and supernaturally united with the bread and wine, so that they are received when the latter are. This union of the earthly and heavenly elements is called unio sacramentalis, is essential to the sacrament, and not present when the ordinance is not observed according to Christ's appointment. The elements are not to be adored; for they are for use, not for worship. The question how the mysterious union is accomplished is answered by saying, Purely by the continuing power of the first ordinance by Christ himself. The command "Do this" insures, that, as often as the sacrament is administered, the union takes place: hence the union does not depend upon the consecration of a priest. But Christ's words of institution should always be clearly spoken or sung, (1) out of obedience to Christ's command to make every celebration a repetition of the first; (2) in order that the faith of the hearer in the existence and importance of the sacrament may be awakened, strengthened, and confirmed; (3) and in order that the elements may be blessed and consecrated to the holy use. The further question respecting the moment when the union takes place may be dismissed as unprofitable to discuss. It is essential to a right administration of the sacrament, that its three parts, consecration, distribution, and reception, be all present. The Lutheran Church emphasizes the reception by the mouth (manducatio oralis), and of both kinds by all the communicants (manducatio indignorum). It emphasizes the first in contradistinction to the Calvinistic view of spiritual participation through faith. This it considers contradictory to the words of institution, which refer to oral communion.—"Take," "eat," "drink." Similarly Paul calls the cup, which we bless, and the bread, which we break, the communion of the body and blood of Christ. But these are actually taken by the mouth. When, therefore, the Lutheran Confession uses the expression, that the body and blood of Christ are received in, with, and under the bread and wine of the sacrament, it means that no one can enjoy in this sacrament the bread and wine unless he does at the same time actually receive them by his mouth. But the meaning is not that the body and blood of Christ are corporeally present (impanatio) in the bread and wine, nor in such a manner connected with them that they are partaken of as so much material food, and enter the system. On the contrary, the Lutheran Church asserts the spiritual partaking of the heavenly elements, but not as if this spiritual partaking were something different and distinct from the oral partaking, rather as proceeding at the same time, the two being supernaturally and spiritually connected. Nothing depends upon the spiritual condition of the recipient. He may receive the body and blood unworthily; and then he eats them to his own judgment (1 Cor. xi. 29), for he becomes "guilty of the body and blood of the Lord" (xi. 27), not discerning the Lord's body; i. e., not considering, that, in taking the material elements, he is at the same time receiving the body of the Lord. But this effect would not happen if the unworthy recipient partook only of bread and wine. The unworthy are all those who do not believe, who go to this sacrament without any repentance of their past sins, and sincere desire to improve their lives (Form. Conc., Epit., § 18; Sol. decl., vii. §§ 69-71).

In regard to the blessing attached to the right use of the sacrament, the Confession says, in brief, "These words, 'Given and shed for you for the forgiveness of sins,' show, that, in the sacrament, forgiveness of sins, life, and salvation are given; for, where forgiveness of sin is, there is also life and salvation."

What has been previously said may be embraced in the following propositions. (1) The words of institution are to be understood in their ordinary acceptance. Since our Lord said, "Take, eat, drink, this is my body, my blood," his body and blood are really and truly present, and are distributed and received. (2) This reception is by the mouth, agreeably to the words of institution, because the Lord has determined no other way, but at the same time spiritually, because the body and blood of Christ is a spiritual, heavenly food, which is not assimilated by the body, as earthly food would be. (3) Because the reception of the body and blood of Christ in the Lord's Supper is joined to the earthly signs, so both are received by all those who participate in the sacrament, held agreeably to the words of institution, irrespective of their worthiness or unworthiness, but to the blessing of the worthy, and to the judgment of the unworthy.

It remains now to answer certain questions. First, Is not the Roman Church right in giving the laity the bread only, inasmuch as in the bread (i. e., the body) the blood is of course contained? In regard to this it is sufficient to remark, that such action is plainly in flat contradiction to the words of institution, "Drink ye all of it," and also to the action of our Lord in giving the cup. But next it may be asked, What kind of body and blood is that we partake of in the Lord's Supper? The glorified. To this it may be objected, that the primary reference must have been to the mortal body. True; and it is the same body, but it is differently conditioned. It is not now mortal, but immortal, glorified. But, if that is the case, one may further object: Then those who received the bread and wine directly from the Lord's hands did not receive the sacrament as we do, for Christ was not yet glorified. The objection is aimed at the power of Christ. The Lord, who had power to lay down his life, and power to take it again (John x. 18), is not restricted by laws of our human nature. When he said, "Take, eat, this is my body," he had perfect ability to give his body to the disciples. Wonderful, surely, mysterious, supernatural, but not impossible, is this proceeding. The power thus to be present whenever the Lord's Supper is administered, comes from the union in him of the human nature with the divine or divine-human person (communicatio idiomatum).

See FRANK: Theologie der Concordienformel, Abt. iii.; v. HOFMANN: Schriftbeweis, ii. 2, pp. 223 sqq. von BURGER (Lutheran).

III. The Reformed View.—This, like the Catholic and the Lutheran, underwent certain changes ere it reached its present form, and is even now differently expressed, as the opposition to the Lutheran view is more or less strongly put. The battle was, at the outbreak of the Reformation, over the question whether the words of institution were to be taken literally or figuratively. Zwingli laid the stress upon "is," in the sense of "means;" Ecolampadius, upon "body and blood," which he declared means "represents body and blood,"—a more correct point to emphasize, since the copulative fails in Aramaic, the speech our Lord employed. This, however, Zwingli knew. Lutheran theologians are now not so much inclined to oppose the tropical interpretation, bearing in mind that it was accepted by such men as Augustine and Athanasius, and, moreover, that figurative expressions occur too frequently in the Bible to make it impossible for our Lord to have used such in the institution of the Last Supper. But the advocates of the literal interpretation insist that he would not speak figuratively at so solemn and momentous a time. In reply, it should be said, it is not for us to say so. We know he did speak so on other occasions, and from misunderstanding him sad events have happened (Matt. xix. 12). We dare not prescribe how Christ must speak. But the opponents say, it cannot be supposed he would give his disciples a mere figure, since the words he used imply that he gave them something real. This argument is, of course, not to be so understood as begging the question: what he did give them being the very thing to be determined; for, if he really did give them his veritable body, then it would be an emptying of the sacrament to understand the word "body" figuratively. Lutheran theologians do not so insist upon the strictly literal meaning of the words of institution, that thereby an absolute equality between subject and predicate is established. Luther saw that such an interpretation led directly to the Roman view; therefore, for a time, he also inclined to the figurative interpretation. The Lutherans avoid the dilemma, Rome, or the Reformed Church, by saying, In, with, and under the bread, the body of Christ is given. But this expression proves that the Lutherans are not yet completely emancipated from Romanism. At the same time, it is freely granted that the Zwinglian theologians, in their zeal against the Roman Church, went too far on the other side.

The institution of the Lord's Supper was preceded by the speech of Jesus in the synagogue at Capernaum (John vi. 48-63); and the latter, though in no way directly connected with the former, throws considerable light upon it, in that it presents an instance of figurative speaking. On both occasions is there mention made of an eating and drinking of the body and blood of Christ. But in his Capernaum speech, there surely was a most emphatic rejection of the literal acceptance of those words; for this was just the sense the people at Capernaum took them in. Hence the way was, to say the least, prepared for the acceptance of the figurative interpretation of the words of institution on the part of his disciples.

The Lord's Supper is no exception to the general statement that every thing in the New Testament links on to the Old, for it is directly connected with the Paschal Supper. The Lord took his farewell supper, and at the same time his Paschal Supper. But, in order to free his church from the ordinances of the Jewish dispensation, he set before his disciples bread and wine.

If the partaking of the body and blood of Christ is to be spiritual, we should naturally expect, that, in the words of institution, there will be something which cannot be taken other than figuratively. And this is the case. The four accounts are divisible into two groups, — Matthew and Mark, Luke and Paul (1 Cor. xi. 23-26); and it is precisely in the second group, presumably the more authentic, if any thing, that some points present themselves which cannot be understood literally. (1) Luke's phrase, "This cup, the new covenant in my blood, that which is poured out for you;" and Paul's, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood." Some would draw "in my blood" to cup, and read, "This cup is, in consequence of my blood, symbol or pledge of the new covenant;" others, and better, with Calvin, connect the clause with "new covenant," and read "This cup, i.e., that which it contains, sets forth the new covenant, which has been formed and sealed by my blood." But in either case we have a strongly figurative expression. The Lord, under the affecting excitement of the hour, heaps figure upon figure. (2) The phrase, "This do in remembrance of me" (Paul gives it twice, after the distribution of the bread and of the wine; Luke only once). How can any one resist the impression that the phrase points directly to a figurative meaning of the supper? For "remembrance" implies absence. "To remember" a present Lord is a solecism. And the argument loses nothing of its force when we suppose the words were never spoken (as a matter of fact, they are not given in Matthew and Mark); for they prove the understanding Luke and Paul had of the supper, — that it was a parallel to the Paschal Supper, in which there was a remembrance made every year of past events. The Lutherans strive to break the force of the argument by emphasizing Paul's warning (1 Cor. xi. 27-29) against eating and drinking unworthily, saying, that, since one cannot sin against an absent object, therefore the body and blood of Christ must be present. But the premise is false, and the conclusion invalid. One can, for example, commit an offence against a country while not in the country, as by insulting the flag of that country. Again: the Lutherans call attention to the clause, "not discerning the body," as if it implied the actual presence of the body. But it does not at all necessarily do this. Another proof passage with the Lutherans is 1 Cor. x. 16-22. Here Paul parallels the communion of the body and blood of Christ with that between the participants in the Jewish sacrifices, and with that between idolatrous sacrificers. But the communion in all three cases is, after all, not based upon the material contact, but upon the common frame of mind. So there is communion in the body and blood of Christ, because there is common belief in Christ as the Saviour from sin and guilt through death, of which the pledge has been given us in the Last Supper.

We are now in condition to take a comprehensive view of the Lord's Supper. The feet-washing which preceded its institution was a fitting prelude. It revealed the ministering love of the Lord; the supper, his yielding, sacrificing love. Love is the secret of the supper. The Lord is about to give up his life into the hands of sinners, but in truth he gives himself up into the hands of his own; for them he dies in order that they may live. Love is the motive in the sacrifice. Of this the supper is the pledge and the confirmation. It is in itself a condensation of the divine love to our human nature, spirit and body. To this fact the Fathers, the Schoolmen, and the Reformers alike call attention. On former occasions the Lord had likened participation in the kingdom of God to a meal to which they were invited: here is a meal, and one, too, in which the host offers himself as food and drink.

Thus the Lord's Supper stands upon the same plane with baptism. Both are symbolical. The latter symbolizes the grace needful to reception into the covenant of grace; the former, that for maintenance and progress in the covenant. The supper offers us nothing else than what is already offered us in the Word, — confirmation in communion with Christ, with its fruit, strengthening of faith, forgiveness of sin, and power of sanctification. But in the supper these are tenderly pressed upon us. By the eating and drinking we are admonished that he gave his body for us, for us shed his blood. Without the supper, we can surely have our strength increased, and obtain forgiveness of sin; but in the supper we receive the most solemn assurances that these mercies are ours. And the supper gives us also direct encouragement to continue in grace, and the strength so to do; so that Zwingli expressed the exact truth when he said that the supper was given to us in order that we might have heart to overcome the world, through faith in Him who overcame the world for us. The supper, is, therefore, no empty, meaningless sign; although it does not in itself confer grace.

But it is one thing to say that Christ is present in the supper, and another to say that he is present in the bread. There is in it a true and real presence of Christ; but it is a sacramental presence, not local nor corporal. It is this presence which makes the celebration of the Lord's Supper the crown of Christian worship. In it

God meets man, and comes laden with richest gifts. See what a part faith plays in the supper. "Christ is with the mouth of faith received." Without faith the sign is empty, meaningless: there is no spiritual presence, only the presence of a symbol. In the faithful the supper has a blessed effect. But no miracle is necessary, simply a working of grace according to the measure of faith in the participants. And where there is no faith, there is no effect except punishment. The unworthy participant eats and drinks judgment: he does not and can not receive Christ.

There remains a word of historical criticism. Zwingli and Œcolampadius, driven by their polemic against Rome, surely went to extremes in reducing the sacraments to mere signs. The First Helvetic Confession (XXIII.), however, more correctly teaches, that, in the "mystical supper," the Lord gives to his own his body and blood, i.e., himself, in order that he may live in them through faith, and they in him. Calvin advances beyond Zwingli, and approaches the Lutheran view, without, however, giving up the Reformed idea. He teaches that the flesh of Christ has a perpetual life-giving power; and in the Lord's Supper the believers, through the Holy Spirit, share in this power through their participation in the substance of the glorified body of Christ. This idea was expressed in the Genevan Catechism, and in the French, Belgian, and First Scotch Confessions. Here we see a tinge of the Roman-Catholic doctrine: yet the underlying idea is correct; we must hold fast upon the human in Christ, if we would come to the divine. In the flesh of Christ lies the power of life,—in the Word made flesh, as it is embodied and lives in the word of the everlasting gospel. And in the Lord's Supper are we, besides, pointed to the death of Christ and its saving power; and thus by it, as Paul says, we show forth the Lord's death until he come. This is the doctrine of the Heidelberg Catechism, and the Second Helvetic Confession, and wherever else it is taught, that, in the Supper, the body of Christ is through faith spiritually received.

To conclude: the participation in the supper in faith strengthens our unity of life with Christ and with our fellow-believers, since this union is founded upon Christ. The Lutheran and Reformed Confessions, in spite of their differences, have much and essential matter in common, not only in the rejection of Roman-Catholic errors, but in the conception of the supper as a true means of grace, assuring our salvation, strengthening our faith, and increasing our union with Christ.

[The High Anglican View is, that "the bread and wine become by consecration really and sacramentally (though in an inconceivable manner, which cannot be explained by earthly similitudes or illustrations) the body and blood of our Lord." This is the doctrine of the real presence, in contradistinction to that of the figurative presence, according to which the bread and the wine are "only memorials of Christ's body and blood," and to that of the virtual presence, "as if our Lord only bestowed in the Eucharist the graces and blessings derived from his atoning sacrifice." In proof are quoted our Lord's address at Capernaum (John vi.), his intercessory prayer (John xvii.), the words of institution in the Synoptists and Paul, the Fathers, and the ancient liturgies. The Eucharist is also a sacrifice; for when our Lord said, "Do this in remembrance of me," he meant, "offer this as a memorial sacrifice." Hence the Eucharist is called the "unbloody sacrifice" by the Fathers and the ancient liturgies. See J. H. BLUNT: Dict. of Doctr. and Hist. Theology, arts. "Eucharist," "Real Presence." The original view of the Church of England, as expressed in the Thirty-Nine Articles, Art. XXVIII., is the Reformed or Calvinistic view. See below.

IV. The Confessional Statements respecting the Lord's Supper.¹

The ROMAN-CATHOLIC doctrine is officially given in the Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent, Sess. XIII., Oct. 11, 1551. See Creeeds, ii. 126-139. The principal points are:—

"In the Eucharist are contained truly, really and substantially, the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and consequently the whole Christ."—Can. 1.

"The whole substance of the bread [is converted] into the body," and, "the whole substance of the wine into the blood."—Can. 2.

"The whole Christ is contained under each species, and under every part of each species, when separated."—Can. 3.

"The principal fruit of the most holy Eucharist is the remission of sins."—Can. 5.

"In the Eucharist, Christ is to be adored."—Can. 6.

"All and each of Christ's faithful are bound to communicate every year."—Can. 9.

"Sacramental confession is to be made beforehand, by those whose conscience is burdened with mortal sin."—Can. 11.

The same view is taught, though less distinctly, in the GREEK CHURCH in the Orthodox Confession of the Eastern Church, Ques. CVI., CVII. (ii. 380-385); in the Confession of Dositheus (ii. 427-432); in the Longer Catechism of the Eastern Church, qu. 315:—

"What is the Communion? A sacrament, in which the believer, under the forms of bread and wine, partakes of the very Body and Blood of Christ, to everlasting life" (ii. 495).

The authoritative teaching of the LUTHERAN CHURCH is thus given, Augsburg Confession (A.D. 1530), Art. X.:—

"The true body and blood of Christ are truly present under the form of bread and wine, and are there communicated to and received by those that eat in the Lord's Supper" (iii. 13).

Afterwards Melancthon changed this article in the edition of 1540, substituting for distribuantur ("communicated") exhibeantur ("shown"). This departure occasioned much controversy. The Lutheran doctrine is thus given in the Formula of Concord (A.D. 1576), Art. VII., Affirmative:—

"We believe, teach, and confess that in the Lord's Supper the body and blood of Christ are truly and substantially present, and that they are truly distributed and taken together with the bread and wine" (iii. 137).

The authoritative teaching of the REFORMED

CHURCHES is thus given: First Helvetic Confession (A.D. 1536), XXIII.:—

"The bread and wine [of the Supper] are holy, true symbols, through which the Lord offers and presents the true communion of the body, and blood of Christ for the feeding and nourishing of the spiritual and eternal life" (iii. 225).

So also in the Second Helvetic Confession, Cap. XXI. (iii. 291-295).

The French Confession of Faith (A.D. 1559), XXXVI., XXXVIII.:—

"The Lord's Supper is a witness of the union which we have with Christ, inasmuch as he not only died and rose again for us once, but also feeds and nourishes us truly with his flesh and blood, so that we may be one in him, and that our life may be in common."

"The bread and wine in the sacrament serve to our spiritual nourishment, in as much as they show, as to our sight, that the body of Christ is our meat, and his blood our drink" (iii. 380, 381).

The Scotch Confession of Faith (A.D. 1560), Art. XXI.:—

"The faithful in the right use of the Lords Table do so eat the bodie and drinke the blude of the Lord Jesus that he remains in them and they in him" (iii. 467-474).

The Belgic Confession (A.D. 1561), Art. XXXV.:—

"Christ that he might represent unto us this spiritual and heavenly bread hath instituted an earthly and visible bread as a Sacrament of his body, and wine as a Sacrament of his blood, to testify by them unto us, that, as certainly as we receive and hold this Sacrament in our hands, and eat and drink the same with our mouths, by which our life is afterwards nourished, we also do as certainly receive by faith (which is the hand and mouth of our soul) the true body and blood of Christ our only Saviour in our souls, for the support of our spiritual life" (iii. 428-431).

The Heidelberg Catechism (A.D. 1563), qu. 76:—

"What is it to eat of the crucified body and drink the shed blood of Christ? It is not only to embrace with a believing heart all the sufferings and death of Christ, and thereby to obtain the forgiveness of sins and life eternal, but moreover, also, to be so united more and more to his sacred body by the Holy Ghost, who dwells both in Christ and in us, that although he is in heaven, and we are upon the earth, we are nevertheless flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bones, and live and are governed forever by one Spirit, as members of the same body are by the one soul" (iii. 332, 333).

The Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England (A.D. 1562), Art. XXVIII.:—

"The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another; but rather it is a Sacrament of our Redemption by Christ's death; insomuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith, receive the same, the Bread which we break is a [heavenly and spiritual] partaking of the Body of Christ; and likewise the Cup of Blessing is a partaking of the Blood of Christ" (iii. 505).

So the Irish Articles of Religion (A.D. 1615, iii. 542, 543).

The Westminster Confession of Faith (A.D. 1647), Chap. XXIX.:—

"The Lord's Supper [is] to be observed for the perpetual remembrance of the sacrifice of himself in his death, the sealing of all benefits thereof with true believers, their spiritual nourishment and growth in him, their further engagement in, and to all duties which they owe unto him; and to be a bond and pledge of their communion with him, and with each other, as members of his mystical body."

"Worthy believers do inwardly by faith, really and indeed, yet not carnally and corporally, but spiritually receive and feed upon Christ crucified, and all the benefits of his death" (iii. 663-667).

The Westminster Shorter Catechism (A.D. 1647), qu. 96:—

"What is the Lord's Supper? A sacrament wherein by the giving and receiving bread and wine, according to Christ's appointment, his death is showed forth, and the worthy receivers are, not after a corporal and carnal manner, but by faith, made partakers of his body and blood, with all its benefits, to their spiritual nourishment and growth in grace" (iii. 697).

The Confession of the Society of Friends (A.D. 1675), Thirteenth Proposition:—

"The communion of the body and blood of Christ is inward and spiritual, which is the participation of his flesh and blood, by which the inward man is daily nourished in the hearts of those in whom Christ dwells; of which things the breaking of bread by Christ with his disciples was a figure, which they even used in the Church for a time, who had received the substance, for the cause of the weak; even as 'abstaining from things strangled, and from blood;' the washing one another's feet, and the anointing of the sick with oil; all which are commanded with no less authority and solemnity than the former; yet seeing they are but the shadow of better things, they cease in such as have obtained the substance" (iii. 797).

Reformed Episcopal Articles of Religion (A.D. 1875), Art. XXVII.:—

"The Supper of the Lord is a memorial of our Redemption by Christ's death, for thereby we do show forth the Lord's death till he come. It is also a symbol of the soul's feeding upon Christ. And it is a sign of the communion that we should have with one another" (iii. 823.)

V. Forms of Celebration. [The original institution of the Lord's Supper took place upon the night preceding the crucifixion; that is, it was upon Thursday, the 14th of Nisan, corresponding to our April 6, A.D. 30. The place of meeting was the large upper room of a Jerusalem house. The company consisted of our Lord and eleven of his disciples; for, although Judas Iscariot was undoubtedly present at the Paschal Supper, it is unlikely that he staid to the after-celebration. (Compare John xiii. 30.) The so-called "Lord's Supper" directly followed the ordinary paschal meal. The articles used were the bread and wine upon the table at the time. The position of the first communicants was reclining, according to custom (John xiii. 23, 25, and art. MEALS).]

From the New Testament it appears, that in the first Christian congregations, more especially in that of Jerusalem, the Lord's Supper was celebrated with exactly the same plainness and simplicity which characterized its institution. Between worship and any other act of daily life, no distinction had as yet developed; no ceremonies, no ritual, existed. The members of the congregation lived with each other like members of one large family, but a family of a new and higher type. Every day they gathered in the houses for the sake of common devotion. They ate together; and, when the meal was finished, one of them would arise, take the bread and break it, and pass the pieces around, together with the cup, in exactly the way in which the Lord had ordered it to be done. There was a danger, however, in administering the communion in this way. It might happen that the sacrament would gradually lose its character of being a separate institution, and sink down to a conventional part of a meal: and this did, indeed, happen (1 Cor. xi. 20, 33).

It is difficult to determine in detail the relation between the Lord's Supper and the agape: it was, no doubt, different in the different countries. Thus while, according to the descriptions of divine service given by Justin (in his Apolog., 1, 65) and by Pliny (in his famous Letter to Trajan, X. 96), the agape and the communion were treated in Asia Minor, in the beginning of the second century, as two distinct acts, other Christian writers, and especially a number of canonical decrees, show that in the West, and also in Africa, they were at the same time celebrated in connection with each other; and from Socrates (Hist. Eccl., v. 22) and Sozomen (Hist. Eccl., vii. 19) it is evident, that, in Egypt, the connection was continued even down to the fourth century. The steadily increasing danger, however, of the desecration of the sacrament, made a separation necessary. First it was ordered that the celebration of the Eucharist should take place, not at the end, but at the beginning, of the meal. Only on one day, the anniversary of the institution, the celebration was allowed by the Council of Carthage (392) to take place at the end of the meal, in order to make the imitation of the last meeting between Christ and the apostles as close as possible. Next it was decided that the agape should be celebrated in the evening, while the communion should be administered in the morning, before sunrise; and finally the councils of Laodicea (363), Carthage (392), and Orleans (533), forbade altogether to celebrate the agape in the churches; while the church, of course, continued to be the usual place for the celebration of the Lord's Supper. Thus the separation was completed. The first description of a communion administered independently of the agape is that above mentioned by Justin. "After a prayer," he says, "we greet each other with a kiss. Then the leader of the meeting brings forwards bread and wine, and makes a prayer, to which the whole congregation answer, Amen. Finally the deacons distribute the bread and wine over which the prayer has been said, to all present, and something is also carried to the houses of those who are absent."

It must be noticed, that, in this description, the celebration of the Eucharist is in no wise represented as a mystery, but as a simple public act; and exactly the same character it has in the descriptions of Ignatius, Tertullian, Januarius, etc. The Apostolical Constitutions were, indeed, the first to represent the administration of the communion as an act from which not only all profane persons, infidels, Jews, and Pagans, but also the catechumens, the penitent, and the excommunicated, should be excluded, — an act performed by the faithful alone, within closed doors, with certain ceremonies, and after certain preparations. The rules of the Liturgia Sancti Jacobi Minoris, the oldest church constitution existing, gives a picture of the act such as it was performed during the third and fourth centuries. After the common service was finished, the deacon began the "mass of the faithful," with the words, "Let no one go away who is allowed to stay!" During a silent prayer, the deacon and his assistants gathered the bread and wine which the congregation had brought along for the celebration; and when all was collected, and one single loaf, the hostia, the sacrificial lamb, selected, the celebration proper began. The faithful gave each other the kiss; the profane, the catechumens, etc., were admonished to retire; the clergy washed their hands; the bread and wine were placed on the altar, at whose two ends two subdeacons took their stand, with fans in their hands to keep off the flies; while from behind, the bishop approached the table, clad in a magnificent robe, and accompanied by the priests. Then followed a general prayer, lasting half an hour, and winding up with special prayers for the clerical office of Christendom, for the secular authorities, for the people, the pious women, parent and children, slaves, emigrants and exiles, travellers, etc. The sacrifice thus blessed, the Thirty-fourth Psalm, the usual communion-hymn, was sung; after which first the clergy, and then the congregation, partook of the Eucharist. The bishop presented the bread to the communicants with the words, "The body of Christ;" the deacon, the cup, with the words, "The blood of Christ;" to which the communicant answered with a loud "Amen."

How the celebration of the Lord's Supper further developed in the Western Church, until, in the course of the sixth century, it assumed the form of the Roman-Catholic mass, will be told in the article MASS. There are some details, however, which need mentioning in order to complete the picture. As above mentioned, in early times the celebration generally took place early in the morning. Only the Easter and Christmas communion continued, down to the twelfth or thirteenth century, to be administered at midnight. As a reminiscence of the midnight celebration, the candles on the communion-table were lighted, even in a celebration by day. Originally the communion was administered every day, then every Sunday; but from the fifth century it was restricted to the three great festivals, Christmas, Easter, and Pentecost. In the earliest times, only the bishop or the leader of the congregation had the right of administering the Eucharist. The presbyter could consecrate the elements only on his authority, and the deacons served only in the mechanical part of the act. During the middle ages, however, when the bishops became great lords, who had many other things to do besides caring for the church, the administration of the sacrament came to devolve entirely upon the priests, not as a right, but as a duty. The communicants prepared themselves by fasting, by ablution, by dressing in clean clothes (the women wearing a peculiar head-dress of white linen, — the dominicale), and by the kiss of peace. In earlier times they approached the altar two and two, and received the elements standing (Const. Apostol., 8, 12). Afterwards the laity, first the women, were excluded from the altar and the choir; and the elements were handed to them over the rails which separated the choir from the nave. Down to the ninth century the bread was given the communicant in his hand; then it was put into his mouth, in order to prevent him from taking it home. Kneeling during the participation in the Eucharist does not occur until the twelfth or thirteenth century, though it was an old custom to receive the blessing with which the communion ended in a kneeling position. With respect to the elements, the Eastern Church continued to use leavened bread; while in the ninth century unleavened bread came into use in the Western Church, from a regard to the circumstance that the institution of the sacrament had taken place on the "day of unleavened bread." The question, however, was left standing, as an adiaphoron. The bread was in round, thin cakes stamped with some figure, — the cross, or Λ and Ω , etc.; or some word, — Jesus, Deus, etc. The Syrian Jacobites added salt and oil to the bread; the Artotyrites (a Montanist sect of the second century), even cheese. The wine was in antiquity always mixed with water, and no distinction was made between red and white wine. By heretical sects, various substitutes were used for wine; such as water, milk, honey, unfermented grape-juice, etc. The breaking of the bread, referring to the breaking of the body of Christ, was the general custom in antiquity, and has been retained by all churches except the Lutheran. With this feature of the administration was connected another, of blending the bread and the wine together, referring to the close union between the body and the blood; and the Greek lay so strong an emphasis on this blending, that they drop the pieces of the broken bread into the wine, and present them to the communicants by means of a spoon. The formula of distribution was, up to the time of Gregory the Great, the above-mentioned: σῶμα χριστοῦ ("body of Christ"), αἷμα χριστοῦ ("blood of Christ"), ποτήριον ζωῆς ("cup of life"). But after that time more elaborate formulas occur; such as, Corpus (sanguis) Domini nostri Jesu Christi conservet animam tuam ("May the body [blood] of our Lord Jesus Christ preserve thy soul"); or, Corpus . . . custodiat te in vitam æternam ("body . . . preserve thee unto eternal life"); or, Corpus et sanguis Agni Dei, quod tibi datur in remissionem peccatorum ("body and blood of the Lamb of God, which was given for thee to the remission of sins"); or, Corpus . . . sit tibi salus anima et corporis ("May the body . . . be to thee salvation in body and soul"); or, in the Orient, Corpus sanctum, pretiosum, verum, Immanuelis filii Dei hoc est vere ("This is truly the holy, precious, true body of Immanuel, the Son of God"); Sanguis pretiosus, verus, Immanuelis filii Dei hoc est vere ("This is truly the precious, true blood of Immanuel, the Son of God").

The form which the Greek Church developed for the celebration of the Lord's Supper is entirely different from that developed by the Roman-Catholic Church. It is symbolical throughout. Not only does one of the antiphonal choirs which perform during the act represent in some mystical way the cherubim, but the whole act is, in its every feature, a symbolical representation of the passion. Five loaves are laid on the altar, each stamped with the sign of the cross and the inscription, Ἰησοῦς χριστός, νικῶν. The officiating priest selects one of them for the sacrificial lamb; and with a symbolical reference to the soldier who pierced the side of Jesus with a spear, so that blood and water flowed from the wound, he cuts the loaf, by thrusting the Holy lance — a knife in the form of a lance — into it, while at the same time the deacon pours the wine and the water into the cup. Under sombre dirges the elements are then carried in a solemn procession, headed with many lighted candles and much incense-burning, through the whole church, and back again to the altar, where they are deposited, like the body of Christ in the tomb. A curtain is lowered before the altar; and, unseen by the congregation, the elements are consecrated by the bishop while the choir is chanting the Lord's Prayer. When the curtain is drawn, the altar represents the tomb from which Christ has risen; and, while the choir sings a hymn of praise, the elements are presented to the communicants without any special formula of distribution.

All the various forms under which the Lord's Supper is celebrated in the various Protestant churches may be referred to two types, — the one established by Luther, and the other by Calvin. Luther issued two liturgies, — one of 1523, in which the whole Latin mass, even the language, is retained, so far as it does not openly contradict Scripture; and one of 1526, the so-called Deutsche Messe. It is the latter, which, with various modifications, has been adopted by all Lutheran churches. Its principal characteristics are, the consecration of the elements by the sign of the cross; the use of the wafer, that is, of unleavened bread which is not broken; the use of white instead of red wine; and the kneeling position of the communicants, who receive the elements in the mouth, and not in the hand. The Calvinist type has generally retained the character of a common meal; the whole arrangement is freer and more simple; the solemn ceremonies are reduced to the least possible; while the holy earnest of the act itself is emphasized as strongly as possible. In the French Reformed Church the elements are placed — the bread in two silver dishes, and the wine in two silver cups — on a table spread with a white linen cloth. From twenty-five to thirty communicants approach the table at a time. The officiating minister makes a free prayer, and then, while repeating the words of institution, presents the elements to his neighbors on the left and on the right, after which the dish and the cup pass from hand to hand. With various modifications this type has been adopted by all the Reformed churches. In no church, however, is the imitation of the ancient form of the communion so close as in the Church of England. In the United Church of Prussia the form adopted is a combination of the Lutheran and the Calvinistic type. The Quakers do not celebrate the Lord's Supper at all.

The mode of administration in non-Episcopal churches in America is almost uniform. The elements are consecrated by prayer by the minister, who breaks as much bread, and pours out as much wine, as he deems sufficient. He repeats in the vernacular the words of institution used by our Lord, and then hands the elements for distribution to the proper persons, who serve him first. The communicants sit in pews. It is usual to make an address between the distribution of the bread and the wine. As in the Church of England, so in her daughter the Episcopal Church in America, in the Methodist-Episcopal Church, and also in many Lutheran churches, the communicants kneel at the chancel-railing in little companies; and to each one, in turn, a certain formula is spoken, as first the bread, and then the wine, is dispensed. In the German Reformed Church they stand. The Friends spiritualize both baptism and the Lord's Supper, and therefore have no such outward ordinances. Various terms are used to designate the Lord's Supper, such as Eucharist, Communion, Holy Communion, Blessed Sacrament, etc.

LORETO, or LORETTO (Lauretum), a town to the south-east of Ancona, the chief seat of the Italian Mary-worship, and not inappropriately called the "Mecca of mediæval Christendom." The legend referred to below seems to have originated towards the close of the period of the crusades, and in close connection with the final destruction of the kingdom of Jerusalem by the Turks. It first occurs in Italia illustrata, by Flavius Blondus, papal secretary (d. in 1461); but in its fully developed form it is not found until about a century later on, in Baptista Mantuanus: Redemptoris mundi Matris Ecclesie Lauretana historia, in his Op. omnia, Antwerp, 1576, iv. 216. Properly speaking, the casa santa is not the whole house of Mary, but only that room in the house in Nazareth in which she was born herself, and in which Jesus was educated. By the apostles the room was transformed into a church, and St. Luke adorned it with a wooden statue representing the Virgin with the child. As long as the kingdom of Jerusalem existed, service was regularly celebrated in the church every Sunday; but, after its overthrow by the Turks, the angels carried away the church through the air, and deposited it (1291) at Tersato, in Northern Dalmatia. Three years later on (1294) it was again moved by the angels across the Adriatic, and placed where it now stands, in a wood belonging to a noble and pious lady, Laureta. It did not become the noted place of pilgrimage, however, until the second half of the fifteenth century. Sixtus IV. confirmed the truth of the legend by a bull of 1471; Clement VII. built the church over the casa santa; and Innocent XIII. instituted a special officium cum missa, in honor of the holy Virgin of Loreto. Innumerable and often immensely costly presents were offered by pious pilgrims. When Louis XIV. was born, his father, Louis XIII., presented the church with an angel of silver weighing three hundred and fifty-one pounds, and holding a child of gold weighing twenty-four pounds. On the occasion of the birth of the Pretender, James II. presented a still more costly statue,—a kneeling angel of gold. In 1798, however, the French plundered the church, and carried away the spoils; and Napoleon returned only a part of them in 1800. The first opposition to the legend and its practical consequences came from Vergerius, whose Della Camera e Statua della Madonna (Bologna, 1554) was translated into Latin under the characteristic title, De idolo Lauretano (Rome, 1556). An exhaustive criticism is found in CASAUBONUS: Exercitat. VII. ad Baronii Annales, 1615; [P. R. KENDRICK: The Holy House of Loreto, Phila.]. ZÖCKLER.

LORIMER, Peter, D.D., an English Presbyterian divine; was b. in Edinburgh, June 27, 1812, and d. at Whitehaven, July 28, 1879. He was the son of a master-builder who occupied a good position in that business in his native city. He received the elements of his education at George Heriot's Hospital, an institution originally founded, in the reign of James VI., for the maintenance and "upbringing" of the sons of decayed burgesses, but in more recent times, with largely increased revenues, placed, in many ways, on a much wider basis than was contemplated by its founder. With a bursary of thirty pounds per annum, he proceeded from the hospital to Edinburgh University. Here he passed through the classes of the art's curriculum with much credit, and also took his theological course as a student of divinity; the professor of divinity at the time being the celebrated Dr. Thomas Chalmers, to whom, as a teacher, Dr. Lorimer always acknowledged the highest obligations. In the year 1836 he was ordained as minister of the Presbyterian Church, Prince's Terrace, London, in connection with the Established Church of Scotland. In 1843, he, along with his congregation, broke up his connection with the Scottish Church, casting in his lot with the large and important body which has been since known as the "Free Church of Scotland," and to which he ever afterwards continued to be warmly attached. In the year 1845, a theological college having been established in London by the English Presbyterian Church, Dr. Lorimer was appointed one of its professors, the chair assigned to him being that of Hebrew, and biblical criticism; and in 1878 he was made principal of the college. In 1857 he had the honor to receive the degree of D.D. from Princeton College, United States. To the world generally, Dr. Lorimer is chiefly known by works in connection with church history, a branch of study which had always possessed for him peculiar attractions, and in which, by his original researches, combined with his power of popular exposition, he has gained an honorable name in English literature.

The following is a list of the principal of Dr. Lorimer's writings hitherto published; an additional but posthumous work, The Precursors of Knox, being, however, now [1882] in the press: Life of Patrick Hamilton, Edin., 1857; The Scottish Reformation, an Historical Sketch, Lond., 1860; John Knox and the Church of England, Lond., 1875; and a translation, with valuable notes, of the first volume (the personal history of Wiclif) of G. LECHLER'S John Wiclif, Lond., 1878, 2 vols.; new edition, 1882, in 1 vol. WILLIAM LEE.

LÖSCHER, Valentin Ernst, b. at Sondershausen, Dec. 29, 1673; d. in Dresden, 1749. He studied theology at Wittenberg; visited Holland and Denmark, and was appointed superintendent of Jüterbog in 1698, superintendent of Delitzsch in 1701, professor at Wittenberg in 1707, and pastor at the Kreuzkirche in Dresden, in 1709. In 1701 he founded the first theological periodical, Unschuldige Nachrichten von alten und neuen theologischen Sachen, which succeeded so well, that, after the lapse of a few years, he became the acknowledged leader of the orthodox party in its contest with the Pietists. The first conflict arose from the favor with which the Pietists met the attempts of the Prussian Government to unite the Lutherans and the Reformed into a common church, with a common confession. Löscher made the attack in his Adresse (1703), which he followed up with his Historie der ersten Religionsmotuum (1704), and Ausführliche Historia motuum (1708). In 1706, however, the Pietists gave up their merely defensive attitude; and Joachim Lange attacked the orthodox in his Aufrichtige Nachrichten. Löscher answered with his Prænotiones et Notiones Theologicæ (1707) and Timotheus Verinus, his chief work, of which the first part appeared in 1718, and the second in 1722. The controversy was not only protracted, but also, at least from the side of the Pietists, exceedingly bitter and coarse. A disputation arranged at Merseburg, May 10, 1719, led to nothing; but peace finally resulted from the growing power of rationalism, which weakened Pietism, and almost obliterated orthodoxy. Löscher was its last prominent representative. See his biography by ENGELHARDT, Stuttgart, 1856. M. VON ENGELHARDT.

LOT (a covering), the son of Haran, and nephew of Abraham; accompanied his uncle from Ur to Canaan and Egypt, and back to Canaan. There the size of their respective flocks and herds gave rise to constant strife among their herdsmen; and so Abraham and Lot, on the suggestion of the former, peacefully parted. Lot went forth in the Jordan valley, attracted by the apparent richness of the country. He lived in Sodom, there brought up his family, and allowed his daughters to marry among the inhabitants. On one occasion the city was attacked by Chedorlaomer; and Lot was carried away captive, but rescued and restored by Abraham. The moral status of the Sodomites is amply illustrated by the story of the visit of the angels thither, and our word "Sodomy." Lot was personally pure (2 Pet. ii. 7, 8). At length the wrath of God against the cities of the plain could no longer be repressed. Abraham, on being warned of the approaching disaster, pleaded with God for them; but they did not contain the requisite ten righteous persons (Gen. xviii. 32). Two angels warned Lot also, who obeyed, but was unable to induce his sons-in-law to flee. The Lord rained brimstone and fire upon Sodom and Gomorrah and all the cities of the plain. Lot's wife, on looking back, contrary to the express command of the angels, became "a pillar of salt." (No faith is to be put in the identifications.) From Sodom, Lot fled to Zoar, and thence to a cave in "the mountain." Anxiety to preserve seed of their father was the excuse for the incest which his two daughters committed with Lot while overcome by wine. In this way the ancestors of the Moabites and Ammonites respectively were born.

In the narrative we have not legend, but family traditional history. The picture presented is true to life and to the times. The destruction of the cities of the plain was due to natural causes, and made so profound an impression, that not only do the Bible writers often allude to it (Deut. xxix. 23; Isa. i. 9; Jer. xx. 16; Lam. iv. 6; Hos. xi. 8; Amos iv. 11), but also Strabo and Tacitus (Hist., v. 7). The Dead Sea is called by the Arabs to-day Bahr Lut ("the Sea of Lot"). For further particulars of the event and the region, see PALÆSTINE, SALT SEA, SODOM. VON ORELLI.

LOT, The Use of the, among the Hebrews.

The name for "lot" is לוֹט, which literally means "little stone," in reference to the different colored stones one used to throw to obtain the divine decision of the question. Faith in a special providence underlay the practice. The decision of the lot was ordered of God. The following classes of cases in which it was resorted to are recorded in the Bible: 1. Partitions.—(a) That of the land of Israel (Num. xxvi. 55; Josh. xviii. 10). According to Jewish tradition, the process was carried on by means of two urns, in one of which were the names of the different families of the Israelites, in the other the lots, upon which the portions of territory were described. Presiding over the drawing was the high priest, with urim and thummim. (b) That of the cities for the Levites (Josh. xxi. 4 sqq.). (c) That of the families returned from the exile, so that one in ten might dwell in Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 1). (d) That of the spoil, also of the prisoners, and of the clothing of condemned persons among the executioners (Joel iii. 3; Obad. 11; Nah. iii. 10; Matt. xxvii. 35; John xix. 23). 2. Selection of Persons.—(a) The choice of men for an invading force (Judg. xx. 9). (b) The choice of a person to fill an office,—Saul (1 Sam. x. 19-21), Matthias (Acts i. 26); but these were quite exceptional cases. (c) The choice of priests to fill the twenty-four courses, and perform various duties (1 Chron. xxiv. 5; Luke i. 9; Neh. x. 34 sqq.). (d) The choice of the scapegoat on the Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 8). 3. The Decision of Doubtful Questions (Josh. vii. 14 sqq.; 1 Sam. xiv. 41 sq.; Prov. xvi. 33, xviii. 18). The lot was either thrown from an urn, or from the bosom of the outer upper garment.

The Bible also records the use of the lot among non-Jewish persons; e.g., Haman, to decide the best day for the destruction of the Jews (Esth. iii. 7), and the sailors of Jonah's vessel, to determine who was responsible for the storm (Jon. i. 7). See URIM AND THUMMIM.

LEYRER.

LOTZE, Hermann Rudolf, a prominent leader in the battle against modern materialism; was b. at Bautzen, May 21, 1817; devoted himself at Leipzig University to medical science, natural philosophy, and metaphysics; was there, in 1843, appointed professor of mental philosophy; followed in 1844, in the same capacity, a call to Göttingen, and in the spring of 1881 to Berlin, where he died July 1 of the same year. When Lotze began his public career, the enthusiasm in favor of Hegelian ideological Pantheism, which held sway over the educated minds in Germany for a long series of years, had passed its acme, and Materialism (Charles Vogt, Moleschott, Büchner) began to have controlling influence with scientists. There were some eminent representatives of theistic views (e.g., Charles Philip Fischer, J. H. Fichte, jun., H. Weisse, Ulrich), whose critical attacks against Hegel were not without some influence, especially since Neo-Schellingianism on the one hand, and Herbart's sober realism on the other, gave them support. Of these theists Weisse met, more than others, with the sympathies of Lotze, who emphatically declared himself against Hegel's Pantheism, and no less against Materialism, then becoming rampant in Germany. No one was better equipped than Lotze to demonstrate the lack of sober, solid reasoning in the positions of Materialism; since no one German scientist mastered better than he did the whole domain of natural science, and no one surpassed his critical acumen and the imperturbable equilibrium of his judgment. No philosopher had a clearer conception, and spoke with more modesty, of the limits of our mental faculties and knowledge. Acknowledging the impossibility of a demonstrative proof of the existence of God, he humbly professes his belief in God as the living centre of the universe, whose life-functions produce continually all the phenomena of the visible and invisible, physical and psychical world. To think that this cosmos should be a purposeless existence without a great aim, a moral end, — viz., to actualize that which is absolutely good and rational, — is, according to Lotze, perfectly irrational. This he holds fast, though he confesses that we do not know what God's own nature is; how those two forms of existence, the material and the psychical (mental, spiritual, feeling and conscious personality), proceed from one and the same source; wherein the real difference exists between those two diverging sides of the cosmos; why there is in this world moral evil and suffering, which, as it seems, is the indispensable concomitant of life. To be enabled to solve these problems we ought to be in the very centre of the cosmos, so as fully to understand its universal plan. This is, however, not our position. We can, consequently, not pretend to establish a philosophic system which would totally, and in an all-comprehensive manner, square with the whole plan and all the facts and phenomena of the universe. It is apparent that this modest and honest "agnosticism" of Lotze has nothing in common with the atheistic and materialistic system of this name now prevailing in some parts of the civilized world. Lotze's whole conception of the universe is essentially ethical. The ethical principle is to him the starting-point, also, for all metaphysics; and he fully acknowledges it as the excellency of Christianity (Microcosmos, vol. iii.). The catalogue of his most prominent (as yet untranslated) publications shows the wide range of his investigations. Metaphysics, 1841 (again, as the second part of the System of Philosophy, 1879); General Pathology and Therapy as Mechanical Natural Sciences, 1842; Logic, 1843 (and again, as first part of the System of Philosophy, 1874); Essay on the Idea of the Beautiful in Art, 1846; On the Conditions of Artistic Beauty, 1848; General Physiology of Corporeal Life, 1851; Medical Psychology, 1852; Microcosmos, Thoughts bearing upon Nat. Phil. and the Hist. of the Human Race, 3 vols., 1856-64; Hist. of Aesthetics in Germany, 1868. See E. PFLEIDERER: Lotze's philosoph. Weltanschauung nach ihren Grundzügen z. Erinnerung an d. Verstorbenen, Berlin, 1882. 81 pp. LOTZE'S Grundzüge der Religions-philosophie was posthumously published (1882).

W. J. MANN.

LOUIS, ST., Louis IX., King of France (Nov. 15, 1226-Aug. 25, 1270), was only eleven years old when his father died. During his minority, his mother, Blanche of Castile, governed the realm. When he was twenty years old, he assumed the government himself; and as he opened his reign with a crusade, — the unfortunate campaign in Egypt, where he was taken prisoner, — so he also closed it with a crusade, — the still more unfortunate campaign in Tunis, where he died of the plague. He was a man of genuine piety; though his piety was of a strongly pronounced mediæval type, ascetic and intolerant. His daily devotions were frequent, long, and strictly observed: on the days of the great Christian festivals he wore hair-cloth, and went barefooted; Wednesday and Friday he refrained from laughing; when he adored the cross, he prostrated himself on the ground before it, etc., but he looked on with composure while the Cathari were tortured. In the Établissements de St. Louis he acknowledged that heretics ought to be punished with death. By an ordinance he cancelled one-third of the debt which his Christian subjects owed to the Jews, etc. He was also credulous and superstitious. At one time he bought the crown of thorns for a million and a half francs; at another, he bought the true cross, and placed it, with many singular ceremonies, in the Church of Notre Dame, in Paris. Nevertheless, he was not the slave of the Pope or of the clergy. The authenticity of the famous Pragmatic Sanction of 1269 is questionable; but, whether or not he ever formulated those articles, he certainly carried them out in practice. The liberties and privileges of the Gallican Church he vindicated against the encroachments of the Pope with great vigor and unswerving decision; and he forbade the Roman curia to levy money in France, under any pretence, without his consent. In the same spirit he defended the laity against the clergy. He wholly exempted laymen from ecclesiastical jurisdiction in civil affairs; and such ecclesiastical judges as attempted, by means of excommunication, to compel laymen to bring also their civil suits before the ecclesiastical court, he compelled to cancel the excommunication by confiscating their revenues. A petition from the French bishop, to give their excommunications more effect by confiscating the property of the excommunicated, he absolutely refused to listen to. In general, it may be said, that, however narrow and unsound his piety was in many of its more personal utterances, its influence on his policy was, in all its great traits, most beneficent; and he is one of the very few truly Christian characters who have ever sat on a throne. He was canonized by Boniface VIII. in 1297. See LE NAIN DE TILLEMONT: Histoire de St. Louis, which also gives a list of the very rich contemporary sources to his life; and GUIZOT: Histoire des quatre grands Chrétiens Français, Paris, 1873, 2 vols.; VERDIÈRE: La monarchie chrétienne de St. Louis entre la papauté et le césarisme, Lyon, 1876; II. WALLON: St. Louis, Tours, 1878; V. VERLAQUE: St. Louis, Paris, 1885.

LOVE, one of the most weighty, comprehensive, and universal of conceptions, having basal value in philosophy, ethics, and theology, and extending through all lands and times. It is that relation between persons, in which the personality of the one is lost in the other, in which each esteems the other better than himself (Phil. ii. 3), and all selfishness vanishes. Love is, therefore, much more than inclination or liking: it is, however, rarely found in completion. In this article we consider, —

1. Love as the Essence of God. — John says, "God is love" (1 John iv. 16), a sentence which is not a definition of the essence of God, but a statement of his feelings toward us. At the same time, the words open a profitable field of speculation in regard to the part love holds in the divine constitution. Augustine first, Richard of St. Victor next, and, after him, others, have endeavored to reconstruct the Trinity by the principle of love: thus, the Father loves the Son, and the Son loves the Father (redamando); both loves are united in love for an object of common affection (condilectio), that is, in the Holy Spirit. But the attempt has been unsuccessful; for the Holy Spirit is more than a product, it is a factor of the divine love; and besides, in the proposed scheme, the persons of the Godhead are not sufficiently distinguished. But it is undoubtedly true that love is a large element of the divine essence; and the later theologians, as, for instance, Dörner, in discussing the problem of the Trinity, give it much space.

2. Love as Principle in Creation. — God created the world in order that he might have a field for the exercise of his love; not that the world was necessary in any way; but it delighted him to make the world, and fill it with creatures whom he could love.

3. Love as Principle in Redemption. — God so loved the world, that he sent his Son to die for it (John iii. 16). The Son, out of his free, divine love, laid down his life for our salvation (Matt. xx. 28). God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself (2 Cor. v. 19); and this love of God in Christ is the only and exclusive ground of our salvation and of our sanctification (Acts iv. 12).

4. Love as Principle in Virtue. — Love is the source and centre of the development of the new life in Christ. Our Lord set his approval upon the Mosaic summary of the law in the form of love to God and man (Matt. xxii. 37 sq.; comp. Deut. vi. 5; Lev. xix. 18), and gave his followers the "new commandment," that they should love one another (John xiii. 31). Paul calls love "the fulfilling of the law" (Rom. xiii. 10), and "the end of the commandment" (1 Tim. i. 5); Peter exhorts to love as the fruit of the holy living (1 Pet. i. 22; 2 Pet. i. 8); John is particularly full upon love (1 John ii. 5, iv. 7, 8); and James calls love of our neighbors "the royal law" (ii. 5, 8).

5. Phenomena of Love. Love manifests itself in the two great directions, — toward God and toward our neighbor, or in the contemplative and in the practical form; the former seen in Mary of Bethany, the latter in her sister Martha (Luke x. 38–42). Our Lord gave his preference to the former. It shows itself in prayer, meditation, worship, and in the communion. The practical, on the other hand, shows itself in all works of benevolence and beneficence, far and near. It is incumbent upon the Christian to unite the two. The hardest burden our Lord lays upon his disciples is to love their enemies (Matt. v. 44). Among human relationships controlled by love, marriage occupies the first place (Eph. v. 21 sqq.). It is noticeable that the apostle who put conjugal love in the closest parallel to the "great mystery" of the love between Christ and the Church spoke slightly of conjugal life (1 Cor. vii. 1, 40).

6. Mockeries of Love. — True love can only exist between human beings: therefore, to speak of love for animals, or of love for a thing, is to use improper language. Self-love is an inaccurate but indispensable term. To love ourselves somewhat is indeed necessary: it is the measure of our love for our neighbors. What passes for love in literature, novels, and on the stage, is too commonly mere sexual longing. Even in religious talk and pictures do we find this debasement of the word [as in the really sensual expressions of affection for Jesus, and in those representations which are so derogatory to the Saviour of the World]. That so-called "love" which leads a parent or guardian to refrain from punishing a child because it would give pain, and all such like indulgences, does not deserve the name. Love for gold, and love for the world, are perversions of love, to its destruction. KARL BURGER.

LOVE, Christopher, b. Cardiff, in Glamorganshire, 1618; educated at New Inn Hall, Oxford, 1635. After taking the master's degree he was obliged to leave Oxford for refusing to subscribe Archbishop Laud's canons. He went to London, and became domestic chaplain to the sheriff, and took a bold stand against the errors of the Book of Common Prayer and the religious tyranny of the times. He was cast into prison on account of an aggressive sermon at Newcastle, and in various ways persecuted in London. At the outbreak of the civil war he was made preacher to the garrison of Windsor Castle, where he gave great offence to the prelatial party by his pointed utterances. He was one of the first to receive presbyterial ordination under the new organization in Jan. 23, 1644, at Aldermanbury, London; and became pastor of St. Laurence Jewry in London, where he was highly esteemed for the eloquence and vigor of his preaching. He was a stroug Presbyterian, the leader of the younger men of that party. In this way he became involved in treasonable correspondence with the Presbyterians of Scotland to restore Charles II.; and, with many others, was arrested May 7, 1651, and chosen to make an example of, to check the Presbyterian agitation against Cromwell and in favor of Charles II. He was condemned, and beheaded on Tower Hill, Aug. 22, 1651. This excited the indignation and wrath of the entire Presbyterian party, which had petitioned, by ministerial bodies and parishes, in vain for his pardon. He went to his death as their hero and martyr. His funeral sermon was preached by Thomas Manton to an immense sympathizing audience. His sermons were published, after his death, under the auspices of the leading Presbyterians of London. The most important of his works are Grace, the Truth and Growth, and different Degrees thereof, 226 pp., London, 1652; Heaven's Glory, Hell's Terror, 350 pp., 1653; Combat between the Flesh and the Spirit, 292 pp., 1654; Treatise of Effectual Calling, 218 pp., 1658; The Naturall Man's Case stated, 8vo, 280 pp., 1658; Select Works, 8vo, Glasgow, 1806-07, 2 vols.

C. A. BRIGGS.

LOW CHURCH is a designation of a school and party in the Church of England and the Episcopal Church of the United States, which in the departments of the sacraments, church government, and ecclesiastical ritual, clings firmly to the principles for which the English Reformers contended. In contrast to the school known as the "High Church," it emphasizes justification by faith, denies the doctrine of baptismal regeneration, and holds the Calvinistic (or Zwinglian) doctrine of the Lord's Supper, deprecating all approach to the so-called "Catholic," or high sacramentarian view. In the department of ecclesiastical polity it disregards the doctrine of apostolical succession, and, while it insists upon the Episcopal as the best form of government, denies that episcopacy is necessary to the being of the Church. In matters of ritual it is more moderate, and excludes as innovations those advanced practices — such as elevating the host, facing the east in prayer, the use of candles, etc. — which come under the general designation of ritualistic.

The views of the Low-Church school are the views of the English Reformers and the bishops, almost without an exception, of the Elizabethan period, — Jewel, Grindal, Parkhurst, etc. In the seventeenth century it was represented by such men as Bishop Stillington (d. 1699), and in the eighteenth by Bishop Hoadly (d. 1761), and included the evangelicals, led by Willerforce, whose eminent and devout labors contributed so much to the revival of piety in England, the establishment of missionary organizations, and the promotion of moral reforms. The extreme High Church and ritualistic tendencies were first advocated by Abp. Laud (1633-15). In the present century, the same opinions have spread rapidly, and assumed an extreme form in the so-called Oxford or Tractarian movement, led by Keble, Pusey, and John Henry Newman. But the Low-Church party has included such men as the brothers Hare, Dr. Arnold, Dean Alford, Dr. Lightfoot (bishop of Durham), Dean Payne Smith of Canterbury, Canon F. W. Farrar, Canon Westcott, Dean Howson, etc. But some of these are also counted as Broad-Churchmen. The late archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Tait, was generally accounted a liberal Low-Churchman. In the Episcopal Church of the United States the relative influence of the Low-Church party has declined since the death of Bishops Johns of Virginia, Melvaine of Ohio, and other prominent leaders. See HIGH CHURCH, LATITUDINARIANS, and BLUNT: Dictionary of Sects, etc.

LOWDER, Charles Fuge, vicar of St. Peter's, London Docks; b. at Bath, June 22, 1820; d. at Zell-am-See, Austria, Sept. 9, 1880. He was educated at King's College, London, and at Oxford, where he took his degree, 1843. He was ordained deacon, Sept. 24, 1843, and became a curate at Walton-cum-Street, near Glastonbury; was ordained priest, Dec. 22, 1844; resigned his curacy, and became chaplain to the Axbridge Workhouse; then moved to Tetbury as senior curate, autumn of 1845. In 1851 he came to London as curate at St. Barnabas. There he was called upon to fight in behalf of certain ritualistic changes. In 1856 he began, not only the most important work of his life, but what was really his life-work, for which all his previous experiences were preparatory, — he headed the mission to St. George's-in-the-East. On June 30, 1866, St. Peter's Church, London Docks, was consecrated; and he became first vicar of the new parish of St. Peter's-in-the-East, constructed out of his former one, and until his death he labored faithfully at this post.

The scene of Mr. Lowder's labors was in East London, in the neighborhood of the Great Docks. The people living there were the worst imaginable. He deliberately put himself in direct contact with their far worse than heathen darkness and degradation; for he yearned over those poor, besotted souls, and did his utmost, during four and twenty years, to carry to them the pure and elevating gospel of Jesus Christ. The measures he adopted were severely criticised. The very people for whom he would have gladly died, rose in rebellion against the "popery," as they called it, of his ritualistic services. It is true he was a ritualist. He called himself a "priest of the Catholic Church." He conducted services with ritualistic additions of crosses, colored vestments, lights, etc.; he heard confessions, granted absolution, and was generally addressed and spoken of as "Father Lowder." In dress, mode of living, general style of theological thought, he resembled a Roman-Catholic priest. He had bound himself by vows of celibacy and poverty. He centred his attention upon the church; but he was not a Roman Catholic, for he yielded no allegiance to the Pope, nor adored the Virgin Mary. He strained every nerve to benefit his parishioners, to educate them, to cure them of their vices; and he succeeded. Like the river in Ezekiel's vision, everywhere his influence went, life sprang up. He lived among blackguards of every description, — thieves, drunkards, prostitutes, — the very scum of London, the most debased population in the world. But he was there to do them good, to teach them the way to God; and the numbers whom he reclaimed, and the even greater numbers, probably, whom he restrained from sin, testify to the power of his influence. His "ritualism" becomes a matter of small consequence in view of the results of his work, for he saved a multitude of souls. When his remains were brought to London, they were received with extraordinary marks of respect. His funeral was attended by three thousand persons who mourned him as a faithful and beloved friend. "No such funeral has been seen in London in modern times." See Charles Lowder: a Biography (anonymous), Lond., 1882; 3d ed., same year. SAMUEL M. JACKSON.

LOWELL, John, founder of the Lowell Institute; b. in Boston, May 11, 1799; d. in Bombay, India, March 4, 1836. He studied for two years at Harvard College; but ill health prevented his graduation, and the greater part of his mature life was spent in travel. He left two hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the maintenance in Boston of annual courses of free public lectures upon religion, science, literature, and the arts. The Lowell Institute, as it is called, went into operation in the winter of 1839-40.

LOWMAN, Moses, a dissenting divine; b. in London, 1680; d. there (in Clapham, Surrey) May 3, 1752. He published several estimable works, — An Argument from Prophecy in Proof that Jesus is the Messiah, 1733; A Paraphrase and Notes on the Revelation of St. John, 1737, 2d ed., 1745, new edition, 1807 (this work is now incorporated with Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby's Commentary); A Dissertation on the Civil Government of the Hebrews, 1740; A Rational of the Ritual of the Hebrew Worship, 1748 (new edition, 1818).

LOW-SUNDAY, the first Sunday after Easter, so called because formerly some portion of the great festival of Easter was repeated upon it; hence it was a feast of a lower degree than Easter.

LOWTH, Robert, D.D., F.R.S., b. at Winchester, Nov. 27, 1710; d. at Fulham, Nov. 3, 1787. He was graduated at Oxford, 1734; took orders; was successively fellow of New College, professor of poetry (1741), archdeacon of Winchester (1750), rector of Woodhay (1753), prebendary of Durham, and rector of Sedgfield (1755), bishop of St. David's (1766), of Oxford (1766), and of London (1777). In 1783, on the death of Dr. Cornwallis, George III. offered him the archbishopric of Canterbury; but he declined it on account of his years and family afflictions, he having just lost his second daughter. Bishop Lowth attained permanent fame by two works.

(1) De sacra poesi Hebræorum prælectiones academicæ Oxoniæ habitæ, Oxford, 1753, 2d ed., 1763, 3d ed., 1775, 4th ed., 1787; edited with notes by J. D. Michaelis, Göttingen, 1758-62, 2d ed., 1769-70, 2 vols.; reprinted edition with additional notes by E. F. K. Rosenmüller, and excursus by K. F. Richter and Ch. Weiss, Leipzig, 1815 (the notes of Michaelis were printed as a supplementary volume by the second and subsequent editions of the original; Rosenmüller's edition was reprinted, Oxford, 1821); English translation by G. Gregory, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (with the principal notes of Michaelis), London, 1787, 2d ed., 1816, 2 vols., 3d ed., 1835, 1 vol., 5th ed., 1847; American edition by Calvin E. Stowe, Andover, 1829; French translations, Le- çons de la poésie sacrée des Hébreux, Lyons, 1812, 2 vols.; Cours de poésie sacrée (abridged), Paris, 1812, 2 vols. These bibliographical details suffice to show the popularity of the work. It is, indeed, the most complete work upon the subject. The most damaging criticism brought against it is that Lowth attempts the impossible, — to bring Hebrew poetry under the categories of the classical variety. (See art. HEBREW POETRY). (2) Isaiah: A New [metrical] Translation, with a Preliminary Dissertation, Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory, London, 1778, 13th ed., 1842; American edition from tenth English edition, Boston, 1834; German translation by Professor J. B. Koppe, Leipzig, 1779. Lowth's translation is generally much admired, but in the judgment of some critics he alters the Hebrew text unduly. Besides these two great works, he wrote a Life of William of Wykeham (London, 1758, 2d ed., 1759), and several pamphlets. His Sermons and other Remains were first collected and edited, with an introductory memoir, by Rev. Peter Hall, London, 1834. Previously there had appeared anonymously Memoirs of the Life and Writings of the late Bishop Lowth, London and Göttingen, 1787.

LOWTH, William, D.D., father of the preceding; b. at London, Sept. 11, 1661; d. at Buriton, Hampshire, May 17, 1732. He was graduated at Oxford, 1683; and became chaplain to Dr. Mew, bishop of Winchester, who made him a prebendary of Winchester, 1696, and rector of Buriton and Petersfield, 1699. His own works were few in number, but weighty in value: A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testament, in Answer to [Le Clerc's] Five Letters, Oxford, 1692, 3d ed., 1821 (this brought him into notice); Directions for the Profitable Reading of the Holy Scriptures, London, 1708, 7th ed., 1799; but his principal work was a Commentary on the Prophets, London, 1714-23, 4 vols., afterwards collected in one folio volume, and incorporated with Bishop Patrick's Commentary, and frequently reprinted, in that connection, under the caption, Patrick, Lowth, and Whitby's Commentary. Dr. Lowth was the efficient assistant upon several works which pass under other names, such as Dr. POTTER's edition of Clemens Alexandrinus, Oxford, 1715, 2 vols., enlarged edition, Venice, 1757, 2 vols.; HUDSON's Josephus, Oxford, 1720, 2 vols.; READING's Historia Ecclesiastica, Cambridge, 1720, 3 vols. (reprinted Turin, 1748). A Life of Dr. Lowth will be found in the seventh edition of his Directions, etc.

LOYOLA. See IGNATIUS LOYOLA.

LUCIAN THE MARTYR was born at Samosata about the middle of the third century, and educated at Edessa, whose school, next to that of Alexandria, was the most flourishing one in Christendom, and numbered such men as Macarius and Bardesanes among its teachers. He afterwards settled at Antioch, and became the founder of a celebrated school of exegetes. Eusebius of Nicomedia, Maris of Chalcedon, Theognis of Nicæa, Leontius of Antioch, Antonius of Tarsus, Asterius of Cappadocia, and Arius, were among his pupils. Forming a transition between Paul of Samosata and Arius, he lived for a long time (275-303) without communion with the orthodox church of Antioch. Late in his life, however, he seems to have been reconciled with the church; and he died a martyr during the persecution of Maximinus. Of his works, Eusebius mentions none; but his peculiar position as father of Arianism was, of course, sufficient reason for Eusebius to throw a veil of obscurity around him. Jerome mentions his recension of the Bible-text, his De Fide, and some letters, to which must be added the apologetical oration communicated by Rufinus. His recension of the Bible-text was used in the whole western part of the Byzantine Empire, from Antioch to Constantinople; while that of Hesychius was used in Alexandria and Egypt; and that of Origen, in Syria and Palestine. Of his recension of the New-Testament text, Jerome speaks disparagingly, and it was forbidden by the Decretum Gelasianum. Of that of the Septuagint, Jerome speaks in better terms; and a tolerably distinct idea may be formed of its character and method. Of the De Fide and the letters, some very slight traces are left, but nothing of his exegetical labors. In the apologetical oration the doctrinal system of Arianism is visible.

ADOLF HARNACK.

LUCIAN OF SAMOSATA flourished during the second half of the second century, but the exact dates of his birth and death are not known. He was born at Samosata on the Euphrates; studied first law, and began to practise at Antioch, then rhetoric, after which he made a professional tour through the empire, visiting Rome several times, Southern Gaul, Thessalonica, Olympia, etc., and returned to Syria in middle life rich and famous. Later on, probably because his money was gone, he made a second starring-tour as rhetorician; and finally he obtained an office in the civil service in Egypt, where he died. The period of his authorship falls principally between his two great travels and after his acquaintance with the Athenian philosopher Demonax (about 165), which led him into a systematic opposition to all religion and philosophy. That of his works which alone interests us here is his Peregrinus Proteus, in which he represents his hero as having been a Christian for some time of his life.

It is apparent, that, during the second part of the second century, the educated part of the Roman society took only a very slight interest in Christianity. Celsus wrote against it; Fronto is also said to have written against it; but Marcus Aurelius, Epictetus, Galen, the rhetorician Aristides, only mention it passingly. To this rule Lucian is no exception. Though the criticism of the respective chapter of his Peregrinus Proteus has run through the whole scale of possible judgments, from the Tridentine Council, which put the book on its Index as the work of a Satanic fiend, to Mr. Kestner, who believed he had discovered a secret Christian in the author, the chapter, when allowed to speak for itself, is neither more nor less than a simple historical testimony to a simple historical fact, representing the Christians, not as impostors, or criminals, or revolutionists, but as blindly believing enthusiasts, ready to make any sacrifice for the weal of their community; that is, just such as they at that moment appeared to the eyes of the indifferent.

Complete Eng. trans. of Lucian by DRYDEN, London, 1711, 4 vols. [German trans. by Fischer, 2d ed., Berlin, 1881 sqq.] See BERNAY: Lucian u. d. Kyniker, 1879; J. M. COTTEBILL: Peregrinus Proteus, Edinburgh, 1879. ADOLF HARNACK.

LUCIDUS, a presbyter who played a prominent part in that controversy between Augustinism and semi-Pelagianism which in the fifth century took place in Gaul. The semi-Pelagians were in the ascendancy, both on account of their number, and because their doctrines were recognized by the Church; and their representative, Faustus Rejensis, compelled Lucidus to recant (about 475). Both Fausti Rejensis epistola ad Lucidum and Lucidi errorem emendantis libellus are found in MANSI, Conciliorum Collectio, vii., and in Bibl. Patr., iv.; and it is evident that Lucidus actually carried the ideas of Augustine to a dangerous extreme.

LUCIFER (light-giver), a term applied by Isaiah to the king of Babylon (Isa. xiv. 12), and not occurring elsewhere in the Bible. It indicates the king's glory as that of "a sun of the morning," a morning-star. Tertullian and others have, it would seem without sufficient warrant, applied the term to Satan; and this is now the common acceptance.

LUCIFER and the LUCIFERIANS. When Constantius, at the synod of Arles (353), succeeded in carrying through the condemnation of Athanasius, Bishop Lucifer of Cagliari in Sardinia (Caralis, or Caraliianus, or Calaris), one of the most ardent champions of the Confession of Nicæa and the cause of Athanasius, immediately repaired to Rome, and was thence sent to the imperial court at Arles, together with the presbyter Pancratius and the deacon Hilarius, in order to demand the convention of an impartial council. But the Council of Milan (355) was far from being impartial. The condemnation of Athanasius was confirmed, and Lucifer was banished. He lived first at Germanicia in Commagene, then at Eleutheropolis in Palestine, and finally at Thebais; and during those years of exile (355-361) he wrote a number of books full of the most violent invectives against the emperor, — De non parentis in deum delinquentibus; De regibus apostaticis; Pro Athanasio; De non conueniendo cum heret.; Morendum esse pro dei filio. After the death of Constantius and the accession of Julian, he was allowed to return to his see. He did not adopt, however, those milder views which the Council of Alexandria, under the presidency of Athanasius, decided upon, and according to which the bishops who had not openly sided with the Arians, but only yielded under the pressure of Constantius, should be forgiven and re-admitted. On the contrary, he demanded that all such bishops should be deposed and excommunicated, and all ecclesiastical acts performed by them — ordinations, consecrations, baptism, etc. — should be declared null and void. He found many adherents, not only in his own diocese, but everywhere in the church: Bishop Gregory of Elvira in Spain, the presbyter Bonosus in Treves, the schismatic Bishop Ephesus in Rome, Bishop Heraclides of Oxyrinchus in Egypt, and others. As the Luciferians considered themselves the true and pure church, they utterly repudiated the name of a sect; but they separated from the general church, and in some places, as, for instance, in Rome, they caused considerable trouble. They disappeared, however, in the course of half a century. Lucifer died at Cagliari, in 371. His works were first edited by I. Tilius, Paris, 1586, and afterwards often. They

LUCIUS is the name of three popes. — Lucius I. (June 25, 253–March 5, 254), the successor of Cornelius. The length of his reign varies, in the different sources, between eight months, ten days, and three years, eight months, ten days; but the former account is by far the more preferable (see LIPSIIUS: Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe, Kiel, 1869). From a letter by Cyprian (61, ed. Hartel), it appears that Lucius was banished for a short time; from another (68), that he wrote some letters concerning the reconciliation of the lapsi. — Lucius II. (March 12, 1144–Feb. 15, 1145). His short reign was much disturbed. A revolt took place in Rome under the leadership of Giordano Pierleone, who was declared patricius. A new senate was elected; and the Pope was asked to renounce all power and rights and privileges, except those belonging to a bishop of the primitive church. Lucius addressed himself to Conrad III. for aid, but in vain. He succeeded, however, in enlisting the Frangipani, the bitter enemies of the Pierleones, on his side; but he died before the issue of the contest was arrived at. See WATTERICH: Vite Pont. Rom., ii. 278–281; JAFFÉ: Regest. Pont., 610–615. — Lucius III. (Sept. 1, 1181–Nov. 25, 1185). He inherited from his predecessor, Alexander III., the bitter controversy with the Emperor Frederic I. concerning the estates of the Countess Mathilde. A compromise was proposed by the emperor, who offered to pay ten per cent of the revenues of the kingdom of Italy to the Pope, and other ten per cent to the cardinals, if the curia would renounce its claim on the estates. But the offer was not accepted. On the contrary, the Pope demanded the immediate surrender of the estates; which the emperor could not comply with, without endangering the position of the empire in Central Italy. A personal interview was finally arranged, in 1184, between the emperor and the Pope, at Verona, where Lucius generally resided. But nothing came out of the interview, except a deeper irritation on both sides. Shortly before he died, Lucius solemnly forbade his successor ever to crown Frederic's son, Henry VI. LÜCKE, Gottfried Christian Friedrich, b. at Egelin, near Magdeburg, Aug. 24, 1791; b. at Göttingen, Feb. 14, 1855. He studied theology at Halle and Göttingen, began to lecture in the university of Berlin in 1816, and was appointed professor of theology at Bonn in 1818, and at Göttingen in 1827. He was a pupil and friend of Schleiermacher, and one of the ablest, commentators. He tried to occupy a middle position, avoiding all extremes; and, though he did not escape the difficulty inherent in his very position, — that of dissatisfying all extremists, radical as well as orthodox, — he vindicated himself with great personal gifts, and exercised considerable influence on the theology of his time. His principal work is his Commentary on the writings of St. John (Gospel, Epistles, and Apocalypse), 4 vols., 1820–32; twice revised and reprinted, 1840–56; [partly translated into English, Edinburgh, 1837]. He also wrote, Grundriss der LUD appears in the genealogical table of Gen. x. 22, as the fourth son of Shem, and was already (by Josephus: Arch. I, 6, 4) identified with the ancestor of the Lydians of Asia Minor. Though the Lydian language did not belong to the Shemitic group, it must be remembered that language is not the principle on which the genealogical table of Genesis proceeds; and from other sides it appears probable that there originally existed a close connection between the Lydians and the Assyrians, as Herodotus tells us (i. 7) that the first king of the Lydians was Agros, a son of Ninus, a son of Belus.

Different from the Shemitic Lud is the African Lud, who, in Gen. x. 13, appears as the first son of Mizraim. With this account agree the prophets. The Ludim are spoken of in Jer. xlvi. 9, as Egyptian mercenaries, together with Cush and Put; in Ezek. xxvii. 10, as mercenaries before Tyre, together with the Persians and Put; and in Isa. lxvi. 19, as archers from the most distant country. LUKE the evangelist, and author of the Acts of the Apostles. — I. THE MAN. The name Luke occurs only three times in the New Testament; and its bearer is spoken of by Paul as his "fellow-worker" (Philem. 24), his "companion" (2 Tim. iv. 11), and the "beloved physician" (Col. iv. 14). There can be no doubt that one and the same person is alluded to in these passages. From the Acts of the Apostles, whose author this Luke was, we learn further, that he was with Paul at Troas on his second missionary tour (52 A.D.), and accompanied him as far as Philippi (Acts xvi. 10 sqq.). Here he seems to have tarried till Paul met him again on his third missionary tour (58 A.D.), and took him with him to Caesarea and Jerusalem. Luke also accompanied Paul on his journey as a prisoner to Rome. With this circumstance the notices of his life in the New Testament conclude. Eusebius (H.E., 3, 4), Jerome (De vir. ill., 7), Theophylact, and others, speak of Antioch in Syria as his place of residence. The notices that he was one of the seventy disciples, or one of the two disciples whom Jesus met on the way to Emmaus, are at variance with the prologue of Luke's Gospel (i. 1-4). It cannot with certainty be determined whether he was a Jew or a Gentile; but the latter seems probable, as he seems to be distinguished by Paul from those who were of the circumcision (Col. iv. 11, 14). Jerome says he died at the age of eighty, at Patræ in Achaia, "and was buried at Constantinople, to which city his bones, and those of the apostle Andrew, were transferred in the twentieth year of Constantine" (De vir. ill., 7). Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. 3, adv. Jul., 1, 73) affirms that he died a martyr.

II. HIS WRITINGS. — The early Christian Church was unanimous in ascribing the third Gospel and the Acts of the Apostles to Luke as their author. Irenæus (Har. 3, 1) testifies, with reference to the Gospel, that Luke, as the companion of Paul, committed to writing the Gospel Paul communicated to him. Origen and Eusebius also agree in ascribing the Gospel to Luke; and Eusebius mentions that some thought Paul refers to Luke's Gospel when he speaks of "my gospel" (Rom. xvi. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 8). The Muratorian canon, in giving Luke, records the testimony of Tertullian and others, according to which Marcion made selections from Luke's Gospel, which he put together to form a new Gospel of his own. Luke's Gospel is also quoted by Justin Martyr and the Clementine Homilies. Papias, it is true, does not quote it; but this neglect cannot be regarded as a witness against the existence of the Gospel, especially when we remember that only a fragment of Papias remains.

The testimonies for the genuineness of the Acts are equally strong. It is first quoted in a letter of the congregation of Vienne and Lyons (Euseb., 5, 2). There are express references to it as the work of Luke, in Irenæus, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian, Jerome, and others. We have evidence that it was used in the year 170, and that, at the close of the century, it was regarded as canonical in Asia Minor, Gaul, Italy, Egypt, and North Africa.

Luke defines the purpose of his Gospel, in the prologue, to be, to confirm a certain Theophilus in the assurance of the trustworthiness of the things he had been instructed in. Was this prologue meant to include the Acts of the Apostles, as well as the Gospel? and had the author the definite plan of writing both works when he put his pen to the Gospel? This cannot by any means be affirmed with certainty. Luther thought the object of the Acts was to hold up before the world the great doctrine that we are all justified by faith, without the works of the law. Towards the end of the last century, Griesbach affirmed its purpose to be apologetic, — to vindicate Paul over against the Judaizing party. Schneckenburger, with his customary acuteness (Ueber d. Zweck d. App., 1841), carried this theory farther by emphasizing the difference between Peter and Paul. According to Baur and the Tübingen school, however, the Acts has a conciliatory aim. It was written by a representative of the Pauline school for the purpose of reconciling Pauline and Judaic Christianity. Both of these theories lack foundation. If the aim of the writer was to vindicate Paul, why did he direct his work to a Gentile (Theophilus), and to Gentile readers? Or, if it was to reconcile the Pauline and Judaic types of Christianity, how did the author come to lay so much stress upon the guilt of the Jews in rejecting Christ (Acts ii. 23), and the universal character of Christianity? Lekebush (D. Composition u. Entstehung d. App.), and Meyer in his Commentary, have fully shown up the untenableness of these theories.

The accepted view is the true one, that the author intended to write a history, and not an apologetical tract. He, no doubt, had a definite plan; but that he set out to write a party document cannot be made out. In the Gospel, Luke makes prominent, as none of the other Gospels do, the universal aim of Christianity; and in the Acts he confirms this idea from the historical progress of Christianity. The object of the Acts is to show how Christianity passed beyond the circle of the apostles, and became firmly established among the Gentile nations.

According to Luke's prologue, many had already written accounts of Christ's life. It also appears there, that Luke had examined these, and stood in a personal relation to the "eye-witnesses and ministers of the word" (Luke i. 2). Thus his sources were twofold, — the apostles and documentary records. In regard to the records, some have held that Luke had before him the present Gospel (or a prior Gospel) of Mark; others, the original Matthew, or both. Weiss, in his thorough and acute works on the Gospels, holds that an original Matthew (the λογια) existed before Mark; that our present Matthew followed, and finally Luke. Godet, in the course of his Commentary on Luke, tries to show its complete independence of both Matthew and Mark. But the notice in the prologue of Luke does not indicate what the records were which he used; and it would, at any rate, seem (Luke i. 1) that he had in mind more than two. The results of modern criticism go rather to confirm the old view, that the Gospel of Luke is older than Matthew and Mark.

The sources from which Luke drew for the Acts were, without doubt, (1) the personal reminiscences he got from Paul, Mark (Col. iv. 10, 11), Philip (Acts xxi. 8), and others (xxi. 17 sqq.), (2) personal observation of his own (the latter portion of the Acts), and (3) documents.

In the concluding chapter of the Acts, Luke records that Paul continued to labor for two years as a prisoner in Rome. This book, therefore, could not have been written before 64. The opinion was almost unanimous, before Kaiser, De Wette, and Credner, that the Acts, as well as the Gospel, were written before the destruction of Jerusalem. This view, which is still held by Lange, Ebrard, Godet, Van Oosterzee, [Alford, Plumptre, Farrar, Schaff, Riddle, etc.], is denied by Bleek, Reuss, Meyer, Keim, Holtzmann, and others, who hold that the description in Luke xxi. 20 sqq. presupposes the catastrophe of the destruction of Jerusalem.

It has been taken for granted in the preceding paragraphs that Luke was the author of the third Gospel and the Acts, and this must be regarded as the only tenable opinion. There can be little room for doubting that both the third Gospel and the Acts are by the same author. The style, both in the construction of the sentences and the use of words, as well as the agreement in doctrine, go to prove this. Schleiermacher originated the hypothesis, which Bleek and De Wette followed, that the passages in Acts in which the author places himself among the eye-witnesses of the events narrated, using the pronoun "we" (Acts xvi. 10-17, xx. 5-15, xxi. 1-18, xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16), are by Timothy. But this view lacks all foundation, and is directly contradicted by such passages as Acts. xx. 4 sq. The Tübingen school has denied that Luke is the author of Acts, on the ground of alleged inaccuracies of statement, which are shown up by a comparison with the Epistles of Paul and the subsequent course of history (see Acts xv., xxi. 25), and of the whole relation which the author represents Paul as holding to the Jews, and which a companion of Paul could not have done. Many passages have been declared unhistorical, but simply on the ground that they relate miraculous cures; or because Paul could not have given the account of the vision on the way to Damascus, or have accommodated himself to the Nazarite's vow (Acts xxi. 24-27). But all such criticism is assumption. Why did the writer, if he belonged to a later age, break off so abruptly with Paul as a prisoner in Rome? There is no other tenable view than that held by the early Church, that Luke was the author of the Acts as well as of the third Gospel. The modern hypotheses have furnished by their inconclusiveness a negative argument in confirmation of this view.

Writers of the early church were inclined to ascribe a part of the Gospel to Paul. Irenæus (Her. iii. 1) and Eusebius expressly affirm that Luke put down the Gospel he received from Paul. Origen held the same view (Euseb. vi. 25). From these testimonies it seems to be beyond dispute that Paul exerted a decisive influence upon the theological views of Luke. The third Gospel is the only one of the four which bears the unmistakable impress of the Pauline spirit. Besides special coincidences (e.g., Luke xxii. 19, 20; 1 Cor. xi. 13 sqq.), it is the freedom of divine grace, and the universality of the plan of salvation, which characterize the Gospel. As illustrations may be mentioned Luke iii. 23-38 (which derives the descent of Jesus from Adam and God), ii. 31, 32, iv. 25-27, ix. 52-56, x. 1-24 (the mission of the seventy), 30-37, xvii. 11-19, etc.

The Acts has not such a decided Pauline cast, or, at least, it is not made so prominent. Comparatively few of the characteristic ideas of Christianity are brought out. The ever-recurring ideas are the necessity of repentance, faith in Christ as the crucified (according to God's plan) and risen Saviour, and baptism in his name. Nowhere do we find the author directly combating the views of the Judaic party, as Paul does in his Epistles (Galatians, etc.). The work appears as an historical commentary upon Paul's fundamental principle,—the gospel for the Jews first, but none the less for the Gentiles. In general, it refutes, by the succession of events it details, the Judaistic attacks upon Paul.

It may be said to be generally acknowledged that Luke follows a definite method. He is the first of the evangelists who proceeds on an historical plan. The words of the prologue of the Gospel (Luke i. 3), "It seemed good to me . . . to write unto thee in order," at first make the impression that Luke followed a chronological arrangement; but a perusal of the Gospel shows that he was as much influenced by considerations of the matter as of time. After detailing the events of the infancy of Jesus, he divides his healing activity into three periods: (1) Galilean ministry (iv. 14-ix. 50); (2) Journeying towards Jerusalem (ix. 51-xix. 27, or xviii. 30?), a section which, for the most part, is peculiar to Luke; (3) Arrival, activity, and death in Jerusalem, and the resurrection (xix. 28-xxiv. 53).

The arrangement of the Acts surprises us by its correspondence with the arrangement of the Gospel. We may look upon it as an historical demonstration of the fulfilment of the Lord's command to his disciples (Acts i. 8) to be his witnesses (1) in Jerusalem, (2) in all Judæa and Samaria, and (3) to the uttermost part of the earth. The current division into two parts—(1) i.-xii., in which Peter is the central figure, and (2) xiii.-xxviii., in which Paul is the central figure—must be given up. As in the Gospel, so here, we find an introduction (Acts i.), giving an account of the ascension, and completion of the number of the apostles. The rest of the book falls into three parts: (1) Establishment of the church at Jerusalem (ii.-vi. 7); (2) Transition to labors among the Gentiles (vi. 8-xii.); (3) Founding and confirmation of the churches in Asia and Europe, and the last labors of Paul (xiii.-xxviii.).

LUKE OF PRAGUE, b. about 1460; d. at Zungbunzlau, Dec. 11, 1528; studied at the university of Prague; joined the Moravian Brethren (which article see) in 1480; was elected bishop in 1500; and became in 1518 president of their ecclesiastical council. In 1491 he was sent by the Unitas Fratrum on a mission to Greece and the Orient, in order to discover some body of Christians whose organization the Unitas could use as a model. In 1497 he was sent on a similar errand to the Waldenses in France and Italy; and in 1522 he opened negotiations with Luther. But no palpable results ensued from those endeavors. He was also a prolific writer, of a more practical than theoretical turn; but most of what he has written is lost. His moderation, however, connected with great firmness, contributed much to the development, not only of the Unitas Fratrum in particular, but, generally, of ecclesiastical affairs in Bohemia.

LULLUS, an Anglo-Saxon by birth, was for many years the friend and assistant of Boniface, and was by him ordained a bishop, and nominated his successor in the see of Mayence. His ambition, it would seem, implicated him in a long controversy with Abbot Sturm of Fulda, another disciple of Boniface, who endeavored to vindicate the independence of his monastery against encroachments of the episcopal authority. Probably at the instance of Lullus, Sturm was banished, in 763, by King Pepin, to the monastery of Jumièges; but Lullus experienced the humiliation of seeing him return to Fulda, and the independence of the monastery confirmed by the king. As an offset to this disappointment, he founded the monastery of Hersfeld, where he died in 786. See HAHN: Bonifaz u. Lul. Ihre angelsächsischen Korrespondenzen. Erzbischof Luls Leben, Leipzig, 1883.

LULLUS, Raymundus (Don Ramon Lull doctor illuminatus); b. at Palma, Majorca, about 1235; descended from a rich and noble Spanish family, and was educated at the royal court of Aragon, where he held the office of gran senescal, and enjoyed great reputation as a poet and a man of the world. But suddenly some external event or inner vision struck him with the nothingness of the life he led; and a sermon he heard on the memorial day of St. Francis (Oct. 4, 1265) gave that new movement of his mind a definite direction. He made a pilgrimage to St. Jago di Compostella, gave his wealth — with the exception of what was necessary to the maintenance of his family — to the poor, and retired as a hermit to the mountain of Randa in Majorca. In 1271 he was visited by new visions, and from that moment the conversion of the Saracens and heathens stood before his eyes as the great goal of his life. The best means of reaching that goal seemed to him to be the construction of a universal science, which, by its irresistible argumentation, should convince even the hostile of the truth of Christianity; and with inexhaustible energy he concentrated the whole fantastic exuberance of his mind on the representation of that science in an appropriate form, and on the establishment of schools in which missionaries could be taught the science, and provided with sufficient knowledge, of the Oriental languages, in order to apply it according to its chief purpose.

From the church and the popes, whom he never grew tired of soliciting, he received no aid. At the Council of Vienne (1311) he barely succeeded in having chairs of Oriental languages established at Paris, Oxford, and Salamanca. A little more encouragement he obtained from the kings of France and Aragon, and from the universities; he having taught his science at various times and places with great success. What he did he had to do unaided. He learned Arabic, and made three missionary tours himself among the Saracens. The first time, he went from Genoa to Bugia, the capital of Tunis (1292); challenged the Arab scholars to a formal disputation; made, as it would seem, considerable impression, but was, for that very reason, ordered to leave the country. The second time, he went from Spain to Bona (1309); visited Algiers and Tunis, but was in Bugia rescued from the fury of the mob only by the aid of an Arab philosopher, Homer. The third time, he went again directly to Bugia (1314), and kept, for some time, quiet among the Christian merchants; but, when he began to preach publicly against Islam, he was stoned out of the city, and left dying on the seashore. A Christian sea-captain found him, and brought him on board his vessel; but he expired shortly after (June 30, 1315), thus sealing by his death the great idea of his life, — to conquer Islam, not by the sword, but by preaching.

The writings of Lullus, in Latin, Arabic, and Spanish, are very numerous. A catalogue in the Library of the Escorial enumerates four hundred and thirty, and the number agrees with that given by Wadding (Scriptores Min.) and N. Antonio (Biblioth. Hisp. Vet., ii. 122). Most of these writings, however, remain unpublished in Spanish, French, and German libraries. Published are those of his works which pertain to his new science, Opera que ad artem universalem pertinent, Strassburg, 1598, and often afterwards. His Magna ars a curious development of scholasticism, made, indeed, a kind of sensation in its time, and exercises still a kind of fascination on the student. Of great interest are also his works against Averroes and the Averroists, Duodecim principia philosophi contra Averroistas; De reprobatione Averrois; Liber contradictionum inter R. et Averroistam, etc. His Obras rimadas were published at Palma, 1859. A collected edition of his works, by Ivo Salzinger (Mayence, 1721-42, in 10 vols.), was never completed.

The church long hesitated, not knowing whether she should recognize Lullus as a martyr and saint, or condemn him as a heretic. In the fourteenth century the inquisitor of Aragon formally accused him of heresy; and some of his works were actually forbidden by Pope Gregory XI. Afterwards the Jesuits proved very hostile to him; but he was warmly defended by the Franciscans, Antonio, Wadding, and others, and, among Protestant church historians, by Neander. See PERROQUET: Vie de R. L., Vendome, 1667; LÖW: De vita R. L., Halle, 1830; HELFFERICH: R. L., Berlin, 1858.

He died after 862, but the exact date is unknown. From his letters it appears that he was well acquainted with all the more prominent churchmen, and took a lively part in all church affairs. In the controversy between Gottschalk and Hincmar he sided with the former, and defended him by letters, by larger works (De tribus questionibus and Collectaneum), and at the synods. LUTHER, Martin, the German Reformer, was b. at Eisleben, [a town in Saxony, not far from Wittenberg], Nov. 10, 1483; d. at the same place, Feb. 18, 1546. His father was a miner, but had been a "genuine peasant" (rechter Bauer), as his son himself once said. His mother is specially praised by Melancthon for her "modesty, fear of God, and habits of prayer." They brought up Martin very strictly, but left upon his mind an indelible impression of moral earnestness and honesty. He was sent to the Latin school of Mansfeld, from which he passed in 1497 to Magdeburg, and 1498 to Eisenach, where he had relatives. With others of the poorer boys, he sang in front of the houses, asking for bread for God's sake (panem propter Deum); and attracting the notice of Ursula, the wife of Kunz Cotta, he was taken in and kindly treated by her. Trebonius was then teaching at Eisenach; and Melancthon says that the scholar from Eisleben manifested "a keen power of intellect, and was, above all, gifted for eloquence." In 1501 he entered the university of Erfurt, took the bachelor's degree in 1502, and the master's in 1505. He was set apart by his parents for the career of a lawyer. Up to this time he had had no acquaintance with the Scriptures. Terrible fears now began to oppress his mind. The death of a dear friend, perhaps, contributed to produce this experience; and inward anxiety, which would not be quieted, induced him to form the sudden resolution of becoming a monk. Terrified by a storm, he entered the Augustine convent at Erfurt, July 17, 1505, and in 1507 was ordained priest. He was zealous in the practice of the monastic rules, but no less so in the study of theology, and almost committed to memory the works of Gabriel Biel and D'Ailly, while he sedulously read Oecam and Gerson. But the conflict going on in his soul, and the doubts of his own salvation, pious exercises failed to put to rest. In spite of them, these doubts grew more clamorous; but he eagerly caught at the advice of an old teacher of the convent, who directed him to the article on the forgiveness of sins. It was, however, the vicar of the order, John of Staupitz, who became his most influential human guide. But that which was decisive in this stage of his experience was the Bible, in the study of which he immersed himself.

In 1508 Luther was called to the chair of philosophy at the university of Wittenberg. He was subsequently, for some unknown cause, called back to Erfurt, remaining there three terms (Semester), and was despatched in 1511 to Rome, in the interests of his order. The exhibitions of ecclesiastical corruption which came under his observation did not at the time occasion any revolt in his mind. At a later period he voluntarily became the assistant of the city preacher of Wittenberg, and preached with great vigor and earnestness. His mind turning away from philosophy, he earnestly sought for the kernel of the nut and the marrow of the bones (nucleum nucis, medullam ossium, Ep. i. 6). He sought to present to his hearers the saving truth, especially from the Epistle to the Romans and the Psalms; and it was in the study of these books, that, as Melancthon has said, the light of the gospel first dawned on him. We possess a manuscript of his lectures upon the Psalms, delivered between 1513 and 1516. Amongst the human instruments who influenced his opinions, Augustine was the chief. And at this period Luther taught of the righteousness which is God-given; and he even had a deeper understanding of the meaning of faith, the "short way" to that righteousness, than Augustine himself. In 1516 he became acquainted with, and was strongly influenced by, the mysticism of Tauler and the German Theology, of which he published editions in 1516 and 1518. Although he had not yet broken with the Catholic Church, he had already come substantially to his later views on the plan of salvation. In agreement with the teaching of the mystics, he regarded as fundamental the personal relation of the individual to Christ by faith. Faith he identified with pure and unselfish devotion. It requires the renunciation of the selfish will, which comes from the devil, and is the fundamental sin. Faith and hope go out to Christ, who alone has fulfilled the law, and was crucified for us; so that we can say, "Thou art my righteousness, but I am thy sin" (es justitia mea, ego autem sum peccatum tuum).

Luther was not aware that his beliefs were in conflict with the opinions which at that time prevailed in the Church. In opposition to the then custom, he called upon the bishops to recognize preaching as the principal duty of their office; and held that the sermon ought to be free from expressions of human opinion, legendary stories, and the like, and should go beyond the department of morals and works, to that of faith and imputed righteousness. The thought never occurred to him that his views were out of accord with those of the Church; and the idea had not yet crossed his mind of doubting its supreme authority. Nothing is more striking than his utter failure to observe that he was holding views contrary to those of the Church, and even of Augustine and the mystics. This fact is a remarkable evidence that it was not the spirit of negation and simple critical reflection, but a spirit of positive and private thought, which produced his views.

Luther's writings of this period, in which these views are expressed, are a volume of Sermons (1515), which the author wrote down in Latin, an Introduction to the German Theology (1516), an Exposition of the Seven Penitential Psalms (his first German work), the Our Father (1517), and Sermons on the Decalogue (1518). His Letters also admit us into the state of his mind. Compare HERING: D. Mystik Luthers, 1879.

It was the sale of indulgences in the vicinity of Wittenberg, by Tetzel, under the commission of the Archbishop of Mainz, which formed the occasion for Luther's first conflict with the Church; not, as he thought, against the Church, but for its honor. He began by warning against the abuse of indulgences, at the confessional and from the pulpit. He next embodied his opposition in Letters to the Magnates of the Church, at least to the Bishop of Brandenburg and the Archbishop of Mainz. With the letter to the latter, he sent the ninety-five theses with which he opened the battle with Tetzel, nailing them, on Oct. 31, 1517, to the door of the Schlosskirche (Castle Church) at Wittenberg. They contained what his sermons had already taught; namely, that Jesus' call to repentance demands that the whole life shall be an act of repentance, and does not refer to priestly confession and penance. The Pope's indulgence cannot remove the guilt of the smallest transgression: it can only pardon guilt in the sense of announcing what God has already done. The gospel is the real treasure of the church. Luther also allowed a sermon (Von Ablass und Gnade) to appear, in which he warned against the use of indulgences.

What Luther was led by an irrepressible conviction to speak out, met with a favor in Germany of which he had not had the slightest presentiment. The "theses went through the entire land in fourteen days, for everybody complained about the indulgences; and while all the bishops and doctors were silent, and no one was found to bell the cat, it was noised about that one Luther had at last attempted the task." Luther was driven to further utterances by the attacks of Tetzel, the Dominican Prierias, the Ingolstadt chancellor John Eck, and Hoogstraten. He answered all four in tracts, of which the most celebrated is the one against Eck, — Asterisci adv. obelisc. Eccii. His most important work on the question of the indulgences was his Resolutiones disputationum de indulgentiarum virtute, 1518. Two new questions were suggested to him in this controversy; namely, that the efficacy of the sacrament depended wholly upon the recipient, and that the Pope did not possess supreme authority. He was branded as a heretic by his opponents, and cited to appear at Rome; and the cardinal legate Cajetan was appointed, for the time being, to bring him into submission. With this last purpose in view, a conference was held at Augsburg (October, 1518); but Luther insisted that he was a true son of the Church, and, refusing to recall his utterances regarding the Pope's authority and the efficacy of the sacrament, appealed finally, from the Pope to a general council. He already affirmed that there had been a time in the history of the Church when there was no papal primate, and this primacy did not belong to the essence of the true Church.

The Pope still hesitated to break with the Elector of Saxony, who was unwilling to deliver Luther up, and despatched his chamberlain, Miltitz, who succeeded (January, 1519) in inducing Luther to promise silence for the time being, and to write a letter to the Pope, expressing his veneration for the Roman Church. But in this very letter, while he allows the doctrines of the invocation of saints and purgatory, he boldly asserts that he cannot believe that an indulgence affects the condition of the soul in purgatory. He, however, felt no longer bound by his promise of silence, when Eck challenged his colleague, Karlstadt, to a disputation to be held in Leipzig. Espousing the part of his friend, he disputed against Eck from June 27 to July 16, 1519. (Compare Seidemann: D. Leipziger Disputation, 1843, and art. Eck.) Eck sought to prove, from Luther's own confession, that he had fallen away from the church. Luther, on the other hand, expressed himself with boldness, denying the divine right of the Pope as primate, and affirming that the power of the keys was intrusted, not to an individual, but to the Church; that is, the body of believers. His's, or rather Augustine's, words were true, that there is one holy and universal Church, which is the totality of the elect (predestinatorum universitas): hence the Greek Church was not heretical. Further: he affirmed, that among the clauses which the Council of Constance at the trial of Hus condemned as heretical were those that were genuinely evangelical. Thus he denied the infallibility of general councils.

The Reformer is described at this time as having been very thin, on account of study, fertile in words and illustrations in his sermons, and cheerful and friendly in his intercourse. In debate he displayed a wonderful freshness and vigor, fearless boldness, and also a rude vehemence, which he did not succeed in suppressing. In 1519 he published his university lectures on Galatians, in his smaller Commentary, and a work on the Psalms (Operationes in Psalmos).

His fame had grown wonderfully, and multitudes of students flocked to Wittenberg to hear him. He entered into correspondence with, and received deputations from, the Utraquists of Bohemia, and from Italy. The Humanists, too, began to show him their sympathy. Melancthon, a young representative of this tendency, stood at his side from 1518 on. Luther wrote to Reuchlin; and in a letter to Erasmus, under date of March 28, 1519, he expressed his esteem for that scholar. Princes also began to extend to him their protection; and Franz of Sickingen and Silvester of Schauenberg offered him a place of safety in their castles. In this condition of affairs Luther sent forth an appeal to the Christian noblemen of Germany, August, 1520 (Ad den christl. Adel deutscher Nation), urging them as laymen to take up the work of ecclesiastical reformation, which the Pope had refused, and advocating the suppression of conventual establishments for nuns, the abolition of the interdict and the ban, the recognition of the independence of the temporal power, the denial of the doctrine of transubstantiation, etc. The tract De Captivitate Babylon. ("The Babylonish Captivity," that is, under the Papacy), which appeared about this time, expressed the Reformer's views on the sacraments, only three of which he retained, — the Lord's Supper, baptism, and repentance, — and in the strict sense only two. He denied transubstantiation, and the sacrifice of the mass, and baptismal regeneration. The prominent features of the plan of salvation and the Christian life were brought out in the work, Von der Freiheit e. Christenmannes ("The Freedom of a Christian Man"). He emphasized personal union with Christ, in whom we are justified by the instrumentality of the Word and faith. These three works may be fitly denominated as the most important ones for the progress of the Reformation, from his pen.

On Sept. 21 Eck appeared in Meissen, with the papal ban; but Luther retorted by burning (Dec. 12) the papal bull and decretals at Wittenberg. He justified this action in the tracts, Warum des Papstes u. seiner Jünger Bücher verbrant sind ("Why the Books of the Pope and his Disciples were burned"), and Assertio omnium articulorum, etc. The ban was the last resort of the papal court; but the emperor (Charles V.) did not feel free to execute it, and Luther was invited to appear before the princes of the empire at Worms. He awaited the result of the diet with composure of mind, carrying on in the interval controversies with Emser ["the scribbler of Dresden"] and others. He journeyed towards the city, trusting in God, and defying the Devil. The only matter which concerned him was the victory of the truth, refusing any compromise with the princes, who would gladly have taken this occasion to get redress for some of their grievances against the papal see. The first (April 17, 1521) and last question put to him was whether he was willing to renounce his writings. After a day's consideration, he answered in the negative, but expressed his willingness to renounce them if they were shown to contain errors. His final answer to their reiterated demands was, "I shall not be convinced, except by the TESTIMONY OF THE SCRIPTURES, or plain reason: for I believe neither the pope nor councils alone, as it is manifest that they have often erred and contradicted themselves. . . . I am not able to recall, nor do I wish to recall, any thing; for it is neither safe nor honest to do any thing AGAINST CONSCIENCE. Here I stand, I cannot do otherwise. God help me. Amen!" (Hier stehe ich, ich kann nicht anders; Gott helf mir, Amen!) In vain were all endeavors, in public and by a private commission of the Archbishop of Treves, to move him; and his insistence upon the article condemned by the council was decisive, which spoke of the "universal Church, which is the body of the elect" (numerus predestinatorum). On May 25 the ban was pronounced against him in its severest form. But Luther left Worms the next day, composed in mind. On his journey he was seized, by the order of his elector

(but not without his own knowledge), and carried off to the Wartburg, [a romantically situated old castle near Eisenach]. This was done to protect his person from harm.

Luther's residence at the Wartburg marks the beginning of the second period of his Reformatory activity, — the period of construction, not only in opposition to the activity of pulling down, but also to that of laying foundations. In the retirement of the castle, which he called his Patmos, he had time for quiet reflection and for the translation of the New Testament into German, which contributed more than any thing else to make the Reformation permanent. It was printed in September, 1522, [and has continued ever since to be the model of German style. See the excellent article, GERMAN BIBLE TRANSLATIONS, in this volume]. He also wrote the first part of his German Postilla here, and a number of tracts and letters. Outside the Wartburg, changes were going forward. Melancthon denied the validity of monkish vows. Changes were made in the public services at Wittenberg, and the celebration of the mass abolished. Luther uttered his views upon these subjects in his De votis monasticis and De abroganda missa privata. But he was conservative, and strongly opposed the tumultuous interference with the celebration of the mass, and other old customs. Karlstadt (at Wittenberg) denounced the use of pictures in the churches, and three fanatics arrived from Zwickau, who professed to be the subjects of visions, denounced infant baptism, and advocated a wholesale destruction of the ungodly. Even Melancthon was at first carried away by them. But Luther spoke out with his accustomed clearness and positiveness against all such errors. The Zwickau prophets, he declared, ought to show their credentials; for God never sent an agent without them. As for infant baptism, children, it is true, could not believe; but faith might be given to them in answer to the prayers of their sponsors, and a positive warrant for it is given in Matt. xix.

Luther left the Wartburg in March, unable longer to bear the retirement. Arriving at Wittenberg on the 7th, he preached eight sermons in succession on the duties of love, order, and moderation; and the Zwickauer prophets shook the dust from off their feet as they left the city. Luther made public in 1523 a new order of service (Formula missæ et communionis), in which he took notice of the scruples of the weaker brethren. A subject in which he took a great interest was the revival of German devotional song; and in 1524 the first Wittenberg hymn-book appeared, with four hymns by Luther himself. About this time Duke George of Saxony forbade the circulation of Luther's writings. This formed the occasion for the Reformer's work upon the extent to which obedience is due to the civil authorities (Schrift über d. weltliche Obrigkeit, wie weit man ihr Gehorsam schuldig sei). He admits their supreme jurisdiction over the temporal affairs of men, and counsels authors and readers to bear patiently the punishment of the laws forbidding the circulation of evangelical writings, but to disobey them. He denied to them the right of making laws for the spiritual concerns of man, or to compel conformity in matters of faith. At a later period he advocated the protection of the reformed Church by the civil power. He also entered into a controversy with Henry VIII. of England, who had answered his book on the sacraments (De Captivitate Babyl.), and wrote a work (Contra Henricum Regem) in which he displays all his rudeness of temper. But in 1525 he showed his kindness of disposition by a request to the king for forgiveness, which was as humble as it was unsuccessful.

The most important event in Luther's conflict with Catholicism, his difference with Erasmus, now occurred. They had been on intimate terms; but Erasmus had long since taken offence at Luther's bluntness, as Luther had taken offence at his ignorance of the method of divine grace, and lack of positiveness and courage. In 1525 Erasmus put forward against Luther a work advocating the freedom of the will (De libero arbitrio), which, after long delay, Luther answered (1525) in his De servo arbitrio, in which he insists upon the impotence of the will. He teaches that God, who knows all things, has predestinated all things, and those who are lost are lost in conformity with his predestination. If it be objected that he is able to, and yet does not, change the will of the wicked, it must be answered that what he does is right, and the reasons for his acting or not acting belong to the mysteries of his majesty. This is the highest stage of faith, to believe that he is clement who saves so few, and just, who makes us damnable (capable of condemnation) of his own will (sua voluntate nos damnabiles facit). Free-will can be predicated of God alone, and man's will is in all things subject to and ruled by the will of God. Luther desired to have these hard-sounding doctrines made public, but warned against attempts to scrutinize the hidden will of God, and urged implicit trust in his revealed Word.

Luther now had to contend principally against the spirit of false freedom, a foe which was making itself felt more and more in the Church. Karlstadt represented this spirit, and denied the presence of Christ's body in the Lord's Supper, professed an intense spiritualism, but, on the other hand, regarded polygamy as admissible, etc. In the mean time, other ecclesiastical and social changes were proposed, such as the revival of the Mosaic jubilee year, in which all property should revert to its original possessors. Munzer, the leader of the Zwickau fanatics, labored to bring about a revolution for the establishment of a kingdom of saints, as he understood it. Luther opposed Karlstadt's tendency in the larger work against the heavenly prophets (Wider die himmlischen Propheten), and answered the argument from the Mosaic law, that Christ had abolished it, and had himself become a law to us. But he admitted that many excellent models were to be derived from Moses in the department of civil government; but such commands derive their power amongst Christians, not because they originated with Moses, but because they are enjoined by the civil authority. The fire, however, was spreading, and the long-feared revolution threatened to break out in the Peasants' War. Luther openly denounced Munzer as a false prophet, but the peasants of Southern Germany he sought to convince that the freedom of the Christian was not a carnal freedom. The strongest words he directed to the princes; and, inasmuch as the murderous and looting gangs continued to spread dismay, he called upon them in God's name to strike down the devilish opposition with stabbing, striking, and throttling (Stechen, Schlagen, und Würgen). See the tracts Ermahnung zum Frieden, etc. ("Exhortation to Peace"), and Sendbrief von d. harten Büchlein ("The Severe Tracts"), 1525. In this period of trial, hearing of intended attempts upon his own life, and feeling himself about to die, he married (June 13, 1525), without experiencing the passion of love, Catharina von Bora, who had been a nun. He did it in a spirit of noble defiance against his enemies, in order before his death to give another testimony of his esteem for the marriage-relation, as well as in the hope that the angels would laugh, and the devils weep, at the contempt he would thereby show for the papal rule of celibacy.

Luther's attention continued to be given to matters of church organization and worship. In 1526 he wrote his book, Deutsche Messe, etc. ("The German Mass"), in which he advocates weekly services and the study of the books of the Bible. He also urged catechetical instruction, but warned against making a new law out of forms and formularies. The alteration of the service of baptism is noticed in the Taufbüchlein (1523, 1527). The first evangelical ordination occurred at Wittenberg, in May, 1525. The discipline of the church was now perfected, and the rights and duties of the church authorities defined. They were not to compel any one to accept the faith, or frequent the services of religion, but to put down external offences. He advocated a spiritual supervision or episcopacy, which was to reside in a higher class of officers. The princes were to appoint them, and they were to institute a system of visitation for the churches. Such visitation was made between 1527 and 1529; and, as one of the results of Luther's personal observation, he wrote his two catechisms (1529).

The meaning and nature of the Lord's Supper had become the occasion of much discussion and extensive differences between the Reformers and their followers. Luther had already written against Karlstadt; and he now discovered that Zwingli, Leo Jude, and Ecolampadius also denied the real presence of the body of Christ. He hastily identified the views of the latter with those of the former, and opposed them with passionate warmth, which rose to vehemence; and imagined he detected in these "sacramentarian fanatics" the revolutionary spirit of Munzer. In 1526 he wrote against Ecolampadius, in his Preface to the Syngramma Suevicum, and also put forth a sermon against the "fanatics," a larger work, in 1527 (Dass diese Worte . . . noch feststehen), and, in answer to the friendly letters of Zwingli and Ecolampadius, another in 1528 (Vom Abendmahl Christi, Bekenntniss). He met Zwingli and Ecolampadius at Marburg, at the suggestion of Philip of Hesse, Oct. 1-3, 1529, came to an unexpected agreement with them on all points except the Lord's Supper, and departed, refusing the right hand of fellowship, although he promised them love and peace. He held, that, although the bread and wine were not changed into the body and blood of Christ, Christ's body was veritably present; and he appealed to the simple words of institution, "This is my body." He, however, constantly affirmed that the mere bread had no virtue, and that it is only by faith that we get a blessing.

This disagreement with the two Swiss Reformers was permanent, and endangered the future of the whole movement of the Reformation. It was in this anxious condition of affairs that the princes of the empire met the emperor in 1530 at Augsburg. This conference was to define finally the attitude of the empire to Protestantism. Luther, left behind by his elector, watched the progress of the assembly from Coburg. The Confession, however, which was presented at Augsburg, was written out by Melancthon, but was the result of previous labors, in which Luther took part. Its articles, however, were not strong and positive enough to suit him; and, when the purpose of the moderate party (Melancthon) was defeated, he could not suppress the remark that "Satan felt that your apology, Leisetreterin ('soft-stepper'), misrepresented (dissimulasse) the articles on purgatory, the worship of saints, and, especially Antichrist the Pope." He suspected Melancthon of the spirit of over-compromise, and became impatient at his delays to write, but did not obtrude his own opinions. On the other hand, he gave up all hope and desire of a reconciliation, which was impossible "unless the Pope was willing that the Papacy should be abolished." In this whole matter of the doctrinal dissent of the Reformation and the Papacy, Luther saw far deeper than Melancthon. The emperor, threatened by the Turks from without, and for other reasons, did not proceed against the Protestants, who had entered, for mutual protection, into the Smalcald League. It had been Luther's principle that all disobedience to the imperial power in civil concerns was unjustifiable. From this position he did not, even in this emergency, retreat, but had recourse to the jurists, who held that the emperor was to be obeyed only as he followed the precedent of law, or, as they expressed it, the "emperor in his laws" was to be obeyed. This satisfied Luther's mind; and in 1531 he preached and published a sermon (Warnung an d. lieben Deutschen) advocating resistance under certain circumstances, and appealing to the authorities in the department of jurisprudence.

The Pope still expressed himself as willing to convene a general council, and despatched the legate Vergerius, who met with Luther at Wittenberg. The Reformer doubted the Pope's sincerity; but, commissioned by the elector, he wrote out articles for the council, affirming that the Pope was the "veritable Eudchrist (Eudchrist), or Antichrist," and demanding that he should renounce his pretensions. The council was, of course, never held. Luther expressed his general judgment of councils in his book Von d. Conciliis u. Kirchen (1539). He here denied their infallibility, and affirmed that their business was alone to defend plain, fundamental doctrines of Scripture.

In the mean time, efforts were not wanting to bring about a union of the Protestants; and Luther expressed himself heartily in favor of it, and in 1537 wrote a friendly letter to the mayor of Basel, expressing the hope that the disturbed waters might settle themselves. In a letter (1538)

to Bullinger he affirmed, that, ever since the Marburg Conference, he had looked upon Zwingli as a most excellent man (virum optimum). Luther showed his conciliatory temper more conspicuously in his recognition of the Bohemian Brethren, writing a Preface for the Defence of their faith, which they presented to George of Brandenburg in 1533, and another Preface, in 1538, for the Confession which they presented to King Ferdinand.

Within the limits of his own church, Luther's chief activity never lay in organization, but in the preaching and exposition of the Word. Under the head of expository writings we may mention his Sermons on Genesis (1523-24) and Leviticus, Lectures on Deuteronomy (1525), Commentary on the Psalms, Lectures on Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Nahum, Malachi, Isaiah (1527), all in Latin; and on Habakkuk, Jonah (1526), Zechariah (1528), Ezekiel xxxviii., xxxix., and Daniel (1530), in German; again on Hosea, Micah, and Joel (after 1530), in Latin; and on Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon (1526-27). In the department of the New Testament we may mention his Sermons on 1 Peter (1523), 2 Peter and Jude (1524), Acts xv., xvi (1526); Lectures on 1 John, Titus, and 1 Timothy and 2 Timothy (1527); Sermons on John xvii. sqq. (1528, 1529); again on 1 John (1530), on Matthew v.-vii. and John vi.-viii. (1530-32); Latin Lectures on Galatians (1531); and large Commentary (1535), etc. Luther continued to preach in the city church at Wittenberg, even after Bugenhagen had become pastor.

We would be mistaken if we were to imagine, that, as Luther's end drew nigh, he looked back with complete satisfaction upon the previous years of his life as a period which had witnessed the restoration of a perfect church fabric. On the contrary, while he thanked God for grace in the past, he felt very deeply the inveterate hostility of the world to the gospel, and looked forward, in anticipation, to severe trials and judgments for the church. The state of the world seemed to him to resemble its condition before the flood, or just before the fall of Jerusalem. He was indignant at the immorality of Wittenberg; and while on a journey, in the summer of 1515, he threatened not to return to "that Sodom." He complained both of the peasants and of the nobility, and says of the latter (1541, Ep., 5, 399), "It is true that they who are in authority (in politica) have always been and will always be hostile to the church." In 1535 (Ep., 4, 602) he had exclaimed that the Papacy was, after all, better suited to the world; for the world wanted to have the Devil for its god. Here we may mention his attitude towards the second marriage of Philip of Hesse. This prince, loving another woman than his wife, secured the opinion from the Reformer, that, while monogamy was the original institution of God, cases might arise to justify bigamy; but the second marriage should, for prudential reasons, be kept secret. The marriage took place, March 3, 1540, in the presence of Melancthon. When the matter became known, Melancthon was so troubled by the criticisms, that he sickened unto death; while Luther prayed earnestly for his life, and comforted him, believing he could defend himself satisfactorily before God, though he could not do it before man.

Fresh efforts were made for the union of the Catholic and Protestant churches in 1540. But Luther doubted whether they enjoyed the favor of God; nor could he sympathize with Melancthon in his endeavors to unite the different Protestant churches by a skilful tempering of words, and he never ceased to warn against the doctrines of Zwingli. He was again incited, by what he considered compromises of the truth, to speak out in a Short Confession of the Sacrament (1544), in which he utters himself more warmly than ever before against the "sacramentarian fanatics." Notwithstanding this vehemence, he did have the feeling of the unity of Christian brotherhood.

On Jan. 23, 1546, he went by invitation to his birthplace, Eisleben, to arbitrate a dispute between some counts. His mission was successful; but as he retired, on Feb. 17, he felt a pressure on his chest. Surrounded by friends, he repeated the words of Ps. xxxi. 5 ("Into thy hand I commit my spirit"), and died peacefully. His remains were interred in the Schlosskirche at Wittenberg.

Luther's doctrinal views have already been indicated. But it must not be forgotten that he does not write as a theologian, in the strict sense; in any of his works. It was his to discern with a lifelike vision, and to bear witness, rather than to formulate and systematize. He did not lack the talent for scholastic treatment, but his utterances always depended upon personal experiences. It was this general consideration which explains the vigor of his preaching. A distinction has been made between the Luther of an earlier and of a later period. In regard to his main doctrines, it can only be said that he now emphasized one, now another, phase, and sometimes, at the same period, seemed to contradict himself, simply because he made the one or the other aspect more prominent. The greatest change in the general attitude of the Reformer took place between 1520 and 1525. He never recalled his utterances about the divine predestination expressed in the work De servo arbitrio; but in his later period he directed his vision to God, as the God of love, revealing himself in Christ as the central point in theology.

Luther's style preserved to the end the freshness and vigor which characterized it at the beginning. His language was pungent, simple, and clear; and he kept equally free from exuberance of feeling or fancy, and dialectic subtlety. The fundamental notion of salvation he always brought to the foreground, both in his writings and sermons. He often condemned the allegorical method of interpretation, yet he himself uses it in many a passage. Characteristic were his popular wisdom and wit, which he was so skilful in employing in proverbs, fables, verses, etc. In 1530, tarrying at Coburg, he passed away the time in working over the fables of Æsop.

His family life was filled up with cheerful and patient experiences. It was very human; and his letters and table-talk present us a charming picture of his love for his wife and children, and his thought for their wants. ["He was eminently social in his disposition," says Dr. Schaff, in the American Cyclopædia, "a great lover of music and poetry, an affectionate husband and father. He liked to play with his children, and to gather with them in childlike joy around the Christmas-tree. In his letters to his wife and friends, he lays open his whole heart, and gives free vent to his native wit, harmless humor, and childlike playfulness and drollery."] In the company of others he shared heartily in festivity; but his moderation in eating was a source of constant surprise to Melancthon, who was not able to reconcile it with the large proportions of his body. His conversation was always full of salt, perhaps sometimes seeming vulgar to a delicate ear. Melancthon, in his funeral oration, eulogized his dignified bearing under all circumstances, his sincerity of heart, his honesty of speech. He was always honorable, just, pure, and amiable.

So far as his religious experience is concerned, Luther always felt himself to be in the midst of an intense spiritual conflict, and yet was always assured of the plan of salvation, and stood undaunted and unanxious in the midst of external perils. He felt that he was in a constant hand-to-hand struggle with the Devil; yet he was always confident that the Devil could not harm him, for he whom the Devil and the world hated so intensely, he used to say, must surely please Christ. Ambitious motives never prevail with him. From the beginning to the end, it is the consciousness of a vocation revealed to him from above which determines him to work and to struggle; and into the carrying-out of that vocation he threw his whole being. He could leave the results of his work to prove to the credulous that it was really of God. He himself was confident of it before the results appeared.

[Luther stands forth as the great national hero of the German people, and the ideal of German life. Perhaps no other cultivated nation has a hero who so completely expresses the national ideal. King Arthur comes, perhaps, nearest to Luther amongst the English-speaking race. He was great in his private life, as well as in his public career. His home is the ideal of cheerfulness and song. He was great in thought, and great in action. He was a severe student, and yet skilled in the knowledge of men. He was humble in the recollection of the designs and power of a personal Satan, yet bold and defiant in the midst of all perils. He could beard the Papacy and imperial councils, yet he fell trustingly before the cross. He was never weary, and there seemed to be no limit to his creative energy. Thus Luther stands before the German people as the type of German character. Goethe, Frederick the Great, and all others, in this regard, pale before the German Reformer. He embodies in his single person the boldness of the battlefield, the song of the musician, the joy and care of the parent, the skill of the writer, the force of the orator, and the sincerity of rugged manhood with the humility of the Christian.

As there is a constant danger that the Germans will deify Luther; so, on the other hand, for a long time, the English race failed to recognize his true worth, and to appreciate the manliness of his character. Such writers as Coleridge, Julius Hare, and Carlyle, have given to us a better and truer conception and admiration of him. The latter says of him, "I will call this Luther a true great man, — great in intellect, in courage, affection, and integrity; one of our most lovable and precious men. . . . A right spiritual hero and prophet, and, more, a true son of nature and fact, for whom these centuries, and many that are to come yet, will be thankful to Heaven."

Luther's hymns deserve a special mention. He not only restored sacred song to the church, but was himself a hymn-writer. The greatest of his hymns is Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott, written in 1529, upon the basis of Ps. xlvii. Miss Catherine Winkworth, Carlyle, and others, have rendered it into English. Carlyle's translation—"A safe stronghold our God is still"—has succeeded best in retaining the tone of the original. This hymn is Luther in song. It is pitched in the very key of the man. Rugged and majestic, trustful in God, and confident, it was the defiant trumpet-blast of the Reformation, speaking out, to the powers in the earth and under the earth, an all-conquering conviction of divine vocation and empowerment. The world has many sacred songs of exquisite tenderness and unalterable trust, and also some bold and awe-inspiring lyrics, like Dies irae; but this one of Luther's is matchless for its warlike tone, its rugged strength, and martial-inspiring ring.]

LIT. — Luther's Collected Works have appeared in six editions. — at Wittenberg (1558), in 12 German and 8 Latin vols.; Jena (1555-58), in 8 German and 5 Latin vols. (2 additional vols. appearing in Eisleben, 1564-65); Altenburg (1661-64), in 10 German vols. (1 additional vol., Halle, 1702); Leipzig (1729-40), in 23 German vols.; Halle (1740-53), in 24 German vols.; Erlangen and Erfurt (1826-73), in 67 German (complete) and 33 Latin vols. In this edition the oldest texts have been consulted. It is the best. De Wette and Seidemann have edited Luther's Letters, in 6 vols. (1825-56); Förstemann and Bindseil, his Table-Talk, in 4 vols. (1844-48); and Bindseil, his Colloquia, in 3 vols. (1863-66). A worthy edition of Luther's complete works has just been made possible by the magnificent liberality of the Prussian Government. For the rich literature on Luther's life, see VOGEL: Biblioth. biograph. Lutherana, 1851. Amongst the many biographies, that of MEURER (3d ed., Dresden, 1870) has the advantage that it draws directly from Luther's letters. That of JÜRGENS, reaching down to 1517 (3 vols., Leipzig, 1846-47), is very rich and full, but lacks definiteness and point. The work of J. KÖSTLIN — Martin Luther's Leben. u. s. Schriften, Elberfeld, 1875, 2 vols. [and by the same, Luther's Leben, Leipzig, 1882, 1 vol.] — may be termed the first attempt to use the existing material [and is the best biography]. LUTHER'S TWO CATECHISMS — the larger one in the form of a continuous exposition, and the smaller one arranged in questions and answers — both appeared in 1529; but the author's preparations for them date back to the very beginning of his reformatory activity. In 1518 Johann Schneider collected and published the various expositions of the Lord's Prayer which Luther had given in his sermons and lectures; and Luther himself was thereby led to publish his exposition in an authentic edition. In the same year he published his Latin exposition of the Decalogue, and in 1520 these sporadic efforts came to a preliminary consummation in his Eyn kurz form der zehnen gepoth. Eyn kurz form des Glaubens, Eyn kurz form des Vatter Users. After 1524 Luther's attention was very strongly drawn to the school. His An die Radherrn aller stette deutsches lands: dass sie christliche schulen auffrichten und halten sollen caused many evangelical schools to be founded; and those schools could not fail to inculcate the expediency, not to say the indispensableness, of a short but sound and thoroughly reliable handbook in the elements of true Christianity. Finally his tour of visitation through Saxony, in 1528, brought the matter to its consummation, by showing him how sorely, in many cases, both the ministers and the congregations stood in need of such a book; and in March, next year, the large Catechism appeared; in July, the small, — both in German.

The Catechisms of Luther, however, are not the first attempts of the kind. On the contrary, they had many predecessors, — by Brenz, Althammer, Lachmann, and others; but they soon took the lead. They were immediately translated into Latin (the large, by Lonicer in May, and by Obopóus in July; the small, by Sauromannus in September); and the latter soon became an almost symbolical book in the Lutheran churches. It was written after the large one, and is, indeed, the ripe fruit of many exertions, the full expression after many trials. It is said to be, next to the Bible, the most extensively used book ever written. It consists of (I.) The Ten Commandments, (II.) The Creed, (III.) The Lord's Prayer, (IV.) The Sacrament of Holy Baptism, and (V.) The Sacrament of the Altar, to which is added, in the editions since 1564, a sixth part, Confession and Absolution, or the Power of the Keys, whose precise authorship is a little uncertain, though substantially it dates from Luther himself, and is found in the edition of 1531. There are, indeed, with respect to the relation between the editio princeps and the next revised and augmented editions, several nice questions of details not yet fully answered; for which see C. A. G. v. ZEZSCHWITZ: System d. christ. kirch. Katech., Leipzig, 1863-69, 2 vols. C. A. G. von ZEZSCHWITZ.

LUTHERAN CHURCH, In Europe. It is the oldest, and probably the largest also, of the evangelical denominations which sprang from the Reformation of the sixteenth century. It was called after the great leader of the German Reformation (first, in derision, by Roman Catholics, then by the followers of Luther, although he himself protested against a sectarian use of his name). Its usual title is "Evangelical Lutheran Church;" "evangelical" being the name; "Lutheran," the surname. In Prussia, and other countries of Germany where the union between Lutherans and Reformed has been introduced (since 1817), the name "Lutheran" has been abandoned, as a church title, for "Evangelical," or "Evangelical United" (evangelisch-uniert). It has its home in Germany (where it outnumbers all other Protestant denominations), and in Scandinavia (Denmark, Sweden, Norway), where it is the established, or national church: it extends to the Baltic Provinces of Russia, and follows the German emigration and the German language to other countries, especially to the United States, where it is now one of the most numerous denominations. (See next article.) Its total (nominal) membership, including the Lutherans in the union churches, is variously put down at thirty millions (by Holtzmann and Zöpfel, in Leikon für Theol. und Kirchenwesen, 1882, p. 158) and at forty millions (by Dr. Krauth, in Johnson's Cyclopædia, iii. 158).

I. HISTORY.—It may be divided into five periods. (1) The pentecostal or formative period of the Reformation, from the promulgation of Luther's ninety-five theses, in 1517, to the publication of the Book of Concord, 1580. (2) The period of polemical orthodoxy, in which the doctrinal system of the church was scholastically defined and analyzed in opposition to Romanism, Calvinism, and the milder and more liberal Melancthonian type of Lutheranism (as represented by Calixtus), from 1580 to about 1700. (3) The period of pietism (Spener, d. 1705; and Francke, d. 1727), or a revival of practical piety in conflict with dead orthodoxy, from 1689 (when Francke began his Collegia philobiblica in Halle) to the middle of the eighteenth century. The Pietistic movement is analogous to the Methodist revival in the Church of England, but kept within the limits of the Lutheran state churches, and did not result in a secession. (4) The period of rationalism, which gradually invaded the universities, pulpits, and highest judicatories, and effected a complete revolution in theology and church life, to such an extent that the few Moravian communities were for some time almost the only places of refuge for genuine piety in Germany. (5) The period of revival of evangelical theology and religion at the third centennial celebration of the Reformation, and the publication of Claus Harms' ninety-five theses against the rationalistic apostasy, A.D. 1817. In the same year Prussia took the lead in the union movement which brought the Lutheran and Reformed confessions under one system of government, but called forth the "Old Lutheran" re-action and secession. Since then there has been a constant conflict between evangelical and rationalistic tendencies in the Lutheran and the United Evangelical churches of Germany.

On the history of the Lutheran Reformation, see the third volume of Gieseler (the fourth in the English translation of H. B. Smith) and the special works of Marheineke and Kahnis; on the doctrinal controversies which led to the formation of the Formula of Concord, Planck, Heppel, Dörner; on the Lutheran divines in the seventeenth century, Tholuck; on the whole history, the respective sections in the compendious church histories of Hase, Guericke, Kurtz, and H. Schmid; also the arts. LUTHER, MELANCTHON, etc.

II. THE LUTHERAN CREED AND THEOLOGY.

—The Lutheran Church acknowledges the three œcumenical creeds (the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian), which it holds in common with other orthodox churches, and, besides, six specific confessions, which separate it from other churches; namely: (1) The Augsburg Confession, drawn up by Melancthon, and presented to the Augsburg Diet in 1530 (afterwards altered by the author in the tenth article, on the Lord's Supper, 1540). This is the fundamental and most widely accepted confession of that church; some branches acknowledge no other as binding. (2) The Apology of the Augsburg Confession, also by Melancthon (1530). (3) and (4) Two Catechisms of Luther (1529), a Larger and Smaller; the latter, for children and catechumens, is, next to Luther's German version of the Bible, his most useful and best known book. (5) The Articles of Smalcald, by Luther, 1537 (strongly anti-papal). (6) The Formula of Concord, prepared by six Lutheran divines (1577) for the settlement of the Melancthonian or synergistic, the Crypto-Calvinistic or sacramentarian, and other doctrinal controversies which agitated the Lutheran Church after the death of Luther and Melancthon. These nine symbolical books (including the three œcumenical creeds) were officially published by order of Elector Augustus of Saxony, in Latin and German, at Leipzig and Dresden, in 1580, under the title Concordia, usually called The Book of Concord. The best editions, next to the editio princeps, are by J. G. Walch (1750), J. F. Müller (1817, 3d ed. 1839); and the best English translation by Professor Henry E. Jacobs (of Pennsylvania College, Gettysburg, Penn.), under the title The Book of Concord: or, the Symbolical Books of the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Translated from the Original Languages, with Notes. Philadelphia (G. W. Frederick), 1882 (671 pages).

On the three different branches of the Lutheran Church in the United States, as regards the binding authority of the symbolical books, see next article.

III. RELATION TO THE REFORMED CHURCH. — There have always been two tendencies in the Lutheran Church in its relation to the Reformed or Calvinistic churches, — one rigid and exclusive, which is represented by the Formula Concordia, the Lutheran scholastics of the seventeenth century, and the "new Lutheran" school in Germany; the other moderate and conciliatory, represented by the altered Augsburg Confession of 1540, by Melancthon (in his later period, after the death of Luther), Calixtus, John Arndt, Spener, Francke, Arnold, Mosheim, Bengel, the Suabian Lutherans, and those modern Lutheran divines who sympathize with the Union, and regard the differences between the two confessions as unessential, and insufficient to justify separation, and exclusion from communion at the Lord's table. The Lutheran Church is, next to the Church of England, the most conservative of the Protestant denominations, and retained many usages and ceremonies of the middle ages which the more radical zeal of Zwingli, Calvin, and Knox threw overboard as unscriptural corruptions.

The strict Lutheran creed differs from the Reformed, or Calvinistic, in four points (as detailed in the semi-symbolical Saxon Visitation Articles of 1592); namely, (1) Baptismal regeneration, and the ordinary necessity of baptism for salvation; (2) The real presence of Christ's body and blood "in, with, and under," the bread and wine (during the sacramental fruition), usually called by English writers "consubstantiation," in distinction from the Roman-Catholic "transubstantiation;" but the term is not used in the Lutheran symbols, and is rejected by the Lutheran divines, as well as the term "impanation;" body and blood are not mixed with, nor locally included in, but sacramentally and mysteriously united with the elements; (3) The communicatio idiomatum in the doctrine of Christ's person, whereby the attributes of the divine nature are attributed to his human nature, so that ubiquity (a conditional omnipresence) is ascribed to the body of Christ, enabling it to be really and truly (though not locally and carnally) present wherever the communion is celebrated; (4) The universal vocation of all men to salvation, with the possibility of a total and final fall from grace; yet the Formula Concordia teaches at the same time, with Luther (De seruo arbitrio) the total depravity and slavery of the human will, and an unconditional predestination of the elect to everlasting life. It is, therefore, a great mistake to identify the Lutheran system with the later Arminian theory. Melancthon's synergism may be said to have anticipated Arminianism, but it was condemned by the Formula of Concord.

LIT. — (1) Lutheran theologians of the strict and exclusive type. CHEMNITZ (Loci Theologici, 1591), JOHN GERHARD (Loci Theologici, ed. Cotta, 1762-81), MUTTER (1610), HAFENREFFER (1609), CALOV (1655-77), KÖNIG (1665), QUENSTEDT (1685), BAIER (1686), HOLLAZ (1750), PHILIPPI (of Rostock, 2d ed., 1864-82, 6 vols.), LUTHARDT (Kompendium der Dogmatik, 1865, 6th ed., 1882), THOMASIVS (a Kenoticist, Christi Person und Werk, 1853-61, 3 vols.), HEINRICH SCHMID (translated from the 5th ed. by Charles A. Hay and Henry E. Jacobs, Philadelphia, 1876), KAHNIS (Luth. Dogmatik, 1861-68, 3 vols., new ed., somewhat modified, 1871, 1875, in 2 vols.). It should be noted, however, that Thomasius (in his Christology), Von Hofmann (in the doctrine of atonement), and Kahnis (on the Lord's Supper), are not strictly orthodox, and depart from the Formula of Concord.

Compare also, for a merely historical statement of the system of Lutheran orthodoxy, HASE'S Mutterus Redivivus (Leipzig, 1829, 11th ed., 1868), an excellent compendium for students. Hase himself is a moderate rationalist, and gives his own views in his Lehrbuch der ev. Dogmatik, 1826, 6th ed., 1870.

(2) Lutheran divines friendly to union with the Reformed, and imbued more or less with the spirit of Melancthon. TWESTEN (Dogmatik der ev. luth. Kirche, 1826-29, 4th ed., 1837, not completed), KNAPP (1827, etc., 2 vols., English translation by L. Woods, Andover, 1831), K. J. NITZSCH (System der christl. Lehre, 1829, 6th ed., 1851), MARTENSEN (Christian Dogmatics, very fresh and genial, 1849, English trans., Edinburgh, 1866).

The great dogmatic works of Rothe, Jul. Müller (on the doctrine of sin), and Dorner, are not confessional. The Lutheran Church of the present century is exceedingly fertile in all departments of theological science, but only a small number of modern divines adhere to the old Lutheran system.

(3) On the general difference between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions, see GÖBEL: Die religiöse Eigentümlichkeit der luth. und reform. Kirche, 1837; SCHNECKENBURGER: Vergleichende Darstellung des luth. und reform. Lehrbegriffs (very acute and discriminating), 1855; JUL. MÜLLER: Lutheri et Calvinii sententiæ de Sacra Cœna inter se comparatæ, 1870, and other works quoted in Schaff's Creds of Christendom, i. 211.

IV. RITUAL AND WORSHIP. — The foundation of the ritual of the Lutheran Church was laid in Luther's work, Von ordnung gottis dienst zun der gemeyne ("The Order of Service in the Church," Wittenberg, 1523), and his Latin (Formula missæ, 1523) and German missals (1526). It was his intention to retain all that was good in the service of the Catholic Church, while discarding all unevangelical doctrines and practices. Thus, in his Latin and German litanies (Latina litania correctæ; Die verdeutschte Litanej), which were in use in 1529 at Wittenberg, he made certain corrections and additions. The Lutheran Church uses a liturgy. The first complete form, or Agende, was that of the Duchy of Prussia, 1525. There is no authoritative form for the whole church. A movement was set on foot in 1817, by Frederick William III. of Prussia, to introduce a uniform Agende; but it created intense excitement, and caused the Old Lutheran secession. The various states of Germany have their own Agenden, which differ, however, only in minor particulars. Luther introduced the use of the vernacular into the public services, restored preaching to its proper place, and insisted upon the participation of the congregation in the services, declaring "common prayer exceedingly useful and healthful" (valde utilis et salutaris). He rejected auricular confession, as practised and required in the Catholic Church, but advocated private and voluntary confession. This practice has been mostly given up. The rite of exorcism, which the Reformed churches abandoned, was retained and recommended by Luther and Melancthon. Hesshusius, in 1583, was the first to propose its omission: and it has since fallen into oblivion in the Lutheran Church. The popular use of hymns was introduced by Luther, who was himself an enthusiastic singer, and by his own hymns became the father of German church hymnody, which is richer than any other. (See HYMNOLOGY.) Congregational singing continues to form one of the principal features in the public services. The great festivals of the church year—such as Christmas, Easter, Pentecost, the Days of the Twelve Apostles, etc.—are observed with religious services. The Reformation is commemorated on the 31st of October. Pictures are admitted into the churches.

V. GOVERNMENT.—The doctrinal development of the Lutheran Church was matured much sooner than its organization and polity. Luther was not an organizer, like Calvin, or, at a later time, John Wesley. The necessity of organization, however, was deeply felt; and in 1529 a visitation of the churches of Saxony was prosecuted, and "superintendents" appointed for the oversight of the congregations and schools. The Order of Discipline of the church in Saxony became the model for other books of discipline. The priesthood of all believers is a fundamental doctrine, and the parity of the clergy is recognized. In Sweden, when the whole country passed over to the Lutheran communion, the Catholic bishops retained their titles (including that of archbishop). The validity of the Swedish orders, from the stand-point of the Church of England, is a matter in dispute. The Danish Church likewise retains the title of "bishops." They have no claim, however, to apostolical succession. The first bishops under the new Danish régime were called "superintendents" (1536), and were consecrated by Bugenhagen. In Germany, church government is executed by consistories (composed of ministers and laymen) and superintendents. These officers are appointed by the government, examine candidates for the ministry, appoint and remove pastors, fix salaries, etc. In Germany, as in Denmark and Sweden, the Lutheran Church is under the governmental patronage of the various states; and the support of the congregations, and the construction of church edifices, are provided for out of the national revenues. The supreme consistory of Prussia since 1852 has been composed, in part of Lutheran, and in part of Reformed members. See RICHTER: D. evang. Kirchenordnungen des 16ten Jahrhunderts, 2 vols., Weimar, 1816; Gesch. d. evang. Kirchenverfassung in Deutschland, Leipzig, 1851; *Lehrbuch d. kath. u. evang. PHILIP SCHAFF.

LUTHERAN CHURCH (the Evangelical), In the United States.—EARLY HISTORY. Lutherans were among the first European settlers on this continent. They multiplied in a variable ratio for two centuries; but for the last fifty years the progress of this church has been remarkably rapid, being promoted both by the ordinary and natural growth, and by the large and constant influx of Lutherans from Germany and Scandinavia. It now ranks third or fourth in numbers among the Protestant communities, although in national position and public influence it has not attained the eminence occupied by other denominations which in numerical strength fall much below it. This fact is due, among other causes, to the want of efficient organization, to the extreme conservatism of the German mind, and especially to the continued dominance of foreign languages, but few exclusively English Lutheran churches having been thus far established in the principal cities.

The earliest representatives of Lutheranism in this country came from Holland. They formed a portion of the first Dutch colony, which in 1621 took possession of the territory now comprised in the city of New York. Holding to a confession that was at variance with that of the Netherland Reformed Church (although never sympathizing with the Arminians), these Lutherans suffered persecution from religious intolerance, which was inflicted by the local colonial government, but instigated by the ecclesiastical authorities of Amsterdam. They never enjoyed the liberty of having their own worship, or a pastor of their faith, until the establishment of British authority in 1664. The first clergyman permitted to serve them was the Rev. Jacobus Fabricius, who arrived in 1669. Their first house of worship was erected in 1671, a rude structure, which was subsequently replaced by a more substantial edifice at the corner of Broadway and Rector Streets, where worship was for a long time conducted "exclusively in the Holland and English languages," although in course of time there were considerable accessions of German and French Lutheran colonists.

The second distinct body of Lutherans arrived upon these shores from Sweden, in 1636, the result of a project long and earnestly contemplated by that illustrious Lutheran sovereign, Gustavus Adolphus. The colony settled along the Delaware. It was accompanied by a preacher named Reorus Torkillus. He was succeeded by Rev. John Campanius, who was the first Protestant missionary among the American aborigines, and who translated Luther's Catechism into their language. It was printed in Stockholm, 1696–98, and was the first publication in an Indian tongue, except John Eliot's Indian Bible, 1661–63.

Somewhat later in the same century an inconsiderable wave of emigration came from Lutheran Germany, and gradually spread over the fertile agricultural districts of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Central New York, and afterwards as far as North Carolina. These German Lutherans proved to be but "pioneers of the masses that soon rolled in after them." In the year 1710, thousands, whom the devastations of war and the religious oppressions under Louis XIV. compelled to flee from the Palatinate, and to seek refuge in Protestant England, were immediately, through the beneficent patronage of Queen Anne, forwarded to America, and settled along the Hudson, some sixty miles north of New York. Large tracts of land were allotted to them for the support of Lutheran ministers and parish schools, — princely domains, from which they were subsequently cruelly defrauded by another denomination.

The Colonial Records of Pennsylvania in 1717 contain an official statement, that "great numbers of foreigners from Germany, strangers to our language and constitution, have lately been imported into the province." Most of these were Lutherans; and the same province received in 1727 another large accession of these people from Würtemberg, the Palatinate, Hesse-Darmstadt, and other German principalities. Another considerable colony of Lutherans, driven by remorseless persecution from Salzburg, crossed the Atlantic in 1734, and, through the liberality of the British Parliament and the friendly interest of the Society for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge, established themselves in Georgia just after the first English settlers had taken possession there under Gen. Oglethorpe. Their first resting-place in the New World they piously named "Ebenezer." Their descendants constitute chiefly the Evangelical Lutheran churches of Georgia and South Carolina.

The great mass of Lutherans who emigrated hither from Germany were, for the most part, unattended by clergymen. They remained, for years, destitute of the ministrations of the word and the sacraments, and the church could for a long time assume no organic form. The people, however, continued devoted to the religious principles under which they had been reared; and having brought with them their Bibles, hymn-books, and other popular manuals of devotion, and having among their number school-teachers and others who were capable of conducting religious meetings, they were wont to assemble in private houses and in barns to celebrate the worship of their church, and to nourish themselves in the faith of their fathers by observations on the Catechism, or by reading from Arndt's True Christianity, or some other deeply spiritual work of Lutheran authorship. The pastors of the Swedish churches likewise gave them some assistance, instructing the young, and administering confirmation and the sacraments.

Thus Lutheranism in this country was for a century, if not "void," yet "without form," and "darkness" brooded over its chaotic state. The people being widely scattered, wofully straitened in their circumstances, without houses of worship, pastoral oversight, or any church order, with no bond of union among themselves, nor any ecclesiastical connection with the fatherland, surrounded by fierce Indians and by more inhuman savages from Europe, preyed upon by crafty impostors, worthless adventurers, deposed clergymen, and other false brethren and fanatics, the Lutheran Church can hardly be regarded as having a proper history till near the middle of the eighteenth century. There was no organism. Lutherans were here, but hardly a Lutheran Church. They were like scattered sheep surrounded by wolves, — a church in the wilderness. Yet so far from losing their ancestral faith, or being alienated from the religion of their youth, these people were animated with earnest longings for "the order and fellowship of their own church." They bewailed the moral devastation in the midst of which they were dwelling, and "sent imploring letters to Holland and to Germany" for spiritual guides, for teachers to instruct their children, for books, and pecuniary contributions toward the erection of houses of worship and the maintenance of churches and schools, — appeals which were not without avail. At length those Lutherans who had organized congregations in Philadelphia, New Hanover, and New Providence (the Trappe), sent a delegation of their brethren to Europe to represent their spiritual distress, to collect funds, and especially to secure proper men for the pastoral office. They were most cordially received in London by Rev. Dr. Ziegenhagen, the Lutheran chaplain of the English court; and in Germany, then aglow with the fervor of the earlier pietism, "they met with warm hearts, and fervent prayers, and material aid everywhere." This was in 1733. Earnest and judicious search was made for a man who combined the peculiar qualifications of spirit, mind, and body, indispensable for the arduous work and the appalling obstacles that must be encountered in planting the Lutheran Church on American soil. After the efforts of years, the very man was found whom Providence had singled out and fitted for this great undertaking; and in the year 1742 he came to this country, — an answer to the supplications long sent up to Heaven, as well as to those carried beyond the sea. This was HENRY MELCHIOR MÜHLENBERG, a man of marvellous intellectual and moral power, a born leader and apostle, a heaven-ordained bishop. His arrival on these shores marks an epoch in the Lutheran Church. His herculean and far-seeing labors constitute the era of its foundation. His immortal services merit for him the title of "Patriarch of the American Lutheran Church." (See H. M. MÜHLENBERG.)

Contemporaneous with Wesley, Whitefield, and Edwards, and imbued with the spirit of churchly pietism which he had imbibed at the university of Halle, Mühlenberg entered upon the stupendous task providentially assigned to him. His whole course was marked by apostolical wisdom and zeal, and by an almost superhuman resolution and fortitude. He fought his great battle for several years absolutely alone, without a colleague, without a friend, indefatigably occupied on the Lord's Day in preaching, and during the week in teaching school, catechising publicly and in families, visiting from house to house, anxiously solicitous for the spiritual condition of all his parishioners, and exercising a paternal supervision and a powerful influence over the whole Lutheran population in this country. His labors were followed by genuine and extraordinary success. A worthy colleague and two assistants from the fatherland in a little while joined him, and soon there prevailed a general awakening through all the region surrounding their labors. Men were everywhere hungering for the gospel in their native tongue. Importunate and availing entreaties were sent abroad for more ministers of the Word; new congregations were organized, churches and schoolhouses erected; strict ecclesiastical discipline was enforced; and the earnestness and abounding prayer of pious and learned pastors were reflected in the active zeal and the gentle Christian virtues of a devout people. Twenty congregations were reported in 1743. "There was apparent a steady increase in numbers, efficiency, and influence." "The comparative numerical strength of the church, the purity of its spirit, and the fidelity of its discipline, held out a most promising future."

This prosperity was not maintained; these bright prospects were not realized. A period of declension followed the general awakening which had taken place in the days of Mühlberg. The Lutheran population was indeed constantly increasing through the channel of immigration. In the autumn of 1750 twenty vessels arrived in Philadelphia with twelve thousand Germans. Similar numbers followed in succeeding years. About that period the Lutheran inhabitants of Pennsylvania alone are estimated at sixty thousand. A force of ministers adequate to the care of a community so large and so scattered was unfortunately wanting, and their increase was deplorably slow. In 1748 there were but eleven Lutheran ministers in all the Colonies now embraced in the United States; in 1750, but sixteen; and in 1768 the entire clergy did not comprise more than twenty-four names. Re-enforcements of excellent men continued to arrive at different periods from Halle; but the influx from abroad gradually abated, and no theological seminary had as yet been provided here for the training of ministers. This great want of laborers accounts largely for the long dearth and the sad declension which now came over the Lutheran Church. Other causes contributed to this unbappy condition, which lasted till near the close of the first quarter of the nineteenth century. Among them may be mentioned the moral ravages incident to the protracted war for independence; the great poverty of the German masses, leaving them with the most meagre provisions for public worship and with an utter lack of educational facilities; their infatuated and persistent opposition to the introduction of the English language into their churches, when this had become an absolute necessity if the young, the educated and the progressive elements, were to be retained in the Lutheran fold, and an impression made by Lutheranism upon the general public; the ingress of doctrinal and spiritual laxity following the rise of rationalism and the decay of orthodox pietism in Europe; the havoc made by false brethren who doffed the livery of the shepherd only to bring ruin and odium upon the fold; the almost universal prevalence of "contention, disorder, and divisions;" and the readiness of the young and worldly-minded to be drawn into denominations of greater prominence and external attractions.

This it happened that a church whose morning in this country was so bright in the time of Mühlberg, and which then gave "a prospect of eminent distinction and extensive usefulness among the churches of the land," experienced a long era of retrogression and gloom, during which the faithful few who still upheld the banner of Lutheranism, instead of rejoicing over steady progress and development, had to bewail melancholy disasters, the alienation of the best elements, the general discouragement of those who remained, and "the almost total ruin of the church."

ECCLESIASTICAL ORGANIZATIONS.—The first association of Lutheran ministers and churches was organized in Philadelphia, in the year 1748, under the title of the "German Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania." It consisted of six ordained ministers, and an almost equal number of lay representatives from the congregations. Its meetings were annual, and "were attended with the most beneficial results." Similar bodies were subsequently formed,—the Ministerium of New York in 1785, the Synod of North Carolina in 1803, the Synod of Ohio and Adja-cent States in 1803, and the Synod of Maryland and Virginia in 1819. These associations, which greatly promoted ecclesiastical prosperity in their respective territories, were geographically remote from each other, destitute of any bond of union or fellowship connecting them together, and without that mutual consultation, co-operation, and intercourse, so necessary to the general vocation and work of the church.

At length a spirit of enlightened activity was awakened; and an agitation for bringing these disconnected bodies into closer fellowship and greater efficiency resulted, in 1820, in the establishment of the General Synod.—an association with which all the synods, except that of Ohio, united, and which represented at the time a hundred and thirty-five preachers and thirty-three thousand communicants. The formation of the General Synod marks a second epoch in the Lutheran Church. Although but advisory in its functions, and purely negative on doctrinal tests, it became at once a rallying and a radiating centre, and gave a powerful impulse to ecclesiastical enterprise, organization, and development, not only among the Lutherans embraced within its bounds, but also among those who declined to unite with it. From this time, dates the successful establishment of theological seminaries, the founding of colleges, the formation of missionary societies and other benevolent agencies for the extension of Christ's kingdom. Remarkable prosperity and growth succeeded; so that the denomination, which in 1820 numbered less than 150 ministers, reached in 1863 a total of 1,365 ministers, 2,575 congregations, and about 300,000 communicants. At the time of its organization the constitution of the General Synod was absolutely silent on confessional subscription. It subsequently adopted a substantial recognition of the Augsburg Confession by requiring of the synods applying for admission adherence to the "fundamental doctrines of Scripture as taught, in a manner substantially correct, in the doctrinal articles of the Augsburg Confession," "with acknowledged deviation in minor or non-fundamental points." At the session of the General Synod at York, Penn., in 1861, this was changed into an unequivocal recognition of "the Augsburg Confession as a correct exhibition of the fundamental doctrines of the divine word, and of the faith of our church founded upon that word." The earlier attitude of this body towards the symbols of the Lutheran Church was always regarded by some as too indefinite, and as altogether inadequate for a Lutheran association. It proved one of the main causes which kept a number of synods aloof from the General Synod, and inspired their assaults upon it for disloyalty to the distinguishing doctrines of the church; and it confessedly tolerated teachings and practices which were at variance with historic Lutheranism, and which assimilated the church of the Reformation to denominations against which it had contended for centuries.

With a growing conservatism in the heart of the General Synod, a strong re-action against measures and worship not deemed in accordance with the confessions of the Church, and a fuller acquaintance among the English portion with its history and doctrines, there gradually arose a decided tendency to a stricter avowal of the Lutheran faith, and a fuller conformity to Lutheran principles and usages. A spirit of restless agitation and ecclesiastical discussion nurtured by personal and partisan contentions and by national jealousies, helped to develop this tendency into a party, many of whose representatives were animated with the hope, that, by the pronounced adoption of all the Lutheran symbols, all those independent synods whose one common trait was the cry for pure Lutheranism and the condemnation of the General Synod, might be gathered into one large, homogeneous, and powerful organization, which should realize the prospects, and fulfil the mission, of the Lutheran Church in America. A crisis arrived in 1864, when the Franckean Synod of New York, a body charged with grave unsoundness in Lutheran doctrine, was admitted into the General Synod, then assembled at York, Penn. A protest was presented against this action. The delegation of the Pennsylvania Ministerium withdrew. Violent controversies ensued. Other synods seceded from the general body, and several more were dismembered when the issue came before them of adhering to or separating from it.

This partial disruption of the General Synod, which, however, did not alienate from it all who heartily held the doctrines peculiar to the Lutheran Church, was followed by the organization of the General Council in 1866. This body adopted as its confessional basis "the doctrines of the unaltered Augsburg Confession in its original sense, as throughout in conformity with the pure truth of which God's word is the only rule;" adding, that, "in this formal reception of the Augsburg Confession, we declare our conviction that the other confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church . . . are of necessity pure and scriptural." The council was originally composed of twelve synods, representing a hundred and forty thousand communicants. Its annual conventions have been mainly occupied with discussions of doctrine, cultus, a constitution for congregations, and especially the question of pulpit and altar fellowship with those outside the bounds of true Lutheranism; while missionary and educational agencies have been left mostly to the individual synods connected with the council.

Notwithstanding the absolute declaration of its Lutheran faith by the General Council, several of the largest synods, composed almost entirely of Europeans, refused an alliance with it; and four synods which took part in its formation withdrew from it at an early period. This unfriendly attitude toward the council was, doubtless, in a great measure, due to the prejudices and jealousies growing out of the differences of language and nationality, to a rigid and cherished exclusiveness, and to an undisguised distrust of the perfect Lutheran orthodoxy of some of its leaders, who had long been identified with the General Synod, who had even distinguished themselves as its ardent champions, and who, it was feared, could not fail, in spite of their new position, to be tinged with the liberalism of the General Synod and of the other denominations with whom they had always fraternized. These independent and exclusive synods, which were characterized both by the stiffest adherence to the Lutheran symbols and by the most active and liberal endeavors for the extension of the church, felt, likewise, the necessity of closer union and co-operation among themselves; and, yielding to the general tendency towards unification, they formed in 1872 The Evangelical Lutheran Synodical Conference of North America. This body renders, if possible, still more complete submission to the Lutheran symbolical books than the General Council, and it professedly and actually denies altar and pulpit fellowship to all outside of its bounds.

At the outbreak of the civil war the Lutherans south of the Potomac, like all the other Protestant denominations, withdrew from the fellowship of their Northern brethren, and in 1863 organized The General Synod of the Confederate States, a title since changed to The General Synod of North America. The close of the war and the re-union of the States witnessed the restoration of fraternal feeling; but as the General Synod, from which the Southern synods withdrew, had in the mean while been sundered, and two rival bodies were in existence in the North, the question of re-union is complicated with the choice between these two bodies; and, as there are embraced in the church South diverse elements allied respectively to both, decisive action in the case is, for the present, unhappily deferred.

Thus the Lutheran Church, which enjoys the honor of never having sent forth any sect, finds itself, in the United States, the subject of numerous divisions, each claiming to be a purer representative of true Lutheranism than the others. There are, besides the four general bodies, a number of synods that have never united with either of them. The main wall of partition which separates one body from another is that of doctrinal rigor or freedom, a stricter or a laxer subscription to the confessions, although, besides this, national antagonisms and jealousies are likewise powerful factors in perpetuating these divisions; the General Synod being composed almost entirely of Americans; the Synodical Conference, of Europeans; and the General Council, of an unequal proportion of both. Deplorable as is this spectacle of numerous divisions in the same household of faith, they at the same time serve to stimulate the different bodies to greater activity, and to produce a desirable rivalry, especially in the sphere of home missions, which, by the increasing myriads of foreigners who come from Lutheran lands, and by the ability of the Lutheran Church to preach to them in every needed tongue, requires emphatically the devotion and activity of all these organizations.

WORSHIP. — In cultus the Lutheran Church of the United States, as throughout the world, holds it to be unnecessary "that the same human traditions — that is, rites and ceremonies instituted by men — should be everywhere observed;" and entire liberty is allowed in the ordering of public worship. The earlier congregations continued the usage, universal in the European Lutheran churches, of a moderate liturgical service combined with extemporaneous prayers. At a later period, and especially within the pale of the General Synod, the use of prescribed forms disappeared almost entirely; and for a long time the services in the Lutheran Church conformed to the prevalent extemporaneous practices of the dominant churches around it. But, with the growing tendency toward a Lutheran self-consciousness, there has likewise arisen a wide-spread and increasing desire for the inspiring formulas of prayer and praise which are interwoven with the best period of Lutheran church-life, and which conduce to the highest spiritual worship of the congregation. The sacred forms of the ancient liturgies are regularly employed in nearly all the churches outside of the General Synod; and the latter body recently adopted, along with the other general bodies, a common order of English service, arranged according to the consensus of the pure Lutheran liturgies of the 16th century. The general prayer is, as a rule, extemporaneous; and the sermon, in all Lutheran churches, holds the central place.

POLITY. — The American Lutherans claim, in accordance with Apol. Conf., art. XIV., that the Scriptures prescribe "no specific form of government and discipline for Christ's Church." Organization has never been a distinguishing glory of Lutheranism. The government that has generally prevailed in this country is a blending of certain principles adopted by the Congregationalists, with others that are recognized as Presbyterian. Three judicatories are acknowledged, — the council of each individual congregation; the district synod, composed of all the ministers, and one lay representative from each congregation within its bounds; and the general body, whose powers are mostly of an advisory nature, the final decision resting in all cases with the congregation. In the Synodical Conference the government is, on the one hand, strictly congregational in theory, on the other hand, really despotic in fact. When the congregation has chosen its pastor, he wields solely in his own hands the power of the keys.

LUTHERANS, Separate. When, in 1817, the union between the Lutheran and the Reformed churches was established in Prussia, the protest of J. G. Scheibel, professor of theology at Breslau, found much sympathy among the Lutherans. For several years, however, the movement was confined within the boundaries of simple literary polemics; but when the breaking of the bread was introduced in the administration of the Lord's Supper, by a cabinet order of 1830, Scheibel refused to obey; and, at the head of a body consisting of between two and three hundred families, he asked permission to continue administering the Lord's Supper after the old Wittenberg agenda. The permission was not granted, and Scheibel left the country. In 1834, however, the government relented. But in the mean time the party had progressed very rapidly under the leadership of Huschke; and the synod convened at Breslau in the same year declared that nothing would satisfy them but complete separation from the State church, and the formation of an independent organization. Persecutions then began. Several ministers were kept in prison for many years. A number of well-to-do laymen were reduced to poverty by money-fines. Not a few emigrated. The ministers Graban and Von Rohr formed in America the Buffalo Synod. With the accession, however, of Friedrich Wilhelm IV., in 1810, a change took place; and July 23, 1815, the concession for the foundation of a free church was given, and in 1850 the church numbered fifty pastors and about fifty thousand members.

Similar movements took place also outside of Prussia, in Saxony, Hesse, Baden. Perhaps no separation from the State church made a deeper impression than that of Theodor Harms at Hermannsburg, a brother of Ludwig Harms. The reason was neither dogmatical nor constitutional. Some changes were introduced by the government in the wedding formularies. Harms refused to accept those changes, and was suspended Jan. 22, 1878. He immediately formed an independent congregation, which in a short time numbered thirty-one hundred members. Meanwhile the relations between the Separate Lutherans and those Lutherans who had remained in the State Church was often very unpleasant, and bitter controversies arose. Finally dissensions broke out, even within the party itself. In 1858 Diedrich, pastor of Jabel, suddenly directed a violent attack against Huschke; and in July, 1862, his partisans convened a synod at Magdeburg (the so-called Immanuel Synod), which condemned the synod of Breslau, and would have no community with its members. A similar split was caused in Saxony by the Missouri Synod. In 1847 Professor Walther from Saxony formed the synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other States, which proved very successful, in the United States of America. Some members of that synod returned to Saxony, and formed in Dresden a Lutheranerverein, which soon occupied a prominent position. But the controversy between Ruhland and Grosse caused great disturbances and much confusion. In Francfort there are now four, and in Hesse-Darmstadt five, congregations of Separate Lutherans, holding no communion with each other, besides several "Free churches."

Dr. WANGEMANN (Berlin).

LUTZ, Johann Ludwig Samuel, b. in Bern, 1785; d. there Sept. 21, 1841. He studied at Bern, Tübingen, and Göttingen; entered the ministry; in 1812 was professor in the gymnasium, and rector of the literary school of Bern; in 1824 he took a pastorate, but in 1833 he resumed teaching as ordinary professor in the university of Bern. He held various other scholastic and ecclesiastical positions; and in every relation of life he proved himself active, useful, worthy. He was a very superior teacher, a humble Christian, a wise and patriotic citizen. After his death two volumes of his lectures were issued upon Biblische Dogmatik and Biblische Hermeneutik, Pforzheim, 1847 and 1849.

GÜDER.

LUTZ, Samuel, b. at Bern, Switzerland, 1674; was appointed pastor of Yverdon in 1703, of Amsoldingen in 1726, and in 1738 of Diessbach, where he died May 28, 1750. He is the representative of the elder Swiss pietism, which showed traces of a peculiar Lutheran coloring, just as the Lutheran pietism evidently was influenced by the Swiss reformers. His works, mostly of ascetic tendency, appeared in two collections, — Ein wohlriechender Strauss, Basel, 1736, and Ein neuer Strauss, Basel, 1756.

GÜDER.

LUZ (almond-tree), L., a Canaanitish city on the border of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 13), and near the site of Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 19, xxxv. 6, xlvi. 3); was taken by the descendants of Joseph (Judg. i. 23), and destroyed, with all its inhabitants, except one family, which had acted as spies, and emigrated into the district of the Hittites, where (H.) they founded another Luz.

LYCAÖNIA, a region of Asia Minor, bounded north by Galatia, east by Cappadocia, south by Cilicia, and west by Phrygia, and consisting of an elevated plateau, surrounded with high mountains, and noted for its wild asses and its sheep. It was a Roman province at the time Paul visited it (Acts xiv. 1-23, xvi. 1-6, xviii. 23, xix. 1). Its language seems to have been a corrupted Greek mixed up with many Syrian words, and was unintelligible to the apostles (Acts xiv. 14).

LYCIA, a region of Asia Minor, stretching along the Mediterranean coast, from Caria in the west to Pamphylia in the east, opposite the Island of Rhodes. After the fall of the Seleucida, it made itself independent, became very prosperous (as the ruins of its cities, Patara and Myra, testify), and exercised no small influence on Eastern politics (1 Macc. xv. 23). Under the reign of Claudius it was conquered by the Romans, and it was a Roman province when Paul visited it (Acts xxi. 1, xxvii. 5).

LYD'DA, the Greek name of the Hebrew Lod, a town belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, and situated in the plain of Sharon, on the road from Joppa to Jerusalem. It is mentioned in the New Testament (Acts ix. 32) as the place in which St. Peter healed the paralytic Æneas. Under Vespasian its name was changed to Diospolis (the "city of Zeus"), but the old name seems to have prevailed. Among the bishops present at Nicæa was also one from Lydda or Diospolis. But in the beginning of the sixth century the see seems to have been removed or abolished. According to legend, it was the birthplace of St. George; and Justinian built a church there in his honor. The church was afterwards burnt by the Moslems, then rebuilt by the crusaders, and finally destroyed by Saladin in 1196.

LYD'IA. See LUD.

LYDIUS is the name of a Dutch family, which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, produced several prominent theologians. — Martin Lydius, b. in Lübeck, 1539 or 1540; d. at Franeker, June 27, 1601; studied at Tübingen, and obtained in 1566 an appointment at the Collegium Sapienticæ in Heidelberg, but gave up that position after the accession of the strictly Lutheran Ludwig VI., 1576, and was appointed pastor in Amsterdam in 1580, and professor at Franeker in 1585. He wrote Apologia pro Erasmo, several orations, and poems. — Balthasar Lydius, b. at Umstadt, Hesse, 1576 or 1577; d. at Dort, Jan. 20, 1629; studied at Leyden, and was appointed pastor of Streekerk in 1602, and of Dort in 1608. He wrote, besides other works, a book on the Waldenses (Waldensia), of which the first volume appeared at Rotterdam, 1616, and the second at Dort, 1617. See BAYLE: Dict., iii. 114.

LYON, Mary, founder of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary; b. in Buckland, Franklin County, Mass., Feb. 28, 1797; d. at South Hadley, Mass., March 5, 1849. After her education at Byfield, near Newburyport, Mass., and teaching at Ashfield, she joined Miss Z. P. Grant (afterwards Mrs. Banister) in the Adams Female Academy at Londonderry (now Derry), N.H., 1824-28; went with her when she removed to Ipswich in the latter year, and remained with her until 1834, when she seriously set out upon the establishment of a female seminary of high standard, decidedly and professedly Christian in character, and with such charges that those of moderate means could avail themselves of its advantages. The scheme seemed chimerical to many, particularly since one element of it was, that the domestic work was to be done by the pupils themselves, and another, that the teachers were to be paid very low salaries, and were to consider their work as essentially missionary. Enough money was finally collected to insure the work. On Oct. 3, 1836, the corner-stone of the building was laid at South Hadley; and Nov. 8, 1837, although the building was hardly completed, the seminary was opened. She brought to the realization of her cherished scheme, health, enthusiasm, sound common sense, a noble intellect, definite intentions, indifference to worldly things, and eminent piety. For twelve years, till her death, she was principal of the institution, and thus moulded hundreds according to a noble and Christian plan. The seminary has ever been a nursery of missionaries, and to-day maintains its reputation for piety and efficiency, and is her fitting monument. See her Life by President Edward Hitchcock, Northampton, 1851; new ed., abridged and in some parts enlarged, New York [1858].

LYRA, Nicolaus de, b. at Lyre, a village in the diocese of Evreux, Normandy, at an unknown date; d. in Paris, Oct. 23, 1340. In 1291 he entered the Franciscan order at Verneuil, and was sent to Paris to study. After taking his degree as D.D., he taught there with great distinction, and was in 1325 made provincial of his order in Burgundy. Among his works are De Messia (a defence of Christianity against Judaism), Tractatus de . . . sacramentum, etc. But the work which made his fame was his Postillæ perpetuæ in V. et N. Testamentum, first printed in Rome (1471-72, 5 vols. fol.), next in Venice under the title Biblia sacra Latina cum postillis (1540, 4 vols. fol.), afterwards often. It is the most, if not the only, important monument of mediæval exegesis before the revival of classical learning. In contradistinction to most theologians among the schoolmen, Lyra understood both Greek and Hebrew (on account of his thorough knowledge of Hebrew many have supposed him to be a converted Jew, though without sufficient reason); and his linguistic knowledge offered him a sounder basis for exegesis, and raised him above many prejudices and fancies. He made a deep impression upon Luther: nevertheless, the well-known saying, Si Lyra non lyrasset, Lutherus non saltasset ("if Lyra had not played, Luther had not danced"), ascribes a much too great influence to the work. C. SCHMIDT.

LYSARNIAS. See ABILENE.

LYS'TRA, a city of Lycaonia, probably the present Bin-bar-Kilishch; was visited twice by Paul, the first time in company with Barnabas (Acts xiv.), the second time in company with Silas (Acts xvi.). It was probably the birthplace of Timothy (2 Tim. iii. 11).

LYTE, Henry Francis, the author of "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide;" b. at Kelso, Ireland, June 1, 1793; d. at Nice, November 20, 1847. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin; ordained in 1815; and after serving as curate near Wexford in Marazion, and Lymington, Hants, in 1823, he entered upon the perpetual curacy of Lower Brixham, Devon, a place on the channel-coast of England, and held the position till death. Up to 1818 he was unconverted; but, having been sent for by a brother-clergyman who was dying in a similarly unhappy state, he realized the wickedness and anomaly of his situation. The two instituted an earnest study of the Scriptures, and were changed in the spirit of their minds. Lyte began a life of devotion and spiritual fervor. His parish at Brixham was composed of sailors and fishermen, but he wrought very successfully among them. It is, however, as a hymn-writer that he is famous. He showed his poetical gifts in boyhood. In 1826 he published Tales upon the Lord's Prayer; in 1833, Poems chiefly Religious; in 1834, The Spirit of the Psalms, a metrical version; in 1846 edited Poems of Henry Vaughan, with a Memoir. Some of his hymns have attained a wide currency, such as "My trust is in the Lord," "Praise, Lord, for thee in Zion waits." "God of mercy, God of grace." But his best-known hymn is "Abide with me, fast falls the eventide." This was composed, it is said, on the evening of his last Sunday with his beloved flock at Lower Brixham, to whom he had, in great bodily weakness, addressed solemn words of parting, and administered the Lord's Supper. He gave the hymn, with the music he had adapted to it, to a dear relative, immediately upon its completion. See J. MILLER: Singers and Songs of the Church, pp. 431-433.

LYTTLETON, George, Baron; b. at Hagley, Worcestershire, Jan. 17, 1709; d. there Aug. 22, 1773. He was educated at Eton and Oxford; in 1744 was a lord-commissioner of the treasury; in 1754, a member of the privy council; in 1755, chancellor of the exchequer; raised to the peerage Nov. 19, 1756, as Baron Lytton of Frankley. He is well known as the author of Observations on the Conversion and Apostleship of St. Paul (London, 1747, frequently reprinted) and Dialogues of the Dead (1760). The first treatise is called by Leland (Deistical Writers) "a demonstration sufficient to prove Christianity to be a divine revelation;" and by Johnson, "a treatise to which infidelity has never been able to fabricate a specious answer." It is based upon the proposition that "the conversion and apostleship of Paul, alone, duly considered, is of itself a demonstration sufficient to prove the truth of Christianity." The proof of it is derived "from the history, circumstances, station, and hopes of Paul as a Jew, an enemy, a persecutor. No motives can seriously be assigned for his conversion to a despised faith, save an irresistible conviction of the truth of the miraculous history which he has recorded." He published a History of Henry II., 1764-71. His Memoirs and Correspondence appeared London, 1815, 2 vols.
