"From all that I ever saw of his country, or heard of his acts, he more closely approximated to the rulers of British India than any of his countrymen. For instance, it was the distinctive character of his government to protect the poor. If there is any class in India who can complain of British rule, it is the native aristocracy, to whom immunity from law is the breath of life. Consequently, under us, they fade away and disappear. Like wasps, they die when they have lost their sting. It is pleasant, doubtless, to see their hoards diffused; a village rises where a palace falls; and mantles of khim khaub and shawl cut up into jackets for the poor. But it would be better if we could keep both classes in the order and law of nature. Perhaps we shall educate and rear in time a rank of Indians that can be rich without vice, powerful without oppression, and capable of sharing in their country's government, yet of resisting bribes. I have heard that, in the Isle of Wight, a race of cats, without tails, has been perpetuated by one who had been docked. Then why despair?

"What in us is an imperfection, in Sawun Mull amounted to a vice. He could not tolerate a gentleman. A low-bred man himself, he hated any one who had a grandfather. Rich merchants he loved, and called around him, for they earned their money as he did himself; but inherited wealth he regarded as contraband, a thing to be seized as confiscated wherever found. Thus the same man who would lend money to a Jut to buy a plough, or dig a well, would keep a Mullanee Puthan out of his estate, and think he did God a service. Between the poor he did justice with great pains and impartiality; but a rich man, even if in the right, never got a verdict from Sawun Mull, without paying for it.

"With all this, he was respected by both rich and poor. One of the ablest natives I ever saw, told me 'he served Sawun Mull for three years, and sat before him in Durbar, where he transacted business every day during that period, yet never heard one foolish word come out of his mouth.' On reflection, he said: 'Yes, there was one bad habit he had got his tongue into, and I never could account for such a wise man so forgetting his wisdom. If a soldier offended him, he would say at once: Take away his arms! strip off his sword and shield, and turn him out of the service!'"

It was a hasty word of this sort which ultimately cost him his life:—

"He had a good soldier, who wanted to leave him, and whom he did not want to lose, so he put him off, at first, by soft words and promises; but, at last, when the soldier demanded his pay and his discharge he got up a law-suit against him, and threatened to put him in prison. The soldier remonstrated, and reiterated his demand. Sawun Mull got angry, and told his guards, as usual, to 'seize the rascal, and take away his sword and shield!' The soldier called out to the guards to lay hands on him at their peril, but stand back, and he would give up his arms. He then pulled off his sword and shield, and surrendered them. The guards asked if they should take him off to prison? 'No,' said the Dewan, 'let him sit at the door, that I may see him, and have a few last words, as I go out.' They were his last, indeed! The soldier had retained under his scarf a loaded pistol, and burning with indignation at the shame that had been put on him, after years of faithful service, he resolved to revenge himself, if it cost his life; so he cocked his pistol, under cover of the scarf over his breast and shoulders, and awaited the Dewan's coming. At last, the Durbar broke up, and Sawun Mull, with a smile of gratified malice, stopped before the arrested soldier, and commenced taunting him with the folly of his resistance. In the midst of the abuse, the soldier pulled the trigger, and the contents of his pistol were lodged in the Dewan's left breast, above the heart. The soldier was, I believe, cut to pieces by the guard. His victim bore up for about ten days, and was apparently recovering, when the wound broke out again, and caused instant death."

Such was the end of the "great and wise Sawun Mull." The reader will perceive there are queer doings sometimes going forward in the Punjab. There are, however, far more terrible things than this recorded in these volumes. Those who are fond of strong excitements may probably expect some glimpses of the smart fighting, in which the author is known to have been engaged; but, though the book affords some striking details and animated descriptions of the kind, they are much too long, and, in other respects, too inconvenient, for extraction. Here, nevertheless, is a small "predicament," which may possibly amuse somebody:—

"The battle of Kineyree was, for a long while, one of endurance; that of Suddoosam, though it lasted from noon till sunset, was one of incessant action. In the former, it was my painful duty to keep still, and quiet my men; in the latter, I did nothing but ride up and down the line, encouraging the different divisions to advance from point to point; now driving skulkers out of a village or a corn-field; now reproving a standard-bearer for letting other colours go a-head of him; now hurriedly thanking Cortlandt for pointing his own guns; now dashing off to keep on Sheikh Emamooddeen. The equestrian vicissitudes I underwent that day are truly ludicrous to remember, though very serious matters at the moment. I commenced the action on a big chestnut Arab, named Zál; but, sulky at being so long without his dinner, he refused to leap a canal, which had brought the artillery to a halt, and fell with me right in the middle. Nor with all my pulling and hauling could I get him out, and I was obliged to leave him till the fight was over. General Cortlandt then got me a bay horse from an officer in his artillery; but I had not gone two hundred yards when over he came backwards, and bruised me dreadfully on the ground. A shot had grazed his nose. Fat Sodik Muhommud Khan, Badozye, who was my aide-de-camp all that day, next put me on a grey belonging to one of his own followers; and this beast I had fairly ridden to a stand-still, when up came one of my ayces (native grooms) with a grey Cabul horse of my own, called Punch. 'What are you doing here?' I asked, for I had mounted Lake on this horse in the morning. 'Lake, Saliib, has sent it with his compliments, as he hears you have lost Zál, and he has borrowed another horse for himself!' So I finished my day upon Punch; and, when the fight was over, I thanked Lake for the timely thought. Lake burst out laughing, and said, 'I send the horse back? Never. That villain of a syce walked off with it, and left me without any horse at all!'

Some days after the battle of Sooddoosâm, there came a report that Dewan Moolraj was preparing to give battle again—Edwardes's army being then within a short distance from Mooltan. In the hurry of preparation, a grave accident befell the Major—we have throughout called him Major, though he was as yet only a Lieutenant, the account of which we must endeavour to find room for. He was in the act of writing to the Resident at Lahore, to urge the policy of immediately besieging the city of Mooltan, when he heard the unexpected news of the enemy's advance. The reader should note the nobly patient spirit manifested by the writer in regard to his misfortune, so gently, yet touchingly exhibited in the next passage:—

"I was in the very act of writing, when a horseman rode in from the picket, and reported that Moolraj's army were crossing the bridge, and were coming on to give us battle. Astounded, but unable to disbelieve, I beat to arms, summoned the chief officers, ordered the line to be turned out at once, and was holding a hurried conference with Lake and Cortlandt in my tent, while all three of us were jumping into boots, or buckling on swords and pistols, when a second horseman from the picket entered. I had just loaded my pistols and went on cramming them into my belt while listening to the man's report. The hammer of one got entangled, but, without looking to see what was the matter, I seized the barrel in my right hand, and pulled the pistol into its place. A loud report, a short pang, and I had lost the use of my right hand for life! The ball had passed through the palm, and lodged in the floor at my feet. But there was no time for regrets.

"The line had turned out, and Lake rushed to the field to take my duty and his own. Nobly he would have done both, but I must own it was a great relief to me to hear that as our line advanced the enemy retreated again behind the city walls, and proved to have been only a party of cavalry sent out to reconnoitre our position. Had Moolraj given us battle that day, the result must have been more doubtful than it had ever been before. All Lake's attention and guidance was demanded by his own undisciplined Dâoodpotras. He had had no time to become acquainted with my men, or they with him; and the accident which had happened at such a critical moment to their customary leader would have been an omen of certain defeat to their superstitious minds. Even as it was, the occurrence was unfortunate; for while it prevented me from being surrounded by my officers, as I was wont to be all day, and confined me like a prisoner to my bed, in Moolraj's hall of audience it was a subject of loud rejoicing and congratulation. At first I was reported dead, and Moolraj made a present to the messenger who brought the news; burying me with the decent remark, that I was 'a stout youth, and it was a pity I should be cut off so young!' On hearing that I had only lost my hand, he probably took the present back again, and thrashed the messenger.

"After this accident, I was twelve days without a doctor; at least a European one. The native doctor of General Cortlandt's troops sewed up my hand with a packing needle, and thought he had done a fine thing; but the agony it caused me I never can forget; for what with the laceration of the wound, the tightness of the stitches, and the intense heat of the sun, inflammation ensued, the hand swelled, the stitches grew tighter, and the pain greater, till at last I would have thanked either Lake or Cortlandt, if, instead of nursing me, they had drawn a sword and chopped the limb clean off. One day, too, a sympathising friend in the Indian navy came in to see me, and, intending to seat himself on my bed, sat down on my wounded hand which was stretched out on a pillow by my side, and then asked me, 'How I did?'

"At last Dr. Cole arrived from Lahore, cut the stitches, and relieved me of all pain in a moment; though it was many weeks before I could even put my hand in a sling; and, in spite of all that surgical skill could do, I shall never grasp a sword again. To a soldier, this is a great loss. On horseback, in subsequent engagements, I have felt quite defenceless; and though it seldom falls to a commander's lot to be personally engaged, yet it may so happen at any time; and it is not pleasant to know to a certainty beforehand that you have no chance of escape."

The Major informs us in a note that the consequences of this accident were aggravated by the discovery that he was not entitled to the poor compensation of a pension, "from the wound not having been received in action;" however, the Directors of the East India Company were good enough to honour him with "a special grant of one hundred pounds a-year, with reference to his eminent services." The Major has no complaint about the inadequacy of this, though some perhaps will think it rather a shabby bounty, considering the nature of the loss. For his own part, he only regrets that the left hand is not better educated, so as to leave a man prepared for accidents. He writes, playfully, in another place; "By the bye, why are we not all taught as children to use both hands alike? Nature gives us two hands, and fashion takes one away again. In civilized countries, the whole population are educated cripples. We laugh at the Chinese for robbing women of their feet, and forget that we ourselves cut off the arms of our children as soon as they can hold a spoon."

From what follows, the reader will be able to appreciate the kind of handling to which the wounded in these irregular armies are liable to be subjected, and the strange notions of surgery that prevail alike among the native practitioners and their victims:—

"In waiting so long for Dr. Cole's arrival, I was only sharing the fortunes of my men. To the wounded of Kineyree were now added the wounded of Sooddoosâm; and it was a dreadful sight to see them palliating mortal wounds with herbs and simples, or aggravating them with the prescriptions of their ignorant Hukeems. Some instances of their treatment will scarcely be believed, but were gravely persisted in, in the face of all remonstrance. If a man's arm was carried off at the elbow, he was made by his 'medical adviser' to plunge the stump into a caldron of hot oil, salt, and blue stone; whereby the flesh shrivelled up like the end of a leg of mutton. Even after Dr. Cole's arrival it was very difficult to induce the wounded to discard their own barbarous surgeons; for they would undergo any suffering rather than have a limb cut off; and they had heard that English surgeons always amputated, and never attempted to heal a wounded limb. Dr. Cole tried very hard to persuade one man to have his leg off; but he said, 'That was a poor cure; there was a fletcher in Mooltan, who would splice his leg with the bone of a goat as neat as could be.' And sure enough the maker of bows and arrows was bribed to come out from Mooltan, and undertook the case with the utmost confidence. Having killed a goat, he extracted the bone of its leg; then laid open the man's thigh, cut out the broken bones, measured off an equal length of the goat's, fitted it in, covered it up, and bound all tightly round with wet sinews, as if he had been mending a splintered bow. The patient was dead forty-eight hours afterwards, but nobody blamed the joiner; all shook their heads, and said, 'Wonderful! There is no controlling a man's destiny!'

"Of all the wounded in my force, the one who caused me the liveliest sorrow was Gholam Surwur Khan, Khâghwânee. This noble officer had not the rare ability of his friend Foujdar Khan in either camp or council; but for grandeur of stature, personal strength, skill as a swordsman, and reckless bravery in the field, he had no equal among thousands of brave men, and might well be called the Pride of the Border. Yet I have already recorded the close of his active career as a soldier. When our guns at Sooddoosâm were brought up by the canal, Moolraj's infantry on the right were emboldened to come out, and taunt our cavalry on the left. Surwur Khan called on his fifty men to follow him, and leaping over the canal charged into the foremost body, and drove them back upon their line. He was in the act of cutting down one of the last, when the foot soldier raised his musket, and shot Surwur Khan through the right arm, breaking both bones, and rendering it useless for life. To this case I particularly drew Dr. Cole's attention, and he was of opinion that amputation alone could save Surwur's life; yet he positively refused to lose his good sword arm, saying that without it he might as well be dead. 'There was a wise man at Ooch,' he said, 'who would mend his arm with a goat's bone, so that nobody could tell the difference;' and he set out in a dying state. An iron constitution, and implicit faith, carried him through; and though the wound was still open when I saw him last, and the arm hanging uselessly by his side, yet Surwur was quite well, and told me with a hearty laugh, that when I returned from England he would be quite able to wield his sword again. I need not add that in this case the sage of Ooch dispensed with the experiment of the goat's bone; but doubtless he considers that he established his superiority over the European Doctor Sahib."

English soldiers are the right fellows to make the best of an unpleasant situation. Here is a snatch of soldierly enjoyment in the midst of military dangers. In the camp before Mooltan, waiting to commence the siege, there were gathered, partly by accident, as many as half a dozen British officers, with one or two members of the navy, who had been sent with steamers to run up and down the Chenab; and thus, says Edwardes, "we had a delightful United Service Club; containing members of the army and navy, and a military surgeon." We give his description of a rather jolly evening:—

"For some time, 'Adam's ale' was the most generous potation we had wherein to drink each other's healths; but gradually the immortal Bass, and even such sophistications as Châteaux Margeaux and Lafitte found their way into the wilderness of war, and verified the saying that Englishmen will take England with them all over the world. One day I remember great mirth was excited by the arrival of a boat full of military stores, from the bottom of which, out of cannon-ball and gunpowder, came four and twenty dozens of soda-water, and (of all things in the world!) a 'prime Stilton cheese,' which Sir Frederick Currie had rightly conjectured would be acceptable under the walls of Mooltan. My wound did not prevent me from joining the merry party which assembled at dinner every evening under the shumyânûh (awning) in front of my tent; for the members of the club used to carry me out of my bed, and set me down close to the table where I could hear all the jokes, and contribute my own little share. At Mooltan the nights were always cool after the hottest day, and it was such a luxury to breathe the refreshing night air, and look up at the mild moon and stars, instead of a flaming sun, that it was generally midnight before we were tired of calling on the doctor to sing 'Annie Laurie,' or the 'Treasures of the Deep.' Happy nights indeed were those, though spent after days of danger and anxious thought, in the midst of a barbarian camp, and within three miles of a powerful and blood-thirsty enemy."

One of these dinner parties was attended with a disaster which threatened to be extremely serious: the camp being still before Mooltan, and the contemplated siege on the point of being commenced:—

"On the evening of the 17th of August, every member of the party which sat down to mess in our camp was seized with violent sickness during dinner. One by one we rose and left the table, and when we called for the doctor, found he too was sick, and could not assist any of us. Now that it is all over, I cannot help laughing at the scene, though it was serious enough at the time. There we were—Lakc, Lumaden, Cortlandt, young Hugo James, Cole, and myself—all sitting outside our tents in the bright cool moonlight, with servants pressing our foreheads, and every one of our heads in a basin, groaning like passengers in a steamer. In vain every one shouted, 'Cole! Cole! come here!'—a voice no longer to be recognised for the merry doctor's replied at convulsive intervals: 'It's no use your calling—my dear fellows—you're all poisoned, and—I'm poisoned myself—and, O dear! I am sure I shall die!'"

"So convinced was Cole that he should never get over it that he bequeathed his rifle to Lumaden, who was, between his own fits, supporting the doctor. 'Take it, my dear boy—it's the two-ounce, and—will reach—O my goodness!' In the midst of all our sufferings (which for the time they lasted were really severe), the unseasonable sound of suppressed laughter reached my ears, and listening for a moment I heard three voices making extremely merry over the sad condition of 'the Feringhees.' My suspicions were naturally aroused by a tone and language so strange in the midst of my own people, and advancing to the spot I found a barber, a water-carrier, and a scullion, collected round a fire, on which one of them was cooking his dinner. Calling for a light, I scrutinised their faces, and not knowing them, asked who they were. They had become serious now, and putting up their hands, replied: 'We are my lord's servants.' 'Why,' I said, 'I never saw you before in my life.' Several old servants stepped forward, and explained that these strangers had been entertained in the place of other servants who were ill; an affair with which they had not thought it worth while to trouble me in such busy times. 'And where did they come from?' At first nobody knew; but at last it appeared that they had all come out of the city of Mooltan; and that for the last fortnight (during which we had all experienced similar attacks, though much milder,) our meals had been cooked, and our water-jars filled, by the assistance of these visitors from the enemy's camp.

"There were no means of legally convicting them of a systematic conspiracy to poison us; but I did not hesitate to make the barber shave off the beards of the water-carrier and the scullion, and the scullion and water-carrier shave the barber on the spot; after which I had them all soundly flogged and turned out of the camp, when they ran as hard as legs could carry them to Mooltan.

"We all got over the attack in a few hours—even our good friend the doctor—and were never attacked again, so that we thought we were not uncharitable in the conclusion that our ci-devant domestics had been emissaries of Dewan Moolraj—that treacherous host who murdered his two guests in the Eedgah—that dastardly enemy who bribed Shoojan Sing to poison his general at Sooruj Koond."

The Major has no mercy on "poor Moolraj." With the healthy instinct of an able and brave man, he hates to see ambition and imbecility go together; and he has, very justly, no measure in his contempt for that spurious compassion which would sanctify the misfortunes of a villain. In his belief, "Moolraj is not the less a murderer because he was one on a large scale; because he murdered with an army instead of a kitchen knife," and with a robust indignation, he denounces him as the "assassin of his invited guests—a traitor, who dethrones the dynasty under which his family rose from insignificance to honour—a rebel, who, striking for his own independence, has riveted the chains of his country."

Here, for the present, must our desultory roamings through these volumes terminate. Should it be possible to arrange matters so as to enable us to return to them in another number, readers may be assured that we shall not neglect the opportunity. The book is one of excellent substance and execution in its kind. Frank and decisive in his opinions, sensible and serious at bottom, but continually flashing over with wit and geniality, the Major shows himself alike in soldiership and authorship as a man of true English mettle—one of those "good yeomen whose limbs were made in England," and who is manifestly a credit to his country. Readers who can afford it will do well to obtain these volumes, and peruse them carefully in connexion with the maps and plans provided to elucidate them; the time so spent will not be misemployed, as we are persuaded no one but a blockhead can read the book without having his stock of information considerably enlarged; his manly attributes stirred and burnished up, and his fancy playfully and pleasantly entertained. The author is as wise, too, as he is lively. There are remarks and aphorisms scattered throughout the volumes, of admirable pith and pertinence. For instance, this, which persons in perplexity might ponder with advantage:—"He who has to act upon his own responsibility, is a slave if he does not act also upon his own judgment." And again—"No man can stand firm with a quicksand underneath him." Very beautiful, too, is this passing allusion to his rude Afghan troops:—"Wild, barbarous, indifferent to human life, they were yet free, simple as children, brave, faithful to their master, sincere towards their God. The crowded city has its virtues, but so has the desert and the mountain; and he who walks the world aright will find something good wherever he finds man; and nothing barren from Dan to Beersheba." Altogether, this is a highly enjoyable and instructive book; not without its faults, of course, but they are so trifling, it is worth nobody's while to mention them. We shall, perhaps, return to it on another occasion.

LIBELLUS A MARGARETA MORE, QUINDECIM ANNOS
NATA, CHEISELE INCEPTVS.

"Nulla dies sine linea."

... Soe my fate is settled. Who knoweth at sunrise what will chance before sunset? No; the Greeks and Romans mighte speake of chance and of fate, but we must not. Ruth's hap was to light on y^e field of Boaz: but what she thought casual, y^e Lord had contrived.

Firste, he gives me y^e marmot.* Then, the marmot dies. Then, I, having kept y^e creature soe long, and being naturallie tender, must cry a little over it. Then Will must come in and find me drying mine eyes. Then he must, most unreasonable, suppose that I c^d not have loved the poor animal for its owne sake soe much as for his; and, thereupon, falle a love-making in such downrighte earneste, that I, being alreadie somewhat upset, and knowing 'twoulde please father . . . and hating to be perverse, . . . and thinking much better of Will since he hath studied soe hard, and given soe largelic to y^e poor, and left off broaching his heteroclitic opinions. . . I say, I supposed it must be soe, some time or another, soe 'twas noe use hanging back for ever and ever, soe now there's an end, and I pray God give us a quiet life.

Noe one w^d suppose me reckoning on a quiet life if they knew how I've cried alle this forenoon, ever since I got quit of Will, by father's carrying him off to Westminster. He'll tell father, I know, as they goe along in the barge, or else coming back, which will be soone now, though I've ta'en no heed of the hour. I wish 'twere cold weather, and that I had a sore throat or stiff neck, or somewhat that might reasonable send me a-bed, and keep me there till tomorrow morning. But I'm quite well, and 'tis the dog-days, and cook is thumping the rolling-pin on the dresser, and dinner is being served, and here comes father.

Father hath had some words with the Cardinal. 'Twas touching the draught of some forayn treaty which y^e Cardinal offered for his criticism, or rather, for his commendation, which father c^d not give. This nettled his Grace, who exclaimed,—“By the mass, thou art the veriest fool of all the council.” Father, smiling, rejoined, “God be thanked, the King our master hath but one fool therein.”

The Cardinal may rage, but he can't rob him of the royal favour. The King was here yesterday, and walked for an hour or soe about the garden, with his arm round father's neck. Will coulde not help felicitating father upon it afterwards; to which father made answer, “I thank God I find his Grace my very good lord indeed, and I believe he doth as singularly favour me as any subject within this realm. Howbeit, son Roper, I may tell thee between ourselves, I feel no cause to be proud thereof, for if my head would win him a castlc in France, it shoulde not fail to fly off.”

—Father is graver than he used to be. No wonder. He hath much on his mind; the calls on his time and thoughts are beyond belief: but God is very good to him. His favour at home and abroad is immense: he hath good health, soe have we alle; and his family are established to his mind and settled alle about him, still under y^e same fostering roof. Considering that I am the most ordinarie of his daughters, 'tis singular I s^d have secured the best husband. Daisy lives peaceable with Rupert Allington, and is as indifferent, me seemeth, to him as to alle y^e world beside. He, on his part, loves her and theire children with devotion, and woulde pass half his time in y^e nurserie. Dancey^o always had a hot temper, and now and then plagues Bess; but she lets noe one know it but me. Sometimes she comes into my chamber and cries a little, but the next kind word brightens her up, and I verilie believe her pleasures far exceed her payns. Giles Hieron lost her through his own fault, and might have regained her good opinion after all, had he taken half the pains for her sake he now takes for her younger sister: I cannot think how Ceey can favour him; yet I suspect he will win her, sooner or later. As to mine own deare Will, 'tis the kindest, purest nature, the finest soul, the . . . and yet how I was senselesse enow once to undervalue him.

Yes, I am a happy wife; a happy daughter; a happy mother. When my little Bill stroaked dear father's face just now, and murmured “pretty!” he burst out a-laughing, and cried,—

“You are like the young Cyrus, who exclaimed,—‘Oh! mother, how pretty is my grandfather?’ And yet, according to Xenophon, the old gentleman was soe rouged and made up, as that none but a child woulde have admired him!”

“That's not the case,” I observed, “with Bill's grandfather.”

"He's a More all over," says father, fondly. "Make a pun, Meg, if thou canst, about Amor, Amore, or Amores. 'Twill onlie be the thousand and first on our name. Here, little knave, see these cherries: tell me who thou art, and thou shalt have one. 'More! More!' I knew it, sweet villain. 'Take them all.'"

I oft sitt for an hour or more, watching Hans Holbein at his brush. He hath a rare gift of limning; and has, besides, the advantage of deare Erasmus his recommendation, for whom he hath alreddie painted our likenesses, but I think he has made us very ugly. His portraiture of my grandfather is marvellous; ne'ertheless, I look in vayn for y^e spiritualitie which our Lucchese friend, Antonio Bonvisi, tells us is to be found in the productions of y^e Italian schools.

Holbein loves to paint with the lighte coming in upon his work from above. He says a lighte from above puts objects in their proper lighte, and shews their just proportions; a lighte from beneath reverses alle y^e naturall shadows. Surelie, this hath some truth if we spiritualize it?

Rupert's cousin, Rosamond Allington, is our guest. She is as beautiful as . . . not as an angel, for she lacks the look of goodness, but very beautiful indeed. She cometh hither from Hever Castle, her account of y^e affairs whereof I like not. Mistress Anne is not there at present; indeed, she is now always hanging about court, and followeth somewhat too literallie the Scripturall injunction to Solomon's spouse—to forget her father's house. The King likes well cnow to be compared with Solomon, but Mistress Anne is not his spouse yet, nor ever will be, I hope. Flattery and Frenchified habitts have spoilt her, I trow.

Rosamond says there is not a good chamber in the castle; even y^e ball-room, which is on y^e upper floor of alle, being narrow and low. On a rainy day, long ago, she and Mistress Anne were playing at shuttlecock therein, when Rosamond's foot tripped at some unevennesse in y^e floor, and Mistress Anne, with a laugh, cried out, "Mind you goe not down into y^e dungeon"—then pulled up a trap-door in the ball-room floor, by an iron ring, and made Rosamond look down into an unknown depth; alle in y^e blacknesse of darkness. 'Tis an awfulle thing to have onlie a step from a ball-room to a dungeon. I'm glad we live in a modern house, we have noc such fearsome sights here.

Rosamond is sociable with alle, and mightilie taken with my husband, who, in his grave way, jests with her pleasantlie enough. Daisy, who seldom thinks anything worth giving an opinion on, said yestereven, when they were bantering eache other in Robin Hood's Walk, "I'm glad, Meg, she fancies your husband insteade of mine." 'Twas a foolish speech, and had better have bene left unsaid. What a pity that folks who say soe little shoulde say aught amiss. I have noe jealousy in my composition.

Father, hearing little Tom Allington hammering over y^e 34th Psalm this morning,—

"Child," says he, "don't say O! as unemphaticallie as if 'twere A, E, I, or U. David is labouring to expresse a thought too big for utterance. . . . 'Oh,—taste and see that the Lord is good.' Try it agayn. That's better, my little man. Yet once more."

I'm glad Rosamond is going. That tiresome saying of Daisy's rankles. A poisoned shaft will infect the soundest flesh. What a pity we ever use such. I never will.

Yes, she's gone, but Will is not happy. Oh God, that I should ever know this feeling! We can never be sure of ourselves; we can never be sure of one another; we can never be sure of any but Thee. For Thou art Love itself, without a shadowe of turning; and dost even condescend, in Thine exquisite tenderness, to call Thyself a jealous God . . . for of whom are we jealous but of those whom we passionately love? And such is the love, not the sternesse, wherewith Thou sayest unto our souls, "Thou shalt not love any God but me! thou shalt not make to thyself anie earthlie idol! for I the Lord thy God am . . . a jealous God,"—I cannot bear a rival on my throne, which is your heart. Love me firste, him next, even as much as you love yourself; and then I will bless y^e both.

Fecisti nos, etc.

Sancta mater, ora pro nobis, ora, ora.

Alas! am I awake, or dreaming still? He beganne to talk indistinctlie in his sleep last night, and as I cannot beare to heare people speak when they sleep but their heart waketh, I gently shooke him, and made him turn about; but not until that he had distinctlie exclaimed, "Tu, Jcsu, es justicia mea." Thercon, a suddain light broke in on me, and I felt, I know not how to expresse what sense of relief, at the apprehension that his disquietation was not for Rosamond, but on y^e old count of justification by faith. Waking up, he says,—“Oh, sweet Meg, I am soe unhappy,” and gives way to tears; but I try to relieve him. But the matter is too hard for me; we cannot unravel it, soe he holds his peace, and sleeps, or affects to sleep, the while I pray to every saint in y^e calendar.

I am glad I did him injustice; which is a strange thing for a wife to say.

How many, many tears have I shed! Poor, imprudent Will!

To think of his escape from y^e Cardinal's fangs, and yet that he will probablie repeat y^e offence. This morning father and he had a long, and, I fear me, fruitless debate in the garden; on returning from which, father took me aside and sayd,—

"Meg, I have borne a long time with thine husband; I have reasoned and argued with him, and still given him my poor, fatherly counsel; but I perceive none of alle this can call him home agayn. And therefore, Meg, I will no longer dispute with him." . . . "Oh, father!" . . . "Nor yet will I give him over; but I will set another way to work, and get me to God and pray for him."

And have not I done so alreadie?

I feare me they parted unfriendlie; I hearde father say, "Thus much I have a right to bind thee to, that thou indoctrinate not her in thine own heresies. Thou shalt not imperill the salvation of my child."

Since this there has beene an irresistibile gloom on our spiritts, a cloud between my husband's soul and mine, without a word spoken. I pray, but my prayers seem dead.

. . . Last night, after seeking unto this saint and that, methought "why not applic unto y^e fountain head? Maybe these holie spiritts may have limitations sett to y^e power of their intercessions—at anie rate, the cars of Mary-mother are open to alle."

Soe I beganne, "Eia mater, fons amoris." . . .

Then, methoughte, "but I am onlie asking her to intercede—I'll mount a step higher still." . . .

Then I turned to y^e greate Intercessor of alle. But methought, "Still he intercedes with another, although the same. And his owne saying was, 'In that day ye shall ask me nothing. Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, he will give it you.'" Soe I did.

I fancy I fell asleep with y^e tears on my cheek. Will had not come up stairs. Then came a heavie, heavie sleep, not such as giveth rest; and a dark, wild dream. Methought I was tired of waiting for Will, and became alarmed. The night seemed a month long, and at last I grew soe weary of it, that I arose, put on some clothing, and went in search of him whom my soul loveth. Soon I founde him, sitting in a muse; and said, "Will, deare Will?" but he hearde me not; and, going up to touch him, I was amazed to be broughte short up or ever I reached him, by something invisible betwixt us, hard, and cleare, and colde, . . . in short, a wall of ice! Soe it seemed, in my strange dreame. I pushed at it, but could not move it; called to him, but could not make him hear: and all y^e while my breath, I suppose, raised a vapour on the glassy substance, that grew thicker and thicker, soe as slowlie to hide him from me. I could discern his head and shoulders, but not see down to his heart. Then I shut mine eyes in despair, and when I opened 'em, he was hidden altogether.

Then I prayed. I put my hot brow agaynst y^e ice, and I kept a weeping hot tears, and y^e warm breath of prayer kept issuing from my lips; and still I was persisting, when, or ever I knew how, y^e ice beganne to melt! I felt it giving way! and, looking up, could in joyfulle surprize, just discern the lineaments of a figure close at t'other side; y^e face turned away, but yet in the guise of listening. And, images being apt to seem magnified and distorted through vapours, methought 'twas altogether bigger than Will, yet himself, nothing thelesse; and, y^e barrier between us having sunk away to breast-height, I layd mine hand on's shoulder, and he turned his head, smiling, though in silence; and . . . oh, heaven! 'twas not Will, but ———.

What could I doe, even in my dreame, but fall at his feet? What could I doe, waking, but the same? 'Twas grey of morn; I was feverish and unrefreshed, but I wanted noe more lying a-bed. Will had arisen and gone forthe; and I, as quicklie as I could make myself readie, sped after him.

I know not what I expected, nor what I meant to say. The moment I opened the door of his closett, I stopt short. There he stode, in the centre of the chamber; his hand resting flat on an open book, his head raised somewhat up, his eyes fixed on something or some one, as though in speaking communion with 'em; his whole visage lightened up and glorified with an unspeakeable calm and grandeur that seemed to transfigure him before me; and, when he hearde my step, he turned about, and 'steade of histing me away, helde out his arms. . . . We parted without neede to utter a word.

Events have followed too quick and thick for me to note 'em. Firste, father's embassade to Cambray, which I shoulde have grieved at more on our owne accounts, had it not broken off alle further collision with Will. Thoroughlie homesick, while abroad, poor father was; then, on his return, he noe sooner sett his foot a-land, than y^e King summoned him to Woodstock. 'Twas a couple o' nights after he left us, that Will and I were roused by Patteson's shouting beneath our window, "Fire, fire, quoth Jeremiah!" and the house was a-fire, sure enow. Greate part of y^e men's quarter, together with alle y^e out-houses and barns, consumed without remedie, and alle through y^e carelessnesse of John Holt. Howbeit, noe lives were lost, nor any one much hurt; and we thankfullie obeyed deare father's behest, soe soone as we received y^e same, that we woulde get us to church, and there, upon our knees, return humble and harty thanks to Almighty God for our late deliverance from a fearfulle death. Alsoe, at father's desire, we made up to y^e poor people on our premises their various losses, which he bade us doe, even if it left him without soe much as a spoon.

But then came an equallie unlookt for, and more appalling event: y^e fall of my Lord Cardinal, whereby my father was shortlie raised to y^e highest pinnacle of professional greatnesse, being made Lord Chancellor, to y^e content, in some sort, of Wolsey himself, who sayd he was y^e onlie man fit to be his successor.

The unheard-of splendour of his installation dazzled the vulgar; while the wisdom that marked y^e admirable discharge of his daylie duties, won y^e respect of alle thinking men, but surprized none who alreadie knew ffather. On y^e day succeeding his being sworn in, Patteson marched hither and thither bearing a huge placard, inscribed, "Partnership Dissolved;" and apparelled himself in an old suit, on which he had bestowed a coating of black paint, with weepers of white paper; assigning for't that "his brother was dead." "For now," quoth he, "that they've made him Lord Chancellor, we shall ne'er see Sir Thomas more."

Now, although y^e poor Cardinal was commonlie helde to shew much judgment in his decisions, owing to y^e naturall soundness of his understanding, yet, being noe lawyer, abuses had multiplied during his chancellorship, more especiallie in y^e way of enormous fees and gratuities. Father, not content with shunning base lucre in his proper person, will not let anic one under him, to his knowledge, touch a bribe; whereat Dancey, after his funny fashion, complains, saying,—

"The fingers of my Lord Cardinal's vericest door-keepers were tipt with gold, but I, since I married your daughter, have got noe pickings; which in your case may be commendable, but in mine is nothing profitable." Father, laughing, makes answer,—

"Your case is hard, son Dancey, but I can oulie say for your comfort, that, soe far as honesty and justice are concerned, if mine owne father, whom I reverence dearly, stodee before me on y^e one hand, and the devil, whom I hate extremely, on y^e other, yet, the cause of y^e latter being just, I shoulde give the devil his due."

Giles Heron hath found this to his cost. Presuming on his near connexion with my father, he refused an equitable accommodation of a suit, which, thereon, coming into court, father's decision was given flat against him.

His decision against mother was equallic impartial, and had something conique in it. Thus it befelle.—A beggar-woman's little dog, which had beene stolen from her, was offered my mother for sale, and she bought it for a jewel of no greate value. After a week or soe, the owner finds where her dog is, and cometh to make complaynt of y^e theft to father, then sitting in his hall. Sayth father, "Let's have a faire hearing in open court; thou, mistress, stand there where you be, to have impartial justice; and thou, Dame Alice, come up hither, because thou art of y^e higher degree. Now then, call each of you the puppy, and see which he will follow." Soe Sweetheart, in spite of mother, springs off to y^e old beggar-woman, who, unable to keep from laughing, and yet moved at mother's losse, sayth,—

"Tell'ee what, mistress . . . thee shalt have 'un for a groat."

"Nay," saith mother, "I wou't mind giving thee a piece of gold;" soe the bargain was satisfactorily concluded.

Father's despatch of businesse is such, that, one morning before the end of term, he was tolde there was noe other cause nor petition to be sett before him; the which, being a case unparalleled, he desired mighte be formally recorded.

He ne'er commences businesse in his owne court without first stepping into y^e court of King's Bench, and there kneeling down to receive my grandfather's blessing. Will sayth 'tis worth a world to see y^e union with which the deare old man bestows it on him.

In Rogation-week, following the Rood as usuall, round y^e parish, Heron counselled him to go a horse-back for y^e greater seemlinesse, but he made answer that 'twoulde be unseemlic indeede for y^e servant to ride after his Master going a-foot.

His grace of Norfolk, coming yesterday to dine with him, finds him in the church-choir, singing, with a surplice on.

"What!" cries y^e Duke, as they walk home together, "my Lord Chancellor playing the parish clerk? Sure, you dishonour the King and his office."

"Nay," says father, smiling, "your grace must not deem that the King, your master and mine, will be offended at my honouring his Master."

Sure, 'tis pleasant to heare father taking y^e upper hand of these great folks: and to have 'em coming and going, and waiting his pleasure, because he is y^e man whom y^e King delighteth to honour.

True, indeed, with Wolsey 'twas once y^e same; but father neede not feare y^e same ruin; because he hath Him for his friend, whom Wolsey said woulde not have forsaken him had he served Him as he served his earthly master. 'Twas a misproud priest; and there's the truth on't. And father is not misproud; and I don't believe we are; though proud of him we cannot fail to be.

And I know not why we may not be pleased with prosperitic, as well as patient under adversitie; as long as we say, "Thou, Lord, hast made our hill soe strong." 'Tis more difficult to bear with comelnesse, doubleesse; and envious folks there will be; and we know all things have an end, and everie sweet hath its sour, and everie fountain its fall; but . . . 'tis very pleasant for all that.

TRIUMPHS OF STEAM.

PART V.

PROSORPTEIA is a rhetorical figure which has ever been freely employed by poets and prosateurs with reference to our earth, and comparison to an animated being is readily enough suggested by the vast orb in motion, like a huge moth wheeling round an enormous flame, in which, according to some philosophers, it is doomed finally to terminate its existence. We may venture, therefore, to indulge in the same figure of speech, but prefer to regard our orange-shaped home as a creature of more intelligence, whose anatomy need not be resigned exclusively to geologists, but is susceptible of ordinary physiological description. It is a multi-mouthed and poly-armed creature, for every river boasts its embouchure, while the arms of the sea extend in all directions, stealing lovingly round the necks of land in their proximity. Railroads are the world's muscles and sinews; for they unite the distant parts together, and convey between them what is required from each. The nervous system is commonly known as the Electric Telegraph, which communicates accurately and instantaneously between town and town, as between member and member; and if you ask, reader, What represents the vital fluid? we would remind you of the circulating medium. Banks and cash-boxes, of course, form naturally the vascular system. We are not about to describe the vascular system. Save us from monetary essays, from currency questions, and California perplexities. Sinews are our subject—not the “sinews of war,” but the sinews of peace, which contract by their enormous power the ends of the earth into union.

Truly, of all the wonders worked in the last half-century—(and how pleasantly every one boasts of them, as though each had lent a helping hand, and while, in fact, many employed the utmost of their power in narrow and ignorant opposition to these great deeds)—of all the advantages talent and civilization have achieved for man in this period, the vast improvement in our means of transport is at once the most striking to our senses, and is chiefly pregnant with promise of still grander effects yet to be revealed. Its importance cannot be over-rated; for easy inter-communication, national and foreign, is the groundwork of civilization. In proportion as facilities exist for mutual intercourse and the transport of merchandise, will the nation’s resources become developed, and the people advance in social progress. One glance of comparison with the past, if not needed for conviction, must at least prove interesting as a note of progress made, and excite a further note of triumph at our onward career. First, then, for a sketch of the past;—and we are going a long way back, even to the Assyrians; but the most anti-antiquarian of our readers may allay all alarm. At a rate worthy of this express age, and consistent with our present subject, shall we restore them to the scenes of modern days.

—“throws out acclamations of self-thanking, self-admiring,

With at every mile run faster, ‘O the wondrous, wondrous age!’”

During the infancy of commerce, the removal of goods would be effected entirely by the simple burden-bearing powers of man and the animals he had subjected to his use; who, following the course of streams, would thus select the most level route between the posts of communication. This laborious method of transport would become lightened by the introduction of vehicles on the sledge principle; and afterwards by those supported on wheels; and such carriages requiring a hard and smooth surface for their advantageous employment, would indicate the necessity for the production of roads.

The earliest roads of which we possess any record were those constructed in the empire of Semiramis, but these do not appear to have been applied to the use of commerce. It is to the Carthaginians we are indebted for the invention of paved roads; and the works of this kind executed by that people and their parent Phœnicians are the first that were applied to a commercial purpose. Roads were formed with much care by the more polished of the Grecian states, but highways were never in a very flourishing condition with a nation so constantly at variance among themselves. The Romans borrowed the invention from their Punic adversaries, but, disdaining their pacific object, undertook and accomplished gigantic military roads worthy of their warlike genius and national grandeur. These magnificent works—one singular feature of which was the selection of hills for the sites of the roads, and the avoidance of low ground (that the leaders might observe the surrounding country and the motions of an enemy from the watch-towers with which they were studded)—displayed the abilities of the Roman citizens in an eminent degree,—by the levellings, excavations, viaducts, and other engineering operations required for their completion, and which could not have been accomplished without much enterprise and talent. In order to maintain dominion over the nations she had vanquished, Rome sought to possess the means by which she could most rapidly pour her conquering troops into any portion of her acquired territories, and to this end established the vast system of direct roads which in their ruins reflect her greatness. The celebrated Via Appia (constructed A.U.C. 442, and extending 300 miles from the capital), the Via Aurelia and Flaminia, were the earliest of these lines of communication: and Italy, Sicily, Corsica, Sardinia, Germany, France, Spain, and England, all exhibit traces of these monuments of Roman skill. In Italy alone their extent has been estimated at 14,000 miles; and their total extent at 48,500 miles, including the labours of this nature performed in Asia and Africa. Some are represented as being divided by a footpath paved with bricks; the carriages travelling in each direction being confined to their appropriated division, as in a double line of railway.

England is indebted to the invasion of the Cæsars for the first artificial ways which penetrated her wastes and wilds. These were respectively the Ikenald, connecting Norwich with Dorsetshire; the Fosse-way, passing through Bath, and extending to the Ermine Street, which commenced at London, and passed through Lincoln and Carlisle into Scotland; and Watling Street, the fourth main line, commencing at Richborough, passing through London, and continuing to Chester. From these main trunks branches extended in directions suited to the requirements of the invaders. When the Romans forsook Britain, the rude islanders utterly neglected the roads graciously bequeathed by the retiring conquerors, and conducted their limited intercourse after a somewhat similar fashion to that enjoyed by the Ojibbeways and Blackfeet of modern times. Miserable indeed were the means of traffic many centuries later, nor was it till the reign of Queen Mary that the first act of the legislature was passed which provided for the maintenance of the roads, by the introduction of a system, not peculiar to England, but at one time of European prevalence.

This statute, still in force, “for amending of highways, being now both very noisome and tedious to travel in, and dangerous to all passengers and carriages," required all persons, according to their ability, to work on the roads four days yearly, or to provide substitutes for their own labour. A new era dawned upon the communicating means of the country in the sixteenth year of the reign of the "merrie monarch," when the first toll-road was constructed, which traversed the counties of Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire, and which long remained an isolated work of its kind. At the beginning of the last century, until which time journeys in England were almost entirely equestrian, turnpike roads attracted in a greater degree the attention and favour of the people and the government: but the records of travelling at that period afford to railway express passengers a most fruitful theme of antithetic fun.

The carrying trade between Yorkshire and Lancashire, and the West of England and Birmingham, was chiefly effected by pack-horses; while travellers were accommodated by the fly-wagon. These dock-tailed quadrupeds, gaily adorned with parti-coloured worsteds, and enlivening their way with the cheery sound of the tinkling bells they bore, journeyed along a narrow flagged pathway, skirted on both sides with deep deposits of mud, which paths are still to be met with in the districts mentioned. Nearly the whole of the merchandise of Scotland was conveyed by pack-horses till within the last hundred years; including not only grain and coals, but even turf, hay, and straw. Carts were employed in long journeys, as journeys were reckoned then. And long enough they must be admitted to have been, when the Selkirk and Edinburgh carrier occupied fourteen days in the performance of his thirty-eight miles; part of which lay through the district of Galt Water; and gladly the acute carrier availed himself of the bed of the stream, as affording the easiest travelling, when this was permitted by the state of the flood. This rate of speed was certainly outdone by the one Edinburgh and Glasgow six-horse stage-coach, which was established in 1678, not many years after the introduction of these vehicles, which succeeded the "loug-wagon" of earlier days. The distance to be traversed is forty-four miles each way, and by dint of most persevering and praiseworthy efforts, the performance was duly accomplished in the wonderfully short period of six days—actually exceeding fourteen miles a-day! Seventy years later, its successor required a day and a half to make the journey between these cities; and the time now needed for transit is the same number of hours. In 1667, the coach occupied forty-eight hours on its way from London to Oxford; and in 1742, the solitary stage between these cities reached its destination in thirty-six hours. A century later the Great Western express achieved the same distance in one hour and three-quarters. From London to Nottingham, in 1692, the coach was four days on the road, exactly the same period required by the Exeter coach in 1725. Now, the Great Western express traverses the 193 miles in four hours.

The "Birmingham Flying Machine" astonished

Middlesex, Warwickshire, and the intermediate counties, in 1765, by travelling from London to Bromwich, through Coventry, in one day and a half; journeying to and fro twice a-week, and charging only a guinea and a half for an inside passenger. One monthly stage-coach pursued its stately way between the English and Scotch metropolitan cities in 1763, completing each trip in from twelve to fourteen days, and conveying, it is estimated, every month about twenty-five passengers. Forty-eight hours were occupied by the coaches of 1830, and one-quarter of that time by the rail-trains of to-day.

Almost to the close of the last century the greater portion of the roads were in a terrible condition, as memoirs of those days sufficiently attest. In Lancashire, that web of railways, occurred Arthur Young's well-known "eighteen miles of execrable memory," over which he travelled in 1770, where he actually passed three broken down carts, and which he "seriously cautions all travellers who may purpose to travel this terrible country to avoid as they would the devil; for a thousand to one they break their necks or their limbs by overthrowing or breakings down;" warning them "they will meet with ruts four feet deep, and floating with mud only from a wet summer." Merchandise was transported at this time almost exclusively by wagons travelling at their top speed twenty-four miles a-day. The cost of traffic was prodigious, the rate levied between Leeds and London being 13*l.* a ton, and 2*l.* between Liverpool and Manchester. Within the last half century Mr. Macadam, and after him Mr. Telford, bestowed their attention upon our rough and crooked ways, the former gentleman devoting himself to surfacial improvements, the latter engineer to the foundations of the highways; and their extension and perfection during this period has been miraculous. Now, the turnpike-roads and paved streets throughout England and Wales exceed 22,500 miles, the debt and unpaid interest of which amounts to upwards of 8,000,000*l.*; they are maintained at an annual cost of about 1,000,000*l.*, and are studded with nearly 8,000 toll-gates. The cross-roads, exclusive of the foregoing, are estimated at 97,000 miles, and 1,200,000*l.* is reckoned to be the yearly expense of maintenance. If space permitted, we should like to sketch the phases through which the vehicles passed that rolled along their surface before they attained the excellent equipment and general perfection of the "fast light coaches," and the last night-mails. They latterly travelled at the average rate of 10½ miles an hour, but at their highest speed achieved 11 miles an hour, including stoppages. The delay incident on changing horses was reduced by the admirable promptitude and arrangements observed, to the circumscribed limit of one minute. In the year 1837 the Commissioners of Stamps licensed 3,026 mails and stage-coaches; of which number 1,507 either took up the reins in London, or resigned them in that city. But all are now supplanted. The deserted road no more echoes their lively rattle, nor glistens with their gay beauty—

"For now, alas! the place seems changed;
 They are no longer here;
 Part of the sunshine of the scene
 With them did disappear."

As the steam-ship has superseded the American liners, so the British four-in-hands have bowed to the supremacy of the locomotive. That thrilling bugle, wound upon the summit of the hill overlooking the village, which whilome summoned the relay of gallant steeds led forth by the brisk ostler, and congregated the curious and the gossips of the hamlet to gaze upon the smart "turn-out" and its ever-varying freight,—that bugle is silenced now by the shrill steam-whistle, which has already, by its familiarity, almost ceased to excite the spasmodic saltations of elderly ladies of the most susceptible nerves. The soldierly guard has acquired on railways a policeman-luc, while the Tony Weller family is well-nigh extinct, full many a dirge having been chanted to his pleasant memory. The aborigines of "the road" have been gradually swept away before the "drivers" of more fiery steeds: stage-coachmen and guards, in 1842, having been reduced to 2,107; and in the following year the remnant of this branch of the family of Jehu and their faithful attendants numbering only 146. Since that year no returns have been rendered. The fate of that small few is involved in equal mystery with that of the lost tribes, for no Fenimore Cooper or Bulwer Lytton has arisen to trace the history of the last genuine knight of the ribbons. Do you seek a specimen of his once jocund race? Look rather for an Irish sedan-bearer, a Knight Templar, an ancient Pict, or a live Megatherium: equal are the chances of success. He is another man, the coachman of to-day; a distinct species, an inferior being: a mere caterer to the gigantic and remorseless destroyer of his predecessors. And the gay and gallant post-boys—steam has not left them unchanged. The delightful prerogative of unceasing juvenility is for ever withdrawn. Post-boys have at length become developed into manhood by that well-known, all-powerful, artificial incubator—steam!

Before proceeding to the introduction of railroads, we must not neglect to notice the valuable means of internal transport provided by canals. Checked though they have been, and staggered, by the rapid spread of railways, they are by no means inclined to relinquish the contest against their formidable opponents without a struggle. Canals were formed by the Egyptians and Chinese, ages ago, to a very considerable extent; but they could not be carried into the interior of countries much raised above the level of the sea before the introduction of locks, a word said to be derived from the Anglo-Saxon loc, signifying enclosure. Fumagalli ascribes "the first application of a series of locks by which water was made to walk up and down stairs," to the universal genius of Leonardo da Vinci; but Zendrini states them to have been the invention of the brothers Domenico of Viterbo, and first applied by them in 1481. Exactly two centuries after this date the famous Languedoc canal was completed, with its 100 locks and 36 aqueducts, and constructed at an elevation of 600 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. As with the roads so with the canals, the Roman works were of greatest magnificence, of which the Aqua Claudia and the Anio Novus are of chief celebrity. But the most colossal of their hydraulic works were the vaulted drains, the main trunk of which, named the Cloaca Maxima, remains to this day, after a duration of 2,000 years, as perfect as at the date of its construction; a remarkable trophy of laborious skill. The first modern aqueduct was that of the canal of Martesana in the Milanese, which was carried over the torrent of Molgora in 1460, by means of a bridge consisting of three arches of about thirty feet span. England was far behind the rest of Europe in availing herself of these important aids to commerce, which backwardness is attributed to the facilities of her coasting-trade and the extent of her navigable rivers: but once embarked in the enterprise she conducted it with her usual spirit. The first project for a work of this nature in Britain was that of canalising the river Avon from the Severn near Tewkesbury, through Worcestershire and Warwickshire, which was proposed by Mr. Sandys of Flatbury, Worcestershire, in the year 1635: but the civil dissensions which followed diverted men's thoughts from cutting canals to the more exciting but less commendable operation of cutting human throats, so the scheme was abandoned. Canals in this island date their origin from 1755, in which year was passed the legislative enactment (the first of its kind) for the formation of a canal $11\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, lateral with Saukey Brook, extending from the river Mersey to St. Helen's in Lancashire. Before its completion, the Duke of Bridgewater obtained an Act of Parliament, in 1759, enabling him to cut his first canal from Manchester to Worsley, where he owned a large estate rich in fields of coal.

The duke was so fortunate as to secure the services of the talented and remarkable James Brindley, who conducted the work with extraordinary ingenuity. On this canal, the aqueduct crossing the Irwell was stretched from bank to bank at a height of 39 feet above the level of that river; concerning the practicability of which construction, generally ridiculed, a celebrated engineer of the day having been consulted, he remarked scoffingly, that "he had often heard of castles in the air, but was never shown before where any of them were to be erected." From this period canals rapidly channelled England in all directions, and in 1803, at the close of that year, 2,295 miles were completed. Since that time nearly 500 miles have been added, besides the Irish and Scotch canals; thus aggregating in the United Kingdom upwards of 3,000 miles. Of these the most remarkable is the Caledonian Canal, from Fort William to Inverness; executed under the superintendance of Mr. Telford, and extending $60\frac{1}{2}$ miles, including Loch Ness, Loch Oich, and Loch Lochy; yet requiring 23 miles of artificial cutting. It was completed in 1834: its surface breadth being 120 feet; its depth, 15 feet; and its width of bed, 50 feet. Twenty-eight locks, each 172 feet in length, were required for this really magnificent work; and the total cost is stated at 1,149,613*l*. Our rivers are navigable to an extent exceeding 1,800 miles, so that there is now available in England alone, upwards of 4,000 miles of internal navigation. In the United States of America, the extent of canals now in operation is upwards of 4,400 miles, requiring an outlay of 27,870,964*l*. This statement includes the Erie Canal, connecting the Hudson River with Lake Erie, which is 363 miles in length, and cost upwards of 5,000,000*l*. sterling. In France the total length of their canals is about 2,700 miles. For the conveyance of heavy goods at a slow rate,—say three miles an hour,—no method can be compared to this means of transport, with respect to the resistance presented to motion, or, in other words, the force of traction required. But the tardiness of this mode of traffic, and the interruptions to which it is subject from deficiency of water in summer and frost in winter, the value of speed, and superior certainty, will award the preference to railway transit. Moreover, goods are conveyed more safely as well as more expeditiously on the railroad. There are regular dépôts established along the aqueous traffic lines, for plundering and disposing of the stolen property; and it has been estimated that the loss of coal by pilferage on navigation, amounts to five per cent. It does not appear from the traffic returns or the dividend tables, that Canal Companies have yet suffered much from the establishment of their rivals. A comparison has been made of the amount of goods annually transported on the Grand Junction Canal before and after 1836, the year in which the London and Birmingham Railway was opened. From this it is gathered that during the three years previous to that event, the merchandise yearly removed amounted to 756,894 tons; and during the subsequent 12 years to 1,039,333 tons. Competition, too, has produced its usual effect of stimulating ingenuity. Accordingly, the method of passing locks is much expedited and facilitated on some canals, by machinery which raises the barges in a few minutes to the required level; and an ingenious steam apparatus for propelling boats has been constructed by Messrs. Christie and Co. of London, after an invention of Captain Beadon's, and is now working on the Bridgewater Canal. Nor do the proprietors despair of sharing some of the returns derivable from passenger traffic; for the "Aquatic Locomotive," a new system of screw propulsion, has been introduced, which is to convey passengers at a half-penny a mile, at a very respectable speed. If defeated at every other point, and worsted in the fire and water struggle, one resource will always remain to canals:—their sites may be converted into railways. Here our theme also changes to the ferrous highway.

As it is sufficiently obvious that the value and efficiency of a road is in an inverse proportion to the expense required for its maintenance, and the amount of tractive force necessary to overcome the resistance of a specific load, the chief points to which engineers would direct their attention should be the hardness, smoothness, evenness and durability of their structures, that friction and the prejudicial effects of gravitation might as much as possible be diminished. Wheel-tracks were devised as the primary step towards our iron-ways, and were constructed of stone, some centuries ago, first, it would appear, in Milan and other Italian cities; by which means the expense of thus paving the whole width of the way was avoided, and the injurious effects were obviated which horses suffered by working on stone roads. In Great Britain several tracks of stone "tram-roads" have been laid down, among which is that near Aberdeen, formed of granite, and the Commercial Road, London, which has been thus paved by Mr. Walker. They produce great friction, and are not durable, in consequence of the amount of abrasion to which they are subject. Railways are no Italian invention, but are indigenous to our native soil; first occurring in the form of wooden rails. Timber, it is true, has been rudely laid along the Russian roads from time immemorial: but this can in no way be considered as the origin of our colliery expedients for removing with the greatest facility their mineral stores. Mr. Nicholas Wood has traced the introduction of railways to some period between the years 1602 and 1649, when they were employed at Newcastle for conveying the produce of the pits to the wharfs on the Tyne and the Wear.

Mostly, the coal-pits were situated on higher ground than the staths, (or places of embarkation,) which would of course render the road easier in the direction of the load; and in places called runs, where the declivities were steep, the course of the wagons was controlled by the convoy, a species of break regulated by the driver. The earliest form of railway consisted simply of two parallel rows of wooden rails, about seven inches broad, and four feet apart, fixed by wooden pegs on transverse sleepers of the same material: but, as the upper rails became speedily unserviceable, and the frequent pinning soon destroyed the supports, the double-way was adopted in Northumberland, Durham, and other counties, consisting in the addition of an upper rail, which, though repeatedly changed, would not so soon destroy the substructure. In the Whitehaven collieries, about the year 1788, the next improvement was made in the fashion of rails by the introduction of iron, in the form of flat bars of wrought-metal nailed down to the subjacent wood; which were in turn superseded, thirty years later, by solid rails of cast-iron, originally suggested (so states Mr. R. Stevenson) by Mr. Reynolds of Colebrooke Dale, Shropshire. On the first introduction of cast-iron plate rails, the flanch formed part of the substance of the rail; but about 1750, the present method was substituted of casting the flanch on the tire of the wheel. Malleable-iron rails, now almost universally employed, were originally the subject of experiment with Mr. Nixon at Walbottle colliery, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in the year 1805; but the form employed, known as the edge-rail, by cutting the tire of the wheels, or by the great expense attending an increased width of surface, retarded the use of wrought-iron until Mr. John Birkenshaw, of the Bedlington Iron-works, designed an improved form, affording the required superficial breadth with less material, so disposed as to present the greatest amount of strength; the letters patent specifying them as "malleable-iron bars formed in prisms." Modifications of these wedge-shaped rails are now chiefly employed in England. On all the colliery lines the sole tractive power was horses, or the influence of gravitation, but their superiority to the old roads was such, that the power of the horse was rendered of greatly multiplied utility. On an ordinary road the estimated draught of a horse, exclusive of the weight of the cart, is from 15 to 30 hundredweight: but on a plate-rail tram-road it exceeds 4 tons, and on an edge railway equals from 15 to 20 tons, including the wagons.

Public railroads are exactly coeval with the nineteenth century, for the legislative act authorizing the construction of the Surrey line in 1801, was the first Act of Parliament of this nature; all earlier railways having been purely private works, chiefly associated with mines or collieries. Cast-iron plate-rails, fastened on rough blocks of stone, were adopted on the Surrey tram-road, which unites Croydon and Wandsworth, and is nine miles long, including the branch to Carchalton, being of nearly the same length as the first Scottish railway, the Kilmarnock and Troon line in Ayrshire, the Act for which was passed in 1808. An outlay of 60,000*l.* was required for the execution of the Surrey line, and the sole motive power employed was horses. Three years afterwards a new locomotive agent of as much, but of very different mettle, made its modest début on the railway at Merthyr Tydvil in South Wales. Fresh from the manufactory of Messrs. Richard Trevithick and Andrew Vivian, of Camborne in Cornwall, the "car without horses, the car without wings," displayed its first performances "with a rush and a roar" undoubtedly, if not with "the speed of a dream": but drawing on this first experiment ten tons of iron, and the carriages containing them, a distance of nine miles, at the rate of five miles an hour, without requiring a second supply of water. Not content with a private stage, the locomotive ventured into public on the Stockton and Darlington line, between Stockton and Wilton Park Colliery, opened on the 27th of September, 1825; which was the first public railway on which steam-power was employed; and where it was associated with horse-power, and applied both by locomotive and stationary engines. This union of agents proved far from harmonious, especially as there was only a single pair of rails, with passing stations; and great delays necessarily occurred. The attention of the scientific and commercial world was now, however, fully awakened to the importance of this new form of power, which had been so successfully applied to navigation. Not only were the Darlington engines of inferior construction, but the field selected for the development of their capabilities was particularly unfortunate, from the steep gradients abounding on that line. Yet the day of triumph was not far distant. Alrcady the "Grand Experimental Railroad" was more than schemed; for in the year preceding the opening for traffic of the Darlington and Stockton line, the first prospectus had appeared of a company established for the formation of a double railway between Liverpool and Manchester. They obtained their Act of Parliament in 1826, despite the determined opposition of the Canal proprietors, who had procured the rejection of the Company's petition for leave to bring in a bill the year before. This scheme originated with Mr. William James of London in 1822, (the projector also of the London and Birmingham Railway,) who influenced Mr. Saunders of Liverpool, commonly regarded as the father of the undertaking, so much in favour of the project, that that gentleman caused a survey of the line to be made at his own expense. A work published in 1820, called "A General Iron Railway," claims however for the author, Mr. Thomas Gray of Leeds, the honour of having founded the existing railway system. Mr. Wilson of Brussels wrote a pamphlet in 1845, explaining the merits of Mr. Gray, who, when he presented a copy of his book to Mr. Wilson, said to him in prophetic tones:—"Here is the main-spring of the civilization of the world: all distances shall disappear; people will come here from all parts of the continent, without danger, and without fatigue; companies will be formed, immense capital paid and invested; the system shall extend over all countries; emperors, kings, and governors will be its defenders; and this discovery will be put on a par with that of printing." The insufficiency of the existing means of transport was most strongly felt at Liverpool, "the greatest thoroughfare in the world," and it is not the least honour of her enterprising merchants that they "with fostering care," as Mr. H. Scrivenor says, "nursed the new-born system at a time when land-owners, canal proprietors, and others, desired its destruction, and combined to crush the project in its bud. Then it was they shielded it from attack, and drew forth its latent principles, discovered its giant strength, and at much cost of time and money exhibited all its virtues in practical results which finally silenced opposition."

Was ever a great boon offered to mankind which provoked not the opposition of short-sighted selfishness and ignorance? When it was proposed to extend the metropolitan turnpike-roads to greater distances, the farmers of the surrounding counties became dreadfully alarmed at the prospect of additional competitors, reduced prices, and resolute ruin. They petitioned Parliament against the measure, alleging, "That the remoter counties would be able, from the comparative cheapness of labour in them, to sell their produce in London at a lower rate than they could do; and that their rents would be reduced and cultivation ruined by the measure!" How have their sapient predictions been verified? As Mr. Porter says, "The plan has been beneficial to them, inasmuch as, by providing for the indefinite extension of the city, it has rendered it a far better market for their peculiar productions." What wonder that such an innovation as Railways was strenuously opposed, threatening, as it did, the coaching interest, and the posting interest, the canal interest, and the sporting interest, and private interests of every variety. "Gentlemen, as an individual," said a sporting M.P. for Cheltenham, "I hate your railways; I detest them altogether; I wish the concoctors of the Cheltenham and Oxford, and the concoctors of every other scheme, including the solicitors and engineers, were at rest in Paradise. Gentlemen, I detest railroads; nothing is more distasteful to me than to hear the echo of our hills reverberating with the noise of hissing railroad engines, running through the heart of our hunting country, and destroying that noble sport to which I have been accustomed from my childhood." And at Tewkesbury, one speaker contended that "any railway would be injurious;" compared engines to "war-horses and fiery meteors;" and affirmed that "the evils contained in Pandora's box were but trifles compared with those that would be consequent on railways." Even in go-a-headative America, some steady jog-trotting opponents raised their voices against the nascent system; one of whom (a canal stockholder by the way) chronicled the following objective arguments. "He saw what would be the effect of it; that it would set the whole world a-gadding. Twenty miles an hour, sir! Why you will not be able to keep an apprentice-boy at his work; every Saturday evening he must take a trip to Ohio, to spend the Sabbath with his sweetheart. Grave plodding citizens will be flying about like comets. All local attachments must be at an end. It will encourage flightiness of intellect. Veracious people will turn into the most immeasurable liars; all their conceptions will be exaggerated by their magnificent notions of distance. 'Only a hundred miles off! Tut, nonsense, I'll step across, madam, and bring your fan!' 'Pray, sir, will you dine with me to-day at my little box at Alleghany?' 'Why, indeed, I don't know. I shall be in town until twelve. Well, I shall be there; but you must let me off in time for the theatre.' And then, sir, there will be barrels of pork, and cargoes of flour, and chaldrons of coals, and even lead and whiskey, and such-like sober things, that have always been used to sober travelling, whisking away like a set of sky-rockets. It will upset all the gravity of the nation. If two gentlemen have an affair of honour, they have only to steal off to the Rocky Mountains, and there no jurisdiction can touch them. And then, sir, think of flying for debt! A set of bailiffs, mounted on bomb-shells, would not overtake an absconded debtor, only give him a fair start. Upon the whole, sir, it is a pestilential, topsy-turvy, harum-scarum whirligig. Give me the old, solemn, straightforward, regular Dutch canal—three miles an hour for expresses, and two for ordinary journeys, with a yoke of oxen for a heavy load! I go for beasts of burthen: it is more primitive and scriptural, and suits a moral and religious people better. None of your hop-skip and-jump whimsies for me."

The incredulity and laughter with which Mr. Stephenson's opinions were listened to by Parliamentary Committees concerning the velocity he expected to attain, are well known. He was implored by the Directors who engaged him not to indulge before these legislators in the visionary schemes, which led him to contemplate the achievement in speed of twelve or fourteen miles an hour, lest he should bring discredit on their enterprise. He says, that "he sought England over for a man to support him in his evidence before Parliament, and could find only one man, James Walker; and was then afraid to call that gentleman, because he knew nothing about railways. He had then no one to tell his tale to but Mr. Saunders, who did listen to him, and kept his spirits up." But the exigencies of Liverpool inspired her inhabitants with sufficient energy to overcome all obstacles. Certainly there were two canals between that town and Manchester, but they were inadequate for the existing traffic of those emporiums of commerce, which then amounted to more than a thousand tons daily, and would greatly increase with added facilities of transport. It was estimated that these towns annually consumed not less than a million tons of coal, supplied from the mines of St. Helens; a distance of thirty miles by canal, but which would be reduced one-half by the proposed railway, and effect upon the carriage the yearly saving of 100,000*l.*

Thus stimulated, the Company's engineers vigorously set to work, in June, 1826, conscious that there was no child's play before them. The tunnels to be excavated, and mosses to be drained, the viaducts to be erected, and levels to be sunk, would tax and test to the utmost their ingenuity and skill. Exclusive of tunnelling, the cuttings amounted to nearly 720,000,000 cubic yards, Professor Barlow tells us, and the embankments to 277,000. Chat Moss, a bog so soft as to be impassable by a pedestrian, except in unusually dry weather, was the first scene of their operations; and a trial of perseverance it proved of no ordinary kind; especially as it was the reverse of a "labour of love," being a difficulty not naturally and necessarily imposed upon the construction of the line, but entailed upon the Company by the blind opposition of Lords Sefton and Derby to the course of the original line, recommended by Mr. Stephenson, the chief engineer, which would have traversed a portion of these noblemen's property. Moreover, the compulsory adoption of this inferior line involved the additional evil of a double gradient, a mile and a half in length each way, and rising one foot in ninety-six in both directions.

This is a permanent and most serious disadvantage to the working of the line. It is evident that it is far more important to make a railway level than a turnpike road, as the resistance to the descending tendency of a load on an inclined plane is far greater on the latter road than on the iron one; for as double the impulsive force is required on a smooth macadamized road rising one foot in twelve, to that which would draw the same load on a level line, the rise of only one in two-hundred-and-forty feet on the railway, requires the impulsive force to be doubled; and a nearly quadrupled power on these particular gradients. If the mortification were not sufficiently severe at first, its measure was completed not many months after the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester line; when a second line was contemplated between these towns, which these very lords, "grown wiser than of yore," were willing enough to admit through their grounds; experience having taught the proprietors of land the increased value of property in the vicinity of railways. But there was no help for it then. Chat Moss, the beloved of snipes and Jack-o'-lanthorns, must be drained and levelled, although $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles in length, and, in some parts especially, of almost unlimited capacity for the reception of solids without apparent surfacial improvement. Through this semi-fluid an iron rod would sink by its own weight; and tons upon tons of embankment were absorbed before this yielding morass could be rendered fit for the support of any superstructure.

Night and day, navvy and horse worked, but winced not at the pulpy foe. Gradually they gorged with their interminable heapings the last and most insatiable half-mile on the Eastern border; and on May-day, 1830, the Rocket Engine steamed a carriage full of enterprise across the Moss. The ingenious method by which this difficulty was mainly overcome is thus described by Mr. R. Ritchie. "As the materials laid down for an embankment, about four feet high, gradually sunk, it became impossible to use either clay or gravel. Recourse was therefore had to the moss itself for the forming of the embankment, which, from its less specific gravity, would not be so liable to sink; and by cutting drains every five yards apart, and laying the moss dry between the drains, it formed an excellent material for the embankment, requiring only four or five times the quantity which would have been used on solid ground. In forming the road on the surface of the moss, drains were first cut on each side of the line, and lateral ones to carry off the water, and by this means the surface acquired tenacity and consolidation. Upon this hurdles, wickered with heath, were laid transversely. Upon these were placed two feet of ballast or gravel, to form the permanent road, and on which the wooden sleepers for the rails were bedded." The Parr Moss, too, was solidified; the Sankey Viaduct, from sixty to seventy feet in height, was erected; the Liverpool Tunnel, through 1,970 yards of moist earth, sand, or sandstone, was completed at a cost of nearly 35,000*l.*; and the finishing touch applied to the constructive works of this Railway (thirty-one miles in length between the terminal stations) by spanning the Irwell with a noble stone bridge, in September, 1829; the total expense amounting to nearly 740,000*l.*

And now the great question presented itself for the Company's solution, of the tractive power to be employed on their completed highway. Three rivals entered the lists; horses, stationary engines, locomotives; but flesh and blood soon withdrew from a contest with iron; lungs could not compete with boilers; breath stood a sorry chance opposed to steam. Two gentlemen in the direction of the Company, accompanied by Mr. H. Booth, made a tour of inspection, and quickly narrowed the question to the rival forms of engine. Messrs. J. Walker and J. U. Rastrick, both civil engineers, were next commissioned to make observations and comparisons on the different methods of applying steam power. They accordingly laid two separate reports before the Board, advocating the adoption of the stationary steam-engine. But Mr. George Stephenson, "the father of the locomotive system," was strongly of a different opinion, and was supported in his views by the majority of the Directors, who resolved to attempt the introduction of the locomotive engine; and, therefore, to encourage and stimulate the invention of improvements, of which they deemed this machine to be susceptible, they offered a premium of 500*l.*, to be contended for in 1829, for the most approved engine, fulfilling the conditions of limitation in weight to six tons, (those in use averaging nine tons,) freedom from smoke, a capability of drawing at starting three times its own weight, and of travelling seventy miles with that load at a minimum rate of ten miles an hour. Four competitors presented themselves for trial. October the 6th was the day appointed for the struggle, and the selected arena was about two miles in extent, on the eastern side of Rainhill Bridge, the only perfectly level part of the railroad.

London, Newcastle, Darlington, and Leith, engaged in the noble rivalry; Messrs. Braithwaite and Ericson entering the "Novelty" on the lists; the smallest engine, weighing 2 tons 15 cwt.; Mr. Burstall of Leith brought forward the "Perseverance," weighing 2 tons 17 cwt.; the "Rocket," whose "training" was first completed, was supplied by Mr. R. Stephenson of Newcastle, and weighed 4 tons 3 cwt.; and the fourth candidate was the "Sans Pareil," also weighing 4 tons 3 cwt., and constructed by Mr. Ackworth, of Darlington. Every run was a heat, certainly, but of course the competitors ran in succession. No spurred and leather-unmentionable rider in this contest lashed his steed. Shovels and pokers took place of whips and rowels; and, instead of melted-down jockeys in rainbow-hued jackets, men smoke-begrimed and fustian-clad governed the reins. But never did a Derby day or St. Leger give birth to so honourable an excitement as prevailed in this salamandrine race. No betting-ring was required to give it interest. And who was victor? "Perseverance" for once failed to "overcome all difficulties," and easily yielded the contest to names of greater pretension; while the "Novelty," unfortunately bursting a vessel, was compelled to seek retirement and professional aid. Mr. Ackworth's engine made a gallant show, performing $22\frac{1}{2}$ miles of the course in 1 hour 37 minutes; but the Sans Pareil, becoming disabled after the same fashion as her metropolitan rival, lost her chance of victory. So the "Rocket" won the field, attaining 29 miles per hour at her greatest speed, and 11½ miles at her slowest pace; accomplishing the whole journey twice at an average rate of 12½ miles per hour, and receiving the premium at the award of the judges, Messrs. Rastrick, Wood, and Kennedy.

These experiments established the locomotive engine as the motor power best adapted for the development of the Railway system; and in the interval of preparations for the public opening of the line, which witnessed the first conclusive proofs of their superiority to all rival forces, we will review briefly the history of the introduction of these "resonant steam-eagles," but must reserve this for our next chapter. SARAH STERLING'S TRAVELS AND OPINIONS.

A RURAL individual once said in my hearing, "We don't ought to speak ill of old maids, now; for, to my certain knowledge, old maids isn't what they used to was." As I happened to have the advantage of the said individual in point of grammar, I smiled at the Doric form of his declaration; but I recognised the truth it contained when I compared the common opinion concerning the selfishness and crossness, "the sour looks and stern rebukes," of old maids, with what I knew, at first-hand, of that class; especially of my aunt Sarah, who has been to me as a mother from the days of my cradle to these present ones of my clerkship in the substantial firm of Cottenham, Brothers, wholesale hosiers, Wood-street, Cheap-side.

My aunt Sarah, or, to give her her due style and title, Miss Sarah Sterling, is a maiden lady of some five-and-forty autumns; and, though I say it who should not say it, being her nephew and her favourite, she is a jewel of a woman. If all maiden ladies were as womanly and as worthy—as gentle-hearted and as strong-headed; if they were all as cheerfully pious towards God, and as unselfishly active for their neighbours' good, as my aunt Sarah, the common, old-fashioned accounts of the sisterhood would be about as appropriate and true at the present day as a description I once saw in an old book of the "littell greene hilles of Old Bourne" (Holborn), or King Richard III.'s assertion, that he saw fine strawberries growing in the garden of the Bishop of Ely's palace there. "Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur ab illis." This quotation is not altogether regretful. True, the times change and we change; but all changes are not for the worse. Many classes among us are, I think, changing for the better. Certainly, "old maids," as my friend the countryman said, "isn't what they used to was." I would cite my aunt Sarah as an example of their improvement among the middle class of an English country town; and will bring her own hand in her own letters to support my opinion. Do not suspect me of any breach of confidence in thus publishing the private letters of a simple, unlearned woman—though she will assuredly know nothing about it. She trusts in my good sense and right feeling towards her, and I will not betray that trust.

It will be necessary to explain to the reader the circumstances under which the following letters were written.

My aunt Sarah has an annuity of 150*l.* With this income she contrived to do a great deal of good and to enjoy life thoroughly, (in a quiet way,) in her little cottage near the town of Rochester. Rochester is her native town, and the present abiding-place of nearly all our kindred. My aunt loves it so well that I do not suppose anything would tempt her to leave its neighbourhood for any length of time, except such a motive as the one which brought her to London last spring and carried her to Belfast this autumn. This motive was a sense of duty. One of her sisters, the wife of an Irish physician, a native of Belfast, who had an indifferent practice in Rochester, died at the beginning of the present year, leaving her husband inconsolable for her loss, and seven children, most of them under twelve years of age. Miss Sterling immediately betook herself to her brother-in-law's house, and assumed the care of the household. Poor Mr. Denham has since told me that, if it had not been for her prompt kindness, her unwearied patience, and gentle ministrations to his grief-bowed soul, at that period, he believes he should have thrown himself into the Medway, in utter despair. At the end of two months it became necessary for him to decide upon some new plan for supporting his family. His practice in Rochester was not sufficient; and the very sight of the streets and houses there had become odious to him. Still he knew not which way to turn. At one time he thought of emigrating to New Zealand; but he shrank from exposing his delicately nurtured children to the hardships of a long voyage and a new country. He was consulting my aunt one day, on this very subject, when he received two letters. On opening them he found his difficulty solved. They were from his own bachelor brother and maiden sister, who lived together in the flourishing town of Belfast, in the North of Ireland. Brother John was, like himself, a physician; but, unlike himself, he had made money, and was now in possession of so extensive a practice that he wrote to invite his widowed brother to become his partner, and that without purchase-money. John Denham said he must have a partner, and that for two reasons he would rather have his brother than a stranger; first, because he knew that Horace was skilful and experienced; and, secondly, because he was his brother. Then, as Horace was his brother, he could not think of taking money from him, especially as he had a large family to support, and had not been very successful in the world. Brother John then referred him to sister Rachel's letter for information concerning domestic arrangements, in case Horace should accept his offer.

Sister Rachel's letter contained an affectionate entreaty that he would come to them very soon. She reminded him of the cheapness of provisions and house-rent in Belfast; but what was of the most importance to Mr. Horace Denham, she showed the educational advantages for his children which he could obtain at a cheap rate in this town. The recently established Queen's College there would enable him to give his four boys a much better education than he could afford to give them in England. She said he might send them all to the College in their turns, instead of being obliged to stint the allowance of intellectual food to some of them, in order that the others might fare the better. This last argument was a decisive one to Mr. Denham, who fully believed the old proverb that "learning is better than house and land." His anxiety about his children was now partially removed, and uttering a fervent "Thank God!" he handed the letters over to my aunt. She had sympathy with all benevolent and generous people, and she was strongly attached to her sister's family, therefore there could be no doubt that she read these letters with a thankful heart. The tears stood in her eyes, (not bright young eyes, O reader, but the worn, somewhat sad eyes of a woman nearly fifty,) and stretching out her hand to her brother-in-law, she said fervently—"God is very good, Horace. We ought, indeed, to thank him. He has saved you out of all your troubles."

"Not out of all, Sarah," he replied, with a dark mournful look; "he has not restored her to me. Henceforth, I shall work without her presence to gladden me, and if I am successful, she will not be near me to smile."

"The Lord giveth, and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord!" said my aunt. "Horace, you have, for years, been blessed with a good, true, and loving wife. Many men go through life without knowing such happiness.—You have been more favoured than most mortals. Now, the dreary hour of privation has come to you also; you must bear it bravely and piously. You must not suffer your spirit to rebel against God. Patience! courage! good brother; and in due time the most Merciful will remove the burden of sorrow from your soul."

The next day it was settled that Mr. Horace Denham should dispose of his house and furniture and sell the remnant of his practice as soon as possible, and that he should repair alone to Belfast to settle his plans with his brother and sister, and prepare a house there for the reception of his family. At the end of a month the sale was completed, my Aunt Sarah had let her cottage for a year, and was prepared to take charge of her sister's children, in a cheap lodging at Kennington, near London, until their father should return from Ireland to fetch them. Mr. Denham saw them all safely though not very comfortably settled in the said lodging at Kennington, and then set off for Belfast with his eldest boy, a lad of fifteen, whom he was anxious to have engaged in his studies at the Queen's College immediately, as at that age idleness and loss of time are extremely injurious to the mind. I, also, came up from Rochester with my aunt and the Denhams, having just obtained the situation before mentioned in the firm of Cottenham, Brothers. I had always lodged with my aunt in Rochester, and as it would have been an unnecessary pain to both of us to part, as long as she remained in or near London, I hired a room in the same house at Kennington. Here I soon became a favourite, and a sort of Pater Familias among the young Denhams. Between us my aunt and I made the children very happy. She was always contented because she was always actively employed for the good of others; and I was never so happy in my life as I was in that uncomfortable crowded little house, this last summer. The boys and girls were full of mirth and right feeling, and my aunt did every thing she could to give them pleasure. I often contrived to take them to exhibitions and to the theatres, and on Sundays, after morning church, we all took a trip into the country together. Our pleasures were simple and innocent enough; but I think we shall all remember them as long as we live.

In the mean time a continuous correspondence went on with Mr. Denham. At the beginning of October he came to London to fetch away his children to their new home. When my aunt found out that Miss Rachel Denham was in delicate health and was utterly unused to the management of children, and that her brother-in-law had not been able to get a housekeeper that he liked, she determined to go with the party to Belfast. Mr. Denham opposed this, because he saw that she quite disregarded her own convenience, and had even given up a favourite plan, of living for the winter in London with me. But my aunt persisted in her resolution; and as I thought that the change might be good for her as well as for her friends, I raised no objection to her going.

On the morning of the third day after I had seen the whole party start off from Euston Square in a double second-class carriage which they had to themselves, I received my aunt's first letter.—One word for her letters, generally. She was fond of writing; and as her letters were like herself, unaffected, sensible, and full of cheerfulness and warm-heartedness, every one of her family was glad to receive them. For my own part, though I can see well enough that they are not clever or witty, that they have no graces of style, and are evidently the production of a woman more conversant with every-day life than with books and the fine arts, yet they have a certain charm for me; a freshness and an indomitable good nature which show that old maids sometimes retain the best part of girlhood all their lives. It is scarcely necessary to add that my Aunt Sarah has a pleasant countenance—that her health is perfect and her temper genial and sunny. She has a habit of looking on the bright side of things; and, if fate should turn the dark one towards her, she rubs that up, till it begins to shine a little. Her opinions and descriptions of persons and places are almost always worth hearing, because they are original. In this first letter, written before the journey was completed, she writes thus :—

LETTER I.

HOTEL, FLEETWOOD,
Oct. 1850.

"MY DEAR NEPHEW,—We have arrived here swiftly and safely, and as we have yet an hour to wait before we go on board the steam-packet which is to carry us to Belfast, I shall amuse myself with writing a little to you. When, like Benedict in the play,—

Here, now, little Frank interrupted me, and I have quite forgotten what I was going to say. I dare say it was nothing very important. I should not like to spend many days as I have spent this; but I do not regret this one experience of railway travelling, as I have learned to pity those who have much of it. Ten hours of incessant noise make the quiet of my own back parlour seem like a paradise. The noise of the train was disagreeable to me at the first, and during the last part of the journey it was quite a torture. The hurry, the bustle, the confusion, the rapid motion, I can bear well enough; but the noise is perfectly terrific. Strong as my head is, I expect it will ache for a week to come. What a life those people must lead who go up and down the lines every day, and take charge of that huge brazen dragon which rushes along with us! I wish you would inquire among your mechanical and engineering friends whether there is any probability that railway travelling will ever be performed more quietly. Depend upon it, my dear boy, we are far removed from a state of perfection in mechanics while all sorts of work by machinery are so very noisy. Some of the wise inventors must invent a way of getting rid of the noise. It must be extremely injurious to health. I have been thinking, acting so strongly as it does upon the nervous system. Surely the loud, sharp, unceasing noises of a journey by railway must be as bad for the nerves and the brain as forcing the eyes to gaze for many hours together upon brilliant and startling colours. For my own part, I feel sure that my brain would become permanently deranged if I were to travel up and down a line of 200 miles every day for a month. I am happy to say neither Mr. Deaham, nor the children, nor Ann (that best of nursery-maids), seemed to feel the noise as I did. My contrivance of sewing blankets into old wrappers to serve as cushions on the journey was found serviceable. By their aid the hard seats of the second-class carriages were made almost as comfortable as those of the first-class. Remember, Sterling, my dear, that you never take a long journey by railway without having a cushion of some sort to sit upon, and in cold weather put your feet upon your carpet-bag and throw your wrapper over your legs; never sit with your feet on the floor. By these means your feet and legs will not become cold from the draught which comes in at the bottom of the carriage. Don't laugh at my old maidish or motherly warnings, but take heed to them, and depend upon it, you will be the better in health and temper.

"I shall not say much about the road, for various reasons. You know part of it; and descriptions of what you do not know would be very uninteresting. We passed through so quickly that there was scarcely time to note more than a few prominent facts; such as these;—Litchfield Cathedral and Stafford Castle are two fine buildings; the station-houses are generally neat and pretty;—the country is beautiful in some parts, especially in Warwickshire; it is pretty in many places, but it is flat and uninteresting for the greater part of the journey to Preston. Wigan, Warington, and other manufacturing places made me melancholy. I dare say it was foolish; but I hated the sight of those innumerable factory-chimneys, belching forth their foul black breath, and making a murky atmosphere over and around each town. As the train stopped at these places, we could see into the windows of some of the factories. There were mysterious wheels spinning round rapidly, men and women, boys and girls, moving their arms, or taking a few steps regularly backwards and forwards, as if they were performing some magical incantation which set those weird wheels in motion. I don't know now what was really going on there, and don't wish to know, for it would destroy a certain beautiful fancy which was in my mind at the time. I half believed that the human beings and the human inventions I saw there were working together to produce webs of a happy life for the race that shall come hereafter: that they were working consciously, and with their whole hearts, to that end; so that the toil and trouble to themselves was clean forgotten: that they lived in and for others and the future; so that their own lives were a happy dream, instead of a sad reality of misery. We practical women have poetic or semi-poetic fancies sometimes.

"I have spoken before of the noise; but nothing I have said of it can give you any idea of the din and uproar at Preston, where we left the first train to get into another, which was to take us to Fleetwood. From the time we stopped at Preston till the time at which we started for Fleetwood, was about ten minutes; and during all that interval four trains came gasping, shrieking, and roaring into the station, and went gasping, shrieking, and roaring away, off in an opposite direction. Now, as our party was large, and wanted keeping together, and we were afraid of losing the Fleetwood train, we all remained on the platform, and witnessed the arrivals and departures of the other trains. The hurry and bustle of the passengers, (among whom some of our little folks got upset several times,) the loud talking, the sorting and tossing to and fro of luggage, the running hither and thither of the people coming to and from the various trains, the deafening noise of the engines as they came under cover, composed the most wonderful picture of discord and confusion I ever beheld. Euston Square Terminus is nothing to Preston, at that moment, in the article of noise. Our excitement was, of course, increased by our fears lest every train which we saw rush off should be the one for which we were waiting. The porters and railway officers were far too busy to give a satisfactory answer to Mr. Denham's questions, and the uproar prevented his hearing half the words he got in reply to his inquiries—the uproar, and the peculiar clipped pronunciation of the men, who have, I suppose, no time to give each word its due length. Little Mary Denham was alarmed to hear one porter at Warrington tell another that our party 'were all goin' to prison' (Pres'on).

"At last we were safely shut into a carriage bound for Fleetwood; and we had another hour's rushing and roaring to that place. The sun was shining brightly, and the afternoon was very clear and beautiful. As I looked out of the window next me, I discovered something in the distance glittering like silver. It could not be a river—surely it must be the sea! Morecombe Bay! Every one was curious to catch a first view of the sea, and the children crowded round the window eagerly, quite forgetting their fatigue, poor little things! Presently I saw that the road over which we were rushing was actually on the sands, and that we were apparently going headlong into the sea. All round us lay the famous and dangerous Lancaster Sands. Do you remember the stories old Mr. Barton used to tell about the coach that went across the sands twice a-week from Lancaster to some other place on the opposite side of Morecombe Bay, (Ulverston, I think,) and how the coach and all the passengers were sometimes nearly drowned in the rapidly advancing tide? Well! I learned from a gentleman in the Fleetwood train that the coach runs twice a-week still, and that, in spite of the frequent loss of life on the Lancaster Sands, the people around the Bay are still very much addicted to walking and driving across them. We soon become familiar with perils when we live long among them. The Neapolitans, you know, will build their villages on the sides of Vesuvius, though they are destroyed every thirty years or so, by the eruptions of the mountain.

"Mr. Denham and the gentleman just mentioned got into some interesting talk about Morecombe Bay, and the beautiful Westmoreland and Cumberland lakes and mountains, and the local customs and traditions. I caught very little of what they said, on account of the children, who were talking eagerly to me and their nurse. There is much interesting matter to be learned about this bay, I am sure. I wish I had read more. Ah! my dear boy, while you are young get all the information, and make to yourself as many objects of interest as you can. The more you know, and the more people and things you care about, the greater will be your chance of content and usefulness through life. I don't know what has set me moralizing in this way; probably the conviction that I have lost a great deal of pleasure in this long journey by my want of knowledge, historic, biographic, legendary, geologic, and agricultural, of the country through which we came. This conviction saddens me, while it makes me most anxious that you, and young people generally, should not grow old in ignorance. My ignorance, however, has not prevented my enjoying a walk about Fleetwood. It is a new town with handsome houses standing empty. Excepting just about the railway terminus and the place where the steamers lie in the bay, the town has a deserted look; as if some evil genius had a spite against the people who built it, and after allowing them to erect noble houses and public buildings, cast a spell over the place, so that no one could live there. It is melancholy to see rows of fine new houses as blank and empty as one of those newly discovered cities in Central America you told me about one day. The situation of Fleetwood is said to be unhealthy, which may account for its few inhabitants; it is a watering-place too, and as the season is over, that may also have helped to give the place its deserted look.

"The view over the bay, from the beach here, is lovely. I went out for a walk with Mr. Denham while Ann was giving the children a sort of tea-dinner at the hotel,—we were to have a similar meal afterwards. I enjoyed it much—the walk, I mean. The sun was shining brightly, preparatory to his setting in the sea. We walked along the shore away from the town. The beautiful bay was spread out before us, as smooth and still as a sheet of glass. Far away on the opposite coast my eyes rested on some dark blue masses, which a mist was slowly covering. Horace told me they were the mountains at the foot of Windermere. Windermere! That word and the sight of those hills awoke all my old longing. Sterling, my dear, you and I will go and see Windermere next year. If we both live, and nothing happens to prevent, you must get a holiday in the summer, and we will endure the railway noise, and come to this uninhabited city. We will then go across the bay to those dear mountains, and see what beauties they enclose. Let us both think about this scheme, and enjoy it in anticipation; I do, already, my dear boy. My only regret this afternoon during the walk, was that you were not with me. If I could have sent you one rapid glance at the calm extensive view of sea and shore—sent it into your dingy office in Wood-street, it would have gladdened your heart for a week. But perhaps not,—perhaps it might have made you discontented with your vocation; and therefore, an unprofitable servant; so it is best that I could not. I was especially charmed with six small substantially-built houses which face the sea, on a grassy terrace a little way out of Fleetwood. They are near enough to the town for convenience, and are yet as still and secluded as if there were no town at all behind them. I could not help fancying how happy you and I might be in one of those unpretending yet really pretty houses. I dare say they are cheap enough. The view alone would make them worth an additional 50*l.* per annum at Brighton. Here, I dare say, you might get the house and the view too for 15*l.* a-year. That is a mere guess; but the rents are very low in Fleetwood, I hear; and provisions are cheap, if we may judge by the hotel charges. The meal we had on our return (called tea) consisted of good tea and plenty of cream, white and brown bread, toast, dry and buttered, muffins, tea-cakes, and biscuits; a great dish of hot broiled bacon, fresh eggs, a cold fowl, tongue, ham, and a fine cold sirloin of beef. Of this we ate as much as we wished, and paid only eighteen pence a-head. Mr. Denham thought the price so low that he talked laughingly of staying at Fleetwood, and taking one of the empty houses; as we might go further and fare worse. Good-bye; we must prepare to go on board the steamer. It sails at nine. It is a fine moonlight night and very calm. God bless you and us all.

"Your affectionate aunt,

"SARAH STERLING."

SKETCHES AND ANECDOTES OF WORTHIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

JEREMY TAYLOR.

OF the numerous divines who in distant or more recent times have enriched the theological literature of England, there is none to whom we can assign a more distinguished position, than to the preacher-poet, Bishop Jeremy Taylor. He has been called—and not improperly—the Chrysostom of the English Church. In richness of expression, fertility of invention, and copiousness of illustration, he is confessedly unrivalled by any sacred orator of any age or country. His mellifluous periods charm the ear and please the taste, whilst they minister to the purposes of piety. Above all, it is upon record that he adorned the faith he preached, by the practice of his life, no less than by the persuasive eloquence of his lips. He passed unscathed through many trials, and whilst drinking deep of the bitter waters of affliction, he afforded his weaker brethren an encouraging example of humility and patience. In the darkest hours of his earthly pilgrimage, his sweetness of disposition never forsook him. Though his bark was tossed upon a troubled sea, he waited with confidence and resignation the issue of the voyage. In the shade of adversity, as well as in the sunshine of prosperity, he found ample opportunities for the display of the gentlest and most attractive graces of the Christian character, and his name is inseparably associated with our most exalted ideas of moral purity and self-denying piety.

It is much to be regretted that the memorials which remain to us of a life so full of interesting and remarkable incidents as that of Taylor, should be so extremely scanty. In recent years he has not wanted indeed for able biographers, but their sources of information appear to have been very limited. "The life of a student," observes Bishop Heber, "is passed within a narrow circle, and of the men whose writings are most widely read and admired, the personal history is often enveloped in the deepest obscurity." And thus in the absence of authenticated information, the biographers of Taylor, like those of Shakspeare, are frequently compelled to resort to conjecture or surmise, and to fill up with invention and suggestions the imperfect outline which has been transmitted to posterity by his contemporaries. Although this course is not the most satisfactory one, it will be necessary for us to adopt it whilst sketching, as we propose as briefly as possible to do, the career of the most accomplished of English pulpit orators.

At the beginning of the 17th century, Nathaniel, the father of Jeremy Taylor, was settled in the town of Cambridge, where he carried on the business of a barber. He had eleven children, of whom Jeremy, baptized in the year 1613, (for there is no certain record of the time of his birth,) was the third. Though engaged in a comparatively humble occupation, he was a man of reasonable learning, being able, as we are informed, to instruct his children in grammar and the mathematics. That he occupied a position of some respectability in the town of Cambridge is also shown by his having been churchwarden of the parish of the Holy Trinity, in the year 1621. It must also be borne in mind that the trade of a barber-surgeon was, in those days, one of considerable importance, as in addition to shaving and hair-dressing, he was expected to perform all the ordinary surgical operations. It should be likewise mentioned that on the score of family, Nathaniel Taylor had some claim to consideration from his fellow-townsmen. He was the lineal descendant of an illustrious victim of the Marian persecution,—the revered and learned Rowland Taylor, chaplain to Archbishop Cramer. His ancestors had also long possessed a small estate in Gloucestershire, and it is reasonable to suppose that these circumstances must have added to his consequence, and raised him rather above the sphere of a provincial tradesman.

His son Jeremy seems to have been sent to school at a very early age, for he attended a free-school in Cambridge in the year 1616, at which time, if he were baptized in the year of his birth, he could have been only three years old. His aptness for learning, quickness, and docility soon attracted attention, and at the age of fifteen, (or according to another authority thirteen,) he was removed to the university, and his name was entered as a "poor scholar," or sizar, of Caius College. Tradition has preserved no anecdote of his boyhood, nor is anything definitely known of his college career. But it is worthy of remark, that only one year before he entered the university, a stripling of still greater promise, and destined to accomplish even higher things, had become an inmate of a neighbouring college. This was no other than John Milton; and it is fair to imagine that the two youths must have been occasionally thrown into each other's society, and that they found in common sympathies and congenial studies, a bond of intimacy. Although the paths which they were destined to tread in after life were widely different, and the parts they were called on to play in the politics of the period directly opposite, it is impossible not to see that in genius and disposition there were many points of resemblance between them.

Both of them, also, were distinguished at this period for their personal beauty. The greatest intellects of the age were enshrined in temples of corresponding comeliness. Of Milton's youthful appearance, in his days of studentship, a characteristic sketch has been drawn by our greatest modern poet, which is worthy of quotation:—

“ Yea, our blind Poet, who, in his later day,
Stood almost single; uttering odious truth—
Darkness before, and danger's voice behind,
Soul awful—if the earth has ever lodged
An awful soul—I seem'd to see him here
Familiarly, and in his scholar's dress
Bounding before me, yet a stripling youth—
A boy, no better, with his rosy cheeks,
Angelical, keen eye, courageous look,
And conscious step of purity and pride.”¹

And in like manner it is said that Taylor's florid and youthful beauty,—his sweet and pleasant air,—his grave and graceful presence—entranced the beholder, and seemed to give an outward indication of intellectual preeminence. It may also be inferred that Taylor, like Milton, frequently sighed over the scholastic jargon then taught in the universities, and longed to inhale a freer and healthier atmosphere. For “the asinine feast of sow-thistles and brambles,” the future author of the Ductor Dubitantium must have had as profound a contempt as the author of Paradise Lost. And it requires no great effort of the imagination to picture these two illustrious members of the intellectual aristocracy of the nation comparing together, at such a time and place, their notions of the beautiful and true, and stimulating each other to more heroic exertions.

Having taken his degree of Master of Arts, Taylor was ordained before he had reached the age of twenty-one, and it was not his lot to remain long in obscurity. By a happy accident he was solicited to take the place of a college friend, who had been appointed to preach at St. Paul's Cathedral, and was either unable or unwilling to attend. The opportunity for distinction was not lost upon the young divine. His eloquent sermons and graceful elocution won the enthusiastic admiration of his auditors, and procured him an introduction to Archbishop Laud. His friend Bishop Rust, (his successor in the diocese of Dromore,) who preached his funeral sermon, and introduced therein a brief sketch of his career, observes that his personal beauty and sublime and raised discourses caused his hearers “to take him for some young angel, newly descended from the visions of glory!” Soon after his first sermon at St. Paul's, he was summoned to Lambeth, to preach before the Archbishop. His discourse, upon that occasion, according to Rust, “was beyond exception, and beyond imitation: yet the wise prelate thought him too young; but the great youth humbly begged his grace to pardon that fault, and promised, if he lived, he would mend it.” It was, however, prudently resolved by Laud that “such mighty parts should be afforded better opportunities of study and improvement, than a course of constant preaching would allow of.” He foresaw the perils to which the excitement and applause of crowded congregations might expose the youthful orator; and he accordingly thought it better to send him to Oxford, where he might pursue his studies in undisturbed seclusion. With characteristic liberality, he placed him in his own college of All Souls, where he soon obtained a fellowship; and, after the lapse of about two years, presented him to the rectory of Uppingham in Rutlandshire.

The liberality of “my lord of Canterbury” to Taylor did not stop here. Soon after promoting him to the rectory of Uppingham, “he preferred him,” says Rust, “to be chaplain to King Charles the Martyr, of blessed and immortal memory.” Being now comfortably settled in the world, with every prospect of future honours and happiness, the prosperous divine resolved on matrimony. Of the lady of his choice, nothing is known except that she bore the musical maiden name of Phœbe Langdale. On the 27th of May, 1639, the marriage was celebrated in the parish-church of Uppingham, the gifted bridegroom being then in the 26th year of his age. But however cheering his prospects at this moment, Taylor's domestic felicity was not of long duration. Within three years his wife bore him three children, the youngest of whom died in May, 1642, and the mother soon followed her darling to the tomb.

The desolation of the pastor's home was but the beginning of his afflictions. The storm of political contention, which was destined to end in civil war, and to mar the fortunes of so many distinguished men, had begun its furious career. The impeachment of Laud, in 1640, had excited Taylor's eloquent indignation; and when the royal standard was raised at Nottingham, on the 22d of August, 1642,² it is supposed that he almost immediately left his parsonage, and joined the army in his capacity of a royal chaplain. Very shortly afterwards his living was sequestered, under the authority of a parliamentary resolution which decreed the forfeiture of the livings of the loyal clergy. A puritan preacher was placed at Uppingham in his stead, who, if the “Mercurius Aulicus” (a royalist news-letter) can be relied on, was a curious specimen of the round-head divines of that period. The following is one of the anecdotes of this neck successor of the accomplished Taylor, contained in the above-mentioned newspaper:—

“Monday, May 6.—Now, if you would see what heavenly men these lecturers are, be pleased to take notice, that at Uppingham in Rutlandshire, the Members have placed one Isaac Massey to teach the people, (for the true pastor, Dr. Jeremy Taylor, for his learning and loyalty is driven thence, his house plundered, his estate seized, and his family driven out of doors.) . . . This Massey, coming lately into a house of the town, used these words, ‘This town of Uppingham loves Popery, and we would reform it, but they will not,’ (and without any further coherence, said;) ‘but I say, whosoever says there is any king in England besides the Parliament at Westminster, I'll make him for ever speaking more. The master of the house replied, 'I say there is a king in England besides the Parliament in Westminster;' whereupon Massey, with his cudgel, broke the gentleman's head. Whoever doubts that Mr. Massey is injured by these relations, may satisfy themselves by inquiring of the inhabitants of Uppingham parish."¹

During the hottest period of the civil war, Taylor is supposed to have followed the royal army in all its perilous marches. He is said to have been a spectator of the decisive battle of Newbury, and to have accompanied the discomfited cavaliers in their retreat from that memorable field. In 1644 he was with the royal forces in Wales, and was taken prisoner by the parliamentary army during the siege of Cardigan Castle. It is impossible, however, to follow his movements accurately at this period of his life. After his release from imprisonment, he left the army, and thenceforth took up his residence in Wales, where he was fortunate enough to find a quiet retreat amid the turmoils of civil strife.

At this period of his life, under the pressure of poverty and adversity, he embraced the profession of a schoolmaster. Tradition states that he instructed his scholars sometimes in one, and sometimes in another cottage, in the village of Llanvihangel, in which he had taken up his abode. But it has been ascertained that he had two assistants, (who were compelled like himself to labour in this way for their subsistence,) namely, William Nicholson, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, and William Wyatt, who became a prebendary of Lincoln;—a circumstance which would seem to imply that the work of instruction, whatever might be the station or degree of the scholars, was carried on in a systematic manner, and on an extensive scale. In conjunction with Wyatt, he published in 1647 a Grammar of the Latin language; and the biographer is thus enabled to trace another point of resemblance in the lives of Milton and Taylor, since both of these great men not only adopted for a short period the profession of the schoolmaster, but also both endeavoured by the compilation of grammars to smooth the way for the youthful learner, and to leave behind them permanent memorials of the task to which they had temporarily dedicated their lofty intellects.

During his residence in Wales, Taylor contracted a second marriage. The name of the lady with whom, in this darker period of his life, he was induced to enter into the bonds of wedlock, was Joanna Bridges, who is reputed to have been a natural child of King Charles I. It would appear that this was a very advantageous match for the impoverished divine. In addition to the endowments of a handsome person and agreeable manners, the lady is said to have been possessed of a good estate in the north-eastern part of Carmarthenshire. But, like most of the royalists' possessions, it is probable that the property had become much reduced and encumbered by fines and other exactions, and was, therefore, insufficient in amount to relieve Taylor at once from the duties of school-keeping. Of his engagements and way of life, however, at this epoch, nothing again is precisely known; but it is certain that his pen was not idle in his retirement, for in the same year in which his Grammar was given to the world, he published his great work on the Liberty of Prophecy.² In this treatise he vindicated the principles of religious freedom upon their broadest basis; so much so that it has been characterised as the "first distinct and avowed defence of toleration which had been ventured on in England, perhaps in Christendom." Its spirit is beautifully represented in the noble apologue with which it concludes, and which its author professes to have taken from the "Jews' books," wherein the patriarch Abraham is rebuked by the Lord of Hosts for denying to an unbelieving wayfarer the rites of hospitality.³ Although written "in poverty and tribulation, without books, or leisure to consult them," in style and matter it is unsurpassed by any other production of its author. By Coleridge, the greatest critic of modern times, this treatise was regarded with almost extravagant admiration. "He saw in it all the confluent powers of the author, swelling the majestic stream of genius, as it rolled onward in its diversified and winding course."⁴ No one, we believe, can read this great work, or any considerable portion of it, without feeling that the writer was far in advance of his age; and that the object which he had in view, and which is declared upon the title-page to be the demonstration of "the Unreasonableness of prescribing to other Men's Faith, and the Iniquity of Persecuting Differing Opinions," as far as argument is concerned, was most satisfactorily attained.

In the dedication to this celebrated production, a brief but beautiful allusion is made by Taylor to his personal history, which the biographer cannot pass over without notice, although some of the circumstances to which it alludes are involved in obscurity, nor has any clue been obtained to the name of the "noble enemy," whose mercy and gentleness it commemorates. "In the great storm," says Taylor, "which dashed the vessel of the Church all in pieces, I had been cast on the coast of Wales, and, in a little boat, thought to have enjoyed that rest and quietness, which in England in a greater I could not hope for. Here I cast anchor, and thinking to ride safely, the storm followed me with so much impetuous violence, that it broke a cable, and I lost my anchor; and here again I was exposed to the mercy of the sea, and the gentleness of an element that could neither distinguish things nor persons. And but that He who stilleth the raging of the sea, and the noise of his waves, and the madness of his people, had provided a plank for me, I had been lost to all the opportunities of content or study. But I know not whether I have been more preserved by the courtesies of my friends, or the gentleness and mercies of a noble enemy."

(3) "When Abraham sat at his tent door, according to his custom, waiting to entertain strangers, he espied an old man, stooping and leaning on his staff, weary with age and travail, coming towards him, who was an hundred years of age. He received him most kindly, washed his feet, provided supper, caused him to sit down; but observing that the old man eat, and prayed not, nor begged for a blessing on his meat, he asked him why he did not worship the God of Heaven. The old man told him, that he worshiped the fire only, and acknowledged no other God. At which answer Abraham grew so zealously angry, that he thrust the old man out of his tent, and exposed him to all the evils of the night, and an unguarded condition. When the old man was gone, God called to Abraham, and asked him where the stranger was? He replied, 'I thrust him away because he did not worship thee.' God answered him, 'I have suffered him these hundred years, although he dishonoured me; and couldst not thou endure him one night?'"

The shipwrecked divine was not cast, indeed, upon an altogether inhospitable shore. On the contrary, it is gratifying to perceive that the misfortunes by which he had been overtaken, proved, as temporal misfortunes often do, the sources of some unexpected benefits. The clouds which had overshadowed him were big with blessings. In his forced seclusion, surrounded by untoward circumstances, he was visited with unlooked-for gleams of comfort. In the village in which he had fixed his temporary abode, rose the charming towers of Golden Grove, the residence of Lord Carbery, an amiable and accomplished nobleman, who was delighted to extend to Taylor his friendship and protection. The introduction to Lord and Lady Carbery, whenever it took place, was an important epoch in the life of the persecuted royalist. In the neighbourhood of Golden Grove he passed some of the happiest hours of his life, cheered by the attentions and solitudes of affectionate friends, and partaking of the pleasures and advantages of highly cultivated society. The situation of the place was most delightful. It was surrounded by a landscape of surpassing loveliness, and by objects peculiarly calculated to influence and interest the poetical mind. The neighbouring fields were clothed in the most attractive garb of pastoral beauty; the river Towey flowed through the grounds,¹ and lofty trees flung their shadows over its stream. A glorious avenue of elms was long remembered as Taylor's Walk, where he meditated some of the sublimest strains of his well-nigh superhuman eloquence. Amidst such scenes the harassed mind might well find rest. Past annoyances and misfortunes were forgotten, and a spirit of calm contentedness and sober joy supervened. The heart of the pious divine overflowed with gratitude and thankfulness. Instead of brooding over what he had lost, he delighted to indulge in the enumeration of the privileges he possessed, and the pure pleasures he enjoyed. Thus in his great work on Holy Living, he exclaims with reference to this period of his life:—"I am fallen into the hands of publicans and sequestrators, and they have taken all from me; what now? Let me look about me. They have left me the sun and moon, fire and water, a loving wife, and many friends to pity me, and some to relieve me; and I can still discourse, and unless I list, they have not taken away my merry countenance, and my cheerful spirit, and a good conscience; they have still left me the Providence of God, and all the promises of the Gospel, and my religion, and my hopes of heaven, and my charity to them too; and still I sleep and digest, I eat and drink, I read and meditate, I can walk in my neighbour's pleasant fields, and see the variety of natural beauties, and delight in all that in which God delights,—that is, in virtue and wisdom, in the whole creation, and in God himself. And he that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down on his little handful of thorns. Such a person were fit to bear Nero company in his funeral sorrow for the loss of one of Poppæa's hairs, or help to mourn for Lesbia's sparrow: and because he loves it, he deserves to starve in the midst of plenty, and to want comfort while he is enriched with blessings."

Of the charms of outward nature, Taylor was in the highest degree susceptible. His happiest illustrations are drawn from familiar sights and sounds, and from the most frequently-recurring objects in the rural landscape. He had an eye for all the beauties of English scenery, and a full appreciation of the poetry of country life. Looking through nature up to nature's God, a close observer of the beauties and mysteries of the visible universe, Jeremy Taylor has been properly designated the Shakspeare of English theologians; casting the hue of poetry over every theme he touched, and relieving with graceful similitudes and gorgeous imagery the weightiest and most solemn disquisitions. To his lengthened residence near Golden Grove, and to the circumstances which attended his sojourn there, we are probably indebted for the most beautiful and picturesque passages in his works. As those passages rise before our memory, we naturally picture to ourselves the peaceful pleasures and cheerful life of the pious pastor: his morning walks, his mid-day musings, his evening reveries; now tracing the upward flight of the lark, now watching the bursting rosebud, and now the waving foliage of the forest, with the rapt attention of the poet and philosopher. Listen for a moment to the musical cadence of one of those charming similes for which he is so famous. "Anger is a perfect alienation of the mind from prayer, and therefore is contrary to that attention, which presents our prayers in a right line to God. For so have I seen a lark rising from his bed of grass, and soaring upwards, singing as he rises, and hopes to get to heaven, and climb above the clouds; but the poor bird was beaten back with the loud sighings of an eastern wind, and his motion made irregular and unconstant, descending more at every breath of the tempest, than it could recover by the libration and frequent weighing of his wings; till the little creature was forced to sit down and pant, and stay till the storm was over, and then it made a prosperous flight, and did rise and sing as if it had learned music and motion from an angel, as he passed sometimes through the air about his ministry here below. So is the prayer of a good man," &c.

We cannot read such a sentence as this, without feeling it to be the language of genuine inspiration—the utterance of an earnest lover of nature, who had often beheld with no common attention what he describes. There can be no question, that Taylor was an experienced observer, as well as a poet of the highest order. As he walked abroad into the fields, he found everything around him suggestive of features and incidents of human life. We know not, for instance, where to turn for a grander or more appropriate array of images, than is presented to us in his beautiful parallel between the life of a man, and the brief glory of a summer's day. "Some are called of age at fourteen, some at one-and-twenty, some never; but all men, late enough; for the life of a man comes upon him slowly and insensibly. But, as when the sun approaching towards the gates of the morning, he first opens a little eye of heaven, and sends away the spirits of darkness, and gives light to a cock, and calls up the lark to matins, and by-and-by gilds the fringes of a cloud, and peeps over the eastern hills, thrusting out his golden horns, like those which decked the brow of Moses, when he was forced to wear a veil, because himself had seen the face of God; and still, while a man tells the story, the sun gets up higher and higher, till he shows a fair face and a full light, and then he shines one whole day, under a cloud often, and sometimes weeping great and little showers, and sets quickly. So is a man's reason and his life."

Although utterly free from the charge of habitually indulging in gloomy or desponding views, it is not surprising that Taylor's musings should, at this period, have frequently worn a melancholy aspect. His genius was inclined to pathos. He had espoused an unprosperous cause, and his life had been tinged with many sorrows. In such a frame of mind, it was natural that the loveliest of earthly objects should suggest to him some sorrowful reflections. Whilst walking, for instance, in the gardens of Golden Grove, and musing upon by-gone days, the sight of the summer rose in its progress from maturity to decay, might well suggest to him that exquisite illustration of the frail tenure of earthly beauty, presented in the pages of his Holy Dying. "It is a mighty change that is made by the death of every person, and it is visible to us who are alive. Reckon but from the sprightfulness of youth, and the fair cheeks and full eyes of childhood; from the vigorousness and strong flexure of the joints of five-and-twenty, to the hollowness and deadly paleness, to the loathsomeness and horror of a three days' burial, and we shall perceive the distance to be very great and very strange. But so have I seen a rose, newly springing from the clefts of its hood, and at first it was fair as the morning, and full with the dew of heaven, as a lamb's fleece; but when a ruder breath had forced open its virgin modesty, and dismantled its too youthful and unripe retirements, it began to put on darkness, and to decline to softness and the symptoms of a sickly age; it bowed the head, and broke its stalk; and at night, having lost some of its leaves, and all its beauty, it fell into the portion of weeds and out-worn faces. The same is the portion of every man and every woman; the heritage of worms and serpents, rottenness, and cold dishonour, and our beauty so changed, that our acquaintance quickly knew us not."¹

Independently of their warmth of colouring and poetical embellishments, the productions of Taylor at this period are usually considered the most valuable that have proceeded from his pen. His treatises of Holy Living and Holy Dying belong to this epoch. He also compiled a practical manual of devotions, to which he gave the name of the Golden Grove, as an appropriate acknowledgment of the many privileges he had enjoyed under his patron's roof. In a chaster and different style, as befitted perhaps the solemn theme, he composed the Great Exemplar,—a life of Christ, which has attained great popularity. Some of his most exquisite sermons were also written and preached in the sequestered village where he had found such a congenial retreat. Among the most interesting of them, is the discourse which he delivered in the month of October, 1650, on the death of his patron's lady—the amiable and accomplished Countess of Carbery. It is easy to believe that every phrase of this inimitable funeral sermon came from the preacher's heart. To the illustrious deceased, Taylor was deeply indebted: he had long known and esteemed her as a friend, and the recollection of past kindnesses weighed upon his spirit. With a heavy heart, but "with a faithful hand," he presented her portrait to the weeping hearers, and a holier or more attractive picture was never delineated from any pulpit. "I have seen a female religion," he said, "that wholly dwelt upon the face and tongue; that like a wanton and undressed tree, spends all its juices in suckers and irregular branches, in leaves and gum, and after all such goodly outsides, you should never eat an apple, or be delighted with the beauties or the perfumes of a hopeful blossom. But the religion of this excellent lady was of another constitution: it took root downward in humility, and brought forth fruits upward in substantial graces of a Christian, in charity and justice, in chastity and modesty, in fair friendships and sweetness of society: she had not very much of the forms and outsides of godliness, but she was largely careful for the power of it, for the moral, essential, and useful parts; such which would make her to be, not seem to be, religious." And again:—"The other appendage of her religion, which also was a great ornament to all the parts of her life, was a rare modesty and humility of spirit, a confident despising and undervaluing of herself. For though she had the greatest judgment, and the greatest experience of things and persons, that I ever yet knew in a person of her youth, and sex, and circumstances, yet, as if she knew nothing of it, she had the meanest opinion of herself; and like a fair taper, when she shined to all the room, yet round about her own station she had cast a shadow and a cloud, and she shined to everybody but herself." . . . "In all her religion, and in all her actions of relation towards God, she had a strange evenness and untroubled passage, sliding towards her ocean of God and of infinity with a certain and silent motion."

(1) Holy Dying.

It must be here observed, that the publication of the Golden Grove ruffled for a brief period the quiet stream of Taylor's life, and subjected him to legal persecution. Some passages in the preface to this manual were considered to reflect upon the ruling powers, and to mark the writer out as an obstinate malignant. An order for his arrest was accordingly transmitted to the local authorities, and he was imprisoned for a short period in Chepstow Castle(?) When we say "for a short period," we are, however, merely following the conjectures of other biographers, whose industry has been unable to discover the length of time he remained in durance, or even to declare with certainty the place of his confinement.

Although there is no record of the commencement of their intimacy, it is supposed that about this time Taylor became an object of interest to an Englishman distinguished in these troublesome days for his attachment to the Church of England,—the celebrated John Evelyn. It would appear from Evelyn's diary, that Taylor preached several times in London in the spring of 1654, and on the 12th of April, 1656, he dined at Say's Court (Evelyn's residence), with Berkeley, Boyle, and Wilkins. On his return to Wales, he was visited by a severe domestic affliction, in "the death of a little child, that lately," he said, when communicating to his friend Evelyn the sad event, "made us very glad, but now he rejoices in his little orb, while we think, and sigh, and long to be as safe as he is." In the course of a few months his dwelling was again invaded by the destroying pestilence, and "two sweet, hopeful boys" were taken from him, and buried side by side. Although piously submitting himself to the will of heaven, Taylor was deeply affected by these visitations. How fondly he loved his wife and little ones may be conjectured from the warmth and passion with which he has described in one of his sermons the happiness of domestic life. "No man can tell," he says, "but he that loves his children, how many delicious accents make a man's heart dance in the pretty conversation of those dear pledges: their childishness, their stammering, their little angers, their innocence, their imperfections, their necessities, are so many little emanations of joy and comfort to him that delights in their persons and society: but he that loves not his wife and children, feeds a lioness at home, and broods a nest of sorrows; and blessing itself cannot make him happy."

It seems to be agreed upon all hands, that it was the loss of his children which drove Taylor permanently from Wales, and induced him to bend his footsteps to the metropolis, whither he had been frequently invited by Evelyn. "When he had spent some years," says Bishop Rust, "in this retirement, it pleased God to visit his family with sickness, and to take to himself the dear pledges of his favour, three sons of great hopes and expectations, within the space of two or three months: and though he had learned a quiet submission to the Divine will, yet the affliction touched him so sensibly, that it made him desirous to leave the country." In London he is supposed to have occasionally lectured to a private congregation of Episcopalians. It is also on record, that he endured about this period a short imprisonment in the Tower, on account of the publication of a collection of Offices, to which the printer had prefixed a picture of our Saviour, and thus rendered himself and the author liable to the penalties of an act against idolatry, which had been recently passed by the Puritan parliament. He had not, however, resided long in the metropolis, when an introduction to Edward Lord Conway once more changed the scene of his life and labours. This nobleman, whom Bishop Rust describes as "a person of great honour and generosity," was possessed of large estates in the north-eastern part of Ireland, and entertaining a high esteem for Taylor's personal character, as well as considerable confidence in his zeal and ability, he tendered him the lectureship of Lisburn, then an inconsiderable town, in the province of Ulster. The stipend paid to the lecturer was, however, so small, that Taylor at first declined it; but other inducements being subsequently held out to him, he departed for Ireland in the summer of 1658, and fixed his residence at Portmore, near the mansion of Lord Conway.

In very many respects, Portmore proved to Taylor a most desirable retreat. The surrounding landscape scarcely yielded in beauty to the Golden Grove. The delightful greensward of Lord Conway's park was washed by the limpid waters of two beautiful lakes, "each studded with romantic islets." Bishop Rust speaks of it as "a place made for study and contemplation;" and it was described to Heber, as a spot in which "the painter, poet, or devout contemplatist might delight to linger."¹ In such a place a mind like Taylor's found many sources of happiness. Though he continued poor and dependent, he was grateful to the Providence who had placed him in so delightful an asylum. From Lord Conway he received many kindnesses, and Evelyn remained his staunch friend, supplying him regularly with sums of money by way of pension. Such assistance, the philosopher of Say's Court was happy out of his abundance to dispense to the poor and pious scholar, and Taylor felt no degradation in accepting it.

The two years which he passed at Portmore, afforded our great divine the requisite leisure for the completion of his most elaborate production, the Ductor Dubitantium; or, Cases of Conscience. In the spring of 1660 he quitted Ireland, and proceeded to London with the manuscript of this work, which he caused to be published in the June following. He found, however, that he had arrived in England at an important crisis. During his absence, the great Protector had died, and from the moment of his decease, it was obvious that the days of the Commonwealth were numbered. The feeble mind of Richard Cromwell was unequal to the task of government, and the majority of the nation, disgusted with Puritan excesses, anxiously waited for the restoration of royalty. Affairs had reached a climax, when on the 24th of April, Jeremy Taylor placed his hand to the memorable declaration of the royalists of London, to which the exiled monarch promptly responded. On the 29th of May, Charles II. made his triumphant entry into the metropolis, surrounded by devoted adherents, who had suffered severely in his cause, and who hailed with extravagant joy his restoration to the throne of his ancestors. Many of these, alas! were doomed to encounter disappointment and neglect, but Taylor was among the fortunate few whose services were thought worthy of acknowledgment, and whose unwavering loyalty was remembered in the day of triumph. On the 6th of August following, he was nominated to the see of Down and Connor; a preferment below his merit, but which more than satisfied his ambition. That such a man should have been appointed an Irish Bishop naturally excites surprise. Among the clergy of the period there were few, or perhaps scarcely any, who had so high a claim to the distinction of the mitre, and it would have been but just and reasonable to have nominated to one of the vacant English Sees, so bright an ornament of the English Church. To banish to a distance the greatest of pulpit orators, whose seductive eloquence might have captivated the careless ear of royalty itself, appears to us an act only to be accounted for on the supposition of Heber, that it was suspected the known fervour of his religious zeal, and the circumstance of his relationship by marriage to the royal family, might have led him to speak more plainly, and to rebuke the vices and follies of the great with more asperity, than would have been at all times agreeable to courtly cars.

Having thus traced the career of Taylor through the dismal straits of obscurity and poverty, to dignity and opulence, we find but little more remaining to be told of him. In January, 1661, the ceremony of his consecration as Bishop of Down and Connor took place in the Cathedral of St. Patrick, and he was very shortly afterwards sworn in a member of the Irish privy council, and elected vice-chancellor of the university of Dublin. In the discharge of his episcopal duties he soon displayed such unwearied zeal, activity, and prudence, that the diocese of Dromore was, in April 1661, annexed to that of Down and Connor, "on account," as it was expressed, "of his virtue, wisdom, and industry." In the midst of dissensions and oppositions, peculiar to the country and the period, he displayed a meek and tolerant spirit, which disarmed the fury of his bitterest antagonists, together with a zeal which was on all occasions tempered alike by charity and discretion. The sturdy champions of the Covenant, who professed, "in the wildest and most gloomy sense," (to quote the words of Bishop Heber,) "the austere principles of their party," abounded in Taylor's diocese, and were in possession of many of the church livings. With these men it was difficult at all times to deal with gentleness: a more powerful argument than episcopal censure or expostulation was often necessary to enforce conformity; but there is abundant evidence that Taylor never resorted without reluctance to measures of extremity, and that he regarded his mission in Ireland as peculiarly one of conciliation. But, above all, the amiability of his personal character was, on all sides, the subject of observation. He had preserved through each vicissitude of fortune the sweetness of disposition for which he had been in his youth remarkable, and as soon as Providence thought fit to endow him with large possessions, he was especially distinguished for the graceful and unostentatious benevolence with which he distributed to others out of his great abundance. His extensive charity was regarded by his contemporaries as the crowning virtue of his life. "But he was not only a good man Godward," says his friend, Bishop Rust, "but he was come to the top of St. Peter's gradation, and to all his other virtues added a large and diffusive charity; and whoever compares his plentiful incomes with the inconsiderable estate he left at his death, will be easily convinced that charity was steward for a great proportion of his revenue. But the hungry that he fed, and the naked that he clothed, and the distressed that he supplied, and the fatherless that he provided for; the poor children that he put to apprentice, and brought up at school and maintained at the university, will now sound a trumpet to that charity which he dispersed with his right hand, but would not suffer his left hand to have any knowledge of it."

In the influential position to which he had been so properly elevated, Taylor laboured for six years, and during the whole of this period his activity and energy were on all occasions conspicuously displayed. At length, on the 3d of August, 1667, he was attacked with fever, and on the 13th of the same month he breathed his last at Lisburn, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. In the mellow autumn of his life, with all its matured experience, and in the full possession of his faculties, he was summoned from the scene of his usefulness by the inscrutable decree of an all-wise Creator. "He passed," says his eloquent biographer, Mr. Willmott, "through the dark gate into the Garden, when the eye of fancy had not grown dim, nor the arm of intellect become feeble. Having borne the heat and burden of the day, he received his wages before the sun was set and the dews of night began to descend. Called home in the rich autumn of his life, he was busy in the field and in the harvest; the sheaves lay piled around him when he fell asleep, 'And from his slack hand dropp'd the gather'd rose.'"

We are unwilling to weaken our estimate of Taylor's character by any further panegyric; but it would at the same time be scarcely proper for us to conclude this sketch without drawing attention to his varied acquirements, and extensive acquaintance with every department of human knowledge. As a scholar, no less than as a divine, he is entitled to our high consideration. With indefatigable industry, as all his writings prove, he ransacked every storehouse of ancient and modern learning. Not content with the beaten path of scholarship, he deviated often into unfrequented bye-roads, presenting his readers with the result of his labours and researches, in the shape of some apt allusion or appropriate anecdote. Among the divines of the period, he was as conspicuous for sound learning, as for the superior grace and eloquence of his discourses; and in the disposal of his time, he seems to have kept steadily in view that great saying of his illustrious predecessor, Richard Hooker:—"There is in this world no kind of knowledge whereby any part of Truth is seen, but we justly account it precious; yea, that principal Truth, in comparison of which all other knowledge is vile, may receive from it some kind of light."

As a Theologian, it is well known that Taylor entertained some peculiar views. His ardent imagination, and speculative temperament, withdrew him, upon certain topics, from what was thought to be the strict line of orthodoxy. Upon these subjects, however, it is neither our province nor our wish to enter. Of one thing we may rest assured,—for it is corroborated by the whole tenor of his life,—that his opinions were the result of sincere conviction; and it can also be mentioned to his honour, that when precipitated into the stormy arena of controversy, whilst he displayed the natural warmth and sensitiveness of an earnest and truth-seeking man, he was at all times distinguished for that spirit of meekness and forbearance which formed, both in the hour of adversity and prosperity, so engaging a feature in his character.

We have elsewhere spoken of Taylor as a poet; and a great one we believe him to be. He possessed, in an almost equal degree with his great contemporary Milton, that divine gift of imagination, which when allied to moral purity, and controlled by reason and experience, may be regarded as the highest faculty of the human mind. But whilst his numerous prose works are filled with passages which are in themselves true poems, and only require the aid of metrical arrangement to make them so in the common acceptance of the term, yet he attempted versification with but little success. When it is recollected, however, that true ease in writing is the result of practice and labour, as well as of natural aptitude, it ought not to occasion surprise that Taylor should have found himself so little at home in the task of poetical composition. His genius was cramped by the unaccustomed fetters of rhyme and metre; and in writing verse, as it has been well observed, he had but the use of his left hand. But his failure, after all, was only comparative. Many examples of gorgeous diction and musical expression might be selected from his verses which would do no discredit to his reputation; and we subjoin a brief specimen from a hymn, in which his biographer, Mr. Willmott, professes to discover "the fervour of Crashaw, with some of the fancy of Cowley:"—

"O beauteous God, uncircumscrib'd treasure
Of an eternal pleasure,
Thy throne is settled far

Where thou prepar'at a glorious place
Within the brightness of thy face,
For every spirit
To inherit,
That builds his hope upon thy merit,
And loves thee with a holy charity.
What ravish'd heart, seraphic tongue, or eyes
Clear as the morning's rise,
Can speak, or think, or see,
That bright eternity?
Where the great King's transparent throne
Is of an entire jasper stone," &c.

Having made these remarks on the life and character of Jeremy Taylor, our pleasantest, but perhaps most difficult task remains behind. It is that of presenting to our readers a few extracts from his works, which, whilst of necessity brief and unconnected, may at the same time forcibly illustrate the character of his genius. We will commence with one or two quotations from his beautiful sermon of "The Marriage Ring."

"They that enter into the state of marriage cast a die of the greatest contingency, and yet of the greatest interest in the world, next to the last throw for eternity. Life or death, felicity or a lasting sorrow, are in the power of marriage. A woman, indeed, ventures most, for she has no sanctuary to retire to from an evil husband; she must dwell upon her sorrow, and hatch the eggs which her own folly or infelicity hath produced; and she is more under it, because her tormentor hath a warrant of prerogative, and the woman may complain to God as subjects do of tyrant princes; but otherwise she hath no appeal in the causes of unkindness. And though the man can run from many hours of his sadness, yet he must return to it again; and when he sits among his neighbours, he remembers the objection that is in his bosom, and he sighs deeply. The boys, and the pedlars, and the fruiterers, shall tell of this man when he is carried to his grave, that he lived and died a poor wretched person.

"The stags in the Greek epigram, whose knees were clogged with frozen snow upon the mountains, came down to the brooks of the valleys, hoping to thaw their joints with the waters of the stream; but there the frost overtook them, and bound them fast in ice, till the young herdsman took them in their stranger snare. It is the unhappy chance of many men, finding many inconveniences upon the mountains of single life, they descend into the valley of marriage to refresh their troubles; and there they enter into fetters, and are bound to sorrow by the cords of a man's or woman's peevishness.

"As the Indian women enter into folly for the price of an elephant, and think their crime warrantable, so do men and women change their liberty for a rich fortune, (like Eriphile, the Argive; she preferred gold before a good man,) and show themselves to be less than money, by overvaluing that to all the content and wise felicity of their lives; and when they have counted their money and their sorrows together, how willingly would they buy, with the loss of all that money, modesty, or sweet nature to their relative!"

In the following directions for the conduct of the newly married (from the same sermon), the wisdom of the preacher is no less apparent than the fancy of the poet:—

“Man and wife are equally concerned to avoid all offences of each other in the beginning of their conversation: every little thing can blast an infant blossom; and the breath of the south can shake the little rings of the vine when first they begin to curl, like the locks of a new-weaned boy; but when by age and consolidation they stiffen into the hardness of a stem, and have, by the warm embraces of the sun and the kisses of heaven, brought forth their clusters, they can endure the storms of the north, and the loud noises of a tempest, and yet never be broken: so are the early unions of an unfixed marriage; watchful and observant, jealous and busy, inquisitive and careful, and apt to take alarm at every unkind word. After the hearts of the man and the wife are endeared and hardened by a mutual confidence and experience, longer than artifice and pretence can last, there are a great many remembrances, and some things present, that dash all little unkindnesses in pieces.”

Before we take leave of this admirable discourse, we may observe that we know of nothing more beautiful, even in Taylor's prose works, than the following description of the duties and character of a good wife:—“But she that hath a wise husband must entice him to an eternal dearness, by the veil of modesty, and the grave robes of chastity, the ornament of meekness, and the jewels of faith and charity; her brightness must be purity, and she must shine round about with sweetness and friendship, and she shall be pleasant while she lives, and desired when she dies.”

We will select from another sermon a remarkable illustration of the dignified and graceful march of Taylor's eloquence. The extract appears to us so perfect an example of the highest style of sacred oratory, that we earnestly commend it to the reader's attention. The subject is the triumph of Christianity:—

“Jesus entered into the world with all the circumstances of poverty. He had a star to illustrate his birth; but a stable for his bedchamber, and a manger for his cradle. The angels sang hymns when he was born; but he was cold, and cried, uneasy and unprovided. . . All that Christ came for was, or was mingled with, sufferings: for all those little joys which God sent, either to recreate his person, or to illustrate his office, were abated or attended with afflictions; God being more careful to establish in him the covenant of sufferings, than to refresh his sorrows. Presently, after the angels had finished their hallelujahs, he was forced to fly to save his life, and the air became full of shrieks of the desolate mothers of Bethlehem for their dying babes. God had no sooner made him illustrious with a voice from heaven, and the descent of the Holy Ghost upon him in the waters of Baptism, but he was delivered over to be tempted and assaulted by the devil in the wilderness. His transfiguration was a bright ray of glory; but then also he entered into a cloud, and was told a sad story of what he was to suffer at Jerusalem. And upon Palm Sunday, when he rode triumphantly into Jerusalem, and was adorned with the acclamations of a king and god, he wet the palms with his tears, sweeter than the drops of manna, or the little pearls of heaven that descended upon mount Hermon; weeping in the midst of this triumph over obstinate, perishing, and malicious Jerusalem. . . .

“They that had overcome the world could not strangle Christianity. But so have I seen the sun with a little ray of distant light challenge all the power of darkness, and without violence and noise climbing up the hill, hath made night so to retire, that its memory was lost in the joys and sprightfulness of the morning: and Christianity, without violence or armies, without resistance and self-preservation, without strength or human eloquence, without challenging of privileges or fighting against tyranny, without alteration of government and scandal of princes, with its humility and meekness, with toleration and patience, with obedience and charity, with praying and dying, did insensibly turn the world into Christianity, and persecution into victory.”

“Certain it is, that as nothing can better do it, so there is nothing greater, for which God made our tongues, next to reciting his praises, than to minister comfort to a weary soul. And what greater measure can we have, than that we should bring joy to our brother, who with his dreary eyes looks to heaven and round about, and cannot find so much rest as to lay his eyelids close together—than that thy tongue should be tuned with heavenly accents, and make the weary soul to listen for light and ease, and, when he perceives that there is such a thing in the world, and in the order of things, as comfort and joy, to begin to break out from the prison of his sorrows, at the door of sighs and tears, and by little and little, melt into showers of refreshment? This is glory to thy voice, and employment fit for the brightest angel. But so have I seen the sun kiss the frozen earth, which was bound up with the images of death, and the colder breath of the north; and then the waters break from their enclosures, and melt with joy, and run in useful channels; and the flies do rise again from their little graves in walls, and dance awhile in the air, to tell that there is joy within, and that the great mother of creatures will open the stock of her new refreshment, become useful to mankind, and sing praises to her Redeemer. So is the heart of a sorrowful man under the discourses of a wise comforter; he breaks from the despairs of the grave, and the fetters and chains of sorrow; he blesses God, and he blesses thee, and he feels his life returning; for to be miserable is death, but nothing is life but to be comforted; and God is pleased with no music from below so much as in the thanksgiving songs of relieved widows, of supported orphans, of rejoicing, and comforted, and thankful persons."

The sermon on the Day of Judgment is usually acknowledged to be the sublimest effort of Taylor's oratory, and proves that he was equally at home in the solemn and terrible, as in dealing with gentler emotions and softer themes. A brief extract from this celebrated discourse will sufficiently illustrate its graphic power and awful grandeur:—

"Consider what infinite multitudes of angels, and men, and women, shall then appear! It is a huge assembly when the men of one kingdom, the men of one age in a single province, are gathered together in heaps and confusion of disorder; but then, all kingdoms of all ages, all the armies that ever mustered, all that world that Augustus Cæsar taxed, all those hundreds of millions that were slain in all the Roman wars, from Numa's time till Italy was broken into principalities and small exarchates: all these, and all that can come into numbers, and that did descend from the loins of Adam, shall at once be represented; to which account, if we add the armies of heaven, the nine orders of blessed spirits, and the infinite numbers in every order, we may suppose the numbers fit to express the majesty of that God, and the terror of that Judge, who is the Lord and Father of all that unimaginable multitude!

"In that great multitude we shall meet all those who by their example and their holy precepts, have, like tapers, enkindled with a' beam of the Sun of righteousness, enlightened us, and taught us to walk in the paths of justice . . . Here men shall meet the partners of their sins, and them that drank the round when they crowned their heads with folly and forgetfulness, and their cups with wines and noises. There shall ye see that poor perishing soul, whom thou didst tempt to adultery and wantonness, to drunkenness or perjury, to rebellion or an evil interest, by power or craft, by witty discourses or deep dissembling, by scandal or a snare, by evil example or a pernicious counsel, by malice or unweariness. That soul that cries to those rocks to cover her, if it had not been for thy perpetual temptation, might have followed the Lamb in a white robe; and that poor man, that is clothed with shame and flames of fire, would have shined in glory, but that thou didst force him to be partner of thy baseness."

Little as we may be doing justice by these quotations to Taylor's powers, the temptation to proceed with them is very powerful. But having regard to the patience of our readers, and our own limited space, we feel that our best course will be to conclude this paper with a few short extracts, which we shall leave, without further comment, to the consideration of those who have followed us thus far in our imperfect sketch of Bishop Jeremy Taylor.

SIN—ITS INSIDIOUS PROGRESS.

"I have seen the little purls of a spring sweat through the bottom of a bank, and intenerate the stubborn pavement, till it hath made it fit for the impression of a child's foot; and it was despised, like the descending pearls of a misty morning, till it had opened its way and made a stream large enough to carry away the ruins of the undermined strand, and to invade the neighbouring gardens: but then the despised drops were grown into an artificial river, and an intolerable mischief. So are the first entrances of sin, stopped with the antidotes of a hearty prayer, and checked into sobriety by the age of a reverend man, or the counsels of a single sermon: but when such beginnings are neglected, and our religion hath not in it so much philosophy as to think anything evil as long as we can endure it, they grow up to ulcers, and pestilential evils; they destroy the soul by their abode, who at their first entry might have been killed with the pressure of a little finger."

HOPE.

"Hope is like the wing of an angel soaring up to heaven, and bears our prayers to the throne of God."

HUMILITY.

"All the world, all that we are, and all that we have, our bodies and our souls, our actions and our sufferings, our conditions at home, our accidents abroad, our many sins, and our seldom virtues, are as so many arguments to make our souls dwell low in the deep valley of humility."

CHEERFULNESS.

"But cheerfulness and a festival spirit fills the soul full of harmony—it composes music for churches and hearts—it makes and publishes glorification of God—it produces thankfulness, and serves the end of charity; and, when the oil of gladness runs over, it makes bright and tall emissions of light and holy fires, reaching up to a cloud, and making joy round about; and, therefore, since it is so innocent, and may be so pious and full of holy advantage, whatever can innocently minister to this holy joy does set forward the work of religion and charity. And, indeed, charity itself, which is the vertical top of all religion, is nothing else but a union of joys concentrated in the heart, and reflected from all the angles of our life and intercourse. It is a rejoicing in God, a gladness in our neighbour's good, a pleasure in doing good, a rejoicing with him; and without love, we cannot have any joy at all. It is this that makes children to be a pleasure, and friendship to be so noble and divine a thing: and upon this account it is certain that all that which innocently makes a man cheerful, does also make him charitable; for grief, and age, and sickness, and weariness, these are peevish and troublesome; but mirth and cheerfulness is content, and civil, and compliant, and communicative, and loves to do good, and swells up to felicity only upon the wings of charity."

"THE COMMON LOT."

"I have read of a fair young German gentleman, who living, often refused to be pictured, but put off the importunity of his friends' desire, by giving way, that after a few days' burial, they might send a painter to his vault, and, if they saw cause for it, draw the image of his death unto the life. They did so, and found his face half eaten, and his midriff and backbone full of serpents; and so he stands pictured among his armed ancestors. So does the fairest beauty change, and it will be as bad with you and me; and then what servants shall we have to wait on us in the grave? what friends to visit us? what officious people to cleanse away the moist and unwholesome cloud reflected upon our faces from the sides of the weeping vaults, which are the longest weepers for our funeral?"

SYMPATHY.

"If you do but see a maiden carried to her grave a little before her intended marriage, or an infant die before the birth of reason, nature hath taught us to pay a tributary tear. Alas! your eyes will behold the ruin of many families, which though they sadly have deserved, yet mercy is not delighted at the spectacle; and therefore God places a watery cloud in the eye, that when the light of heaven shines upon it, it may produce a rainbow to be a sacrament and a memorial that God and the sons of God do not love to see a man perish."¹

GENERAL BENEVOLENCE AND FRIENDSHIP.

"A good man is a friend to all the world; and he is not truly charitable that does not wish well, and do good to all mankind in what he can. But though we must pray for all men, yet we say special litanies for brave kings and holy prelates, and the wise guides of our souls, for our brethren and relations, our wives and children."

SUPERSTITION.

"I have seen a harmless dove made dark with an artificial night, and her eyes sealed and locked up with a little quill, soaring upwards and flying with amazement, fear, and undiscerning wing; she made towards heaven, but knew not that she was made a train and an instrument, to teach her enemy to prevail upon her and all her defenceless kindred. So is a superstitious man, jealous and blind, forward and mistaken; he runs towards heaven as he thinks, but he chooses foolish paths, and out of fear takes anything that he is told; or fancies and guesses concerning God, by measures taken from his own diseases and imperfections."

CERTAINTY OF DEATH.

"All the successions of time, all the changes in nature, all the varieties of light and darkness, the thousand thousands of accidents in this world, and every contingency to every man, and to every creature, doth preach our funeral sermon, and calls us to look and see how the old sexton Time throws up the earth and digs a grave, where we must lay our sins or our sorrows, and sow our bodies, till they rise again in a fair or intolerable eternity."

ADVERSITY.

"All is well as long as the sun shines, and the fair breath of heaven gently wafts us to our own purposes. But if you will try the excellency, and feel the work of faith, place the man in a persecution; let him ride in a storm; let his bones be broken with sorrow, and his eyelids loosed with sickness; let his bread be dipped with tears, and all the daughters of music brought low; let us come to sit upon the margin of our grave, and let a tyrant lean hard upon our fortune, and dwell upon our wrong; let the storm arise, and the keels toss till the cordage crack, or that all our hopes bulge under us, and descend into the hollowness of sad misfortunes."

THE ESCAPE OF MADAME KOSSUTH.

AN AUTHENTIC NARRATIVE.

DURING the month of August, 1848, the President-Governor of Hungary, Louis Kossuth, with the principal officers of his provisional government, were in the fortified town of Arad, on the river Marosch. Between that place and the town of Zegadin, on the Tisch, in the vicinity of Arad, Georgey, with the Hungarian troops under his command, lay encamped; while behind him, towards the Tisch, was the Russian army of reserve, under Paskiewitch. Dembinski, with his men, besieged Temeswar, and he had already carried its third wall. Between him and the Tisch lay the united Austro-Russian forces. The army of Bem had been defeated at Hermanstadt by the Russian General Lüders, and he had fled with a small band of faithful followers toward Temeswar.

With this position of the combatants, the plan of Dembinski was to unite with Georgey near Arad, and then to attack the Russian forces. Before this was effected, news reached him of the capitulation of Georgey, and that the Governor, M. Kossuth, had been compelled to forsake Arad, and retire to the town of Vilagos. Before leaving Arad, the Governor separated from his wife and children, and their parting scene is said to have been one of the most touching nature. Under the circumstances of the moment, it was a subject of more even than doubt whether they would ever again meet on earth. It was only when a young Hungarian nobleman, named Ashbot, now in exile in Kutayich with M. Kossuth, solemnly swore to his wife that he would never leave her husband, that Madame Kossuth consented to be separated from him, and seek safety in flight. The children were confided to the care of a private secretary of the Governor, and this individual subsequently delivered them up to the tender mercies of Haynau, for the purpose of securing his own pardon and safety. The children set out before their mother, and the latter, in her flight, endeavoured to keep at least so near to them as to hear now and then of their safety.

Madame Kossuth sought out a brother of hers residing in the town of Vilagos, and he is now imprisoned in the fortress of Comorn, with many others of the unfortunate Hungarian patriots, for eighteen years, on account of the succour which he then gave to his sister. Leaving him, she next went in search of her children, and wandered to a pesta, or farmhouse, of Boeksak, belonging to a relative. There she fell ill of a typhus fever, which nearly ended her life; and when so far recovered as to be able again to travel, she continued her journey in search of her children. She soon learned that they had been given up by their protector to the Austrian General Haynau, and taken to Pesth. Her own safety depended wholly upon the fidelity of the Hungarian peasants, and on their attachment to her husband.

Now, having no other object in view than her own safety, without friends better off than herself, she soon became reduced to a state of complete destitution. In disguise, she wandered over the most miserable part of Hungary. She even, as a means of safety, as well as support, sought for service as a servant, and by telling that she was a poor woman who had just been discharged from a public hospital—which, indeed, she very much resembled—was so fortunate as to find employment in the family of a humble carpenter, in the town of Orash Haya, who little thought he was served by the lady of Louis Kossuth, the late Governor of Hungary. Everywhere notices were exposed in the streets offering forty thousand florins for her capture, and proclaiming death as the punishment of the person who should dare to harbour or conceal her from the authorities.

Among the persons who fled with M. Kossuth before the overwhelming number of his enemies, was an elderly lady, whom it is necessary to designate as Madame L—, and who, from being unable to ride as fast and as long as those who were stronger and younger than herself, soon became exhausted, and was left behind. She had a son, a major in the Hungarian army, near the person of the Governor, and both the son and mother were warmly attached to his interests. Madame L—, when unable to proceed longer with the fugitives, in order to reach a place of safety in the dominions of the Sultan of Turkey, determined to remain in Hungary, and devote herself to the finding of Madame Kossuth, and restoring her to her husband.

For this benevolent purpose Madame L— disguised herself as a beggar; and after a long and weary journey, oftener on foot than in any conveyance, she crossed the vast sandy plains of southern Hungary, and at length reached the place in which Kossuth's children were, but could hear nothing of their mother.

She learned that the children had been sent, soon after their mother had lost sight of them, to the house of General G—, now in the service of the Sultan in Syria, to be kept with his own three children, hoping that they would thus be screened from those who sought after them. The eldest, named Louis, after his father, was seven years of age; and all were told that if they acknowledged they were the children of the Governor, they would be imprisoned by the Austrians, and never see their parents again. So that when an Austrian officer traced them to the house of General G—, he was at a loss to know which of the children were those of General G—, and which those of M. Kossuth; and approaching the eldest of the latter, he said,—“So, my little man, you are the son of the Governor?” To which the youth replied, “I am not, sir.” His firmness surprised and vexed the officer, who was certain, from the statement of their betrayer, that those before him were the long-lost treasures of his ambitious search. He now endeavoured to frighten the children, and drawing a pistol, directed it to the breast of the boy, and said that if he did not at once acknowledge that he was the son of Kossuth, he would put a ball through his heart. Young Louis—who, it is said, shows himself, now in exile at Kutayieh, much of the character of his father—replied in a tone equally firm: “I tell you, sir, I am not the son of Kossuth.” The officer, baffled by the child's simplicity of manner and apparent sincerity, was divested of his convictions, and led to believe that he had been imposed upon.

But before Madame L— could get near them, other agents of the Austrian Government had been more successful, and the three children had been carried off in secret to Pesth, near the clutches of the butcher Haynau. The mother and sister of M. Kossuth had also been captured, and placed in strict confinement. It may be here mentioned, in this little narrative of the sufferings and deliverance of the relatives of Louis Kossuth, that Madame L—, on finding where and how his children were situated, found out her own maid-servant, and so succeeded as to have her engaged at Pesth as their nurse. This person never left them until the moment of their final deliverance from their Austrian jailors was arrived. After thus having provided for the welfare of the children of M. Kossuth, Madame L— renewed her search for their destitute, suffering mother.

Finding no trace of her, Madame L— determined to follow the fugitives, and if she reached Widdin, to ascertain from M. Kossuth himself where his poor wife had gone, and then return in search of her. Continuing in the disguise of a beggar, sometimes on foot, at others in a farmer's cart, this heroic woman reached the frontiers of Hungary, and crossing them, entered the fortified and walled town of Widdin, where the late Governor of Hungary and his brave unfortunate companions then were, enjoying the protection and hospitality of the Sultan of Turkey. Madame L— applied to M. Kossuth, but not being known to him personally, and the Austrian General having set so high a price on the capture of his wife, he at first regarded her in the light of an Austrian spy. Having, however, soon found her son, who had followed the Governor into Turkey, he readily convinced M. Kossuth of the identity of his mother. All the information which M. Kossuth could give her was, that there was a lady in Hungary in whose house he believed his wife would seek a refuge; and if she was not still there, this lady would most probably know where she was.

The Governor now furnished Madame L— with a letter to this lady, and another with his own signet-ring for his wife, which would be evidence of her fidelity. It is not here necessary to follow Madame L— on her toilsome journey. Devoted to the philanthropic work which she had undertaken, she wandered over the sandy steppes of Hungary, until she succeeded in reaching the little town in which the lady resided, and delivered to her M. Kossuth's letter. This she read and immediately burned it, not daring even to allow it to exist in her possession. This lady informed Madame L—— that the wife of Governor Kossuth had left her residence in the guise of a mendicant, and intended assuming the name of Maria F——n; that she was to feign herself to be the widow of a soldier who had fallen in battle, and that, if possible, she would go to the very centre of Hungary, in those vast pasture-lands, where she hoped no one would seek after her.

With this information Madame L—— again resumed her journey. She feigned to be an aged grandmother, whose grandson was missing, and that she was in search of him. She made many narrow escapes while passing guards, soldiers, and spies; until at length she reached the plains before mentioned. She went from house to house, as if in search of her grandson, but in reality to find one who would answer the description given her of poor Maria F——n. At length in a cabin she heard that name mentioned, and on inquiry who and what that person was, learned that she was the widow of a Hungarian soldier who had fallen in battle, and that she had a child who was with its grandparents. They then described her person, but added that she had suffered so much from illness and grief, that she was greatly changed. "Before she came here," said the speaker, "she worked for her bread, even when ill; but after her arrival, she became too much indisposed to labour, on account of which they sent to the Sisters of Charity for a physician, who came, bled, and blistered her; and when she was able to go, she had been conveyed to the institution of the Sisters, where she then was." Madame L——, feeling convinced that the poor sufferer must be none other than the object of her search, expressed a desire to visit her.

At the Sisters of Charity, Madame L—— had much difficulty in procuring access to Maria, and the latter was as much opposed to receiving her. At length Madame L—— told the Sisters to inform her that she had a message for her from her husband, who was not dead as she had supposed, and that she would soon convince her, if she would permit her to enter. Poor Maria, between fear and hope, gave her consent, and Madame L—— was allowed to see her. Madame L—— handed her the letter of Governor Kossuth. She recognised, at once, the writing; kissed it; pressed it to her heart; devoured its contents, and then destroyed it immediately. Soon, a story was made up between the two females: they told the Sisters of Charity that Maria's husband "still lived," and that she would rejoin him. A little wagon was procured; as many comforts were put in it as could be had without suspicion; and these two interesting women set out on their escape from the enemies of their country.¹

(1) It is not known by what route the ladies reached the capital of Hungary; but it is certain that, supposing their presence would not be suspected at Pesth, they heroically proceeded to that city,

Madame L—— had a relative in Hungary who had not been compromised in the war; so this person arranged to meet the ladies at a given place, and in the character of a merchant, travel with them. After they had left the pasture-grounds, he passed as the husband of "Maria," and the elder female as his aunt. At night they stopped at a village, and were suspected, on account of the females occupying the bed, while he slept at the door. They started early in the morning, and the "husband" remained behind to learn something more of the suspicions to which their conduct had given rise. He again overtook them, as they stopped to feed their horse, and bade them be greatly on their guard.

In the evening, while the two ladies were sitting together in a miserably cold room, the face of poor Maria so muffled up as to conceal her features, and induce the belief that she was suffering from her teeth, both appearing much as persons in great poverty, overcome by her afflictions, Maria had a nervous attack, and talked and laughed so loud that her voice was recognised by an Austrian officer who happened to be in the house. This person sent a servant to ask them to come into his room, where there was a fire. Madame L—— inquired the name of the "good gentleman" who had the kindness to invite them to his room, and when she heard it, Maria recognised in him a deadly enemy of her husband. While they were planning a means of evading him, the officer himself came into their apartment. Immediately arising, they made an humble courtesy, in so awkward a manner as to divest him of all suspicion. Madame L—— spoke, and thanked him again and again for his kindness, but added that such poor creatures as they were not fit to go into his room. So soon as the officer retired, Maria had another attack, which would certainly have betrayed them, had he been present. Madame L—— implored her to be composed, or they would be lost.

Starting again, they were not molested until in the evening, when they were apprehended and conducted by two policemen before a magistrate. There the former spoke of them as suspicious characters; but they were not told of what they were suspected. While the examination was going on, Madame L—— slipped a bank-note into the hand of the superior of the two policemen. This bribe quite changed the affair; the two men became their friends, excited the pity of the magistrate in their favour, and they were then in the possession of General Haynau. It has since then become a source of pride to both of them, that they, safe in their disguise, passed that celebrated military "butcher" in the streets of Pesth. Among the letters with which this lady was charged by the exiles of Widdin was one for the lamented martyr of Hungary, Count Casimir Bathiany, then confined in a prison of the city, waiting the cruel fate to which the "butcher" subjected him. When it was decided that he should be ignominiously put to death by the hangman's rope, that excellent and very mild Hungarian patriot endeavoured to put an end to his own existence with a razor; but unfortunately not succeeding, Haynau dragged his mutilated and bleeding body from the prison, and ended his life on the gallows. The letter which Madame L—— had for him was from his brother, who had escaped into Turkey with M. Kossuth; and she had the satisfaction of causing it, through the venality of his jailors, to be placed in the hands of the sufferer, to whom it was no little source of consolation to know that his brother lived in safety.

allowed to depart. Thus they went on from station to station, until they reached the frontiers of Hungary near the Danube. They entered the little town of Saubin, and asked permission of the head of the police to pass over the river to Belgrade. This was refused, until they said they wished to go there for a certain medicine for a daughter who was ill, and that they would leave their passports as a security. He then gave his consent, and they crossed the Danube, and entered the dominions of the Sultan of Turkey.

It was night when they entered Belgrade. They knocked at the door of the Sardinian Consul, who had recently been stationed in that frontier town by his king, whose whole heart sympathised in the Hungarian cause, and who had formed a friendly alliance with M. Kossuth for the freedom of Italy and Hungary. The Consul had been advised by M. Kossuth that two females would probably seek his protection, but not knowing them, he inquired what they wished of him. Madame L—— replied, "Lodging and bread." He invited them in, and Madame L—— introduced him to Madame Kossuth, the lady of the late Governor of Hungary.

It will readily be conceived that the Consul could scarcely believe that these two miserable beings were the persons they represented themselves to be. Madame Kossuth convinced him by showing him the signet-ring of her husband. In his house Madame Kossuth fell ill, but received every possible kindness from her host. They learned that all the Hungarians and Poles had been removed from Widdin to Shumla; and notwithstanding that it was in the midst of a severe winter, they decided upon proceeding at once to the latter place. The Sardinian Consul applied to the generous and very liberal Prince of Scrvia, in whose principality Belgrade is, for his assistance in behalf of the ladies, and in the most hospitable and fearless manner he provided them with his own carriage and four horses, and an escort; and in this way they started through the snow for Shumla. Their journey was without any apprehensions of danger, for the British Consul-General at Belgrade, Mr. F——, had provided the party with a passport as British subjects, under the assumed names of Mr., Mrs., and Miss Bloomfield; yet the severity of the weather was such that Madame Kossuth, in the ill state of her health, suffered very much. Often the snow was as deep as the breasts of the horses, and not unfrequently four oxen had to be attached to it in their places. A journey which in summer would have required but a few days, now was made in twenty-eight.

On the twenty-eighth day, a courier was sent in advance of them to apprise Governor Kossuth of their approach. He was ill; and, moreover, on account of the many plans of the Austrians to assassinate him, the Sultan's authorities could not allow him to leave Shumla, and go to meet his wife. The news of her deliverance and her approach occasioned the liveliest satisfaction to all the refugees; and the Hungarians and Poles went as far the gates of the city to meet this heroic martyr of the cause of Hungary. It was night when the carriage neared the city; as it entered the gates, she found the streets lighted up with hundreds of lights, green, white, and red, the colours of the Hungarian flag, and was welcomed with the most friendly shouts from the whole body of the refugees.

When Madame Kossuth descended from her carriage, she found herself in the presence of her husband, who had risen from his bed of illness to receive the poor "Maria F——" of the plains of Hungary. In place of receiving her in his arms, M. Kossuth, overcome by feelings of admiration for the sufferings which his wife had undergone, and by gratitude for her devotion to the cause of her country, threw himself at her feet and kissed them. She endeavoured to speak and offer her husband consolation and tranquillity, while her own poor feeble heart was ready to burst with emotion. Her voice failed her, and amid the reiterated shouts of the Hungarians and Poles, this heroic woman was carried to her husband's apartments.

In March of the past year some seventy persons—the chief of the Hungarian refugees, among whom were also several Poles—were conveyed in one of the steamers of the Sultan of Turkey to the place designated for their future residence in Asia Minor. From Shumla they travelled by land to Varna, on the Black Sea; from thence they were taken in the steamer to Ghemlik, in the Gulf of Madanieh, in the Sea of Marmora, without being allowed to stop at Constantinople. They crossed from that place to Broosa, at the foot of Mount Olympus, and after a short delay there, agitated by hopes and fears, they continued on to Kutayieh, where they all still are. Madame Kossuth is with her husband, and, greatly through the labours of Madame L——, who undertook another journey into Hungary for this purpose, she now also has her children with her. Among the individuals who persist in remaining at Kutayieh with the ex-Governor of Hungary and his lady are Madame L—— and the relative who during the dangerous wanderings in Hungary figured as her husband. Many of the refugees are but ill provided for. The amount which the Turkish government allows M. Kossuth for his subsistence is insufficient for the support of so many persons. It is a well-known fact that the duration of the detention of M. Kossuth depends wholly upon the Sultan, whose protection was so generously and so effectively granted to the refugees. It is also known that the Sultan has refused to detain him for a longer period than one year, and that this period ends with the month of May of the present year. To detain him beyond that period, will be to assume a responsibility in the eyes of the world which will weigh heavily upon the character of the Sultan; who has, thus far, possessed the sympathy and the admiration of all well-thinking men on both sides of the Atlantic. We would invoke that generous prince to carry out what he has so successfully begun; and to permit Kossuth and his unfortunate companions to seek a home in the distant New World, where they cannot, even should they desire it, which we disbelieve, disturb the tranquillity of Austria, and where assassins can never molest them. In the United States they will all find a hearty welcome; and in the paths of private life each will find that sympathy and assistance to which their patriotism and their sufferings so strongly entitle them.

LE BISCELIAS.

Translated from the "Revue des Deux Mondes."

In the month of February, during those dreary days in which the Parisian shivers from cold, I was inhabiting a room which could not boast even a fireplace, on the quay of Santa Lucia at Naples; the thermometer of Reaumur was at fifteen degrees, the inhabitants of the Villa Reale wore white pantaloons, and the streets were inundated with violets.

One morning I was awoke rather earlier than usual, by the sound of laughter and voices of every description. Shaking off my drowsiness, I rose and opened the window. I perceived a dozen large boats with oars and sails, moored to the quay, which were preparing to leave for Sorrento, where a fête was to be celebrated. The boatmen were addressing those who passed with the cries and gestures of madmen, promising them a favourable wind, a quick passage, the best rowers in the world, and every species of amusement. Each boat, on receiving as many passengers as it could contain, spread its sails and departed. There is something captivating and contagious in Neapolitan gaiety. I experienced the infection, and dressing hastily, descended in time to obtain a seat in the last boat, in the midst of a joyous body of Neapolitans.

The sky was of a magnificent blue, and promised a fine day. Already the signal for departure had been given: the boat was unmoored, and the sail hoisted. We had scarcely advanced thirty yards, when the Captain perceived a man on the Quay du Géant, waving his handkerchief and running as fast as his embonpoint and his age (sixty years) would permit him. One stroke of the hook brought us close to the edge; the stout man jumped in and seated himself breathless at my side. This time we left the coast, borne by a warm and perfumed breeze, which scarcely ruffled the deep blue surface of the Mediterranean.

Vesuvius was adorned with its plume of white smoke, and the point of Capri appeared enveloped in a scarf of gauze, like the belles of the empire in the miniatures of Isabeau.

Before us appeared Sorrento in the midst of its orange-trees, Massa, more elevated on the coast, and the Strait of Campanella, like a door opening on the Gulf of Salerno; behind us, the quays of the town, overlooked by the fort St. Elmo, described a curve from Pausilippo to Portici, presenting an uninterrupted line of monuments, palaces, and houses.

Whilst I was admiring the double panorama of this beautiful and justly celebrated Bay of Naples, my fat neighbour heaved sighs sufficient to fill the sails of a little boat. I at first imagined that he had not recovered from his run; but I soon perceived from his expressive grimaces that anxiety or trouble, rather than fatigue, caused the exercise of his enormous lungs. His gloomy look, his large knitted eyebrows, his contracted forehead, the shaking of his head, the movement of his lips, betrayed an internal monologue, presenting a striking contrast to the lively countenances of the other passengers. With him alone there was no bay of Naples, no smiling sky, no fête-day, no merry companions. However, after having wiped his face with his handkerchief, the stout gentleman looked around him benevolently, and took off his waistcoat to make himself more at his ease. His shirt was saturated with perspiration, and, doubtless, he considered his appearance not exactly suitable in a place where there were any of another sex, for he drew a white shirt from a small packet which he carried under his arm, and prepared to change his linen. The colour rose to my face. I expected to hear the husbands and fathers launch into abuse of no very gentle nature; but I did not then comprehend the easy manners of these good Neapolitans. No one appeared at all scandalized at this sans-gêne. My neighbour in drawing the sleeves of his shirt, murmured an apology to the company; the ladies and young girls turned aside their heads without interrupting their conversation, and no one appeared to notice this change of toilet, which was indeed executed with all possible decency and dexterity.

At the end of a minute, as if this operation had slightly relieved his sufferings, my stout neighbour awoke from his reverie, to ask the captain if he expected to arrive at Sorrento before ten o'clock. What was my surprise at seeing the passengers burst into fits of laughter at this simple question, and the captain himself bite his lips. A second question from the fat gentleman caused an increase of merriment. At my left, was seated a young girl who was laughing immoderately. I turned and asked her what it was that so greatly amused her.

"E Biscegliese!" replied she, in a low voice.

"And because this poor man is a Biscegliais," resumed I, "is this a reason why you should laugh in his face with so little ceremony?"

"Perhaps," replied the girl, "you have not seen the Don Pangrazio of the theatre of San Carlino?"

"Pardon me, I have seen him."

"Well then, if you know this amusing comedian, why do you not laugh with us?"

The reader must know that Bisceglia is a little town of La Pouille, where is spoken a patois which excites the risibility of the Neapolitans whenever they recognise the accent. From time immemorial, the character of Don Pangrazio, at the theatre of San Carlino, has been performed by Biscegliais, or by Neapolitans who can imitate the patois of La Pouille to perfection. Bursts of laughter are heard the instant Pangrazio appears. This popular taste, however, is the cause of a cruel and bitter injustice;

a Biscecliais no sooner appears in Naples, than every one roars with laughter the moment he opens his mouth; it would be to little purpose were he to put himself into a passion, the spectators would but increase their merriment on observing the anger of a Biscecliais.

Such was the fate of my neighbour, when, in his ill-humour, he wished all his travelling companions at the devil. In listening attentively, I discovered that the accent of Bisceglia gave a crying tone to his language, which was truly very comical, and that he resembled amazingly the Paucrace of San Carlino, who was then an admirable actor. However, as the Biscegliese did not entertain the same contempt for a foreigner as he did for a Neapolitan, I took pity on him, and engaged him in conversation with a very serious air.

"It is plain," said I to him, "that you do not go to Sorrento for pleasure."

"Altro!" replied my companion, "I am going to Sorrento to scold, to weep, to regulate, and to spend in doctors' and surgeons' fees, the rest of the thirty ducats, of the half of which the inn-keepers of this infamous country have already swindled me. Is that pleasure? Besides, I find nothing pretty, either in Naples or its environs. At Bisceglia, the town is more agreeable, and the people are at least civil; but what signifies that when I think of the spectacle which awaits me there? My poor nephew, the most handsome young man in La Pouille, lying on a bed of suffering with a broken arm! . . . Oh, what a fearful accident!"

"And how has your nephew managed to break his arm?"

"Who knows?" returned the Biscecliais. "Assuredly it was not in the service of God, although the poor fellow is an Abbé, and, by the protection of Monseigneur, he has already a revenue of six hundred ducats: it was doubtless for the dark eyes of some wicked woman, some Neapolitan beauty."

"Wait a little, do not accuse the Neapolitan women before understanding the matter."

"You do not know them then?" replied the Biscecliais. "There never happens a crime nor accident in the country but a woman is at the bottom of it. My nephew is twenty years old, he has a figure of perfect symmetry, and eyes which the queen of the Amazons would envy; what more is necessary? We will ask him presently who has reduced him to the state in which he now is, and you will see if he does not say it is a woman. Were it not for this, why should his arm be broken? An arm does not break of itself without the interference of a Neapolitan woman. And yet I warned him of the dangers he would encounter, and told him to beware of the dandies who spend all their money in new clothes, of the gamblers, and sharpers, but especially of the women. You will see whether he has heeded my counsel."

"I could swear you are mistaken in attributing your nephew's broken arm to the Neapolitan women; and I am curious to know which of us is right. If, therefore, you will permit me, I will accompany you to the bed of your nephew; to learn, first, the state of his health, and then to request the narration of his adventures."

"You will confer an honour on him in so doing."

Having quitted the boat, we were directed by a child to the house of the abbé. The arrival of his affectionate uncle having been announced to the patient, a young man of an elegant figure appeared, with his right arm in a sling, and the other resting on the shoulder of the servant.

The uncle embraced his nephew, and both began talking with such rapidity, and at the same time, that the thread of their discourse escaped me. I only understood the uncle was reproaching the young abbé for his imprudence, and that the nephew was bewailing his sad fate with the most pathetic lamentations. Tears soon flowed. The servant added a soprano to this strange concert, and having wiped her tears with her bare arms, brought some seats on to the terrace. Calmness being in a measure restored, it was perceived that a stranger was a witness of this affecting scene. The uncle introduced me to his nephew, and after the ordinary civilities had passed, related to the god of the day our meeting in the boat, and added that we had made a bet.

"A bet!" repeated the young man. "You, too, uncle, you make bets! alas! you will lose them as your unfortunate nephew has lost that which has reduced him to the pitiable state in which you now see him."

The uncle explained the subject of our discussion during the journey.

"You are right, uncle," said the invalid with a sigh. "There is behind the scenes a woman, a Neapolitan, an ungrateful beauty."

"Pardon me, monsieur l'abbé," interrupted I: "it is fair that before acknowledging myself conquered, I should at least know what has happened to you. The satisfaction of my curiosity will recompense me for the loss of my bet. Have the kindness, therefore, to relate your misfortunes to me. The deep interest I shall take in your narration, will prove, I trust, that I am not unworthy of your confidence."

"Relate my misfortunes!" cried the young man, raising his beautiful eyes to heaven. "Re-open my wounds, and cause all the blood of my heart to flow. That is asking my death, Seigneur Français, and death by the most fearful torments. You know not that this poor heart has been ground to a thousand atoms, torn by nails of iron, and that its lacerated members now writhe under a load of anguish, never before experienced by a mortal. This heart was that of a Tancredi, a Rinaldo; but when I utter the name of the cruel one who has ruined, who has assassinated me, all the torments of hell overwhelm me. Judge then for yourself, if I can relate my sufferings, which are unparalleled on earth. At a subsequent period, Seigneur Français, we shall see."

Diable! thought I, when I heard this longed for recital, he will not be celebrated for his moderation. Miguel Cervantes was indeed right when he advised narrators, by the mouth of the wise Don Quixote, to suppress all useless exclamations and reflections.

"God forbid," said I to the patient, "that my interest or curiosity should occasion such terrible sufferings. You will at another time relate your unparalleled misfortunes, and I promise you an amount of compassion proportioned to the extent of your sufferings; but your uncle and I have not yet determined the conditions of the bet. We must repair this neglect; I leave it to him to decide what I have lost."

"Dear uncle," said the abbé, demand a supper for us three, at the house of a merchant of pizze, with oysters of Fusaro."

"Be it so," said I, "an oyster supper."

"And some white wine of Capri?" asked the abbé.

"As much as we can drink."

"Allegri!" cried the invalid: "return to-morrow, Seigneur Français; I think, if I arm myself with courage, I shall probably be able to give you the narration you desire."

"Do not attempt that which is above your strength."

"Fear nothing. Under an appearance of delicacy, I enjoy excellent health. I am sensitive; but heaven has given me the soul of a hero of Torquato Tasso."

"Poor Torquato!" returned I, "he is one who truly suffered!"

"Like me, in this same village of Sorrento. Oh! yes, I resemble poor Torquato. . . . But there is a ring. It must be the doctor. He arrives just at the right moment, I will ask him on what day we can go to Naples to eat pizze and oysters from the lake of Fusaro."

It was in fact the doctor who then appeared. I perceived with pleasure that he was a Frenchman, and an intelligent person. He granted his young convalescent permission to go to Naples and eat whatever he pleased. I took leave of my new friends and went out with the doctor.

"The wound was not very serious, I apprehend?" said I.

"A violent contusion," replied he, "but happily not a fracture. The young man thought himself dead, or at least in danger of losing an arm, because the muscles, from being crowded together, gave him much pain. From his conversation you may guess the style of his letters to his uncle. The poor old man has taken this eloquence for sterling coin, and has hastened from Bisceglia, expecting to attend his nephew in his last moments. You must not, however, imagine that my young invalid is not seriously in love. He expresses himself with exaggeration, but he feels keenly."

"Then you know his adventure, and the cause of his accident?"

"From beginning to end. Geronimo conceals nothing from his friends."

"You would oblige me by relating this story. I am to receive the narration to-morrow; but I am afraid of the flowery language of our hero."

"You would not come to the end in less than half a day," said the doctor, "and all the epithets in the dictionary would be employed. Follow me to the Sirène. We will drink some lemonade, and I will relate the adventure to you."

We entered the Sirène. Lemonade was brought to us on a terrace from which could be seen the whole bay of Naples, and then the doctor commenced his narration:—

II.

"OGNISSANTI Geronimo Troppi, such is the name of my patient, is a native of Bisceglia. Having neither fortune nor ambition, he took the petit collet six months since, and came here to seek the protection of some of his more wealthy friends.

"On the fourteenth of last August, the eve of the Assumption, a celebrated clergyman was to preach at Santa Maria del Carmine. Our young abbé, well shaved, with new gloves on, was entering the church about two o'clock, when he saw three carriages arrive containing eighteen people of the same company.

"In the middle carriage was a young lady in mourning, her fan in her hand, her arms uncovered and ornamented with velvet bracelets. When she descended, all the company surrounded her, to talk a little before entering the church. The abbé, who was listening, discovered from the conversation of these good people, that the lady wore her mourning for the last time, and that she was going; according to custom, to pay her devotions to the memory of some near relative, before leaving her mourning dress. Without possessing actual beauty, this young person was of a striking figure. A forest of naturally wavy hair was parted in thick bandeaux on a rather low forehead. Her eyebrows being so near to each other as almost to meet, would have given a sinister expression to her face, had not the lustre of her eyes, the movement of her nostrils, and the grace of her lips, on which seemed to play a mischievous smile, removed the serious and almost disagreeable air of the upper part of her face. The lady instantly perceived the ravages her beauty had made in the breast of our abbé. As coquetry in Naples is practised on a large scale, the glances, the encouraging looks which indicate preference, soon completely captivated the good Geronimo.

"Grand Dieu!" thought he, "if it is for a husband she is in black, grant that I also may quit my black habiliments to marry her!"

"During the whole of the sermon, the beautiful Neapolitan listened to the preacher with attention, and suffered nothing to disturb her pious meditations. One of the persons belonging to her company was, in the mean time, walking in the square in front of the church; he was a Calabrais, about thirty years of age, and formed like a Hercules. Don Geronimo walked up and down in front of the church, hesitating between a desire to address the Calabrais, and a dread of being ill-received. At length he took courage and approached the unknown.

"You are accompanying a young lady who appears as virtuous as she is beautiful, sir," said he to him.

"The Hercules looked smilingly upon the abbé.

"Too beautiful, and too virtuous," replied he, "for the tranquillity of the world, and also gifted with grace and wit, but so disdainful, that the finest man in the two Calabrais, namely, your most obedient servant, is in despair! If it is your intention, seigneur abbé, to make me talk in order to gain information, you are addressing the wrong person. I will not utter another word on the subject.'

"And you are right," resumed the abbé. "All that does not concern me, since I do not know the lady. Doubtless she is in mourning for her father?"

"No, it is for her husband."

"So young and already a widow! poor creature! I can understand the cause of her disdain: she is inconsolable for the loss of her husband. You must not despair. This sorrow announces a good heart."

"Sorrow," said the Calabrais, "for poor Matteo! she could not endure him."

"Then she wishes to devote the rest of her life to the education of her children."

"What children? she has none."

"Widowhood and liberty have their pleasures, especially with a fortune, for doubtless her husband left her some property."

"A comfortable independence," said the Calabrais; "besides, Lidia's father is that rich lamp-seller whose shop is so brilliantly lighted in the evening, at Toledo, near the palace Borbonico."

"After the sermon," resumed the abbé, "the lady would do well to pray at the tomb of her husband."

"We are going to conduct her thither, to Capo di Monte."

"And then you will reconduct her to her own house, in the street of —"

"At Saint Jean Teduccio, out of town, where she has a small country house."

"Yes, and then a family repast will enliven the end of this sad day. Take courage, and do not despair, seigneur Calabrais. Often, with ladies, love is but two steps from disdain: you will see that the lady will not remain from the age of eighteen years to that of twenty without marrying again. Amongst so many adorers, she will find one to please her, and I predict you will be distinguished above your three rivals."

"In the first place," replied the Calabrais with a terrible look, "Lidia is only seventeen; then I have four rivals, not three, and if one of them were more successful than myself, I would take him by the neck with one hand, and by the legs with the other, and would break him on my knee. All you have said therefore, seigneur abbé, is full of error."

"Excuse my ignorance," murmured Don Geronimo, "I will no longer interfere with the matter, save to wish you good health and the success you deserve."

"In spite of the terror with which this formidable rival inspired him, and the perilous perspective which so many obstacles caused him to foresee, the abbé could not resist the desire of again exchanging a few glances with the beautiful widow. He went on quickly, and walked to the cemetery of Capo di Monte, pondering in the meantime over the information given him by the Calabrais.

"Lidia," said he—"a widow without sorrow—no children—seventeen years of age—a comfortable independence—daughter of a lamp-seller in the Rue de Tolède—country house at San Giovanni Teduccio—insensible to the homage of a ferocious man with large red whiskers—more favourable to me alone—that is the woman I need. I will sacrifice my future career to her. What happiness to marry so lovely a woman! But, alas! five rivals, counting the Calabrais! To what dangers I am exposed! Let us endeavour to escape the eyes of the jealous. Not to approach them and to communicate from a distance with the divine Lidia would be a master-stroke."

Don Geronimo concealed himself in the cemetery behind a tomb, from whence he soon heard the three carriages arrive, containing the widow and her company. Lidia knelt alone on a stone, whilst her friends awaited her at the gate. Having finished her devotions, she rose and perceived at a few yards from her the young abbé of the place Sta. Maria del Carmine, who was making signs to her. After having examined attentively the expressive features of Geronimo, she put her hand to her neck to ask if the band would not be an obstacle. The abbé replied in the negative by taking off the band and putting it in his pocket. The beautiful widow then showed two rows of teeth of pearly whiteness, and placed her finger on her mouth to recommend silence and discretion; she pointed with her fan towards her company, and with her head answered "yes" in a manner full of tenderness and candour: to this the abbé replied by placing his hands on his heart, like the first ballerino of San Carlo, and closing his beautiful eyes to express the excess of his happiness. When he reopened his eyes, the lovely Neapolitan had disappeared; but he heard her sonorous voice laughing at the expense of the young men in her company, as if to let Geronimo perceive that he was more favoured than his rivals.

On his return to Naples, the good abbé was almost beside himself with joy. His heart was dancing a tarantella in his bosom, and he would willingly have embraced every one he met. He assembled his household, namely his servant-boy, and announced to him his approaching marriage with a widowed countess, who was amiable and beautiful, and worth several million ducats; he promised handsome remunerations, provided his servant should not be guilty of awkwardness or stupidity, but should on the contrary redouble his zeal and attention during the preliminaries of the marriage; for, added the abbé, although the countess is mistress of her actions, she has to overcome the opposition of a powerful family, and to get rid of several suitors, among whom are two Princes, three Illustrissimes, and a General. The boy opened his large eyes, congratulated his master on so happy a change in his destiny, and promised to exert his utmost powers to effect the desired end.

"You are now to learn the particulars of this important secret which is to make my fortune and my happiness. Listen, Antonietto: without the assistance or interference of a third person, I offered the countess my heart and my hand in the cemetery of Capo di Monte. My offer was accepted; the divine Lidia, surprised and captivated by my good looks and my eloquence, swore, on the very tomb of her former husband, to be mine for life; but time is necessary to dismiss politely the other suitors for her hand; and in order not to excite suspicion, we have mutually determined to communicate only by letter. It is in fulfilling the hazardous task of messenger, that you are to employ your ability and prudence, Antonietto. To-morrow, the fête de l'Assumption, you must go to San Giovanni Teduccio. You can ask some child in the village where the beautiful countess Lidia resides. When you see her leave her house for the church, you must follow her carefully, and endeavour to find an opportunity of slipping into her hands a note which I shall write this evening. If the countess be not accompanied by any attendant, you must request her to bring an answer when going to vespers. If she should question you concerning my fortune, my rank, and that of my family, tell her I am twenty years of age, that I have powerful friends and patrons, a superb living, rich relatives, and brilliant prospects; but that I will leave the church for which I have no longer any inclination, since my heart is inflamed with pure and unchangeable love. You will add further, that Geronimo Troppi, having neither father nor mother, is master of his actions, and in possession of his patrimony; that he will give dresses to his wife, that he will not prevent her going to the theatre, nor to balls, still less to the fêtes of Pedigrotta, and to those of the Madone dell' Arco. Now, reflect, Antonietto. Weigh well the words you have just heard, and fail not to employ the rest of the day and the whole of the night in forming your plans.

"Instead of forming plans, and reflecting on the means he possessed of serving his young master, Antonietto, with his mind filled with the all-absorbing idea of self, of which a true Neapolitan never loses sight, thought only of the advantages he himself would derive from the marriage of Geronimo. His first infraction of his master's orders, was to join a party of boys of his own age, and relate, with extraordinary amplifications, the wonderful events which he said were about to surprise the whole town. At night without depriving himself of five minutes' sleep, in order to prepare his part, he fell instantly asleep, lulled by golden fancies which concerned himself alone.

"Geronimo had composed a letter full of hyperbole and metaphor. He copied it on rose-coloured paper ornamented with birds, and folded it carefully. In giving this precious epistle into the care of his Mercury, the abbé added a hundred other injunctions, to which the boy appeared to listen with an attentive and respectful manner. Antonietto placed the letter in his pocket, and when he saw his master take a demi-carlin from his purse, telling him to take a place in a corricolo, in order to lose no time, his eyes sparkled with delight. Scarcely had he entered the street, when he turned the large piece of copper in his hand, and vowed solemnly not to waste his money in needless expenses on the road. To satisfy his conscience, he asked the driver of a corricolo for how much he would take him to San Giovanni Teduccio. The coachman offered to let him stand on the step for two grani; but Antonietto did not condescend to reply to such exorbitant demands. He showed his demi-carlin with a majestic air, turned away, and commenced his journey on-foot. A fly, behind which he mounted, took him for nothing to the bridge of the Madeleine; the remainder of the road he walked, beguiling the time by songs and gambols. When he reached the village he found to his surprisè that mass had already commenced.

"In order to deliberate on this circumstance, which he had not foreseen, Antonietto entered the shop of a macaronaro. Before the fire were pieces of macaroni two feet long, suspended from a stick. The boy took three of these pieces, each of which he devoured at a single mouthful, and, having completed his repast by a glass of water, was about to indulge himself in a siesta, when, happily for our abbé, another child, enticed by the macaroni and the demi-carlin, came to offer his services to Antonietto. The boy knew the beautiful Lidia, and in the hopes of obtaining a reward, promised to point out to Antonietto not only the lady he wished to see, but also all who were present at mass, pretending to know their names and rank in society. The two boys went to the church, and speedily discovered the Signora Lidia, in the midst of a considerable multitude. The beautiful widow was listening devoutly to the service, when she felt a hand gently pulling her dress. She then perceived between two chairs the face of a child who was on all-fours.

"'What do you want with me, boy?' said she.

"'Take this, contessina,' replied Antonietto, presenting the letter. 'It is from Don Geronimo, your future husband, to whom you swore eternal fidelity yesterday at Capo di Monte. I shall come to fetch your answer at vespers, as my master ordered me.'

"Antonietto retired as quietly as he had come, and fell asleep at the foot of a wall, with his head in the shade and his feet in the sun. The metaphors of our hero had doubtless made a favourable impression on the heart of the lady, for on returning to the church, she motioned the little messenger to approach.

"'Here is my answer,' said she, drawing a letter from her bosom. 'Love has truly inspired your master. Tell him that he has acted rightly in leaving me to get rid of the tiresome suitors who constantly surround me. Tell him that he has as much prudence as amiability and talent; that I entreat him to read with indulgent eyes this note, in which he will find neither beautiful similes, nor poetry, nor eloquence, as in his letter, which would not dishonour the pen of the great Metastasio. Tell him to write to me next Sunday, and send his letter in the same manner as to-day, and that his prose or verse will always be well received; and say, also, that Lidia Peretti, widow of Matteo Peretti, is very willing to change her name for that of Lidia Troppi, and that if it depended upon her alone, the affair would be concluded. He will understand what that means; and above all, tell him that I think of him, and tell him that which I dared not write, lest it should appear a want of modesty,—namely, that I love him because he is handsome. Try to remember all this, and here is a carlin to assist your memory as well as your legs.’”

III.

“Two months had elapsed since the first meeting of the widow and the abbé, when Lidia wrote to Don Geronimo to inform him that he might at length present himself to her family. On the list of names which he received, the abbé found that of a prebendary of his acquaintance, who consented to introduce him to the family. The day for the first visit was appointed; and Don Geronimo, accompanied by the prebendary, to whom he related his prospects and adventures during the ride, drove to the house of the beautiful Lidia. On descending from the carriage, they crossed a vestibule paved in mosaic and ornamented with frescoes. Through a half-opened door were to be seen the remains of a copious breakfast; our abbé observed that an air of comfort pervaded the whole house. The servant conducted the visitors to a little garden, at the bottom of which were seated three persons under the shade of a citron-tree. They were Lidia, her father, the lamp-seller of the Toledo, and her aunt, dame Filippa, an old lady who was loaded with necklaces and gold chains. Geronimo became confused before this assembly, in spite of the indulgence which softened the faces of the father and aunt, and the pleasure which animated the beautiful eyes of the young widow.

“My friends,’ said the prebendary, ‘the embarrassment which Don Geronimo Troppi now feels, proceeds from a noble and upright heart, which merits your encouragement and your kindness. The most difficult part is already accomplished, since my protégé pleases you. My good friend Michel, and you, Dame Filippa, you see what young persons are; they meet, they look, they love. Whilst you were giving light to your countrymen by selling lamps, your amiable daughter was kindling other and more dangerous fires, and it happened one fine day that she provided herself with a second husband when you least expected it. The Church will lose a good subject; but let us leave that, lest we increase the timidity of our lovers; and to put them at their ease, let us talk for a little about the rain and fine weather.’

“The weather is fine,’ said Lidia, impetuously, ‘and the subject on which you have spoken pleases us all. My father approves my choice. You have very prettily and politely stated the manner in which the mutual love of Don Geronimo and myself was awakened; but do not imagine that I am foolish or giddy. Oh, no; on the contrary, I am very prudent. I have obtained information respecting your protégé, by making the gossips talk. I have been told that he lives prudently, that he spends nothing beyond his income, that he is not a gambler, and Signor

Geronimo confirmed these accounts by speaking of marriage in his first letter. I then passed in review the other five persons who sought my hand. Two of those suitors are dandies, and more in love with themselves than with me; the third is a flatterer and deceiver of young ladies, and incapable of making a quiet husband; the fourth a gambler, who holds the cards in his hand from morning till night, and who would always neglect his wife for the bazzica; the fifth, although a very good sort of man, is too quarrelsome and noisy; his Calabrais accent prevented his pleasing me, and since he does not please me, I ought not to marry him; is it not so? Have I failed in prudence or wisdom in amusing these adorers with useless words and delays? What is necessary to a widow who wishes to decide on a second marriage? To feel an inclination for a person of good manners and an amiable disposition. It is true that the eyes of my body first distinguished Signor Geronimo; but I have also looked at him with those of my reason, and I have seen what I have seen; for I am very cunning, Monsieur; besides I have a good, affectionate father, who thinks only of my happiness; therefore at present, instead of speaking of the weather, Signor Geronimo will, in his turn, tell us how he became inspired with this affection, of which he has assured me in the prettiest letters that ever pen wrote since the days of letter-writing commenced.’

“During this speech, which had been uttered with extreme volubility, our abbé, delighted with such candid avowals, felt his courage return, and being thus called upon by the lovely widow, he replied with equal vivacity:—

“And I, too, divine signorina; I, too, have made use of the eyes of my reason, in spite of the bandage of love of which the poets speak. It is not only by your incomparable beauty, your bewitching grace, and all the treasures of your lovely person, that my affection has been awakened, it is also by your merit, your wisdom, your talent, your virtues, for I have examined all, and have carefully weighed all. I possess a penetrating eye—”

“Poor Geronimo! he could say no more. From the moment he had commenced speaking, the face of the beautiful Lidia had changed alternately from crimson to white and from white to crimson. The pleasure and tenderness which had been visible in the countenance of the young Neapolitan gave place to the deepest disappointment. This disappointment soon became a species of despair; and Lidia, clasping her head in her hands, exclaimed:—‘Good heavens! he is a Bisce liais!’

“‘Certainly,’ replied Geronimo, turning pale, “I am a Bisce liais; do not you know that since you have obtained information respecting me?”

into what a snare have I fallen, holy Virgin! It must not be thought of. Signor Geronimo, I restore you your promise. On the word of an honourable woman, I loved you with all my heart; but I had not heard you speak, and I could never marry a young man who speaks like Don Pancrazio. Oh! no, it would be impossible; let us think no more about it.'

"'But, signorina,' resumed the abbé, 'will you not give yourself time to know me better? your ears will become accustomed to my accent, and I shall lose it by degrees in conversing with you.'

"'Signor Geronimo is right,' said the father. 'This prejudice against the Biscelias is unreasonable, my child, and you will have time to teach your husband to speak Neapolitan purely.'

"'That is self-evident,' said aunt Filippa: 'to refuse a young man of a good family on account of his Biscelias accent, would be folly.'

"'And will my affection for him return in proportion as he loses his accent?' asked Lidia despondingly. 'Can you assure me that the Virgin will perform such a miracle!'

"'Then you will not even see me?' said Geronimo sadly.

"'Listen,' resumed the young widow. 'Signor Geronimo, I consent to see you again as often as you please, but no longer on the footing of a betrothed. Try to make me accustomed to your accent. Come as a friend, and even as a sixth suitor for my hand. The successor of poor Matteo, my first husband, is not yet chosen; that is all I can say, and I say it in order that you may not flatter yourself with chimerical illusions; at present, pray let us talk of the weather.'

"'It was in vain that the father, aunt, and prebendary lectured the beautiful Lidia; the abbé prayed and wept in vain: the young Neapolitan was immovable.'

"'Do not speak further on the subject,' said she, 'Signor Geronimo, for I feel an irresistible desire to laugh, and in spite of my sorrow and regret, and the pity I feel for you,—I shall burst into a fit of laughter if you continue to speak thus. It is a great pity, I confess, to break off so excellent an engagement for a motive apparently so frivolous; but there is no remedy. If I were to marry a Biscelias I should always fancy I had Don Pancrazio at my side. The tenderness and respect due to a husband would not accord with such an idea. Let us talk of the weather. Let us be good friends, and think no more of projects which I have already laid aside.'

"'The prebendary commenced by pretending to admire the flowers in the garden. Lidia instantly began talking with such carelessness and freedom, that Geronimo's misery was complete. He did not attempt to take part in the conversation, and the prebendary, seeing that his eyes were filled with tears, motioned him to take his hat and beat a retreat. The compliments which passed in speaking of the happiness experienced in making the acquaintance of M. l'Abbé, and of the pleasure that would be felt in receiving him, were like so many daggers to poor Geronimo. He scarcely ventured to open his mouth to murmur a faint adieu, lest he should again betray his fatal accent. In reconducting him to the door, the father advised him not to despair, dame Filippa made signs of encouragement, and Lidia gave him her hand at parting in a cordial manner, repeating that it was a great pity, but that all former arrangements must now be forgotten; the carriage-door was opened, the coachman drove on, and Geronimo, giving vent to his grief, wept like a child.

"'Calm yourself, my good friend,' said the prebendary. 'Offer your sorrows to God, and enter again within the pale of the church. She is a good mother, and will console you. It is well for a priest to have known adversity. This experience will serve you at a later period. Having been unhappy at an early age, you will the sooner become a christian philosopher. It is well for a young man to recognise the worthlessness of terrestrial affections, and to despise the feebleness of poor humanity.'

"'You think then,' said Geronimo, 'that all hope is lost?'

"'Hope still,' replied his friend; 'it would be sinful to despair.'

"'You speak about it very quietly and calmly,' resumed the young abbé; 'but I am desperately, madly in love. I shall not thus renounce my happiness. I will get rid of the fatal accent of my native town, and reconquer the heart of my adorable Lidia; since she loved me for two months without having seen me, she may yet love me again, and I will spare no pains to re-kindle that affection which is dearer to me than life itself.'

"'What I dreaded is then going to take place,' said the prebendary sighing; 'you will add to the number of extravagant abbés. I have only one piece of advice to give you: lay aside this dress, and give up your living.'

"'I will think of it, sir,' replied Geronimo.

"'In order to avoid a subject of conversation he did not like, our abbé buried his face in his handkerchief, and did not utter another word until they reached Naples. Having conducted the prebendary to his church, Geronimo dismissed the coachman and returned on foot to his own house. Finding, however, that he was haunted continually by his distracting thoughts, he rose from the chair into which he had thrown himself half fainting on entering, and endeavoured to find relief to his mind in walking through the streets of Naples. In the course of his perambulations he reached the church of Santa Maria del Carmine. The sight of the place where he had first beheld her who was the cause of all his sorrow, tended only to increase his misery. He entered the church to contemplate the place where Lidia had sat when listening so attentively to the words of the preacher. Whilst dragging himself listlessly along the aisle, with the aid of the curious marbles which adorn the church, he stumbled against a seat, and fell, exhausted with grief, on the simple stone which marks the burial spot of the young and unfortunate Conradin, who was decapitated by order of Charles of Anjou.

IV.

"Although his fall was the result of an accident, our abbé experienced a kind of pleasure in considering it the effect of his despair. Instead of raising himself, he remained stretched on the ground sighing deeply.

"Oh Copradin!" exclaimed he mournfully, "is it not dreadful that a mortal should be compelled to envy thy sad fate? I am, nevertheless, reduced to do it. Yes, I would willingly perish on the scaffold like thee. I should bless the axe which would deliver me from my love and my anguish. I bear in my heart the destroyer of my soul, and the barbarity of Charles of Anjou is not to be compared with the cruelty of my ungrateful mistress."

"A loud and singularly cheerful voice interrupted this lamentation.

"Ah! Signor Troppi, what are you doing there? This is not the time to compare yourself to the nephew of Mainfroi. Let him sleep quietly there, and let us think of something merry. A Lidia has given you pain, a Luigia shall console you. It would be a pretty idea if at twenty years of age, with your handsome face, and in a town like Naples, you were to die of love for an ungrateful mistress. Come, take my hand, and get up."

"He who thus spoke was the notary's clerk, Marco, the sworn enemy of melancholy. In his merry little eyes, in his mouth, which stretched from ear to ear, and in the whole of his countenance, was to be seen good temper aided and improved by good living.

"Come with me," continued Marco, raising the abbé like a child. "I will revive your spirits with a glass of good wine."

"It is hemlock or opium that I want," murmured Geronimo.

"Bah!" resumed the clerk "we will see in a little while whether you think of death or not."

"Don Marco then conducted the abbé to his own residence, situated in the Marché aux Poissons. Having taken three bottles of wine from a small case,

"Let me show you, said he, how exactly each of these bottles is suited to your present situation. This one, for instance, bears, most assuredly, the most mournful name in the world: it is Lachryma Christi. You will not venture to affirm that your tears exceed in bitterness those of our divine Saviour. Drink this glass at a single draught, to render homage to the sufferings of the son of the Madonna, and to humble yourself before him."

"Geronimo drank the wine, and found it excellent.

"And this one," exclaimed Marco, "you will see if this does not come à propos. What is it a despairing lover does? He flees from his inhuman lady-love; he leaves his country; but you cannot leave the kingdom without permission, unless you lose your living. Where will you then go? To Sicily? Well, then, drink this glass of Marsala. It is the wine of the only country to which you can take your broken heart. This argument being unanswerable, nunc est bibendum. As to this bottle with a long and narrow neck," continued Marco, "it is for your especial benefit that God has sent it into the world. It contains muscatel from Syracuse, the delicious nectar which would soften the manners of a Carthaginian. Nothing more exquisitely delicate ever flowed from the vessels of Hebe. Taste this fine Muscatel, Signor Troppi, and if the black crape with which your imagination is hung, be not instantly changed into gauze more rosy than the shawl of Aurora, I shall give you up as really very ill. We shall thus judge of the depth of your wound."

"The three glasses of wine being emptied, Marco struck the abbé on the shoulder, saying:

"Now, young man, to action! let us take the devil by his horns. You are in despair? Very good! . . . You call death to your aid? Admirable! but wherefore? Ah! you have not thought of that. It is because you think your ungrateful mistress the most beautiful, the most amiable of women, and that you will never find a treasure to equal her. Now this is an error which you share with all ill-treated lovers. There is not one who, sooner or later, does not recognise his error. Now, if I were to oblige you to acknowledge it at once, without further painful delay, would it not be so much gained? Look around you, and you will see that the world is full of beautiful, good and amiable women; and when you see that, you will be consoled, you will marry, and will make me a wedding present!"

"Alas! my dear Marco," replied the abbé, "I know very well that there are other good and beautiful women; but for me, Lidia alone lives. Lidia loves me not, therefore I wish to die!"

"What a deuce of a reason that is!" returned Marco. "Every one has his own tastes and inclinations. You love a woman, I love wine. Marsala pleases me; Muscatel charms me: am I indifferent to Lachryma Christi? not at all. If you were to see the numbers of pretty faces who enter the churches, and go and place the light burden of their consciences in the box for sins, you would be astonished at the riches and variety of their youthful charms. Do as I do, and say: 'Lidia is beautiful, but here are many other women who may compare with her. It would be barbarous to despise them, because an ungrateful beauty disdains or deceives me.' Then you will be reasonable in your tastes and inclinations."

"It is useless to speak of tastes and inclinations," cried Geronimo. "It is an unhappy passion, of which I confess the folly, but which I cannot subdue, that assassinates me, and inspires me with this longing for death. Instead of lecturing me in vain, tell me rather by what means I can get rid of an insupportable life without offending Heaven, for I do not wish to lose my soul with my body."

"A mischievous smile lurked in the corners of Marco's eyes.

"That is different, Signor Troppi," said he, "I detest busy-bodies. I press the point no further. Get rid of your life, if you wish. I cannot suggest the means of dying you require, but I can direct you to a competent person. One of my friends, who, although not in the church, is more learned than an archbishop, and has written on cases of conscience, will indicate the right path to you. Wait, that I may give you a letter to the illustissime docteur Jean Fabro.'

"The clerk took up a pen and wrote the following note:—

"'Doctor Jean, the bearer of this letter is a young Bisce liais, who wishes to die of love and despair, without going to hell. He is rich, half mad, and rather simple. Make a long story, and have a long consultation. A hundred piastres offered to the Virgin to atone for a crime which most assuredly he will never commit, will be divided between us. Do not grant him permission to kill himself. He will pay a tolerable price if you know how to flatter his feelings by appearing convinced of his despair.'

"'With the advice of Doctor Jean,' said Marco, folding the note, 'you will be able to enter paradise at any hour you choose to appoint.'

"Geronimo thanked his friend and hastened to the abode of the doctor, to whom he delivered the letter. Dr. Jean Fabro perused the epistle attentively, then with a mild and compassionate manner exclaimed:—

"'How many young and handsome men thus perish, destroyed by fatal passions, like tender leaves dispersed by a furious north wind! You are suffering, my good friend; that is easily seen by your mournful eyes; you are unhappy!'

"'More so than I can express,' replied Geronimo, drying a tear.

"'But have you sufficiently reflected on your fatal desire for death?'

"'Do not leave the subject of consultation,' said the abbé. 'To the point. Can you indicate a method of leaving this vale of tears without losing my soul? If you can, sell me the secret; I will pay the price and make use of the receipt when I please, for I intend to take the necessary measures in order to make Lidia regret my death.'

"'The expedient with which I shall furnish you,' replied the doctor, 'is infallible. You will not find it in the books of St. Augustin, St. Chrysostom, nor St. Ambrose, nor any of the fathers of the church. We must go to the Spanish casuists. Now they tell us that it is not forbidden to get a surgeon to bleed you. It is not a crime to unfasten the bandage; any accident might cause that, and your blood, which will flow freely of itself, will carry away also your innocent soul, which will naturally take its flight to heaven. A pious offering to the church will show that you had no criminal or impious design, and I will undertake, for a hundred piastres only, to procure you a confessor and absolution. You will pay him the money in advance, and then you will be at liberty to choose the time and place of your death.'

"'This expedient appears admirable,' said the abbé; 'all is arranged, I do not see that there would be any sin in it. Accept this piastre for the present, my dear sir, and when I have fixed the time of my death I will follow your advice scrupulously.'

"Simple as he was, the good abbé had his little share of cunning. In pondering over the advice of doctor Jean, he asked himself what would be the good of Jean Fabro's interference, and whether the first confessor he found would refuse absolution at the enormous price of one hundred piastres. Besides, it was imprudence to pay so large a sum beforehand: despair might give place to courage at the last moment; many persons, resolved to die, had been known to fail and return to life. The Madonna would not restore money that had once been paid. The wisest plan was therefore to leave the hundred piastres to the church as a legacy, and to call a confessor before performing the last act. Having taken these resolutions the abbé paused. A few days' delay served to convince him that he could live without his Lidia. One morning he ordered his barber to bleed him in his left arm, pretending to suffer from head-ache, and after depositing his will in safe hands, he drove to Saint Jean Teduccio, accompanied by Antonietto, who was singing merrily behind the carriage, never fancying that his master was thus hastening to his end. At twenty steps from Lidia's house, the coachman stopped his horses as he had been ordered, and the lively face of the little groom appeared at the door of the carriage.

"'What are your commands, excellenc?' said the boy.

"'Go and ring at the gate of the divine Lidia,' replied the abbé. 'When the servant opens the door, throw yourself on the ground, uttering lamentable cries, and say: Go quickly and call the signora, tell her to make haste, my master is there, dying in a carriage. He has not five minutes to live, and wishes to take an eternal farewell of your mistress. As soon as the signora, in tears, hastens from the house, you will bring her here, and then run to the Church in search of a priest.'

"Antonietto, persuaded that his master was going to have a joke, motioned his head in token of obedience, and then hastened towards the house, but returning hastily to the carriage, he said:—

"'Excellence, if the contessina should ask of what my unfortunate master is dying, shall I answer, weeping, that it is of love or grief?'

"'No, tell her that I have been bled in the arm, that I have unfastened the bandage, and am bathed in my blood.'

"'Very good, sir.'

"When the abbé heard the broken words and lamentations of his groom, he took off his coat, removed his shirt sleeve, and put his hand to the bandage.

"'One moment!' thought he, 'if Lidia be not at home, my death will produce no effect.'

"He waited until he heard the beautiful widow asking the cause of the noise, then slowly and with a trembling hand he unfastened the long bandage which was bound round his arm. On seeing the linen stained with blood fall on his knee, Geronimo recommended his soul to God. A cloud passed before his eyes, a noise similar to that of the sea buzzed in his ears, the paleness of death overspread his features, he leaned his head on his shoulder, like the beautiful Narcissus, and fainted.

THE STORM IN HARVEST.

THIS is a small copy of a print exceedingly celebrated in its day, and deservedly so. The qualities of Richard Westall's works were such as to ensure popularity. Effective grouping, bold and striking effects of light and shade, and concentration of interest upon the leading incident, were sure to tell. There is a grandeur of treatment in the work before us. The gloom of the passing storm, with its momentary flashes of lightning, the calm, yet solemn expression of the old reaper, the terror of the women and children, and dog, are admirably contrasted. But it is unnecessary to enlarge; the beauties of this work being such as every one will readily detect and appreciate. It is one of Westall's master-pieces.

MEDICAL ASYLUM.

THE subject of a FUND, for the relief of distressed Medical Practitioners, has long engaged my thoughts; and it was no small encouragement to hear, when accidentally mentioned at Mr. T——'s, that such a plan, if properly brought forward, would have the full weight of your approbation and support. I have not yet consulted my professional brethren, personally; but I have reason to believe that, among the large body of influential practitioners throughout the country, it would find many liberal and strenuous supporters. It must have often struck you as a singular fact in these days of active philanthropy, that, among the numerous benevolent institutions, recently founded, or in progress of erection, no adequate institution has been formed for the relief of those necessitous members of a profession, whose lives have been spent in ministering to the afflicted,—and whose health and worldly substance have often been sacrificed to the calls of humanity. To such meritorious, but indigent, members of the profession, a fund like that now in contemplation would become a source of unspeakable relief—restoring to health and professional usefulness men and families who are at this moment condemned to a bitter dependence upon the contributions of private friends, or the offerings of casual benevolence. I have now before me instances of men who, after having exhausted their patrimony in fitting themselves for the exercise of a liberal and arduous profession, have, through ill health, or some stroke of unmerited adversity, been reduced to a state of lamentable destitution. In a few instances—a very few—perhaps, this position of their affairs has been the result of rash speculation or improvidence; but in by far the majority of cases, it has been caused by the utter impossibility of securing, even by acknowledged talent and unwearied industry, the means of a scanty subsistence—far less a provision for sickness—for a family—for old age. But here I confine myself to those members of the profession who, without accidental or hereditary advantages of fortune, have no means of acquiring distinction or competence, but by the daily exercise of their talents—and professional merit without tact is no certain passport to successful practice.

It was observed by an illustrious poet, that the host of young and talented artists, who annually fall victims to the withering touch of neglect and disappointment, might be justly called an "Army of Martyrs:" and I can truly say from long observation, both at home and abroad, that the number of talented men of the medical profession—men of sensitive honour, and finished education—who pine away in obscurity, or waste their lives in fruitless efforts to earn an honourable livelihood, is greater than any one, not acquainted with the hidden sorrows of this vast metropolis, could ever imagine.

The following may be taken as a sketch from life:—A. B. after receiving a good classical education, is sent to College, there to prosecute his studies under Professors, in whose steps he is ambitious to tread. This stage in his professional education is attended with great expense, but he is considered a "young man of promise;" looks forward to professional distinction, and readily submits to privations. The close of his student-life, as he fondly believes, will be the commencement of a career that will indemnify him for all his present sacrifices. This period arrived, he travels a year or two on the Continent; visits the Schools and Hospitals, and makes himself thoroughly acquainted with the medical science and statistics of France and Germany. He returns home—in the opinion of his friends and teachers—a man who has profited by his opportunities; and feels confident that he is entering upon the wide field of professional life, with advantages that must speedily secure for him a career of honour and usefulness—with everything to recommend him but experience—and experience must be the work of time. In professional intercourse with men of high standing, he is complimented upon his acquirements; and inspired with a pleasing confidence in himself, and assured of many friends, he makes choice of some eligible locality, and "settles in practice." His name appears as physician or surgeon to the neighbouring hospital or dispensary; and patients, "attracted by the new door-plate," honour him with frequent consultations; but where he receives fifty fees in gratitude, he receives only one in gold. He is soon known to be "a feeling, kind-hearted man"—visits the poorest in their own wretched dwellings—ministers to their necessities in every form of disease and destitution—carries relief to the hearts and hearths of his poor patients,—and returns home with the fruits of his labour—the benediction and prayers of the destitute! "I was sick, and ye visited me."

This probably goes on for years. His slender patrimony has now melted away in acts of daily charity: he is still living on professional expectancy: his family has increased: the calls upon his "well-known liberality" are met with increased labour: it is urged upon him that the very fact of having given so much, obliges him to give more. Labour that, with other men, closes with the close of day, and is followed with only studious leisure, social intercourse, and refreshing rest, is often prolonged by the "medical man" for consecutive nights, amid scenes of pain, sickness, dejection, and anxiety. Other men, of every class, have their allotted hours of retirement, domestic enjoyment, and repose; but the medical man is public property. His sleep, like his studious or social hours, is continually broken in upon by the calls of humanity—the whims of a selfish patient—the manoeuvres of some unscrupulous rival; but more than all, by a deep sense of his own responsibility, which—if other calls be silent—never suffers him to rest, but is still urging him on for the relief or recovery of his patient, whose sufferings are probably much less acute than his own. The world expects—the law compels—his duty urges him to answer every summons; and thus the fatigues of an anxious day are too often followed by those of a harassing night.

The unavoidable close to a life of so much labour, is often, as we can testify, exhausted health and spirits,—the gradual but certain failure of all that mental and bodily vigour, which, under happier auspices, might have transmitted his name as an example to posterity.

At length A. B. is earnestly exhorted to contract the sphere of his duties—to recruit his health in the country—to "think of himself and his family," and, in compliance with these urgent solicitations, he repairs to the country. But in the absence of his family, in the absence of those endearing ties that sweeten labour, and make even the yoke of poverty light, the fresh air brings no health to him. His anxiety increases; absences becomes insupportable, he returns home, finds his professional walk abridged by a younger man, making the same efforts as his predecessor, and like him, perhaps, to spend and to be spent; or, if more successful, doomed to purchase success with a shattered constitution and an anxious mind.

We need hardly proceed to the last features in the sketch of a medical man: Finding his professional labours have entirely failed, A. B. is persuaded to embark on the "sea of periodical literature," and this for a time furnishes him with a scanty subsistence. But active habits being followed by long sedentary occupation, his health becomes every day more precarious: youth has passed away; with an anxious eye he looks round upon those objects of his tenderest regard, who have no human means of support, but in the throbbing heart, and trembling hand, which become less and less efficient, as the demands upon his affection and his industry increase.—

Had the benefits of an Institution, such as we propose, been attainable at this moment, the life of this accomplished man might have been prolonged; relieved from temporary pressure, his mind would have recovered its healthy tone, and with that, his physical energies would have revived. But overworked, hopeless, and exhausted, his death adds another item to the melancholy list of martyrs to the profession; while his widow and orphans are thrown upon the kindly offices of private friends,—for among the public charities of the metropolis, we repeat, there is none to which the widows and orphans of medical gentlemen can appeal.

Shall it continue thus? Shall the "medical man," who every day (for I speak of those who practise in the densely populated quarters of the capital,)—shall he who daily subjects himself to mental anxiety, to bodily fatigue, to deadly infection, in the discharge of his duties: shall he whose hourly task is to revive the hopeless, reclaim the abandoned, to restore the sick and prostrate to the useful arts and occupations of civilized life,—who daily perils his life for that of his patient,—shall he be denied the well-earned meed of public sympathy and support? Of the resolution, fortitude, and patience with which these objects are carried out by the profession, generally, it is impossible to speak too highly. It is by no means rare, among the practitioners of this class—ill-requited and little appreciated as they often are—to perform the two-fold duty of physician and almoner; to give instead of receiving a fee; for in too many instances, where medical aid is appealed to, the sufferer is languishing for want of wholesome food, not physic. In many cases, too, it is the mind, not the body,—or the body only through the mind,—that needs the physician; and whoever can dispense the moral medicine with judgment and sympathy, will do much to restore his patient to health, perhaps to happiness. It often happens, too, that he who prescribes must also furnish the means for carrying his directions into effect.—

A profession of such high and manifest responsibility, involves a life of anxiety, suspense, and self-denial, beyond what is imagined by the public. Hence the chronic diseases, the sudden deaths, to which so many members of the profession become the annual victims. Their sympathy, from the excessive tax laid upon it by the daily calls of humanity, becomes morbidly sensitive; and though some, from long habit, or constitutional apathy, may escape the tax thus imposed, it is paid by the majority, at the sacrifice of much health and comfort. It is for professional men of this class that I am anxious to bespeak the active sympathy of their more fortunate brethren, and the public; and surely it is but reasonable to expect that they, who so faithfully watch over the public health, should, in their own sorrows, look to the public for sympathy and relief—but especially to those members of the profession whom Providence has blessed with the means of increasing their own happiness by promoting that of others. And the plan I would recommend for uniting the efforts of all parties in effecting this important object, is—

A general subscription among all members of the profession, annually, or by donations: and as every member of the community must, at one time or other between his birth and his death-bed, have had some experience, however slight, of medical skill and kindness, there is good reason to believe that many persons of influence and liberality would be glad to bear public testimony to the benefits they have derived from Medical Science. Thus, too, many long and often unrequited services rendered to the public by deceased members of the profession, might be acknowledged by corresponding donations to a "Relief Fund," for the benefit of their widows and orphans.

As soon as sufficient funds were realized for the purpose, it might be desirable to purchase ground in some eligible quarter, for erecting a house to be entitled the "Medical Relief Asylum," or some other distinctive name, for the benefit of distressed members of the profession. The house might comprise a common hall, a reading or lecture-room; a chapel, a library with chemical and philosophical apparatus, and the usual domestic offices, more or less extensive, according to circumstances, enclosed in at least an acre of ground, where the inmates might enjoy the advantages of air and exercise, supplying whatever is needful for an invalid, but excluding whatever is superfluous.

It is calculated that among the invalids elected to the benefit of residence in the proposed institution, many would be found both ready and able to employ their minds and pens in maturing and bringing out works for the advancement of science, the introduction of sanitary measures, and the general welfare of the state. It may be reasonably expected that, in a retirement so constituted, many gifted minds would recover their healthful activity; and, being relieved from the paralyzing effects of unrequited industry, the depression and debility arising from united labour and anxiety to provide for the current expenses of every day, would be thus enabled to accelerate the progress of mental culture, and repay their country by contributing something, at least, to her moral and intellectual wealth. Presuming that they are all educated men, many of them highly so, they would thus find leisure to condense the substance of their experience in professional or classical literature, and to publish their MSS. when approved by good judges, the profits of which would belong to the Institution.

Such results are at least possible, and it requires only the countenance and support of professional men themselves to give vital efficiency to the whole scheme. Let their fat be once pronounced, and the benefits of this plan will be neither distant nor doubtful. Every honourable member of the profession will then have this cheering prospect,—that, if disabled by accident or disease, he has still a home that will open its door to receive him, and where, with the ordinary comforts of life, he will enjoy the solace of congenial society.

If, in addition to what is above suggested, accommodation were provided for a limited number of inmates, widows and orphans of practitioners—who had fallen victims to disease or accident in the course of professional duties; or if, in lieu of residence, donations or pensions could be awarded, according to the merits of each case; and if a school, for a limited number of children, could be attached to the establishment, little would be wanting to render it complete. B.

[P.S.—It is gratifying to observe that since the above letter was written, it has been proposed to erect and endow a College for the reception of distressed Members of the Medical Profession or their Widows; and a school for the education and maintenance of their sons, to be called, "THE ROYAL BENEVOLENT MEDICAL COLLEGE." For this very laudable purpose, a considerable sum has been already subscribed; and it is earnestly hoped that, in their attempt to carry out the scheme, the projectors may confidently rely on the support and liberality of the public.]

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."²

CHAPTER LXI.

THE FATE OF THE WOLF!

AFTER the disturbance at the Casino, Lord Bellefield, accompanied by Rastelli, repaired to a shooting gallery, where his lordship practised with pistols for an hour. Having by repeated successes assured himself that his late fall had not shaken his nerves to a degree which could interfere with his skill as a duellist, he turned to his companion, observing, "Now, Rastelli, devise some method of killing time for the next hour or so; I am anxious not to return to the Palazzo Grassini till the family have retired for the night. I had rather avoid meeting any of them till this little affair is over. What can we contrive to do with ourselves?"

"Come home with me, and let us have a quiet game at écarté," was the reply; "that will amuse without exciting you. I wish you to keep cool, in order to punish for his temerity the insolent Luigi." As he spoke, the dark eyes of the Italian flashed with the fire of revenge.

Lord Bellefield remarked his eagerness, and smiled contemptuously. "Calm yourself, my good Rastelli," he said, quietly lighting a cigar, "justice shall be done, depend on it."

"How cold and phlegmatic you English are!" exclaimed Rastelli, irritated at his companion's apparent apathy; "had the brigand insulted me as he has insulted you, if I had not stabbed him on the spot, I should have known no peace till he lay bleeding at my feet."

Lord Bellefield placed his hand on his friend's shoulder, and approaching his lips to his ear, said in a low impressive voice, "Listen! we Englishmen do not talk about these things, we do them." There was a cold grating bitterness in his tone, which told of such fiendish malice working at his heart, that the Italian's display of boyish passion shrank into insignificance beside it.

Together they repaired to Rastelli's dwelling; cards were produced, and their game began. With the calculating prudence of an accomplished gamester, Lord Bellefield played cautiously and for moderate sums, till he had tested his adversary's calibre; then, confident in his own skill, he artfully led on the young Italian to propose higher stakes, until, at the expiration of an hour and a half, he had won above a couple of hundred pounds.

"You are becoming excited, and beginning to play wildly, amico mio," he said, pushing back his chair; "we will pause for to-night."

"And when will you give me my revenge?" inquired the Italian, with flushed cheeks and trembling lips.

"When you like—to-morrow evening, if it so please you;—always supposing our peep-of-day amusement goes as it should do," answered Lord Bellefield, carelessly.

"And what if you should be hit?" questioned Rastelli, with a grim smile, which involuntarily suggested to his auditor the idea that such a catastrophe would not deeply distress him.

"To provide against such a contingency, I shall make my will to-night, and appoint you executor and residuary legatee; so that when you have satisfied the few claims against me, the remainder of my property will be yours, to compensate for this evening's run of ill-luck," was the jesting reply.

Rastelli, having by this time in a degree recovered his good humour, answered in the same light tone; then having made their final arrangements for the morrow's meeting, they shook hands and parted.

As Lord Bellefield gained the street, the conventional smile faded from his lips, and a dark sullen expression imparted a gloomy ferocity to his countenance. His look did not belie the nature of his thoughts, which ran somewhat after the following fashion:—

"A nice thing I'm in for!—to think of that accursed Arundel turning up in such an out-of-the-way place as this! my ill-luck follows me everywhere. That scoundrel is my evil genius. I shall be rid of him to-morrow, for I'll shoot him like a dog; that's some comfort." He paused, then a new idea seemed to strike him, and he muttered—"Curse him, he means to murder me; I read it in his fiendish eyes. I wonder whether he is anything of a shot? A nice way to lose one's life, in a quarrel with a tutor! it's next door to going out with one's valet. Well, I'm in for it, and must chance it; a quick aim and a hair trigger may pick him off as it has done many a better fellow, before he has time to be mischievous. I wonder whether Charles or old Grant know of his being here?—if not, the thing can be easily hushed up." A sound as of a man's footstep caused him to start and look round, but seeing no one he resumed,—"Assassination is said to be one of the fashions of this place; I wish I was a little more au fait as to the customs of the natives, or had longer time to act in. I might get my friend quietly disposed of without risk or trouble." He reflected a moment on the feasibility of such a scheme; but the spirit of revenge and hate was strong within him, and muttering a fearful curse, he added, "No! ——— him, I'd rather shoot him with my own hand! that blow sticks by me."

At this moment a man started out from a dark archway, so suddenly, as nearly to run against Lord Bellefield, who, drawing himself up indignantly, was about to commence an angry remonstrance, when his elbows were pinioned from behind, some person tripped up his heels, a cloak was flung over his head, and despite his attempts to free himself, he was overpowered and hurried away by a party of several men. After proceeding some short distance, they reached the bank of a canal; here they paused, and still holding the cloak over their captive's head to prevent him from giving an alarm, they bound his hands. One who seemed to possess authority over the others, superintended this operation in person.

"Not so tight," he said, to an over-zealous individual who was tying the cord as though it were never to be unfastened, "not so tight, it will numb his arms. Now," he continued, "raise him carefully;" and in obedience to his command, Lord Bellefield felt himself lifted from his feet, and placed in a lying posture, at the bottom of what he rightly imagined to be a gondola.

Having ascertained, by listening, that a portion of his captors were engaged in rowing the boat, Lord Bellefield made an effort to remove the cloak from his face, at the same time slightly raising himself; immediately a heavy hand pressed him down, and a deep low voice uttered the following caution,— "There is the point of a naked stiletto within an inch of your heart; if you again attempt to move or speak, I plunge it in!"

Thus warned, nothing remained but to lie still, and await his captor's pleasure, which alternative, distracted by mingled rage and fear, Lord Bellefield was forced to adopt. From the time occupied by their transit, it appeared that they must have proceeded some considerable distance ere the gondola again stopped. Carefully guarded as before, the prisoner was taken on shore, and half-led, half-carried over some uneven, stony ground, in traversing which his conductors were more than once forced to turn aside, as if to avoid some obstacle that lay in their path; he was then told to ascend steps; doors were unbarred to afford them ingress, and the air struck cold and damp, as from a vault. At length, apparently, they reached their destination, and the prisoner was made to sit down on a stone bench; a light was procured, and then the order was given,— "Untie his hands, remove the cloak, and leave us."

The persons spoken to obeyed, and in another moment Lord Bellefield was able to look round him.

The chamber in which he found himself was small, the roof was high and vaulted, and the walls appeared of an immense thickness; the door was of oak, thickly studded with iron nail-heads; there was no fire-place; an antique lamp, hanging by a chain from the roof, lighted the apartment, and a grated window, sunk in the thickness of the wall, seemed to afford the only means of communication with the outward air. As Lord Bellefield became aware of these particulars, the men who had released his hands and removed the cloak quitted the room, locking and barring the door on the outside; in another moment the sound of their retreating footsteps echoed along the stonc passage, and died away in the distance. A shudder passed over Lord Bellefield's frame as he found himself thus strangely left alone with one whose purpose he could scarcely imagine other than hostile. As his companion—who wore one of those half-masks termed a domino, which effectually concealed his features—did not seem inclined to address him, Lord Bellefield had time to examine, with a beating heart, the preparations made for his reception. The only article of furniture the apartment contained, with the exception of the stone bench on which he was seated, was a heavy oak table. At the end nearest him lay a drawn sword, the blade crossed by that of a naked stiletto, in front of which was placed a loaded pistol. A similar arrangement of weapons garnished the other end of the table, at which stood the motionless figure of the stranger. The whole thing was so strange, and so like some fancy of a horrible dream, that it was with difficulty Lord Bellefield could believe the evidence of his senses. At length, the silence became unendurable to such a degree, that, even at the risk of hurrying on his fate, he resolved to break it. Addressing his captor, he asked, in a voice which trembled in spite of his efforts to appear cool and indifferent,—“What place is this to which you have brought me?”

The person addressed paused a moment, and then, without removing his mask, replied,—“The ruins of the convent of the Black Flagellants, situated on an island in the lagunes, a mile from Venice.”

Up to this moment, Lord Bellefield had been possessed with a secret belief that his captor was none other than Lewis Arundel; and having already had a convincing proof both of his enemy's bodily strength, and of the implacable nature of his feelings towards him, the idea that he had kidnapped him, and carried him off to this desolate place in order to force upon him a combat à l'outrance, with weapons in the use of which his skill as a duellist would avail him little, was by no means an agreeable one. This fear his companion's speech had dispelled, for the voice, though deep and stern, was not the voice of Lewis. Ignorant of the existence of any other person likely to nourish deep feelings of revenge against him, Lord Bellefield immediately conceived that he had fallen into the hands of some English ruffian connected with banditti, in which case their object would probably be plunder; and the solitary chamber, the naked weapons, &c., mere scenic arrangements got up for the sake of intimidating him, and so making a better bargain. Much relieved by this view of the affair, he began—

“Your object in bringing me here is of course plunder, all this absurd mummery is therefore utterly needless; you have only to name some reasonable sum for my ransom, and as I cannot get out of the scrape otherwise, I must pay it.”

“You will find it no mummery, and are wrong in supposing money will be of the slightest avail to you,” was the reply.

Lord Bellefield, however, still considering his idea a right one, and accounting for this speech as he had already accounted for the presence of the weapons, viz. as a means of intimidating him, to extort from his fears a higher ransom, he continued—

“My good fellow, you have completely mistaken your man; all your tragedy nonsense is quite thrown away upon me. The affair is simply a matter of business: you require money, and knowing my rank, imagine me a Cræsus. I am nothing of the kind, but I can make it well worth your while to set me free; conduct me safely to the square of St. Mark, and I will give you a hundred Napoleons.”

“A million curses on your money!” exclaimed the other furiously; “may the bitter malediction of a desperate man cleave to the rank and riches which have served to add a false splendour to as mean and pitiful a scoundrel as ever disgraced God's earth. Fool! let me undeceive you—I am Miles Hardy” (as he spoke he flung down his mask), “the brother of your victim—I have brought you here to die; now do you think your money, that money which you refused to give to save her from a life of infamy, or a beggar's death, is likely to bribe me to change my purpose?”

For a moment Lord Bellefield was utterly confounded by this declaration; he had never been aware that Jane had a brother, and the surprise added to his discomfiture; besides, hardened as he was, he felt that he had deeply wronged the girl, and a superstitious instinct of the justice of the retribution which had overtaken him, helped still more effectually to terrify and crush him: for once his haughty spirit and presence of mind failed him, and mistaking utterly the character of the man with whom he had to deal, he resolved first if possible to deceive, then to cajole and bribe him.

“Refuse money to Jane Hardy!” he began in a tone of feigned surprise; “you must have strangely deceived yourself: while she remained with me I lavished hundreds upon her, and when, with the caprice of her sex, she chose to leave me for some more fortunate swain, as I imagine, ignorance of her abode alone prevented my settling a liberal allowance upon her. Even now I am ready to do so if she wishes it—where is she?”

A look of contemptuous anger, which had overspread Miles Hardy's face as Lord Bellefield uttered these falsehoods, gave place to an expression of deep solemnity as he replied, “She is, where you will be ere another day dawns, wretched liar that you are,—gone to answer for her sins before her God!"

"Dead!" exclaimed Lord Bellefield, involuntarily shocked into an expression of feeling. Miles regarded him attentively; had he discerned in him any symptoms of real grief for her loss, any signs of true penitence for the destruction he had wrought, there was that working in the brother's heart which might even yet have saved him. But a doom was upon the seducer, and a fresh display of his evil, sordid nature, hastened it. "Poor girl!" he said, "pon my word, Hardy, I'm quite shocked at this sudden intelligence; I really was excessively fond of her at one time—a—I mean to say before she chose to run away from me; however, you must not take the affair so deeply to heart; I can assure you these things are happening every day, and I always meant to make her a liberal settlement; but as that is now unfortunately impossible, we must see what can be done for you." Having delivered himself of this heartless speech, which he considered a model of diplomacy, Lord Bellefield paused to observe its effects upon his auditor. Miles stood for a moment as if absorbed in grief, murmuring to himself, "My poor Jane, and was it for such a thing as this you sacrificed your young life? My poor, poor sister!" Then suddenly raising his head, he said with a glance of the most withering scorn—

"Your mean lies will prove of as little use to you as your money; I loathe it, them, and you alike. I have told you I brought you here to die, and I have told you true; but I am no murderer, and if you have the courage of a man, you have one chance yet remaining: on that table lie six weapons, three for you, and three for me; choose which you will, and come on; only if the first fails we must try the second, and if that does not end the matter, there still remains the third. Come, make your choice."

"Well, but hear me"—began Lord Bellefield, turning very pale.

"Not a word," was the angry answer, "instantly defend yourself; if you refuse, I will shoot you where you stand;" so saying he advanced a step towards the table.

Lord Bellefield, who had risen during the last speech, slowly followed his example, casting, as he did so, a scrutinising look round the apartment, and especially towards the window, the action did not escape Hardy's quick sight.

"Your search is useless," he said, smiling contemptuously; "were you here alone, with proper tools at hand, and knowing how to use them to the best advantage, it would take you two hours to break out of this place; if you call ever so loudly, there is no one to hear you—my companions are half way back to Venice by this time;—you have nothing left but to overcome me, or to die the dog's death you deserve."

"'Tis false!" exclaimed Lord Bellefield, eagerly; "my friends have succeeded in tracing me, and even now I hear the tread of soldiers in the passage; hark!"

With a gesture of surprise, Hardy turned towards the door. This was all Lord Bellefield wanted. Springing forward, he seized the pistol, levelled it, and, with the speed of thought, fired. Looking round, Hardy perceived too late the snare that had been laid for him. As he did so, a sharp stinging pain, followed by a sensation like the burn of a red-hot iron, passed round his left side. The ball, aimed at his heart, had struck against the handle of a clasp-knife which, sailor-fashion, he wore slung round his neck by a string, and, glancing off, entered the side, and passed round one of the ribs under the skin, lodging among the muscular fibres of the shoulder-blade. Furious at the cowardly stratagem to which he had so nearly fallen a victim, and half-maddened with the pain of his wound, Hardy seized the other pistol, and, shouting—"Die, you infernal, treacherous scoundrel!" snapped it at his adversary; but, owing to the priming being damp, the pistol rusty, or from some other unexplained cause, the cap exploded without discharging the weapon. Flinging it down with an oath, he snatched up the sword that lay nearest to him, and exclaiming, "Come on, and be — to you!" scarcely gave his antagonist time to follow his example, ere he attacked him furiously.

For a minute or two, cut and thrust followed each other so rapidly, that all seemed confusion. Then, as their first fury became expended, and they fought more cautiously, Lord Bellefield perceived, to his extreme satisfaction, that he was the better swordsman of the two, Hardy having merely picked up the use of the cutlass on board a man-o'-war, while his antagonist had learned fencing amongst the other military exercises of a cavalry regiment in which, till within the last two or three years, he had held a commission. If, therefore, he could contrive to defend himself till Hardy's fury should have, in some degree, worn out his strength, he trusted either to disarm his adversary, or by a well-directed thrust to rid himself of him for ever. Nor was he disappointed in this expectation; for having with some difficulty parried a furious thrust, he caught Hardy's sword with the blade of his own weapon, and, by a sudden turn of the wrist, sent it flying out of his hand, leaving his enemy defenceless, and at his mercy. But mercy being a quality for which his lordship was never famous, more especially when, as in the present instance, its exercise might compromise his own safety, he drew back a step to get room for his thrust, with the benevolent intention of running his opponent through the body. With the speed of lightning, Hardy perceived the only chance remaining for him, and unhesitatingly adopted it. Snatching up one of the stiletos, he rushed upon Lord Bellefield, and, receiving his thrust through the fleshy part of his left arm, closed with him, and buried the dagger in his heart. Uttering a sound between a gasping sob and a groan, the young nobleman staggered, raised his arm as if in act to strike, and fell back a corpse.

Thus did the vengeance of the great God whom he had insulted by a life of selfish crime, overtake this wicked man in the pride of his youth and strength; and thus in the same night were the libertine and his victim called to appear before the Judge of all the earth, to answer for their deeds, whether they had done good, or whether they had done evil. For the humble penitent, we may indeed sorrow, yet not as without hope, knowing that "the blood of Christ Jesus cleanseth from all sin;" but for the impenitent sinner, cut off in the midst of crime, dying with his selfish heart untouched, his evil nature unregenerated, "there remaineth no longer any hope, but a fearful looking-for of judgment to come."

THE STORY OF A FAMILY.¹

FIRST NOTICE.

THIS work is, as its name discloses, our old friend, the "Story of a Family," republished in two very pretty little volumes, the latter half of the second containing new matter wherewith the tale is properly wound up; the abrupt and untimely conclusion which cut short the story in SHARPE being cancelled. The object of the present notice is to afford, to those of our readers whose "financial arrangements" do not permit them to seek knowledge at the fountain's head by purchasing so desirable an addition to their library, some idea of the ultimate fate of the Dramatis Personæ, in whose fortunes we cannot but believe they must even yet feel no inconsiderable interest. Should any of our readers, "rashly importunate," venture to inquire why such a review is needed, and for what reason the "Story of a Family,"—unlike the lost sheep pathetically deplored by that distressed member of the Agricultural Association, "Little Bo-peep,"—did not "bring its tail behind it," we can only satisfy their curiosity by telling them another "story" of that "Happy Family," the House of Commons.

On one occasion, a youthful member of this illustrious assembly, whose zeal outran his discretion, chanced to express himself with so much vehemence, that the usually taciturn Speaker (so named on the lucus a non lucendo principle, because, in a parliamentary sense of the word, he never speaks) was forced to call him to order, which he did by observing—"Unless the honourable member is more careful in his language, I shall be forced to NAME him." "And pray, Mr. Speaker," inquired the young delinquent, in whom the bump of veneration was fearfully undeveloped, "pray what would be the consequence if you did name me?" The Speaker paused aghast at such presumption—then, shaking his head with an air of ominous mystery, replied in a tone of the deepest solemnity—"Heaven only knows!"—And so say we to the inquiring minds who would seek to penetrate the secrets of the Adytus of literature.

That the "short, SHARPE, and decisive conclusion of the Tale" was an unsatisfactory one, we will not attempt to deny. Martin Tupper, the philosopher of proverbs, has declared that "Every end is happiness;" but unless we admit the plea of exceptions proving the rule, the end, or rather the "no end," of the Story of a Family which appeared in SHARPE, would assuredly confute this dictum of our modern Sancho Panza—for we have yet to learn that it was productive of happiness to anybody.

And thus having begun with the end, we will, still setting established precedent at defiance, proceed with the middle, and plunge at once in medias res, by reminding our readers, that we left poor Ida sorrowing over the death-bed of that paragon of papas, the amiable and excellent Percy Lee. Here, taking example by the Authoress, we will yet leave her a short time longer while we follow the fortunes of Madeline Tyrrell, alias Mrs. Chester, whose character, full of great faults, and still greater virtues, we own to possess a degree of fascination for us with which that of Ida, sweet, loveable and child-like, with an instinct of good never at fault, and a gentle simplicity of diction with which she murmurs forth uncomfortable truths which bowl down the bad characters, like so many nine-pins, has failed to inspire us. The contrast between Ida and her Governess, and the influence each, dissimilar as are their two natures, possesses over the other, evince perhaps more than any other portions of the work, the writer's unusual power of reading and delineating that inscrutable mystery—the human heart.

Be it remembered that Ida, having influenced Madeline to allow her to show the journal of her inner life to Mr. Tyrrell, and lectured that outraged husband into a proper frame of mind for reading it, is summoned to the death-bed of her father—leaving the good seed she has sown in the hearts of the estranged couple to fructify. The scene we have chosen for our extract, will show the effects of her well-meant efforts as a peacemaker. Little Arthur, the curly-haired pledge of Madeline's matrimonial infelicity, knocks at her bed-room door, and the following conversation takes place between them, the child being delightfully ignorant of the relationship in which he stands towards the "White Lady."

"Come in, love, I am awake," said Madeline, languidly lifting her eyes from her book, and fixing them upon the door. The tap was low and timid, and she felt sure that it announced Ida. Slowly the door moved forwards, and a little face, bright yet shy, all garlanded with waving ringlets, looked in. Madeline stared at it as though it were a spectre, pressed her hand tightly upon her heart, and could not speak.

"May I come in, ma'am?" asked little Arthur, looking almost inclined to run away. "I promised to be very quiet."

"Children are the greatest of helps to self-control. A kind of instinctive shame checks the indulgence of any violent passion or impulse before them, whether it be anger or grief, bitterness or folly. Their eyes are too new upon earth to be suffered as yet to look upon its evils; they must not witness the result where they cannot possibly comprehend the cause. Madeline forced a smile, and beckoned to him encouragingly, though the ineffectual words died inaudibly upon her lips. He came in, and stood beside her chair, laying his hand upon her knee, and looking up in her face.

"'You have been very ill,' said he, in a cautious whisper, as though he had been schooled to speak softly, 'you look so white. Are you better?'

"'Yes, my darling,' she answered, suffering her trembling and icy fingers to rest upon his, but closing her eyes, as if quite unable to meet his clear cloudless gaze.

"'All this while have you been in bed?' continued the little boy. 'Oh, how tired you must be! I was very ill once, a long, long while ago; a great many years, I believe. I can remember it, though. I was in bed for three weeks, and I could not get up at all, and they put pillows behind me when I was to eat my dinner, and fed me with a spoon; and my head went from side to side like a little baby's, though I was three years old. I wasn't strong enough to keep it straight, you know. And I had my marbles in the bed with me, but I couldn't play with them. And papa nursed me,—oh, so kind and so careful! He never went to bed at all, but sat by my side all the night, for fear I should be frightened, or, I think,' (with a look of awe and doubt,) 'for fear I should die and go away from him. I am glad I did not die.'

"Tears forced their way from under her closed eyelids, and poured down her cheeks like rain.

"'Why do you cry?' asked Arthur earnestly. 'Am I naughty? don't you like me, or are you only sorry because I was so ill? Don't cry,—I am quite well again.'

"He seemed troubled, and she struggled for sufficient calmness to re-assure him.

"'I am only crying because I have been ill,' said she in a stifled voice. 'Go on talking to me, I like to hear you.'

"'Perhaps you were crying because you thought you should die?' rejoined the child. 'Were you naughty, and did that make you afraid? Oh, if you are sorry, God will forgive you. I didn't like to die, because I was afraid of a new place, and of leaving papa; not because I was afraid of God. But you have no papa, have you? And you are so old, you can't be afraid.'

"Madeline drew him close to her bosom, and kissed him tenderly. He sat on her knee, and put up his hand coaxingly to her cheek, smoothing the rich dark mass of hair which shadowed it beneath the falling lace of her cap.

"'I think you will get quite well again very soon,' said he, 'and then you shall finish painting my picture. Papa looked at it, and he said you would finish it when you got well.'

"The words had a strange, unreal, impossible sound; Madeline did not answer them. She kept her eyes fixed on the ground, and breathed with difficulty. A sudden oppressive sense of a presence was upon her; she felt that someone had entered, though she heard no step; it seemed as though an unseen hand of giant strength were holding down her eyelids, and, like one struggling with the nightmare, though her life depended on her looking up or speaking, not for her life could she do either. So highly strung and stretched was every nerve, that when a sound actually broke the momentary silence, which, reckoned by her throbbing heart, would have been ten times its length, it was with difficulty that she restrained a scream. Yet the words were commonplace, every-day words, and the voice quiet and courteous.

"'I hope you are better this morning?'

"The spell was broken; she looked up, and beheld Mr. Tyrrell. She made a great, an astonishing effort; she seemed to compress, to crush her emotion, and sweep it aside for the moment, as though it were a tangible thing, over which she had power. There was an unnatural numbness upon her, both in thought and feeling, and a strange lurking consciousness that life was, so to speak, intermitted, and that it would be resumed, ere long, with fearful energy of re-action; that she must, therefore, resolve desperately to use and to command the interval, uncertain of its duration and of its end. She put the child gently from her knees, and he went to his father, saying,—

"'Oh, papa! you came too quick. I was going to tell her you were coming, but I hadn't got to it yet.'

"She was not conscious of noting the words, but she found, afterwards, that she remembered the minutest particulars; how the little fellow put his hand into his father's, and quietly submitted to be led from the room; how the latter, having closed the door upon him, and stood for a second, as if uncertain, advanced, and drew a chair by her side. She observed the merest trifles: that a corner of the hearth-rug was displaced by the leg of his chair; that a fly had settled upon his arm, and travelled along the coat-sleeve, till it reached his hand, and was shaken off by a slight involuntary movement. The picture never rose up before her thoughts afterwards without the fly and the fold in the hearth-rug. When she lifted a momentary glance to his face—not his eyes, those she could not meet—she saw that his colour came and went rapidly; she felt, rather than heard, that there was suppressed agitation in the calmness of his voice, and this helped to strengthen her. Yet his manner was deliberate, assured, and very gentle.

"'I fear I have startled you,' said he, again addressing her. 'If you are not strong enough to see me, to listen to me, I will go. I can wait till you are more completely recovered.'

"'I am quite strong enough,' she answered.

"'Then, if that be the case,' replied he, 'I will speak. I will not distress you long; I have only a few words to say. My object is not to distress, but to relieve you. It is better, I think, at once to—to—' he hesitated—

"'I understand,' interposed she, quickly, and bowing her head; 'it is better.'

"Why was this tone of consideration so inexpressibly bitter to her, and for what was it preparing her? For silence. He did not speak again for some minutes; the pause was intolerable, and at last she lifted her eyes, and met his earnest, melancholy gaze fixed immovably upon her face. It seemed to fascinate her and she surveyed him as though taking note of the change of years. A little more expansion of the lofty forehead, a line or two of thought, a shade of pathos, a touch of softness—the picture was mellowed, not faded. And how was it with her? The radiance and buoyancy of her beauty were gone for ever, nor could she guess how much of loveliness time, sorrow, and discipline had given in its place. She knew not how the gradual moulding of the heart had traced its work upon the countenance; she thought herself a wreck, a mere phantom of the past, and involuntarily she shook her head as he gazed upon her, her lips parting with a painful, yet half-deprecating smile.

"'Madeline,' said he, at length, and the name fell upon her ear like a stroke upon an open wound, 'we have both been wrong.—Nay!' (putting up his hand) 'hear me. My fault has been as great as yours. I feel it so. We have both suffered—you the most, for you had not that consolation which has been the innocent charm and study of my life.' He hurried over this reference to their child, as if he feared to agitate her too powerfully. 'Now, I am not looking to the past with any bitterness, nor to the future with any romance. I see the whole truth, clearly, strongly, coldly, if you will; and seeing it, I am ready—anxious—to resume the duty to which I was once fully as faithless as yourself. I disguise nothing. This is my wish. But not for an instant will I be a restraint upon you; you shall decide for yourself and for me.'

"She had covered her face with her hands, but he felt that she was listening; he felt, too, how stiff and heartless were his words. Doubt of her feelings, desire to spare them, pride, shame—all united to constrain him; yet his voice softened and faltered as he proceeded:—

"'Whatever you may once have felt,' said he, rather hurriedly, 'I know that indignation and the lapse of years, and the sense of wrong, must long since have effaced it. I know you, Madeline; I appeal to no past feelings. I was unworthy of the gift which I first sought, and whatever your offences may have been, I deserved that it should be withdrawn.'

"'No, no,' murmured she, sobbing, and keenly feeling the generous delicacy of his words; 'let there be truth between us! I was sorely tried, and my sin was heavy. The depth of my humiliation has avenged it.'

"'You are right!' he exclaimed, taking up her words with a mixture of vehemence and solemnity; 'there must be perfect truth between us now. Listen then to The Truth. When we were together seven years ago, I was a mere man of the world; my standard of life was neither natural nor supernatural, but artificial; and to it my feelings, sympathies, conceptions, hopes, were all bound as with bands of adamant. You were a woman with infinite capacity of womanly perfection; but without one help, one guidance, one healthful memory of instructed childhood, one habit of wise discipline, ere the tender will had hardened itself in opposition. I need not go on. Such as you were, I took you, and took also the duty and the privilege (you gave me the power) of making you that which you were capable of becoming. How did I fulfil this duty? Do you suppose I have never thought of this? never asked myself, with keenest reproach, why, when you opened to me a way into the very depths of your character through your generous, self-abandoning, confiding heart, I repaid you by obstinately refusing to use it? You did not know me; and I stood aloof, and suffered you to destroy your own happiness and mine, rather than by a word enlighten you. Do you suppose, Madeline,' he continued, dropping his voice as he drew nearer to her, 'that in solitude, at nightfall, in those hours when conscience is suddenly revealed to the soul as an angel of judgment, beneath whose sentence it must needs fall prostrate,—that at such times I have never told myself, with bitter, ineffectual tears, that if she whom I had irrevocably lost could be restored to me, I would be to her other than I had been? We have all such thoughts of the dead in our tender moments, and when there has been real wrong, they make the helpless remorse of a lifetime. But you and I are happier, for we have the power of reparation. And when my boy—our child—'

"'Oh, no more! no more! Have mercy upon me!' she exclaimed, and with a sudden, irresistible movement, flung herself at his feet. 'Give me your pardon; say to me, "Go in peace," and let me hide myself again for ever!'

"Tyrrell felt that he had conquered. How gently he raised her! 'I have forgiven everything,' said he, as with grave tenderness and authority he took her hands in his; 'but I retract my former words,—I will not leave you liberty of choice. I decide for you; a year hence you shall abandon me if you will; till then, my wife, come back to me, and have faith in me.'"

Any comment on this scene would be misplaced. To those who do not recognise in it the truest pathos, the deepest, most earnest poetry of real life,—poetry, because it is real, and therefore appeals from heart to heart,—our opinion of it would appear overstrained and exaggerated, while those who think with us will agree that it is a soul-picture to love and ponder over,—a thing to feel, but not to prate about.

Of course, after this explanation, the separated husband and wife come together again, and enter with some fear, but more hope, upon a new course of existence. Tyrrell, in order to escape the good-natured comments of society, on Madeline's account, even more than on his own, determines to quit England for a season. Accordingly, he applies for and obtains the governorship of A—, a juvenile colony, possessing a real live bishop and a taste for educational reform. Setting sail for this antipodal Utopia, Tyrrell, Madeline, and the curlypated, no longer motherless Arthur, disappear for some time from the pages of "The Story of a Family," though in tracing the further history of Ida and Godfrey, we learn the success of their experiment, which we should be forestalling the interest of the tale were we to mention out of its proper place.

We propose to give in our next Number a second and concluding notice, wherein the reader will learn what further befalls the various characters, and be enabled to judge whether our opinion of the entire work agrees with his own.

A MORNING WITH MADAME IDA PFEIFFER.

OUR readers may perhaps recollect a short paper inserted a few months ago and entitled, "A Lady that has seen the World." It recorded my meeting with a female pilgrim to Jerusalem, who subsequently went round the earth entirely by herself, and who, when the paper was written, was on her way home to her native city, Vienna. I had often anxiously desired to meet again so remarkable a fellow-traveller, and, by the merest hazard in the world, I chanced, through a newspaper paragraph, to hear that she was at the present moment in London, and immediately obtained her address. As she was at that time lodging at a friend's house some distance from town, a meeting was appointed at his counting-house in the city. From Jerusalem to Crutched Friars was certainly a rather abrupt transition, and as I pushed my way through the multifarious obstructions of our crowded streets to the place of rendezvous, I could not help speculating as to what changes had been wrought by the interval of time and travel that had elapsed since our previous meeting.

I reached the house, hurried up two flights of dirty stairs, tapped at the door of an office differing in no respect from the thousand dark and dingy ones in the city. "Come in," was the response; and on entering, in the shadow of the room and looking strangely out of place in the midst of a heap of ledgers and day-books, was, sure enough, the well-remembered face of my old fellow-traveller, who rose and received me with the most lively expression of satisfaction. I, too, was rejoiced to find no change for the worse in the appearance of my friend after so severe an ordeal as a journey round the world.

I remarked in my previous paper that there was little in the person or bearing of Madame Pfeiffer (such is the name of our adventurer) to mark her out as the heroine of such a remarkable exploit. Her age may be (for in such cases we may only presume to guess) verging, perhaps, upon fifty; her stature is small, her figure slight, her features plain, her dress homely, and her whole appearance the very reverse of commanding. Her manner is remarkably quiet, not to say even humble; and it is only in conversation with her, when her dark eye kindles into animation over the recital of some passage in her travels, that one perceives any outward manifestation of the courage and enthusiasm that so remarkably distinguish her.

After exchanging our mutual congratulations, the conversation (which was carried on in French, Madame speaking English but imperfectly) naturally turned upon the subject of her recent journey. Reminding her of our original meeting on the shores of Palestine, and of the indifference with which she endured fatigue and hardship on that occasion, I playfully observed "that I considered that she had served her apprenticeship to myself, and that I had always boasted of a pupil who had left her tutor so infinitely behind." She admitted that it was even so, and that her power of bearing privation, tested in that journey, together with the taste for travelling she then acquired, had led her to meditate still more extensive wanderings.

"It was after my journey to Iceland, which followed that into Palestine—"

"Iceland! my dear madame!" I exclaimed with a sudden start. "Why, I had not the slightest notion you had ever visited that country."

"Oh yes, and published a book about it," was her quiet reply; and she immediately resumed, "after this Iceland journey, then, I left Vienna and embarked at Hamburg for Rio Janeiro, and, after remaining some time on the coasts of Brazil, penetrated into the interior, visited the savage tribes, and crossing the continent of South America, reached Valparaiso, which, as you know, is on the shores of the Pacific Ocean. Thence I crossed over to the island of Tahiti, where, during my stay, I was upon the most intimate terms with Queen Pomare. Leaving that beautiful spot, I crossed the wide Pacific Ocean to Canton, with which city I was much delighted."

"Of course," I remarked; "you do not mean the interior of the Chinese quarter, into which Europeans are not allowed to penetrate?"

"Indeed I do," was her reply. "I am, perhaps, the only person that has ever gone through it. I must admit that the attempt was rash, but I could not overcome my curiosity. Madame Gutzlaff, the Missionary's wife, assured me she had never ventured to think of such a thing."

"But how did you contrive to accomplish it?" I inquired.

"I hired two native Chinese to show me about," was her reply. "On reaching the prohibited entrance of the city it occurred to me that if I paid them there they might perhaps go off and leave me. I was obliged therefore to resort to a little stratagem. Making signs that I had no money, but showing an order upon one of the English houses of business, I pointed to the city, and expressing in the same way my desire to go through it to the English quarter, they consented to accompany me through the streets. In I ventured. Such a sight had never been seen in Canton before. The people gathered in crowds, the women held up their children as I passed along, the curiosity and amusement of the people were prodigious, and your gracious queen, on the opening of the Exhibition, could hardly be more run after than was my poor insignificant self."

"And were you not horribly afraid?" I inquired.

"Not in the least," was the reply.

"And did you meet with no insult?"

"Not the slightest. Nothing could exceed the civility of the people. After traversing the city my Chinese guides brought me to the house of the English merchant, who could scarcely believe that I had come off scatheless from so unprecedented an enterprise. Well, from Canton I visited several of the principal ports of China, and thence, touching at Singapore, made my way to Ceylon, where, not satisfied with remaining at Point de Galle, I visited the capital, Kandy. Calcutta was the next point of my journey. I ascended the Ganges on the deck of a bungalow, went far into the interior, examined the antiquities, visited the courts of some of the native princes, by whom I was kindly received, and, satisfied with my survey of India, returned to the coast, embarked for the Persian Gulf, and then ascending the Tigris, looked in upon Dr. Layard in the midst of his excavations at Nineveh."

Such a narrative of adventure, and from the mouth of a female, might well take away one's breath. I really seemed to be dreaming as I looked upon the frail little body before me, and heard her describe a devious career like this with far less excitement of manner than the mistress of a cockney boarding-school would throw into her account of the perils of a journey to Boulogne. "What next?" I inwardly exclaimed, as Madame, renewing her narrative, quietly went on.

"I entered next upon a rather dangerous journey among the countries occupied by the wandering tribes of Kurdistan. Here I more than once fell into the hands of robbers."

"You surely were not alone on this occasion?" I exclaimed.

"Entirely so," she replied; "and to that cause I probably owed my complete immunity from outrage. What could they do? They saw before them a poor unprotected woman, advanced in years and with all she possessed in the world done up in a small bundle. They would stop my horse, gaze upon me with astonishment, ask a few questions, and then suffer me to pass on unmolested. On one occasion, being exhausted with thirst, I begged for water from the leathern bottles they carry it about in, and they gave it me immediately."

"Then there are many more Robin Hoods than have ever been commemorated in song; there is honour even among thieves. Human nature is the same in the forest of Sherwood and the wilds of Kurdistan!"

"Well," she resumed; "after I had done with the Kurds, I made my way through Persia and Circassia to the shores of the Black Sea, along which I sailed to Constantinople; thence to Greece, Sicily, and Italy, and so back to my own door at Vienna, after an absence of three years. And now guess, what do you think this journey cost me?"

Having already observed the simple and self-denying habits of my old companion, I was prepared for a rather low estimate, but when I considered the mere distance she had gone over, without allowing her any thing to eat, I mentally named a figure, (a sum of several hundreds,) which some experience in travel led me to fix upon as the very minimum of her expense. What was my surprise, then, when she declared that she had performed this extensive series of wanderings into the interior of so many countries, where the means of conveyance are almost wanting, for the insignificant sum of a hundred and fifty pounds!

The next time I met Madame was at the hospitable house of a friend. She had been making the most of her short stay in London, had visited the principal objects of interest, and been present at the inauguration of the Glass Palace by her Majesty. She confessed that the vastness of London oppressed her, and it was not one of the slightest instances of her courage and self-reliance, that she boldly sallied forth one morning to make her way on foot from Hackney to Piccadilly, with nothing but an address-card, and the merest smattering of English to guide her in her devious course.

The conversation turned upon her present plans. Far from her taste for travel having been satisfied, it seemed only "to have grown by what it fed on," and she was already preparing for a second voyage around the globe. Although scientific research was not to be expected from a solitary woman, yet her travels had not been without fruit, since she had made collections in botany and entomology which formed a valuable addition to the museum of Vienna. The Austrian Government had not merely paid her for these, but had made her a present of a hundred pounds towards the prosecution of her further adventures, while the Professors had given her instructions in the best mode of preserving specimens, and collecting objects of value to science.

Her present views were to go by the Cape to Australia and New Zealand, and thence to Borneo and the islands of the Indian Archipelago. She had already taken her passage, and was to sail during the following week.

Reverting to the manner in which I had rediscovered her, I observed, that it was through a New York newspaper, under the head of "What is talked about," stating that she was in that city, after performing her voyage round the world. What was my surprise to learn, then, "that she was never there in all her life," and that the statement was a pure mystification, like so many others in which our transatlantic brethren seem to delight. "It was this account," I remarked, "that contained your adventure with a robber, stating moreover that you had valiantly defended yourself, and cut off one or two of your adversary's fingers with a knife, and that, I suppose, is also an invention of the editor's."

"On the contrary," she replied, "it is strictly true.

I was travelling through the wild interior of Brazil in company with Count —, whom you remember made one of our party to Mar Saba and the Dead Sea. We were attended by a single servant, and having understood that the road was safe, had neglected to provide ourselves with defensive weapons. On passing through a secluded spot, we were suddenly attacked by a powerful Negro armed with a sword. He rushed upon the Count, who being unable to parry the blow, received a severe wound, when I drew forth a clasp knife which I carried about my person, and in the excitement of the moment rushed upon the robber, and cut him desperately in his hands. The servant flew on the robber, the robber attacked the Count, whom I in my turn sought to defend, though drawing down vengeance on myself, but as our adversary was powerful and well armed, the issue would have been fatal to us all had not some travellers, attracted by our cries, hurried up to the spot, whereupon the Negro took to flight."

"Did you receive no injury in the conflict?" I inquired.

"Far from it, I bore away with me a lasting memento," was the reply, as she then extended her arm, enveloped in a muslin sleeve, and invited me to make an examination of it. As I did so, my hand sunk, with a sickening sensation, into a hollow, midway between the elbow and the shoulder, the token of a deep and ghastly wound, which she will carry with her to the grave.

Reminiscences such as these filled up the remainder of our interview. I was disappointed in my hope of seeing this extraordinary woman again. She has set sail upon her long and perilous enterprise, at a time of life when most persons are only anxious to repose calmly by the fireside for the remainder of their days. Notwithstanding the old proverb concerning "the pitcher and the well," let us earnestly hope that she may return safe and sound to her own home, and add another chapter to the record of her most marvellous experiences.

A SCENE IN THE APENNINES.

GEORGE BARRETT, of all our water-colour artists, delights most in depicting sunset and sunrise, and the more poetical aspects and tones of nature. There is always something exquisitely soothing in his productions. He may be termed, far better than Turner, our English Claude, since his vein of art is precisely similar, nor does he ever venture to depart from it. The subject before us admirably reflects his peculiar qualities. The vast expanse, the glowing colour, the intensity of tone, the solemn hush into which the whole landscape is sinking, are given as no other painter can give them. The engraving is a perfect gem, and fully worthy of the picture.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

"Lelio, Hervor, and other Poems." By Patrick Scott. Chapman & Hall.—We have here some original and brilliant poems from the pen of a writer whose mind is evidently imbued with the true spirit of poetry. The language is noble and chaste, the subject of the main composition is grand and new, while the sentiments are such as strongly excite the sympathy. "Lelio" is a theory of conscience, illustrated by a tale, which is coloured by a reflection of the opinions prevalent in the present day. In some of the passages, Mr. Scott's poetry reminds us of John Martin's painting. It suggests infinite grandeur, majesty, and splendour, impressing us at the same time with the idea of silence and gloom. There is a powerful attack upon various social phases of the present day, which the reader will not fail to understand. In "Hervor" we have a gallery of pictures representing the features and the feats of continental kings. In an allegorical story, Liberty is represented making a pilgrimage to an ancient tomb, in search of the sword long buried there, and Mr. Scott takes the opportunity of dealing right and left upon his contemporaries. There is no flattery in the poem, for your real poet never stoops to adulation; but there is truth, and this is the age for frankness. We are much pleased with this piece, but, of course, it is upon "Lelio" that the weight of our attention rests. It is infinitely beyond the common order of contemporary writing, and there are passages, upon which the author has been most prodigal of rich fancies and sublime conceptions.

"Recollection of Mrs. Anderson's School." By Jane M. Winnard.—Those who are familiar with our pages will need no further inducement to peruse this very agreeable and instructive tale from the graceful pen of one of our most valued contributors. It is a little book, but one which required no ordinary ability to write, for while it charms the young, for whom it is principally intended, it will be read with pleasure and satisfaction by those of graver years.

"Coleridge; his Philosophy and Theology: an Essay reprinted from the Eclectic Review."—If the test of mental superiority is the power of acting upon and stimulating other minds, the author of the "Antient Mariner" may justly be considered an extraordinary person. Many men of the highest powers have acknowledged their obligations to him. He has left behind him, indeed, no great philosophical work; but the influence he has exercised is great and lasting. The present pamphlet, written by one of Coleridge's admirers, has for its object to set forth his method of reconciling the claims of theology and philosophy, and ensuring their harmonious action. It is well worthy of perusal, for the originality and depth of its views. The character and claims of the great master are well appreciated by his commentator, himself evidently a man of original powers of mind, and wielding a forcible and practised pen.

TO THE READERS OF SHARPE.

THERE are some things in the duty of the Editor of a popular Journal, which we have always felt to be works of necessity rather than labours of love, and amongst these may be included that of Preface-writing. Not that we object to meet our readers pen in hand ; on the contrary, we never feel happier than when, seated in our editorial chair, we are either preparing an article of our own, or deciding upon the merits of those of our contributors ; but we must own that we feel an almost insurmountable difficulty in avoiding common-place platitudes on having for the fourteenth time to return thanks for "liberal support," "continued patronage," &c., and then to rehearse the oft-told tale of our "determination to merit," and "intentions to improve." So thoroughly are we satisfied of our inability to say anything of the sort, which our readers would care to peruse, that we had mentally determined to omit the usual half-yearly address in toto, but we find that we must bow to tyrant custom, and fill the page, which our printer declares that he has reserved expressly for a Preface, and the absence of which our friends, we are told, will construe into a token of disrespect. Now, with all deference to their better judgment, we think this would be treating us harshly, after we had flattered ourselves that the volume just completed was of a sufficiently sterling character to need neither introductory apology nor eulogistic prelude. We have rather been confirmed in this good opinion of the merits of our contributors and ourselves, by the knowledge that two if not more of our serial articles have already been deemed worthy of reproduction in a separate form, not only in this country, but also in the United States, where our go-ahead friends have not alone reprinted our labours as soon as published, but actually, in the case of "Lewis Arundel," (being too impatient to wait for the conclusion of the tale from the pen of the Author,) have quietly manufactured a termination of their own, and completed the work before it had appeared in our own columns. We suppose complaint is useless, but we are determined to act upon the system of reprisals, and avail ourselves of occasional selections from the pens of our Transatlantic brethren ; and though we cannot stoop to the practice of fabricating for them that which they have yet to write, we shall hold ourselves justified in introducing to the readers of SHARPE such specimens of American talent as their best living writers have already produced. Our present volume contains original translations of several pieces, which have adorned the periodical literature of our continental neighbours, and we trust that by these additions we have given increased variety to our pages, and done good service to our readers, and enabled them to judge of the comparative merits of our foreign cotemporaries.

More might be said, but we find that we have filled our prescribed space, and if we have not attained to the dignity of a preface, we have, at least, made a sufficiently lengthy apology for its absence ; we shall therefore lay down our pen with the heartfelt wish that we may meet all our old friends, and a large accession of new ones at the commencement of the new year, and that our Fifteenth Volume may be as popular as any of its predecessors.

SHARPE'S LONDON JOURNAL.

THE LAST DAYS OF THE EMPEROR ALEXANDER.'

THE knowledge of an extensively organized conspiracy embittered the last years of the Emperor Alexander, and increased his constitutional melancholy. His attachment to Tzarsko Zelo made him linger longer at his summer palace than was prudent in a man subject to crysipelas. The wound in his leg reopened with very unfavourable symptoms, and he was compelled to leave his favourite residence in a closed litter for St. Petersburg; and the skill and firmness of Mr. Wyllie, his Scotch surgeon, alone saved the diseased limb from amputation. As soon as he was cured, he returned again to Tzarsko Zelo, where the spring found him as usual alone, without a court or chamberlain, only giving audience to his ministers twice a-week. His existence resembled rather that of an anchorite weeping for the sins of his youth, than that of a great Emperor who makes the happiness of his people.

He regulated his time in the following manner:—in summer he rose at five, and in winter at six o'clock every morning, and as soon as the duties of the toilette were ended, entered his cabinet, in which the greatest order was observed.

He found there a cambric handkerchief folded, and a packet of new pens. He only used these pens in signing his name, and never made use of them again. As soon as he had concluded this business, he descended into the garden, where, notwithstanding the report of a conspiracy which had existed two years against his life and government, he walked alone with no other guards than the sentinels always stationed before the palace of Alexander. At five he returned, to dine alone, and after his solitary meal was lulled to sleep by the melancholy airs played by the military band of the guard regiment on duty. The selection of the music was always made by himself, and he seemed to sink to repose, and to awake, with the same sombre dispositions and feelings which had been his companions throughout the day.

His empress Elizabeth lived like her consort, in profound solitude, watching over him like an invisible angel. Time had not extinguished in her heart the profound passion with which the youthful Czarowitz had inspired her at first sight, and which she had preserved in her heart, pure and inviolate. His numerous and public infidelities could not stifle this holy and beautiful attachment, which formed at once the happiness and misery of a delicate and sensitive woman.

(1) Translated from the French of Alexandre Dumas, with omissions and additions, by Miss Jane Strickland.

At this period of her life, the Empress at five-and-forty retained her fine shape and noble carriage, while her countenance showed the remains of considerable beauty, more impaired by sorrow than time. Calumny itself had never dared to aim her envenomed shafts at one so eminently chaste and good. Her presence demanded the respect due to virtue, still more than the homage proper to her elevated rank.

She resembled indeed more an angel exiled from heaven, than the imperial consort of a Prince who ruled a large portion of the earth.

In the summer of 1825, the last he was destined to see, the physicians of the Emperor unanimously recommended a journey to the Crimea, as the best medicine he could take. Alexander appeared perfectly indifferent to a measure which regarded his individual benefit, but the Empress, deeply interested in any event likely to restore her husband's health, asked and obtained permission to accompany him. The necessary preparations for this long absence overwhelmed the Emperor with business, and for a fortnight he rose earlier, and went to bed later, than was customary to him.

In the month of June, no visible alteration was observed in his appearance, and he quitted St. Petersburg after a service had been chaunted, to bring down a blessing from above on his journey. He was accompanied by the Empress, his faithful coachman Ivan, and some officers belonging to the staff of General Diebitch. He stopped at Warsaw a few days, in order to celebrate the birthday of his brother, the Grand-Duke Constantine, and arrived at Tangaroff in the end of August 1825. Both the illustrious travellers found their health benefited by the change of scene and climate. Alexander took a great liking to Tangaroff, a small town on the borders of the sea of Azof, comprising a thousand ill-built houses, of which a sixth-part alone are of brick and stone, while the remainder resemble wooden cages covered with dirt. The streets are large, but then they have no pavement, and are alternately loaded with dust, or inundated with mud. The dust rises in clouds, which conceals alike man and beast under a thick veil, and penetrates everywhere the carefully closed jealousies with which the houses are guarded, and covers the garments of their inhabitants. The food, the water, are loaded with it; and the last cannot be drunk till previously boiled with salt of tartar, which precipitates it; a precaution absolutely necessary to free it from this disagreeable and dangerous deposit.

The Emperor took possession of the governor's house, where he sometimes slept and took his meals. His abode there in the day-time rarely exceeded two hours. The rest of his time was passed in wandering about the country on foot, in the hot dust or wet mud. No weather put any stop to his out-door exercise, and no advice from his medical attendant nor warning from the natives of Tangaroff, could prevail upon him to take the slightest precaution against the fatal autumnal fever of the country. His principal occupation was, planning and planting a great public garden, in which undertaking he was assisted by an Englishman whom he had brought with him to St. Petersburg for that purpose. He frequently slept on the spot on a camp-bed, with his head resting upon a leather pillow.

If general report may be credited, planting gardens was not the principal object that engrossed the Russian Emperor's attention. He was said to be employed in framing a new Constitution for Russia, and unable to contend at St. Petersburg with the prejudices of the aristocracy, had retired to this small city, for the purpose of conferring this benefit upon his enslaved country.

However this might be, the Emperor did not stay long at a time at Tangaroff, where his Empress, unable to share with him the fatigues of his long journeys, permanently resided, during his frequent absences from his head quarters. Alexander, in fact, made rapid excursions to the country about the Don, and was sometimes at Teherkask, sometimes at Donetz. He was on the eve of departure for Astracan, when Count Woronzoff in person came to announce to his sovereign the existence of the mysterious conspiracy which had haunted him in St. Petersburg, and which extended to the Crimea, where his personal presence could alone appease the general discontent.

The prospect of traversing three hundred leagues appeared a trifle to Alexander, whom rapid journeys alone diverted from his oppressive melancholy. He announced to the Empress his departure, which he only delayed till the return of a messenger he had sent to Alapka. The expected courier brought new details of the conspiracy, which aimed at the life, as well as the government of Alexander. This discovery agitated him terribly. He rested his aching head on his hands, gave a deep groan, and exclaimed, "Oh, my father, my father!" Though it was then midnight, he caused Count Diebitch to be roused from sleep and summoned into his presence. The General, who lodged in the next house, found his master in a dreadfully excited state, now traversing the apartment with hasty strides, now throwing himself upon the bed with deep sighs and convulsive starts. He at length became calm, and discussed the intelligence conveyed in the despatches of Count Woronzoff. He then dictated two, one addressed to the Viceroy of Poland, the other to the Grand-Duke Nicholas.

With these documents, all traces of his terrible agitation disappeared. He was quite calm, and his countenance betrayed nothing of the emotion that had harassed him the preceding night.

Count Woronzoff, notwithstanding this apparent calmness, found him difficult to please, and unusually irritable, for Alexander was constitutionally sweet-tempered and patient. He did not delay his journey on account of this internal disquiet, but gave orders for his departure from Tangaroff, which he fixed for the following day.

His ill-humour increased during the journey; he complained of the badness of the roads and the slowness of the horses. He had never been known to grumble before. His irritation became more apparent when Sir James Wyllie, his confidential medical attendant, recommended him to take some precaution against the frozen winds of the autumn; for he threw away with a gesture of impatience the cloak and pelisse he offered, and braved the danger he had been entreated to avoid. His imprudence soon produced consequences. That evening he caught cold, and coughed incessantly, and the following day, on his arrival at Orloff, an intermittent fever appeared, which soon after, aggravated by the obstinacy of the invalid, turned to the remittant fever common to Tangaroff and its environs in the autumn.

The Emperor, whose increasing malady gave him a presage of his approaching death, expressed a wish to return to the Empress, and once more took the route to Tangaroff; contrary to the prayers of Sir James Wyllie, he chose to perform a part of the journey on horseback, but the failure of his strength finally forced him to re-enter his carriage. He entered Tangaroff on the fifth of November, and swooned the moment he came into the governor's house. The Empress, who was suffering with a complaint of the heart, forgot her malady, while watching over her dying husband. Change of place only increased the fatal fever which preyed upon his frame, which seemed to gather strength from day to day. On the eighth, Wyllie called in Dr. Stephiegen, and on the thirteenth they endeavoured to counteract the affection of the brain, and wished to bleed the imperial patient. He would not submit to the operation, and demanded iced water, which they refused. Their denial irritated him, and he rejected everything they offered him, with displeasure. These learned men were unwise, to deprive the suffering prince of the water, a safe and harmless beverage in such fevers. In fact, nature herself sometimes, in inspiring the wish, provides the remedy. The Emperor on the afternoon of that day wrote and sealed a letter, when perceiving the taper remained burning, he told his attendant to extinguish it, in words that plainly expressed his feelings in regard to the dangerous nature of his malady. "Put out that light, my friend, or the people will take it for a bier candle, and will suppose I am already dead."

On the fourteenth of November, the physicians again urged their refractory patient to take the medicines they prescribed, and were seconded by the prayers of the Empress. He repulsed them with some haughtiness, but quickly repenting of his hastiness of temper, which in fact was one of the symptoms of the disease, he said, "Attend to me, Stephiegen, and you too, Sir Andrew Wyllie. I have much pleasure in seeing you, but you plague me so often about your medicine, that really I must give up your company if you will talk of nothing else." He however was at last induced to take a dose of calomel.

In the evening, the fever had made such fearful progress that it appeared necessary to call in a priest. Sir Andrew Wyllie, at the instance of the Empress, entered the chamber of the dying prince, and approaching his bed with tears in his eyes advised him "to call in the aid of the Most High, and not to refuse the assistance of religion as he had already done that of medicine."

The Emperor instantly gave his consent. Upon the fifteenth, at five o'clock in the morning, a humble village priest approached the imperial bed to receive the confession of his expiring sovereign.—"My father, God must be merciful to kings," were the first words the Emperor addressed to the minister of religion; "indeed they require it so much more than other men." In this sentence all the trials and temptations of the despotic ruler of a great people—his territorial ambition, his jealousy, his political ruses, his distrusts and over-confidences, seem to be briefly comprehended. Then apparently perceiving some timidity in the spiritual confessor his destiny had provided for him, he added, "My father, treat me like an erring man, not as an Emperor." The priest drew near the bed, received the confession of his august penitent, and administered to him the last sacraments.

Then having been informed of the Emperor's pertinacity in rejecting medicine, he urged him to give up this fatal obstinacy, remarking, "that he feared God would consider it absolutely suicidal." His admonitions made a deep impression upon the mind of the prince, who recalled Sir Andrew Wyllie, and giving him his hand, bade him do what he pleased with him. Wyllie took advantage of this absolute surrender, to apply twenty leeches to the head of the emperor, but the application was too late, the burning fever continually increased, and the sufferer was given over. The intelligence filled the dying chamber with weeping domestics, who tenderly loved their master.

The Empress still occupied her place by the bed-side, which she had never quitted but once, in order to allow her dying husband to unbosom himself in private to his confessor. She returned to the post assigned her by conjugal tenderness directly the priest had quitted it.

Two hours after he had made his peace with God, Alexander experienced more severe pain than he had yet felt; "Kings," said he, "suffer more than others." He had called one of his attendants to listen to this remark with the air of one communicating a secret. He stopped, and then as if recalling something he had forgotten, said in a whisper, "they have committed an infamous action."

What did he mean by these words? Was he suspicious that his days had been shortened by poison? or did he allude, with the last accents he uttered, to the barbarous assassination of the Emperor Paul? Eternity can alone reveal the secret thoughts of Alexander I. of Russia.

During the night, the dying prince lost consciousness. At two o'clock in the morning, Count Diebitch came to the Empress, to inform her that an old man, named Alexandrowitz, had saved many Tartars in the same malady. A ray of hope entered the heart of the imperial consort at this information, and Sir Andrew Wyllie ordered him to be sought for with haste.

This interval was passed by the Empress in prayer, yet she still kept her eyes fixed upon those of her husband, watching with intense attention the beams of life and light fading in their unconscious gaze. At nine in the morning, the old man was brought into the imperial chamber almost by force. The rank of the patient, perhaps, inspiring him with some fear respecting the consequences that might follow his prescriptions, caused his extreme unwillingness. He approached the bed, looked at his dying sovereign, and shook his head. He was questioned respecting this doubtful sign. "It is too late to give him medicine; besides, those I have cured were not sick of the same malady."

With these words of the peasant physician, the last hopes of the Empress vanished; but if pure and ardent prayers could have prevailed with God, Alexander would have been saved.

On the sixteenth of November, according to the usual method of measuring time, but on the first of December, if we follow the Russian calendar, at fifty minutes after ten in the morning, Alexander Paulowit, Emperor of all the Russias, expired. The Empress, bending over him, felt the departure of his last breath. She uttered a bitter cry, sank upon her knees, and prayed. After some minutes passed in communion with heaven, she rose, closed the eyes of her deceased lord, composed his features, kissed his cold and livid hands, and once more knelt and prayed.

The physicians entreated her to leave the chamber of death, and the pious Empress consented to withdraw to her own.¹

The body of the Emperor lay in state, on a platform raised in an apartment of the house where he died. The presence-chamber was hung with black, and the bier was covered with cloth of gold. A great many wax tapers lighted up the gloomy scene. A priest at the head of the bier prayed continually for the repose of his deceased sovereign's soul. Two sentinels with drawn swords watched day and night beside the dead, two were stationed at the doors, and two stood on each step leading to the bier. Every person received at the door a lighted taper, which he held while he remained in the apartment. The Empress was present during these masses, but she always fainted

(1) The autopsy exhibited the same appearance generally discovered in those subjects whose death has been caused by the fever of the country: the brain was watery, the veins of the head were gorged, and the liver was soft. No signs of poison were discovered; the death of the Emperor was in the course of nature.

at the conclusion of the service. Crowds of people united their prayers to hers, for the Emperor was adored by the common people. The corpse of Alexander I. lay in state twenty-one days before it was removed to the Greek monastery of St. Alexander, where it was to rest before its departure for interment in St. Petersburg.

Upon the 25th December, the remains of the Emperor were placed on a funeral car drawn by eight horses, covered to the ground with black cloth ornamented with the escutcheons of the empire. The bier rested on an elevated dais, carpeted with cloth of gold; over the bier was laid a flag of silver tissue, charged with the heraldic insignia proper to the imperial house. The imperial crown was placed under the dais. Four major-generals held the cords which supported the diadem. The persons composing the household of the Emperor and Empress followed the bier dressed in long black mantles, bearing in their hands lighted torches. The Cossacks of the Don every minute discharged their light artillery, while the sullen booming of the cannon added to the solemnity of the imposing scene.

Upon its arrival at the church, the body was transferred to a catafalco covered with red cloth, surmounted by the imperial arms in gold, displayed on crimson velvet. Two steps led up to the platform on which the catafalco was placed. Four columns supported the dais upon which the imperial crown, the sceptre, and the globe, rested.

The catafalco was surrounded by curtains of crimson velvet and cloth of gold, and four massy candelabra, at the four corners of the platform, bore wax tapers sufficient to dispel the darkness, but not to banish the gloom pervading the church, which was hung with black embroidered with white crosses. The Empress made an attempt to assist at this funeral service, but her feelings overpowered her, and she was borne back to the palace in a swoon; but as soon as she came to herself, she entered the private chapel, and repeated there the same prayers then reciting in the church of St. Alexander.

While the remains of the Emperor Alexander were on their way to their last home, the report of his dangerous state, which had been forwarded officially to the Grand-Duke Nicholas, was contradicted by another document, which bore date of the 29th of November, announcing that considerable amendment had taken place in the Emperor's health, who had recovered from a swoon of eight hours' duration, and had not only appeared collected, but declared himself improved in health.

Whether this was a political ruse of the conspirators or the new Emperor remains quite uncertain; however, a solemn Te Deum was ordered to be celebrated in the cathedral of Casan, at which the Empress Mother and the Grand-Dukes Nicholas and Michael were present. The joyful crowds assembled at this service scarcely left the imperial family and their suite a free space for the exercise of their devotions. Towards the end of the Te Deum, while the sweet voices of the choir were rising in harmonious concert to heaven, some official person informed the Grand Duke Nicholas, that a courier from Tangaroff had arrived with the last despatch, which he refused to deliver into any hand but his own. Nicholas was conducted into the sacristy, and with one glance at the messenger divined the nature of the document of which he was the bearer. The letter he presented was sealed with black. Nicholas recognised the hand-writing of the Empress Consort, and hastily opening it, read these words,—

“Our angel is in heaven; I still exist on earth, but I hope soon to be re-united to him.”

The bishop was summoned into the sacristy by the new Emperor, who gave him the letter, with directions to break the fatal tidings it contained to the Empress Mother with the tenderest care. He then returned to his place by the side of his august parent, who alone, of the thousands assembled there, had perceived his absence.

An instant after, the venerable bishop re-entered the choir, and silenced the notes of praise and exultation with a motion of his hand. Every voice became mute, and the stillness of death reigned throughout the sacred edifice. In the midst of the general astonishment and attention he walked slowly to the altar, took up the massy silver crucifix which decorated it, and throwing over that symbol of earthly sorrow and divine hope a black veil, he approached the Empress Mother, and gave her the crucifix in mourning to kiss.

The Empress uttered a cry, and fell with her face on the pavement;—she comprehended at once that her eldest son was dead.

The Empress Elizabeth soon realized the sorrowful hope she had expressed. Four months after the death of her consort she died on the way from Tangaroff, at Beloff, and soon rejoined him she had pathetically termed “her angel in heaven.”

The historical career of the Emperor Alexander is well known to every reader, but the minor matters of every-day life mark the man, while public details properly denote the sovereign.

The faults of Alexander are comprised in his infidelity to a beautiful, accomplished, and affectionate wife. He respected her even while wounding her delicate feelings by his criminal attachments to other women. After many years of mental pain, the injured Elizabeth gave him the choice of giving her up, or banishing an imperious mistress, by whom the Emperor had a numerous family.

Alexander could not resolve to separate for ever from his amiable and virtuous consort,—he made the sacrifice she required of him.

His gallantry sometimes placed him in unprincipled situations, and brought him in contact with persons immeasurably beneath him. He once fell in love with a tailor's wife at Warsaw, and not being well acquainted with the character of the pretty grisette, construed her acceptance of the visit he proposed making her, into approbation of his suit. The fair Pole was too simple, and had been too virtuously brought up, to comprehend his intentions. Her husband was absent, so she thought it would not be proper to receive the imperial visit alone; she made, therefore, a re-union of her own and her husband's relations—rich people of the bourgeoisie class—and when the Emperor entered her saloon, he found himself in company with thirty or forty persons, to whom he was immediately introduced by his fair and innocent hostess. The astonished sovereign was obliged to make himself agreeable to the party, none of whom appear to have divined his criminal intentions. He made no further attempt to corrupt the innocence of this beautiful woman, whose simplicity formed the safeguard of her virtue.

A severe trial separated him for ever from his last mistress, who had borne him a daughter; this child was the idol of his heart, and to form her mind was the pleasure of his life. At eighteen the young lady eclipsed every woman in his empire by her dazzling beauty and graceful manners. Suddenly she was seized with an infectious fever, for which no physician in St. Petersburg could find a remedy. Her mother, selfish and timid, deserted the sick chamber of the suffering girl, over whom the bitter tears of a father were vainly shed, while he kept incessant vigils over one whom he would have saved from the power of the grave at the expense of his life and empire. The dying daughter asked incessantly for her mother, upon whose bosom she desired to breathe her last sigh, but neither the passionate entreaties nor the commands of the imperial lover could induce the unnatural parent to risk her health by granting the interview for which her poor child craved, and she expired in the arms of her father, without the consolation of bidding her mother a last adieu.

Some days after the death of his natural daughter, the Emperor Alexander entered the house of an English officer to whom he was much attached. He was in deep mourning, and appeared very unhappy:

"I have just followed to the grave," he said, "as a private person the remains of my poor child, and I cannot yet forgive the unnatural woman who deserted the death-bed of her daughter. Besides, my sin, which I never repented of, has found me out, and the vengeance of God has fallen upon its fruits. Yes, I deserted the best and most amiable of wives, the object of my first affection, for women who neither possessed her beauty nor merit. I have preferred to the Empress even this unnatural mother, whom I now regard with loathing and horror. My wife shall never again have cause to reproach my broken faith."

Devotion and his strict adherence to his promise balm'd the wound, which, however, only death could heal. To the secret agony which through life had haunted the bosom of the son was added that of the father, and the return of Alexander to the paths of virtue and religion originated in the loss of this beloved daughter, smitten, he considered, for his sins.

The friendship of this prince for Madam Krudener had nothing criminal in its nature, though it furnished a theme for scandal to those who are apt to doubt the purity of Platonic attachments between individuals of opposite sexes.

In regard to this emperor's political career, full of ambition and stratagem, we can only re-echo his dying words to his confessor:—"God must be merciful to kings!" His career, however varied by losses on the field or humiliated by treaties, ended triumphantly with the laurels of war and the olives of peace; and he bore to his far northern empire the keys of Paris as a trophy of his arms. His moderation demands the praise of posterity, and excited the admiration of the French nation at large.¹ His immoral conduct as a man and a husband was afterwards effaced by his sincere repentance, and he died in the arms of the most faithful and affectionate of wives, who could not long survive her irreparable loss. His death was deeply lamented by his subjects, who, if they did not enrol his name among the greatest of their rulers, never have hesitated to denote him as the best and most merciful sovereign who ever sat upon the Russian throne.

PETER AFFLECK;

OR, THE PORTALS OF SCIENCE.

(A DUNDEE STORY.)

BY W. W. FYFE.

AMONGST the numerous organs of public opinion that have seen the light in the ancient and royal burgh of Dundee, there was one which we question whether any person now living be old enough to remember. It has long since descended to "the tomb of all the Capulets." But in its peaceful and prosperous days, ere party discussions disturbed the land, every true man paid for his paper; every syllable which the voracious print contained was matter of firm, conscientious belief to town and country; and the most problematical reports or opinions were infallibly stamped with authenticity the moment they obtained the imprimatur of the press. In these halcyon days, an aged printer, from whom we many years ago received an account of the following whimsical incidents, was initiated in the mysteries of the black art of Dr. Faustus, in the humble capacity of a printer's devil—a very harmless sort of imp in general, who may principally be regarded as the victim of appearances, which, as he is usually well begrimed with lamp-black, are certainly against him. Our friend, however distinguished in after life as an author and a scholar, was, by the universal assent of the town, allowed to be "an auld farrant laddie,"—a character which, if it destroyed his proper standing amongst the boys of the different "traps," or streets, engaged from year's end to year's end in a warfare of missiles, which, had Mr. Macadam's system of road-making then been known, would have been fearful to contemplate, gained for the youthful printer an unwonted degree of consideration from the "douce" seniors of the community. Amongst the worthy patrons and admirers of the "auld farrant laddie" was Mr. Peter Affleck, his quondam teacher; but who, having in fact exhausted upon the young prodigy his entire stock of literature, science, and art, had now, in a manner, changed places with the boy, and literally looked up to him as a miracle—but a miracle of his own creation, which made a very great difference indeed to "the master;" for it is not to be supposed he could be so devoid of professional feeling as not to have cogent reasons for overlooking the pedantry and self-importance which, in common with most of his brethren of the birch, Mr. Affleck manifested on all proper occasions. In truth, it soothed his pride to fancy that the astonishing gifts of intelligence which the printer's apprentice began to display were nothing less than natural results of the extra pains bestowed on his instruction. The master thought he beheld but the reflection of his own genius in the brightness of his pupil. He was, therefore, very favourably disposed to listen at all times to the wonderful recitals which young "blackie" (who soon learned how to avail himself of the good man's credulity) did not fail to pour forth in reference to the mysteries of the printing-office. It never appeared that Peter's ideas on the subject arrived at a more definite shape than that of vague astonishment and admiration. He resembled a faithfully attached friend of a certain philosopher, whom a great phrenologist pronounced to be composed of wonder and adhesiveness. Peter wondered, indeed, as much as Katerfelto,

"With his hair on end,
At his own wonders wondering for his bread."

Those who may account it strange that such should be the case must remember that we speak of a long by-gone period. The schoolmaster had not been abroad in those days; and the circuit of his information was sometimes inconceivably limited. That of Peter Affleck's was, perhaps, still more so than might otherwise have been the case, had he spent all his days amidst the bustle of a town. But for many long years had he been thrown back on the very meagre resources of his own mind, whilst settled as a schoolmaster amidst the dreary wastes of the Shetland Isles. A character of great natural simplicity had not well been able to resist the contagion of intense ignorance and prevalent superstition; and, if well read in a few classic authors, a master of the dead languages, and versed in some points of abstruse science, as regarded modern inventions and matters of every-day life the poor schoolmaster was therefore nearly as ignorant as a child. The intuitive perception of this on the part of the young printer was consistent with character; and his zeal to impart information to one to whom he had hitherto been indebted very greatly, outran his discretion. Of one fixed idea Mr.

Affleck became at length possessed in consequence of the boy's prelections; and we are sorry to say that it is doubtful if more than one ever vegetated in his mind on the subject. After ponderous cogitation and long rumination, the worthy schoolmaster felt thrilled with the awful and mysterious conviction that the printing and publishing offices in question were "The Portals of Science." What precise notion he may have attached to this, if he attached any, we cannot pretend to say; the exact form taken by the esteemed pedagogue's conclusions is that which we have given.

We must by no means omit to mention that Mr. Peter Affleck had a son—the very opposite in all respects of his worthy father—as rough as he was dignified, and as mischievous as he was sedate. When, therefore, young Peter was everlastingly teased and taunted with the example of our friend of the printing-office, the latter, his trade, office, and all concerned, became excessively distasteful in his eyes; and it was with no great good-will that Master Affleck heard of his father's intention to take an early opportunity of entering "The Portals of Science," for the express purpose of awakening the dormant faculties of young Hopeful to the importance of knowledge. In deep consultation with his favourite pupil it was resolved that the most appropriate moment for executing this project, which had long lain near the good man's heart, should be one which, in point of interest, should resemble the moment of projection of the alchemists. It will be easily surmised that, however compatible with the degree of veneration entertained by the schoolmaster, this was not in reality the most auspicious time that could have been chosen for intruding upon the bustle of the printing-office. The fact is, that there were posts even in those days, and even "latest news;" and that these conflicting elements produced fully as great a ferment in that day as in the present, when the sands of time are running out and intelligence pouring in. It was, nevertheless, decided that such should be the precise instant of the preceptor's approach.

It is necessary to describe the house appropriated for the purposes of the press, although it is long since numbered amongst the things that were. It stood in a well-known part of the town, denominated "the Vault." Two back streets, connected by a thoroughfare, went under this name, one of which was, however, more properly St. Clement's Lane, and the other, which sufficiently attested the accuracy of its name by the hollow reverberations retorted to the tread of men and the hoofs of animals by its resounding causeway, was the Vault. The two streets already mentioned defile from the principal oblong square of the town, called the High Street, at either side of the public building containing the town-house and, formerly, the jail; but which is well known to occupy the site of the great church and cemetery of St. Clement's, a fabric of extreme antiquity, not even supposed to have survived so far down as the Reformation. Connected with this ecclesiastical edifice there had been one of those numerous monastic institutions in which the town of Dundee so much abounded, that at its sack and pillage by the celebrated general of the Restoration, one of the gay cavaliers of the Claverhouse faction roundly swore that, for his part, he could always have foretold that the ging-eared worshippers of "the jug and the lily," (a pot sustaining a daffodil being the insignia of the town,) would be ruined by a Monk. The ruins of the cloister and monastic cells partly existed in the rear of the town-house even in our day; and the latter were actually converted in the progress of improvement into "lock-ups" for the adjoining police-office. Thus in the penitential cell, where some holy ascetic had lashed and lacerated his frame under the influence of his creed, the drunken brawler was in after-times doomed to repent at leisure of his transgressions. At the time of which we speak, there had, however, been no such use made of the cells. On the contrary, the place in which they were situated, a narrow strip of green vacant grass behind the town-house, bordered on one side by the low and mouldering ruins of the cloister, and, beyond, hemmed in by a confused huddle of dwelling-houses, was rarely, if ever, visited; and then with footsteps awed by dread. There was no positive superstition attached to the place more than to any common place of sepulture; but what gave it somewhat of an ominous character was the accredited report of subterraneous passages and empty labyrinths that led to nothing, of which, indeed, the very ring of the vaulted street adjoining was enough to satisfy the passer-by, especially in the lone and silent night as he hurried homewards. More than this, there stood within the precincts of the sort of cul de sac called the Vault, an ancient hostellerie, constructed in the form prescribed by our ancestors for these houses of public entertainment, viz. with a walled court-yard in front, above the gateway of which creaked and swung the huge emblazoned sign; and with innumerable small, as well as some large apartments, with quaint bow-windows. This old hostellerie had, by dint of breaking through doors, and ingeniously connecting new and old buildings, been, in fact, converted into the printing-premises in question. And, strange to tell, from that day forth, as if the imps of darkness had sunk dismayed before the quenchless light of knowledge, the evil repute of the neighbourhood, especially of the subterranean vaults and of the ancient ruins, had in a measure ceased.

Whether the frequenters of the house of revelry had more than necessary to do in sustaining the superstitious feelings originally attached to the spot, is uncertain. Perhaps they found the passages excavated by the monks convenient, in the same way as the inhabitants of Eyemouth, in former times, when smuggling was more prevalent, which is said to have occasioned more of that town to be built under the ground than above it. Be this as it may, although the preternatural appearances in and around the Vault were less talked of latterly than they once had been, nothing is more certain than the fact that the man who was now ready to be the first to enter the "Portals of Science" would have been about the last to enter the subterranean purlieus of the Vault. As for his son and heir, most places, indeed, were alike to him; he was even familiar with one of the very arcana of the ancient town, called "Little Hell," from its many abominations, and long since removed to make way for the fashionable Union Street, running parallel to the old thoroughfare of Couthe's Wynd, gifted by King James IV., in one of his gaberbunzie moods, to a bold flesher named Couthe, who had done his majesty, when beset at the approach of his own palace at Whitehall adjoining, service similar to that of Jock Howieson on Cramond Brig.

Mr. Peter Affleck and his hopeful son—who, by the way, added to his father's aggravation at his general conduct by a habit he had contracted of expressing himself invariably in the pure vernacular, which in Forfarshire presents a broader Doric aspect than perhaps anywhere in Scotland—entered the "Portals of Science" by advice of their friend at court, the young apprentice, precisely as the clock struck twelve on the night of publication, and within a comparatively short time of the hour when the mail, by which the newspapers were then franked by the member for the Burghs, must be despatched. Their coming had been casually hinted at, and indeed encouraged, though by no means anticipated at such a conjuncture, on the part of the master-printer, whose usual urbanity, however, completely gave way on beholding the inauspicious visitation. The compositors were busy at their posts rattling up the "latest news," as if for life or death; the foreman was driving everything before him; the master and reader had resigned his functions of corrector of the press, in the consciousness of inaccuracies being now of less consequence than the delay of rectifying them. He stood with watch in hand at the "stone," or imposing-table, urging every possible sort of exertion to catch the post, when the unhappy schoolmaster and his son appeared upon the scene.

"For mercy's sake, Mr. Affleck," cried the printer, "could ye no come in the morn? Ye see we're just at touch and go."

"Eh, father," suggested Hopeful, "they're just at touch and go. Come awa' and see."

"Silence, Peter," said the schoolmaster, with an air somewhat betwixt the word of command, and an expression of mortification. "Certainly, sir, surely," he replied to the printer; but at the same time advanced farther into the composing-room after his son, who had espied his father's ally, the apprentice, at another part of the apartment. The printing-office was not, indeed, furnished with those sliding panels which figure in the romances of Mrs. Radcliffe; but it so happened that in the course of its construction various doors, almost equally mysterious, had been opened for convenience-sake in the old panneling, of which, indeed, they were composed, leading to the numerous interior staircases or flights of steps, that still perplex the mazes of very old houses. Our friend, the "auld farrent laddie," alarmed for the consequence of his share in the schoolmaster's inapposite intrusion, pulled up one of these doors, which happened to be at his hand, significantly facilitating thereby the egress of the Afflecks; and the father, seizing the son by the collar, after a preliminary shaking and another stern injunction of silence, plunged through the aperture, whilst the door, being made to close with what is termed "a pace," relapsed into its position, hardly to be distinguished on either side from the rest of the panelling, as soon as the apprentice relaxed his hold;—so closely was it fitted to prevent draught, that sound was nearly excluded as well as air.

The hurry of the composing-room went on for nearly an hour, the bustle was subsiding, for the point at which they had been driving was all but gained, when those within began to have leisure to attend to a series of scuffling noises which seemed to proceed from behind the wainscot. It seems that Mr. Affleck and his son had got beyond the door in the wainscoting, but no further, and were then left in utter darkness. There was another door beyond it which opened on the stair; but this being also closed for the same reason as the first, and in the same manner, had eluded the search alike of father and son, though diligently plied, from the confusion caused by the mouldings of the wainscot all around where they were now immured. Whilst engaged in their exertions to extricate themselves, and confident every moment of accomplishing that point, the father in stern whispers, enforced by desperate shakings, still enjoined silence on his son, from shame probably at the prospect of being detected blundering in the passage, or possibly from a natural unwillingness to be the cause of interrupting the pressure of business within. The youngster was with difficulty kept down, and the joint release of the pair was in reality owing at length to his breaking bounds. Two points of apparent egress they had, indeed, almost at once discovered; but neither of these fulfilled the conditions required at the moment. The first of these was a fire-place, which, despite his son's asseverations of its leading to the "lum head," the worthy dominie had not exactly made up his mind for either attempting himself, or suffering the daring explorer of "Little Hell" to attempt. The other was a closet, or as Hopeful pronounced it, a "bunker." But then it was a bunker such as the schoolmaster's entire mathematical powers were puzzled to define. This recess was, indeed, neither horizontal, nor was it perpendicular, being formed of the space betwixt the roof of a lower stair, which caused its floor to dip at a very considerable angle, and to a rather alarming extent when fathomed in perfect darkness,—and of the underside of a garret-stair, which presented zigzag inequalities following the dip of the lower section. It somewhat on the whole resembled a large  which has tumbled over. This mysterious aperture, whilst it gave hope baffled escape. With the fireplace the dilemma was trifling. It was either to sally up its ample gorge, through the soot, or to remain where they were. But this other insidious and alluring man-trap was a matter more perplexing, the more especially as presenting itself for the only means of egress to be perceived, at least by groping in the place. Young Affleck had penetrated its mysteries very speedily, had he been permitted; and, as it was, repeatedly dived farther into the recess than his agitated parent was at all pleased with. Round and round and round groped the twain; till, at last, a horrible suspicion began to fill the schoolmaster's mind with a vivid superstitious dread to which since a sojourner in Shetland he had almost been a stranger,—he had begun to conceive that he and his son had been bewitched. He placed his hand on Hopeful's mouth, however, with a lingering reluctance to draw on any exposure to the compositors, before communicating this alarming conviction; and it was only in consequence of being unable to prevent the kicks of desperation that ensued the information, that their deliverance was effected.

"Preserve us a', Mestir Affleck!" cried the master of the house, "glowering," as Hopeful afterwards asserted, into the recess. "Whare hae ye been a' this time? What for did ye no cry out?"

"Yer stairs turned upside doon," said the junior, shaking himself loose from the parent gripe, whilst the poor dumbfounded schoolmaster mumbled something unintelligibly by way of apology, and was hurrying off in the direction in which he had originally entered the premises.

"Upside doon!" cried the printer, in astonishment, as he directed young Hopeful to hold the one door whilst opening the other, till by the light streaming through he perceived that all was as usual. "This way, Mr. Affleck," he added, "this way;" now fully and fairly persuaded that the worthy pedagogue had screwed his courage up to enter "the Portals of Science" at dead of night, by imbibing somewhat too strong potations: "here's the stair, sir; here's the stair." So saying, the printer, to whom our dominie, more and more ashamed, astounded, and confused, muttered a still more unintelligible apology, vanished beyond the inner wainscot. The father and son thus directed, managed this time to effect their escape by the staircase, the former still continuing his ejaculations:—

"Never mind, never mind—sorry to trouble you," &c. At length, with a sigh, like one relieved of an oppressive burden, he observed to his son that he had given up all hopes of ever getting out, and rushed down the inside stair followed by Hopeful, shouting,

"Heth! I'm gled we've won oot! Father, giv' thae be the Portels o' Science, I do'ot if we'll be muckle enlightened by this visitation."

"Silence, Peter," cried the father, resuming his ordinary equanimity, but continuing his rapid flight down stairs; "truth lies at the bottom of a well." So saying, he discovered that he had reached the limits of his descent by that rather awkward movement which a person makes in taking a step too many, and bringing himself unexpectedly in contact with the ground. They were still in utter darkness, and the response of the son rather grated on the father's ear, as he rejoined:—

"I dinna care whare it lies, if I were anee oot o' this hole."

The fact was, that Mr. Affleck, followed by his son, instead of rising to the street had, in his confusion, rapidly hurried down an extra stair, and that led to a cellar, if cellar it could be called, which was neither more nor less than one of the redoubtable vaults of the locality. And when the honest man spoke of a well, little did he think that if there were any truth in his proposition he should soon run so narrow a chance of finding it out in person. The subterranean apartment in which the two were now plunged was, like their former man-trap, notable for two things; and one of these was a well, the other being a subterraneous passage, supposed to lead from some catacombs, unexplored, to the old crypt of St. Clement's, passing on its way through the cellar. Well and passage were remarkable for one common feature. No one knew whether the well had a bottom; it was only certain that it had no top; at all events no covering. And as for the passage, although it had been shrewdly suspected of having served the jolly monks once on a day to pass to the refectory of the old Hospice for the comfort of their carnal men in seasons of mortification, no one had ever ventured to explore it within the knowledge or memory of living man. Not so Mr. Peter Affleck and his offspring. Before they were many hours older, they had fathomed both these mysteries.

On gathering himself up, the recently prostrated schoolmaster began to feel all his superstitious fears returning. What was worse, from the previous instance of the effect of communicating them to his son, he was debarred the solace, which is sometimes considerable, of sharing his terrors. He felt, however, more firmly convinced than ever that he was suffering from the cantrips of witchcraft. Something, nevertheless, behoved to be done. Stumbling and poking about in the cellar, he had just got upon the verge of the yawning well, when young Peter, who had narrowly escaped the danger, judging by his father's voice that he must be near it, exclaimed, on approaching:—"Tak' care, father, tak' care; there's another trap, wantin' the stair. Tak' care, or ye'll whumble ower, head foremost, wi' an awfu' squelsh; an' am thinkin' we're far enough doon alreddy."

Mr. Peter Affleck was about to reply, by suiting the action to the word, when, mistaking the direction in which the danger lay, he unfortunately precipitated himself into the well, clutching at his son and dragging him along with him, whilst their cries, resounding through the dismal vaults, startled something that fitted away as if on leaden wings into the distance, and even roused some neighbouring cock, which forthwith faintly crew, as if ever so far away. Fortunately the well, if deep, was not wide, and Peter's person having in his fall been thrown in the first instance across it, he descended by the feet—a considerable distance, however—spasmodically throwing out his legs against the sides of the aperture, and aided by the obstruction which he carried along with him in the shape of his son, he found himself ultimately brought up in the shaft or pit into which he had sunk. Freezing with affright in this cruel position, neither father nor son could for a length of time muster spirit to stir. Young Peter at last commenced his escape from the depths; and the well being lined with brick, or perhaps cement in blocks, pieces of which had given away, afforded to one by no means unaccustomed to such exertions an easy mode of access. To do the youth justice, he encouraged his father by every means in his power to follow his example; but it was not until he had stripped his jacket, and let it down by one sleeve, so as to afford the father a hold of the other, that with much pain and difficulty the schoolmaster found himself, more dead than alive, on what he rather hoped than believed might be terra firma.

The state of the schoolmaster, as he lay on the damp cellar floor, quaking with intense alarm, was truly pitiable. It was less the recent sense of imminent danger, or the re-action of the effort of self-preservation—an instinct which exerts itself too powerfully in the human breast to be easily overcome—than the state of moral perturbation in which this renewal of his former perplexities in an aggravated form produced, principally occasioned by his northern superstitions. Hours seemed to pass before the miserable man was re-invigorated for action. They were not in reality hours, except in the amount of agony compressed into them; but both to father and son, in their perfect despair, these fearful moments absolutely distended into ages of interminable, unendurable, and speechless fear. At length the elder Affleck, after making some desperate lounges—raised upon his elbow—such as Mr. Kean exhibits in the closing conflict of Richard III., regained his feet at such a distance from the well as he deemed to be safe, and, as good fortune would have it, felt that he had approximated to the side or wall of the cavern. He rightly enough surmised, that in cautiously groping his way along by its guidance, he was tolerably secure, at all events, from pitfalls, and might, perhaps, arrive at the point of egress.

Slowly and silently piloting their way by the wall, father and son, revived slightly by this assurance, moved onwards. Ere long, they turned an angle, but afraid to relinquish their hold upon the wall, continued still to steer their course by its means. On and on they went, slowly but surely, the atmosphere becoming damper and denser as they advanced; the space, too, through which they moved, becoming, or rather feeling more contracted; and what proved most harrowing to their feelings, they were perceptibly descending deeper and deeper beneath the surface. At length the younger, unable amidst his fears to resist the impulse of curiosity, stretched forth his hand; half a step from the wall along which he had been feeling brought it in contact with a similar wall beyond it. He instantly pronounced, in a tone of cheerfulness, which smote, however, most diabolically on the parent ear, that they were in "Little Hell." The schoolmaster relieved his troubled spirit by a groan, and was ready to faint. He felt that sort of dread sensation which a strong writer—not a transatlantic one—has supposed a man would feel, if with his body at the temperature of red-hot iron, a plate of ice were thrust down from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet. A cold shiver thrilled through the midst of his terrible agitation, and the chattering of his teeth sounded through the subterranean passage like the solemn click of the "death watch" in an antique chamber. At that moment a rushing as of air smote upon their faces, and the leaden flapping of wings was heard once more. They had arrived at a point where the passage they were threading appeared to diverge in two directions, down one of which—that along the wall whereof they were advancing—Apollyon himself seemed, judging by the noise of wings, to be now coming upon them. They were pretty well decided already, as far as decision could be the property of faculties now so completely unhinged as theirs, that it was too late to recede. But the diverging path opportunely served for a flight of desperation. Terror added wings to their speed. To their surprise, the ground appeared now to rise, although they were sensible that they were not retracing their steps. The atmosphere became less suffocating and sepulchral, and, blessed be heaven! they thought that in the distance they could faintly discern a gloomy twilight. But the horrible wings were in pursuit! Nearer and nearer they came. Peter and his son literally flew along the narrow passage as if pursued by fate. But, alas! as they seemed about to emerge from the Cimmerian darkness into the spot which "counterfeited gloom," of rather produced it without any counterfeit, a small keg or barrel, which somehow lay in the way, tripped the foremost, father or son, we forget which, and father, son, and barrel, were speedily rolling over and over on the damp floor of the passage, whilst, brushing with loathsome proximity to their faces and persons, a huge overgrown bat, the most terrified party, perhaps, of the lot, flapped lazily over them, and almost instantly soaring upwards, disappeared. The fresh morning air, whose influence was very perceptible in the position in which the dominie and his son now found themselves, operated favourably, after a time, in their revivification, for this crowning catastrophe had well-nigh deprived both of animation, when it was discovered by one or other that they lay adjacent to a flight of steps.

Joyfully, at least with a melancholy pleasure,—a pleasure which, like all others, being comparative, was, in their case, not far short of the superlative degree, owing to the ordeal through which they had passed to reach it, for "sweet is pleasure after pain,"—they emerged into the morning moonlight, as it was not yet dawn, where it lay sleeping as in dreams upon the low broken columns of the ruined cloister, and saw it chequered by scattered shadows of decay and desolation on the small green patch of grass that remained unprofaned of the cemetery of St. Clement's. To climb the gate which guarded this property of the "common guild" was no easy task; but it was nothing compared with what our adventurers had undergone. The memory of that night never faded from the recollection of either. It is almost superfluous to say that the scholars of Peter Affleck that morning missed him for once from his post; and that young Hopeful, who, something loth however, had been deputed to announce that his father had a "sair heid," added, in confidence, his own particular explanation of the overnight exploits that had occasioned it, and even volunteered to lead the forlorn hope of an exploring party through the mazes whose secrets he had thus been privy to unravelling. We may add that the project was not at all popular, and was never undertaken, chiefly from the visible disinclination of young Affleck himself, when it came to the point, to stand to his word. As for his father, he had no stomach for the undertaking, and it was long ere he could so much as endure a reference even to the "Portals of Science," which he dropped from amongst his habitual topics of discussion; and if he manifested any continuance of favouritism for "the auld farrent laddie," we have reason to believe he never again put to the test his influence for gaining him admission to inspect the marvels of the printing-office.

Great changes have come over the localities referred to since these ludicrous events transpired; so great, that few will be able to recognise them. The ruins have been almost totally removed, and replaced by places of durance vile, and other public offices. The hostelry has been totally or partially rebuilt and heightened, and in lieu of a printing-office has become a tavern once more. The vaults are still there, roofed over by the reverberating public causeway, but they are blocked up in all directions, and used extensively as wine merchants' cellars. The aversion of old Affleck to speak much or at all of his subterranean researches tended to restrict the legend of the existence of subterranean passages, as before, to the rising generation. And the enterprise of the son being effectually damped towards the prosecution of any discovery in that direction, all recollection of these mysterious labyrinths was speedily lost in oblivion, where, but for our present disclosures, they would have remained.

PRESENT CONDITION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

NOTHING does Great Britain more credit than her efforts to suppress the slave-trade. Nothing is more unfortunate for the Americans than the continuation in their southern States of this infamous institution. We admit, of course, that our country gave America that detestable inheritance, and that it forms no stigma on their national character, for to abolish it at once is an impossibility. Perceiving, therefore, that our transatlantic brethren are anxious to rid themselves of this burden, we lay little blame to any but the holders of slaves, the landed proprietary, who cling to the vile system, and threaten the disruption of the Union if any attempt is made on their monstrous privilege. Nevertheless, it is the duty of the true liberal party to persevere, and aid England in her honourable enterprise. The African squadron does much, but other plans may do more. None could regret more than we the removal of that magnificent naval police force which patrols the coasts of the slave country; but there are remedies to be applied in the seat and cradle of the disease which may accomplish more than the most vigilant cruisers. It may be interesting to sketch the present state of this unnatural trade, to relate a few anecdotes in connexion with it, and to describe a plan proposed for its extirpation.

About sixty years have passed since England opened a war upon the slave-trade. At that time Great Britain carried away from Africa thirty thousand; Portugal twenty thousand; France, Holland, and Denmark sixteen thousand—in all sixty-six thousand; while other traders made it up to a hundred thousand. We relinquished the traffic; but for a long period it continued to increase, and in 1839, the number of victims was one hundred and fifty thousand. It fell before 1845 to thirty-two thousand six hundred, but doubled next year, though at present, owing to the cooperation of Brazil, it has been reduced to an average between those two figures. The average number since 1807, has been seventy-seven thousand. Had Great Britain continued to share in the trade, we might probably have counted the slaves by millions, instead of thousands, for myriads have been liberated by her cruisers, and myriads more are saved from capture by her refusal to countenance the abominable transaction. Yet still the system exists at will in Africa, and the interior of that dreary continent is a theatre of oppression of the weak by the strong, horrible to contemplate. It will continue to be so while the profits are so enormous, and the native kings find advantage in the sale of human flesh. Princes in Africa excel Hobbes in their ideas of divine right, and ambitious of rivalling their brethren of Christendom, revel in all the excesses of barbarous ferocity. They are woman floggers, man hunters, sacrificers of human beings, slave sellers, and “fountains of justice” at the same time. The King of Dahomey, among others, annually collects all the warriors, male and female, in his dominions, sallies forth from the capital, invades a neighbouring territory, destroys what he cannot plunder, and bears home a mighty multitude of captives. These are distributed among the nobles and the people, with a choice reserve for his majesty. Most are sold as slaves, many are kept as servants, and a few are put aside to be hacked in pieces, or beaten to death with clubs, for the amusement of the court, and the propitiation of the gods! Mr. Forbes, a late traveller,¹ saw several of these miserable wretches doomed to die. They were placed in canoes or cradles, carried up to a high platform, held aloft by the arms of the soldiers—all the while sitting in meek patience, looking for their fate—and then dashed to the ground, to be struck limb from limb by the infuriated savages below. Our humane countryman, doing honour to his nation, ransomed two or three of the intended victims, but the royal taste for blood was too hot and eager to forego its feast altogether, even in consideration of glittering new-minted dollars, or scarlet cloth, or bright-barrelled guns, or a case of the sparkling dew swept from the slopes of Ben Nevis.

Clearly, the great support of the slave-trade is its profitable nature. It is useless to show the princes of Africa, or the people degraded by their rule, that other sources of revenue are more honourable, or more manly. They retort, “but not more profitable.” A traveller in Zanzibar remonstrated with the merchants, advising them to follow a more honest occupation. “Which is that?” they asked. Some ivory was then in the market, so the Englishman said, “We will buy and pay you for that in preference to buying men!” In the reply was summed up the grand cause of African degradation. It was a laconic but eloquent answer: “It is easier to catch a man than an elephant!” The income derived by the slave sellers is enormous; but it is by bartering for money the life and blood of the land. The true materials of wealth are the productions of the soil and the fruits of the people’s industry. With all her millions of population, however, with all her inexhaustible resources, with her vast territories, and the multiplied natural advantages she enjoys, Africa exports to every other part of the globe no more than Cuba with twelve hundred thousand inhabitants. The reason is evident,—cotton, coffee, sugar, grain, ivory, even gold, must be bought and sold at a fair price, because the principle of competition prevents extravagant profits; but Africa has a monopoly of the slave-trade curse. When will the native trader, accustomed to buy a slave from the kidnapper for twenty-five shillings, to sell him for five pounds, turn to a traffic in ivory at fifty per cent.? When will the merchant accustomed to buy a slave for five, and to sell him for a hundred and five pounds, (2,000 per cent.) turn to cotton with a profit of thirty per cent.?

What we propose chiefly to dwell on is the slave-trade of the interior; the horrors of the middle passage and the plantations being familiar to every reader. We may describe a few episodes of this great system as displayed in the deserts and the oases they contain, and it will be seen what a strange wild life is that of the slave-hunter and the slave in the great cradle of human misery. Yet we must not think of these races as altogether savage. It may make us blush to confess the truth, but it is absolutely a fact, that in the cities of Ghat and Ghadames in the oases of the Sahara wilderness, there are more children who can read and write than in any English town of similar size. The Negroes on the banks of the Niger copy the Koran in beautiful characters, and many arts of refinement have been introduced among them; but the slave-trade, as a means of accumulating gold, is an absorbing lust, devouring all the better feelings of their nature.

We have heard of European bishops assuming many offices besides those of religion; but in Africa they stray still more boldly from their mission. A traveller saw one of them at Ghadames, with a mind full of speculations in slaves. He was a delicate gentleman, who imitated the women in foppery, blackening his eyelids and staining his finger and toe-nails with dark-red henna. He asked, "What is the expense of a journey to Constantinople?" adding, "I shall go and buy some slaves at Ghat and convey them to Constantinople. Don't you think I shall make money by it?" The traveller warned him that if he took slaves to Malta they would touch British ground and be free, which disconcerted the aspiring bishop of the faithful.

Ghadames is a considerable city in the desert on the south borders of Tripoli, and forms a stage in the progress of the slave caravans from the distant country of Bornou. The melancholy trains arrive continually on their way to the coast. The poor creatures, men, women, and children, are naked, with the exception of a slight leathern fillet round their loins. Their forms emaciated with hunger and fatigue, their features pinched, and their whole appearance miserable—nothing can present a stronger picture of human degradation. The merchants are half bandits, and some of them vie with the wild beasts in ferocity. Richardson saw one six feet nine inches high, with limbs like the trunks of palm-trees, and a tread that seemed to root his foot at every step. As he walked the low-covered street, he lowered his huge lance, "as large as an ordinary gas-light post, for fear of catching the roof," and "his big sword, swinging from his back, scraped the mortar from both sides of the walls." Such a monster was a fit leader for a slave caravan, and his power subdued the little spirit that remained in his victims. Many of the slave chiefs are of a similar description, yet bonds are necessary to tame the poor captives on their journey. A resident in Ghadames, strolling through the city with a friend, saw some merchants gambling. They were playing for iron manacles and fetters! "These," they said, "are for slaves; each has a pair of them, to prevent him from escaping while travelling through the desert." Collars for the neck were also exhibited, and when our countryman inquired who manufactured them, he was told, the people of Soudan. There are iron mines among their mountains, and the manacles and fetters are fabricated there. They are only used in the desert for the slaves of the soil, and are never sold. So Africa forges her own chains, and the wretched dwellers in Soudan dig among the hills the metal that is to gall their limbs on the weary march over two thousand miles of desert!

Still in the career of the poor slaves there are sunny spots, short hours of pleasure, and among these is the farewell festival, on the last borders of their country. They collect together to dance and sing, resigned to their inevitable lot, and looking forward to a happier day after the end of life, when for, strange to discover, the only hope of these desolate exiles is in a future state, on the joys of which their fancy is for ever dwelling. After the short dance and a few songs, the slaves proceed to the tombs of their dead relatives, to bid them adieu, paying pious rites to their manes and chanting, half as a prayer, half as a hymn, their desire "to be restored to them and liberty after death." They carry chafing-dishes and burn sweet gums in them, but the tears they shed and the hopes they breathe are a richer incense, because they are the true oblations of the heart. When the slaves remain in an African town under native masters, their burial-place is apart from that of the free population, the pride of class accompanying humanity even into the grave, as it would, if possible, beyond. Among the bondpeople in the cities, an occasional day of rejoicing occurs, but is always commenced by a visit to the tombs and a song of happiness and freedom in a future life. Then they collect in a garden, dress gaily if they can, feast if they have the means, dance and sing, and forget their slavery during the few hours of their revel.

"To Eden's beauty and matchless bloom

In some of the oasis-cities the slaves are well treated and learn to love their masters. We have an account of one venerable sheikh, with the wrinkles of ninety years on his cheeks and brows, whose serfs beheld him as an earthly god, and revered all his words, not from terror but affection. But with the slave merchants the case is far different. They appear to their miserable prisoners like demons of evil, and the Razzia, or slave hunt, is dreaded more than the approach of any storm. Meeting a caravan on the sterile face of the desert, a melancholy sight presents itself. Children, leaning like old men on staves, crawl over the ground. Perhaps a thousand human beings are dragged along in the miserable train. Camels bearing ostrich feathers, hides, wooden bowls, spoons, sandals, wooden combs, leather pillow-cases, bags, purses, pouches, bottles and skins for water, spears, lances, staves, daggers, swords, shields, with jars of liquid butter, baskets of grain, dried beef, pepper, fruit, tobacco, gums, cottons, and other commodities, are crowded with them, though the chief merchandise is human flesh. The labours of the journey are tremendous, but the strength of the Negro appears equally so. Children of five years of age walk the whole distance across the mighty wilderness of Sahara, and women vie with the men in their powers of endurance. The wretched creatures, if they are allowed to keep any toys and trinkets, find some solace in them, decorate their persons, and feel a pleasure in this task of vanity.

(1) Shirley Hibberd, the poet of lakes, and woods, and streams, whose imagination resembles, in its freshness and beauty, the flowers it perpetually delights in.

Often, however, no such indulgence is permitted. The slaves, generally young girls, are driven on with the lash, and if, to appease their thirst, they offend by plucking some of the fresh green herbage by the way, they are barbarously whipped as a punishment. They are allowed to drink once in the morning and once in the evening, if water be abundant, but when the supply is scanty, a single draught is all that is given to quench their thirst. Misfortune teaches them many a severe lesson. One traveller saw a little child three years old, riding a tall camel, alone and fearless. It knew that a sign of fear or a sound of complaint would condemn it to drag on foot over the ground. Another, a young girl, was limping along over the stony desert, all but exhausted by the journey. A savage driver seized her, fastened a rope about her waist, dragged her after him, tied her to the camel, and drove the beast forward. The poor girl ran, and fell; she was pulled over the stones, bleeding in every limb, and then lifted up, still hauled forward by the cord, until, limping, falling, and sinking at intervals, she accomplished that stage. Next day the same weary labour awaited her, and so she made her way from the huts of her own country to the seaport, where she was to be shipped off to labour in the plantations of Cuba.

Sometimes the troops of girls are given into the charge of boys, who whip and goad them along with sharp pieces of wood. Children of thirteen, hardened in brutality, excel the ferocity of men; and women placed under their command, are tortured by the little tyrants with the last excess of malignity, stripped, flogged, and driven until they drop. A poor maiden from Bornou was once dragged along until she became blind from the unbearable fatigue, and then whipped until she became insane.

In the journal of a recent traveller through the wilderness of Africa, we meet with many passages like the following:—

“Evening. Died a young female slave. She had been ill a month. She was of the most delicate frame, and cost seventy dollars as a great beauty. She was buried in the grave-yard of the Marabet without any ceremonies. Happy creature to have so died!”

The next day, succeeding that on which this entry was made, Richardson visited the tent of a slave-driver, and saw a girl lying ill on the ground. The savage was lashing her with a whip of bull’s hide. A quarter of an hour afterwards, the traveller was sauntering through a desert burial-ground, when he met the slave-driver’s servant with a small axe in his hand.

“What are you going to do?”

“What! are you going to dig the grave of the young negress whom Haj Ibrahim was just now beating?”

“Yes,” answered the man, and he was ashamed of his master’s cruelty.” The poor creature had been whipped on the point of death—perhaps killed by the lash. They dug a narrow grave, a few inches deep, placed the warm body in, lying on the right side, with the face towards Mecca, and covered it with a garment of black cotton. The servant felt it once more to see if the girl was really dead. He fancied her heart was still beating, and stopped up the nostrils with clay. Frequently the unhappy wretches are buried alive, and smothered by the earth, which is found disturbed above them. The traveller aided in placing some small stones over the spot, and the poor young slave was left sleeping in the desert.

The men are often still more severely treated, being gashed with daggers for the least offence. The Haj Ibrahim, who whipped the dying girl, is described as a favourable specimen of his class, who “treated his slaves as much like a gentlemanly Moor as he well could do.” He carried with him on his journeys a gigantic tent, made of dried bullocks’ skins, to shelter the poor creatures at night; for the Nigritians cannot bear the cold, and soon die when exposed to it. Consequently, as a matter of pecuniary prudence, they are forced to bear huge burdens of wood, to make fires on the camping grounds. The moment the halt is sounded, the slaves collect and prepare immense piles of billets, interlaid with masses of desert scrub, which are kindled, and around these the poor creatures gather to warm themselves, and forget in a few hours of repose the pains and labours of the day. Even these short intervals of rest are broken into by the cruelty of the drivers, or the anguish of some dying wretch worn out by the fatigues of the march. A resident in Ghat once saw a negress, just arrived with a caravan, lying on the ground, fast sinking under an accumulation of agony. Her bones were nearly through the skin, which was parched and shrivelled like a dry water-bottle. Her owner was rubbing her with some oil. He asked the stranger for some medicine, but our countryman saw that the girl needed, not physic, but food. “Give her something to eat,” he said. The merchant replied, “I have nothing.” “What do you eat yourself?” “Bread and bayeen.” “Give her that.” The avaricious wretch made no reply, but turned away. He evidently considered such food too good for a slave, even to save her life.

We in this country, enjoying the comforts our civilization has ensured us, seldom remember that such scenes are at this moment actually taking place in Africa. We do not take home to our hearts the reality of the thing. While looking at this page, the reader should recall to mind that slave-caravans are toiling over the Sahara, that weary and thirsty wretches are dragged along by ropes, some fainting by the way, some dying, some whipped along with thongs of bull’s hide, some goaded with spears, and all torn from their native homes to till the soil of a country not their own, for the advantage of strangers. It is said that numerous Europeans are engaged in the interior of Africa, aiding the native princes in their kidnapping expeditions, and realizing abundant profits from their adventures. A traveller inquired of a Soudan trader where the slaves were obtained. He said, in the wild land beyond his country, and that many men, with white hands and faces, assisted to capture the thousands that were annually dragged away. He added that collars, fetters and manacles were used to tame them into subjection when they were sent down the Black River to the Great Salt Water, as they call the Atlantic Ocean. His interrogator asked how the slaves were caught. The trader instantly sprang up, and seized an Arab gun. He then squatted low on the ground, creeping along the floor, as though waiting and watching in silence. By a curious pantomime he suggested the idea of an unwary native approaching, and then made a sudden spring, as a tiger on his prey, with a horrid shout, to terrify the victim. After a sufficient number have been collected by this or a bolder process, the caravan is formed, and the slaves are driven over the border, in most cases never to return. They invariably discharge their feelings in songs and prayer-hymns as they move along by day, or gather round the camp fires by night. A republican poet of America has rendered into English verse a slave-chaunt, written down in the Saharan desert by a traveller. There is nothing added to the original, and the words are almost literally given. Nothing can exceed the sad melody of the cadence, or the melancholy music of this, their Song of Supplication to Heaven.

"Where are we going? Where are we going?

Where are we going, Rubec?!

Hear us! save us! Make us free.

Send our Atka² down from thee!

Here the Ghiblee wind is blowing;

Strange and large the world is growing;

Tell us, Rubec, where are we going?

Where are we going, Rubec?

"Bornou! Bornou! Where is Bornou?

Where are we going, Rubec?

Bornou land was rich and good,

Wells of water, fields of food;

Bornou land we see no longer,

Here we thirst, and here we hunger,

Here the Moor-man smites in anger;

Where are we going, Rubec?

"Where are we going? Where are we going?

Hear us, save us, Rubec!

Moons of marches from our eyes,

Bornou land behind us lies;

Hot the desert wind is blowing,

Will the waves of sand arc flowing!

Hear us! tell us! Where are we going?

Occasionally we find an account of some of these poor creatures treading the homeward path, free again after years of toil, and bounding on in their child-like hope to see all things as they had left them. Stories of past times there may be among every people, but no elaborated romance from the pen of the finest writer ever could touch the heart more than the story of one young slave woman restored, after years of servitude, to liberty. She accompanied the traders on their way to Bornou, dwelling in silent happiness on the joys of her deliverance, until the well-remembered track was entered upon, and the hills of her own country came in view. Then all her feelings played at once in the passion of a new-born pleasure; she laughed, she wept, she danced along the road, she poured out incoherent blessings on her conductors, she burst into rapturous songs of joy, and at length, in the delirium of her excitement, fell into convulsions and hardly escaped with life. In the dismal picture of the slave trade in Africa we have been drawing, how pleasant to find one little oasis like this on the bleak and desolate waste of misery and serfdom!

Such is a sketch of the slave-trade in Africa, and such are the miseries to which humanity is there exposed. To effect a change, to uproot the system, to convert the slave-hunters into honest traders, the slavers into tillers of their own soil, and to shut the ports of Africa against merchants seeking to perpetuate the unnatural traffic, would be to achieve a victory as great as that for which any statesman or conqueror ever yet won a laurel or a triumphal arch. An infinity of plans has been proposed; but we cannot examine more than one of them. It appears reasonable. It is simple, and might be carried into practice at a moderate expense. Its author is Macqueen, an important authority in connexion with Africa. Its chief feature is to make Africa the instrument of her own emancipation, and, by developing her resources, to destroy the profit of the slave dealer.

"Only raise," he says, "in any more commanding and accessible portion of Africa, say on the greatest entry, the banks of the lower Niger, 300,000 bales of cotton, 20,000 tons of coffee, and 100,000 tons of sugar at a cheap rate, and throw these yearly into the market of the world, already fully supplied by slave labour, and the result would be that this additional produce would reduce so greatly the general prices of all produce in every quarter, that the external slave trade would cease to be profitable and therefore cease to exist."

If Government, or a chartered company with a large capital, were to send agents with power to make treaties, to all the native princes along the slave coast of Africa, they might be brought by considerations of interest to forbid the passage of slaves through their dominions. At present the chief receives from two to four shillings for every slave carried through his kingdom. Calculate the yearly average, and grant him double the amount, besides presents of such commodities as barbarians love, and the amount of the whole would not equal half the cost of our squadron. Add stipulations of mutual friendship, and engage to buy the principal products of the soil, to be admitted into English ports at the terms of the most favoured nation. Stipulate for perfect liberty of trade, in return for which protection might be guaranteed to the prince. Show the chiefs and the people that by cultivating cotton, indigo, coffee, and sugar, by collecting gold, ivory, silver, copper, iron, and gums, they can procure more profit with less danger than by continuing the traffic in slaves, and that traffic will cease. To appeal to their feelings of humanity, blunted by the practice from an immemorable date of the slave-trade, is like whispering in a hurricane. It is simply useless.

To command the mouth of every African river by a settlement would destroy four-fifths of the facilities for carrying on the trade. It may seem a formidable project, but other projects far less feasible and useful, but more costly, are undertaken and paid for.

Such is the plan of Mr. Macqueen, to whose great knowledge of Africa, its resources, its people, the temper of its chiefs, and the state of the slave-trade, much respect is due. We lay it before the reader, and trust that in the multitude of schemes projected for the advancement of this country in commercial prosperity, Africa will not wholly be forgotten. It is as much a question of interest as of philanthropy, for the realization of the idea would bring us the chief necessaries, comforts, and luxuries of life, far cheaper than they are at present, amidst a limitless field for the employment of British enterprise, capital, and industry. In return for the productions of their soil, the inhabitants of Africa would willingly receive British merchandises, provided our manufacturers were judicious enough to study their taste. There is a science in trade which many of us have yet to learn. It is useless to carry dull-coloured cottons and cloths to an Oriental market,—useless to offer boots of polished leather to men who tread the desert,—useless to tender close-fitting pantaloons to those who wear none but the loosest and lightest clothing. Weavers in Spitalfields cannot alter the tastes of wearers on the banks of the Niger. They must conform to them. Now that the Exhibition of Industry has been opened to view, something of this may be taught to our manufacturers. At any rate, we are convinced a mighty market yet remains to be created on the shores of Africa. We conclude as we commenced, by saying that Europe has done much, but accomplished next to nothing, for that great continent. We have now, however, entered into new relations with it. Steam has brought its coasts within a month's voyage. We shall know it better; we shall hear from it more frequently; and it is to be hoped, for the sake of humanity, that some great efforts will be made to suppress the slave-trade. The philanthropists of the last age reaped a rich harvest by their labours; but the good cause is incompletely prosecuted, and there is still work for another Howard, another Wilberforce, and another Clarkson on the western shores of Africa.

THE KING'S SHILLING.

BY DINAH MARIA MULLOCK.

LITTLE FANNY was a merry laughing-eyed lassie of some eight or nine years old, whose childish figure was well known as the town clock in the populous streets of the market town where she dwelt, and her clear, glad voice as recognisable as the tones of the church bell.

And, as she was well known, so was she well loved and esteemed. No maiden of her years could have more friends than had Fanny. From that awful dignitary the beadle, who was wont to give her patronising pulls of the hair whenever she came in his way, down to the surly mastiff which kept guard over Daniel Wright's timber-yard, and always wagged his tail at the little girl's approach, and wriggled his large body about in a manner which was, though sufficiently expressive of his satisfaction, vastly undignified for an animal of his size, years, and condition; from the highest to the lowest, everybody and everything liked Fanny.

Perhaps she had so many friends, because she was utterly destitute of natural protectors. She was not exactly a foundling, but approached very nearly to that condition. Seven years before, a poor and sickly woman, with a young child in her arms, came to Bridge-End, and took up her abode in a room in one of its humblest cottages. She contrived to earn a little by doing needlework, but one day, while on her way to her employer's, she fell down in a fit, and was carried home by two stout workmen from the timber-yard. One of these men brought his wife to see her, and tend her, but all was in vain,—two days afterwards she died, blessing her new friends with her last breath, because they promised to protect and cherish her child.

So little Fanny became one of the already numerous family of John and Nancy Brightwell, sharing alike with the seven bouncing boys and rosy girls, bread and butter as well as chastisements. But, truth to tell, the latter fell least frequently to Fanny's portion, for she was a good and obedient child, and as Nancy often observed to her neighbours, was a real treasure to her adopted parents. She carried John Brightwell's dinner to the timber-yard far more carefully than either Jane or Ellen did, and moreover, she already sewed so neatly, that Nancy actually entrusted to her the greater portion of the manufacture of her husband's new shirts.

What was very wonderful too, although held up as a model to the before-named Jane and Ellen, Fanny was regarded with affection by both of them. But, after all, there was no marvel in this:—the little girl was so cheerful, so loving, so willing to perform little services, above all, so unselfish. There was the secret. We all love those most who love themselves least.

Nothing more was known of Fanny's origin than I have related. Her mother had said nothing of any relatives or friends, and there were no letters or papers that could lead to any discovery as to who or what she was. All that was left at Mrs. Rushbrook's death, was contained in a little deal box:—some few articles of clothing, and two or three books, all of which were preserved with religious care by the good Nancy; "For who knows," she was wont to say, "but what they may help to find Fanny's relations, some day." Besides this, there was a small gold locket, which the dying mother took from her own neck, and placed round her child's, begging her future protectors to let her wear it always; there were two locks of hair in it, one dark-brown like Mrs. Rushbrook's, the other of a golden colour. This little ornament, attached to a black riband, was always perceivable round Fanny's neck.

Thus, there was a considerable proportion of romance attached to the little maiden's history: but inasmuch as the good people of Bridge-End are not addicted to poetry or novel-reading, but are as matter of fact a race as shall be found in the three kingdoms, this circumstance did not tend to Fanny's popularity among them. At first, indeed, they shook their heads, and deprecated the false charity of the Brightwells in taking into their family the child of a woman they knew nothing of; the infant had far better have been consigned to the tender mercies of the parish authorities, argued these wiseacres,—the Brightwells had a large family enough of their own, without adopting stray children of no one knew who.

But the kind-hearted carpenter and his wife pursued what they believed to be their duty, steadily and cheerfully, without heeding the remarks of their neighbours. "Heaven won't suffer us to starve because we have taken pity on this desolate infant," they said to each other:—and indeed from the time of Fanny's domestication with them, the fortunes of the Brightwell family gradually improved.

Fanny attained her ninth year, without any very remarkable events chequering her career, although, arguing from the romantic style of her advent into Bridge-End, something of the kind might not unreasonably have been expected. All that had occurred to her, were the mere common-places incident to every little maiden of her age and station. She had her long curls cut off, to satisfy good Mrs. Brightwell's notions of the propriety and neatness due to the mature age of nine years. She had an adventure with a goat, who, when she made advances of a friendly nature towards him, had rushed at her, and bruised her with his hard horns, causing her to feel considerable pain, and more terror. This was indeed an era in her existence, for from that time, her universal love of all created things received a wholesome admixture of fear, and she confined her demonstrations of tenderness to those animals who appreciated and returned her affection. Finally, the only manifestation of her growth in years and wisdom which remains to be noted, consists in the fact, that about this time her organ of constructiveness must have been very largely developed, for she, having a girl-like passion for dolls, and her very limited means not permitting the purchase of one, even of the humblest description, she manufactured, out of some pieces of wool and calico, a figure of such exquisite proportions, that save for its want of hands and feet, and for the general inexpressiveness and indefinite outline of its features, it might be pronounced a very masterpiece in the art of doll-making. Such as it was, it was little Fanny's delight—the very apple of her eye; and her dire distress may be imagined, when one day, while she was absent on an errand, little Harry, the youngest of the Brightwells, who was just beginning to walk and talk, and to be sensible of the delight of doing mischief, seized the doll, and amused himself by gradually pulling it to pieces, scattering the rags around him as he sat in state on the floor.

Poor Fanny! in silence she stood and beheld the remnants of her cherished plaything floating about the room. Tears stood in her eyes, and rolled down her cheeks, for it was a deep grief to her,—as deep perhaps, in its way, as any she knew in after life. But not a word of reproach escaped her lips. The mischief was done, and she was too gentle and good-hearted to feel any pleasure in scolding the unconscious child. "He didn't know what harm he was doing,"—she said to herself as she quietly picked up the rags, threw them away, and resigned herself to her fate.

There was a reward in store for her, however, sooner than she anticipated. A day or two before, Mrs. Brightwell had performed that indispensable household duty, denominated by her, "rummaging out her things,"—and while clearing the contents of a huge press, which among other articles contained Fanny's deal box, had discovered a silver shilling, carefully wrapped up in paper, hidden in a corner, it having evidently escaped either from some possessions of Nancy's own, or from the deal box aforesaid. Mrs. Brightwell inclined to the opinion that the money was her own, and through some unaccountable carelessness had been put away with some article or another. This, unlikely as it was, (for, as she remarked to her husband, "shillings were never so plentiful with them, that they should mislay one without knowing it,") was yet less improbable than that the coin should have remained concealed in Fanny's box all this while, so often as they had examined it.

"Moreover," argued the sage Nancy, "poor Mrs. Rushbrook would have been glad enough to spend a shilling, if she had had it. It isn't likely she would have let it be in that box;—and it couldn't have been there without her knowing of it."

Finally, the good woman took possession of the mysterious coin, and safely bestowed it among various others in an old teapot in her corner cupboard. But her conscience was very tender, and she fidgeted exceedingly about the affair.

"I'm not easy about it," said she to her husband; "I don't feel honest, like, in having money I don't know how I came by. If it did come from Fanny's box, the child ought to have it—not me."

So, when Nancy found (though not through Fanny, be sure,) that Harry had destroyed the beautiful doll, and that the little girl had already begun to collect the materials for making another, the thought flashed on her mind, that here was an opportunity for doing that which would at once make Fanny's heart exceeding glad, and ease her own conscience. And so without pausing to think about it, she went to her teapot, and selected the identical shilling, which was distinguish-able from all others, because although new and bright, as if newly coined, there was a round hole bored through it, and the two letters D. H. were rudely cut in the silver. And then the good woman called Fanny to her, and gave the money into her hands, merely saying it was for her to buy a nice, real doll with, instead of the one Harry had destroyed.

Fanny was too bewildered to thank her. Her joy was so extreme, it well-nigh overpowered her, and indeed, well-bred young ladies often think it proper to faint on experiencing less emotion than did my little lassie, as she stood with her shilling in her hand, staring wildly at it with her large blue eyes. That shilling! it was bliss—it was everything to her! Magnificent visions floated before her eyes of dolls with waxen faces, and eyes and noses, and with hands and feet fashioned of pink or blue kid. What could not a shilling buy? To her ideas, it was a mine of inexhaustible wealth. Among all her acquaintance, she knew of no one who had ever possessed so much money at one time:—no, not even including Miss Jacobs, that juvenile capitalist, who had a wax doll, dressed in the height of fashion, with a yellow dress, a pink cloak, and a blue bonnet, and who received a regular allowance of pocket money from her grandfather—not even Miss Jacobs had ever owned more than a silver fourpence at a time. Fanny was in a perfect whirl of wondering happiness, and she had not quite recovered herself, even when she was in the street, surrounded by a little crowd of playmates, all staring with eyes and mouths wide open at “Fanny’s shilling!” She tried to preserve that composure and self-possession suitable to the possessor of so much wealth, and looked on with a benignant smile, while her friends examined the precious coin and made their remarks. “What was she going to do with it? Did she mean to wear it round her neck, by a riband slung through that curious little hole? Or would she spend it?”

Before they had half satisfied their curiosity, the little maiden broke from them, and proceeded alone on her way to the High Street, in a certain shop of which she had often remarked a doll of a peculiarly charming character, with blue eyes, and flaxen hair, handsomely dressed in a robe of glazed calico. This doll was for sale at the moderate charge of ten-pence, and Fanny calculated that the remaining two-pence would purchase some little toys for Jane and Ellen: for her thoughts were not all for herself, and even this sudden flush of prosperity could not make her selfish.

So she walked slowly up the street, looking into the shop windows with the air of one who is consciously able to purchase all their contents, and grasping her shilling tightly in her hand the while. Suddenly she felt some one plucking at her dress, and at the same time, a timid little voice said, “Pity, pity, Mademoiselle, for my old grandfather!”

Turning round, she saw a little girl of her own age, ragged, and nearly barefooted; her pale face bearing evident marks of cold and hunger, and her sunken eyes filled with tears. Beggars are rare in Bridge-End, and Fanny had never beheld such a picture of distress as this child presented. Instinctively, she stopped to listen to what she had to say.

“Pardon, Mademoiselle; but we are so poor, so miserable. We are French, and I do not speak your tongue rightly. I never begged before, never; but he is old, and we are starving, and—~~and~~—Oh, help us!” she cried, clasping her thin hands together, and looking into Fanny’s face with an expression of imploring anguish.

Fanny’s eyes grew tearful, and she paused for a moment. “How could you tell I had any money?” asked she, innocently, and she looked furtively at the bright silver shilling.

“I did not know, I was not sure; but I thought,” said the French girl, in her broken accents; “and it seemed easier to ask of you, a little girl such as I am, than of a grown woman. Oh, Mademoiselle! if you can, help us! We have no friends, no help, if you do not help us. Take pity on us, or we must starve!”

If Fanny had hesitated before, she was quite vanquished now. “Come with me,” said she, quickly; and she led the way down the street, past the shop in whose window stood the doll, in its gay robe, and stepped into a baker’s shop.

“A large loaf,” said she to the man, who knew her well, as she was often sent for bread by Mrs. Brightwell.

“No,” and she placed the shilling in his hand.

“Eh! what a curious shilling! bright as a new one! and yet it’s cut and bored as if it had been in use for years;” and the man sounded the coin two or three times before he could satisfy himself of its goodness, and give her the change.

“There,” said Fanny to the French girl, giving her the loaf and all the money that remained from the shilling; “take that to your poor grandfather, and don’t be sad or hungry any more. Good-bye!”

And leaving the grateful child without staying to listen to the blessings which poured from her lips, Fanny ran away home.

“Where’s your doll, child?” was the inquiry of Mrs. Brightwell which greeted her ears on her return. She stood, blushing and fidgetting, and stammered forth a reply that “she had not bought it.”

“Then what have you done with the shilling I gave you? Tell me this instant, Fanny. I shall be wonderful cross, I can tell you, if you’ve been and spent it on trumpery.”

“I—I haven’t spent it at all; I gave it away,” said the half-frightened child, thus sorely pressed; and she piteously told the story of the poor French girl, while Nancy listened, scarce knowing whether to feel vexed or pleased at this instance of the tender-heartedness of her adopted child. Her own generous sympathies applauded what she had done, but she feared to encourage such disinterestedness in one who would in after life have to work for her bread. So she said nothing, but bade the child go about her usual avocations. And thus, to all appearance, ended poor Fanny's hopes of possessing a real doll. Two or three days afterwards, she passed the toy-shop again. But the lady in the pink calico dress was gone. It was not in childish nature to repress a sigh; but we will answer for it that never once did the wish cross Fanny's heart that she had not given her bright shilling to the poor girl and her grandfather.

One day, a week after this occurrence, a stranger arrived at Bridge-End, and located himself in the principal apartment of the Brown Bear. A stranger is always an interesting object in a little country-town; but this gentleman attracted particular observation, because he seemed to know no one in the place, and appeared to have no reason for coming, except to walk about the town, looking at the names above the shops, and at length walking into that of Mr. White, the baker.

His first action was to sit down, his second, to pull from his pocket a shilling, carefully wrapped in paper. Holding it before the puzzled baker's eyes, he said, sternly, "Do you know this piece of money?"

"Know it, sir? Really, I can't say; I can't be expected to recollect every shilling."

"This is a very peculiar one," interrupted the stranger, "and if you have once seen it, you will know it again. Besides," added he, impatiently, "I have traced it to you, and that's enough. You must know it, and you must tell me from whom you received it."

Thus adjured, Mr. White looked carefully at the shilling, and at length suddenly exclaimed with considerable energy:—"Well, if I didn't think at the time it was a queer one! I had my doubts of taking it, I do assure you, sir, but it sounded all right, and little Fanny—how could she ha' got it, I wonder?"

"Little Fanny!" cried the stranger, bounding from his seat in strong agitation. Then, in a moment regaining his composure,—"Who is the person you call by that name, and where does she live?" he inquired.

"At Mrs. Brightwell's, Pleasant Cottage, up the town," replied the baker, adding in his regard for the child, "I'm sure, sir, poor Fanny didn't know it was a bad shilling. Don't be too hard upon her, sir, poor little thing!"

But before he had finished his speech, the stranger (whom Mr. White firmly believed to be a policeman in disguise) had vanished, and before the good baker had half finished his wonderings and speculations as to the probable end of it all, the gentleman was in the Brightwells' cottage, deep in conversation with honest Nancy.

That evening, Nancy Brightwell went into the town to make some purchases. Her eyes were red with weeping, but they had been joyful tears that the kind-hearted creature had shed that day. To a select circle of acquaintances she told the story: "Fanny's father was found! The stranger was no other than Colonel Halton, an officer, rich, and able to make his daughter a lady. Little Fanny a lady!" And Nancy wept again, and again began relating her tale, though in a somewhat incoherent manner. "Yes, indeed. and the poor gentleman, so stern and proud as he looks, cried like a child when I told him all about Mrs. Rushbrook's (that's his wife) dying, and being buried in the churchyard yonder. And he told me how he was took prisoner, and how they said he was dead, and how, when he came back, after being in a prison for four years, he heard that the agents he left with all the money for his wife and child, had been rogues and ran off with it. And he couldn't find his poor wife anywhere, as how should he, when the poor thing, obliged to work for her living, had thought fit to take another name? For she was an orphan, and had no friends or relations to go to, when misfortune came on her."

"Ah! that's the most wonderful part of it, you see. It seems Colonel Halton, when quite young, ran away from his friends, ('cause they wanted him to be a lawyer,) and 'listed as a private soldier. So he always kept the 'King's Shilling' the recruiting Sergeant gave him, and he bored a hole through it for a riband, and cut his initials on it, and gave it to his wife before they were married, for a keepsake. Well now, look here. Somehow or another, often as I've looked through the things in that little box Mrs. Rushbrook, poor thing, left, I never found this shilling till the other day. I gave it to Fanny to buy a doll, and she, bless her heart, meets with a poor starving beggar, girl, goes into White's shop, and buys a loaf of bread for her, instead of spending it for a doll. Well, White pays this shilling, among other money, to the miller, and the miller goes to London and pays it for some article in a shop, where Colonel Halton is buying something. He knew his shilling at once, and never rested till he traced it to Fanny. Oh, he knew she was his child, the instant he set eyes on her, bless you! And—and they are going to live near here in some grand house, and my Jane and Ellen are going to school, and my boys are to be—Oh, I can't wait, I'm in such a hurry! But only think, folks, what a Providence there has been in all this. For if I had found the shilling before I did, or if Fanny had spent it at the toy-shop instead of the baker's,—who knows?—she would most likely have remained poor little Fauny to the end of the chapter, and never have been as she is, happy with her own Papa, and going to be a rich lady. A lady! think of that! My little Fanny a lady, and a Colonel's daughter!"

MAJOR EDWARDES ON THE PUNJAB AGAIN.¹

AGREEABLY to promise, we are going to present the reader with a few more passages from Major Edwarde's interesting volumes. Those who have gone over the former paper will have obtained a notion of the general features of the Punjab countries, and learned something of the kinds of people that inhabit them. Further remark about the literary qualities of the work will be unnecessary; so we may at once proceed to extract such matter as we have space for, and which we think may be acceptable. The following is the author's description of the Indus, which, in boldness and precision of outline, could hardly be surpassed had it been written with an eye to poetical effect.

"The Indus pursues its course with the sagacity of a living thing. Burning with all the zeal of the Muhommudan races on its banks to perform its pilgrimage, it seems, from its high altitude in Tibet, to have scanned the map of Central Asia, and discerned that it was nearer to the Indian Ocean than the Caspian. In vain the Indian Caucasus, seeking a bridegroom for her daughter Oxus, stands across its path; it detects an opening, and rushes by. In vain the Solimánée Range stretches out its arms to draw it into the thirsty vales of Afghanistan; it leaps through the rocks of Attock and Kálábágh, and takes refuge in the sandy deserts of the south, nor resumes its western course till the mountains of Solomon are passed, when it turns with its fellow-traveller, the Sutlej; and the two, with loud songs, as of pilgrims whose place of pilgrimage is in sight, roll on uninterruptedly to the sea."

From this we pass on to what the Major calls "a highly interesting circumstance" connected with the Indian trade, which came under his notice:—"Ali Khan, Gundapoor, the uncle of the present chief, Gooldad Khan, told me he could remember well, as a youth, being sent by his father and elder brother with a string of Cabul horses, to the fair of Hurdwár, on the Ganges. He also showed me a Pushtoo version of the Bible, printed at Serampore, in 1818, which he said had been given him, thirty years before, at Hurdwár, by an English gentleman, who told him to 'take care of it, and neither fling it into the fire nor the river; but hoard it up against the day when the British should be rulers of his country!' Ali Khan said little to anybody of his possessing this book, but put it carefully by in a linen cover, and produced it with great mystery, when I came to settle the revenue of his nephew's country, 'thinking that the time predicted by the Englishman had arrived!' The only person, I believe, to whom he had shown the volume was a Mullick, who read several passages in the Old Testament, and told Ali Khan 'it was a true story, and was all about their own Muhommudan Prophets, Father Moses and Father Noah.'

"I examined the book with great interest. It was not printed in the Persian character, but the common Pushtoo language of Afghanistan; and was the only specimen I had ever seen of Pushtoo reduced to writing. The accomplishment of such a translation was a highly honourable proof of the zeal and industry of the Serampore mission: and should these pages ever meet the eye of Mr. John Marshman, of Serampore,' whose own pen is consistently guided by a love of civil order and religious truth, he may probably be able to identify the 'English gentleman' who, thirty-two years ago on the banks of the Ganges, at the then frontier of British India, gave to a young Afghan chief, from beyond the distant Indus, a Bible in his own barbarous tongue, and foresaw the day when the followers of the 'Son of David' should extend their dominion to the 'Throne of Solomon.'"²

We shall give next one of the author's personal adventures, in that part of the Déraját called Koláclce, where, amongst other troubles, he had to deal with an obstinate merchant chief, named Shahzâd Khan, head of a tribe called Nássurs, and who refused to pay a tax which the Sikhs had been accustomed to exact from all merchants and traders who pastured their camels in the neighbourhood, while journeying to and from Hindoostan. The Major describes Shahzâd Khan as "a thorough Afghan in his hatred of all Hindoos, and all forms of taxation." He had defied Dost Muhommud, the Ameer of Cabul, and the Nuwab of Dera; and "was it to be supposed," said he, "that he would knuckle down to the dogs of Sikhs?" So unconscionable a "free trader" was the Khan, that Edwardes found it needful to attempt to force him into order and submission; and accordingly he planned a night attack upon his camp—the account of which the reader shall now have an opportunity of perusing.

"We pushed on through a very ugly night, and came in sight of the watch-fires of the Nássur camps about day-break. The guides pointed out Shahzâd's far away in the rear of all, under the outer ridges, which lie like pebble-stones beneath the mountain called Solomon's Throne; and I called a halt under shelter of a ravine, to look at it, breathe the horses, and let the stragglers close up. Great was then my surprise to discover, by the morning light, that the gallant band of nearly three hundred men had dwindled down to about seventy or eighty! The heroes had taken advantage of the night to lose their way; and I was afterwards told by the infantry reserve, that one hundred Dooránees turned back from the middle of the Loonce river, and declared that 'the Sahib was not going on.' I told the Sikh Hussáldâr to muster his men: he reported twenty present out of sixty. Of the two hundred Dooránees, there may have been forty; Káloo Khan had about five men, and I had about twelve or fourteen others.

"This was clearly quite inadequate to perform the feat for which we had come—viz. to seize Shahzâd Khan in the midst of his people, and carry him off prisoner. The stout rebel, who had fought with Dost Muhommud, the Nuwab of Dera, and Dewan Lukkee Mull, was not very likely to be overpowered by eighty men; yet I felt that it would be more honourable and more wise, if I hoped for influence in this wild country, to be defeated in a bold attempt, than not to make it, after going twelve miles to do so; so getting the men together, with a heart not over light, I led them on at a gentle trot to the rebel camp.

"The grey dawn was just removing the friendly veil that had hitherto concealed us, the watch fires of the mountaineers were dying out, and we could see the savage Cabul dogs of the merchants spring up from beside the ashes, before their accursed howls of alarm and warning reached our ears.

"The Doorânees now galloped to the front, as if no power on earth should prevent them from being first in the fray; and though I succeeded in calling them in, and keeping them with the rest of the party, they still whirled their guns over their heads, and shouted valorously that they would eat up the Nâssurs.

"But the Nâssurs seemed in no hurry to be eaten, and turned out, at the baying of the dogs and the shouts of the Doorânees, like a nest of hornets, with juzails, swords, clubs, and even stones.

"I thought the best chance I had was to make my few fellows fight, whether they would or no, so led them round to the rear of the Nâssur camp, and got them between it and the hill, under a dropping fire of bullets, which did little or no harm; then, beckoning with my hand to the Nâssurs, I told Kaloo Khan to shout to them, in Pushtoo, to surrender; a bare-faced proposition, to which the Nâssurs replied only with a handsome volley of both bullets and abuse. 'Come on,' they cried, 'come on, you Feringhee dog, and don't stand talking about surrender!' In truth, it was no time, for the fire was getting thick; so seeing nothing else left, I drew my own sword, took tight hold of a chain bridle, given me prophetically by Reynell Taylor, stuck the spurs into Zâl, and, calling on all behind me to follow, plunged into the camp.

"The attacking party always has such an advantage that I am quite sure, if our men had followed up, few as they were, they might have either seized or killed Shahzâd; but it shames me to relate that out of seventy or eighty not fifteen charged, and scarcely a dozen reached the middle of the camp. . . .

"The mêlée, therefore, was much thicker in our neighbourhood than was at all pleasant, and how we ever got out of it is unaccountable; but we did, after cutting our way from one end to the other of the Nâssur camp. Somewhere about the middle of it a tall ruffian, whom I was told afterwards was Shahzâd's brother, walked deliberately at me with his juzail, and sticking it into my stomach, so that the muzzle of it pushed me out of my saddle, fired! The priming flashed in the pan, and as he drew back the juzail I cut him full over the head; but I might as well have hit a cannon ball,—the sword turned in my hand; and the Nâssur, without even re-setting his turban, commenced re-priming his juzail, an operation which I did not stay to see completed. Between 1845 and 1849 there was no lack of peril on the Punjab frontier, and I, like all the rest, had my share; but I have always looked back to the moment when that juzail missed fire as the one of all my life when I looked death closest in the face.

"On getting out to the fresh air again, I looked round, and found myself with two men, one of whom was a highwayman I had pardoned a week or ten days before. The brave Doorânees and Sikhs might be seen circling and curvetting about the circumference of the camp, handsomely followed up by the enemy, and I was thinking what course to pursue, when my eye fell on the Nâssur herd of camels tied down in a ring. 'Now,' said I to the highwayman, 'the victory is ours, after all,' and away we both dashed at the camels, whose long necks were already bobbing about with fright, like geese looking out of a market basket. Up they all jumped, and tore themselves free from their fastenings; and I put a lot of them before me, and drove them off as if I had all my life been a moss-trooper, my friend the thief entering heart and soul into the business, and giving them a professional poke with his spear, which set them stepping out gloriously. The Nâssurs who were in charge yelled like demons, and one 'took up a rock,' as Homer would have said, (a great stone as big as his own head,) and hurled it at me with such good aim that it hit me below the knee, and would have unhorsed me if that excellent villain, the highwayman, had not put his hand under my shoulder and tossed me back again into my saddle. The heroes outside now joined us, and very glad I was to see them, for the whole swarm of angry Nâssurs were in hot pursuit of their camels. The Sikh runaways at this point did something to make amends, forming line in the rear behind us, and keeping off the Nâssurs with their musketry till we had pricked the spoil quite out of reach, when they galloped up to us, and left the Nâssurs puffing in the middle of the plain.

"I think none of us spoke for some time; but the scuffle had been so sharp, and might have been so serious, and most of us had been giving and taking blows with such good-will, that our brains were busy enough revolving the confused events which had crowded themselves into the last ten minutes.

"When we had made about a mile I called a halt, and looked about to see who was hit besides myself. Three horsemen only were wounded with musket balls, and I began to think we had got off cheaply, when a whisper arose that 'Kaloo Khan was missing!'

"'Missing?' I said, 'why, he was by my side in the middle of the camp just now. Who saw him last?' A Doorânce follower of Muhommud Alim's spoke up, and said: 'He saw him knocked over the crupper of his horse, but was too busy looking after his own master to help any one else!'

"What was to be done? It was certain that he was either dead, or a prisoner. The men I had with me would not have gone back for all the Khans in Asia; and if they could have been persuaded, our return would only have been the signal for Kaloo Khan's murder, if he still lived. The same argument applied to the reserve of infantry, who could not now be very far behind.

"A follower of the young Khan's, well versed in this kind of work, suggested a reprisal; and seeing no other remedy, I despatched a messenger in search of the reserve, with orders to turn back and surround another Nássur camp nearer home, and close to the fields of the Gundapoor, where resistance was impossible; and, if they could, secure two or three Nássur chiefs, to exchange for Kaloo Khan. This they did, and made prisoners of two Mullicks, one of whom was Sir Must Khan, who divided with Shahzâd the chieftainship of the tribe. The reserve also brought away upwards of two hundred more camels, to add to those which we had captured from Shahzâd; so that in all we got three hundred and twenty.

"I will give the conclusion of this episode here. Shahzâd Khan struck his camp immediately after the fight, and marched away out of the Dérâjât into the Sheraunee hills, with all his flocks and herds and people, and poor Kaloo Khan, who had got no less than six or seven severe, but not dangerous, sabre cuts, over his head, shoulder, and arms, which the Nássur women sewed up with hairs pulled out of his own horse's tail.

"I received intelligence that Shahzâd's brother was grazing the majority of his camels on the left bank of the Indus, and I sent a party after him, but he had got a message from Shahzâd first, and made a forced march into the Mooltan territory, whence he recrossed the Indus, and got up through the Ooshteraunee hills to his brother.

"At last I gave the camels, seventy-five in number, which I had carried off from Shahzâd's own camp, to Ali Khan, Kaloo Khan's father, who took them to the mouth of the nearest pass, and bartered them for his son, who returned very weak in flesh, but stout in heart, and justly proud of his honourable wounds, to which, indeed, he has since added more than one in my service, in battles where still harder knocks were received than in the skirmish under the Tukht-i-Sooliman.

"On Kaloo Khan's return, Sir Must Khan and the other Nássur hostages were dismissed with honour; and at parting, I bound a handsome turban round Sir Must's head, and told him I should henceforth consider him the chief of the Nássur clan, and treat all who adhered to Shahzâd as rebels.

"Of the two hundred and forty camels carried off by the reserve, along with Sir Must, only ten proved to belong to Sir Must himself, and ninety-six to other honest men, all of which were given back to them. The remainder proved to be the property of Shahzâd himself, who, anticipating an attack from my close neighbourhood, had put the majority of his camels under the charge of other Nássurs, who were on good terms with the Sikh Government.

"These, therefore, I confiscated; gave thirteen of the finest (worth about 100%) to Kaloo Khan, to pay his doctor's bill; one to each of the four wounded horsemen; and sold the rest on account of Government, realizing thereby three thousand six hundred rupees, in satisfaction of the fifty rupces of 'trinnee,'¹ which Shahzâd said 'he never would pay to the dogs of Sikhs and Feringhees!'

"From that time until I left India the face of Shahzâd Khan, Nássur, was seen no more in the pastures of the Dérâjât; and though the Mooltan war raged upon the frontier, and a son of Dost Muhommud of Cabul came down as far as Bunnoo with an army, and invited Shahzâd to join him and take revenge, the Nássur saw further into the future than the Doorânce Prince, and declined descending from his mountain hiding-place.

"Nor was I ever again told by any other Cabul merchant in the province under my charge, that he would not come when he was called, or would not obey the laws of the Sikh territory in which he lived, and bought and sold."

This wild exploit, with every appearance against it in the outset, seems thus to have been signally successful. The Major, however, does not conceal from us that older heads than his by no means approved of such a mode of establishing authority; and he acknowledges that he got a proper good "wiggling" from the resident (Sir F. Currie) on account of his questionable proceeding. But as the affair ended well it could not be very seriously regretted, and the Major even appears to think that, all circumstances considered, it might perhaps be justified.

We must, at any rate, pass on to something else and here are a couple of paragraphs illustrative Afghan piety—and, we regret to say, rather suggestive of the ludicrous.

"I have never seen races more exact in religious observances, than those of the Dérâjât. Whatever occupation they might be engaged in, whether business or pleasure, it was always interrupted at the hours of prayer; and if one forgot it, another would pull him by the sleeve, and remind him. In my tent, which was always full of people concerned in some cause or other, they would break off the conversation, and beg to be excused for a moment; then take a scarf, and spreading it in the corner towards Mecca, devoutly commence their genuflections. If there was not room for all to pray at once, the business in hand went on, and the solemn effect of the sonorous Arabic ejaculations of the Koran was oftentimes sadly marred by the evident attention which the devotee paid to the proceedings; producing that very common squint—one eye to this world, and one to Heaven.

"Once I remember asking from those who were not praying, how many koss it might be to a certain village, and received for answer, 'Ten;' when a man praying in the corner snapped one of the Prophet's titles in two, and called out, 'Fourteen,' in a kind of parenthesis between the syllables. A still more indecorous interruption occurred during the Kolâchee settlement. One of the Gundapoor toomuns was at his noon-tide prayer, while his tenant, a Jut, was giving me his deposition as to the produce of the estate. Suddenly we were all startled by the toomun turning round, and saying, 'That's a lie! Wait till I've done my prayers, and I'll tell you all about it.'

As a general remark, the Afghans of the Dérâjât are wont to draw a favourable comparison between themselves and their brethren in Western Afghanistan, by describing the latter as 'Khoodâ-purust, wuleykin Khoodâ-turrus naheen;' i.e. a God-worshipping, but not God-fearing people; and, as far as my experience goes, I think they have justice on their side."

If the reader has no objection he shall now be introduced to one of the cleverest rascals to be found along the whole Punjab frontier—Bhowanee Sing—a bold "borderer," who occupied the fortress of Girâng on the Indus, under the great Runjeet Sing, and kept it faithfully on behalf of his descendants; but being a fellow of "predatory instincts," he became a confirmed free-booter, and levied the most unconscionable "black-mail," throughout his entire neighbourhood. The author calls him a specimen of the "true Sikh," whose very "type and embodiment" he affirms to be "a highwayman in possession of a castle." He says: "Take any man of that nation—I care not who—and give him a mud tower as his earthly portion, and next week he will be like Ali Baba, the Captain of Forty Thieves. Let him alone—that is, don't overmatch him with kings and other great policemen—and he will die a great man. It is the history of the Punjab in a nutshell."

"Bhowanee Sing," he proceeds, "had all the elements of a great rascal. He was small in stature, but his heart was a large and a hard one, and its pulsations were those of a sledge-hammer among the people round him. It was impossible to look at his wild elfin locks, and fiery eye, without clenching your fist—he looked such a villain. Perched upon the battlement of Girâng, he took an admirably just view of his position. He saw beneath him a plain very often fertile, if very often barren, and in possession of a people who were too great thieves themselves not to submit to plunder as a law of the universe. Beyond them was a plain still wilder, where rich merchants fed their camels. Nothing could be easier than to ride out and take them. The means at his disposal were ample. There was a strong fort to sally out from, and come back to, and lock up plunder; and there was a garrison of seventy-one soldiers who had no objection, of course, to be seventy-one thieves, and who, moreover, would cost nothing, but be paid by Government. If the victims complained to the Nazim of the province, what cared he for the Nazim? Was he not particularly told to keep himself independent? And if they carried their complaints to Lahore, he had only to send a share of the plunder to Lahore also. In short, Bhowanee Sing saw that there was a fine opening.

"Acting upon these views, he soon turned the royal fort of Girâng into a nest of highway robbers; the very people of the country were in his pay and service; and he extended his operations like a net over the whole country between the Indus and the Ooshteraanee hills, the boundary of Sungurh and the boundary of Choudwan. Herds and herds of camels he caused the Beloochees to drive away; and then sallying out with his horsemen, he pretended to pursue them, fired blank cartridge till all the country echoed, routed his own thieves, brought the rescued camels to Girâng, and then claimed the gratitude of the owners, with a heavy ransom equal to a quarter of the value.

"And from all this there was no appeal found in the Punjab; and Bhowanee Sing went on thus for, I believe, twenty years, doing evil, and growing rich. At last the British came; and at this point Bhowanee Sing would have left off, if he had been really the clever fellow he had hitherto appeared. But this is the way with bad men; they are certain to break down. Like ill-cast bells, they crack when they are hard rung. 'What is the British Resident to me?' said Bhowanee Sing; and he robbed on. Among others, one day his gang pounced upon a herd of camels that belonged to a Meankheyl merchant, whose name was, I think, Juhân Khan. The Meankheyls encamped hard by, took horse and pursued the robbers, who, finding themselves pressed, divided, and took separate paths across the jungle. One party was overtaken, and the furious Meankheyls came down on them sword in hand. Far in front rode one on a foaming mare, and already he was within a few yards of the spoilers, when the hinder robber turned, stuck the butt of his spear into the ground, and dropping on his right knee behind it, planted his left foot firmly against the butt, while with both hands he depressed the point, and received the charge of the Meankheyl. Vainly the horseman tried to turn it with his sword; the force of his own onset lent it strength, and entering his lungs, it issued at his back, and bore him to the earth. It was Juhân Khan, and he died two days after. The rest of the pursuers stayed to pick up their leader, and the robbers made good their retreat within the gates of the fort of Girâng.

"Juhân Khan's surviving brother, Deen Muhommud, swore revenge; and betook himself to Mooltan, where he heard there was a British officer. There he found Lieutenant Nicholson, one of the Resident's assistants, who read his petition; and writing an English note on the back, told him to take it on to me in Bunnoo, and he would get redress. I sent for Bhowanee Sing, who swore he had seized the camels because Juhân Khan would not pay his trinne, or tax on grazing. Deen Muhommud produced the Government receipt for the trinne, and the Governor of the province deposed that, had any trinne been due, Bhowanee Sing had nothing to do with its collection; so I made Bhowanee Sing deposit one hundred rupees for every camel, and the case stood over for trial, as the season for the return of the Powinduh caravans was expiring, and Deen Muhommud could stay no longer. Meanwhile Bhowanee Sing was removed from his castle at Girâng, and brought a prisoner to Lahore, where he found for once that bribery was of no use.

"It was not till my present visit to the very scene of the murder, that the trial of Bhowanee Sing came on. His noble friends in the Lahore Durbar sent him honourably down, without fetter or handcuff, and an escort more than a guard of cavalry. I put him in irons. Then, for the first time, the people of the country saw that his day was gone. A perfect 'cloud of witnesses' rose up against the fallen robber; and when at last, after a most laborious trial, Bhowance Sing was convicted, and in consideration of the lax laws under which he had lived, was sentenced to only twelve years' imprisonment, and forfeiture of the deposit money to Deen Muhommud, the brother of the murdered Meankhey! was not the only one who thought the punishment a too 'impotent conclusion' to a long career of rapine."

Major Edwardes assures us that Bhowance Sing was but one out of hundreds of strong-handed oppressors of the Punjab people, whom the British Resident and his assistants dispossessed of their scandalous strongholds, laying upon the ruins of their lawlessness the foundations of a more beneficent supremacy. The success of the English in India is intelligible enough, and has its sufficient justification in the fact, that wherever British rule and influence have been extended in that country, the condition of the general population has been materially and morally advanced. This, indeed, is the true sanction of all conquest. Power rangeth through the world, working with such instruments as occasion offers to its service, and failing not, in the round of revolutions, to make it clear that Might, wielded by wisdom and generosity, is the exact measure of the Right.

"Nulla dies sine linea."

Who coulde have thoughte that those ripe grapes whereof dear Gaffer ate soc plentifulle, s^d have ended his dayes? This event hath filled y^e house with mourning. He had us all about his bed to receive his blessing; and 'twas piteous to see father fall upon his face, as Joseph on the face of Jacob, and weep upon him and kiss him. Like Jacob, my grandsire lived to see his well-beloved son attain to y^e height of earthlie glory, his heart unspoyled and untouched.

The days of mourning for my grandsire are at an end; yet father still goeth heavilie. This forenoon, looking forth of my lattice, I saw him walking along the river side, his arm cast about Will's neck; and 'twas a dearer sight to my soul than to see the King walking there with his arm around father's neck. They seemed in such earnest converse, that I was avised to ask Will, afterwards, what they had been saying. He told me that, after much friendly chat together on this and that, fater fell into a muse, and presently, fetching a deep sigh, says,—

"Would to God, son Roper, on condition three things were well established in Christendom, I were put into a sack, and cast presently into the Thames." Will sayth,—

"What three soe great things can they be, father, as to move you to such a wish?"

"In faith, Will," answers he, "they be these.—First, that whereas the most part of Christian princes be at war, they were at universal peace. Next, that whereas the Church of Christ is at present sore afflicted with divers errors and heresies, it were well settled in a godly uniformity. Last, that this matter of the King's marriage were, to the glory of God, and the quietness of alle parties, brought to a good conclusion."

Indeed, this last matter preys on my father's soul. He hath even kuelled to the King to refrain from exacting compliance with his Grace's will concerning it; movingly reminding him, even with tears, of his Grace's own words to him on delivering the great seal, "First look unto God, and, after God, unto me." But the King is heady in this matter; stubborn as a mule or wild ass's colt, whose mouths must be held with bit and bridle if they be to be governed at alle; and the King hath taken y^e bit between his teeth, and there is none dare ride him. Alle for love of a brown girl, with a wen on her throat, and an extra finger.

How short a time agone it seemeth, that in my prosperity I sayd, "We shall never be moved; Thou, Lord, of Thy goodness hast made our hill soe strong!" . . . Thou didst turn away Thy face, and I was troubled!

Thus sayth Plato: of Him whom he soughte, but hardly found: "Truth is his body, and Light his shadow." A marvellous saying for a heathen.

Hear also what St. John sayth: "God is Light; and in him is no darkness at all." "And the Light was the life of men: and the Light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not."

Hear also what St. Augustine sayth: "They are the most uncharitable towards error who have never experienced how hard a matter it is to come at the Truth."

Hard, indeed. Here's father agaynst Will, and agaynst Erasmus, of whom he once c^d not speak well enough; and now he says that if he upholds such and such opinions, his dear Erasmus may be the devil's Erasmus for what he cares. And here's father at issue with half y^e learned heads in Christendom concerning y^e King's marriage. And yet, for alle that, I think father is in the right.

He taketh matters soe to heart that e'en his appetite fails. Yesterday he put aside his old favourite dish of brewis, saying, "I know not how 'tis, good Alice; I've lost my stomach, I think, for my old relishes" . . . and this, e'en with a tear in his eye. But 'twas not the brewis, I know, that made it start.

He hath resigned the Great Seal! And none of us knew e'en of his meditating it, nor of his having done soe, till after morning prayers to-day, when, instead of one of his gentlemen stepping up to my mother in her pew with the words, "Madam, my Lord is gone," he cometh up to her himself, with a smile on's face, and sayth, low bowing as he spoke, "Madam, my Lord is gone." She takes it for one of the manie jests whereof she misses the point; and 'tis not till we are out of church, in y^e open air, that she fully comprehends my Lord Chancellor is indeed gone, and she hath onlie her Sir Thomas More.

A burst of tears was no more than was to be looked for from poor mother; and, in sooth, we alle felt aggrieved and mortyfyde enough; but 'twas a short sorrow; for father declared that he had cast Pelion and Ossa off his back into the bottomless pit; and fell into such funny antics that we were soon as merry as ever we were in our lives. Patteson, so soon as he hears it, comes leaping and skipping across the garden, crying, "A fatted calf! let a fatted calf be killed, masters and mistresses, for this my brother who was dead is alive again!" and falls a kissing his hand. But poor Patteson's note will soon change; for father's diminished state will necessitate y^e dismissal of all extra hands; and there is manie a servant under his roof whom he can worse spare than the poor fool.

In the evening he gathers us alle about him in the pavillion, where he throws himself into his old accustomed seat, casts his arm about mother, and cries, "How glad must Cincinnatus have been to spy out his cottage again, with Raecilia standing at the gate!" Then, called for curds and cream; sayd how sweet y^e soft May air was coming over the river, and bade Cecil sing "The King's hunt's up." After this, one ballad after another was called for, till alle had sung their lay, ill or well, he listing the while with closed eyes, and a composed smile about his mouth; the two furrows between his brows relaxing graduallie till at length they e^d no more be scene. At last he says,

"Who was that old prophet that could not or would not prophesy for a King of Judah till a minstrel came and played unto him? Sure, he must have loved as I do, the very lovely song of one that playeth well upon an instrument, yclept the human heart; and have felt, as I do now, the spirit given him to speak of matters foreign to his mind. 'Tis of res angusta domæ, dear brats, I must speak; soe, the sooner begun, the sooner over. Here am I, with a dear wife and eight loved children . . . for my daughters' husbands and my son's wife are my children as much as any; and Mercy Giggs is a daughter too . . . nine children, then, and eleven grandchildren, and a swarm of servants to boot, all of whom have as yet eaten what it pleased them, and drunken what it suited them at my board, without its being any one's business to say them nay. 'Twas the dearest privilege of my Lord Chancellor; but now he's dead, and gone, how shall we contract the charges of Sir Thomas More?"

We looked from one to another, and were silent.

"I'll tell ye, dear ones," he went on. "I have been brought up at Oxford, at an Inn of Chancery, at Lincoln's Inn, and at the King's Court; from the lowest degree, that is, to the highest; and yet have I in yearly revenues at this present, little above one hundred pounds a-year; but then, as Chilo sayth, 'honest loss is preferable to dishonest gain: by the first, a man suffers once; by the second, for ever:' and I may take up my parable with Samuel, and say: 'Whose ox have I taken? whose ass have I taken? whom have I defrauded? whom have I oppressed? of whose hand have I received any bribe to blinde mine eyes therewith?' No, my worst enemies cannot lay to my charge any of these things, and my trust in you is, that, rather than regret I should not have made a purse by any such base methods, you will all cheerfully contribute your proportions to the common fund, and share and share alike with me in this my diminished state."

We all gat about him, and by our words and kisses gave warrant that we would.

"Well, then," quoth he, "my mind is, that since we are all of a will to walk down-hill together, we will do soe at a breathing pace, and not drop down like a plummet. Let all things be done decently and in order: we won't descend to Oxford fare first, nor yet to the fare of New Inn. We'll begin with Lincoln's Inn diet, whereon many good and wise men thrive well; if we find this draw too heavily on the common purse, we will, next year, come down to Oxford fare, with which many great and learned doctors have been conversant; and, if our purse stretch not to cover e'en this, why, in heaven's name! we'll go begging together, with staff and wallet, and sing a Salve Regina at every good man's door, whereby we shall still keep company, and be merry together!"

Now that the first surprise and grief, and the first fervour of fidelity and self-devotion have passed off, we have subsided into how deep and holy a quiet!

We read of the desertion of the world as a matter of course; but, when our own turn comes, it does seem strange, to find ourselves let fall down the stream without a single hand outstretched to help us; forgotten, in a moment, as though we had never been, by those who lately ate and laughed at our table. And this, without any fault or offence of ours, but merely from our having lost the light of the king's countenance. I say, it does seem strange; but how fortunate, how blessed are those to whom such a course of events only seems strange, unaccompanied by self-reproach and bitterness! I could not help feeling this, in reading an affectionate letter deare father writ this forenoon to Erasmus, wherein he sayd, "I have now obtained what, from a child, I have continually wished! that, being entirely quit of businesse and all publick affairs, I might live for a time only to God and myself."

Having no hankering after the old round he soe long hath run, he now, in fact, looks younger every day; and yet, not with the same kind of youth he had before his back was bowed under the chancellorship. 'Tis a more composed, chastised sort of rejuvenescence: rather the soft warmth of autumn which sometimes seems like May, than May itself: the enkindling, within this mortal tabernacle, of a heavenly light that never grows dim, because it is immortal; and burns the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever: a youthfulness of soul and mind characterised by growth; something with which this world and its fleeting fancies has nothing to do: something that the king can neither impart nor take away.

. . . We have had a tearfull morning . . poor Pateson has gone. My father hath obtained good quarters for him with my Lord Mayor, with a stipulation that he shall retain his office with the Lord Mayor for the time being, as long as he can fill it at all. This suits Pateson, who says he will sooner shift masters year by year, than grow too fond of any man again, as he hath of father; but there has been sad blubbering and blowing of noses.

This afternoon, coming upon Mercy seated in y^e alcove, like unto the image of some saint in a niche, her hands folded on her lap, and her eyes steadfastly agaze on the setting sun, I could not but mark how years were silentlie at work upon her, as doubtless upon us all; the tender, fearfull girl having thus graduallic changed into the sober, high-minded woman. She is so seldom scene in repose, so constantly astir and afoot in this or that kind office, mostly about the children, that I had never thought upon it before; but now I was alle at once avised to marvel that she who had so long seemed sifter for heaven than earth, shoulde never literallic have vowed herself y^e spouse of Christ, more in espécial as all expectation of being y^e spouse of anic else must long since have died within her.

I sayd, "Mercy, thou lookst like a nun: how is't thou hast ne'er become one in earnest?"

She started; then sayd, "Could I be more usefull? more harmless? less exposed to temptation? or half so happy as I am now? In sooth, Meg, the time has been when methought, how sweet y^e living death of the cloister! How good that must needs be which had the suffrages of Chrysostom the golden-mouthed, and holy Ambrose, and our own Anselm! How peacefull, to take wing like y^e dove, and fly away from a naughty world, and be at rest! How brave, to live alone, like St. Antony, in the desert! only, I would have had some books with me in my cave, and 'tis uncertayn whether St. Antony had knowledge of letters, beyond y^e heaven-taught lesson, 'God is love,' . . . for methought so much reflection and no action would be too much for a woman's mind to bear—I might goe mad: and I remembered me how the dove that gladly flew away from the ark, gladly flew back, and abode in y^e ark till such time as a new home was ready for her. And methought, cannot I live apart from sin here, and now; and as to sorrow, where can we live apart from that? Sure, we may live on y^e skirts of the world in a spirit as truly unworldlie as though we were altogether out of it: and here I may come and go, and range in the fresh air, and love other folks' children, and read my Psalter, and pore over the sayings of the wise men of old, and look on the faces I love, and sit at the feet of Sir Thomas More. Soe, thcre, Meg, are my poor reasons for not caring to be a nun. Our deare Lord is in himself all that our highest, holiest affections can seek or comprehend; for he made these our hearts; he gave us these our affections; and through them the Spirit speaks. Aspiring to their source, they rise up like the white smoke and bright flame; whilc, on earth, if left unmastered, they burn, suffocate, and destroy. Yet they have their naturall and innocent outlets even here; and a woman may warm herself by them without scorching, and yet be neither a wife nor a nun."

Ever since father's speech to us in y^e pavillion, we have beenc of one heart and one soul; neither have any of us said that aught of the things we possessed were our own, but we have had all things in common. And we have eaten our meat with gladness and singleness of heart.

This afternoon, expressing to father my gratefull sense of our present happiness . . . "Yes, Meg," returns he, "I, too, am deeply thankful for this breathing space."

"Do you look on it as no more, then?" I sayd.

"As no more, Meg: we shall have a thunder-clap by-and-by. Look out on the Thames. See how unwontedlie clear it is, and how low the swallows fly. . . How distinctlie we see the green sedges on Battersca bank, and their reflected images in the water. We can almost discern the features of those poor knaves digging in the cabbage gardens, and hear 'em talk, so still is y^e air. Have you ne'er before noted these signs?"

"A storm is browng," I sayd.

"Aye, we shall have a lightning-flash anon. So still, Meg, is also our moral atmosphere just now. God is giving us a breathing space, as he did to the Egyptians before the plague of hail, that they might gather their live stock within doors. Let us take for example them that believed and obeyed him; and improve this holy pause."

Just at this moment, a few heavie drops fell agaynst the window pane, and were scene by both. Our eyes met; and I felt a silent pang.

"Five days before the Passover," resumed father, "all seemed as still and quiet as we are now; but Jesus knew his hour was at hand. E'en while he yet spake familiarly among the people, there came a sound from heaven, and they that stood by said it thundered; but he knew it for the voice of his dear Father. Let us, in like manner, when the clap cometh, recognise in it the voice of God, and not be afraid with any amazement."

Gammer Gurney is dead, and I must say I am glad of it. The change, to her, must be blessed, and there seemed some danger lest, after having escaped being ducked for a witch, she shoulde have been burnt for a heretic. Father looked on her as an obstinate old woman; Will counted her little short of a saint and prophetess, and kept her well supplied with alle she could need. Latterly she was stone deaf; so 'tis a happy release.

The settled purpose of father's soul, just now, is to make up a marriage between Mercy and Dr. Clement. 'Tis high advancement for her, and there seems to have been some old liking between 'em we never knew of.

Though some months have passed since my father uttered his warning voice, and all continues to go quiet, I cannot forbear, now and then, to call his monition to mind, and look about for the cloud that is to bring the thunder-clap; but the expectation sobers rather than saddens me.

This morning, leaning over the river wall, I was startled by the cold, damp hand of some one from behind being laid on mine. At the same time a familiar voice exclaimed, "Canst tell us, mistress, why fools have hot heads and hands icy cold?"

I made answer, "Canst tell me, Patteson, why fools should stray out of bounds?"

"Why, that's what fools do every day," he readily replied; "but this is All Fools' Day, mine own special holiday; and I told my Lord Mayor overnight, that if he lookt for a fool this morning, he must look in the glass. In sooth, mistress Meg, I should by rights wear the gold chain and he the motley; for a proper fool he is, and I shall be glad when his year's service to me is out. The worst o' these Lord Mayors is, that we can't part with 'em till their time's up. Why now, this present one hath not so much understanding as would foot an old stocking; 'twas but yesterday when, in quality of my taster, he civilly enough makes over to me a half-caten plate of gurnet, which I wave aside, thus, saying, I eat no fish of which I cannot affirm 'rari sunt boni,' few are the bones. . . . and I protest to you he knew it not for fool's latin. Thus I'm driven, from mere discouragement, to leave prating for listening, which thou knowest, mistress, is no fool's office; and among y^e sundrie matters I hear at my lord's table . . . for he minds not what he says before his servants, thereby giving new proof 'tis he shoulde wear the motley. . . . I note his saying that y^e king's private marriage will assuredlie be made publick this coming Easter, and my Lady Anne will be crowned. . . . more by token, he knows y^e merchant that will supply the Genoa velvet and cloth of gold, and the masquers that are to enact the pageant. For the love o' safety, then, mistress Meg, bid thy good father e'en take a fool's advice, and cat humble pie betimes, for, doubt not this proud madam to be as vindictive as Herodias, and one that, unless he appease her full early, will have his head set before her in a charger. I've said my say."

Three bishops have been here this forenoon, to bid father to y^e coronation, and offer him twenty pounds to provide his dress; but father hath, with courtesie, declined to be present. After much friendly pressing, they parted, seemingly on good terms; but I have misgivings of y^e issue.

A ridiculous charge hath beene got up 'gainst dear father; no less than of bribery and corruption. One Parnell complaineth of a decree given agaynst him in favour of one Vaughan, whose wife, he deponeth, gave father a gilt flaggon. To y^e noe small surprise of the Council, father admitted that she had done soe: "But, my lords," proceeded he, when they had uttered a few sentences of reprehension somewhat too exultantlie, "will ye list the conclusion of the tale? I bade my butler fill the cup with wine, and having drunk her health, I made her pledge me, and then restored her the gift, and would not take it again."

As innocent a matter, touching the offering him a pair of gloves containing forty pounds, and his taking the first and returning the last, saying he preferred his gloves without lining, hath been made publick with like triumph to his own good fame; but alack! these feathers show which way sets the wind.

SKETCHES AND ANECDOTES OF WORTHIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

ISAAC BARROW.

IN reviewing the lives and characters of some of the most famous divines who have distinguished themselves by contributions to the theological literature of the Church of England, after Hooker and Taylor, the greatest name that occurs to us is that of Dr. Isaac Barrow. Of this illustrious triumvirate of theologians it has been admirably remarked by Bishop Heber, that "Hooker is the object of our reverence, Barrow of our admiration, and Taylor of our love." Having dwelt at some length on the lives of Hooker and Taylor, we shall now attempt to sketch, with all possible brevity, the principal incidents in the life of Barrow, whose genius was certainly of a character peculiarly calculated to excite in us feelings of admiration, and of whom it has been well said, that he "possessed the clearest head with which mathematics ever endowed an individual, and one of the most unsophisticated hearts that ever beat in the human breast."¹

Dr. Isaac Barrow was the eldest son of Mr. Thomas Barrow, a substantial citizen of London, carrying on the business of a linen-draper. Although engaged in trade, Mr. Barrow was descended from a family of some distinction in Suffolk; but it appears that the family name had been corrupted, before it reached him, from Barrough to Barrow. His wife was the daughter of a gentleman of good estate in the county of Kent, and a lady of sweet disposition and amiable manners. Their son, Isaac, was born (or rather is supposed to have been born) in the month of October, 1630.² His mother died when he was about four years old, and perhaps some of the peculiarities of his boyhood may be fairly attributed to his having been deprived at so early an age of the advantage of maternal instruction and the watchful solicitude of a mother's love. Certain it is that he grew up a rough, rude, robust, and wayward boy, fonder of pastime than study, and fonder of fighting than any other pastime. His education commenced at the Charter House, where he remained for two or three years, and where, we are told, he was always prominent in those sports which led to quarrelling and fighting among his playmates. His personal appearance corresponded with his waywardness of disposition. From his earliest years he was remarkable for his negligent and slovenly attire; and, in this respect, his disposition never changed, for at no period of his life did he deem it necessary to sacrifice to the graces, or to condescend to the neatness and nicety of apparel which befitted his station. Of intellectual pre-eminence his boyhood afforded no sign or token. "For his book," says a biographer, "he minded it not; and his father had little hope of success in the profession of a scholar, to which he had designed him, and often solemnly wished that, if it should please God to take away any of his children, it might be his son Isaac."

(2) This date has been disputed on the authority of some conversation with Barrow, reported by a friend, in which he is said to have intimated that he was born on a rather remarkable day, namely, the 29th of February.

Fortunately, for Barrow, he was removed from the Charter House before he became a confirmed idler, and was placed in a school at Felstead, in Essex, where a change in his habits and disposition was soon discernible, and where he began gradually to apply himself to learning. In the course of a short time he had made such progress, and gained so good a character, that he was appointed what his biographer calls "a little tutor" to the young Viscount Fairfax; and, in December, 1643, he was entered as a member of Peterhouse College, Cambridge, of which college his uncle, Isaac Barrow, was a fellow. In February, 1645, he commenced his residence at the University, and removed to Trinity College. The circumstance which induced him to change his college was the expulsion of his uncle, who had been sacrificed to the turbulence of the times, and ejected from his fellowship at Peterhouse by the Presbyterians. The treatment of the uncle, probably, tended to deepen the feelings of enthusiastic loyalty in which the nephew had been educated. At any rate, Barrow was noted at college for his loyalty, and he was one of those who could neither be induced by persuasion, nor by prospect of worldly advantage, to subscribe to the Covenant. Whilst steadfastly adhering to what he believed to be the strict line of duty, many were found, even amongst those of a more complying disposition, to respect his motives and conduct. It is narrated by his biographer, Mr. Abraham Hill, that "one day Dr. Hill, Master of the College, laying his hand on his head, said, 'Thou art a good lad; 'tis pity thou art a Cavalier:' and when in an oration on the Gunpowder Treason he had so celebrated the former times as to reflect much on the present, some fellows were provoked to move for his expulsion, but the

But Barrow's residence at the University was unfortunately attended with a greater inconvenience than the trifling annoyances which arose from political differences. To his great discomfort, he was exposed to the pressure of pecuniary embarrassments, and, but for the interposition of a generous and powerful friend, he would have been compelled to relinquish all hope and prospect of academic distinction. His father (who held the appointment of mercer and linen-draper to King Charles I.) had suffered much in his estate by his attachment and obstinate adherence to his sovereign's cause, and was unable to furnish the very moderate allowance required for his son's support at the University. In this extremity Barrow was fortunate enough to attract the attention of the learned and celebrated Dr. Hammond, who, having detected his ability, determined, with commendable liberality, that poverty should be no bar to his advancement. Supported by Hammond's generosity, the young student applied himself to learning with renewed earnestness and vigour, and, although a notorious royalist, and remarkable for the honesty and candour with which on all occasions he made known his opinions, he became a scholar of his college in 1647, a bachelor of arts in 1648, and a fellow in 1649.

Having established a reputation at the University, another difficulty, which he must have long foreseen, presented itself to Barrow, and this was the choice of a profession. The extinction of the royal authority, the peculiar position of the Church of England, and the ascendancy of practices and tenets to which he could not subscribe, prevented him at first from turning his attention to divinity. Conceiving the clerical profession closed against him, he was led by the bent of his inclination to prepare himself for the practice of physic, and his vigorous understanding easily mastered the elements of the sciences of anatomy, chemistry, and botany. But after his election to a fellowship, the study of medicine appearing inconsistent with the oath which he had taken on his admission, (requiring him to make divinity the principal end and object of his studies,) he began to apply himself to theology, and theology, curiously enough, caused him to direct his attention to mathematics; a department of knowledge in which he was destined to achieve a European reputation. As he proceeded in his theological investigations, his experience led him to the conclusion that the science of mathematics should be treated as the basis of every other. He found, in other words, by his own requirements, that "a divine must be a chronologist, a chronologist an astronomer, and an astronomer a geometer." His attention, however, was by no means wholly engrossed with his mathematical studies. Having been long distinguished as an elegant classical scholar, he added to his other acquirements a knowledge of Arabic, in which he made considerable progress. Nor did he neglect the lighter and more graceful accomplishments of the student. He was a diligent reader of poetry, both ancient and modern, and frequently exercised himself in poetical composition. That a just idea may be formed of his character and attainments, we must also state that he had before this period carefully studied the writings of Bacon, Descartes, and Galileo, and was thoroughly versed in all the philosophy and scientific discoveries of his age.

In 1652 Barrow became a Master of Arts, and the following year, on the resignation of the Greek professor, Dr. Dupont, he announced himself as a candidate for the vacant chair. It cannot be doubted that Barrow had peculiar qualifications for this distinction, and his claims were earnestly [supported by Dupont, whose pupil he had been; but a clamour was raised against him on account of his theological views, which it was said inclined to Arminianism, and he was consequently rejected. This disappointment preyed upon his spirits, and the aspect of public affairs added to his gloom. Compelled as he was to witness the triumph of principles that he abhorred, and the total ruin of the cause to which he was attached with his whole heart and soul, and for which his relations and dearest friends had suffered and sacrificed so much, his position appeared to him at this period a truly miserable one. To divert the current of his thoughts, and to prevent his mind from dwelling overmuch on sorrowful and disagreeable incidents, he at length resolved to try for a time a change of scene and circumstances; and, all things considered, his resolution was certainly a wise one. To a man like Barrow, of vigorous frame, undaunted courage, observant spirit, and enterprising disposition, a few years of wandering and adventure had many attractions, and appeared likely to be productive of great advantages. He had no tie of any description to detain him in England: the world was all before him; and his inclinations pointed to foreign travel as the most profitable exercise for his intellect, and the remedy best adapted to heal the wounds of a disappointed spirit. Having fully adopted the design, there were, however, some difficulties of a pecuniary nature to be encountered before it could be carried into execution. But Barrow was not to be deterred from his purpose by trifling obstacles: to procure the necessary funds for his journey he sold his library, and with the sum thus realized, about the year 1654, he set out on his travels.

It is much to be regretted that he did not leave behind him some account of his adventures and observations in foreign lands. In the absence of better information, we can but detail the course of his wanderings, during a period of nearly four years, as narrated by his literary executor and biographer, Mr. Hill, to whose sketch we have before referred. He proceeded at first to France, staying a short time in Paris with his father, who was residing there in attendance on the English Court, and from thence betook himself to the classic ground of Italy. At Florence he remained some time, and would have stayed longer but for the dearness of the place. On leaving the city of the Medici, it was his intention to visit Rome, but the prevalence of the plague there compelled him to relinquish the idea. With no very definite object, beyond a vague desire of visiting Eastern climes, he then embarked at Leghorn for Smyrna. The voyage was rather a perilous one, and was by no means destitute of excitement and adventure; for the vessel in which he sailed was attacked by an Algerine corsair, and was only saved by the skill and desperate valour of her commander and crew. Upon this occasion Barrow justified his reputation for courage, and gave an encouraging example of English spirit. As soon as the hostile craft commenced the attack, "he betook himself to his arms, stayed upon the deck, cheerfully and vigorously fighting, till the pirate, perceiving the stout defence the ship made, sheered off and left her." It has been stated that when remonstrated with afterwards on having needlessly exposed himself to danger, and asked why he did not go down into the hold, and leave the defence of the vessel to those to whom she belonged, he replied:—

"It concerned no man more than myself: I would rather have lost my life than have fallen into the hands of those merciless infidels."

From Smyrna he proceeded to Constantinople, where he remained above a year. During this time he was principally engaged in studying the works of St. Chrysostom, which were composed in that city. Having satiated his curiosity, and stored his mind with much valuable learning and information of every kind, he left the Turkish capital for Venice, on his return homewards. The vessel in which he sailed met with an accident on reaching her place of destination, which might have been attended with fatal results; for her passengers were no sooner landed than she took fire, and, with all the goods on board, was entirely consumed. From Venice Barrow travelled through Germany and Holland, and by this route reached England, without meeting with any adventure that has been specially recorded.

Shortly after his return home, the time having now elapsed when, by the terms of his oath, as a Fellow of Trinity, he was compelled to take orders, or to quit the college, Barrow was episcopally ordained by Bishop Brownrig. It was not, indeed, without great reluctance and many misgivings that he took this step; for the times were unsettled, and a dark cloud still hung over the Church. But in the course of a few months the prospect cleared; the reign of the Puritans was at an end, and the kingdom returned to its allegiance to the royal authority. We will not attempt to describe the feelings with which Barrow hailed the joyful event of the Restoration. All his life long he had been distinguished for his undeviating and consistent attachment to the royal cause. In his case loyalty was not a mere impulse or sentiment, but a principle. Upon all occasions, he inculcated a reverence for the monarchy as a positive duty, without regard to feeling or expediency. Separated by natural disposition, as well as by the circumstances of his life, from the intrigues of party and the turmoil of political strife,—utterly careless of the worldly consequences which might result from his profession of opinion,—and neither calculating on promotion, nor fearing obloquy, he persevered in his unobtrusive career of fidelity and duty, like Milton's Abdiel,—

Amidst the general acclamations which hailed the return of Charles II. to the throne of his ancestors, the learned subject of our sketch was not wholly silent. In the exultation of the moment, he indited a Latin ode on the Restoration, in which, with suitable pomp of language, he introduced Britannia congratulating her monarch on his return from exile. But notwithstanding his demonstrations of loyalty, and his many and great claims on the royal regard, in the distribution of honours and emoluments, Barrow was entirely passed over. With many other learned and faithful friends of the monarchy, he was consigned in its day of triumph to oblivion and neglect, whilst preferments and distinctions were conferred on many a worthless parasite and shameless renegade. Although he had never sought promotion, Barrow was naturally grieved and disappointed at the treatment he experienced, and in the bitterness of his spirit he wrote the well known distich :

Et nemo sensit te rediisse minus.

Though neglected by the Court, his merits were, however, at length recognised by the University; for in 1660, (the year of the Restoration,) he was chosen Professor of the Greek language at Cambridge. As soon as he was installed in this office, for which it will be remembered he had unsuccessfully struggled some years before, he delivered a course of lectures, which are reported to have been of unparalleled excellence; but having lent the manuscript of them to a friend, it was never returned, and these valuable performances were in consequence irrecoverably lost. In 1662 he was appointed Gresham Professor of Geometry, and in the following year, a professorship having been established in the University, under the will of Mr. Lucas, he was nominated to it. It was Barrow's principle, however, to hold no office without being able to dedicate to it all the attention which it might appear to require at his hands, and we find him, therefore, successively resigning both the Gresham and Lucasian professorships, entirely from conscientious feelings. To the latter chair, he had the gratification and distinction of recommending as his successor, Isaac Newton, then a young man of twenty-seven, who had already given many indications of consummate ability and original genius. It may also be mentioned that on the marriage of Charles II. with Catharine of Braganza, he wrote an epithalamium in Greek verse, which was deemed highly creditable to the University.

In recording the remaining events of Barrow's life, we are not enabled to embellish our narrative with any startling incidents. After his return from foreign travel, he passed his remaining years—and valuable years they were to the cause of learning—within the precincts of the University. His life was emphatically the life of a scholar; his character was that of the student rather than the man of the world. It is remarkable that notwithstanding his great reputation as a preacher and divine, he held scarcely any ecclesiastical preferments. Once, it is said, he was offered a valuable living, but a condition being annexed to it that he should superintend the education of the donor's son, he rejected the proposal with disdain. A small living in Wales was, at length, presented to him by his uncle, and he was afterwards appointed a prebendary of Salisbury Cathedral, by Dr. Seth Ward, bishop of that see. He deemed it right, however, as he was not able personally to perform the pastoral duties which properly devolved on him, to apply the income of both these preferments to charitable purposes, and on his elevation to a higher office in the University, he resigned them altogether. Few men in their way through life have shown a greater disregard for wealth, or have made greater sacrifices from conscientious scruples, than the subject of our present sketch, and irrespectively of the estimate which may be formed of his abilities, it is impossible not to admire his singular moderation and magnanimity of character.

In the year 1672, Dr. Barrow (he had received his degree of D.D. by mandate in 1670) was appointed by Charles II. Master of Trinity College. The careless and profligate monarch was not blind, indeed, to Barrow's merits; for he was in the habit of speaking of him as “ the unfair preacher,” meaning by that expression, that he exhausted every subject on which he touched, and left nothing for others to say after him; and when he conferred on him the mastership of his college, he made the remark that he had advanced to that dignity the best scholar in his kingdom. Whatever may be thought of Charles's judgment in such matters, it is certain that the important office could not have been conferred on an abler or better man than Barrow. As soon as he was appointed, he turned his attention to the formation of a library, the want of which had long been felt by the students, and to the erection of a suitable edifice to contain it. In the prosecution of this design, his zeal and industry knew no bounds. Upon this single affair, it is averred by his biographer, “ that he writ out quires of paper, chiefly to those who had been of the college, first to engage them, and then to give them thanks, which he never omitted.” These letters are still preserved in the edifice which was erected by means of his untiring exertions, and which remains an enduring memento of his public spirit and energy of character.

Had a longer life been vouchsafed him, we are safe in asserting that Barrow would have been remembered as a still greater benefactor to his college and to the world. His active mind was never at rest. He was always revolving schemes of improvement, and the experience of his past conduct pointed to a brilliant future career of usefulness. But as it often happens to the wisest and the best of men, when least expected, death was waiting for his prey. At the comparatively early age of forty-six, the great scholar and divine was seized with a malignant fever, which proved fatal. He died on the 4th of May, 1677, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

In person Barrow has been described as "low of stature, lean, and of a pale complexion." His bodily strength and powers of endurance were most remarkable. He had a clear, piercing grey eye, full of intellect and spirit, but was somewhat short-sighted; and it is also stated that he had a peculiarly thin skin, and was very sensible of cold. In his personal appearance he was negligent and slovenly to a reprehensible degree, and he had some strange and eccentric habits. One of his peculiarities was an inordinate love of fruit, in which he occasionally indulged to a dangerous extent. In justification of his practice, he maintained that fruit was physic to him as well as food, and he often said that if in autumn it killed hundreds, yet it preserved thousands. He was also much given to the use of tobacco, which he called his Panpharmacum, or universal medicine; holding, with many habitual smokers, that it assisted his powers of reflection, and regulated his thinking. His conversation was cheerful and facetious, and he avoided upon principle the appearance of gravity and over-strictness of demeanour so often assumed by pretenders to wisdom and piety. We say upon principle, for in one of his sermons he has admirably vindicated the grounds upon which he regulated his conduct in this respect;—forcibly observing, amongst other things, that it is most expedient "to put the world out of conceit that all sober and good men are a sort of such lumpish and sour people, that they can utter nothing but flat and drowsy stuff, by showing them that such persons, when they see cause, in condescension, can be as brisk and smart as themselves; when they please, can speak pleasantly and wittily, as well as gravely and judiciously."

From these insignificant records of Barrow's personal demeanour, we cheerfully pass to a general estimate of his character. Of his high principle, untiring energy, patience, and self-reliance, after the events of his life which we have recorded, it is unnecessary for us to speak. His judgment was clear and sound, and his writings bear witness to the variety of his acquirements, and the vigour of his mental faculties. His moral qualities were fully equal to his intellectual. The purity and rectitude of his conduct defied the darts of calumny. His character was peculiarly distinguished for manliness, simplicity, and truthfulness, and to the utmost moral firmness, he united a high degree of physical courage. The pugnacious disposition which he had manifested in boyhood, subdued by proper discipline, was gradually transformed into a spirit of firmness and fortitude, adapted to every exigence of life. We have already related one anecdote of his personal intrepidity: another, of a different nature, has been preserved, which is still more characteristic of the man. He was on one occasion a visitor at a friend's house, and had left his bed early to take a morning's walk, when he was attacked by a huge and fierce mastiff, who being chained up all day, was suffered at night to be at large. With ready presence of mind, he seized the dog by the throat, threw him down, after a severe struggle, and held him to the ground. To prevent his enemy breaking from him, he was compelled to lie upon him with his whole weight, and in this position took counsel with himself as to what it would be right for him to do. "Once," he said, "he had a mind to kill the animal, but he quite altered this resolution, judging that it would be an unjust action, for the dog did his duty, and he himself was in fault for rambling out of his lodgings before it was light." At last, having cried out loud for assistance, some people of the house came up, and relieved him from his disagreeable predicament, without any other hurt than a strain of the hand, which he felt for some days afterwards.

Barrow was never married. In early life his fellowship precluded him from aspiring to matrimony, and when he became Master of Trinity, the permission to marry which was inserted in the patent was erased at his special request. His habits were, perhaps, at this period better fitted for a single life, and if he missed the advantages of the married state, he avoided many dangers to which the scholar is proverbially liable in that condition. Although he had not, like Taylor, the society of a loving wife to cheer and console him in his days of gloom and despondency, on the other hand, he was free from the domestic annoyances to which, as we have seen, his predecessor, Richard Hooker, was exposed: if his hours of leisure were unsolaced by the companionship of a cheerful and prudent helpmate, he had not to endure the manifold discomforts to which the simple-minded author of the Ecclesiastical Polity was subject in the married state:—he was never called away from his friends to "rock the cradle," nor were his studies interrupted by the scolding of a pert virago.

Having sketched the events of Barrow's life, and attempted an estimate of his character, our next duty is to enter on a brief examination of his writings. In his twofold character of a mathematician and a divine, posterity is deeply indebted to him. His mathematical works, written in Latin, have procured him a continental reputation, and some authorities have assigned him a position only inferior to that of his illustrious friend, Sir Isaac Newton. As a theologian, his claims are still higher, and it must certainly excite surprise that a divine so wonderfully endowed was not promoted to a higher dignity in the church of which he was so great an ornament.

In the pulpit, although it has been observed that he rarely put forth all his strength, the genius of Barrow was displayed to great advantage. His sermons were full of matter, and had the character attributed to them by Charles II. of utterly exhausting the topics on which they were composed. They were, in fact, more like treatises than pulpit orations, and were invariably written with great care, being often transcribed three or four times before the author's fastidious taste was satisfied with their language or structure. Their length, as mere sermons, was excessive, and must have sometimes tried the patience of congregations; for the shortest of them occupied at least an hour and a half in the delivery. It is reported that on one occasion he preached before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London for the space of three hours and a half; and being asked, on descending from the pulpit, if he was not tired, he replied, with the utmost naïveté, that he was—of standing so long! But notwithstanding the great length of his discourses, it is certain that Barrow was not esteemed a tiresome preacher by those who had the privilege of listening to him. Though he did not aim at the higher graces of oratory, his style was admirably adapted to his matter. For pointed and pregnant periods, and for clear, strong, masculine language, he has no superior amongst English theological writers, and perhaps scarcely an equal. All that he has written is especially distinguished for consistency, propriety, and good sense, and there is "a certain air of powerful and conscious facility" in his manner, (to quote the expression of an able critic,) which gives to his productions a peculiar charm.

Having made these remarks, it remains for us to add a few quotations which may convey to the reader's mind some idea of Barrow's intellectual character. As we cannot find space for any long extracts, our object will be to select the passages most characteristic of the man, and best adapted to illustrate his style and manner.

We begin with an extract, which may well take precedence of any other, as a beautiful delineation of the Christian character, and as a powerful argument on behalf of the religion of which the author was so distinguished a minister:—"An honest pagan historian saith, of the Christian profession, that 'nil nisi justum suadet et lenè;' the which is a true, though not full character thereof. It enjoineth us that we should sincerely and tenderly love one another, should earnestly desire and delight in each other's good, should heartily sympathise with all the evils and sorrows of our brethren, should be ready to yield them all the hope and comfort we are able, being willing to part with our substance, our ease, our pleasure for their benefit or succour; not confining this our charity to any sort of men, particularly related or affected toward us, but, in conformity to our heavenly Father's boundless goodness, extending it to all; that we should mutually bear one another's burthens, and bear with one another's infirmities, mildly resent and freely remit all injuries, all discourtesies done unto us, retaining no grudge in our hearts, executing no revenge, but requiting them with good wishes and good deeds. It chargeth us to be quiet and orderly in our stations, diligent in our calling, veracious in our words, upright in our dealings, observant in our relations, obedient and respectful towards our superiors, meek and gentle to our inferiors; modest and lowly, ingenuous and compliant in our conversation, candid and benign in our censures, innocent and inoffensive, yea, courteous and obliging in all our behaviour towards all persons. It commandeth us to root out of our hearts all spite and rancour, all envy and malignity, all pride and haughtiness, all evil suspicion and jealousy; to restrain our tongue from all slander, all detraction, all reviling, all bitter and harsh language; to banish from our practice whatever may injure, may hurt, may needlessly vex or trouble our neighbour. It engageth us to prefer the public good before any private convenience, before our own opinion or humour, our credit or fame, our profit or advantage, our ease or pleasure; rather discarding a less good from ourselves, than depriving others of a greater. Now, who can number or estimate the benefits that spring from the practice of these duties, either to the man that observes them, or to all men in common? O divinest Christian charity! what tongue can worthily describe thy most heavenly beauty, thy incomparable sweetness, thy more than royal clemency and bounty! how nobly dost thou enlarge our mind beyond the narrow sphere of self and private regard, into a universal care and complacency, making every man ourself, and all concerns to be ours!"

His sermon on the nature of Christian Charity contains the following beautiful delineation of the most attractive of Christian graces, which is at any rate worthy of the second place in our selections:—"Is any man fallen in disgrace? Charity doth hold down its head, is abashed and out of countenance, partaking of his shame. Is any man disappointed of his hopes or endeavours? Charity crieth out Alas! as if it were itself defeated. Is any man afflicted with pain or sickness? Charity looketh sadly, it sigheth and groaneth, it fainteth and languisheth with him. Is any man pinched with hard want? Charity, if it cannot succour, will condole. Doth ill news arrive? Charity doth hear it with an unwilling ear and a sad heart, although not particularly concerned in it. The sight of a wreck at sea, of a field spread with carcasses, of a country desolated, of houses burnt and cities ruined, and of the like calamities incident to mankind, would touch the bowels of any man; but the very report of them would affect the heart of charity."

It may be mentioned to Barrow's credit that he steadily and vigorously assailed the fashionable vices of the age in which he lived; and we know not where his clear strong sense and power of argumentation appear to greater advantage than in his admirable discourses on the abuses of the faculty of speech, which were especially rife at that period.

In one sermon we find him forcibly rebuking the habit of swearing, which, however impious and unseemly, was too frequently cultivated as an accomplishment by the gay Cavalier and the profligate courtier of the Restoration. Whilst, however, the royalist gentleman indulged in the utterance of oaths and curses, as a proof of his breeding and gentility, the royalist divine denounced from the pulpit this odious practice, as not merely hateful in the sight of God, but as "uncivil and unmannerly," when judged by ordinary rules of politeness. "If men would but a little consider things," he says, "surely this scurvy fashion would be soon discarded, as much fitter for the scum of the people than for the flower of the gentry; yea rather, much below any man endued with a scrap of reason, not to say with a grain of religion. Could we bethink ourselves, certainly modest, sober, and pertinent discourse would appear far more generous and manly, than such wild hectoring God Almighty, such rude insulting over the received laws, such ruffianly swaggering against sobriety and goodness. If gentlemen would regard the virtues of their ancestors, (that gallant courage, that solid wisdom, that noble courtesy which first advanced their families and severed them from the vulgar,) this degenerate wantonness and dirtiness of speech would return to the dunghill, or rather, (which God grant,) would be banished from the world."

With equal point and vigour does he describe and condemn the prevalence of slander and scandal, and the mischievous habit of reckless and foolish speaking, which then pervaded society to a great extent. The records of judicial proceedings prove to us that actions for slanderous words were particularly common at this epoch; much more so, indeed, than at any subsequent period. The courts were continually occupied with the vindication of private character; and this circumstance strongly points to the depraved appetite of the community. It was, therefore, by no means without correct data for the remark, or in any tone of exaggeration, that Barrow spoke of slander as a sin, which though it had been in all times and places epidemical and rife, did especially seem to reign and rage in that age and country. "There are implacable dissensions," he observes, (when attempting to account for the remarkable prevalence of this vice,) "fierce animosities and bitter zeals springing up; there is an extreme curiosity, niceness, and delicacy of judgment; there is a mighty affectation of seeming wise and witty by any means; there is a great unsettlement of mind and corruption of manners generally diffused over people: from which sources it is no wonder that this flood hath so overflowed that no banks can restrain it, no fences are able to resist it; so that ordinary conversation is full with it, and no demeanour can be secure from it. If we do mark what is done in many (might I not say, in most) companies, what is it, but one telling malicious stories of, or fastening odious characters upon, another? What do men commonly please themselves in so much, as in carping and harshly censuring, in defaming and abusing their neighbours? Is it not the sport and divertisement of many to cast dirt in the faces of all they meet with; to bespatter any man with foul imputations? Doth not in every corner a Momus lurk, from the venom of whose spiteful and petulant tongue no eminency of rank, dignity of place, or sacredness of office, no innocence or integrity of life, no wisdom or circumspection in behaviour, no good nature or benignity in dealing and carriage, can protect any person?"

Whilst rebuking the authors and concocters of slanderous and malicious stories, the great divine does not spare the much larger class of reckless and foolish speakers who propagate, from a sheer love of mischief, the malignant lie that has been set afloat by others. "Another way" [of foolish speaking], he says, "is receiving from others and venting such stories which they who do it certainly know, or may reasonably presume, to be false; the becoming hucksters of counterfeit wares, or factors in this vile trade. There is no false coiner who hath not some complices and emissaries, ready to take from his hand, and put off his money; and such slanderers at second hand are scarcely less guilty than the first authors. He that breweth lies may have more wit and skill; but the broacher showeth the like malice and wickedness. In this there is no great difference between the great devil that frameth scandalous reports, and the little imps that run about and disperse them."

One of Barrow's finest passages, and probably the passage oftenest selected for quotation, is his definition and description of the qualities and properties of wit. Although better known than anything else in his writings, we cannot refrain from presenting it to our readers:—"To the question, what the thing we speak of is, or what this facetiousness doth import, I might reply as Democritus did to him that asked the definition of a Man, 'Tis that which we all see and know: any one better apprehends what it is by acquaintance, than I can inform him by description. It is indeed a thing so versatile and multiform, appearing in so many shapes, so many postures, so many garbs, so variously apprehended by several eyes and judgments, that it seemeth no less hard to settle a clear and certain notion thereof, than to make a portrait of Proteus, or to define the figure of a fleeting air. Sometimes it lieth in pat allusion to a known story, or in reasonable application of a trivial saying, or in forging an apposite tale: sometimes it playeth in words and phrases, taking advantage from the ambiguity of their sense, or the affinity of their sound: sometimes it is wrapped in a dress of humorous expression; sometimes it lurketh under an odd similitude; sometimes it is lodged in a sly question, in a smart answer, in a quirkish reason, in a shrewd intimation, in cunningly diverting, or cleverly retorting an objection: sometimes it is couched in a bold scheme of speech, in a tart irony, in a lusty hyperbole, in a startling metaphor, in a plausible reconciling of contradictions, or in acute nonsense: sometimes a scenical representation of persons or things, a counterfeit speech, a mimical look or gesture passeth for it: sometimes an affected simplicity, sometimes a presumptuous bluntness, giveth it being; sometimes it riseth from a lucky hitting upon what is strange, sometimes from a crafty wresting obvious matter to the purpose; often it consisteth in one knows not what, and springeth up one can hardly tell how. Its ways are unaccountable and inexplicable, being answerable to the numberless roivings of fancy and windings of language. It is, in short, a manner of speaking out of the simple and plain way, (such as reason teacheth and proveth things by,) which by a pretty surprising uncouthness in conceit or expression doth affect and amuse the fancy, stirring in it some wonder, and breeding some delight thereto. It raiseth admiration, as signifying a nimble sagacity of apprehension, a special felicity of invention, a vivacity of spirit and reach of wit more than vulgar.

. . . . It also procureth delight, by gratifying curiosity with its rareness or semblance of difficulty; as monsters, not for their beauty, but their rarity; as juggling tricks, not for their use, but their abstruseness, are beheld with pleasure, by diverting the mind from its road of serious thoughts; by instilling gaiety and airiness of spirit; by provoking to such dispositions of spirit in way of emulation or complaisance; and by seasoning matters, otherwise distasteful or insipid, with an unusual and thence grateful tang."

On the spirit of detraction, so commonly observable in narrow and ill-natured minds, Barrow has left us these fine remarks, in a sermon on that subject:—"An honest and charitable mind disposes us when we see any man endued with good qualities and pursuing a tenor of good practice, to esteem such a person, to commend him, to interpret what he doeth to the best, not to suspect any ill of him, or to seek any exception against him; it inclineth us, when we see any action materially good, to yield it due approbation and praise, without searching for, or surmising any defect in the cause or principle whence it cometh, in the design or end to which it tendeth, in the way or manner of performing it. A good man would be sorry to have any good thing spoiled: as to find a crack in a fair building, a flaw in a fine jewel, a canker in a goodly flower, is grievous to any indifferent man; so would it be displeasing to him to observe defects in a worthy person, or commendable action; he therefore will not easily entertain a suspicion of any such, he never will hunt for any. But on the contrary, 'tis the property of a detractor, when he seeth a worthy person, whom he doth not affect, or whom he is concerned to wrong, to survey him thoroughly, and to sift all his actions, with intent to descry some failing, or any semblance of a fault, by which he may disparage him; when he vieweth any good action, he peereth into it, labouring to espy some pretence to derogate from the commendation apparently belonging to it. . . . As good nature and ingenious disposition incline men to observe, like, and commend what appeareth best in our neighbour; so malignity of temper and heart promoteth to espy and catch at the worst: one, as a bee, gathereth honey out of any herb; the other, as a spider, sucketh poison out of the sweetest flower."

We have perhaps quoted sufficient, and more than sufficient, to justify the remarks which we have made on the characteristics of Barrow's English prose. Although his sermons are not, like Taylor's, thickly studded with poetical embellishments and rhetorical graces, there is a nervous, manly, forcible strain of reasoning eloquence running through them all which will never fail to commend them to the attentive perusal of those who recognise the careful study of our best authors as an important part of their intellectual training. We conclude this paper with a few sentences on the goodness and greatness of God, which appear to us especially deserving of citation as a favourable sample of the author's more elevated style:—

"Wherever we direct our eyes, whether we reflect them inward upon ourselves, we behold His goodness to occupy and penetrate the very root and centre of our beings; or extend them abroad towards the things about us, we may perceive ourselves enclosed wholly, and surrounded with His benefits. At home, we find a comely body framed by His curious artifice, various organs fitly apportioned, situated and tempered for strength, ornament, and motion, actuated by a gentle heat, and invigorated with lively spirits, disposed to health, and qualified for a long endurance; subservient to a soul endued with divers senses, faculties and powers, apt to inquire after, pursue, and perceive various delights and contents. Or when we contemplate the wonderful works of nature, and, walking about at our leisure, gaze upon this ample theatre of the world, considering the stately beauty, constant order, and sumptuous furniture thereof, the glorious splendour and uniform motion of the heavens, the pleasant fertility of the earth, the curious figure and fragrant sweetness of plants, the exquisite frame of animals, and all other amazing miracles of nature, wherein the glorious attributes of God (especially His transcendent goodness) are most conspicuously displayed, (so that by them not only large acknowledgments, but even congratulatory hymns, as it were, of praise, have been extorted from the mouths of Aristotle, Pliny, Galen, and such like men, never suspected guilty of an excessive devotion,) then should our hearts be affected with thankful sense, and our lips break forth into His praise."

"OUR poor Geronimo thought himself really on the road to the other world. He would doubtless have been there, if he had not forgotten, in his distress, to reopen the wound with his nails, as he originally intended. Fear and emotion had caused him to faint. Lidia, who hastened from the house on hearing the cries of the groom, found the abbé lying in the carriage, with his arm bare, the sleeve of his shirt drawn up to the shoulder, his eyes nearly closed and his mouth half open. This pitiable sight moved the young widow. Although there were no traces of blood, it might easily be seen that Geronimo had endeavoured feebly to put an end to his life, and that a circumstance almost independent of his will had prevented his committing suicide. Lidia refastened the bandages quickly, threw some cold water on the face of the invalid, rubbed his temples with vinegar, and soon had the pleasure of seeing him revive. Geronimo opened his eyes, his colour returned, and he soon felt as well as it was possible for a lover overwhelmed with grief. He was conducted to the house, where the whole family began to reproach him gently.

“‘Do you know,’ said the young widow to him, ‘that it is very improper to come here to die at my door, to scandalize me in this manner? I should have been reproached as if it had been my fault. People would have talked of it for the next ten years. Thank goodness! all has passed off with but little noise. Was a man ever known to kill himself because his accent was laughed at? That was truly an idea worthy of a Biscéliais! No one but a native of Bisceglia would ever have dreamt of such a thing! Let us take care that this adventure is not related to any one, for Don Pangrazio would certainly have it acted at San Carlino if it were made known. Signor Geronimo, now that you have recovered from your alarm, pray banish all your extravagant notions.’

“The curé of San-Giovanni-Teduccio, who soon arrived, conducted by Antonietto, gave the abbé a short lecture, and promised silence. Geronimo swore that he would no longer think of death, and returned to Naples, cured of his folly, and ashamed of his absurdity. However, his confusion was agreeably diminished by the thought of his resurrection. In the evening, whilst he was playing at ‘scoppa,’ in a café in the Strada di Toledo, a woman requested his attention for a few moments; she was the servant of the young widow.

“‘My mistress,’ said the woman, ‘has sent me to town, Signor Geronimo, to tell you that she earnestly requests you to live—that you would disoblige and grieve her were you to think still of dying—that you must come and see her often, as do her other friends, and she will willingly teach you to speak Neapolitan correctly.’

“This delicate attention restored the hopes of the poor abbé. He fancied it was intended for an encouragement, and doubted not that in taking lessons in Neapolitan, the pupil would inspire the instructor with a tender affection. The following morning, he went to the house of the beautiful Lidia to testify his docility. His five rivals had preceded him, but he displayed no jealousy, and joined them in the attack of gallantry. Two of his rivals had pretensions to wit; Geronimo opposed them without affectation, and, if he had not always the advantage in the skirmish of bon-mots, he atoned for his defeat by his modesty and good temper. Two other rivals, dressed very fashionably, and loaded with gold chains and ornaments, were models of dandyism, whom Geronimo could not pretend to equal in magnificence of dress. He contented himself with vying with them in the grace of his attitudes. The Calabrais alone, with his ferocious manner and stentorian voice, inspired him with as much fear as dislike, but the abbé carefully avoided any discussion that might degenerate into a quarrel. He was a little laughed at on account of his accent, but he took all the raillery in good part, and kept his temper admirably. Aunt Filippa, who took him under her special protection, came to his aid, and Lidia complimented him on his good temper.

“One Saturday morning, the two dandies went to San-Giovanni-Teduccio in order to give into Lidia’s charge the key of the box which they had purchased for the evening at San Carlino. While so doing, they expressed a desire that Signor Geronimo should be of the party. The abbé entering at the moment, the young widow turned to him and said,—

“‘We are going to San Carlino to-night, and I offer you a seat with us. You will be able to compare the Biscéliais accent with the Neapolitan, which will be an excellent lesson for you.’

“‘That is to say,’ returned Geronimo, ‘you wish to compare me to Don Pangrazio. Since such is your pleasure, I will not refuse you the amusement. I will go to San Carlino; and we will see how far I resemble an old buffoon.’

“Notwithstanding his amiability, the abbé could not conceal his mortification in thinking of the ridicule with which he was menaced. To calm his dissatisfaction, Lidia invited him to remain to dinner. She helped him with her own beautiful hand to ‘ravioli,’ ‘lazagui’ and veal ‘à l’humido,’ so that on leaving the dinner-table he felt his good temper and even his cheerfulness perfectly restored. In the evening, the carriage which had been ordered from Naples arrived, and Geronimo departed with dame Filippa and her beautiful niece. On reaching the theatre, the abbé found his five rivals waiting in the hall. The orchestra was playing the overture. Soon the curtain rose, and Don Pangrazio entered loaded with all kinds of preservatives from misfortune: the bull’s horns, the hands of coral, the rat made of lava from Vesuvius, the heart, the pitchfork and the serpent. He was received with a burst of laughter, as usual; then he advanced to the front of the stage with a sheepish air, in order to confide to the public his superstitious fears.

“‘Gentlemen,’ said he, ‘if I have forgotten anything, inform me of it, I pray you, for charity’s sake. These large horns which I carry under each arm preserve my forehead from a similar ornament. By turning this coral hand, the first and little finger of which are open, towards persons of a suspicious appearance, I shall avoid all pernicious influence. This rat is to eat all papers that might cause me anxiety. This pitchfork will prevent my losing my way, and will keep all lesser accidents far from me. This serpent will preserve me from deceit and perfidy, and this cornelian heart is a certain talisman against the arts and coquetry of the women of this country. My attire is complete, and I have been told that I may now venture into the Strada di Toledo. I perceive with pleasure that one is safe at Naples, and that unless he forgets some one precaution, a prudent man runs no risk in this capital; however, I am not free from uneasiness. I have had a disagreeable dream, and I really feel inclined to return to Bisceglia.’

which he discovered all kinds of prognostics. In the midst of his hypotheses he saw the extraordinary figure of Tartaglia, thus named on account of his stammering. Tartaglia is a personage in great favour with the Neapolitans, like Don Pangrazio. He represents a man much injured by the climate, and suffering from a chronic ophthalmic disease. His sunken cheeks, his long nose surmounted by enormous blue spectacles, his look of ill-health and the defect in his speech, constitute the particular marks of the wizard, whom it is dangerous to meet. In fact, every conceivable accident happens to the unfortunate Pangrazio at the same moment. Whilst he is busied with his amulets, one thief steals his handkerchief, another his snuff-box, and a third his watch. A girl pretends to take him for her lover whom the corsairs have seized and taken to Barbary; she embraces him, and torments him to a terrible degree by her caresses. Pangrazio attempts to make his escape, when a carriage knocks him down into the mud. He rises in a furious temper, cursing the thieves and wicked girls of Naples, when two young men, elegantly dressed, approach him politely, and assist him to remove the mud from his clothes.

“Is it possible! Signor Pangrazio,” said they, “that a person of your rank and merit is in this state? How happy we are to be able to assist and guide you in this town, with which you are unacquainted! Take care of the cheats; mistrust the whole world without exception. Here, waiter! a brush, a towel and some water for Signor Pangrazio.”

“The Biscélliais is delighted with so fortunate a ‘rencontre,’ and speaks with rapture of the politeness and amiability of the men of rank at Naples. Not content with assisting him to brush his clothes, these amiable young men request the honour of his company at dinner, that they may enjoy the pleasure of his conversation for at least a few minutes longer. They order the waiter to serve Signor Pangrazio with the best and most expensive dishes: rice with green peas, cutlets fried ‘à la Milanais,’ eggs, radishes, salad and cucumbers. Pangrazio prefers macaroni to all these things; they serve him with a plate of it, which he divides with his fingers and consumes. In the mean time, the two young men breakfast and empty the costly dishes which the Biscélliais would not touch; then exchanging looks, they rise, take their hats, and, amidst a profusion of compliments and salutations, disappear, leaving the unfortunate Pangrazio in a very disagreeable situation, and in one which he finds very onerous to his economical Biscélliais purse. The old man can scarcely believe himself the dupe of his credulity. After amusing the public with his droll conjectures on the absence of the two young men, he concludes by paying the bill, but not without endeavouring to bargain. Pangrazio ascribes all his misfortunes to the wizard Tartaglia; he makes a rush at the throat of the old stammerer, and endeavours to strangle him; he is however seized, and prevented from avenging himself on the object of his fear and dislike. After this, the Biscélliais sends to the devil

the whole of his useless talismen and returns to his native village, vowing never to return to Naples—until the following day, in order again to act before the company who shall be pleased to honour the theatre with their presence. The five rivals of our abbé repeated with infinite glee the speeches and maledictions of the superstitious and duped old man. Geronimo joined in the general laugh, but not heartily; however, his turn came when the cheater of the young men of fashion and their disgraceful flight excited laughter and jests. The two fashionable suitors of the young widow bit their lips; the abbé amused himself at their expense, and as Lidia joined him, he considered himself amply avenged for the comparison between himself and Don Pangrazio.

“The play being ended, Geronimo proposed a walk in the town. The Calabrais had already taken possession of Lidia’s arm; Geronimo offered his to her aunt, the other young men followed behind. The abbé having invited the ladies to take some ices, the whole party seated themselves round a table at the Café de l’Europe. After the refreshments had disappeared, the conversation ceased. One of the fashionable young men called for the ‘Gazette des Deux-Siciles,’ the other for the ‘Salvator Rosa.’ The two beaux-esprits pretended to read the ‘Quotidienne’ and the ‘Débats,’ although French was to them as perfectly unintelligible as Hebrew. The Calabrais employed himself merely in humming a tune.

“We must ride home,” said the young widow.

“I will go and fetch a carriage,” said the Calabrais, leaving the table hastily.

“One of the fashionable young men whispered to the other, entreating him to pay the expenses.

“The two beaux-esprits became intensely interested in the French journals.

“It is exactly like this evening’s play,” exclaimed Lidia with a melodious laugh.

“Bravo!” cried Aunt Filippa, holding her sides; “where is the Don Pangrazio? Call Don Pangrazio to pay the bill. I see very well that the Biscélliais alone has money, and we must not trust to the fine airs of fashionable young men.”

“Gentlemen,” said Geronimo, “I had foreseen your eagerness to pay, but as it was I who offered ices to the company, I cannot suffer another to share the expense; therefore, I gave a piastre to the waiter on entering.”

“The Calabrais soon returned with a carriage. Whilst he was conducting Lidia to it, the aunt took Geronimo aside and whispered to him,—

“The Madonna protects handsome young men. This has been a fortunate evening for you; I am going to talk to my niece.”

VI.

"The day after this adventure, Don Geronimo received a challenge from Don Giacomo, the Calabrais, which he accepted, and went the following morning with his two seconds to the Porta Capuana, the spot appointed for the combat. After waiting some minutes, a fly arrived, containing the seconds of the Calabrais; they descended, and one of them, approaching the abbé and his seconds, said,

"Gentlemen, we beg ten thousand pardons for having caused you to rise so early on account of a bravado. Don Giacomo has left the town, and we have heard that he has sent information to the police. If we are not arrested by the gendarmes, it is because the attempt is useless, and the combat impossible, one of the combatants having departed."

"If so," said the abbé, "let us go and breakfast together."

"With all that," murmured Antonietto, "I have acted against my own interest, and have lost a magnificent legacy."

"They then entered a café, where they breakfasted with good spirits and a good appetite.

"We will let every one hear of the courage of Don Geronimo and the cowardice of his adversary," said the four seconds.

"And in truth, this event created some noise in the town. It was talked of in the cafés with much glee, and when Geronimo returned for the first time to San-Giovanni-Teduccio, the lovely widow gave him her forehead to kiss, saying,—

"If your adversary had not been a coward, you would have hazarded your life for me. I shall remember it, my good friend."

"Yes," added the old aunt. "You are an amiable young man, Don Geronimo, and what is more, you are brave. I like those kind of people. When you have a wife, she may feel herself in safety, being protected by your arm. It is not so with the beaux-esprits and men of fashion. I will say no more, but so much the worse for those who have ears and do not listen to me."

"Dame Filippa had remarked that 'the Madonna protected handsome young men,' and certainly this was verified in the instance of Geronimo, for, one fine day, our abbé found that he had got rid of all his rivals, not by intrigue, but thanks to his little share of courage and the special protection of the Virgin. The two beaux-esprits having received nothing but discouraging and ironical replies to their elegantly turned phrases, considered Lidia too insensible to the beauties of eloquence to be worthy their homage. The two fashionable young men, deeply mortified by the adventure at the Café de l'Europe, imagined they would screen themselves from ridicule by laughing at Lidia and at the plebeian manners of her aunt. Kind friends were not wanting to repeat and exaggerate these remarks and jests. The young widow heard of them, and shut her door against the jesters; so that out of six lovers, there was left only one, namely, our abbé, to visit San-Giovanni-Teduccio. Lidia treated him with familiarity, as a friend of no importance; but her father and aunt doubted not that friendship would soon give rise to a more tender sentiment.

"In the mean time, Geronimo passed his days at the house of the young widow. He dined there frequently, played at cards with the elderly persons, conducted the family to the theatre and to fêtes, and was invited to all parties of pleasure. Besides which, he enjoyed the privilege of carrying the parasol, the shawl, and all little parcels in general belonging to the lady, of performing numerous commissions, of preserving 'madame' from draughts of air, calling coachmen, paying for refreshments, and scolding the boatmen.

"The uncle of our abbé had, doubtless, exaggerated the dangers to which a young man in Naples is exposed; yet his severe remarks about the women were not absolutely false. The Neapolitan women are intelligent, energetic, and gifted with extraordinary presence of mind, but they are also self-willed, sarcastic, pitiless to those who displease them, hostile in words even to those whom they love, as if they were angry with them for having pleased them. Love of command and dominion is the predominant feature of their character. The Neapolitan men adopt a half serious and half comic language, in order to excite coquetry, or to beat a retreat in case of failure. Poor Geronimo was a native of Bisceglia. He could not imitate the light tone of the Neapolitans, who, even when endeavouring to depict their attachment, preserve their independence and gaiety. When he spoke of his affection, it was in the most serious manner possible.

"Lidia, although she had not the faults of the Neapolitan women in a very marked manner, was nevertheless hasty, changeable, and abrupt. Eagerness to obey her did not obtain from her those delicate rewards which a French lady bestows with so much talent; she interrupted protestations of devotion by laughing, and dwelt only on proofs of indifference: so that after three months of unwearied assiduity, Geronimo could not tell whether he had gained or lost in the esteem of the lovely widow.

"When the winter arrived, Lidia returned to town, and Geronimo still continued his daily visits. His attentions were redoubled without receiving any better treatment, and he might have remained in that condition until death, had not an incident at that time occurred which completely changed the course of events.

"It was towards the end of January, on one of those clear and lovely mornings of which the sky of Naples is so lavish, that the young widow took it into her head to make an excursion to Sorrente. She persuaded Maitre Michel, her father, to leave his shop, and the old aunt to dress herself; the rest was left to Don Geronimo. They took the train to Castellamare, and hired a carriage for the two leagues between Castellamare and Sorrente, following the sea-shore along the most beautiful and most picturesque road in the world. On reaching Sorrente, dame Filippa and her niece each mounted a mule, and the whole party began to ascend the mountain. They had not proceeded more than two hundred steps, when dame Filippa, holding the bridle of her mule's head, called Maitre Michel back and kept him by her side. The mule driver, with the sagacity of his race, perceived that a lille-à-lille between the young persons was desired, and stayed behind to gather wild flowers. Geronimo, with one hand resting on the saddle which bore his adored Lidia, and with the other playing with his cane, walked in silence for some distance. At length, heaving a deep sigh, and looking tenderly at his companion, he exclaimed,—

“ ‘Is it possible that this lovely Nature, which is beginning to awake after the sleep of winter,—this zephyr, which is wafted from Sicily,—these perfumes of spring, speak not to your heart, beautiful Lidia?’ ”

“ ‘Unquestionably,’ replied the young widow, ‘Nature says many pretty things to me; but I can assure you, it does not speak to me of you, at this moment, so probably you do not care to know of what I am thinking.’ ”

“ ‘You do me injustice,’ returned Geronimo. ‘Be your reflections what they may, I shall only be too happy to hear them.’ ”

“ ‘In order to communicate yours to me; is it not so? Well, that is useless; I know all that you are dying to tell me, and I will repeat it verbatim. Here it is: O divine Lidia! look at this lovely sky, these rocks on which the aloe and fig-tree press amorously against each other; listen to the murmur of the wind in the branches of this green oak, which is inviting you to sit under its shade—the voices which rise from the bosom of the sea, where the gold-fish sport in the sun—the insects humming under the grass and moss;—all these things tell you that Don Geronimo is dying of love for you, and that you must make haste and give him your heart.’ ”

“ ‘You wish to discourage me by your jests,’ said Geronimo, ‘but you have not guessed what I am thinking of; it is something far different.’ ”

“ ‘Then you intend to favour me with a tirade of reproaches, in which you will delicately remind me of the little services you have rendered me, the martyrdom I cause you to endure, the dangers you have incurred for my beautiful eyes, and, after dwelling on the horror of ingratitude, you will amiably add that you are willing to pardon these frightful wrongs if I will consent to call you by the delightful name of husband. I know all that by heart, and instead of hearing a new edition, I prefer looking at the lizards which are crossing our path, the ears of my mule, and the shadow of your hat.’ ”

“ ‘As you please; but you have not guessed my thoughts.’ ”

“ ‘I can do very well without knowing them.’ ”

“ ‘I will wait until you are disposed to listen to me, for they are things you must know. I could have wished to tell you them here, in the hope of finding you in an indulgent mood on so lovely a day as this. It must be for another time.’ ”

“ ‘Speak now, Signor Geronimo; I have time to listen to you at present—my indulgence shall equal the docility of my mule.’ ”

“ ‘Then I will avail myself of the opportunity. Lidia, when a vessel has struck on the rocks, when it escapes the fury of the waves and returns to the harbour, if the captain does not think of the dangers it has encountered, and the trials it has experienced, it may chance to sink at a time when he least expects it. The weary horse dies, if his master does not give him food and repose after his fatigue.’—

“ ‘The commencement is august,’ interrupted Lidia. ‘I know what you are going to say,—your heart resembles a vessel that has struck against the rocks, and a weary horse.’ ”

“ ‘Ungrateful, unjust, pitiless woman!’ exclaimed Geronimo, ‘shall I never find indulgence in your heart? What moment of the day, what day of the year, must I select in order to speak to you of love, which you are driving to despair? Have I not given you sufficient proofs of my devotion and perseverance? It is not my affection which fails me, but my strength. I feel that my courage is leaving me. To-day you must answer me, seriously; to-morrow will be too late.’ ”

“ ‘Oh!’ exclaimed the young widow, ‘I was wrong in expecting reproaches; you have favoured me with menaces instead of reproaches. As to the serious answer you demand, you shall have it now. If your strength and courage fail, I am very sorry; but I cannot take a husband without loving him, and I do not love you enough to marry you. If it were not so, do you think I should wait in this manner for weeks and months? You see me every day from morning to night—what prevents you from inspiring me with love? You know not, neither do I. Is it not enough for you that I prefer no one to you? If you despair of touching my heart, it is not my fault. As soon as I share your attachment, you will know it. To question me is useless, therefore silence your menaces and complaint, and let us stop here; this magnificent view will calm your mind.’ ”

“ ‘Sublime nature!’ exclaimed he, weeping, ‘I call thee to witness my last effort, and the insensibility of her for whom I would willingly give my life.’ ”

“ ‘Pray don't scream so,’ said Lidia; ‘I like you much better when you speak in a lower tone, as you did just now.’ ”

“ ‘It is the Divine will,’ pursued Geronimo, heedless of the interruption, ‘which displays itself in this fatal insensibility. To it will I bow. O grief! O deception! O salutary discouragement! I will return where heaven bids me.’ ”

“ ‘The arrival of the rest of the party interrupted the conversation of the young people. The excited state of Geronimo did not escape the eye of dame Filippa. When the company had examined and admired the Gulf of Salerno, the ladies remounted’ ” their mules to return to Sorrento. In descending the mountain, dame Filippa motioned Geronimo to remain behind with Michel, and approaching Lidia, said to her:—

“My niece, you give pain carelessly to Don Geronimo, who is an excellent young man, and who loves you tenderly. This is very wrong. Take care; such conduct causes unhappiness. It is time to finish this cruel game, which Christian charity and reason alike condemn. Virtù della Madonna! Of what are the young girls of the present generation made? In my time we did not torment the men thus. Without waiting three whole months before I decided on accepting a devoted lover, I married the first who made me an offer, and that before I was eighteen years of age, I can assure you.”

“Dear Aunt,” replied Lidia, “you did as you pleased, and very wisely, I am sure. Permit me to act differently. The young girls of your day were much better than those of the present, that is evident. It is not my fault if I am not fifty years old. Since I am poor in years, permit me not to contract a second marriage against my wishes, and do not scold me.”

“Poor in years, poor in reason and in experience, my lovely one,” resumed dame Filippa. “I do not scold you, I think only of your happiness. This coquetry, this fickleness, does not become a sensible girl like yourself. You want a husband—see how rare a good one is. Your youth and beauty have attracted many suitors; how different is Don Geronimo from all the others! he loves you passionately. You have reflected and delayed long enough; take him for your husband at once, or soon you will be unable to do it. I see very clearly that he will wait no longer. Do not delay until Sunday or even until to-morrow; let me tell him this very moment that you give your consent.”

“For pity’s sake, dear Aunt, do not be in such a hurry. If you admire Don Geronimo so much, why do not you marry him?”

“It would be folly for me to marry him, and folly for you to refuse him. Once more, I seek your happiness. I see clearly, and perceive that it is time to cease this cruel game. You will not attend to me now; soon, regret will come.”

As though he had guessed what dame Filippa had been saying and the uselessness of his services, Geronimo did not attempt to enter into conversation with Lidia during the remainder of the journey. He walked by her side with his head down, his eyes fixed on his boots, speaking to himself and kicking the stones with a discontented air. The return to Sorrento was performed sadly and silently, a circumstance which seldom happens with two Neapolitan lovers. Whilst Michel was ordering dinner, Geronimo wandered through these gardens, and at length seated himself on this rock, the foot of which is washed by the sea. Lidia rejoined him after a few minutes.

“You are angry with me,” she said; “you will not speak to me. Come, my good knight-errant, I bring you peace at length. After all, there has not been much time lost yet. A delay of three months is not the death of a man.”

“Do not jest thus,” replied the abbé; “on the contrary, it is death; death or the church! I no longer hesitate between these two. Your motives are excellent. You do not love me; I am a Biscegliais, I resemble Don Pangrazio; nothing can be said against all this! Since a thousand proofs of affection, sacrifices, efforts, fidelity, devotion, are not considered of any value,—

“Pardon me, dear sir,” interrupted the young widow, “of what sacrifices, of what proofs of love are you speaking? Have you conquered the Holy Land, refused the hand of the Queen of Cyprus, or the vice-royalty of Sicily, in order not to desert me? Have you received even a bruise in my service, or incurred any other danger than that of being overturned in a fly when you went to the Porta Capuana? No one has been killed, or even wounded, hitherto.”

“It is not my fault,” returned Geronimo, “nor yours either, that I am still alive. Do you regret that I have not a wound in my body, or any serious injury? You have but to command, and I shall with pleasure obey you, in whatever you are pleased to order.”

“Foolish boasting, idle words!” replied Lidia. “Take care, lest I should be tempted to put this contempt for life to the test.”

“Do it,” exclaimed Geronimo, “and you will know, in losing me, whether I loved you; do it, I entreat you.”

“You wish it? I will do so. Can you swim?”

“Certainly.”

“Well, without exposing your life to danger, I should like to see whether you would venture to take a bath in your clothes. Throw yourself into the sea, not from this place, which is thirty feet above the surface, but from that projecting rock, which is not twelve feet high. You tremble—you are pale—you are afraid; console yourself, I do not insist further. Let this lesson suffice, and speak no more of dangers, of wounds and death, for if you do, I shall always remind you of the bath.”

Geronimo bit his lips and stamped on the ground, then throwing down his hat, he took off his coat, and hastened to the edge of the rock. Before precipitating himself into the deep, like the unfortunate Sappho, he turned round to look at his mistress with a supplicating and yet indignant air.

“The head first!” cried the cruel one, laughing. And, in truth, in he plunged head foremost, and swam back to the shore; but he had no sooner regained the bank than he fell down, and remained perfectly motionless. Lidia, who was watching him, became pale in her turn, and hastened to the edge of the water with alarm.

“What is the matter, my friend?” said she, kneeling down at his side.

“It is but little, madam,” replied the abbé, with a desponding smile; “merely an arm broken. What is that compared to the conquest of the Holy Sepulchre? When I am no more, pray for me; I feel that I am dying—Adieu, Lidia—you are the cause of my death. It would have been better to marry me than to weep over my grave.

“Geronimo uttered a deep groan and fainted. The bruised wrist became swollen; the muscles of the arm became black from the effect of the contusion. The young widow uttered piercing cries for help, which caused her father to hasten to the spot, followed in the distance by dame Filippa. The invalid was with difficulty conveyed to the hotel. Whilst the servant, in tears, was calling a doctor, Geronimo, numbed, shivering, and suffering from his wound, reopened his eyes, which were inundated with tears.

“Do not weep, my friend,” said Lidia, “you will soon recover. I will take care of you, I will console you, I will no longer tease you. I curse my caprice and folly, and I hope, by dint of care, attention, and affection, that I shall make you forget this sad day.”

“It is too late, madam,” returned Geronimo. “Love is departed from my heart, and will not return again to it. I abandon all thoughts of you and of marriage, and am determined to remain in the church.”

“There!” exclaimed the aunt. “Did I not tell you, my niece, that these games would end badly for you? You have drawn your bow so well that it is broken. Come, it is now your turn to give some proof of affection. Speak! can your tongue, which is so fluent when deriding others, find nothing to say to express your affection?”

“It is too late,” repeated Geronimo; “love has cast me into the sea—I wish no more to hear its voice. This experience shall suffice. The will of Heaven be done. Madam, I pray you, leave an unfortunate one who has been unable to please you, and whom your cruelty has cured of his folly. Henceforth I belong not to myself; I belong entirely to God and the church, my holy mother.”

“Such is, according to all appearances,” continued the doctor, “the end of the intimacy between Lidia and my patient. The tears and repentance of the young widow have been unable to shake his wise resolution. For fear of being influenced by her, he refused the care which Lidia wished to bestow upon him, and left the hotel as soon as I had placed the first dressing on his wound. He hired a small house in the village, and gave strict injunctions to his servant to admit no woman. The good old prebendary who introduced him to the family of Michel, visits him twice a-week to strengthen him in his pious intentions, and to be the bearer of the encouragement and praises of the clergy, who are deeply affected by this return to devotion, and regard this adventure as a miracle. Geronimo will never forgive love for bruising him, and causing him to incur the risk of breaking his neck. His affection seems now to be fixed on a different object, and I should not be surprised if he were to become a sincere and exemplary priest.”

I thanked the doctor for his history, and invited him to take his share of the supper proposed for the following day; then taking leave of him, I returned to Naples by the train.

At the entrance of the Strada di Toledo is a small passage called “Vico del Campaniello,” where the famous merchants of “pizze” have established themselves. The large hall of each shop is divided into small cabinets by thin partitions, which do not reach to the ceiling. A curtain forms the opening of these cabinets. Many carriages are seen, when the opera is ended, in the little street Del Campaniello, which, indeed, is frequented by all classes, both rich and poor. The “pizza” is a cake made of thick pastry, and ornamented with fish. You select from among the cakes one that appears proportioned to your appetite. The baker then places the cake in his oven, from which it is withdrawn baked and ready for eating in the space of a few minutes. Oysters, olives, and fruit constitute the rest of the supper, of which the “pizza” is the most important part.

Don Geronimo, the old uncle, and the doctor were punctual to the hour appointed for the rendezvous. The young abbé, who was well acquainted with the best houses, led us to the most celebrated merchant of “pizze” in Naples. We regaled ourselves with oysters from the lake of Fusaro, and with wine of Capri. My two Biscegliais friends selected cakes of an extraordinary size, on which twenty-four fish were ranged like the rays of the sun. The doctor and I were satisfied with choosing cakes with six fish, and even those we found it difficult to consume. Don Geronimo ate his enormous portion with an air of satisfaction that was truly refreshing. He was devouring the last fish when the curtain was drawn slightly aside, and a child entered, who began to speak hastily and earnestly to the young abbé.

“Do you understand,” said the doctor, addressing me in French.

“Not a word,” answered I.

“This child is the illustrious Antonietto, whose adventures I have related to you. He is come to inform Geronimo that Lidia, having heard of his return to Naples, has followed him, and is now waiting at the door in a carriage to seize upon him when he goes out. We shall doubtless witness some droll scenes now.”

“Antonietto,” said the abbé, “go and tell the signora that I am with my uncle and two strangers, and that I beg her to allow us to sup in peace, and to make no disturbance. Tell her that the trouble she is taking is perfectly useless; that I neither desire nor ought to see her, and that my determination never to marry is unalterable.”

The boy disappeared, but in a minute afterwards the curtain was again withdrawn.

“Sir,” said Antonietto, “the contessina will not go away without speaking to you herself. She is weeping and will not listen to me.”

“Go and tell her,” said the abbé, “that I am gone out by the back door.”

"The signorina," replied Antonietto, "knows very well that there is no back door."

"Then tell her, that if she persecutes me in this manner, I shall curse the day I met her at Santa Maria del Carmine, and shall be obliged to depart for Rome."

"That will make no difference to her, sir; she will wait for you in her carriage."

"Let us go away directly, then, before there are many people here."

Thus saying, Don Geronimo rose and took his hat, muttering something about the caprice and obstinacy of women.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I deeply regret the unfortunate circumstance which has thus interrupted our delightful supper. I hope at another period to enjoy the honour of your company. At present, I find there is but one course left for me, that of flight."

The abbé left the shop with rapid strides, and placing his head at the carriage door, said in a severe tone:—

"Madam, I repeat it for the last time: I am a priest."

He then fled with the utmost rapidity to the Strada di Toledo, where he disappeared in the crowd. The young widow had descended from the carriage in order to follow Geronimo, but being unable to overtake him, returned in tears, and seizing the doctor's arm, said,

"Dear sir, is it possible that this naughty ungrateful one loves me no longer? He who has been talking to me of his love from morning till night for the last six months, without failing for one single day to visit me!—he who never picked up the thimble or the reel of cotton I let fall, without kissing it before returning it to me!—he will not even listen to me! Is it possible thus to despise a woman whom he adored as if she were an angel of heaven? Must I do penance?—must I humble myself?—must I throw myself into the water, in my turn, to obtain pardon? I am ready to do anything; I am resigned to all, except to the loss of my darling Geronimo. No, that cannot be. He is too handsome, too amiable; I love him too much. Doctor, doctor, intercede for me!"

Lidia was prevented by her sobs from proceeding further. A nervous trembling agitated her whole frame. She took the doctor's arm with both her hands, and placed her head on his shoulder, weeping bitterly and unrestrainedly.

"Calm yourself, my dear young lady," said the doctor, "calm yourself. Do not create a noise in public; you will repent of it afterwards."

"What signifies the public to me? Let the whole world know my grief, my faults, and my repentance, and let Geronimo forgive me! Ah! fool that I was thus to ill-treat a man I so fondly loved. It is God who is punishing me. Yes, I merit this for my contempt and cruelty; but the suffering I have occasioned has been visited upon me a hundred-fold. Alas, poor me! what will become of me, alone in the world, in this wide universe so desolate and dreary since I have lost my Geronimo?"

"Do not weep," resumed the doctor; "I promise you that I will speak to Geronimo, and request an interview, and I doubt not that if he consents to see you, his affection will be rekindled."

"Do not imagine it," said the uncle; "my nephew is now a priest."

Lidia hastily quitted the doctor, and seized the arm of the old Biscéllais.

"You are his uncle," cried she; "ah! do not set your face against me. I am truly to be pitied. Have compassion on a poor woman whose heart is lacerated with grief. Your nephew will lose nothing by marrying me. I am rich. My first husband left me a fortune, and my father, who gains more than a thousand ducats yearly by selling lamps, has no other child beside myself. Dame Filippa, my aunt, would willingly give the half of her fortune if she could only prevent my weeping, for she is as generous as she is wise. Ah! why did I not heed her advice! Dearest uncle, accept me for your niece; I will love you as if I were your own child. I will wait upon you, I will make your coffee myself, and I make it in the old Italian manner, which is far better than all the new systems. Ask Maitre Michel, my father, if he ever wanted anything whilst I kept his house. And at your age is it not much more agreeable to be surrounded by children who love you fondly, than to be attended by mercenary servants? I shall enliven your house, or else you will come into ours. Old men like to live in a cheerful and well-conducted household; it comforts them, and raises their spirits. I will beguile your time with my songs and gaiety, and will never give myself a moment's repose until you are served; I will with my own hands pour out the glass of muscatel which will warm your heart, and you will see what a disturbance I shall make if they do not serve you with water as clear as crystal. And instead of going to Bisceglia to die there in solitude, separated from your nephew by the church, you will be surrounded by little children, who will look at you with their large eyes, and call you 'zio carissimo' as soon as they can speak, and they will be the image of their papa, and you will make them jump on your knee, while you say to yourself: Oh! happy day, when in the Vico del Campaniello I was moved by the tears of poor Lidia, who is now my much-loved niece, and who has surrounded me with these darling and affectionate little creatures."

Whilst Lidia, with touching grace and feeling, was rapidly unfolding this charming picture, a grimace similar to a smile moved on the lips of the Biscéllais, and a little tear endeavoured to pass his grey eyelashes.

"Do not offer any opposition," said I, "you are affected, and in truth, one must have a heart of iron to witness without compassion such touching grief."

"Come," said the doctor, "things may yet be managed. Embrace this charming niece whom heaven sends you."

"By my faith, it is done!" cried the old man, clasping the young widow in his arms. Be my niece and my daughter. I will speak to Geronimo, and to-morrow you shall hear from me."

Lidia re-entered her carriage with a joyful heart; we conducted the old Biscéllais to his nephew, and employed ourselves in concerting and preparing the important negotiation whilst going to the house. Geronimo heard his uncle's narrative calmly, and suffered us all three to speak without answering us; at length, when we had exhausted our last argument in favour of marriage, he said:—

"A night of reflection is necessary. To-morrow I shall take a definite resolution. Return at noon, and you shall then go to the signora and inform her of my intentions. I promise you I will examine the pros and cons deliberately, and will place in the balance her grief, her regret, the regard I owe her, the wishes of my uncle, and the interest you all testify in this unhappy lady, and even my former affection, which I shall not attempt to stifle, if nature and human weakness raise their voices."

The following day, I reached the cottage of the abbé at a quarter past twelve. The uncle and the doctor were walking in the court in front of the house. They presented me with an opened letter, in which I read the following words:—

"DEAREST UNCLE,—I rose very early this morning, still undecided after a night of sleeplessness and reflection. I went to my pious and venerable protector in order to submit my case to him. He commanded me to close my ears to the counsels of men who were influenced by worldly feelings, and to obey the voice of conscience. Heaven calls me, and I should be culpable in hesitating any longer. Naples having become a place of snares and temptations for me, I intend leaving instantly for Rome; there I shall study for three years, at the end of which period I shall have the happiness of being ordained. My protector has added to my benefice the sum of five hundred ducats to defray my travelling and lodging expenses. Go yourself to the lady whom this information interests, and tell her of my departure. Speak gently and kindly to her. Tell her to forget me, to console herself, and to rejoice as a Christian that I am in the service of God. Then repeat for the last time, that I belong irrevocably to the church. Tell the French gentleman and my excellent doctor, that when we next meet, my dress and office will not prevent my offering them an oyster-supper either at the house of a 'pizze' merchant or elsewhere. The enjoyment of their company is one of those pleasures which a good priest may grant himself. Adieu, dear uncle; rejoice that I have escaped from the dandies and the Neapolitan women. Fear nothing more for your respectful and devoted nephew," &c. &c.

At the news of this precipitate flight, and of the pious intention which it appeared perfectly impossible to alter, Lidia uttered heart-rending cries. For a whole week, she remained drowned in tears; and her grief became so violent as to cause her friends serious alarm on account of her health. At the theatre of San Carlino, she was seen to weep frequently when the speeches of Don Pangrazio were exciting bursts of laughter throughout the house. Two months had elapsed since the departure of Geronimo, when she met, under the portico of San-Gennaro, a handsome young man, who offered her the holy water with an air of deference that surprised her. This young man followed her, discovered who she was, obtained an introduction to the family, gained the consent of Maitre Michel and the protection of dame Filippa. He had a small fortune, good education, a good temper, and a very handsome face and figure, like Geronimo. He married the lovely widow, and restored to her the gaiety, appetite, capriciousness and love of pleasure which she had for a short time lost. Lidia now leads the most agreeable life a Neapolitan lady can desire. She rules her household, governs her husband, quarrels with him at least once a-week, becomes reconciled to him in less than twenty-four hours, scolds him for going to the café, which however does not prevent his returning there, and often whips her two children, who are the images of their father.

Ognissanti Geronimo studied theology for three years at Rome, then having been ordained, he returned to Naples, where he has become an archpriest and one of the most devoted members of the Italian clergy. His natural eloquence, regulated by study, has become more sober. He frequently selects for the subject of his sermons, the danger of the company of women, the salutary effects of accidents connected with divine grace, and the consolation which religion grants to those who have been tried by affliction.

WE hope all our readers are pedestrians, ladies inclusive. It is, we are happy to know, a truly English taste: the pedestrian feats of our countrymen—ay, and countrywomen too—are famous all over the world. They brave alike the snows of Switzerland and the sands of Arabia. Mrs. Campbell and her daughters crossed over Mount Blanc, and Miss Martineau tells us, that she walked almost all the way from Suez to Mount Sinai. Indeed, there is no exercise that opens so many sources of enjoyment, or charms away so many cares. Are you tormented with the constant predominance of one idea? harassed with an overweight of business? or stupified by some grievous and heavy affliction?—our advice to you is, Set off and walk; no matter where, so it be in the open country. Away with you, over hill and dale, until you are thoroughly leg-weary, and if there be a cure for your ailments, you will find it in the change of air and scene, the lovely face of nature, that natural and divinely-appointed medicine, which, next to religious trust, is perhaps most effectual in soothing human suffering. Even the torments of a guilty conscience, as the old philosophers said, may be lulled, if only for a while, by the potent charm of pedestrianism. For our humble part, we have ever been passionate admirers and diligent practitioners of this exercise, and owe to it a world of enjoyments most precious at the time of fruition, and no less pleasant in the retrospect. We delight, therefore, to meet a fellow-enthusiast, such as the author of the useful and lively little manual from which we mean to borrow a few pages to edify the judicious amateur, and also to stimulate, if possible, the laggard and the lazy to wholesome exertion.

And those who always walk'd, now walk the more.”

“ In travelling, he says, we multiply events, and innocently. We set out, as it were, on our adventures; and many are those that occur to us, morning, noon, and night. The day we come to a place we have long heard and read of, is an era in our lives; and from that moment the very name calls up a picture. How delightfully, too, does the knowledge flow in upon us, and how fast! Would he who sat in a corner of his library, poring over books and maps, learn more, or so much, in the time, as he who, with his eyes and his heart open, is receiving impressions all day long from the things themselves? Our sight is the noblest of all our senses; it fills the mind with most ideas, converses with its objects at the greatest distance, and continues longest in action without being tired. Our sight is on the alert when we travel; and its exercise is then so delightful, that we forget the profit in the pleasure.”

Leaving panegyric, the author now addresses himself, in a business-like way, to the numerous preparations incident to an extended walk:—

“ Having paid our court to the seasons, in the most seasonable manner we could, let us then now descend to look into some of the dry and matter of fact details of preparation for a pedestrian trip, which, though somewhat at first uninviting, yet we promise thus much to every and all—poet or naturalist—philosopher or man of business—that the poetry of nature's changing garb and features,—the science of her thousand ways of wonder-working life—the tone of her sweet influence on the mind and body—will be promoted, in no trifling degree, by our securing, as far as practicable and foreseen, those conditions actually essential to the comfort and success of a pedestrian ramble; for, if great things are only the summing up of small things—as, in the fable, the grateful ant stung the leg of the man, whose deadly aim was thereby diverted from sacrificing the poor bird, to whose kind act of rescue when in danger the ant had previously owed her own life—how can we despise even the least matter which can exercise an influence for good or evil on our journey's successful issue? Who has not had to experience the bitter mortification of having a trip on foot spoilt by some trifle, unheeded or unanticipated in the hey-day of the start! What corn began to complain on the second day? What sore heel, from the wear of an ill-fitting boot or shoe, has not destroyed all the soaring pleasure of our excursion, just when the country began to open to our eager gaze? and who that has so paid the penalty of incaution and neglect at starting, does not wish to take good care that such shall not happen again to themselves,—or to any friend, indeed, starting on a similar trip, and who will listen to the voice of experience in the matter?

“ To enter, then, forthwith into all manner of ‘Hints’ and practical suggestions.

“ In the first place, the reader will be, perhaps, surprised to learn how many things need to be attended to in preparing for a few days' or weeks' excursion into the country; and, further, that you must begin to train and harden yourself a day or two before actual setting out.”

This is sound and sensible advice, which no one should neglect to follow. We have not, however, space here to enter upon his consideration of the impediments of corns, chilblains, neglected nails, his experiences on socks, shoes, knapsack, &c. and a compact arrangement in the smallest possible space, of the numerous articles which, until the improvement fondly anticipated by N. P. Willis, of starting off in our ethereal portion, and leaving our empty bodies behind to the care of our house-keeper, is realized, will be requisite for even the most hardy pedestrian. This is indeed the great dilemma. To carry a sufficient number of articles to ensure a moderate degree of comfort, will render the knapsack inconveniently heavy, while, unless it be tolerably stored, the tourist may be obliged, like the poet with his one shirt, to lie in bed while his unique coat and pair of pantaloons are being dried, after some untoward encounter with “the elements.” Such, alas! has often been our own fate. On all these points our author is a first-rate authority, and gives us the best instructions how to hit the juste milieu.

Let us now proceed to start with him on his ramble.

“ Having all matters arranged, the toggery all donned, the knapsack fairly strapped on, we should say, select in the next place some suitable companion of congenial feelings and cheerful humour: for much of the pleasure of a tour depends on this having of company, even if only a dog to whistle to. ‘The influences of agreeable conversation, in alleviating the toilsomeness of travel, have been pleasantly depicted by Shakspeare:—

“ These high, wild hills, and rough, uneven ways,
Draw out our miles, and make them wearisome;
And yet your fair discourse hath been as sugar,
Making the hard way sweet and delectable.”

Richard II. Act ii. sc. 3.

Indeed, every one knows that the Irish bull, that a journey of ten miles is reduced to five a-piece when undertaken with a companion, is founded in truth and nature. It may be that the cultivation of the mind, and the improvement of the taste, might have enabled the traveller to have found, at least in part, that companionship he desired in the birds, beasts, plants, trees, brooks, hills, and stones, he encountered in his excursion; but still the force of the observation remains the same, that the most pleasing and unwearying efforts demand an impulsion from the mind as well as from the mere bodily powers.¹

"An additional reason for seeking cheerful companions is, that the mind is unbent from intense thought or anxious care by the presence of others and their extemporaneous converse, when, if left alone to yourself, it might prove next to impracticable to unshackle the trammelled habits of intense application; and unless such be accomplished, the chief end of the excursion is missed: the mind must be at ease to allow the body to reap the benefit of its exertions. Davis observes most justly, in his interesting Manual, p. 355,— 'As we have seen that, for an agreeable and beneficial exercise, there must be an harmonious action in a large number of the parts and organs of the body, so there should be a like harmony of excitation to call this action forth. The will, the great stimulant of muscular contraction, must direct its efforts with singleness of purpose to the acting limbs.'

"The allotting of the amount of exercise each day is, for the commencement of such a tour, and to the unaccustomed, of the greatest consequence; and we must proceed to show why it is so, in order that this condition, absolutely essential to the pleasure and benefit of the pedestrian excursion, may be cautiously secured. People may be accustomed to walk about all day in town, and yet find a day's walk in the country very different; and, from their not rightly estimating this experience, may be very apt to overdo themselves at starting, and so get fatigued with the new and exhilarating demands upon their animal frame and spirits: therefore it would be well to limit their first and even second day's work to something under what they might possibly accomplish at a great stretch; for, if the first day become a toil instead of a pleasure, the spirits begin to flag, and a listlessness as to the objects undertaken steals over the mind, owing to fatigue. Few minds can then, under the pressure and lassitude caused by the first day's forced march, muster up courage sufficient to throw themselves out of bed early, to begin with spirit and alacrity the second day. Davis remarks, (p. 323,) that 'all exercises should be accurately apportioned to the age, strength, and previous habits of the individual. Where this rule is neglected, exercise becomes an evil, and that of serious magnitude.' And further on, alluding to undue exertion of any powers, whereby their growth and development suffers in the young— 'A state of weariness comes on, that sleep refuses to alleviate. Such a call is made upon the digestive organs and the nervous system, for velocity of action, that these parts are first to fail; and fever, accompanied with serious digestive disorder, ensues. . . . Under an extraordinary stimulus, the task may possibly be performed; but the consequences are disagreeable and prejudicial. Excessive fatigue takes the place of that moderate tiredness which conduces to sleep, and the balmy soother of wearied nature refuses to do her office; a painful restlessness, attended with fever, and, in extreme cases, with delirium, distresses the frame; and when at length lumbers steal over the troubled system, they are not followed with any commensurate degree of refreshment.' Dr. Combe relates a very striking instance of the folly of over-exertion of this kind.

"Exercise pushed, then, to the point of inducing fatigue, so as to render the muscles sore and trembling from overstrained efforts, remaining stiff and sore after a night's disturbed repose, is not the way to derive either benefit or pleasure from a country tour. On an average, we should say, that, for those who can accomplish by effort some twenty miles for a day's walk, a dozen or fifteen is the outside they should lay out for the first day's exercise; then, by getting a refreshing night's rest, they will have the power and disposition to walk twenty miles on the next day, and perhaps twenty-five on the third, and increase a little each day as they feel equal to do so: thus they will adopt the safest way to secure all the beneficial and agreeable results of a pedestrian journey. Experience will probably have already convinced some of our readers that our advice, resulting from the same instructive source, is not to be despised, even by comparatively old hands, on commencing a tour after a period of sedentary pursuits and comparative bodily inactivity: though there may be some buoyant spirits who feel as if they had done nothing unless they came in like a horse after a day's hunting, tired and jaded with a glorious run, (in exciting companionship of the baying hound and bugle note,) forgetting, most probably, as such highfliers generally do, that the hunter gets the next day for recruiting repose; so that, in fact, he only runs generally three or four days out of the week. This reflection will be sufficient to moderate, we hope, the zeal of those freshmen who seem not yet to have learnt that discretion is the better part of valorous enterprise! We are certain that many a green tourist gets dispirited, if not almost disgusted, with what he pays too dear for in the purchase of, whereas the fault lies entirely with the folly of his own extravagant bid, and not in the article. This remark applies not only to this little episode of our common life, but to that ordinary routine of our course, as well, which— because we pursue with too absorbing an aim, too avaricious a grasp—palls, wearies, and disgusts. What saith the sage Armstrong (page 36 of his valuable poem on health) in reference to overwrought exertion?

" 'For know, whate'er
Beyond its natural fervour hurries on
The sanguine tide; whether the frequent bowl,
High-season'd fare, or exercise to toil
Protracted; spurs to its last stage tired life,
And sows the temples with untimely snows.'

" Early rising is at all times so unquestionable a good habit, and so conducive to mental and bodily vigour, that few words need be added to enforce the carrying out of this practice, as well on the starting as on all succeeding days; the pure freshness of the air penetrating like a cordial to the inmost recesses of our nature, fulfilling body and mind with the glow of conscious and joyous existence, until a sensation of almost bursting life chases the blood through its several channels with the bounding flow of healthful activity—an enjoyment the sluggard never realizes, even in the all-capable range of his snoring ideal life. A few miles stepped out before breaking the fast, will make light work of the rest of the day's labours; and a keen appetite acquired for breakfast is of itself no mean recommendation—indeed, of such preponderating value is this motive alone with many, that did it co-exist with no other, it would raise them from their couch, and cause them to sally forth early. We need scarcely stop to remark, besides all just stated, that, as far as the search of the picturesque goes, no time equals the morning for beauty and sharpness of outline, whether the objects be mountain peak or mirrored lake: all nature around wears a youthful brow, and, if the sun shines out, then, in the flowing language of Shelley's translation of a hymn in Faust—

Is bright as on creation's day.’

“An old Latin doggerel has presumed even to fix the hour for rising, in order, we suppose, that, by adopting the benevolent suggestion of a standard hour, mankind may derive the advantage of imitating the regulated visits of Aurora's early beams:—

“ ‘Surge quintâ,
Prande nonâ,
Coena quintâ,
Dormi nonâ,
Nec est mortî
Vita prona:’

which, being rendered into English, will run thus, making allowance for our modern confusion of meal times:—

“ ‘Rise at five who has the power;
Breakfast and lunch at nine's good hour;
Dine at five's revolving magic;
So shall death by sickness tragic,
Who by nine sleeps if he can,
Ne'er cut short life's little span.’

Thus, then, we have got our chart to steer by; and, though an adage of olden time, it will hold good now-a-days—at all events, in country rambles and health-seeking tours. We have the hour, then, laid down, though the cloth wants laying for—

“Breakfast; and, moreover, something to garnish it with, suitable for the devastations of a hungry pedestrian. We can't exactly produce the materials, but we can suggest what we have found, from experience, the most hunger-proof amongst provisions—that is, instead of tea or coffee, a good jug of well-made cocoa or chocolate. There is something substantial in it: the stomach takes some time to discuss its endless resources of liquid nutriment. If to such a host in itself, you append plenty of bread and butter, and an assortment of fish, flesh, or fowl, or eggs, you cannot starve though you wait till afternoon for your next substantial meal, viz. dinner. Tea is all very well in a drawing-room; or when pursuing literary avocations, a light meal is required, in order to let the brain have more opportunity for concentrated thought; but when at ploughman-like labours, the nearer you come to his solid subsistences, the better. We fancy tea will come in with a better grace towards the fag end of the day, say after dinner, as a diluent of aromatic and grateful nature.

“ ‘A fine day anywhere is a fine thing; but a fine day at Killarney is the finest of all possible things. Only see how clear the mountain looks, with but one little silvery cloud sleeping in the hollow of the Devil's Punchbowl, the broad face of the sun smiling on it, as if he was just going to say, “You brat of a cloud, I'll swallow you up in a twinkling!” It would be a pity to lose a moment—“Hallo, Gorham! breakfast, breakfast, all in a hurry, if you please; tea, coffee, bread, butter, toast, eggs, ham, honey, salmon, all very good—is everything ready, Gorham?” “Yes, sarc.”’

A-propos of Killarney. After such a breakfast as the above, we started off from the hotel, and were soon afterwards threading the gloomy defile called the Gap of Dunloe. When in its most gloomy depth, a ragged individual suddenly started up from behind a rock, and proclaimed himself as the appointed “guide” through the pass and neighbourhood. Now it so happens, reader, that we have a peculiar aversion to this sort of animal, and being, moreover, furnished with an excellent map, civilly declined the favour intended for us. Poor Pat, however, was not disposed to give up a chance, and insisted on the fearful perils of the way, and the absolute necessity of putting ourselves under his protection. “Sorra a jontleman, your honour, ever ventures through the Gap widout tacking a guide wid him,” he kept on, as we resolutely pursued our way, gradually quickening our pace; Pat, the meanwhile, striding on by our side, and repeating his importunate exhortations. At last, coming to a dead stand-still, and looking our persecutor in the face, we inquired, with provoking coolness, “Good man, will you have the goodness to go about your business?” But Pat was not to be thus daunted. “Well thin, sir,” he replied, with steady assurance, “if yer honour does not know yer own need, sorra a bit will I lave you in the midst of disthress, but I'm the boy will stick to you, aven in spite of yourself.” There was no standing this, so off we bolted at top speed. Pat dashed after us. For five minutes we were neck and neck, till having some slight advantage in longitude of limb, our persecutor by degrees dropped astern and at length became invisible. He had his revenge, however, for we lost our way, and what was worse, the villain came to know of it. Guides are by no means to be despised in mountain excursions, and the traveller, when once in their hands, should never be obstinate, but implicitly obey their instructions and devoutly believe in their legendary narrations.

"Supposing that now our friends—we use the plural, because we wish it to be understood there must be a little knot of two, three, or four 'jolly companions every one,' banded together for the trip, in order that even one individual may reap the whole benefit of the tour—supposing, then, that all are in full sail now, passing along the pleasant hedgerow, the rude stone wall, or crossing some open moorland, singing and shouting as you go along; we would commend so goodly an exercise for the lungs, whose proportionate expansion calls forth, and gives new tone to, their elastic tissues, whereby the blood is more freely received from, and remitted to, the heart; and, by its more than wanted contact in these channels with the vivifying air, it circulates with a freer bound, imparting new zest to life; and so leap forth ideas of wit, pleasant mirth, and merriment, till it becomes difficult to trace the interfused relations of cause and effect, in our wondrously compounded union of mind and body."

On a point of much importance, our author's remarks are worthy of all acceptance, inasmuch as they are derived from experience; we mean, the best method of alleviating thirst. "What can be more simple, provided the means are at hand?"—we hear some tyro exclaim; "it is only to drink, and to drink enough, no matter what—pale ale, bottled porter, humble home-brewed, spirits diluted with water, or, in default of any other ingredient, the latter element alone in all its crystal purity." Pleasant but pernicious illusion! and which, like all the flowery paths of premature indulgence, only leads to increased suffering in the end. On the contrary, our author tells us, and wisely too, "Avoid drinking as you would poison, in short, drink as little as possible of anything, and do not give way to the first sensation of thirst. Be not always tempted by the crystal fountains you may meet with, being yourself warm. Should your thirst be overwhelming, take a mouthful, keep it for some seconds in your mouth, so as to warm it a little before swallowing." "Should the temptation to go on swallowing too fast be irresistible, a drop or two of spirits—mind, reader, just a drop or two—will check the sudden chill, which is apt to be dangerous to the heated frame." We were once talking to an old chamois-hunter who scaled the steeps of Monte Rosa, about this matter. "Do you venture to drink water when among the highest precipices of the Alps?" was asked. "It would be madness to do so," was his reply. "Once tasted, the rage for it is unconquerable. We merely moisten the mouth, from time to time, with a little drop of wine." This advice is, however, applicable chiefly to long and severe walks, for on ordinary occasions a glass of home-brewed at the porch of a village alehouse, especially if intended to wash down certain ploughman slices of home-made bread-and-butter, is among the choicest delights incident to a country walk. Probatum est.

We proceed to the important article of dinner.

"It is not well to drive dinner too late. Though circumstances must often be allowed to have the principal meal under their sway, rendering dinner hour elastic, yet where it is practicable, the middle of the afternoon, about three or four o'clock, is best. This may generally be contrived beforehand, by so planning the day's work as that some decent 'hostelry' may be holding out its inviting emblems about this period of your performance; in case, however, you should be a denizen of some far-off and barren waste, where the chances of obtaining refreshment at all before nightfall are down at zero, then we presume that your olfactory nerves, presciently discovering the same calamitous state of things, will advertise you not to leave the last hospitable quarters without exercising the sagacious forethought of stowing away some sandwiches (whether plain meat, or anchovy paste between respectable folds of bread-and-butter, as is the fashion in the present day, deponent saith not.) The hour we name is a little in advance of our Latin prescription lately recited; and the old Romans who conquered this fair land might have chosen to vote for the arrival of sunset, before proceeding to such grave doings as dinner always supposes: but really we must desert antique, though illustrious exemplars, when our modern stomachs grow rebellious, and in hollow ventriloquial murmurs utter the scholastic adage, Necessitas non habet legem; (necessity has no law:) especially when we the stomach have generously undertaken to 'get up the steam' for all the rapid locomotions of the body, and all the sparkling creations of the brain, you can do no less than, in order to these ends, duly to cater 'fuel' for our gastronomic boiler!

"A dinner of plain animal food is the best, without many sauces, or partaking of made-up dishes. The main part of the day's excursion will have been accomplished, and only a few miles afterwards should be attempted to close the day's enjoyment. After the first process of digestion is pretty well over, usually occupying about an hour after the repast, the body, if not over-fatigued, is usually disposed for a little further rambling—if also the party be in tolerable health—half a dozen miles will be done at nearly, if not at quite, the same smart paco as previously. Such forms a pleasant division of the day's allotted task, and is by no means prejudicial.

"Whilst matters of a substantial class are occupying some necessary time in preparing, comfort will be consulted by a grateful ablution of the face and hands from the dust, &c.; and the recital of a stave out of 'Croker's Legends of Killarney' will not diminish the appetite of our travellers whilst the courses are removing, though that be fast vanishing in the glancing sheen of knives and forks.

"Father Cuddy sang for entertainment to his assembled friends the following, with mirth in his eye and melody on his tongue:—

 Cum alba et nova
 In stabulo scite leguntur,
 Et a Margery bella
 Quæ, festiva puella!
 Pinguis lardi cum frustis coquantur.
 Ut belles in prato
 Aprico et lato
 Sub sole tam læte reudent,
 Ova tosta in mensa,
 Mappa bene extensa,

“ Croker furnishes very kindly a fair and elegant translation—thus :—

“ ‘ O ’tis eggs are a treat,
 When so white, and so sweet,
 From under the manger they’re taken,
 And by fair Margery,
 Och ! ’tis she’s full of glee,
 They are fried with fat rashers of bacon.
 Just like daisies all spread
 O’er a broad sunny mead,
 In the sunbeams so beautifully shining,
 Are fried eggs well display’d
 On a dish, when we’ve laid
 The cloth, and are thinking of dining.’

“ The Legends of Killarney ’ abound with humour and wit, and very likely our readers will feel tempted, from this specimen, to hunt up therein more racy Latin verses, by the celebrated Abbot of ‘ Sweet Innisfallen.’ A glass of beer, ale, or porter during dinner, along with a couple or three glasses of wine after, where the party prefers to take anything stronger than Adam’s ale, will be amply sufficient in reason; or the wine may be rendered, according to the dictate of either custom or invalidedness, into its equivalent tumbler of spirit and water. For the safe conduct of the person, and purposes of health, as well as from the dictates of good morals, we shall not mind the jeer or laugh which many accustomed to excess in revellings and wine may choose to assail our next quotation, which we shall make in favour of temperance, from an old-fashioned writer of assured high name :—

‘ Drink not the third glass :—which thou canst not tame,
 When once it is within thee ; but, before,
 May’st rule it as thou list :—and pour the shame,
 Which it would pour on thee, upon the floor.
 It is most just to throw that on the ground
 Which would throw me there, if I keep the round,
 * * * * *
 Be not a beast in courtesy ; but stay,
 Stay at the third cup, or forego the place,
 Wine above all things doth God’s stamp deface.’

“ Our readers will perceive that our plan is to avoid sanctioning either extremes, of stimulating drinks, or abstinence unmitigated in its rigorous exaction : and the following will serve to rectify any mistaken views travellers may take of the temperance moderation, or of our own recommendations thereof.

‘ sometimes issued against all fermented liquors, upon the plea that they are as unnatural to man as to the inferior animals, less canting and injudicious. It is not natural to man to abuse any of the gifts of Providence; but it is quite natural to him to use with temperance all the luxuries which his superior faculties at once enable him to procure and qualify him to enjoy, and this among the rest. With respect also to fermented liquors, slow indeed must those poisons be, which, used in moderation, frequently take half a century or more to produce their effects. We commonly say that a man makes a beast of himself when he gets tipsy; but it appears that it is from not making a beast of himself that this accident is apt to overtake him. But the world is too old for this kind of trash at present. Even the good folks of the temperance societies do not restrict their proselytes to acorns and water. They know better than to cut off the arm because it may sometimes be employed in mischief; and their injunctions are in general as judicious as their object is philanthropic and praiseworthy.’

“ There is one caution about taking food we should have given, viz.—that it is necessary, especially for the dyspeptic invalid, to wait ten or fifteen minutes before sitting down to a hearty meal, if fatigued with exercise. If you infringe this rule, the stomach will not be in a fit state to digest the food wherewith your eagerness and sense of exhausted strength may greedily cram it. Flatulence, feverishness, and oppression are the fruits of such hasty work.

“ Never walk immediately after a meal, for the same reasons—interrupting digestion in its earlier stage; towards the close, however, on the other hand, as before remarked, a gentle exertion of the body is indicated by fidgetiness coming on; prompting to such leisurely walking on as is grateful and healthful.

“ Before we leave the subject of potations, we must enter our gravest protest against the habit of taking stimulants early in the day, especially the stronger kind, as spirits: such is injurious, and a slavery of depraved habit. . . .

“ We now shall beat the drum for mustering to the last part of the day’s march, when the hill-tops smile in a glowing sunset, and the renewed song of birds pipes gaily to the waning glories of the god of day. Across that meadowed plain, and towards yon skirting wood, lies a mile or two of agreeable walk. Away, then!

“ After a little progress, the grateful breeze dies away, the oppressive heat of noon returns, and clouds come on apace, betokening the approach of a thunder-storm, ere half the broad meadow is traversed, and the sheltering wood, a mile off yet, is impossible to reach. How suddenly the fair face of heaven can change! In the ‘Recreations of Christopher North,’ the subjoined description drenches us with wet in the very reading, of ‘A Storm, closing a Pleasure Excursion.—Well, that is very extraordinary.—Rain—rain—rain! All the eyes of heaven were bright as bright might be—the sky was blue as violets—that braided whiteness, that here and there floated like a veil on the brow of night, was all that recalled the memory of clouds—and as for the moon, no faintest halo yellowed round her orb, that seemed indeed “one perfect chrysolite;”—yet, while all the winds seemed laid asleep till morn, and beauty to have chained all the elements into peace—overcast in a moment is the firmament—an evanishing has left it black as mist—there is a fast, thick pattering on the woods—yes, rain—rain—rain—and ere we reach Bowness, the party will be wet through to their skins. Nay, matters are getting still more serious—for there was lightning—yes, lightning! Ten seconds! and hark, very respectable thunder! With all our wisdom we have not been weather-wise, or we should have known, when we saw it, an electrical sunset. Only look now towards the west. There floats Noah’s ark—a magnificent spectacle; and now for the flood. That far-off, sullen sound, proclaims cataracts. And what means that sighing and moaning and muttering up among the cliffs? See—see how the sheet lightning shows the long lake shore all tumbling with foaming breakers. A strong wind is there—but here there is not a breath. But the woods across the lake are bowing their heads to the blast. Windermere is in a tumult—the storm comes flying on wings all abroad—and now we are in the very heart of the hurricane. See, in Bowness is hurrying many a light—for the people fear we may be on the lake; and faithful Billy, depend on’t, is launching his lifeboat to go to our assistance. Well, this is an adventure. But soft—what ails our argand lamp! Our study is in such darkness that we cannot see our paper—in the midst of a thunder-storm we conclude, and retire to bed by a flash of lightning.’— shares the effects of such transmitted agency. Metallic substances, particularly if bright, and moisture in every shape, are amongst the first conducting powers. The very rain itself, therefore, is a conducting medium of the lightning most favourable because most diffused; yet things of a more solid and projecting form will be rather chosen by the lightning in its course, owing to their attracting it and concentrating it upon themselves: when such is the case, the object is either frequently damaged in itself, or wherever the conducting medium is cut off from the ground by some other thing interposed between the latter and itself, upon such the electric fluid spends its force—shattering, injuring, scorching, as the case may be; and then the object is said to have been ‘struck’ by the electric current. Trees, buildings, and tall objects in general, especially when wet, attract the lightning; and the less perfect their conduction may be, the more injury they are likely to sustain, as well also, objects close beside them: hence, when trees are struck, being shivered and burnt, cattle or men sheltering under them frequently lose their lives at the same time, sharing in the fate of the conducting tree. In the creature world, the endowment of a nervous system seems to render its possessors peculiarly susceptible to the influence of atmospheric electric changes, in addition to their common physical qualities: thus, a man may be ‘struck,’ because he is a conductor in common with inanimate things around; but the fluidity of his blood and the high temperature of his body, necessary for life, probably, render him a better conductor of electricity than mere dead animal matter. Hence the double source of dangers to us when we place ourselves in such circumstances as that, around us as well as within ourselves, such favourable conducting means are brought into a fearful focus. Many valuable lives have been sacrificed to the want of knowing these simple facts, of such easy recollection. The writer lost an old friend in this regretful way; and if he appear to some tedious on this subject—now, happily, commonly understood, in part at least—yet some one individual reading these pages may be cautioned off, thereby, from possible danger; and the already well-informed reader would be selfish indeed if he begrudged a moment’s patience over a passage which the author begrudged no trouble to indite—seeing that thereby, as before said, some one case may possibly occur where a party may be so exposed, and where no other means of gathering the necessary instructions, for instant adoption, may be within reach.”

We have drawn very largely upon our author for the materials of what we hope will prove a pleasant and suggestive paper at this delightful season, and we must now wind up by thanking him for his capital little book, and heartily recommending it to the attention of all our readers, as the very best we know of about Pedestrianism. That he has a veritable gusto for his subject, will be evident enough from his conclusion. He thus finally conducts us to our inn:—

"Our slippers, a hasty change of all wet garments, a cheerful fire quickly kindled by eager hands, and a cup of tea as quickly prepared, all form a series of shifting scenes in our little drama of the 'rural,' such as all lovers of the 'natural' must remember often to have seen enacted in the course of their devotional pilgrimage to the shrine of the 'picturesque.' If the said tea-drinking be close upon the 'hours' of rest, and if the article be brewed, as frequently is the case on such occasions, into 'veritable stingo'—travellers thinking they cannot have too much of a good thing—then it probably will be found to interfere with the crown of the pedestrian's labours, 'balmy sleep.' . . .

"We believe we have now completed our day's undertaking, leaving our little attempt in the hands of the charitable folks for whose benefit, combined with amusement, we have endeavoured thus to cater after our best fashion. Now we shall beg leave, then, to discharge the very last act of our willing service, viz. to bring the bed-candlestick, and attend the best-humoured of the party to his charming little bed-room, with modest old-fashioned oriel window, it may be, through whose crystal panes, mayhap, come streaming in the bonnie smiling beams of the bright harvest moon,—and, as they seem to struggle across the neatly carpeted floor, just reach the snug little bed with white dimity hangings, in the middle of the room, there to fall upon the dazzling snow-white counterpane, with a spell only felt in the country on a 'stilly night!' If one single ray, the furthest flung of all the pencilled host, stray onwards to the bed's head, and there enable him to spell the grateful invitation of the downy pillow, we will take the parting liberty of reading aloud, for the gentle reader's benefit and closing sympathy, the lines under which he has already fallen fast asleep—

"To all and each a fair good night,
And rosy dreams, and slumbers light!"
"Byron's Hours of Idleness."

BOSWELL, THE BIOGRAPHER.

BY F. W. SHELTON.

"As I believe the merits and memory of such a person ought to be thankfully recorded, I shall offer a word of defence to the consideration of every reader, a part and but a part of that just commendation which might be from thence enlarged, and shall then leave it to his judgment whether my error be an excess or defect of commendation."—WALTON.

It argues a deal of magnanimity for a whole community to join in the cry of "mad dog" when an animal has been unjustly accused. It is as much as his life is worth to be abroad, and far easier for every man to fetch him a zealous kick in passing, or hit him with sticks, stones, brickbats, and billets of wood, than stop to inquire whether there be any "soundness in his bones." When the hue and cry is once raised, he is not much better than a "dead lion." This may be defensible policy during the summer solstice, when unmuzzled animals ought to conduct themselves with much modesty, and restrict their walks to the limits, but it is entirely abominable to treat an honest, praiseworthy man "like a dog." Yet so it is; and it reveals the least amiable trait in human nature, that the majority are ever ready to snatch up an evil report and divulge it eagerly. Some carry their fondness for defamation to such a pitch that they are no better than hyenas, and rake up the dust of an unimpeachable man, or hunt the records in hopes to give the lie to his tombstone. A hundred years are not sufficient to have allayed his dust, or to have confirmed his greatness. But it is at least virtuous to join in the popular cry, and when the ultimate tribunal of public opinion has once passed upon a man unjustly, it is as hard for him to retrieve his own as for the poor, melancholy Magdalen. He goes down to posterity with contempt.

"The evil which men do lives after them;
The good is oft interred with their bones."

Has it ever occurred to any to plead for James Boswell, the biographer; to snatch his memory from the fangs of sarcasm, or the carplings of the critic? The idea certainly has entered into the brain of no one, or we should not venture, so ill-prepared, to stand up his humble defender. Inoffensive man that he was, will the peltings of the pitiless storm never cease to beat upon his house, or his name to be a proverb? For half a century he has been assailed with every term of ignominy or reproach by the whole literary world, down to the paltriest scribe: a poltroon, a sycophant, a canister at the heels of greatness, a jackal leading forth the great lion. "Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart—see! they bark at him." The phenomenon of his case has scarcely a parallel in the world of letters. How strange is it to have acquired such a Janus-faced, double reputation, looking one way on the gratitude of admirers, in another on the out-pointed fingers of scorn! Shame and honour, fame and infamy, praise and obloquy, never formed such a twin alliance before; nor did an infallible criticism ever assume so compound an expression of face, or contradict itself flatly in the same breath. Neither was reason, which presumes to sit upon his case, ever so unreasonable. To praise a man for his works' sake, and then with outrageous zeal cry out that those very works condemn him; to flatter the end, but to despise the means; to execrate for doing, yet by no means to have the work undone; to separate the artist from the immortal chef-d'œuvre of art, and consign them to different immortality, what is it but to thunder out the contradictory anathema: "O villain, thou shalt be condemned to everlasting redemption for this!"

Of all critics, Macaulay knows how with the severest hand to reveal the anatomy of character. Yet, subjected to a mode of writing and analysis like his, there is no man of weak points who might not be made to appear utterly contemptible. To bring together the incongruities, somewhat sparse when scattered through a long stretch of lifetime, and concentre them upon a single page, sparkling with point and antithesis, arranged with a nice art to illustrate the most forcible figures of rhetoric, is a merciless way of dealing with the subject, though it may give compactness, strength, and splendour to the essay. There may be an antithesis of words for which the common observer might not have noticed any corresponding antithesis of actions. Foibles, separated far from one another in point of time, and forgotten in the circumstances which produced them, may be classified in ascending degrees of folly, until they have reached a terrible climax on paper. That which is very nice in fact, may be rendered very disgusting in description; and most men of healthy morals would "suffer some," after their character had been exposed on a post-mortem examination. There is, indeed, no gainsaying the conclusions arrived at, and the truth of the admirable analysis; but society cannot look on every phase at once, and many men who have passed tolerably well with the crowd, may be thus crucified on sharp points, and made the victims of a style of writing. Thus Boswell is condemned to unenviable fame for his achievement in literature; and Horace Walpole, in spite of his studies, wit, vivacity, and original turn, his eminent appreciation of art, and collections in virtu,—out of that very budget of letters which confirms his reputation, and makes his genius shine out, as well as fills up a chasm in history, is proved to be the most frivolous man of any age or country. Yet it is not more certain that one was the most eminent in biography, and the other in letter-writing, than that Macaulay himself is the most admirable of critics.

What we propose is, to set down something in extenuation; to throw a little more weight into the scale of "good works," and to show that the world has judged too harshly of James Boswell. But if it should be said that there is little ground of dispute, and that public opinion, when settled down, is infallible, we reply, that our age is not so far remote from his that it should have passed upon him its last judgment. It is not too late that a wrong decision should be revised or rescinded; although the case must soon reach the last court for the correction of errors. It is not too late while the great man yet speaks dogmatically, (and the echo of his voice never dies,) while commentators yet add to the mass of testimony, and these are in turn commented on, and lastly an intolerable sharpness of rebuke is administered to Croker's Boswell's Johnson. Sub judice lis est. We presume that no very grave misdemeanours will be imputed to the man as the reason for which he has been hunted down from age to age, and every rising generation taught to scorn their benefactor. It is not that he was a very strange man, certainly, with peculiar instincts which led him into eccentric modes of action, (for what man has not his weakness?) that he once walked among the crowds on some gala-day, wearing a placard upon his hat with the inscription "Corsica Boswell," or that once, being in wine, he behaved unseemly in the rigid presence of Mrs.

VOL. XIV.

Hannah More. To these vanities, light as air in comparison, he might have added weightier faults, and the British public would never have exacted such a penalty. Greater men have acted worse and fared better. One may be guilty of all manner of treason against society, and go at large; but who will forgive him for being a servile, fawning sycophant? Well, suppose the biographer to have done all that is alleged against him; to have dogged the steps of the great man; to have watched him in his out-goings and his in-comings; to have hung upon his lips, and treasured up his philosophy; to have suffered meekly his rebukes, and sought his approval with smiles bordering on adulation; was there nothing pardonable in this? Was there no good trait concealed beneath the garb of humility? Had he done all this in presence of mere earthly greatness,—had he humbled himself before the insignia of royal power, that might be deserving of scorn; but to pay unwonted homage to the attributes of immortal Mind—to sit meekly at the feet of Gamaliel—this is the best kind of sycophancy, and cannot be exercised by the dull, the ignorant, or the unreflecting. The public are every day guilty of worse weaknesses, when they are carried to the utmost bounds of extravagance; when they crown their favourites with roses, and drag them in triumphal chariots. Consistency is a jewel. What! may one almost worship the mere form of external beauty without censure, and be scorned for doing homage to the might of Intellect? Between the two, what comparison is there with regard to worthiness? The one temporal—the other eternal; the one apt to be a counterfeit presentment, at the best a mere symbol—the other, the thing itself which the first signifies. What are the best endowments of Venus; the most charming grace ever imagined; the loveliest smiles ever lighted? These must wax old, or be changed to a hideous aspect; but that shall —“flourish in immortal youth, Unhurt amid the war of elements.”

So far from deserving censure, we should judge the biographer to be worthy of all praise for his conduct, and so far elevated above his detractors as his enthusiasm carried him further in the adoration of genius. The charge lies not so much in the fact of his being a disciple, as in the manner in which he proclaimed himself to be such. But examine it seriously, and the accusation usually made against him falls to the ground. A sycophant is a parasite, and a parasite is one who courts the tables of the rich, and earns a welcome by flattery. It is not the mere act of prostration or outward humility which is sufficient to make up the character. The meaning of the word involves a base or unworthy motive, as when one crouches and fawns like a dog, through fear of chastisement, or plays a servile part to accomplish an unworthy end. The application cannot be made to Boswell, because the bad motive is entirely wanting. Had he been so contemptible as is alleged, the great man, who was above deceit, and not wanting in bluntness, would have found him intolerable, and thrust him out of his presence.

It is an indirect insult to the memory of the lexicographer to cherish the idea that he would harbour in his path a blockhead or a flatterer, or to warp into an expression of contempt the jocular remarks which he might have applied to the peculiarities of his friend. The attack loses all its speciousness, as the object of Boswell is well known; which was, to write the life of Dr. Johnson, and the illustrious author knew and encouraged the design. The perpetual attendance, and attitude of listening, so offensive in appearance, were necessary to the fulfilment of the plan. If a person were preparing to write a history, and his researches were to be diligent and of any value, would he not push them into every quarter where information could be obtained; into the most unexplored recesses of the library; into the most antique books which time had spared, as well as by personal inquiry to a degree of obtrusiveness which only the cause justified? And how then may one prepare himself to write biography when the subject still lives? There is but one resort, but one fountain of the knowledge which he wishes to acquire, and if he seeks it constantly is there anything mean in this? We know well enough that such is not the usual course adopted. Death is suffered first to reach his "shining mark," and then the biographer begins a vain search to discover that which is irretrievably lost. The record is professedly inaccurate; he can but present the remains of great men—the poor fragments saved out of the rich matériel of their lives. It appears that there is great credit to be bestowed on diligent research to recover some worm-eaten memento, and only contempt on the parsimonious care which would prevent it from being lost. There is great rejoicing over some stray fact, but a very cold reception for the "ninety and nine, which went not astray." How many gems and jewels are buried in darkness, which ought to sparkle gloriously in the light! How many pure and beautiful things are lost to literature, which must have been beyond all price, since their very fragments are χρυσαιώτερα χρυσού—more golden than gold! Hence works which are called "Lives" are for the most part failures, and while there are many admirable historians there is but one biographer. Indeed, the requisites for the latter are so different, and so peculiar, that it is to be despaired of whether any greater perfection will be arrived at in this department. Public acts make up history, and are no sooner developed than they find their safe and enduring place in the nation's archives. Out of such a mass, it is the duty of the historian not more to select and arrange, than to reduce to philosophical principles; but it is different with the biographer, where the map extendeth, not over the range of many centuries, but the short space of one man's life. It is the part of the first to deduce the proper lessons, to condense, to arrange: the narrative bears the same relation to the events, as the Veni, vidi, vici, of Cæsar to the battle. It is the duty of the other not to philosophize, but to collect and record, it matters not how much, whatever will serve to lay open the character of the subject. One looks on as from a high point over the immense field, and leaps from promontory to sun-lit promontory; the other conducts you over a circumscribed place in the communion of a spirit, into the bowers of the garden, or the alcove of the library, as with Cowper at Chertsey, or Pope at the shades of Twickenham. The one is read with the cold eye of philosophy, which never shrinks aghast from the bloodiest battles; the other with the warmth of regard and human sympathy. The one is but a game, rendered amusing by the adroit players; the other illustrates a social existence, introduces you to the fireside, where the feelings and affections cluster, and into the circles of friends where wit, genius, and eloquence, flow uncontrained. Who is able to perform the latter office properly, unless it be some friend who sticketh closer than a brother? The great Dr. Johnson in this province falls far below his despised contemporary. The "Lives of the Poets," though admirable, cannot pretend to do this, and are tinctured in many cases by the strong prejudice of the writer, and charged with injustice. The art of biography consists in letting the subject illustrate his own history or character. Plutarch's Lives are rather History, or parts of History. They are written centuries after many of the characters ceased to exist, and some are thrown as far back as the heroic ages, and have to do with as veritable personages as Blue Beard or Jack the Giant Killer.

The biographer of Dr. Johnson, in accomplishing his work after such a plan, has conferred on the author a kind of immortality independent of the posthumous fame which follows great men, and which would not have been conferred by his works alone, although these retain their rank among the English classics. The stately periods, such as that with which Rasselas sets out, all weighed in the balance, and to be pronounced with grand intonation; the sesquipedalian words of the Rambler; the pomp of style so characteristic of the man; these have given way to purer taste, and to the chaster graces of the Saxon. The public taste has completely shifted since the days of the essayists. New schools have arisen, and thrust out the old disciples, who, if they are not forgotten, are hastily passed by the crowd, in their desire for fresher novelty. In poetry, the cumbersome books of the epic are thrown aside for the livelier cantos of Don Juan; and now none reads, for nobody writes, an epic poem. It is "all the same in prose." The newspaper has taken the place of the essay, and a more exciting romance supplies the place of Richardson's novel. The taste for reading has become too prevalent and too ravenous, either too utilitarian or too spoiled by excessive stimulus, to draw from the "pure wells of English undefiled." The ancient public of the Athenians was in many respects a prototype of the capriciousness of ours. Τί νέον λέγεται;—Is there any news? Who turns to refresh himself with the speculations of Addison, when every newspaper will furnish him with more exhilarating themes; or examines the gentle limning in the portraiture of Sir Roger de Coverley? Who reads (except the scholar) Sir Charles Grandison, or Clarissa Harlowe, when any modern novel will afford more bloodthirsty heroes and melo-dramatic heroines? Even the Great Unknown is thrust aside; and where hundreds read Scott, thousands are at this moment delighted with the history of "David Copperfield," and the happy destinies of the gentle Agnes.

Thus, by the inevitable law of change, the most far-spread reputations must in time become abbreviated, or fade from their original brightness, while the waters of forgetfulness gather around and threaten to engulf the most imperishable works. After all, what do we know even of those whose reputation is freshest? When the best biographers have collected all their facts, and all the materials they can muster, what a poor, vague, unsubstantial idea do they present of the persons they commemorate! Even with the aid of a correct likeness affixed, do we fail to embody the character which they set forth, and illustrate by so many traits. We are acquainted with many facts concerning them; that Pope was irascible, Cowper melancholy, and Goldsmith a spendthrift; but do we see them, as it were, face to face, or grasp them as with the hand of friendship? The written works form but a small part of the emanations of a great mind; of the sparks and scintillation which attrition kindles. There is the flash of wit, so sudden and so subtle in its elements that its very nature is to evanesce; the apt thought, which must not be changed in its apt expression; the spontaneous eloquence which gathers its passion from the passing object, from the thunder-cloud which breaks that instant over-head, from the sunshine which bursts suddenly on the valley, from the voice of a small bird, or the expanding beauties of a flower; there are the gorgeous visions painted by a single dash of description—the inspiration enkindled in a moment, but which vanishes like the early cloud, or like the morning dew.

Who is there that can watch a man so closely as to lose nothing of the divine essence of genius which is continually escaping as a candescent body throws off its particles of light? There is only one instance in which this has been in any degree accomplished, and that by one who has ever since received for his pains the ingratitude of the Republic of Letters; an ingratitude more obdurate than that of the Athenians, which sometimes relented, and although it banished first, or condemned to death, yet afterward shed tears, and erected statues. We repeat, that no man ever enjoyed the same kind of immortality as the despised Boswell has conferred on his subject. The laurels are fresh and green as yesterday; they will be a century hence as green as they are to-day. He has had justice done to him at the expense of vast injustice to another; he has been grouped with his distinguished compeers in a manner so natural, so life-like, upon the canvass, that posterity extol the picture with the highest words of criticism, yet in the same breath with the most malignant abuse revile the painter. The great author and lexicographer is embalmed to all ages. After he emerged from Bolt Court, and his palmiest glory began, it is to all the world as though he had never died. But he is before us, not wrapped in swathings, or Egyptian balsams; not in a resemblance which does not speak, or in the statue which cannot give from its dead eyes the expression of the soul. He lives—he moves: we behold him in his grotesque attitudes as vividly as if he were now present; we listen to the ipsisima verba, the sharp reply and rejoinder which wound up the case at issue, as though his lips moved. The guests arrive, the conversation is enkindled; Burke, Fox, Goldsmith, and Sir Joshua Reynolds are at the board. We have the soul of every banquet—the very essence of wit which flashed among that brilliant throng. The grave has long closed over the mortal part of each; the club is extinct, but the spirit of all is preserved. Who has wrought out this wonderful achievement? It is time that an end were put to looking the gift-horse in the mouth. If there is no gratitude in the world of letters, let justice be done. Because the biographer had his faults and failings, of which his own family were ashamed, is that any reason why he should not have the benefit of the maxim, De mortuis nil nisi bonum? Does that afford the shadow of an excuse for more serious calumnies, and for certain persons to show their own smartness by attempting to exhibit his folly, and to display at the same time their own wit and his want of it? If he was willing to render himself ridiculous to his own age, it was for the benefit of posterity, and posterity should be the last to refuse indulgence, or to upbraid him with the folly. Those who were eye-witnesses to his obscurity without knowing the object, might justly have entertained for what had the aspect of sycophancy a feeling of disgust. But when the client's grotesque and squalid garb has passed away with the actor from the stage, and nothing but what is pleasant remains; nothing but the great work which cost him such a sacrifice of time, labour, and dignity; it is affectation, it is ingratitude, to heap contempt upon his memory. Let the truth be adhered to. A distinguished writer has pronounced him a man of contemptible parts with the same justice that he has pronounced Xenophon to be a man of small parts who wrote the Cyropædia.

In almost the same sentence wherein he sets him down the first of biographers—as much as Homer was the first of heroic poets, Shakspeare the first of dramatists, Demosthenes the first of orators—he declares him to be a man of the feeblest and meanest intellect; a contradiction which he himself acknowledges to be strange in the extreme. Now the very idea of writing biography after such a plan was original; and originality is the highest mark, and involves the very idea of genius: but to assert that he who not only conceived the idea, but carried it out successfully, was a fool or a blockhead, is absurd, unjust, and contradictory, and ought to brand the calumniator with folly. It argues still greater rashness to appeal to the book itself, after acknowledging it to be a "very great work," as the ground and evidence of the charge. Certainly, the pleasure, the instruction to be derived from it ought to banish every such reflection against the author. One generation is too apt to be the mere echo of the opinions of another—to suffer old errors to slumber, and unjust stigmas to remain. The white flag ought to wave over the grave of the innocent, although for a century that grave has been dishonoured. In that singular work which we have mentioned, is a preservation of the past so remarkable, that we are reminded of the chambers which have been revealed at Herculaneum and Pompeii. There the brush and pencil of the artist are as fresh as the colours of yesterday; but desolation reigns in the solitary courts: the eloquence which prevails there is the eloquence of silence; and only imagination can re-people the deserted halls with the forms of the departed. Time has spared; the progress of decay has been arrested; and the beautiful tints remain fixed and vivid upon the walls. But it is more difficult to render permanent the hues and colouring which genius casts over its most unstudied thoughts, which are only intended to give present delight, to lull the flying pain, or charm the passing hour. Here is a gallery presented to us, yet filled with animation; voices echo in the chambers which have not been deserted; the tapestry moves; the glorious society are there; we enjoy the very soul of the banquet; the hilarious company of wit, learning, and eloquence. For one who has created this strong illusion, or rather preserved a stronger reality, has no better reward been assigned than a fame equivocal as that which attaches to Erostratus, who set fire to the Temple of Diana at Ephesus. The evil must one day be repaired. So long as that constellation is seen in the literary heavens, so long shall he who has pointed it out to our admiration shine,—it is true, with diminished light and with a different glory,—but no less a star in the midst of that splendid galaxy.

A WRECK ON THE COAST.

THE firm and vigorous pencil of Stanfield is to be traced in this effective subject. The gray cast of the sky—which still bears traces of the storm—the perfect truth of the shipping—the forcible and well-grouped figures—all betoken the master hand. Boulogne sands have an evil reputation for shipwreck; and the loss, a few years since, of a number of female emigrants on their way to Australia will not soon be forgotten.

COMPANIONS OF MY SOLITUDE.¹

If it be true that Man is a thinking animal, par excellence, then does the bulk of the species perform its functions ill enough. This fact is forcibly borne in upon the mind after reading such a book as the one we are about to introduce to the reader. It is the work of a thinking man—a man who not only possesses the thinking faculty, but knows how to exercise it to considerable advantage both for himself and others. Many persons will require no further proof of this truth than the fact, that "Companions of my Solitude" is written by the author of "Essays in the Intervals of Business," "Claims of Labour," "Conquerors of the New World," and the two volumes entitled "Friends in Council."

To the last-mentioned of these works, the new one bears most resemblance; indeed, it is a sort of continuation or supplement to it. It is marked by the same gentle boldness of speculation in matters of thought,—the same decision and tolerance in matters of conduct and opinion,—the same depth and delicacy in matters of feeling,—the same scholarly and gentlemanly taste in questions of art and society. We may add that there is at times a tone of melancholy in the new book which we never detected in the others; but, as if to counterbalance this, we have much of the delicate evanescent humour which flashed here and there (always in the right place) over the pages of "Friends in Council." Of the style of composition, we need say little more than that it is the only style which could result from such a combination of mental qualities. There is no surer indication of a man's character than the style he writes. In no case, we imagine, can such an aphorism be more appropriate than in the present. The peculiar felicities of our author's style cannot be described accurately, but we may affirm in a general way, that they will be very much to the taste of those who are not enamoured of the flashy, frothy rhetoric, the glitter, the flippancy, the disagreeable straining after point and wittiness, which prevail so much in the current literature of the day. To all our readers ambitious of good writing, we would say, study the style of "Companions of my Solitude." See how well it unites dignity with grace, precision and exactness with ease! How well it conveys the author's meaning, and nothing but the meaning. You have all the right words in their right places, and there is no appearance of effort in the arrangement. Each sentence springs gracefully and naturally out of the preceding one. It is a rare style to have been produced in this excessive nineteenth century; a style that is close and pregnant;

"Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full."

Let all who value the purity of our noble English language give a hearty welcome to such writers. They will do much towards ridding us of the pestilent literary patois of the day, which has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

Although the matter in this volume is not divided in the regular essay fashion, it is nevertheless a collection of essays on various subjects; the "Companions" of the author's "Solitude," of which he speaks thus at the commencement of the work:—

"When in the country, I live much alone: and as I wander over downs and commons, and through lanes with lofty hedges, many thoughts come into my mind. I find, too, the same ones come again and again, and are spiritual companions. At times they insist on being with me, and are resolutely intrusive. I think I will describe them, that so I may have more mastery over them. Instead of suffering them to haunt me as vague faces and half-fashioned resemblances, I will make them into distinct pictures, which I can give away, or hang up in my room; turning them, if I please, with their faces to the wall; and in short, be free to do what I like with them."

In this first chapter he says,—

"Meditating upon general improvement, I often think about the climate in these parts of the world; and I see that without much husbandry of our means and resources, it is difficult for us to be anything but low barbarians. The difficulty of living at all in a cold, damp, destructive climate is great. Socrates went about with very scanty clothing, and men praise his wisdom for caring so little for the goods of this life. He ate sparingly, and of mean food. This is not the way, I suspect, that we can make a philosopher here. There are people who would deride one for saying this, and would contend that it gives too much weight to worldly things. But I suspect that they are misled by notions borrowed from Eastern climates. Here we must make prudence one of the substantial virtues."

We cannot forbear quoting some observations on Puritanism, suggested by the post-office regulations, "which did not allow letters to go out from country places, or be delivered at such places, on a Sunday." He had been disappointed in receiving a letter from his little boy. "To be sure," he says, "I know pretty well what the letter would be;" and hereupon follows a capital child's epistle, which we quote to elicit a smile from parents.

"I hope you are well, papa, and I send you my love, and I have got a kite, and uncle George's dog is very fierce, his name is Nero, which was a Roman Emperor, nearly quite white, only he has got two black spots just over his nose. And I send my love to mamma and the children, and I am your own little boy and affectionate son,

"Not a very important, certainly not a very artistic production, this letter, but still it has its interest for the foolish paternal mind, and I should like to have received it to-day. It is greatly owing to these Borgias that I have not received this letter. Most of my neighbours imagine that their little petitions were the sole cause of these post-office regulations; but, I beg to go somewhat further back, and I come to Pope Alexander the Sixth, and lay a great deal of the blame on him. The pendulous folly of mankind oscillates as far in this direction as it has come from that; and an absurd Puritan is only a correlative to a wicked Pope.

"From such reflections I fell to considering Puritanism generally, and I am afraid I came to a different conclusion from that which would have been popular at any of the late public meetings; but then I console myself by an aphorism of Ellesmere's, who is wont to remark 'how exactly proportioned to a man's ignorance of the subject is the noise he makes about it at a public meeting.' Knowledge brings doubts, and exceptions, and limitations, which though occasionally some aids to truth, are all hindrances to vigorous statement."

"What are the objects of life, as far as regards this world? Its first wants, I answer, namely, food and raiment. What besides? Marrying, and the rearing of children; and, in general, the cultivation of the affections. So far, Puritans would agree with us.

"But suppose all these things to be tempered with gaiety, and festivity: what element of wickedness has necessarily entered? None that I can perceive. Self-indulgence takes many forms; and we should bear in mind that there may be a sullen sensuality as well as a gay one.

"But the truth is, there is a secret belief among some men that God is displeased with man's happiness; and in consequence, they sink about creation, ashamed and afraid to enjoy anything."

"Once I happened to overhear a dialogue somewhat similar to that which Charles Lamb, perhaps, only feigned to hear. I was travelling in a railway carriage with a most precise-looking formal person, the Arch-Quaker, if there be such a person. His countenance was very noble, or rather had been so before it was frozen up. He said nothing; I had a great respect for him. At last his mouth opened. I listened with attention; I had hitherto lived with foolish, gad-about, dinner-eating, dancing people: now I was going to hear the words of retired wisdom; when he thus addressed his young daughter, sitting opposite,—"Hast thee heard how Southamptons went lately?" (in those days South Western Railway shares were called Southamptons,) and she replied with like gravity, giving him some information that she had picked up about Southamptons, yesterday evening.

"I leant back rather sickened as I thought what was probably the daily talk, and the daily thoughts in that family, from which I conjectured all amusement was banished save that connected with intense money-getting."

Concerning amusement, as one of the necessaries of life to a virtuous man, he speaks to the purpose in various parts of this and his former works. In this place, he says,—

"You hear clergymen in country parishes denouncing the ill-nature of their parishioners: it is in vain: the better sort of men try to act up to what they are told, but really it is so dull in the parish, that a bit of scandal is welcome to the heart. These poor people have nothing to think about; nature shows them comparatively little, as art and science have not taught them to look behind the scenes, or even at the scenes; literature they know nothing of; they cannot have gossip about the men of the past, (which is the most innocent kind of gossip,) in other words, read and discuss history; they have no delicate handiwork to amuse them; in short, talk they must, and talk they will, about their neighbours, whose goings on are a sort of perpetual puppet-show to them.

"But to speak more gravely, man, even the most sluggish-minded man, craves amusement of some kind, and his wiser and more powerful brethren will show their wisdom, or their want of it, in the amusements they contrive for him. We need not be afraid that in England any art or innocent amusement will be cultivated too much. The genius of the people, though kindly, is severe. And that is why there is so much less danger of their being injured, if any one is, by recreation. Cyrus kept the Lydians tame, we are told, by allowing them to cultivate music; the Greeks were, perhaps, prevented from becoming dominant by a cultivation of many arts; but the Anglo-Saxons, like the Romans, can afford to cultivate art and recreations of all kinds. Such pursuits will not tame them too much. To contend occasionally against the bent of the genius, or the circumstances of a people, is one of the great arts of statesmanship. The same thing which is to be dreaded in one place is to be cultivated in another; here a poison, there an antidote."

There is no subject discussed in the volume that deserves to be brought forward for general recognition and consideration, more than that which our author has aptly termed "the tyranny of the weak over the strong." It is a species of domestic tyranny more common than any other, and from which the oppressed can rarely free themselves, and that, on account of their good, and not their bad qualities.

"This is a most fertile subject, and has been nearly neglected. Weak is a relative term; whenever two people meet, one is comparatively weak and the other strong. The relation between them is often supposed to imply this. Taking society in general, there is a certain weakness of the kind I mean, attributable to the sick, the spoilt, the ill-tempered, the unfortunate, the aged, women, and the clergy. Now, I venture to say, there is no observant man of the world who has lived to the age of thirty, who has not seen numerous instances of severe tyranny exercised by persons belonging to one or other of these classes, and which tyranny has been established, continued, and endured, solely by reason of the weakness, real or supposed, of the persons exercising it. Talking once with a thoughtful man on this subject, he remarked to me, that of course the generous suffered much from the tyranny I was speaking of, as the strength of it was drawn from their strength. If you come to analyse it, it is a tyranny exercised by playing upon the good-nature, the fear of responsibility, the dread of acting selfishly, the horror of giving pain, prevalent among good and kind people. They often know that it is a tremendous tyranny they are suffering under, and they do not feel it the less because they are consenting parties."

The fourth chapter is one of the most interesting in the volume. It has a delicate humour and a pathos that are positively charming, and we return to it again and again. The subject of it is a sort of day-dream:—

"I pictured to myself a descendant of mine, a man of dilapidated fortune, but still owning this house and garden. The few adjoining fields he will long ago have parted with. But he loves the place, having been brought up here by his sad, gentle mother, and having lived here with his young sister, then a rapturous, imaginative girl, his companion and delight. Through the smallness of their fortune, and consequently the narrow circle of their acquaintances, she will have married a man totally unfit for her; the romance of her nature has turned somewhat sour, and though occasionally high-minded, she is very peevish now, and is no longer the companion that she was to her brother."

He goes on speculating on the affairs of his imaginary descendant, and communes with him in thought; and many of the observations elicited are valuable for their sound sense and their novelty. The following remark concerning Rochefoucault may be cited par exemple.

"The people who write shrewdly are often the most easy to impose upon, or have been so. I almost suspect—without, however, having looked into the matter—that Rochefoucault was a tender lover, a warm friend, and, in general, a dupe (happy for him) to all the impulses and affections which he would have us imagine he saw through and had mastered. The simple write shrewdly, but do not describe what they do. And the hard and worldly would be too wise in their generation to write about what they practised, even if they perceived it, which they seldom do, lacking delicacy of imagination."

Our author is not a mere ponderer over abstract ideas, having no immediate connexion with what is going on in the world around him; on the contrary, the sympathetic nature of his mind is shown by the serious way in which he takes up most of the exciting topics of the day. The condition of the Church is one concerning which he speaks wisely, being able to consider it from many sides.

"As I went along, I thought of the Church of England, and of what might be its future fortunes. I had just been reading the works of two brothers: last night I had been reading an elaborate attack from the Roman Catholic side, upon the Anglican Church, by one brother; and this morning I had read a very skilful attack upon all present religious systems by another brother. And I thought to myself, the Church of England suffers from both attacks.

"One's acquaintance who meet in the street, shrug their shoulders, and exclaim, 'What a state the Church is in! Oh! that these questions that divide it had never been raised.' I do not agree with them, and sometimes I tell them so. If there are these great differences among thoughtful men about great subjects, why should they (the differences) be stifled? Are we always to be walking about as masked figures?"

The largest portion of the volume, and to our thinking the ablest in thought as well as the noblest and most touching in feeling, is devoted to a subject which is too complex and too painful to be commented on in such pages as ours. The author has called it "the great sin of great cities." Let him who thinks that he has ought to do with this sin, and who would know what a large-hearted man of knowledge and experience has to say about it, let him read the sixth chapter of "Companions of my Solitude." And having read it, let his saddened spirit be renovated by reading the seventh, in which Ellesmere, the author's satirical legal friend, tells a tale, a simple unvarnished tale, illustrative of the divinity that is in a man who is capable of the highest sort of love. Ellesmere is a strong-minded man of the world, a high-bred English gentleman, a lawyer, silent, acute, sarcastic, and by no means given to sentimentality. He is induced, by a serious talk with the author upon the serious subject above alluded to, to tell a portion of his own private history. The only woman whom this proud English gentleman ever loved, and that with every fibre of his being, was a German maid-servant of the better-class, whom he was the means of saving from starvation. He loves her so well that he never allows Gretchen to suspect it, though he would gladly have made her his wife.

But Gretchen, he knows, has a lover in her own rank, "a poor man and far away." Shame on him if he should endeavour to shake her fidelity. He puts her in the way of earning her livelihood, and then goes away loaded with her grateful affection, intending never to see her again, but not, on that account, to forget her, as is the custom with less tenacious minds. Hear his own words on his after-conduct.

"Not being a philosopher or a philanthropist, I do not easily forget those I once care for. I studied how to protect her in every way. I mastered the politics of that German town, and learnt all the intricacies of the little court there. I ascertained everything respecting our relations with it, and who amongst our diplomatists was desirous of the residence there, when there should be a change. I busied myself more in politics than I had done; and, I believe, I must own that my speech on the — intervention, which had its merits, and cost me great labour, was spoken for Gretchen. Of course, I need hardly say that I spoke only what I most sincerely thought; but I should probably have let politics alone but for her sake. At last there was an opportunity of a new appointment being made of a minister to that German court, and the man who wished for it, and whose just claims I had aided as I best could, obtained it. His wife, Lady R., one of those brilliant women of the world who are often more amiable than we give them credit for being, had long noticed the care with which I had cultivated her society. She imagined it was for one of her beautiful daughters, and did not look unkindly upon me. Before she went to reside at — I undeceived her, telling her the whole truth, the best thing in such a case, and binding her to secrecy. She promised to look out for Gretchen and take her into her household. I told Lady R. that Gretchen had a lover, and said that if anything could be done for him, without lifting him out of his rank, it should be. Neither would I have Gretchen made anything different from what she was. I could have given her money by handfuls, but that is not the way to serve people. At the same time I implored Lady R. to let me know immediately, in case anything should ever occur to break off the marriage.

"Milverton.—And you would have put in your suit and married this girl?"

"Ellesmere.—There was but little chance, I fear; but you may be sure no opportunity would have escaped me. As for the world, I am one of the few persons who really care but little for it. The hissing of collected Europe, provided I knew the hissers could not touch me, would be a grateful sound rather than the reverse,—that is, if heard at a reasonable distance. Well, but I told you I saw Gretchen once more. Yes, once more. You may remember that some time ago I had a severe illness, and was not able to attend the courts on an occasion when I was much wanted. This appeared in the newspapers of the day, and so, I conjecture, came to the knowledge of Gretchen, who in her quiet indomitable way had learnt English, and was a great student, as I afterwards heard, of English newspapers. She had also contrived to learn more about my life than I chose to tell her when I answered her question about my being happy; and the poor girl had formed juster notions of the joyousness and comfort of a lawyer's chambers in London. She begged for leave of absence to visit a sick friend: Lady R. conjectured, I believe, where she was going, and consented.

"A few days afterwards there was a knock at my door, (I was still very ill, and unable to leave my sitting-room, but solacing life as best I could by the study of a great pedigree case,) when my clerk, with an anxious and ashamed countenance, put his head in, made one of those queer faces which he does when he thinks a great bore is wishing to see me, and that I had better say 'No,' and exclaimed, 'A young woman from Germany, sir, wants to see you.'

"I knew instinctively who it was, but I had the presence of mind to make a gesture signifying I would not see her, (for I could not have spoken,) and I was afraid, in my present state of weakness, I should betray myself in some way, if I were to see her unprepared. While the parleying was going on in the passage, I collected myself sufficiently to ring for my clerk, and tell him he might appoint the young woman to come in the afternoon. By that time I had reflected upon my part, and was somewhat of myself again. She came: I scolded and protested;

she did nothing in reply, but look at me and say how thin I was; and there was no resisting the quiet, affectionate, discreet way in which she installed herself every day for some hours as head nurse. Even my old laundress relaxed so far as to say that Gradgin (for that was what she called her,) was a good girl, and not hoity-toity; and my clerk Peter, a very cantankerous fellow, was heard to remark, that for his part he did not like young women much, but Miss Gradgin was better than most, and certainly his master did somehow eat more of anything made by her than by anybody else, and never threatened now to throw the chicken broth he brought in at his head.

"I jest at these things, Milverton; and in truth, what remains for us often in this world but to jest? Which of the queens was it, by the way, who on the scaffold played with the sharpness of the axe, and said something droll about her little neck? Well, I jest; but this visit of Gretchen's was a very severe trial to me. It is a common trial though, I dare say. No doubt many a person dotes upon or adores some one else, who is, happily, as unconscious of the doting or adoration as Ram Dass, or any other heathen deity, of the fanatic love of his worshippers. To the loving person, however, it is like walking over hot iron with no priest-anointed feet, and yet with unmoved countenance, not even allowed to look stoical. I could not resist listening sometimes to Gretchen's wise, innocent, pleasant talk about all the new things she was seeing; and, perhaps, if I had not kept carefully before me the claims of the absent peasant lover, some day when she was moving about me like sunlight in the room, I might in some moment of frenzy, which I should never have forgiven myself, have thrown myself at her feet, and asked her to take these dingy chambers, and my faded self, and all my belongings, under her permanent control. But wiser, sterner, juster thoughts prevailed."

Truly has the wise man said, "Greater is he that ruleth his own spirit than he that taketh a city." Of this strong man's love the end may be guessed. "There was an opportunity for advancing her lover. It was done, not without my knowledge. She had by this time saved some money. They were married six months ago. I sent the wedding-gown. Do not let us talk any more about it."

But before we leave off talking to our readers about it, we must make one more quotation, which is exquisite in its description and suggestions. It is about a genuine woman—this much-loved Gretchen.

"I have said nothing to you, Milverton, which describes herself; and, indeed, I always look upon all descriptions of women in books and elsewhere as having something mean, poor, and sensuous about them. I may tell you that she always, from the first time I saw her, reminded me a little of the bust of Cicero. She had the same delicate critical look, though she was what you would call a great large girl. She might have been a daughter of his, if he had married what he would have called a barbarian.

German woman. In nature she has often recalled to me Jeannie Deans, only that she has more tenderness. She would have spoken falsely (I am sorry to say) for Effie, and would have died of it.

"Lady R. (in whose house Gretchen was a servant,) when she was over here some little time ago, said to me, to comfort me, I suppose, that though Gretchen was a sweet girl, she did not quite see what there was in her to make her so attractive to a man like me. But these women do not always understand one another, or appreciate what makes them dear to particular men. She added, 'But still, I do not know how it was, Gretchen became the great authority in our household; they all referred to her about everything, and she did a good deal of their work.' In fact, she was the personification of common sense; only that what we mean by common sense is apt to be hard, over-wise, and disagreeable; hers was the common sense of a romantic person, and of one who had a great perception of the humorous. I think I hear her low, long-continued laugh, as I used to pour forth some of my odd theories about men and things to hear what she would say. And she generally did say something fully to the purpose. But action was her forte. There was a noiseless soft activity about her like that of light."

We have read many stories of unrequited love in the course of our lives, but none more noble and touching than that of the great lawyer Mr. Ellesmere. The manner of telling it, too, as we said before, gives a great additional charm; it is exquisitely natural and life-like. But we must close our remarks on this book, or we shall be tempted to transcribe the whole. We can only wish to all our readers an intimate acquaintance with the author's "Companions in Solitude."

DIORAMA OF JERUSALEM AND THE HOLY LAND.

ST. GEORGE'S GALLERY, HYDE PARK CORNER.

TURNING out of the "shock, the hum of men," in the neighbourhood of Hyde Park Corner, I entered the doorway of a public exhibition, and was transported in a few minutes far beyond this every-day life of high pressure and restless progress, away into life in the East, where sacred and chivalrous memories clothe every beautiful scene with additional beauty, or where, as Byron says of this "land of the Sun,"

"All but the spirit of man is sublime."

For persons whose minds have acquired a true interest in Palestine, and the localities of Scripture History, this diorama will have peculiar charms, for it depicts as faithfully as a diorama can, (more faithfully than any diorama we have ever yet seen,) all that a diorama pretends to do; and that is saying much. Here the spectators see before them (in many instances with an appearance of reality that is positively startling) places that have long been as household words in their mouths, and as hidden treasure to their imagination. To the artist-eye one picture will be better than another, but all have merit; and to general spectators, we doubt whether any one of them will appear to have a fault. The usual coarse exaggeration in drawing and colour, which is so great a drawback to profit and pleasure in looking at most dioramas, (even some of those most favoured by the public,) is entirely absent here. Truth and taste have combined to make this diorama a real work of art.

The opening scene—a travelling party resting under a group of date palms in the desert; the moonlight view within the walls of the Convent of St. Catharine; the giant Cedars of Lebanon; the pass of Petra; the Garden of Gethsemane; scenes within the city of Jerusalem, and the banks of the River Jordan, are among the most interesting pictures. We have never seen a thing of the kind better managed. All went well, and was effective. The viva voce explanations were just what were wanted, and no more, since all present brought some knowledge of the Bible geography with them. The dioramic effects were really natural, and the music was of a far higher character than the ill-performed rubbish generally given at such entertainments. It was really an improvement. We were very sorry to return to London again.

THE STORY OF A FAMILY.

SECOND NOTICE.

IDA'S grief for the loss of her father,—“père comme il y en a peu,”—is naturally and touchingly described. The following short extract, which prefaces the account of the first evening on which the sorrowing girl makes an effort to join the family circle, is in the authoress's very best style.

* * * * *

“It is a trying moment, (who cannot remember such?) when, after some household grief, the one who is specially left desolate, first resumes her place in the family circle. How secret is the vigilance! how guarded the tenderness of the rest! What care to temper the conversation! what unreal cheerfulness of tone! what scrupulous choice of subject! And to the sufferer, how wretched a mockery of past habits which can never thoroughly be resumed, does it all seem! how miserable an attempt to simulate the absence of misery! She feels this acutely, even while she believes in the necessity of the attempt, and is grateful for the love from which it springs; and if the feeling be one-sided, surely it is one side of the truth. Why should we think entire recovery from sorrow desirable? why seek to efface, to ignore, if it were possible to forget, the affliction which is sent to sanctify our energies? When God strikes our goodly fabric to the earth, surely He does not always intend us to begin forthwith to construct another out of the ruins; He would perhaps rather teach us to live without these earthly tabernacles, in expectation of that house built without hands, eternal in the heavens.”

At the close of this same evening, Alexander, the unloved and unlovable cousin, seizes an opportunity, and, with his usual absence of tact, and want of delicacy of feeling, gives Ida so unmistakeable a hint of his intention on the following day to honour her by the offer of his hand, that even her simplicity cannot but comprehend him, and she accordingly commissions his uncouth sister Agnes to break to him the discomfiting intelligence, that he has misplaced his affections, and to hint to him, in the most gentle manner possible, that she would not have him at any price; thereby evincing a selfish want of consideration for Agnes the uncouth, which, as it is about the only fault Miss Ida commits throughout the two volumes, and therefore the strongest connecting link between our little heroine and the rest of Eve's frail daughters, we gladly recognise and point out. The obtuse ambassadress stumbles through her mission with an irritating bluntness, which completely takes the shine out of Alexander's superficial French polish, and puts that refined young gentleman into a most natural and undignified rage, in the course of which he reiterates the assertion that “she” (meaning Ida) “will repent it,” with so much apparent confidence in his own power to bring about the consummation he so devoutly wishes, that even the slow-witted Agnes sees more in it than the senseless threatening of an angry man, and is haunted by a presentiment of some fresh misfortune about to befall the unoffending Ida. She is not kept long in suspense. Her amiable father, uncle Alexander, reflecting that (particularly in novels,) “where there's a will there's a way,” has discovered a flaw in the testamentary document whereon the story hinges, and only awaits the denouement of his son's courtship, to make his discovery public, preparatory to transferring the contested fortune from Ida to himself.

In a somewhat stormy interview with his brother, the excellent, kind-hearted, pig-headed Uncle John, he communicates this intelligence, skilfully contriving to cast suspicion upon the memory of the deceased Percy Lee, by which insinuation he trusts to avert inquiry, and avoid the expense and uncertainty of litigation. Uncle John speaks out, and Mr. Alexander Lee retreats in dudgeon to the village inn, whence he indites two letters, one to his brother, setting forth his determination not to be appeased without an apology; the other to Ida, “recapitulating his explanations, and expressing his confidence that her reasonableness, unselfishness, and strong sense of right, would cause her to rejoice that she no longer stood in a position which she must feel to be false according to the rules of nature, custom, and justice,” winding up this precious epistle by offering her a home, which he feels tolerably certain she will not accept. The following extract, showing how these missives are received, affords a fair specimen of the writer's livelier style.

“When the letters were brought in, Ida was sitting between Uncle John and Aunt Ellinor, holding a hand of each. She was bewildered and distressed. Her first intimation of what had occurred was from Agnes, who had broken into her room in an agony of tears to wish her good-bye, adding, almost inarticulately, that Uncle John would explain, and running away before Ida had time to do more than return her embrace. To Uncle John accordingly she went, and she found him pacing the library, red, furious, and incoherent, Ellinor soothing him, Frederick sitting by in disturbed silence, and wonder without parallel! Melissa sympathising with him! Yes, Melissa was fond of Ida, and her indignation was thoroughly aroused against Alexander, though it must be owned that it did not fairly break forth till after it had been clearly explained to her, that he intended to claim the whole property, up to which announcement she had contrived to believe, that the portion of the will which concerned Ida's heiress-ship might be disproved, while that which involved the alternative of dividing the property among all the members of the family, might continue to have the force of law. When she understood the real state of the case, her wrath knew no bounds, and in the first outbreak of it she even expressed, among other strong imputations of crime, an opinion that Alexander had himself forged the will, with a malignant desire to encourage false hopes in the rest of the family, which he might afterwards enjoy the diabolical pleasure of destroying. And though she did not absolutely maintain this view against opposition, she seemed by no means to consider it necessarily false, or absolutely groundless.

"As soon as Ida made her appearance, Uncle John stopped in his career, and said in a hurried under tone to the rest, 'We must break it to her carefully.' Melissa, a little affronted at the hint, withdrew into the back-ground immediately, and sat down in silence. Ellinor was literally afraid to speak. Frederick, who would have given worlds to undertake the commission, thought that, as matters stood, he should only complicate them by interfering. Accordingly, Uncle John was left to break it to her as carefully as he liked; a feat which he accomplished by a series of preparatory bursts, so tumultuous and spasmodic in character, interspersed with intervals of calmness so artificially deliberate and violently nonchalant, that Ida was frightened out of her wits, and, trembling in every limb, entreated to be told if anything very dreadful had happened. Thereupon Uncle John began to pace the room again, muttering denunciations; and while he was thus occupied, the others communicated the occurrences of the morning in a kind of three-part dirge, harmonious and mournful, each repeating, with variations, the phrases of the others, and terminating in a full united chord of dismay. Ida's relief was inexpressible.

"O! dear, is that all?" said she. "Well, it certainly seems much more just that Uncle Alexander should have the property. Pray, don't be vexed about it on my account."

"My dear child, how can you talk such stuff?" cried John, indignantly; "you know nothing at all about it. It is one of the most shabby, paltry, pitiful transactions"—

"No, no, dear Uncle John, don't use such words," interrupted Ida. "I know it is only because you love me so much that you can't bear the thought of any misfortune befalling me; but this is not a misfortune at all, not even a disappointment, for I never knew till—till quite lately, that there was any chance of my having all this money. I am sure I don't want it. And just think how unhappy I should be if there were to be a family quarrel, and I were in any way the cause of it! About money too! Such a poor, miserable reason for quarrelling. O! I am sure you could never think of being angry with your own brother about money!"

"A scoundrel!" exclaimed he, sitting down by her side. "And you'll just be a beggar, my dear little innocent darling! That's all! A beggar!" repeated he, with stinging emphasis.

"Ida looked up at him, with an approach to her old playfulness.

"That sounds very shocking," said she. "And only think what cruel aunts, and what a cruel Uncle John I must have, if they let me go about begging!"

"Ellinor now took her seat on the other side. 'You will live with me, my darling,' whispered she."

* * * * *

Some of his superfluous steam having thus found vent, Uncle John sits down to answer his brother's letter, and having at length overcome the difficulties of composition, reads aloud his production for the purpose of obtaining the opinions of his auditors. It commences after the following fashion:—

"MY DEAR ALEXANDER,"—I thought of presenting my compliments in the third person, but, you see, it's better not; for he said, "My dear John," to me, which is a tolerably clear sign that it means nothing."

"(By this time the audience began to perceive that uncle John was delivering himself of an introductory commentary upon his letter; a discovery which relieved them from a state of some bewilderment and anxiety. He proceeded with great and increasing emphasis, interspersing the text with extempore notes, which could with difficulty be distinguished from it, as the whole was declaimed in a sort of indignant, abusive tone, without breaks.)

"MY DEAR ALEXANDER,—I have no apology to make, since I regret nothing which passed this morning, except the part which you played; and a contemptible part it was, and one which deserves transportation a good deal more than a downright burglary."

"Oh, my dear uncle!" exclaimed Ida, "Uncle Alexander will never be friends with you again if you write in that manner."

"Upon my honour, my love, I don't much care if he never is friends with me again. His friendship is not so very creditable. And I must be sincere, you know."

"But can't you say what you think a little more gently?" pleaded Ida, exceedingly distressed. "Contemptible is such a word! And, indeed, I beg your pardon, I hope you won't be angry with me for saying that I think that would be really wrong about burglary."

"Contemptible! Burglary!" repeated Uncle John, looking down at his letter. "I've got a full stop at 'played';" and I haven't read any further. Oh! I see,—but you must let me say my say as I go on—I have written very moderately, I assure you. I wouldn't have written those strong expressions on any account, though they are quite true, just the same. No, no; after all, he is a brother, and I am a Christian," (he gave the sentence all the emphasis of an antithesis,) "and I shall take great care not to provoke him. I shall be very forbearing towards him—don't be frightened—I shall be as gentle as possible to him; a mean, pitiful, cold-hearted fellow! Now let me go on," (resuming his emphatic declamation.)

"'Played! I must always consider that you are taking an unfair advantage of a mere oversight, and getting possession of the property of your niece, whom you ought to protect, by means of a quibble. For I cannot for one instant suppose that you believe that Ida'—had—had anything to do with it. She is incapable of forgery—that is to say—of course, I—"

"'Good gracious, John!' cried Melissa. 'Ida! who ever suggested such an absurdity? Why, she was only four years old when the will was read!'

"'I know, I know,' returned the abashed Uncle John. 'That was just what I was going to say, if you would only listen.'

"He winked till he was nearly blind, cleared his throat, and trod hard on Melissa's tender foot under the table, and finally said that it was absurd to read the letter aloud: his sisters should read it to themselves, and give him their opinion of it. If Ida would show what she had written, nothing further was necessary. The fact was, the sentence in which he had broken down so lamentably, stood thus in the manuscript:—

"'I cannot for one instant suppose that you believe Ida inherits the estates in consequence of any such nefarious transaction as that at which you hinted this morning. Her father was as incapable of forgery as yourself.' When he arrived at the name of 'Ida,' he became aware of what was coming, and suddenly remembered how necessary it was to keep poor Ida in ignorance that any such infamous suggestion had been thrown out. He therefore made a desperate attempt to supply an impromptu substitute for the real paragraph—plunged madly into impossible sentences—found himself saying all sorts of things which he did not intend, and so came to an untimely end in spite of himself."

Ida has in the mean time written a quiet, sensible letter, which, after more discussion, and an attempt on the part of Aunt Melissa to substitute an absurd effusion from her own pen, is allowed to be sent, Uncle John's notable epistle being forthwith consigned to the flames. No opposition being therefore attempted, Mr. Alexander Lee establishes the validity of his flaw, and comfortably pockets the fortune.

We must now recur to Godfrey, who, be it remembered, was, when last heard of, suffering great anguish of spirit from a mistaken idea that Ida, shocked at his confession that, in a moment of boyish passion, he had struck Frederick the unhappy blow which had occasioned his loss of sight, must always regard him with feelings of horror and aversion. Urged by this tormenting belief, he determines to emigrate, and seek refuge from his thoughts in active employment. At this juncture, fortunately encountering Tyrrell, the new-made Governor of A—, that gentleman offers him the post of private secretary, which he gladly accepts, and leaves England with Madeline and her husband, happily ignorant of Uncle Alexander's machinations, and Ida's consequent loss of fortune. Frederick, meanwhile, who, in spite of his blindness, has become a skilful musician, has obtained the appointment of organist at C—, a missionary training college. Accordingly, he, his mother and Ida, take up their abode at Seringa Cottage, a cheap domicile situated close to the scene of Frederick's labours. Here in a short time they become practically aware of the discomforts of, what we cannot but consider, a very unnecessarily severe attack of poverty. Ida, "bringing every faculty of her young intelligence to bear upon this new mystery in the practical complexity of life," sets to work to economise with all her might and main, and retrenchment is the order of the day. Bills are immediately called in, expenses curtailed, and the second female servant receives notice to quit. This "sweeping reform," is, however, deemed insufficient, and reading aloud of an evening is henceforth accomplished by the aid of a pathetic "single rushlight," but even the adoption of this ascetic luminary fails to make both ends meet, and the reader is trembling lest Ida, in her emulation of Joseph Hume, should reduce the family to a "Child's Night Light," when a new idea enters the head of our enterprising heroine, and secreting herself with unlimited black satin, she determines to realize capital by embroidering waistcoat pieces. The scheme answers beyond her most sanguine expectations; generalizing on the original idea, she drills a fatigue party of national-school girls in the exercise of embroidery, and lo! the enemy is dislodged, the demon of poverty flies before the needle points of Ida and her workwomen.

This part of the book is not, we confess, to our taste. We recognise from the first a spirituality about the character of Ida; she seems raised so completely above humanity, such as we usually find it, by her unerring instinct of simple, child-like faith, that a degree of reverence mingles largely with our feelings towards her. When in brighter days her lover becomes aware of this industrial episode, "the idea of Ida working for her bread was as intolerable to him as though he had been an unripe sentimentalist of eighteen." Now although we bear even less similitude to the "simple juvenile" alluded to thus slightly, than did Godfrey Lee, we quite agree with him on this point, and consider Ida taking thought for a rushlight, an association of ideas little short of sacrilege.

Leaving the party at Seringa cottage "on household cares intent," let us take a hop, skip and jump, and clearing "seven long years" at a leap, imagine ourselves on the deck of a homeward-bound vessel from A——. But the authoress shall speak for herself.

"Little did Mrs. Aytoun think, when she said to herself, with that heavy, inward, noiseless sigh which belongs not to hope deferred, but to the absence of all hope, 'It is seven years to-day since Godfrey left us,'—little did she think that he was at that moment on the sea, and that the vessel in which he sailed was—homeward bound! His fellow-passengers thought him the dullest and most immovable of men; and one vivacious lady could not refrain from scolding him heartily, when he alone, of all the group assembled on deck, uttered no exclamation, gave no sign, when the captain pointed to a low film just showing above the far edge of the sea, in the twilight of a summer's morning, and said, 'That is England!' She said, she thought he had no human feeling at all; he had been quite silent and patient during that long weary calm, where they made no way, and it seemed as though winds and waters had ceased from their natural office to spite them, and that they were to wear out the rest of their lives eating away their very hearts for vexation, idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean; he had been quiet, silent, and patient when the wind sprang up, and all the hearts were springing with it, and the little world within the vessel was as full of gratulatory and exultant voices as a wood in spring; he was quiet, silent, and patient NOW. Did he not know that yonder cloud was England? Was he not glad? 'Very,' he replied, with an odd, shy, doubtful smile, and turned aside from his vociferous companions, keeping his very eyelids close, because of the burning light that was beneath them. His soul was charged well-nigh beyond its strength, and silence seemed to be literally his only hold upon sanity. Had he released it only for one moment, instead of joining in the mirthful ejaculations of the rest, he would have leaped and shouted like a maniac. As it was, he dared not look upon that growing shore for more than an instant at a time, but shut his eyes in a sort of terror at it, and at himself. For seven years one thought had been the strength and light of his inner life, and that thought was now about to become a fact, or—a memory! No wonder that, as he neared that dim visionary shore, it seemed to be towering up into mountains ready to fall upon him and crush him! No wonder that, as he prepared to take leave of Illo for ever, and knew not for what she should be exchanged, he was momentarily tempted to wish himself back in the anxious Past, labouring, inseparably united with her, and trying to believe that he neither leaned upon her nor looked to her!

"During his voyage out he had ample time for searching his heart, and for forming his resolutions. He had not thrown away this privilege of discipline. When he set foot upon the soil of his new home, there stood before his eyes, in vivid and palpable distinctness, the shape into which the inexpressive block before him, the capable but indefinite Future which might be allotted to him, must be hewn and moulded; nor had eye, hand, or will once faltered in their task. The wrongs of which he felt himself to be guilty were all against his mother and Frederick, and every energy of his life was to be devoted to the labour of reparation; if, perhaps, he might at length be suffered to bring back into their home the sunshine which he had helped to banish from it. This was the work which he had to do. He sternly forbade himself to think of winning Ida, except in so far as such a thought was implied in the unceasing endeavour to render himself worthy of her. The disappointment which had planted in his heart so bitter a root of anguish, he looked upon now as a necessary step in the discipline of his purification. How could he ever dream of stretching forth his hand to grasp a happiness for which he was so utterly unfit? Consistently with this view, he never relaxed the rule of silence which he had imposed on himself and his family with regard to Ida. We will not examine whether he would have been able to maintain this strictness, had he not obtained frequent intelligence of her, without inquiry, through Madeline. Thus he knew that she was well, that she was unmarried, that she lived with his mother and Frederick, and that she was the joy of their hearts, the brightness of their daily life, the very angel of their fireside. In the perpetual presence of this thought he worked on, but never suffered himself to forget all that lay between himself and her, and turning away his eyes from the one shining possibility of his future, fixed them steadfastly upon those for whom he was bound to labour, and for whom he did labour with his whole heart.

"But it is necessary to explain the nature of this labour a little more definitely. There was a professorship in the college at C——, established for the instruction of the students in some, at least, of those languages a knowledge of which would be necessary to the support of their missionary toils in foreign lands. Three languages were the minimum qualification required of the professor ere entering upon the duties of his office; but a formidable catalogue of tongues and dialects, on which he was expected to deliver lectures in the course of those duties, was appended. It was in contemplation to subdivide these requisites, so soon as the funds of the establishment should allow it, and to provide a complete staff of instructors in this most important department. Godfrey determined to await this period, diligently qualifying himself in the meantime to come forward as a candidate whenever the opportunity should arrive; or failing that, to attempt the more daring enterprise of succeeding the present professor, whose occupation of his post was understood to be temporary. He was an old man, and had been himself a missionary; he had accepted so arduous an office out of zeal for the interests of the infant college, well knowing how difficult it would be to procure a duly qualified substitute. Godfrey was resolved that on his part the qualifications, at least, should not be wanting. The tedious voyage out was to him a time of strenuous, uninterrupted activity, and he arrived at his destination, able immediately to pass a preliminary examination in the language of the people amongst whom he had come to reside. As soon as this was satisfactorily over, he went to the bishop, explained his views, his hopes, his intentions, and asked for advice and assistance. When was not the head of a listener to another man's hopes shaken? He spoke words of soberness and truth, of doubt and discouragement; but in the course of the interview he saw enough to convince him that he was dealing with no common character, and, in the end, while anxiously counselling Godfrey not to be too sanguine, he promised hearty co-operation with his efforts. The vigour and enthusiasm of those efforts never flagged; every leisure hour, of which the light duties of secretary to the governor of—afforded plenty, was engrossed by study; every opportunity was eagerly seized; and it is a trite observation that opportunities are sure to abound if eyes are opened to them.

"Madeline's cordial sympathy was given from the first; not so Tyrrell's; he was, as we have already said, a man of deeds; he had very little faith in enthusiasm, and he stood aloof and sneered politely. At the end of two years, however, he gave in. He sent for Godfrey, and offered him eighteen months' leave, to be passed either in a visit to England, or in a journey to certain places which he named, (we are purposely obscure in our geography,) for the sake of acquiring a more accurate knowledge of certain languages and dialects. The young secretary's face was in a glow directly, and his thanks were vehement and eloquent.

"You go home, then?" said Tyrrell, in a tone rather of assertion than of inquiry.

"There was a sudden melancholy flash in Godfrey's eyes, and there was unspeakable pathos in the quiet deep voice with which he answered, 'Oh, no, I must not think of it. I am not nearly ready yet.'

"From that moment Tyrrell was his fast friend, and made full atonement for past distrust by the zeal of his present sympathy and the earnestness of his assistance; and so, in hard and solitary labour, warmed by the good wishes of these few friends, the time wore away. At length, sooner than he had dared to hope—for he kept vigilant guard upon the buoyancy of his own nature—the trial arrived. The bishop, who corresponded with the warden of C—college, and without absolutely committing Godfrey, had intimated that he desired the earliest possible information of any new arrangements relative to the professorship of languages, announced that the long-expected change was about to take place. Two new professorships were to be substituted for the old one, which would be vacated in the course of the next six months; and the warden wrote that if the gentleman on whose behalf the bishop was interested had any serious intention of offering himself as a candidate for either of these posts, he must repair to England forthwith, duly armed with testimonials, which would be examined by certain commissioners, appointed by the trustees of the college. These judges were likewise empowered to make personal inquiry into the qualifications of the candidates. The warden had considerably given his friend the longest notice that was possible under the circumstances, and though he could not exactly give the day on which the examinations were to take place, he named the limit within which it had been determined that all the arrangements must be completed. Godfrey found that he must start directly; he was not likely to lose time about it. His heart swelled as he kneeled to receive the blessing of the good bishop, and it was with deep, almost dejected humility that he answered his fatherly words of counsel and sympathy at parting. 'Pray for me,' said he, 'that I may be strengthened to bear disappointment!'

"Tears gathered in his eyes as he took leave of the kind group that accompanied him to the shore; Tyrrell, Madeline, Arthur, grown a tall, slight, downcast youth of thirteen, and two little fairy girls, Godfrey's pets and playmates, who made many piteous appeals to him, 'not to go away to England, and never come back again.'

"'Tell Ida, that I am very happy!' murmured Madeline, as, deeply blushing, she returned the strong pressure of his hand. Her husband caught the whispered words, and the light that came to his eyes as he drew her arm through his, and looked down into her face, told eloquently the source of her happiness. It had come at last. After many doubts, misgivings, and struggles, after some faults and some weakness, and much quiet suppressed trouble of spirit, they had won their way through the cloud, and come out into the sunshine at last. After the birth of that youngest little prattler, Madeline's life had been in danger, and she had then been taught, too clearly for mistake, too deeply for forgetfulness, how very precious she had grown to her husband. Her sensitive, passionate nature was at rest for ever."

It would be a hard-hearted novelist, indeed, who could disappoint this excellent young man, and accordingly we find him, some two pages further on, the successful candidate. Brim-full of happiness he posts down to Seringa Cottage, and encounters Uncle John at the railroad station seeking a lost box of Aunt Melissa's. Uncle John, little changed by years, bodily or mentally, accompanies him, undertaking to break his sudden arrival to his mother. Our concluding extract will show how he accomplishes his mission:—

"Don't speak to me, but take me as quickly as you can," strode away at a pace which Uncle John would sooner have died than check, and did very nearly die in struggling to equal. It was lucky that the distance was but short, for when Godfrey released his flushed and panting companion on the doorsteps of Seringa Cottage, he noticed not his exhaustion, and was quite unconscious of his own rapidity of movement. "Tell them very gently! Be very careful!" said he; and pulling his hat over his brows, he followed Uncle John into the passage, and stood con-ceased by the half-open door of the sitting-room, with heart beating so tumultuously that for a moment he was as one blind, and literally could not see the very objects upon which his eyes darted as eagerly and hungrily as a falcon on the swoop. But the mist cleared away, and he saw. His mother sat by the window, her embroidery in her hand. There were more lines in her placid, delicate face than when he last saw it, there was more silver in the smooth bands that were drawn back beneath the close frilled cap, the dress seemed altogether more decidedly that of an old lady, but the quiet figure was as graceful, the gentle face as lovely as ever. Frederick was opposite to her; Godfrey could only see his profile. Not a change had passed over his serene and beautiful countenance; the glory which it had first put on in childhood still rested upon it. Ida was not in the room, and Godfrey did not see Melissa till she spoke.

"So you are come back at last!" said she, sharply; "and pray what news of my box?"

Till that moment Uncle John had entirely forgotten the existence of the box, and he was now so much startled, and felt such an intense anxiety to clear it effectually out of the way, that he answered on the impulse of the moment that it had come all right, and would arrive in five minutes; then giving Melissa three vehement and rapid winks, clearing his throat, and ostentatiously suppressing a smile, he walked up to Ellinor.

"I say, Ellen, when did you hear from Godfrey?" was his cautious beginning.

"My dear John," replied his surprised sister, "we were talking of his letter at breakfast to-day. Don't you remember?"

"Yes, to be sure I do," replied Uncle John; "that was the reason why I asked you. I want to know what he said about coming home."

"Coming home!" repeated the mother, the ready drops gathering in her eyes. "Oh, we must not think of that for a long time. God knows what is best! I can scarcely hope to live till that happy day."

"How do you know that?" rejoined her brother. "It may be nearer than you think."

Ellinor shook her head, and stooped over her work. "I say," reiterated Uncle John, "we never know what's going to happen to us, do we? No, you know that we don't! Well, then, isn't it very presumptuous, just because you know Godfrey's at the other side of the world, that you should take it for granted that he can't be here? Eh, Ellinor?"

"What do you mean?" inquired Ellinor, suddenly raising her eyes to his face, and so much startled by the expression which she there encountered, that she involuntarily dropped her work, and clasped her hands together.

"My dearest mother," interposed Frederick, "I am quite sure, from my uncle's voice, that he knows something about Godfrey. Pray don't be more agitated than you can help. It must be good news."

"Yes, and it is good news, master Frederick!" added the exulting Uncle John.

Mrs. Aytoun rose slowly, with an air of utter bewilderment. Her eyes were still fixed upon her brother's face. "Where is he?" exclaimed she, tottering rather than walking towards the door, and pausing as she reached it, for she was caught in the closest and fondest of embraces, and so rather carried than supported back again to her seat. It was a joyful confusion; sobs, kisses, broken words, and hands that clasped each other as though they believed that to relax for a moment would incur the doom of a new separation. And then Godfrey sat on the sofa, between his mother and Frederick, an arm round each, and made them understand that he was come home in earnest, and that he had earned the right of remaining: and Ellinor's eyes clung to his face with an unquiet happiness, as though seeing were any thing but believing; and Frederick drew closer and closer to his side, and reproached himself for unthankfulness as the burning wish passed across his heart that he might once, only once, look upon that beloved face! Uncle John stood apart, rubbing his hands, and detailing all that he knew, and all that he didn't know, to Melissa: interspersed with a hundred self-congratulations on having "broken it" so well to his sister, seeming almost to think that the meeting was his work, and he had reason to be proud of it.

"They soon remembered Ida. A hint from Frederick, who seemed to guess her feelings by intuition, caused Mrs. Aytoun to go in search of her, and gently tell her the great joy which had come upon them all. Ida's hands were cold and trembling when she placed them in Godfrey's, and she could scarcely command her voice to bid him welcome in unsteady accents. He was satisfied, however; who shall fathom the depths of that perfect satisfaction which seemed to fill his heart and saturate his whole nature, as the excitement passed away, and the questions ceased, and the narrative was over, and they sat together gazing upon each other in most eloquent silence, as though they were saying to Life, 'This is enough! Give us no more, but give us nothing else!'

"It was an hour after Ida entered the room, ere Godfrey actually raised his eyes to her face, and then he only looked from under the shadow of his hands. How much longer was it ere he ventured to tell her all which that first look had taught him?"

* * * * *

No Œdipus is required to answer this question, nor are any of the after incidents of the Story of a Family particularly calculated to astonish the prescient minds of the novel-reading public. Ida and Godfrey are happily married, and by the time two of the little "natural consequences" have opened their blue eyes upon this naughty world, a lawyer dies, which does not particularly distress anybody, leaving behind him a paper which ought to delight everybody, for it knocks on the head uncle Alexander's quibble, and restores a large share of the property to Ida, clearing the aspersed memory of Percy Lee. Of course, she and Godfrey do all that is liberal by the dispossessed Alexanders, and then, as the summit of human felicity, indulge themselves by converting Evelyn Manor into a training-school to prepare young boys for admission into the Missionary College, wherein the brothers Lee are organist and professor. Thus finally ends the Story of a Family.

And now let us briefly state our opinion of the tale. As a work of art it has many faults: amongst which, perhaps, an apparent want of forethought, inducing a confusion of arrangement in the various situations and incidents, stands most prominently forward. The writer is herself aware of this defect, and accounts for it by stating in her preface that the story was composed à plusieurs reprises. To this fact may also be attributed a certain clumsiness in the machinery by which the necessary situations of the tale are evolved; as for example, when by the requirements of the plot Percy Lee's absence becomes necessary, the improbable nature of the business which takes him abroad. Another defect, which a longer experience of that most contradictory of paradoxes, human nature, will enable the writer to avoid, is a too great consistency in some of the subordinate characters, making them embodiments of an idea rather than living men and women; the Alexanders, father and son, are too consistently bad, Aunt Melissa too unflinching in her selfish sentimentality, Uncle John too constantly ridiculous. But one possessing the head to conceive, and the hand to execute, such life-pictures as Madeline and Ida, such sketches as Percy Lee, Frederick, Godfrey, Tyrrell, may well afford to pardon the friendly critic, who shall point out, where the pencil which has traced these forms of spiritual loveliness may have failed to portray correctly, the grotesque animation of an outline caricature; and remembering these remarks only in so far as they may aid her to avoid such blemishes for the future, let her thank God, who has entrusted to her the noble gift, the power to imagine and depict these shapes of beauty, the lowly and meek, yet only true great ones of the earth. By detailing their trials and struggles in achieving the real end of life, self-renunciation, may she continue to warn the careless-hearted, and to cheer those who faint by the way; and so doing her Master's work zealously, may she reap the exceeding great reward of those, who "shall convert the sinner from his sin, and save souls alive." In these days no light responsibility rests upon the shoulders of the tale-writer; thousands read his thoughts, thousands rise from the perusal the better or the worse for that which he has written. The greater the amount of talent, the greater the responsibility. It would be well if all sustained it as efficiently as the authoress of the "Story of a Family."

POEMS LEGENDARY AND HISTORICAL.¹

THIS is a volume, principally in the same style to which Macaulay has given such celebrity; and if the poems it contains do not altogether rise to the compact vigour and energy of that powerful writer, they are not without very considerable merit, and will be perused with interest and pleasure. Perhaps the most pleasing are upon the fertile subject of the Fall of Granada; but as these are too long for extraction, we select the following. There is a mournful melody in the first, that admirably suits with its theme.

(1) "Poems, Legendary and Historical. By Edward A. Freeman, M. A. late Fellow; and the Rev. George W. Cox, S. C. L., Scholar of Trinity College, Oxford."

THE TOMB OF DON RODERICK.

AFTER the battle of Xeres, the same legends sprang up respecting the fate of Roderick, as in our own land were given forth about Harold after the fight at Hastings. Towards the end of the ninth century, in the city of Visco in Lusitania, (wrested by Don Alphonso the Great, King of Leon, from the Moslem,) there was found in a field outside the walls a small chapel, and near it, a tomb bearing the following inscription,

"Hic Requiescit Rodericus Ultimus Rex Gothorum."

—See Legends of the Conquest of Spain, p. 156.

ON Xeres, when the shadows closed
O'er weltering heaps of countless slain,
Full many a valiant knight reposed
From wearying strife and pain.

And foe with foe, that woeful night,
Still lock'd in deadliest hatred slept;
While o'er that scene of ruthless fight
The night breeze sorrowing swept.

But whether in that fierce affray
Mid meaner foes Rodrigo fell,
Or lived to see a later day,
No mortal tongue may tell.

All wildly gasping and dismay'd
His war-horse scourd the cumber'd plain,
And through the gathering mist and shade
Its rider sought in vain.

And long (so hope deceives) they deem'd
That Roderick had not perish'd then;
And at the destined hour they dream'd
He yet would come again,—

To wreak a vengeance passing thought
On traitor heart and recreant hand,
For every woe their sin hath brought Upon that hapless land.

Ev'n thus they deem'd he dwelt afar,
Abiding still the destined hour
To lead the Christian hosts to war
With more than mortal power.

Long ages past, it so befel,
Scarce raised above the holy ground
Where stood a hermit's lowly cell,
A humble grave they found.

'Twas said that mossy mouldering stone
Show'd forth the place of Roderick's sleep,
Where o'er that spot so still and lone
The wild flowers loved to creep.

Where'er he lie, he resteth well
From onset fierce and fiery fray—
Whether in battle-strife he fell,
Or pass'd in peace away.—G. W. C.

KING HAROLD'S FUNERAL.

DEW WILLIAM feasted in his tent,
His captains all around;
And sounds of gladsome melody
Through all his camp resound:
A thousand fires are flashing high
O'er Senlac's battle-plain,
And England heard the victor shout
That told her hero slain.

Oh sad the sight that bloody night
Beneath her bosom vell'd,
When as the Saxon battle-axe
Before the stranger fall'd:

And on the plain were bleeding
The noblest of our land,
And stark in death King Harold lay,
Amid that ghastly band.

Then came two priests across the plain
To William's royal tent,
And as they pass'd the threshold,
Their knee they humbly bent;
The knights and nobles of his train
Look'd stern with wrathful eyes,
But fear'd to harm that hallow'd garb,
And William bade them rise.

"Stand up," said he, "ye men of God,
I do not war with you;
Ne'er 'gainst the ministers of peace
True knight his falchion drew:
But tell us wherefore are ye come
Among our warrior train,
For whatso'er may be your prayer,
Ye shall not ask in vain."

Then rose the brothers from their knees,
And deep each bosom sigh'd,
To see amid their own dear land
The foeman's conquering pride:
Then out spake Ailric to the Duke,
"We come from Waltham tower,
To crave the body of the chief
Who fell in yonder stour."

"For know it was King Harold
Who built Waltham's minster fair,
And bade us, whenso'er he died,
To lay his body there;
Wherefore our founder's corpse we crave,
In his own church to lay,
That we may for his soul and thine
Our daily masses say."

Duke William's brow was bent in thought;
Then, like a noble foe,
He bade them, when the day should dawn,
Through Senlac's field to go,
And seek for noble Harold,
And bear him to the grave,
With all the rites that fit a king
And knight in battle brave.

All night upon that bloody plain
Those brethren knelt in prayer;
And oft they heard the dying groan
Of men who perish'd there;
And oft times burst upon their ear
The Norman's victor cry;
And watch-fires show'd the hallow'd flag
In triumph waving high.

As soon as night had pass'd away,
They traversed all the plain,
To seek for Harold's bloody corpse
Amid the heaps of slain:
They saw brave knights and men-at-arms
Lie cold upon the ground,
Where'er the Northern battle-axe
Had dealt its ghastly wound.

They saw stout thanes, whose dying hands
Still grasp'd its mighty haft,
Each with his manly bosom pierced
With many a deadly shaft;
None lay as slain in coward flight,
For all were valiant there,
And fix'd eyes on their foemen seem'd
To cast a haughty stare.

But where was Britain's mightiest lord
Those princely thanes among?
Where was the stoutest arm that e'er
The axe of Wessex swung?

So gash'd was every face with wounds,
The brothers could not tell
The monarch's form among the chiefs
Who round about him fell.

Then sought they for fair Editha
King Harold's corpse to find,
Fair Edith of the Swan's Neck,
That dame of loving mind.
They found the lady in her bower
All mournful and alone,
To think of captive England's tears,
And Harold's dying groan.

She came, all veil'd her lovely form
In mourner's sable guise,
All streaming were her golden locks,
And dimm'd her bright blue eyes;
Yet came she forth without a tear,—
They would no longer flow;
And speechless were her quivering lips,
So bitter was her woe.

She gazed around upon the dead,
And quickly spied the crest
Deck'd with a ribbon she had torn
From off her own fair breast;
She knew the belt her hands had wrought,
She knew his pennon'd spear,
And though all gash'd was every limb,
She knew his face so dear.

One kiss upon his death-cold lips
The lovely Edith press'd,
Then o'er his bloody limbs she threw
Her own sad mourning vest;
And bade them bear the corpse away
To Waltham's minster fair,
And grace the monarch's funeral
With mass and dirge and prayer.

They laid him in a royal tomb,
And oft the mass did say,
And oft the lady Editha
Came there to weep and pray:
And stretch'd upon her dying bed,
It was her latest prayer,
With Harold, her own king and love,
Her tomb and dirge to share.

THE AUTHOR.

G. S. NEWTON, R.A.

THIS is one of the most admirable pieces de caractère ever painted. The courtier on his way to the levee, or perhaps to a still more interesting assignation, is seized upon by an importunate author, who insists upon inflicting upon him his last new poem. Fearful of losing his meeting, and too well-bred to break off abruptly from his tormentor, he stands the picture of hesitation and despair—holding out his watch as a hint to the importunate scribe, who is, however, far too deeply absorbed in his own performance to notice it.

IGNORANCE.

"The truest characters of ignorance
Are vanity, and pride, and arrogance,
As blind men use to bear their noses higher Than those that have their eyes and sight entire."

CAROLINE'S FIRST VISIT TO THE OPERA.

BY JANE M. WINNARD.

"Eftsoons they heard a most melodious sound
Of all that might delight a dainty ear,
Such as, at once, might not on living ground,
Save in this paradise, be heard elsewhere."

"And beauty born of murmuring sound Shall pass into her face."

WORDSWORTH.

FIFTEEN springs have shed their blossoms on the head of my young friend Caroline Stanley,—but, as yet, she is not the embodiment of a Poet's idea of youthful beauty, or of Love's young dream. She is just a simple school-girl, to look at. I cannot conscientiously say that she is pretty, unless, indeed, with the prettiness of promise, or the promise of prettiness. She is tall and thin—slender is not the word, it is too poetical, and gives the idea of elegance, which Caroline is quite without, being as awkward as girls of her age and make usually are. How can they be otherwise? Grace implies a complete mastery over, and skill in using one's limbs. Caroline's limbs are growing and altering from week to week; she has no time to get accustomed to their peculiarities;—"tout y est passager pour le moment." But in two or three years more that troublesome process of growing will be well-nigh finished, and then, I am almost certain she will begin to be graceful; not because her body is perfectly symmetrical, for that is not the case; but because her mind is active, poetical and artistic. Is it not true that what is meant by the word graceful, as applied to a human being, i.e. a certain flowing ease, freedom and roundness in the movements of the body, does not come from the body itself, but from the mind? Women, and men too, with well-proportioned bodies—admirably constructed as far as the mere modification of matter, the putting together of the machine is concerned—are often anything but graceful. There is no spirituality in their movements; they seem mechanical, not the effect of an intelligent volition. Others there are, unsymmetrical in body, lame even, with spinal curvature, with legs and arms too long or too short, who are, still, graceful, whose every motion gives you the idea of spiritual refinement and vitality, whose every attitude it is a pleasure to look upon, because you see the beautiful mind in it. In these last cases, I always found it was as difficult to keep the bodily defects in my memory, as in the other cases it was difficult to believe in the correct bodily proportions. Now, my young friend, Caroline Stanley, is by no means ill-made; and she has decidedly an active intellectual and imaginative mind; therefore, I am tolerably certain she will be a graceful woman. Her feet are somewhat too large for her present size; her arms are mere sticks, (they will plump up nicely, in a year or two;) her hands are well-shaped, and rather red; but then she can console herself with the saying of the very young beauty, recorded by De Grammont, who being sneered at for a similar defect, by a more mature and lily-handed lady, replied with as much malice as naïveté, that "lo temps ne lui était pas arrivé pour les avoir blanchis." That is, Caroline might console herself with that reflection, if she stood in need of consolation on the subject, which she does not, being perfectly regardless, at present, of the colour of her hands, or of the prettiness or plainness of her person. She is as unconscious of, as she would be indifferent to, the fact, that she has a great chance of becoming a beauty. Her face is full of feeling and intelligence, she has sweet, dark eyes, a noble, generous mouth, a finely-shaped head, and a profusion of dark brown hair; she only wants the roundness and the bloom which three more summers will give her to be lovely.

I am thus minute in my account of this young girl, because I wish my reader to picture her to himself as I first saw her, about a month ago. So fresh, so pure, so eager, so loving and loveable a human bud is worth sketching in pen and ink, in default of a limner's skill to paint it with colours and a pencil.

Caroline is one of the younger daughters of an old friend of my husband's. Mr. Stanley is a country gentleman who is not so rich as his neighbours. He has great natural taste for music, has studied the art all his life, and has endeavoured to bring it to bear upon the improvement of society in his native place, with some good effect. All his children are more or less musical; but Caroline is the only one who showed considerable talent and taste for the art in early childhood; and upon her Mr. Stanley fixed his hopes of thorough sympathy and community of employment. At twelve years old the girl was placed under the charge of a cultivated woman, (a friend of her mother's,) who kept a select school near London. I believe the chief object in sending her there, was that she might be taught music by Herr—. Caroline reached her fiftieth birthday in a certain month of May, while her father was in London upon business, for a fortnight. He staid at my house during that time, and I was astonished at the amount of music he contrived to hear during the intervals of business. The London concerts, oratorios, and operas were a grand feast to him.

One morning, he said to me, "My dear Mrs.—, I am going to ask a favour of you,—my daughter Caroline is at school in Kensington."

"Yes, you would like her to come and stay here while you are in town?" I said. "Shall we go and fetch her to-morrow?"

He smiled, "You are the most quick-witted and impulsive of old ladies. You have guessed my wish exactly. But I dare not execute it. Her mother and her governess are judicious, sensible people; they would not hear of such a thing as a week's interruption of her studies. Just near the holidays, too. No, I have been given to understand that, very emphatically; and I dare not disobey orders. But, though I could not venture to take her away from school for a week's dissipation with me, yet, with your cooperation, I will give her a treat which she will remember as long as she lives, and which will only take her away from the temple of Minerva for one night."

"What are you going to do with her?" I asked.

"To-morrow is her birth-day. That will afford me an excuse for making the request of good Mrs. Irons. I want to take her to the opera; she has never seen one."

"Delightful!" I exclaimed.

"You must go, too," said Mr. Stanley.

"Of course I will," I replied. "It is a long time since I went; but now there is something to go for. To see a young girl, who loves music, go, on her fifteenth birth-day, to see her first opera, I would get up out of a sick-bed. Get the Governess's consent, by all means, and bring Caroline here as early as you can to-morrow. I shall be dreadfully disappointed, I assure you, if she does not come. It will be a great pleasure to us all, you know."

"I will bring her an hour or two before dinner, to-morrow," said the pleased father, and he bade me "Good bye, for the present."

The next day I was much occupied in writing letters to my sons in India, and in receiving visits from some old friends, and had scarcely time to think about Caroline Stanley and my evening's engagement. Between four and five o'clock, just as my last visitor departed, the drawing-room door opened, and Mr. Stanley walked in with a music-book tucked up under one arm, and a young girl in a straw bonnet and a black silk scarf on the other. I rose and took the young girl by the hand. She blushed and smiled and glanced at her papa. She looked very, very happy, and a very little afraid.

"This is Caroline, I suppose?"

"Yes.—I got her away with some difficulty, though. She was hard to manage, was she not, Carry?"

"That was because you tried to manage her, papa," said Caroline. "Mrs. Irons is not to be managed at all. It is the best to tell her out at once, what you want, and then she will do it, or not."

I was pleased with the girl's look and tone. "You like Mrs. Irons?" I asked.

"Oh yes!" she replied; "we all like her."

We sat down; and Caroline spoke no more, unless she were spoken to. After inspecting the room rapidly, she seemed to have taken in its contents, and then she watched her father with an affectionate expression of countenance, till he asked her whether she would not like to look over the music of the opera.

"Oh yes! papa. Have you got it?"

"Yes, my dear. It is this great book, which you wondered I should carry through the streets. If I had not done so, my little Carry would have had no chance of looking over the opera. I know that Mrs. — has no copy of 'Figaro.'"

"Is it 'Figaro' we are to see to-night?" I asked as soon as I saw Caroline lost in a perusal of the music. "I do not think that is the best opera for a young girl to see first."

"Nor do I," said her father; "but I had only Hobson's choice—that or none. I do not think Caroline will see the defects that you and I see in the subject. She will only hear and feel the exquisite music which transcends it, and makes the plot forgotten."

"But it is that exquisite music which I should dread for her," I rejoined in a whisper. "With those deep, loving eyes, 'flowed with naphtha, fiery sweet,'—with that sensitive mouth,—I should fear the effect of Mozart's love-music upon her—at least such tender, thrilling, passionate strains as are scattered so profusely through this opera. Anti-poetical, frivolous, and disagreeable as the subject of Le Nozze di Figaro is, some of the music might have been written by Apollo, to celebrate the loves of Cupid and Psyche. No woman who has the faculty of appreciating good music, could hear it unmoved."

"But, my dear Mrs. —, little Carry is not a woman. She is a mere child. She will not see half that you see in the opera. I want her to hear the orchestral portions well performed: they will be capitally done to-night;—and I want to give her an idea of what good, classical singing is, and that she will get from—and—and—to-night. You don't expect she will fall in love with Figaro, or the Count, or Cherubino, do you? I do not think she is very inflammable. I believe she had a valentine this year, which she handed over to her Governess as a specimen of silly sentiment and incorrect orthography. Besides, she knows half the music of Figaro by heart. She never saw the libretto, and understands so little of Italian, that if she looks at it to-night, she will understand nothing of the story. She has imagination enough—musical imagination enough, to want no story—or to make one suited to her own being. The music, as I said before, she knows by heart."

"Not by heart," I said smiling—"By rote, perhaps.—Perhaps she may learn it by heart to-night."

"I'll risk it. There's not much sentiment in that little head," he said, pointing to his daughter, as with her bonnet tossed off, and hair very rough, she sat poring over the music-book in her lap;—beating time with one hand, and frowning and screwing up her mouth, with her whole soul bent on the composition.

"Perhaps you are right," I replied; "we often fear for the young when there is no danger for them; and we are careless and neglectful when the real peril is at hand. It is often best to trust them to what we so profaely call Chance, since, in the search for good, they must inevitably encounter some evil."

When Caroline appeared, ready dressed for the evening, I was able to make the observations upon her person with which I have already favoured the reader. Her white muslin frock and pink sash were all the adornments she required, except the unwonted colour in the cheek and brightness in the eye, which the anticipation of the coming pleasure gave. I looked at her with all the interest with which an old woman who has daughters of her own, and has lost some, looks on a young girl who is upon the eve of womanhood. She sat still, and smiled to herself as if she were nursing a pleasant thought in her heart. She was not exuberant in her joy, as most young girls are, on a similar occasion. This was because the joy, in her case, was of a very deep kind. Music was a passion with her; and she was not going that night to the opera with the idea of seeing a place of fashionable amusement, but of hearing a master-piece of musical composition worthily performed. As she said to me, she "had been trying for hours to understand it all, and found that she could not—but had a presentiment that when she came to hear it all properly performed, she would know what it meant, much better."

Her father looked with fatherly pride upon his simple, pure-looking child. "Why, Carry! you do not seem half so pleased as I expected you would be! You take it all quietly enough."

"Oh! papa dear, you know I'm stupid and cannot say what I feel. I never can say how happy I am."

"Well! have you your cloak ready?—Hand Mrs. — her gloves; and now come along! for I would not miss the overture for the world," said Mr. Stanley.

"Miss the overture! Oh, papa! what a dreadful idea!—Pray make haste!" And she bounded down stairs without the bouquet which poor Henry Granville had rushed off to buy, before dinner was over, when he found that one of the friends I had invited him to meet was a young lady. In vain Mr. H. Granville ran after her, to perform his duty, and hand her into the carriage. She was already perched on the front seat when he got into the hall.

"You forgot your bouquet, my dear," said her father, handing it to her, significantly, as we drove along.

"So I did! They are very beautiful flowers. I am much obliged to you," and she looked at Mr. Granville. "I wish I had put them into water, though, and left them at home. It will be such a pity to see them fade."

"Not in your hands," said poor, astonished Henry Granville, trying to make a compliment.

"Why not? Besides,—you know, they can't be in my hands. I have got this to hold," (and the little unconscious bear held up the great music-book;) "you or papa must hold my flowers for me; will you?"

Here was a marvel! The elegant, much admired Harry Granville found a new thing under the sun!—a young lady who regarded him and his bouquet as scarcely worthy attention. He looked curiously at the little, untaught, unsophisticated thing. I smiled at them both, and hoped the gentleman might learn a profitable lesson.

It was a pleasant sight to see Caroline's eyes glancing, half eagerly, half timidly, on all sides, as we proceeded from the carriage to our box. The bustle and confusion in the lobbies, the groups of fashionably dressed men and women that we passed through in our rapid transit, caused her to cling to Mr. Granville's arm a little nervously; but by the time we were seated, she had recovered her equanimity. I expected that she would have burst into enthusiastic admiration at the first coup d'œil of the well-filled house,—or, perhaps, be stricken mute with astonishment at its splendour. Nothing of the sort.

That simple school-girl stood up in front of the box, surveyed the whole house attentively, for a minute or so, and then fixed her eyes on the orchestra. Her father stood up beside her.—

"Well, Carry! what do you think of it all?"

"It is very large and very handsome;—but, but,—I am a little disappointed. I had imagined something much more brilliant."

I looked at the young face, and saw in it the traces of an imagination which would often transcend in its creations the wonders of man's works. She would always be liable to disappointments of this kind. Would she be disappointed in the works of genius? I asked myself.—Would the opera itself disappoint her?

She sat down quietly and unobtrusively, half hidden behind the little curtain, to wait for the overture. The flush on her cheek, and a light in her eye, made her look quite pretty. Her father sat beside her, and held her hand; she smiled affectionately at him. The conductor entered and took his place in the orchestra amid loud applause.

"What is that?" asked Caroline. Her father explained; they opened their book, and looked over the music together. The conductor waved his magic wand, and the rapid overture began. During the three, or two, minutes and a half, (I forget which it is,) that the overture to Le Nozze di Figaro ought to occupy in the performance, Caroline's face seemed to grow gradually brighter and brighter, as if that quick, warm, sunny music were running in her veins. At its conclusion her little hands joined vigorously in the applause, and she half rose.

"Oh, papa! if they would only play it again! How glorious! That is better than I ever thought it could be."

"Sit down, my dear. Yes, I see—they are going to repeat it! This overture is a great favourite; it is generally encored."

During the second performance Caroline shut her eyes, and never once looked at the book. When it was ended, she drew a deep breath. "Oh, papa! how delightful!"

Up went the curtain; Susanna and Figaro were discovered; and from that moment till the end of the act, Caroline Stanley forgot everything but the music and her father. Happy father! He sat beside her, with his whole soul wrapped up in his child, and her intense, quiet enjoyment; fearing to disturb it by any remark, and yet anxious to explain a peculiarity, or to point out a beauty in the composition or the performance. As they sat hand in hand, and exchanged glances of sympathetic pleasure, I thought I had never seen a picture of purer or more ecstatic felicity; and certainly I had never before appreciated the power of music as a bond of union between one soul and another. The caste of the opera was very strong. I will not name the singers. Let each reader fancy the parts of Susanna and the Countess, Figaro and Cherubino, and the rest, filled up by his own favourite in each character. Caroline was enchanted, delighted beyond expression with the performers. I shall not follow her throughout the opera, although I can recollect nearly every change in that expressive young face; utterly unused as it was to serve as a mask to the feelings. I trembled for her at the commencement of "Non so piu." Surely that wonderfully truthful expression of the first intimations of love in the youthful breast would awaken strange feelings in that sensitive heart of hers. What passed within her I cannot tell; but her face was as a mirror in which one saw a clear reflex of all that Cherubino describes. It was the same during "Voi che sapete." Passionate tears were in her eyes. I glanced at her father—his attention was taken up by the singer. Caroline saw me look at her, and strove to conceal her emotion. She laughed sweetly during "Non più andrai," and sighed with the Countess during the "Dove sono," and "Porgi amor." I shall never forget the expression of her face during the whole of the "Deh! vieni!" It was extraordinary in one so young. She seemed to feel the music thoroughly, and yet one would say it expressed feelings which it was impossible for her to enter into. What could a mere child know of the deep tenderness, the passionate yearnings of that matchless song? In the "Crudel perchè," too, she seemed to sympathise first with the Count, and then with Susanna's arch trickery.

To say the truth, I was extremely puzzled by Caroline's whole behaviour. That she knew nothing by experience of the sweet and bitter, the fire and ice, the innumerable contrarities contained in the words passionate love, I was certain; yet she seemed to comprehend that love-music—not to recognise its merits as a scientific composition merely, but to feel it, in her soul. She asked no questions; she never looked bewildered, or as if she had any difficulty in comprehending what was going on. As to being tired—ask a lover whether the conversation of his beloved one tires him? I remember Mr. H. Granville, who had, of course, heard the opera a dozen times before, and could not comprehend how any one could like to sit silent during the whole performance, endeavoured to amuse her by some witticism concerning the singers, in the midst of the duet "Sull' aria." Caroline behaved in a very natural, but very unpolite way. Without looking at the amiable young man, she held up an admonitory fore-finger, and frowning desperately, said in a quick, decided tone, "Don't talk just now, please!" yet there was something so inoffensive in her manner, that Harry Granville only drew back with a smile, and strove to listen to the music too.

The appearance of so young a girl, and her entire absorption in the music, attracted a good deal of attention to our box, but Caroline was quite unconscious of it, and continued to open her eyes wide, to shut them entirely, to frown with the intensity of her efforts to keep up with the orchestra, to wreath her sweet mouth with triumphant smiles, and to glance for sympathy at her father, without taking the slightest notice of anything or anybody else. Between the acts, however, she looked out over the house with great curiosity, and admired the beauty of several ladies very enthusiastically. The dresses, too, she acknowledged were very fine. "The whole scene was magnificent," she thought; but she added that "people would enjoy the music better, if they all came in a quiet way, plainly dressed, and sat almost in the dark; with no light anywhere but on the stage!"

"What a strange idea for a young lady!" exclaimed Mr. H. Granville. "Most young ladies come here on purpose to show themselves, and to see the rest of the beau monde."

"Then what a shame to waste good music upon them!" exclaimed the indignant little school-girl. "The idea of performing such music as this to a set of people whose minds are occupied with other things! I call it wicked!"

"You are apt to use strong language, my dear!" said her father laughing.

"But don't you agree with me, papa?"

"Not exactly, my dear. I do not think the ladies and gentlemen who come to the opera to laugh and talk, and stare at each other, positively wicked. I would not send them to prison for it, as I see you would, by your looks; but I think they have very bad taste, and are foolishly extravagant with their money. I think they might just as well assemble here occasionally, and enjoy themselves quite as much, without going to the expense of bringing together accomplished artistes from all parts of Europe. A few ballad-singers and rope-dancers would do as well."

"Poor Mozart! how ashamed we should be, papa, if he could appear suddenly in the midst of this great place, and see how little attention was paid to his beautiful music! And papa! what a sad thing for these people. How much enjoyment they lose! enjoyment that I am sure nothing else can give."

"Oh! they do enjoy it, Miss Stanley," interposed Harry Granville. "We don't listen to everything in an opera as carefully and rigidly as you do—especially one so familiar as 'Figaro;' but you observe everybody is silent when — is singing, or —"

"Yes, they listen to the singer, but they don't listen to the music. It is Mozart, and not Signor — or Madame —, that Caroline is fighting for," I said.

"What! exclaimed the young man, "is it possible that Miss Stanley does not admire Madame — and Signor —?"

"Oh, yes!" said Caroline, "I do admire them very much. I can see how gifted they are, how well trained; that they have fine voices, and fine taste, and great industry,—genius even. But you do not expect me to admire their performance as much as Mozart's composition? There is an immense difference, is there not, papa?"

Mr. Stanley smiled at her seriousness.

"I think so, my dear; but people in general do not understand music enough to make any such distinction; they are apt to confound the singer with the music."

"That is part of the thanks we pay to the gifted musical performer for making clearer and more beautiful in our minds the compositions of the great masters. We associate his performance with the thing performed, and we see that he too has genius," I said.

Caroline smiled.

"Ah, yes! As long as I live I shall never hear the music of 'Figaro' without recalling the performers of to-night. It is very different from hearing it gone through with a piano-forte and a single voice."

I did not wish to remain after the opera was concluded; and Caroline said she would not like to have her impression of the music spoiled, by seeing anything else. She would "rather go home and think it all over in bed." I never saw a girl at once so moderate and reasonable, and at the same time so susceptible of strong and passionate emotion.

To my surprise, Harry Granville, whose grand passion was the ballet, begged to return with us. It was clear to me that he was puzzled and piqued by the school-girl.

On our way home, he said,

"I hope you are not tired, Miss Stanley! You expended a vast amount of energy upon listening to that opera. You seemed to do it with your whole soul."

"Of course! Don't you do the thing you like best in the world, with your whole soul?—I can't bear to enjoy myself by halves."

"What an Epicurean notion!" exclaimed her father.

"Is it?—but is there anything wrong in enjoying oneself thoroughly, papa?"

"That depends upon the nature of the enjoyment."

"But, listening to the best music,—going every night to the opera, papa—surely there can be nothing wrong in that? It must be so improving. Don't you think we ought to go every night?"

"Certainly not, my dear. People in our position in society, with only a moderate income, cannot do so: we are moral, as well as intellectual, imaginative and sensitive beings; and our moral nature is the part of us that should be paramount. A sense of duty should be made strong within us, to rule over every impulse and inclination. You and I love music, dearly; but we have no right to injure others, and to injure our own moral nature, by gratifying our love for that or any art. It would be selfish in us to spend money in going every night to the opera, or in spending all our time in the study of music; the money and the time belong to the rest of our family. If we could forget that, we might become better musicians, but we should be inferior moral beings."

"And in time, I think, you would become inferior musicians," said I. "The various parts of our being are intimately connected; you cannot deteriorate morally, without producing a deterioration in your intellectual faculties, in time. Want of thorough truthfulness,—of justice,—of conscientiousness, affect the judgment and the taste, in purely intellectual things; and still more in art, which is not purely intellectual, but in great part emotional. Depend upon it, if you neglect any duty in the pursuit of art, you will become an inferior artist."

"Very true," said Mr. Stanley. "To be a great artist, it is first of all necessary to bring one's life into accordance with duty. We must have——'Conscience revered and obey'd,

As God's most intimate presence in the soul,
And his most perfect image in the world.'

You look puzzled, Caroline. What is it you don't understand?"

"I do not understand about all the great men who have sacrificed everything to the development of their genius. Have they been immoral men? Surely, Mozart and Handel, Haydn and Beethoven, were right in devoting their lives to music?"

"Certainly they were, my love; they followed the voice of duty within them. What they sacrificed in pursuit of the art, was not the happiness of others, but the petty enjoyments of an ordinary life for themselves. They could have done no other work for the world, so good for it, and for themselves, as what they have left behind them."

"Then some people may devote their whole time and thought to an art?"

"Yes, in the highest sense of the word art, they may, because that includes the consideration of things above the earth—God and immortality."

"How are people who love an art very much to know, at first, whether they only love it, or are capable of doing something in it?"

"By studying it, and trying to work in it. That takes some time; but it is not very difficult to ascertain whether you possess merely the appreciative, or, indeed, the creative faculty."

Caroline looked up at her father, earnestly. I saw what was passing in her mind; but she said nothing. That night, after Harry Granville had gone, Mr. Stanley, Caroline, and I, sat for a long time talking. I questioned Caroline a little about the ideas she had attached to the music of the opera, and found that as she did not understand the Italian words sufficiently, she had attached a meaning of her own to the music, and one quite different from that to be found in the libretto. To her mind, Cherubino's strains described the fervent desires, the vague indefinite yearning, of the young musical aspirant to arrive at a proper knowledge, a full enjoyment of his art. The "Deh vieni!" expressed her own eager expectation of the time when she should be a real musician. Simple, strong-hearted Caroline! How she loves! how she aspires! To a mind like that there can be no danger of the kind I apprehended for her just yet! The effect of her first visit to the opera has been a great one, though of a different kind. I was charmed with the way in which this effect showed itself. After we had talked long, and were about to wish each other good night, Caroline put her arms round her father's neck. "I have something to say to you, papa!—You said it is not always easy to tell whether people can only appreciate an art, or whether they really have power to do something in it. Can you tell whether I have any power to become a musician? I do not mean, a great composer; but a small composer, and a good practical vocalist and instrumentalist; above all, do you think I should be capable of appreciating the highest musical compositions?" She looked very earnestly into his face. He returned her look.

"I cannot tell, Caroline. What do you think yourself?"

"I think, papa, that my great love for music was not given me merely to amuse myself or my friends, in an idle hour. Herr — has taught me that. This wonderful opera to-night seems to have raised my desires and hopes in music. I feel as if it had given me new life; as if I had never known till now what love for music is in my heart. It seems to me that I could desire nothing better for myself on earth than to know music as well and to sing as perfectly as Madame —. If I could devote a great deal of time to the study of music, if you could spare money for me to have the proper instruction, if you and mamma thought it was right that I should do so, —"

"In short," interrupted her father, "if you were neglecting no duty, you would like to devote yourself for a time to the study of music?"

"Yes, papa! that I might ascertain whether what I feel here," and the young girl laid her hand on her heart, "is a little genius, or a great deal of love for music."

Her father embraced her affectionately. "You are anxious to do right, I see, and that, in my opinion, is rather in favour of your having genius. We will give you the trial, my darling. It cannot but be beneficial, even if you do not succeed in being all you desire. You are very young; you can spare a year or two. Nay, my darling; we will talk no more, now, you are over-excited. Good night, try to rest; perhaps, to-morrow you will not repeat the request of to-night, you may dream away the effects of the opera."

Caroline shook her head gravely, and departed.

"Well, Mrs. —," said her father to me, "what do you think of to-night's experiment? I don't think it will make a love-sick damsel of her."

"No! but it may make a cantatrice of her, which you and Mrs. Stanley would scarcely approve."

"We have no right to try to prevent the development of any good faculty. If that be the result of Caroline's first visit to the opera, her mother and I must reconcile ourselves to it. Caroline is a good girl; she will do right."

All this happened a year ago. I heard yesterday that Caroline is about to go to Germany with her father, there to become a pupil in some grand royal academy of music. One of her aunts is to remain with her while she studies there, and at the end of two years she is to proceed to Italy, where she is to stay, I know not how long, devoting herself to the practice of her darling art. She is perfectly happy at present—not dazzled with the pomps and vanities of the external life, or with the honours and praises lavished on the successful cantatrice; but sunning her young hopes in the brightness of the glory which dwells for ever in the works of the great musical composer. That she has begun to think about the nature of music itself, is dimly groping after the unintelligible causes and effects of that beauty which is partially revealed in this the most immaterial of the arts, is evident from a girlish letter which her father received from her a few days after the above recorded visit to the opera. "Tell me all you know about this, dearest father," she writes. "Tell me, too, whether something I found in a book the other day, is not quite true. I fancy it must be. This is what the author¹ says:—'Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and therefore that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so. It is by the reaction of the mind upon the notices of the ear, (the matter coming by the sense, the form from the mind,) that the pleasure is constructed, and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another.'"

EGYPT UNDER ABBAS PASHA.

BY BAYLE ST. JOHN.

WHEN the late Mohammed Ali heard at length of the taking of Acre by his troops under Ibrahim, he exclaimed, "That place," adding an energetic but somewhat unsavoury expression, "that place has cost me," not the lives of so many thousand men, but, "so many thousand cantars of gunpowder." These words illustrate pretty forcibly the narrow and selfish views of that celebrated but overrated man. We do not believe, indeed, that during the whole period of his sway in Egypt, the thought ever crossed his mind that he was bound to govern for any other purpose than his own personal aggrandisement, or that he was to regard in the slightest degree the feelings, the comfort, the property or the lives of his people.

The system which arose from this wretchedly egotistical state of mind was to a certain extent successful. Although great schemes of conquest, which even a more magnanimous species of selfishness might have carried out, were destined to end in comparative shame and disgrace, yet a somewhat brilliant de facto sovereignty was erected and maintained to the termination of the old man's life; and he died regretting only that he had not been allowed to march to Constantinople. To the end of his days he was rolling in wealth, and possessed of arbitrary power in dominions of great extent, where he was not the less arbitrary because he was compelled to acknowledge a superior, and to send a tribute, instead of a fleet and an army, to the shores of the Bosphorus. The provinces which he called his own, lay sleeping in a death-like tranquillity; and because he could ride through the streets without a guard, his flatterers told him that he had secured the fear, respect and love of the people. For he had many flatterers, this ancient of days;—not merely his own minions, whose business it was, but European gentlemen, who affected to be awe-struck in his presence, and gathered and treasured up and repeated his wise sayings, his profound observations, and, save the mark! his wit; but they never could impress on any impartial hearer the belief in any of these things. His sayings and observations were sometimes very foolish, sometimes distinguished by respectable common-sense; and his wit consisted in prefacing a very silly or impertinent remark with a peculiar grunt. Whenever, therefore, his courtiers, being in a narrative mood, began to tell how on a certain occasion the pasha said, "Hunk!" &c., a crowd of admirers were ready to smile, and one or two disinterested lookers-on were compelled to smile likewise, though, perhaps, for a very different reason.

Nothing is easier than to surround a man who has sufficient talents to fight or wheedle himself into a position of authority with a halo of false reputation; but it is rather more difficult to impress a character on the civilization of a country, and, now-a-days, to found an enduring dynasty. We shall not here recapitulate the enormous blunders of Mohammed Ali, in political and economical questions, nor explain how these blunders arose from a selfish desire to make what is vulgarly called a "splash," nor waste an anathema on his crafty cruelty and abominable tyranny. We wish merely to remind the reader that his period of power having come to a close, little good had been done, except, perhaps, improving to some extent the method of transacting public business.

Well, there were plenty of people to succeed him. The pasha had a large family of children and grandchildren, to whom he had behaved sometimes with indulgence, but generally with unreasoning and perverse severity. There was scarcely a member of his family with whom he had not had many little quarrels, and who did not avoid his presence as they did the plague. Even the favourite Ibrahim could not bear to live in the same city as his presumed father; and the rest would have been little less startled by the last summons of all, than they were by an occasional order to appear in the presence of the angry and savage old man. One feeling, however, was pretty general amongst them;—they regarded the pasha as a wonderfully important personage, and themselves consequently, being his children, as little less wonderful and important. Their hopes were in the uncertainty of life; and very many of them in their own minds had arranged what they would do in case they came to be viceroys, how they would make the money spin, and what mighty devices they would put in practice, to emulate and surpass the splendours of "Effendina"—"Our Lord," par excellence.

It must be confessed that Abbas Pasha alone had the good sense to take up a position of his own. Whether he was as crafty and politic as some pretend before his elevation to power, it is difficult to decide; but the plan at that time generally ascribed to him, of forming what was called a Turkish or bigoted party,—a party of discontented great folks, and fanatical Ulemas,—a party which should appeal to the religious prejudices of the good Caireens, and oppose itself to the inroad of European adventurers and improvements,—this plan, if distinctly formed, was certainly a very sagacious one. Let us be frank: Europeans have done more harm than good in Egypt; that is to say, whenever they have appeared except as mere commercial men, bringing the goods of their own countries, and anxious to take away the surplus of the luxuriant crops of the valley of the Nile. As political advisers, partly, perhaps, because men undertook to advise who were fit only for the counting-house, partly because their own interests were concerned, their intermeddling has been most pernicious. Even the benefits, for some such there are, which have been conferred by their wisdom, have been mingled with an immense amount of misery. There is one fact which has attained an almost mythological dignity from its notoriety and the admirable manner in which it symbolizes European meddling in Egypt. An English merchant, who ought to have known the manners of the country, advised the construction of the Mahmoudiyeh Canal. It has been most useful to commerce; but twenty thousand people were starved or worked to death within six weeks, in order to complete it. Fifty illustrations of the same kind might be given; but we wish merely to have our meaning understood, when we say that if Abbas Pasha or his party ever contemplated, as there is reason to suppose they did, the utter destruction of foreign influence, the total change of a system, under which French and English measures alternated like whig and tory administrations, we must candidly admit, they had some very good grounds to go upon.

The creation of the party was a long and laborious work; very likely it was brought and kept together more by mutual discontents, ambitious hopes and straightforward bigotry, than by any very Machiavelian policy. Probably Abbas Pasha really liked ram-fighting, and was a pigeon-fancier, and did not assume these tastes as the elder Brutus played the fool, in order to accomplish his ends. But, however this may be, he certainly occupied a more respectable position than his uncle Ibrahim, whose whole ideas of the duties of government were getting money and playing at soldiers; and than any of the other members of this most obese and heavy-headed family. Even if it be true that he meditated a revolt against the broken-down conqueror of Syria, and was only withheld by fear of the European powers, this fact gives an impression of his energy, and by no means derogates from his character in this country. The Saids and the Ahmeds, the Ismaïns and the Mustaphas, would each and all of them strike a blow and rid the country of their beloved relations, if the little word impossible did not stare them in the face. As it is, they are in perpetual feud with the head of the family, and there is no end to their bickerings, heart-burnings, jealousies and hatreds. Abbas is haughty and overbearing to them; they as insolent as they may be to him. Be sure that on all sides direful causes of affront have been given; but probably Abbas has been provoked by unbecoming pretensions. What else could be expected from a set of ignorant, debauched adventurers who have got a temporary footing in the country, and actually talk with the pride of an ancient respectable line of hereditary princes of their rights, and their expectations, and their rank, and so forth! Abbas of course has not the same natural influence over this unruly brotherhood as had the ruthless old man and his more savage immediate successor, and probably, in attempting to exert his rightful authority, has been betrayed into undignified squabbles. It is certain that many members of his family have fled or retired to Constantinople; among others, Mohammed Ali Bey, and the notorious Nazlet Hanem. Some remarks have been made on this subject, to the effect that Abbas is frightening away his dutiful relations by his violent and unreasoning conduct; but if Egypt never loses two of its natives whom it can worse spare than these, it will be fortunate. Without further inquiry than into their character, one would be inclined to admire and respect the man who had quarrelled with them. Mohammed Ali is a debauched worthless lad; and Madame Nazlet cannot have justice done to her without details into which our pen is not at liberty to enter.

It is a sad thing, certainly, to view the breaking up of a large family; but it would be a sadder thing to witness vice unpunished, and harmony arising out of the reckless indulgence of unbridled passions. Abbas Pasha himself, if report speak true, has little in his private life to plead for lenity in judging of his public character. His taste leads him to the most trifling amusements. Just as of old, when he was the supposed head of a kind of Conservative Turkish party, when he was Governor of Cairo, and silently nourishing his ambitious schemes, he spends time and money in the undignified, though not inelegant, and certainly innocent occupation of a pigeon-fancier. Near the new palace which he is building—(none of these Turkish princes seem to care about living where their fathers lived before them)—rises a magnificent square tower, entirely devoted to the lovely winged favourites of his Highness the Viceroy, who is reported to be quite learned in this department of natural history. Another of his tastes, for which Englishmen will have more sympathy, is for horses; and the public will remember his bold challenge to the Jockey Club. In what way he passes the remainder of his leisure hours we do not inquire; but we give him, in common with his relatives, the advantage of an excuse that has before been urged in their favour,—namely, that of an infamous education.

Abbas Pasha has not exactly carried out the views which were attributed to him before he reached his present elevation. He has not, for example, done all that his fanatical anti-Frank friends could expect in shaking off foreign influence. He began, it is true, by getting rid, in rather a hasty and shabby manner, of many Europeans, chiefly English, in his employ; and showed a disposition entirely to put a stop to that enormous blunder of the Barrage. His first, and very wise impulse, was either to destroy the works altogether, or, abandoning them, simply allow the river to work its own majestic will. But a clamour was raised on all sides! After throwing so many millions of dollars into the river, why should not a few millions more be thrown? I believe the French, who have a fondness for this undertaking because it was suggested by or through Napoleon—(the Osiris of his day is parent of all wonderful inventions);—I believe, I say, that France made it almost a national question; and so this work, which already impedes the navigation of one of the finest rivers in the world, and which, if successful, would only achieve an object that one quarter of the expense in the establishment of steam-engines at various points for raising water would effectually accomplish, is allowed to drag on slowly towards its conclusion. We must give Abbas credit for the courageous good sense which suggested to him that the first loss was the best; and yet we must not withhold from him some praise for yielding to the influence of friendly persuasion, and refraining from carrying out his own opinion, however well founded, when he was told that by doing so he would incur the risk of being accused of treason to his grandfather's fame. The old man had fondly believed that his Barrage would join the Pyramids that look down upon it in that restricted category of the "Wonders of the World," and might well be supposed to lie uneasily in his grave if all the piles which he had caused to be driven, all the mighty walls, and piers, and arches, which he had caused to be raised with a disregard of expense and human labour worthy of Cheops, were allowed to sink and lie forgotten in the slimy bed of the Nile.

This was the first point on which it appeared that Abbas Pasha was not disposed to act up fully to his presumed plan of destroying European influence altogether; but on many other occasions he early showed a disposition to temporise between his prejudices and his interest. We cannot here enter into detail on matters of minor importance, but, coming down to a recent period, we may mention another instance of a similar nature. For many years before his death Mohammed Ali had held out hopes that he would construct, or allow to be constructed, a railway from Cairo to Suez. This was preeminently an English project—not likely to be unuseful to the country at large, it is true, but calculated chiefly to promote the more expeditious and comfortable transit of passengers to and from India. The Pasha, however, deceived by an excess of cunning, really entertained no intention of performing his promise. With great want of sagacity, he contounded the proposed stations on the line of railway, which he might have held in his own hands if he chose, with the counters which he was told had formed the nuclei of the British power in India. He believed the English had some sinister designs upon his country, and were engaged in all sorts of schemes for introducing themselves into it. The same policy which made him refuse to deepen the entrance of the port of Alexandria lest a British fleet might come in, made him unwilling to throw a railway across the Desert of Suez, even if he kept the whole management in his own hands. The recommendations, he saw, came all from one country: the objections, nearly all, from another. France was opposed to the railway because it had another darling Napoleonic project in hand—namely, the cutting of the Isthmus of Suez, which was much talked of once, but which now nobody mentions but to laugh at. The difficulties of execution, immense as they were found to be by the Austrian commission, were not the most decisive objections. The real ones were contained in an answer to the very appropriate question: Cui bono? However, the railway was shelved for a time. It has lately come again upon the tapis; and although it is now proposed to lay down a line in the first instance between Alexandria and Cairo, to compensate for the water communication which M. Moujel is spoiling by his Barrage, yet there is every probability of proper extensions and branches being made in due time.

If, indeed, the project be really a serious one. Many say, in spite of the official manner in which the announcement has been made, that it is only a ruse, a piece of policy in order to propitiate English influence, and that as soon as certain manœuvres shall have been successful or otherwise, nothing more will be said about the railway. There is no answering for the diplomacy of Eastern courts; but this explanation seems a little too Machiavellian. I have no doubt the promise has been made, in part, because it is thought to be agreeable to the English; but I can hardly imagine Abbas Pasha is so foolish as not to know that if he coaxes Lord Palmerston with a sugar-plum, and when his lordship opens his mouth, puts a finger in instead, Lord Palmerston will bite pretty sharply.

Be these things as they may, it seems admitted on all hands that Abbas Pasha has now completely thrown overboard the party which he courted so assiduously as heir-apparent, and is seeking foreign, especially English, support. All this is fair enough provided he does not fall into the old error of sacrificing the natives entirely to strangers, as did his great predecessor, and provided he do not allow himself to be persuaded by flatterers—and he has flatterers; what man in power has not?—to engage in grand undertakings for the purpose of emulating the renown of the old Pharaohs. Egypt wants neither a resuscitation of old times, nor a hasty imitation of the new. She has to find out the form of its own civilization: and modern improvements, as they have been hitherto introduced, will only weigh her down into despair.

But it is said that Abbas Pasha has no views at all about the progress of the arts, and manufactures, and commerce; no thought of the amelioration of the country; but that in endeavouring to gain the goodwill of Europe, he wants to serve some ambitious projects of his own. There may be something in this. Not that it is probable he intends to play the old game over again and throw off the yoke of Stamboul; but there is certainly a very arduous struggle now carrying on, both by open and underhand means, between Egypt and the Porte. There is an infinity of points of difference between the vassal and his lord; but the gist of the matter is, that the former wishes to preserve all the privileges, to be treated with the same indulgence, to be left with the same freedom of action, as his grandfather; he wishes to remain, in fact, a vassal little more than in name, free to indulge any arbitrary whims; whilst the latter is attempting, with some reason,—with great reason indeed, but perhaps in too precipitate a manner, and actuated by feelings that resemble private grudge,—to reduce Egypt to the same subjection as the rest of the Ottoman Empire.

The discussion is a serious one, and much may be said on both sides; but it must be accorded at once in favour of the Porte, that the Viceroy of Egypt is not to be considered as an independent sovereign merely paying tribute to a superior power, but as an officer of the Empire. Certainly, he holds a distinguished position; and his case is an exceptional one; but very imprudent would be any who should advise him to take the same ground as Mohammed Ali, even after his defeat and expulsion from Syria, was allowed to assume. He has been levying troops, and is said even to have victualled his fleet to give more weight to his negotiations; but it is not probable he will draw the sword when, by giving way a little, he may establish a character for moderation, and be left undisturbed in a position sufficiently splendid to satisfy a very respectable ambition.

On the other hand, it is hoped that no undue heat, no petty jealousy, no minor considerations of self-love—excited and encouraged by the numerous runagates from Egypt, as Artin Bey and his fellows—will finally govern the councils of Constantinople. Many missions have passed from this country to the Porte with the object of warding off the blows that are being aimed at the authority of Abbas Pasha. Probably they ask too much, as is always done in such cases; but, if report speak true, they have been answered with an asperity which seems calculated rather to provoke a quarrel than to lead to a satisfactory settlement. The great question now is about the Tanzimat promulgated by the Porte, which may be briefly described as a well-intended attempt to introduce some kind of order into the administration of the empire, to substitute certain rules in place of arbitrary will, and generally to control the actions of what are called the great men in their relations with those who, we suppose, may be described as the little men. Such a scheme, even if imperfect in its details and difficult to be applied, must command our sympathies. The provinces of the Turkish empire—and Egypt is at least as great in degree as the remainder—have been too long the sport of caprice; and if it be the secret object of Abbas Pasha utterly to prevent the introduction of this new system—to refuse it even a fair trial—he will most certainly, whatever may be the effect of obstinate passive resistance, receive no countenance or support from England.

It is said, however, that he merely desires—and such is the purport of his remonstrances—that certain modifications, adapted to the peculiar situation of Egypt, shall be made. The Porte is the best judge as to how far these modifications are compatible with the spirit of its decree; and as the communications that have taken place have been chiefly verbal, we will not take upon ourselves to say whether they are even suggested by any peculiar necessity. The negotiations are in progress; and all we can say is, that unless Abbas Pasha be considered too dangerous a subject, and his removal be desired, it will be better to make up by amenity of procedure for the inexorable requirements of principle.

There was one great grievance in Mohammed Ali's time, namely, the existence of the ferdeh, or tax of one-twelfth upon income of all kinds, down to that of the poorest fellah. This was a great outrage on legality. It was opposed to all the constitutions of the Turkish empire; and it was understood that, after the Syrian affair, it should be voluntarily done away with by the Pasha. But an easy source of revenue is not easily given up; and, in spite of all remonstrances, the tax was maintained. There was no burden to which the people objected more than this. They paid,—but they murmured somewhat loudly; and even in the coffee-houses many were sometimes bold enough to say that the ferdeh was illegal. On one occasion, when Ibrahim Pasha was in Cairo, not long before his father's death, there was the semblance of a riot on the subject; but the stick and the halter were brought into play, and the conviction produced that, legal or not legal, the tax must be paid. Abbas Pasha himself for some time allowed this copious fountain to gush into his treasury; but it now suited the policy of the Porte to return vigorously to the charge in favour of legality; and towards the end of last year the ferdeh was finally abolished to the infinite delight of the whole population. The long-wished-for event was celebrated by illuminations in Alexandria and Cairo; and the general joy might have risen to something like enthusiasm had not a fresh, though temporary, cause of discontent accompanied the great boon.

This was the conscription, which nearly drove Egypt into a revolt last winter. In old times, when soldiers were wanted, men were pounced upon suddenly wherever they could be found, and marched off, leaving great grief behind; but before any dangerous excitement could be got up. This was justly considered a barbarous and inartificial method; and when, for what purposes remains a mystery, a certain levy of men was required, it was determined to proceed with regularity, and to make each district furnish its quota according to the number of inhabitants.

The idea, at first sight, seems both fair and wise; and if the people could have been got to acquiesce in the necessity of their supplying soldiers in any proportion at all, would have worked very well. But as nobody in Egypt wants to shoulder a musket, as everybody has the utmost hatred and abhorrence of military service, arising partly from constitutional want of energy, but chiefly from the knowledge that the soldier is ill-paid¹ and ill-fed, and rarely, if ever, returns—we never met but one old discharged campaigner in the country—it is not surprising if the public announcement of the intentions of Government produced the greatest possible perturbation. The first impulse of the whole adult population, except those who could boast of some very undoubted claim of exemption, was to fly to the mountains; and every desile, every cavern, every catacomb, every quarry in the Libyan and Arabian chains, were soon tenanted by people running away from enlistment. Wherever we went in our excursions, we became accustomed to see lines of human beings perched like crows on the summit of seemingly inaccessible cliffs, on the look-out for the enemy in the shape of the Sheikh-el-Beled; for the task of catching and forwarding the prescribed number of “strong active young men” devolved on the civil authority, aided sometimes by that estimable rural police, the Arnaut irregular cavalry. On many occasions we surprised these poor people in their retreats; and once, when they mistook us for recruiters, were assailed with slings diverted from their original purpose, namely, that of frightening the sparrows away from the crops. Accounts reached us at several places that blood had been shed; and the affair in various ways rendered our journey somewhat melancholy. Now we came upon a large town, as Geneh, seemingly deserted by its whole population, with closed shops and silent streets; then we met a party of recruits, chained neck and neck, going to their destination; and anon we saw a crowd of women, driven to despair by the loss of son, or husband, or brother, tossing up their arms, tearing their garments, and invoking curses on their oppressors. Public opinion in all despotic countries finds utterance through the weaker sex; they dare to say what would perhaps bring condign punishment on the men; they nearly made a revolt once in Cairo under Mohammed Ali, and on the present occasion they expressed their mind pretty freely. Some of the more noisy brought a good beating on themselves from some irascible Sheikh; but in general their anathemas were received with a kind of sheepish deprecating good-humour. It was difficult to ascertain how many recruits were at last got together, but, as near as I could gather, the number ordered was one in about every 180 souls.

The sight of so much unhappiness naturally excited great indignation and disgust; but not so much perhaps on reflection as the permanent misery and ill-treatment of a great proportion of the population.

(1) Soldiers will often stop a European in a by-place and beg. They get about twenty paras (a penny farthing) a-day.

Abbas Pasha has taken the old system as he found it, and, with the exception of the abolition of the ferdeh, has done nothing to alleviate the condition of the fellah. It is especially on the lands of the great men, the pashas and the beys, that these poor serfs are worst off. Their profession is that of agricultural labourers, but it must not be supposed that they have freedom to carry their services to what master they will. They belong to the land as much as do the palm-trees; and the nature of their occupation, their hours of labour, and their pay, are regulated by their lord and master in a perfectly arbitrary way. At Randa, opposite Sheikh Abadeh, we found a sugar estate occupying 1,300 men, and endeavoured to ascertain in as exact a manner as possible how they were treated. We found that, in the first place, they were, of course, forced to work, both on the land and in the factory, at a nominal pay of twenty-five paras, or three-halfpence a-head, and that some of them were in active employment nearly eighteen hours a-day. Now it is possible for a man to exist on such wages in that part of Egypt even with a family; and as bare existence is considered in most countries an adequate reward for unintelligent labour, there seemed not so much reason to complain. But then came the question, how was the payment made? The answer in substance was, the men are paid twenty-five paras a-day, but they never get the money; they receive what is called its value in the refuse of the molasses; but this only when it can be of little service to them, when the owner of the estate has glutted the market, and they can only sell at a loss of forty or fifty per cent. They would be only too happy to receive fifteen paras in hard cash; as it is, some of them necessarily eke out their living by stealing, and others by the produce of little plots of land, which they cultivate at night when they should be reposing after the fatigues of the day. The women and children assist them, when the latter are not pressed into what is called the service of the state; that is, compelled to dig canals, and perform other light work for which they receive neither pay nor food. Their parents bring them food, or some charitable person flings them a morsel of coarse bread, otherwise they would perish.

Such is pretty nearly the state of things in the private possessions of all the descendants of Mohammed Ali. In fairness, however, we must remind the reader that Abbas Pasha is only answerable for acquiescing in customs handed down. He has not established any new pernicious regulation that we have heard of; and even if he remain perfectly quiescent and leave things to go their own gait, King Log is better than King Stork. The mischievous activity of Mohammed Ali is not to be regretted; and if, by the influence of Constantinople prudently exercised, some little check is gradually put upon the caprices and violence of the great proprietors who call themselves princes,—and it is for the interest of Abbas Pasha that this should be the case,—Egypt, though not possessed of all the happiness she wants, might not be very discontented, and would have no reason to look back with regret on the time of the old pasha. According to all accounts, some classes of the agricultural labourers are gradually enriching themselves in spite of the burdens which they bear; and, although wealth is still timid to show itself, a great amelioration in the state of the country may soon be perceptible.

FORGIVENESS OF INJURIES.

AN EASTERN ANECDOTE.

BY F. L.

OF Abon Hanifah, an Eastern sage,
Renown'd above the doctors of his age
For teachings earnest, eloquent, and bold,
This story (worthy such a sage!) is told.

It chanced one day, in sacred garb attired,
By thousands honour'd, follow'd, and admired,
Beneath a shady sycamore he stood,
And taught aloud the list'ning multitude,
When a pert brawler, pushing thro' the throng,
Wantonly struck him as he pass'd along.
What said the sage? indignant and distress'd,
How were the feelings of his soul express'd!
"Were I vindictive, rude aggressor, know
I had, perchance, return'd you blow for blow;
Were I to wrangling and contention prone,
Or bent on making ev'ry grievance known,
Unto the Caliph's bar I should repair,
And seek forthwith for reparation there;
But with my humour it doth more agree
To pray to Him who made both you and me,
That when upon the judgment-day we meet
As trembling suppliants at His mercy-seat,
'Through the same gate, forgiving and forgiven,
We may together reach the courts of Heaven!"

FLOWERS, AND THEIR LEGENDARY HISTORY.

"Call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells and flowerets of a thousand hues,
Ye vallies low, where the mild whispers use,
Of shades and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
On whose fresh lap, the swart star sparsely looks.
Throw hither all your quaint enamell'd eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honey'd showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal flowers;
Bring the rake primrose that forsaken dies,
The tufted crowtoe, and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy peak'd with jet,
The glowing violet,
The musk rose, and the well attired woodbine,
With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head."

LYCIDAS.

THE love of flowers is so intimately connected with, even if it does not arise from, a finer sense of the beautiful on God's earth, that it is formed, as it might be expected to form, a shade, slight it may be, but still a shade, in the character of nations.

The Spaniards love flowers with all the intensity of their semi-asiatic nature. Every terrace in Andalusia glows with flowers; from every balcony where the black-eyed "unchacha" sits embowered, trail rose-bushes. Every mantilla is fastened with a flower—no miserable abortion of muslin and paint, but a real blossom, with the hue of an embodied blush, or the deep serene colour of a maiden's eye. The very beggar boys ask you for flowers, to twine round an altar, or deck a tawdry saint.

Then comes Italy, land of petrified beauty, where a stainless sky canopied the thousand flowers that bloom amid ruins of palace-temple, now one mighty tomb, where, as of yore round Pæstum by the sea, grow the violet, the hyacinth, and the wall-flower, that breathe out perfume sweeter than the pontiff's incense, while yonder moans the sea-god for his violated fane.

But the modern Sybarites still faint at fragrance too intense, as the legend tells us the Venetian ladies did, at the toilette of the Grecian princess, whom their proud Doge had wedded; and on this account, though beneath every palace terrace, the spray from the fountain, that mounts like a silver column to the skies, fall on orange blossom, the Italians do not love flowers with that perfect love that nestles them in the bosom in this our England.

In Greece—alas! for Greece—the narcissus still lingers wooingly by the spring, and the poppy flowers in the rare seen corn; and the mailed Klepht, forgetful of Apollo, crushes beneath his shoon, on the dark rock of Delphi, the hyacinth, or waters the crocus, whom his forefathers thought sprung from the buried corpse of a shepherd, with the blood of a hapless traveller.

The English are a flower-loving people—from the pale weaver that bends over his single tulip, to the royal maiden with her costly and frail exotics. No poets have sung more lovingly of flowers than our own. The poems of no nation contain more allusions to the lovely, though diminutive gems, that stud our meadows and bloom in that "wilderness of sweets" or wild grown hedge.

We hail the primrose, springing from the dead leaves, as we would an angel visitor that told of Hope; we are Northmen, and we long, after a dreary winter, for the genial breath of June; we greet the many-coloured multitude in the riper year, we lament their departure when falls

"The frost from the clear cold heaven, as falls the plague on men, And the brightness of their smile is gone on upland glade and glen;"

and we sing with Herrick, gay, warm-hearted, impassioned, lyrical, anaerontic Herrick.—

"What! were ye born to be
An hour or half's delight,
And so to bid good night.
'Twas pity nature brought you forth,
Merely to show your worth,
And lose you quite."

How Burns wept as he turned up the daisy in the furrow at Mossiel! How Wordsworth, with his head weighed down with calm thought, bent over the humble Celandine! How that great patriarch of song, Chaucer, loved "the queen of flowers," that bew powdered the meadows of fair Woodstock when the ground was all "green and white," and he watched it night and morning;

"When it upriseth early on the morrow,
That blissful sight softoneth all my sorrow."

And what a sweet benediction is his that falls like dew upon our heads, as we turn over his black-lettered page in some latticed nook of the Bodleian, looking down on garden and terrace beneath—

"Well by reason men may it call,
The emprise and throne of flowers all,
I pray to God that faire might she fall,
And all that loven flowers for her sake."

What sweet welling from the pure heart of the Lollard poet, unossified by a courtier's, a soldier's, or a burgher's life! Then there's Froissart, with his stanzas on flowers, and above all the Elizabethan writers, Shakspeare, Jonson, Fletcher, Greene, Herrick, Lovelace, Carew, Browne, Wotton, Middleton, &c. and not forgetting our own Shelley and Keats. The Provençal troubadours sang of them, and the German minnesingers.

Legends throng around us from the far seats of religion and war and love. How various are the associations of a single flower—the rose! Now, sacred to Venus, twined round the altar of Paphos, regarded as a sweet emanation of her beauty; now, the badge of hostile faction; now, the enamoured of the nightingale; now, crimsoned deeper with the hearts's blood of its wearer, adopted by the victorious Earl of Richmond, it is still retained in the royal badge. The Hindoos have, too, their legends of the flower. Within its velvet bosom Camdeo was nurtured, till he strung his bow with bees, and tipped his darts with fire-coloured blossoms, and burst forth in the full effulgence of the Deity. The monks moulded the flower in their patera, in the rich bosses of their roofs, and in the tesseræ of their pavements. The Greeks used it on their tombs as the emblem of a short life. The Romans wore wreaths of it at their feasts, or dipped its leaves in their wine bowls. The Sun-worshippers of Rhodes used it as their emblem upon their drachmas; and the middle ages, rich in romance, made their own superstitious use of it—Whitsuntide they called their Rose Easter; and on Midsummer Eve, like Faust's own Gretchen, they made love divinations with its ruddy leaves. In the mountain churchyards of Wales, they planted the white rose on the grave of a virgin, and the red on that of a village patriarch. Then arise recollections of the golden rose, that the Roman descendants of the fisherman gave to the great to day, and banned to-morrow.

In Elizabeth's court gallants wore the rose behind their ear, and their sons mimicked it in ribbon, and wore it on their shoes.

The white rose was the favourite emblem of the followers of the young Pretender, as the violet was of those of Napoleon. With this type of innocence the Jacobin gentleman decked the button-hole of his laced coat on the Prince's birthday, as regularly as June came round, and long after Culloden had been blasted by the trampling and the blood of men; very nearly, therefore, did this simple flower become again, as in the "Wars of the Roses," the signal for cruelty and murder. Smollet draws the band of emigrés at Boulogne, with all the pathos of one describing the exile of his own unfortunate countrymen. Adherents of a ruined cause, they wandered daily to the seashore, to see those white cliffs of England, which they might gaze at, but never again approach; with what fond interest must those poor, broken-hearted, faithful men, have watched the white rose clamber and bloom over their humble cottages—bloom and fade—meet emblem of their shattered hopes.

A STROLL THROUGH THE LIBRARY OF THE BRITISH MUSEUM IN 1851.

THE Great Exhibition has exercised in many quarters a talismanic influence. It has given a stimulus to every description of public-mindedness, (if we may be allowed to coin a long word for our purpose,) and has tended, in no slight degree, to relax the exclusiveness of the English character. Whilst its attractions grow upon us day by day, and every fresh visit unfolds new wonders, and raises it in our estimation, we are also mindful that, in addition to the more obvious advantages we have derived from it, it has been indirectly the means of opening up, in other places, additional sources of rational amusement; of diverting the current of sight-seeing out of its ordinary channel; and of affording the visitors who have been crowding our metropolis this fine summer, some unexpected gratifications.

Whether by accident or design, the authorities of the British Museum have most opportunely selected this period for admitting the public to the noble rooms in that establishment in which the collections of books and manuscripts are deposited. We are quite sure, from the expressions of gratification which have reached us, that the privilege which has been conceded is fully appreciated; and we feel also bound to observe that every exertion has been made to render this department of the Museum as interesting and attractive as possible. With regard to the general question of indiscriminate admission to public libraries, we are aware that it has been commonly objected that rows of book-shelves and varieties of book-binding cannot, under ordinary circumstances, be particularly edifying or attractive to the majority of sight-seers; and if the trustees of the British Museum had simply afforded the public an opportunity of strolling through the library, and gazing on the mere outsides of the literary treasures under their control, we think there would be some force in the objection, and that from such an arrangement little advantage would be found to accrue. But with a laudable desire of extending the usefulness of a national institution, and rendering its resources generally available, the only plan of fairly exhibiting the contents of a great library has been adopted in the present instance, and carried out with great skill and discretion. Both in the rooms devoted to printed books and to manuscripts, the greatest rarities of the several collections are advantageously displayed in glass cases, with printed or written explanations; the works being generally opened so as to display any characteristic peculiarities of type or caligraphy. Many beautiful specimens of early printing, illuminated books and manuscripts, and curious literary relics, are thus brought under observation; and to any one of ordinary information and intelligence, it would be difficult to present an assemblage of objects more interesting or suggestive.

As many of our readers may have already visited, and as many more will be likely to visit, this new department of the Museum, we have ventured to throw together a few notes on some of the most remarkable bibliographical curiosities exhibited in the manner already mentioned. We may observe that an official catalogue or guide to a portion of the collection has been published, and appears to have been drawn up with great care and accuracy.¹ Many visitors may, however, wish for some more popular and descriptive information; and it is partly to supply that want that this paper has been written. Within our narrow limits we cannot, of course, notice every work or object exhibited; but we have selected those for description to which we consider it most likely that a visitor would wish his attention to be drawn.

In commencing our tour through the rooms in the Museum which are exclusively devoted to literature, we shall find that the first we enter (situated on the right-hand facing the entrance hall), has been appropriated to the reception of the magnificent library bequeathed to the nation in 1847 by the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville.² There are two table-cases in this room, in which are exhibited some early block-books, and the very first productions of the printing-press; a series of great value, as illustrating the history and progress of the art of printing. It is well known that the practice of taking impressions from wooden blocks, engraved in relief, prevailed in Europe at the commencement of the fifteenth century, and preceded the invention of printing with moveable types by many years; but it is singular enough to find that the same method of multiplying copies had been adopted in China from a period of very remote antiquity, and remains unchanged at the present day. It has been asserted by some historians (perhaps most extravagantly) that printed books existed in the Celestial Empire 300 years before the birth of Christ; but there is no doubt that the art of printing from blocks, as still practised, prevailed there as early as the year of our Lord 932.

The most remarkable block-book exhibited in the case before us is the Biblia Pauperum, supposed to have been executed about the year 1430, or rather

(1) "British Museum. A Short Guide to that Portion of the Library of Printed Books now open to the Public. Printed by Order of the Trustees, May, 1851."

(2) For a further description of this collection, and for a general sketch of the formation of the British Museum Library, we refer our readers to a former article in SHARPE, vol. ix. pp. 233—236.

later. In size the work has been described as a small folio, and consists of about forty leaves, each leaf containing a wood-cut, accompanied with sentences descriptive of the engravings. This book was undoubtedly intended, as its name imports, as a Bible for the commonalty, or rather as a substitute for the Sacred Volume, adapted to the capacity and the pecuniary means of the masses. At the time it was produced, a complete Bible in manuscript was worth at least a hundred pounds of our present money, and we may therefore infer that a process by which copies of even these rude representations of sacred stories were multiplied, must have been regarded as an important innovation. The Biblia Pauperum, having been a popular book, widely circulated among the laity, is rarely found in a perfect state. For some of the copies of it, however, large sums have been given, and it is justly esteemed a great bibliographical curiosity.

Next to the Biblia Pauperum, we have a single page printed from a block, entitled Temptationes Demonis, which is remarkable as the largest specimen of block-printing with which bibliographers are acquainted. It is 16½ inches in height, and 10½ in breadth, and is a production of such extreme rarity, that it is supposed to be the only copy in existence. This singular and precious relic may be described as a devotional broadside, commencing with the following title in Latin: "Here begin the temptations of the devil, tempting a man by the seven mortal sins and their branches. And immediately follows the defence of the good angel, the man's guardian, alleging (or producing) Holy Scripture against them." The three figures which appear on the block are, the devil with his hook, the man undergoing temptation, and the good angel who is protecting him. "The text commences with the seven deadly sins, against which are placed the texts of Scripture applicable to them, and the references to the passages in the Bible. Then follow the deadly sins in order, against each of which are placed the eight branches or sins resulting from it; and opposite to each of these branches, the text of Scripture particularly bearing upon it, with the references to the passage."¹

Another curious and valuable block-book exhibited in this case, is the Speculum Humane Salvationis, or the Mirror of Salvation; a compilation of passages from Scripture and profane history, ascribed to a Benedictine monk of the thirteenth or fourteenth century, known as "Brother John." It appears that this was a very popular work, as it was translated into several languages, and frequently reprinted. This copy is described in the Guide as of "the first edition;" and it may be mentioned as a curious fact, that in subsequent editions of this production the text accompanying the figures was printed with movable characters. These later editions, therefore, form a curious link between the impressions taken from wooden blocks and the earliest specimens of typography.

The transition from these rude block-books to the first book printed with movable metal types is, however, very great. It has always been remarked that the first efforts in the typographical art are well-nigh the most perfect. "The hand of Heaven," says a bibliographical enthusiast, "worked in a cause so beneficial to man. The art of printing sprung at once from infancy to maturity, and the growth, though rapid, was firm and complete." It is certainly a marvellous thing to find the first printed book presenting so beautiful an appearance as the Mazarine Bible, which is the name by which this celebrated production of the press is commonly known, on account of a copy of it having been discovered by De Bure in the library of Cardinal Mazarin. It is without date; but from the collateral evidence which has been adduced upon the subject, it is pretty clearly established that it was issued from the press of Gutenberg and Faust, at Mentz, before A.D. 1455. In the character of the type we trace a close resemblance to the manuscripts of the period, and few persons unacquainted with early typography, would suspect, at the first glance, that they were gazing on a printed page. From the neatness, care, and precision with which it is executed, we may surmise that immense pains and expense were lavished upon the work. "Those who have not seen it," says Dibdin, "can form little notion of the beauty and regularity of the press-work, and of the magnificent appearance of the volumes. They exhibit a masterpiece of art, and a miracle in their way."² The text, which is the Latin version known as the Vulgate, is remarkable for correctness; and indeed nothing is wanting to render this production one of the most remarkable achievements of human industry and ingenuity which the world has afforded. It must be stated that the two volumes exhibited in the Museum belong to different copies. The first, on vellum, (in magnificent condition,) is from the collection of Mr. Grenville, and the other (on paper) is from the library of King George III., which became the property of the nation in 1823. Previous to the latter date, there was no copy of this important work in the National Library, and the deficiency was often the subject of lamentation and complaint.

After the Mazarine Bible, the most remarkable production of the early printing-press is the Mentz Psalter,—a Latin translation of the Psalms, printed at Mentz by Faust and Schoeffer, in 1457. A copy of this work, which is of extreme rarity, (some six or seven copies being all that are known to exist,) printed on vellum, is exhibited next to the Bible. It is a beautiful production, from the collection of Mr. Grenville, and the visitor will not fail to admire its fine bold type, and the brilliancy of the ink, which has retained its lustre for so many years. This work is remarkable as being the first book which bears the date of the year when it was printed, the place of publication, and the printer's name. It is also the first example of printing in colours; the initial letters of each of the Psalms being printed from wood-cuts, executed with singular beauty and delicacy, in three colours,—black, red, and blue. Another edition of the same Psalter (also on vellum), executed by the same printers in 1459, and said to contain the first printed text of the Athanasian Creed, is also exhibited.

In the second table-case in the Grenville Room, we have several other specimens of the early German printers. Among these are the Racionale Divinorum Officiorum, by William Durand, printed at Mentz, with improved types of cast metal, in 1459; the Catholicon, a kind of grammar, compiled by John of Genoa, a Dominican monk, in the thirteenth century, printed at Moutz in 1460; and, above all, the Latin Bible of 1462, "finished and perfected for the service of God," (according to the inscription at the end,) "in the city of Mentz, by John Faust, citizen, and Peter Schoeffer de Gernsheim, clerk of the same diocese." The type with which this work is printed differs much from that of the Mazarine Bible, and is denominated by a bibliographer "the earliest specimen of the large secretary gothic" character employed by these printers. It is conjectured, from the close resemblance which the early printed books bear to manuscripts, that they were frequently, and of course fraudulently, sold as such. Being usually printed on vellum, with illuminated capital letters, a purchaser might have been easily deceived, until he came to compare the copies; and from the extraordinary rapidity with which Faust produced Bibles for sale, it is a common, and not improbable notion, that the rumour attributing to him the character of a necromancer had its foundation. With regard to the price of these early works, there is, curiously enough, a deed of sale extant, executed by Herman de Statten, the agent of Faust and Schoeffer, conveying a copy of their Bible to William Tourneville, Bishop of Angers, for forty golden crowns. The document consists of a formal memorandum in Latin, and is dated April 5th, 1470. It proves, in a striking manner, both from the price paid for the work, and the legal formalities attending the transfer, the costly and important character of these early productions of the printing-press.

From the Grenville Room the visitor will pass into the manuscript department of the library, where a variety of relics are exhibited which cannot but prove deeply interesting to every student of history and every lover of literature. Immediately upon his entering the department, he will observe, conspicuously displayed upon screens on his right and left, a large collection of autographs of royal and illustrious personages. Upon one side, arranged in regular rotation, are the autographs of the English sovereigns since the Conquest. Among them is the boyish signature of Edward V. accompanied by the mottos and signatures of his treacherous relative, Richard Duke of Gloucester, and Henry Duke of Buckingham. The handwriting of the boy-king Edward VI. will also attract attention. The specimen exhibited is a Latin letter, written in a beautifully neat and legible character, conveying, better than language itself could do, a notion of the precocious ability of that youthful sovereign. Here, too, are to be seen, (and the collection is historically interesting,) the Great Seals of all the sovereigns from the time of William I. Before he finishes his examination of royal autographs, we would, however, especially direct his attention to one or two letters, which appear to us, from historical associations, especially interesting.

The first to which we would draw specific attention, is a letter of Queen Elizabeth's, (before her accession to the throne,) written in a kind of print-hand, and appearing to us a very miracle of neat and elegant penmanship. It is a curious specimen of the pedantic and elaborate style of epistolary composition cultivated at the period by high-born women who affected a reputation for scholarship, or laid claim to superior intellectual accomplishments; and it may be likewise observed that more than common interest attaches to it from the time at which it was written. It was indited in one of those troublesome years of Queen Mary's reign, when the Lady Elizabeth, (having suffered imprisonment, and narrowly escaped from greater dangers,) had been permitted to retire to the Palace of Hatfield, where, keeping prudently aloof from political and polemical disputes, she occupied her time with the quiet delights of study and reflection. There is no date to the letter, but it must have been written between the summer of 1555 and the autumn of 1558, the year of Mary's death. The circumstance which led to its composition appears, from its contents, to have been a request which Mary had made to be furnished with her sister's portrait. It was first printed, we believe, in Mr. Isaac Disraeli's "Curiosities of Literature," where it will be found at full length; but the peculiarity of the style induces us to transcribe a portion of it, preserving the original orthography:—

"Like as the riche man that dayly gathereth riches to riches, and to one bag of money layeth a greater sort til it come to infinit, so me thiuketh, your Majestie not beinge suffised with many benefites and gentlines shewed to me afore this time, doth now increase them in askinge and desiring wher you may bid and comaunde, requiring a thinge not worthy the desiringe for it selfe, but made wortny for your highnes request. My pictur I mene, in wiche if the inward good mynde towarde your Grace might as wel be declared as the outwarde face and countenance shal be seen, I wold nor have taried the comandement but prevent it, nor haue bine the last to graunt but the first to offer it. For the face, I graunt I might well blusche to offer, but the mynde I shall neure be ashamed to present. For thought from the grace of the pictur, the coulours may fade by time, may giue by weather, may be spotted by chance, yet the other nor time with her swift winges shall ouertake, nor the mistie clouds with their loweringes may darken, nor chance with his slipery fote may ouerthrow."

Side by side with the letter of Elizabeth, is an epistle in French by her unfortunate rival, Mary Queen of Scotland. And close at hand is a still more interesting document, headed "Jane the Quene;" being one of the two letters written by that high-minded woman, during her brief assumption of sovereignty, and addressed to the lieutenants of different English counties. A letter of Oliver Cromwell, as Protector,—in a firm, bold, legible hand,—is also included in this series, and we need scarcely state, is stamped with character in every line. Commencing with the sentence,—“Sr, it hath pleased God to raise me out of a dangerous sicknesse, and I doe most willinglie acknowledge that the Lord hath (in this visitation) exercised the bowells of a Father towards me,”—it is written throughout in a strain of fervent piety, and will recall to the reader's mind many of the most striking mental lineaments of this extraordinary Englishman.

Before we quit the subject of royal autographs, we may remark that the distinctness of character which distinguishes the handwriting of some of our sovereigns has been made the subject of criticism. For instance, "Henry VIII." it is observed by Oldys, "wrote a strong hand, but as if he had seldom a good pen." The handwriting of his man-hearted daughter, Elizabeth, indicates, according to another authority, "asperity and ostentation;" whilst that of her cousin, Mary Stuart, though frequently irregular and uneven, denotes "simplicity, softness, and nobleness." James I. again, "wrote a poor ungainly character, all awry, and not in a straight line," whilst Charles I. wrote a beautiful, open, Italian hand, which prepossesses the observer in his favour. Charles II. was distinguished for a "little fair running-hand, as if written in haste, or uneasy till he had done." The phlegmatic James II. wrote "a large fair hand," and Queen Anne "a fair round hand," such as we might expect to find in a copy-book. Any reader of English history may decide how far these peculiarities are suggestive of personal character and disposition.

Upon the screen on the other side of the door by which the manuscript room is entered, the visitor will find a selection of autographs even more interesting than those we have been examining. In addition to a curious collection of ancient charters with their pendent seals, we have here a plentiful display of the letters and signatures of illustrious men; statesmen, generals, divines, and men of letters; amongst which are many valuable documents, which vividly recall to the mind the characters of eminent men and important events, in English and European history. We cannot, of course, enumerate every object worthy of notice; but we will endeavour to particularise a few of the most interesting relics. We observe, for instance, a letter of John Hampden, remarkable alike for the extraordinary beauty of the penmanship and the elegant style of the composition. The handwriting of Raleigh, Galileo, Wolsey, Sir Thomas More, Sir Philip Sidney, Calvin, Luther, Erasmus, and Melancthon, all more or less characteristic, will also attract the attention of the visitor; and he must not omit to notice the letters of the English martyrs, Latimer, Bonner, Cranmer, and Ridley. A letter of Benjamin Franklin's, in a bold, mercantile, business-like sort of hand, containing a notable testimony in favour of agricultural pursuits, must not be overlooked; and there are many interesting epistles by Newton, Dryden, Addison, Pope, Voltaire, and other eminent literary and scientific men, full of characteristic phrasology, and reminding us, as letters always do, of innumerable personal traits and peculiarities.

To turn from the profession of literature to that of arms, we would briefly call attention to a scrap of paper which might possibly escape observation, and yet to most Englishmen a relic of considerable interest. We allude to a memorandum, referring to the disposition of a portion of the troops under his command, written by the Duke of Wellington on the field of Waterloo. A letter of Napoleon, whilst a simple officer of artillery, is another great military relic. There is also a fine dashing letter of Prince Rupert, conveying a good notion of character, if ever human hand-writing was capable of doing so; and among the memorials of other great captains, are autographs of Sully, Marlborough, Turenne, Washington, and Nelson.

Without over estimating the intrinsic value of autographs, we must confess that we feel (in common, we should think, with most persons) a strange interest, not unmixed with awe, in contemplating these memorials of the departed great. Now and then a worn and faded document will recall to the mind with wonderful vividness a series of historical events. We notice, for instance, in this collection, a letter written by the unfortunate Duke of Monmouth, after the battle of Sedgemoor, to the Queen Dowager, (earnestly and humbly supplicating her to intercede with the king that his life might be spared,) which every student of history must feel it a privilege to inspect. It is dated from Ringwood, to which place Monmouth had been conveyed under a strong guard, upon his capture, after the flight from Sedgemoor. The state of his mind at this period has been accurately and vividly portrayed by Mr. Macaulay. The failure of his enterprise had unmanned the popular favourite. He was no longer the bold, adventurous chieftain, but the trembling, humiliated, and miserable captive; and it is easy to imagine the feelings with which he penned this document, which expresses in such piteous terms the anguish and prostration of his mind. He was in the hands of a bitter and remorseless enemy, and yet he clung to life, life on any terms and at any price, with desperate energy. In the words of the historian, life seemed to him to be worth purchasing by any humiliation; nor could his mind, always feeble, and now distracted by terror, perceive that humiliation must degrade, but could not save him." Such being the circumstances under which this letter was written, we make no apology for transcribing it, particularly as it is very short. It is dated, as we have said, from "Ringwood, the 9th of July ('85),” the day after he had written to the king in the same strain of craven supplication:—

“MADAM,—Being in this unfortunate condition and having none left but your Ma^y that I think may have some compassion of me, and that for the last king’s sake, makes me take this boldness to beg of you to intercede for me. I would not desire your Ma^y to do it, if I wear not from the bottom of my heart convinced how I have bine dis[c]eajued into it, and how angry God Almighty is wth me for it; but I hope, Madam, your intercession will give me life to repent of it, and to shew the king how really and truly I will serve him hereafter; and I hope, Madam, your Ma^y will be convinced, that the life you save shall ever be devoted to your service, for I have bine and ever shall be your Ma^y most dutifull and obedient servant
“MONMOUTH.”

Amongst other historical relics, we may particularize, before we pass on, the curious carte blanche (a sheet of blank paper with a seal attached), “said to have been sent by Charles II., when Prince of Wales, to the Parliament, to save his father’s head.” A portion of the will of Mary Queen of Scots, in her own hand-writing, is another valuable and interesting document. There are also letters by some of the most eminent foreign potentates, who have occupied a distinguished place in the history of the world. The autograph of the human tigress, Catherine de Medici,—full of masculine energy, will readily attract attention; and the letters of Peter the Great of Russia, Gustavus Adolphus, and Frederic the Great, are, in like manner, instinct with character.

Having spent some time among the autographs, it is fit that we should now proceed to examine a few of the other attractions of the manuscript department. In the centre of the room is a glazed table-case, in which are exhibited many choice and beautiful oriental manuscripts. The natives of the East, we may remark, have been always celebrated for their proficiency in the art of caligraphy. The favourite productions of the Persian poets are often written in the most beautiful manner, upon fine silky paper, powdered with gold and silver dust, and perfumed with essence of roses or sandal-wood. Such manuscripts have been often minutely described by oriental students, and their beauties duly set forth. “The Asiatics,” it has long since been observed, “have many advantages in writing: their ink is extremely black, and never loses its colour; the Egyptian reeds with which they write are formed to make the finest strokes and flourishes; and their letters run so easily into one another that they can write faster than any other nation. It is not strange, therefore, that they prefer their manuscripts to our best printed books; and if they should ever adopt the art of printing, in order to promote the general circulation of learning, they will still do right to preserve their classical works in manuscript.”² Leaving the visitor to the minute inspection of the specimens of Persian and other oriental manuscripts, which are exhibited in this case, we must, however, pass on to other subjects.

Before we examine the contents of the two other table-cases in this department, we notice, conspicuously displayed on a stand, a very ancient manuscript of the Bible, “containing the Latin text of the Vulgate revised by Aleuin, probably written in the reign of Charles the Bald, King of France, about 840;” and similarly placed, on the opposite side of the room, is a Hebrew roll of the Pentateuch, written on brown African goat-skin, “probably about the fourteenth century.” Both these manuscripts are in beautiful preservation. The Latin Bible contains some curious illuminations, and the text is to all appearance as fresh and legible as if written in the last instead of the tenth century.

We will now glance at a few of the rarities contained in the two table-cases we have already mentioned. The one on our left hand contains, in the first place, the celebrated copy of “St. Cuthbert’s Gospels,” comprising the Latin text of the Evangelists, with an interlinear Saxon version, written between the years 698 and 720. For an account of this beautiful book and the legend attached to it, we are able to refer the reader to a paper in a former volume of this Journal.³ The next object which attracts attention is a volume of the Codex Alexandrinus, the most ancient manuscript extant of the Old and New Testaments in Greek, said to have been written between the fourth and sixth centuries, and presented to King Charles I. (by whom it was, in 1628, deposited in the royal library,) by Cyril, Patriarch of Constantinople. This precious manuscript, we may observe, is bound in four volumes, the New Testament being comprised in the last. “It is written on vellum,” (to quote an accurate description from a competent authority,) “in double columns, in uncial or capital letters, without spaces between the words, accents, or marks of aspiration. The letters are round and well formed. Some words are abbreviated, but they are not very numerous. There is a variety both in the colour of the ink and the form of the letters. The MS. is on the whole in good condition, but sometimes the ink has eaten through the parchment; the shape of the letters, however, can generally be traced; sometimes the ink itself has scaled off.” A facsimile of this work has been published by the Rev. H. Baber, formerly keeper of the Printed Books in the British Museum; and although doubts have been cast by some controversialists on its age and authority, its excellence and general correctness have been warmly attested by many competent scholars. “Besides all the canonical and most of the apocryphal books found in our editions," we are told that it contains "the third and fourth book of the Maccabees, the Epistle of Athanasius to Marcellinus, prefixed to the Psalms, and fourteen hymns, the eleventh in honour of the Virgin. Ecclesiasticus, the Song of the Three Children, Susannah, and Bel and the Dragon, do not appear to have formed part of the collection. The New Testament contains the genuine Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and part of the other which has been attributed to him. This is the only known manuscript in which the genuine Epistle exists."

(1) A very interesting relic has recently found its way to the Museum, being the private memorandum-book found in Monmouth’s possession at the time of his arrest. It contains a number of songs, receipts, &c. in his own hand-writing, and, as the reader will remember, has been referred to and described by Mr. Macaulay.

In the case we are now examining, we shall also find the original autograph copies of some remarkable literary productions; and it may be safely averred, that these are not the least interesting relics contained in the manuscript-room of the British Museum. Among them is the original draft of Dr. Johnson's tragedy of Irene, which, according to Boswell, the great lexicographer rescued from the papers he had destined for the flames, a few days before his death. There is likewise a volume of the comedies of Lope de Vega, in the poet's own handwriting. We are willing to believe that this is the actual penmanship of this prolific writer, who is said to have dictated verses faster than they could be taken down, and to have written something like eighteen hundred plays. There is also a beautiful autograph copy of a masque by Ben Jonson, and a precious volume, with many corrections, in the handwriting of Tasso. But the most remarkable relic of this description, is the original manuscript of Pope's translation of the Iliad and Odyssey, in three volumes, presented to the British Museum by David Mallet. This translation (of which a single volume is exhibited) is written, as it is well known, on the backs of letters received from various friends, such as Addison, Steele, Rowe, Young, &c. The economy exhibited in this arrangement, has procured for the poet the nick-name of "paper-sparing Pope;" but if he was sparing of his paper, this manuscript proves that he was by no means so of his labour. The vast number of corrections, alterations, and interlineations, bear witness to the amount of toil bestowed by the author on this great production, and illustrate in a remarkable manner the laborious process by which perfection of phraseology was attained by one who trusted less to inspiration than to long and painful practice. In many instances epithet after epithet was changed, and line after line re-written, before the nice ear and fastidious taste of the poet could be satisfied. Thus, to take a single instance, adverted to by Mr. D'Israeli, the second line of the couplet which commences the well-known description of the parting of Hector and Andromache, originally stood as we have marked it in italics:—

Extends his eager arms to embrace his boy."

The line was subsequently altered to,

"Stretch'd his fond arms to seize the beautiful boy."

The epithet "beautiful" was afterwards erased, and "lovely" substituted for it, and the lines finally stood thus:—

"Thus having spoke, the illustrious chief of Troy
Stretch'd his fond arms to clasp the lovely boy."

There is another singular circumstance, of minor importance, connected with this manuscript, which will not escape observation, and that is, the occasional employment of a kind of print-hand. As it has been said that Pope taught himself to write by copying printed books, it was natural enough, that when writing with particular care, he should have made use of Roman or Italic characters, as the printer would call them, and thus assist in giving to the manuscript its singular character and appearance. Upon the whole, we regard these volumes as peculiarly valuable and important, and rejoice that they should have found their way into the national archives. "Such reliques," it was well observed by Dr. Johnson, when speaking of the Milton MSS. in the University of Cambridge, "show us how excellence is acquired; what we hope ever to do with ease, we must learn to do with diligence."

Amongst other notable curiosities (we have not space to give a particular description of everything worthy of examination) the visitor will find in the same table-case, a relic associated with some mournful historical recollections. It is the identical Book of Hours (a small manual of devotion) believed to have been used by Lady Jane Grey on the scaffold, and containing some notes in her own handwriting. Upon one of the pages appears the signature JANE DUDDLEY, in large, firm, legible characters.

Another object which will attract observation is a small volume of Prayers and Meditations, "composed originally in English by Queen Catherine Parr, and translated into Latin, French, and Italian, by Queen Elizabeth (when Princess), as a gift to Henry VIII., in her own handwriting." We have elsewhere spoken of Elizabeth's skill in penmanship, and of her claims to superior scholarship. It must be borne in mind that she was the pupil of Roger Ascham, who taught many illustrious persons the use of the pen. To write a "fair hand" was in those days esteemed, among the great of both sexes, no mean accomplishment; and it is evident from this volume, that Elizabeth was an apt pupil of the great master of the science of calligraphy. From the same renowned schoolmaster the illustrious princess also received instructions in the learned languages. King Edward VI. (who was likewise a pupil of Ascham's) was another excellent penman, and a volume of texts of scripture in his handwriting is exhibited among other curious relics in this case.

The other table-case in the manuscript department of the library is devoted to illuminated missals, &c., some of which are of extreme beauty. There are here two very remarkable manuscripts, in point of elaborate embellishment, which are said to have belonged to the historian Philippe de Comines. One is a copy of Froissart's Chronicles, and the other of Valerius Maximus. We can only pause to observe that the illuminated title-page of the latter volume is a perfect miracle of the art.

Having quitted the manuscript-room, we enter the noble apartment denominated the "King's Library," appropriated entirely to the collection of printed books, formed by King George III., and presented to the nation (as an inscription over the door informs us) by King George IV. According to some revelations in a recent number of the Quarterly Review, it is, however, hardly accurate to say presented, as it seems to have been pretty clearly understood by the royal donor at the time of the so-called presentation, that a pecuniary equivalent was to be given for the library. "It is," says the Museum Guide, "one of the most noble libraries known—remarkable not only for the judicious selection of the works, and the discriminating choice of the editions, but for the bibliographical peculiarities and rarity of the copies. The number of those on large paper deserves particular mention."

In the middle of this spacious room there are several glazed table-cases, appropriated to the exhibition of early specimens of typography, from this and other collections in the library. We begin with a selection of early Hebrew books, one of them produced in 1485, and remarkable as being the first book printed in Portugal; after which follow some of the earliest books printed in the Greek character, comprising the Greek Grammar of Lascaris, the first specimen of Greek typography, (printed at Milan, under the superintendence of a Greek named Demetrius, of Crete,) in the year 1476; the celebrated Florence Homer, printed in 1488, at the expense of two patriotic Florentine citizens; and the Fables of Æsop, printed at Milan, about 1480. The latter book is remarkable as being the first edition of the first Greek classic which proceeded from the printing-press; and in the same case we have a copy of the first Latin classic ever printed, being the first edition of Cicero de Officiis, printed at Mentz by Fust and Schoeffer in 1465. This work has been described as "one of the rarest and most beautiful specimens of typography in the world." The copy exhibited is printed on vellum, but on vellum and paper it is said to be equally scarce, and there are few works which the book-collector would pounce on with greater avidity, if a copy should haply present itself in some quarter where its value was unknown. At the latter end of the last century, it is related by Dr. Harwood, that "an old Scotch usher, somewhere in the purlieus of Moorfields, picked up for ONE SHILLING, this Editio Princeps of Cicero's Offices, and immediately repaired with it to the Earl of Oxford, who very generously rewarded the old gentleman for his knowledge of books, and for the distinction he had paid him." A second edition of this work, also on vellum, printed in 1466, is exhibited in the same case. Without confusing our readers too much with bibliographical details, we must also draw their attention to the first edition of Ovid, which, in a perfect form, is one of the rarest, if not the rarest, of the early editions of the classics. It is boldly asserted by Dibdin, that "'Ovid' defies possession, on his first appearance, in a perfect form. I repeat it," he continues, "a perfect copy of the Editio Princeps of Ovid, by Azzoguidi, 1471, folio, nowhere exists: in other words, its existence is unknown." The bibliographical critic seems to have been scarcely accurate in this most emphatic declaration; but Mr. Grenville (by whom the book was bequeathed) observes, in a note concerning it, that except this copy, which has been carefully collated, not one has been found perfect. The other six copies known to exist are every one of them more or less defective.

Amongst the notable works in the second case, on the same side of the library, we must draw attention to the splendid edition of Livy, printed at Rome, by Conrad Sweynheim and Arnold Pannartz (two Germans to whom the honour belongs of introducing the art of printing into Italy), about the year 1469. These printers were the first to adopt what has since been called the Roman character, in place of the Gothic or black letter. In addition to this welcome innovation, they introduced other improvements in their art, and were particularly distinguished for the excellence of their paper, ink, and types. Before establishing themselves at Rome, they had for some time exercised their glorious calling in the monastery of Subiaco, in the kingdom of Naples; and the work we have been noticing, which, according to Mr. Grenville's note, is the only copy known to exist on vellum, is supposed to have been expressly taken off for Pope Alexander VI., when Vice-Chancellor of the Roman see, and Governor of the monastery in which the printers had found an asylum. This remarkable volume, which was subsequently deposited in the Benedictine library at Milan, appears to have been one of the treasures dispersed over Europe by the French Revolution, which disturbed so many monastic collections. In 1815 it was purchased by Sir Mark Sykes for 903*l.* There are also in this case some of the most admired productions of the early Venetian press. In 1469, John and Vindelin de Spira, likewise natives of Germany, settled in Venice, and in the same year produced their first book, the Epistole Familiares of Cicero, which is here exhibited. Besides paying great attention to the correctness of their works, by securing the services of two learned men as correctors of the press, it is admitted that they also excelled in all the mechanical requirements of their art. Their type is remarkable for clearness, beauty, and symmetry. The visitor will also observe in this case a fine copy of Pliny's Natural History, on vellum, printed at Venice, by Jenson, in 1472. Nicolas Jenson was a Frenchman, and has been sometimes described as the first Venetian printer. The productions of his press are also much esteemed. A copy of the Latin translation of Euclid's Geometry, printed at Venice by Ratdolt, in 1482, may be also referred to here as being one of the earliest books printed with diagrams. The visitor will not fail to admire the beautiful appearance of this volume, which was a presentation copy to one of the Doges of Venice.

In the case opposite to the one we have been examining, our attention is invited to some select specimens of Italian typography in the 16th century. As most of these are from the Aldine press, it will not be improper for us to advert for a few moments to the personal history of the illustrious member of that renowned family who first practised the art of printing. Aldus—or rather Theobaldus Manutius (for the name which he assumed, and which has become so celebrated, was an abbreviation of his Christian name), was born about the year 1446. In addition to his other names he frequently assumed the appellation of Pius, from having been for some time tutor to Albertus Pius, a prince of the house of Carpi. The idea of becoming a printer was, it is said, first suggested to his mind during a visit which he paid with his noble pupil to “the phoenix of his age,” Pius of Mirandola. In the year 1489, he established himself at Venice, for the purpose of maturing and carrying out his design; and in 1494, he published an edition of the Greek poet Musæus, being his earliest work. Having married, in the year 1500, the daughter of Andrea d’Asola, he sedulously pursued his profession till the year 1506, when he was compelled to leave Venice, through the disordered state of public affairs. He afterwards returned, and entered into partnership with his father-in-law, with whom he carried on business with renewed assiduity, conferring, up to the day of his death, inestimable benefits on the republic of letters. We are indebted to Aldus for the introduction of the Italic or Aldine character, as it is still called, and also for a still more important innovation, that of printing the most valuable literary productions of the ancient world in a more portable and less expensive form than had been adopted before his time. “Whatever the great of ages past might seem to lose by this indignity, was more than compensated in the diffused love and admiration of their writings. ‘With what pleasure,’ says M. Renouard, ‘must the studious man, the lover of letters, have beheld these benevolent octavos, these Virgils and Horaces contained in one little volume, which he might carry in his pocket while travelling, or in a walk; which, besides, cost him hardly more than two of our francs, so that he could get a dozen of them for the price of one of those folios that had hitherto been the sole furniture of his library.’”¹

A copy of the Aldine Virgil (on vellum), printed in 1501, is exhibited in the case we are now examining, and is properly designated in the Guide as “the earliest attempt to produce cheap books.” It is really a very beautiful work, and is held in high estimation. We may say the same of the other productions of the Aldine press—the Horace, Juvenal, Martial, Catullus, Petrarch, Dante, &c. &c.—which are here presented to our notice, and will be regarded with veneration by every lover of books. In this case we also observed the first edition of Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso, printed at Ferrara, in 1516. The great popularity of this work at the time of its publication may be judged of by the fact, that no less than sixty editions were published in the 16th century. The first edition is on all hands acknowledged to be of extremely rare occurrence, and contains, we may remark, forty cantos, the remaining six being added in 1532. The first editions of the Divina Comedia of Dante, and of the Sonetti e Triomphi of Petrarch, must be also noticed. They are of much earlier date than the works of which we have been speaking, the former having been printed at Foligno, in 1472, and the latter by Spira, in 1470.

In the fourth table-case devoted to the exhibition of typographical rarities in the royal library, we observed some beautifully executed books of Hours, issued under ecclesiastical sanction, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Several bibliographical curiosities appear side by side with these, to which more than ordinary interest attaches. The one more particularly deserving of notice, is the first edition of Don Quixote, printed at Madrid in the year 1605. As a proof of the popularity of this remarkable production on its first appearance, it has been ascertained that another edition was called for at Madrid, in the same year, and two more elsewhere, viz. at Lisbon and at Valencia. Recollecting that the work of Cervantes has been pronounced to be “the greatest in the world as a book of entertainment,”—that it is the only book of that class which is read with almost equal interest by the denizens of every nation,—it is impossible to peruse without interest, or even without emotion, its simple title-page, as printed for the first time, during the life of the high-minded but unfortunate author: “El Ingenuo hidalgo Don Quixote de la Mancha. Compuesto por Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra.” Appropriately placed near the first edition of Don Quixote, the visitor will perceive the two earliest editions of the great Portuguese epic—the Lusiad by Camoens.

Upon quitting the King’s Library, the next room to which we are admitted is one of small dimensions, appropriated to the collection of volumes upon Natural History, (16,000 in number,) bequeathed by Sir Joseph Banks. From this apartment we pass into the large, or principal, room of the library, where we find many objects of interest awaiting our notice. In the centre of this room are two cases; the one on the left, principally devoted to early English Prayer Books, Liturgies, and Bibles; and that on the right, to the earliest productions of the English printing-press.

In the former case, the first volume which commands attention is the first edition of the Book of Common Prayer, printed in 1549. This is not the place for inquiring into the origin of our noble and expressive Liturgy, and for investigating the sources from which it was derived. The exquisite judgment of the compilers is shown in the use which they made of the ample materials bequeathed to them from remote antiquity, and the simple and forcible language in which they clothed these grand devotional exercises. In the act of Edward VI. by which the general use of the Liturgy is appointed, in place of other books tending to superstition and idolatry, it is aptly described as "an uniform, quiet, and godly order of common and open prayer . . . agreeable to the order of the Primitive Church," and much more comfortable unto the king's loving subjects than other diversity of service. The second Reformed Prayer Book, published in 1552, is also exhibited side by side with the first edition, and is opened at the page of the Litaun in which the following petition occurs, which was modified and altered to its present form, in the reign of Elizabeth: "From all sedicion and priuey conspiracie, from the tyrannie of the Byshop of Rome, and al his detestable enormities, frō all false doctrine and heresy, from hardnes of harte and contempe of thy worde and commaundemente; Good Lorde, deliuer us." A copy of the Salisbury Manual, "printed for the use of England, after the accession of Queen Mary, and the re-establishment of the Roman Catholic religion in this country," curiously illustrates the strife of creeds at this memorable period, and is appropriately exhibited with the early editions of the Reformed Liturgy.

The first complete edition of the Bible in the English language, is another work which must not be passed over without notice. This remarkable book is entitled, "The Bible; that is, the Holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of the Douche and Latyn into Englishe." It bears the date of 1535, and is generally supposed to have been printed at Zurich, by Christopher Froshover. This conjecture has been principally formed from the shape of the type, which is a kind of foreign secretary-gothic.¹ It is commonly known by the name of Coverdale's Bible, and contains a dedication, "Unto the moost victorious prynce, and our moost gracyous soveraygne lord, kynge Henry the eyghth, kynge of Englande and of France, lorde of Irelande, &c. defendour of the fayth, and under God the chiefe suppressor heade of the Church of Englande," which is signed with the venerable name of "Myles Coverdale." It has been related, that when Coverdale's translation was presented to the king, it was handed over to Gardiner, and other bishops, to be strictly examined. These ecclesiastics kept it so long, that Henry had to send for it. Upon its being re-delivered to him, he asked their opinion of the translation, and was answered that there were many faults in it. Not satisfied with this reply, he inquired whether there were any heresies to be found in it. The answer was, they had found none. Upon which, the sovereign gave vent to the declaration, "If there be no heresies, then, in God's name, let it go abroad among our people." Accordingly, in the injunctions to the clergy, published by Cromwell, as the king's viceregent in matters ecclesiastical, it was thereupon provided that in every parish church, a book of the whole Bible, both in Latin and English, should be deposited "in the quire, for every man that will to look and read thereon."

The demand for English Bibles having increased, another edition, distinguished as MATTHEWE'S BIBLE, (a copy of which, printed on straw-coloured paper, is exhibited in this case,) was published in 1537. Like the former impression, it was printed abroad, under the patronage of Cromwell. The real editor of this Bible was John Rogers, a native of Lancashire, the first Protestant martyr in Queen Mary's reign. He was burnt in Smithfield, February 4th, 1555. The name of Thomas Matthews is supposed to be altogether fictitious.

Previously to the publication of the whole Bible, portions of the Scriptures in English had been printed abroad. The first, and most remarkable, is the translation of the New Testament, by William Tyndale, (of which a fragment, bequeathed by the Right Hon. Thomas Grenville, is exhibited amongst these rare impressions of the English Scriptures,) printed at Cologne, in 1525. Subsequently in 1530, a translation of the Pentateuch, which would have been published earlier, but for an accident at sea, in which the unfortunate translator lost all his papers, was printed by Hans Luft, "at Marlborow, in the land of Hesse." In 1534, two other editions of Tyndale's Testament appear to have been published at Antwerp. An interesting copy of one of these, upon vellum, which formerly belonged to Queen Anne Boleyn, and was bequeathed to the Museum by the Rev. C. M. Cracherode, should be noticed, if only as associated with a name so intimately connected with the history of the English Reformation. To return to the complete versions of the English Bible, we must direct attention to the first edition of Cranmer's Bible, called also the Great Bible, "truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrue and Greke texts, by the dylygent studye of divers excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges;" and printed in 1539. Another edition, of which a fine copy on vellum is exhibited, (presented to Henry VIII. by his loving, faithful, and obedient subject, Anthony Marler, of London, "haberdassher,") followed in 1540. Both these editions have an engraved frontispiece, supposed to have been designed by the famous Hans Holbein. It represents, in the upper part, Henry VIII. upon his throne, delivering to the lords spiritual and temporal copies of the Holy Scriptures. In the middle part, Cranmer is represented on one side delivering the same book to the clergy, and Cromwell, on the other side, presenting it to the laity. At the bottom, the king is represented attending divine service, in his cross-barred pew, the priest praying, and the congregation turning towards the sovereign, and crying Vivat Rex. To complete this very interesting collection of English Bibles, the first edition of our present authorized version, printed at London, by R. Barker, in 1611, has a place allotted to it.

We have hitherto omitted to notice the two large volumes conspicuously displayed in the centre of this case. They belong respectively to the celebrated Polyglot Bible, edited by Dr. Brian Walton, and the Lexicon Heptaglotton, by Dr. E. Castell, designed as an accompaniment to that noble work. Walton's Polyglot is remarkable, amongst other things, for being the first book published in England by subscription. Every private assistance was rendered to the learned editor, during the progress of the work, and the undertaking was encouraged by Cromwell and the council of state, by contributions of public money and by allowing paper for its use to be imported free of duty. The first volume was published in 1654, and the sixth and last in 1657. Upon the accession of Charles II. the editor cancelled the two last leaves of his preface, in which he had suitably acknowledged the generosity of the Protector, and prefixed to some copies a dedication to the king. The impression is accordingly divided into what are called Republican and Loyal copies: the British Museum fortunately possessing one of each variety. Nine languages are used in this Polyglott; viz. Hebrew, Chaldee, Samaritan, Greek, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Persian, and Latin; but no single book is printed in all of them. Castell's Lexicon, which should accompany the Polyglott, is one of the most remarkable monuments of human industry afforded in the whole range of literature. For seventeen years, the poor author toiled at this great work from sixteen to eighteen hours each day, and supported at his own charge, seven Englishmen and seven foreigners, to assist him, who all died during its progress. He not only expended upon it all his own fortune, but having been compelled to borrow money for the completion of his undertaking, he had to petition Charles II. that a prison might not be the reward of his unparalleled sacrifices and exertions.

A very remarkable copy of another celebrated polyglot Bible is exhibited, (a volume being opened as a specimen,) in an upright case to the left of that we have been examining. This book, which has been denominated the eighth wonder of the world, is the Biblia Polyglotta, printed at Antwerp by Christopher Plantin, between the years 1569 and 1572. The copy in the Museum is of exceeding beauty, being printed on the finest vellum, and is further remarkable as having been presented by order of Philip II. of Spain, to the Duke of Alva for his services in the Netherlands. What those services were, the reader of history knows too well. To establish the policy of the remorseless bigot, who declared, "that he would rather have no subjects at all than have heretics for his subjects," the most unheard-of cruelties were perpetrated in the Low Countries by this savage instrument of a detestable court. In a few short years some of the most fertile provinces in Europe were converted into a desert; eighteen thousand victims were delivered over to the executioner; numbers fell in the field, and more than thirty thousand, who escaped the sword and scaffold, sought safety in exile. For such services it is curious enough to find the catholic king presenting his minister with a copy of the sacred Scriptures! A Latin inscription, setting forth the circumstances of the presentation, is printed upon a fly-leaf in the first volume.

The large glazed case opposite, on the right hand, (in the same room,) is devoted, as we have before intimated, to the earliest works of English printers. The collection of Cartons is remarkably rich and interesting, and commences with the "Recueil des Histoires de Troycs," in French, (his first work printed abroad,) to which the date of 1467 has been assigned. Underneath this is the same work in English, also printed abroad, (most probably at Cologne,) translated by Caxton himself, at the express request of his patroness, the Duchess of Burgundy. The first work printed in England, after Caxton had set up his press in Westminster Abbey, follows in due course. It is entitled "The Game and Playe of the Chesse: translated out of the French, and imprinted by William Caxton;" and was finished on the last day of March, 1474. A second edition of this work was afterwards published with woodcuts. We need not particularize the subsequent productions of the Caxton press, of which many fine impressions are here for the first time brought under public observation. Among them will be found the "Cronicles of England," imprinted "In thabbey of Westmynstre by London," the "Subtyl Hystories and Fables of Esope," with curious woodcuts, not devoid of character and spirit, the "Golden Legende," and Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. We may remark that these volumes are generally opened at some characteristic engraving or interesting passage, as in the instance of the Golden Legende, which contains the curious narrative of St. Thomas à Becket's parentage, and a wood engraving of his martyrdom.

In the same case are some of the productions of Pynson and Wynkyn de Worde: nor must we omit to mention that very singular production of the early printing-press, called the "Book of St. Alban's," a treatise of Hawking, Hunting, &c. printed in the Benedictine Monastery of St. Alban's, in 1480, and supposed to have been written by Dame Juliana Berners, prioress of the Nunnery of Sopewell, near St. Alban's. As a specimen of the style and matter of this work, and of the intelligence of the period, we quote the following piece of heraldry, which appears amongst other equally singular passages in this antique treatise, or rather collection of treatises. "Of the offspring of the gentilman Jafeth come Abraham, Moyses, Aron, and the Profetys, and also the Kyng of the right lyne of Mary, of whom that Gentilman Jhesus was born, very God and Man. After his Manhode, kyng of the land of Jude and Jues. Gentilman by his Moder Mary, Prynce of Cote Armure," &c.

But we feel the time has well-nigh arrived for bringing our pilgrimage to a close, and that it is necessary for us to economize the remainder of the space allotted to our rambling observations. We must therefore supplicate the reader, if not over fatigued, to accompany us into the western rooms of the library, in which are exhibited several literary curiosities to which, before parting, we must invite his attention. The first small case we arrive at, in our progress through these rooms, is devoted to book-rarities, illustrated with the manuscript notes and autographs of distinguished men of letters. Among them are the autographs of the learned Bentley on an edition of Horace, and of Milton on a copy of Aratus; the corrections made by Sir Walter Scott in a proof sheet of Paul's Letters to his Kinsfolk; and a copy of "Ben Jonson his Volpone or the Foxt," 1607, with the following note in the great playwright's handwriting on a fly-leaf facing the title-page: "To his loving father and worthy friend Mr. John Florio; the ayde of the Muses, Ben Jonson seals this testimony of friendship and love." The greatest curiosity, however, in this case, is a copy of "The Essayes, or morall, politike, and millitarie discourses of Lo: Michaele de Montaigne," translated into English by Florio, with the autograph of WILLIAM SHAKSPERE. Respecting the authenticity of this signature, there is now scarcely any question, and the contents of the volume, as observed by Sir Frederick Madden, (who has written an interesting pamphlet on the subject,) come in aid, and add to the interest of the autograph, whilst attesting its genuineness by showing that Shakspeare must have been well acquainted with the work on which it appears. One remarkable passage indeed is quoted by Sir Frederick, from the Tempest, which seems to have been copied almost word for word from Florio's Montaigne. It occurs in the first scene of the second act, where the following dialogue takes place between Gonzalo, Antonio, and Sebastian after their escape from the vessel:

Gonzalo. Had I plantation of this isle, my lord—

Antonio. He'd sow it with nettle-seed—

Sebastian. Or docks, or mallows—

Gonzalo. And were the king of it, what would I do?

Sebastian. 'Scape being drunk for want of wine.

Gonzalo. I' the commonwealth, I would by contraries Execute all things: for no kind of traffic Would I admit; no name of magistrate; Letters should not be known; no use of service,

Of riches, or of poverty; no contracts, Successions; bound of land, tillth, vineyard none;

No use of metal, corn, or wine, or oil;

No occupation; all men idle, all;

And women too, but innocent and pure:

No sovereignty;—

Sebastian. And yet he would be king on't.

The corresponding passage of Montaigne, is in the following words. He is speaking of a newly discovered country, to which he gives the name of Antarctic France. "It is a nation, would I answer Plato, that hath no kind of traffike, no knowledge of letters, no intelligence of numbers, no name of magistrate, nor of politike superiority; no use of service, of riches, or of poverty; no contracts, no successions, no dividences; no occupation, but idle; no respect of kindred, but common; no apparell but naturall; no manuring of lands; no use of wine, corn, or muttle. The very words that import lying, falsehood, treason, dissimulations, covetousness, envie, detraction, and pardon were never heard of amongst them." But whilst it was evidently Shakspeare's aim to convey a satire on Utopias, it is worthy of remark, (and we take the liberty of again quoting from Sir Frederick's pamphlet,) "that in the original, Montaigne is speaking seriously of the newly-discovered country of Brazil, where Villegaignon first landed in 1555. Malone infers with great probability, that it was from the perusal of this chapter that Shakspeare was led to make an uninhabited island the scene of his Tempest, and from the title 'Of the Caniballes,' as it stands in Florio, he has evidently by transposition (as remarked by Dr. Farmer) formed the name of his man-monster Caliban." To return to this interesting copy of the first English translation of Montaigne, we may remark, that several Latin sentences are written on the page containing the autograph, and on the fly-leaf at the end of the volume, but they are clearly in a more recent hand and by a later pen.

The second case we have to notice is appropriated to the early editions of eminent English authors. We have here the first edition of Izaak Walton's Angler, with its characteristic title-page: "The Compleat Angler, or the contemplative man's recreation: being a discourse of fish and fishing not unworthy the perusal of most anglers—Simon Peter said, I go a fishing; and they said, We also will go with thee." Of Shakspeare's Venus and Adonis, two editions are exhibited, the first (printed in 1602) being of extreme rarity. The first edition of "Shake-speares Sonnets, (1609,) never before imprinted," is another rare and interesting relic. A still more valuable and more highly-prized production is the first collected edition of Mr. William Shakspeare's Comedies, Histories, and Tragedies, printed in 1623, with a portrait of the author, accompanied by the following lines, printed in a large clear type, in the centre of the leaf facing the title-page:—

TO THE READER.

This Figure, that thou here seest put,

It was for gentle Shakspeare cut;

Wherein the Grauer had a strife

With Nature, to out-doo the life:

O, could he but have drawn his wit

As well in brasse, as he hath hit

His face: the Print would then surpass

All, that was ever writ in brasse.

But, since he cannot, Reader, looke

Not on his Picture, but his booke.—B. 1.

It is well known that this first issue of Shakspeare's collected plays was printed under the superintendence of Heminge and Condell, two of his dramatic associates. In their dedication of the work to the Earls of Pembroke and Montgomery, the editors only modestly claim for themselves the credit of publishing in a collective form the immortal productions of an author who never troubled himself about posthumous fame. "We have but collected them," they say, "and done an office to the dead to procure his orphans guardians, without ambition either of self-profit or fame: only to keep the memory of so worthy a friend and fellow alive as was our Shakspeare." Of this valuable work there are altogether four copies in the Museum Library.

Another first edition worthy of particular notice is that of Milton's Paradise Lost, described in the title-page as "a poem written in ten books," London, 1667; this being the original division of the work. It is said that no less than five title-pages (including the first) were printed before the impression was sold off. In such an age it was not to be expected that such a work would obtain a speedy popularity; and a notable instance of the perverse judgment passed on it by some of Milton's literary contemporaries is afforded us in the well-known criticism of Waller, who thus announced its first appearance: "The old blind schoolmaster, John Milton, hath published a tedious poem on the 'Fall of Man;' if its length be not considered as its merit, it has no other."

In the third case, at which we arrive as we rapidly proceed through these rooms, are contained some interesting autographs of eminent foreign poets and critics. There is a small volume here upon which many sentimental observations might be made,—the Poesie di Vittoria Colonna, printed in 1538, with the autograph of Michelangelo Buonarroti. Vittoria Colonna was the wife of the Marquis of Pescara, who died of the wounds he had received in the battle of Pavia. After her husband's death,—young, beautiful, and accomplished,—she withdrew herself from the world, and lamented in solitude her grievous bereavement. Endowed with genius of the highest order, and with a strength and gravity of mind rarely met with in her sex, she poured out her soul in poetry; the productions of her muse being for the most part of a serious and sacred character. For this pure and noble-minded woman Michael Angelo conceived a sincere affection, and although she had pledged herself never to wed again, she entertained for him a feeling of warm regard. He addressed to her many poems, instinct with the spirit of ardent Platonic adoration, which remind us of his great poetical idol, Petrarch. There are few love-stories more interesting than this, and the volume of Vittoria Colonna's poems, in which the great artist-poet has written his name, may be well regarded as a sacred relic. The volume No. 5, in the same case, is also rather a curious one. It is entitled "An Essay upon the civil wars of France. . . and also upon the epic poetry of the European nations, from Homer down to Milton. By M. de Voltaire, 1727." On the title-page is the following inscription in the author's own handwriting: "to St. Austons from his most humble servant Voltaire." This book was written in English by the French philosopher. It was never reprinted in its original dress, but being afterwards re-written in French, it is included in the general collection of his works. Another very interesting work appears in the next case; viz., a copy of the German Bible, printed in 1541, which was successively the property of Luther and Melancthon, both of whom have enriched it with manuscript notes.

Before we quit the library, we pause to notice a small selection of Proclamations, four in number;—the first by King Charles II. ordering the suppression of the "Defensio pro populo Anglicano" and the "Iconoclastes" of John Milton; the second, the order of the Council of State, appointing Cromwell Lord Protector; the third, a proclamation offering a reward for the apprehension of the Pretender Prince James, if he should attempt to land in England; and the fourth, a proclamation by Prince Charles, styling himself prince of Wales, offering a reward for the apprehension of King George II. We need not enlarge on the historical value and interesting character of these documents. It is also proper to call attention to the many important works connected with the discovery of America, contained in the case No. 5. Amongst these is the celebrated letter of Columbus, written eight months after his discovery, and translated into Latin by Aliauder de Cosco.

VISIT TO HOWE'S CAVE.

On the morning of August 7th, 1850, I was one of a party of eight gentlemen who rode over from Sharon-Springs to Cobleskill, to visit Howe's Cave. The region through which our road lay presented few features of interest beyond the fact that, as we approached the end of our ride, we noticed that the fields were indented with frequent circular holes, partly filled up with stones and soil. The fancy was expressed that the country had here suffered an attack similar to the small-pox, and had come off with a pitted face. A rude gate-way, with "Howe's Cave" painted on its front, drew us aside from the main road, and in a few moments we alighted at the house of the great cave-explorer. We found him a pleasant, well-informed Yankee, familiar with the leading facts of geology, proud even to idolatry of his subterranean property, and with a tinge of bat-and-owliness in his visage, which betrayed that he was more at home in doing the hospitalities of his cave than those of his hotel. We had left Sharon before breakfast, and our first item of preparation for the day's work was to fortify ourselves internally with a heterogeneous three-meals-in-one, which opened with coffee and cucumbers and ended with blackberries, cream-cake, and custard-pie. Howe next threw open a wardrobe containing jackets and trowsers of coarse sacking, made so as to button close to the person. They had already seen much underground service, and were thickly plastered with Stygian mud. We now began to catch the spirit of our adventure, and throwing aside our broad-cloth and linen, we plunged into the over-hauls. A cheap leathern skull-cap finished the uniform, and but for a sprinkling of spectacles and pallor, we might have been easily mistaken for a platoon of jolly hod-carriers. It was a matter of lament that we could not have then stood for a daguerreotype, and thus furnished our wives and sweethearts with a new study in the "Philosophy of Clothes."

We were ready now to move, and each armed himself with a tin lamp of the petticoat species, and half a dozen Lucifers, which he was cautioned to keep dry. The mouth of the grotto is not over fifty paces from the house. Eight years ago, when it was first discovered, the opening was so small that visitors were forced to forego the use of their legs, and for a considerable distance to imitate the locomotion of Eve's seducer. Since then, the entrance has been so enlarged by blasting and removing the black limestone, that one walks in erect. The first feeling is that of exhilaration. It is like entering a new world without undergoing the pangs of death. A cool and delicious oxygen is welcomed to the lungs. The sound of a distant water-fall is elaborated into exquisite music by the echoing arches. As you push forward, the light of your lamp seems to be thrown back upon you by a wall of impenetrable blackness. With the solid rock on either side of you, above and beneath, your desire to know what lies in front soon rises to a delightful eagerness for discovery that would neither stop to see nor to fancy a danger. The general features of the cave are soon understood. By some convulsion of nature, which happened far back in the waste of unhistoric centuries, the rocky hills drained by the Cobleskill were rent and fissured in many places. One of these fissures now forms what is called Howe's Cave. A stream of water, often swollen to a torrent, has been rushing through its entire length for uncounted ages, wearing it deeper and broader; while the lime-water, dripping through its broken roof, has displayed an amazing ingenuity and patience in the slow work of forming stalactites and stalagmites. In dry seasons, the first three miles of the cavern are traversed with comparative ease. A foot-path has been made along-side the stream, which is crossed, when necessary, on plank-bridges, or by leaping. Even ladies not unfrequently leave their autographs eight miles from the entrance, without meeting with alarm or over-fatigue.

Our visit to the cave was under circumstances less propitious. A heavy rain had fallen the night before, and a second shower commenced at the time of our entrance, which continued from two to three hours. It was remarked by Howe that the cave-stream was unusually high. In several places it had already overflowed the path. Especially was this observable in a narrow passage called the Harlem Tunnel, about a mile from the entrance. Yet this caused no uneasiness in any one of our party, and if our guide was disturbed, he kept his alarm to himself. Most likely he felt no alarm; for the moment we parted from the day-light, he appeared a new and different creature. Out of his cave he was awkward and uneasy, like a sailor on pavements; but no sooner were its rocky walls about him than he straightened into a commanding presence, and gave us full assurance that he was at home. The sound of the unseen cataract came to his ears like that of the trumpet to the war-steed. With lithic limbs and unhesitating step, he led the way to the remote regions of this inner world.

A mile or so beyond the Tunnel brought us to a spot where the loose rocks have dammed the stream, and formed a deep, long pond, which has been appropriately named the Stygian Lake. Our guide now put on a new character. "Portitor ille, Charon." Seizing his ferry-pole, he sprang into a long, low, slimy boat, and beckoned us to follow. We could now help ourselves to a reason why his chin was so badly neglected; why his eyes glared so strangely in the dismal-lamplight; why his back was so partial to a sordid garment. It was that he might personate the Stygian ferryman, so as to fill out the description of Virgil:

"Cui plurima mento
Canities inculca jacet: stant lumina flammâ;
Sordidus ex humeris nodo dependet amictus."

The infernal craft parted from its moorings with six hearty, flesh-eating ghosts for passengers. Six, I say; for already two of our number, having either satiated their curiosity or exhausted their courage, had slyly slipped away and returned. We stood erect in the boat, as it moved over the sluggish waters. Our Charon soon lighted a flambeau, and holding it aloft, disclosed a rapid succession of sights which at once amazed and delighted. The Cavern was here spanned with roof-work of every conceivable pattern, and the whole was studded with countless stalactites, each differing from another in size or form:

"From its curved roof the mountain's frozen tears,
Like snow, or silver, or long diamond spires,
Hang downward, raining forth a doubtful light."

Now we passed beneath a flat ceiling, so low that we could grasp the pendent limbicles with the hand. Now there opened in the roof so high an arch, that the flame of a torch vainly strove to reach its key-stone. Here the limbicles were round and ribbed, like the rattlesnake's tail; there they had shaped themselves into graceful festoons, mocking the upholsterer's skill. Even animate creatures were imitated with startling accuracy. Infant crocodiles were weeping calcareous tears, and mute birds were roosting on the branches of trees that grew downward, like shadows thrown from the steep bank of a river. On this side stood Lot's wife petrified in the act of taking the prohibited retrospect. Yonder, the Phrygian Niobe, "whom, like clasping ivy, a stony shroud overgrew, moistened the rocks with her ceaseless weeping."

The Stygian Lake may be half a mile in length, and is soon crossed. Beyond it stretches an immense chamber, called Musical Hall. Its roof is vaulted and groined, like that of a cathedral. Yet no cathedral was ever constructed with the power of playing such fantastic tricks with sound. Our Protean guide here became ambitious, and, like Salmoncus of old, undertook to rival the thunders of Jupiter. His firmament was comparatively narrow, and the fulminating machinery somewhat primitive, but there was nothing contemptible in the report of his thunderbolts. A heavy plank he raised on end, and throwing his weight upon it, brought it in sudden contact with the rocky floor. The nearest arches at once caught up the sound, split it into ten thousand fragments, multiplied them into each other until they became a deafening peal, cuffed them this way and then the other way, till they deepened into the angry bellow of an earthquake, and sent them through the long-drawn aisles of immense apartments, until every rock in those miles of cavern was grafted with a voice of thunder. We stood still with astonishment. We had not a syllable to utter; our small voices were quenched within us by the oceans of thunder that submerged us. If Jupiter Tonans could have found any fault with the report of that fulminating plank, his idea of good thunder must have been different from ours.

A second experiment in acoustics was not less brilliant. Howe had brought a mysterious box under his arm, shaped like a baby's coffin, from which he now took out a violin, and resigning the insignia of Jove, he stepped abruptly into the character of Ole Bull. Howe the thunderer had petrified us into speechlessness, converted us into momentary fossils: but Howe the fiddler re-executed the old Orphean feat, and made the human rocks caper about him, in wild excitement. His music went to the heels quicker than champagne ever went to the head. It thrilled along the tendon Achilles like electric influence. The chattering of those grave geologists up and down that sepulchral hall, by the dim, weird light of those six petticoat-lamps—"pars magna fui"—was a sight to see! And the music! that was an audience never to be forgotten. By the magic power of the place, the humble instrument was transformed into something divine. It was no longer constructed of wood, and glue, and catgut. It was now a thing of soul, and living nerve, and quick intelligence. Close your eyes, and the player was no longer Lester Howe, the cavern guide, but Ole Bull, the wild and wondrous Norwegian: more than this: the ear was misled not with the skill of a single artist, but a thousand Ole Bulls woke the melody of a thousand instruments. Ole Bull made a mistake when he undertook to dramatize the Falls of Niagara with his fiddle-bow. He should have tried his hand at Howe's Cave. Here was a fit subject within the grasp of his genius; and the very place was one that would have exalted, reduplicated, and idealized his genius. I can imagine nothing more sublime and beautiful in harmony than a concert in Musical Hall by the mighty artist of Norway.

But we have still four miles of hard walking before us, and we must not tarry. Soon after leaving the boat we are confronted by a pile of immense angular rocks, thrown loosely together, and rising upward of a hundred feet. This difficult pass is inevitable. We can neither go beneath it nor around it. We are obliged to pick our upward way cautiously and slowly. Every step is a study; every foot of advance is a conquest. For the rocks are wet and slippery. They are intersticed with yawning chasms. A misstep might end in the splash of a bruised body deep down where the sullen waters complain in the dark. It was a picturesque sight to see our party toiling in a line over these weary rocks, each surrounded by his little space of lamp-light. Seldom was a word spoken. Now and then a loose rock would slip from its perch, and after bounding from cliff to cliff, with a succession of harsh grating thunders, would find its wet grave in the current below. We began now to appreciate the greatness of our undertaking. The excitement of the first three miles had evaporated; an enlarged conception of the grandeur of the cavern superadded itself to our sense of weariness, and made us solemn and mute. It was in one sense, a Sabbath-day's journey—that solemn climbing of the "Rocky Mountains!" The sermon preached by the stones, and the compact darkness, and the funeral waters, told in the words, but with more than the eloquence of Massillon, that "God only is great!"

At the summit of these rocks was a platform—welcome to our tired feet—which served as an anteroom to various side-chambers, each curious and peculiar. These we had not time to visit.

The sermon of the rocks did not deter us from violating the sanctuary in which it was preached. We had come to geologize as well as to adore, and had brought our hammers and baskets with us, as well as our hearts and ears. We turned iconoclasts in a twinkling, and broke the images of the temple to which but a moment before we were paying devout homage. We atoned dearly for the sacrilege. While we were wasting the time in cool speculation over the anatomy of a shattered stalactite, the angry waters beneath us were gathering for revenge.

The descent of the Rocky Mountains again brought us along-side the Styx. By this time we were thirsty as well as tired. The water was cool, clear, and inviting. Like Gideon's picked men of old, we lapped of it with the tongue, as a dog lappeth, putting the hand to the mouth.

Howe hurried us onward, for reasons which we afterward understood, and we soon reached the "Winding Way," which, on several accounts, is the most singular locality in the cavern. It is formed by a narrow fissure in the solid lime-stone, and has a smooth dry under-foot. The sides of the fissure are thickly and deeply indented. The indents answer to each other like the teeth of a steel-trap, so that while passing through it, one keeps dodging from the right to the left, and back again ceaselessly. There is no visible roof to the Winding Way; but a lamp held over the head discloses, here and there, a rocky wedge, caught in the teeth of this stupendous trap, and threatening ruin to those beneath. A sight of one of these wedges, apparently just tottering to its fall, quickened our steps with something like a general shudder. Beyond this passage, there is an immense circular room, so lofty, it is said, that a rocket has been thrown up without reaching its ceiling. The entrance to this rotunda was so nearly filled with water that our guide thought it imprudent to attempt going further. Thinking, doubtless, that students ought to be fond of meditation, he bade us be seated in a circle, and to forbear talking. He then extinguished the lamps, and for five eternal, voiceless minutes, we were entombed in a darkness so profound, that one of the party ventured the opinion that charcoal would make a white mark! We were six miles from the sunshine, and so pleasant was the re-lighting of the lamps, that we showered blessings on the man who invented Lucifer-matches.

At this point the ceiling of the cave was quite low, and covered with autographs and classic symbols, done in lamp-smoke, which showed that undergraduates had been here before us, and that their college feelings had survived the difficulties of the way. Here, as elsewhere, the characters ΣΦ, ΑΔΦ, ΧΨ, ΨΥ, were trying hard to out-smoke each other; and here, as elsewhere, it was hard to tell which carried the night. These Greek characters were a tough mystery to Howe. They troubled him more than geology. He would have them repeated, once and again. I could notice that his lips were busy the while, as if he was trying to fix them in his memory.

Our steps were turned toward the daylight. We had soon wriggled through the Winding Way, and were near the further base of the Rocky Mountains. Before commencing the ascent, our guide told us that the water had risen twelve inches. He had climbed but a few rods, when a dull splurge, a cry, and a struggle in the current arrested his attention. "Hold on, guide! and help your friends. S. has lost his lamp!" Howe turned back with hasty strides, evidently vexed and alarmed. His agitation and words convinced us of what we were before ignorant, that our return was attended with real danger. "The man who drops his lamp is a madman. It should be the last thing surrendered in such a fix as ours." S. needed his lamp more than any other one of the party. He was a pale short-sighted student from New York, whose steps had seldom encountered any worse impediment than a crack in the flag-stones of Broadway. He was now taken under Howe's immediate care in the van of the party, and again we moved upward. The summit was safely passed, and the hither side of the rocks was nearly left behind, when there was another splurge, a cry, and a struggle. This time our oracle in geology had fallen—he of the hammer and the carpenter-bag full of rocks. The image-breaker of the sanctuary was getting his retribution. He remembered that a lamp was worth more than a limb, and by clinging to the former both were disabled. He held fast to his lamp, but could not keep it from the water. It was quenched, and filled with oil's inveterate enemy. His knee struck upon a sharp cliff, and the wound was severe. Matters were now growing serious. There were two lampless adventurers, where light was literally life; one half-blind and the other a cripple. Howe found it easier to get out of his patience, than out of his cavern. He gave us a round scolding; bade us keep close together, and be-brother each other as well as we could with light and assistance.

At the hither base of the rocks, it was necessary to cross the stream. Howe declared that the water had risen two feet, and on feeling for his plank-bridge, it had been swept away by the current. There was no time to lose. He gave a spring and landed on the opposite bank, prostrate in a soft bed of mud. We followed as well as we could; some falling into the water, and all getting goodly bemired. Then followed a mile of dreary and tedious pilgrimage. Sometimes, like Christian in the Valley of Shadows, we were walking upon a path with the edge turned up, and deep chasms on either side; sometimes we were crossing narrow bridges with two feet of rushing water above them; sometimes we were clinging to the sides of precipices, like Shakspeare's samphire-gatherers, feeling that sense of danger which sublimates the breathless moment.

It was a glad time when we reached the Stygian Lake, and Charon's occupation came again. The old mud-scow was a floating palace. For the world, we would not founder so precious a craft: so we threw ourselves heels uppermost to drain our boots. Then we sprang aboard, and as the boat parted her moorings, we all sang the Canadian boat-song:

"Row, brothers, row; the stream runs fast;
The rapids are near, and day-light is past."

The song appeared to have been written for the very place, and the very hour. As our voices rose wild and strong, mingled in the roar of the near water-fall, and were sent back to us from a thousand echoing vaults and secret chambers, our hardships were all forgotten, and the voyage was one of un-mixed enjoyment.

Our spirits kept their elevation until we came in sight of the Harlem Tunnel. This passage is half a mile long, and not more than five feet square. On entering the cave, we had passed the Tunnel on stones thinly covered with water. Now the stream had risen so high that there was only a foot of space between its surface and the roof of the passage. Howe drew near to the opening, and so held his lamp that we could clearly see the torrent rushing through the Tunnel. "There," said he, "we must either wade through that passage, or retrace our steps and pass the night on the summit of the Rocky Mountains." The water was fast rising, and in twenty minutes would fill the Tunnel. Before us were a warm supper, dry bedding, cheerful day-light, wives and sweethearts. Behind us were darkness, hunger, cold, wet rocks, and a fearful looking-for of death by flood or precipice. We gave the "onward" word, and followed our leader. The passage was well-nigh a tragic affair, yet we managed to extract fun from it, notwithstanding. We had only to look well after our lights, avoid butting the rocks with our foreheads, and the rest was simple wading. The passage of the Tunnel was the last of our difficulties. We drained our boots, and pressed forward without obstruction. We might have been a hundred rods from the entrance, when our eyes were greeted with a soft, pale-blue light, which grew larger, and whiter, and warmer, as we advanced, until our lamps became dim, and we were again bathed with the glad and yellow sunshine. We emerged from the earth's bowels just in time to see the sun go down. A recent shower had hung the forest-trees with heavy water-beads, and below us rolled the Cobleskill with a swollen and turbid flood. The next two hours were filled up with the shifting of garments, the restoring of complexions damaged by lamp-smoke, the drying of watches and bank-bills, and the quenching of hunger. Dr. E——'s elbow was glad to be released from a basket of Aragonite, weighing some fifty pounds, which he had brought from the Winding Way. Howc held a special thanksgiving at his fiddle's escape from the under-ground deluge; while there lingered in all hearts

Of wearied ocean, when the storm is gone."

In one of his well-known odes, Horace celebrates his escape from the wiles of a treacherous mistress, by saying that he has "suspended dripping garments to the potent god of the deep." I have done likewise. I had the simplicity to believe that there could be nothing deceitful, or dangerous, or unamiable about a cavern. I have a shirt and a pair of pantaloons that will prove the contrary: "Suspendi uida vestimenta."

NATA, CHELSEÆ INCEPTVS.

"Nulla dies sine linea."

April, 1534.

A HEAVIER charge than either of y^e above hath been got up, concerning the wicked woman of Kent, with whom they accuse him of having tampered, that, in her pretended revelations and rhapsodies, she might utter words against the king's divorce. His name hath, indeed, been put in the bill of attainder; but, out of favour, he hath been granted a private hearing, his judges being, the new archbishop, the new chancellor, his grace of Norfolk, and Master Cromwell.

He tells us that they stuck not to y^e matter in hand, but began cunningly enow to sound him on y^e king's matters; and finding they could not shake him, did proceed to threats, which, he told 'em, might well enow scare children, but not him, and as to his having provoked his grace the king to sett forth in his book aught to dishonour and fetter a good Christian, his grace himself well knew the book was never shewn him save for verbal criticism when y^e subject matter was completed by the makers of y^e same, and that he had warned his grace not to express soe much submission to the pope. Whereupon they with great displeasure dismissed him, and he took boat for Chelsea with mine husband in such gay spiritts, that Will, not having been privy to what had passed, concluded his name to have beene struck out of y^e bill of attainder, and congratulated him thereupon soe soone as they came aland, saying, "I guess, father, all is well, seeing you thus merry."

"It is indeed, son Roper," returns father steadilie, repeating thereupon, once or twice, this phrase, "All is well."

Will, somchow mistrusting him, puts the matter to him agayn.

"You are then, father, put out of the bill?"

"Out of the bill, good fellow?" repeats father, stopping short in his walk, and regarding him with a smile that Will sayth was like to break his heart. . . "Wouldst thou know, dear son, why I am so joyfull? In good faith, I have given the devil a foul fall, for I have with those lords gone so far, as that without great shame I can ne'er go back. The first step, Will, is the worst, and that's taken."

And so, to the house, with never another word, Will being smote at the heart.

But, this forenoon, deare Will comes running in to me, with joy all bright, and tells me he hath just heard from Cromwell that father's name is in sooth struck out. Thereupon, we go together to him with the news. He taketh it thankfully, yet composedly, saying, as he lays his hand on my shoulder, "In faith, Meg, quod differtur non aufertur." Seeing me somewhat stricken and overborne, he sayth, "Come, let's leave good Will awhile to the company of his own select and profitable thoughts, and take a turn together by the water side."

Then closing his book, which I marked was Plato's Phædon, he steps forth with me into the garden, leaning on my shoulder, and pretty heavilie too. After a turn or two in silence, he lightens his pressure, and in a bland, peaccifying tone commences Horace his tenth ode, book second, and goes through the first fourteen or fifteen lines in a kind of lulling monotone; then takes another turn or two, ever looking at the Thames, and in a stronger voice begins his favourite

"Justum, ac tenacem propositi virum Non civium ardor, etc."

on to

"Impavidum ferient ruinæ;"

—and lets go his hold on me to extend his hand in sine, free action. Then, drawing me to him agayn, presentlie murmurs, "I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with y^e glory which shall be revealed in us. . . Oh no, not worthy to be compared. I have lived; I have laboured; I have loved. I have lived in them I loved; laboured for them I loved; loved them for whom I laboured; my labour has not been in vayn. To love and to labour is the sum of living, and yet how manie think they live who neither labour nor love. Agayn, how manic labour and love, and yet are not loved; but I have beene loved, and my labour has not been in vayn. Now, the daye is far spent, and the night forecloseth, and the time draweth nigh when man resteth from his labours, even from his labours of love; but still he shall love and he shall live where the Spiritt sayth he shall rest from his labours, and where his works do follow him, for he entereth into rest through and to Him who is Life, and Light, and Love."

Then looking stedfastlie at the Thames, "How quietlie," sayth he, "it flows on! This river, Meg, hath its origin from seven petty springs somewhither amongst y^e Gloucestershire hills, where they bubble forthe unnoted save by the herd and hind. Belike, they murmur over the pebbles prettily enough; but a great river, mark you, never murmurs. It murmured and babbled too, 'tis like, whilst only a brook, and brawled away as it widened and deepened and chafed agaynst obstacles, and here and there got a fall, and splashed and made much ado, but ever kept running on towards its end, still deepning and widening; and now towards the close of its course look you how swift and quiet it is, running mostly between flats, and with the dear blue heaven reflected in its face." . . .

'Twas o' Wednesdayer was a weck, we were quietly taking our dinner, when, after a loud and violent knocking at y^e outer door, in cometh a poursuivant, and summoneth father to appear next daye before y^e commissioners, to take y^e newly coined oath of supremacy. Mother utters a hasty cry, Bess turns white as death, but I, urged by I know not what suddain impulse to con the new comer's visage narrowly, did with eagerness exclaim, "Here's some jest of father's; 'tis only Dick Halliwell!"

Whereupon, father burst out a laughing, hugged mother, called Bess a silly puss, and gave Halliwell a groat for 's payus. Now, while some were laughing, and others taking father prettily sharplie to task for soe rough a crank, I fell a musing, what e^d be y^e drift of this, and coule only surmise it mighte be to harden us beforehand, as 'twere, to what was sure to come at last. And the preapprehension of this soe belaboured my already o'erburthened spirits, as that I was fayne to betake myself to y^e nurserie, and lose alle thought and reflection in my little Bill's prettily ways. And, this not answering, was forct to have recourse to prayer; then, leaving my closett, was able to return to y^e nurserie, and forget myself awhile in the mirth of the infants.

Hearing voyces beneath y^e lattice, I lookt forthe, and behelde his Grace of Norfolk (of late a strange guest) walking beneath y^e window in earnest converse with father, and, as they turned about, I hearde him say, "By the mass, master More, 'tis perilous striving with princes. I could wish you, as a friend, to incline to the king's pleasure; for, indignatio principis mors est."

"Is that all?" says father; "why then there will be onlie this difference between your grace and me, that I shall die to-daye, and you to-morrow;"—which was the sum of what I caught.

Next morning, we were breaking our fast with peacefullnesse of heart, on y^e principle that sufficient for the daye is the evill thereof, and there had bene a wordy war between our two factions of the Neri and Bianchi, Bess having defalked from y^e man-cheteers on y^e ground that black bread sweetened the breath and settled the teeth, to the no small triumph of the cob loaf party; while Daisy, persevering at her crusts, sayd, "No, I can cleave to the rye bread as steddilie as anie among you, but 'tis vayn of father to maintain that it is as toothsome as a manchet, or that I eat it to whiten my teeth, for thereby he robs self-deniall of its grace."

Father, strange to say, seemed taken at vantage, and was pausing for a retort, when Hobson coming in and whispering somewhat in his ear, he rose suddainlie and went forthe of the hall with him, putting his head back agayn to say, "Rest ye alle awhile where ye be," which we did, uneasilie enow. Anon he returns, brushing his beaver, and says calmie, "Now, let's forthe to church," and clips mother's arm beneath his owne and leads the way. We follow as soon as we can, and I, listing to him more than to y^e priest, did think I never hearde him make response more composedlie, nor sing more lustilie, by the which I founde myself in stouter heart. After prayers, he is shriven, after which he saunters back with us to the house, then brisklie turning on his hecl, cries to my husband, "Now, Will, let's toward, lad," and claps the wicket after him, leaving us at t'other side without so much as casting back a parting look. Though he evermore had bene avised to let us companie him to the boat, and there kiss him once and agayn or ever he went, I know not that I s^d have thoughte much of this, had not Daisy, looking after him keenly, exclaymed somewhat shortlie as she turned in doors, "I wish I had not uttered that quip about the cobloaf."

Lord, how heavilie sped y^e day! The house, too big now for its master's diminished retinue, had yet never hitherto seemed lonsome; but now a somewhat of dreary and dreadfull, inexpressible in words, invisible to the eye, but apprehended by the inner sense, filled the blank space alle about. For the first time, everie one seemed idle; not only disinclined for businesse, but as though there were something unseemlie in addressing one's self to it. There was nothing to cry about, nothing to talk over, and yet we alle stooede agaze at each other in groups, like the cattle under y^e trees when a storm is at hand. Mercy was the first to start off. I held her back and said, "What is to do?" She whispered, "Pray." I let her arm drop, but Bess at that instant comes up with cheeks as colourless as parchment. She sayth, "'Tis made out now. A poursuivant de facto fetched him forthe this morning." We gave one deep, universal sigh; Mercy broke away, and I after her, to seek the same remedy, but alack, in vayn. . .

How large a dobt we owe you, wise and holie men of old! How ye counsel us to patience, incite us to self-mastery, cheer us on to high emprise, temper in us the heat of youth, school our inexperience, calm the o'erwrought mind, allay the anguish of disappointment, chat suspense, and master despair. . . . How much better and happier ye would make us, if we would but list your teaching!

Bess hath fallen sick; no marvell. Everie one goeth heavilie. Alle joy is darkened; the mirthe of the house is gone.

Will tells me, that as they pushed off from y^e stairs, father took him about the neck and whispered, "I thank our Lord, the field is won!" Sure, Regulus ne'er went forthe with higher self-devotion.

Having declared his inability to take y^e oath as it stodee, they bade him, Will tells me, take a turn in the garden while they administered it to sundrie others, thus affording him leisure for re-consideration. But they might as well have hidden the neap-tide turn before its hour. When called in agayn, he was as firm as ever, so was given in ward to y^e Abbot of Westminster till the king's grace was informed of the matter. And now, the fool's wise saying of vindictive Herodias came true, for 'twas the king's mind to have mercy on his old servant, and tender him a qualified oath; but queen Anne, by her importunate clamours, did overrule his proper will, and at four days end, y^e full oath being agayn tendered and rejected, father was committed to y^e Tower. Oh, wicked woman, how could you? . . . Sure, you never loved a father. . . .

In answer to our incessant applications throughout this last month past, mother hath at length obtained access to dear father. She returned, her eyes nigh swollen to closing with weeping. . . . we crowded round about, burning for her report, but 'twas some time ere she couldo fetch breath or heart to give it us. At length Daisy, kissing her hand once and agayn, draws forthe a disjointed tale, somewhat after this fashion.

"Come, give over weeping, dearest mother, 'twill do neither him, you, nor us anie good. . . . What was your first speech of him?"

"Oh, my first speech, sweetheart, was, 'What, my goodness, Mr. More! I marvell how that you, who were always counted a wise man, s^d now soe play the fool as to lie here in this close, filthy prison, shut up with mice and rats, when you mighte be abroad and at your liberty, with y^e favour of king and council, and return to your righte fayr house, your books and gallery, and your wife, children, and household, if soe be you onlie wouldc but do what the bishops and best learned of the realm have, without scruple, done already.'"

"And what said he, mother, to that?" . . .

"Why, then, sweetheart, he chucks me under the chin and sayeth, 'I prithee, good mistress Alice, to tell me one thing.' . . . Soe then I say, 'What thing?' Soe then he sayeth, 'Is not this house, sweetheart, as nigh heaven as mine own?' Soe then I jerk my head away and say 'Tilly-valley! tilley-valley.'"

Sayth Bess, "Sure, mother, that was cold comfort. . . . And what next?"

"Why, then I said, 'Bone Deus, man! Bone Deus! will this gear never be left?' Soe then he sayth, 'Well then, Mrs. Alice, if it be soe, 'tis mighty well, but, for my part, I see no greate reason why I shoulde much joy in my gay house, or in anie thing belonging thereunto, when, if I shoulde be but seven years buried underground, and then arise and come thither agayn, I shoulde not fail to find some therein that woulde bid me get out of doors, and tell me 'twas none o' mine. What cause have I then, to care soe greantlie for a house that woulde soe soone forget its master?' . . .

"And then, mother? and then?"

"Soe then, sweetheart, he sayth, 'Come tell me, Mrs. Alice, how long do you think we might reckon on living to enjoy it?' Soe I say, 'Some twenty years, forsooth.' 'In faith,' says he, 'had you said some thousand years, it had bene somewhat; and yet he were a very bad merchant that woulde put himselfe in danger to lose eternity for a thousand years. . . . how much the rather if we are not sure to enjoy it one day to an end?' Soe then he puts me off with questions, How is Will? and Daisy? and Rupert? and this one? and t'other one? and the peacocks? and rabbits? and have we elected a now king of the cob-loaf yet? and has Tom found his hoop? and is y^e hasp of the buttery-hatch mended yet? and how goes the court? and what was the text o' Sunday? and have I practised the viol? and how are we off for money? and why can't he see Meg? Then he asks for this book and t'other book, but I've forgot their names, and he sayth he's kept mighty short of meat, though 'tis little he eats, but his man John a Wood is gay an' hungry, and 'tis worth a world to see him at a salt herring. Then he gives me counsell of this and that, and puts his arm about me and says, 'Come, let us pray;' but while he kept praying for one and t'other, I kept a-counting of his gray hairs; he'd none a month agone. And we're scarce off our knees, when I'm fetched away; and I say, 'When will you change your note, and act like a wise man?' and he sayth, 'When? when?' looking very profound; 'why, . . . when gorse is out of blossom and kissing out of fashion.' Soe puts me forthe by the shoulders with a laugh, calling after me, 'Remember me over and over agayn to them alle, and let me see Meg.'"

. . . I feel as if a string were tied tight about my heart. Methinketh 'twill burst if we goe on long soe.

He hath writ us a few lines with a coal, ending with "Sursum corda, dear children! up with your hearts." The bearer was dear Bonvisi.

The Lord begins to cut us short. We are now on very meagre commons, dear mother being obliged to pay fifteen shillings a-week for the board, poor as it is, of father and his servant. She hath parted with her velvet gown, embroidered overthwart, to my lady Sands' woman. Her mantle edged with coney went long ago.

But we lose not heart; I think mine is becoming annealed in the furnace, and will not now break. I have writ somewhat after this fashion to him. . . .

"What do you think, most dear father, doth comfort us at Chelsea, during this your absence? Surelie, the remembrance of your manner of life among us, your holy conversation, your wholesome counsells, your examples of virtue, of which there is hope that they do not onlie persevere with you, but that, by God's grace, they are much increast."

I weary to see him. . . . Yes, we shall meet in heaven, but how long first, oh Lord? how long?

Now that I've come back, let me seek to think, to remember. . . . Sure, my head will clear by-and-by? Strange, that feeling shoulde have the masterdom of thought and memory, in matters it is most concerned to retayn.

. . . I minded to put y^e haircloth and cord under my farthingale, and one or two of y^e smaller books in my pouch, as alsoe some sweets and suckets such as he was used to love. Will and Bonvisi were awaiting for me, and deare Bess, putting forth her head from her chamber door, cries piteously, "Tell him, dear Meg, tell him . . . 'twas never soe sad to me to be sick . . . and that I hope . . . I pray . . . the time may come . . ." then falls back swooning into Dancey's arms, whom I leave crying heartilie over her, and hasten below to receive the confused medley of messages sent by every other member of y^e house. For mine owne part, I was in such a tremulous succussion as to be scarce fitt to stand or goe, but time and the tide will noe man bide, and, once having taken boat, the cool river air allayed my fevered spiritts; onlie I coulde not for awhile get ridd of y^e impression of poor Dancey crying over Bess in her deliquium.

I think none o' the three opened our lips before we reached Lambeth, save, in y^e Reach, Will cried to y^e steersman, "Look you run us not aground," in a sharper voyce than I c'er heard from him. After passing y^e Archbishop's palace, whereon I gazed full reafullie, good Bonvisi beganne to mention some rhymes he had founde writ with a diamond on one of his window-panes at Crosby House, and would know were they father's? and was't y^e chamber father had used to sleep in? I tolde him it was, but knew nought of y^e distich, though 'twas like enow to be his. And thence he went on to this and that, how that father's cheerfulle, funny humour never forsook him, nor his brave heart never quelled, instancing his scarlesse passage through the Traitor's Gate, asking his neighbours whether his gait was that of a traditor; and, on being sued by the porter for his upper garment, giving him his cap, which he sayd was uppermost. And other such quips and passages, which I scarce noted nor smiled at, soe sorry was I of cheer.

At length we stayed rowing: Will lifted me out, kissed me, heartened me up, and, indeede, I was in better heart then, having been quietlie in prayer a good while. After some few forms, we were led through sundrie turns and passages, and, or ever I was aware, I founde myselfe quit of my companions, and in father's arms.

We both cried a little at first; I wonder I wept noe more, but strength was given me in that hour. As soone as I coulde, I lookt him in the face, and he lookt at me, and I was beginning to note his hollow cheeks, when he sayd, "Why, Meg, you are getting freckled;" soe that made us bothe laugh. He sayd, "You shoulde get some freckle-water of the lady that sent me here; depend on it, she hath washes and tinctures in plenty; and after all, Meg, she'll come to the same end at last, and be as the lady all bone and skin, whose ghaastlie legend used to scare thee soe when thou wert a child. Don't tell that story to thy children; 'twill hamper 'em with unsavoury images of death. Tell them of heavenlie hosts a-waiting to carry off good men's souls in fire-bright chariots, with horses of the sun, to a land where they shall never more be surbated and weary, but walk on cool, springy turf and among myrtle trees, and eat fruits that shall heal while they delight them, and drink the coldest of cold water, fresh from y^e river of life, and have space to stretch themselves, and bathe, and leap, and run, and, whichever way they look, meet Christ's eyes smiling on them. Lord, Meg, who would live, that coulde die? One mighte as lief be an angel shut up in a nutshell as bide here. Fancy how gladsome the sweet spirit woulde be to have the shell cracked! no matter by whom; the king, or king's mistress. . . . Let her dainty foot but set him free, he'd say, 'For this release, much thanks.' . . . And how goes the court, Meg?"

"In faith, father, never better. . . . There is nothing else there, I hear, but dancing and disporting."

"Never better, child, sayst thou? Alas, Meg, it pitieth me to consider what misery, poor soul, she will shortlie come to. These dances of hers will prove such dances that she will spurn our heads off like footballs; but 'twill not be long ere her head will dance the like dance. Mark you, Meg, a man that restraineth not his passions hath always something cruel in his nature, and if there be a woman toward, she is sure to suffer heaviest for it, first or last. . . . Seek scripture precedent for't . . . you'll find it as I say. Stony as death, cruel as the grave. Those Pbarisces that were, to a man, convicted of sin, yet hated a sinning woman before the Lord, and woulde fain have seene the dogs lick up her blood. When they lick up mine, deare Meg, let not your heart be troubled, even though they shoulde hale thee to London Bridge to see my head stuck on a pole. Think, most dear'st, I shall then have more reason to weep for thee than thou for me. But there's noe weeping in heaven, and bear in mind, Meg, distinctlie, that if they send me thither, 'twill be for obeying the law of God rather than of men. And after alle, we live not in the bloody, barbarous old times of crucifyings and flayings, and immersing in cauldrons of boiling oil. One stroke, and the affair's done. A clumsy chirurgeon would be longer extracting a tooth. We have oft agreed that the little birds struck down by the kite and hawk suffer less than if they were reserved to a naturall death. There is one sensible difference, indeed, between us. In our cases, preparation is a-wanting."

Hereon, I minded me to slip off y^e haircloth and rope, and give the same to him, along with the books and suckets, all which he hid away privatchie, making merry at the last.

"'Twoulde tell well before the council," quoth he, "that on searching the prison-cell of Sir Thomas More, there was founde, flagitiouslie and mysteriouslie laid up . . . a peece of barley-sugar!"

Then we talked over sundrie home-matters; and anon, having now both of us attained unto an equable and chastened serenitie of mind, which needed not any false shews of mirth to hide y^e naturall complexion of, he sayth, "I believe, Meg, they that have put me here ween they have done me a high displeasure; but I assure thee on my faith, mine own good daughter, that if it had not beene for my wife, and you, my dear good children, I woulde faine have beene closed up, long ere this, in as straight a room, and straighter too."

Thereon, he showed me how illegal was his imprisonment, there being noe statute to authorize the imposition of y^e oath, and he delivered himself, with some displeasure, agaynst the king's ill counsellors.

"And surlic, Meg," quoth he, "'tis pitie that anie Christian prince shoulde, by a flexible council readie to follow his affections, and by a weak clergy lacking grace to stand constantly to the truth as they have learned it, be with flattery so constantly abused. The lotus fruit fabled by the ancients, which made them that ate it lose all relish for the daylie bread of their own homes, was flattery, Meg, as I take it, and nothing else. And what less was the song of the Syrens, agaynst which Ulysses made his sailors stop their ears, and which he, with all his wisdom, coulde not listen to without struggling to be unbound from the mast? Even praise, Meg, which, moderately given, may animate and cheer forward the noblest minds, yet too lavishly bestowed, will decrease and palsy their strength, e'en as an overdose of the most generous and sprightlie medicine may prove mortiferous. But flattery is noe medicine, but a rank poison, which hath slayn kings, yea, and mighty kings; and they who love it, the Lord knoweth afar off; knoweth distantlie, has no care to know intimatchie, for they are none of his."

Thus we went on, from one theme to another, till methinketh a heavenie light seemed to shine alle about us like as when the angel entered the prison of Peter. I hung upon everie word and thought that issued from his lips, and drank them in as thirsty land sucks up the tender rain. . . . Had the angel of death at that hour come in to fetch both of us away, I woulde not have said him nay, I was soe passivclie, so intenselie happy. At length, as time wore on, and I knew I shoulde soone be fetcht forth, I coulde not but wish I had the clew to some secret passage or subterrenal, of the which there were doubtless plenty in the thick walls, whereby we might steal off together.

Father made answer, "Wishes never filled a sack. I make it my businesse, Meg, to wish as little as I can, except that I were better and wiser. You fancy these four walls lonesome; how oft, dost thou suppose, I here receive Plato and Socrates, and this and that holy saint and martyr? My jailors can noe more keep them out than they can exclude the sunbeams. Thou knowest, Jesus stood among his disciples when the doors were shut. I am not more lonely than St. Anthony in his cave, and I have a divine light e'en here, whereby to con the lesson 'God is love.' The futility of our enemies' efforts to make us miserable was never more stronglie proven to me than when I was a mere boy in Cardinal Morton's service. Having unwittinglie angered one of his chaplains, a choleric and even malignant-spirited man, he did, of his owne authoritie, shut me up for some hours in a certayn damp vault, which, to a lad afeard of ghosts and devilish apparitions, would have beene fearsome enow. Howbeit, I there cast myself on the ground with my back sett agaynst the wall, and mine arm behind my head, this fashion . . . and did then and there, by reason of a young heart, quiet conscience, and quick phansy, conjure up such a lively picture of the queen o' the fairies' court, and alle the sayings and doings therein, that never was I more sorry than when my gaoler let me goe free, and bade me rise up and be doing. In place, therefore, my daughter, of thinking of me in thy night watches as beating my wings agaynst my cage bars, trust that God comes to look in upon me without knocking or bell-ringing. Often in spirit I am with you alle; in the chapel, in the hall, in the garden; now in the hayfield, with my head on thy lap, now on the river, with Will and Rupert at the oar. You see me not about your path, you won't see my disembodied spirit beside you hereafter, but it may be close upon you once and agayn for alle that: maybe, at times when you have prayed with most passion, or suffered with most patience, or performed my hests with most exactness, or remembered my care of you with most affection. And now, good speed, good Meg, I hear the key turn in the door. . . This kiss for thy mother, this for Bess, this for Cecil, . . . this and this for my whole school. Keep dry eyes and a hopefull heart; and reflect that nought but unpardoned sin shoulde make us weep for ever."

A WOMAN'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD

BY IDA PFEIFFER.

WE have before taken occasion to introduce to our readers the very remarkable lady, some of whose most recent wanderings are here more fully recorded by her own pen. Here, indeed, is an entirely new species of the genus "unprotected female," though a species which may possibly be included in a single individual. We have long been of opinion that the sphere of independent action for women might be greatly enlarged with benefit to all parties, but the exploits of Madame Pfeiffer have, we must own, considerably extended what we should have regarded as the limits of feminine enterprise and courage. Yet, eccentric as her tastes and habits may appear, we have never met with any one more entirely free from the affectation of eccentricity, a more perfect specimen of the "sound mind in a sound body." She does the most extraordinary things with the same unconscious simplicity that she manifests in the routine of the most trivial every-day duties. A simple and sober-minded matron of the middle class, after quietly fulfilling for a number of years the ordinary domestic duties of her station, and watching over the education of her children till they reached maturity—she then, without being able to smooth over any of the difficulties of the undertaking by the resources of wealth or high rank—chooses, by way of recreation, to set out on such a course of adventurous travelling as few men would have the spirit to undertake,—the wonder being increased by her age, which is tending towards the evening of life,—and by her country, for in general, in German women the quality of "stay-at-homatiiveness" is strongly developed; and they often take, moreover, a certain pride in not suffering their minds, any more than their persons, to wander beyond the domestic circle.

But, however difficult it may be to account for her proceedings, they must be sharp-sighted critics indeed who could discover, as some have done, in her unpretending narrative, any indication of her having been urged by an impulse of vanity to her singular course of action. Not only the calm and undaunted temper in which she encounters imminent peril, but her habitual disregard of all considerations of mere personal convenience or comfort, and her perfect indifference to the petty motives and feelings which such a supposition implies; these compel us, at all events, to decline that solution of the difficulty, even though it should remain insoluble. That it is so to us in some measure we are forced to admit, and we can only accept the explanation she has herself offered, namely, that she is actuated by an "inborn love of travelling," which must be classed among what are called natural instincts.

It is perhaps to be regretted, that, to her many natural qualifications, Madame Pfeiffer did not add that of such a course of previous study as might have enabled her to obtain more valuable results from her uncommon opportunities. But, considering the interest of her personal narrative, we almost feel as if we were guilty of ingratitude in offering this suggestion; and we shall therefore proceed to offer our readers some of the passages from her volumes which appear best worthy of selection—using the liberty of compression, but leaving them in the first person, that they may lose none of their force and freshness. Madame Pfeiffer left Vienna on her adventurous expedition in May 1846, and embarking at Hamburg in a Danish brig, arrived, after a three months' voyage, at Rio Janeiro. The capital of Brazil has been so frequently visited by travellers, that we shall pass over her description of it, and bear our heroine company on some excursions into the interior of the country, which offers a more unhacknied field of observation.

"During my stay at Rio de Janeiro," she says, "I had heard so much of the rapidly increasing prosperity of Petropolis,—a German colony lately founded in the neighbourhood,—of the magnificent scenery amidst which it lies, of the primeval forests through which one part of the road leads, that I could not resist the wish to make an excursion to it. My travelling companion, Count Berthold,¹ was of the party, and we therefore engaged two places in a boat that goes daily to Porto d'Estrella, about twenty-two leagues off—whence the journey must be performed by land—and as the Count wished to botanise, and I to collect insects, we determined to make it on foot. We passed the night at this little port, which carries on a considerable trade with the interior of the country, and the next morning set out on our pedestrian ramble. We soon found ourselves in a broad valley, mostly overgrown with thick shrubs and young trees, and surrounded by lofty mountains. The sides of the road, which forms the principal communication with the province of Minas Geraes, were soon adorned by the wild pine-apple, not yet ripe, but glowing with a lovely rosy red colour; the taste of the fruit is however not quite equal to its appearance, and it is therefore seldom plucked. The sight of the humming-birds also afforded me great pleasure. One can fancy nothing prettier than these delicate little creatures as they hover about, getting their food out of the cups of flowers, like butterflies, for which, indeed, in their rapid flight they may easily be mistaken. The appearance of the forest did not quite fulfil my preconceived notions, as I had expected thick and high trunks of trees, but I believe the power of vegetation is too strong for this; the large trees are choked and rotted by the mass of smaller ones, of creepers and parasites, that spring up around them. Both the latter are so abundant, and cover these trees so entirely, that one can often hardly see their leaves, much less their trunks. A botanist here assured me that he had counted, on a single tree, six-and-thirty different species.

"We had made a rich harvest of flowers, plants, and insects, and were pursuing our way, enchanted by the glories of the woods, and not less by the views of mountain and valley, sea and bay, which opened to us from time to time; and as we approached a ridge of mountain, 3,000 feet high, which we had to ascend, we met several troops of Negroes and other passengers. It did not therefore occur to us to take much notice of the movements of a single Negro, who appeared to following us. As soon, however, as we had reached a rather solitary spot, he suddenly sprang on us with a long knife in one hand, and a lasso in the other, and gave us to understand, by very expressive gestures, that it was his intention to murder us and drag us into the wood. We had no weapons—for this part of the road had been represented to us as quite safe—and nothing to defend ourselves with but our umbrellas: I had, however, in my pocket a penknife, which I instantly drew out, and opened, fully resolved to sell my life as dearly as possible. We warded off several blows which our assailant aimed at us, but the umbrellas did not hold out long. He broke mine short off, so that only the handle was left in my hand; but in the struggle he dropped his long knife. I darted after it—but he was quicker—and getting hold of it again, gave me with it two deep cuts in the arm. Despair, however, gave me courage, and I made a thrust at his breast with my pocket-knife, but I only wounded his hand, and he threw me down. The Count now seized him from behind, and this gave me the opportunity of getting up again, but my companion had received a severe wound, and it would certainly have been all over with us had we not heard on the road the sound of horsemen approaching. As soon as the Negro distinguished this sound he desisted from his attack, and, gnashing his teeth like a wild beast, fled into the wood. Immediately afterwards the riders made their appearance round a turning in the road; we hastened towards them, and the appearance of our umbrellas and our freshly bleeding wounds, soon explained our condition. They inquired what direction the fugitive had taken, sprang from their horses and hastened after him, but they would scarcely have overtaken him had not two Negroes lent their assistance. He was at length brought in, tied fast, and when he refused to walk received such a shower of heavy blows on the head, that I thought the poor creature's skull must have been beaten in. He remained, nevertheless, lying on the ground, quite motionless, until the two other Negroes were compelled to take him up and carry him to the nearest house, struggling, and making furious attempts to bite. It was not till afterwards that I learned that he had been, a short time before, punished by his master for some offence, and when he met us in the wood he probably thought it would be an excellent opportunity to revenge himself on the whites.

"The Count and I got our wounds bound up, and then continued our excursion, not altogether without fear, but in perpetual admiration of the lovely landscape.

"The colony of Petropolis lies in the midst of a primeval forest, 2,500 feet above the level of the sea. It was founded about fourteen months before my visit, principally for the cultivation, for the use of the capital, of certain European plants and fruits, which in tropical countries will only prosper at a considerable height. There was already a small row of houses forming a street, and on an open place the skeleton of a large building, intended, I was told, for an imperial pleasure palace, though it had no very imperial aspect, and its little low doors contrasted curiously with the great broad windows. Around this castle the town is to be formed, but many single houses already lie scattered in the woods. Some of the colonists, the mechanics, shopkeepers and so forth, receive small allotments of land near the castle for building purposes, the gardeners get large portions, but not more than two or three acres. What a melancholy lot must these good people have found in their own country, to think it worth while to come to this strange part of the world for so small an inducement!

"The wound of Count Berthold proved more serious than had been anticipated. The great heat and his attempting to make use of the hand brought on an inflammation, which made it necessary for him to remain at Rio de Janeiro.

"I was more fortunate," says our stout-hearted matron; "for as my wounds were both in the upper part of the arm, I could take better care of them, and spare them more, so that they were soon neither dangerous nor troublesome. Under these circumstances I found myself, however, compelled to make my next excursion alone, or else, to give up the most interesting part of it, the visit to the native Indians. I could not make up my mind to this, and I therefore inquired whether I could with tolerable safety venture on it unaccompanied. I received a sort of half-and-half assurance to this effect, besides the promise of a trustworthy guide; and thus provided, and armed with a good pair of double-barrelled pistols, I set out without fear on my ramble. Our way lay at first through a mountain district, and then descended into a warmer region, where the uniformity of the forest is frequently interrupted by coffee and sugar plantations. The coffee-trees stand in rows on the sides of almost perpendicular hills, and attain a height of from six to twelve feet. They begin to bear in the second, or at most in the third year, and remain fertile ten years. The harvest may be said to be perpetual, for blossoms and quite ripe fruit are found on the trees at the same time. It is obtained either by plucking or by slaking the tree, having previously placed straw mats beneath it; the first is, however, though more troublesome, by far the best plan.

"It was during this excursion that I witnessed for the first time the spectacle of a forest conflagration. These are here purposely kindled in order to fertilize the soil. For the most part, I saw at first only enormous clouds of smoke rising and rolling away, and I wished for nothing more than an opportunity of coming quite near to one of them. My wish was soon fulfilled, for in the course of the day, my way lay between a burning forest and a tract of low brushwood also on fire. We heard the loud crackling noise, and saw through the smoke huge tongues of flame darting upward. From time to time came heavy sounds, like those of cannon from the fall of the great trees. As my guide advanced in the immediate direction of this fiery gulf, I own I felt a little nervous. I considered, however, that he certainly did not wish to throw away his own life without reason, and that, therefore, it was probable his experience had taught him that the passage might be made with safety. At the entrance sat two Negroes to give travellers directions how to proceed, and direct them to use the utmost speed. These instructions my guide translated to me, and then giving his horse the spur he dashed into the smoke, and I immediately followed his example. Glowing ashes and sparks flew all round us, and the feeling of suffocation from the smoke was almost worse than the tremendous heat. It was fortunate for us that we had not more than five or six hundred paces to go, for our horses could not breathe, and it was with the utmost difficulty we could keep them up to the gallop.

"In Brazil these fires seldom extend very far, as the vegetation is too fresh. The forest usually has to be kindled in several places, and even then the fire often goes out, and great places remain unconsumed in the midst of it. We passed the night at a Venda, lying quite alone in the thickest of the woods, and on this, as on other occasions, I could not help marvelling at the singular mixture of timidity and courage exhibited by the inhabitants of Brazil. On the one hand, almost every one you meet in the street is armed with long knives and pistols, as if the country were full of robbers and murderers; and on the other you find the owners of plantations living quite carelessly alone in the midst of a multitude of slaves; and the traveller fearlessly stops to pass the night in lonely houses, lying in the almost impenetrable seclusion of the woods, where he finds no fastening to his window and no lock to his door. The rooms occupied by the proprietor generally lie far apart from those allotted to his guests, and from the people of his household, who are all slaves, and from whom one could scarcely in case of need obtain any help, since they generally sleep in remote corners of the stables and outhouses. At first I felt somewhat timid at being left thus to pass the night alone, surrounded by the wild dark woods, and cut off from every human aid; but as I was assured that no one had ever heard of a house being broken into, I soon dismissed my idle fears, and went quietly to sleep. . . .

"Five leagues further on, at the little town of Canto Gallo, I, for the last time, found shelter in a Venda. Henceforward I was to trust to the hospitality of the owners of Fazendas. On reaching one of these settlements the usual practice is to remain at the gate until, through a servant, permission has been obtained to enter, but this is scarcely ever refused. The Fazenda Boa-Esperanza, six leagues off, was our object for this day, and after passing a small waterfall we came to the most splendid woods I had yet seen. A narrow path running along by the side of a rivulet led through them. Palm-trees with their majestic crowns rose high above the leafed trees which mingled their foliage below, and formed delightful bowers and arches of verdure; orchidaceous plants grew luxuriantly round their branches, ferns shot up, and parasite plants twined round every trunk and stem, and formed walls of blossoms and flowers of a boundless variety of resplendent colour and exquisite perfume; parrots and other gaily coloured birds, which I had known only stuffed in museums, rocked themselves on the branches, and with the ever lovely humming birds animated these enchanted groves. I seemed to be wandering in fairy land, and almost expected every moment to see some wood-nymph or sylph appear before me. I was too happy, and felt that every fatigue and hardship of my journey was most richly repaid. One thought alone disturbed my enjoyment; it was that feeble man should venture to enter into a contest with this gigantic nature, and bend her to his will. How soon may the deep, holy tranquillity of these grand solitudes be broken by the axe of the settler, in order to give room for the cultivation of the common necessaries of life!

"At St. Retta, about four leagues from Canto Gallo, there are some gold washings in the river of the same name, and where diamonds are also found. Since diamond seeking, or digging, is no longer an imperial monopoly, every one is free to follow this occupation; but it is, nevertheless, carried on with all the secrecy possible, in order to defraud the State of its share of the profits."

After crossing the rivers Parahyba and Pomba in a canoe formed of the hollowed-out trunk of a tree, Madame Pfeiffer reached the last settlement of the whites, where she stopped to rest for the night before her visit to the Puri Indians.

"On an open space that seemed to have been with difficulty won from the forest, stood a large wooden house surrounded by some wretched huts, the abodes of the slaves; but the whole style of housekeeping in this establishment was such as to make me think myself already among the savages. The house contained a large hall, from which opened four rooms, each inhabited by a white family. Their whole furniture consisted of some straw mats, and the inhabitants were crouching upon the ground like Indians, and helping to free each other from the vermin. The kitchen was like a great dilapidated barn, and had a hearth running along its whole length, on which were burning various fires; over these hung little kettles, and at the sides were wooden spits with pieces of meat, which were cooked partly by the smoke and partly by fire. The kitchen was full of people; there were whites, Puris, and Negroes, children of Whites and Puris,—and of Puris and Negroes, in short, a true pattern-card of all the shades of variety in the three races. The yard swarmed with fowls, beautifully coloured ducks and geese, enormously fat pigs, and terribly ugly dogs. Beneath some cocoa palms, and tamarind-trees, laden with magnificent fruit, sat white and coloured people, singly or in groups, mostly engaged in appeasing their hunger. Some had broken pots, or gourds, containing boiled beans and Indian corn flour mixed together, and were eating with great appetite the thick uninviting-looking mess. Others were devouring pieces of meat which they tore asunder with their hands, and tossed into their mouths alternately with handfuls of flour. The children also held gourds containing their dinner, which they had to defend valiantly against many marauders; for now a fowl would come and peck something out, now a dog make a snatch at a bit, or sometimes a little pig would come waddling up, and his joyful grunt as he hurried away would show that he had not come in vain.

"Whilst I was making my observations there arose outside the court a joyful cry: I advanced towards it, and soon saw two lads dragging along between them, by a rope, a great black snake, certainly above seven feet long. From what I could gather of the remarks made on it, its bite is highly dangerous, indeed mortal; but this one was dead. This account gave me a little uneasiness, at least I did not quite like to pass through the forest in the dark, and take up my abode for the night under a tree; I resolved, therefore, to put off my visit to the savages till the following morning, and remain for the night with my present entertainers.

"The women gathered round me, and I showed them the collection of flowers and insects that I had made during the day; this probably procured me some reputation for learning and medical knowledge, for they immediately asked my advice upon several cases of cutaneous eruptions and so forth, and I prescribed warm baths and embrocations of soap and oil, which I devoutly hope were found of service. On the following morning I set off into the woods in search of the Puri Indians, and after working our toilsome way through the thicket for eight hours, we met some Puris who led us to their huts.

"In a little space beneath some large trees, were five huts or rather arbours, for they were open on three sides, and consisted only of four stakes driven into the ground, with others placed horizontally, and a roof made of a few broad palm leaves, between which the rain could enter quite freely. In the interior there were a few mats and a little glimmering fire, in which some roots, cobs of Indian corn, and bananas, were roasting. In a corner under the roof, a little store of these things was laid up, and some gourds lay about, which the Puris use instead of dishes, pots, &c. The long bow and arrows which forms their only weapon, leant against the stakes in the back-ground. I found these Indians still uglier than Negroes. Their skin is of a light bronze colour, they have broad wizened faces, lank coal-black hair, low broad foreheads, a crushed-looking nose, little narrow eyes, almost like those of the Chinese, large mouths, with thick lips, and a peculiar expression of stupidity which is increased by their mouth being always open. Their costume consists only of a few rags worn round the loins.

"The number of these Indians still remaining in Brazil is said to be about 500,000; but they are scattered about over a vast extent of forest in the interior, and more than six or seven families are never found on the same spot. This they leave again as soon as they have killed all the game, and consumed the fruits and roots in the neighbourhood. Many of these Indians have received baptism, and, indeed, for a small consideration of brandy and tobacco are ready to receive it as often as may be desired. Their language is extremely poor; they have, for instance, only one word for to-day, to-morrow, and yesterday, and are compelled to make out the meaning by signs, pointing for the future forwards, for the past day backwards, and for the present right upward over their heads.

"They are unable to count more than two, and when they wish to express a greater number, are obliged to repeat one, two, one two continually. They are said to have an astonishing acuteness of smell, and are employed to track runaway Negroes. They will also labour hard at heavy work like wood-cutting; but can seldom be induced to come to it unless when they are in a half-starved condition."

Madame Pfeiffer accompanied the Puris on a parrot and monkey hunt, and moreover afterwards partook of the dainties thus provided. In case our readers should be inclined to try these dishes, we may inform them on her authority that roasted monkey is excellent; but she cannot say so much for parrot. After the banquet, also, she was entertained with the fashionable dances; but the war-dance was accompanied by such hideous yells and threatening gestures, that even her courage gave way, and she started up in sudden terror, with the idea that she was surrounded and wholly in the power of savage enemies. Even after she had retired to her singular place of repose, she remained apparently under an impression of fear very unusual with her. She was tormented by the thought of the many wild beasts, and terrible serpents, which might possibly be harbouring within a short distance of the open and entirely defenceless spot where she lay, and whenever she heard a rustling in the leaves, dreaded that some such unwelcome visitor would make his appearance; but this mood, so little accustomed with her, soon passed away. She calmly considered that if there were really much danger of attack of this kind, it was not likely the Puris themselves would occupy such entirely defenceless habitations, and then accommodating herself with a log of wood for a pillow, she lay down again and slept quietly till morning.

We shall see hereafter that she exhibited no less intrepidity against danger of a different kind.

The next stations on her tour were Valparaiso and Tahiti, where she again undertook a pedestrian excursion, in the very commencement of which she had to wade through thirty-two brooks, being not very gracefully, but very suitably accoutred for the undertaking in strong men's shoes, no stockings, trowsers and a blouse tucked up to the hips!! We are inclined to think it would be easier to find women capable of emulating her other achievements than willing to present themselves in such a costume as this. The dangers and difficulties of the journey increased as the traveller advanced. A broad mountain stream, which rushed along over a stony bed, had to be crossed sixty-two times. "At dangerous places," she says, "the Indian took hold of my hand, and drew me half swimming after him. The water reached frequently to my hips, and any attempt to dry myself again was out of the question. The footpath also became more and more toilsome and dangerous. We had to climb over rocks and stones, which were so covered with the great leaves of the oputu, that you never knew where to set your foot with safety. I tore many considerable wounds in my hands and feet, and fell down many times, in attempting to cling to the treacherous stem of a pisang, which broke under my grasp. In two places the ravine narrowed so much that there was no path but the bed of the torrent. It was really a breakneck expedition, and one which is seldom undertaken even by the officers; by women probably never."

After eight hours of this kind of travelling, Madame Pfeiffer reached the principal object of the excursion, a volcanic lake, lying at a height of 1,800 feet above the level of the sea. It is surrounded by green hills so closely, that not even space for a foot-path is left along the margin, and whoever wishes to cross it must make use of a conveyance, which even Madame Pfeiffer describes as enough to make you shudder.

"The curiosity of such a mode of transit induced me, however, to tell my guide that I should like to try it. Immediately he pulled a few stalks of the pisang, fastened them together with a tough kind of grass, laid some leaves upon it, pushed it into the water, and invited me to take a seat on this fragment of a boat. I felt a little afraid, but was ashamed to say so, and I therefore placed myself upon it, my guide following me, swimming and pushing the frail vessel before him. I reached the opposite side, and returned in safety, but I cannot say that I was quite comfortable. The thing was so small that there was nothing to lay hold of, and it really went more under than over the water, so that I thought every moment I should have fallen in. I would not advise any one who cannot swim to attempt a similar voyage."

From the circumstances that fell under Madame Pfeiffer's observation, we derive no very favourable idea of the influence which French civilization is likely to produce on the manners of the Tahitians. The solemn responsibility which falls on the more advanced people in their relation with one still in its infancy, is, we fear, likely to be less felt by the present protectors of Tahiti, than by our own countrymen; and it is a duty that has at all times been too lightly regarded by Europeans in their intercourse with uncultivated races.

From Tahiti Madame Pfeiffer sailed direct for Macao, intending to penetrate, if possible, at whatever personal risk, into the jealous seclusion of the Celestial Empire, and her courage and perseverance did not, as we shall see, go unrewarded. Let us accompany her on her first visit.

"A year ago I had little thought I should ever be among the small number of Europeans to whom the shaven heads, long tails, and little ugly cunning eyes of the Chinese, would ever be known otherwise than in pictures. We had scarcely cast anchor, however, at Macao, before several of them made their appearance, climbing up the sides of the vessel, whilst others, in boats, displayed a store of fruit, pastry, and pretty works of various kinds all round our vessel, so that in a few minutes it had the appearance of a fair. Some of them lauded their wares in broken English, but on the whole they did very little business, as our crew only bought some cigars and fruit. Captain Jurianse then got out a boat, and we landed, but not till we had each paid a Spanish dollar to the Mandarin. This, it seems, was an abuse, and I am told it was soon after done away with. We went to one of the Portuguese commercial houses, and on our way thither passed through a great part of the town, for European women as well as men can here go about freely, without being exposed, as they would be in other Chinese towns, to the danger of stoning. In the streets inhabited exclusively by the Chinese, things looked extremely lively. The men sat in groups in the street, playing at dominos; and in the numerous shops of carpenters, shoemakers, locksmiths, &c., all were busy working, gossiping, gambling, and eating. Of women I saw few, and those only of the lowest class. I was much amused by the way in which the people made use of two little sticks instead of knife and fork, and the skill and dexterity displayed in carrying food to their mouths with these machines; with rice they appeared, however, to have some difficulty, and usually put the vessel containing it close to their lips, holding their mouths wide open in readiness, and then pushing in a large portion, of which a good deal usually fell back in a rather unpleasant manner into the dish. For fluids they make use of little china spoons."

At Macao, and at Hong-Kong, which she afterwards visited, Madame Pfeiffer remained only a short time, and then resolved to visit Canton, and moreover, for economy sake, to make the passage in a Chinese junk. A place in the steamer or a private boat would have cost twelve dollars, whilst the fare in the junk was only three; and as Madame Pfeiffer, as we have seen, is seldom very anxious on the score of personal comfort, this consideration immediately determined her to incur whatever risk there might be. Notwithstanding certain warnings she had received, she felt no fear of any ill treatment from the Chinese, but put her pistols in order, and went quietly on board. The company she soon perceived was not very select, but they behaved with decorum.

"Some were playing at dominos, whilst others drew doleful music from an instrument with three strings. At the same time there was smoking, gossiping, and drinking tea without sugar out of very little cups; and from all sides this divine beverage was freely offered to me. No Chinese of any rank drinks either water, or any spirituous liquor, but always weak unsugared tea. Late in the evening I retired to my own cabin, where, as the deck was not quite close, the rain came through upon me; but as soon as the captain perceived it, he assigned me another place, in which I found myself in the company of two Chinese women. They were engaged in smoking tobacco out of little pipes no larger than thimbles, and which require to be filled again every four or five whiffs.

They were very civil, and as soon as they saw I had no head-stool, (a little stool hollowed at the top, about eight inches high, made of bamboo, or sometimes of strong pasteboard, and used instead of a pillow,) they got me one, and did not desist from their polite entreaties till I had consented to use it. One can lie on it better than might be supposed.

"In the early morning, I hastened upon deck to see the entrance from the sea to the mouth of the Si-Kiang, but we were already so high up that there was no more mouth to be seen. I got a view of it, however, on my return. A little before reaching it, the river widens to a breadth of eight leagues, but at the actual mouth, it is so shut in by rocks and mountains as to lose half its breadth. At Hoo-mun, or Whampou, the river divides into two arms, of which one leads to Canton, and is called the Pearl River. Along its banks stretch immense rice plantations, enclosed by rows of bananas and other fruit-trees, which form pretty avenues, but which are, nevertheless, planted for utility more than for beauty. The rice requires such an excessively wet soil, that the trees are required to give it some solidity, that it may not be entirely washed away.

"There were many pretty country houses in the true Chinese style, with their curious peaked roofs and coloured tiles, lying under the shade of large trees; and variously built pagodas, of from three to nine stories high, raised on little hills in the neighbourhood of the villages, attracting the eye from a great distance. There were also fortifications for the protection of the river, having much the appearance of large unroofed houses.

"Several miles before Canton, the villages begin to follow one another very closely, but they are all miserable in appearance, and for the most part consist of huts built on stakes driven into the bed of the river. Great numbers of boats, which are also inhabited, lie before them. The nearer one comes to the city, the livelier becomes the appearance of the river, and the greater is the number of inhabited boats, and vessels of all sorts of strange forms which make their appearance. There are junks, the back part of which rises two stories above the water, and resembles a house with high windows and balconies. These junks are often of amazing size, and several thousand tons burthen. Then there are the Mandarins' boats, with their painted walls, doors, and windows—their carved galleries, and coloured silk flags—and before all, the flower-boats, with their upper galleries adorned with wreaths and arabesques, the interior of which contains a saloon and several smaller apartments, decorated with looking-glasses, silken hangings, glass chandeliers, and coloured paper lanterns, interspersed with pretty baskets filled with fresh flowers, so that the whole has really quite a fairy-land aspect. These boats remain at anchor day and night, and serve the Chinese for a lounge and a place of recreation. Plays are acted in them, and dancing and conjuring tricks performed. Europeans are not positively refused admittance, but in the present unfavourable disposition towards them, they would, in going there, certainly expose themselves to insult, and possibly to serious ill treatment.

"In addition to this strange craft, imagine thousands of little boats (Shampans) cruising and moving about in all directions—fishermen casting their nets—children and grown people amusing themselves with swimming and bathing—boys playing and wrestling in diminutive boats, so that it seems impossible but that they must fall over. Careful parents, however, tie bladders or hollow gourds under the arms of the little ones, so that if they do tumble in, they may not sink.

"For some years past the entrance into Canton, and even a residence in the factories, has been permitted to European women, so that I had no hesitation about landing; but how to get to the house of Mr. Agassiz, to which I was recommended, required consideration. As I could not speak a word of Chinese, I made my captain understand by signs that I had no money with me, but that I would pay him when I got to the factory.

"Greatly surprised was Mr. Agassiz, when he saw me arrive in company with the captain, and learned that I had come from the ship on foot, quite uninjured and without difficulty; and now first I learnt how extremely perilous it was for me as a woman to have ventured, with only a Chinese companion, through the streets of Canton. It was, I was told, an unheard-of case, and that I might think myself most fortunate not to have been grossly insulted, or even stoned. In such a case, my companion would assuredly have taken to flight, and left me to my fate. I had certainly remarked, on the way to the factory, that old and young called after me, and pointed with their fingers; that the people ran out of the shops, and that, by degrees, I found I had a long train following me. What could I do, however, but put as good a face on the matter as possible, and show no fear? Perhaps it was for that very reason that no harm happened to me. It is true, however, that since the last war the minds of the Chinese have been more than ever embittered against Europeans, and especially against women, as there exists, it seems, a Chinese prophecy, that the Celestial Empire shall one day be conquered by a woman."

Having seen our heroine safely harboured in the factory, we must for the present take our leave of her, reserving her experience in China, and a glimpse of still more adventurous journeyings in Hindostan, and across the Arabian desert, till next month. The prophecy concerning the conquest of China by a woman we strongly recommend to the attention of the professors of the art, now fortunately so numerous. During the present high spring-tide of loyalty, we are convinced that something might be made of it. Could it not be shown that the woman in question was no other than our Sovereign lady, Queen Victoria?

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER LXII.

FAUST PAYS A MORNING VISIT.

FRERE, on the principle of striking whilst the iron is hot, had no sooner obtained Lewis's promise to place in his hands the arrangement of the quarrel between Lord Bellefield and himself, than he induced his friend to write a carefully worded apology for having in the heat of passion assaulted his lordship on the previous evening. Lewis took the pen, and, without a murmur, wrote as Frere dictated, his compressed lips and knitted brow alone telling of the martyrdom his proud spirit was undergoing; but his strength of will was as powerful for good as for evil; he had resolved on the sacrifice, and, cost what it might, he would make it.

"And now, what is your intention?" he inquired, as Frere, having signified his approbation of its contents, folded the note and deposited it safely in his pocket-book; "suppose Bellefield should refuse to accept this apology?"

"Never fear," was the confident reply, "he must accept it; and, to tell you the truth, although he may bluster and give himself airs when he perceives you are not forthcoming, I expect he will only be too glad to be quit of such an awkward customer. I don't wish to be personal, but depend upon it, you are by no means pleasant as an enemy; there is 'a lurking devil in your eye,' as Byron says, (and he ought to know about devils, for, adopting the fallen angel hypothesis, he was very like one himself,) that would try a man's nerve rather when he found himself standing opposite your loaded pistol at eighteen paces."

Lewis smiled faintly.

"The devil has been pretty well taken out of me this time," he said; "henceforth I shall be essentially a man of peace."

He paused, pressed his hand to his brow, and a slight shiver passed through his frame. Frere regarded him anxiously.

"What are you shivering about?" he inquired. "You don't feel ill, do you?"

"No; it is nothing," was the reply. "I have, as you may easily imagine, gone through a good deal, both mentally and bodily of late, and I am a little overworn; but a couple of hours' sleep will set me right again."

"Then the sooner you take it, the better," rejoined Frere. "Never mind me; I shall esconce myself in this arm chair till the man of war, your second, makes his appearance, and sleep or read as the fates may incline. What time do you expect your accomplice?"

"He will be here at half-past four," was the reply.

"And it is now just two; so turn in, and pleasant dreams to you."

Thus saying, Frere flung himself back in the chair, and drawing a volume of Dante out of his pocket, set to work to polish up his Italian, as he termed it. Lewis rose to follow his friend's advice; but a mist seemed to swim before his eyes, his brain reeled, his trembling knees refused to support him, and, staggering forward, he sank heavily to the ground in a fainting fit. Frere, much alarmed, raised him in his arms, and, carrying him with some difficulty into the inner room, laid him on his bed, and began, with more energy than skill, to apply every conceivable or inconceivable remedy to recover him, but with only partial success; for although after the lapse of a few moments colour returned to his lips and pulsation to his heart, he neither spoke nor appeared to recognise his friend's voice, and after a few inarticulate murmurs sank into a dull heavy sleep. Frere covered him with the bed-clothes as well as he was able, then, drawing a chair to the bed side, seated himself there-upon to watch his slumbers. Half-past four arrived, and with it Major Ehrenburg, the Austrian officer who had promised to act as Lewis's second. Before he came a new idea had entered Frere's head—it might not be necessary to make use of the apology at all, Lewis's sudden illness would be a sufficient reason for his not meeting his adversary.

"The amusement you have promised yourself in seeing my friend shoot or be shot, you will be disappointed of, Mein lieber Herr," he said, with a quiet smile, as the Austrian stared at him in surprise and twisted his moustaches fiercely. "Lord Bellefield in his angry moods is no doubt a very terrible fellow, but Lewis is about to wrestle with a more deadly foe yet, or I am much mistaken."

"Excuse me, sir, I have no time for badinage," returned the other, bowing with haughty politeness, "nothing can prevent this duel. I must speak with the Signor Luigi himself immediately. Permit me to pass."

"Oh! certainly," replied Frere, holding open the door of the bedroom; "but, in regard to nothing being able to prevent the duel, 'there are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.' You will find my words to be true. See, his adversary has laid him on his back already."

The young soldier advanced to the bedside; Lewis still slept, but his slumbers were disturbed and feverish. As the other bent over him he turned uneasily and murmured some inarticulate sounds. Laying his hand on his shoulder, Ehrenburg attempted to rouse him.

"Luigi," he said, "it is late; they will be on the ground before us."

The only reply was again an inarticulate murmur; but on his repeating his summons, Lewis sat up and stared about him with a look of dull unconsciousness, then a wild light came into his eyes, and, glaring furiously at the Austrian, he exclaimed in a hoarse voice—

"Villain, it is false! she loves you not—she never loved you!"

"Do you not know me, Luigi?" inquired Ehrenburg in a more soothing tone of voice.

"Know you, scoundrel, yes! On earth, or in the lowest hell, I should know and hate you." He paused, glanced wildly round the room, then exclaimed in a voice scarcely audible through passion, "What! here in my own house do you come to triumph over and to insult me? This is too much." And, with a scream of fury he made a spring at the other's throat, which he would have succeeded in grasping, probably to his severe injury, had not Frere, who had watched him closely during the foregoing scene, thrown himself upon him, and with the assistance of the young soldier, who at length began to perceive the true state of the case, contrived to hold him down, till, exhausted by the violence of his struggles, he ceased to resist any longer.

"He must have exposed himself to malaria, and the fever has attacked the brain—is it not so?" inquired Ehrenburg as soon as he had recovered breath enough to speak.

"So I fear," was the reply. "Malaria, or macaroni, or some horrid foreign thing or other, has brought on a violent fever, and, as you see, he is now about as mad as a March hare, (though perhaps a belief in that popular zoological delusion may not extend to the Austrian dominions.)"—this last remark was made sollo voce—"and now, major, the sooner you're off the better, for Lord Bellefield, unless he is much belied, is not particularly famous for patience. You'll explain to him why Lewis can't do himself the pleasure of shooting him this morning; and you may add, with my compliments—Richard Frere's, at your service—that it's better luck than he deserves. By the way," he continued, "if you could give one a hint how to come by such a thing as a doctor I should esteem it an additional favour."

"I will call at the residence of an English physician as soon as I leave this house," was the reply; "fortunately, one who is reckoned very skilful resides within a few doors."

"That's right," returned Frere, "none of your foreign quacks for me. Doctors are bad enough all the world over, I dare say; but an English one is a degree better than any of your homeopathic, mesmeric, clairvoyant humbugs—At piacer di revedervi, Signor; I mean, Leben sie wohl, mein Herr. A mustachioed, lazed, and padded young puppy!" he continued, as, with a haughty bow and a puzzled expression of countenance, the young Austrian quitted the apartment; "can't he be content with cutting throats himself without encouraging his neighbours to go and shoot at one another! I hate a fellow who will be second in a duel as I hate a professional hangman. I'd half a mind to let poor Lewis strangle him—a foreigner more or less is no great matter."

The physician's opinion coincided with that of Richard Frere. Overwrought both in mind and body, Lewis had been attacked by a fever of the most virulent nature, and every resource that the science of medicine afforded appeared powerless to subdue it.

Night and day Richard Frere sat by the sick man's bedside, listening with an aching heart to his fevered ravings. Now, for the first time, did he become aware of the depth and strength of that passion which, having destroyed its victim's peace of mind, seemed about to finish its work of devastation by sapping the very springs of life itself. In his delirium the idea appeared to have fixed itself in Lewis's imagination that the duel had taken place, and that Lord Bellefield had perished by his hand, and the agonized expressions which his remorse forced from him were painful to listen to; occasionally he would appear to forget even this, and, imagining himself in the presence of her he loved, would breathe forth expressions of the deepest tenderness, when suddenly the recollection of his supposed guilt would flash across him, and, upbraiding himself in the bitterest terms, he would exclaim that a bar existed between them, and declare himself a murderer accursed before God and man. And so the weary days wore on, and the sufferer grew paler and weaker, while still the fire which was consuming his young life burned fiercely as at first.

The day following the night of Lord Bellefield's death was a remarkable one, for it witnessed the assassination of the unfortunate Marinovitch, whose courage and strong sense of duty forbade him to desert his post, even in order to preserve his life; this act of dastardly revenge heralded the revolt in Venice. The Palazzo Grassini was, as may be supposed, the scene of much alarm and anxiety. General Grant and Leicester had been foiled in their attempt to trace the after proceedings of the party who had kidnapped Lord Bellefield, nor was any light thrown upon his mysterious disappearance until another night and day had elapsed, when, in consequence of a high reward offered by the family to any person who could afford information in regard to the affair, an individual in the garb of a gondolier sought an interview with General Grant. This worthy (who was none other than Jacopo, the bravo whose siletto had so nearly proved fatal to Lewis) having bargained for the promised reward and for a free pardon for his own share in the transaction, confessed that he and certain of his associates had been engaged by an Englishman named Hardy, with whom he had been for some months acquainted, to seize and carry off a gentleman, against whom Hardy, for some reason, appeared to nourish a deep revenge; that this gentleman had been staying at the Palazzo Grassini; and that Hardy having pointed him out to him, he (Jacopo) had watched him the whole evening, and finding he remained abroad so late, had arranged to waylay him as he returned home, and succeeded in his design, though the plan was near being frustrated by the unexpected absence of Hardy, who however joined them at the last moment. He then communicated those details of the enterprise with which the reader is already acquainted, up to the time when he left Hardy and Lord Bellefield alone in the ruined convent, beyond which he either was, or affected to be, ignorant in regard to the affair. The clue thus gained was, however, sufficient. Led by Jacopo to the room in which the duel had taken place, the General and Leicester soon found their worst fears realized. The body lay covered with a cloak on which was pinned a paper, written by Hardy before the duel, stating his intention of forcing Lord Bellefield to a mortal combat, adding that when that paper was found, either one or both of them would have gone to their long account; at the bottom was scrawled in pencil:—

“I have kept my word; he brought his fate upon his own head—no one had any hand in his death, but myself; he fell in fair fight, having wounded me severely, but, as I think, not mortally.

“(Signed) MILES HARDY.”

All Leicester's early affection for his brother was brought back by his dreadful fate, and he wept over his corpse like a woman. The General shuddered slightly when his eye first perceived the expression of rage and hatred stereotyped on the rigid features of the dead man's face, then his brow contracted and his mouth grew stern, as he turned to issue directions for the murderer's apprehension. Whether being Italians, the police looked upon manslaughter with a favouring eye, or whether the disturbed state of the city facilitated his escape, certain it is that Miles Hardy contrived to evade the search made for him; and after offering large rewards for his apprehension, and using every other means in his power to stimulate the exertions of the police, General Grant was fain to rest satisfied that he had done all which the strictest sense of duty could demand at his hands. Perhaps, as the memory of the scene he had witnessed by poor Jane Hardy's death-bed recurred to him, and he thought of the cruel provocation her brother had received, even the stern old soldier might be glad that he had not been called upon to condemn Miles to an ignominious and cruel death.

The feelings both of Laura and Annie when they became acquainted with this frightful catastrophe, may easily be imagined. From Laura it was impossible to conceal it, for unused as he was to deep emotion of any kind, her husband's grief was for the time so overpowering, that he completely lost all self-control, and it was only by the judicious exercise of her good sense and tenderness, that she was enabled to restore him to anything like composure. Nor had she a much easier task with Annie, for a superstitious but not unnatural dread seized her lest (her earnest desire to avoid a union with Lord Bellefield having been thus fearfully accomplished,) she might be in some degree morally guilty. But Laura, tender, kind, judicious Laura, with her man's head and her woman's heart (a rare alliance, constituting human perfection), argued and soothed, and coaxed and reasoned, until Annie's self-upbraiding horror yielded to her gentle persuadings, as did of old the demon which tormented Saul to the melody of David's harp—and indeed there is on earth no music sweeter than a loving woman's voice.

During all this time poor Walter found himself sadly neglected. After the affair at the Casino, Mr. Spooner, ignorant of Lewis Arundel's illness, and fearful that he would keep his word and inform General Grant of the shameful manner in which he had betrayed his trust, found some plausible excuse for resigning his situation and returning to England, at the General's expense, before any exposure should take place. So he wrote himself a letter, announcing the death of his mother, (at that moment drinking brandy and water in the bar of an hotel in Birmingham whereof she was landlady,) and leaving three orphan sisters (invented for the occasion) solely dependent on him for everything, which epistle answered his purpose very nicely. After his departure, Walter was left pretty much to his own devices, and one of his chief amusements was drilling and talking to Faust, for whom all his old fondness had revived since the interview in which he had made up his quarrel with Annie. He was therefore especially annoyed and perplexed by a habit which the dog had lately acquired of absenting himself every day for several hours. Various were the schemes Walter laid to discover what became of the animal, but by some fatality they all failed to effect their object, and the cause of the dog's absence, as well as the mode in which he contrived to effect his egress, still remained a mystery. At length, one evening, as Walter was sitting at a window of the Grassini palace which looked into a small court-yard, or garden, enclosed by a high wall, his attention was attracted by observing something, which in the short glimpse he had of it appeared like an animal's head, pop up above the wall and disappear again. Watching the spot carefully, Walter soon witnessed a repetition of the phenomenon; but this time a rough hairy body and legs followed the head, and after a slight scramble the delinquent Faust himself made his appearance on the top of the wall, which was sufficiently broad to afford him a precarious footing: he then deliberately, but with great caution, walked along the narrow causeway thus afforded, until he reached a spot where the limb of an old tree grew so as nearly to touch the wall; upon this he got, and contrived, by a mode of progression half-slipping half-clambering, to arrive at a point whence he could easily jump to the ground. All these manœuvres Walter carefully noted, and formed his plan accordingly. The boy's curiosity—(we continue to use the term boy, for although in age and appearance poor Walter was now almost a man, in mind he was still far younger than his years, in spite of those occasional flashes of intelligence so often to be observed in cases of partial mental imbecility, which render a just estimate of the individual capacity so difficult to arrive at)—Walter's curiosity, we repeat, was thoroughly aroused by this discovery, and he determined if possible to find out the nature and object of Faust's clandestine expeditions. That he had some definite object Walter never for a moment doubted, for he had so completely made a friend and companion of the dog, that he had learned to look upon him much more as a reasonable being than as an animal guided only by an enlightened instinct.

For the rest of that day, and from an early hour on the following morning, Walter never lost sight of the dog, though he contrived to effect his purpose without interfering with its liberty of action. At length his patience was rewarded by seeing Faust enter the garden and begin to scramble up the identical tree, by means of which he had effected his descent on the previous day. Seizing his hat, Walter lost no time in following him; the tree was easy to climb, and the same branch which had afforded a passage for Faust, enabled Walter to reach the top of the wall in safety. On the other side the difficulties were still less, for the ruins of some ancient building lay scattered in all directions, and a pile of them actually came within a few feet of the top of the wall, forming a rough but efficient flight of steps. By the time Walter regained terra firma, however, Faust had proceeded some distance, and had he chosen to run on might still have preserved his secret inviolate. But when Walter called him, he stopped, and waited till his friend approached, though neither threats nor endearments could prevail upon him to turn back, or to allow Walter to come near enough to lay hold of him. And so the pair proceeded, Faust running on for a short distance, waiting till Walter drew near, and then resuming his course. The route the dog pursued avoided the more frequented ways, and Walter began to think Faust was merely taking a stroll for the benefit of his constitution, when the animal suddenly turned down an archway, and, looking back to see that his friend followed, proceeded along a narrow alley which led into one of the smaller streets, and stopped at the door of a house which projected beyond some of the others. The door stood ajar, and Faust without ceremony pushed it further open and walked in. Walter paused, debating as well as his mental capacity enabled him to do, whether or not he should venture to follow. It was a knotty point to decide. On the one hand his fears urged him to turn back and not risk facing the possible dangers which might lie hidden within this mysterious mansion; curiosity, on the other hand, prompted him to enter and discover at once and for ever the aim and end of Faust's incomprehensible visits. Fear was very nearly gaining the day, when, in thinking over every motive, probable or improbable, which might influence the dog, the bright idea flashed across him, that perhaps Faust had discovered his former master, and the hope of again meeting his "dear Mr. Arundel" outweighing every other consideration, he boldly opened the door, and encountering Faust, who had returned to look for him, followed that sagacious quadruped up a flight of stairs.

Now it so happened, that the particular morning in question was that of the 14th day from the commencement of Lewis's illness, and the physician had pronounced the crisis of the disease to be at hand. He had seen his patient late on the previous evening, and administered to him a powerful narcotic, from the effect of which he had not recovered when Walter and Faust commenced their ramble. Frere, who had sat up with him all night, had gone out to refresh himself with a short walk, leaving Lewis under the care of Antonelli, his old attendant. This worthy man had in his turn been called down to see a friend, who having heard of the Signor Luigi's illness, had come to prescribe some uncomfortable remedy in the infallibility whereof his faith was as unshakable as his ignorance on all medical subjects was profound. Antonelli, whose grief at his patron's danger had been overpowering, was easily interested in his friend's account of the wonderful specific, and with the garrulity of age, remained discussing its merits for a much longer space of time than he was at all aware of. Thus it came about that Walter, when he had followed Faust up-stairs, and, after a second fit of hesitation, entered an apartment through the partially open door of which the dog had disappeared, found himself in a room, in one corner of which stood a small iron bedstead whereon lay some person, who from his deep regular breathing seemed to be in a sound sleep. Cautiously, and with noiseless footsteps, the boy approached and gazed upon the sleeper, nor for a moment could he recognise, in the pale worn face which met his view, the features of his "dear Mr. Arundel." But this doubt was speedily resolved when Lewis moved uneasily in his sleep and muttered some indistinct words, amongst which Walter caught the name of Annie. Two clear ideas now presented themselves to the boy's mind; his friend was asleep and must not be roused, and from the expression of his features he must be either ill or unhappy. Having arrived at these conclusions, he proceeded to act upon them by seating himself at the bedside, to wait patiently till Lewis should awake, while he devoted all the powers of his intellect to form some theory by which to account for the change in his late tutor's appearance. As he thus sat anxiously watching, Lewis again turned restlessly, murmuring something, the meaning of which Walter could not catch, then speaking more distinctly, he said,

"She leaned upon his arm; she smiled on him; she loves him! I saw it with my own eyes."

He said this so plainly, that Walter, fancying he must be awake, addressed him, and asked if he were ill. Lewis caught the sound of the words, and replied,—

"Ill in mind, Frere, nothing more."

Walter, still believing him to be awake, continued,

"It is I—Walter; do you not know me?"

For a moment, the sleeping man made no reply; then resuming the conversation which he imagined himself holding with Frere, he exclaimed eagerly:

"Love one man, and engage herself to another! I tell you no! Annie Grant never loved me!"

At this moment, Faust, (who had been lying quietly, and as if he were quite at home, on a rug by the bedside,) roused by the sound of his master's voice, placed his fore-paws on the bed, and finding himself unnoticed, endeavoured to attract attention by licking first the sick man's hand and then his face. The effect of the opiate had by this time in great measure worn off, and roused by Faust's intrusive affection, Lewis awoke with a violent start, and attempting to raise himself to a sitting posture, gazed around him in surprise, and fell back upon his pillow from weakness. After lying for some moments perfectly motionless, he again unclosed his eyes and asked in a low faint voice,—“Am I dreaming still, or did I see Walter?”

“No, you are awake now, dear Mr. Arundel; it is I, Walter; Faust found you out, and brought me to see you.”

As Walter mentioned Faust, Lewis for the first time perceived his old favourite, and stretched out his hand with the intention of patting him, but the effort was beyond his strength, and his arm sank powerless by his side. Faust, however, perceived the attention, and acknowledged it by again licking his hand. Lewis turned his languid eyes from Walter to the dog, and a tear stole down his wasted cheek, then his lips grew compressed and an expression of anguish overspread his countenance. With consciousness had also returned bitter memories. In the meanwhile Walter, delighted at recovering his long-lost friend, grew loquacious in the fulness of his joy, and ran on in his usual disconnected manner.

“So you haven't forgotten Faust then, Mr. Arundel? He has never forgotten you either, poor fellow! all the time you have been away; but I've taken great care of him, you see—he's nice and fat, isn't he? we've been very good friends too, only we used to quarrel sometimes when he would follow Annie, and I did not like it, because—because”—here he paused, having a kind of confused recollection that this was a subject on which he wanted to say something particular. After waiting for a minute or two, his ideas grew in a degree clearer, and he continued:

“You know I took a dislike to poor Annie, because I thought she made you go away. I always thought so until she told me it was not the case, and how fond she was of you.”

When Walter first mentioned Annie's name, Lewis started and made a gesture to induce him to be silent, but the boy did not understand his wishes, and his auditor soon became too much absorbed in the interest of his disclosures to seek again to interrupt him.

“You were talking about Annie just now, you know, before you were quite awake,” resumed Walter, “and you said she did not love you. I remember I thought so too once, and that was the reason why you went away, and so I took a dislike to her, and would not let Faust follow her, only he would; but we were both quite wrong, for Annie is just as fond of you as Faust and I are, and now I'll tell you how I came to find it out.” He then in his rambling way gave a childish but perfectly intelligible account of his conversation with Annie Grant, with which the reader is already acquainted. Just as he had finished his recital, Richard Frere returned from his walk in time to overhear the last few words of the history, and to discover that Lewis had fainted from intense emotion.

THE HISTORY OF PUPPET-SHOWS IN ENGLAND.

(From the Revue des Deux Mondes.)

If I intended in these pages merely to write complimentary phrases in honour of puppet-shows, my task would be an easy one and soon accomplished; but I propose rather to trace the faithful and detailed history of this minor species of drama, which occupied a distinguished rank amongst the Greeks and Romans, and which, in modern times, has obtained the precedence amongst many of its prouder rivals. It is at present my intention to relate how my little clients have been received in England and in Germany. It would not have been surprising if an entertainment, which supposes in the artist who performs it and in the assembly who witness it, such prompt susceptibility of imagination, had obtained less success under the rigid sky of London, Amsterdam, and Naples, than in Greece, Italy, France, and Spain.

It has not, however, been so; and I can assert, without fear of being contradicted by the facts which are to follow, that the nations of Germanic origin, who are always regarded as gifted with more serious temperaments than those of southern nations, have received these fantastic representations as readily and as heartily as their more easily amused neighbours. We shall find our little wooden comedians as much loved, cherished, and understood, on the banks of the Thames, the Oder, and the Zuyderzee, as at Naples, Paris, or Seville.

In England especially, the love of this species of drama has been so universally experienced, that it would probably be impossible to find a single poet from the time of Chaucer down to Lord Byron, or a single prose writer from Sir Philip Sydney to Mr. W. Hazlitt, who has not in his works given abundant information on the subject, or at least made frequent allusions to it. The dramatic writers, especially, commencing with those who were the glory of the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. have given the most curious particulars concerning the arrangement and directors of Puppet-shows. Shakspeare himself did not disdain to draw from this singular arsenal ingenious and energetic metaphors, which he puts into the mouths of his most tragic personages at the most pathetic moments. I may mention ten or twelve pieces by this poet in which allusions of this description are found: “The Two Gentlemen of Verona;” “The Winter's Tale;” the First Part of “Henry IV;” “The Taming of the Shrew;” “Twelfth Night;” “Love's Labour Lost;” “Midsummer Night's Dream;” “Antony and Cleopatra;” “Hamlet;” “The Tempest;” “Romeo and Juliet;” and “King Lear.” The contempo-aries and successors of this great poet, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Milton, Davenant, Swift, Addison, Gay, Fielding, Goldsmith, Sheridan, and others, have also borrowed many moral and satirical similes from this popular entertainment. Thanks to this singular attachment of the dramatic writers to their little frequenters of the highways and cross-roads, I have found sufficient information in their works to form a collection of more complete and detailed accounts of English puppet-shows, than I may venture to affirm any better-informed critic has hitherto done. This is one of the most remarkable effects of the difference between literature that is called romantic and that more sober literature designated classic. Assuredly an English or German critic might in vain study with the utmost care the great French dramatic writers, Corneille, Rotrou, Racine, Molière, Regnard, Marivaux himself, and Beaumarchais; he would be unable to gather from these works a collection of observations sufficiently precise and substantial to enable him to write the smallest portion of the civil or literary history of France. I do not mention this as an error of the great French writers; God forbid! it is merely a simple fact which I remark in passing, and which appears to me clearly to mark the difference between these two classes of poetry, one of which enters a sphere of ideal generalization, while the other, devoting its attention more particularly to characteristic singularities, plunges its roots deeply and firmly into individual reality.

L.—MECHANIC STATUARY IN THE CHURCHES—IN MIRACLE PLAYS AND IN PAGEANTS.

In England, as in all other parts, movable sculpture was first employed in the ceremonies of religious worship. The crucifix with springs, belonging to the abbey of Boxley, is not an isolated proof of monastic superstition. Until the time of Henry VIII., the catholic clergy celebrated the solemnities of Christmas, Easter, and the Ascension, "in manner of a show and interlude," in all the churches of Great Britain. On these occasions "certain small puppettes" were employed. The historian from whom I gathered these details, relates that he was present in 1520, at the celebration of Pentecost in St. Paul's Cathedral, where he saw the descent of the Holy Ghost represented by a white pigeon, which was made to issue from a hole in the middle of the roof of the nave.¹ Similar spectacles also took place in the country. At Witney, a large parish in the county of Oxford, the clergy represented the resurrection of our Saviour, by means of statuettes with springs, representing the living Christ, Mary, the guards of the tomb, and the other actors of this sacred drama;² but, at the invasion of protestantism, all the dramatic rites, and even instrumental music, were banished from the Churches. In truth, there have always been, in Christian society, two schools completely divided as to the share of influence which ought to be exercised by the fine arts in the celebration of rites. All the Protestant sects are like branches issuing from the most austere of these two schools and they have even surpassed it in severity. Anglicans, Lutherans, Presbyterians, have all done their part to abolish the religious ceremonies which catholicism had introduced or tolerated. Although the Anglican Church has retained in its ritual far more of the ancient liturgy than any dissenting communion, it has, nevertheless, under the influence of puritanism, abolished from the churches all the figurative practices which Knox, Cameron, and their disciples, designated papistical mummeries. Dean Swift, in his "Tale of a Tub," calls Lord Peter (such is the sobriquet he applies to the pope) the original author of puppets and raree-shows. The pencil of the celebrated Hogarth has illustrated this text in an engraving entitled, "Enthusiasm delineated," in which is seen a Jesuit in a pulpit, under whose half-opened cassock we perceive the end of a harlequin's dress. With each hand the enthusiastic preacher moves a puppet; with the right, God the Father, after Raphael; with the left, Satan, after Rubens. On the railings round the pulpit are six other puppets, namely Adam and Eve, St. Peter and St. Paul, and Moses and Aaron.³ Urged by the fury of the new iconoclasts, the clergy not only banished from their churches the ancient monuments of movable statuary, but also destroyed them. Stow informs us of the fate of the crucifix of Boxley, which, he said, was called "the crucifix of graces," and whose eyes and mouth moved "with divers vices." On Sunday, the 24th February, 1538, it was shown to the people by the preacher, who was the Bishop of Rochester, then carried to Powle's Cross and destroyed before the multitude.⁴

However, the religious drama, although excluded from the churches, was nevertheless long maintained amongst many societies which had been founded by Catholics, and continued by Anglicans. In the mysteries and miracle plays performed at Chester, Coventry, Oxford, Towneley, &c., the movable statuary introduced several giants mentioned in Scripture, and in legends, such as Samson, Goliath, and St. Christopher, as well as some monstrous animals, such as Jonah's whale, St. George's dragon, &c., colossal pieces of wicker-work, which were moved with much adroitness by men placed in the interior.

Other large puppets had also, and have preserved for a long period their share in the municipal and popular pageants, such as the annual procession at the election of the lord mayor, and May-games. In the first of these pageants were seen, among other amusing masquerades, figures of fabulous giants armed cap-à-pié. In London, Gogmagog and Corinæus, now immovable on their pedestals in Guildhall, were introduced in the procession.¹ In the May-games, the procession was composed, according to the importance of the place, of a greater or smaller number of groups, who had each their separate chiefs, dances and songs.² Generally there was a Jack or a Jeannot frolicking and jesting in front of the cortège, or a fool in official costume, that is, with a fool's cap and bells. Then came the principal actors of the national ballads, Robin Hood, Friar Tuck, Maid Marian, all represented (including the beautiful Marian and her companions) by young boys dressed according to the characters they performed. This procession, in order to leave nothing to be desired, brought up the rear with several groups particularly in favour with the people, such as Morris-dancers and hobby-horses,—horses formed of wicker-work, with heads of pasteboard, which were made to move and walk by men concealed under the folds of the long trappings.³ This last part of the May-games was the constant object of violent reprobation on the part of the precisians, or most rigid Protestants. Thus, in spite of the affection of the people, hobby-horses were suppressed, towards the middle of the reign of Elizabeth, as one of the damnable remains of paganism. The regret of the populacc was testified by a satirical ballad, of which the chorus, having become proverbial, furnished Shakspeare with one of the most cutting remarks in the sarcastic dialogue between Hamlet and Ophelia during the representation of the murder of the king, his father:

"Ham. What should a man do, but be merry? for, look you how cheerfully my mother looks, and my father died within these two hours.

"Oph. Nay, 'tis twice two months, my lord.

"Ham. So long? Nay then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables. O heavens! die two months ago, and not forgotten yet! Then there's hope a great man's memory may outlive his life half a-year: but, by'r lady, he must build churches then: or else shall he suffer not thinking on, with the hobby-horse; whose epitaph is, For, O, for, O, the hobby-horse is forgot."⁴

In Ben Jonson's comedy of "Bartholomew Fair," performed in 1614, we find the word hobby-horse employed in its simple and primitive acceptation,—namely, as a child's plaything: "What do you lack, what do you buy, mistress?" says an itinerant merchant, "a fine hobby-horse to make your son a tilter? a drum to make him a soldier? a fiddle to make him a reveller?"⁵

A zealous puritan, however, who passes at the time, begins abusing the merchant, and styles his hobby-horse "an idol, a very idol, a fierce and rank idol."

After numerous re-establishments and abolitions, the cavalcade of hobby-horses was again in great favour during the reign of Charles I. In a tragic-comedy of William Sampson, the "Vow-breaker," we find a very amusing picture of the laborious exercises of a citizen who, under the long trappings of his osier palfrey was to turn, trot, gallop, and kick naturally. The author has described in a very original manner the despair of an unfortunate man, destined for this part, who is about to be supplanted in his occupation after having undergone the fatiguing apprenticeship of a horse's paces, and when he is able at length to flatter himself that he can very creditably prance, rear, amble, neigh, shake the plumes and ribands of his mane in time, and sound his bells at the precise moment.⁶ The preoccupation of mind naturally caused by so arduous a task gave rise to the expression, which has ever since been retained: "It is his hobby-horse."⁷ At the commencement of the present century, the name of hobby-horse was given to a plaything consisting of a plank supported between two small wheels, and furnished with a spring, by means of which it could easily be set in motion and directed. A singular passion for this child's game took possession of the inhabitants of Great Britain of every age and rank, thirty years ago. In 1819 and 1820, these little machines studded the avenues of all the parks in England. Caricature, as may easily be credited, obtained abundant occupation through this hobby-mania. Princes and ministers, whigs and tories, were all represented bestriding their hobbies. Mr. Thomas Wright published as a specimen of the picturesque jokes with which this caprice was welcomed, a caricature representing the "military episcopal duke of York" urging his fiery hobby on the Windsor road, in the pursuit of the reduction of the civil list, from which however he deducted a considerable share.⁸

II.—VARIOUS NAMES GIVEN TO PUPPET-SHOWS.

The generic term puppet, derived either from the French "poupée" or the Latin "pupa," is found for the first time about the year 1360, under the ancient form of "popet," in the works of Chaucer, where he employs it, according to some critics, in the sense of

(6) In his declaration of May 24th, 1618, King James included hobby-horses amongst the lawful games after prayers on Sundays and holy-days. See "Book of sports and lawful recreations after evening prayers and upon holy-days," mentioned by Burton, "Anatomy of Melancholy," p. 273, Oxford edit. 1638. However, the royal will could not prevail against fanaticism. In Ben Jonson's "Gipsies metamorphosed," which was performed before the king three years later, complaints are still made of the absence of the morris-dancers and hobby-horses.

(8) I have found this expression in a letter of John Dennis, which appears to belong to the year 1695. (The select works of John Dennis, vol. ii. p. 510); but was it in use at the time of Shakspeare? I submit this doubt to Mr. Benjamin Laroche, à propos of the manner in which he has rendered the passage of "Hamlet" above quoted, and the note he has added thereto.

a movable doll. In the prologue to one of the "Canterbury Tales," ("the rime of Sir Thopas,") Chaucer supposes that the master of the hotel in which the narrators are assembled thus speaks :—

"This were a popet in arms to embrace
For any woman small and fair of face."¹

This word, taken in a general sense, is so frequently used even by the most serious writers in the reign of Elizabeth, that I will only quote one example taken from Shakspeare.

In the "Taming of the Shrew," a gentleman of a very positive character begs one of his friends to procure him a wealthy wife, "as," says he, "wealth is burden of my wooing dance." Grumio, his valet, in order to leave no doubt concerning his master's opinion adds :

"Nay, look you, Sir, he tells you flatly what his mind is. Why, give him gold enough and marry him to a puppet, or an aglet-baby, or an old trot with ne'er a tooth in her head, though she have as many diseases as two-and-fifty horses; why, nothing comes amiss, so money comes withal."

In the "Tempest," the magician Prospero, invoking the spirits of the air, his nimble and invisible servants, calls them demi-puppets.

"You demi-puppets that
By moonshine do the green sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites."²

This name of demi-puppets is in truth very applicable to the little subjects of Prospero, who act more by his direction than by their own impulses.

Another name formerly given to puppets is that of "maumet" or "mammet," which, like the ancient French word "marmouset," originally signified idol.³ It was applied with extension to the figures of saints which were placed in the interior and in the environs of churches, and at length to the movable dolls by means of which scenes from the Bible and from martyrology were represented at fairs. This expression is met with in Romeo and Juliet. The old Capulet, enraged by the obstinacy of his daughter in refusing the hand of Paris, exclaims :—

"God's bread! it makes me mad :
Day, night, hour, tide, time, work, play, Alone, in company, still my care hath been
To have her match'd : and having now provided
A gentleman of noble parentage,
Of fair demesnes, youthful, and nobly train'd,
Stuff'd (as they say) with honourable parts,
Proportion'd as one's heart could wish a man,—
And then to have a wretched puling fool,
A whining mammet, in her fortune's tender,
To answer—'I'll not wed,'—'I cannot love,'
'I am too young,'—'I pray you, pardon me.'"⁴

(3) Chaucer, "Canterbury Tales," Poetical Works, p. 163. vol. 2, p. 31.

(4) "Romeo and Juliet," Act iii. Sc. 5. The word "mammet" is employed with the same meaning, in the "First Part of Henry IV" Act ii. Sc. 2.

During the latter part of the sixteenth and the whole of the seventeenth century, the word "motion" was employed, which originally signified "movement," and was, by extension, applied to a doll, either an automaton, or one moved by wires, and at length to a puppet-show. We find a remarkable instance of the first sense (that of an automaton) in a comedy of Beaumont and Fletcher, entitled the "Pilgrim." A young lord, feigning to be dumb, introduces himself in the midst of a troop of beggars, to the house of his mistress' father. The latter, irritated at being unable to obtain a word from the young man, exclaims angrily :

"What country craver are you? Nothing but motion,
A puppet-pilgrim."⁵

The second sense, that of a small figure moved by wires, was much in use at the end of the sixteenth century. Examples of it were abundant. Let it suffice to quote a line from "The Two gentlemen of Verona," in which the word "motion," is employed as synonymous with "puppet."

"O excellent motion! O exceeding puppet!"⁶

Ben Jonson has employed the word motion twice in the same line, at first, in the sense of a mechanic doll, then in that of a puppet-show.⁷ He again plays on the latter sense and on the original, (that of movement,) in one of his best pieces: "Every man out of his humour." Before the curtain is raised, he presents to us Asper, the supposed author of the comedy about to be performed, who is placing in ambush near the stage two of his confidants whom he enjoins to examine the work thoroughly, and above all, to notice the effect it produces on the audience :

"Note me; if in all this front
You can espy a gallant of this mark,
Who to be thought one of the judicious,
Sits with his arms thus wreath'd, his hat pull'd here,
Cries mew, and nods, then shakes his empty head,
Will show more several motions in his face
Than the new London, Rome, or Ninveh."

Again, in "the Silent Woman," the same writer applies, still more curiously, this word "motion" to two quite contrary ideas, that of silence and agitation. The chief actor in this comedy is a Mr. Morose, who, we are told in the list of personages, is a gentleman who dislikes noise. He thinks he has acted admirably in marrying a woman whom he believes to be dumb, but who proves neither a woman nor dumb. Epicene,⁸ as his learned name indicates, is a young man in female dress. Great is the astonishment of Mr. Morose at the first words he hears from the mouth of the supposed dumb one. "You can speak then?"—"Ay, sir," replies she; "why, did you think you had married a statue or a motion only? one of the French puppets, with the eyes turned with a wire? or some innocent out the hospital, that would stand with her hands shut, and a plaise mouth, and look upon you?"

And, in truth, the "Silent Woman" speaks so well and so loudly, and creates such a disturbance in the house, that at the fifth act, the unfortunate lover of silence, deafened and distracted, exclaims despairingly: "You do not know in what a misery I have been exercised this day—what a torrent of evil! my very head turns round with the tumult! I dwell in a wind-mill: the perpetual motion is here, and not at Eltham."

The author thus opposes the words "perpetual motion" taken in the proper and ordinary sense, to the "motions" taken from sacred history, which were then so popular at Eltham, that they were performed from morning till night.¹

To these various names applied to puppet-shows, we must add one other, that of "drollery." In the third act of the "Tempest," the old King of Naples being shipwrecked on the shore of an enchanted island, where he is welcomed by a concert performed by invisible musicians, a multitude of little spirits speedily serve him with a magnificent repast, and then perform a silent dance round the table. The king in surprise asks who these little beings are? Sebastian, one who was shipwrecked with the king, replies:

"A living drollery: Now I will believe,
That there are unicorns; that in Arabia,
There is one tree, the phoenix throne; one phoenix
At this hour reigning there."²

Thus, according to Steevens, the word "drollery" signified, in the time of Shakspeare, a farce performed by wooden machines, since the single addition of the word "living" suffices to render these little creatures a phenomenon not less wonderful than the unicorn or the phoenix. In our time and since the middle of the last century, the terms "drollery" or "droll" have only been applied to the farces performed by a juggler in the open air in front of itinerary theatres.

Thus we find four words applied to various kinds of puppet-shows, "puppet," "mammet," "motion," and "drollery."

III.—PUPPET-SHOWS FROM THE FOURTEENTH CENTURY TO THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE REGULAR THEATRE. (1562.)

Puppet-shows, as well in England, as in every other part of the world where they were known, were but the reproduction in miniature and at little expense of the mysteries and miracle plays which the members of various societies performed with great pomp on holy-days. The advantage which motion-men possessed over the performers of mysteries was the power of carrying their miniature theatres from town to town, and exhibiting at every season in the year and several times a-day, their instructive wonders. Besides the scenes taken from mysteries, they again introduced the personages and episodes most admired by the populace in the May-games and pageants, especially the heroes of national ballads, King Bladud, Robin Hood, Young Marian, and Little John. They even exhibited in miniature the giants who had been so much admired in the municipal festivals, as well as the morris-dancers and hobby-horses. Many of these persons have left no other traces of their ancient renown but on the theatres of puppet-shows. Hawkins remarks that a little before the time in which he wrote, a Moor dancing a saraband was one of the indispensable actors of puppet-shows.³ As to the giants, the Duke of Newcastle, in his comedy of "the Humorous Lovers" performed in 1677,⁴ makes one of his actors say, that he was shown, in order to alarm him, a man dressed "like a giant in a puppet-show." Punch's famous horse with his kicks might be very probably a last remembrance of hobby-horses. When, in the middle of the fifteenth century, the societies began to vary their performances by adding to the miracle-plays moralities, or plays in which vices and virtues were personified, (a proceeding which soon introduced the comedy of manners and intrigue, as mysteries opened the way for historical drama,) the actors of puppet-shows hastened to follow their example. They had merely to carve in wood or pasteboard a dozen new actors, "Perverse Doctrine," "Gluttony," "Vanity," "Lechery," "Blunders," and that personage who included them all, "Old Vice," or as he was also called sometimes "the Old Iniquity."⁵ This actor, a sort of low Harlequin⁶ descended from the ancient buffoons, was, in all pieces performed by the societies, the joyous partner of the "Devil." Shakspeare, in Hamlet, has taken from this buffoon of moralities and puppet-shows an allusion of most striking energy. In the midst of Hamlet's cutting reproaches to his mother, he gives a frightful portrait of Claudius:

"A murderer, and a villain:
A slave, that is not twentieth part the tythe
Of your precedent lord: a vice of kings:
A cutpurse of the empire and the rule;
That from a shelf the precious diadem stole,
And put it in his pocket!

—A king
Of shreds and patches:—"⁷

In "Twelfth Night," Shakspeare completes the character and costume of an old buffoon:—

"Like to the Old Vice

Who with dagger of lath
Cries Ah! ah! to the devil."⁸

To those who doubt that the theatres of puppet-shows represented morals, I offer the testimony of Shakspeare. The loyal Count of Kent seizing an emissary of Goneril, the ungrateful daughter of the aged monarch, apostrophises him in these terms :

"Take Vanity, the puppet's part, against the royalty of her father."¹

We see from this that "Vanity" or "Layd Vanity,"² who was one of the habitual performers of moralities, figured also in puppet-shows.³ As to the titles of either the moralities or miracle-plays acted by marmets during this first period, we know nothing, in fact, with any degree of certainty. I think, however, that we can indicate three religious pieces which appear to have been performed by puppets before 1560. In a posthumous pamphlet of Robert Greene, published in 1592 (the year of his death) under the title of "Greene's Groat's-worth of Wit bought with a Million of Repentance," an old comedian boasts to Roberto (probably Robert Greene himself), that he was seven years an "absolute interpreter of the puppets," and that he had composed two excellent moralities, "Man's Wit" and the "Dialogue of Dives."⁴ It is to Shakspeare we owe our knowledge of the third piece. In the "Winter's Tale," the bandit Autolycus, who had disguised himself in order to commit some wicked deed, says, in speaking of himself to some one who questions him without knowing who he is,—

"I know this man well; he hath been since an ape-bearer, then a process-server, a bailiff; then he compassed a motion of the 'Prodigal Son.'"⁵

IV.—PUPPET-SHOWS FROM 1562 UNTIL THE END OF THE REIGN OF CHARLES I.

The narrow limit of puppet-shows was naturally enlarged when the regular theatre was established in England. The great revolution which took place in European taste, and which has been termed the revival, was manifested with regard to the English theatre about 1562.⁶ Then to the morals, masques, and interludes, which had been in favour under the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI. and Mary, were added a host of new species of drama, tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral, pastoral-tragical, comical-pastoral, in a word, Jonson also arms "the Old Iniquity" with a wooden dagger in "The Devil is an Ass," Act i. Sc. 1. Works, vol. v. pp. 13, 14.

(3) Mr. Whalley, editor and commentator of Ben Jonson, quotes in support of this opinion a passage from "The Alchemist," in which are these words: "A puppet with a vice;" but this does not speak of the Vice of moralities, but of a puppet moved with a vice, as Messrs. Farmer (Malone's Shakspeare by Boswell, vol. xix. p. 249), and Gifford (Works of Ben Jonson, vol. iv. p. 41 and note), have remarked. We have already noticed the crucifix of Boxley moved "with divers vices."

(6) This year, 1562, "Gorboduc," the first English tragedy, composed in the ancient form and with choruses, was performed before the king at Whitehall. It is not, however, certain that a drama on the subject of Romeo and Juliet did not precede "Gorboduc."

every form of scenic diversion which Polonius so pedantically enumerates in "Hamlet." The puppet players hastened to imitate this new description of entertainment. After the example of the children or scholars of St. Paul's, Westminster, Windsor, the Queen's Chapel, and the servants of the Earls of Leicester, Essex, Warwick, Lord Clinton, &c., who, without ceasing to perform on certain days miracle-plays and morals, daily offered to the public pieces taken from ancient or national history, the puppet-players procured a double series of amusements, the one religious, the other profane. Amongst the pieces of the former class, the remembrance of which has survived, I may mention "Babylon,"⁷ "Jonah and the Whale," "Sodom and Gomorrah," the "Destruction of Jerusalem,"⁸ and the most celebrated of the "motions" of this period, the "City of Nineveh."⁹ This last, if I may believe a rather equivocal eulogium passed upon it by a contemporary dramatist, presented a succession of sights made rather to please the eye than the mind.¹⁰ As to the pieces on profane subjects, Ben Jonson acquaints us with two, "Rome" and "London," which he associates with "Nineveh," and which offered probably, like the latter, a spectacle more picturesque than dramatic.¹¹ After having found the motion-men unscrupulously appropriating the best passages of mysteries and moralities, we shall not be surprised to see them acting with the same liberty towards the first works of the regular theatre. "I have seen," says one of the actors in an old comedy, "all our chronicle-plays performed by puppets."¹² In truth, subjects taken from national history particularly pleased the multitude. "Lantern Letherhead," an excellent type of a puppet-player, whom Ben Jonson has introduced in Bartholomew Fair, remembering the brilliant success he has met with in his career, pauses with satisfaction at the chronicle-plays, saying, "Jerusalem was a stately thing, and so was Nineveh, and the City of Norwich,"¹³ and Sodom and Gomorrah, with the rising of the 'prentices, and pulling down the hawdy-houses there upon Shrove-Tuesday; but the Gunpowder-plot there was a get-penny! I have presented that to an eighteen or twenty pence audience, nine times in an afternoon. Your homeborn projects prove ever the best, they are so easy and familiar."¹⁴ Eighteen or twenty pence for entrance was a considerable and extraordinary sum, for our friend Lanthorn informs us elsewhere, that the usual price for places at puppet-shows was much less exorbitant. Before the opening, he causes the performance to be announced by a drum, and places at the door a man with good lungs, to call out; "Twopence a-piece, gentlemen, twopence a-piece! an excellent motion! the best motion in the fair!"

However, the motion-men were not contented with performing chronicle-plays; they carried their ambition higher; they attempted to represent tragedies, properly so called. Dekker, a contemporary of Shakspeare, tells us that he has seen "Julius Cæsar," and "the Duke of Guise," acted by mummets.¹ His testimony is confirmed by that of two writers of the same time, John Marston and the unknown author of the comedy, entitled the "Woman out of her Humour." The question naturally presents itself, what was this "Duke of Guise," and above all, this "Julius Cæsar?" It is probable, that the first of these tragical puppet-plays was taken in part from Christopher Marlow's drama, "The Massacre of Paris, with the Death of the Duke of Guise." As to "Julius Cæsar," the editor of Punch and Judy hesitates not to think, that it was Shakspeare's tragedy; but this opinion, which, in itself, is not improbable, is contradicted by a chronological impossibility. For it is in the "Dutch Courtesan," a comedy printed in 1605, that Marston speaks of the "Julius Cæsar" of the puppet-shows, and the tragedy of Shakspeare did not appear on the stage, at the earliest, until 1607.² It is, therefore, certain that the Julius Cæsar of the puppet-shows could only have been borrowed from one of those pieces, sufficiently extensive in number, which were composed on this subject before Shakspeare; perhaps, from that which was acted before Queen Elizabeth on the 1st January, 1563, and which the curious remember with interest as the first English drama, the subject of which was taken from Roman history. In any case, be this piece what it may, it could only have been represented on a puppet-show by extracts, since Lanthorn Letherhead informs us, that the players of puppet-shows gave as many as nine representations of the same piece in an evening.

This encroachment of puppet-players on the classic grounds keenly wounded the self-love and interests of authors and comedians, who consequently let no opportunity escape of depreciating their impertinent rivals. It is from their constant raillery that we obtain our best and most certain information. The old motion-men themselves, who had been accustomed to make the persons mentioned in the Bible and the well-known heroes of national ballads speak and act, testified but little approbation of this innovation. Ben Jonson, who in "Bartholomew Fair," as we have seen, so cleverly places on the stage a puppet-player of the old school, again introduces him to us when he is angrily complaining of this invasion of pedantry into puppet-shows: "They put too much learning in their things now-o'-days," he observes, "and that, I fear, will be the spoil of this."⁴

Dekker, who tells us what the puppet-players borrowed from both the tragic and comic drama, was not altogether disinterested in the question. He is suspected of having written more than one "drollery" and some anonymous prologues, at the request of the Smithfield and Fleet-Bridge motion-men, and could not consequently behold his patrons providing for their wants by extracts from the dramas admired at the "Globe" and "Phoenix" without dissatisfaction.⁵

Ben Jonson, to complete the ridicule entertained for puppet-players, who had a great fondness for tragedies, introduces us in the fifth act of "Bartholomew Fair," to one of these ludicrously classical performances. The following is the play-bill of the chief piece, read by an amateur before entering Lanthorn's little hall: "The ancient-modern History of Hero and Leander, otherwise called the Touchstone of True Love, with as true a trial of friendship between Damon and Pythias, two faithful friends of the Bankside."⁶

We thus see, that in order to please the eager lovers of Grecian antiquity, "Lanthorn Letherhead" thinks he cannot do better than couple and amalgamate two of these heroic subjects, judging that there cannot be too much of a good thing. The dialogue justifies the bill, and superabundantly accomplishes what the latter had promised. During the whole of the eighteenth century, we found in Paris the puppet-players of the fairs of St. Germain and St. Laurent parodying the best French tragedies, including Alzire and Mérope; whilst at London, in 1814, one of the most illustrious dramatic poets parodied the puppet-plays of the fair on one of the first theatres! Strange inversion of parts, and all to the advantage of puppet-shows!

We must not, however, fancy that there were only itinerant motion-men in England. Besides the puppet-players in the open air, who raised their little stages at Stourbridge-Fair⁷ and Smithfield, there were showmen in possession of halls, among other places at Paris Garden,⁸ and in the most populous parts of the city, at Holborn Bridge and Fleet Street.⁹ Curiosity frequently led the crowd out of London as far as Eltham, a royal residence, in the county of Kent, the motions of which place were celebrated. Jasper Mayne, in his piece entitled "The City Match," alludes to the custom of the London women of going to Brentford to see the puppet-shows. This amusement was also greatly liked in the country. Puppet-shows were considered as one of the most agreeable pastimes the gentry could enjoy. In one of Ben Jonson's comedies, "Cynthia's Revels," Phantaste, enumerating the pleasures a woman might hope to enjoy in the various stations of life, says,

"As I were a shepherdess, I would be piped and sung to; as a dairy-wench, I would dance at May-poles and make syllabubs; as a country-gentlewoman, keep a good house, and come up to term to see motions."¹

Sometimes the country people would even go to London to be present at puppet-shows, as we see from Ben Jonson, in "Every Man out of his Humour." Frequently the motion-men carried their little wooden actors to the houses of rich citizens and merchants at family festivals. It sometimes happened that individuals contributed by their ability and wit to the amusement of these shows. Thus Ben Jonson in the last piece he gave to the public, (the "Tale of a Tub,") shows us a young esquire offering to his relatives and friends the treat of a puppet-show, of which he is at once the subject and inventor. Under Henry VII., there were even strangers in the streets of London, who became puppet-players. A letter of the privy council, addressed to the Lord Mayor the 14th of July, 1573, authorizes some Italians to show their "strange motions" in the city.²

As to the acting, there were two kinds of puppet-plays, that in which the little figures were dumb, and that in which they were supposed to talk. The two puppet-shows in the works of Ben Jonson, furnish us with an example of each mode of representation. The masque performed by puppets, which concludes the "Tale of a Tub," is executed according to the manner which I consider a legacy transmitted to the jugglers of the middle ages by the last pantomimes of antiquity. This method consists of a dumb show, explained by a verbal exposition or descriptive song, and is called a pageant, of which Cervantes has left us so charming a description in the show given by Peter, the "Titerero," to the company assembled in a "venta" of La Mancha.³ The masque, in the "Tale of a Tub," is composed of five motions or pictures, which are presented to the view of the spectators like Chinese shadows, behind a transparency. The master of the game, holding in his hand a wand ornamented with silver, and armed with the whistle of command, advances in front of the curtain, and explains in a short prologue the plot of the piece; then he draws the curtain, and relates each incident as it happens, naming each person at his entrance, and indicating with his wand the different movements of the actors.⁴

In another of Ben Jonson's comedies, "Bartholomew Fair," the arrangement of the puppet-show is quite different. Here the puppets speak, or rather an officious voice behind the scenes speaks for them. The name of interpreter is applied as much to him who recites the prologue and explains the movements, as to him who speaks for the puppets. Many comedians have commenced their career, and many more have sadly ended theirs, in this modest function. Amongst the cruel extravagances with which Hamlet tortures the love of Ophelia, we observe this cutting reply:—

"Oph. You are a good chorus, my lord.

"Ham. I could interpret between you and your love if I could see the puppets dallying."

Shakspeare again makes use of this locution in the "Two Gentlemen of Verona;" but there it is a clown who speaks.⁵ The director of the puppet-show himself generally performed the part of interpreter, and spoke for his whole troop. Lanthorn Letherhead, in "Bartholomew Fair,"⁶ makes us acquainted with this custom in a droll manner. In order to satisfy the curiosity of a provincial gentleman, who has no idea of a puppet-show, and who has expressed a desire to be introduced to the actors before the performance, he brings the basket containing his puppets: "What!" exclaims the gentleman, "do they live in baskets?" "They do lie in a basket, sir, they are o' the small players." "These be players minors, indeed. Do you call these actors?" "They are actors, sir, and as good as any, none dispraised, for dumb shows: indeed, I am the mouth of them all."

Ben Jonson, to whom we owe so much information on the subject now occupying our attention, has transmitted to us the names of two puppet-players. The first was old Pod, whom he sometimes honours with the title of Captain Pod. He mentions the name of this puppet-showman as being, in 1599, inseparable from the idea of puppets.⁷ In 1614 that artist was dead, and had been so for some time.⁸ Two years after, a man named Cokely was in the enjoyment of public favour.⁹ It appears from the manner in which Ben Jonson frequently speaks of this new puppet-showman, that it was then the fashion to have him with his puppet at festivals in order to amuse the guests.¹⁰

THE GOOD PRIEST.

THIS is the type of the better order of Romish ecclesiastics, such as are to be found scattered among remote villages, where they often exercise a truly paternal influence over the poor flock committed to their charge. Such men are often great lovers of children, and much beloved by them in return. Here is the "first introduction" of a little one, the expression of whose countenance is admirably caught by the painter. Neither is the reverential manner of the elder girl less faithfully depicted. The whole forms a very pleasing composition.

LORD ASHLEY AND SOCIAL REFORM.

THIS popular and philanthropic nobleman, who has just been removed to the Upper House by the death of his father, the sixth Earl of Shaftesbury, was born in 1801, and is, consequently, in the fiftieth year of his age. The founder of the family was the celebrated Lord Chancellor Shaftesbury, the Achitophel of Dryden—the most prominent member of the notorious "Cabal" of Charles II., and the author of the second great charter of this country's freedom—the Habeas Corpus Act. The grandson of this turbulent statesman, the author of the well-known "Characteristics," attained considerable reputation in the literary world, and was designated by Voltaire, the boldest English philosopher. Lord Ashley is the great grandson of this nobleman, whose talents and literary tastes he has inherited, though differing widely from his opinions, both philosophical and religious. His Lordship graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, where in 1822 he was first-class in classics. He has held a seat in the House of Commons for a quarter of a century, and has at different times been a Commissioner of the Board of Control, a Lord of the Admiralty, and a member of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Lord Ashley's well-earned reputation, however, has not been acquired in the regions of Red Tape, but by his laborious exertions to ameliorate the distress of the friendless and the destitute—the erring and the ignorant. One of his earliest efforts was in behalf of the women and children employed in collieries and mines. After the passing of the "Factories Regulation Act," forbidding the employment of young children in factories, suspicions began to be entertained, that vast numbers of children were employed in a variety of other less desirable trades, besides the cotton and woollen manufactures, and that evils and abuses, as great as any previously discovered in connexion with the factory system, might, on inquiry, be found to exist among the work-people in these trades. On the motion of Lord Ashley, accordingly, a commission was issued, to inquire into the numbers and condition of children and young persons engaged in various employments not under the control of the "Factories Regulation Act." The result of this inquiry was, to bring to light an extent and severity of suffering and degradation among sections of our working population, of which few had previously any conception. The number of children and young persons employed in the coal mines, was found to be enormous; a very large proportion of the persons employed in them being under thirteen years of age. Instances occurred, in which children began to work as early as four years of age, sometimes at five, not unfrequently between six and seven, and often from seven to eight, while from eight to nine was the ordinary age at which their employment commenced. In several districts, female children began to work in the mines as early as males. In these districts, both sexes were employed in precisely the same kind of labour, and during the same number of hours. The girls and boys, and the young men and the young women, and even married women, and women with child, commonly worked almost naked, and the men, in many mines, quite naked. "There is no distinction whatever," says one of the Commissioners, "in their coming up and going down in the shaft—in the mode of hurrying or thrusting—in the weight of corves, or in the distances they are hurried—in wages or dress: indeed, it is impossible to distinguish, either in the darkness of the gates (ways) in which they labour, or in the cabins before the broad light of day, an atom of difference between one sex and another." In the east of Scotland, where a much larger proportion of children and of girls was employed than in other districts, the chief part of their labour consisted in carrying the coals on their backs, up a succession of steep ladders, each eighteen feet high, from mainroad to mainroad, till the pit-bottom was reached, where the load was to be cast. In one case mentioned, the height ascended and the distance of the road added together, exceeded the height of St. Paul's; and it not unfrequently happened that the tugs broke, and the load fell on those females who were following.

The overseer at the Arniston Colliery says, "Women always did the lifting or heavy part of the work, and neither they nor the children were treated like human beings. Females submit to work in places where no man nor even lad could be got to labour in; they work in bad roads, up to their knees in water, in a posture nearly double: they are below till the last hour of pregnancy; they have swelled ankles and haunches, and are prematurely brought to the grave." The regular hours of work in the coal mines, for children and young persons, were rarely less than eleven, more frequently they were twelve; in some districts they were thirteen, and in one district they were generally fourteen and upwards. In the great majority of these mines, night work was a part of the ordinary system of labour, and produced the most injurious effects, both on the physical and moral condition of the work-people. In many mines, the conduct of the adult colliers to the children and young persons was harsh and cruel in the extreme: "A coal is sent at their heads—a gash on the head made with a pick —an eye knocked out, ribs broken;" and many other instances of reckless brutality are recorded. The effect of such early and severe labour was to stunt the growth of the children, to produce a crippled gait, and a curvature of the spinal column, as well as a variety of disorders, such as affections of the heart, rupture, asthma, rheumatism, and loss of appetite: and this, not merely in a few cases, but as an habitual and almost inevitable result of their occupation.

The evidence given as to the moral, intellectual, and spiritual state of the great mass of the collier population, presents us with a picture even darker and more appalling than that which has been drawn of their physical condition. It was found that their education had been almost wholly neglected,—that they had received scarcely any instruction at all, either religious or secular,—that they had no correct conception of their moral duties, and that, in fact, their intellects were as little enlightened as their places of work; "darkness reigned throughout." "With respect even to the common truths of Christianity and facts of Scripture," says Mr. Symons, "I am confident that the majority are in a state of heathen ignorance." "Their morals are bad, their education worse, their intellect very much debased, and their carelessness, irreligion, and immorality," deplorable in the extreme.

Such was the appalling state of physical and moral degradation which Lord Ashley was the means of bringing to light, and his lordship was not the man to sit down contented with the mere exposure of such evils without making a strenuous effort to remove them. As soon as the Report of the Commissioners, detailing these facts, had been laid before Parliament, Lord Ashley moved for leave to bring in a Bill to make regulations respecting the age and sex of children and young persons employed in mines and collieries. His speech on the occasion was a happy specimen of clear statement, intermixed with numberless touches of simple and deeply pathetic eloquence, and produced a deep impression on the House and on the country. The motion was unanimously agreed to. The slavery of the women and children in our mines and collieries was entirely abolished, and one foul stain on our moral and social condition wiped away.

The success which attended his exertions in behalf of the women and children employed in mines and collieries, encouraged Lord Ashley to put himself at the head of another great movement for the moral improvement of the working classes, by shortening the duration of daily labour in factories. In spite of the most formidable opposition from the mill-owners and the government, he succeeded in carrying through Parliament, an Act for the reduction of the time of labour in factories to ten hours a-day. The measure was cordially hailed by the great mass of the working classes, and speedily produced the most beneficial effects. It was found that the diminution in the amount of wages in consequence of working short time, was by no means in proportion to the reduction in the number of hours,—that under the new system the operatives performed their tasks with more hearty good-will and with greater care and attention than under the old, while the masters found it necessary to accelerate the speed of the machinery, so that a greater amount of work was turned out in the shorter time. The factory children had now time to acquire some education. The females were able to attend to their household duties themselves, instead, as under the old system, of entrusting them to hirelings, and in consequence their households were better and more frugally kept, and the male operatives, instead of spending their spare time in idleness and profligacy, as was at first feared, employed themselves much more extensively than before in gardening and other pleasing and profitable pursuits. The system has, therefore, been found to exercise the most beneficial influence both on the physical and moral well-being of all classes of the work-people, and it is to be hoped that the subsequent enlargement of the hours of labour to eleven, at the urgent instance of the mill-owners, will not materially abridge the salutary effects of the movement.

While engaged in these disinterested labours of love, Lord Ashley had the misfortune to incur the displeasure of his Dorsetshire constituents, whom he had represented for fifteen years, by his vote in favour of Sir Robert Peel's measure for the repeal of the corn-laws, and in a spirit of high-minded and honourable independence worthy of all commendation, he at once placed his seat at their disposal. His lordship's services, however, were too valuable to be long lost to the country, and in little more than a year, at the general election in 1847, he was triumphantly returned for Bath at the head of the poll.

Our limits will not permit us to dwell at present on Lord Ashley's efforts to reclaim the outcast juvenile population of the metropolis, to ameliorate the condition of the milliners and dressmakers, and to diminish the amount of Sabbath labour in the Post Office. We pass on to the consideration of the plan which his lordship has recently promulgated for the purpose of providing lodging-houses and improved dwellings for the poor.

All who are acquainted with the subject know that the want of proper dwelling-houses for the poor and industrious classes of the community, is one of the most fertile sources of pauperism and crime, disease and death; but few except those who have actually explored the recesses of our larger towns, can form any adequate conception of the state of the wretched hovels in which tens of thousands of the inhabitants are compelled to pass their lives. The great mass of the labouring classes, in the metropolis and other large towns throughout the kingdom, return from their daily toil, not to decent, clean, and healthy homes, where, in the bosom of their families, they may rest their weary limbs, and refresh their exhausted spirits, but to filthy, squalid, pestiferous garrets and cellars, which no exertion can keep clean, and where the pure air of heaven never enters; where there is nothing to allure or to cheer; where not merely comfort and happiness, but even decency and order, are unknown; the focus of disease; the nursery of the infirmity, the work-house, and the jail. A return made in 1842 gave the following results of a house-to-house visitation in St. George's, Hanover-square. 1,465 families of the labouring classes were found to have for their residence only 2,174 rooms. Of these families, 929 had but one room for the whole family to reside in; 408 had two rooms; 94 had three, 17 four, 8 five, 4 six, 1 seven, and 1 eight.

Now, if this be the case in one of the best parishes in London, what must be the condition of the over-populous and more needy parishes in the eastern part of the metropolis? In many instances it has been found that two, three, four, and even five families occupied a single apartment. In these wretched dwellings, all ages and both sexes, fathers and daughters, mothers and sons, grown-up brothers and sisters, the sick, the dying, and the dead, are herded together. In one house the visitors found a porter, whose earnings amounted to twelve shillings a-week, two of which he paid for a confined and unwholesome apartment, in which himself and six other people—four children and three adults—slept. The children were shoeless, extremely filthy, and poorly clad; the wife ill in bed of a scrofulous knee. Two of his children were still-born, and three others had died in infancy. His neighbour, a policeman, had all his children ill at one time, and lost two. In another house lived a shoemaker, who occupied two apartments, the rent of which amounted to one-third of his weekly earnings. This poor man had lost five of his seven children, and was himself far gone in a lingering consumption—the disease, as it has been justly termed, of England's shops and workshops and factories—the disease produced by the slow poison of foul air—the disease of the clerk, the compositor, the tailor, the draper's assistant, and the poor needlewoman. In a garret about ten feet by fourteen, not six feet below the short cross-joisting, four or five shoemakers were found at work, and it was ascertained that the husband and wife, a grown-up son in a consumption, a daughter about seventeen, and a child, all slept in the same bed, in the room where these men were at work all day, and where they frequently worked late at night with candles. In the next lane, which is only from three to four feet in breadth, a labourer and his family inhabited a room six feet by eighteen, divided into two compartments, without any proper place for a bed in either, and yet the rent of this wretched hovel was 4*l.* a-year. In a second, another labourer inhabited a room seven feet square, which neither the light nor the free air of heaven ever reached. In a third, the rent of which was 4*l.*, there was a widow with five children, from twelve to two years of age. All these, be it observed, belonged to the industrious, sober, well-doing class of the poor, who had sought in vain for a wholesome habitation at such rents as they could afford to pay, and had been driven by necessity to take up their residence in houses so situate and constructed as not to admit of ventilation, in a narrow and confined space, without any proper supply of water, undrained, and surrounded by unwholesome exhalations and every kind of abomination moral and physical.

The lodging-houses for the homeless poor, the dens of misery and crime, in which the "dangerous classes" herded together, are of course incomparably worse. In the report of the London Fever Hospital for 1845, of one particular room in a lodging-house it was said, "It is filled to excess every night, but on particular occasions, commonly 50, sometimes from 90 to 100 men are crowded into a room 33 feet 9 inches long, 20 feet wide, and 7 feet high in the centre. The whole of this dormitory does not allow more space, that is, does not admit of a larger bulk of air for respiration, than is appropriated in the wards of the Fever Hospital for three patients. The natural and necessary result was, that considerably more than one-fifth of the whole admissions into the Fever Hospital for that year—no less than 130 patients affected with fever—were received from that room alone." Of another of these receptacles for the migrating poor, one of the city missionaries says, "In this one room, which measures 18 feet by 10, slept the night previous to my inquiry, 27 male and female adults, 31 children, and 2 or 3 dogs, making in all 58 human beings breathing the contaminated atmosphere of a close room. In the top room of the same house, measuring 12 feet by 10 feet, there are six beds, and on the same night there slept in them 32 human beings, all breathing the pestiferous air of a hole not fit to keep swine in. The beds (which are composed of straw, shavings, rags, &c.) are so close together, that when let down on the floor, there is no room to pass between them, and they who sleep in the beds furthest from the door, can consequently only get into them by crawling over the beds which are nearer the door. In one district alone there are 270 such rooms. . . . These houses are never cleaned or ventilated; they literally swarm with vermin. It is almost impossible to breathe. Missionaries are seized with vomiting or fainting upon entering them." "I have felt," said another, "the vermin dropping on my hat like peas. In some of the rooms I dare not sit, or I should be at once covered." This appalling state of matters is not confined to the metropolis. In Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, and even in many of the third and fourth-rate towns, there are vast multitudes of the poorer classes living in the same state of physical and moral degradation. In one of the wynds of Glasgow, for example, there is a single "land" or tenement, at which one entry and stair admit to upwards of 40 dwellings. The average number of inmates in each dwelling or apartment during the night, amounts to at least 8 persons, giving a grand total on this one stair of 360 persons. The rent of this building, in which a humane man would hesitate to lodge his cattle, amounts to 120*l.* a-year. In another place in this city, it was found, on investigation, that there were eighty-four instances in which four persons slept in a bed, thirty-five in which more than five so slept, three in which seven, and one in which eight slept in the same bed. Well might Mr. Chadwick say that he had seen in the wynds of Glasgow and Edinburgh infinitely worse scenes than those horrible dens described by Howard as existing in the prisons of his day; and Mr. Hawes, that having visited, with Dr. Alison, some of the worst quarters of the city of Edinburgh, he could bear personal testimony to the fact that in the wynds, narrow streets, and courts of that city, are dwellings, if they deserve the name, rather fit for brutes than human beings. Anything so degrading, so humiliating as the sights he saw on that occasion no language could describe. Darkness, filth, disease, an atmosphere scarcely endurable, numbers huddled together in a space that even for brutes would be thought too small, characterised the numberless abodes of misery he had visited with Dr. Alison.

As might have been expected, the sickness and mortality among the inhabitants of these wretched dwellings is frightfully great. Malignant fever, the frightful scourge and fell destroyer of manhood in its prime, the fertile source of widowhood and orphanage, of pauperism and crime, is never absent from these crowded streets and lanes. In a house-to-house visitation made by an eminent medical practitioner, it was found that in the first 100 families of the labouring poor visited by him, there were no less than 212 of the members suffering under disease, manifest in various stages; they had already had 251 deaths, and a corresponding amount of sickness. "They are emaciated, pale, and thin," says Dr. Aldis, "and in a low condition. They complain of sinking, depression of the strength, loss of spirits, loss of appetite, accompanied by pains in different parts of the body, with disturbed sleep." "The depressed and low condition of health in which these people are always found induces habits of intemperance, unfortunately too common among them." In Liverpool the average age at death from 1784 to 1810 among the gentry was 43 years, and among the operatives 18½ years. In 1841-42, while among the former the average duration remained stationary, among the latter it had diminished to 16 years. At the beginning of the present century, the deaths in Manchester were one in fifty-eight; the mortality there now is about one in twenty-eight. In Glasgow, the deaths in 1847 were one in eighteen. Dr. Grey states that the loss of life in Manchester alone from fevers and other contagious disorders, which might be averted, will fall little short of 2,000 a-year. In Liverpool, the annual waste of human life considerably exceeds 3,000. The same mode of calculation will give for the metropolis an annual sacrifice of 10,000 lives, and for the United Kingdom no less than 60,000, from diseases which might be prevented by the erection of well-aired, well-drained, comfortable dwellings for the labouring classes of the community.

But this is not all. It is not every attack of disease which proves fatal, and Dr. Lyon Playfair states that for every unnecessary death there are twenty-eight cases of equally unnecessary sickness, which do not terminate fatally; so that the cases of preventable sickness occurring every year in the United Kingdom will amount to the enormous number of 1,680,000. A very large proportion of the subjects of this frightful sickness and mortality are persons in the prime of life, between the ages of twenty and forty, the period when life is of the greatest value to the individual and to society; when the poor have the largest number of children dependent on their labour for support; when sickness plunges entire families into temporary, and death into permanent, destitution. The returns obtained during the Poor Law Commission show that there are in this way produced and pauperized yearly in England and Wales alone upwards of 47,000 widows, and more than 120,000 orphans; and from calculations based on the Registration Returns it appears, that the loss in money on the year's deaths is, in round numbers,—from the loss of the productive power of the labourer, thirteen millions; from sickness, a million and a half; and from funerals, nearly three hundred thousand pounds,—making a total loss to the country every year of nearly fifteen millions of money, by far the greater part of which might and would be saved under proper sanatory regulations; fully bearing out the remark of Dr. Southwood Smith, that of all taxes the heaviest is the fever tax.

The moral evils which either spring from or are inseparably connected with this physical wretchedness are most appalling. It is manifestly impossible that persons sunk in such abject degradation and misery can possess elevated moral feelings and pure domestic affections, or be actuated by sound religious principles, spending their lives, as they are compelled to do, from the moment of birth to that of death, in a poisoned atmosphere, in which the destruction of the body and the corruption of the mind have alike become inevitable. No wonder that working men on their return from their daily toil should so generally abandon their miserable dwellings with all their accompaniments of dirt, darkness, and noise, and repair to the gin-palace in search of a more comfortable home and more cheerful company, and seek to drown in the intoxicating cup, all recollection of the wretched wives, and the hungry children, they have left behind in their miserable high-rented hovels, which it would be a mockery to call a home. All experience shows the intimate connexion between physical wretchedness and moral degradation; and in all our large towns ignorance, poverty, and crime, are invariably found to prevail in those districts which filth, fever, and cholera have marked for their prey. It cannot be denied that the waters of bitterness have flowed in upon our industrious classes by many different channels, and that it is our duty to set ourselves vigorously to stop up all the outlets of mischief. But it is the want of a home which, beyond all other causes, makes thieves, drunkards, and vagabonds, peoples our jails and bridewells, and crowds our penal settlements. It is the want of a home that sends thousands to a premature grave, and leaves their wretched widows to the workhouse, and their miserable offspring to the streets.

The first step, then, towards the improvement of the social condition of the poor, is to furnish them with healthy and comfortable homes. So long as this is left undone, it will be found almost impossible to train up the labouring classes to that self-respect which is the best preservative against moral contagion, or even to teach them to practise the common decencies of life. "Talk about the schoolmaster as we may," it has been justly said, "we must begin with the mason. It is of little use to be able to read books, if we have not a house to read them in. It little matters whether we are dealing with farm-labourers in the rural provinces, with artisans in the manufacturing districts, or with soldiers in the barracks; no social or moral reformation can be brought about until we give men fit places to live in." Great improvements have no doubt taken place of late years in London and other large towns. New streets have been opened up. Old streets and lanes have been widened, cleaned, and paved. Extensive clusters of dilapidated buildings, which were a nuisance and a standing reproach to their owners and to the public, have been removed, and splendid shops and dwelling-houses erected in their room. But it appears to have been completely forgotten, that these very improvements, while they minister to the social and domestic comforts of the middle and upper classes of society, have helped to deteriorate the physical condition, and consequently to retard the moral and intellectual advancement, of the humble and labouring portion of the community. The bad old dwellings of the poor have been destroyed, and their places supplied, not by good new ones, affording to the working classes comfortable homes at a moderate charge, but by high-rented shops, and "places," and squares, and crescents. Hence the removal of every street or lane inhabited by the working portion of the population serves only to make their crowded, ill-ventilated, and insalubrious dwellings more crowded and pestiferous than before. It is owing to this cause, as well as to the rapidity with which our town population is augmenting, that the working classes find the difficulty of obtaining comfortable dwelling-houses at a moderate rent increasing year by year. And hence in nearly all our large towns, every improvement effected by the removal of dilapidated buildings, or by the widening or total destruction of narrow streets and lanes, has only served to increase the difficulties, and to deteriorate the condition, of the humbler portion of society. The well-fed, well-clad, comfortably housed, have had their comforts and enjoyments greatly increased, but the poor and degraded have been made poorer and more degraded still. Our "improvements" must be conducted on very different principles if we wish to free the working man from those injurious influences which are almost irresistibly dragging him down to the lowest level. If we would raise up a healthy, vigorous population, "their country's pride," exemplary in all the relations of life, temperate in their habits and provident in their arrangements, frequenting the church, the school, the mechanic's institute and the lecture room, instead of the pawnbroker's office and the gin-shop,—living like immortal beings conscious of their high destinies, not herding together like the beasts that perish,—we must sweep away those closes and wyuds where filth, disease, misery and crime exist in every variety of form,—

"Where flags the noontide air, and as we pass
We fear to breathe the putrefying mass."

We must erase those houses, where "dirt, damp and decay reign triumphant," and replace them, not as heretofore by spacious shops and costly dwellings for the rich, but by well-aired, well-drained, comfortable and moderately-rented habitations for the poor.

The experiment of providing comfortable houses for the working-classes at a moderate rent has been tried in various places, and has proved not merely a humane project, but also a profitable speculation. The Society for the Improvement of the Labouring Classes have turned their attention to this important point, and have been most successful in their exertions. They have already provided excellent accommodation both for the migratory and the stationary poor. For the latter they have erected a large weekly lodging-house in George Street, St. Giles, accommodating 104 male inmates, and a similar house in Hatton Garden capable of containing 57 single women. For the more migratory order of lodgers, they have provided a nightly lodging-house in Charles Street, Drury Lane, with a supplementary one—arising out of the overflow of demand for accommodation in the former—in the next street, King Street. They have also erected a series of buildings near Bagnigge Wells, consisting of nine small houses for one family each, seven for two families each, and one large house for thirty aged females. Their most important undertaking is the erection of a large building in Streatham Street, Bloomsbury, to accommodate forty-eight families in such a manner as that each tenement shall be so distinct from the other, as to preserve the domestic privacy and independence of each family.

The capital subscribed by this Society is purely donative, for although, as a commercial speculation, the buildings would pay five per cent. and upwards, yet the profits are laid by for further investment in such new buildings as may be required.

Another Society, "The Metropolitan Association for Improving the Dwellings of the Industrious Classes," was incorporated in 1845. The capital of the Association was raised by shares, on what we consider the only sound principle in such undertakings, the profitable investment of money. They have erected several piles of buildings in various parts of London, and their object of providing decent and comfortable homes for the industrious classes has been satisfactorily realized. The Report of the Association read at the annual meeting in 1849, states that all the dwellings have been occupied, and almost without intermission, from the date of their completion, and several applicants have been and are still waiting for vacancies. Not only have the tenants expressed themselves pleased with the superior comforts and accommodation afforded them, but they have also proved, by regularly paying their rents, and by their general strict observance of the rules laid down for the management of the building, that they are desirous of assisting the directors in preserving a high character for respectability in its occupants. Out of 1,390*l.* of rents, only 7*l.* remained in arrears, the whole of which was expected to be ultimately received.

On the same occasion the Earl of Carlisle observed, that "even in a commercial point of view, the success of the Association could no longer be doubted; but were they to look at the case in a moral point of view, all doubts and misgivings as to success must vanish from their minds, and their language and feelings must be those of congratulation and assurance. When they saw the neatness and cleanliness of the apartments in those dwellings, and thought of the miserable hovels in which the majority of the industrious classes had been hitherto crammed, and from which those who inhabited those apartments had been transferred—in damp cellars surrounded with foul air and filth of all kinds, or mounted up in attics, under the broiling tiles exposed to the summer sun—when they thought of that, and contrasted the pleasant apartments they were now placed in, certainly no one could but feel that a more rational mode of exercising their benevolence could not be devised."

The mortality among the adult residents in these dwellings is only one-half of the mortality of the metropolis generally, and among the children it is lower still. In Holborn, St. Giles's, St. Saviour's, and Whitechapel, the mortality among children under five years of age is so high as ten per cent.; in other parts of the metropolis it is eight per cent.; while in the model dwellings it is only one and four-tenths per cent.

At the seventh annual meeting of this Society, which was held on the 2d of July last, the chairman, Lord Ashley, (now Earl of Shaftesbury,) stated that the return of interest on their capital was four per cent. from their land, and six and a-half per cent. from their buildings and fixtures, &c. All their houses were full, and occupied by decent, orderly, and well-behaved tenants, and their rents are paid with remarkable regularity. The health of the inmates had fully answered the expectations of the founders. In the lodging-houses for single men, containing 957 persons, not a single case of typhus had occurred since they were opened. In the time of the cholera there were 500 persons under one roof in the model dwelling houses in St. Pancras; in a small court called Peahen Court in Bishopsgate Street, there resided 150 persons. In the model dwellings not a single person died of cholera; in Peahen Court there were seven deaths, and in one day twelve orphans were thrown on the workhouse. The model lodging house in George Street, Bloomsbury, is within a stone's-throw of Church Lane. The ravages of cholera in Church Lane were dreadful, while in the model buildings, in its immediate vicinity, not one person died.

It is worthy of special notice, that these comfortable and salubrious dwellings are provided, and with an adequate profit, at a rent even lower than is charged for the wretched hovels in which the great mass of the industrious classes are still compelled to reside. Lord Ashley states, that the average rent paid in Snow's Rents, Westminster—"a vile place"—was in 1844, 2*s.* 4½*d.* per week per room; that the labourers in the London Docks pay from 2*s.* to 4*s.* per week for single rooms, which for filth and disgusting appearance defy description, and that the single men pay in the lodging-houses 1*s.* 6*d.* per week for half a bed, and 2*s.* for single beds, several sleeping in the same room—the apartments often crowded to the greatest excess. On the other hand, in the model lodging house, George Street, Bloomsbury, every man had a compartment to himself, with a bed, chair, and ample space to walk about, for 4*d.* a-night,—exactly the same payment demanded from him in the worst and most disgusting place, and yet that house yields six and a-half per cent. on the money invested. Houses of three rooms, with every accommodation, and a constant supply of water, are provided at the rent which is exacted for one room elsewhere.

Lord Ashley has throughout been the main-spring of this praiseworthy attempt to provide comfortable and moderately-rented dwellings for the labouring classes; and he has recently introduced into Parliament a bill to encourage the formation of associations for this object, and to facilitate their operations. This measure has been most favourably received by both Houses of Parliament, and will, in all probability, become law in the course of a few days. The bill, which is as nearly as possible a transcript of the Baths and Washhouses Act, is permissive only, and is based upon the principle, that the institutions established under it shall be remunerative and self-supporting. It gives power to town-councils and commissioners in those towns which shall adopt the act, to erect lodging-houses for the accommodation of the industrious classes, and to make bye-laws for their management. There can be no doubt that the adoption of this measure by Parliament is a decided step in the right direction. Till very lately, the legislature has done almost everything that it could do, to render the home of the working man unhealthy, uncomfortable, and even immoral. Very heavy taxes have been laid on nearly all the materials of building—on bricks, on timber, and on glass. Besides a house-tax, a very heavy duty has been laid on that which in this climate is the most indispensable requisite of a dwelling,—the salutary light of heaven; and though the smaller class of houses has been professedly exempted, the accumulative operation of the window-tax, which regards all dwellings under one roof as forming only one house, has almost totally precluded clusters of lodgings for the labouring class in one large building, and has thus virtually prohibited that arrangement of dwellings which gives the greatest capabilities for lodging a large number with comfort, decency, and health. The repeal of the taxes on bricks, timber, and glass, and more recently the abolition of the pernicious window-tax, has undoubtedly done much to promote economical arrangements for housing the labouring classes. But the cost of charters and the law of partnerships are a fatal discouragement to the association of private persons with limited responsibility for the construction of such edifices as we have described. The expense of obtaining the charter for the Metropolitan Association for establishing Model Lodging Houses, amounted to the scandalous sum of 1,200*l.* We trust that this important matter will not be lost sight of now that it has been brought under the notice of the public. It is surely the very least that ought to be expected of the legislature, that it should remove every artificial impediment in the way of working men seeking to provide house-accommodation at their own expense, in the cheapest, most decent, and most comfortable manner.

THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

BY I. M. W.

AMID a constellation of blue-lights, rockets, and other combustibles, we anchored in the roadstead of Chagres at eleven P.M. October 23, too late to think of landing that night. Early on the morrow we bade farewell to the gallant ship that had carried us safely, notwithstanding our Friday departure; and full of hope and breakfast, armed with resolution and steeled to pull the Elephant by his "preposteriors," we landed at Chagres. There was one universal exclamation of astonishment, all bearing a striking similarity to the most strictly pious expression of PLACIDE'S Dutchman in Ireland: "Minc Gor, vat a beobles!" The old town on the south side of the river is composed of some fifty huts, built of bamboo and thatched with palmetto leaves, in which, (without flooring,) rolling in mud, are seen women, children, dogs, pigs, and other miscellaneous vermin, promiscuously mixed up, "lout-enscramble," as the French say. 'Tis most devoutly to be hoped that their food is not as scanty as their raiment. Dry-goods are scarce in that market. The female attire most in vogue, was apparently after the style of grandmother Eve, or what the French call "Tulle-Musion;" that of the children was still more primitive, and is best defined as being à-la-Cupid. Occasionally a lord of the dominion was seen strutting about in the superfluous luxury of a shirt, which I am told is a recent innovation of fashion. On the left bank of the river have lately been erected a few frame-buildings, occupied as gambling-houses and "groggeries," denominated, "as per shingle," confectionaries and coffee-houses; the aptitude of which cognomens I have never been enabled to solve, as neither coffee nor candies are among the vendibles. Some three hundred of the genus homo; species Negro, Mulatto, Indian, and Caucasian; are seen bartering, gambling, drinking, and quarrelling; the later miserable, sickly-looking wretches, bearing the outward signs of dissipation, and suffering from the withering effects of a poisonous atmosphere, where the entire amount of population has been swept away by death in the last six weeks. If there is a prototype of Hell on earth, or his Satanic Majesty holds any mundane dominion, I know of no place half so likely to elect him as Chagres. There is scarcely a crime, disease, or pestilence that stalks not in its precincts. But yesterday a friendless man was dying on a table while they were gambling in the same room; and before his eyes were closed they had robbed him of his dear-bought wealth, six thousand dollars, (in dust.) His kindred will probably never know his fate, or when or how he died. Here it was that I first saw a leper. How truly fortunate we are to be freed from that terrible scourge! Horrible! horrible!

After making divers bargains, from which they felt privileged to "fly" at pleasure, I finally effected the charter of a boat and four men to convey myself and party of two thence to Cruces, sixty-four miles, for one hundred and forty dollars; and at three o'clock P.M., when our stock of patience was exhausted, and we were growing dangerous, we succeeded in shipping our crew, weighed anchor, and started. The current is extremely rapid even at Chagres, increasing as you ascend. With four oars we performed ten miles by seven o'clock, reaching a place called Gatoon, having passed every boat we saw bound up. Here we "lay by," awaiting the moon. Some dozen sheds were located on the river bank, occupied by Indians, with one exception, where two black-looking white men affected to keep a hotel, flourishing under the imposing title of the "Astor House." Two rough-sawed and smooth-greased filthy boards, placed across sticks driven in the ground, served for bar and table; some rancid matter that might once have been butter; a fearful looking compound, denominated by our host "peach-saäs," sour black bread, suspicious looking cheese, and a grim mixture, slanderously termed "coffee," constituted the tempting repast. The larder of the "Astor House" was innocent of milk, biscuit, or meat of any kind. By some accident we were without provisions, save what was stowed away in our baggage. We had eaten nothing since breakfast; but hunger or starvation appeared preferable to any such indulgence, until we finally obtained a piece of ham, to which a philanthropic traveller charitably added a biscuit. Thus fortified, we had recourse for comfort to our well-filled flasks, and felt grateful for "smallest favours." I am bound in justice to state, that the "Astor House" was distinguished from some of the surrounding edifices, in having one gable-end "fenced up." The ground where the floor should have been was wet and muddy, and no possible place offering, I abandoned all hope of sleep, and occupied myself in speculating on the rough and uncouth characters about me.

"In a country where laws are scarcely known and never feared, where each resents his own injuries and maintains his own cause, every man carries his weapons in his belt as his ready reference in dispute, his only recourse for justice. It was easy to distinguish those accustomed to a wild life from those to whom such scenes were a novelty, although each individual garb was "selon" the fancy of the wearer. My own consisted of a drab shooting-coat, short pantaloons, boots reaching to the knee, a slouched hat, and leather belt, decorated by a large hunting-knife and a pair of pistols. If there was any fashion claiming supremacy, it was in favour of red shirts. Finding no quarrel likely to occur for the evening's diversion, I strolled away to ferret out an unmistakable Ethiopian laugh, and soon found two wenchies with as many buok-negroes of my own crew, dancing for life. There's something positive in a Negro-dance; it has a wonderfully infectious and exhilarating effect on spectators. I've always found it impossible to keep my feet still during its performance. They never lose a note of the music, and you feel firmly convinced that an accidental-false note must inevitably result in a broken leg. I spent an hour enjoying their abandon and light-hearted gaiety, and walked away, confirmed in my belief that the acmé of happiness is to be found among those "dingy denizens of a weary world."

The night was hot and sultry. We had had two heavy showers since leaving Chagres, and everything was wet and muddy. I, however, lay down on my luggage in the boat and soon (forgetful of the wide space that intervened) in spirit I was at home!

It was three o'clock when I awoke, saturated by the heavy dews. The moon rode high in the heavens, and shone forth with the same calm and holy aspect that had so often thrilled me in boyhood. The loud deep bark of the baboon, and the shrill scream of an owl, was all that broke the deep stillness of the night. After more than an hour's search through the various sheds, by which I incurred no little risk in waking up wrong passengers, I mustered my crew, and we pursued our toilsome way. When the sun rose, the rich tropical foliage was a source of lively curiosity. The thick and deep-green verdure of an eternal summer, whose shade is ~~right~~ at noon; the slim, smooth trunks, whose branches towered high in the heavens; while far above us, extending its broad arms over our heads, was the majestic sycamore, amid whose boughs we could discern the active little monkey peeping down upon us; the cocoa-tree; the huge leaf of the plantain; and last, though fairest of them all, so strikingly resembling the graceful form of a "coronet" of feathers, the ill-named cabbage-tree: with these exceptions, the Chagres river is very similar to all our southern streams: perhaps it may best be likened to the Chattahoochee.

It was near eleven o'clock before we reached a "ranche," fifteen miles from the place of our morning's departure, where we hoped to breakfast. Hope was ever delusive, and so we found it. We could only add to our stock a cup of coffee, without milk, and some miserable biscuit. We soon hurried on, until the intense heat obliged us to "lie by" under the trees for two hours, when it commenced raining, and we resumed our journey. Now, when it rains in this region, it rains. I never saw anything so terribly in earnest. It comes down like a shower-bath, and fairly takes away your breath. Sheltering ourselves as well as we could in our ponches for three hours, we sat cheerless and forlorn, the monuments of misery. By six o'clock P.M., having made but eight miles since breakfast, we came to a wretched-looking hovel, where we must needs pass the night. Our fare here was as foul as usual, (without meaning a pun, for a chicken would have been a luxury.) Coffee, black bread, and some ham, the frying of which must have been effected at a fearful sacrifice of life, was all that could be had, until a gentleman succeeded in purchasing four eggs at a dollar, and generously divided his prize with me. For ten dimes I bargained for the privilege of lying on a mat. It was the dryest place to be found; and as fatigue and privations made it downy and sweet, my slumbers were sound and refreshing. At three o'clock, by the moon's clear light, we resumed our way. Soon after day-break the boat shot round a point in the river, when, as I turned her bows across the current, she struck hard on a snag, and despite every exertion of the crew, swung round and nearly filled. In an instant the chance of saving our baggage seemed hopeless. The water was deep; the current far too rapid for a swimmer to gain the point; and a glance sufficed to show that it required no mean effort for life to reach the opposite bank, encumbered as we were with clothing, for it was some hundred and fifty yards distant. As the boat vibrated on the sunken log, we had time to divest ourselves of superfluous weights, our boots and weapons. The water fairly boiled around us, while only by rapid transits from side to side could we keep from being capsized. A heavy box of castings, stowed in the bottom, proved our salvation. I ordered the crew to jump overboard and sustain themselves on either side; this so lightened her, that after a few convulsions, as if sensible of the wound, she broke away from her sudden foe, and was rapidly swept far out into the stream.

All personal danger was now past; but our baggage still remained in imminent jeopardy. The snag had penetrated the bottom of the boat, and she was fast settling. The steep banks on both sides rendered it difficult even to climb; so that it was obvious we could save nothing but ourselves. Coasting along, determined to rescue our "plunder" if possible, we cheered the crew on, while our efforts were employed in "bailing out" with every available utensil. After more than an hour's exertion and suspense, the water gaining rapidly, and the deeply-laden "gig" half full, we reached a little mud-flat, discharged cargo, and hauled out for repairs. Such incidents are of too frequent occurrence for the crew to be at a loss for expedients; so we were soon afloat again, and at noon, having performed eight miles in about as many hours, we stopped at a "ranche" to breakfast, "much as usual." After our morning's adventure, we ceased to wonder at the number of persons drowned on the river. Nine miles thence, after having been favoured with the usual pluvius dispensation, as night set in, we discovered the territory of an old Indian squaw decorated with two sheds, one of which was enclosed. Here we "came-to:" several boats soon followed, including some bound down, until the number of the destitute seeking shelter and food amounted to near fourscore. The mud was six inches deep, so that our tent was useless: to proceed was impossible: the boatmen reported the rapids just above impassable by night. Food there was none; but when hope was coldest, Fortune smiled. My Niobeian despair must have excited the commiseration of the old lady, who hired me a hammock, and after supping on charity, the scanty remains of a fellow-traveller's hamper, I "hung myself up," and the stilled heart could scarce produce a deeper slumber.

The sun was up when we commenced our fourth day's toil. The stream now became so rapid that oars were laid aside for poles; and keeping close to the bank, availing of every pendant branch and tree, our "speed" did not much exceed a mile to the hour. Frequently we lost, in a few moments, by being swept into deep water, the labours of a full half hour. The "après" seemed universally to pity the "avants." As one canoe flew by us with the current, containing eight or ten passengers, all straining with paddles, they greeted us with: "This is the way, boys, you'll go when you're bound home!" Seven miles of struggling brought us to Gorgona, a small Indian village of bamboo-huts, and two board-houses for hotel, where we found—ye gods! how we feasted our eyes on it!—the first "table-cloth" we had seen since we left the steamer Georgia; and we rubbed our hands in anticipation of breakfast. If we were somewhat disappointed in the edibles, we had feasted on that cloth, faint symbol of civilization, and paid our dimes without reluctance. We were now within seven miles of Cruces: anxious to end our aquatic voyage in that quarter, we embarked once more. The distance thence was mostly accomplished by the crew wading in the water, and thus propelling the boat. In passing a rapid not fifty yards long, which consumed an hour, our baggage was again in peril; and one of the crew, having been swept away from the boat, saved himself by his coolness and activity, where a less agile man must have perished. Just before reaching the town, I shot an alligator, some twelve feet long. After performing divers antics that would have astonished the entire RAVEZ family, he suddenly disappeared to parts unknown. In a small mud creek, branching from the river, we found the landing of Cruces, and disembarked at three P.M., on Sunday, October 27th.

As I slept on shore, two Indians were fighting with knives, weapons they invariably carry, having blades about twelve inches long. The sight was anything but gratifying. I have a peculiar antipathy to surgical operations. One's blood must be warmed by either habit, passion, or excitement, to carve unshrinkingly a fellow-subject. Death must have been the fate of one or both of the Indians, but the bystanders interfered, and they were separated.

The village is a collection of miserable-looking huts, built (like all the Indian habitations) of cane and bamboo, occupied by Indians and Negroes, between whom there exists no distinction, and a few frame-buildings recently erected by Americans. In one of the latter we took up our quarters. Hogs, as in Ireland, are here privileged characters, and rove unrestrained guests through every house. As the habits of that favoured animal are not remarkable for cleanliness, it is hardly necessary to add that filth and mud enter largely into the products of the place. There was nothing to engage the traveller's curiosity, save the ruins of an old Spanish cathedral built by the Jesuits, in which mass is still performed.

After supping superlatively well, comparatively speaking, the transient twilight of the tropics had hardly vanished, ere, wishing to retire for the night, we were shown up-stairs to the general dormitory. It comprised the entire length and breadth of the building, and contained, by a nice computation of our arithmetic, seventy-two cots, to each of which was apportioned one sheet, one blanket, and a pillow, while the space allotted to an occupant was reduced to limits of which man cannot be deprived—six feet by two. Our nice perceptions were fast evaporating; but spreading my wolf-robe and my own blanket, I was soon asleep.

About midnight I was awakened by a most extraordinary concert, consisting of an extensive band of performers on the nasal organ. The harmony can only be conceived by one who has slept in the same room with fifty worn-out travellers. After the ludicrous and comic effect, so much melody became exceedingly annoying, and while revolving the expediency of raising an alarm of fire, that we might all take a fair start, fatigue triumphed over the senses, and ere long I may have joined in the choir. At daylight there was a general resurrection. Toilets were as brief as orisons. We were soon occupied bargaining with the natives for the transportation of our luggage to Panama, which was finally effected at an equal waste of words and capital, or twelve dollars per hundred pounds, and sixteen dollars for saddle-mules. At ten o'clock we mounted and rode forth, a warlike, brigandish-looking squad—from appearances, much more to be dreaded than attacked. Four men had just been robbed on the road, among whom we fancied there must have been a great want of "matériel." I think an armed party of three always safe.

In an Indian-rubber bag strapped behind me I carried a great-coat and a change of linen; in front, fastened to the saddle, my "poncho," and a small leather bag containing my gold and liquors, both equally precious and necessary. These, added to my gun, made rather a heavy burden for my "steed;" but he was a strong-built, bright-eyed little animal, and notwithstanding sundry falls, equal to any of his fellows. Proceeding a few hundred yards, we struck a narrow defile in the mountains, where our imagination, previously excited in picturing the road, we still found most woefully at fault, and some conception of the truth began to dawn upon us. It certainly beggars description. I am conscious of my inability to paint it, or give even a faint idea of its ruggedness. It is assuredly only one remove from impassibility.

In the excitement and rivalry of the chase, I have recklessly driven my horse over many a break-neck spot, and been astounded at his success; still I should have doubted that a mule could have picked his way over such a confused chaos of rocks and stones, intermingled with slippery mud. Any attempt to ride a horse unbroken to its paths must inevitably result in the death of the animal, if not the rider. The road leads through ravines where your saddle-bags scrape the rocky sides, and often only six inches wide at the bottom, diverging till over-head the fallen trees and thick foliage shut out the sun and darken the narrow gulfs whose windings are so abrupt, that your companions are shut from view, though not two lengths apart; mounting precipitous rocks where foot-holes are cut for each step of the mule, and any slip, or even the error of putting a wrong foot first, sends "horse and rider" rolling over each other amid shouts of laughter. Descents, though apparently more fearful, are much more easily accomplished by the animal sliding down on his haunches. What I have described is far the better portion of the road. In some places rocks and stones of all sizes are covered and intermixed with a soft clay about three feet deep, through which the animal must take his footing at a venture, and consequently it is one continued struggling, floundering, and falling; the frequent carcasses over which he steps, seemingly admonishing him of his fate, if he falter. After emerging, either mounted or afoot, the first process is to dig the mud from your eyes and face, arrange your trapping, settle yourself in your saddle, and prepare for a similar ordeal.

There appeared to be a philosophical determination among us to laugh at all misfortunes. I was greatly amused at the awkwardness of one of the party, a tall man with a long pair of "dividers," which I doubt had ever before bestrode a quadruped. He opened the "ball" with a clownish feat that set us off in convulsions of laughter, although it was some time before he joined-in, evidently entertaining serious misgivings respecting his equestrian skill, and revolving the expediency of again trusting himself on the outside of a mule. A foot-passenger to whom I addressed a few eloquent and figurative adjectives, expressive of my appreciation of the road, replied: "Fire away, stranger; you can't abuse it!" I rode on, thinking he had expressed more in one sentence than I should in my whole journal.

I had early found it advisable to abandon the reins, and allow my mule to select his own path. About noon we came to an abortive effort at improvement, by throwing a species of log-bridge over a mud-hole. When about half-way across, the animal, finding his further progress intercepted, turned short to the right, and plunged off from a height of about four feet, actually burying himself with his head and neck below the visible horizon. My feet became too deeply imbedded to extricate myself from the saddle, and with a total eclipse of both eyes by the shower of mud, I kept my seat stoically, listening to the remarks of some foot-passengers who happened to witness the catastrophe, and the shouts of my companions. "Handsomely interred!" exclaimed a rough-looking red-shirt. "There's the end of his tail," said a facetious biped, seated on a stump, performing a surgical operation on his boot; and whether spelt tale or tail appeared equally applicable. But his obsequies were not destined to be so performed; his race was not yet run. After a few desperate struggles, greatly assisted by a liberal application of my "persuaders," (most blood-thirsty looking spurs,) we emerged, or rather, I should say, "broke cover," fresh as paint. While thus comfortably progressing, amusing ourselves at each other's mishaps, the sky became darkened, the lightning flashed, the thunder reverberated among the rocks and chasms in not very pleasing propinquity, the rain descended, the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon us, and we stood it like hydropathic disciples.

At three o'clock, copiously wet and correspondingly dry, we came to a little opening, and greeted the American ensign on a large tent standing close by "a small dog with a short tail." Here we dismounted and "got fed" on corn-cake and molasses. After abundant recourse to our flasks for additional sustenance, we remounted and faced the storm, still laughing at vicissitudes, to which I contributed by two additional falls of my mule, we drove our weary brutes over many a carcass of the slain, wedged in the narrow passes; which, by-the-by, I noticed were all horses, so I am unable to place on record the still unobserved skull of a dead donkey. By dark we reached a considerable clearing, in the centre of which stood two large sheds, where we must needs pass the night. We had ridden twelve miles, and surmounted all the most diabolical portions of the road. Man's courage and fortitude will sustain him cheerily over daily hardships and sufferings, if night but bring him refreshing rest; but it would have chilled one, nourished by luxury and uninured to exposure, to have looked upon the hopeless prospect of repose before us. A large open shed, with the ground underneath wet and muddy, was our only asylum, already half filled with Indians.

Some desperate remedy and effort was necessary. Reconnoitring, we discovered that the proprietor and his two squaws, all dirty aborigines, possessed an enclosure in one corner, of loose cane, reaching about the height of a man. This we speedily stormed and took, when our host, finding we were determined to defend it and not to abdicate, opened negotiations, and a treaty was soon made and ratified, to the following effect: We were to pay a considerable sum of money, and to receive five twine hammocks, (our party had been reinforced by two;) the invaders to retain undisputed and quiet possession during the night, and retire unmolested in the morning. Provisions there were none to be had, by forage or negotiation, so we could not possibly sustain a siege beyond the time specified in the truce. Soon after, Uncle SAM's mails began to arrive, and were piled for the night under the same shelter. They consisted of one hundred and twenty-four bags, loading forty-one mules. We were wet to the skin, and fire to dry our clothes and cheer us became another subject of bargain. As it exemplified the grasping disposition of the red rascal, I must describe it. He first bargained to make a fire for four dimes money down, and maintained the contract was fulfilled by lighting three small sticks and producing smoke enough to have dried a cargo of herrings. Our complaint of "mas fuego" was answered with "mas reales," and another equal payment brought but a similar instalment. This I repeated four times, till getting incensed, and fearing he would impoverish me before morning, I seized a brand and threatened gratuitously to bestow on him a glowing sample of my fire. Looking me steadily in the face, to satisfy himself that I was in earnest, and that no more dimes were to be had, he brought an abundant supply, displaying his "ivories" at the success of his artifice.

Long after my comrades had retired, I sat by the fire, musing over the past and present. What a picture lay before me! How I lamented the neglect of early studies, and my inability to sketch the wild scene, so stilled, so hushed! The clouds had melted away, and the stars shone with the wondrous brilliancy of the tropics; the natives lay scattered on the ground, sleeping heavily in such picturesque and abandoned attitudes, it seemed more a deserted battle-field marking some fierce struggle, than the quiet repose of breathing forms still redolent with life.

The Indians, though diminutive in stature, are generally well made, and with singularly handsome faces. They possess nothing of the high cheek-bone that so disfigures our northern tribes. With cast of features so very similar, they appear more like members of the same family; and to a stranger it is no easy matter to distinguish them apart. Their honesty I think highly commendable. Intrusted with baggage for days together, instances are extremely rare where anything is pilfered or lost. The following morning our party and the sun rose simultaneously. The latter seemed to have made a mistake, for he just peeped out and was speedily covered up again. The dark forms that lay so motionless around us had disappeared like demons with the night. The man-with-two-halves stood immovable and statue-like, patiently awaiting us to capitulate. At a considerable outlay of smiles and dimes, we seduced his two frailties into furnishing us with coffee; but famine drove us out of our camp, and we resumed our march. The country became more open, and the road improved rapidly as we approached Panama. A ride of five miles brought us to a rude pavement, where I urged my mule in advance of my companions, wishing to catch a first sight of the sea. After crossing a stone bridge and passing a decayed monastery on the left, I rose a little acclivity, and the mighty though placid and peaceful Ocean of the West lay before me! I sat motionless and almost breathless, gazing over its tranquil waters with sensations such as one rarely feels in life: like the opening of a seal, a sudden vision of a new world, or a first sight of the "other side." It was some time before I had eyes for the surrounding scenery, though grandly beautiful. The fortifications at Panama were distinctly visible. Some dozen vessels lay at anchor among mountainous islands rising abruptly from the sea. Behind the city rose a lofty peak far into the clouds; and at its base, although on a considerable mount overlooking every other edifice, stood some extensive ruins of an old cathedral. So imposing was the magnitude of Nature's works about me, I felt as if I had never before conceived the grandeur of her efforts, so wondrously developed here.

I know not what beautiful peroration I might have poured forth, as thoughts came thick and fast; but my soliloquy was interrupted by an exclamation of, "Come on; I've taken off my hat to old Briney!" The spell being thus dissolved, I rode on. We soon after came to a wide road, bounded with miserable Indian huts, extending near a mile. At its terminus we passed dilapidated stone houses composing the suburbs of the city, when a few hundred yards brought us to the walls. Crossing a ditch, and entering an arched gateway, we were in Panama.

CROSSING A TORRENT IN BOOTAN.

A COOL head and a firm hand must be indispensable for such a mode of transit as this. Woe to the brain that gets dizzy, or the timid fingers that cease to clutch manfully the rope. Yet may this kind of thing become as familiar by practice, as going up stairs. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte; but that first "pas," it must be admitted, is neither the safest nor the pleasantest, and should it prove a "faux pas," must be fatal to him who makes it. At all events, the incident furnishes a very striking subject for the pencil, and is most effectively treated by the artist Daniel, to whom we are indebted for so many characteristic pictures of Indian life and scenery.

HOLY ROOD.

It is not generally known that the name given to the ancient Abbey of Holyrood, founded by David I. and subsequently adopted for the Royal Palace, was acquired by circumstances truly miraculous if we may believe Hector Brece, whose account we here abridge and modernise.

David, who was crowned King of Scotland at Scone in 1124, came to visit the Castle of Edinburgh three or four years after. At this time there was about the castle a great forest full of harts and hinds. "Now was the Rood-day coming, called the Exaltation of the Cross, and because the same was a high solemn day, the King passed to his contemplation. After the masses were done with vast solemnity and reverence, appeared before him many young and insolent barons of Scotland, right desirous to have some pleasure and solace by chase of hounds in the said forest. At this time was with the King a man of singular and devout life named Alcuin, Canon of the order of St. Augustine, who was long time confessor afore to King David in England, the time that he was Earl of Huntingdon and Northumberland." Alcuin used many arguments to dissuade the King from going to the hunt. "Nevertheless, his dissuasion little availed, or the King was finally so provoked by inopportune solicitation of his barons, that he passed, notwithstanding the solemnity of the day, to his hounds." As the King was coming to the vale that lay to the east from the castle, subsequently named the Canon-gate, the stag passed through the wood with such din of bugles, and horses, and braying of dogs, that "all the beasts were raised from their dens. Now was the King coming to the foot of the crag, and all his nobles severed, here and there, from him, at their game and solace, when suddenly appeared to his sight the fairest hart that ever was seen before with living creature." There seems to have been something awful and mysterious about the appearance and movements of this hart which frightened King David's horse past control, and it ran away over mire and moss, followed by the strange hart "so fast that he threw both the King and his horse to the ground. Then the King cast back his hands between the horns of this hart, to have saved him from the stroke thereof," when a miraculous Holy Cross slid into the King's hands, and remained, while the hart fled away with great violence. This occurred "on the same place where now springs the Rood Well." The hunters, affrighted by the accident, gathered about the King from all parts of the wood to comfort him, and fell on their knees, devoutly adoring the holy cross, which was not a common, but a heavenly piece of workmanship, "for there is no man can show of what matter it is of, metal or tree." Soon after, the King returned to his castle, and in the night following he was admonished by a vision in his sleep, to build an abbey of canons regular in the same place where he had been saved by the cross. Alcuin, his confessor, by no means "suspended his good mind," and the King sent his trusty servants to France and Flanders, "who brought right crafty masons to build this abbey, dedicated in the honour of the holy cross." The cross remained for more than two centuries in the monastery, but when David II., son of Robert Bruce, set out on his expedition against the English, he took the cross with him, and when he was taken prisoner at the battle of Neville's Cross, the cross shared the monarch's fate. It subsequently became an appendage of Durham Cathedral. The stately abbey of Holy Rood was despoiled by the Protector Somerset in 1554, and totally destroyed by the Presbyterians at the Revolution.

1851; OR, THE ADVENTURES OF MR. AND MRS. SANDBOYS.¹

This is a very clever serial work, by Henry Mayhew and George Cruikshank;—the sketches by the latter are sui generis, and would make the most saturnine and the most stupid laugh,—that wholesome laughter after which we feel better and cleverer; humour is very influential, if not absolutely infectious. Most of our readers are familiar, at least by name, with Buttermere, the beautiful, in which vale are cradled the quiet homes of a few Britons like Mr. and Mrs. Sandboys. It is almost impossible to read Mr. Mayhew's graphic account of Buttermere and its inhabitants, and not believe that the actual living population have been set up in type, for the edification of Londoners. Our curiosity is so much excited on that point, that we mean to send a copy of the first number to a friend hard by Borrowdale, and ask him if his veritable neighbours are or are not in print. As for the scenery about Buttermere and Crummock Water, it is exquisitely painted by Mr. Mayhew, and we are disposed to regret that the business of the tale will take him from that old-world loveliness, to the noise and turmoil of the modern Babel. The English lakes are being fast spoiled, by having a fashionable season, but little Buttermere will remain untainted for many years yet. By the way, the romance of Mary, the beauty of Buttermere, will not bear the test of close inspection. I have heard a few facts, from one who remembers her well, and who dined at the inn, on the very day of the execution of her lover at Carlisle, and was waited on by her on that occasion, which tend to prove that, instead of being heart-broken, she was heart-whole—if not heartless.

Let the untravelled Londoner "entertain conception" of such a place as Mr. Mayhew describes thus— it is not a far-fetched fancy.

"WHAT BUTTERMERE IS NOT.

"Here the knock of the dun never startles the student, for (thrice blessed spot!) there are no knockers. Here are no bills, to make one dread the coming of the spring, or the summer, or the Christmas, or whatever other 'festive' season they may fall due upon, for (oh, earthly paradise!) there are no tradesmen, and, better still, no discounters, and, greater boon than all—no! not one attorney within nine statute miles of mountain, fell, and morass, to ruffle the serenity of the village inn! Here that sure revolving tax-gatherer, as inevitable and cruel as the fate in a Grecian Tragedy, never comes with long book and short inkhorn, to convince us it is Lady Day, nor 'Paving,' nor 'Lighting,' nor 'Water,' 'Sewers,' nor 'Poor's,' nor 'Parochials,' nor 'Church,' nor 'County,' nor 'Queen's,' nor any other accursed accompaniment of our boasted civilization. * * * * Here there are no newspapers at breakfast to stir up your early bile with a grievance, or to render the merchant's morning meal indigestible with the list of bankrupts, or startle the fundholder with a sense that all security for property is at an end. Here there are no easy-chair philosophers,—not particularly illustrious themselves for a delight in hard labour,—to teach us to 'sweep all who will not work into the dust-bin.'"

All Buttermere is attracted to London by the Great Exhibition—all but Mr. Sandboys, who hates novelty and is afraid of London wickedness, and his wife, who hates the far-renowned 'London dirt.' No; they won't go. But what is their fate? Alas! everybody being gone, how shall they live? The grocer, the smith, the inn-keepers, the butcher, the brewer,—all are gone. In this predicament, Mr. Sandboys, after many dreadful misfortunes, is obliged to start for London to avoid being starved in Cumberland!

The whole party set off, father, mother, two children, two servants, and twenty-three packages of luggage. Arrived at Workington, they get into the wrong train, go to Holborn Hill in Cumberland instead of the Holborn Hill on whose proud summit stands the "Bull and Mouth," and their twenty-three packages go on to London. The next mistake is that the whole party are carried asleep to Edinburgh, and when they are at last en route for London, (what a Babel it will be two months hence!) a pretended "detective," who kindly offers to put the Sandboys on his guard against thieves, robs him, not only of all his cash, but of his railway tickets! Taken before a magistrate, the astounded and humiliated Sandboys finds a friend in the police inspector, and supplied with a loan, starts again for town. On his arrival, the Bull and Mouth, of course, is full. Sandboys, utterly bewildered, is recommended to the house of Mrs. Fokessell, who has one apartment to let at five shillings a night—it is the cellar, from the rough vaulted roof of which is suspended a hammock, and with that "thing" the verdant Sandboys are obliged to be content. And now, reader, if you want to know how many times they tried to get into the "thing," how many times they came out of it in the most surprising manner, what finally befel them, and fell on them;—if you want to know these things,—and they are of great importance to you, (as of course, you are going to town)—then you must get this amusing book, and if you don't derive a little healthy laughter from it, you will never laugh any more in your life, and it is problematical to us whether you ever have laughed.

NOTICES OF BOOKS.

"The British Metropolis in 1851." A little guide book to London, on a very novel and useful plan, the idea of which is good, and the execution most creditable. The author appears to have taken great interest in his subject, and we congratulate him on the result of his labours. Still there are some errors which it would be well to correct in a future edition; we are told that Box Hill is beyond Hampton Court instead of near Dorking, the fine new Greek church in London Wall is not noticed at all, although perhaps, for its size, the most expensive church of modern London. Still these errors are the exception, and the fact of our finding but them in the course of our reading, shows that the author is minutely accurate, and to be depended upon.

"Elementary Anatomy and Physiology, for Schools and Private Instruction." By W. Lovett. We are sorry that we have not found an earlier opportunity of noticing this valuable addition to our daily increasing stock of school-books. Having glanced through its contents, we can safely affirm that the teacher will find it an excellent and useful elementary book for conveying instruction upon subjects which ought not to be wholly lost sight of in any scheme of education. The nature of the work and the author's object in its publication are, however, so fully and clearly stated in the opening sentences of the preface, that we prefer giving Mr. Lovett's own words to any further remarks of our own. "This little work," he observes, "may be said to have had its origin in the efforts I have been making, for some time past, to impart to children some knowledge of their own physical, mental, and moral nature; believing it to be an essential and important branch of youthful education. In the pursuit of my object I have had to glean my information from many sources, and to simplify and condense it, and to give it in such a form as I thought might be best comprehended and appreciated by those I sought to instruct. And, having to some little extent succeeded, I have thought it might aid others, engaged in the great work of education, if I printed what I have taught in a lesson form; accompanied by drawings of the diagrams I used, together with an outline of the method I adopted, and still pursue, in teaching this kind of knowledge to several classes of both sexes, weekly." It remains for us to state that the diagrams are remarkably well drawn and coloured; that the subject-matter of the volume is admirably arranged and classified, and that the style throughout is lucid, clear, and easy of comprehension.

SCRAPS.

"I FIND that our ancestors used for Lord the name of Laford, which, (as it should seem,) from some aspiration in the pronouncing, they wrote Illaford and Illafurd. Afterward it grew to be written Loverd, and by receiving like abridgment as other our ancient appellations have done, it is in one syllable become Lord. To deliver, therefore, the true etymology, the reader shall understand that, albeit we have our name of bread from breod, as our ancestors were wont to call it, yet used they also, and that most commonly, to call bread by the name of Illaf, from whence we now only retain the name of the form or fashion wherein bread is usually made, calling it a loaf; whereas loaf, coming of Illaf or Laf, is rightly also bread itself, and was not of our ancestors taken for the form only; that such as were endued with great wealth and means above others, were chiefly renowned (especially in these northern regions) for their housekeeping and good hospitality; that is, for being able, and using to feed and sustain many men, and therefore were they particularly honoured with the name and title of Illaford, which is as much as to say, as an afforder of laf, that is, a bread-giver, intending (as it seemeth) by bread, the sustenance of man, that being the substance of our food the most agreeable to nature, and that which in our daily prayers we especially desire at the hands of God. The name and title of Lady was anciently written Illeaf or Leafdian, from whence it came to be Lafdy, and lastly Lady. I have showed here last before how illaf or laf was sometime our name of bread, as also the reason why our noble and principal men came to be honoured in the name of Laford, which now is Lord, and even the like in correspondence of reason must appear in this Leafdian, the feminine of Laford; the first syllable whereof being anciently written Illeaf, and not Illaf, must not, therefore, alienate it from the like nature and sense, for that only seemeth to have been the feminine sound, and we see that of Leafdian we have not retained leady, but lady. Well, then, both Illaf and Illeaf we must here understand to signify one thing which is bread; Dian is as much to say as serve; and so is Leafdian a bread-server: whereby it appeareth that as the Laford did allow food and sustenance, so the Leafdian did see it served and disposed to the guests. And our ancient and yet-continued custom, that our ladies and gentlewomen do use to carve and serve their guests at the table, which in other countries is altogether strange and unusual, doth for proof hereof well accord and correspond with this our ancient and honourable feminine appellation."

VERSTEGAN.

THE Earl of St. Alban's, Secretary to Queen Henrietta Maria during all her misfortunes, found himself at the Restoration but in an indifferent condition.

Being one day with Charles II. when all distinctions were laid aside, a stranger came with an importunate suit for an employment of great value which was just then vacant. The king ordered him to be admitted, and bid the earl personate himself. The gentleman addressed himself accordingly, enumerated his services to the royal family, and hoped the grant of the place would not be deemed too great a reward. "By no means," replied the earl, "and I am only sorry that as soon as I heard of the vacancy I conferred it on my faithful friend the Earl of St. Alban's, (pointing to the king,) who has constantly followed the fortunes of my father and myself, and has hitherto gone unrewarded; but when anything of this kind happens again worthy of your acceptance, pray let me see you." The gentleman withdrew; the king smiled at the jest, and confirmed the grant to the earl.—Addison's Anecdotes.

NEGRO WIT.

THERE is a tradition that one of the old esquires in Malden, Massachusetts, had a slave who had been in the family until he was about seventy years of age. Perceiving that there was not much work left for the old man, the esquire took him one day and made him a somewhat pompous address, to the following effect:—"You have been a faithful servant to me, and my father before me. I have long been thinking what I should do to reward you for your services. I give you your freedom. You are your own master; you are your own man." Upon this the old negro shook his grisly head, and with a sly glance, showing that he saw through his master's intention, quickly replied, "No, no, massa; you eat de meat, and now you must pick de bone."

"PROPER words in proper places make the true definition of a style."—Swift.

AN EXTRAORDINARY ALTAR-PIECE.

"OVER a Popish altar at Worms," says Burnet, "there is a picture one would think invented to ridicule transubstantiation. There is a windmill, and the Virgin Mary throws Christ into the hopper, and he comes out at the eye of the mill all in wafers, which a priest takes up to give to the people."—Cunningham's Life of Hogarth.

"ALL FLESH IS GRASS."

BISHOP Hughes, in a sermon to his parishioners, repeated the quotation that "all flesh is grass." The season was Lent, and a few days afterwards he encountered Terence O'Collins, who appeared to have something on his mind. "The top of the mornin' to your riverence," said Terence, "did I fairly understand your riverence to say 'all flesh is grass,' last Sunday?" "To be sure you did," replied the Bishop, "and you're a heretic if you doubt it." "Oh! divil the bit do I doubt anything your riverence says," said the wily Terence; "but if your riverence plazes, I wish to know whether in this Lent time I could not be afther having a small piece of bafé by way of a salad?"

SKETCHES AND ANECDOTES OF WORTHIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

ROBERT SOUTH.

WE think that most of our readers will admit that the biographies hitherto included in our sketches of English divines have presented portraits of human character as nearly faultless—as free from human frailty and infirmity—as they might reasonably hope to meet with. The meek and patient Hooker—the pure-minded and charitable Taylor—the honest and high-minded Barrow, belong emphatically to that select class or category of mortals who have been placed by the suffrage of intelligent and truthful men of all parties, in a position far beyond the reach of vulgar praise or censure. The subject of our present sketch—the witty and satirical Dr. South, has left behind him a reputation of a somewhat different kind. Inferior in learning and ability to neither of the great ornaments of the English Church, on whose lives we have commented, and endowed with a wonderful faculty of vigorous and searching eloquence, he was nevertheless, as his writings prove, a man of intolerant disposition, a sincere and unselfish, but vehement and angry partisan, a thorough “good hater” of the practices and tenets of his opponents, and one who occasionally lacked the charity and discretion, as well as the decorousness of language and demeanour, which should distinguish the conduct of the Christian minister.

Dr. Robert South was born in the year 1633. His birth-place was the pleasant suburban village of Hackney; a quiet sequestered village then, for many miles of cultivated fields and verdant pastures lay between it and the great metropolis. His father was a prosperous merchant of London; his mother a woman of good family, from the county of Kent, whose maiden name was Berry. In childhood and early boyhood, South was distinguished for quickness and intellectual precocity. Having passed very creditably through a course of preparatory instruction, at the age of fourteen he was sent to Westminster school, as a King's Scholar. This famous seminary was at that time under the dictatorship of the renowned Busby; the sturdy disciplinarian who walked with covered head amongst his boys, even before a royal visitor, solemnly assuring his Majesty afterwards, in explanation of his conduct, that it was necessary to preserve his dignity before his scholars, and to appear the greatest man, even though a king were present. Although his presence inspired immoderate awe in the little kingdom over which he held despotic sway, this distinguished pedagogue is represented to have been a man of mean and insignificant appearance, and in height, considerably below the middle stature. A tall Irishman, it is said, once addressed him in a coffee-house, in the following words: “Will you allow me, Giant, to pass on to my seat?” “Certainly, Pigmy, was the reply.” “I alluded, sir,” said the Celt, “to the vastness of your intellect.”

“And I,” retorted Busby, “to the size of yours.” As a schoolmaster, there is no doubt that Busby united considerable tact in tuition, with great learning. But woe to the unlucky wight who possessed but a moderate amount of brains, or neglected his tasks whilst under his control! The Westminster pedagogue boasted of the efficacy of flagellation, and rarely erred upon the side of mercy. Under his successful but not very benignant sway, the school furnished an abundance of good scholars, and he invariably spoke of his rod, as the sieve to prove them.

At Westminster, whilst yet a mere youth, South distinguished himself by an act of courageous and uncompromising loyalty, which, young as he was, might have involved him in some trouble. On the 30th of January, 1649, (the day appointed for the execution of King Charles I.) being reader of the Latin prayers that morning, he publicly, and to the surprise and consternation of his auditors, prayed for the king by name, “but an hour or two at most before his sacred head was struck off.” This was the first public indication which he had an opportunity of giving of the fervent spirit of loyalty which animated him through life. We may believe that that spirit was nurtured or strengthened in a great degree, by the associations he formed at Westminster; for in a sermon “prepared for delivery at a solemn meeting of his school-fellows in the Abbey,” he thus commemorated in after life the loyal character of that seminary. “Westminster is a school which neither disposes men to division in church, nor sedition in state—a school so untaintedly loyal, that I can truly and knowingly aver that, in the worst of times, (in which it was my lot to be a member of it,) we really were King's Scholars, as well as called so. And this loyal genius always continued among us, and grew up with us, which made that noted Coryphæus, Dr. J. Owen, often say, ‘that it would never be well with the nation, until this school was suppressed.’”¹

In 1651, having been elected a student of Christ Church, South proceeded to Oxford. His great attainments and undoubted ability soon brought him into notice at the university, and in the year 1655 he published a copy of Latin verses, the subject of which was, oddly enough, a panegyric on Oliver Cromwell, on the occasion of his concluding a peace with the Dutch. As this poem, however, was a mere college exercise, upon a subject proposed by the university magnates, it cannot be regarded as any declaration of South's political feelings, nor would it be fair to look upon it in that light. It was nevertheless afterwards triumphantly referred to by his opponents, (when smarting under his vigorous and relentless railery,) as a proof that he was himself at this period of his life a waverer and trimmer in political matters. It is very clear that the compliment paid to Cromwell in verse, was never repeated by South in prose. A much more genuine expression of his opinion of the Protector will be found in a sermon which he preached in Westminster Abbey in the year 1684. Nothing can be racier than the contemptuous bitterness with which he there speaks of the man whom he had been constrained to eulogize at college, and we feel little doubt that the sentiments so earnestly and characteristically expressed, were those which he entertained in his earlier as well as his maturer manhood.

"For who," he says, "that should view the small despicable beginnings of some things and persons at first, could imagine or prognosticate those vast and stupendous increases of fortune that have afterwards followed them? Who, that had looked upon Agathocles first handling the clay, and making pots under his father, and afterwards turning robber, could have thought that from such a condition he should come to be king of Sicily? Who that had seen Masaniello a poor fisherman, with his red cap and his angle, could have reckoned it possible to see such a pitiful thing, within a week after, shining in his cloth of gold, and with a word or a nod absolutely commanding the whole city of Naples? And who that had beheld such a bankrupt, beggarly fellow as Cromwell, first entering the parliament house with a threadbare, torn cloak, and a greasy hat, (and perhaps neither of them paid for.) could have suspected that in the space of so few years he should, by the murder of one king, and the banishment of another, ascend the throne, be invested in the royal robes, and want nothing of the state of a king, but the changing of his hat into a crown?"

It has been stated that this singular piece of pulpit rhetoric was delivered in the presence of King Charles II., who was so tickled by the humorous description of Cromwell's first appearance in Parliament, that he burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter, and turning to Rochester said, "Ods fish, Lory, your chaplain must be a bishop; therefore put me in mind of him at the next death."

But, to return to South's college career, we find that at this inauspicious period he gave many proofs of his steady attachment to the ritual and liturgy of the Church of England, which are in themselves perfectly inconsistent with the notion that he had in the slightest degree swerved from the loyal principles in which he had been educated. His open observance of the proscribed forms of worship more than once drew down upon him the censure of his superiors, and Dr. John Owen, then Vice-Chancellor of the University, (the "noted Coryphæus" before alluded to,) who, having himself been regularly ordained, had afterwards joined the Presbyterian party, went so far as to oppose, and that most vehemently, his obtaining his Master of Arts degree. Hearing that South was constantly in the habit of worshipping according to the liturgy, he sent for him, and menaced him with expulsion from the University, if he persisted in the practice, observing that "he could do no less in gratitude to his lighthness the Protector, and his other friends, who had thought him worthy of the dignities he then stood possessed of." To this speech South is stated to have replied with cutting severity, "Gratitude among friends is like credit among tradesmen: it keeps business up, and maintains the correspondence; and we pay not so much out of a principle that we ought to discharge our debts, as to secure ourselves a place to be trusted another time."

Notwithstanding the opposition of Owen, South obtained his degree in 1657, and was ordained in the following year. The discouraging aspect of the times did not prevent him from at once commencing his ministrations, and with a spirit of zeal and intrepidity unparalleled at that period, he plunged into a series of attacks on the Puritans. On the 24th of July, 1659, (the year before the Restoration,) he preached an Assize Sermon at Oxford, entitled, "Interest deposed and Truth restored, or a word in season," which he afterwards published with a dedication to "The Right Worshipful Edward Atkins, formerly one of the Justices of the Common Pleas." In this dedication he describes one object of his discourse to be the "defence of the ministry, and that at such a time," he continues, "when none owned them upon the bench, . . . but when, on the contrary, we lived to hear one, in the very face of the University, (as it were in defiance of us and our profession,) openly, in his charge, defend the Quakers and fanatics, persons not fit to be named in such courts, but in an indictment!" The language of the sermon, and the topics introduced into it, tend to give us a high opinion of the preacher's courage and ability. Every passage appears skilfully framed to irritate the dominant party, and to provoke their bitterest animosity. The selfishness, pride, and hypocrisy of the pretenders to over-godliness were ridiculed and exposed with singular force and animation, and in a tone of the most perfect fearlessness. Having regard to the peculiar circumstances of the period, who will not admire the vigour of the following assault?

"Many, while they have preached Christ in their sermons," observed the intrepid churchman, "have read a lecture of atheism in their practice. We have many here who speak of godliness, mortification, and self denial; but if these are so, what means the bleating of the sheep, and the lowing of the oxen, the noise of their ordinary sins, and the cry of their great ones? If godly, why do they wallow and steep in all the carnalities of the world, under pretence of Christian liberty? Why do they make religion ridiculous by pretending to prophecy; and when their prophecies prove delusions, why do they blaspheme? If such are self-deniers, what means the griping, the prejudice, the covetousness, and the pluralities preached against, and retained, and the arbitrary government of many? When such men preach of self-denial and humility, I cannot but think of Seneca, who praised poverty, and that very safely, in the midst of his riches and gardens; and even exhorted the world to throw away their gold, perhaps, (as one well conjectures) that he might gather it up: so these desire men to be humble, that they may domineer without opposition. But it is an easy matter to commend patience when there is no danger of any trial, to extol humility in the midst of honours, to begin a fast after dinner.¹ But oh, how Christ will deal with such persons when he shall draw forth all their actions bare, and stript from this deceiving veil of their heavenly speeches! He will then say, It was not your sad countenances, nor your hypocritical groaning, by which you did either confess or honour me: but your worldliness, your luxury, your sinister, partial dealing; these have denied me, these have wounded me, these have gone to my heart; these have caused the weak to stumble, and the profane to blaspheme; these have offended the one, and hardened the other. You have indeed spoke me fair, you have saluted me with your lips, but even then you betrayed me. Depart from me, therefore, you professors of holiness, but you workers of iniquity."

The Restoration of royalty was a joyful event to South, and a fortunate one for his personal peace and security. Outspoken and fearless as he had been in the expression of his opinions before that event, it could not be expected that he would moderate his zeal in the day of triumph, or mitigate the severity of his sarcasm when he was at liberty to launch it with impunity. On the 29th of July, 1660,—exactly two months after the triumphant entry of the restored sovereign into the metropolis,—he preached a sermon before the University of Oxford, on the occasion of the King's Commissioners meeting there, in which he gave full scope to his determined animosity against Puritans and Dissenters. The discourse which he delivered is published in his collected works under the title of "The Scribe Instructed," and in the course of it he thus felicitously described and satirized the puritanical mode of preaching:—

"First of all," he said, "they seize upon some text, from whence they draw something which they call a doctrine; and well may it be said to be drawn from the words, forasmuch as it never naturally flows or results from them. In the next place, being thus provided, they branch it into several heads, perhaps twenty or thirty, or upwards. Wherefore, for the prosecution of these, they repair to some trusty Concordance, which never fails them; and by the help of that, they range six or seven scriptures under each head, which scriptures they prosecute one by one, first amplifying and enlarging upon one, for some considerable time, till they have spoiled it, and then, that being done, they pass to another, which, in its turn, suffers accordingly. And these impertinent and unpremeditated enlargements they look upon as the motions and breathings of the Spirit, and therefore, much beyond those carnal ordinances of sense and reason, supported by industry and study; and this they call a saving way of preaching—as it must be confessed to be a way to save much labour, and nothing else that I know of."

With equal force and humour he then alluded to the practices invariably resorted to in the pulpit by the Puritan preachers, such as shutting the eyes, distorting the face, speaking through the nose, and toning instead of preaching their sermons. He denounced the presumption of those who left their worldly callings to undertake without preparation the duties of the ministry, and who were in the habit of haranguing the multitude, "sometimes in streets, sometimes in churches, sometimes in barns, and sometimes from pulpits, and sometimes from tubs; in a word, whosoever and howsoever they could clog the senseless and unthinking rabble about them." Ridiculing many of the cant terms of Puritanism as he went on, he observed that it was no wonder that those who intended to make their preaching and praying an extemporary work should be content with an extemporary preparation for it; such mushroom divines would find that "hasty births were seldom long-lived and never strong;" and he concluded with the following vehement denunciation of the party then so recently dominant in church and state:—

"Providence having broken the rod of (I believe) as great spiritual oppression as was ever before exercised upon any company or corporation of men whatsoever; when some spiritual tyrants, then at the top and head of it, not being able to fasten any accusation upon men's lives, mortally maligning by them, would presently arraign and pass sentence upon their hearts, and deny them the proper encouragement and support of scholars, because, forsooth, they were not (in their refined sense) godly and regenerate; nor allowed to be godly because they would not espouse a faction, by resorting to their congregational, house-warming meetings, where the brotherhood (or sisterhood rather) used to be so very kind to 'their friends and brethren in the Lord.' Besides the barbarous, raving insolence, which those spiritual dons from the pulpit were wont to show to all sorts and degrees of men, high and low; representing every casual mishap as a judgment from God upon such and such particular persons, who, being implacably hated by the party, could not, it seems, be otherwise by God himself. For 'Mark the men,' said Holderforth,² (as I myself, with several others, frequently heard him.) And then, having thus fixed his mark, and taken aim, he would shoot through and through it with a vengeance. But, I hope, things are already come to that pass, that we shall never again hear any, especially of our own body, in the very face of loyalty and learning, dare, in this place, (so renowned for both,) either rail at majesty, or decry a standing ministry, and, in a most unnatural and preposterous manner, plant their batteries in the pulpit for the beating down of the church."

(1) Very credibly reported to have been done in an Independent congregation at Oxford.

This is strong language, but there are many passages much stronger in sermons preached by South at subsequent periods. By some of the loyal clergy he was often considered to carry his invectives and abuse too far; although there is no doubt that at the period of reaction which followed "the reign of the Saints," his bold unsparing satire was applauded and approved, as well as keenly relished, by the vast majority of the high-church party. Before we pass on to the other events of his life, we cannot refrain from presenting the reader in this place with another specimen of his satirical rhetoric, which we quote from a discourse avowedly directed against the long extemporary prayers of the Puritans:—

"I do not," he says, "in the least question, but the chief design of such as use the extempore way, is to amuse the unthinking rabble with an admiration of their gifts; their whole devotion proceeding from no other principle, but only a love to hear themselves talk. And I believe it would put Lucifer himself hard to it to outvie the pride of one of those fellows pouring out his extempore stuff amongst his ignorant, whining, factious followers, listening to and applauding his copious flow and cant, with the ridiculous accents of their impertinent groans. And the truth is, extempore prayer, even when best and most dexterously performed, is nothing else but a business of invention and wit, (such as it is,) and requires no more to it, but a teeming imagination, a bold front, and a ready expression; and deserves much the same commendation (were it not in a matter too serious to be sudden upon) which is due to extempore verses, only with this difference, that there is necessary to these latter a competent measure of wit and learning, whereas the former may be done with very little wit, and no learning at all."

In August 1660, South was appointed public orator of the University of Oxford, and in that capacity delivered an oration on the installation of Lord Clarendon as chancellor, which had an important influence on his future career; for the chancellor was so struck with his manner and delivery, and formed so high an opinion of his abilities, that he at once made him his chaplain; an appointment which, in the course of a short time, led to other promotions. In the meanwhile abundant opportunities were afforded our divine of making known the fervour of his political principles. On the 30th of January, 1663, (the anniversary of the execution of King Charles I.) he preached a remarkable sermon in the royal chapel of Whitehall, before Charles II. The argument of his discourse is well expressed in the title under which it was afterwards published,—"Pretence of Conscience no Excuse for Rebellion;" a topic well suited to the place, the audience, and the occasion. The preacher took his text from the book of Judges, (xix. 30.) "And it was so, that all that saw it said, There was no such deed done nor seen from the day that the children of Israel came up out of the land of Egypt unto this day: consider of it, take advice, and speak your minds." Nor did the eloquent divine fail to speak his mind to the full satisfaction of his royal and noble auditors. The sentiments of ultra-loyalty which flowed from his lips came from the heart, and were delivered with all the earnestness of conviction. His congregation were, doubtless, prepared for a wholesale attack on their ancient enemies; but the cry-aloud-and-spare-not spirit of this famous discourse must have exceeded their expectations. We can fancy that a buzz and murmur of applause frequently ran through the admiring assemblage during its delivery, and that audible whispers of commendation proceeded from the gratified sovereign. Although never very scrupulous in the employment of strong phraseology, the loyal divine thought it necessary to justify, at the outset, the vehement terms of indignation in which he was about to speak of the rebellion and its catastrophe:—

"And this," he exclaimed, (after speaking of the death of Charles,) "is the black subject and occasion of this day's solemnity. In my reflections upon which, if a just indignation, or indeed even a due apprehension of the blackest fact which the sun ever saw since he hid his face upon the crucifixion of our Saviour, chance to give an edge to some of my expressions, let all such know, the guilt of whose actions has made the very strictest truths look like satires or sarcasms, and bare descriptions sharper than invectives; I say, let such censurers (whose innocence lies only in their indemnity) know, that to drop the blackest ink and the bitterest gall upon this fact, is not satire, but propriety."

A highly coloured portrait of the "murdered sovereign" then followed, which may be referred to as an excellent specimen of South's polished and pointed rhetoric. "He every way," he said, "filled the title under which we prayed for him. He could defend his religion as a king, dispute for it as a divine, and die for it as a martyr. I think I shall speak a great truth, if I say, that the only thing that makes Protestantism considerable in Christendom, is the Church of England: and the great thing that does now cement and confirm the Church of England is the blood of this blessed saint." Whilst pronouncing this splendid eulogy on the dead, the courtly divine did not forget the living. The presence of Charles II. and his retinue reminded him that the appropriate conclusion of his panegyric on the father's virtues would be a modicum of praise bestowed upon the son. An allusion to the reigning sovereign was therefore skilfully introduced. "But to finish," he continued, "this poor imperfect description, though it is of a person so renowned, that he neither needs the best, nor can be injured by the worst; yet, in short, he was a prince whose virtues were as prodigious as his sufferings, a true pater patriæ, a father of his country, if but for this only, that he was the father of such a son."

Of the judges who sat upon the king's trial he spoke in these terms of contemptuous sarcasm:— "Such an inferior crew, such a mechanic rabble were they, having not so much as any arms to show the world, but what they wore and used in the rebellion, that when I survey the list of the king's judges, and the witnesses against him, I seem to have before me a catalogue of all trades, and such as might better have filled the shops in Westminster Hall, than sat upon the benches. Some of which came to be possessors of the king's houses, who before had no certain dwelling but the king's highway. And some might have continued tradesmen still, had not want and inability to trade sent them to a quicker and surer way of traffic, the wars. Now, that a king, that such a king, should be murdered by such, the basest of his subjects, and not like a Nimrod, (as some sanctified railing preachers have called him,) but, like an Actæon, be torn by a pack of blood-hounds; that the steam of a dung-hill should thus obscure the sun; this so much enhances the calamity of this royal person, and makes his death as different from his who is conquered and slain by another king, as it is between being torn by a lion, and eaten up with vermin; an expression too proper, I am sure, as coarse as it is, for when we are speaking of beggars, nothing can be more natural than to think of vermin too."

Nor did the preacher confine himself to denunciations of those who "openly inbriued their hands in the bloody sentence;" but, (that impartial justice might be done,) the "more considerable traitors who had the villany to manage the contrivance, and yet the cunning to disappear in the execution," came in for a full share of vituperation. "The Latin advocate (Mr. Milton!) who, like a blind adder, has spit so much poison upon the king's person and cause," is not forgotten; and such a description of the greatest intellect of the age proves how far the rancour of political animosity could carry one of the ablest divines of the Church of England. It seems scarcely to have entered into South's mind that the member of an opposite party could possess a single estimable qualification of mind or character. The actions and motives of his opponents were with him alike detestable. If they pleaded the imperious mandates of conscience or conviction, he had a ready answer;—the pretence of conscience was no excuse for rebellion; and this doctrine he supported with weapons and arguments which we can well believe were most palatable and acceptable to the auditory he addressed. With one short extract from this branch of his sermon, we will leave it to pass on to other matters:—

"But still, conscience, conscience is pleaded as a covering for all enormities, an answer to all questions and accusations. Ask, what made them fight against, imprison, and murder their lawful sovereign? Why, conscience. What made them extirpate the government, and pocket the revenue of the church? Conscience. What made them perjure themselves with contrary oaths? what makes swearing a sin, and yet forswearing to be none? what made them lay hold on God's promises, and break their own? Conscience. What made them sequester, persecute, and undo their brethren, rape their estates, ruin their families, get into their places, and then say, they only robbed the Egyptians? Why, still this large capacious thing their conscience; which is always of a much larger compass than their understandings. In a word, we have lived under such a model of religion, as has counted nothing impious but loyalty, nothing absurd but restitution."

The high-church principles and great ability of South, aided by the patronage of Clarendon, soon procured for him ecclesiastical preferment. In the month of March, 1663, he was made Prebendary of St. Peter's, Westminster, and in 1670 he was installed a Canon of Christ Church, Oxford. The degree of Doctor of Divinity had been conferred on him in 1663, after some opposition, when a Master of Arts of only six years standing, in recognition of his genius and great attainments; and his position in the Church was, in all respects, a highly distinguished one. He enjoyed a full share of the honours and emoluments of his profession, and he stood well with the wealthy and powerful of the land. In the summer of 1677, Mr. Lawrence Hyde, the son of his patron, the Earl of Clarendon, was despatched on an embassy to Poland, to congratulate John Sobieski on his election to the crown of that kingdom, and South readily accepted an offer to accompany the embassy in the capacity of chaplain. The eyes of Europe were then turned on Poland and its newly-elected king. The accomplishments, the courage, and ability of Sobieski were renowned through Christendom, and his romantic achievements were on every tongue. He had been elected king by the unanimous voice of the Polish diet, amid the patriotic shouts of a "Polc for Poland;" and he had since earned for himself the title of the "Wizard King," by beating back, with a small but determined force, the armies of Mahomet IV. Under his sway, in fact, Poland had arisen to a height of glory and of importance amongst the nations of Europe from which, after his death, she gradually declined, till she ceased to be a kingdom at all.

It was natural that South should have been anxious to see and converse with such a man, and to have an opportunity of making his personal observations on the manners and customs of so remarkable a nation. That he was a keen and shrewd observer is shown by the account of his visit, transmitted in a letter from Dantzic, (dated December 16th, 1677,) to Dr. Edward Poccocke, Regius Professor of Hebrew at Oxford. From the personal habits and appearance of Sobieski to the minutest particulars respecting the people over whom he reigned, nothing seems to have escaped his attention. He found the King of Poland "a very well-spoken prince, very easy of access, and extremely civil, having most of the qualities requisite to form a complete gentleman." Of his accomplishments and attainments he spoke in high terms. "He is not only," he said, "well versed in all military affairs, but likewise, through the means of a French education, very opulently stored with all polite and scholastical learning. Besides his own tongue, the Slavonian, he understands the Latin, French, Italian, German, and Turkish languages." In person he describes him as "a tall and corpulent prince, large faced, and full eyes;" his hair cut close round his ears like a monk, and his dress a long robe hanging down to his heels, tied about the waist with a girdle, and a large scimitar by his side, the handle of which was curiously set with diamonds.

Few English travellers had at that time penetrated into Poland, and South found the customs and manners of the people differing widely from those of western Europe. His observations are sometimes very curious and characteristic, as in the following description of a religious ceremonial at Posen. "Among other things worthy of remark," he says, "I observed here,—for I never thought it a damnable sin, (like our sectaries in England who call themselves by the soft name of Protestant dissenters,) to be acquainted with their ceremonies at saying mass,—that, while any part of the Gospel was reading, every man drew his sword half way out of its scabbard to testify his forwardness to defend the Christian faith; which has been a custom put in practice throughout all Poland ever since the reign of King Miecislau, who was the first of that character in this kingdom who embraced Christianity, A.D. 964, and was the first sovereign prince of it that renounced Paganism."

The following description of the mode in which punishment was inflicted upon servants by their masters affords some insight into the constitution of society in Poland at the period of South's visit. "Masters also have a power," he observes, "of chastising their servants, which they do after this manner:—if the servant they are about to punish be a Polish gentleman, then they make him lie down on his belly on a carpet spread on the ground, or upon a stool, when another gentleman servant lays him on unmercifully upon the back with a rope or stick, giving him as many blows or lashes as the master, who is always present, orders. After which he that is beaten embraces the knees of him that has commanded him to be beat, and salutes him with the good-natured title of benefactor. Which discipline seems a little too severe; but, however, is necessary for the temper of these people. The servants of vulgar extraction are likewise punished after the same manner, only with this difference, that they have no carpet spread under them. Some of the former think it an honour to be so thrashed, which honour they always bestow liberally as often as they deserve it."

Of the manners and morals of the Polish clergy no very favourable account is given. "The regular clergy," he writes, "are generally very rich, but not less dissolute and immodest; for they frequently go into the cellars to drink, those being the tippling-places in this country; and sometimes you shall see many of them so drunk in the streets that they are scarcely able to stand or go, and this without either their superiors or the people taking notice of them."

In the Polish constitution South already perceived the seeds of dissolution, and he expresses his surprise that, with its manifold faults and weaknesses, it should have existed for above a thousand years. "Nay, considering the power of their sovereign," he continues, "the absolute prerogative every gentleman has in his own lands, in a manner above the laws,—the turbulency of their diets, and the small obligation the officers think they lie under to perform their several duties, the Poles themselves have owned it to be no less than a miracle that they should have subsisted as a kingdom and republic so long; I having heard them to say, that their preservation was to be attributed to God alone, that protected them to be the invincible bulwark of Europe against the progress of the common enemies of Christendom, the Turks and Tartars."

Upon South's return to England, from his Polish trip, he became rector of the pleasant village of Islip, in Oxfordshire. At that time the living produced about 200*l.* per annum, and in the disposal of this sum he gave a remarkable proof of the generosity of his disposition. One half of the income he set aside for the maintenance of a curate, and the other half he distributed in charity, or employed in the education and apprenticeship of the poor children of the parish. He also spent a large sum of money in repairing the church and parsonage, and purchased a piece of ground to be added to the latter, for the benefit of succeeding incumbents.

During the latter part of Charles the Second's reign, the highest ecclesiastical preferments were within the reach of the then most popular of divines. There is no doubt that a bishopric was more than once tendered to him, but this distinction he always steadily declined. Upon the accession of James II. South beheld with indignation the insidious means resorted to by the sovereign to restore the supremacy of the Roman Catholic faith. Not all his loyalty to the crown, deep and fervent as it was, could prevent him from launching from the pulpit his bitterest invectives against the Papists and their supporters, although, in matters temporal, he still adhered to the doctrine of the divine right of kings. When the Monmouth Rebellion broke out, much as he disliked the measures of the court, he avowed himself ready, if necessary, to change his black cassock for a buff-coat. And when the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of the Establishment, joined in a memorial to the Prince of Orange to come over and protect the constitution and religion of Great Britain, he was applied to in vain for his signature. His religion, he said, had taught him to bear all things, "and he would use no other weapons but his prayers and tears for the recovery of his sovereign from the wicked and unadvised counsels wherewith he was entangled."

The abdication of James, or rather his desertion of the kingdom, having, according to the highest legal opinions, left his subjects at liberty to transfer their allegiance to another sovereign, South was induced, though with considerable reluctance, to acknowledge the title of the Prince of Orange to the vacant throne.

When it was proposed, however, to promote him to one of the sees previously occupied by the non-juring bishops, he rejected the proposal with becoming warmth—in fact, almost with indignation; for he respected the motives of those who had sacrificed emoluments and distinction for conscience' sake, and properly refused (as he expressed it) to rise upon the ruins of men illustrious for piety, good morals, and strictness of life, as well as for consistency, sincerity, and honour.

During the reign of King William, our high-church divine steadily resisted, according to his means and opportunities, every measure of concession to the opponents of the Established Church. He was in the list of zealous churchmen who murmured at the Act of Toleration, and who vehemently opposed the contemplated revision of the Liturgy; and his sermons constantly breathed the bitterest hostility to nonconformists of every shade, as well as the utmost contempt for their characters and attainments. He still regarded and spoke of them as rebels, intent upon the plunder of the church, and the murder of kings, if the opportunity again presented itself; and we find him, in 1692, deprecating their notions of religion and their forms of worship with the same vehemence of sarcasm which he had employed in the days of the Stuarts. In a sermon preached at Westminster Abbey, in that year, on the subject of the Christian Pentecost, he thus significantly sneered at the illiterate ministers of the dissenting communities:—"In the fourth and last place, this emanation of gifts from the Spirit assures us that knowledge and learning are by no means opposite to grace, since we see gifts, as well as graces, conferred by the same Spirit. But amongst those of the late reforming age (whom we have been speaking of), all learning was utterly cried down. So that with them the best preachers were such as could not read, and the ablest divines such as could not write. In all their preachments they so highly pretended to the Spirit, that they could hardly so much as spell the letter. To be blind was with them the proper qualification of the spiritual guide, and to be book-learned, as they called it, and to be irreligious, were almost terms convertible. None were thought fit for the ministry but tradesmen and mechanics, because none else were allowed to have the Spirit. Those only were accounted like St. Paul, who could work with their hands, and, in a literal sense, drive the nail home, and be able to make a pulpit, before they preached in it."

An event in South's life, too important to be passed over, was his controversy, about this time, with Dr. Sherlock, then Dean of St. Paul's, on the nature of the Trinity. The combatants carried on their discussion with great warmth as well as ability, and South was considered to bear away the palm of victory. The contest excited some public interest, and a witty, but rather irreverent ballad, entitled, "The Battle-Royal," was written upon it, which became so popular, that it was translated into various languages. Its object was to ridicule such discussions, as opposed to the true interests of religion, and the first verse was as follows:—

"A dean and prebendary
Had once a new vagary,
And were at doubtful strife,
Who led the better life, sir,
And was the better man,
And was the better man."

And then, after a humorous description of the momentous controversy, the moral was given in these lines:—

"Thus in this battle-royal,
As none would take denial,
The dame for which they strove, sir,
Could neither of them love; sir,
Since all had given offence, &c.
"She therefore, slyly waiting,
Left all three fools a-prating,
And being in a fright, sir,
Religion took her flight, sir,
And ne'er was heard of since,
And ne'er was heard of since."

During the reign of Queen Anne little was heard or seen of the once celebrated Dr. South. The infirmities of age gradually stole upon him, and impaired the vigour of his mental faculties, whilst, according to some accounts, they affected his temper, and rendered him sullen, impatient, and morose. He took a lively interest, however, in the proceedings against Dr. Sacheverel, and warmly exerted himself on his behalf. Ecclesiastical preferments were still pressed upon his acceptance, and on the death of Dr. Sprat, he was offered both the See of Rochester, and the Deanery of Westminster; but he declined such honours as unfit for an old infirm man, who had refused to accept similar preferments even in the vigour and prime of manhood.

As he sank into his dotage, and grew feebler and feebler, many longing eyes were cast upon his rich rectory and comfortable stall. Long before he departed from this mortal scene, his demise was hourly expected, and, we fear, impatiently waited for, by eager expectants for ecclesiastical preferment. On the 13th of January, 1709, Dr. Jonathan Swift coolly added the following postscript to a letter which he had indited to the Earl of Halifax: "Pray, my lord, desire Dr. South to die about the fall of the leaf, for he has a prebend of Westminster, which will make me your neighbour, and a sinecure in the country, both in the queen's gift, which my friends have often told me would fit me extremely." In the following October, however, Halifax was compelled to reply to his friend's pressing request in these words: "Dr. South holds out still, but he cannot be immortal!" Winter, however, was coming on, and Swift, growing impatient, wrote to Halifax, to solicit another preferment in case that gentle winter (too gentle, it seems, for Swift) should not carry off the superannuated divine. In spite of all, South lived on for nearly seven long, long years more, and died, at last, at the age of eighty-three, on the 8th of July, 1716.

It would be superfluous to dwell at any length upon the prominent features of South's character. His greatest admirers will admit that he was violent and intolerant, and his opponents will not deny that he was conscientious, earnest, and sincere. He was evidently a man of warm and generous disposition; a fast friend and a determined foe; and an enemy to shuffling and hypocrisy in every shape. On the other hand, his strong prejudices occasionally warped his judgment, and stifled the better feelings of his nature. He was one-sided, obstinate, and bigoted to a degree rarely met with in a world where the best of men have been constrained to admit their liability to error. Perhaps great allowances should be made for the circumstances of the period, the influence of early training, and the warmth of his temperament; but after all deductions and allowances have been made, it is impossible to regard with approval the virulence of his invectives, and the extravagant harshness of the judgments which he thought fit to pass upon others.

As a preacher, however, in his own peculiar walk, South stood unrivalled and alone. His manly eloquence and vigorous language, combined with the earnestness of his style and manner, rendered him the most popular pulpit orator among the Church of England divines of the period. "Not diffuse, not learned, not formal in argument, like Barrow," says Hallam; "with a more natural structure of sentences, a more pointed, though by no means a more fair and satisfactory turn of reasoning; with a style clear and English, and free from all pedantry, but abounding with those colloquial novelties of idiom, which, though now vulgar and offensive, the age of Charles II. affected; sparing no personal or temporary sarcasm, but, if he seems for a moment to tread on the verge of buffoonery, recovering himself by some stroke of vigorous sense and language; such was the worthy Dr. South, whom the courtiers delighted to hear."

The readers of South's sermons will also find that he was not only an accomplished divine, but a shrewd observer of the world and the world's ways. Traces of his great experience and accurate knowledge of mankind are everywhere apparent. His discourses are full of home-truths, and strong common-sense remarks. With the skill and courage of a master-mind, he dissected human motives, and mercilessly exposed every subterfuge and evasion to which hypocrisy ordinarily resorts. He was undoubtedly gifted with a keenness and clearness of perception such as few men have possessed; in fact, we have no hesitation in placing him, in this respect, in the same rank with Swift and La Rochefoucauld. His remarks upon every-day topics are equally distinguished for their pointed truth, their sagacity, and originality. Some of our readers may think it an interesting fact, that in one of his sermons, (on "the Wisdom of the World,") he was the first to give expression to an idea, the parentage of which has been since ascribed to more than one distinguished person. In his recent biography of Goldsmith, it was mentioned by Washington Irving as a curious circumstance, that that great writer, who in conversation could keep nothing to himself, was the author of a maxim which inculcated the most thorough dissimulation, and which has been commonly quoted as the remark of "the fine-witted Talleyrand," namely, that it is maintained by men of the world, "that the true end of speech is not so much to express our wants as to conceal them." The idea was, however, forcibly expressed by South, long before the time of either Goldsmith or Talleyrand.

"It is looked upon," he says, "as a great piece of weakness and unfitness for business, forsooth, for a man to be so clear and open, as really to think, not only what he says, but what he swears, and when he makes any promise, to have the least intent of performing it, but when his interest serves instead of veracity, and engages him rather to be true to another, than false to himself. He only now-a-days speaks like an oracle, who speaks tricks and ambiguities. Nothing is thought beautiful that is not painted; so that, what between French fashions and Italian dissimulations, the old generous English spirit, which heretofore made this nation so great in the eyes of all the world round about it, seems utterly lost and extinct, and we are degenerated into a mean, sharking, fallacious, undermining way of converse; there being a snare and a trepan almost in every word we hear, and every action we see. Men speak with designs of mischief, and therefore they speak in the dark. In short, this seems to be the true inward judgment of all our politic sages, that speech was given to the ordinary sort of men, whereby to communicate their mind; but to wise men, whereby to conceal it."

In the sermon from whence we have taken this quotation, another fine passage occurs, in which the so-called wisdom of the world is vigorously arraigned for the crimes of heartlessness and ingratitude. The policy of neglecting a friend to court the good opinion of an enemy was well understood in King Charles's days, and many instances must have presented themselves to the preacher's mind. "Gratitude," he well said, "looks backward, but policy forward." And then, with a significance of allusion which was doubtless fully appreciated, he thus admirably rebuked the craft of the politician:—

"Whence it is, that now-a-days, only rich men or enemies are accounted the rational objects of benefaction. For to be kind to the former is traffic; and in these times men present, just as they soil their ground, not that they love the dirt, but that they expect a crop; and for the latter, the politician well approves of the Indian's religion in worshipping the devil, that he may do him no hurt; how much soever he hates him, and is hated by him. But if a poor, old, decayed friend or relation, whose purse, whose house and heart had been formerly free, and open to such an one, shall at length, upon change of fortune, come to him with hunger and rags, pleading his past services and his present wants, and so crave some relief of one, for the merit and memory of the other; the politician, who imitates the serpent's wisdom, must turn his deaf ear, too, to all the insignificant charms of gratitude and honour, in behalf of such a bankrupt, undone friend, who, having been already used, and now squeezed dry, is fit only to be cast aside. He must abhor gratitude as a worse kind of witchcraft, which only serves to conjure up the pale, meagre ghosts of dead, forgotten kindnesses, to haunt and trouble him; still respecting what is past; whereas such wise men as himself, in such cases, account all that is past, to be also gone; and know that there can be no gain in refunding, nor any profit in paying debts. The sole measure of all his courtesies is, what return they will make him, and what revenue they will bring him in. His expectations govern his charity. And we must not vouch any man for an exact master in the rules of our modern policy, but such an one as hath brought himself so far to hate and despise the absurdity of being kind upon free cost, as (to use a known expression) not so much as to tell a friend what it is o'clock for nothing."

We have quoted several examples of South's merciless ridicule of the nonconformists. He was, however, equally opposed to the Romanists, and not a whit more scrupulous in making their religious ceremonies the subject of his railery. In the first sermon which occurs in his collected works, the Roman Catholic notions of pilgrimage and penance are thus pointedly satirized:—

"It seems that with them a man sometimes cannot be a penitent unless he also turns vagabond, and foots it to Jerusalem, or wanders over this or that part of the world, to visit the shrine of such or such pretended saint; though, perhaps, in his life ten times more ridiculous than themselves: thus, that which was Cain's curse is become their religion. He that thinks to expiate a sin by going barefoot does the penance of a goose, and only makes one folly the atonement for another. Paul, indeed, was scourged and beaten by the Jews, but we never read that he beat or scourged himself; and if they think that his keeping under of his body imports so much, they must first prove that the body cannot be kept under by a virtuous mind, and that the mind cannot be made virtuous but by a scourge, and consequently, that thongs and whiplow are means of grace, and things necessary to salvation. The truth is, if men's religion lies no deeper than their skin, it is possible that they may scourge themselves into very great improvements. But they will find that bodily exercise touches not the soul; and that neither pride, nor lust, nor covetousness, nor any other vice, was ever mortified by corporal discipline: it is not the back but the heart that must bleed for sin: and consequently, that in this whole course they are like men out of their way; let them lash on never so fast, they are not at all the nearer to their journey's end, and howsoever they deceive themselves and others, they may as well expect to bring a cart as a soul to heaven by such means. What arguments they have to beguile poor, simple, unstable souls with, I know not; but surely the practical, casuistical, that is, the principal, vital part of their religion savours very little of spirituality."

Dealing in general with the ordinary events and realities of life, it will be seen that South's discourses are remarkable for their solid, manly wisdom, which imparts to them a character essentially practical, and has procured for them the reputation of being "not Sunday but week-day sermons." He saw deeper than most men into the motives of human conduct, and formed in general a clearer estimate of human character. As an example of the subtle truth which characterises some of his remarks, we present our readers with the following sentences on the nature and effect of the indulgence of a contemptuous feeling towards individuals or governments:—

"We will discourse of contempt and the malign hostile influence it has upon government. As for the thing itself, every man's experience will inform him that there is no action in the behaviour of one man towards another of which human nature is more impatient than contempt; it being a thing made up of these two ingredients, an undervaluing of a man upon a belief of his utter uselessness and inability, and a spiteful endeavour to engage the rest of the world in the same belief and slight esteem of him. So that the immediate design of contempt is the shame of the person contemned; and shame is a banishment of him from the good opinion of the world, which every man most earnestly desires, both upon a principle of nature and of interest. For it is natural to all men to affect a good name; and he that despises a man, libels him in his thoughts, reviles and traduces him in his judgment. And there is also interest in the case; for a desire to be well thought of directly resolves itself into that owned and mighty principle of self-preservation; forasmuch as thoughts are the first wheels and motives of action, and there is no long passage from one to the other. He that thinks a man to the ground will quickly endeavour to lay him there; for while he despises him, he arraigns and condemns him in his heart; and the after-bitterness and cruelties of his practices are but the executioners of the sentence passed before upon him by his judgment. Contempt, like the planet Saturn, has first an ill aspect, and then a destroying influence."

Devoted as he was to the study of human nature and the analysis of human motives, no one knew better than South the difficulties of such a pursuit. "Who can tell," he says, in one sermon, "all the windings and turnings, all the depths, all the hollow-nesses and dark corners of the mind of man? He who enters upon this scrutiny, enters into a labyrinth or wilderness, where he has no guide but chance or industry to direct his inquiries or to put an end to his search. It is a wilderness, in which a man may wander more than forty years; a wilderness through which few have passed to the promised land."

In recommending the practice of virtue, he did not disdain to appeal to the selfish side of human nature. He strove to make men virtuous and religious by showing that it was their interest as well as their duty to be so. He set before them the superiority of spiritual to sensual pleasures, as demonstrated in the very nature of pleasure itself. "Pleasure, in general," said he, "is the apprehension of a suitable object, suitably applied to a rightly disposed faculty, and so must be conversant both about the faculties of the body and of the soul respectively." And he pointed out the very unsatisfactory nature of frivolous recreations and enjoyments by showing their inferiority, even to the pleasure arising from the performance of daily duties and attention to ordinary occupations.

"Nor is that man less deceived," he has well and wisely said, "that thinks to maintain a constant tenure of pleasure, by a continual pursuit of sports and recreations. The most voluptuous and loose person breathing, were he but tied to follow his hawks and his hounds, his dice and his courtships, every day, would find it the greatest torment and calamity that could befall him; he would fly to the mines and galleys for his recreation, and to the spade and the mattock for a diversion from the misery of a continual unintermitted pleasure. But, on the contrary, the providence of God has so ordered the course of things that there is no action, the usefulness of which has made it the matter of duty and of a profession, but a man may bear the continual pursuit of it without loathing and satiety. The same shop and trade that employs a man in his youth employs him also in his age. Every morning he rises fresh to his hammer and anvil; he passes the day singing; custom has naturalized his labour to him; his shop is his element, and he cannot with any enjoyment of himself live out of it."

We subjoin two more quotations from South's sermons, which, together with the extracts already given, will, we trust, convey to our readers an accurate notion of his style and manner. The first is a definition and description of the sin of Ingratitude:—

"Ingratitude is an insensibility of kindnesses received, without any endeavour either to acknowledge or to repay them. Ingratitude sits on its throne, with pride at its right hand and cruelty at its left, worthy supporters of such a state. You may rest upon this as a proposition of an eternal unfailling truth, that there neither is, nor ever was any person remarkably ungrateful, who was not also insufferably proud; nor, convertibly, any one proud, who was not equally ungrateful. For as snakes breed in dunghills not singly, but in knots, so in such base noisome hearts, you shall ever see pride and ingratitude indivisibly wreathed and twisted together. Ingratitude overlooks all kindnesses, but it is because pride makes it carry its head so high. Ingratitude is too base to return a kindness, and too proud to regard it; much like the tops of mountains, barren indeed, but yet lofty; they produce nothing, they feed nobody, they clothe nobody, yet are high and stately, and look down upon all the world about them. Ingratitude, indeed, put the poniard into Brutus's hand, but it was want of compassion which thrust it into Cæsar's heart. Friendship consists properly in mutual offices, and a generous strife in alternate acts of kindness. But he who does a kindness to an ungrateful person, sets his steel to a flint, and sows his seed upon the sand: upon the former he makes no impression, and from the latter he finds no production. The only voice of ingratitude is, Give, give; but when the gift is once received, then, like the swine at his trough, it is silent and insatiable. In a word, the ungrateful person is a monster which is all throat and belly; a kind of thoroughfare or common sewer, for the good things of the world to pass into; and of whom, in respect of all kindnesses conferred on him, may be verified that observation of the lion's den; before which appeared the footsteps of many that had gone in thither, but no prints of any that ever came out thence."

Our second extract, on the "Prosperity of Fools," will remind our readers of Lord Bacon's celebrated saying: "Certainly virtue is like precious odours, most fragrant when they are incensed, or crushed; for prosperity doth but discover vice, but adversity doth but discover virtue."

"Why the prosperity of fools proves destructive to them, is, because prosperity has a peculiar force to abate men's virtues, and to heighten their corruptions. Prosperity and ease upon an unsanctified impure heart, are like the sunbeams upon a dunghill; it raises many filthy, noisome exhalations. The same soldiers, who in hard service and in the battle are in perfect subjection to their leaders, in peace and luxury are apt to mutiny and rebel. That corrupt affection which has lain, as it were, dead and frozen in the midst of distracting businesses or under adversity, when the sun of prosperity has shined upon it, then, like a snake, it presently recovers its former strength and venom."

As a clerical humourist, the name of South has almost passed into a proverb. His reputation in that character does not merely rest upon his sermons; but many smart sayings are recorded of him, which prove the quickness of his apprehension, and the liveliness of his fancy. One of the best witticisms attributed to him, is the mock-serious reprimand which he is said, when preaching on one occasion before a sleepy auditory in the chapel royal, to have addressed in a loud tone to the Earl of Lauderdale: "My lord, I am sorry to disturb your slumbers, but you snore so loud, you will wake his Majesty." The incident, it may be remembered has been thus versified:—

"Old South, a witty Churchman reckon'd,
Was preaching once to Charles the Second,
But much too serious for a court
Who at all preaching made a sport;
He soon perceived his audience nod,
Deaf to the zealous man of God.
The Doctor stopp'd; began to call,
'Pray wake the Earl of Lauderdale:
My lord! why, 'tis a monstrous thing!
You snore so loud, you'll wake the King.'"

Nor were his sneers at the nonconformists confined to the pulpit. When a presbyterian tradesman assailed him, during the fervour of the Popish plot, with lamentations on the national blindness, and prophecies of Papal ascendancy, with a return to the fire and fagot, South addressed him in a bantering but consoling tone: "Never fear, my friend, men of your profession are too great hypocrites ever to become martyrs."

Before we conclude our sketch, we may remark that whilst he sometimes transgressed the rules of decorum, and occasionally manifested a deplorable want of charity towards those from whom he differed, South has left behind him one of the most admirable summaries of the duties and qualifications of the Christian minister upon record. It must be regretted that he did not reduce into practice all the rules of conduct which he recommended to others. But the best of men are often insensible to their own defects, and it is satisfactory, at least, to know that in enumerating the qualifications which a Christian minister should possess, he did not exclude the gentler virtues of moderation and charity. "God is the fountain of honour," he says, in describing the true glory of the clergy, "and the conduit by which he conveys it to the sons of men, are virtues and generous practices. Some, indeed, may please and promise themselves high matters from full revenue, stately palaces, court interests, and great dependences. But that which makes the clergy glorious, is to be knowing in their profession, unspotted in their lives, active and laborious in their charges, bold and resolute in opposing seducers, and daring to look vice in the face, though never so potent and illustrious. And, lastly, to be gentle, courteous, and compassionate to all. These are our robes and our maces, our escutcheons and highest titles of honour."

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER;

OR, MAN AS HE IS.

By OCTAVIUS FRERIE OWEN, M.A.; Author of "The Man of Fact;" "Schools of Ancient Philosophy," &c.

II.—THE MAN OF TON.

THIS plant of graceful delicacy is an exotic from the usual clime of civilization, and is forced into luxuriant elegance by the artificial warmth of the hothouse called "good society." Like the border on which it grows, it is somewhat indefinite and anomalous in its nature—if "nature" it have any—and belongs to a circle where emotion is rarely admissible, visible feeling being studiously expatriated from such neighbourhood, for nothing more offends a well-bred man than the exhibition of natural impulses, which, if joyous, he denominates "vulgarity," —if lacrymose, "a scene." As the moon, he moves, the condensation, as in the centre, of many stars, quiet brilliancy is his "specific difference," logically speaking, and the temperature he most affects, if it be not chaste, is at all events cold.

Do not start, then, at the information that a "Man of Ton" need not be, in the highest sense of the annexed term, "a gentleman;" for this latter, involving in its strict meaning a forbearance towards others, is "a delicate refinement known to few," as Thomson says. On the contrary, we have sometimes witnessed most thorough-paced ill-manners and brusquerie, in circles considered of very high caste, good connexion being but too often deemed the only necessary carte d'entrée thereto, in the same way as some very strict fanatics think, if a man be only rigidly devout, he may be excused his entire neglect of personal cleanliness, nor ever come near "baths or wash-houses!" To the Man of Ton, his dress, and the petits soins he pays his person, constitute the chief details of his existence; they are the offerings he renders at the shrine of that divinity Fashion, to whose minister he pays his only sincere adoration,—"the idol," says Swift, "who makes men by a kind of manufacturing operation;" we mean—his tailor. It is indeed to be regretted that he does not endeavour to keep his principles as spotless as his linen—though if the Man of Ton enter under the first of the two following descriptions, they would scarcely repay his care.

Yet it is beneficial to others, at least, if not to the individual himself, to ape the virtue if he have it not; it is certain too, that though the hood does not make the monk, still it keeps the latter from doing many things he would commit, if he wore it not; and thus upon the same principle, we suppose, as a fat man is compelled in consequence of his obesity to balance his figure at its utmost altitude, which gives him the appearance of one above doing a bad action, so the external exhibition of our fashionable man's politeness, is by no means without its use. His gentlemanly bearing, even when wholly artificial, elicits in his imitators a genuine good-breeding: the master indeed may be a dummy, but his image copied by his followers dignifies them, and keeps the precincts of society hallowed, which might otherwise be violated by bad manners under the excuse of eccentricity. The indescribable fetter of high polish which, though unseen, keeps down vulgar selfishness in circles wherein, by some mischance, such has entered, is linked most subtly, yet most strongly, by the rivets etiquette has forged; and the most daring feels himself coerced within proper limits, by an intangible yoke he cannot break. There are some who think that boorishness is an inseparable adjunct to high talent, who try as it were to imitate Cromwell, by copying the defect of his wart; yet this only evinces the dwelling-place of the mind to be so narrow, as not to allow talent and gentility to dwell in it together: now to these, the rules of "ton" especially apply, and they are made to feel that though originality be tolerated, ill-breeding is unpardonable, and many men dread to be chasséd, far more than to be shot.

In former times, there were three indispensable requisites to form the Man of Ton, the Sedley or Rochester of the day:—wit, valour, fashion; we, less exclusive, are content to frame our exquisites from the last only, the two former qualities being seldom cared about or inquired after. Virtue par excellence was not looked for in either age, and had a tax been levied on the men of fashion on its account, it would hardly have borne the expense of collecting. But we must not therefore suppose, that "ton" is indiscriminately and invariably the adjunct of depravity, we see its votaries under divers shades of disposition, and the same qualification which may shield a profligate or conceal a knave, may also be the concomitant of a noble heart, and gild the refinement of the man of honour.

We will introduce our readers to a sketch of two opposites.—It is four o'clock, Regent Street begins to fill, yet even there, the observed of all observers, Sir Charles, seldom appears. His haunt is more select, nor besides his club in St. James' Street, does he frequent other precincts, than the neighbourhood of Park Lane, and similar fashionable localities, where he dreads not the intrusion of the canaille between the wind and his nobility. He is the cynosure of all the women, the favourite model of the men, though placed in a region of his own, beyond competition; like Orion, a gorgeous constellation only to be seen in the clearest and most sublimated—we do not mean the purest—atmosphere. Not to be reached by the herd of imitators of his own sex, it is astonishing how low he will stoop to recognise the notice of the fairer order, indeed, his fame is strangely enhanced by the reported universality of his attentions to every pretty face. His name has suffered no injury by more than once appearing in courts of law with heavy damages attached to it; these last rather illuminate his reputation, and may be regarded as Cupid's stars of merit, though they rise in vice, and set in mortgages! You are expecting an Apollo in intellect and beauty, a Mars in courage, a Mercury in grace;—yet he is none of these; Phidias would not have selected that stultified and sensual face for aught other model than a Satyr; the contracted eye, the salacious lip, the hair half-curl, half-set, present a very Pan. He never said a witty thing in his life; his powers of mind are mediocre and superficial; his judgment exercises itself in flats—by some men of fashion held indisputable—upon the anecdote of an operatist and the exact flavour of Chablis; yet he is run after by the women, who blush and adore him, by the men, who abuse and copy him! He is the spoiled child of Fashion; in her patronising influence lies the mystic spell, which binds to his inferior intellect the taste, sounder sense, and better feelings of his class; she it is, who has invested that almost Gorgon head with power to look down the wondering mob of lesser men, with looks of stone, icy as his own soul. You ask for his accomplishments;—he can gamble, race, drive, seduce; his principle is to gratify himself, his practice to destroy others, like the Upas—by the poison of his shadow!—in a word, he wears the best fitting coat and boot, the most recherché cravat, has a delicately formed hand, a cold heart,—would you have more?

Slay! here comes metal more attractive: antithetical to the last in disposition, though still essentially the Man of Ton, can any form be more significantly impressed with pure nobility and high breeding than that which has just passed us? If ruffles, and a court-suit,—that impossible attire to any but your thorough gentleman, were again to be prescribed by Fashion,—what figure could adopt it with more perfect ease than this our present hero? It is Colonel L—, a man of the highest birth, most finished bearing, and most versatile ability in town. Notwithstanding the reputed love of idleness and of pleasure belonging to his profession, he is esteemed universally as an intelligent, high-minded soldier, a cavalier truly "sans peur et sans reproche," and you may even introduce him to your sister or your wife without anxiety. The Colonel is very nice in his sense of "honour;" he attaches a very comprehensive meaning to that term; it includes in his view, truth, faithfulness to trust reposed in him—is synonymous with integrity—and he would deem it the blackest ingratitude, the foulest stain, a bar-sinister on his armorial bearings in fact, were he to injure a friend's reputation, or that of his wife or child. When you therefore converse with him, you feel you are not associating with an amusing hypocritical profligate, who would sacrifice your dearest ties to-morrow for a passing whim, but with one whose friendship, if you are so fortunate as to gain it, will stand you well, alike to stamp your own position as a man of merit, and to serve you personally in case of need. He has had, more than once, close siege laid to his heart; it were impossible with such a deportment and such personal advantages, that he should escape the ordeal, but he has passed through it nobly. There is a romantic story afloat, that on one occasion, a wild enthusiastic girl abandoned her father's roof, and fled to him; and more than once in his campaigns abroad, his name has been sought for, and his guardianship solicited, by the victims of war's harrowing desolation, and its domestic separations; but on the occasion to which we especially refer, so closely did the Colonel keep the secret of his innamorata's indiscreet flight, that nothing oozed out but the bare report of the incident, added to the fact of the father's impassioned expressions of gratitude to the noble preserver of his daughter's reputation. That she was very beautiful is affirmed, also that she was of good family, but her name is known to but few, and to those only by other channels than the Colonel's information: he, indeed, appears to have so promptly checked all observation from the first upon the subject as to awe the most audacious interrogator into silence; in this presenting a remarkable contrast to Sir Charles, our former friend, whose significant shrugs, and mock deprecation of insidious remarks, cut, like the lancet in the sponge, through the softness which conceals the edge, and ruin reputations he hypocritically pretends to shield.

Personally, in L——'s appearance there is nothing flimsy or acquired connected with his style; the whole arrangement is unaffected, yet there is something indescribably attractive in the tout ensemble of the man. From the position of the hat to the turn of the foot, you are convinced that he is a remarkable person, and you turn to detect, if possible, wherein consists the marvellous magnetic power of the impulses which draw you to him. True he is handsome, yet there are others, if feature be alone considered, more regularly well looking. Is it in the intellectual expression? Certes that is no common individuality, stamped by exponents like that eye and mouth, even when the forehead is partially concealed; yet how many intellectual men pass unnoticed, only from the commonness of their appearance, as they shamble through the public ways, or move risibility by their ungainly figure, when, wrenched into an ill-fitting costume for the nonce, they seem in society starchy and out of place; if short, appearing like hogs in armour, or full clothes-bags with heads and feet thrust through, and if tall, calling up a fanciful idea of gawky giraffes in regimentals. No! it is not even intelligence alone which rivets your notice, for the man often is a composite and not a simple character: a living diphthong, his two radical elements are high breeding and good society: an intellectual consonant, he cannot stand alone without the aid of that, which renders the language of his society intelligible, we mean the vowel—Fashion. He contracts within his own personality the blended influences of many qualifications. The face, that dial of the soul, tells that the hours of the inner life pass wholesomely, and leave no track of the tedium of dissipation the recklessness of debauchery, the taint of dishonourable regret! The form lofty, yet pliable in gesture; the manner, a rare combination of natural artlessness and educational finish, spring from a noble disposition within, more than from an adventitious social code, without. Over all, as if to cover every salient point, which might break the regularity of grace, is thrown the veil of exquisite refinement, which smooths unevenness without obliterating character, and induces self-command without degenerating into insipidity. Truly a noble jewel in most pure and perfect setting is such our real "Man of Ton!"

A VISIT TO THE CATACOMBS IN ROME,

WITH NOTICES OF SOME EARLY CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES, ARTS, AND RELICS.

BY S. LEY WOLMER.

On a lovely evening in the month of May an Italian, the Count Giovanni de Viva, and an English gentleman, his friend, who was then visiting at Rome, having passed the evening together, went to see St. Peter's by moonlight.

Gentle reader! will you permit your countryman to be the narrator of a little history? Will you try even to become a party interested in it, and picture the two friends, and yourself, if it please you, with them, standing in the Piazza, or open space, in front of St. Peter's?

Around is a wide-spreading semicircular colonnade, in which are ranged hundreds of columns in double rows, supporting above the entablature numerous lofty statues. A magnificent fountain on each side throws volumes of crystal waters high in the air, and they are descending with a pleasing sound, scattering about their spray like summer showers. The lofty obelisk which once ornamented the capital of Egypt now stands in the centre of the piazza, and breaks the full view of the church with the sharp outline of its lofty column, covered with strange and not yet wholly deciphered hieroglyphics.

On the occasion we are now recording, the stars rapidly appeared in the dark blue sky, until at length the mighty host of them, proceeding in silent loveliness on their nightly pilgrimage, presented the glorious sight which the heavens of a southern clime offer on a cloudless night. Under certain associations of feeling the scenes of nature or the beauties of art produce peculiar impressions of their glory and beauty. Could it be otherwise at such a time, and in such a place as Rome, with the edifice of St. Peter's before us? And then the moon, "walking in brightness," rising higher and higher in the heavens, began to throw a flood of radiance over the giant church, lighting up cross, and dome, and tower. At that moment the combinations of beauty in the scene were indeed superb.

On one side of the church the constellation of Orion shone in full majesty, whilst to the left the brightest of the fixed stars sparkled with a tremulous lustre; and, in the happy combinations of the moment, from the point of view from which we gazed, a bright planet seemed for awhile to rest like a brilliant diamond on the point of the cross which surmounts the dome. It suggested the thought of a beautiful representation of Truth, descending like a pure light from its native heaven, and resting on the cross, the nearest point it found to brighten on earth, and to direct man even from the summit of an earthly to a heavenly temple.

From the serenity of the air, the last vibrations of the sound of the bells, which alone reminded us of the flight of time, wavered and wavered so long and so softly, that I ventured to express a thought which would have been rejected in the daylight—that the dying sounds seemed like the spirits of the hours, unwilling to depart; and so lingering about ere they passed away.

The Signor de Viva was a Catholic, I a Protestant; both of us, I trust, Christians. We had seen much of Rome together, but its subterranean wonders had hitherto been forgotten.

"To-morrow, Signor Count, shall we visit the catacombs?" I inquired.

"With all my heart; and if you will permit me, I will be your guide," replied the count.

The next day, at an early hour, we met, and as we passed towards the suburbs of Rome the count made our walk more agreeable by giving some general accounts of the catacombs of Italy, and more particularly as to those which had been found at Ronie.

The catacombs, he stated, are large and extensive galleries which have been dug in ages past underground. The soil which is under Rome, and extends to some distance in the adjoining country, is of a soft character, called Tufa, and is easily worked away; and, whether for the original building of the city or other purposes now unknown, immense cavities were dug ages since; this process constantly going forward, galleries were formed in many parts of considerable length, running along and frequently intersecting each other, like the streets of an underground city.

Great questions have always been entertained by antiquarians as to the original object of forming these passages, but the strong probability is in favour of their having been excavated for the pozzuolano earth, as it is termed, which is of volcanic origin—the passages in many places seem to follow the vein of it; but, whatever was the origin of the catacombs, it is certain that they were subsequently used as burying places long before the Christian era. Notwithstanding the general custom of burning the body amongst the Romans, there were classes of the dead not so disposed of, and these vaults were conveniently used for the interment of slaves and malefactors, whose bodies were thrown into them. After the Christian era the early Christians availed themselves of these subterranean passages for burials, and during the persecutions, the bodies not only of general disciples, but especially of the martyrs, here found a resting-place; the remains of the heroes of the faith, in the estimation of the disciples, threw a sanctity around the place where they rested, so that other Christians desired to be interred near them, and thus the catacombs gradually became a full city of the dead. But concurrently with the use of the catacombs as a place of interment for the early Christians, they were also made a place of refuge during the existence of persecutions, and the disciples met each other and assembled in groups in these dismal places.

Sorrow finds its solace in the hopes of the Gospel and in the acts of worship—the tears which flow as we look down on the earth become dried as we turn our eyes towards heaven. Hymns of praise and accents of prayer ascended often from the galleries of the catacombs. From time to time larger spaces were cut out and subterranean chapels made, in which the ceremonies of the new faith were performed, and the Agapæ, or Love Feasts, celebrated. These assemblies of Christians, and the reverence shown to the remains of martyrs, were noticed by St. Jerome whilst he was a student at Rome.

The researches in modern times amongst the catacombs, added my friend, have been extensive, and some of the results as interesting as the discoveries amongst the tombs of the Egyptians. Many works have been written on the subject; the study of them, if you are inclined for such a repast, will afford you ample contentment, and our present visit may perhaps induce a relish.

The catacombs have been generally known for several hundred years, but no accurate account appears, before an Italian, named Bosio, explored and described some of them in a work published about 1632. Another author, Arringhi, has largely illustrated this interesting subject in two folio volumes, entitled, "Roma Subterranea," published in 1651. Another important and interesting work, giving an account of the pictures and sculptures and other relics found in the catacombs, was written by an author of the name of Bottari, besides which there are many modern publications. In some of these works the results of the visits of the explorers are fully detailed, and plans given of the cemeteries and of the galleries in them as then found.

From the published accounts to which I have referred, and from my own personal observation, (continued the count,) I may inform you briefly that there have been five principal catacombs discovered underneath Rome, and which are now known by the names of the Catacombs of St. Sebastian, and those of Pontianus, of St. Agnes, St. Cyriaca, St. Pancras, with some smaller ones. The most extensive range of catacombs which have been explored and described is that anciently known as the cemetery of the Pope Calistus. The church of St. Sebastian was subsequently built over a part of this subterranean place, and the catacombs then became, and still continue designated as those of St. Sebastian. No adequate idea can, however, now be obtained of the whole extent and ramifications of the catacombs from the parts which can be at present explored; for, excepting a certain space which has been left open in each to gratify curiosity and research, the passages have been built up. The fearful accidents which occurred and which were liable to occur in these dismal regions were assigned as the reasons for closing them up. Fancy, my dear friend, descending amidst the remains of the dead and the mephitic vapours arising from the earth, and then, by some unforeseen accident, the lights being extinguished and the right path to return lost—wandering on and on, and up and down, in an inextricable labyrinth—day and night, and in hunger and thirst—in such a scene and amidst such horrors. This is no fancied scene; many have been missed after descending into the catacombs; and the loss of a whole party some years since in a similar way at length decided that ingress far into the catacombs should be prevented.

In the catacombs of St. Sebastian were found two separate stories one above the other; the upper part was nearly 1,000 feet in length and more than 600 feet in width: the lower was rather smaller in extent and dimensions; but in both, galleries or corridors ran in all directions, crossing and intersecting each other, and numerous small chambers opening into the galleries were full of human remains; the position and manner of their interment you will be able to understand better by an examination of the catacomb itself. There is reason for supposing that this cemetery of which I am now speaking was used by the disciples of Christ at a very early period, and was distinguished by the name of the Cemetery of the Catacombs.

But see before us, (exclaimed the count,) the church of St. Sebastian; we shall descend from it into the catacombs over which, as I informed you, it had been built.

We were now in the Appian Way; and if antiquity could raise a reverential feeling, I was quite disposed to acknowledge the religio loci.

It is surprising what a favourite St. Sebastian is in all places in Italy. His image, pierced with arrows and bound to a tree, meets the eye, I think, more frequently than that of most other saints. The martyr is generally represented as a young man with a well-developed form, which is partially uncovered, and there is nothing except the number of arrows with which he is occasionally represented as transfixed, which can awaken any of those painful feelings which the effigies of some of the old and suffering martyrs create. Perhaps these circumstances, added to the virtues of his life and his tragical death, may account for the interest with which his memory is regarded.

The fabric of the church of St. Sebastian offers externally nothing of peculiar interest. In fact, the exteriors of the churches in Italy are not generally of pleasing architecture, and frequently appear quite unfinished—the glory and the beauty are reserved for the interiors.

The neighbourhood around the church of St. Sebastian is very sombre, with little appearance of population and but few dwellings. It is quite a place for a cemetery. Before we entered the church the count called my attention to a small chapel in the neighbourhood bearing the singular title of "Domine, quo vadis?"—"Lord, whither goest thou?" The origin of this name, the count informed me, with a full assurance of his own belief in the truth of it, was, that it had been built on the spot where St. Peter, being threatened with martyrdom at Rome, was leaving the city to avoid it, when he here met the Saviour himself going towards Rome. The apostle inquired of him, "Domine, quo vadis?" To which the Lord replied, "I go to Rome to be again crucified," and then disappearing left on the spot where the church now stands the print-marks of his feet. The apostle, according to the legend, strengthened and freed from his fears, returned boldly to Rome to meet his martyrdom.

On our entering into the church of St. Sebastian the count dipped his forefinger in the vase of holy water, which is always found near the church doors, marked his forehead with the sign of the cross, and touched several parts of his body with similar devotion. He then offered his hand to me, although in his eyes a heretic. I thought no offence arose in touching it, as my friend reminded me that as water was needful for the purification of the body, so man needed a holy and heavenly influence, of which it was a type, to cleanse the pollutions of the soul. Instead of the mere accustomed touch by which the union of the faithful is symbolized, I grasped the proffered hand with a warmth which might, and probably did, suggest some kindly thoughts as to the brotherhood of us all, notwithstanding the divisions of sects and parties into which we have fallen.

Having taken a general survey of the church, we then made our arrangement for a descent into the catacombs with the sacristan, an officer of the church who was to attend us. He was an intelligent person, dressed in costume; and, requesting us to follow him, he placed large lighted tapers in our hands. Thus prepared, we descended from the church by a narrow staircase until we reached a small chapel excavated from the surrounding earth. Our attention was here directed to a marble statue of St. Sebastian, executed by Bernini, a celebrated sculptor of modern days, several of whose chief works have the curious distinction of ornamenting underground chapels instead of being exposed to the open-day world. The effect, however, of white marble in such sombre localities is increased by the contrast, and a simple statue appearing so unexpectedly will produce a sensation it would not have raised elsewhere.

In this chapel also is shown the place where, our guide informed us, the remains of the Saint Lucina were found. As I was not acquainted with the history of this lady, or even with her place in the calendar, the count kindly relieved me by promising, at another time, a detail of her history and saintly virtues, which he assured me would be so interesting that I should probably desire to see her relics, which had been removed from the catacombs to be objects of veneration in one of the churches in Rome. I thanked him for his courtesy, but felt quite satisfied with the effect produced on my imagination by looking into the place where the lady so long had reposed, and ventured to express my opinion that it would have been much better had her remains been left undisturbed.

"Whatever may be your feelings as to St. Lucina," observed the count, "we shall both be united in our admiration of the great Apostle of the Gentiles; and although as Catholics we claim peculiar relationship with St. Peter, you too will also allow his claims as one of the greatest among the great."

"Certainly," I replied; "amongst the deathless names of the world those of the first apostles of Christ stand in the foremost rank. The fame of earthly conquerors is as nothing to that of the victors of the human mind. Dynasties have been formed, have passed away and are forgotten since the preaching of the apostles began. They were chosen to be, and were made, able ministers in setting up that kingdom whose foundations are never to be shaken, and whose duration is to be eternal."

"Then solemnize your mind," replied the count; "with the remembrance that in this very spot beneath our feet, if the ancient tradition be true, the bodies of some of those great men, 'of whom the world was not worthy,' were deposited after their executions.

"On one of the hills of Rome, (the Janiculum,) St. Peter, it is believed, was crucified; and that St. Paul resided for a considerable period in Rome, historical evidence has decided. In the suburbs of the city he was beheaded.

"We will visit together," added the count, "the Mammertine prisons, where St. Peter was confined, and the spot called the Three Fountains, where St. Paul yielded up his life under the tyranny of Nero. There is something affecting in the thought," he continued, "that these martyrs, after their life of energy and suffering, were even denied the privilege of mingling their remains with the earth of their native land."

"Why should that be lamented?" I asked.

"Can you ask such a question?" the count replied. "You, a foreigner—would you not think with sorrow that you were to die and rest away from your native shores—the land which gave you birth, and to which all your early associations are attached?"

The count favoured us with quotations from Petrarck and Lamartine in favour of his views.

"My dear count," I exclaimed, "if you will quote Petrarck and Lamartine in the catacombs, however much they may be flattered by the selection, I fear we shall make slow progress with our guide, who looks rather impatiently towards you."

We entered without further delay into one of the passages which branched off from the little chapel, and were at once amidst the sepulchres.

In passing through the narrow enclosure, on either side, above and beneath us, was the coloured tufa, or clay; the glare of our large tapers made our party look ghastly to each other, and a sense of oppression in the feelings was occasioned by the confined atmosphere and the associations as we looked around. There were rows of niches, or spaces, of the length of a human body, cut out in the walls all along these passages, but all were now open and tenantless. We threaded passage after passage presenting the same dismal aspect, the silence only broken by our footfalls and voices. It appeared that all the graves had been disturbed; when the outer covering was first broken away, the remains of the wrecks of humanity which had been originally placed in them appeared. Skeletons alone remained. The outlines of human forms in bones in recumbent attitudes were on all sides, some falling to powder on exposure to the air, but others remaining in good preservation.

The description of the remains, "each in his narrow cell for ever laid," would have been strictly applicable to those interred in the catacombs, if they had been allowed to repose there; but the catacombs were always the Church treasury-houses for the relics of saints and martyrs. They became mines to be explored, yielding treasures in the estimation of some more valuable than the glittering gems or precious metals of the earth. They were soon ransacked to supply objects for the veneration or superstition of the members of the Romish Church.

I confess I was disappointed in not realising what my imagination had depicted. On either side I expected to have seen forms still exhibiting something akin to humanity; to have found lamps hanging before the tombs—vases yet containing some of the blood shed by the primitive martyrs resting, as they had originally been placed, beneath their remains—and pictured memories on their tombs, and inscriptions to record their names, and something of the events of their lives and deaths, or other interesting memorials to repay research and invite reflection.

After exploring various corridors and passages, and small spaces or chambers cut out in the earth, but all of the same character, we reached the wall by which further progress in the catacombs was barred on all sides. I longed to pass the barrier. I told my disappointment and desire to the count.

"I share your feelings," he replied; "and thus it ever is with human nature—that which we have is never sufficient if there is something ungained beyond it.

"Is it not enough, my friend, that you are now in the very spot where the early disciples of our faith celebrated some of their divine mysteries, the blessings of which we enjoy without the persecutions to which they were subject? Look at this very chamber, scooped out of the earth, in which we are standing; this was the scene, doubtless, of many a discourse and many an Agape, or Love Feast. There, in the centre, is yet the stone chair in which the Episcopos, or Bishop, gathered his children around him, and in these gloomy caverns told them of 'the light that shined in darkness,' and which they enjoyed although 'the world comprehended it not.' Here, in silence, they were armed for the combat and sufferings to which they were called in the world; and, looking to the great Author of their faith, learned how 'to endure,' as seeing him who is invisible;' and here, when the struggle was over, their remains were brought by their pious brethren to wait until the time when they shall be awakened to glory and immortality."

Our guide, too much accustomed to the scene to receive any new or forcible impressions from it, seemed very inattentive to the count's reflections, but called our attention to an inscription on one of the unopened niches—

"Valentinus, in pace."—Valentinus, in peace.

Would that the Church had left all the tenants of the tombs "in peace," instead of defeating the inscriptions on their graves by disturbing their remains and giving them so premature and unhallowed a resurrection!

"Notwithstanding all your comments, count," I exclaimed, "would that we could pass the barriers, and, with our guide and some new lights, explore the forbidden catacombs. There I might realize the scenes I expected to see, for innovation has not defaced them."

"True," replied our guide; "but I would not accompany you, lest we might meet the same fate as the party who perished there; their bones are added to those they came to explore. We might stumble over their remains as we passed along."

The idea was horrible, and checked for a moment my wish to explore beyond the walls.

"But, gentlemen," continued our guide, "if you are desirous of seeing horrors, you may see enough of them elsewhere—there is no lack of them in Italy. The Catacombs of St. Sebastian are fit for any Christian to visit; but you may find much of what you desire at other places."

I might visit at Rome, it appeared, the less disturbed Catacombs of St. Agnes, the Cemetery of St. Pontianus, and that of St. Pancras—the latter, he said, was rarely entered; and then there was a modern place in Rome where the dead monks were all kept in an underground gallery in their cowls and their hoods, dressed as when alive, with a label on each, telling his name and the date of his death. And then, I was informed, there were, at Naples, catacombs less interfered with than those at Rome; and in some of the churches there the noble dead of centuries ago, dressed in Spanish doublets and military and regal ornaments according to their rank when in life, were still kept in large boxes, which could, by special favour be inspected; and this favour, by the way, was generally accorded to an Englishman.

This was all good news, which the count most satisfactorily seconded, adding, that he was glad to relieve me of much of my present disappointment by the information, which the guide confirmed, that the removal of the bodies and the interesting relics found in the catacombs, instead of a disadvantage, was quite the contrary; for, as the former were held as the sacred deposits of the churches, and guarded more carefully by the veneration of the faithful than precious gems, so the latter had been deposited in museums at the Vatican and elsewhere in Rome, where they could be studied at leisure, with every advantage arising from the results of the studies and comments of learned antiquarians to be referred to in the libraries close at hand; that a whole gallery of early Christian antiquities, from the catacombs and elsewhere, had been collected at the Vatican, forming the most interesting of its halls for observation, devout reflection, and study; and that at Rome there was a complete feast of relics as well as ruins for all who had the desire to pursue the study.

"In fact, in this the Cross has again triumphed, as it will in everything else in God's good time," piously observed the count, as a closing remark.

"Amen," I fervently replied; "but I confess I do not exactly perceive the connexion of your remarks in this particular instance."

"The contents of the martyrs' graves," observed the count, "have become the treasures of the Church; and the Church and the altar guard the martyrs' remains.

"You have forgotten, my friend," he continued, "what occurred but a few days since when we stood together in the midst of the ruins of the Colosseum—

you gave me its history and depicted the scenes which had occurred in it as if you had been an ancient Roman. Did you not then picture the tens of thousands within its circle, gazing with intense interest whilst the gladiators fought and the cruel Nero was about to decide the fate of the poor conquered wretch down whose wounded side the 'blood-drops rained like a shower?' Did you not bid me look at the ruins of the door out of which lions and other ferocious beasts had often sprung amidst the acclamations of the vast multitude around—yes, had sprung amidst that noise and their own roaring—to meet the calm and determined look of the Christian who was to be torn asunder for his witness to his Saviour? And did you not then point to the desolations all around—to the neighbouring ruins of the palace of the Cæsars; and to the large cross fixed and standing erect in the midst of the Colosseum, 'in all its meek supremacy,' and then triumphantly observe, 'The Cross has triumphed?'

"I now point you to the catacombs and their remains and relics. I direct your attention to the symbol of the cross as the loftiest thing in Rome, crowning the dome of St. Peter's, over which we saw last evening that bright star resting. High above all other things the cross towers above the city, the nearest point to heaven, with its mute appeal and acknowledgment of the faith of the city in Him, the Crucified. That cross catches the first glittering ray of the morning sun—it is the last object on which it shines."

I was glad to remember that the loftiest object in London was the cross on St. Paul's, and that it too caught the first sunbeams and retained them the last.

"Would to heaven," I exclaimed, "that those who dwell whether beneath the shadow of St. Peter's or St. Paul's, reflected more of the brightness of the true cross in themselves!" To effect this, however, it also occurred to me that they must look to Him who died upon it to give them the power.

As we emerged from the catacombs we decided that our next visit should be to the museum and the galleries of the Vatican. The next morning we accordingly set out to explore the museum at the Vatican.

"We must again pass St. Peter's," observed the count; "but the glorious temple will exhibit a very different appearance bathed in the sunbeams of this bright May day, from that which inspired such poetic associations in the moonlight."

"Well, I promise you," I replied, "there shall be no rhapsody whatever on the subject. Let us talk of graves, since we are going to explore records taken out of them. Permit me to quote a passage from an English writer which our yesterday's visit has recalled to my memory. Sir Thomas Brown says, 'Man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, and pompous in the grave—solemnizing natiivities and deaths with equal lustre—nor omitting ceremonies of bravery even in the infamy of his nature.'"

The count replied to my quotation,—

"How universal is this longing after an immortality of some kind—this desire to be remembered and loved, not only whilst we live, but after we have ceased to be of the visible world. "Though the worm fulfils the work of destruction beneath, man rears the monument above; it is only a question of time how long before it must crumble in the dust like the perishing remains it covers."

"The pilgrim must seek a resting-place somewhere, though it be in the grave," I observed.

"True," replied the count. "Man is indeed a pilgrim, but a pilgrim for eternity.—His home is not in the grave, but beyond it."

"Why," I asked, "should we so earnestly try to escape the decree which consigns that which is perishable, to ruin?"

"There is a something within us that tells us we cannot all die," rejoined the count, "and it is the struggle of the soul for the life—the 'fuller life' after which it yearns—that makes it solicitous even for the fragile companion with which for awhile it is associated."

"It is, indeed, a glorious hope," I replied, "that although the body returns to dust, the soul, freed from corruption, shall still exult in life, 'shall wake and wonder, and adore and praise.' Yes, the soul was made for immortality,—life, eternal life, is the true scene for its action, and its energies; that life we are instinctively awaiting. Even amidst the very triumphs of death we are expecting the light to shine, and trusting for its advent, even as we descend into the darkness of the grave."

"It would add another to such pretty similes, as to our natural longing after immortality," exclaimed the count, "if you were also to say that amidst the silence of the regions of death, the soul is still listening to catch some notes of the music of Heaven. But such aspirations, and such hopes, are doubtless strong arguments, not only for the immortality of the soul, but may also be some indications connected with the redemption of the body itself from corruption—some foreshadowing of its resurrection."

"It is certain," continued De Viva, "that in all ages, as with an universal consent, there has been great care for the mortal remains, a feeling in which civilized and savage have alike united."

"How various have been the methods of sepulture by which man has essayed to ward off for awhile the sentence of 'dust to dust!' Abraham bought the field of Machpelah and the cave which was in it for a burying-place; the bones of Joseph were carefully preserved and carried to Canaan; the process of embalmment—the mummy of Egypt—the pyramid, still standing unshaken amidst the desert—the urns of Greece, yet holding the burnt ashes—the tombs of the Roman in the city where we are—the painted chambers of the Etruscan tombs, with the vases standing as they were placed 3,000 years ago—the monumental tablet—the tabooed places of the savage—all attest the same feelings —"

"Which one of our English poets,"—I stopped the count's discourse,— "has beautifully illustrated, when he writes that—

" 'E'en in our ashes live their wonted fires.'"

"Once more, then, I again behold thee, thou glorious temple!" I involuntarily exclaimed as we reached the Fountains, whose thrown-up waters were sparkling and revelling in the sunbeams.

"Stay, stay," cried the count, "remember your promise; no more rhapsodies. You Englishmen are a strange race, with your cold manners, your exclusive habits, your measured words, and apparently unexcitable minds, when once you get into an enthusiasm—no matter what it is about—once set you moving and there is no stopping you."

"It is the character of my countrymen," I replied, with a feeling of pride; "we are difficult to be set in motion, but when we do move, it is in right earnest, and all together; we do not stop until the end is accomplished." Any further dissertation was fortunately prevented by the count's reminding me we were now close to the Vatican. Let us approach it by a more than regal entrance. We passed first into St. Peter's, and then up the grand staircase, to the Palace of the Popes.

On our visit to the Vatican we explored the Museum of Sepulchral Monuments and Ancient Tomb Inscriptions, called the Galleria Lapidaria. It is in the part of the palace called the Belvidere, which was the design of the sculptor Bramanti. It forms one of the approaches to the range of other museums beyond. What a contrast does this long corridor present to some of those other museums in the Vatican—full as they are of the treasured sculptures of the past, where art and taste have lavished all their powers, and forms of manly beauty and female loveliness are made immortal in marble—whilst here, all around us, are only sepulchral urns and commemorative tablets, either of Pagan Rome or such memorials in marble and stone of the early Christians and martyrs as have been collected from the catacombs or otherwise rescued from decay or destruction! On the right-hand side the Heathen memorials are ranged, the Christian on the left.

The attention is immediately struck with the difference of the art and ingenuity connected with the one and absent in the other. The tomb of the Roman is generally adorned with care; the inscription not only legible but cut with bold and well-designed letters, and on most of the tablets are the letters D. M. S. (Dis Manibus Sacrum.) announcing at once they were not the records of those to whom "light and immortality had been brought to light by the Gospel."

We took a general coup d'œil of the contents of the gallery, passing up and down in very leisurely observation, pausing and making comments as our attention was attracted on either side. This desultory method of studying antiquities, if not quite scientific, was very agreeable, and procures me the advantage of being able to dispense with any attempt to place in the order of the museum the description of the tablets or their inscriptions. We deciphered many of the inscriptions, and sketched in a little note-book, which I have now before me, some remembrances of the tablets and of their descriptive emblems.

The inscriptions do not commonly offer more than the name of the deceased and the age and the time of death, sometimes adding the occupation; but there are frequently some few words which impart a grace more touching than a lengthened epitaph, although memorials of the class analogous to modern grave inscriptions are not frequent.

"Irene in pace, qui vixit Ann XX."

Irene in peace, who lived twenty years.

"Arethusa in Deo Dep. in pace."

Arethusa in the Lord
Died in peace.

"Januarius Leontide conjugē in pace."

Januarius to his wife Leontide in peace.

"Dulcissimo Filio Faustino Pater bene merenti."

The Father lamenting to his dearest Son Faustinus.

And such like are the records of the departed and of those who sorrowed for ere they rejoined them. The most striking objects on the tablets are the pictorial emblematic representations which accompany the inscriptions. Amongst these the dove with an olive branch—the good shepherd bearing a lamb either over his shoulders or in his arms—the cross and the triangle—are very conspicuous. On many of the tablets, in addition to the cross, the Greek letters alpha and omega are found; and many inscriptions, supposed to indicate those who suffered by martyrdom, have, in addition to some emblem, a Christian monogram, or Pro Christo, engraved on the sepulchral tablet. On one of the Roman sepulchral stones, containing the usual initial letters D. M. S., we noticed the emblem of a leaf annexed. This figure probably is to denote the fragility of life. It was, however, peculiarly interesting on this tablet as showing not merely the transition from the Heathen to the Christian sentiment, but the union of both; the first inscription being Pagan in character, whilst the emblem which followed is so frequently on the Christian tablets. This mixture would often naturally occur in the change from the old customs to the Christian methods before the latter had finally displaced the former, although so tenacious is the hold of ancient usages that still in many of the rites and practices continued in the southern countries there can be no doubt of their being but the old heathen superstitions under another modification of form.

"Illustrative of this transition state to which this Roman sepulchre has called our attention, let us at once inspect," said the count, "another most interesting relic which has been but lately discovered, and is now added to the treasures of art in the Vatican."

We soon found in an adjoining room the object of our search. It is a large vase of black marble, nearly four feet high and two wide, which we were informed had been brought to light whilst excavations were being made in Rome. The form is after the model of the ancient Greek vases, and the workmanship and ornaments are considered to be of the fourth or fifth century of the Christian era. The under portion is covered with acanthus leaves sculptured all round, amidst which are intermingled the heads of satyrs.

"Observe in this," said the count, "the lingering of the Pagan taste, and contrast it with the representations on the upper part, where are represented on the one side, in relief, the Holy Virgin holding the infant Saviour in her arms, whilst three men—most probably the Wise Men—are advancing towards them. On the other side is the figure of Christ on a throne, and around him are the apostles."

After leaving the Vatican, where we remained until the evening, we passed into the ante-hall of St. Peter's. The portals were thrown back, showing the magnificent interior, inviting us to enter. The sun was now setting, but the departing rays were filling the church with glory, lighting up aisles and altars, monuments and pictures. Numerous priests were moving to and fro, clothed in white vestments, and congregating for the evening service. The vesper were just beginning. Some preluding notes of music from a choir of voices—unaided by organ or instrumental melody—swelled upon the air, reaching us from one of the chapels in the distance; and as we listened, the sounds increased until the anthem was swelling in full and lofty harmony—

"Magnificat anima mea Dominum."

Whilst the music was thus filling the church, "fanning the air as with an angel's wing," the sunbeams were lighting up all the interior with their departing splendour. The combination was exquisite; a glowing sunburst and rejoicing music seem to illustrate each other. Sunbeams in such places are like embodied music, and lofty strains of praise, such as those, gladden the heart like the sunshine. What a mighty power has music! How like a spirit it hovers around unseen and holds such mastery over human feelings!

The air was redolent of the odour of incense, sweet but almost oppressive to the senses. And when the sunshine departed, the shades of evening soon began to throw over the majestic objects around the indistinctness which, whilst it removes much of the actual, encourages the ideal. Again, another strain of melody! A single voice, combining strength and sweetness, commenced; then voice after voice followed until they all united, when the full choir swelled into one bursting, long-sustained anthem of praise, which at last died away in distant echoes.

"We have no longer the response of other days," whispered De Viva. "In that cupola," pointing to the dome, hundreds of feet above us, "another choir formerly assembled to respond to those below—to send back the praise, not in faint echoes, but in full response—an imago of the celestial choir in unison with the worshippers below. Let us still fancy the cupola haunted by such strains.”

“The praise of the Creator,” I remarked, “is the true and noblest service of the divine art of music.

We remained until the closing anthem.

“Laudate Dominum, omnes gentes !
Laudate Dominum, omnes populi !”
Praise the Lord, all ye nations !
Praise the Lord, all ye people !

And now the strain is rising, and the chorus is swelling and mounting higher and higher yet, like a host rejoicing and calling on all around to join in the triumph. Now, by a soft relapse, some of the voices are repeating the strain which like a line of gold runs through every part, whilst others are contrasting, as it were, in reply other tones in grand relief. And now again all the voices are united and swell in concluding harmony—

“Laudate Dominum ! Laudate Dominum !”

“Amen !” exclaimed the count.

“Even so, Amen,” I replied.

Have we not all felt that there are some occasions in our life—transient though they may have been, yet deep and powerful ere they passed away—when the human spirit rising purified, as it were, for awhile from earthly dross, has felt its true life developing ; and when noble and elevated influences, pervading and enlarging its powers, have offered some foretaste of a life of the soul into which it has yearned with passionate longing to expand ?

THE

ADVENTURE OF GOODWIFE EGGLESTON.

A HANDSOME octavo volume was published at Hartford, in the early part of last summer, entitled, “The Public Records of the Colony of Connecticut.” This volume contains the sayings and doings of a considerable portion of our Puritan ancestors, from their first arrival in the Connecticut valley throughout a period of twenty-nine years. I esteem it one of the most curious and instructive books in American literature, and I affirm that a man, who is rightly constituted for the search, can pick up matter of laughter and wonder in it by the hour. As my own family is the most ancient in the State, being sprung from the very oldest inhabitant, I take an exceeding interest in this volume, and seldom pass a day without having it in my hands.

A few weeks since, as I was looking it over with my usual delight, I came upon the record of a circumstance which struck me as one of the most curious things that ever could have happened in so staid and decorous a community as that of our straight-haired forefathers. In one part of this singular passage I found a person alluded to, who I presently conjectured might be the same with one who was distinctly named in another part. Hereupon

I commenced pondering the idea with all due earnestness ; and, having come to a sort of conclusion, I said to myself : “The case, in all probability, was so and so, and so and so.” But, before I set the fact down in my memorandum book, I thought it best to see and consult my venerable friend, Eliakim Tailecoate, Esq., whom I respect as one of the finest intellects, and altogether the most distinguished antiquarian, in the State. Having called in the evening upon my esteemed friend, I took down his copy of the Records, showed him the passage, and asked his opinion upon my conjecture. The excellent man smiled in his usual cheerful manner, and replied : “Nothing could be more correct, Mr. Elde, than your supposition ; in fact, I have manuscripts in my possession which will prove its truth most triumphantly.”

“Is it possible, Mr. Tailecoate ?” said I, in a rapture. “Where did you obtain them, and how were you so fortunate ?”

“Listen, Sir,” said he, taking the tongs and poking his old-fashioned wood fire, as it is his custom to do when he is highly pleased ; “I observed this entry, Sir, only last week, and reading over the names, it occurred to me that somewhere or other I had met them before. They were familiar to me, Sir ; very familiar. I tried to recall the place where I had seen them, and at last the idea became connected with my dead mother’s old hair-covered trunk in the garret, which contains quite a number of old letters and manuscripts. I posted up there immediately, and at the very first package, what do you think I found ? Why, Sir, no other than these five letters !”

So saying, he rose, walked to his secretary, opened it, and took out a small packet of very yellow papers, tied together with a bit of faded red ribbon. I received it with profound respect, and untying the ribbon, proceeded to examine the old papers, while my friend sat eyeing my antiquarian eagerness with silent rapture. I found them to consist of three letters from Mary Tailecoate and two from Judith Tailecoate, dated at Hartford in the year 1645, and written to their “deare and honoured parents” Mr. Jonathan Tailecoate, then tarrying, it appears, at New-Haven. The hand-writing was fine and cramped ; and, partly owing to this, partly to the ink being very much faded by time, the letters were almost illegible. Glancing over them hastily, I discovered to my surprise that they contained in piecemeal, here and there, a very full and quite humorous account of the whole affair to which I have alluded.

“How is this ?” said I to my friend. “Were your ancestors any way connected with this Baggett Egleston ?”

“Certainly,” he replied. “This Goodwife Sarah Egleston was half-sister to Jonathan Tailecoate, who, you know, was the first of my ancestors that settled in America.”

With my friend’s permission I took the letters home, and by the end of that week had written out a full account of the adventure of Baggett Egleston and his wife, in my own style. This account I showed to Mr. Tailecoate, who was highly pleased with it, and gave me permission to make it public if I could get it into any respectable newspaper or magazine. With his sufferance, therefore, I present it to an intelligent and appreciating circle of readers.

It is not to be supposed that the early settlers of Connecticut were all pious people, nor all men of strong minds; nor, on the other hand, a mere collection of hypocrites and blockheads. As in other assemblages of human beings, so in this, there was a mixture of every sort of character and every grade and variety of intellect. The mass of the community was perhaps composed of grave, sober men, who feared the Lord and endeavoured, according to their knowledge, to do their duties by themselves and their fellow-citizens. But there was, besides, a thick sprinkling of individuals who simply aped the demeanour of the godly, and instead of groaning inwardly at their own corruptions, only groaned outwardly to obtain the respect and admiration of their neighbours. There was also a reasonable proportion of addle-headed people, whose simpleness obtained them not one jot more of estimation or influence than might have been expected, and who, like addle-headed people in general, were very apt to get entangled in the brambles and thorns of worldly trouble. And finally, there was not wanting a sufficient number of lazy, dissolute and uproarious dogs, sons of Belial, as they were called, who had a vast liking for idleness and jollity, held lecture-days¹ in abomination, eschewed the company of ministers and deacons, and regarded the General Courts and Particular Courts of the colony with mingled aversion and fear. As the law exercised a strict vigilance over all these classes, and intruded its power into almost every department of life, it may well be supposed that its records in those days present to us some of the most curious circumstances which can be found in the annals of society. Not only was the peace of the colony and the welfare of religion watched over, but the disputes of the quarrelsome were settled, the reprobates and profane persons were corrected, and even the simple and foolish were brought up to answer for the consequences of their shallow-patedness.

With these premises, let us look back to the fourth day of June, in the year 1645, and take a view of the little village of Hartford, as the beams of the morning sun fell brightly upon its log-cabins or rudely framed and covered houses. The heavy slab doors and diminutive windows were wide open to let in the summer breeze, and the families of the Puritans were seen, some preparing their breakfasts, and some already sitting at their plain but plentiful meals. Presently many of the doors were closed, and the voice of the husband and father was heard reading the Word of Life, and then lifting itself up to the Giver of that Word, and the Dispenser of every earthly blessing.

(1) The Puritan phrase for the Sabbath.

From not every house, however, could these devotional sounds be heard, as might have been perceived by stopping at this tumble-down looking cabin, which Miss Mary Tailecoate has described to us as "a little log-howse with a broken dore, and only one small windowe."

The family, still at breakfast, consisted of but one man and one woman. The two were sitting in chairs, evidently of home manufacture, on opposite sides of a rickety table, which looked as if it might have come from England. Another chair, a long chest, a coarse cupboard, a couple of four-legged stools, and some articles of cooking furniture, were scattered here and there about the room. As this was the only apartment in the cabin, at the further end of it stood a low bedstead, strowed over with not very clean bed-clothing, still tumbled with last night's usage. On the table, before the couple who were making their breakfast, was a wooden plate, containing some coarse bread, and an earthen dish of crispy baked beans, mingled with slices of fat pork. This, with a brown stone pitcher of water, constituted the meal which was now rapidly disappearing before a pair of by no means feeble appetites.

The appearance of the lady, though a little slovenly, and just now, too, somewhat ill-natured, was on the whole rather agreeable. Her robust form, a little too full indeed for beauty, was clothed in a short frock, coming close up around the neck, and a skirt of blue linsey-woolsey. Careless brown curls peeped out from under a rather dirty cap; her cheeks were full and high-coloured, and her eyes of a dark and handsome hazel. It seemed clear, however, that she had got up that morning, as the saying is, "wrong end foremost," and was ready to seize upon every excuse for pouring out the ill-humour with which she was fully charged.

"I tell thee, Baggett," said she, as her husband extended his pewter plate for another quantum of beans, "thou art the greatest eater in the colony; and what with thy eating and thy laziness and thy folly, it is no wonder that we have grown poorer every year. Thou hast nigh upon brought thy wife to starvation. The very salvages themselves do fare better than we should, were it not for my good brother, Elder Tailecoate. Little did I know when I married thee what a good-for-nothing I was giving myself away to. You had a horse and oxen then, but now you have eaten up the one, and let that precious hypocrite, Samuel Sherwood, fool you out of the other. Ho! I should be better a widow than the wife of such an one."

This sharp address was delivered to a thin-faced, chalky-complexioned man, with dull grey eyes, and an expression of visage in which simplicity was strongly mingled with stubbornness. His slender under-sized form was arrayed in a doublet of coarse linen, and a pair of breeches of the same material, tied with ribbons below the knee. His legs from the knee to the ankle were bare, but his feet were cased in clumped and immensely heavy shoes, fastening, like the breeches, with ties of ribbon.

Notwithstanding her wrath, Goodwife Eggleston helped her husband to what he wanted, and then helped herself. Baggett went on eating in silence; for, as Miss Mary Taillecoate informs us, "hee was a man of verie few wordes, and seldom replied to the floutings and scoldings of his wife." This seemed to be especially provoking to the good lady, who, after a moment, resumed: "Baggett, why don't thee speak? I wish thee would say something when I talk to thee, and not sit there like a dumb beast. Not a thought in thy noddle, I warrant. Come, let some words come out of that mouth of thine, instead of filling it all the time with beans and bacon. If thou hadst been as silent in the company of sharpers as thou art with thy wife, thou mightest have ploughed with thine own oxen now, instead of delving with a spade. Only to think that I, the sister of Jonathan Taillecoate, should have married a man who had not enough of sense to keep what his father gave him!"

"I wish thou wert fairly rid of me then, or I of thee!" replied Baggett, provoked at last to break silence. "I have had no peace since I was yoked to thee; be silent, or I will speak out something to a purpose; thou shalt find that I can speak. I am no fool, as every one knows."

"No fool!" retorted his wife; "the whole plantation knows thee for a simpleton; and Samuel Sherwood knows it best of all: he can swear to it by those oxen that have leaked out of thy purse into his. And thou wishest to be fairly rid of me, ch? Well, the Lord grant it! Right glad would I be to be my own woman again. Come! Say no more. Shame on thee to be here eating and scolding, with the sun an hour high."

"I will have nothing more to do with such a pestilent woman!" replied Baggett; "thou art the very evil spirit in a house. I will do something to free me from such a torment."

"Ay! do something! do it to a purpose, and see how it will make the whole colony stare. They will not believe that it was thee who did it."

Baggett now rose from the table, took a long swallow at the water-pitcher, picked up his broad-brimmed, sugar-loaf hat from the floor, put it on his head, and walked sulkily to the door. He slammed it as he went out, stumbled off the log which served him as a door-step, shouldered his heavy hoe, and began to trudge away to his work.

Goodman Eggleston was indeed almost a simpleton, very obstinate withal, and a stubborn believer in the infallibility of his own opinion. In consequence, the property which his father left him had gradually wasted, until, from a very respectable station, he had become one of the poorest householders in the colony. This was extremely mortifying to his wife, whose family was somewhat wealthy and aristocratic. By wealthy and aristocratic, I mean that they consorted with the Governor and minister, owned a horse, a cow, and a yoke of oxen, and laid claim to hundreds of acres of wild land. Goodwife Eggleston, at first all happiness and smiles, soon began to fret and scold, until, in the end, fretting and scolding had become the warp and a good part of the filling of her conversation. Nothing could teach Baggett, however; and he only grew more and more indignant at her interference.

This morning, thoroughly angry, he walked on as we have described him, bent upon effecting in some way a deliverance from his trials. Sulkily, sulkily he trudged down the principal street, passing by without notice his fellow-citizens, until he came to a path which led off to his fields. Here he looked up to see which way he should go, and then stumbled on in the same sullen, downcast manner as before. The bright sun was shining joyously into the beautiful valley of the Connecticut; the balmy air of June breathed softly over the fields and among the forests; the birds flew gaily from tree to tree, or sat on the branches and poured forth their full-throated music; in short, the young Summer was smiling one of his sweetest smiles, as he followed the steps of his departed sister, Spring. But all this was entirely lost upon poor Baggett, who, deep in the dumps, would have had no eye just now for the beauties of Eden, no ear for the very melody of the spheres. He was about stepping across a little brook which ran gurgling and murmuring through the meadows, when he heard some one call him from a neighbouring corn-field: "Goodman Eggleston! Goodman Eggleston! hold awhile! I am anxious to speak with thee."

Looking up, he saw his nearest neighbour, Deacon Gybbins, coming toward him, his silver beard waving in the breeze, and a hoe trembling in his aged hands. "Friend Eggleston," said the deacon, lowering his voice as he came nearer, "I have desired for some time past to discourse with thee upon a certain matter, but have as yet found no opportunity. I will make bold to say that my mind much misgiveth me to see that ungodly youth, George Tuckye, hankering so much about thy dwelling as he hath done of late. It appeareth to me that he is there during thy absence more than is seemly. It is reported that he hath a great liking for Goodwife Eggleston; and indeed he hath declared as much, more than once, to some of his profane companions. It hath also been told me by a certain aged handmaid of the Lord, that Goodwife Eggleston favoureth him more than is becoming to a woman who is in the bonds of marriage. I would counsel you, dear neighbour, to have a care over this matter, that it proceed not to anything culpable, nor to any scandal in our village. May the wisdom of the Lord guide thee and direct thee in the business!"

"Thanks, Deacon Gybbins," replied Baggett. "I will see to the affair;" and he turned away to proceed on his walk.

"Have a care, neighbour Eggleston," shouted the old deacon, after he had taken a few steps; "give not way to the spirit of evil; remember how Simeon and Levi were accursed for their violence."

"Poor man!" he continued to himself, as he tottered back to his work; "he is one of the simple ones. I hope that he will be preserved from the ways of wrath and folly."

Baggett, with a puzzled expression of countenance, as if deeply engaged in thought, walked on very slowly until he came to a thicket thirty or forty yards beyond. Here, hid by the thick underbrush from Deacon Gybbins, he sat down on a stone, and remained for some minutes motionless and pensive. He then rose with a sudden start, as if he had taken his determination, and with his hoc on his shoulder struck off rapidly across the fields toward the Connecticut River. He pushed on over the undulating ground, now for the most part cleared, but still scattered with the stumps of trees which once covered it, until he reached a small clump of fine old chestnuts. Passing through these, he came out upon a little green knoll, where stood a comfortable looking cabin, facing toward the river. This was the dwelling of Thomas Ford, a well-to-do settler, who cultivated a small patch of ground, but occupied most of his energies in hunting and fishing. Thomas Ford's wife was the sister of George Tuckye, and, in consequence of a law of the colony, passed February the 21st, 1636, George generally resided with his brother-in-law. The said law was in these words: "It is ordered y^t noe yonge man y^t is neither married nor hath any servaunte, and be noe publicke officer, shall keepe howse by himself, without consent of the Towne where he lives first had, under paine of 20s. pr weeke." This enactment was a great trouble, no doubt, to the wild bucks and gay young men about town of those days, obliging them to nestle in whatever families they could, and even perhaps to house themselves with some solemn, admonishing old deacon. As for this George Tuckye, he appears to have been an uneasy, noisy fellow, fond of wild jokes and uproarious mirth, and a sad neglecter of the weekly lecture, and all other divine ordinances. He was a continual smoker, drank wine whenever he could get it, sparked it a great deal among the women, seldom worked in the fields, fished a good deal, and was often out hunting with the Podunk Indians, who lived across the river. In consequence of these peculiarities, he was very little liked or respected by the graver part of the community, who looked upon him as a youth not indeed absolutely vicious, but as exceedingly trifling, carnally-minded, and profane.

Baggett Egleston passed quietly round to the front of the cabin and knocked at the door. "Come in," said a voice. "It's he!" muttered Baggett. He stepped in, and pushing back the swinging door, his eyes fell upon the very man he wanted. There he sat, a short, thick-set, tow-headed, light-complexioned, good-humoured looking young fellow, smoking a dingy pipe, and idly watching a couple of Indians who were paddling in a canoe across the river. As Baggett entered he looked round.

"Oh, good morning, neighbour!" said he, puffing out a cloud of tobacco smoke, and then pushing a stool with his foot toward his visitor. "Come in: take a seat."

"All alone?" said Baggett, sitting down on the stool, and fanning himself with his hat. "Where is Goodman Brown and his wife?"

"Gone to the village to see some of their gossips. Married folks can visit till their legs can't carry them; but if we pretty fellows try it, why, we get admonished—fined perhaps. Anything new?"

"No, nothing out of the common way: only, George, I—I—I have a little private business for thee: wouldst like to hear it?"

"Out with it."

"Well, George, they tell me thou hast a pretty fancy for Goodwife Egleston: is it true?"

The young man, fairly startled from his indifference, opened his eyes wide, and looked Baggett fixedly in the face for several seconds, as if to see whether he was speaking in jest or anger.

"Well, neighbour," he at last replied, in a drawing but steady tone, "I hope no offence, but I will speak the truth: they have told thee no lies. But what then?"

"Why," said Baggett, scratching his small head, and looking rather puzzled, "why, you must know that Sarah and I get along but ill together; and no longer ago than this morning she told me to my face that she wished she was rid of me. I can't bear her tongue any longer, and if you want the woman, why, you are welcome to her; and I should say thanks for the riddance!"

"Sell thy wife!" roared George, jumping up, and dropping his pipe. "Thou dost not mean to have me buy her? Sell a wife! I never heard of such a thing in all the colonies!"

"No, no, George; but don't speak so loud. No, I never thought of that. I'll give her away. You may have her for nothing. Only get her to go, and many thanks to you."

"Well, this is strange! mighty strange! Something altogether new! Will it be legal? What will the General Court, and the Particular Court, and the ministers, and the deacons say? Ho! ho! Won't they admonish us! Won't they fasten my delicate trotters in that pillory of theirs? The pillory—the chief pillar of the temple, you know."

"Well, all that is worth considering. But as to the legality of the affair, friend Tuckye, I think I can convince thee of the legality thereof. That is the very thing I considered before I came here. Cannot a man give away his own? Is not my wife mine? I took her for such; such she is, as the Scriptures say, beyond controversy; now, being mine, I give her away to you, and thus she becomes yours."

"Well, dang it! It's new doctrine, and don't smell so orthodox as it might do. However, I like Goodwife Egleston enough to run a little risk for her; so here goes; let the devil look out for the loose ends. I'm thy man."

"Good! neighbour Tuckye," said Baggett; "thou art a friend indeed!"

"But," resumed George, "we must have some sort of an agreement: thou canst write: do thou make one, and I will put my mark to it."

"Thy mark? No, my mark; my name I mean. Yes, I will write an agreement. Let me see; give and bequeath! Yes, that is it; those are the terms; it is the terms which make the legality, friend Tuckye."

"So be it," said George. "Well, you want pens and paper;" and getting up, he walked across the room to a wooden chest, opened it, and took out a huge earthen ink-stand, a stumpy pen, and some dirty sheets of brownish-white writing paper. Then, shutting the box, he laid the articles on the lid.

"There, neighbour, do thou scratch away; devil take the letter that I can make. When I get as learned as thou, I too, perhaps, will give away a wife."

Baggett kneeled on the floor, and, using the chest as a writing-desk, proceeded very gravely, and with much consideration, to draw up the following formula:

"I, BAGGETT EGLESTON, being in my perfect memory, and having formally taken Sarah Egleston to be my true and legall wife, I doe now, of mine own free will and desire, give and bequeth the sed Sarah Egleston unto my deare fryend George Tuckye, to be his true and legall wife, now and for ever. Amen. This fowerth day of June, 1645.

"BAGGETT EGLESTON."

"There, George," said he, holding up the blotted paper and reading it aloud, "there, that is the bequeathal; take it, and take the woman too as fast as thou canst get her."

"Very good!" said George, with a grin, stuffing the paper into his breeches-pocket. "But thinkest thou that this will be enough? Will it need nothing more? No ceremony? No marrying?"

"Why, no! I suppose not," replied Baggett, elevating his eye-brows, and looking sagaciously at the wall. "I should say no. She has been married once; married to me, you understand; and I transfer my rights to you. Howsoever, if thou likest it better, thou canst have a wedding; only it will cost thee something, remember. I should advise thee," he continued, rather dryly, "to spend as little at the beginning of the business as possible."

"But the Particular Court? Well, no! the Particular Court be hanged! Let it go as it is. I'll adventure my ancles against the pillory: they will last through one lecture-day, I warrant. But how will you break the affair to Goodwife Egleston? Ho! ho! Goodwife Tuckye, I should say. Just let her know the thing, Baggett, I pray thee. I should feel a bit awkward to have to explain it all to her myself."

"Surely! O yes! I will secure thee of a welcome. I will explain it to her; and, will she, nill she, she shall come to it. I will inform her, and then go to Windsor, and tarry there a day or two, so that thou canst have a fair chance."

Some further conversation ensued, and then Baggett took his leave, to go home, as he said, and inform the goodwife of the change which had been made for her. But the nearer he got to his house, the less courage he felt about communicating the information, and the more disposed to let his fortunate heir take the whole burden of the business upon his own shoulders. The terrors of his wife's tongue weighed upon him; the responsibilities of the step which he had taken depressed him still more; and a rising fear of the Particular Court completed the overthrow of his resolution.

"A plague take it!" he muttered to himself. "I have got far enough into the fore-front of the battle. Let George Tuckye stand out a little where the archers can shoot at him. If I go to forcing the woman, I shall have the whole business to answer for, from head to tail."

Goodwife Egleston, as her husband entered, was busy in boiling a dish of pounded Indian corn for dinner. Her wrath had somewhat abated since morning, but had not yet gone down far enough to make her anxious for one of those customary reconciliations which had hitherto served as oil upon the troubled waters. She looked up with some surprise as he came in, and a shade gathered over her brow, for she supposed that he had forsaken his work thus early out of sheer idling and laziness.

"What, man!" said she, "art hungry again? Hast come for thy dinner? Thou wilt have to wait till noon any how."

Baggett said nothing, but looked hard at his wife, took off his hat, scratched his head, and then stared at the wall. He was revolving in his small wits whether he should say anything about his novel arrangement with George Tuckye, and, very prudently as he thought, he finally concluded to keep silence.

"Sarah," said he, "I have business to look to at Windsor; it will be needful for me to tarry there a couple of days or thereabouts; so thou canst keep the house alone, and see how thou likest it."

"Tarry a week if thou like," was the reply: "thy business will be none too well done; and, as for me, dost think that I cannot get along without thee? Never fear for me."

Baggett grated his teeth, but softly; and in glum silence began to prepare for his expedition. He leaned his hoe in one corner, took down an old fusil which hung over the mantel-piece, loaded it, slung on his powder horn and bullet-pouch, stuck his hat on his head, and walked to the door. Here he half turned round and said: "Sarah, if George Tuckye should come here, he is a friend of ours, you know, and a very pretty fellow, say what they will against him. So, if he wants anything of mine, why you can let him have it, I tell you, be it what it may."

"Well! well!" replied the lady; "I will see about it. What has he promised to lend George Tuckye, I wonder?" she continued, as Baggett marched into the street. "His dinner, I'll warrant, seeing he wants it not himself."

An hour passed away: no gossiping neighbour came in to relieve her loneliness; noon came, and she sat down to her meal alone. She began to feel the absence of her husband; her fit of sulkiness gradually gave way to gentler emotions, and she began to regret that she had spoken so unkindly to the partner of her joys and sorrows. She thought of the first happiness of their married life; she censured herself for interrupting it by the sharpness of her temper; then she excused herself by bringing up, and dwelling upon, her husband's follies; then she pitied him, as being more unfortunate than blameable; and finally she melted away into tears, and had that woman's relief the world over, a hearty crying-spell. An hour after dinner found her wishing poor Baggett back, and indulging in as soft and loving a humour as any husband could desire.

Let us now return to George Tuckye. This young roysterer waited, impatient and somewhat agitated, for two or three hours, hoping that Baggett would reappear to inform him of the successful issue of his interview with pretty Goodwife Eggleston. Noon came and passed, but no messenger of good tidings arrived, and he began to think that he must set about doing something for himself. He put on his best clothes, stuffed Baggett's precious formula into his pocket, and set out for the cottage where lived his promised bride. He walked slowly, and repeatedly stopped by the way to cudgel his brains for a suitable address and explanation, so that it was the middle of the afternoon before he reached Baggett's cabin. There was the prize he was about to play for, the desired of his soul, sitting on the door-step, and whiling away her lonely hours by vigorously patching and darning her husband's old breeches. A softened and almost sentimental expression was brooding on her face, and George, who always called her the finest woman in the colony, thought he had never seen her look so handsome.

"Good day, Mistress Eggleston," said he, although Goodwife would have been a more proper term, as Mistress was usually applied only to higher ranks of society.

"Ah, good day, George," she replied, with a smile. "Welcome! Baggett told me that perhaps thou wouldst be here to-day."

"Ay, Sarah," said George, thinking, with his heart in his mouth, that all had been explained and agreed to, "thou seest I have come to take full possession."

"To take full possession!" repeated Goodwife Eggleston, opening her handsome eyes. "Truly, my husband told me that thou wouldst want something; but I doubt if he would be willing to have thee take possession of all."

"No, not of the house and furniture. I care not for goods and treasure, so that I can but have thee; it is thee I have come for, and surely thou wilt not say me nay."

"Me!" exclaimed the lady, opening her eyes wider than before. "Fye! George. What dost mean? Oh, ho! thou art making merry with me. Ha! ha! ha! But thou must ask Goodman Eggleston first."

"The fool!" said the young gallant to himself. "He has gone away and not told her. But I have the bequeathal, with his name to it: I will show her that; perhaps I can persuade her myself."

With this idea he rammed his hand into a pocket of his doublet, among twine, tobacco, bullets, and wadding, and brought out the important document.

"There, Sarah!" said he, holding the paper before her eyes; "there! look at that. We have been talking of thee, you see; that is, Goodman Eggleston and I; and he—but here it is, in black and white: 'I, Baggett Eggleston, being in my proper memory, and—'—and—there, take it and read it thyself, Sarah. I am no great clerk in writing, though print isn't so hard."

Goodwife Eggleston, mute with wonder and curiosity, seized the paper, and spelled it through with a look in which it was difficult to say whether there was more of amazement or indignation. Her face grew red and pale by turns, and when she had finished, she threw down the paper and burst into tears. "It seemeth probable," remarks Miss Judith Tailcoat, in one of the letters from which I have compiled this history, "that her loue for her husbande is a kinde of intermittent loue, which goeth away att times and returneth att times." A very acute observation, Miss Judith; there is a great deal of that kind of love in the world: Goodwife Eggleston is not the only person who has been noted for it.

George picked up the paper, with some misgivings, and put it safely in his pocket; and well was it that he did so, as otherwise it never would have come down for the edification and amusement of these latter-days. Before it was fairly housed, the tearful wife suddenly recovered from her melting mood, and made a vigorous snatch for it. Failing this, she fetched a spiteful slap at George's head, which, as the young fellow ducked almost to his knees, only knocked off his hat. He sprang up lightly and stepped off to a safe distance; upon which Goodwife Eggleston, seeing that she had failed of revenge, stumbled into the cabin, and sitting down on a bench, again gave way to tears. George stayed without a moment, thinking whether he had not better give up his undertaking; but hoping that the storm was passing away in this copious shower, he resolved to make one more effort to weather it. He stepped in softly, and sat down at a safe and respectful distance, on the same bench. He felt very much like some timid child who sees a beautiful cat which it wants to stroke and pet, but is afraid of getting a scratch in the face: the child puts out its little hand, and then looks at the cat's claws, and so stands in a trembling hesitation of wishfulness and fear. Just so George sat for some time in silence, looking stedfastly at Goodwife Eggleston, who, with her face buried in her hands, kept on sniffing and sobbing.

"Sarah," said he, at last, "don't cry so. I meant thee no harm. I am willing to be thy true and loving husband, and thy goodman is willing to give thee up to me."

"I don't want you!" sobbed Goodwife Eggleston. "I won't have you; and he is a fool, a wicked creature, to want to get rid of his own wife. I won't consent to such a sinful proceeding."

"But, Sarah," whispered the persevering lover, moving nearer and trying to take her hand—

"Go away!" screamed the indignant woman, giving him a strong push and springing up. "Go away! Go out of the house! I will call the constables. I will appeal to the Court. I will see if men can give away their wives in this colony!"

With these words, she dodged past George, sprang out of the door, and set off on a run toward the house of Governor John Haynes.

"Come back!" roared George, all the terrors of the Particular Court rising, like a frightful ghost, before his eyes. "Sarah! Goodwife Egleston! Mistress Egleston! Come back! I'll say no more about it." But she never slackened her pace; she pushed on; she ran into the Governor's yard; and George Tuckye, quite dumbfounded with the turn of things, took the shortest and speediest cut for the cabin of Thomas Ford.

The next morning, betimes, after breakfast and the customary lengthy prayers were over, Governor John Haynes was seen knocking at the door of that excellent man, Rev. Samuel Stone. This gentleman was one of the two first ministers in Hartford, the other being Thomas Hooker, who died only three years after the event which we are relating, and who is styled by Cotton Mather "the light of the western churches." Mr. Stone, who survived his colleague fifteen years, was also highly respected by the New-England clergy, and much honoured and trusted by the colonial Government of Connecticut. His epitaph, cut on a slab of red sand-stone, and dated July the 20th, 1663, remains to us in the old burying-ground at Hartford, and describes in rude verse his character and excellent qualities. It informs us that he was

"Newengland's glory and her radiant crown."

And after a few more lines, declaring that he was safely and sweetly sleeping in Jesus until the glorious morn of the resurrection, it closes thus :

"In nature's solid art and reasoning well
Tis known beyond compare he did excell;
Errors corrupt by sinnewous dispute,
He did oppvno, and clearly them confute;
Above all things he Christ his Lord prefer'd:
Hartford, thy richest jewel's here inter'd."

Captain Edward Johnson, too, author of the "Wonder-Working Providence," one of the strangest books that ever was written, eulogizes his merits in the following very extraordinary poetry :

"Thou well-smoothed Stone Christ's work-manship to be;
In 's Church new laid his weak ones to support,
With 's words of might his foes are foil'd by thee;
Thou daily dost to godliness exhort.
Mourn not, O man, thy youth and learning spent
In desert land; my muse is bold to say
For glorious workes Christ his hath hither sent,
Like that great work of Resurrection day."

Not very excellent poetry, certainly, either as to sense or measure; and we may safely believe that the worthy minister stood higher as a man than his panegyrist as a bard.

It somewhat surprised me, at first, that Governor Haynes, who was a decorous man in his conduct, and a great respecter of age, should not have applied to Mr. Hooker instead of Mr. Stone, inasmuch as the former was the older of the two. But I subsequently found an explanation of the circumstance in a remark which Miss Judith Tailecoate makes in another place, that Mr. Hooker was gone on some church business to Farmington. The Governor accordingly knocked at Mr. Stone's door, which was presently opened by a little maid, who curtsied very low at seeing the illustrious visitor. On learning whom he wanted, she opened a door on one side of the entry, and pointing into the room, said timidly that "the master" was there. John Haynes entered and found the good minister busily engaged in correcting a sermon of two hours in length, wherewith to feed his hungry flock on the morning of the next lecture-day.

"Good morning, Mr. Stone," said he. "The Lord prosper you in your holy calling."

"The Lord be with you, friend Haynes," replied the minister. "Enter and be seated."

"Mr. Stone," said Governor Haynes, after he had ensconced himself in a huge mahogany chair, "the Particular Court meets to-day, and we have one very serious case to be tried before it; a case, I am grieved to say, that throws much scandal upon that holy truth that hath been so long preached in this backslidden colony. I have been informed that a simple man named Baggett Egleston—not a lamb of the flock, I believe, for which the Lord be praised—that this man hath actually given away his lawful wife, with whom he was united in the bonds of wedlock by holy Mr. Hooker, to a sinful creature, George Tuckye by name; also that this Tuckye hath got speech of Goodwife Egleston, and endeavoured to persuade her to the agreement, which the woman had strength and wisdom given her to refuse to do. Awful as the matter seemeth, there can be no question of its verity, for goodwife Egleston hath herself come to me and informed me of the affair, complaining grievously, and with many tears, of the wickedness and unfeelingness of her husband, and the beastly impudence of this Tuckye. Now I have despatched Constable John Halls after Tuckye, and Constable Thomas Barbor after Egleston, to bring them before the Court where we shall try their cases this day. But it seemeth proper that you, the shepherd of these erring sheep, should be aware of their straying, so that you may converse with them, and expound unto them their errors, and, if the thing be possible, lead them to repentance. Wherefore I desire that you would appear at the Court to-day, where a room shall be given you with the prisoners, to hold with them, I trust, profitable and edifying discourse."

The Governor having finished his harangue, the good minister leaned back in his chair, and raised his eyes to the ceiling, with a deep and audible sigh, almost a groan. "O Lord, how long," said he, "how long shall Thy Word be preached to a foolish and ungodly generation, who having eyes see not, and having ears hear not, and having hearts understand not? How have they hated instruction and despised reproof! But I, I too, must bear on my feeble shoulders much of the guilt. Alas! what an unfaithful shepherd have I been to the sheep who have been committed to my care! How little have I warned and instructed them! How have I sought mine own ease, when I should have been praying for my people!

"Well, Governor Haynes, dear brother in the Lord, this is a mournful instance of perverse selfishness in the one, and gross desires in the other, of these two poor creatures. I will gladly see them to-day, and use the strength which shall be vouchsafed me in trying to convince them of their error, and showing them their only hope of forgiveness."

Governor Haynes, having fulfilled his mission, now withdrew, and the minister, after some moments of sad reflection, resumed the writing of his sermon.

George Tuckye was already sitting sulkily in the little dark cabin which served the colony as a gaol, and Constable Thomas Barbor, mounted on his old grey mare, was just now spurting off for Windsor, in hot search after Baggett Egleston. The doors of a large framed and boarded building, the Connecticut State House of that period, were soon thrown open, and the members of the Particular Court, with a considerable number of plaintiffs, defendants, witnesses, and spectators, began to gather, and then take their seats. Governor Haynes and Mr. Stone came in; a long prayer was offered by the latter; and the Court thus prepared, gravely commenced its business. The deputies were six in number, and the jurymen twelve; and the reader if he wishes for their names, may find them all recorded on the one hundred and twenty-sixth page of the Public Records of Connecticut.

The first case was an action for slander by Thomas Sherwood the elder, against Henry Graye, which the jury decided by finding for the plaintiff, as it is entered on the Records, "costs of Court and damages twenty pound."

The second case was between the same parties on another count of slander; and here again Henry Graye was cast with "costs of Court and damages fewer pound."

Then came a third action of slander, by the same calumniated Thomas Sherwood the elder, against Jehu Burre the elder, which was concluded by the jury finding Jehu Burre "costs of Court, and damages fifteen pound." *

Jehu Burre the elder then had an action against Thomas Sherwood the elder, but got no "damages," and no further satisfaction than a round bill of costs.

Thomas Sherwood the elder having thus triumphantly vindicated his reputation, and lined his pockets with thirty-nine pounds in promises to pay, the Court proceeded to investigate the affairs of a certain deceased serving-man of one Mr. Parks. While a smart discussion on this case was going forward, some individuals who were gathered outside the door had their attention directed up the road which led northward toward Windsor. A grey horse was coming in the distance, at a heavy gallop; but whether the beast was bestridden by one man or by two, it was difficult to say. All looked earnestly and in silence, until old Thomas Sherwood broke out: "That's he. I know the mare. I should be surp of her among a thousand, for I raised her myself. I can tell her by her carrying her tail so much to one side, and wipping it as she jumps. It was something peculiar about that beast; I never seed it in any other."

"Yes, it's he, sure enough," repeated one after another.

"But where is Baggett?" asked one. "He hasn't got him."

"Oh, Baggett is a little fellow, you know; you couldn't see him behind big Thomas Barbor. And don't you see? There is one of his feet poking out on one side. Yes! he has him, I'll warrant. He wouldn't come back without him."

As the group discussed the matter, on came the grey horse, galloping, galloping; down it went into a little valley; up it came on the nearer side: and there, sure enough, was Constable Barbor, riding like one of Cromwell's troopers, with little Baggett Egleston strapped hard and fast at his back. On he came; he pulled up at a post; silently and gravely he untied his prisoner and allowed him to dismount: then springing off himself, he took him by the collar of his doublet, and marched him into the State House. By this time the Court had settled the case on which it had last been engaged, and had decided, as the record preserves it, that "Nath: Dickenson and Tho: Coleman are to take a particular accompte of the estate of Mr. Parks' man deceased, and bring yt to the Court; and for the wages due to him, it may be respited untill we here from Mr. Parks, or his returne."

Everything being ready, George Tuckye was brought from the gaol, and the two chap-fallen prisoners found themselves in face of the awful array of Governor, Deputies, and Jury. As the reader is already acquainted with the case, we will not trouble him with the evidence; we will only present him with a passage from a letter of Miss Mary Tailcoate, describing in her quaint way the conduct of the two principal witnesses:

"Goodwife Egleston," says the letter, "did give her witsse righte heartily against George Tuckye, throwing all y^e blame upon him; but sed not one word with willingness against her husbände, crying and weeping most lamentably that ever shee should have brought him intoe trouble. Indeed, brother Jonathan, who was att y^e Court, tells us that it was right worthy of laughter to heare her take on soe, when all did know how shee flouts and abuses him att his own howse, making it sometimes as unhappy for him as shee can. But, as my sister Judith wittily wrote you in a former letter, her loue seemeth to bee of an intermittent kinde."

"Deacon Gybbins," continues Miss Mary, "when hee gave his witsse, sed that att the time hee informed Baggett of the affair of Goodwife Egleston and George Tuckye, hee did pray that Baggett might be guided by the wisdom of the Lord; but now it did appeare to him that hee had been guided by the wisdom of Sathan, which was meere foolishness. The deacon did almost weepe when hee spake this, as thinking that he was much to blame for the matter; for that, he sed, he should have watched himself over Baggett's course, whose simpleness and want of knowledge all were aware of."

Good Deacon Gybbins!

The facts having all been made known to the Court, the Governor addressed a very brief and, as everybody thought, a very excellent speech to the jury. "Gentlemen," said he, "this is a case very much out of the common way, and it is no easy matter to judge what action to take upon it. Questionless it is known to you all that the wife of Goodman Egleston is a woman of sharp and unruly temper, that putteth forth little effort, in general, to make her husband's life a happy one. Yet is this no excuse for such an unlawful and unheard-of proceeding as the giving away of his legal spouse to another man, while himself is yet alive. His principal excuse lies in this, that he is clearly a man of small learning and very mean and inconsiderable intellects, and also mournfully ignorant of the requirements of morality and religion. This last, indeed, is verily a crime in the prisoner; but likewise is it an exceedingly pitiable misfortune. He hath done wickedly, more through ignorance than malice. I would advise, therefore, that Mr. Stone be requested to admonish him, and that, as punishment, some light fine be put upon him.

"As for the other prisoner, George Tuckye, he also is a man of no learning, and very ignorant of religion. He too hath sinned through ignorance and stupidity; and, in part, hath been led away by the foolish counsels and assertions of Egleston. Still, as he hath been guilty of pressing the matter upon Goodwife Egleston, and importuning her to so great a scandal and sin, I advise that he too should be admonished and bear a fine. Gentlemen, you may now consult and pronounce your judgment."

The opinions of the jury, it may be supposed, agreed in essence with the Governor's; and they soon brought in their decision, as recorded in the following passage of the Records:

"Baggett Egleston, for bequeything his wife to a young man, is fyned 20s.

"George Tuckye, for his misdemeanor in words to Egleston's wife, is fyned 40s., and to be bownd to his good behavior, and to appeare the next Court.

"Tho: Ford acknowledgeth himself to be bownde in x^l. to this Commonweith, and George Tuckye in 20^l., that the said George shall appear at the next Court, and keepe good behavior in the meane season."

The Court now proceeded to other business, while the two prisoners were led back to gaol, to receive the dreadful admonition. In woe-be-gone silence, amidst that twilight gloom, they sat down on the rude bench provided for inmates of the building, and waited in fear and trembling. Presently a hand was heard on the door; they fixed their eyes upon it; it opened; the tall form of Mr. Stone appeared in strong relief against the outer light; the door slowly closed, and he was with them alone. They both arose from their lowly seat as he approached, and made him a humble obeisance. The minister waited till his eyes had become accustomed to the dim light of the room, so that he could watch the faces of the two culprits, when in a kind and pitying, yet solemn and commanding tone, he thus addressed them:

"My poor children, you have been guilty of a grave offence against the laws of this colony, and, more dreadful still, against the laws of God. Thou, George Tuckye, sinful worm that thou art, hast broken the holy tenth commandment, in that thou hast coveted thy neighbour's wife. You coveted her before you knew that he was willing to part with her, and it was your coveting in a measure which led this simple man to make his foolish and sinful offer. You have verily sinned and done wickedly, and it becomes you to apply for mercy to Him who is gracious and will abundantly pardon. The peril which you have escaped, not by your own might and wisdom, but by the virtue of another, even her whom in your folly you tried to persuade to evil, has been fearful. Had you succeeded, your life would have been required by our just law, and your spirit, unless purified by the blood of sprinkling, would have passed into eternity under a burden too heavy to be borne. Your ignorance has been one cause of your crime, but, while I also must cover my soul with sackcloth for this, you too are not freed from guilt. Where have you been on the days when Zion was holding her solemn feasts? Have your feet been in the sanctuary? Have we beheld your face in the Lord's courts? Alas! how seldom! Your chosen ones have been among the profane, among those who know not how to sing the Lord's song, but whose voices are lifted up in the foolish songs of worldly merriment. Cease, I beseech you, from these evil ways, and come up and abide in the tabernacle, even in the holy hill of the Lord.

"And you, Baggett Egleston, what I have said to your companion in this folly belongs also to you. But what can I say to a man who will so lightly cast away the wife of his bosom, and surrender her into the hands of a stranger? Do you not know that what God hath joined together no man may put asunder? Do you not know that the wife is bound to her husband so long as she liveth, and that he is commanded to love her even as himself? These are the words of the Volume of Truth; but how fearfully have you gone astray from them! In this, as in all your life, you have said unto your Creator, 'Depart from me, for I desire not the knowledge of Thy ways.' Beware, lest at the last day He also bid you depart into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. But I am willing to hope better things of you, and to believe that from this time you will be no more like the brutish man who knoweth not, and the fool who understandeth not, but like those who rejoice all the day in the name of the Lord, and who shall be exalted in his righteousness. Go now to thy home; salute gently the wife of thy bosom; love her even as thy own soul; and seek in her company for that peace which passeth all understanding.

"And thou, George Tuckye, go also to thy home, not forgetting the warning which hath been bestowed upon thee, but remembering it to thy everlasting edification. May the Lord follow you both, and be your eternal Shepherd, leading you in the paths of righteousness, for his name's sake. Amen!"

Mr. Stone paused, and a solemn silence ensued, only broken by a few stifled sobs from poor Baggett, which showed how deeply his feelings had been touched by this Scriptural discourse. The minister's very heart rejoiced at these sounds, and as he turned away and opened the door, he silently prayed that what he had spoken might be as that bread which being thrown upon the waters is found again. As they came out one by one, the last beams of the dying day fell softly on the tearful cheeks of Baggett Egleston and the sobered countenance of George Tuckye. The former hastened home with a quick yet soft step, like that of one who, with a full heart, seeks for the joy of pardon and reconciliation. The latter also walked quietly away, with a look of thoughtfulness that had seldom hitherto been seen on his round and florid visage.

"I must endeavour to see Goodwife Egleston," said Mr. Stone to himself; "perhaps all these wandering sheep may yet be brought into the fold of the Good Shepherd."

This ends the story of Baggett Egleston; and my indefatigable friend, Mr. Taillecoate, assures me that he has been able to find nothing further of it in any letter, manuscript, or record whatever.

THE ITALIAN PEASANT GIRL.

ITALY'S bright suns and brighter eyes are sources from which many of our poets and painters have drawn their inspiration, and to the exercise of their talents we natives of northern clime assuredly owe much of that power of appreciating the beautiful which is so rapidly extending itself among us. The Italian Peasant Girl of Mr. Pickersgill is one of those embodiments of the principles of loveliness that gratify us by their contemplation whenever and wherever they are presented to our notice. Youth and beauty combined with simplicity of costume are the materials from which the artist has produced a very clever picture, and one which has deservedly extended his reputation. Critics have pretended to discover in the features of the maiden too much intelligence for a peasant girl, but we must remind them that the indescribable charm which superiority of intellect lends to the countenance of its possessor is not the exclusive privilege of any station in society.

Mr. Hart has skilfully transferred to the steel that which the artist has so tastefully depicted on the canvas.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THO. MORE.¹

LIBELLUS A MARGARETA MORE, QUINDECIM ANNOS NATA, CHELSEÆ INCEPTVS.

"Nulla dies sine linea."

September.

SEEMING y^e woodman fell a noble tree, which, as it went to the ground, did uprear severall small plants by y^e roots, methoughte such woulde be the fall of dear father, herein more sad than that of the abbot of Sion and the Charterhouse monks, inasmuch as, being celibate, they involve noe others in their ruin. Brave, holie, martyrs! how cheerfully they went to their death. I'm glad to have seene how pious men may turn e'en an ignominious sentence into a kind of euthanasia. Dear father bade me note how they bore themselves as bridegrooms going to their marriage, and converted what mighte have bene a shock to my surcharged spiritts, into a lesson of deepe and high comfort.

One thing hath grieved me sorelie. He mistooke somewhat I sayd at parting for an implication of my wish that he shoulde yield up his conscience. Oh no, dearest futher, that be far from me! It seems to have cut him to the heart, for he hath writ that "none of the terrible things that may befall him touch him soe nearlie as that his dearly beloved child, whose opinion he soe much values, shoulde desire him to overrule his conscience." That be far from me, father! I have writ to explain the matter, but his reproach, undeserved though it be, hath troubled my heart.

November.

Parliament will meet to-morrow. 'Tis expected father and y^e good bishop of Rochester will be attainted for misprision of treason by y^e slavish members thereof, and though not given hithertoe unto much heede of omens and bodements while our hearts were light and our courage high, yet now y^e coming evill seemeth foreshadowed unto alle by I know not how many melancholick presages, sent, for aught we know, in mercy. Now that the days are dark and short, and the nights stormy, we shun to linger much after dusk in lone chambers and passages, and what was sayd of the enemies of Israel may be nigh sayd of us, "that a falling leaf shall chase them." I'm sure "a going in the tops of the mulberry trees" on a blustering evening, is enow to draw us alle, men, mothers, and maids, together in an heap. . . . We goe about y^e house in twos and threes, and care not much to leave the fireside. Last Sunday we had closed about y^e hearth, and little Bill was a reading by the fire-light how Herodias' daughter danced off the head of St. John the Baptist, when down comes an emptie swallow's nest tumbling adown the chimnie, bringing with it enow of soot, smoke, and rubbish to half smother us alle; but the dust was nothing to the dismay thereby occasioned, and I noted one or two of our bravest turn as pale as death. Then, the rats have skirmished and galloped behind the wainscoat more like a troop of horse than a herd of such smaller deer, to y^e infinite annoyance of mother, who could not be more firmly persuaded they were about to leave a falling house, if, like the scared priests in the temple of Jerusalem, she had heard a voyce utter, "Let us depart hence." The round upper half of the cob-loaf rolled off the table this morning, and Rupert, as he picked it up, gave a kind of shudder, and muttered somewhat about a head rolling from the scaffold. Worse than this was o' Tuesday night. . . . 'Twas bedtime, and yet none were liking to goe, when, o' suddain, we hearde a screech that made every body's heart thrill, followed by one or two hollow groans. Will snatches up the lamp and runs forth, I close following, and alle the others at our heels, and after looking into sundrie deserted cupboards and corners, we descend the broad stone steps of the cellars, half-way down which Will, stumbling over something he sees not, takes a flying leap to clear himself down to the bottom, luckily without extinguishing the lamp. We find Gillian on the steps in a swoon; on bringing her to, she exclayms about a ghost without a head, wrapped in a winding-sheet, that confronted her and then sank to the ground as she entered the vaults. We cast a fearfull look about, and descry a tall white sack of flour, recently overturned by the rats, which clears up the mystery, and procures Gillian a little jéering, but we alle return to the hall with fluttered spirits. Another time I, going up to the nurserie in the dark, on hearing baby cry, am passed on the stairs by I know not what, breathing heavilie. I reach forthe my arm, but pass cleare through the spirituall nature, whatever it is, yet distinctlie feel my cheek and neck fanned by its breath. I turn very faint, and get nurse to goe with me when I return, bearing a light, yet think it as well to say nought to distress the rest.

But worst of alle was last night. . . . After I had beene in bed awhile, I minded me that deare Will had not returned me father's letter. I awoke him and asked if he had broughte it up stairs; he sleepily replied he had not, soe I hastily arose, threw on a cloke, took a light, and entered the gallery, when, half-way along it, between me and the pale moonshine, I was scared to behold a slender figure alle in white, with naked feet and arms extended. I stodee agaze, speechlesse, and to my terror made out the features of Bess . . . her eyes open, but vacant; then saw John Dancey softly stealing after her, and signing to me with his finger on his lips. She passed without noting me, on to father's door, there knelt as if in prayer, making a low sort of wail, while Dancey, with tears running down his cheeks, whispered, "'Tis the third time of her thus sleep-walking . . . the token of how troubled a mind!"

We disturbed her not, dreading that a suddain waking might bring on madness; soe, after making moan awhile, she kisses the senseless door, rises up, moves towards her own chamber, followed by Dancey and me, wrings her hands a little, then lies down, and graduallie falls into what seems a dreamlesse sleep, we watching her in silence till she's quiet, and then squeezing each other's hands ere we part.

—Will was wide awake when I got back; he sayd, "Why, Meg, how long you have beene! could you not lighte on the letter?" . . . When I tolde him what had hindered me by the way, he turned his face to the wall and wept.

Midnight.

The wild wind is abroad, and, methinketh, nothing else. Sure, how it rages through our empty courts! In such a season, men, beasts, and fowls cower bencath y^e shelter of their rocking walls, yet almost fear to trust them. Lord, I know that thou canst give the tempest double force, but do not, I beseech thee! Oh! have mercy on the frail dwelling and the ship at sea.

Dear little Bill hath ta'en a feverish attack. I watch beside him whilst his nurse sleeps. Earlie in the night his mind wandered, and he told me of a pretty ring-streaked poney noe bigger than a bee, that had golden housings and barley-sugar eyes; then dozed, but ever and anon kept starting up, crying "Mammy dear!" and softlie murmured "Oh" when he saw I was by. At length I gave him my forefinger to hold, which kept him ware of my presence without speaking, but presentlie he stares hard towards y^e foot of the bed, and says fearfullie, "Mother, why hangs yon hatchet in the air, with its sharp edge turned towards us?" I rise, move the lamp, and say, "Do you see it now?" He sayth, "No, not now," and closes his eyes. After a good space, during the which I hoped he slept, he says in quite an altered tone, most like unto soft, sweet music, "There's a pretty little cherub there now, alle head and noe body, with two little wings aneath his chin; but, for alle he's soe pretty, he is just like dear Gaffer, and seems to know me . . . and he'll have a body agayn too, I believe, by and by. . . . Mother, mother, tell Hobbinol there's such a gentle lamb in heaven!" And soe, slept.

He's gone, my pretty . . . ! slipt through my fingers like a bird! upped to his own native skies, and yet, whenas I think on him, I cannot choose but weepe. . . . Such a guilelesse little lamb! . . . My Billy-bird! his mother's owne heart. They are alle wondrous kind to me. . . .

How strange that a little child shoulde be permitted to suffer soe much payn, when of such is the kingdom of heaven! But 'tis onlie transient, whereas a mother makes it permanent, by thinking it over and over agayn. One lesson it taughte us betimes, that a naturall death is not, necessarilie, the most easie. We must alle die. . . . As poor Patteson was used to say, "The greatest king that ever was made, must bed at last with shovel and spade," . . . and I'd sooner have my Billy's baby deathbed than King Harry's, or Nan Boleyn's either, however manie years they may yet carry matters with a high hand. Oh, you ministers of evill, whoever ye be, visible or invisible, you shall not build a wall between my God and me. . . . I've something within me grows stronger and stronger, as times grow more and more evill; some woulde call it resolution, but methinketh 'tis faith.

Meantime, father's foes . . . slack that anie can shew 'emselves such! are aiming, by fayr seemings of friendlie conference, to draw from him admissions they can come at after noe other fashion. The new Solicitor Generall hath gone to y^e Tower to deprive him of y^e few books I have taken him from time to time, . . . Ah, Master Rich, you must deprive him of his brains afore you can rob him of their contents! . . . and, while having 'em packt up, he falls into easie dialogue with him, as thus, . . . "Why now, sure, Mr. More, were there an act of parliament made that all y^e realm shoulde take me for king, you woulde take me for such with the rest."

"Aye, that would I, sir," returns father.

"Forsooth, then," pursues Rich, "we'll suppose another act that shoulde make me the Pope. Woulde you not take me for Pope?"

"Or suppose another case, Mr. Rich," returns father, "that another act shoulde pass, that God shoulde not be God, would you say well and good?"

"No, truly," returns the other hastily, "for no parliament coulde make such act lawful."

"True, as you say," repeats father, "they coulde not," . . . soe eluded the net of the fowler; but how miserable and unhandsome a device to lay wait for him thus, to catch him in his talk.

. . . I stole forth, ere 'twas lighte, this damp chill morning, to pray beside the little grave, but found dear Daisy there before me. How Christians love one another!

Will's loss is as heave as mine, yet he bears with me tenderlie. Yesternighte, he sayth to me half reproachfullie, "Am not I better unto thee than ten sons?"

March, 1534.

Spring comes, that brings rejuvenescence to y^e land, and joy to the heart, but it brings none to us, for where hope dieth, joy dieth. But patience, soul; God's yet in the aunry!

May 7. Father arraigned.

July 1. By reason of Will's minding to be present at y^e triall, which, for the concourse of spectators, demanded his carlie attendance, he committed the care of me, with Bess, to Dancey, who got us places to see father on his way from the Tower to Westminster Hall. We coulde not come at him for the press, but clambered on a bench to gaze our very hearts away after him as he went by, sallow, thin, grey-haired, yet in mien not a whit cast down. Wrapt in a coarse woollen gown, and leaning on a staff, which unwonted support when Bess markt, she hid her eyes on my shoulder and wept sore, but soon lookt up agayn, though her eyes were soe blinded, I think she coulde not see him. His face was calm, but grave, as he came up, but just as he passed he caught the eye of some one in the crowd, and smiled in his old, frank way; then glanced up towards the windows with the bright look he hath soe oft cast to me at my casement, but saw us not. I coulde not help crying "Father," but he heard me not; perchance 'twas soe best. . . . I woulde not have had his face cloud at y^e sighte of poor Bessy's tears.

. . . Will tells me the indictment was y^e longest ever hearde; on four counts. First, his opinion on the king's marriage. Second, his writing sundrie letters to the Bishop of Rochester, counselling him to hold out. Third, refusing to acknowledge his grace's supremacy. Fourth, his positive deniall of it, and thereby willing to deprive the king of his dignity and title.

When the reading of this was over, the Lord Chancellor sayth, "Ye see how grievouslie you have offended the king his grace, but and yet he is soe mercifulle, as that if ye will lay aside your obstinacie, and change your opinion, we hope ye may yet obtayn pardon."

Father makes answer . . . and at sounde of his deare voyce alle men hold their breaths; . . . "Most noble Lords, I have great cause to thank your honours for this your courtesie . . . but I pray Almighty God I may continue in the mind I'm in, through his grace, until death."

They coulde not make goode their accusation agaynst him. 'Twas onlie on the last count he coulde be made out a traitor, and proof of 't had they none; how coulde they have? He shoulde have bene acquitted out of hand, 'steade of which, his bitter enemy my Lord Chancellor called on him for his defence. Will sayth there was a generall murmur or sigh ran through y^e court. Father, however, answered the bidding by beginning to expresse his hope that the effect of long imprisonment mighte not have bene such upon his mind and body, as to impair his power of rightlie meeting alle y^e charges agaynst him . . . when, turning faint with long standing, he staggered and loosed hold of his staff, whereon he was accorded a seat. 'Twas but a moment's weakness of the body, and he then proceeded frankly to avow his having always opposed the king's marriage to his grace himself, which he was soe far from thinking high treason, that he shoulde rather have deemed it treachery to have withholden his opinion from his sovereign king when solicited by him for his counsell. His letters to y^e good Bishop he proved to have bene harmlesse. Touching his declining to give his opinion, when askt, concerning the supremacy, he alleged there coulde be noe transgression in holding his peace thereon, God only being cognizant of our thoughts.

"Nay," interposeth the Attorney Generall, "your silence was the token of a malicious mind."

"I had always understoode," answers father, "that silence stode for consent. Qui tacet, consentire videtur;" which made sundrie smile. On the last charge, he protested he had never spoken word against y^e law unto anie man.

The jury are about to acquit him, when up starts the Solicitor General, offers himself as witness for the crown, is sworn, and gives evidence of his dialogue with father in the Tower, falselie adding, like a liar as he is, that on his saying "No parliament coulde make a law that God shoulde not be God," father had rejoined, "No more coulde they make the king supreme head of the Church."

I marvell the ground opened not at his feet. Father brisklie made answer, "If I were a man, my lords, who regarded not an oath, ye know well I needed not stand now at this bar. And if the oath which you, Mr. Rich, have just taken, be true, then I pray I may never see God in the face. In good truth, Mr. Rich, I am more sorry for your perjurie than my peril. You and I once dwelt long together in one parish; your manner of life and conversation from your youth up were familiar to me, and it paineth me to tell ye were ever held very light of your tongue, a great dicer and gamester, and not of anie commendable fame either there or in the Temple, the inn to which ye have belonged. Is it credible, therefore, to your lordships, that the secrets of my conscience touching the oath, which I never woulde reveal, after the statute once made, either to the king's grace himself, nor to anie of you, my honourable lords, I should have thus lightly blurted out in private parley with Mr. Rich?"

In short, the villain made not goode his poynt: ne'erthelesse, the issue of this black day was aforehand fixed; my Lord Audley was primed with a virulent and venomous speech; the jury retired, and presentlie returned with a verdict of Guilty; for they knew what the king's grace woulde have 'em doe in that case.

Up starts my Lord Audley;—commences pronouncing judgment, when—

"My lord," says father, "in my time, the custom in these cases was ever to ask the prisoner before sentence, whether he coulde give anie reason why judgment shoulde not proceed agaynst him."

My lord, in some confusion, puts the question.

And then came y^e frightfulle sentence.

Yes, yes, my soul, I know; there were saunts of old sawn asunder. Men of whom the world was not worthy.

. . . Then he spake unto 'em his mind, how that after lifelong studdy, he coulde never find that a layman mighte be head of the church. And bade his judges and accusers farewell; hoping that like as St. Paul was present and consenting unto St. Stephen's death, and yet both were now holy saunts in heaven, soe he and they might speedilie meet there, joint heirs of e'erlasting salvation.

Meantime, poor Bess and Cecillie, spent with grief and long waiting, were foret to be carried home by Heron, or ever father returned to his prison. Was't less feeling, or more strength of body, enabled me to bide at the Tower wharf with Dancey? God knoweth. They brought him back by water; my poor sisters must have passed him. . . . The first thing I saw was the axe, turned with its edge towards him—my first note of his sentence. I forct my way through the crowd. . . . some one laid a cold hand on mine arm; 'twas poor Patteson, soe changed I scarce knew him, with a rosary of gooseberries he kept running through his fingers. He sayth, Bide your time, mistress Meg; when he comes past, I'll make a passage for ye; . . . Oh, brother, brother! what ailed thee to refuse the oath? I've taken it!" In another moment, "Now, mistress, now!" and flinging his arms right and left, made a breach through which I darted, fearlesse of bills and halberds, and did fling mine arms about father's neck. He cries, "My Meg!" and hugs me to him as though our very souls shoulde grow together. He sayth, "Bless thee, bless thee! Enough, enough, my child; what mean ye, to weep and break mine heart? Remember, though I die innocent, 'tis not without the will of God, who coulde send 's angels to rescue me if 'twere best; therefore possess your soul in patience. Kiss them alle for me, thus and thus. . . ." soe gave me back into Dancey's arms, the guards about him alle weeping; but I coulde not thus lose sight of him for ever; soe, after a minute's pause, did make a second rush, brake away from Dancey, clave to father agayn, and agayn they had pitie on me and made pause while I hung upon his neck. This time there were large drops standing on his dear brow; and the big tears were swelling into his eyes. He whispered, "Meg, for Christ's sake don't unman me; thou 'lt not deny my last request?" I sayd, "Oh! no;" and at once loosened mine arms. "God's blessing be with you," he sayth with a last kiss. I coulde not help crying, "My father! my father!" "The chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!" he vehementlie whispers, pointing upwards with soe passionate a regard, that I look up, almost expecting a beatific vision; and when I turn about agayn, he's gone, and I have noe more sense nor life till I find myself agayn in mine owne chamber, my sisters chafing my hands.

Alle's over now. . . . they've done their worst, and yet I live. There were women coulde stand aneath y^e cross. The Maccabees' mother—. . . yes, my soul, yes; I know—Nought but unpardoned sin. . . . The chariot of Israel.

Dr. Clement hath beene with us. Sayth he went up as blythe as a bridegroom to be clothed upon with immortality.

Rupert stode it alle out. Perfect love casteth out feare. Soe did his.

. . . My most precious treasure is this deare billet, writ with a coal; the last thing he sett his hand to, wherein he sayth, "I never liked your manner towards me better than when you kissed me last."

They have let us bury his poor mangled trunk; but, as sure as there's a sun in heaven, I'll have his head!—before another sun hath risen, too. If wise men won't speed me, I'll e'en content me with a fool.

I doe think men, for y^e most part, be cowards in their hearts. . . . moral cowards. Here and there, we find one like father, and like Socrates, and like . . . this and that one, I mind not their names just now; but in y^e main, methinketh they lack the moral courage of women. Maybe, I'm unjust to 'em just now, being crost.

. . . I lay down, but my heart was waking. Soon after the first cock crew, I hearde a pebble cast agaynst my lattice, knew y^e signall, rose, dressed, stole softlie down and let myself out. I knew the touch of y^e poor fool's fingers; his teeth were chattering, 'twixt cold and fear, yet he laught aneath his breath as he caught my arm and dragged me after him, whispering "Fool and fayr lady will cheat 'em yet." At the stairs lay a wherry with a couple of boatmen, and one of 'em stepping up to me, cries, "Alas for ruth, mistress Meg, what is 't ye do? Art mad to go on this errand?" I sayd, "I shall be mad if I go not, and succeed too—put me in, and push off."

We went down the river quietlie enow—at length reach London Bridge stairs. Patteson, starting up, says, "Bide ye all as ye are," and springs aloud and runneth up to the bridge. Anon, returns, and sayth, "Now, mistress, alle 's readie. . . readier than ye wist. . . come up quickly, for the coast's clear." Hobson (for 'twas he) helps me forth, saying, "God speed ye, mistress. . . . Gin I dared, I woulde goe with ye." . . . Thought I, there be others in that case.

Nor lookt I up, till aneath the bridge-gate, when casting upward a fearsome look, I beheld y^e dark outline of the ghastly yet precious relic; and, falling into a tremour, did wring my hands and exclaym, "Alas, alas, that head hath lain full manie a time in my lap, woulde God, woulde God it lay there now!" When, o' suddain, I saw the pole tremble and sway towards me; and stretching forth my apron, I did in an extasy of gladness, pity, and horror, catch its burthen as it fell. Patteson, shuddering, yet grinning, cries under his breath, "Managed I not well, mistress? Let's speed away with our theft, for fools and their treasures are soon parted; but I think not they 'll follow hard after us, neither, for there are well-wishers to us on the bridge. I'll put ye into the boat and then say, God speed ye, lady, with your burthen."

Rizpah, daughter of Aiah, did watch her dead from the beginning of harvest until the latter rain, and suffered neither the birds of the air to light on them by day, nor the wild beasts of the field by night. And it was told the king, but he inter-meddled not with her.

VOL. XIV.

Argia stole Polynices' body by night and buried it, for the which, she with her life did willingly pay forfeit. Antigone, for aiding in the pious theft, was adjudged to be buried alive. Artemisia did make herself her loved one's shrine, by drinking his ashes. Such is the love of women; many waters cannot quench it, neither can the floods drown it. I've hearde Bonvisi tell of a poor Italian girl, whose brothers did slay her lover; and in spite of them, she got his heart, and buried it in a pot of basil, which she watered day and night with her tears, just as I do my coffer. Will has promised it shall be buried with me; layd upon my heart; and since then, I've beene easier.

He thinks he shall write father's life, when he gets more composed, and we are settled in a new home. We are to be cleared out o' this in alle haste; the king grutches at our lingering over father's footsteps, and gazing on the dear familiar scenes associate with his image; and yet, when the news of the bloody deed was taken to him, as he sate playing at tables with Queen Anne, he started up and scowled at her, saying, "Thou art the cause of this man's death!" Father might well say, during our last precious meeting in the Tower, "'Tis I, Meg, not the king, that love women. They bely him; he onlie loves himself." Adding, with his own sweet smile, "Your Gaffer used to say that women were a bag of snakes, and that the man who put his hand therein woulde be lucky if he founde one eel among them alle; but 'twas onlie in sport, Meg, and he owned that I had enough eels to my share to make a goodly pie, and called my house the eel-pie house to the day of his death. 'Twas our Lord Jesus raised up women and shewed kindnesse unto 'em, and they 've kept their level, in the main, ever since."

I wish Will may sett down everie thing of father's saying he can remember; how precious will his book then be to us! But I fear me, these matters adhere not to a man's memory. . . . he 'll be telling of his doings as Speaker and Chancellor, and his saying this and that in Parliament. Those are the matters men like to write and to read; he won't write it after my fashion.

I had a misgiving of Will's wrath, that night, 'specialie if I failed; but he called me his brave Judith. Indeed I was a woman bearing a head, but one that had oft lain on my shoulder.

My thoughts beginne to have connexion now; but till last night, I slept not. 'Twas scarce sunsett. Mercy had been praying beside me, and I lay outside my bed, inclining rather to stupor than sleep. O' suddain, I have an impression that some one is leaning over me, though I hear 'em not nor feel their breath. I start up, cry "Mercy!" but she 's not there nor anie one else. I turn on my side and become heavie to sleep; but ere I drop quite off, agayn I'm sensible or apprehensive of some living consciousness between my closed eyelids and the setting sunlight; agayn start up and stare about, but there's nothing. Then I feel like . . . like Eli, maybe, when the child Samuel came to him twice; and tears well into mine eyes, and I close 'em agayn, and say in mine heart, "If he's at hand, oh, let me see him next time . . . the third time 's lucky." But 'steade of this, I fall into quiet, balmy, dream-lesse sleep. Since then, I've had an abiding, assuring sense of help, of a hand upholding me, and smoothing and glibbing the way before me.

We must yield to y^e powers that be. At this present, we are weak, but they are strong; they are honourable, but we are despised. They have made us a spectacle unto the world, and, I think, Europe will ring with it; but at this present hour, they will have us forth of our home, though we have as yet no certayn dwelling-place, and must flee as scared pigeons from their dove-cot. No matter, our men are willing to labour, and our women to endure; being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it. Onlie I marvell how anie honest man, coming after us, will be able to eat a mouthful of bread with a relish within these walls. And, methinketh, a dishonest man will have sundrie frights from the Lares and Lemures. There 'ill be dearth o' black beans in y^e market.

Flow on, bright shining Thames. A good brave man hath walked aforetime on your margent, himself as bright, and usefull, and delightsome as be you, sweet river. And like you, he never murmured; like you, he upbore the weary, and gave drink to the thirsty, and reflected heaven in his face. I'll not swell your full current with any more fruitless tears. There's a river whose streams make glad the city of our God. He now rests beside it. Good Christian folks, as they hereafter pass this spot, upborne on thy gentle tide, will, maybe, point this way and say—"There dwelt Sir Thomas More;" but whether they doe or not, vox populi is a very inconsiderable matter, for the majority are evill, and "the people sayd, Let him be crucified!" Who would live on their breath? They hailed St. Paul as Jupiter, and then stoned him and cast him out of the city, supposing him to be dead. Their favourite of to-day may, for what they care, goe hang himself to-morrow in his surcingle. Thus it must be while the world lasts; and the very racks and scrues wherewith they aim to overcome the nobler spirit, onlie test and reveal its power of exaltation above the heaviest gloom of circumstance.

Interfecistis, interfecistis hominem omnium Anglorum optimum.

"MANY women are more learned, discreeter, more excellent, and more constant than a number of men; but the greater part are fond, foolish, wanton, fibbergibs, wavering, witless, tattlers, triflers, eaves-droppers, rumour-raisers, wine-bibbers, back-biters, and in every respect doltified with the dregs of the devil's dunghill."—Bishop Aylmer.

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.

BY JANE M. WINNARD.

CHAPTER I.

A TEA-FIGHT AT MILFORD GRANGE.

MILFORD is an old-fashioned village, situated in one of the least known counties of England. The scenery around for several miles is wild and picturesque;—so much so, indeed, that I am afraid the farming thereabouts would not be approved by the members of the Royal Agricultural Society, whatever might be said in its favour by those of the Royal Academy of Painting. Mr. Underwood, of the Grange farm, was a farmer of the old school, and by no means the worst of his school. He was also a yeoman in the proper sense of the word, for two hundred acres of the land which he farmed as well as the house he lived in had been a patrimonial inheritance of the Underwoods for the last hundred and eighty years. Old Fuller's aphorism, that "the good yeoman is a gentleman in ore, whom the next generation may see refined," had been verified several times among the Underwoods during the last century; and some of the family were not unreasonably proud of the off-shoots from the old stock which had taken root elsewhere, and grown to flourishing trees in the loftier regions of gentility. But the main trunk of the family tree remained fast rooted in the old Grange at Milford.

At the time of my story, the master there was Mr. Gideon Underwood,—or "Gideon Underwood, Yeoman," as he styled himself, in all legal and parochial documents, and on the wagons and carts used about the farm. Many a man might have styled himself "Gentleman" or "Esquire" with less ground for assuming either title than Gideon Underwood; but he preferred the style and condition of yeoman. He had a sort of honest pride, as it is called, in his position and name, (which, carefully inspected, is no other than "the pride which apes humility,") and this made him reject what he considered a mere modern, vulgar distinction, and cling heartily to all that had belonged to his ancestors, and made them to be esteemed of men. They had left him a recognised position in the world; with which, as he said, he was thoroughly contented,—and of which, though he never said it, he was so proud, that if any of his children presumed to be discontented with it, and to desire a different sphere of life, he had no toleration for the peculiarity, but cast them off at once. This family pride, and a certain stern high-principled puritanism, Mr. Underwood seemed to have inherited from his namesake, a sergeant in Cromwell's Ironsides, to whom the two hundred acres had been originally granted out of a large confiscated estate, and who, having married the daughter of a London citizen, built the Grange house with her dower. This last fact it is necessary to mention, to account for the size and appearance of the abode, which was not in accordance with the humble pretensions of its owners. It was not a cottage, nor a farm-house; it was what the advertising auctioneers call a "gentlemanly residence;" that is to say, it was a large house, substantially built in a good style of domestic architecture of the seventeenth century. Over the chief entrance, embedded in the masonry, was a slab of marble, once white, now grey and stained by exposure to the weather, which would have been long ago hidden by the ivy that covered every other part of the walls, but for the scrupulous care with which it had always been cut away, in order to show the following inscription:—

GIDEON UNDERWOOD AND ELIZABETH HIS WIFE
BUILT THIS HOUSE, A.D. MDCLII.

"Desire of me, and I shall give thee the Heavens for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession."

"Except the Lord build the house, their labour is but lost that build it."

"The lot is fallen unto me in a fair ground: yea, I have a goodly heritage."

"I have set the Lord always before me: for he is on my right hand, therefore I shall not fall."

This tablet was to the Underwoods of Milford what a well carved coat of arms, in a similar situation, is to its bearers. If any of Gideon's descendants had had misgivings about the good taste and Christian humility of this inscription, it certainly was not his representative and namesake whose household is about to be presented to the reader.

* * * *

It was a sultry afternoon in August, and the great parlour on the first-floor at the Grange, (which Mr. Underwood would not suffer his daughters to call a drawing-room, because it savoured of affected aristocracy,) had all its five windows thrown open to the garden, and all its chair-covers taken off, and stood in prime holiday array. Enormous bouquets (nosegays, the Underwoods called them) in enormous old porcelain vases stood in a formal row on the high mantel-piece; and another, the size and shape of a peacock's tail, spread itself in front of the old black grate. A few faded family portraits, in heavy carved and gilded frames, had had their faces turned from the grey wainscotted walls to the light; large chairs of carved walnut-wood were ranged round the room,—a chess-board was set out on a massy round table in one corner,—a backgammon board, and a few books and prints lay on a corresponding one in another corner,—an old square piano-forte stood open at the far end of the apartment; and in the centre, a huge mahogany table which had been prepared for the expected guests;—tea being no idle ceremony and make-believe at Milford, but a regular substantial meal.

"groan'd with the weight of the feast"

Yet in spite of all these efforts to give the great unused room a festive air, it still looked unused and of an uncomfortable bigness—as if it were far too large for any company that could be beguiled into it. Nor was this feeling of dreary vastness in the apartment entirely removed when the four Underwood girls entered it, all armed cap-à-pie for a Tea-Fight, as an evening party is denominated in those regions. Yet they were large girls, more than five feet seven in height, and wore such a wonderful quantity of crinolines and flounces, that, as their brother Jack observed, "it was a day's journey to get round one of them." After repeating that disrespectful personality, I must, in justice to the young ladies, say that Jack, in his innermost mind, thought his sisters remarkably fine girls; and all the finer for the flounces and the crinoline, because they were "the real London fashion." For London, and for the fashion, master Jack had the profoundest veneration; though his father had as yet no suspicion of the fact.

"Now girls," said Martha, the eldest, who had been like a mother to her sisters ever since Mrs. Underwood's death ten years before, "let me see how you all look! Mary, my dear, that frock really is too low. I hope father won't notice it. Leah, how very nicely you have plaited Rachel's hair! It looks quite beautiful; but what a figure you have made of yourself!"

"I told her so," said Rachel, laughing, "but she would try to do her hair like that saint's in the picture Mr. Crypt gave her. She has been trying to make herself look as ugly as that, ever since she knew he admired it. She wanted to do mine so, because she says twins ought to be alike, but I wouldn't be made a fright of, for all the saints and new curates in the world. She wanted Jack to part his hair in the middle, and shave off his whiskers, like—"

"Go it, Rachel, my girl," exclaimed Jack, entering the room redolent of bergamot and lavender-water, and resplendent in a new cut-away coat, a blue waist-coat and neck-cloth, and finer studs and shirt buttons than had ever been seen in Milford before. "Go it, Rachel, I like to see you go-ahead. You stick at nothing. I don't want to spoil sport, but if you wish to know what Leah did say, Martha?"

"Oh! you are sure to make out a good case for Leah. She's your favourite. But I don't think even you can say she has done her hair well," said Rachel.

"Done her hair well! No, I should say she has dressed it well, in the newest fashion, saint or no saint, as you will perceive if you look at my last number of the 'Fashionable Gazette.'—Leah, my dear," he continued, patting Leah's cheek patronisingly, "if you would only hold up your head and throw a little more animation into your manner."

"Now Jack," interrupted Martha, who, like a real mother, would let no one find fault with her children but herself. "What are you always picking holes in the poor girls for? Rachel is too lively—and Leah is too quiet; upon my word you are difficult to please! What have you to say against Mary? I hope she is pretty enough to suit you. You can speak now, for she does not hear. Lord bless me! she will certainly fall out of that window! What can she be looking at in the road?"

At this moment Mary Underwood drew her head in from the window suddenly, and said,—

"Martha, I think we had better take our places, for there is Miss Agnes Shepherd, and the strange gentleman with her."

"Law!" exclaimed the lively Rachel, clasping her hands and opening her eyes with surprise and curiosity.

"Physic and Divinity!" exclaimed Jack, imitating her gesture with strong exaggeration. "How often have I told you that no lady says 'law!' You should say 'ah ciel!'"

"Do let the girl alone, Jack," said Martha laughing. "You will never turn her into a fashionable."

"No, indeed," said Rachel. "I'm not a lady—I'm a yeoman's daughter. I can't say your fine words. Who's to remember ah ciel! Law! comes so natural to everybody. You say it often enough yourself when you are not dressed up quite so fine. Where am I to sit, Martha dear? I should like to help you at the table—may I?—If Jack don't think me ornamental in the family I may be useful." The last tone had a little pique in it, sweet-tempered as the bouncing Rachel was.

Leah noticed it, and whispered to her brother,

"Go and kiss Rachel, and don't find fault with her continually for trifles, dear Jack. It has such a bad effect! It is the surest way of destroying family affection—Miss Miriam Grey says so."

Jack strode after Rachel, who had installed herself in state, (and a leelle leelle mortification,) at what he called "the coffee plantation in the land of Prog." Miss Miriam Grey's opinion, backed by Leah's "dear Jack," was more potent in softening the manners of this ingenuous youth than any art with which he was acquainted.

"I say, Rachel," he began, in a tone between a grumble and a coax. "You mus'n't mind what I say, you know."

"I don't; but it isn't pleasant, for all that. I know I'm not as pretty as Mary, nor as sensible and good as Martha, nor as clever as your favourite, Leah, but still, Jack"—and Rachel's merry rosy face was turned up to her tall brother's penitent one with a touching expression of wounded affection and humility.

"Still you are my own darling Rachel," murmured Jack, with tenderness almost like that of a lover, but with the manner of an embarrassed bear. "Why will you talk such nonsense about Leah's being my favourite? You know in your heart it is not so. I love Leah and all of you very much, but you know which I love best! only you are always trying to provoke me by saying disagreeable things."

And Jack ended his apology for misconduct to Rachel as he usually did by se fachant très fort against her. There is a class of people with whom this line of conduct succeeds admirably. Rachel, warm-hearted and unexact as she was, belonged to it.

She seized her brother's hand. "Indeed, indeed, Jack, I never meant to say a disagreeable thing to you."

"But you should not always be taunting me with caring most for Leah,—if I said you cared more for Mark than you did for me, now—"

"Oh, you couldn't say that, because you don't think it."

"Well! well! I suppose nobody is to be jealous in the family but you."

"Jealous!—oh Jack!—how can you?—"

"Hush!—somebody's coming in—Don't be a simpleton. I forgive you, child.—There!"

The grateful and penitent Rachel pressed her lips to the brawny hand she held, and the magnanimous Jack pressed his on the crown of Rachel's not over subtle head, just as their brother Mark threw open the door of the room, and ushered in the guests whose arrival the pretty Mary had announced several minutes before.

Miss Agnes Shepherd was the bachelor vicar's maiden sister; a lady who deserves a paragraph to herself. She was sixty years old, and in capital preservation as far as regards the essentials of health and strength; for the accessory and transitory quality of beauty, she had never possessed much, and had never shown the slightest desire to increase her store or to preserve it. She thought it did a great deal more harm than good in the world, and would sigh over the prettiest child in a family as other people sigh over a deformed or sickly one. She would never allow that anything was the better for being pretty. She was born a Utilitarian—and a despiser of the arts. As a moralist, she was not enlarged in her views, but, to make amends for that, she was extremely punctilious in adhering to them. In religion, she was what she herself called "a strict churchwoman,"—but what other members of the church (her good and learned brother, the vicar, included) thought rather a bigoted one. Strong-minded as she was on most points, Miss Shepherd's religion partook of the superstition prevalent among the hill-folks with whom she had passed her life. She had just education enough to be ashamed of it, but she could not shake off her belief in haunted houses, apparitions, the evil eye, &c. In a social aspect she was valuable. She was a good sister—an indefatigable housewife, and a wonderful economist to her brother—and to all the rest of the parish she was Tatler, Spectator, Guardian, and Examiner. Millford would have been badly off for local conversation and small talk if it had not been for Miss Shepherd. She was not a general favourite—a busy-body seldom is—but she made herself generally useful, and so the poor got into the habit of looking to her for assistance in any temporal difficulty, and the richer neighbours always spoke of her with respect, because she was "so good to the poor," and because they dreaded her sharp scrutiny into their own affairs. She was a worthy disagreeable person, and was immensely influential in consequence. Disagreeable people, like ill-tempered ones, are worshipped among us as the Evil Genii were worshipped by the weak and cowardly Asiatic nations. Miss Shepherd loved to create a sensation; she also loved a good feast—a game of whist—and an opportunity of wearing her canary-coloured lutestring gown. It was therefore with uncommon good humour that she marched in upon the young Underwoods for her evening campaign, followed by a person who had never been seen or heard of in Milford before.

"How do you do, Miss Underwood?—Allow me to introduce to you a friend of my brother's—Miss Underwood—Miss Leah,—Miss Rachel,—Miss Mary,—Master—I beg your pardon,—Mister John Underwood."

"What a hateful old thing!" growled Jack, as he ducked his head by way of a bow to the stranger, and thus brought it on a level with Rachel's. "I wish some one would burn that absurd old gown of hers! Who ever saw such a waist! Can't somebody tell her of it? I declare her arms and neck are browner and skinnier every time she bares them to the public gaze. She must stain them with walnut-juice for the occasion! Look at her poking up her sharp chin into poor Leah's face—What a contrast!

"Like a devil of the pit she seems, mid holy cherubim."

"Hush! hush!" said Rachel, who was fond enough of her brother to mistake his high spirits for what he himself called de l'esprit, and was convulsed with merriment accordingly. "She is looking at us. She will hear you!"

"Not she;—she has the advantage of being deaf. She is not looking at us,—she's looking to see what sort of a spread we have. Now, Rachel, mind you make her coffee weak, and I'll take care she don't have any of those peaches. I say, where are the cards?"

"In the card-box, to be sure. What do you mean?"

"Miching mallico, my dear."

"Oh, bother your French! Here comes Mr. Crypt."

"Yes. How cold and damp he looks! and what a dress for a Christian! I can't stand that Oxford coat of his. Look at it! There, now—as sure as the Grey Tower stands on the top of the hill, it's just the shape of the Irish beggars' coats—with the skirts hanging down to their heels, and the collar torn off!"

"For shame, Jack!" said Rachel, blushing a celestial rosy red. "How dare you speak so of a clergyman? And such a dear, pious young man, too! You wouldn't dare to say such things to Leah, or to Miss Miriam. I won't put up with it!"

"Come, come, Rachel; don't make me out worse than I am. Crypt is a regular good minister, and none of your idle parsons. You are like the rest of the world,—you would judge of a man by his coat. I respect him; I haven't a word to say against him, except that—Ah! here comes Mr. Shepherd and my father with him. I must go and speak to the vicar."

While this familiar dialogue had been going on between Rachel and Jack, Leah had been listening to the loud talk of Miss Shepherd, and had been obliged to talk almost as loud in reply.

"Well, I hope she'll come, my dear. Your father makes such a fuss with her, that I don't think he could sit down in peace to a rubber unless Miss Miriam was at the instrument making a noise."

"She said she would come, ma'am, if she were well enough."

"Well enough!—well enough! Nonsense! What's the matter with her, I should like to know?"

"What ails us is in us, my dear madam," said Mr. Underwood, who had overheard the last sentence. "I need not ask how you are;—in perfect health, as usual. Leah, my dear, it is six o'clock. Are they bringing tea?"

The tone of the last was slightly severe. "I'll go and see, father." And Leah, who knew that her father considered an infringement of punctuality in the light of an infraction of the Decalogue, went off to Martha.

"Father says it's six o'clock, dear."

"Everything is ready. Tell Mark and Jack to put the chairs round the table. Have you spoken to the strange gentleman?"

"No. He and Mark have been talking together at that window ever since they came in. I don't like to interrupt them."

"Where's Mary? Tell her to come and butter father's toast. Be quick, dear;—he's looking this way."

As Leah turned away, the anxious Martha made a sign to Rachel at the other end of the table, who immediately began pouring out coffee; and another to Jack, who instantly broke up his conference with the vicar and Mr. Crypt, about shooting some rats in a cottage in the village.

"I beg your pardon.—My sister wants me."

"There seems to be some good in that young man," said the curate; "he is so attentive to his sisters."

"There is a great deal of good in the whole family, you will find. The eldest son, David, was a very remarkable boy. At sixteen, he was the best classic I ever saw, for his age. Poor fellow!"

"Is he dead?"

"Oh! dear, no. Only he offended his father—and—Mr. Underwood is extremely strict in his household. Ah! I see there is a general move towards the table. We must take our places. It is the custom in this part of the country, you will find, to sit down to tea as regularly as to a dinner, and, alas! often as long."

Mr. Crypt moved forward with solemn alacrity, to seek and to sit beside the pretty Mary, or the amiable Leah. But Mr. Crypt was fated to disappointment on this occasion.

Mary was standing in the recess of one of the windows, when her brother Mark and the strange gentleman planted themselves in front of it, and, not perceiving that she was behind the thick moose curtain, commenced a conversation in which she felt so much interest, that she feared to stir a muscle, lest she should betray her hiding-place, and put a stop to it. She was very sorry when she heard Leah's quiet voice say, "Tea is ready, Mark. Will you come to the table?" Nor was she better pleased when, on emerging from the recess as soon as they moved away, Jack stepped hastily towards her, saying,— "Where have you hidden yourself? Father has

"That, sir," said Jack, waving his hand preparatory to a preposterous statement.

"A good one, while you're about it, Jack," interrupted Philip.

"Nonsense," said Rachel, turning to her lover good-naturedly. "I'll tell you. It's just a friend of the vicar's, who has come to stay with him a short time. He's a foreigner. You can see that by his very dark complexion. He comes from Leipzig—He's very handsome, I think."

"Humph!" said Mr. Bang, "de gustibus non est disputandum."

"What's the meaning of that?" asked Rachel, sharply. "I hate people to talk French, and such stuff that I don't understand."

"It merely means that no one can dispute the correctness of your taste. Now I examine him, it really seems to me that gentleman is the handsomest man I ever saw. Such a fine sallow complexion! such a profusion of hair about his face! such a mild expression of eye! such a lively, open, engaging air! I don't wonder he takes the fancy of young ladies so much. Mary, to judge by her look and manner, is quite of your opinion. Don't you think so, Mr. Philip?"

Poor Philip! yes, alas! he had been thinking so for the last five minutes. Mary had been so absorbed by that confounded black bearded foreigner, that she had only smiled once at him. He had determined not to look at her again. And rather than show any desire of attracting her attention, he would make himself quite merry and comfortable for the rest of the evening with "the Noisies," as Mr. Bang, Rachel, and Jack, had been nicknamed by Miss Shepherd, whose nicknames had something adhesive in them.

"It looks like it, certainly," said Philip, with assumed carelessness. "Here! take your cup," and presenting the article in question with more petulance than politeness, he threw some of the coffee over Rachel's gown.

As I have said before, Rachel was sweet-tempered, and guessing what was passing in Philip's mind, she made light of the accident. "Never mind, you could not help it." Yet it was a new and decidedly becoming gown.

"But he could, though; and you're the best girl in the world," whispered the admiring Bang, who, being a middle-aged man, thought a great deal more of temper in a wife than he did of any accomplishments, and more than he did of most other charms. And snatching a napkin, he began to rub away at Rachel's skirt with all his might.

Meantime Mr. Underwood was listening to a low sweet voice beside him with the profoundest attention.

"You are very kind, and so are the dear girls, but——"

"Excuse me for interrupting you, Miss Grey," said the host, his peculiar hardness of tone considerably softened, whether most by affection or respect, it were difficult to decide. "You must not use such words in speaking of me and my family. I hope we shall never forget what is due to one whose birth is so much above our own; least of all to one whose name is Grey. If I thought any of my daughters ever presumed upon——"

"My dear sir, they could not behave otherwise than as I wish. Remember," she added with a smile, "they have been my pupils."

"I can never forget your condescension to my poor motherless girls. But you really must not make so light of the honour. What would the world say if it were generally known that the last descendant of the Greys of Milford was governess to the daughters of Gideon Underwood?"

"The world would say that she was a fortunate woman to meet with such friends. 'The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away.' Besides you know I never possessed anything belonging to my family but my name, and what I and my sister owe to your kind exertions. Do not talk of any obligation but that which we owe to you."

Old Mr. Underwood seemed to lose his self-possession at this. He gave a hurried look at the sightless up-turned eyes of the gentle speaker, and then glanced hastily round the table as if to see whether he were observed. In so doing, he caught the vicar and his son Mark, both in the act of looking at him, as if he had been the subject of their conversation, and in turning his eyes away, he encountered those of the strange gentleman opposite. He started involuntarily, for they seemed to be reading his own inmost thoughts. Had he ever seen those eyes before? Gideon Underwood had dreamed sometimes of an avenging angel, an angel who came to bear witness to a secret wrong, who whispered to his proud soul, "There is nothing hidden that shall not be known;" and the eyes of the angel were like the eyes of the man who sat face to face with him then. His stern features grew pale, and he grasped the arm of his chair with an iron gripe. The stranger had withdrawn his look, and was listening as before to Mary. The glance was quite accidental; yet its effect had been so powerful upon him, that he did not hear Miss Grey's question to Leah, who had left Mr. Crypt, and came round to see if she wanted anything.

"Is there not a stranger in the room?" asked Miss Grey.

"Yes, there is," said Leah, bending low, so as not to be heard.

"I thought so," said Miss Grey, in the same tone. "Why?"

"I don't know, I felt it." Then after a pause, she added, "It is a man, is it not? And he is sitting opposite to us now?"

"Yes; haven't you heard him talk?"

"No; tell me, what is he like, Leah?"

"Like nobody I ever saw before, dear. Go on drinking your tea, he's looking this way, but he can't overhear us, for the Noisies, and Philip with them, are in full operation. Hark at Jack's laugh!—Thank goodness, father doesn't seem to hear them!—In the first place, he's a foreigner. He comes from Germany—Mr. Shepherd brought him."

"Well; is that all you have to tell? I might have learned that without eyes."

"To say the truth, Miriam, dear, I hardly know how to describe him. He is a great, large man,—neither young nor old,—rather too much beard,—moves indolently,—and yet his face looks as if he had done and thought a great deal. He is sitting now sunk down in his chair as if he were half asleep, and yet I can't get rid of the feeling that he knows very well what every one round the table is doing—Ha!"

"What is the matter?" inquired Miss Grey.

"Why, I'm almost afraid he heard what I was saying, for he looked up at me just then. He's looking at you now. I really can't stand his eyes; they pierce through one. I declare they are like Gideon, the Ironside's," and she glanced towards the portrait of the founder of their family, which was looking on the party from the wall at their right hand. Illuminated by the bright rays of the sun, the face of the old warrior was more distinctly seen than usual. It was a powerful face; fierce, melancholy, and fanatical, with a touch of grim humour in it.

Probably the stranger wished to remove the embarrassment his look seemed to have caused Leah; or the portrait itself excited his curiosity when his eyes followed hers to it, for after examining it curiously, he bent forward, and said to her with a smile—

"Is that the portrait of an ancestor, Mademoiselle? If it is so, I think the race must have improved; I do not trace much resemblance between that head and those of the gentlemen of your family;" and he glanced at her father, and Mark and John. "And quant aux dames—I congratulate you—there is absolutely no degree of likeness."

Leah was quite relieved by his agreeable manner, and thought, as many of her sex do, that the foreign accent was a great improvement upon good English pronunciation. As to his eyes being like old Gideon's, she was surprised at her mistake—they were full of something very like playfulness at this moment. She was about to make some reply when her father suddenly arose. It was the signal for the usual grace after meat: every one arose accordingly. Mr. Crypt pronounced a few words in a grave gentle tone, and then the company left the table and dispersed slowly about the room.

As Mary was looking after Philip Ward for a moment her father called her.

"Yes, father," she said, in the timid tone which was natural to her whenever she spoke to him.

"Mary, I am sorry to see that your spirit is so light and giddy that the presence of company makes you forget your usual duties—any little attention which you have been in the habit of paying to me. Henceforth, you need not take the seat beside me at meal times, and tell Leah that I desire she will occupy it henceforth as she did this evening." The tone was cold and implacable; as if Mary had been guilty of some gross act of neglect.

Persons who have not lived long enough in a narrow circle to understand how the most insignificant things can be magnified into importance either for pain or pleasure, have no conception of the vast amount of ludicrous misery that there is in the world. They can scarcely believe in the enormous tyranny of trifles that weighs down gentle souls so that they well nigh forget their birth-right of wandering through eternity. They know not how the strong, severe man, whose strength and severity would find a healthy field of activity in a large sphere, being fixed by circumstances in a small one, finds his nature accommodate itself to the small one. Therein he becomes strong and severe about all the petty good and the petty evil which he is capable of understanding, with a strange inadequacy between cause and effect, which cannot but make the unthinking laugh though it will make the judicious grieve. Ridiculous as it was that a man like Mr. Underwood should be displeased with his daughter Mary for forgetting to butter his toast, and that she should blush, and tremble, and find warm tears spring to her eyes, as she heard his absurd expression of wrath and the punishment affixed to it—it was a melancholy, nay, a cruel and unholy thing which it indicated. Here were the noble virtues on one side, and the gentle virtues on the other, spoiled, perverted, and rendered noxious by want of a clear guiding intelligence; family affection deprived of its sweetness and turned into gall; fear substituted for love as the mainspring of action; a consequent banding together in secret of the inferiors against the ruling power; a conspiring to elude the unnecessarily severe laws; a gradual generating of hatred in the more active and elastic minds among the oppressed; a disinclination to believe in any goodness or wisdom in the governing power; and a determination to set themselves free from it on the first opportunity of rebellion. In the softer, more yielding, and more timid minds, that dare not rebel, because rebellion is to them a terrible wrong, and that cannot hate because to them hatred is agony, there is a constant struggle to obey in spite of their outraged intelligence, and to love, in spite of their outraged feelings. Such a household is like to a fine nation with an oppressive government.

A thought, something like this last, came into the mind of the stranger, who had been near enough to hear Mr. Underwood's words to Mary, and to see the result. He was a very quick and acute observer, and though he did not, of course, understand the special trifle which had served as the scourge on the present occasion, he knew that he had for a moment seen behind the veil, into the torture room of the family. He looked with a feeling of shame and commiseration upon the retreating figure of Mary, and then glancing at the father, half indignantly for a moment, he found his indignation melt away into a feeling of pity, stronger and more painful than that he had felt for the young girl.

Gideon Underwood's face was a face that roused his sympathy and curiosity equally. And the stranger turned away to conceal his emotion. He walked to a window overlooking a wide prospect, and there thought over some of the sin and sorrow of great nations, to which he had been a witness. Alas, for the tyrants and oppressors! the slaves and the oppressed! the strong ignorant men, who have to rule and know not how to do so, in accordance with God's laws; and the weak ignorant, who have to obey, and know not how! "Oh! ye sons of men," he murmured, "verily, ye are your own greatest tormentors! What other prayer is left for us all than that of the Saviour, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do?'" There it is! It is the want of knowledge. They know not what they do. That harsh man knows not the anguish he has inflicted on the cowering timid spirit of his child; and she knows not, cannot suspect, that his stern hard words hide a yearning for her love and sympathy, and a bitter disappointment that he cannot win it by authority."

"You are looking at the Grey Tower yonder, I perceive," said Mr. Crypt.

"Yes—and a little beyond it. It is a picturesque ruin."

"The part you see is a ruin; but there is a portion of the old building which is still inhabited. It belongs to Miss Grey, the blind lady who sat opposite you; she lives there with her sister, Mrs. Ward, and her son."

"That young man who is laughing so immoderately?"

"Yes. He is a fine young fellow, but without prospects."

"That does not seem to trouble him much," said the stranger, looking with some amusement at a group of the young people who were listening to something that caused them intense mirth, which they were endeavouring to suppress as much as possible.

"No," said Mr. Crypt. "He is I am afraid of too light and careless a spirit, and takes no heed for the morrow. Poor Philip! I wish he could be settled among us here, for he is ill-fitted to withstand the temptations of the world. Here, now, he might be won by degrees to think of the one thing needful."

"He is in God's hand," said the stranger, reverentially. "Let him enjoy the season of youth if he can. It is not given to all to do so."

"No indeed! Look at that young man;"—said Mr. Crypt, pointing to Mark, who was conversing with Mr. Shepherd. Who would think that he is not thirty years old? Was he ever a boy?"

"Shall we go and hear what it is they are laughing at?" said the stranger, moving towards the merry group.

Mr. Crypt, who studied to be grave upon principle, as the stranger studied to be merry, had a natural tendency to high spirits, which was a portion of the old Adam he had not succeeded in beating out of himself; so thus invited, he readily followed the stranger to the corner of the room in which Mr. Bang was entertaining a select few with a little anecdote. This anecdote was the more piquante as it related to some one in the room, who had a mortal objection to being laughed at, and at whom Mr.

Underwood would not have allowed any one to laugh could he have prevented it.

The strange gentleman saw at a glance when he joined the group, that the commodity in which they were dealing was illicit, and said so at once to Mr. Bang with a smile.

"But," he added, "I have a fair offer to make. If you will let us join your party, I and this gentleman," touching the grave but delighted Crypt, "will give our word not only to enjoy the joke, whatever it may be (provided I understand the language well enough)—"

"Oh! you understand it quite well enough, sir, I am sure," said Jack. "Come along. It's a capital joke. Here's a seat."

"Oh!" said Mr. Bang. "But what will you and Mr. Crypt do if we admit you into our coterie?"

"We will each tell a droll story," said the stranger.

"Each?" said Mr. Bang, looking at the curate with some humour, which the latter returned as he replied emphatically, "Each."

"That will do," said Mr. Bang. "You must know, sir, that the vicar's sister, Miss Shepherd—"

"No names," ejaculated Jack and Philip.

"— is a hard-fisted old lady. I mean to say that she sometimes carries the virtue of economy, over into the territory of the vice meanness. You must also know, that though she is not an amiable person to her equals, she is extremely kind to the poor, though she has not a good name among them. One reason for this I was explaining in my little anecdote—which these people won't believe because they never heard it before. A sign that they don't converse much with the poor. Whether she has any ulterior views of saving her soul by this sort of charity, I don't pretend to say."

"'Charity thinketh no evil,'" said Mr. Crypt, quietly, and without anything dictatorial in his manner.

"You are right, sir, you are right," said Mr. Bang; "but, hang it! I can't be charitable towards—that person. She's such an abominable mischief-maker. It will be your turn some of these days, and then we shall see. She puts her brother to his wits' end sometimes to get a rag of charity to cover her multitude of —. Well! well! Miss Rachel, I see you don't like this—nor Mr. Crypt either."

"Suppose you put off your indignant protests against the lady, and tell us what it was that amused you so much just now," said the stranger.

"Ah! revenons à nos moutons," said Jack.

"I was relating one of the strange accidents which give people an ill name, and go far towards hanging them. It is a story with a moral, you perceive. One winter's morning, Miss Shepherd set off to walk two miles to see a poor woman who was ill. On the road she met with the fish-man. In these parts we do not see fish very often, and whenever a wandering merchant of that description comes to Milford, Miss Shepherd is sure to purchase some of his wares. So, stopping him, she commanded him to overhaul his basket. As it chanced there was nothing there that suited her palate particularly."

"Or her brother's?" suggested good Mr. Crypt.

"Or her brother's, we will say for the sake of charity and Mr. Crypt—nothing but two fine large eels, in a torpid state with the cold. One of these had been already purchased by Mrs. Ward, and was on its way to the Grey Tower; the other Miss Shepherd bargained for. She offered so small a sum for it that the fish-man said he really could not take it all the way back to the village for the money; and it came to pass, finally, that Miss Shepherd bought the fish, and made the man tie it up in a paper, and put it in her pocket."

"Mr. Bang!" ejaculated Rachel.

"It is true, I assure you; Miss Shepherd puts wonderful things in that huge pocket of hers."

"She does, indeed," said the stranger, laughing. "I can tell you something on that subject presently."

"Well!" continued Mr. Bang, "away trudged Miss Shepherd, highly delighted with her bargain, and scenting the coming treat by anticipation. At last she arrived at Dame Wither's cottage, and there she sat down by the bed-side, and began to read and talk to her in a comforting strain about driving the devil out of our hearts. In the midst of the discourse the poor woman gave a scream of terror and started up, asking, 'Was there not waste ground enow about Milford parish but she must come driving the devil out of her own heart into a poor 'ooman's bed?' And she pointed to a 'black serpent' that was wriggling about over the clothes. The poor woman then fell back in a fit, to poor Miss Shepherd's consternation and ultimate prandial loss, for, in her efforts to restore the terrified patient, her fine eel disappeared from the cottage, and never was found any more. Since that time Miss Shepherd's eel has been believed in privately among the Milford poor as Beelzebub."

"I am sorry to interrupt conversation about so powerful a person as Beelzebub," said Mr. Underwood, attempting to smile; "I came to see if any persons here will play at whist."

He looked at the stranger.

"Thank you, I never play."

"Oh! but he sings, Mr. Underwood," screamed Miss Shepherd, who had caught the word "play."

"He will sing with Miss Grey. My brother says he sings beautifully. What was that you said he sung so well at Torrington Hall, Edward? Something you mentioned that struck you particularly because it reminded you of some one. Oh! I recollect, it was 'Lord, remember David.'"

It was evident, even to the stranger, that Miss Shepherd had said something very mal à propos. Every one looked disconcerted and glanced towards Mr. Underwood, whose eyes were cast on the ground, while his lips were white and compressed. How grateful the girls were to the next speaker! It was their unknown guest.

"It was not about singing we were thinking, madam. Mr. Underwood was recruiting for the whist table. Who will play?"

At the same moment the sound of the old piano was heard. Miss Grey had struck up a favourite march of Mr. Underwood's. Immediately most of the younger people gathered round her; Mr. Crypt and Leah sat down to whist with Miss Shepherd and, as they supposed, Mr. Underwood; but he did not take his usual place, and, after some minutes, the vicar himself came to the table and said,—

"Now, Agnes, you must be content to beat me this rubber, for Mr. Underwood has been obliged to leave the room."

She looked up sharply and peered in every corner.

"And has your friend, the foreign gentleman, been obliged to leave the room too?" she asked, sharply.

"Yes, since it is with him that Mr. Underwood has business to transact."

"Is that what you brought him here for to-night?"

"Yes, my dear," said the vicar, mildly.

"Why did you not tell me so, then?" she asked.

"Simply because it did not concern me to do so, and because ——" he hesitated.

"Mulier est hominis confusio," suggested Mr. Crypt, with the utmost gravity, shuffling the cards.

The vicar smiled.

"Mr. Crypt is complimentary, my dear; for as an old poet renders his remark—

'Madam, the sentence of this Latin is,
Woman is manne's joy, and manne's bliss.'

"Oh, indeed! now mind you don't revoke!" said his sister.

"I won't, Miss Leah, you may be assured;" said Mr. Crypt, with more than one meaning in his words.

Many an eye turned toward the door as the evening proceeded, and much real anxiety was felt, and more curiosity; but Mr. Underwood and the Strange Gentleman were seen no more that evening in the Great Room at Milford Grange, and the Tea-Fight concluded, as many other fights have done, without any clear apprehension of what advantages had been gained, beyond a display of respective forces.

THE HISTORY OF PUPPET-SHOWS IN ENGLAND.¹

V.—WAR CARRIED ON BY THE PURITANS AGAINST ACTORS.—PUPPET-SHOWS DURING THE SUPPRESSION OF PERFORMANCES, AND FROM THE RECOMMENCEMENT THEREOF UNTIL THE REVOLUTION OF 1688.

IN no country in Europe was the war between the Church and Theatre so long and so bitter as in Protestant England. We have seen the Clergy of the Reformation expelling from the churches almost all those ceremonies calculated to influence the senses, which Catholicism had introduced or tolerated; we have seen the chiefs of the Anglican Church, under the influence of Presbyterian fanaticism, abolishing, as dangerous remains of paganism, the secular entertainments which, at certain periods, enlivened both town and country. If the miracle plays and moralities performed by the societies of various towns were not suppressed at the same time, it was because, although the Puritans and New Gospellers treated these performances as profanation and idolatry, the more politic Anglicans deemed it prudent to employ this powerful auxiliary of proselytism in the service of the new religious establishment. John Bale, Bishop of Ossory, composed twenty Mysteries and Moralities, all imbued with the spirit of Protestantism, which were represented with great success by the pupils of the episcopal college of Kilkenny. The Anglican Clergy entered with so much spirit into this singular method of propagating their principles, that they recommended to the faithful certain dramas of this description, which might be easily performed by a very small number in private.¹ This method of Protestant instruction having been suppressed in 1553, by a proclamation of Queen Mary, who at the same time restored the mysteries and miracle-plays² to all their catholic splendour, the re-establishment of these dramatic services did not take place, as might have been imagined, on the ascension of Elizabeth. This princess, although raised to the throne by the Protestant party, forbade all religious controversies concerning the stage; pretending, like a true daughter of Henry VIII., that she alone was to regulate everything connected with religion. The prohibition of the theological drama was one of the principal causes of the sudden prosperity of the profane and classic theatre, which enjoyed the support of the young queen, and which answered so well to her taste for erudition, elegance and poetry. Everything smiled on comedy and tragedy, when in 1562, (the same year in which the first English play composed after the ancient manner was performed,) translations of the laws of Geneva were scattered throughout England; these laws, as is well known, forbade all scenic representations with the utmost severity. The effect was extraordinary; all the Presbyterians of the three kingdoms, by whom the word of Calvin was revered almost more than the Gospel, lifted up their voices against a theatre, which they said rose from the ashes of paganism, and which they cursed as a return to idolatry. From this period commenced an infuriated war between Puritans and actors, which lasted more than a century. Geoffrey Fenton in 1574,³ John Northbrooke in 1577,⁴ Stephen Gosson in 1579,⁵ Philip Stubbs in 1589,⁶ William Rankin in 1587,⁷

Doctor Rainolds in 1599,¹ William Prynne in 1633,² Jeremy Collier in 1697,³ &c., were the principal champions of this long crusade, which, after having caused the suspension of theatrical representations at various times and on various pretexts, at length obtained under the Long Parliament, and during the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, the entire suppression of theatres. Before this fatal termination and during the contest, comedians and dramatic authors, supported by the especial favour of Elizabeth and James I., took most cruel and mortifying vengeance on their intolerant persecutors. In France, actors and dramatic writers, who were violently attacked by Jansenists and Gallicans, obtained but rare although brilliant victories over their adversaries: such were "Tartufe," a scene of "Don Juan," and Racine's "Two Letters against Port Royal;" I do not include the Basilio of the "Burlador de Sevilla," because that appears to be rather an aggression than revenge. In England, on the contrary, under the reigns of Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I., there was not a single comic author who did not introduce, in nearly all his works, various types of hypocrites, precisians, and Banbury-men,⁴ on whom the author showered the envenomed darts of ridicule and satire. I cannot resist the temptation of here introducing some fragments of a scene of this description, which is, indeed, particularly connected with the history of puppet-shows. One of the best characters in Ben Jonson's comedy entitled "Baltholomew Fair," is that of Rabbi Busy, whom the list of personages entitles a "Banbury-man." Being conducted, by the incidents of the drama, to a Smithfield puppet-show, he is unable to restrain his volcanic zeal at the sight of the little actors, and unceremoniously interrupts the performance by a tirade of invectives from his biblical vocabulary:—

"Busy. Down with Dagon! down with Dagon! 'tis I, I will no longer endure your profanations.

"Leatherhead. What mean you, sir?

"Busy. I will remove Dagon there I say, that idol, that heathenish idol, that remains, as I may say, a beam, a very beam;—not a beam of the sun, nor a beam of the moon, nor a beam of a balance, neither a house-beam, nor a weaver's beam, but a beam in the eye, in the eye of the brethren; a very great beam, an exceeding great beam, such as are your stage-players, rimers and moricedancers, who have walked hand-in-hand, in contempt of the brethren and the cause, and been borne out by instruments of no mean countenance.

"Leath. Sir, I present nothing but what is licensed by authority.

"Busy. Thou art all licence, even licentiousness itself, Shemei!

"Leath. I have the master of the revels' hand for't, sir.

"Busy. The master of the revels' hand!—thou hast Satan's: hold thy peace, thy scurrility; shut up thy mouth; thy profession is damnable, and in pleading for it thou dost plead for Baal. I have long opened my mouth wide and gaped, I have gaped as the oyster for the tide, after thy destruction."

The furious puritan is anxious to prove his proposition in form. At this challenge the cunning puppet showman shrewdly replies :

"Faith, sir, I am not well-studied in these controversies between the hypocrites and us. But here's one of my motions, puppet Dionysius, shall undertake him, and I'll venture the cause on't.

"One of the Spectators. I know no fitter match than a puppet to commit with an hypocrite!"

Then the puritan and puppet engage in a most ludicrous controversy. At length, having exhausted his arguments, the puritan exclaims :

"You are an abomination; for the male, among you, putteth on the apparel of the female, and the female of the male."

"You lie, you lie, you lie abominably;" replies the puppet. "It is your old stale argument against the players, but it will not hold against the puppets; for we have neither male nor female amongst us. And that thou may'st see, if thou wilt, like a malicious purblind zeal as thou art."

Whereupon the little puppet ludicrously furnishes the disconcerted puritan with a proof of what he has advanced. The interpreter, elated with his triumph, and eager to follow up his advantage, resolutely sustains that his profession is as lawful as that of his adversary; then continuing his parallel: "I speak by inspiration as well as he,¹ that I have as little to do with learning as he; and do scorn her helps as much as he," thus loading the enemy of theatres with darts of the most cutting, lively, and admirably comic satire.

However, this hatred of puppet-shows with which Ben Jonson superabundantly invests his Baubury-man was truly lodged in the brains of some precisians. Geoffrey Fenton devoted one entire chapter (the seventh) of his celebrated book, "A Form of Christian Policie,"² to the task of proving that fiddlers and puppet-players were as unworthy of enjoying the rights of citizenship as comedians themselves. It appears that in some counties puppet-shows had been included in the suppression of hobby-horses, for James I. mentioned them by name in the list of lawful recreations after evening prayers and upon holy days,³ but that was only a passing storm. The greater part of the puritans themselves did not scruple to attend the scriptural plays performed by puppets. A proof of this custom is furnished by Cowley's comedy of "the Gurdian," represented towards the end of the reign of Charles I., and again performed on the stage after the Restoration under the title of, "The Cutter of Coleman Street." In the fifth act of this drama, a masque, accompanied by several violins, is introduced in order to entertain a puritan lady. One of the persons of the play remarks that this impromptu will afford celestial delight to the worthy widow, who, in her whole life, has never seen any performance but "The City of Nineveh" at puppet-shows.¹

When all representations at the theatre were suspended by the bill of September 2d, 1642, and at length abolished by the bill of October 23d, 1647, puppet-shows were not included in this proscription. The tolerance they enjoyed is clearly proved by a petition from the London comedians to Parliament, January 24th, 1643. These unfortunate beings complained of the silence imposed upon them and the abolition of theatrical performances, whilst bull-fights and puppet-plays were authorized.² Although free from all interference, it does not appear that the motion-men exerted themselves to increase their stock of performances during this period which was so advantageous to them. I can, in fact, add but one title to the list already given of this species of drama; but this title possesses peculiar interest, because it indicates a puppet-show on the subject of "Paradise Lost," and because, by a singular chance, this information is afforded by Milton. In 1643, twenty years before the publication of his master-piece, this great man addressed to Parliament an eloquent speech in defence of what we now call the liberty of the press. The author, in the first pages, wishing to establish the legitimate basis of human liberty, says: "Many there be that complain of divine Providence for suffering Adam to transgress. Foolish tongues! When God gave him reason, he gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the Motions."³ During the suspension of theatres, puppet-plays were not only freely represented throughout the kingdom, but the Norwich puppet-players, who were then celebrated, used to come even to London to show their best opera-puppets. I find this remark, amongst others equally curious, in a play by William Davenant, entitled, "Play-house to be let," which this ingenious poet found means of having performed, in spite of the edict of suppression, by inserting an episode against the Spanish, conformable to the views of Cromwell, who was then preparing an armament against Philip IV.⁴

The Restoration gave new life to theatres, when at length, liberated from their long silence, poets and comedians displayed extraordinary activity. The motion-men, on their side, endeavoured to preserve

(1) This passage proves that although the subject of puppet-plays was submitted to the approbation of the Lord Mayor, the dialogue was left to the discretion of the interpreter.

(2) The title has in addition: "gathered out of French." I regret not knowing from what French author this singular book was formed. For the passage mentioned, see G. Chalmers, Malone's Shakespeare by Boswell, vol. iii. p. 433 and note 8.

(4) This drama, in which the distress of comedians is described with as much truth as humour, is entitled "Play-house to be let," containing the history of Sir Francis Drake, and the cruelty of the Spaniards in Peru, expressed by instruments and vocal music. Mr. Payne Collier was mistaken in ascribing to this play, which was written to serve the designs of Cromwell, the date of 1663, and in another place that of 1673. the favour they enjoyed. Their competition with the large theatres appeared sufficiently formidable to the parties interested, namely, the royal company of Drury Lane, and that of the Duke of York, who were assembled in the theatre of Dorset Garden, to warrant their presenting a petition to Charles II. in 1675, requesting the suppression, or at least the removal of a puppet-show which was then represented on the site of Cecil Street in the Strand, and whose vicinity was very injurious to their receipts.¹

But we are approaching an important date, a date which opened a new political era, and a new era in the history of puppet-shows; I mean, the glorious Revolution of 1688, which occasioned, according to Mr. Payne Collier, two memorable events, the ascension of the illustrious house of Orange, and the happy arrival of Punch or Polichinelle in England.

VI.—PUPPET-SHOWS FROM 1688 UNTIL THE PRESENT TIME.

PUNCH.

From the year 1688, the history of English puppets is entirely concentrated in the history of Punch. This name has been the subject of many false explanations. Some have believed that there existed a secret and fanciful analogy between the name and even the flames of the wit of Punch, and the beverage, of which the receipt is said to have come from Persia. This is going too far in search of an error.²

Punch is simply an alteration and contraction, effected by the monosyllabic nature of the English language, of the word Punchinello: in fact, we at first find the names Punch and Punchinello used indifferently one for the other. But is it certain that Punch travelled from the Hague to London after the arrival of William of Orange? On this subject we have our doubts. From the account of his learned and able biographer, we find traces of his presence in England before the abdication of James II.³ Therefore, the hero of puppet-shows could not have come from Holland in the train of William III. to dethrone "the old Vice;" he must have come from France with the Stuarts.

A more important observation is, that Punch did not at first possess the gross and more than satanic immorality of which he was accused, and on which he was even complimented at a later period, if we may believe a very carefully handled portrait given in Latin verses by a young fellow of Magdalen College, named Joseph Addison. Punch, in 1617, was merely a sharp, lively, noisy fellow, a kind of little king of Xvetot or Coccagne, rather disorderly, a great boaster, but making a vast deal more noise than mischief. Let us hear Addison, whose verses are entitled "Machine gesticulantes," Anglice Puppet-shows:⁴—

"*Ludit in enses plebscula parva theatro:
Sed præter cæteros incedit homuncio, rous
Vocæ strepens
In ventrem tumet immoedicum; pons eminet ingens
A tergo gibbus; pygmæum terriat agmen
Major, et immanem miratur turba giganteum.*"

After a description of his physical advantages, the author proceeds to an account of his disposition:—

" Jactat convitia vulgo, Et risu importunus adest atque omnia turbat."

As to his gallantry, it was more lively and giddy than improper:—

"Nec raro invadit molles, pictamque protervo Ore petit nympham, invitoque dat oscula ligno."

Some passages from these verses show us that Punch's theatre was a great improvement on the ancient puppet-shows we found in London during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. We remember that in 1614, there was only one price for seats at puppet-plays in Bartholomew Fair, and that was very low: "Two-pence, gentlemen, two-pence a piece, the best motion in the fair!" In 1697, Punch's theatre had become more comfortable and less exclusively plebeian; and there were seats at different prices:—

"Nec confusus honos: nummo subsellia cedunt Diverso, et varii ad pretium stat copia nummi."

Every artifice then invented to delude the eye was employed, such as perpendicular wires stretched in front of the stage, to deceive the spectator, &c.:

" Lumina passim
Angustos penetrant aditus, qua plurima visum
Fila secant, ne, cum vacuo datur ore fenestra,
Pervia fraus pateat."¹

All the limbs of these little figures were jointed, and from the top of the head issued a metallic branch uniting the separate wires in the hand which gave them motion:—

" Truncos opifex et inutile lignum
Cogit in humanas species, et robore natam
Progeniem telo efformat, nexuque tenaci
Crura ligat pedibus, humerisque accomodat armos,
Et membris membra aptat, et artibus inserit artus.
Tunc habiles addit trochæas, quibus arte puillum
Versat onus, molique manu famulatus inert
Sufficit occultos motus, vocemque ministrat."

Unfortunately, in this composition, Addison does not mention the title of a single puppet-play, nor the name of a single puppet-player. This we regret, because we have very little information on the subject during the reign of William III.; we can mention only "The Siege of Namur," represented in 1695, at Bartholomew Fair, a play to which a learned man of the time, John Dennis, a critic by profession, devoted a few lines in one of his letters.² Some years later, various opera-puppets, taken from Scripture, were shown at the same fair: in these, despite the serious nature of the subjects, Mr. Punch was constantly introduced. See a play-bill, bearing no date, but which appears to belong to the commencement of the reign of Queen Anne, (1703,) the original of which is preserved in the British Museum.

"At Crawley's booth, overagainst the Crown Tavern, in Smithfield, during the time of the Bartholomew Fair, will be presented a little opera, called 'The old Creation of the World,' yet newly revived, with the addition of 'Noah's Flood,' also several fountains playing water during the time of the play. The last scene does represent Noah and his family coming out of the ark, with all the beasts two by two, and all the fowls of the air seen in a prospect sitting upon trees; likewise over the ark is seen the sun rising in a glorious manner; moreover, a multitude of angels will be seen in a double rank, which presents a double prospect, one for the sun, the other for a palace, where will be seen six angels ringing of bells. Likewise machines descend from above, double and treble, with Dives rising out of hell, and Lazarus seen in Abraham's bosom, besides several figures dancing jiggs, sarabands, and country-dances, to the admiration of the spectators; with the merry conceits of Squire Punch, and Sir John Spendall."¹

This John Spendall was the old actor of moralities, who had been transferred to the puppet-theatre with the old Vice and his company.

We find in the sixteenth number of the Tatler, dated May 17th, 1709, an account of a puppet-show represented at Bath, the subject of which was the "Creation of the World," followed by the "Deluge," as in the Smithfield performance. "When we came to Noah's flood in the show, Punch and his wife were introduced dancing in the ark."²

It was the opinion of the audience that the show was very instructive for young persons. At the end of the play, Punch was very civil to the whole company, making bows till his buttons reached the ground. In another puppet-show, still on the "Deluge," when the rain began to fall in torrents, Punch popped out his head from behind the scenes, and said in a sotto voce to the patriarch: "It is rather misty, master Noah."

Addison, who had become, under Queen Anne, a fashionable writer, and the partner of Sir Richard Steele in the editing of "The Tatler" and "Spectator," joined with his talented colleague in establishing an extraordinary reputation for a showman who then appeared. Many of the malicious criticisms and cutting comparisons of these two friends, were occasioned by Mr. Powel's mechanical dancers and singers, and by the pieces which the deformed, though clever little man, himself arranged. Thanks to the humour of these two intelligent writers, to the unrefined taste of the public, and to his own real merit, Powel acquired and retained extensive fame during the reigns of Queen Anne and George I. and the commencement of the reign of George II. He appears to have at first tried his skill in various large towns of the kingdom; he particularly frequented Bath during the season. In 1709, Steele published, in several numbers of the Tatler, an amusing correspondence between the imaginary Æsculapius Isaac Bickerstaff, who is almost always supposed to hold the pen of "The Tatler,"³ and our already-celebrated and real puppet-showman, Mr. Powel. The unfortunate doctor complains bitterly of Mr. Powel's malicious prologues and satirical epilogues, and especially of the taunts with which a certain Mr. Punch is constantly assailing his person and his profession.⁴ Mr. Powel, in the ironically apologetic reply furnished him by the Tatler, declares that he has neglected nothing in order to perfect himself in his art: he has travelled in Italy, France, and Spain, and is acquainted with the proceedings of the most talented mechanics in Germany. He accuses his rival of being a busy-body and dangerous leveller, who is anxious to create insubordination in his company, and especially to persuade good Mr. Punch to break the wires by which his jaws are moved: hateful plot! since it is by the most legitimate right, namely that of creation, that he is absolute master of his little band, being able, if such is his pleasure, to light his pipe with one of Mr. Punch's legs, or warm his fingers with his carcase.

In January 1710, we find Mr. Powel's puppets and dramas very well received, not only in Bath, but even in London. Punchinello and his scolding companion accompanied by Doctor Faust, caused the new Italian Opera at the Haymarket, according to the Tatler, to tremble, and deprived it of the greater portion of its brilliant audience. Punchinello in particular, in the opinion of the fair sex, balanced the merit of the famous singer Nicolini.⁵

In the commencement of the following year (1711,) Mr. Powel established his theatre at Covent Garden. In the fourteenth number of the Spectator, Steele is supposed to have received a letter full of complaints from the subsacristan at St. Paul's. For twenty years, this good man has regularly rung the bell for service; but during the last fortnight he has experienced deep regret in finding that the usual attendants have ceased to respond to his pious call. The reason is that Mr. Powel has selected the hour of prayer for the opening of his puppet-show. The worthy sacristan, who is greatly scandalized at announcing the commencement of a profane game instead of an exercise of piety, requests the advice of "The Spectator" as to the measures he ought to take in order to remove this Mr. Punchinello, or at least to make him choose less canonical hours for his entertainments.⁶

This play of Mr. Powel, by which the church of Saint Paul was thus deprived of its parishioners, was taken from a very popular legend, "Whittington and his Cat," or "Whittington thrice Lord Mayor of London." This history, which is found in almost every commercial country, in England, Italy, Portugal, and even in the East, is the history of a poor scullion, who had nothing but a cat to give as a seaman's venture to the captain of a vessel which was sailing for the Indies. The cat was, however, put on board for fun. Having touched at an island which was infested by rats, the captain thought he could command a good price in that country for the cat and the kittens, which she had had during the passage, and sold them advantageously to the king of the island. This sum, having been remitted to Whittington, prospered in his hands, and was the origin of a fortune, which led to his being thrice Mayor of London. Steele had the cruelty to draw a parallel between "Whittington and his Cat," and a grand opera which was then being performed at the Haymarket, "Rinaldo and Armida," and to give, as may be supposed, the preference to the former. He further took care to announce that Mr. Powel, in order to continue his contest with the Haymarket, would shortly represent the opera of "Susannah, or Innocence Betrayed," with a pair of new "Elders."

Mr. Powel's talent was then proverbial, and his name was associated with everything connected with machinery. "The Spectator," in the 277th number, records that before the rupture with France, English ladies received their fashions from Paris by means of "a jointed baby," dressed in the latest fashion, which regularly every month crossed from Calais to London. "The Spectator" states that he had been invited to see one of these dolls which had arrived, notwithstanding the war, and gives an agreeable description of every part of the dress as far as—but not including—the knots of the garters, declaring that "as he pays a due respect even to a pair of sticks when they are under petticoats, he did not examine into that particular." He then adds: "As I was taking my leave, the milliner farther informed me, that with the assistance of a watchmaker, and the ingenious Mr. Powel, she had also contrived another puppet, which, by the help of several little springs to be wound up within it, could move all its limbs, and that she had sent it over to her correspondent in Paris to be taught the various leanings and bendings of the head, the risings of the bosom, the courtesies and recovery, the genteel trip, and the agreeable jet, as they are now practised at the court of France."

The popularity enjoyed by Mr. Powel's puppets, and even by others far inferior to them, was so great, that Dr. Arbuthnot, who published an allegorical pamphlet on the affairs of the day, entitled the "History of John Bull" in 1712, mentions the inordinate attachment to this description of entertainment as a characteristic feature of the London inhabitants. Amongst the choleric Mrs. Bull's reproaches to her husband, she lays particular stress on the time wasted at puppet-shows: "You sot," says she, "you loiter about alehouses and taverns, spend your time at billiards, ninepins, or puppet-shows." And a little further: "the whole generation of him are so in love with bagpipes and puppet-shows!"

"The Spectator," in the 377th number, commences a bill of mortality, with "Lysander slain at a puppet-show."

What were these dangerous and attractive puppets?

Probably those which Mr. Powel had established under the galleries of Covent-Garden. In 1713 this little hall bore the name of Punch's Theatre. This information is furnished by the title of a play, which is as follows: "Venus and Adonis, or the Triumphs of Love, by Martin Powel; a mock opera acted in Punch's theatre in Covent-Garden; 1713, in 8vo." Was this Martin Powel our celebrated interpreter, the favourite of Steele and Addison? I think so, but cannot positively assert it. The admirers of Powel tell us that he himself made all his actors and composed almost all his plays; but they do not inform us of his printing a single one. The author of "Punch and Judy" even declares that he composed them extempore; nevertheless it is certain that they contained many verses which were written, and which may have been printed. It is surprising that neither Addison, Steele, nor Swift, who have so often spoken of Mr. Powel, have never mentioned his christian name. Once, Addison, in order to distinguish him from George Powel, the celebrated tragedian, who, he proposed, in raillery, should act with the little performers of our Powel, called the latter Powel junior.¹ In 1715 appeared a satirical pamphlet, attributed to Thomas Burnet, entitled "A Second Tale of a Tub, or the history of Robert Powel, the puppet-showman; dedicated to the Earl of Oxford." This title appears to remove all doubt, and to prove that the christian name of Powel was Robert; but we must beware of deciding thus hastily. The "Second Tale of a Tub" was a very cutting satire against Robert Walpole.² The allegory commences with the title, by the facetious attribution of the statesman's christian name to Powel. The engraving of the frontispiece represents the minister, in a court dress, holding in his hand Powel's wand, the famous silver wand of the interpreter. On a small stage, lighted by foot-lamps, appear two puppets, namely, Punch and his wife.³ Mr. Thomas Wright, in his history of the House of Hanover, illustrated by caricatures and pamphlets, has again introduced the grotesque figure of the minister-interpreter; but he unfortunately neglected to show us the theatre and the two puppets, which would have had especial interest in our eyes.

The author of the "Second Tale of a Tub," in directing the shafts of his satire against Robert Walpole under the name and costume of Robert Powel, makes us acquainted with many of the best opera puppets composed or arranged by the able Powel. He mentions the "Children in the Wood," taken from a very touching popular ballad; "King Bladud," the heroic picture of a truly patriotic king; "Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay;" "Robin Hood and Little John;" "Mother Shipton;" and "Mother Goose." As to Punch, he speaks of him merely as a buffoon, creating laughter by his impertinence and blunders.

It is to this golden age of English puppets that belong some stanzas composed by Swift on puppet-shows, in which, according to the nature of his genius, brilliant poetical imagination is mingled with caprice and sarcasm.

THE PUPPET-SHOW.

- "The life of man to represent,
And turn it all to ridicule,
Wit did a puppet-show invent,
Where the chief actor is a fool.
- "The gods of old are logs of wood,
And worship was to puppets paid;
In antic dress the idol stood,
And priest and people bow'd the head.
- "No wonder, then, if art began
The simple votaries to frame,
To shape in timber foolish man,
And consecrate the block to Fame.
- "From hence poetic fancy learn'd
That trees might rise from human form;
The body to a trunk be turn'd,
The branches issue from the arms.
- "Thus Dædalus, and Ovid too,
That man's a blockhead have confest;
Powel and Stretch the hint pursue;
Life is a farce, the world a jest.
- "The same great truth South Sea has proved,
On that famed theatre, the Alley;
Where thousands, by Directors moved,
Are now sad monuments of folly.
- "What Momus was of old to Jove,
The same a Harlequin is now;
The former was buffoon above,
The latter as a Punch below.
- "This fleeting scene is but a stage,
Where various images appear,
In different parts of youth and age,
Alike the prince and peasant share.
- "Some draw our eyes by being great,
False pomp conceals mere wood within;
And legislators ranged in state,
Are oft but wisdom in machine.
- "A stock may chance to wear a crown,
And timber as a lord take place;
A statue may put on a frown,
And cheat us with a thinking face.
- "Others are blindly led away,
And made to act for ends unknown,
By the mere string of wires they play,
And speak in language not their own.
- "Too oft, alas! a scolding wife
Usurps a jolly fellow's throne;
And many drink the cup of life,
Mix'd and embitter'd by a Joan.
- "In short, whatever men pursue,
Of pleasure, folly, war or love;
This mimic race brings all to view,
Alike they dress, they talk, they move.
- "Go on, great Stretch,¹ with artful wand,
Mortals to please and to deride;
And when death breaks thy vital band,
Thou shalt put on a puppet's pride.

(1) Stretch was probably a puppet-player in Dublin.

"Thou shalt in puny wood be shown,
Thy image shall preserve thy fame;
Ages to come thy worth shall own,
Point at thy limbs and tell thy name.

"Tell Tom¹ he draws a farce in vain,
Before he looks in nature's glass;
Puns cannot form a witty scene,
Nor pedantry for humour pass.

"To make men act as senseless wood,
And chatter in a mystic strain,
Is a mere farce on flesh and blood,
And shows some error in the brain.

"He that would thus refine on thee,
And turn thy stage into a school,
The jest of Punch will ever be,
And stand confest the greater fool."

The desire of converting puppet-shows into a serious and moral show, which Swift so humorously noticed, was soon increased and developed, being aided by the philosophical and declamatory tendencies of the age. Fielding, a great lover of the natural, and in particular of Mr. Punch, whom he introduces in a comedy composed in his youth,² has admirably ridiculed this misplaced ambition in a chapter of "Tom Jones." He causes his hero to arrive at a village inn, just as a puppet-player is representing some scenes from a then fashionable comedy by Colley Cibber, "The Provoked Husband." The assembly, containing the literati of the place, appeared perfectly satisfied with this serious and correct entertainment, which was free from all low wit and megriment, and to confess the truth, from everything calculated to excite laughter. After the play, the performer, encouraged by the unequivocal satisfaction of his audience, thought himself justified in remarking, that nothing in the age was so much improved as puppet-shows, and that in banishing Punch and his wife Joan and all their jokes, they had succeeded in raising puppets to the rank of rational performances.

In spite of the universal concurrence in this opinion, Tom Jones expressed a slight doubt of this pretended progress. He could not, for his part, help regretting his old friend Punch, and he feared that in banishing him with his merry companion, puppet-shows had been spoiled. The pretended morality of this new description of plays almost instantly received a very severe check. One of the girls belonging to the inn, being surprised in an improper conversation with the interpreter's companion, replied with effrontery, that she had but followed the example of the lady whom they had all been admiring in the "Provoked Husband;" this very naturally furnished the hostess, who had hitherto been silent, with an opportunity of complaining grievously of the bad principles inculcated by puppet-shows of the present day, and of regretting the time when puppet-players performed none but irreproachable plays, such as "Jephthah's Rash Vow," upon which no wrong construction could be placed.¹

(1) This is a friendly counsel given by Swift to the Irish doctor, Thomas Sheridan, or rather to his son, also named Thomas, to correct the precocious taste he manifested for the theatre. These two Sheridans, men of learning and merit, are the father and grandfather of the illustrious Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

(2) This little play of Fielding, in which an entire puppet-show is introduced, is entitled, "The Author's Farce, with a Puppet-show called the Pleasures of the Town." It was performed at the Hay-market in 1729, and repeated some years later at Drury Lane.

We find at the period of which we are now speaking, a sentimental and declamatory school of puppets, in imitation of the great theatres, and to which belonged, it is thought, Russel, one of the most renowned of Powel's successors, and Charlotte Clarke, daughter of the poet and comedian Colley Cibber. This woman, who was gifted with eminent talents and a good education, but who also possessed an adventurous and changeable disposition, quitted the stage, where she had made her début with success, and in 1737 opened a great puppet-show, situated, as she informs us in her autobiography, in Tennis Court, James-street, near the Haymarket. Having speedily ruined herself by her misconduct, she was glad to earn a guinea a-day by acting as interpreter to Russel's puppets, at Kickford's great Rome, in Brewer-street.²

Nevertheless, biblical subjects, popular ballads, and the merry jokes of Punch, still amused and interested the multitude at least, at fairs. Hogarth, in an engraving dated 1733, has depicted the accumulated wonders of Southwark Fair. Here, a bagpipe-player, accompanied by a monkey in military dress, is dancing two dolls with his feet; there, a woman in the costume of a Savoyard, with a hurdy-gurdy on her back, is showing a magic-lantern to a wondering child. In another part is the entrance to a puppet-show, on the door of which is written in large letters, "Punch's Opera." A large bill hanging from the balcony indicates the play for the day. In one compartment, Polichinelle is seen riding indifferently, whilst his well-trained coursers thoroughly search the pockets of Harlequin; in another compartment, is a scene from the Bible,—Adam, Eve and the Serpent; the subject being again "Paradise Lost."³

Gay, in his description of a village fair, introduces a similar scene, in which Punch is not forgotten:—

"The mountebank now treads the stage, and sells
His pills, his balsams, and his ague-spells;
Now o'er and o'er the nimble tumbler springs,
And on the rope the venturous maiden swings;
Jack Pudding in his party-colour'd jacket,
Tosses the glove and jokes at every packet.
Of rare-shows he sung and Punch's feats,
Of pockets pick'd in crowds, and various cheats.
Then sad he sung, 'the Children in the Wood;'
(Ah! barbarous uncle, stain'd with infant blood!)
How blackberries they pluck'd in deserts wild,
And fearless at the glittering faulchion smiled."⁴

To be concluded in next No.

An Irish journal says, "The following bill was presented by a farrier to a gentleman in this town:—*To curing your pony that died, 1*l.* 1*s."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER LXIII.

URSA MAJOR SHOWS HIS TEETH.

WALTER's visit to Lewis produced a more favourable effect upon the patient's health, than did all the pills and potions wherewith his doctor had sought to exorcise the fever-fiend. He had not then deceived himself, Annie had loved him; nay, from Walter's recital, as well as from her manner on the occasion of his protecting her through the crowd in the square of St. Mark, was he not justified in believing that she loved him still? the idea was in itself happiness, for although the fact of her renewing her engagement with Lord Bellefield so immediately after Lewis had quitted Broadhurst still remained unaccounted for, the hope that she loved him seemed to impart a new aspect to the whole affair, and for the first time he allowed himself to believe that her conduct might admit of some satisfactory explanation. The emotions of such a mind as Lewis's necessarily produce marked effects upon the body; agitation of spirits had mainly conduced to bring on the fever which had thus prostrated him, and the hope to which Walter's words had given rise, seemed to infuse new life into him; at all events, it is certain, that from the moment in which he became convinced that Annie had loved him, he began to amend. As soon as Frere considered him strong enough to bear such an announcement, he informed him of the appalling fate which had overtaken his enemy. Lewis was at first strongly affected; but for events over which he had had no control, he might now have been in the position of Miles Hardy, a wanderer on the face of the earth, bearing with him the harrowing consciousness, that the blood of a fellow-creature was upon his hands. After remaining in silent thought for some minutes, he suddenly raised his eyes to his friend's countenance.

"Frere," he said, "how can I ever be sufficiently grateful to God, who chose you as his instrument to set my sin before me, and bring me to a better frame of mind! had this dreadful fate overtaken Bellefield without my having resolved not to fight him, I should have felt morally guilty of his death, considering that it was a mere accident which had enabled Hardy to meet him sooner than myself."

"You acted rightly, under circumstances which I must confess to have afforded about as severe a trial to a man of your impetuous nature as could well be conceived," returned Frere; "so it is but fair that you should reap some advantage from your self-conquest. I pity poor young Hardy more than I blame him, for he has probably never been taught the truths of Christianity, and nothing else could have possessed sufficient power over him to induce him to forego his revenge. Ah! if such men as Bellefield could but be made to see the mental agony their vices cause to others, even their selfish hearts would be touched, and they would be unable to go on sinning with such callous indifference: but, in their selfishness, they look only to the gratification of their own passions, and ignore all possible results which might tend to interfere with them; such a career as Bellefield's is a fearful and inexplicable mystery to reflect upon, and it is only by a high exercise of faith, that we can believe even Omnipotence able to bring good out of such consistent and unmitigated wickedness."

"And is such your belief?" inquired Lewis earnestly.

"Most assuredly it is," was the reply. "I am not one of those who acknowledge God's attributes with my tongue, but in my heart practically deny them; nor can I believe, that a Being, the perfection of wisdom, of justice, and of mercy, could allow evil to exist, were He not able to overrule it to good. But if you ask me, 'How can these things be?' I tell you at once I do not know; I form no theory on the subject, for I have no power to do so; my mind is that of a weak fallen man, and the secret things of God are so immeasurably above it, that to speculate upon them is equally presumptuous and absurd. Still I feel as certain of the main fact as if each special detail of the Divine scheme lay spread out like a map before me, because, were it not so, God would falsify His attributes, the great Being we worship would be, not a merciful Father, but a stern inexorable Judge. Depend upon it, Lewis, the real fallacy in the religious teaching of the present day is, that practically, if not theoretically, fear rather than love is inculcated as the actuating principle, and, as a natural consequence, men ignore and put aside thoughts of futurity, as they put aside any other painful and alarming reflection."

As Frere concluded, Lewis paused in thought, then observed,—

"All you have said sounds wise and true, and yet there appears a contradiction somewhere. Evil must always be hateful to God, and as such must deserve everlasting punishment. I cannot understand it."

"Nor do I wish or expect you to do so," replied Frere; "but cannot you wait patiently through a little space—the life of one man—trusting that when this mortal shall have put on immortality, our enlarged faculties may enable us to see clearly that which we now believe as a matter of faith? The only difficulty arises from your attempting to measure things infinite with your finite intelligence; for instance, you talk of everlasting punishment,—what do you mean by the term?"

"Mean, why, of course, punishment that shall endure throughout eternity," replied Lewis.

"And eternity, which to be eternal, can no more have had a beginning than it shall have an end, is an idea our minds cannot grasp; and in attempting to define and realize these things, we only confuse and mislead ourselves. Take my word for it, Lewis, true religion, the religion Christ came down from heaven to teach men, consists in a sincere, earnest, and consistent belief in the goodness and benevolence of the Creator, carried out practically, by an unceasing endeavour to reform our fallen natures after His image."

"And how are we to gain the knowledge and the strength requisite to enable us to do this?" asked Lewis.

"By studying God's written word with an honest intention of doing as we are there told to do, at the same time imploring His assistance to enable us to carry out our good intentions," was the earnest reply.

So the conversation ended, but Lewis thought over the ideas thus presented to him, which, though not entirely new to him, or indeed to any other reflecting mind, had, perhaps, never before occurred to him in a light so clear and practical as that in which Frere had placed them; and as by slow degrees his strength began to return, and, with Antonelli's assistance, he contrived to creep for an hour at a time to his painting room, he arose from that couch of sickness a wiser and a better man.

As soon as Charles Leicester had recovered from the first shock of his brother's death, he determined to entrust his wife and child to the care of General Grant, while he started for England to break the distressing intelligence to his father. Lord Ashford was now becoming an old man, and although the profligate career of his eldest son had caused him the deepest anxiety and regret, he still regarded him with much affection; and Leicester had only too good reason to dread the effect which might be produced upon him if, by any accident, he were to be made aware of the fatal event without sufficient preparation. Accordingly, on the second day after the discovery of the catastrophe, he quitted Venice, and travelled day and night till he reached England; but fast as he journeyed, the evil tidings journeyed still more swiftly; a rumour of the truth had somehow found its way to the London clubs; at one to which he belonged Lord Ashford had accidentally overheard the affair discussed, and while uttering a half frantic inquiry as to the speaker's authority, was seized with a fit, from which he recovered only to remain a heart-broken man, paralysed and childish. Charles finding him in this deplorable state, was of course unable to leave him, and wrote to Laura, to beg that no unnecessary delay might occur, to prevent her joining him as soon as possible.—Under these circumstances, General Grant resolved to proceed to England at once, with the party under his charge.

When Frere's anxiety for Lewis's life had ended, and he felt satisfied that he was on the road towards recovery, and might safely be entrusted to the care of Antonelli, he had made his way to the Palazzo Grassini, and seeking an interview with General Grant, had explained to him the object which had brought him to Venice, together with the train of events which had hitherto prevented his announcing his arrival.—He gave an account of the fracas between Lord Bellefield and Lewis at the casino, and his friend's subsequent self-conquest, in resolving for conscience sake to forego his revenge: but he said nothing of Lewis's attachment to Annie, feeling that he had no right to betray his confidence to the General, without personally obtaining his consent to the measure.

General Grant was much interested by this recital, and praised Lewis's conduct throughout the whole affair, the shock of Lord Bellefield's death having taken away any little prejudices in favour of duelling, which might have lingered in the chivalrous mind of the old soldier. He thought, however, that considering the relative positions of the different parties, it would be better for him not to visit Lewis, so soon after the awful catastrophe which had taken place, but he sent him a kind message by Frere, saying, he should hope to see him on his return to England, and thanking him for his interference in Walter's behalf.

On the morning previous to that fixed for the departure of Laura and her friends, Lewis, having over-exerted himself the day before by painting for several hours, and having paid the penalty by lying awake during great part of the night, had fallen into a deep sleep which lasted so long, that Frere, having breakfasted and given orders that Lewis was on no account to be disturbed, went out. He had undertaken, with his usual good nature, innumerable commissions for the General; these he set to work diligently to execute, and after wandering up and down the lanes and squares of Venice, now trudging like an excited postman, now sitting bolt upright in the stern of a Gondola, with the cotton umbrella spread like a gigantic mushroom over his head to keep off the sun, he arrived, hot and tired, at the Palazzo Grassini. General Grant was from home, so Frere left a card, saying, he would call again later in the afternoon; then, considering on second thoughts that it would not be kind, as he had been out so long, to leave Lewis again on the same day, he altered his determination, and desiring to be shown into the library, sent a message to ask to be allowed to speak to Mrs. Leicester, or to Miss Grant. Now the servant to whom this message was entrusted, being, like many of his betters, averse to needless trouble, and chancing to encounter Annie as he was proceeding from the library to the drawing-room, saw fit slightly to alter the tenor of his message, and leaving out all mention of Laura, informed Miss Grant that a gentleman of the name of Frere, having called to visit the General, had, on learning that he was from home, asked to be allowed to see her. This intelligence slightly flurried Annie, Frere being always connected in her mind with the idea of Lewis, and it was not without a degree of trepidation which mantled her cheek with a most becoming blush, that she hastened to comply with his summons.

When Frere perceived who it was that his message had produced, a scheme, which had suggested itself to him as a vague possibility, as he had sat by Lewis's bedside listening to the ravings of his delirium, recurred to his mind, as a right and advisable step which it behoved him to take, now that chance had thrown the opportunity in his way; his first business, however, was to deliver himself of the commissions entrusted to him by the General. Having relieved his mind of the weight of this responsibility, he began,—

"Well, Miss Grant, I'm glad to see you looking better than you wore. I suppose it's the"—(having got rid of your detestable engagement, was his original sentence, but he checked himself, and substituted,) "idea of getting away from this horrid place, all puddles and palaces, the men every one of them either a tyrant or a slave, and such lazy rascals into the bargain; the women, not at all the style of female to talk to you about; and without any particular beauty to account for it either, as far as I'm a judge, though perhaps in my present position I'm a little bit over fastidious; then Rose Arundel is as near perfection as anything on this earth can be—but I'm forgetting you don't know anything of the matter, and all that I'm saying must be high Dutch, or thereabouts to you."

And having by this time talked himself into a regular entanglement, the worthy bear came to a sudden and unexpected stand-still. Annie hastened to relieve him.

"You have, indeed, let me into a secret, Mr. Frere," she said, smiling; "but it is quite safe in my hands, and it is a secret, moreover, which I am delighted to hear; there is no one in whose happiness I take deeper interest than in that of dear Rose Arundel, and I quite approve of the step you hint at, as being likely to secure it; you must allow me to offer you my warmest congratulations."

"Thank ye, thank ye," returned Frere, looking most comically bashful, and routing his hair about insanely in his embarrassment, "I certainly do hope to make her happy, God bless her; though I don't think you can judge much about it, one way or other, seeing that I may be a Bear in reality, (she calls me one in fun, you know,) meaning to eat her up bodily for aught you can tell. As to its being much of a secret, too many people know it, too many women in particular, to render that possible; so, though I don't want it announced in the Times till the event actually comes off, you need not put any violent constraint upon your natural communicativeness, for I am not so ignorant of the idiosyncracies of the fair sex, as to forget the pain and grief constrained silence occasions them."

Annie made a playful rejoinder, and then after a minute's pause ventured timidly to ask, "I hope Mr. Arundel continues to gain strength. I,—that is, my father,—and indeed, all of us were so grieved to hear of his illness!"

Frere fixed his large eyes upon hers, as he replied gruffly, "Yes, he's getting on well enough for anything I know to the contrary; but he's as weak as a child. It will be months before he becomes anything like the man he was, again; he's been most unpleasantly near supplying a vacancy in some moist grave-yard of this amphibious city; small thanks to those who helped to bring him to such a condition."

Annie turned very pale at this somewhat unfeeling speech, but she managed to stammer out, "I thought, that is, we were told that it was a fever produced by exposure to malaria, from which Mr. Arundel had suffered."

"A fever it was, and no mistake," was the reply, "such a fever as I should be very sorry to fall in the way of catching, I can tell you."

"And yet you have nursed him through it with the most unceasing self-devotion. You see I know you better than you are aware of, Mr. Frere," interrupted Annie, with a beaming smile.

"Nursed him! why of course I did; if I hadn't, I should have deserved to be well kicked," returned Frere, in a tone of intense disgust. "I've known Lewis ever since he was a pretty black-eyed boy of ten years old, and though he is a little hot-headed and impetuous sometimes, that's no reason why I should leave him to die of a fever in a foreign land, far away from those that love him. A nice sort of friend I should be if I did, and a pretty figure I should cut the next time I came in Rose's way! She is not one of those who care about people by halves, I can tell you; why, she actually dotes on her brother."

"Oh! I am sure she does; it was that which first made me love her," exclaimed Annie with enthusiasm; then seeing all that her speech involved, she blushed "celestial rosy red," and cast down her eyes in confusion.

"Humph!" grunted Frere, "that sounds all very nice and amiable, but I prefer deeds to words! I'll tell you what it is, Miss Grant," he continued, turning suddenly upon Annie, "you talked about malaria being the exciting cause of Lewis's illness, it was no such thing—the cause of his fever was anguish of mind—the poor boy's been miserable for the last two years, almost crazy with grief, as I take it, for he has been doing all sorts of wild uncomfortable things; and, if the truth must be told, it strikes me it's more your fault than any one else's."

"My fault!" exclaimed Annie, her face and neck flushing crimson, at this unexpected charge, "oh Mr. Frere, how can you speak such cruel words?"

"Because they happen to be true ones, young lady," returned Frere, sternly; "you are the daughter of a rich man, and a man in a high station, and for that reason, it's very seldom you have the plain honest truth spoken to you; but you shall learn it to-day from my lips, if you never heard it before in your life, and if it is not palatable, the fault does not rest with me,—I knew something of this affair, when Lewis quitted Broadhurst all in a hurry, two years ago, and I set it down as a foolish bit of boyish romance, that a few months' absence would cure; but it was not till I watched by his bed-side, and listened through the solemn hours of the night to his frenzied ravings, that I became aware the passion he felt for you was rooted in his very heart's core, and saw that by his deep, his overpowering love for one, who I fear was not worthy of him, he had shipwrecked the happiness of a lifetime. Silence!" he continued, angrily, as Annie half rising from her seat, seemed about to interrupt him,

"silence! you have voluntarily, or involuntarily, been the cause of deep misery to the two persons (for Rose has suffered greatly on her brother's account,) for whom I care most in the world, and you shall learn, before we part, the evil consequences of your acts, and tell me whether you possess either the will or the power to repair them."

Annie again attempted to speak, but finding her accuser would not listen to her, sank back with a gesture of despair, while Frere continued,—

"Very early in his residence at Broadhurst, Lewis, as I imagine, became attached to you, though for a long time he would not acknowledge the fact even to himself; at length, however, it became impossible for him to deceive himself further; then began the struggle between his pride and his affection; and from that period to the hour in which he quitted Broadhurst, he lived in a state of mental torture. Well, you could not help his falling in love with you, you will say; and because a poor tutor was bold and foolish enough to forget the difference of position between you, (which by the way he never did for one moment, though the recollection was agony to his proud spirit,) and to raise his eyes to his employer's daughter, you were not bound to forget it also,—I grant you that—but shall I tell you what you could have helped? (which I should never have known anything about, but for poor Lewis's delirious ravings,)—you could have helped saying and doing a hundred little nameless things, trifles in themselves perhaps, (so are straws, but they show which way the wind blows!) which gave the poor fellow the idea, that you returned his affection, and that had he dared to declare his feelings, he might have obtained such a confession from you; an attempt which he was too honourable to make, but rather, with an aching heart, tore himself away from Broadhurst, throwing up every prospect he then had in life:—you might have helped this, Miss Annie Grant, and if you had been worthy of the love of such a noble nature, you would have done so."

As Frere, completely carried away by the excited feelings which his recapitulation of Lewis's wrongs and sufferings had aroused, paused for breath, poor Annie, who during the latter portion of his harangue had been utterly unable to restrain her tears, replied in a voice scarcely audible through emotion,—

"You cruelly misjudge me, Mr. Frere—most cruelly—and are making an unkind and ungenerous use of knowledge, which if your friend had retained his reason, would never have been in your possession."

Frere felt the justice of this reproach, and moreover the sight of poor Annie's tears appealed to his kindness of heart, and served to disarm his wrath.

"Well, that is certainly true," he said, "and if I have indeed misjudged you, why I can only say I am very sorry for it; at all events I need not have spoken so harshly and rudely to you; but you see, Miss Grant, I feel very deeply about this matter, and the idea that all which Lewis has suffered had been the consequence of your love of admiration, and idle coquetry, made me angry with you."

"Indeed, indeed, I am no coquette," murmured poor Annie.

"Well, you seem to have behaved like one, at all events," returned Frere, "unless indeed," he continued, as a new light suddenly broke in upon him—"unless indeed you really do by any chance care about Lewis as much as he cares about you,—of course, in that event, you would be more to be pitied than blamed"—he paused; then, after a moment's reflection, continued, "but no, that cannot be either;—if you had really loved Lewis, you would scarcely have engaged yourself to another man, before he had been out of the house four-and-twenty hours—what do you say to that? eh, young lady!"

Poor Annie! heavily indeed did her fault press upon her; most bitterly did she repent the weakness of character which had prevented her from refusing to engage her hand, when her heart went not with it. What could she say? Why she could only sob like an unhappy child, and whisper in a broken voice,—

"I will send Laura to you,—ask her, she knows all—she can tell you."

And so running out of the room, she threw herself upon her friend's neck, and begged her incoherently and vaguely, to "go immediately to him, and explain everything;" with which request Laura, when she had provided the solitary pronoun with a chaperon, in the shape of a concordant noun, and restricted the transcendental "everything" to mean the one thing needful in that particular case, hastened to comply.

The commission was rather a delicate one, and the excellent Bear did not render the execution thereof the less difficult, by choosing to take a hard-headed, moral, and common-sense view of Annie's conduct, which confused Laura to such a degree, that in her desire to be particularly lucid, she contrived to entangle the matter so thoroughly, that a person with greater tact and more delicate perceptions than the rough and straightforward Frere, might have found the affair puzzling.

"Well, I tell you what it is, Mrs. Leicester," he at last exclaimed abruptly, "if you were to talk to me till midnight, which, seeing you've a long journey before you to-morrow, would be equally fatiguing and injudicious, you would never be able to convince me that your young friend acted wisely. The idea of accepting that unhappy man, (whose death, between ourselves, was a gain to everybody but himself, though, of course, I shall not say so to poor Charles, who, in his amiability, contrived to have a sort of fondness for his brother;) but the notion of accepting him to prevent anybody guessing she was in love with Lewis, seems to me about the most feeble-minded expedient that ever occurred to the imagination, even of a woman; it's like cutting one's throat to cure a sore finger. I don't admire the principle of judging actions by their results, or I should say the result of this has been just what I should have expected, viz. everybody has been made miserable." However, though she has done a foolish thing, that is very different from doing a deliberately wicked one.

So I suppose we must not be too hard upon her, poor little thing; I dare say Lewis, at all events, will be magnanimous enough to overlook it, in consideration of her correct taste in properly appreciating his good qualities; however, I'll do my best to explain the matter to him, and put it in as favourable a light as my conscience will allow me. And so wishing you a good journey, I'll be off. I have a notion it won't be very long before Lewis and I shall follow you; we shall not be many hours in England before we beat up your quarters, depend upon it. Lewis will have some strange revelations to make to Governor Grant, that will cause his venerable locks to stand on end in amazement. Ah! it's a queer world. Well, good-bye, Mrs. Leicester; I expect you and I should become good friends in time, though you're quite mistaken if you fancy that young woman acted sensibly in accepting her scampish cousin, when all the time she was in love with another man."

And so Richard Frere fairly talked himself out of the house, leaving Laura especially astonished at his brusquerie, and decidedly of opinion, that she had mismanaged the affair, and done her friend's cause irreparable injury.

In the meantime, Lewis, having awoke from his long sleep, and finding himself all the better and stronger for his nap, had just breakfasted with much appetite, when Antonelli appeared, and handed him a note. It was from Laura, (written before her interview with Frere,) informing him of their intended departure on the morrow, begging him to call upon her immediately he returned to England, which, as soon as his health would permit, she advised him to do without loss of time, and winding up with a hint, that, in regard to the matter which especially interested him, he might make himself quite easy, for that everything could be most satisfactorily explained.

Lewis read and re-read the note. "The matter that especially interested him!"—that could have but one meaning. Oh, yes! Annie had cleared herself,—she had never accepted Lord Bellefield; or, if she had, she had been cheated into doing so. Annie was good and true,—the Annie of his imagination—the bright, fair, loving, gentle being his soul worshipped! But he must have certainty,—he must not again be the dupe of his own wishes; no, he must have certainty, and he must have it at once. Wait till his return to England? Why, that might be days, weeks hence! And was he all that time to suffer the tortures of suspense? It was not to be thought of. He must see Laura before her departure, and learn the truth. But this would necessitate a visit to the Palazzo Grassini, in which he must run the chance of encountering the General, or Annie. And as his thoughts reverted to her, the idea, for the first time, occurred to him, of the mental suffering she must have undergone if, as he now believed, she had indeed truly loved him, and been in some manner forced by circumstances to consent to the engagement with her cousin. Then he remembered the scene in the Square of St. Mark; and a sense of the cruelty of his own conduct towards her overwhelmed him. This decided the question. He would, at all risks, see Laura; and if—as he now would not for a moment doubt—her explanation proved satisfactory, he would entreat her to obtain Annie's forgiveness. She must forgive him, when she came to know all he had suffered—when she heard how ill he had been: and as he thought of his illness, the somewhat perplexing question occurred to him, How was he to reach the Palazzo Grassini in his present weak state? Never mind; where there was a will there was a way. He would do it, he was determined; and so he summoned Antonelli, and, to the alarm of that worthy man, who fancied the fever had again flown to the brain, and that his beloved master was delirious, announced that he was going out to pay a visit, and requested his assistance in dressing himself.

It was not till his toilet was completed, and he attempted to walk down stairs, that he became aware how weak and helpless his illness had left him, and it required all his resolution to persevere in his expedition: luckily the distance was short, and he was enabled to perform some of it in a gondola; still, by the time he reached the Palazzo Grassini, his strength was so completely exhausted, that if he had been required to proceed a hundred yards further, he would have been unable to accomplish the task. Having inquired if Mrs. Leicester was at home, and received an answer in the affirmative, he continued,

"Then show me at once up to her boudoir, I will hold you blameless for doing so."

The servant, who knew how intimate Lewis had been there, before the coming of the Grant party, and how his visits had ceased with their arrival, naturally enough conjectured that the young painter was for some reason desirous to avoid encountering any of the General's family, and complied with his request unhesitatingly. But the domestic in question, who chanced to be the same individual who had admitted Frere, was not aware of the additional, and to the parties concerned, somewhat important fact, that since he had performed that service, Miss Grant and his mistress had changed places, and that at the moment he was conducting Lewis to the boudoir, that apartment was tenanted by Annie Grant, while Laura was engaged in solemn conclave with Richard Frere in the library. Thus it fell out that when the door of the boudoir was noiselessly opened, Annie Grant, who had remained there after she had despatched Laura on her difficult mission to Ursa Major, and more majorum, from the time of Niobe downwards, had indulged her feelings with a hearty cry, was wiping her eyes, and trying to make herself believe that her troubles must be "working to an end," and that, dim on the horizon of her future fate, there might be discerned a good time coming. Annie thus pondering, and thus engaged, saw a tall bending figure enter, in whose well-known features, their expression softened and spiritualized by severe illness, she needed no announcement to recognise Lewis Arundel.

CHAPTER LXIV.

RELATES HOW, THE ECLIPSE BEING OVER, THE SUN BEGAN TO SHINE AGAIN.

THE windows of Laura's boudoir were shaded from the burning rays of an Italian sun, by (literally) Venetian blinds, which kept out not only the heat, but in great measure the light also; and Lewis, whose eyes were dizzy, and his head swimming from weakness, perceiving a female figure advancing towards him, naturally conjectured it to be Laura, and accosted her as follows,—

"You are no doubt surprised to see me here, but after perusing your note, I could not rest till I had learned the truth from your own lips, and as you are to quit Venice to-morrow, there was no time to lose; so I resolved, couste qui couste, to make the effort, and here I am."

He paused for a reply, but obtaining none, looked up in surprise, and perceived Annie Grant standing pale and trembling before him: completely overcome by this unexpected encounter, he contrived to stammer out,—

"I beg pardon, I believed I was addressing Mrs. Leicester. I must go and seek her;" and turned to put his design into execution: but his strength was unequal to the task, and leaning against a marble slab, he remained motionless, utterly unable to proceed. For a moment, Annie paused as if thunder-stricken, then her woman's heart awoke within her, and in an instant she was by his side, bringing a chair for him to sit down.

"Oh! Mr. Arundel, how wrong, how mad of you to venture out," she exclaimed, her anxiety for him overpowering every other feeling; "you will bring on a return of the fever. Why, you are so weak that you can scarcely stand; pray sit down."

Advancing a step, Lewis took the chair from her, and leaning on the back for support, said, with a faint smile,—

"I have indeed somewhat miscalculated my strength, Miss Grant; I am very, very weak," and as he spoke he sank upon the seat, while the bright flush, which the excitement of beholding Annie had called into his cheeks, faded to the most deathlike paleness: his companion became alarmed.

"You are faint," she said, "let me ring for assistance."

A tray, with a decanter of water and some glasses, stood upon a table near; Lewis's eye fell upon them.

"It is merely the unaccustomed exertion," he said, "it will pass away in a moment."

Annie caught the direction of his glance. "You would like a glass of water," she exclaimed, "let me give you one;" and suiting the action to the word, she filled a glass with the sparkling liquid, and handed it to him. He took it with a slight inclination of the head, drank it eagerly, and was about to rise, in order to put down the glass, when Annie, by a deprecating gesture, prevented him, and taking it from his trembling fingers replaced it on the table. As she turned from doing so, their eyes met, and she perceived that his were fixed on her features, with a deep, earnest, scrutinising gaze, as though he strove to read in her countenance the history of her inner life. For a moment she met his gaze, with a firm, truthful, unshrinking look; then, unable to bear the power of that eagle eye, she turned away with a blush and a smile, half tender, half reproachful, for Annie was no stoic, and every feeling of her heart revealed itself in her tell-tale countenance. Lewis could bear it no longer—speak he must.

“Miss Grant—Annie,” he said, and as he pronounced her christian name his deep voice trembled with suppressed emotion; “When I came here to-day I had no thought of seeing you; but accident, (if, indeed, in this strange complicated life anything may be so considered,) has determined it otherwise, and the opportunity shall not be lost. Not very many days since, I was so grievously ill, that the chances were strongly against my rallying; it has pleased God to spare my life a little longer; but such an escape as this, gives rise to deep and solemn thoughts. While I lay upon the bed of sickness, which had so nearly proved the bed of death, I learned to read my own heart—my past life glided as it were in review before me, and my faults and errors, no longer hidden by the mists of self-deceit or of passion, revealed themselves clearly in the light of an awakened conscience: above them all, stood forth in its evil beauty, the master-demon pride, and I saw how it had embittered my whole existence, and how, if ever I hoped to obtain even peace of mind, much more happiness, I must relax no effort until I should subdue it. Annie, I have loved you long; you cannot, do not doubt it; but because I deemed you richer and of higher rank than myself, I was too proud to own it to you. Years of mental torture have been my punishment: I do not complain that this should have been so—I do not impugn the justice of the decree; on the contrary, I acknowledge it with deep contrition. I sinned, and it was fitting I should pay the penalty, however bitter;—but there was a grief I was not prepared for, and in which I could not discern retributive justice; for whatever a slanderous world may say, my love for you has been deep, pure and disinterested, the truest, most earnest feeling of my inmost soul. Annie, I will be frank with you, and even if my presumption ruins my cause, I have suffered too much from concealment, not to tell you the whole truth. When, distracted by my hopeless passion for you, and maddened by the insults of one who is now no more, I tore myself away from Broadhurst, and left you, as I deemed, for ever, the most bitter pang proceeded from a secret belief, which even despair could not banish, that I read in your soft glances the assurance that had I dared to urge my suit, I might have learned I had not loved in vain; and in the midst of my desolation I was happy, deeply happy, in the thought. Then, a ray of light broke in upon the darkness—a strange chain of events led to the discovery that I was heir to an ancient and honourable name and an ample fortune, and I waited but to obtain legal evidence of the fact, ere I hastened to tell you of my affection, in the fond hope of eliciting that I was beloved again: once assured of that, I determined that nothing should prevent my winning your hand—all obstacles must yield before such a love as mine. With these feelings burning in my breast, imagine the dismay which overwhelmed me, on learning by a letter from your father, that scarcely twenty-four hours after I had quitted Broadhurst, you, of your own free will, had renewed your engagement with your cousin. Hear me out,” he continued, as Annie, who with blushing cheeks and tearful eyes, had remained as though spell-bound, drinking in his every tone, attempted eagerly to interrupt him—“Hear me out, and then if you can explain this mystery, the devotion of a life-time shall plead forgiveness for my having misjudged you. How I lived through the wretchedness that letter caused me, I do not know. I believed I was going mad, for a time I was mad, and railed at Heaven for having created a being so fair and false as then I deemed you. Oh! the misery, the heavy crushing grief, when the heart adores, with all its faculty of loving, one whom the reason points out as light, fickle, and all unworthy to have called forth such true affection. For two years this black veil of doubt and mistrust hung between your image and my spirit—I cast from me any idea of claiming the rank and riches that were my birthright, for I valued them only as they could bring me nearer to you; and went forth a wanderer, tormented by the consciousness, doubly humiliating to one of my proud nature, that although I believed you unworthy of my affection, I still loved you devotedly as ever. The first person who won me from my gloomy thoughts, and led me to hope your conduct might be satisfactorily explained, was your kind friend Laura, who in her honest singleness of heart, could not believe in the possibility of the fickleness of which I imagined you guilty—and I, (though her arguments failed to convince my reason) how I loved her for her unbelief! I could say much more,—could tell you of the agony of mind I endured, when unseen by you, I watched you leaning on his arm, and smiling upon him, and deemed my worst fears realized, and that you loved him; but it is needless—Annie, I cannot look on you and believe you false; if indeed you ever loved me, I know that, despite appearances, you have been true to that affection, and that you love me still. Annie, dearest, tell me that it is so?”

He ceased, and with his hands clasped, as those of some votary adoring his saint, sat gazing on the April of smiles and tears, that played over the expressive features of her he loved, until reading in her tender eyes the secret her lips refused to speak, happiness lent him strength, and springing to her side, he drew her unresistingly towards him, and reproved the coral lips for their silence, by sealing his forgiveness upon them with a loving kiss. And as Annie, albeit there is no reason to doubt that she was an exceedingly moral and well-conducted young lady, did not appear to discern any great impropriety in this act, but on the contrary, disengaged herself from his embrace gently and tenderly, the probabilities are, looking at the matter in a correct light, and with an artist eye, (an optical delusion, popularly supposed to fulfil one of the main duties of charity, by clothing the naked,) that the view she took of the affair was a right one. And then by degrees, having declared that it was impossible she could ever tell him anything about it, but that Laura knew,—would not he go and ask Laura at once? (a proposition Lewis coolly but decidedly ignored,) she contrived, she never knew how, to enable him to guess the truth; which he did very quickly and cleverly, and found so perfectly satisfactory, that his anger (such mild anger!) instantly changed to the most unmitigated pity, an emotion so nearly akin to that other Christian virtue, love, that we fear we shall lay ourselves open to the charge of writing an actual love scene, if we pursue the subject any further. And as it is a well ascertained fact, that young persons strictly brought up, and never allowed to inflame their imaginations and gain perverted views of life, by perusing those inventions of the enemy of man- (and woman-) kind, works of fiction, either never fall in love at all, or do so according to parental act of parliament, passed in the year one of the reign of good king Mammon, we (lest we incur the high displeasure of any of this monarch's respectable subjects) will say no more about it. But when Laura, grieved at what she considered the unsatisfactory issue of her interview with Richard Frere, returned to her boudoir to make the best report her conscience would allow of to Annie, she was especially surprised, and a little frightened to discover her friend, with heightened colour, downcast eyes, and a bright smile playing about the corners of her mouth, sitting on a sofa by the side of what Laura would have taken for the ghost of Lewis Arundel, only that ghosts do not in a general way look so intensely happy, and are not usually addicted to holding young ladies' hands caressingly between their spectral fingers. However, the ghost soon vindicated his claim to the protection of the habeas corpus act, by rising and shaking Laura's hand cordially, and taking the initiative in conversation, by exclaiming—

"My dear kind Mrs. Leicester, I owe all my happiness to you."

Then Laura began to surmise what had happened, and in the excess of her joy, scolded Lewis so vigorously for his madness in venturing out, and Annie for her folly in allowing him to talk, that she was forced to stop in the midst of her harangue, to declare herself a virago, and to laugh so heartily at her own vehemence, that in order to save herself from becoming hysterical, she was fain to betake herself to her own bedroom, and indulge in the feminine luxury of a good cry. And then Lewis and Annie sat and looked into each other's eyes; their joy was too full for words, but such silence as theirs is far more eloquent, for as there is a grief too deep for tears, so is there happiness which language is powerless to express, and such happiness did they experience at that moment. At length, Lewis spoke.

"Dearest," he said, in a low soft voice that trembled with the tenderness which filled his soul, "I must leave you now: there are many reasons which forbid my meeting your father till we reach England, and I am prepared to prove to him, all that your trustful loving heart believes, because I tell you that it is so. Until we meet in our own happy country, which for the future will be as dear to me for your sake, as lately it has been for the same cause hateful, our engagement must remain a secret from all but Laura."

"But will that be right?" pleaded Annie, looking up wistfully into the face of him who would be from thenceforth her oracle.

It is a fearful responsibility when, through the affections, we gain such a hold over a living soul, that the judgment lies dormant, and the thing which seems good in our eyes appears so in theirs also; such influence is indeed a mighty talent committed to our charge, and most careful should we be lest we abuse the trust reposed in us. Lewis felt this strongly, and paused to re-consider his decision. His chief reason for wishing that General Grant might not be immediately informed of his declaration, was the difficult position in which it would place that gallant officer in regard to Lord Bellefield's relations. How could he, for instance, expect Lord Ashford to believe that his brother-in-law had used all possible exertion to secure the murderer of his son, when Annie Grant, that son's destined bride, was affianced to a man who, but for the catastrophe which had taken place, would have met Lord Bellefield in a duel? and the altercation and subsequent challenge were so completely a matter of notoriety in Venice, that it was certain that some account of them, probably an exaggerated and distorted one, would find its way to England. But this was a reason which he could not give Annie, as he correctly imagined that the affair at the Casino had been kept from her knowledge. Thus, the more he reflected the more certain he became that his original determination was a right one. Accordingly, he replied:—

"Trust me, dearest, concealment is as foreign to my nature as to your own. My faults (and I have only too many) do not lie in that direction; but, to the best of my judgment, I believe that in wishing your father should, for the present, remain ignorant of our engagement, I am consulting your interest and his, quite as much as my own. Believe me, love, I would sacrifice anything,—even the cherished hope of one day calling you my own, rather than influence you to do aught for which your conscience could afterwards upbraid you."

And Annie did believe him, with the strong unhesitating faith of perfect love. Had he advanced the most incredible assertion,—declared, for instance, that he had discovered perpetual motion, squared the circle, and set the Thames on fire,—Annie would equally and implicitly have believed him. Had he deceived her, her only refuge from an universal scepticism would have been to die. Then came the "sweet sorrow" of a lovers' parting,—sweet in the many evidences of affection which the occasion calls forth, and sorrowful by reason of the anxious thoughts to which quitting those we love, even under the happiest auspices, necessarily gives rise. And Annie's bright eyes were dim with tears, and Lewis's mouth, no longer sternly compressed, trembled with the emotion he in vain attempted to conceal, as, with a murmured "God bless and protect you, my own darling!" he tore himself away.

In the meanwhile, scarcely had Richard Frere quitted the Grassini Palace, than he encountered General Grant, fretting and fuming under the weight of a burden of minor miseries, and full of complaints of the abominable misdemeanours of the Venetian officials, amongst which, by no means the lightest, was the culpable stupidity which prevented them from speaking or understanding English, together with the obstinate prejudice with which they refused to acknowledge, that by adding the letter O to the termination of words in that language, they immediately became Italian—

"I said 'requiro uno passporto' to them, sir! half-a dozen times over, and nobody shall ever make me believe they did not know what that meant!" was his indignant complaint.

Of course, Frere's ready sympathy entailed on him a request that if he could spare the time to go back to the office with him, the General would esteem it such a great favour, and of course, though his conscience reproached him for being away from "poor solitary Lewis" for so many hours, he did what was required of him; and of course, having said A,—B, C, and D, followed as a matter of necessity, until, before he had gone through the alphabet of the General's commissions, several hours had elapsed, and Lewis having found his way back to his lodgings, was reclining in an easy chair, enjoying a feast of happy memories, and bright anticipations, when Frere, hot, tired, and dissatisfied with his morning's work, flung down his cotton umbrella, and throwing himself, very much unbuttoned, in a kind of dishevelled heap, upon the nearest chair, began—

"Well, confound this climate, say I, where a man can't get through a morning's business without coming home more like a piece of hot boiled beef, than a temperate Christian—here's a state of dissolution for a free-born Briton to be in. I tell you what it is, young man, if you keep me here much longer, I shall become a mere walking skeleton—flesh and blood literally can't stand it, and I shall have to go home and be married in my bones."

"By which ceremony I suppose you hope to become possessed of an additional rib, to make up for your loss of substance," suggested Lewis, smiling at the odd quaint way in which his friend described his troubles.

"Yes! it's all very well for you to sit there and laugh at a fellow," returned Frere, grumpily, "but if you had been parading about this oven of a place for two hours, at Governor Grant's tail, as I have been, you would find it no such laughing matter, I can tell you. He is as obstinate and wrong-headed as an elderly mule, too; making a fuss about trifles that do not signify a bit, one way or the other. Why cannot he take life coolly and quietly as—as—?"

Here he came to an abrupt conclusion, having discovered that the grumbling tenor of the speech, was somewhat at variance with the ending he had intended to make to it,—viz. "as I do." Lewis finished it for him.

"As a sensible man should do, I suppose you were going to observe."

Frere detected the covert satire, and shook his fist threateningly at his friend.

"You had better be civil, you know, or I may be tempted to give you the thrashing I have owed you so long. I could not have a better opportunity than now, when you are so weak that you can scarcely walk across the room alone."

"Perhaps I may be stronger than you are aware of," returned Lewis; "what do you think about my being able to go out, for instance?"

"Think," replied Frere dogmatically, "why, I think that if you attempt it a week hence, it will be too soon. Dr. Fullerfee says, a fortnight, but his is scarcely an unprejudiced opinion; however, I'll take care you don't set foot outside this room within a week."

Lewis turned away to hide a smile, while Frere, still suffering from heat, and not having another available button, which could be respectably unfastened, pulled off his neckcloth, and thus relieved, resumed—

"Who do you think I've been lecturing this morning?"

Lewis professed his ignorance, and Frere continued, "Only a certain young lady, in whose proceedings I've an idea you take particular interest,—one Miss Annie Grant."

Lewis started as Frere pronounced this name, but recovering himself, asked in an elaborately indifferent tone of voice, "Pray when did this interesting colloquy take place, and what might be the subject thereof?"

"The colloquy, as you call it, took place some four hours ago; and the subject thereof, was the young woman's conduct towards your precious self. Now, don't go and fly into a passion," continued Frere, as Lewis coloured, and seemed about to make some hasty rejoinder; "remember, life ought to be taken easily and quietly by a sensible man, and of course you consider yourself one,—but I took the liberty to tell Miss General Grant a few home truths, that she will be none the worse for hearing."

He then proceeded after his own fashion to give an account of his conversation with Annie, and his subsequent interview with Laura, concluding his recital thus,—

"So the upshot of the whole affair, and a very unsatisfactory one I'm afraid you'll think it, is this. When you had left Broadhurst, Ma'amselle Annie found herself in a bit of a fix, and not being a man or Rose Arundel, she, after the fashion of her silly sex, did a weak and injudicious thing; but as I said to the other young woman, who, by the way, seems to have the best sense of the two, that's very different from doing a deliberately wicked one, and therefore, perhaps, Lewis may be induced to look over it."

"For heaven's sake, my dear fellow, don't tell me any more about it, you will drive me frantic with your detestable common-sense platitudes," exclaimed Lewis, springing from his chair impatiently; "at least you would have done so," he continued more quietly, "if I had not happened to see Annie myself since your well-meant but somewhat unnecessary interview with her, and learned from her own sweet lips that she forgives me for having so hastily and ungenerously misjudged her."

"Eh! what! has the young woman been here in my absence," returned Frere, greatly scandalized. "Oh! this will never do! I don't allow such liberties to be taken with my patient; besides, I don't consider the proceeding by any means a correct one; she might have found you in bed, with your nightcap on, for aught she could tell to the contrary."

"Do you know what is reported to have occurred when a mountain refused to come at Mahomet's bidding?" asked Lewis, quietly.

"Why Mahomet went to the mountain, to be sure, like an arrant humbug as he was; but what has that got to do with the case in question? Why you don't mean to say," continued Frere, as a sudden light broke in upon him; "you don't mean to say that you've been to call upon her?"

"I am afraid I must confess that such is the alarming fact," was the cool reply.

"Well! I have known many insane actions in my life certainly," growled Frere, making fruitless attempts to re-unbutton his already enfranchised garments, "but this,"—here he nearly tore a wristband off his shirt, in his pursuit of coolness under difficulties,— "is the very maddest thing I ever did hear of—a man that was on the point of death here not ten days ago, to rush out of bed the moment one's back's turned, for the sake of seeing—"

"She is looking so sweetly pretty, Frere," interrupted Lewis; "and those eyes—there never were such eyes seen in the world before."

"Oh, of course not," returned Frere, viciously. "Patent double-acted high-pressure sky-blue revolvers, made to look every way at once, see through mill-stones, and peep round the corner into the Margain, they are, no doubt; but if she could use them to no better purpose than to lure out, at the risk of his life, a foolish boy that ought to have had more sense;—but it's a mere waste of words talking to you," he continued, catching a smile on Lewis's features; "and here have I gone and ruined my other shirt, and this one is at the wash,—psha! I mean to say—hang me, if I know what I mean to say—only if you're not the worse for this—both the boy, how absurdly happy he's looking! So it's all right between you, eh! Lewis? Well, Heaven knows, you have suffered enough to deserve that it should be so, my poor fellow, and though you must have been mad to go out, and I ought to be very angry with you, yet, as it has ended, and always supposing it does not do you any harm, why I am heartily glad you did it;" and so saying, Frere, whose feelings, and the heat together, were decidedly too many for him, made a precipitate retreat into the bed-room, where, for the present, we will leave him.

CHAPTER LXV.

LEWIS OUT-GENERALS THE GENERAL, AND THE TRAIN STOPS.

LEWIS's recovery was not retarded by his imprudent visit to the Palazzo Grassini; and Frere had the satisfaction, ere many weeks elapsed, of perceiving that he was strong enough to render their return to England practicable. Accordingly, the Giaour pictures, and the sketch of Annie and Faust, were carefully packed, (Lewis having determined to retain them as mementos of that eventful portion of his career, which led to their execution,) old Antonelli received a present of money sufficient to enable him to carry out the darling wish of his heart, viz. to bestow upon his son the education of a painter; and Lewis and Frere having wound up their affairs in Venice, quitted that city, which, filled with a rabble of revolutionary demagogues and their dupes, had become no longer a desirable place of residence. The friends reached England without any adventures worthy of record; and Rose was compensated for many a weary hour of anxiety and suspense, by her joy in welcoming her brother, and learning from his lips the unmitigated satisfaction with which he had heard of her engagement to Richard Frere; and how that "glorious fellow" had redoubled all his former obligations to him, by his sound advice, and tender and judicious nursing. If for a moment Frere could have regretted the part he had played, the loving smile of warm approval with which Rose received him, would have compensated him for any far greater expenditure of time and trouble. But Lewis had much to tell, which gave rise to very different emotions in his auditor; and Rose, as she grieved for the untimely fate of poor Jane Hardy, and shuddered at the awful retribution which had overtaken her betrayer, breathed a silent thanksgiving that her brother had been restrained from any deed of violence, to which his impetuous disposition, keen sensibilities, and quick sense of injury, might have impelled him. Lewis had also something to hear as well as to communicate.

Mrs. Arundel, in her spirit of opposition to the artless and bereaved relic of the late Colonel Brahmin, had carried her flirtation with that victim of literary ambition, Dackerel Dace, Esq. to such a pitch, that when the blighted barrister determined to resign his destiny altogether in favour of matrimony, and made her an offer of his limp hand, flabby heart, and five thousand a-year, to give piquancy and flavour to the tasteless and insipid "trifle" he tendered for her acceptance, that volatile matron felt, that she had committed herself too deeply to retract, and that, setting off the money against the man, the bargain after all might not be such a bad one, and so said "Yes." Rose disliked the match greatly herself, and fearing Lewis would do so still more strongly, she ventured upon a mild remonstrance; but when once she had taken a thing into her head, Mrs. Arundel was very determined, and Rose gained nothing, but an intimation half-earnest, half-playful, that as she (Mrs. Arundel) had not interfered with her daughter, when she chose to engage herself to Ursa Major, she expected the same forbearance (and she emphasized the vile pun most unmistakably,) to be exercised towards her, and her odd fish, by which nickname she irreverently paraphrased the ichthyological appellation of her "future."

Lewis, as Rose had feared, was both hurt and annoyed at this fresh and convincing proof of his mother's volatile and worldly nature, but there was nothing in the connexion to justify his taking measures to break off the match; Mrs. Arundel was perfectly free to do as she pleased, and competent to decide her own course in life; so after one conversation with her on the subject, the nature of which may be gathered from the result, he left the affair to take its own course. His first step on reaching London was to seek an interview with his legal adviser; their conference proving satisfactory, eventuated, (to use an affected but expressive word,) in sending for a patent cab, wherein Lewis ensconced himself, in company with a small lawyer and a large blue bag, and the trio drove to Park Crescent.

The feelings with which Lewis once again stood within the library of General Grant's mansion,—that library where he had first been engaged to act as poor Walter's tutor,—the room into which he and Annie had been shown on the night when he had rescued her from insult in the crush room of the opera,—the night of the unhappy Mellerton's suicide,—may well be imagined. Then he had been poor, friendless, in the situation of a dependent, and made to feel that situation, alike by the open insults of Lord Bellefield, and the frigid courtesy of the General and Miss Livingstone, his youth, inexperience, sensitive disposition, and proud impassioned nature, rendering all these trials doubly galling to him; while, still more to embitter his lot, came that "sorrow's crown of sorrow," his hopeless attachment to Annie. Now how different was his position! heir to an ancient and honourable name, and a princely fortune, his affection returned by her he loved, his rival swept from his path without his having to reproach himself with participation in the act which wrought his downfall, his mind strengthened, his principles raised, and his faults diminished, if not eradicated, by the struggle he had undergone, and above all, his soul fortified by the recollection that, through God's grace, he had been enabled, at the turning point of his career, to sacrifice everything rather than sin against his

Maker's law! He received a moderately cordial welcome from General Grant, which tepid reception was occasioned by a conflict in the mind of that noble commander, between his strong regard for Lewis, a sense of the obligations he lay under to him, and an uncomfortable recollection of his attachment to Annie, together with the moral impossibility of allowing his daughter to marry a man, whose present income consisted of the savings of an ex-tutorship, and whose prospects embraced the doubtful gainings of a professional artist; Lewis perceived his embarrassment, and rightly conjectured its cause, which it was the object of his visit to remove. But General Grant's cold imperturbability had caused him so much annoyance in bygone hours, that a slight spice of what the French term esprit malin actuated him, and under its influence he began, after a few desultory remarks—

"It may possibly not have escaped your memory, General, that, during a conversation I had the honour to hold with you before I finally quitted Broadhurst, I mentioned to you my devoted attachment to Miss Grant."

The General bowed in token of assent, but the cloud upon his brow grew darker. Not heeding this, Lewis continued:—

"I remember then expressing myself somewhat strongly against certain conventional prejudices relating to inequality of position, which opposed an effectual bar to the realization of my wishes. I was young and inexperienced then,—I have since become wiser in the ways of the world, and am perfectly aware, that in speaking as I did on that occasion, I alike wasted my words and your valuable time."

He paused; and the General, who had been considerably puzzled during the speech to make out what his companion might be aiming at, settled, to his own satisfaction, that the increased knowledge of human nature to which Lewis alluded, had shown the young man the folly of which he had been guilty, and that this speech was intended as an apology,—nothing could be more respectful and correct. Accordingly, the cloud vanished, as in his most gracious manner he replied:—"Sir, your observations do you credit. Pray set your mind at rest on this subject;—fortunately my daughter never had the slightest suspicion of your feelings towards her; and, for my own part, I have long ago dismissed the affair from my recollection; and you may rest assured, that in our future intercourse the subject shall never again be broached between us."

As the General alluded to his daughter's happy ignorance of Lewis's attachment, a slightly ironical smile curled that young gentleman's handsome mouth; repressing it instantly, he replied with a calm, almost nonchalant air,—“I scarcely see how that can be accomplished, General Grant, as the object of my visit here to-day is to make you a formal proposal for your daughter's hand!”

If Lewis had suddenly risen from his chair, and, with the full power of his returning strength, hurled that article of furniture at General Grant's head, it might have knocked him down more literally than the foregoing speech, but, figuratively, nothing could have done so. For a minute or two he appeared utterly unable to frame a reply; then, drawing himself up to a degree suggestive of a telescopic conformation, he began in an awful tone of voice,—“Sir, you have astonished me,—nay, more than that, sir, you have disappointed me—very greatly disappointed me. I had hoped better things of you, sir;—I had hoped, from the early promise you evinced, that your judgment and good sense would, when matured and strengthened by a little more knowledge of the world, have enabled you to conquer your strangely misplaced attachment,—would, in fact, have saved me from the painful situation in which you have—to which you have—that is—you would have saved yourself (you must not blame me, sir, if the truth sounds unpalatable) the humiliation of a refusal.”

“Then I am to understand that you unhesitatingly reject my suit?” inquired Lewis, something of the old stern look coming across his features.

“Most unequivocally and decidedly,” was the concise reply.

“It would have been more courteous, and therefore more according to General Grant’s usual conduct, towards those whom he considers beneath him in the social scale, to inquire whether any, and, if so, what amelioration might have taken place in my future prospects, to have induced me to hazard so bold a step, ere my proposal was thus unmistakably declined,” observed Lewis, in a marked, yet respectful tone of displeasure; “it will, however, make no difference in my intentions, as when I shall have obtained your answers to a few important questions, and explained to you my object in making them, it is possible you may view my conduct in a different light.”

The General, who grew taller and stiffer every moment, merely acknowledged this speech by an inclination of the head, so slight as to be scarcely perceptible; and Lewis continued,—

“The late Sir Hugh Desborough, Walter’s grandfather, was, I believe, your intimate friend?”

“Bless my soul, yes, sir; we served together in India, were for six years in the same regiment, and lived as if we were brothers. Why do you ask such extraordinary questions?” exclaimed the General, startled completely out of his dignity.

“Because, in that case, you are probably well acquainted with the circumstances of his family history, and can set me right if I state them incorrectly,” replied Lewis, upon whom the mantle of the General’s cast-off dignity appeared suddenly to have fallen; “Sir Hugh had two sons, I believe; the elder married imprudently, quarrelled with his father, who refused to receive the lady he had espoused, and severing all family ties, lived abroad under a feigned name, and was believed to have died without issue. The second son was Walter’s father, and Walter inherits the baronetcy, in default of male issue of the elder son.”

He paused, and the General observed, “You are correct in your facts, sir, but to what does all this lead?”

“That you will be better able to perceive, sir, when I inform you, that I am prepared to prove, indisputably, and to your full satisfaction, the following additional particulars. Sir Hugh’s eldest son, Captain Desborough—”

“Right; he was captain in the —th lancers, and threw up his commission when he chose to live abroad. It was said he entered the Austrian army, and attained the same rank in that service,” interrupted the General.

“He did so,” resumed Lewis, who spoke in the same calm, unimpassioned voice which he had used throughout the interview, though to any one who knew him well, it would have been perceivable that he did so by the greatest effort; “but those who believed that he died abroad, and without male issue, were misinformed; he died in England, in the spring of 18—, and left (besides a daughter) one son, who is still living.”

“Left a son! why he would be heir to the title and estates, instead of Walter. Where is he, sir? who is he?” exclaimed the General, impetuously.

Lewis rose, drew himself up to his full height, advanced slowly till he stood face to face with the General, and then, fixing his piercing glance upon him, said, “He now stands before you, General Grant, and asks you whether, when he has established his rights before the eyes of the world, you will again refuse him your daughter’s hand?”

Reader, the only little bit of mystery in our story, (if indeed it has presented any mystery at all to your acuteness,) is now cleared up; and, the interest ended, the sooner the tale itself arrives at a conclusion the better. But for the satisfaction of the unimaginative, the strong-minded women, and practical men of the world, who cannot rest assured that two and two make four till they have counted it on their fingers, we will write a few more last words, winding up the various threads of this veracious history.

In his interview with General Grant, Lewis had only stated that which he was fully prepared to prove; and when the lawyer and his blue bag, (not that lawyers ever do carry blue bags anywhere but in farces at the minor theatres, or those still more “unreal mockeries,” the pages of modern novels,) were called in to assist at the conference, the following facts were elicited:—

The packet of letters which Lewis found amongst Hardy’s papers, and which gave him the first intimation that he, and not poor Walter, was heir to the title and estates of Desborough, had been written by Captain Arundel, or, as his name really was, Desborough, to his younger brother, Walter Desborough, (the father of the poor idiot, who was in fact first-cousin to Lewis); the object with which these letters were written was to bring about a reconciliation between Sir Hugh and his eldest son—Walter Desborough having undertaken the office of mediator. In order to do this, it was first of all necessary to disabuse Sir Hugh’s mind of an idea that Captain Desborough's marriage was not valid, and that the children were illegitimate; for this purpose the wedding certificate was enclosed, (proving that he had been married in his own name, and by a properly constituted authority,) together with certificates of the baptism of Rose and of Lewis. The letters also contained an account of his having taken the name of Arundel, and his reasons for so doing; in fact, without going into minutiae, the letters contained complete evidence, legally to establish the identity of Captain Desborough and Captain Arundel, and to render Lewis's claim to the baronetcy indisputable. To account for their having been found among Hardy's papers, it must be borne in mind that Walter Desborough was the scoundrel who first roused the evil nature in that misguided man, by eloping with his wife;—Hardy, be it remembered, followed the guilty pair, and assaulted the betrayer of his honour to such good effect, as to confine him to his bed for months; his companion in crime returned to her father's house, and died shortly after giving birth to the unfortunate Miles.

When she returned to her father, she had brought with her a portable writing-case, in which were letters she had received from her seducer, previous to her elopement; in this desk, for convenience of travelling, Walter Desborough had placed papers of his own, and amongst others, the letters, &c. which he had shortly before received from his brother;—long ere he recovered from the effects of Hardy's chastisement, he had forgotten where he had placed these papers, and Hardy never discovering them, (he left his home, and enlisted as a soldier, on his release from the imprisonment the assault entailed upon him,) the letters were to all intents and purposes lost, till by a chapter of accidents they fell into the hands of Lewis. The shock which led to Captain Arundel's, (or Desborough as he should rightly have been called,) sudden death, was caused by reading an account of his father, Sir Hugh's demise, in the newspaper. The clue Messrs. Jones and Levi had gained, was from a shopman in the public library, in which Captain Arundel had been sitting, when he first became aware of his father's decease, who gathered, from an involuntary exclamation he made at the moment, that Sir Hugh Desborough's death was the subject which had so much excited him; this shopman had been a clerk of Messrs. Jones and Levi, and learning in their employ that knowledge was sometimes money as well as power, sold them, for a couple of sovereigns, the information he had acquired, giving at the same time an account of the strange death of Captain Arundel; hence their subsequent application to Lewis.

The evidence being so clear and full, Lewis had little difficulty in establishing his claim, more especially as General Grant, convinced of its justice, did not attempt to resist it on Walter's behalf. The poor fellow himself could not be made to comprehend his change of fortune; but he did comprehend, to his inexpressible delight, that for some reason or other he was always to live with his dear Mr. Arundel, who, when months had gone by, and arrangements made which he neither understood nor heeded, took him to a grand house of his own, where Faust was waiting to receive them, in a great state of boisterous tail-wagging affection; and when Faust, having licked them all over, and having made them damp, dusty, and rumped, in the excess of his love, had quite done with them, and gone back to a large bone on the drawing-room rug, and Lewis placing his arm round Walter's neck, had whispered to him that he was never to go away any more, and that he hoped before very long, Annie would come and live with them, Walter felt sure he had never known what it was to be quite happy till then, which fact he afterwards communicated to Faust in the strictest confidence.

Lewis's assertion in regard to Annie was not based on mere conjecture; for General Grant—albeit he felt that, in the interview we have lately recorded between himself and Lewis, he had been decidedly out-generalled—did not again reject his late tutor's proposal for his daughter's hand, but, on the contrary, with the usual self-knowledge of worldly elderly people, (that is, of those who, nine times out of ten, dictate the actions, and influence for weal or woe the future, of the young and generous-hearted,) the moment he became convinced that Lewis was about to inherit a baronetcy, and an income little short of 10,000*l.* a-year, contrived to persuade himself that when his first surprise had been passed, and he had become aware how deeply his daughter's happiness was involved, he should certainly have allowed her to unite herself with Sir Lewis Desborough, under his former phase of a precarious portrait-painter. But, if we had been Sir Lewis, we should have felt heartily glad we were not forced to rely on such a very "forlorn hope."

Rose, no longer Arundel, did not enjoy the name of Desborough many weeks, for although she had particularly desired to be married on the same day as Lewis and Annie, she yet yielded the point, when Ursa Major, hearing that General Grant would not allow his daughter's wedding to take place till a year after the death of Lord Bellefield, grew so outrageous, that Rose was forced to marry him out of the way, in order to prevent him from snapping and growling at every one that came near him. But this was Richard Frere's last bearish episode; for constant association with Rose softened his little asperity of temper, which, having arisen solely from the unloved and unloving existence he had been forced by circumstances to lead, disappeared in the sunshine of a happy home.

Lord Ashford did not long survive the loss of his eldest son, and Charley Leicester, the portionless younger brother, with "a good set of teeth and nothing to eat," is now a highly respectable peer of the realm, with a rent-roll to be computed by tens of thousands. Happy in the affection of his wife and children, (for "Tarley" has already had two successors to dispute the chance of being "spoiled by papa, only that mamma won't let him,") Charles, Lord Ashford, has but one trouble in life, though that unfortunately appears likely to prove an increasing one—viz.: that those confounded fellows, Schneider and Shears, won't make his waistcoats to fit him as they used to do, they are all too tight round the waist—and Schneider and Shears bear the blame meekly, having only last week discharged an injudicious foreman, who had been rash enough to declare that their excellent customer, Lord Ashford, was growing stout. For a short time, the Countess Portici resided with her brother and sister-in-law, Alessandro having obligingly got himself knocked on the head in the cause of liberty, the reversion of this popular watchword being about the only legacy he bequeathed to his young, interesting, and not particularly disconsolate widow, who having sown her romance, replaced the handsome Italian by a rich old French nobleman, Le Marquis de Carosse-Tranquille, irreverently translated by Bracy, who is still a bachelor and makes more puns than ever, into "My Lord Slow-Coach"—a title which the mental incapacities of that venerable foreigner rendered unpleasantly appropriate.

The mighty Marmaduke De Grandeville purchased with his wife's money a large estate in ———shire, which had belonged to his family some five hundred years before; he has since instituted a set of regulations for his tenantry, formed on the model of the feudal system, and if he be not prematurely suffocated by his own greatness, bids fair to "add a new lustre to the noble name which—ar—ahem!" &c. &c.

Mrs. Arundel carried out her design of marrying her "blighted barrister," and by her liveliness of disposition has done more towards removing the mildew from his mind than could have been expected. As, however, in accordance with her taste, they live chiefly abroad, Lewis and Annie see but little of them.

Miss Livingstone as she increased in years grew harsher, stiffer, and more frozen than ever, until one bitter winter's day, happening to catch a slight additional cold, her temperature sank below the point at which animal life can be maintained, and becoming rather stiffer and colder than usual, the first half of her patronymic ceased to be any longer appropriate—her last word was a cross one.—General Grant lived to a good old age, improving, under the influence of certain bright-eyed little Desboroughs, into a very amiable grandpapa.

The fate of Miles Hardy still remains a mystery; that he did not die of the wounds received in the death-struggle with Lord Bellefield, was ascertained; but whether he perished in the Italian revolution, in which he was known to take an active part, or, as was rumoured, escaped in safety to America, the few who are interested in him have failed to learn.

Annie and Lewis, after their stormy transit along that portion of the Railroad of Life in which we have accompanied them, were, at length, happily united; their future fortunes yet lie hid amid the uncut leaves of the great book of Fate; but one thing we may safely predicate, viz., that whatever trials may be in store for them, they will find in their mutual affection a source of constant joy and consolation, of which the lonely-hearted and uncared-for are unhappily ignorant.

Reader, the RAILROAD OF LIFE is closed, nor is it at present the intention of its author to begin another tale in the pages of SHARPE. He would fain take leave of you in the simple words of the old Latin play-wright, "Valete et plaudite;" but if his consciousness of his own shortcomings forbids his seeking your applause, let him at least hope that you will not refuse your good wishes to your old acquaintance, FRANK FAIRLEIGH.

 NOTICES OF BOOKS.

"Hamon and Catar; or, The Two Races." A Tale. Simpkin and Marshall.—This tale has the advantage of rarity, being built up in a part of the kingdom of romance not much frequented by story-tellers. It is antediluvian; the scene lying partly in the city of Enoch, which, according to the 4th chapter of Genesis, was a city built by Cain and called after the name of his son, partly in the land of the descendants of Seth, and partly in the uninhabited country between them. The geography of the tale is, of course, very vaguely indicated; not so the dramatis personæ, who are brought before the reader vividly enough, and go through the business set down for them not in the least like antediluvian fossils, but like our contemporaries, in a semi-sublime state of barbaric civilization. The author, who has a great facility, we had well-nigh said a fatal facility of writing, shows much vigour and brilliancy of fancy, and no small share of the higher poetic faculty, imagination, but they both want to be trained in the way in which they should go. Still "Hamon and Catar" is a clever, decidedly a clever production, in a difficult department of literature. The very choice of such a subject is proof sufficient that its author is ambitious. But cleverness and ambition, with an active fancy and a bold imagination, are not sufficient for the achievement of excellence in this department, though they certainly go a great way towards attaining it. The rapid eager way in which the story runs on, (as if its writer never had occasion to pause in composition,) as well as the careless nature of the style, a curious mélange of naïveté, bombast, and common-place, alternating with passages of fair writing and effective eloquence, gives us an idea that the author is very young in years and younger still in literature. He wants little encouragement, we imagine, to sit down and write a much better book than the present, (it is probable that he has already written one,) but we are glad to offer him a few words in approval of the undoubted talent he has already displayed. "Hamon and Catar," with all its faults, is by no means a work of which he will be ashamed when he is ten years older. It is earnest, vigorous, and often highly poetic. The story is interesting; the characters are distinct and life-like; that is, like the sort of life to which we have been accustomed since the Deluge. We cannot say that they have anything of about them; but they certainly are not commonplace men and women. We might expect to meet such among the Kirgish Tartars or other inhabitants of Central Asia at the present day. They have a pleasant touch of wildness and romance about them. And if all the daughters of Cain were as good and self-sacrificing as Anna and Ada, we do not see clearly what the sons of Seth had to complain of after entering into the bonds of matrimony with them. We expected a story of

"The large utterance of the early gods"

"Woman wailing for her demon lover,"

from the first few pages, and were somewhat disappointed to come upon a mere human story of love and jealousy, and woman's devotion. We do not quite understand why the story could not have been told without the intervention of Cain. Our curiosity as to his whereabouts during the time of narration is never satisfied. There is something verging both on the impossible and the ridiculous, in a man's telling a story while he is "falling, falling eternally," and "the great universe on fire seems rushing after him into the Abysses." We do not presume to say that it might not be done in an antediluvian fiction; but we think that l'art difficile de bien conter was never exercised under such discomfortable circumstances, and we cannot help regretting that somebody else did not save Cain the additional trouble of telling a story à longue haleine.

"Historical Sketches and Personal Recollections of Manchester," is the title of a volume lately put into our hands, as emanating from the pen of Mr. Archibald Prentice, many years the editor of the Manchester Times. This gentleman is well known in Lancashire as one of those untiring advocates of progress, who have ever been found struggling in the foremost ranks for the extension of political rights and freedom of commerce. Our author has collected, in the work before us, the scattered records of the most important events which have occurred in Manchester during the forty years which preceded the passing of the Reform Act, and the consequent enfranchisement of that great centre of manufacturing industry. We see that his labours have attained to the distinction of a second edition, an honour not often conferred upon local histories, which must necessarily contain much that is uninteresting to the general reader, or be deficient in those details that constitute their chief merit in the localities they profess to describe. Mr. Prentice's pages comprise the origin and early records of that party which has in late years, and under more favourable circumstances, risen into power and popularity as the "Manchester School," and to those who take an interest in tracing the gradual expansion of political creeds, and the slow but certain steps by which they attain their influence, they will repay an attentive perusal.

His account of the fatal collision between the people and the soldiery in St. Peter's Fields, Manchester, in August 1819; will be read with deep interest by many who are too young to remember the stormy days of the Reform agitation. We trust that our author will continue his labours, and bring down the history of Manchester to the present time. The period extending from 1832 to 1850, embracing the important records of the Anti Corn-Law League, in which that town was actively engaged, will make an admirable companion volume to the Historical Sketches.

THE SMALL DEER OF CEYLON.

THIS is the title given by the artist to the rich group of tropical life that forms the subject of our engraving. It is not our present purpose to enter upon the zoology of Ceylon; the deer of that island are a variety of the species unknown to temperate latitudes, though resembling in their general characteristics those members of the stag family with which we are all sufficiently familiar. Our object in this brief notice is rather to direct the reader's attention to the merits of the artist, than to dilate upon the natural history of the birds and beasts which constitute the prominent features of his drawing; and even this is scarcely necessary, for Mr. Daniell is already so well known to the British public by his beautiful illustrations of our Indian possessions as to render any commendations from us superfluous. He has laboured with great success in a clime where nature has most bountifully supplied those invaluable adjuncts to the artist—beauty of form, brilliancy of colour, and a cloudless sky; and the present illustration, combining as it does some magnificent scenery with curious specimens of the animal kingdom, must rank among his happiest productions.

SCRAP.

In 1804 Mungo Park, the celebrated traveller, was residing near the banks of the Yarrow, where he was often visited by Sir Walter Scott. On one occasion, Lockhart in his Life of Scott relates that, not finding him at home, Scott went in search of his friend, and "presently found him standing alone on the bank, plunging one stone after another into the water, and watching anxiously the bubbles as they rose to the surface." "This," said Scott, "appears but an ill amusement for one who has seen so much stirring adventure." "Not so idle, perhaps, as you suppose," answered Mungo. "This was the manner in which I used to ascertain the depth of a river in Africa before I ventured to cross it—judging whether the attempt would be safe, by the time the bubbles of air took to ascend." At this time Park's intention of a second expedition had never been revealed to Scott; but he instantly formed the opinion that these experiments on the Yarrow were connected with some such purpose.

ITALY, AND HER FOREMOST MEN.

THE apathy with which the wrongs and miseries of Italy have been hitherto regarded in England—an apathy we have not been able to pass by, without remark, in our preceding pages—is gradually clearing away, beneath the radiant beams of truth; that sun of the moral world, which, however it may have to struggle for awhile against the clouds of ignorance, prejudice or error, finally bursts through them all, and shows every object in the light, that stands the test of investigation, and determines its actual quality and position.

One reason of the change which is daily developing itself in English feeling, doubtless is to be found in the conviction that the cruelties and injustice which have marked the conduct of the priestly government in Rome, ever since its re-establishment, and the still more atrocious barbarities of the military one in Naples, under its Commander-in-Chief, King Bomba, argue something radically wrong in those who practise them, rather than in those upon whom they are practised. Another reason is, that a more correct view is beginning to be obtained of the real character and motives of the different partisans who have exerted their energies in the cause of liberty and the diffusion of knowledge; or in that of despotism, and the continuation of ignorance; according, we will have the charity to imagine, as their consciences may have dictated to them.

It is in order to throw additional light upon this important subject, connected as it is with all the dearest interests of humanity, freedom, rationality, religion, unfettered intercourse in the great family of Man, and consequent reciprocation of benefits to every branch of it, that we propose laying before our readers brief sketches of the principal personages, the "Foremost Men," who may be considered as taking an influential part in the affairs of Italy—affairs which are daily more and more connecting themselves with the interests of Europe.

The leading parties in Italian politics may be divided into three classes. The first is the Absolutists; the regular upholders of "the good old times," when it was heresy to hint that abuses and imperfections might possibly exist even in institutions of priestly framing, and rebellion to suggest any means by which such abuses and imperfections might be ameliorated. This class, known in Rome by the appropriate sobriquet of the Ocurantisti, and in Tuscany and the north of Italy by that of Codusi, is characterised by such men as Cardinals Antonelli and Della Genga, at Rome, the Marquis del Carretto at Naples, Monsignor Coole, the King's Confessor, and others equally notorious, besides a whole train in every state of political turp-coats and official spies, as a specimen of whom it will suffice to quote the name of Nardoni, the most infamous and most traitorous of them all; discarded by Pio Nono himself, as a stain upon his police, a foul accuser of innocent men, but subsequently replaced, as a fit instrument of the baseness which seeks for protection to itself, by the betrayal and ruin of others. To this class, we have assigned priority of mention, not from any preponderance in its numbers, or importance in its talent, but simply in deference to its "bald antiquity," and the compassion with which it is natural to regard those whose race, whatever it may have been, is nearly run; who, in fact, to use a colloquial phrase, more expressive than elegant, are "on their last legs."

Then follow the Moderates, or partisans of constitutional liberty; among whom Rome reckons Pantaleoni, the able and benevolent physician, well known to the English visitors and residents there; Mamiani, his intimate friend; the unfortunate Rossi, and his colleague the Duke of Rignano; Minghetti, Recchi, and Farini, whose history of the Roman State, from 1815 to 1851, has been recently laid before the English public, through the translation of Mr. Gladstone. Piedmont produces Gioberti, Balbo, and Azeglio, all distinguished for their literary attainments; also Pinelli, Cavour, and the Abbé Rossini. Florence shows us the Marquis Capponi and Rodolfi, the Abbé Lambruschini, and the advocates Salvagnoli and Galeotti. Naples, Poerio, the highly-gifted unfortunate Poerio, chained to a common galley-slave, in a wretched and pestiferous dungeon; Comferti, Troja, and Spaventa; Sicily boasts of Ruggiero Settimo, the venerated head of the Sicilian government, whilst that island maintained its independence, Scialoja, and many others, at this time suffering imprisonment, under circumstances of aggravation, that make it worse than death.

And now come the Republicans, headed by Mazzini; one of the most extraordinary men in Europe, and at the same time, we verily believe, whatever varying opinions may exist as to the tendency of his theories, or the length to which he carries them, one of the most sincere in purpose, and disinterested in speculation. In his train appear Cernuschi, Cattaneo, Garibaldi, the famed Guerilla warrior, generous as brave, Gavazzi, the eloquent Barnabite friar, whose thunders (so lately holding all London in astonished admiration) against despotic power and papal abuses have been borne across the Mediterranean, to strike terror into the Vatican, and make monarchs tremble upon their uneasy thrones; Saffi; Guerrazzi, and Montanelli from Florence; from Venice, Manin, the honest president of the Provisional Government in that city, and Tomaseo, his coadjutor as Minister of the Interior, distinguished not less by his literary attainments, than the warmth of his patriotism: and to these might be added many others, from different states, who have found a temporary refuge in this country, of which one of the dearest and most sacred privileges is, that of affording an asylum to the unfortunate, and conferring liberty on the slave.

In order to understand the nature of the late movements in Italy, and the respective politics of the leading parties, it is necessary to look back, even so far as the closing years of the last century. At that period, Italy was rapidly progressing towards civilization: but then came the French Revolution, which led to the French Invasion; an event fraught, in many points, with benefit to Italy, but in many others, deplorably the reverse; for the excesses of the Revolution, both in doctrine and practice, alarmed the conscientious and sober-minded: their abhorrence of these excesses begot in them distrust and dislike of all new opinions whatsoever; they dreaded everything that led to discussion, progress and liberty, and clung, for protection, to the priests, who were glad enough to make them sensible of its value, by magnifying the dangers to which they were told they must inevitably be exposed without it. The sovereigns of Europe, restored in 1815 to the thrones from which they had been rudely shaken by Napoleon, naturally favoured this disposition wherever it was to be met with; and they instituted as fierce a crusade against liberal opinions, the rights of the people, and social advancement, as the Revolutionists had too often done against moral order, and the principles of humanity and justice. Two questions were at that time agitated in Italy, and still are, and, we may add, always will be, until they are settled in a manner conformable to the good sense and common rights of mankind. These questions may be comprised in very few words. One relates to the Cause of Independence, or of Emancipation from Austria; in other words, the National Cause: the other, to the Cause of Liberty and Progress, or the Constitutional Cause. By the Holy Alliance, Austria found herself not only mistress of the richest provinces in Italy, but also intimately connected with all its governments, as well as with the priestly party: she might even have brought over the Liberals to her side, if she would have given any honourable satisfaction to their feelings; for in fact, the government of Napoleon had been anything but liberal. Such was the unfortunate condition to which Italy was reduced by the French Revolution, and the treaties of 1815.

And now came in quick succession all the evil and degrading consequences attendant upon the subjugation to Austria, which the unhappy Italians too soon found, hung like a millstone round their necks. Napoleon had, at any rate, protected literary and scientific men; but, by Austria and the Restoration they were neglected, if not persecuted, everywhere save in Tuscany. The natural consequence was, that learning, genius, and enterprise, leagued themselves against Austria, in other words, against despotism, ignorance, and priestcraft. The first outburst of this confederation was manifested in the conspiracy of 1817, when Rasori, the celebrated physician, and several more, were imprisoned, though only for a short time; the government not daring, in its early days of despotism, to commit any act that should too forcibly excite the attention of the public. The next endeavour of the Liberals was to gain the religious party to join them in their denunciations against Austrian bondage, and their appeal in favour of popular liberty; and in this they succeeded to a considerable extent, chiefly through the aid of Silvio Pellico, Alessandro Manzoni, and others of the school of the Conciliatore, a journal published at Milan in 1820, but prohibited a few months afterwards, by Austria.

The revolution of 1821 discovered the alliance of many of the religious party with the National Cause, and even with the Constitutional one, in Piedmont and Naples. Several priests, to their honour be it spoken, took part with the patriots, and the court of Rome itself, under the mild administration of Consalvi, behaved with great moderation respecting them.

When the revolution broke out in France, in 1830, a great excitement prevailed throughout Italy; but in proportion as the anti-priestly party seemed to gain ground in France, so did the timorous amongst the conscientious and religious part of the community in Italy draw back from the liberal party, with which they had previously appeared willing to coalesce. Nevertheless, a revolution took place in central Italy, in the Roman provinces, and as religion was properly respected in the course of it, no disadvantageous change was produced by it in the real state of public feeling.

Thus were affairs going on, when the Liberals resolved to take one step more, and that was to endeavour to interest the different Italian governments in the grand cause of the people of Italy—the theme was first touched upon by Gioberti, in his "Primato," wherein he reverted to the Guelphic policy, and advocated the placing the Pope at the head of the Italian movement. Close upon him followed Balbo, maintaining the same opinions, still more decidedly, in his work "Le Speranze d'Italia." Both writers, but particularly Balbo, took, as the first point in their argument, the independence, and as their second, the civil liberty and progress of Italy. These productions created an extraordinary sensation throughout the country: the first brought over the priests to the Italian cause, and the second completely won the King of Piedmont, Charles Albert, to participation in the sentiments it promulgated. Such is the importance of the pen—a weapon, when rightly wielded, of more efficacy, and more extended influence, than the sword. Next stepped forth Massimo d'Azeglio, with "I Casi di Rimini," wherein, with the popular mode of arguing peculiar to himself, he applied to practice the principles propounded by Balbo. This work procured him the distinction of being exiled from Tuscany, where he was living at the time of its publication; but he found a home and protection in Piedmont, where he was still residing at the accession of Pio Nono. It was then that, for a few short and sunny weeks, it seemed to the delighted Italians as if the song of the heavenly host was heard again in the translucent air, and floated over the glorious dome of St. Peter's.—"On earth peace and goodwill towards men," seemed proclaimed a second time, in the gracious words of the amnesty that knit all parties together, for the moment, in one general reconciliation and feelings of fraternal love. Even the Jesuits, relaxing their iron imperturbability, their icy insulation, seemed inclined at that moment to hold out the hand of fellowship to the Liberals, by espousing the cause of independence against Austria. But they had previously gone too far in opposition to it; the half-extended hand was looked upon with suspicion—no one was willing to clasp it—Gioberti roughly and publicly repulsed it, in his "Gesuita Moderno;"—it was drawn back, clenched in anger; and from that time, an open division took place between the moderate, or religious party, headed by the Pope, and the violent, the bigoted, the ultra-montane party, headed by the Jesuits, and the regular old Gregorian Monsignori. Nevertheless, Italy marched on in the path of liberty—one reform followed another, and the Constitutionals were in the full expectation of accomplishing their beau idéal of moderate monarchism, when lo! the revolution of France, the abdication of Louis Philippe, and the proclamation of a Republic in that country, checked all their hopes, filled the Absolutists with dismay, and excited afresh in the ardent minds of the Republican Party, till then somewhat damped by the failure of their plans, a thousand dazzling visions of success and glory, which they lost no time in endeavouring to realize, by the most strenuous exertion of every faculty they possessed, and every means they could employ.

Of how many evils to Rome has not that revolution been the cause! and not to Rome alone, but to every country labouring under similar hardships and oppressions. Yes! France has much to answer for, in the miseries she has occasioned by her uncalled-for and unjustifiable interference, under the most treacherous pretences, with an oppressed, yet noble people, who had a right, as free agents and rational beings, to redress their own wrongs. She has to answer for many a groan, forced from gallant hearts, throbbing out their last pulsations in fetid dungeons—for many a tear wrung from the eyes of bereaved wives, and destitute families—for many a crime committed under her auspices, against the unoffending and the brave—for many a prolonged cruelty of a despotism which she has done her utmost to maintain, and for doing which she meets her just reward in the scorn and censure of every generous mind throughout the civilized world.

We have entered so fully on former occasions into the wrongs under which Rome laboured, previous to the accession of Pio Nono, and has continued to labour since his inauspicious return, that it is unnecessary at present to repeat them; particularly since most of our readers have probably become yet more intimately acquainted with them through the indignant eloquence of Father Gavazzi, who has unmasked and commented upon them, in the orations he has given the public, with all the fearlessness of truth, and all the severity of well-founded and undisguised disgust. And now, as we all know that one of the greatest revolutions in the world, and at the same time the greatest reformation, was accomplished in the sixteenth century by the labours of one monk, it may not be irrelevant to bestow a few remarks upon those of another, who has been aptly termed the Luther of the nineteenth; and who certainly has as wide a field before him, as was ever opened to his predecessor, in the exposure of Papal abuses, and the effects of despotic rule on the welfare, moral and physical, of those who may be condemned to groan under its decrees.

Father Gavazzi is a native of Bologna, and is the second son of a family of twenty children. His father, who was of noble birth, filled several offices of importance, both at Bologna and Forli, with credit, and was held in general esteem. It was probably in consideration of the number of children he had to provide for, that he was induced to devote his second son to the Church, and accordingly the future orator became, in his sixteenth year, a monk of the order of Barnabites. He had already given promise of great talent, and at the age of twenty he was appointed to the office of Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, in the Public College of Ravaggio, at Naples. The majority of his pupils were nearly as old as himself, but by the solidity of his attainments, and the kindness and urbanity of his manners, he gained their respect and affection alike; insomuch that it was with great regret they saw him compelled to take his leave of them, in consequence of being summoned to Arpino, to go through his spiritual exercises, previous to his ordination. Soon after his arrival there, however, he was sent forth to preach in Terra di Lavoro, and Calabria, by the command of his Superiors; who had probably the good sense to see that an active life and public career were much more congenial to his temperature and qualifications, than poring over the legends of the Saints, or sitting in his cell in a state of serene stultification, gazing upon nothing, in the anticipation of some seraphic vision. At the expiration of a year, he returned with the reputation of a most powerful and convincing orator. After receiving ordination, he went to Leghorn, where he received an appointment in one of the public schools, as teacher of general literature; but the system of espionnage, which is one of the curses of that ill-used, and therefore turbulent city, was there carried on with lynx-eyed activity, in all places of instruction; professors and pupils were equally subjected to it. No wonder then that Gavazzi's ardent language, breathing, as it had ever done, the most passionate love of liberty, and scorn of oppression and despotism, whatever shapes they might assume,—no wonder that it should immediately attract the attention, and alarm the susceptibilities of the Jesuit informers, who kindly took upon themselves the task of ascertaining the state of public opinion and private morals; and that in consequence of the deductions they drew from it, he should very soon after his arrival receive a "broad hint" that the more speedily he relinquished his employment, and, to use an Italian phrase, relieved the city from the incomodo of his presence, the more agreeable it would be to the authorities, and the more prudent for himself. He obeyed the mandate at that time; but, disgusted with the prospect of being similarly thwarted in all his endeavours to impart instruction in the capacity of a teacher, he resolved to relinquish the employment at once, and devote himself, for the future, to that of a sacred orator. There is no character throughout Italy more secure than this from the interference of authority, or even the misrepresentations of hired spies, or traducers by profession. An eloquent preacher speedily becomes the favourite of the people; they look upon him as their property, and will not allow of any attack being made upon him, directly or indirectly: a government of priests is cautious how it condemns one of their own body, whose talents may serve to throw lustre over the sacred functions, even though his arguments be distasteful to its prejudices, or inimical to its interests; and as it would be as difficult to define the exact nature of the offence, as the degree of punishment due to it, they wisely shut their ears to what he may utter, and their eyes to the effect it may produce, as long as they have any excuse either to themselves or the people, for their apparent indifference to his proceedings.

But Gavazzi was not the man to do anything by halves, and he entered upon his vocation with all the zeal that the consciousness of a good cause will always inspire in the breast of an honest man, and all the fearlessness of one who, looking upon himself at once as a soldier of Christ and a citizen of the world, sees in banishment from place to place, only fresh scenes for his duties, and fresh inducements for the exercise of them. He was twenty-five years of age, and already was his reputation matured, when he commenced his daily preaching, during the season of Lent, at Piacenza; and from that time he continued these sermons annually, as long as he remained in Italy. But the chief field for ten years of his pious and patriotic labours, was Piedmont. Asti, Alessandria, Vercelli, and Turin, were successively visited by him in the course of his mission; and it is only justice to say that he was generally beloved and respected, wherever he went. Nevertheless, he found bitter enemies and inveterate opponents, as well as obedient proselytes and admiring friends. Among the most malignant of the former were the Jesuits, at whose head was the Marquis de la Margherita, then Minister of Foreign Affairs for Piedmont. He was gloomy, bigoted, and narrow, in all his notions; he dreaded every appearance of intellectual progress, hated the word improvement, in whatever sense it might be used; and whilst he tyrannized over others, he was himself the abject slave of the Order of St. Ignatius, to which he belonged. Now as all Gavazzi's sentiments, all his arguments, all his views, were in direct opposition to those entertained by the members of that Order, an open war was established between them, and the banishment of the orator, convicted of the crime of captivating and enlightening the people, was decreed by Margherita as a matter of course.

Gavazzi now transferred his labours to Parma, where he pursued them for four years, and where they were so fully appreciated that he has been known to preach to crowded congregations ten times in one single day. There, however, he found a field which he had not anticipated, in the central prison of the city, where he had his abode assigned him, by a mandate from Gregory the Sixteenth, in consequence of a series of sermons he had delivered at Bologna, which turning upon patriotism, justice, and gospel purity, did not exactly suit that Pontiff's ideas of propriety. On his release from "durance vile," he went to Perugia, and thence, in 1845, to Ancona; where, his zeal overstepping his discretion, he launched forth into such a furious tirade against the ruling powers and their doctrines, that he speedily found himself again incarcerated, and this time with more severity, for it was in the College of the Noviciate of St. Severino; and whoever would wish to know the extent to which the rigour of punishment may be carried, has only to commit some fault which may bring him within its priestly discipline. This poor Gavazzi found to his cost, for during twelve months that he remained under monkish coercion in that place, every indignity was heaped upon his devoted head, and every ingenuity resorted to, in order to render his life degraded and miserable.

The death of Gregory was, however, the signal for Gavazzi's release. He had been on terms of intimacy with the brothers of Pio Nono; and by that Pontiff, then giving the promise of every excellence in himself, and every blessing to his people, he was released from his convent prison, recalled to Rome, and taken into favour at the Vatican.

It was in the beautiful Church of Santa Maria degli Angioli, that the sonorous accents of Gavazzi were heard for the first time in the Eternal City: whoever has paced the spacious transept of that glorious edifice, may easily imagine how grandly such accents would echo through it; his subject, moreover, was an inspiring one; it was the first anniversary of Pio Nono's accession to the Papal Chair, and in the eventful year that had preceded it, how many great and good things were believed to have been effected! How many more, it was hoped, were to be achieved in that which was to follow! He was listened to with enthusiasm and delight, as he bailed the rising of the day-star of liberty, in the pure cerulean hemisphere of his beloved Italy; and Pio Nono himself, heard with complacency and approbation of a theme so closely associated with his own praises.

In his next popular effusion, Gavazzi was less successful, as far as giving his Holiness satisfaction was concerned. It was upon the discovery and defeat, in Rome, of the plot against its liberties, which had commenced in Ferrara, through Austrian emissaries, and in counterpoise of which, the Pope agreed to the organization of the National Guards. Gavazzi, penetrated with gratitude on the occasion, delivered a sermon of thanksgiving in the Church of St. Andrew delle Fratte; but, hurried by his enthusiasm into a just denunciation of the evils resulting from the arbitrary and narrow-minded reign of Gregory, he forgot himself so far as to paint the faults of the man, instead of confining his strictures to the errors of the Pontificate. This was contrary to the etiquette of the Vatican. These strictures, when reported to him, sounded harshly in the ears of Pio Nono; to censure the dead was but one step from criticising the living; the example was not to be passed over with that impunity which might allow it to grow into a precedent; the gifted orator was rebuked, and silence imposed upon him. Gavazzi submitted to the injunction with a humility which did him honour; partly from a candid acknowledgment within himself, that his impetuosity might have carried him beyond the bounds of propriety, and partly from sincere affection at that time to Pio Nono: though a suspicion that the Holy Father's character was deficient in stability and truth was then first awakened in his mind, and unhappily but too fatally confirmed by succeeding circumstances.

It was in the month of January, during the temporary disgrace of Gavazzi, that the dreadful onslaught was made at Padua, by the Austrian troops, upon the student population of that city, who, carried away by the impetuosity of youth, had manifested their love of liberty in a defiance of their oppressors, by whom they had been brutally insulted. This attack they had no power to resist. Pity and horror were alike raised by the sanguinary deed, as base as it was cruel, for where was the honour of victory over those who had no means of contest? The execrations of the people mingled with the shrieks and wailings of desolated mothers, the groans of bereaved fathers—the remaining youths were hastily recalled to their homes, the university broken up, and prayers were offered and solemn funeral rites performed, in many of the chief cities, for those who had fallen untimely on the unequal field, like flowers cut off in their bloom. Rome shared in the general feeling; her students implored Gavazzi to pay the tribute of his eloquence to their brothers, murdered in the streets of Padua. Grief and rage unchained his tongue; he thundered forth, in the Church of the University, a philippic against tyranny in all its hideous forms, and lamented over its recent victims, with an agony of regret that at once melted his congregation into woman's weakness, and roused in them the most ardent desire to avenge those for whom they mourned. This harangue was a deep aggravation, at the Vatican, of Gavazzi's previous offence; he was condemned to expiate it in the Convent of Polveriera, from whence, as though its discipline, notorious for its severity, was yet not severe enough, he was secretly transferred to the Capuchin Convent of Genzano. But he was not destined to imprisonment and inactivity. The proclamation of the republic in France, and the temporary triumph of the liberal party at Vienna, were events that carried the hopes of Italy up to their climax. One long cry of brotherhood and unity sounded through the land, and troops were sent from all parts, into Lombardy, and to Venice, to repel the hordes which Austria was certain to pour upon those points, as soon as she should recover from the stupor of the blow she had received. At Rome sprang up, as if by magic, an army of youthful volunteers, whose "beauté virile," and "ardeur patriotique," draw forth the warmest eulogiums from the high-spirited and munificent Princess Belgioso, who repeatedly witnessed their courage, and who had herself conducted into the field a regiment fitted out solely at her own individual expense.

These were not times to keep a man like Gavazzi shut up in a convent—and he was soon to be seen parading the streets of Rome with a tri-coloured cross upon his broad breast, the emblem at once of his devotion to his sacred calling and to his country. Often have we seen him thus decorated, shedding the light of his resplendent countenance from the gallery of the Chamber of Deputies, on the speakers below; often heard his animating exhortations ring through the arches of the Colosseum, his voice, all-powerful though it be, almost overwhelmed in the thunders of applause his arguments called forth. All parties owned the power of his eloquence, and the force of his reasoning, and when the troops were summoned to the Vatican, to receive on themselves, their arms, their banners, and their cause, the Papal benediction, and the blessing of God, Gavazzi was nominated the chaplain in chief. That same evening he was admitted to a private interview with Pio Nono, who in the course of it invested him with full power to exercise due authority over the other chaplains, and graciously bestowed upon him a special blessing, for his well-doing in his new vocation. The Holy Father moreover favoured him with some communications which he had much rather have been without, as they only tended to confirm in him the suspicions he had already begun to entertain, as to the Pontiff's firmness and sincerity in the cause of emancipation. In short, he was given to understand that the passage of the Po was permitted by Pio Nono, not to vindicate the rights of the Italian nation, nor to repel the Austrian aggression of them,—not for any veneration of liberty in itself, or desire to extend its blessings among his people,—in short, not for any great national or disinterested end whatsoever, but solely for the recovery of the petty territory of Polesine for the Holy See! Such was the footing, whether true or not, upon which the Holy Father chose to put an expedition that exposed the flower of his subjects to death, in order, we may presume, to leave himself "a hole to creep out at," if interrogated by his "trusty and well-beloved cousin" of Austria, as to his motives for sanctioning the expedition.

To track the progress of Gavazzi through the Roman States is unnecessary; at Perugia, Padua, Venice, everywhere his voice was heard appealing, encouraging, beseeching, warning, threatening,—everywhere it was listened to with enthusiastic delight, and no doubt his eloquence was one of the most powerful weapons that were employed at that time in the liberal cause. As brave in the field as he was eloquent in the forum, his tall figure might be seen in the thickest of the fight, comforting the dying, or carrying off the wounded to a place of safety. Four of his brothers attended him in this campaign, and proved themselves worthy of the name which he was destined to render celebrated throughout the whole civilized world. In the retreat of the Piave he was exposed to great personal insult from the enemy, and often incurred considerable danger: returning to Florence, he resumed his discourses there, but was soon seized by the authorities, and conveyed across the frontier. He then sought shelter with a relative a few miles from Bologna, but his hiding-place being discovered, orders were issued for his arrest: he was enabled, however, to escape to Milan, by the kindness of Cardinal d'Amat, the Governor of Bologna, who contrived to warn him of his peril, and sent him money to facilitate his departure. At Milan he found the state of parties, harassed, irritated, and distrustful of each other, unfavourable to his declamations; and the case was the same at Genoa, to which city he repaired after the capitulation of Milan. Bologna proved a more congenial field; he was implored by the inhabitants to raise his voice against the dreadful crime of assassination, which, joined to the horrors of brigandage, was then carrying terror into the bosoms of the most respectable families. Taking Ancona in his way, he there greatly strengthened the public feeling in favour of liberty; and, arriving at Bologna, he added the force of his eloquence to the calmer arguments and judicious measures of Galletti, by which tranquillity and order were in a great measure restored. His reward was an order for his arrest, despatched from Rome by Rossi, and carried into immediate execution by that minister's colleague, Zucchi.

Gavazzi was now in more real peril than he had perhaps ever been exposed to, amid a shower of bullets, with destruction stalking round him. Though still retaining the titular dignity of Chaplain-in-Chief to the Pontifical Forces, and of which no step had been taken by the Papal Court to deprive him, he was sent like a common malefactor to Corneto. In the dungeons of that town, devoted solely to the imprisonment of priests, and wherein are practised severities and cruelties that would not be allowed in any civil establishment, not even for the most atrocious crimes, Gavazzi might, under the ancien régime, have languished out the remainder of his days, unheard of, amid chains and stripes, hunger and filth, and every species of insult, companioned with the most guilty and most degraded of men, the very dregs of a venal and corrupt priesthood; but in passing through Viterbo, the people flew to his rescue, and carried him off in triumph from the grasp of his guards. This bold manifestation of popular feeling alarmed the papal government so much that an order was instantly sent in confirmation of his release. Immediately quitting the Roman States, he retraced his steps to Venice, where, however, he was now coldly received; the public sentiments had undergone a change; he was accused, though very unjustly, of advocating Communism, and pushing all his opinions to the ultra: but soon a gleam of brilliant light shot once more across his path. The Pope fled from Rome; the government was left in the hands of Gavazzi's admirers and friends; joyfully he presented himself among them, joyfully was he welcomed by them. Soon were his courage and his eloquence called forth—the approach of the French roused them to the utmost, and once more he might be seen, foremost in the place of danger, waving his cross on the city walls, bearing the wounded to the hospital, blessing the dying, consoling the afflicted—everywhere the zealous priest, the devoted citizen, the brave patriot. But Rome fell at last, and Gavazzi, unable to endure the spectacle of her second subjugation, sought refuge in England, where, for many months after his arrival, he had to struggle with poverty and all its degrading attendants. He made his first appearance before the public on occasion of delivering a funeral oration in honour of his friend and fellow-sufferer, the excellent priest, Ugo Bossi, basely and secretly murdered at midnight, in his native city, by the Austrians, under the pretended legality of martial orders. We were among the auditors of that evening, and cannot imagine it possible ever to forget the effect which his commanding figure, his noble attitudes, his varied and most expressive action, the deep pathos of his voice, the dignified energy of his grief, produced upon his impressionable countrymen,—and we may add upon ourselves,—as he eulogized the virtues of his martyred brother in spiritual arms, and loaded with solemn maledictions the tyranny that sought to extend itself throughout Europe by the destruction of all who attempted to obstruct its course.

From this time Gavazzi's fortunes began to assume somewhat of a brighter aspect. Simple in his personal habits as a monk in his cell, very little was sufficient for his actual need; he had now made himself known—soon he was applied to for instruction, which furnished him from day to day with the means of support. At length his fellow-exiles in this country, duly appreciating how valuable his abilities would prove in giving publicity to their cause, clubbed their slender pittance together, to procure him a suitable room wherein to deliver a course of lectures upon the errors and abuses of the Church of Rome, and the mal-administration of the temporal government of the Pope. The interest of the public was speedily excited in the lecturer, and has continued to increase until he has acquired a universal popularity. He is indeed, we should imagine, at this moment, the most powerful and accomplished orator in Europe—nature has given him every requisite talent, and circumstances have combined to draw forth all his extraordinary qualifications. He is equally to be desired as an advocate, and dreaded as an opponent. He is not one of the mealy-mouthed who nor of the over refined and subtle reasoners who waste their finer wits in trying, like the gifted Burke, to “— cut blocks with a razor.”

He employs expressive terms, and striking illustrations:—and if his constitutional impetuosity, his zeal in the cause of his country's freedom, and the peculiar genius of his mother-tongue, sometimes hurry him into personal vituperation, and coarseness of epithet or comparison, it can only be said that violent diseases require violent remedies; the abuses, the turpitudes and the tyrannies of the papal court, as proved by all history, cannot be exaggerated by any language; the iniquities of its secret proceedings require to be stated by a bold voice, nor can they be detected and laid faithfully open by a keener eye, a more unflinching hand, than that of this warrior-priest, whose constant text seems to be

“Cry aloud—spare not!”

LIFE IN PRAIRIE LAND.

BY EUNICE W. FARNSHAM.

[This work, which has been universally admired, both in England and America, for its vivid pictures of western life, as well as the beauty of its style, has, strange to say, never been reprinted in this country, and it is accordingly introduced to our readers in the full confidence that it will afford them no small measure of gratification.]

CHAPTER I.

Embarkation for the Illinois—Western steamboats in general—The Banner in particular—Her captain and crew—Hoochier bride and bridegroom—A walk in St. Louis—A horrible tale of Lynching.

On the morning of one of the last days of April, 18—, there was a small party of persons collected in the cabin of a steamboat which had just arrived at St. Louis from Louisville, discussing some topic which seemed to possess for them an engrossing interest. This party consisted of six persons, four ladies and two gentlemen, all evidently travellers. The question was how and when they should prosecute the remainder of their voyage up the principal eastern tributary which the father of waters receives above the Ohio. One of the gentlemen had explored the forest of steamboats which crowded the wharf of this growing city, and reported that there was but one advertised "For the Illinois this evening, without fail;" that he could not get on board of her, but thought her appearance extremely unpromising. It was near the close of the week, and as the other gentleman was a clergyman, and he and his party had, moreover, no dear friends from whom they had been separated seven long years, awaiting their arrival, they concluded to stop till the succeeding one. They accordingly went on shore, and the writer and her companion set out, accompanied by a cartman and sundry trunks, chests, &c, to find the elegant, fast sailing, high-pressure boat that was going "up the Illinois this evening, without fail."

We had travelled far enough on the western waters already to have learned that the "this evening" of the bills might possibly be adjourned twenty-four or even thirty-six hours; but faith is no less requisite on western steamboats than elsewhere, and summoning all ours, we embarked ourselves and our baggage on board the "Banner." We soon found the faith which led us on board was a mere rush-light to that necessary to keep us there. If steamboats had been running on the Illinois at the time when Noah explored the summit of Ararat, one would have affirmed that this very "Banner" was the pioneer of that period. But there is a story to be told, by-and-by, of the first craft of this kind that ever went up the Illinois, and its effect on the settlers, which unfortunately conflicts with this supposition, and drives the antiquarian to a period comparatively modern, as that which gave birth to the Banner. She was not a very large boat, but what she wanted in size was amply compensated in filth. One flight of stairs between the cabins was carpeted, and sundry small patches still remained on the floor of that in which we ate, being too firmly fastened by mingled grease and clay to be easily removed. It is not perhaps generally known, that these articles, properly compounded, make a paste which is quite firm and sticky, and holds in cold water. I mention it for the benefit of the unenlightened, and can bear ample testimony to the virtues, having seen them repeatedly demonstrated in various ways at the west. The floors were broken, the stairs dilapidated; there was no linen for the berths, the hurricane deck leaked, and its edge was hung with delicate filaments of tar, which the warmth of the sun often drew to an inconvenient length and sometimes quite severed, irrespective of the welfare of those passing beneath. The waste of steam was so great that the wheels effected only about four revolutions a minute, and the boat had a strange habit, which I could not then fully comprehend, but which has since been satisfactorily explained by a scientific friend, of occasionally running twice or thrice her length, with considerable rapidity, and then suddenly lurching so as to throw every thing to the larboard. She averaged five of these spasms a day. There was a one-handed chambermaid on board, a one-eyed cook, and a three-fingered boy to wait at table. But all these imperfections were more than compensated by the exquisite finish and perfection of the captain. He was a soft-voiced, red-haired gentleman, in white silk hose, and French pumps, umbrageous ruffles, and a light satin cravat; who had strangely enough been transferred from his natural profession of lounging in the Broadway of some western town, to the command of this antediluvian piece of water craft. One could draw his portrait this day, by adding a thatch of red bristles over the mouth, and substituting for the silken hose, gaiters of the neatest fit and finish. On deck he wore lemon-coloured gloves. The first polish of the laundress was taken off his snowy linen pantaloons when I first saw him, and the plaits of his ruffle had relaxed a little from their precise angles, but the satin cravat, the pumps and hose, were unexceptionable. He walked with a mincing, uneasy gait through the little hall which led to the ladies' cabin, and presented himself before my astonished eyes—one delicate glove drawn on, and the other straightened in his hand—with a bow that would have graced the drawing-room of St. James's.

"It's a ver-ry-warm day, miss." I looked my astonishment, and was about informing him that the gentlemen's cabin was in some other part of the boat, when he laid his white hand on one of the filthy chairs, and placing it near the door, seated himself upon it, with such an at-home sort of air, looking at the same time so familiar with the filth and disorder about, that I felt convinced he must be a part of the establishment. He must either be the captain or clerk, for the cook is black, and none of the hands would dare undertake a prank of this kind. These thoughts passed rapidly through my mind, while the object of them was adjusting his cravat, arranging his hair, and passing his cambrio handkerchief slowly over his moist forehead, so that, notwithstanding my deliberation, I replied, before he was entirely prepared to continue the conversation, that so far as the temperature was concerned, I was happy to be able to coincide with him.

"You are going up the Illinois, miss?"

"I am delighted with your sagacity, sir," I replied; "that forms a part of my present expectation."

"Have you ever been up?"

"Never, sir."

"Then you have a delightful trip before you."

"I admire your taste," I replied, glancing at the naked floor, the mutilated chairs, and the greasy berths.

"How far up do you go, miss?"

"I am not informed, sir, as to the exact distance."

"You have recently arrived in this region, I presume?"

"I have, sir."

"I shall have great pleasure in carrying so intelligible a young lady into the country."

"You flatter me."

"O no, miss, I believe I speak truth."

"Your sagacity, sir, is beyond praise."

Before he had time to reply, a young chap in a red calico shirt, with a face dirtier than I can describe, presented himself at the door and bawled out, "Cappen, please to come hyur.¹ John's dead done with whiskey, the new engineer's gone off on a spree, and th' ain't nobody to keep the fire up." Hereupon the "cappen" rose and departed, with a pompous solicitation that I would excuse his absence.

He had been gone but a very few moments when the one-handed chambermaid entered, directing in a raw Hooshier girl who had been our fellow-passenger from Louisville. Poor child! even her eyes, trained as they were to rude sights, looked astonished at the poverty and filth about her. I did not wonder that she started with an exclamation of delight and said, "I'm right glad to see you!" though we had never exchanged a word before. She was a tall, dark featured person, with a head of fine black hair that flowed to her feet when the horn comb was withdrawn from it. Her stature was large, her hands and feet proportionably so. She was accompanied by a man whose relation to her had excited a good deal of speculation among us. He was several years her senior; had lost three of his front teeth, wore a red flannel shirt with a standing collar of the same, supported by a cotton pocket-handkerchief, a fur cap, and the thickest of all possible boots, the tops of which were just invaded by the bottoms of a pair of jean pantaloons. His attentions to his travelling companion were so peculiar that we had been in a delightful state of uncertainty all the way as to what this relation could be. They were authoritative enough for those of a father, but then their age forbade the supposition. He might have been an uncle, but she never called him so; possibly a cousin, but no woman ever so prized the attention of a mere cousin. He could scarcely have been a brother, because there was not the faintest resemblance between them. What then could he be? We had examined and rejected every supposition but that of his being her husband; but nobody would listen to that, because supported by no probabilities. The riddle was turned over to me for solution. It cannot be wondered at, that in such desperate circumstances, I looked upon their entrance as quite a providence, and reciprocated the self-gratulation expressed by my fellow-passenger.

She seated herself on one chair, deposited her bundle on another, and laughing the while, exclaimed, "This hyur boat ain't set out so smart by a heap as t'other. I 'lowed we shouldn't have such a fine place to be in all the way."

"Why," said I, "had you been told that the boats up the Illinois were so poorly furnished?"

"No, I never heern nothin about 'em, but 'tain't in natur to have such carpets, and cheers, and glasses everywhere; it costs a heap to have 'em."

Poor child! the splendours of a comfortable cabin had been to her like the show of regal magnificence to a peasant; and she could say with poor Hinda, though not in language so sentimental, "I knew, I knew it could not last!"

In a few minutes her companion made his appearance, and announced that he had toted the plunder aboard, and as the boat wa'n't goin to start till after night, he was goin up to see the place. He gave her no invitation to accompany him, nor did she seem to expect it. I did not wish to broach the question at once, so we had a few words on indifferent topics, till Hal (I believe I have forgotten to say that my travelling companion bore that convenient soubriquet) entered and asked me if I would like to stroll an hour or two over the western city.

"Most gladly," I replied; "a wilderness and motion were preferable to this tedious place."

"Have you seen the captain?" was his next question.

"Yes; he has paid his respects formally."

"Well, he's a character, isn't he, to finish off such a boat as this? but we'll have some fun out of him before we part."

We sallied forth, and my heart really ached as I left the solitary girl sitting there, robbed of all the splendour that had so delighted her senses for the last few days, and alone. She looked sad, and I made an interrogative sign to Hal about asking her to accompany us, with all the oddities of her person and apparel, but he shook his head. When we were out, I asked why he had refused my request.

"Why," said he, "Mr. Red-flannel may prefer to escort his wife himself, and his preference might be expressed rather strongly if he found me doing it without his consent. We don't know how these Hooshiers will receive any civilities to which they are not accustomed; and you have heard enough of the modes in which they express their displeasure, to be aware that it is no slight thing to awaken it. You see that clump of trees yonder in the skirt of the city?"

"Yes; but what have they to do with the resentment of insult or wrong?"

(1) It is difficult to convey by any written combination of letters the sound of this word as uttered by the natives of these regions. It is more like hyur preceded by a sharply aspirated, than anything else to which I can liken it.

"Much. There is a heap of ashes under one of them with which this pleasant wind is playing, as if they were not the most revolting object that could be found on the face of this republic."

"And what, pray, renders them such? Your face tells a tale of horror."

"And well it may; for last night, only last night, a man, an unfortunate and guilty one it may be, but still a man, and a citizen of this proud state, was tied to that tree and burned alive!"

"Merciful heaven, it cannot be!"

"Yes, it is even so, and a crowd of people were gathered around to witness the fearful spectacle."

"And was there no heart during all that period of agony to relent and turn the tide of fury into pity and tenderness? A word uttered in the spirit of human love must have done it, methinks, and made the most violent ready to bear their suffering victim away in their arms."

"It remained unspoken, then; for the damning fact is recorded on earth as well as in heaven."

"It surely must blast the peace of every person who had any knowledge of it and did not interpose to prevent it. But what was his offence? Surely it must have been very aggravated to have awakened such awful vengeance."

"I have not learned the precise circumstances, but rumour (and that from those who approved, or at least suffered the disgraceful event to take place, would, we may suppose, attribute to him his full measure of iniquity) says that he had led a desperate sort of life on the river and in its vicinity. His final offence was stabbing an officer who attempted to arrest him for some recent crime."

"Did the wound produce instant death?"

"No. I believe the man is still living, or at least survived some hours. I have understood that he was very much esteemed, and had a family of small children. But these are less than feather weights in the scale that will balance the guilt of his murderers."

"These things are awful truly, and disgraceful too, if we consider the boasted supremacy and efficiency of our laws. I trust the like does not occur so often that the city is not agitated by it."

"No, such extreme cases do not; but this is only an extreme one of a class of public offences that are frequent here. Individual or associated feeling often assumes the prerogative of law in the infliction of lesser punishments."

"Well, it is not perhaps, on reflection, so extraordinary as it seems at first sight to us. We come from a region comparatively old, where time has defined right and interest, and developed more fully the power of law, and established rules of action. Here all is new. Passion may break forth and do its fatal misdeeds, before the slower majesty of law is perceived by the turbulent actors to be sufficient for their purposes. Such scenes must exhibit clearly to every reflecting mind the necessity of framing in our seasons of entire self-possession rules by which we will abide when these have passed away. Fanatical liberalists may term them shackles to restrain our future freedom, but I would that every one of such might stand beside that funeral dust. Before the awful truth taught there, his ravings for large liberty would shrink into their true insignificance."

"But if such lessons are not learned from the pages of history, black with the records of fouler violence than this, how shall the shallow minds which reject them there, imbibe them here?"

"True; but we are wandering far, and your horrible recital has been so painful that I am less disposed to walk than before I heard it. Let us return."

CHAPTER II.

Departure from St. Louis—The first night on board the Banner—The next morning—Speed of our boat—Junction of the Missouri and Mississippi—Landing at Alton—Unpardonable behaviour of the boat under trying circumstances—Disaster to the captain—A specimen of Hoosier indignation.

ON reaching the wharf, we found things wearing a very busy appearance. The engine was wheezing like an asthmatic, some rough-looking men were toting plunder on board, the captain stood upon the guard with both gloves drawn on and buttoned, the hands were moving about as if intent on business, and things began to wear quite the aspect of departure. This was encouraging.

"Will you start to-night, captain?" said Hal.

"Certainly, sir," taking out his repeater. "Ring the bell, Jack. That's our first bell; we shall be off in an hour."

"Really," said I, as we walked up the street, "this affair has some creditable points; its punctuality for instance."

"Yes, you'll learn the value of that when our friends who wait here till Monday pass us halfway up the Illinois."

"Now out upon your croaking, and let's put a cheerful face on the attempt, since we have made it."

The hour extended from one o'clock to six. We left the wharf just as the sun was setting, and if the reader escapes a common-place description of spires gilded by his last rays, of windows blazing with crimson and golden light, of trees shaking their small foliage in the evening wind, and of the dying hum of the city, stealing fainter and fainter on our ears as the muddy waters parted slowly before our prow, he may thank the Banner and her peerless captain. Either were sufficient to have put to flight the sentimentality of a legion of school-misses,—both together quite routed mine; not to mention our red-flannelled Hoosier, or his long-haired bride. Every thing about me was so thoroughly uncomfortable, that I felt no disposition to rest in any anticipation short of that which pictures the homes and faces we so longed to see. Three days of this dismal journeying were reported to lie between us and them, and it required under such circumstances some heroism in man or woman to look forward through their tedious length.

I was fatigued, and requested the chambermaid to prepare my berth as early as possible. She offered me a very disinterested piece of advice in reference to it, which I shall give here for the benefit of such as may be similarly situated, without the like kindness to direct their choice. It was, that I had better abandon the little pen, otherwise state-room, which I had chosen beside the cabin, and take my berth in the latter apartment, "Kase," to use her own elegant language, "the bugs ain't a touch in kyur to what they be in yander." Here was another volume of misery opened to my already oppressed senses. Seeing my consternation, she added, "O, you needn't dread 'em so powerful; I broomed the berths to-day, and shook the 'trasses, so they won't be so mighty bad."

"Make my berth where you think best," I said.

"There ain't no clean sheets, but I can tear off a pair, and you can sleep in 'em, you know, if they ain't hemmed, and I'll give you my pillow."

"No, thank you," I replied; "just tear off a third sheet, and I'll make a pillow-case of it for myself."

At last the berth was prepared, and the vermin made a night of it. They had evidently not been treated for some time, and brought vigorous appetites to my reception. After a contest of four or five hours, I was fain to yield possession to them. Making such limited ablution as the place allowed, I dressed myself and sat down on the stern of the boat to wait the coming day, and speculate on the distance we had made. When the light came up over the heavy forest which clothed the eastern bank of the river, I saw that the waters were still muddy, and knew, therefore, that we could not have passed the mouth of the Missouri. Nine hours' running had brought us twenty-two miles!—a dismal augury for the 240 that yet remained. As the daylight gained, I saw that the current under the eastern shore was dark and clear, and a few minutes after the scattered town of Alton began to peer up from among its beautiful bluffs, just touched with the first tender hue of spring.

And now the waters widened on the west, and opened up inland a broad, eddying, plunging sea of mud. On the spine of a sand-bar which was just visible between the two streams, the currents met, and the waters of the Missouri rose into a circling wave which toppled an instant and ran on, eager to mingle with the purer element that glittered and danced beyond. But the Mississippi, as if disdainful the foul alliance thus tumultuously sought, stole angrily away beneath the dark forest on the opposite shore, and preserved her identity a long way down, in a narrow transparent vein, growing more slender, till at length its bed was wholly usurped by the muddy monster.

This, then, was the junction of these two streams! The point where the mighty son of the mountains meets the clear-eyed daughter of the lakes—majestic union of powers whose feeble birth is in the deep wilderness and the untrodden solitude, whose maturity makes the ocean tremble. Nothing could be more impressive. When the child's geography had first been put in my hands, I read of these great rivers and put my feeble powers to their utmost task to conceive them. I had followed the insignificant red and green lines which represent them, and explored the echoing mountains whence one plunges to the plain below, and the gushing springs and softly chiming lakes whence the other rises and winds; till fancy, wearied with the effort, drooped her pinion, and left me on the rough bench in the little brown school-house, sick and disgusted with the narrowness and coarseness of the world to which I was confined. I had taken the eagle's wing, and, perched upon the mountain pine, had seen the little rivulets

"—leap and gush O'er channell'd rock and broken bush,"

bending towards each other, and swelling as they united, till their march became resistless. I had followed them where the dim wood and towering cliff reechoed to their tread, and where they cut the verdant bosom of the sunny plain like threads of molten silver. Vast, illimitable journey! And here, beneath my eye, these messengers from the unweary solitudes, thousands of miles away, met and pursued their path together. It seemed like a union of strength to thread the more dangerous territory inhabited by man. Both streams at this time were swollen to their fullest capacities by the spring floods. The gigantic Missouri poured out his turbid waters with a force that made his feeble neighbour recoil and leave a chasm between the transverse muddy wall, and the clear dark stream that glided timidly by on the other side.

While I was contemplating this scene, wrapt in silence, a little window close beside me opened, and a hand was thrust forth which I immediately recognized to be the solitary member belonging to the body of our chambermaid. She drew back with a scream, and an exclamation not of the most feminine character; but the next moment her eyes relieved her trepidation, and after muttering some apology, she expressed her opinion that I "must feel right peart to be out that airly." I had no little difficulty in convincing her that there was sufficient activity in my nerves of sensation to render the insects that shared my berth somewhat troublesome.

"I reckon," said she, "thar must have been a mighty small chance of the varmints about you, 'kase I swep up about a pint of 'em yesterday and thow'd 'em overboard; so it's impossible you could ha had a great many."

I yielded the point, and afterwards observed that whenever they were alluded to on board this boat, it was by measure!

We reached Alton at eight o'clock. The bell rang when we were within 100 yards of the shore, and the boat was in one of her spasms, which the captain calculated would lay him alongside in gallant style. But alas! spasmodic action is no more to be relied on in boat nature than human. On we came, the waters quite whitening in our wake, and making, as the delighted Mrs. Raddle observed on another occasion, "acterally more noise" than if we had come in a better boat, for the engine creaked and hissed at every joint, and the escape-pipe disgorged itself about thrice a minute with a dismal hollow sound, as if its vitals were breaking up. We nearly touched the shore; the captain stood in his ruffles, silk-hose, pumps, and gloves; the passengers waited, valises and trunks in hand, ready to jump ashore, and two or three were gathered at the waterside shaking hands with their friends, and exchanging the usual ceremonies, when, oh, most inglorious spectacle! the spasm ended, the boat rolled over on the other side, threw the captain across a stool, and the passengers among barrels, &c., and lay motionless for several moments.

"That was the unkindest cut of all," was it not?" cried Hal, maliciously, to the prostrate captain, "to play you such a trick here, before the town, just as we were on the eve of such a bold approach; but never mind. She'll hardly have another fit before you can bring her up."

The bell rang, the wheels revolved backwards, and all the numerous mysteries were duly performed again, but now the boat refused to approach the shore. She would come up obediently to within a few feet, but the nicest calculation and the most delicate persuasion could take her no nearer. At each failure she was obliged to turn quite round, and each evolution took her half-way across the stream, and consumed nearly half an hour. No petted child ever conducted herself in a more refractory manner before company than she before the astonished eyes of the goodly citizens of Alton. Every prank deepened the tint of our captain's hair, whiskers, and face, and was made the occasion of as many jokes as could be uttered till another followed.

"She shows off admirably, captain; nothing could be more fortunate."

"If you could throw her into a fit just before she backs water, she'd be sure to come up."

"If she refuses again, you may as well go on; may be she'll come to her temper at the next landing."

"The wood will be out soon, and then she'll certainly float ashore somewhere."

In the midst of this scene our red-flanneled Hooshier made his appearance. His arms were inserted in his pockets, nigh to the elbow, the fur cap tipped over the left eye, and the thick boots projected more than ever as he leaned against the side of the cabin, raised his upper lip by way of adapting his eyes to the strong sunlight, and inquired with a loud voice into the meaning "of all these hyur turnins." He was informed by Hal that the captain had thought of landing at Alton, but had changed his mind and was now merely showing his boat to the citizens.

"Look hyur, stranger," said he, "do I look as if I could be gummed that easy? I've seed too many boats in my day to believe your story; but if he's trying to land thar, this one takes the rag off them all. I say, cappen, what'll you give me to jump over and put my shouldha under the starn, and shove her up for you? I calculate there wouldn't be much difficulty in doin it, if you'd stop that infarnal old ingine that's whizzin and bustin, below thar. It's about half man-power, I reckon, when it don't leak."

The poor captain became more and more perplexed every moment, and actually went so far as to remove one of his gloves. The people on shore cheered the last two evolutions, and the whole thing had reached the climax of the ridiculous, when, by a fortunate guess on the part of some one, the boat was at last brought alongside the shore, just one hour and a half from the time of the first attempt. Everything had been brought up to the boiling point by the long suspense and severe effort. The perspiration stood in drops on the brow of the agonized captain; the boilers had contracted the rage, and thrown off more steam than had brought us from St. Louis; the very tar had been warmed into greater freedom and threw itself more fearlessly on the luckless by-passers. Our Hooshier had not duly considered this circumstance, and, in the excitement of the moment, he planted himself directly beneath one of these thin filaments. It spun out in a beautiful thread of dark amber, and then, unluckily, parting above, deposited a large lump on the very edge of his cap, and shot off, in a fine stream, to the immaculate bosom of red-flannel below.

"Look hyur, now," said the wrathful Hooshier, doubling his fists; "if any body wants to throw tar on me, he may do it as long as he can stand, after I've had two or three good licks at him. I'm a better steamboat than this when I'm set a-goin, and 'twon't take much such combustible as that tar to fire me up."

The bystanders were greatly amused, but kept themselves at a safe distance, for his arms were swinging about in a manner rather inconvenient to those on the narrow guard.

"Easy, friend, easy," said Hal; "you cannot suppose that any gentleman would throw tar upon you; if you look up, you will see where the insult came from."

"Yes, I see it's the infarnal old boat. I could lick out twenty-four just like her; but there'd be more sense in giving that ruffled carrot yonder a taste of a live man's fists."

A little persuasion, however, cooled his wrath. Our old passengers sprang gladly ashore, and the new ones set their feet upon the plank rather doubtingly, but some one on the fire-deck settled the question by calling out "There won't be another boat till Tuesday."

(From the Revue des Deux Mondes.)

HITHERTO, we find that poets and itinerant singers attribute only amusing peccadilloes to Mr. Punch; but we are approaching the critical period in which his manners begin to be depraved. Swift, in 1729, shows him to us as already on the decline, in a satire in verse, by means of the speech addressed to a disagreeable and turbulent whig, Richard Lighe, here called Timothy, by a poor infirm man, well known in the streets of Dublin, for his tory opinions, named Mad Mullinix. The latter compares his adversary to a malicious Polichinelle, and makes us acquainted, during his speech, with some of the most successful puppet-shows then represented at Dublin.

"Tim, you mistake the matter quite,
The Tories! you are their delight;
And should you act a different part,
Be grave and wise, 'twould break their heart.
Why, Tim, you have a taste, I know,
And often see a puppet show.
Observe, the audience is in pain,
While Punch is hid behind the scene;
But when they hear his rusty voice,
With what impatience they rejoice!
And then they value not two straws,
How Solomon decides the cause,
Which the true mother, which pretender,
Nor listen to the witch of Endor.
Should Faustus, with the devil behind him,
Enter the stage, they never mind him;
If Punch, to stir their fancy, shows
In at the door his monstrous nose,
Then sudden draws it back again.
Oh what a pleasure mixt with pain,
You every moment think an age,
Till he appears upon the stage;

• • • • •
The Duke of Lorraine drew his sword;
Punch roaring ran, and running roar'd,
Reviles all people in his jargon,
And sells the king of Spain, a bargain;
St. George himself he plays the wagon,
And mounts astride upon the dragon;
He gets a thousand thumps and kicks,
Yet cannot leave his roguish tricks;
In every action thrusts his nose,
The reason why, no mortal knows;

• • • • •
There's not a puppet made of wood
But what would hang him if they could;
While teasing all, by all he's teased,
How well are the spectators pleas'd!
Who in the motion have no share,
But purely come to mar and stare;
Have no concern for Sabria's sake,
Which gets the better saint or snake,
Providing Punch (for there's the jest)
Be soundly maul'd and plague the rest.
Thus, Tim, philosophers suppose
The world consists of puppet shows;
Where petulant, conceited fellows,
Perform the part of Punchinelloes;
So at this booth, which all call Dublin,
Tim, thou'rt the Punch to stir up trouble in;
You riggle, fidge, and make a rout,
Put all the other puppets out,
Run on in a perpetual round,
To tease, perplex, disturb, confound,
Intrude with monkey grin and clatter,
To interrupt all serious matter;
Are grown the nuisance of your clan,
Who hate and scorn you to a man;
But then the lookers on, the Tories,
You still divert with merry stories,
They would consent that all the crew
Were hang'd before they'd part with you."

In this portrait, which is not a flattering one, and in some couplets sung in 1731, and taken from a puppet-play,¹ Punch, or rather Punchinello (for thus he styles himself), appears still as a disorderly little fellow, very noisy and tolerably brutal, but he has not yet committed any of those paternal or conjugal enormities, which will soon cause him to bear a striking resemblance to Henry VIII. or Bluebeard. We are, however, reluctant to acknowledge this resemblance; we prefer comparing our friend Punch to Don Juan. Hone has, in fact, drawn a parallel between these two personages, in which, contrary to his usually exact rules, he advances that Punch may have suggested the idea of the character and exploits of the famous "Burlador de Sevilla."² He forgets that even in 1876, when Shadwell introduced the first imitation of Don Juan, "The Libertine Destroyed," on the English stage, Punchinello was not then known in Great Britain. Payne Collier thinks, with much more reason, that the drama of Punch and Judy is of recent date in England, and taking the contrary opinion to Hone, attributes the hyperbolical licences of this composition to the infatuation excited by Mozart's master-piece at the end of the last century. Punch, according to Mr. Payne's definition, is the Don Juan of the populace. The most ancient text in which this talented critic has found any mention of the adventures of Punch and Judy, is a ballad which he does not take to be older than 1790, and which he has extracted from a collection of pieces, some printed, others in manuscript, formed during the years 1791, 1792 and 1793. He supposes these stanzas to have followed the drama at an early period, and to have been composed by an amateur who was delighted with the representation. I may add, that I should not be surprised to find that Mr. Payne was something more than the editor of this ballad. In whatever relation he may be connected with it, I am sure it will be read with pleasure here:—

"Oh! hearken now to me awhile,
A story I will tell you,
Of Mr. Punch, who was a vile,
Deceitful, murderous fellow;
Who had a wife, a child also,
And both of matchless beauty;
The infant's name I do not know,
Its mother's name was Judy.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"But not so handsome Mr. Punch,
Who had a monstrous nose, sir,
And on his back there grew a hunch
That to his head arose, sir,
But then, they said, that he could speak
As winning as a mermaid,
And by his voice, a treble squeak,
He Judy won, that fair maid.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"But he was cruel as a Turk,
Like Turk, was discontented,
To have one wife, 'twas poorish work,
But still the law prevented
His having two, or twenty-two,
Tho' he for all was ready,
So what did he in that case do?
Oh, sad! he kept a lady.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"Now Mrs. Judy found it out,
And being very jealous,
She pull'd her husband by the snout,
His lady gay as well as;

(1) See "Punch and Judy," p. 46.

(2) Hone's "Ancient Mysteries," p. 230.

Then Punch he in a passion flew,
And took it so in dudgeon,
He fairly split her head in two,
Oh, monster! with a bludgeon.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"And next he took his little heir—
A most unnatural father!
And flung it out of a two-pair-Window—for he'd rather Possess the lady of his love
Than lady of the law, sir—
And cared not for her child above
A pinch of Maccaban, sir.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"His wife's relations came to town,
To ask of him the cause, sir;
He took his stick and knock'd 'em down,
And served 'em the same sauce, sir;
And said, the law was not his law,
He cared not for a letter,
And if on him it laid its claw
He'd teach it to know better.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"Then took to travel o'er each land,
So loving and seductive,
Three ladies only could withstand
His lessons most instructive.
The first, a simple rustic maid,
The next, a pious abbess,
The third I'd call, but I'm afraid,
The tabbiest of tabbies.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

* * * * *

"In all his course he scrupled not
To make a jest of murder,
So fathers, brothers, went to pot—
It really makes one shudder
To think upon the horrid track
Of blood he shed in system;
And though with hump upon his back,
The dames could not resist him.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"'Tis said, that he a compact sign'd
With one they call 'Old Nick'las,
But if I knew them, I've no mind
To go into particulars;
To it, perhaps, he owed success
Wherever he might go, sir,
But I believe we must confess,
The ladies were—so so—sir.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"At last he back to England came,
A jolly rake and rover,
And pass'd him by another name,
An alias, when at Dover;
But soon the police laid a scheme
To clap him into prison,
They took him when he least could dream
Of such a fate as his'n.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"And now the day was drawing near—
The day of retribution;
The trial o'er, he felt but queer
At thought of execution:
But when the hangman, all so grim,
Declared that he was ready,
Punch only tipp'd the wink at him,
And ask'd after his lady.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"Pretending he knew not the use
Of rope he saw from tree, sir,
The hangman's head into the noose
He got, while he got free, sir.
At last the Devil came to claim
His own; but Punch, what he meant Demanded, and denied the same—
He knew no such agreement.
Right tol de rol lol, &c.

"You don't!" (the Devil cried,) "'tis well,
I'll quickly let you know it:
And so to furious work they fell,
As hard as they could go it.
The Devil with his pitchfork fought,
While Punch had but a stick, sir,
But kill'd the Devil, as he ought:—
Huzza! there's no Old Nick, sir.
Right tol de rol lol, &c."

I admit, with Mr. Payne Collier, that the drama of which this ballad contains an analysis is of a recent date; but I do not believe it to be so recent as he judges it. In fact, Dr. Johnson, who published his edition of Shakspeare in 1765, says in the last note on "Richard III." that he saw "the devil very lustily belaboured by Punch" in a puppet-show. This was indeed, a very old tradition.

Mr. Payne Collier, although not ignorant of certain truly British features in the physiognomy of our hero, in which he shows us a union of the sensuality of Falstaff and the cold atrocity of King Richard III.,¹ is nevertheless inclined to attribute the principal honour of this creation to France; to which, in truth, a large portion of this popular and now European work belongs. The portion of the French is gaily, and I think we must in conscience reserve to ourselves a large share of this legend. Our claims on this subject are ancient and substantial; they are even anterior to the arrival of Punch in our country. We find that in the old moral-plays, the old Vice contested vigorously with master Devil, and even remonstrated with him concerning capital offences; but at the end master Devil took vengeance on the old sinner, or rather on Sin personified, and carried the old Vice to hell with as little ceremony as Judas, Dr. Faust, or the valet of Friar Bacon. Ben Jonson, in 1616, either of his own fancy or in accepting a new idea from some ingenious stroller, changed the situations of these characters, and presented to us a poor devil surpassed in malice and wickedness by a mere personification of human iniquity. Ben Jonson realized, or at least sketched, this happy idea in "The Devil is an Ass."

"The devil was wont to carry away the Evil,
But now the Evil outcarries the devil."

This novelty pleased the public, and passed from Blackfriars theatre to the puppet-shows; and Punch, on arriving in London from Paris or Amsterdam, failed not to appropriate this part of the character of old Vice his predecessor.² We must, however, observe

(1) "Punch and Judy," p. 76. Shakspeare has signalled the resemblance between Richard and the old Vice:
"Thus like the formal vice, Iniquity,
I moralise two meanings in one word."

(2) Dr. Johnson, in a note on "Hamlet," says that the Vice is the old buffoon of English farces from which Punch is descended. Douce ("Illustrations on Shakspeare," vol. ii. p. 251.) found but little difficulty in proving that there were no ties of relationship that the majesty of Satan is by no means compromised. The devil, who is deceived by a son of Adam, is merely a subaltern devil—he is not Old Nick in person. Besides, to belabour the devil, to carry him away even, is not to kill him. Now to kill the devil, that is the great matter, the chief business, the wonder, like the duel between Satan and Sin in Milton: that is also the grand exploit of Polichinelle. If Ben Jonson has not carried out his idea to this point, we must confess that he, at least, nearly reached it. Besides, it is in the singularity itself that consists the entire merit of Punch and Judy. According to Payne, a strolling puppet-player having one day refused, on the score of religious scruples, to make Punch kill the devil, found himself not only deprived of his money, but also hooted and ill-treated by the spectators.¹

Punch and Judy, the delight of the populace, began to excite the curiosity of the elegant world at the commencement of the nineteenth century. Accordingly it received numerous re-touches and embellishments more or less happy. The "Morning Chronicle" of September 22d, 1813, gives us an account of one of these new and more refined editions. In this drama, Punch, like a second Zeluco, having become a prey to frantic jealousy, murdered his wife and son; he then made his way to Spain, where he was cast into the dungeons of the Inquisition, from which, however, he escaped by means of a golden key. Being attacked by Poverty, who was accompanied by her two attendants, Dissipation and Idleness, he combatted her under the form of a black dog and put her to flight. He triumphed likewise over Disease, who accosted him gloomily in the shape of a doctor. Death, in its turn, attempted to seize him; but he so effectually shook the dry bones of the old skeleton that he at length gave him his death blow.² Amongst other editions we mention one which contains a very original conversation between Punch and Blue-beard, on a subject interesting to both sexes, namely, plurality of wives.

It was none of these embellished versions, but the true and popular text of the "Tragical Comedy of Punch and Judy," that Mr. Payne Collier published in 1828, with George Cruikshank's admirable illustrations. The text was furnished in a great measure by an old Italian puppet-player, named Piccini, who, at the end of the last century, used to exhibit the pretty little puppets he had brought from his native country in the towns and villages of England. Having become more celebrated and less nimble with years he fixed his residence in London. Towards 1820 he carried his little theatre about only in the classic neighbourhood of Drury-lane. He had at first performed Pulcinella in his native tongue, but by degrees he acquired the accent of Punch, and at length adopted the more sober drama preferred by national taste. The editor of Punch and Judy, in order to obtain a perfectly satisfactory text, was obliged to compare Piccini's manuscript with that of several other itinerant puppet-players. Thus Punch, having had his rhapsodies like Homer, like him found an Aristarchus. And more, Punch and Judy, this sensual and sceptical creation, in which life and death, laughter and murder, the supernatural and the trivial, are combined, has made one of the chords of Lord Byron's lyre to vibrate.

But besides this ironical, paradoxical, and ultra-diabolical Punch, there is another Punch, satirical, merry, a free-talker, and always ready to circulate scandal and ridicule. This Punch, a kind of British Figaro, who is personified in our day by a publication bearing his name, began during the last century to take an important part in politics. The following is the title of a puppet-play, printed in 1742: "Politicks in miniature, or the humours of Punch's resignation; tragi-comi-farcical, operatical puppet-show."³ We are inclined to suspect, from the second of Hogarth's large engravings of the elections of 1754, that the puppets were not at that time the last to censure electoral corruption. In this print, named "Canvassing for Votes," amongst various ingenious episodes, we perceive a post from which is suspended a large play-bill like those of the puppet-shows. This bill represents Punch, candidate for the Treasury, walking through the streets with a wheel-barrow full of bank-notes and guineas, which he is distributing indiscriminately among the people. At the bottom of the bill is written, "Punch candidate for Guzzledown."⁴ Another caricature relating to the events of 1756, also reveals to us the title of a puppet-play. It is named, "Punch's Opera, with the Humours of Little Ben the Sailor."⁵

In 1763, some new and very perfect puppets were established at London under the name of Fantoccini, which were made to perform numerous wonderful feats of dexterity.⁶

In 1779, there was a puppet-show in London known by the name of the Pantagonian theatre, situated in Exeter Change. Among the plays there represented was one entitled, "The Apotheosis of Punch; a satirical masque, with a monody on the death of the late Master Punch." It was a very ill-timed parody on a poem, composed under the title of a Monody, by the illustrious Richard Brinsley Sheridan, on the death of Garrick, and recited at the Theatre Royal Drury Lane, the direction of which Sheridan had taken when the great tragedian retired.

From the commencement of the nineteenth century English puppet-shows, and, in particular Punch, have well fulfilled their satirical mission. Not a single celebrated man, nor a remarkable event, has escaped between Punch and the old Vice; but that was not Johnson's meaning. His meaning, which he has better expressed in the last note on "Richard III." is, that Punch, in presenting a superior type of physical and moral deformity, has naturally supplanted and succeeded the old Vice in farces.

the notice of Master Punch. Lord Nelson was very naturally a great favourite. After the battle of the Nile, the puppet-players joined in the universal praise of the victor.

"Come, Punch, my boy," said the naval hero, "come on board, and help me to fight the French. I'll make you a captain or commodore, if you like it." "But I don't like it," said Punch, "I shall be drowned." "Never fear that," resumed Nelson, "he that's born to be hanged will never be drowned."

During one of the elections for Westminster, Sir Francis Burdett had also the honour of being exhibited on the puppet-shows. The baronet is the humble solicitor. "Who are you for, Mr. Punch," says he, "I hope you'll give me your support." "I know nothing about it," replies Punch, "ask my wife, I leave Mistress Punch to manage all these matters." "Very well," says Sir Francis, "and what say you, Mrs. Punch? Bless me—what a pretty little poppet you've got there, I wish mine was like it!" "Well, that may very well happen, Sir Francis; for," observed Mrs. Punch, "for you are very like my husband. You've got a fine handsome nose like his." "That's true, Mistress Judy, but Lady Burdett is not like you," adds the baronet, with a hug. It may well be supposed that Mrs. Judy was not likely to repulse such a gay and gallant candidate.

We must not be surprised at the striking originality presented by some of these political sarcasms, which were thus cast to the wind. Thanks to the incognito which envelops the interpreter of the puppets, many young men of inflammable temperaments and exuberant spirits, have found in Punch a convenient mode of disposing of their superfluous satire or buffoonery. We may mention for instance John Curran, a man who afterwards became celebrated at the bar and in parliament; when he was a young student at Newmarket, his native town, he solicited and obtained the permission of a puppet player to act as interpreter to his puppets for one evening. The talent and wit of the new interpreter charmed the audience, and the collection that evening was four times as large as usual. Delighted with his success, young Curran employed himself in this manner for some days; but on perceiving with what facility he could furnish his little clients with arguments for and against, he decided on his profession, and began to study for the bar, where he distinguished himself as a brilliant and able advocate. He afterwards became a member of the Irish Parliament and of the House of Commons; and in 1806, under the administration of Fox and Sheridan, he was appointed Master of the Rolls in Ireland, and had a seat in the Privy Council.¹ Might it not be some future and mischievous colleague of Sir Francis Burdett, who, behind the scenes of a puppet-show, so cleverly ridiculed the candidate for Westminster?

We now find puppet-players attempting to represent donkey-races in order to please the taste of the multitude. In some of these performances, Punch, who, as is well known, is not a very clever horseman, performs with great success the parts of a better and horsedealer.²

We must not, however, imagine that the itinerant puppet-players and gallantee-showmen of London had entirely abandoned their religious shows. Besides "Jephthah's Rash Vow," which, as we have seen, was performed in the time of Fielding; and "the Court of Solomon," of which Goldsmith speaks in his comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer,"³ Hone introduces to us a very talented artist, Laverge, who almost to the present day retained his religious shows. His theatre, under the name of the "Royal Gallantee-show," was in 1818 in Ely-court, Holborn-hill; he there, as well as in private houses, exhibited the "Passion of Jesus Christ," "Noah's Ark," "the Prodigal Son," and a fanciful and legendary play, entitled "Pull devil, Pull baker," in which a baker who gives false weight is carried to hell in his own basket by the devil.⁴

Punch and puppet-shows have not only had, as we just remarked, their rhapsodies and Aristarchuses; they have also met with an Aristotle.—I mean, a critic at once ingenious and philosophical, who has condescended to fathom the cause of the universal affection for puppets. In his excellent "Lectures on English Comic Writers," at the end of the first chapter (on "Wit and Humour,") Mr. Hazlitt has briefly but clearly and satisfactory indicated some of the natural causes of the irresistible and universal attraction of puppet-shows. I regret that we cannot at present follow this learned critic; but I have thought it my duty at least to notice his work, and refer the reader thereto for further details.

I shall terminate the history of English Puppet-shows, by mentioning a fact which is particularly honourable to them. Dr. Johnson, who was a great admirer of puppet-shows, frequently declared in private that puppets could act Shakspeare's plays quite as well as living actors; and that, in his opinion, the effect of Macbeth in particular was diminished rather than heightened by the theatrical scenery, "et quid quid telorum habent armentaria theatri." Boswell, in confirming the authenticity of this singular remark, observes that the judicious and humorous critic does not state this opinion in his commentary on Shakspeare, nor in any of his printed works. This was but one of the numerous freaks which he took into his head in the heat of conversation, and which was in a great measure occasioned by his prejudice against comedians.⁵ Be that as it may, before the end of the last century, a puppet-player, named Henry Rowe, who certainly could not have known the opinion of the learned scholar, conceived the bold idea of representing Shakspeare's plays by means of his little wooden actors. He himself recited the whole of the dramas, and with taste and energy, as those who witnessed the representations have informed us. He continued his performances for several years in York, his native town. And, what is still more worthy of remark, he not only performed Macbeth in this manner for a long period, but in 1797 he printed an edition of this play with notes, and the work of a humble puppet-showman now takes its stand with the numerous other works written to elucidate and honour Shakspeare. This Henry Rowe was a man of a very original disposition, and a good musician. He was designated the "York trumpet," because he had sounded the charge and the retreat at the battle of Culloden, and because, on his return to his native town after the submission of the Jacobites, he sounded his trumpet in all public solemnities, for nearly fifty years. He died in 1800; it is to be regretted that in the following verses, written in his honour, no mention is made of his puppets. I would I were a poet, that I might write another epitaph on Henry Rowe; then would I associate his modest name with those of Shakspeare, Komble, and Mrs. Siddons.

The Doctor's antipathy to actors arose from the imperfection of his organs, (he was partially deaf and shortsighted;) from the failure of his own tragedy, "Irene;" and from the large fortune that Garrick, his pupil, had made, by means of talents which Dr. Johnson considered far inferior to his own. That did not, however, prevent his esteeming and loving the great actor. Garrick, on his part, used to say of Johnson, that he had nothing of the bear but the skin.

"When the great angel blows the judgment trump,
He also must give Harry Rowe a thump,
If not, poor Harry will never awake,
But think it is his own trumpet, by mistake;
He blew it all his life with potent skill,
And but for want of breath had blown it still."

MY AUNT SARAH'S LETTERS.

LETTER II.

12, — Square, Belfast; October, 1850.

MY DEAR NEPHEW,

I hope that grand waiter at the Fleetwood Hotel was as good as his word, and duly posted my letter to you; if so, you know all I had to tell you up to that point. I closed my letter in the midst of a hubbub of children, servant, and father, who were all assembling in the sitting-room, and putting on hats and cloaks ready to go on board. The excitement of the children at this stage of the proceedings was tremendous. None but the two eldest—John and Sophia—had ever even seen the sea till they reached Fleetwood; and, now, to be actually going to sail upon it—and at night, too!—it was too much for their self-control. They danced, and shouted, and kissed each other and their father and me. Occasionally one of the boys would try to tease his sisters by telling them that the voyage was a dangerous one; that ships were often lost in the Irish sea—that it was very likely we should be wrecked—at all events, if we were not, it was certain that we should be sea-sick. Some of the little ones began to cry at the idea of being drowned; and little Mary was much alarmed at the idea of being sea-sick; she did not seem to care for the drowning so much. Upon inquiry I found that you had once described, in her hearing, your sensations during a passage from Brighton to Dieppe. This has made a deep impression on her mind, especially that part in which you declared that you would have been grateful to any one who would have thrown you over-board. Poor little Mary! she had no idea that the same exaggerated form of saying, "I was very sick and melancholy," has been used by almost everybody who has ever been at sea. The thought of the coming torments weighed upon her mind. She sat still, with the tears in her large eyes, ready dressed. I went up to her, and asked what was the matter—"Oh! Do you really think I shall be so very sea-sick?" And then she poured forth a tearful repetition of what you had said. I tried to console her, as well as I could. But I was a hypocrite (as women so often are), for I felt none of the security and disregard of sickness and danger, which I endeavoured to instil into her mind. To say the truth, I was horribly afraid, for a tolerably brave woman. I was even glad to have little Mary, to put courage into. I waited with some of the children, while Mr. Denham took the others and the maid on board the steamer. Our berths had been secured before. Mr. Denham soon returned, in high spirits, with an invigorating account of the night. He seemed to be much relieved at the prospect of an excellent passage; and confessed to me, that if it had been an ugly night, he would not have trusted his family to the mercies of the Irish Sea, but would have waited at Fleetwood till fair weather came. But at this time of year, fair weather is seldom seen in these narrow seas, I am told. The passage from Fleetwood to Belfast is almost always a rough one.

We were singularly fortunate in every respect. Nothing could be more beautiful and quiet than the appearance of everything as we went on board. The moon was shining in a cloudless, dark blue sky;—the sea was as smooth, and the air was as still as possible. It was cold, but there was no wind. The tranquil beauty of the time seemed to have touched the hearts of all. The children spoke only in whispers: and the crew also spoke to each other in undertones. The other passengers, who stood at first in dark groups on the deck, spoke quietly, but in cheerful tones. I went down into the narrow closet called the Ladies' Cabin, where I found Ann, and the other children, all comfortably undressed in their berths. Poor Ann was sadly tired. The stewardess had helped them all to bed, and was now ready to do the same for me, and my party of young ones. Little Mary declared that she was not at all sleepy, and I allowed her to go up to the deck again to her two brothers and her father. I intended to follow her there, as soon as little Frank was comfortably in bed. We were still at anchor, and the vessel was quite motionless; and as one of the children observed, "we might just as well be on land, for there was no tossing and tumbling." It was a great deal more easy and comfortable than we expected. When I returned to the deck, I told Mr. Denham of my intention to try and sleep there. I felt sure, that I should be less ill there, than in the crowded little cabin, and at Mary's earnest entreaty I promised that she should stay with me. Cloaks and shawls were soon spread over a bench on the deck. Here I settled little Mary at one end, and then lay down at the other. The child was delighted, you may be sure. All her fears seemed to have vanished. Watching the passengers, as they walked briskly up and down the deck, she lay in the moonlight, snugly wrapped up, and talking about fifty things to her father, who stood beside us, smoking his cigar, before going to bed. John and Tom were watching the crew getting under weigh. The noise of getting up the steam, and then raising the anchor, was a very quiet noise compared with the railroad. The sounds seemed subdued by the soft beauty of the night. After Mr. Denham left us, with a smiling assurance that we should be obliged to go below very soon, I lay looking at the moonlit sky, and the retreating lights of Fleetwood. The sides of the vessel were too high to allow of my seeing the sea from that position. It was a deep enjoyment to drink in the repose of that hour. Presently, a gentleman, who had watched our arrangements with considerable interest, and who was now quietly pacing the deck alone, stopped beside me, and offered the use of a great boat-cloak, which he had among his luggage. "If you intend to lie here long, you will be glad of it, for it is getting very cold." I thanked him, and he fetched the cloak, and laid it over us, covering little Mary, who was now dosing, very tenderly. I like to see a grown man—a man of the world, whose time is little employed in cultivating the gentler feelings—I like to see such a person kind and gentle to children. I formed a favourable opinion of this individual in consequence; and we entered into conversation. You know, Sterling, I am long past the age when it would be thought indecorous for a woman to enter into conversation with a strange man. To tell you a secret, I never was of an age when I myself should have had any thought of impropriety in conversing with such a sensible, agreeable, unaffected individual as the one in question. He was well acquainted with the Irish Sea, and seemed to have crossed it very frequently, in all directions. He was not an Irishman; from a few trifles in his speech, I guessed he was from Yorkshire. He said we were very fortunate; that the boat on which we were, was the best boat in the channel, (The Prince of Wales;) that he had never seen the sea calmer than it was then, and that he felt sure we should have a remarkably smooth passage. He talked a good deal, and well, about Ireland, and the north of England. Presently, he bade me good night, and went down stairs. It was now half-past eleven, and no one remained above but the captain and the man at the helm. Mary was fast asleep, with her sweet little face half hidden in a black shawl—looking, as you or any other poetical young gentleman would say, like a young moon behind a cloud. I watched her, and the bright starry moony sky above, alternately; and thought of many days long gone by, when I had no more care than the child, and seemed to have as boundless a heaven of hope to wander in, as the moon and stars. Seeming, it is, or was, in both cases; for they run in their fixed orbits, and my hopes have done the same, and are still ending, still beginning. God's governance of his creatures is unspeakably good and tender. How much have I to be thankful for!—and I was thankful and hopeful too, as I breathed the fresh, cold sea-breeze, and looked forward to the new home of these motherless children, which I was allowed to help them to establish. It was no interruption to my thoughts about that, and you, and all dear to me, to hear the captain's measured tread on the deck, and his occasional orders to the steersman—"Don't go to Nor'rard"—"Wear ship"—"Starboard! and quickly, too."—These words were not spoken in a loud tone, but as if they partook of the tranquil nature of my waking dream. Presently I dosed. Once I woke and found the good-natured captain was slipping a pillow under my head. He thought my "head wanted righting," he said, and so he "went below, and got a pillow." This made me perfectly comfortable. I heard and saw no more, till a voice sounded in my ears—"Come, ladies! you are losing all the beautiful scenery." I got up at once, and so did little Mary. The sun was rising out of the water, tinging the clouds with red and gold, and we were sailing fast up the Lough of Belfast, with mountains in the distance on either hand, and the town in front of us, though yet a long way off.—"Beautiful!" exclaimed Mary. "Oh! if that is Belfast, we shall like that fifty times better than Rochester or Kennington. How nice it is to be on the sea! Have I slept here all night, in the open air?"—"Yes, Mary, and what has become of the sickness?"—"I forgot all about it. I have not been sick, have I?"—"No; no one has been sick, this time," said the captain. "I never remember a smoother passage, and we have done it in an hour less than usual. We shall have been only eleven hours. Oh! she is a capital boat!" After looking about us a little longer, I took Mary with me, to the cabin, that we might get some water and wash our faces, and arrange our dress in the best way we could, for going ashore. The Ladies' Cabin presented a strange spectacle of women lying in their berths, and merry, happy little children, tumbling about the floor half-naked, waiting for Ann, and other servants, to wash them. I stayed to help her, and to send the noisy little prattlers up to the deck. Ann was quite astonished at what she called my imprudence in sleeping on deck, and could hardly be persuaded that Mary had not taken a mortal cold. It was impossible to make her understand, that it was far more imprudent to sleep in that crowded cabin, inhaling bad air at every breath, than to brave the little extra cold of the sea-breeze. I am sure, Mary was all the better for it, and so am I. When the cabin was cleared, I left Ann to put up the carpet bags, and went on deck. There I found Mr. Denham, standing in the midst of the children, watching the entrance of the vessel into the harbour. We were soon alongside of the quay; and the gang-way was let down. It was evident that we were in a new country, from the aspect of the quay itself. Such groups of ragged, patched, and vociferous porters! eagerly gesticulating and screaming to the people on board our vessel, in offer of their services, to carry luggage, or get a car. Their costume was an ingenious variety of colourings. They all wore long great coats, hanging down to their heels; but no coat had sleeves of the same colour as the body; and, in general the right sleeve varied from the left in colour; often, one side of the skirt of a coat was blue, and the other brown. Some of these men looked like mere bundles of rags; but they all had animated faces, and all carried thick sticks in their hands. The amount of eloquence they poured forth upon those whom they wished to make their prey, was quite wonderful. Their voices sound full and rich, (the brogue here is strong.) I could not help thinking, they were very much like what I have read of Italian lazzaroni—barring the long coats. There was much mirth and drollery going on among them. I was pleased to see no evidence of starvation in their faces; but as Mr. Denham told me, Belfast is the most flourishing town in these parts, and all the poor are fully employed. I wish you could have seen the queer cars, and cabs, and omnibuses, which these excited porters were leading and backing about in all directions. The very horses seemed to have acquired some of the exuberant energy of the men, and pranced about in a quite unnecessary style. As we stood on the vessel, watching the busy scene on the quay, we were kept in fits of laughter. We were waiting for Mr. Macdonald, the friend whom Mr. Denham expected to meet and conduct us to our new abode. As it was probable that he would bring carriages and porters, Mr. Denham sturdily refused the vociferous solicitations of the men on the quay, who were evidently very much puzzled and excited by our remaining beside a load of luggage, on the deck of the steamer, long after every other passenger had disappeared. We were surprised not to see Mr. Macdonald; but at length it occurred to me, that as the vessel had arrived an hour earlier than she was expected, Mr. Macdonald would not think of appearing yet. Mr. Denham then proposed that he and one of the boys should set off to his house. I longed to be on shore, and, as I could be of more use in preparing breakfast at the house, than I could be in standing there on the deck of the Prince of Wales, I offered to go with John, instead of his father, whom I wished to remain with the children, in case of accidents. John was carefully impressing on my mind the fact that the Belfast tradespeople are more than half Scotch, and therefore, that I must not expect to be enlivened by Irish bulls and Irish drollery in my intercourse with them: just as he had explained this fully, and I was beginning to fear that I should enjoy neither brogue nor bulls in my visit to Ireland, we went into a shop, to ask our way. "Which is our nearest way to—Street?" asked I, of a good-tempered looking woman behind the counter. She looked at us, without speaking, for an instant, and I thought she declined speaking at all, when she came slowly from behind her counter, and walked to the door. There she stood, and uttered these words, in a rich full brogue—"There!—ye must go round the corner, to the High Street, where the arch is—and presently ye'll come to the corn-market, where the Butchers are—ye'll turn straight, and then ye'll niver have to turn again at all—only three times—if ye don't miss ye're way."

We thanked her, though we had gained nothing by her information, except the certainty that brogue and bulls were not extinct in Belfast.

We soon found Mr. Macdonald, who was about to sally forth to the harbour. He gave us a warm welcome, and as our new home was close by, he conducted me and John there, before he went to fetch the others. By the time the whole party arrived, it was past eight o'clock, and by the help of a clever, active Irish girl, (a servant the Macdonalds have hired for us,) I had got a cheerful breakfast ready. But before breakfast, you may be sure, we all inspected every hole and corner in the new house, and had even assigned the chief rooms to their proper purposes.

By this time I was overcome with fatigue, and went up stairs to bed. I slept several hours, and woke much refreshed. Since then, I have been attending to the children and the servants, and have written this letter; and now, I must dress for dinner.

Hark! there is a tremendous knock at the door. I wonder who that is. It should be the Lord Lieutenant, at least.

Little Mary has just been in. Who do you suppose gave that knock at the door? It was a boy, with a pennyworth of onions! Mary tells me that the beggars and the tradespeople all come to the door with double knocks, and that Ann is quite scandalized at the custom. I begin to be curious about the town. Mary has been out, and reports wonders. Good-bye for the present. Mind you do not sit up too late. Let me hear soon, how you get on without

Your affectionate Aunt,
SARAH STERLING.

We have heard the title of this book called affected. To our thinking the epithet is very ill-chosen. A better title could scarcely have been adopted, since the author might fairly presume that those who read his works understand metaphor as well as matter of fact. The word "yeast" is admirably suggestive of the substance of this book; of the form, nothing certain could be predicated from the title: it might be a treatise; it might be detached, half-worked out essays; it might be a poem; it might be a novel. As it is our present business to give an account of the work, we may as well say that it partakes of the nature of all these. It is a talé vigorously sketched, with meaning and purpose in every line. The fire, and eloquence, and pathos are irresistible, and although more finish and fulness might be demanded by moralists as well as by artists, and with some justice, yet we are by no means sure that the book would have been better if the writer had bestowed more pains upon the story itself. What he desires is, that his readers should take the pains to carry on this "Story Without an End" for themselves. In reading "Yeast," your business is not to give yourself up entirely into the hands of the author, but to watch and weigh carefully what he writes. As he says in the epilogue, "I have set forth, as far as in me lay, the data of my Problem: and surely, if the premises be given, wise men will not have to look far for the conclusion. In homely English, I have given my readers yeast: if they be what I take them for, they will be able to bake with it themselves." But, be it remembered, this yeast is not of our author's manufacture; he has but skimmed it off from the surface of the great fermenting vat of Society in England, and that eminent brewing company should be well acquainted with the truth of the old adage, "as you brew, so you must bake." If the staff of life baked in England in these days be somewhat bitter, the cause is mainly in the yeast, as will be seen by those who recognise the truths which Mr. Kingsley has stated so forcibly in the volume before us. The tale appeared, at first, in parts, in "Fraser's Magazine," and is now published in one volume, with corrections and additions, and a preface; which last is of much assistance to those who have seen nothing of the work before, as it states clearly the author's intention in writing it:—

"This little tale was written two or three years ago, in the hope that it might help to call the attention of wiser and better men than I am, to the questions which are now agitating the minds of the rising generation, and to the absolute necessity of solving them at once and earnestly, unless we would see the faith of our forefathers crumble away beneath the combined influence of new truths which are fancied to be incompatible with it, and new mistakes as to its real essence. That this can be done, I believe and know: if I had not believed it, I would never have put pen to paper on the subject.

"I believe that the ancient Creed, the eternal Gospel, will stand and conquer, and prove its might in this age as it has in every other for eighteen hundred years, by claiming and subduing, and organizing those young anarchic forces, which now, unconscious of their parentage, rebel against Him to whom they owe their being.

"But, for the time being, the young men and women of our day are fast parting from their parents and each other. The more thoughtful are wandering either towards Rome, towards sheer materialism, or towards an unchristian and unphilosophic spiritualist epicureanism, which in my eyes, is the worst evil spirit of the three, precisely because it looks, at first sight, most like an angel of light. The mass, again, are fancying that they are still adhering to the old Creeds, the old Church, to the honoured patriarchs of English Protestantism. I wish I could agree with them in their belief about themselves. To me they seem—with a small sprinkling of those noble and cheering exceptions to popular error which are to be found in every age of Christ's Church—to be losing most fearfully and rapidly the living spirit of Christianity, and to be for that very reason clinging all the more convulsively—and who can blame them?—to the outward letter of it, whether High Church or Evangelical; unconsciously all the while that they are sinking out of real living belief into that dead self-deceiving belief in believing, which has been always heretofore, and is becoming in England now, the parent of the most blind, dishonest, and pitiless bigotry. In the following pages I have attempted to show what some, at least, of the young in these days are really thinking and feeling."

Taken as a mere tale, "Yeast" is superior to its elder brother, "Alton Locke." It is more lifelike, and even more heart-stirring, because its sympathy is not only with the sufferings of the working classes, but with the sufferings of all classes. Although there is no character in "Yeast" so likely to live in men's memories as that of Sandy Mackay in "Alton Locke," (Tregarva, the Cornish keeper, in spite of its cleverness and beauty, being sometimes more like an abstract ideal sketch, than a drawing from the life,) yet all the dramatic persons in "Yeast," however slightly indicated, are living, breathing human beings. The hero, though very unlike a hero, in the circulating-library meaning of the word, is an admirable and vigorous representative of the cultivated young gentleman of England at the present time. In spite of the rough, undressed-up, and somewhat audacious picture of Lancelot Smith, we believe the young men of the privileged classes will not be inclined to repudiate him as a type, as the young chartists repudiate "Alton Locke." Lancelot Smith is strong—Alton Locke is painfully weak. The one has the true stuff of manliness in him, and the other has not.

It is to the development of the character of Lancelot Smith that all the philosophy, poetry, religion, and politics of the book is supposed to subserve. He is the Young Man of the Age whom the Age is to educate; and we are shown skilfully and truly how it does educate him, up to a certain point. Properly speaking, the tale has not beginning, middle, or end. It begins in the middle, with a fox-hunt on a November day, which, by accident, brings about the first meeting between Lancelot and the heroine, who is a type of a certain class of young women of the day—a rapidly increasing class.

As the scrap of description with which the philosophy of fox-hunting begins is very good, we will give it for the benefit of our readers.

"The edge of a great fox-cover; a flat wilderness of low leafless oaks, fortified by a long dreary thorn-capped clay ditch, with sour red water oozing out at every yard; a broken gate leading into a straight wood-ride, ragged with dead grasses and black with fallen leaves; the centre mashed into a quagmire by innumerable horse-hoofs; some forty red coats and some four black; a sprinkling of young farmers, resplendent in gold buttons and green; a pair of sleek drab stable-keepers, showing off horses for sale; the surgeon of the Union, in Macintosh and Antigropelos; two holiday school-boys with trousers strapped down to bursting point, like a penny-steamer's safety valve; a midshipman, the only merry one in the field, bumping about on a fretting sweating hack, with its nose a foot above its ears; and Lancelot Smith, who then kept two good horses, and 'rode forward,' as a fine young fellow of three-and-twenty who can afford it, and has nothing else to do, has a very good right to ride."

The dash and spirit seen in the foregoing pervades the entire work, with a few exceptions. The tone is strong, fresh, bold;—and as unlike that of a sermon or a treatise on moral philosophy as can well be, while the subjects handled are of the very gravest. This may be seen by the following account of the hero, as he is when first presented to the reader.

"He was now in the fifth act of his 'Werthercan' stage, that sentimental measles which all clever men must catch once in their lives, and which generally, like the physical measles, if taken early settles their constitution for good or evil, if taken late goes far towards killing them.

"Lancelot had found Byron and Shelley pall on his taste, and commenced devouring Bulwer and worshipping 'Ernest Maltravers.' He had left Bulwer for old ballads and romances and Mr. Carlyle's reviews; was next alternately Chivalry-mad and Germany-mad; was now reading hard at physical science; and on the whole trying to become a great man, without any clear notion of what a great man ought to be. Real education he never had had. Bred up at home under his father, a rich merchant, he had gone to college with a large stock of general information, and a particular mania for dried plants, fossils, butterflies, and sketching, and some such creed as this:—

"That he was very clever.

"That he ought to make his fortune.

"That a great many things were very pleasant, beautiful things among the rest.

"That it was a fine thing to be 'superior,' gentlemanlike, generous, and courageous.

"That a man ought to be religious.

And left college with a good smattering of classics and mathematics, picked up in the intervals of boat-racing and hunting, and much the same creed as he brought with him, except in regard to the last article. The scenery-and-natural-history mania was now somewhat at a discount. He had discovered a new natural object including in itself all—more than all—yet found beauties and wonders—woman!

"Draw, draw the veil and weep, guardian angel! if such there be. What was to be expected. Pleasant things were pleasant—there was no doubt of that, whatever else might be doubtful. He had read Byron by stealth; he had been flogged into reading

Ovid and Tibullus; and commanded by his private tutor to read Martial and Juvenal for the improvement of his style. All conversation on the subject of love had been prudishly avoided, as usual, by his parents and teachers. The parts of the Bible which spoke of it had been always kept out of his sight. Love had been to him, practically, ground tabooed and 'carnal.' What was to be expected? Just what happened. If woman's beauty had nothing holy in it, why should his fondness for it? Just what happens every day—that he had to sow his wild oats for himself, and eat the fruit thereof, and the dirt thereof also.

"Oh, fathers! fathers! and you clergymen, who monopolise education! either tell boys the truth about love, or do not put into their hands, without note or comment, the foul devil's lies about it, which make up the mass of the Latin poets; and then go, fresh from teaching Juvenal and Ovid, to declaim at Exeter-hall against Peter Dens' well-meaning prurience! Had we not better take the beam out of our own eye before we meddle with the mote in the Jesuit's?"

In this state of mind Lancelot Smith, on the day of the before-mentioned fox-hunt, emerging behind his companions, sees issuing from a little old chapel in the hills, Argemone Lavington, the eldest daughter of the owner of the hounds.

"That face and figure, and the spirit which spoke through them, entered his heart at once never to leave it. Her features were aquiline and grand, without a shade of harshness; her eyes shone out like twin lakes of still azure, beneath a broad marble cliff of polished forehead; her rich chestnut hair rippled downward round the towering neck. With her perfect masque and queenly figure, and earnest upward gaze, she might have been the very model from which Raphael conceived his glorious St. Catherine—the ideal of the highest womanly genius, softened into self-forgetfulness by girlish devotion. She was simply, almost coarsely, dressed; but a glance told him she was a lady, by the courtesy of man as well as by the will of God.

"They gazed one moment more at each other, but what is time to spirits? With them, as well as with their father, one day is as a thousand years. But that eye-wedlock was cut short the next instant by the decided interference of the horse, who, thoroughly disgusted at his master's whole conduct, gave a significant shake of his head, and, shamming frightened (as both women and horses do when only cross), commenced a war-dance, which drove Argemone Lavington into the porch, and gave the bewildered Lancelot an excuse for dashing madly up the hill after his companions.

"'What a horribly ugly face!' said Argemone to herself; 'but so clever and so unhappy!'

Blest pity! true mother of that graceless scamp, young Love, who is ashamed of his real pedigree, and swears to this day that he is the child of Venus!—the coxcomb!

Lancelot bewitched by this apparition, mismanages his horse and is thrown.—A broken leg—concussion of the brain—a hospitable reception in the mansion of Squire Lavington, and a prolonged nursing there by his friend Colonel Bracebridge, are the direct consequences of this fall; the indirect and more important consequences are his recovery and leisure to go “deeper and deeper still” in his love for Argemone, and the social philosophy, politics and religion, which pour forth in a living stream from the hearts of all the chief personages, especially from that of Tregarva the keeper, one of the lower classes, who has his patent of nobility direct from the King of kings, and who inevitably becomes an influential person wherever he is disposed to lend a hand. That our land produces men of the Tregarva kind, we believe and know. May such yeast or leaven in the working-classes ultimately leaven the whole mass! In the meantime, gentlemen and clergymen, like our author, do well to recognise, and to make the world recognise, the existence and value of these “unaccredited heroes,” and the world should thank them accordingly. Of Argemone and her sister Honoria much might be said; but we confine ourselves to the following:—

“Argemone was busy in her boudoir (too often a true boudoir to her) among books and statuettes, and dried flowers, fancying herself, and not unfairly, very intellectual. She had four new manias every year. Her last winter’s one had been that bottle and squirt mania, mis-called chemistry; her spring madness was for the Greek drama. She had devoured Schlegel’s lectures, and thought them divine; and now she was hard at work on Sophocles, with a little help from translations, and thought she understood him every word. Then she was somewhat High Church in her notions, and used to go up every Wednesday and Friday to the chapel in the hills, where Lancelot had met her, for an hour’s mystic devotion, set off by a little graceful asceticism.

“And here a word about Honoria, to whom nature, according to her wont with sisters, had given almost everything which Argemone wanted, and denied almost everything which Argemone had, except beauty. And even in that, the many-sided mother had made her a perfect contrast to her sister,—tiny and luscious, dark eyed, and dark haired; as full of wild simple passion as an Italian, thinking little except where she felt much, which was indeed everywhere; for she lived in a perpetual April shower of exaggerated sympathy for all suffering, whether in novels or in life; and daily gave the lie to that shallow old calumny, that fititious sorrows harden the heart to real ones. Argemone was almost angry with her sometimes, when she trotted whole days about the village from school to sick-room; perhaps conscience hinted to her that her duty, too, lay rather there than among her luxurious day-dreams. But alas! though she would have indignantly repelled the accusation of selfishness, yet in self and for self alone she lived; and while she had force of will for any so-called self-denial, and would fast herself cross and stupified, and quite enjoy kneeling thinly clad and barefoot on the freezing chapel floor on a winter’s morning, yet her fastidious delicacy revolted at sitting, like Honoria, beside the bed of the ploughman’s consumptive daughter in a rocking, stifling, lean-to garret, in which had slept the night before, the father, mother, and two grown-up boys; not to mention a new-married couple, the sick girl, and alas! her baby. And of such bed-chambers there were too many in Whitford Priors.”

Lancelot has no relations but an uncle, a banker; whose bank stops payment, whereby Lancelot is in due time deprived of all worldly goods;—and a cousin, a Tractarian Curate, to whom he writes as follows, (sitting up one night during his convalescence, to do so, in disobedience to the express commands of his doctors and nurses):—

“You complain that I waste my time in field sports. How do you know that I waste my time? I find within myself certain appetites; and I suppose that the God whom you say made me, made these appetites as a part of me. Why are they to be crushed any more than any other part of me? I am the whole of what I find in myself—am I to pick and choose myself out of myself? And besides, I feel that the exercise of freedom, activity, foresight, daring, independent self-determination, even in a few minutes’ burst across country, strengthens me in mind as well as in body. It might not do so to you; but you are of a different constitution, and, from all I see, the power of a man’s muscles, the excitability of his nerves, the shape and balance of his brain, make him what he is. Else what is the meaning of physiognomy? Every man’s destiny, as the Turks say, stands written on his forehead. One does not need two glances at your face to know that you would not enjoy fox-hunting,—that you would enjoy book-learning and ‘refined repose,’ as they are pleased to call it. Every man carries his character in his brain. You all know that, and act upon it when you have to deal with a man for sixpence; but your religious dogmas, which make out that every man comes into the world equally brutish and fiendish, make you afraid to confess it. I don’t quarrel with a ‘douce’ man like you, with a large organ of veneration, for following your bent. But if I am fiery, with a huge cerebellum, why am I not to follow mine? For that is what you do, after all,—what you like best. It is all very easy for a man to talk of conquering his appetites when he has none to conquer. Try and conquer your organ of veneration, or of benevolence, or of calculation,—then I will call you an ascetic. Why not? The same Power which made the front of one’s head made the back, I suppose?”

“And, I tell you, hunting does me good. It awakens me out of my dreary mill-round of metaphysics. It sweeps away that infernal web of self-consciousness, and absorbs me in outward objects; and my red-hot Perillus bull cools in proportion as my horse warms. I tell you, I never saw a man who could cut out his way across country, who could not cut his way through better things when his turn came. The cleverest and noblest fellows are sure to be the best riders in the long run; and as for bad company and the ‘world,’ when you take to going in the first-class carriages for fear of meeting a swearing sailor in the second-class—when those who have ‘renounced the world,’ give up buying and selling in the funds—when my uncle, the pious banker, who will only ‘associate’ with the truly religious, gives up dealing with any scoundrel or heathen who can ‘do business’ with him,—then you may quote pious people’s opinions to me. In God’s name, if the Stock Exchange and railway stagnating, and the advertisements in the Protestant Hue-and-Cry, and the frantic Mammon-hunting which has been for the last fifty years the peculiar pursuit of the majority of Quakers, Dissenters, and Religious Churehmen, are not ‘The World,’ what is it? I don’t complain of them, though; Puritanism has interdicted to them all art, all excitement, all amusement—except money-making. It is their dernier ressort, poor souls!

“But you must explain to us naughty fox-hunters, how all this agrees with the good book. We see plainly enough, in the meantime, how it agrees with ‘poor human nature.’ We see that the ‘religious world,’ like the ‘great world,’ and the ‘sporting world,’ and the ‘literary world,’

‘Compounds for sins she is inclined to,
By damning those she has no mind to;’

and that because England is a money-making country, and money-making is an effeminate pursuit, therefore all sedentary and spongy sins, like covetousness, slander, bigotry and self-conceit, are to be cockered and plastered over, while the more masculine vices, and no-vices also, are mercilessly hunted down by your cold-blooded, soft-handed religionists.

“This is a more quiet letter than usual from me, my dear coz, for many of your reproofs cut me home: they angered me at the time; but I deserve them. I am miserable, self-disgusted, self-helpless, craving for freedom, and yet crying aloud for some one to come and guide me, and teach me; and who is there in these days, who could teach a fast man, even if he would try? Be sure, that as long as you and yours make piety a synonym for unmanliness, you will never convert either me or any other good sportsman.”

On a hasty perusal of the book, it might be objected that the Tractarian cousin is made a mere man of straw, in fighting for what he believes to be the truth against Lancelot’s infidelity.—But on due consideration, the reader will see that this is done on purpose. To all the arguments against Lancelot’s life and opinions of a simple and pious youth of this kind, really suffering for conscience sake, but as Lancelot believes mistakenly—Lancelot would cry “connu.” They would not reach his difficulty. He loves his cousin, but he has no respect for his intellect, though he has much for his conscience. Lancelot’s conversion is effected by very different and far more painful means;—partly by loss of fortune, station, friends, worldly hopes, and—of his beloved by death; and partly by commune with men of superior mind to himself, who are believers—Tregarva, and a strange omnipresent, omniscient man, who is a mysterious benefactor to everybody, and who has neither a local habitation nor a name. Lancelot’s cousin, of course, is made to go over to Rome. On this subject, Lancelot writes to him in his usual straightforward, unmitigated fashion. What he here puts in bold words, nestles in timid half-thoughts or stalks tyrannically through the mind of the present generation, as imperious whole thoughts, and needs a wholesome expression.

“It is a relief to me, at least, dear Luke, that you are going to Rome in search of a great idea, and not merely from selfish superstitious terror (as I should call it) about the ‘salvation of your soul.’ And it is a new and very important thought to me, that Rome’s scheme of this world, rather than of the next, forms her chief allurements. But as for that flesh and spirit question, or the apostolic succession one either; all you seem to me, as a looker-on, to have logically proved, is that Protestants, orthodox and unorthodox, must be a little more scientific and careful in their use of terms. But as for adopting your use of them, and the consequences thereof, you must pardon me, and I suspect, them too. Not that—anything but that—Whatever is right, that is wrong. Better to be inconsistent in truth than consistent in a mistake—and your Romish idea of man is a mistake—utterly wrong and absurd—expect in the one requirement of righteousness and godliness, which Protestant and heathen philosophers have required, and do require, just as much as you. My dear Luke, your ideal men and women won’t do, for they are not men and women at all, but what you call ‘saints.’ . . . Your calendar, your historic list of the earth’s worthies, won’t do—not they, but others, are the people who have brought humanity thus far. I don’t deny that there are great souls amongst them; Becket, and Hugh Grosstetes, and Elizabeths of Hungary. But you are the last people to praise them, for you don’t understand them. Thierry honours Thomas à Becket more than all canonizations and worshippers do, because he does see where the man’s true greatness lay, and you don’t. Why, you may hunt all Surius for such a biography of a mediæval worthy as Carlisle has given of your Abbot Samson. I have read, or tried to read, your Surius, and Alban Butler, and so forth, and they seemed to me bats and asses. One really pitied the poor saints and martyrs for having such blind biographers—such dunghill cocks, who overlooked the pearl of real human love and nobleness in them, in their greediness to scratch up and parade the rotten chaff of superstition, and self-torture, and spiritual dyspepsia, which had overlaid it. My dear fellow, that calendar ruins your cause: you are sacrés, aristocrates, kings and queens, bishops and virgins by the hundred at one end, a beggar or two at the other, and but one real human living St. Homobonus, to fill up the great gulf between. A pretty list to allure the English middle classes, or the Lancashire working men! Almost as charmingly suited to England as the present free, industrious, enlightened, and moral state of that Eternal City, which has been blest with the visible presence and peculiar rule, temporal as well as spiritual, too, of your Dalai Lama. His pills do not seem to have had much practical effect there. . . . My good Luke, till he can show us a little better specimen of the kingdom of heaven organized and realized on earth, in the country which does belong to him, soil and people, body and soul, we must decline his assistance in realizing that kingdom in countries which don't belong to him. If the state of Rome don't show his idea of man and society to be a rotten lie, what proof would you have?"

Of the religious and irreligious doubts which are now working in the heart of society, Mr. Kingsley shows thorough knowledge, and contrives in Lancelot's letters to his cousin, and his conversations with persons of all phases of faith in the book, to bring out the faith in Christ as the only religion that has ever satisfied or can ever satisfy the heart as well as the mind of man.

Of some great social evils touched on in this book, Tregarva and Lancelot talk thus:—

"It isn't far to walk, sir. Perhaps some day when the May-fly's gone off, and the fish don't rise awhile, you could walk down and see. I beg your pardon, sir, though, for thinking of such a thing. They are not fit places for gentlemen, that's certain.' There was a staid irony in his tone, which Lancelot felt.

"But the clergyman goes?"

"Yes, sir."

"And Miss Honoria goes?"

"Yes, God Almighty bless her!"

"And do they not see that all goes right?"

"The giant twisted his huge limbs, as if trying to avoid an answer, and yet not daring to do so.

"Do clergymen go about among the poor much, sir, at college, before they are ordained?"

"Lancelot smiled, and shook his head.

"I thought so, sir. Our good vicar is like the rest hereabouts. God knows he stints neither time nor money: the souls of the poor are well looked after, and their bodies too, as far as his purse will go; but that's not far."

"Is he ill off then?"

"The living's worth some forty pounds a-year. The great tithes, they say, are worth better than twelve hundred; but Squire Lavington has them."

"Oh! I see," said Lancelot.

"I'm glad you do, sir, for I don't," meekly answered Tregarva. "But the vicar, sir, he is a kind man, and a good; but the poor don't understand him, nor he them. He's too learned, sir, and, saving your presence, too fond of his prayer-book."

"One can't be too fond of a good thing."

"Not unless you make an idol of it, sir, and fancy that men's souls were made for the prayer-book, and not the prayer-book for them."

"But cannot he expose and redress these evils, if they exist?"

"Tregarva twisted about again.

"I do not say that I think it, sir; but this I know, that every poor man in the vale thinks it—that the parsons are afraid of the landlords. They must see these things, for they are not blind; and they try to plaster them up out of their own pockets."

"But why, in God's name, don't they strike at the root of the matter, and go straight to the landlords, and tell them the truth?" asked Lancelot.

"So people say, sir. I see no reason for it, except the one which I gave you. Besides, sir, you must remember that a man can't quarrel with his own kin; and so many of them are the squire's brothers, or sons, or nephews."

"Or good friends with him, at least."

"Ay, sir, and to do them justice, they had need, for the poor's sake, to keep good friends with the squire. How else are they to get a farthing for schools, or coal-subscriptions, or lying-in societies, or lending-libraries, or penny clubs? If they spoke their minds to the great ones, sir, how could they keep the parish together?"

"You seem to see both sides of a question, certainly. But what a miserable state of things, that the labouring man should require all these societies, and charities, and helps from the rich!—that an industrious freeman cannot live without alms!"

"So I have thought this long time," quietly answered Tregarva.

"But Miss Honoria—she is not afraid to tell her father the truth?"

"Suppose, sir, when Adam and Eve were in the Garden, that all the devils had come up and played their fiends' tricks before them,—do you think they'd have seen any shame in it?"

"I really cannot tell," said Lancelot, smiling.

"Then I can, sir. They'd have seen no more harm in it than there was harm already in themselves, and that was none. A man's eyes can only see what they've learned to see."

"Lancelot started: it was a favourite dictum of his in Carlyle's works.

"Where did you get that thought, my friend?"

"By seeing, sir."

"But what has that to do with Miss Honoria?"

"She is an angel of goodness, herself, sir, and she therefore goes on without blushing or suspecting, where our blood would boil again. She sees people in want, and thinks it must be so, and pities them, and relieves them. But she don't know want herself, and therefore she don't know that it makes men beasts and devils. She's as pure as God's light herself, and therefore she fancies every one is as spotless as she is. And there's another mistake in your charitable great people, sir. When they see poor folk sick or hungry before their eyes, they pull out purses fast enough, God bless them! for they wouldn't like to be so themselves. But the oppression that goes on all the year round, and the want that goes on all the year round, and the filth, and the lying, and the swearing, and the profligacy that go on all the year round, and the sickening weight of debt, and the miserable grinding anxiety from rent-day to rent-day, and Saturday night to Saturday night, that crushes a man's soul down, and drives every thought out of his head but how he is to fill his stomach and warm his back, and keep a house over his head, till he daren't for his life take his thoughts one moment off the meat that perisheth—oh, sir! they never felt this; and therefore they never dream that there are thousands who pass them in their daily walks who feel this, and feel nothing else.”

This conversation is the beginning of the attachment of these two young men of different ranks. Our want of space forbids, or we could devote much time to this “stately Cornishman,” who is “six feet three, and has thews and sinews to match,” and who is religious, wise and humble, and who says to Lancelot in adversity:—

“Pardon me; but I never felt what a real substantial thing rank is, as I have since this sad misfortune of yours.”

“And I have never till now found out its worthlessness.”

“You are wrong, sir, you are wrong. Look at the difference between yourself and me. When you've lost all you have and seven times more, you are still a gentleman. No man can take that from you. You may look the proudest duchess in the land in the face, and claim her as your equal: while I, sir,—I don't mean, though, to talk of myself—but suppose that you had loved a pious and a beautiful lady, and among all your worship of her and your awe of her, had felt that you were worthy of her, that you could become her comforter, and her pride, and her joy, if it wasn't for that accursed gulf that men had put between you, that you were no gentleman, that you didn't know how to walk, and how to pronounce, and when to speak, and when to be silent, not even how to handle your knife and fork without disgusting her, or how to keep your own body clean and sweet. Ah, sir! I see it now as I never did before, what a wall all these little defects build up round a poor man; how he longs and struggles to show himself as he is at heart, and cannot, till he feels sometimes as if he was enchanted, pent up, like folks in fairy tales, in the body of some dumb beast. But, sir,” he went on, with a concentrated bitterness, which Lancelot had never seen in him before, ‘just because this gulf which rank makes is such a deep one, therefore it looks to me all the more devilish. Not that I want to pull down any man to my level: I despise my own level too much. I want to rise: I want those like me to rise with me. Let the rich be as rich as they will. ¶ and those like me covet not money but manners. Why should not the workman be a gentleman and a workman still? Why are they to be shut out from all that is beautiful and delicate, and winning and stately?’”

From Mr. Kingsley's known sympathy with and knowledge of the working classes both in town and country, it was to be expected that when Lancelot visits the country fair in disguise with Tregarva, revelations and experiences would occur that would be likely to set the blood boiling or freezing in the veins. But we were not prepared for the skill and power and sad simplicity with which the scenes there are brought into the reader's heart and mind. They indicate a deep knowledge of the condition of the labouring poor.

In justice to the versatile genius of our author, we must make room for a quotation differing in style from any yet given.

“Old things had passed away—when would all things become new? Not yet, Lancelot. Thou hast still one selfish hope, one dream of bliss, however impossible yet still cherished. Thou art a changed man—but for whose sake? For Argemone's. Is she to be thy God, then? Art thou to live for her, or for the sake of One greater than she? All thine idols are broken—swiftly the desert sands are drifting over them, and covering them in. All but one—must that too be taken from thee?”

“One morning, a letter was put into Lancelot's hands bearing the Whitford post-mark. Tremblingly he tore it open. It contained a few passionate words from Honoria. Argemone was dying of typhus-fever, and entreating to see him once again; and Honoria had, with some difficulty as she hinted, obtained leave from her parents to send for him.

* * * * *

“A faint voice—oh! how faint! how changed!—called him from within the closed curtains.

“He is there! I know he is! Lancelot! My Lancelot!”

“Silently still he drew aside the curtain; the light fell full on her face. What a sight! Her beautiful hair cut close, a ghastly white handkerchief round her head, those bright eyes sunk and lustreless, those ripe lips baked, and black and drawn; her thin hand fingering uneasily the coverlid. It was too much for him. He shuddered and turned his face away. Quick-sighted that love is, even to the last! Slight as the gesture was, she saw it in an instant.

“You are not afraid of infection?” she said faintly, ‘I was not.’

“Lancelot laughed aloud, as men will at strangest moments, sprung towards her with open arms, and threw himself on his knees beside the bed. With sudden strength she rose upright, and clasped him in her arms.

“Once more,” she sighed, in a whisper to herself, ‘once more on earth!’ And the room, and the spectators, and disease itself, faded from around them like vain dreams, as she nestled closer and closer to him, and gazed into his eyes, and passed her shrunken hand over his cheeks, and toyed with his hair, and seemed to drink in magnetic life from his embrace.

“No one spoke or stirred. They felt that an awful and blessed spirit overshadowed the lovers, and were hushed, as if in the sanctuary of God.

“Suddenly, again she raised her head from his bosom, and in a tone in which her old queenliness mingled strangely with the saddest tenderness,—

“All of you go away, now; I must talk to my husband alone.”

“So they were left alone.

“I do not look so very ugly, my darling, do I?”

Not so very ugly? though they have cut off all my poor hair, and I told them so often not! But I kept a lock for you;’ and feebly she drew from under the pillow a long auburn tress, and tried to wreath it round his neck, but could not, and sank back.

“Poor fellow! He could bear no more. He hid his face in his hands, and burst into a long low weeping.

“I am very thirsty, darling; reach me—No! I will drink no more, except from your dear lips.’

“He lifted up his head and breathed his whole soul upon her lips; his tears fell on her closed eyelids.

“Weeping? No, you must not cry. See how comfortable I am. They are all so kind—soft bed, cool room, fresh air, sweet drinks, sweet scents. Oh! so different from that room!’

“What room, my own?’

“Listen, and I will tell you. Sit down—put your arm under my head—So. When I am on your bosom, I feel so strong. God! let me last to tell him all. It was for that I sent for him.’”

And then follows her account of the horrible filth and misery at Ashley, the village on her own estate—where she caught the fever—and her self-reproach for having lived a life of luxury and ease while all that social evil lay at her door to be cured.

“You will do it, darling? Strong, wise, noble-hearted, that you are! Why do you look at me? You will be rich some day. You will own land, for you are worthy to own it. Oh! that I could give you Whitford! No! It was mine too long—therefore, I die—because I—Lord Jesus! have not I repented of my sin?’

“Then she grew calm once more. A soft smile crept over her face, as it grew sharper and paler every moment. Faintly she sank back on the pillows, and faintly whispered to him to kneel and pray. He obeyed her mechanically—‘No, not for me—for them—for them and for yourself—that you may save them whom I never dreamt that I was bound to save.’”

To those among our readers who feel surprise that such a work should emanate from the heart and brain of a clergyman of the Establishment, a few words may be needful. There is, as Solomon teaches, and as we all know, a time for everything; a time to refrain from words, and a time to speak. It is now a time for the Church to speak, and to act, for the salvation of the young, and the sorely oppressed of this country. Desperately unhappy are the young and the poor who think and feel at all beyond self, and the present moment; and the more mature and the rich suffer in consequence, for all society is banded together by inextricable links. The whole nation is sick at heart; the disease of selfish materialism and ungodliness eats into it day by day, like a pestilence. If among the ministers of Christ’s religion (the true physicians of souls) there be some whom God the Father has gifted with a peculiar insight into the diagnosis of this disease, and with a corresponding power of expression so that he can teach other physicians what they do not know, and help each patient to understand his own case; surely those men deserve profound thanks for not having yielded to the temptation of keeping their talent wrapped in a napkin. It is a far easier, and, for prosperity in this world, a far safer thing to ignore than to proclaim any sort of deep vital evil. Honour to those who peril all in the cause of God and truth!

“Yeast” is a problem which time only can solve; and which assuredly will be solved, if not in our time, wholly, yet in the time that will come after. It is therefore a matter which concerns all practical as well as all speculative thinkers to examine the statement of this “Problem,” and judge for themselves whether it be correct. For our own part we know too well that the contents of this book are of the utmost importance to society in England. It is as a Christian Teacher far more than as a literary artist that we have regarded our author, but we feel deeply the identity of the aims of both:—

“The means are diverse, but the end the same.”

Earnestly—nay, almost solemnly—do we urge the better sort among our readers to ponder on the leaven which is now leavening the moral world within and around them. This involves introspection; but it is healthful, not morbid; it also involves the necessity of a more active, vital, Christian love,—“He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?”

REVOLUTIONS OF RUSSIA.¹

THE ACCESSION OF NICHOLAS I. 1825.

THE death of the Emperor Alexander placed the inhabitants of his empire in mourning; for the grief and loyalty of the lower classes were sincere, and their attachment to his person almost idolatrous in its character. The public feeling was increased by the prospect of the reign of an unpopular sovereign afflicted with mental malady, and devoid of courtesy.

As for the Grand-duke Nicholas, no one thought of him, but the Russian people dreaded the accession of Constantine, whom they considered their sovereign in right of his primogeniture. In no country in the world has this natural law been so repeatedly broken. Every person in Russia was aware that the heir-presumptive had purchased his marriage with a Polish lady, the object of his ardent affections, by the resignation of his claims to the succession, but that he would abide by that act seemed a conjecture too improbable to be entertained by any one. Constantine was nevertheless sincere when he abandoned his rights, and he hastened to assure his next brother that he was so, by his youngest brother the Grand-duke Michael, through whom he forwarded a letter confirming his resignation of the throne, and acknowledging his next brother as his sovereign. The courier from St. Petersburg crossed the Grand-duke Michael, and brought letters from Nicholas acknow-making Constantine as his Emperor, and urging him to ascend the throne. The wife of Constantine joined her entreaties to those of the next heir, and with rare devotion offered to resign her consort rather than that he should give up the empire for her. Constantine, over whose mental agonies the soothing influence of the fair Pole possessed a magical power, continued firm in his resolution to remain in the condition of a subject, and he adhered to the determination he had expressed in the important document of which the Grand-duke Michael was the bearer, and which is here subjoined:—

“MY VERY DEAR BROTHER,—

“I received yesterday, with feelings of profound sorrow, intelligence of the death of our adored sovereign, and my benefactor, the Emperor Alexander. In hastening to assure you of the painful feelings this misfortune has excited in my mind, I do only my duty in announcing to you that I have forwarded to her Imperial Majesty, our august mother, a letter, in which I declare, that in consequence of the rescript I obtained from the late Emperor, bearing date February the 2d, 1822, permitting my renunciation of the throne, it is now my unalterable determination to give up to you all my rights to the Empire of Russia. I entreated, at the same time, our beloved mother, to make this declaration public, that the same may be put into immediate execution. After this declaration, I regard it as a sacred duty to beseech your Imperial Majesty to receive the first from me, the oath of fidelity and submission, and to permit me to say that I do not aspire to any other title or dignity than that of Czarowitz, with which my august father deigned to honour my services. My sole happiness, hereafter, will consist in giving your Imperial Majesty continual proofs of my unbounded devotion and respect for your person, of which thirty years of constant and zealous service to the Emperors, my father and brother, are the pledge, in which sentiments I wish to serve your Imperial Majesty, and your successors, until the end of my life, in my present situation and functions.

“I am, with the most profound respect,
“CONSTANTINE.”

Upon the receipt of the despatches which followed this letter, the Grand-duke, called to reign over a vast Empire, by the repeated abdication of his brother of the rights of primogeniture, no longer hesitated,—he published the former correspondence between the Emperor Alexander and the Grand-duke Constantine, with the document already quoted upon the 25th of December, 1825, and fixed the morrow for his recognition as their sovereign by his people.

The inhabitants of St. Petersburg, relieved from their dread of a second Paul by the abdication of the heir-presumptive, began to reflect with hope upon the promise which the talents and pure moral character of their new sovereign afforded them. The handsomest and bravest man in his dominions, his fine person attracted attention, while his reserved manners excited awe. His grave carriage, his demure look; only raised to penetrate to the soul the man who ventured to observe him, with a glance which compelled him to know and reverence his master—his haughty manner of interrogation, so unlike the suavity of Alexander, or the bluntness of Constantine, had isolated him from the rest of the imperial family, and centred him in the bosom of his own domestic circle. The Russian people, feeling their need of a guide, at once comprehended that the cold dignity of this prince concealed an indomitable will, and that, if they themselves had not chosen their new sovereign, God had considered their need, and given to the Russians, who were at once too polished and too barbarous, a man who would grasp the sceptre in an iron hand covered with a velvet glove.

The morrow, though considered as a day of joy and festivity, was preceded by some rumours that, like the breath of an approaching tempest, gave warning that some great national crisis was at hand. It was whispered in the evening of the 25th that the abdication of the Czarowitz was a forgery, and that Constantine, then exercising the authority of Viceroy of Poland, was on full march for St. Petersburg with an army to claim the empire as his birthright. In addition to this startling rumour, it was said that several regiments, and among them that of Moscow, had determined to take the oath to no Russian prince but Constantine; and the words, “Let Nicholas live, but let Constantine reign,” were heard at intervals in the streets as an intimation of the state of the military pulse.

In fact, the conspiracy which had disturbed the last days of the Emperor Alexander was about to raise its head, and seize upon the Great-Duke Constantine's name as its rallying point. This Prince, who had passed his life with the army, was beloved by the soldiers, and the conspirators, who understood little of the character of their new sovereign, supposed the revolt of the regiments stationed in St. Petersburg would compel him to resign his recently acquired rights. They would then summon Constantine to receive the empire, and with it the constitution they had prepared. If he refused to accept it, they intended to imprison him and the rest of the imperial family. They would then establish a republic, an oligarchy in which the despotism of the many would replace the despotism of one. Such was the design of a party composed of military aristocrats, who, bolder than the murderers of Paul, dared, by open force and secret fraud, to contest the throne of Russia with its new sovereign. The soldiers, devoted to Constantine, they designed to make their blind instruments in a conspiracy of which that Prince was not the real object, but their own aggrandisement.

Faithful to their plans, the Prince Stah—and the two Bes—went to the barracks of the 2d, 3d, 5th, and 6th companies of the Regiment of Moscow, whom they knew to be devoted to Constantine. The Prince then informed these men that they were deceived respecting the abdication of the Czarowitz, and pointed out Alexander B—— to their attention, whom he affirmed had been sent from Warsaw to warn them against taking the oath to the Grand-duke Nicholas. The address of Alexander B——, confirming this astounding communication, excited a great sensation among the troops, of which the Prince took advantage by ordering them to load and present. At that instant the Aide-de-camp Verighny and Major-General Fredericks, who commanded the grenadiers, having the charge of the flag, came to invite the officers to visit the colonel of the regiment. Prince Stah——, who believed the favourable moment was come, ordered the soldiers to repulse the grenadiers with coup-de-crosses, and to take away their flag, at the same time throwing himself upon Major-General Fredericks, whom B——, on the other side, menaced with a pistol, with the stock of which he felled him to the earth; then, turning upon Major Schenshine, commander of the brigade, who ran to the assistance of his colleague, he knocked him down in a moment, and flinging himself among the grenadiers, successively wounded Grenadier Krasscfski, Colonel Khavosschinski, and Subaltern MoussiEFF; and cutting his way to the flag, seized and elevated it with a loud and triumphant hurrah. To that cry, and to the sight of the blood so boldly shed to win the flag, the greater part of the regiment replied, "Long live Constantine! down with Nicholas!" Prince Stah——, followed by four hundred men whom he had seduced from their duty, then marched, with drums beating, to the Admiralty quarter.

At the gate of the winter palace, the aide-de-camp, the bearer of the news of the revolt, encountered another officer, who brought tidings from the barracks of the grenadier corps of equally alarming import. When that regiment were preparing to take the oath of fidelity to the Emperor Nicholas, the sub-lieutenant Kojenikoff threw himself before the advanced-guard, exclaiming, "It is not to the Grand-duke Nicholas we ought to make oath, but to the Emperor Constantine." He was told that the Czarowitz had abdicated in his next brother's favour. "It is false," was his reply; "totally false; he is on the march for St. Petersburg to reward the faithful and punish the guilty."

The regiment, notwithstanding these outcries, continued its march, took the oath of allegiance to the new sovereign, and returned into quarters, without showing any disposition resembling revolt. At dinner-time Lieutenant Suthoff, who had taken the pledge of obedience with the rest, entered at that moment, and addressed himself to his own company in a manner calculated to excite their attention: "My friends, we were wrong to obey the order; the other regiments are in open revolt; they have refused to take the oath, and are at this moment in the Place of the Senate;—put on your uniforms, arm, come on, and follow me; I have your pay in my pocket, which I am ready to distribute without waiting for the ceremony of an order."

"But is what you say quite true?" cried many voices.

"Stah, here is Lieutenant Panoff,———, one of your best friends,—ask him."

"My friends," remarked Panoff, anticipating their question, "you all know that Constantine is your only lawful emperor, and that they wish to dethrone him."

"Live Constantine!" replied the soldiers.

"Live Nicholas!" exclaimed Colonel Sturler, the commander of the regiment, throwing himself courageously into the hall. "They are deceiving you, my friends; the Czarowitz has really abdicated, and you have now no other emperor than the Grand-duke Nicholas. Live Nicholas!"

"Live Constantine!" responded the soldiers.

"You are mistaken, soldiers; you are about to take a fatal step; you are deceived," again shouted the colonel.

"Comrades, do not abandon me; follow me," cried Panoff; "let those who are for Constantine, unite with me in the cry, 'Long live, Constantine.'"

More than three parts of those present joined in the cry of "Long live Constantine!"

"To the Admiralty! to the Admiralty!" said Panoff, drawing his sword; "follow me, soldiers, follow me."

With a wild hurrah two hundred soldiers followed their leader to the place he indicated, whither, though by a different route, the insurgent portion of the Regiment of Moscow had already preceded them.

Milarodowich, the military governor of St. Petersburg, a cavalry general, whose splendid charges on the field had gained him the appellation of the Russian Murat, was by this time at the palace, to communicate to his new sovereign the dispositions he had made for the defence of his throne and the capital. He had directed the troops upon whose fidelity he thought he could rely, to march to the winter palace. The first battalion of the regiment Probrajenski, three regiments of the guard Paulowski, and the battalion of the Sappers and Miners, were those he considered fit for this important service.

The emperor saw then that the mutiny was more general than he anticipated; he therefore sent by Major-general Meidhart, to carry orders to the Semenowski guard to repress the mutineers, and to the horse-guards, to hold themselves in readiness to mount. He went down himself to the corps of chief guards of the winter palace, where the regiment of Finland guards were at that time on duty, and ordered them to load their muskets and invest the principal avenues of the palace. At that very moment tumultuous sounds interrupted the voice of the sovereign occasioned by the approach of the third and sixth companies of the Regiment of Moscow, headed by Prince Stah——, and the two B——, with the captured flag proudly displayed to the wind, and drums beating, to the ominous cry of "Long live Constantine! Down with Nicholas!" The rebel troops debouched on the Admiralty Square, but whether they thought themselves not sufficiently strong, or that they dreaded facing majesty with these treasonable demonstrations, they did not march upon the winter palace, but took up their position against the senate, where they were immediately joined by the grenadier corps, and sixty men in frocks with pistols in their hands, who mingled themselves among the rebel soldiers.

The emperor at this crisis appeared from under one of the arches of the palace, approached the grating, and threw a rapid glance on his revolted subjects. He was paler than usual, but was composed and calm. It was whispered that he had resolved to die as became a Christian emperor, and that he had confessed and received the absolution of the Church, before he took leave of his family. Every eye was fixed upon him, when the hard gallop of a squadron of cuirassiers was heard on the side of the marble palace; it was the horse-guards, headed by Count Orloff, one of the bravest and most faithful friends of the emperor. Before him the gates expanded; he leaped from his charger, while the regiment ranged itself before the palace. The roll of the drums announced instantly the approach of the grenadiers of Preobrajenski, which arrived in battalions. They entered the court of the palace, where they found the emperor with the empress, and their eldest son, the little Grand-duke Alexander; behind them were ranged the Chevalier guard, who formed an angle with the cuirassiers, leaving between them an open space, which was quickly filled up by the artillery. The revolted regiments regarded these military dispositions with apparent carelessness, while their cries of "Long live Constantine!" "Down with Nicholas!" evidently proved that they expected, and waited there for reinforcements.

While affairs were in this state at the palace, the Grand-duke Michael, at the barracks, was opposing his personal influence to the flood-tide of rebellion. Some happy results had followed these attempts, and the bold resolution taken by Count Lieven, captain of the sixth company of the Regiment of Moscow, who arrived in time to shut the gates against the battalion, then about to join their rebel comrades. Placing himself before the soldiers, he drew his sword, and swore on his honour to pass the weapon through the body of the first man who should make a seditious movement to re-open them. At this threat, a young sub-lieutenant advanced, pistol in hand, towards Count Lieven, with the evident intention of blowing out his brains. The count, with admirable presence of mind, struck the officer a blow with the pommel of his sword, which made the instrument leap from his hands; the lieutenant took up the pistol and once more took aim at the count. The young nobleman crossed his arms, and confronted the mutinous officer, while the regiment, mute and motionless, looked on like the seconds of this singular duel. The lieutenant drew back a few steps, followed by the heroic count, who offered him his unarmed breast as in defiance of his attempt. The lieutenant fired, but the ball took no effect: that it did not strike that generous breast appeared miraculous. Some one knocked at the door.

"Who is there?" asked many voices.

"His Imperial Highness the Grand-duke Michael," replied those without.

Some instants of profound silence followed this announcement. Count Lieven availed himself of the general stupefaction to open the door, no person attempting to prevent that action.

The Grand-duke entered on horseback, followed by the officers of ordnance.

"What means this inaction at a moment of danger?" asked the Grand-duke. "Am I among traitors or loyal soldiers?"

"You are in the midst of the most faithful of your regiments," replied the Count, "of which your Imperial Highness shall have immediate proof." Then raising his drawn sword, he cried, "Long live the Emperor Nicholas!"

"Long live the Emperor Nicholas!" shouted the soldiers with one voice.

The young sub-lieutenant attempted to speak, but Count Lieven stopped him by touching his arm. "Silence, sir; I shall not mention what has passed; and you will ruin yourself by the utterance of a syllable."

His magnanimity awed and convinced the disloyal officer.

"Lieven, I confide to you the conduct of this regiment," remarked the Grand-duke, emphatically.

"I will answer for its loyalty with my life, your Imperial Highness," replied the Count.

The Grand-duke departed, and on his rounds, if he received no enthusiastic greeting, at least found what he sought, obedience to the authority of the Emperor Nicholas.

Reinforcements came in on every side; the Sappers and Miners drew up in order of battle, before the palace of the Hermitage; the rest of the Regiment of Moscow, rescued from the stain of rebellion by the courage and address of Count Lieven, now proudly debouched by the Perspective of Niewski. The sight of these troops gave a delusive hope to the revolted, who, believing them to be on their side, greeted them with loud cheers; but they were instantly undeceived, for the new-comers ranged themselves along the Hotel of the Tribunals, facing the palace, and with the Cuirassiers, Artillery, and Chevalier guards, enclosed the revolted in a circle of steel.

A moment after, they heard the chant of the priests. It was the Patriarch, who came out of the church of Casan, followed by all his clergy, and preceded by the holy banners. He now commanded the revolted "in the name of Heaven, to return to their duty." The soldiers, for the first time perhaps in their lives, regarded with contempt the pictures which they had been accustomed from infancy to regard with superstitious veneration, and they desired the Patriarch "to let them alone, since if heavenly things belonged to the priestly jurisdiction, they could take care of those of earth." The Patriarch continued his injunctions to obedience, notwithstanding this discouraging rebuff, but the Emperor ordered him to desist and retire." Nicholas himself was resolved to make one effort to bring back these rebels to their duty.

Those who surrounded the Emperor wished to prevent him from risking his person, but he boldly replied, "It is my game that is playing, and it is but fair play on my part to set my life on the stake."

He ordered the gate to be opened, but scarcely had he been obeyed, before the Grand-duke Michael approached him, and whispered in his ear that that part of the Regiment Preobrajenski by which he was then surrounded, had made common cause with the rebels, and that the Prince T——, their commander, whose absence he had remarked with astonishment, was at the head of the conspiracy. Nicholas remembered that four-and-twenty years before the same regiment had kept guard before the red palace, while its Colonel, Prince Talitzén, strangled the Emperor Paul, his father.

His situation was terrible, but he did not even change countenance; he only showed that he had formed a desperate resolution. In an instant he turned and gave his orders to one of his generals, "Bring me hither the Grand-duke."

The general returned with the young prince: the Emperor raised the boy in his arms, and advancing to the grenadiers, said, "Soldiers, if I am killed, behold your sovereign. Open your ranks; I confide him to your loyalty."

A long loud hurrah, a cry of enthusiasm that came from the very heart of these suspected soldiers, echoed to that of the Emperor, whose magnanimous confidence had won their admiration. The most guilty among them dropped their weapons and opened their arms to receive the heir of the Empire. The imperial pledge was placed with the colours in the midst of the regiment, a guarded and sacred asylum for honour and innocence.

The Emperor mounted his horse and went out of the gate, where he was met by his generals, who implored him not to go any further, as the rebels openly avowed their intention of killing their sovereign, and their arms were loaded. The Emperor made a sign to them with his hand to leave him a free passage, and forbidding them to accompany him, spurred his horse and galloped forward till he arrived within pistol-shot. "Soldiers," cried he, "I am told that you wish to kill me. Is that true? if it is, here I am."

There was a pause, while the Emperor sat on horseback, remaining like an equestrian statue between the two bodies of troops. Twice the word fire was heard among the rebel ranks, and twice some feeling of respect to the dauntless courage of the sovereign restrained the execution of the order; but at the third command some muskets loaded with ball were discharged, which whistled past the Emperor without striking him, but wounded, at a hundred paces behind him, Colonel Velho and many soldiers;

At that moment the Grand-duke Michael and Count Milarodowich galloped towards the Emperor, the regiment of cuirassiers and those of the Chevalier guards made a forward movement—the artillerymen were about to apply their matches to the cannon.

"Halt," cried the Emperor. All obeyed. "General," said he to Count Milarodowich, "go to these unfortunate men and endeavour to bring them to their allegiance."

The Count and the Grand-duke Michael rode forward, but the rebels received them with a shower of ball, accompanied by their war-cry, "Live Constantine!"

"Soldiers," cried the Count, who was conspicuous alike by his fine martial figure and splendid uniform covered with orders,— "Soldiers, behold this sabre," and he flourished above his head a magnificent Turkish one, the hilt of which was set with jewels, and advancing with it to the front ranks of the rebels, he continued, "This sabre was given me by his Imperial Highness the Czarowitz, and on my honour, I will make oath upon its blade, that you have been deceived, that the Czarowitz has abdicated the imperial crown, and that your real and legitimate sovereign is the Emperor Nicholas."

Cries of "Live Constantine!" and the report of a pistol were the replies given by the revolted to the address of the Count, whose action with the sword arm had left his side exposed to the enemy. He was seen to reel in the saddle. Another pistol was aimed at the Grand-duke Michael, but the soldiers of the Marine, though included in the revolt, seized the arm of the assassin.

Count Orloff and the cuirassiers faced the heavy fire of the musketry, and enveloped in their ranks the wounded Milarodowich, the Grand-duke Michael and the Emperor Nicholas, whom they carried off by force to the palace.

The Count, wounded to death, sat his horse with difficulty, and the moment he arrived at the palace fell into the arms of those who surrounded him.

The Emperor, notwithstanding the late unfortunate attempt, still wished to make one last endeavour to bring back the revolted, but while he was issuing orders to that effect, the Grand-duke Michael seized the match: "Fire," cried he, "fire upon the assassins." At that moment four cannons opened upon the rebels, and paid with usury the deaths they had sent into the loyal ranks of the imperialists. Before the voice of the Emperor could stop the slaughter, a second discharge followed the first. The effect of these volleys within reach of pistol-shot was terrible. More than sixty men of the grenadier corps of the Regiment of Moscow and the Marine guards fell; the rebel troops fled, some by the street Galernain, some by the English quay or by the bridge Isaac, others across the frozen waters of the Neva, then a plain of ice, but all were hotly pursued by the Chevalier guards at full gallop.

That evening Count Milarodowich, who was struggling with the agonies of death, expressed a wish to see the bullet which had given him his mortal wound. The surgeon, who had successfully traced and extracted the ball, put it into his patient's hand. The expiring warrior carefully examined the missile, its weight, and form, and found it deficient in calibre. "I am satisfied," said he, "that ball was aimed by no soldier." Five minutes after these words, he breathed his last. He then paid the debt of nature, the only debt he ever paid in his life. Handsome, valiant, the finest horseman in the army, and the idol of his own soldiers, the Russian Murat lost his life by the hand of a Russian, but not of a Russian soldier. The rival of the ci-devant King of Naples loved display in every shape; but the field of battle, at the head of his cavalry, was the theatre on which he best loved to exhibit his martial form, splendid horsemanship, and daring courage. The gaming-table found him as reckless of his fortune as the field of his life, and the bravest cavalry general in the Russian service was a ruined gamester, loaded with debts which his death acquitted by leaving him insolvent. In paying the debt of nature Count Milarodowich surrendered his only personal possession.

The next day, at nine o'clock in the morning, while the population of his capital was yet uncertain whether the rebellion was effectually crushed, Nicholas, Emperor of Russia, gave his hand to the Empress to assist her into a droski which stood before the gates of the winter palace, and drove through the streets of St. Petersburg. He stopped before the barracks as if to offer his bold bosom to the bullet or the steel of the assassin. The sight of his fine countenance, shadowed by the floating plumes of his military hat, far from exciting treasonable demonstrations, awakened lively expressions of loyalty and devotion to his person, and cries of "Long live Nicholas!" greeted his fortunate rashness. The Russian people knew and recognised in him a brave man and great sovereign.

The trial of the chief conspirators took place under the shadow of night and secrecy: they were brought from all parts of the empire to St. Petersburg. The sentence, but not the examination of the guilty, alone was made public; eighty persons were condemned to death, or life-long exile in Siberia. The most powerful, according to the custom of Russia, increased the population of Siberia; among these we find the name of Prince T——: his wife, with rare devotion, petitioned and obtained from the Emperor permission to accompany her husband to that dreary land of woe and crime. The decimation of the disloyal but seduced regiments was an act of severe military justice that astonished Europe, but secured the tranquillity of Russia. The son of the Emperor Paul, whose life and death had been the stake of the military contest of December 1825, might be better excused than any other man for that tremendous sentence. He had been fired upon by his own soldiers while unarmed and confiding his person to their generosity; his brother and his plenipotentiary, Count Milarodowich, had been aimed at by assassins, and the Count had died of his wound.

A flash of magnanimity enlightened this cloud of severity. In the list of conspirators the Emperor remarked the name of Suwarrow, a name dear to Russia and associated with her victories. He chose to examine this young man, the grandson of the great field-marshal, himself. His countenance and manner, unusually gentle, seemed to inspire confidence. The questions he asked this lieutenant only required a simple affirmative or denial, and they were not of a nature to elicit a confession of guilt. "Gentlemen, you see and hear," remarked the Emperor to his council, "it is as I have told you, a Suwarrow cannot be a rebel," and he acquitted the prisoner, and gave him a captain's commission and sent him back to his regiment; but unfortunately for the conspirators, this lieutenant was the only person who bore that favoured name. All were not Suwarrows.

It was remarked that those who were executed uttered these words as their last legacy to posterity, "Live Russia! Live Liberty! our avengers are at hand!" Their war-cry of "Live Constantine!" false to their hearts, was not repeated by lips which the presence of death had rendered then the echo of truth.

The funeral pomp of the widowed Empress Elizabeth, whose remains were brought for interment to St. Petersburg in this same month of December, turned the thoughts of its inhabitants from these scenes of civil strife and the executions that followed them, to a Princess, whom for twenty-four years they had regarded as a link between the human and angelic natures. The memory of these events seemed buried in that sepulchre, which the tears of a grateful people had consecrated to the remembrance of the consort of the deceased Emperor Alexander.

SKETCHES AND ANECDOTES OF WORTHIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

THOMAS KEN.

THE life of Bishop Ken has been carefully and eloquently written by at least two practised pens. In 1831, an elaborate biography of him was published by the Rev. W. Lisle Bowles,¹ which, though somewhat unreasonably digressive in its character, and too exclusively devoted to political and general topics, may be properly described as a valuable and interesting work. And in this present year of 1851, we have been presented with another life of Ken,² (written, as the title-page informs us, "by a Layman,") which is at once distinguished by unusual accuracy and elegance of style, and by a spirit of affectionate veneration for the memory of the deprived bishop which will commend it to the earnest attention of many thoughtful and sympathising minds.

The incidents of Ken's life, as they have been presented by his biographers, are by no means uninteresting or unimportant. [He played a prominent part in some of the most memorable events of the period in which he lived, and that period is known to the English historian as comprehending some of the most momentous occurrences in our annals. His character also was full of heroic traits, and commands our highest respect and reverence. In every relation of life,—as a parish priest, as a Christian politician, and as a prelate of the Church, he was conscientious to a degree which ordinary minds might deem romantic or absurd. Sincere and earnest in all that he undertook, and regardless of worldly approbation and emolument, he could never be induced to sacrifice his principles and convictions to temporary profit or expedience. Whilst many men of the same period and profession, whom the world accounted great and good, permitted themselves to seek preferment by indirect and scarcely creditable means, it can be mentioned to his perpetual honour that he voluntarily embraced obscurity and poverty, rather than depart in the slightest degree from the course of duty which he had marked out for himself.

The birth-place of this distinguished divine and upright man was the sequestered village of Little Berkhamstead in Hertfordshire. He was born in the month of July, 1637; the youngest son, by the first marriage, of Mr. Thomas Ken, of Furnival's Inn, an attorney of the Court of Common Pleas, descended from an ancient family in Somersetshire. His mother, whose maiden name was Chalkhill, is said to have been a lineal descendant of the poet John Chalkhill, the friend of Edmund Spenser. She died before Ken had reached his fifth year, but her place was supplied, in a great degree, by an elder sister, Ann Ken, who afterwards became the wife of the famous Izaak Walton. This union took place when the subject of our sketch was about nine years old. Five years afterwards his father died, and "honest Izaak" was henceforth constituted, by the bond of relationship between them, the boy's sole guardian—a better he could not have had!

After a most careful preliminary home education, at the age of thirteen, Ken was sent to the ancient school of Winchester, founded by the renowned William of Wykeham. The warden of the college at the time of his admission was Dr. John Harris, "a noted Grecian, and formerly Greek professor of the University of Oxford." This learned man appears to have been also a most eloquent preacher, being described by one of his contemporaries as second only to St. Chrysostom. In politics and religion, however, he sided with the Presbyterians, having been a member of the Westminster Assembly of Divines, appointed by the Parliament in 1643. After remaining at Winchester five years, Ken was elected a student of New College, Oxford. Before quitting the school,—perhaps on the eve of his departure,—he left behind him a permanent memorial of his school-days, which is still regarded with veneration by Winchester boys. "Those who have been brought up at a public school," says his recent biographer, "can testify how they love to recognise the names of their distinguished men, engraved,—or as it were enshrined,—on the old wainscotings and walls. Ken's name sheds a bright ray on the venerable cloisters of Winchester. "THO. KEN, 1656," cut into the stone buttress of the south-east corner, still remains a cherished memorial to Wykehamists of the good bishop."

On removing to Oxford, there being at the time no vacancy at New College, Ken was entered as a student at Hart Hall. In the course of a year, however, he was admitted within the walls of New College; a change which left him nothing to desire, since it afforded him the opportunity of selecting for his daily companions the friends of his earliest youth, and of renewing intimacies which he had formed at Winchester. The closest friend of his boyhood, Francis Turner, afterwards Bishop of Ely, who had left school a year before him, was again his chosen and constant associate. With Turner and two other friends of congenial disposition, he is supposed to have joined the resolute band of youthful churchmen in Oxford "who assembled together for prayer in the house of Thomas Willis, close by Merton College, when the Liturgy had been prohibited in the churches and chapels." Amongst other accomplishments, we may add that Ken was distinguished at this period for his musical taste and skill. He was an excellent, and, in the intervals of severer studies, a frequent performer on the lute, and from his secluded chamber were often heard to proceed.

In May, 1661, Ken took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, and about the year 1663 he is supposed to have entered into holy orders. Some authorities, however, fix the period of his ordination in 1661, and others in 1664, after he had attained the degree of Master of Arts. The precise time at which he commenced his ministerial duties appears to us, however, quite unimportant, although it has been a matter of controversy with his biographers. His first preferment was to the rectory of Little Easton, in Essex, to which he was instituted, on the presentation of William Lord Maynard, in August 1663. Lord Maynard was an enthusiastic royalist; he had been impeached by the Parliament in 1647, and in the recent times of commotion he had given many proofs of his attachment to the royal cause. His wife, Lady Margaret Maynard, was a woman of great piety and prudence. Her charity and ardours of devotion, according to Ken, might have become a Proba or Monica. A sincere and lasting friendship grew up between her and the zealous pastor, and continued to the time of her death, which happened twenty years after their introduction to each other. Her funeral sermon was preached by Ken on the 30th of June, 1682, in the parish church of Little Easton; his text being taken from the book of Proverbs:—"A gracious woman retaineth honour."

In April, 1665, Ken resigned the living of Little

Easton and became chaplain to Dr. Morley, bishop of Winchester. His introduction to the bishop had been brought about by his relationship to Isaac Walton, between whom and Dr. Morley a long intimacy had subsisted, cemented by many acts of mutual kindness. When Morley was ejected from his preferments, (consisting of a canonry of Christ Church and the rectory of Mildenhall,) in the Commonwealth times, he became an inmate of Walton's house in Staffordshire, and partook for about a twelvemonth of that good man's freely proffered hospitality.¹ The events of subsequent years, however, wrought a great change in the worldly condition of the two men. After the Restoration, Morley became bishop of Worcester, and was subsequently translated to Winchester; but in the midst of his honours he did not forget his humble and excellent friend. Both Walton and his daughter were constant visitors at his episcopal palace, and it was beneath his roof that the beautiful lives of Hooker, Herbert, and Sanderson were written, and an enlarged edition of the Complete Angler prepared for the press.

In 1666 Ken was elected a Fellow of Winchester College, and had he been contented with a life of seclusion and studious ease, a congenial retreat was now afforded him, where he might have passed the remainder of his days in lettered tranquillity. "But a recluse life," says his biographer, "was foreign to the bent of his desires." He sighed for more active duties, and an extended sphere of usefulness. "The bishop, therefore, on the 6th of July, 1667, collated him to the rectory of Brightstone, in the Isle of Wight, a cheerful little village, about four miles from Carisbrook Castle, with a goodly church, and a near prospect of the sea, sheltered from cold winds by overhanging hills."²

In this pleasant spot he remained about two years, at the end of which time the rectory of East Woodhay becoming vacant by the death of Dr. Robert Sharrock, his patron, Bishop Morley, removed Ken thither, in order that he might have him nearer to his own person. But Ken would not accept the living of Woodhay till he had resigned Brightstone, and although it was at that period an extremely common practice to hold several preferments together, he steadily persisted in a resolution he had formed never to take any cure the duties of which he could not personally perform. In the rectory garden of Woodhay, "Bishop Ken's yew hedge," according to his recent biographer, is still shewn as a cherished memorial of his residence in that parish. In the parish register there is also an entry of the baptism of "Rose Ken, daughter of Mr. Jon Ken, born 23rd June, 1670," from whence his biographer has drawn the inference that at this period his brother's family were residing beneath his roof; an arrangement which procured for Ken, who was "himself unalterably dedicated to a single life," the advantage of a social circle which did much to relieve the loneliness of his country parsonage.

At Woodhay he remained above three years, discharging the duties of his ministry with unwearied zeal and industry. Easy of access, gentle, generous, and affectionate, he was in all respects the model of a country pastor. As his recent biographer has observed, he wanted none of the qualities which in one of his own poems he has enumerated as requisite to constitute the character of the good parish priest:—

"A father's tenderness, a shepherd's care,
A leader's courage, which the Cross can bear;
A ruler's awe, a watchman's wakeful eye,
A pilot's skill the helm in storms to ply;
A fisher's patience, and a labourer's toil,
A guide's dexterity to disembroid;
A prophet's inspiration from above,
A teacher's knowledge, and a Saviour's love."

More we need not quote; but we cannot resist the temptation of transcribing a few lines, in which he has undesignedly sketched his own portrait, with a truly faithful hand:—

"Of a mild, humble, and obliging heart,
Who with his all does to the needy part;

Whose province, heaven, all his endeavour shares,
Who mixes with no secular affairs,
 Oft on his pastoral account reflects,
By holiness, not riches, gains respects;
Who is all that he'd have others be,
From wilful sin, though not from frailty free."

In 1672, Ken was induced by Bishop Morley, though with some reluctance, to resign the rectory of Woodhay. The Bishop had a double motive in procuring his resignation. In the first place, his declining strength having become unequal to his increasing labours, he desired the assistance of Ken, as a friend and counsellor, in superintending the affairs of his diocese. And in the next place, he was anxious to secure a vacant benefice in an agreeable neighbourhood for a learned and estimable man, (the accomplished George Hooper, well known as an orientalist and mathematician,) for whom he knew that Ken entertained a profound respect, as one in every way qualified to succeed him in his charge.

On leaving the parsonage of Woodhay, in which he had spent many happy hours, Ken repaired to Winchester, where some important labours and distinctions awaited him. As Prebendary of the Cathedral, Fellow of the College, and Chaplain to the Bishop, many serious and weighty occupations devolved upon him. But his active mind was not satisfied with the discharge of the ordinary duties of his station. In addition to his other employments, he took upon himself the partial care of a neglected parish in the neighbourhood, where he found an ample field for the exercise of his zeal and cloquence. At this period of his life he produced his first work, a Manual of Prayers for the use of the Winchester Scholars. He also composed about the same time, the three hymns for Morning, Evening, and Midnight, which were subsequently printed at the end of the Manual.

(1) It is fair to state that this usually received story of Dr. Morley's visit to Staffordshire, and acceptance of Walton's hospitality, is open to some doubt. In a sketch of Walton's life, prefixed to Pickering's edition of the Complete Angler, Sir Harris Nicolas, after some investigation of the subject, has come to the conclusion that, however pleasing such an episode in the life of Walton may appear, it is unsupported by evidence, there being no direct proof that Morley was ever in Staffordshire, or that he was indebted to his friend Isaac for any particular services. After the king's death he retired to Holland, where he entered into the service of Charles II.

There are no devotional stanzas in the language so well known as Ken's Morning and Evening Hymns. The words appear to breathe a strain of household melody, which has to all of us a familiar sound. Penned by a true poet as well as devout Christian, their simple beauty and plaintive music would be felt and recognised by any one of ordinary taste, even without the sanctifying aid and influence of early associations. If there were nothing else for which the name of Ken were worth recollecting, the authorship of these beautiful hymns would give him some claim on the regard and reverence of posterity; whilst a knowledge of his personal character imparts to them an additional interest and significance: for no one at all familiar with the life of Ken can read or hear the first couplet of the Morning Hymn, without having vividly recalled to his mind the author's spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion to the higher objects of existence:—

"Awake, my soul, and with the sun
Thy daily stage of duty run."

Or who can refrain from associating with the commencement of the Evening Hymn, the placid piety of the gifted writer's resigned and thankful mind?—

"Glory to thee, my God, this night,
For all the blessings of the light."

From such very familiar productions, it would be impertinent to make further quotations, but no sketch of Ken's life would be complete without some reference to them.

With regard to the music of these hymns, it has been asserted that they were all adapted to the same tune by Ken himself, who, according to Hawkins, "had an excellent genius and skill in music." Of the tunes now in use, that for the Morning Hymn, to quote the recent biography, "is a corrupt version of the tune composed by Bartholomon, (a violin player of the last century,) being now encumbered with modern grace notes, inconsistent with the solemnity of devotional music." The Evening Hymn, it is added, was originally set to a melody composed by Tallis, which is now still more distorted from its ancient simplicity.

Towards the close of the year 1675, a journey to Rome was undertaken by Ken, in company with his nephew Izaak Walton, the younger. The period selected for their visit was a peculiarly interesting one. The Catholic Jubilee, held in Rome every 25th year, was then being celebrated under Clement X. with unusual splendour. From every country in Europe which owned the spiritual supremacy of the Popedom, crowds of pilgrims were flocking to the papal city. Of these it is recorded that many fainted by the way, and not a few were consigned to neglected graves in the countries through which they passed. Others, with singular fortitude and courage, bore up under every hardship, and amidst difficulties and toils which nothing but religious fervour could have enabled them to surmount, succeeded in reaching the promised goal.

To all the faithful who arrived in Rome during the year of the Jubilee, and who, being confessed and penitent, duly visited for fifteen days the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and contributed according to their means to the ecclesiastical treasury, the pope had promised a plenary indulgence,—a prize which, though considerably reduced in value by the influence of the Reformation, was still considered by the mass of devout Romanists not unworthy of the expenditure of some toil and cost to obtain.

It was reckoned that not less than 200,000 strangers, allured by this liberal invitation, became temporary inmates of the city during the Jubilee; and the scenes presented to the eye of the curious spectator, were of a most interesting and remarkable character.

The singular spectacle which the Jubilee afforded them at Rome, were not the only circumstances calculated to interest the travellers during their sojourn in Italy. The luxurious palaces and populous cities which they beheld beyond the Alps, exceeded their preconceived notions of Italian wealth and splendour. To the travelling Englishman of those days there was no land which presented so many objects of attraction; whilst the journey, being performed on horseback, and being also by no means devoid of difficulty and danger, was sufficiently troublesome and expensive to be rarely undertaken. One effect of Ken's visit to Rome was, however, to fasten on him in his own country the suspicion of being secretly inclined to the errors and superstitions of the papacy. For such a suspicion, neither before or after his journey, did any part of his conduct exhibit the shadow of a foundation, and some of his subsequent acts tended in the strongest possible manner to prove the groundlessness of the malicious insinuation.

Soon after his return to Winchester, Ken was removed into a widely different sphere of duty. In 1677, William, Prince of Orange, afterwards King William III. of England, visited the court of his kinsman Charles II. on a matrimonial errand. Coming amongst us in the fulness of his renown, and immediately after his victories over the power which aimed at universal dominion—at once the foe of France and the firm friend of the Protestant cause—the Dutch Stadtholder was naturally at this period a popular hero with the English nation. It was, therefore, with undisguised satisfaction that the public heard of his projected alliance with the Princess Mary, the eldest daughter of the Duke of York. Although his manners were cold and unamiable, his military services were gratefully remembered by a people who kept a jealous watch on their ancient enemy, and who considered that every blow which crippled the supporters of popery and arbitrary power was struck in their cause and for their defence. The marriage took place, amidst demonstration of joy from all classes, in the beginning of November, and three weeks afterwards, long before the popular enthusiasm had subsided, William embarked for Holland with his English bride. In the retinue of the newly married pair, were Count Zulestein, a natural son of William's grandfather, and Mistress Jane Worth, the daughter of Sir Henry Worth, who had married the sister of Lord Maynard, Ken's former patron. The princess had also two English chaplains, of whom one was George Hooper, already mentioned as a friend of Ken. Hooper was rudely and improperly treated in Holland. From the princess, indeed, he received many marks of favour, but her husband's manners and conduct were too cold and repulsive for his endurance. In addition to other grievances, he was ill-treated in pecuniary matters; his meagre stipend being left unpaid. He at last procured a small sum which enabled him to quit his disagreeable post, and with this he returned to England. Soon after his departure, Ken was appointed his successor, but at whose instance is not known. Perhaps his name was mentioned by Hooper, or perhaps by his old friend Lord Maynard. However this may be, the appointment came in the shape of a royal command, which Ken could not disobey, and accordingly with many regrets and some misgivings he bade farewell to Winchester, and repaired to the court of the Stadtholder.

As might have been expected, during his sojourn in Holland Ken fared no better than his predecessor Hooper. The atmosphere of the Dutch court and the temper of the Dutch ruler, were by no means to his taste. His own disposition was lively and cheerful,—at times he was even prone to facetiousness,—whilst the Stadtholder was gloomy, sullen, and taciturn. Ken also perceived, to his great indignation and regret, that William treated his English wife with studied unkindness and neglect. Even before they had left England, it was observed that he had taken little notice of her at the play, and the ball, or in general company, and when transplanted to another country, he threw off the outward semblance of respect and affection. Under these circumstances Ken felt it his duty to remonstrate with the prince. It is not known how the expostulation was received, but in all probability his interference tended to irritate the Stadtholder, and added materially to the discomforts of his situation.

Whilst matters were in this state, another instance of Ken's inconvenient sense of duty tended further to exasperate William, and afforded him a colourable pretext for expressing his displeasure. We have already mentioned the names of Jane Worth, one of the maids of honour to the princess Mary, and of Count Zulestein. Since they had left England together, the count had paid particular attentions to the fair Jane, and had promised her marriage. This promise, however, he seemed in no hurry to fulfil, and as time glided on, the lady began to feel some anxiety on the subject. When the circumstance came to Ken's knowledge, his sympathies were awakened, and recollecting that Jane Worth was a relative of one of his oldest friends, he determined to interfere. He sought an interview with Count Zulestein—reminded him of his plighted vow, and conjured him, as a Christian and man of honour, to fulfil his engagement. Thus appealed to, the count no longer hesitated, and the marriage took place. As soon as William, (who was absent from court when the nuptials were celebrated,) heard of the occurrence, his wrath was excited against Ken, and he made no secret of his intention to resent his impertinent interference in the affairs of his family. Although Jane Worth was descended from two English families of distinction, and Count Zulestein was but a spurious branch of the Nassau race, he affected to consider the match beneath the dignity of his house. Ken bore his reproaches with magnanimity, and after vindicating the purity of his motives, expressed himself as nothing loth to leave his court. But William cautiously avoided discharging from his service such a man in the haste and heat of passion, fearing, perhaps, that it might tend to render him unpopular in England. It was therefore ultimately arranged between them that Ken should remain in Holland for a twelvemonth longer, at the end of which time, he would be at liberty to return home.

The year elapsed, and in 1680 Ken embarked for England. Immediately on his arrival king Charles II. (who was far from "showing any dislike of his behaviour in Holland,") made him one of his own chaplains. This office only required his occasional attendance at court, and the remainder of the year he passed at Winchester. It so happened, that at this period the king, ever intent on pleasure, and fond of variety, frequently selected this city as a temporary residence. In 1683 the first stone of a new palace, designed by Sir Christopher Wren, had been laid there, and Charles and his brother, the Duke of York, manifested the greatest interest in the progress of the building. Excursions to Portsmouth and hunting parties in the New Forest were amongst the favourite amusements of the brothers, during their repeated visits to Winchester; and those visits, with the attendant pastimes, attracted together a large concourse of persons. At these times the city was much overcrowded, and there was some difficulty in finding accommodation for the court ladies. The Duchess of Portsmouth had a house to herself, furnished in the most magnificent manner; but in attempting to provide for another notorious favourite, (the celebrated Nell Gwynn,) a circumstance occurred which placed Ken in a position of some embarrassment. "He had a good house," says his recent biographer, "in the Cathedral Close, opposite to the deanery, where the king was to lodge. When 'his harbinger,' whom we may suppose was an officer of the household, 'came to Winton, he marked the doctor's house, which he held in right of his probend, for the use of Mrs. Gwin.' But Ken's fearless heart at once prompted him to vindicate the holiness of his office. 'He absolutely refused her admittance, declaring that a woman of ill-repute ought not to be endured in the house of a clergyman, especially the king's chaplain.' This must have excited no small surprise amongst the courtiers; but as he was peremptory, she was forced to seek other lodgings. A small building was put up for her at the south end of the deanery. 'It was ever afterwards known by the name of Nell Gwynn, and has only been removed within the present century.'¹

Shortly after the occurrence of this incident, we find Ken again varying the scene of his labours. The fortress of Tangier, in the Straits of Gibraltar, which had formed a portion of the dowry which Charles II. received with his queen, Catherine of Braganza, had long been to the English nation a source of expense, exceedingly disproportioned to its importance. Its governor was, at this period, the notorious Colonel Kirke, under whom the place had become the theatre of riot, disorder, and profligacy, which rendered it a dangerous station for an English garrison. At last the Parliament came to the resolution of refusing further grants for its maintenance, and soon afterwards it was thought advisable to send a naval force, under Lord Dartmouth, to demolish the fortifications, lest they should fall into the hands of the Moors. With this fleet Ken sailed as chaplain, at the earnest desire of its commander, who was most anxious to improve the moral tone and discipline of the navy. "I think it of the utmost importance," said Dartmouth, in making the application to him, "to have the ablest and best man I can possibly obtain to go with me, both for the service of God, and the good government of the clergy that are chaplains in the fleet. My most earnest request to you is, that if it be not too great an inconvenience, you would do me the honour and favour to go with me this short voyage."

On this new service it must have required from Ken no small resolution to have ventured. In the scale of social importance, the sea-chaplains of those days ranked beneath the humblest country curate. His pay was on a par with that of the common seaman; he was not considered an officer, nor admitted to the society of the quarter-deck, and he could not even have the bell rung for prayers without the permission of the captain. Of course the class of men who entered into such a service were usually inferior in character, talents, and pretensions, to the majority of the English clergy; but the presence of Ken amongst them on this occasion appears to have effected much good, and, whilst he was on board, the services of the church were performed with unusual regularity and decency.

The voyage to Tangier lasted about five weeks, and during this period, in the intervals of his official duties, Ken is said to have composed the greater part of an epic poem, entitled Edmund, which is admitted, by those who have waded through it, to be a very dull and tedious performance. "It seems strange," says his biographer, "that the lively author of the 'Three Hymns,' and other holy songs published after his death, should have indited twelve such anomalous cantos. Our reverence for the author forbids any criticisms or quotations. It had been well for his poetic fame if the epic had been consigned to a like fate with the subject of his verse, the Royal Edmund,

"Heroe, Martyr, Saint, and King."

who he describes to have been cast into the sea by the sailors, on a voyage to Anglia, at the instigation of demons and monsters of the deep.²

Arrived at Tangier, Ken did his best to curb the profligacy and disorder of the place. But the difficulties of the task far exceeded his expectations. From the highest to the lowest, from the commanding officer to the sentinel, corruption and vice of every kind prevailed to a frightful extent. The governor, Kirke, is described as a "monster of tyranny and vice;" a brutal, covetous, and profligate fiend, who would listen to no expostulations or remonstrances.³ However, under these trying circumstances, Ken performed his duty, as he had always done, with zeal and fearlessness. Regardless of sneers and insults, he openly rebuked the vices of the governor and his minions, and if his efforts were unsuccessful, he was not without some sympathizing friends. Mr. Secretary Pepys, with whose Diary so many of our readers are acquainted, had accompanied the Tangier expedition from England, and was, with Ken, an eye-witness of the disgraceful condition of the fortress. Like Ken, also, he shrank with disgust from the immoralities of the place, as the following entries in his diary prove:—

"30th September. Sunday.—To church, (in Tangier,) a very fine and seasonable, but most unsuccessful, argument from Dr. Ken, particularly in reproof of the vices of this town. I was in pain for the Governor, and the officers about us in church, but I perceived they regarded it not.

"26th October.—Being a little ill, and troubled at so much loose company at table, my lord not being there, I dined in my chamber, and Dr. Ken, for the same reason, came and dined with me. We had a great deal of good discourse on the viciousness of this place, and its being time for Almighty God to destroy it."

(Owing to the demoralized condition of the garrison the fleet was detained at Tangier much longer than had been expected, or than necessity required. At the beginning of March, 1684, it however set sail for England, and in the course of the following month, with a joyful heart, Ken landed in England.

The first news he received on his return, must have grievously damped his joyousness of spirits. His

(3) The following is a portion of Mr. Macaulay's graphic description of Kirke's intolerable cruelty and licentiousness. "He lived," says the historian, "with boundless dissoluteness, and procured by extortion the means of indulgence. No goods could be sold till Kirke had had the refusal of them. No question of right could be decided till Kirke had been bribed. Once, merely from a malignant whim, he staved all the wine in a vintner's cellar. On another occasion he drove all the Jews from Tangier. Two of them he sent to the Spanish Inquisition, which forthwith burned them. Under this iron domination scarce a complaint was heard; for hatred was effectually kept down by terror. Two persons who had been refractory were found murdered; and it was universally believed that they had been slain by Kirke's order. When his soldier's displeased him he flogged them with merciless severity; but he indemnified them by permitting them to sleep on watch, to reel drunk about the streets, to rob, beat, and insult the merchants and the labourers."

excellent friend and relative, Izaak Walton, had died during his absence from England, and now lay buried in the cathedral, "where he and Ken had for many years joined in the services of the church they both loved so well, and had each in his sphere so zealously served."

Having dropped a few quiet tears on the tomb of his oldest and dearest friend, he was shortly afterwards summoned to Farnham Castle to receive a last farewell from the dying lips of Bishop Morley. The death of Morley led to Ken's advancement. Dr. Mews was translated from the see of Bath and Wells to that of Winchester, and the former bishopric therefore became vacant. Strange as it may seem, the rigid virtue of Ken was at this crisis properly appreciated by a profligate court. Many applications were made to Charles II. for the vacant see, but his characteristic answer is said to have been, "Oddsfish! who shall have Bath and Wells but the little fellow who would not give poor Nelly a lodging." Without hesitation he insisted that Dr. Ken should be at once nominated to the mitre which had been placed at his disposal, and on the 25th of January, 1685, the ceremony of his consecration took place in Lambeth Palace.

"Within one short week from his consecration," observes the biographer whom we have so often quoted, "Ken, 'who was in greater favour than all the bishops,' was suddenly summoned to the bed-side of the dying king. The cold hand was already laid upon him. Dismay and confusion now reigned within the palace, which but as yesterday furnished a scene of such manifold wickedness, as Evelyn says, 'he had never before seen.' The death summons came over that ungodly crew, like the hand-writing on the wall at Belshazzar's feast." According to Hawkins, the earlier biographer of Ken, the new bishop "kept a close attendance by the royal bed, without intermission, for at least three whole days and nights, watching, at proper intervals, to suggest pious and proper thoughts and ejaculations on so serious an occasion; in which time the Duchess of Portsmouth coming into the room, the bishop prevailed with his majesty to have her removed."

After the death of Charles II. Ken repaired to Wells, the chief city of his diocese, and there, in the first year of his episcopate, prepared for the press his Exposition of the Church Catechism; or, the Practice of Divine Love. Soon afterwards he was summoned to London, to assist in the coronation of King James II.; and, although the junior bishop present, he was selected by the king on that occasion to walk by his side under the canopy of state, whilst Turner, Bishop of Ely, his schoolfellow and constant friend, preached the coronation sermon. But despite these marks of favour, Ken's honest heart was not at ease. He had long discerned the perils which menaced the Establishment, from the Popish tendencies of the king; and in the midst of the pageant in which he was called on to take part, many gloomy forebodings of the calamities he so much dreaded must have crossed his mind. As a marked circumstance it was observed, that the usual ceremony of presenting the sovereign with a copy of the English Bible was omitted, and the Communion Service of the Church of England was not read. Deeply, deeply as Ken was attached to the Stuart dynasty and to the doctrine of strict hereditary right, he must have trembled to think of the gulf which separated the Protestant hierarchy from a Roman Catholic sovereign, and of the part he might himself be called upon to play in the event of a struggle such as his fears foreboded.

Not long after the king's coronation the diocese over which Ken presided became the scene of insurrection and civil war. In the summer of 1685 the Duke of Monmouth landed at Lyme, and raising the standard of revolt, soon succeeded in setting the greater part of the West of England in a flame. The cathedral city of Wells suffered much from the rebels. In their hostility to the episcopacy, (from its alleged connexion with the papacy,) they defaced the walls of the cathedral, broke down its ornaments, and tore the lead from the roof to cast into bullets. Some of them would have even caroused round the altar had not one of their leaders protected it with a drawn sword.¹ Leaving Wells they marched back to Bridgewater, and the fatal battle of Sedgemoor followed. The forces of Monmouth were completely routed, and the unfortunate leader, who had fled despairingly from the field, was in the course of a few days captured and placed at the disposal of his relentless and grievously offended foe. As soon as he was lodged in the Tower of London, that gloomy and memorable state prison, Ken and Turner were sent to administer to him ghostly comfort and advice, and to apprise him of the day appointed for his execution. What followed is well known. The captive's pusillanimity, his unmanly tears, his craven supplication to the king that his life might be spared, on any conditions and at any price—his interviews with Turner and Ken, who vehemently upheld the doctrine of non-resistance, and vainly besought him to acknowledge the sinfulness of rebellion—all this has been graphically told both in Mr. Macaulay's history and in the recent life of the bishop, to which we have often directed attention. With Dr. Tenison, Turner, and Dr. Hooper, Ken attended Monmouth to the scaffold, and to the last fervently impressed upon him the misery and ruin which his enterprise had entailed upon his faithful followers.

As soon as this sad scene was over Ken returned to his diocese, and endeavoured to arrest the tide of cruelty which marked the course of the victorious party. Colonel Percy Kirke, of Tangier notoriety, whose cruelty and licentiousness, it will be remembered, were openly rebuked by Ken in that den of wickedness, had been left in command at Bridgewater, and the vindictive government implicitly relied on his ferocious nature to execute without compunction, compassion, or remorse, its sentence of tremendous vengeance. We will not dwell on the sickening horrors that ensued. The military executions of Kirke were in number and barbarity unparalleled for atrocity, and in no respect justified by circumstances. But the tyranny of military license was not sufficient. When the cruelties of the Tangier ruffian had sufficiently appalled and disgusted the district, he was recalled to make room for the legal executioner. Thousands of miserable wretches were thrust into over-crowded prisons to await the "Bloody Assize;" for it had been arranged that Jeffreys, chief justice of England, a monster as pitiless as Kirke, should make a progress of goal delivery through the west of England, and complete, by the instrumentality of the law, the massacre which Kirke had commenced with the sabre. "The chief friend and protector of these unhappy men in their extremity," says Mr. Macaulay, "was one who abhorred their political and religious opinions; one whose order they hated, and to whom they had done unprovoked wrong—Bishop Ken. That good prelate used all his influence to soften the goulers, and retrenched from his own episcopal state that he might be able to make some addition to the coarse and scanty fare of those who had defaced his beloved cathedral. His conduct on this occasion was of a piece with his whole life. His intellect was, indeed, darkened by many superstitions and prejudices; but his moral character, when impartially reviewed, sustains a comparison with any in ecclesiastical history, and seems to approach, as near as human infirmity permits, to the ideal perfection of christian virtue."

(1) "Macaulay's History of England," vol. i.

It will be remembered that this eloquent eulogium proceeds from one by no means favourably disposed towards the party in church and state to which Bishop Ken belonged, and the united testimony of every trustworthy writer of the period, proves how fully it is deserved. But if the good bishop was sometimes successful in softening the heart of a gaoler, it was impossible for him to make any impression on such obdurate breasts as those of Kirke and Jeffreys. Nothing that he could say or do could prevent the legal murders which were perpetrated around him; and although his heart bled for the sufferers, he was made to feel that all interference, (even though it came in the shape of a supplication from an angel's lips,) was utterly unavailing.

But, turning from these horrors, we are invited by Ken's biographers to contemplate the unwearied zeal and anxious care with which he discharged the duties of his episcopate in his oppressed and harassed diocese. No toil seemed too severe, no expenditure, even though it transcended his means, too large in the prosecution of his incessant labours. Nor was his charity confined to the natives of his diocese, or even to his own countrymen. The revocation of the edict of Nantes in the month of October, 1685, filled the south of England with Protestant refugees, expelled from their native country by the inhuman and impolitic tyranny of Louis XIV. Upon these unhappy strangers the kind Bishop of Bath and Wells bestowed a full share of his sympathy and compassion.

In the Lent following, being appointed one of the preachers at Whitehall, he delivered an eloquent sermon on their behalf, and earnestly enforced their claims upon the Protestant public of England. He also caused an address to be circulated through his diocese, in which he exhorted his clergy to appeal to the liberality of all within their reach to assist in this work of charity, and to contribute themselves, according to their ability, "remembering how blessed a thing it was to be brotherly kind to strangers, to Christian strangers, especially such as those whose distress was very great, and in all respects most worthy of their tenderest commiseration." These kind and generous words were accompanied by an almost unprecedented act of liberality; for having at this period most opportunely received a fine of 4,000*l.* he appropriated nearly the whole of it to the relief of the poor refugees.¹

Whilst the persecuted Huguenots were partaking of the bounty of the English nation, the King of England was endeavouring by every means in his power to undermine the faith he had vowed to protect, and to restore his heretical subjects to the fold of Rome. Intent upon this great scheme, he little foresaw the perils he would have to encounter and the difficulties he must overcome. Had he been more sagacious, or less sincere, he would have shrunk aghast from the desperate design to which his zeal and intrepidity had impelled him. Among the bishops and clergy of the Established Church, the House of Stuart had hitherto found its firmest and most faithful supporters. The pulpits of the Establishment had recently rung with high-flown sentiments of loyalty, and the doctrine of the unlawfulness of resistance, under any circumstances, to rightful kings had been inculcated by the most respectable divines. In the Church of England, therefore, the Stuart kings had a powerful ally, and the sentiment of loyalty to the Crown was so bound up with that of attachment to the Church, that it was difficult, and in the highest degree dangerous, to separate them. What then must be thought of the policy of a sovereign who, by a series of aggressive acts, succeeded in arraying against him in firm, compact, and strenuous opposition, the ultra-loyal hierarchy who had been hitherto only suspected of being too supple and compliant to the Crown?

The manner in which the king's unconstitutional project was defeated has been recently related in an historical work of more than ordinary merit and accuracy.² The very men who would have laid down their lives for the maintenance of the royal prerogative, were the men from whom he received the most efficient check in the prosecution of his daring design. Amongst others, it fell to the lot of the loyal, meek, and pious Ken, to defend the Protestant constitution of the country against the encroachments of a Popish king. Little did the sovereign think that opposition to his illegal acts would have proceeded from such a quarter. The circumstances of the preceding reign, as well as his own experience, induced him to rely on the passive obedience of the clergy and laity of the Establishment under any acts of tyranny and aggression; and it seems never to have entered his mind, that a prelate of the Church of England would have disobeyed the mandates of his prince, from a conviction that they did not coincide with the duty which he owed to his God.

Whilst the king's open profession of the Roman Catholic religion, the revival of its public ceremonies, and the promotion of Roman Catholics to ecclesiastical preferments were giving rise, on all sides, to ill-suppressed murmurs and public discontent, it is upon record that Ken exercised his influence and eloquence in the maintenance and advocacy of Protestant doctrines with considerable success. As the Lent lecturer, he preached a sermon at Whitehall, on the 18th of March, 1617, "before the Princess of Denmark, (afterwards Queen Anne,) and a great crowd of people, and at least thirty of the principal nobility," which, according to Evelyn, "contributed not a little to the manifest disadvantage of the Popish interest." And again, on the 20th of March, he delivered another pointed discourse at St. Martin's church, upon which occasion, we are told, "the crowd of people was not to be expressed, nor the wonderful eloquence of this admirable preacher."¹

Soon after this, on the 4th of April, 1687, James II. issued his celebrated Declaration of Indulgence: a document speciously designed to secure the support of the nonconformists in furtherance of his plans for the overthrow of the Protestant Establishment. By this proclamation the penal laws against Roman Catholics and dissenters were suspended, and the full exercise of the right of public worship guaranteed to both. Under the mask of toleration, however, the most sagacious advocates of freedom discerned a deep-laid scheme to undermine the religion and constitution of the realm. Many of the dissenting communities signified their dissatisfaction, and rejected the proffered boon, whilst the friends of the Church of England felt constrained to regard their sovereign as the open foe of Protestantism. It was evident to all men, and to Ken amongst others, that a crisis was at hand; and when it came, in spite of all his loyalty, he hesitated not how to act.

In the spring of 1688, (a memorable and eventful year,) Ken once more, and for the last time, performed the duty of preaching the Lent sermon in the Royal Chapel. The occurrences of the past year encouraged him to speak with greater plainness, and with more force and vehemence than were usual to him. Taking his text from the prophet Micah, he drew a parallel between the condition of the "Reformed Church of Judah," as there described, and the perilous state of the Church of England; and he concluded with an impassioned peroration, in which he earnestly exhorted his hearers "to a uniform zeal for the Reformation." Many of his stern, truthful, and pointed phrases were conveyed to the king, who sent for him to the palace. They were closeted together for some time, but the only result of the interview was a reprimand uttered by Ken, "that if his majesty had not neglected his own duty of being present, his enemies had missed this opportunity of accusing him."

Very shortly after this interview with Ken the king issued a second Declaration of Indulgence, which was, in substance, little more than a repetition of the previous one; and there was for some time considerable doubt in the public mind why it was issued at all. But it soon appeared that James had a purpose in what he had done, and that purpose was made apparent by an Order in Council of the 4th May, directing that the Declaration, in its new form, should be read by the ministers of all churches and chapels throughout the kingdom, on two successive Sundays during divine service; and the bishops were further ordered to distribute copies in their respective dioceses. This order excited the utmost consternation and alarm amongst zealous churchmen and moderate dissenters. Several of the bishops met to deliberate upon it, under the guidance of Archbishop Sancroft, and circulars were sent to the absent prelates. Ken was in his diocese at this moment, but he quickly obeyed the archbishop's summons, and arrived in London on the 17th of May. The next morning a meeting was held, at which a petition to the king against the Declaration was unanimously adopted, and having been drawn up in the archbishop's handwriting, was signed by all present, except the Bishop of London, who was under suspension. The next step was to present it, and as the Declaration had to be read the day after the morrow, there was no time to spare. Accordingly six of the bishops (of whom Ken was one,) immediately repaired to Whitehall, and requested admission to the royal presence. They were almost instantly admitted, and a memorable scene ensued. At first his majesty was gracious and good-humoured, but his face darkened as he read the petition against his favourite scheme. He said it was "a standard of rebellion," and it was in vain that the bishops asserted their loyalty and reiterated their attachment to his person. At length Ken spoke: "Sire," he said, "I hope you will give that liberty to us which you allow to all mankind." But the king was implacable; he still spoke of the petition as an invitation to rebellion, and insisted that his Declaration should be read. Upon this, Ken exclaimed, with his usual boldness, "We are bound to fear God and honour the king. We desire to do both: we will honour you: we must fear God." It was evident that the object of the interview had failed. Angrier and angrier words came from the king. He told the bishops he would remember that they had signed that paper, (the petition,) and that he would keep it. Ken only uttered, "God's will be done;" and after a few further remarks the prelates respectfully withdrew.

The petition soon found its way into print, and the conduct of the bishops was on all sides applauded. In most of the churches of the metropolis on the following Sunday, the king's order was disobeyed, and the Declaration was not read. A feeling of enthusiastic Protestantism ran through the nation, which irritated the court and goaded the king to adopt measures of revenge. The bishops were summoned before the council, and ultimately committed to the Tower, on the charge of having published a false and seditious libel, by placing their petition in the king's hand. On the first day of term, they were brought before the Court of King's Bench, and a day having been fixed for their trial, they were, after some discussion, suffered to go at large on their own recognisances. Had bail been required, it was known, says Mr. Macaulay, "that one of the most opulent dissenters of the city had begged that he might have the honour of giving security for Ken!" On the 29th of June, amidst unparalleled public excitement, the trial took place, and resulted, as is well known, in a triumphant acquittal of the courageous prelates. We need not detail the circumstances of this important inquiry, as they belong rather to history than to the private memoirs of Bishop Ken. It is sufficient to state that the proceedings were watched with the utmost anxiety by all sections of Protestants; and when, after a night of fierce discussion, the jury pronounced their verdict of not guilty, the clamorous shouts with which it was hailed by a crowded court, and the public manifestations of joy in the metropolis and elsewhere, filled the king and his advisers with terror and dismay.

However deep and sincere might have been the loyalty of a large portion of the English nation, the downfall of the Stuart dynasty was now certain. The birth of the Prince of Wales, which took place whilst proceedings were pending against the bishops, had aggravated the uneasiness of the public mind, by introducing the prospect of a Roman Catholic dynasty; and many staunch Tories, who at a former period had shrunk from rebellion as the greatest possible crime, began to regard the deposition of their sovereign as an act of inevitable necessity. On the day of the acquittal of the bishops, a message was sent to the Prince of Orange, inviting him to come over to England with an armed force, which was signed by several distinguished statesmen. Many English noblemen and gentlemen repaired to the Stadtholder's court, and whispers of invasion and revolt were heard on all sides. As soon as the king became fully aware of his danger, he seems to have had some intention of making terms with the Church of England, for he immediately sent for Ken and other prelates. The influence of the Jesuits, however, prevented him from following the dictates of a sound policy; and the bishops were merely told, in vague and general terms, that the king wished well to the Church of England, and relied on the loyalty of its bishops and clergy, and were then dismissed.

With a heavy heart Ken returned to his diocese, and awaited with calm dignity the coming storm. He had left the king surrounded by time-servers and parasites, who he well knew would desert him in the hour of danger, and without compunction transfer their allegiance to a stranger. His own notions of loyalty and obedience were of a far different character, and were calculated to stand a severer test. On the 5th November, the Prince of Orange landed at Torbay, and Ken once more found a portion of his diocese in the occupation of a foreign army. As soon as the Dutch came within a short distance of his cathedral city he took refuge in Wiltshire, having first communicated the circumstances of his departure to Archbishop Sancroft. "I would not," he said, "have left the diocese in this juncture, but that the Dutch had seized houses within ten miles of Wells before I went, and your grace knows that, having been a servant to the princess and well acquainted with many of the Dutch, I could not have stayed without giving some occasion of suspicion, which I thought it most advisable to avoid; resolving by God's grace to continue in a firm loyalty to the king, whom God direct and preserve in this time of danger."

In the last crisis of James's fate it is important to note the melancholy contrast between the conduct of Ken and others whom he had injured and persecuted, and that of the relatives, friends, and dependents on whose attachment he relied. Abandoned, and "deserted in his utmost need," the unfortunate monarch bowed beneath the storm and fled the realm. As he passed into exile the ingratitude of those who were nearest and dearest to him pressed heavy on his heart, and the proceedings which followed his departure tended still further to embitter his reflections. In the hour of adversity he learned who were his true friends. It will be found that Ken assiduously attended the Convention parliament during the debates on the alleged vacancy of the throne by the king's withdrawal from the realm; and when the peers, by a majority of fifteen, concurred with the commons in offering the crown to William and Mary, he joined the minority in a firm but temperate protest. Nor was this all. His name appeared in the list of devoted royalists, who, though they had little reason to be loyal to king James, were ready to affirm the solemn obligation of the oath of allegiance which they had taken to him, under any circumstances, and at any personal sacrifice. All the arguments of expedience which could by possibility be urged made no impression on Ken and this chivalrous minority. At the cost of his bishopric the loyal prelate determined to obey the dictates of his conscience, and, had it been necessary, he would have submitted to far greater sacrifices for the vindication of a principle.

When the important act of parliament which required the clergy to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, before the 1st of August, 1689, (further providing that if they continued to refuse till the 1st February, 1690, they were to be absolutely deprived,) passed the legislature, Ken was busily engaged in his diocese. He had made up his mind to pursue the even tenor of his way, in peace and quietness, ready to yield when summoned by law to do so, but not feeling himself at liberty to retire voluntarily from his post of duty. Several other prelates were in the same predicament, and it must be admitted that they were treated by the new government with great consideration. It was not till more than a year after the date fixed by the act of parliament for their deprivation, that they were interfered with; and it is probable that no attempt would have been made to remove them even then had not a foolish conspiracy for the restoration of James by means of a French army been discovered, in which some of the more rash and inconsiderate nonjurors were implicated. When the sentence of deprivation was at last permitted to take its course, a considerable delay took place in appointing a successor to Ken. His blameless life and conduct had made him everywhere an object of respect, and he had many friends at the court of William and Mary. At length Dr. Richard Kidder, a learned Hebraist, was promoted to the see of Bath and Wells, and after a solemn assertion of his canonical rights in Wells Cathedral, the deprived bishop quietly retired from the diocese over which he had presided with such distinguished honour.

A glowing picture has been drawn by Mr. Bowles of the circumstances which probably attended the departure of Ken from his episcopal palace; and although, (to quote the observation of his recent biographer,) the description is highly poetical, it may not, therefore, be less true. "We can easily conceive," he says, "with what prayers of the poor, and how beloved and regretted, Ken bade farewell to the diocese and flock so dear to him, to the palace of Wells, the retired gardens, and the silent waters that surrounded them; to the towers and to the devotional harmonies of his cathedral. Surely it would be no stretch of imagination to conceive, that, on the drawbridge, as he passed, leaving the abode of independence and peace, a crowd of old and young would be assembled, with clasped hands and blessings, to bid him farewell. Mild, complacent, yet dignified, on retiring with a peaceful conscience from opulence and station to dependence and poverty, as the morning shone on the turretted chapel, we naturally imagine he may have shed only one tear when looking back on those interesting scenes. Perhaps his eye may have rested on the pale faces of some of the poor old men and women who had partaken of their Sunday dinner so often, and heard his discourse, in the old hall: then, and not before, we may conceive:—

'Some natural tears he dropp'd, but wiped them soon;
The world was all before him, where to seek
His place of rest, and Providence his guide.'

After Ken's expulsion from his bishopric an asylum was generously afforded him by his college friend, Thomas Thynne, (who had been raised to the peerage by Charles II. under the title of Viscount Weymouth,) in his beautiful mansion at Long Leat. In his retirement he composed "many useful, excellent, and pious pieces," (as Hawkins, his earliest biographer, calls them,) and conducted himself with a quiet dignity and moderation, which secured the sympathy and affection of all around him. During the great storm in 1703, his successor, Dr. Kidder, was killed in his palace at Wells, by the fall of a stack of chimneys, upon which an offer was made to Ken to restore him to his bishopric. It happened, however, that his old friend Dr. Hooper had been just mentioned as Kidder's successor, and this circumstance was sufficient to determine him in refusing an honour which his age and growing infirmities rendered him disinclined to accept, unless the interests of the church imperatively required it. "I told you long ago, at Bath," he says in one of his letters to Hooper, on this subject, "how willing I was to surrender my canonical claim to a worthy person, but to none more willingly than to yourself. My distemper disables me from the pastoral duty, and had I been restored, I declared always that I would shake off the burthen and retire."

A year afterwards a pension of 200*l.* per annum was conferred by Queen Anne upon the retired bishop. His income had previously amounted only to 80*l.* out of which, however, it is stated that he distributed a considerable sum in charity. As soon as he obtained this large accession to his means, his friend, Bishop Hooper, was compelled to use his friendly authority to prevent him from giving it all away, "which," according to a manuscript life of Hooper, "he was so charitable as to be always doing; so that his habit was mean, and a poor horse to carry him about, which made Hooper entreat him to lay out something for himself; and from that time he appeared in everything according to his condition."¹ Having survived all the other deprived bishops, Ken died at Long Leat on the 19th of March, 1711, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. In the latter portion of his life his bodily sufferings were very acute; but his cheerfulness of disposition never forsook him, and his hours of pain and sickness were soothed by the attentions of many affectionate friends. His death, which came at last as a welcome release, had been long apprehended, and he had desired that, whenever and wherever he died, he might be buried "in the churchyard of the nearest parish within his diocese, under the east windows of the chancel, just at sun-rising, without any manner of pomp and ceremony, besides that of the Order for Burial in the Liturgy of the Church of England; and be carried to the grave by the six poorest men in the parish." He also directed that a plain stone should be laid over him, with the following inscription upon it of his own composing:—

"May the here interred Thomas, late Bishop of Bath and Wells, and uncanonically deprived for not transferring his allegiance, have a perfect consummation of Blisse, both of body and soul, at the Great Day, of which God keep me alwaies mindful."²

We shall not follow the course we have adopted in our previous sketches of illustrious divines, by attempting to give any extracts from Ken's writings. It must not be forgotten, however, that as the author of the Morning and Evening Hymns, and of other devotional poems, a distinguished place should be assigned him amongst our sacred poets, and that as an eloquent and forcible preacher, his reputation stood high amongst his contemporaries. But it is not as an author that we have selected him as the subject of our present sketch. It has appeared to us that the incidents of his life have a peculiar interest of their own, and that his pure, firm, and consistent character ought not to be left unnoticed, whatever may be his claims to literary distinction.

SIR THOMAS MORE AND ERASMUS.

THOSE of our readers who have lately found any pleasure in contemplating the Household of Sir Thomas More, and in reviving their recollections of his intimacy with Erasmus, may be grateful to us for the following scattered notices of those celebrated men.

Erasmus was born at Rotterdam, in 1467. At nine years old, he was sent to school at Deventer, where he gave proofs of uncommon memory, though he represents himself as accounted a dull scholar. He was left an orphan at the age of thirteen; and his guardians plundered him of his patrimony, and drove him into a convent. Young as he was, he refused to part with his liberty for three years; and it was not till his third removal from one convent to another that his constancy gave way, and he reluctantly entered on his year of probation.

The monastic life suited his health as little as his taste; and, in his twenty-third year, he, with the permission of his superiors, accepted an invitation to reside with the Archbishop of Cambray. Thence he went to Paris, where he gave private lectures. Among his pupils were some young Englishmen, who induced him to visit England in 1497, where he met with a reception that endeared the country to him, and made him thenceforth fond of visiting it. In 1498, he applied himself closely to the Greek language, and said that, as soon as he could get any money, (which was a necessary we find him continually in want of,) he would first buy Greek books and then clothes. He seems to have been fearful, at first, of burning his fingers by meddling with theology, as if he had had a kind of instinct that his inquiries would lead him away from received opinions. In 1513 we find his friend, Dean Colet, roundly charging him with being too querulous and greedy, (probably in answer to some indirect application for assistance,) but promising to give him a small matter if he would ask for it without false modesty. Erasmus replied, that, in the opinion of Seneca, favours were dearly purchased which were extorted by begging. "Socrates," says he, "talking once with some friends, said, 'I would have bought me a coat to-day, had I had the money.' 'They,' observes Seneca, 'who then gave him what he wanted, showed their liberality too late.' Another, seeing a friend who was poor and sick, and too modest to make his wants known, put some money under his pillow while he was asleep. When I used to read this in my youth," pursues Erasmus, "I was extremely struck with the modesty of the one and the generosity of the other. But since you talk of begging without shame, pray who can be more shameless than myself, who live in England on the footing of a public beggar? I have received so much from the archbishop that it would be scandalous to take any more of him, were he even to offer it. I asked N. with sufficient assurance, and he refused me even more roundly. Even our good friend, Linaere, thinks me too bold; and, though he knew my poor state of health, and that I was leaving London with hardly six angels in my pocket, yet he urged me most pressing to spare the archbishop and Lord Montjoy, and advised me to retrench and learn to bear poverty with patience. A most friendly counsel, forsooth! While I had health and strength I used to dissemble my poverty, but now I cannot, unless I would risk my life."

In his fortieth year he visited Italy; then revisited England, where his acquaintance commenced with Sir Thomas More, for whose amusement and his own he wrote his "Moriae Encomium, or Praise of Folly." At the request of the Chancellor of Cambridge, he went to that University and read lectures in Greek and divinity. He returned to the Low Countries in 1514, and was created nominal counsellor to the Archduke Charles, with a stipend. The prior of Erasmus's convent, at Stein, now endeavoured to recall him; but he strongly resisted, defending his mode of life, which was indeed that of a scholar rather than of a monk. "I have lived," says he, "among sober people, attached to my studies, which have preserved me from many vices. I have conversed with persons who had a true love of Christianity, and from whose conversation I have derived great benefit. I will not boast of my writings; but many have told me that they have been made by them not only more learned, but more virtuous. I never loved money, nor was ambitious of glory or reputation. Every time I have thought of returning to you, I have been dissuaded by the consideration that some of you would envy and others (hate) me. I have recalled the insipid and frivolous conversations I used to hear, without the least savour of Christianity in them; your altogether secular repasts, and your whole life taken up in the observance of ceremonies. I have considered the infirmities of my own body—long a prey to harassing and dangerous disease—and have felt that either I could not give you satisfaction, or that I must destroy myself in doing so. But perhaps you will say that it would be a sufficient happiness to die in a fraternity. Alas! you are mistaken, and almost all the world along with you. We make Christianity to consist in a dress, in eating, and in little observances. We look upon a man as lost, who quits his white garment for a black one, who wears a hat instead of a hood, and who often changes his habitation. May I not venture to affirm that the greatest mischief that has been done to the Christian religion arises from these Religious Orders, though perhaps a pious zeal at first introduced them? Would it not be better, according to the doctrines of our Saviour, to look upon Christendom as one house, one family, one monastery, and all Christians as one brotherhood? Would it not be better to account the sacrament of baptism the most sacred of all vows and engagements, and never to trouble ourselves where we live, so we live well?"

Such a letter must have been highly unpalatable to his superior; but Erasmus was beyond the reach of his anger. About this time, he visited Basle, and became acquainted with Frobenius the printer; and here, in 1516, he published his celebrated Greek and Latin New Testament, which was bought and read with avidity. Though he shrank from joining the reformers, it was a common saying among the monks that "Erasmus laid the egg and Luther hatched it." Certainly, no man did more to discredit the frauds and superstitions of his church. "I am surprised," he says to Wareham, in 1516, "at the perverse judgment of the multitude. We kiss the old shoes and dirty handkerchiefs of the saints, and neglect their books, which are the more valuable and holy relics." Yet, to Wolscy, two years later, he endeavours to clear himself of any connexion with the reformers. "These wretches," says he, "ascribe to Erasmus everything that is bad; and confound the cause of literature with that of Luther, though they in reality have no connexion. As to Luther, he is altogether unknown to me; and if he hath written anything amiss, surely I ought not to bear the blame of it. His life and conversation are universally commended; and it is no small presumption in his favour, that calumny itself can fasten no reproach on his morals. If I had really had leisure to peruse his writings, I am not so conceited of my own abilities as to pass a judgment on the opinions of so considerable a divine; though even children, in this knowing age, undertake boldly to pronounce this is croneous and that heretical!"

"There are none," says he, "that bark at me more furiously than those who have never even seen the outside of my book. When you meet with one of these bawlers, let him rave on at my New Testament till he has made himself hoarse. Then ask him gently whether he has read it. If he has the impudence to say yes, urge him to produce one passage that deserves to be blamed. You will find that he cannot. Consider, now, whether this be the behaviour of a Christian, to blacken a man's reputation, which he cannot restore to him again if he would. Of all the vile ways of defaming him, none is more villanous than to accuse him of heresy; and yet to this they have recourse on the slightest provocation!"

A Dominican friar at Strasbourg, who had spitefully attacked Erasmus's Testament, was compelled to own that he had not read one word of it. "These men," exclaims Erasmus, "first hate, next condemn, and lastly, seek for passages to justify their censures. And then, if any one opposes them and calls them what they are, they say he is a disturber of the public peace; which is just as if you gave a man a blow in the face, and then bid him be quiet and not make a noise about nothing."

Speaking of converting the Turks, in case they were conquered, "What will they think," says Erasmus, "when they find our quibbling professors so little of a mind, that they dispute together till they turn pale with fury, call names, spit in one another's faces, and even come to blows? What must they think when they find it so very difficult a thing to know what expressions may be used when you speak of Jesus Christ? as if you had to do with a morose and malicious being whom you call forth to your own destruction, if you use a wrong word in the form of evocation, instead of a most merciful Saviour who requires nothing of you but purity of heart and manners."

"Let no man," he soon afterwards says, "be ashamed to reply to certain points. God knoweth how it can be! as for me, I am content that it is so; I know that the body and blood of our Saviour are things pure, to be received by the pure, and in a pure manner. He hath appointed this for a sacred sign and pledge of his love for us, and of the concord which ought to exist among Christians. I will therefore examine myself, to see if there be anything in me contrary to the mind of Jesus Christ, and whether I be in love and charity with my neighbour. But, to be curious how the ten categories are in this sacrament, how the bread can be transubstantiated by consecration, and how a human body can be in different places at the same time,—all this, in my opinion, serves very little to advancement in piety."

Elsewhere he says of the eucharist, "I know not what good an invisible substance can do there, nor how it could profit any one if it were discernible. If there be a spiritual grace present to the symbol, that seems to be sufficient. However, I cannot depart from the general consent of the Church."

In other words, he had no mind to be a martyr, but only to suggest doubts which should lead braver men to be such. "This worthy man," says his biographer Jortin, "spent a laborious life in an uniform pursuit of two points: in opposing barbarous ignorance and blind superstition, and in promoting useful literature and true piety. These objects he attempted in a mild, gentle manner, never attacking the persons of men, but only the faults of the age. He knew his own temper and talents, and was conscious he was not fitted for the rough work of a reformer."

His income arose almost entirely from pensions and gratuities from princes and wealthy prelates, all of the Romish Church, who would undoubtedly have withdrawn their patronage had he made common cause with the Lutherans. His cause was rather that of free and critical inquiry, in opposition to ignorance and prejudice; and when he found it leading him farther than he had foreseen, he stopped short and began to defend the church he had done so much to shake. Luther expressed pity rather than contempt for this weakness; but the heat of controversy gradually placed these two eminent men in more open antagonism, and drew from each of them acrimonious expressions which did their cause no good.

In 1522, appeared the "Colloquies," of Erasmus, which, in the easy and popular form of dialogue, attacked the superstitions of the day with a mixture of sense and wit that made them very generally acceptable. Their tendency was soon detected by the Church; and the faculty of Theology at Paris pronounced a censure on them as on a work "in which the fasts of the Church are slighted, the suffrages of the Holy Virgin and the saints derided, celibacy rated below matrimony, Christians discouraged from monkery, and grammatical preferred to theological erudition. Wherefore it is decreed that this wicked book be forbidden to all, more especially to young folks." He was next engaged in his controversy with Luther, which did not redound much to his credit. In consequence of the public change of religion at Basle, he removed to Friburg, where he published an epistle against the reformers, in which he asserted that there were certain cases in which they might lawfully receive capital punishment as blasphemers and seditious persons. He afterwards returned to Basle, which he left no more; and after prosecuting his learned labours for a time, under the pressure of severe bodily afflictions, he expired in his sixty-ninth year, surrounded by Protestant friends, and dying much as a Protestant might, in everything but in name. He was the most eminent, though not the sole reviver of learning in his day, and is justly regarded as one of the great benefactors of his age. His memory is equally cherished at the place of his birth and of his death; and the bronze statue erected to his memory in the great square of Rotterdam, representing him in the act of scrutinizing a manuscript with delighted avidity, is admirably characteristic of the man.

When we say that some of our happiest and earliest years were spent on the site of Sir Thomas More's country house in "the village of palaces;" some of our readers will hardly believe we can mean Chelsea. But, in those days, the gin-palace and tea-garden were not; Cremorne was a quiet, aristocratic seclusion, where old Queen Charlotte

"Would sometimes council take and sometimes tea."

—A few old, quiet streets and rows, with names and sites dear to the antiquary, ran down to the Thames, then a stranger to steam-boats; a row of noble elms along its strand lent their deep shade to some quaint old houses with heavy architraves, picturesque flights of steps and elaborate gates; while Queen Elizabeth's walk, the Bishop's walk, and the Bishop's Palace, gave a kind of dignity to the more modern designations of the neighbourhood.

When the Thames was the great highway, and every nobleman had his six or eight-oared barge, the banks of the river as high as Chelsea were studded with country houses. At the foot of Battersea Bridge, which in those days did not disfigure the beautiful reach, Sir Thomas More, then a private gentleman and eminent lawyer in full practice, built the capital family house which was afterwards successively occupied by the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Daera, Lord Burleigh, Sir Robert Cecil, the Earl of Lincoln, Sir Arthur Gorges, Lord Middlesex, the first Duke of Buckingham, Sir Bulstrode Whitlock, the second Duke of Buckingham, the Earl of Bristol, and the Duke of Beaufort. It stood about a hundred yards from the river; its front exhibited a projecting porch in the centre, and four bay-windows alternating with eight large casements; while its back presented a confused assemblage of jutting casements, pent-houses, and gables in picturesque intricacy of detail, affording "coigns of vantage," we doubt not, to many a tuft of golden moss and stone-crop. This dwelling, which for convenience and beauty of situation and interior comfort, was so highly prized by its many and distinguished occupants, appears at length to have been pulled down when it became rickety and untenable from sheer old age—in Ossian's words, "gloomy, windy, and full of ghosts." In the freshness of its recent erection and occupancy by a buoyant, untamed, gay-spirited family, Erasmus thus writes of it:—

"More has built himself a house at Chelsea. There he converses with his wife, his son, his daughter-in-law, his three daughters and their husbands, with eleven grand-children. There is not a man living, so affectionate as he; he loveth his old wife as if she were a young maid." "I would call his house," he continues, "the academy of Plato, were it not an injustice to compare it with an academy where disputations concerning numbers and figures were only occasionally interspersed with disquisitions on the moral virtues. I should rather call his house a school of Christianity; for though there is no one in it who does not study the liberal sciences, their special care is piety and virtue. No quarrelling nor intemperate words are heard; idleness is never seen."

We must give one more life-sketch of this engaging household; more attractive than that painted by Holbein:—

"He suffered none of his servants to give themselves to cards or dice; but some of them he allotted to look after the garden, assigning to every one his sundry plot; some, again, he set to sing, some to play on the organ. The men abode on one side of the house; the women on the other. He used, before bed-time, to call them together, and say certain prayers with them. He suffered none to be absent from mass on Sundays or holy days; and upon great feasts he ordered them to watch the eyes till matin-time. He used to have some one to read daily at his table, which being ended, he would ask of some of them how they had understood such and such a passage; and so then grant a friendly communication, recreating all men that were present with some jest or other."

More was born in Milk Street, 1480. His father,

Sir John More, one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench, on removing him from a free grammar school in Threadneedle Street, placed him in the household of Cardinal Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Chancellor. Here his early promise of excellence soon fixed on him the attention of his patron, who, on occasion of one of his many ready and felicitous replies, observed to one of the bystanders, "This child will unquestionably prove an extraordinary man." The cardinal would often amuse himself by putting his wit to proof, especially during the Christmas merriments; when, the actors performing their several parts, young More would suddenly step in among them, and, never studying before upon the matter, make up an extempore part for himself so full of drollery and fun, that he made more sport for the company than all the players besides.

At the Cardinal's instance, young More was early sent to Oxford, where, from sixteen to eighteen, he studied hard with scarcely any intermission; his father limiting him to an allowance, the scantiness of which he was himself in after-times one of the most forward to praise. His inclination was for the church, but his destination was the law; and at the end of his two years at Christ-church he was removed, first to New Inn and then to Lincoln's Inn. His private discipline was now of the strictest kind. Interpreting the text, "He that hateth his life," &c. somewhat too literally, he acted up to his interpretation of it with an honesty and courage which it is impossible not to admire, living hard, lying hard, and never allowing himself more than four or five hours' sleep out of the twenty-four, with the ground for his bed and a log for his pillow. Dean Colet, the founder of St. Paul's school, which he dedicated "to the child Jesus," was the confessor of More, who diligently attended his sermons on the Lord's Prayer, the Apostles' Creed, and the Ten Commandments. The following letter of the young student to his venerable pastor is delightful, both for its affectionate, pious turn of thought, and unaffected ease of expression:—

"As I was lately walking before Westminster Hall, busying myself about other men's causes, I lighted on your servant, at whose first salutation I was marvelously pleased, both because he is always acceptable to me in himself, and because I thought he could not have come to London without you. But when I learnt of him that you were not come, nor likely to come for a long while, my great pleasure was turned into as great disappointment. For what can be more grievous to me than to be deprived of your most sweet conversation? whose wholesome counsel I was wont to enjoy, with whose delightful familiarity I was recreated, by whose weighty sermons I have often been stirred up to devotion, by whose example I have been much amended, and in whose very countenance I was wont to rest contented! Wherefore, as I have found myself greatly strengthened, so long as I enjoyed those helps, so now do I find myself much weakened and depressed, being deprived of them so long. For what, I pray you, is there here in this city to incline any man to live well, and that doth not rather, by a thousand devices, draw him back, and tempt him to all sorts of wickedness? What findeth he here but feigned love, and the honey-poison of venomous flattery? In one place, cruel hatred, in another nothing but litigations and suits. Whithersoever we cast our eyes, what see we but victualling houses, fishmongers, butchers, cooks, pudding-makers, and poulterers, who administer to our appetites, and do good service to the world and the prince thereof? Why, even the houses themselves bereave us, in great measure, of the sight of heaven; so as that the height of our buildings, and not the circle of our horizon, limits our prospect. For which cause, I forgive you, the rather that you delight to remain where you are, in the country. For there you find a company of plain souls, void of all craft, wherewith our citizens do so abound; wherever you look you behold a pleasant prospect, the temperature of the air refresheth you, the clear beholding of the heavens delighteth you, and you find nothing there but bounteous gifts of nature and saintly tokens of innocence. Yet I would not have you so carried away with these contentments that you should be stayed from hastening hither. For if the discommodities of the city displease you, as they very well may, yet the country about your parish of Stepney, whereof you ought to have some care, may afford you the like delights to those which now you enjoy. Return, therefore, my dear Colet, either for Stepney's sake, which mourneth for your absence as children for their mothers, or else for London's sake, in respect it is your native place, whereof you can have no less regard than of your own parents; and last, though least, return for my sake, who have wholly dedicated myself to your directions."

The lectures of "the boy-sage," as he was called, were even honoured by the attendance of his Oxford master, the learned Grocyn; and his reputation acquired him the office of law-reader at Furnival's Inn. With every prospect of a rapid rise in his profession, there was nothing imprudent in his early marriage with Joan Colt, the eldest daughter of Mr. Colt, of New Hall, in Essex. He established her near his own family in Bucklersbury; and his being thus early "clogged," as his grandson says, with wife and children only proved a healthful stimulus to increased exertion. Before the age of twenty-three, he was member of the House of Commons, and incurred Henry the Seventh's resentment by opposing his demand for an enormous dowry for his daughter the Princess Margaret. The king revenged himself on the son by throwing the father into prison, and keeping him there till he paid a heavy fine for a pretended offence. More found it necessary to retire from practice, to keep out of the incensed monarch's sight; and this pause in his active career was to him a season of enjoyment and self-improvement. In the sixth year of his married life his wife died, leaving him one son and three daughters, Margaret, Elizabeth, and Cecily. Within two or three years he married

Mrs. Alice Middleton, a widow, who had one daughter, named Margaret; and he farther increased his family circle by the addition of Margaret Giggs, a gentle, sweet-tempered orphan girl, whom he said he loved as if she were one of his own daughters; and who herself said in after times, that "she had sometimes been fain to commit a trifling fault for the nonce, for the sake of hearing Sir Thomas More chide her, with such sweetness, gentleness, and moderation." Here then, we have the family party, first at Crosby House, and then at Chelsea, where More commenced building his house soon after his return to practice. Six years of retirement had done him no harm; he rose rapidly in his profession, found himself in the receipt of a large income, in spite of a disinterestedness which prevented his accepting a retaining fee in any cause the justice of which he was not fully convinced of; and, amid all his busy moments, he found time to continue the literary works and maintain the correspondence with eminent foreigners which he had probably commenced during his seclusion. His chief correspondent was Erasmus, who, in those days when penny-posts were not, retained a number of young men to carry his letters and receive their answers, which were often in the shape of money. At length these two celebrated men met by chance, each without knowing the other. More was calling on the Lord Mayor; Erasmus happened to have been shown the Mansion House cellars, where he had been regaled with ale and oysters. On being introduced, merely as a foreigner, to More, the following colloquy ensued. "Whence come you?" "From the regions below." "What were they about there?" "Drinking out of leather jacks, and eating live oysters." More, after a moment's thought, exclaimed, "Either you must be Erasmus or the devil." "Either you," returned Erasmus, "must be More or nothing."

More frankly made him free of his house, which Erasmus called "neither magnificent nor provocative of envy, but handsome and commodious enough." The gay, approachable manners of the young people, and their innocent salutations when they met and parted, amused and pleased him. Here he accorded some of his notice to their tutor, Mr. Gunnel, who afterwards rose in the church. To this excellent man Sir Thomas More writes thus:—"I have received, my dear Gunnel, your letters, such as they are wont to be, full of elegance and affection. Your love for my children I gather from your letters; their diligence from their own. I rejoice that Elizabeth has shewn as much modesty of deportment in her mother's absence as she could have done in her presence. Tell her that this delights me above all things; for, much as I esteem learning, which, when joined with virtue, is worth all the treasures of kings; what doth the fame of great scholarship, apart from well regulated conduct, bring us, except distinguished infamy? Especially in women, whom men are ready enough to assail for their knowledge, because it is uncommon, and casts a reproach on their own sluggishness. Among other notable benefits which solid learning bestows, I reckon this among the first,* that we acquire it not for the mere sake of praise or the esteem of learned men, but for its own true value and use. Thus have I spoken, my Gunnel, somewhat the more in respect of not coveting vain-glory, because of those words in your letter wherein you deem that the high quality of Margaret's wit is not to be depressed, which, indeed, is mine own opinion; but I think that they the most truly depress and affront their wit who accustom themselves to practise it on vain and base objects, rather than raise their minds by the study and approval of what is good in itself. It mattereth not in harvest time whether the corn were sown by a man or a woman, and I see not why learning in like manner may not equally agree with both sexes; for by it reason is cultivated, and as a field, sown with wholesome precepts, which bring forth good fruit. Even if the soil of a woman's brain be of its own nature bad, and apter to bear fern than corn, by which saying men oft terrify women from learning, I am of opinion that a woman's mind is, for that very reason, all the more in need of manure and good husbandry, that the defect of nature may be redressed."

In the same vein writes this enlightened, affectionate father to "his most dear daughters, Margaret, Elizabeth, and Cecily, and to Margaret Giggs, as dear to him as if she were his own." To his beloved Margaret at a very early age he thus expresses himself:—"I cannot tell you, most dear Margaret, how grateful to me are your most delightful letters. While I was reading them there happened to be with me that noble youth, Reginald Pole; not so ennobled, indeed, by birth, as he is by learning and all kinds of virtue. To him your letter seemed a miracle, even before he was made aware how you were beset by shortness of time and other molestations; and hardly could he believe that you had had no help from your master, till I told him seriously that you had not only no master in the house, but that also there was no man in it that had not more need of your help in writing than you of his."

Praise like this would stimulate a mind like Margaret's rather than inflate it with empty vanity; he knew with whom he had to do. "I pray thee, Meg," he elsewhere says, "to let me know what your studies just now are; for I declare to you that rather than suffer my children to lose ground, I would myself continue your education to the loss of my worldly estate, and the neglect of all other cares and businesses." "I will pass over, my sweetest daughter, the delight your letter gave me, to acquaint you with the impression it made on a perfect stranger. It happened, this evening, that I was sitting with the Bishop of Exeter, a learned man, and by general consent allowed to be a sincere man. Happening to take out of my pocket a paper which was to the purpose we were talking of, I by chance pulled out therewith your letter. The handwriting pleasing him, he drew it from me and looked at it, when, perceiving the salutation to be a woman's, he began eagerly to peruse it, novelty inviting him thereunto. But when he had finished it, and found it was your writing, which he could not credit till I had seriously affirmed it—why should I not report what he said upon it? Such a letter! so good a style! such pure Latin! so eloquent! so full of sweet affection!—he was marvellously taken with it. When I perceived this, I brought forth an oration of yours, and also some of your little verses, which so pleased him, that every look and gesture of the man, quite free from exaggeration and flattery, bewrayed that his thoughts were more than words could utter, though his words, too, were to your great praise; and forthwith he took from his pocket a Portugal piece, which I shall take care to inclose you herewith. I could not possibly shun the taking it, as he must needs send it to you in token of his dear affection, though by all means I endeavoured to prevail on him to take it again, for I was afraid lest he should think I had contrived the accident on purpose, and therefore I would not show him any of your sisters' letters, lest he should send them presents too; but I thought within myself, it is doubtless a pleasure to gratify the good man in this. Write carefully to him, therefore, and express your good thanks."

The oration was, we believe, in answer to Quintilian, and she also translated Eusebius out of Greek. The good bishop would hardly have sent a Portugal piece to a girl who was not of very tender age, and yet More addresses her as a woman, and a woman of sense. In nothing, perhaps, are the discrimination and genius of parents more discernible than in their knowing whom, and what, and how much they should encourage or repress. To show his daughter's letters, and tell her of the encomiums they received, was the act either of a brave or a foolish father. Nobody could call More foolish. There was such a singular happiness in his treatment of those around him that not one of even the inferior members of his numerous household turned out ill, and even his homely wife's rugged temper was charmed from its asperity, though he would laughingly tell her she was penny wise and pound foolish, saving a candle's end, and spoiling a velvet gown. "Tilley-valley," she would reply to him, "here sit you, making goslings in the ashes. My mother would often say to me, Better rule than be ruled."

"Truly then, good Alice," was his retort, "you better her teaching, for I never found you willing to be ruled yet. Are you not a jolly master-woman?"

It was one of his sayings, that souls in a separate state would think as meanly of the bags of gold they had hoarded in their lifetime, as a man advanced in years would think of a bag of cherry stones which he had hoarded when a child.

When he saw any of the young men of his household dressing themselves fine in some uneasy fashion, or stroking up their hair to make themselves high foreheads, he would coolly tell them that if God gave them not hell he would do them great injustice, for they were taking far more pains to win it and to please the devil than many even virtuous men did to win heaven and please God.

Another of his sayings was, that God could not punish man worse than if he should suffer everything to happen that every man wished for. "Not only," said he, "doth pleasure withdraw wicked men from prayer, but affliction doth the same sometimes. Yet there is this difference, that affliction doth sometimes wrest a short prayer from the wickedest man alive; but pleasure withdraweth even one that is indifferent good from all prayer."

The public conduct of More as chancellor is too well known here to need repetition. The death of his father brought him a very small addition to his estate, as Sir John More's house and lands at Gubbins, in Hertfordshire, were settled on his last wife for her life, and she survived the chancellor. Sir Thomas has left it, under his own hand, that the amount of all his revenues and pensions, except what had been granted by letters patent of the king's liberality, viz., the manors of Duckington, Frinchford, and Barley Park, did not exceed fifty pounds a year; a rare saying for one who had gone through so many public offices! A subscription of a thousand pounds was made by the bishops and clergy, and offered to him in testimony of their thankfulness to him for his polemical writings; but he would in no wise accept it, nor permit it to be settled on his wife or children, saying he would sooner see it cast into the Thames.

Having resigned the great seal he never busied himself in public matters any more, but devoted the interval that elapsed before his refusing the oath of supremacy, to study, prayer, and the preparation of his mind for its approaching conflict. He diminished his establishment, finding other services for his men, and disposing of his children in homes of their own. As he lay wakefully on his pillow, his wife was often aware that he was passing the long hours of the night in prayers and tears, instead of in sleeping. The strength which he needed, however, he obtained for the seeking, for when the time of action came, we never find him betraying the slightest token of vacillation. On being summoned to Lambeth, to take the oath, he requested to see the form, which, when he had attentively read, he said that he would neither find fault with its authors, nor would blame any man that took it, but that, for his own part, he felt that he would not do so without danger to his soul. He was committed to the custody of the Abbot of Westminster for a few days, during which time the king took it into private deliberation how he should deal with his old servant, and was inclined to let him off on his swearing not to divulge to any one whether he had taken the oath of supremacy or no; but the enmity of the queen caused this merciful design to be abandoned, and, on the oath being again tendered and again declined, he was committed to the Tower. As he went thither, Sir Richard Wingfield, who had him in charge, observing that he wore a gold chain about his neck, recommended him to take it off, and send it home by some private hand to his family; but he calmly replied, "Nay, sir, that will I not, for if I were taken in the field by mine enemies, I would they should fare somewhat the better for me."

According to his great-grandson, to whose testimony we do not accord implicit faith, More was tempted even by his beloved Margaret, to yield his conscience to the dictates of expediency, but to this he hearkened, no, not for a moment; saying, that "for the last seven years he had been diligently reading over all the fathers, who, with one consent, supported the pope's supremacy, and he saw not how one member of the Church, as England was, could lawfully withdraw itself from the whole body." Here we find the wise More arguing on false premises, and adjudging the Church of Rome to be the Church of Christ, instead of one member of it, as much so as the Church of England. But a conscientious Roman Catholic could hold no other doctrine; and, while differing from him in judgment, we cannot withhold our admiration from the marvellous constancy with which he supported a point of conscience. Henry the Eighth did more harm to the cause of the Reformation by beheading More than by writing against Luther, for he furnished the Church of Rome with her purest martyr.

The only moment when his steadfast composure was almost overcome, was when Margaret Roper rushed into his arms on his return to the Tower after his condemnation:—

"Oh! what a spectacle was this!" exclaims his grandson, "to see a woman of nature shamefast, by education modest, to express such excessive grief as that love should make her shake off all fear and shame; which doleful sight piercing the hearts of all beholders, how do you suppose it must have moved her father's? Surely, his affection and forcible love would have daunted his courage, if that a divine spirit of constancy had not enabled him to behold this most generous woman, this most worthy daughter, endowed with all good gifts of nature, all sparks of piety, which are wont to be most acceptable to a loving parent, pressing unto him at such a time and place, where no man could have had access, hanging about his neck before he was aware of her, holding so fast by him as she could scarce be plucked off, not uttering any other words than 'Oh, my father!' What a sword was this to his heart! and at last, being drawn away by force, to run upon him again without any regard either of the weapons wherewith he was compassed, or of the modesty becoming her own sex! What comfort did he want! what courage did he then stand in need of! and yet he resisted all this most courageously, remitting nothing of his staid gravitie, speaking only what we have recited before, and desiring her to pray for him."

It seems that, when the unhappy daughter was borne off, Margaret Giggs, incited by her example, rushed forward also into More's arms, and received a last embrace. After this tragic scene there is a little bathos in the like approach of Dorothy Collie, a poor, humble servant maid, who loved her master well in her simple way, and must needs kiss his hand, and of whose demonstrative attachment he afterwards said, with a benignant smile, that it was very homely but very lovingly done. Perhaps this little incident, artless and unlooked-for as it was, had the good effect of withdrawing his soul for a few moments from the anguish of parting from his child.

More's wife was turned out of her house at Chelsea immediately after his execution, and all her goods were taken from her, "the king allotting her of his mercy," says her descendant, "a pension of twenty pounds by the year; a poor allowance to maintain a Lord Chancellor's lady."

The manner of Margaret's possessing herself of her father's head has been variously told, and it is not the only incident connected with his sad end which his friends, not superior to the superstition of the time, dressed up with additions approaching to the supernatural. The partizans of a great and good man betray a want of faith in his imperishable qualities, when they seek to hasten and enhance his fame by fabulous marvels.

And yet we must wind up with a ghost story, most unexpectedly borne testimony to, since writing, the last paragraph. Near Ewhurst, in Surrey, is a very old, secluded, beautiful country seat, built in the Elizabethan style, of red brick, and called Banyards. It is at present in the occupation of a venerable clergyman and magistrate. This mansion, in the time of Henry the Eighth, was the residence of Sir Edward Bray, who was Constable of the Tower in the year 1539, and whose son married Elizabeth, the daughter of Margaret and William Roper. Here, then, Margaret may probably have visited her daughter; and, as she seems to have kept jealous ward over the coffer containing her father's head to the day of her death, when it was buried with her in the Ropers' vault, in St. Dunstan's Church, Canterbury, the knowledge of her possession of so ghastly a relic may easily have given rise to a report among the poor people of the neighbourhood, that a restless ghost haunted the long gallery of Banyards. The facts connected with the legend have probably died away; the belief in the ghost remains. While writing the above, I asked a country-girl from Ewhurst, who happened to come into the room, if she knew Banyards. She said, "Oh, yes, her father used to work there; it was a beautiful old place." "Had she ever heard of its being haunted?" "Yes; there were strange noises frequently to be heard in the long gallery, as of men playing at bowls; and—she did not know whether it were quite right to talk of such things—but a man still living, she believed, and still working on the grounds, had once kept watch in the house, all alone, and, on looking through the keyhole of the gallery door, had seen a figure, white as wool, pacing up and down, which melted away the moment he opened the door." Furthermore, she did not believe much in ghosts, and thought the house had of late years been quite quiet. There is a distinction between authenticating a ghost and a ghost story. Of all the spirits that in English history have walked, there are few with whom one would more gladly have an hour's colloquy than with that of Sir Thomas More.

"If from the ceremonies of the silent dead
Our long departed friends could rise anew,
Why feel a horror, or conceive a dread
To see again those friends whom once we knew?"

"Oh! if the flinty prison of the grave
Could loose its doors and let the spirit free,
Why not return the wise, the just, the brave,
And set once more the pride of ages free?"—

THE PIC-NIC PARTY.

J. STOTHARD, R.A.

STOTHARD was beyond comparison the first illustrator of Boccaccio's graceful fancies—without embodying any of his objectionable grossness. What can be more elegant than the group before us—of Florentine nobles and ladies—buried in the rural retreat to which they had retired from the plague, and amusing their vacant hours by reciting the tales of the Decameron? Our painter has thoroughly seized the spirit of the scene. There is a grace in the forms, and a sentiment diffused over the whole composition, that thoroughly reflects the manner of the great original.

RUINS.

D. ROBERTS.

DAVID ROBERTS is well known as the first architectural painter of the present day. Whatever may be the style—classical, mediæval, Greek, or Gothic—no one can compare with him either for grandeur of general effect or delicacy of detail. The subject before us is a composition of the ruins of an ancient Roman edifice, seen in the beams of the setting sun, that diffuse over the scene an air of pensive melancholy which heightens the fallen magnificence of the ruined pile.

A VIEW FROM TELEGRAPH HILL, SAN FRANCISCO.

WE invite the reader's attention to the subjoined admirable epistle to the EDITOR, from a friend and correspondent in far-off "Eldorado." It is as graphic as a painting, and moreover is imbued with true feeling, which cannot be simulated. The letter was written in April last; and into it we plunge, in medias res:—

"The rainy season has fairly commenced, yet the Storm-king is by no means inexorable, but often courteously gives place to the Sun, who readily avails himself of the privilege, and lights up the newly-washed face of Nature with a brilliancy of which the unhappy dwellers in Atlantic cities cannot have the faintest idea. At such times it is my delight to ascend 'Telegraph-Hill,' an eminence of some twelve hundred feet in height, and reclining upon the green slope, with a quiet cigar, to bask in the glorious sunshine, and look down upon this city of magic, and its beautiful surroundings. Though many of the accessories of a fine landscape are wanting, yet the scene is not without its charm. There is a delicious, dreamy haziness in the atmosphere, lulling the senses to repose, and lending enchantment to everything upon which the eye can rest. Looking westward through the portals of the 'Golden Gates,' I see the mighty swell of the Pacific rolling onward with a dignified good-nature until it reaches the shore, when it loses its equanimity at once, and dashes the foam high upon the imperturbable rocks, proclaiming at the same time its resistless and overwhelming power in its own solemn and majestic tones. Glancing along the opposite shore of the bay, my eye rests with delight upon the graceful outlines of the magnificent 'White Squall,' peerless among clipper-ships, as she gallantly dashes outward on her fleet career. In the distance I see the long line of green mountains of the 'Contra Costa,' varied only by a single forest of pines, far behind which is visible the summit of 'Mount Diablo,' blue in the distance, yet with its outline clear and sharp in the pure atmosphere; before which rises abruptly the small matter-of-fact-looking island of 'Yerba Buena,' with the ghostly wreck of the ill-fated 'pent-up Utica' at its base.

"And now I look down upon the wonder of the nineteenth century, this miracle of progress and promise, which yesterday was not, and to-day ranks in the first class of cities; in whose history a period of four years carries us back to dim and remote antiquity. How shall I describe it, as it appears to me now, laid out in most scrupulous regularity, but built in every possible style of architecture which the heart of man can conceive, from the stately brick edifice, which would be respectable in any eastern metropolis, down to the most grotesque and nondescript shanty? In the place of innumerable spires that strike the eye of the beholder in more ancient and advanced communities, I see only the quaint belfry of the new Presbyterian church, and the modest cupola of the City Hall. We are worshippers of Mammon here, and there is nothing about his temples to point heavenward. Prominent in view is the Grand Plaza, 'Portsmouth Square,' tastefully ornamented with ancient boots, broken bottles, and superannuated counters, with the joint indications of an Artesian well in the centre, commenced some time since with great zeal by our city fathers, but speedily discontinued; doubtless on the principal that 'all's well that ends well.' Conspicuous, also, is the high form of the 'Union Hotel;' not much, certainly, in the way of architecture, but not to be excelled in any land for 'creature comforts;' the 'Eldorado,' chief shrine of those who 'buck at monté,' and otherwise disport themselves; and the new gaol, gorgeous with granite and marble, on which the chain-gang have just commenced work, with most rebellious stomach. Hard by is Pacific-street, so called by reason of numberless rows, and the classic precincts of "Clark's Point," where the sons of Neptune most do congregate. Even at this far distance come to my ears, on this calm afternoon, the tones of a gloomy fiddle, and a sound of most portentous dancing.

"It is a curious sight to see noble ships engulfed in the very heart of a populous city, but such a remarkable spectacle is presented here. In the olden time they were dragged far up into the mud to serve as store-ships, and the gigantic improvements of the money-making 'Yankees' have surrounded them with sand, and the city has reached and passed them in its wonderful progress. To a sailor it is indeed most pitiful to see these gallant ships doomed to such an ignominious fate, never more to bound 'o'er the glad waters of the dark blue sea,' but to rot ingloriously in these 'yellow sands.' At the foot of the hill upon which I recline are the white tents of the peaceful and enlightened 'Sidney coves,' gleaming in the sunlight like virgin snow; emblematic perhaps of the purity of the occupants. On the hills behind the city, I see houses in every stage of elevation, and some of them are of considerable pretensions. We are not civilized enough, as yet, for Tudor cottages, but there are some faint imitations of Swiss chalets, standing boldly out from the barren hill, guiltless of foliage. Now I look again upon the noble bay, filled with a vast assemblage of vessels of every clime and kindred and tongue. 'John Bull' is here, sturdy and dogmatic; the noisy and garrulous Frenchman; the swarthy Italian; and all the other nations with their appropriate adjectives. The old heathen gods and heroes are here in full force: Jupiter is setting up his back-stays; Apollo is full of candles; Mars has grown domestic, and holds a choice assortment of furniture; Ariadne still lies sad and solitary on the shore, while Theseus rides doggedly at anchor on the other side of the bay, regardless of her woe. Nor is Shakespeare unrepresented, for 'Othello' is here seeking new adventures to beguile the car of Desdemona; 'Hamlet' has given up his moody speculations, and gone rashly into the lumber trade; 'Brutus' is 'up' for Panama; 'Cleopatra' is taking in ballast; and I notice 'Miranda' with her fore-top mast gone, having been roughly treated in a late tempest. 'Byron' also sleeps here in a muddy grave. Apart from these are anchored the government-vessels, in sullen state, disdaining communion with the common herd. A Dutchman with an unpronounceable name, is coming up, escorted by one of those fiery and vindictive little iron steamers, shrieking malignantly, as if fretting and fuming within herself that she cannot get on faster; like the workings of a proud and restless spirit in a feeble frame.

"But now I behold the long black form of the mail steamer, as she threads her way through the mazy throng, rushing boldly outward on her certain though trackless course, regardless of the gathering mist and darkness, bearing her precious freight that shall move the very heart-strings of mankind. As I gaze upon her receding form, I muse upon the varied contents of those grim-looking mail-bags. What tales of weal and woe do they not contain!—some of them gilded with the bright rays of hope and promise, and many, too many, dark with the despairing sentiments of those who have sunk beneath the influence of a malignant star! What gloomy returns of consignes; what out-pourings of love and devotion from the weary exile to fond hearts at home! All this, in every language, and addressed to every land, is contained within the narrow compass of that long black steamer. God protect that gallant ship, and may no link of the chain that binds millions of warm hearts to the Fatherland ever be broken!

"It is a good thing and a pleasant to meditate at eventide in this calm retreat. I love to withdraw from the plank-roads and bustling throngs, and gain, Antæus-like, new vigour from every touch of earth. . . . But the blue waters of the bay are fast changing to a dull green; the top of 'Mount Diabolo' is veiled from mortal eyes; the 'Golden Gates' are golden no longer; the breeze comes in chill with the evening fog. I leave my 'bad emittance,' and mingle once more with the busy throng." W. H. F.

THE STRANGE GENTLEMAN.¹

CHAPTER II.

THE GREY TOWER.

WE have stated that the founder of the family at Milford Grange obtained by grant from the Long Parliament two hundred acres of a confiscated estate. This estate had been the property of Sir Hugh Grey, a cavalier of eminence; and consisted (besides other lands) of the great manor of Milford; whence the members of that family were always called Greys of Milford, in contradistinction to the Greys of Groby, the Greys of Ruthyn, and other noble persons of the name of Grey. Sir Hugh died in exile, leaving a son, who, at the Restoration, laid claim to the estates, and had his claim acknowledged by the government. He was put into possession of all the lands owned by his father, excepting the two hundred acres aforesaid. In consideration of some secret service rendered to the state by Gideon Underwood's father-in-law, the London citizen, (probably the negotiating a private loan for the new king,) the Puritan soldier had this grant of land confirmed to him and his heirs for ever by Charles II. free from all dues to the Lords of the Manor. It may easily be imagined, that the proud Greys of Milford, who believed that they had a right to be "monarchs of all they surveyed" from their ancestral tower, were by no means pleased to survey thence the goodly habitation of that "cattiff Roundhead" standing sturdily in the valley, and looking as if it were meant to stand for ages—an upstart, and a rival to the Grey Tower itself. For several generations there was a deadly hatred between these two families. It was none the less deadly that the Greys thought the Underwoods beneath them, far beneath them, in rank, and that the Underwoods acknowledged that they were so. Each party was proud of its own position; for it is a remarkable thing, that people who are proud by nature are never at a loss for something to be proud of. A man of low degree is often as proud of his origin as one of high degree; there is no personal or mental defect,—no point in a man's condition or conduct, that may not be made food for pride. Of all vices it is the most omnivorous and the most tenacious of life; and it is not unfrequently hereditary, like other predominant characteristics, moral or intellectual. The course of hatred, like the course of love, does not always run smooth and undisturbed; and it happened more than once in the last century, that some young people of these two families forgot that they were Greys and Underwoods, and committed the enormity of falling in love with each other. In these cases the Montague-and-Capulet rage of the two houses was increased by all the fire of patrician and plebeian animosity and contempt, and the poor Romances and Juliets came badly off in the sequel.

As in all physical things a perpetual circling change goes on, thereby preventing unwholesome stagnation, so it is in the social system. The rich become poor and the poor rich—new families are continually springing up to public notoriety, and old ones are dying out. Many a noble house, after attaining the highest honours, sinks out of sight in a generation or two, and is merged in the great mass of the nation. There is more aristocratic blood lost among the people than is ever found in the aristocracy. The springs on the hill-tops are fed from the unfathomable ocean, and render their pure streams to it again. The moral which the reader is expected to draw from these startlingly new observations, and which by his own unassisted genius he might never have found out, is just this,—The people should live as though they were one day to become nobles, and the nobles should live as though they were one day to become plebeian.

The Greys of Milford never let such an idea enter into their heads; and when they found the words "passing away" written upon their grandeur and state, their earthly possessions and their very family, they became prouder than ever, and scorned more than ever plebeians generally, and the Underwoods of the Grange in particular. At length, when only a fourth part of the original estate remained, it was inherited by a certain Sir Everard Grey and his only sister. In childhood, these two had been left for several years at the Grey Tower, under the care of a sort of housekeeper or gouvernante; while their father—their only surviving parent—was on the Continent, preferring to live cheaply in a sort of second-hand splendour where he was not known, to economising in his old family abode amid the ruins of former grandeur. The dilapidated condition of this abode, which he had not money to repair, would cost his little children no pangs; they would be happy and healthy there, and by the help of the housekeeper and the clergyman of the parish, they would learn from books all that was necessary, till he should find it convenient to send for them. This he settled quite to his own satisfaction; but when he did send for them, he was amazed and indignant at the result of the training to which they had been subjected. For instance, he found that Everard had so little sense of the dignity of a Grey, that he wished to become a practical farmer, and cultivate the remnant of the family estate instead of entering the army, as had been the immemorial custom with the eldest sons of the house. Worse still, instead of having what their father considered a proper degree of Christian pride, they had been taught, that a certain quality called Humility ought to be the great distinguishing characteristic of a Christian, since it is the one moral virtue inculcated by Christ which is not also inculcated by most systems of pagan morality. He read his Bible and attended Divine Service every Sunday, but he was quite disgusted on week-days that his children did not think of themselves more highly than they ought to think, that they esteemed others better than themselves, that they were not disposed to take the highest place at feasts, and that they had the extremely vulgar habit of condescending to persons of low estate. It is not easy, nor would it be pleasant to describe his anger, when he discovered that, while at Milford, they had learned to love their neighbours as themselves, especially the Underwoods. Nay, as it turned out, when he presented a certain rich cousin Grey to her as a husband, his daughter had learned to love one of the Underwoods better than herself, and, indeed, better than all the rest of the world put together; which is more than she had Scripture warrant for doing, perhaps. It was also more, much more than she had warrant for doing in the code of pre-matrimonial propriety for ladies, since, though she was well assured that this scion of the ignoble house of Underwood loved her, she was also well assured that he would rather be burnt at the stake than marry any woman whose family would look down upon him; he had so much proper pride. This young lover who would never seek to be her husband, but would only worship her at a proud, respectful distance, was the Gideon Underwood whom we have introduced to the reader as an elderly gentleman, (we beg his pardon, as an elderly yeoman,) ruling his household with a rod of iron, and, unconsciously, perhaps, revenging the undue severity he had exercised in youth against himself, by administering as much as possible to his children, under the name of wholesome discipline. He and her brother Everard were friends, although Gideon often gave a bitter tone to their friendship by his pride of inferior rank, which took offence at shadows, and cost young Grey a world of conciliation and submission in boyhood. In manhood, Everard Grey saw clearly that Gideon Underwood's pride would prevent his becoming a good husband to his sister, even if it would allow him to sue for her in marriage, and if their father's pride would allow him to grant such a suit. This point decided in his own mind, he used all his influence with his sister to induce her to give up all thoughts of their old playmate as a husband, and to marry the cousin who had presented himself, and who seemed really attached to her. After a time, she yielded to her brother's reasoning, and became the wife of James Grey, Esq. of Torrington Hall, near Milford. This gentleman soon after neglected his property, and his wife too, preferring other places and other people. When they had been married five years, he had lost nearly all his possessions, including his character. Soon after that, his wife lost him, and returned, with her two little girls, to live with her father in Germany. Here she was employed happily enough in educating her children until her father's death, when, by his will, she became co-heir with her brother, (now Sir Everard,) of the old ruinous Grey Tower, and the few remaining acres of the once great Manor of Milford. When she again took up her abode there, with her brother, her eldest girl (afterwards Mrs. Ward) was twelve years old, and her old lover had been married almost as many years to an excellent woman, who had already two sons, and, in due time, brought him the rest of the fine family with which the reader became acquainted in the last chapter.

Sir Everard Grey and Gideon Underwood were both undemonstrative, reserved men—one from timidity and modesty of character, the other from inordinate pride; but the affection which had sprung up in childhood between them was as enduring as it was sincere. They lived in habits of intimacy, though Gideon never forgot the difference of rank. At Sir Everard's death, a change came over Gideon Underwood. He became sterner, more morose, and more tyrannical in his family; harder and more reserved to the rest of the world; the little tenderness which he had ever shown during the life of his friend, seemed now to be sealed up again within his breast, scarcely ever showing itself to his wife or children.

Sir Everard died unmarried, and, by his will, his sister and her children were to inherit the property; but, failing their issue, it was to pass to Gideon Underwood and his descendants. Mrs. Grey did not long survive her brother, and, on her death-bed, appointed Gideon Underwood guardian to her unmarried daughter, Miriam, then a girl of fifteen. It was the dying mother's wish that Miriam should live in the Grey Tower until she married. In this strongly-expressed wish might be detected the secret romance of a woman's heart. The Grey Tower had been the paradise of her youth. Here she had known peace, and joy, and love; it was full of sweet personal recollections—of old family traditions. There was a repose and a sanctity about the old place—a noble sadness in its picturesque decay—a sense of vastness and of freedom in the wide prospects from its lofty site, which she felt sure would have a hallowing influence on the enthusiastic and poetic nature of her youngest daughter. Mrs. Ward, her other child, had lately married a young man of good fortune, and was gone to India. She needed not a share in the small family property; and, by her husband's consent, it was all settled on Miriam.

Gideon Underwood undertook the guardianship of the young orphan, Miriam Grey, with a feeling of chivalrous loyalty and reverence scarcely to be appreciated in these days, when chivalry and loyalty are no longer the most fashionable qualities. He felt towards her as the Scotch Jacobites felt towards the young Pretender,—as old Whig nobles felt towards Queen Victoria, on her accession,—as the Anglo-Saxons looked upon Matilda, the niece of Edgar Atheling,—as Lord Craven must have looked upon the Princess Sophia, the youngest daughter of Elizabeth of Bohemia, that far-famed Queen of Hearts. All the tenderness and delicacy of his stern nature came to light again in his conduct to this young lady—the last representative of the house of Grey, and the child of the fair woman he had loved in youth. His pride in and for her became unbounded. It is true Miriam Grey was a beautiful girl, but he believed that there was no beauty equal to her beauty. Her powers of mind were considerable, but he believed them to be unrivalled in her own sex. With birth, beauty, and talents for a dowry, he soon began to form ambitious hopes for his ward—hopes of restoring the old dignity and splendour to the family of Grey. Why should she not marry one of her wealthy cousins of the same name? Why should they not settle at Milford, restore the old Grey Tower to more than its original splendour, and raise up sons and daughters, who should in future generations call the lauds after their name? Why should not Miriam Grey do this?

Because Miriam had a warm loving heart, which was not easily to be perverted to ambitious purposes. Because she was a very woman, and would have rejected a coronet of strawberry-leaves from an unloved hand in favour of a myrtle-wreath placed on her brow by one she loved; and this, though she was keenly sensible of the dignity of her family, and of the honour due to her as a woman. She inherited a portion of the pride of the Greys, and had caught more pride from the influence of Mr. Underwood. It was her warm loving heart that saved her from the worst corruption of this pride in early youth. In vain did Mr. Underwood promote his ward's intimacy with her own distant relations, and other county gentry; in vain did he impress upon his two elder sons, David and Mark, the fact that Miss Grey of the Tower belonged to a totally different sphere from that of any yeoman's family however ancient and respected; in vain did he reiterate to the graceful Miriam, that within the valley of Milford she had no equal. It was all in vain—Miriam was not fond of visiting at the great houses of the county; she preferred living at the Grey Tower, and associating, even on unequal terms, with the young Underwoods. Every younger child in the family was a blessing to her, and David, Mark, and Martha were her companions. She also loved Mr. Shepherd her tutor, and soon learned from him, that if she had no equal in birth among the inhabitants of Milford, she had equals and superiors in simple genuine worth and fervent piety in some of the cottages there. Sometimes, she would spend many hours at the vicarage, (this was before Miss Agnes Shepherd came to live there and martyrise her brother,) and during these visits, she was often present at conversations between Mr. Shepherd and his pupil, David Underwood. She learned many things from these conversations; among others, that it was possible for a yeoman's son to have the intellect and the dignity of a prince. For, truth to tell, this said David Underwood, like Dr. Beattie's Minstrel, "was no vulgar boy;" he had, as the French say, "de l'esprit comme quatre," and learned early how to manage it; so that what Mr. Shepherd told his new curate many years after was quite true—at sixteen David was a remarkably good scholar for his age. Indeed, he was in every way a remarkable boy; and his father, in his secret soul, though he treated him somewhat harshly, was intensely proud of his eldest son, who for natural gifts and solid intellectual attainments might vie with any scion of a noble house. He looked forward to the day when David should take his place as master of the Grange Farm, and, in proud humility, adorn his station with such accomplishments as were never seen unaccompanied by gentle birth before.

Seeing these things were, that Miriam Grey was fair, that David Underwood was young and passionate, and that they had opportunity of knowing one another, the result may be guessed. Besides, David had almost been forbidden by his father to dare to raise his eyes to her;—was it therefore to be wondered at, that he should love her, without making an effort to check the feeling? He too had a will of his own.

In addition to the education received from his pastors and masters, David Underwood, like other youths of superior intelligence, had given himself an education which they dreamed not of. One effect of this was perceptible in his eighteenth year, when he argued thus with himself in the matter of his daily-growing passion for Miriam Grey. "Shall I be held back by a flimsy social fiction from laying hold on a strong natural truth? What care I for gentle or simple? God made men and women—'male and female created he them,' not plebeian and patrician, or I read neither nature nor the Bible aright. If sweet Miriam Grey were an emperor's child, yet being what she is, a beautiful high-souled girl,—and I, David Underwood, being as I am, gifted by God with a capacity for loving true beauty and nobility, I should still take leave to love her. Firmly, but reverentially, should I strip the purple from her in my imagination, and love her with all my heart and soul, as a true man loves a true woman. And if I were able to win her love in return, she should be mine in spite of Emperors and Royal Marriage Acts. The right of loving is one of the first of the Rights of Man, and for the exercise of this right I will contend against all human constituted authorities."

The pride, self-reliance, and strength of will of this youth were inherited from his father; his capacity for passionate affection, and his powerful intellect, were peculiarly his own; no member of the Underwood family had ever possessed such a union of disturbing attributes since the death of its founder, the Commonwealth soldier. There were traditional stories concerning that worthy and his wife, which proved that he was as capable of fighting and dying for love as for glory; and young David's character was not altogether unlike that which the family annals, backed by his portrait, gave to their progenitor. David had the temperament of an innovator, a reformer—not to say of a revolutionist and a martyr. Let me now relate how David's character came to open war with his father's.

One evening, fourteen years before the date of the last chapter, at the same season of the year, i.e. in August, David Underwood, then a tall, vigorous youth of nineteen, was wandering along the hill-side, below the Grey Tower, lost in thought. Occasionally his eagle eyes shot a glance across the valley—sometimes they became fixed steadfastly on the old tower itself, standing proudly above him in solitude and decay; but more often they were turned on the grass and heather beneath his feet. There he had walked, to and fro, for more than two hours, unobserved by any one but Miss Grey, who sat at the window of her parlour, in the south turret of the tower, watching the prospect and the gradual approach of evening; and, perhaps, watching David Underwood as well, and wondering a little as to the nature of the subject he was revolving in his mind;—he was given to speculating upon all subjects in heaven and earth, she knew. Another half-hour passed; then the sun sank down in the midst of enormous gold and crimson clouds, leaving the sky, from the zenith to his setting-point, dappled over with roscate flakes of filmy cloud, while in the soft, dusky east, the young moon, with a tremulous light, seemed to hang motionless over the opposite hill-top. It was one of those sunsets which fix themselves in the memory of the gazer as among the rarest and most beautiful sights this earth can afford, and which, while we are gazing on their sublime loveliness, transport the soul to the great Creator's throne, in adoration of his power and glory. We have all seen such sunsets, and have thought as Miriam Grey thought then, that if it were not for the mysterious longings of the soul after immortality, this wonderful world contains beauty enough to satisfy the heart of man for ever—it is so "wondrous fair!" When the brilliant colours had almost faded from the sky, and the landscape was becoming obscured, Miriam Grey looked once more for David Underwood. He was gone from the place where he had been walking, and she was about to turn away from the window a little sadly, for the want of something she could not define, when she heard some one outside calling her.

"Miss Grey!"

The tone was deep and musical. She knew the voice; it was David's; and turning back again, she looked down upon him with a smile.

"So, you are tired of your solitary walk down there. What a glorious sunset it has been!"

He looked up at her, and remained silent; but silence is easier than speech in the presence of beauty which touches the heart.

Miriam's pale gold hair fell in massy curls over her fair shoulders to her waist. Her blue eyes looked larger and darker than usual in the twilight, and a soft, ineffable expression of joy, caused by the sublime sight she had just witnessed, lingered about her sensitive mouth. As she stood looking down upon him from that narrow, Gothic-pointed, ivy-framed window, David Underwood thought so fair a saint was never niched in cathedral aisle, or called into life beneath a painter's hand, or even imagined by a poet in his dreams. He could not speak, but remained gazing at her, as though she were indeed a poetic vision—a pictured or a sculptured saint. The sight seemed to have tongue-tied him; yet he had come there determined to speak.

"What are you thinking of, Mr. David, that you are so silent?" she asked, smiling once more, yet turning her eyes away from his, embarrassed she scarcely knew why, and trying to hide it.

"Of many things,—of some that, with your permission, I must tell you this evening. Excuse me if my language is somewhat abrupt and uncourtous; but you must hear me, Miss Grey! I cannot speak here. May I come in, or will you come down to the old north turret? If I come in, Mrs. Egerton may interrupt us. Will you not condescend to grant my request? It may be the last I shall ever prefer to you."

There was something so earnest, so strangely proud and sad in his tone, that Miriam could not bear to refuse so slight a request. Perhaps he had resolved at last to leave Milford, and seek his fortune elsewhere. He was wont to say that home-keeping youths have ever homely wits; and she knew that he yearned to mix himself with the great world-strife, and that Milford Valley had long been too narrow for his young ambition. She had been expecting this termination to his late moody disquietude; and now he had come, she thought, to tell her his plans, and to engage her good offices with his father, who would certainly be furious at the idea of his desiring any other mode of life than that which he destined for him. David, too, had so strong a will,—so much force of character generally, that most people yielded to him at once, knowing opposition to be useless. His was the tyranny of the strong over the weak—a better thing for both parties than the tyranny of the weak over the strong. On the present occasion, therefore, though Miriam Grey felt, instinctively, that there was some degree of impropriety in granting a private interview to a young man, in the absence of her governess and friend, Mrs. Egerton, yet Miriam Grey was not yet eighteen, and like most thinking girls at that age, was apt to think she had a right to do as she pleased. To offend David in his present mood did not please her; and, after a little hesitation, she said:—

"If you have really some secret of importance to tell me, you may go round to the north turret, and I will come to you there;" and she disappeared from the window.

The north turret was a complete ruin; hollow from top to bottom, open to the sky above, and with half one side of the wall fallen to the ground. Nature had exercised her usual silent magic in adorning what the art of man had neglected to preserve for his daily use. She had had her own way with the north turret any time these hundred years; and now it was as picturesque a piece of ruined architecture as any painter would desire to see. Half tapestried with ivy on the outside, with its small loop-hole windows clearly marked out against the sky, the remaining segment of the circular wall stood erect, and apparently deriving no support from the main body of the tower, which it seemed barely to touch. Mosses, lichens, wall-flowers, and weeds of glorious feature, more than I have botanic skill enough to enumerate, grew in profusion over the inside of the wall, and among the fallen stones, lying in heaps around. There must have been a flower-garden beside this north turret in ancient times; for a few of the oldest and strongest garden-flowers maintained an existence there yet, and flourished amid the wilderness.

"The marigold amidst the nettles blew,
The gourd embraced the rose-bush in its ramble,
The thistle and the stock together grew,
The hollyhock and bramble."

"The bear-bine with the lilac interlaced,
The sturdy bur-dock choked its slender neighbour,
The spicy pink. All tokens were effaced
Of human care and labour."

No, not quite all,—at least, within the small area of the turret itself. The ground here had been disencumbered of stones and made level. And Nature, in one of her freaks of imitating Man's art, had covered it like the boudoir of a petite maitresse, with the softest, thickest, and most exquisitely-coloured carpet—the very beau idéal of moss. On one side of the interior, whence a magnificent prospect over the valley was obtained, a bank of earth had been raised; divan or sofa-fashion, and shaped carefully, with a view to the personal ease of the occupant. This too, Nature—assisted, perhaps, by art—had covered with similar moss, and cushioned (to speak at once like Shakspeare and an upholsterer,) with wild thyme and the nodding violet. This area had been cleared, and this seat made for Miriam's mother by Mr. Underwood. Here Miriam had spent many happy hours of childhood beside her mother, who loved the place; and for her sake, and for its own romantic beauty, Miriam loved it also, and took care to preserve it unchanged. The interior of the ruined turret always looked as if it were tended and set in order by fairy hands—but the fairy was no other than "a great lubberly boy"—Tom Withers—the only serving man in the household at the Grey Tower.

On the evening of which we have been speaking, the moonbeams were just stealing softly over the ruined turret, when David Underwood walked into it and stood looking eagerly at an old door in that part of the wall which still joined the main building. It was a low, gothic-arched door, somewhat sunken in the soil. It had been in olden time the only means of access to the north turret, and when this turret fell into decay, the door had been fastened up as useless, like other doors and "passages which lead to nothing" in the Grey Tower. In the late Mrs. Grey's time, however, the old doorway had been cleared, and the door turned once more on its great rusty hinges. Miriam from her childhood had been accustomed to pass through this door, from the house, to her mother's seat in the old ruin. David knew she would come that way now. In a few moments she emerged from the low, dark portal, and stepped into the mossy area of the turret, where the amber twilight lay like a gentle shadow, as yet untouched by the moonbeams. David stood looking at her in silence. There was something in her beauty which he had never seen before. It was always spiritual and delicate; but now there was a certain sad and wistful look in her face, a trembling tenderness in her manner as she moved towards him, that made his heart beat high.

"What is it you have to tell me?" she asked, with an attempt to speak and look as usual. "What discovery in philosophy have you made? Have you invented a new form of government?—or is it that you have come to tell me you are about to leave Milford for good?"

He bowed his head at the last words and murmured, "I am about to leave Milford,—whether for good or for evil is for you to decide."

"I, Mr. David? What have I to do with it?"

"Can you not guess?" he asked, without changing his tone.

"You think my influence over your father is sufficient to win his consent. I fear it is not, but, I will spare no effort."

"You will spare no effort to facilitate my departure?" he asked bitterly.

Miriam was agitated, and sat down on the moss-grown couch. "Is not that what you would have?" she asked. "Is not that what you came to speak to me about? I feared it was."

"You fear!—Miss Grey!—My heart and brain are filled with strong thoughts and feelings. I am, as you know, self-willed and impetuous. Perhaps I have committed what you gentlemen call an indecorum in insisting on this interview; but you, perhaps, recollect that I am not a gentleman, not your equal, and you condescend to speak with me as you would with any inferior who craved an audience."

"Mr. David! This is very misplaced. Why do you speak so bitterly? What have I done to offend you?" Miriam spoke with large tears standing in her eyes. "It must be a weighty matter indeed that so disturbs your mind."

"It is a weighty matter," he replied, his voice rising as he went on, till it swelled into a full-toned passionate music, that thrilled through Miriam's heart. "It is a weighty matter, this great strong burden which I carry in my soul, and from which I would not be freed, now, or in all the countless ages of eternity. It is a weighty matter for a solitary human soul—this—this—Ha!—You know it now!" and he sunk on his knee beside her, clasping her hands in his, and searching her fair face with his eager gaze. "Ah! Miriam Grey, do not turn away—look at me once more with your gentle eyes—smile on me as you did a little while ago, that I may have power over myself—that I may get back courage and tell you of my love. But is there need to tell what I have so ill concealed? I am too proud for a dissembler—almost too proud for a wooer. Listen to me, fair Miriam Grey! How fair, how unutterably fair at this moment! You think as my father thinks, that I am not worthy to aspire to your love because my birth is lower than your own. I know you think this, and yet I love you, proud as I am, and am bold enough to tell you so. I am bolder still—I venture to tell you that your superior birth does not make me unworthy of your love, only your superior purity—your beauty and the glory of your womanhood; these bow down my spirit before you. No social distinctions can bar out my love. I love you, and I will love you. No power on earth shall dare to interfere with me there. Ah! do not shrink from me. I cannot tame my language into soft taffeta phrases. Miriam Grey, as sure as God reigns in heaven, I believe there is no man can love you so devotedly as I, or so enduringly. Was it only kindness—gentle, womanly kindness, such as you would show to any one, that I saw in your face just now?—that—if I am not mad—I see there now? Speak to me, Miriam. Have mercy! Forgive!—for indeed, I have lost my self-control, and I know not what I say." With these last words the passionate young man flung himself forward with outstretched arms, over the bank beside her, and buried his face in the thick dewy moss that he might hide the blinding, suffocating emotion which he found too strong for even his pride to subdue.

Sweet Miriam Grey! It would have been a rare sight for a poet or a painter to have watched her then, as the moon-beams began to rest on her face. For a moment or two she remained motionless, waiting another sign from him,—her heart swelled well-nigh to bursting with a multitude of feelings. He did not speak, but lay there, breathing great tremulous sighs,—the proud, self-possessed David no more. Love and pity soon made all other feelings in her heart (even fear) give way before them, and Miriam turned towards him and laid her hand softly on the bowed head. That he felt the touch she knew, for he started and trembled in every limb—but he did not speak—nor change his position. She looked upward to the sky for a moment, and shook back the fair curls from her face—she seemed to hesitate—the hand that rested on David's head played nervously with a lock of his hair—then bending low, she whispered,

"Dear David, why do you distress yourself thus? There is no need."

"No need!—Is it so?" he exclaimed, turning slowly round. "No need! Does that mean that you will listen to me?—that you will not think me beneath your love?"

"No."

"How then? What does it mean?"

"That I love you already."

"Miriam!" and he rose and sat beside her, "say the words again, a hundred and a hundred times, that my soul may drink in all the meaning. You love me already!—that means before this hour. Gracious, gentle Miriam, how can I thank you? You love me! what will this love be to you, Miriam?"

"It will make me happy. And you—will it make you happy? will your terrible pride allow you to take to wife a woman who is so unfortunate as to be your superior in birth?"

"And you—will the delicate Lady Miriam wed the rough David Underwood, half clown, half book-worm?"

"No. But she will wed the true-hearted boy, the man of genius, David Underwood; and she will lay aside her ancestry as a worn-out robe, and clothe herself proudly and meekly with the light of his fame."

"Fame! Yes, I had forgotten. I will be famous, Miriam,—fame shall make me in the sight of all men more honourable than the noblest pedigree. Let fame go now; this moment belongs to love."—They sat silently, in a state of perfect, measureless happiness gazing on each other; how long, neither they nor I can tell. At length, Miriam's head sank on his shoulder and David murmured: "Oh for a power to stay this moment! But it will never come again, never! in all the ages." And his eyes looked in steadfast sadness up into the unfathomable heavens. Miriam looked timidly at him.

"What makes you say that? It seems to me rather as if the light of this hour would spread itself over the whole of life; that it would never go. And you say that it will never come again! Ah, David! you frighten me. Is this one of those intuitions, which are to you what experience is to common minds, as Mr. Shepherd says?"

"Nay, I know not, Miriam. I have said only what forced itself upon me as a truth. All is so frail, so transitory here."

"Nay, not all things; God's greatest, best gift, Love,—that does not pass away. I feel it, I know it. If you do not feel thus, you cannot love—as I do," faltered Miriam.

"Hush, hush! do not talk of my love so slightly. You cannot guess what it is and has been. Come to my heart, Miriam! rest your dear head there, while I try to make you understand the great, strong love which has been growing up within it these many years. In truth, Miriam, this poor heart deserves such solace, for it has suffered much. There never was a time, since you came here a little fairy child, that I have not loved you. Had you been able to love me as long and as well, you would not need to be told this, and the last year could not have gone by with us as it has done. You could not have passed over or misunderstood my suffering, and you would have blessed me before as you have done this evening. One little look, a tone of tenderness, would have been encouragement enough for me, for I am bold-spirited even in love, which, like conscience, makes cowards of most of us."

"Am I not bold too; I fear I have been too bold, David. Yet—yet—I think the love a woman feels has something in it deeper than that of man."

"That is a woman's heresy. Let me assure you in the poet's words that "'all thy passions, match'd with mine,

Are as moonlight unto sunlight, and as water unto wine.'"

"The poet sings falsely, at least in regard to one passion," said Miriam, smiling as he kissed her cheek; "but 'deeds, not words' for me. If God grants us both life, you shall learn by my conduct how much Miriam Grey loves David Underwood; not now, perhaps, but in long years to come."

It often happens in life, that an hour of intense felicity is close neighbour to one of misfortune. It was so on this never-to-be-forgotten evening in the youth of Miriam Grey and her lover.

Mr. Underwood had set out from home that evening at an unusual time, to pay a visit at the Tower. He went to see Miriam alone, on a subject of importance concerning her future life. He wished to prepare her for the morrow, when, as he knew, a certain wealthy gentleman of her own name would present himself as a suitor, and would be ready to accept her on any conditions. Her birth, and her beauty, which he had seen during half an hour, had captivated his heart thoroughly for the moment, and the present owner of Torrington Hall had already propitiated Mr. Underwood by a promise of rebuilding the Grey Tower and living in it, if it ever fell into his hands. Mr. Underwood became anxious that it should fall into his hands, and went to sound his ward on the subject of Sir Ralph Grey, and, if possible, to prepossess her in his favour. As he was a fair and well-behaved young gentleman, Mr. Underwood did not think he had a very difficult task before him. With his usual firm, proud step, he mounted the hill. When he arrived at the level ground, half way up, on which stood the Tower, he walked more slowly, for the solemn beauty of the evening had awakened bygone memories connected with the spot and the hour. Here, long years ago, he had walked with his early friend, Sir Everard, and here, on such a night, he had told his love to Miriam's mother. Not here, indeed, on the wide hill side, but in that still, sheltered nook, within the ruined turret. The thought of her child's marriage brought her forcibly to his mind. How beautiful she was! how good! Yet he had renounced her; it was his own act. Had he dealt well by her? Perhaps not; yet how could he, an Underwood, marry a Grey? He to be spoken of as a low interloper in a noble family. No, the Underwoods would have nothing to do with unequal marriages; they were always evil. But, though he had resisted the temptation of his own heart then, he would not at such a time as this forget what had once been between them. He would go to the old place and think of her, and of what she would have done for Miriam at this juncture. It would be a fitting preparation for his interview with the girl.

Slowly he passed along in front of the Tower. Miriam was not at her window, and there was no light in the room. He turned the next angle, and stood for a moment contemplating the exquisite beauty of the ruined turret, as the moonlight came through the long, narrow, ivy-wreathed windows, and its stand, time-softened outline stood out black against the sky. He knew that at this hour the moonlight was resting on the bank he had raised for Everard's sister, as it had rested on the same spot, when, in an unwary hour, long years ago, he had forgotten what was due to his dignity and hers, and had told his love. Gideon Underwood was not given to the melting mood, but he thought it would be a melancholy pleasure to see it now. And Gideon Underwood advanced again. As he made his way cautiously among the fallen stones, (he did not leap lightly over them now,) he thought he heard voices. He approached nearer. Yes! he was not mistaken; some one was speaking,—and now a voice that he knew—it was Miriam's—replied. Surely it was a man's voice he had heard before. Who could she be talking to there, and at that hour? A lover? Miriam? and he, her guardian, not know of it? Impossible! He knew her too well. Still he ought to ascertain who was her companion, and the nature of the conversation. She was his ward, as dear to his heart as one of his own children; as dear as David himself. He would listen.—He did listen. He heard nearly all the conversation we have set down, and at every word his anger increased. He looked in upon them unperceived, and saw them seated on that very bank, Miriam clasped in David's arms, and her fair head resting on his breast! The sight maddened him. It aroused a world of unavailing regret, and vivid pictures of what he himself had lost. In addition to his anger as a father against a disobedient son, and his bitter disappointment at this impediment to his plans for Miriam Grey, Gideon Underwood felt involuntarily and almost unconsciously envious and jealous as a man. His son, a mere boy, who had done nothing, deserved nothing as yet in life, sat there, blessed in love, where he had renounced his love, from a principle of honour,—there where he had so often seen her sit. David sat there, experiencing all the sweets of a first and mutual love, utterly regardless of aught but his own happiness. It cost the stern man a secret but acute pang, and gave a sting to the fury with which he interrupted them. He did not acknowledge it to himself, but the sight of a happy love always irritated him. He affected to treat all love as a mere delusion of youth, unworthy the attention of a mature man; but love revenged himself on Gideon Underwood. Even in advanced life the sight of happy lovers, if it did not actually make him envious, caused him to feel what is finely described by some French writer as, "un malheur sourd dont on ne se rend pas compte." But to see David so happy, in the place where he himself had been so miserable; and with one who was so like his own lost love, that at the moment he could almost believe it to be she herself,—this was a "malheur vif" too acute to be borne by any man without some demonstration of pain; so it mixed itself up with his parental anger. As Miriam pronounced those last words, while David pressed his lips on her cheek, Gideon Underwood strode up to them and seized David violently by the shoulder,—so violently as to drag him from his seat, and cause Miriam to fall to the ground.

Words are powerless to describe what young David Underwood felt at that moment; but somewhat of the wrath within might be seen in his eye as it glared fiercely at his father, when with one swift backward stroke of his young arm he had shaken off that offensive hold and confronted him. But this first natural instinct of resentment for the personal attack on himself was gentleness compared with the young man's feeling as he saw Miriam attempting to rise. True; her fall was a slight accident, and he who caused it had certainly not intended it. But it had been caused. Miriam Grey had been injured and insulted in his presence,—had suffered an indignity that no woman, not even the basest and most degraded, ought ever to receive at the hand of man; and he had not been able to prevent it! He, David Underwood, stood by and saw her rise from the ground after being thrown down: he could not stir a limb to assist her; but remained with a blanched face and tightly compressed teeth gazing at the spot on which she had fallen as if he expected the raging fire from his heart to burn up the offending place and utterly obliterate it from the earth. As yet he felt only the shame, the indignity, and a strange wild self-reproach. "I ought to have prevented it. Idiot! coward! fool! to be taken unaware. To have suffered my treasure to be cast from me—my idol to be profaned—a woman to be insulted while she sat beside me—any woman—no matter whom! but this one—my Miriam!—Miss Grey of Milford! Oh! away with the sight! It must be a dream!" He moved his hand hurriedly across his eyes as these thoughts passed through his mind; and at that moment a loud, angry voice addressed him.

"So it is you, boy! you! who have dared to speak of love to that lady. Have basely sought to make her forget what she is and what you are!" David started and turned proudly towards the speaker.

"Hold, father! enough of insult! Respect me if you would have me forbear from treating you as one man treats another. Though I am your son, I am not a slave or an insensible brute."

"David! It is your father," said the frightened Miriam, laying her hand on her lover's up-raised arm. It felt powerless to his side, and his eyes turned mournfully to her.

"My father!" he murmured. "You do well to remind me of it,—you, whom he struck to the ground! That I will never forget!"

"Hush! it was nothing. A mere accident. Don't look so, David, for the love of heaven! Your father is terrible in anger," she whispered. "Say something to him—see how he looks at you, David! For my aske."

The young man saw those beautiful imploring eyes, and made an effort to suppress the dark passion that raged within. He drew up his noble figure to its full height, approached a step towards his father, and said in a subdued voice, "Father!"

"Silence, boy!" said Mr. Underwood. "Silence! am I to be bearded and talked to by you? Hear me, I say. You are my son; born to obey me, and I will be obeyed, or you shall be no more my son. How long have you taken advantage of that girl's weakness, and led her to disgrace her family by listening to your love? How long have you dared to let your thoughts and affections wander in direct disobedience of my well-known will? How long have you duped me and deceived us all? How long, boy as you are, how long have these things been?"

David replied in a lower tone, "Ever since I have felt a man's heart within me, I have loved Miriam Grey, and loathed your undue tyranny, father. But never until this evening has either secret been torn from my bosom. This evening I have told her of my passion, and she has promised to be my wife. Ay! glare at me as you will, your authority reaches not to my heart or to hers. We love each other, and we ask no blessing from you or any harsh earthly tyrant,—we ask only the blessing of our Father in Heaven. This evening, too, I tell you that you overstrain your parental authority,—that it is not good for me, at least, to bear it any longer; and that I will not. It poisons my heart. I am no longer a child. I claim the freedom of a man, and if you do not grant it me willingly, I will take it. I would be your son, father, not your bondsman. You shall not dictate to my thoughts or my affections. I love and I will love Miriam Grey, and no vain ambition, (the disease of an old-world imagination and a pitiful pride,) no false sentiment on your part shall withhold her from me. She is young, and fair, and pure-hearted; therefore I love her, and take no heed of her ancestry. I am her equal, and that I will prove to the world. Do you know me now, father? I would deceive you no longer. If you would have the love and respect of your children—of them all,—do not treat them as you have treated me. Perchance, some may bear it worse and love you less than I do now."

"Have you done, sir?" asked Mr. Underwood, with concentrated pride, rage, and surprise in his quivering voice.

David bowed his head in assent, and his father turned away.

"Miriam Grey!" said Mr. Underwood. "This is a shameful scene for you to witness, still it will open your eyes to the depth of your error. You have heard him. Look well! It was my son David,—the pride of my heart—as you thought just now, the fitting object for your love. Would you, indeed, take for your husband a son who disobeys, insults, outrages, and defies his father? Would you disgrace your name by an alliance below you,—an alliance with a penniless boy, without station, or means of subsistence? who has nothing to recommend him but a specious tongue and a handsome person? Miriam! shame on you, to be thus fooled by the eye. Awake, girl! This is David Underwood the yeoman's son who aspires to wed you, the descendant of a noble house."

"She has said that she loves me!" cried David haughtily—"I will not have her tampered with. She is mine!" and he strode to Miriam, and threw one arm round her.

The father's rage at this action knew no bounds: "Loose her this instant!—loose her, I say! Miriam, come from him!"

Miriam made an effort to obey her guardian, but David's arm confined her. He smiled scornfully at his father.

"Ay! make the weak tremble at your authority! boys and women—they dare not resist you."

In another moment Mr. Underwood was struggling with his son. It was a fearful sight to see the natural love between those two men turned by their un-governed passions into deadly hate. The hate was strong in proportion to the love which should have been.

"Let her go, David, or, by God's—"

"I will not let her go at such bidding." David kept one nervous arm wound like an iron ring round Miriam's waist, and with it he held her off from his father, while with the other he warded off his attacks. At length David lost all self-possession, became furious, and with one unlucky blow struck his father to the ground, insensible.

Oh! what unfathomed depths of evil are in the human heart!—Who shall sound his own? or say, hitherto but not beyond it could my sin go. I tell you, O Reader! good and moral as you may be in other respects, if in your heart any strong selfish passion be knowingly indulged, it will undermine the kingdom of God within you; and in an hour when you look not for it, it will explode, and carry all before it—patience, meekness, long-suffering, kindness, truth, brotherly love—ay, and filial love—parental love—all sweet, sacred household affections. Not in the whining accents of the self-righteous hypocrite or the neighbour-scorning Pharisee do I say it; but in the sober voice of one who knows it by experience do I say to people as noble-hearted and as high principled as Gideon Underwood and his son David,—“The heart of man is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked,” when the devil's brood—the passions, any one of them—reign over it. Be sure it will burst out some day to the overthrow of virtue and happiness and self-respect. Therefore let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed lest he fall.

David stood stupidly gazing at Miriam as she tried to restore his father's consciousness. They had not spoken till Mr. Underwood seemed to be recovering. With his eyes fixed in horrible fascination on his father's face, David spoke in a low hollow voice,—

"Miriam, have you no words for me?"

"None! He was your father!—After this, you must forget all that has passed between us."

"Nay—No need to say it, Miriam. Now, indeed, I am unworthy of your love. I know you would shudder at my touch."

"He is becoming conscious!—Go!—Do not let him find you here."

"Farewell, Miriam!"

He went away; but not, as Miriam supposed, to return to her on the morrow and plead for forgiveness. How she dreaded that meeting! She had determined to put away David's love; she would be no source of division and anger between a father and a son. But she was spared it. The meeting of the morrow never came. David Underwood left Milford that night, and did not return to her or to his family. His name was never mentioned to Mr. Underwood; the little children were taught to abstain from pronouncing David's name in their father's presence; they were told he was gone away and would never come again. Mr. Underwood became a harder, sterner, sadder man—none knew exactly why, but Miss Grey of the Grey Tower.

A JOURNEY ROUND THE WORLD IN THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

A TRULY republican idea was it to reconstruct the old social edifice at the very moment it was falling into decay, and to found it on a new basis, on the most solid basis that can support man, namely his own pride and interest,—and this idea was conceived by aristocratic England! This is true fraternity, and very different from the mistaken fraternity which the French demagogues proclaimed on their banners when they sent them, by the hands of bandits, into Belgium, Switzerland, and Rome. This great idea was not only conceived but also carried into effect by England, and the execution, to say all in one word, is worthy of the conception. Without further preface, let us imagine ourselves in the midst of the innumerable carriages that are continually passing in front of the Crystal Palace.

The exterior of the building is covered with flags and streamers, which, waving merrily in the breeze, add an air of festivity to the scene. The general aspect is one of extreme lightness and elegance, presenting a striking contrast to the stern and frigid appearance of the other London edifices. A gigantic portico is before us. In this large entrance have been erected, in order to avoid confusion, numerous little doors in red cloth, which admit but one person at a time. On these doors is written: "No change given," therefore you must have your money ready in your hand: you approach the narrow entrance, throw your shilling on a counter, pass on, and without uttering a syllable to any one, without being addressed, you find that you have entered, by the most insignificant doorway conceivable, into the most extensive covered space ever seen or imagined by man. It is a new world—and what world is it? Here are large and leafy European trees proudly extending their huge branches under the transparent roof; there, a thicket of palms and bamboos which speak of the East; a gigantic crystal fountain whose limpid waters rise to an extraordinary height, and sparkling in the sunshine descend noisily into the basin beneath; and not far from this refreshing murmur, which tells of the wonders of nature, you hear the solemn tones of the organ, pealing forth the sacred melodies of religion. In the first moment of amazement you behold at the same time, in the midst of these confused sounds, carpets from the East, arms from India, a European park with its woods and rivulets, and an innumerable army of equestrian statues around you. All appears at first red and light blue; these colors have been selected with great taste. Red, the solid colour which adorns the ground-floor, forms an admirable basis, and contrasts well with the azure tints of the roof which appear to bury themselves in the sky. The top of the transept is but indistinctly seen, the beautiful foliage of the trees deprives it of architectural stiffness and gives it an incomparable air of magnificent elegance; but this is not all: this immense transept, of whose size I feel it utterly impossible to give any adequate idea—this unrivalled entrance in which you have experienced the first sensation of amazement—this coup d'œil which gives you an idea of the whole—all this is but a preface, and whatever your imagination may anticipate, be it as luxuriant as it may, is far below the reality. You must advance to the crystal fountain of which we have spoken, that is, to the centre of the palace, and then you see on the right and left the two veritable galleries of the Exhibition which are at right angles with the transept; this new view surpasses all expectation. You imagine you have reached the bounds of admiration, when your admiration is redoubled; your surprise is increased tenfold. Picture to yourself, on either side, prospects stolen from the golden country of the "Thousand-and-one Nights," two galleries, apparently interminable, covered from top to bottom with the most perfect produce of the human genius, and all natural curiosities from Canton to Peru, and from New Zealand to Greenland. Imagine entire miles of carpets of every colour, sparkling crystals, furniture of incredible richness, bronzes, velvets, jewels worthy of Cleopatra, silks, silver, pearls, diamonds; all appear cast at a venture into this bazaar of universal genius. For us has been realized one of those dreams which in a day of fever may have entered the brain of Sardanapalus. Those who have not seen the Exhibition have no idea, I may boldly affirm, of the riches of the world. And yet all these marvels are contained in a transparent palace, supported by imperceptible columns, and the light may freely play on the sparkling jewels, the dazzling colours, the murmuring fountains, and the innumerable statues. Over the glass roof, white canvas has been placed, to prevent the heat of the sun penetrating with too much power. Thanks to the ventilators and fountains, the freshness is extreme: we might imagine ourselves under the waves of some fabulous stream, in the crystal palace of a fairy, or of a naiad of whom Jupiter was the noble lover. Around you is an immense multitude, and yet not a crowd; you have sixty thousand companions, yet you are not crushed or pushed; you walk as quietly as you would in Oxford street; nevertheless there is nothing to indicate constraint of any kind. Here and there are policemen who direct you which staircase to ascend or descend, or which way to proceed. You hear no sound of voices, you see no commotion; every one goes where he pleases and lives in his own way, for you must live in this endless palace if you wish to see the contents of it; you may eat there, and if you list, you may sleep there. Confectioners have large establishments there and plenty of occupation. Economical persons, such as labourers and workmen, of whom there is a large majority on four days of the week, bring their provisions in their baskets. It is a droll sight to witness these good country people in their smock frocks and carefully brushed leather boots, seating themselves by the side of one of the fountains, dissecting huge pieces of ham with their teeth, and distributing meat and bread among their children as they would the grain among their poultry. Every one eats in peace and troubles himself not about his neighbour: he goes to see, not to be seen. In France it is precisely the contrary; I recollect on the fourth of last May, round the tents of the mountebanks in the Champs Elysées, there were, without the slightest exaggeration, far more soldiers to preserve order, than spectators. In London, in order to guard the palace in which all nations are assembled, two sentinels in red coats have been placed in front of the grand entrance! and they, I fancy, are stationed there for decorum, or as picturesque accessories: they will assuredly never have anything to do.

The Exhibition has, in a great measure, put an end to the visits of ladies in their carriages to the shops of Piccadilly and Regent Street, and of this, as may well be imagined, the tradesmen complain bitterly. The Crystal Palace is now the grand promenade, especially on Fridays and Saturdays, when the prices are raised to prevent the admission of the mob. The crowd, however, is scarcely less on those days, indeed, all anticipations on this subject have been entirely disappointed. It was supposed that during the first few weeks such a multitude would have overrun the streets of London, as to render extraordinary measures necessary to secure order and tranquillity: people were mistaken. The début was so quiet as to give Prince Albert serious apprehensions for the success of the Exposition of which he was the instigator. At length it was reported that the shilling days would collect such an enormous multitude that the receipts would be considerably larger on those days than during the previous weeks. The contrary was the result: the receipts on the first shilling day amounted only to a thousand pounds, while those of the half-crown days were 2,500 pounds daily, from the commencement. The Railway Companies were forbidden to lower their prices during the first month, so much was it feared that London would be overrun by visitors from the country. Now it happened that the town was less full than ever; the hotels were empty; no one could understand it. In England, as well as throughout Europe, the generality of people determined to permit the most eager to visit London first, and to go themselves when the "crowd was over;" consequently, everybody started at the same time: at the commencement of June the number of visitors suddenly increased materially, and from that time to the present, the amounts received have increased daily. At present, all expenses paid, there remains a surplus of several thousands, and this Great Exhibition, about which there have been so many different opinions, will in the end prove a very profitable speculation; for the receipts of each day cover the expenses of a month, which amount to between two and three thousand pounds. Thus, the difficulty will not be to raise the funds necessary for so extraordinary an edifice; but to decide on the manner of spending the surplus. This is a question which excites the interest of the world, and revives the grand quarrel between the free-traders and protectionists: it will not be an easy matter to decide. Some demand the continuance, others the immediate destruction of the universal bazaar; some vote for a winter garden, others for a commemorative monument. Who will be the victors? We are acquainted with the difficulties under which the Exhibition was opened. After an appeal to the voluntary subscribers, who in a very few days returned the insufficient sum of 65,000 pounds, signatures merely, instead of payments, were solicited. Numerous signatures having been received and the list signed, the Bank of England advanced the money, and in five months the Crystal Palace was constructed. The erection of this palace gave rise to serious reprehension; a considerable party opposed the idea of the Exposition in toto, as they deemed it a preface to free trade, and dreaded, in such revolutionary times, the unprecedented solemnity, and the vast multitude of visitors of every description which it would attract. Even when these objections had been overcome, the malcontents would not acknowledge themselves defeated. Every imaginable pretext was successively advanced by those who considered their opponents imprudent innovators. Now, by a happy coincidence, or if we may so speak, by providential chance, there is not one single ground of objection which, far from injuring the palace of the Exhibition, has not wonderfully improved it. It is certain that, strange as it may appear, its beauty is owed in a measure to the opposition made to it. Thus for example, the discontented demanded: "What right have you to build in Hyde Park? It is a public walk. Is it not in order to have a good view of these beautiful grounds that honest citizens have purchased at a high price the terraces which surround them? And can you come coolly and erect your building in front of their very windows? In virtue of what law can you thus lower the value of their property? Besides, how long will this exposition last? You say, six months, but who is to answer for that? If once you put bricks and mortar together we know what will become of your building, and what excellent reasons will be found to prevent its destruction." These objections were serious; not one of them could be faced and combated legally; it was necessary to parry them artfully. "You dread the permanence of our building," was the reply, "and the difficulty of removing it? Be assured, we shall have nothing to do with bricks or stones; our building will be formed of cast-iron and glass; when the Exhibition is over, it will be removed in twenty-four hours; the neighbouring proprietors will not thus suffer the inconvenience of a slow construction, nor inhale the dust of a brick-building. If the vicinity of the Exhibition is a disadvantage, it will be of short duration, and repaid a hundredfold by the commercial movement which will be experienced in the neighbourhood of the building." Thus the glass palace was decided upon which was proposed by Paxton, and which was destined to produce the incomparable effect of which we have attempted to give some idea; thanks to the discontented, we were delivered from thick walls, and probably from those odious yellow bricks which the London smoke so quickly blackens. This was not all:—opposition returned to the charge. "Your building is to be of glass; very good: but what are you to do with the noble trees which stand on the spot you have selected? will you dare to fell them? These trees belong to the nation; we love them, we have seen them there from our childhood, our children play under their shade; what right have you to destroy these trees, which to them form the chief attraction of the park?" "You are right," was the answer; "we will not fell the trees, we will enclose them in our palace; thus, instead of being exposed to the inclemency of the weather this winter, they will, for the first time in their lives, be in a hot-house." In order to preserve these elms it was necessary to raise the roof of the palace to an unexpected height, and to form it of colossal dimensions; thus, the trees which had been happily respected, proved destined to give the ensemble extraordinary beauty.

We must return to the Exhibition and not quit it again, now that we have sketched its history. At the first visit it is impossible to enter into any of the details; and it would be useless, when everything claims a share of your attention, when curiosity induces you to take a general view, to remain long at one particular spot and commence partial examinations. You will find enough to do to take a general survey of this universal panorama. Five hours are not too much to prove to you, that you are wandering at the same time through the five portions of the globe. Interest does not tire for a single moment, if you merely read the superscriptions of the various exhibitions, and admire the colours of all the flags of the world. I was chiefly interested, I confess, in reading the names of the distant countries, the products of which we little expect to meet on the tables of industry, and which we know only by the yet recent accounts of the sailors who discovered them. Van Diemen's Land, South Australia, New Zealand, &c. can we read those names without surprise, in front of the stalls reserved for Belgium, Holland and the Zollverein? I might also add Trinidad, Guiana, Canada, New South Wales, and twenty more names. Was it not on these coasts, whose very existence was doubted, that our grandfathers perished in shipwrecks, the accounts of which so deeply interested our childhood? The voyages of Cook and Bougainville, which kindled in our breasts a love of the unknown; the discoveries of Banks and Solander, who are our old friends; the combats of Anthropophagi; the Fortunate Isles, in which were found primitive manners and unequalled hours: all these marvels took place in a world that has now, alas! entirely disappeared. Our minds were still meditating on the adventures of Captain Wilson, the good king of the Pellew islands, the Nymphs of Otaheite, and of Guatimozi and Montezuma, when, after a lapse of several years, we cast our eyes towards these countries, expecting to find virgin lands covered with unknown fruits, mysterious forests, unexplored lakes, people living on yucca-root and dogs cooked between two stones, to our surprise, we behold nothing but parks, villas, towns lighted with gas, theatres, elegantly dressed ladies, and handsome carriages rolling over excellent Macadams! On the quays, we find engravings representing the massacre of Captain Cook at Owhyhee by naked savages, tattooed and adorned with feathers, and everybody knows that the present king of the Sandwich Islands, his majesty Tamehameha III, is one of the best billiard-players in the world! Canada itself, which has sent handsome calèches, elegant harnesses, and remarkably comfortable furniture to the Exhibition,—is it not very near to the country of Uneas, the last of the Mohicans? Does it not surprise you to inhale the perfume of the plants of the Prairie when standing close to an excellent travelling carriage, the wood of which was cut from forests which were but lately inextricable, and unknown to all save the deer and elk who there found their hiding-places? Have you forgotten Natchez, Chactas, and Celuta, and the well-formed women who hung the cradles of their children on the branches of the maple-tree? On those large rivers, from which Chateaubriand in his canoe contemplated the solitary forests, listened to the imposing sounds of the desert, and exclaimed that, at last, he had found primitive liberty—on those very rivers myriads of steamboats now ply, filling the air with smoke, and ringing their bells when approaching the towns at which they stop. Ah! the poetry of nature has forever disappeared: yes, it is true,—the savages now wear shoes and neck-ties. We must no longer dream of adventures in the Savannas, we must remember that the first half of the century in which we live has witnessed this incredible transformation; we must cease to say that man is stationary, and that the present age produces nothing great. I know nothing more senseless and insane than this common and oft-repeated maxim. Never, on the contrary, since the creation of this planet have men witnessed such extraordinary events; never has the current which hurries us onward been more irresistible, more rapid, or more wonderful; one must be blind not to perceive this, and to those who go to sleep thinking of the apathy of the nineteenth century we can promise an extraordinary surprise when they wake.

And now that we have witnessed the West awaking, and seen how the new worlds, apparently scarcely issued from chaos, were melted in the crucible of European civilisation, let us go into Asia, the cradle of the human race. On this ancient land of tradition, we shall behold a very different spectacle. In the West we observed inordinate passion for progress; here, we perceive determined opposition to all innovation, and, strange to state, the result is equally marvellous. The Exhibition permits us to make the comparison in a few steps, and never was examination more fertile in information, uncertainty, and mystery. On entering the Crystal Palace, the first objects we notice are the products of India, China, Turkey, Persia, and Tunis, if it be permitted to include the latter under the title of the Eastern countries. The philosopher, as well as the man of the world, may spend a whole day in contemplating the master-pieces of art from the countries of the sun. We feel, from the first glance, that we are in an extraordinary country, in which nothing recalls that which surrounds us, which we might imagine to have fallen from the heavens on to our globe. When we find ourselves in the Indian exposition in particular, surrounded by shawls of fabulous texture, of price still more fabulous, by veils so light that we are almost inclined to think them woven air, by tissues of silver and silk, of gold and pearls, we rub our eyes and stand gazing in utter bewilderment; but it is not a dream. These wonderful textures, these arms of almost incredible richness, of unparalleled elegance, these harnesses of gold and rubies, these dresses embroidered with diamonds equal in value to the wealth of one of our European kingdoms, these palanquins glittering with emeralds do not come from paradise; seraphs had nothing to do with the manufacture of them; they were men, real, veritable men, who created these wonders. It is true that these men resist our civilisation, we suspect them of barbarism, and in our intolerable pride we nearly call them savages. What! can those but little known and still less understood people be savage, whose works bear such an impress of distinction and dazzling richness? In a corner of this our globe there exist shepherds, who, seated before their habitations, without other instruments than their hands and feet, weave and embroider shawls, scarfs, and carpets, whose beauty confounds us with admiration. In order to imitate them, learned Europe studies and invents, she creates machines wonderful for their complication and skill, chemistry comes in with its aid, and the result of numberless discoveries, labour, and science, approaches not nearer the model than prose to poetry, or the cold representation of an architect to the boldly conceived picture of a great artist. The most able artists of the West have exerted their talents in the manufactures of the Gobelins and Beauvais, and the carpets there woven are unequalled in the countries called civilized; but compare them with the carpets of Persia and Tunis: what a contrast! what harmony of colour, what exquisite tints, what richness, with far more simple processes! Whence comes it that colours, which cannot be harmonised in our countries, and which nature has nevertheless united everywhere, blue and green, for instance, are so happily amalgamated in materials of Eastern manufacture? How comes it that they can give to the woollen stuffs, which with us are so dull in colour, the transparency and brilliancy of windows of the Middle Ages? What genius has instructed them in secrets, which after so many centuries of research we have been unable to discover? It is not for us to instruct the peasants of Africa and Asia; it is for us, on the contrary, to learn by studying their work; and this has been so clearly proved by the Exhibition, that the workmen of our western manufactories, the dyers especially, have been sent to this school of taste and simplicity. Where then are art, progress, and civilisation? what doubts are excited by such a phenomenon! Yes! the East is a perfect enigma! He who has been in the midst of those silent and dignified, elegant and majestic nations, has felt that there is something inexplicable about them. Light comes from the East, from thence also have come all great innovations, and western conquerors have been unable to cross the eastern frontiers. Have you not often thought of the eternal and extraordinarily unequal contest between the Russians and Circassians? Have you never been struck with the incredible and undying resistance maintained by the poor Indians against another colossus named England? Where then exists the secret force of these people who are apparently so feeble? Compare their resources with ours; their means of defence with our engines of war: their arms are still more simple than their machines. Look at the light bows, the slender arrows, the inlaid poignards that India exhibits in London. After our mortars and instruments of war, these are veritable toys; the handle of these little sabres is so short, that they seem made to be used by children. It resembles a contest between the panther and the elephant; and on the peaceful land of industry, we find again the same difference; we can instantly recognise in their various works the agile Sikh and heavy Saxon.

There is yet another remark to make upon the striking exhibition of the eastern nations. It is the contrast between the extravagant richness of the objects of luxury, and the extreme poverty of the utensils necessary to life. For the exterior they have splendid garments, gold and precious stones; for the fireside, for the wants of every hour, a humble coffee-pot ill-made, a handful of rice, and pure water. An Indian sleeps on a hard mat, but he is anxious that his wife should have an extravagant dress, and loves to see her adorned with bracelets more valuable than his whole house; the Arab sleeps under a wretched tent, but his horse must be the most beautiful of his tribe; his furniture consists of a solitary and ancient carpet, but his pistols are mounted with silver. The native of the East is a poet preeminently; he loves the beautiful, he adores the superfluous, the useless is to him necessary; he despises what is indispensable, because what is indispensable is ugly, always ugly, always the expression of some want of our frail nature. He deems nothing beautiful to be useless. In the West, man is of a diametrically opposite opinion; he values things only in proportion to the material services they render him; he consecrates his life to the useful, he raises temples in its honour, he deifies the material, he makes gods of his wants.

Having visited the Eastern exhibition, and admired the tissues of gold, and magnificent jewels there displayed, let us turn to the exhibition of the United States. Assuredly, these enlightened Americans do not trouble themselves about the beautiful. Here we see paletots of caoutchouc, boots of caoutchouc, houses of caoutchouc; all these are hideous beyond measure, but they are serviceable and lasting. Here are steam-engines. Nature had bestowed superb forests upon these men; they have felled them in order to make railways: they have drained their flowery meadows to sow potatoes and beans, and they rear hogs where the wild horses formerly grazed in peace. To them, time is everything; "go ahead" is their motto. The man of the East, on the contrary, watches the years passing, he spends his day after the counsel of the poet, he enjoys his hours. To him life is not a mathematical thing, it is not measured by the pendulum of a clock. He regrets not the days he has lost, he deplures only those that are passed. The one dreams, the other is constantly active; both are happy in their own fashion; and following tracks diametrically opposite, both arrive, even in industry, at results equally surprising. Economists and philosophers, meditate and write books! here is a problem worthy of you; and before you have decided between the United States and India, the world will have performed more than one daily revolution.

And China? what is China? What is this almost fabulous empire, twice the size of Europe, which abhors us, and which we admire, despite its contempt of us; of which we know nothing save prodigies; whence we receive nothing but masterpieces of art? I know that we pretend to ridicule this nation of sages, but how little they trouble themselves about our raillery! how they prosper in peace, while fever gnaws us! how firmly do they remain stationed on their immovable basis, without even hearing the distant sound of our revolutions! The Chinese exhibition, however, is not worthy of the Great Empire, it must be acknowledged. China is not on good terms with England; she has her reasons for that; it is even said that China has sent nothing to the Crystal Palace, and that the rare products which have been introduced under her name, are there unknown to her, and have been picked up from the shops of London by diplomatic precaution. It was not necessary that China, by her absence, should recall the inglorious invasion of Canton. We laughed at this monstrous work, ridiculed the soldiers who opposed terrible figures on painted paper to the British cannon. We were in the wrong. On which side were the barbarians? Which party followed the law of nature, and combated for the right? Where had England concealed her noble device that day? The Chinese army was ludicrous, but it was an honour to the Celestial Empire. Are the Chinese so primitive, so uncivilized, as to think of war, to employ their talents in discovering the best manner of killing one another, to waste their time in preparing arms like the savage hordes of the earliest times? They have something better to do; thousands of years have elapsed since the peace congress terminated its business at Peking. How these people must pity us, if they ever think of us! And they may well do so. In the Exhibition there is a young Chinese, seated in the midst of his porcelain and cabinet-work. Without surprise, smiling with an air of raillery, he watches the movement which surrounds him. He is a man about twenty years of age, dressed in silk and shaved after the manner of his country. Never have I beheld a more satirical and contemptuous countenance. I could not look at him without a certain degree of embarrassment; his contempt annoyed me, and yet I could not help looking at him constantly. "Is it possible," said I to myself, examining him from head to foot, "that this man laughs at our Crystal Palace? What has he seen so wonderful in his own country, that a marvel, so extraordinary in our eyes, excites no surprise in his mind? What is it that makes this Chinese think us so profoundly ridiculous?" At the very moment I was looking at him, the young man, doubtless surprised at the attention with which I was examining him, laughed in my face in a most impertinent manner; and it is not towards me alone that he has acted thus. One day I observed two illustrious men standing at his stall. Do you imagine that the Chinese guessed the distinction of those visitors? Not at all; he showed his white teeth to them in the same manner as he had done to me, and you would never have made him believe that those men were worthy of the blue button of the first class.

At a short distance from the Crystal Palace, in a small building lately erected, is a second Chinese exhibition. There, in the midst of numerous articles of furniture and porcelain, is seen a lady of high rank, with her suite, from Peking; at least so say the advertisements. Being curious to see this family, I entered the building. Scarcely had I done so, when I heard in the distance a strange soft melody, which arrested my attention. I proceeded to the drawing room of the lady, who was carelessly seated in a large arm chair, fanning herself like an Andalusian, with a very pretty fan, her tiny feet crossed on a silken cushion; her shoes were of red silk, with a silver chain passing from the heel to the toes. She was very young, and very pretty, according to my taste, although yellow as an orange. Her little brown eyes, turned up at the temples, were keen and observant; her long black hair fell in plaits on her shoulders; her figure was very easy and supple, as far as I could judge through three or four tunics of different coloured satin, which hung down, and partially concealed large red silk trowsers. Her manners were perfect, and when I approached her in order to examine her feet more closely she testified, by a slight and very pretty movement, that her modesty was alarmed. Behind her was seated her female attendant, and two pretty children, as yellow and satirical looking as their cousin; at a little distance a young man, dressed in blue satin and standing, was playing on a long flute, and producing the singular sounds I had heard on entering. The young lady had so engaged my attention at first, that I had not noticed the musician; but when I turned my eyes towards him, I instantly perceived that the ironical look of the young Chinese of the Crystal Palace was fixed upon me. It was, in truth, he; this provoking fellow; he recognized me perfectly, and was seized with so strong a desire to burst out laughing, that I thought at one moment he would have stopped in the middle of his serenade. He evidently found something very ludicrous about me. The tune he was performing on the flute bore no resemblance to anything, save the slow psalmodies which the Arabs of the desert sing in the evening. There was something in it at once incoherent and sad, melancholy and soothing. Such a composition has never been met with at any period in European music; it was the song of another race, the melody of another world; but (may musicians pardon me!) it was charming. It might be compared to a bird of another hemisphere warbling notes completely unknown in this one. Doubtless there is something Chinese, or at least Asiatic in my composition, for nothing can equal my love of the songs of the East, save my detestation of the piano, that heartless and soulless instrument, which excites no emotion in the mind, and produces only powerless chords and short tuneless notes. For the greatest musical emotion I ever experienced, I am indebted to a Greek sailor. I arrived at Syra on a starlight night; our vessel was at anchor; all the crew were sleeping, and I was walking alone on the oridge. Suddenly a boat passed me, in which a man was singing while rowing. What he sang no one knew he could not have told himself; but the air of touching melancholy which the breeze wafted over the water filled me with such emotion, that I wept like a child. I do not pride myself upon being able to produce tears on every occasion, and I defy all the singers at the opera, as well as all the composers, to plunge me into a state of causeless sentimentality or beatitude. I would not send such a challenge to the Chinese. He is acquainted with the secret of the sailor of Syra. All Eastern melodies have the same origin, and the same inexplicable charm. Just now, in speaking of colours, I asked myself how the inhabitants of Asia could so happily amalgamate green and blue, which in Europe are irreconcilable. How can they, we may also ask, succeed in producing such striking harmonies by coupling dissonant notes, which with us create such fearful sounds as to drive to despair all unfortunate cats who chance to hear them? This is another problem to which no treatise on counterpoint can give us the key, and which musicians are unable to explain. I could have wished to understand and speak Chinese, that I might talk of these things and a thousand others with the interesting family from the Celestial Empire, but when the serenade was ended, the lady rose hastily and disappeared, pattering the floor with her little feet, like a gazelle trotting; her attendant vanished with her, and the juveniles followed; the hero of the flute took the same road after giving me a little friendly salute.

I could speak of the East for a long time, were it not necessary to limit even our most irresistible predilections. The West is well worthy of being visited again: from China, then, let us go to Europe; at the Exhibition 'tis but a minute's journey. We will first visit the smaller states, and then proceed to the great industrial nations. And first we enter Greece, a little blue and white division, patriotically hung with the national colours. Poor Greece! what yet remains to thee save thy patriotism and thy name? It is not yet decidedly European, and it is no longer oriental; the gold embroidered dress is very beautiful, but it is out of season. The European has supplanted the Asiatic dress in Attica, frys and carriages are numerous in Athens, and you no longer see the lower classes in little velvet waistcoats. Greece has adopted our manners; she has nothing beautiful now save her sky, nothing great but her memories. It is true I see there marbles from Paros, but who will carve these marbles? O Pericles! what wouldst thou think, wert thou to behold in this obscure and empty corner all that remains of thy country.

Portugal is contiguous to Greece; the two ruins may console each other. After the manner of the poor, Portugal makes a show of wealth; it is as generous as a broken down gentleman. Its liberality is carried so far as to open ten tons of the very best snuff for the benefit of those who pass. Sixty thousand snuff-takers daily sneeze at its expense. I admire this untiring and aristocratic generosity. Germany is more parsimonious; it had at first a fountain playing Eau de Cologne, but the source is now dried up; it is a poor affair to make promises which are not kept. Portugal is no longer as it was in the time of Diaz, Albuquerque, Vasco de Gama, and Camoens, who sang its praises, but it is far from being dead, and its exposition is not indifferent. Fine linen, passable silks, good arms, excellent cloth, prove that its industry demands only to be allowed to exist in peace. Luxury is represented by essences, fine marbles, and some very pretty flowers in wool by M. Marques of Lisbon, and the Azores have sent a filter of very rare and massive stone. Denmark and Sweden ought to have made a similar effort. Excepting some statues after Thorwaldsen, or perhaps by himself, the Danish exhibition is not worth mentioning. Thorwaldsen was very fortunate in being born in Iceland, a country in which sculptors are rare; he is indebted in a great measure to his origin for his renown. Had he been an Italian or Frenchman, his name would never have been heard of; being a child of the pole, a reputation was created for him similar to that which will shortly belong to Hiram Power, a sculptor of the United States, for almost the same reason, although his "Greek Slave," which was made in Italy like the statues of Thorwaldsen, is superior to them. I ask the pardon of enthusiasts—I do not propose my judgment as a standard, but, for my own part, I hope that Mr. Hiram Power will not establish a school at Boston, as Thorwaldsen has done at Copenhagen. The Americans and Danes have accomplished great things in the world; would that they would leave the arts alone! As to Sweden, let us not speak of it; we must not abuse the absent. It might have sent some of the brass of Boraas, and some of its splendid iron; it preferred a vacuum. The space allotted to it is as desert as the forests of Norway. There, it is said, meetings are now appointed at London; it is the least frequented spot in England. "Let us go to Sweden," is the whisper, "no one will disturb us there."¹

From Sweden to Italy the distance is great, but I like contrasts. Besides, with regard to industry, the difference is not so great as might have been imagined. Italy, like Greece, dreams of the past; she may well do so; let this for the present be her excuse. It is true there are mosaics from Florence, some alabaster vases of doubtful taste, some fine specimens of cabinet-work, a small reduction of the "Laocoon," a copy of Costoli's "Dying Gladiator," some very fine straw bonnets, and a large block of alum from Civita Vecchia; but of industry properly speaking, there seem to be no specimens except from Sardinia. Genoa has sent some fine carpets, some cabinet-work worthy of notice, lace, silks, and even "confetti." This is all very creditable, but not uncommon. Let us remember the three years, the three iron ages which have ruined this country, formerly blessed by heaven; and wishing it a happier future, let us now quit the Crystal Palace for to-day, and reserve for our next visit, the examination of the other countries.

RECIPT FOR A WINTER SALAD.

Two large potatoes, passed through kitchen sieve,
Unwonted softness to the salad give.
Of mordent mustard add a single spoon—
Distrust the condiment which bites so soon;
But deem it not, thou man of herbs, a fault
To add a double quantity of salt.
Three times the spoon with oil of Lucca crown,
And once with vinegar, procured from town.
True flavour needs it, and your poet begs
The pounded yellow of two well-boiled eggs.
Let onion atoms lurk within the bowl,
And, scarce suspected, animate the whole;
And lastly, on the flavoured compound toss
A magic teaspoon of anchovy sauce.
Then, though green turtle fail, though vonison's tough,
And ham and turkey are not boiled enough,
Serenely full, the Epicure may say—
Fate cannot harm me—I have dined to-day!

Quarterly Review.

"UNDER this head come the practices of making speech vary according to the person spoken to; of pretending to agree with the world when you do not;

(1) Sweden has since this was written taken her rank among the exhibitors.

of not acting according to what is your deliberate and well-advised opinion, because some mischief may be made of it by persons whose judgment in the matter you do not respect; of maintaining a wrong course for the sake of consistency; of encouraging the show of intimacy with those whom you never can be intimate with; and many things of the same kind. These practices have elements of charity and prudence as well as fear and meanness in them. Let those parts which correspond with fear and meanness be put aside. Charity and prudence are not parasitical plants, which require poles of falsehood to climb up upon. It is often extremely difficult in the mixed things of this world to act truly and kindly too; but therein lies one of the great trials of a man, that his sincerity should have a kindness in it, and his kindness truth."

—Friends in Council, vol. i.

Dr. Johnson once told me that a young gentleman called on him one morning, and told him that, having dropped suddenly into an ample fortune, he was willing to qualify himself for genteel society by adding some literature to his other endowments, and wished to be put in an easy way of obtaining it. Johnson recommended the University; "for you read Latin, sir, with facility?" "I read it a little to be sure, sir." "But do you read it with facility, I say?" "Upon my word, sir, I do not very well know, but I rather believe not." Dr. Johnson now began to recommend other branches of science; and advising him to study natural history, there arose some talk about animals and their divisions into oviparous and viviparous. "And the cat here, sir," said the youth, who wished for instruction, "pray in which class is she?" Our doctor's patience and desire of doing good began now to give way. "You would do well," said he, "to look for some person to be always about you, sir, who is capable of explaining such matters, and not come to us to know whether the cat lays eggs or not. Get a discreet man to keep you company; there are many who would be glad of your table and fifty pounds a-year." The young gentleman retired, and in less than a week informed his friends that he had fixed on a preceptor to whom no objections could be made; but when he named as such one of the most distinguished characters (Mr. Burke) in our age or nation, Dr. Johnson fairly gave himself up to an honest burst of laughter at seeing this youth at such a surprising distance from common knowledge of the world.—Note by Mrs. Piozzi to Boswell's Life of Johnson.

"In every art there must be with respect to truth some fiction, and with respect to resemblance something incomplete. . . . Music is an intellectual or a sensual pleasure according to the temperament of him who hears it. The mistake of most people is to suppose that it is by the ear they communicate with music, and, therefore, that they are purely passive to its effects. But this is not so. It is by the re-action of the mind upon the notices of the ear (the matter coming by the sense, the form from the mind) that the pleasure is constructed; and therefore it is that people of equally good ear differ so much in this point from one another."—De Quincy's "Opium Eater."

TRIUMPHS OF STEAM.

PART VI.

A PATENT was taken out in March, 1802, by Messrs. Trevithick and Vivian, for the first high-pressure engine adapted to locomotion; and, in 1804, as we have related, they established one upon the railroad at Merthyr-Tydvil. This machine was supported on four wheels, and the cylinder was placed horizontally, as in locomotives of the present day. Engineers were at this period, and for years afterwards, haunted by a phantom difficulty which a page or two of Bacon, ever powerful to exorcise all spirits of that species, would have laid at once and for ever. They theorised upon the insufficiency of the friction between the wheels and the rails to maintain the bite necessary to ensure progression, and neglected experimental observation. Contrivances, many and various, were invented to obviate this imaginary impediment, and Messrs. Trevithick and Vivian proposed to this end, (as their patent states,) "to make the external periphery of the wheels of carriages uneven by projecting heads of nails, or bolts, or cross grooves, or fittings to rail-roads; and in cases of a hard pull, to cause a lever, bolt, or claw to project through the rims of one or both wheels, so as to take hold of the ground." Then Mr. J. Blenkinsop, of Middleton Colliery, near Leeds, invented a "rack rail," which he patented in 1811, and the driving-wheels of his engines were cogged to correspond with the rack, and thus prevent the possibility of skidding; of course the friction and wear of the rails was most extravagant.

In the following year Messrs. W. and E. W. Chapman, of Northumberland, patented a new invention to reduce the expense of railways by directing the power employed to the rotation of a barrel, which, as it revolved, wound up a chain fixed at certain distances and compelled the advance of the carriage to which it was attached. One inventor, Mr. W. Brunton, engineer to the Butterly Company, Derbyshire, commiserating the unfavourable prospects of the steam-locomotive, determined to set it fairly on its legs, and with great ingenuity fitted it with these valuable appendages, making one of his "mechanical travellers," as he called them, a uniped, a second a biped, and another a polyped. Moreover, the legs were terminated in jointed feet, which accommodated themselves to the irregularities of the road; and the feet were nicely fitted with shoes, not to preserve their tenderness from the action of the cruel flints, but to diminish the wear of the road by these iron-hoofed runners. Mr. Brunton has furnished a full account of his invention to the "Repertory of Arts," and states that it succeeded famously in 1813 on a railway at the Crick Limb Works, where its stately trotings were performed. Pulleys, toothed and smoothed, connected with chains of links alternately circular and oval, were arranged in a new and complicated form by Messrs. W. Tindall and J. Bottomley, of Scarborough, in 1814, with a view to the improvement of the steam motors then in use; but happily that year

VOL. XIV.

Mr. Blacket, of Wylam, exploded, by the obvious method of trial, the erroneous idea of the necessity of racks, chains, or pulleys to compensate the ideal want of adhesion between the circumference of the wheels and the iron road. Furthermore, during this same year, Mr. G. Stephenson constructed a new engine at the Killingworth Colliery on a greatly improved principle, (introducing the double cylinder,) capable of drawing thirty tons at the speed of four miles per hour, which was improved upon by this inventor, and Mr. J. Dodd, in 1815, and again, in 1816, in conjunction with Mr. Losh. Gradual advances were made, but especially after the opening of the Stockton and Darlington Railway in 1825, where Mr. Stephenson conducted his experiments on a larger scale and led them to a more successful issue. The complete triumph of the locomotive steam-engine over all competitors we have already witnessed on the Liverpool and Manchester Railway. And let us now pause a moment over the history of the successful introducer of the iron steed, and here devote a few lines to that hero of other more legible and more enduring lines, in which his genius is faithfully portrayed by axe and mattock upon rock and stone, with an unvarnished grand simplicity, where flattery is inadmissible, and which infinitely transcends in force and dignity the grandest panegyric of the pen.

George Stephenson, born at Wylam, near Newcastle on Tyne, in 1781, was made a coal-pit "trapper" when only six years old; the whole duty of his situation consisting in holding open a trap-door for the successive "trams" to pass through. Then he became a "picker," whose employment is to separate the slate from the coal; and, (having removed to Callerton Pit,) after passing through two or three other gradations, he was promoted to the office of engineman. Literary education he had none, and did not even learn to read till his twenty-third year. From Callerton he changed his quarters for Walbottle Pit, where, his wages being increased to twelve shillings a-week, he considered himself, as he said on the occasion, "made a man of for life." His next remove was to Willington, and from thence to Killingworth, where, by the most diligent and unwearied self-culture, he rapidly advanced in his studies, and his talents first attracted influential notice. The character of his genius, like that of James Watt, was such as to apprehend and elucidate whatever came within its sphere. He constructed a sun-dial; and during the "night-shifts," when he had much leisure time on his hands, he used to cut out clothes for the pitmen and instruct their wives in the same art. He manufactured shoes, cleaned clocks and watches, and worked out his arithmetic lessons by the engine fire; here, too, he studied the action of the powerful engine of which he was destined successfully to introduce a new and most important application. Before his removal to Walbottle, and when in receipt of ten shillings a-week, he sought the hand of Miss Hindmarsh, the daughter of a neighbouring farmer, but his suit proving unsuccessful on account of his lowly condition, he transferred his affections to her servant-maid, and this time was rewarded with acceptance. The celebrated engineer, Mr. Robert Stephenson, was the only offspring of this marriage; and the exertions and self-denial practised by his father in order to secure him a sound education, present in a highly favourable light the steady determination and amiable character of George Stephenson. Subsequently—the death of his first wife rapidly succeeding the birth of her son—the ci-devant rejected suitor of Miss Hindmarsh exemplified the Parisian proverb, "On revient toujours à son premier amour," and renewing his early application, he was received with smiles, and lived a long and happy wedded life with his early love. It was at Wylam Colliery where Stephenson first saw the locomotive engine, (one of Trevithick and Vivian's,) and his thoughts were speedily directed to the correction of its imperfections, and at Killingworth, in 1814, aided by the partners in that colliery, he erected his first engine upon the improved principle before described. His ingenuity soon developed the latent powers of this machine, and its supremacy over all rivals was fully established in the "Rocket;" though it should not be left unmentioned that for one peculiar feature in the construction of the "Rocket," to which its success may in no slight degree be attributed, he was indebted to Mr. H. Booth, Treasurer of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway Company; namely, the introduction of hot air-tubes in the boiler, by which contrivance steam was generated with greatly-increased rapidity—a method since universally adopted, and to a far greater extent.

Long before this period the engineering talents of Stephenson were engaged on railways, and his son became associated with him in business. He laid the foundation of the extensive works in Newcastle, where the "Rocket" was built in 1830, and continually his inventive powers were tasked to improve the wonderful engine, of which he was not the original author, but which, at least, he practically invented, and rendered of that immense importance which it is now acknowledged to possess throughout the length and breadth of the civilised world.

Another valuable invention his northern friends claim for him—the Miner's Safety Lamp, (usually ascribed to Sir H. Davy)—and it is ascertained that he made trial of such a lamp in Killingworth Colliery before the chemist's discovery was made known, however independent that discovery may have been of Stephenson's experiments. It is certain that the latter received a testimonial from the townsmen of Newcastle, consisting of a silver tankard, accompanied by a thousand guineas, presented to him as "the discoverer of the safety-lamp."

Before his death, which took place at his seat at Euston, in Derbyshire, on the 12th of August, 1848, George Stephenson had amassed a considerable fortune, and was no less regarded for his sterling character than for his remarkable talents. The honoured of princes, and the friend of pitmen, the lowly miner and the palace guest, he was at all times superior to the littleness which could have blushed at his humble origin, and displayed rather the nobler pride generated by the consciousness of having wrestled with the obstacles of birth and fortune, and come off conqueror in the strife. And justly he might be proud of having been the chief promoter of that new system of transport which is now widely diffusing its extensive benefits among the human race. His death was regarded as a national loss. "Tracing the progress of railways from the construction of the Liverpool and Manchester Railway to the present time," said the Directors of the London and North-Western Company in a resolution embodying their testimony of profound regret at his decease, "we find Mr. Stephenson foremost in urging forward the great railway movement; earning and maintaining his title to be considered, before any other man, the author of that universal system of locomotion which has effected such mighty results, commercial, social, and political, throughout the civilised world." His works are enduring monuments to his valued memory; his "good," at least is not "interred with his bones."

At length all preparations for the opening of the first grand passenger-railway were completed, and public interest was wrought to the highest pitch of excitement on the memorable morning of the 15th of September, 1825, when "all the world seemed collected in that spot," (the Liverpool terminus.) "Not only," says one lively describer of the scene, "nine-tenths of those I knew in the neighbouring counties were there, but three-fourths at least of my whole circle of friends, from Peking westward to the Pacific." Eight locomotives were assembled to perform the inauguration trip of revolutionized transit—the "Northumbrian," "Phoenix," "North Star," "Dart," "Comet," "Arrow," "Meteor," and the victor "Rocket;" all having issued from the erecting shop of Messrs. Stephenson & Co. Of these, the first engine devoted its services to three carriages, the first containing the band; the second, a magnificent and sumptuous carriage, assigned to the Duke of Wellington, Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Huskisson, and other gentlemen of distinction; and the third appropriated to the directors of the company.

One pair of rails was reserved to the "Northumbrian" and its precious freight, while the remaining seven "steam-horses," with their respective trains of cars, containing in each set from 90 to 100 passengers, were restricted to the other line. Thus 722 individuals were accommodated, and happy indeed was the possessor of any gay-tinted ticket which indicated by its hue that the correspondent flag waving above one or other of the hissing engines was to herald his approach, and by its number the particular carriage-seat allotted him. Of spectators it was estimated that at the termini and along the line, there could not have been fewer than 400,000; most of them devoting the day to a joyous holiday, though some indeed, at the Manchester end, of the destructive radical school, hoped to change the aspect of the revolution of that day, and supplied themselves with abundance of the ominous tricolor cockades to deck the advocates of injustice, crime, and violence; but common-sense, constables, and dragoons, rendered unpopular these ribbon decorations. Exactly at twenty minutes to eleven o'clock the signal-gun fired; the engineers applied the steam to the "drivers," the obedient giants with a deep-breathed puff-puff, moved the massive trains—ran—flew with them, amid the exciting and tumultuous plaudits of the beholders, echoed and re-echoed from side to side, from carriage and from bank. Through the Olive Mount Cutting, under Rainhill Bridge, the novel procession swept the "iron highway" reaching the top of the Sutton acclivity, then travelling in those early days at a speed of twenty-four miles an hour, and reaching at mid-day the grand Sankey Viaduct and Embankment, where the beholders were congregated in unusual force. Vessels rested on the stream that the anxious eyes on deck might witness the rushing flight of their wonderful rivals; and fields and roads teemed with pedestrian and equestrian humanity ready to rend the air with their applauding voices. Stands were erected for public accommodation, one of which was prepared for a thousand rejoicers, at a charge of half-a-guinea a head, which included refreshment and, to a certain distance, carriage conveyance. Of course, the pleasure of the day could not be summed up in one or two glimpses—how brief!—of the steam cortège; so preparations were made for tripping and fiddling away the intervening time.

But these festivities were abruptly closed by intelligence of the melancholy accident inseparably associated with this memorable day. Gaily the procession swept over Sankey Viaduct and through the borough of Newton to Parkside, where the engines stopped to receive fresh supplies of water and fuel; and here the deplorable event happened which mingled wailings with the nation's joy. Not scrupulously attentive to the directions printed on the tickets by order of the company, Mr. Huskisson had alighted from his seat, and was standing near the carriage between the lines of railway, when three of the engines on the opposite line, advancing at a brisk pace, alarmed that gentleman, who, conceiving that there was insufficient standing room between his own carriage and the range of the passing train, hastily opened the door to re-enter, and with so much force that he lost his balance, falling across the rails immediately before the Dart reached that spot; and, though the driver sought instantly to stop the engine, before that could be accomplished, the two engine wheels and one of the first carriage wheels ran over him, crushing his leg and thigh, and inflicting the fatal injuries which in a few hours terminated his earthly career. Away flew the "Northumbrian" over the remaining seventeen miles to Manchester, where the impatient populace were waiting to receive the trains, but their unresponded cheer warned them of evil tidings, which were quickly spread by the first words of her passengers, "A surgeon! Lord Wilton wants a surgeon!" In an incredibly short space of time one eminent in his profession was hurrying back to the wounded statesman, but his injuries proved too severe to yield to human skill. His last words were, "I have met my death—God forgive me!" Earl Wilton promptly applied a tourniquet, and the unfortunate gentleman was removed in a car to Eccles, where he expired at the house of the rector, Mr. Blackburn, before the whole of the party with whom he started in full vigour of health had returned to Liverpool.

The original arrangements of the programme of the day were by this gloomy circumstance subverted, and the increasing turbulence of the Manchester radicals, who pelted the better dressed with dirt, and were expected to work mischief to the rails, added to the sympathising gloominess of the weather, in no degree raised the spirits of the 721 hearts that bounded so exultingly when their owners that morning took their seats for the first time in a railway train. The gentlemen of the party were compelled to walk up the Sutton plane; and all finally reached Liverpool by about eleven o'clock at night instead of four, as had been anticipated. Nevertheless it is a golden day in the country's calendar of progress; a day of triumph which has secured us more, and cost us infinitely less, than by far the majority of those "glorious" days of victory—red-letter days if you will—reddened by the blood of thousands of desolate families, and secured to us as precious treasures of memory and proud congratulation which can never be forgotten by the true Briton while we have a Westminster Abbey, and a national debt of eight hundred millions.

On September the 16th, traffic was opened on this line by the Northumbrian, with a train occupying 130 passengers, and performing the journey from Liverpool to Manchester in one hour and fifty minutes; and on and after the following day, three times daily, a train regularly started from each terminus, and increasing traffic soon necessitated further additions. The number of passengers from this date till the end of 1830, was 71,951. In the first six months of the succeeding year, they numbered 183,726; and during the latter half of 1831, their number swelled to the astonishing total of 256,321; the goods traffic presenting a table of corresponding progression.

How much Manchester benefitted by the construction of this line may be gathered from the single fact that her manufacturers saved, in the carriage of cotton only, more than 20,000*l.* a-year; while her manufactured goods were transported to America, through Liverpool, in positively less time, and at less expense, than was formerly incurred from Manchester to Liverpool alone.

Thus did the grand experimental railroad pioneer the way for the steam revolutionists, that in an incredibly short space of time have completely changed the aspect, not only of travel, but of civilized society. Britain's indomitable energies were fully aroused to the consciousness of possessing a new and incalculably mighty element of progress, the full value and effects of which are still beyond the reach of human estimate.

With unexampled rapidity were schemes proposed, fostered, and matured, for reticulating with railways the entire kingdom. Regardless of distance, and obstacles, moral or physical, the most sanguine had already united together every town of the slightest commercial pretension. Acts of Parliament authorising some or other of these schemes, backed by enterprising capitalists, were speedily multiplied. From 1801, (the year of the first railway act,) to 1825, fifty-five acts were passed of this character, of which there are only six having reference to passenger-lines. From 1826 to the close of 1835, ninety-five acts were passed, authorising the construction of 927 miles of railway. Now had the tide decidedly set in, and accordingly, from 1836 to 1843, one hundred and fifty-three acts were passed, authorising an additional 1,717 miles. But during the next four years, the railway maniacal years, from 1844 to 1847, no fewer than six hundred and forty-one Acts passed the Legislature, permitting the construction of railroads to the extent of 9,837 miles; thus making the total number of acts subsequent to 1826, eight hundred and eighty-nine, and the number of miles authorised, 12,481. Since that period, the amount of mileage, for which new powers have been granted, is exceeded by that which is abandoned; and at the close of the year 1850, the table stands thus:—

MILES OPEN FOR TRAFFIC.
England and Wales	5,132
Scotland	951
Ireland	538
	6,621
In course of construction	551
Not commenced	4,831
	12,003

Of the railways not yet commenced, the Railway Commissioners are of opinion that probably 2,400 miles will never be completed under existing Acts of Parliament.

Among the earliest and most important lines which succeeded the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester, were the Great Western; act obtained 1835, length 117½ miles, part opened 1838. The Grand Junction; act obtained 1833, length 82½ miles, opened 1837. The London and Birmingham, 112 miles; act passed 1833, part opened 1837. The Midland Counties, 57 miles; and the North Midland, 72½ miles; acts passed in 1836 and both opened in 1840. Of these germs of the main arteries of our railway system the Great Western has now attained to 263½ miles in length; while the Grand Junction, (which then included the Liverpool and Manchester,) became incorporated in 1846 with the London and Birmingham, and the Manchester and Birmingham Railways; thus forming the Great London and North Western Railway, the most gigantic among its brethren, its mileage having now reached 518½ miles; pecuniary interest being, moreover, possessed by the company in 640 miles of tributary lines. The authorisied capital of this company now exceeds thirty millions sterling. The North Midland and the Midland Counties, together with the Birmingham and Derby Junction, were incorporated in 1844, under the name of the Midland Railway, which is second in extent only to the London and North Western. Its present length is 496½ miles, and the authorised capital of the company 17,788,160*l*. Another of these main trunks, bidding fair to rival any of the foregoing in importance, is the Great Northern, the "spine," as it is called, of the kingdom. No part of this line was opened till 1848, but at present 236 miles are available for traffic, and, when completed its length will be 300 miles.

Perhaps there is no aspect that more strikingly exhibits the wonderfully rapid establishment of the railway system in England, and, at the same time, the remarkable monetary resources of our country, than the consideration of the immense sums devoted to their construction. Prodigious has been the outlay in every stage; upwards of two hundred millions having been already expended upon them, and powers yet unexercised are possessed for a further outlay exceeding one hundred and forty-six millions. On the 1st of January, 1850, the total authorised capital of the railway companies in the United Kingdom, was no less a sum than 347,046,164*l*! But there is no other state in which the cost throughout of establishing a railroad is so enormous as in our own; and to give some idea of this, we annex the amount per mile, expended on a few of our principal lines; independently of the "plant," and before a train has run upon their path.

On the English Lines the average sum per mile paid for the purchase of land, exceeds 14,000*l*, and far too great an element in the swollen amount has been the parliamentary expense incurred. By the Brighton Company 4,806*l*. per mile was thus outlaid; by the Manchester and Birmingham, 5,190*l*.; and by the Blackwall Company, 14,414*l*.

It has been estimated, indeed, that the money laid out in Parliamentary expenses, during the three years 1845 to 1847, would have been sufficient to pay for the construction of a line from London to Aberdeen at the rate of 20,000*l*. per mile! In contrast with this enormous expense stands the average cost per mile of American railways, which is only 5,031*l*. In Prussia the average cost has been about 10,000*l*.; Austria, 11,800*l*.; lesser States of Germany, about 19,000*l.* per mile. Many of the American railroads, it should be remembered, are only single lines; nor are they to be compared to our own for solidity, beauty, durability, or any other excellence. The trains rush up the centre of the streets, and, as the traveller "Across the Atlantic" tells us, "You might be walking in a shady lane of a dark night, unconscious that there was a line of railway within a hundred miles, and suddenly hear the engine turn in out of a field behind you, and see it whisk past, or feel it go over you, according as you did or did not get out of the way in time. As for villages and country towns, it rattles right up their main streets, not unfrequently stopping at the door of the hotel, or in front of the church, by way of a station. On these occasions you might sometimes shake hands with the people on each side of you, who stand at their shop-fronts to see you go past."

But, while astonishment is created by a financial view of our railways, their magnificence can only be rightly appreciated after consideration of the gigantic works and noble structures which they have on all sides called into existence. Trophies of art and science, varied and beautiful, elegant and stupendous, abound in cameo and intaglio upon our new highways. Starting from some chief station, among the two thousand erected, of noble exterior and corresponding beauty within—the beauty of fitness as well as adornment—(such, for instance, as the Euston terminus, the erection of which cost 81,582*l.*)—and presenting a scene unparalleled and unique, not the least striking portion being the light and elegant iron roofs which shelter the thronging travellers—the passenger now races the wind in some narrow defile, the grassy, earthy, brickly, stony, or rocky sides of which, sloping or perpendicular, are fifty, sixty, even seventy to an hundred feet in height; now emerges upon a luxurious level, where, sitting at his ease, he beholds fields, trees, streams and villages rush past him in hot pursuit, till he suddenly finds himself upon a thready ridge, high and dry, though in the centre of a boggy wilderness; and anon, he is hanging for an instant over some majestic river upon a bridge supported on peerless piers, which flies swiftly yet smoothly from under him, and he is buried in a reverberating chasm, where he hears in intense perfection the shrill salutation of his steed and its fellow-creature as they enjoy an interview, brief, 'tis true, in the course of their opposite windings. Again, escaping from the tunnel, he is restored to the light of day, and finds himself transported as by enchantment to the centre of a palatial edifice, there surrounded by temptations of appetite not easily resisted in the potent shapes before him, liquid and compact, sweet, pungent, savoury, warming, cooling, refreshing and invigorating, and he has five whole minutes at his disposal, so is instantly an added devotee before the gastronomic shrine. Not that he needs food or drink, but the universal rush is infectious; he has no interval for considering whether he hungers or thirsts; hesitation, one moment's delay, would prohibit choice; so with the energy of decision, and reflecting that a merciful man is merciful to his stomach, he seeks to store that region with all expedition, till "Take your seats, gentlemen," irresistibly arrests the benevolent operation. Again, he is smoothly lighteninged over viaducts of surpassing grandeur; above chasms of unsearchable depth; across rivers and arms of the sea, wide enough and deep enough to swamp a fleet; through massive tubes of iron, glibly and swiftly as a grey pea through a pea-shooter from the distended jaws of a school-urchin; and is finally clasped in the arms of his friend—breathless?—nay, never freer in his respirations; fatigued?—pshaw!—"fresh as a daisy," as he assures that friend, who, knowing he would start at the nine a. m. train, felt equally sure that the 200 miles would be traversed, and he at his friend's table at half-past two, p. m., without so much a disarrangement as a rumpled whisker.

Wonderful works have combined to ensure him punctual to the dinner-hour, and he is a grateful man. He, and not he only, will listen with interest to some details of their structure. The level and smoothness of the road, which rendered our traveller's ride so voluptuously easy, cost labour and science a struggle with nature of no little severity. Mountains and valleys needed to be "made straight" by spades, and mattocks, and wheelbarrows.

Enormous embankments have to be packed and consolidated, carefully guarding against the risk of future subsidence or slips. On the Liverpool and Manchester Railway there is the Broad Green Embankment, which is thirty feet in height, and extends nearly three miles; measuring sixty feet in breadth at the surface, and at the base 135 feet: no less than 550,000 cubic yards of material being absorbed in its formation. The embankments on the London and Birmingham Railway, 112 miles in length, are estimated to contain 10,698,315 cubic yards. Perhaps the highest in the country are to be found on the Clarence Railway, in the county of Durham.

If our traveller wondered whence the masses of material were obtained for some of these immense works, the first "cutting" he came to would throw a little light upon his cogitations. This is one of the nice reckonings of the engineer, to make the cuttings and embankments of his line balance one another; though it is not to be expected that the result can be exactly attained. Some railways have averaged in their earth-works as much as 150,000 cubic yards per mile. The excavations on the London and Birmingham line amounted to considerably upwards of twelve million cubic yards, of which the chalk hewn out of the Tring cutting alone equalled 1,297,763 cubic yards. When the material is sandstone, as at the Olive Mount cutting on the Liverpool and Manchester line, the labour required is tremendous; and though sand excavations are certainly not so formidable, they are works of no insignificant magnitude when, as on the Newcastle and Carlisle Railway, dug to the depth of 110 feet.

Engineers have displayed great ingenuity in suiting the character of their works to the very various situations in which they are constructed. Thus, it frequently happens in cuttings that different descriptions of strata are pierced; and when the upper stratum is hard and solid and the lower more loose in substance, the sloping necessary for the stability of the under portion of the excavation would entail very serious labour in removing the superior portion. In such cases the rock is underbuilt with massive brick revêtement walls some three or four feet in thickness, and the sides of the cutting are left perpendicular. This method is adopted at Blisworth, where there is a cutting of this nature sixty feet in depth, and again between Camden Town and Euston Station.

But the most difficult, uncertain, laborious, and expensive works in constructing a railroad are the tunnellings, which are generally found to be great bores. Few travellers entertain any high degree of partiality for these dark, noisy, mysterious, earth-embowelled pathways; and engineers like them at least as little. The poor contractor for the Kilsby tunnel fell a sacrifice to its deceitful quicksand which wouldn't be pumped dry, and compelled him finally to give up the contract and the ghost. The strata through which the subterranean pass was to be made was believed to be entirely the shale of the lower oolite; but in the process of excavation the liquid enemy manifested himself by throwing water up the shafts in torrents. A reinforcement was sent to the attack under Mr. Robert Stephenson, who, with the aid of his army of thirteen steam-engines, 200 horses, and 1,250 men, obtained in eight months a glorious triumph; but not till after two years and a half had been spent upon this tunnel, which is 2,425 feet in length, and consumed 36,000,000 of bricks in lining the top and bottom.

Some tunnels need no lining, the material being sufficiently compact not to require support. This is the case with the Penmaenbach Tunnel, between Chester and Holyhead, which is cut through solid basalt: but the operation of perforating basaltic rock, granite, or whinstone, is extremely laborious, being effected almost entirely by the tedious process of blasting. The Box Tunnel, between Bath and Chippenham, the longest English tunnel, is upwards of one mile and three quarters in length, and exceeded 300,000*l.* in expense, or nearly 100*l.* per yard—nothing, if compared with Brunel's subaqueous achievement; for the Thames Tunnel cost about 1,200*l.* per yard. Sovereigns, if laid down abreast, a foot wide from end to end, up one path and down the other, would not pay for it.

Emerging from these gloomy recesses, let us follow our traveller over the viaducts, which led his musings back to our old friends the Romans. We have many imposing structures of this nature, and among the finest is that crossing the Dee, in the beautiful Vale of Llangollen, 1532 feet in length. It is securely built upon the solid rock, and measures 148 feet in height from the river-bed to the central top of the parapet. Its construction occupied from the 19th of April, 1846, to the 12th of August, 1848, costing more than 100,000*l.* The London and Greenwich Railway is a viaduct throughout, twenty-six feet wide and about twenty high, and consists of 878 arches, twenty-seven of which are skew arches. This form of road was necessitated by the multitude of houses standing in the proposed line. Another magnificent structure is the Stockport Viaduct, designed by Mr. George W. Buck. It is 2,179 feet long, and 108 feet high, and carries over the Mersey the Manchester and Birmingham Railway. And many more raised roads, stupendous and beautiful, have our engineers erected throughout the kingdom, fully worthy of deep attention; but we must leave all further notice of them to more professional pages.

Bridges most numerous, of brick, stone, wood, and iron, span and support our railways; probably not fewer than 15,000. On the eighty-two miles of the London and North Western Railway, lately the Grand Junction, there are 169 bridges, of which sixty-three are below the line. There are two or three bridges of such surpassing interest that we must devote some space to their individual notice. Each would have conferred immortal fame upon its architect; but all have instead combined to weave an unfading wreath of laurel for one man, Robert Stephenson. The High Level Bridge at Newcastle, the Conway, and the Britannia Tubular Bridges, are all the works of his hands.

A "high level" bridge across the Tyne, had long been a desideratum with the good folks of Newcastle, the old bridge suiting only the low districts of the opposite shores; and when it was determined to combine the termini of the neighbouring railways into one grand central station, it became necessary, in order to include the Darlington line, then terminating at Gateshead, to carry it over the river at a considerable altitude. Mr. R. Stephenson served, therefore, the common interest of the directors and townsmen by planning this ingenious structure, the first which unites the suspension with the ordinary principles of a viaduct. It is nearly 1,400 feet in length, and comprises a carriage-road as well as a railway. A level bridge for horses, vehicles, and foot-passengers, is constructed at the altitude of ninety feet from high tide level. Above this the railroad is carried at an additional height of twenty-five feet, the parapet of which is more than 130 feet from the river bed. In this structure the iron-work weighs nearly 5,000 tons, and the total cost of the bridge has been about 580,000*l.*

But this beautiful erection is greatly surpassed in interest by the tubular bridges on the Chester and Holyhead line. It is true these are not the first tubular bridges, for a wooden one was built over the Rhine, about two miles above Lanfen, in 1757, by a carpenter, John Ulrich Grubenman, the length of which was 353½ feet without support from below; but this is no prototype of the Britannia and Conway tubes. The latter and lesser of these "iron tunnels, hung up in the air across arms of the sea," is flung over the Conway, close under the old castle wall, at an elevation of eighteen feet above high-water level; its clear span being 400 feet. The bridge consists of two rectangular tubes, each 424 feet long, and fourteen feet wide, with an average height of twenty-four feet, and weighing 1,800 tons. In June 1846, the masonry was commenced, and on the 17th of November 1846, the first tube was adjusted; on which occasion a festival was given in honour of the engineer, where his father was present, George Stephenson. To him the enjoyment of that scene must have repaid his early denials for the sake of the son, whose reputation was thus gloriously advancing. Before the second tube was fixed, which took place on the 2d of November in the same year, the father's spirit was removed from participation in earthly honours, and the son's shaded by his irreparable loss! Since that date, with invariable safety, trains have shot through the double tunnel, nor has anything occurred to diminish confidence in the all-abundant strength of the iron passage; and, indeed, the most timid would feel satisfactorily assured of their security in transit from Chester to Conway by a brief glance at the rigid tests and experiments of Captain Simmons, the results of which are conclusive against all apprehension of danger. As the principles adopted in the construction of this bridge are identical with those of its gigantic neighbour, we need not, to describe them, delay longer our notice of the grander triumph.

North Wales was rich enough in varied attractions before the year 1845. Admirers of scenery soft and sublime; students of history, of language, of manners, of men; votaries of fancy or fishing; lovers of loeks, lakes, or learning; the antiquary and the engineer; all, and severally, found abundant charms in Taffyland. But, in 1845, the hero of Conway designed, the directors of the Chester and Holyhead Railway proposed, and the British senate decreed, an added beauty to her scenes, especially attractive to the noble corps of engineers. Telford had prepared mighty and beautiful objects to delight the civil race in this lovely region, but Stephenson crowned them with the hand that—

"Knots in the air with the bridge that it flings,
Two peaks far disrupted by ocean and skies."

Beautiful were the Menai Straits, but not in the official eyes of the Chester and Holyhead Board. More lovely to them would have been a uniform level sward, solid and unyielding, instead of shelving shores and stormy seas, thought by the majority to be superior elements of the picturesque; and next in beauty would they have ranked the bridge first planned by their engineer, of two cast-iron arches on piers of masonry. But not so the Admiralty. They could not suffer the navigation of the channel, always intricate, to be thus impeded; and put their veto on any erection which did not fulfil the condition of a clear height above high-water from shore to shore of 100 feet, and no centering. So Mr. Stephenson was referred back to his cogitations, which kindly devised for him and the company that remarkable manifestation of skill and genius—the Britannia Tubular

Bridge. That offspring of much gestation may be briefly outlined as two contiguous hollow beams supported by a mid-tower in the Menai Straits, by two side towers near the opposite shores, and two massive abutments at the extreme ends on solid land.

On the 30th June, 1845, the Parliament sanctioned this undertaking, and experiments were instituted to resolve upon the best form of structure. The bridge was actually commenced April the 13th, 1846; and on the 21st of the same month, Mr. Frank Foster laid the first stone on the Britannia Rock of the gigantic central tower. Midway between the Anglesey and Carnarvon shores, here 1,100 feet apart at high water, frowns this firm and rugged rock, (though said frowns are not always visible, his crest being ten feet beneath the stream at high-tide,) and he stood sponsor to the tower, conferring his own name, which the boisterous Straits ratified by christening with no sparing sprinkle. Rapid was the growth of this promising child; from his chlorite-schist cradle, thriving, not on Cheshire cheese, but Cheshire sandstone and Anglesey marble, he attained on June the 22d, 1849, the astonishing stature of 230 feet, on which day the last stone was laid by Mr. R. Stephenson. At the base, its dimensions were sixty-two feet by fifty-two, and it tapers upwards, measuring seven feet less each way at the entrance of the tubes. 20,000 tons of stone, and 387 of cast-iron, are worked into this lofty mass of masonry. The twin-towers, Carnarvon and Anglesey by name, stand each at the distance of 460 feet from their taller brother, their heads rising 190 feet above the level of high water. Their base is equal to the Britannia base, but they taper to fifty-five feet by thirty-two at the lower level of the tubes. Beyond these, east and west, the Carnarvonshire and Anglesey abutments are erected inland 230 feet from the respective towers. The height of each is 163½ feet, and their length 173 feet, including the wing walls, which terminate in a pair of handsome pedestals, each surmounted by a colossal lion couchant.

The masonry, though magnificent, is not the most extraordinary portion of the Britannia Bridge, the characteristic feature being the iron tunnels they support. To fulfil the Admiralty dictum, Mr. Stephenson bent his energies to devising a straight, not an arched erection. Strength, durability, and lightness were the objects to be attained in such a construction, and the engineer determined to avail himself of the well-known superiority of hollow beams to solid ones in their capability of resistance proportioned to their weight. This form being resolved upon, experiment soon decided in favour of wrought-iron as the material to be employed, on account of the great resistance this metal opposes to extension. Plates of malleable iron varying from six to twelve feet in length are chiefly employed, strongly rivetted together. Many and elaborate were the experiments directed and performed by Messrs. Stephenson, Fairbairn, Hodgkinson, E. and L. Clark, and other talented engineers, before the form of these aerial tubes, or rather passages, was

With unexampled rapidity were schemes proposed, fostered, and matured, for reticulating with railways the entire kingdom. Regardless of distance, and obstacles, moral or physical, the most sanguine had already united together every town of the slightest commercial pretension. Acts of Parliament authorising some or other of these schemes, backed by enterprising capitalists, were speedily multiplied. From 1801, (the year of the first railway act,) to 1825, fifty-five acts were passed of this character, of which there are only six having reference to passenger-lines. From 1826 to the close of 1835, ninety-five acts were passed, authorising the construction of 927 miles of railway. Now had the tide decidedly set in, and accordingly, from 1836 to 1843, one hundred and fifty-three acts were passed, authorising an additional 1,717 miles. But during the next four years, the railway maniacal years, from 1844 to 1847, no fewer than six hundred and forty-one Acts passed the Legislature, permitting the construction of railroads to the extent of 9,837 miles; thus making the total number of acts subsequent to 1826, eight hundred and eighty-nine, and the number of miles authorised, 12,481. Since that period, the amount of mileage, for which new powers have been granted, is exceeded by that which is abandoned; and at the close of the year 1850, the table stands thus:—

MILES OPEN FOR TRAFFIC.

England and Wales	5,132
Scotland	951
Ireland	538
	—6,621

Of the railways not yet commenced, the Railway Commissioners are of opinion that probably 2,400 miles will never be completed under existing Acts of Parliament.

Among the earliest and most important lines which succeeded the opening of the Liverpool and Manchester, were the Great Western; act obtained 1835, length 117½ miles, part opened 1838. The Grand Junction; act obtained 1833, length 82½ miles, opened 1837. The London and Birmingham, 112 miles; act passed 1833, part opened 1837. The Midland Counties, 57 miles; and the North Midland, 72½ miles; acts passed in 1836 and both opened in 1840. Of these germs of the main arteries of our railway system the Great Western has now attained to 263½ miles in length; while the Grand Junction, (which when included the Liverpool and Manchester,) became incorporated in 1846 with the London and Birmingham, and the Manchester and Birmingham Railways; thus forming the Great London and North Western Railway, the most gigantic among its brethren, its mileage having now reached 518½ miles; pecuniary interest being, moreover, possessed by the company in 640 miles of tributary lines. The authorised capital of this company now exceeds thirty millions sterling. The North Midland and the Midland Counties, together with the Birmingham and Derby Junction, were incorporated in 1844, under the name of the Midland Railway, which is second in extent only to the London and North Western. Its present length is 496½ miles, and the authorised capital of the company 17,788,160*l*. Another of these main trunks, bidding fair to rival any of the foregoing in importance, is the Great Northern, the "spine," as it is called, of the kingdom. No part of this line was opened till 1848, but at present 236 miles are available for traffic, and, when completed its length will be 300 miles.

Perhaps there is no aspect that more strikingly exhibits the wonderfully rapid establishment of the railway system in England, and, at the same time, the remarkable monetary resources of our country, than the consideration of the immense sums devoted to their construction. The poor contractor for the Kilsby tunnel fell a sacrifice to its deceitful quicksand which wouldn't be pumped dry, and compelled him finally to give up the contract and the ghost. The strata through which the subterraneous pass was to be made was believed to be entirely the shale of the lower oolite; but in the process of excavation the liquid enemy manifested himself by throwing water up the shafts in torrents. A reinforcement was sent to the attack under Mr. Robert Stephenson, who, with the aid of his army of thirteen steam-engines, 200 horses, and 1,250 men, obtained in eight months a glorious triumph; but not till after two years and a half had been spent upon this tunnel, which is 2,423 feet in length, and consumed 36,000,000 of bricks in lining the top and bottom.

Some tunnels need no lining, the material being sufficiently compact not to require support. This is the case with the Penmaenbach Tunnel, between Chester and Holyhead, which is cut through solid basalt: but the operation of perforating basaltic rock, granite, or whinstone, is extremely laborious, being effected almost entirely by the tedious process of blasting. The Box Tunnel, between Bath and Chippenham, the longest English tunnel, is upwards of one mile and three quarters in length, and exceeded 300,000*l.* in expense, or nearly 100*l.* per yard—nothing, if compared with Brunel's subaqueous achievement; for the Thames Tunnel cost about 1,200*l.* per yard. Sovereigns, if laid down abreast, a foot wide from end to end, up one path and down the other, would not pay for it.

Emerging from these gloomy recesses, let us follow our traveller over the viaducts, which led his musings back to our old friends the Romans. We have many imposing structures of this nature, and among the finest is that crossing the Dee, in the beautiful Vale of Llangollen, 1533 feet in length. It is securely built upon the solid rock, and measures 148 feet in height from the river-bed to the central top of the parapet. Its construction occupied from the 19th of April, 1846, to the 12th of August, 1848, costing more than 100,000*l.* The London and Greenwich Railway is a viaduct throughout, twenty-six feet wide and about twenty high, and consists of 878 arches, twenty-seven of which are skew arches. This form of road was necessitated by the multitude of houses standing in the proposed line. Another magnificent structure is the Stockport Viaduct, designed by Mr. George W. Buck. It is 2,179 feet long, and 106 feet high, and carries over the Mersey the Manchester and Birmingham Railway. And many more raised roads, stupendous and beautiful, have our engineers erected throughout the kingdom, fully worthy of deep attention; but we must leave all further notice of them to more professional pages.

Bridges most numerous, of brick, stone, wood, and iron, span and support our railways; probably not fewer than 15,000. On the eighty-two miles of the London and North Western Railway, lately the Grand Junction, there are 169 bridges, of which sixty-three are below the line. There are two or three bridges of such surpassing interest that we must devote some space to their individual notice. Each would have conferred immortal fame upon its architect; but all have instead combined to weave an unfading wreath of laurel for one man, Robert Stephenson. The High Level Bridge at Newcastle, the Conway, and the Britannia Tubular Bridges, are all the works of his hands.

A "high level" bridge across the Tyne, had long been a desideratum with the good folks of Newcastle, the old bridge suiting only the low districts of the opposite shores; and when it was determined to combine the termini of the neighbouring railways into one grand central station, it became necessary, in order to include the Darlington line, then terminating at Gateshead, to carry it over the river at a considerable altitude. Mr. R. Stephenson served, therefore, the common interest of the directors and townsmen by planning this ingenious structure, the first which unites the suspension with the ordinary principles of a viaduct. It is nearly 1,400 feet in length, and comprises a carriage-road as well as a railway. A level bridge for horses, vehicles, and foot-passengers, is constructed at the altitude of ninety feet from high tide level. Above this the railroad is carried at an additional height of twenty-five feet, the parapet of which is more than 130 feet from the river bed. In this structure the iron-work weighs nearly 5,000 tons, and the total cost of the bridge has been about 580,000*l.*

But this beautiful erection is greatly surpassed in interest by the tubular bridges on the Chester and Holyhead line. It is true these are not the first tubular bridges, for a wooden one was built over the Rhine, about two miles above Lanfen, in 1757, by a carpenter, John Ulrick Grubenman, the length of which was 353½ feet without support from below; but this is no prototype of the Britannia and Conway tubes. The latter and lesser of these "iron tunnels, hung up in the air across arms of the sea," is hung over the Conway, close under the old castle wall, at an elevation of eighteen feet above high-water level; its clear span being 400 feet. The bridge consists of two rectangular tubes, each 424 feet long, and fourteen feet wide, with an average height of twenty-four feet, and weighing 1,800 tons. In June 1846, the masonry was commenced, and on the 17th of November 1848, the first tube was adjusted; on which occasion a festival was given in honour of the engineer, where his father was present, George Stephenson. To him the enjoyment of that scene must have repaid his early denials for the sake of the son, whose reputation was thus gloriously advancing. Before the second tube was fixed, which took place on the 2d of November in the same year, the father's spirit was removed from participation in earthly honours, and the son's shaded by his irreparable loss! Since that date, with invariable safety, trains have shot through the double tunnel, nor has anything occurred to diminish confidence in the all-abundant strength of the iron passage; and, indeed, the most timid would feel satisfactorily assured of their security in transit from Chester to Conway by a brief glance at the rigid tests and experiments of Captain Simmons, the results of which are conclusive against all apprehension of danger. As the principles adopted in the construction of this bridge are identical with those of its gigantic neighbour, we need not, to describe them, delay longer our notice of the grander triumph.

North Wales was rich enough in varied attractions before the year 1845. Admirers of scenery soft and sublime; students of history, of language, of manners, of men; votaries of fancy or fishing; lovers of leeks, lakes, or learning; the antiquary and the engineer; all, and severally, found abundant charms in Taffylund. But, in 1845, the hero of Conway designed, the directors of the Chester and Holyhead Railway proposed, and the British senate decreed, an added beauty to her scenes, especially attractive to the noble corps of engineers. Telford had prepared mighty and beautiful objects to delight the civil race in this lovely region, but Stephenson crowned them with the hand that—

“Knots in the air with the bridge that it flings,
Two peaks far disrupted by ocean and skies.”

Beautiful were the Menai Straits, but not in the official eyes of the Chester and Holyhead Board. More lovely to them would have been a uniform level sward, solid and unyielding, instead of shelving shores and stormy seas, thought, by the majority to be superior elements of the picturesque; and next in beauty would they have ranked the bridge first planned by their engineer, of two cast-iron arches on piers of masonry. But not so the Admiralty. They could not suffer the navigation of the channel, always intricate, to be thus impeded; and put their veto on any erection which did not fulfil the condition of a clear height above high-water from shore to shore of 100 feet, and no centering. So Mr. Stephenson was referred back to his cogitations, which kindly devised for him and the company that remarkable manifestation of skill and genius—the Britannia Tubular

Bridge. That offspring of much gestation may be briefly outlined as two contiguous hollow beams supported by a mid-tower in the Menai Straits, by two side towers near the opposite shores, and two massive abutments at the extreme ends on solid land.

On the 30th June, 1845, the Parliament sanctioned this undertaking, and experiments were forthwith instituted to resolve upon the best form of structure. The bridge was actually commenced April the 13th, 1846; and on the 21st of the same month, Mr. Frank Foster laid the first stone on the Britannia Rock of the gigantic central tower. Midway between the Anglesey and Carnarvon shores, here 1,100 feet apart at high water, frowns this firm and rugged rock, (though said frowns are not always visible, his crest being ten feet beneath the stream at high-tide,) and he stood sponsor to the tower, conferring his own name, which the boisterous Straits ratified by christening with no sparing sprinkle. Rapid was the growth of this promising child; from his chlorite-schist cradle, thriving, not on Cheshire cheese, but Cheshire sandstone and Anglesey marble, he attained on June the 22d, 1849, the astonishing stature of 230 feet, on which day the last stone was laid by Mr. R. Stephenson. At the base, its dimensions were sixty-two feet by fifty-two, and it tapers upwards, measuring seven feet less each way at the entrance of the tubes. 20,000 tons of stone, and 387 of cast-iron, are worked into this lofty mass of masonry. The twin-towers, Carnarvon and Anglesey by name, stand each at the distance of 460 feet from their taller brother, their heads rising 190 feet above the level of high water. Their base is equal to the Britannia base, but they taper to fifty-five feet by thirty-two at the lower level of the tubes. Beyond these, east and west, the Carnarvonshire and Anglesey abutments are erected inland 230 feet from the respective towers. The height of each is 168½ feet, and their length 173 feet, including the wing walls, which terminate in a pair of handsome pedestals, each surmounted by a colossal lion couchant.

The masonry, though magnificent, is not the most extraordinary portion of the Britannia Bridge, the characteristic feature being the iron tunnels they support. To fulfil the Admiralty dictum, Mr. Stephenson bent his energies to devising a straight, not an arched erection. Strength, durability, and lightness were the objects to be attained in such a construction, and the engineer determined to avail himself of the well-known superiority of hollow beams to solid ones in their capability of resistance proportioned to their weight. This form being resolved upon, experiment soon decided in favour of wrought-iron as the material to be employed, on account of the great resistance this metal opposes to extension. Plates of malleable iron varying from six to twelve feet in length are chiefly employed, strongly rivetted together. Many and elaborate were the experiments directed and performed by Messrs. Stephenson, Fairbairn, Hodgkinson, E. and L. Clark, and other talented engineers, before the form of these aerial tubes, or rather passages, was fixed in detail. Cylindrical, elliptical, and rectangular hollow girders were fashioned, tested, and crushed beneath the unconscionable pressures with which they were overburdened, by the zeal of these earnest and untiring men; who finally found the strongest form to be the rectangular, which is consequently adopted. Furthermore, the top and bottom are composed of parallel cells; eight in number in the roof, and six in the floor, a contrivance that affords much additional strength. Each gallery complete consists of four separate tubes, one on either side of the Britannia-tower, extending to its appropriate land-tower, the length being 472 feet, and one from each land-tower to the corresponding inland abutment measuring 274 feet. Externally the width of each tube is fifteen feet. 65 miles of bars of iron have been used to connect the vertical sides of the cells with the upper and lower plates, and the rivets that unite the iron sheets consumed 126 miles, or 900 tons of rod-iron. They are seven-eighths of an inch in diameter, and were driven into the rivet-holes red-hot, that their contraction in cooling might compress the wrought-iron plates still more closely together. The whole weight of iron in these aerial tunnels exceeds 11,300 tons; but if they had been solid instead of hollow they would have bent beneath their own weight. Of the eight tubes, the four shortest were constructed on scaffolding in the respective positions they were intended permanently to occupy; but the four longest were built on platforms on the Carnarvon shore, and were thence floated on pontoons to the foot of the bridge. It was in June, 1847, that the first load of iron reached the Straits, and in June, 1849, the first tube was floated, and was finally secured in its airy resting-place on the following 9th of November.

Perhaps during the whole process of this undertaking, fraught as it is with unusual interest in every stage and detail, there were no portions more striking and critical than the floatings and elevations of the great central tubes. Sir Francis Head was an eye-witness on one of these occasions, and he has portrayed the scene with his usual graphic power. Truly it was no ordinary sight to witness the stately sailing of the huge metal mass towards its lofty home, and required, as it received the guidance of the best engineering genius of the day. Mr. Stephenson directed the whole proceedings; and Sir F. Head describes the movements of his arms by which he signified to his coadjutors how he wished them to regulate the speed. This telegraphic mode of action, it appears, was imagined by some of the spectators to result from a high degree of nervous excitement on the part of poor Mr. Stephenson. "Did'nt you observe," said one, "how he kept continually stretching out his arms, raising them up and then sinking them down? But no wonder, he was so agitated!" When Aquarius had borne his burden to the foot of the Britannia tower his aid was not dispensed with; indeed, the greatest service had yet to be accorded. After the aquatic excursion came the aeronautic trip; for this enormous gallery, weighing 1,800 tons, (the weight of each of the four longest sections,) had an upward journey exceeding 100 feet to accomplish; so, to give him a lift, Messrs. Easton and Amos, of Southwark, supplied a powerful hydraulic press, said to be the most mighty instrument existing. The engines applied to the force part of this press could drive the fluid, it is calculated, more than five times as high as the top of Snowdon. Upwards of 8,000 lbs. per square inch is the enormous pressure exerted by this machine, the whole lifting power of which is estimated at 2,622 tons.

In February, 1850, the second tube was deposited, and on March the 6th, a locomotive first flew across the Menai Straits. At half-past six a.m., the driver of that engine started with two other engines from the Bangor Station, all gaily decorated with union-jacks and foreign flags. That driver felt no fear in his trial trip; he urged neither steed nor stoker as he neared the novel tube, but at a steady, stately pace of some seven miles an hour, he boldly tested the strength of his own creation. It was Robert Stephenson. He was the first man that traversed with a steam-engine that spanning gallery. In the centre of each span the engines rested, but not the trace of a deflection could be detected. To prove the stability of the structure it was subjected to several severe ordeals, all establishing the complete success of the gigantic undertaking. During these tests an interesting episode occurred in the Carnarvon land-tube, where Mr. Mare, of Blackwall, the constructor of seven tubes out of the eight, inserted the last rivet, exactly the two-millionth, in its prepared home; Mr. Stephenson driving it in and clenching it amid the prolonged shouts of the assembled populace, reverberated by the bold hills of Carnarvon. On the Monday week following the "up line" was opened for public traffic. The third and fourth tubes were deposited on the 11th of July and 13th of September in the same year respectively; and on the 21st of October, 1850, the "down line" was permanently opened, and the Britannia bridge completed, little more than four years being occupied in the whole construction; about half the time required for the erection of Telford's beautiful Menai Suspension Bridge. Many similar and additional experiments were made on this occasion, and, among others, that of driving a heavily-loaded train throughout the tube at the highest attainable velocity; the result being a less amount of deflection than when the weight within the tube was stationary.

Those lovers of mountain and marine scenery whom the liberality of the London and North Western Company has induced to visit Bangor and Beaumaris, among other beauties of the principality, will feel peculiar interest in knowing that every section of this bridge through which they will be twice hurried, is constructed to bear a weight about nine times greater than it can ever be required to sustain, namely that of a train co-equal with itself in length. Indeed, Mr. Stephenson assures us that no part of the line is so competent for its work as the bridge between Carnarvon and Anglesey; while its lateral strength is far too considerable to admit of the least apprehension of danger from the severest hurricanes. From lion to lion the total length of the bridge is 1,841 feet, an extent which will be readily realised by those of our readers who remember that this measurement is exactly seven feet less than that of the Crystal Palace. The whole cost according to the official statement has been as follows:—

Masonry	£158,704
Iron used in tubes and towers	149,565
Construction of tubes	226,234
Pontoons, raising, machinery &c.	37,878
Carpentry and labour in floating, raising, and completing bridge)	25,498
Experiments	3,986
Total cost :	£601,865

There are very many curious and interesting details and peculiarities, besides observations and experiments, which we should be glad to describe could we afford the space, but must content ourselves with referring only to the ingenious method by which the ever-varying contraction and expansion of the metal, according to the temperature is provided for. The differences of length vary from half an inch to three inches, the maximum and minimum lengths being attained about three hours after noon and midnight. To meet this effect certain ends of the tubes are left loose, working on iron-rollers, with admirable contrivances for maintaining the true level of the line and ensuring safety to the passing trains.

Our railways abound with beauties, and we confess to no sympathy with those who think them antithetical to poesy, or destructive of the picturesque. A rail-train skirting the forest, winding among steep hills and above or beneath graceful bridges, with the stateliness of a floating giant of the deep, and the swiftness of a messenger of air, is an object of exceeding beauty; while to see it dashing into a dark vision-impenetrable tunnel, like some fabulous dragon hiding himself from heaven's light in his earth-rent cavern; or to watch the swift approach through the blackness of night of those fiercely-glaring, fiery, blood-red eyes—to hear the rattling thunder of the monster as in one pulse-beat he rushes past—and then to lose him as instantaneously as though its air-rending shriek had opened a chasm which engulfed the black, half visionary, land-leviatian, approaches, nay, attains sublimity.

Hans Christian Andersen has admirably described a railway ride:—"The first sensation," he says, "is that of a very gentle motion in the carriages, and then the chains are attached which bind them together; the steam whistle sounds again and we move on, at first but slowly, as if a child's hand drew a little carriage. The speed increases imperceptibly, but you read in your book, look at your map, and as yet do not rightly know at what speed you are going, for the train glides on like a sledge over the level snow-field. You look out of the window and discover that you are careering away as with horses at full gallop; it goes still quicker; you seem to fly; but here is no shaking, no suffocation, nothing of what you anticipated would be unpleasant. What was that red thing which darted like lightning close past us? It was one of the watchmen, who stood there with his flag. Only look out, and the nearest ten or twenty yards you see is a field which looks like a rapid stream; grass and plants run into each other. We have an idea of standing outside of the globe and seeing it turn round; it pains the eye to keep it fixed for a long time in the same direction It is as if town lay close to town; now comes one, then another. One can imagine the flight of birds of passage—they must leave towns behind thus. . . . And as to all the poetry of travelling being lost, I am quite of the contrary opinion. It is in the narrow, close packed diligences that poetry vanishes: we become dull; we are plagued with heat and dust in the best season of the year, and in winter by bad heavy roads; we do not see nature itself in a wider extent, but in longer draughts than in a railway carriage. Oh, what a noble and great achievement of the mind is this production! we feel ourselves as powerful as the sorcerers of old! we put our magic horse to the carriage, and space disappears; we fly like the clouds in a storm—as the bird of passage flies! Our wild horse snorts and snuffs, and the dark stream rushes out of his nostrils. Mephistopheles could not fly quicker with Faust on his cloak! I can remember but a few times in my life that ever I felt myself so affected as I was on this railroad journey; I felt a devotion, such as when a child I have felt in the church alone; and when older in the sun-illuminated forest, or on the sea in a dead calm and starlight night."

Truly "space disappears" beneath the strides of our "magic horse," and we feel scarcely startled by the assertion which has been made, that "it will be literally easier, and take less time, to travel than to stay at home." What different geographical ideas the next generation will imbibe from their "Goldsmith's" and "Guy's" to some of our hazy visions of distance! Mile-reckoning will be eschewed, and minute-measure established. Butler's Atlas must be superseded by Bradshaw's Guide, with a universal railway frontispiece; and the infant mind will describe the mutual distances of nations by the time in which express trains perform the journey between them. "Capital cities" and "chief towns" will become obsolete terms, and "central" and "minor stations" will bother instead the brains of childhood. What may we not prophesy of the future from that we witness around us? The journey from London to Paris has already been performed in nine hours. Only the other day our Exhibition Commissioners were whirling over the "pale iron edge" on their way to the gay capital at a velocity of sixty-six miles an hour. The night-mail regularly reaches Paris in twelve hours; while the express trains travel to Southampton at the rate of about forty-five miles an hour, to Dover at forty-eight and a half miles an hour, and to Exeter at nearly fifty-two miles an hour; and in experimental trips even seventy miles an hour has been exceeded. But does not this tearing pace wear out mortal man, and seem better adapted for rockets or cannon balls than flesh and blood? Is it not at least subversive of all ease, comfort, and tranquillity? "While the train," says a reviewer, "is thus almost on the wing, beating the eagle in its flight, the passengers are reclining in their easy chairs, thinking or sleeping, reading or writing, as if they were in their own happy homes—safer indeed than there, for thieves cannot rob them by day, nor burglars alarm them by night. The steam horse starts neither at the roar of the thunderstorm, nor the flash of its fire. Draughts of a purer air expel the marsh poison from its seat before it has begun the work of death; and, surrounded by conductors, the delicate and timid traveller looks without dismay on the forked messenger of destruction, twisting the spire or rending the oak, or raging above the fear-stricken dwellings of man."

Nor is it passengers only, "the least transportable species of luggage," who speed from town to town with such rapidity. Ponderous loads of merchandise, perhaps 300 tons in weight, surpass the most extraordinary feats of swiftness our fleetest messengers could accomplish before the iron monarch waved his snowy plume. This branch of traffic is not confined to bulky articles. More than two thousand parcels are booked daily at the Euston Station, and the entire arrangements are so complete that not more than one parcel in four hundred thousand is lost.

Certainly the velocity attained is scarcely more striking than the immense cargoes, animal, vegetable, and mineral, that are now transported daily and nightly between all parts of the kingdom; which results as much from the great reduction of cost in money as from the diminished expenditure of time. Not only is merchandise conveyed as far in one hour as it travelled formerly by the best waggons in a day, but the charge made is now about three-pence a ton per mile where, eighty or ninety years ago, it was five times that sum; and it has been calculated for the two years ending 30th of June, 1848, that nearly seventeen millions was actually saved by passengers in rail-trains of what they would have expended had they travelled by stage coach—the saving being about seven-tenths of the actual outlay! We need not wonder, then, at the enormous increase of passengers, who last year were nearly treble the number booked in 1843 in the United Kingdom; for, in 1850, they greatly exceeded sixty-six millions. The total amounts of the yearly traffic received by the railway companies of Great Britain and Ireland correspond in magnitude and progression. The annual increase of the sums received is upwards of a million sterling. In the year ending 30th June, 1850, the total receipts for passengers and goods was 12,407,853*l.*; of which more than half was paid by passengers.

One of the most interesting developments of our new system of transit is the excursion train, which has obtained, in a remarkably short space of time, very extensive public support. Most marvellous are the invitations of the more liberal and enterprising of our railway companies; and not less astonishing are the swarming responders who besiege the London termini—portals to them of every variety of beauty in nature and art. Hence the trains and sets of trains conveying their two, three, even six thousand passengers to or from the metropolitan centre. Is it an afternoon's excursion that is desired, O denizen of London? You may go to Hampton Court and back, (thirty miles,) for one shilling. A sea-breeze? Take a ticket for Hastings; you pay five shillings for your 150 miles. Or have Oxford's glories excited your curiosity? For three-and-sixpence the intervening sixty-three miles are travelled twice over. Do you want more for your money, and a peep at Salisbury Cathedral? The same sum will defray the cost of your journey, and afford you nearly a 200 miles ride. If your friends, on the other hand, politely recommend you to "go to Bath," and you wish to oblige them, your journey there and back, (213 miles,) will cost you the modest sum of five shillings. Now-a-days, a scanty purse and a short leisure will not hide from you the lovely valleys of Hope and Hathersage, of Borrowdale and Patterdale, of Llanberis and Festiniog; or the bold summits of the Peak, of Snowdon, of Helvellyn, of Saddleback, and Skiddaw.

The democratic effect of these steam-trips in the present days for the millions, when,

"Her Majesty's carriage, though fit up in style, Goes by just the same line as the penny-a-mile," is amusingly exemplified by Mr. Laing, who describes a Rhine steam-boat scene in his "Observations on Europe." After depicting an English exclusive he proceeds to "The German potentate, who at home sits in whiskered magnificence at the window of his schlon, and may count every shirt laid on the green to bleach within the circle of his hereditary dominions and territorial sway, condescends, in these days of speed and economy, to save his state revenues and travel by steam to visit his crowned cousins. Seated in the saloon of a Rhine steam-boat, he stares over his tawny mustachios, like an owl in a withered beech-hedge, at the free and easy crowd of passengers of all ranks and countries who seem quite insensible of their proximity to so much grandeur. He discovers, perhaps, in his all-engrossing, talkative, vis-à-vis neighbour at dinner, whom the waiters fly to serve, the thriving draper of his own village metropolis, returning from Manchester with a fresh stock of goods and assurance, with which he feels quite at his ease, and sits altogether unannihilated in the sublime presence. Nay, horror of horrors! the fellow calls for a bottle of higher-priced wine than his Serene Highness is drinking; nods, actually nods, to the thrice illustrious Herr; tells him they must have seen each other somewhere before, and proposes a glass to their better acquaintance! Where will the influence of steam-power end?"

Notwithstanding the multitude of runners to and fro on the face of the earth, and the immense power of the newly developed agency of traffic, the risk and danger to the necks and limbs of prudent passengers is extremely small; and, owing to improvements in system, knowledge, and practice, these risks are still diminishing. In 1848 the proportion of passengers injured on all our lines, by accidents beyond their control, was one in every 452,818; the proportion killed, one in 6,440,087. In 1849 only one in 760,018 was injured, and one only in 12,768,308 passengers lost his life by such accidents. Railway riding is the safest as well as the most expeditious and cheapest mode of travel yet discovered. This the public are beginning to understand and appreciate; though the faith of many as well as the persons of few may be somewhat shaken now and then by "another dreadful collision," to be accounted for, perhaps, by the couplet a stoker writes to a friend in our merriest periodical,— "Sometimes, Jem, I own with our puffin' and strivin'
We thinks too much of speed, and too little of drivin'."

There may be a few folk still remaining who sympathise in the old lady's feelings that refused to travel by railroads because she "didn't believe in 'em;" and there are many more to whom the truths of our new art of locomotion are not brought home. They cannot rid themselves of the old notions of distances and fatigues; nor can be persuaded that any journey of twenty miles and upwards can be other than "a great undertaking." But considerable advances are already made in familiarizing men's minds with the real expedition and ease of visiting those dear friends and scenes they have been wont to consider as enviously separated from them by floods, fields, and other obstacles, requiring much expenditure of time and great screwing-up of enterprise to overcome.

Still, as yet, we are but in the infancy of steam traffic. Railways beget travellers, and travellers extend railways; the most civilized countries, as was to be expected, are in the van, but their sphere is enlarging with accelerated rapidity, more than a thousand miles annually being added to their length. After the United States and England comes Germany, with 8500 miles of rails projected, more than half being completed. France, with upwards of 3,500 miles planned; mostly working. Russia has 1,400 miles open, or in course of construction. Belgium, 500 miles open. Italy has 150 miles executed. Spain, at present, boasts only of eighteen miles; but 800 miles have been laid down in Cuba.

Think of the impetus given to every variety of human intercourse when the continental systems of railway are complete; when not only the Panama railway is opened, (which it is expected to be next year,) but also that uniting Cairo with Alexandria, for which preparations are already making; when the proposed Ostend and Calcutta line is constructed, bringing Hindostan within seven days' ride of London; when Asa Whitney's Atlantic and Pacific Railway, (a most novel, gigantic, and though, prima facie, extravagant, really feasible scheme) is not only feasible but fact!

Is not the Electric Telegraph an incorporated portion of the railway system? It would scarcely be excusable here to omit mentioning this wonderful invention by which we beat time hollow.

"Time and tide wait for no man," but the lightning messenger gives time the go-by, and, in America, beats him by "long chalks." A message sent from Boston at ten o'clock a.m. reaches New Orleans at half-past nine the same morning, beating time by half an hour. In America more than 10,000 miles of wire are laid down, the cost in that country being only about thirty pounds a mile. In England, where the cost is 150*l.* per mile, scarcely a quarter of that extent is in operation. From the chief station in Lothbury,—which like a great spider in the centre of his web, feels at the end of every thread what is transpiring around,—news are spread instantaneously to the confines of the kingdom. At eight o'clock a.m. Edinburgh knows the principal contents of the London Journals; and even Dublin, separated by the sea, had the Queen's Parliament Speech in print eight hours after it was delivered in the House of Lords. But salt-water is to oppose no retardation. St. George's Channel, as well as Dover Straits, is to become a site for that strangest marvel, the submarine telegraph; and it is seriously proposed to lay down wires between the United Kingdom and United States. It is said thirty-six distinct wires, making a total length of 120,000 miles, may be safely trusted beneath the Atlantic billows, protected by gutta-percha. The work would be guaranteed to endure for ten years, and might be completed in two, and the whole outlay is estimated at 600,000*l.* Really Lord Palmerston couldn't have been joking in talking of the day when, "If he were asked a question about India he should say, 'Wait a moment while I telegraph the Governor-general, and I'll tell you!'" Of clairvoyants the "occupation's gone," the electric telegraph has rendered us independent of them; just as steam, by almost conferring universal ubiquity upon us, inspires contempt for the seven-league boots so often sighed after in childhood. From electric telegraphs will flow repression of fraud and prevention of violence, in addition to much commercial advantage and social happiness.

What gigantic promises loom upon us through the atmosphere of steam! we would fain indulge in tracing their outlines, but must prepare instead to conclude our sketches of some of the Triumphs of Steam, in its appliance to locomotion, and space compels us to confine our remarks on their resulting effect in a very small compass.

Which are the leading characteristics of our new mode of transport? Immensely improved regularity, accommodation, cheapness, and speed. Let us reflect how these tend to diminish the evils and augment the enjoyments of life. It is evident that the inconvenience and sorrows of separation between friends are materially lessened as the opportunities of meetings are multiplied, and their anxiety allayed as increased facilities of communication, personal and postal, are afforded, and which would therefore be embraced when cause for anxiety really exists. The swift transmission of letters, as well as the reduced rates of postage, tends greatly to their multiplication. John o'Groats and Land's End may communicate in as short intervals as correspondents between Stepney and Hammersmith could rail at, sympathise, or advise with one another but a very few years ago. As respects personal intercourse, journeys no longer entail personal difficulty or fatigue in the regions of railways. The comfort, ease, and safety of travelling attained is marvellous. Travellers are multiplied by the moderate cost of transit, and the increase in their numbers re-acts in further reducing prices. The cost saved by this reduction of rates throughout the kingdom is very considerable, and, of course, remains for employment in other branches of industry. It is obvious that the diminished cost of transport lowers to, at least, the same extent the price of the article to the consumer. In that important necessary, fuel, the chief expense is the carriage; and greatly is the comfort of the poor enhanced by a cheap supply of this commodity. Further, the consumer is benefited by depending no longer on a limited, local, and precarious supply. There will be fewer contingencies of scarcity of any particular product, and of unequal plenty, as markets for supply and consumption will be multiplied to every town, village, and province, by the facility of access now extended to greatly increased distances, thus enlarging in like degree the available field of commercial intercourse. Thus the producer derives corresponding advantages. His goods are transmitted with safety and celerity to more distant markets; nor can his supplies be too abundant, even though of a perishable nature, since he has access to an area with scarcely assignable limitations. Cattle can now be conveyed to distant towns, cheaper by from two to ten per cent., at far less risk, and in a more healthy condition, than by driving; and many fresh sources of industry and traffic have dated their origin from the establishment of railways. Land is advanced in value; much that had hitherto been left waste as uncultivable has been brought into cultivation by the cheap conveyance of chalk, limestone, and manure with which it is rendered fertile; and country towns are improved by the lighting, buildings, bridges, &c., for which to the railways they are indebted.

The employment afforded to a large class of our population is another point of view by no means to be overlooked. Upwards of sixty thousand persons are permanently engaged on our railways. Including those employed in the construction of new lines, and taking into consideration the probable number dependent on the employé, fully one-fiftieth of the whole population, Dr. Lardner reckons, were supported in 1848 by the railways of the United Kingdom. Prominent among the blessings conferred are the opportunities presented to town-pent men, who toil with head or hands, of breathing pure air and refreshing their fagged faculties, mental and physical, with the invigorating beauties of country scenes, while their families share in a still greater degree the health-bestowing benefits. Gradually the poorer classes will partake of this advantage, workmen's villages will spring up, and cheap workmen's trains convey them to their respective scenes of labour. In the governmental departments of the country the rapidity of intelligence is invaluable, especially with the powers now possessed of transferring and concentrating large bodies of men, troops or police, when required, for the suppression of disorder and local disturbance. Increased traffic must eventually annihilate the vexatious passport system; and will no doubt materially help to eradicate the clumsy machinery of fiscal taxes, the expenses of collecting which will be saved to the people by the establishment of a direct system of taxation.

If we regard the effects of our improved methods of transport on the moral interests of the community, we shall find at least as much reason for congratulation. Habits of order, punctuality, and systematic industry are inculcated. Education penetrates the old fastnesses of ignorance, and dislodges prejudice and crime. Lessened labour, more abundant supplies—of not only the necessaries, but the conveniences, and even the refinements of life—improve the appearance and condition of the people, and increase their self-respect and good order. Their minds become enlarged by greater variety of scenes and intercourse. Degraded pleasures are less relished and less sought after. Innocent and healthful recreations, as well as being the least costly, will promote the happiness of individuals, and augment considerably that of their families, who will receive, in consequence, better training than they could otherwise have done. All these circumstances tend to diminish the country's criminal list, and, therefore, to reduce the civil army arrayed against crime; and as much will national crime be repressed, and the more gigantic and sanguinary armies of the earth, to a still greater extent, will become disbanded. What is the result? Besides the inestimable blessing of peace, the expense of maintaining troops is spared the people, and men are given us to assist with their labour, in obtaining and elaborating the products of our bounteous earth. Thus, mutual action and reaction advances social progress, nor can we attempt to pursue, much less to limit, the extent of the powerful agencies now being developed among us.

What steam-traffic has done, is doing, and will do, are subjects intensely interesting to the trader, to the politician, and especially to the friend of human progress, the lover of mankind. Replete with realized enjoyment and joyful promise are these avenues of thought, leading us, the farther we penetrate and the more diligently we explore them, into ever new and increasingly beautiful aspects of view, where visions clearer and more clear unfold themselves—not cheats of the imagination, but naturally arising from the agencies witnessed at work around us—and all declaring tendency to that promised consummation of the ways of Providence towards man, when ultimately this fair earth shall be purified and perfected, and enjoyed by those happy children of men—

“The crowning race

Of those that, eye to eye, shall look
On knowledge, under whose command
Is earth and earth's, and in their hand
Is nature open like a book.

No longer half akin to brute,
For all we thought, and loved, and did,
And hoped and suffer'd, is but seed
Of what in-them is flower and fruit.”

The pen of the poet alone, “faithful and far-seeing,” can portray, with any measure of success, the hopes that continually expand as contemplation is indulged of what these new powers and stirrings among men are destined to achieve. To some minds, railways and steam ships are interesting only through the medium of shares and dividends; to others, their prominent advantage is their aid in a day's pleasuring; to many more, they are contributors of various enjoyments, themselves being neither thanked nor thought of; but to the thinking observer of the times they unfold their true character as leading instruments in the regeneration of the world.

Society is already becoming penetrated with the influences of steam-traffic throughout every ramification—influences which it cannot be doubted must spread to every habitable speck upon the globe. No race nor class of men can be excluded from participating in the vast benefits that shall be conferred. We might rather say, races and classes shall exist no more; social distances, like physical distances, shall be annihilated; and the grand result of railroads, (of levelling tendencies, moral as well as material,) and their accessories, in fewest words may be described as moulding all mankind into one affectionate family, and universalizing to each member the abounding products and loveliness of their many-climbed and beautiful earth-home. Human life is becoming lengthened, strengthened, and more happy. The sources of enjoyment are daily increasing. Man sees more, hears more, learns more, achieves and enjoys far more in a limited time, than he could have done in any other age. Is not this living longer?

“We live in deeds, not years; in thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.

We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives
Who thinks most—feels the noblest—acts the best.”

Above all, steam-power will cement the interests of men of all colours and climes; uniting the scattered threads of nations into one common cord, to the increase of strength and unity of purpose, and binding the prospering earth together in peace, happiness, and good-will. We consider it a mighty instrument, bestowed by Heaven upon men, to mitigate the original curse of toil pronounced on our race in Eden, and to soften—perhaps to annul the further curse drawn down by the impiousness of our forefathers around the Babel tower, when the human family was confused, scattered, and divided. By the powers now entrusted to us shall they again be united together in mutual dependence; the arts of peace and civilization will be spread and multiplied, and the knowledge of Christianity universally extended—promulgated, not by the tardy though heroic labours of a few isolated missionaries, but by the free intercourse of all Christendom with the heathen nations of the earth, and the mingling of idolaters with the scenes and people of our Christian lands. The re-union of mankind thus established shall never again be dissolved, weakened, or disturbed, till the old heavens and the old earth shall pass away, and that better country shall appear, visions of which we are encouraged to cherish by the Holy Book of inspired Revelation.

In concluding our sketch of steamboats and railways, incomplete and imperfect as it must necessarily be, we nevertheless trust that sufficient interest has been eliminated to invite some minds to pursue more in detail, in other spheres and different aspects, the action, influence, and mission, the wonders, and the Triumphs of Steam.

B.

GOING! GONE!!

I NEVER had the honour of seeing or hearing George Robins, and I rather think, that if allowed the choice of when and where I should have enjoyed that privilege, I should not have cared for seeing him in the rostrum. Robins shone more in print than in his sale-room, the aristocratic character of his audiences preventing those familiarities in illustration which the critical desiderate in a model auctioneer. But there was one occasion on which I should have been glad to have seen the renowned knight of the hammer. It was at an annual meeting of the shareholders of Drury Lane. Lord Byron, Hobhouse, and other literati, with a laudable view to the elevation of the drama, had consented to become members of the managing committee, and on the faith of their efficiency, George had purchased certain shares. The day of reckoning came, and the noble and learned committee had to meet their constituents. The utilitarian capitalist listened with great patience to the details of what had been done for the restoration of “the legitimate,” but no mention was made of a dividend, and on his receiving a negative reply to his express inquiry on this point, the look of contempt which Robins cast on Lord Byron and his coadjutors, must have been rich beyond description.

I have alluded to the tight-lacedness of high-class auctioneers, and accordingly, I do not mean to call attention to them or their doings, but will restrict myself to the sayings and actings of some of the more humble professors of the art. I lately heard of one member of the fraternity, whom it might be worth a walk of some miles to behold. He was selling some ready-made clothes, and excited the feelings of his audience by the bold statements which he thundered in their ears.

"Them clothes is unkimmin cheap—there never vas the like on them before, and there never vill be the like again. Them clothes, ladies and gen'lmen, vas made by people as vorks under ground nine days in the veek, keeps themselves in wittels, hasks no vages, and in these dull times werry glad to get a job too, I can tell you." None of Mr. Mayhew's social pictures can at all approach to this.

To proceed however to personal sketches. No. 1 was a youth who owned a donkey-cart filled with crockery-ware, whose system of business was amusing in the extreme. Halting at a crowded corner of the street, he mounted his vehicle and shouted out, "Here ye are!" and then spinning round a plate on the point of his forefinger, he jerked it up in the air several times, and then ended this part of the performance, by kicking it to pieces with his foot. By the time this feat was accomplished, a sufficient crowd had collected, and the sale commenced.

"Here ye are! look at this brown basin. Two and six for the basin, two and five, two and four, two and three, two and two, two and one, two! No! Well then, sixpence for the basin! five, four, three, two! one penny for the basin! No! not one penny for the basin? De'il a hair I care!" And with an action suitable to this irreverent remark, the brown basin was tossed over the heads of the spectators and shivered to pieces. The effect of this pantomime was striking. Women declaimed in loud chorus at such a wanton destruction of property, and men looked thoughtful and grave.

"Oh mau, dinna brak the things," was the imploring request of one Abigail.

Another brown basin sprang into the air, but was dexterously caught, and then the bidding began in good earnest, and generally was kept up with such spirit, as to preclude the necessity of sacrificing any more cracked ware; for although it may detract from the poetry of the narrative, truth requires us to state that those pieces only were made to describe the hyperbolic curve, which the young gentleman previously knew to be defective.

No. 2. Tommy East was a stationary, not a peripatetic vendor, and was amongst the first of his class who attracted my attention. He had a pale face and lack-lustre eye, and a monotonous nasal tone, which never by possibility varied one note. He was a sort of automatic auctioneer, no emotions being visible in his face, and the only thing that moved about his whole body was his lower jaw, and the hammer when it sounded the final "Gone!" To have an idea of Tommy's oratory, his harangues would require to be read not only without punctuation, but even without spaces between the different words. Thus:—

"Here's a watch five shillings for the watch, five and six so you may. Dont stand at the door there good people, like likelike — the farend of a fiddle. Five and six — don't likespeaking at a sale—oftendone for a purpose. Several respectable people got their pockets picked last night. Five and eight thank you. Going all done at five and eight, ten then gone! Much good may it do you buyers pay the duty."

No. 3. Mr. Tuckey belonged to a different order. He had a well-developed person, copiously adorned with Brummagen jewellery, and he essayed connexion with the higher walks of the profession. He generally sold the stocks of large dealers, who accompanied him from town to town, and looked after goods and cash at one and the same time. Mr. Tuckey did not relish this surveillance, but nevertheless he had to submit. The point in Mr. Tuckey's rhetoric consisted in his extreme unwillingness to "throw away" so many valuable articles for a "mere nothing."

"Ladies and gentlemen, the next lot is three trays, real papier maché. None of your imitations, ladies and gentlemen, but the real sterling article, on my honour. At the wholesale manufactory, these trays are sold to dealers at one guinea each."

Proprietor. A guinea and a half.

"This gentleman, my friend here, ladies and gentlemen, says that the wholesale price is a guinea and a half; on my conscience I believe it is, but I am always unwilling to have the appearance of exaggerating. At the manufactory they sell at one guinea and a half each; now I am willing—nay, I am ashamed to mention it—I assure you, ladies and gentlemen, I do it with the utmost reluctance, but if it were not that the whole stock must be sold off on Friday by twelve o'clock, I would not—positively I would not—put up these valuable articles—the last set we have, positively the last of the many we had—and I am willing to put them up at one guinea—one guinea for the whole lot."

Here the proprietor groans.

"My friend's feelings are hurt, and no wonder. If I were not used to it, I could not do these things without blushing. To think of these three papier maché trays with chinese patterns being offered for one guinea—it passes comprehension, positively it does, ladies and gentlemen. In the shops they would sell at three pounds each—now do not offer sixpences or shillings, but let your advances be in crown pieces for these valuable articles. One guinea and no advance! none, no advance, none! can I believe my senses, ladies and gentlemen? Well, make me an offer, make me an offer, do pray."

Voice. Seven and sixpence.

Proprietor turns his eye upwards in silent horror.

"Seven and sixpence! Sir, you are pleased to be facetious—however, just for the joke of the thing we shall say seven and six. I shall probably offend my friend, but for the joke, I'll put them up at the trifle named. Seven and six, seven and six! Now positively, having put them up, I will sell them—I will do it. Ladies and gentlemen" (with great solemnity), "will you stand by and see me throw these things away? I am serious—upon my honour I never was more serious in my life—I will do it. This is too much! You are not believing me, I see you are not, but I tell you I will throw these articles away if you don't interpose immediately—I will do it. The last call, seven and six, office, twice, thrice!"

Proprietor wipes his forehead, and produces other three of similar pattern.

"Miracles never cease. I thought the last was the last of these valuable articles, but here is another set of the same choice pattern. I love a joke as well as most people, but you will not expect that I should put up these at the same ludicrous, absurd sum as before," &c. &c.

No. 4. Joe Hadley was a stoneware dealer, who purchased and sold on his own account. He was a Dutch-built personage, with short legs, and seen from the chest upwards, had on the platform the appearance of a tall man, although in reality he was short and squat. Joe's voice was cracked, and he spoke with his mouth twisted to one side, and laboured hard in his vocation. As he warmed with his holding forth, he undid his neckerchief, then doffed his coat, then unbuttoned his waistcoat, each fresh item of disrobing producing an immediate extension of his harsh and dissonant tones. Joe used no hammer, but proclaimed the striking of a bargain by a tremendous clap of his hands. His elocution was more curious from manner than matter.

"Make me an offer for them two jugs—real ironstone—a fact, I assure you—they might be an ornament to any drawing-room. Come, speak up; don't be alarmed, ladies. They're worth a crown the pair, but I'll put 'em up at sixpence. No advance! Well then, a bawbee! Are you pleased now? or would you have me to give you them for nothink, and then pay you for the trouble of taking them away? I don't care for money. I don't, I assure you. I have lost five hundred pounds of goods, them was all blowed down in one night, and I never said a word. Am I to be kept standing here all night?—if there's no business to be done, far better that you go home, and I go in to supper; fact, I assure you. Them two jugs, I won't take them in again at no rate—I wouldn't do it, I assure you. But I must have an advance on a bawbee."

Voice. "A penny."

Joe smacked his hands with fearful energy.

No. 5 was a book auctioneer. Bill Gillespie was a great economist of his lungs, and would make the vital force expended by Joe Hadley in one night serve him for a whole week. Bill addressed his hearers in a conversational tone, and was the very personification of coolness. His books, for the most part, were not of a high order, but he made the most of them by descriptions avowedly quizzical.

"What have we here? Let me see. 'A Grammar of the Turkish language.' A most interesting publication this, gentlemen. Those of you who want to go and convert the Mahommedans, could not do better than present yourselves with this interesting volume. Shall we say three shillings for this excellent work?—or shall we say sixpence? Nobody says nothing for this curious duodecimo? Well, that is extraordinary. A Turkish grammar—and I see it also has an appendix—going for one sixpence! This is the true shop for the diffusion of useful knowledge, but if you don't want knowledge, I must put up my shutters. Make me an offer for this rare volume."

Voice. "Threepence."

"It is yours. Here followeth what? 'Debates on the Corn-laws for six nights in the House of Commons,' containing a great deal of sence, and I dare say a great deal of nonsense. Well, it's the way of the world. Shall we say sixpence for this performance?—or one penny? Nobody says one penny for six nights' speeches? Take away the speeches, as the speeches are not wanted. What is this now? 'The distressed State of the Orkney and Shetland Islands.' Ah! gentlemen, this is a valuable work; it describes the sufferings of that interesting people; it is a rare, picked copy, and as clean as paint,—very possibly because the gentleman who first bought it never read it."

Voice. "Let me look at it."

"Havon't time, my dear sir. Shall we say half-a-crown for this unique tome?—or shall we say fourpence? The Orkney and Shetland Islands in distress, and no man cares fourpence for their sorrows!"

Voice. "I'll give you a penny."

"Two islands in distress, and only one penny offered! Gentlemen, what are things coming to? Sir, the treasure is yours for one penny. Now, what have we now? 'Gisborne's Sermons on Domestic Duties.' This comes home to us all. A volume of excellent sermons which any gentleman may read at home, if detained by sickness or bad weather. A portrait of the author too, evidently a peaceable old gentleman. Shall we say one shilling? Very fine subjects, 'Wisdom cryeth aloud in the streets,'—tippence!—'Disobedience to Parents;' listen to that, young men in the corner. Tippence for 'Virtue its own Reward,' to say nothing of the other discourses in this well-known work. Gentlemen, it's not poetry that I am offering to you, it's sermons. Tippence! Do I address any Divinity students—here's models of eloquence for you, and all for tippence! The country is going down. Take away Gisborne's Sermons till better days dawn on us."

I shall now add a few words on the philosophy of auctions. In the exhibitions of the grade I have referred to, the spectator may derive much instruction and amusement. The person who can, night after night, draw together motley crowds, every one of whom knows that his object is a crusade against their pockets, can be no ordinary artist. No advertisement or catalogue heralds the approach of these sales. When other shops shut, the auction shop opens, the red flag is, pirate-like, run up at the door, the crier takes his station underneath, and forthwith the traffic begins. People who go to lounge, remain to buy, and the most determined opponents of the system will melt if they come within the sphere of its influence, just as certainly as Franklin turned out the contents of his purse at the charity sermon of Whitefield. Mere buttoning of the pockets will not do when one goes to a sale; he must denude himself of bullion altogether if he means to keep out of temptation—and even this extreme precaution will be useless, if he happens to be known to the officiating functionary. Nay, we have even heard of instances where a purchaser giving his card, and having an honest-looking physiognomy, at once obtained unbounded credit, and paid dearly for the compliment implied in this liberality. On the whole then the safest course, and we speak from long experience, is to go armed with a few shillings, and with a determination rigid as flint, not to exceed in expenditure the amount thus carried about the person.

Auctioneers behold many illustrations of humanity in its sinful and suffering phases. They preside at the breaking-up of many happy homes. They are privy to the despair of the bankrupt, and to the tears of the emigrant—and they preside over the final scattering of the chattels of those who have outlived friends and relations, and have wearily spent the last grains of the sand of life, amidst the cold looks of a new and unknown generation.

"Talk of friendship!" said a salesman to us, "why, I have known old files who entertained their friends by the score, and then when they died, and their effects came to be sold, how coolly would these old and tried guests look on! The bamboo cane of their friend, if it went above a couple of shillings, would pass into the hands of a stranger, his watch would be bought by a pawnbroker, and the curious old rummers that they so often drank out of, would be allowed to be carried off by some old crone of a furniture-dealer, with a black bonnet."

As affecting economical science, much might be said on the subject of auctions. No one dreams of hanging on at such exhibitions, except with the view of obtaining at a cheap rate something that may prove useful or ornamental. Professional attendants,—by which we mean, those who purchase with the intention of selling again—will rarely make mistakes; but amateurs, who constitute the bulk of the auctioneer's audience, must and do make many blunders. Let any one possessing furniture two or three years old make the experiment of selling off, and although the gross return may not equal the original cost, he will be surprised to find that certain articles, such as carpets, dining tables, &c. bring a higher price after being used by him, than he paid for them when new. These are the inconsistencies of frail humanity—in the race for cheapness, people become excited and forget what they are doing. Another shilling, crown, or pound, is nothing in the reasoning of such persons; according to them, the rope should go with the bucket, but in their hurry they forget that the last straw breaks the camel's back, and that the additional coin brings up the article to retail price. As a set-off against this class, there is a numerous section of the community who make a covenant with their person, and who will, on no account, enter within the precincts of a sale-room. "Time is money," say these utilitarian persons; "the time that we spend in such places waiting for a windfall, might be more profitably occupied in attending to our own business; and supposing we do get the article cheap at last (of which, however, there is only a chance), the lost time is worth more than the saving effected." There is no use in discussing the question with such mathematical casuists—the auction is to them at best a peradventure, and they will not risk a stiver on the probability of the reversion. Of course, the amusement of the scene goes for nothing, for we are speaking of persons whose eye never glistens, whose cheeks never flush, and whose sculpturesque visages no smile ever irradiates. They are of the earth, earthy; and know of no enjoyment apart from their money-bags. We, therefore, finally turn to the median types of the human family, those who run not to the extreme of extravagance or parsimony; and to them we say, that if they wish to unbend from the realities of this stern world, they might do worse than to turn aside occasionally, and listen to the echoes of the Going! GONE!! of the Cheap Jacks.

ANECDOTES AND APHORISMS.¹

COLERIDGE, on one occasion, asked:—"Why are not more gems from our great authors scattered over the country? Great books," he continues, "are not in everybody's reach; and though it is better to know them thoroughly, than to know them only here and there, yet it is a good work to give a little to those who have neither time nor means to get more. Let every book-worm, when in any fragrant scarce old tome he discovers a sentence, a story, an illustration that does his heart good, hasten to give it."

Setting forth with this quotation, Miss Sinclair has here collected and put together a great number of anecdotes, incidents, aphorisms, and instructive sentences, which she has met with in the course of her varied reading, and considers worthy of being repeated and remembered. The collection is in some respects creditable to her judgment and good taste; though we not unfrequently come upon some rather stale, as well as indifferent remarks and sayings. For instance, that famous despotic dictum of Louis XIV.,—"L'état, c'est moi!"—now so hacknied and familiar as scarcely to deserve the gravity of being printed by itself. One suspects that the collector must have entered it in her common-place book at a very tender age, and, finding it there, has printed it with something of her first respect for its smartness and singularity. A great many passages might be given which appear open to the same objection; and indeed we think that the volume has throughout an air of "book-making" which, in such a work, it was doubtless very difficult to avoid, but which nevertheless might have been rendered something less apparent, had the compiler exercised a more rigid and critical discrimination. Some of the anecdotes are particularly "scedy" —by which expressive vulgarity we mean, metaphoricly threadbare and worn out by previous repetition —while others are singularly pointless and utterly uninteresting. A few look like our old acquaintances in the pages of Joseph Miller, and are, of course, known and recollected more or less by everybody.

But apart from the inutility, tameness, and commonplace of many of the graver extracts, and the perplexing want of point in many of the anecdotes, we have to complain that Miss Sinclair, from what seems to be a loose habit of entry, often deprives even a tolerable thing of such actual force and pith as it originally possessed. As a case in point we take the following:—"A prosing tedious old gentleman, who had been tolerated occasionally in the country by George Selwyn, seeing him hurry past one day in London, stopped him, saying—'Surely you remember me?' 'Yes!' answered Selwyn, breaking away, 'and when next we meet in the country, I shall be glad to renew the acquaintance.'" (P. 351.) Now every one who knows the story (and it is known pretty generally) will perceive that the whole lustre of the joke is lost in this account of it. We have to write from recollection, but we believe the original relation states that when the old gentleman met Selwyn, the latter, as was likely enough, did not happen to remember him, or it might be that he intentionally passed him without notice; whereupon the old gentleman, stopping Selwyn, informed him who he was, and, by way of bringing himself to mind, said he had had the pleasure of once meeting him in the country. "Oh, indeed!" returned the wit, abruptly passing on, "and when next we meet in the country I shall be glad," &c. The turn of the jest manifestly depends upon the old's gentleman's reference to the circumstance of his having met Selwyn in the country; and by omitting to mention this, Miss Sinclair has evidently spoilt the story.

Then again, here is another anecdote familiar enough in literary circles, which we take to be very loosely rendered, and is made to have a bearing which is nowise justified by the actual fact. "When Victor Hugo was an aspirant for the honours of the Académie, and called on the learned and accomplished Royer Collard to ask his vote, the sturdy veteran in literature professed an entire ignorance of his name. 'I am the author of "Notre Dame de Paris," "Les Derniers Jours d'un Condamné," "Marion Delorme," &c. &c. 'I never heard of any of them.' 'Will you do me the honour of accepting a copy of my works?' 'I never read new books.' Exit Hugo!" (P. 350). Miss Sinclair must have reported this very carelessly, or received it from some one who had done the like: at any rate, the anecdote as we have heard it is distinctly different. Instead of his saying bluntly, "I never read new books," we have always understood that Royer Collard's remark was somewhat thus; "You must pardon me," said he, deprecating his ignorance of Hugo's writings, and offering his reason for declining to accept a copy.

VOL. XIV.

"You must pardon me, but at my age men cease to read; they read over again: à mon âge on ne lit plus; on relit." The anecdote in this form assumes a significance very unlike the one which it has in Miss Sinclair's version. We are sorry to have to say it, but we must insist that such loose and heedless "jotting" as this is scarcely excusable in a lady of her pretensions. She seldom seems to demand any meaning of an anecdote, and does not appear to understand that such a thing can have no value unless it illustrates some fact in the experience of human nature, or is otherwise in itself particularly singular or entertaining. Other passages might be selected which have as little merit in point of accuracy or interest as any we have given; but which the limits of the present notice will not admit of being quoted. We are, moreover, getting tired of finding fault, and desire to draw attention to such parts of the work as are likely to possess an interest for our readers. Let no one suppose we have any wish to speak harshly or contemptuously of Miss Sinclair's labours; we have had, on the contrary, a sincere respect for her abilities and accomplishments almost from our infancy; and if in noticing this particular book we have dwelt somewhat on its defects, it is that, in our small critical capacity, we have an obvious duty to the public, and must reasonably do our best to put them in a position to judge whether the work is worth the outlay required for obtaining it, and whether it is likely to yield them any proportionate satisfaction when it is obtained.

Objections, however, as far as we intend to make any, being now disposed of, we have next to say that, notwithstanding its deficiencies, the volume does contain a sprinkling of useful and pleasant matter. Certain passages of the sort we shall straightway proceed to quote, leaving them, as is fitting, to speak their own praises. We begin with some remarks upon Exclusive People, extracted out of "Arlington;" we suppose, the novel of that name by the late Mr. Lister:—

"I have seen many kinds of exclusive society, and I am not very much the admirer of ours. I happened to be in—shire lately. There they are exceedingly exclusive. They exclude almost every person, and certainly every topic that does not belong to that county. Everybody talks, thinks, and looks—shire. All are provokingly intimate with each other, and as provokingly unacquainted with everybody else. You are made to feel, as long as you are among them, that to know the world in general passes for nothing; but you must know every man, woman, or child, house, road, horse, and dog in—shire, if you would be thought to know anything, and wish to understand what they are talking about. All their jokes are local. You hear a mightily flat story, about some person or other, that every one round you is ready to die of, and you stare about you and try, by way of sociability, to get up a laugh, and then you are told with a compassionate air, 'Ah! if you did but know the person! The story is nothing without having seen him!' And then what an inferior being you seem, the man who never saw Smith of Smithy Hall!

"I have seen people of a very different kind, people of family and rank, and of the world, who, in their way, were very snugly and amiably exclusive. I was once on a visit to the Caldecots at their country place—that warren overrun with cousinship—the head quarters of a family clique. It ought to have been charming to see a large party so united—impossible to disapprove—but equally impossible to like it. They were very merry together, but what intolerable wits to a stranger! They had among them a large stock of traditional jokes, known only to themselves, and the least possible allusion to any of these set a whole row titrating in an instant. One felt that the world was divided by them into two classes, those who were related to them, and those who were not, and that they a little despised you for being of the latter. Then they had family names for things and persons, which they stared at you if you did not know. It was really difficult to learn! Everybody was alluded to by a nickname.

"I call society exclusive that is intended solely for the amusement of an initiated few. It matters not who those few may be, whether country neighbours, or a class of cousins, or agriculturalists, with their talk on short-horned cattle and mangel-wurzel; or yachters, or turf-men, or those sporting pedants, who, morning and evening, live in scandal, and obtrude upon the drawing-room their reminiscences of the field; all these, and others too, I call in their several ways exclusives; and I think that this exclusiveness injures society rather than improves it. It is a selfish system, and a narrow-minded one; and it has one crime which many will think worse than all, it tends to make society dull."

As it is likely some of our readers have never read "Napier's Life of Montrose," we think it may not be amiss to insert an extract which Miss Sinclair has here reprinted, descriptive of the execution of that nobleman. It need scarcely be mentioned that this is the famous Graham of Claverhouse, whom Sir Walter Scott has drawn with such fine effect in one of his best novels.

"It was resolved to celebrate his entrance into Edinburgh with a kind of mock solemnity. Thus on Sunday, the 13th of May, the magistrates met him at the gates, and led him in triumph through the streets. First appeared his officers, bound with cords, and walking two and two; then was seen the Marquis placed on a high chair in the hangman's cart, with his hands pinioned, and his hat pulled off, while the hangman himself continued covered by his side. It is alleged in a contemporary record, that the reason of his being tied to the cart was, in hope that the people would have stoned him, and that he might not be able by his hands to save his face. In all the procession, there appeared in Montrose such majesty, courage, modesty, and even somewhat more than natural, that even these women who had lost their husbands and children in his wars, and were hired to stone him, were, upon the sight of him, so astonished and moved, that their intended curses turned into tears and prayers. Of the many thousand spectators only one, Lady Jane Gordon, Countess of Haddington, was heard to scoff and laugh aloud. Montrose himself continued to display the same serenity of temper, when at last, late in the evening, he was allowed to enter his prison, and found there a deputation from the Parliament. He merely expressed to them his satisfaction at the near approach of the Sunday as the day of rest.

"'For,' said he, 'the compliment you put upon me this day was a little tedious and fatiguing.'

"Montrose told his persecutors that he was more proud to have his head fixed on the top of the prison walls than that his picture should hang in the king's bed-chamber, and that far from being troubled at his legs and arms being dispersed among the four principal cities, he only wished he had limbs to send to every city in Christendom, as testimonies of his unshaken attachment to the cause in which he suffered. When Sir Archibald Johnston of Warriston, the Clerk-Register, entered the prisoner's cell, and found him employed early in the morning, combing the long curled hair, which he wore according to the custom of the cavaliers, the visitor muttered:—

"'Why is James Graham so careful of his locks?'

"Montrose replied with a smile:—

"'While my head is my own, I will dress and adorn it; but when it becomes yours, you may treat it as you please.'

"Montrose, proud of the cause in which he was to suffer, clad himself, on the day of his execution, in rich attire—'more becoming a bridegroom,' says one of his enemies, 'than a criminal going to the gallows.' As he walked along, and beheld the instrument of his doom, his step was not seen to falter nor his eye quail; to the last he bore himself with such steadfast courage, such calm dignity, as have seldom been equalled, and never surpassed. At the foot of the scaffold, a further and parting insult was reserved for him: the executioner brought Dr. Wishart's narrative of his exploits and his own manifesto, to hang round his neck; but Montrose himself assisted in binding them, and smiling at this new token of malice, merely said:—'I did not feel more honoured when his majesty sent me the garter.'

"He then asked whether they had any more indignities to put upon him, and finding there were none, he prayed for some time, with his hat before his eyes. He drew apart some of the magistrates, and spoke awhile with them, and then went up the ladder in his red scarlet cassock, in a very stately manner, and never spoke a word; but when the executioner was putting the cord about his neck, he looked down to the people upon the scaffold, and asked:—

"'How long shall I hang here?'

"His head was afterwards affixed to a spike at the top of the Tolbooth, where it remained a ghastly spectacle, during ten years."

There is another execution scene, that of the courtly and enterprising Walter Raleigh, from what book taken we cannot say, but as it seems to be from one not usually accessible to our friends the "general readers," we have decided on transcribing it.

"Sir Walter Raleigh, on the morning of his execution, received a cup of sack, and remarked that he liked it as well as the prisoner who drank of St. Giles's bowl in passing through Tyburn, and said, 'It is good to drink if a man might but tarry by it.' He turned to his old friend Sir Hugh Ceeston, who was repulsed by the sheriff from the scaffold, saying:—

" 'Never fear but I shall have a place.'

"When a man extremely bald pressed forward to see Raleigh, and to pray for him, Sir Walter took from his own head a richly embroidered cap, and placing it on that of the aged spectator, said:

" 'Take this, good friend, to remember me, for you have more need on it than I.'

" 'Farewell, my Lords,' he exclaimed to a courtly group, who took an affectionate leave of him; 'I have a long journey before me, and must say good-bye.'

" 'Now I am going to God,' said he, as he reached the scaffold; and gently touching the axe, continued, 'This is a sharp medicine, but it will cure all diseases.'

"The very executioner shrunk from beheading one so brave and illustrious, until the unflinching knight encouraged him, saying:—

" 'What dost thou fear? Strike man!'

"In another moment, the great soul had fled from its mangled tenement."

The bearing of brave men in the face of the "king of terrors" is a noble and salutary spectacle; nevertheless it is a painful one to witness; so, after the quotations just given, it may not be amiss to cast about for some respectable kind of joke, that the reader may not be overburdened by melancholy impressions. Here is one, borrowed from some back number of the Quarterly Review, and curiously illustrative of the acute discernment of a certain British farmer, not likely to be otherwise known to fame.

"There lived in the west of England, a few years since, an enthusiastic geologist, a Doctor of Divinity and chairman of the quarter sessions. A farmer, who had seen him presiding on the bench, overtook him shortly afterwards, while seated by the roadside on a heap of stones, which he was busily breaking in search of fossils. The farmer reined up his horse, gazed at him for a minute, shook his head in commiseration of the mutability of human things, then exclaimed, in mingled tones of pity and surprise: 'What, Doctor! be you come to this a'ready?'

The man, it seems, had no conception of scientific stone-breaking, and so, in his simplicity, fancied the geologist had been reduced to the necessity of working on the roads for a livelihood.

Next shall be related the story of the Tower Ghost; "communicated by Sir David Brewster to Professor Gregory," and authentically recorded in "letters on Animal Magnetism, p. 494;" also in this present kaleidoscope of anecdotes, p. 326:—

"At the trial of Queen Caroline, in 1821, the guards of the Tower were doubled; and Colonel S——, the keeper of the Regalia, was quartered there with his family. Towards twilight one evening, and before dark, he, his wife, son, and daughter were sitting, listening to the sentinels, who were singing and answering one another, on the beats above and below. The evening was sultry, and the door stood ajar, when something suddenly rolled in through the open space. Colonel S—— at first thought it was a cloud of smoke, but it assumed the shape of a pyramid of dark thick gray, with something working towards its centre. Mrs. S—— saw a form. Miss S—— felt an indescribable sensation of chill and horror. The son sat at the window, staring at the terrified and agitated party; but saw nothing. Mrs. S—— threw her head down upon her arms on the table, and screamed. The Colonel took a chair, and hurled it at the phantom, through which it passed. The cloud seemed to him to revolve round the room, and then disappear, as it came, through the door. He had scarcely risen from his chair to follow, when he heard a loud shriek, and a heavy fall at the bottom of the stair. He stopped to listen, and in a few minutes the guard came up and challenged the poor sentry, who had been so lately singing, but who now lay at the entrance in a swoon. The serjeant shook him rudely, declared he was asleep at his post, and put him under arrest. Next day, the soldier was brought to a court-martial, when Colonel S—— appeared on his behalf, to testify that he could not have been asleep, for that he had been singing, and the Colonel's family had been listening, ten minutes before. The man declared that, while walking towards the stair-entrance, a dreadful figure had issued from the doorway, which he took at first for an escaped bear on its hind legs. It passed him, and scowled upon him with a human face, and the expression of a demon, disappearing over the Barbican. He was so frightened that he became giddy, and knew no more. His story, of course, was not credited by his judges; but he was believed to have had an attack of vertigo, and was acquitted and released on Colonel's S——'s evidence.

"That evening Colonel S—— went to congratulate the man, but he was so changed that he did not know him. From a glow of ruddy health in his handsome face, he had become of the colour of bad paste. Colonel S—— said to him:—

" 'Why do you look so dejected, my lad? I think I have done you a great favour in getting you off; and I would advise you in future to continue your habit of singing.'

" 'Colonel,' replied the sentry, 'you have saved my character, and I thank you; but as far as anything else, it little signifies. From the moment I saw that infernal demon, I felt I was a dead man.'

"He never recovered his spirits, and died next day, forty-eight hours after he had seen the spectre. Colonel S—— had conversed with the serjeant about it, who quietly remarked:—

"It was a bad job, but he was only a recruit, and must get used to it like the rest."

"What!" said Colonel S—, "have you heard of others seeing the same?"

"Oh, yes," answered the sergeant, "there are many queer, unaccountable things seen here, I assure you, and many of our recruits faint a time or two; but they get used to it, and it don't hurt them."

"Mrs. S— never got used to it. She remained in a state of dejection for six weeks, and then died. Colonel S— was long in recovering from the impression, and was reluctant to speak of it; but he said he would never deny the thing he had seen."

What explanation Sir David Brewster has given of this singular apparition, Miss Sinclair's book does not inform us, and the present writer does not happen to know. We quote it for its strangeness, and leave the reader to make of it what he can. We proceed with a curious instance of mental absence:—

"Lessing, the German philosopher, being remarkably absent, knocked at his own door one evening, when the servant looking out of the window, and not recognising him, said:—

"The professor is not at home!"

"Oh, very well!" replied Lessing, composedly walking away; "I shall call another time."

The cool Charles-Matthews-cum Theodore-Hook-ism of the following has struck us as being rather good in its way: it appears to be taken from the Life of Sir F. Buxton.

"Mr. Gurney of Farham, who was a strict preserver of game, when walking once in his park, heard a shot in a neighbouring wood. He hurried to the spot, and his naturally placid temper was considerably ruffled on seeing a young officer with a pheasant at his feet, deliberately reloading his gun. As the young man, however, replied to his rather warm expressions by a polite apology, Mr. Gurney's wrath was somewhat allayed; but he could not refrain from asking the intruder what he would do, if he caught a man trespassing on his premises:—

"I would ask him to luncheon," was the reply.

"The serenity of this impudence was not to be resisted. Mr. Gurney accordingly invited him to luncheon, and afterwards supplied him with dogs and a gamekeeper, and thus secured to him excellent sport for the remainder of the day."

There is another anecdote of successful coolness, of earlier date, which will serve very well to accompany the foregoing:—

"Charles II. after his restoration, appears, according to custom, to have neglected his most faithful adherent, Lord St. Albans, who nevertheless was a frequenter of the court. One day, when a gentleman had requested an interview of his majesty to ask for a valuable office then vacant, the king in jest desired the Earl of St. Albans to personate him, which he did before the whole court; but, after hearing the stranger's petition with an air of dignified authority, he said that the office was by no means too great for so deserving a subject. 'But,' added the earl, gravely, 'I have already conferred it on my faithful adherent, Lord St. Albans, who constantly followed my father's fortunes and my own, having never before received any reward.' The king was so amused by this ready jest that he instantly confirmed the gift to his clever representative."

But we have yet a cooler thing (though somewhat different in character) than either of the preceding to bring forward, and which, if true, is really one of the strangest incidents that could happen in a man's experience.

"Barthe, a writer of French comedies, hearing that his intimate friend Colardeau was on the point of death, instantly hastened to the sick man's chamber, and finding him still in a condition to listen, addressed him thus:—

"My dear friend, I am in despair at seeing you in this extremity, but I have still one favour to ask of you; it is that you will hear me read my 'Homme Personnel.'"

"Consider," replied the dying man, "that I have only a few hours to live."

"Alas! yes; and this is the very reason that makes me so desirous of knowing what you think of my play."

"His unhappy friend heard him to the end without saying a word, and then in a faint voice observed, that there was yet one very striking feature wanted to complete the character which he had been designing.

"You must make him," said he, "force a friend who is dying to listen to a comedy in five acts."

Our collector has treasured up two or three tolerable anecdotes of that artfullest of "dodgers," Talleyrand, which, though not new to everybody, are likely to have a novelty for some, and therefore may bear quoting.

"After the pope had excommunicated him, he is reported to have written to a friend, saying, 'Come and comfort me; come and sup with me. Everybody is going to refuse me fire and water; we shall therefore have nothing this evening but iced meats, and drink nothing but wine.'" When Louis XVIII., at the restoration, praised Talleyrand for his talents and influence, the latter modestly disclaimed the compliment, but added, with an arch significance, "There is, however, some inexplicable thing about me which prevents any government from prospering that attempts to set me aside." The next is exquisitely diplomatic. A banker, anxious about the rise or fall of stocks, came once to Talleyrand for information respecting the truth of a rumour, that George III. had suddenly died, when the statesman replied, in a confidential tone, "I shall be delighted if the information I have to give be of any use to you." The banker was enchanted at the prospect of obtaining authentic intelligence from so high a source; and Talleyrand, with a mysterious air continued, "Some say the king of England is dead; others, that he is not dead; for my own part, I believe neither the one nor the other. I tell you this in confidence, but do not commit me." No better parody on modern diplomacy could easily be written.

We insert the next incident for the benefit of such tyros and inexperienced persons as are apt to plunge too precipitately into vexatious and forbidden questions:—

“When the Church of England was first disturbed by keen controversies, grounded on the Oxford Tracts, Archbishop Howley, always conciliatory and prudent, gave a public breakfast at Lambeth, where his clergy of all parties had no sooner taken their seats than a very young divine, by way of beginning the conversation, said, across the table,—

“Pray, what does your Grace think of the Oxford Tracts.”

“The archbishop, with his usual suavity replied:—

“Pray, sir, do you take tea or coffee?”

Perhaps what follows next is the best joke in the whole book. If you look at it, you will see that it contains an extremely subtle imputation:—

“Lord Sundon, a commissioner of the treasury with Bubb Doddington and Winnington, was very dull. One Thursday as they left the board, Lord Sundon laughed heartily at something Doddington said, and, when gone, Winnington observed:—

“Doddington, you are very ungrateful; you call Sundon stupid and slow, and yet you see how quickly he took what you said.”

“Oh, no!” replied Doddington, ‘he was only laughing now at what I said last Treasury-day.’”

Taking Doddington’s estimate, one would say that his lordship was the slowest man of his century.

Our last extract shall be what we consider a very pretty fancy, though in Miss Sinclair’s telling it loses some of its beauty:—

“Ariosto tells a story of a fairy who, by some mysterious law of her nature, was condemned to appear, at certain seasons, in the form of a foul and poisonous snake. Those who injured her during the period of her guise, were ever excluded from participation in the blessings which she bestowed; but to those who, in spite of her loathsome aspect, pitied and protected her, she afterwards revealed herself in the beautiful and celestial form which was natural to her, accompanied their steps, granted all their wishes, filled their houses with wealth, made them happy in love, and victorious in war. A useful moral might be drawn from this little fable, in favour of showing kindness and civility to the most degraded and unhappy!”

Good reader, you are to suppose the fairy to be the representative of our manifold humanity, and learn that whosoever honours that under its varied manifestations and disguises—whosoever shields and cheers it under difficulty and in danger, or pities and consoles it in its sins and in its wretchedness—is drawing benefit and beauty to his own soul and being, and making the track of his earthly pilgrimage glad and luminous behind him; even as the daylight, breaking over land and main, sheds glory on the clouds and mists with which the night had wrapped the world.

VISITS TO THE LONDON CHURCHES IN SERVICE TIME.

BY ONESIMUS.

THE present is truly an inquisitive age, the people of every part of the world desiring to know what those of all other parts are doing; and, while at home, nothing is exempt from scrutiny, we have engaged a “commissioner” to visit the London churches in service-time, whose reports we purpose to lay before our readers.

The novelty of such a feature in journalism is scarcely questionable; and it is submitted that a large portion of the reading public, amongst the other exhibitions of the time, will find something to interest them, and useful withal, in a moving panorama of the metropolitan pulpits, as well as in learning something of the quality and general tendency of orthodox divinity, as written by beneficed incumbents or preached by the working clergy, in the principal churches of London, in the year of grace 1851.

“Our commissioner,” himself a sincere and liberal churchman, has it also in charge to note how far congregations in general appear to be really concerned in the ritual and ordinary services of the church; and from certain other brief notices of the different churches and their immediate neighbourhoods, antiquarian, topographical or traditional, it is not unreasonable to hope that his reports will be found acceptable to the general reader.

And now, without prejudice or partiality, but simply because every undertaking must have a beginning somewhere, here follows his report of a visit to the church of

ST. CLEMENT DANES.

THIS parish, though anciently suburban, has been for ages in the very midst of busy life, being bounded on the east by Temple Bar, where the “Liberties of Westminster” terminate, and London proper begins. Its Danish name alone is as good authority as a registry for an antiquity of one thousand years, and the patron saint for almost another,—Clemens Romanus having been a disciple of St. Peter, and one of those pronounced by St. Paul to have been inscribed “in the book of life.” [Phil. iv. 3.] Moreover, wells being ever held in veneration by the ancients, there is one on the north side of this church, at the lower end of Clement’s Lane, which, though now covered over and surmounted by a pump, there was a time when to its copious effluxions, virtues salutary to both body and soul were ascribed; and whence the name of Holy-well Street, which anciently led to it.

And that motto, which is inscribed over the western entrance into St. Clement’s church,—“Thou God seest me,” [Gen. xvi. 13.] will be found to possess an interest far beyond that of a merely curious coincidence, on a due consideration of the verse following, in connexion with the facts just stated, directly referring, as it does, to “The well of Him that liveth and seeth me.”

But this is not the place for tracing down a connexion between a branch of Hagar's offspring, or of any of the fierce tribes ranging from the sea of Japan, to the Orcaides, with the original settlement of this parish. Some of the family and immediate descendants of Canute are said to have been buried here, and Strype mentions, that to such of the Danes as had been married to English women was conceded the privilege of settling between the isle of Thorne, (the locality of Westminster Abbey,) and Caer Lud, (Ludgate). A church was standing here, however, in the first year of Edward the Confessor [1041], called Ecclesia Clementis Danorum, of which the patronage was given by Henry II. to the Knights Templars; and after the common course of times and changes it was presented by Queen Elizabeth to the Cecil family, who still retain it.

As to the ancient well, neither the traditional virtues of its waters, nor even the name of St. Clement, could exempt it from the common lot of all sublunary things; for in the course of time it was found to have degenerated into a place of resort to which the Loudon apprentices and other pleasure seeking citizens were wont to come out for a little rural recreation. The entire lane is now little better than a medium for the escape of the manifold impurities of Clare Market into the Thames, and the modern parish authorities, with the inscrutability of motive peculiar to their order, have in this channel of reeking pestilence established their Infant School!

When old Loudon first began to have extramural yearnings, this parish was foremost in the acquirement of "west end" importance, and along the northern bank of the Thames, quite to the then remote hamlet of Charing, the great aristocratic families built their mansions and laid out their courts and gardens, as the modern names of streets and localities, such as Drury, Craven, Russell, Devereux, Essex, Norfolk, Arundel, Lancaster, Cecil, Buckingham, Northumberland, &c. fully testify. But since the fanciful and talented Leigh Hunt and the recondite and painstaking Mr. Cunningham, have already, in their respective works, done ample justice to the lay anecdotes of London topography, we must keep as closely as possible to matters ecclesiastical.

The former church of St. Clement Danes, long described by old writers with the faint praise of "indifferent good," being at length removed, the present was built in 1682 by Edward Pierce, under the direction, it is said, of Sir Christopher Wren; but as to its style or order, the less that is said the better, except that, with the advantages of position, it is certainly a striking object, and the interior is commodious, light, and graceful. The steeple was raised 85 feet in 1719, the bells having been cast in 1695, "by their majesties' founders." Concerning these bells, the sexton's table of fees for funeral duty is a curiosity in its way, showing that much depended on the weight of metal to be put in motion. The charge for the great bell, or tenor, being one shilling and fourpence; for the 7th, one shilling; for the 6th, ninepence; for the 5th, sixpence; and the same for any other up to the first. They constitute a noble peal, however, in professional hands, if they could but be heard, which is rarely possible, owing to the confusion and eternal din by which the church is surrounded; the only chance of hearing them in perfection being the adventitious descent of a deep snow, to deaden the noise of carriage-wheels, at the time when an old year is being rung out, and a new one welcomed in. At any other they must be listened to in the neighbouring inns of court.

From time immemorial the chimes of St. Clement have evinced a most Jacobite perversity of action, and such as under a less liberal system of government might have rendered the churchwardens liable to receive a communication from the attorney-general; for considering that in George Lewis of Hanover, afterwards George I., Handel found his first patron, the unrelenting torture of his sublime "Hanover tune" here perpetrated, day and night, year after year, must be anything but complimentary to the reigning dynasty, or creditable to the loyalty or musical taste of the parish.

The present rector of St. Clement Danes is the Rev. William Webb Ellis, M.A. of Brasenose College, Oxford; and who was presented to this rectory by the Marquis of Exeter on the demise of the late Rev. William Gurney, in 1843. While at Oxford, Mr. Ellis published "A Concise View of that class of Prophecy which relates to the Messiah, connected with the leading doctrines of the Christian Faith." 12mo. Oxon. pp. 125. He was afterwards appointed to the curacy of Gravesend, and published a Sermon there on the Resurrection, 1833. We next find him promoted to the curacy of St. George's chapel, in Albemarle Street, which he still retains, with the most effective personal ministrations. In 1836, he published a collection of sixteen sermons, which he had preached there, and dedicated it to the Marquis and Marchioness of Exeter, "with the sincerest respect and gratitude for especial kindnesses." In 1838, was published, by particular request, a Sermon preached in St. George's Chapel on Sunday, June 24th of that year, on the occasion of Her Majesty's Coronation. His text was from 2 Chron. xxxiv. 1, 2; the subject being the reign of the pious young king Josiah; and the argument, the natural and inevitable effect, for good or for evil, of royal example.

Designing to visit St. Clement's Church for the purposes above stated, and knowing that on Sundays, parish congregations are wont to put forth some showy pretensions to "respectability," a Friday in Lent was taken advantage of for a sort of preliminary call, when there were found assembled three persons, females; and these, with the writer, and the clerk, constituted the entire congregation to be addressed as "Dearly beloved brethren," &c. It was gratifying, however, to join in a service sedately and well read, and to glance up now and then at the seat long honoured with the preference of Samuel Johnson, who was here a regular attendant, and, as stated by Boswell, as well as in his own correspondence with Mrs.

Thrale, hither came on all especial occasions of penitence and thanksgiving.

On Sunday, March 30th, the service was again read by the same curate, Mr. Gregory; and an excellent discourse was delivered by the Rev. Mr. Brown, from 1 Peter v. 7: "Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you." Mr. Brown's voice was deep and sonorous, and yet clearly audible above the surrounding rumble of carriages; and he spoke with an earnestness calculated to strike the attention of people apparently engulfed in worldly cares. But the church, though immediately surrounded by an immense population, was not one-third filled.

In the evening, at seven, the ordinary service was read with a clear and distinct voice, by the Rev. Mr. Owen, after which the rector delivered a discourse from Psalm xxvii. 10: "O hide not Thou Thy face from me, nor cast Thy servant away in displeasure." His argument was, that in these words is embodied the substance of all prayer and devout supplication, and that this text, in letter or in spirit, must therefore be the language of all erring mortals, in their penitent appeals to the throne of grace. Upon such a groundwork as this, a less gifted orator than Mr. Ellis could have read arguments beyond the reach of controversy; but on the present occasion, he chose rather to expose folly than to combat with perverted reason, and adduced a succession of illustrations, in the felicity of which he excels, of that spiritual blindness by which a large portion of mankind are but as beings benighted, even in the glare of daylight. Mr. Ellis's voice is not strong, but his earnestness and energy of manner command respect and attention. It can be scarcely necessary to say, that, in the composition of his discourses, an infelt piety, and a mind of a superior order, are manifest; and in addition to that energy of manner before adverted to, there is a captivating eloquence of expression in his countenance, and his very hands seem to speak.

The organ was sweetly and well played, and the few children belonging to the parochial schools, who had been instructed in the choral service, acquitted themselves in a manner highly creditable to their teachers; and therefore such as, in these times of pretended refinement and of pretended zeal for the Church's honour and welfare, left the congregation generally open to the charge of listless inattention to the essential requirements of the rubric, or of incompetency to join in the more enlivening portions of devotional worship; and, with regret, we have finally to add that the church was not more than one-sixth filled.

LETTERS FROM AUSTRALIA.

THE following are bona fide extracts from the home-letters of a young man who has lately exchanged the life of a student in England for that of a farmer in Australia. They are here published as affording to intending emigrants much of that practical information which only domestic correspondence is likely to furnish:—

"Ship ———, Adelaide,
"Saturday, Nov. 16th, 1850.

"MY DEAR——, We arrived here on Thursday last, after a tiresome passage of ninety-five days; and, as I expected, this is the first opportunity I have had of letting you know of my whereabouts since I left Plymouth. Our captain having unfortunately some peculiar notions on the subject of short cuts, has kept so completely out of the track of homeward-bound ships that we have only met one, and that one we did not go near enough to speak. After this explanation I will proceed to give you some account of the voyage; it will be principally from memory, as I have kept no journal.

"We left Plymouth on Monday, the 12th, as I suppose you know from my hurried note, sent by the pilot; a few minutes after the despatch of which I was attacked by sea-sickness and took to my berth. There I lay without eating anything, except half a biscuit, until Wednesday afternoon, when one of my messmates brought me a quart of gruel made after a primitive sea-fashion, of flour, water, and sugar. I succeeded in finishing this, and feeling much revived got up and went on deck. After the first three days I had no return of sea-sickness; during all that time, however, I was in a state of partial stupefaction, the only things I recollect being the alternations of daylight and darkness, and the noise of the waves striking the vessel, at each of which—and they occurred about every ten minutes—it seemed to me as if we had struck against a rock. During the last two of these momentous three days, we were running across the Bay of Biscay, (by the bye, one of my first attempts at a joke was to christen it the Bay of Biscuit, that being generally the sustenance of the passengers while crossing it,) and were fortunate enough to escape without a storm, but there is always a heavy sea there.

"After this we had a splendid fair wind for a fortnight; and beautiful weather, though not unpleasantly hot, the wind being N. E. We had reached lat. 15 N., long. 23 W., i. e. we were within 1,000 miles of the Line, and 1,400 W. of London, when, on Monday, August 26, about midnight, we had our first specimen of a gale. I was awaked by the noise of the men on deck shortening sail, and got up with the intention of going on deck, but found it quite impossible. The fore-hatchway was the only one open, and down that seas and the rain came pouring in such a way as to flood the 'tween-decks. In addition to the other unpleasantnesses, the lamps, which we have always kept burning at night, went out, and we were in perfect darkness until daybreak, listening to the captain's orders—which he delivered in a voice very like hoarse thunder—and trying from thence to get some idea of the state of affairs; add to this the scrambling for plates and dishes, which the rolling of the vessel caused to fly in all directions, and you have some notion of the way in which we passed the night.

"On going on deck in the morning we found the only casualty that had occurred during the squall, which moderated at sunrise, was the loss of the foresail. About ten this day we exchanged names with the first and only homeward-bound ship we met on the voyage,—a brig bound for Liverpool. For about three weeks afterwards we had light and variable winds, but never a perfect calm. The weather was very hot, though there was no thunder and only a little sheet-lightning on two or three evenings. We crossed the Line on September 7, and in the evening had the usual nautical joke of Neptune coming on board. He made his appearance with considerable effect, amidst the firing of squibs and the blazing of a tar-barrel, supposed to be his chariot. His presence was the signal for the discharge of copious buckets of water by sailors concealed in the rigging on passengers assembled on the poop. We all came in for a pretty good soaking; however, as salt-water never gives cold, we took it very good-humouredly; in fact, I rather enjoyed it than otherwise.

"About ten degrees south of the Line, we fell in with the S. E. trade-wind, which carried us to lat. 38.5., when we were at our nearest distance to the coast of South America, being, on September 23, about 500 miles of it. From this time until, on October 7, we passed the Cape of Good Hope, we had a succession of foul winds for about twenty hours, then fair, then foul again, until October 20. These four weeks were the most unpleasant part of the passage, the weather being very cold, in consequence of the captain having gone so far to the south as lat. 45.5. It was just the end of winter there, too. One morning the snow lay three inches deep on the deck. From this time till we reached Adelaide, we had generally fair winds, sometimes very strong ones, but not once what the sailors would acknowledge to be a regular gale. The nearest approach to one was on Sunday, October 3; it lasted only a few hours, but carried away our foreyard, and all hands were employed that day and the day after in replacing. This was the only Sunday during the voyage that we had not Divine Service.

"On Thursday morning,—last Thursday, you know,—we were all aroused at breakfast-time by the news that land was in sight. This was soon made out to be Kangaroo Island, (at the entrance to the Gulf of St. Vincent, on the E. shore of which Adelaide is situated;—get a map, and look for these places.) My first view of Australia, i. e. of Kangaroo Island, was by no means prepossessing, the coast consisting of a row of rocky hills, nearly covered with stunted trees. The island appeared to me to be perhaps fitted for the colonization of kangaroos, but certainly of nothing else. In the course of the morning we came in sight of the main-land, and this looked more promising, being very picturesque and beautiful, and much better wooded than the island. It reminded me very much of a range of Scottish hills, covered with fir and birch-trees. However, the telescope soon dissipated that illusion with respect to the forests, and showed them to consist of blue and white gum-trees, of most strange and outlandish appearance.

"(Sunday, November 24.—I wrote thus far late at night by the light (?) of our swinging lamps, which must account for the fact of my letter being nearly illegible. I expected to have an opportunity of despatching it next-day, but in this I was disappointed, so I put it by, to be continued at leisure. So I'll now take up the thread of the voyage where I left off.)

"During the day we sailed slowly up St. Vincent's Gulf, every inch of shore being closely scrutinized by a dozen telescopes. We only saw three log-huts and a few cattle along the whole sixty miles of coast. We anchored off the light-ship at the entrance to the port of Adelaide at midnight. This was about the most interesting incident in the voyage. It was a beautiful moonlight night, the passengers were all on deck, the captain walking the poop evidently in a high state of gratification at having brought his ship safe to land, and the second mate heaving the lead, and giving the depth in fathoms in a peculiar sort of chant. At length we came to our right anchorage-place, the mate sang out, 'By the deep, five.' 'Let go the anchor!' shouted the captain. Down it went with a splash into the water, the chain rattled out at the hawse-holes, and we were at rest for the first time for three long months.

"On getting up next morning we were much disappointed to find that, instead of going into port as we expected, the ship would be obliged to remain and discharge her cargo where she was, by means of boats. So here have we been lying for the last week, about five miles from land, in sight of Adelaide, but unable to get ashore. For, in consequence of there being no competition, the boatmen charge twenty-five shillings for a trip there and back; and the greatest part of our passengers—I among the number—cannot afford to pay that for the gratification of our curiosity. However, we have had the satisfaction of plenty of fresh provisions and bread. In the beginning of the week all the crew, except one, took a boat and ran away. The consequence is that we have been obliged to take part in the duty of watching at night. On Thursday and Friday the cargo was discharged into a lighter alongside, and most of the young men on board volunteered to assist. All our Adelaide passengers left us on Friday. We shall remain here about a week longer, Captain S—having to clear his cargo at the custom-house, and procure fresh hands before he can go on to Port Phillip. It is, however, only four days' sail if we have fair wind.

"I am afraid I have given you rather a meagre account of the voyage—I can't help it. Now that it is over, the time seems to have passed so quickly that it is just like a dream, one week being precisely like another; the only distinction, the varying state of the weather.

"There is to me one peculiarity about a long sea voyage, viz., the impossibility of realising the fact of being some 12,000 miles from England. The reason I suppose is, that as there can't very conveniently be land-marks or mile-stones at sea, one has no means of judging of the distance run. I feel as if we had been cruising for three months just out of sight of land at Plymouth. You will, doubtless, want to know what sort of fellow-passengers I have had. With some few exceptions, they were not very brilliant. To use our old phrase, there was not a soul on board. One of the best educated men is a Mr.——. He was studying for the Church of England, but was obliged to give up on account of his health, so he got married and came out to Australia. He read us the service on Sunday mornings; and in the afternoon a Mr. W——, and Mr. R——, who have come out as Methodist missionaries, assisted alternately. These latter have gone ashore at Adelaide, as they are going to the Burra Burra Mines, (by the way, what a capital name for a mine, 'Burrow-burrow.')

I suppose you remember my speaking of a Mr.—— whom I met at Silver's, the outfitters. He turned out to be a gentleman farmer, who with his wife and two grown-up sons was emigrating on account of the repeal of the corn-laws; he was the 'large capitalist' of the vessel. The only mathematically-inclined individual on board was a Mr. W——; he was one of the masters at—— Prison, and, by a curious coincidence, attended Professor De Morgan's schoolmasters' classes at the same time that I did the regular ones. The rest of the passengers I shall dismiss in few words. One Mr.——, who has emigrated on account of the ill-health of his wife, is a very nice gentlemanly fellow; we intend to make an excursion up the bush together when we reach Melbourne. Among the women-kind, the nicest was a young married Scottish lady, who spoke with the prettiest of all possible Fife accents. One of our notables of another sort, was an Irish clergyman. I mention him because his brother introduced himself to me at Plymouth on the very Hibernian ground of his uncle having gone to school with my grandfather.

"I don't think I have told you anything about what we may call the 'domestic economy' of the ship. Well, first and foremost, we had plenty to eat; we had either preserved meat or soup four days a-week and salmon on Fridays. These preserved meats are roast beef and mutton packed in air-tight tins; when opened they eat as fresh as the day they were cooked. Then we had plenty of flour, suet, and raisins to make puddings of, and no want of sugar. The tea and coffee were but middling, but that did not matter to me since I was so well-provided with cocoa. I got a lot of marmalade at Plymouth, which proved very good with biscuit. All the passengers were divided into messes of eight each, who drew their provisions together; these were served out raw, and we had to take it in turns, two at a time, week and week about, to make them ready for the cook, though the cooking department itself we had, of course, nothing to say to. You have no idea what a splendid hand I am at the manufacturing of pies out of the preserved meat, raisin-puddings, &c. One thing which you will be interested about I've not mentioned yet, and that is my health. For the first month of the voyage, until we crossed the Lane, and got into cool weather, I was very ill and weak; indeed it seemed to be the general idea that I should be dropped overboard (before we reached the Cape. During this time the ship's doctor was very kind to me, and let me have all sorts of 'medical comforts,' in the shape of arrow-root, sago, wine, &c.¹ After this I began to get better fast. You will think I am a good deal stronger when I tell you that, a few weeks ago, I went to the main-mast head, being the first of the passengers who had done it; it was by no means easy work, the rope-ladders only extending half-way, the other half there being only ropes to climb up. I cut off a piece of the vane as a trophy, which I enclose.

"Monday, Nov. 25.—I don't think I have told you anything about our amusements. They were scanty enough, the passengers being unsocial at first. While we were crossing the tropics the principal occupation was lounging about the poop, under the awning, in every variety of ungraceful attitude, looking out for sharks and flying-fish. We did not see any of the former, but plenty of the latter flew on board. The evenings were very beautiful, and most favourable for astronomical observation, the air being so clear. We saw Mercury every evening for a fortnight. When there was no moon, the phosphorescence of the sea in the wake of the ship was splendid. My own personal amusement was, of course, principally my concertina. I am getting on with it pretty well, being able to play 'Lift thine Eyes,' and 'Körner's Prayer,' with all the parts. I soon formed an acquaintance with the ship's carpenter, as I told you I should. Ours was a very well-informed young Scotchman, from the neighbourhood of Inverness, and I found him one of the most conversational men on board. I have gained a great deal of useful information from him. He and the second mate sing Scotch songs, arranged as duets, uncommonly well.

"During the last few weeks I have been amusing myself, whenever the motion of the ship would allow it, in making a model of an emigrant's cottage out of rough Australian wood; it excited the admiration of everybody on board, including my friend the carpenter, who was pleased to signify his great approval of the way in which the roof was framed,—the said roof being a design of my own. I finished the house just before we reached Adelaide, and made a present of it to a Mr. L——, a lieutenant in the navy, who left us there. He is going up into the bush to take possession of a Government allotment of land, and promised most faithfully to build his house after my model, a good deal of which was made after his designs.

"As we approached the south, and came into cold weather, the ship was continually surrounded by flocks of birds,—Cape pigeons, whale-birds, and albatrosses. They afforded us some good sport in fishing for them, and the Cape pigeons were very good to eat. Mr. P—— caught two albatrosses, and, in defiance of the experience of the Ancient Mariner, killed them, and kept their wings to send home to friends in England. They measured eleven feet from tip to tip. Since we have anchored here, (off Adelaide,) we have caught great numbers of gar-fish and grey mullet; and have had them every day for breakfast and tea. In this long and rather rambling epistle I have given you all the news of the voyage.

* * * * *

"I like the climate very much, for, although it is very hot sometimes, (it is now summer, and the thermometer stands in the middle of the day at 120° in the sun,) the heat is not half so oppressive as I have found it in England, and the mornings and evenings are always beautifully cool.

* * * * *

"There must be some evil genius trying to prevent the despatch of this letter, and to keep you in suspense as long as possible. From some cause or other, the 'Imperial,' by which I was about to send it, has been kept in port, and we have sailed for Port Phillip before her. I have therefore taken this letter with me, as I shall have a better chance of sending, via India, from thence. I shall cover the outside of this letter with odds and ends of information. We had no deaths on board, but some serious illnesses. There was one birth. Tell — that her prognostications that I should lose all my worldly goods overboard have not been fulfilled; the only things I have lost being a straw hat and the brass cap off the end of my telescope. I have been speculating and wondering where you will spend your Christmas-day; I suppose I shall spend mine in Melbourne. Does it not seem strange that, owing to the difference of longitude, when you are having your Christmas dinner, it will be three o'clock on the morning of the next day with me? I always have to make this allowance when I try to imagine what you and my friends in England are doing at any particular time."

"At sea, between Adelaide and Port Phillip,
"Tuesday, Dec. 10th, 1850.

"A wet day at sea! Oh, what a deal of discomfort is implied in these five words! Everything cold, damp, and miserable; no place endurable except one's cabin. Fortunately I have mine all to myself now, the three other occupants having left at Adelaide; and so thither I have retired, and having placed my desk in my berth, under the port-hole, and improvised a chair out of a couple of boxes, am trying to write, which the rolling of the ship makes rather a difficult matter. We left Adelaide last Thursday evening, having been detained much longer than we expected, on account of the lighter which took the goods out of the ship running ashore. This kept us a week, and then we had to wait some days for fresh hands, since, as I told you, all the sailors but one had run away. I was glad enough when we sailed; it was so tiresome to be anchored in sight of Adelaide and unable to land. One day, we had some hours' amusement in fishing for a shark. It was discovered in the morning swimming slowly round and round the ship, just beneath the surface of the water. A large shark-hook was soon hunted up, baited with a lump of pork, and thrown overboard, fastened to the end of a strong rope. The shark bit three or four times, and once we hooked and hauled him half out of the water, but he contrived to get away. He was such a monster!—twelve or fourteen feet long. He did not pay us another visit; and, I suppose, told all his friends of the reception he met with, for we saw no more.

"Another reason that made us by no means sorry to leave was, that the anchorage-ground where we lay was very bad; and whenever there was a strong south wind, and as this was the case almost every night, we were in continual expectation of the anchor dragging, and the ship going ashore. The first did happen one afternoon, and the vessel drifted about a mile in shore, bringing us into most unpleasant proximity to the wreck of another ship, the 'Græcian, which had been drawn from her anchor a short time before. We let go another anchor, which fortunately took hold and brought the ship up just in time. We were at work for two hours in the evening heaving in the anchor; for, being short-handed, the captain sung out for volunteers,—a call promptly obeyed by all the young men. I worked away at the windlass the whole time, and hardly felt at all tired after it. Some of the songs the sailors sing while at work are very pretty; I enclose one which I have taken down. The part in small notes is given in recitative by one man to any words he may happen to think of: the part in large notes is sung by all the men in chorus, beginning very piano, and then gradually ascending to ff. You have no idea what a beautiful effect it has, especially at night, during a storm, under which circumstances I first heard it. It is only used on grand occasions, such as hoisting the yards after reefing, or while getting in the anchor.

"Melbourne, Dec. 19.—We arrived here on Wednesday last, but I did not go ashore until Friday morning. My first impressions of Melbourne were not very favourable, for it was a cold, showery day, and the streets, which are all unpaved, were about six inches deep in mud. I went to an inn for the night, and next day removed to where I am now writing—a boarding-house kept by a Mr. M'J—. It is a comfortable, respectable place, and by no means expensive; the inmates are all either Scotch farmers or stock-holders.

"I will write again in the course of a few weeks and tell you how I am going on."

LIFE IN PRAIRIE LAND.¹

BY ELIZA W. FARNHAM.

CHAPTER III.

Leaving Alton we discover that Jersey is on board—A day on an island—Who Jersey is—Some of his experience during his travels—His political opinions—Peculiar style of expressing them—His notions on travel.

We got under weigh again after several starts and backings, and ran slowly along under the magnificent bluffs that tower above the Mississippi on the Illinois side. In a short time Hal came to me, his face drawn into one of its heartiest expressions of humour, and said, "Jersey is here; who could have dreamed of the good luck?"

But as the reader doesn't know Jersey, he will hardly participate in our pleasure till he is introduced. The brief appellation by which he is here distinguished was given him on the first day of his appearance among us, in honour of the declaration which he then made, that he "was born in Jarsey, and had never been out of it till that day." He wore a suit of coarse snuff-coloured homespun, a large bell-crowned white hat, and a cravat of blue ground, dotted with large oval figures of copperas colour. He had lost a front tooth, and had an awkward habit of grinning, which made it manifest at every word he uttered. Though much older than Hal, the latter had kindly offered to be his Mentor on first meeting him, and many were the waggish tricks he had played upon him, and the roars of laughter which the performances of Jersey, under his direction, had elicited. The simple, credulous face of the one, and the grave, imperturbable honesty of the other, in the height of Jersey's most ridiculous exhibitions, had been an inexhaustible fund of amusement among the gentlemen during the weary hours of our journey. Jersey had left home under the auspices of the celebrated Marion City colony, but had been separated from them at Columbia, Penn., by getting on board the wrong boat. It was there that he first joined us. He travelled economically: that is, he found his own supplies, and slept on the floor of the cabin. His ignorance exposed him to every sort of imposition, against which Hal was in truth his protector. But for the honest care which he exercised over his worldly concerns, he repaid himself by letting out upon him the whole strength of his trick-loving disposition. A party of gentlemen were about leaving the packet, on the second day, for a walk. Hal suggested that Jersey had better accompany them, as his health might suffer from the long confinement. But there was a difficulty in the case. He had just purchased two large cards of gingerbread,—and what should he do with them? To leave them on his box he thought would be dangerous, and this opinion was fully concurred in by his adviser. To eat them at so short notice was out of the question; to put them in his pocket impossible.

"There is but one way in which you can dispose of them in safety," said Hal, "and that is to tie them up in your handkerchief and take them under your arm."

This was accordingly done, and they set forth. But Jersey's handkerchief gaped and revealed the secret. It was no choice herbarium, as his friend had asserted to the company when they joined them, but a pair of luscious brown sheets of gingerbread, which he had purchased at a Dutch farm-house just back; none of your shop compounds made of dirty lard, vinegar, and sal seratus, but a dainty mixture of golden butter, pure butter-milk, and superfine flour. A league was entered into at once; two of the party engaged Jersey in familiar elbow conversation, and at a rough place in the road stumbled against him, while a third at the same moment dexterously abstracted about a third of one of the loaves. The foremost rogues begged his pardon, and the walk was resumed, Jersey replacing the handkerchief, which had settled a little in the shock he received. Another stumble was soon made, and the part of the other loaf which projected behind his arm was withdrawn. After a long walk there was a short run to gain a bridge from which to let themselves down on the boat. Jersey seated himself on the railing beside Hal, and, as the boat came up, the latter began to swing his arms and go through the various motions preparatory to a leap. These were continued till the moment of jumping, when at a word they all found themselves upon deck, but Jersey's bell crown was lying on the bridge. Astonished and alarmed beyond measure, he looked about with the most ludicrous terror in his countenance, and exclaimed, "My hat's lost!"

"No, it isn't," said his grave friend, who had knocked it off. "There, the steersman is throwing the boat up to the shore. I'll take care of your gingerbread while you run and get it."

But Jersey preferred to keep the gingerbread under his own protection, and leaping ashore with it, soon returned with the favourite chapeau elevated to its old position. He now seated himself to examine his stores, and great was his consternation to find that more than a third of each cake had disappeared. A thousand ways of accounting for its loss were immediately suggested by the innocent youths about him. But Jersey evidently rejected them all, and from that hour his confidence in Hal and his companions waned. When he reached Louisville he took another boat and came on to St. Louis alone. But if he had enjoyed greater freedom from jokes, he had been imposed on in more serious matters, and seemed rather glad than otherwise to meet his grave friend. I had never seen him yet, except in the heat of his performances, but now Hal was very desirous that I should have the pleasure of hearing him converse awhile. An opportunity soon offered.

We were passing a little wooded island three or four miles above Alton, when one of the spasms came on, and was succeeded by a lurch more violent than any previous one, and an immediate settling of the whole craft. She had sprung a leak. The captain made his appearance, this time without the gloves, and ordered her to be run on the island instantly. The goods were all taken out, the hands set at work, while the passengers went strolling through the woods.

The island was small and uninhabited. There was nothing of interest upon it, save two or three little glades in which the early spring flowers were just unfolding their petals. We spent three or four hours in the checkered wood, admiring the various arts by which nature ushers her tender and beautiful train into being, and were about returning for some books, when "The sound of approaching footsteps arrested us. In a few minutes Jersey broke through a thick copse near us. "Stop," said Hal, "this fellow will be richer than any printed book." Accordingly we waited, and Jersey was introduced in due form. He had in some confidential moment intimated to Hal that he was more brilliant in the society of ladies than gentlemen, and I saw at once that he needed no patronage. He prided himself on his political acumen, and, considering this his forte, plunged at once into a discussion of the various prominent men who were likely to claim the suffrages of the people in the ensuing presidential canvass. His opinion of them was delivered with a simplicity and brevity which quite surprised me.

First of all, he thought "Mr. Clay capable, honest, and fittin." Mr. Van Buren he guessed was capable, but dishonester than Mr. Calhoun, who would be all right if he wasn't a nullifier. I asked about Mr. Webster. "Oh, Webster," said he, "is a capable man, but he ain't fittin." On proposing a word or two of the leading doctrines of these statesmen, I found him utterly ignorant of them. Nullification, for aught he knew, meant the annexation of Texas. Bank and anti-bank were the same to him. He only knew of banks in general, that they were places where people put their spare funds for safety. He seemed not to have become acquainted with that more modern feature, by the introduction of which they have become forced loans for the accommodation of gentlemen who wish to travel in Europe, Texas, or other "foreign parts." The tariff was in some way connected with trade, but whether trade between the mechanics and farmers of our own country or between us and the Indians, of which he understood there was "considerable" carried on in the west, he could not tell. In short, Jersey was one of those few Americans who, having a moderate share of sense, have grown up without travel or books, and while they have not the weakness of idiocy, have the ignorance of the most unfavoured peasant. I have rarely met in a citizen of the republic a like absence of all acquired knowledge, except among some of the miserable emigrants from the mountains of North Carolina.

Having finished his political discourse, this illustrious son of "the Jarseys" was pleased to deliver himself of some rambling thoughts on travel. On this topic his style was more discursive. In general he thought people had better stay "to hum and mind their business, than to be licking it through the country, the way they do now in steamboats and on rail-roads. He thought they'd make more by it. Besides, when he went, he preferred going in conveyances to travelling. He didn't think it was a pleasant thing to be carried along as if you had a whirlwind wrapped around you; and then you met so many sorts of folks. No doubt," he added, "a good many of 'em is honest as anybody, but there's a good many more that'll cheat you out of your eyes, if they can make sixpence on 'em, and some that'll steal your bread and meat and throw it away, if they don't want it themselves." These remarks werged, as Mr. Weller would say, on the personal, but the ringing of the bell left no time for explanation. We hurried to the boat. It was much later than we thought, before the summons called our attention to the hour. When we arrived, the last of the barrels, boxes, &c., were going on board; the steam was up, and we were just ready to be off. Supper was soon laid, and we left the pleasant island while at table.

CHAPTER IV.

Another night on the Banner—A conversation with our western bridegroom—His opinions on the woman question decidedly anti-Wolstoncraft—His reasons for entering into matrimony—How he would sympathize with his wife in sorrow, with a practical illustration—Her story and disposition to lighten the darker shades of his doctrines.

THE night brought on another general engagement between the passengers and the vermin. The latter held the berths by prior occupancy and could not be routed, but they were more than willing to enter into a treaty for joint tenancy, with certain privileges in their favour. It was these privileges that made all the mischief. Like most questions in diplomacy, they were exceedingly difficult to settle; one party claimed and exercised them on all opportunities, the other denied them, and rarely failed to offer the most violent opposition to their use, even to the taking of life. It is due to the weaker party, however, to say that they gained by industry and perseverance what they never could by strength—the partial exercise of the prerogatives they claimed, and, in general, the final rout of their more powerful opponents.

They, at any rate, were productive of much merriment below, but it was a heavy affair in our quarter. I had few books which were accessible, and the long-haired bride had fewer ideas. She possessed little of that strength of mind and bold thought which characterize most of those rudely bred women. I thought the magnificent garniture of her head had taken the place of more valuable properties inside, as is often the case among more cultivated females. The strange character of the feeling manifested by her husband made me very desirous of drawing him into an expression of it in words before he left us, and as their landing-place would probably be reached on the third morning, I availed myself of a chance meeting on the shady guard in the afternoon, to engage him in conversation. A few words about the height of the water, the timber, and the prairies, served the purpose.

"You are going to become a prairie farmer?" I said.

"No, I've been onc afore, I've got a farm up the river hyur that I've crapped twice a'ready; there's a good cabin on it, and it's about as good a place, I reckon, as can be found in these diggins."

"Then you built a cage," I said, "and went back for your bird to put in it?"

He looked at me, and his face underwent a contortion, of which words will convey but a faint idea. It was a mingled expression of pride and contempt, faintly disguised by a smile that was intended to hide them.

"Why, I don't know what you Yankees call a bird," he replied, "but I call her a woman. I shouldn't make much account of havin a bird in my cabin, but a good, stout woman I should calculate was worth somethin. She can pay her way, and do a handsome thing besides, helpin me on the farm."

Think of that, ye belles and fair-handed maidens! How was my sentiment rebuked!

"Well, we'll call her a woman, which is, in truth, much the more rational appellation. You intend to make her useful as well as ornamental to your home?"

"Why, yes; I calculate 'tain't of much account to have a woman if she ain't of no use. I lived up hyur two year, and had to have another man's woman do all my washin and mendin, and so on, and at last I got tired o' totin my plunder back and forth, and thought I might as well get a woman of my own. There's a heap of things beside these that she'll do better than I can, I reckon; every man ought to have a woman to do his cookin and such like, 'kase it's easier for them than it is for us. They take to it kind o' naturally."

I could scarcely believe that there was no more human vein in the animal, and determined to sound him a little deeper.

"And this bride of yours is the one, I suppose, that you thought of all the while you were making your farm and building your cabin? You have, I dare say, made a little garden, or set out a tree, or done something of the kind to please her alone?"

"No; I never allowed to get a woman till I found my neighbours went ahead of me with 'em, and then I should a got one right thar, but there wasn't any stout ones in our settlement, and it takes so long to make up to a stranger, that I allowed I mought as well go back and see the old folks, and git somebody that I know'd thar to come with me."

"And had you no choice among your acquaintances? Was there no one person of whom you thought more than another?" said I.

"Yas, there was a gal I used to know that was stouter and bigger than this one. I should a got her if I could, but she'd got married and gone off over the Mississippi, somewhar."

The cold-hearted fellow! it was a perfectly business matter with him.

"Did you select this one solely on account of her size?" said I.

"Why, pretty much," he replied; "I reckon women are some like horses and oxen, the biggest can do the most work, and that's what I want one for."

"And is that all?" I asked, more disgusted at every word. "Do you care nothing about a pleasant face to meet you when you go home from the field, or a soft voice to speak kind words when you are sick, or a gentle friend to converse with you in your leisure hours?"

"Why, as to that," he said, "I reckon a woman ain't none the worse for talk because she's stout and able to work. I calculate she'll mind her own business pretty much, and if she does she won't talk a great deal to me; that ain't what I got her for."

"But suppose when you get home she should be unhappy, and want to see her parents and other friends?"

"Why I don't allow she will; I didn't get her for that."

"But if she does," I replied, really anxious to touch some chord that might afterwards vibrate in the poor girl's behalf; "if she does feel unhappy? You know one's feelings are not always under their own control."

"Wall, if she does I expect I shan't mind it much, if she keeps it to herself."

The selfish brute!

"If she kept it to herself, as you say, would you not attempt to alleviate her sorrows? would you not take her on some pleasant ride or walk, and speak very kindly to her, and endeavour to make your new nome and company agreeable to her?"

"Oh!" said he, laughing feebly, "I shall give her enough to eat and wear, and I don't calculate she'll be very daunsey if she gets that; if she is she'll git shet of it after a while."

My indignation increased at every word.

"But you brought her away from her home to be treated as a human being, not as an animal or machine. Marriage is a moral contract, not a mere bargain of business. The parties promise to study each other's happiness, and endeavour to promote it. You could not marry a woman as you could buy a washing machine, though you might want her for the same purpose. If you take the machine there is no moral obligation incurred, except to pay for it. If you take the woman, there is. Before you entered into this contract I could have shown you a machine that would have answered your purpose admirably. It would have washed and ironed all your clothes, and when done, stood in some out-of-the-way corner till it was wanted again. You would have been under no obligation, not even to feed and clothe it, as you now are. It would have been the better bargain, would it not?"

"Why that would be according to what it cost in the fust place; but it wouldn't be justly the same thing as havin a wife, I reckon, even if it was give to you."

"No, certainly not; it would free you from many obligations that you are under to a wife," (it was the first time, by the way, he had used the word,) "and leave you to pursue your own pleasure without seeing any sorrowful or sour faces about you."

"Oh, I calculate sour faces won't be of much account to me. If a woman 'll mind her business, she may look as thunderin as a live airthquake, I shan't mind it."

"No, sir, I see you possess a very happy insensibility to the woes or happiness of others. Your wife has occasion to congratulate herself on the prospects of life with a person elevated so far above the emotions which move the common herd."

I will not deny that the fellow's coolness somewhat enraged me. There was a fair prospect that I should have read him a lecture as long as he would find patience to hear, but at this moment his wife came round the stern of the cabin. I thought she had heard the conversation, for the usual insipid smile was replaced by a slightly contracted expression on her dark brow, and her voice sounded more as if it were the utterance of a soul conscious of its own identity and requirements, as she said, "John, will you come help me git to the big chist, the captain has had some truck put on it."

"Wall, you ain't a baby, I reckon, that you can't tote it somewhar else," was the amiable reply.

"But thar's such a heap of it," answered the poor girl, unwilling to be wholly refused—so early too!

"What if thar is a heap. Tote away ten or fifteen minutes, and thar won't be so much."

She turned away without another word, but as she passed the open window, I saw her wiping her eyes with the corners of her calico apron. It was the most human manifestation I had seen in her. Notwithstanding the intense disgust I felt for the base-hearted tyrant who stood before me, I was constrained to make one more effort on behalf of his victim. I said, therefore, as gently as I could speak, that it was not customary to treat females so in our country; that a man would be pronounced a brute who would refuse to render or procure assistance for a woman under like circumstances, even if she were his servant, and such conduct was still more abhorrent toward a wife.

"Wall, I reckon the Yankees may do as they like about them things, and I shall do jist the same. I don't think a woman's of much account anyhow, if she can't help herself a little and me too. If the Yankee women was raised up like the women here aar, they'd cost a heap less and be worth more."

This was the old key again. He was hopelessly benighted and brutified. His red flannel bosom and dark face inspired stronger aversion than ever, and I turned away, saying that I trusted his wife would agree with him in these opinions, or they might lead to some unpleasant differences.

"Oh, as to that," said he, "I reckon her pinions won't go fur anyhow; she'll think pretty much as I do, or not at all."

Thou beast! I exclaimed mentally; and sat down in the cabin pondering on the incredible brutality of such opinions in a civilized man, when the wife came in. She had just returned from her visit to the "big chist." There was no longer a doubt, from the expression of her face, that she had heard the conversation, and understood some part of it too. I left her to her own choice, whether to speak of it or not.

After a few minutes she said, "I reckon you'll think John talks hard about women."

I replied, that it was quite unusual to find persons who thought as he did.

"Well," said the faithful creature, "I reckon he don't think as bad as he says;" but her suffused eyes more than half contradicted her tongue.

There's too much of the true woman in her for this brute, notwithstanding her ignorance and silliness, thought I. It's an absolute waste of some of the fairest materials that compose human nature to throw her away with this selfish animal.

"How long have you been married?" I asked.

"Two weeks yesterday," she replied, the blood mantling through her dark cheek and brow.

"Had you been long acquainted?"

This question unscaled her tongue, and without waiting further inquiry, she ran on with her story.

"No, I never see'd him but three or four times.

We was new-comers in the settlement whar his folks lived, and nobody knowed when he come back that he wanted to git a woman to take with him. He come to our house once after night, and him and the old man had a long talk out doors, and finally he come in and stopt a little, and went off. The next day, dad ast me how I'd like to come to Illinice! I didn't take his meanin rightly, but John came again afore long, and then he ast me. I told him I'd heern 'twas a good country, but I liked it well enough thar. Then he said the old man had told him he might have me to go back with him if I was willin to it, and he allowed I would be. So after two or three weeks, we got married and put right off for his place."

"And you expect to be happier in the new home than you were with your father and mother?"

"I hain't calculated much about that; but I reckon I'll want to see them and the young ones a little, till I get broke in."

I could scarce forbear a laugh at the significance of this rude expression. It was a common one with her, but described the process before her more forcibly than the most elegant language. There was no hope for her but to settle into her slavery, and wear the shackles, if possible, without chafing under them. She had not character enough to redeem herself, and the brutal treatment to which she was doomed would tend every day to diminish the little that she had, and reduce her to the condition of a mere machine. Both parties were beyond hope: so that in gratifying my curiosity I had raised a crowd of painful emotions in my own breast, and turned a dark page for the poor over-brown child before me. They left us next day, the bride wrapping her light slippers in her pocket-handkerchief, and walking barefoot from the landing.

A WOMAN'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD.¹

BY IDA PFEIFFER.

Few places can offer less attraction to lady visitors than Canton; European women live there almost as prisoners, and never leave the house but in a closed litter; no places of amusement or social intercourse are open to them,—neither horses nor carriages are kept, and the only recreation is a little boating or walking in the evening in a small pleasure-garden laid out by the European settlers, and which is surrounded on three sides by a wall, the fourth being washed by the Pearl River. They cannot either, in the absence of objects of amusement and interest out of doors, find any amends in domestic occupation, for the entire management of the house is taken out of their hands by an officer entitled a Comprador, whose business it is to take charge of all the furniture, plate and linen, to engage the servants, provide their food, and be answerable for their fidelity; in consideration of which services he takes two dollars a month from the wages of each.

A great number of servants are kept; for as a separate one is required for every different kind of work, a family of, for instance, four persons will want not less than ten or twelve. First, every member of the family must have one servant exclusively; if there are children, there must be several nurses, and three or four persons must be kept for the common work, such as cleaning rooms, carrying wood and water, and so forth; yet with all this crowd of attendants, people are badly waited on, as, if the one happens to be absent whose particular kind of service you need at the moment, no other will supply his place. The Comprador makes all the purchases of provisions, and at the end of the month gives in his account, without troubling himself to enter too much into details. The mode of life of most Europeans is dull and monotonous, though sufficiently luxurious. The general routine is this:—In the morning, on first waking, they take a cup of tea in their rooms, and after that a cold bath. At nine they have breakfast, consisting of fried fish, cutlets, cold roast meat, eggs, tea, and bread-and-butter; and then every one goes to his respective business till four, when there comes a dinner of turtle, curry, roast meat, fruits, &c.; with Portuguese wines and English ale and porter, all iced. After this there is tea, and perhaps a walk in the before-mentioned garden.

Madame Pfeiffer, however, was not to be deterred by the consideration of personal risk, or fear of the Chinese "Mrs. Grundy," from making her short stay in Canton as amusing and instructive as possible; and a countryman of her own having chivalrously offered his attendance, she made several excursions, and saw most of what there was to be seen.

She went first to the studios of several painters, and greatly admired the brilliancy of their colouring. In composition and in their knowledge of perspective, they are, as is well known, in their infancy. The figures in their background are as large and as bright as those in the front, and rivers which should be in the remote distance appear to meander through the clouds.

With music the case is even worse than with painting; they have many instruments—violins, guitars, lutes, (though all with wire strings,) as well as drums, trumpets, and other wind instruments, but their performance upon them, in point of musical excellence, is about on a level with that on the marrow bones and cleavers. Of more mechanical arts—the manufacture of silk and porcelain, the carving in wood, ivory, and tortoiseshell, &c., they often produce admirable specimens. Among other manufactories, Madame Pfeiffer mentions one at Hong-Kong for coining bad money, which carries on its operation with the most perfect composure, and remains quite undisturbed, paying, of course, a tribute to certain mandarins and official dignitaries. The seas swarm with pirates, especially in the neighbourhood of Canton, but they manage in the same way to escape all troublesome interference with their professional undertakings. Madame Pfeiffer herself experienced an instance of the carelessness or the impotence of the Chinese government to put a stop to these outrages.

"On the 8th of August, Mr. Agassiz left home to accompany a friend to Whampoa, intending to be back the same evening, and I remained with the Chinese servants alone in the house. He did not come back as we had expected, and at length, towards one o'clock, I was startled by loud voices, and a violent knocking at the house-door. At first I supposed it was Mr. Agassiz returned, and wondered only at the noise, but I soon perceived that it was not, as I had supposed, at our house, but the opposite one; for, from the extreme narrowness of the streets, and the windows standing open day and night, it is very difficult to distinguish between the two. I heard a cry, however, 'Get up, get up! Dress yourself!' accompanied with exclamations of, 'It is dreadful! Horrible! Good God! Where did it happen?'

"I sprang out of bed and hastily threw on a few clothes, thinking either that there was a fire, or an insurrection broken out, which was daily expected. The common report was, that on the 12th or 13th of August a revolution would certainly take place, in which all the Europeans would be put to death. My situation, it may be supposed, was not a very pleasant one, for I was entirely alone with the Chinese. I soon, however, perceived one of the European gentlemen at a window, and called out to beg him to tell me what had happened, and he informed me that news had just come of two of his friends who had been going to Hong-Kong, (Whampoa was in the direct road,) having been attacked by pirates, one murdered, and the other very severely wounded. He then immediately left the window, so that I had no opportunity of asking the names of the unfortunate persons, and remained the whole night in the most terrible anxiety. Towards five in the morning I was relieved by the return of Mr. Agassiz, and I then learned that this calamity had befallen a Swiss, named Vauchec, whom we had met the evening before at the house of a neighbour, and who at eight o'clock had been merrily singing beautiful songs and quartetts. At nine he went on board his boat, moved off at ten, and a quarter of an hour afterwards had met his tragical end in the midst of thousands of Shampans and other vessels.

"It had been his intention to go to Hong-Kong, and thence in a larger vessel to Chang-Hai, a new port opened to the English in 1842. He had carried with him Swiss watches to the amount of 40,000 francs, and had been mentioning to a friend how carefully he had stowed them away, so that none of his servants had seen where they were placed. In this, however, it appeared he was mistaken; the pirates generally have in every house their spies among the servants, and they were only too well informed of poor Mr. Vauchee's secret. Scarcely a day passed indeed in which we did not hear of some violence towards Europeans, and in almost every counting-house, there was a store of muskets, pistols, and sabres kept in constant readiness."

Notwithstanding these perils, however, Madame Pfeiffer had the courage to sally forth under the protection of her countryman, to visit some of the Chinese temples, a gratification which nevertheless, under the circumstances, we cannot but think she would have done better to renounce.

The great temple at Honan is said to be one of the finest in China; attached to it, are extensive buildings and large gardens, surrounded by a high wall. You first enter a great outer court, at the end of which is a colossal portal leading into an inner one. Beneath this portal are the statues of two war gods, each eighteen feet high, in a threatening attitude, and with terribly distorted faces. They are supposed to be driving evil spirits from the temple. Beneath a second portal, resembling this, are placed four celestial kings; this gate leads unto the innermost court, where is the entrance to the temple itself. It is a hundred feet long, and about the same breadth, and has a flat roof from which depend a great number of lamps, glass lustres, artificial flowers, and coloured ribbons, and also many altars, candelabras, images, and vases for flowers and incense, which reminded me involuntarily of the decorations of Catholic churches.

In the foreground stand three altars, and behind these, three statues, representing Buddha in three different forms, as the past, the present, and the future. The figures are colossal and in a sitting posture. When we entered the temple there was a service for the dead going on, by the order of a mandarin, for the death of his wife. On the right and the left were priests, whose robes, and even their ceremonies, resembled those of the Catholic Church. At the middle altar was a mandarin devoutly praying, while two servants were wafting air to him with two long fans. He had on a brocaded robe reaching to the knee, with open sleeves, and beneath it white silk trowsers. On his breast he wore two birds as the insignia of his rank: round his neck he had a necklace of precious stones; and on his head a velvet cap of a conical shape and fastened with a gold button. He kissed the ground very frequently, and every time he did so, three little wax tapers were handed to him, which he first raised up high, and then gave to a priest, who stuck them up before the statue of Buddha, but without lighting them, and in the meantime a band of music composed of three performers, one blowing a kind of flute, another striking a metal ball, and a third scraping an instrument with strings.

Besides this chief temple, the authoress visited several others decorated with statues of wood, all gilt and painted in staring colours. In the Temple of Mercy, the zeal or folly of an American missionary had nearly been productive of fatal consequences. One of the Bonzes had offered to Madame Pfeiffer and her companion, each a little wax taper, which they were to present to his deity; but before they could do so, the American snatched the tapers from their hands, and angrily gave them back to the priest, declaring that such an action would be idolatry. The priest took great offence, immediately closed the door of the temple, and called to his comrades, who came running from all sides, pouring forth torrents of invective, making threatening gestures, and pressing closer and closer upon the strangers. They escaped with much difficulty, and almost fighting their way through the crowd; but the undaunted lady, notwithstanding this alarm, found herself able and willing to pay a visit to the Sacred Pigs, whose sty is a handsome stone hall, but which, notwithstanding all the care that is taken of them, was so powerfully perfumed, that even the authoress, little fastidious as she is, was compelled to make a hasty exit.

Sacred as these animals are, however, the Chinese, it seems, fully appreciate the savoury properties of roast pork.

Another excursion was to visit the pleasure palace and gardens of the Mandarin Hauqua. The house, though only one story high, was of considerable extent, and furnished with broad stately terraces. At the entrance were painted representations of two gods, whose business it is to drive away evil spirits. The front of the house consisted of various reception rooms, with no wall on one side, and opening immediately on a garden, on the ground floor; those on the floor above, on a broad terrace, also adorned with flowers, and enlivened by a splendid prospect of the ever animated river, of the beautiful country, and of the villages round Canton. Round the saloons lay a number of pretty little cabinets, separated only by transparent partitions painted with flowers. The number of chairs and sofas that stood round the apartment seemed to indicate that large parties were sometimes entertained in it. There were also some European articles of furniture, such as looking-glasses and clocks, besides an astonishing number of lamps and lanterns of glass, of transparent horn, gauze and paper, ornamented with glass beads, fringes, and tassels. There were also lamps attached to the walls, so that when lit up the rooms must have a very gay effect.

"As we had been so fortunate as to reach the house without being stoned, we took courage to visit also the great ornamental gardens, which lay about three-quarters of a mile off, on the banks of a canal communicating with the Pearl River. We had scarcely turned into the canal, however, before our boatmen attempted to put back; the reason of this proceeding was, that they saw lying in it a mandarin's boat with all the flags hoisted, a sign that the mandarin himself was on board, and they would not venture to take us Europeans past him, for fear of being punished by the great man, or stoned by the populace. We would not, however, allow them to turn, but passed close by the mandarin's boat, and then landed, and continued our progress on foot. We had soon collected behind us a great crowd, who began their operations by pushing children against us to make us angry. We armed ourselves, however, with patience, and reached the garden in safety, when the door was immediately closed behind us.

"We found the garden in perfectly good order, and crowded with kiosks, bridges, and so forth, and all the walks, great and small, trimmed with flower-pots, in which, as well as flowers, were a great number of little crippled fruit-trees.

"In this art of stunting and crippling trees the Chinese have obtained a mastery, and they prefer these dwarfs of about three feet high to the finest and most umbrageous trees that can be found. It is certainly curious to see what fine fruit these diminutive cripples will bear. Among the other decorations of the garden were ships, birds, fish, pagodas, and so forth, cut out of trees, in which the eyes of animals were made with eggs with black spots in them; little rocks ornamented with little flower-pots and little animals, which could be transported at pleasure, so as to form different groups, a favourite amusement, I am told, of the Chinese ladies.

"Another amusement, very fashionable for gentlemen as well as ladies, is flying kites, and for this purpose every Chinese gentleman's garden is provided with a lawn, where grown people will sit for hours gazing at the paper dragons, &c., which they have sent up.

"In another garden the travellers found a steam-boat, building under the superintendence of a Chinese, who had been thirteen years in America studying the art. The mandarin, to whom the garden belonged, had gone to Peking to receive a batton, as an acknowledgment of his services in having started the first steam-boat in the Chinese empire. The builder was much pleased with the praise of the Europeans, and also took considerable pride in his knowledge of the English language, in which he requested them to carry on the conversation."

A visit paid to a tea manufactory did not pass off so pleasantly. The proprietor himself conducted them into some great lofty halls where about six hundred people were at work, among them many women and children. Immediately on the entrance of the Europeans the whole throng rose up from their work, screaming and pointing their fingers at the visitors, and rushing towards them with such an appearance of fury that Madame Pfeiffer was "almost afraid." The united efforts of the proprietor and the superintendent were scarcely sufficient to keep them off, and they begged the strangers to make their inspection as quickly as possible. The alarm did not, however, prevent the authoress from taking a very cool observation of the process of preparing the tea, and afterwards accepting the hospitality of the proprietor. In the evening, as they returned in safety along the Pearl River, they witnessed a brilliant spectacle.

VOL. XIV.

"It was, as I afterwards learned, a festival of thanksgiving, offered to the gods by the owners of two junks which had made a long sea voyage without being attacked by pirates or damaged by the formidable typhoon. Two of the largest flower-boats, magnificently illuminated, were floating slowly down the stream; all their apartments resplendent with lamps and chandeliers; all the galleries marked out in lines of fire; the masts lit to the top with paper lanterns, while rockets were continually being sent up from the decks, which, if they did not ascend very high, made a famous noise. Two boats with torches and noisy music preceded the two illuminated junks, and from time to time they stopped and sent up flaming offerings of consecrated paper highly scented. This consecrated paper is used on a great variety of occasions, and as it has to be bought of the priests, the sale makes a considerable part of their revenue."

Madame Pfeiffer returned to Hong-Kong as she had come, in a Chinese junk, but this time she confesses not quite so fearlessly as before, for the melancholy fate of Mr. Vauché was too fresh in her recollection. In order therefore to prevent the pirates from taking any unnecessary trouble on her account, under the idea that she had any valuable property, she took care to pack the few things she carried with her in the presence of the servants, as it was likely enough that some of them might be engaged as reporters for those worthies.

From Hong-Kong she visited Singapore, Ceylon, Madras, Calcutta, Benares, Allahabad, Delhi, and Bombay; but as it is not possible for us to bear her company much longer, we prefer joining her again when she sets out on the more unfrequented route from Bagdad to Mossul.

We should not, however, omit to say, that she speaks with enthusiastic gratitude, of the kindness shown her by the English residents throughout India. Not only was every comfort and luxury of their splendid abodes placed at her disposal, but a higher value was imparted to these things by the warm-hearted friendliness with which they were offered, and which she felt was so much the more honourable to the bestowers, as her appearance and manner of travelling was so perfectly simple and unpretending.

From her commendations of many things English, we must indeed except most of the English steamers in the East, which are, from her account, in general bad and inordinately expensive. To the captain of the steamer, Forbes, however, which brought her from Bombay to Bassora, she was indebted for many attentions. The only European the city contained was the English agent, named Barseige, not an Englishman but an Armenian, to whom she had a letter, but who abruptly declined to afford her the shelter of his roof, so that had not Captain Lichfield offered her an asylum in the steamer, she would have been in the most awkward position.

From Bassora to Bagdad she was courteously offered a free passage in a Government steamer, a very welcome kindness, for though the way by land is shorter than by water, (390 instead of 500 miles,) it is dreary and dangerous, leading through deserts where there are no other inhabitants than wandering hordes of Bedouins and robbers.

The ancient city of the caliphs Madame Pfeiffer describes as making a glorious appearance from a distance, with its minarets and cupolas glittering in the sun, and the palaces and fortifications which in almost endless lines embrace the shores of the yellow Tigris, and the palm-groves and gardens which cover the country for many miles round; but, like nearly all Oriental cities, it does not improve on a closer inspection. The houses however are handsomer inside than outside. All the buildings are of brick, burnt and unburnt, of which a great deal is brought from the ruins of Babylon. The heat is here so great as to necessitate three changes of the sitting-room during the day. The early morning is passed in the ordinary rooms, towards nine o'clock people take refuge in cellars fifteen or twenty feet below ground, and after sun-set, they ascend to the terraces, where they drink tea and receive visits till a very late hour, and frequently also sleep under mosquito nets.

"In order to travel safely, and without great expense, from Bagdad to Mossul, one must join a caravan; I begged Mr. Swoboda, therefore, to recommend me to one. He, indeed, advised me by no means to venture alone amongst the Arabs, but to take at least one servant with me; this, however, with my very scanty resources, I could not afford; and besides, I was pretty well acquainted with the people, and knew from experience that I could trust them. The distance I had to go—from Bagdad to Mossul—is three hundred miles, and is usually done in fourteen days, or rather nights, for in the hot season that is the time for travelling. At five o'clock in the evening we were all to assemble in the caravanserai before the city gate; Mr. Swoboda accompanied me thither, and promised the guide in my name a good backsheesh if he would pay me some attention on the way. And so off I set on my long journey, through many difficulties and dangers, without any convenience or any kind of protection. I travelled like the poorest Arab, and had to make up my mind, as he must, to endure the burning sun, to content myself for food with bread and water, or at most a handful of dates or a few cucumbers, and to require no other resting-place than the hot ground.

"Our caravan was small; it consisted of only one-and-twenty camels, of which the most were laden, and twelve Arabs, of whom five were going on foot; but some miles beyond the town we were joined by other travellers, mostly traders, and after that the numbers varied almost every evening, some remaining at different stations, and others arriving to join us. But not unfrequently our caravan presented such an assemblage of rabble that I was more afraid of them than of the robbers; and, indeed, I was told it was by no means uncommon for these to join a caravan in order to find better opportunities of pursuing their profession. At all events I could not feel much confidence in the protection of such a mob of pilgrims, traders, &c. most of whom had never drawn a sword or fired a pistol in their lives. Two or three dozen of well-armed robbers, it was evident, could easily manage a hundred of them.

"We rode the first night for about ten hours through a flat and desolate country—for a few miles from Bagdad all cultivation appeared to be suddenly cut off—and we then reached a place on the Tigris, called Yengilché, where there was a khan, but by no means so handsome and clean a one as I found on the road to Babylon. Hunger drove me out into the village, where I went from hut to hut in hopes of hunting up something to eat, and at last was so fortunate as to become the possessor of some milk and three eggs. I then filled my leathern water-bottle at the Tigris and returned to the khan to consume my magnificent repast. The eggs I ate directly, the milk I saved for the evening, and I had certainly more satisfaction in this my hard-earned meal than is often found at the most richly furnished table. On my foraging expedition through the village I noticed that it had once been far more extensive, as I saw many decayed houses; but the plague, it seems, had carried off the greater part of the inhabitants.

"I had made some disparaging observations upon my khan at this place, but how glad should I have been the next day of a far worse one, so that it had only afforded me some shelter from the fierce intolerable radiance of the sun! We encamped on a stubble field, far from any human dwelling, and the utmost that could be done for my accommodation was to drive two or three sticks into the ground, and throw a cloth over them so as to get a little shade; but my tent was of such small dimensions, as well as such simple construction, that I had to remain in it constantly in a sitting posture, and dreaded to make the least movement lest I should bring my house about my ears. I could not help thinking with envy of some of the missionaries I had met travelling in the most luxurious manner, with laden pack-horses, and tents, and servants; and especially afterwards when the heat rose to above forty degrees of Reaumur, and I could get nothing to eat but a bit of hard bread with lukewarm water to dip it in, and one cucumber without either salt or vinegar. I never lost heart, however, nor for a single moment repented that I had exposed myself to these hardships.

"The first considerable stay that we made was at a village about three miles from the little town of Kerkoo; this was the home of the Arab leader of our caravan, and his house, as well as several others, lay round a dirty court-yard, surrounded by a wall and with only a single entrance. Men and mules, horses and asses, were sleeping all together about it as we entered, and our animals trotted past so close to the sleepers that I was quite frightened for them. They knew, however, where they had to go to, and were very careful, and the sleepers lay quite undisturbed.

"My Arab had been three weeks away from his home, and was now returning for a very short time, yet no one of his family got up to greet him except one little old woman whom I took for his mother; and as she exchanged no word of welcome with him, and merely ran by his side without doing anything to help him, I thought she might almost as well have remained lying with the rest.

"His house, in which I was for the time to take up my abode, consisted of one long high room, separated by partitions, which did not reach quite to the front wall, with three narrow divisions, about thirty feet long by nine broad, each of which was occupied by a family. There was no light but what came through the common door of entrance and through two holes in the ceiling. A corner was assigned for my accommodation in one of these divisions, and my first study was devoted to ascertaining the degree of relationship subsisting between the different members of the family. At first this was rather difficult, as there was no sort of tenderness shown to any but the little children, who seemed to be regarded as common property. I made out at last, however, that there was a grandfather, a married son, and a married daughter.

"The grandfather had been with us on the journey; he was a fine vigorous old man of sixty, but a desperately quarrelsome old fellow, who was always wrangling about something or other and contradicting his son, our leader, who took it very quietly and always did what his father told him. The animals of the caravan belonged to them in common; but when we got home the old gentleman did not trouble himself to look after them but betook himself to repose. It was easy to see that he was the patriarch of the family.

"As far as I could judge from a first impression, the character of the Arab appears cold and repulsive; neither man nor wife, father nor daughter, ever exchanged a friendly word, but spoke only what was absolutely necessary. There was, as I have said, more affection shown towards the children, who might riot and scream as much as they would, and were never scolded however naughty they were. But as soon as the child is grown up, it comes to his turn to bear with the weaknesses of the parents, which he does, treating them with great tenderness and respect. To my great astonishment I heard the children call their mothers 'mama,' or 'nana' and their fathers 'baba.'

"The women lay the whole of the day long, lolling on the ground; only towards evening did they make up their minds to get up and set about baking some bread. For this or for any other kind of work their costume is excessively inconvenient, as their sleeves hang down half an ell from their arms, and whenever they set about anything they have to tie them in a knot behind. Of course, they continually get loose, and are a great hindrance, at the same time the worthy ladies, it must be confessed, make them of as much use as they can, for they make them do duty as kitchen cloths, to wipe spoons and other utensils, as well as for pocket handkerchiefs.

"I was terribly tormented by the women at first during the two days we had to pass here. They pressed round me and examined my clothes, then they tried to take my turban from my head, and at last became so intolerable, that I was driven to seize one of them suddenly by the arm, and turn her out of doors. I had done it so quickly that she did not know what I was going to do till she found herself outside, and probably they supposed me much stronger than I really was, for when I signified to the rest that I would do the same to them if they over-stepped a circle that I drew round me, they drew back and respected my boundary. The only trouble I had afterwards was from the wife of my host, who worried me to give her things. I gave her a few trifles at first, but when I saw plainly that she would go on till I had nothing left, I appealed to her husband, and threatened to leave his house and seek another shelter if she did not leave off. As, to Arab notions of hospitality, this would be a most terrible disgrace, he immediately gave his wife a most hearty scolding, and after that I had some peace.

"In the evening I saw, to my great joy, a large pot set over the fire, and into it was put a good quantity of mutton to boil. I had for eight days eaten nothing but bread, cucumbers, and dates, and I really longed for some warm and more nourishing food. But, alas! how did my appetite decline when I saw the dish prepared. The old woman threw some handfuls of small red grains and a great number of onions into another pot containing water, and in about half an hour she put in her dirty hands, stirred it about, squeezed it, and then took out some of the red grains, chewed them, and spit them back into the saucepan. This operation she repeated many times; she then took a dirty rag, strained this delicate sauce through it, and poured it over the mutton. In spite of my determination not to touch it, however, I so much felt the want of food that I began to reflect how many things of which I had already eaten were probably not at all cleaner, only that I had not seen them prepared; and, in short, I partook of this dainty dish, and found myself much strengthened by it.

"The night of the 30th June, the last of our journey, was the most fatiguing, for we made a march of eleven hours. At about half way we crossed the river Hasar, famous for the passage of Alexander the Great. It was broad but not deep, and we rode through it; on one side at a considerable distance ran a chain of mountains, and nearer a range of bold, low hills; but the want of trees in this part of Mesopotamia is most striking; during the last five days I had not seen one, and I really believe there must be in this country many people who have never seen one in their lives, for there were tracts of from twenty to thirty miles where not so much as a shrub grew. Water, fortunately, is not wanting, for every day we crossed one or two little rivers. At seven o'clock we reached the town of Mossul, which lies on a trifling elevation in a very large valley on the western bank of the river, which is here considerably narrower than by Bagdad. I had been now fourteen days day and night wearing the same clothes; I had only once had a warm meal—the memorable one above mentioned—and had been exposed to the most tremendous heat, and had been almost constantly riding, yet, notwithstanding these hardships, I was perfectly well and in the best spirits.”

One of the first objects of Madame Pfeiffer before leaving this country was to visit the ruins of Nineveh and view the excavations made under the direction of Mr. Layard; but as these are very likely already known to our readers, as far as description can make them, we pass on to what will probably have more novelty.

At Mossul our adventurous heroine found that there was a possibility—though avowedly not without considerable danger—of making a journey into Persia, a design which she had before been compelled to abandon on account of an important insurrection that had broken out in the country through which she would have had to pass. Even at present she was well aware that the result of her enterprise was somewhat doubtful, and therefore as a measure of precaution, in case she should never return, forwarded her papers to her sons in Europe; and then with a stout heart joined a caravan that was going, though by a circuitous route, to Tabreez, carrying with her a few letters of introduction to native Persians, and a list of Persian and Arabic words for every day use.

“On the second night’s journey, as the caravan was passing through a beautiful valley, into which a resplendent moon was pouring down its full radiance, half-a-dozen stout fellows, armed with great cudgels, sprang out and seized the bridles of the foremost of the party.” Madame Pfeiffer saw, of course, that they had fallen among thieves, and began to rejoice, she says, that she had had the lucky thought of leaving behind her her papers and sundry treasures that she had collected during her travels; and she seems to have awaited with perfect calmness the result of this little agreeable meeting. One of the travellers had sprung from his horse, and, seizing one of the fellows by the throat, threatened to shoot him. This threat had a most admirable effect; these tractable highwaymen immediately desisted from their attack, and in the course of a few minutes hostilities had ceased, and the belligerents were engaged in a pleasant conversation, which ended at last by the robbers pointing out to the caravan a comfortable place for their bivouac, and receiving for their services a friendly backsheesh. From Madame Pfeiffer, as a woman, they appear to have been too much of gentlemen to ask anything. A day or two afterwards they had to pass through a magnificent mountain pass; high walls of rock suddenly opened to form a passage for a river and a narrow path among loose stones and fallen masses of rock. Along these the practised animals climbed like chamois, and carried the travellers with steady steps past the edge of a fearful precipice, with the torrent roaring and dashing from rock to rock at the bottom. They had proceeded for nearly an hour this way when the moon became obscured by clouds, and they were soon enveloped in thick darkness. The guide kept constantly striking fire, in order to throw some light on the path; but it was soon found absolutely necessary to make a halt, and stand one behind another, motionless, as if changed into stone, till the morning dawn enabled them to advance with rather less danger. They found themselves in a beautiful circle of mountains, and saw rising far in the background the snowy head of an enormous giant peak. As they ascended towards the plateau for which they were bound, they perceived on several places small spots of blood, but no one paid much attention to them, as it was thought a horse or mule might have torn himself against the crags and left these signs behind him. Soon, however, they came to a spot where there had been a great pool of blood, and looking about for the cause, discovered two human bodies hanging half-way down the rocks. The travellers turned shudderingly from this scene of murder, and continued their journey towards the little town of Raandus.

At this place, which is scarcely ever visited by an European, Madame Pfeiffer found herself an object of intense curiosity, especially to the women. As soon as they heard of the arrival of the Ingleso—for here every European is supposed to be English, as in England formerly every foreigner was catalogued as a Frenchman—they ran in crowds to see her, and not merely to see, but to institute a very searching inquiry into the material of her clothes, and of every thing belonging to her. After a time one of her numerous visitors hit upon the happy idea of offering her a bath—an offer which she, of course, accepted with great joy; but, unfortunately, it appeared when the bath was ready that the locality chosen for it was a cattle-shed that had no door, the vacant space being filled by a throng of eagerly curious faces; and Madame Pfeiffer found that, unless she would consent to go through the ceremony in presence of the whole company, she would have to renounce the prospect of this most welcome refreshment. At this place she had to wait some time for a caravan. The evenings and nights were spent upon a terrace at the top of the house; the day in a dark hole, crouching on the ground, and making use of her knees for a table, if she wished to write. The women, as usual, lounged about her all day, or played or quarrelled with the children. Madame Pfeiffer, as a good housewife, was naturally scandalized at this state of “do-nothingness,” especially as there was the most obvious need of washing and patching in their persons and clothes. She could not remonstrate with them in words, but she pointed to the rags in their garments, and then fetched a needle and thread, and gave them a practical lesson in the valuable art of mending, which was by no means thrown away, and she soon found herself the directress of a regular sewing-school. No less satisfactory was the result of her efforts in another department. The behaviour of the children, when anything happened to cross them, was of the most outrageous description; they would fling themselves on the ground, roll in the dirt, kick, scream, and howl, and not unfrequently, out of pure wickedness, lay dirty hands on the bread, melons, or any eatable that chanced to be near. To cure them Madame Pfeiffer, as before, had recourse to pantomime—she behaved herself precisely in the same way—and the astonished juvenile, after gazing at her in speechless wonder, at length understood her meaning, and to a certain extent amended the error of his ways. The reform proceeded so far that the child would often go and give itself a good washing, apparently for the purpose of affording her pleasure, and then come and exhibit its hands and face. "How much good," she adds, "might any one acquainted with their language do among people so willing to be taught. What a fine field would appear to be opened among them for the exertions of missionaries; yet the result of missionary labours in the East appears hitherto to have been the reverse of encouraging." So far as Madame Pfeiffer's inquiries on the subject went, indeed, it amounted as nearly as possible to zero. We have not space here to inquire whether the missionaries themselves are in any respect to blame for the failure, but we earnestly recommend the inquiry to those who are endeavouring to turn into this channel the benevolent energies that might be better employed on less remote and uncertain objects.

We regret to be compelled here, for the present, to take our leave of Madame Pfeiffer, having already been induced by the interest of the subject to devote to her volumes more space than we can well spare. We would willingly have followed her through the remainder of her wanderings, and seen her, after a thousand perils past, lodged safely in the bosom of her family and her native city. But even if we had done so, we could not have laid down the story of her adventures, as we do those of a fictitious heroine, with the satisfactory conviction that there is nothing more to be said; for the truth is, that at the present moment she is (not quietly at home in Vienna, but) engaged in a second circumnavigatory expedition, and will once more have "travelled the earth's wide region round" before we hear of her again.

THE RIVAL.

C. R. LESLIE, R.A.

THE prince of illustrators of Don Quixote—the finest interpreter of the more humorous scenes of Shakspeare—is the accomplished painter who has furnished this capital subject. Woe to the unlucky wight, grown old and palsy, who ventures to lay siege to the heart of a youthful maiden, as mirthful and malicious as she is irresistible. Hero is a case in point. The poor old gallant, half disabled by years and half by buckram and wadding, is puffing like a turkey cock in his endeavour to pick up the fan which the fair one has spitefully let fall, while her younger and more favoured suitor is sharing the laugh at his rival's expense.

THE SUBLIME PORTE.

IN offering a few remarks upon the government of Turkey, which, by common accord, is known in Europe and the United States as "The Sublime Porte," it is not intended to quote history, but rather to speak of it; only in reference to the present period. It is nevertheless necessary to state that the Turks themselves call the Turkish Empire Mémlik-i-Othmanieh, or the "Ottoman States" (kingdoms), in consequence of their having been founded by Othman, the great ancestor of the present reigning sovereign, Abd-ul-Mejid. They are no better pleased with the name of Turk than the people of the United States are, generally, with that of Yankee: it bears with it a meaning signifying a gross and rude man—something indeed very much like our own definition of it, when we say any one is "no better than a Turk;" and they greatly prefer being known as Ottomans. They call their language the "Ottoman tongue"—Othmanli diloo—though some do speak of it as the Turkish.

As regards the title, "The Sublime Porte," this has a different origin. In the earlier days of Ottoman rule, the reigning sovereign, as is still the case in some parts of the East, held courts of justice and levees at the entrance of his residence. The palace of the Sultan is always surrounded by a high wall, and not unfrequently defended by lofty towers and bastions. The chief entrance is an elevated portal, with some pretensions to magnificence and showy architecture. It is guarded by soldiers or doorkeepers well armed; it may also contain some apartments for certain officers, or even for the Sultan himself; its covering or roof, projecting beyond the walls, offers an agreeable shade, and in its external alcoves are sofas more or less rich or gaudy. Numerous loiterers are usually found lingering about the portal, applicants for justice; and there, in former times, when the Ottomans were indeed Turks, scenes of injustice and cruelty were not unfrequently witnessed by the passer-by.

This lofty portal generally bears a distinct title. At Constantinople it has even grown into one which has given a name to the whole government of the Sultan. I am not aware, however, that the custom here alluded to was ever in force in that capital, though it certainly was in other parts of the empire of Othman. It is not improbable that it was usual with all the Sultans, who, at the head of their armies, seldom had any permanent fixed residence worthy of the name of palace. Mahomet the Second, who conquered Constantinople from the degenerate Greeks, may, for some time after his entrance into the city of Constantine—still called in all the official documents, such as "*Firman*s," or "Royal Orders," Kostantinieh—have held his courts of justice and transacted business at the elevated portal of his temporary residence. The term "Sublime Porte," in Turkish, is Deri Alich, or the elevated and lofty door; the Saxon word door being derived from the Persian der, or dor, in common use in the Ottoman language, which is a strange mixture of Tartar, Persian, and Arabic. The French, or rather the Franks, in their earlier intercourse with Turkey, translated the title literally "La Sublime Porte," and this in English has been called, with similar inaccuracy, "The Sublime Porte."

Long since, the Ottoman Sultans have ceased administering justice before their palaces, or indeed anywhere else, in person. The office is delegated to a deputy, who presides over the whole Ottoman government, with the title of Grand Vezir, or in Turkish, Véziri Azam, the Chief Vezir, whose official residence or place of business, once no doubt at the portal of his sovereign, is now in a splendid edifice in the midst of the capital. At Constantinople the Ottoman government is also called the "Sublime Government," Devleti Alih, a word closely bordering on that of superiority and preeminence claimed by the "Heavenly Government" of the empire of China. The Sultan, in speaking of his government, calls it "My Sublime Porte." The Grand Vezir being an officer of the highest rank in the empire—a Pacha, of course, in fine, the Pacha—his official residence is known in Constantinople as that of the Pacha, Pachu Kapousee, i.e. the "Gate of the Pacha." The chief entrance to the "seraglio" of the former Sultans, erected on the tongue of land where once stood the republican city of Byzantium, called the "Imperial Gate," or the Babi Humayoon, is supposed by some to have given rise to the title of "The Sublime Porte;" but this is not correct. It may have once been used as a court of justice, certainly as a place where justice was wont to be executed, for not unfrequently criminals were decapitated there; and among others, the head of the brave but unfortunate Aâli Pacha, of Yanina in Albania, the friend of Lord Byron, was exposed there for some days previous to its interment beyond the walls of the city.

The title of porte, or door, is used in Constantinople to designate other departments of the government. The bureau of the Minister of War is called the Seraskier Kapousee, or the Gate of the Serasker (head of the army); and those of the Ministers of Commerce and Police are called, the one Tijaret Kapousee, and the other Zabtieh Kapousee. These, however, are sufficient, without mentioning any other facts, to explain the origin and nature of the title of the Ottoman government, known as "The Sublime Porte."

The Sultan of the Ottoman Empire is known by his subjects under the title of Sultân, which word signifies a ruler; and generally as Shevketlu Padischah Effen-dimiz, "His Majesty the Emperor our Lord;" and all foreign governments now recognise him as an Emperor, and call him by the title of "Imperial Majesty." The definition of the word Padischah is supposed to be "Father of Kings," and originally was Peder Schah, the first part of it (Peder) being the origin of our Saxon word Fâder, or father. In his own tongue he is called Khan, in Persian Shah, and in Arabic Sultan, all meaning, in extensu, the same, viz. King, Sovereign, or Prince. He reigns over one of the most extensive empires of the world, all possessed or acquired by inheritance from his ancestors, who obtained it by conquest.

Until the reign of the late Sultan, Mahmoud the Second; the Ottoman sovereigns had their residence in the "Seraglio" before alluded to, in the city of Constantinople. Its high walls were not, however, sufficiently strong to protect them against the violence of the Janissaries, and after their destruction the remembrance of the scenes of their cruelty induced the late and present Sultan to forsake it for the safer and more agreeable banks of the Bosphorus. The extensive and very picturesque buildings of the Seraglio are now left to decay; they offer only the spectacle of the "dark ages" of Turkey, gloomy in their aspect, as in their history, and yet occupying one of the most favoured spots in the world, on which the eyes of the traveller are fixed as by a charm in approaching the great capital of the East, and on which they dwell with a parting feeling of regret as he bids the magnificent "City of the Sultan" farewell.

On the Bosphorus are two splendid palaces, one on the Asiatic and the other on the European shore. The first is called Beylerbey, "Prince of Princes," the latter Teherâgiân, "The Lights." Both are beautiful edifices, in excellent taste; and, as architecture has done in all ages, they serve to show the advance of the people who erected them in the noblest of the arts.

The Turkish Sultan, in theory, is a despotic sovereign, while in practice he is a very paternal one. As the supreme head of the government, he may exercise unlimited power; few checks exist to preserve the lives and property of his subjects against an influence which he might exercise over them. His ancestors conquered the country, and subjugated its inhabitants to his rule with his troops, consequently it all belonged to him, and could only be possessed by his gift: thus, in fact, the empire is his, and the concessions made by him to his subjects are free-will offerings, which are not drawn from him by compulsion on their part, but are grants on his, in behalf of reform and civilization. The feudal system of land-tenure was abolished by his father, and there is now scarcely a feature of it remaining. It is several years since the present Sultan spontaneously removed all the arbitrary power hitherto possessed and frequently exercised by his predecessors; at the same time he granted all his subjects a "Charter of Rights," called the Hatti Sherif of Gulckhaneh, or imperial sacred rescript of Gulckhaneh, named after a summer-house or Kiosck within the precincts of the Seraglio, where it was read before him by the present Grand Vezir, Reclid Pacha, in the presence of the whole diplomatic corps, and all the ministers and other high officers of the Ottoman government. In this charter the Sultan conceded all the rights and privileges which could be expected from a sovereign prince not reigning with a constitutional form of government. He has never withdrawn any of these privileges, or resumed the power which he then renounced. Moreover, this charter limited the power of all his officers. The only punishments which they can now exercise are fine and imprisonments of limited extent. None can any longer inflict the "bastinado," nor capital punishment for crimes of a graver nature; these are reserved for the Councils or Boards at the capital and the chief towns of each province. The sentences of the latter are, in all cases, subject to the confirmation of the former, and the decrees of the Council of State, held at the [Sublime Porte, are laid before the Sultan previous to their adoption as laws." The following extract, translated from a small work in the Turkish language, published by the order of the government in 1848, will serve to show the spirit of the reforms made by the late and present Sultans:

"Fifty years ago, certain Governors-General of the provinces of the empire, aided by individuals known as Déré Beys, (petty princes, who had usurped and maintained arbitrary power in the interior of the country,) exercised despotic power over the persons and properties of the subjects of His Majesty. The Sultan, having observed this abuse of authority, ardently desired to suppress so serious an evil; but at that period the Janissaries, the only coercive force of the empire, formed a powerful body of rebels, which disregarded the rights of the people, and aided the plans of the factious. The Sultan endeavoured for some time to draw these rebellious forces to a wiser and more salutary course, and even acted with indulgence toward the more criminal, and in this way deferred the accomplishment of his reforms until a favourable moment. The late illustrious Sultan, Mahmoud II., a prince possessing a character full of benevolence and justice, yet of uncommon determination and courage, finding the Janissaries unable to curb their own vicious inclinations, found it imperiously necessary to suppress the entire order, and to create a regular army in their stead, on which reliance could be placed to sustain the authority of their sovereign. In fine, the Sultan, seeing that all his generous motives were unappreciated, and hoping by their disbandment to secure the peace and tranquillity of his subjects, found himself compelled to suppress the order by violent means. It need not be here related that the sudden destruction of the armed force of an empire, before another has been properly created to supplant it, will expose it to the evil designs of its enemies. In this position Sultan Mahmoud found his empire situated some twenty years ago. In the midst of his important reforms he was called upon to protect his empire against the attacks of Russia, to suppress a revolt in Albania, the Morea, and later to carry on an internal warfare with the ambitious Pacha of Egypt. His young army, but half organized, was poorly qualified to take the field against troops which had enjoyed the advantage of instruction under officers of experience. He even, near the close of his eventful reign, had the sorrow to know that his fleet had proved unfaithful, and gone over to his rebel governor. An untimely death put an end to the reign of this illustrious and talented, though unfortunate prince; and in the midst of disordered finances, a defeated army, and a misguided marine, the present Sultan, Abd-ul-

Mejid Khan, succeeded, at an early age, to the throne of his ancestors.

"Endowed with a character eminently distinguished for its sentiments of justice, clemency, and the most unbounded benevolence, his present Imperial Majesty, on ascending the throne, formed the design of allaying all the troubles and dissensions which were preparing the ruin of his country, and destroying the confidence of his subjects in the stability of his government. Measures were at once adopted to reorganize the army and improve the education of its officers; the Egyptian question, one of great gravity for the welfare of the empire, was, by judicious management, settled in a manner satisfactory to the sovereign and his Governor-General, and the imperial fleet returned to its natural obedience. By reforms in the administration of the government, the tranquillity of his Majesty's subjects was secured against molestation on the part of their authorities; and the acts of tyranny, become so common from the governors of the more distant parts of the empire, were suppressed. Thus, in a short time, the Sultan was enabled to render his accession illustrious by acts which secured to every individual his life, fortune, honour, and the faculty of pursuing his affairs free from all apprehension.

"The prosperity of his country and the happiness of his people having thus been secured, His Majesty was left to effect the most sincere wish of his heart by carrying out the task which he had assumed, of instituting salutary reforms in all the branches of his government, based upon principles of strict justice and equity. Actuated by sentiments of generosity and clemency, he desired also that the expenses of the government should be diminished; and the results of his paternal administration, by a gradual increase of his revenues, enabled him to do so without any loss or detriment to the public service.

"The military force of the empire, which at the commencement of his reign was only 50,000 troops, without scarcely any organization, by care, at the present moment amounts to 150,000 regular troops, and 150,000 more as national militia, all provided with arms, and exercised; thus offering a force of some 300,000, which may at any time be called into active service. In the marine of the Sultan there are now 15,000 scamen, all under strict organization and regular instruction.

"It has been the constant desire of His Imperial Majesty to maintain and strengthen with all friendly powers relations of peace and sincere amity; relations which, as much as any others, promote the prosperity and well-being of the empire and the welfare of his subjects.

"Beside the naval, military, and medical academies established at the capital, many young men have been sent to be educated in London, Paris, and Vienna, in all the branches of knowledge, the arts and sciences. Instructors and architects have also been engaged from Europe and America, for employment in the marine and army of the Sultan, and the great benefits arising from their labours are daily extending."

"It may also be added, with the assurance of its being regarded as a strong evidence of the salutary administration of the government of the Sublime Porte, that the many families which forsook their native soil to seek a shelter and a home in foreign lands, where for some twenty-five years they remained exiles from their own country, have, by the wise measures of the Sultan, and the justice which actuates all his acts, happy to return to their homes, solicited permission to do so. This act on their part has not been in any measure promoted by the government, but has taken place wholly from a conviction that the dominions of the Sultan offer them more safety and happiness than those of any other sovereign.

"The preceding will serve to show the unprejudiced mind of the reader that the heavy clouds which obscured the reign of the present Sultan, at the commencement of his career, have disappeared; that the past seven years offer a convincing evidence of the generous intentions of his Majesty, and of the salutary nature of the reforms which he designs effecting. What may not be expected from the sway of so enlightened and clement a prince? We submit this question to the minds of all just and impartial men, and devoutly offer the prayer that the life of a sovereign so precious to his empire and people may be prolonged. He is doubtless an agent in the hands of the ALL-WISE, to regenerate the vast country placed by HIM under his charge."

The present Sultan, Abd-ul-Mejid, which name is Arabic, and signifies "Servant of the Glorious," (God,) is now in his twenty-ninth year: he succeeded his late illustrious father, Mahmoud II., in 1839, when he was but seventeen years of age. His father had inspired him with the desire to improve his empire and promote the welfare of his people by salutary reforms, and frequently carried him with him to observe the result of the new system which he had introduced into the different branches of the public service. Previous to his accession to the throne, but little is known of his life, or the way in which he was brought up. It may be supposed to have been much like that of all oriental princes. Except when he attended his parent, he seldom left the palace. He had several sisters and one brother, all by other mothers than his own. The former have, since his accession, died, with the exception of one, the wife of the present Minister of War. His brother still lives, and resides with the Sultan in his palace. The mother of the Sultan, who was a Circassian slave of his father, is said to be a woman of a strong mind and an excellent judgment. She exercised much influence over her son when he ascended the throne, and her counsels were greatly to his benefit. He entertains for her feelings of the deepest respect, and has always evinced the warmest concern for her health and happiness. She is a large, portly lady, yet in the prime of life; and although she possesses a fine palace of her own, near to that of her son, she mostly resides with him. Her revenues are derived from the islands of Chio and Samos.

In person the Sultan is of middle stature, slender, and of a delicate frame. In his youth he suffered from illness, and it was thought that his constitution had been severely affected by it. His features are slightly marked with the small-pox. His countenance denotes great benevolence and goodness of heart, and the frankness and earnestness of character which are its chief traits. He does not possess the dignified and commanding figure which eminently characterised his father, and in conduct is simple and diffident. His address, when unrestrained by official forms and ceremony, is gentle and kind in the extreme—more affable and engaging than that of his Pashas; and no one can approach him without being won by the goodness of heart which his demeanour indicates. He has never been known to commit an act of severity or injustice; his purse and his hand have always been open for the indigent and the unfortunate, and he takes a peculiar pride in bestowing his honours upon men of science and talent. Among his own subjects he is very popular and much beloved; they perceive and acknowledge the benefit of the reforms which he has instituted, and he no longer need apprehend any opposition on their part. In some of the more distant portions of his empire, such as Albania, where perhaps foreign influence is exerted to thwart his plans, his new system of military rule has not yet been carried out; but it evidently soon will be, especially when its advantage over the old is felt by the inhabitants.

The palaces of the Sultan, on both banks of the Bosphorus, though externally showy, are very plain and simple in their interior arrangement. They are surrounded by high walls, and guarded by soldiery. The first block of buildings which the traveller approaches on visiting them, up the Bosphorus, are the apartments of the eunuchs; the second his harem, or female apartments; and the third those of the Sultan. Beyond this are the offices of his secretaries, guard, and band of music, all beyond the walls of the palace. The number of eunuchs is some sixty or eighty, and the females in the harem about 300 to 400. The Sultan never marries; all the occupants of his harem are slaves, and he generally selects from four to six ladies as his favourites, who bear children to him, and who succeed to his throne. The remainder of the females are employed as maids of honour, who attend upon his mother, his favourites, his brother's mother, favourite if he has one, and upon his children. Many hold offices in the palace, and are charged with the maintenance of good order and regularity. Many of them are aged females, who have been servants to his father, his mother, and sisters and brother, and have thus claims upon his kindness and protection. The only males who have the right of entrance to the imperial harem are the eunuchs, all of whom are black, and come mutilated from Egypt. The chief of their corps is an aged "gentleman of colour," possessing the Sultan's confidence in an eminent degree, and in official rank is higher than any other individual connected with the imperial palace. The eunuchs are assigned to the service of the different ladies of the harem, do their shopping in the bazaars, carry their messages, and accompany them on their visits. Indeed, their duties are much like those of well-bred gallants in our country, without any of the ambitious feelings which animate the latter, and certainly they never aspire to the possession of their affections. Some of them grow wealthy, possess much property, and slaves of both sexes, but as they can have no families the Sultan is their legal heir. Eunuchs are possessed by many of the pachas and other officers of rank, for the purpose of serving their wives, sisters, and daughters: they cost four or five times as much as an ordinary black slave, and the highest officers seldom possess more than ten of them at once. From them much interesting information can at times be procured relative to the most sacred and least known of the Mussulman family system. They are generally of mild disposition, gentle and amiable; though this is not always the case, for they sometimes are petulant, cross, and confoundedly non-communicative.

The Sultan's palace is peculiarly his private home, and no officers of high rank occupy it with him. He has four private secretaries and as many chamberlains. He has also two aids-de-camp, who are generally in command of the body-guard, which has its quarters in the vicinity of the palace. He seldom, however, commands their attendance: their duties are to keep watch at the principal entrances, and to salute him or any of his higher officers who may arrive at or leave the royal residence. The secretaries write out his orders, and the chief of their number receives all foreign functionaries or Turkish dignitaries who visit the palace on business. One of them is the Sultan's interpreter, and translates articles for his perusal from the many foreign papers received from Europe and America by the Sultan. All official documents are sent to the chief secretary by the different ministers of the Sublime Porte, and those received from the foreign embassies and legations are translated there, previous to being transmitted to the Sultan. No foreign legation ever transacts any official business directly with the Sultan, or through the chief (private) secretary; but the latter may be visited on matters relating to the sovereign personally. Documents from the Sublime Porte are always communicated through the Grand Vezir, who has a number of portfolios in which these are placed, and he sends them to the palace by certain functionaries charged especially with their conveyance. Of these the Vezir possesses one key, and the Sultan, or his chief secretary, another. The Sultan passes several hours of the day, from eleven to three, in perusing these papers, and in hearing their perusal by the private secretary before him; and his imperial commands are traced on their broad margin, either by his own hand in red ink, (as is customary in China,) or he directs his secretary to do it for him. So very sacred are all manuscripts coming from his pen, that these papers seldom ever leave the bureaux to which they belong, except after his decease. It is only on such documents that the autograph of the Sultan is ever seen.

At about three o'clock the Sultan generally leaves the palace in a caïque or barge, which, being smaller than that used for official purposes, is called the incognito (tebdil), and visits the edifices that he may be erecting, calls upon his sisters, or spends the remainder of the day at one of the many delightful nooks on the Bosphorus or Golden Horn, where he possesses kiosks, or summer-houses. Sometimes he takes with him his brother or his sons; and he is strongly attached to them. It is said that he is having the latter instructed in the French language, in geography and mathematics. The elder is some ten years of age, but will not succeed his father to the throne until after the death of his uncle, who, by Mussulman law, is next in right to the reigning Sultan. Inheritance, in Islam lands, runs through all the brothers before it reverts to the children of the eldest son. Females cannot succeed to the throne, and the house of Othman would consequently become extinct with its last male representative.

ITALY, AND HER FOREMOST MEN.

HAVING introduced upon the scene, in our last number, an influential person of the republican party, we will next present one from that of the Moderates, in the person of Massimo Tapparelli, Marquis of Azeglio, one of the most accomplished artists and authors of modern Italy. This distinguished character is descended from an ancient Piedmontese family. His eldest brother, the Marquis Roberto, is the father of the Marquis Emanuel d' Azeglio, the present ambassador at the English court from Sardinia. He himself is the second son, and derives his title, as Marquis, from the Castle of Azeglio, in the province of Soera, not far from Caluzo, a part of the family property. After completing the usual routine of a liberal education, he entered the army as lieutenant in a regiment of dragoons; but his passion for the arts preponderating over his inclination for a military life, he quitted it three years after, with a nominal advancement, which secured to him the right of wearing his uniform. He then went to Rome, where he soon made a reputation for himself—as well for his moral and intellectual qualities as for his skill as a painter, particularly of landscapes; many of which it has been our good fortune to see, that fully merited the high eulogiums bestowed upon them, and the honour of gracing the walls of the royal apartments and gallery at Turin. He married the daughter of Alessandro Manzoni, the celebrated novelist, under whose influence his literary tastes matured and ripened, and brought forth their first fruits in a novel entitled "Ettore Peveramosca, or La Disfida di Barletta," a work which is looked upon by the Italians as next in merit to the "Promessi Sposi" of his distinguished father-in-law. In this novel, he has admirably portrayed his own character, and depicted his own sentiments, glowing as they were with pure patriotism and an ardent love of liberty. Four years after, he published another novel entitled "Niccolo di Lapi," which gained him additional celebrity as a writer, and drew the attention of the public towards him as a politician. A few years after his marriage, he had the grief of being left a widower, with an infant daughter. In due time he again entered into the bonds of wedlock, with a French Protestant lady, respectably connected, but who proved so dissimilar to himself in tastes and pursuits, that after a reasonable period of probation spent in the gradual development of the fact, they found they had at least one opinion in common, which was, that it would be to the increased advantage and comfort of each to live apart; though still on terms of friendship and mutual good-will, or, as the Marquis himself gallantly expresses it, "In una tenera separazione."

Azeglio had traversed Italy, through all its principal states, and had everywhere found much to complain of; as well in the narrow policy as the dishonourable and immoral means resorted to both by the church and the restored monarchies, in their respective governments. His fame preceded him at Milan, Genoa, Venice—wherever he went; everywhere he found himself sought after, and courted by leading men, and became a political leader, almost before he was aware of the extent of his influence; indeed, in Italy, distinction of whatever sort it may be, instinctively, sooner or later, impels a man of ability towards a political object; so much does that unfortunate country feel the necessity of the aid of talent in its behalf—so ready it is to acknowledge, and, if possible, reward every exertion made for its benefit.

Azeglio was in the full prime of genius and attainments when the political movement began to reveal itself in Italy; he entered fearlessly into it, and was one of the first who endeavoured to give it a wise direction.

Until 1840, the Italians had dreamed only of revolutions, but conscious that they had not strength enough in their own country to effect them, they relied solely on France for assistance, and were in fact entire tools and victims of the French interests. Gioberti and Balbo had already endeavoured to raise a feeling of nationality among them, independent of France, or any other power; and Azeglio, seizing the moment when an abortive insurrection in Romagna served to place his arguments in their strongest light, published a pamphlet showing the futility and injurious effects of all such premature attempts, at the same time that he exposed, with all his eloquence, the nefarious conduct of the priests and government, who goaded the people on to these rash undertakings, by a tyranny that drove them to despair.

This pamphlet, written in the familiar though energetic style, characteristic of its author, was read throughout Italy, and produced an electrical effect, heightened by its coming from a man of Azeglio's known liberality. The Grand Duke banished him in consequence of it from Florence, where he was living at the time of its publication. Gregory XVI., then lying upon his death-bed, ordered a reply to it to be framed, but before it was completed, he departed this life, leaving behind him the singular, we may say the solitary precedent of a pope appealing, or, at least, intending to appeal to public opinion, through the impartial medium of the press.

Charles Albert, whose decided hatred to Austria, though as yet kept secret from the world, was already known to some of his bosom friends, persisted in protecting Azeglio as he did Balbo, in spite of the entreaties and threats of that haughty and despotic power, not all the arguments of which could ever prevail upon him to exile either one or the other of these eminent patriots.

And now came the accession of Pio Nono to the papal throne, and with it the glorious vision of reform which, for a brief moment, dazzled the mental view of his admiring subjects. Azeglio immediately wrote a pamphlet in praise of the new Pontiff, and cordially supported his politics. He even came to Rome to advocate them in person, and was well received by the pope, who permitted him to remain unmolested. He was the leader of the movement in the "Eternal City" during 1847, but nothing was ever undertaken or done either by himself or his friends, without the previous consent of his holiness. His party might, in fact, be considered as the connecting link, at that time, that kept the pope and the people together. By the advice, and with the aid of Pantaleone, a man of excellent judgment and calmness of character, he framed the Programme "Dell' opinione nazionale in Italia." It was the banner raised in the cause of reformation; asking for moderate liberty, agreement with the national government, and federation among each other as the only independence, at that juncture, feasible to the Italians. It was warmly approved, and even acted upon, by Pio Nono, Charles Albert, and the Duke of Tuscany, up to the end of 1847. Meanwhile Austria offended the pope by her attack upon Ferrara. Azeglio wrote a pamphlet upon the protestation of his holiness respecting it; another upon the emancipation of the Jews, and a third upon the infamous conduct of the Austrians at Milan. He then went into Romagna and Piedmont, with the consent of the pope, to excite the people to oppose the Austrian intervention.

When the papal troops marched out of Rome in the cause of independence, under colours solemnly consecrated for the occasion by the pontiff, the Marquis d'Azeglio accompanied them as aide-de-camp to Durando, the general-in-chief; but receiving a wound in the leg, from the effects of which he is still suffering, he retired to Florence, where he witnessed excesses in the republican party, then greatly strengthened by the proclamation of a republic in France, which drew forth a pamphlet from him couched in the same indignant terms he had used in his reprehension of the excesses of the absolutists. The severity of his strictures drew upon him threats and menaces that made him consider his personal safety in danger, insomuch that when Guerrazzi came into office, he judged it expedient to retire to Spezzia. He there wrote several political articles, and among them an address to his electors at Strambino, in Piedmont, in January, 1849, which may be justly regarded as a model of popular verve. He was returned, and duly elected; but he could not prevail upon the Chamber of Deputies to vote against the offensive war with Austria, or against other measures, by which Piedmont was carried to the very brink of ruin.

After the fatal battle of Novara, Pinelli was desired to form a fresh administration, but he only consented to do so on condition that he might be aided by Azeglio, to whom he offered the Presidency of the Cabinet. Azeglio had no longings after power, and he detested application to business—nevertheless he yielded to the entreaties of his friends, on the express condition that a liberal constitution was to be retained. The Parliament was dissolved, and a strong opposition against the government was returned. It was then that Azeglio exhibited the tact and management that constitute him one of the first statesmen in Europe. He struggled calmly and peacefully against a party that, in his opinion, had ruined Italy; giving time to the country fairly to judge of his own administration, and to contrast it with that of those who succeeded him, and whose attacks and opposition he bore with so much equanimity as to draw upon him the displeasure of some of even his most attached friends. Fortunately, the king supported him, and Pinelli resigned office, still, however, adhering to the Ministry.

The Opposition increased in strength, and pushed its influence so far that the parliament was again dissolved, and another called immediately. The Opposition used every effort to gain Azeglio over to its side, but in vain. The king published a touching address to the nation, which brought the people in shoals to the poll, and the result was a great majority in favour of government. It is this same parliament that is now directing the affairs of Piedmont, and by which the measures that have raised that country so highly, have been carried into execution; Azeglio is one of its greatest ornaments, and strongest supports, and is considered as the head of the Moderate Party in Italy. He has had many difficulties to struggle with. As they gradually receded on the side of the Revolutionists, they secretly advanced on that of the Conservatives; it was the re-action that was to be apprehended. He had to oppose, or, at any rate, to restrain, a large portion of the most respectable and honourable portion of the community, who had warmly upheld him in the previous assembly; persons devoted to order and monarchy, and who were still willing to adhere to the form of the constitution—but they were timid and narrow-minded, and having before bowed their necks to absolute power, they were regarded with coldness and suspicion by the people at large. Piedmontese to the letter, in the worst acceptation of the word, they would have succumbed to Austria, provided Austria would have made concessions to the Piedmontese interests. Their party would have been, at that moment, supported by the country, and applauded by all the governments of Europe; especially by those of France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria. The court of Rome would also have treated them with every indulgence; but they would have had national feeling against them, and an opposition would have sprung up, in consequence, between the people and the government, which again would have caused a reaction in favour of the revolutionary party. Azeglio kept on good terms with this party at first, but never gave ear to its emissaries; and on the great question of the ecclesiastical tribunals being agitated, he separated himself from it entirely, being, on this point at any rate, strongly supported by the republican party.

No arts, no intrigues, in fact, no means whatsoever, honest or dishonest, are there that have not been resorted to by the papal party, and the absolutists, by the Austrians, and even by the French, to shake Azeglio's administration; but to all their accusations he has answered by facts; strengthened in his integrity by the honesty of the king, who has withstood every endeavour to estrange him from his faithful and talented minister, and who reaps the benefit of his firmness, in the returning confidence of his people and the gradually increasing tranquillity and prosperity of his dominions.

The Marquis d'Azeglio himself may be regarded as one of the most gifted men that Italy ever produced: musician, poet, painter, author, and politician, he shows in all his pursuits that peculiar aptitude which distinguishes the Italians in everything they undertake: but it is more especially with respect to his moral qualities that he may claim the respect of all who know him. Simple in his tastes, and unostentatious in his mode of living, his purse is always at the service of his friends, or of any one that may be in need. He is devoted to his family, devoted to his friends, and, above all, devoted to his country—for its welfare he sacrifices his own tastes, and the leisure he knows so well how to turn to good account. He would willingly resign public life could he feel assured that the state would lose nothing by his transferring his office to another. He has no personal ambition; no love of power for its own sake, nor any pride whatsoever. He dines simply with his friends at a restaurant, as he did in his unfettered artist days; his doors are always open; no one ever finds any difficulty in procuring access to him, or engaging his attention; his manners are courteous and encouraging, and his temper perfect. Need it be said of such a man that he has not a personal enemy, however some may differ from him in his opinions, or may be envious of his success?—Respected in public, and idolized in private life, time will only shed a brighter halo around his head, and Italy will proudly inscribe on her list of imperishable names, that of the sagacious politician, and most accomplished gentleman, the Marquis d'Azeglio.

Another ornament of the moderate party is Count Terenzio Mamiani, characterised by General Pepe as "a terse versifier, a studious metaphysician, a man of subtle mind, both prudent and clever. He placed the summit of wisdom in pursuing half measures, under all circumstances, and balancing all extreme parties by temporisation." The Count was born at Pesaro at the beginning of the present century, of a noble family descended on the female side from the famous Della Rovere, formerly Dukes of Urbino. His father was impoverished by the political troubles attendant upon the close of the last century, and he, being a second son, was almost without fortune. Being sent to Rome for the purpose of education, he studied at the Collegio Romano, where he soon made himself distinguished by his talents. He showed at this period of his life a sincere disposition towards piety, but it was damped by the bigotry and intolerance of the priests with whom he was surrounded, who checked in him every attempt at rational inquiry, predicting of him that his love of investigation would one day lead him into all manner of heresy: and he himself unwittingly strengthened their conviction on this head by his manner of treating the subject, given him for a theme, of the appearance of the cross, with the inscription "In hoc signo vinces," to the Emperor Constantine the Great, on Pons Milvius, the present Ponte Molle, on the occasion of his battle with the tyrant Maxentius, over whom he obtained a signal victory; the unfortunate tyrant being drowned in the Tiber, close to the bridge. On this occasion, the young student spared no research in the valuable library of the college, to ascertain the nature of the vision, and the facts on which its appearance was entitled to credit: but the deductions he drew from his investigations were such as to give anything but satisfaction to the Professor, subsequently Cardinal, Ostini, who not only joined his brethren in the prophecy that he would decidedly fall into all the damnable sins of an inquiring, and therefore, heretical spirit, but went forthwith, in a towering rage, to complain of him to his uncle, Cardinal Galeffi.

After having completed his studies at Rome, Mamiani returned to Pesaro, his native town, where he shortly after obtained an appointment as Professor of Italian Literature, at the Military Academy at Turin. This appointment was equally suited to his tastes as his attainments, and he discharged the duties of it to the satisfaction of his pupils and himself, to the end of the session. On returning to Pesaro, however, for the vacation, he found himself compromised in the political movements of the Papal provinces in 1831; his townsmen therefore, anxious to shield him from molestation, sent him as their deputy, to the Congress, at Bologna, where he was named Minister of the Interior. But the Austrian invasion, soon after, put an end to the short-lived reign of the liberals, and the members of the revolutionary government were obliged to take refuge in the fortress of Ancona, where they capitulated to Cardinal Benvenuti, the Pope's Alter Ego.

On this occasion, however, Mamiani showed himself a hero, as in his more peaceful capacity he had a man of letters. He was the only one who refused to sign the agreement to the capitulation, and advised a vigorous resistance. When the town, in spite of his spirited remonstrances, was given up, he took refuge, with forty of his companions, on board a felucca, intending to gain the coast of Corfu, but the master of the boat basely betrayed his passengers to the captain of an Austrian vessel, who took them to Venice, where they were detained many months in confinement, but were finally released, and sent to France, through the interposition of Louis Philippe, who had not, at this early period of his reign, thrown off the mask of liberality so bare-facedly as his successor, the president of the Republic, has ventured to do.

Mamiani, encouraged by this show of good-will on the part of the citizen-king, now went to Paris, but he soon found there that any reliance on France for sympathy in the cause and interests of Italy, would be equally misplaced and injurious. He therefore withdrew, for the time, from public life, and tranquilly devoted himself to his favourite pursuits, preserving, nevertheless, his personal independence, notwithstanding the very limited means of subsistence that remained at his disposal. Unfortunately, the assiduity with which he followed his studies, was such, that, about 1834, he found his sight so seriously affected that he was alarmed lest he might be called upon to endure the total privation of it; nor has he ceased to suffer from it, though in a varying degree: yet it was in this season of privation that he published the admirable metaphysical works which gained him at once the reputation of a great philosophical writer. He was thus leading the happy life of a man of letters, rich in the society and friendship of the most distinguished men in France, when the sudden and unexpected burst of enthusiasm, called forth by the first measures of Pio Nono, awakened an answering echo in his patriotic bosom, and roused him to new hopes for his beloved country. His nice sense of honour prevented him from signing the declaration required by the Papal Nuncio, at Paris, previous to accepting the amnesty granted by the new Pontiff, but he requested permission to visit his family for three months, upon giving his word of honour to take no part in any illegal political movement. In October, 1847, he came to Rome, and was presented to the Pope, who received him very kindly; at that time he took some part in the journalism of the day, and wrote several articles for the Italice.

From the Papal States Mamiani removed to Genoa, where he undertook the management of a journal which became of considerable influence in the rapid movements at that time taking place in Italy, and afterwards throughout Europe. He advocated the principle of progressive reform, in accordance with the crowned heads of Italy, and reproached even the revolution of Sicily, though never struggle against oppression was more justly called forth, on the grounds that hostilities between sovereigns and their subjects could only end in the discomfiture of the latter. Happily for the human race, his theory, in this particular, is not borne out by history, or by its agreement with that Holy Writ, which declares, "There is no king saved by the multitude of an host; a mighty man is not delivered by much strength."

The revolution of Sicily, nevertheless, however reprobated by Mamiani and his party, forced the king of Naples to grant, nominally, a constitution on the 29th of January, 1848, and his example was followed by the King of Sardinia, the Duke of Tuscany, and the Pope. The French revolution came next, and Mamiani published a very sensible pamphlet upon it and its possible consequences. The revolutions of Milan and Vienna followed, and to them succeeded the war of independence in Italy.

About this time the elder brother of Mamiani, distinguished, like himself, by his scientific and literary attainments, died, and left him the heir to a moderate fortune; upon which he requested permission to return to the Papal States, in order to take possession of it. This permission was granted him, and he arrived in Rome towards the end of April, 1848, at the ill-omened moment when the Pope's duplicity or weakness led him to publish his Encyclica of the 29th of that month, wherein he condemned the very war against Austria which he had himself excited only a few months before. The ministry, disgusted with the treachery or irresolution of his holiness, sent in their resignation two days after, and the formation of a new one was entrusted to Mamiani.

All the energies of Mamiani were now employed in endeavouring to preserve peace at home, and prosecuting the war in Lombardy, which he did with the express authorization of the Pope, as temporal prince, although as spiritual sovereign he affected to disapprove of it; in fact, his holiness tried to do what no man, be he priest or layman, has ever yet been able to do; he tried to "serve two masters," to flatter both Austria and Italy. When Austria triumphed he showed the Encyclica, when Italy, he claimed its gratitude for having authorized the war.

After a stormy session of three months, Mamiani, disgusted by the perpetual intrigues of the Oscurantisti to estrange the Pope from the Liberals, resigned office at the time of the Austrian invasion of Cremona, and was succeeded by Fabri, who equally disgusted with the secret machinations he had to contend against, gave place to Rossi.

Mamiani, meanwhile, returned to Pesaro, and afterwards went to Turin, to attend Gioberti's great political meeting. He was detained there by illness, but he had got as far as Genoa, when he received intelligence of the assassination of Rossi on the 15th of November, and the revolution of the succeeding day. He proceeded to Rome immediately upon hearing this, and found on his arrival that he had been named minister of foreign affairs. He had at first resolved to decline any part in public business at that time, but on the disgraceful, unprincipled, unpastoral flight of the Pope, the very next night, leaving the capital without a head, and the country without a government, he declared his readiness to accept the office allotted to him in this moment of danger and emergency. His friends among the moderates strongly endeavoured to dissuade him from connecting himself, under the provisional government, with a party, the republican tendencies of which every day developed themselves more and more clearly; but his heart was too generous to make distinctions at such a moment, and he hoped to be able to prevail upon the pope to return, and to insure the maintenance of the constitution. Disappointed, however, in these expectations, and unable to fully sympathize in the views of his colleagues, constantly progressing towards the proclamation of a republic, he sent in his resignation; but not wishing to retain, for his own advantage, according to the custom of his predecessors, the profits arising from the passports whilst he was in office, he, with the generosity natural to him, handed over the amount to his friend Dr. Pantaleone, the treasurer of the Chamber of Deputies, to be laid out in the purchase of such works as might be deemed most useful for the library, which, at that time, it was intended to have formed for the use of the Council of Deputies. He was subsequently elected a member of the Italian Constituent Assembly, or Diet of the Italian States, the immediate convocation of which in Rome he had himself recommended, in a most eloquent harangue, as a potent means of uniting and strengthening the resources of the Peninsular. In this assembly he raised his voice against the proclaiming a republican form of government in Rome, and upon that measure being carried, he resigned his seat, and confined his political exertions to writing in the "Speranza dell' Epoca," against, what appeared to him, the disorderly proceedings of the time. The French, who soon after so unjustifiably surrounded Rome, approved highly of his arguments and his conduct, and on their entry into the city frequently applied to him for advice; nevertheless, with the fickleness and ingratitude of their nation, they shortly after gave him leave to depart, and he accordingly went to Genoa, where he took up his abode, and is at this time residing. He had written a work upon the Papacy, and had prepared it for the press, but his trunks being sent after him, from Rome to Civita Vecchia, the priests there, having received intelligence that it was in one of them, had the locks forced and consigned his papers to an auto da fé, without giving themselves the trouble of looking into them, to know whether or not they deserved the fate prepared for them.

But we must not give all our attention to the Moderates. We will now introduce another of the republicans—not an orator, not a writer, not a diplomatist, not even a deputy in the chambers, an organ of the voices and views of thousands, but a warrior, stalwart and staunch, ready to die in the cause in which he has pledged his honour after the dictates of his heart. We mean Giuseppe Garibaldi, well known throughout the countries whose despotism he has opposed, as the Guerilla Chieftain. Garibaldi is a native of Nice; early accustomed to battle with the waves, at fifteen years of age he threw himself into the midst of them to rescue some of his companions, who were upset in a boat. Twice afterwards he performed a similar act of humanity; once was to a poor Negro. "Is he not a fellow-creature?" said Garibaldi, "a brother?" Entering early as a sailor into the navigation of the Levant and the Black Sea, he touched at many Italian ports, and from one of them proceeded to Rome, at that time merely to gratify a curiosity natural to, and commendable in a youth; little foreseeing, that in his maturer age he should find himself there again, in defence of her liberties, basely crushed by the superior numbers of republican France.

In 1833, Savoy and the neighbouring provinces began, like a hidden volcano, to throw up in portentous clouds the evidences of their interior commotions. Garibaldi could not escape the spread of the electric flame. But the plot being discovered, he returned to Marseilles, and entered as an officer in the marines.

Finding every hope lost, at this time, of a liberal movement in Italy, he proceeded to Rio Janeiro, in 1836, where for some time he carried on the humble trade of a coaster. The republican insurrection of Rio Grande against the government of Rio Janeiro had received a terrible blow in its very outset from the discomfiture in the island of Fanfa, and the leaders of it were arrested and sent to prison. Garibaldi's generous heart was moved at the thought of their defeat, and he endeavoured to arm a few bargues for their rescue, but he was himself taken prisoner in the attempt, after being struck by a ball, which severely grazing his arm, lodged under the left ear and finally traversed round to the right; whence it was extracted by the skill of Ranon Delarca, a benevolent surgeon, who lavished upon him the tenderest cares during the tedious months of his recovery, and still more tedious of his lengthened imprisonment. At last orders came for his removal to the capital. Aware of the tortures that might there await him, he endeavoured that same night to effect his escape, but was retaken, after wandering two days in the country, and sent back to his prison. "I shall be silent," says he, in a letter to one of his party, "on the hardships of those two days; only I cannot omit recording for the execrations of posterity, the name of a monster, Leonardo Millan, who basely availed himself of his brief authority over me, to keep me two hours suspended by the hands." From this barbarous and uncalled-for outrage, aggravated by the fiend-like mockery of a savage crowd of inhuman wretches, who, his prison door being left open for that purpose, stood by to enjoy his anguish, Garibaldi was afflicted, during certain states of the atmosphere, for twelve succeeding years, with severe rheumatic pains in the wrists. Being finally released from prison, he repaired to Rio Grande, where he was received with enthusiasm, and was immediately put in command of the small marine force that the place was possessed of. He soon signalized himself by his bravery and foresight: being on one occasion attacked by Captain Moringue with 120 men, he with only eleven, all of whom were Italians, defended himself so bravely, that many of the assailants were slain, and the others took to flight; thus proving, as he wrote to his Government with that laudable pride in his cause which he would not have arrogated personally to himself, that one free man is worth ten slaves. "Un uomo libero vale per dieci schiavi."

We do not undertake to trace Garibaldi's adventurous course in the Brazils, full as it was ———"of hair-breadth scapes,

And moving accidents by flood and field;"

our business is only with him in Rome; nevertheless, we must here make mention of his wife, that model of female heroism and conjugal love, who finally paid the tribute of her life to her devotedness to her husband, and to the sacred cause of liberty in which he early engaged her energies and her destiny with his own. This admirable woman had joined Garibaldi and his fortunes in Rio Grande, being herself a native of that country. In one of the rencontres with the enemy, she was taken prisoner, and had the grief to hear it reported that her husband had fallen. Unable to endure her suspense, still hoping to render him some solace, or receive his last sigh, she eluded the vigilance of her guard in the middle of the night, and the break of day beheld her on the field, bending her trembling steps among the dead, turning her pitying eyes upon the wounded, seeking among them the form—perhaps, alas! the inanimate form—of her beloved. Two days she tracked the wide and solitary expanse. At last she found him whom she sought, and who was spared to be revived by her tender cares. Often have we seen this high-minded, yet gentle woman at Rome, charming all who approached her by the frankness and kindness of her manners; her serene though thoughtful brow showing that she felt herself the wife of a hero, whilst the tenderness of her smile betrayed that she would not have loved him less had his lot been cast in the humblest walk of private life. Shortly after her husband was thus restored to her, she presented him with a son, whom he named Menotti, out of reverence for the memory of one of the many brave who had shed their heart's blood for Italy.

After the hazardous undertaking of Cima da Serra, Garibaldi, unwilling to expose his wife, who had accompanied him with her infant, to greater dangers than she had already encountered, took up his abode for a time in Monte Video, and there, with all the docility of a truly great mind, which never feels degraded in bending to circumstances not degrading in themselves, he eked out the means of subsistence for those dear to him, and for himself, by giving lessons in algebra and geometry, in the principal college in the city; as he had before done in French and writing, in Constantinople; yet has this unpretending hero been represented as an illiterate adventurer, that could scarcely spell his own name.

Garibaldi's personal habits were at all times of the simplest kind, and in his private dealings he was exact even to scrupulousness. To this, General Pacheco y Obes, minister from the Oriental Republic to Paris, bears honourable testimony. "In 1843," he informs us, "Signor Francisco Agell, one of the most respectable merchants in Monte Video, waited on the Minister of War, to inform him that Garibaldi, the head of the Italian Legion, the commander of the national fleet,—the man, in short, that had, day after day, risked his life for Monte Video, and was ready any day, at a moment's notice, to risk it again in her defence,—that this man had no light in his house in the evenings, because in the soldiers' rations, his proportion of which afforded his principal means of support, candles or oil were not included. The minister immediately sent him a hundred pataccoi, about twenty pounds; but Garibaldi would only retain half the sum, requesting that the other half might be given to a widow, whose circumstances, he said, were more necessitous than his own. Those fifty pataccoi," continues the same writer, "were all that Garibaldi ever received from the Republic: whilst he remained with us, he and his family lived in poverty, he wore the same shoes as the common soldier, and his intimates often had recourse to stratagems to replace for him his worn-out habiliments. Nevertheless, he was equally respected by all the inhabitants of Monte Video; never man was more universally beloved, and never man more deserved to be so. Ever the foremost to excite the ardour of the troops in battle, he was not less zealous in palliating, as far as came within his power, the miseries inseparable from war. Whenever he was seen in the office of the Governor, it was to solicit the pardon of some conspirator, or to plead in behalf of some unfortunate: and it was solely through his intervention, that the life of Michele Haedo, condemned to death by the laws of the Republic, was spared." Many other traits of Garibaldi's chivalric generosity are related by the General Pacheco y Obes, which, he remarks, are still themes of admiration, as well in the adverse party, as in his own. Among them is his conduct at Gualaguaychu, when he took prisoner Colonel Villagra, one of the most ferocious of Rosas' leaders, and restored him and his companions to liberty. What a contrast to the barbarous cruelties of Rosas himself, and of his friend Oribe, one of whose latest exploits, not yet two months since, was to have an unhappy prisoner of war, Major Tabares—unhappy indeed, in falling into such fiend-like hands—brought forth at a bull-fight, when the people had assembled, with his hands tied behind him, and lashed by the neck, waist, and heels, to a thick bar of iron, firmly fixed into the ground, in the midst of an enclosure, on one side of which was a raised platform for General Oribe and his particular friends, to whom he had sent special invitations for the purpose. The signal was given, the music struck up inspiring airs, and four ferocious bulls were admitted into the enclosure, where they gored in the most dreadful manner the helpless victim, pointed out more immediately to their fury by being enveloped in white, and having a red cap placed on his defenceless head. All the time this revolting spectacle went on, the music continued; and when the bulls, wearying of an enemy from which they could meet with no resistance, were withdrawn, it being discovered that life was not quite extinct in the unfortunate victim, he was coolly lanced to death, and his head cut off, in the presence of the horror-stricken spectators; who, nevertheless, durst not manifest by any outward sign the disgust and detestation they felt against the promoters of such an infernal deed.

And these things are done in a country calling itself Christian, in an age boasting of its enlightenment; and yet there are those who would brand all attempts at reformation, any endeavour to limit human authority, capable of such enormous abuses, as the work of anarchy, planned by the enemies of social good! A fleet of twenty English vessels was commanded by Admiral Brown, an esteemed veteran officer, against the Argentine Republic, at the time when Garibaldi was performing his prodigies of valour in its defence: the generous Englishman could fully appreciate valour in a foe, and was so struck with the astounding proofs of it that came within his own perilous experience, that he sent to him to express his intention of paying him a visit. Garibaldi, respecting the grey hairs of his frank and noble opponent too much to suffer him to take this trouble, hastened to his house to prevent it, by offering his hostages in person. The admiral was astonished to find so commanding a figure in so young a man, and equally pleased with his manners as his appearance, shook him most cordially by the hand, warmly complimented him on the courage and skill he had shown in the battle of Parama, and other naval rencontres, and a few days afterwards, not to be outdone in courtesy, returned his visit, at his own humble dwelling.

For his valorous defence of Salta, Garibaldi had the gratification of receiving from the governor of Monte Video a banner, with the inscription upon it, written in letters of gold: "Gesta dell' 8 Febbraio, 1846, della legione italiana agli ordine di Garibaldi." "Acts of the Italian Legion, February 8th, 1846, under the command of Garibaldi;" and of having the honourable privilege granted to his men, of taking the right hand on all occasions of public parade. But notwithstanding the success that followed his arms, and the distinctions he received, he found it impossible to remain longer away from his native country, and his desire to return to it was most fortunately seconded, at that moment, by the extraordinary excitation of the Italians residing at Monte Video; who, overjoyed at the outbreak in Italy, and animated by the noblest hopes, followed the impulse of their generous hearts, by raising in a very short time, among themselves, a considerable sum, to fit out an expedition to aid the cause of liberty in their native country. Thus it may be seen that Garibaldi did not intrude himself into the Roman States, the unauthorized and lawless rebel he has been represented, by a party who have good reasons of their own for smothering all the breathings of an oppressed multitude after a better order of things.

Accompanied by a hundred chosen men from the Italian legion, and by other volunteers, Garibaldi quitted Monte Video in April, 1848, and after a tedious passage and fourteen years of honourable exile, he once more put his foot upon his native ground, and hastened to Nice, to embrace his aged mother and his wife and children, who had preceded him by some months in arriving at his paternal roof. But it was only for a few days that he allowed himself the calm enjoyment of domestic happiness; the war of independence was already declared, and, all impatience to take part in it, he proceeded to Turin, to lay his pretensions before the government; but Charles Albert was then vacillating between two parties, with an indecision which, a she afterwards paid for it by griefs and anxieties that ended in his death, there is no need to dwell upon in this brief memoir: let it suffice to say, that Garibaldi was wounded in all his finest feelings, by the coldness with which he was received, and after wasting some time of which every moment was precious to him, he proceeded to Milan, where he found a very different reception; the Committee of Public Safety there, unhesitatingly and joyfully availing themselves of the name and services of so illustrious a warrior, immediately consigned to him the care of forming a volunteer corps, for the defence of the province of Bergamo.

In a very short time three thousand men rushed to his standard, and were immediately ordered to Brescia. Scarcely had he finished these arrangements ere he was hastily called to Milan, then suffering under reverses of its first successes, that filled the inhabitants with gloomy forebodings, too fully verified by succeeding events. He lost not a moment in obeying the summons; arrived at Monza, within twelve miles of the city, the intelligence reached him of the armistice, which revealed to him at once the real state of affairs. Garibaldi, who had seen such energy called forth among the people, and the soldiers gaily rushing onwards to battle, as to a festival, rejoicing in the roar of the cannon, and bravely confronting death in every shape, could not but suspect that this armistice was a snare laid by cowards, and disdaining to complain of such unworthy artifices, instead of succumbing in any way to the Austrians, he preferred calling around him a few faithful followers, and with them daring the enemy upon other ground. Crossing the Tessin after a forced march from Bergamo, he embarked at Arona, for Luino, which he found occupied by the Austrians in four times his own numbers. Nevertheless he resolved upon attacking them immediately, in their quarters, which he did with an impetuosity that drove them from their stronghold; but soon ashamed of their momentary discomfiture, and confident in their superiority of numbers, they returned to the attack, and were again repulsed by Garibaldi, until he found himself in danger of being entirely surrounded; he therefore had only to think of saving the remnant of his troops. They were, in fact, in want of everything; ammunition, food, even clothes. By forced marches he reached Arona, with his men exhausted by fatigue and inanition. In this deplorable plight, he was compelled to ask for assistance, and the Municipality advanced him seven thousand francs upon his receipt for the same; a paltry sum in comparison with his necessities and deserts, yet some have endeavoured to represent his acceptance of it as a crime. The nights which by his troops were given to short repose, after their toilsome days, Garibaldi had passed in exploring the mountain paths by which he might most safely and speedily convey them across the frontier. Once arrived in Switzerland, he and his followers were warmly welcomed, as the brave and honourable defenders of the flag of liberty, but he had brought with him the germ of fever, contracted in Roverbella, and worn out with fatigue and chagrin, he sought a temporary repose in the bosom of his family at Nice. After a very brief sojourn with them, he returned to Genoa. His transit was one continued triumph; the population rushed in crowds to hail him as he passed, and the clubs sent their deputies to greet the hero of Monte Video, the warrior of Luino. His first care was to recruit his health, which he justly regarded as the property of his country. Whilst he was slowly recovering, he was offered by the Piedmontese government a distinguished post in the national army, but he had already pledged himself to Sicily, and soon after repaired to Leghorn for the purpose of embarking for that island. The enthusiasm with which he was received by the Livornese, induced him to prolong his stay in Tuscany; but the death of Rossi, followed by the flight of the pope, turned all his thoughts towards Rome.

His arrival in that city is thus noticed in "The Roman Advertiser" of Dec. 16, 1848. "General Garibaldi arrived in Rome on Tuesday morning, and was enthusiastically received in the evening, at the Circolo Popolare. The expression of his face indicates talent and resolution, and he spoke with enthusiasm, and at the same time with prudence, of the present state of affairs in Italy; moderating the furious zeal of some violent republicans, who would fain have borne him then and there to the Capitol. . . The General returned to his hotel accompanied by the applauses of the audience, and of the crowd in the Corso, the demonstration limiting itself to vigorous cheering."

A few days after this welcome, however, Garibaldi was requested to leave the city for a time, on account of some unruly proceedings on the part of the ultra republicans; for though it did not appear that he had anything to do with them, his departure was deemed a proper measure of precaution, lest the malcontents should make his name a pretext for further disturbances. In January 1849 he returned to Rome to take his place in the Constituent Assembly, as delegate from the College of Macerata, and voted for the proclamation of the republic in the memorable sitting of the 5th of February following. At this time a splendid sword of honour, which had been publicly exhibited for a month beforehand in the great hall of the Caffé Nuova, was presented to him in the name of the Tuscans, and other Italians.

For some weeks Garibaldi's military movements were confined to watching the movements of the Neapolitans, among whom his name created so much alarm, that ten thousand men were sent on the Abruzzi frontier, with all the precautions of advanced guards, out-posts, picquets and patrols, to be in readiness to resist any hostile movement on his part.

Too soon, however, Rome herself required his aid, and called him within her walls. He was then fifty miles off, at Agnani, but in two days he presented himself with his troops before the people, who rushed out to meet him, and all ranks seemed to be inspired with fresh confidence, new hopes from his presence.

We have already described Garibaldi's noble appearance and chivalric bearing in Rome,¹ his valour in its defence, his sorrowful departure from it, when it reluctantly succumbed to the brute force of the most treacherous and unjust attack upon it, that modern history will, it is to be hoped, ever have to record,—the afflicting trial he had to undergo, in seeing the beloved partner in his toils as in his glories sink under the griefs and dangers of his retreat, and in receiving her last sigh as she lay stretched on a humble pallet, in a lonely hut, the poor owners of which were punished for their charity by imprisonment, and threatened with death. It would be painful and useless to recal those scenes. We have wished to do justice to Garibaldi, because his character and conduct have been misrepresented or misunderstood.

We have witnessed what he was at Rome; we have inquired continually of honourable men, and of Englishmen, too, who served under him, what he was in the field. All their testimonials have been in his praise. Humane as brave, rigid in discipline, inflexible in honour; unwearied in exertion, considerate to the wants of others, careless of his own; devoted in his friendships, gentle and loving in his household; such is the man who has been stigmatized as a lawless mercenary freebooter. It may perhaps raise a smile; but it ought to be one of admiration, rather than of scorn, if we inform our readers that this man of war, this sanguine—not sanguinary—hero, is at the present time peacefully, and we trust profitably, employed at New York, in a manufacture of his own, of spermaceti candles. So at any rate he will not be in want of that article of home consumption, as he was at Monte Video. But let "the blast of war" blow in his ears, the trumpet sound once more in the cause of freedom, and Europe will soon see him wave his banner, and gather his followers about him, again to confront despotism and treachery, whatever forms they may assume for the oppression of the helpless portion of mankind.

CHAPTER III.

A RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW BY THE NARRATOR, AND A DISCOVERY BY MISS SHEPHERD.

DAVID UNDERWOOD's sudden and unexplained departure made a great sensation in the little world of Milford, at the time. Dame Rumour, with her hundred tongues, was extremely busy with the event; but of these fivescore unruly members, very few wagged to any truthful purpose. What these few said remained, ultimately, as matter of common belief in the valley and its neighbourhood;

"The rest, the gods dispersed in empty air," to share the fate of the unaccepted prayers of mortals in the Iliad and Odyssey.

As the reader was put in possession of the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, concerning the matter in the last chapter, there is no need to tell him what was agreed upon as true by the Milford people, who had no means whatever of verifying the same, since those who could tell were silent. Nor will it be necessary to say, that though startling events are talked of and thought about much longer in small communities than they are in large ones, yet a year or two sufficed to obliterate the recollection of David Underwood from the minds of most people in the parish. Of the few who did not forget him so soon, it will be well to say something now, before I return to the proper date of my story.

Miriam Grey did not forget David Underwood. Whether she held any communication with him after his departure,—knew where he was, what he did, what he intended to do,—was not known even to those who watched her with the vigilance of affection; but that she did not forget him was well known to them, though she never pronounced his name, or seemed to heed when it was mentioned accidentally by indifferent people.

His mother did not forget David Underwood. She was not by any means what is called "a superior woman," not even a positively high woman, in anything; she was simply, a well-meaning, conscientious creature. Her reason had quite a sinecure as regards the regulation of her passions in youth, for there were none within her that required regulation. The mainspring of action, nay, of feeling, in this calm, gentle woman, was a principle of active obedience and non-resistance to her husband. And this principle led her to the habitual breaking of the first commandment of the Decalogue. She had "more gods than one:" the God in heaven, to whom her morning and evening prayers were addressed, and Gideon Underwood, her god on earth, to whose service and honour her days were devoted. Had any friend told her this truth, the pious, candid soul would have been wretched, perchance; but as long as her husband continued what he had ever been to her, cold and considerate, kind and commanding. Mrs. Underwood never perceived that she worshipped the creature instead of the Creator. She would have lived an idolatress of her husband to the end, but that God had willed to draw her wholly to Himself by suffering. There where she had sinned, from thence came her punishment—from the character of the human being she had allowed to stand between her and God, blinding her to his laws of immutable right and truth.

I was wrong in saying her nature was utterly passionless; her maternal love was a passion; and David, her first-born, was dearer than all her other children. From his childhood David had avoided his father instinctively, and clung to his mother with a tenacity and warmth of affection which sometimes startled her with its intensity, for her weak nature could not comprehend the strength of his. Not comprehending, she feared for him, she knew not what strange trials in life. She watched over him anxiously, treasured all his sayings in her heart, tried even to sympathise in his ambition, and promised to use her influence with his father to let him go from home when he was grown up; for she felt that her young eagle was not to be caged like a linnet.

When he presented himself before her, as she sat alone on that fatal night, and with white lips and broken words told hurriedly what had happened a while since at the Grey Tower, and prayed for her forgiveness and her blessing on his departure, she granted all his desire, and breathed no word of reproach. She did not oppose his going, but with silent celerity helped him to collect the few things necessary for his journey, and gave him all her money and trinkets; for she knew her husband too well to hope that he would relax one iota of his anger or his natural parsimony in favour of his offending child, at least for many months to come. She did not dream that he would never forgive. When she asked where he thought of going, David replied, that he had not determined yet, but to London first of all.—London! If anything could add to his mother's suffering then, it was the thought that her inexperienced boy was going alone and friendless to that far off, terrible city, which she had never seen, but which in her imagination was worse than Tophet,—a place where all the devils had set up their thrones, and the nations of the earth came to worship them. Her last words, as she clung weeping to her boy, were of warning and fond injunction to keep himself unspotted from that wicked world. She was comforted by poor David's few sentences.

"Mother, your love will keep me from all deadly sin. Your love—the thought of Miriam—will be ever in my heart. No devil will have power to enter in where they are. The place where we are matters little; the kingdom of the devil, like the kingdom of God, is within us. In this quiet valley, in the very presence of that sweet angel, I sinned—I might have been a parricide! I can do no worse in London, or in hell. Mother, let me go; I cannot meet my father's eye. I must go and expiate by some good work this fearful early sin. Miriam is lost to me, now, for ever! But you, mother! you will love me, pure or sinful, absent or present, sane or insane, here and hereafter. Kiss me once more, dearest mother; bless me, forgive me, pray for me, hope for me, and oh! love me ever as you do now."

And thus David left his home. His gentle mother's eyes, streaming with tears, followed his form as he took his course along the valley in the moonlight, turning often to look at his old home.

She still stood outside the house, when her husband returned with his customary slow proud step, but with a bandage across his brow. How the sorrowing mother shrunk from this evidence of her child's violent spirit! She suppressed a cry of anguish, and stood waiting. Her husband asked what she did there. Grief had "made her stout," and she replied, "I was watching my son David. He has left his home, and gone abroad into the world."

"Ha! it is well. Henceforth, remember, Mary, that name is forbidden in my household. He is no longer a son; I trust to you to obey me in this, as you have ever done."

"But, Gideon——"

"No word for him. Do you forget your duty as a wife? Let me never be reminded of his offences, or I may come to curse——"

She laid her hand upon his arm, and said fearfully, "I will obey you; only, for the love of heaven and your own soul, curse not your son. Let him be a stranger to you henceforth."

And it was so. David seemed to be swept out of his father's recollection from that hour. The little children were tutored by their mother to ask no questions of any one but her about their brother. And in less than a year, his name was never heard in the household; the little ones forgot him. Mark and Martha, who were older, talked in secret of poor David, but they thought their father could do no wrong, and came to the conclusion that David must have committed some very wicked act. Though they did not love his memory the less, they mourned for him, and feared to ask what he had done.

Miriam Grey's mirthfulness was all gone now whenever she came down to the Grange. She did not play much with the children, or talk with Mark and Martha. She would sit watching Mrs. Underwood as she moved about her household duties with an enforced exactitude; while her pale face and wasted form told of the secret lamentation and woe. In obedience to her husband's commands, "no voice was heard in Rama." But the grief, though voiceless, was imperative. Her gentle heart, which, until now, had been in utter subjection to her husband's will in all things, throbbed in secret opposition to him. Slowly, in the very tumult of the strife between this old allegiance and the natural sorrow for her son, she began to perceive that her husband was harsh and tyrannical, and that as it had been with David, so might it be with each of their children in succession, as they grew up to have hopes and desires beyond the home circle. Then came the thought, "If I had acted differently; if, in years gone by, I had remonstrated against this vile love of power, and this cold hard pride, instead of yielding to it, and encouraging it, because I liked to see him so like a king! Ah, I have not been a help-mate for him! I have been his slave, and he has not respected me! How could he respect so poor and mean a creature?"

Her husband treated her more coldly from day to day, as he saw in her face that her heart was with the child who had outraged the holiest human bonds. Not until four years afterwards, when she lay on her death-bed, did his heart feel a pang of remorse for his wife's unhappiness. Then he said, "Mary, is there anything I can do to prove that you have been dear to me?" With the courage of a spirit in sight of immortality, the once timid, weak-spirited wife, spoke out. She spoke of his hardness to them all,—to her, to the banished one, to all but Miriam Grey, the child of his first love. She was not stayed by fear or undue reverence. And from that simple woman, whom he had more than half despised, the proud Gideo Underwood heard words of truth which were for the most part strange to him. When she had passed away, they were not all forgotten. Though habit was potent, and he never lost his ungentle pride wholly, yet pity, and something like tenderness for his motherless children, sprang up within him. His iron rule was relaxed for the younger children. Leah and Rachel, John and Mary were allowed to grow up in a softer, warmer atmosphere than their elders. Miriam Grey's influence was always strong, and after his wife's death, it became stronger than before. But no word concerning David was ever exchanged between them.

The years passed on, bringing each its portion of joy or sorrow to the Underwood family and to Miriam Grey. To the latter more of sorrow than of joy, for she had ceased to hope for the realization of the dream of her youth; and it pleased God by slow degrees to deprive her of sight. This affliction she bore with a cheerful resignation that endeared her to all. Religion and philosophy taught her the same lessons by different methods. She learned, that as "God's incorruptible spirit is in all things," so is his immutable will above, around, within us; ordering all our existence as it seemeth good to him, with a wise illimitable love that no man can fathom; so that it is folly for short-sighted human beings to nourish any desire of a different lot in life than that which He has assigned them, and utter madness to try to make a different lot for themselves, since in his own good time he will do for us better than we can hope or dream. She learned also to lay down any supposed claim she had to be made happy on earth, because she saw clearly that "with renunciation life begins." She was young to learn this deep truth; nor would she have learned it by experience alone. There was one in Milford who had helped to teach her this and much other strengthening doctrine; one whom she revered and loved for his wisdom and goodness, and for his affectionate remembrance of David. This was Mr. Shepherd, the rector.

He, too, had disappointed hopes connected with his old pupil. It had been his secret desire that David should enter the church. He had some expectation of winning Mr. Underwood's consent to sending the youth to Oxford, when David disappeared from Milford as we have described. A short time after that event, Mr. Shepherd received a few affectionate manly lines from his young friend, enclosing a letter to his father, which he begged him to deliver, and informing him that he had met with much kindness from some distant relations of the name of Underwood. The letter was faithfully delivered, but the good rector had reason to fear that it was never read, and that all David's subsequent communications to his father shared the same fate. After his mother's death, David wrote no more to his father, and seldom to Mr. Shepherd. At length, his letters ceased altogether, and there was good reason to believe that in the midst of new ties and associates those of his early days had been, for a time at least, forgotten.

Mr. Shepherd, too, had a new pupil and associate, who, in some measure, compensated to him for the loss of David. This was Philip Ward, who came with his mother to reside at the Grey Tower on the death of Captain Ward. Philip was then about fourteen years of age, and being an amiable, clever boy, soon became a great favourite with every one, especially his aunt and Mr. Shepherd. About the same time, too, Miss Agnes Shepherd, having given up all hopes of a husband, left off going from London to Cheltenham and from Cheltenham to Brighton, and resolved to take up her abode with her brother at Milford for the rest of her life. No event so important to the parish had happened for many years. The flight of this lady from the gay and busy world was a sort of Hegira from which the Milford folks dated. "That was two years after Miss Shepherd came;"—"It was five years from the time Madam Shepherd came that the fever broke out again;" &c., were sentences of daily occurrence.

Miss Shepherd thought she had two or three decided advantages over Mrs. Ward, as a candidate for the hand of Mr. Underwood—she was her brother's sister,—she was rich and clever. Mrs. Ward, on the other hand, was her mother's daughter, and was poor and foolish. But then she was pretty, and not by any means old. It was a frequent question with Miss Shepherd, whether, on the whole, Mrs. Ward had not as good a chance as herself of marrying Mr. Underwood of the Grange. "Men are so foolish in those matters," she argued. This question remained long undecided; and Miss Shepherd had not settled it to her satisfaction, at the time our story opens. One thing, however, she had settled to her own satisfaction by that time, viz. that Mr. Underwood loved money—nay, that for some cause or other, he was extremely anxious to obtain money at that time.

Being of an active turn of mind, especially after tasting Martha's cherry-brandy, she never rested till she got to the bottom of any business that excited her curiosity. Therefore, when she returned home from the little party at the Grange, with her brother and the Strange Gentleman, and her ears caught the words, "mortgage," and "five per cent." in a sotto voce conversation carried on between the two gentlemen, she, with the dexterity of a great wit, jumped to the conclusion, that her brother's guest was a usurer from whom Mr. Underwood was negotiating a loan.

"Yes, yes!" she thought, "that's it!—no wonder Edward would not tell me who he was, or anything about him, except that he comes from Germany.—He's a Jew, of course! Nearly all the Germans are!—Besides, any one can see he is a Jew, by his face, and his great black beard. What terrible eyes he has!—He is not like common mortals, I am sure.—I wonder I could ever mistake him for a Christian. I remember, now, he looked quite pale when Martha asked him to take some ham. And then—he could not be making fun of me when he spoke so gravely about the battle of Leipzig!—I am not superstitious—but—we all know that there is such a person as—the Undying One. No one believes in ghosts and such things, but the Wandering Jew has been seen in every age of the Christian era. I wonder whether Edward has any suspicion on the subject. What can he mean by inviting him here, after what the Prayer-book says against Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics?—Poor Edward! He has all sense but common sense, and never suspects anybody. Still he must know something about this person, especially as he told me he was a remarkable man, and well known in the world. Besides, he met him at Torrington Hall. Sir Ralph is not likely to have objectionable people there."

This seemed rather a strong argument against her view of the case. She watched the stranger's features as they were illumed by the moonlight. They were composed, and grave, and although she was still convinced of his Jewish origin, she was a little inclined to doubt the preternatural history of their guest, till he suddenly turned his eyes on her, and caught her in the act of scrutinising his face. A strange expression came over it, and he asked,—

"Shall I tell you my thoughts, madam, and save you the trouble of deciphering them?"

Miss Shepherd was quite frightened at the tone in which this was said, and was almost inclined to call out to her brother, who had walked on a few yards ahead. But she found her voice die away within her; and she stood staring while her companion went on in a strange low tone: "I was thinking of certain moonlight nights in Palestine, and in South America—in China, and at the Poles—for I, you know, have led a wandering life, and have gone, like Satan, to and fro in the earth, and up and down in it."

Miss Shepherd could not utter a syllable. Fascinated, and half afraid, she stood as in a dream, till awakened by the voice of her brother, telling them to come on faster. The stranger smiled, and offered her his arm: she declined it sturdily, and walked on alone, lost in thought. When she became again conscious of what was going on, they were all standing in the porch, at the Rectory, and her brother and his friend were talking of Sir Ralph Grey. A laugh from her brother, in which the stranger joined, dissipated all her late fantastic thoughts. They seemed to vanish like a dream. But a fresh train of speculation concerning the stranger succeeded—and this time, it had nothing supernatural for its basis. It ran thus:—"He is a Jew—it is as clear as the nose on his face. Now, Sir Ralph Grey would not ask any Jew to his house.—It must be a distinguished one.—It may be the author of 'The Curiosities of Literature'—that would make him so interesting to Edward;—but then, what could he possibly want with Mr. Underwood?—indeed, what would Sir Ralph care for him?"

At last a bright idea occurred to her as she remembered a maxim of the society in which her early life was passed—"Let a man's origin be what it may, provided only he be richer than other people, he will be received in the best society." She glanced again at the stranger, as he hung up his hat.

"Edward said he had been used to the best society, here and abroad. Yes, it is clear by his manner that he is a person of distinction,—though unfortunately a Jew. Ah! I have it now! He is here incog. of course! What can I have been dreaming of all this time?—It must be that last spoonful of cherry-brandy that has set my brain wandering so and disturbed my nerves. How could I mistake that dignified manner. This is a Jew indeed!—the great Jew of the Age—honoured by Christian majesties all over Europe. No wonder Sir Ralph Grey is proud to have him at the Hall. I suppose he is looking for land to purchase. It would be a fine thing for the country if he should buy a place near here. I suppose that is what he went to Mr. Underwood about; I've always heard he is not at all proud, and it looks like it, indeed, for him to come and stay at our house and go to a trumpety tea-party at a farm-house. How condescending really great people always are!—I wonder now how much he is worth! I dare say he don't know himself."

At this point in her thoughts, to which an active brain and cherry-brandy had brought her, the subject of them approached her with a chamber-candlestick in his hand, like an ordinary mortal wending bedwards.

"Good night, my dear madam," he said rather sleepily.

"Good night, M. le Baron!" replied the lady with emphasis, and making a profound curtsy.

He raised his eyebrows—but refrained from speaking. There could be no mistake now, she thought—"He does not reject the title;" and she retired to rest satisfied that she had at last unravelled the mystery which had perplexed her all day. Proud was Miss Agnes Shepherd to sleep beneath the same roof with that very particular Baron "of the Hebrew persuasion," who was one of the bulwarks of Christendom, and like "the jolly young waterman" of the song, was certain of "winning each heart and delighting each eye," because he had

"Gold and gold! and gold without end!
He had gold to lay by, and gold to spend,
Gold to give, and gold to lend,
And reversions of gold in futuro.
In wealth his family revell'd and roll'd,
Himself and his wife and his sons so bold,
And his daughters sang to their harps of gold,
'O bella eia del oro!'"

"Ah!" thought Miss Shepherd as she was just dropping asleep,— "I must go up to the Grange the first thing in the morning, and give that flirting creature, Miss Mary, a hint. How forward all the girls are, now a days! She went on chattering all tea-time with him. I must tell her it is of no use to try her arts in that quarter. There is a Baroness Rothschild, I know."

At the risk of being thought somewhat prying and inquisitive I will add that Miss Shepherd's sleep was not peaceful that night, and that she muttered many words indicative of the nature of her dreams. (These few, I can bear witness to—"Mr. Underwood,"—"Salathiel,"—"Mortgage of the estate,"—"Der Ewige Jude,"—"Railway scrip,"—"Loans,"—"Three per cents,"—"Undying one,"—"Ugly one,"—"Disagreeable one,"—"Mrs. Ward,"—"Odd trick,"—"Cherry-brandy,"—"Mr. Croly,"—"St. Leon,"—"The Strange Gentleman."

CHAPTER IV.

BUSINESS OF IMPORTANCE. THE BACK-PARLOUR, AND THE BLACK SCAUR.

It was midnight. The latest guest had been gone more than an hour from the Grange Farm. All the household was quiet. The girls had retired to their rooms; and though I will not venture to say that they were in bed and asleep, because it is not the custom of girls to go to bed and to sleep immediately on retiring to their rooms for the night, especially after a party, yet I will say this for the Underwoods,—they laughed and talked at night with the fear of their father before their eyes, and did it so discreetly, that no one in the adjoining rooms could be disturbed by their discussions; a habit which we recommend to the imitation of young ladies generally, as conducive to the peace of domestic life, especially during the small hours of the night.

But though every one else was gone to bed, the master of the house was still sitting in the little back-parlour. This room was his private apartment or study, in which he wrote letters, transacted business, and sat much alone. In this apartment he had spent some of the most important hours of his life; and if its walls could have spoken, they would have revealed more things that lay hidden in the heart of Gideon Underwood, than any human being had ever known—some things that he himself, perchance, had forgotten in the long course of years. They could have told of the proud infant who used to hide himself in a dark corner and sob out his indignant grievs where no one should see that he wept—of the schoolboy who would sit at that window watching the pathway from the Grey Tower—of the young man who paced its narrow area with impatient steps and moody downcast glance,—paced it night and day, times without number—of the mature man who sat hour after hour at the carved black-oak table,—making interminable calculations of pounds sterling, and of acres and crops, sometimes with a strangely sanguine look for one habitually so calm. They could have told of the widower's grief, and of the father's—of the man of to-day, grey-haired and hard featured, who turned restlessly over papers, and found in none what he seemed to seek. But in all the bygone years, not even when his lost son first went into banishment, had those dark walls witnessed such emotion in Gideon Underwood as on this night.

The interview between him and the stranger endured for three hours; and at the close Gideon Underwood saw distinctly that he was a ruined man, that he had reduced his children to beggary, and not only his own children—that, he thought, he might have borne with comparative equanimity—but the children of her whom he had loved in youth—the helpless women committed to his charge; he had defrauded the orphan and the widow—he had dealt treacherously by those who trusted implicitly to him.—This stranger had come in the name of the law to take possession of all he had inherited from his ancestors. Worse still, of the old tower on the hillside, and of the few acres which Miriam Grey still called hers and hoped to bequeath to her nephew. The facts, plainly read to him in written documents, seemed to Mr. Underwood more real than when he had only known that they were so, and that any day the law might claim its own. With the strange infatuation of error, he had half dreamed that by some miraculous chance he might escape from the consequences of his misconduct—that he might recover all by a lucky speculation, as he had lost all by a series of unlucky ones.

What was it he had done? asks the reader. What many a man has done before, and most have lived to repent. He had done evil that good might come. He felt the importance of money; he desired to gain it more quickly than was possible by the ordinary course of his business, and he speculated in the funds—in railways. First, he employed only his own property—It was mortgaged—at first, slightly,—then deeply,—then, beyond hope of redemption unless he should succeed in one final, promising, brilliant scheme, a share of which was proposed to him. The success was almost certain; it seemed madness not to use any means in his power to attain it. The only means in his power was to mortgage Miss Grey's property, which she entrusted entirely to him. He would risk it—it was a fine means of increasing her little fortune as well as of redeeming his own. There could be no doubt of success. He did risk it; and he knew no peace from that hour. It was more than two years before the result of this brilliant speculation was known to the shareholders. It was total, irremediable failure. When Mr. Underwood was officially informed of the fact by his lawyer, in London, he was at the same time informed that the gentleman by whom his estate and that of Miss Grey had been finally purchased, and who lived much abroad, would send an agent in the course of a few months to arrange with him all minor details—the time of yielding possession, &c.

The great blow having been struck, Mr. Underwood was singularly calm and careless about the rest. He determined not to abridge by a single hour the season of happiness to the unconscious victims of his misdeed. His children saw indeed that his mind was much occupied, and Martha and Leah began to talk together about the sudden breaking-up of his constitution, and were anxious that he should have medical advice; but he denied having any ailment, and persisted steadily in all the old habits of his life. He was a strong, iron-hearted man, or he could not have lived as he did. Perhaps, too, there was a secret hope at work, that something—he knew not what—might happen to ward off the blow from the innocent sufferers. Week after week and month after month passed; but the expected agent did not appear.

On that August day, when Mr. Shepherd asked permission to bring a friend who was staying with him, to join the little party in the evening at the Grange, Mr. Underwood never suspected that this friend was the dreaded messenger from the real owner of what he still called his property. He had not for a long time been more at ease than on that evening. The dreary secret of his heart seemed to be forgotten, until it was recalled to memory by Miriam Grey's expression of gratitude to himself. At that moment, too, he caught the stranger's eye fixed on him; and the gaze was like that of the avenging angel who haunted his dreams. By some unaccountable process of the mind, he knew immediately that the stranger was the agent so long expected, and when he subsequently requested a private conversation, Mr. Underwood led him at once to the little back-parlour, and without a word of unnecessary preamble proceeded to the fatal business.

The stranger said very little, and though his accent was foreign, he showed in a few moments that he was what he declared himself to be, an English lawyer, whose business had kept him much abroad. He had, in fact, been attached to several embassies in various capacities. He now presented his credentials in due form, but with an unbusiness-like sympathy for the receiver. These were inspected and read by Mr. Underwood with self-possession. If anything could add to the bitterness of his feelings on seeing the patrimony of which he had been so proud pass into other hands, it was to learn, as he did now, for the first time, that the man who had got possession of it was a certain Admiral Underwood, the head of one of those branches of the family which, as we informed the reader, had taken root during the last century among the gentry of the land. Our yeoman hated his gentlemen-cousins, and avoided all communication with them, and with this one in particular, who was a courtier. He was somewhat surprised that the Admiral should have heard that the Milford Grange was in the market. "How did he know it?" he asked with a grim look at the agent.

"From a person who comes from this part of the country, and who thought it a desirable purchase," was the reply.

"Does the Admiral intend to come and live here himself, sir, do you know?"

"I think not. He has provided a tenant, I believe."

"What, without giving me the option of remaining as tenant?"

"Would you be inclined to rent the farm?" inquired the stranger in a business-like way.

"Yes; I will take it at the rent he affixes. Please to mention this to the Admiral, and add that though I never stooped before to ask a favour of any man, I ask this of him,—to let me work for bread during the remainder of my life as tenant of the land which I and my fathers have owned for ages."

The agent noted the request in his pocket-book, and then proceeded to read aloud numerous law-papers connected with the transfer of the Underwood estate. The wretched Gideon sat by, seemingly as immovable as marble. The strange gentleman watched him in some surprise. It was clear that he felt for him; he turned his head aside while Mr. Underwood finally signed away the house in which they were, and all its demesnes and appurtenances.

"Now, if you please, we will proceed to the documents connected with the Grey estate."

"As you please. Shall I send for Miss Grey? But no, I had forgotten. She must be prepared for this."

He was silent for some minutes, and seemed trying to collect his thoughts while he slowly paced up and down the room. The stranger sat at the table arranging his papers, and with an instinctive respect for the grief of his companion, never once looked up during that painful pause. Presently, Gideon Underwood stopped beside him.

"It is necessary, I dare say, that those documents should be read and signed by Miss Grey."

"In the presence of two witnesses."

"The reading of legal papers to women is generally a mere form; they don't understand them. At least, it will be so in the present case. You can read them to me now, and I will engage that she shall be ready to sign them to-morrow at the hour you appoint, after being made aware of the nature of their contents."

"As you please, sir, in that matter. Anything I can do to soften this unhappy event."

Gideon's proud stiff bow was changed into a sudden impulse to offer his hand to the stranger.

"Admiral Underwood has been considerate in the choice of his agent, sir. Words are not necessary between us, for I have seen all along that you have a manly heart, and that it feels for my agony at this moment. My children, whom you saw just now around me, have not the remotest suspicion that their true condition is that of houseless wanderers, and it is the thought of what I must tell them on the morrow which breaks my spirit now. But, proceed; your work is not over yet. The Grey Tower,—where is that accursed deed of mortgage? I am ready to hear all the necessary forms."

They were all read through, and an hour was appointed on the morrow, at which Mr. Underwood was to meet the stranger up at the Tower in the presence of Miss Grey, when the papers were to be duly signed and witnessed. His business completed, the agent rose at once to depart, for he knew that his presence was a restraint on the feelings of that stern grey-haired man. Truly, lawyers had need have nerves of steel.

"To-morrow, then," he said, "at four o'clock in the afternoon, I will wait on Miss Grey." Then, as he was going to the door, he turned back and said, "Will you excuse me, Mr. Underwood, if I interfere in your affairs so far as to advise that you defer speaking to your family on this unfortunate subject until after I receive my next instructions from the Admiral?"

"What good can there be in the delay?—They must know that they are beggars, sooner or later."

"Nay; if the Admiral accepts you as a tenant, your sons, indeed, may turn out into the world; indeed they should do that, under any circumstances; but your daughters—"

"Need not. Ah! you are right. I had not thought of it; girls do not readily suspect evil, or foresee misfortune. They will live on here as usual, and need not know that we are but tenants of our old home. There is something in that. I would not be entirely disgraced in their eyes; I thank you heartily for the suggestion. Good-night—you will find your way back to the great parlour by that staircase; tell them that I am too busy this evening to return to the company, and inform Miss Grey, if you can find an opportunity, that I shall be with her at the Tower to-morrow afternoon, and shall hope to see her without the presence of Mrs. Ward or Philip."

Saying these words, Mr Underwood closed the door softly, almost in the face of the stranger. The latter stood near it for a short time hesitating. At one moment his hand was on the lock, as if he could not resist a strong impulse to go in again;—then again he withdrew it suddenly, and went quickly up the staircase to the company. He delivered Mr Underwood's message to Martha, and then approached Miss Grey, for the purpose of communicating the one with which he had been entrusted to her. Miriam Grey was seated at the piano-forte. No one was near her at the time but Mary and Philip, who had come there that their words might be drowned to "alien ears" by the notes of the instrument. She heard their soft tones occasionally melting into the cadences of the air she was playing. Since her loss of sight Miriam Grey had lost much in music; she could not learn new compositions from printed pages, and she seldom had an opportunity of hearing them performed by others, when the ear might in some measure have done the work of the eye. So she learned to love all her old familiar music better and better, because she had little hope of acquiring new. At the present moment she was playing an air that carried her back to the years of early youth: and so absorbed was she in the train of thought which it suggested, that she was not aware the strange gentleman they had all been talking of in his absence was standing beside her, listening intently, and watching her sightless up-turned eyes.

It was natural he should look on her with melancholy interest, as he thought of her position. She, a gentle lady—blind—helpless, and, as it seemed to him, with too little of earth in her nature to wage a successful warfare with the commonest, lowest ills of life, in the midst of which she was about to be precipitated through the misconduct of her guardian. And if she could not bear these commonest, lowest ills, of poverty and low estate, and perhaps, (who could tell?) the daily labour for the daily bread; for though, while Gideon Underwood lived, he would never suffer her to toil—as, indeed, he ought not—yet Gideon Underwood was an old man, and the time of unprotected privation would come at last to his injured ward;—if she, blind and delicate in body and refined in mind, all unused to the rough work which in some shape or other always attends the earning of bread,—if she could ill bear to become poor, how could she bear to be stripped at once of all her old reverence and esteem for her guardian?—how could she bear that terrible misery—the recognised unmistakeable wrong-doing of one loved and trusted in as surely, ay, almost as surely, as the eternal and immutable God?

The stranger felt all the weight of Mr Underwood's misconduct, now, as he regarded his gentle unconscious victim. He speculated as to whether she had yet learned the lesson which women are so slow to learn, that when they lean on a man's faith and rectitude it is for the most part on a poor pliant reed they lean. He wondered whether she had already trusted in man and been deceived. Perhaps, she had had a faithless lover; did she love, now? He tried to read the secret in her face. But he could not read anything there but a pure and chastened spirit, that seemed to have anticipated on earth the serenity of the blessed in heaven. Blind as they were, and all unconscious of his searching gaze, he could not look long on those eyes, but passed his hand hastily across his own, and muttered to himself a half malediction that he was made an instrument in the work which brought tears to them.

Slight as the sound was, it recalled Miss Grey to the consciousness of the present, and turning her head suddenly, her sightless eyes shone full upon him, as she said, "Is it you, dear Philip?"

Some emotion seemed to impede the stranger's utterance, but at length he said indistinctly, "No, madam. I have the misfortune—unhappiness—to be a stranger. But that music is a mutual friend."

She smiled gently and said—"Ah! you know it?—Do you like Haydn's canzonets?"—It was a simple question, but whether the sense of all that would befal the questioner in a few hours overpowered our legal friend, or whether German music brought back the German language to his tongue, so as to embarrass his English, certain it is, that he could find no words to reply.

Miss Grey continued playing in silence. He stood by her till she came very near the conclusion of an allegro movement, and then stooping down he said,

"Mr. Underwood commissioned me to say, that he wishes to see you alone to-morrow afternoon, on important business. I—it is in my power, perhaps, to prepare—to soften, in some degree, the pain he must inflict. Will you grant me a few words alone before you see him? Do not let any one in this room, his children especially, suspect anything. Affliction may be in store for them, but 'sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.'"

Miriam Grey's eyes turned towards him with a sad wondering expression, while her fingers went mechanically through the last cadence of the music, and she said, "Ah! I have felt that something lay heavy at Mr. Underwood's heart. It concerns me, too?" For a moment her beautiful features flushed, and were contracted by a strong spasm of agony; and then they turned of an ashen whiteness. Her hands dropped from the keys, making a mournful, jarring discord; her head dropped on her bosom, and she burst into tears.

Unfortunately, there was no concealing the fact. Martha and Leah hurried her from the room, and the stranger made the best story he could in the circumstances—the heat, the touching nature of the music.

"Ah! it's that music of Haydn's, I know," said Philip; "it often makes her cry."

"She has been very nervous for some time," said Mrs. Ward. "It is only nervousness, I assure you, my dear Mr. Shepherd."

"On the contrary, my dear Mrs. Ward, I think there is something really the matter with her. She has been in this state for some time. You had better take her home directly. Go and see if the phaeton is ready, Philip," said the affectionate old man, forgetting his sister and the odd trick. "Is Martha with her?"

"It is nothing but the heat!" said Jack, loudly.

"It is nothing but this foreigner! I hate foreigners!" said Mr. Bang, sotto voce.

"It is nothing but affectation!" muttered Miss Shepherd.

The stranger looked very uncomfortable, and sat down alone at one of the tables, pretending to be much interested in looking at a set of Bartolozzi's engravings. He stood up and bowed to Mrs. Ward when she withdrew, and he heard Martha say that Miss Grey was better, and was quite ready to go. He sat down again and took up an engraving.

Presently Leah approached the table, as if searching for something. When she had attracted his attention she said quietly, (her manner was singularly composed at all times,) "Miss Grey will be obliged if you will see her early to-morrow."

"Certainly. How early?" he replied, still examining the print.

"Anxious as she seems to be about this business which you have to communicate, I should say, as early as possible. She is always up at five o'clock. At six you would be certain to find her roaming about near the Tower. I will walk with you then, as she will need a companion, and cannot have her sister."

"You are very good. We will meet at the end of the village about that time."

"Let me warn you to inflict no unnecessary pain. She cannot bear as my father can. She is so good, so gentle! We all love her so much!"

"God bless you all! Perhaps—"

At this moment Mr. Crypt came up to look after Leah; and Miss Shepherd having taken her limited quantity of cherry-brandy, rose up and announced that it was time to be going. The good rector went to the door of Mr. Underwood's room to wish him good-night, and was struck by the alteration of his looks during those few hours. Mr. Underwood wrung his hand, and murmured in his ear, "Pray for me! Pray for me, my old friend, for I am in trouble." Simple, affectionate Mr. Shepherd. He went away believing that Gideon Underwood's grief was in some way connected with his banished, disobedient son. He was too unworldly to think of such things as loss of property, station, and character,—too virtuous to think that an ill-regulated desire for riches, and a proud ambition of aggrandising those connected with him, could lead a man like Gideon Underwood, the pattern of uprightiness and integrity, to positive crime. So, with his heart full of anxiety about what had befallen the poor exile, and a latent hope that he would return, at last, like the repentant prodigal, Mr. Shepherd accompanied his sister and his friend.

In an hour from that time, when all was still at the Grange, we will look in on Mr. Underwood. He is seated before an old-fashioned escrutoire, many small drawers of which are open, and packets of discoloured letters are lying about. The table behind him is covered with written papers of various kinds; the floor is scattered over with fragments of torn letters. The room looks much like a mere room for "ledger-men," with their "red-lined accounts," to meet and barter and transact what the world calls business in. But look again carefully at the apartment and its occupant, and you will see through the appearance into the very heart of things. That grey-headed man! what is it that he does? Are those bank-notes or bills that he fingers so gently? that he gazes on through a dim mist? Nay, they are rubbish to you and me; old letters, the few faint words scarcely legible, promising nothing, claiming nothing, telling of the veriest trifles that happened long ago. They are written in a weak, girlish hand, and bear a foreign post-mark. They are absolutely valueless, yet that old man gazes on them as if the world held nothing more precious. These, at length, he lays aside reverentially.

He takes up a small clasped volume. He opens it.

It is a neat, methodical-looking diary, and on every page he sees the words "my dear husband," "my honoured husband." He looks quickly but yet softly through the pages, and sighs as he closes it once more, and lays it beside those dear letters, but not so as to touch them; they are too sacred for contact even with so pure a thing as his dead wife's diary. Then, from out one of the larger drawers he takes out packet after packet of letters, all addressed to himself. One or two he unfolds and reads; they are signed "Your affectionate friend, Everard Grey." A tenderness stole over the sad stern face as he read. But suddenly he broke off from reading, and muttered,—

"Why waste more time? Let them go too! I dare not keep them now, old friend! I am stained, disgraced, infamous! Go, all of them! all my precious, best treasures! Henceforth I am poor indeed! I, Gideon Underwood, friend, lover, husband. See! just spirits, present now, I feel it—present and upbraiding;" and he looked somewhat wildly round the room, as if expecting a visible spirit-presence; "See, I will not contaminate these your dear relics, by allowing them to remain any longer in the keeping of a wretch such as I." Then rising, he made a heap on the hearth of those letters from Everard Grey, and laying gently above them his wife's book, and holding above that those most precious mementos of his early love, he set fire to the pile. The bright flame leaped up, roaring and dancing, as if in triumph over its prey, while the offerer of the sacrifice knelt beside it, pale, haggard, and with his eyes fixed on the devouring element.

He watched the last spark expire, and then rose up with an expression in his eye that told of a fiercer fire within. The disorderly condition of the room seemed to attract his attention, and he was about to set some of the papers in order, when he caught sight of certain letters lying in a drawer of the escrutoire. There were ten or a dozen of them, all with the seals unbroken.

"Poor David!" murmured the father, "you are well avenged for my unforgiving spirit. Your mother's prophecy is true. It is too late now to care for your fortunes, my boy; but it is not too late to speak the word which I know these letters pray for. I cannot read them now, I am too weak; but Miriam shall have them." He gathered them together, and wrapping them in a paper, addressed the parcel to Miss Grey. Then he walked hurriedly to and fro, looked through the window out into the moonlit garden, returned to the escrutoire, busied himself there for some time, and then shut it up. At every moment his agitation seemed to increase. He flung himself moodily into a chair by the table, and seizing a pen, wrote as follows in a handwriting quite unlike his usual firm one.

"MY CHILDREN,—When these words are read by you, my crime will be known. I have brought disgrace and poverty on you all. I have betrayed the sacred trust reposed in me, and have ruined Miss Grey and her sister. My sons, all of you! as you hope for happiness hereafter, spare no efforts to keep them from want, and, if it may be, restore what I have deprived them of. My daughters, be you ever gentle and loving to Miriam Grey, and may God bless you! David, my son, I forgive your offence against me, and ask now that you will forgive my greater one against you. In the heat of your young blood you resented a strong provocation, and I, with the concentrated energy of a proud, vindictive, wicked spirit, would never suffer my anger to be appeased. God has broken that spirit now. I have sinned like the meanest of mankind, and my pride is laid low. I bless you, my son, and if it be any satisfaction to you, know that I have always loved you in the bottom of my heart. And now, farewell, all of you. And when you are struggling with the misery he has brought on you, curse not too bitterly

"YOUR UNHAPPY FATHER."

These poor, vague, disjointed words, were all he could command at that moment. Having written them, he left them lying on the table, and opened the door gently, for fear of disturbing the house. When he reached the hall, he did not ascend the staircase to go to his bed-chamber, but softly unbarred the front door, he took his hat and walked out into the garden. He stood on the steps some moments, contemplating the well-known view of the valley and the Grey Tower Fell—all now steeped in the white moonlight, and assuming a distinctness of outline that seemed to him almost preternatural.

"How beautiful!" he thought, "how opposed to the dark disordered world within my breast! All this I have forfeited! of this I have robbed my children! Here, for two hundred years, we have lived honoured and trusted of men, and blessed by God, and I, who verily thought in my heart to be more honourable than all my ancestors, and scorned to accept the common every-day happiness of man, that I might cherish my devilish pride and worship my own image—I have fallen below the lowest of mankind! Ah! there is the verbal scutcheon of our race!" and he gazed at the marble tablet over the door-way; "I have stained and dishonoured it—I dare not repeat the words now."

He turned away, and passing through the garden-gate, which was unfastened—for in that part of the country locks and bars were needless—he walked away rapidly down the valley. He had no sooner gone through the gate, than a tall figure emerged from a shadowy angle of the house, and walked stealthily after Mr. Underwood. The latter hurried on as if impelled by some goading demon, skirting the silent village, along a wood side, away over the shoulder of the Grey Tower Fell—pausing for one moment to gaze on the old Tower itself, and then rushing on faster, as if that look had but served to accelerate his flight. Out of sight of the Grey Tower and of Milford valley, the country on the other side the fell was of a wilder, rougher character. At every hundred yards the ground became more rugged, but Mr. Underwood sped on unhesitatingly, as if he were a youth flying to his beloved. Some strong spell was on him—he looked neither to the right nor to the left, and never once looked behind him after he had lost sight of the Grey Tower. His pursuer followed as best he might, but he was never far behind. At length they struck into an old wood; a weird, dark, gloomy spot, even at noon-day; a place avoided and dreaded by the villagers for miles around—full of traditional horrors, and brooded over by a supernatural curse. The Black Scaur Wood was a more secret and unexplored locality than any I have ever seen within the four seas. Rarely did any one venture into its dim recesses, and he who did so once seldom attempted the feat a second time. Among such adventurous spirits no one born in Milford was ever to be reckoned; unless, indeed, some educated youth of spirit—a Grey or an Underwood—might try his courage there once in a generation.

All along the edge of this wood, on one side, were strange spectral trees; some blasted by lightning, others standing erect but lifeless, their huge trunks hollowed into cavities that looked like the lurking-places of unclean beasts; and here and there a black sepulchral yew stretched its enormous arms in contrast with the dead trees near. What had once been a road or path-way, wound into the depth of the wood, and terminated on the edge of the Black Scaur, on the further side of the wood. A scaur is a local term for a precipice. This Black Scaur was so called from the dark colour of the silix rock which composed it. It overlooked a narrow ravine between the hills, at the bottom of which, a rapid stream flowed with a ceaseless clamour all through the summer, and in the winter the clamorous stream became a deafening torrent. To a fanciful observer looking from the brink of that stream, up along the perpendicular face of the Scaur, the trees of the wood above seemed like a jagged iron crown in the very act of tumbling over the brow of a huge Norse Giant. And to such an observer, gazing from the upper edge of the Scaur down into the ravine below, it seemed as if the turbid stream were an army of demons shouting to him to jump down from his station and join in their revels.

Without simile or metaphor—without the slightest exaggeration—the edge of the Black Scaur is incomparably the most dangerous precipice I ever saw. There is a fatal, giddy fascination about it; and the strongest-headed men have need to clasp the trunk of a tree very tightly, when they look over into the abyss. The Scaur continues for about five hundred yards or more, and in no part of that space is the ground so dangerous, as at the sudden point where the old road through it terminates. It might have served as a place for the execution of criminals in some far off, barbaric age, when the law-makers, in conscious or unconscious imitation of the early Romans, threw offenders from the top of some natural elevation. But far more hideous, wild, and terrible than any Tarpeian rock was the sheer, blank, murderous descent of the Black Scaur, with the demon-roar of the torrent below. The very birds, and small woodland animals, seemed to shun the brink—and all along the edge, no delicate mountain blossom smiled in innocent defiance of the terror that overhung the spot.

And now, in the beautiful holy night, Gideon Underwood was hurrying through the old pathway he had once threaded in his youth. Then he went to satisfy the bold-spirited curiosity that was within him, and the pride which loved to say, "I have been where my fellows dare not go." Now, he went with a strange undefined purpose. An irresistible impulse had seized him to stand once more and look down from that fearful point. He often did this in his dreams—he would do so now in his waking state, and see what came of it. It was a terrible trifling, a reckless play with the spirit of evil, whose hand he now felt on him. He felt that he had the power to resist—to turn back—but that somehow, the will to use that power refused to exert itself. As he went through the dark hollows of that old wood, where the moonbeams sent little light, he was obliged to pause several times to make sure that he was not deviating from the path; and as he paused, hoarse voices from the stream, in the depth of the ravine beyond, seemed to be calling him to hasten onward.—Once he called out aloud, "No! I will not go on!" and just then, a dark shadow appeared close behind him. But, in another moment, the fatal, inexplicable fascination was resumed—he hurried on, stumbling, breathless, yet still eager and determined. Through the sudden opening in the trees, at the end of the path—on the extreme edge of the precipice, where there was nothing beyond, but the upper and the lower air, hanging over the ravine—there, in the infinite space, floated the moon, looking searchingly into the face of the advancing man. Yet on he went, listening to the torrent voices from below, and closing his eyes against the soft dazzling light.

His steps became more rapid as he approached the edge of the Scaur, for the ground there descended a little. At length, he stood on the utmost verge—where he had once stood as a boy. He had thought then, that if disgrace should ever overtake any one of the name of Underwood, here were his fitting place of punishment, where none might ever know his fate. It was the wild romantic fancy of a boy; but it came back with vivid force to the disturbed brain of the old man, coupled with the passionate yearning of the heart for freedom from the galling load of life. Gideon Underwood was one of the many hundreds who in an hour of strong agony rush wildly towards any point whence they may hope to break loose from this bondage of sin and sorrow.

"Mad from life's history,
Swift to death's mystery,
Glad to be hurl'd
Anywhere, anywhere,
Out of the world."

The wild desire had mastered him now; and as a bird falls from the tree into the jaws of the serpent below, he was about to drop over the fearful edge, when he was dragged back into the wood by a strong arm. His o'er-excited spirit could bear no more, and he sank down at the feet of his deliverer in a state of utter unconsciousness.

AFTER a few days' rest to reflect on what we saw at our last visit, we again enter the Crystal Palace to continue our examination of its contents. The next country we enter is Switzerland, which is worthy of remark for various reasons: but there is a more attractive name, it is Spain; let us examine its exhibition leisurely—those who love this chivalrous nation will find much to interest them. Spain is like men of great minds, none offer her a cold affection or mere common sympathy—they either adore or dislike her. Thank goodness, I am among the number of those who love her passionately, and nevertheless, Spain is diametrically opposite to China. Imagine my Chinese friend traversing the uncultivated territories of Castile. He would not hesitate to affirm that all the inhabitants are mad at least, if not dead.

Can you fancy Don Quixote riding through a Chinese rice-field and meeting a Mandarin? Here reason reigns; there, romance in its highest acceptation: on one hand we trace the operations of the mind, on the other, the impulses of the heart; meditative philosophy and noble folly, Confucius and Cervantes. I have spoken of Chinese wisdom and the nobleness of peace. Now Spain allures me, and were I not afraid of contradicting myself, I should sound the praises of the clarion and the tournament. It is true, order is a most excellent thing, but is glory nothing? May not the fascinating attraction of peril, the intoxication of combat, be taken into consideration? Is it necessary to convert all the glittering spears into scales for counters? Love and honour do not increase the contents of the purse, yet who would consent to live in the world without them? Ah! how noble was the age of lances, cavaliers, tournaments, and scarfs defended till the latest breath! "God and my lady" was a noble cry. Ages of heroism and passion, of nobility and combats, of golden crests and iron-girded horses; days of poetry in which woman reigned, when brave knights lived but to love her, and died for a smile; ages for ever passed, ye will still be adored, and far as the admiration of the useful may lead us, woe be to him who can think of you without feeling a spark of chivalry kindled in his bosom! If we love Spain, let us not deceive ourselves—it is because she, more than any other country, has preserved the worship of love and honour. In the midst of her misfortunes, she has ever remained faithful to the traditions of the past; we can everywhere trace the influence of the poetry of other days. Look at its exhibition in London, which I have quitted too unceremoniously; you will there see its image. It has been said, and very justly, that a nation may be judged by its products. The Spanish love God, woman, and glory. What have they chiefly exhibited? Sacred vases, ornaments, and swords. Religious fervour, the respect of love, chivalrous enthusiasm, the church, the boudoir, the circus, are all there. The pyxes and silver gilt crosses inlaid with precious stones, from Madrid, are of beautiful workmanship, but rather overloaded with ornaments; to my ideas, profusion of details injures the elegance of the whole; but it is not correct simplicity that best pleases the Spaniard, and we may easily recognise the models of this jewellery in the crowded and minutely-detailed sculptures in wood of Seville and Burgos. As to the inlaid arms of Eusebio Zuloaga, they are very fine, and the swords of Toledo, pliable as whalebone, enclosed in their round adder-shaped scabbards, are excellent. When drawn from the sheaths in which they peacefully sleep, they raise themselves tremblingly, like infuriated reptiles. The inscription the Andalusians place on their navajas should be engraved on these blades: Si esto bitora te pica, no ha remedio en la boteca, ("If this viper sting thee, there is no remedy in pharmacy.") Every one is acquainted with the cloaks of Valencia, the woollen stuffs of Segovia, the richness of the mantles of Malaga, and the fans of Andalusia.

The exhibition of Spain would not have been complete without some of the tedious and delicate workmanship in wood. M. Perez of Barcelona has engaged to maintain the ancient reputation of his country, and has sent a mosaic table composed of three millions of different pieces; it is a prodigy of patience and delicacy. When the Spaniard has prayed to God, seen and conversed with the woman he loves, and praised the chiclanero, what is still a desideratum? A cigar. Havannah has completed the exhibition of the mother country, by adding two glass cases filled with the best and most tempting regalia and pañatelas. In short, the peninsular exhibition is very interesting. I was at Madrid five years ago, when for the first time, I believe, Spain opened a museum for the products of her industry. I might venture to affirm, if I were any authority on these matters, that, since that period, the progress is immense. We ought all to rejoice at the prosperity of this loyal nation, which, for the last three years, has given to the whole of Europe lessons of good sense and pride.

Belgium has long been Spanish, and something of the character still remains. Although assimilated to England by its tastes, manners, climate, and industry, it has preserved some artistic tendencies of a different nature, of which it would be unjust to make no mention. Its statuary, for instance, although it does not entirely justify the pretensions of the connoisseurs of Brussels, is far from contemptible. But it is not for me here to speak of arts, or of their application to industry: I well know that a more able pen must treat of this subject for the readers of SHARPE; I wish merely to touch upon the Sculpture in wood, of which the Belgians have exhibited numerous specimens, because I fancy I can there trace Spanish influence. It is shown, I think, in the execution, which is rather heavy—in the drawing, which is rather laboured and crowded—and in the choice of subjects, which are almost all religious. All that is certainly not without merit, although we may safely say that the Spanish did better formerly, and that the French, in this respect, are far before their excellent neighbours. It is true, the French might in their turn take lessons in the manufacture of wools, cloths, and flannels. Each to his work.

Belgium, in London, is bounded by Austria, and if we turn our back upon Antwerp, we shall perceive Bohemia with its crystals. It is a frightful spectacle. I love Vienna tenderly, as one may and ought to love a country in which happy days have been spent; I esteem the Austrians: they are powerful, firm, resolute, and have a thousand other good qualities; but they are not colourists. These far-famed Bohemian crystals offer a horrible mélange of detestable tints which are enough to give one the headache. Never did a pack of famished dogs howl in a more distracting manner than these unlucky glasses: one may hear them cry; they abhor and abuse each other. I have never smelt any perfume whatever, without immediately giving it, in my own mind, some colour, and to colours one may, in like manner, give a voice. The senses are never completely independent of each other; if their functions are different, they have a common soul. Without positively asserting that we breathe what we touch, we see what we smell, and hear what we see, we may yet say that there exists a similar connexion between the senses. I heard the din of the Bohemian exhibition. I still see in my mind's eye two large green vases, the clarions of this insufferable orchestra; they resemble two rounded pyramids, extremely elongated, remarkably fragile, and refusing under any pretext to stand straight on their bases. The staring green with which they are coloured, is interrupted towards the summit by a collar of milky white; and immediately behind, two large, fat, dropsical, unruly flagons are singing a duet out of time. They are followed by a perfect army of melancholy candelabra, mutinous candlesticks, stupid wine-glasses, lazy cups, flat plates, empty sugar-basins, and ambitious fruit-dishes. It is a perfect bedlam. But those two vases—Austria ought never to be pardoned for them. If you happen to find them in any man's house, be he who he may, mistrust him—do not make him your friend; if you meet them in the drawing-room of a lady, be she young, be she even beautiful, be on your guard, reserve your homage for another occasion, she is not worthy your notice. It is to be regretted that interested, and, if we may credit report, mean and unworthy considerations prevented the French from sending their crystals of Baccarat to the exhibition; they would have obtained a sure and glorious victory over the Bohemian glass. The Baccarat workmen conceal their superiority too carefully: it is not to their modesty that this secrecy is to be attributed; they are accused, on the contrary, of preferring money to glory, and of feigning inferiority in order to retain the exaggerated protection of the custom-house officers. Austria has also exhibited a bed-room and dressing cabinet, on which much praise has deservedly been bestowed. The sculptured bed, tables, chairs, and cabinet of maple-wood are executed in perfection. We do not often meet with such cabinet-work in Germany; it is true that comes from Milan, we are told. The design might well be German—this beautiful furniture is so inconvenient. The little, round, short, interwoven, useless curtains, forming a dais, covered with tassels resembling little bells, give the bed an air of resemblance to those instruments of torture, in which you are invited to sleep, in Germany, between two stifling eiderdowns which menace you with apoplexy if you endure them, and punish you with colds on the chest if you discard them! The Germans, who produce such good and useful things as the cloths and flannels from Saxony, have no idea of elegance. As soon as they attempt it, they lose themselves for want of knowing how to combine the useful and ornamental. Look for instance at a carriage from Hamburg, with golden springs, and chased lanterns; that is useless, and out of place. I could easily mention twenty more articles of the same description. When we depart from nature, goodness knows where we may go, and nothing, as La Fontaine says, is done with grace. Have you ever noticed Germans attempting to imitate the light gaiety of the French? They never can hit the exact mark; they aim either too high or too low, and exchange their own quiet and serious manners for awkwardness. It is precisely the same with their manufactures; if they leave their own sphere to follow their neighbours, they attain nothing but absurdity.

The German exhibition also contains an immense plan in relief of the castle of Rosenau, the birth-place of Prince Albert. Extreme innocence breathes in this object, and I am convinced that he who made it is a very worthy man. It is formed of a large square piece of wood, covered, I apprehend, with papier-mâché, on which hills and lawns have been placed, miniature fir-trees planted, and in which valleys have been excavated; the walks are ingeniously indicated by sawdust. On an eminence is seen a pasteboard castle; at the foot of the hill are assembled about a hundred little wooden country-people. The affair is wound up, and the worthy folks commence a waltz. It would be unjust, however, thus to laugh at the rest of Zollverein. Its exposition is extensive and curious. Prussia in particular has made great exertions. The statuarics of Berlin have sent several interesting pieces; and M. Drake's vase, although faulty from the inequality of the figures, the want of perspective, and a kind of general confusion, yet offers many admirably handled and extremely pretty parts, and the production, if not worthy of the enthusiasm with which it has sometimes been mentioned, is nevertheless very praiseworthy. I may say the same of his statue of a child, which is said to be a portrait of his son. M. Ernst Rischel, of Dresden, exhibits two little bas-reliefs in white marble, in the anacreontic style, both very elegant, and touched with great delicacy; also, next to them, a religious group in a bold style. The chessboard and men of silver enamel, by Weishaupt Sohn of Leipsic, is, I do not hesitate to state, a wonderful piece of workmanship; it would look extremely well in the Hotel Cluny, in which is preserved another exquisite chessboard said to be the gift of the Old Man of the Mountain.

I am not acquainted with Russia, a circumstance I deeply regret. I believe there is no country in the world of which a more false idea is generally formed. Although we do not now picture the subjects of the Emperor Nicholas as uncouth savages bowed down under a yoke of iron, and inhabiting a country in which the white bear would not hesitate to take up its abode, yet we speak but doubtfully of them. The contrast is incredibly striking between the rude recollections of the age of Peter the Great, and the refined, exquisite, and we might almost add excessive civilization of which the high Russian society gives evidence. In no country can a more charming woman be found than a Russian lady of rank. There is an indescribable grace about her peculiarly her own, and bearing no resemblance whatever to Spanish loyalty, Italian passion, German reverie, or English reserve. This grace is probably not a gift of nature, but all trace of art is admirably concealed. It is a union of aristocratic distinction, Greek delicacy, and French tact, on which a ray of the East has also shed its light. How can we reconcile this delicate charm with the knout, these talented diplomatists with the Cossacks, and St. Petersburg with Siberia? At all events, there is something of the East in Russia, as we perceive in the Exhibition by the taste for luxury and love of the beautiful in the silks of Indian richness, and the gold and silver-embroidered leather. Besides the diamonds, turquoises, marble mosaics, and gold and silver work of which they are perfect masters, the Russians have exhibited the entire furniture of a house in malachite,—tables, mantelpieces, enormous vases, folding-doors twenty feet high, in malachite! With this stone, of which we unfortunate beings are happy to possess a seal or studs, M. Demidoff erects palaces. Being the proprietor of the mines, he lives in a precious stone like a seaman in his bark. If I mistake not, these are Asiatic ideas which would never enter the brain of a North American, although the sun of Massachusetts is far superior to that of Lithuania or Finland. Do you doubt this? Then let us visit the United States a second time, if this method of travelling be not too fatiguing. There, where the beautiful is always sacrificed to the useful, everything is black, cold and gloomy. Not an ornament, not a carving is there to relieve the frigid collection of articles exhibited. Fancy is banished as a crime; you inhale the united odours of iron, pitch and tar, the forge and the vessel. Even a child would cultivators, the democratic and republican England, by its works.

On all sides appear chronometers, compasses, telescopes, sea-charts, instruments of war, hatchets, pick-axes, and all utensils round which might be inscribed the motto "ense et aratro;" and to represent commercial fever and love of gold, strong iron chests, with most extraordinarily complicated locks. What is art to those constant and indefatigable travellers? What matters the ideal to them? Are the days sufficiently long to be spent in dreaming? and what is the difference between reverie and idleness? No; if they want portraits, or even landscapes, they can be taken almost instantaneously by daguerreotype; is it not a more exact and mathematical mode of painting? Thus reasoning, the Americans have devoted themselves to the darkened room and to nitrate of silver, and, it must be confessed, they have sent some superb plates of silver. Nothing appears difficult to them; the fall of Niagara itself they have succeeded in arresting in its progress, or in seizing in its flight; they present it to us taken in the act. At length, when their exhibition was completed, they themselves were surprised at their own gravity. They perceived there was no article of amusement in all their collection, and, in commiseration of the frivolity of Europe, they wished to prove that jest was not unknown to them; consequently they filled four boxes with ludicrous dolls, pasteboard dogs, and stuffed birds. Such was their quota of amusement, at least so they thought, but they were mistaken. The ludicrous side of their character was revealed unknown to them, and in no part of the exhibition is our risibility so strongly excited as when we gaze on the eccentricities, so seriously exhibited, of American genius. I shall describe some of them. The first object we notice is a wooden box about the size of an ordinary trunk; in this case we find an entire house of caoutchouc, capable of being fixed at pleasure on a very light board, and folding by means of ingenious hinges, and occupying no more room than an umbrella. All necessary furniture is packed with the house. Here is an excellent elastic mattress which expands at pleasure; these rags are cushions, into which you have only to blow in order to transform them into good arm-chairs. Do you wish to breathe the fresh air before your door with your family on a lovely summer's evening? Blow into this long strip; you will thus convert it into a very comfortable form on which you may sit with your whole family. In the course of your journeyings you will probably meet with a stream you will be compelled to cross; take this paletôt; you have never seen its equal. At first sight there is nothing to distinguish it from an ordinary Macintosh, and it resembles those worn by the dandies of Hyde Park and the Champs Elysées. But in one of the pockets you will find a small tube, the end of which you must adjust to a button-hole. The paletôt instantly swells; it is metamorphosed, and takes the form and qualities of a good canoe. Two little oars are concealed at the bottom of the trunk;

you embark, seated on the case which contains your house, and having crossed the river, the canoe resumes its original form. According to the state of the atmosphere, it becomes a garment, or disappears in the box. A little further, you see a copper machine about the size of a bottle; you take it for a turnspit, doubtless; not at all, it is a tailor. Wind it up, and present a piece of cloth to it; it begins to move, it turns; scissors appear and cut the cloth, a needle presents itself, and begins to sew with feverish activity; in less than a minute or two it throws down a pair of trousers, then tremblingly waits for another piece of cloth. Take care lest it seize the end of your coat, for it would immediately cut it with its usual skill, and convert it into one of those garments which English modesty mentions not.

You thus perceive that with this trunk and machine a man might travel far without the aid of his fellow-creatures. Add to this baggage one of the steam-ploughs lately invented by the English, which, by means of a little apparatus that moves six ploughshares at a time, turns over a field in a minute; you can navigate, sleep, and support yourself without troubling any one. In spite of these eccentric inventions, the exhibition of the United States is not what was expected; it expresses not the power of that great nation. The English exhibitors rejoice at this with an ostentation which but ill conceals their secret jealousy, and even fears. On his side, the Yankee laughs at, or pretends to laugh at, the Crystal Palace. "We will purchase it," he says, "to form a wing to the building we intend to erect." It is like the Gascon asserting the palace of Versailles resembled his father's stables.

It is quite time, after these distant excursions, to retrace our steps and return to the point from which we started. We must not forget, that to ourselves, as well as to the rest of the world, the principal interest in this universal exhibition is caused by the contest between England and France; they are the real combatants of these pacific lists. The English exposition occupies the whole of the left wing of the palace, that is to say, one-half of the whole. It covers several acres of ground. A folio volume would not suffice to describe it minutely; besides, it is not my intention to wander step by step into this endless labyrinth of products of every species and every colour. I wish to sketch from afar this imposing spectacle, to notice the resemblance to and difference from the French exhibition, and remark some of the principal objects. England is the most powerful country in the world: such is the exclamation that involuntarily escapes your lips at the sight of this formidable bazaar, which is as a counterpoise to the entire universe, and in which everything seems to have been amassed by the hands of the Titans.

As you enter the gallery, an almost terrific noise assails your ears; you hear the mingled sounds of steam-engines, the moving causes of the numerous works, pistons, hydraulic machines, fountains, spinning machines, weaving machines: the iron world seems hurrying on as if in its feverish ardour it would cover the earth with its works, or grind the world from one pole to the other. In the gallery above this volcano, which is constantly emitting columns of cottons and cloths, iron and tools, you meet with heaps of diamonds, entire streets lined with golden jewels and pieces of plate; at the end, miniature ships, a perfect fleet, always in full sail, as if ready to convey to every sea these products of intelligence, riches, industry, and courage. And think not that I have arranged this rough sketch of the English exhibition to suit myself. No, you will find it thus yourself; every one may see it; the nation is painted at its work, and if we enter into details, we shall find the portrait still more striking. What do you see under that enormous globe? It is an aerial tunnel, in which the carriages of a railway train may travel above the masts of the vessels; below are implements for draining, by means of which the Scotch drain marshes, fertilize an ungrateful soil, and give to countries more favoured by heaven, lessons in agriculture. At a little distance, we perceive marbles, silks, unknown fruits, and exotic grain; these are exhibited by the English colonies, who exchange the riches they receive from the hand of Nature for the products which the governing nation owes to its industry. There we see Malta, the depository of the Mediterranean; the Archipelago of the Ionian Isles, the key to the Adriatic; Guiana, New South Wales, Canada, Jamaica, the Cape of Good Hope; Jersey, the sentinel stationed there to watch the French; Calcutta, Bombay, and many more: these are the arms of England encircling the globe.

It must be confessed, as far as grandeur of appearance is concerned, the English exhibition is incomparable. In its general aspect, it has this striking feature, that it appears, thus to speak, to take its stand midway between America, the country of the useful, and France, the land of the agreeable. Without possessing to the same extent as the French, devotion to the beautiful, and love of amusement, we are yet less determined in our austerity—in a word, less prosaic—than our rivals of the New World. If we have nearly the same tastes, the same manners, the same inclinations, we at least admit a different manner of living and different customs: with us, the useful ever bears the palm; but if ornament offers itself at the same time, we do not despise it. If we give the preference to the useful, that is no reason for our rejecting all besides with scorn. We are the greatest manufacturers in the world, but we have had our Shakspeare and our Byron. Here we see a droll machine which is worthy of America: it consists of some wheel-works of iron, into which a child throws some sheets of paper, and from which issue envelopes; but there are carvings almost French in appearance, and by the side of this enormous block of pit-coal, we find a blue diamond worth thousands. We may almost accuse our exhibitors of having paid too much attention to elegance, for in several objects there are marks of evident affectation and imitation. The French may rejoice at this, for they know themselves to be the cause of the passing aberration. We laugh at the follies of the French, and often have cause for our mirth. When they pretend to combat with us, we point to our sky charged with the smoke of our machines, our seas covered with vessels: they can answer nothing; but we are not ignorant that this light and pleasure-loving nation illumines the torch from whence rise sparks the world admires, and which to-morrow might emit flames that would set the universe on fire. Will it be credited that this "Diable au Corps," which is the cause of their vices as well as their virtues, the transports which produce their success as well as their misery, the grace and ease in which refinement and education appear, the chivalrous pride to which they owe their elegance, the gallantry which is probably their greatest charm,—all is admired and envied by England, perhaps quite as much as France envies and admires our calm power and imposing stability? Despite our gravity, we like the French, and notwithstanding our sense, we are jealous of them. I know that this assertion will probably call forth a sneer, or at least a laugh, and will perhaps be regarded as a jest; yet, if we do not like France, and are not jealous of her, why do we imitate her? why do we seek from her models of good taste, and thus tacitly acknowledge the superiority of her imagination?

That we imitate France, who will deny after visiting the Exhibition? And we must confess we are but poor imitators; in attempting to follow them, we take the wrong path, and lose more than we gain by our pursuit. This year especially we have erred in this respect. Sure of our power and commercial superiority, we were anxious to be the first in everything, and almost neglected our incontestable advantages, in order to combat our neighbours across the channel on their own ground. We have always heard the artists of France praised for their talent in making objects of luxury and beauty; we dreaded their ability and experience, and feared lest we should be ridiculed for our simplicity. We fancied that massiveness might be taken for heaviness, and put ourselves to great expense in order to ape the French; in so doing, we have exaggerated, done violence to nature, and abandoned our good old customs and traditions. The English silver has always been celebrated for the elegance and richness of its massive simplicity: this year, a new species of plate has appeared, studied and overcharged with chasing, in which we can trace a clumsy imitation of French goldsmith's work;—the comfortable, delightful, durable London carriages, were renowned for their straight cut: the Exhibition is adorned with extraordinarily shaped travelling carriages, lined with red silk, the panels adorned with orange-blossom, painted on flesh-coloured grounds; semicircular gigs, white phaetons, and laudaus formed like shells. We all know the comfort and solidity of our own furniture; the Exhibition presents pianos with the keys of mother-of-pearl, ebony seats on which it would be impossible to sit, and sofas absolutely useless, save for dolls.

French gloves and boots are unrivalled; we, in order to excel them, have renounced our good coachmen's gloves and never-ending shoes, and produced pink, primrose, and pale-green gloves, and pointed boots, on the ends of which the portrait of Prince Albert is embroidered. The London harnesses and saddles are unequalled for excellence and simplicity; for the Exhibition, the best saddlers in the United Kingdom have exerted their talents, to embroider shapeless saddles with red thread, and load with ornaments harnesses suitable only for cardinals. It would be easy, but useless, to add to this list.

Far be it from us to say that everything in our exhibition is equally ugly: no, there are on the contrary multitudes of excellent and superb things. Everything that is intended for daily use is perfect. The shawls are soft, warm, and cost nothing; the Scotch tartans are beautiful in colour; the cast-iron fire-places draw wonderfully; the telescopes are perfect; and the price of the calicos and prints is incredibly small. Strange as it may appear, it is nevertheless true, that England, the land of aristocracy, produces good things for the people only, while France, the country of democrats, works only for the aristocracy! At Paris, a certain degree of luxury is permitted to everybody; in London, unless you are a nabob, you must steadily deny yourself everything that exceeds the limits of absolute necessity; for here, as well as everywhere else, you may read the character of the nation in its exhibition. If you wish to live in London like a workman or shopkeeper, you will be well fed, well clothed, well lodged, and at little expense; but you must not think of pleasure. You do not live there to amuse yourself; a box at the theatre with a carriage to conduct you thither will cost you just as much as a journey from Paris to Marseilles. The superfluous is unknown to the common people, and the parallel we have established between the tastes of the East and West may also be equally well applied to France and England. Walk through the Strand, the City, or Piccadilly; notice the crowd hurrying on; you might take it for a swarm of ants: not a man stops or looks round; each one has his own business in his thoughts, and thinks of it alone. During the day, there is not a moment to spare for pleasure; the evening is devoted to the family circle; the Sabbath is consecrated to God. We do not need the amusements in which the French delight; indeed, we could not enter into them with such zest as they do. Imagination and Reason are two inimical sisters, between which, alas! choice must be made, for the former rarely permits those whom the latter has crowned to enter her lists. England has long since made her choice, and daily reaps the advantages of it; she is calm, majestic, inflexible and wise. We must, however, remain faithful to the customs tradition has handed down to us and our climate compels, for if we once leave the beaten track, we shall lose ourselves, and renounce our native character without acquiring that which we covet. France has chosen the flowered path; she is ever gay and agreeable, and often unhappy. The two great nations are separated only by a little strait, yet how different are they! there is nothing between them but contrast and dissimilarity. We may, however, give them good lessons sometimes. An incident lately occurred in England to which the scandals of French assemblies offer a sad contrast. From time immemorial it has been the custom in the House of Lords to open the sitting by a short prayer offered by one of the bishops who are honoured with a seat in the assembly. One day, it chanced that there was not a single bishop present. What did the house? It immediately and unhesitatingly deferred the sitting. In France, such a circumstance would be thoroughly laughed at, yet it is by this absolute respect of the past that a country preserves its greatness and purity. It is the same with institutions as with the dykes of Holland: in permitting the slightest encroachment there is danger of perishing: the smallest fissure might give entrance to the deluge.

But we must hasten now to the French exposition, which, indeed, well merits our attention. The first object which arrests our attention is Pradier's Phryné, which is placed before the beautiful carving in walnut wood and the bronze armour. A little further appears the Bacchante of Clesinger, surrounded by the Gobelins, Beauvais, and Aubusson tapestry, and Sèvres porcelain. The vases from Sèvres are so beautiful, that all who cast their eyes on them remain as if enchained by some invisible power. Ascend to the gallery; you will then see the various produce of Lyons. It is not necessary to be a connoisseur to recognise the beauty of those pieces of velvet and satin; the painter as well as the workman may find matter for study; the mere arrangement of the Lyons exhibition is a masterpiece. Each yard of silk is displayed with the respect due to it; each tint is surrounded by friendly tints, each design by designs which harmonize with it. The Queen, who is the most diligent visitor of the Exhibition, greatly admires these galleries. M. Eugene Delacroix, a good authority, asserts that the persons who arrange the goods in the shop-windows of Paris are the best colourists in Europe. The power of arranging and harmonizing colours, which so eminently distinguishes the French, is a national feature, and is found everywhere throughout France, not only in the shop-windows, but in the arrangement of the houses, and the dress of the women. It is greatly to be lamented that imitation has been carried to such an extent, that it is frequently almost impossible to distinguish the true from the spurious. Below the galleries of Lyons and Alsace, opposite the furniture of the working association, in which a certain unity and harmony is wanting, is seen a perfect host of jewels and watches in imitation gold, bronzes of pretended art, and "nouveautés" in bad taste, which the jury of admission ought to have excluded, for they are unworthy the place they occupy in the Crystal Palace.

We may also hazard another remark on the French exhibition. For the purpose of maintaining order, French superintendents have been stationed in various parts;

this is very good, but why, in the name of that is singular, have these worthy men been furnished with military hats? What is the good of testifying their warlike mania in this pacific congress? We all know that they are incomparable soldiers; Europe has learned that to her cost, and there is no fear of her forgetting it. Our English policemen have a much more simple and suitable costume. Our neighbours have yet to learn from us, how to esteem and respect the constituted authorities. As we have already remarked, France, which men have attempted to make the nucleus of universal democracy, is eminently aristocratic in her industry. She can produce only beautiful objects; she can work only for the wealthy. As long as there are rich people on earth to purchase her silks, velvet, porcelain, carpets, bronzes, pictures, and statues, there is no fear of the prosperity of her commerce. It matters little whether the prices demanded be exorbitant or not, the objects will still be required. Do you think that because a velvet dress cost 350 francs instead of 300 one less will be sold? Do you imagine it will be of any consequence whether M. Fourdinois asks 40,000 or 35,000 francs for his sideboard? The only marvel is, that Socialism has produced workmen capable of such things. How blind are Socialists! Can they not perceive that the day which witnesses the realization of their fond dreams, and the disappearance of those large fortunes which alone can procure objects of art and luxury, will also find them dying of hunger?—for cheap and useful things [they] cannot make, and the expensive articles by which they now obtain their living, will no longer be demanded. They are attempting to kill the hen of the golden eggs. Worthy demagogues! you who are longing to raze the palaces, of "your tyrants" for love of equality, to level fortunes, abolish luxury, and sow potatoes in the Tuileries; intelligent counsellors! you who are advising the people to select the ignorant and simple for their leaders, go to the exposition of Lyons and Sèvres; tell us for whom these masterpieces of art will be made, when there is no one to pay for them; tell us whether a nation formed upon your model would produce such wonders; tell us, in short, whether the people who formed them are capable of being governed by men taken from the dregs of the community. The French may derive consolation from their own exhibition; there is no fear of their being yet reduced to the miserable condition which Socialists desire.

"The more truth you can get into any business, the better. Let the other side know the defects of yours; let them know how you are to be satisfied; let there be as little found out as possible, (I should say, nothing,) and if your business be an honest one, it will be best tended in this way. The talking, bargaining, and delaying, that would then be needless—the little that would then have to be done over again—the anxiety that would be put aside, would, even in a worldly way, be 'great gain.'—Friends in Council, vol. i.

IT RUNS IN THE BLOOD.

THE tendency of nature to reproduce personal peculiarities of all kinds, and to transmit them through successive generations from father to son, has often been remarked, and may, to a greater or less extent, be noticed in every family circle. It is no uncommon occurrence to see the child an almost perfect fac-simile of the parent in the cast of features and expression of the countenance, the sound of the voice, the figure of the body, and the dispositions of the mind. Sometimes there is no resemblance to either father or mother, where there is a very striking resemblance to a grandfather or grandmother, or even to a more distant relative. A family peculiarity will not unfrequently disappear in one generation and re-appear in the next, and even more generations than one are occasionally passed over. Every one who has examined a gallery of family portraits must have noticed this tendency of nature to raise up casual varieties or characteristic peculiarities of features or form, and to render them fixed and indelible in succeeding generations. A face of remarkable loveliness will thus be reproduced at intervals with perfect accuracy, and the beauty of to-day, while bearing no resemblance to her immediate progenitors, will frequently be found to be an actual likeness of a remote ancestor from whom she may be separated by a couple of centuries. "I always consider an old English family," says Washington Irving, "as well worth studying as a collection of Holbein's portraits, or Albert Durer's prints. There is much antiquarian lore to be acquired, much knowledge of the physiognomies of former times. Perhaps it may be from having continually before their eyes those rows of old family portraits with which the mansions of this country are stocked; certain it is that the quaint features of antiquity are often most faithfully perpetuated in these ancient lines; and I have traced an old family nose through a whole picture gallery, legitimately handed down from generation to generation almost from the time of the Conquest. Something of the kind was to be observed in the worthy company around me. Many of their faces had evidently originated in a Gothic age, and been merely copied by succeeding generations; and there was one little girl in particular, of staid demeanour, with a high Roman nose and an antique vinegar aspect, who was a great favourite of the Squire's, being, as he said, a Bracebridge all over, and the very counterpart of one of his ancestors who figured in the court of Henry VIII."

It would be very easy to adduce many instances of this transmission of family faces and features. A peculiar thickness of the under lip has been hereditary in the imperial house of Hapsburg ever since the marriage, some centuries ago, with the Polish family of Jagellon, whence it came. In our own royal family, a certain fulness of the lower and lateral parts of the face is conspicuous in the portraits of the whole series of sovereigns, from George I. to Victoria, and has been equally marked in other members of the family. The females of the ducal house of Gordon have long been remarkable for a peculiarly elegant conformation of the neck. The Clackmannanshire Bruces, who are descended from a common stock with the famous Robert Bruce of Scotland, are said to have that strongly-marked form of the cheek-bones and jaws which appears on the coins of that heroic monarch, as it did in his actual face when his bones were disinterred at Dunfermline about thirty years ago. The prevalent tallness of the inhabitants of Potsdam, many of whom are descended from the gigantic guards of Frederick I.; the Spanish features observable in the people of the county of Galway, in which, some centuries ago, several Spanish settlements were made; and the hereditary beauty of the women of Prague,—are well-known facts which have frequently attracted the attention of chronologists. The burgesses of Rome (the most invariable portion of every population) exhibit at the present day precisely the same type of face and form as their ancestors, whose busts may be seen carved in relief on the ancient sarcophagi, and the Jewish physiognomies portrayed upon the sepulchral monuments of Egypt are identical with those which may be observed among modern Jews in the streets of any of our great cities.

A curious example of the persistence of family features occurred a few years ago in the case of a female descendant of the unfortunate Stuarts, through Charles Ratcliffe, the brother of the Earl of Derwentwater, who was executed for his share in the rebellion of 1715. The lady referred to was walking through the gallery of the Louvre, when a gentleman whom she did not know began to observe her studiously. At length he came up, and begging her to excuse his curiosity, requested to know if she was in any way related to Charles II. of England. Her ladyship told him she was; her great-grandfather was a grandson of that monarch. The quæstioner said he was gratified, but not much surprised, to be informed of the fact. Lady — then asked how he should have thought of putting such a question, when he informed her that he was an artist accustomed to copy portraits. On seeing her ladyship enter the room, he was struck by a certain droop of the eyelid in her case, which he had recently found strongly marked in a portrait of Charles II. which he had been employed to copy. The peculiarity being almost unique, he had imagined that she might be a descendant of the king, as she now proved to be.

A still more curious example of the manner in which a family peculiarity may originate and become indelible, occurred in the family of Scott of Harden, now represented by Lord Polwarth. During the reign of James VI., William (afterwards Sir William) Scott, eldest son of Scott of Harden, made an incursion upon the lands of Sir Gideon Murray, of Elibank, afterwards deputy-treasurer of Scotland, and a great favourite of the king. But the laird of Elibank was upon his guard, and, having collected his retainers, attacked the marauders when they were encumbered with their plunder, defeated them, and made young Harden prisoner. Sir Gideon conducted his captive to Elibank Tower—now a heap of ruins on the banks of the Tweed—where his lady received him with congratulations on his victory, and inquired what he intended to do with his prisoner. "I intend," said the victorious laird, "to consign him instantly to the gallows, as a man taken red-hand in the act of robbery and violence." "Hout na, Sir Gideon," answered his more considerate lady, "that is not like your wisdom. Would you hang the winsome young laird of Harden when you have three daughters to marry?" "Right," answered the baron, who joyfully caught at the idea, "he shall either marry our daughter, meikle-mouthed (large-mouthed) Meg, or strap for it." When this alternative was proposed to the handsome prisoner, he for some time stoutly preferred the gibbet to "Meikle-mouthed Meg," and persevered in this ungallant resolution until he found one end of a rope made fast to his neck, and the other knitted to a sturdy oak-bough of Elibank's "doom-tree," which extended its broad arms close to the gate of his fortress; when, seeing no other chance of escape, he consented to save his life at the expense of marrying the lady. The contract of marriage, executed instantly on the parchment of a drum, is still in the charter-chest of his noble representative.

The marriage contracted under such singular circumstances proved eminently happy, and it appears to have completely terminated the feud between the Murrays and Scotts. But the most curious and memorable circumstance connected with it is, that all Meg's descendants have inherited something of her characteristic feature.¹ Sir Walter Scott, who was descended from the third son of this worthy dame, largely inherited her "oral" peculiarity, and has made this incident the subject of a ballad, (never completed,) entitled the "Reiver's Wedding," of which we may give a few stanzas as a specimen. For some unknown reason the poet has substituted Lochwood, the ancient fortress of the Johnstones, in Annandale, for the real locality of his ancestor's drumhead wedding contract.

"Lord William rode down by Falshope burn
His cousin dear to see,
With him to take a riding turn—
Wat Draw-the-sword was he.

And when he came to Falshope glen
Beneath the trysting tree,
On the smooth green was carved plain,
'To Lochwood bound are we.'

'O if they be gane to dark Lochwood
To drive the Warden's gear,
Betwixt our names I ween there's feud;
I'll go and have my share.

'For little reck I for Johnstone's feud,
The Warden though he be,
So Lord William's away to dark Lochwood
With riders barely three.

(1) In the south of Scotland, where this incident occurred, the family to which the lady belonged, are commonly designated "the Muckle-Mou'd (big-mouthed) Murrays."

The Warden's daughters in Lochwood sat
Were all both fair and gay,
All save the lady Margaret,
And she was wan and wae.

The sister Jean had a full fair skin,
And Grace was bauld and brow;
But the leal-fast heart her breast within,
It weel was worth them a'.

Her father's pranked her sisters twa
With meikle joy and pride;
But Margaret maun seek Dundrennan's ha—
She ne'er can be a bride.

On spear and casque by gallants gent,
Her sisters' scarfs were borne;
But ne'er at tilt or tournament
Were Margaret's colours worn.

Her sisters rode to Thirlstone bower;
But she was left at hame,
To wander round the gloomy tower,
And sigh young Harden's name.

'Of all the knights the knight most fair,
From Yarrow to the Tyne,
Soft sigh'd the maid, 'is Harden's heir,
But ne'er can he be mine.

'Of all the maids the foulest maid,
From Teviot to the Dee,
Ah!' sighing sad, that lady said,
'Can ne'er young Harden's be.'

She looked up the briery glen,
And up the mossy brae,
And she saw a score of her father's men
Yclad in the Johnstone grey.

O fast and fast they downward sped,
The moss and briers among,
And in the midst the troopers led
A shackled knight along."

We may match this tale of "Meikle-mouthed Meg" with another "legend of a large mouth," the accuracy of which is vouched for by the author of the Traditions of Edinburgh, who received it from the present representative of the family referred to—a large pursy old man, with a low forehead, small eyes, and an enormous mouth. His mouth, he said, was the chieftain and representative of a long ancestral line of illustrious and most extensive mouths, which had flourished for upwards of two centuries at a place called Tullibody, somewhere in the western parts of Kife. There was a tradition that the mouth originally came into the family by marriage. A paternal ancestor of the speaker wooed and was about to marry a lady of great beauty but no fortune, when his design was knocked on the head by the interference of his father, who, by threats of disinheritance, induced him to jilt the "locherless" dame, and to marry another lady who was the heiress to a large fortune and a large mouth—both bequeathed to her by her father, one of the celebrated kail-suppers of Fife. When this was told to the slighted lady of his love, she was so highly offended that she wished the mouth of her fortunate rival might descend, in all its latitude, to the latest generation of her faithless swain's posterity. The country people, who pay great attention to the sayings and doings of ladies condemned to wear the willow, waited anxiously for the fulfilment of her malediction, and accordingly shook their heads, and had their own thoughts, when the kail-supper's daughter brought forth a son with a mouth reflecting back credit on her own. The triumph of the ill-wisher was considered complete when the second, the third, and all the other children were found to be equally distinguished by this feature; and what gave the triumph still more piquancy was that the daughters were found to be no more excepted than the sons from the family doom. In the second generation, moreover, instead of being softened or diluted away, the mouth rather increased, and so it had done in every successive generation since that time. The race having been very prolific, it was now spread so much that there was scarcely a face in Tullibody altogether free of the contagion, so that the present head of the family could look around him with all the patriarchal feelings of the chief of a large Highland clan.

Fate and fortune are said to be very favourable to people with large mouths. So it proved in this case. After the mouth came into the family, luck also came; and still as the mouth had increased with successive generations, just so had riches increased. The third in the line from the "first man," a cooper by profession, became so wealthy before he died, that he might have got his name handed down to immortality on a certain conspicuous, though dusty and illegible, board in the parish church, along with those of other charitable persons, by leaving "ane hunder merks, Scots, to y^e pvir." Despising the humble glory of making such a legacy, and being too poor to found a college, and too wise to endow a cat, he did better—he founded a spoon!—a spoon which should go down to future ages as a traditionary joke upon his family feature, and remain for ever in the hands of those who could appreciate his beneficence. He left it under certain provisions or statutes of foundation. The main scope of his intentions was simply that the spoon should always be possessed by his largest-mouthed descendant. In the first place, after his own death, it was to fall into the hands of his eldest son, a youth of highly promising mouth; or, indeed, whose mouth was fully entitled to the proverbial praise bestowed upon the cooper of Fogo, "that it was father's equal and mair;" and who, moreover, entertained such a respect for the will of his parent, that he seemed likely to preserve and transmit the precious heirloom with all due zeal and care. At his death it was to become the property of the son, daughter, nephew, or niece, (for it was not limited to heirs male, but, with a laudable regard for the claims of the fairer sex, destined to "heirs whatsoever,") who should appear to have the mouth most fitted to enjoy it in all its latitude. At the death of that person it was to go to the next largest mouth, and so on in all time coming. The will of the eccentric founder of the spoon was most religiously observed by his descendants, and with the exception of an attempt, nearly a century ago, on the part of a female possessor of the much coveted article, to alienate it to a person not eligible, which had nearly caused a family feud, the invaluable vessel glided peacefully down the current of ages in the possession of a lineal male line of truly respectable mouths, prized by the happy inheritors, and honoured by the homage and veneration of all the rest of the family. The precious heirloom, which was exhibited by its venerable possessor, was a silver implement of peculiar shape. The calix was circular, like the spoons of the Romans, about four inches in diameter and one deep in the centre, and it had a short sturdy handle, with a whistle at the extremity.

There are examples of family peculiarities handed down from father to son, of a much more painful kind than those which characterised the descendants of "Meikle-mouthed Meg," and the kail-supper of Fife. One of the most remarkable of these has been traced through three generations in the family of Lambert, commonly known by the name of the "Porcupine-man." The founder of this extraordinary race was first exhibited as a boy by his father in 1731, and came from the neighbourhood of Euston Hall, in Suffolk. His body is described as covered with warts as thick as packthread, and half an inch long. In 1755 he was again exhibited, when he was forty years of age, and had had six children, every one of whom at the same period, nine weeks after birth, had presented the same peculiarity. One of his sons grew up to maturity, and was still alive in 1802, when two of his children, of the ages of twenty-one and thirteen respectively, were exhibited in Germany by a person of the name of Joamy, who pretended that they belonged to a race found in New Holland. Dr. Tilesius, however, examined them most minutely, and published an accurate account of this singular family, which corresponds exactly with that given of their father and grandfather. The whole body, excepting the palms of the hands, the soles of the feet, and the face, was covered with a series of horny excrescences of a reddish brown, hard, elastic, and about half an inch long, which rustled against one another when rubbed with the hand. Once a-year the horny clothing was shed, and its falling off was accompanied with some degree of uneasiness; it yielded also to the action of mercury, which was tried for the purpose, but in both cases it gradually returned after a very short period. "It appears, therefore, past all doubt," says the author of the account of this extraordinary phenomenon, (Philosophical Transactions, vol. xlix. p. 22.) "that a race of people may be propagated by this man, having such rugged coats or coverings as himself; and if this should happen, and the accidental origin be forgotten, it is not impossible that they might be deemed a different species of mankind." Another more common peculiarity, which runs in entire families, consists of supernumerary fingers. In ancient Rome it was designated by a peculiar name, and the Sevigili are mentioned by Pliny and other eminent writers. Sir A. Carlisle has carefully traced, through four generations, the history of one such family, into which the peculiarity was brought by the great-grandmother of the youngest examined. Everybody has heard of "Six-fingered Jack," and many other instances of a similar kind might be mentioned.

The natural law which originates and regulates these peculiarities, is found to operate among the irrational as well as among the rational creatures. A striking instance of this fact is to be found in the origination of a new breed of sheep in the state of Massachusetts, in which a peculiar natural quality displayed by an individual animal for the first time has become perpetuated in its offspring. In the year 1791, a ewe gave birth to a male lamb, which, without any known cause, had a longer body and shorter legs than the rest of the breed. The joints are said to have been larger and the fore-legs crooked. The shape of this animal rendering it unable to leap over fences, it was determined to propagate its peculiarities, and the experiment proved successful. A new race of sheep was produced, which, from the form of the body, has been termed the otter-breed. It seems to be uniformly the fact that, when both parents are of the otter-breed, the lambs that are produced inherit the peculiar form.

It would thus appear that even the smallest varieties of race once produced are never again obliterated. "Whence," says a distinguished ecclesiastic, "arises this indelicity by natural processes of variety by natural processes introduced? This should seem to be one of the mysteries of nature, that we may on anything compel her to place her signet, but we know not how to force it off. Man, like the magician's half-skilled scholar, so beautifully described by the German poet, possesses often the spell whereby to compel her to work, but has not yet learned that which may oblige her to desist.

The natural law in question operates as powerfully in regard to intellectual and moral qualities as it does in the case of physical peculiarities. The old Roman poet, commemorating the hereditary virtues of one of the great clan families of ancient Rome, says, "The brave spring from the brave and good. There is in heifers and in horses the virtue of their progenitors. The fierce eagle does not produce the unwarlike dove." Many of these family characteristics which run in the blood of certain races have been commemorated both by traditions and by songs. The old Scotch family of the Gordons, for example, are characterised, both by the people and all the old ballad writers, as "the gay Gordons." As in the fine old ballad of "Glenlogie:"—

"His name is Glenlogie when he is from home,
He is of the gay Gordons, his name it is John,
He turn'd about lightly as the Gordons does a'.

Again:—

"Where left thou thy men, thou Gordon so gay?
In the bog of Dunkinkie, mowing the hay."

The Grahams are the "gallant Grahams:"—

"O! the Grahams, the gallant Grahams!
Wad the gallant Grahams but stand by me,
The dogs might donk in English blude
Ere a foot's breadth I wad finch or flee."

The Lindsays—a clan celebrated for their warlike achievements—were termed the "light Lindsays," probably in consequence of the gaiety of their deportment. They appear to have made a conspicuous figure at the famous battle of Otterburn, and their prowess is thus commemorated in the old ballad written on that memorable conflict:—

"He has chosen the Lindsays light,
With them the Gordons gay.

The Lindsays flew like fire about Till a' the fray was done."

The characteristic peculiarities of other eminent families are preserved in such traditional designations as the "manly Morisons," the "haughty Hamiltons," the "sturdy Armstrongs," the "haughty Humes," the "saucy Scotts," the "cappit Kers," the "bauld (bold) Rutherfords," the "false Montceiths," the "trusty Boyds," the "proud Macneils," the "bauld Frasers," and the "fiery Macintoshes." The moral characteristics of some half dozen of these powerful families are very graphically hit off in an imitation of the Litany, made about a century ago by Mr. Maxton, of Cultoquay, the proprietor of a small estate in Perthshire, which has been preserved without either the diminution or the addition of a single acre by the family whose representative still possesses it, for the space of 500 years. This is the more surprising, as the estate, which is small, is surrounded on all hands by those of about half-a-dozen different proprietors, whose power, wealth, or policy, would long ago have succeeded in attaching it to their own enormous properties, had not the Maxtons, from father to son, made it a point of pride to preserve and transmit it entire. In allusion to the difficulty of preserving his estate intact in the midst of such powerful and avaricious neighbours, the proprietor referred to was in the habit of repeating the following strange prayer, with the rest of the Litany, every morning on performing his toilette at a well near his house:—

"From the greed of the Campbells,
From the ire of the Drummonds,
From the pride of the Grahams,
From the wind of the Murrays,
Good Lord, deliver us!"

All the objects of the satire took the joke in good part, except the Murrays, whose characteristic is the most opprobrious—wind, in Scottish phraseology, signifying a propensity to vain and foolish bravado. It is said that the Duke of Athol, the chief of the Murray clan, hearing of Cultoquay's litany, invited the old humourist to dinner, and desired to hear from his own mouth the lines which had made so much noise over the country. Cultoquay repeated them, without the least boggling, when his grace said, half in good, half in bad humour, "Take care, Cultie, for the future to omit my name in your morning devotions, else I shall certainly crop your ears for your boldness." "That's wind, my lord duke," quoth Cultoquay, with the greatest coolness, at the same time taking off his glass. On another occasion a gentleman of his grace's name having called upon Mr. Maxton, and used some angry expostulations on the manner in which his clan was characterised, Culto-quey made no answer other than bidding his servant to open the door and *let out the wind of the Murrays!*¹

We shall conclude our account of these family peculiarities of disposition with the notice of one of a darker character, originating in the troublous times when 'might made right.' After the fall of the Romish Church in Scotland, the rank and wealth of the bishops, abbots, priors, &c. were no longer vested in ecclesiastics, but in lay impropiators of the church revenues, who had no claim to the spiritual character of their predecessors in office. Of these laymen who were thus invested with ecclesiastical revenues, some were men of high birth and rank, who did not fail to keep for their own use the rents, lands, and revenues of the church. But if, on the other hand, the titulars were men of inferior importance, who had been inducted into the office by the interest of some powerful person, it was generally understood that the new abbot should grant for his patron's benefit such leases and conveyances of the church lands and tithes as might afford his protector the lion's share of the booty. There were other cases, however, in which men who had got grants of these secularized benefices were desirous of retaining them for their own use without having the influence sufficient for that purpose, and these became frequently unable to protect themselves, however unwilling to submit to the exactions of the feudal tyrant of the district. This preliminary explanation is necessary to enable the reader to understand the object of the following atrocity practised on one of these titular abbots by the Earl of Cassilis, (ancestor of the present Marquis of Ailsa,) whose extent of feudal influence was so wide that he was usually termed the King of Carrick—a district in Ayrshire.² We abridge and modernise the narrative from the Journal of Bannatyne, secretary to John Knox.

Master Allan Stewart, by means of the queen's corrupted court, obtained the abbey of Crossraguel. The Earl of Cassilis, thinking himself greater than any king in these quarters, determined to have the whole benefice, (as he hath divers others,) to pay at his pleasure, and because he could not find such security as his insatiable appetite required, this shift was devised. The said Mr. Allan, being in company with the Laird of Bargany, (also a Kennedy,) was by the earl and his friends enticed to leave the safeguard which he had with the laird, and was suddenly seized and carried to the house of Dunure, where, for a season, he was honourably treated, (gif a prisoner can think any entertainment pleasing;) but when the earl found that Stewart could not, either by promises or menaces, be induced to alienate to him the land of the abbacy, he caused his luckless prisoner to be conveyed to a secret chamber in "ane house callit the Black Vault of Denbic." In the chamber there was a great iron chimney, under it a fire. "My lord abbot," said the earl, "it will please you confess here that with your own consent you remain in my company, because ye durst not commit yourselves to the hands of others." The abbot answered, "Would you, my lord, that I should make a manifest lie for your pleasure? The truth is, my lord, it is against my will that I am here; neither yet have I any pleasure in your company." "But ye shall remain with me, nevertheless, at this time," said the earl. "I am not able to resist your will and pleasure," said the abbot, "in this place." "Ye must then obey me," said the earl; and with that were presented unto him a feucharter of the whole lauds pertaining to the abbey, together with a nineteen and five years' lease of the tithes.

After that the earl spied repugnance and saw that he could not come to his purpose by fair means, he commanded his cooks to prepare the banquet, and so first they took off the abbot's clothes even to his skin, and next they bound him to the chimney, his legs to the one end and his arms to the other, and so they began to feed the fire; and that the roast might not burn, they spared not flaming with oil, (basting as a cook bastes roasted meat.) Lord, look thou to sic cruelty! And that the crying of the miserable man should not be heard, they closed his mouth that the voice might be stopped. In that torment they held the poor man till that often he cried, "Eye upon ye! will ye no ding whingers (daggers) in me, and put me out of the world, or else put aue barrel of powder under me, rather than to be tormented in this unmerciful manner?" The famous King of Carrick and his cooks, perceiving the roast to be aneuch (sufficiently done), commanded it to be tane from the fire, and the earl himself began the grace in this manner, "Benedicite Jesus Maria, you are the most obstinate man that ever I saw; gif I had known that ye had been so stubborn, I would not for a thousand crowns have handled you so; I never did so to man before you." And yet he returned to the same practice within two days, and ceased not till he obtained his foremost purpose, that is, that he had got all his pieces subscribed as well as aue half-roasted hand could do it. The earl thinking himself sure enough so long as he had the half-roasted Abbot in his own keeping, and yet being ashamed of his presence by reason of his former cruelty, left the place of Dunure in the hands of certaiu of his servants, and the half-roasted Abbot to be kept there as prisoner. The Laird of Bargany, out of whose company the said Abbot had been enticed, understanding (not the extremity but) the retaining of the mau, sent to the court and raised letters of deliverance of the person

(1) Chambers' Popular Rhymes of Scotland, p. 241.

(2) The family of Kennedy, of which the earl was the head, were possessed of very extensive influence in the south, as indicated by the old rhyme.—

'Tween Wigton and the town o' Ayr,
Port Patrick and the cruiues of Cree,
Nae man need think for to bide there,
Unless he court wi' Kennedie.

The Kennedies of Bargany, who interfered in behalf of the oppressed Abbot, were themselves a younger branch of the Cassilis family, but held different politics, and were powerful enough in this and other instances to bid them defiance.

of the man according to the order, which being disobeyed, the said Earl for his contempt was denounced rebel and put to the ban. But yet hope there was none, neither to the afflicted, neither yet to the purchaser (i. e. procurer) of the letters, to obtain any comfort thereby, for in that time God was despised and lawful authority was contemned in Scotland. The Laird of Bargany, perceiving that the ordinary justice could neither help the oppressed nor yet the afflicted, applied his mind to the next remedy, and in the end, by his servants, attacked and took the house of Duure, where the poor Abbot was kept prisoner, and carried him to Ayr, where publicly at the market cross he declared how cruelly he was entreated, and publicly did revoke all things that were done in that extremity.

John, sixth earl of Cassilis, the grandson of this brutal savage, was the husband of Lady Cassilis, the heroine of the adventure with Johnnie Fa and the Gipsies.¹ With a barbarity worthy of his descent, the Earl hanged the whole band of gipsies, including the hapless Sir John, upon "the Dule Tree," while the wretched countess was taken by him to a window in front of the castle, and there, by a horrible refinement of cruelty, compelled to witness the dreadful scene.

Let our readers now peruse the following account of a recent exploit of the present possessor of the titles and estates of the King of Carrick, and say whether he ought not to be regarded as the worthy scion of a worthy race.² A man at Maybole (the village where the poor Abbot enjoyed the Earl's treacherous hospitality) had a pet deer which was known to all the people of that place. The man was sitting by the road-side with his tame favourite near him, when the Marquis of Ailsa was passing in his carriage on his way to the Kilmarnock steeple-chase. The Marquis ordered his coachman to stop and demand of the man whence he had that deer. The man replied that it was his own and a pet deer. The Marquis (who appears to have been under the impression that the deer had been stolen from his park) ordered the coachman immediately to throw the animal over, which was done, and the Marquis descending from his carriage, kneced on the creature and stabbed it in the throat. He and the keeper then took up the deer and carried it to the toll-house which was at hand, telling the gate-keeper to retain it till he sent for it. Shortly afterwards, the Marquis met a police officer and ordered him to go and take the man's name. When the officer went to the toll-house, he knew the deer, which was found to be still alive. It got up and ran bleeding to its former home, which was not more than one hundred yards distant. The officer followed it and gave it water to drink, but the liquid ran out of the hole the Marquis had made in its throat. The police officer declared that it would be humane to kill the poor animal at once, but the owner declared he could not take the life of his pet and associate. The officer then killed it and took it back to the toll-house, where it was kept in obedience to the orders of the noble Marquis, who, however, did not send for it, and at the end of seven days it was taken by the toll-keeper and thrown over a hedge into a ditch. The game-keeper of the Marquis had meanwhile sent the owner word that he might take the deer from the toll-house and eat it. The poor man, however, declared that he could not eat his favourite.

It has been justly said by Walter Savage Landor, in his indignant comment upon this cold-blooded and unprovoked atrocity, that "rude nations, where pity and mercy were little known, have risen up unanimously against the powerful and warlike for similar injuries. Well known to every school-boy is the Virgilian story of Silvia's pet fawn, and fiercely was its death avenged on its less culpable slayer. Yet never had it beguiled the anxieties and penury of a weary master; never had it followed him into the public road, harmless, heedless, innocent, confiding; never had it partaken or needed the wayfarer's morsel begged at the last hospitable door. Enough to see that it was caressing a kind master and a kind master was caressing it."

No one who reads the account of this atrocious action, can doubt that moral as well as physical qualities "run in the blood," and that the noble Marquis is the heir of the "savage virtues" of the King of Carrick, as well as of the estates so mercilely extorted from the "half-roasted" Abbot.

BIOGRAPHY OF THOMAS CHALMERS.³

PART III.

WE left Chalmers just as he was entering upon his duties as Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of St. Andrews. He appears to have become at once quite a popular professor, gaining the good-will of the students by his suavity and heartiness of manner, and commanding their respect by the dignity and impressiveness of his prolections. It is true, he one day caused them to laugh at him, by calling them "brethren" instead of "gentlemen;" and he had once or twice to reprove them for trifling indecorums—such as introducing a dog into the class-room, or the too free indulgence of what he called "pedestrian approbation," a habit of applause stamping with which they greeted the little bursts of oratory and striking illustrations that frequently diversified his lectures. This practice seems to have been very common in the Scottish Universities. Alluding to it on one occasion, Chalmers said:—"Even the cold and unimpassioned mathematics, I have been given to understand, are now assailed with the din and disturbance of these popular testimonies; and on asking a professor of that science, whether it was the trapezium or isosceles triangle that called forth the loudest tempest of applause, I learned that the enamoured votaries are after all not very discriminating, but that they saluted each of these venerable abstractions with equal enthusiasm." He considered it "a somewhat perplexing phenomenon in the seats of learning," and suggested that, if the professor's effusions required any response at all, it would be better and more appropriate that it "should come from the heads than from the heels" of the applauders. It seems, however, that his suggestions were not particularly attended to, for we learn that this same "pedestrian approbation accompanied Dr. Chalmers through the whole of his academical career."

After the close of the first session, in 1824, the Professor repaired to Edinburgh to attend the General Assembly; but as the matters of debate in which he engaged were principally of local and temporary interest, it is not necessary or desirable that we should enter into any account of them. Neither need we stay to describe his daily movements during a six weeks' visit in Glasgow, or to relate how his pulpit ministrations were, as heretofore, invariably attended with "a great crowd," and his company solicited for endless "dinners," and every variety of festive and social gathering. It was the old life of buzz and bustle, which is the haze that surrounds an established popularity; confusing, wearisome, and unsufficing beyond description. Towards the end of it, he writes:—"This festivity is now beginning to tell. Spent a sick and sleepless night, and the suffering aggravated by the thought that after all I make no progress in satisfying my friends. Those with whom I have not been, insist upon their day, and those with whom I have been once, insist upon a second visit." Were he a patent digester of the first magnitude, he could not successfully go through a tithe of the gastronomy which his tolerably stalwart but still imperfect system was called on to perform. "Vanity of vanities," says he, at last, "all is vanity!"

As an instance of the minor perplexities arising from such a blazing notoriety, we will mention one that was not a little ludicrous. On Sunday, the 18th of July, he writes, in a sort of journal-letter which, when he was from home, he was in the habit of transmitting to Mrs. Chalmers,—“On our arrival at the chapel gate, was met by my old friend the daft woman who used to pursue and annoy me, and at one time presented me with a sheep's head and trotters. She got hold of my legs as I was stepping out of the noddy: she has been urging me in this way for several Sundays." That was the daft woman's way of expressing her homage for a distinguished reputation! Chalmers, however, could take such things good-naturedly; and on summing up the proceeds of his services at St. John's, he was able to say that "the whole parochial concern is already about 200l.

the better for me;" and so he thinks that of itself "worth coming for," even though he was afterwards followed by his daft friend aforesaid, "who ran after the noddy with all her might, but could not overtake it."

The Glasgow preachings and festivities being ended, Chalmers appears to have gone to Edinburgh, and from thence passed on to Costerton, to visit Dr. Nicoll. Here he met an "exclusively academic party," most of them St. Andrews' men, his favourite colleague Mr. Duncan being one of the number. This gentleman, says Chalmers, "annoyed me by the affirmation that I am sensibly and considerably fatter since I left St. Andrews." Perhaps it was this remark which induced him to think of exercise. He adds in the same letter:—"Before dinner we had a game at bowls in the green before the house. I and Mr. Duncan against Dr. Nicoll and Dr. James Hunter. We had the best of three games. Mr. Gillespie afterwards took up Mr. Duncan, and was beat by him." The learned dignitaries were thus seasonably prepared for dinner, which seems to have been an affair of magnitude. "With all the convivialities of the west," says Chalmers, "I have seen no such guzzling as to-day with my St. Andrews' friends, and told Mr. Duncan so. They are rare lads these Letterati or Katerati." To avert scandal, however, and to prove that they did not get to singing "We won't go home till morning," it will be proper to mention, in the words of the same authority, that they "tumbled into their respective couches between twelve and one o'clock." Chalmers relates further that next morning he "got up about eight: went to Mr. Duncan's closet and got behind him in his sofa-bed, where I had a good purchase for jamming him out, and did so accordingly." He had subsequently "a cordial talk with him;" and after breakfast, the whole learned party proceeded on to Edinburgh.

Here Chalmers seems to have tarried for a day or two with a certain Miss ——, whom, as she is nameless, we shall venture to call Martha, inasmuch as she was "troubled about much serving." She is a kind of character not uncommon, though rarely, if ever, represented in our literature; and on that account we shall give the doctor's sketch of her:—"You would be amused with the state of matters here. Miss —— evidently making a great effort both to accommodate me and to abstain from pressing. She makes open proclamation of my freedom, protests that she will make no infringements thereupon—is determined to act up strictly to the principle of leaving me to myself; and if she would simply and silently do so it were most delightful. But she is so very loud in the profession of this her new system, and withal so very fearful and so obviously so of even the slightest encroachment upon it, that while she studies to abstain from all restraints upon me, she gives me a feeling that I am a very great restraint upon her. She is a truly kind and pleasant person notwithstanding, though her treatment is calculated to give a bystander the impression that I am a very sensitive and singular personage withal. She never asks the same thing twice of me, but she makes up for this by the exceeding multitude of these things, such as, If my tea is right—if I would like more sugar—if I take cream—if I am fond of little or much cream—if I would take butter to my cake—when I take to loaf, if I take butter to my white bread—if I move from one part of the room to another, whether I would not like to sit on the sofa—after I have sat there, whether I would like to stretch out my legs upon it—after I have done that, whether I would let her wheel it nearer the fire—when I move to my bed-room, whether the fire is right—whether I would like the blinds wound up? &c. &c. She at the same time most religiously abstains from repetitions, but to reply even once to her indefinite number of proposals is fatigue enough, I can assure you; nor is the fatigue at all alleviated, when, instead of coming forth a second time with each, she comes forth with a most vehement asseveration, accompanied by uplifted hands, that she will let me do as I like, that she will not interfere, that I shall have liberty in her house; and when I said that I behoved me to make calls immediately after dinner, she declared that I would have leave to go away with my dinner in my mouth if I so chose. I have got the better of this by downright laughing, for I verily think now that the case is altogether desperate."

While Chalmers was at Glasgow, he had received what is styled a "call," from a Presbyterian congregation at Stockport, similar in purport to that of the man of Macedonia who appeared to the Apostle in a vision, saying, "Come over and help us." The Presbyterian congregation had just been building a new Sunday-school, large enough for the accommodation of four thousand children, and they accordingly wanted an orator of forty or fifty "parson-power" to levy a collection. As a man whose name had "honour in all the churches," Dr. Chalmers had been thought of; though it was intended that he should be only one of several attractions. On arriving at Stockport, he found that the managers of the affair were preparing a sort of "theatrical performance," and contemplated making him "one of the performers." "They have got the sermon into the newspaper," said he, writing to Mrs. Chalmers, "and on reading the advertisement I was well-nigh overset by the style of it. They are going to have a grand musical concert along with the sermon, to which the best amateurs and performers of the neighbourhood are to lend their services. This is all put down in their gaudy manifesto, and to me it is most ineffably disgusting." He could not avoid expressing his "antipathies to this part of the arrangement;" and he asked Mr. Grant, the gentleman with whom he was staying, if he might take the paper with him "for the amusement of his Scottish friends. Thereupon Mr. Grant inquired if the Doctor disliked music; to which the latter answered, that he "liked music, but disliked all charlatanerie." On Sunday, however, he proceeded with his entertainer to the place of exhibition, protesting strongly against the

"quackish advertisement" that had been issued; and on arriving found the "managers" in the midst of a rehearsal. What followed it will be best to state in his own words:—"I asked what they were about; and with some hesitation and difficulty they told me that they had been practising for the music of this evening. When I went to the great preaching hall, I found that there was just this practising before an immense assemblage, on which I called out, in the distinct hearing of those about me, that there was an air of charlatanerie about the whole affair, and that I did not like it at all. I would stay no longer in that place, and went along with them to the committee-room, where there were about twenty managers and others. I said that I had come from a great distance on their account, and had therefore purchased the privilege of telling them plain things; that they should have consulted me ere they made their arrangements—that I was quite revolted by the quackery of their advertisement—that they had made me feel myself to be one of the performers in a theatrical exhibition—that what they had done stood in the same relation to what they ought to have done, that an advertisement of Dr. Solomon's did to the respectable doings of the regular faculty, &c. &c. I was firm and mild withal—they confused, and awkward, and in difficulties. I said that still I would preach, but that I thought it right to state what I felt." After delivering himself to this effect, Chalmers left the place, and went in the carriage with Mr. Grant and Mr. Marshland to the magnificent residence of the latter gentleman on the banks of the Mersey. While there he begged Mr. Marshland to send for Mr. M——, the gentleman with whom he had corresponded on the matter prior to his arrival, that he might hold a conversation with him. "Mr. M—— sent word back that he could not possibly come—and why? because he was presiding at a dinner given before sermon to the Gentlemen of the Orchestra, and he was just in the middle of a speech to them when my message came. On this Mr. Marshland and Mr. Grant walked down to Stockport, and told Mr. M—— of my difficulties and wishes; that I would not comply with their arrangement until it was altered. They wished my prayers and sermon to be mixed up with their music, me all the while in the pulpit. I said, that I would not be present at their music at all, that my service should be separated altogether from their entertainment—that I should pray, preach, and pray again in continuo—not entering the pulpit till the moment of my beginning, and retiring from it as soon as I should have ended. The gentlemen had their interview with Mr. M——, and he was very glad to comply. I dined at half-past two—retired for an hour to prepare—drank coffee after five. The two gentlemen walked before, to be at the music. The two ladies went down with me in the carriage at six. Will you believe it? an orchestra of at least 100 people, three rows of female singers, in which two professional female singers, so many professional male singers, a number of amateurs; and I now offer you a list of the instruments, so far as I have been able to ascertain them—one pair of bass drums, two trumpets, bassoon, organ, serpents, violins without number, violoncelloes, bass viols, flutes, hautboys. I stopped in the minister's room till it was all over. Went to the pulpit,—prayed, preached, retired during the time of the collection, and again prayed. Before I left my own private room they fell to again with most tremendous fury, and the likeliest thing to it which I recollect is a great military band on the Castle-hill of Edinburgh." By the whole exhibition, however, 3,500 people were got together, and a collection of more than 400*l.* was realized; so perhaps we must say that the Stockport Presbyterians were not unwise in their generation; and that so long as a community can believe that great or useful ends can be really served by clap-trap, there is not likely to be wanting a multitude of even "pious" folks who will think it may be "sanctified" to the promotion of religion and philanthropy.

Returning home in October to St. Andrews, Chalmers entered upon his second session at the University, surrounded by "more than double the number of students that had ever, in the days of his most famous predecessors," attended the Moral Philosophy Lecture Room. Dr. Hanna says, "The superior character and capacity of the students told upon the spirit and efforts of their professor. It was throughout one busy season of animating and most productive labour." As, however, all his views in this department of inquiry are already before the public in his published works, it seems unnecessary to advert to them in the present pages. In addition to his lectures on Moral Philosophy, he opened another class for Political Economy. His mode of conducting this was, to prescribe regularly a certain portion of Smith's "Wealth of Nations," to be read and studied, and upon it the students were afterwards closely and searchingly examined. "In the course of these examinations," says Hanna, "he refuted or modified, supplemented or illustrated the views of the text-book, as they seemed to require it, introducing occasionally a more elaborate treatment of some leading topic; endeavouring in this way, and by references to publications more recent than that of Dr. Smith, to make his students acquainted with the latest and most approved doctrines of the science." The good effects of this method were so apparent that on describing it afterwards to the Royal Commissioners for inquiring into the Scottish universities, he added,—"I must say, that I feel great comfort in it, and am sensible of its great efficacy. I find that coming to close quarters with the juvenile mind upon subjects which they have previously read upon, is a very effective method of teaching them, inasmuch that were I furnished with an unexceptionable set of text-books on moral philosophy, I should feel strongly inclined to adopt the same method in that class too." As it was, he regularly examined the students upon his lectures as they were delivered; his questions being first addressed to individuals, and then, if unanswered, cast abroad on the whole class. Professor Jardine says, "The excitement, the suspense of mind, and the successive approximations of one after another to the true and sufficient answer, created scenes of intellectual animation that I delight to recal." Among the answers given, however, there were at times some of a very racy and original absurdity. The following anecdote of the class-room will serve as an illustration:—

"A raw-boned student from the wilds of Ross-shire was called up for examination. 'Who,' said the professor, about to plunge with all eagerness into the discussion of the Malthusian doctrines, 'who was the father of the correct theory of population?' At once, and in the strongest northern accent, his young friend answered, 'Julius Cæsar.' The gravest students were overset by this incongruous reply, and for a few moments nothing was seen of the professor himself, but his back rising and falling above the book-board, as he struggled with the fit of laughter into which he had been thrown. When at last he was able to command himself, he courteously apologised for his untimely hilarity to the poor student, who still stood in confusion before him, and without the least allusion to the answer, expressed his great regret that he could never hear that peculiar dialect without his risibility being affected."

In conjunction with the prelections and examinations, the students of both classes were required to write essays. A great latitude was allowed as to the subjects; "they might either take the topic suggested, or any other connected with that part of the course which was then before them, and they might either adopt the views of the professor, or they were left free, and even invited to adopt and defend their own, though they should be different from or opposed to those promulgated from the chair." As was to be expected, few availed themselves of a privilege so hazardous; but on one occasion, it seems, there was a fellow bold enough to do so. In the course of one of the examinations, Chalmers felicitously refuted Adam Smith's distinction between productive and unproductive labour, in which the statesman, the judge, the lawyer, the teacher, the clergyman, and the man of science, are all classed among the non-producers, because they do not create any tangible commodity; while the pastry-cook, the squib manufacturer, and the vender of quack medicines, being creators of 'tangible commodities,' are exalted to the rank of productive labourers. Mr. Lewis, (apparently a St. Andrews' student at the time,) in giving an account of the circumstance, says; "To rivet on our minds the absurdity of this distinction, we got it as the subject of an essay. All the essayists echoed the views of the professor, varied only with such illustrations, grave or humorous, as occurred to them, all save one, who stood forth as the champion of Dr. Smith, and not content with maintaining his own views, he termed those of the professor Quixotic, and characterised the distinction that he had drawn as a fantastic distinction. This was too much. The Doctor felt it, and coloured deeply; replied by a profusion of argument and illustration, and after thrice slaying the slain, he returned next day to the charge with an elaborate written defence, until we roared out our convictions in unmistakable sounds; and the champion of squibs, and crackers, and puff paste, was fain to hide his head amid the general uproar." The bold student was probably wrong in his conclusions, but nevertheless, we should like to know his after history; for it appears to us he must have been rather an original fellow who could stand in a minority of one against a university professor and his class; and with that native daring, it seems that he would be always likely to maintain, manfully, a will and an opinion of his own. Of such men, as we fancy, the true stuff of society is made. As the Doctor took such pains to silence him by argument, one is led to believe that he considered him an antagonist worth convincing. For the rest, in his intercourse with the students, we find Chalmers to have been distinguished by the kindest and most familiar cordiality. And "if the highest end of good teaching be to awaken intellectual impulses, and stimulate to intellectual activity," Dr. Haama, who has had better means of judging than ourselves, considers that end to have been "gained in a preeminent degree."

Passing over the proceedings of the General Assembly of 1825, which have no interest for us, and are not likely to have any for the reader, we find Chalmers getting into a warm controversy with his associates in college. From a survey of his history, as far as it has been made public, we think it is not to be denied that the Doctor was a man of controversial spirit. A person of strong combative tendencies, he certainly seems to have been throughout his whole career. Such men, however, the world is generally in need of, and Chalmers undoubtedly appeared at a right time. All reformers are lusty fighters. Not, certainly, with the weapons of carnal warfare; but they are, nevertheless, furnished with an instinct for contending against all manner of baseness, error, and every form of falsehood and of tyranny. It is no disparagement of Chalmers to call him a pugnacious man. Luther, Knox, Cromwell, were all obstinate and constitutional contenders. Their work was not to be done without fierce blows and contradictions. Truth, with her serenity and gentleness, sometimes needs a champion. With respect to Chalmers, it is matter of proof that the strivings and oppositions in which he became from time to time engaged, were all more or less needful and conducive to the vindication of truth and manliness. Such we think, at any rate, was the character of the controversy, the particulars whereof are now to be related.

In the autumn of 1824, Dr. Nicoll resigned the living of St. Leonard, one of the city parishes of St. Andrews, which he had held conjointly with the principality of the United College. By ancient law and usage, the students of the University were obliged to attend the Sunday services in St. Leonard's Church. On Nicoll's resignation, it happened that a professor, whose hands were already full of his own proper work, and who was otherwise unacceptable as a minister, received the presentation. As a consequence, a sense of dissatisfaction spread among the students, and a number of them presented a petition to the Senate, praying to be relieved from the compulsory attendance at St. Leonard's, hitherto exacted. Chalmers took no part either in originating or supporting this petition; but when the Senate decided against the prayer of the petitioners, and even refused to concede the relief desired on the solicitation of their parents, he warmly espoused the students' cause; "both acts being alike revolting to him, that by which the chancellor forced a minister upon the college, and that by which the college forced an attendance upon the minister." He stood alone against the rest of the professors; and his position was all the more painful, as one of them was the very person from attendance upon whose ministry the students were craving a dispensation. Nevertheless, he deemed it just to vindicate what seemed to him the natural right of the parent to direct and control the religious education of his children. He thought that the spirit of relaxation which the age required, should have led the college to defer to such a right, particularly as many of those who demanded it were not connected with the establishment, and among those who belonged to it, were many who desired more evangelical ministrations than had been provided at St. Leonard's. His colleagues, however, thought otherwise, and as majorities have the power of deciding in such disputes, the reasonable liberty sought by the petitioners was peremptorily denied them.

By his conduct in this affair, though he had obviously been striving only for the liberation of conscience, Chalmers incurred the suspicion of being hostile to the interests of the establishment, and much offence and irritation consequently ensued. How strongly he felt the unfairness of the imputation appears from the pains he took to vindicate himself, when he subsequently appeared before the Royal Commissioners appointed to inquire into the Scottish Universities. Being examined on the question of church attendance, he took occasion to explain his exact views respecting the claims and relations of ecclesiastical establishments. "I think," said he, "that if the church establishment of Scotland was overthrown, it would operate to the diminution, by nine-tenths, of the Christianity of our land; and yet, consistently with this principle, if I knew of any dissenting chapel where, in point of fact, the members of my family received a deeper, a more powerful, and a more practical impression upon their consciences than in the parish church, I should not feel myself guilty of schism though I recommended and encouraged the members of my family to go to that place where they found the ministrations that was most calculated to do them good." He held, further, that the purity and effectiveness of an establishment was substantially promoted by the external pressure of a zealous and vigorous dissent. And as to schism, he says:—"The real schismatics are the schism-makers, or they who, by means of a reckless and ill-advised patronage, are the emanating fountain-heads of the whole mischief. . . . I have no veneration for the Church of Scotland, merely quasi an establishment, but I have the utmost veneration for it quasi an instrument for Christian good; and I do think, that with the means and resources of an establishment, she can do more, and does more, for the religious interests of Scotland, than is done by the activity of all the dissenters put together. I think it is a high object to uphold the Church of Scotland, but only because of its subserving to the still higher object of upholding the Christianity of our land; and the measure which I now contend for would only have the effect of bringing the Church into a sort of temporary obscurity in this place, from which she emerges on the moment that we put forth the remedy that is in our hands."

This disagreement about church attendance was not the only one which arose between Chalmers and his colleagues. A more distressing difference sprang up in connexion with the administration of the college funds. It had long been a practice among the professors to dispose of the university finances by laying aside yearly what they deemed sufficient for the maintenance of the college fabric, and then dividing the remainder among themselves. Finding that one-third of his income was dependent on this apparently irregular arrangement, Chalmers was led to inquire into the history of the appropriation. "That inquiry conducted him unwillingly to the conclusion that it was made without distinct and explicit legal authority; and that in making it, in becoming the arbitrators who fixed yearly the amount of their own salaries, the professors involved themselves in a very painful conflict between personal and public considerations—the more that they took to themselves the less being left for the general objects of the society." He accordingly brought his doubts before the "Senatus Academicus," and, pending their settlement, declined to receive his dividend. The Senate did nothing to satisfy his scruples. At length, however, in the summer of 1826, the appointment of a Royal Commission seemed to afford him an opportunity for getting the matter settled by authority. In this, his hopes were disappointed. Embarrassments arose connected with the investigation, which were prolonged until Chalmers left St. Andrews in 1828—at which time there was remaining due to him upwards of 700*l.* of income. The Commissioners subsequently authorized him to receive it, thereby sanctioning the mode of appropriation practised by the College; but, on bringing forward their report in 1831, they promulgated the conclusion, that "the principal and professors appear to have made these appropriations without authority." No acknowledgment was made of the part which Chalmers had taken against the practice so condemned; and thus he became very unjustly included in a serious public censure. To clear himself in the popular estimation he determined to write a pamphlet; in which he warmly intimated to the Commissioners, that "when receiving that money" under their sanction, he did not understand that he had given them, in exchange for it, the power of aspersing his character and good name. In this production he very sufficiently vindicated his honour and integrity, and made it clear to all who cared to know the truth, that no shadow of blame attached to him in regard to the transaction.

It will be seen that the Doctor's residence in St. Andrews was not particularly peaceful. These distractions, however, did not hinder him from steadily proceeding with his literary pursuits. In the year 1826 he completed the third volume of "The Christian and Civic Economy of Large Towns." The College Session over, and the General Assembly again attended, he struck off in the middle of summer for a country tour, in the course of which he visited the birth-place of Burns, and the grave of Dr. Thomas Brown. The rest of the year does not appear to be noticeable for anything requiring special mention.

In February 1827 it was proposed to him to take the Chair of Moral Philosophy in the new University of London. This offer he at first neither accepted nor declined, postponing his answer until he should have ascertained the result of the investigation into the Scottish colleges which the Royal Commissioners were then prosecuting. About the same time he accepted an invitation from the Rev. Edward Irving to open a new church which had just been erected for him in London. On this occasion he was introduced to Samuel Taylor Coleridge, to whose wondrous talk he listened for the space of three hours, but he does not appear to have been particularly edified. "His conversation," said he, "which flowed in a mighty unrelenting stream, is most astonishing, but I must confess to me still unintelligible. I caught occasional glimpses of what he would be at, but mainly he was very far out of all sight and sympathy. I hold it, however, a great acquisition to have become acquainted with him. You know that Irving sits at his feet and drinks in the inspiration of every syllable that falls from him. There is a secret, and to me yet unintelligible communion of spirit betwixt them, on the ground of a certain German mysticism and transcendental lake-poetry which I am not yet up to. Gordon says it is all unintelligible nonsense, and I am sure a plain Fife man, as uncle 'Tammas,' had he been alive, would have pronounced it the greatest buff he had ever heard in his life." Chalmers afterwards made a remark to Irving on the obscurity of Coleridge's utterance, observing, that for his part he "liked to see all sides of an idea at once;" to which Irving, in his eccentric, characteristic way, replied, "Ha! you Scotchmen would handle an idea as a butcher handles an ox: for my part, I love to see an idea looming through a mist." One here gets a glimpse of that singular idiosyncrasy which subsequently evolved its wild vagaries on prophecy, and revelled in the "miraculous gift of tongues."

There is another incident of this London visit which seems to us worth reporting. On Monday, the 14th of May, after visiting the courts at Westminster, where he "was much interested by the aspect of the various judges, who looked very picturesque," Chalmers went to Covent-garden to hear Cobbett and Hunt address the people on politics. "I had a view of their persons," says he, "but was excessively anxious to hear their speeches. There was a ladder set up from the street to the flat roof of a low house, which every person who paid a shilling had the privilege of going to. Duncan would not ascend; I and Strachan did, but on the moment of our doing so the peace-officers came and dispersed the speakers. Duncan enjoyed our disappointment vastly, and we felt that a fool and his money were soon parted. We followed the crowd in the hope of hearing them somewhere else, but all we got was a sentence or two from Gale Jones."

In September of this year Chalmers went to Belfast to open a new church, and availed himself of the opportunity to visit the Giant's Causeway, and other interesting scenes and curiosities in Ireland. On returning to St. Andrews he resumed a work which he was writing on the "Use and Abuse of Literary and Ecclesiastical Establishments." At the close of the year it was completed. We have no space to treat of its contents, but may say, in passing, that it related mainly to the existing condition of the Scottish universities. Prior to its publication Chalmers received from Lord Lansdowne the offer of the metropolitan living of St. Cuthberts—"one of the most desirable livings in the Church of Scotland." His conviction, however, of the "superiority of a professorship in point of usefulness" induced him to decline the offer. Shortly afterwards, he was elected, without solicitation on his part, to the Divinity Professorship in the University of Edinburgh; and thither, accordingly, he removed in November 1828.

In March, of the next year, he was requested by Sir James Mackintosh to use his influence towards disposing the popular mind in Edinburgh to a favourable consideration of the question of "Catholic Emancipation," then coming on for final discussion in the House of Commons. As Chalmers was personally desirous of relieving all classes of religionists from irksome disabilities he readily complied with the suggestion, and at several public meetings spoke boldly and earnestly in behalf of the contemplated measure. He held that the Protestant faith was competent to contend with Romanism on the broad arena of equal liberty. One of his speeches is said to have produced a most electric effect upon his auditors. From this we quote a passage which elicited enthusiastic and deafening applause:—"It is not by our fears and false alarms," said he, "that we do honour to Protestantism. A far more befitting honour to the great cause is the homage of our confidence; for what Sheridan said of the liberty of the press, admits of most emphatic application to this religion of truth and liberty. 'Give,' says that great orator, 'give to ministers a corrupt House of Commons; give them a pliant and servile House of Lords; give them the keys of the Treasury and the patronage of the Crown; and give me the liberty of the press, and with this mighty engine I will overthrow the fabric of corruption, and establish upon its ruins the rights and privileges of the people.' In like manner, give the Catholics of Ireland their emancipation; give them a seat in the Parliament of their country; give them a free and equal participation in the politics of the realm; give them a place at the right ear of majesty, and a voice in his counsels; and give me the circulation of the Bible, and with this mighty engine I will overthrow the tyranny of Antichrist, and establish the fair and original form of Christianity on its ruins."

Right! Doctor, the truth may surely be trusted. Let every one contend valiantly for what he believes to be the truth, and at last that which is really true shall prosper. Against this, neither "principalities nor powers," neither popes, nor councils, nor sectarian confederations, nor parliamentary majorities, nor the very "gates of hell," shall be able to prevail. In the free conflict of opinions, popery, bigotry, and all superstitious abominations whatsoever shall be consumed, and the pure light of God's inextinguishable truth beam out and illuminate the world.

Proceeding with our sketch, however, let the reader be informed, that on the accession of William IV. Chalmers was sent to court as one of a deputation, to present a congratulatory address from the Church of Scotland. The particulars of this ceremony are graphically described, and amusingly commented on, in letters which he wrote during his absence to his daughters. A few sentences may be given, as they illustrate his playful style of correspondence, and show how a frank-hearted, unsophisticated man of fifty, albeit a Doctor of Divinity and a University Professor, can look on dignified conventionalisms, however formidably imposing. "A vast deal of consultation," says he, "aunt our movements to and from. We are all on edge. We have to make three bows; and the question is, whether we shall all make them on moving towards the throne, or after we have spread ourselves before it, and there is such a want of unanimity and distinct understanding about it, that I fear we shall misbehave. . . . The greatest consternation amongst us about hats, which had been promised at twelve, but had not yet arrived. There were four wanting, and at length only three came, with the promise that we should get the other when we passed the shop. We went in three coaches, and lauded at the palace entry about half-past one. Ascended the stair, passed through a magnificent lobby, between rows of glittering attendants, all dressed in gold and scarlet. Ushered into a large ante-room, full of all sorts of company walking about and collecting there for attendance on the levee; military and naval officers in splendid uniforms, high legal gentlemen with enormous wigs; ecclesiastics, from archbishops to curates and inferior clergy. Our deputation made a most respectable appearance among them, with our cocked three-cornered hats under our arms, our bands upon our breasts, and our gowns of Geneva on our backs. Mine did not lap so close as I should have liked, so that I was twice as thick as I should be, and it must have been palpable to every one at the first glance, that I was the greatest man there, and that, though I took all care to keep my coat unbuttoned, and my gown quite open; however, let not mamma be alarmed, for I made a most respectable appearance, and was treated with the utmost attention. . . .” In the room he was “introduced to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was very civil;” and he “had a good deal of talk” with the Bishop of London. But, he adds, “far the most interesting object there was Tallyrand, whom I could get nobody to introduce me to, splendidly attired as the French Ambassador. . . . I gazed with interest on the old shrivelled face of him, and thought I could see there the lines of deep reflection and lofty talent. His moral physiognomy, however, is a downright blank. . . .” The time came on for the deputation to appear in the presence of majesty. “We all made a low bow on our first entry, and the king, seated on the throne at the opposite end, took off his hat, putting it on again. We marched up the middle of the room, and made another low bow, when the king again took off his hat; we then proceeded to the foot of the throne, and all made a third low bow, on which the king again took off his hat. After this the moderator read his address, which was a little long, and the king bowed repeatedly while it was reading. The moderator then reached the address to the king upon the throne, who took it from him and gave it to Sir Robert Peel on his left hand, who in his turn gave the king his written reply, which he read very well. After this the moderator went up to the stool before the throne, leaned his left knee upon it, and kissed the king’s hand. We each in our turn did the same thing, the moderator naming every one of us as we advanced. I went through my kneel and my kiss very comfortably. The king said something to each of us. His first question to me was, ‘Do you reside constantly in Edinburgh?’ I said, ‘Yes, an’t please your majesty.’ His next question was, ‘How long do you remain in town?’ I said, ‘Till Monday, an’t please your majesty.’ I then descended the steps leading from the foot of the throne to the floor, and fell into my place in the deputation. After we had all been thus introduced, we began to retire in a body just as we had come, bowing all the way, with our faces to the king, and so moving backwards, when the king called out, ‘Don’t go away, gentlemen, I shall leave the throne and the queen will succeed me.’ We stopped in the middle of the floor, when the most beautiful living sight I ever beheld burst upon our delighted gaze—the queen with twelve maids of honour, in a perfect spangle of gold and diamonds, entered the room. . . . She took her seat on the throne, and we made the same profound obeisances as before, advancing to the foot of the steps that lead to the footstool of the throne. A short address was read to her as before, and her reply was most beautifully given, in rather a tremulous voice, and just as low as that I could only hear and no more. We went through the same ceremonial of advancing successively and kissing hands, and then retired with three bows, which the queen returned most gracefully, but with all the simplicity, I had almost said bashfulness, of a timid country girl. She is really a very natural and amiable looking person. The whole was magnificent.”

From this amusing piece of gossip, the reader who has never been at court may obtain some notion as to how things are managed there. Further extract of the kind will be unnecessary; and the remaining particulars of the Doctor’s history presented in the present volume, may be very soon despatched.

During the summer of 1831 he was almost unremittingly engaged upon his work on Political Economy. This was published in January 1832; at a time when the country was convulsed with the expectations and alarms, occasioned by the forthcoming “Reform Bill.” Chalmers was not in favour of the measure. “He had no faith in many of the principles upon which it was ordinarily advocated.” He did not perceive how any mere change in the mode of electing representatives was likely to improve the economic condition of the people; and the result has shown that he was right in denying that it would have any such effect. The reform he desired to see commenced, was a social one. He had studied long and diligently the question, “how the great mass of the labouring population of the country, in so many instances toil-worn and over-driven, could be sustained in sufficiency and comfort—could be prevented from sinking, as he saw many of them doing, into greater straitsness of circumstances, and into the necessity of severer toil.” His work, accordingly, was not a treatise on Political Economy in the usual acceptation; “it was rather a survey of all the devices for enlarging the resources and adding to the comforts of the community which political economists had suggested”—a searching discussion of all proposed expedients for securing the “happiness of the greatest number;” with the object of making it appear that each and all of them must necessarily fail in accomplishing the result desired: and this being demonstrated, he sought to establish the grand conclusion—which was true then, and is now, and will for ever remain true—“that the one and only means whereby a steady, progressive, and secure advance in the economic estate of every population, and more especially of a population such as ours, in an old country of limited extent, could be ensured, was the spread of right principles, and the prevalence of moral, intelligent, and religious habits among the people.” A work so distinctly opposed to the current notions, to the prevailing infatuation concerning paper-constitutions and salvation by act of parliament, was not likely to obtain just then a very warm reception; and accordingly we find that the book was but indifferently successful. Gradually, however, it is obtaining a more extended favour. We cannot regard it as a complete or sufficient exposition of the subject, but it nevertheless contains many just conclusions, many eminent suggestions, which social reformers and economists may ponder to their advantage, and which perhaps they will ultimately find worthy of adoption.

While Chalmers was engaged upon this work, he received a communication from the Bishop of London, requesting him to undertake the composition of one of several projected treatises, "in proof of the wisdom and benevolence of the Deity," for the writing and publication whereof the Duke of Bridgewater had recently bequeathed the sum of £8,000. He readily accepted the invitation, and in the course of 1832, produced the well-known treatise "On the Adaptation of External Nature to the Moral and Intellectual Constitution of Man." This work was published in 1833, and "notwithstanding a depreciatory notice of it in the Quarterly Review, it met with a very large amount of public approbation and acceptance."

In the General Assembly of 1832, Chalmers was elected "Moderator." A little before, he had received the offer of the West Church, in Greenock—"the most lucrative ecclesiastical living in Scotland." Its endowments were nearly double those of his Divinity Professorship, but he nevertheless declined it, under a "firm conviction of the superior importance of a theological chair." He did not mind about preferment, save in so far as it enabled him to accomplish what he considered his proper work in life.

In the summer of 1833, Chalmers made what he called his "Tour of the Cathedrals." Some rest and refreshment was required after four years of incessant literary and professorial labour, during which he had composed an entire course of Theological Lectures, his work on Political Economy, and the Bridgewater Treatise before mentioned. So he set off and visited the Peaks and caves of Derbyshire, Chatsworth, Haddon Hall, and other sights, taking with him a rustic Achates, or gig-driver, from Huddersfield, whom he especially delighted, by letting him see all the wonders which he himself visited, and drew from him the confession, many times repeated, that "no such fine things were to be seen at Huddersfield." Going southwards, he stays a day or two in London, where, on the 26th of June, he writes off the following bit of drollery, for the women-kind at home:—"Started at nine, much refreshed. Got a hair-dresser to clip me—a great humourist; he undertook, at the commencement of the operation, to make me look forty years younger, by cutting out every white hair, and leaving all the black ones. There was a very bright conversation of clever sayings that passed between us while the process was going on. I complimented his profession, and told him that he had the special advantage, that his crop grew all weathers, and that while I had heard all over the provinces the heavy complaints of a bad hay-harvest, his hay-making in the metropolis went on pleasantly and prosperously all the year round. He was particularly pleased with the homage I rendered to his peculiar vocation, and assured me, after he had performed his work, that he had at least made me thirty years younger. I told him how delighted my wife would be with the news of this wondrous transformation, and gave him half-a-crown, observing that it was little enough for having turned me into a youthful Adonis. We parted in a roar of laughter, and great mutual satisfaction with each other."

He proceeded next day to Cambridge, where he found the town "all in a bustle with the British Association," and was introduced to a multitude of learned and scientific persons. In less than a week he was back again in London, a circumstance which we mention solely for the sake of introducing the following passage from his diary:—"Monday, July 1st. After dinner I went down to the House of Commons. A dull debate, and I did not sit to the end of it. Sir Robert Peel the best speaker. A number of the members came to me—last, though not least, Mr. Daniel O'Connell, who shook me most cordially by the hands, complimenting me on my evidence about the Irish Poor-Laws, saying that he was a disciple of mine upon that subject, and not of his own priest, Dr. Doyle; and I, on the other hand, glad of good being done whatever quarter it came from, and, knowing him to be an influential personage, expressed myself much gratified with the view that he had taken on that question. I am sure it would have done your heart much good to have seen how closely and cordially Mr. Daniel O'Connell and your papa hugged and greeted each other in the Lower House of Parliament."

In the course of his visits to cathedrals he finds himself at Norwich, where, in company with Mr. Gurney of Earlham, he had an interview with Bishop Bathurst. The good old gentleman was then nearly ninety years of age. "He received us," says Chalmers, "with great courteousness; had just finished reading my last book, which he complimented, and gave us most interesting anecdotes of other days, and I felt particularly interested in his personal acquaintanceship with Bishop Warburton. We stopped a quarter of an hour with the venerable old prelate—a perfect gentleman, and of a mild and benevolent spirit, and great suavity of mind. I was much pleased with the Cathedral and its precincts." As the Doctor was some days afterwards proceeding from Peterborough to Lincoln, he was discovered by one of the outside passengers on the coach, who rather obtrusively asked him if he was going to preach at Boston. "I observed him," says he, "making me known to a shop-keeper at Spalding, a town through which we passed, when they both ran together to the shop, I supposed to write a letter to some of the Independents at Boston to get up a deputation." At Boston, next day, being Sunday, a deputation actually appeared, the Doctor's "Peterborough discoverer" having sent on the news of his arrival. He would not preach, however, but went "forenoon and afternoon" to Boston church—"one of the noblest parish churches, and furnished with one of the finest and loftiest towers in England." He expresses only an indifferent opinion of the preaching. The next day he goes on to Lincoln by steamboat on the Witham. "The people," says he, "came into our boat both at Boston and from various parts of the tract through which we passed, and had a good deal of the uncouthness and rudeness of the otter tribe, an amphibious species of animal like themselves." If the Doctor were to travel that way again he would find them just the same. He adds, "We little comprehended the dialects of each other."

After visiting Lincoln Minster, and standing under the big bell, familiarly called "Great Tom of Lincoln," he went forward to Hull, and thence to Beverley, where amongst other curiosities he beheld and conversed with the "biggest man" he ever saw. This was the clergyman of Beverley. The Doctor playfully describes him to his little daughter, Fanny, in a letter. "He is so heavy that he cannot walk; he would weigh more than two of your papa. We found him sitting on an arm-chair that could have been made into a bed for you and Helen sleeping in. When he goes to church to preach, which he does very often, he gets upon a wooden horse called a velocipede, which runs upon wheels, and with this he moves through the streets, and through the church, till he gets to the foot of the pulpit; and then two great strong men-servants push him up the stair, and through the door of the pulpit with their backs and their shoulders, when he sits squash down upon an immense cushion, and preaches sitting to the people, for to do it standing would be impossible. He received us with great politeness, is a literary and gentlemanly person, and so much esteemed, that his odd movements in public excite no ridicule."

Through Whitby, Stockton-on-Tees, Sunderland, and Morpeth, Chalmers at length reached Norham, from whence he intended to have "speeled along the border on foot, with one leg, wherever it was possible, in England and another in Scotland." But this "pedestrian speculation" was frustrated by the kindness and solicitude of friends, who passed him on from place to place, by carriage or on horseback, with such persistent accommodation, that he was not in fact "suffered to foot it on any part of the journey." "All the week," says he, "I have had the services done to me which I recollect in my younger days done to those beggars who were carried about in barrows;—lifted at Norham and let down at Kirknewton,—lifted at Kirknewton and let down at Sprouston,—lifted at Sprouston and let down at Edgerston,—lifted at Edgerston and let down at Wolflee,—lifted at Wolflee and let down at Hindlee,—lifted at Hindlee and let down at the Rowe,—lifted at the Rowe and let down at Woodhouselee. I will not, when I consider the length and arduousness of the way, say it was hard to be disappointed of my pedestrian speculation; but rather when I look back to all the accommodation I have had, and to the kindness which prompted it, I cannot but feel a grateful emotion, which for once in this classic and inspiring region, I shall give vent to in poetry:—

"Good people, my thanks,
For thus haining my shanks."

There is nothing more in this third volume requiring mention here, except we allude to a serious shock of illness which Chalmers sustained after making a warm speech in the General Assembly of 1834, from which, however, he duly and thoroughly recovered. Dr. Hanna's narrative is carried down to the year '35; but of the doings of Chalmers in these two latter years little is related but what appertains to church politics and purely local interests, with which we need not be concerned. The reader will perceive that the work is not yet finished; Dr. Hanna finding that he could not compress his materials within the compass originally assigned for them; and therefore "presuming on the public indulgence," he intends to bring out another volume. Under the circumstances, we suppose we must add another to the present papers when the work shall be completed; unless our readers happen to be getting tired of the subject; and in that case, perhaps they had better petition the Editor in a body, and thus prevail on him to put a stop to our humble, and, it may be, not over-successful efforts at entertaining them.

A DIORAMIC VIEW OF PENTONVILLE.

BY Q.

"The chaise in which my brother Bill Used to be drawn to PENTONVILLE."

Young reader! are you familiar with those lines? I will believe you are; for though the occasion which gave them birth has long gone by, wit is perennial. Who knows not the "Rejected Addresses?" While Wordsworth, and Southey, and Coleridge, and Scott, and Byron, and Crabbe shall be read, the clever travestie of their various styles (Scott declared that he must have written his in a fit of somnambulism) shall be read and admired too. Well, you have read those lines then—but you are disposed to be critical. You say a burlesque should bear some sort of analogy to its original. Now here is none—the very reverse. Wordsworth was what a poet said of poets in general, —one who fled the city and loved the woodlands. If "brother Bill" had been drawn to Hampstead Heath, or Dulwich Common, or even to Kensington Gardens, verdure enough would have been obtained to make him look Wordsworthian. But Pentonville! the muse of Wordsworth could not have breathed in it. A land of unwatered streets in summer, and smoky mud in winter. World-famous, indeed; but for what? For the biggest and gloomiest of penal structures—"loca nocte silentis latè," like the infernal realms of the poet, where all is gloom, and people must not speak to each other. Not even in his slumbers could Wordsworth have persuaded himself that he had drawn poetry from such a place. Peter Bell would have died unsung, if he had unfortunately got into Pentonville prison.

So you say, young reader! and no wonder: Pentonville is all you say. But when brother Bill used to make his chaise-trips thither, matters were much otherwise. The prison had no existence. On that site of sorrow, voices like yours tuned the summer air to melody, and the fresh hay loaded it with incense. Hundreds of happy children, merry as the carolling lark above them, were rolling about in that rich fresh hay, or hurling huge heaps of the fragrant mass at each other. No doubt there were many places worthier the notice of the bard; but Pentonville was not unworthy. It had scenes as rural as might be found about the most secluded villages in England. And a village it was, though, no doubt, a large one. But Wordsworth's heart might have danced with the daffodils that grew where those long and gloomy vistas of brick now weary and depress the eye. The valetudinarian, of either sex, of every age, was brought from the darkness and closeness of London to the bright exhilarating sky, the refreshing breezes, the rich and verdant fields, of Pentonville. The Smiths were right. It was just whither Wordsworth would have transported the Cockney child.

Perhaps, young reader, you have never been at Pentonville. The name has been enough for you. You would as soon have made a pilgrimage to Newgate, or its neighbour, Giltspur Street. You have turned your travels, actual or imaginative, another way. And if you have been ambitious of seeing the world, but have not possessed the means, whether of time or money, to make "the Overland Route," you have seated yourself in a diorama, or at a dissolving view, and Fancy and Art have borne you beneath the frowning brows of Gibraltar, over the blue Mediterranean, up the staircase streets of Valetta, along the broad unpeopled squares of Alexandria and Cairo, across the sandy expanse that parts you from the pearly sea, and over its lordly billows, to the scarcely less lordly floods of the Ganges. Yet, for once in a way, condescend to sit at a diorama of Pentonville. My exhibition will have this advantage, that you can travel now no other way to what it will show you. Some freak of fortune may transport you to the East, and you may see, in veritable essence and reality, all you contemplate in the clever mockery of a London panorama. But what I shall show you, you will never see, save in contrivances like mine. I do not take you far, young reader, it is true, especially if you live in the gorgeous land of Cockayne. One little mile—omnibuses every three minutes. But what I lose in space, I compensate in time. I carry you up that ever-flowing stream. I bear you, not over seas and shores which possibly you may behold with the natural eye—but over years—which it is unquestionable you never can behold. I carry you back to the times when "brother Bill," in his little chaise, "used to be drawn to Pentonville."

Take your seats then, young readers all, and attend to the spectacle. The long highway before you is Penton Street. You that have not seen it say, "Well, any how, there is no beauty there"—you that have, are becoming impatient, and tell me that it is very accurate certainly, and that for that very reason you are disappointed, because I had prepared you for a considerable change: but there it is, just as you saw it, it may be, a week ago—a fair, wide, respectable street enough, with some good houses, especially in the more distant part. Now have a little patience, and observe. Already that distant part is becoming more indistinct—a mist is spreading over it. Now the houses are gone—only a portion of the street is visible. Now that mist, the exhalation of early summer morning, is clearing away. Across the street some faint object is coming into sight. Now we can make it out—It is a rustic railing—at one end of it, close to the houses, is a gate as rustic. The whole is just what you might observe at the end of a lane in some sequestered village, to prevent the intrusion of cattle. Now try if you can make out anything beyond. A small stone building, of cottage dimensions, but scarcely cottage shape, is just becoming visible. Now its outline is distinctly traceable against a background of rich verdure, field, and wood. The fresh morning breeze, laden with the thousandfold fragrance of the country, rushes on our faces.

Would you not like to explore that green and pleasant land? "Assuredly." Once more then, observe. The mist which has cleared from the field is now descending on the street, along which we seem to have made some advance. A few houses only separate us from that rural barrier, and those fields beyond. And take a look at those houses before they too pass into the mist. Do not say they are such as you have beheld with your unenchanted eyes. They are the same walls, no doubt. But did you ever remark those rich cabbage roses, with their mossy rival sisters, and those silver-starred jessamines, which leave you in blissful ignorance of the "graystocks" they cover? Did you ever observe, in your rambles past these houses, those hedges of sweet peas, those luxuriant masses of convolvulus, those broad and bright carnations? Never! they are not the growth of 1851. Gaze on them! for while you gaze they are dissolving, and we stand beyond the gate we were noticing, and must prepare to take a survey of the scene before us.

The prominent object which we beheld when first the dispersing mist disclosed the view, we now ascertain to be a square building of stone, with two gables and a sloping roof, and appearing to exhibit some pretensions to a venerable antiquity. This is THE WHITE CONDUIT. It gives its name to a famous place hard by, which we will presently turn to inspect; it names also the fields before us. It gives character to the foreground of a fairer landscape than you probably suspected was ever to be seen at a place that at any time bore the name of Pentonville. It is no conduit, however, whatever it may have been. It is preserved because it is old and picturesque, not because it is useful. Utilitarianism has not progressed so far from London yet as to Pentonville. Now look at the landscape beyond and about you. There is, first, the far sweeping and undulating horizon. Take one general glance around at it. How varied! how beautiful in its variety! how distant!—those objects which we behold to the left may be trees, but yet we cannot pronounce them so. That far away verdant knoll, crowned with wood, is Primrose Hill—a name of Cockney mould, it is true, but not, like Cockney names in general, belying its application. Now look just below it—that little church, with the low tower, is St. Pancras, and gives its name to the pretty little village grouped beneath it. Now direct your eye to the right. What is there to remind you of a prison in those varied fields?—some blending the dark promise of the hay harvest with the painted buttercup and starry daisy, some alive with the mower and the hay-maker, some luxuriant with the rich yellow green which marks the new mown meadows. It is the very dwelling of Liberty. How freely are those Spanish sheep grazing in the valley, and how goodly is the appearance of their Andalusian guardians in native costume, and the stanch wolf-dogs, with their spiked collars, here so superfluous withal! How free are those 999 cows which give life to that largest pasture of the whole! mysterious number, as the Pentonville rustic tells with awe; beyond which, the wealthy proprietor dreads, or has not been permitted, to acquire. Now mark that pleasant-looking, large, white building, at the distance of a mile or two, standing out against the trees that strive to close it in. How cheerfully it faces the morning sunshine, which comes right down upon it without impediment or adulteration! That is Copenhagen House. There the more ambitious son of Cockayne, who spurns the barriers of Pentonville, finds satisfaction for his adventurous spirit. Thither the Pentonvillian himself, for change of association, takes his morning or evening summer ramble. That noble mass of tufted green which you see beyond, is called Caen Wood; and that sheet of fiery gold, as our view exhibits it, is the sun-lighted roof of the stately mansion that bears the same designation. Now turn to those fair “sister hills.” They are not unworthy a poet, nor have they been unsung. Who knows not Hampstead and Highgate? Yet look at them here, and they are fairer than you have ever seen them—there is little trace of brick and mortar in those wild half-purpling summits which we have now in view. What say you now? might not the bard of Rydal have brought Master Bill hither, without impeachment of his taste? or even been pleased to make Pentonville alternate with “sweet Liswyn Farm,” and “Kilve by the green sea?”

But perhaps we may get a view of the young gentleman in the chaise. Our best chance will be found in turning to the right, where a very different scene opens on our eye. That long and not very shapely edifice, whose deficiencies, however, are considerably covered and obviated by that fair row of lindens, is a spot of no small renown in Cockneyland. It derives its name from the White Conduit opposite. It is called White Conduit House. The summer's morning is now seven hours on its way, and behind a gate, in a clear space well adapted for the purpose, the kine are brought out to the milking. White earthenware jugs are deposited on a board for the convenience of those who are disposed to enjoy the luxury of a draught of milk, fresh from the cow. And these, in truth, are not a few. The substantial citizen, the office clerk, the apprentice of the shop, find time, these long days, to procure a modicum of pure milk and pure air—things which “jewels, purple and gold” cannot procure for them in their dwellings beyond Smithfield Bars or London Wall. They enjoy, too, the benefit of a two-mile walk, which, long before they reach “the Angel,” has come upon open ground. But mostly invalids, and of these mostly children, are “drawn” to Pentonville. An abundance of little chaises is thronging the entrance to White Conduit House. “Brother Bill” is most probably in one of them.

The milking is over—the men of business are gone back to their desks and counters, but the children stay to disport themselves in the renowned White Conduit Gardens. These have no existence in 1851, but they have only very lately been built over. Still, you do not remember them as “brother Bill” beheld them. Look then, and you shall see. Our background is breaking up into a triple vista. We cannot, alas! acquit either design or execution of the grave sin of Cockneyism. But what of that? Is the air less pure, are the boisterous children less happy, because the great mind of the designer scorned to be limited by the narrow material boundary, and projected a wooden tower twenty feet high to represent a rustic church, and painted a flat board with innumerable trees, that an avenue of twenty yards might seem interminable? What joy is afforded by the mechanical chimes in that tower to the embryo musician! What study in perspective does that board present to the infant amateur of art? Say what you will, here are flowers in abundance, here are arbour seats with tables for study and refreshment, here is an ample pond where the youthful disciple of Walton may practise on the minnow and stickleback. And when evening shall arrive, every corner of these gardens will be crowded by people who spend their days in honourable toil amid dust and smoke, and think themselves entitled (and who will dispute it?) to their coffee, a ramble and ventilation, before they sleep to prepare them for the morrow's early labour. I wish to make my diorama agreeable as well as faithful, and, therefore, I do not exhibit the White Conduit Gardens on a Sunday evening. Yet were I to do so, it would be unjust to conclude that all of that vast multitude were sabbath-breakers. Many of them have been sober attendants on morning and evening service, and must take some refreshment for themselves, and for the children fatigued by a salutary walk, and overlaid with the buttercups, roses, and honeysuckles, which are to gladden and perfume the smoky atmosphere of home for the next six days.

But the day wears on—let us turn once more to the fair “White Conduit Fields.” And, hark! there are notes of martial music. A pageant is approaching. Drum and trumpet and trombone are distinctly heard—it is the Grenadiers' march. Now they are near enough for us to hear oboe and clarinet as well. Now scarlet glares, and gold and steel glitter in the sun. Some rough-looking carpenter-like soldiers precede. They are not armed with musket and bayonet, but with axe, and saw, and hammer—they are the pioneers. Here is the drum-major, with his cocked hat set square and trimmed with gold lace and red ribbons, and wielding his staff of office with conscious pride. Then the band, not dissimilarly attired, save here and there an Ethiop musician, with turban and crescent. There are the drums and fifes, a goodly company. A gallant array follows. The colours are displayed. The officers, with cocked hat and pendant plume, keep order from their chargers. They proceed to the second field. There they are drawn up for a field day—that field is called “the Parade;” for such it is for them. Here their band plays one evening in every week, to the great delight of the Pentonvillians, who promenade on that fair gravelled walk, and gaze on the green prospect below.

To the eye of the unpractised civilian, these soldiers seem to perform their evolutions very gracefully and precisely. At any rate, some allowance is due to them. They have never been called on to stand fire, and uncharitable people doubt if they would respond to the call: but do not you think so. They are men—they are Englishmen—they have wives, and children, and hearths, and a country, and freedom to fight for. They will fight fast enough, if they are wanted, and gallantly too. They have enrolled themselves in a military body, that they may be able to add skill and system to courage. They are peaceful men—men of trade and labour—of the shop and of the field. But they are true and loyal hearts, and their king and country may rely on them for peace or war. They are THE CLERKENWELL LOYAL VOLUNTEERS. A strange designation to your ears, young spectators! and such may it ever prove! If the substantial Pentonville of 1851 be a gloomy substitute for the fair vision we have been beholding in our aerial diorama, we are not without our compensation, and a very sufficient one too. Red coats, indeed, do not everywhere dazzle our eyes, nor do Tyrtæan strains thrill our ears, and make our hearts beat martially. But we have no apprehensions from foreign enmity and violence—and if we want exhibitions, we have one which outdoes all which we have ever beheld, and which is a testimony, and, let us hope, a warrant too, of peace and love with all nations around us. Therefore let us be grateful, though Pentonville be now better known to pickpockets than to poets. Poets must go further; and they will not lose time—and the rail will carry them with ten times the velocity with which “brother Bill” was necessitated to travel, to spots ten times fairer than even his Pentonville.

That house, now broken up into two humble tenements, is probably as useful, and even as ornamental externally, (the old laburnum still grows over the wall,) as when, under the designation of Hermes Hill, it was the proud abode of the important Dr. De Valangin, whose painted dogs, no doubt, “brother Bill” must often have admired on his summer excursions;

or as when from its stately gates issued a pompous equipage, bearing ostentatiously on every part the cipher of S. S., and freighted with no less a personage than William Huntington, “Sinner Saved,” the coalheaver converted—into a man of wealth, and a popular preacher. And some will think that an elegant residence, called Suetonius Lodge, with a formidable British Lion in front, is preferable to the fragment of a vallum (still, however, amid the wilderness of houses, religiously preserved) which the Pentonvillian of old dignified with the name of Cæsar’s Hill, and which a well-grounded tradition assigns as the spot where eighty thousand Britons lay bleeding round the car of the outraged Boadicea.

Well! we have seen enough—have we not? to justify the Smiths in making Wordsworth bring little Bill, for air and recreation, to this overbuilt and overcrowded place. Perhaps it had undergone fewer changes from the time of Suetonius to his, than from his to the present day. It is a very type of change. On its every flagstone it bears inscribed, “Tempora mutantur.” Yet, is not that inscription more or less legible on every work of man, and every production of nature?

“And, like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve,
And, like this unsubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a wreck behind. We are such stuff
As dreams are made of; and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep.”

The ancients tell us that the first moiety of night brings with it sullacious visions through a stately portal of ivory; while the dreams of the latter half are true, but come through a homely gate of horn. The sleep that “rounds” our little life is even so. Our early dreams come to us in pageantry and beauty, through the pure white portal of innocence; but, alas! they are soon departed, and sadly unreal. Pass, however, the meridian of “our little life,” and up come the hard realities, through the dark horny gate of maturity: and they depart not till we awake in the incorporeal morning—but it is our own fault if they depart not then—for, after all, earthly realities are dreams, if we make them not something better or worse. Be it then our wisdom to cherish the remembrances of youth. Let the young store them while they may, like summer fruits, for the solace of winter. I do not agree with Dante’s Francesca, that no distress is more grievous than the recollection of happiness in affliction. It is one of the aggravations of affliction that it with difficulty permits us to call up the images of departed happiness. “One fatal remembrance” commonly erects an impassable barrier against the happy memories which before used to come back to us at a call, with the spring of an unstrung bow. If they can only be brought back, they will not change their nature—they will be happy memories still. Perhaps it may be said, this must depend partly on the object of memory, and partly on the nature of the affliction. I will not enter on metaphysical refinements. I believe an innocent joy will never forego its joyousness in the presence of the darkest sorrow, if memory can only bring it thither. Happy days and a fair scene may alike pass away—the scene not only from our eyes, but from the very face of the earth, vanishing like the hours with which it was associated—but, if the association can be retained, and its lustre brought to pierce the gloom which surrounds us, the light which is in it will not be found darkness. The beams of Faith and Resignation must, however, clear the way for it. Persuaded that all is for the best, that all is the operation of unerring Love, we may in time be enabled to let in the radiance of early happiness upon our darkest sorrows. Otherwise, even a little present grief may shut out happy memories of considerable proportions. Pentonville is life symbolized. Whose flowers have not been shred away by the hand of Death or of Inconstancy? In whose gardens and fields have not care and sorrow reared their dark and unsightly dwellings, their silent prison-houses, where they ply their stern corrective discipline? But shall these meditations mar the fresh enjoyments of childhood? Nay; they will not—they cannot; childhood, happily, is protected from this suffering by a providential incredulity. Shall the retrospect overwhelm the mature with despondency? Nay, again; the dispensation is providential, and, therefore, must be good and wise. Who now repairs to Pentonville for clear air and rural joys? Yet it were no less unreasonable to seek the pure delights of heavenly-minded childhood upon earth. Those pleasures were given us that we might aim at that land where they abide for ever, by “becoming as little children” in lowliness, docility, trustful faith, and tranquil purity, and thus fit ourselves for those substantial enjoyments, of which the exquisite experiences of childhood are, perhaps, the faithful shadow—but no more.

Our diorama has beguiled us somewhat from the idea with which we sat down to behold it. It has made us, perchance, “sadder;” if our sadness has made us “wiser” also, the exhibition will need no apology.

LIFE IN PRAIRIE LAND.¹

BY ELIZA W. FAIRHAM.

CHAPTER V.

Improved conduct of the boat—Politeness of her captain—Our style of conversation pantomimic on my part—Landing—Pokerton—Starting for our final destination—The country, the road, the sioux—Their peculiar character demonstrated—Woodland and its principal inhabitants—Prairie Lodge—Our meeting.

OUR boat conducted herself much better in the latter part of her tour than the first. Her improved conduct gave the captain leisure, when he was awake, to spend some time with his female passengers. As I was the only one left after the departure of the Hooshier bride, these honours were concentrated on me. It would have been a troublesome distinction had the engine been less noisy or his voice louder, but as the one was “soft and low,” and the other hissed, whistled, groaned, and splattered continually, I was but little embarrassed by them. If his face expressed astonishment at what he uttered, I proceeded to look astonished myself. If he looked a negative, I shook my head; an affirmative, I nodded; sentiment, nothing was easier than to respond; profound, it cost little effort to look wise and inquiring. Every day he donned a fresh ruffle and white pantaloons; but the hose, I think, were the same—so that after two or three days, there were several transverse stripes of a dark brown colour crossing the foot, which, at a distance, with a little aid from the imagination, might be construed into ribbons, and so made to impart the appearance of a more elaborate finish to the fine pumps. He had a Leghorn hat, with a wide rim lined with lemon-coloured silk, in which he aired his brainless cranium on very warm days, though he never pardoned himself for appearing in the cabin with it.

We worried on through the flood of water that was pouring down the bed of the Illinois and submerging its banks, till the night of the fifth day brought us to the landing-place of our friends in the town of Pokerton. It was at that time the county seat of one of the largest and wealthiest counties in the state. Its name is faintly descriptive of its inhabitants in a double sense: one of their favourite recreations being a game at cards, which is indicated by the first two syllables of this name. A still more conclusive right to it was demonstrated before we left the town. We had a promise of a conveyance to reach our friends early in the morning, but our utmost efforts of coaxing, hiring, and remonstrating failed to bring it till one o'clock. My vexation may easily be conceived. After a journey of nearly four weeks, to be delayed so long within nine miles of the dearest friends I had on earth; to be doomed to sit in the wooden room of a wooden tavern, every beam and board of which was saturated with the juice and fumes of tobacco; to look out, hour after hour, into the sleepy street of a river town, thronged with rough boatmen, horse-jockeys, plaintiffs and defendants, (for the court was in session,) with their learned counsel, every man and boy of them armed with a cigar, or old pipe, brown with the absorbed fumes of the weed; to see among them all not a face that one had ever seen, and, tired as I then felt, not one that I could fancy I should ever wish to see again,—was insufferable. Reading, in such a state of suspense, was out of the question; and it was impossible to set foot out of doors, for the mud mounted half-way to the tops of the men's boots. I had not a few misgivings about the “new country,” and they increased in arithmetical progression, till a nondescript vehicle drove to the door, and Hal came in to announce that deliverance had at last come. Cloak and hat were never donned quicker than mine on that occasion. I stood waiting long before the baggage was in.

The driver was a native. “Is this kyur the young woman that's goin out?” said he.

(1) Continued from p. 286.

"The very same, sir."

"Wall, just wait till I get this truck aboard, and I'll help you in."

"Thank you, I can help myself. How long will it take you to drive to my sister's?"

"I can't rightly judge now; the roads is heavy and the slues deep, but I allow we'll fetch it about five o'clock, anyhow. I should a been here two hours ago, but my beast was out on the prairie, and I couldn't git him afore."

"Well, our patience has been amply proved, meantime; but now, if you can, accomplish it by five o'clock. It's just half-past one, and I confess I do not see clearly how one horse is to travel nine miles, with three persons and the baggage, over the heavy roads and those other phenomna that you named, whatever they may be, even in that long time."

"Thar, we're all ready now, that big piece of plunder can't go; seat yourself with the lady, Mr. and we'll put out;—jist hold on the lines a minute, till I go in."

When he returned he had replenished the inner man with a liberal potation of whiskey, and his resolutions for our benefit were multiplied indefinitely.

He mounted a large trunk in front, flourished his whip, and we soon left the suburbs of Pokerton behind us.

It was a glorious April day. The very air was exhilarating enough to have routed a legion of azure tormentors, not to mention the circumstances under which we were breathing it.

Those who have ever experienced the emotions that fill the heart when one approaches the home of friends—a dear sister or brother, after a separation of years, can appreciate something of ours as the wheels rolled on and brought us nearer to this interesting termination of our wanderings. The deep joy which will not permit one to be silent, and yet finds no relief in words; the questions which will continually force their way to utterance, though no answer is expected; the imaginary portrait of the home, its internal arrangements and external appearance; the changes which time has wrought in the persons of its old inmates; the appearance of the new ones he has introduced; the volume of the past which is to be opened by each party,—its mingled contents of painful and pleasurable records; the new things that are to be told, and the old ones, that are to be reviewed; the freshness of each to each, and the days that must elapse before this single charm can be diminished; the speculations upon the probable position and employment of each member of the family when you enter, and their surprise contrasted with your coolness which says, "Why, you didn't know we were so near, but we did, and are not at all surprised;" all these thoughts and feelings, and a thousand others which human language can but faintly define, crowded our minds and kept every faculty upon its fullest tension.

The country itself had indescribable charms for the eye to which it was new. We had left the foliage of spring further south, but I rejoiced more to see the prairies in their naked majesty, having in my mind the rich promise which the coming months were to fulfil. Where they had not been burned, the grass was still brown, and the trees and copses naked.

One of the great desires of my life that yet remained ungratified, was to see a prairie. Several smooth openings among the groves looked large enough to our uneducated vision, but the driver declared they were nothing—mere "little meadows which would make smart truck patches by-and-by. Jest nothin at all in the way of a prairie." But this did not restrain our exclamations of delight at the beauty around us; to all which came the reply, "Nothin at all, ma'am."

I at last asked if we should pass nothing entitled to the name of prairie?

"None of much account," he replied; "thar's two or three smart little openings among the baarens, but the timber's scattered all over hyur."

We crossed a little stream at some distance from the town, and our road thence onward, for more than a mile, wound among beautiful heights thinly wooded and covered with the clean brown grass. As we mounted one of these, the country opened before us, and swept away to the eastern horizon, a distance of many miles—a smooth, open plain, undotted by a tree or other familiar object. I can never forget the thrill which this first unbounded view on a prairie gave me. I afterwards saw many more magnificent—many richer in all elements of beauty—many so extensive that this appeared a mere meadow beside them—but no other had the charm of this. I have looked upon it a thousand times since, and wished in my selfishness that it might remain unchanged; that neither buildings, fences, trees, nor living things should change its features while I live, that I might carry this first portrait of it unchanged to my grave. I see it now, its soft outline swelling against the clear eastern sky, its heaving surface pencilled with black and brown lines, its borders fringed with the naked trees!

No better proof of the reality of this prairie could have been given than the silence which it inspired in myself and my companion. We had burst into exclamations of delight a dozen times before, when the little glades opened around us; but now there was not a word uttered. Both were lost in contemplation of the sublime spectacle which lay before us. We had no inquiries to make. Nature spoke to us in her own unequivocal language.

But the view was short; the road soon wound again among trees, and afterward ran across a tract of low open ground from which the prospect beyond was cut off. It began now also to be worse than we had found it. The turf was wet and very soft, and the soil where it was cut, so adhesive that it was extremely difficult for the horse to make any progress. We had not yet learned what the slues were, and I was about asking our Jehu to enlighten us on this point, when a practical demonstration, much more impressive than the most eloquent description, superceded the necessity, and, indeed, the opportunity of speech.

We approached a long narrow line of stagnant water, filled with bogs of tall grass, and apparently very much broken up in the middle. There was no bridge in sight, and the road terminated abruptly on one side of this miniature swamp, and emerged as abruptly on the other. It was evident that people crossed, or at least drove in from both sides.

The man on the trunk betrayed no hesitation, he only looked first to the right, then to the left, as if he contemplated turning out of the beaten track if any better one offered; but apparently the examination was fruitless, for he advanced and plunged his horse at once into the thickest of the black pool. I was certain we should never get through. The animal sprung, floundered, and pulled his best, and drew the waggon (the driver, by the way, called it a dearborn,) about twice its length, when he went down, and I thought was going to disappear altogether, but a sudden jerk showed that he still found footing. The fore-wheels sank in the place he had just occupied, the driver lay in the pool between, the horse stood high and dry on the opposite side, the shafts dragging at his heels, and Hal and I sat looking all sorts of consternation, first at the driver, then at the horse, then at each other. It was but a moment, and both broke into a shout of laughter that brought Jehu in astonishment to his feet, and drew the attention of two elderly ladies who were looking up some early sprouts of beans in a garden near by. There we sat dismally helpless, in a bemired and decrepit waggon, the horse and driver a few feet in advance, and both of us wondering how we were to get out. The man of the whip soon recovered his self-possession, and merely remarking that the bottom of the slue must have fallen out since he crossed it, suggested that I should walk ashore as I best could, and go into the tavern, while he went to the blacksmith's shop for help, and to get his fractures repaired. "It was right good luck," said he as he drove off, "that we didn't get slued afore we got to town."

"To town!" said Hal, opening his eyes in astonishment; "where is a town?"

"Why, hyur; don't you see there's a tavern, and yonder is a blacksmith's shop, and two houses beside. This is Woodland."

"Yes, so I should think, in its natural sense."

On due inspection, however, a sign-post was visible before the smartest-looking of the three cabins. It belonged to the garden where we had seen the elderly ladies, and now both their caps were visible in front. People with travelling baggage could not pass through the town without inspection, still less be "slued" in its very suburbs, and not receive any proffer of hospitality from its principal inhabitants. On charitable thoughts intent, therefore, the good matrons issued from the door to invite the strangers in till repairs were made. While they approached, I had time for a brief survey of their persons. As we were within two or three miles of our sister's house, these people must be neighbours, so I had some interest in the examination.

Both were somewhat past the middle period of life. One was a straight, tall, precise figure, trimmed at all corners into more than Puritan stiffness. Her face was expressive of much kindness, I thought. I was not so well skilled in physiognomy then as now. Her carriage was lady-like, and both her dress and manner indicated that she was an emigrant from the east. The former, however, was peculiar, and betrayed the presence of some strong prejudices in the wearer. The waist was short, and the long skirt fell in narrow, perpendicular folds to the feet. The sleeves, (it will be remembered that this was the period of maturity among large sleeves,) were confined to the long, slender arm half-way above the elbow, and thence enlarged a trifle to the shoulder. A neat, square collar of spotted muslin surrounded the neck. The cap was equally plain; still all was in keeping with the person, whose whole mien was characterized by a stiffness that reminded one of a new-made Quaker in a ball-room. Her companion was quite a contrast to this in person and dress. She was shorter and thicker. Her movements were quick and free, and indicated a woman who had moved much, and always with an object. Her dress was more conformable, as Mr. Weller, sen., would say. Her sleeves were larger, her waist longer, her skirt not so perpendicular, and her cap had a fuller border. All these observations were made in a much shorter space than it will take to read them, for we met in less than a minute from the time when they commenced. A courteous salutation from the non-conformist and a cordial one from her companion were followed by a scrutinizing gaze through the glasses of the latter, and an exclamation, "La! it's Miss —, Mary's sister, isn't it?" There was no denying the charge.

"I thought so, you look so much like her; come in, do. Why, you broke down in the slue, eh? Well, who'd a thought it?—but Mary's been expectin on you this good while. She'll be glad enough, I guess. Take a chair; you must be tired. And that's your brother Hecury with you, eh? I thought I knowed you as soon as I looked at you. It beats all how much you and Mary looks alike. Why, when'd you come up the river? What, last night, and never got out here till this time? Take off your things; you'll have to wait some time for 'em to mend the waggon: the whippetree is broke; I see the fellow carryin it along in his hand."

"No, thank you," said I, embracing the first pause in the good old lady's interrogatories and salutations, to inquire the distance that yet remained.

"La! 'tain't but three mild; we're nigh neighbours. Well, how glad they will be to see you! Do take off your bunnut; they won't get the waggon mended right away."

I replied that I would walk rather than wait long, now we were so near.

"I massy, you can't do it,—the road is so wet and the slues so full of water. There's a slue right out here that you couldn't get across at all, so you'll have to wait."

I now turned my attention to a group of young girls who were gathered at the other side of the room. One of them, a pale, timid-looking child of fourteen, with large black eyes and a face singularly like that of the taller woman, came forward, and was introduced by the latter as her daughter Josephine. The others bore the like relation to the hospitable landlady. When the latter abated the tempest of her speech a little, the more dignified non-conformist entered into conversation with me. She told me who she was, a piece of information which had more interest for me than the reader may suppose; how long she had been there, and where she came from. It was all done in a very proper and precise manner. Not a single rule of etiquette was transgressed, either in question or answer.

At the end of half an hour the waggon was at the door, and we were once more ready to start. We inquired of the landlady for the house.

"It's the next but one," she replied. "You go by Squire O'Brien's jist out here in the edge of the grove, and it's the next one you come to. It's a story and a half frame-house, with a kitchen back."

Silence seize your tongue, good woman, for the next half hour, for that hint! I wouldn't have looked at the best painting that represented it, and here, within an hour of seeing it, I have the whole thing set before me.

We drove on, got over the slue without breaking down, rode through one or two little copses of hazel and sassafras, emerged on the open prairie with the same sky-bound savannah in front that had so charmed us a little way back, and continued thus till we struck the outskirts of a thin tract of barrens, entered a lane with fair fields on either hand, and saw two houses before us. But now we were all seized with a sudden mistiness of recollection. Nobody could tell whether it was the first or the second; something had been said about two close together, and it was finally settled between Hal and his Jehu that it must be the further one. We looked hard at the first to see if we could detect no familiar face peering from its windows, but they seemed deserted and lonely. The yard and garden adjoining were enclosed with a picket-fence, some rose-bushes and a few other flowering shrubs dotted the turf of clean cultivated grass, which was just springing from its winter bed, and there was an aspect about the whole that made me almost exclaim, "This must be Mary's home." But we had passed, and were looking back, when a face appeared at one of the kitchen windows that settled our doubts, and turned the horse's head in the direction of our own rather quicker than was quite consistent with the safety of the dearborn. No accident befel us, however, and in another moment we were ushered through the unfinished hall into the room which served as kitchen, parlour, and dining-room. One was there whom our hearts bounded to see, but not Mary.

"Where is she?"

"She has stepped into her father-in-law's, the next house; but she'll be here in a moment, for she must have seen you."

The words were scarcely uttered when the outer door opened, and a thin, slight figure bounded in, and the next moment we were alternately clasped in her arms. "My dear sister!" "My dear brother!" were the only words we had need to exchange. Deep emotion is always silent.

CHAPTER VI.

Sun-bonnets, veils, gloves, &c.—Environments of Prairie Lodge—Its neighbours—A horticultural curiosity—Preparing for tea—Partaking it—The evening—Who were present, and how we spent it.

MARY was followed by a sturdy little boy, with cheeks like the rich side of a fall pear. He looked at us a moment, and then drew to the opposite side of the room.

"This is my Junius," said the proud mother.

"So this is the famous letter-writer, about whose wonderful doings and sayings we have been favoured with such long passages in certain epistles from Prairie Lodge. He is not exactly as spiritual as old Nominus Umbra was at the last date, but he will be all the more interesting to us mortals by-and-by, when his highness condescends to make our acquaintance. Now let us see the externals of Prairie Lodge."

"Oh, there is little to see now. Nature does most of our ornamental work here, and she has barely commenced the business of the season yet. I can show you what she has to work on, and you will soon see for yourselves that she is an elegant and unsparing artist here. Now, are you ready?"

"Yes."

"What, no gloves?"

"Never a one. I want my hands at liberty, having a special use for them; and, moreover, I hate gloves."

"But you'll wear a sun-bonnet?"

"Why, yes, I must concede as much as that, I suppose, though next to the articles just mentioned your close, straight-forward sun-bonnet is my abhorrence."

"Yes, so I should think, and all other forms included, to judge from the colour of your face and neck."

"Why, I have worn, as you see, a little open hat, that would let me look wherever I chose. I have not lost sight of a leaf, or rock, or anything either curious or beautiful, for the sake of saving a shade of brown on my complexion."

"But you haven't travelled from New York in that little ribboned nut-shell without a veil?"

"Exactly so, sister mine. I packed my veil in the bottom of my trunk when I started, to save all scruples, and relieve myself from two or three troublesome debates each day on the propriety of dropping it over my face for five minutes. I put veils in the same category with gloves."

"And sun-bonnets too? Why you'll run wild on the prairie before the first flowers are out; if the Indians were crossing the country as often as they used to be, three or four years since, they'd take you along for a stray princess."

"Thank you; the rank would be flattering: but if it were due to our family on the score of colour, I have an elder sister who should take precedence."

"Here we are. This little brook that is fringed by these willows, runs from a piece of springy ground above the garden, and falls into the little stream that crosses the road at the foot of that large tree. It is here all the year, except, occasionally, a few weeks in very dry seasons. One could scoop out a delicious little pool under those drooping willows, if one had time and felt no scruples about gloveless hands."

"Yes, I'll think of it. Now where does this clean path lead through that unparalleled gate and those bushes beyond?"

"To the spring."

"Ah, what a distance!"

"Oh yes, but we only bring water thence for drinking and cooking; we have, usually, an abundance of rain-water near the door."

"That's a blessing; but when the clouds fail?"

"That is a failure we very seldom hear of here. You'll see before you have been with us a week it is the last dispensation one would provide against."

"You have showers, then, sometimes?"

"The clouds will answer that question some day in a manner that will astonish you."

"Is there anything worth seeing in this grove beyond your spring?"

"Nothing of much interest in the natural world; there is a little spot there—" and my sister's face lost its playful expression while she spoke. "But I must tell you the story some day, when we have leisure, and take you to see it."

"Very well, if it be melancholy, as I guess, let us dismiss it till some future time, when sorrow will be a pleasure. Whose house is that down the road?"

"That is Mr. R——'s, John's father. We call it 'the other house.'"

"It would be more convenient, would it not, to eliminate the last two letters of the article, and cut the phrase down to two words?"

"Undoubtedly. But I trust you will not claim the idea as original. It is one we have often availed ourselves of, since the erection of this made a t'other of that."

"Very ingenious, truly. But what are all these shrubs about the yard?"

"Here you see a row of forest trees: this tall one that bends so gracefully is an elm. John and ——— placed them here two years ago. These are roses along here; yonder are two lilacs on each side the front door; further on is another kind of rose between the gate and the large tree, and this is a seringa, but it has never flowered yet. Those scattered promiscuously yonder, are roses. I have been unable to procure a greater variety; indeed, if roses would bloom at all seasons, I should scarcely crave it. As the roots increase, I intend to divide and multiply them till the yard, all except my bleaching plat, is a wilderness of them. There is nothing in the flower world that I so much love. They grow very fast on our rich soil. If different kinds of shrubbery were to be had here, one could have a magnificent display in a very few years. I have the promise of some from Cincinnati this spring, by a gentleman with whom you are partially acquainted, I believe. Oh, I declare it's a phenomenon that red can be seen through so dark a brown! But this gentleman is to have a variety of plants sent on, and he offers to divide with me. By the way, I had like to have forgotten one horticultural curiosity. It is here on the west side of the house, under the bed-room window. These windows are not so bare in summer. I have a flowering scarlet-runner that clusters very thickly over them, and makes a more beautiful drapery than your damask and gossamer."

"I have no doubt; but show me your curiosity."

"Here it is, do you recognise it? But there's little need of asking; for a lady who abhors bonnets and veils, you blush easily, methinks."

"I scarcely know who would not blush to see themselves stared at by their own initials done in green of that size, and in salad, too! common salad! By-and-by it will be plucked and eaten in vinegar. Who would not blush at the prospect of such an ignominious blotting from the face of nature? But who is that approaching us?"

"My husband. You'll hardly recollect him:—but come in. I must set about tea. Hal is whispering me that you haven't eaten since you left St. Louis."

"If he doesn't call such service as he did at the supper table last evening eating, it must be confessed we have not."

"Be seated; you will now learn the convenience of having your parlour and dining-room in the kitchen,—that is, when you are your own servant. I take care of my family alone, but it will interfere little with our conversation; you sit there, I work here; so it all goes on harmoniously."

"But suppose I work with you; let me lay the table."

"Certainly. I shall refuse you no privilege of that kind."

In a few minutes the shining plates were laid upon the snowy cloth; a reflector filled with tender biscuit glittered on the hearth; the tea-kettle bubbled into the fire; the cellar yielded its stores of golden butter, cheese, and honey, and a repast was before us that would have tempted appetites more pampered than ours had been. In the evening all the family were gathered, not excepting the gentleman whose plants were on their way from Cincinnati. There was also present a gentleman who had long been domiciliated with my sister's family—a man with a dark face, which seemed the home of the very genius of melancholy. A single word explained his connexion with the story which Mary had promised me at some future day. The evening was spent in the enjoyment of some of the richest emotions that belong to humanity; all retired at a late hour; we new ones with a world of novelty yet to explore—the others with many wonders of the eastern world yet to learn.

CHAPTER VII.

Prairie life begun—Rambles in the groves and over the prairies—Visits on horseback—An afternoon with a neighbour three miles distant—Amusing details of this visit, a fair specimen of the social visiting of the country.

THE next day calls were received from the other house, invitations accepted, and prairie life fairly begun.

There was everything yet to see and learn, but we were under progress very soon. Hal, I believe, advanced much more rapidly than myself—a natural consequence of his being abroad so much more. But we were no stayers indoors. When the household cares were disposed of for an hour or two, away we went into the groves and thickets, or out upon the prairies. There were some visits to be made at two or three miles' distance; these called for horses. Sometimes the call was responded to by one only, and I remember one afternoon enjoying a hearty laugh when Hal, who was to accompany us, came in and announced very gravely that the horse was ready, and that he would mount and wait till we came out. He had built a small addition to him, he said, and quite regretted there was not a fourth person to accompany us. Mounted thus, one on the saddle, the other behind on a blanket, with Hal for our bridle knight—and never had two ladies a more waggish or humorous one—we scoured the prairies. Hal was generally in at the mounting and dismounting; but unless there were danger to be encountered, we saw little of him between the goals; what we gained over him by our speed being lost by the various explorations which curiosity or fancy led us to make.

The equestrian of the prairies enjoys the largest liberty which falls to the lot of mortals. Time and distance are the only checks he knows. He draws his rein for whatever point he lists, and gallops in straight or curved lines on till he tires or reaches the spot. Physical freedom is nowhere more perfect, and seldom is it enjoyed with a higher zest than we brought to these excursions, great as was the disproportion between steeds and riders.

Our visits were usually made in the afternoon. The hour for starting was the earliest practicable after dinner, which was always taken at twelve. When the morning had been auspicious within, and only the ordinary affairs of the house were on hand, the preparations could all be made by one o'clock. But the force of habit was too strong to suffer me to submit to this without an earnest protest, and I remember feeling very much annoyed one day at being dragged out to spend a long afternoon less agreeably than we should have spent it at home.

"What possible pleasure can it afford our hostess?" I inquired.

"I cannot vouch for the pleasure," said Mary; "but the convenience, I can assure you, will be very great."

"How, pray?"

"If we go at one she will have time to prepare tea; if we wait till two, she will be compelled to dismiss us without."

"Send a messenger, then, to assure her that we are coming; that will give her time."

"Yes, but it would be very awkward to take her in mid preparation."

"Not at all for us; and the lady, on your own showing, can be endowed with no very high degree of sensibility; so I think your argument fails."

"My argument may, but my experience does not. I have visited this lady, you never have; and I speak from positive knowledge when I say that it will not do to go later than one."

This was one of those obstinate cases—such as arise in many other affairs of life—in which one feels the reasons to be indisputable, but finds it difficult to set them forth in words. We repaired to our post at one o'clock; the hostess was already on the qui vive. She, however, sat about five minutes after our entrance, to give dignity to the reception, and then went about consummating the great event of the day—the tea table. The whole affair went on in the room where we sat, so that I shall be able to give its different stages and progress with an accuracy which, I trust, may be appreciated.

First stage—half-past one—a kettle of pumpkin is suspended over the fire for stewing, and a tea-kettle placed on the hearth, a few inches from the forestick; half past two, a patent oven is placed before the fire, filled with gingerbread, of which I will give the recipe to the next edition of the Frugal Housewife. Next, the pumpkin is taken up and prepared for baking, by sifting and mixing with eggs, milk, ginger, and molasses. I ought to have remarked that as all this took place in the month of May, the pumpkin was dried. At four o'clock, the gingerbread was replaced by a pan of wheaten biscuit, and the tea-kettle was suspended from the hook whence the pumpkin had been taken. At half-past four, the table was placed in the centre of the room, and covered with a cloth. Dishes now began to drop around upon it. They appeared at random, of all ages, colours, and sizes, just as the congregation gathers at a country meeting-house. This continued till dark, broken at intervals by the attention necessary to affairs elsewhere. At five o'clock, the biscuits were removed, wrapped in a table-cloth or towel, and a pie placed in the oven. The fire was stimulated with a fresh basket of chips. Time was shortening now, and affairs began to wear a hurried look. I could not forbear taking advantage of a short absence of the hostess, to ask Mary whether her experience would enable her to guarantee us any supper, with all our punctuality. At six o'clock, a plate of dried beef and pickles appeared on the table, flanked by a saucer of honey and a preserve dish of plums. The teapot was scalded at half-past six, the biscuit and cake had taken their places at a quarter to seven, and just fifteen minutes afterward, we were seated at the table. The attention of the hostess was several times interrupted by the pie, which would not bake; at last she declared herself under the necessity of apologizing for its conduct, and asking us to excuse its appearance. We left a little before eight o'clock, and the naughty pie was taken from its hot berth a few minutes previous. When I was invited to repeat the visit, it was impossible to forbear expressing myself so highly entertained that I should take great pleasure in doing so.

This is not an exaggerated report; but it is due to the females of the country to say that such extreme slowness is not characteristic of them. The person who figured here was an importation from the Buckeye State, and would have been a snail even in Yankee land.

This, though a literal description, is a fair representation of social visiting in that country.

EPITAPHS AND GRAVE-YARDS.

BY F. LAWRENCE.

"Man is a noble animal, splendid in ashes, pompous in the grave."—SIR THOMAS BROWN.

"VICTORY, or Westminster Abbey!" was the exclamation of Commodore Nelson, when, during the great contest with the Spanish fleet, under Sir John Jervis, on the 14th February, 1797, he sprang from a captured vessel at the head of an intrepid boarding party, and seized another ship from the astonished and terrified enemy. "A grave in the Abbey"—too often an early grave—is, in like manner, the great ambition and reward of the English statesman. To be carried, a lifeless corpse, through long lines of formal mourners, and interred in that stately pile, is the gorgeous vision which cheers him at his post of duty, and stimulates the exhausted energies of mind and body. The neglected man of genius, consigned during his life-time to penury and wretchedness, is indemnified for his sufferings (in the world's opinion) by a bust in Poet's Corner, as in the memorable instance of the author of Hudibras, on the erection of whose monument in Westminster Abbey the following graphic and sarcastic lines were written:—

Whilst BUTLER, needy wretch! was yet alive,
No generous patron would a dinner give;
See him, when starv'd to death, and turn'd to dust,
Presented with a monumental bust.
The poet's fate is here in emblem shown;
He asked for bread, and he received—a stone.

"To subsist in lasting monuments," as Sir Thomas Brown has it, "has been always the characteristic infirmity of the noblest and most active minds." Nay, even weaker men exult in the idea of handing down to distant generations, by means of the sepulchral memorial, some slight record of their existence. Whilst these feelings are so strongly implanted in our nature, it is reasonable enough that our meditations should often turn on "graves and epitaphs," and though the subject is not recommended by novelty—though it is a topic with which every one is in some degree familiar, we trust that our readers will pardon us for attempting to string together a few remarks upon English epitaphs, and upon grave-yards in England and elsewhere. The theme, we know, is an exceedingly fertile and inviting one, but bearing in mind how much has been written upon it, we intend to confine our observations within very narrow limits.

It will not surprise those who take any interest in the subject we have started, that we first invite their attention to scenes which they have often visited. We say, "often visited," because we take it for granted that wherever the tombs and sepulchral memorials of our greatest men are grouped together, every Englishman with a spark of national pride in his bosom will occasionally love to linger. In treating, therefore, of the epitaphs in our great metropolitan cathedrals, we shall consider our readers to be treading with us over familiar ground; although it is ground far too interesting for us to omit to notice, or even to pass lightly over. The memorials of English worthies in Westminster Abbey and St. Paul's are of all monuments in this great city the last we would see perish. It may be a question whether such memorials are well placed within the walls of a cathedral, or whether they could not with greater propriety be deposited elsewhere; but this is a point which, though of much importance, we feel it would be inexpedient for us to discuss here.

The best epitaphs, according to our notion, are generally the shortest and the plainest. In no description of composition is elaborate and highly ornate phraseology so much out of place. Where a world-wide reputation has been achieved by the illustrious dead, the inscription of the name alone, with the addition perhaps of a date, (as many instances might be cited to prove,) is often calculated to produce a more impressive effect than an ostentatious epitaph. It has been observed that the simple words—

CATHERINE THE GREAT TO PETER THE FIRST,
inscribed upon the monument erected by the Empress Catherine of Russia to the memory of Peter the Great, arrogant as they are, contain the essence of the true sublime. And, in like manner, amongst the most impressive memorials in Westminster Abbey are the words, "O rare Ben Jonson," chiselled beneath the great playwright's bust, and the name of J. DRYDEN, with the date of his birth and death, and the simple statement, that the tomb on which it is inscribed was erected, in 1720, by John Sheffield, Duke of Buckingham. We doubt whether the effect of the latter would have been improved by the addition of the couplet which was written for it by Pope, admirable as that couplet is:—

This Sheffield raised: the sacred dust below
Was Dryden once—the rest who does not know?

(1) This course has been adopted in the monument recently erected in Westminster Abbey to the memory of Robert Southey, which, the visitor will remark, merely records his name and the date of his birth and death.

Among the best epitaphs to be met with in the interesting portion of the Abbey known as Poet's Corner, we are inclined to number that on Edmund Spenser, which combines in an eminent degree the qualities of dignity and simplicity, and possesses a character of its own which at once attracts attention. The monument upon which it appears had been originally erected by Anne, Countess of Dorset, and having fallen into decay, was restored, in 1768, precisely in its old form.

Hearo lyes (expecting the second
Comminge of our Saviour CHRIST
Jesus) the body of Edmond Spenser,
The Prince of Poets in his tyme,
Whose divine spirrit needs noe
Other witness than the works ;
Which he left behinde him.
He was borne in London in the yeare 1553,
And died in the year 1598.

The epitaph of Michael Drayton, another of the Elizabethan poets, said by some to be the composition of Ben Jonson, and by others of Quarles, has also a species of quaint beauty and solemnity about it which raises it above the ordinary level. It was originally set in gilt letters—

MICHAEL DRAITON, Esq.
A memorable poet of this age,
Exchanged his laurell for a crown of glorye,
A^o. 1631.

Doe, pious marble ! let thy readers know
What they and what their children owe
To DRAITON'S name, whose sacred dust
We recommend unto thy trust :
Protect his memory, and preserve his storye,
Remaine a lasting monument of his glorye ;
And when thy ruines shall disclaime
To be the treasurer of his name,
His name that cannot fade shall be
An everlasting monument to thee.

* We cannot say that the Latin epitaphs in Westminster Abbey are much to our taste, nor can we, under any circumstances, recommend the use of a dead language in funeral inscriptions. One Latin epitaph, however, we cannot pass over, namely, that to the memory of Oliver Goldsmith, by Dr. Samuel Johnson—a noble and scholar-like production, dictated by genuine affection, and full of grace and tenderness. In the delineation of the personal and literary character of his deceased friend, we recognise all the grander traits of honest Samuel's loving heart and powerful pen. Nothing can be in better taste than his just and generous commendation of his friend's genius :—

*Affectuum potens et lenis Dominator ;
Ingenio sublimis—vividus, versatilis,
Oratione grandis, nitidus, venustus—*

To return to the English epitaphs in the Abbey, one of the most remarkable for its elegance and simplicity is that on Purcell, the composer, which is reputed, on the authority of Malone, to have been the composition of Dryden. It is certainly not unworthy of his pen :—

Here lyes
HENRY PURCELL, Esq.
Who left this life,
And is gone to that blessed place
Where only his Harmony
Can be exceeded.
Obiit 21 die Novembris
Anno Ætatis suæ 37
Annoque Domini 1695.

Among the more modern inscriptions, those upon the great engineers, James Watt and Thomas Telford, are particularly worthy of notice. The former is from the pen of Lord Brougham, and is justly admired for its noble and expressive phrasology :—

Not to perpetuate a name,
Which must endure while the peaceful arts flourish,
But to show
That mankind have learned to know those Who best deserve their gratitude,
The King,
His ministers, and many of the nobles
And commoners of the realm Raised this monument to
JAMES WATT,
Who, directing the force of an original genius,
Early exercised in philosophic research,
To the improvement of the Steam Engine,
Enlarged the resources of his country,
Increased the power of man,
And rose to eminent place
Among the most illustrious followers of science,
And the real benefactors of the world.

The inscription upon Telford's monument is equally chaste and beautiful. After giving his name and the dates of his birth and death, it presents this noble summary of his life and character :—

The orphan son of a shepherd, self-educated,
He raised himself,
By his extraordinary talents and integrity,
From the humble condition of an operative mason,
And became one of the Most eminent Civil Engineers of the age.
This marble has been erected near the spot
Where his remains are deposited,
By the friends who revered his virtues,
But his noblest monuments are to be found amongst
The great public works of his country.

Every visitor to Westminster Abbey will reverently pause before the magnificent cenotaph of the great Earl of Chatham, which, though somewhat too confused and elaborate in its artistic decorations, is not unworthy of the great services of the greatest of English ministers. Having achieved a higher reputation as a statesman and orator than any other public man which his country had produced, and having fallen, as it were, in her service, the national gratitude was displayed in an unprecedented manner by the honours paid to his memory. His body lay in state for three days in the painted chamber in the House of Lords—his public funeral exceeded in splendour the obsequies of princes of the blood—his debts were paid by the nation—and finally, the stately tomb to which we have drawn attention was placed over his remains. The inscription upon it, whilst exceedingly plain and simple, is impressive and appropriate :—

Erected by the King and Parliament
As a testimony to The Virtues and Ability of

WILLIAM FITZ, EARL OF CHATHAM,
During whose administration, in the reigns of George II. and George III.
Divine Providence
Exalted Great Britain
To a height of Prosperity and Glory
Unknown in any former age.

Of the poetical epitaphs in the Abbey some of the most important are by Alexander Pope. Like everything else that proceeded from his pen, they are highly polished and carefully written, but, viewed as monumental inscriptions, entirely undistinguished for any striking excellence. Among the best of them is that on the Honourable James Craggs, a secretary of state, rather discreditably mixed up with the South Sea Bubble:—

Statesman, yet friend to truth ! of soul sincere,
In action faithful, yet in honour clear !
Who broke no promise, served no private end,
Who gained no title, and who lost no friend ;
Ennobled by Himself, by all approved,
Praised, wept, and honoured by the Muse he loved.

The epitaph on Gay is interesting as a tribute of friendship, and for the faithful portrait which it presents of that pleasing and amiable poet. The simplicity of his character is admirably delineated in the first couplet:—

Of manners gentle, and affections mild,
In wit a man, simplicity a child.

Taken altogether it is a most beautiful and appropriate composition, and we cannot but regret that the monument on which it appears should be disfigured by the doggerel lines, said to have been written by Gay himself, and inscribed on the ledge just above Pope's epitaph ;

Life is a jest, and all things show it ;
I thought so once, but now I know it.

The epitaph of Nicholas Rowe, the dramatist, (also by Pope,) has been much admired for the pathos of the concluding lines, the beauty of which, however, it is a matter of notoriety, was considerably marred by a plain prosaic circumstance, which proves the danger of assuming facts even in poetical compositions. The monument is commemorative of the poet and of his only daughter, the wife of Henry Fane, Esquire. His widow survived him, and her inconsolable affliction was beautifully depicted by Pope ;

To these so mourned in death, so loved in life,
The childless parent, and the widowed wife,
With tears inscribes this monumental stone,
That holds their ashes, and expects her own.

Almost, however, before "the monumental stone" was finished, the disconsolate widow dried her eyes, and married a gallant colonel of dragoons, without considering that she was spoiling the beauty of her husband's epitaph. So much for poetical prophecy and female constancy !

Among the most flagrant instances of false taste and imbecility in the monumental inscriptions in Westminster Abbey, we must specify, before we pass on, that on the tomb of David Garrick. The tomb itself has been described as "a theatrical conceit, of which the design exhibits neither taste nor invention."¹ The epitaph was the production of Pratt, the author of Harvest Home and other lucubrations which have long since been consigned to the tomb of the Capulets ; and both epitaph and monument are thus spoken of by Charles Lamb in the Essays of Elia. Alluding principally to the eccentric attitude of the actor's effigy, he observes, "Though I would not go so far, with some good Catholics abroad, as to shut players altogether out of consecrated ground, yet I own I was not a little scandalized at the introduction of theatrical airs and gestures into a place set apart to remind us of the saddest realities. Going nearer, I found inscribed under this burlesque figure a farrago of false thought and nonsense." The farrago in question is in verse, and represents Shakspeare and Garrick as "twin stars" (!) who as long as time shall last are to "irradiate earth with a beam divine."

There are but few epitaphs in St. Paul's Cathedral—the other great resting-place of our illustrious dead—which we deem worthy of remark or reproduction. The best in the whole edifice, and one of the most perfect compositions of its kind, is the well-known inscription commemorative of its renowned architect, Sir Christopher Wren:—

Subditus conditur hujus Ecclesiæ et Urbis
Conditor, CHRISTOPHERUS WRAN, qui vixit
Annos ultra nonaginta, non sibi, sed
Bono publico. Lector, si monumentum requiris, Circumspice.

We need not point out the beauties of this celebrated epitaph:—its terseness of phraseology (to which no translation could do justice),—its suggestiveness, grandeur, and dignity. Another Latin epitaph in St. Paul's is also deserving of notice, both on account of its merit, and the individual it commemorates. We allude to the inscription on the monument of Dr. Samuel Johnson, written by the famous scholar, Dr. Parr.

Of the English inscriptions in this Cathedral, the only one which seems to possess any striking character, is that on the monument of the philanthropist, John Howard. It concludes with the well-known sentence: "He trod an open and unfrequented path to immortality, in the ardent and unremitting exercise of Christian charity. May this tribute to his fame excite an emulation of his truly glorious achievements."

From the remarks we have made, and the few illustrations we have selected from notorious sources, it will be concluded that it is no very easy matter to produce a good epitaph. Great practice in the art of composition is required—great power of condensation—and the exercise of rare judgment and discrimination. In their efforts at epitaph-writing, few English poets have appeared to great advantage. One or two perfect specimens, indeed, we do possess, but the success of a single writer must be set off against the failure of a great many others. Of our good epitaphs, the very best, in our opinion, is that on the Countess Dowager of Pembroke, the sister of Sir Philip Sidney, by Ben Jonson. Although it has been often quoted, we cannot find it in our hearts to exclude it from our selections :—

(1) "Worthies of England," by Geo. Lewis Smythe, 1850.

Underneath this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse,
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother ;
Death, ere thou hast slain another,
Fair, and wise, and good as she,
Time shall throw his dart at thee.

Delicacy of expression, and grandeur and beauty of thought, are united in this exquisite production. Another of Jonson's epitaphs, although more rugged in versification, is also deserving of quotation ;

Underneath this stone doth lie
As much virtue as could die ;
Which, when alive, did vigour give
To as much beauty as could live.
If she had a single fault,
Leave it buried in this vault.

We have already had occasion to make a few remarks on Pope's epitaphs. Not a few of them, as we have before hinted, appear to us tame and insipid, and characterised by a false taste. We would, however, except from this censure the well-known couplet designed for the monument of Sir Isaac Newton, in which dignity of language, and boldness of conception, are strikingly blended :—

Nature and nature's laws lay hid in night ;—
God said, " Let Newton be ! " and all was light.

David Garrick is the author of some very good and characteristic epitaphs. The best of them, to our taste, is that upon Claudius Philips, the musician, who lived and died in great poverty. It was for some time ascribed to Dr. Johnson, but is now clearly established to have been the production of Garrick :—

Philips, whose touch harmonious could remove
The pangs of guilty power and hapless love,
Rest here, distress'd by poverty no more,
Here find that calm thou gav'st so oft before ;
Sleep undisturb'd within this peaceful shrine,
Till angels wake thee with a note like thine.

Another of Garrick's most celebrated epitaphs, is that on Mr. Havard, the comedian, who died in 1778. It is described by the author as a tribute " to the memory of a character he long knew and respected." Whatever its merits as a composition, the professional metaphor introduced is, to say the least of it, sadly out of place :—

" An honest man's the noblest work of God."
Havard, from sorrow rest beneath this stone ;
An honest man—beloved as soon as known ;
Howe'er defective in the mimic art,
In real life he justly play'd his part !
The noblest character he acted well,
And heaven applauded when the curtain fell.

The epitaph on William Hogarth, in Chiswick Churchyard, (also by Garrick,) is in far better taste :—

Farewell, great painter of mankind,
Who reach'd the noblest point of art ;
Whose pictured morals charm the mind,
And through the eye correct the heart !
If genius fire thee, reader, stay ;
If nature touch thee, drop a tear :—
If neither move thee, turn away,
For Hogarth's honour'd dust lies here.

Some distinguished men have amused themselves in their life-time, by inditing epitaphs for themselves. Benjamin Franklin, and the great lawyer and orientalist, Sir William Jones, have left us characteristic performances of this kind in prose, and from Matthew Prior we have a mock-serious epitaph in verse. The latter composition has been often quoted, but its author was so great a master of terse, epigrammatic expression that it will bear repetition :

Nobles and Heralds, by your leave,
Here lie the bones of Matthew Prior ;
The son of Adam and of Eve,
Can Bourbon or Nassau go higher ?

Written in the same spirit, but superior in tone and quality, is the following epitaph " on a poor but honest man," the authorship of which is unknown to us :—

Stop, reader, here, and deign to look
On one without a name,
Ne'er enter'd in the ample book
Of fortune or of fame.

Studios of peace, he hated strife ;
Mock virtues fill'd his breast ;
His coat of arms, " a spotless life,"
" An honest heart " his crest.

Quarter'd therewith was innocence,
And thus his motto ran :—
" A conscience void of all offence,
Before both God and man."

In the great day of wrath, though pride
Now scorns his pedigree,
Thousands shall wish they'd been allied
To this great family.

The identical thought contained in Prior's epitaph is ludicrously expressed in the following inscription taken from a monument erected in 1703, in the New Church burying-ground of Dundee, to the memory of J. R.

Here lies a Man,
Com'd of Adam and Eve ;
If any will climb higher,
I give him leave.

Amongst our poetical epitaphs, of the more polished and elaborate class, we must not omit to notice two by the poet Mason ; one of them being to the memory of his mother, in Bristol Cathedral, and the other on a young lady named Drummond, in the church of Brodsworth, Yorkshire. We have only space for the latter.

Here sleeps what once was beauty, once was grace ;
Grace, that with tenderness and sense combined
To form that harmony of soul and face,
Where beauty shines the mirror of the mind.

Such was the maid that, in the morn of youth,
In virgin innocence, in nature's pride,
Blest with each art that owes its charms to truth,
Sank in her father's fond embrace, and died.

He weeps ; O venerate the holy tear !
Faith lends her aid to ease affliction's load ;
The parent mourns his child upon the bier,
The Christian yields an angel to his God.

Of whimsical and satirical epitaphs,—some actually inscribed upon the tomb-stone, and others merely written and intended for pasquinades,—a large collection might be made. We must admit that we have ourselves little taste for these anomalous compositions, nor do we consider it creditable to the national character, that so many English churchyards can be pointed out where they occur. Within the hallowed precincts of the grave,—in the presence, as it were, of the awful realities of death,—it would be thought that few men would care to jest. Nevertheless, experience proves that there are those who will make even the sad paraphernalia of the tomb the subject of mirth and pleasantry : witness the epitaph designed for the tomb of Sir John Vanbrugh, distinguished as a dramatist and architect, and reflecting on his achievements in the latter capacity :—

Lie heavy on him, Earth, for he Laid many a heavy load on thee.

The original of the following not very gallant production is to be found among the epigrams of Boileau :

Here lies my wife ; there let her lie :
She is at rest—and so am I.

We do not suppose that this was ever engraved upon a tombstone, either in its French or English dress ; but the following doggerel lines are said to have been actually copied from a slab in an English church :—

Here lies the body of Sarah Sexton,
Who as a wife did never vex one ;
We can't say that for her at the next stone.

The following effort of rustic wit (?) is also known to have appeared on a tombstone in Essex :—

Here lies the man Richard,
And Mary his wife ;
Their surname was Pritchard ;
They lived without strife ;
And the reason was plain :
They abounded in riches,
They no care had nor pain,
And the wife wore the breeches.

We will not, however, multiply examples of these compositions. Doggerel lines of the description we have quoted have often found their way into print, and we have selected one or two of the least offensive, as examples of oddity and eccentricity. It may be added, however, that compliments almost as strange as this sort of satire have been sometimes engraved upon tombstones ; as in the following flattering epitaph on a beautiful young lady :—

Sleep soft in dust, wait the Almighty's will,
Then rise unchanged, and be an angel still.

From the subject of epitaphs to that of grave-yards and cemeteries, the transition is so easy and natural, that we are tempted to enlarge the limits of our paper, for the purpose of making a few observations upon them. We have somewhere met with the remark that national peculiarities and characteristics are nowhere more strikingly displayed, than in burial-places and monumental inscriptions. Perhaps the theory is fanciful, and if carried to its full extent untenable ; but it receives some support from the parade of sentiment which we meet with in a French cemetery, and also from some of the features of an English churchyard, where the epitaphs, though little distinguished for taste or variety, are generally expressive of honesty and heartiness of affection. In Scotland, also, it has been observed, that the plain and massive grave-stones harmonize with and illustrate the deep-seated and rugged piety of the people ; whilst in Ireland, the ill-tended and slovenly burial-places symbolize the unsteadiness of the Celtic character. But, however this may be—and the notion is hardly worth dilating on—we invite our readers to consider with us for a few moments the merits and defects of our present arrangements, in city, town and country, for the interment of the dead.

In the first place, we must protest, in common we hope with all sensible persons, against the practice which has hitherto prevailed to such a fearful extent, of hurrying the dead in the very heart and centre of populous towns and cities, and of continuing the use of over-crowded churchyards, surrounded on all sides by human habitations. We believe the practice to be both revolting and unnecessary, and we protest against it in the name of expediency, of humanity, and of propriety. Putting the matter simply on the ground of taste and feeling, we object to a system which renders the resting-place of the departed liable to continual desecration, as well as a source of annoyance to the living ; and we rejoice to find that the legislature has endeavoured by a recent enactment in some degree to remedy the evil, by empowering the Board of Health to prohibit interments in over-crowded burial-grounds.

The view which we take upon this subject is sanctioned so completely by the instincts of humanity and the dictates of common sense, that it is, perhaps, hardly necessary to refer to precedent, or to cite the practices of other nations and other times in its support. Nevertheless, we will remind our readers that among the Greeks, the cemetery, or "place of rest," was always without the cities, and that among the Romans, the interment of the dead beyond the walls was provided for by special enactment. The early Christians, also, originally buried outside their cities, though in the course of time they were induced to transfer their burial-places to the neighbourhood of their churches. The notion that led to this change was of course the greater sanctity of the latter situation ; and that idea has naturally clung to us up to this day. Where circumstances permit and sanction it, we admit that no place of interment can be more appropriate than the consecrated ground in the vicinity of the church. We love the rural churchyard, where the "immemorial" yew-tree casts its solemn shade over the turf-covered graves of the humble dead, and everything breathes the air of tranquillity and repose. With its hallowed associations, and aspect of solemnity, peace, and serenity, it would be impossible, we believe, to imagine a more appropriate resting-place from the fitful fever of life, or one more consonant with the feelings and instincts of our nature. But the churchyard in the large city or town is a very different thing. Its narrow limits, often liable to be still further contracted by undue encroachments,—its graves profaned to make room for fresh tenants,—the busy hum of life and business surrounding it on all sides, and forming so strange a contrast to the stillness of the grave,—all combine to convince the most thoughtless and the most bigoted (for to all "old ways" some men will be found bigoted,) of the impropriety of such a mode of interment.

We say then, Abolish altogether the interment of the dead amongst the habitations of the living in large, populous, busy towns. As a substitute, cemeteries, or burial places in the suburbs, must be of course resorted to. Many of these have already been established in London and other large places, by means of Joint Stock Companies; and their establishment has done much to diminish the number of interments in crowded burying-grounds. But it is obvious that such a mode of burial is only accessible to the comparatively wealthy, and it cannot be said, therefore, that any efficient remedy is yet applied to the evil of which we complain.

With regard to the taste exhibited in the sepulchral memorials of English cemeteries, (which is a matter more immediately germane to our present inquiry,) we shall say but little. Many of our readers must be familiar with those in the neighbourhood of the metropolis, and have, doubtless, formed an opinion upon this point. As far as our own impressions go,—whilst we admire the decency and repose, the neatness and propriety which are so grateful to the feelings of survivors, and form so striking a contrast to the squalid deformity of the city burial-place,—we cannot say that the cemeteries we have visited present in their monumental memorials and inscriptions many examples of elevated taste and poetical feeling. The sepulchral emblems which abound on all sides are characterised by great sameness and triteness, (witness the frequent occurrence of broken columns, and similar common-place memorials;) whilst, with regard to epitaphs, we think we are justified in saying that there are few which display originality of thought, or any remarkable power of expression.

"They order this matter better in France." Thus does Sterne begin the narrative of his "Sentimental Journey through France and Italy;" and if the oracular remark can in these days be said to apply to anything, we think it may be properly applied to burying-grounds. In the first revolution, the National Assembly, by one of its most salutary decrees, prohibited interments within churches, and directed the formation of burial-places at a distance from human dwellings. During the dismal period of the Reign of Terror which soon followed, (when Death was declared an Eternal Sleep,) men and women were buried anywhere and everywhere, without memorial or inscription to mark the spot. But this barbarism was succeeded by a strong reactionary feeling. At the beginning of the present century decrees were promulgated for the regulation of cemeteries, and it must be confessed that at the present time the Parisian burial places are superior to any arrangements of our own for the interment of the dead. The famous cemetery of Père la Chaise (consecrated in 1804) ranks first in order, and is worthy of a few remarks. Among the many hundreds of our countrymen to whom the sights of Paris (thanks to the potent influence of rail and steam!) are now so familiar, there are few who have visited this spot without bringing away some pleasing impressions. Not that we intend to assert that Père la Chaise is all that a burying-ground should be. Far from it. We should like less prettiness and more solemnity; less theatrical display, less trite sentimentality. But still its advantages are great over all the burial-places on a large scale which it has been our lot to visit. To say nothing of its well-chosen situation, and the fine panoramic view of Paris which is obtained from it, there is a striking and peculiar beauty in the admixture of tombs, shrubs, and flowers, for which it is remarkable. Death is here disarmed of all that is terrible in its aspect. The resting-place of the departed is made as attractive as Parisian taste (which exults in the pretty and pleasing,) could devise. The carefully tended graves, periodically visited and adorned with amaranth wreaths, bear witness to the depth and constancy of the affection of the survivors. Flowers of the most brilliant hue, elegantly disposed in urns and baskets, relieve the sombre tints of the cypress and acacia trees, which flourish luxuriantly on all sides. The tombs themselves are many of them at once interesting and curious to an English eye; a large proportion representing temples and sepulchral chapels, fitted up with altars, and decorated with flowers. Although there is no great variety or originality in the epitaphs, simple and pathetic inscriptions continually occur,—full of good taste and delicacy,—and had we not already exceeded the limits we had assigned ourselves, we should have presented a few specimens.

We must not omit to state another circumstance, which gives more than common interest and importance to the cemetery of Père la Chaise. Amongst its sixteen or seventeen thousand tombs, there are mingled numerous memorials of illustrious warriors, artists, and men of letters, recently deceased; and the visitor cannot thread its winding paths without meeting with world-famous names inscribed upon stately cenotaphs, or, should he be accompanied with a guide, without having places pointed out to him where bodies are crumbling into dust, which were once animated by spirits of no common mould. Conspicuously situated, in the centre of the cemetery, is the splendid mausoleum erected to the memory of Casimir Perier, who having vigorously wrestled with the giant democracy, after the revolution of 1830, perished in May 1832, from exhaustion of the mental and bodily energies, produced by over excitement. The burial place of Marshal Ney, enclosed with iron railings and planted with flowers and evergreens, is shown to the inquiring stranger, though no monument or inscription marks the spot: and we venture to think, that neither friend nor foe would pass on without heaving a sigh for the fate of the gallant soldier who was cruelly shot down, in cold blood, as a traitor and deserter, after passing unscathed through the perils of a hundred fights! The great politicians and orators of the Restoration, Manuel, Benjamin Constant, and General Foy, are all interred near the same place; and the monument of Foy, representing the General in the act of addressing the Chamber of Deputies, it is superfluous to state, has been much admired. A host of military celebrities who rose to distinction under the fostering eye of Napoleon, and whose achievements have added so much to the highly-prized military reputation of France, have also appropriate, and, in many instances, superb memorials in this remarkable burying-ground. Records will also be found of some who have won their laurels in more peaceful pursuits, or by works of charity and benevolence, as in the case of the Abbé Sicard, (a name well known in the revolution!) the Director of the Deaf and Dumb Institution, whose tomb is often inquired for. Without, however, enumerating all the illustrious persons of whom memorials are to be found in Père la Chaise, we venture to assert that it would be difficult to imagine a more interesting assemblage of monumental emblems, and the only regret is, that from the nature of their structure and constant exposure, they are not likely to be permanent.

Before we bring to a conclusion these discursive remarks, we may perhaps be permitted to refer to the judiciously and eloquently expressed opinions of a recent English writer on the subject of interments. In a late number of the Quarterly Review, (at the conclusion of an article on Gardening;) it is well observed that, "if the horrid means of disposing of the dead" which prevails in London and elsewhere, "had been found in New Zealand before the introduction of Christianity, and we had been innocent of them, we should reproach them with the foul iniquity, as a worse stain on the native character than even cannibalism itself." "There is a beautiful legend," continues the reviewer, "if in these days we may be pardoned for calling anything in this line a mere legend—that on the death of the Virgin, the apostles went, after a time, to remove the body, and on opening the tomb where it had been laid, found that it was gone, but in its place appeared, in full growth, a thick cluster of bright and varied flowers. On this hint be it ours to speak. Let us remove the remains of our friends from the possibility of being a nuisance and a pollution. Let no vault, nor catacomb, nor niche, be permitted to pour forth through its chinks what must shock the sensitiveness of the most ardent affection. Let us lay what is left reverently in the earth, and above the spot let us spread a carpet of living bloom. . . . Give us, whenever the appointed hour arrives, no other monument than a parterre, six feet by two, not hung about with trumpety dyed wreaths of éternelles and fragile amaranths, but planted with humble, homely, low-growing favourites—the aconite and the snow-drop, to mark a resurrection from the death of winter; the violet and the lily of the valley, to join cheerfully in the sweetness of spring; the rose, to sympathise with the beauty of summer; and the Japan anemone and the chrysanthemum, to carry a smile into the fading light of autumn. So best may the corruptible body be rendered up to Nature." From the tenor of our previous remarks, the reader may conclude that we cordially sympathise with such sentiments as these. We believe they are participated in, to some extent, by most persons of taste and feeling, and whilst others may think them rather fanciful, they indicate at any rate an enlightened and elevated tone of feeling, on a topic which comes home to the "business and bosoms" of us all.

We must here break off, not because we have exhausted the subject, but because we do not wish to occupy too much space with so grace, and, comparatively, so trite a topic.

VISION OF CHARLES XI.

WE are in the habit of laughing incredulously at stories of visions and supernatural apparitions, yet some are so well authenticated, that if we refuse to believe them, we should, in consistency, reject all historical evidence. The fact I am about to relate is guaranteed by a declaration signed by four credible witnesses; I will only add, that the prediction contained in this declaration was well known, and generally spoken of, long before the occurrence of the events which have apparently fulfilled it.

Charles XI. father of the celebrated Charles XII. was one of the most despotic, but, at the same time, wisest monarchs, who ever reigned in Sweden. He curtailed the enormous privileges of the nobility, abolished the power of the Senate, made laws on his own authority; in a word, he changed the constitution of the country, hitherto an oligarchy, and forced the States to invest him with absolute power. He was a man of an enlightened and strong mind, firmly attached to the Lutheran religion; his disposition was cold, unfeeling, and phlegmatic, utterly destitute of imagination. He had just lost his queen, Ulrica Eleonora, and he appeared to feel her death more than could have been expected from a man of his character. He became even more gloomy and silent than before, and his incessant application to business proved his anxiety to banish painful reflections.

Towards the close of an autumn evening, he was sitting in his dressing-gown and slippers, before a large fire, in his private apartment. His chamberlain, Count Brahe, and his physician, Baumgarten, were with him. The evening wore away, and his majesty did not dismiss them as usual; with his head down and his eyes fixed on the fire, he maintained a profound silence, weary of his guests, and fearing, half unconsciously, to remain alone. The count and his companion tried various subjects of conversation, but could interest him in nothing. At length Brahe, who supposed that sorrow for the queen was the cause of his depression, said with a deep sigh, and pointing to her portrait, which hung in the room,

"What a likeness that is! How truly it gives the expression, at once so gentle and so dignified!"

"Nonsense!" said the king, angrily, "the portrait is far too flattering; the queen was decidedly plain."

Then, vexed at his unkind words, he rose and walked up and down the room, to hide an emotion at which he blushed. After a few minutes he stopped before the window looking into the court; the night was black, and the moon in her first quarter.

The palace where the kings of Sweden now reside was not completed, and Charles XI. who commenced it, inhabited the old palace, situated on the Ritzholm, facing Lake Modu. It is a large building in the form of a horseshoe: the king's private apartments were in one of the extremities; opposite was the great hall where the States assembled to receive communications from the crown. The windows of that hall suddenly appeared illuminated. The king was startled, but at first supposed that a servant with a light was passing through; but then, that hall was never opened except on state occasions, and the light was too brilliant to be caused by a single lamp. It then occurred to him that it must be a conflagration; but there was no smoke, and the glass was not broken; it had rather the appearance of an illumination. Brahe's attention being called to it, he proposed sending one of the pages to ascertain the cause of the light, but the king stopped him, saying, he would go himself to the hall. He left the room, followed by the count and doctor, with lighted torches. Baumgarten called the man who had charge of the keys, and ordered him, in the king's name, to open the doors of the great hall. Great was his surprise at this unexpected command. He dressed himself quickly, and came to the king with his bunch of keys. He opened the first door of a gallery which served as an antechamber to the hall. The king entered, and what was his amazement at finding the walls hung with black.

"What is the meaning of this?" asked he.

The man replied, that he did not know what to make of it, adding, "When the gallery was last opened, there was certainly no hanging over the oak panelling."

The king walked on to the door of the hall.

"Go no further, for heaven's sake," exclaimed the man; "surely there is sorecery going on inside. At this hour, since the queen's death, they say she walks up and down here. May God protect us!"

"Stop, sire," cried the count and Baumgarten together, "don't you hear that noise? Who knows to what dangers you are exposing yourself! At all events, allow me to summon the guards."

"I will go in," said the king, firmly; "open the door at once."

The man's hand trembled so that he could not turn the key.

"A fine thing to see an old soldier frightened," said the king, shrugging his shoulders; "come, Count, will you open the door?"

"Sire," replied Brahe, "let your majesty command me to march to the mouth of a Danish or German cannon, and I will obey unhesitatingly, but I cannot defy hell itself."

"Well," said the king, in a tone of contempt, "I can do it myself."

He took the key, opened the massive oak door, and entered the hall, pronouncing the words "With the help of God." His three attendants, whose curiosity overcame their fears, or who, perhaps, were ashamed to desert their sovereign, followed him. The hall was lighted by an innumerable number of torches. A black hanging had replaced the old tapestry. The benches round the hall were occupied by a multitude, all dressed in black; their faces were so dazzlingly bright that the four spectators of this scene were unable to distinguish one amongst them. On an elevated throne, from which the king was accustomed to address the assembly, sat a bloody corpse, as if wounded in several parts, and covered with the ensigns of royalty; on his right stood a child, a crown on his head, and a sceptre in his hand; at his left an old man leant on the throne; he was dressed in the mantle formerly worn by the administrators of Sweden, before it became a kingdom under Gustavus Vasa. Before the throne were seated several grave, austere looking personages, in long black robes. Between the throne and the benches of the assembly was a block covered with black crape; an axe lay beside it. No one in the vast assembly appeared conscious of the presence of Charles and his companions. On their entrance they heard nothing but a confused murmur, in which they could distinguish no words. Then the most venerable of the judges in the black robes, he who seemed to be their president, rose, and struck his hand five times on a folio volume which lay open before him. Immediately there was a profound silence, and some young men, richly dressed, their hands tied behind their backs, entered the hall by a door opposite to that which Charles had opened. He who walked first, and who appeared the most important of the prisoners, stopped in the middle of the hall, before the block, which he looked at with supreme contempt. At the same time the corpse on the throne trembled convulsively, and a crimson stream flowed from his wounds. The young man knelt down, laid his head on the block, the axe glittered in the air for a moment, descended on the block, the head rolled over the marble pavement, and reached the feet of the king, and stained his slipper with blood. Until this moment surprise had kept Charles silent, but this horrible spectacle roused him, and advancing two or three steps towards the throne, he boldly addressed the figure on its left in the well-known formulary, "If thou art of God, speak; if of the other, leave us in peace."

The phantom answered slowly and solemnly, "King Charles, this blood will not flow in thy time, but five reigns after." Here the voice became less distinct, "Woe, woe, woe to the blood of Vasa!" The forms of all the assembly now became less clear, and seemed but coloured shades: soon they entirely disappeared; the lights were extinguished; still they heard a melodious noise, which one of the witnesses compared to the murmuring of the wind among the trees, another to the sound a harp string gives in breaking. All agreed as to the duration of the apparition, which they said lasted ten minutes. The hangings, the head, the waves of blood, all had disappeared with the phantoms, but Charles's slipper still retained a crimson stain, which alone would have served to remind him of the scenes of this night, if indeed they had not been but too well engraven on his memory.

When the king returned to his apartment, he wrote an account of what he had seen, and he and his companions signed it. In spite of all the precautions taken to keep these circumstances private, they were well known, even during the lifetime of Charles, and no one hitherto has thought fit to raise doubts as to their authenticity.

LETTER OF MARION DELORME TO M. DE CINQUE MARS.

[The following is inserted in connexion with our recent papers, "The Triumphs of Steam."] To the Editor of Sharpe's London Magazine.

SIR,—The credit of having first suggested the application of steam as a motive power, has, by common consent, been usually awarded to the celebrated and ingenious Marquis of Worcester. His claim, however, to the originality of the suggestion appears to be somewhat mooted by the following letter from Marion Delorme to the Marquis de Cinque Mars, the unfortunate favourite of Louis XIII., which I accidentally met with in the second volume of "A Summer amongst the Bocages and Vines," by Louisa Stuart Costello, published in 1840, by Richard Bentley, of New Burlington Street, p. 51, et seq.

As this letter is not, I believe, very generally known, and as it furnishes a curious illustration of the arbitrary proceedings in France in the 17th century, it may, perhaps, be worth republishing in your Magazine.

I am, Sir, &c. &c.

August 1, 1857.

WILLIAM HAMILTON.

Paris, Feb. 1641.

MY DEAR EFFIAT,—While you are forgetting me at Narbonne, and giving yourself up to the pleasures of the court, and the delight of thwarting M. le

VOL. XIV.

Cardinal de Richelieu, I, according to your express desire, am doing the honours of Paris to your English lord, the Marquis of Worcester; and I carry him about, or rather, he carries me from curiosity to curiosity, choosing always the most grave and serious, speaking very little, listening with great attention, and fixing on those whom he interrogates, two large blue eyes, which seem to pierce to the very centre of their thoughts. He is remarkable for never being satisfied with any explanations which are given him; and never sees things in the light in which they are shown him. You may judge of this by a visit we made together to Bicêtre, where he imagined he had discovered a genius in a madman. If this madman had not been actually raving, I verily believe your marquis would have entreated his liberty, and have carried him off to London, in order to hear his extravagancies from morning to night at his ease.

We were crossing the court of the madhouse, and I, more dead than alive with fright, kept close to my companion's side, when a frightful face appeared behind some immense bars, and a hoarse voice exclaimed, "I am not mad! I am not mad! I have made a discovery which would enrich the country that adopted it." "What has he discovered?" I asked of our guide. "Oh!" he answered, shrugging his shoulders, "something trifling enough, you would never guess it; IT IS THE USE OF THE STEAM OF BOILING WATER." I began to laugh. "This man," continued the speaker, "is named SALOMON DE CAUS: he came from Normandy, four years ago, to present to the king a statement of the wonderful effects that might be produced from his invention. To listen to him, you would imagine, that with steam you could NAVIGATE SHIPS, MOVE CARRIAGES; in fact, there is no end to the miracles, which, he insists upon it, could be performed. The Cardinal sent the madman away without listening to him. SALOMON DE CAUS, far from being discouraged, followed the Cardinal, wherever he went, with the most determined perseverance, who, tired of finding him for ever in his path, and annoyed to death with his folly, ordered him to be shut up in the Bicêtre, where he has now been for three years and a-half, and where, as you hear, he calls out to every visitor, that he is not mad, but that he has made a valuable discovery. He has even written a book upon the subject which I have here."

Lord Worcester, who had listened to this account with much interest, after reflecting a time, asked for the book, of which, after reading several pages, he said, "This man is not mad. In my country, instead of shutting him up, he would have been rewarded. Take me to him, for I should like to ask him some questions."

He was, accordingly, conducted to his cell, but, after a time, he came back, sad and thoughtful. "He is indeed mad now," said he, "misfortune and captivity have alienated his reason, but it is you who have to answer for his madness. When you cast him into that cell, you confined THE GREATEST GENIUS OF THE AGE!!" After this we went away, and since that time he has done nothing but talk of SALOMON'S CAUSE. Adieu! my dear and faithful Henry. Take haste and come back, and pray do not be so happy where you are, as not to keep a little love for me, MARION DELORME.

"THE LATEST NEWS."

A VILLAGE SKETCH.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

LITTLE Grizzy Jones was one of the most intelligent and energetic girls in the village of Pangried: she knew every one, she thought for every one, she acted for every one; she was here, there, and everywhere; she was the friend of everything and everybody; and the more forlorn and helpless things were, the more did Grizzy patronise and protect them. And I may here use the odious term "patronise" in a far higher and better sense than that in which it is usually understood; for in her case it really signified "protection," and had nothing to do with selfishness, or pomp, or fashion. And who was Grizzy Jones? She was believed to be an orphan; her father went away, it was quite forgotten why or how, from the village of Pangried, while she was a baby; and her mother died before she was ten years old. Mrs. Jones had taught the village school until within a few days of her death, and there was nothing left for Grizzy but the furniture of the pretty cottage, excepting a few small matters which the child cherished exceedingly. Everything was sold, and Grizzy was nominally put to board and lodge with a certain Goody Green, who "did for" boys and girls in a way that did not meet with Grizzy's approval, who forthwith determined on "doing for herself," and went to one of the farmers, for the ostensible purpose of looking after the children; though in fact she looked after everything. No matter how humble individuals are, they have power of thought and action; the certainty of good both for themselves and others may be made to follow. Nobody seemed to care who Grizzy was: she belonged to the whole village; and, as far as the interest she took in it was concerned, the whole village belonged to Grizzy. In the harvest-time, that fulfilment of the year's promise, Grizzy would get afield with the early breakfasts, carrying a baby and a basket, and closely followed by a dog—or two—for all the animals followed her; and after giving the child the opportunity of a good healthy plunge in the grass, and decking its hat with flowers, and gathering some healing herbs for Goody Grimes's leg, and some groundsel for Miss Collin's bird, and cutting a straight switch for the poor lame boy, and picking a handful of moss for some one's flower-pot, and grubbing some worms for the old fisherman, Grizzy would sing all the way home; leaving the tokens of her thoughtfulness as she passed the humble tenements; pausing perhaps to lead the blind to a sunny seat, or lift the lame boy to where he could see the harvesters; and then putting the farmer's wife in good humour by tales of an abundant harvest. Grizzy never saw things on the dark side: if an accident happened, she was sure to discover how it might have been much worse; if the sheep broke fold, she found it out in time to prevent much mischief; all the pining turkeys and motherless lambs were brought to Grizzy for cure and protection; the old women knew that her young legs would run their messages; the school-children could depend upon her scholarship; the cat always kitted in her handbox, in the belief that there her kittens would be safe from drowning; and the old curate could rely implicitly on her truth. And yet, though all the women were as her mothers, all the men her fathers, and all the young her brothers and sisters, still, at times, Grizzy felt the crushing of spirit from which she preserved so many. This came upon her in her little room, where only she had time to commune with herself, when the door was closed, and she had tended the maimed puppy, or trampled chicken, placed there by those who knew that if a chance remained for the outraged existence that threatened to forsake its tenement, it would be under Grizzy's protection. When she had cared for these things, and, as the last sweet duty of her waking life, read a chapter in the Bible, it might be that the sacred page was wetted by a tear! She was always ashamed and perplexed at this: things might be so much worse; she was so very happy, and every one was so very good; but it must be so sweet to have an own mother, and an own sister, or even a father or brother; but to have no one who was bound to care for her, no one who loved her just for her own self, not for her usefulness or out of charity, but simply because she was their own! Fearing she sinned even by such small regrets, the village maid would pray longer than usual, and then sleep to waken to the whine of the puppy, or the pipe of the chicken, or at the very first wink of morning.

Girls pass rapidly from ten to fifteen, and still more swiftly from fifteen to twenty. Grizzy had nearly arrived at this critical period without having been what is called "in love." She had not concentrated feelings, shared by every one; and though two "smart farmers" had paid more than usual attention to Grizzy, Grizzy laughed them off, with a mingling of seriousness and fun that put an end to all thoughts of the humble orphan girl, who could so completely neglect "a good opportunity." "Th dear!" she said, "what could I do for James Wilson? he is so well to do, with everything at his command; so prosperous, so comfortable, plenty and to spare, that I should be heartbroken from having nothing to do. Then he lives two miles out of the village! How could I be happy two miles—two whole miles—from all the people?" Tom Harmer was still more unsuited to Grizzy's taste; for he was a middle-aged widower, and hard to the poor, severe to his children, and unkind to animals. Some said that Grizzy would live and die an old maid. There was, however, one person whose affection would have been told to Grizzy
