ANOTHER half-yearly Volume is concluded, and we are proud to say that, through the favour of our Subscribers, SHARPE not only still continues to support its ground, but steadily to increase in public estimation. The utmost attention has been given to maintain that moral and religious tone which renders it a safe and acceptable Journal for family perusal. The works of fiction that give life and interest to its pages are generally admired, and the biographical and miscellaneous articles have been considered by our contemporaries as equal to many in publications of higher pretension. For the only subject of complaint—the sudden cessation of the “Story of a Family”—we have endeavoured to make amends by two long and elaborate notices. Illness has unfortunately prevented the completion of “Lewis Arundel” in the present Volume; but our Subscribers will not have long to wait for the denouement of the story, which will be followed at no long interval by another of no less interest.

SHARPE'S LONDON JOURNAL.

TRIUMPHS OF STEAM.

BY R.

PART I.

OUR readers will readily unite in a tribute of hearty thanks to the mighty locomotive power of the nineteenth century. During the past summer, unrivalled in the annals of travelling, which of them has not been indebted to the agency of steam for some invigorating change of scene, for mountain air or ocean breezes, for rural seclusion or city excitement? City denizens have no small cause to bless the memories of Watt and Stephenson, as emerging from a commodious carriage after an easy ride of fifty or sixty minutes, in less time, and with incomparably less fatigue, than they could walk from Tower Hill to Hyde Park Corner, they find themselves in a new world, amid corn-fields and hop-gardens; or within ten minutes' walk of rocks carpeted with sea-weed, foaming billows, and snowy sea-gulls. Nor are country residents behindhand to honour gratefully those master minds, and congratulate themselves on the existing facilities for exchanging sea-coast scenes for inland beauties, during a few weeks; or peaceful balmy valleys for the bracing breezes of our ocean shores; besides multiplied trips of pleasure and profit to "the great metropolis." Many of us who were mostly confined in our olden excursions to the precincts of our island home, now realize by personal inspection the marvels and the beauties of the Seine, the Rhine, the Danube, and the Bosphorus.

Nor does Britain alone participate in these benefits; Europe and America alike share and enjoy them. In River Navigation our Western brethren have greater advantages to boast of than ourselves, and Jonathan may well praise the memory of Fulton—though he neglected him during his life, and left him to die in penury—as he navigates his stupendous lakes and rivers, revelling, amid their wondrous wilds in every comfort, on board the luxurious steam-boats of the Hudson and the Mississippi. He likes railroads too, as well as steam-coats, and his recorded preference will find an echo in many a bosom on this side of the Atlantic. "I like railroads," says Jonathan; "anybody may hate railroads, despise railroads, or rail at railroads, but I like railroads. I like, when I arrive at the station a quarter of an hour before starting, to be shown into a nice warm room, where the quarter of an hour passes quicker than five minutes in a dirty coach-office or a coffee-room, where the waiters try to look you into a glass of brandy-and-water for the sake of the house, or out of a sixpence for the sake of themselves. I like the ample room of a steam-carriage, where there is no necessity for your neighbours to dig holes in your sides with their elbows, or lay their soft heads upon your soft shoulders. I hate to wait for anything; men must wait, and so must horses, but steam-coaches know no dependence, and are never in love. I like to have to do with porters who charge nothing for being civil, and haven't time to put their hands into their pockets, which is a vulgar and idle habit. I like to travel fast. I dread vicious horses, and feel for distressed ones. I don't like going down-hill—drag-chain breaking—coach upsetting—coachman dying, leaving a wife and twelve children—myself doubled up in a ditch with a broken leg, when I'm going to be married the next week, and no threepenny assurance offices to pay the doctor."

Though far from wishing to depreciate the high advantages of the personal pleasure and health promoted by our "fire-caravans," the benefits conferred by them are seen in an infinitely more important and imposing aspect, when viewed with reference to the substantial results of the wonderfully facilitated intercourse between men and nations in every variety of relationship. Rapidly to glance at the multiform advantages, commercial, social, and civilizing of this puissant locomotive agent, would be to elicit grateful acclamations from peer and peasant, nabob and navy, purseful and poor, traveller and trader, retrospective excursionists of 1850, and expectant Industrial Expositionists of 1851, together eliminating a whirlwind of praise from the thirty-six cardinal points of the compass.

Such as have not before explored the early history of the great discovery of the power of steam, and its application to locomotion, must, in their late journeyings in pursuit of business or pleasure, have burned to know all that can be learned of the past history, the origin, rise, and progress of its wonderful machinery. It is possible some unthinking mortals may step time after time into a railway train without a thought about the origin of railroads or steam-engines. The first might be the effect of the Noachian deluge, and the second, the natural product of some South Pacific Island, with directions for use wrapped up in the boiler, for anything they know or care about, to the contrary. But in this educated age, such cygni nigri must be very rare birds indeed. Few must be the number of those who have not thought o'er the past, replete with the most ingenious and successful inventions and rapid improvements, before the present high state of perfection in our means of travelling has been attained. Ay, and penetrated, too, the distant future in their speculations and provisions of what the further unfolding of the mighty powers of steam and engineering talents will achieve in the world's history. To these the following memorabilia of steam, its existing effects, and gigantic promises, cannot prove wholly uninteresting.

PART II.

OUR first impulse is to look around, and gazing with wonder on the contrast presented between now and then—meaning by the latter adverb the middle of the last century—to explore with ever-increasing admiration the details of the mighty engineering works sounding and abounding in all directions.

But, as our object is rather to sketch the prominent achievements of steam in the history of locomotion, we shall touch very lightly upon the mechanical and scientific, and confine ourselves chiefly to resultant facts in connexion with travel. And as practical water transit, by the impulsion of steam, dates from an earlier period than land traffic by the same agency, we propose (prefixing a very brief outline of the early history of steam and the steam-engine) to treat, first, of aquatic triumphs, and, secondly, of the rail and its grim-headed caravans; subsequently indulging in speculations on the future mighty effects which the power of steam may be expected to impress upon the habitable globe.

Our readers are aware that water increases its bulk about seventeen hundred times, when evaporated under the weight of the atmosphere at the earth's surface. The increase of volume which water thus undergoes by its conversion into steam, is of course diminished or increased in proportion to the amount of pressure under which it may be confined. "A pint of water may be evaporated by two ounces of coals. In its evaporation it swells into two hundred and sixteen gallons of steam, with a mechanical force sufficient to raise a weight of thirty-seven tons a foot high. The steam thus produced has a pressure equal to that of common atmospheric air; and by allowing it to expand, by virtue of its elasticity, a further mechanical force may be obtained, at least equal in amount to the former. A pint of water, therefore, and two ounces of common coal, are thus rendered capable of doing as much work as is equivalent to seventy-four tons raised a foot high." Two hundred feet of steam can be condensed in one second, by four ounces of water, and their expansive force reduced to one-fifth.

The power exerted by steam appears to have been known to some extent at a very early period, although the ancients did not at all comprehend theoretically its source. They had no idea of the expansive force exerted by water in the state of vapour, but imagined that the air expelled from water by heat, exercised in its expulsion that immense power, the existence of which under these circumstances they had discovered. It was left for Dalton and Mariotte to evolve the laws of pressure common to all elastic fluids, though the fact of the elasticity of steam was known in the seventeenth century.

It is interesting to have ascertained that the Greeks and Egyptians derived some practical benefits from their acquaintance with steam; the latter in adding to the imposing effect of their stupendous monuments of industrial labour—the former, in administering to their voluptuous refinement. But the swarthy worshippers of Isis and Osiris, whatever their obligations to steam, would hardly feel flattered while contemplating their great pyramid, five hundred feet in height, standing upon a base measuring seven hundred feet each way, and weighing twelve thousand seven hundred and sixty millions of pounds; requiring for its erection the labour of one hundred thousand men for twenty years, according to Herodotus—could they be made aware of Dr. Dionysius Lardner's calculation that "the materials of this pyramid would be raised from the ground to their present position by the combustion of about four hundred and eighty tons of coals:" which reflection, mathematically expressed, would present to the indignant Pharaohs a rather odd and depreciatory equation. If gratified to know that men of yore profited by their knowledge of steam, there is yet more cause to lament over the abuse of that power in their hands, for it appears to have been pressed chiefly into the service of superstition, and to have aided in promoting the delusions of heathen idolatry.

Dr. Wm. Bell, in a learned and interesting paper on "Æoliophiles, or the Earliest Application of Steam to the Purposes of Superstition," suggests that this jugglery in the use of steam, this prostitution of its power to the designs of infamous pretenders, might have caused its powers, though well known, to remain undeveloped through the series of ages which elapsed before it was shown to the world in its practical application as an agent in arts and manufactures. He believes that a considerable knowledge of the powers of steam was possessed so early as two centuries and a half before the Christian era; and how many centuries might then have elapsed since the first reasoner on the subject had given his discoveries to the world, was hidden in an impenetrable veil of obscurity. Several drawings of human and animal figures have been exhibited by Dr. Bell, showing that each was only a sort of steam-boiler cast in that shape, with one hole for pouring in the water, and another out of which the oracular sounds were to proceed. These figures had been found in England, (the Cauld Lad of Hilton, Staffordshire, and at Basingstoke, Hants,) in Norway, Scandinavia, Germany, the Crimea, and other parts. The priests, it would seem, used them to strike terror into the hearts of their devotees, by the unearthly sounds they emitted, and the mode of use was to stop up one aperture and to raise the steam inside the figure until it attained sufficient power to force out the stopper; the confined steam rushing out with a whistling screeching sound, and filling the place where the devotees were assembled, their minds were soon impressed with the belief that they were in the presence of a supernatural being; and of their fears the priests were not slow to take advantage. Many learned quotations are adduced in support of Dr. Bell's opinion, and reference is made especially to accounts which have come down of a German figure of this kind which, even so late as the sixteenth century, was looked upon as a deity possessed of strange powers.

The Cauld Lad of Hilton, in connexion with which the Manor of Essington, in Staffordshire, was held of the feudal lord of Hilton, was a figure of this kind, the use of which had been converted from paganism to suit the times, when another form of worship prevailed.

The feudal service was, that the lord of Essington should, at a certain period, take a goose into the great hall at Hilton, and drive it three times round the fire, while Jack of Hilton (the image) blew the fire; that then the goose became the property of the lord of Hilton, and the lord of Essington received a mess of meat from the lord of Hilton's table. Now, this was clearly an old Saxon custom, applied as a bond for feudal service. The goose was a bird sacred under the Saxon Edda; the image was the idol of the same heathen system; the fire was the altar; the goose was brought to sacrifice; and the subsequent feasts were but parts of the same pagan rite. One curious figure of this kind is cast in the form of a knight, armed at all points, seated on horseback.

It was known that, in the time of the Crusades, Christian knights who were captured were made to suffer the cruel torture of being roasted to death in their armour, on horseback, and it is very possible that the form of this image might be suggested by the desire to have some imitation of the horrid sport, when the barbarians who practised it had not the means of providing the reality. It has been said that the oracular noises which are reported to have proceeded from the head of the Memnon were caused by water in the interior raised to a high temperature by an Egyptian sun; but these sounds appear more probably to have arisen from the peculiar vibrations excited in the particles composing the granite by the sudden change of temperature at sunrise; for it is well known that some kinds of granite, especially when cleft, emit sounds like those described by Pausanias and Philostratus as emanating from the statue in question.

The earliest detailed record we possess of a veritable steam-machine is that constructed by Hero the philosopher of Alexandria, who collected the science and inventions of the ancients along with some of his own into a systematic treatise written in Greek, more than 120 years before the Christian era. His work on Pneumatics and Steam Machinery was one of the first and finest specimens yielded by the printing-press. Thus the press made the first advances in the interchange of benefits between printing and steam: that steam has fully repaid the attention may be satisfactorily ascertained by a visit to "Captain Hoe's last fast press," which, with four men to supply the blank sheets, and four more to bear away the printed ones as they are issued, works off twelve thousand impressions an hour. The construction of this machine is as beautiful as it is complete, and, notwithstanding its rapidity of motion, it cannot be heard at work in an adjoining room. That nothing may be wanting to secure expedition, it may be added, that Captain Hoe has produced other machinery by which in one hour 3,600 of these newspapers are folded.

Attention was attracted to the power of steam shortly after the printing of Hero's work, and steady progress has attended the prosecution of the study until the present high pitch of efficiency has been attained in steam machinery.

One of the first names appearing in the annals of steam after this period is that of Blasco de Garay, a Spaniard, whose experiments were made about the year A.D. 1543, and of whom we shall again have occasion to speak. Solomon de Caus, a French architect and engineer, a native of Normandy, prosecuted his researches about A.D. 1614. He was evidently ignorant of the elasticity of steam, for his theorem is "that the parts of the element water mix for a time with the parts of the element air; that fire causes this mixture, and that on removing the fire, and dissipating the heat, then the parts of the water mixed with air return to their proper place, forming again part of the water."

In January 1618, David Ramsay, a page of the king's bedchamber, obtained a patent "to exercise and put in use divers new apt formes or kinds of engines, and other pitiable inventions, as well to plough grounds without horse or oxen, and to make fertile as well barren peats, salts, and sea-sands, as inland and upland grounds within the realmes of England, &c. As also, to raise waters, and to make boats for carriages running upon the water as swift in calmes, and more safe in storms, than boats full-sailed in great winds." The water-raising engine, and water-carriages, have long been perfected; and Sir Willoughby d'Eresby has lately added the steam-plough.

A curious æoliphile was constructed by Giovanni Brasca, an Italian, in 1629. It consisted of a close copper vessel, in the shape of a negro's head, which was filled with water, and furnished with a small tube proceeding from the mouth. Steam was generated within, and issuing from the tube, was directed against the vanes of a horizontal flat wheel, turning it round, and thus imparting motion to a pestle and mortar, employed in the alchemist's laboratory.

But the honour of inventing and constructing the first steam-engine at all analogous to the present method of applying the power of steam, is certainly due to Edward Somerset, Marquis of Worcester. If Newton's grand discovery originated in his observation of a ribstone pippin, the Marquis was under equal obligations to an Irish stew. The downfall of an apple attracted the notice of the astronomer; and the upstart of a pot-lid arrested the attention of the mechanician. During his imprisonment in the Tower, as a Royalist agent, the Marquis observed the lid of the saucepan, in which his dinner was preparing, to fly off; and rightly conjectured that the moving power might be applied to a rather more useful purpose. On regaining his liberty, he pursued the idea, and succeeded in constructing a high-pressure steam-engine. Of his work he has left a record, couched in mysterious language, in the well-known volume entitled "A Century of the Names and Scantlings of such Inventions as at present I can call to mind to have tried and perfected, which (my former notes being lost) I have, at the instance of a powerful friend, endeavoured now, in the year 1655, to set these down in such a way as may sufficiently instruct me to put any of them into practice."

It was not, however, until thirty years after the death of the Marquis of Worcester, that the first practical steam-engine was made. This was the condensing engine, invented by Captain Thomas Savary, in the year 1697. Eight years subsequent to Savary's invention, an immense improvement was effected by Thomas Newcomer, an ironmonger, jointly with J. Cauley, an ingenious glazier: Newcomer being the inventor of the principle of the atmospheric engine. Dr. Papin, a Frenchman, introduced about this time the floating piston, and safety-valve, and indicated indeed the atmospheric principle. His countrymen have sought to attribute to him the honour of having invented the steam-engine; but he has no just pretensions to the discovery. The Landgrave of Hesse employed Dr. Papin in 1698, to exert the agency of steam for the purpose of raising water, and his machinery was constructed upon the principle which had been indicated by the Marquis of Worcester. His efforts were unsuccessful; but Leibnitz, who was then residing in England, forwarded to him a description and plans of the engine constructed by Captain Savary; and the Doctor published no account of his own experiments until ten years after Savary had obtained his patent.

Henry Beighton and James Brindley both effected improvements on Newcomer's engine before the giant genius of James Watt appeared to exhibit the vast resources with which the steam-engine was endowed by his unparalleled ingenuity. Before his inventions this mighty machine was still comparatively in its infancy: though it may be said to have been weaned from its juvenile nurses, the cock-boys, and taught to help itself, by one of these attendants, Humphrey Potter, whose duty it was to open and shut the cocks at the required intervals; but a taste, not confined to the sunny shores of Italy, for the dolce far niente, led him to add scoggan, as he called it, (derived from the verb scog, to skulk;) which consisted in a series of strings, by which the cocks were so connected with the moving parts of the machine, that they were opened and shut by its own movements, independently of all outward attention, and with a precision and regularity far superior to that attained by the most attentive of cock-boys. This contrivance was much improved by Brighton, and was the first in that series of inventions which has since rendered the steam-engine so pre-eminent as a self-acting machine.

We must not stay even to mention all Watt's ingenious and most important improvements, among which the Separate Condenser, the Condenser Pump, the Double-acting Engine, the Parallel Motion, and the Governor, are most conspicuous. He obtained his patent in 1769, for the invention of the "Double Impulse" engine by which the steam was made to act above, as well as below, the piston, and which constituted the first great improvement, by which the steam-engine could be successfully employed as the motive power in the propulsion of vessels.

PART III.

This leads us to the next branch of our subject,—the triumphs of steam in the art of Navigation, and affords us the opportunity to redeem our promise of further reference to Blasco de Garay. On the 17th of June, 1543, this Spanish sea-captain experimented before Charles V. at Barcelona, with an engine he had constructed, by which "ships and vessels of the largest size could be propelled even in a calm, without the aid of oars and sails." The ship selected for the experiment was the Trinity, Capt. Peter de Scarza, a vessel of 200 tons burthen, which was made to travel at the rate of three miles an hour. Revolving wheels were attached to the side of the ship, and a prominent part of his apparatus appeared to be a huge kettle of boiling water. No further particulars are known, as the inventor never disclosed the construction of his engine, nor did he make any practical use of it, as it did not find favour in high places, though the Emperor suffered him not to go altogether unrewarded.

Whatever merit Blasco de Garay may have deserved is lost to him, through his selfish taciturnity, and the recognised original inventor of steam-boats is Jonathan Hulls, who obtained a patent for a boat of this description in December 1736, and published an account of his machine in the following year, under this title "Description and Draught of a new-invented Machine, for carrying Vessels or Ships against wind and tide, or in a calm, &c." The "Draught" represents a strong boat, with a smoking chimney, towing a two-decker; wheels are depicted on each side of the stern, to the axis of which six paddles are attached; and motion, originating in a steam-engine, is imparted by ropes passing round the circumference of the wheels. Thomas Paine succeeded Hulls in the study of steam navigation, and sought, indeed, to obtain the credit of having invented steam-boats, but their plans were not reduced to practice. In France, the Comte d'Auxiron, in 1774, and after him J. C. Perrier, conducted experiments on the Seine, but though the latter employed superior machinery, both must be considered to have failed.

A steam-boat was constructed on the Saône, at Lyons, in the year 1781, by the Marquis de Jouffroy. His boat was 147 feet in length. The result of his experiments at this time was far from satisfactory; but more successful on the Rhone and the Seine, in the early part of the present century. It was about this period that Suratti sought in Italy to succeed in the production of practical steam-boats.

We now arrive at an important epoch in our history; the period when Patrick Miller, of Dalswinton, launched the first successful steam-boat in the world. This gentleman, a man of great enterprise and genius, had devoted considerable attention to wheel-boats, and had constructed a twin-boat, with a wheel in the centre, which had safely voyaged to Sweden and back, in the year 1789. The application of wheels to the propulsion of boats was by no means a new invention, for they had even been employed by the Egyptians, the wheels being moved by oxen working in a gin on the deck of the vessel. Such boats also were used by the Romans as transports, men or horses driving the wheels. Mr. Miller was so deeply impressed and affected by the sufferings of sailors from shipwreck, that he spared no energy or expense in his attempts to improve the art of navigation. He was materially assisted in his experiments by Mr. James Taylor, a gentleman engaged as tutor in Mr. Miller's family. Mr. Taylor indeed was the first to suggest the application of steam as the motive power in the wheel-boats; the practicability of which proposal was at first much doubted by Mr. Miller, but he subsequently determined upon making the trial, leaving to Mr. Taylor the chief superintendence of the work. The aid of Mr. William Symington, an Edinburgh engineer, was now sought, who undertook to construct the engines required for the boat.

All preparations for the trial were completed in October 1788, and the boat selected was a twin (or double) pleasure-boat, twenty-five feet in length, and seven feet in breadth: the engine, the cylinders of which were four inches in diameter, was fixed on one side in a strong oak frame; the boiler was placed on the opposite side, and the paddle-wheels were situated in the centre. The experiment was tried at Loch Dalswinton, in Dumfriesshire, and was attended with complete success, the speed obtained being five miles an hour. Encouraged by the very prosperous results of this first attempt, Mr. Miller proceeded to conduct experiments on a larger scale, and accordingly purchased a gabert at the Forth and Clyde Canal, for which Mr. Symington constructed a double engine, at the Carron Foundry, with cylinders eighteen inches in diameter. This vessel was submitted to trial in November 1789, on a level reach of the Canal at Lock Sixteen, about four miles in length, and was witnessed by many spectators, but the insufficient strength of the paddle-wheels precluded a fair experiment. In a memorial to the Chairman of the select committee of the House of Commons, appointed in 1824 to investigate the subject of steam navigation, Mr. Taylor gives the following account of this voyage, and of the more successful one in the following month.

"After passing Lock Sixteen, we proceeded cautiously and pleasantly for some time, but, after giving the engine full play, the arms of the wheels, which had been constructed too slight, began to give way, and one float after another broke off, till we were satisfied no accuracy could be obtained in the experiment, until the wheels were replaced by new ones of a stronger construction. This was done with all possible speed, and upon the 26th of December we again proceeded to action. This day we moved freely without accident, and were much gratified to find our motion nearly seven miles per hour. Next day, we repeated the experiment with the same success and pleasure. Satisfied now that everything proposed was accomplished, it was unnecessary to dwell longer upon the business; for indeed, both this, and the experiment of last year, were as complete as any performance made by steam-boats even to the present day."

The canal was too narrow to admit of this boat working freely, and the banks being injured by the great undulation which the action of the wheels occasioned, it was found necessary to lay it aside.

Satisfied with his success, Mr. Miller relinquished these pursuits in favour of certain branches of agriculture, especially the cultivation of clover grass. He expended in his experiments no less a sum than thirty thousand pounds. The subject was not, however, abandoned by Symington, who commenced business at Falkirk, and received powerful and effective support from Thomas, Lord Dundas of Kerse. This nobleman, a large shareholder in the Forth and Clyde Canal Company, was desirous of introducing steam tug-boats to supersede the use of horses, for towing vessels on that canal, and accordingly engaged W. Symington in a series of experiments for this purpose, in January 1801. A vessel was launched the following year in the month of March, named the "Charlotte Dundas," in honour of the late Lady Milton, the daughter of Lord Dundas; and his lordship, accompanied by Mr. Symington, and other gentlemen, went on board the vessel at Lock Twenty of the canal, which, Mr. Symington tells us, "took in drag two loaded vessels, (the Active and Euphemia,) each upwards of seventy tons burden, and with great ease carried them through the long reach of the Forth and Clyde Canal to Port Dundas, Glasgow, a distance of nineteen miles and a-half, in six hours, although the whole time it blew a very strong breeze right ahead."

To Symington therefore belongs the honour of having produced the "first practical steam-boat." The use to which it was applied had been recommended sixty years before, as we have seen, by Jonathan Hulls, but had never previously been carried into execution. The engine employed was constructed on the principle of Watt's "double-acting engine," to which was united the connecting-rod and crank invented by James Pickard in 1750, and his own patented invention, the union of the crank to the axis of Miller's improved paddle-wheel. "Thus," says Mr. Bennet Woodcroft, to whom we are indebted for other interesting details—"Thus had Symington the undoubted merit of having combined together, for the first time, those improvements which constitute the present system of steam navigation." The ingenuity and perseverance of this engineer seemed likely to obtain the reward he merited of personal advantage, by the successful introduction of steam-boats; for he received from the Duke of Bridgewater an order to build eight boats to ply on his canal, such as that he had built for Lord Dundas. His experiments for the latter nobleman occupied him till April 1803; and the expenses incurred amounted to upwards of 7,000*l*. Alas for the vanity of human expectations! Disappointment was to be the lot of Mr. Symington. The Forth and Clyde Canal Company feared the destruction of the canal banks if steam-vessels were introduced; and "on the same day that Symington was informed by Lord Dundas of the final determination of the committee not to allow steam-boats to be employed on the canal, he received intelligence of the death of the Duke of Bridgewater."

But let us turn our attention to our transatlantic friends, and we shall find that they have not been backward to lend their aid in promoting the accomplishment of navigation by steam. The aspect of the physical features of the United States of America must itself have been a strong incentive to the prosecution of this art. There was the spectacle of their majestic rivers, which ought to have been (and now are) such valuable instruments of internal intercourse, then comparatively useless for such a purpose. The navigation of these noble waters was beset with difficulties, for it was only with extreme labour that boats could return against the stream; the voyage up the river Mississippi from New Orleans to Pittsburgh, a distance of 2,000 miles, only being accomplished by many efforts of rowing, and warping by successive lines fixed to the trees, and occupying a period of from four to nine months—a distance now achieved in a few days. One class of boatmen, indeed, on the Mississippi, dropped down to New Orleans from the interior with their produce in arks, fastened only by wooden bolts, which they unbuilt at the end of the voyage, and after selling the timber, they returned home slowly overland.

As early as the year 1783, James Rumsey and John Fitch conducted experiments on steam-ships in America. Rumsey explained his project of steam navigation to General Washington in 1784, and shortly afterwards Fitch exhibited a model of his proposed boat to the general. Not long after this period, Oliver Evans prosecuted the same study, but John Fitch undoubtedly produced the first steam-boat in the United States. He was born at East Windsor, Connecticut, where he was apprenticed to a watch-maker, and before the revolutionary war he had established himself in the business of clock-making, and engraving and repairing muskets, at New Brunswick, in New Jersey. When this state was overrun by the British troops, he retired to the interior of Pennsylvania, where he employed himself in repairing guns for the American army. He himself states that when the idea first occurred to him of propelling boats by the force of condensed vapour, "he did not know that there was such a thing as a steam-engine in existence." In 1788, he obtained a patent for the application of steam to navigation in the states of Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, &c., and succeeded by unwearied exertion in interesting about twenty persons in his plan, and inducing them to take shares of fifty dollars each. The company was formed under his state patents, the proceedings of which have been recorded by Dr. Thornton, a principal shareholder. He says: "We worked incessantly at the boat to bring it to perfection, and some account of our labours may be seen in the travels of Brissot de Warville in this country; and under the disadvantages of never having seen a steam engine on the principles contemplated, of not having a single engineer in our company, or pay, (we made engineers of common blacksmiths,) and after expending many thousand dollars, the boat did not exceed three miles an hour." Many of the shareholders were discouraged, and wished to abandon the project, but Dr. Thornton and a few others undertook to attain a speed of eight miles an hour within eighteen months, or forfeit all the expenditure on failing.

These terms were accepted, and a second experiment was made. Dr. Thornton says: "I was among the number who proceeded, and in less than twelve months we were ready for the experiment; a mile was measured in Front-street (or Water-street), Philadelphia; every precaution was taken before witnesses, the time was shown to all, the experiments were declared to be fairly made, and the boat was found to go at the rate of eight miles an hour, or one mile within the eighth of an hour." This boat was built in 1787, and subsequently accomplished eighty miles in one day. Governor Miffling, attended by the council of Pennsylvania, came in procession, and presented to the company a superb silk flag, prepared expressly for the occasion, and containing the arms of Pennsylvania. About this time Mr. Fitch visited France, hoping to introduce his invention into that country. This hope was disappointed, owing to the unhappy state of France, then plunged in the horrors of the revolution. On his return to America he made improvements in his boat, but was unable to obtain the necessary means for perfecting his invention. Disheartened and impoverished, he abandoned himself for the temporary alleviation of his distresses to excessive indulgence in strong drink, and "retiring to Pittsburg, he ended his days by plunging into the Alleghany."

Rumsey, a native of Virginia, came to London, where he was backed by a wealthy American merchant, and obtained the support of some enterprising citizens, who defrayed the expenses of his experiments. Unfortunately, the death of Rumsey occurred when his steam-boat was nearly completed, after two years spent in preparations, but his supporters launched the vessel in February 1793, when she was found capable, by repeated trials on the Thames, of attaining the speed of four knots an hour against wind and tide. A boat constructed in 1804, by John Cox Stevens, propelled by a screw, on the principle of the common smoke-jack, travelled with equal velocity, and for a short distance maintained even seven miles an hour. Mr. Stevens, jun. conducted this vessel from the Hudson to the Delaware, thus performing the first sea-voyage that was made in any steam-boat. Although Mr. Stevens spent sixteen years of his life, and 20,000 dollars upon his experiments, they never yielded him any personal advantage; and Robert Fulton died in embarrassed circumstances, though his name is the one chiefly associated with the practical introduction of steam-boats, and he it was who constructed the first vessel of that class employed for public accommodation.

Fulton's father was a native of Ayrshire, but he was himself born in America. "He was brought up," Mr. Bell says, "in the line of a painter, and was an excellent hand-sketcher, and likewise a good miniature painter. He was not brought up an engineer, but was employed to come to this country to take drawings of our cotton and other machinery; that led him to become a civil engineer, and he was quick in his uptake of any thing." Chancellor Livingstone was his great patron, and aided him in building his first boat, which was named the Clermont, after the chancellor's country-seat. His success drew from his biographer, Cadwallader Colden, the following magnificent poetical peroration:—

"A bird hatched on the Hudson will soon people the floods of the Wolga; and cygnets descended from an American swan will glide along the surface of the Caspian Sea. Then the hoary genius of Asia, high-throned upon the peaks of Caucasus, his moist eye glistening while it glances over the ruins of Babylon, Persepolis, Jerusalem, and Palmyra, shall bow with grateful reverence to the inventive spirit of the Western World."

The first "American swan," whose metaphorical progeny were to curl their smoke, if not their necks, above the Caspian waters, first sought its native element on the Hudson River, from the building-yard of Charles Brown, in August, 1807. After some improvements in the arrangement of the paddles, the steam-boat built by Livingstone and Fulton was advertised to start for Albany from New York on a certain afternoon. Fulton's narrative to Judge Story, in his own words, will best describe this voyage. "When I was building my first steam-boat," he said, "the project was viewed by the public at New York either with indifference or contempt, as a visionary scheme. My friends, indeed, were civil, but they were shy. They listened with patience to my explanations, but with a settled cast of incredulity on their countenances. I felt the full force of the lamentation of the poet—

"Truths would you teach, to save a sinking land,
All shun, none aid you, and few understand."

"As I had occasion to pass daily to and from the building-yard while my boat was in progress, I have often loitered, unknown, near the idle groups of strangers gathering in little circles, and heard various inquiries as to the object of this new vehicle. The language was uniformly that of scorn, sneer, or ridicule. The loud laugh rose at my expense; the dry jest, the wise calculation of losses and expenditure; the dull but endless repetition of 'the Fulton folly!' Never did a single encouraging remark, a bright hope, or a warm wish cross my path.

"At length the day arrived when the experiment was to be made. To me it was a most trying and interesting occasion. I wanted many friends to go on board and witness the first successful trip. Many of them did me the favour to attend, as a matter of personal respect; but it was manifest they did it with reluctance, fearing to be partakers of my mortification, and not of my triumph. I was well aware that, in my case, there were many reasons to doubt of my own success. The machinery was new, and ill-made; many parts of it were constructed by mechanics unacquainted with such work; and unexpected difficulties might reasonably be presumed to present themselves from other causes. The moment arrived in which the word was to be given for the vessel to move. My friends were in groups on the deck. There was anxiety mixed with fear among them. They were silent, sad, and weary. I read in their looks nothing but disaster, and almost repented of my efforts. The signal was given, and the boat moved on a short distance, and then stopped, and became immovable. To the silence of the preceding moment now succeeded murmurs of discontent and agitation, and whispers and shrugs. I could hear distinctly repeated, 'I told you so,—it is a foolish scheme. I wish we were well out of it.' I elevated myself upon a platform, and addressed the assembly. I stated that I knew not what was the matter; but if they would be quiet, and indulge me for half an hour, I would either go on, or abandon the voyage for that time. This short respite was conceded without objection. I went below, and examined the machinery, and discovered that the cause was a slight malformation of some of the work. In a short period it was obviated. The boat was put again in motion; she continued to move on. All were still incredulous;—none seemed willing to trust the evidence of their own senses. We left the fair city of New York; we passed through the romantic and ever-varying scenery of the Highlands; we descried the clustering houses of Albany; we reached its shores; yet even then imagination superseded the force of fact. It was doubted if it could be done again, or if, in any case, it could be made of any great value!"

Perhaps the severest struggles of genius are the contentious with unsympathising and unreasoning incredulity which the sons of science have continually to undergo. On his return to New York, Mr. Fulton published the following account of his voyage in "The American Citizen," addressing the editor of that journal.

"SIR,—I arrived this afternoon at four o'clock in the steam-boat from Albany. As the success of my experiment gives me great hopes that such boats may be rendered of great importance to my country, to prevent erroneous opinions, and give some satisfaction to the friends of useful improvements, you will have the goodness to publish the following statement of facts:—

"I left New York on Monday at 1 o'clock, and arrived at Clermont, the seat of Chancellor Livingston, at 1 o'clock on Tuesday;—time, 24 hours; distance 110 miles. On Wednesday, I left the Chancellor's at 9 in the morning, and arrived at Albany at 5 in the afternoon;—distance 40 miles; time 8 hours; equal to nearly 5 miles an hour, &c.

" (Signed) R. FULTON."

Thus this journey of 150 miles was accomplished in the space of thirty-three hours, a distance now occupying considerably less than ten. The Clermont, or North River, as she was also called, was 130 feet in length, and 16½ feet in breadth. The engine, made by Boulton & Watt, was of 18-horse power; the boiler of which was 20 feet long, 7 feet deep, and 8 feet broad; the cylinder being 24 inches in diameter, and the stroke of the piston 4 feet. She continued to run between New York and Albany, and was soon crowded with passengers; but the Clermont was not suffered to navigate the Hudson unmolested; for the boatmen plying on the stream, fearing that the intruder would ultimately supersede their slower craft, purposely ran foul of her, seeking to inflict damage; and so persevering were these attempts, that the legislature found it necessary to enact a law "to punish, by fine and imprisonment, any person who attempted to destroy or injure her." Perhaps the boatmen sought also to retaliate for the alarm they suffered on her first appearance, which is thus related by C. Colden:—

"On her passage from New York to Albany, the Clermont excited the astonishment of the inhabitants of the shores of the river, many of whom had never heard even of an engine, much less of a steam-boat. She was described by some, who had indistinctly seen her passing in the night, as a monster moving on the waters, defying the winds and tides, and breathing flame and smoke. She had the most terrific appearance from other vessels which were navigating the river when she was making her passage. The first steam-boat (as others yet do) used dry pine-wood for fuel, which sends forth a column of flame several feet above the flue; and whenever the fire is stirred, a shower of sparks fly off, which in the night have a brilliant and beautiful appearance. This uncommon light first attracted the attention of the crews of other vessels. Notwithstanding the wind and tide were adverse to its approach, they saw with astonishment that it was rapidly advancing towards them; and when it came so near as that the noise of the machinery and the paddles was heard, the crews, in some instances, shrank beneath their decks from the terrific sight, and others left their vessels to go on shore; others, again, prostrated themselves, and besought Providence to protect them from the approach of the horrible monster, which was marching on the tides, and lighting its path by the fires which it vomited."

Fulton was by no means the inventor, but he was the successful introducer of steam-boats. He had frequently inspected the Charlotte Dundas of Symington, while she was lying at Lock Sixteen; and had adopted Symington's invention. The engine itself he purchased of Messrs. Boulton & Watt, it is said under an assumed name; and for the forms and proportions of his vessel, he was indebted to the calculations of Colonel Beaufoy. After the Clermont there followed in succession from Brown's Yard, the Rariton, the Car of Neptune, the Paragon, and the Fire Fly. Before his death, which took place in 1815, Fulton had the satisfaction of seeing steam navigation introduced in both the old and new hemispheres. Thirty years after his first experiment on the Hudson it was computed that 1,300 steam-boats had been built in the United States, of which 260 had been lost by various accidents. The first explosion, an example since so widely and fearfully followed in America, is believed to have occurred in the Washington on the Ohio River, in the year 1816.

A profound thought, issuing from the secluded study of some deep thinker, oftentimes has conferred more benefits upon the world than the life-performances of its most energetic actors. Yet to a casual observer the quiet scholar would be an object of incomparably inferior interest to the successful practitioner. So Symington's Charlotte Dundas, layed up at Lock Sixteen, might have been regarded by careless spectators as a useless abortion. This vessel was, however, the germ of steam navigation in America as well as in Europe. We have seen that the first practical American steam-vessel, the Clermont, originated in Fulton's inspection of the Charlotte Dundas, and in like manner the first boat of this description used for the service of the public in Great Britain, was built by Bell, after the same model. Indeed, Symington's vessel is pronounced "superior in its mechanical arrangements to either Fulton's Clermont, or Bell's Comet."

It would appear that the American was indebted to Mr. Bell for the attraction of his attention to his successful pursuit. The latter had fruitlessly endeavoured to excite the interest of the British Government in his experiments; first in 1800, afterwards in 1803, and again in 1813. Conscious of the valuable results which would accrue from the employment of steam as a ship-propelling power, he explained his object to many foreign governments, including that of the United States; and the last-named government, when he explained the great utility that steam navigation would be to them on their rivers, they appointed Mr. Fulton, as he states in a letter written, in 1824, to John Macneil, Esq., of Glasgow, to correspond with him; "so in that way," he concludes,

This gentleman, a native of Helensburgh, completed his first vessel on the 18th of January, 1812. He built it of 40 feet keel, and 10½ feet beam, and fitted it with an engine of three horse power. She was named the Comet, (because a comet had appeared that year, in the north-west part of Scotland,) and was established on the Clyde as a passage-boat between Glasgow and Greenock. At first the speculation did not prove very profitable to the proprietors, the expenses being scarcely cleared during the first year; "for so great," says Bell, "was the prejudice against steam-boat navigation, by the huc and cry raised by the fly-boat and coach proprietors, that for the first six months very few would venture in her. But in the course of the winter of 1812, as she had plied all the year, she began to gain credit; as passengers were carried twenty-four miles as quick as by the coaches, and at a third of the expense, besides being warm and comfortable. But even after all, I was a great loser that year. In the second year I made her a jaunting boat all over the coasts of England, Ireland, and Scotland, to show the public the advantage of steam navigation over the other mode of sailing." The voyage was accomplished in three hours and a half, and the fares demanded were three shillings for the second, and four for the best cabin.

After the efficiency of the Comet became apparent, the number of travellers speedily increased; for whereas previously eighty up and eighty down formed the average number of passengers, four years afterwards, as Stuart informs us, "it was not unusual for five or six hundred persons daily to enjoy the healthful amusement of a water excursion, and the enchanting beauties of the Clyde." Emulation was soon excited by this success in many parts of the kingdom: the efficacy of steam-boats was fully established, and they quickly multiplied. In 1812 there was "but one in the United Kingdom, the solitary Comet: in 1820 there were 43; in 1830 there were 315; in 1840 they numbered 824, and in 1848 they had increased to 1,100; when their aggregate length, it has been calculated, was 125,283 feet; their aggregate breadth 19,741 feet, their aggregate tonnage 255,371 tons, and their aggregate of horse-power 92,862. Among other enterprises, Mr. Lawrence of Bristol introduced a steam-boat on the Severn, which he afterwards conveyed to London, to ply on the Thames; but met with so much opposition from the watermen, who dreaded such a powerful rival, that he was compelled to withdraw his vessel, which was subsequently sent to Spain. Obstacles of this nature could no more be tolerated on the Thames than on the Hudson; and accordingly Mr. Dawson, who had previously experimented in Ireland, established a steam-boat on that river in 1818, to run between London and Gravesend. She was named the Margery, and started daily from the Dundee Arms, Wapping. Her wheels were uncovered, and afforded a famous subject of ridicule to the watermen by their tremendous splashing.

Sometimes by collision these wheels were broken, and the vessel was delayed for an "hour or so," "before a jury duck-foot could be fitted, and, perhaps, before another mile was done, there was another break and another stoppage." This steamer was not well supported; she had many disadvantages in her construction, not the least of which was "shooting off," not only steam but boiling water, which inflicted severe scalds; and after a short trial she was abandoned as a failure. The Old Thames, and afterwards the Majestic, succeeded the Margery, and river steam-boats soon became general.

These earlier ones occupied, it is true, from five to seven hours in their transit from London to Gravesend, but even this speed was an improvement upon the rates achieved by the sailing-boats, which occupied four-and-twenty hours, and sometimes a day and a half in effecting the voyage. The old "tilt-boats" are still remembered, which were exactly like the present Trinity House ballast-lighters. These "were succeeded by the Dundee boats," as quoted in Porter's Progress of the Nation, "which, as fast sailers, were the wonder and admiration of all who witnessed the improvement. They were, however, of the most inconvenient nature, as the passengers were frequently not only called upon to embark in the middle of the night, in order to have the first of the flood, and after tacking and beating about, together with sometimes too much wind, sometimes too little wind, or none at all, besides being huddled in a low inconvenient cabin, were frequently, after being six or eight hours on the water, compelled to land at Woolwich, Blackwall, or Greenwich, and then have to find their way in the best manner they could to the metropolis." The distance (thirty-one miles) is now performed in less than an hour and a half. The rate of increase in the number of river-steamers has been as follows:—In 1820 there were only four; in 1835 they equalled forty-three in number; and in the present year (1850) they have increased to sixty-nine. We learn from a correspondent of the Morning Chronicle that these steamers perform 120 trips daily up and down the river, the average number of passengers each run being 1,280, and the average amount paid during the season in transit by river steamers exceeding 255,170*l*. These boats have conveyed during the six months this year of "the season," which is supposed to begin on Easter Monday, no fewer than 27,955,200 passengers; the amount thus expended, as we have seen, exceeding a quarter of a million sterling. Nearly 800 persons are now employed in the steam navigation of the Thames, and it is calculated that on this river no less than 8,280 miles are performed daily by river steam-boats.

In the meantime steam navigation has not been confined to rivers. Steam-vessels were soon adventured, and with complete success, upon the performance of dangerous coasting voyages, connecting all the chief ports in the kingdom; and were boldly and safely steered across Dover Straits and the Irish and St. George's Channels. But the noblest triumph is the successful navigation of the Atlantic Ocean, realizing to some extent that bridge of nations which lends such material aid in uniting all countries into one nation, one kindred, one tongue. The details of this and other very interesting portions of our history must be reserved for a future number.

THE ROSE.

BY R. M. W.

Live like the rose. So bud, so bloom,—
In growing beauty live;
So sweeten life with the perfume
That gentle actions give.

Die like the rose; that when thou'rt gone,
Sweet happy thoughts of thee,
Like fragrant rose-leaves, may be strewn
Upon thy memory.

MRS. DAY OF COMB HILL.

BY J. M. W.

"Who is Mrs. Day?" and "Where is Comb Hill?" asks the impatient, go-a-head reader, gifted with the new spirit of progress, which desires to arrive at a journey's end before starting, and will, in no wise, be contented with the old fashion of beginning all things at the beginning. Patience! patience! my volatile friend. You shall learn the answer to both those questions in due time. It is, indeed, the express business of this present article to enlighten you on the subject.

To begin with the second question—"Where is Comb Hill?" You know, I suppose, the quiet village of Linley. No? You astonish me! Well then, of course, you know the post-town of Topham. No? How very extraordinary! What would the Topham people think, I wonder, if they heard of such ignorance? You don't know the town of Topham! You never heard of it in your life! Well, well! I would advise you to keep that ignorance to yourself whenever you chance to walk through the said town. Why, the very children would point the finger at you, in scorn, and say, "There's a fellow that never heard tell of our town. Ain't he a bit outlandish, I expect!"

As your geographical knowledge is so very limited, I am compelled to take a wider range at once, and ask you if you ever heard of an English county called Kent? Oh! you have heard of that—have even been into it? Now then, be pleased to take a map of the said county, and somewhere between Greenwich and Dover, and between Herne Bay and Seven Oaks, you will find the small town of Topham, within six miles of which is Linley; and two miles to the north of Linley stands Comb Hill. Though the map will show you the latitude and longitude of the place, it will give you no idea of what it is like. That, I must endeavour to do. It will be a pleasant task; for I love Linley and Comb Hill, and I should like to make other people love them, too.

Linley is a small village quite unknown to tourists; it is six miles off a turnpike road. The old by-roads leading to it are scarcely worthy to be called roads at all. I don't suppose they have been mended for the last fifty years. They remind me of the famous Scotch couplet, which we give in plain English—

"If you had seen these roads before they were made You'd hold up your hands and bless General Wade."

And they also convince me that there is nothing of the nature of an Irish bull in the said couplet, for the roads all about Linley are roads before they are made. They want making terribly. Any wheeled thing lighter or more elegant than a farm waggon, feels the shock of the journey to Linley very much. In dry weather, they consist of century-old ruts and large flint stones, bristling up, thick as children in St. James's Park on a Sunday evening; in wet weather, of mud a foot thick, and innumerable pools formed by drippings from the over-hanging boughs of the hedges, which are rarely cut, and when they are cut, the boughs are left lying over the road till they rot away. You may get over the ground tolerably well on horse-back, but in a chaise or light carriage, or on foot, progress through the Linley lanes is not easy. To add to the difficulty of these lanes, they are all up or down hill; for there is no level ground about Linley. The pretty village itself lies on a hill in a broad valley. Its situation is very beautiful, and reminds those familiar with the scenery in the north of England of some places in Westmoreland and Cumberland, only the hills are less lofty than the fells there. The great characteristics of the place are its secluded, old-world look, its perfect quiet, and extreme simplicity. The valley of Linley is broad and winding—no river passes through it; the hills are high and have the most beautifully bold and varied outlines, occasionally gliding imperceptibly one into another, and forming new folds in the valley at every turn. The soil hereabouts is not rich; there is little wood and no water; the chalky soil is, however, prolific in wild flowers, which throng all the hedge-rows, and every uncultivated patch of ground, of which there are many on the tops of the hills, mingled with gorse and broom, heath and briars; while the finely sweeping sides of the hills are covered with corn-fields, at this season (the end of July) yellowing to the harvest. The barley and wheat on these upland ranges do not grow quite so thick and rich as in the lower part of Kent, but they are as beautiful to look at; indeed, more beautiful, because you can see the wind rush up or down the whole of the side of a steep hill, and bend the graceful cars before it. It is a pleasant thing to stand on the top of a hill, planted from top to bottom with oats, and see the slightest breeze ripple their surface like the waters of a lake on a calm day. This Linley Valley is all one farm, of about nine hundred acres. It belongs to Mr. Richard Chester, who manages it himself, and lives in the old Linley Court-House, with his family. Linley Court is a strange old place, half farm and half manor-house. Straight, ugly, and convenient on one side—ivy-grown and ruinous on another—straggling, picturesque, snug, and home-like on a third. The bosky, old-fashioned garden lies on this side of the house; and, separated from it by a low stone wall, is the churchyard, in the midst of which, right opposite Mrs. Chester's parlour-window, rises the ivy-mantled tower of the church. When I first went down on a visit to Linley Court, I was particularly struck with this arrangement of things, and was very fond of sitting on the said stone wall, under the shade of the huge old yew-tree, in the corner of the churchyard. The advantages of this position were obvious. I commanded the old garden, with its thickets of sweet-smelling flowers—roses, lilies, honeysuckles, jessamine, sweet peas, and clove pinks, which seemed to spring up of themselves, in all corners, in the greatest luxuriance. I could see into the parlour—even see myself reflected in the high looking-glass over the mantelpiece, if I were disposed to lean forward for that purpose. I could hear the merry voices and sweet laughter of Mary and Carey Chester as they went about the house engaged in their ordinary domestic employments. I could hear the younger ones, at the far end of the garden, engaged in their childish games. Then, I had but to turn my head half round, and, from the spacious house, ringing with the sounds of life, I was transported, in a moment, to the narrow silent houses of the dead. Beneath the long, green, sunny grass,

"Where heaves the turf in many a mouldering heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

I loved in those days to "muse on graves, and worms, and epitaphs;"—all young people are inclined to be "sad as night for very wantonness." When they grow older they find that the sadness of night will come unbidden, unwished for; and that it is no pleasure, any more, to be very wretched. Still, even now, that I have grown older, I love to sit on the churchyard wall at Linley and listen to the domestic sounds from the house mingling with the full, solemn, imaginary music sent up from the silent graves so close at hand. And while I listen and muse, (for I can't call it thinking,) my eye wanders away to the north, where Comb Hill rises, capped by what, in this chalky district, is a respectable sweep of wood. From this seat under the yew-tree you have a very good view of Comb Hill: and a very fine, bold elevation it is, with its great sides rich with waving crops.

One morning, during a July spent at Linley, I rose early, intending to finish a water-colour sketch of Comb Hill from my favourite seat, before the heat of the day came on. By six o'clock I had established myself, my book, and my colour-box, to my satisfaction, and was beginning to work, when I thought I heard a sob near me. Somewhat startled, I looked round, (without rising,) first in the garden and then in the churchyard, and could see nothing. Again the sob came; and other sobs, deeper and more convulsive, followed. This time I was sure the sound came from the churchyard;—from the other side of the yew-tree. I shifted my position a little, and then I saw a woman on the other side of the tree. She knelt beside a grave—a child's grave—which I had often noticed, because it was so carefully trimmed. The woman had her back turned towards me. She was bowed down, with her head nearly resting on the grave; occasionally she uttered parts of her prayer aloud, and her voice sounded touchingly pathetic. She was poorly dressed. Though I did not recognise her, I concluded she was one of the villagers, and, feeling that involuntary respect which deep grief always inspires, I moved away gently, and did not return to my place till an hour afterwards, when she was gone. At breakfast I mentioned the circumstances, and asked if any one could conjecture who the poor woman was. I was told at once that it was "Mrs. Day, of Comb Hill."

"Is that her child," I asked, "that is buried under the yew-tree?"

"Yes. It is fifteen years ago since it died," said Mrs. Chester.

"Her grief is long-lived. Has she any other children?" I asked.

"No; and she never had any but this one. Little Alice Day was nine years old when she died. She was an intelligent little creature, and the prettiest child in these parts. Her mother almost broke her heart when Alice died; and though she has become externally cheerful again, and resigned to her loss, yet I have always thought she has not forgotten the child. It was about this time in the year she died. Indeed, I think this day, the twenty-fourth of July, is the anniversary."

"If it is so, mother," said Carey Chester, "we had better put off our intention of going up to Comb Hill to-day. We were all going there to show J—the prospect from Day's cottage, and we had promised the children they were to go too, and have tea with Mrs. Day under the great walnut-tree."

"I certainly think you had better defer your visit for a day or two, after what J—tells us she saw this morning. Go on Monday; Mrs. Day will be glad to see you all, especially the little ones."

When the important Monday arrived, I was up in the history of the Days. John Day was the owner of a small farm on Comb Hill, called by that name. Sixty acres of freehold elevated him above the rank of labourer, though he laboured hard enough, nearly all the year round, on his little estate. He was very industrious, and chose for his wife a young woman who had lived as a housemaid with Mrs. Chester when she was first married. Sarah was a jewel of a wife, as John Day soon discovered. She was affectionate, good-tempered, and sensible; thrifty, active, and a capital manager. When they had a thriving, healthy girl, there were no people in all Kent happier than John Day and his wife; now, though they were a much sadder couple than formerly, they were believed to be contented. They lived alone in their cottage upon Comb Hill Farm, far away from any habitation; they seldom saw any one but the two men who worked for them, and the girl who helped Mrs. Day in her dairy and house work.

It was a fine afternoon when we set off to go to Comb Hill Farm. The sky was cloudy, which was a great relief from the burning heat of the sun. I and one of the little girls, who were not considered capable of walking so far, without being knocked up at the end of the journey, were mounted upon ponies. The others, Mary and Carey, William and Richard, Phœbe and Jack, with their eldest brother Charles armed with a thick stick, to keep us all in order, as he said, were to walk. We were a merry party, and the elder portion soon got into some pleasant talk about travelling, and foreign countries, and celebrated mountains and lakes. I, however, did not take part in it long, for my attention was irresistibly attracted to the beautiful scene around. When we left Linley Court, the old road first went down a hill, and then began to ascend again; which the reader will not think very surprising, as I have already informed him that the place was built on a hill in the midst of a valley, and that consequently every road from it must first go down a hill, and then up another. This ascending road was overshadowed by tall, impending hedges, for the first half mile; and nothing could be seen but the lovely greenery on each side, and the profusion of wild flowers, which the children, as usual, stopped to gather by handfull. At last we came out on the edge of a wide piece of upland common, from which there was a beautiful view of part of the valley. Over this common our grass-grown road lay. Even a stranger in these parts could have found out the road, by the deep cart ruts in it; but in nothing else did it differ from the rough stony grass land of the common. Higher and higher we went, and every five minutes I gave my pony a rest that I might look behind me, over the gradually widening landscape. Hills behind hills seemed to be piled up in every direction, as far as the eye could reach. Near at hand, just below us, lay Linley village, with its church and court-house, nestling, as it seemed, in the deepest part of the valley. At last we had reached the edge of the wood which skirted the top of the fine hill; and before we plunged into the narrow road which led through part of it, to the house which was our destination, we all turned to look back again. All the Chester family, unlike many people born and bred in the country, had a full appreciation of the beauties of nature which surrounded them, and I heard little Kitty, who was ten, tell little Jack, who was nine years old, that she liked this prospect better than the famous one from Blue Bell Hill between Maidstone and Rochester, which she had seen the week before. When I asked her why she liked it best, she said, "Oh! for a great many reasons." First, because "home was in it;" then again, "because it did not look as if any one had tried to make it look pretty, as the Blue Bell Hill view did." Then "she liked this best because there were so few houses to be seen;" she "liked to see nothing but beautiful hills like those, with sheep on them, or great fields of corn." Lastly, "she liked this view because she always saw it when she went to see dear Mrs. Day."

I did not think Kitty's reasons so bad;—although Charles patted her on the shoulder compassionately, and said, "Well, well, Kitty! Let us live in hope that you may be able to give something like a reason for a preference some day."

Kitty was quite satisfied with her reasons;—and pushing her pony close to mine, said she hoped I was so too. This Comb Wood, although in nothing like an American primeval forest, gave me the idea of great antiquity. The trees were none of them lofty or large; they were, for the most part, of stunted growth, gnarled and fantastic, sending out all their strength on one side, and leaving the other withered and twigless. Their knotted entangled boughs, their moss-covered trunks, and roots half bare of earth, looked very old; as if they had lived in their deformed state, beyond the length of life of more favoured, full-grown trees. Ferns grew in profusion, and to a good height here, "muffling the feet" of the old oaks and elms. The wood was very dark and cool, and the smell of the ferns and the underwood was delicious, as we went slowly through it. No sound of birds was heard; it was too early in the afternoon, and too late in the year. No sound of brook or bubbling stream was there;—all was still, solemnly still, in that old wood;—and as we pass through, we look on this side and on that, in silence; or, if we spoke, we spoke in a subdued tone, as if there were a sort of sanctity in this leafy solitude. We had gone on for a quarter of a mile when the trees became fewer, it was lighter, and the air blew on our faces again more freely.

"Here we are, at the beginning of Day's farm," said Charles Chester, who led the way, and my pony, lest it should stumble in the dark wood.

We were now fairly out of the wood; but its still seclusion was not gone. There were some fields of corn, a small meadow with some pretty cows feeding, a fine old orchard full of apple and cherry trees; and in the midst of this little farm stood a little house, sheltered by a large tree;—the very walnut tree under which we were to take tea, and of the fruitfulness of which I had heard such marvels. How, last year, John Day had gathered forty sieves for pickling, and then left more than as many again to ripen. It was famous through all the country round, was John Day's walnut tree. Our party made for the house. Some of the younger ones ran on first, to give notice of our coming, and brought out Mrs. Day to meet us. She was the same person I had seen weeping in the churchyard. Now she looked somewhat different. Her gown, instead of being of cotton, was of black stuff, her cap and muslin kerchief were as white as soft water and pure air would make them; she had a little black and grey shawl pinned crosswise over her breast, and over the ends of it was tied a white holland apron. Her dress was highly characteristic. Neat, clean, and without any shadow of adornment, or of indication that any changes in fashion came under her notice.

Now that I could see her face, I admired it. She was upwards of fifty, and though she looked older, there was a great deal of activity and vigour about her. Her blue eye was dimmed, but was full of intelligence; the hair was grey, and the face was pale, but not much withered;—and the mouth had nothing of the coarseness which I had observed among the older men and women of the labouring class in this part of Kent. Mrs. Day had a pure Saxon look and expression. She did not abound in words, which is also another Saxon point of character;—but it is very likely it was a habit acquired from living so much alone, in a situation where nothing new ever happened;—and so there was nothing to talk about. She looked pleased to see her “young mistresses,” as she called Mary and Carey; and brightened all over with pleasure when she was surrounded by a group of clamorous children.

“How do you do?”—“Did you expect us?” “Mamma sent a cake—has it come?” “We want to have tea under the walnut-tree, Mrs. Day.” “Ah! may we make a fire and boil the kettle out here?” “Oh! Mary, Mary, she says we may; and that we may have the little tea-things out.” “Oh! what a dear, kind old creature she is!” And the little things fell to jumping round Mrs. Day, and kissing her after the manner of young human beings when they have got what their hearts are set on.

Mrs. Day welcomed me with the courtesy of a kind heart, and led me into her house, that I might sit down to rest. There was a small garden immediately round the cottage, and this was literally crammed with flowers. They were not of rare kinds, but they were fine, and so closely planted, that the garden looked like a small flower show,—one variegated mass of colour. Mrs. Day seemed pleased to have her garden commented on.

“I wish you had come up here a week ago, ladies. Now, all my best flowers are going off. Here is one damask rose-tree, ma’am; isn’t that a fine one? I can’t count the roses; and see what a many more buds there are to come out. I shall have some very fine carnations out in a day or two.”

As I looked round, I cast my eye upon a small square piece of ground under one of the windows, which was more brilliant than the rest; in the midst was a white rose-tree, still in flower. Carey Chester stopped me as I was about to make some remark on this.

“Don’t say anything about that. It was her little girl’s garden, and she still takes more pains with that than with all the rest of the garden put together. If she likes you, she will, perhaps, give you a rose from Alice’s tree. It will be a great mark of favour.”

Mrs. Day led the way into her cottage. There was a passage paved with red-brick, which led straight through the house. On one side of this passage, a door opened into what Mrs. Day called her best room, and on the other side was a door which opened into the kitchen. As there was an old sofa in the best room, and as it was the best room, I was made to go there to rest. Not that I was in the least tired, but everybody chose to fancy I was. When Mrs. Day had established me to her satisfaction on the sofa, the children came tumbling over the uneven bricks of the passage, asking where they were to put their hats and gloves, and what they could do towards getting tea ready. A door in the best room was opened, which I had thought was a closet-door, and displayed an upward staircase. As the children expressed a wish to go up stairs, and see what there was new, since they were there last, Mrs. Day took them up; and I heard their little feet and their merry voices over head for some moments; then they came down again, and Mrs. Day in the midst of them, carrying Kitty in her arms.

“Now, you must get out the playthings, dear Mrs. Day,” said Kitty—“I know where they are. They are in that thing,” pointing to an old walnut-wood book-case. “We only want to look at them, you know; and then you must tell us about little Alice again. I love to hear of her.” And the pretty over-indulged darling pointed her little white finger at the book-case, and then looked coaxingly in Mrs. Day’s face. Mrs. Day could not resist that look; but began feeling in her pocket immediately for a bunch of keys, and selecting one, she put it into the lock of the book-case. The door was opened, and displayed, carefully arranged, the mother’s treasure—her dead child’s playthings. There were the little ten-things all in a row. These were taken out, and put on a table, to the great delight of the children. There was a wax doll all discoloured, and with its face sadly cracked, that lay in a doll’s cradle. The children looked at this with reverent, half-dismayed faces. They did not quite understand what it was to die; but they knew that Alice had been like themselves, a great many years before; that she took great pride and pleasure in her doll; and that she had never lived to be a woman; but had died when she was nine years old, and was buried under the yew-tree. Then there was a little wooden cart she had had given her, when she was two years old, by their own mamma; and a box of Tonbridge-ware toys. Mrs. Day took the lid off, for them to see, but she would not let them touch one of the things inside, because little Alice had last put them in, with her own hands. There was a little tumbler and a housewife and a pair of scissors; and there was a Bible and prayer-book. All these things Mrs. Day held in her own hands, while the children stood in a group round her, and asked their simple questions about how long Alice had this or that, in a whisper. It seemed as if they half fancied she was near, and might hear them. At last everything had been seen and talked of;—Mrs. Day closed the book-case once more; and they all went slowly out into the garden, leaving me to meditate on what I had seen. In less than ten minutes I heard a loud shout of young voices under the walnut-tree, and, peeping out at the window, I saw Mrs. Day giving little Jack a ride on her back. She looked as if the presence of children could always make her gay. Finding that my proper companions had disappeared, I got up and stole into the kitchen, which I liked much better than the best room. It was small, low, and scrupulously clean. It had a wide, projecting chimney, in which no fire was, nor had been all that summer, if I was to judge by the brightness of the bars, and the gorgeous beau-pot of double poppies, which filled up the space within them. There were two old arm-chairs, beside the fire-place, under the chimney. I had to stoop my head to sit down in one of these chairs; beside it was a little round table, on which lay an old Bible, Mrs. Day's spectacles, a thimble, and some thread; and in a little recess in the wall, beside the fire, a few old books of a religious nature,—“The Whole Duty of Man,” “Blair's Sermon's,” “Hervey's Meditations.”

I got out from the chimney-ingle again, and examined one or two plants in pots, which stood in the room. These were a small orange-tree, a fine geranium, a calceolaria, and a cineraria. These looked as if she had bestowed much pains upon them. On the walls were some strange, old, coloured engravings, representing Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, as female figures, in the most wonderful costumes, and with singular attendants, selected from the wildest beasts. There was an old telescope supported by two iron nails in the wall; there was also a tall, narrow looking-glass, hung, slantingdiagonal, on the wall. Over the low-browed chimney was a shelf, and on this were ranged a few bright brass candlesticks, a spice-box, a tobacco-box, and a flour-dredger. The floor was covered with a patched carpet, the windows had little dimity curtains; there was a walnut-wood bureau, and a table of the same wood. I could see no signs of any kitchen work ever being performed there. Upon further investigation of the premises, I found Ann, a stout girl who was Mrs. Day's maid, domesticated in the washhouse, which was a much larger apartment than any other in the house, and did duty as kitchen, and dairy, and scullery. I had scarcely got back to my place on the sofa in the best room, when Carey and little Kitty came to fetch the cups and saucers, and to tell Ann to carry out the large table from the best room. In a few moments we were all actively engaged in setting out the evening meal, under the walnut-tree. I must not forget to state that there was a small table as well as a large one; and, that at the small table the small folks sat, and drank tea out of the small cups and saucers which had once belonged to little Alice. These playthings Mrs. Day always brought out when any well-behaved children came to see her, though she never allowed any one but herself to handle anything else which had belonged to her darling. It is said that little Alice used to have the little cups placed on a table beside her bed during her last illness, and would play at having a party to tea; and that just before she died, when she knew that she was dying, she told her mother to be sure and let any little girls, who came to the house when she was dead and buried, make tea in those pretty cups; “for you know, mother dear, it will remind you of the happy times I spent with them, when you would pretend to be a lady come to take tea with me. You must play at that sometimes when I am gone.”

And Mrs. Day played at pretending to be a lady come to take tea with Kitty that evening, and though she looked pale at first, and the tears were in her eyes, yet Kitty and Jack played such odd tricks, and said so many droll things, that her bitter recollections passed away. Mary Chester presided at the large tea-table, and made tea for us grown-up people, while Mrs. Day sat with the children.

“Look at her,” whispered Charles; “is Pascal's aphorism applicable to her, ‘Peu de chose nous console parceque peu de chose nous afflige?’” or would you say rather, ‘Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning?’”

“I would say neither. Pascal's mot is a little too contemptuous of human nature, and the ‘weeping that endureth for a night’ designates a sorrow of a short and violent nature; not one like this, which has endured for fifteen years. It is out of the very depths of the grief which has endured so long, that Mrs. Day can take part in the joy of children, and this joy is indeed but the inversion of her grief. She is evidently a woman whose heart would have been ‘too happy in its happiness,’ had she been the mother of many children. God saw fit to deprive her of her only one, and she has learned to be resigned to His will, even while the sorrow has clouded her life. Let us go and talk with her. It must be good for all of us to converse with such a being. She looks like a truly good woman.”

“She is what she looks like,” said Charles; “her husband told my father once, that ‘her price is above rubies,’ and that ‘he verily believed God had taken her child away from her to try her spirit, and see whether it would become rebellious; that there never was a woman who put more control upon her feelings; not even before him, in the first year after her loss, would she weep aloud for little Alice.’”

I thought of the passionate sobs and the fervent prayers which I had heard uttered under the yew-tree over the grave, a few days before, and I could not but respect the woman whose heart was so steadfast, that even the sorrow of years long passed by, lived within her, and became a bond of union between her and God.

When our evening meal was finished, we sent the little ones to play in the orchard, while we sat round our hostess, under the walnut-tree, and she told us many a simple tale, stored in her mind during the fifty years of her life; tales of which she knew the actors; often, indeed, she was an actor in them herself. They were all, or chiefly, about Linley folks; and many of them were about children who died young. Children seemed ever dearer to her heart than adults. With what tenderness she spoke of them; how she loved to repeat their clever sayings and descant on their pretty ways! She was a real “Children's Friend,” and was in high favour with all the young folks for five miles round. About eight o'clock she rose and said, "Now, ladies, I must go and see that my John's supper is ready. Ann sometimes forgets it, and he will be home soon, I expect. He's had a long day over the hill getting in the oats."

"We had better think of returning, now," said Mary, when she had gone. "Old Day and his wife go to bed at half-past eight; and we will not infringe on their habits. William, will you see about the ponies; and you, Richard, will you bring the children to the house?"

The children grumbled a little, after their childish fashion, at being obliged to go away so early. They are wont to believe that pleasure will or ought to last for ever. Before we left, John Day came home; a hale, fresh-coloured old man, with a steady, pleasant countenance. He greeted us all heartily and respectfully, said he was "glad we had kept his old woman company while he was away;" that "the days was long and lonesome to her, biding all day in the house by herself."

"But I don't bide in the house all day, John," replied his wife; "or how would we have such a garden?" and she looked at her flowers with pride.

"Ah! that's true; she's a fine hand at a garden, isn't she, Mr. Charles? She's so uncommon fond of it, that I mind one day last summer, coming home, as I have now, after a tired day, she'd been trimming that white rose-tree, and she had clean forgot my supper. But that's the only time she ever neglected her duty to me," and he smiled and looked at her affectionately. Mrs. Day turned away with a pleased smile, and gathered one or two beautiful roses from the said tree,—Little Alice, as she called it,—and gave one to each of the ladies, with a kind "God bless you!" and a whispered word, "If ye ever have a little one, put the dried leaves of this flower under its first pillow, and think of Sarah Day, of Comb Hill. It may bring you good luck, and can do you no harm."

"What a singular request!" I said to Mary, as we went through the dark wood on our way home. "She is not at all a person I should have suspected of having strong feelings, a poetical temperament, and a pet superstition. She looks so quiet, calm, and jog-trot. If I had not seen her in the churchyard, and afterwards in her own garden, and in the midst of these children, I should have said she was nothing at all remarkable."

"Do you think her remarkable now?" inquired one of the young men.

"Yes, I do; and I begin to think the Linley Valley and the surrounding hills have none but remarkable inhabitants. I have seen only a glimpse of Mrs. Day, and out of that glimpse Wordsworth could have made a poem. She is a strong, pure, gentle woman. How far superior to a dozen women of her age who pass through my mind at this moment! votaries of the world, whose only object in life seems to be to keep up a semblance of a foolish youth! who have done nothing useful—whose mind is frittered away in vanity—and who would probably look down upon Mrs. Day as upon an inferior. Yet they go to church on Sundays as she does. Oh! not as she does. She goes there to look on the face of the living God, and she sees it; they go there to look at the congregation and hear the preacher; and that is all they see and hear."

Charles Chester quoted from George Herbert's "Temple"—

"He that desires to see
The face of God, in his religion must Sincere, entire, constant, and humble be."

"That is it," I said. "It is because she has led an active, useful life in the sphere in which she was born; and in her religion is 'sincere, entire, constant and humble;' it is on this account that she is better than many women, than most women; it is on this account that she gains love and honour from all; for, indeed, virtue is the only noble, honourable, and lovely thing."

"There are not many Mrs. Days in the world!" exclaimed Carey, as we emerged from the wood upon the open space on the top of the hill, and looked down upon Linley village, half hidden in mist.

"No; but that is the very reason why we should all do our best to increase their number. Precept and example have not lost their efficacy in human nature," said Charles, gravely.

"We may increase the number of women like Mrs. Day, perhaps; but we cannot increase the number of hills like this, Charles," said I. "As I have been here once, and seen both Mrs. Day and Comb Hill, you may be sure I shall find my way up hither again."

"See how slowly the mist is curling up from that end of the valley, and how fast the sun seems to be going down," said Mary. "We must not linger, or it will be dark before we get home."

"Come, children, now for a run," cried Richard; and away they all went down the hill, leaving Mary, Kitty and me with Charles. We went on slowly but steadily, and talked of Mrs. Day and her unassuming character, and her uneventful life, all the way home.

Ever since that evening, when I read or hear of simple goodness in a woman, which makes itself felt in the mere presence, and brings a blessing with it, on all occasions, I remember Mrs. Day of Comb Hill, and try to recall her still eyes and her peaceful, unworldly look; and I say to myself, "So looked this or that woman" whose goodness has become famous. She is sister in spirit to Mrs. Day of Comb Hill.

In the sciences every one has so much as he really knows and comprehends; what he believes only, and takes upon trust, are but shreds; which, however well in the whole piece, make no considerable addition to his stock who gathered them. Such borrowed wealth, like fairy money, though it were gold in the hand from which he received it, will be but leaves and dust when he comes to use it.—Locke on the Understanding, book i. c. iv. § 23.

LEGENDS OF THE MONASTIC ORDERS.¹

Mrs. JAMESON has written much and ably on ancient Art,—on that portion of it, at least, which is associated with the past ages of Christianity; her knowledge has been acquired by very extensive reading, and she has become intimately acquainted with the most curious and the best works of art, by frequent visits to the most famous collections throughout Europe. She writes not only learnedly, but eloquently; takes a broad, comprehensive, and liberal view of the subject in hand, and irresistibly compels her readers onward in the pursuit of a theme, which, under less pleasant and skilful guidance, would possibly possess little attraction, even in these days of almost universal erudition.

And when we consider the intimate relationship that formerly existed between Christianity and Art,—how, notwithstanding the obscurity which surrounded both, they progressed together, and, we will go so far as to say, assisted each other through a long period of darkness, till the light of the Reformation showed a new starting-point for their future career, and each pursued a course distinct from, and independent of, the other;—when this, we say, is considered, it does seem strange that men should regard the records of those periods, even with all their superstition and fanaticism, as little better than “old wives’ tales,” and unworthy the notice of thinking and rational beings. It should, however, always be borne in mind, that, in the days when the followers of a pure religion—debased as it undoubtedly too often was by ignorance and imposition—evoked the aid of art to promulgate its tenets and enforce its practice, there was scarcely any other channel through which this object could be attained: education was restricted to the cell and the cloister; books were unknown beyond the walls of the monastery and the convent; oral teaching, even when exercised, had little power to convert, because the minds of the multitude were unprepared for its reception; there remained then no other means by which they could be so effectually taught the charities of life, and see exemplified the virtues of the religion they professed, as by symbolical representations; for the eye may be easily made the medium of communication to the understanding and the heart, when they can comprehend and feel no other. Hence the priesthood of former ages were glad to avail themselves of the assistance of the artist in working out their objects; and hence their churches and ecclesiastical edifices were filled with pictures of saints, and martyrs, and holy men, undergoing the trials and afflictions which gave them a title to the crown of immortality. It was just the same spirit that led the most polished nations of antiquity—the rulers of Greece and Rome—to place their heroes on the roll of heathen mythology, and summon the worshippers to temples reared to the honour of mortal divinities;

where the deeds of the mighty were sung in poems, and offerings were exultingly laid on the altars of sacrifice. And thus the ministers of the simple, unostentatious religion of Christ, while openly rejecting Polytheism, unquestionably favoured its practice—in many cases without any unworthy or insincere motive—by appealing to the senses of a rude and credulous people, and “making them gods who are not gods.”

We trust to be acquitted of all superstitious and irreverent feeling,—of all sympathy with the absurd uses and doctrines of the Romanists,—if we express our agreement with Mrs. Jameson’s opinion, that the poetical and traditional saints of the early ages of that church ought to have, even for those who dissent from it, a deep and lasting interest. For, she says, in speaking of them as they are represented in art:—

“Where the information has been, through ignorance or incapacity, most imperfect and inadequate, it is still consecrated through its original purpose, and through its relation to what we hold to be most sacred, most venerable, most beautiful, and most gracious, on earth or in heaven. Therefore the angels still hover before us with shining, wind swift wings, as links between the terrestrial and the celestial; therefore evangelists and apostles are still enthroned as the repositories of truth; the fathers and confessors of the Church still stand robed in authority as dispensers of a diviner wisdom: the martyrs, palm-sceptred, show us what once was suffered, and could again be suffered, for truth and righteousness’ sake; the glorified penitents still hold out a blessed hope to those who, in sinning, have loved much; the virgin patronesses still represent to us the Christian ideal of womanhood in its purity and its power. The image might be defective, but to our forefathers it became gracious and sanctified through the suggestion, at least, of all they could conceive of holiest, brightest, and best. The lesson conveyed, either by example or pictured parable, was always intelligible, and, in the hands of great and sincere artists, irresistibly impressive and attractive. To us, therefore, in these later times, such representations are worthy of reverent study, for the sake of their own beauty, or for the sake of the spirit of love and faith in which they were created.”

There is, we should presume, nothing in this argument to excite controversy, and yet we can readily imagine it might prove a cause of offence. But the religious faith of any community, however, in one’s own opinion, removed from the right path, is entitled to respect, simply because it is a religious faith, and therefore an acknowledgment of a superior Being whose attributes are wisdom and goodness. We may reject their creed, we may deplore their errors, we may deride their nummeries, we may labour earnestly for their conversion; but we have no right to doubt the honesty and sincerity of their hearts, nor should we refuse them the testimony of admiration for their zeal, though that zeal be “without knowledge.” It must moreover be borne in mind, that if the outward religious ceremonies of the Romish church glittered with vain and empty pageantry so as to become almost a religion of sights and sounds, there were, at the successive periods of which Mrs. Jameson writes, thousands who knew little of its outward show, and worshipped at lowly and very humble shrines. These had little else to support them in their faith than the testimony of their consciences to truths taught by men as humble as themselves, and as far removed from the pomp and splendour of vast ecclesiastical establishments. What would be the purpose here of imposition? And is there nothing to be learned from the examples which have come down to us, of their patience, and meekness, and gentleness, and purity of life? It seems a great pity that writers of the present day—a day whose watchword is “liberty” in all things—should be called upon to defend themselves from the charge of discipleship, even when writing a history of facts almost without a comment. Mrs. Jameson’s former work on “Sacred and Legendary Art”—to which, by the way, the volume now under review is a necessary sequel—has subjected her to the accusation of having spoiled her book by making it Roman Catholic. This is her reply:—

“But I am not a Roman Catholic:—how, therefore, could I honestly write in the love of thought, feeling, conviction, natural and becoming in one of that faith? I have had to tread what all will allow to be difficult and dangerous ground. How was this to be done safely, and without offence, easily given in these days? Not, surely, by swerving to the right and to the left;—not by the affectation of candour;—not by leaving wholly aside aspects of character and morals which this department of the fine arts, the representations of monastic life, necessarily place before us. There was only one way in which the task undertaken could be achieved in a right spirit—by going straight forward, according to the best lights I had, and saying what appeared to me the truth, as far as my subject required it; and my subject—let me repeat it here—is artistic and æsthetic, not religious. This is too much of egotism, but it has become necessary to avoid ambiguity. I will only add that, as from the beginning to the end of this book there is not one word false to my own faith—my own feelings; so I truly hope there is not one word which can give offence to the earnest and devout reader of any persuasion:—if there be, I am sorry;—what can I say more?”

Mrs. Jameson’s volumes have been written, not with the view of offering an apology for monachism, but to show how the works of the great masters of art who owe their fame to this often vilified system may be rightly interpreted. Painting, as we have before observed, was one of the means employed to bring the mind of man into obedience to the rule of faith, and a powerful engine it became, when proceeding from a mind enthusiastically imbued with the spirit of its theme. Every one knows, by his own experience, what impression a fine picture, whatever its subject, leaves on the memory, and how the recollection of it will cling to us—imperfect it may be, like some fitting shadow—long after it has passed before the eyes. It is not to be wondered at then, that nations who were sitting in comparative darkness while yet removed but a short distance from the great fountain of light which broke forth at the Christian epoch, and whose ears had heard some faint echoes of the miracles then performed, and of the persecutions and martyrdoms which the intervening periods had witnessed, should regard with awe and veneration the pictured representations of those who had “fought the fight of faith,” and of their actions. And if monachism had done nothing more than record these deeds, and preserve them from perishing, it would be entitled to the gratitude of every succeeding generation of Christian men—certainly of every lover of art. But monachism did more than this: there is not a blessing which we of the enlightened nineteenth century enjoy—there is nothing of which we are proud—that we do not owe, either directly or indirectly, to it. We are no apologists for this system; we should grieve—heartily—to see it prevailing again; but we cannot shut our eyes to facts, and we must speak justly of these facts. The mental darkness which covered the civilised world after the barbaric hordes of Alaric and Attila had passed over its surface, might have existed until now, had not the few followers of Christianity, forming themselves into monastic institutions—at first “no bigger than a man’s hand,” but afterwards swelling and spreading over the earth—kept alive some sparks of intelligence and vitality. True, they were for a long period concealed; the gems lay hid in obscure and far-away places; there was “neither voice nor language,” for many years, to tell of their existence; the Goth and the Hun, like the lava from the fiery mountain upon Herculæum, had overspread all that was beautiful, and bright, and excellent; but they were still living, and ready to come forth with renewed splendour when the fitting time had arrived for their reappearance. Let us see how eloquently Mrs. Jameson writes on this subject.

“Monachism in art, taken in a large sense, is historically interesting, as the expression of a most important era of human culture. We are outliving the gross prejudices which once represented the life of the cloister as being from first to last a life of laziness and imposture: we know that, but for the monks, the light of liberty, and literature, and science, had been for ever extinguished; and that, for six centuries, there existed, for the thoughtful, the gentle, the inquiring, the devout spirit, no peace, no security, no home but the cloister. There, learning trimmed her lamp; there, contemplation pruned her wings; there, the traditions of art, preserved from age to age by lonely and studious men, kept alive in form and colour the idea of a beauty beyond that of earth—of a might beyond that of the spear and the shield,—of a divine sympathy with suffering humanity. To this we may add a stronger claim on our respect and moral sympathies. The protection and the better education given to women in these early communities; the venerable and distinguished rank assigned to them when, as governesses of their order, they became in a manner dignitaries of the Church; the introduction of their beautiful and saintly effigies, clothed with all the insignia of sanctity and authority, into the decoration of places of worship and books of devotion,—did more, perhaps, for the general cause of womanhood than all the boasted institutions of chivalry.”

There is, however, a dark side to this glowing picture, but we do not care to hold it up; nor is our authoress, with all her respect for these institutions and the dwellers in them, slow in acknowledging their errors and failings. She relates a legend to show how eager the monks often showed themselves to be—in a sly way too—to exalt their own particular Order, and to advance their own objects, more than those of the religion or the morality they professed. It is, as she says, "a specimen not unworthy of John Bunyan, if John had been a Dominican friar instead of a Puritan tinker:"—

"A certain scholar in the university of Bologna, of no good repute, either for his morals or his manners, found himself once (it might have been in a dream) in a certain meadow not far from the city, and there came on a terrible storm; and he fled for refuge until he came to a house, where, finding the door shut, he knocked and entreated shelter. And a voice from within answered, 'I am Justice; I dwell here, and this house is mine; but as thou art not just, thou canst not enter in.' The young man turned away sorrowfully, and proceeding further, the rain and the storm beating upon him, he came to another house; and again he knocked and entreated shelter: and a voice from within replied, 'I am Truth; I dwell here, and this house is mine; but as thou lovest not truth, thou canst not enter here.' And further on he came to another house, and again besought to enter; and a voice from within said, 'I am Peace; I dwell here, and this house is mine; but as there is no peace for the wicked, and those who fear not God, thou canst not enter here.' Then he went on further, being much afflicted and mortified, and he came to another door and knocked timidly, and a voice from within answered, 'I am Mercy; I dwell here, and this house is mine; and if thou wouldst escape from this fearful tempest, repair quickly to the dwelling of the brethren of St. Dominick; that is the only asylum for those who are truly penitent.' And the scholar failed not to do as this vision had commanded. He took the habit of the Order, and lived henceforth an example of every virtue."

With the exception of the last, the extracts we have made have been selected from the introduction to the volume, in which is traced the rise and progress of monastic institutions from their earliest establishment, till the period when they may be said to have covered the whole of Christian Europe, and to have had no small influence in the political affairs of every country where they prevailed. It was about the seventh century after the death of St. Benedict, or in the thirteenth of the Christian era, that the spirit broke forth which has left us—mouldering, and time-worn, and despoiled as they are—some of the grandest productions of human genius that the world ever saw, or most probably will see;—cathedrals, abbeys, monasteries, massive in their proportions, exquisite in their rich and delicate carvings;—sculptures, rude perhaps in comparison with the finished works of the classical epochs, but noble, nevertheless, and full of dignity;—pictures, produced indeed in the twilight of art, yet evincing the depth of human feeling and the fervor of human faith. To understand fully the character of these conceptions, it is necessary to know something of the causes and results of the state of spiritual excitement at the period referred to.

"There had been nearly a hundred years of desolating wars. The Crusades had upheaved society from its depths, as a storm upheaves the ocean, and changed the condition of men and nations. Whole provinces were left with half their population, whole districts remained uncultivated; whole families, and those the highest in the land, were extinguished, and the homes of their retainers and vassals left desolate. Scarce a hearth in Christendom be-

and powerfully acted on by the revelation of a hitherto unseen, unfeared world of woe. In the words of Scripture, 'men could not stop their ears from hearing of blood, nor shut their eyes from seeing of evil.' There was a deep, almost universal, feeling of the presence and the burden of sorrow; an awakening of the conscience to wrong; a blind, anxious groping for the right; a sense that what had hitherto sufficed to humanity would suffice no longer. But in the uneasy ferment of men's minds, religious fear took the place of religious hope, and the religious sympathies and aspirations assumed in their excess a disordered and exaggerated form. The world was divided between those who sought to comfort the afflictions, and those who aspired to expiate the sins of humanity. To this period we refer the worship of Mary Magdalene, the passion for pilgrimages, for penances, for martyrdoms, for self-immolation to some object or some cause lying beyond self. An infusion of Orientalism into Western Christianity added a most peculiar tinge to the religious enthusiasm of the time, a sentiment which survived in the palpable forms of art long after the cause had passed away. Pilgrims returned from the Holy Land, warriors redeemed from captivity among the Arabs and Saracens, brought back wild wonders, new superstitions, a more dreamy dread of the ever-present invisible, enlarging in the minds of men the horizon of the possible, without enlarging that of experience. With a more abundant food for the fancy, with a larger sphere of action, they remained ignorant and wretched. As one, whose dungeon-walls have been thrown down by an earthquake in the dead of night, gropes and stumbles amid the ruins, and knows not, till the dawn comes, how to estimate his own freedom, how to use his recovered powers,—thus it was with the people. But what was dark misery and bewilderment in the weak and ignorant, assumed in the more highly endowed a higher form; and to St. Francis and his Order we owe what has been happily called the mystic school in poetry and painting: that school which so strongly combined the spiritual with the sensual, and the beautiful with the terrible, and the tender with the inexorable; which first found utterance in the works of Dante, and of the ancient painters of Tuscany and Umbria. It has been disputed often whether the suggestions of Dante influenced Giotto, or the creations of Giotto inspired Dante; but the true influence and inspiration were around both, and dominant over both, when the two greatest men of their age united to celebrate a religion of retribution and suffering; to solemnize the espousals of sanctity with the self-abnegation which despises all things, rather than with the love that pardons and the hope that rejoices; and which, in closing 'the gates of pleasure,' would have shut the gates of mercy on mankind."

But it is time that we passed on to the immediate subject-matter of this highly interesting volume, and among the numerous "legends" therein narrated we could extract, did our limits permit, many equally beautiful, affecting, and characterised by the noblest motives that actuate humanity. Mrs. Jameson arranges her book into three divisions, according to the founders of the three great monastic Orders, including under each head the various minor Orders that sprung from them. The Benedictines, as the earliest, are placed first on the list, with their followers, the Camaldolese, the Vallambrosians, the Carthusians, and the Cistercians: next come the Augustines, with their off-shoots—mostly of minor importance; and then the Franciscans, Dominicans, Carmelites, and Jesuits, each of which claims its own separate and distinct founder, whose laws and precepts were implicitly obeyed by their respective disciples, so far at least as to avoid any separation or secession. The founders of these various religious establishments were all remarkable men—men of genius, of deep insight into human character, of determined will, of large sympathies, of high aspirations, and of unquestionable piety; differing as much from each other in character, as their respective communities differed from each other in aim and purpose. The Benedictine Order, as the earliest, the most interesting and important—the great civilisers, in fact, of the modern world—claim a few words at our hands. The pictured effigies of the saintly personages of this renowned and widely-spread Order offer to the reflective mind associations of no common interest, and are suggestive of a multitude of thoughts,—some painful and humiliating, such as wait on all institutions springing out of the temporary conditions of society and our imperfect human nature; yet, predominant over these, feelings of gratitude, sympathy, and admiration; if not in all cases due to the individual represented, yet belonging of right to the community whose great and glorious privilege it was to raise up the half-savage serfs of Europe to a sentient and intelligent being, and to build and endow a new world, of comparative order and beauty, out of the ruins of the old. The post of honour thus assigned to them they are entitled to,—

“First, as the early missionaries of the north of Europe, who carried the light of the Gospel into those wilds of Britain, Gaul, Saxony, and Belgium, where heathenism still solemnized impure and inhuman rites;—who with the Gospel carried also peace and civilization, and became the refuge of the people, of the serfs, the slaves, the poor, the oppressed, against the feudal tyrants and military spoilers of those barbaric times.

“Secondly, as the sole depositaries of learning and the arts through several centuries of ignorance; as the collectors and transcribers of books, when a copy of the Bible was worth a king’s ransom; . . . we are indebted to them for the preservation of many classical remains of inestimable value; for instance, of the whole or the greater portion of the works of Pliny, Sallust, and Cicero. They were the fathers of Gothic architecture; they were the earliest illuminators and limners; and to crown their deservings under this head, the inventors of the gamut; and the first who instituted a school of music, was a Benedictine monk, Guido d’Arezzo.

“Thirdly, as the first agriculturists who brought intellectual resources, calculation, and law to bear on the cultivation of the soil; to whom we owe experimental farming, and gardening, &c.; wherever they carried the cross, they carried also the plough.”

Of the Carthusians it is remarked:—

“The sumptuous churches and edifices of this self-denying Order date from the sixteenth century; about that period we find the first application of their increasing funds to purposes of architecture and artistic decoration. They had previously been remarkable for their fine libraries, and their skill in gardening. They were the first and the greatest horticulturists of Europe; of them it may be said, ‘that wherever they settled they made the desert blossom as the rose.’ When they built their first nest amid the barren heights of Chartreux, they converted the stony waste into a garden. When they were set down amid the marshes at Pavia, they drained, they tilled, they planted, till the unhealthy swamp was clothed for miles around with beauty and fertility: it is now fast sinking back to its pristine state, but that is not the fault of the few poor monks who, after years of exile, have lately been restored to their cells, and wander up and down the precincts of that wondrous palace-like church and once smiling garden, like pale phantoms come back to haunt their earthly homes.”

But we must bring both our quotations and our remarks to a close, trusting that we have shown and said enough to induce a perusal of Mrs. Jameson’s learned and interesting volume;—learned as regards the research and artistic knowledge she displays in it; interesting in the tales and facts related of those whose names figure therein. Making every allowance for the fictions with which many of these histories are surrounded, there is nevertheless a large portion of truth at the foundation; and a sensible reflective mind will be able, easily, to separate the gold from the alloy. It is astonishing how ignorance, or prejudice, or indifference blind the understanding and warp the judgment: men wander over the earth to seek out and admire the works of their fellow-men, but they know little, generally, and care less, for those who created them. They gaze upon the noble ruins of some old abbey or monastery, heedless that secluded monks caused those grey columns to rise and those lofty arches to spring, and that other generations of studious men were silently employed within their walls in working out the regeneration of mankind. They pace up and down the aisles and cloisters of some cathedral, yet standing in its beauty and its power, forgetful that it was reared to the honour of God by these self-same devoted ministers of his temple. They admire the varied hues which the sunlight sheds through painted windows, from apostles, and saints, and martyrs,—too often regarding the pictured representations as only handing down to us the memories of fanatics and imposters. They stand before a portrait of a St. Boniface or a St. Clara, ignorant that the one abjured the world on account of its wickedness; and perhaps associating the other—one of England’s earliest martyrs to the faith—with much that is sensual. Let us not, however, be misunderstood; we are no advocates for saint-worship or image-worship, but we would that the lives and characters of those who are designated as “saints” should be well understood ere they are passed by as unworthy of notice, or subjected to ridicule. Ours is an age of reason and of realities, it ought not the less to be an age of faith;—faith in our own pure and more enlightened creeds, which have sprung from those beliefs for which the heroes and heroines, if we may be permitted to use the term, of Mrs. Jameson’s book “endured a great fight of afflictions.” In closing the volume—a most valuable addition, by the way, to the art-literature of our country—we do so with this reflection, that, while we regard such histories and such representations as only the “types and shadows of good things,” worthy of being known, and imitated up to a certain point, it ought to be matter of consolation and thankfulness to each one of us that Christian art is not now needed to enforce Christian charity or induce religious belief.

THE BRAZILIAN BRIDE.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART I.

AMONG the nobles who suffered most from the invasion of Portugal, and who followed John VI. across the Atlantic, in search of a safer home in another hemisphere, was the Marquess de Gonsalva. He had married a young and lovely woman, to whom he was tenderly attached. She suffered much at the separation from her home and family, and her health failed under the fatigue and privation of the voyage; she had scarcely reached Brazil, ere she died in giving birth to a son.

The Marquess remained a widower, devoting himself to the care of his child, and the reparation of his ruined fortune.

Alonzo was a fine, generous-spirited boy; grateful and affectionate in his disposition, and very handsome in his person; his clear, dark complexion, laughing eyes, and white teeth, were united to a form remarkable for its just proportions and natural grace. It was of the subject of his education that his father felt, most severely, the change of his circumstances; he could not afford to send him to Europe, but all the scanty means that Rio de Janeiro supplied were put in requisition, and in every respect made the most of.

"What a pity it is," thought the good Marquess, "that my boy, who is beyond all doubt the finest and most talented boy in the country, should lose any advantage that money could procure. Money, money, where are you to be had?" cried the father, impatiently pacing the room; he suddenly stopped, and appeared for a full half-hour wrapped in thought; then, starting from his reverie, ordered his horse, rode in great haste to the convent of —, had a long conference with his sister the Abbess, returned home, declined an invitation to a ball, and wrote letters the remainder of the evening.

A large and important looking packet was addressed to a Portuguese merchant, well known as a man of great wealth at St. Paul's. About the time an answer might be expected the Marquess became anxious and impatient; it arrived at length; Alonzo took it to his father, who shut himself up in his room to read it.

Presently, Alonzo was called. "My boy," said the Marquess, rubbing his hands in great glee, "how would you like to be married?" Alonzo was just turned seventeen, and therefore answered without a moment's hesitation, "Very much indeed, sir!"—and as he spoke, the bright eyes of Donna Clara, the little peeping foot of Donna Julia, and the separate perfections of half a dozen other donnas, glanced in delightful confusion across his mind. "Then married you shall be," replied his father; "sit down, my son; I have an important communication to make. I need not inform you that we have lost almost the whole of our property, with but very little hope of regaining it; in fact, we are very poor. I wish you to go to Europe, and for the next few years to have every advantage that travel, study, and an introduction to the first society can give. I wish you, in short, to take your station in the world—that station for which your birth and talents so eminently fit you; but this wish cannot be accomplished without money; and money, as we are situated, cannot be procured, except by—marriage." A pause; the blood receded from the cheek of Alonzo, but, bowing his head, he replied, "I understand you, sir." The Marquess proceeded, "Senhor Josef Mendcz owes his rise of life to my father, and much also to me; he is, as you well know, considered the richest individual in Brazil; he has only one child, a daughter, the sole inheritor of his wealth. I have proposed a marriage between you and her, frankly offering the fair barter of rank on one side for wealth on the other. I believe it to be the secret wish of his heart that his daughter should be ennobled by marriage; gratitude unites with pride, and he has accepted my offer with the utmost eagerness. It is arranged that we instantly proceed to St. Paul's, where the ceremony will take place—from thence you start for England. My worthy friend, Mr. Mordaunt, will meet you at Falmouth. I write to him by this next packet, offering him so handsome an income, that I have no doubt whatever he will become your tutor, guide, and companion, during your five years of travel and study. At the expiration of that time you will return to your home, and friends—your bride, and father. I pray only that I may not be snatched away before that happy moment arrives; I shall then die in peace!" The father and son embraced with emotion. "But—" said Alonzo, hesitatingly; "but—the lady, sir?" "True—the lady," replied the Marquess; "why—your lady is but a child at present; she has not yet completed her thirteenth year, and I regret to say" (the Marquess tried to look grave) "her health is considered delicate; however, in all that personally regards her, I confess I am rather deficient in information."

Preparations were speedily made for their departure. Alonzo, who was a universal favourite, took leave of all his young friends with a heavy heart; they merely knew he was going to St. Paul's and from thence to Europe; his intended marriage was a secret.

His last visit was to his aunt, the Abbess. "May the saints protect you, son of my brother!" cried the good lady. "Alonzo, thou art the last support and representative of our ancient and noble house; blessed be the chance that brings it back to wealth and independence! But remember, Alonzo, thou takest upon thee a duty most delicate and most difficult towards the hand that bestows these blessings. There is no good in this world without its attendant evil; may thy golden chains lie lightly on thee!"

They embarked, and in a few days reached St. Paul's. They were met on board by Senhor Josef, a little elderly man, shrewd and active—with a long queue, cocked-hat, brown dress-coat, and flowered waistcoat. His joy and pride were almost too great for words; and, for once in his life, natural feelings swept away his whole routine of compliment—which is saying a great deal for an old Portuguese.

The house of Senhor Josef was situated in the centre of the town, and was not at all distinguished from its neighbours, either in its outside or inside appearance; comfort had made less progress here than even at Rio. A heavy, dull-looking building, with large whitewashed rooms, a few of them only matted; rows of old-fashioned chairs ranged round the wall, or projecting in two stiff rows from the ends of a venerable-looking sofa; a couple of small tables, to match, looked at each other from exactly opposite sides, and were ornamented with artificial flowers somewhat faded, in vases; a French clock in a glass case; old, massive, silver candlesticks, with candles ready to light, decorated with wreaths of white cut paper; such was the appearance of the grand sala of the wealthiest man in Brazil.

They were met at the entrance by a little dark, fat, good-humoured Senhora, arrayed in stiff flowered satin, whom Senhor Josef introduced as his sister Theresa. She gave Alonzo a hearty smack on each cheek, and led him into the sala, where presently a small table was brought in, by two neatly dressed black damsels, covered with cakes and very fine fruit. While Alonzo was paying his compliments to these delicacies, the two fathers were talking apart. "The ship sails to-morrow," said the Marquess; "it is very soon," and he sighed; "but, as you observe, we had better not lose the opportunity."

"Much better not," replied Senhor Josef; "every thing is arranged; licence from the bishop, the priest, and the witnesses; all can be completed in an hour from this time."

"And your daughter?"

"Why, my lord, you know Isabella is but a child, and a sickly child; she has been sadly spoiled and petted; and, in consequence of her ill health and my numerous avocations, her education has been somewhat neglected; however, we must begin to make up for lost time."

"Well, Senhor," said the Marquess, with a sort of effort, "the sooner the business is finished the better." Senhor Josef whispered to his sister, and they both left the room. The Marquess then informed Alonzo that the ceremony would take place instantly, and that to-morrow he would leave for Europe. The Marquess also thought it prudent to prepare his son for the appearance of his bride, and, after having repeated what her father had stated, he continued: "Promise me, Alonzo, to conceal as much as possible any unfavourable emotion she may excite; remember we have set our fate upon this cast!"

"We have, indeed, sir!" said Alonzo, gravely; "but the sacrifice is great." By this expression, Alonzo did not mean that he or his rank was sacrificed, although his more worldly father put this interpretation on his words; no—the natural integrity, and yet unsullied freshness of his youthful feelings, told him that he was selling his honour and independence, and, what youth prizes so much in perspective, free choice in his wedded love.

They retired to their separate half-furnished bedrooms to make some alteration in their dress; which was scarcely completed when a request arrived that they would meet Senhor Josef in his private room.

Thither they went, and found him with a notary, a priest, and two witnesses. A deed was handed over to the Marquess to read, by which a very handsome settlement was made on his son; the Marquess expressed his gratitude, and Alonzo kissed the hand of his new father; the deed was signed and sealed, and copies put in their possession. Senhor Josef's will was next read, in which, after providing for his sister, and bequeathing to her the only house he had (their present residence), the rest of his immense fortune he settled exclusively on his daughter. He also expressed his intention to make all fixed and sure by winding up his mercantile concerns before the return of Alonzo; but no land would he purchase; he was aware that a large hereditary estate in Portugal belonged by right to the Marquess, which in all probability he would possess in peace before he died.

These interesting arrangements being completed, the party were requested to proceed to the oratory, where the marriage ceremony was to take place.

Both the father and son felt sad misgivings on the subject of the bride herself, and it was with a throbbing heart that Alonzo, especially, approached the oratory; his father, yet apprehensive of the final events, whispered emphatically, "Senhor Josef has performed his part nobly; oh, my son! for my sake struggle to support yours." Alonzo pressed his father's hand, but his heart was too full to answer.

Although the day shone brightly through the arched and small-paned windows of the oratory, it was, as usual in Catholic chapels on occasions of ceremony, lighted with a great number of huge wax candles, which produced a most disagreeable effect. Two rows of slaves, male and female, were drawn up on each side; the priest and witnesses took their stations, as did Alonzo and the Marquess. Senhor Josef had gone for his sister and daughter.

A few painful minutes elapsed. At length a scuffle was heard in the passage, and "Non quero! non quero!" was shrieked out by a weak but shrill female voice. A moment afterwards, Senhor Josef appeared with his sister, actually dragging in a thin, dark, lanky form, that was making all the opposition it was capable of, by biting, scratching, and screaming. The father and aunt were assisted by four young mulatto females, whose disordered white dresses, and flowers falling from their heads, showed but too clearly in what desperate service they had been engaged. The girl herself was dressed in thickly-worked Indian muslin, trimmed with rich lace, but which, according to the Portuguese taste, was nearly as yellow as her own complexion; in her ears, and round her neck, were clumsily set diamonds of great value; her hair they attempted to dress in vain, and it fell over her shoulders, long, straight, and black. Anger and mortification were deeply impressed on the countenances of her father and aunt; and all present looked dismayed. But poor Alonzo! his blood ran cold; he actually sickened—and nothing but the imploring look of his father prevented him rushing from the oratory. When fairly placed in the centre of the circle, the girl shook herself free, and threw back her disordered hair; she was panting with rage and exertion, evidently beyond her strength; she glanced first on the Marquess, and then turned her eyes steadily on Alonzo. Every one was wondering what would happen next; when to their surprise and relief, after a long and childish stare, she stepped up quietly and placed herself beside him. The priest, who knew her well, lost not the favourable moment, and instantly commenced the service. She went through it with perfect composure, every now and then turning round to look at her companion. Once did Alonzo raise his eyes to meet hers—but his fell, as if avoiding the gaze of a basilisk; he visibly shrunk, as he touched her cold and skinny hand—in short, he could not conceal the agony he suffered. Nevertheless, the ceremony came to its conclusion, and with a sort of convulsive effort he turned to salute his bride. But she had already reached the door (no one thought proper to prevent her)—there she stopped, and once again fixed her very large, black, and fearfully brilliant eyes upon Alonzo; their expression was changed, it was no longer the same as at the altar; but what that expression was Alonzo, though haunted by it for years after, could never make out.

The party left the oratory. The Marquess was the first to recover his composure, and conversed freely on indifferent topics until dinner was announced. Senhora Theresa made an apology for her niece, who, she said, was too unwell to join them. They sat down to a repast more abundant than elegant; and the gloom quickly disappeared from every countenance but one.

In the evening, the fathers had a long conference over their coffee; and Alonzo, availing himself of the excuse his intended early embarkation provided, retired for the night to his chamber.

After a light and hurried breakfast on the following morning, he prepared to depart. The Senhora expressed her deep regret that Isabella was not sufficiently recovered, after the agitating scene of the preceding day, to take leave of him personally; but,—and the good Senhora was proceeding with a string of apologies, when Alonzo impatiently interrupted her by placing in her hand a morocco case, containing a set of pink topaz of the latest London fashion, which he had brought from Rio as a present for his bride. He mumbled something about the Senhora presenting it in his name as it appeared he could not have the honour of offering it himself. Away went the aunt with her prize, and returned in a few minutes with a ring, containing one deep yellow diamond, of value enough to purchase a dozen of his pink topaz sets, and this was given with many fine speeches from his bride, made up by the Senhora, with the felicity of her sex on such occasions.

After receiving the blessing of his new relatives, he went on board, accompanied by the Marquess, who took leave of him with the greatest affection; giving him, of course, much wise counsel, mixed with the heartiest congratulations on his good fortune; but not one word was breathed, by either, concerning her who was at once the maker and marrer of all, the rivet to those golden links, without which, indeed, they would have lain lightly enough. The Marquess was a man of much tact; he felt that anything he could say on this delicate subject must be wrong.

A few weeks brought Alonzo to Falmouth, where he was met by Mr. Mordaunt, his tutor. They proceeded together to the continent, where it was arranged they should spend three years in travel and study; the two remaining years were to be devoted entirely to England.

Mr. Mordaunt was admirably calculated for the office assigned to him, and soon became affectionately attached to his pupil.

Three delightful years flew rapidly by. The most interesting spots in France, Germany, and sacred Italy were visited. The study of the best authors in each language; that of the history, government, manufactures, and works of art of each country; together with the acquaintance of the most eminent men—all contributed to exalt and enrich the highly gifted mind of Alonzo, and to fill his heart with the noblest sentiments of benevolence and patriotism. During this time, he might have been pronounced among the happiest of mortals; but in his overflowing cup one black and bitter drop was mingled.

Mr. Mordaunt had been made aware of Alonzo's marriage, and of all the circumstances attending it, by the Marquess. In the first letter Alonzo received from his aunt the Abbess, were these words:—"The only chance you have of domestic peace (happiness is perhaps out of the question), in your peculiar circumstances, is to guard your heart with the most vigilant care; if once that treasure pass into the possession of another, guilt and misery will attend you through life. I repeat to you again and again—guard your heart!" This letter was handed to his tutor, who, pointing to the last sentence, said emphatically, "Let that be your watchword."

During his residence on the continent, his time and attention were too much occupied, his change of residence too frequent, to allow of his affections being at any time in danger. And, besides the observing eye of Mr. Mordaunt, and the watchword of the reverend Abbess, it must be noticed that the young Don was not of that lightly inflammable nature, which the sparkle of an eye, the smile of a rosy lip, or the touch of a delicate hand, could ignite in an instant. But Mr. Mordaunt perfectly agreed with the Abbess in opinion that, if ever he loved, it would be deeply, passionately, and therefore to him—fatally.

At the appointed time they arrived in England; and a year and a half had been passed with the highest advantage and improvement, in travelling through that extraordinary country, and in visiting Scotland. The last six months they were to spend in London; and, alas! the dreadful evil, from a quarter so little suspected that even Mr. Mordaunt appeared to be thrown off his guard, approached; and the god of love was, as a poet would say, amply avenged for the sacrilege that had been perpetrated in profaning the sacred band of Hymen.

Alonzo was at the Opera with his friend, the Brazilian Chargé d'Affaires. He thought, as he looked round, that he had never been in any public place of amusement where the sex showed to so much advantage as at the English Opera; the absence of crowd, the light not too glaring, the superb dresses, contributed, he supposed, to produce this effect. He observed the Chargé attentively viewing through his glass some person in an opposite box, and he fancied many other glasses were pointed in the same direction; he looked, also, and his eye immediately rested on one of the most beautiful young women, he thought, he had ever seen; there was that peculiar something, however, in her complexion, style, and dress, which marked her as a foreigner. "Who is that?" said he to the Chargé; "she looks French or Spanish."

"Neither," said the Chargé, exultingly; "she is one of us—Brazilian!"

"Indeed!" exclaimed Alonzo, in an accent of surprise and pleasure.

"Have you not heard of her?" asked his friend; "she is called the beautiful Brazilian, and is the novelty of the season, making sad havoc in the hearts of her English admirers. She has come out under the auspices of the Countess of Godolphin, the lady next her."

"What is her name?"

"Donna Viola de Montezuma."

"The name is noble," observed Alonzo, "but I do not recollect it at Rio."

"Her family is settled in the north of Brazil; she herself, however, has just come from Rio, with her duenna and suite, to finish her education. She is an heiress, and is reported to be engaged in Portugal. Would you like to go round? I will introduce you."

"If you please;"—and away they went.

The Chargé first introduced Alonzo to the Countess, and then presented him as a fellow-countryman to the beautiful Brazilian. She received him with the most marked pleasure, and made a seat for him beside her.

"I am indeed most happy to become acquainted with you, Don Alonzo," said she, "if it were only to express to you the affection I feel for your dear aunt, the Abbess, in whose convent I have been some time a resident, and from whom I have received all the care and love of a mother—indeed, I owe her very much."

"Her love and care, at least, seem to have been well bestowed," replied Alonzo; "did you also know my father?"

"Intimately; and I may also venture to say that I know you, so much have I heard of you from the Marquess and your aunt. I am sure no son or nephew was ever so beloved."

Alonzo sighed, as he recollected that neither of them had mentioned this lady in their letters; the reason was obvious—and he felt a pang more acute than usual when he looked on her lovely and intelligent countenance—glanced over a figure that appeared to him perfection, and listened to her lively and natural remarks—then compared her with that one of whom he could scarcely endure in any way to think.

The next morning, he mentioned to Mr. Mordaunt, as carelessly as he could, his introduction of the preceding evening.

"I have heard of that lady," observed Mr. Mordaunt. "She is a good specimen of your countrywomen, does great credit to Brazil, and would make, I dare say, an excellent English marriage, if she were not already engaged."

"She is really then engaged?" inquired Alonzo.

"Decidedly—to a Portuguese nobleman; this has been published as much as possible, to keep lovers at a distance."

"Well," thought Alonzo, "as she is engaged, and I married, there can be no danger;" and that very evening (for the lady, he understood, was not permitted to receive morning visitors) beheld him at the Countess's.

An intimacy soon sprang up between them, as was natural between persons of the same age and station in a foreign country. There was no one that Viola was, or appeared, half so pleased to see as Don Alonzo. She had always a new song to sing to him, a new drawing to show to him, or a new book to recommend. She was fond of chess, and many a happy moment did he spend while the Countess was engaged at her whist. But never, in his eyes, was she so fascinating as when, passing the black ribbon of her guitar over her shoulder, she accompanied herself in their own beautiful national melodies; her voice was exquisitely sweet and clear; the execution finished and graceful. At those moments an exclusive affinity appeared to exist between them; although there might be, and often were, numerous other listeners and admirers, it was his eye only that she sought for approval.

They met frequently at public places, and also at other houses. Viola was a beautiful dancer, and he felt proud (he knew not why, for it was nothing to him) of the admiration she excited. Sometimes he waltzed with her, and with a beating heart caught here and there a half whisper from the spectators; "The two Brazilians—an interesting couple, are they not?"

It was thought better that Viola, on account of her peculiar situation, should continue to observe, although in England, the strict form of her own national manners. Immediately after dancing, she returned to the side of the Countess, or her chaperone; she never went out for exercise except when so accompanied, and she never received any visitor except in such presence. These arrangements gave great satisfaction to Alonzo, (he did not know why, for it was nothing to him,) although he frequently suffered by them.

"Guard your heart!" conscience whispered to Alonzo. Alas! his heart had escaped,—but he guarded his manners, and they were the next best security; he tried to watch even his very eyes; he never flirted, he never complimented; in fact, he succeeded so well that the Countess and Mr. Mordaunt appeared to have no suspicion; but he could not deceive himself, and he was not quite so sure that he deceived Viola.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

WE have noticed with some pleasure the completion of a biography which, apart from its literary value, may be regarded as an appropriate tribute rendered by filial affection to the memory of a good and great man. Such a work is deserving of more than a common welcome, and challenges from us a few remarks. We take it for granted that all who are familiar with the works, or any portion of the works, of the late poet-laureate, will peruse with some gratification the details of his personal history which are to be gleaned from these volumes; and, although the lives of literary men are but rarely diversified by startling incidents or romantic adventures, we believe that we shall be able, from the ample materials before us, to weave a narrative not altogether devoid of interest.

On the position which Southey filled among the literary celebrities of the generation to which he belonged, it would be idle for us to dwell at any length. As a critic and historian, he was unrivalled for depth and variety of information, and for his skill in imparting that information to others. His prose style was lucid, perspicuous, and always admirably adapted to the subject-matter. He managed to hit the happy medium between the appearance of haste and slovenliness, on the one hand, and of pedantic stiffness, on the other. In his Life of Nelson, and in his other popular prose productions, we are charmed as much by the easy flow of the narration and the absence of all appearance of effort, as by the chastened elegance and correctness of every sentence and expression. His claims as a poet are more equivocal. Comparatively speaking, his poetical works have made but little impression on the reading public, and it may be safely predicted that only a small proportion are destined to achieve an enduring popularity. Other and abler critics have pointed out the faults of his more ambitious essays in verse; the only one to which we think it necessary to allude is his tendency to diffuseness, and want of that power of condensation, which is the grand secret of poetical excellence. We can scarcely wonder at, though we have often regretted, the neglect to which some of his longer poems have been consigned, abounding as they do with images of grandeur and sublimity. It must be admitted that the subjects which Southey selected, as well as his versification and mode of treatment, were not calculated to remove the prejudice which existed, and still exists, against all modern epics. And when the shafts of ridicule were directed against his eccentric productions,—when a noble satirist adroitly applied to them Porson's bitter sarcasm—that they would be read when Homer and Virgil were forgotten, but not till then,—a general disposition to depreciate them began to prevail, and it was only by a select few that their merits were fairly acknowledged.

The biography of Robert Southey now presented to the world, commences with some brief recollections of his early life, written by himself, in a series of letters to his friend, Mr. John May. Before we make any extracts from this interesting piece of autobiography, we may inform our readers that the laureate was born at Bristol, where his father carried on the business of a linen-draper, on the 12th of August, 1774. The recollections of his childhood commence at the third year of his age, and are thus playfully introduced in one of the before-mentioned letters:—

“The popular saint of the democratic cantons in Switzerland, St. Nicholas de Iluz, (to whom I paid my respects in his own church at Saxeln) remembered his own birth, knew his mother and the midwife as soon as he was born, and never forgot the way by which he was taken to be christened, nor the faces of the persons who were present at the ceremony. But he was an extraordinary child, who, though he neither danced, nor sung, nor preached before he was born, (all which certain other saints are said to have done,) had revelations in that state, and saw the light of heaven before he came into the light of day. It has pleased the metaphysico-critico-politico-patriotico-phoolo-philosopher, Jeremy Bentham, to designate me, in one of his opaque works, by the appellation of St. Southey, for which I humbly thank his Jeremy Benthamship, and have in part requited him. It would be very convenient if I had the same claim to this honour, on the score of miraculous memory, as the aforesaid Nicholas—but the twilight of my recollection does not begin till the third year of my age.”

Some of the poet's earliest years were passed under the roof of a maiden aunt, named Tyler, who possessed a small independent property. This lady lived on terms of intimacy with the daughter of the proprietor of the Bath and Bristol theatres, and being herself passionately fond of dramatic representations, and plentifully favoured with free admissions, she often went to the play with her little nephew, upon whose mind, as might be expected, the performances made a strong impression. Long before the child could comprehend the meaning of what passed upon the stage, he acquired a keen relish for the drama, which ultimately became the passion of his boyhood. At the age of six he was sent to a day-school in Bristol, kept by a Baptist minister, where he remained about twelve months, when the death of the master caused his father to remove him. It was then decided that he should be sent from home, and placed as a boarder in a school nine miles from Bristol. The sensitive child keenly felt the pang of departure, and when, for the first time in his life, he saw his mother weeping, the effort which he made to subdue his own emotions long haunted his remembrance, and is alluded to in one of his poems, as—

And the first painful smile that clothed his front
With feelings not its own.”

“The little exile” felt truly wretched in the change made in his condition, and the misery of the first night which he passed at school is thus described in the same poem:—

“ Sadly at night
I sat me down beside a stranger's hearth,
And when the lingering hour of rest was come,
First wet with tears my pillow.”

The school to which he had been transferred was a very indifferent one, and the master, though a man of considerable attainments as a mathematician, utterly unfit for his profession. But little attention was paid to the pupils, either in or out of school, and the domestic arrangements were most defective. One of the discomforts of the place made a strong impression upon poor Southey, and is thus spoken of in the letters to his friend May. “ I dreaded nothing so much,” he says, “ as Sunday evening in winter; we were then assembled in the hall, to hear the master read a sermon, or a portion of Stackhouse's History of the Bible. Here I sat at the end of a long form, in sight but not within feeling of the fire, my feet cold, my eyelids heavy as lead, and yet not daring to close them, kept awake by fear alone, in total inaction, and under the operation of a lecture more soporific than the strongest sleeping dose. Heaven help the wits of those good people who think that children are to be edified by having sermons read to them !”

At this school Southey remained another twelvemonth, when he was removed, and sent on a visit to his grandfather at Bedminster. This was a delightful change. A large garden was attached to his grandfather's house, which appeared to the emancipated school-boy quite a paradise, and in which he spent some of the happiest days of his childhood. The poet has favoured us with a minute description of this magic spot, in the course of which he refers to a constitutional peculiarity in his friend Wordsworth which may not be generally known:—

“ The side of the house,” he says, “ in the forecourt also was covered with an apricot-tree, so that every luxury of this kind which an English sun can ripen, was there in abundance. Just by the orchard-gate was a fine barberry-bush; and that peculiar odour of its blossoms, which is supposed to injure the wheat within its reach, is still fresh in my remembrance. Wordsworth has no sense of smell. Once, and once only in his life, the dormant power awakened. It was by a bed of stocks in full bloom, at a house which he inhabited in Dorsetshire, some five-and-twenty years ago; and he says it was like a vision of paradise to him; but it lasted only a few minutes, and the faculty has continued torpid from that time. The fact is remarkable in itself, and would be worthy of notice, even if it did not relate to a man of whom posterity will desire to know all that can be remembered. He has often expressed to me his regret for this privation. I, on the contrary, possess the sense in such acuteness, that I can remember an odour and call up the ghost of one that is departed.”

After staying at Bedminster some time, Southey was taken home, and placed as a day-boarder at a school in Bristol, kept by a Welshman named Williams, where he remained between four and five years, “ which, if not profitably, were at least,” he says, “ not unhappily spent.” For the first two years of this period he lived at his father's; but his holidays were always spent with Miss Tyler at Bath. Upon that lady, however, coming to reside at Bristol, he took up his abode with her altogether; and his early taste for literature was naturally directed into a dramatic channel from the associations he formed at this period. Shakspeare was put into his hands as soon as he could read, and before he was eight years old he had gone through all the plays of Beaumont and Fletcher. He was likewise, as in the days of his childhood, frequently taken by his aunt to the Bristol theatre; and in imitation of what he had seen passing on the stage, he soon began to compose dramas of his own. The first subject he attempted was the Contineuce of Scipio, in which battles were plentifully introduced, because the battle in Cymbeline was then one of his favourite scenes. Of this production, his patience only enabled him to finish about an act and a half; but he set to work upon other subjects, and whilst his dramatic passion lasted, teased his play-mates to engage in the same occupation, and was much surprised to find they were not able “ to write plays as well as to do their lessons.”

It had been decided by Southey's uncle, the Rev. Mr. Hill, that he should be sent to Westminster, as soon as he was old enough to enter a public school; but the following incident led to his leaving Williams's seminary somewhat earlier, perhaps, than he might otherwise have done. “ Williams,” he says, “ who read well himself, and prided himself upon it, was one day very much offended with my reading, and asked me scornfully who taught me to read. I answered, ‘ My aunt.’ ‘ Then,’ said he, ‘ give my compliments to your aunt; and tell her that my old horse that has been dead these twenty years could have taught you as well.’ I delivered the message faithfully, to her great indignation. It was never forgotten or forgiven, and perhaps it accelerated the very proper resolution of removing me.” Upon being taken from the guardianship of Williams, he was placed for a twelvemonth, under a clergyman named Lewis, at whose house he attended for a few hours every day as a private pupil. The profit he derived from this year's tuition was very small, and it was found at the end that Lewis's assistance had enabled him to add but little to his stock of school-learning. On the other hand, aided by solitary and congenial studies, he became conscious of the growth of his intellectual nature, and the poetical spirit, which, like a plant, “ required no forcing, nor artificial culture, only air and sunshine, and the rains and the dews of heaven,” was gradually maturing itself within him. In the thirteenth and fourteenth years of his age, the frequent perusal of Tasso, Ariosto, and Spenser, had filled his mind with visions of romance, which entirely superseded his dramatic furor. At this period, also he wrote some heroic epistles in rhyme, and made translations from Virgil, Ovid, and Horace, besides projecting more ambitious works in imitation of his new models.

-In his fifteenth year, Southey was placed at Westminster, being at the time, as he confesses, in every way ill qualified for the discipline of a public school. Nor was his career there very fortunate. He formed, it is true, many valuable friendships, which were of signal service to him in after life, but his stay was shortened by a disagreeable occurrence which attended his first appearance in print. With some of his school friends, he had joined in the publication of a little periodical, called "The Flagellant," which had reached its ninth number, when a sarcastic article appeared, on the subject of corporal punishment. This paper gave great offence to Dr. Vincent, the head-master of Westminster, who proceeded so far as to prosecute the printer for a libel. Upon this, Southey promptly acknowledged the authorship of the article, and offered to make an apology; but Dr. Vincent was inexorable, and he was in consequence compelled to quit the school.

On leaving Westminster, Southey returned to Bristol, and for some months resided with his aunt, Miss Tyler. It had been long resolved to send him to Oxford, with the view of his entering the church, and accordingly, after some delay, arising out of family troubles, he was entered at Balliol College, having been previously rejected by the Dean of Christ Church, (Cyril Jackson,) on account, it is said, of the part he had taken at Westminster in the publication of the "Flagellant." In January, 1793, he began his residence at the University, with an ardent thirst for knowledge, and a genuine taste for literary pursuits, but with little prepossession in favour of college discipline. Almost immediately on his arrival, he thus wrote to a Westminster friend, Mr. Grosvenor Bedford. "Behold me, my friend, entered under the banners of science or stupidity, which you please, and like a recruit got sober, looking to the days that are past, and feeling something like regret. . . I feel myself entered upon a new scene of life, and, whatever the generality of Oxonians conceive, it appears to me a very serious one. Four years hence I am to be called into orders, and during that time, (short for the attainment of the requisite knowledge,) how much have I to learn! I must learn to break a rebellious spirit, which neither authority nor oppression could ever bow; it would be easier to break my neck. I must learn to work a problem, instead of writing an ode. I must learn to pay respect to men remarkable only for great wigs and little wisdom."

At this period of his life Southey was an ardent and sincere republican. The French Revolution had excited in his young mind feelings of enthusiastic sympathy and admiration, and although its excesses served to moderate his democratic views, he could not easily forget his early dreams of human perfectibility. His religious views were also unsettled, and were far too widely removed from strict orthodoxy to permit him sincerely to entertain the notion of becoming a minister of the Church of England. Under these circumstances, with little practical knowledge of the world, he began to look around for some occupation which might furnish him with the means of subsistence, without requiring the sacrifice of his opinions. Whilst he was making inquiries upon this subject, and meeting with disappointment at every turn, he made the acquaintance of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, then an undergraduate of Jesus College, Cambridge; and this incident led to some of the most important events of his life.

At the time that Southey was introduced to Coleridge, the latter was on a visit to an old school-fellow at Oxford. A marked similarity in their religious and political views made them close friends from the beginning; and whilst they were declaiming together on the abuses in the social system, and on the misery and injustice that prevailed in their native country, Mr. Coleridge started the idea of a new scheme of colonization, to which he proposed to give the name of "Pantisocracy." The writings of English and foreign socialists have made us familiar with similar Utopias, and their pretensions would now appear trite and stale, but in the days of Southey's early manhood such schemes were well calculated to attract the attention of the earnest visionary. The details of the plan were soon arranged, and the co-operation of some congenial spirits readily promised. Among the first converts were Mr. Robert Lovell, the son of a rich Quaker, and three of Southey's fellow-collegians, of good family, named Burnett, Allen, and Seward. Mr. Lovell, it may be necessary to state, had married a Miss Fricker, of Bristol, and to one of that lady's sisters Southey had recently engaged himself. For a time the young enthusiast contrived to prevent the news both of his intended marriage and of the scheme of Pantisocracy from reaching the ears of his aunt; but at length all was discovered, and a storm ensued which rendered him a homeless adventurer.

The Pantisocratic scheme soon failed, from the vulgar want of funds to carry it into execution, and Southey and Coleridge found themselves under the necessity of doing something for a livelihood. Some literary engagements were at length obtained, and a course of historical lectures delivered at Bristol by the two friends, which proved, it appears, highly successful. In his own words, the young poet had "cut his cable, and was drifting on the ocean of life." Whilst engaged in this manful struggle, the death of his friend Seward plunged him into the deepest distress, and the mode in which he lamented his loss, both in poetry and in prose, will convey some idea of the intensity of his sufferings. "Bedford—he is dead; my dear Edmund Seward! after six weeks' suffering. . . In that room where I have so often seen him, he now lies in his coffin! It is like a dream, the idea that he is dead—that his heart is cold—that he, whom but yesterday morning I thought and talked of as alive—as the friend I knew and loved—is dead! . . . There is a strange vacancy in my heart. The sun shines as usual, but there is a blank in existence to me." From the beautiful poem in which, four years later, he commemorated his loss, we will extract two stanzas, which from their intrinsic excellence are well worthy of quotation:—

“ Often together have we talk'd of death;
 How sweet it were to see
 All doubtful things made clear;
 How sweet it were with powers
 Such as the cherubim,
 To view the depth of Heaven!
 O Edmund! thou hast first Begun the travel of eternity!
 I look upon the stars,
 And think that thou art there,
 Unfetter'd as the thought that follows thee.
 * * * * *

Not to the grave, not to the grave, my soul,
 Follow thy friend beloved!
 But in the lonely hour,
 But in the evening walk,
 Think that he companies thy solitude;
 Think that he holds with thee
 Mysterious intercourse;
 And though remembrance wake a tear,
 There will be joy in grief.”

The arrival in England of Southey's uncle, Mr. Hill, who had been long resident in Portugal, and who has been mentioned as taking so much interest in his nephew's education, occasioned a fresh change in the poet's fortunes. Southey had looked forward with dread to an interview with his uncle, but the good man treated him with exemplary and unexpected forbearance. Finding that his nephew had determined not to enter the church, he proposed to him to return with him to Lisbon for six months, and then, if he saw no objection, prepare for the legal profession. The generous offer was promptly accepted; but on the day fixed for his departure, the poet was united to Edith Fricker, at Redcliffe Church, Bristol. The young couple parted after the ceremony, and the bride wore her wedding ring hung round her neck, and kept her maiden name, till the report of the marriage rendered concealment useless.

On his return from Portugal, Southey began to think seriously of devoting himself to the study and practice of the law. Without abandoning literature, he was sanguine enough to hope that he might master the drudgeries of his new profession. Having for a short time established himself at Bristol, with his young wife, he thus writes to his friend, Mr. Bedford:—“ I have told you what I am about; writing letters to the world is not, however, quite so agreeable as writing to you, and I do not love shaping a good thing into a good sentence. . . . Then for a volume of poems, and then for the Abridgment of the Laws, or the Lawyer's Pocket Companion, in fifty-two volumes folio! Is it not a pity, Grosvenor, that I should not execute my intention of writing more verses than Lope de Vega, more tragedies than Dryden, and more epic poems than Blackmore? The more I write, the more I have to write. I have a Helicon kind of drowsy upon me, and crescit indulgens sibi.”

The letters alluded to in the foregoing extract were the “ Letters from Spain and Portugal,” which contained the impressions of his recent tour in those countries. At the beginning of 1797, (in the twenty-third year of his age,) Southey left Bristol, and came up to London to pursue his legal studies. Having paid the necessary fees, he was admitted a student-at-law at Gray's Inn; and, though hating the metropolis with an intense hatred, he made up his mind for a time to reside there with his wife. His mornings he resolved to devote to law, and his evenings to his poem of Madoc, on which he was then hard at work. With noble self-denial, he determined to resist the attractions of literary society;—paying more regard to the happiness of the woman who was to share his home than many in his position might have done. “ I have declined,” he says, in a letter written at this period to Mr. Joseph Cottle, “ being a member of a Literary Club which meets weekly, and of which I have been elected a member. Surely a man does not do his duty who leaves his wife to evenings of solitude; and I feel duty and happiness to be inseparable. I am happier at home than any other society can possibly make me.”

The poet's detestation of London increased with the length of his acquaintance. Green fields were his delight, and bricks and mortar his abhorrence. He adopted, as his favourite quotation, the emphatic words of John Donne:—

“ Sir,—I do thank God for it—I do hate
 Most heartily that city.”

He found also, after a time, that he could pursue his studies with equal or greater advantage in the country. It is not surprising, therefore, that he soon withdrew from the metropolis, residing in various country places which suited his convenience or pleased his fancy. In a metrical letter to Mrs. Southey, dated June 4, 1798, he thus emphatically expresses his horror of London life:—

“ To dwell in that foul city,—to endure
 The common, hollow, cold, lip-intercourse
 Of life; to walk abroad and never see
 Green field, or running brook, or setting sun!
 Will it not wither up my faculties,
 Like some poor myrtle that, in the town air,
 Pines on the parlour window!”

As may be imagined, the study of the law became more and more distasteful to him, and, as his literary avocations increased, Coke and Blackstone were almost wholly thrown aside. About this time, also, he began to suffer severely from the results of mental labour; and, by way of necessary relaxation, he made a pedestrian excursion into Wales, and spent a few weeks in Herefordshire. In a letter from Hereford to Mr. Wynn, he encloses a curious specimen of epistolary correspondence, being the copy of a genuine note from a west-country farmer's daughter to a female acquaintance, which we cannot resist the temptation of transcribing:—

“ Dear Miss,—The energy of the races prompts me to assure you that my request is forbidden; the idea of which I had awkwardly nourished, notwithstanding my propensity to reserve. Mr. T. will be there; let me with confidence assure you that him and brothers will be very happy to meet you and brothers. Us girls cannot go for reasons; the attention of the cows claims our assistance in the evening.

“Unalterably Yours.”

As literary occupation flowed in upon him, and engrossed all his time, Southey felt himself placed in a position of some embarrassment. All his tastes and wishes disposed him to prefer the peaceful cultivation of literature to any other employment, and he felt, moreover, that his delicate constitution was unfitted to sustain the wear and tear of a lawyer's life. But he still, says his son, thought it right to continue to keep his terms at Gray's Inn: though every day he became more convinced of his peculiar inaptitude for the legal profession. On the 21st of December, 1799, he thus writes from Bristol to his friend Mr. Bedford: “Grosvenor, I have nothing of what the world calls ambition. I never thought it possible that I could be a great lawyer; I should as soon expect to be the man in the moon. My views were bounded—my hopes—to an income of 500*l.* a-year, of which I could lay by half to effect my escape with . . . I am not indolent; I loathe indolence; but, indeed, reading law is laborious indolence—it is thrashing straw. I have read, and read, and read; but the devil a bit can I remember. I have given all possible attention, and attempted to command volition. No! The eye read, the lips pronounced, I understood and re-read it; it was very clear; I remembered the page, the sentence,—but close the book, and all was gone! Were I an independent man, even on less than I now possess, I should long since have made the blessed bonfire, and rejoiced that I was free and contented.”

His health continuing “in a most, unsatisfactory state,” he now made up his mind to try the air of Lisbon for a short time. Meanwhile his hands were full of work, and his brain constantly employed. He had commenced his poem of Thalaba—the most original and successful of his poetical productions—and was rapidly proceeding with it. He also found time for some nobler speculations. Willing to lend his aid to any project of practical benevolence, he meditated, at the suggestion of a friend, “an essay upon the state of women in society; and its possible amelioration by means, at first, of institutions similar to the Flemish Beguinages.” . . . “The object,” he says, (writing to his friend Mr. John May,) “is to provide for the numerous class of women who want employment the means of respectable independence, by restoring to them those branches of business which the men have mischievously usurped or monopolised, when they ought only to have shared. Oh! what a country might this England become, did its government but wisely direct the strength, and wealth, and activity of the people! Every profession, every trade is overstocked; [this was in February 1800] there are more adventurers in each than can possibly find employment; hence poverty and crime. Do not misunderstand me as asserting this to be the sole cause, but it is the most frequent one. A system of colonization, that should offer an outlet for the superfluous activity of the country, would convert this into a cause of general good; and the blessings of civilization might be extended over the deserts that, to the disgrace of man, occupy so great a part of the world! Assuredly poverty and the dread of poverty are the great sources of guilt.” This extract—which is as full of good feeling as of good sense—shows that the poet was still actuated by the same philanthropic ardour and the same earnest anxiety for the welfare of his species which, in early life, had hurried him into some extravagances.

In the spring of 1800, Southey departed with his wife for Lisbon. A series of letters written during his residence there to friends in England, are included in the present biography, and abound with lively and interesting descriptions of the place and people. The following characteristic passages are from a letter to Lieutenant Southey, written May 23d, 1800: “Lisbon has twice been clean since the creation; Noah's flood washed it once, and the fire after the earthquake purified it. . . . Government will neither cleanse the city themselves, nor suffer any one else to do it. An English merchant applied lately for permission to clear the street in which he lived, and it was refused. . . . No doubt this is a regular government; it is an old monarchy, and has an established church. . . . An acquaintance of mine (Tennant, well known for some famous chemical experiments on the diamond) met an Irishman in Switzerland, who had been at Rome. He said it was the most laineant government in the world; you might kill a man in the streets, and nobody would take the laisist notice of it. This also is a laineant government: a man stabs his antagonist, wipes the knife in his cloak, and walks quietly away. It is a point of honour in the spectators to give no information. If one servant robs his master, it is a point of honour in his fellow-servants never to inform of him. Both these points of honour are inviolable from prudence, for a stab would be the consequence. One method of revenge used in the provinces is ingeniously wicked: they beat a man with sand-bags. These do not inflict so much immediate pain as a cane would do, but they so bruise all the fine vessels, that, unless the poor wretch be immediately scarified, a lingering death is the consequence.” In another letter to Lieutenant Southey, he thus describes some of the drawbacks to the fine climate of Lisbon. “The warm weather is come; we shut our windows to exclude the heated air, and our shutters to darken the room: if half the money expended upon the souls in purgatory were employed in watering the street, we should be relieved from the torment of burning. Yet is the heat more endurable than the intense light; this is insufferably painful: the houses are white, the stones in the street white, the very dust bleached, and all reflect back upon us the scorching sun; the light is like the quivering of a furnace fire; it dazzles and makes the eyes ache, and blindness is very common. . . . Everlasting noise is another characteristic of Lisbon. Their noonday fireworks, their cannonading on every fool's pretext, their bells to every goat in a flock, and every mule in a drove, prove this; above all, their everlasting bell-ding-donging,—for bell-ringing would convey the English idea of music, and here it is only noise."

Having afterwards removed to Cintra, the poet began to feel the good effects of the climate; and though "longing to see the faces of friends, and hungering after the bread-and-butter comforts and green fields of England," he was thoroughly enraptured with the luxuries and beauties of this favoured soil. "The spot I am in," he says, in a letter to his friend Wynn, "is the most beautiful I have ever seen or imagined. I ride a jackass, a fine lazy way of travelling; you have even a boy to beat old Dapple when he is slow. I eat oranges, figs, and delicious pears,—drink Colareswine, a sort of half-way excellence between port and claret,—read all I can lay my hands on,—dream of poem after poem, and play after play,—take a siesta of two hours, and am as happy as if life were one everlasting to-day, and that to-morrow was not to be provided for."

Attributing the degraded condition of the mass of the Portuguese nation to the blighting effect of superstition, Southey often dwelt, in his letters to absent friends, on the absurdities of the Romish faith, and the ignorance and indolence both of the laity and clergy. In a letter to his mother, he gives the following sketch of a religious drama, designed for the amusement and edification of the faithful, which appears to us unparalleled by anything we have seen for ingenuity and blasphemy:—

"You like the Catholics; shall I give you an account of one of their Lent plays upon Transubstantiation which is lying on the table? It begins by the Father turning Adam out of doors. 'Get out of my house, you rascal!' Adam goes a-begging, and bitterly does he complain that he can find no house, no village, nobody to beg of. At last, he meets the Four Seasons, and they give him a spade, and a plough, &c., but nothing to eat. Then comes Reason, and tells him to go to law with his Father, who is obliged to find him in victuals. Adam goes to law; an Angel is his counsel, and the Devil pleads against him. He wins his cause: and the Father settles upon him oil—for extreme unction; lamb; and bread and wine. Up comes the Sacrament, and there is an end of the play. This is written by a priest, one of the best Spanish writers, who has written seventy-two of these plays, all upon the body and blood, and all in the same strain of quaint and pious blasphemy."

To return, however, to the events of Southey's life. In June 1801, he returned to England, and once more took up his residence at Bristol. Thalaba had been finished by him during his stay in Portugal, and the copyright of the first edition was purchased by Messrs. Longman for 115*l*. He had given up all thoughts of the law, and his hopes were now fixed on obtaining some permanent appointment in a southern climate. A prospect was opened to him by his friend Wynn, of becoming private secretary to a gentleman who had been nominated ambassador to Palermo, and who was thence to proceed to Constantinople. A very small salary was attached to the post, but it was thought it might lead to a consulship. Southey was pleased with the idea; and, in his usual cheerful and playful style, wrote to Coleridge to express his satisfaction, and to tempt his friend to expatriate himself likewise. "I feel here," he says, "as a stranger. . . . What tie have I in England? My London friends? There, indeed, I have friends. But if you and yours were with me, eating dates in a garden at Constantinople, you might assert that we were in the best of all possible places; and I should answer, Amen: and if our wives rebelled, we would send for the chief of the black eunuchs, and sell them to the Scraglio. Then should Moses learn Arabic, and we would know whether there was anything in the language or not. We would drink Cyprus wine and mocha coffee, and smoke more tranquilly than ever we did in the Ship in Small Street."

This scheme, however, came to nothing; but in the autumn, Southey proceeded to Keswick in Cumberland—destined to be his residence for so many years in after life, and the place of his final repose—on a visit to his friend Coleridge. On leaving the Lake district,—of which, it appears, his first impressions were by no means favourable,—he received intelligence that he had been appointed, through the influence of his friend Wynn, private secretary to Mr. Corry, then Chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland, at a salary of 350*l*. a-year. He immediately repaired to Dublin, where he remained only for a short time, as the duties of his office required him to reside in London during the winter. His position in life was now altered, and he found many new friends eager to hail the dawn of his prosperity. "The civilities which have already been shown me," he says, in a letter to Mr. William Taylor, "discover how much I have been abhorred for all that is valuable in my nature; such civilities excite more contempt than anger, but they make me think more despicably of the world than I could wish to do. As if this were a baptism that purified me of all sins—a regeneration; and the one congratulates me, and the other visits me, as if the author of Joan of Arc and Thalaba were made a great man by scribbling for the Irish Chancellor of the Exchequer."

At the beginning of the following year, the poet's feelings sustained a severe shock from the death of his mother, the last remaining friend of his infancy and childhood. A short time after this sad event, he resigned his secretaryship. It appears that the specific duties of his office were not sufficient to find him employment, upon which Mr. Corry suggested that he should undertake the tuition of his son, to fill up the time. This Southey refused to do, and gave up his appointment, "losing thereby," in his own words, "a foolish office and a good salary." In the autumn his first child was born to him, a daughter, whom he named Margaret. Naturally enough, this event made him more anxious to settle himself in some permanent residence, which he might reasonably call a home. At one time his attention was turned to Wales, and he was actually in treaty for a house in Glamorganshire, in the Vale of Neath, when he considered "one of the loveliest spots" in Britain; but the negotiation was broken off. A twelve-month passed, and his child, to whom he was tenderly attached, sickened and died. This circumstance drove him from Bristol, and Coleridge being still resident at Keswick, he was attracted thither in his hour of bereavement. The grandeur and loveliness of the lake scenery soon began to exercise an influence on his poetical tastes, and we find him, on the 8th of September, 1803, thus writing to Lieutenant Southey: "Edith suffers deeply and silently. She is kept awake at night by recollections, and I am harassed by dreams of the poor child's illness and recovery; but this will wear away. Would that you could see these lakes and mountains! how wonderful they are! how awful in their beauty. All the poet part of me will be fed and fostered here. I feel already in tune, and shall proceed to my work with such a feeling of power as old Samson had when he laid hold of the pillars of the temple of Dagon."

In the congenial seclusion to which the poet had prudently withdrawn, he appears to have occupied himself with more zeal than ever in his varied literary pursuits. Few events occurred to vary the even tenor of his life, and his letters breathe a spirit of cheerful contentedness. Another daughter was born to him in April, 1804, whom he named, after her mother, Edith. In the spring of 1805, the poem of Madoc, on which he had been employed at intervals for years, at length made its appearance, in an expensive style of typography. Its success was rather dubious. The critics of the Edinburgh were unfavourable, and the poem was not calculated to fix popular admiration. But the great merits of the work were admitted by a discerning few, among whom it is refreshing to find the great literary giant of the north, Sir Walter Scott. In a letter to Miss Seward, Sir Walter thus speaks of Southey's epic: "I think Southey does himself injustice in supposing the Edinburgh Review, or any other, could have hurt Madoc, even for a time. But the size and price of the work, joined to the frivolity of an age which must be treated as nurses humour children, are sufficient reasons why a poem on so chaste a model should not have taken immediately. We know the similar fate of Milton's immortal work in the witty age of Charles II., at a time when poetry was much more fashionable than at present."

The intelligent reader will find many passages to interest him, in the letters written by Southey at this period, to his various private friends. Many shrewd and humorous remarks are interspersed, and various opinions are expressed, which curiously illustrate the character of the man. We will make one, and but one, more quotation from this portion of the work, as a specimen of the material of these familiar epistles. Our extract is from a letter to John Rickman, Esq., March 22, 1805.

"The abuses, or main abuses, of printing spring from one evil,—almost immediately makes authorship a trade. —er-sheeting was in use as early as Martin Luther's time, who mentions the price—a curious fact. The Reformation did one great mischief; in destroying the monastic orders, it deprived us of the only bodies of men who could not possibly be injured by the change which literature had undergone. They could have no peculium; they laboured hard for amusement; the society had funds to spare for printing, and felt a pride in thus disposing of them for the reputation of their Order. We laugh at the ignorance of these Orders, but the most worthless and most ignorant of them produced more works of erudition than all the English and all the Scotch universities since the Reformation; and it is my firm belief that a man at this day will find better society in a Benedictine monastery than he could at Cambridge; certainly better than he could at Oxford."

Having now traced the poet to his comfortable retreat at Keswick, it will be convenient for us to pause. In a future number we will proceed with our Biography, and in as brief a compass as possible present the reader with the remaining incidents in the life of Robert Southey.

AN EDITORIAL VISIT.

BY THEODORE S. FAY.

I WAS passing from my office one day, to indulge myself with a walk, when a little hard-faced old man, with a black coat, broad-brimmed hat, velvet breeches, shoes and buckles, and gold-headed cane, stopped me, standing directly in my path. I looked at him. He looked at me. I crossed my hands before me patiently, forced my features into a civil smile, and waited the development of his intentions; not being distinctly certain, from his firm, determined expression, whether he was "a spirit of health or goblin damned," and whether his intents were "wicked or charitable"—that is, whether he came to discontinue or to subscribe, to pay a bill or present one, to offer a communication or a pistol, to shake me by the hand, or pull me by the nose. Editors now-a-days must always be on their guard. For my part, I am peaceable, and much attached to life, and should esteem it exceedingly disagreeable to be either shot or horsewhipped. I am not built for action, but love to sail in quiet waters; cordially eshewing gales, waves, water-spouts, sea-serpents, earthquakes, tornadoes, and all such matters, both on sea and land. My antipathy to a horsewhip is an inheritance from boyhood. It carried me across Cæsar's bridge, and through Virgil and Horace. I am indebted to it for a tolerable understanding of grammar, arithmetic, geography, and other occult sciences. It enlightened me not a little upon many algebraic processes, which to speak truth, presented, otherwise, but slender claims to my consideration. It disciplined me into an uniform propriety of manners, and instilled into my bosom early rudiments of wisdom, and principles of virtue. In my maturer years, the contingencies of life have thrust me rather abruptly, if not reluctantly, into the editorial fraternity, (heaven bless them, I mean them no disrespect,) and in the same candour which distinguishes my former acknowledgments, I confess that visions of this instrument have occasionally obtruded themselves somewhat forcibly upon my fancy, in the paroxysms of an article, dampening the glow of composition, and causing certain qualifying interlineations and prudent erasures, prompted by the representations of memory or the whispers of prudence. The reader must not fancy, from the form of my expression, that I have ever been horsewhipped. I have hitherto escaped, (for which heaven be praised!) although my horizon has been darkened by many a cloudy threat, and thundering denunciation.

Nose-pulling is another disagreeable branch of the editorial business. To have any part of one pulled is annoying; but there is a dignity about the nose impatient even of observation or remark; while the act of taking hold of it with the thumb and finger is worse than murder, and can only be washed out with blood. Kicking, cuffing, being turned out of doors, being abused in the papers, &c. are bad, but these are mere minor considerations. Indeed, many of my brother editors rather pique themselves upon some of them, as a soldier does on the scars obtained in fighting the battles of his country; they fancy that, thereby, they are invested with claims upon their party, and suffer indefinite dreams of political eminence to be awakened in their bosoms. I have seen a fellow draw his hat fiercely down over his brow, and strut about, with insufferable importance, on the strength of having been thoroughly kicked by the enemy.

This is a long digression, but it passed rapidly through my mind as the little, hard-faced old gentleman stood before me, looking at me with a piercing glance, and a resolute air. At length, unlike a ghost, he spoke first.

"You are the editor?"—&c.

A slight motion of acquiescence with my head, and an affirmative wave of my hand, a little leaning toward the majestic, announced to my unknown friend the accuracy of his conjecture.

The little old gentleman's face relaxed—he took off his broad-brimmed hat, and laid it down with his cane carefully on the table, then seized my hand and shook it heartily. People are so polite and friendly when about to ask a favour.

"My dear sir," said he, "this is a pleasure I have long sought vainly. You must know, sir, I am the editor of a theatrical weekly—a neat thing in its way—here's the last number." He fumbled about in his pocket, and produced a red-covered pamphlet.

"I have been some time publishing it, and though it is admitted by all acquainted with its merits, to be clearly the best thing of the kind ever started this side of the Atlantic, yet people do not seem to take much notice of it. Indeed, my friends tell me that the public are not fully aware of its existence. Pray let me be indebted to you for a notice. I wish to get fairly afloat. You see I have been too diffident about it. We modest fellows allow our inferiors to pass us often. I will leave this number with you. Pray, pray give it a good notice."

He placed in my hands the eleventh number of the "North American Thespian Magazine," devoted to the drama, and also to literature, science, history, and the arts. On reading over the prospectus, I found it vastly comprehensive, embracing pretty much every subject in the world. If so extensive a plan were decently filled up in the details, the "North American Thespian Magazine" was certainly worth the annual subscription money, which was only one dollar. I said so under my "literary notices," in the next impression of my journal; and, although I had not actually read the work, yet it sparkled so with asterisks, dashes, and notes of admiration, that it looked interesting. I added in my critique, that it was elegantly got up, that its typographical execution reflected credit on the publishers, that its failure would be a grievous reproach to the city, that its editor was a scholar, a writer, and a gentleman, and was favourably known to the literary circles by the eloquence, wit, and feeling of his former productions. What those productions were, I should have been rather puzzled to say, never having read, or even heard of them. This, however, was the cant criticism of the day, which is so exorbitant and unmeaning, and so universally cast in one mould, that I was in some tribulation, on reading over the article in print, to find that I had omitted the words, "native genius," which possesses a kind of common-law right to a place in all articles on American literary productions. Forth, however, it went to the world, and I experienced a philanthropic emotion in fancying how pleased the little, hard-faced, old gentleman would be with these flattering encomiums on his "Thespian Magazine."

The very day my paper was out, as I was sitting "full fathom five" deep in an article on "The Advantages of Virtue," (an interesting theme, upon my views of which I rather flattered myself,) I was startled by three knocks at the door, and my "Come in" exhibited to view the broad-brimmed hat of the hard-faced old gentleman, with his breeches, buckles, gold-headed cane, and all. He laid aside his hat and cane with the air of a man who has walked a great way, and means to rest himself a while. I was very busy. It was one of my inspired moments. Half of a brilliant idea was already committed to paper. There it lay—a fragment—a flower cut off in the bud—a mere outline—an embryo; and my imagination cooling like a piece of red-hot iron in the open air. I raised my eyes to the old gentleman, with a look of solemn silence, retaining my pen ready for action, with my little finger extended, and hinting, in every way, that I was "not i' the vein." I kept my lips closed. I dipped the pen in the inkstand several times, and held it hovering over the sheet. It would not do. The old gentleman was not to be driven off his ground by shakes of the pen, ink-drops, or little fingers. He fumbled about in his pockets, and drew forth the red-covered "North American Thespian Magazine," devoted to the drama, &c., number twelve. He wanted "a good notice. The last was rather general. I had not specified its peculiar claims upon the public. I had copied nothing.

That sort of critique did no good. He begged me to read this carefully—to analyse it—to give it a candid examination." I was borne down by his emphatic manner; and being naturally of a civil deportment as well as, at that particular moment, in an impatient, feverish hurry to get on with my treatise on the "Advantages of Virtue," which I felt now oozing out of my subsiding brain with an alarming rapidity, I promised to read, notice, investigate, analyse to the utmost extent of his wishes, or at least of my ability.

I could scarcely keep myself screwed down to common courtesy till the moment of his departure; a proceeding which he accomplished with a most commendable self-possession and deliberate politeness. When he was fairly gone, I poked my head out, and called my boy.

"Peter."

"Sir."

"Did you see that little old gentleman, Peter?"

"Yes, sir."

"Should you know him again, Peter?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, if he ever come here again, Peter, tell him I am not in."

"Yes, sir."

I re-entered my little study, and closed the door after me with a slam, which could only have been perceptible to those who knew my ordinary still and mild manner. There might have been also a slight accent in my way of turning the key, and (candour is a merit!) I could not repress a brief exclamation of displeasure at the little old gentleman with his magazine, who had broken in so provokingly upon my "essay on virtue." "Virtue or no virtue," thought I, "I wish him to the d—."

My room is on the ground-floor, and a window adjoining the street lets in upon me the light and air through a heavy crimson curtain, near which I sit and scribble. I was just enlarging upon the necessity of resignation, while the frown yet lingered on my brow, and was writing myself into a more calm and complacent mood, when—another knock at the door. As I opened it, I heard Peter's voice asserting, sturdily, that I had "gone out." Never dreaming of my old enemy, I betrayed too much of my person to withdraw, and I was recognised and pounced upon by the little old gentleman, who had come back to inform me that he intended, as soon as the increase of his subscription would permit, to enlarge and improve the "North American Thespian Magazine," and to employ all the writers in town. "I intend also," said he, and he was in the act of again laying aside that everlasting hat and cane, when a cry of fire in the neighbourhood, and the smell of the burning rafters attracted him into the street, where, as I feared, he escaped unhurt. In many respects fires are calamities; but I never saw a more forcible exemplification of Shakspeare's remark, "There is some spirit of good in things evil," than in the relief afforded me on the present occasion. I wrote, after that, with my door locked. This I knew was, from the confined air, prejudicial to my health; but what was dyspepsy or consumption to that little hard-faced old gentleman—to those breeches—to that broad-brimmed hat—to those buckles—to that gold-headed cane?

"Remember, Peter," said I, the second morning after the foregoing, "I have gone out."

"Where have you gone?" inquired Peter, with grave simplicity. "They always ask me where you have gone, sir. The little man with the hat was here last night, and wanted to go after you."

"Forbid it heaven! I have gone to Albany, Peter, on business."

I can hear in my room pretty much what passes in the adjoining one, where visitors first enter from the street. I had scarcely got comfortably seated, in a rare mood for poetry, giving the last touches to a poem, which, whatever might be the merits of Byron and Moore, I did not think altogether indifferent, when I heard the little old gentleman's voice inquiring for me.

"I must see him; I have important business," it said.

"He has gone out," replied Peter, in an under tone, in which I could detect the consciousness that he was uttering a bouncer.

"But I must see him," said the voice.

"The scoundrel!" muttered I.

"He is not in town, sir," said Peter.

"I will not detain him a single minute. It is of the greatest importance. He would be very sorry, very, should he miss me."

I held my breath—there was a pause—I gave myself up for lost—when Peter replied firmly,

"He is in Albany, sir. Went off at five o'clock this morning."

"Be back soon?"

"Don't know."

"Where does he stay?"

"Don't know."

"I'll call to-morrow."

I heard his retreating footsteps, and inwardly resolved to give Peter a half-dollar, although he deserved to be horsewhipped for his readiness at deception. I laughed aloud triumphantly; and slapped my hand down upon my knee with the feelings of a fugitive debtor, who, hotly pursued by a sheriff's officer, escapes over the line into another county and snaps his fingers at Monsieur Bailiff. I was aroused from my merry mood of reverie by a touch on my shoulder. I turned suddenly. It was the hard-faced little old gentleman, peeping in from the street. His broad-brimmed hat and two-thirds of his face were just lifted above the window-sill. He was evidently standing on tiptoe; and the window being open, he had put aside the curtain, and was soliciting my attention with the end of his cane.

"Ah!" said he, "is it you? Well, I thought it was you, though I wasn't sure. I won't interrupt you. Here are the proofs of number thirteen; you'll find something glorious in that—just the thing for you—don't forget me next week—good-bye. I'll see you again in a day or two."

I shall not cast a gloom over my readers by dwelling upon my feelings. Surely, surely, there are sympathetic bosoms among them. To them I appeal. I said nothing. Few could have detected anything violent or extraordinary in my manner, as I took the proofs from the end of the little old gentleman's cane, and laid them calmly on the table. I did not write any more about "virtue" that morning. It was out of the question. Indeed, my mind scarcely recovered from the shock for several days.

When my nerves are in any way irritated; I find a walk in the woods a soothing and agreeable sedative. Accordingly, the next afternoon, I wound up the affairs of the day earlier than usual, and set out for a ramble through the groves and along the shore of Hoboken. I was soon on one of the abrupt acclivities, where, through the deep rich foliage of the intertwining branches, I overlooked the Hudson, the wide bay, and the superb, steeped city, stretching in a level line of magnificence upon the shining waters, softened with an overhanging canopy of thin haze. I gazed at the picture, and contemplated the rivalry of nature with art, striving which could most delight. As my eye moved from ship to ship, from island to island, and from shore to shore—now reposing on the distant blue, then revelling in the nearer luxuriance of the forest green, I heard a step in the grass, and a little ragged fellow came up and asked me if I was the editor of the ——. I was about replying to him affirmatively, when his words arrested my attention. "A little gentleman with a hat and cane," he said, "had been inquiring for the editor, &c. at the adjoining hotel, and had given him sixpence to run up into the woods and find him." I rushed precipitately, as I thought, into the thickest recesses of the wood. The path, however, being very circuitous, I suddenly came into it, and nearly ran against a person whom it needed no second glance to recognise, although his back was luckily toward me. The hat, the breeches, the cane, were enough. If not, part of a red-covered pamphlet, sticking out of the coat-pocket, was. "It must be number thirteen!" I exclaimed; and as the little old gentleman was sauntering north, I shaped my course with all possible celerity in a southerly direction.

In order to protect myself for the future, I took precautionary measures; and in addition to having myself denied, I kept the window down, and made my egress and ingress through a door round the corner, as Peter told me he had several times seen the little old gentleman, with a package in his hand, standing opposite the one through which we usually entered, and looking at the office wistfully.

By means of these arrangements, I succeeded in preserving my solitude inviolate, when, to my indignation, I received several letters from different parts of the country, written by my friends, and pressing upon me, at the solicitation of the little old gentleman, the propriety of giving the "Theatrical Magazine" a good notice. I tore the letters, each one as I read them, into three pieces, and dropped them under the table. Business calling me, soon after, to Philadelphia, I stepped on board the steamboat, exhilarated with the idea that I was to have at least two or three weeks respite. I reached the place of my destination about five o'clock in the afternoon. It was lovely weather. The water spread out like unrippled glass, and the sky was painted with a thousand varying shadows of crimson and gold. The boat touched the shore, and while I was watching the change of a lovely cloud, I heard the splash of a heavy body plunged into the water. A sudden sensation ran along the crowd, which rushed from all quarters towards the spot; the ladies shrieked and turned away their heads; and I perceived that a man had fallen from the deck, and was struggling in the tide, with only one hand held convulsively above the surface. Being a practised swimmer, I hesitated not a moment, but flung off my hat and coat, and sprang to his rescue. With some difficulty I succeeded in bearing him to a boat and dragging him from the stream. I had no sooner done so, than to my horror and astonishment I found I had saved the little hard-faced old gentleman. His snuff-coloured breeches were dripping before me—his broad-brimmed hat floated on the current—but his cane (thank heaven!) had sunk for ever. He suffered no other ill consequences from the catastrophe than some injury to his garments and the loss of his cane. His gratitude for my exertions know no bounds. He assured me of his conviction that the slight acquaintance previously existing between us would now be ripened into intimacy, and informed me of his intention to lodge at the same hotel with me. He had come to Philadelphia to see about a plate for his sixteenth number, which was to surpass all its predecessors, and to which he would let me have an early copy, that I might notice it as it deserved.

INVASION OF ENGLAND BY THE FRENCH.¹

ENGLAND, we are assured, is in a defenceless state. All Europe menaces her safety; France, in particular, burning with hereditary hatred of the British Lion, is perpetually meditating an invasion of our crowded shores. We meanwhile stand in our unarmoured innocence, indulging in deep dreams of peace, and ready to be devoured by our gigantic enemy. Sir Francis Head, however, has been favoured with a vision, and no doubt most people will consult his pleasant volume to learn the particulars of their approaching fate. The imagination has magical power, and will create for us the picture of England invaded by a French army, of our great roads filled by columns of Gallic cavalry, our capital occupied by foreign troops, and ourselves overwhelmed in the sack and slaughter that would desolate our wealthy city.

Suddenly, on a fine May morning, the sails and smoke of a strange fleet are observed on the horizon. Steamer after steamer, under convoy of mighty leviathans, appears in view. A vast armament displays its formidable length along the English coast. It approaches. The scared dwellers on the shore betake themselves to flight; the bells ring; stacks are set on fire; beacons blaze from cliff to cliff; the alarm runs along the country; and darkness arrives again, while the whole land is in commotion, and French columns are formed on English soil.

Some thoughtful patriots fly to the railway station. By "a few quivering motions of two little black needles," there appear simultaneously upon "the white dials of all the electric telegraphs in the United Kingdom the three words—MENE, Tekel, Upharsi; Angliæ, THEY ARE COMING!"

What sensations would thrill the nerves of all peaceful people! The great fearing for their property; the bishops for their revenues; the fundholders for their dividends; the landlords for their rents; the placemen for their salaries; the farmers for their crops; the parsons for their tithes; the tradesmen for their stocks; and the women for all but themselves. Then would the country, in unavailing sorrow, repent its niggardly economy. Had the proposition of Sir Francis Head been adopted, what a splendid result! Had we raised and paid a standing army of 150,000 men, we might set up the British banner, spread its folds to the blast, and meet the force of invasion by a shock of tenfold power. Our author draws a richly-coloured picture of the scenes that would ensue after the alarm was spread through England.

In our dockyards every ship of war would swarm like an ant-hill with labourers. Masts, yards, sails, and riggings, would assume their places as if by magic. Guns and powder-barrels would be rolled on deck. Trains of hardy tars, ready primed for battle, would pour on board; ship after ship would weigh anchor, and soon a mighty fleet, with the British flag displayed, would sail forth in search of the impudent invader. Next day the town would blaze with placards;—"LATEST INTELLIGENCE—HALF-PAST FIVE.—GLORIOUS NEWS—BY ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH. DESTRUCTION OF THE FRENCH FLEET OFF THE COAST OF KENT.—ROUT OF THE INVADERS AND TRIUMPH OF THE BRITISH ARMS!!!"

With proper deference to the military science of Sir Francis Head, we imagine that if ever our neighbours should be so mad as to attempt an invasion of our shores, the newspaper-proprietors might print such placards beforehand, and rest certain of the receipt of such news. He, however, confides little trust to the navy—the sole and sufficient bulwark of our island. From all parts of England he would have the red-coated gentry issue in swarms out of their barracks to crowd down and defend their coasts. Soldiers, rammed, crammed, and jammed by thousands into first, second, and third-class carriages, bullock, ballast, coal, and luggage-trucks, "would, in silent joy, through the verdant fields of merry England be seen flying along every railway in the kingdom towards the metropolis." Cheers would welcome them as they passed; the clink of arms; the roll of drums, the tramp of feet, and "horses to battle going," the exciting shout, and all the varied notes of war would perpetually strike the ear. All day and all night cannon would rumble through our streets, bayonets glimmer by myriads along our roads, every ray of sunlight be reflected from a sword, and the land quako under the ceaseless tramp of cavalry. The end of all this is most comfortable. The invaders, we are told, would be caught in the awkward position of having one leg on sea and the other on shore. The French officers would have to excite their troops, the English to restrain theirs. Ultimately, the Gallic host is to be smitten with the edge of the sword, routed, scattered, and driven back into the sea with awful and unsparing slaughter.

Next day the enemy would send by electric telegraph apologies and proposals of peace. London would be illuminated; John Bull would shed tears of joy. Pewter medals would be distributed among the soldiers of the line; stars and pensions among the officers. The army would then go comfortably into peace quarters, and be paid thirty millions a-year for standing between the people and their liberties. The nation could then express its thanks to Sir Francis Head by creating him field-marshal, giving him ten thousand a-year, erecting him a monument five hundred feet high, and getting the great sculptor Baily to execute a bust of him for the British Walkhalla.

But supposing the French come now, says Sir Francis, before my plan is adopted! Ay, there's the rub! The Queen, he tells us, is to be packed off to a fortified dockyard, in a safe conveyance, marked,—"Royalty; with care. This side up." The army is to follow her into close quarters, and abandon the palaces, the Houses of Parliament, the bishops' castles, the Bank, the wealth, the property, not to mention the people of London, to their fate. What would that fate be? Sir Francis will explain presently. Meanwhile, he tells the reason why the useless and costly army we already have should not fight. If it fought and were destroyed, "the British nation would be ANNihilated; whereas, if London only were to be captured, the nation would be RUINED, but not ANNihilated." The country must wait three years to stir its blood up for an assault on the invader!

As for defending London by an entrenched line of positions, it would take a long time, and cost, at least, two millions, which Sir Francis hardly hopes will be expended on it. Holding it unfortified, would be impossible. The cities of Spain, containing massively-built convents, with flat roofs and covered balconies, can resist no siege, therefore London could not. The reasoning is cogent; but we pass it by. The French army is on the march! It sweeps the country as it goes. Farmhouses, villages, towns, and cities, are devastated by the way, and foreign troops are quartered under every English roof on the road. Sir Francis shall carry on the narrative:—

"The French army, after leisurely marching towards London, through—say Maidstone, Tunbridge, and Chatham, its right resting on the Thames, would probably encamp on and in the neighbourhood of Blackheath, and here Woolwich, OUR MAIN AND ALMOST ONLY ARSENAL, in which all our brass guns are made,—the great dépôt of guns and ordnance preparations for our navy, as, also, for the preparation of our shells, rockets, fireworks, and cartridges,— would fall into his hands!

"Remaining here for a few days, until his rear, filled up by successive reinforcements from France, had increased his force to, say 200,000 men, he might then safely inform the French admiral that he and his fleet being no longer required, might quietly return to Cherbourg; for it is evident that if the French army, after reaching Blackheath, were to be conquered, they would neither as corpses, nor as prisoners of war, require their own fleet, and that if they were not conquered, the ships and navy of England would be but too happy to take them back to France the instant they were disposed to return there.

"About a month after the French ships had arrived at Cherbourg, there would probably arrive in the Channel in a state of profuse perspiration, caused by eager and excessive haste, the British Mediterranean fleet, the admiral of which would be apprised by a communication, possibly dated, 'Admiralty, London,' that any damage he might do to French coasts or to French shipping would, by the French army in England, be duly placed to the Dr. side of its account with Great Britain."

Though the French general might from Blackheath dictate terms of submission to the English nation, he would probably prefer to imitate that great bully Napoleon, and do so in a conquered capital. Accordingly, with drums beating, trumpets braying, and banners flying, he would march into London, and there, we are informed, would fix his camps at various points. Those that Sir Francis indicates are:— St. James's and the Green Parks, Hyde Park, under shelter of Paxton's glass palace, Regent's Park, any open ground about Hackney and Bow, Deptford Dockyard, Clapham, Camberwell, Brixton and Battersea, Highgate, Primrose Hill: he might emulate the ancient Roman camps, and look down upon London in all a conqueror's pride. It behoves, therefore, the dwellers in these localities to consider, whether they would not incur the certainty of having their taxes doubled rather than run the risk of an event like this.

All large buildings, warehouses, public offices, &c. would be occupied as barracks or hospitals. It would be necessary to provide shelter for the horses, and Sir Francis considers churches peculiarly fit for the purpose. So all parsons, whether Popish or Puseyite, would have to yield their places and preach in the open air. Next to the horses, the officers would claim attention. Each of these delicate animals would be billeted in a good house, requiring from four or five rooms, according to his rank, and insist upon living on free and easy terms with the family.

"The interior of the city would, of course, be strongly watched by powerful guards and numerous patrols, supported by detachments occupying strong buildings, either commanding useful positions, or in open places such as the squares. For these purposes and for the important object of maintaining a communication with the main forces in the outskirts, a precaution always of vital importance, the Millbank Penitentiary, the New Houses of Parliament, the Horse-Guards, Whitehall, the Admiralty, up to the National Gallery and barracks adjoining, and all the other great buildings round Trafalgar Square, as well as all the club-houses about Waterloo-Place and Pall Mall, would be strongly occupied, and to secure a communication from these points to Regent's Park, and also to interrupt any hostile communication between the eastern and west positions of London, the whole of Regent-street would probably be occupied. Lastly, to command the line of the Thames, which would, of course, be considered of great military importance, troops would hold, in considerable force, Hungerford Market, Somerset House, the Tower, St. Katherine's and the London Docks, the buildings of which are admirably adapted for barracks."

Having caught his fish, the French General would next proceed to dress it. Sir Francis describes this process in the language of a true tory. He endeavours to damage the liberal cause in this country by insinuating that it is allied with the national enemies, and declares that among the "humiliations" England would be compelled to suffer, would be "Parliamentary Reform," an equalisation of public burdens and public benefits, and the natural adjustment of the social machine. The French would, as he terms it, "lubricate the lower orders"¹ first, and then proceed to provide for themselves. They would employ bands of renegade citizens (of course, reformers) to work out their views. These detestable individuals would make the round of the town, visit every "respectable" house, and force from every family, say half its wealth. Furniture, wine, plate, pictures, horses, carriages, merchandise, &c., would be taken in pledge of payment. Tax-gatherers, with bayonets fixed, would ransack all our dwellings, and a few refractory citizens would be hanged by way of example. And the newspapers? they would fare terribly! To every editor a message would be sent that he should print nothing disagreeable to the invaders.

If these orders were not complied with, the unhappy editor, says Sir Francis, would have his coat pulled off, his whiskers clipped, his hair cut short, his face covered with plaster, and daubed with pitch. He would be tortured by the soldiery, perhaps with thumb-screws, and those delicate inventions of cruelty employed by the Dutch against the English at Amboyna. Should he remonstrate or cry out, his mouth might be filled with small pica, or visited by the end of a brush dipped in hot turpentine. The presses would be broken, the types confused and scattered, the forms dashed to fragments, the offices burned. Probably, every blank cheque found on the premises would be filled up, and presented at the banks by men with good means of enforcing payment. With thousands of riotous soldiers in its streets, London would then be a fine place to live in. You could not move without being watched—could not cross Regent-street unless under surveillance—and would probably be lightened of your purse every time you attempted to carry one. Should you wish to save your money by hiding it at home, you run the risk of being shot in revenge by a French sentinel. Meanwhile, the invaders would make their quarters comfortable. To supply the scattered camps, regular forage parties would parade the town. Butchers, bakers, grocers, wine-dealers, and venders of provisions in all variety, would be laid under contribution. London must support its conquerors. Scenes of debauch, carried to the highest point of excess, would multiply in every direction; and the ancient metropolis of the British Empire, given up to rapine, would suffer the penalty of refusing to support an idle army of fifteen myriads of men. We must be annually ruined to provide against an impossible contingency.

(1) The "lower orders" are indebted to Sir Francis for this graceful compliment, which we hope our readers of that class will appreciate. They would sell themselves to the French, we believe, for a promise of Parliamentary Reform!

When he had firmly established himself in London, the French general, armed with full powers by his grateful and exulting government, would consider what fruit should be reaped after so fine a season of success. In the first place, he would seek to balance the heavy humiliations France has, in the course of time, received at the hands of England. Every banner won on victorious battle-fields would be seized and "trophied in triumphal show;" all the spoils of Trafalgar and Waterloo would be resumed; exulting songs would be sung under roofs that never before echoed but to the sound of English rejoicing; our public buildings, our records, our House of Commons—all that we are proud of—would be filled by French soldiers, and guarded as the possessions of an enemy. Above all, the venerable flag, rendered sacred by a thousand years of glory, would flap its drooping folds under the triumphant colours of an invader. Insulting proclamations, vaunts, and threats, would be placarded on the walls, and messages would be sent to our statesmen, such as would make the blood tingle in their veins. The queen, cooped up in a dockyard, with Lord John and Sir Peter Laurie, would tremblingly await the turning of the tide. Meanwhile, Sir Francis Head, being called on to serve his country, would prepare a great dose of soldiers for the French, and Carlo Napier would exhibit that perfection of naval skill to which he so frequently calls our attention.

Having in every possible way enjoyed the rich feast of English humiliation, the French would next think about the solid advantages to arise from their achievement. In the first place, a small slice of India would be acceptable—perhaps that little territory called Bengal, with all forts, guns, and munitions of war belonging or appertaining thereto. Then their general would suggest that a certain small white column, set up, one fine morning, by General Wolfe on the Plains of Abraham, in Canada, should be removed, and the possessions restored. Thus would France be compensated for the shame and loss she suffered on that memorable day. The frowning fortress of Quebec, with all the fair and wealthy provinces it guards, must be delivered over. After that, an island or two in the West Indies would be acceptable. Then the little settlement at the Cape, and some good port on the Australian coast, might be ceded. When we had surrendered these, France might let us retain the rest of our possessions, if we would only quietly give up Gibraltar and Malta, with Singapore, Labuan, and Hong-kong, in the oriental seas. As a supplementary stipulation, we must recall Sir James Brooke, whose influence in the Indian Archipelago is rendering the English name so popular there that our neighbours fear to be wholly forgotten in that quarter.

Thus shorn of our colonies—for Sir Francis hints at no resistance to these demands—we might proceed to stipulate as to the amount of ransom to be paid for London. Computing its population at two millions, and valuing the personal interest of each individual at 25%, the sum would amount to 50,000,000%. Add to this an equal payment from the public coffers, and France might consent to spare London for 100,000,000%. When we consider that every citizen has already lost half his goods, and been compelled to contribute towards the support of the invaders, it may be imagined the cockneys would have to pay rather dearly for the privilege of entertaining such lively visitors. To be sure, a few young ladies, sociably inclined, might learn French from the foreign soldiers, and save their parents the expense of a boarding-school education. We doubt, however, whether this advantage would compensate for the evils of the transaction.

In addition to these demands, there would be certain treaties required to be signed with respect to commerce, slavery, the right of search, the limitations of the English colonial empire, and favourable terms of trade for the French. At length, should we gracefully yield, all would be arranged, and the invader would return to his capital after a three years' residence in the British metropolis. Of course we must pay his fare back to Paris.

Such are the humiliations—indicated rather than described—which Sir Francis declares we must suffer when the French choose to invade our shores. But should we be refractory,—should the English spirit burst forth, and Englishmen fly to arms in defence of their capital city! Invention faints, fancy is cold, and imagination is barren, when required to depict the scene that would ensue. London must expiate in ruin the fanaticism of its citizens!

At the signal of havoc, the army would close on the devoted city. A storm of martial music would sound around it, and troops would pour in on every side, to consummate its destruction. Soldiers, frantic with rage, would throng its streets; they would set the houses on fire, burst open the stores of wealth, ransack the dwellings, rob the churches, spoil the altars, sack the banks, burn the shipping, invade the palace, and trample down the throne. Crown, coronet, mitre, and cardinal's hat, with all the frippery of greatness, would be tossed into bonfires,—no place, no thing would be spared; no person, from sex, age, or station, would find respect. The more splendid the building, the brighter blaze it will make; the more "exalted" the individual, the better object of sport; the fairer and more tender the woman, the richer the prize for a savage and drunken soldiery. Children spitted on the bayonet; men hewed to pieces, or burned; women insulted and tortured—all these, and worse, are the horrors suggested by Sir Francis Head to accompany his view of the sack of London and the slaughter of its inhabitants: we cannot enlarge the sketch. Most readers are familiar with the ideas of a city in such a situation; to those who are not, we recommend a perusal of the recent work by General P  p  , on the Revolution in Italy. There we have, graphically painted, the most vivid pictures of the atrocities committed, by command of the Austrian Emperor, upon the brave republicans of Brescia. That will faintly suggest the idea of such a city as London in the hands of invaders, thirsting for blood and plunder.

At the end of about three years, when England had been ruined, an army and fleet might be gathered sufficient to revenge its wrongs. A poor consolation! At any rate, however, when the French had annihilated our commerce, stricken our industry with paralysis, stopped all the wheels of government, and brought eternal infamy on the nation's name, it would be some satisfaction to rout their armies, drive them from London, chase them to the borders of the sea, hunt them into their ships, and then, with our navy, to sweep their fleets off the water, and overwhelm them with ruin at a blow! If this be cold comfort, it is all Sir Francis Head affords us.

Now, however, that we have awakened from this broken dream of terror, we may leave speculations, and examine some of the facts which alarm Sir Francis Head. Europe, he reminds us, is concentrating enormous masses of armed men, which menace the peace of the whole world. In the event of a general war, our poor armies would stand but a small chance with the gigantic hosts of France and Russia. Let us first see what is the force of the English army, and then compare it with those of foreign nations. In England we have about 37,000 men; in Ireland about 24,000; in the Mediterranean, 8,000; in Asia, 30,500 "royal troops," with, perhaps, 100,000 in the pay of the East India Company; in Africa, nearly 4,000; in the rest of our colonies, 20,000;—making a total of about 230,000, besides 30,000 pensioners, more or less worn out; 8,000 dock-yard men, occasionally drilled; 13,000 yeomanry (why not 300,000?) and in the Channel Islands, nearly 9,000 effective militia. The standing army in England, in fact, is too small to protect, too large to be supported, and might well be replaced by a comparatively costless, and infinitely more dignified defence, in the shape of a national militia.

In France there is a regular army of 488,000 men, with a national guard numbering 2,630,000. In Austria, during peace, there are 378,552 soldiers under arms; but during war, the Landwehr, or reserve of the regular army, would raise the total to nearly 600,000. In Prussia, the regular army, on its war footing, is composed of 546,670 men, besides 100,000 above forty years of age, who could be summoned on great emergencies. The military forces of Russia amount to 950,000 men, so that about three millions of enemies may be supposed—according to the prophets of civil—to threaten the sanctity of our seagirt isle. But, as we have terrified our friends, let us appease their fears by a few facts borrowed from an able and well-informed contemporary—the United Service Magazine. They show the strength of those floating fortresses—the sole and sufficient defence of England—which place us beyond the danger of invasion. At the present moment, when war hangs like a thunder-cloud on the horizon, such an account is peculiarly interesting and valuable.

The naval force of Great Britain consists of about 688 vessels, of from 1 to 120 guns each, employing 45,000 able-bodied seamen, 2,000 lads, and 14,000 royal marines. This fleet contains 165 war-steamers. Our mercantile navy and our fishing marine supply additional stores of strength, perfectly inexhaustible, and ready trained.

The French navy consists altogether of about 400 vessels, manned by 25,000 men.

The Russian fleets are composed of 180 ships, manned by 42,000 men. The navy of the prosperous American Republic, of which England need fear nothing, since it is our best friend, contains 80 ships, manned by some of the finest sailors in the world.

We have no space to review, as our contemporary has done, the causes which contribute to maintain the absolute supremacy of Great Britain on the sea. No foreign navy approaches hers in power. As for a standing army, we want none. Sir Francis Head's proposal of a military force of 150,000 men quartered in the country is monstrous. The experiment would sink the country into bankruptcy, or drive it into revolution. The English fleets, in case of attempted invasion, will protect the English shores. No armament could ever leave the French coast with less than a year's preparation. Napoleon, with all his genius, was compelled to give up the darling scheme. He knew the heart of England was impregnable; and what he could not attempt, what man in France could now accomplish? By the time the invading armament was ready, our seas would swarm with ships, our shores would be covered with men, ready to defend their hearths and homes. At the signal, "They have set sail!" the whole country would awake. Every man would leave his fireside, every mother would send her son, every forge in the island would glow, and every anvil bear the strokes of hammers, shaping iron into pikes and swords. The railways would pour myriads on myriads of armed men to the scene of danger; the fleet, recruited from the merchant navy, would throw itself between our cliffs and the enemy's armament, and, in the words of the United Service Magazine, "the sixty thousand men would probably thank their stars if we left them a cockboat to paddle back to their native coasts."

If we have jested with Sir Francis Head, it has been with all courtesy, and with very good humour. We relished his book very much. We advise our friends to read it. It is full of a novel and fascinating interest, pleasantly written, and, in some parts, absolutely romantic. The ladies, to whom it is dedicated, must acknowledge Sir Francis to plead well for their protection. He is anxious for their safety. So are we. But all the fair ones in the country may rest assured, that if we decline to vote for an army of 150,000 men to guard them, it is not from a carelessness of their safety. On the contrary, we beg all terrified damsels to believe us to have such an opinion of Englishmen, that, when the occasion occurs, we would trust to their impromptu valour the defence of those who form the richest treasures of the land!

MY GRANDFATHER'S CLOCK.

I HAVE a peculiar affection for old clocks; especially that sober race of puritanical clocks, with long, lank bodies, that stand so primly in the corners of rooms, slowly and discreetly ticking away the hours, as if it were a sober, solemn business, this disposing of time, as in truth it is: and that keep their hands always before their pious faces, as if to shut out the frivolous forms and fopperies of their later days. How impertinently your new-fangled clocks appear beside them! With what a rattle-headed jerk they tick off the minutes, as if they were impatient to come to the striking, and hear themselves jingle in their folly! You see none of this in the good old-fashioned time-pieces. I think they abominate striking: it gives them such spasms, and they strike so slowly and fearfully, that I am sure they dread it. Then how pertly these new clocks put their hands before their faces, like silly school girls, tittering at everything they see! Give me the good old-fashioned clocks, in their rich mahogany casings, that smack of the olden time: the quaint old clocks, that look as if they had innumerable stories to tell me of my great-grandfather, who died an hundred years ago at Salem, in "the witch time." I hope I am not blinded by family prejudice, but I did use to think that my grandfather's clock was the worthiest clock that ever ran up and down in the race with Time.

I sat by the fireside one December night, looking full in the face of this old clock, counting its slow tickings, and wondering if it never got tired and stiff, standing there so straight and prim, and wishing all the while that my grandfather would begin his promised story. But he seemed in no haste; for he sat in his accustomed corner, quietly smoking his pipe, and looking steadily into the glowing coals; peering, as I thought, into the changing embers to recognise the familiar forms and faces of old comrades and friends. I ventured to express this idea in a whisper to a little urchin whom my grandfather had undertaken to "bring up," and who now sat before the ruddy fire, trying on for the fiftieth time his first pair of boots. He said he "thought it probable that he was;" and further, he "thought it sensible in the old gentlemen to look there, as he knew no other place than the fire where my grandfather would be likely to find the forms of those old soldier 'nobs' with whom he had caroused in the wars." Having relieved himself of this opinion, he carefully shut one eye for the space of half a minute, then opened it with a jerk, and went into the leather business with renewed energy. I was not a little scandalized at the impudence of the fellow, so I sat perfectly still, and relinquished my idea.

As I said before, my grandfather seemed in no hurry to commence his story, so I sat quite quiet, communing with my old friend the clock. I don't know but I might have continued to gaze at its honest face until this time, had it not suddenly stopped ticking, and distinctly winked at me! Yes, "Old Knick," that old clock winked at me; not lewdly, as is but too common now-a-days, but solemnly and drowsily; not once, but twice, thrice, four times; and then it nodded; and what with nodding and winking, at length I lost sight of it entirely.

When I opened my eyes again, methought I saw a long baronial hall, with a polished oaken floor, and quaint oaken panelling, and thick oaken cornices round the ceiling; and then there were huge antlers nailed upon the walls, and prim, stately pictures starting out from the oaken wainscotting, and a great fireplace on one side, with a roaring fire in it, that sent dancing and flickering lights and shadows upon the polished panels, and played fantastic tricks with the old paintings, making them wave and quiver, and nod to one another in the most familiar and friendly manner. I assure you, Sir, I could hardly believe the evidence of my own senses when I saw that there was a goodly company of old-fashioned clocks assembled there. There were fat old oaken clocks, plethoric gentlemen, who wheezed and talked with difficulty, and there were slim mahogany clocks, prim stately ladies of the old school, who tossed their haughty heads, and "bridled up," and made sweeping courtesies, when the old gentlemen saluted them and facetiously asked "how time went with 'em." And then there were brazen-faced, and solemn-faced, and wooden-headed looking clocks; but they all bustled about, and chatted, and gossiped, in a truly wonderful manner for such ancient people. My grandfather's clock was there, and a gallant sprig of a beau he was. His puritanical manner had quite disappeared; he talked a great deal, and cut a great many jokes, and paid such pointed attentions to a blooming widow of a clock, that he kept her breast in a continual flutter. Ah! his attentions were almost scandalous; such as I never should have suspected of the staid old clock who used to stand in my grandfather's kitchen and tell the church time on Sunday mornings!

Just at this moment there was a great bustle at the further end of the hall, and in stalked a gentleman whom I knew immediately by his scythe and grey beard, for I had seen a picture of him in the primer only the day before. He bustled into the centre of the hall, and said, in quite a cheerful voice for so old a man, "The company mustn't lose time!"—at which pleasantry all the clocks smiled. Then he took a bunch of keys from his girdle, and stepping up to one of the clocks, thrust it into his breast and turned it for some time: at which liberty the clock looked indignant, and made a chuckling noise, and seemed as if about to strike; but he thought better of it and didn't. When the old gentleman had visited all the company in like manner, he stepped to one side of the room and cried out that "now they were wound up they could go:" at which all the clocks smiled again, as if old Time had "come a good turn" on 'em. And now there was a great bowing and scraping among the clocks, and finally they all took their places on the floor and moved slowly off—"tick, tick, tick"—in the measure of the contra-dance. Forward and back, slowly, up and down, stately, vis-à-vis, this wheezy old gentleman balancing to that tim matron opposite, and that sleepy-looking clock at the farther end of the room hob-nobbing to himself, forgetting time and tune. Tick, tick! Mahoganies change; my grandfather's clock and the blooming widow down the middle; bless her! how her heart palpitated, and how amorously the old fellow eyed her! Ah, I fear he had but a sorry character in his youthful days, when he was nothing but a watch! Still, up and down, over and back (they kept wonderful time for such old people), until the Oaks got out of breath and the Mahoganies looked red in the face. Then they stopped and gathered into little groups, and began to be facetious and witty. One old fellow remarked that he felt nearly "run down;" at which the gentlemen smothered their laughter, and the ladies grew redder in the face, and looked out of the window; for it reminded them of "running down at the heel," and "heel" wasn't exactly a proper word to use in the presence of high-born dames.

After a little time they took their places for a Scotch reel, and my grandfather's clock was just swinging his partners off in gallant style, when the hall-door burst open, and in rushed a jaunty rabble of modern clocks! They came in laughing and chattering like magpies. They all had short bodies and slim legs, which they dangled about curiously, looking like a troupe of modern ballet-dancers. The old clocks were quite shocked at the indecent spectacle, and with a haughty step they all moved out of the room, except my grandfather's, who stood looking angrily at them. Zounds! what a clatter and bustle there was there! How the young clocks hopped and danced through the cotillion. Right and left, hurry and tumble, short bodies and slim legs—how they flew round one another and round themselves! Up and down, and off in tangents; and how they giggled and tittered, and couldn't have stood still if they were going to be burnt. And then, when they came to the jig, whew! how they "went it!"—rat-a-ta-tat! each one "going in to win"—and how the merry bells of each one jingled and rattled, keeping time to the clattering feet on the oaken floor! My grandfather's clock could stand it no longer, so he strode firmly up to the dancers and exclaimed, "One!"

When I looked up, my grandfather had his hand on the bed-room door-latch. He had told his story, and I had missed it. Reader, so have you; but if I'm so sleepy another time, you may call my grandfather a tory!—N. Y. Knickerbocker.

THE PSALMS OF DAVID.

AMONGST all compositions, these alone deserve the name of sacred lyrics. These alone contain a poetry that meets the spiritual nature in all its moods and in all its wants, which strengthens virtue with glorious exhortations, gives angelic eloquence to prayer, and almost rises to the seraph's joy in praise. In distress and fear, they breathe the low, sad murmur of complaint; in penitence, they groan with the agony of the troubled soul. They have a gentle music for the peace of faith; in adoration, they ascend to the glory of creation, and the majesty of God. For assemblies or for solitude, for all that gladdens and all that grieves, for our heaviness and despair, for our remorse and our redemption, we find in these divine harmonies the loud or the low expression. Great has been their power in the world. They resounded amidst the courts of the tabernacle; they floated through the lofty and solemn spaces of the temple. They were sung with glory in the halls of Zion; they were sung with sorrow by the streams of Babel. And when Israel had passed away, the harp of David was still awakened in the church of Christ. In all the cras and ages of that church, from the hymn which first it whispered in an upper chamber, until its anthems filled the earth, the inspiration of the royal prophet has enraptured its devotions, and ennobled its rituals.

And thus it has been, not alone, in the august cathedral or the rustic chapel. Chorused by the winds of heaven, they have swelled through God's own temple of the sky and stars; they have rolled over the broad desert of Asia, in the matins and vespers of ten thousand hermits. They have rung through the deep valleys of the Alps, in the sobbing voices of the forlorn Waldenses; through the steepes and caves of Scottish highlands, in the rude chantings of the Scottish covenanters; through the woods and wilds of primitive America, in the heroic hallelujahs of the early pilgrims.

Nor is it in the congregation, alone, that David has given to the religious heart a voice. He has given an utterance, also, for its privacy,—for the low-lying invalid,—soothing the dreariness of pain, softening the monotony of heavy time, supplying the prayer or the promise, with which to break the midnight or the sleepless hour: for the unhappy, to give them words of sadness, by which to relieve their disquieted and their cast-down souls; by which to murmur between themselves and God, the holy sorrow that heaven alone should hear: for the penitent, when the arrows of conviction rankle in his breast, when the light of grace would seem departed, and the ear of mercy closed,—then David gives the cry of his own impassioned deprecation, in supplication and confession. And when contrition has found repose, and the tempest of lamentation been stilled by the assurance of peace, he gives the hymn of his exultant and of his grateful praise.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER LI.

TREATS OF A METAMORPHOSIS NOT DESCRIBED BY OVID.

WE must now request our readers to draw on the seven-leagued boots of their imaginations, and, thus accoutred, to stride remorselessly over the space of two years. 'Tis soon done;—a slight mental effort, an agile hop, skip, and jump of the fancy, and the gulf is passed—time is annihilated. Let us raise the curtain, and mark the changes the destroyer has wrought. The world goes round much the same as it did before; two years make little difference in the personal appearance of the fifty-eight-centuries-old planet—no lack of births, deaths and marriages, to regulate the average supply of the human race; if the cholera creates a deficiency one year, more poor curates marry, and starving Irishmen take unto themselves wives, the next, and those "beautiful" babies, who contrive to turn out such very plain adults, multiply upon the face of the earth, and the thinned ranks are replenished. And yet two years cause strange alterations, when we dive beneath the surface of society, and become cognisant of the fortunes of individuals;—smiles have given place to tears, and the grief of the mourner has turned to joy; poor men have grown rich, and rich men poor, and the bad (with but few, very few, exceptions to prove the rule) have become worse, and the good advanced in righteousness; and the mass of the half-hearted, clinging yet more closely to this earth of which they are so enamoured, where their grave is awaiting them, see heaven afar off, and wish feebly, and for a shorter time each seventh day, that they were good enough to reach it. Thus the passenger train, with its cargo of hopes, and fears, and wishes, speeds along the RAILROAD OF LIFE.

In a magnificent apartment in one of those Arabian-night-like edifices, a Venetian palazzo, which,—having belonged to one of the great historical families of the middle ages, whose chief was, by virtue of his position, a petty sovereign, was now let for the season to a wealthy Englishman,—lounged Charles Leicester, whose own surprise at the change of fortune which could render such a description of him appropriate, had not even yet ceased. On a sofa opposite sat his wife, on whose knee was perched a very young gentleman, to whom we could scarcely sooner have introduced our readers, for the excellent reason that he had not made his appearance at the Cradle Terminus of our Railroad when last we treated of his amiable parents. The present phase of this extremely young aristocrat was, so to speak, one of ex-babyhood; he was in the very act of ceasing to be "the most beautiful creature in the world," and, as yet, retained enough of his pristine loveliness to deserve the epithet of a really pretty child. He exhibited in his proper person an instance of that strange phenomenon which (why, we have either no idea, or, we hope, for the sake of morality, a wrong one) always excites such extreme astonishment in the minds of all nurses, maiden aunts, and female acquaintance,—he was decidedly like his own proper papa and mamma. For the rest, when placed on the carpet, he preferred a quadrupedal to an erect method of progression,—had a strange habit of making the rashest experiments in gastronomy, by putting everything wrong and dangerous into his mouth,—never sat still for two minutes consecutively,—would, in the same breath, laugh heartily and bewail himself piteously, from exciting causes, which may be expected to remain a mystery throughout all time, and confined his conversation to two substantives and a colloquial hieroglyphic—viz. "Pap-pa," "Mam-ma," and "gib-Tarley," which last was believed to be an infantine-English compound of his proper name and the verb "to give," and signified an insatiable desire to render himself monarch of all he surveyed by a process of general self-appropriation. At the moment in which we shall introduce the reader to the party thus assembled, a servant entered, bearing a packet of letters on a silver waiter, and, handing them to Leicester, withdrew.

"Letters from England, by Jove!" exclaimed Charles, untying the string which encircled them.

"Any for me, Charley?" inquired Laura, who, in her position of wife and mother, looked the prettiest little matron conceivable.

"Two for me, and one for you, from Annie Grant, if I may judge by the writing," replied her husband, as he rose to hand it to her.

"Gib-Tarley, pap-pa! gib-Tarley," vociferated that individual in the prettiest of infantine trebles, making insane plunges at the letters.

Laura, raising her hand above the curly pate of her acquisitive offspring, gained possession of the interesting missive, then, holding "Tarley" out at arm's length, she exclaimed:—

"Here, take your boy, papa, he is in a troublesome humour, and I wish to read my letter in peace."

Leicester meekly obeyed, muttering as he did so, "Wide-awake young woman, knows a thing or two, that mamma of yours, master Tarley:" then taking the child on his knee, he continued, "now Tarley means to be a good boy, and sit quite still, because papa is going to be busy with the affairs of the state."

The effect of this exhortation appeared to be to excite, on the part of the young gentleman to whom it was addressed, a sudden and violent determination there and then to convert his father into an extempore high-mettled racer, which equine transformation he strove to accomplish by placing himself astride on the paternal knee, clutching a fragile and delicate watch-chain by way of bridle, kicking the sides of his fictitious Rosinante with immense juvenile vigour, and vociferating at the top of his small voice, "Pap-pa, gee-gee! pap-pa, gee-gee!"

appeared hopelessly immersed in her letter, so resigning himself to his fate, he murmured faintly,—“The thermometer stands at 75° in the shade, that’s all,” and started at a brisk canter. The progress of the ride, however, served to exhilarate both horse and jockey to such a degree that, ere long, a violent game at romps was established, which ended in papa’s perching his youthful son on his shoulder, and, still influenced by the equestrian hypothesis, galloping round the room with him, and clearing the sofa at a flying leap in the course of their rapid career, to Laura’s undisguised terror.

“There, my dear Charles, that will do, you will break the child’s neck and your own also, to a certainty if you do such wild things; now ring for nurse to take him, I want to talk to you about this letter.”

“Tarley,” however, by no means approving of this arrangement, and insisting strenuously upon a prolongation of his ride, his father, who it must be confessed rather spoiled him than otherwise, complied with his demand for “Gee-gee more!” by again dashing round the room with him, and continuing his headlong course till he had deposited his rider within the august precincts of the nursery, where the precocious Ducrow, falling under the baleful glance of an autocratic nurse, subsided into a state of infantine depression, and was heard no more.

Leicester, having returned to the apartment in which he had left his wife, flung himself, in a state of apparent exhaustion, upon the sofa he had lately jumped over, exclaiming—“That child will be the death of me, I’m certain of it; where he can get all this dreadful energy of character from I can’t conceive: it must come from the Peyton side, for I’m certain that even at his early age, I had a much more clearly defined idea of the dolce far niente than that unnatural little essence of quicksilver possesses; by Jove if he should turn out as fast when he grows up as he appears now before he has begun growing at all, it will be an awful look out for our grey hairs.”

“Nonsense, Charley, you’ve energy enough when you care to exert it; in fact it is all your own doing, you know you delight to excite the child. But now be sensible, and sit up and listen to me, for I really want to consult you about this letter.”

“As to listening to you, my love, I’m only too happy to do so at all times and seasons, and I’ll promise to be as sensible as is compatible with my general mental capacity, but in regard to the sitting up, you really must excuse me. I have a strong idea I sprained something in jumping over this sofa just now, my back or my shin, I forget the precise spot, but I can assure you it requires rest.”

“Oh, you idle man,” was the laughing answer, “how incorrigible you are!” and as Laura pronounced this condemnation she seated herself on a footstool by her husband’s side, drew out her letter and handing it to him, said, “They have consented to my plan, and are coming here in the course of the next fortnight; but I do not like the tone of Annie’s note, she must be much more really ill than I was at all aware of,

and there appears throughout a spirit of depression, which is so completely foreign to her nature,—I cannot understand it.”

“I have a despatch from the General,” began Leicester, leisurely breaking the seal, “perhaps that may tend to elucidate the mystery; what a fist the old fellow writes; the letters all hold up their heads as if they were a regiment of soldiers, and his signature bristles like a stand of bayonets. Oh! he ‘hopes to be in Venice by Friday week, if his daughter’s health, which has given him some little uneasiness lately, should permit them to travel with the degree of swiftness and punctuality which has appeared to him expedient in laying out their intended route.’ I’m very sorry dear Annie is ill, what can be the matter with her, think you?”

“From Bellefield,” returned Leicester, opening it; “he can’t come with the Grants, but he’ll follow them before long. He has backed the Dodona colt for the Derby, and has got a heavier book on the race than he likes; he was hit hard at the last Newmarket meeting, and if anything were to go wrong with the colt, and he not on the spot to hedge, on the first hint, the consequences might be more unpleasant than people in general are aware of. Well! thank heaven, with all my follies I always contrived to keep clear of the betting ring. I don’t like that note of Belle’s; he’ll get into some awful scrape if he does not take care.”

“For which I shall not pity him one bit,” rejoined Laura; “born to a high position, gifted with a princely fortune; if he chooses to disgrace the one, and squander the other by gambling with a set of blacklegs, he deserves whatever he may meet with. I hope I have not pained you, Charley dearest,” she continued, observing a slight shade of annoyance on her husband’s good-humoured face; “but truth is truth; I cannot like that man; I wish he were not your brother, and, oh! how I wish he were not to be the husband of our darling Annie. I say, Charley, how came it you never fell in love with her yourself? do you know—don’t be conceited now—I think I was very lucky to get you under the circumstances?”

A gay laughing answer rose to the lips of Charles Leicester, and then the memory of the empty heartless life he had led before his marriage, and the deep true happiness he had enjoyed since, came across him, and drawing his wife towards him, he imprinted a kiss on her smooth forehead as he replied, “If I am, indeed, worthy of your affection, darling, it is you alone who have rendered me so, for before I knew you, I was a mere conceited, idle, frivolous butterfly, spoiled by the world, and with just sense enough (like most spoiled children,) to despise my spoiler, without sufficient manliness of nature to free myself from its trammels by any unassisted efforts of my own.”

What reply Laura made to this speech, if indeed she made any, we do not feel ourselves called upon to chronicle; suffice it to say that she did not, by word, look, or deed, evince the smallest symptom of having repented of her bargain. A pause ensued, which was broken by Leicester, who exclaimed,

"By Jove! I was very nearly forgetting all about it—what's o'clock?" then drawing out a small enamelled watch, one of the relics of former days of dandyism, he continued, "half-past three; there is just time. I have procured an order to see the pictures Cardinal d'Ancona was telling you about last week."

"Oh, the two paintings from Lord Byron's Giaour, by the young artist about whom no one knows anything, and who is said to be a genius? I'm so glad; when shall we go?" inquired Laura.

"Why, it's a case of Hobson's choice," returned Leicester, "for it seems the painter was so tormented by idle people coming to his studio, that he has been forced to lay down a rule only to admit visitors on two days in the week, from three till five; but the oddest part of the business is that he chooses to be absent on these occasions, leaving an old attendant to play cicerone—in fact, there appears to be some kind of mystery about the man; however, to-day is the day, so the sooner we're off, the better, more especially as I must be with the Consul by half-past four."

"I shall be ready in less than five minutes," rejoined Laura, "so order round the carriage, and let us prosecute this wondrous adventure by all means—a mystery is such a rarity in these matter-of-fact days, that even so small a one as that of a man who prefers avoiding one's notice instead of seeking to obtrude himself upon it, is interesting."

"When will women cease to be curious?" soliloquised Leicester, elongating his body in order to reach the bell-rope without the trouble of rising.—Another quarter of an hour saw them en route.

In obedience to Leicester's directions the carriage stopped at the door of a small house, at the corner of a street turning out of the square of St. Mark's. On presenting the order, an old man with grey hair came forward, and ushered the visitors into a room lighted by a sky-light, beneath which were arranged various pictures, some finished, others in a less forward state of preparation. After examining several of the smaller sketches, which displayed unusual talent, both Leicester and his wife paused with one accord before a large painting. The old cicerone approached them, "That is the picture," he said in Italian, "about which every one is talking; it is very grand, but the companion picture is finer; the Signore has refused 800 guineas for the pair. They are taken from your Lord Byron's poem the Giaour; here is the passage, ecco lo!"—As he spoke he pointed to the following stanzas:—

"With sabre shiver'd to the hilt,
Yet dripping with the blood he spilt;
Yet strain'd within the sever'd hand
Which quivers round that faithless brand;
His turban far behind him roll'd,
And cleft in twain its firmest fold;
His flowing robe by falchion torn,
And crimson as those clouds of morn
That, streak'd with dusky red, portend
The day shall have a stormy end;

A stain on every bush that bore
A fragment of his palampore,
His breast with wounds unnumber'd riven,
His back to earth, his face to heaven,
Fall'n Hassan lies—his unclosed eye
Yet lowering on his enemy,
As if the hour that seal'd his fate
Surviving left his quenchless hate;
And o'er him bends that foe with brow,
As dark as his that bled below."

The artist had, indeed, well represented the fearful tragedy; the principal light in the painting fell upon the figure, and especially the face of the prostrate Hassan, which, convulsed by the death agony, yet glanced with an expression of "quenchless hate" upon his destroyer. The features of the Giaour, owing to the position in which he stood, with one foot planted on the breast of his fallen enemy, were not visible, but his figure was tall and commanding, and his attitude in the highest degree expressive of triumphant power. Leaning against the same easel stood the companion picture—it contained but a single figure, but it was one which having seen, it was scarcely possible to forget, such a living embodiment did it present of hopeless despair. The stony eye, the sunken cheek, the stern yet spiritless mouth,—all spoke of one who had indeed "nothing left to love or hate," all realized the painful description of "the vacant bosom's wilderness," that paralysis of the soul in which "The keenest pangs the wretched find

Are rapture to the dreary void,
The leafless desert of the mind."

In this painting, also, the features of the Giaour were partially concealed by the hood of a monk's frock, which threw a deep shade across them, and the drooping nerveless figure served in great degree to tell the tale. The two pictures were entitled "Revenge and its fruits." Laura and her husband gazed at them long and silently; at length Leicester observed, with the air of a man who tries to dissipate a sentiment akin to superstitious fear, by listening to the sound of his own voice,—

"'Pon my word, they are very extraordinary pictures; there's I don't know what about them—a kind of uncomfortable fascination—they're very horrible, but they're very clever, eh?"

"Oh! they are most wonderful," returned Laura, in a subdued voice, as if she almost feared to trust herself to speak; "particularly the second. I never saw anything express such utter hopelessness as that face and attitude; one feels that active pain even would be a relief to the monotony of that dull despair. What an uncommon person the artist must be; the execution is good, but it is the mind in the pictures that is so extraordinary."

Leicester, who, during this speech, had been attentively examining the face of the prostrate Hassan, suddenly exclaimed, "Yes! of course, now I see who it is; look here, Laura, do you perceive a likeness to anybody you know in the face of this floored individual?"

Thus accosted, Laura, after a moment's scrutiny, replied, "It is like your brother."

"Just what struck me," returned Leicester; "what a quaint coincidence! I've seen some one somewhere, of whom the other fellow reminds me too."

"The figure bears a shadowy resemblance to the Signor Luigi himself, Eccellenza," observed the old attendant; "at least I have always thought so."

"He must be rather an alarming, sanguinary kind of personage, at that rate; he has not flattered himself, I must say."

"The Signore is tall and dark, but handsome as the Belvidere Apollo—he is not sanguinary as you say, Signore, but of a kindness which touches the heart. I am bound to love him, for he saved me from ruin."

"How was that?" tell me, asked Laura in a tone of interest.

"My dear Laura, I am grieved to prevent your hearing this worthy man's recital, but unfortunately it only wants five minutes of the time at which I promised to be with the Consul."

"How long shall you be obliged to stay with him?" inquired his wife.

"Less than half an hour, perhaps twenty minutes would suffice," was the reply; "shall I leave you here and come back for you before five o'clock?"

"There are several pictures the Signora has not yet examined," suggested the old man. Thus urged, Laura consented to remain: an idea which she would not confess even to her husband, so wild and fanciful did she feel it to be, had taken possession of her, and her curiosity in regard to the mysterious artist had become redoubled.

"You were going to tell me some anecdote," she observed, as Leicester quitted the studio.

The Ciccone, who was a venerable looking old man with grey hair, and a thoroughly Italian cast of features, placed a chair for the lady before a view in Venice, at which she had not yet looked, and then resumed—

"Favorisca di sedersi la prego Signora. I was going to relate how the Signore, whom I serve, generously rescued me from ruin; but to do so I must trouble the Eccellenza with a few particulars of my own history. I was originally educated as a painter, but although I was a correct copyist, and possessed some skill in mixing colours, I had not the afflatus, the inexplicable, the divine gift of genius, which cannot be acquired. Look at these pictures," he continued, warming into enthusiasm as he pointed to the paintings from the Giaour; "in my prime I could execute better than that, my colouring was richer and smoother, my shades less hard and abrupt, though to acquire that skill had cost me fifteen years constant study; but alas! the mind was wanting. I could execute but I could not conceive—my pictures would never have entranced any one as you were entranced before those great soul-creations!" He paused, sighed deeply, then resumed, "So I grew poor, I had a wife and children to support, and I bent my pride to become a scene painter at the Fenice Theatre. I worked there twenty long years, and then from over use my eyesight grew dim, and they discarded me. After that I was employed by the great painter of the day, Signore B—elli, to prepare canvasses and mix colours for the young artists whom he instructed. A year and a half ago a pupil came to study with him—he was a stranger—"

"Of what country?" inquired Laura, eagerly.

"I cannot inform the signora. He speaks French, German, Italian, and very rarely English, equally well, but I think he is not a fellow countryman of mine. The other young artists, who frequented B—elli's studio, would often tease me for sport, but the Signore was always kind, and would not permit them to do so when he was present. One day a pupil who was finishing the drapery of a Madonna and child, of which picture all the more important parts had been painted by B—elli himself, called to me to bring him some particular colour which he required—in my haste I stumbled, and overthrew a flask of oil, which fell upon the not yet dry painting, entirely obliterating the features of the Madonna. Irritated at the difficulty into which I had plunged both him and myself, the student sprang up and seized me by the throat; in a moment the Signore Luigi interfered, and compressing the youth's arm in his powerful grasp, forced him to release me.

"Remember, Carlo," he said, gently, "Antonelli is an old man."

"He has ruined himself and me!" exclaimed the other, clasping his hands in despair; "B—elli will discharge him without doubt, and me he will refuse to instruct any longer."

"Perhaps there is yet an alternative," urged the Signore Luigi; "B—elli will not return till to-morrow morning; much may be done in eighteen hours; I will strive to restore the face."

"He immediately set to work; fortunately he paints with as much quickness as skill. When night drew near he dismissed us; through the long hours of darkness he laboured incessantly, pausing neither for sleep nor refreshment. With the earliest ray of dawn I was again at the studio; he was painting still, calm, earnest, grave, as is his wont, only appearing a little paler than usual; but such a work of art had grown beneath his hand, such a marvellous creation! the Madonna herself could not have appeared more lovely than was that heavenly face. It was completed ere B—elli arrived; when he beheld it he was amazed.

"What inspired hand has traced those features?" he demanded.

"The history was related to him. He once more examined the picture, then turning to the Signore, who stood near, with folded arms, gazing on the other's excitement with an air of cold indifference, he exclaimed, in a tone of mingled admiration and rage, 'Go, I can teach thee no longer; it is thou shouldst be the master.'

"The Signore took him at his word. He engaged these painting rooms, arranged with B—elli that I should accompany him, and is now the first painter in Italy as to talent, and when his execution is a little more perfected,—ah! se ne saprà qualche cosa, we shall see men will talk of him!"

"And the head was very lovely, was it? what style of face was it?" inquired Laura.

"How can I tell you? it was perfection, vi bisognava vederla," was the enthusiastic reply. "Stay," he continued, glancing at the clock, which now wanted only ten minutes of five; "I have an idea; there is yet time, but you must never say that you have seen it. Here, follow me;" and drawing out a key, he unlocked a door leading into a small apartment, comfortably though simply furnished, and fitted up with bookshelves somewhat after the fashion of an English study; "Ecco!" resumed Antonelli, "he has again sketched the head, but the subject is different. He will not allow me to place this picture in the studio, though it is such a gem I could sell it for a large price."

As he spoke, he drew back a curtain, and the light fell upon a small picture, painted with greater care, and more elaborately finished than any which Laura had yet seen. It represented a girl of exquisite beauty, in a kneeling attitude, with her arms flung sportively around the neck of a magnificent dog, her golden tresses falling over and mingling with the waves of his shaggy coat.

As Laura gazed, her colour went and came quickly and her eyes seemed to grow to the canvass: both girl and dog were portraits done to the life, and she recognised each of them immediately—her wild conjecture was then the truth!—her determination was instantly taken. Seating herself, as if to examine the picture more nearly, she contrived by one or two artful questions, to set the garrulous old man talking again; and, forgetful of the flight of moments, drew him on to relate to her how the Signore had discovered that his youngest born, the son of his old age, possessed a talent for painting, and how the Signore was giving him lessons, and the talent was daily developing under such favourable circumstances, until the old man had begun to hope that the boy might succeed better than his father had done, and retrieve the shipwrecked fortunes of the Antonellis.

While he was yet in the midst of his recital the clock struck five, and almost at the same moment a quick active footstep was heard bounding up the staircase, and the deep tones of a man's voice exclaimed:—

"Antonelli, Antonelli, dove sei buon' amico?"

With a horror-stricken glance at his companion, the old man was about to rush precipitately out of the room, when Laura, quietly laying her hand upon his arm said:—

"There is nothing to be alarmed about! bisogna ch'io gli parli.—tell the Signore that an old friend is waiting to see him."

As she spoke a tall graceful figure appeared at the door of the study, and stopped in amazement on perceiving how it was tenanted. In no way embarrassed by the situation in which she found herself, Laura rose from her seat with the same degree of quiet, courteous, self-possession, with which she would have received a guest in her own drawing-room, and advancing towards the new comer, said, holding out her hand:—

"Your kindness will pardon the little stratagem by which I have sought to verify my conjecture that in Signor Luigi I should have the pleasure of recognising an old friend."

"Leave us, Antonelli," exclaimed his employer sternly; then carefully closing the door, he turned towards his guest, and, bowing coldly, inquired, "To what am I indebted for the honour of a visit from Mrs. Leicester?"

"To the fact that I was vain enough to fancy the pleasure I feel in meeting an old friend might be mutual; and that Mr. Arundel would not resent the liberty I have taken in disregarding the regulations of the famous Signor Luigi: if I am so unfortunate as to have committed a mistake, it is soon remedied," she continued quickly, finding that Lewis (as we have not intended say but the most transparent mystification in regard to the identity of the painter and our hero, we may as well call him by his proper name,) remained silent,—as she spoke she rose and advanced towards the door. Her look and words recalled Lewis's wandering thoughts; he took her hand, reconducted her to her seat, and then, in a tone of deep feeling, said:—

"Forgive me! but you do not, can not know the train of overpowering memories your sudden appearance called up; indeed I am glad again to look upon the face of an old friend, since you accord me the privilege of so considering you, glad as a two-years' exile from all who ever knew or cared for him, can make a man."

"Is it so long since you quitted England?" inquired Laura.

"It is," was the reply. Lewis paused, and then continued, "I left England under circumstances which caused me great mental suffering—suffering, which time and a complete change of scene could alone render less bitter. I travelled for five months, passing through Greece and visiting Constantinople; at the expiration of that period I wandered thither, my vigour of mind and body in great measure restored. The wonders of this country revived my enthusiasm for art; this, and the necessity of following some profession, led me to the idea of adopting the career of a painter. For a year I worked for ten hours daily in the studio of Signore B—elli, at the end of that period I quitted him and commenced painting on my own account; hitherto my success has surpassed my most sanguine expectations, so that I trust I have at last hit upon my true vocation."

"I am so delighted to hear it!" exclaimed Laura, warmly; "but how is it we have seen nothing of you before—did you not hear of our arrival? we have been here more than a month!"

Lewis coloured, bit his lip, and then replied, "My recollections of England were so painful that I resolved, partly for that reason, partly that I might keep my mind free from any anxieties which could interfere with my devoting my faculties fully and entirely to art, to avoid the society of the few English who were likely to come in my way; indeed, my only associates have been the young artists with whom I became acquainted in the studio of B——elli, and the family of the worthy old man who acts as my assistant."

"But you will make us exceptions to the rule," pleaded Laura; "Charles will be really hurt if you refuse to come to us." Lewis paused, his impulse was to refuse, but there was a genuine kindness in Laura's manner which vouched for her sincerity; had she been a man he would have adhered to his resolution, but it was not easy to say no to Laura.

"Forgive my apparent churlishness," he began, "but may I ask whether you have any of—of your English friends staying with you?"

"Not at present; Charles and I are leading a quiet humdrum Darby and Joan life, which need not alarm even your hermit-like habits. You must promise to dine with us to-morrow at six."

"You are most good-natured to humour what must appear to you my absurd caprices," replied Lewis, touched by her thoughtful kindness.

"But you will come," she said, holding out her hand to him.

Lewis took it in his own and pressed it warmly as he replied, "Nobody could resist such gentle pleading."

At this moment the door was flung open, and Charles Leicester burst in, looking more puzzled, excited and angry, than he had ever been known to do in the previous course of his existence; while Antonelli, vociferating eagerly in Italian and broken English, was vainly endeavouring to detain him.

CHAPTER LII.

IS DECIDIBLY ORIGINAL, AS IT DISPLAYS MATRIMONY IN A MORE FAVOURABLE LIGHT THAN COURTSHIP.

THE Honourable Charles Leicester was, take him all in all, about as easy tempered a fellow as ever breathed; but when old Antonelli informed him that his young and pretty wife was closeted with a mysterious stranger, at the same time positively refusing to allow him to enter the apartment in which they were shut up together, even he considered that it was time to exert himself; so seizing the old man by the arm, and swinging him round with a degree of energy which greatly discomposed that worthy cicerone, he threw open the door, and staring with an angry and bewildered gaze into the dimly lighted room, discovered, to his horror and disgust, Laura, quietly sitting with her hand clasped in that of a handsome young Italian, for such did Lewis at first sight appear. The period which had elapsed since Leicester had last seen him, had produced so marked a change in his appearance, that meeting him for the first time under circumstances so utterly disconnected with all former associations, he might well deem he was addressing a total stranger. Lewis's pale features had regained in a great degree their look of health, and exposure to a southern sun had converted the delicate complexion into a manly brown, while, having allowed his moustaches and even a short curly beard to grow, the lower part of his face was enveloped in a mass of glossy black hair, this, and the stern thoughtful expression of his countenance, caused him to look at least five years older than he really was. He rose as Leicester entered, and advanced a step towards him; then, seeing that the other did not in the slightest degree recognise him, he paused and exchanged a smiling glance with Laura as he marked Charley's puzzled angry expression.

Laura, entering thoroughly into the absurdity of the situation, determined to improve it to the uttermost; returning Lewis's glance with a look into which she contrived to throw an amount of tenderness that by no means soothed her husband's irritation, she began,—

"Ah, Charles, let me introduce you; you will be delighted to hear that Signor Luigi has kindly promised to dine with us to-morrow."

"The deuce he has!" muttered Leicester to himself, "he might have waited till I had asked him, I think;" then acknowledging the introduction by a freezing little bow, he continued aloud,—

"Now, my dear Laura, the carriage is waiting;" then crossing to the place where his wife was seated, he held out his arm with the evident intention of linking hers with it and walking her off forthwith.

But Laura clearly disapproved of such precipitation; for, without showing the slightest disposition to move, she replied,— "Restrain your impatience a few minutes longer, Mr. Leicester;—having formed so agreeable an acquaintance," she continued, glancing at Lewis, "you really must allow me time to prosecute it."

It was not in Charles Leicester's nature to be angry with any one for five minutes consecutively; with his wife, whom he idolized, it was utterly impossible; so, making up his mind that Luigi was a kind of lion, to be regarded in the light of an exhibition, and stared at and fed accordingly, and that Laura's sudden fancy for him was only an instance of womanly caprice,— "women always went mad about celebrities," he knew,—he made a short, penitent, civil speech, and then flung himself lazily into a chair, with a look of half-bored, half-sulky resignation, which, under the circumstances, was perfectly irresistible.

That his two companions found it so, was evidenced, by their simultaneously bursting into a hearty fit of laughter, increased to an alarming degree by the look of utter astonishment that came over Leicester's face, at their incomprehensible conduct.

As soon as Laura could recover breath she began, "Why, Charley, you dear, good-natured, stupid old thing! don't you see who it is yet?"

At the same moment, the Mysterious One approached him saying, "Have you quite forgotten the existence of Lewis Arundel?"

For a moment Charley gazed in half-sceptical astonishment, and then seizing his hand, and shaking it as if he was anxious to make up for his dulness by dislocating his friend's shoulder, he exclaimed, "My dear fellow, I'm delighted to see you—I really am quite ashamed of myself—but 'pon my word you've made yourself look so particularly unlike yourself; and the whole thing altogether is so very strange and unexpected, and more like an incident in a novel, than a real bona fide transaction of every day life—that you must hold me excused. My dear Laura, I began to think you were gone out of your senses, and that I should have to procure a keeper for you. Why, Arundel, then you've turned out a genius after all, a second Michael Angelo, eh! I said you would, if you remember, that day when you painted the cow?"

As he spoke, he stooped to pick up his cane and gloves, which in the excitement of the discovery, he had allowed to drop; consequently he did not perceive the effect his words had produced upon Lewis. Did he remember the incident to which Leicester had alluded?—would to heaven he could forget that which was branded on his memory, as with a red-hot iron, the fact that on the day in question, he had for the first time beheld Annie Grant! He turned pale—the blood seemed to rush back upon his heart, and oppress him with a feeling of suffocation,—he was forced to lean against a table for support.

These signs of emotion were not lost upon Laura's quick eye, and rising at the moment to divert her husband's attention, she observed, "Now I have at length succeeded in enlightening your understanding, Charley dear, I am quite at your service, and that of the horses."

"Come along then," was the reply; "you'll dine with us to-morrow without fail, Signor Luigi, alias Arundel, you polyglot mystery. 'Pon my word it's the oddest coincidence I ever knew, exactly like a thing in a play, where everybody turns out to be somebody else—come along, Laura; I must try and conciliate your old friend the cicerone too, for I swung him round in my wrath most viciously; I hope I have not dislocated any of his venerable joints; I got the steam up to no end of a height, I can tell you, when I fancied I had lost my love. Bye-bye, al piacere di rivederla, Signor." Thus running on, Charley Leicester tucked his wife under his arm, and having handsomely rewarded Antonelli, departed.

In the course of their drive home, Laura, after her husband had again and again expressed his astonishment at the denouement which had just taken place, inquired,—“You never clearly made out the reason why Mr. Arundel quitted Broadhurst, did you, Charley?"

"No! Bellefield hinted in his way, which gives one an impression without one's exactly knowing what grounds one has for taking it up, that Arundel had misconducted himself in some manner; but the General's letter quite contradicted such an idea, and spoke of him in the very highest terms. I thought nothing of what Bellefield said, for they never liked one another, and, entre nous, I consider Belle behaved shamefully to him on one or two occasions."

Laura paused for a minute in thought, and then inquired, "What did the remark you made about sketching a cow, refer to?"

"Oh! did I never tell you that?" returned Charles, laughing; "the incident occurred on the occasion of his first introduction to the Grant family;" and he then proceeded to give her a full, true, and particular account of the interesting adventure, with which the reader is already acquainted. As he concluded, Laura observed,

"In fact then, he beheld for the first time Annie Grant. Now I can guess why he turned pale when you referred to it: Charley, you must be very careful how you say anything about the Broadhurst party before him."

"Eh? and wherefore, oh wise little woman, endowed with an unlimited power of seeing into mile-stones?" was the bantering reply.

"Well, if I tell you, you must promise never to mention the idea, for it is only an idea, to anybody till I give you leave," returned Laura.

Charley compressed his lips, and went through a pantomimic representation of sewing them together.

"Nay, but I'm serious," resumed Laura; "if I tell you, you must be careful, and not blunder it out in any of your absent fits; do you promise?"

"I'll do more than promise," returned her husband energetically; "I'll swear by all "The heathen gods and goddesses, Without skirts and bodices, never to reveal to mortal ear the fatal secret—so let us have it!"

"Well then, if you must know, I suspect Mr. Arundel to have had better taste than you, and not to have escaped with a whole heart from the fascinations of Annie Grant."

"Phew——!" replied Leicester, giving vent to a prolonged whistle indicative of intense surprise; "that is the state of the case, eh? then my allusion to the cow was just about the most unlucky topic I could have hit upon. I certainly have a genius for putting my foot in it, whenever circumstances afford an aperture for the insertion of that extremity. I should not wonder if that idea of yours, always supposing it to be correct, might explain his sudden departure from Broadhurst, and account for this strange freak of expatriating himself, and starting as a second-hand modern Michael Angelo. I say, Laura, suppose the fancy should happen to be mutual, Bellefield may have had more cause for disliking Arundel than people were aware of."

"She would never have accepted your brother, if she knew that another loved her, and felt that she returned his affection; Annie is too good and true-hearted for that," returned Laura, warmly.

"Time will show," replied Leicester. "I only hope it may not be so; for, between Arundel and Belle, I should not know how to act. Belle is my brother, and to Arundel's good advice I shall always consider I am in great measure indebted for a certain plague of my life—(without whose plaguing the said life would't be worth having, all the same);—the only course I can take, if our suspicions prove true, will be to preserve a strict neutrality."

"And how would you wish me to act, Charley dear?" inquired Laura, taking her husband's fingers caressingly between her own soft, white little hands. "You know, I can't recommend Annie to marry your brother if she does not love him."

"Follow the dictates of your own good sense and kind heart, darling, and you will be sure to do rightly. I have the most perfect confidence in you, and would not influence you one way or another, if I could."

The tears rose to Laura's eyes at this fresh proof of her husband's affection; and as she reflected on what he had said in regard to Lewis's share in bringing them together, she inwardly vowed that if ever it lay in her power to do him a similar good turn, she would not be slothful in advancing his interests.

True to his promise, Lewis dined with them the next day; by mutual consent, all reference to the past was avoided, and no allusion made to any of the Broadhurst party. As soon as Lewis found this to be the case, a certain proud embarrassment, observable in his manner, disappeared; and, yielding to the delight of again finding himself in congenial society, he unconsciously displayed his brilliant conversational powers,—relating, with playful wit, or forcible and striking illustration, the adventures which had befallen him and the scenery he had beheld in his late pedestrian tour, till Charles and Laura, who had only been acquainted with him when the cloud of his dependent position at Broadhurst hung over him and concealed his natural character beneath a veil of proud reserve, were equally delighted and astonished; and when, late in the evening, he took his departure, they vied with each other in performing a duet to his praise.

"He talks so well!" exclaimed Charley.

"He knows so much!" cried Laura.

"He has been everywhere," continued the former.

"And done everything," resumed the latter.

"He is so clever and epigrammatic," urged the gentleman.

"And his descriptions of scenery are so poetical," put in the lady.

"His figure is so striking," said the master.

"And his face so handsome," rejoined the mistress.

"What a pair of eyes he has."

"And such a smile."

"Then his moustaches and whiskers are irreproachable."

"And his hands whiter than mine."

"In fact he is a stunner!" declared the baritone.

"Though I detest slang, I must confess that he is," chimed in the soprano.

"If I were a woman I should be over head and ears in love with him," suggested Charley.

"I am both the one and the other," responded his wife, casting an arch glance at her spouse, as much as to say, "how do you like that?" which rebellious speech her lord and master punished by stopping her mouth with—the only remedy we believe ever to have been found effectual in such a case.

From that time forth Lewis became a constant visitor at the Palazzo Grassini, and at last completed his triumph over Laura's affections, by asking, as a favour, to be allowed to take a sketch of "Tarley;" "he wanted a study of a child's head so much;" then the sketch was pronounced so successful, that nothing would serve but that it must be perpetuated in oils, and as the possibility of making "Tarley" sit still long enough for such a purpose, did not exist unless Laura sat also, Lewis consented to paint them together, although he had hitherto steadily refused to take a portrait, in spite of large sums which had been offered him to do so.

Laura received a second epistle from Annie Grant, postponing their visit for another fortnight. Her father had all along expected Miss Livingstone would accompany them, as a matter of course; but when it came to the point, that redoubtable spinster broke into open revolt, asserted her independence, nailed her colours to the mast, and determined upon death or victory. So resolute was she, that after a most obstinate engagement with sharp tongues, which followed upon two days of sulky silence, the General was forced to make terms, and yield his own will to that of a woman; so Minerva remained behind to garrison Broadhurst. As, however, the General by no means approved of his daughter travelling without some female companion, the journey was very nearly being given up, when at the last moment, a lady, the wife of an Austrian officer quartered at Venice, was discovered, who, seeking for an escort to enable her to join her husband, was only too happy to be allowed to accompany the Grant party. These delays, however, would necessarily retard their arrival for at least a fortnight. Days passed away; the picture (and a very pretty one it was,) of the fair young mother, and her little, rosy, merry child, advanced towards completion, and Lewis began to look forward with a feeling almost akin to regret, to the time when the sittings, and the agreeable friendly conversations to which they gave rise, would be at an end.

Since he had quitted England his thoughts and feelings had undergone various and considerable changes: at first he had striven, in the excitement of active adventure, to banish recollection, and after a time he succeeded so far as to take a lively interest in all he saw. The revolutionary spirit, which has since produced such changes in modern Europe, was then beginning to show itself, and he witnessed the outbreak of a rather serious émeute in one of the German States, in which he contrived to get mixed up, and by these means he came in for a couple of days' hard fighting, and a week of intense fatigue and excitement. This, paradoxical as it may appear, was of the greatest psychological assistance to him; it roused him effectually, and took him completely out of himself. The excitement was kept up for some little time longer, for, owing to the part which his old student associations had led him to take in the affair, he brought upon himself the suspicions of the Prussian government, and the next event of his tour was, in fact, a flight to save himself from arrest. During this period he was accompanied by a young German, who, much more deeply implicated in the affair than Lewis had been, dreaded that his capture might lead to his execution; and, unwilling to atone for his patriotism with his life, he and his companion hurried from the scene of their exploits, experiencing innumerable dangers, difficulties, and hair-breadth escapes, ere they arrived at that sanctuary for political refugees, the city of the Sultan. Having by these means regained his energy and vigour of mind, Lewis applied himself heart and soul to the study of his new profession, and in the interest of the pursuit kept his powers, mental and bodily, so fully employed as to hold memory at bay, and to require neither society nor sympathy; but now a change had again come o'er him; he had in great measure mastered the difficulties of his art, he had solved the problem whether by his talent he could secure a competency for himself and those belonging to him; constant and indefatigable labour was no longer an obligation, and ere the Leicesters discovered him, he had begun to feel, though he would scarcely acknowledge it even to himself, the want of those social ties from which, in his first frenzy of grief, he had voluntarily separated himself. In the society of the Leicesters he obtained exactly the amount of relaxation which he required,—Laura appreciated and understood him, Charles, without understanding, liked him—while on his part, the lady's society interested and soothed him, and that of her husband afforded him amusement and companionship.

As the day approached on which the Broadhurst party were expected to arrive, Laura became considerably perplexed as to how she might best break the matter to Lewis: she had once, by way of experiment, mentioned to her husband in Lewis's presence, the fact that she had received a letter from Broadhurst, and the start he gave at the name, the death-like paleness which overspread his countenance, the quivering lip, and clenched hand, told of such deep mental suffering, that, frightened at the effects she had produced, Laura immediately changed the subject and had never again ventured to allude to it.

The last sitting for the picture chanced to be fixed for the very morning before that on which the Grants were expected to arrive. Laura consulted her husband as to the affair: Charley stroked his chin, caressed his whiskers, gazed vacantly at himself in the chimney-glass, and then, putting on a look of sapient self-confidence, in regard to the reality whereof it was clear he entertained the strongest misgivings, he began in a thorough master-of-the-family tone,—

"Why, it seems to me, my love, that the present is exactly one of those emergencies in which a woman's tact is the very thing required. I should advise you to feel your way with great caution, very great caution, and when by this means you have ascertained the best method of breaking it to him, I should speak at once without any further hesitation, and—and—"

"I think you had better undertake the business yourself, Charley dear, as you seem to have such a clearly defined idea how to set about it," interrupted Laura, with a roguish smile.

"Not at all; by no means, my dear," replied Charley, speaking with unwounded energy. "A—in fact, so strongly do I feel that a woman's tact is the thing required, and that any interference of mine might ruin the whole affair, and in short, bring about something very disagreeable, that I have made arrangements which will keep me from home during the whole morning, so as to leave you a clear field."

"Oh, you dreadfully transparent old impostor! a child of five years old could see through you," exclaimed Laura, laughing heartily at the detected look which instantly stole over her husband's visage. "Now, if you don't honestly confess that you have not an idea how to get over the difficulty," she continued, "that you dread a scene with a true degree of masculine horror, and yet have not the most remote notion how to avoid one, I'll 'make arrangements which will take me from home all the morning,' and leave you to flounder through the affair as best you can."

"There is a vixen for you," exclaimed Charley, appealing to society at large. "Poor Socrates! I always had a deep commiseration for his domestic annoyances when I read of them at school, but I little dreamed that I should live to have personal experience of the miseries of possessing a Xantippe;" then throwing himself into a mock-tragic attitude, he ejaculated, "ungrateful woman! I leave you to your fate," and shaking his fist at her, pressed his hand to his forehead, and rushed distractedly out of the room—in less than two minutes he lounged in again drawing on his gloves. "What a bore time gloves are!" he murmured feebly—"here, Laura!"—sitting, he seated himself by his wife's side, languidly holding out his hand, while with the most helpless and unimaginable he allowed her to pull on the refractory gloves for him, which she did with a most amusing display of energy and perseverance.

"Voilà, Monsieur!" she said; "that Herculean feat is accomplished. Have you aught else to command your slave?"

Charley regarded her with a look of affection as he replied, "What a blessing it is to have a good, clever little wife to do all the horrid things for one! Good-bye, my own! When you have done victimising Arundel with your alarming intelligence, ask him to dine with us to-day; I want particularly to talk to him. He knows the people here better than I do; but it strikes me the politics of the place are getting into a mess."

So saying, he imprinted a kiss upon her brow, admired his hand in the new well-fitting glove, and sauntered out of the apartment as listlessly as though he were walking in his sleep.

Punctual to his appointment, Lewis arrived, looking so handsome and animated that Laura felt doubly grieved at having to make a communication which she was persuaded would tend to renew the memory of a grief against which he appeared to have struggled with some degree of success. Her task was rendered the more difficult from the conviction that Lewis's intercourse with her husband and herself had been of great service to him, by insensibly overcoming his misanthropic distaste to society. This intercourse, she feared, the tidings she was about to impart to him would effectually interrupt.

"Where is 'Tarley?'" inquired Lewis, after exchanging salutations with "La Madre."

"In the nursery, adorning for the sacrifice of his personal freedom during the period you may require him to remain en position," answered Laura; "shall I ring for him?"

"May I fetch him myself? I promised him a ride on my back for good conduct at the last sitting, and he must not be disappointed," urged Lewis, in reply.

"Agreed,—always premising that you take great care not to tumble the clean frock," returned Laura, with a gratified smile. "Who could believe that that man was the same creature who used to look so stern, and cold, and proud?" she added, mentally, as Lewis departed on his mission; "he has as much tenderness of nature as any woman. If he really does love Annie, and she can prefer Lord Bellefield, she deserves all the unhappiness such a choice will inevitably bring upon her;—her greatest enemy can wish her nothing worse. Well, 'Tarley,' are you going to sit still, and be good?" she continued, as that self-willed juvenile entered, seated in triumph upon Lewis's shoulder, and grasping a lock of his horse's ebony mane, the better to preserve his balance.

Tarley having signified in the very smallest broken English, his intention to keep the peace to the best of his feeble ability, the sitting began in good earnest, and terminated, as far as that young gentleman was concerned, in less than an hour, during which period, he not only tore his mamma's gown once, made a hole in the sofa-cover, and had one violent fit of kicking, he may, comparatively, be considered (all things are comparative,) to have kept his word. A few finishing touches still remained to complete Laura's portrait, and these Lewis hastened to add. The conversation (originating in Tarley's escapades) turned on education.

"The theory which I hold to be the true one is simple enough," remarked Lewis; "the first thing to inculcate is—oblige me by turning a little more to the light—implicit obedience; that once acquired—rather more still—you may, as the mind develops, occasionally give a reason for your commands—you see my object is to get a clearer light on the left eye-brow—thank you; don't move."

"But that obedience, to be of much avail, should be founded on other feelings than mere fear of consequences," returned Laura; "for that in sturdy minds produces obstinacy, in weak ones deceit and falsehood, and in both cases necessarily loses its effect as the pupil advances towards maturity. It always appears to me, that in our conduct towards children, we should strive to imitate (with reverence be it spoken,) God's dealings towards ourselves. We should teach them to love and trust in, and obedience based on affection and faith, will surely never fail for time or for eternity. Then," she continued as Lewis, bending over his work, failed to reply; "I should endeavour to make their punishments appear as much as possible the natural consequences of their faults; for instance, I should allow them to experience to the uttermost the mental suffering caused by pride and anger, and in their cooler moments point out to them that it may be wise, as well as right, to suffer even injustice mildly, rather than bear the distress of mind a contrary line of conduct is sure to entail. I should impress upon them the evil of coveting, by denying them the thing they so eagerly sought. In fact," she added, hastily, fancying from her companion's silence, that, for some reason, her conversation was distasteful to him; "I have a great many sapient theoretical ideas in regard to education, but how they may turn out when I come to put them in practice, remains to be proved."

Lewis, who during the conclusion of this speech had been painting away as zealously as if his life depended upon his exertions, though a close observer might have remarked, by his downcast eye and quivering lip, the effect Laura's words produced on him, replied earnestly,

"Would to heaven all mothers felt as truly and wisely as you do about education; were children taught such principles of self-government as you propose, there would be fewer aching hearts among us."

Having uttered these words, and sighed deeply, he spoke no more until he had finished Laura's portrait.

"There," he said, "I need detain you no longer; with the exception of a few touches to the drapery, which I can do at my own rooms, the picture is completed."

Laura approached and duly admired it, declaring the likeness of Tarley to be perfect; but feeling quite certain Lewis had flattered her terribly, at which little touch of woman's nature, the young artist smiled as he denied the accusation. And now the moment had arrived, when Laura must break her intelligence to him as best she might. Her straightforward simple nature disdained all subterfuge, and she began accordingly,

"There is a topic which, from a fear, perhaps uncalled for, of giving you pain, Charles and I have avoided, but which I am now compelled to mention to you;—you asked me at our first meeting whether we were alone; after to-day, we shall be so no longer, and the guests we expect are none other than your former pupil Walter, General Grant, and his daughter." Laura had purposely placed herself in such a position that she could not see her companion's features, as she made this communication, and the only sign of agitation which met her ear, was the sound of his quick and laboured breathing.

After a moment's pause, he said in a hurried, stern tone of voice,—“I cannot meet them! it is impossible, I must leave this place, directly.”

"Nay, that surely is unnecessary, no one here knows you but ourselves; you have only to resume your incognito, and in Signor Luigi the Venetian Painter, no one will recognise Lewis Arundel. We will keep your secret inviolably."

"Can I rely on the discretion of Mr. Leicester?"

"Perfectly: if he knows you consider the matter important he will remain silent as the grave."

"Be it so, then," returned Lewis, after a pause. Having paced up and down the room, he threw himself on a sofa, and covering his eyes with his hand, remained buried in painful thought.

Laura watched him with deep interest, till at length she could restrain the expression of her sympathy no longer.

"I must speak that which is in my mind," she said, earnestly. "I know that you are good and true-hearted, you can have done no wrong that you have cause to be ashamed of, why then do you fear to meet these people?"

Lewis started, raised his head, and flinging back his dark hair, exclaimed, almost fiercely,—“Did you say fear? I fear no living being! There is no man who can accuse me of evil-doing; my name is as spotless as your own pure soul.”

"Then why refuse to meet them?"

"Because I fear my own heart," was the vehement reply, "because I have sworn never to meet her again till I have learned to look upon her with the indifference her weak fickleness deserves, and that," he added bitterly, "will not be till grey hairs bring insensibility to woman's love and such-like gilded toys, or till she has crushed out the last germs of my lingering madness by marrying the heartless scoundrel to whom she is engaged;" he paused, then continued more calmly,—“You ask me why I refuse to meet these people; hear the truth, and then judge for yourself whether I can meet them; nay, for me, if you will, for I am half-frenzied by the anguish I have suffered, and am as incapable to decide for myself in this affair as a child,” (such puppets are we to our loves and hates);—and then, in eager hurried accents, he told her of his love for Annie Grant, his struggle for self-conquest, his signal failure, his fearful hope that she returned his affection, the parting, his confession to the General, the strange tidings he had learned in London, and then the cruel paralysing blow of Annie's engagement, renewed the very day after he had left Broadhurst, believing, on no slight grounds, that she loved him and him only. All the burning sorrow, pent for two long years within his secret soul, he poured forth before her; and Laura listened with glowing cheeks and tearful eyes, and a growing resolve in her brave, pure heart, to set aside all conventionalisms, and every hollow form of society, and if Annie should but prove worthy of him, to labour with all the energy of her earnest nature to bring these young, sad, loving hearts together again.

MISS STRICKLAND'S LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF SCOTLAND. 1

THIS first volume of Miss Strickland's New Series of Royal Biographies will be gladly welcomed by the readers of the Lives of the Queens of England, to whom the authoress inscribes the work. The merits of her previous book are too generally known to require specification here. When a book has attained so much popularity,—when it has met with such complete success (as the phrase is) among all-classes of general readers, they constitute themselves its critics; and the writer of such notices as the following, would be wasting his own time and that of the readers of SHARPE, by entering into an elaborate account of what they are as well acquainted with as he is. Saying, therefore, little or nothing, on the present occasion, concerning Miss Strickland's qualities as an authoress,—leaving her very extensive public to recall to mind the diligent research, the persevering industry and skill in selecting her materials from heaps of rubbish, the thorough earnestness with which she throws her whole mind into her subject, and the cleverness with which she presents it to others,—we pass, at once, to what is new to most of our readers, and will be undoubtedly interesting to them; viz. the contents of this first volume of the "Lives of the Queens of Scotland," recently published. Of its outward appearance a word may be said. It is a handsome looking, red volume, with the royal arms of Scotland emblazoned on the cover; and is in size, type, and general appearance, uniform with the volumes of the "Queens of England." Like them, it is embellished with two engravings,—the one a portrait of Magdalene of France, the first wife of James V.; the other a vignette, representing the marriage, by proxy, of that monarch to his second wife, Mary of Guise.

In her preface, Miss Strickland says, that the Life of Mary Stuart will occupy two volumes of this forthcoming series; and she mentions some facts in connexion with the subject, calculated to arouse the attention and stimulate the curiosity of those who are her fellow students in that double puzzle, the life and character of the thorough woman and thorough prince,—Mary Queen of Scots. Miss Strickland promises to publish "several unedited letters" of Queen Mary which have "escaped the research of Prince Labanoff;" and she also tenders thanks to the Honourable John Stuart for favouring her "with the use of Mary's secret correspondence, recently discovered in the family archives of the House of Murray." A secret correspondence of Mary Stuart!—and,—“found in the archives of the house of Murray!” “Surely, something must come out of that!” say the lovers of revealed secrets. But they must bate their curiosity, and bide their time; Miss Strickland's "Life of Mary Stuart" is not published yet. In the meantime, those who are much excited on the subject, and have not before heard of this secret correspondence, may find favour with the Honourable John Stuart, and get sight of these letters of the "fairest qucen on ground," if they can.

The present volume contains the complete biographies of two Queens, and the unfinished life of a third.

The first biography is that of Margaret Tudor. She was the daughter of Henry VII., and the sister of Henry VIII. She was married at the age of thirteen to king James IV. of Scotland, at that time in his thirty-first year. It could scarcely be expected that this should be a happy marriage. Margaret's education had been neglected, and even if it had been very carefully attended to, it was impossible she could at that age be a companion, in any sense of the word, to such a husband as James IV. He was an accomplished man,—a man of high intellect and fastidious taste;—he was capable of the strongest love for a woman of corresponding nature, and he could brave many perils to place her on the throne;—as he had shown in the case of the Lady Margaret Drummond, the love of his boyhood, and of his manhood too. Her cruel murder left James in "a distraction of grief such as dispositions at once impetuous and affectionate alone can feel," says Miss Strickland. His daughter by this private marriage, was brought up at "Edinburgh Castle under the appellation of 'the Lady Margaret, the king's daughter,' and finally married John, Lord Gordon."—Our authoress goes on to say:—

"She can scarcely be classed as an illegitimate child; neither can her unfortunate mother, a devoted wife to a loving husband, be ranked in the meretricious sisterhood of royal favourites. James the Fourth, after his heart-strings had been rent by the tragical death of his wedded love, became reckless, and unhappily formed illicit ties which were productive of much evil both to himself and his descendants. But had his second spouse, Margaret of England, been nearer the age of her hapless predecessor, or had assimilated with his temper and pursuits when she grew into companionship with him, perhaps his memory would be freer from such reproach."

"The great abilities of James as a ruler, the success which attended his plans for civilizing and enriching his people, the formidable position assumed by his country as a naval power, all obtained for him the admiration of contemporary statesmen. There was likewise enough of romance connected with him to attract the attention of the classes delighting in the picturesque and marvellous. The beauty of his person, the variety of his attainments, his skill and taste in music and poetry; the wonderful facility with which the hand that struck the lute and clavichord tastefully, could sway the adze of the ship-wright when building his mighty war-ship at Falkirk, captivated every one. Likewise, the singular penance he enjoined himself (for having been brought in arms against his father) by wearing an iron chain about his waist, to awake his remembrance of his sin when it hurt him, was appreciated as a most edifying action in that era."

A very proper sort of husband to be married, at thirty-one, to an ignorant, passionate tempered, spoiled young lady of thirteen, whose only recommendations were that she promised to be very handsome, and "danced with great activity!" He, a sovereign, too, accustomed to have every thing made easy for him; and, one can imagine, not much used to the society of boys and girls, seeing that he could command that of the flower of manhood and womanhood in his dominions. Yet he seems to have behaved with great kindness and consideration to this mere child. Their first meeting, after her arrival in his dominions, (she had previously been married, by proxy, in her father's court,) was one planned by him, on purpose "to relieve his young bride from the anxiety of a formal introduction to him, in the midst of tedious state ceremonies, with the eyes of a multitude fixed upon them." Miss Strickland proceeds thus:—

"He wished to make acquaintance with her before such ordeal commenced; and if his bride had a heart worth the winning, it was evident the King of Scotland thought it most likely to be won when they were disencumbered of the stiff stateliness ever surrounding royalty on public days. He entered the presence of Margaret Tudor with his hawking-lure flung over his shoulder, dressed simply in a velvet jacket; his hair and beard, curling naturally, were rather long, his complexion glowing from the manly exercise he had just been engaged in. He was the handsomest sovereign in Europe;—the black eyes and hair of his elegant father, James III. being softened in his resemblance to the blonde beauty of his Danish mother.

"Sir Walter Scott has drawn James IV.'s portrait con amore, and has not exaggerated the likeness.

"For hazel was his eager eye,
And auburn of the darkest dye
His short-curl'd beard and hair.
Light was his footstep in the dance,
And firm his stirrup in the lists;
And oh! he had that merry glance
Which seldom lady's heart resists."

"The young qucen met her royal lord at the doorway of her great chamber. The King of Scotland uncovered his head and made a deep obeisance to her, while she made a lowly reverence to him. He then took her hand and kissed her, and saluted all her ladies by kissing them. It was noticed that he welcomed the chivalrous Earl of Surrey with especial cordiality. Then the King of Scotland took the qucen on one side, and they communed together for a long space. She held good manner, (was unembarrassed,) and the king remained bare-headed during the time they conversed, and many courtesies passed between them. Incontinent (immediately) the board was set and served. The king and qucen washed their hands with humble reverence, and after that sat them down at table together.

"After supper they washed again with the reverences," which we opine to have been an elaborate series of bows and genuflections, performed with due solemnity. "The minstrels began to blow, then Qucen Margaret danced, accompanied by my Lady Surrey."

This meeting took place at Dalkcith Palace, August 3d, 1503. The account of it quoted here is given by John Young, Somerset Herald, who formed part of the English cortège that brought Margaret to her husband. Soon after this they were married; and after due merry-makings, public and private, her English escort returned home, leaving, however, twenty-four of their nation as attendants on the young qucen in her new home. Poor child! in spite of all the kindness, and flatteries, and amusements provided for her by the Scottish king and his court, she sends a very discontented letter to her father by one of the returning ladies. The following is a portion of it. The spelling of Margaret's many letters (for she became a great letter-writer in after life) is almost very bad—so is the hand-writing—and so the grammar, very often. The first paragraph is dictated to one of her ladies, the other is in her own hand, "mine evil hand" as she herself calls it:—

"Sir, as for news, I have none to send, but that my Lord of Surrey is in so great favour with this king here, that he cannot forbear the company of him at no time of the day."

It is scarcely to be wondered at that the king should very much prefer the company of such a man as my Lord of Surrey to that of his childish wife; or that she being perfectly unable to comprehend in what my Lord Surrey's attractions consisted, should be displeased at the preference. She goes on with her very natural grumbling:—

"He and the Bishop of Murray ordereth everything as nigh as they can to the king's pleasure: I pray God it may be for my poor heart's ease in time to come. They call not my chamberlain to them, who, I am sure, would speak better for my part than any of them that be of that council. But if he speak anything for my cause, my Lord of Surrey hath such words unto him that he dare speak no further. God send me comfort to his pleasure, and that I and mine, that he left here with me, may be well entreated."

In her own hand is the rest:—

"For God's sake, Sir, hold me excused that I write not myself to your Grace, for I have no leisure at this time; but with a wish I would I were with your Grace now, and many times more. And for this that I have written to your Grace, it is very true; but I pray God I may find it well for my welfare hereafter. No more to your Grace at this time; but our Lord have you in his keeping. Written with the hand of your humble daughter.

"MARGARET."

Miss Strickland says elsewhere, "Had Margaret Tudor reached one half the age of her spouse, she might have had more success in disputing his heart with the matured beauties of her court; as the case was, it could only be expected that she would grow up to womanhood with the passions of anger and jealousy in a perpetual state of exercise."

As she grew older, Margaret became a handsome woman, indeed,—a brilliant beauty, as far as a fine figure, regular features, a complexion à la Tudor, (all lilies and roses,) and a profusion of the finest golden hair can make beauty; she had also the additional attraction of a clever, quick mind, and great vivacity and warmth of manner. She was in many respects strikingly like her brother Henry VIII. She is at times childishly absurd and wilful—always covetous and passionate—full of cunning to gain her ends, yet imprudent in the extreme,—a woman of strong impulse and no principle; running headlong after the gratification of her own passions of the moment, with no regard of consequences, and at other times deceitful and calculating for petty ends. She is by no means an uncommon character; only the generality of such women are not so much exposed to public scrutiny, or indulged with so much power as queens were in those days.

After making a tremendous fuss about the legacy which her brother Henry withheld from her, and urging her husband to engage in a war with England, the war was no sooner actually declared than "Queen Margaret began to be excessively full of lamentations for the measure she had urged on. Her jealousy was excited by the correspondence Anne of Bretagne, Queen of France, commenced with James IV., urging him to do his devoir as chevalier-errant, by invading England, and marching three days, with banners displayed over the Borders. In token that she had chosen him as her knight, Queen Anne sent him a ring of immense value, taken off her finger.

"James was eager to make a diversion in favour of his ally by invading England, but soon found that his wedded partner meant to let him have little quiet in consequence, either by day or by night; the cause of grievance being that the Queen of France had written him 'ane love-letter.' Common sense might have represented to her that the Queen of France was a woman dying of decline. She was withal old enough to be her mother. King James, however gallantly disposed to the French Queen, had never seen her; neither was he likely so to do. The ideas of the disputed jewels, and the message of the Queen of France, working together in Margaret's irritable brain, either produced some uneasy visions or led her to feign some. The tragical events that soon after occurred caused her to give them forth as prophetic, in which representation she was supported by certain grave chroniclers."

The dreams, omens, and other supernatural occurrences which preceded the fatal battle of Flodden Field, are supposed by many to have originated with Queen Margaret; being devised by her to deter her husband from the expedition on which he was bent. They failed to do so; and he set off with his fine army for the invasion of England, having appointed his queen regent of the kingdom during the minority of their son, in case of his death. If she married a second time, she was to forfeit that dignity. All our readers are familiar with the dreadful result of the battle of Flodden Field. Margaret was left a widow and guardian of the well-nigh ruined kingdom in her four-and-twentieth year;—a terribly difficult position for the wisest and best of women to maintain, and one which it was not possible such a woman as Margaret Tudor could maintain long without doing much mischief. The powerful Douglas faction soon secured her to themselves by means of their young and handsome chief, the Earl of Angus, with whom Margaret fell in love, and contracted a second marriage. From that moment there was no peace in Scotland, until James the Fifth was able to assume the government, for Margaret would not yield to the supreme authority, or the guardianship of the young king, and the great nobles would not let it remain with her, but invited the Duke of Albany to be regent. In a short space of time Margaret grew tired of the Earl of Angus, (as Mary Stuart did Darnley, and for the same reason; he was weak-minded,) and wished to obtain a divorce from him that she might marry the said Duke of Albany, one of the best intellects of the age. After many years she obtained the divorce, but instead of marrying Albany, who would have nothing to do with so perilous a match, she married Henry Stuart, a young lieutenant of her son's guards, afterwards created Lord Methven. Nothing can exceed the moral indignation of her brother Henry at Margaret's flirtations, marriages, and continual attempts to obtain divorce. The royal Blue-beard is quite shocked at Margaret's conduct, and writes edifying remonstrances to her, which contrast strangely with his own matrimonial career.

Margaret Tudor left another child besides James V., viz. her daughter by the Earl of Angus, the Lady Margaret Douglas, who was brought up at the English court, and whose descendants were again blended with our royal family.

This Margaret Tudor, the first of Miss Strickland's Queens of Scotland, is a very important person in our history, being the one from whom the subsequent sovereigns of Great Britain claim their right to rule over the two kingdoms. Her life was a remarkable one, and, in consequence of her unprincipled character and imprudent conduct, she caused much domestic disturbance in Scotland, during the two or three next reigns. She contrived to keep both England and Scotland in a state of political ferment as long as she lived. She was a bad wife, a bad mother, and a foolish wicked woman. In reading her life we are forcibly reminded of Solomon's words, "As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman that is without discretion;" "Every wise woman buildeth her house, but the foolish plucketh it down with her hands." But, though it is impossible not to condemn Margaret Tudor, let us not do so without considering what sort of education she had had, for the situation she was called upon to fill at so early an age; what sort of life she was obliged to lead among flatterers in her husband's court; the numerous temptations that beset her, and that were double temptations to a weak, lively mind, and undisciplined feelings. Let all mothers and fathers beware lest they indulge their darlings too much, and forget that each one of them will be called in time to rule over some kingdom in this world, great or small, and must be taught in infancy to "rule their own spirits." The history of this queen is a moral lesson to all women of undisciplined nature; such as she is, such (let them not be too incredulous at the comparison,) in corresponding circumstances would they be, perhaps; for Margaret is by no means a woman of extraordinary natural endowments, good or bad. If "history be philosophy teaching by examples," then is this example one that we should consider heedfully, for wisdom calls aloud to us through it.

Of a very different nature is the next biography,—that of Magdalene of France. She was the first wife of James V., the son of Margaret Tudor, and the daughter of the chivalric Francis I. of France, and had the advantage of being brought up by one of the best and most accomplished women of that age, the celebrated Margaret, Queen of Navarre, that pearl of womanhood, the noble sister of Francis I. "Those whom the gods love die young," and the fair Magdalene, good as she was fair, was one of the many illustrations of that classic axiom. She was carried off by consumption about a year after her marriage, at the age of seventeen. Strange as it may seem, amid the stern and hard details of history and state policy, the intrigues and conventional forms of a court, one comes now and then upon a sweet little bit of romance; and very refreshing it is to the historic student to do so, especially if the student be a woman. We can see that Miss Strickland has written the touching story of this young princess con amore. Women, even when they are historical and biographical writers, and therefore strive to be impartial, are always made partisans by their feelings. It is easy to perceive that our amiable authoress has a strong dislike to the character of the uneducated, severely tried Margaret Tudor, but her best sympathies are at once roused by the romantic story of the carefully nurtured, untempted Magdalene de Valois. "Youth, beauty, and death, when found together, are always interesting," we heard some one say apropos of this princess. But they are of tenfold interest when we find them adorning a royal love tale. Let us repeat this tale for the benefit of such of our readers as are unacquainted with it.

When James V. was a boy, his mother, Margaret Tudor, entered into a treaty for the hand of this princess for her son. Her brother Henry offering at the same time to give his own daughter, the princess Mary, to the young King of Scots, Margaret dared not openly refuse that alliance, but kept up negotiations with both France and England, intending all the time that James should marry Magdalene, because she knew that Henry was endeavouring to divorce Katharine of Aragon, and in that case the princess Mary would be illegitimate. James was nine years older than his unknown affianced bride, and was in love many times before he saw her; he had had, indeed, several illegitimate children. But when it came to a question of his marriage, he determined to see the lady before he decided. He travelled to Paris incognito, somewhat in the style of his great grandson Charles I., when he wanted a wife. The results to a certain extent were the same. Each fell in love with the daughter of the reigning king of France, and married her. There is not, we believe any reason for supposing that Henrietta Maria "did love for love allow;" at all events, not to the same extent that the gentle young Magdalene did. She had had the advantage of a noble, pious, loving training, up to the moment when she saw the handsome prince whom she had been taught from infancy to consider as her future husband. She was an invalid, and probably spent half her days in a dream of love for him whose praise was always being sounded in her ears, and when all the circumstances of his visit to France are taken into consideration, it is not to be wondered at that Magdalene "surrendered her heart, at once, to the accomplished sovereign to whom her hand had been pledged in her unconscious childhood."

"The advent of a sovereign like James V., under such circumstances, created a wonderful sensation among the nobles and ladies of the French court, more especially the latter. They marvelled at his boldness in undertaking so perilous a voyage, in stormy weather, considering the roughness of the seas and the danger of the coast; that he should have ventured upon such an expedition without asking for a safe conduct from either the King of England or the King of France; and that he should have travelled in a strange land, not only without a military escort for the protection of his person, but attended by so few servants. There was no court in Europe where the spirit of knight-errantry was so highly appreciated as in that of the chivalric Francis I., no man better qualified, both by nature and inclination, to enact the part of a royal hero of romance than the fifth James of Scotland. Gay, gallant, beautiful, and fascinating, he excited the most enthusiastic feelings of admiration in every breast, but in none more ardently than in that of the young delicate invalid, who had been accustomed to regard him from her earliest recollection, as her affianced husband."

That she was not too much depressed by illness to have strong feelings, and a strong will of her own, is indicated by these words of Sir David Lindsay of the Mount. "Yet, notwithstanding all her sickness and malice (mal case), fra the time she saw the King of Scotland, and spake with him, she became so enamoured of him, and loved him so well, that she would have no man alive to be her husband, but he allunerlie," meaning him alone. Miss Strickland proceeds thus:—

"There are instances where sickness, instead of marring, adds a touching charm to female beauty, especially in early youth when the malady is of a consumptive or hectic character. This was the case with the Princess Magdalene of France, who is described by contemporaries as a creature too fair and exquisite for this work-day world, in which she was to have but a brief continuance. King James, beholding in her the realization of his beau ideal of feminine loveliness and grace, determined to break through all contracts, treaties and entanglements that might prevent their union, and to woo and win her for his queen."

It was in vain that the French king spoke of James's recent attentions to Magdalene's cousin, the Lady Mary of Vendome, whom he ill-treated by thus seeking the hand of his daughter; in vain he urged the opinion of physicians that a residence in so cold a climate as Scotland would kill her, "and offered to bestow her younger sister Margaret on him instead."

"The royal lover would not hear of the exchange; but persisted in his suit for Magdalene, who was, according to the report of a quaint Scotch chronicler, 'ane young lady of pleasant beauty, goodly favour, and comely manners, above all others within the realm of France.' King James would have no one but her, sick or well, strong or weak; the Lady Magdalene was the mistress of his heart, and the more difficulties that were made, the more eager he was to call her his own."

"As to Magdalene, she was deaf to all warnings. She had made up her mind to be queen of Scotland, were the climate more ungenial than Lapland, and the people greater barbarians than Muscovites. She would be content to leave her own vine-clad hills, and all the refinements and luxuries of her native land, to share the fortunes of King James. Love, and the happiness of finding herself beloved by the object of that first sweet passion that prevailed in her young heart over every other feeling, did that for the fair invalid which the skill of the physicians had failed to do—it recalled her apparently to life, and all the hopes and blissful expectations from which she had been previously cut off in the spring-tide of existence."

The lovers carried all before them, and were soon married, at the French Court. James was twenty-five, and Magdalene was sixteen. For the express delectation of our female readers, we proceed to quote Miss Strickland's description of the portrait of Magdalene, prefixed to this volume. It has been "carefully reduced from the whole-length figure of that Queen, in the curious contemporary painting of her marriage with James V., in Lord Elgin's collection at Broomhall in Fifeshire."

"Magdalene is very lovely; her features are small regular, and delicate; her complexion fair, with light brown hair, which is simply and becomingly arranged in curls and plaits. She wears a small round cap, formed of a network of pearls and jewels. She is tall, slender, and graceful in stature, with a long throat, elegantly moulded. Her countenance is indicative of feminine sweetness and sensibility, and there is something very maidenly in her attitude, as she stands with downcast eyes, bending her head slightly forward, and extending her hand to receive the nuptial ring. Her dress is white damask, embroidered with gold, fitting closely to her shape, finished at the throat with a small quilled doubled ruff, parted with a collar of gems. The upper part of her sleeves is formed of three full double frills or puffings rising a little above the shoulders; below these epaulettes the sleeves are tight to the arms, and finish with small ruffles and bracelets at the wrists. It is impossible for anything to be more chastely elegant and becoming than this costume, which would not be at all unsuitable for a royal or noble bride of the present day."

The royal couple spent several months after their marriage at the court of France; but, at length, it became necessary for James to return to his kingdom, and they parted from Francis I. with genuine sorrow on both sides. That monarch loved his daughter, and must have had sad forebodings concerning her health; he, however, dismissed her with feasting and magnificent presents. James, whose marriage had infuriated Henry VIII. because his daughter had been rejected, and because he dreaded the alliance of Scotland and France, which had been always dangerous to England, could not expect that his uncle would give him a safe passage through his dominions. The poor delicate girl was therefore obliged to make the long voyage from Dieppe to Edinburgh, and in tempestuous weather. She had to remain in a storm all one night, tossing at anchor off Scarborough; for James dare not land even for a night—the rage of the sea was better to bear than the rage of the Tudor lion. At length, on the fifth day after embarkation they arrived at Leith.

"They landed at the pier amidst the acclamations of a mixed multitude of loving lieges of all degrees, who came to welcome their sovereign home, and to see their new queen. Magdalene endeared herself for ever to the affections of the people by the sensibility she manifested on that occasion; for 'when she stepped on Scottish ground, she knelt, and bowing herself down, kissed the moulds thereof for the love she bore the king, returned thanks to God for having brought the king and her safely through the seas, and prayed for the happiness of the country.' This was, indeed, entering on her high vocation, not like the cold state-puppet of a public pageant, but in the spirit of a queen who felt and understood the relation in which she stood, both to the king and people of that realm. A touching sight it must have been to those who saw that young royal bride thus obey the warm impulse of a heart overflowing with gratitude to God, and love to all she then looked upon."

The "sweet flower of France" lived but forty days after this event. Her gracious behaviour, her youth and beauty, the king's love for her, and the fact that she was likely to bring an heir to the kingdom, all conspired to make her death deplored throughout the length and breadth of the land. Brantôme says of this princess, (as quoted by our authoress,) "The Princess Magdalene married the King of Scotland, from which destiny her friends had vainly tried to turn her. 'Not, certes,' said they, 'but he is a prince both brave and beautiful; but then to have to go and live in such a barbarous country, and among a rude people!' 'Nevertheless, while I live I shall be a queen, which has always been my wish,' she replied." Miss Strickland thinks we should read "his Queen."

"When the Princess Magdalene was Queen in Scotland," pursues Brantôme, "she found the country first as she had been previously told, and altogether different from our douce France. But Queen Magdalene gave no sign of regret, unless in this one exclamation, 'I would be a Queen!' She covered her sadness and the fire of her ambition with such ashes of patience as she best might. M. de Ronsard told me this, and he went with her to Scotland, leaving his service as page to the Duke of Orleans, who gave him to her, and he went to see the world."

Brantôme also says that "she was very deeply regretted not only by James V., but by all his people, for she was very good, and knew how to make herself truly beloved. She had a great mind, and was most wise and virtuous."

"The first general mourning ever known in Scotland was worn for her, and her obsequies were solemnized with the greatest manifestation of sorrow of which that nation had ever been participant. The lamentations for the premature death of the youthful queen, and the hopes that perished with her, of an heir to Scotland, appear to have been of a similar character to the passionate and universal burst of national sorrow, which in the present century pervaded all hearts in the Britanic empire, for the loss of the noble-minded Princess Charlotte of Wales and her infant.

"How many hopes were borne upon thy bier, O stricken bride of love!"

Those who know much of human nature generally, and of the Stuart family in particular, will not be astonished to hear that, sincerely as James V. mourned for Magdalene, he married again, eleven months after her death. Nor will such persons refuse to believe that that second was a love match, too, on his side at least.

We have now come to the third biography in this volume, that of Mary of Lorraine, or as she is more commonly called, Mary of Guise. Miss Strickland begins thus:—

"Of all the ladies James V. of Scotland had seen in France, with the exception of his lovely and beloved Magdalene, he had admired Mary of Lorraine, Duchess of Longueville, the most. Indeed, there is reason to believe that an impression was made on the susceptible heart of the errant monarch by the charms of this fair duchess, previous to his introduction to the royal flower of Valois. Drummond of Hawthornden says, 'Whilst James disported himself in France, he had made acquaintance with a lady rich in excellences, who, next to Magdalene, had the power of his affections, Mary of Lorraine, sister to Francis, daughter of Claude, Duke of Guise, and widow of the Duke of Longueville.'

But Mary was not the widow, but the very happy wife of the Duke of Longueville at the time; and was present with him at the marriage of Magdalene. She became a widow a month before the death of that queen, and very soon after that event, James V. seems to have turned his thoughts to her, as a second wife. Poor Mary, who was sincerely attached to her late husband, by whom she had two children, (one born after his father's death,) was by no means disposed to listen to any overtures of marriage, and desired only to devote herself to her children. But women in so elevated a rank, could not, in those days, dispose of themselves. About this time Henry VIII. was a widower, by the death of Jane Seymour; and "having communicated to Francis I. his desire of choosing a princess of his lineage of his next queen, that monarch politely replied, 'that there was not a maid or widow of suitable degree in France, but should be at his choice.'" The royal lady-killer was about fifty-eight years of age at that time. No "maid or widow" of France would he accept, but the young Duchess of Longueville; partly, it seems, because she was tall and finely proportioned, and he was pleased to admire tall women, and partly out of envy and perversity against his nephew James V., to whom Francis I. had promised the lady. Henry was not contented with that king's information that she was engaged to the King of Scotland, but sent a proposal in due form, to the poor duchess herself. She did not reply as that other Italian Princess did on a similar occasion, "that if she had two heads she would be most happy to place one of them at the disposal of his majesty, but that having only one she thought it best to keep it on her shoulders;" she simply declined "the great honour he was willing to confer on her," and soon after obeyed the commands of Francis, and was married to the King of Scots:—

"That Mary had any choice in the matter is doubtful; but it appears probable that having previously expressed an insuperable reluctance to enter into a second marriage, and her acceptance of the King of Scotland being made public early in the new year, (1538,) she entered into that engagement at last, not only in compliance with the will of her own sovereign, but to avert the possibility of being, by any change of politics, consigned as a state victim to the royal wife-killer of England, who had a daughter two years older than herself, and was already provided with a male heir to his dominions.

"James entered into a lover-like correspondence with the fair widow of Longueville, and after many letters of princely love and affection had been exchanged between them, the articles of marriage were agreed on."

This marriage could not be without pain to Mary of Guise, for she was obliged to leave her darling and only child, the little Duke of Longueville, behind her, and (Frenchwoman as she was,) to go to a cold, semibarbarous country, where everything was strange to her. However well-disposed she might be to her new home, and anxious to do her duty there, we are not surprised to hear that when some of the English Court asked Madame de Montrieux "How the new queen liked Scotland?" that lady somewhat smiled as she answered, "The Queen of Scotland loved France the best."

James V. and his second wife led a very happy life as far as conjugal affection is concerned, for he was passionately devoted to her; but their felicity lasted only for a brief period. The loss of his fine army in the Solway turned the king's brain, and brought him to his death-bed, at Falkirk, at the same time that his wife, in a state of great anxiety for him, gave birth, at Linlithgow, to a daughter—the celebrated Mary, Queen of Scots. All their other children were dead. Here ends Miss Strickland's first volume; and here begin the trials and troubles of Mary of Lorraine as Queen Regent of the distracted kingdom of Scotland. The next volume will contain much interesting matter.

THE LAND'S END.

HERE then we stood, the waves thundering below, and before us the Atlantic, without a shore nearer than America; the horizon line, not straight, but appearing, as it really is, the section of a circle, and blending softly with the summer sky;—here, amid a convulsion of rocks and precipices that form an irresistible barrier to the raging waters, we were impressed with the feeling of a position amidst a vast solitude, which some speak of experiencing in deserts. It is true there were no arid sands here; for the richest heaths, dwarf furze, almost all bloom, only three or four inches high, and several kinds of wild flowers, of which we did not know the names, enamelled the ground beneath our feet; but there was an overpowering loneliness, a sense of our own insignificance compared to what was around us, amidst a silence only broken by the hollow booming of a restless sea, that broke into the orifices of the cliff far beneath our feet, or now and then by the shrieking of a cormorant, or the rushing wing of a sea-mew.

There is a tale related, with the customary exaggerations, respecting the fall of a horse over the rocks here, and of the narrow escape of the rider, which, as no name is mentioned, every one thinks he may tell in his own way. The officer's name whose horse thus fell over was Captain Arbuthnot, about forty years ago, upon the staff of the western district, accompanying his superior officer, General Wilford, who also had a command in the same district, to see the Land's End. The general dismounted on the brow of the descent; but Captain Arbuthnot, who did not know the nature of the ground, rode down some way, when, the grass being slippery, and his horse alarmed, he dismounted, and flinging the bridle over his arm, led on the animal, which, startled most probably at the roar of the sea in front, backed himself over the cliff which was near in another direction, and dragged

Captain Arbuthnot to the edge, before he could disengage his arm, thus narrowly escaping being pulled over with him. We must again remark that the Land's End is a low headland, not more than sixty feet in height, as the ground is all the way a descent to its extremity, and the headlands on both sides rise to four and five times the elevation; its Cornish name is "Penwith, the Headland,"—or "Antyer Deweth, the Land's End."

THE PAST YEAR AND THE PRESENT.'

WE gladly welcome a second series of the Illustrated Year Book of Wonders, Events and Discoveries, the design and execution of which we had occasion to commend last Christmas. The present volume is fully as well executed as its predecessor, and the occurrences of the past year which it describes, as well as those of the coming one of which it heralds the advent, confer on it, if possible, a more exciting interest.

Imagine for a moment a year-book during the reign of the Plantagenets, and such in fact are the romantic pages of Froissart. War must have needs been its sole burden, science and literature a mere blank. In 1357 we should have had a lively chronicle of the campaigns of the Black Prince in France. In 1850 we have Prince Albert establishing the apotheosis of peace, by setting on foot a grand exhibition of the works of all nations. Henceforth it must ever be one of the principal functions of a year-book to record the great feature of our own day—the astounding progress of science, and its application to the purposes of human life, and to the amelioration of our social condition. A few years back, and who would have believed in marvels that are now of everyday familiarity? The difficulty seems now to prescribe any bounds to the progress of discovery. Every season brings its wonder with it: last year it was the erection of the Britannia Bridge, this season it is the Electric Telegraph, and what it may be next year Heaven only knows.

But we will not delay our readers with reflections that must arise in every thoughtful mind; but proceed at once to the facts collected in the volume before us, and that pretty much in the order in which they are narrated, dwelling first on the lighter and more fugitive topics. The first popular rarity of the year was unquestionably the first appearance in England of a living hippopotamus from the remote shores of the Upper Nile. And here it may be remarked that among the many interesting problems that have been left for their solution to the science and enterprise of the present age, is that of the source of this patriarch of rivers, and there is at length every reason to believe that its discovery is near at hand. In a pleasant abridgement of the recent and arduous journey of Dr. Krapf to the mountains of Central Africa, we find that he succeeded in penetrating to the vicinity of the snow-covered peaks of Kilimanjaro, in which the head-waters of the Nile are to be sought for. The animal brought to this country was taken from its waters, as we learn, at a distance of two thousand miles above Cairo.

"The Zoological Society had long been anxious to obtain a living specimen of this great amphibious quadruped for their Menagerie. Several attempts with this object have been made within the last twenty years, but uniformly with ill success; so that the offer of an American agent at Alexandria to give 5,000*l.* for an animal of this species, delivered to him at the above city, entirely failed to induce any speculator to encounter the risk and labour of an expedition to the White Nile for this purpose. The desire of the Zoological Society was communicated to Abbas, Viceroy of Egypt, by the Hon. Mr. Murray, our excellent Consul at Cairo, and an energetic advocate of the interests of science everywhere. The Pasha was deaf to Mr. Murray's hint; doubtless, seeing the difficulty of gratifying the Society's wishes. Hasselquist, on the authority of 'a credible person,' who lived twelve years in Egypt, states it to have been impossible to bring the living animal to Cairo; and Cuvier remarks, the French savans attached to the expedition to Egypt, who ascended the Nile above Syene, did not meet with one Hippopotamus; but M. Caillaud asserts that he saw forty in the Upper Nile; though, their resort lay some fifteen hundred miles, or more, from Cairo. Here they are often shot with rifle balls; but to take one alive was a much more difficult matter. However, the requisite commands were given by the Viceroy, and the proper parties sent in search of the animal.

"This was in August, 1849, when the hunters having reached the island of Fobaysch, on the White Nile, about 2,000 miles above Cairo, shot a large female Hippopotamus in full chase up the river. The wounded creature turned aside and made towards some bushes on the island bank, but sunk dead in the effort. The hunters, however, kept on towards the bushes, when a young Hippopotamus, supposed to have been recently brought forth, being not much bigger than a new-born calf, but much stouter and lower, made a rush down the bank to the river; it had nearly escaped, owing to the slipperiness of its naked skin, and was only secured by one of the men striking the boat-hook into its flank, while another lifted it into the boat. The scar of the wound is still visible on the left side; but it was much nearer the haunch when the animal first arrived at Cairo, its relative position having changed with the growth of the body.

"The wound was of course dressed as soon after the capture as circumstances would admit, and the captors started with their charge down the Nile. The food of the young animal was their next anxiety; he liked neither fish, flesh, fruit nor grass, and, failing in these three courses, the hunters were fairly puzzled. They must, however, have been indifferent observers; else milk would at once have suggested itself as the best sustenance for a newly-born mammal. At length the thought came; the boat was stopped at a village, all the cows were seized and milked, and the young charge lapped up the produce with alarming celerity. They then took with them a stock of milk, but it would not keep; so they were compelled to 'take it in' new from the cow; or rather they took with them a good milch cow, just as that useful animal is taken on board an Indiaman, where, by the way, a large number of infantine passengers has made milk as scarce as would our Hippopotamus. But in this case, he had all the supply to himself; and in this 'milky way' he reached Cairo on the 14th of November, 1849. The colour of his skin at this time was a dull reddish brown. He was, of course, first shown to the Pasha, (an honour claimed by royalty in all cases of prodigies,) the Hon. Mr. Murray was apprised of his arrival, and to his residence the young animal was conveyed, with a military escort, and the due form of imperial present-making. So far is the Hippopotamus now removed from the observation of men, that the present specimen created intense wonder and interest in Cairo; gaping crowds filled its narrow sandy streets, and a whale at London Bridge would not excite half so much curiosity.

"It being thought safer for the animal to winter in Cairo than to proceed forthwith on his journey, the Consul had duly prepared to receive the young stranger, for whom he had engaged a sort of nurse, Hamet Safi Cannana. An apartment was allotted to the Hippopotamus in the court-yard of the Consul's house, leading to a warm or tepid bath: his milk-diet, however, became a troublesome affair; his craving for milk whilst under Mr. Murray's care actually created a scarcity of that article at Cairo, for the new comer never drank less than from twenty to thirty quarts daily.

"By the next mail after the arrival of the Hippopotamus, the Consul despatched the glad tidings to the Zoological Society; and great was the joy at No. 11, Hanover Square, and at the Regent's Park. Preparation were then made for shipping the animal for Alexandria. The chosen vessel was the Ripon, one of those well-appointed steamers which resembles a luxurious hotel rather than a sea-going vessel. On the main deck was built a house from which were steps down into an iron tank in the hold, containing 400 gallons of water; the whole being constructed and fitted up at Southampton, from a plan by Mr. Mitchell, the able Secretary to the Zoological Society. The tank, used by the Hippopotamus as a bath, was filled with fresh water every other day; for which purpose, in addition to the supplies from time to time taken on board, was used the condensed water of the ship's engines, which amounted to 300 gallons per day. It was proposed to use sea water; but Mr. Mitchell foresaw that should the Hippopotamus take to salt water, how would he be affected by the change on his arrival in the Regent's Park, where the supply of the ocean draught might not be compatible even with the prospectus of the last new Water Company.

"Early in May the Hippopotamus left the Consul's hospitable quarters, and was conveyed in the canal-boat with Hamet Safi Cannana to Alexandria. Here his debarkation was witnessed by 10,000 spectators. The Consul accompanied his four-footed friend, and, for safety, applied to the governor of Alexandria for an escort; and a strong body of the Pasha's troops accompanied the animal and Hamet to the spot where the Ripon was moored. Here he embarked. There were on board his Excellency General Jung Bahadur Ramagee, and the Nepaulese princes, his brothers. The Ripon also took to the Zoological Society a collection of quadrupeds and birds, among which were an ibex from Mount Sinai, a lion, a leopard, two lynxes, an ichneumon, some civet cats, and a variety of serpents, lizards, and desert rats. A young giraffe was also to have formed part of the collection, but it was unfortunately drowned in the canal after reaching Alexandria.

"The Hippopotamus bore the voyage so well as to increase in fatness; he lived exclusively on milk, of which he consumed daily about forty pints, yielded by several cows on board. He was very tame, allowed himself to be freely handled by his Arab attendant, Hamet, whom he followed like a faithful dog; and who was seldom away for more than five minutes without a summons to return in the sound of a loud grunt. Hamet slept in a berth with the Hippopotamus, strange bed-fellow as he was; and thus they arrived in the Ripon at Southampton, on Saturday, May 25. He was landed early in the morning, sent by special train by the South Western Railway to London, and was safely housed at ten o'clock at night in the comfortable quarters prepared for him in the Regent's Park. Thus the whole of the arrangements for his transport from Cairo were most successful, and reflect the highest credit on the energy and ability of those concerned in them. It will readily be understood that no ordinary difficulties had to be surmounted in his maintenance at Cairo, in the first instance; and afterwards in getting him down to Alexandria, shipping him on board the Ripon, supplying him with the vast quantities of fresh water necessary for his bath, transferring him from the steamer to the railway, and thence to the Gardens. It appears, however, that throughout the whole of this eventful journey, from the island where he was captured, everything contributed to a favourable issue to the Viceroy's liberal desire to assist the Zoological Society in the most interesting and important enterprise which they have ever undertaken.

"On arriving at the Gardens, Hamet walked first out of the transport van, with a bag of dates over his shoulder, and the Hippopotamus trotted after him; now and then lifting up his huge grotesque muzzle, and snuffing at the favourite dainties; with these he was duly rewarded on entering the apartment, adjoining which had been prepared for him a bath.

"Next morning, the Hippopotamus was first seen by the members of the Society, when his healthy condition, his docility, and attachment to his Arab attendant, and the evident enjoyment with which he plunged and gambolled in the water, gave satisfactory testimony of the care which had been bestowed on him, and the foresight with which the Society's arrangements had been laid for his reception. Although yet under a twelvemonth old, his massive proportions indicated the enormous power to be developed in his maturer growth; and the grotesque expression of his physiognomy far exceeded all that could be imagined from the stuffed specimens in museums, and the figures which had hitherto been published from the reminiscences of travellers."

Scarcely inferior to the excitement caused by the Hippopotamus, was the nine days' wonder caused by the arrival among us of the Nepalese Ambassador, who came from the remotest recesses of the Himalaya to pay his respects to Queen Victoria. Of the origin and antecedents of this prince we are also furnished with a pleasant account, of which we shall give an abridgement. We have no space, however, to enter into a detail of the intrigues and chances which have elevated him to his present position, and must content ourselves with a brief chronicle of his doings while in this country:—

"Within the past year we have had a distinguished claimant of this class in Jung Bahadur, the Prime Minister of Nepal, and Regent of the minority in the government of that country. In a letter from Calcutta, written on April 7, the very day of his embarkation for England, he is thus introduced:—

"The visit of the Nepal Minister will be, I imagine, the most remarkable one you have received this century. Rammohun Roy was a clever, quiet, intellectual Bengalee Hindoo gentleman, who, I believe, turned Unitarian, and died in England. Dwarkanath Tagore, whom the good folks at home appeared to think a very great man, was a humbug; in fact, he was rich only—or thought to be so. The Pasha of Egypt was comparatively next door to you, and a Mahomedan; but our "Minister and Commander-in-Chief of the Nepalese," fresh from his mountains, is a genuine and most strict Hindoo—a nobleman of the Rajpoot caste and the Goorka tribe—the most valiant, and now nearly sole independent, of the native states. As he will probably remain in England two or three months, you may perhaps see, and will, I am sure, be interested by, him. He is thirty-two years of age only; rather slight in figure, but neatly formed; strong, firm, and agile as a hart; forming a strong contrast with his two stout, or rather fat, brothers, who accompany him. His features are of the Tartar cast. He appears to have great physical courage. On his way down to Calcutta in the steamer, passing through the jungly shores of the Sunderbunds, some object of game exciting his attention, regardless of tigers and alligators, and to the great alarm of his followers, he jumped overboard into the water or mud, but returned equally safe and unsuccessful."

"Then we read of another extraordinary feat performed by His Excellency, during his stay at Patna. The exploit consisted in riding to the summit of a large masonry granary on the back of a hill pony, which animal is famous for its sure-footedness; still, a more trying experiment, both to the rider's nerves and to the pony's paces can scarcely be conceived; the height of the dome is about 200 feet, with two most peculiarly awkward and dangerous staircases leading to the summit. . . .

"His Excellency, General Jung Bahadur Koorman Ramagee, arrived in the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steamer Ripon, at Southampton, on Saturday morning, May 25. The Prince's suite consisted of twenty-four persons, amongst whom were his brothers, Colonel Jugget Shumshere Koorman Ramagee, and Colonel Dheer Shumshere Koorman Ramagee. The General came to this country as Ambassador Extraordinary from the Government to the Queen of England; and he was charged with a complimentary letter and costly presents for her Majesty; the embassy being also accompanied by Mr. McLeod, private secretary to his Excellency, and Captain Cavanagh, political agent at Nepal.

"Jung Bahadur and his suite are Buddhists; and, on account of their strict notions respecting their religion, diet, and ablutions, and their dread of having their food, or the vessels which contain it, touched by Christians, they were compelled to engage the whole of the fore-cabins and saloons of the Ripon, in which they fitted up a cooking apparatus, constructed out of a large square box made of planks and paddle-floats, filled with mud and sand. The fuel they used was charcoal. Their principal food on board was poultry, kids, eggs, rice, and vegetables. They took in themselves, at each port they touched at, whatever water they used.

"Jung Bahadur was treated with great distinction by the Governor-General of India, having been received in full Durbar at Calcutta, and saluted with nineteen guns on his arrival and departure. Although so young, he has already proved himself a successful warrior, and is one of the most perfect marksmen ever seen. He used repeatedly to fire at and strike a bottle from the mast-head of the Ripon during the voyage from Alexandria. He was sea-sick after he left Egypt, and so ill that it was determined to land him at Marseilles, in order that he might reach England through France. He, however, through the kindness and attention of all on board, got better, and was enabled to enjoy the voyage. He was very fond of all the amusements and games entered into by the passengers during the voyage, and cordially joined in them. He was particularly delighted with the music of the Ripon's band, and rewarded the musicians most munificently. . . .

"The Embassy was welcomed in truly magnificent style by the Hon. East India Company entertaining Jung Bahadur and his companions at a grand banquet at the London Tavern, on Saturday the 15th of June. The company included some of the principal functionaries of state, members of both houses of parliament, and a number of gentlemen of eminence connected with India and the East India Company."

and his dusky but handsome face, and his magnificent costume studded with diamonds, were eagerly sought for among the fashionable world. He appeared at public dinners, frequented the opera, and even attended the conversaciones of the Royal Society. When the season was over, he made a tour to our principal dock-yards and cities, where he exhibited an intelligent appreciation of our national resources, gave large orders to our manufacturers, and scattered his cash and jewels pretty freely about him. It is fair to presume that he left our shores deeply gratified with his reception among us. He next visited Paris, where he was entertained with a grand review, and every one has heard of his fastening a superb diamond bracelet around the arm of the danseuse Cerito. With this exploit vanishes the dusky ambassador from our view; and whether we shall next hear that he is sovereign of Nepal, or that he has been killed in some intrigue of the palace, remains to be unfolded.

Another Indian marvel, destined to make a more abiding stay, is the great diamond, Koh-i-noor, or the mountain of light, which after glittering on the brows of a whole series of Eastern potentates is destined at last, through the fortune of war, to adorn the diadem of Queen Victoria. The story of this gem is a perfect romance, very pleasantly narrated by our author; but with our limited space we prefer to turn to, as a notice of the crowning achievement of the year, the submarine electric telegraph:—

"The greatest miracle of modern science—the Electric Telegraph—has, within the past year, acquired a grand extension of its working in the first interchange between England and France, destined to form the future key for instant communication with the European continent. This achievement is illimitably suggestive of great and glorious results to the entire human family. It will do more to calm its dissensions than a century of Peace Congress sittings; and its increase of international benefits approximates to the promises of inspired prophecy.

"One of our most profound electricians is reported to have exclaimed, 'Give me but an unlimited length of wire, with a small battery, and I will girdle the universe with a sentence in forty minutes. Yet this is no vain boast; for so rapid is the transition of the electric current along the lines of the telegraph wire, that, supposing it were possible to carry the wires eight times round the earth, it would occupy but one second of time!' . . .

"In 1842, Morse conceived his subaqueous plan, which, in December 1844, he submitted to the United States' House of Representatives. In the autumn of the former year, the Professor, at the suggestion of the American Institute, undertook to give the public in New York a demonstration of the practicability of his plan, by connecting Governor's Island with Castle Garden, a distance of one mile. For this purpose, he laid his wires, properly insulated, beneath the water. He had scarcely begun to operate, and had received only two or three characters, when his intentions were frustrated by the accidental destruction of a part of his conductors, by a vessel which drew them up on her anchor, and cut them off.

"In the moment of mortification, he immediately devised a plan for preventing such an accident in future, by so arranging his wires along the banks of the river, as to cause the water itself to conduct the electricity. Morse tested this arrangement across a canal with success; and the law of its passage was next ascertained, showing that electricity crossed the river, and in quantity in proportion to the size of the plates in the water; the distance of the plates on the same side of the river from each other, affecting the results. It was further demonstrated that there might be situations in which the arrangements for passing the electricity across rivers might be useful; although experience could alone determine whether lofty spars, on which the wires may be suspended, erected in the rivers, might not be deemed the most practical. The principle has since been applied by Professor Vail, one of Professor Morse's assistants, across the Susquehanna river, at Havre de Grace, a distance of one mile, with complete success. This plan was next successfully put in practice by the Electric Telegraph Company and Captain Taylor, in the submarine telegraph, laid across the English Channel, by which an instantaneous communication is made from coast to coast, across the harbour of Portsmouth, from the house of the Admiral in the Dock-yard, to the railway terminus at Gosport. By these means, there is a direct communication from London to the official residence of the Port-Admiral at Portsmouth.

"Schemes for telegraphing across the Atlantic and the Pacific were triumphantly expounded to the wondering public, soon after Morse's success. It was, however, urged that great difficulty must, unquestionably, attend the construction of any telegraph over the comparatively moderate extent of rivers or lakes, owing to the impediments presented by anchorings, and the passage of vessels; but these became next to insuperable, when looked at in connexion with the stupendous experiment of reading off continuously wires over thousands of miles of sea, or even of the reading them through channels.

"The chief obstructions that present themselves (said the objectors) occur in the physical configuration of the sea itself—its rocks, and currents, and the agitation of its waves; albeit it is contended by philosophers, that at certain fixed fathoms down, the ocean is tranquil; and that the water, from its superincumbent weight, becomes almost solid, so that a wire, when sunk, might be looked upon as literally lodged or imbedded in a sort of oceanic cement. Independently, moreover, of the physical, let us look at what we may designate the conjectural side of the affair. Fancy a shark or a sword-fish transfixing his fins upon the insulated wires, in the middle, perhaps, of the Atlantic, interrupting the magic communication for months. Granted that minor fishes would be scared away by shocks of electricity through their scales; but what would all this avail against the headlong plunge of a whale! What is to be done against the tides, when they deposit their floating debris of wrecks and human bodies? Even supposing you could place your wires at the lowest depth—say thirty thousand feet—ever reached by the plumb-line, would your wires even then be secure?"

The first experiment in England was made by Mr. C. V. Walker, superintendent of telegraph to the South Eastern Railway, by sinking a portion of tubing in the sea, near Folkestone, on the 10th of January, 1849. At forty-nine minutes past noon, the first telegraph despatch was successfully forwarded to London. Application being shortly afterwards made to the French government, they gave their sanction to the scheme of an international telegraph. Meanwhile Mr. Brett, the inventor of the Patent Printing Telegraph, had obtained permission to apply his scheme to a submarine communication.

"At length, the arrangements for the solution of the great problem were completed. The points of communication selected by Mr. Brett, were from the beach at Dover, nearly opposite the railway terminus, to Cape Grinez, at a short distance from Calais; at both which places temporary stations were provided.

"In the week previous to the experiment, the Goliath steam vessel, a very appropriate name for so gigantic an undertaking, arrived at Dover, having on board about thirty miles of the submarine wire, destined to form the connecting link, which was coiled 'midships' upon an immense reel or drum, 15 ft. by 7 ft. The copper wire was coated with gutta percha, was 9-16ths of an inch in diameter; it weighed about five tons, and the cylinder two.

"The preliminary arrangements of laying down the connecting wires from the coast at Dover and Cape Grinez, which for better protection from the chafing of shingle is, to the extent of about 400 feet, encased in lead tubing, having been made, preparations were commenced on Tuesday to complete the undertaking; but in consequence of the boisterous weather it was postponed until the following day.

"On Wednesday, the weather being moderately fair, the Goliath was moored off the Admiralty Refuge Pier, and was provisioned for the day, having on board a crew of thirty men. There were also on board Mr. Jacob Brett; Mr. J. C. Wollaston, C. E.; Mr. F. Edwards, and other scientific gentlemen. The Goliath rode out to the Government pier with her telegraphic tackle and apparatus on board, under a calm sea and sky, and a favouring wind; and then being fully under weigh, she steamed out at the rate of about three or four miles an hour into the open sea, in a direct track for Cape Grinez, twenty-one miles across channel, the nearest landmark to the English coast, and lying midway between Calais and Boulogne. The vessel was preceded by Capt. Bullock, R. N., of H. M. steam-ship Widgeon, who accompanied the experimenters as a pilot; and who had caused the track of the navigation to be marked out by a succession of buoys surmounted with flags on the whole route between the English and French coasts.

"There was an anxious crowd assembled on the pier to witness the departure of the convoy. About half-past ten o'clock, the end of the wire on board was securely fastened to the end of that from the shore, encased in lead, which was connected with a telegraph apparatus temporarily fitted up in a horse-box at the railway station, by which the uninjured state of the wire during the progress of submersion was tested.

"The operation of paying out the thirty miles of wire commenced on a signal to the sailors to 'go ahead with the wheel' and 'pay out the wire,' which was continuously streamed out over a roller at the stern of the vessel; the men, at every sixteenth of a mile, being busily engaged in riveting on to the wire square leaden clumps or weights, of from 14 lbs. to 24 lbs. weight; these had the effect of sinking the wire in the bottom of the sea, which, on the English coast, has a depth of thirty feet, and varies from that to 100 and 180 feet. . .

"Various interesting salutations were kept up hourly during the progress of submerging the wire, between the gentlemen on board and Mr. J. Brett. The only conjectured difficulty on the route was at a point in mid-channel, a ridge (called by the French Le Colbart), between which and another inequality called the Varne (both well-known and dreaded by navigators) there is a deep submarine valley, surrounded by shifting sands: the one is seventeen miles in length and the other twelve, and in their vortex, not unlike the Goodwin Sands, ships encounter danger, and part from their anchors and drifts; and trolling-nets of fishermen are frequently lost. Over this physical configuration, however, the wire was successfully submerged, below the reach, it was believed, of either ships' anchors, sea animals, or fishing-nets, though it will be curious to know that it withstands the agitation of the wild under-currents and commotions that are supposed to be the characteristics of such localities. The remainder of the route, though rougher on approaching the coast of France, was accomplished cleverly but slowly.

"On nearing Cape Grinez, the soundings become very rugged, and the coast dangerous; but by steady and cautious manipulation, the Goliath delivered her cargo of wire to be safely connected with the end of the tubing which had been laid at Cape Grinez, and run up the cliff to a temporary station at its summit. This was completed the same evening, and every accommodation was afforded by the persons at the lighthouse, in the use of lanterns and lamps, so that at nine o'clock the same evening (the 28th of August) the following message was printed, in legible Roman letters, upon a long strip of paper, by telegraph, in the station on the French coast; in the sight of a numerous audience of the French officials and others, amidst tremendous cheers of all present at the success; three times three resounding on all sides for the Queen of Great Britain, and Louis Napoleon Bonaparte and the French nation.

THE MESSAGE.

"CAPE GRINEZ, COAST OF FRANCE, half-past eight, P.M.
" [By Submarine Telegraph.]

"The Goliath has just arrived in safety; and the complete connexion of the underwater wire with that left at Dover this morning is being run up the face of the cliff. Complimentary interchanges are passing between France and England under the straits, and through it for the first time. The French mail, ut mos est, may not arrive at Dover at the time of going to press, but, in a short time, on the necessary arrangements being complete, Paris news and closing prices at the Bourse will be communicated by a mail that sets time and detention at defiance. . . .

"The Electric Telegraph appears to us more like a miracle than any scientific discovery or mechanical achievement of our time. Assume the steam-engine, and railroads are a mere question of finance. Even so magnificent an operation as the completion of the tubular bridge across the Menai Straits does not affect the mind with a sensation of wonder. What power was requisite to raise a given weight? What material could best endure the strain of the traffic? How could it be most effectually laid down?—how best supported by the single arch or from above? Such a work is in its way no doubt astounding from the combination of forces brought to bear in order to obtain a certain result, but they are all forces with which we are perfectly familiar. Now, the introduction of electric communication is but of the other day. We had scarcely taught ourselves to acquiesce in the idea that instantaneous communication between two points on solid land was a mere matter of course than it was gravely proposed to drop the communicating line and transmit intelligence along the bottom of the ocean. The jest or scheme of yesterday has become the fact of to-day. The wildest exaggeration of an Arabian tale has been outdone by the simple achievement of modern times. The consequences of the electric telegraph must be as important as the agency by which they are obtained is wonderful. Great excitement prevailed throughout Europe when the first balloon carried up an adventurer into the skies. But there was no comparison between such an achievement and the present. Even the most enthusiastic projectors must have entertained certain doubts as to the practical value of their aeronautic expedition. In the case of the submarine electric telegraph, the first and obvious effect of this instantaneous communication between the two most civilized and powerful nations of the world will be to unite them so closely in community of interests as to secure their co-operation in all designs that may promote the advancement of humanity and maintain the peace of the world. In a great measure this had been already effected by a mode of communication which required at least a certain number of hours. But with the electric telegraph across the Channel, communication with Paris is not even a question of seconds. At present, no doubt a message must be first forwarded to Dover; at Dover a delay will take place, another at Cape Grinez, and so on through France; but these are mere points of detail now that the chain of communication has been carried across the bed of the ocean. Some few arrangements are all that is requisite in order to render a sustained conversation between two persons, the one in London, the other in Paris, not merely a possibility but a fact."

Every one has heard of the breaking of the wire in consequence of its casing not being sufficiently strong; but this is a defect which will be easily remedied in future. The success of this marvellous experiment is complete, and it will no doubt be applied to an extent which it might at present seem visionary to anticipate.

The present year too will be memorable to the Londoners as that in which the new building for the British Museum was brought to a conclusion. The heavy old chateau which we all knew so well, has vanished for ever, and its place is supplied by a magnificent edifice of the Ionic order, elaste and severe in style, and on a scale commensurate with the ever-widening circle of acquisitions in every department of science. Perhaps the most striking recent accessions have been the Nineveh marbles, some of the most remarkable of which have been recently added to the collection. Here we may remark that of late years antiquarian research has fully kept pace with science, and opened to our investigation vast fields of interest both in the eastern and western world. The whole of North America as well as its central and southern portions are found to contain almost innumerable traces of early occupants, while ancient Assyria has been disinterred from the obscurity of ages.

Another pleasing feature of our times, is the popularization of literature by means of cheap publications—a work in which the finest geniuses, a Dickens or a Hunt, do not disdain to co-operate. Simultaneously with this has grown up a taste for instructive pictorial representations. Time was when there was but one panorama in London; now, their name is legion. Thousands have travelled up the Mississippi into the far west, and gazed upon the monuments of Ancient Egypt, or tracked the course of their countrymen to the burning clime of India, after this cheap and easy fashion. Of these panoramas, our Year Book contains some lively and instructive sketches.

But the great subject of anticipation, during the latter end of the past year, was the Great Industrial Exhibition of the coming; and to this, as the brief months hasten away which intervene before its fulfilment, the public attention is devoted with an intensity which, like Moses's rod, swallows up all inferior matters. Received at first by a practical people with some degree of doubt and hesitation, and by many with sneers of incredulous foreboding, it is rapidly becoming a fait accompli. Even as we write, the vast palace, destined to receive the stupendous gatherings of a world's industry, rises like an exhalation; and already, from the east and the west, from the north and from the south, the eager nations are preparing, to flock to it. While the continent of Europe resembles a volcano about to burst forth into destructive fury it is our glory—and may it ever remain so—to cultivate the spirit and the arts of peace, not in the narrow spirit of selfish aggrandisement, but with a generous regard for the interests of the whole humanrace.

A sketch of the rise and progress of this great scheme cannot but be acceptable to our readers:—

"It is right that the credit of originating our grand scheme should be given where it is due. Its first announcement will be found in the Journal of Design, for September, 1849, wherein the Editor observed.—'Whilst almost every European nation has held exhibitions of its industrial products, England, as a nation, has not yet adopted this beneficial mode of encouraging its manufactures, and instructing its people to understand and appreciate them.' But public opinion in our country is at last awakening to a sense of the importance of such exhibitions, and its convictions are likely to be converted into a practical result by the active intelligence of his Royal Highness Prince Albert. From all we hear, we believe that his Royal Highness, as President of the Society of Arts, is engaged in organizing the means of forming a great collection of the works of industry of all nations, to be exhibited in London in 1851; and that measures are in active progress for ascertaining the willingness of our manufacturers to assist in this gigantic undertaking. With this view, we believe, his Royal Highness has authorized two or three gentlemen to proceed to the manufacturing districts, and collect the opinion of the leading manufacturers, and evidence of their desire to assist his Royal Highness, in order that the results of this inquiry may be submitted to Her Majesty's Government.'

"In the Journal of Design for October, the royal proposal is stated to have assumed thus early the aspect of a certainty. The Editor then repeats that the particular idea was the Prince's own: 'Now is the time,' said his Royal Highness, 'to prepare for a great exhibition—an exhibition worthy of the greatness of this country; not merely national in its scope and benefits, but comprehensive of the whole world; and I offer myself to the public as their leader, if they are willing to assist in the undertaking.' This is true patriotism.

"On the 30th of June, the Prince summoned Mr. T. Cubitt, Mr. H. Cole, Mr. F. Fuller, and Mr. J. S. Russell, members of the Society of Arts, to Buckingham Palace, when his Royal Highness proposed that the exhibition should consist of raw materials of all kinds, mineralogical, agricultural, &c.; of machinery and mechanical inventions; of the results of these, namely, manufactures; and, lastly, of sculpture and plastic art generally; and that the exhibition should be opened to all nations.' At the second meeting, held at Osborn, on July 14, the President of the Board of Trade was also present, at which the appointment of a Royal Commission was decided on; and at the third meeting Mr. Cole, Mr. Fuller, and Mr. Russell, were empowered by the Prince to travel through the manufacturing districts of the country, in order to collect opinions.

"It was at this meeting also, June 30, that Prince Albert gave to the proposed Exhibition that great feature of universality which has ever since formed the chief characteristic of his plan. His Royal Highness 'considered that whilst it appears an error to fix any limitation to the products of machinery, science, and art, which are of no country, but belong as a whole to the civilized world, particular advantage to British industry might be derived from placing it in fair competition with that of other nations.' . . .

"Not the least wonderful part of the Exhibition,' says the Times, 'will be the edifice within which the specimens of the industry of all nations are to be collected. Its magnitude, the celerity with which it is to be constructed, and the materials of which it is to be composed, all combine to ensure for it a large share of that attention which the Exhibition is likely to attract, and to render its progress a matter of great public interest. A building designed to cover 758,984 superficial feet, and to have an exhibiting surface of about 21 acres, to be roofed in and handed over to the Commissioners within little more than three months from its commencement; to be constructed almost entirely of glass and iron, the most fragile and the strongest of working materials, to combine the lightness of a conservatory with the stability of our most permanent structures—such a building will naturally excite much curiosity as to the mode in which the works connected with it are conducted, and the advances which are made towards its completion. Enchanted palaces that grow up in a night are confined to fairy-land, and in this material world of ours the labours of the bricklayer and the carpenter are notoriously never-ending. It took 300 years to build St. Peter's at Rome, and 35 to complete our own St. Paul's. The New Palace of Westminster has already been 15 years in hand, and is still unfinished. We run up houses, it is true, quickly enough in this country; but if there be a touch of magic in the time occupied, there is none in the appearance of so much stucco and brick-work as our streets exhibit. Something very different from this was promised for the great edifice in Hyde Park. Not only was it to rise with extraordinary rapidity, but in every other respect is to be suggestive of "Arabian Nights" remembrances. In its favour, the window law has been ignored, and 900,000 superficial feet of glass, weighing upwards of 400 tons, used in its construction. Not a stone or a brick has been employed throughout the spacious structure, which rests upon 3,800 cast-iron columns, and is strengthened and kept together by 2,224 girders of the same material. The plan of it comprises a basement, and two upper tiers diminishing in area as they ascend, and thus securing a graceful variety of outline; while the monotonous effect of a façade 1,848 feet long is broken by a spacious transept. This transept, 408 feet long and 72 feet wide, is arched, and rises to the height of 108 feet, inclosing within it, as in a glass-case, certain trees, which respect for the Park timber has induced the Commissioners to spare. The roof of the entire building, resting on the cast-iron girders, is what is technically called "ridge and valley," and looks like an undulating sea, the whole being covered with canvase to exclude the rays of the summer sun and prevent any inconvenience arising from excessive heat; except the transept, where the presence of trees renders light necessary, and where, therefore, the arched glass roof will remain uncovered. When closed in and completed, the view presented by the interior will, it is anticipated, be wonderfully graceful and splendid. The central avenue, with rows of pillars shooting off from it on either side, and so arranged that the eye can traverse freely to every part of the building, must have a very grand appearance. Care has been taken to have the columns upon which the whole fabric rests distributed with such regularity, that no confusion or forest-like effect can be produced by them. It will be the same in all the avenues as in the central one; although there, from its proportions and the entire absence of galleries or upper flooring to break the perspective, the view presented will be most imposing."

Our space is more than occupied, and we can say but a few words in conclusion. The years 1850-1 will be memorable in the pages of history for the great impulse given to the arts of peace and the progress of civilization by this stupendous Exhibition; and for the national protest against the feeble attempts of the Papacy to fasten about us the chains which we had already broken and cast aside for ever. On one hand we hail the victorious progress of science and philanthropy; on the other, we behold in full retreat the routed forces of priestcraft and superstition. - Would that the correction of our social evils kept pace with this encouraging prospect; yet even here are cheering signs of improvement. The dark places of the earth are being explored, the haunts of misery and crime laid open to the light of day. Men of all ranks are becoming anxious to set their shoulders to the wheel of social improvement. Let us hope that our religious differences may no longer retard the establishment of a system of education for the people. Above all, let us look up with thanksgiving and with hope to that Great Being, the march of whose beneficent providence is so evident even among the clouds that sometimes overcast our limited horizon, and commit to his wise and paternal keeping the advancing destinies of our beloved country.

THE BILLET DOUX.

ANOTHER charming specimen of the peculiar style of Newton. A girl receiving her first billet-doux; a moment of no small interest, it must be confessed, and treated by the painter with exquisite refinement and delicacy. The beauties are such as the reader must detect for himself, for they elude any attempt at formal description. No one knew so well as this accomplished and unfortunate painter, how "to catch a grace beyond the reach of art."

"OLIVE;" a novel, by the author of the "Ogilvies," 3 vols. (Chapman and Hall). We have perused with much pleasure, and we hope some profit, this second effort of the authoress of the "Ogilvies." Her former work contained, as it appeared to us, in addition to a degree of performance evincing high talent, delicate taste and deep feeling, a promise of better things to come. The faults were essentially those of an inexperienced writer—the head and front of her offending being a bigotted faith in the creed, that "love's young dream" is the aim and end of existence for all and sundry,—a theory comprising the whole duty of man and woman in a blind worship of the sightless god. "Olive" has not disappointed us; and in no particular does it more clearly indicate advance, than in the abandonment of this Thekla-like philosophy; although it contains good measure of amateness, and sufficient sighing to meet the requirements of the boarding-school public. "Ich habe gelebt und geliebet," is no longer the motto; to have "lived and loved," no more the one thing needful; and poor humanity is allowed to eat, drink, and sleep, discourse on art, paint pictures, indulge natural affection towards parents, and cultivate friendship, without the constant intrusion of Cupid. The great and especial merit of "Olive" lies in the beautiful development of a true woman's nature, portrayed in the character of the heroine, whose lively instinct of goodness, strengthened and directed by a deep sense of religion, conducts her through the changes and chances of a life of self-renunciation, with a cheerful calmness, of which the sanctifying influence falls like a blessing upon all who come within its sphere. Yet is she neither idealized into an impalpable abstraction, which we admire, but feel to be impossible, nor made to appear a parson in petticoats, whose sermonizing strikes us as equally wholesome and unpalatable; but with all her excellence and superiority, she still remains "a very woman," a being loving, and to be loved. The main fault of the book is a want of self-consistency in the character of the hero, who, described as a moral Hercules, and placed in an equally original and striking position, conducts himself with a very "lady-like" degree of unreasoning vacillation, which in real life would have lost him the respect, though it might not have deprived him of the love of his innamorata. Of the other characters our limits merely enable us to point out the grand old artist, Michael Vanbrugh, in himself a picture well conceived and ably executed; his good little sister, in whom affection supplies the want of a mind; "Harold's mother," a haughty matron, whose clear head and cool heart render the deep love which she really feels for her son, a most uncomfortable blessing; to whom no greater contrast can be imagined than that which we find in Olive's silly, fascinating, child-like mamma, who, beginning her career by a dislike scarcely natural to her slightly deformed, plain little girl, lives to acknowledge in that daughter's tenderness her only consolation. For the rest (with the exception of an episode regarding a certain Christal Manners, with which we could willingly have dispensed,) we give "Olive" our warm approval, and cordially recommend it to our readers.

"Imagination: an Original Poem," by Spero. This production (which is dedicated by permission to Mr. Charles Dickens) is evidently the work of an unpractised writer, who is, however, endowed with a considerable share of the divine faculty which forms his theme. Many sweet descriptions and passages of great poetical excellence might be selected from the poem which he has presented to the public, whilst the frequent occurrence of harsh and rugged lines seems to prove that it has been written in haste, in the midst of uncongenial pursuits, and that little time or care can have been bestowed in polishing or correcting it. The poet tells us in his preface that his life has been passed "in the cold city's crowd;" that his view of nature's works has been contracted that lakes, mountains, and forests are strange to him, and that the "grasp of active, busy life" has held him back "from the bright longings of his aspiring soul." These circumstances are calculated to bespeak the indulgence, and excite the interest of the reader; but the work itself is one of considerable merit, and indicates a power of fancy and faculty of observation which may, in the course of time, achieve still better things.

Then morn and eve again; t./r

CHRISTMAS BOOKS AND NEW YEAR'S PRESENTS.

OUR readers will be glad, perhaps, to have a few words recommendatory of such annuals as we have already seen; and we shall, accordingly, give our modicum of advice, beginning with the more costly, and ending with the more economical, so that every one may choose what likes him best. For handsome engravings on a large scale, and a world of miscellaneous matter connected with the fine arts in general, the volumes of the Art Journal are, after all, by far the fullest and cheapest that are published; and to those who have not the work already in numbers, they constitute as handsome a present as can be made. For novelty and peculiarity of design, two publications by Mr. Bogue, of Fleet Street, are also well worthy of remark:—they are, "Sketches after English Landscape Painters," by Louis Marvy, with short notices by W. M. Thackeray; and another entitled "Christmas with the Poets." The first is an elegant volume of coloured engravings from the works of our best landscape-painters, many of which are exceedingly beautiful. They are accompanied by short notices by the accomplished author of "Vanity Fair," who has most admirably discriminated the styles of the respective painters. The second is a volume still more to our taste,—novel in design, and happy in execution, consisting of a series of engravings on wood in the very highest style of the art, to illustrate poems, both ancient and modern, on the subject of Christmas. The typography and binding are really gorgeous, and the originality of the design must secure to these books a large share of the patronage bestowed on works of their class.

Much lower in price, and less expensive in getting up, but full of sterling and valuable matter, is "Mrs. Hall's Pilgrimages to English Shrines," written with great ease and felicity, and accompanied by a host of woodcuts, from the clever pencil of Fairholt. The design of this work, reprinted from the Art Journal, and published at a surprisingly cheap rate, is to collect the scattered remnants connected with the memories of great and good men, and its execution is every way successful.

Those who delight in foreign, rather than domestic subjects, may turn to "Gleanings in the Overland Route," by the author of "Forty Days in the Desert," for a correct picture of our possessions of Malta and Gibraltar, and other matter connected with the interesting and popular subject of which it treats. This book also abounds in illustration, and is very handsomely got up.

Still cheaper than this is the "Year-Book of Remarkable Occurrences," of which the liberal use we have made in this number is the best eulogy we can pronounce. For an elegant present to children we may recommend Miss Meteyard's work, "The Doctor's Little Daughter." This unpretending story abounds in exquisite little episodes and passages of description, its fault being, perhaps, the redundancy of matter; which, duly diluted by the regular bookmaker, is equal to a whole catalogue of common-place stories. From these stores of art and poetry, historical illustration foreign and domestic, fact and fiction, there is abundant room to make a selection.

GUIZOT.

OUR present business is with M. Guizot as a historian and philosopher; a character in which he will be remembered long after his services to humanity, as a statesman and a minister, have ceased to attract the attention of men. In those respects we place him in the very highest rank among the writers of modern Europe. It must be understood, however, in what his greatness consists, lest the readers, expecting what they will not find, experience disappointment when they begin the study of his works. He is neither imaginative nor pictorial; he seldom aims at the pathetic, and has little cloquence. He is not a Livy nor a Gibbon. Nature has not given him either dramatic or descriptive powers. He is a man of the highest genius; but it consists not in narrating particular events, or describing individual achievement. It is in the discovery of general causes; in tracing the operation of changes in society which escape ordinary observation; in seeing whence man has come, and whither he is going, that his greatness consists; and in that loftiest of the regions of history he is unrivalled. We know of no author who has traced the changes of society, and the general causes which determine the fate of nations, with such just views and so much sagacious discrimination. He is not, properly speaking, a historian; his vocation and object were different. He is a great discourses on history. If ever the philosophy of history was embodied in a human being, it is in M. Guizot.—Mrs. Alison's Essays.

DINNERS AND DIPLOMACY.

PEOPLE possessing but a slight knowledge of diplomatic affairs, can have but an imperfect idea of the importance of a dinner in arranging international difficulties. The enormous salaries paid to our ambassadors and consuls have recently been subjected to a severe overhauling, with a view to their reduction. A committee of commoners was appointed, before which Lord Palmerston, and several of the most distinguished diplomats in London underwent a cross-examination as rigid as that adopted towards equivocating witnesses on a criminal trial. From the facts elicited, it would appear that dining his rivals is the most important and arduous part of an ambassador's duty. We know that in olden times "wretches were hung that jurymen might dine." That is passed; indecisive juries are no longer starved into a decision, but the principle is carried into a higher sphere, and now nations are taxed that their representatives may outshine rivals in the splendour of their cuisine.

Sir Richard Pakenham, the late minister to Washington, averred that good dinners were all-powerful agents of diplomatic success, and boasted, with bad judgment and worse taste, that when there, his dinners were the admiration of all, and that he gave better dinners than the President of the United States. He might have seen that it is both extravagant and invidious for any country to allow its ministers incomes that enable them to eclipse in splendour the first magistrate of the state to which they are accredited. Sir George Seymour, who has had thirty-three years' experience in diplomacy, said boldly,—“I consider that giving dinners is an essential part of diplomacy. I have no idea of a man being a good diplomatist who does not give good dinners!”

Well, if by feeding ministers national quarrels can be accommodated, why should they not be well fed? History tells from what trivial causes great wars have arisen, and why should they not be averted by means equally insignificant? Who shall tell how much canvas-backs and Champagne had to do with the settlement of the Oregon question? “Fifty-four forty or fight” was a very good cry before dinner, but no man with a Christian-like digestion feels like fighting in his calm post-prandial moments. We understand that some ill-feeling has arisen in Washington towards Sir Richard Pakenham on account of his boastful confession; but his candid avowal will probably be one chief cause of removing the evil. Palmerston and Pakenham both allowed that “American ministers are most successful in diplomacy, though unprovided with the means of giving sumptuous entertainments;” and their cross-questioners refused to believe that the poor bribe of a dinner can influence state affairs. Besides, say they, “if their excellencies be freely regaled overnight, they may think next morning, and with a bitterness aggravated by previous indulgence.” They can see no reason, in short, why the British diplomatist should be better paid or give better dinners than an American minister, who does his work equally as well; and the consequence is, they recommend a sweeping reduction of the enormous salaries now paid.

STATISTICS OF TRADES.

DIFFERENT trades and professions seem to suit the inhabitants of different countries. In London all the milkmen are Welsh; all the sugar-bakers are German, and a great many of the tailors. The vast majority of the bakers are Scotch, but there is not a Scotch butcher to be found. While no theatrical performer ever came from Scotland, we have had considerable success in medicine and in law. To the literature of the country, I trust, it will be allowed that we have brought at least our fair contribution, when it is considered that there are less than 3,000,000 of inhabitants in Scotland, while there are 8,000,000 in Ireland, and 14,000,000 in England.—Lord Campbell—Lives of the Chief Justices, Vol. II.

TRIUMPHS OF STEAM.¹

PART IV.

HAVING traced the progress and successful establishment of river steamboats in a former paper, let us next glance at the early ocean voyages of these connectors of continents and contractors of seas: it would scarcely seem extravagant to add, annihilators of time and space—when comparing records of voyages made less than a century ago, with those effected by steam-ships in the present day. During Fielding's voyage to Lisbon in 1754, thirty days elapsed between embarkation at the Tower Wharf, London, and anchoring at Torbay, in Devonshire. Compare this fact with the performance of an American merchant last year, and judge if the above epithet is not almost justified. On the 4th of April, 1849, this gentleman left New York for Canton, and arrived at his destination on the 15th of June, after accomplishing a distance of nearly fifteen thousand miles. Thus, "in little more than two months, he traversed the Atlantic and Indian oceans, and the Mediterranean, Red, and China Seas. Starting from the United States of America, he called at England, Gibraltar, and Malta, in Europe; Alexandria and Suez, in Africa; and at Aden, Ceylon, Penang, Singapore, and Hong Kong, in Asia. With the exception of passing through England and Egypt, the whole of his journey was performed by water in British ships."

Long after Fielding's time such a change in the affairs of travellers was beyond mortal ken or credit. Sailors and savans alike decried the feasibility of sea-voyages in steamboats. When first it was proposed to employ them on the Forth and Tay ferries, Admiral Sir Philip Durham declared, "I have viewed the matter with a seaman's eye, and am certain that a steamboat can never live on the Forth;" and Dr. Lardner, penetrating a kindred subject with a philosopher's eye, staked his "reputation and knowledge as a man of science," on the impossibility of any steamer crossing the Atlantic Ocean. In 1820, however, steamboats attempted those very ferries; yet their lives escaped the sacrifice considered due to their temerity; and, cruelly regardless of the Doctor's "reputation," steamers whistle at "men of science," and paddle across from New York to Liverpool in spite of the demonstrated impossibility of the thing. Let us seek out and proclaim the daring insolent, who first ventured to set at nought the fiat of the wise. Bring her forth trembling,—not from contrition for opposing philosophy, but from the pulsations of that iron heart within, which gave her might to brave and overcome,

" . . . on the Atlantic
The gigantic Storm-wind of the equinox," and the raging waves it lashes into being.

The success of ocean-navigation was confidently predicted by Fitch; and it has already been mentioned that to another American, Mr. Stevens of Hoboken, the honour is due of performing the first sea-voyage with a steamboat, in transferring his vessel by sea to Philadelphia, for the navigation of the Delaware, from the River Hudson; in consequence of the exclusive privilege then enjoyed by Fulton of navigating this river.

Deep-sea communication by steam-vessels, and the establishment of Post-office steam-packets in Great Britain, originated with Mr. David Napier. The Rob Roy was built for this gentleman in 1818, by Mr. Denny of Dumbarton, a vessel of 90 tons burden, with an engine of 30-horse power, with which he established regular communication between the ports of Greenock and Belfast. Subsequently she plied between Dover and Calais. Messrs. Wood shortly afterwards built for Mr. Napier the Talbot, 120 tons, which was fitted with two of his engines, each of 30-horse power, supplied from the celebrated Vulcan Foundry, Glasgow. "This vessel," says Mr. Scott Russell, "was in all respects the most perfect of her day, and was formed on a model which was long in being surpassed." The Talbot ran between Dublin and Holyhead; and steam-packets connecting Liverpool, Greenock, and Glasgow, were established by the same enterprising gentleman.

In the following year to that which witnessed the successful efforts of the Rob Roy, the Americans achieved another triumph by building and equipping the Savannah, the first steam-vessel that dared to breast the billows of the Atlantic; which, after a passage of twenty-six days from the port whose name she bore, and without stopping at any intermediate station, arrived safely at Liverpool on the 20th of June 1819. She was of 350 tons burden, and her hold between the main and fore-masts was entirely occupied by the coals and the machinery. The consumption of coals by this engine amounted to nearly ten tons daily. The construction of the paddle-wheels was such as to admit of their easy removal in adverse weather. They were fitted when in use to a cast-iron axle-tree fixed through the sides of the vessel; and it does not appear that it was ever found necessary to shelter them from the too-rough treatment of the waves. The following most amusing account of her first voyage was given in the "New York Tribune:"—

"For fourteen days the Savannah on her passage to Liverpool went without canvass, depending entirely on her steam-power for propulsion, and never using sails and steam at the same time. Her engine was a low-pressure, one of only 80 or 90-horse power, with which she could generally make eight knots in the hour. When the ship arrived off Cape Clear, she was immediately telegraphed to Liverpool as a 'ship on fire,' and the British Admiral then lying at Cork, despatched a king's cutter to her relief; but the officers and crew were struck with astonishment in being unable to overhaul a vessel under bare poles. However, after several shots had been fired from the cutter, the engine was stopped, and they were permitted to come on board, and were greatly gratified as well as astonished at the marvellous craft.

"As she approached Liverpool great numbers met her in boats, and during this time she wore all her colours, when a boat from a British sloop of war came alongside and hailed the sailing master, then on deck, demanding, 'Where is your master?' 'I have no master,' was the reply. 'Where is your captain, sir?' 'He is below, sir.' The captain then came on deck. 'Why do you wear that pennant, sir?' says the officer. 'I wear it,' says Captain Rogers, 'because my country permits me to do so.' 'My commander,' answered the officer, 'thinks that it was done to insult him, and if you don't take it down he will send a force that will do it.' Captain Rogers made no reply to this threat, but gave orders to the engineer to 'get ready the hot-water engine.' Now there was no such thing on board, but, n'importe, the order answered the object. John Bull evacuated, and no more was heard of him.

"The reception in Liverpool was a wonderful one; the whole city and country crowded to see the strange craft; and during her stay she was visited by noblemen from London, by naval officers, and other distingués in great numbers.

"The Savannah then left for Copenhagen and Stockholm, where she was visited by the royal family and thousands of persons of the highest rank; and at the latter place took on board Lord Lyndock, then on his travels through the north of Europe, and proceeded to Saint Petersburg, where she was received with the greatest éclat by all classes, and a rich service of plate presented to her officers.

"The ship reached Savannah after a pleasant passage of twenty-five days, and afterwards went to Washington city, where she laid up. Captain Rogers tells us that the rule was to carry sail while the ship would make five knots an hour; and when that speed could not be reached, to take in sail and use the engine, there being no difficulty of getting fully eight knots out of her."

The passage of a steamer across the Atlantic was a rare feat for the next twenty years. In 1828 the Curaçoa voyaged direct from Holland to Surinam, occupying twenty-four days from off Dover. A British steamboat, the Sir Lionel Smith, crossed from St. Thomas to New York in 1837; and before this the Royal William, a Quebec boat, and the Cape Breton, built at Greenock, had both crossed the Atlantic. The City of Kingston effected also in 1837 a British passage: she put in, however, at Madeira on her way. But the following year witnessed a new era in Transatlantic navigation. The Great Western and Sirius were the practical pioneers of the Cunard and Collins fleets.

On the 4th of April, 1838, the Sirius, commanded by Captain Roberts, sailed from Cork, in the face of the supposed proof that no steamer could carry sufficient coals for above two-thirds of the voyage. Alas for those cumbrous coals!—to which timid theorists have since pointed as abundantly sufficient to make another noble enterprise of travel end in smoke: we rejoice to say, with exactly the same success. "The coals!" said the East India Company, in opposition to Lieutenant Waghorn's plan for the "Overland Route,"—"At Suez they will cost us twenty pounds a ton!" "You are mistaken," said the Lieutenant; and by the means he conceived coals were transferred from the pit to the steamer for £4 3s. 6d. per ton: and the overland route was established "in spite of the India house," as he himself declared it should be, at the moment of his indignant resignation of the appointment he held in their pilot service, in consequence of the Company's illiberal opposition to his most skilfully devised and nobly executed projects. We may well regret the failure of Davy, Faraday, and Brunel, in their attempts to employ carbonic acid gas as a mechanical agent, and thus supersede the use of steam,—so immense would have been the saving in space and in expense, had the scheme proved practical.

But we must not leave the Sirius alone on the Atlantic. The merchants of Bristol did not leave her alone, for they fitted out a second steamer, and three days after the sailing of her Cork rival, the Great Western started from that port where Sebastian Cabot was born in 1467, and whence he sailed 344 years before upon that voyage rendered so memorable by its resulting in the discovery of the North American Continent; for, on the 24th of June, 1494, having pursued his course with favourable winds, he first saw upon the horizon the land to which he gave the name of Prima Vista, since called Newfoundland.

So the Sirius had the start: she "ran the race, and won it too, for she got first to"—New York. Nineteen days after she had left the Emerald Isle, the smoke of her funnel is descried in the distance by the hopeful and the disbelieving—both alike anxious—denizens of that Western capital; presently her hull is visible; and at length she gallantly rides into the centre of their beautiful harbour. Was the Great Western far behind? Performing her voyage in sixteen days, (thus beating the Sirius considerably in speed,) she arrived at New York on the evening of the same day, St. George's Day, the 23d of April.

We can imagine that the successive arrivals of these two famous vessels were regarded by the throngs who crowded the wharves to greet with hearty welcome, and gaze upon the half-expected—yet more than half-despaired of—strangers, with feelings somewhat akin to those which animated the inhabitants of the town of Palos de Moguer, on that rejoicing day when the Nina, Captain Christopher Columbus, and, on the evening of the same day, the Pinta, Captain Martin Pinzon, returned to that port after their first most adventurous voyage, from which so little success was predicted, so much achieved.

One of the American Journals thus proclaimed the advent of this new era in the intercourse of Great Britain and America:—"The permanent establishment of steam-ship lines between New York and England, is now placed beyond a doubt. The physical difficulty has been solved, and the vast accession of patronage, already crowding upon both these steamers, almost proves, in advance, that the trade and intercourse of the two countries will be doubled in less than five years. England and the United States are but parts of the same great empire of mind, peopled by the same great and wonderful race, talking the same language, thinking the same thoughts, and"—(now for the climax)—"steaming on the same principle!"

The following spirited narrative of the arrival of these two ships is extracted from a journal of one of the passengers by the Great Western, which was furnished to the Quarterly Review:—"From the time of crossing the bar of the harbour," says the writer, "all her 'poles' were set aloft, and flags gaily streaming at each,—the foreign ensign at the gaff, and at the fore a combination of the British and American; and at three P.M.," the narrative continues, "we passed the Narrows, opening the bay of New York, sails all furled, and the engines at their topmost speed. The city reposed in the distance—scarcely discernible. As we proceeded, an exciting scene awaited us: coming abreast of Bradlow's Island, we were saluted by the fort with twenty-six guns (the number of the States);—we were taking a festive glass on deck. The health of the British Queen had just been proposed, the toast drunk, and, amid the cheers that followed, the arm was just raised to consummate the naming, when the fort opened its fire. The effect was electrical: down came the colours, and a burst of exultation arose, in the midst of which the President's health was proposed. The city now grew distinct: masts, buildings, spires, trees, streets, were discerned; the wharves appeared black with myriads of the population hurrying down, at the signal of the telegraph, to every point of view; and then came shoals of boats—the whole harbour covered with them; and now the new-comer reaches the Sirius, lying at anchor in North River, gay with flowing streamers, and literally crammed with spectators—her decks, paddle-boxes, rigging, mast-head high. We passed round her, giving and receiving three hearty cheers; then turned towards the battery. Here myriads again were collected; boats crowded around us in countless confusion; flags were flying, guns firing, and bells ringing. The vast multitude set up a shout—a long, enthusiastic cheer—echoed from point to point, and from boat to boat, till it seemed as though they never would have done."

The Great Western was fitted with two engines, each of 225-horse power: her burden was 1,340 tons. She is now employed in traffic among the West India Islands. The Sirius ran for some time between Dublin and Cork, and was wrecked on this passage in January 1847. In heavy weather, and a dense fog, she struck on a reef of rocks in Ballycotton Bay; and though she was got off, the damage she sustained was so great, that the water rushed into the engine-room, and extinguished the fires. The vessel was then run ashore, the crew escaping in the boats, but the ship went to pieces immediately.

All honour to her memory for the part she played in that great stride of facilitated intercourse with our Western neighbours! Till then the proud old Liners rode the seas supreme; and gallantly and well they did their work, performing their passage home, on several occasions, in the short space of fifteen days. Their average passage was thirty-seven days homewards: outwards, twenty-one. But the length of the voyage in these first-class ships—till 1838 the pride of merchant navigation—was extremely uncertain. In the winter preceding the first passage of these steamships, thirty Liners out of fifty belonging to New York, were supposed to be toiling homewards across the Atlantic, and eighteen were due at that city at one time. One ship from Liverpool was spoken, fifty-five days after sailing, at a distance of 1,000 miles from her destined port: and some of these vessels were seventy days on the voyage. With sailing ships those accidents of wind or stream make the most essential difference, which would retard to a very immaterial degree the progress of a steam-packet. Two ships, of equal sailing powers, starting even at the same moment, may make the most unequal passages. The Inconstant frigate sailed from Cork on the 4th of January, 1838, voyaged to Halifax, and returned to Plymouth, in forty-nine days; the President left Portsmouth six days later, and was fifty-seven days before reaching New York; while the Samson, starting on the 5th of January, occupied sixty-two days on the same passage.

Steam-ships supply no such records,—

"Nought heedest thou the wind or tide; but onward, night and day,
Unwearied as the waves around, thou marchest on thy way,
Where mighty ships lie all becalm'd, with sails that flap the mast—
What boots to thee their thousand guns? thou mildest and walkest past."

Thus it happened to the old Liners; they were an easy triumph;—soon were their services doomed to be discarded. "Presently," prophesied the "Quarterly," "they will cease to be named at all. Look at the Great Western, the inhuman monster, on her first three days out, overhauling a brave old Liner—seven days from Liverpool—with the black ball, 'the badge of all her tribe,' in her fore-topsail, under top-gallant sails—careering and plunging to a lively foam and a fair wind." Her defeat, and the touching sympathy of the narrator, is thus recorded in the passenger's Journal referred to above. "This new comer is none of your old sort. See how she comes vapouring up, flapping her huge wheels like an eagle's wings, and snorting, as it were, with the thought of victory and the sight of game. She comes on apace. All her colours are strung out. The ship is almost caught, but she leaps ahead and escapes once more. The steamer, with a dignified air of conscious supremacy, disdaining pursuit, wheels round windward, and passes the Liner on the other side, with three 'heartly cheers.' Then dashing a-head, as if satisfied, she hauls in her toggery, and presses her helm hard a-starboard, and the Liner—the brave old Liner—is seen no more. Her owners will scarcely know her when she reaches port at last. She brings no news. She will soon bear no letters—no specie. Nobody will watch for her, nor speak of her. Alas! her day is gone by. Who can think of her sufferings without a sigh?"

Hopeless, indeed, would be her race with this new rival. Compute the powers of the Great Western by an average of five years' performances. In this time she ran twenty-seven voyages to America, at a speed averaging on her outward passage, 193½ miles a-day; and homeward, 233 miles a-day;—thus averaging, in 787 days' steaming, a speed, per day, exceeding 211½ miles.

Let it be remembered that this is the very voyage on which ships have been upwards of six weeks coping with easterly winds, yet compelled at last to return to the port from whence they sailed. An Irish vessel in 1838, after having been out two months, was thus driven home again, though she had reached within 100 miles of New Brunswick, for which port she was bound; and another craft, sailing from Demerara for Halifax, was blown instead into Liverpool! Imagine the gratification of captain, crew, and especially of passengers, at finding themselves separated from their desired haven—only by the breadth of the Atlantic Ocean! But these misfortunes were not the worst which befell travellers across those seas. During the preceding year, one ship, the Diamond, was exactly one hundred days on her passage from Liverpool to New York. She carried 180 passengers, and the scarcity of provisions was such, that before the vessel reached land, a sovereign was offered and rejected for a roasted potato; and seventeen passengers perished from starvation.

Turn now to the doings of the Royal Mail Steamships only ten years later. These magnificent vessels accomplished eighty-eight voyages across the Atlantic in 1848, carrying 3,995 passengers. Of these voyages that of the Britannia, in boisterous March, was the longest, occupying eighteen days and a half; while the shortest passages were those of the Europa, in October, from Liverpool to Halifax in eight days eighteen hours, and to New York in ten days twenty-three hours; and those of the America, in June, from Liverpool to Boston in ten days six hours, and from New York to Liverpool, in November, in eleven days eleven hours.

The Europa excelled in June, 1849, her best passage in 1848, making the run from Liverpool to New York in ten days twelve hours and a half, still bearing the palm for speed; but was herself eclipsed this year (1850) in September, by both the Asia and the Pacific; the former effecting the quickest passage yet performed from New York to Liverpool, occupying only ten days seven hours; and the latter, (one of the six packets comprising the Collins line,) the swiftest outward voyage between those ports, accomplishing the passage in the short space of ten days and a quarter. The wear and tear of these vessels—not borne on, but driven through, the waves of the Atlantic—is tremendous. A passenger has compared his voyage in one of them to "crossing in a diving-bell," the cabin being more than half the time under water.

But the last new ship, and the ninth of the Cunard fleet, the Africa, will beat them all; and we may confidently predict that in the wonderful year commencing the last half of the nineteenth century, A.D. 1851, the pleasure trips of brother Jonathan to our palace of crystal will detain him under ten days in his floating palace of steam.

The Africa may bear eastward or westward some of those very gentry who modestly volunteered, not many years ago, to eat that British steam-vessel, her cargo, engines, and coals, which should first show her figure-head in an American port. It is believed that this promise was never literally fulfilled; but that instead of feeding upon the coals, these were reserved to feed the engine; and in place of eating the engines, they ate something more unlikely to lie heavy on their stomachs, (being of considerably less weight)—their words.

Already the Africa has shown us somewhat of her powers. Why, on the 5th of November last, while busy hands were poking with might and main at the appalling bonfires which blazed around the unlucky Pope, the stout stoker of the Africa stirred his fires to a different purpose,—not for the separation of sects, but for the union of nations; and the mighty engines and beautiful ship, travelled three hundred and twenty-nine miles that day, the greatest distance yet performed in twenty-four hours. The river steamers of the Hudson and Mississippi can of course attain higher speed, and have exceeded twenty-five miles an hour, though neither "butcher's trays," nor "skimming-dishes," which alone, the "Quarterly" declared some years since, could attain the velocity of sixteen miles an hour. "Credat Judæus!" said they to an account of such an achievement.

Communication with our transatlantic neighbours will be yet further expedited by the establishment of a contemplated Atlantic station on the western coast of Ireland—say Galway, or Valentia—the construction of a railroad to the selected port;—and, of course, the electric telegraph.

Meanwhile, let us turn our attention to what steam has effected for us in Eastern intercourse.

Distant steam voyages were no doubt very much discouraged by the ill success of the Enterprise, which steamed to Calcutta in 1826. Future enterprises were more successful. The Memnon of 400-horse-power and 1,140 tons, despatched to India in 1842, steamed to the Cape of Good Hope in 42 days—356 years subsequent to the first discovery of the extreme southern promontory of Africa by Bartholomew Diaz, in his caravel of 50 tons burden; and 345 years after Gama first rounded the Cape, 133 days from the time he first weighed anchor in the Tagus. He occupied six months on that part of his return voyage from India, two years later, between the Cape and Lisbon. Now we have a regular mail established to that colony by screw steam-ships; and thirty days only are required for the voyage from Southampton.

Here let us glance briefly at this particular class of steam-vessels,—the screw-propellers; which are of especial advantage in long sea voyages. Bramah patented a submerged propeller so early as 1785; and after him Lyttelton and Shorter took out patents for inventions of a similar description. But Captain J. Ericsson, a Swedish officer, by an original arrangement of his own, first successfully employed the application of the screw-propeller to practical purposes. He was assisted in his experiments by Mr. Francis B. Ogden, of New Jersey, and their first boat, named after this gentleman, was launched from the banks of the Thames.

In conjunction with Captain R. F. Stockton of the United States' navy, a line of screw steamers was established between Philadelphia and Baltimore, via the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, to the great discomfiture of the Railway Company, who had united those cities at an enormous expense.

The most magnificent vessel that has been constructed on this principle is the Great Britain, which is one-third longer than any line-of-battle ship in the service. Her length aloft is 322 feet; main breadth, 50 feet 6 inches; depth of hold, 32 feet 6 inches; tonnage, 3,444 tons. Her engines are of 1,000-horse power; and are connected with the screw, which revolves at the rate of 25 miles an hour, by an immense chain. This screw is made of wrought-iron, and has six arms, each fifteen feet and a half in diameter, pitched at an angle of 28 degrees. She is rigged with six masts, and fitted with water-tight bulkheads, which stiffen the vessel and increase her safety.

The first voyage of the Great Britain across the Atlantic was made in July 1845, and in September 1846 she was stranded in Dundrum Bay, where she remained till the following August, when she was brought safely into Liverpool by Mr. Bremner, of Wick, after nearly twelve months' exposure to the waves; sheltered however, by a breakwater, from the terrific surge of the Irish Sea. Since that time she has remained inactive.

There are many advantages derivable from the application of the Archimedean screw to steam-ships; nor are such vessels deficient in speed. Her Majesty's tender yacht Fairy surpasses in rapidity all the steamers on the river. The apparatus can be made to ship or unship at pleasure, and can be applied to sailing vessels without requiring that they should undergo any alteration in their original construction. Screw-propellers are particularly adapted for canal boats, and—we regret to add—for war vessels. We may have reason to regret this circumstance, if we are to credit Captain Stockton's boast that "with 20 steam frigates, on the plan of the Princeton, he would take possession of the British Channel, and blockade London itself." Captain Halsted, R.N. describes the advantage of screw over paddle-wheel war steamers to consist in the absence of all impediments to the traditional full-armed broadside; the employment of machinery entirely protected from shot; the economy of using sail power or steam power at option; and that the ship herself is a fully furnished and independent sailing ship. There are now on the roll of the Admiralty, 164 screw, or paddle-wheel, steam-vessels; in value about eight millions sterling.

Her Majesty's steam-sloop Driver has performed the circuit of the globe; starting from England in 1842. She left the British shores in March, and called at the Cape, the Mauritius, Singapore, and Hong Kong. From this island, after steaming from port to port in China, and voyaging to Borneo, Bombay, and other ports, she essayed the eastern passage to New Zealand; but, encountering a typhoon, was compelled to make for Singapore. When the damages she had sustained were fully repaired she steamed to Pyon; and thence to Swan River, Hobart Town, Sydney, and the Bay of Islands in New Zealand, which she reached in 1846. She left New Zealand for Rio in January 1847, which she gained in 51½ days; and arrived from that port in England after a further voyage of 48 days: having travelled 75,696 miles during the five years and nine months in which she was in commission.

Round the "tempestuous Cape," where Diaz lost his life, has long since ceased to be the best route to India, except for heavy merchandise. A few years more, and we shall as soon dream of "doubling the Cape," and so more than doubling the distance to our Eastern possessions, as of adopting the footsteps of Alexander for our pathway to those regions. For upwards of 300 years the high-road to India, opened up by Vasco di Gama, was the unquestioned course pursued, till Lieutenant Waghorn schemed and effected his "overland route." The Portuguese, via the Cape, arrived at Calicut in 1498. The British Officer, in 1830, reached Bombay via the Red Sea. No comparison is attempted to be instituted between the discoveries of these navigators; but each established a new path to the Indies; and the Lieutenant's voyage down the centre of the Red Sea was scarcely less personally hazardous than that of Vasco—ignorant as he was of its dangerous navigation; without map or compass; and performing it in an open boat, manned by six mutinous Arabs. Not the most remote analogy can be detected certainly in the respective rewards of these men. The grateful Portuguese made Vasco a viceroy and loaded him with honours; Waghorn with difficulty obtained the conferment of a Lieutenant's rank: he died in debt, incurred in the public service, and left his widow destitute.

The "overland route" is a beautiful development of steam agency. A weary voyage was the old passage of 12,450 miles, and several months in duration. The present line of travel is 5,238 miles in length, requiring less than one month for its accomplishment. Francis Xavier was eleven months on the seas between Lisbon and Goa—(though we need not go back to him for a contrast, as that is sufficiently supplied by our own East Indiamen)—the overland mail of the 8th of July, 1850, reached Bombay by the steam-packet Feroze, in the unparalleled short space of twenty-five days, seventeen hours. This interesting journey is now so familiar to the public that we need not pause to describe its details. The East India Company first despatched steam-ships at regular intervals between Bombay and Suez in 1834: and the combined exertions of the French and Egyptian governments and the Peninsular Steam Navigation Company, completed the route in its present excellence: but they have not yet exhausted its capabilities of improvement. From London to Marseilles the distance is now reckoned to be traversed in four days; from Marseilles to Alexandria in seven; thence to Suez in three; and from Suez to Bombay in fifteen: making in all twenty-nine days; though, as we have seen, it has been performed in less. The contemplated railway across the isthmus will convert the days occupied in that portion of the transit into hours; and we may expect the time is not far distant, when within three weeks of quitting our metropolitan home, we shall land on the shores of neighbouring India.

But the grand achievement essential to the perfection of this route is the Suez ship-canal, which must soon be constructed. England, France, and Austria, are combined in the performance of this great undertaking. M. Negrelli is appointed by the last-named country for the survey of this work: France is represented by M. Paulin Tclabot; and our own government has commissioned Mr. R. Stephenson to unite with the two other gentlemen in preparing evidence which shall lead to the final determination of the track to be adopted.

The course indicated by the country as most suitable for this canal appears to be the junction of Suez and Pelusium at the eastern extremity of lake Menzaleh. This is the narrowest part of the isthmus, which does not here exceed seventy miles in width. The land is low and level between these points, and, from the nature of the surrounding country, could be easily supplied with water. It is not to be supposed in this engineering age that physical obstacles will prevent the accomplishment of this long-desired union of the seas: nor could it fail to succeed as a commercial speculation. Some difficulties, or at least, misgivings exist from want of faith in the Turkish government, to which that country is subject; but this combination of the three great European Powers for the promotion of the enterprise will surely guarantee the fairness and stability of the stipulations and contracts founded upon their united negotiations. This work completed, all merchandise will be conveyed by the same route as the letters, instead of dawdling in their wake months after the goods are announced to the consignees. No transshipments will delay the passenger and damage the cargo: and, as waiting for the Bombay steamer will be unknown, neither pyramids, petrifications, nor the egg-hatching dépot, will be in request as a solace for impatient travellers during sometimes days of detention. The Mahmoudieh canal; the Boulac omnibuses, with their Arab horses, and reckless drivers; the "city of Victory;" the journey across the Desert; all will be superseded. The pack-camels of the sea, (our merchant-ships,) and the outstripping heiries of that element, marked by their curling "black banners" longer than their hulls,—ever new, and ever ugly—will alike voyage down the ship-canal to Hindostan: and "round the Cape to India" will soon become a legend of ancient logs.

Thanks to the Peninsular and Oriental Company, in forty days we may now exchange chin-chins (how d'ye do's) at Hong Kong, with our fellow fan-quis, (foreign devils,) as all barbarians are styled in the polite language of the celestials. This company may be regarded as the chief Steam Navigation Company in the world. They possess a noble fleet of twenty-five steamers. Two vessels are now building on the Clyde, to be called the Ganges and the Singapore, which will rival the best employed in the celebrated Cunard service, and will still further expedite communication with India. Computing the Peninsular Service, the Italian, Constantinople, Alexandria, Black Sea, India, and China Services, it is found that in October last, the aggregate mileage performed by this Company's vessels extended to 570,867 miles per annum. Some notion of their expenses may be gathered from the fact that repairs alone last year (1849) cost them considerably upwards of £100,000. Mails are conveyed by these packets three times a-month from Southampton to Madeira, Gibraltar, Lisbon, &c.; once a-month to Malta, Greece, the Ionian Islands, &c.; and in conjunction with three vessels of the Indian Navy, once a-month to India, China, and Ceylon. By separating the line to Bombay from the contract line to Calcutta, at the suggestion of Mr. Henderson, the present bi-monthly mail was established.

The packets of the General Steam Navigation Company, the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, and the Pacific Steam Navigation Company, convey the mails respectively to Holland and Hamburgh twice a-week; to the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico twice a-month; to New Granada, Chagres, Panama, &c., twice a-month; to Valparaiso, and all places south of Panama, once a-month.

The system adopted for the rapid distribution of the mails in the West Indies must not be overlooked. Several steamers are engaged in this operation which take different directions, the Barbadoes, Trinidad, Antigua, and other routes, meeting at Grenada, the trysting place where the mails are exchanged. The collected mails are brought from Havannah, via the Bermudas to Southampton. Mails are conveyed to France twice, and to Dublin three times daily. From every important port in the world we receive intelligence in London within two months—excepting the Australian colonies. Newspapers have arrived from California, in October last, only seven weeks after publication. But with Australia we have no steam communication at all; we have not even a regular ship-mail; for the Government contract with Mr. H. Toulmin expired in 1848, and has not since been renewed, nor has another been substituted. This contract was abandoned two years ago, that a steam-packet mail might be established; but, though colonists are clamorous, Government is ever tardy in its operations. The delay is occasioned, and the difficulty comprised, simply in the selection of one out of three rival routes:—that by Singapore, that by Panama, and the route direct by the Cape of Good Hope.

Early in 1850 the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty called for tenders for the monthly conveyance of H. M. mails between Singapore and Sydney, intimating their willingness to entertain tenders for other routes. The response which has found most favour with the Government is the offer of the Peninsular and Oriental Company to establish a line between Sydney and Singapore in connexion with the Indian mail service. The average time in which they would contract to perform the voyage would be 72 days and a half outwards, and 79 days homewards, the distance, via Galle, Singapore, Swan River, and Adelaide to Sydney,—the contemplated route,—being 12,779 miles. There are two modifications of this route, embracing different ports, each of which have their advocates. They are briefly as follows:—

VIÀ TORRES STRAITS.

	MILES.
Southampton to Batavia (calling at intermediate ports)	8,801
Batavia to Copang	1,000
Copang to Cape York	1,110
Cape York to Sydney	1,800
	12,711

VIÀ GALLE AND WESTERN ROUTE.

	MILES.
Southampton to Galle (calling at Intermediate Ports)	6,657
Galle to Swan River	3,046
Swan River to Sydney (calling at Intermediate Ports)	2,320
	12,023

Portions of the Singapore line are already occupied by this Company's vessels: and from the facilities it affords for navigation and coaling, the chances of delay are not great. The advantages that would be secured by steam communication between Australia and Bengal are of important consideration, but there are, nevertheless, grounds of solid objection to this route that must not be overlooked.

An essential condition of the Oriental Company's tender is the transfer to themselves of the Bombay and Aden line now worked by the East India Government; but these opposite neighbours refuse to abandon their present contract; and not without reason. They have incurred heavy expense in the construction of large and powerful steamers, and in forming extensive establishments at Bombay. Moreover, that service is valuable to them in the regular routine of duty it affords to their naval force: and should they yield their consent ultimately to the desired arrangement, they would simultaneously require to be relieved from the burden of maintaining Aden; from which cost the British Government is unwilling to absolve them.

But there are cogent reasons in opposition to this route, apart from all interference with the East India Company. As it involves a passage through Egypt, and, in some measure, through France or Austria, it would always be exposed to the contingency of difficulties which might arise from misunderstandings with the Governments of those countries. In addition to this contingency there is the actual inconvenience of several trans-shipments before the passenger arrives at his destination; the needless exposure to the risks of a tropical climate; and lastly, and perhaps chiefly, the necessarily heavy expense of the passage.

The Panama route has been tendered for by the "Pacific Steam Navigation Company," who offer to perform the distance in 68 days out and 66 days home. This is slightly the longest voyage of all, as will appear from the annexed table.

PANAMA ROUTE.

	MILES.
Southampton to Chagres (calling at St. Thomas's)	4,753
Across the Isthmus	60
Panama to Sydney, calling at Albemarle's Island, Tahiti, and New Zealand.	8,103
	12,916

This route would be chiefly advantageous as assisting to maintain a good direct line to the Gulf of Mexico, and in affording easy intercourse between North America and the Australian colonies. Serious obstacles, however, exist to its adoption. As with the Eastern route, the Isthmus trans-shipments oppose their inconveniences: and the climate of the Caribbean Sea and Mosquito Coast is perhaps, of all climates, the most fatal to Europeans. Then the space to be traversed across the Pacific Ocean without suitable coaling-places renders the punctuality of the voyage extremely dubious; while no ports of importance would be connected by the last 8,000 miles of travel. Only the Galapagos, the Society Islands, perhaps the Sandwich Islands, would benefit by this portion of the voyage.

It only remains for us to notice the third route, via the Cape of Good Hope, for which the "General Screw Steam Shipping Company" have offered to contract, and to perform the journey in seventy days each way, including a stoppage of five days at the Cape. Most of the objections urged against the other two rival schemes are inapplicable to the third. The Cape route would involve no transshipments, no dangerous vicissitudes of climate, no dependence upon friendly relationship with foreign powers, and is in all respects best adapted for facilitating emigration. Other colonies of importance, Cape Town, Natal, and the Mauritius, besides those of Australia, will participate in the benefits of such an arrangement. Still it must be borne in mind, that this plan necessitates the navigation of the most boisterous seas, and that the return passage is especially one of considerable difficulty and danger. In point of distance, it stands below both the Singapore and Western ways to Sydney, as the following summary exhibits:—

CAPE ROUTE. (DIRECT.)

	MILES.
Southampton to Madeira	1,294
Madeira to St. Helena	2,983
St. Helena to Cape of Good Hope	1,710
Cape of Good Hope to Port Phillip	6,104
Port Phillip to Sydney	590

One or other of these schemes must speedily be selected. Government is so strongly urged upon this subject that indecision or inactivity will not long be endured. Emigration to Australia and New Zealand is eminently on the increase; the population of those colonies already including half-a-million of English residents: and that the outward tide flows freely may be gathered from the fact, that considerably upwards of 30,000, during the last year, have joined them from the British Isles. At all events, under existing circumstances, physically, politically, and economically, the Cape route will be the most immediately advantageous, and measures cannot be delayed until a Suez Canal, or a Panama Canal, shall obviate the Isthmus difficulties alleged in objection to those contending tracks; though neither of these great works can be considered as a very remote contingency. The Egyptian Ship-Canal has already engaged our attention, and we must not neglect to notice the corresponding design contemplated in Central America.

Before any aquatic junction is effected between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, they will in all probability become connected by a railroad traversing the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Grants have been obtained for the construction of this work by a citizen of the Mexican Republic, from the government of that country, under which certain citizens of the United States have engaged to carry forward the enterprise. The government of Mexico are not perfectly agreed with this company in all the preliminary stipulations which it will be necessary to enforce; but the advantages they will derive from the accomplishment of this undertaking, and the interest with which it is regarded by the United States' government, as expressed in the President's message of December last, justify the belief that the negotiation will soon be carried to a successful issue.

Valuable as the fulfilment of this scheme will prove to the commerce of all nations, it is still second in importance to the noble project of an Isthmus Ship-Canal—a project that in its scientific, commercial, and cosmopolitan bearings, has long occupied the minds of men of genius, of enterprise, and of world-wide philanthropy.

One glance at the globe reveals the tantalising position of that "narrow neck of land which unites North and South America," in width so comparatively insignificant, that in childhood we wondered how it was the southern continent had not broken away from so slender a suspension. There we find it, however, in our maturer days; and the conviction has grown upon us that the union will continue to subsist till a human arm severs the "narrow neck" of that obstacle to which we have so long succumbed at the expense of an additional and often dangerous voyage round Cape Horn, of 8,000 miles, in sailing to our colonies of the North Pacific. The present aspect of Western America has given fresh impulse to investigations having for their object to dispense with this costly addition to such voyages. Gold-washers of California, agriculturists of Oregon, miners of Vancouver's Island—all clamour for oceanic intercommunication separating the American continents. Valparaiso, Chili, Oahu, New Zealand, and the South Sea Islands, lend their voices to swell the polyglot demand. The vast advantage that our extending trade with China would derive from this realization of the original scheme born in the mind of Columbus—a western route to the Indies—urges on the enterprise. The world's verdict on the subject is, "If practicable, the work shall be accomplished." It is practicable according to the best evidence we possess on the subject—nay, more,—a water-way between the oceans has been effected. Some natives of Central America were induced by a monk in 1783 to construct a boat canal, which unites the River San Juan de Chirambira with the River Atrato, and thus channelled the only break of communication by boat from the Eastern to the Western Ocean: a track still available to boatmen in the wet season.

If practicable, this is not the germ even of the practical canal which will assuredly become the avenue for those future fleets destined, ere long, to steam upon the placid waters of the Pacific. Difficulties there are, and those far from trivial, which oppose the completion of such a path, navigable for ships of several hundred tons burden: but apparently none that are insurmountable by the skill, the labour, the unprecedented richness of resource, now commanded by our engineers. There are the physical difficulties of high tracts of land, and the liability of these districts to the disturbance wrought by volcanic agency. Then there are the political difficulties of native opposition, and the uncertainty of local governments. And, in addition, the negative difficulties arising from the local absence of the requisite supply of manual labour. These, and other obstacles to success, have been fairly considered, and the decree is still, that we have here no exception to the well-known axiom of the ancient sage Μελέτην τὸ πᾶν. Do we need encouragement from precedents? Where shall we find a precedent for a Britannia Bridge? Yet examples of great hydraulic works are not wanting. The Languedoc Canal is constructed. The Caledonian Canal is in full operation. There, in the very neighbourhood, exists that monument of human industry and skill, the Mexican "Desagué," described so fully by Humboldt, a work some miles in extent, for three of which it is 200 feet in depth, and at the surface, 300 feet in width. Surely we need not be appalled, deterred, or delayed in the accomplishment of the desiderated Mid-Columbia Ship-Canal.

Which is the most judicious route? occurs as the primary question: and answers various and conflicting have been proposed. Even the Geographical Society are the reverse of unanimous in their opinions, as the discussions over the paper furnished by Captain Fitzroy sufficiently display. All decisions must be arrived at with reference to such leading considerations as,—the best ports afforded on both sides of the Isthmus, the climate of the country, the most advantageous situation as regards the chief marts of trade, and the intrinsic facilities of construction. Five principal routes have been suggested. Two distinct channels taking their rise from the Gulf of Darien; that crossing the Isthmus of Tehuantepec; another traversing the Isthmus of Panama; and the fifth, and intermediate route, through the Lake of Nicaragua.

The proposals for uniting the Gulf of Darien and the Atrato River are in the minority, and are virtually abandoned.

Several important advantages appear to be offered in the course suggested by Don Jose de Garay, who obtained in 1842 a grant of privilege to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. In direct width the land extends to 150 miles; but the plan of his surveyor was to take advantage of the facilities presented by the Coatzacoalcos, a river to some extent navigable for 160 miles, and providing at its embouchure a safe port for shipping. A canal of 50 miles in length, 20 feet deep, and 122 feet wide, was to unite this river with the Pacific, and was to ascend to the table-land of Tarifa, 525 feet above the level of the Atlantic; from whence a descent to the Pacific would be required of 660 feet, for which it would be necessary to construct 150 locks. Abundance of excellent timber, fertility of soil, salubrity of climate, and the activity of the population, besides reputed mines of the precious metals among the mountains,—all speak greatly in favour of this scheme. The high levels of this country, the absence of any good Pacific port, and the length of the passage, must be placed on the opposite side of the account. The Tehuantepec route is not, therefore, most in favour for a canal; though for a railroad it is now the selected line.

A map-survey points at once to Panama as most worthy of choice; for this isthmus at the narrowest does not exceed 20 miles in width: but maps on their smooth surfaces fail to indicate that heights forbid what width or narrowness appears to invite. Here a mountain-ridge 1,000 feet above the level of the sea has written in legible and gigantic characters—"No thoroughfare." That part of the isthmus which would really admit of transit is wider by 14 miles. Messrs. Salomon & Co., merchants of Panama, have surveyed and advocated this fourth route. Their canal was proposed to be 22 feet in depth, 160 feet wide, and extending to the length of 25 miles, requiring to ascend only 33 feet to its highest point of land. It would unite the rivers Chagres and Trinidad with the Farfan, which communicates with the Pacific Ocean by the Rio Grande. Less expense would be incurred by the Panama Canal than by any of its rivals; but nothing can be said in favour of the surrounding country: the climate is extremely unhealthy, and the situation lies too far to the south.

The last passage proposed, by which those mighty bodies of water are sought to be connected, which lave almost within sound of each other the rival shores of the western continents, is the route through the State of Nicaragua. In 1830 the King of Holland favourably entertained this project, but was prevented from pursuing it by the Belgic Revolution; and Prince Louis Napoleon subsequently took measures for the prosecution of the undertaking. Ascending from the Gulf of Mexico the river San Juan, whose mouth forms an excellent harbour, the Nicaragua Lake is reached after a course of 100 miles. This lake is united to Lake Leon by the Tipitapa, a river 20 miles in length. An isthmus little more than 10 miles wide alone divides Lake Leon from the River Tosta, which falls into the Western Ocean, and at the point of communication forms the port of Rialejo. Of the 278 miles thus traversed, 82 would require works. Shallows would require to be deepened; rapids to be overcome by locks; and drainage (from the flow of waters into the Colorado) must be remedied by dams. The highest summit-levels do not exceed 51 feet above the surface of the lakes; but the country is said to be volcanic, a contingency against which it would puzzle our most ingenious engineers to provide. Not only does this country enjoy a more healthy climate, but a saving of 900 miles is effected in this route to California as compared with Panama; and it is calculated that, when fully organized, the transit may be achieved in 24 hours. Yes! the cause of Nicaragua versus Cape Horn is equivalent to 24 hours contrasted with from 1,500 to 2,000, with incomparably less uncertainty, less risk, less fatigue, less expense, less—everything that can be imagined as a point of inferiority in rival routes of travel. Surveys have been made, and are still in active progress under Mr. W. O. Childs, lately Chief Engineer of the State of New York. Accurate information has been obtained, deserving of complete reliance; and the result is an absolute determination in favour of the project last described. A New York Company is formed which has appointed two commissioners for entering into negotiations with British merchants who may desire to participate in the enterprise, which is estimated to require an outlay of £4,000,000 sterling. Warmly have our principal mercantile firms responded to the invitation thus frankly offered, and Sir J. H. Pelly, the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company, has lent his valuable assistance to the promotion of this grand and noble project, fraught in its successful issue with changes in the world's history too vast to be yet clearly contemplated. Treaties are already entered upon between the New York Company and the Government of the State of Nicaragua. Ratifications have been exchanged by the contracting parties, as President Fillmore announced in Congress. Progress has been made in the preliminary arrangements, and little more appears to be required than the designation of the free ports on either side of the isthmus, and an agreement which shall fix the limits of this neutral ground, within which it shall be incompetent to all to carry on operations of war.

According to the terms of the charter, in twelve years the canal will be completed, which is to bring Cantón within five weeks steaming of London, and to shorten voyages from the United States to China and the East Indies by 10,000 miles, and by 14,000 miles to the western coast of Mexico and California.

The tide of immigration flowing into this last-named State of yesterday, the population of which will soon number half a million, adds vastly to the importance of the channel. At least 50,000, it is reckoned,—some say 70,000—crossed the isthmus on their way to share the precious deposits so lavishly spread in those regions of almost fabulous wealth. Added facilities for reaching El Dorado must be attended with an increased rush of colonization; and Nicaragua and the adjoining States would soon receive a vast influx of settlers to cultivate their fruitful soils.

None can presume to describe or limit the magnificent results that must accrue to universal man from these highly accelerated means of intercourse, among which steam-ships stand forth pre-eminent. Nor is it only as mere economists of time that they are to be regarded, for these abbreviations create some branches of commerce which could not exist without them. Thus, in the conveyance of perishable provisions, fruit, &c., and live stock, between distant ports, delays would ruin such cargoes. Observe the importance of the steam-tug to sailing-vessels in towing them out of land-locked harbours, and down winding rivers, into the very breeze which is needed to waft them to their destinations; where, otherwise, they might have been lying wind-bound for an indefinite time.

A remarkable use of the steam-tug in fisheries demands a brief notice. The shoals of fish which pass the English shores on their southward migrations, sometimes within a short distance, do not at other seasons approach sufficiently near for the rude termination of their travels by the fishing-boats; as these vessels could not, in such cases, return in time to dispose of their cargoes while fresh. This difficulty is obviated by the steam-tug. Sometimes fifty or more smacks are towed out by a steamer, left during the night to net their harvest, and towed to shore again in the morning, where the fish are landed: and this course is repeated for successive days, till their finny prey becomes too scarce to recompense the trouble of capture.

Our slight sketch of Steam Navigation must speedily receive its final touch, though its intimate connexion with the topic of our succeeding paper on Railways will lead necessarily to fresh incidental allusions. The innumerable collateral subjects of interest to which it leads, heighten its intrinsic claim to study and attention. That the steam-ship is appreciated among nations, the rapid increase of their steam-fleets will exhibit. Our own registered vessels of this class, in 1849, numbered 1,118: the burden of which is reckoned at 151,429 tons. Comparisons with earlier dates have already been made. Less than three years ago the new Steam Basin in Portsmouth Harbour was opened: a magnificent work; the area of water in the basin and inlets being 8½ acres: and this is but the first of several such, in different parts of the kingdom, now required by the increasing importance of our Steam Navy. France, in 1835, possessed 75 steamers: 279 are now owned by that nation. In America the fresh and fresh lines of steamers, chiefly for river traffic, follow one another with amazing swiftness, in all senses of the expression.

Among the secondary sources of the striking changes, gradually, but with an ever accelerating rapidity, developing themselves upon the surface of our globe, the fleet intercourse attained by the medium of steam power must rank foremost in importance. How inter-communications among men are multiplied by this agency, a glance at commercial statistics will reveal. This in detail is not our province, but we will present one comparison in illustration of the fact. In 1835, the letters and newspapers that passed between England and Ceylon, Bombay, Madras, and Calcutta, was 274,120; as we learn from Mr. Porter. Ten years later, after steam power had been extended to the climes of the East, that number was increased to 1,795,028. When the vast numbers of emigrants who annually quit our shores to gain a surer livelihood in newer lands are considered—and who can avoid the consideration when the population of the United States alone is augmented yearly by nearly 300,000 from the British Isles, and when every individual is more or less connected with the inhabitants of our colonies?—then the vast value of easy access to these colonies will be readily apparent. It is only by means of a vigorous and increasing population, that the varied resources can be exhibited of these accessions to our wealth, and advances towards the entire civilization of the world. It is a point of view not to be overlooked, which regards the relief of anxiety afforded by a speedy interchange of communication among friends and families. The commercial importance of all things tending to this end is too obvious to require enlargement.

But there is one aspect of yet more vital consideration, which cannot fail to impress emotions of the liveliest hope upon the faithful student of human progress. We cannot continue to organize our "pleasure trips" to France, and Norway, and America (as spoken of this year), mingling among all peoples; and amid these visitings made and returned, still retain old national animosities. We cannot establish the "floating bridge between remote lands," and bind all countries in contiguity, without lessening by every advanced step, and ultimately destroying, the liability of the scourge of war with all the hideous sins and sorrows inseparable from its ghastly train. Steam ships, truly, have been pressed into the service of slaughter; they are so desecrated, and will be, for a time; but the end is not yet.

"Oh! thine might be a blessed power among the sons of men!

A vanguard leader, like the guide of Israel on their way,
A living fire to cheer the night, a moving cloud by day.
Could man's ambition know control, could angry passions cease,

Or, were thy venturous course confined within the reign of peace,

Swift in thy flight, from shore to shore, from dark to sultry skies, Welcomed wert thou, in every port, with shouts and glistening eyes.

A pledge of amity renew'd each voyage then would be,
As though the nations stretch'd and shook their hands across the sea!"

But the "reign of peace" has already commenced on the earth. We point with heartfelt gratitude and strengthened hope to that first neutral territory, from which the pledge of nations has abolished strife: that stipulation in the Nicaragua charter, to which allusion has before been made, and which of all others shines forth most radiant with bright promise for all nations, and kindreds, and tongues. This little bit of ground, won from the world's battle-field, and whence the furies of war, of rapine, and of slaughter, are banished for ever, is but the first fruits of extending civilization, and spreading Christianity. As a merely commercial question, wheat-fields and vineyards must no more be abandoned to the tender mercies of a revengeful soldiery. We shall have no room for "cock-pits;" we want to build "Treasuries" in their stead, as we have already done in Downing-street. We shall all have our glass-houses soon: England, this year; next year the United States: so we must not throw stones—much less bomb-shells—at our neighbours. We cannot afford to waste our precious metals on cannon and shot, which are not worth the powder they consume—they are needed for rails, and aqueducts, and viaducts. Mortars must be elaborated into steam-boilers: and twenty-four pounders converted into Archimedean screws, for the China Express boats, and the California mails. Inch by inch—nay, district by district—the powers of this world, under the influence of Power Divine, will agree to narrow the field of belligerent operations. So shall the "reign of peace" be perfected. All mankind will become united into one nation, speaking one universal language—one family, enjoying in harmonious intercourse the fruits of universal peace. "Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us. God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear him." B.

THE VALUE OF A WIG.

I HAVE somewhere read of a traveller who carried with him a brace of pistols, a carbine, a cutlass, a dagger, and an umbrella, but was indebted for his preservation to his umbrella; it grappled with a bush when he was rolling over a precipice. In like manner, my friend W——, though armed with a sword, rifle and hunting knife, owed his existence to his wig. He was specimen hunting (for W—— is a first-rate naturalist) somewhere in the backwoods of America, when, happening to light upon a dense covert, there sprung out upon him—not a panther or a catamount—but, with a terrible whoop and yell, a wild Indian—one of a tribe then hostile to our settlers. W——'s gun was mastered in a twinkling, himself stretched on the earth, the barbarous knife, destined to make him halder than Granby's celebrated Marquis, leaped eagerly from its sheath. Conceive the horrible weapon making its preliminary flourishes and circumgyrations; the savage features, made savager by the paint and ruddle, working themselves up to a demoniacal crisis of triumphant malignity; his red right hand clutching the shearing-knife, his left, the frizzle top-knot; and then the artificial scalp coming off in the Mohawk grasp! W—— says, the Indian Catchpole was, for some moments, motionless with surprise; recovering, at last, he dragged his captive along, through brake and jungle, to the encampment. A peculiar whoop soon brought the whole horde to the spot. The Indian addressed them with vehement gestures, in the course of which W—— was again thrown down, the knife again performed its circuits, and the whole transaction pantomimically described. All Indian sedateness and restraint were overcome, the assembly made every demonstration of wonder, and the wig was fitted on rightly, askew, and hind part before, by a hundred pair of red hands. Captain Gulliver's glove was not a greater puzzle to the Hounhym. From the men it passed to the squaws, and from them down to the least of the urchins; W——'s head, in the meantime, frying in a midsummer's sun.

At length the phenomenon returned into the hands of the chief—a venerable greybeard; he viewed it very attentively, and, after a long deliberation, maintained with true Indian silence and gravity, made a speech in his own tongue that procured for the anxious, trembling captive very unexpected honours. In fact, the whole tribe of women and warriors danced around him with such unequivocal marks of homage that even W—— comprehended that he was not intended for a sacrifice. He was then carried in triumph to their wigwams, his body coloured with their body colours of the most honourable patterns; and he was given to understand that he might choose any of the marriageable maidens for a squaw. Availing himself of this privilege, and so becoming, by degrees, more proficient in their language, he learned the cause of this extraordinary respect. It was considered that he had been a great warrior; that he had, by mischance of war, been overcome and tufted; but that, whether by valour or stratagem, each equally estimable among the savages, he had recovered his liberty and his scalp. As long as W—— kept his own council he was safe; but trusting his Indian Delilah with the secret of his locks, it soon got wind amongst the squaws, and from them became known to the warriors and chiefs. Then a solemn sitting was held at midnight, to consider the propriety of knocking the poor wig-owner on the head; but he had received a timely hint of their friendly intention, and when the tomahawks sought for him, he was far on his way, with his life-preserver, towards a British settlement.

RECENT RESEARCHES IN NORTH AMERICA.

OUR readers may not be aware that the antiquities of the Indian tribes of North America have acquired, within the last half century, an immense and increasing interest. The earlier historians of the continent were ignorant or incredulous as to the existence of any such mementos of the past, although the chroniclers who followed in the wake of Cortez and other conquerors, had described them in the most glowing terms. At length, by the researches of Humboldt and other travellers in Mexico and Peru, especially of Stephens and Catherwood in Central America, it has been found, that those portions of the continent abound in the most magnificent remains. Immense pyramidal mounds crowned with gorgeous palaces, or sacrificial altars adorned with elaborate sculptures, tablets covered with hieroglyphic inscriptions, as yet undecipherable, generally rude, but sometimes elegant in idea and execution; sculptures, and paintings, and ornaments,—are met with in increasing numbers among the depths of the tropical forests, the gorgeous vegetation of which invests them, as it were, with a funereal shroud, and embraces them in the death-grasp of final obliteration. It is fortunate, that some records of these precious memorials are preserved to us by recent explorers. They attest the former existence of a race which had attained a fixed state of civilization, a considerable knowledge of the arts and sciences, with a religious system, of which terror appears to have been the great principle, human sacrifices forming its conspicuous feature; a state of things indeed in all respects identical with the condition of Mexico at the period of its invasion by Cortez, when some of the temples were doubtless destroyed, while others of more ancient date probably were at that period already fallen into ruin. In North America, during the period of its first settlement, which was confined almost exclusively to the seaboard, no discoveries whatever were made; but as the stream of emigration, crossing the ridges of the Alleghanies, poured down upon the Mississippi and the Ohio, and the dense forests and boundless prairies of the west were gradually opened and explored, another and very interesting class of antiquities began to be disinterred from the oblivion of centuries. It was but slowly, indeed, as the forest fell beneath the axe of the back-woodman, that they came to light; they were for a long time but partially uncovered, or so imperfectly explored, that, even until a very recent period, they were regarded by many as being only peculiarities of geological formation, which credulous imagination had converted into fortresses, and temples, and sepulchres. The recent researches of Squier and Davis, accompanied as they are by elaborate surveys and drawings, have left no further room for scepticism, and have established, beyond dispute, the interesting fact, that the interior of the North American continent, as well as the southern, was once inhabited by an immense and settled population, who have left behind them almost innumerable memorials of their occupation.

These remains extend almost continuously over the whole interior, from the great lakes on the north to the Gulf of Mexico on the south, and from the sources of the Alleghany in western New York, far above a thousand miles up the Missouri, and into Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa. They are found in far greater numbers in the western than in the eastern portion of this immense district. They may be traced too along the seaboard from Texas to Florida, but are not met with any further along the north-eastern coast. They are generally planted in the rich valleys of the western rivers, or elevated above them on commanding natural terraces. In the neighbourhood of the upper Lakes they assume the singular form of gigantic relievos of earthen walls, often covering several acres, tracing out upon the soil outlines of the figures of men, birds, beasts, and reptiles. Southward of these appear, on the banks of the Ohio and its tributaries, mounds and truncated terraces of immense extent, sustaining earthen enclosures and embankments extending for entire miles. Of these extraordinary earth-works many were evidently fortifications, exhibiting no small constructive skill, defended by numerous bastions, having covered ways, hornworks, concentric walls, and lofty mounds intended as observatories, and numerous gateways giving access to the immense line of fortified enclosure, with graded roadways to ascend from terrace to terrace. Of these defences there appears to have been a chain, extending from the head of the Alleghany diagonally across central Ohio to the river Wabash.

Not all, however, of these earth-works were intended as fortresses; many are evidently designed for religious purposes. One of the most extraordinary of these is called the Great Serpent, on a projecting tongue of high land in Adams County, Ohio. The head of the reptile points toward the extremity, his form is traced out with all its convolutions, and its jaws are opened as it were to swallow a large egg-shaped enclosure occupying the extreme point of the promontory. Its entire length, if stretched out, would be a thousand feet. The serpent and globe was a symbol in Egypt, Greece, Assyria, and Mexico; and those familiar with English antiquities will no doubt remember a similar and still more gigantic instance of a serpent, sacred enclosure, and mound on the downs of Avebury in Wiltshire. Of the earth-works some are square, some perfectly circular, others of intricate and curious outline, while many appear to have something symbolical in their arrangements. It is necessary also to correct a popular mistake with regard to their materials, which, it has been affirmed, consist exclusively of earth, whereas both stone and unbaked brick have occasionally been made use of. The mounds scattered over the western valleys and prairies are almost innumerable, and of infinitely various dimensions, one of the largest covering six acres of ground. These also appear to have been appropriated to different purposes, some to sustain sacrificial altars or temples, others intended for sepulchres, containing skeletons, with pottery and charcoal for consuming the bodies. A remarkable instance of the latter class is the great mound at Grave Creek, which was penetrated by a perpendicular shaft opening into two sepulchral chambers, containing several skeletons with pottery and other articles. Within these enclosures and mounds have been discovered numerous stone sculptures of the heads of men, or of human figures in crouching attitudes; of the beaver, the wild cat, and the toad; of the swallow and other birds; of the heron striking a fish, the last very beautifully executed; and of the sea cow, an animal peculiar to the tropical regions. Ornamented tablets have also been dug up, and in some places sculptures of men, eagles, and elks can be traced on the face of the rocks, with rude attempts to represent hunting scenes. There have also been found instruments of silver and copper, axes, drills, and spear heads, stone discs, and instruments for games, with beads, shells, ornaments, and pipes, as well as decorated pottery.

Respecting the whole of these monuments it may be remarked, that they are evidently far ruder than those in Mexico and Central America, to which as they approach in locality they appear to approximate in their character and arrangements; and it is thus an interesting question whether we are to regard them as the original and more ancient works of a race who afterwards reached a higher degree of civilization further to the south, or whether, on the contrary, they present to us traces of a migration from the south towards the north. "It is not impossible," observes Squier, "that the agriculture and civilization of Mexico, Central America, and Peru, may have originated on the banks of the Mississippi." Whatever may be the result of further researches, one thing is abundantly evident, that the great valley of that river and of its tributaries was once occupied by a population who had advanced from the migratory state of hunting to the fixed condition of cultivators of the soil, that the population who raised these great defensive and sacred structures must have been dense and widely spread, in order to execute works for which prolonged and combined efforts were so obviously necessary, and that their customs, laws, and religion must have assumed a fixed and definite shape.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART II.

Time glided by unheeded; the London season was near its close, when, one morning at breakfast, Mr.

Mordaunt observed, "Well, Alonzo, time gets on; we are now in July, and before the end of October you must be safely landed at Rio. We must secure your passage in the next month's packet."

All this was well known and fully expected, yet did the intimation astound Alonzo. "So soon! can it be possible?"

The same evening they were en famille at the Countess's; the whist and chess tables were arranged as usual. "What are you thinking of, Don Alonzo, to make such a move as that?" inquired Viola; "you are a little absent—out of spirits this evening."

"I ought not to be so," said Alonzo, trying to rally, "for we have been busy all day planning and arranging about our voyage home."

"Indeed!" said Viola. Alonzo thought she sighed; certainly, she in her turn made a false move. Soon after, a servant entered with a case of jewels belonging to Viola, which had returned from being repaired; while looking at them Alonzo observed, that she was not a little envied by the London belles for the splendor of her jewels.

"How comes it," said she, "that I never see you wear any ornaments, not even a ring? Our young Brazilian beaux are naturally so fond of these decorations!"

"I assure you," said Mr. Mordaunt, looking off his cards, "Don Alonzo has one of the most superb rings I ever saw—a single yellow diamond, of great value."

Alonzo felt irritated, he scarcely knew why, and replied, in a bitter sarcastic tone, quite unusual with him: "Yes, I have a yellow diamond, indeed, that I never wish to see, or to show to any one else."

The words were scarcely out of his mouth before he felt their impropriety. "Draw your card, my lady, if you please," said Mr. Mordaunt.

"Check!" cried Alonzo, and with an effort looked at Viola. She was leaning on her hand; and her large, black, and brilliant eyes, with their long up-turned lashes, were fixed on his. He started at the look—why or wherefore he could not imagine. The eyes were withdrawn, and the game continued.

A few evenings after, he was leading her from a dance to place her, as usual, by the side of the Countess; they had to traverse three or four crowded rooms before they could reach the one where her ladyship was seated at whist; they moved very slowly and loiteringly along, seemingly in no great hurry to arrive at their destination.

"Are you really going to leave us next month, Don Alonzo?"

"Really; and you, Donna Viola, what becomes of you?"

"I go to Portugal."

"And there?" said Alonzo in an inquiring tone.

"Oh, there we shall not remain long; our Brazilian property will require our presence."

"Then we shall meet again," said Alonzo, eagerly.

"I hope so—I dare say, in a few months."

"Well, that is some comfort!"—and he seemed to respire more freely; then, after a pause—"but, I shall never again meet Viola!"

"But Viola, Don Alonzo," she replied, firmly, "will meet you as she has always met you; what she has been, she will continue to be—your sincere and affectionate friend."

"Thank you, Viola, thank you!—but pray do not speak another word to me just now." He placed her in her seat, and without looking at her, turned away and left the house.

Mr. Mordaunt had accepted the pressing invitation of Alonzo to accompany him to Brazil; their passage was taken, and their preparations well forward. Alonzo paid his farewell visits, and did all that was necessary on the occasion with the most perfect composure.

A passage was also taken for Viola and her suite in the Lisbon packet, and the day was fixed for her leaving town for Falmouth. The day following was decided on by Alonzo for the same purpose, but this he managed to conceal from her.

The morning before her departure, he called on the Countess. "You are come to take leave of Donna Viola?" said her ladyship.

"No, I am not; I am come to take leave of you, (for I also am on the eve of quitting London,) and to thank you for all your kind attention."

"But why not of Viola?" said the Countess; "she will be so disappointed."

"It is better I should not."

"But what am I to say to her?" inquired she.

"Precisely what I have just said—that it is better I should not."

The Countess returned no reply; and, with all good wishes on each side, they parted.

The weather was beautiful, and Mr. Mordaunt appeared to enjoy his journey exceedingly; but Alonzo was absorbed in thought, and it was only now and then, when Mr. Mordaunt touched upon his approaching meeting with his father, and his old Rio friends, that Alonzo could be roused for a moment. At the inns, too, he occasionally heard something that attracted his silent attention, of the beautiful young foreigner who had passed the day before.

They arrived at Falmouth in the morning to breakfast. With a beating heart, Alonzo inquired concerning the foreign lady and the Lisbon packet; the lady had gone on board the evening before, and the Lisbon and Rio packets were to sail early on the following morning.

After breakfast, the two gentlemen were engaged superintending the embarkation of their servants and baggage, and having taken an early dinner went on board.

It was a lovely evening. Alonzo glanced at the merry and busy town of Falmouth, the numerous vessels, and the broad Atlantic, which lay stretched out before him; then his eye fixed, as though there were nothing else worth looking at, on the small vessel that lay nearest to him. He suddenly left his station, descended into a boat, and was in a few minutes on board.

In the outer cabin he met the duenna, who looked very much surprised at seeing him; but, without speaking, threw open the door of the after-cabin—he entered, and the door closed behind him.

Viola lay on a couch, apparently absorbed in reading; the noise startled her, and she looked up; but nothing can express the astonishment painted on her countenance at the sight of Alonzo, who stood fixed as a statue before her. She sprang from the couch, and evidently her first feeling was to run towards him, but probably the strangeness of his look and demeanour arrested her; for she checked herself, and exclaimed, "Don Alonzo!"

"Viola!" said he seizing both her hands, and gently forcing her to return to the seat she had left; "Viola!" (the word seemed to choke him,) "I cannot live without you—you are yet free, have pity on me!"

"Alonzo," she asked, in a tremulous voice, "are you free?"

"I am not irrevocably bound."

In a moment she seemed to recover her self-possession, and replied, "Then I must tell you, that I am. You are labouring under a fatal error; you think I am but engaged—I am married. But stay!" she exclaimed, alarmed at the effect of her communication—"stay!—one moment!—Alonzo!—I beseech you!"

It was in vain; he almost shook her off, rushed to his boat, and in a few minutes was on board of his own vessel; he pushed by Mr. Mordaunt, and everybody and everything that impeded his way to his cabin, where, locking the door, he threw himself on his bed, in a state of mind not to be described.

Mr. Mordaunt took possession of the boat Alonzo had quitted, went on board the Lisbon packet, and had an interview with Donna Viola.

At day break, the following morning, Alonzo, wrapped in a cloak, and his hat slouched over his brow, stood on the deck, watching, with gloomy composure, the Lisbon packet getting under weigh; she soon began to move—a few minutes more, and she was dashing through the water close beside him. Desperate thoughts for an instant darkened his mind; a feeling of revenge and despair beset him, and he felt a strong temptation to plunge into the wake of the flying vessel—when one of the latticed windows of the after-cabin was suddenly thrown open; he saw a waving handkerchief, and then the form of Viola herself, her eyes streaming with tears, kissing both her hands, and waving them to him. He had just time to return the salutation; his dark purpose vanished, the weakness of his mother came over him, and he wept. "She loves me!"—that thought alone, single and abstracted, brought back the blood in a rush of transport to his heart—"she loves me! and nobly sets me the example of a virtuous submission to our fate!"

A friendly hand at that moment was laid on his; Mr. Mordaunt drew him to his cabin. "Alonzo," he said, "I have been sadly to blame—I ought to have foreseen and guarded against all this. Donna Viola, whom I saw last evening, bade me give you this note," putting one into his hand.

Alonzo tore it open:—"Alonzo, I conjure you, for the sake of your father—for my sake—struggle against your fatal and hopeless passion! We shall very soon meet again—let us meet in peace, in innocence, and friendship! Heaven bless you, and Heaven forgive us both, for we have been much to blame!—Viola."

Viola was very inexperienced, and Mr. Mordaunt knew very little about love, otherwise Alonzo had never received this note, which only added fuel to the flame; he kept it next his heart, and read it every day during the passage. He questioned Mr. Mordaunt closely concerning his interview with Viola the preceding evening, and especially inquired whether he could give him any information concerning her husband. "I am told," he said, "that he is a man of high rank, very rich, old, and infirm. He has married the orphan daughter of his friend, merely as a safeguard to her and her property in these dangerous times." At this intelligence, Alonzo's heart bounded with secret joy; he became comparatively tranquil, but he would not analyse his feelings—he dared not.

A few weeks brought them to Rio. On entering its superb harbour, Mr. Mordaunt was struck with admiration at the magnificent and beautiful scenery that surrounded him; but to the heart of Alonzo it spoke yet more feelingly, entwined as it was with all his dear and early associations. He could have kissed the black and barren rock of the Sugar-Loaf; it was passed, and threw open the graceful sweep of the Bay of Botafogo, surrounded with its wooded and lofty mountains; this too was passed, and the harbour of Rio appeared. Great political changes had taken place, and the Imperial flag waved upon every fort and hill. The visiting boat approached, and by the side of the officer sat Alonzo's watchful and expecting father, who in a few minutes more was locked in the arms of his son. On their landing, friends crowded round them; in the afternoon they visited the good, kind Abbess; and the evening was employed in renewing Alonzo's recollections of his young female friends, most of whom had now become wives and mothers; and those whom he had known as children, had started up into young women, a process remarkably rapid in that country. He was pleased to observe the vast improvement that, even during the short period of his absence, had taken place at Rio, as far as concerned the comforts and refinements of domestic life. On the following morning he was presented at court;—in short, for two or three days, he had not leisure even to look melancholy.

But one morning after breakfast, (a time universally agreed upon for making disagreeable communications,) his father informed him that, in about a month, Donna Isabella might be expected, with her father and aunt. "I have taken a temporary residence for you, which I think you will like, at Botafogo, (I say temporary, for you will soon be offered, what you most desire, a diplomatic mission to Europe;) and the furnishing and arranging this residence has been my hobby for the last six months. If you and Mr. Mordaunt have no objection we will ride to see it this afternoon." "If you please, sir," was the only reply; and, accordingly, at the appointed time they set out. The house and situation were both delightful; the furniture tasteful and costly. The apartment peculiarly appropriated to Donna Isabella, and called her garden-room, opened into a delicious parterre; it contained tables for needle-work and drawing, book-cases filled with a collection in English, French, and Italian; there were also a piano, harp, and guitar.

"Is Donna Isabella such a proficient in music?" asked Alonzo, with a sarcastic smile.

"She is, I believe, very fond of it," quietly replied the Marquess. Alonzo, with much warmth and sincerity, thanked his father for the kind pains he had taken; then sighed, and thought how happy he could be here with—certainly not with Donna Isabella.

After the first novelty of his arrival had worn off, Alonzo relapsed into sadness; a settled gloom was gathering on his youthful brow, a sickening indifference to all around was gradually stealing over him. His father and Mr. Mordaunt did all they could to arouse and distract his attention. Excursions into the country were frequently made, especially to the botanical garden, about six miles from the city. It is arranged with exquisite order and good taste, encircled by bold and rugged mountain-scenery, opening towards the ocean—reposing in all its richness of floral beauty, with its shady and stately trees, its leafy bowers and gushing streams, like a gem in the wilderness—like the decked and lovely bride of a dark-browed warrior in those stern days of "auld lang syne," of which one loves to dream in spots like these. Water-parties to the many beautiful islands—society and study—were all tried, and in vain! every day, every hour, seemed to increase the despondency of Alonzo; but he never complained, never even touched in any way upon the subject that caused it. Upwards of three weeks passed in this manner.

Alonzo was fond of the society of the Abbess; with the unerring tact of her sex, she managed his present mood; she would sit opposite to him, employed at her old-fashioned embroidery frame, for an hour without speaking; this was just what he liked. One afternoon he had ensconced himself in his accustomed seat in her little grated parlour; he scarcely observed her entrance, but instead of seating herself at her frame, she stepped towards him.

"Alonzo, I am glad you have come, for I was just going to send for you."

"To send for me?" repeated he, listlessly.

"Yes, a friend of yours has arrived at the convent, and wishes to see you."

"A friend of mine!"

"You recollect, I suppose, Donna Viola de Montezuma?"

He started from his seat—the shock was electric.

"Viola, did you say?—Donna Viola;—recollect her!—what of her?—what of her?"

"She has become a widow."

"Go on!"

"She arrived at Lisbon just in time to receive the last breath of her expiring husband. After the funeral, she consigned her affairs there into proper hands, and delayed not a moment in returning to this country, where they demand her instant attention. She arrived yesterday, and remains here for a short time. She wishes to see you."

"I am ready," said Alonzo.

The Abbess left the room. "This is too—too much!" he exclaimed aloud, as he paced the little parlour with hurried steps. A slight rustling near the grate arrested him; it was Viola, in deep mourning, looking more lovely and interesting than ever. She presented him her hand through the grate—he knelt, and pressed it to his lips, to his heart, to his burning forehead. "Alonzo," she said, in the kindest and most soothing tone, "I have heard from the Abbess of your marriage, and I fear that I have innocently contributed to render that, which might have proved the highest blessing, a source of bitter misery. What can I do but to entreat you to arm yourself with the resolution of acting right? I confess that your forcing me to lose my esteem for you, would be the greatest pain you could inflict, even although your affection for me were the cause. Promise me, Alonzo—"

He hastily interrupted her: "I will promise nothing—nothing! Heaven grant that I may do what is right, but in the present state of my mind, I will pass my word for nothing."

Viola sighed. "Well," she resumed, "I shall see whether Alonzo be really what I believed him, or not. I shall see whether he be capable of sacrificing the happiness of his young and innocent wife, and of his dotting father—his own honour and principles, to the shadow of a shade; for such is all hope of me. Heaven bless you, Alonzo! and support you through this trial! You have my prayers, my best, my warmest wishes; deserve to be happy, and leave the rest to Providence."

She disappeared; he still remained kneeling at the grate, apparently wrapt in thought. At length, a ray of light seemed to break through the darkness that surrounded him; a single spark of hope saved him from utter despair. He decided that, in his first interview with Donna Isabella, he would reveal every secret of his heart; he would conjure her, as she valued their mutual happiness, to assist him in breaking the tie that had been made between them. He would recall to her recollection the fatal hour of their union, when reluctance on his side, and the necessity of absolute force on hers, formed but an evil omen of future concord. Since that moment they had never met, had never even corresponded; he had formed elsewhere a deep and serious attachment, and so perhaps had she. As to the debt he had incurred towards her and her family, with a little time and indulgence it would be cleared, as the property in Portugal was on the eve of being restored to his father. Thus, if they acted with determination, and in unison, there could be no doubt of their succeeding in breaking the galling fetters in which the mistaken zeal of their relatives had bound them. "If," he exclaimed, "she be not utterly devoid of the common pride and delicacy of her sex, there is but one step to take; she will—she must take it—and I shall become free and happy!"

Full of this thought he left the convent; and, on his return home, sought Mr. Mordaun, and laid his project before him. Mr. Mordaun listened with the utmost kindness and sympathy. He saw but one objection to the attempt: if Donna Isabella, in spite of all he could urge, should refuse to enter into his views, how much wider would it make the breach between them! how much would it diminish their chance of happiness! But to this side of the picture Alonzo absolutely refused to turn; and Mr. Mordaun, seeing him perfectly resolved, gave up the point; glad, at all events, that Alonzo had even this slight support to lean upon until the crisis arrived.

At the top of the Marquess's small and rather inconvenient abode was a room in which, on account of its height and airiness, and the view of the harbour it commanded, the gentlemen preferred to breakfast, and to spend the morning in; a spy-glass was fixed here, to which, of late, the eye of the Marquess had been often and anxiously applied. One morning, about a week after the scenes just described, the Marquess seemed more than usually on the alert, watching the approach of a fine Brazilian merchant-ship. "Is she near the fort?"—"here she comes"—"she is abreast of it"—"now for it!" and as he spoke, up flew a private signal. The Marquess clasped his hands, and exclaimed in a half-whisper, to Mr. Mordaun, "Thank heaven, there they are at last!" and the two gentlemen instantly left the room.

"Well," thought Alonzo, "I am not bound to know that there they are at last, until I am informed of it;" and he tried again to rivet his attention to his study. Three intolerably long hours passed away; a note was then brought to him from the Marquess: "Donna Isabella, her aunt, and father have arrived, and are now at Botafogo. The two ladies are somewhat fatigued, and prefer not receiving you until the evening; therefore, between seven and eight, Mr. Mordaun and the carriage will be at your door."

Alonzo sent away his untouched dinner; he dressed en grande toilette; and, taking down Walter Scott's last new novel, strove to fix his attention on its delightful pages. Alonzo had generally the power of exercising great mastery over his mind; to an indifferent observer he would appear rather cold, reserved, and not easily acted upon in any way; but, when his feelings once burst their barrier, it was with a violence proportioned to the restraint he had thrown over them.

At half-past seven, the carriage drew up to the door, and Alonzo immediately descended to it. "I am glad to see you are quite ready," said Mr. Mordaun, as he entered; the door closed, and they drove off.

"You have seen Donna Isabella?" inquired Alonzo.

"Yes, I have," was the laconic reply, with evidently a wish of saying no more. After a considerable pause, Mr. Mordaunt asked whether he still kept to his purpose.

"Certainly," said Alonzo firmly, and no further conversation passed.

Half an hour brought them to their destination; with a throbbing heart Alonzo descended from the carriage. They were shown into the grand sala, brilliantly lighted. Here were assembled Senhor Josef and Senhora Theresa, the Marquess, and the Abbess, with an attendant nun; the old lady had not left her convent for many years, but on this occasion she was determined to be present.

Alonzo saluted Senhor Josef and his sister with gravity, but perfect and sincere kindness; he kissed the hand of his aunt; then, turning to his father, begged to know where he might find Donna Isabella.

"She waits for you in her garden-room," replied the Marquess; Alonzo bowed, and left the sala.

He struggled successfully to continue the same appearance of composure, as he passed along the corridor which led to the garden-room; the door was ajar, he entered and closed it.

The room was only lighted by a single Grecian lamp, suspended from the centre; the latticed doors leading to the garden were thrown open, and the moonbeams quivered brightly on the rich festoons of flowers and foliage that twined around them. Leaning on the harp near the furthest door, stood a lady magnificently dressed as a bride; one hand hung listlessly at her side, in the other were gathered the folds of her veil, in which her face was buried. Alonzo advanced, and although somewhat prepared for a favourable alteration, he was struck with astonishment at the exquisitely fine and graceful form that stood before him. "Donna Isabella, I believe;"—no reply, and no change of position. He approached a little nearer, and ventured to take the unoccupied hand, whose slight and delicate fingers were covered with gems, but on the arm was only a single bracelet, and that was of pink topaz. "Donna Isabella, I venture to claim a few minutes' private conversation with you, on a subject that deeply concerns the happiness of us both; permit me to lead you to a seat." He paused—the emotion that visibly pervaded her whole frame convinced him that at least he was not addressing a statue. Suddenly, she raised her head, clasped her hands, and sunk on her knees at his feet. Alonzo recoiled, as though a supernatural appearance had presented itself, while, with a tone that thrilled through heart and brain, she exclaimed—

"Alonzo, can you forgive me?" It was Viola! "Can you forgive me, for all the deception I have practised, and caused others to practise? May the prize I strove for—my husband's heart—plead my excuse! I know it will!"

While she spoke, Alonzo in some degree recovered himself. He raised up the beautiful suppliant, and folding her in silence to his breast, kissed her with pure, intense, and devoted affection. He could not speak; he thought not, and cared not how it had all been brought about; he only knew and felt that his wife was in his arms, and that—that wife was Viola.

The party in the drawing-room, to whom the duenna was now added, were in an agony of impatient expectation. The Marquess at length led the way, and they all crept softly along the passage: "May we come in?"

"Come in!" said Alonzo; the first words he had spoken since the denouement.

Their entrance dispersed, in a great measure, the concentrated feelings of Alonzo, and he became attentive to learn the mechanism by which his present happiness had been effected. It appeared that the prepossession Isabella had conceived for her husband at the altar, had produced a striking change on her, as love did on Cymon. Ill health, the absence of the usual means of education at St. Paul's, the ignorance and weak indulgence of those with whom she resided, had allowed weeds to spring up and choke the rich treasures of her mind. However, she accompanied the Marquess from St. Paul's, and was placed by him under the charge of the Abbess, where, in three years, her improvement in health, beauty, and mental attainments astonished all those who observed her. The two years she passed in England, under the most judicious care, had brought her to that point of perfection to which she had now arrived.

Alonzo had not the slightest recollection of any of her features except her eyes, which on the day of their union had that large size and troubled expression which usually attend ill health. He could now account for the startling recollection that had passed over him one evening at the chess-board: the look she then gave, and that with which she had impressed him on her leaving the oratory, were the same.

"And you, my grave and worthy tutor," said Alonzo, addressing Mr. Mordaunt, "did you join in this powerful league against me?"

"I confess," replied Mr. Mordaunt, "that I was in the service of the enemy; so much so that, on the evening you first met Donna Viola, and were introduced to her at the Opera, I knew beforehand that such a meeting and such an introduction would take place. I take this opportunity, however, of hinting, that you may thank your own impetuosity that the discovery was not prematurely advanced on board of the Lisbon packet; for Donna Viola, terrified at your vehemence, would have revealed the whole truth, could she but have prevailed upon you to stay and hear it."

"Alas, for my vehemence!" exclaimed Alonzo; and trying to collect his puzzled thoughts, he turned to the Abbess. "And you too, my dear aunt—you too, my Lady Abbess! it is well you have the power of absolving yourself for all those little fibs you told me the other day."

"May Our Lady grant me absolution," replied the good Abbess, devoutly, "for whatsoever stain of sin

I may have contracted by playing a part in this masque!"

"Supper! supper!" cried out the Marquess, as he marshalled them the way. Alonzo seized his Viola (for thus he ever after named her,) as if he dreaded that some magical delusion would again snatch her from his sight—and never did a set of happier creatures meet than those which now encircled the sumptuous banquet prepared in honour of his Brazilian wedding.

BIOGRAPHY OF ROBERT SOUTHEY.¹

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

PART II.

WE resume with pleasure the thread of a narrative which want of space compelled us to break off rather abruptly in a former number. Our readers will recollect that we had traced Southey to his quiet abode among the mountains of Cumberland, where he was destined to pass the remainder of his life. The situation of his secluded dwelling-place was well suited to his habits and pursuits. The beauty of the scenery by which he was surrounded offered an inducement to out-door exercise, which his laborious literary occupations rendered absolutely necessary; and being thoroughly domesticated in his habits, he fully appreciated the advantages of retirement, and the peaceful attractions of his home. Having reached the prime of manhood, he gave himself up to literature, and laboured at it with all his heart, and soul, and strength. "Habitually an early riser," says his son, "he never encroached upon the hours of night; and finding his highest pleasure and his recreation in the very pursuits necessary for earning his daily bread, he was probably more continually employed than any other writer of his generation." By a careful appropriation of each moment of his times, and by assigning to himself different tasks for each portion of the day, he was able to get through a stupendous quantity of work, in reviewing, translating, and independent original composition in verse and prose. It may here also be observed that his opinions, social, religious, and political, which, to use his son's words, had been "for many years in a transition state," were now gradually settling and sobering down. His republicanism had fled with the enthusiasm of his youth; he had ceased to believe in human perfectibility; and his views of religious truth had gradually assumed an orthodox form.

We have remarked that Southey's bodily constitution was originally weak, and the course of his life had been marked, in an unusual degree, by trouble and anxiety. The responsibilities which he had somewhat imprudently incurred at an early period of his life, and the harassing nature of his occupations, had told upon his nervous and excitable frame. "Many things," he says, writing to his friend Wynn, "make me feel old;—ten years of marriage; the sort of fatherly situation in which I have stood to my brother Henry, now a man himself; the premature age at which I commenced author; the death of all who were about me in childhood; a body not made of lasting materials, and some wear and tear of mind." On the other hand, he possessed what he felt to be the best and bountifullest gift of heaven,—a happy, buoyant spirit,—ever gay and cheerful, and ready to be amused by the veriest trifles. "O, dear Light-foot," he says, in a letter to the Reverend Nicholas Lightfoot, (a college friend,) "what a blessing it is to have a boy's heart! it is as great a blessing in carrying one through this world, as to have a child's spirit will be in fitting us for the next."

Having encountered many difficulties in the course of his career, it must be mentioned to Southey's honour, that he always regarded the literary aspirant with feelings of genuine sympathy and kindness, and was ever ready at the proper time with a word of encouragement or advice. Among those in whose welfare he had taken a peculiar interest, was Henry Kirke White, a volume of whose poems had appeared in 1804. The Monthly Review had noticed this little work in the most cruel and insulting manner. "I was provoked," says Southey, in a letter to Mr. Duppa, "and wrote to encourage the boy, offering to aid him in a subscription for a costlier publication." Soon after this, however, by the kindness of friends whom he had won by his talents and piety, Kirke White was sent to Cambridge, where he literally killed himself with study. "His life," says Southey in another letter to Duppa, "will affect you, for he fairly died of intense application. Cambridge finished him. When his nerves were already so over-strained that his nights were utter misery, they gave him medicine to enable him to hold out during examination for a prize!" After his death a boxful of his papers was sent to Southey for inspection, "the sight of which," says the poet, "literally made my heart ache, and my eyes overflow, for never did I behold such proofs of human industry." From these papers he was enabled to construct two admirable volumes of "Remains," accompanied with a short Memoir. As may be imagined, it was a labour of love; his services (though it was a sacrifice of time he could then ill afford,) were given to the family of the deceased gratuitously; but he felt an interest in the undertaking far beyond that of mere literary taskwork, and the success of the publication was an ample recompense for his toil.

In the spring of 1807 a pension of 200*l.* per annum was conferred upon Southey by the government of the day. As a timely recognition of his literary services and distinguished talent, it will not be denied that this was a proper and graceful proceeding. In a pecuniary point of view, however, the only advantage it conferred on the poet was to relieve him from an obligation which must have been rather galling to his independent spirit. Up to this period he had received from his friend Wynn an allowance of 160*l.* per annum, being about the sum which the pension, deducting fees and income-tax, actually realized. Such acts of friendship are of rare occurrence in the world, and deserve to be recorded. Without this generous assistance, it is probable that Southey would have severely felt the pressure of pecuniary embarrassment; for his literary exertions were, in general, but poorly requited, and his expectations of inheriting anything from wealthier branches of his family had been wofully disappointed. The first edition of Madoc produced him the insignificant sum of 25*l.*, and though consoled with the idea that the merits of the poem would procure him some posthumous renown, he had been convinced by experience that "drafts upon posterity would not pass for current expenses." He had also found—and the discovery was not very agreeable—that "his poems had sold exactly in an inverse ratio to their merit," and that he could not put himself upon a level with the taste of book-buying readers. Under these discouraging circumstances, in order to increase his scanty income, he was compelled to give up the principal portion of his time to the more profitable employment of writing for reviews and periodicals,—an occupation for which he was admirably qualified by his varied information and excellent taste, although he felt it to be somewhat irksome.

The establishment of the Quarterly Review, in the autumn of the year 1808, exercised a considerable influence in the direction of Southey's literary labours. Since its establishment, the renowned "Edinburgh" had assumed a kind of literary dictatorship, which, from its open avowal of Whig sentiments, and its decided party tone, had become most distasteful to some of the leading spirits of the time. It was now resolved to contest the ground with a Tory periodical of a similar character, and Gifford, the translator of Juvenal, had been appointed editor. Southey, who had formerly refused an offer to become a contributor to the Edinburgh, from a dislike to its principles, was solicited, through his friend Mr. Bedford, to co-operate in the new undertaking. To this request, without pledging himself to any particular political views, he willingly acceded. Announcing to Lieutenant Southey the expected appearance of the new Review, he says, "I think we shall do good, and will do my part with a hearty good-will. What I said to Bedford was, that as long as this government-caravan was travelling my road I was content to travel with it. . . . One good thing is, that I shall be pretty sure of civil treatment here, and the Review will carry great weight with it." The anxiously-expected periodical by no means, however, met with his unequivocal approval. "I could have wished," he says in a letter to Mr. Gifford—and many of our readers will sympathise, we hope, with the good feeling of these remarks,—"that this Review had less resembled the Edinburgh in the tone and temper of its criticisms. That book of Miss Owen-son's is, I dare say, very bad, both in manners and morals; yet, had it fallen into my hands, I think I could have told her so in such a spirit that she herself would have believed me, and might have profited by the censure. The same quantity of rain which would clear a flower of its blights, will, if it falls heavier and harder, wash the roots bare, and beat the blossoms to the ground. I have been in the habit of reviewing more than eleven years; for the lucre of gain, and not, God knows, from any liking to the occupation; and of all my literary misdeeds, the only ones of which I have repented have been those reviews which were written with undue asperity, so as to give unnecessary pain."

We have always considered some of Southey's familiar poems to rank among his most successful efforts in verse. Of this class we would particularize the "English Eclogues," which, in addition to their other merits, display considerable dramatic power. They were founded upon incidents which fell under the writer's observation, and have an air of truthfulness about them which attracts and fixes the reader's attention. The subject of one of them—"The Alderman's Funeral"—is thus alluded to in a letter to Sir Walter Scott, dated July 30, 1809:—"The Eclogue which I have sent Ballantyne has suffered a little by having all its local allusions cut out. . . . The thing was suggested by my accidentally crossing such a funeral some years ago at Bristol; and had I been disposed to personal satire, the hero of the procession would have afforded ample scope for it. As soon as he knew his case was desperate, he called together all the persons to whom he was indebted in his mercantile concerns; 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'I am going to die, and my death will be an inconvenience to you, because it will be some time before you can get your accounts settled with my executors; now if you will allow me a handsome discount, I'll settle them myself at once.' They came into the proposal, and the old alderman turned his death into nine hundred pounds' profit."

The sketch of this keen tradesman's character in the above-mentioned eclogue, is a favourable specimen of Southey's vigorous style, and contains some wholesome truths:—

—“This man of half a million
Had all those public virtues which you praise:
But the poor man rung never at his door;
And the old beggar at the public gate,
Who, all the summer long, stands hat in hand,
He knew how vain it was to lift an eye
To that hard face. Yet he was always found Among your ten and twenty-pound subscribers,
Your benefactors in the newspapers.
His alms were money put to interest
In the other world, . . . donations to keep open
A running charity account with heaven.

* * * * *
Who should lament for him, sir, in whose heart
Love had no place, nor natural charity?
The parlour spaniel, when she heard his step,
Rose slowly from the hearth, and stole aside
With creeping pace; she never raised her eyes
To woo kind words from him, nor laid her head
Upraised upon his knee, with fondling whine.
How could it be but thus? Arithmetic
Was the sole science he was ever taught;
The multiplication-table was his Creed,
His Pater-Noster, and his Decalogue.
When yet he was a boy, and should have breathed
The open air and sunshine of the fields,
To give his blood its natural spring and play,
He in a close and dusky counting-house
Smoke-dried, and sear'd, and shrivell'd up his heart.

So from the way in which he was train'd up
His feet departed not; he toil'd and toil'd,
Poor muckworm! through his threescore years and ten;
And when the earth shall now be shovell'd on him,
If that which served him for a soul were still Within its husk, 't would still be dirt to dirt."

In 1810 "the Curse of Kehama," upon which Southey had for some time laboured most assiduously at such intervals as he could spare from other engagements, was presented to the public. Notwithstanding the great merits of this production, like most of his other poems it was but coldly received. The oriental grandeur of the subject, its pomp of language, magnificent imagery, and occasional passages of sublimity and tenderness, were fully appreciated by the critical few; but the incidents were in general too wild and unnatural to please the ordinary readers of verse.

Among the most enthusiastic admirers of Southey's poetry at this period was the celebrated and unfortunate Percy Bysshe Shelley. He had made a pilgrimage to Keswick in the winter of 1811-12, and the boldness and extravagance of his sentiments forcibly reminded the author of "Wat Tyler" and "Joan of Arc" of the views and opinions which he had himself entertained in his early days. The following description of Shelley occurs in a letter to Mr. Grosvenor Bedford, and is too characteristic for us to omit:—

"Here is a man at Keswick who acts upon me as my own ghost would do. He is just what I was in 1794. His name is Shelley, son of the member for Shoreham; with 6,000*l.* a-year entailed upon him, and as much more in his father's power to cut off. Beginning with romances of ghosts and murder and with poetry at Eton, he passed at Oxford into metaphysics; printed half-a-dozen pages, which he entitled 'The Necessity of Atheism;' sent one anonymously to Coplestone, in expectation, I suppose, of converting him; was expelled in consequence; married a girl of seventeen, after being turned out of doors by his father; and here they both are in lodgings, living upon 200*l.* a-year, which her father allows them. He is come to the fittest physician in the world. At present he has got to the pantheistic stage of philosophy, and in the course of a week I expect he will be a Berkleyan, for I have put him upon a course of Berkeley. It has surprised him a good deal to meet, for the first time in his life, with a man who perfectly understands him, and does him full justice. I tell him that all the difference between us is that he is nineteen and I am thirty-seven; and I dare say it will not be very long before I succeed in convincing him that he may be a true philosopher, and do a great deal of good with 6,000*l.* a-year; the thought of which troubles him a great deal more at present than ever the want of a sixpence (for I have known such a want) did me. . . . God help us! the world wants mending, though he did not set about it exactly in the right way."

The "Life of Nelson," which may be fairly designated the most popular production which proceeded from Southey's pen, made its appearance in 1813. "It originated," says his son, "in an Article in the fifth number of the Quarterly Review, which was enlarged at Murray's request. My father received altogether 300*l.* for it; 100*l.* for the Review, 100*l.* when the 'Life' was enlarged, and 100*l.* when it was published in the Family Library."

Although the subject was not of his own choosing,

Southey had executed his task con amore, and a more delightful piece of biography was never penned. Writing to his uncle, the Rev. Herbert Hill, on the occasion of its completion, the poet says, "This is a subject which I should never have dreamt of touching, if it had not been thrust upon me. I have walked among sea-terms as carefully as a cat does among crockery; but, if I have succeeded in making the narrative continuous and clear—the very reverse of what it is in the lives before me—the materials are in themselves so full of character, so picturesque, and so sublime, that it cannot fail of being a good book."

We now come to an event of some importance in Southey's life. The office of Poet-laureate having become vacant by the death of Henry James Pye, Esq., the dignity (?) was in the first place tendered to Sir Walter Scott, and afterwards, upon his refusal, to Mr. Southey. In a letter to "his elder brother in the muse," Sir Walter explained that he had not refused the office "from any foolish prejudice" against it; but rather because being already in the receipt of official emoluments, he was unwilling to incur censure by engrossing another of the very few appointments "proper to be filled by a man of literature, who had no other views in life." Upon its being understood that the birth-day and occasional odes usually exacted from the laureate, were to be dispensed with, Southey signified his consent to accept the post, and, after some delay, received the appointment, and was duly sworn in at the office of the Lord Chamberlain. "I swore," said the new Laureate, in a letter to Sir Walter Scott, "to be a faithful servant of the king, to reveal all treasons which might come to my knowledge, to discharge the duties of my office, and to obey the Lord Chamberlain in all matters of the king's service, and in his stead the Vice-Chamberlain. Having taken this upon my soul, I was thereby inducted into all the rights, privileges, and benefits which Henry James Pye, Esq., did enjoy, or ought to have enjoyed."

We may here state that the net emoluments of the office did not exceed 90*l.* a-year, and we believe that they have not since been raised beyond that sum. "The original salary," says Southey, "was 100 marks. It was raised for Ben Jonson to 100*l.* and a tierce of Spanish Canary wine, now wickedly commuted for 26*l.*, which said sum, unlike the Canary, is subject to income-tax, land-tax, and heaven knows what taxes besides."

Upon being actually installed, Southey announced the event to his wife in the following choice lines, composed in St. James's Park, on his way from the Chamberlain's office, after the gentleman-usher, "a worthy sort of fat old man, in a wig and bag, and a snuff-coloured full-dress suit, with cut steel buttons and a sword," had administered the oath before described:—

"I have something to tell you, which you will not be sorry at,

'Tis that I am sworn in to the office of Laureat,
The oath that I took there could be nothing wrong in,

"Twas to do all the duties to the dignity belonging.
Keep this, I pray you, as a precious gem,
For this is the Laureat's first poem."

Contrary to his expectations, however, he found, after his appointment, that official verses were frequently required from him, and most reluctantly, as many of his letters show, did he execute his allotted task. "When did this fool's custom begin?"—he writes to Mr. Bedford. "Before Cibber's time? I would have made the office honourable if they would have let me. If they will not, the dishonour will not be mine." And again, after the lapse of two years, he thus addresses the same gentleman. "I have not been well used about the Laureateship. They require task verses from me,—not to keep up the custom of having them befiddled, but to keep up the task,—instead of putting an end to this foolery in a fair and open manner, which would do the court credit, and save me a silly expense of time and labour."

On the subject of the protracted contest with France, Southey had for some time felt and expressed himself most strongly. When the uselessness of the war was insisted on by some, and its hopelessness by others, he had not ceased to recommend vigorous measures, and to prophesy final success. He appears to have regarded the character and policy of Buonaparte with the most intense abhorrence, and to have watched with eager solicitude for the hour of final retribution. When the news of the battle of Waterloo reached England nothing could exceed his exultation. He considered it "the greatest deliverance that civilized society had experienced since the days of Charles Martel." In honour of the event he kindled bonfires on the summit of Skiddaw, "roasted beef and boiled plum-puddings there," sang "God save the king," fired cannons, and indulged in other manifestations of delight. Before his enthusiasm was sufficed to cool, in the autumn of 1815, he started off to behold the scene of the portentous struggle, taking with him two dear companions.

"So forth I set upon this pilgrimage,
And took the partner of my life with me,
And one dear girl, just ripe enough of age
Retentively to see what I should see;
That thus, with mutual recollections fraught,
We might bring home a store for after thought."

It was about the end of September when they visited the field of Waterloo, and though so short a time had elapsed since the battle, the "fields were cultivated again, and wild flowers were in blossom upon some of the graves." To quote his more elaborate description of the scene is verse:—

"The passing season had not yet effaced
The stamp of numerous hoofs impress'd by force,
Of cavalry whose path might still be traced.
Yet Nature everywhere resumed her course;
Low pansies to the sun their purple gave,
And the soft poppy blossom'd on the grave."¹

In the spring of the following year the poet was overtaken by a severe domestic calamity. His only boy Herbert, "in all respects a child after his father's own heart," and who had given many promising indications of intellectual ability and love of study, was taken from him by the hand of death, in the tenth year of his age. It was long before the fond father recovered from the effects of this blow, and many of his letters indicate the severity of his sufferings. "You more than most men," he writes to his friend Mr. Grosvenor Bedford, "can tell what I have lost, and yet you are far from knowing how large a portion of my hopes and happiness will be laid in the grave with Herbert. For years it has been my daily prayer that I might be spared this affliction. . . . In his desk are the few letters which I had written to him, in the joy of my heart. I will fold up these and send them to you, that they may be preserved when I am gone, in memory of him and of me." As time wore on, he endeavoured by religious meditations and constant occupation to assuage the violence of his sorrow—practising, as he observed, what he had preached in his poem of Roderick:—

(1) Pilgrimage to Waterloo.

"Nature hath assign'd
Two sovereign remedies for human grief;
Religion.—surest, firmest, first, and best;
And strenuous action next."

As soon as he was able to treat the subject with sufficient calmness he commenced the composition of a tributary poem to his boy's memory; but the mournful task was never completed, and the few fragments that remain possess but slight interest.

It was unfortunate for Southey's peace that his connexion with the "Quarterly," and the exigencies of the period converted him into a political writer. As a politician he had an evident tendency to fall into extremes, which arose perhaps from a natural ardour of disposition and warmth of temperament. He was emphatically a "good hater," and a warm partisan. Living in strict seclusion, rarely mixing with the world, and scarcely ever brought into personal contact with a political opponent, his views and opinions were never modified by the notions of convenience and expedience which influence the conduct of more worldly-minded men. On the other hand, the violent tone of the political articles attributed to him in the "Quarterly" will sufficiently account for the rancour of his opponents, especially when we remember that he was regarded by them as a seceder and a renegade. His early professions of republicanism had been too publicly made to be soon forgotten; and whilst party spirit was at its height an opportunity of annoying him occurred, of which his political foes gladly availed themselves. In the spring of 1817, to his great surprise, he found that "Wat Tyler, a poem by Robert Southey," had been advertised as "just published," in the newspapers. The history of this production belongs, perhaps, more properly to an earlier period of his life. It had been thrown off in the summer of 1794, when he was in his twenty-first year, and in the height of his democratic enthusiasm. The MS. was taken to London by his brother-in-law Lovel, who placed it in the hands of a bookseller named Ridgeway then imprisoned in Newgate; but the work was not published at that time. For three-and-twenty years the author had not heard of it, and great therefore was his astonishment and indignation, at seeing it after the lapse of such a period, and after such a complete change had taken place in his opinions, thus unscrupulously given to the world. Of course the publication attracted attention, and called forth many remarks. One of Southey's most persevering opponents drew attention to it in the House of Commons, and quoting from it the following lines, (which we cite as a specimen of its style and matter,) inquired why the author was not prosecuted for sedition:—

“ My brethren, these are truths, and weighty ones:
Ye are all equal; Nature made ye so.
Equality is your birthright; when I gaze
On the proud palace, and behold one man,
In the blood-purpled robes of royalty,
Feasting at ease and lording over millions;
Then turn me to the hut of poverty,
And see the wretched labourer, worn with toil,
Divide his scanty morsel with his infants,
I sicken, and, indignant at the sight,
Blush for the patience of humanity.”

To this attack Mr. Southey replied in a spirited pamphlet, and by the advice of his friends applied to the court of Chancery for an injunction to restrain the sale of the poem. The application, however, was refused by the Lord Chancellor (Eldon) on the ground, “that as the work was calculated to do an injury to society, the author could not reclaim his property in it.”

We pass rapidly on to such other events of Southey's secluded life as appear to us to require notice. The Laureateship continued for many years to be no sinecure. He was still required to furnish occasional odes, and this task-work was the more laborious, as unlike his predecessors, he was unable to satisfy himself with mere repetition and commonplace. The death of George III. in January, 1820, seemed, says his son, to call for some more particular effort on his part than his previous official verses, and the event having been for some time expected, he had planned a poem of altogether novel structure and design.

More than once, it will be remembered, he had attempted to reconcile the English language to the classical metres. His early Sapphics having been received with ridicule are now only remembered from Canning's witty and admirable parody on them in the Anti-Jacobin, but notwithstanding this failure, the poet held firm by his theory, and had frequently indulged the idea of making the experiment on a grand scale. Accordingly, having been for some time closely engaged on the work, in 1821 he produced the Vision of Judgment, in English Hexameter verse, which, notwithstanding the labour it cost him, we must fain pronounce the most objectionable and least meritorious of all his poetical performances. It must always be regretted that he imported the violence of party politics into the most solemn speculations which the human mind can entertain; and making all allowances for warmth of disposition, and the circumstances of the period, it cannot be denied that he laid himself open to grave animadversion. Having made these remarks on the poem itself, we may add that its publication brought him into fierce collision with one of his most celebrated contemporaries. In the preface to his Vision, Southey had gone out of his way (though certainly not without provocation, as the early cantos of Don Juan prove,) to attack Lord Byron, and what he designated the Satanic school of poetry. “The school,” he said, “which they have set up may properly be called the Satanic school, for though their productions breathe the spirit of Belial in their lascivious parts, and the spirit of Moloch in those loathsome images of atrocities and horrors which they delight to represent, they are more especially characterised by a Satanic spirit of pride and audacious impiety, which still betrays the wretched feeling of hopelessness wherewith it is allied.” This strong language extorted from Lord Byron a reply of a virulent personal character, which called forth a rejoinder from Southey in the shape of a letter addressed to the editor of the Courier newspaper, which contained the following among other equally vehement expressions:—“Of the work which I have done it becomes me not here to speak, save only as relates to the Satanic school, and its Coryphæus, the author of Don Juan. I have held up that school to public detestation, as enemies to the religion, the institutions, and the domestic morals of the country. I have given them a designation to which their founder and leader answers. I have sent a stone from my sling which has smitten their Goliath in the forehead. I have fastened his name upon the gibbet for reproach and ignominy, as long as it shall endure. Take it down who can!” Upon the appearance of this letter, Lord Byron despatched a hostile message to his opponent, which was, however, prudently suppressed by the gentleman to whom it was entrusted for delivery; and thus ended the affair.

The productions which during the next few years followed each other in quick succession from Southey's pen, were for the most part in prose, and secured a wider circle of readers than his poetry had done. The Life of Wesley, the History of the Peninsular War, and the Book of the Church,—all of them being more or less tinged with his political and religious views—belong to this period, and were received with rapture and applause by a considerable portion of the public. His prose style—originally formed by a careful study of the best masters—had attained an unusual vigour and polish from the constant practice of composition, and in the trick of writing pleasantly on a given subject he was certainly excelled by no contemporary scribe.

With regard to his personal history at this time, we find few incidents worth narrating. He passed his days amidst his books, (taking, for health's sake an occasional country stroll,) and it was only at intervals, few and far between, that he permitted himself to be drawn from his seclusion. His letters, indeed, are full of interesting information on literary and other topics; but we must content ourselves with very brief extracts from them. During a visit to London in the winter of 1823-24, in a letter to Mrs. Southey, he thus sketches one of the most remarkable men of the period—the celebrated Rowland Hill:—

“Rowland, a fine tall old man, with strong features, very like his portrait, began by reading three verses for his text, stooping to the book in a very peculiar manner. Having done this, he stood up erect and said, ‘Why, the text is a sermon, and a very weighty one too.’ I could not always follow his delivery, the loss of his teeth rendering his words sometimes indistinct, and the more so because his pronunciation is peculiar, generally giving e the sound of ai, like the French. His manner was animated and striking, sometimes impressive and dignified, always remarkable; and so powerful a voice I have rarely or never heard. Sometimes he took off his spectacles, frequently stooped down to read a text, and on these occasions he seemed to double his body, so high did he stand. He told one or two familiar stories, and used some odd expressions, such as—‘A murrain on those who preach that when we are sanctified we do not grow in grace!’ and again, ‘I had almost said that I had rather see the devil in the pulpit than an Antinomian!’ The purport of his sermon was good; nothing fanatical, nothing enthusiastic, and the Calvinism which it expressed was so qualified as to be harmless; the manner that of a performer, as great in his line as Kean or Kemble; and the manner it is which has attracted so large a congregation about him, all of the better order of persons in business.”

At the end of the year 1824, Mr. Gifford retired from the editorship of the Quarterly Review, and it was then placed under the management of Mr. John Taylor Coleridge, (now Mr. Justice Coleridge,) of whose judgment and ability Southey entertained a high opinion. Writing from Keswick in January 1825, he thus counsels the new editor on the conduct of the Review:—

“The Quarterly Review has been overlaid with statistics, as it was once with Greek criticism. It is the disease of the age—the way in which verbose dulness spends itself. The journal wants more of the literæ humaniores, and in a humaner tone than it has been wont to observe. I think a great deal of good may be done by conciliating young writers who are going wrong, by leading them with a friendly hand into the right path, giving them all the praise they deserve, and advising or insinuating rather than reprehending. Keats might have been won in that manner, and perhaps have been saved. So I have been assured. . . . Do not overwork yourself, nor sit up too late, and never continue at any one mental employment after you are tired of it. Take this advice from one who has attained to great self-management in this respect.”

In the summer of 1825 Southey was enabled to carry into execution a design which he had long entertained of paying a visit to Holland. Having reached Leyden, his further progress was for some time delayed by a troublesome wound in his foot, which proved to be one of those disagreeable occurrences that he could hardly regret, as it introduced him to the household of an amiable and accomplished man of letters whom he ever afterwards held in high esteem,—by name Bilderdijk. Some time before, Southey had received a Dutch translation of his poem of Roderick, from the pen of Madam Bilderdijk, accompanied by a Latin letter from her husband, and he had visited Leyden principally for the purpose of seeing them. Upon his arrival, finding that he was an invalid, they insisted on his taking up his abode with them. He availed himself of the offer, and remained under their hospitable roof three weeks, treated with marked attention, and becoming every day more attached to them. So great was the impression which their kindness made upon him, that the next year, as he could not prevail on them to visit him at Keswick, he undertook another journey to Leyden. In communicating this intention to his friend Dr. Jebb, (Bishop of Limerick,) in April 1826, he thus speaks of the attention he had received in Bilderdijk's house. “Here I was nursed,” he writes, “as if I had been their brother; and thither, as they cannot come and visit me, I am going to see them once more. Were Leyden ten times as distant as it is, I would take the journey, for the pleasure which I shall give and receive. I knew him only by letter till I was cast upon their compassion. But Bilderdijk is one of those men whose openness of heart you perceive at first sight; and when I came to know them both, if I had sought the world over, it would not have been possible for me to have found two persons with whom I should have felt myself more entirely in unison; except indeed that my host stands up, like a true Hollander of the old stamp, for the Synod of Dort.” Bilderdijk was at this time upwards of seventy years of age, and of weakly constitution. His only means of subsistence was a pension of about 140*l.* a-year, and his wife, a woman of great talent, was twenty-four years his junior. They had one son,—a poor sickly boy of twelve,—but a happier family, according to the Laureate's testimony, the world never saw.

During his second absence in Holland a curious circumstance took place, which might have had an important influence on Southey's fortunes. As he passed through Brussels, on his return home, he learnt that he had been put in nomination, and elected a Member of Parliament for the borough of Downton in Wiltshire. The strange occurrence was partially explained by the following note, which he found awaiting him in London, and which was afterwards discovered to have been written by Lord Radnor:—

“A zealous admirer of the British Constitution in Church and State, being generally pleased with Mr. Southey's ‘Book of the Church,’ and professing himself quite delighted with the summary on the last page of that work, and entertaining no doubt that the writer of that page really felt what he wrote, and, consequently, would be ready, if he had an opportunity, to support the sentiments there set forth, has therefore been anxious that Mr. Southey should have a seat in the ensuing Parliament; and having a little interest, has so managed that he is at this moment in possession of that seat under this single injunction:—Ut sustineat firmiter, strenue et continuo, quæ ipse bene docuit esse sustinenda.”

This unexpected honour Southey had the good sense to decline, being well aware that it was a position for which his habits and feelings entirely unfitted him; and to this resolution he firmly adhered, though his friends seriously proposed to purchase a qualification for him, in the shape of an estate of 300*l.* a-year.

As we approach the concluding years of Southey's life, we cannot refrain from quoting, as a proper introduction, the following summary of his personal character by his friend Mr. Henry Taylor, the accomplished author of "Philip van Artevelde:"—

"His sixty summers—what are they in truth?
By Providence peculiarly blest,
With him the strong hilarity of youth
Abides, despite grey hairs, a constant guest.
His sun has veer'd a point towards the west,
But light as dawn his heart is glowing yet,—
That heart the simplest, gentlest, kindest, best,
Where truth and manly tenderness are met With faith and heavenward hope, the suns that never set."

His industry at this period, we may remark, was most exemplary. All his life long he had leaned on literature as his main support; but in the autumn of his days his assiduity was greater even than in their spring-time and summer. Although "his whole pleasure and happiness was centred in his home,"—notwithstanding his thoroughly domestic habits—"his family," observes the Rev. Mr. Southey, "necessarily saw but little of him. He could not, however he might wish it, join the summer evening walk, or make one of the circle round the winter hearth, or even spare time for conversation after the family meals. . . . Every day, every hour had its allotted employment; always were there engagements to publishers imperatively requiring punctual fulfilment; always the current expenses of a large household to take anxious thought for: he had no crops growing while he was idle. 'My ways,' he used to say, 'are as broad as the king's highroad, and my means lie in an inkstand.'" It is pleasant to know that he went about his daily tasks in a cheerful and unrepining mood, and that he regarded a life of toil as a fair payment for the many blessings by which he was surrounded. His library, which consisted at his death of something like 14,000 volumes, contained nearly all the works which he required in the course of his varied reading, and it was especially rich in Spanish and Portuguese books and MSS. The room which he constantly occupied was filled with his handsomest and most precious volumes, "arranged," says his son, "with much taste, according to his own fashion, with due regard to size, colour, and condition; and he used to contemplate these, his carefully accumulated and much prized treasures, with even more pleasure and pride than the greatest connoisseur his finest specimens of the old masters: and justly, for they were both the necessaries and luxuries of life to him; both the very instruments whereby he won, hardly enough, his daily bread, and the source of all his pleasures and recreations—the pride of his eyes and the joy of his heart."

We will not attempt to touch on the various topics embraced by his correspondence in these later years. It is enough to say that some of his letters to his intimate friends display his usual playfulness and buoyancy of disposition; whilst others abound with shrewd remarks on the politics and literature of the period. As a specimen of his later epistolary style, we are tempted to find space for the following sketch of Barry the painter, from a letter addressed to Allan Cunningham, who was then engaged on his "Lives of the Painters," for Murray's Family Library:—

"I know Barry, and have been admitted into his den in his worst (that is to say, in his maddest) days, when he was employed upon his Pandora. He wore at that time an old coat of green baize, but from which time had taken all the green that incrustations of paint and dirt had not covered. His wig was one which you might suppose he had borrowed from a scarecrow; all round it there projected a fringe of his own grey hair. He lived alone, in a house which was never cleaned; and he slept on a bedstead with no other furniture than a blanket nailed on the one side. I wanted him to visit me. 'No,' he said, 'he would not go out by day, because he could not spare time from his great picture; and if he went out in the evening the Academicians would waylay him and murder him.' In this solitary, sullen life he continued till he fell ill, very probably for want of food sufficiently nourishing; and after lying two or three days under his blanket, he had just strength enough left to crawl to his own door, open it, and lay himself down with a paper in his hand, on which he had written his wish to be carried to the house of Mr. Carlisle (Sir Anthony) in Soho Square. There he was taken care of; and the danger from which he had thus escaped seems to have cured his mental hallucinations. He cast his slough afterwards; appeared decently dressed and in his own grey hair, and mixed in such society as he liked. I should have told you that, a little before his illness, he had with much persuasion been induced to pass a night at some person's house in the country. When he came down to breakfast the next morning, and was asked how he had rested, he said, remarkably well; he had not slept in sheets for many years, and really he thought it was a very comfortable thing."

During a visit to London in the autumn of 1830, tempted partly by the stirring nature of the times, Southey mixed more in general society than he had been accustomed to do on similar occasions, and was introduced to many distinguished personages. Amongst other engagements he dined with the Duchess of Kent, and was much gratified, says his son, "by her bringing forward the Princess Victoria, then eleven years of age, to tell him she had lately read with pleasure his 'Life of Nelson.'" Political friends and political opponents whom he had never seen flocked around him, and hastened to do him honour. "The Duke of Wellington," he says, in one of his letters, "sent me a card; but I could not accept the invitation. But the oddest thing that befel me was that as I rose from my knee at the levée, my hand was unexpectedly caught hold of and shaken by Lord Brougham." With the latter learned lord, who was then Lord Chancellor, he had afterwards some interesting correspondence on the expediency of extending a more liberal government patronage to the profession of literature.

Before we draw this biography to a conclusion, a few words may be said respecting the last great work, and certainly not the least celebrated, which proceeded from Southey's pen: we allude to "The Doctor." This production formed at once the chief recreation and employment of his declining years, and was intended as a receptacle for all the "odd knowledge and playful fancies" which he had been unable to embody in any of his former works. The first two volumes were published anonymously in 1834, and although the secret was known to a few of his most intimate friends, Southey took great pains to conceal it even from the members of his own family; and in order that his well-known handwriting (which, by the way, was neatness and elegance itself) might not be detected by the printers, the manuscript was copied by a friend's hand before it went to press.

The poet was enjoying the surprise created by the appearance of this strange book, and smiling at the comments of his friends, when he was stunned by the occurrence of a domestic calamity which summoned up all his fortitude. His faithful partner, who, in his own words, had been for forty years the life of his life, was separated from him by a visitation worse than death itself, and his happy home was rendered desolate.

How acutely he felt this calamity, we need not say. For many months he laboured under the deepest despondency. His mind was unstrung; he was "shaken to the root," and knowing that his income mainly depended on his own exertions, he became seriously anxious about the future. At this juncture, he received by the post one morning an official letter from Sir Robert Peel, who was then Prime Minister, offering him a baronetcy, as a reward for his literary exertions, accompanied by a private epistle from the same distinguished minister, enjoining him to state unreservedly whether there was anything that could be done for him by the Government which would be serviceable or acceptable to him. In reply to this communication, Southey made a frank statement of his circumstances and prospects. He drew attention to the only certain sources of income which he possessed, and to the provision which he had made for his family by means of life-assurances. He stated—and truly stated—that the main dependence of his family had been, and must still continue to be, on his daily industry. As a literary man he had been hitherto not unsuccessful. "But the confidence I used to feel in myself," he went on to say, "is now failing. I was young, in health and heart, on my last birthday, when I completed my sixtieth year. Since then I have been shaken to the root. It has pleased God to visit me with the severest of all domestic afflictions, those alone excepted into which sin enters. My wife, a true helpmate as ever man was blest with, lost her senses a few months ago. She is now in a lunatic asylum; and broken sleep and anxious thoughts, from which there is no escape in the night season, have made me feel how more than possible it is that a sudden stroke may deprive me of those faculties by the exercise of which this poor family has been hitherto supported." The baronetcy he, of course, entirely declined.

About three months afterwards, Southey received another letter from Sir Robert, in which he informed him that he had had the gratification of attaching his name to a warrant which would add 300*l.* per annum to the amount of his existing pension. This munificent act was rendered still more graceful and more pleasing to the poet's feelings by the concluding words of the letter which communicated the welcome intelligence.

"I trust you can have no difficulty," wrote the premier, (whose kindness to men of letters must be numbered amongst the many virtues for which he is held in honour,) "in sanctioning what I have done with your consent, as I have acted on your suggestion, and granted the pension on a public principle—the recognition of literary and scientific eminence as a public claim. The other persons to whom I have addressed myself on the subject are—Professor Airy of Cambridge, the first of living mathematicians and astronomers,—the first of this country, at least,—Mrs. Somerville, Sharon Turner, and James Montgomery of Sheffield."

After three years of mental alienation, Mrs. Southey breathed her last in December 1837. In the following summer, to recruit his health and spirits, a short tour on the Continent was proposed to the bereaved husband; and in the company of several friends he made an excursion through some of the most interesting parts of the north of France. Only one more event of his life remains to be noticed. On the 5th of June, 1839, he was married to Miss Bowles, a lady of some literary celebrity. His reasons for taking this step are thus detailed in a letter to his friend Walter Savage Landor. "I have now," he writes, in March, 1839, "only one daughter left, and my son divides the year between college and home. . . . Reduced in number as my family has been within the last few years, my spirits would hardly recover their habitual and healthy cheerfulness, if I had not prevailed upon Miss Bowles to share my lot for the remainder of our lives. There is just such a disparity of age as is fitting; we have been well acquainted with each other more than twenty years, and a more perfect conformity of disposition could not exist; so that, in resolving upon what must be either the weakest or the wisest act of a sexagenarian's life, I am well assured that, according to human foresight, I have judged well and acted wisely, both for myself and my remaining daughter."

From this period, however, his faculties failed him, or at any rate, their vigour and activity no longer remained. A few melancholy signs of his approaching disorder had long excited the apprehensions of his friends. A loss of memory, "a confusion of time, place, and person, the losing his way in well-known places," were too faithful indications of the sad blank which was doomed to follow. He sank at last into a hopeless mental lethargy, which is thus described by his son and biographer. "In the earlier stages of his disorder, (if the term may be fitly applied to a case which was not a perversion of the faculties, but their decay,) he could still converse at times with much of his old liveliness and energy. When the mind was, as it were, set going upon some familiar subject, for a little time you could not perceive much failure; but if the thread was broken, if it was a conversation in which new topics were started, or if any argument was commenced, his powers failed him at once, and a painful sense of this seemed to come over him for the moment. His recollection first failed as to recent events, and his thoughts appeared chiefly to dwell upon those long past, and as his mind grew weaker, these recollections seemed to recede still further back. Names he could rarely remember, and more than once, when trying to recall one which he felt he ought to know, I have seen him press his hand upon his brow, while he sadly exclaimed,—'Memory! memory! where art thou gone?'"

Such is the gloomy picture presented by his son of Southey's last days. At length, on the 21st of March 1843, a brief attack of fever ended his mortal career. He was buried in Crosthwaite churchyard; Mr. Wordsworth being the only intimate friend who, besides the members of his own family, followed his remains to their last resting-place.

BUSH WEDDINGS AND WOOINGS,

BY MRS. TRAILL.

Author of "Letters from the Backwoods of Canada, by the wife of a British Officer."

I REMEMBER being greatly amused by the description of a remarkably juvenile wedding among the Yankees, which was sent me by my friend M. — some years ago, shortly after her emigration to Canada; the parties alluded to being mere boys and girls, of thirteen and fifteen, who took into their wise heads to show their special love of independence, by marrying and setting up for themselves. But in our portion of the province the picture is often reversed; affairs matrimonial frequently wear a different aspect; many of our Bush marriages being more remarkable for the antiquity of the bride and bridegroom than their juvenility.

It is no unusual thing to see venerable grey-beards or ancient grandsires, without a tooth in their heads, hobbling to church, not as might be supposed, to bestow their countenance and advice upon their blooming descendants on such an occasion, but on their own accounts, and, I am concerned to say, I cannot bear high testimony to the disinterested motives that govern many of these unions.

If a woman happens to be left in a state of widowhood, with a few acres of land cleared and cropped, a yoke of oxen, two or three cows, a little poultry, and a fat hog in the sty, there is sure to be a general race among the widowers, with or without families, and needy bachelors, for her hand and worldly possessions.

Great and assiduous is the court paid to the owner of these same goods and chattels; be she ever so old or so ugly, it matters not a rush. The most vixenish old scold that ever tormented a worthy, meek-spirited spouse to death, will be sure to receive plenty of offers of marriage. The more important her worldly goods, the more numerous and importunate her suitors; every cow, or pig, or sheep, outbalances some notorious flaw in her temper, age, or reputation.

It is in fact the age and disposition of her yoke of oxen, the size and beauty of her swine, not her own size or beauty; the good character of her cows, not her own fair name, that is the matter under consideration. I heard of one old lady who received four offers in one week, on the reputation of a fine thrifty sow of a particular good breed; but, however gratified they may be by the flattering preference shown to their antiquated charms, they in their turns are apt to become cautious, and those who bid up the highest are sure to carry the day, unless the old fool should take it in her head to give the preference to some among her younger wooers, and take to herself a youthful spouse to tyrannize over her for the remainder of her days.

One buxom widow that I knew actually feigned to forget how many months she had been wearing her weeds for her poor dear husband; she could not tell whether she had been a widow six months or four, but she thought it must be six. It was barely four; but then her new suitor was so urgent to make sure of her hand against a host of rivals, and he was young and strong, and she thought would carry on the labour of the farm for her and her two children so nicely, without any trouble on her part, that she married forthwith. Like many such speculations, hers proved a failure; and she only secured to herself a lazy, selfish tyrant, who came like a locust to devour the produce of her land, and lay his clutches upon her little property to the disadvantage of her children. This, however, he finds he cannot do. The law not allowing the children's property (and female children inherit on equal terms when the father dies intestate) to be alienated from them by a second marriage, nor can it be shared by the children of the widow by another husband. Small harmony, as you may imagine, exists between such a couple, and as a house divided against itself cannot stand, this most amiable husband contemplates leaving his wife to scratch for her two chickens as she best can, and returning from whence he came.

I was once the unintentional witness to two weddings on the same day. It chanced that I was spending the morning at the house of the clergyman of —, when two parties of young people came to be married, accompanied by their parents and friends.

The marriage ceremony took place in the sitting-room where the family were assembled. I knew something of the first couple that were introduced. The bride was a good-humoured, ignorant Wiltshire lass of seventeen, adorned with blushes and grins, and a neat cotton gown and black bonnet lined with pink. By some unaccountable stupidity the young woman was placed next to her own brother, a tall sheepish lout of eighteen, while the bridegroom stood on the opposite side of the room, lost amongst a throng of old people and bridesmaids, where he stood twirling his hat and looking as if he was marvelling what he came there for. This arrangement had the effect of producing some ridiculous confusion. The clergyman, mistaking the bridesman for the bonny bridegroom, proceeded with great solemnity to exhort the young people on their duties, and by-and-by to scold the aforesaid lout for his backwardness in making the proper responses; matters had gone as far as that most important question "Wilt thou take this woman," &c., when the embarrassment of the parties increased to a ludicrous degree. Nancy cast an imploring look at her lover, but finding the minister was growing positive, and convinced by this time that all was not right, she began to blush deeper than ever, and at last stammered out,

"Bless ye, zur, but that an't he that should be married to L. That's brother!"

Having said this, she danced across the room, and, pulling her discomfited spouse cleft by the sleeve, shoved him into the place her brother occupied, and stuck herself by his side, with an air of self-satisfaction at her own management that caused even the grave features of the matron of the house to relax into a smile, and brought my risible muscles into play more decidedly than strict decorum warranted. I had, in truth, much ado not to laugh outright;—I only needed, I assure you, one glance from your own mischievous black eye to have set me off—the scene was so truly comical; for the clergyman, who was a little deaf at times, grew confused, and could not at first comprehend where the mistake lay. And then the poor brother of the bride looked so rueful at being nearly forced into a marriage with his own sister, and cast such sheepish looks at a tall, gawky lass opposite to him, dizened out in a fine green-striped gauze frock, (some second-hand piece of ball finery,) with flounces innumerable, a dirty splashed dimity petticoat, short enough to display thick homespun worsted stockings, and clouted shoes, inch thick with mud.

"Why did you not place the bridegroom next your daughter?" said Mr. —, rather sternly, to the bride's father.

"Lawk, zur! vy, it's zuch a toime zince voife and I ztood up together afore the parzon to be married, that I wholly vorgot all about un," said the old man "but I promise your vurzhip I'll remember better next toime."

Methought his old dame looked a little sour at this declaration of her simple spouse, though, I am sure, he meant no offence to his worthy partner.

So ended the first wedding; and, as soon as they had departed, in came the second couple. They were not quite such a set of nimmies as the former party; but the bride looked sad, and the groom grave; and they were united without a gleam of the sunshine of true love glancing over their faces. I felt melancholy as I contemplated the sorrowful faces of the bride and the mother who stood near her; and argued but little for her happiness, when I saw the air of indifference with which the husband left his newly-made wife to tread her way through the deep miry streets alone; while he stalked on at a quick pace before her, apparently unmindful of her, for he never once turned his head to see how she made her way along the wet rough road.

I remember, a few months before my own marriage, I found a wedding-ring lying on the threshold of the church porch at Waltham Abbey. I tried, without effect, to discover the owner of the lost ring;—the curate could throw no light on the mystery,—the clerk of the parish only answered, with a facetious wink and nod,—“Oh! well, Miss, I suppose it is a sign you won't be long without a ring on your finger. You may say, you are already provided for;” and he cast a sly glance towards the curate as he spoke, who chanced to be a single man, and one of the beaux of the place, and who, I dare say, was as much annoyed as myself at this witticism of the clerk's. The sexton, with a grave shake of his head, on being shown the ring, observed,—“She was a careless wife that dropped that ring; depend upon it, her husband will have little good of her.”

The history of the lost ring haunted my imagination for a long time. I often wondered if it had been dropped accidentally by some faithful wife, who would long deplore its loss, and vainly seek it. Or had it been cast away in high disdain by some indignant and heart-wounded bride? I could suppose a high-spirited young woman treated in the contemptuous manner of the bride whose nuptials I witnessed, tearing the fetter from her finger, and casting it from her in bitterness of spirit.

There is an evil that is not of unfrequent occurrence in this country, and is a source of much domestic infelicity, besides having a demoralizing tendency. It is this: Many men coming to the colony, having previously deserted their wives, or been deserted by them, pass themselves off for unmarried persons; and, after having induced some unconscious or thoughtless girl to marry them, forsake their victim, on the plea of illegality in the marriage. I have met with instances in which the young women, with blind infatuation, refused to listen to the warning of friends, and have shut their eyes to proofs of the most startling nature; and there are not wanting instances of clandestine marriages where you would least expect to hear of such romantic proceedings—among the humbler class of settlers.

It is not very long ago since a farmer in a neighbouring township, early one morning, saw at his door a steed waiting with a side-saddle, and found to his utter astonishment it was to convey away his eldest daughter,—his housekeeper and handmaid, for he was a widower. The bride was all dressed for a start, when her angry sire intercepted her on her way to her lover. The bonny bridegroom contrived, however, to mollify the resentment of the old man, and he even accompanied them to church, and gave away the bride. So, in this instance, the course of true love did run smooth; but it is a solitary instance, for I could record several runaway matches where the wrath of the parents was scarcely less than that of the father of fair Ellen, the lost bride of Netherby, in Scott's ballad.

Our young people generally marry on pretty equal terms. The lass brings for her tocher cows or sheep, and often a portion of wild land, or the prospect of it. The husband has generally a lot of land, say a hundred acres, a log house or a good roomy shanty, a yoke of oxen with which to work the land; and if he be active and sober, the axe soon hews them out a strait path in the world; and the wife clothes her young family, her husband and herself, in warm and comfortable homespun garments, dyed by her own hands, and often the web is woven in the house, or at a neighbour's. The loom is frequently seen in the dwellings of the emigrant, many of whom had followed the craft of weavers in the old country. I have had female servants in my house who could card and weave both. As to knitting, it is an accomplishment learned by all classes; here our ladies think it no disgrace to bring their balls of yarn, and ply their fingers while they chat away. For my own part, I envy and admire their skill and usefulness, whilst I find myself too stupid to imitate their good example. I fancy I could sooner learn to spin than shape a stocking.

No wonder the old-established families of the middling class thrive and become prosperous. The Canadian housewife turns every thing to account. They so contrive to gather up all fragments that nothing be lost: even the snips and shreds of worn-out garments are not wasted, but are cut in strips about an inch wide and sewed together. If white, these rags are dyed with arnotto, Spanish brown, butternut bark, the bark of the oak, or with indigo, and many other dyes of native vegetables and earths. These are then wound up in large balls and sent to the loom, where they are manufactured into very decent carpeting. I have seen them in bedrooms, and even parlours, where they looked very neat and even gay; besides these economical coverings for the floors, the settlers' wives sometimes spin a coarse sort of yarn, which is dyed grey, or some sober colour, and is then woven into very respectable carpeting, which resembles a coarse drugget, and looks quite as well. They also have bed-covers made of the same material, but it is more gaily coloured, and woven in patterns.

The inferior wool is pulled and washed clean, and made up into thick warm quilts, one of which, containing from five to six pounds of wool, will be equal in warmth and comfort to two pairs of blankets. The winter sheets are often composed of a mixture of flax, thread, and wool, such as is usually worn by the men as shirts, and the women as petticoats, or dyed for outer garments. When intended to be worn as gowns, the wool is either dyed blue, grey, brown, or red, or woven in stripes or checks. Sometimes you see them made of the native grey of the sheep, which, when mixed with white, and striped, looks very well, and never changes its colour.

The country flannel sells from three to four shillings a yard. It is full a yard wide; the frilled cloth is half the width, but, being much finer and thicker, is nearly double the price. Sheep are the greatest source of comfort the settler can possess. Let him get the length of keeping a small flock, and he will never need to go to the store for comfortable and decent clothing for his family. Besides the wool, he can have fresh meat and plenty of candles; a luxury which those who cannot kill sheep or beef must either forego, or pay at the enormous rate of a shilling a pound for candles half made of lard: if he buys the tallow, he must give sevenpence and eightpence per pound for it, and then be at the trouble of making them at home. This last, however, is the cheapest plan, and I would recommend it as most economical to the housewife.

The resinous knots of the pine and hemlock are often the only light the poorest settlers have to do their evening work by; a good store of these laid by for winter use is no bad thing. I have often been glad to avail myself of this substitute for candles; in the parlour and in the kitchen no other light is used excepting on particular occasions. This is one of the many expedients which necessity and want of money teaches the emigrant to adopt.

Many indeed are the useful acquirements of the settler's wife in this country. The young women are brought up in the practice of every kind of domestic thriftiness; they make the soap soft and hard; the candles, the sugar; they spin, they knit, they card the wool, they dress the flax, they dye the yarn and thread—to say nothing of the usual feminine accomplishments of pickling, preserving, making butter and cheese. They are their own mantua-makers, and their husbands' tailors; while the men by turns follow the various crafts of weaver, shoemaker, boat-builder, and carpenter; in short, they can generally turn their hands to any thing that necessity requires them to make or mind, besides the ordinary occupation of the farmer.

With such habits of industry, no wonder if our young couples set poverty at defiance, and become independent in every sense of the word, and after a few years of honest struggles and toil acquire those substantial comforts that are less frequently to be seen in the dwellings of those of the higher order of emigrants,—I mean, families of the well-educated but poor gentlemen.

I have told of the weddings and woolings of some of the lower class among us, but you must not take them as general pictures, but only as individual portraits. As to the young people of the better sort, they usually marry and are given in marriage at a much earlier period than is customary at home, from sixteen to twenty being the common age for our young ladies to be wooed and won. I must confess I am rather an advocate for early marriages, while the young heart's affections are warm and untainted by interested motives; while they are yet unspotted by the world, or corrupted by the worldly and mercenary spirit that now walks this fair earth amidst the haunts of fashion and wealth. There is a spring and elasticity in the youthful mind that leads it to conform to circumstances, however adverse they may be, which enables the young wife and mother to struggle more cheerfully against trials which would break the spirit of those more advanced in age. Her hope is more lively, she looks forward to those years to come when the trouble and sorrow of youth shall have disappeared or been overcome, and she does not despond. The bright light of youth and health and joy gilds the edges of the dark cloud that hovers over her; she hopes to emerge from its obscurity like the moon walking in light in the clouded sky.

Whatever may be the arguments used by the wise and prudent against early marriages in Britain, I uphold them as wise and prudent measures in British America; and so, wishing the single married and the married happy, I close my chapter on Weddings in the Backwoods.

A TRANSATLANTIC OPINION OF THOMAS CARLYLE.

(ENDORSED BY MANY ON THIS SIDE THE WATER.)

THE chief defect of Thomas Carlyle is his lack of practicality when writing on practical subjects. In a world constructed on different principles he might be a very available man; but the planet Earth has been set spinning in space, subject to certain conditions on the part of its mixed population, which, upon the whole, merely for the sake of existence, it is as well, perhaps, to obey. In fact, under obedience to the great laws of the universe, there is considerable social trimming and shifting of position to be done before the complicated mechanism of society can move at all. Pure autocratic humanity is at the mercy of inferior powers. We live dependent upon our own weaknesses or infirmities, and upon the weaknesses or infirmities of others. We are sophisticated; and to accomplish any good in the world we must remember this, else we are apt to dwell in abstractions, to be mere isolated speculators upon human affairs, arrogating some diviner intelligence than the working men around us; while thinking we are gods, accomplishing ourselves in the purest vices of devils, unmitigated selfishness. The moralist separating himself from the problems of active life, with their relative conditions, becomes simply a grumbler. In this world we must do the best we can, and take what we can get; for the greatest misery is to do nothing, and to receive something is essential to life. The common sense of mankind has bestowed a vulgar epithet upon the philosophers whose chief occupation is railing at the world, even from the steps of the temple. They are Croakers, Scolds; and at common law, which supposed them to be confined to the feminine gender, when they became insupportable in old English villages, they were liable to an ignominious ducking in a horse pond. You do not alter the character by changing the gender, or giving it the use of type or the freedom of the London Press. The more conspicuous the stage the greater the nuisance. We can only see a difference in degree between the virago who annoys a village, or the self-styled philosopher who bores the world with his fault-finding: if the one should be dipped in a puddle, the other should be drowned in the Atlantic.

Now Carlyle, a Scotchman, of very proud and lofty instincts, undoubtedly, is not exempt from a certain resemblance to the communis rixatrix of Blackstone. He is for ever huffing and snarling at the world, quarrelling with everything but his bread and butter. The politics of the world are all wrong; the kings are wrong; the democrats are wrong; civilization is all on the wrong track,—its manufactures, railways, its thousand means; the Church is all wrong,—a mere shabby priestcraft, a system of fraud and delusion.

Now it is very easy to get one's opinions unsettled upon any of the positive institutions of the world, and we are willing to admit the constant law of change which governs them, but, for the time being, they are our homes and shelter; and a wise man, we think, will accomplish his reforms through them, not waste his efforts in unprofitably railing against them.

Take the representative system in politics, to which the world is universally tending in some democratic form: it calls for the wisest counsel, the best head, and the purest aims to guide it. It is worse than idle at this time to prate of the superiority of a strong usurpation of a kingcraft, or talk of a theocracy. Undoubtedly, you may find virtues in the latter systems, and evils in the existing ones, and you may ring the changes to the end of time. As there is a vice of too much confidence in forms, there is equal evil in a contempt for them. It is a grand defect of the railer in snatching after some imaginary good to lose the benefit in his way. So Carlyle attacks the Church of England as an undisguised mass of insincerity, though he cannot discover a real evil which is not denounced by its liturgy and pulpits daily. The difference between the two is that the Church is a uniform, steady, both conservative and reforming institution, striking at the roots of abuses as they arise, constantly invigorating society, involving the truest and purest system of ethics, and the highest culture of the individual, while the new philosophers who affect to see the world from a loftier point of view, are driven about in a sea of uncertainty, without guide or landmark, save their individual will. If it rested with these various opponents of Christianity, how long should we see marriage preserved, or the Family, or the State, or a Church? What would be the state of the world under their government or no government of individual intuitions?

In writing this we are by no means desirous of undervaluing the force and literary ability of Carlyle's style, or even of his pungent and frequently well-applied satire; but we would warn our readers against the direct destructive tendencies of his writings. That he is not an ordinary vulgar destructive matters little; or that he has certain far-fetched substitutes, in his own mind, for he gives us nothing definite in his writings, to propose for what he would destroy; he may be on that account the more dangerous. He deals with truths to be sure, but truths are keen edged weapons, which may wound the handler; and the most treacherous falsity, perhaps, is a misapplied truth.

To reproduce the lyrics of Beranger in English verse, is a hard task; as hard as the translation of the "Pickwick Papers" into French prose, or Burns's Songs or Elliott's Corn Law Rhymes into French poetry. It is a difficult matter for any one who has not been born and bred under the same sunshine with the author of the "Roi d'Yvetôt" and "Le Violon Brisé," by any process so thoroughly to acclimate himself to his peculiarities of style and felicitous idioms of expression, as to understand their full sense and spirit, much more to clothe them in a foreign dress. It is as hard a matter to make English verse of his songs as it would be to make an Englishman of Beranger himself, that Poet of Grisettes, of La Grande Nation, of French Democracy and Parisian gaiety, folly and love au Sixième. Classic authors of almost any country, who indulge in an elaborate style, and write for posterity and academic honours, for aught that appears to the contrary in their works, might easily be translated, physically and bodily, as well as in their writings, into foreign parts, without doing much violence to their habits of thought or nationality of association. But Beranger out of France,—away from the vineyards and the vintage—from the tri-colour—from the village filles of Passy and Tours—from the bachelor convivialities of Paris—would be Beranger no longer. His nationality and his individuality are the life of his poetry and his poetic fame. At home he is universally known; abroad, hardly at all; nor can his genius be properly estimated from the point of view which our standards of criticism adopt in judging of the merits of works of poetic art.

In fact, there was hardly ever an author whose literary eminence has been so entirely owing to his popularity, in the strictest sense of that much abused term, as Beranger. Without a liberal education, without literary connexions, or any profound study or appreciation, apparently, of the resources of poetry, his natural wit, his lively perceptions of the ludicrous, his strong sympathies with humanity, as such, irrespective of caste or class, and his vivid imagination, have infused into his lyrics the truest poetic spirit, and made them genuine, powerful productions of genius. Their appeal is not to the judgment of critics, but to the sensibilities of every man who reads them. This is a test to which few poets would choose to bring their works; but with Beranger it has been the only test to which he has cared to bring his. He sings to amuse himself, to entertain the public, to please the people; and, strange to say, he succeeds not only in amusing himself, but also in entertaining the public, and pleasing everybody. To object to his morals, or rather his want of them—to criticise his style, or rather his neglect of style—to lament that he should have wasted his life in writing so much that is witty, and so little that is wise—all this makes him none the less the most popular song-writer of the present age.

In spite of his popularity at home, all the greater since the last Revolution, which the whole political tendency of his writings helped to bring on, Beranger has been but little studied or appreciated out of France. One principal reason has been the extreme difficulty, already adverted to, of adapting inflexible English to the necessities of his peculiar and very independent style, which generally derives half its point and beauty from the use of happy expressions in the vernacular, which it is almost impossible to render effectively in a foreign tongue. The few translators who have ventured on the work hitherto, have succeeded very imperfectly, and none have attempted more than partial selections. We remember but three volumes of such translations:—one by William Anderson, published in Edinburgh; one from the press of Pickering, by the "Author of the Exile of Idria," a poem which never took refuge, to our knowledge, in this country; and another, a Philadelphia collection, issued in a neat volume, in 1844, by Carey and Hart.

In point of fullness and faithfulness the present translations by Mr Young far surpass the previous attempts. He has laboured evidently to reproduce Beranger as he really is; and to present the poems which have made him famous, as nearly as possible, as they really are. The work shows much diligence, discrimination, and poetic power. It is uniformly careful in execution, and in the main very successful. By way of comparison with its predecessors, take that charming song, "Ma Vocation," which opens with this simple, compact, and touching stanza:—

"Jeté sur cette boule,
Laid, chétif et souffrant;
Etouffé dans la foule,
Faute d'être assez grand;
Une plainte touchante
De ma bouche sortit,
Le bon Dieu me dit: 'Chante, Chante, pauvre petit!'"

This the author of the "Exile of Idria" expands into English verse as follows:—

"Squalid, faint, and suffering, hurl'd
Up and down this wheeling world,
Crush'd amongst the crowd of men,
Myself too weak to press again;

(1) "Beranger: Two Hundred of his Lyrical Poems done into English Verse." By William Young. New York: Putnam. 1850.

*I breathed a deep and bitter sigh,
That spoke my spirit's misery :
Some God that heard, suggested, 'Sing,
And Song shall consolation bring.'*

The Philadelphia translator goes beyond this, and undertakes to make a real lyrical affair of it, e. g. :—

"Cast on this ball, despised, oppress,
No giant at the very best,
I'm stifled by the throng ;
Whilst in distress for aid I cry
*A voice within me bids me try
The powers of Lyric song ;
Yes ! 'tis a voice that sweetly cries,
Rise, hapless Beranger, arise,
And strike the lyre !*"

Mr. Young catches the true spirit of this simple ode for the first time amongst these translators of Beranger :—

"Plain, sorry, and sickly Adrift on this ball,
Trodden down by the masses
Because I'm so small ;
To my lips when a murmur
Will touchingly spring,
God whispers me kindly,
'Sing, little one, sing !'"

A few selections from the volume will give the better idea both of the spirit of Beranger and the style of the translations. The following version of the "Roi D' Yvetôt," one of the most famous of all the poet's productions, in which, under a lively ballad, a satire upon the extravagant magnificence and expense of the imperial court is indulged in, is well done :—

"LE ROI D'YVETÔT.

"There was a King of Yvetôt once,
But little known in story ;
To bed betimes, and rising late,
Sound sleeper without glory :
With cotton night-cap, too, instead
Of crown, would Jenny deck his head—
"Tis said,
Rat tat, rat tat, rat tat, rat tat,
Oh, what a good little king was that !
Rat tat.

"Snug in his palace thatch'd with straw,
He eat four meals a day ;
And on a donkey, through his realm,
Took leisurely his way,
Frank, joyous, from suspicion free,
One dog alone his guard to be,
Had he.
Rat tat, rat tat, rat tat, rat tat,
Oh, what a good little king was that !
Rat tat.

"One single onerous taste was his—
A somewhat lively thirst ;
But the king who heeds his subjects' good,
Must heed his own the first.
A tax at table to allot,
Direct from every cask he got
One pot,
Rat tat, rat tat, rat tat, rat tat,
Oh, what a good little king was that !
Rat tat.

"Since maidens of good family
With love he could inspire,
His subjects had a hundredfold
Good cause to call him sire.

Four times a year the roll was beat ;
His men at targets to compete,
Would meet
Rat tat, rat tat, rat tat, rat tat,
Oh, what a good little king was that !
Rat tat.

"He sought not to enlarge his states,
To neighbours kindness show'd,
And, model for all potentates,
Took pleasure for his code.
Thus had his people shed no tear -
Till, dying, they in grief drew near His bier.
Rat tat, rat tat, rat tat, rat tat,
Oh, what a good little king was that !
Rat tat.

"And still of that right worthy prince,
Oft is the portrait shown,
The sign of a famous drinking house,
Through all the province known,
And many a fête-day crowds will bring
To tipple there before the 'The King,'
And sing
Rat tat, rat tat, rat tat, rat tat,
Oh, what a good little king was that !
Rat tat."

In a different strain, and with an equal spirit of sympathy with the masses, Beranger often sang the glories of the Empire, the great qualities of Napoleon, and the souvenirs of his splendid career. As a contrast to the satirical ballad of the King of Yvetôt, we extract :—

"THE PEOPLE'S REMINISCENCES.

"Ay, many a day the straw-thatch'd cot
Shall echo with his glory !
The humblest shed these fifty years
Shall know no other story.
There shall the idle villagers
To some old dame resort,
And beg her with those good old tales
To make their evenings short.
What though they say he did us harm,
Our love this cannot dim ;
Come, Granny, talk of him to us,—
Come, Granny, talk of him.

"Well, children : with a train of kings
Once he pass'd by this spot ;
'Twas long ago,—I had but just
Began to boil the pot.
On foot he climb'd the hill, whereon
I watch'd him on his way :
He wore a small three cornered hat :
His overcoat was grey.
I was half frighten'd till he spoke,—
'My dear,' says he, 'how do !'
'Oh, Granny, Granny, did he speak ?
What, Granny ! speak to you !'

"Next year, as I, poor soul, by chance,
Through Paris stroll'd one day,
I saw him taking, with his court,
To Notre Dame his way.
The crowd were charm'd with such a show
Their hearts were filled with pride :
What splendored weather for the fête !
Heaven favours him ! they cried.
Softly he smiled, for God had given
To his fond arms a boy.
'Oh, how much joy you must have felt ;
Oh, Granny ! how much joy.'

"But when, at length, our poor Champagne
By foes was overrun,
He seem'd alone to hold his ground—
Not dangers would he shun.
One night—as might be now—I heard
A knock,—the door unbarr'd,
And saw,—Good God!—'twas he himself,
With but a scanty guard.
Oh, what a war is this, he cried,
Taking this very chair—
'What! Granny, Granny, there he sat?
What! Granny, he sat there?'

"'I'm hungry,' said he: quick, I served
Thin wine and hard brown bread,
He dried his clothes, and by the fire
To sleep droop'd down his head.
Waking, he saw my tears:—'Cheer up,
Good dame,' says he, 'I go
'Neath Paris walls to strike for France
One last avenging blow!
He went; but on the cup he used
Such value did I set—
It has been treasured, 'What! 'till now?
You have it, Granny, yet?'

"Here 'tis; but 'twas the hero's fate
To ruin to be led.
He, whom a Pope had crown'd, alas!
In a lone isle lies dead.
'Twas long denied: No, no, said they,
Soon shall he reappear;—
O'er ocean comes he; and the foe
Shall find his master here.
Ah, what a bitter pang I felt
When forced to own 'twas true!
'Poor Granny! heaven for this, will look,
Will kindly look on you."

The "Violon Brisé," another of Beranger's most popular songs, is in something of the same style, and is in the original one of the most touching and interesting poems of its class ever written. It loses much in translation, but Mr. Young gives it with much effect:—

"THE BROKEN FIDDLE.

"Come here, my poor dog, honest beast;
Munch away, never mind my despair,
Here's a morsel of cake for to-day, at the least,
If to-morrow black bread be our fare.

"Last night in our valley the foe
Victors only by trickery—spoke:
'Play a tune, we would dance;' but I boldly said,
'No!
So my fiddle in anger they broke.

"'Twas the villagers' orchestra; now
Happy days, pleasant fêtes, are no more!
In the shade who can get up our dances? or how Shall the Loves be aroused as of yore?

"Its strings, they we lustily plied—
At the dawn of the fortunate day,
To announce the young bridegroom awaiting the bride,
With his escort to show her the way.

"Did the priest give an ear to its touch
If our dance without fear would allow;
The gladness it spread all around it was such,
It had smoothed even royalty's brow.

"What, and if it has preluded strains
That our glory was wont to awake!
Could I dream that the foeman invading our plains
His revenge on a fiddle would take?

"Come here, my poor dog, honest beast;
Munch away, never mind my despair,
Here's a morsel of cake for to-day, at the least,
If to-morrow black bread be our fare.

"How long will the Sundays appear,
In the barn, or beneath the old tree!
Will Providence smile on our vintage this year,
Since silent the fiddle will be?

"How it shorten'd the toils of the poor!
How it took the chill off from their lot!
For the great, and for taxes, and tempests, a cure
All alone it enliven'd the cot.

"What hate it hath served to suppress!
What tears hath forbidden to flow!
What good—all the sceptres on earth have done less Than was done by the scrape of my bow.

"But my courage they warm—we must chase
Such pitiful foes from our land!
They have broken my fiddle—'tis well—in its place,
The musket I'll grasp in my hand!

"And the friends whom I quit—a long list—
If I perish some day will recall,
That the barbarous hordes I refused to assist
In a dance o'er the wreck of our fall.

"Then come, my poor dog, honest beast;
Munch away, never mind my despair,
Here's a morsel of cake for to-day, at the least,
If to-morrow black bread be our fare."

The beautiful illustrations which embellish this volume, struck off from the plates prepared for the illustrated Paris edition, by Perrotin (which is the edition of the poet's works), and the handsome style in which it has been published, makes the book very attractive. It will be best appreciated by those who best understand Beranger and his position, social, poetical, and political, and who can enjoy his humour and pathos in the original as well as in the translation. To others it is an introduction to a man of great and peculiar genius, which ought to be followed up by an acquaintance with his works in their vernacular.

INSTINCT IN A BIRD.

ONCE when travelling in Tennessee, Wilson was struck with the manner in which the habits of the pennated grouse are adapted to its residence on dry, sandy plains.—One of them was kept there in a cage, having been caught alive in a trap. It was observed that the bird never drank, and seemed rather to avoid the water; but a few drops one day falling upon the cage, and trickling down the bars, the bird drank them with great dexterity, and an eagerness that showed she was suffering with thirst. The experiment was then made whether she would drink under other circumstances, and though she lived entirely on dry Indian corn, the cup of water in the cage was for a whole week untasted and untouched; but the moment water was sprinkled on the bars, she drank it eagerly as before. It occurred to him at once, that in the natural haunts of the bird, the only water it could procure was from the drops of rain and dew.

YEW TREES.

It is strange, but no less true, that the origin of some of the most widely extended customs is often enveloped in the deepest obscurity. Not the least remarkable of these is the practice of planting Yew Trees in localities devoted to the burial of the dead.

The custom appears to have been coeval with, if not prior to, the erection of churches themselves. It prevailed in Gaul, previous to the Roman invasion; and there are well-attested instances of trees in existence in this country, eight, ten, and twelve centuries old. There are several specimens in Kent of great size and antiquity; some of which, though still crowned with their chaplets of verdure, have become completely cavernous, the outward trunks being full of perpendicular interstices, the tree being sustained by a cluster of columnar supports, instead of its original wood. The churchyard of Upper Hardres, Kent, contains two very ancient yews; one of them, however, was nearly destroyed by the memorable November gale some years since; its companion measures twenty-one feet in girth, three feet above the soil.

Brabourne churchyard, in the same county, once contained, on the authority of Evelyn, a yew tree, fifty-eight feet in circumference; the tree has long since disappeared. It is a remarkable fact, however, that both Mrs. Somerville, and Humboldt, in their descriptions of the vegetable world, represent this tree as in actual existence. The latter writer, who quotes from Decandolle, assigns to this identical specimen, the Taxus baccata, an antiquity of thirty centuries. The age of trees has been a subject of much curious inquiry and speculation. Pliny speaks of a cypress which was planted at the foundation of Rome, and fell through neglect in the last year of the reign of the Emperor Nero. Ancient writers record the celebrated Lydian plane-tree, which Xerxes decorated with ornaments; and the ash at Ephesus, venerated by the Greeks.

The Banyan, Ficus Indica, attains an immense age, and as a particular specimen, we may refer to the sacred Banyan of Ceylon.

Yew trees, however, as individuals, are undoubtedly the most ancient trees of Europe. The Scotch yew of Fortingal was estimated to be from twenty-five to twenty-six centuries old, and those at Ripon, in Yorkshire, and at Crowhurst in Sussex, ranged from twelve to fourteen centuries. Stouting churchyard contains a yew tree which, at four feet from the ground, measures twenty feet in circumference. In Monk's Horton churchyard there is a tree seventeen feet six inches in girth; averaging the same from five to ten feet high. There is also a fine specimen in Elham churchyard.

Eulichen records a yew at Grassford, North Wales, fourteen hundred years old, and in girth, fifty-two feet, below the branches; and another tree in Derbyshire, is estimated to be two thousand one hundred years in age. The author of "Physical Geography" refers to a tree in Senegal, the Baobab, which from the number of its concentric rings is calculated to be five thousand one hundred and fifty years old. Humboldt, however, throws some doubts upon the correctness of this mode of reckoning; still, in his "Aspects of Nature," in a discussion on the longevity of trees, he assigns to Michel Montagne the merit of being the first vegetable physiologist who noticed the relation of the annual rings to the duration of the tree. Malpighi also called attention to the same subject subsequent to Montagne. The longevity of the yew-tree is undoubted, and there are few, if any, species of the vegetable world which can equal it; hence, perhaps as a type of immortality, we may imagine why it has been planted near religious houses, and in the receptacles for the dead. It has been a generally prevalent opinion, however, that the cultivation of this tree was encouraged for the purpose of supplying the English yeomanry and archers with bow-staves; and that, for greater security and protection, it was planted in churchyards.

From the existence of many statutes on the subject, considerable importance was undoubtedly attached to the means for obtaining a constant supply of yew bow-staves. The attention of the legislature was actively engaged respecting the importation of these articles from the continent; although we have proofs that there were considerable forests of yew in Sussex, Buckinghamshire, Westmoreland, in Scotland, and in Ireland, where vast quantities of the wood have been found in a fossil state. By one of those absurd restrictions too, by which commerce was sought to be regulated in former times, a certain price was placed upon bow-staves, beyond which the owners were not allowed to sell them; and as if to increase the difficulties with which the ancient merchant had to contend, he was compelled to pay a sort of tax, towards the defences of the country, by supplying so many staves for every butt of bourdeaux or sherry that he imported. He was also obliged to import four staves of yew for every ton of goods shipped from places where these articles were procurable.

Although the practice of planting yew-trees in churchyards has been generally prevalent, we should rather trace the custom to superstitious ideas or to religious feelings, such as dictated the planting of cypresses in the cemeteries of the East.

The yew was a sacred plant among many nations. It had a supposed efficiency in keeping off evil spirits. As an evergreen it was a symbol of immortality, and consequently was not inaptly planted near the sepulchres of the dead. Even now, evergreens are borne at processions in some parts of England, and, as a type of hope and of eternity, a green sprig or branch is thrown into the grave.

On Palm Sunday, branches of the yew are often displayed instead of the palm, and Caxton in his "Directions for keeping Feasts all the Year," is decisive upon this point, alleging, that as we have not the olive for an evergreen, the yew is substituted in its stead. There is something in the dark foliage of the yew, its perennial green, and the majestic mournfulness of its appearance, that especially befits it to illustrate the resting-places of the dead, and in the earlier ages of society, among a rude people, prone more to cherish appeals to the imagination than to the reason, and whose very religion was made up of passionate expressions, and imposing ceremonies, who selected the gloom of primeval forests for their temples, and worshipped their deities in mystery and seclusion,—this feeling would survive after the occasion that awakened it was gone. The Celt, or Teuton, when he had become a Christian convert, would dwell with fondness on the superstitions of his race; and as some of the early propagators of Christianity conformed to many innocent customs which fell in with the feelings of their disciples, perhaps this planting of the yew-tree by the remains of the dead was part of their traditional practice. If a superstition, its beauty and its gracefulness go far to excuse it, and we trust it may long survive many others of more equivocal character, engrafted at an early age upon our religious observances.

The planting of the yew as a sepulchral emblem may also be derived from the Romans, since Statius has recorded the fact that his countrymen carried garlands of this tree in funeral processions. At Sparta, soldiers who fell in battle, and women who died in childbed, were at their interment honoured according to the laws of Lycurgus, with a procession of green boughs. Thus was there ever something touching, though fantastic in these ancient ceremonies.

"The Greeks," as Philpot informs us, "strewed flowers over the urns and repositories of their dead, and adorned them with ribands, as they did the urn of Philopemen; but they more particularly affected the scattering of myrtle and amaranthus, as the Romans did that of the rose. Both these nations, however, concurred in the similar composition of the funeral pile, which was furnished and made up of rosemary, larynx, yew, cypress, and fir, wherein it is probable was couched some tacit hint of their surviving hopes, and in which mysterious hieroglyphics, as being trees which were perpetually verdant, were wrapped up the secret inferences of future resurrection."

Perhaps the wood of the yew might also have been used for coffins, as the Athenians, according to Thucydides, were accustomed, when burying their heroes, to employ cypress wood for the same purpose.

There is something deeply significant in the various uses to which the yew-tree has been dedicated. Now, as the emblem of mourning or immortality, holding its tenancy for ages in the burial places of our forefathers, as generation after generation sported around it in childhood, grew up to maturity, and at last slept beneath its shade; now, in the gardens of the ancient English gentry, in the quaint forms of goblins, monsters, and "paynins bold," presiding in gloomy state or fantastic humour over high terraced walls, and neat clipped parterres; nay, even this practice may have been derived from our Roman conquerors. Whenever they planted a garden, they set up a god, and the Termini of their boundaries, or the Priapi or Hermi of their pleasure grounds, may after all have been the prototypes of those fantastic guardians of yew, or box, which seemed to watch in silence and precision over the destinies of the vegetable world. That world has indeed run somewhat wild, and quite outgrown them.

Opposed as our modern ideas may be to this monster peopling of our gardens, with pyramids, giants, birds, and dragons, we cannot look otherwise but kindly on these sports of the imagination. Though vestiges of the olden times, and types of an era of much mental darkness, they can never be without their interest to succeeding generations. Like the fossil remains of a former world, though they may appear at first sight to be but so many monstrosities, gentler reflections will recall something, even in the days of old, akin to what is graceful and beautiful still. They had human hearts, these said rough forefathers, gentle affections too, that then as now haunted the groves; love found its trysting-place, or mused upon its day-dream, beneath the seclusion of these garden deities, what time the Norman twanged his bow in the New Forest, or the startled deer glanced in light and shadow through the glades of Sherwood.

In spite of the innovations of the modern landscape gardener, who measures his skill by his power of optical deception, and thinks he has achieved an intellectual triumph when, by the appearance of a lawn of boundless extent, he tempts you to stumble over a hà là fence into a grassy moat, there are still many grounds kept up in the old-fashioned style.

Castles and antiquated halls, nay old trees too, call us back to the past, and in spite of the stern realities of which history is ever reminding us, that past always appears to us like a distant landscape, which, however barren and uninteresting on actual survey, is invested through the distance with a thousand beautiful hues and shadows. A fairy-like haze lies over it; tradition, like twilight, has its forms of illusion, its deepening gloom and darkness, streaked at times with gleams that shed back from the blue infinite of the past a thousand spells.

Virgil has sung of the "broad spreading beech," Gray has recorded the yew-tree in his "Elegy," and in the ancient British laws, the yew denominated "sacred" in all lists of trees, was computed to far exceed the oak itself in value. Much is it to be regretted that its beautiful wood is not more employed for furniture, and articles of domestic use. There is no indigenous tree, and few foreign ones, more excellent in grain or colour, and few which so readily conform to the direction of the turner's gouge.

It is to be lamented, too, that this tree is not more generally planted, and unless the ancient practice be revived, another age or two must see not only our churchyards, but our gardens, deprived of all successors of this stately and venerable associate of the oak and the holly. As a tree, too, it has its individual interest, its early English recollections, and although from its boughs were fashioned the weapons that sped the shafts fatal to three kings of England, Harold, Rufus, and Cœur de Lion, it armed the prowess which raised the shout of victory on the memorable plains of Cressy, Agincourt, and Flodden.

The days of English archery are gone. From the reign of Elizabeth this pursuit ceased to be aught but a pastime, and the practice only remains to vary the sports of our boyish days, or to grace the festivities of some rural fête.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THO^s. MORE.

LIBELLUS A MARGARETA MORE, QUINDECIM ANNOS
NATA, CHELSELE INCEPTVS.

Chelsea, June 18.

. . . On asking Mr. Gunnel to what use I s^d put this fayr libellus, he did suggest my making it a kinde of family register, wherein to note y^e more important of our domestick passages, whether of joy or griefe—my father's journies and absences—the visits of learned men, their notable sayings, etc. “You are smart at the pen, Mistress Margaret,” he was pleased to say; “and I woulde humble advise your journalling in y^e same fearless manner in the which you framed that letter which soe well pleased the Bishop of Exeter, that he sent you a Portugal piece. ’Twill be well to write it in English, which ’tis expedient for you not altogether to neglect, even for the more honourable Latin.”

Methinks I am close upon womanhood. . . “Humble advise,” quotha! to me, that hath so oft humble sued for his pardon, and sometimes in vayne!

’Tis well to make trial of Gouellus his “humble” advice: albeit, our daylie course is so methodicall, that ’twill afford scant subject for y^e pen—Vitam con-tinet una dies.

. . . As I traced y^e last word, methoughte I heard y^e well-known tones of Erasmus his pleasant voyce; and, looking forthe of my lattice, did indeede beholde the deare little man coming up from y^e river side with my father, who, because of y^e heat, had given his cloak to a tall stripling behind him to bear. I flew up stairs, to advertise mother, who was half in and half out of her program gown, and who stayed me to clasp her owches; so that, by y^e time I had followed her down stairs, we founde ’em alreadie in y^e hall.

So soon as I had kissed their hands, and obtayned their blessings, the tall lad stept forthe, and who s^d he be but William Roper, returned from my father's errand over-seas! He hath grown hugelie, and looks mannish; but his manners are worsened insteade of bettered by forayn travell; for, insteade of his old franknesse, he hung upon hand till father bade him come forward; and then, as he went his rounds, kissing one after another, stopt short when he came to me, twice made as though he would have saluted me, and then held back, making me looke so stupid, that I c^d have boxed his ears for his payns. ’Speciallic as father burst out a-laughing, and cried, “The third time’s lucky!”

After supper, we took deare Erasmus entirely over y^e house, in a kind of family procession, c’en from the buttery and scalding-house to our own deare Academia, with its cool green curtain flapping in y^e evening breezc, and blowing aside, as though on purpose to give a glimpse of y^e cleare-shining Thames! Erasmus noted and admired the stone jar, placed by Mercy Giggs on y^e table, full of blue and yellow irises, scarlet tiger-lilies, dog-roses, honeysuckles, moonwort, and herb-trinity; and alsoe our various desks, each in its own little retirement,—mine own, in speciall, so pleasantly situate! He protested, with everie semblance of sincerity, he had never seene so pretty an academy. I should think not, indeede! Bess, Daisy, and I, are of opinion, that there is not likelie to be such another in y^e world. He glanced, too, at y^e books on our desks; Bessy’s being Livy; Daisy’s, Sallust; and mine, St. Augustine, with father’s marks where I was to read, and where desist. He tolde Erasmus, laying his hand fondlie on my head, “Here is one who knows what is implied in the word ’Trust.’” Dear father, well I may! He added, “there was no law against laughing in his academia, for that his girls knew how to be merry and wise.”

From the house to the new building, the chapel and gallery, and thence to visit all the dumb kinde, from the great horned owls to Cecy’s pet dormice. Erasmus was amused at some of their names, and doubted whether Dun Scotus and the venerable Bede would have thoughte themselves complimented in being made name-fathers to a couple of owls; though he admitted that Argus and Juno were goode cognomens for peacocks. Will Roper hath broughte mother a pretty little forayn animal called a marmot, but she sayd she had noe time for such-like playthings, and bade him give it to his little wife. Methinks, I being neare sixteen and he close upon twenty, we are too old for those childish names now, nor am I much flattered at a present not intended for me; however, I shall be kind to the little creature, and, perhaps, grow fond of it, as ’tis both harmlesse and diverting.

To return, howbeit, to Erasmus; Cecy, who had hold of his gown, and had alreadie, through his familiar kindness and her own childish heedlessness, somewhat transgressed bounds, began now in her mirthle to fabricate a dialogue, she pretended to have overheard, between Argus and Juno as they stode pcareht on a stone parapet. Erasmus was entertayned with her garrulitic for a while, but at length gentlie checkt her, with “Love y^e truth, little mayd, love y^e truth, or, if thou liest, let it be with a circumstance,” a qualification which made mother stare and father laugh.

Sayth Erasmus, "there is no harm in a fabella, apologus, or parabola, so long as its character be distinctie recognised for such, but contrariwise, much goode; and y^e same hath been sanctioned, not only by y^e wiser heads of Greece and Rome, but by our deare Lord himself. Therefore, Cecillie, whom I love exceedingly, be not abasht, child, at my reproof, for thy dialogue between the two peacocks was innocent no less than ingenious, till thou wouldst have insisted that they, in sooth, sayd something like what thou didst invent. Therein thou didst violence to y^e truth, which St. Paul hath typified by a girdle, to be worn next the heart, and that not only confineth within due limits but addeth strength. So now be friends; wert thou more than eleven and I no priest, thou shouldst be my little wife, and darn my hose, and make me sweet marchpane, such as thou and I love. But, oh! this pretty Chelsea! What daisies! what buttercups! what joviall swarms of gnats! The country all about is as nice and flat as Rotterdam."

Anon, we sit down to rest and talk in the pavillion.

Sayth Erasmus to my father, "I marvel you have never entered into the king's service in some publick capacitie, wherein your learning and knowledge, bothe of men and things, would not onlie serve your own interest, but that of your friends and y^e publick."

Father smiled and made answer, "I am better and happier as I am. As for my friends, I already do for them alle I can, see as they can, hardlie consider me in their debt; and, for myself, y^e yielding to their solicitations that I w^d putt myself forward for the benefit of the world in generall, w^d be like printing a book at request of friends, that y^e publick may be charmed with what, in fact, it values at a doit. The cardinal offered me a pension, as retaining fee to the king a little while back, but I tolde him I did not care to be a mathematical point, to have position without magnitude.

Erasmus laught and sayd, "I woulde not have you y^e slave of anie king; howbeit, you mighte assist him and be useful to him."

"The change of the word," sayth father, "does not alter the matter; I shoulde be a slave, as completely as if I had a collar rounde my neck."

"But would not increased usefulness," says Erasmus, "make you happier?"

"Happier?" says father, somewhat heating; "how can that be compassed in a way so abhorrent to my genius? At present, I live as I will, to which very few courtiers can pretend. Half-a-dozen blue-coated serving-men answer my turn in the house, garden, field, and on the river: I have a few strong horses for work, none for show, plenty of plain food for a healthy family, and enough, with a hearty welcome, for a score of guests that are not dainty. The lengthe of my wife's train infringeth not the statute; and, for myself, I see hate bravery, that my motto is, 'Of those whom you see in scarlet, not one is happy.' I have a regular profession, which supports my house, and enables me to promote peace and justice; I have leisure to chat with my wife, and sport with my children; I have hours for devotion, and hours for philosophie and y^e liberrall arts, which are absolutelie medicinall to me, as antidotes to y^e sharpe but contracted habits of mind engendered by y^e law. If there be anie thing in a court life which can compensate for y^e losse of anie of these blessings, deare Desiderius, pray tell me what it is, for I confesse I know not."

"You are a comicall genius," says Erasmus.

"As for you," retorted father, "you are at your olde trick of arguing on y^e wrong side, as you did y^e firste time we mett. Nay, don't we know you can declaime backward and forwarde on the same argument, as you did on y^e Venetian war?"

Erasmus smiled quietlie, and sayd, "What could I do? The pope changed his holy mind." Whereat father smiled too.

"What nonsense you learned men sometimes talk!" pursues father. "I—wanted at court, quotha! Fancy a dozen starving men with one roasted pig betweene them;—do you think they would be really glad to see a thirteenth come up, with an eye to a small piece of y^e crackling? No; believe me, there is none that courtiers are more sincerelie respectfull to than the man who avows he hath no intention of attempting to go shares; and c'en him they care mighty little about, for they love none with true tendernesse save themselves."

"We shall see you at court yet," says Erasmus.

Sayth father, "Then I will tell you in what guise. With a fool-cap and bells. Fish! I won't aggravate you, churchman as you are, by alluding to the blessings I have which you have not; and I trow there is as much danger in taking you for serious when you are onlie playful and ironical as if you were Plato himself."

Sayth Erasmus, after some minutes' silence, "I know full well that you holde Plato, in manie instances, to be sporting when I accept him in very deed and truth. Speculating he often was; as a brighte, pure flame must needs be struggling up, and, if it findeth no direct vent, come forthe of y^e oven's mouth. He was like a man shut into a vault, running hither and thither, with his poor, flickering taper, agonizing to get forthe, and holding himself in readinesse to make a spring forward the moment a door s^d open. But it never did. 'Not manie wise are called.' He had clomb a hill in y^e darke, and stode calling to his companions below, 'Come on, come on! this way lies y^e east; I am avised we shall see the sun rise anon.' But they never did. What a Christian he woulde have made! Ah! he is one now. He and Socrates—the veil long removed from their eyes—are sitting at Jesus' feet. Sancte Socrates, ora pro nobis!"

Bessie and I exchanged glances at this so strange ejaculation; but y^e subjectt was of such interest, that we listened with deep attention to what followed.

Sayth father, "Whether Socrates were what Plato painted him in his dialogues, is with me a great matter of doubt; but it is not of moment. When so many contemporaries coulde distinguishe y^e fancifulle from y^e fictitious, Plato's object coulde never have beene to deceive. There is something higher in art than gross imitation. He who attempteth it is always the leaste successfull; and his failure hath the odium of a discovered lie; whereas, to give an avowedlie fabulous narrative a consistence within itselfe which permitts y^e reader to be, for y^e time, voluntarilie deceived, is as artfulle as it is allowable. Were I to construct a tale, I woulde, as you sayd to Cecy, lie with a circumstance, but shoulde consider it noe compliment to have my unicorns and hippogriffs taken for live animals. Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, magis tamen amica veritas. Now, Plato had a much higher aim than to give a very pattern of Socrates his snub nose. He wanted a peg to hang his thoughts upon——"

"A peg? A statue by Phidias," interrupts Erasmus.

"A statue by Phidias, to clothe in y^e most beautiful drapery," sayth father; "no matter that y^e drapery was his own, he wanted to show it to the best advantage, and to y^e honour rather than prejudice of the statue. And, having clothed y^e same, he got a spark of Prometheus his fire, and made the aforesayd statue walk and talk to the glory of gods and men, and sate himself quietlie down in a corner. By the way, Desiderius, why shouldst thou not submit thy subtletie to the rules of a colloquy? Set Eckius and Martin Luther by the ears! Ha! man, what sport! Heavens! if I were to compound a tale or a dialogue, what crotches and quips of mine own woulde I not putt into my puppet's mouths! and then have out my laugh behind my vizard, as when we used to act burlesques before Cardinall Morton. What rare sporte we had, one Christmas, with a mummerie we called the 'Triall of Feasting!' Dinner and Supper were broughte up before my Lord Chief Justice, charged with murder. Their accomplices were Plum-pudding, Mince-pye, Surfeit, Drunkenness, and suchlike. Being condemned to hang by y^e neck, I, who was Supper, stuf out with I cannot tell you how manie pillows, began to call lustilie for a confessor; and, on his stepping forthe, commenct a list of all y^e fitts, convulsions, spasms, payns in y^e head, and so forthe, I had inflicted on this one and t'other. 'Alas! good father,' says I, 'King John layd his death at my door;—indeede, there's scarce a royall or noble house that hath not a charge agaynst me; and I'm sorelie afrayd' (giving a poke at a fat priest that sate at my lord cardinall's elbow) 'I shall have the death of that holy man to answer for.'"

Erasmus laughed, and sayd, "Did I ever tell you of the retort of Willibald Pirkheimer? A monk, hearing him praise me somewhat lavishly to another, could not avoid expressing by his looks great disgust and dissatisfaction; and, on being askt whence they arose, confest he c^d not, with patience, heare y^e commendation of a man soe notoriously fond of eating fowls. 'Does he steal them?' says Pirkheimer. 'Surely no,' says y^e monk. 'Why, then,' quoth Willibald, 'I know of a fox who is ten times the greater rogue; for, look you, he helps himself to many a fat hen from my roost without ever offering to pay me. But tell me now, dear father, is it then a sin to eat fowls?' 'Most assuredlie it is,' says the monk, 'if you indulge in them to gluttony.' 'Ah! if, if!' quoth Pirkheimer. 'If stands stiff, as the Lacedemonians told Philip of Macedon; and 'tis not by eating bread alone, my dear father, you have acquired that huge paunch of yours. I fancy, if all the fat fowls that have gone into it coulde raise their voices and cackle at once, they woulde make noise enow to drown y^e drums and trumpets of an army.' Well may Luther say," continued Erasmus, laughing, "that their fasting is easier to them than our eating to us; seeing that every man Jack of them hath to his evening meal two quarts of beer, a quart of wine, and as manie as he can eat of spice cakes, the better to relish his drink. While I . . . 'tis true my stomach is Lutheran, but my heart is Catholic; that's as heaven made me, and I'll be judged by you alle, whether I am not as thin as a weasel."

'Twas now growing dusk, and Cecy's tame hares were just beginning to be on y^e alert, skipping across our path, as we returned towards the house, jumping over one another, and raying 'emselves on their hind legs to sollicit our notice. Erasmus was amused at their gambols, and at our making them beg for vine-tendrils; and father told him there was hardlie a member of y^e household who had not a dumb pet of some sort. "I encourage the taste in them," he said, "not onlie because it fosters humanitie and affords harmlesse recreation, but because it promotes habitts of forethought and regularitie. No child or servant of mine hath liberty to adopt a pet which he is too lazy or nice to attend to himself. A little management may enable even a young gentlewoman to do this, without soyling her hands; and to neglect giving them proper food at proper times entayls a disgrace of which everie one of 'em w^d be ashamed. But, hark! there is the vesper-bell."

As we passed under a pear-tree, Erasmus told us, with much drollerie, of a piece of boyish mischief of his,—the theft of some pears off a particular tree, the fruit of which the superior of his convent had meant to reserve to himself. One morning, Erasmus had climbed the tree, and was feasting to his great content, when he was aware of the superior approaching to catch him in y^e fact; soe, quicklie slid down to the ground, and made off in y^e opposite direction, limping as he went. The malice of this act consisted in its being the counterfeit of the gait of a poor lame lay brother, who was, in fact, smartlie punisht for Erasmus his misdeede. Our friend mentioned this with a kinde of remorse, and observed to my father,—"Men laugh at the sins of young people and little children, as if they were little sins; albeit, the robbery of an apple or cherry-orchard is as much a breaking of the eighth commandment as the stealing of a leg of mutton from a butcher's stall, and oftentimes with far less excuse. Our Church tells us, indeede, of venial sins, such as the theft of an apple or a pin; but, I think," (looking hard at Cecily and Jack,) "even the youngest among us could tell how much sin and sorrow was brought into the world by stealing an apple."

At bedtime, Bess and I did agree in wishing that alle learned men were as apt to unite pleasure with profit in their talk as Erasmus. There be some that can write after y^e fashion of Paul, and others preach like unto Apollos; but this, methinketh, is scattering seed by the wayside, like the great Sower.

'Tis singular, the love that Jack and Cecy have for one another; it resembleth that of twins. Jack is not forward at his booke; on y^e other hand, he hath a resolution of character which Cecy altogether wants. Last night, when Erasmus spake of children's sins, I observed her squeeze Jack's hand with alle her mighte. I know what she was thinking of. Having bothe beene forbidden to approach a favourite part of y^e river bank which had given way from too much use, one or y^e other of 'em transgressed, as was proven by y^e smalle footprints in y^e mud, as well as by a nosegay of flowers, that grow not, save by the river; to wit, purple loose-strife, cream-and-codlins, scorpion-grass, water plantain, and the like. Neither of 'em woulde confesse, and Jack was, therefore, sentenced to be whipt. As he walked off with Mr. Drew, I observed Cecy turn soe pale, that I whispered father I was certayn she was guilty. He made answer, "Never mind, we cannot beat a girl, and 'twill answer y^e same purpose; in flogging him we flog both." Jack bore the firste stripe or two, I suppose, well enow, but at length he heard him cry out, on which Cecy coulde not forbear to doe y^e same, and then stopt bothe her ears. I expected everie moment to heare her say, "Father, 'twas I;" but no, she had not courage for that; onlie, when Jack came forthe all smirked with tears, she put her arm aboute his neck, and they walked off together into the nuttery. Since that hour, she hath beene more devoted to him than ever, if possible; and he, boy-like, finds satisfaction in making her his little slave. But the beauty lay in my father's improvement of y^e circumstance. Taking Cecy on his knee that evening, (for she was not ostensible in disgrace,) he beganne to talk of atonement and mediation for sin, and who it was that bare our sins for us on the tree. 'Tis thus he turns y^e daylie accidents of our quiet lives into lessons of deepe import, not pedantically delivered, ex cathedra, but welling forthe from a full and fresh mind.

This morn I had risen before dawn, being minded to meditate on sundrie matters before Bess was up and doing, she being given to much talk during her dressing, and made my way to y^e pavillion, where, methought, I s^d be quiet enow; but beholde! father and Erasmus were there before me, in fluent and earnest discourse. I w^d have withdrawne, but father, without interrupting his sentence, puts his arm rounde me and draweth me to him, soe there I sit, my head on a shoulder, and mine eyes on Erasmus his face.

From much they spake, and other much I guessed, they had beene conversing y^e present state of y^e Church, and how much it needed renovation.

Erasmus sayd, y^e vices of y^e Clergy and ignorance of y^e vulgar had now come to a poynt, at the which, a remedie must be founde, or y^e whole fabric w^d falle to pieces.

—Sayd, the revival of learning seemed appoynted by heaven for some greate purpose, 'twas difficulte to say how greate.

—Spake of y^e new art of printing, and its possible consequents.

—(If y^e active and fertile minds at present turning up new ground and ferreting out old abuses.

—Of the abuse of monachism, and of y^e evil lives of conventualls. In special, of y^e fanaticism and hypocrisy of y^e Dominicans.

Considered y^e evils of y^e times such, as that societie must shortlie, by a vigorous effort, shake 'em off.

Wondered at y^e patience of the laitie for soe manie generations, but thoughte 'em now waking from their sleepe. The people had of late beganne to know their physickall power, and to chafe at y^e weighte of their yoke.

Thoughte the doctrine of indulgences altogether bad and false.

Father sayd, that y^e graduallic increast severitie of Church discipline concerning minor offences had become such as to render indulgences y^e needfulle remedie for burthens too heave to be borne.—Condemned a Draconic code, that visited even sins of discipline with y^e extream penaltie.—Quoted how ill such excessive severitie answered in our owne land, with regard to y^e civill law; twenty thieves oft hanging together on y^e same gibbet, yet robberie noe whit abated.

Othermuch to same purport, y^e which, if alle set downe, woulde too soone fill my libellus. At length, unwillinglie brake off, when the bell rang us to matins.

At breakfaste, William and Rupert were earneste with my father to let 'em row him to Westminster, which he was disinclined to, as he was for more speede, and had promised Erasmus an carlie caste to Lambeth; howbeit, he consented that they s^d pull us up to Putney in y^e evening, and William s^d have y^e stroke-oar. Erasmus sayd, he must thank y^e archbishop for his present of a horse; "tho' I'm full faine," he observed, "to believe it a changeling. He is idle and gluttonish, as thin as a wasp, and as ugly as sin. Such a horse, and such a rider!"

In the evening, Will and Rupert had made 'emselves spruce enow, with nosegays and ribbons, and we tooke water bravelic;—John Harris in y^e stern, playing the recorder. We had y^e six-oared barge; and when Rupert Allington was tired of pulling, Mr. Clement tooke his oar; and when he wearied, John Harris gave over playing y^e pipe; but William and Mr. Gunnell never flagged.

Erasmus was full of his visitt to y^e archbishop, who, as usuall, I think, had given him some money.

"We sate down two hundred to table," sayth he:

"there was fish, flesh, and fowl; but Wareham onlie played with his knife, and drank noe wine. He was very cheerfull and accessible; he knows not what pride is; and yet, of how much mighte he be proud! What genius! what erudition! what kindnesse and modesty! From Wareham, who ever departed in sorrow?"

Landing at Fulham, we had a brave ramble thro' y^e meadows. Erasmus, noting y^e poor children a gathering y^e dandelion and milk-thistle for the herb-market, was avised to speak of forayn herbes and their uses, bothe for food and medicine.

"For me," says father, "there is manie a plant I entertayn in my garden and paddock which y^e fastidious woulde cast forthe. I like to teache my children y^e uses of common things—to know, for instance, y^e uses of y^e flowrs and weeds that grow in our fields and hedges. Manie a poor knave's pottage woulde be improved, if he were skilled in y^e properties of y^e burdock and purple orchis, lady's-smock, brook-lime, and old man's pepper. The roots of wild succory and water arrow-head mighte agreeable change his Lenten diet; and glasswort afford him a pickle for his mouthfulle of salt-meat. Then, there are cresses and wood-sorrel to his breakfast, and salep for his hot evening mess. For his medicine, there is herb-twopence, that will cure a hundred ills; camomile, to lull a raging tooth; and the juice of buttercup to cleare his head by sneezing. Vervain cureth ague; and crowfoot affords y^e leaste painfull of blisters. St. Anthony's turnip is an emetic; goose-grass sweetens the blood; woodruffe is good for the liver; and bind-weed hath nigh as much virtue as y^e forayn scammony. Pimpernel promoteth laughter; and poppy, sleep: thyme giveth pleasant dreams; and an ashen branch drives evil-spirits from y^e pillow. As for rosemarie, I lett it run alle over my garden walls, not onlie because my bees love it, but because 'tis the herb sacred to remembrance, and, therefore, to friendship, whence a sprig of it hath a dumb language that maketh it y^e chosen emblem at our funeral wakes, and in our buriall grounds. Howbeit, I am a school-boy prating in presence of his master, for here is John Clement at my elbow, who is the best botanist and herbalist of us all."

—Returning home, y^e youths being warmed with rowing, and in high spiritts, did entertayn themselves and us with manie jests and playings upon words, some of 'em forced enow, yet provocative of laughing. Afterwards, Mr. Gunnell proposed enigmas and curious questions. Among others, he woulde know which of y^e famous women of Greece or Rome we maidens w^d resemble. Bess was for Cornelia, Daisy for Clelia, but I for Damo, daughter of Pythagoras, which William Roper deemed stupid enow, and thoughte I mighte have found as good a daughter, that had not died a maid. Sayth Erasmus, with his sweet, inexpressible smile, "Now I will tell you, lads and lasscs, what manner of man I w^d be, if I were not Erasmus. I woulde step back some few years of my life, and be half-way 'twixt thirty and forty; I would be pious and profounde enow for y^e church, albeit noe church-man; I woulde have a blythe, stirring, English wife, and half-a-dozen merrie girls and boys, an English homestead, neither hall nor farm, but betweens both; neare enow to y^e citie for convenience, but away from its noise. I woulde have a profession, that gave me some hours daylie of regular businesse, that s^d let men know my parts, and court me into publick station, for which my taste made me rather withdrawe. I woulde have such a private independence, as s^d enable me to give and lend, rather than beg and borrow. I woulde encourage mirth without buffoonerie, ease without negligence; my habit and table shoulde be simple, and for my looks I woulde be neither tall nor short, fat nor lean, rubicund nor sallow, but of a fayr skin with blue eyes, brownish beard, and a countenance engaging and attractive, see that alle of my companie coulde not choose but love me."

"Why, then, you woulde be father himselfe," cries Cecy, clasping his arm in bothe her hands with a kind of rapture, and, indeede, y^e portraiture was soe like, we coulde not but smile at y^e resemblance.

Arrived at y^e landing, father protested he was wearie with his ramble, and, his foot slipping, he wrenched his ankle, and sate for an instante on a barrow, the which one of y^e men had left with his garden-tools, and before he c^d rise or cry out, William, laughing, rolled him up to y^e house-door; which, considering father's weight, was much for a stripling to doe. Father sayd the same, and, laying his hand on Will's shoulder with kindnesse, cried, "Bless thee, my boy, but I woulde not have thee overstrayned, like Biton and Clitobus."

BY A FRENCHMAN.

THE islands of the Mediterranean present to the eye of the voyager as he floats past on some soft breezy day nearly every variety of natural scenery,—green valleys, cool forests and blue mountains, with here and there, as if to increase the effect of the beautiful, naked and arid rocks. Gibraltar, which has been often described, partakes of the latter character, and we propose in the present paper to condense the observations of a recent French traveller upon another rock in the same sea, not less remarkable for its physical peculiarities, the manners of its inhabitants, and the events of which it has been the theatre. As our title imports, we allude to Malta; and the remarks of a foreigner, upon what he heard and saw in the little British dependency, will perhaps possess more of piquancy and variety than could be expected from a native writer.

This island was first taken possession of by the Phœnicians 1519 years before the birth of Christ: they held it for 784 years, when the Greeks, who had just founded one of their most important colonies at Syracuse, made themselves masters of the Phœnician settlement, to which they gave the name of Malita, because of the delicious honey obtained there. During the wars between Carthage and Rome, the former power took the island from the Greeks, and was afterwards in turn driven out by the Romans, who lost it for a time, but took permanent possession in the year 316 before Christ. Their domination lasted more than six centuries. In the year 58 of the Christian era, St. Paul, as recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, was wrecked at Malta, and embraced the opportunity to make the truths of the gospel known to the natives. And it is interesting to know that the catacombs yet to be seen at Cita-Vecchia, and which have survived the assaults of the Vandals, Goths, and others, who succeeded the Romans, are supposed to be places in which the early Christians devoted themselves to the practice of their religion.

In the year 833, Malta fell into the power of the Saracens. Two hundred years later it was annexed to Sicily, under the government of Roger, youngest of the twelve sons of Tancred, who conquered it on their return from the Holy Land. In 1194, Henry VI. of France took Malta and Sicily from the Normans; and afterwards, in 1226, Charles of Anjou subjugated the two islands, as part of the conquest of Naples. The Sicilian Vespers, on the 30th March, 1283, put an end to the French dominion in Sicily, which, with Malta, was seized by Pedro of Arragon, and made a dependency of Spain for 246 years. A common fate appears to have attended the two islands, but in 1526 a career of glory and independence opened for the rock of Malta, which thenceforth ranked among the most memorable places of the earth. In that year the Knights Hospitallers established themselves upon the island.

The Hospitallers was one among the many half-military, half religious orders, which originated in the fervour and enthusiasm of the middle ages. On the expulsion of the knights from Rhodes, they petitioned the emperor Charles V. to cede to them the island of Malta, promising to repress the audacity of the African corsairs who then infested the Mediterranean. Pope Clement VII. supported their request, which was granted after four years' delay; one of the conditions being that they should present a falcon every year to the viceroy of Sicily, in token of homage. During the 267 years that they held possession of the island, the chief authority was exercised by a succession of twenty-eight grand masters, under one of whom, Jean de La Valette, occurred the memorable siege of Malta by the Turks, of which it has been said that it only required a Homer to become as famous as that of Troy: never was human courage, or human vengeance, carried to a higher extreme.

In June 1798 Napoleon stopped at Malta, on his way to Egypt with the French fleet, and asked permission of the grand master, Ferdinand de Hompesch, to water the ships. The request was refused, and the next day the French took possession of the island, and the power of the Hospitallers was at an end.

Some of the aged knights remained to die on the scene of their former triumphs, others followed Napoleon's banner, and the greater number dispersed themselves over Europe. A few weeks afterwards, Malta was blockaded by Nelson. The result of this blockade is well known. The French garrison capitulated after having lost nearly one half of their number by disease and famine; from which period the Maltese have lived quietly under English rule.

Seen from a distance, Malta resembles a pedestal of white marble, broad oblong, slightly elevated above the surface of the waves, waiting as it were to receive some gigantic statue. On drawing nearer, the immense mass of stone assumes a definite outline, without losing any thing of its nakedness and angularity, and at length a city of white houses, without visible roofs or windows, appears as though excavated in the glittering rock. The sun's rays sparkle on the dazzling walls, whose upper lines cut the deep blue sky with a distinctness that excites a stranger's astonishment. The newly arrived traveller imagines himself approaching one of the often dreamed-of Eastern cities, and looks above the ramparts for the graceful and tapering stem of the palm-tree, an essential accessory of every oriental landscape; but not a tree is to be seen; no tint of spring relieves the dry and monotonous picture. After passing beneath some formidable batteries, you enter the port, and find yourself unexpectedly under the guns of several men of war, lying solemnly at anchor. Scarcely have you recovered from the effect of this first surprise than a new one awaits you—a nautical joust. At the sight of the packet entering the port, a hundred boats of elegant build and brilliant colours, manned by rowers in white vests, with scarlet girdles, put off from every part of the quays, and challenging each other to speed, seem to fly along the water to the vessel, round which they are soon congregated. Then begins an uproar of which it is scarcely possible to give an idea. The swarthy boatmen, with Arab eyes and pointed teeth, utter the most extraordinary cries, quarrelling all the while in their vivacious yet guttural language, offering their services on every side, careless of the unsparing use of a rope's end, and at last, in spite of opposition and Britannic gravity, carry you off to the shore with bag and baggage.

The quays are narrow, and to ascend to the city, rising in stages above your head, you are obliged to pass through a number of paved and vaulted posterns, to cross draw-bridges, and to mount the long stone stairs under a scorching sun; where at every step you encounter a tall, pale, lean, stiff, red-coated English sentry, or a handsome Highlander with bare legs, pacing gravely up and down, musket on shoulder and claymore on thigh. Every thing betokens the melancholy and sombre fortress; but, when on the platform, you are again in a street full of life, animation, and gaiety. The spectacle which presents itself is perfectly unique. In all that surrounds you, you perceive the most singular medley of English luxury and Italian misery; northern phlegm, and southern vivacity. The street is broad, straight, and regular; the houses are all of the same height and colour, with gay shops thrown in here and there; and the pavement is thronged with people. In this crowd the Maltese ladies, with their thickly plaited black mantillas, glowing eyes, dark hair, and Andalusian feet, elbow the starched English dames, who walk with downcast eyes, flaxen hair, and feet on which you might sleep standing. Half-naked Sicilian sailors, with every species of arms and uniform, Levanters in oriental costume, busy merchants, splendid equipages rolling past, magnificent Arabian horses shaking their long manes as they gallop, beaux who strut and beggars who skulk,—all are mingled, crowded and confused around you. The multitude speaks all languages. With the English hiss you hear the lively voice of a Frenchman; and an Arab from Tunis discourses gravely by the side of an Italian who gesticulates. The shops are filled with merchandise from every country: tailors from London, perfumers from Paris, cafetiers from Greece, and porters from Smyrna live in mutual good understanding in the Grande-Rue. Stately hotels, excellent in appearance and well kept, display their rival signs on all sides to the eyes of the traveller. Life in Malta is easy, inexpensive, and carelessly elegant. A large number of young and rich English officers indemnify themselves there for their expatriation by all the enjoyments of luxury, and keep up the jovial customs which the knights, for their part, imported before them. A multitude of travellers arriving from every quarter of the globe, and obliged to sojourn in the island, either waiting for ships, or performing quarantine, create much stir at the hotels, and a great sale of all the little indulgences which compensate for privations and the ennui of a long voyage. An excellent course of geography and commerce might be constructed by following carefully the conversations, often peculiarly interesting, which take place round the tables d'hôte at Malta.

During the ten days that I stayed at Malta, waiting for the steam-boat in which I intended to continue my voyage to Greece, I passed all my time in riding about the island on pretty little Arabian horses, which may be hired in the city at a cheap rate. The country, if such it can be called, presents a most extraordinary appearance, being all artificial. On going out of the city for the first time, the stranger stands still for an instant with surprise, so singular and different from any other landscape is the scene before him. An immense plain of chalk stretches before you, shadowless and without vegetation. Not a tree, not a bunch of verdure, is to be seen on the white and desolate plateau, which the sea washes on every side. Endless repetitions of dwarf walls are the only objects that meet the eye, with the immense clouds of dust which the slightest breath of wind raises in every direction. Yet although so arid in appearance, the country is far from being unproductive; by dint of industry the inhabitants of this isolated rock have made it, as it were, give nature the lie. In certain places, now the most fertile of the island, such as the Floriana, and the governor's garden, not a particle of vegetable earth existed; the Maltese borrowed soil from Sicily, fetching it from the environs of Syracuse, and spreading the productive layer over the polished surface of their rock. This process, which could only be successfully accomplished by rich proprietors for pleasure-gardens, was too costly for the poor peasants, who had neither money nor vessels, and they effected by ingenuity what could not have been realized by any other means at their disposal. After tracing out a regular section of the surface, they excavate and remove the rock to a depth of nearly two feet, with iron wedges; taking care to preserve the small portions of earth found in the fissures. When the excavation is complete, they spread alternate layers of this earth and of rock dust inside to a thickness of eighteen inches; the whole is then watered and left exposed for a year to the action of the sun and air. With the pieces of rock dug out of the opening they build a wall around it, and it is the number and appearance of these walls which present so extraordinary a spectacle to a stranger. The whole island is covered with them, and they protect the little artificial plots from the violence of winds and the inundations that frequently happen. At the end of the year the owner ploughs his land with a little plough worthy the primitive times; sometimes drawn by two oxen, but more frequently by two asses. Cotton, wheat, vegetables, and particularly melons, are cultivated with success.

The island supports about half of its population, which numbers 114,000, all Roman Catholics, except about 300 Jews and Turks, and the English: the latter are in a proportion of one in twenty-five to the other inhabitants. Although at first sight Malta is entirely bare, it is not altogether deprived of trees. Fig, lemon, and pomegranate trees grow here and there, half hidden by the walls of the inclosures: neither must the trees be forgotten on which grow the ruddy-coloured fruits known as Maltese oranges; these are said to be the result of a pomegranate grafted on an orange-tree. Without Sicily, the Maltese could not exist; and it is a delightful sight every morning to see the arrival of the speronari—little vessels—in the port, laden with Sicilian roses, fruits from Catania, or snow from Etna. Notwithstanding its barrenness, the Maltese call their island Flora del Mondo, "flower of the world." This affectionate, but somewhat boastful appellation, confirms an observation frequently made, yet difficult to explain; it is, however, certain, that the poorer a country the more is it beloved by its inhabitants. Numerous examples might be quoted in connexion with the wildest mountains of Scotland, of Switzerland, Auvergne, or Limousin, the most arid of the isles of Greece, and the most desolate of the steppes of Bulgaria; but Malta alone would be sufficient, for no place on earth inspires its inhabitants in a higher degree with this inexplicable attachment.

The commerce of Malta is considerable; the average annual amount of imports and exports being 53,000,000 francs, 32,000,000 of which are importations. This amount may be apportioned as follows:—England, 5,000,000; United States, 4,000,000; the two Sicilies, 3,000,000; Austria, 2,000,000; France, 2,000,000 only. Egypt, the Barbary States, the Ionian Islands, Russia, Spain, and Sardinia share the remainder. The industry of Malta consists principally in the preparation of cotton, and the manufacture of a prodigious quantity of cigars: the latter, which are excellent, sell at about five farthings per dozen. England collects 100,000*l.* yearly, in taxes and imposts at Malta, which sum is expended in the services of administration. In exchange, she has founded and continues to support several establishments for the benefit of the population. At the Lyceum, children receive an elementary education gratuitously. The university, long neglected, has been newly organized within the past few years, and the study of natural history facilitated by the establishment of a botanic garden. To confess the truth, however, these institutions have not as yet met with any marked success; education, much neglected in the towns, is still more so in the country. Of the 114,000 inhabitants, scarcely 25,000 know how to read and write.

The temperature at Malta is high, with but little fluctuation. In summer the mercury stands at 85°, seldom above 90°; rain and clouds are so rare as to be phenomenal; the sky is nearly always blue and cloudless. The greater part of the houses, built in the eastern style, open only on an inner court, often filled with flowers. In winter the temperature rarely falls below 50°. A white frost is a thing unknown, and would be looked upon as a public calamity. It is, however, related that one morning at the end of last century, a peasant came in great haste to the city to inform the grand-master that he had seen what his children called an ice candle in his field. The grand-master immediately mounted his horse and set out with his knights to see the phenomenon; but notwithstanding their diligence, before they reached the spot, the ice was melted. But the time of my stay drew to a close: my friend embarked for Italy, on board the Mongibello, and the next day I found myself on board another steamer, sailing in an opposite direction. Malta gradually disappeared behind me as a shadow, and after a pleasant voyage of three days, I forgot my momentary regrets, and uttered a cry of enthusiasm, on seeing for the first time on the horizon the blue mountains of the Peloponnesus.

THE PIMPERNEL.

LITTLE scarlet Pimpernel,
None but thou can tell so well
What the weather-change may be.
None can tell so well as thee,
All the roving one can see,
None so wisely half as thee,
When the welkin vapour's aroud
Telleth thee the passing cloud;
When in East the pallid dawn
Heralds the coming of the morn,

Then with joy thou spreadest out
All thy little flowers about,
Where in holt or upon wold
Smiles thy little eye of gold.
When with clouds the heavens frown,
Then thy little head bends down.
Little weather-prophet, say,
Fair or foul the coming day?
For thy eye on sun above
Is fix'd, like lover on his love,
Like supple courtier on his lord,
Like Parsee on his god adored.
Like kneeling Carib on the sun
Thou gazest till his course is run;
Ever, ever gazing on,
Never musing but of one.
Come what seasons there may be,
Still unchanged thy flower we see.
Like a pennon in the wind,
Fickle as a maiden's mind,
Ever veereth round thy head,
Till in western waves of red
Thy great monarch sinketh down,
Then, too, sinks thy tiny crown.
In thy little flower we see
Type of fix'd mobility.
Winds may blow, as they blow now;
Still for winds what careest thou?
Though with fury raging free
They may shake the giant tree,
Whatsoever be their power,
They will spare the little flower.
E'en the bud that gems the sod,
Overshadow'd is by God.
Little Persian songs of praise
Do thy flow'rets ever raise.
To thy God thou off'rest up
Drops of dew in ruby cup;
And when sinks the king of light,
Thy violet eyes with tears beam bright;
Till the stars, with softer beam,
Like the sun's fair children seem.
Thine upon the meadow ground,
Where thy blossoms most abound;
Or where trailing through the grass,
All thy snake-like sprays do pass.
Little scarlet Pimpernel,
None can tell us half so well
What the coming change shall be.
None but such a one as thee!

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLIGH."

CHAPTER LIII.

LEWIS ATTENDS AN EVENING PARTY, AND NARROWLY ESCAPES BEING "CUT" BY AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.

"Now listen to me, and be good, and sensible, and tractable, for once in your life," exclaimed Laura, when Lewis's agitation had in some degree subsided; "you appear to have acted with more than sufficient self-will and impetuosity all through this affair, and the result has not proved so satisfactory as to justify you in refusing a friend's advice and assistance. Excuse my plain speaking," she continued, with a frank smile which would have thawed the moroseness of the most churlish misanthrope who ever reversed the precepts of Christianity by hating his neighbour; "but I must either say all I think, or be wholly silent. Besides, it is no kindness to hide the truth from you."

"What would you have me do?" returned Lewis, sadly; "believe me, I reproach myself for my past folly more bitterly than you could do were you my worst enemy, instead of the gentle zealous friend you are."*

"I would not have you at present do anything, more especially anything rash," returned Laura, "but simply leave the matter in my hands."

"Promise me—," began Lewis.

"I promise you I will do nothing which can in the smallest degree compromise your honour, or even your pride," returned Laura, with the slightest possible degree of sarcasm in her tone, "beyond this I will promise you nothing; and if you have not sufficient faith to trust my friendship thus far, you are less worthy of it than I have deemed you."

Lewis glanced with mingled surprise and admiration at the animated features of his spirited confidante. Accustomed to Rose's calm, persuasive reasoning, and the half-carnest, half-playful, but wholly-bewitching manners of sweet Annie Grant, Laura's keen wit, and fearless bearing, surprised and pleased, while at the same time they insensibly influenced him. "I will trust you," he said; "you have the strong sense and bold energy of a man's mind, united with all the gentleness and refinement which are woman's especial attributes. I will, and do trust you fully;—but, alas! dear friend," he continued, sorrowfully, "neither you nor any one else can remove the cause of my unhappiness. I will not attempt to deceive you, or myself; despite my best endeavours to forget her, I cannot, and I am miserable;—I, who deemed myself so strong, am powerless to cast this affection from me; and though I despise her for her weak fickleness,—though I scorn her for allowing herself to be contracted to that man of whom I never can bear to think as the brother of your kind-hearted, liberal-minded husband,—I yet love her with the reasonless passion of an idiot."

"You take too gloomy a view of the affair; she may not be so much to blame as you imagine; she may yet prove worthy of your affection," urged Laura.

"Would to heaven it could be so!" exclaimed Lewis, vehemently. "You bid me consider the matter calmly and sensibly," he continued, after a pause; "by doing so I perceive the hopes with which you would fain inspire me, to be unreasonable and delusive. Facts speak for themselves; and as they remain unalterable, so must my grief. Either she cannot return my affection, and is attached to her intended bridegroom, or, loving me, she has, with the most culpable weakness, allowed herself to be persuaded into an engagement with a man every way unworthy of her, to whom she is, to say the least, indifferent; and this, not in consequence of a lengthened persecution, but within twenty-four hours after I have left her, fondly deeming that had fate allowed me to ask her hand, she would not have refused it."

"It is very strange, very unaccountable," returned Laura, musing, "so much so, indeed, that I feel sure we do not yet know the whole truth, and that there must be some way of explaining her conduct satisfactorily."

Lewis shook his head mournfully.

"Farewell," he said; "you will soon be able to judge for yourself, and will find that the view I take of the affair, gloomy as it may appear, is indeed the only true one."

"You will dine with us to-day? Charles particularly wishes it. You must not refuse?—remember, it will be the last time for some weeks that I may have an opportunity of seeing you!" pleaded Laura.

"I do not know why I consent, except that it seems impossible to say no to you," returned Lewis, unable to resist the influence of Laura's sympathetic kindness. "You will find me a dreadful bore," he continued, with a deep sigh, "for your intelligence has completely unmanned me."

"We will take the chance of that," replied Laura, with an incredulous smile; and so, shaking hands, they parted.

The dinner passed off heavily enough. Lewis, despite his efforts to the contrary, appeared out of spirits and distrait. Charles, having been cautioned and tutored, to the utmost extent of female foresight, as to what he was to say, and what to avoid, grew nervous and puzzle-pated; called Laura, Annie, and asked Lewis why he did not send for Miss Grant (meaning his, Lewis's, sister Rose) to live with him and keep his house; by which blunders he provoked his wife to such a degree, that she could have found in her heart to box his ears for him, without the smallest compunction. The arrival of Tarley and the desert produced a marked improvement, that young gentleman being in the highest possible state of health and spirits, and influenced by a strong determination to partake of everything on table, wine included, to ignore all established precedents as to eating jam by the intervention of a spoon, to consider walnuts appropriate missiles to throw at the company generally, and the cut-glass decanters in particular, to set maternal authority at defiance, as evinced by a resolution to pull off his left shoe and imbed it in orange marmalade, and in fact, to do everything which appeared good in his eyes, and naughty in those of his elders, and then and there to make a night of it. These little antics, at first amusing, and secretly patronised and fostered by Charles and Lewis, soon becoming tiresome, and at length unbearable, Laura asserted her prerogative, and not without much kicking and an hysterical affection, which was neither laughing nor crying, but a compound of the two, succeeded in carrying away her unruly offspring. When the gentlemen were left to themselves, Leicester, filling his glass and handing the bottle to Lewis, began—

"Do you mix much with the young men of the place, so as to judge of their political bias at all?"

"I am acquainted with some dozen, or more, young artists, though I do not enter much into their pursuits, from want of inclination; although, at first, they pressed me to belong to their clubs;—I should say, however, judging from their conversation, that democratic principles were rife among them."

"I fear so; indeed, from information we have received, I should not be surprised if some attempt were likely to be made to throw off the Austrian yoke."

"Surely that would be great folly," returned Lewis; "with the troops and resources the Governor, Count Palffy, has at his command, any popular tumult might easily be quelled. It is only from cowardice or inaction on the part of the authorities, that any of these successes in Northern Italy have been achieved."

"Ay, but inaction is just what I fear," rejoined Leicester; "the Austrians will not believe in the amount of popular disaffection which exists; they will go on ignoring the danger, till the moment at which it could be most successfully combated has escaped them. Not that I care very much about the matter; I am neither Trojan nor Tyrian; but I am anxious to gain some certainty as to the chance of a popular outbreak, that I may take measures to provide for the safety of Laura and the child: besides, I think you are aware we have some guests coming to us; had I known this sooner, I should have written to them to postpone their visit till some more favourable opportunity."

"I will investigate the matter," returned Lewis, eagerly, "and will communicate to you any information I may obtain; women should never be exposed to the chance of witnessing the horrors of street warfare."

After conversing on this topic for some minutes longer, the gentlemen, being neither of them addicted to the practice of wine-bibbing, followed Laura to the drawing-room. Lewis appeared silent and depressed, and a gloom hung over the little party, which no effort on the part of the hostess could dispel.

Soon after ten o'clock their guest rose to take leave.

"I shall send Charles to you very often; and, if possible, without attracting attention, I shall occasionally come with him," observed Laura; "so mind, you are not to freeze up again into a marble misanthrope: I consider I have improved you vastly since you have been under my tuition, and I by no means desire to have laboured in vain."

"You have shown me kindness which I may never be able to repay," answered Lewis; "but to prove that I neither forget nor feel ungrateful for it, I will struggle against the faults you so justly reprobate; if I sometimes fail, you must remember that it is difficult to preserve a cheerful, easy manner, with an aching heart, and so pardon me."

Having taken a cordial leave of his host and hostess, and refused Charles's offer of walking home with him, partly because he knew it would be an act of self-denial in his friend to relinquish his wife's society, partly because he wished to be alone,—Lewis quitted the Palazzo Grassini, and strolled on in the direction of his own abode. As he passed under the Piazza of St. Mark, a particularly beautiful effect of moonlight on the opposite buildings struck him, and leaning against one of the columns, he paused to observe it. The place where he was standing was in deep shadow, and to any one approaching from the left his figure was invisible, the massive column effectually concealing it. Having thoroughly fixed in his recollection the appearance which had attracted him, and which he proposed to transfer to canvass, he was about to quit the Piazza, when a figure wrapped in a dark mantle advanced with a quick yet stealthy tread. As the new comer approached the spot where Lewis was stationed, a low whistle pierced the air, and immediately a second figure, also disguised in a dark robe, appeared from behind a pillar which had hitherto concealed him, and, addressing the other, observed,—

"You are late; I have waited for you."

"The delay was unavoidable, Signor," was the reply; "I was forced to wait myself for Paulo, as until I had seen him, I could not bring you the pass-word."

"And what is it?" inquired the first speaker eagerly. The other glanced round with a suspicious air, as he replied, "I Martiri di Coenza."¹

"Good!" was the rejoinder; "and the place of meeting?"

"The great Hall of the Palazzo —iani," naming one of the many ruined palaces which are to be found in Venice.

"Wisely chosen," observed the first speaker, who appeared of a rank superior to that of his companion; "the time of meeting must be at hand?"

"If Vossignoria proceeds thither leisurely, the hour will strike as you reach the appointed rendezvous."

"'Tis well," was the reply. "Now leave me; we had better not be seen together."

The person addressed raised his cap as a token of respect, and turning, hurried from the spot,—his confederate paused a moment as if in deliberation, and then strolled leisurely away in the direction of the Palazzo —iani. Lewis waited till the echoes of his retreating footsteps died away in the distance, then starting in the direction of his own dwelling, he walked with rapid strides till he reached the corner of one of the less frequented streets; having done so, he struck down it, running at a pace which few could have kept up with, till he approached his own house, when he again moderated his speed. Letting himself in with a private key, he entered his sitting-room, took a brace of small pistols from a drawer, loaded them carefully, and concealing them in a breast-pocket, flung a dark cloak over his shoulders, and again quitted the room. His determination was taken. Accident having put him in possession of the time and place of some secret meeting, as well as the pass-word which he doubted not would ensure his admission, his love of adventure occasioned him instantly to resolve to be present at it. The assembly was doubtless of a political nature, and besides gratifying his taste for excitement, he might obtain some information in regard to the probability of a popular insurrection, and thus satisfy Leicester's anxiety for the safety of his wife and child—in which (though Lewis would not own the motive even to himself) might be involved that of Annie Grant. That the expedition he projected was a dangerous one he was well aware, but he trusted to chance and to his own tact and presence of mind to save him from discovery, and in case of these failing him, he possessed the pistols as a last resource. Twenty minutes brisk walking brought him beneath the walls of the Palazzo —iani.

Pausing under the shadow of the building, he waited till he had seen two or three persons, carefully muffled up, proceeding in a particular direction. Conjecturing from their appearance and evident desire to escape observation, that they were bound on the same errand as himself, he followed with a quick but noiseless step the next man who passed. This person walked on rapidly till he reached a small archway; here he stopped and looked round as if to assure himself that he was not followed, when, perceiving Lewis, he seemed embarrassed, and after a moment's deliberation, during which he scrutinised the young artist's figure narrowly, he stationed himself in the centre of the path as if to intercept Lewis's further progress. As he approached, the stranger advanced a step to meet him, observing in Italian,—

"The signor walks late, and chooses a strange path; may I venture to inquire his object in so doing?"

"The same as your own," returned Lewis sternly; adding in a tone of command, "We are too late already, lead the way."

The person thus addressed, in whom, from a slight peculiarity in his accent, Lewis recognised him who had appeared the inferior of the two speakers whose conversation he had overheard in the Piazza of St. Mark, seemed for a moment undecided how to act; and then, either deceived by Lewis's manner, or purposing to postpone any further investigation till he should obtain the assistance of the other conspirators, he passed through the archway, and turning abruptly to the right hand, ran up a flight of stone steps terminated by a low door closely studded with large iron nail heads. Giving a low whistle, some one from within partially opened the door, and the stranger entered, followed by Lewis. The moment he had done so, the door was shut and bolted behind him, and he found himself in total darkness, while at the same instant he felt his arms pinioned by a powerful grasp, while a gruff voice exclaimed,—

"Give the pass-word!"

"I Martiri di Cosenza," replied Lewis firmly.

"Proceed," was the rejoinder, as the grasp was removed from his arms, and the light of a dark-lantern was thrown along the narrow stone passage in which Lewis now found himself. Having traversed this, a second door opened at his approach, a rush of cold air streamed upon him, and he found himself in a large dimly-lighted chamber, in which were assembled somewhere about thirty persons, who were gathered round a long table, at the upper end of which stood a man, who, with his arm extended, and his whole bearing indicative of strong excitement, was addressing the meeting. Drawing the collar of his cloak more over his face, and choosing a spot where the shadow of one of the heavy columns which supported the roof, served in some measure to conceal him, Lewis joined the group. As he did so, the speaker, glancing with flashing eyes round the assembly, exclaimed,—

"We are resolved, then—the cup is full to overflowing,—we will bow no longer beneath the yoke of foreign tyrants. Our brethren in Milan have set us a glorious example,—the accursed Austrian already trembles before their valour. Italy has shaken off her lethargy;—we have only to be true to ourselves and to the glorious cause, and liberty awaits our efforts."

A subdued murmur of consent and approbation ran through the assembly, and the speaker continued:—

"Thus agreed, then, it only remains for us to act, and our first duty is to succour those who have suffered for our sakes. Those heroes, those friends of the Venetian people, Daniel Manin and Niccolo Tommaseo, languish in an unjust imprisonment; we will demand their liberation, and that with a voice that shall force the tyrants to listen—the voice of an awakened and indignant nation."

As the speaker ceased, amidst a subdued buzz of approbation, a man in the dress of an artisan arose, and rolling his fierce bloodshot eyes around the assembly, exclaimed:—

"Yes, brothers, we will liberate our brave compatriots—Manin and Tommaseo shall be set free to aid in the struggle for our liberty; but we must do more, Venice must rise and cast out these foreign butchers. A blow must be dealt which shall strike terror into their coward hearts; a blow which shall prove to them the fate they may expect, if they dare to oppress and withstand a people struggling for their freedom.—And on whom can it so justly fall as on the arch-tyrant, sold hand and soul to Austria, thirsting only for vengeance and for murder—the base persecutor Marinovich?"

He paused; there was a moment's silence, and then a low whisper went round the assembly, "Death to Marinovich!" There was again a pause, and then men began to communicate with one another in deep muttered tones. After a short interval the first speaker, who had been writing rapidly, arose, and again addressing them, said:—

"We are, then, agreed; and our first act shall be the liberation of Manin and Tommaseo. It is time that we disperse as silently and cautiously as may be; we must creep now that we may soar hereafter."

In order not to interrupt the thread of our narrative, we have described the proceedings as they occurred;—we must now revert to Lewis. During the delivery of the first speech he observed that the man who had addressed him as he entered, and who appeared a tall, muscular young fellow, had contrived to place himself by his side; and was regarding him from time to time with looks of mistrust and suspicion. At the proposal for the assassination of Colonel Marinovich, the Commandant at the Arsenal, a man who, though a strict disciplinarian, Lewis knew by report to be a brave and gallant officer, he had been unable to repress some slight sign of disapprobation. As he did so he perceived a scowl pass across the features of his watcher, who took the opportunity of drawing yet nearer to him, while an accidental movement revealed the unpleasant fact that he held in his hand a naked stiletto. As the president ended his final address, Lewis, who had kept his eye fixed on the features of his dangerous neighbour, felt convinced that the man only awaited the termination of the business proceedings, to denounce him to his fellow-conspirators. With his usual coolness and decision in moments of danger, Lewis saw that his only chance of safety lay in taking the initiative; accordingly, catching the man's eye, he fixed on him a piercing glance, as he said in a stern whisper—

"The first word you utter aloud, you are a dead man;" at the same moment he presented the muzzle of a pistol within an inch of his ear. The man started slightly, and attempted to increase the distance between them, but Lewis laid an iron grasp on his collar, and detained him; he then stood for a moment irresolute, at length he said, in the same low whisper,—

"You are an Austrian spy."

"I am not," returned Lewis; "I am an Englishman."

The other again started, regarded him fixedly, and then resumed,—

"Swear by all you hold sacred never to reveal that which you have learned to-night."

"I will swear nothing, except to blow out your brains if you attempt to speak, or move, without my permission," was the stern, uncompromising rejoinder.

The stranger's lip quivered, and his grasp tightened on the stiletto, but he caught the glance of Lewis's flashing eyes, and felt that he was in earnest, and that his life hung upon a thread. The members of the secret association were, by this time, noiselessly gliding away in parties of two and three, and Lewis, fearing if he remained too long he might attract the attention of the president, who still continued writing at the table, determined to depart; accordingly, he said in a low whisper,—

"Now we will go—precede me; but if I observe you attempt, by word or sign, to betray me, that moment I shoot you like a dog."

The stranger, who seemed by this time sullenly to have resigned himself to his fate, or, possibly, to be reserving his strength for the execution of some scheme which he had devised for the future, obeyed in silence, and left the vault, closely followed by Lewis, who still retained a firm grasp of the other's collar, although the ample folds of his cloak prevented the fact from being observed. In this manner they reached the door at the top of the stairs, and here were stationed two brawny-limbed, ruffianly-looking fellows, who acted in the double capacity of porter and sentry. Their attention, however, appeared solely directed to prevent the intrusion of any unwelcome visitant, the advisability of refusing egress to any one who had already passed their scrutiny never seeming to occur to them. This Lewis felt to be the deciding moment of his fate; once outside the gate he would be in comparative safety. Pressing the muzzle of the pistol against the back of his companion's neck by way of a gentle hint, he muttered, "Remember!"

The young man shuddered slightly as the cold iron touched him, but made no reply. As they reached the gateway, the janitor stationed on the left side, addressing Lewis's companion, made some inquiry in a low voice. Glancing round appealingly as if to indicate that he was forced, even for their common safety, to reply, he spoke a few words in a dialect Lewis did not comprehend, when the gate-keeper respectfully held the wicket open, and they passed out. And now once again Lewis felt that he was a free man, and he inwardly congratulated himself on having escaped so great peril, which congratulations were, as the event proved, somewhat premature.

Having descended the steps, Lewis loosened his hold on the stranger's collar, saying carelessly, as he replaced his pistol in his breast,—

"There, young gentleman; thanks to your prudence, and my precaution of bringing a brace of pistols with me, I have drawn my head out of the lion's mouth without having it bitten off for my pains. But now I want to have a little serious conversation with you."

"Wait till we are further from the Palazzo—iani, then," was the reply, in a voice that yet trembled from excitement, or some other deep emotion; "we may be overheard; keep more in the shade of the buildings."

Suspecting no treachery, Lewis complied; scarcely had he done so, however, when he fancied he heard a stealthy footstep following him, and turning abruptly, found himself face to face with a tall savage-looking ruffian, who, armed with a naked stiletto, was evidently meditating mischief. Confused by his sudden motion, the fellow stood for a moment irresolute;—not so his intended victim. The path along which he had been proceeding, followed the course of one of the smaller ris or canals by which Venice is in so many directions intersected. Availing himself of this circumstance, Lewis rolled his cloak round his arm, and sprang upon his assailant, parrying, with the shield thus constituted, a hasty and ineffectual stab which the other made at him. Foiled in his attempt, the ruffian drew back to avoid Lewis's onset, thereby incautiously approaching too near the bank of the canal. His antagonist was not slow to perceive the opportunity thus afforded him. Following up his retreating foe so as to prevent him from turning to perceive his danger, he waited till the man reached the brink of the canal, then stretching out his foot, he tripped him up, and parrying a second stab as he had done the former one, pushed him over the bank, which at that part was somewhat steep. A heavy fall and a loud splash in the water announced that his stratagem had succeeded, but at the same moment he felt his throat compressed by a powerful grasp, a naked stiletto flashed before him, and the eyes of the young conspirator, burning with hatred and revenge, glared at him through the darkness with the ferocity of those of some savage animal. Up to this point Lewis's courage and self-possession had never for a moment failed him, but now a strange wild idea occurred to him, and a horrible dread suddenly overwhelmed him: his senses reeled, his limbs trembled, and for the first time in his life he experienced the mental agony of fear. Instinctively he seized the uplifted wrist of his assailant, and gazed with starting eye-balls at his face, on which the cold moonlight streamed. Yes! there could be no doubt; in the features of the being with whom he was engaged in deadly conflict, he recognised a dark, shadowy, but most unmistakeable resemblance to Hardy the poacher. Was it incipient madness, or was he thus horribly to be convinced of the reality of tales which he had hitherto deemed the mere drivellings of superstition?—could the dead indeed rise from their graves to seek vengeance on their slayers?

As these thoughts flashed meteor-like through his brain, his antagonist made a violent but ineffectual effort to free his wrist, and this action in great measure restored Lewis's self-possession. Ghosts had not thews and sinews, and even in that moment of peril, a flush of shame at his childish terror spread over his brow, and the impulse seemed to lend redoubled vigour to his frame. Consequently the struggle, though severe, was short. Superior in strength to his assailant, Lewis, having succeeded in wresting the dagger from his grasp, hurled it into the canal, leaving him completely unarmed, and at his mercy. The stranger was the first to speak. Folding his arms across his breast with an air of dogged resolution, he said, speaking for the first time in English, and without the slightest foreign accent,—

"You were wrong to throw away that weapon; it would have done your work as effectually and more silently than the pistol."

"You consider your life as forfeit, then?" inquired Lewis.

"I expect you to do by me as I would have done by you," was the concise reply.

"I am no assassin," returned Lewis, coldly; "and that reminds me of your worthy associate. You engaged my attention, so that I am ignorant whether he sank or swam."

"Never fear for honest Jacopo," was the answer; "he follows the calling of a gondolier, when his stiletto is not in requisition, and can swim like a fish. Look yonder; he has gained the shore, and is even now watching us."

As he spoke, Lewis observed a tall figure crouching under a projecting portion of the bank of the canal.

"He will not molest you further," continued his late antagonist; "once foiled in his spring, like the tiger, he will not renew the attack. Had he slain you I should have paid him five zwanzigers; as it is, the poor fellow will only get his ducking for his pains."

"Why did he follow us?" asked Lewis.

"As you entered, I gave him a hint not to let you pass on your return; had he attempted to stop you, however, I believed you would shoot me, therefore, thinking I could obtain your death or capture without losing my own life, I gave him a glance by which he knew he was not to interrupt you. He then asked me in the thieves' patois of this place, what he was to do, and I told him to follow us, as you were a spy. You know the rest."

Lewis paused for a moment, and then said abruptly, "You are an Englishman?"

"I am."

"You will accompany me to my rooms," rejoined Lewis, "I would question you further."

"For what purpose?"

"That you will learn at the fitting time," returned Lewis.

"What if I refuse?"

"I will summon the police, and if you attempt to escape, I will shoot you through the head," was the stern rejoinder.

"I will go with you," replied the stranger; "but I warn you I will not be arrested—my liberty is dear to me, my life I hold cheap—so cheap that even now, unarmed as I am, and unequal to you in muscular strength, I am tempted again to rush on you and try the chances of a death-struggle."

"I would advise you not to do so," returned Lewis, calmly; "besides," he added, "I may be more disposed to befriend you than you are aware of—it is with no hostile purpose I thus force you to accompany me, believe me."

"I will trust you," was the reply. "Your looks and words have, I know not why, a strange power over me—you must possess the gift of the Malocchio, which these Italians believe in—it was your glance, far more than your pistol, which kept me silent in the chamber of meeting."

During almost the whole of this conversation they had been walking side by side in the direction of the street in which Lewis's studio was situated, and in another five minutes they reached it.

"Have I your word of honour that you will not again attempt my life or seek to escape till our interview is concluded?" asked Lewis.

"You have," was the concise reply.

"Follow me, then," continued Lewis; and drawing a key from his pocket he unfastened the door, entered, closed it again, and accompanied by the stranger led the way through the painting-room into his study:—removing his hat and cloak, he signed to his companion to follow his example. As the other complied with his request, Lewis, having lighted a powerful lamp by the aid of which he was accustomed to paint at night, was enabled to take a more particular survey of his new acquaintance than circumstances had yet permitted. He was a tall, powerfully-built stripling, with a dark complexion and handsome features, but although he could scarcely have numbered twenty years, his face wore a prematurely old expression, and there was a wild, reckless look in his eyes which told of a spirit ill at ease. He wore a sailor's dress, though the materials of which it was composed were of a finer quality than ordinary; he coldly refused the chair which Lewis offered him, and folding his arms across his breast waited to be questioned. Lewis in the mean time took his seat at the table, placed the pistols on the desk before him, and fixing his piercing glance on the face of his captive began:—

“My knowledge of you is this—I find you an active and zealous member of a conspiracy to overthrow the Austrian Government in this city—one of a set of conspirators whose first act is to be the assassination of Colonel ~~Marinovich~~ Marinovich, commandant of the Arsenal. As far as I am concerned, you first resolved to denounce me to your associates as a spy; foiled in that attempt, you incite an accomplice to murder me, and on his failure, use your best endeavours to stab me yourself; in the struggle I disarm you, and you find yourself in the power of the man for whose blood you have been thirsting. Even allowing, for the sake of argument, that you were justified in seeking the life of one who might betray your treasonous designs, you still remain the convicted conspirator, and my natural course would be to hand you over to the police; for your threat of never being taken alive is absurd, since, having lost your stiletto, I could have captured you at any moment I pleased; however, the fact of your being an Englishman interests me in your behalf, and if you will answer my questions frankly and truly, I may be induced to let you off. In the first place tell me who you are, and enough of your former life to enable me to understand how I find you thus plotting with foreigners with whom you can have no feelings in common, for an evil purpose.”

“I can soon satisfy you, if that is all you require,” was the reply. “My life has from its commencement been a curse to myself and to others. Wrong has produced wrong; I was badly brought up, and I have turned out badly; I am not the first that has done so, nor shall I be the last. At the age when most children are carefully trained to good, I was as sedulously instructed in evil. At twelve years old, I could swear, game, and drink, and my instructors laughed to see the boy aping the vices of the man. My mother died in giving me birth; my father, I know not why, never loved me: he used me harshly, and I hated him for it: so I left my home, and worked for four years on board a man-of-war. At the end of that time, the ship was paid off. Seeking pleasure, I fell into vicious company; squandered, and was robbed of my pay, and for some weeks I wandered a houseless beggar through London streets. The chance kindness of a stranger rescued me from that state of wretchedness”—a peculiar expression flitted across the features of his auditor as he mentioned the fact of his rescue from beggary; not observing it, he continued,—“I then entered the merchant-service, and speedily rose to the rank of mate. The misery I had undergone rendered me more careful. I saved money; studied my profession; and hoped in time to become a captain of a merchant-man. I embarked the whole of my savings in a trading speculation, which would more than have doubled them, when the ship containing my property was wrecked. I was picked up by a vessel bound to this port, and was landed here again a beggar; and after trying in vain to procure any better situation, I have been forced to work in the arsenal as a common labourer to save myself from starvation. But even there my ill-fortune and the cruelty and injustice of men followed me. Peculation to a great extent was discovered amongst the workmen; I was examined before Colonel Marinovich; in vain I protested my innocence. God knows I have committed sins enough; but thieving and lying were never among them. However, I was condemned to receive forty lashes. Yes, sir; I, an Englishman, innocent of the crime of which I was accused, was beaten like a slave by the orders of a tyrannical foreigner; and now, perhaps, you can tell what took me to the meeting to-night? It was the hope of revenge, and there were others there with the same deadly purpose. The man who proposed the assassination of Marinovich was innocent as myself, and like me had smarted beneath the tyrant's lash. You by revealing this plot threatened to cheat us of our just revenge, and for that reason I would have sacrificed your life. And now you know my history, what will you do with me?”

There was a moment's pause ere Lewis, fixing his eyes on him with a clear penetrating glance, said, slowly and impressively, “There are a few minor particulars which appear to have escaped your memory; I will try to supply the deficiency. You were born in the village of B—, in H—shire. Your early instructors in evil were the worthless characters who accompanied your father on his poaching expeditions. You left home because in a drunken mood your father struck you, and would not confess afterwards that he was sorry for so doing. You would have run away sooner, but for your affection for your sister Jane. The stranger who rescued you from beggary was a young man who met you by chance at the door of a house in — Street, Russell Square, you begged of him in Italian; the merchant-ship in which you served, to whose commander he gave you an introduction, was the ‘Beauty,’ of Southsea, Captain Singleton, and your own name is Miles Hardy. Am I not correct in these particulars?”

When Lewis began speaking, his companion's attention became riveted. As he proceeded, his surprise grew deeper and deeper; but when he mentioned his name, he sprang forward, and, regarding him with wildly gleaming eyes, exclaimed, “Tell me, what are you? man or devil? who thus know every secret of my life.”

“I am no devil,” returned Lewis, smiling, “but a mortal like yourself; you have seen me before; look well at me; do you not recognise me?”

Thus appealed to, the young man carefully scanned his features, and then, in a low, hesitating voice, rejoined, "You are, or I am much mistaken, the gentleman who rescued me from beggary."

"You are right," was the reply; "we are both much changed since that night, but I knew you at the moment you seized me by the throat."

"Thank God, I did not succeed in taking your life!" exclaimed Miles Hardy, passionately; "you are almost the only person who has ever shown me disinterested kindness; and how have I sought to repay it! Oh, sir; can you forgive me?"

"The simple fact that you did not recognise me exonerates you from the charge of ingratitude, my poor boy," returned Lewis, kindly; "but now sit down. Ere I can explain to you how I gained the knowledge which has so much surprised you, you have a long tale to listen to, and one which will cause you much sorrow. You turn pale; wait, I will get you a glass of wine."

"It is nothing," was the reply; "I have fasted long; it will pass away in a moment;" but as he spoke he sank heavily into a chair which stood beside him.

Lewis produced from a cupboard food and wine, and placing them before him, he induced him to partake of some refreshment, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing the light return to his eye, and the colour to his cheek. Lewis then filled for himself a glass of wine, replenished that of his companion, and seating himself, hastened to relate to Miles Hardy the strange train of events by means of which he had become acquainted with so large a portion of the young man's history.

CHAPTER LIV.

WALTER SEES A GHOST!

THE feelings with which Miles Hardy listened to the account of his unhappy father's career, and the mingled grief and anger with which he heard how the heritage of his mother's shame had descended to his unfortunate sister, may easily be imagined. Lewis strove with an amount of patient kindness, for which those who only knew the fiery side of his character would scarcely have given him credit, to soothe the passionate emotions which his tale excited in an auditor so nearly concerned in the fortunes of those to whom it related. After long perseverance his efforts were in some degree crowned with success—Miles became more calm, and agreed with Lewis that his first duty was to seek for, and endeavour to reclaim, his sister. His share of the legacy would furnish him with funds sufficient to enable him to live without the necessity of daily labour, and until his right to the money should be established, Lewis insisted on becoming his banker. The next question was not so easily arranged—Lewis informed Miles that in regard to the events of the evening he had arrived at the following determination, viz. to call on Colonel Marinovich, make him acquainted with the plot against his life, beg him to inform his superiors that such a conspiracy was on foot, and explain the manner in which he had become aware of its existence—but as far as Miles was concerned in the affair, he would promise to preserve a total silence, on one condition; namely, that he, Miles, should withdraw from the conspiracy and engage to keep the peace in regard to the commandant of the Arsenal. To this proposition the young man demurred.

"What," he said, "give up my just revenge!—submit to undeserved chastisement like a beaten hound, and leave it to less tame and slavish spirits to punish the tyrant for his cruelty!—allow them to meet the danger and divide the glory, while I stand by inactive! Never!"

"Believe me, Miles," returned Lewis, earnestly, "revenge, even just revenge, partakes of the nature of sin, and brings upon him who obtains it the curse of an upbraiding conscience. But yours is not a just revenge; you have suffered wrong, and the sense of this blinds your judgment. I know by report the character of this Marinovich; I know him to be a just and honourable man, though a stern disciplinarian—great abuses had existed at the Arsenal, and it was in order to reform them that the command was bestowed on him; in your individual case he has acted unjustly, but in all probability, appearances were strongly against you, and he had not sufficient personal acquaintance with you to know that amongst such inveterate liars as are the majority of the lower order of Venetians, your word might be relied on—his only fault is, therefore, that he committed an error in judgment, and would you on this account take a man's life? Besides, conniving at assassination is a cowardly proceeding, unworthy any Englishman, and especially a brave young fellow like yourself."

It was evident that Lewis's reasoning was not without its effect on him whom he addressed, for his brow contracted, his fingers closed and relaxed, his mouth quivered convulsively, and his whole demeanour was that of a person struggling against some powerful temptation. At length he exclaimed abruptly—

"I know not how it is, you sway me like a child. I had resolved not to rest till that man had died, but I never before saw the matter in the light in which you have now placed it. I believed that his death would be an act of justice, and considered, that in order to obtain it, we must take the law into our own hands—but I feel the truth of what you say, that assassination is cowardly; I felt it when Jacopo was dogging your footsteps, and but for the cause that was at stake, could have found in my heart to warn you."

"Then you will agree to my proposal?" inquired Lewis.

"Yes, I will agree to withdraw from the conspiracy, but it is at the risk of my life that I do so; if I am found in Venice after my desertion is known, I am a dead man. Moreover, I will promise you to abstain from secretly attempting Marinovich's life; but if I should ever meet him face to face, and hand to hand, I will teach him to remember having flogged an Englishman."

Lewis felt that in his new character of Mentor he ought to combat this openly declared resolution, but he abstained from doing so, partly because he felt it would be useless, and partly because he sympathised so completely in the sentiment, that he could not muster sufficient hypocrisy to reprove it. Accordingly he remained satisfied with the concession he had gained, and furnishing Miles with all the information he possessed in regard to his sister, which was but vague and unsatisfactory, (a rumour that she had passed some time in Rome, on her first arrival in that country, being the only trace he had yet been able to discover of her proceedings.) Lewis gave him an introduction to an agent whom he had employed to gain further tidings, and forcing a sum of money upon him more than sufficient to defray his expenses, hastened his departure, ere the brilliant rays of an Italian sun had spread the lustre of the coming day throughout the picturesque old streets and palace-crowned squares of Venice.

On the following morning, Lewis fulfilled his intention of calling on Colonel Marinovich, who heard his recital in silence, and when he had concluded, thanked him for his information, said he was aware great disaffection existed amongst the men employed at the Arsenal, and that energetic measures must be taken to prevent its spreading further. Promised to report the discovery of the secret meeting to the governor, took down Lewis's address, and politely bowed him out.

Having despatched a note to Charles Leicester, telling him he wished to see him, Lewis debated with himself how much of the previous night's adventure he should reveal to him, and at length decided that it would be more prudent to avoid mentioning his encounter with, and recognition of Miles Hardy, as although he had refused to reveal to him the name of the seducer of his sister, yet any reference to an affair in which Lord Bellefield had so singularly misconducted himself must necessarily be painful to Leicester. Moreover, although in his dealings with Miles Hardy, Lewis had acted justly according to the best of his judgment, he was by no means clear that the law might take the same view of the matter. Charley listened to his friend's account—yawned—wondered why he had such a strange predilection for putting his life in danger, prophesying that he would do it once too often and be sorry for it afterwards—expected there would be a shindy in Venice before long—wished Laura and the brat were safe in England, and that the other people were not coming—voted it all an awful bore—asked Lewis whether he liked foreign tailoring, into the merits and demerits whereof he entered at some length—yawned again, and patting him affectionately on the back, told him to take better care of himself for the future, and lounged carelessly out of the studio.

A week passed away. The Grant party had arrived;

Annie, although she made a great effort to appear in her former spirits, was evidently labouring under some ailment, mental or bodily, or both combined, which was wearing away her youth, and changing her whole character. Laura, who watched her closely, observed that she was unusually silent and abstracted, falling into long reveries, from which she would awake with a start, and glancing round with a half-frightened air, would immediately begin talking in an unnaturally excited manner, as if to do away with any suspicion to which her silence might have given rise. Her temper also, which had been remarkable for its sweetness, had now become uncertain, and she occasionally answered even the General with a wayward captiousness, which surprised Laura only one degree less than the preternatural meekness, with which that gallant officer submitted to her caprices and indulged her every whim; but the fact was, General Grant had sufficient acuteness to perceive, that for some cause, utterly beyond the scope of his philosophy to account for, his daughter was not the quiet, gentle, will-less creature she had been, and that if he required her to yield to him in great matters, he must allow her to rule in small. Moreover, he had lately become seriously alarmed about her health; a London physician, whom he had consulted on the subject, having plainly told him, unless great caution was observed she would go into a decline, and warned him that the seat of the disease appeared to be in the mind, and that anything like harshness or opposition should be avoided. Walter, too, was much changed during the two years which had elapsed. In appearance, he was now a young man, tall, and slightly, but gracefully formed, with well-cut regular features, though a want of intellectual expression marred what might otherwise have been considered a handsome countenance. But, considerable as was the alteration in his personal appearance, the change in his mental capacity was equally perceivable; his powers of mind had developed to a greater degree than had been anticipated, but alas! deprived of Lewis's firm, yet gentle rule, the improvement in his disposition had by no means kept pace with the extension of his faculties. For some weeks after Lewis had quitted Broadhurst, poor Walter could not be persuaded but that he would come back again, nor was it till the arrival of a tutor, recommended by Lord Bellefield, that he fully realized the fact of his friend having left him never to return. The first effect this conviction produced upon him, was a fit of deep dejection; he refused all attempts at consolation, could scarcely be persuaded to take nourishment, and sat hour after hour playing listlessly with the wavy curls of Faust's shaggy coat. At length, in order to rouse him, General Grant desired the dog to be taken away from him; the remedy proved only too effectual. The new tutor, a certain Mr. Spooner, who appeared as if he had been selected because he was in every respect the exact reverse of Lewis, was the person to whom the General entrusted this commission.

Absorbed in his own sad thoughts, Walter allowed him to coax the dog from his side by the attraction of a plate of meat, but when he laid his hand on the animal to buckle a collar and chain round his neck, he started up, exclaiming,—

"What are you going to do with Faust? he is never tied up; let him alone." Finding that his remonstrance was not attended to, he continued, "Faust! Faust! come here, sir, directly."

The dog struggled to obey, but Mr. Spooner, having fastened the chain round his neck, endeavoured to force him out of the room, and in doing so, stepped accidentally on Faust's toes, who uttered a shrill yelp of pain. Walter's eyes flashed—

"You are hurting him," he cried; "how dare you!" and without waiting for a reply, he darted across the room, seized the astonished Mr. Spooner, who, unfortunately, happened to be a small, slightly-framed man, by the throat, and shook him till his teeth chattered; then suddenly releasing him, he snatched the chain from his grasp, and leading the dog away, muttered in a threatening tone,

"Never you touch Faust again; if you do, I'll strangle you."

The results of this scene were twofold: Walter had rebelled and gained his point, and the person whom he had thus conquered had lost all chance of obtaining that degree of ascendancy over him, without which his control must become merely nominal. This produced, as might be expected, the worst possible effect upon poor Walter's disposition. He became wilful in the extreme, and his tutor, partly to save himself trouble, partly to avoid any outbreak of temper, gave way to him, on every occasion; unless, indeed, he had any particular personal interest at stake, when he sought to gain his point by cajolery and manoeuvring, and being rather an adept in those ingenious arts, was usually successful.

One new and inconvenient caprice of Walter's was, a dislike which he appeared suddenly to have taken to Annie Grant, and which displayed itself in various ways: sometimes he would avoid all intercourse with her, even sulkily refusing to answer her when she spoke to him; at others he would seek her out and endeavour to annoy her by saying what he deemed sharp things to her. Occasionally, however, he would fall into his old habits, and confide in her as his playmate, from whom he was sure of sympathy and assistance; when suddenly, perhaps, even in the midst of some conversation with her, he would appear to recollect his new-born animosity, and his manner would entirely alter. One thing invariably excited his extreme indignation, and this was any attempt on her part to caress or notice Faust. The pain this altered demeanour caused Annie (perhaps in consequence of some theory which she had formed as to its origin), was known but to her own heart, and could be guessed at merely by her unwearying efforts to conciliate poor Walter. Laura, upon whose quick-sightedness nothing was lost, carefully noted these changes, and made her own private comments upon them. In pursuance of her design of befriending Lewis, she made several attempts to penetrate the veil of reserve which hung around Annie Grant; but in vain: with her lightness of heart seemed also to have departed her openness of disposition, and Laura had too much good taste, as well as too much sympathy with her grief, to endeavour to force her confidence. At length one day, as Laura and Annie were sitting together, Laura working zealously at some article of juvenile finery, destined unconsciously to foster the seeds of incipient dandyism already apparent in that embryo man-about-town "Tarley," and Annie listlessly turning over the pages of a novel, from which her thoughts were far away, the elder lady suddenly broke silence, by observing,

"Tarley will be two years old to-morrow; how the time slips away, it really seems impossible!"

Annie's only reply was a deep sigh, and Laura continued—

"Why, Annie, you'll be of age in a month—four short weeks more, and you will actually have arrived at years of discretion. How wise you ought to be!"

Finding Annie still remained silent, Laura only waited till she had passed some interesting crisis in her stitching, and then looked up. To her alarm and surprise, she beheld the "big tears" silently coursing each other down her friend's pale cheeks: in an instant she was by her side,—

"Annie, dearest," she said, "you are weeping; what is it? Have I said or done anything to pain you?"

Annie slightly shook her head, in token of dissent; and made an effort to check her tears, which proving ineffectual, eventuated in a bitter sob. Laura could not stand the sight of her grief; throwing her arms round her, she said,—

"Annie, you are miserable; I see, I know you are; and your unhappiness is wearing you to death. Why will you not confide in me? Perhaps I might help you. What is it, darling? will you not tell me?"

She paused for a reply, but obtaining none, continued, "This marriage with Lord Bellefield, it is distasteful to you, I am afraid?"

A shudder, which passed through poor Annie's frame, as Laura mentioned the name of her intended husband, proved that on this point her suspicions had not erred. Fancying she now saw her way more clearly,—

"Dearest," she resumed, "do not afflict yourself thus; you must not, shall not marry him. I will speak to the General myself. Charles shall write to his brother; you shall not be sacrificed."

"Hush! hush!" interrupted Annie, struggling to recover composure; "you do not know what you say. I must marry him; there is no alternative."

"Do not say so, Annie," returned Laura, gravely; "marriage is a sacred thing, not lightly to be entered into; and in marriage one requisite alone is indispensable—love! Tastes may differ, faults of temper or disposition may exist; yet if man and wife truly love each other, they will be very happy; but to marry without love is grievous sin, and it entails its own punishment—wretchedness.”

Laura spoke solemnly, and with feeling; and Annie, as she listened, trembled and turned pale. When she had concluded, however, Annie merely shook her head, repeating hopelessly—

“It must be—it must be!”

“And pray, why must it be?” asked Laura, quickly; for she was becoming slightly provoked at that which she deemed Annie’s childish weakness; the only fault, perhaps, with which her clear head, warm heart, and earnest zealous nature, unfitted her to sympathise—

“Why, if the thing is wrong in itself, and is to render you miserable, must it be? At all events, let us make some efforts to prevent it; suffer Charles and me—”

“Dearest Laura,” interrupted Annie, mournfully, “I assure you nothing can be done; any attempt to break off the match now would be unavailing, and end in making me still more wretched than I am at present.”

Annoyed alike at her perseverance in that which Laura could not but consider a culpable want of moral courage, and at the way in which she still withheld her confidence, while at the same time the idea occurred to her, though she was vexed with herself for admitting it, that one so feeble-minded was no fitting bride for the high-souled brave-hearted Lewis, the spirited little matron was about to utter a somewhat sharp reply, when, glancing at Annie’s pale beautifully-formed features, the expression of deep anguish she read there disarmed her, and merely saying, “We take different views of this matter, Annie, dear, and must talk of it again when we are both more composed,” she rose and left the apartment.

Annie waited until the sound of the closing door assured her that she was alone, and then murmuring, “She too is angry with me, and despises me—nobody loves me; oh, that I were dead!” she hid her face in the sofa cushion, and gave way to a passionate burst of grief.

Now, there is one of our dramatic personæ for whom we have reason to believe many of our readers entertain a warm regard, a regard in which we confess ourselves fully to participate, of whom we have lately heard but little—of course, we refer to that most “meritorious individual,” that dog of dogs, dear, honest old Faust. Since Lewis had quitted Broadhurst, Faust’s character, like those of his betters, (if mortals are better than dogs,) had in a degree altered. The blind unhesitating obedience he had been accustomed to pay to his master’s slightest signal, he accorded to no other person; if Walter called him, he would come, it is true, but he would do so in the calm, leisurely, dignified manner in which one gentleman would comply with the request of another; towards the General he conducted himself with a degree of respectful hauteur, which seemed to say, “We are not friends, there is no sympathy between us, but as long as I continue to reside in a family of which you are the head, I owe it to myself to render you the amount of courtesy due to your position.” For Mr.

Spooner, the usurper, who had dared to succeed his beloved master, he showed a most unmitigated contempt, utterly ignoring all his commands, and resenting any attempt on his part to enforce his authority by the utterance of a low deep growl, accompanied by a formidable display of sharp white teeth. Towards Annie alone did he evince any great affection, which he showed chiefly by attending her in her walks, and taking up his position under the sofa, or close to the chair on which she was sitting—demonstrations of attachment which, as we have already hinted, were, for some unexplained reason, a source of considerable annoyance to Walter. During the conversation between Laura and Annie, Faust had been lying unnoticed under the sofa, and now finding his young mistress alone, and for some cause or other unhappy, (he knew that quite well,) it occurred to him that the correct thing would be to come out and comfort her, which he attempted to do by laying his great rough head in her lap, wagging his tail encouragingly, and licking her hand. In her loneliness of heart, even the poor dog’s sympathy (endeared as he was to her by a thousand cherished recollections) was a relief to Annie, and stooping down she imprinted a kiss on his shaggy head, whispering as she did so, “Good Faust,—you have never forsaken me!” At this moment the door opened, and Walter entered hastily. As his eye fell upon Annie and the dog, his cheeks flushed, and he exclaimed lustily,— “Annie, I wish you’d let Faust alone; how often have I told you that I won’t have him meddled with!”

With a start at this sudden interruption, Annie hastily raised herself, and pushing the dog gently from her, said,—

“Dear Walter, do not be angry; Faust came and licked my hand, you would not have me unkind to him?”

“Oh! it’s Faust’s fault, is it?” returned Walter crossly. “Faust, come here! Take him to our room, Mr. Spooner, and keep him there till I come; he shall not stay in the drawing-room if he is naughty. Faust, do you hear me, sir?”

“He will never follow me, Sir Walter; it’s no use calling him,” remonstrated Mr. Spooner.

“He will do as I tell him, and so will you too,” returned Walter, imperiously, and twisting his handkerchief, he tied it round the dog’s neck, led him to the door, gave the end of the leash thus formed to Mr. Spooner, and then fairly turned the pair of them out of the room; having accomplished this feat, he strolled listlessly to the fireplace, and amused himself by pulling about the ornaments on the chimney-piece for some minutes. At length a new idea seemed to strike him, and turning to his companion he said,

“Do you know why I was so angry with Faust just now?”

“Because I was petting him, I suppose, as you don’t seem to like me to do so,” returned Annie.

“Ah! that was not all, though,” rejoined Walter; “I wanted him particularly to have been with me when I was out walking to-day, very particularly.”

"Yes, and why was that?" inquired Annie, who always encouraged him to talk to her, in the hope of overcoming the dislike which he had taken to her, and which, for many reasons, pained her inexpressibly. Walter remained for a minute or two silent, and then coming close to her, he asked in a low whisper,

"Annie, do you believe in ghosts?"

"My dear Walter, what an odd question," returned Annie, in surprise; "why do you ask it?"

Walter glanced carefully round the room, to assure himself that they were alone, ere he replied, in the same low awe-stricken whisper, "Because, if there are such things, I think I've seen one."

"Silly boy," rejoined Annie, anxious to re-assure him, for she saw that he was really frightened; "you have fancied it—What was your ghost like, pray?"

"Promise you won't tell anybody."

Annie, half amused, half puzzled by the boy's earnestness, gave the required pledge; as soon as she had done so, Walter, stooping down so as to bring his mouth on a level with her ear, replied,—

"It was the ghost of Mr. Arundel!"

Overcome by so unexpected a reply, Annie was a moment or so before she could find words to inquire, "My dear Walter, what could make you imagine such a thing? Perhaps you were asleep, and dreamed it—when was it?"

"No, I was not asleep; and it was not fancy," returned Walter, gravely; "I was out walking this morning early with Mr. Spooner, and we lost our way, and after trying for some time to find it, Mr. Spooner hired a boat, and told the boatman to set us down near—near—well I forget, but he meant near here. When we got out, we had to go through some narrow passages between the different streets, and in one of them, which was very dark because of the high houses, we met a figure of a man, very tall and wrapped in a long black cloak; it drew back to let us pass, and just as I got close to it, it turned its head, and I saw the face; it was stern and dark, and wore a black beard, but the beautiful eyes were the same, and when I saw them I knew it was Mr. Arundel, or," he added, sinking his voice, "his ghost!"

As his companion remained silent, he continued, "When I saw who it was, I stopped and was just going to speak, but at that moment he stared hard at me, gave a violent start, and before I could do anything to prevent it, vanished through a dark archway."

"Oh! you must have mistaken some one for him," returned Annie, struggling for composure—"Mr. Arundel is probably in England, and ghosts are out of the question; besides, if there are such things, which I much doubt, they only appear after people are dead."

Walter considered for a minute, and then met the difficulty by consolatorily suggesting, "Perhaps dear Mr. Arundel is dead—perhaps he grew so unhappy that he could not live without ever seeing Faust and me, and—Ah! Annie, how could you be so cruel as to send him away?"

"I send him away, Walter! what can have put such a strange notion into your head?" exclaimed Annie, astonished at the accusation.

"Yes, you did," returned Walter vehemently—"he went away because he loved you and you would not love him—it was very cruel of you, and I hate you for it whenever I remember how unkind you have been,"—and overcome by his feelings, the poor boy burst into tears.

A thousand confused thoughts flashed like lightning through Annie's brain. What could he mean?—was she listening to the mere folly of idiocy, or had he indeed any possible foundation for his assertion? Anxious to soothe him, she laid her hand caressingly upon his, while, replying rather to her own heart than to his last observation, she said—

"No, my poor Walter, he whom you so much regret never loved me."

"Ah, but he did, though," returned Walter, positively, drying his tears—"I know it." He spoke so decidedly, that Annie, despite her reason, could not but feel curious to hear more, and turning away her head to hide her agitation, she asked in a low voice—

"How do you know?"

"If I tell you, you must never tell the General or anybody," returned Walter—"people think I'm a fool, and I know I am not clever and can't learn like other boys, and sometimes I feel a weight just here," and he pressed his hand to his forehead, "and then all my sense goes out—I wonder where it goes to—Annie, do you think it finds wings and flies up to heaven among the white angels? I think so sometimes, and then I long to be a bird and fly with it." Too much interested to allow him to fall into a new train of thought, Annie recalled his wandering ideas by saying—

"You were talking about Mr. Arundel, Walter dear."

"Oh yes, and about you, I remember," resumed Walter. "I knew, at least I thought, he was very fond of you a long time ago, but I was not quite sure of it till one day when I dressed Faust up like a gentleman, with Mr. Arundel's watch, and you took it off the dog's neck, and then you threw your arms round him and kissed him as you did just now—that was what made me angry when I remembered about the first time—well, while you were hugging Faust, Mr. Arundel came to the door and saw you, though you did not see him, and his eyes danced and sparkled, and his mouth melted into such a sweet smile; he was so glad to see how fond you were of Faust, and then I knew he loved you, for if he had not, he would not have cared about it, you know. Then he went away, and left me Faust, and I thought because he had left Faust he was sure to come back, but I know now that he left him to comfort me, and went away himself all alone. Then that horrid Mr. Spooner came; he's a great friend of Lord Bellefield's, and one day they were talking together, and they fancied I did not attend to them, but I did though, for I knew they were talking about Mr. Arundel. Well, Mr. Spooner asked why he went away, and Lord Bellefield replied, 'Why, if the truth must be told, he had the audacity (what does that mean?) to raise his eyes to my cousin Annie.' Mr. Spooner questioned him further, and he informed him that Mr. Arundel had gone boldly to the General, and said he loved you."

"Told my father so!" exclaimed Annie.

"Yes, so he said," resumed Walter; "and the General told him you loved Lord Bellefield instead, and meant to be his wife; and then poor Mr. Arundel said he would go away, and so he did, but of course if you had loved him he would have stayed, and we should all have been so happy together. So you see, Annie, it was you that sent him away, and since I've known that, I've hated you, and tried to keep Faust from loving you, only he will, and I can't hate you quite always;—but I never meant to tell you all this, and you must never tell Lord Bellefield, or he would be ready to kill me."

He paused, then, regarding her with a sad regretful look, he said, "But, Annie, is it really true that you don't love dear Mr. Arundel?"

Poor Annie! affected and excited as she had been by the foregoing scene, this last speech was too much for her, and throwing her arms about the boy's neck, and hiding her burning cheek against his breast, she whispered, "Dearest Walter, do not hate me! you have no cause to do so!"

THE BARONESS VON BECK.

"Who is the Baroness Von Beck?" inquires some simple-minded English lady or gentleman, not accustomed to travel in foreign parts, and having but vague and misty notions concerning "all people, nations, and languages," not British. It would be difficult to explain, all at once, who and what this famous Baroness is; and yet we think it very much worth our while to make an effort in that direction. Therefore, after an attentive reading of her book, we take pen in hand and proceed to tell the public what it is all about, and a bit of our mind on the matter, into the bargain.

The Baroness Von Beck is a noble Magyar lady. Her husband was killed on a barricade in Vienna, on the 28th of October, 1848, fighting on the popular side. Since that day, his widow has devoted herself, body and soul, to the cause of Hungarian independence; not with the ordinary, passive, indirect, and ornamental flag-working patriotism of her sex, nor with that more active kind of patriotism, which animated so many brave and generous women in the late European revolutions; and which has ever animated such women, in all national wars, since the Carthaginian ladies cut off their hair to make bow-strings, and gave their gold and silver ornaments to be made into weapons for use against the Romans. No, the Baroness Von Beck's patriotism has something in it different from these, though inclusive of them; for she, too, presents colours to regiments, gives banquets and encouraging words to soldiers, tends the wounded, and gives her property to the government which she believes to be the only true and lawful one. Her patriotism exhibits itself in energetic deeds, such as would do honour to the courage, military knowledge, and undaunted resolution, of many a captain known to fame. Her state of mind is simply this. Now that her husband is dead, (having no children,) she has no personal tie to this life. She is ready to die at any moment; for her own sake, she cares not how soon. But there is one idea, for which she will sacrifice everything yet remaining to her; an idea which she firmly believes to be realizable, and which she can help to realize. Thus, having a distinct object in view, a grand and exciting object, (the national independence of her country,) and being freed utterly from that ignoble fear, the fear of death, it becomes easy to understand how she should desire to make herself essentially useful to the generals and political leaders in the Hungarian cause. The desire, it is easy to conceive; thousands of women, in a similar position, would have a similar desire; but not one in twenty thousand would have the ability to gratify it. Madame Von Beck has that ability. To the tact, acuteness, ready wit, and general cleverness of a clever woman, she joins the fearlessness, the persistency, and presence of mind of a clever man. Add to this an experience among soldiers and politicians, and a familiarity with the engines and the arts of war; and it ceases to be wonderful, that a woman, a high-born lady, should be mixed up with the details of a bloody war; passing from camp to camp—mixing in military councils—the confidante and adviser of Kossuth—the messenger from one general to another, across districts held by the enemy; it ceases to be wonderful, because you see that she is admirably calculated for the work, and that it has a strong charm for her. The active spirit within her could not rest quietly, while all that she held dear was being fought for by others. This masculine daring is accompanied by passionate, womanly enthusiasm. Had circumstances conspired to favour the external resemblance, all the world would recognise in this Magyar lady another Joan of Arc. Never was any feeling more thorough, more entire, than her love for Hungary, and her desire for the restoration of its ancient rights. It is a strong passion, which no amount of suffering in the cause will ever enfeeble. Her perfect faith in, and love for Kossuth, is only equalled by her scornful anger at Görgey, and her bitter hatred of the Austrian government and its generals.

This book of hers is remarkable in several ways. First, it does not read like a translation, (though occasionally we meet with foreign idioms,) but if it be written by the Baroness herself in English, it is deserving of high praise as a literary production, and we are puzzled to understand how a Magyar lady, who had never been to England till she was driven here the other day as an exile, should have learned to write English more correctly than many English authors. Secondly, though an extremely interesting book has been produced, there is clear evidence throughout, that "she had no such stuff in her thoughts" as literary notoriety. What she states, briefly, in her preface, as the reason for writing it, cannot be doubted by any one who reads the book.

"Although a woman," she says, "I have taken the most ardent interest in the contest, having enjoyed the confidence of the noble and heroic men who took the lead in that national movement. I have stood by their side in moments the most exciting—have heard their deliberations—have witnessed their actions; and now that the struggle has been terminated by treason, I feel it to be a sacred duty to impart to the public my own personal knowledge, both of the men, and of the object which they strove to accomplish." "Neither female vanity, nor a desire for notoriety, has induced me to become an author; it was to satisfy a heartfelt impulse, which warns me not to neglect the discharge of a solemn obligation." Thirdly, the personal adventures related in this book, are some of the most extraordinary that ever befall a woman; and they strike the reader the more that they do not happen by chance, but seem to be the result of her own strong, masterly will. She is not controlled by circumstances, but seems to rule her own fate, failing in nothing she undertakes, till Görgey's surrender; which, according to her view of matters, was a shameful act of treason, caused by a mortified, selfish ambition, and envy and hatred of Kossuth. Making due allowance for the strong, passionate feeling, which animates her when she describes actions, sketches characters, and attributes motives, a very good—in fact, a very truthful idea—of the Hungarian war may be got from this book. It is better worth reading than fifty impartial accounts by people who could not possibly have seen and known half as much as the Baroness Von Beck. Taken merely as autobiography, the volumes are very interesting. Here is the true account of the strange, romantic adventures of a woman of the present day, as strange and full of marvels as the lovers of marvels will find,

"Lone, sitting by the shores of old romance."

In their own time did these things occur. If ladies and gentlemen in England care to learn how their fellow-creatures in Hungary were spending their time in 1849—if they would like something startlingly new and exciting, and yet, full of the common newspaper talk—let them get this book.

We will now give a few extracts. The following will convey some notion to the reader of the sort of work the Baroness Von Beck was employed in by Kossuth and the Generals. Kossuth tells her, that he has an important and dangerous mission in which he can employ no one but herself:—

"I told him I was ready by life and by death. He then told me it was essential I should visit Görgey's camp, which was still at Tokay, though it was afterwards removed to Miskolcz; not for the purpose of communicating with Görgey, from whom the President had just returned, and who was expected on a visit to him in a few days. I was to remain at Tokay till the Hungarians had removed from thence, and the place had been taken possession of by the Austrians, who were already on their march. When they arrived, I was to ascertain their strength and disposition, with all particulars the knowledge of which would be likely to be advantageous to our cause; from thence I was to proceed to Pesth, and observe the proceedings of the enemy, and communicate from thence all the information I had acquired to Kossuth. 'In what manner you will be able to accomplish all this,' said he, 'I must leave altogether to your own resources; I know they will not fail you. Comfort our true-hearted brethren in Pesth. Tell them to bear their present difficulties with patience, and to look forward with assured confidence to better times, for the God of Hungary still lives and will not forsake his faithful people. From Pesth,' he continued, 'you must proceed to Vienna, and bear a letter to the ——— Ambassador, with whom you are already acquainted. I am convinced that your presence there will greatly animate and encourage all our colleagues. Tell the gallant Viennese not to despair of the firmness and bravery of the Hungarians. We will! yes, we will! make them yet share in that glorious freedom for which we are fighting. From Vienna you must go to Prague. There you will find a few members of the Austrian Diet, who are native Bohemians. Ascertain from them the disposition of the Bohemian people as regards Hungary, and the nature of the estimate they form of our proceedings. From thence you must visit successively, Dresden, Leipsig, and Breslau. I will give you letters relating to the purchase of arms and their transmission to us, which I entreat you to deliver carefully. It will be necessary also that you take 140,000 florins to pay for them, which will be a heavy and serious charge for you. The last subject upon which I wished to speak with you, refers to a matter recently brought under my notice by yourself. You have informed me, and I feel with truth, that we have been paying extravagant prices for many articles of clothing for the army, such as linen, cloth, ticken, and other materials. The army must have lighter clothing for the approaching summer, and I wish much to put your economical hints in practice, so that we may obtain the various articles at a more reasonable charge. You will, therefore, have the goodness to visit the manufacturers of such fabrics in Moravia on your return, and contract with them as you see most advantageous for the necessary supplies. The manufacturers must engage to deliver the various articles upon the Hungarian frontiers, where they shall be duly paid for in ready cash. I know not how the prices of such things range, but you will receive all such information from the Minister of the Commissariat. You have now my commission. I have named everything which is of the most pressing importance; but the whole shall be clearly drawn up in writing. It is a fearful undertaking; of that I am distinctly conscious; but our country requires the service, and if you cannot accomplish it, it is vain to ask any one else.'

"I thanked him sincerely for the distinguished confidence he had again placed in me, and promised faithfully to accomplish everything as he had directed. Indeed his slightest wishes were sacred to me, for I have never known him form a desire or a hope for himself alone; all was for the fatherland. I regarded him with a species of superstition, as I would look upon its guardian genius. At his command, I could at any time have joyfully laid down my life for the promotion of our great cause."

Her reverence for Kossuth is very strongly expressed throughout; and her opinions about the other leaders are clearly set down, except in the case of Klapka.

She speaks coolly of him, without strong blame or praise; thinks he ought not to have surrendered Komorn; and that if he did surrender it, that he should have made better terms. She was with him at Komorn; and, indeed, seems always to have been in every place, where anything of importance to the Hungarian cause was going on. Of course she does not speak with much gentleness of the Austrian generals. She is delighted when she tricks them, as she often does, and in the most daring manner. Her disguises and various ruses de guerre, are not a whit less amusing for being very dangerous. She tells the following anecdote of Jellachich, the celebrated Ban of Croatia, with manifest pleasure and contempt:—

“When he entered Pesth, he heard that the young Countess Karolyi possessed a palace there in which she was then residing. The fame of her beauty and amiability had been long known to him; and he thought this a favourable opportunity of recommending himself to her notice. He therefore quartered himself at her residence, and strove with all his power to make himself agreeable to her, without success.

“He had the most profound faith in his personal charms, and believed that such an Adonis as he must prove irresistible. He could not understand, therefore, why the young countess did not surrender at discretion; but he was utterly confounded when, wishing to have an interview with her one morning, he received a message that the countess was not at home to him. He went at once to the Tiger Hotel, bursting with mortification; and to revenge himself, sent for his ‘bill,’ that he might pay the beautiful Karolyi for his board and lodging. She saw his meaning, and instead of taking offence sent him actually an account, in which every thing he had had at her palace was charged for at a monstrous price. So far the exchange was, perhaps, only fair; but the Croat could not digest the indignity put upon his self-esteem, and all his love for Karolyi turned into a desire for vengeance, which he gratified by filling her palace with common soldiers. Thus ended the renowned Ban’s first love-adventure in Pesth, to the inextinguishable mirth of the worthy citizens.”

It is difficult to select passages from these pages that would give, in a short space, a fair idea of the real eloquence of the work. Out of the fulness of the heart her mouth hath spoken. Indignation sometimes makes verses, and good verses too; indignation has made an eloquent prose-writer in these pages. A noble indignation it is; there is nothing selfish in it. Never were the horrors of war more vividly depicted! She who holds war to be right in such a cause as that in which she is engaged, denounces it solemnly in any other cause. The truthful pictures she draws of the battles she has witnessed,—the awful misery of towns delivered up by Austrian generals to be pillaged for six hours by a brutal soldiery,—the havoc and ruin wrought in besieged and bombarded cities,—are all enough to make the reader’s blood boil or freeze as he reads. The following is one of the least horrible of these scenes from her every-day life. Buda had been taken at last, after a brave defence by Henzi, the Austrian general, whose fidelity to his treacherous government, and whose noble character, she records, as well as his dying words to herself, when she went to visit him, “I was betrayed!”. He had been commanded to defend Buda till succours came, which were never to be sent.

“At seven o’clock, all was still; Buda had fallen. Couriers were issuing from the town to bear the intelligence in every direction. I was anxious to see the state of the fortress after so desperate a siege, and ordered my carriage to be driven thither. I entered at the Vienna Gate, where the battle had raged with exceeding fierceness. The scaling ladders by which our troops had mounted the walls and entered the fortress, were still in the positions in which they had been placed. Behind the gate the street had been barricaded, and the effect of this fresh obstacle was plainly visible in the heaps of Hungarian dead which lay before it. My carriage could not pass on account of the barricade. I, therefore sent it back, and determined to proceed on foot.

“I ascended the walls, but they had been so damaged that it was dangerous to walk on them. I persevered, however, till I got into a position in which I could neither go forward nor retire without danger; from this awkward predicament I was rescued by Colonel Reueti. It is impossible to form an adequate idea of the ruin and destruction which lay around on every side. It was horrible, thrice horrible! The smell which arose from the blood and the dead bodies that choked the streets, was the most fearful and unnatural sensation I have ever experienced. The Austrians had not had time to bury those that had fallen during the latter part of the siege, and the bodies lay about in every stage of decomposition, and were preyed upon by dogs and vermin. The Croats had crawled into the cellars, where numbers of decaying bodies had been hastily thrown, and, upon being discovered, I am sorry to narrate, were slaughtered without mercy. The hatred of the Hungarian soldiers against the Croatian troops was intense, and well had they merited it by the wanton cruelties and abominations of which they were guilty towards our people.

“Their officers were sent under an escort to a place of safety to save them from the fury of the populace, whom they had shamefully mishandled and dishonoured during their possession of the fortress; but the private soldiers fared, I fear, very dreadfully, for the crowd were infuriated beyond measure. They rushed up and down, armed with paving-stones and clubs, to wreak their long pent-up vengeance upon those heartless robbers and cold-blooded murderers. But the sight of so much unmitigated evil and terror was too much; I began to sicken at it, and departed to my lodgings with a feeling as if I myself had arisen from the dead, and carried with me still the odour and impression of mortality.”

All the adventures in the book are not so grave and heartrending as the above. Comedy mingles occasionally for a moment with the fiery epic, and softens its terror. Görgey’s surrender to the Russians, and his previous falling away from her party—that is, the Hungarian party, headed by Kossuth,—is told with every appearance of its being truth;—truth in that sense which means that which the speaker troueth. It will be easy for the reader to conceive her rage and disappointment, and her subsequent anguish, after reading the following account of the surrender of Görgey’s army at Villagos; she and the troops, all, or nearly all, believing firmly that if Görgey had allowed them, they could yet have retrieved the ill-fortune of the war. Nearly all the ill-fortune she attributes to Görgey’s treachery; but, by her own showing, the government, of which Kossuth was the actual head, caused a great deal of it by the nomination of inefficient commanders-in-chief in place of Görgey.

It was unsafe to irritate a vain and ambitious man. Madame Von Beck must have been a sharp thorn in Görgey's side during the few weeks preceding the accompanying scene. He had ordered her to quit his camp; but she seems to have been indifferent to the mandate, staying just as long as she chose, and going about in it as she chose. She treated him with contempt as a traitor; which was a daring thing to do before his overt act.

"At length, the 13th of August, the dark day of Hungary, arrived. The drums were beaten, and the troops got under arms. I hastened to see the last of my brave countrymen, who had so often scattered before them the very men to whom they were now about to yield. Görgey rode at the head of the column; his brow was still bound up, as he had not quite recovered from the wound he had received at Komorn. His staff rode with him, accompanied by a large number of Russian officers. I drove out too; I was determined to see the tragedy to an end, though my heart should break the moment after. The sky was cloudless and the sun shone brilliantly. I found our troops already drawn up before the encampment, between Villagos and Szölös. Near the latter place was a stream crossed by a bridge, on the other side of which the Russians were drawn up in order of battle. Our troops marched in companies to the bridge and laid down their arms, which were immediately taken possession of, and carried across the bridge by the Russians. It was a most piteous and affecting sight; our soldiers wept like children. The huzzar kissed his musket, pressed it to his heart, and laid it down like the rest. The huzzar dismounted from his horse, the beloved companion of his marches and his battles; the faithful friend that had never failed him in time of need, with whom he had shared his last crust, and his straw bed, in the wild bivouac. He knew not how to part with him; he embraced him and kissed his lips, he sobbed upon his neck, and wetted it with his tears; he repeated all the endearing names which he had given his charger, whilst the spirited and sagacious animal looked round as if trying to comprehend his master's agitation, and whined in response to his caresses. This was a scene painfully touching, and can be understood by those only who know the marvellous attachment that springs up between the huzzar, and his horse: to deprive him of his horse, was to take away from the huzzar a portion of his own existence. When he gave up the animal to the Russians, and returned to his ranks, he was a broken-down and disconsolate man.

"The artillery was next delivered up; the gunners speaking to the different pieces and bidding them farewell, as if they had been living creatures. Görgey stood by the bridge, surrounded with Russian officers. No tear fell from his eyes—no emotion was visible upon his countenance. He looked as cold and motionless as marble, betraying by no word or movement any sympathy with the manifest pain of the gallant warriors who had fought beneath his orders on so many battle-fields, and who were ever so fearless and devoted.

"A low murmur of rage and vengeance against him rose from the Hungarian ranks, which he pretended for a time not to hear; but by-and-by it became too evident to remain unnoticed, and he rode away with the Russians into their encampment. Those who up to the last moment had believed him true, now condemned him for a traitor. By two o'clock in the afternoon, ten thousand men had laid down their arms.

"The consequences are known to the world. Why repeat the often told tale of horror? the torrents of blood that were shed? the frightful violation of all the laws of heaven and earth? the bloody and dishonoured graves, and the long catalogue of crimes, which have made Austria and Haynau words of reproach among all the nations of the earth."

Her subsequent adventures in Hungary and Austria are full of mournful interest. She makes her way to London—where she writes this book; and whence she hopes to make a journey to rejoin Kossuth. She closes her eloquent work with the following words; they come direct from the heart, and speak to it:—

"And the true children of my country, where are they? What nameless suffering do they endure because they were faithful to the last? Some have carried their sorrows to the primeval forests of America; there, at least, they will be free. Some, and amongst them him whose lofty soul, adorned with more than human excellence, should have called forth the reverence of all who admire genius adorned by goodness, receive from the hospitality of the Mussulman that refuge which Christian Europe denied, lest it should thwart the murderous instinct of a power claiming the name of the Redeemer. Some have gone to lay down their lives in the struggle against Scandinavian lust of power; others wander throughout the cities of continental Europe in misery and sorrow, or stalk through the streets of mighty London, wondering all day at its wealth, its power and liberty, and retiring at night to their miserable garrets, to dream of the past, and to die in anticipating the future.—Our sun rose brightly, it sunk in storms and blackness; yet it was but one day in the cycle of time. That sun shall rise again, though we are forgotten; and, in the consolation of this hope, I cease from complaining, and at length lay down my pen."

BARDS OF THE BIBLE.

BY GEORGE GILFILLAN.

It is not long since a review of the "Literary Portraits" of this author appeared in the columns of our JOURNAL; he now essays a loftier and more perilous flight. In his present volume there is the same "merciless cleverness" that characterised the former; the same continued outpouring of glowing phraseology, the same want of simplicity and condensation of style. Both sentiment and expression are, to our thinking, often exaggerated; yet we think that our readers will acknowledge that none but a man of genius could have written passages like the following:—

THE HEBREW PROPHET.

"The Hebrew prophet, in his highest form, was a solitary and salvage man, residing with lions, when he was not waylaying kings, on whose brow the scorching sun of Syria had characterised its fierce and swarthy hue, and whose dark eye swam with a fine insanity, gathered from solitary communings with the sand, the sea, the mountains, and the sky, as well as with the light of a divine afflatus. He had lain in the cockatrice's den; he had put his hand on the hole of the asp; he had spent the night on lion-surrounded trees, and slept and dreamed amid their hungry roar; he had swam in the Dead Sea, or haunted, like a ghost, those dreary caves which lowered around it; he had drank of the melted snow on the top of Lebanon; at Sinai, he had traced and trod on the burning footprints of Jehovah; he had heard messages at midnight, which made his hair to arise, and his skin to creep; he had been wet with the dews of the night, and girt by the demons of the wilderness; he had been tossed up and down, like a leaf, upon a strong and veering storm of his inspiration. He was essentially a lonely man, cut off, by gulph upon gulph, from tender ties and human associations. He had no home; a wife he might be permitted to marry, but, as in the case of Hosea, the permission might only be to him a curse, and to his people an emblem, and when (as in the case of Ezekiel) her death became necessary as a sign, she died, and left him in the same austere seclusion in which he had existed before. The power which came upon him cut, by its fierce coming, all the threads which bound him to his kind, tore him from the plough, or from the pastoral solitude, and hurried him to the desert, and thence to the foot of the throne, or to the wheel of the triumphal chariot. And how startling his coming to crowned or conquering guilt! Wild from the wilderness, bearded, like its lion-lord; the fury of God glaring in his eye; his mantle heaving to his heaving breast; his words stern, swelling, tinged on their edges with a terrible poetry; his attitude dignity; his gesture power—how did he burst upon the astonished gaze; how swift and solemn his entrance; how short and spirit-like his stay; how dreamy, yet distinctly dreadful, the impression made by his words, long after they had ceased to tingle on the ears; and how mysterious the solitude into which he seemed to melt away! Poet, nay prophet, were a feeble name for such a being. He was a momentary incarnation—a meteor kindled at the eye, and blown on the breath, of the Eternal.”

CHRIST'S SOLACE IN NATURAL BEAUTY.

“The manner of Christ's life, as he uttered his parables and other sayings, was in the highest degree poetical. It was the life of a stranger on this earth, of a wanderer, of one who had no home but the house not made with hands, which he had himself built. Hence we identify his image with nature, and ever see him on lonely roads, midnight mountains, silent or stormy lakes, fields of corn, or the deep wildernesses of his country. Every step trode by the old seers, was retrode by him, as if to efface their fiery vestiges, and make the regions, over which they had swept like storms, green again. He was only sent to the lost sheep of Israel, but he more than once approached to the very boundaries of his allotted field. We find him, for instance, in the neighbourhood of Tyre and Sidon, straying by a mightier sea than that of Tiberias, and lifting his eyes to a loftier summit than that of Tabar. ‘He must needs’ see Lebanon, as well as pass through Samaria. His were not, indeed, journeys of sentiment, but of mercy; and yet, why should he not have gazed with rapture upon the peaceful, the pure, and the lofty, in the works, while he did the will, of God? This was, peradventure, the chief source of his solace amid suffering and weariness.

He was not recognised by men, but the lilies of the field looked up meaningly in his face, the ‘waters perceived him—they saw him well,’ the winds lingered amid his hair, the sunbeams smiled on his brow, the landscape from the summit seemed to crouch lovingly at his feet, and the stars from their far thrones to bend him down obeisance. He, and He alone, of all men, felt at home in nature, and able to see it, and call it, ‘My father's house.’ He felt not warmed by, but warning the sun—not walking in the light of, but enlightening the world, and could look on its great orbs as but the ‘many mansions’ for his spiritual seed. Of all men he only (mentally and morally) stood erect, and this divine uprightness it was which turned the world upside down. The poetical point of view of nature, is not that of distant admiration or of cold inquiry, it is that of sympathy, amounting to immersion; the poet's soul is shed, like a drop, into creation; but this process was never fully completed, sure in one—in him who uttered the Sermon on the Mount.”

THE PARABLES OF JESUS.

“Let us glance, first, at his parables, which are a poetry in themselves. Truth, half betrayed in beauty, half shrouded in mystery, is the essence of a parable. It is the truth wishing to be loved, ere she ventures forth to be worshipped and obeyed. The multitude of Christ's parables is not so wonderful as their variety, their beauty, their brevity, and the sweet or fearful pictures which they paint at once and for ever upon the soul. Here we see the good Samaritan riding toward his inn, with his wounded brother before him. There, lingeringly, doubtfully, like a truant boy at evening, returns the prodigal son to his father, whose arms, at his threshold, stretched out, seem wishing for wings to expedite the joyous meeting. In that field stalks the sower, graver than sowers are wont to be in the merry season of spring. On the opposite side, the fisherman, with joyful face, is drawing ashore his heavy-laden net. With yet keener ecstasy depicted on his countenance, you see the merchantman lighting on a pearl of pearls, while across from him is the treasure-finder, with circumspective and fearful looks, hiding his precious prize. And, lo! how, under the dim canopy of night, shadowing the barely-budding field of wheat, steals a crooked and winged figure, trembling lest the very darkness see him—the enemy—scattering tares in huddled abundance among the wheat. The morning comes; but, while revealing the rank tares growing among the good seed, it reveals also the large mustard-tree which has shot up with incredible swiftness, ‘so that the fowls of the air do build in the branches thereof.’ Here you see a woman mixing leaven with her meal, till the whole lump is leavened; and there another woman, sweeping the room, how fast, yet intensely, for her lost piece of silver. There the servant of the marriage-host is compelling the wanderers from the ledges to come in, his face all glowing with amiable anger and kindly coercion; and yonder, in the distance, with anxious eye and crook in his hand, hies the shepherd into the twilight desert, in search of his 'lost sheep.' And, hark; as the marriage-feast has begun, and the song of holy merriment is just rising on the evening air, there comes a voice, strangely concerting with it, hollow as the grave—a whispered thunder. It is the voice of Dives, saying—'Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water, and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame.' In such figures Jesus [has exhausted life, earth, eternity."

THE POLITENESS OF PAUL.

"An old poet has quaintly called Jesus 'The first true gentleman that ever breathed.' Paul's politeness, too, must not be overlooked, compounded as it was of dignity and deference. It appeared in the mildness of the manner in which he delivered his most startling and shattering messages, both to Jews and heathens; in his graceful salutations; in his winning reproofs—the 'excellent oil which did not break the head;' in the delicacy of his allusions to his own claims and services; and, above all, in the calm, self-possessed, and manly attitude he assumed before the rulers of his people and the Roman authorities. In the language of Peter and John to their judges, there is an abruptness savouring of their rude fisherman life, and fitter for the rough echoes of the Lake of Galilee than for the tribunals of power. But Paul, while equally bold and decided, is far more gracious. He lowers his thunderbolt before his adversary ere he launches it. His shaft is 'polished,' as well as powerful. His words to King Agrippa—'I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost and altogether such as I am, except these bounds'—are the most chivalric utterances recorded in history. An angel could not bend more gracefully, or assume an attitude of more exalted courtesy."

SHAKESPEARE, GOETHE AND THE BIBLE.

"Shakespeare—nature's favourite, though unbaptized and unconsecrated, child—has derived less from Scripture than any other great modern author, and affords fewer points of comparison with it. He was rather a piece of nature than a prophet. His real religion, as expressed in the words, 'We are such stuff as dreams are made of, and our little life is rounded with a sleep,' seems to have been a species of ideal Pantheism. He loved the fair face of nature; he saw also its poetic meaning; but did not feel, nor has expressed so deeply its under-current of moral law (?); nor the sublime attitude it exhibits, as leaning upon its God. Hence, while the most wide and genial, and one of the least profane, he is also one of the least religious of poets. His allusions to Scripture, and to the Christian faith, are few and undecided. He has never even impersonated a character of high religious enthusiasm. He never, we think, could have written a good sacred drama; and had he tried to depict a Luther, a Knox, a Savonarola, or any character in whose mind one great, earnest idea was predominant, he had failed. The grey, clear, catholic sky behind and above, would have made such volcanoes pale. Had he written on Knox, Queen Mary would have carried away all his sympathies; or, on Luther, he would have been more anxious to make Tetzels ridiculous, than the Reformer reverend or great. Shakespeare was not, in short, an earnest man, hardly even—strange as the assertion may seem—an enthusiast; and, therefore, stood in exact contrast to the Hebrew bards. . . .

"Goethe, we know, admired the Bible as a composition, took great interest in its geography, and had his study hung round with maps of the Holy Land. But even less than Shakespeare did he resemble its poets. Universal genius bred in Shakespeare a love for all things which he knew, without much enthusiasm for any in particular. An inferior, but more highly cultured degree of the same power, led Goethe to universal liking, which at a distance seemed, and in some degree was, indifference. His great purpose, after the fever of youth was spent, was to build up his Ego, like a cold, majestic statue, and to surround it with offerings from every region—from earth, heaven, and hell! He transmuted all things into ink; he analysed his tears ere suffering them to fall to the ground; his tortures he tortured in search of their inmost meaning; his vices he rolled like a sweet morsel, that he might know their ultimate flavour, and what legacy of lesson they had to leave him; his mental battles he fought o'er again, that he might become a mightier master of spiritual tactics; like the ocean, whatever came within his reach was engulfed, was drenched in the main element of his being, went to swell his treasures, and generally 'suffered a sea-change,' into 'something' at once 'rich,' 'strange,' and cold. This was not the manner of the rapt, God-filled, self-emptied, sin-denouncing, impetuous, and intense bards of Israel. Could we venture to conceive Isaiah, or Ezekiel, entering Goethe's chamber at Weimar, and uttering one of their divine rhapsodies—how mildly would he have smiled upon the fire-eyed stranger—how attentively heard him—how calmly sought to measure and classify him—how punctually recorded in his journal the appearance of an 'extraordinary human meteor, a wonderful specimen of uncultured genius'—and how complacently inferred his own superiority!"

CHARACTER OF ABRAHAM.

"The great charm of Abraham's character, is its union of simplicity with grandeur. He rises like one of those great stones which are found standing alone in the wilderness, so quiet in their age, so unique in their structure, and yet on which, if tradition be believed, angels have rested, where sacrifices have been offered up, and round which, in other days, throngs of worshippers have assembled. His prayers pierce the heavens with the reverent daring of one of the mountain altars of nature. He is at once a shepherd and a soldier. He is true to the living, and jealous of the honour of the ashes of the dead. He is a plain man, dwelling in tents, and yet a prince with men and God."

INDIVIDUALITY OF THE CHARACTERS IN THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES.

"The Book of Acts presents us with a great many characters, of whom, besides the apostles, the rapt Stephen, the Ethiopian Eunuch, the brave Cornelius, the most marked are unhappily evil. Barnabas, Ananias, Philip, Aquila, Mark, Silas, Timotheus, and Luke himself, have not much that is individual and distinctive. The sameness of excellence attaches to them all. It is very different with the others. Their shades are all dark, but all strikingly discriminated.

"There is, for example, Simon Magus, the begetter and name-giver to a distinct and dreadful crime (Simony), an original in wickedness, a genuine and direct 'child of hell.' No mistake about him. He thinks every thing, as well as every person, 'has its price,' and would bribe the very Spirit of God. You see him retiring from Peter's scorn and curse, blasted, cowering, half-ashamed, but unconverted. . . .

"Then there is Gallo, another great original in the world of evil, the first representative of a large class who, in all ages succeeding, have thrown the chill of their careless and cutting sneer upon all that is earnest and lofty in nature or man, in life or in religion.

"Then there is the town-clerk of Ephesus, one of those persons who substitute prudence for piety, and who find a sun in the face of a time-piece—who tell men when they are not to act, but never when the hour of action has fully come, and when delays are as contemptible as they are dangerous.

"Then there is Tertullus the tool, servile, wiry, accommodating, plausible; who talks, but never speaks; and whose character may be studied as representing, in a full and ideal manner, all courtly pleaders who have since appeared, as well as many who have pled in nobler causes.

"Then there is Felix, whom one trembling has immortalised. Rude the lyre; but a great master stood once before it, and it vibrated to his touch. Even nettleshade has sometimes been made musical in the blast.

"Then there is Agrippa, the 'almost Christian'—one of thousands who, were Christianity and the thrill produced by eloquence the same thing, would be believers; but who, as it is, will lose heaven by a hair's-breadth, and feel little sorrow!

"Then there is Festus, the emblem of the cool, intellectual man, who finds an easy solution for the problem of earnestness, or genius, or enthusiasm, or religion—a problem which, otherwise, would distress and disturb him—in the cheap cry, 'It is madness—Paul, Burke, Chalmers, and Irving, were mad.'

"We close this rapid glance at the more peculiar and striking of Scripture characters, by expressing our amazement: First, at their multitude; secondly, at their variety; thirdly, at the delicacy with which they are discriminated; fourthly, at the manner in which they are exhibited—so artless, brief, and masterly—not by analyses or descriptions, but by actions and words; fifthly, at the great moral and emblematical lessons which they teach; sixthly, at the fact that the majority of these characters have left duplicates to this hour; seventhly, at the honesty of the writers who record them; and, lastly, at this significant fact, there is one character who appears transcendent above them all, at once in purity, power, and wisdom."

These extracts will enable the reader to form an estimate of the beauties and faults (if such, indeed, he consider them) of Mr. Gilfillan's volume.

THE BORE RUSHING UP THE HOOGLY.

This engraving, though small in scale, may be considered as one of the masterpieces of our English landscape school. It will bear the closest and most critical inspection. The subject is one which it required the hand of a master to treat. It represents the sudden rush of the tide up the Hoogley river to Calcutta, accompanied by a heavy gale. The effect is wonderfully striking; the ship almost on her beam ends, cutting the lurid streak of light; the waving trees, and the distressed boat in the foreground, are rendered in the highest feeling of art, and executed with a precision and power of the burin never, perhaps, surpassed.

"ACROSS THE ATLANTIC."

THIS is the taking title of a right lively and humorous little book, which will be perused, from beginning to end, with unflagging interest, and for the general truthfulness of which those of us who have visited America can personally vouch. Pitch where we may, we are pretty sure to light upon something clever, pointed, and characteristic. Take the following sketch, for example, of the "Great Barnum:"—

"Barnum is not an ordinary showman. He is not one who will be handed down to posterity, only on the strength of the objects which he has exhibited, or the curiosities which he has brought to light. He stands alone. Adopting Mr. Emerson's idea, I should say that Barnum is a representative man. He represents the enterprise and energy of his countrymen in the nineteenth century, as Washington represented their resistance to oppression in the century preceding. By 'going-a-head' to an extent hitherto unprecedented in his trade—devoid of any absurd delicacy as to the means by which the ends are to be accomplished—he has endeared himself to the middle and lower ranks of his countrymen, and seems to stand forth proud and preeminent as their model of a speculator and a man. I firmly believe that there are few commercial people in the United States who would not look upon Barnum as a congenial, though a superior spirit; or at all events who do not feel a pride, albeit a secret one, in his exploits.

"The rise of this illustrious person, like that of some of his fellows, would seem to be veiled in obscurity. Whether he rose to fame on a fabulous griffin, or reached the wished-for goal on the back of an eight-legged horse, must remain matter of conjecture. His more recent exploits are well known. They are, Firstly.—The discovery of an extraordinary fish (if I remember aright). Secondly.—The production of a Quaker giant. Thirdly.—Of a giantess to match, who married the giant. Fourthly.—Of an old black woman, either a nurse or an attendant of some sort on General Washington, who related anecdotes of the patriot in infancy. Fifthly.—Of Tom Thumb. Sixthly.—Of Jenny Lind. Seventhly, Eighthly, and Ninthly.—Of a giantess and giant boy; some Chinese gentlemen and ladies of high rank; and a negro who has discovered a process of turning his skin from black to white by means of a herb, which process he is now undergoing. Independently of which, I have heard that Mr. Barnum has a third share of some ghosts, who are now showing off their 'mysterious rappings' to enthusiastic audiences."

"Amongst the upper-middling, and mercantile and professional classes of English, dinner is the great event of the day; the hospitable port to which our morning and afternoon toils and labours are insensibly wafting us; the peaceful vale into which we descend after having borne the brunt of the mid-day sun. With it commences a new era. Papa returns from Westminster-hall or the city, Julia and Angelina from their drive with mamma in the Park, Cadwallader from his club. It is a mystery and a solemn rite, to the due celebration of which a total change of toilet, and the assumption of evening costume, are necessary. We devote the rest of the day, in a certain sense, to recreation, and banish business from our minds till the ensuing morning. So that the English merchant's, or lawyer's, day admits of these two principal divisions, to wit, the antepandial and the post-pandial hours.

"Dinner in the bosom of an American family can only be compared to a religious rite or ceremony in this respect, that every one is anxious to get through it as soon as possible. Occurring in the middle of the day, it is so far from being the optata meta of our daily exertions, the bar and hindrance to the transaction of all further business, that it may be looked upon merely as the connecting link between the writing of two commercial letters, the drawing up of two conveyances, the overhauling of two bales of goods. Papa rushes in from his office or his chambers, Homer and Otis from somewhere else; they all sit down in statu quo. In an hour the affair is over, and every one at his business again. It is fearful to see so great a meal made so light of, and divested of the halo of poetry, which more civilized nations have succeeded in throwing over it. Of the two theories with regard to this, the prince of repasts, I own myself a humble adherent of the Cis-Atlantic or British."

Perhaps the reader would like to peep into a court of Law in New York:—

"Notwithstanding that I was a little sick of Blackstone and Fearné, I attended the Court of Common Pleas, whilst in New York, thinking that it would furnish me with as favourable a specimen of the superior law-courts of the country, as I could hope to find. It was a square, white-washed apartment, not much larger than a bar-room at one of the hotels. Under a red canopy, on a bench slightly elevated above the rest, sate the Judge, a respectable and intelligent-looking man. An insurance case was going on. A barrister was addressing the jury, with much earnestness and gesticulation, and, it must be owned, with that sharp nasal twang which is so universally prevalent in this country. Around him sate the members of the bar, some in brown holland blouses, some with huge imperials on their chins, some balancing themselves in their chairs against the railings which divided them from the spectators, and hanging their legs over the backs of other chairs, nearly all intent on getting rid of their saliva, and imprinting the wet seal of the Republic on every object in their vicinity. In this national pastime, (which is too well known to need further comment) the Judge displayed a laudable proficiency. Two gentlemen (apparently reporters) seated at a table to the left of the bench, the jury, and half-a-dozen idle spectators like myself, completed the assemblage. The jury were arranged in two rows, and before each row were placed two spittoons, so that no gentleman had to expectorate a greater distance than past three of his fellow jurymen—a wise precaution, providing against the incapacity of a bad shol.

"A glance at such a scene was sufficient to show that there was a total absence of dignity about it. A stranger would, indeed, have sought in vain for the stateliness of a Denman, or the melodious tones of a Thesiger, in an assembly where all appeared to be pretty much on a level (as, perhaps, in a Republic they should be), and you might have mistaken the crier of the court for the Judge, and the Judge for the crier. But to argue from this circumstance that a fair trial cannot be had in the United States, that the Judges are not sound lawyers, and the barristers great advocates, would be a 'most lame and impotent conclusion.'"

"Members and Government" in England and America:—

"By becoming Members of Parliament, we rise from our insignificance into public life; we become public men; we gain a locus standi, as well as a seat; it is our object to sit in the one, and to stand in the other, as long as we can. Our names soar up to the top of subscription lists, with the two magical letters tied to the end of them, like a tail. Good dinners are ours—not paid for by ourselves, but given us by people in Baker Street and Finsbury Square,—and we like good dinners. Our appendage acts like Grimstone's eye-snuff upon the vision of some of our friends, who used always to be rubbing those organs with a pocket-handkerchief as we passed. They no longer rub them now; they see us. I should electrify my little chop-house in the Strand, where I now sit down to the joint without making any manner of sensation, if I were one day to stalk in as the Member for Guttleborough. 'Did you see that gentleman sitting at No. 7, sir?' the waiter would ask, as soon as I had left. 'That is none other than Mr. Such-a-one, the Member of Parliament.' And he would begin telling lies about me. These are the considerations which draw the sportsman from his hounds, the Scot from his manufactory, and the Irish prince (if he had his rights) from his mud castle, and pop them all down a heterogeneous mass within the walls of St. Stephens.

"In America, the case is entirely different. There, the rich merchant, or the barrister in good practice, or the man of wealth and influence, in such cities as New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, would, by accepting a seat in the legislature, be making as great a sacrifice for the good of his country as I should, by refusing one, for mine. To appreciate this, only consider the consequences which, in that great Republic, accrue to the victim who suffers himself to be dragged down from private into public life. He leaves his comfortable house in New York, or his villa on the Hudson, the elegant society by which he has been surrounded, and (dearer than all) the privacy which he has hitherto enjoyed. What does he get in exchange? He is compelled to reside in a miserable, unhealthy, unfinished town, for nine months in the year, without any objects of interest around him, without recreations of any kind, without any society to speak of. He is forced to drop his 'aristocratic' airs, and to stand up and drink a cocktail with any drunken constituent who pursues him to the bar of his hotel. He is forced to sit next to, and to converse familiarly with, persons whom he has hitherto only read of in newspapers and novels, as we read of the 'Tipperary boys'—savages from Iowa and Wisconsin, whom the unsettled populations of those districts have sent up to represent them—stump-orators, who have not won their places by underhand dealing, by bribery and corruption, but have rushed in upon their opponents, and gouged them, like men. When he goes back, he finds that his house is no longer his own. Nothing is his own. He himself no longer belongs to himself—he belongs to the people. All day long, he is employed in shaking hands with Generals and Judges, and other dirty persons. As for any credit attaching to the position of a member of the Lower House, I should think it must act rather as a bar to your introduction to decent society. You are a delegate, not a representative—a flunkey, not a man. A constituency of so many thousands meet and proclaim, by a majority of so many hundreds or thousands, that such and such are their opinions.

'Now, then, who'll carry our opinions up to Washington? Come, the place is vacant. Who offers himself for the pluck and shoulder-knot?' or, 'Who'll be our errand-boy?' 'Please, gentlemen, I will,' cry half-a-dozen. Homer Smith, or Artaxerxes Brown, or Nahum Robinson, as the case may be, is the chosen one. 'Now, sir, you go up and deliver this parcel, and mind what you are about, do you hear?' You have twenty-thousand masters. You are servant-of-all-work to a vast constituency, with every individual member ringing his bell for you at one and the same time. Respectable men will not, for the most part, accept this kind of position. They prefer looking on.

"It is worth observing, too—when a man gets upon political topics, there is no stopping him—it is worth observing the different impression produced in your mind, in England and America, by one and the same word, the word 'Government.' I am not about to indulge in a comparison between the Republican and the Monarchical forms of Government; such a discussion would ill suit these trifling pages, and, indeed, would be rather stale anywhere. What I mean to say is this. When you hear of Government doing so and so—Government is about to erect a Lunatic Asylum in Downing Street—Government is on the point of increasing our steam navy—Government will scarcely permit this and that—Bob has got a situation under Government, and so on, what do you understand? You lose, don't you, all idea of any particular person, such as Russell, or Wood, or Palmerston? They are merged in the notion of a collective body, solemn and mysterious, holding its deliberations somewhere—at Windsor, or in Downing Street, or in Chesham Place—perhaps, nowhere at all, but arriving at a determination, by communicating with each other through the medium of the penny post. Does the Queen say anything? What does H.R.H. do? Does he sometimes favour us with a law on real property or Irish affairs, on the sly, just as, openly, he has conferred upon us the boon of a national exhibition? When we, of the middling classes, have one of the ministers pointed out to us, rolling down Whitehall in his carriage, or rattling up Rotten Row on his cob, we look upon him with an undefined awe, as a being quite separated and apart from ourselves. What is he thinking about now? Pray, Heavens! he may not be about to tax me! A veil of mystery enshrouds that man. I shall, perhaps, never see him again—I shall only feel him. If I wished to see him, how many ushers, clerks, rods, wands, passages, and waiting-rooms, should I have to undergo, before looking upon his august face!

"Now, at Washington, the smallness of the town, and the absence of ranks and grades, and the tiny space in which business has to be transacted, brings home the idea of Government to the bosom of every one as a familiar and well-known object. We can almost see the ordinary springs by which the political machine is put in motion. We may sit next to the Secretary of War at dinner, every day at our hotel;

we walk about arm-in-arm with the Secretary of something else; we hob-a-nob with a third great man; we take our evening cigar with a fourth. We meet them at dinner in little back-kitchens, and see basins of broth sent out to them. They are but men. There is no more mystery hanging over their deliberations, than there is over those of the vestry in a country town. We are as familiar with the every-day life of the Prime Minister, as we are with that of the Mayor. If I want to talk on business with the highest personage in the country, I knock at the door, ask if Mr. Fillmore is at home, and, if he is, put down my pipe and walk in."

The following observations appear to be singularly judicious and impartial, and worthy of acceptance on both sides the Atlantic:—

"In adverting, however, to the absence of refinement, so clearly discernible in American men, it would be unpardonable to omit one consideration, which has not been sufficiently taken into account by English travellers. The Government of the United States is a popular Government, their institutions are popular institutions, the spirit which presides over the manners and customs of private life, is a spirit springing directly from the masses, and which looks to the welfare of the masses as its sole and legitimate end and object. If, then, there be wanting that highly refined and polished class of gentlemen, which is to be found in England, on the other hand, you would search in vain for anything corresponding to the semi-barbarian class of peasants, that some of our counties exhibit. Men are more upon a level; if there be very few who cultivate the graces of external deportment, on the other hand, (to their lasting glory be it said,) there are very few that cannot read and write. And while the English traveller is fully justified in enjoying a good-humoured laugh at their neglect of the forms and decencies of life, an American traveller would be equally entitled to dwell upon our shortcomings, which if not so ludicrous in their nature, are, perhaps, after all, more disastrous in their effects. The only difference would be in the result. Whilst the British Lion would snore contentedly (or, still better, rouse himself to effect some improvement,) under the influence of their remarks, the feathers of the American Eagle are ruffled by the slightest breath of censure. Such a touchy people surely never existed. When they have accomplished something of which they can reasonably be proud, this absurd thin-skinnedness will be no longer discernible.

"Talking of the touchiness displayed by our Transatlantic cousins, I may be permitted to advert, once more, with regret, to the circumstance that the works of Hall, Trollope, Dickens, and other travellers, are looked upon by them as studied and malicious libels upon their national character. I once heard an American, at Washington, make the following remark, 'I was in Cincinnati for six months, and I do not think, that throughout the whole of that time, I met with three gentlemen.' The New York Hotel, in New York, has been recommended to me by another American, on the express ground, that 'it is not frequented by those vulgar Western people.' I have heard, over and over again, at Philadelphia, and elsewhere, that 'the Western States are inhabited by a fine population, but if you were to go there with the expectation of finding many men with gentlemanly manners, you would be disappointed. You would meet with some curious specimens, down there Sir.' Americans themselves have repeatedly begged me to wait and go West. 'You would be so much amused at the fellows you would meet with on the steamers, down there,' they have said. And yet, when Mr. Dickens, after passing through the Eastern cities, (the state of society in which, he, for the most part, eulogises,) comes to exhibit a good-natured portrait, or even caricature, of some of these peculiar personages of Ohio and Missouri, a hundred reviews and newspapers bristle up to fling the lie in his teeth. This is very absurd. Besides which, the Bostonian, or Baltimorean, who, in speaking of the Down Wester, tells you, very reasonably, that the same refinement cannot be expected in a new and unsettled country, as is to be found in cities of longer standing, (Boston and Baltimore for example,) should remember that the very same remark, though in a modified form, is applicable to the manners of his own city and state, when compared with those of Europe."

As full of light reading, but not without sterling sense, as well as playful humour, of pointed but not malicious satire, proof enough has been given that no one will be likely to yawn over this book, or lay it down until he has done with its contents.

Turning from prose to poetry, what say our readers to the following picture of a baby culled from a recent volume of poems by W. C. Bennett. Nothing more difficult, as painters know, than to catch on canvass the evanescent graces of childhood—to fix its rapidly fleeting and alternating images; nor does it require less the hand of a master to translate them into verse. From two or three, all equally beautiful, we take the following:—

"BABY MAY.

"CHEEKS as soft as July peachers:
Lips whose dewy scarlet teaches
Poppies paleness; round large eyes
Ever great with new surprise;
Minutes filled with shadeless gladness;
Minutes just as brimm'd with sadness;
Happy smiles and wailing cries;
Crows and laughs with tearful eyes;
Lights and shadows, swifter born
Than on windwept Autumn corn;
Ever some new tiny notion,
Making every limb all motion;
Catching up of legs and arms;
Throwings back and small alarms:
Clutching fingers; straightening jerks;
Twining feet whose each toe works;
Kickings up and straining risings;
Mother's ever new surprisings;
Hands all wants and looks all wonder
At all things the heavens under;

Tiny scorns of smiled reprovings
 That have more of love than lovings;
 Mischiefs done with such a winning
 Archness that we prize such sinning;
 Breakings dire of plates and glasses;
 Graspings small at all that passes;
 Pullings off of all that's able
 To be caught from tray or table;
 Silences—small meditations
 Deep as thoughts of cares for nations;
 Breaking into wisest speeches
 In a tongue that nothing teaches;
 All the thoughts of whose possessing
 Must be wooed to light by guessing;
 Slumbers—such sweet angel-seemings
 That we'd ever have such dreamings;
 Till from sleep we see thee breaking,
 And we'd always have thee waking;
 Wealth for which we know no measure;
 Pleasure high above all pleasure;
 Gladness brimming over gladness;
 Joy in care; delight in sadness;
 Loveliness beyond completeness;
 Sweetness distancing all sweetness;
 Beauty all that beauty may be;—
 That's May Bennett; that's my baby."

THE VINTAGE.

STOTHARD was certainly the prince of book illustrators, and his graceful and classic pencil never, perhaps, realized anything more beautiful than the group before us, conceived in the very spirit of Raffaele, yet with an originality peculiar to the painter. Stothard is not to be cited so much for the accuracy of his drawing, as for the feeling which runs through all his works. Others may surpass him in the correct rendering of mere form; but where, now that he is gone, shall we look for that living grace and beauty that gives a charm to even the humblest effort of his pencil?

DIFFICULTIES OF MARRIAGE IN GERMANY.

AMONGST the better classes in this country, such things as elopements are seldom or never heard of. No such thing as getting married here without the consent of parents! Certain prescribed forms must be gone through, or the marriage is null and void. The proposal being formally made and accepted, then comes the verlobung, or betrothal. This takes place, for the most part, privately; shortly after which, the father of the bride (as she is then called) gives a dinner or supper to the families and the most intimate friends on both sides, when the fact is declared, and leave given to publish it to the world, who, however, has generally been fortunate enough to anticipate the information. The cards of betrothal are then circulated amongst their friends and acquaintance, and, as it may interest some of my fair readers to see how these things are managed in Germany, here follows one:—

When the day is fixed, (and in this country they do not brook delay,) then follows the protocolling, or whatever else they call it; and the testimonials on both sides, required by the government, afford a beautiful specimen of ceremonious legislation. We copy from the printed form lying before us what these certificates are expected to show, and what must of necessity be established ere a marriage licence can be obtained. The king, as a careful father of his people, does not like to have unhealthy children. The first thing, therefore, is to prove that you have been vaccinated. Then comes the "week-day school ticket," in testimony of a regular attendance there; also a "Sunday-school ticket." A "certificate of attendance upon a religious teacher," and another of "confirmation" is also required. Then a "conduct certificate," a "service book," a "wanderbuch," (this refers to the compulsory travels of their Handwerks-burschen.) An "apprentice ticket" must also be exhibited, and a "statement made and substantiated as to property," which, if not considered to be satisfactory, according to circumstances, destroys the whole thing. The "permission from the parents, on both sides," must be likewise produced. A "residence permission ticket," a "certificate as to the due performance of militia duties," an "examination ticket," and also one as to "business, trade, or occupation" at the time. Those in a higher class of life, besides (with a few natural exceptions) the above, have yet other things to do, proofs to make, and cautions to give ere the knot of matrimony can be tied. As one instance, it may be mentioned that every Bavarian officer, without distinction, must deposit in the hands of Government such a capital (by way of guarantee) as, at 4 per cent., shall produce annually, at the least, 400 florins! Without this, or the king's dispensation, which is seldom, or now never, obtained, the permission to marry is withheld. The capital, once deposited, is intangible, being intended as some provision for the wife and family after his death.—Pictures of Nuremberg.

ON telling Socrates that such a one was nothing improved by his travels,—"I very well believe it," said he, "for he took himself along with him."

The smallest and slightest impediments are the most piercing; and as little letters most tire the eyes, so do little affairs most disturb us.

There is no so good man, that so squares all his thoughts and actions to the laws, that he is not faulty enough to deserve hanging ten times in his life.

Aristo used to say that neither a bath nor a lecture did signify anything, unless they scoured and made men clean.

The want of goods is easily repaired; the poverty of the soul is irreparable.—Montaigne.

AFRICA.

THE past year has been remarkable as a year of progress. In many cases the results have not appeared, but great movements are ripening towards a catastrophe under the genial influence of an educated public opinion. Among the important achievements of the period are the plans maturing for a more complete conquest of the ocean, and the subjugation, for the use of man, of the three elements—fire, air, and water. We have just received accounts of the assembling of the forces, as we may term them, which are to hew down the great barrier between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans. The Isthmus of Panama will soon be traversed by the railway train, and the Nicaragua canal will afterwards unite those mighty waters. The first sod of railway in India has been turned. A link of steam will also be laid down between England and her flourishing settlements in Australia. Active preparations are making for opening a channel for commerce from the Mediterranean into the Red Sea, and as a guarantee that these are not ideal projects, never to be realized, a great triumph has been actually accomplished, and arrangements made for a line of steamers between England and the Cape of Good Hope.

Great Britain and Africa will, within a few weeks, have approached within thirty days' journey of each other. A new bond has sprung up between them; a new era has opened on the dark old continent, for the more attention is bestowed on it, the sooner will the day of its deliverance arrive. The country has reason to be well satisfied with this plan. It is excellently conceived, and we confidently trust to its being well carried out. A new impulse will thus be given to civilization on the African coast; commerce will be extended; mutual relations strengthened; our colonies advanced, and the general sum of human prosperity increased. For whatever tends to bring countries, as well as individuals together, serves to subdue their barbarism, and to develop in the one instance the riches, as in the other the qualities, of which each may happen to be possessed. Therefore, as we look upon the establishment of steam communication with the Cape as the commencement of a new era in the history of Africa, we intend to devote a few pages to a subject which will henceforward possess an increasing interest.

Third in size among the great divisions of the globe, Africa has long been among them the least civilized, and least useful to the rest of the world. Regions discovered since this vast continent had lost in antiquity the account of its first intercourse with Europe, have risen to the first rank among civilized states. While their shores are covered with cities, their lands populous, and their ports crowded with commerce, hers are chiefly ruled by savage native kings or still more savage conquerors; her once fertile tracts are deserts, and many of her harbours receive and dismiss fleets laden only with slaves. It is as though a curse rested on the soil. Some geographers maintain that Africa, exhausted and useless, will one day be engulfed among the united waters of the Atlantic, Indian and Southern Oceans, while the ever-growing islands of the Oriental Archipelago and the Pacific will gradually increase until the whole tract appears above water and forms a more fortunate and mightier continent, sitting above the line, in place of the sunken deserts of Sahara and Libya.

"But where is Africa? I seek in vain
Her swarthy shore along its native main!
Methinks I hear a wailing in the wild
As of a mother weeping o'er her child!
Her fate lies buried in mysterious night
Where the wide waters of the globe unite,
And where the moonlight paved her hills with smiles,
The billows moan amid a hundred isles!"¹

This theory, however originated by grave geographers and favoured by the fancy of the poet, should by no means place Africa beyond the sympathies of philanthropy. Whatever she may be now, she once enriched the world, and will again be received into the communion of civilization. Her situation is admirable for intercourse with all other countries. With the map of the world spread before us, we find Africa in the centre of the three other quarters. The Mediterranean, which bounds its northern coast for almost a thousand miles from east to west, separates it from Europe by a distance at one place of not more than ten, seldom a hundred, and never three hundred miles. The Red Sea, dividing it on the north-east from Asia, is one of the narrowest on the globe. By one slight neck of land, soon to be pierced by a canal, it is connected with Arabia and Palestine. To the west it is throughout its extent opposite America, while on the east, the richest shores in India may be reached within thirty days. England will shortly be within a month's voyage. What the north-west passage would give to Great Britain, Africa possesses as commanding the approaches from Europe to the "exhaustless east." Her mighty coast-line of fifteen thousand miles embraces an area of fourteen millions, extending from north to south 4,302 miles, and from east to west 4,127. Thus it stretches through the whole of the torrid zone, and includes within its borders 11° lat. of the southern, and 14° of the northern temperate zones, enjoying some of the finest climates and most productive soils on the face of the earth.²

When commerce flourished in its vigorous infancy at Tyre, ships sailed from that opulent city in search of the rich products of Africa. When Judæa was a wealthy kingdom, Solomon sent vessels to range the shores of Tarshish, once supposed to indicate a single province, but now admitted to have been applied to the whole continent. The gold of Ophir, believed by some to have been brought from the Malayan Peninsula, was collected on the eastern coast. Thus the most famous cities of ancient times opened the intercourse with Africa, which the Phœnicians, the mariners of Carthage, and the merchants of Greece continued to carry on, until the splendid republic declined, and left to Rome a task which she almost neglected to perform. We learn that the traders of Athens procured from the great Peninsula gold in dust and ingots, blocks of ebony and ivory from a country where it was so plentiful that the cattle-sheds were enclosed with palings made of elephants' teeth. Black slaves, linen, medicinal roots, perfumes and aromatic spices, dyes rivalling in depth and brilliance the purple of Tyre, kermes, dried locusts as materia medica, with alum, salt, cinnabar, and many precious stones, were brought to the marts of Greece. Ostrich feathers, to adorn the crests of helmets; slabs of citron-wood, for the making of tables; beautiful marbles, many gums, oils, roots, and other commodities, too various to enumerate, ministered to the wants and luxuries of wealthy Greece. Egypt was her granary; but that superb kingdom, with all others on the shores of Africa, was swallowed up by the enormous conquests of the Romans, and a vast blank in history succeeds this memorable period.

When the democratic institutions of the ancient republics degenerated into aristocracies, and, ultimately, were degraded by the change to imperialism, civilization appears to have sunk to sleep, and not to have awakened until the revival of letters in the fourteenth century. Commerce, under the same baneful influence, became inactive, and, although still carried on, displayed little of the lustre which once rendered Carthage, though an African state, the dangerous competitor of Rome.

The conquests of the Mohammedans, indeed, spread over Africa, and enterprises were undertaken by the adventurous to penetrate its mysterious depths, and lay down the outline of its enormous coasts; but the continent still stretched as though interminably to the south, and was lost in mystery. When printing was discovered, and men were opening their minds to knowledge, the Portuguese commenced the grand career of discovery, which adorned the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries with an un-fading lustre. The Cape, named "Non," from the belief that it forbade the sailor's advance, was at length passed. The mariners pursued the shore, still lengthening as they sailed, and Cape Bojador, 160 miles southward, was reached. Its aspect appeared to warn them from further adventure, but in 1433 the formidable promontory was doubled, and the navigators entered the tropics. Nearly forty years elapsed before they crossed the Line, and sailed into those seas supposed by the ancients to boil under the fervour of the sun. In less than thirteen years from that date they advanced fifteen hundred miles beyond the Equator. The Cape was discovered, hopes were excited of finding a passage to India, and at length, in 1497, Vasco di Gama reached the gates of the East, and steered through the stormy ocean that breaks round the Cape of Good Hope:—

"O'er India's sea, wing'd on by balmy gales,
That whisper'd peace, soft swell'd the steady sails."⁽¹⁾

But after this happy discovery immense blanks remained on the map, and the enterprise of Europe was for ages engaged in tracing the course of rivers, laying down the windings of the coast, and exploring the kingdoms of Africa. America, indeed, possessing the powerful attraction of novelty, diverted the attention of the world, and long intervals elapsed between the fits of English enthusiasm. Many travellers, nevertheless, set out on journeys; some to explore the course of the Niger, others to traverse the desert, others to examine the resources of the coast. Many fell victims to disease, and were buried on the banks of the Black River; others were killed by the natives, and left their bones to bleach on the caravan-routes across the wastes of Sahara. The names of Jobson, Stibbs, Bruce, Ledyard, Lucas, Ben Ali, Houghton, Mungo Park, Hornemann, Nichols, Browne, Roentzen, Burekhardt, Tuckie, Peddie, Campbell, Stokoe, Gray, Ritchie, Lyon, Denham, Clapperton, Oudney, and the faithful Lander, are all those of famous wanderers through the African continent. Park, the solitary pedestrian, discovered the mysterious Niger, flowing through countries hitherto unknown, with a stream as broad as the Thames at Westminster; and Clapperton and Oudney, two unpretending young men, committing themselves in a frail canoe to its waters, were borne by a strange current through 600 miles of a savage region to its long-sought termination in the sea.

Clapperton was told by Bello, Sultan of the Fulahs, Filatahs, or Fellahs, that in the eastern part of Sudan dwelt a race so attached to the sound of the letter F that the names of ninety-nine mountains began with it. Three of them were Fazuglu, Faffuku, and Fandufu. Upon this, two recent travellers¹ indulged in the following extravagant but pleasant conceit:—

It is funny that these Fellahs are so fond of the letter F, but unfortunate for folly that they could not furnish fuller facts for the following frivolous flight of fancy:—

"Fish, flesh, and fowl, and fruitful fields,
For fortune's favourite, friend or foe,
Fazuglu finds, Fandufu yields.
Where Furzi, Furdo, Faff'klu flow,
They fecundate to furnish food
For far-famed Fellahs, first who fought
For fierce Dan Fodio;² free of thought,
Or fill full fast from foaming flood,
Foul feral Fitre fever fraught."

Gradually settlements were formed on the Western, Eastern and Southern coasts, where the English, Dutch, and Portuguese established themselves to carry on traffic with the native princes. They found the country to be inhabited by seven races of people; the Hottentots at the Cape, the Kaffirs their neighbours, the Abyssinians in their hilly country on the east, the Numidians, a race apparently created to be conquered, the Nubians inhabiting all the regions spread round Abyssinia, the Egyptians on the banks of the Nile, and the Negro family scattered over the vast tracts stretching from the southern confines, of the Great Desert, as far as 20° of south latitude. In what numbers, however, these nations exist no one knows. That our ignorance is complete, may be shown by the fact, that one estimate allows sixty, another seventy, another more than a hundred millions as the population of the continent.

What the Europeans, however, looked for at first was ivory, with precious metals, and spices; they found elephants' teeth, gold, and other valuable commodities, which rendered the possession of an African colony important to a trading nation.

Into the details of vicissitudes suffered by Africa and the pretenders to the possession of her soil, our limits will not allow us to enter. They belong to general history, and the reader may look far to find them completely described in any single work. We want a history of Africa, as much as one of Insular Asia. At present, however, we may offer a sketch of the recent progress of discovery, and follow it by a view of the present aspect of the slave trade, the state of commerce, and the condition of the English settlements at the Cape and on the Coast.

Among the great problems which have perplexed geographers, the sources of the Nile and the Niger have been among the most interesting. The great river of Egypt is the traveller's Mecca. For the empire that flourished on its banks, for the beautiful relics of art, and the magnificent works of industry, bequeathed to us by the pride of that fallen power, it possesses a perpetual claim on our attention, but also for the mystery which still hides the remote springs that pour their tribute into its channel. The discovery of the source of the Blue River, by Bruce, was once accepted as the solution of the question; but the Western branch, or White Nile, which is an infinitely larger stream, still remains unexplored to its birthplace among the interior mountains. Traveller after traveller has complacently announced himself as the great discoverer, whose star had outshone that of Bruce, but further examination has, in all cases, shown that the main stream had not been traced to its fountain head. From the days of Alexander to our own time the inquiry has been carried on, and it is still incomplete. The last attempt was set on foot by Mohammed Ali, the late able and ambitious, but ferocious Viceroy of Egypt. The result of the expedition may be briefly described, to show that the honour is even now reserved for some future explorer, to connect his name for ever with the source of the Bahr el Abiad.

Ferdinand Werne commenced his journey in 1840. He was sent, not to find the source of the Nile, but to aid science in the interest of avarice, by opening an easy route to the famous gold countries beyond the Mountains of the Moon. From the junction of the Blue with the White Nile, he sailed with his company in large river vessels. The stream was broad and beautiful, bordered by an undulating woody country, and spangled with the brilliant white lotus. Vast tribes of barbarians inhabit the borders, dwelling in villages, which follow each other in rapid succession along the course of the river. At times the stream contracted and rolled rapidly along; at times it expanded in vast lakes, and was lost to sight on either side, while in some places its broad surface, glittering with lotuses and studded with green islands, was bounded by low forests or broken lines of hills.

At sunset the travellers enjoyed a prospect almost equal in beauty to any presented among the islands of the East. The wide stream, glowing like liquid gold, rippled softly along, darkening as the sun hid itself behind the Araskol, and the slender sickle of the moon shone clearer in the west, with Venus in an unclouded sky. The islands stood out, with their thick groves, from the tranquil water; and, on the other side, the tapering peaks of the mountains grew dim in the deep blue, behind a line of dusky woods. On the shore the crews crowded round the bright fires; some cooking, some singing songs in chorus; others dancing or leaping in the glare of the flames. Long streaks of light fell from the rising blazes over the river, and the vessels lay under the shadow of the banks,—the only sign of civilization in the whole savage scene. Gradually the light thickens, the deep flush of sunset disappears, the white rays of the moon silver the hills, woods, and the stream; the revel ceases, and the landscape becomes as still as though its silence had never been disturbed since the day of creation.

Through such scenes the explorers proceeded for hundreds of miles, passing out of one kingdom into another, leaving the inhabited for the uninhabited, the woody for the naked, the level for the hilly country. From the "land swarming with gnats" they passed into the "Region of Lakes," peopled by a gigantic race of men. After many adventures, which we cannot now pause to describe, they reached the far-famed Mountains of the Moon, long supposed to lie beyond the sources of the Nile. Beyond these a bar of rocks obstructed their progress, and they were compelled to return. Here, however, they were beyond the Mountains of the Moon. The last map of Africa, constructed on a magnificent scale, "according to the latest authorities," traced the Nile within seven degrees of the Equator. Twenty years before it was carried within twelve degrees, so that although Werne failed in his great object, he actually visited the Mountains of the Moon, and has reported to Europe the important fact that within four degrees, or about two hundred and eighty miles, of the central line which encompasses the globe, the mighty and mysterious stream still flowed with majestic breadth, and was navigable for vessels of considerable size and burden.

Next to the Nile, the Niger is the most interesting of African streams. Like the great river of Egypt, it is influenced by a periodical rise, which, indeed, visits all the rivers of Abyssinia, the Blue and the White

(1) We reserve a detailed notice of the various attempts made to discover these mysterious fountains, with the numerous theories concerning them, for a separate paper, to be written by a gentleman now basking in the sun of Egypt, on the bosom of Old Nile.

Nile, the Senegal, with all its tributaries, the Joliba, the Congo, and the Zambazec.

For many ages the curiosity of the world was excited to discover the sources of the Niger, and some of the most famous travellers' names are associated with the enterprise. So lately, however, has any real information been obtained, that we find in a work written little more than fifty years ago that it is "a great river of Africa, supposed to have its original near that of the Nile." According to our present ideas, more than 2,000 miles of solid land, embracing many kingdoms, intersected by vast streams, and ridged by high chains of mountains, lie between. From the same account, published especially for the edification of geographers, we learn that this, the Black River of the ancients, rises near the confines of Upper Ethiopia. It then runs "a prodigiously long course," from east to west, some 3,000 miles, and after approaching within four miles of the "Western Ocean," turns to the south, flows some eighty miles in that direction, and enters the sea near the spot where the Senegal pays its tribute to the Atlantic. So much for the geography of fifty years ago.

But while this account was concocting, Mungo Park was wandering on foot through the kingdom of Bambara, where his hopes were crowned, and he saw "the long-sought majestic Niger, glittering in the morning sun, as broad as the Thames at Westminster, and flowing slowly to the eastward."

From that period discovery proceeded, but much in connexion with the mighty river remains still doubtful. From all that we know, it is supposed to rise in the Snowy Mountains, on the borders of Ganora, about two hundred and fifty miles from the Ivory Coast. It flows first to the north-west, thence to the north-east, continues in that direction as far as the long-sought and fallen city of Timbuctoo, makes a complete curve there, rolls in a broad and deep stream south-east, changes to due east, receives the waters of the Chadda, and then flows through many channels into the Gulf of Guinea, after a course of more than 2,500 miles.

For some of these details we still rely on the reports of native travellers and conjectures based on a comparison of their theories. There is still, therefore a great task unperformed, which it is left for some explorer to achieve. The last expedition to the Niger was singularly fruitless of results. It sailed in 1840, and proposed to explore the stream, to make treaties with the savage kinglings inhabiting its banks, to plant the influence of England in the interior, and establish a model farm; to discourage the slave-trade, and open a commerce with the native nations. The end was melancholy. The river fever struck great numbers of the adventurers, and many who had left England full of heart and hope, were laid in their graves under a lonely grove on the island of Fernando Po. The native kings, in some instances, accepted treaties, but afterwards exercised the royal prerogative of breaking faith. The model farm was abandoned, partly from the hostility of the people, but partly also from the mismanagement of its founders. Altogether the expedition, which set out with flourishing auspices, accomplished little save proving the deadly nature of the climate at the borders of the Niger. Every precaution was adopted, but in vain. The steamers proceeded a few hundred miles, and were compelled to return, and in melancholy dejection our countrymen gave up the project.

A general view of the condition of our knowledge of Africa, though it must be of the slightest kind, may still be interesting. Few regions in their outward aspect offer so much to the curious observation of man. The great desert, whose hot and barren solitudes are traversed by the native traders in their annual caravans, presents an invincible barrier against the march of armies across its centre from west to east. A line of oases, indeed, refreshed by copious springs, lies like a chain along its arid surface, from the great Lake Shad to the foot of the Black Mountains. Scattered at intervals few and far between over the vast Sahara, are wells surrounded by small patches of green, to which the fancy, fainting after the weary travel of the desert, imparts a magical beauty. Eastward lie—

"The tufted isles
That verdant rise amid the Libyan wild;"

but with the exception of those happy spots—the stars, as it were, that lighten up the gloom of the desert—one mighty waste is spread from the Atlantic to the Valley of the Nile, and beyond it to the borders of the Red Sea. From the mountains which shut it in on the north, descend many rivers whose waters, after a course of from one to two hundred miles, are swallowed up by the thirsty sand.

Thus the mighty tract, beautifully compared by ancient poets to a leopard's skin, extends from north to south about eight hundred, and from east to west more than three thousand miles, varied only by the fertile valley of Egypt, the oases of Libya, and the "Isles of the Blessed," which form the only smiles on the frowning face of the Saharan desert. The most recent explorer of this region was Richardson, who is now engaged in penetrating to the centre, and acquiring a complete knowledge of the routes from one side of the continent to the other.

South of the desert lies an immense populous tract watered by many rivers, very fertile, but covered chiefly with woods. Several of the numerous territories into which it is divided, are ungenial to the European constitution, and all are inhabited by barbarous races of men. There is the great field of slavery. Over these two thousand miles the degenerate savages are scattered, in subjection to heathen kings,—curses of the earth—who revel in their subjects' blood, and draw their resources from the sale of the unhappy people. Here humanity is seen in its uncouthest form. Human sacrifices, of fearful extent, bloody slave hunts, abominable orgies in the name of religion, the lowest and the basest superstition, with customs too horrible and filthy to describe, prevail among millions of beings. The earth is poorly tilled, and vast tracts of it are left totally wild. Mines remain unworked, and immense natural treasures wholly undeveloped. Rivers, towns, tribes, hills, lakes, and even kingdoms exist here unknown to Europeans, and only described in the reports of the barbarian traders. It is evident that civilization has found few resting-places on this "wild and swarthy shore"

On the borders of the Atlantic and the Eastern Oceans, the Red and the Mediterranean Seas, as well as around the Nubian Deserts, lie kingdoms which we cannot enumerate. At the extreme south is our flourishing and important colony of the Cape of Good Hope, whose prosperity will shortly receive such an impulse from steam communication with Great Britain. Rounding the famous promontory of Rams, and sailing northward, we reach the newly settled district of Natal. Of these settlements we shall have more to say, especially of the latter, which has recently been much misrepresented.

On the shores of the Mediterranean lies Algeria, the scene of French conquest, which presents some curious facts for our contemplation in another notice. At a few other points on the coast European flags have been fixed, but principally as naval stations. It will be remembered that Gordon Cumming, who displayed so much manly valour in his conflicts with the gazelles and giraffes of South Africa, penetrated further into the countries beyond Kaffirland than any previous traveller. He crossed extensive tracts north of the Bamangwato Mountains, among the boundless elephant forests. He found them inhabited by numerous tribes, and densely swarming with the nobler orders of the animal creation. Many other gentlemen have, within a few years, visited different parts of Africa, obtaining a knowledge of their resources and their social state. One has just returned with an interesting picture of life in Dahomey, another has described his visit to Algeria, another has accompanied a French expedition among the wild tribes of the Kabylie. Mr. Richardson, with several companions, is, as we have said, exploring the interior. Bayle St. John lately visited the little-known Oases of Garah and Siwahah, and is now prosecuting his researches on the banks of the Nile, though we know not whether he may be enabled to reach the White River and explore it even so far as Werner went.

With this slight glance at the aspect of Africa, and the recent endeavours to improve our knowledge of its geography, we conclude our first notice of the great continent. We shall next sketch, briefly, the present state of the slave trade, the foreign and domestic commerce, the condition of our settlements, and the French possessions. A plan has been proposed for extirpating by the roots the inhuman traffic in negroes. This we shall briefly describe and submit it to discussion. Many projects have been started, but all have, hitherto, failed, though our African squadron does good service by checking what it cannot destroy. It will be a melancholy day for Africa, if ever this check should be withdrawn. We are advancing towards success in the great object which humanity has in view, and it will be poor policy now to abandon the African coasts to the undisputed reign of slavers, that they may run riot in their hideous occupation. The Americans are anxious to abolish the vile traffic. Let it be remembered we gave it to them. It is an inheritance they received from Great Britain, but their landed proprietors, the aristocratic lords of the soil, in the southern states, cling to it, and it is only by civilizing Africa that we can cut off their supply of slaves.

LOVE GIFTS.

(FROM THE ITALIAN)

BY S. LEY WOLMER.

Two gentle lovers to an absent friend
Some gifts of love's remembrance fain would send.
The youth an off'ring of a rose-bud bore,
The damsel on her breast a lily wore:
This rose, he said, her clustering hair shall deck,
And this fair gem shall sparkle on her neck.
And I this lily send, the girl replied;
My chaste'n'd flower shall be thy rose's bride.
Sweet love, the youth replied, Oh! never spare
From thy fair breast the lily—guard it there.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF EMINENT MEN.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

EVERYBODY has heard of Benjamin Franklin, how from a poor printer's boy he raised himself, by following out his own maxims of thrift and perseverance, to be one of the first citizens of Philadelphia; that he took an important part in the struggle which ensured the independence of America, became her representative in foreign courts, and died full of years and honours, embalmed in the hearts of his countrymen, and venerated by the whole civilized world. In the intervals of leisure he left behind him an Autobiography, certainly one of the most delectable as well as the most instructive ever penned by mortal. As the whole may now be bought for a shilling, we shall allow ourselves but a few racy extracts, which will serve however to convey a distinct idea of the moral idiosyncrasy of the man.

In proposing to write his memoirs, Franklin sets out in the peculiar vein of pleasantry that runs through all his writings:—

"In thus employing myself, I shall yield to the inclination so natural to old men, of talking of themselves and their own actions; and I shall indulge it without being tiresome to those who, from respect to my age, might conceive themselves obliged to listen to me, since they will be always free to read me or not. And, lastly (I may as well confess it, as the denial of it would be believed by nobody), I shall, perhaps, not a little gratify my own vanity. Indeed, I never heard or saw the introductory words, 'Without vanity I may say, &c., but some vain thing immediately followed. Most people dislike vanity in others, whatever share they have of it themselves; but I give it fair quarter wherever I meet with it, being persuaded that it is often productive of good to the possessor, and to others who are within his sphere of action; and therefore, in many cases, it would not be altogether absurd, if a man were to thank God for his vanity among the other comforts of his life."—P. 2.

After tracing the events of his early youth—his engagement as a printer in his brother's office at Boston—we come to his departure for Philadelphia, with but few dollars in his pocket, but a fund of self-reliance whereon to draw for success. On his voyage, he tells us,

"Being becalmed off Block Island, our crew employed themselves in catching cod, and hauled up a great number. Till then, I had stuck to my resolution to eat nothing that had had life; and on this occasion I considered, according to my master Tryon, the taking every fish as a kind of unprovoked murder, since none of them had, or could do us any injury, that might justify this massacre. All this seemed very reasonable. But I had been formerly a great lover of fish, and when it came out of the frying-pan it smelt admirably well. I balanced some time between principle and inclination, till, recollecting that when the fish were opened I saw smaller fish taken out of their stomachs, then thought I, 'If you eat one another, I don't see why we may not eat you;' so I dined upon cod very heartily, and have since continued to eat as other people, returning only now and then occasionally to a vegetable diet. So convenient a thing it is to be a reasonable creature, since it enables one to find or make a reason for everything one has a mind to do."—P. 33.

Franklin, at first, got on but slowly in Philadelphia, and went over to England to try his fortune. While here he lets us a little into his religious views. Happening to meet with some arguments meant to refute infidelity, they produced in him the very opposite effect to that intended by the writer, and he became a confirmed Deist:—

"My arguments perverted some others, particularly Collins and Ralph; but, each of these having wronged me greatly without the least compunction, and recollecting Keith's conduct towards me, (who was another freethinker,) and my own towards Vernon and Miss Read, which at times gave me great trouble, I began to suspect that this doctrine, though it might be true, was not very useful. My London pamphlet, printed in 1725, which had for its motto these lines of Dryden:

'Whatever is, is right. But purblind man
Sees but a part o' the chain, the nearest links;
His eyes not carrying to that equal beam,
That poises all above;

and which, from the attributes of God, his infinite wisdom, goodness, and power, concluded that nothing could possibly be wrong in the world; and that vice and virtue were empty distinctions, no such things existing; appeared now not so clever a performance as I once thought it; and I doubted whether some error had not insinuated itself unperceived into my argument, so as to infect all that followed, as is common in metaphysical reasonings."—Pp. 53, 54.

Uninfluenced by Christianity, as a vital principle, Franklin nevertheless strenuously endeavoured to regulate his life by the principles of virtue. In following out this plan, he went to work with that method and system that distinguished all his actions:—

"I made," he tells us, "a little book, in which I allotted a page for each of the virtues. I ruled each page with red ink, so as to have seven columns, one for each day of the week, marking each column with a letter for the day. I crossed these columns with thirteen red lines, marking the beginning of each line with the first letter of one of the virtues; on which line, and in its proper column, I might mark, by a little black spot, every fault I found upon examination to have been committed respecting that virtue, upon that day.

"I determined to give a week's strict attention to each of the virtues successively. Thus, in the first week, my great guard was to avoid every the least offence against Temperance; leaving the other virtues to their ordinary chance, only marking every evening the faults of the day. Thus, if in the first week I could keep my first line, marked T, clear of spots, I supposed the habit of that virtue so much strengthened, and its opposite weakened, that I might venture extending my attention to include the next, and for the following week keep both lines clear of spots.

Proceeding thus to the last, I could get through a course complete in thirteen weeks, and four courses in a year. And like him, who, having a garden to weed, does not attempt to eradicate all the bad herbs at once, which would exceed his reach and his strength, but works on one of the beds at a time, and, having accomplished the first, proceeds to a second; so I should have, I hoped, the encouraging pleasure of seeing on my pages the progress made in virtue, by clearing successively my lines of their spots; till in the end, by a number of courses, I should be happy in viewing a clean book, after a thirteen weeks' daily examination."—Pp. 77, 78.

Although when tested by this arithmetical process he was surprised to find himself "so much fuller of faults than he had imagined," he made, on the whole, decided advance in virtue, though unable to attain unto absolute perfection. In one particular, as he deploras,—

"I made so little progress in amendment, and had such frequent relapses, that I was almost ready to give up the attempt, and content myself with a faulty character in that respect. Like the man, who, in buying an axe of a smith, my neighbour, desired to have the whole of its surface as bright as the edge. The smith consented to grind it bright for him, if he would turn the wheel; he turned while the smith pressed the broad face of the axe hard and heavily on the stone, which made the turning of it very fatiguing. The man came every now and then from the wheel to see how the work went on; and at length would take his axe as it was, without further grinding. 'No,' said the smith, 'turn on, turn on, we shall have it bright by and by; as yet it is only speckled.' 'Yes,' said the man, 'but I think I like a speckled axe best.' And I believe this may have been the case with many, who, having for want of some such means as I employed found the difficulty of obtaining good, and breaking bad habits, in other points of vice and virtue, have given up the struggle, and concluded that 'a speckled axe is best.' For something, that pretended to be reason, was every now and then suggesting to me, that such extreme nicety as I exacted of myself might be a kind of foppery in morals, which, if it were known, would make me ridiculous; that a perfect character might be attended with the inconvenience of being envied and hated; and that a benevolent man should allow a few faults in himself, to keep his friends in countenance."—p. 81.

Few persons, it must be admitted, displayed equal candour in estimating their own character, and in listening to the strictures of others.

"My list of virtues," he says, "contained at first but twelve; but a Quaker friend having kindly informed me, that I was generally thought proud; that my pride showed itself frequently in conversation; that I was not content with being in the right when discussing any point, but was overbearing, and rather insolent, of which he convinced me by mentioning several instances; I determined to endeavour to cure myself, if I could, of this vice or folly among the rest; and I added Humility to my list, giving an extensive meaning to the word.

"I cannot boast of much success in acquiring the reality of this virtue, but I had a good deal with regard to the appearance of it. In reality there is, perhaps, no one of our natural passions so hard to subdue as pride. Disguise it, struggle with it, stifle it, mortify it as much as one pleases, it is still alive, and will every now and then peep out and show itself; you will see it, perhaps, often in this history. For, even if I could conceive that I had completely overcome it, I should probably be proud of my humility." —Pp. 83, 84.

Franklin now conceived what he calls a great and extensive project. Observing that in human affairs everything is carried on by party interest, he proposed to raise a United Party for Virtue, a sort of moral freemasonry, to be called by the attractive title of "The Society of the Free and Easy." "Free," he observes, as being, by the general practice and habits of the virtuous, free from the dominion of vice, and particularly, by the practice of industry and frugality, free from debt, which exposes a man to constraint, and a species of slavery to his creditors." This plan, however, so promising for the interests of humanity, was never destined to be carried out.

From these specimens of Franklin's schemes, the reader may be apt to suspect that he was little better than a crazy visionary. So far from it, he was, perhaps, the most practical man that ever lived, and did most good in his day and generation. He was not of those, who, as they get wealthy, wrap themselves up in their own selfish comforts and conveniences. His mind was perpetually active in devising something for the benefit of his fellow citizens. He established the first library in Philadelphia—gave a tone to the public mind—founded a Philosophical society, to which his own experiments gave celebrity—was chosen representative for his city, and at last became so essential a portion of its economy, that, as he tells us, when any new plan was started, every one said to his neighbour—Have you consulted Franklin on the business, and what does he say to it?

It was whilst Franklin was thus at the zenith of popularity, that Philadelphia was visited by Whitfield. It would be difficult to hit upon two characters more strikingly contrasted. Whitfield's object was to collect money for an orphan asylum he was building in Georgia. Franklin thought that Philadelphia would have been a better place for it, and therefore refused to subscribe; but the enthusiasm of the preacher proved an overmatch for the caution of the philosopher.

"I happened," says the latter, "soon after to attend one of his sermons, in the course of which I perceived he intended to finish with a collection, and I silently resolved he should get nothing from me. I had in my pocket a handful of copper money, three or four silver dollars, and five pistoles in gold. As he proceeded I began to soften, and concluded to give the copper. Another stroke of his oratory made me ashamed of that, and determined me to give the silver; and he finished so admirably, that I emptied my pocket wholly into the collector's dish, gold and all. At this sermon there was also one of our club, who, being of my sentiments respecting the building in Georgia, and suspecting a collection might be intended, had by precaution emptied his pockets before he came from home. Towards the conclusion of the discourse, however, he felt a strong inclination to give, and applied to a neighbour, who stood near him, to lend him some money for the purpose. The request was fortunately made to perhaps the only man in the company who had the firmness not to be affected by the preacher. His answer was, 'At any other time, friend Hopkinson, I would lend to thee freely; but not now; for thee seems to be out of thy right senses.' * * *

"The following instance will show the terms on which we stood. Upon one of his arrivals from England at Boston, he wrote to me, that he should come soon to Philadelphia, but knew not where he could lodge when there, as he understood his old friend and host, Mr. Benezet, was removed to Germantown. My answer was, 'You know my house; if you can make shift with its scanty accommodations, you will be most heartily welcome.' He replied, that if I made that kind offer for Christ's sake, I should not miss of a reward. And I returned, 'Don't let me be mistaken; it was not for Christ's sake, but your sake.' One of our common acquaintance jocosely remarked, that, knowing it to be the custom of the saints, when they received any favour, to shift the burden of the obligation from off their own shoulders, and place it in heaven, I had contrived to fix it on earth."

One of Whitfield's disciples having soon after asked his advice how to go to work to get subscriptions for a chapel, Franklin advised him as follows:—and the hint, we are persuaded, will not be lost upon those who are meditating a similar appeal.

"In the first place, I advise you to apply to all those who you know will give something; next, to those who you are uncertain whether they will give anything or not, and show them the list of those who have given; and lastly, do not neglect those who you are sure will give nothing; for in some of them you may be mistaken.' He laughed and thanked me, and said he would take my advice. He did so, for he asked of everybody; and he obtained a much larger sum than he expected, with which he erected the capacious and elegant meeting-house that stands in Arch Street."—P. 117.

One of Franklin's difficulties as a public man, was to get out of the Quakers, who were a majority in the council, and who stuck, in name at least, to their peace principles, a vote of supplies for the war then waging with France. When pressed hard, and compelled to yield—they saved their consciences by voting a small sum for the king's use. On one occasion, as he tells us:—

"They would not grant money to buy powder, because that was an ingredient of war, but they voted an aid to New England of three thousand pounds, to be put into the hands of the Governor, and appropriated it for the purchase of bread, flour, wheat, or other grain. Some of the Council, desirous of giving the House still further embarrassment, advised the Governor not to accept that provision, as not being the thing he had demanded; but he replied, 'I shall take the money, for I understand very well their meaning; other grain is gunpowder;' which he accordingly bought, and they never objected to it.

"It was in allusion to this fact, that when in our fire company we feared the success of our proposal in favour of the lottery, and I had said to a friend of mine, one of our members, 'If we fail, let us move the purchase of a fire engine with the money; the Quakers can have no objection to that: and then, if you nominate me, and I you, as a committee for that purpose, we will buy a great gun, which is certainly a fire engine:' 'I see,' said he, 'you have improved by being so long in the Assembly; your equivocal project would be just a match for their wheat or other grain.'"—Pp. 108, 109.

To which we may add this amusing story, communicated by one James Logan, who admitted the lawfulness of defensive warfare.

"He told me the following anecdote of his old master, William Penn, respecting defence. He came over from England when a young man with that Proprietary, and as his secretary. It was war time, and their ship was chased by an armed vessel, supposed to be an enemy. Their captain prepared for defence, but told William Penn and his company of Quakers that he did not expect their assistance, and they might retire into the cabin, which they did, except James Logan, who chose to stay upon deck, and was quartered to a gun. The supposed enemy proved a friend, so there was no fighting; but when the secretary went down to communicate the intelligence, William Penn rebuked him severely for staying upon deck, and undertaking to assist in defending the vessel, contrary to the principles of Friends; especially as it had not been required by the captain. This reprimand, being before all the company, piqued the secretary, who answered, 'I being thy servant, why did thee not order me come down? But thee was willing enough that I should stay and help to fight the ship when thee thought there was danger.'"—Pp. 107, 108.

Not long before the revolutionary war, Franklin was sent over to England as political agent for Pennsylvania. He had acquired a handsome fortune, and had attained to the highest post his countrymen had to bestow. His father, he tells us, when urging upon his children habits of industry and frugality, frequently repeated the proverb of Solomon, "Seest thou a man diligent in his calling, he shall stand before kings, he shall not stand before mean men." "I thence considered industry as a means of obtaining wealth and distinction, which encouraged me,—though I did not think that I should ever literally stand before kings, which, however, has since happened; for I have stood before five, and even had the honour of sitting down with one, the King of Denmark, to dinner." On his voyage he was very near being wrecked on the Scilly islands, of which incident he wrote an account, from Falmouth, to his wife, ending after this characteristic fashion—"The bell ringing for church, we went thither immediately, and, with hearts full of gratitude, returned sincere thanks to God for the mercies we had received. Were I a Roman Catholic, perhaps, I should on this occasion vow to build a chapel to some saint; but as I am not, if I were to vow at all, it should be to build a lighthouse."

Here, to the reader's great regret, terminates the Autobiography, with the philosopher's arrival in England. We cannot run through the subsequent events of his life, during and subsequent to the memorable struggle for the independence of America, in which he played so conspicuous a part. But having before us a volume of his letters, we are tempted to make a few quotations, to complete an idea of his character.

Franklin so thoroughly detested war, in a moral and economical point of view, that he bitterly deplored the long and sanguinary dispute between England and his native country. At last it terminated, and in a letter of congratulation to a friend he thus writes:—"I hope it will be lasting, and that mankind will at length, as they call themselves reasonable creatures, have reason and sense enough to settle their differences without cutting throats; for in my opinion, there never was a good war, or a bad peace." In a letter to Dr. Priestley, he thus writes, in a tone of satirical bitterness:—

"In what light we are viewed by superior beings, may be gathered from a piece of late West India news, which possibly has not yet reached you. A young angel of distinction being sent down to this world on some business, for the first time, had an old courier-spirit assigned him as a guide; they arrived over the seas of Martinico, in the middle of the long day of obstinate fight between the fleets of Rodney and De Grasse. When through the clouds of smoke he saw the fire of the guns, the decks covered with mangled limbs, and bodies dead or dying; the ships sinking, burning, or blown into the air; and the quantity of pain, misery, and destruction the crews yet alive were thus with so much eagerness dealing round to one another; he turned angrily to his guide, and said, You blundering blockhead, you are ignorant of your business; you undertook to conduct me to the earth, and you have brought me into hell! No, sir, says the guide, I have made no mistake; this is really the earth, and these are men. Devils never treat one another in this cruel manner: they have more sense, and more of what men (vainly) call humanity.

"But to be serious, my dear old friend, I love you as much as ever, and I love all the honest souls that meet at the London Coffee-house. I only wonder how it happened that they and my other friends in England came to be such good creatures in the midst of so perverse a generation. I long to see them and you once more; and I labour for peace with more earnestness, that I may again be happy in your sweet society." I. 107—109.

In another letter to Priestley, he gives this striking illustration of the trite argument for contentment:—

"All human situations have their inconveniences. We feel those that we find in the present; and we neither feel nor see those that exist in another. Hence we make frequent and troublesome changes without amendment, and often for the worse. In my youth I was passenger in a little sloop descending the River Delaware. There being no wind, we were obliged, when the ebb was spent, to cast anchor, and wait for the next. The heat of the sun on the vessel was excessive, the company strangers to me, and not very agreeable. Near the river side I saw what I took to be a pleasant green meadow, in the middle of which was a large shady tree, where it struck my fancy I could sit and read (having a book in my pocket), and pass the time agreeably till the tide turned. I therefore prevailed with the captain to put me ashore. Being landed, I found the greatest part of my meadow was really a marsh, in crossing which, to come at my tree, I was up to my knees in mire; and I had not placed myself under its shade five minutes before the mosquitoes in swarms found me out, attacked my legs, hands, and face, and made my reading and my rest impossible; so that I returned to the beach, and called for the boat to come and take me on board again, where I was obliged to bear the heat I had strove to quit, and also the laugh of the company. Similar cases in the affairs of life have since frequently fallen under my observation." I. 53, 54.

There are several letters in this book to Mr. Strahan, the king's printer, with whom Franklin appears to have lived upon a footing of most intimate friendship. The style of these letters is quite jocosé and playful; and the humour is frequently borrowed from the circumstance which begun their acquaintance, their common profession. Take the following specimen, which we give only for the curiosity of the thing; and as an instance of this great man, in his old age, (for he was eighty,) delighting to unbend in a strain of professional drollery with his ancient brother in trade. He is speaking of the evils which he is fond of deducing in our constitution from the number of profitable places under Government:—

"Those places, to speak in our old style, brother type, may be good for the CHAPEL, but they are bad for the master, as they create constant quarrels that hinder the business. For example, here are two months that your government has been employed in getting its form to press; which is not yet fit to work on, every page of it being squabbled, and the whole ready to fall into pye. The founts, too, must be very scanty, or strangely out of sorts, since your compositors cannot find either upper or lower-case letters sufficient to set the word ADMINISTRATION, but are forced to be continually turning for them. However, to return to common (though perhaps too saucy) language, don't despair; you have still one resource left, and that not a bad one, since it may re-unite the empire. We have some remains of affection for you, and shall always be ready to receive and take care of you in case of distress. So if you have not sense and virtue enough to govern yourselves, e'en dissolve your present old crazy constitution, and send members to Congress.

"You will say my advice 'smells of Madeira.' You are right. This foolish letter is mere chit-chat between ourselves, over the second bottle. If, therefore, you show it to any body (except our indulgent friends Dagge and Lady Strachan) I will positively sollers you. Yours ever most affectionately." I. 144.

It is a memorable proof of the force which his patriotism acquired during the American war, and of the strength of feeling excited in him by the sufferings of his country, that a letter is to be found in which he thus addresses this same dear and familiar friend, then a steady supporter in Parliament of Lord North's measures.

"Philadelphia, July 5, 1775.

"MR. STRAHAN,—You are a Member of Parliament, and one of that majority which has doomed my country to destruction. You have begun to burn our towns and murder our people. Took upon your hands! They are stained with the blood of your relations! You and I were long friends: you are now my enemy, and I am yours, B. FRANKLIN."

The two following letters will show that Franklin had unconsciously imbibed, like many modern deists, much of the spirit of Christianity, while repudiating its distinctive doctrines. The first is to his old friend Whitfield, who, he tells us, "had often prayed for his conversion, though he never had the satisfaction of believing that his prayers were answered."

"For my own part, when I am employed in serving others, I do not look upon myself as conferring favours, but as paying debts. In my travels, and since my settlement, I have received much kindness from men, to whom I shall never have any opportunity of making the least direct return; and numberless mercies from God, who is infinitely above being benefited by our services. These kindnesses from men I can therefore only return on their fellow-men, and I can only show my gratitude for these mercies from God, by a readiness to help his other children, and my brethren. For I do not think that thanks and compliments, though repeated weekly, can discharge our real obligations to each other, and much less those to our Creator. You will see in this my notion of good works, that I am far from expecting to merit heaven by them. By heaven we understand a state of happiness, infinite in degree, and eternal in duration: I can do nothing to deserve such rewards. He that, for giving a draught of water to a thirsty person, should expect to be paid with a good plantation, would be modest in his demands, compared with those who think they deserve heaven for the little good they do on earth. Even the mixed imperfect pleasures we enjoy in this world are rather from God's goodness than our merit: how much more such happiness of heaven! For my part, I have not the vanity to think I deserve it, the folly to expect it, nor the ambition to desire it; but content myself in submitting to the will and disposal of that God who made me, who has hitherto preserved and blessed me, and in whose fatherly goodness I may well confide, that he will never make me miserable; and that even the afflictions I may at any time suffer shall tend to my benefit."

The other letter is to one who had asked his opinion of an irreligious work which he proposed to publish, and sent to Franklin in MS. We recommend the great philosopher's answer to all those who, holding certain sceptical or infidel opinions with great sincerity, believe it to be a duty which they owe to truth, that they should advance them into public notice, and endeavour to unsettle the faith of the people. It is to be observed, however, that he founds his reasonings upon expediency alone.

"I have read your manuscript with some attention. By the argument it contains against a particular Providence, though you allow a general Providence, you strike at the foundations of all religion. For without the belief of a Providence that takes cognisance of, guards and guides, and may favour particular persons, there is no motive to worship a Deity, to fear its displeasure, or to pray for its protection. I will not enter into any discussion of your principles, though you seem to desire it. At present I shall only give you my opinion, that though your reasonings are subtle, and may prevail with some readers, you will not succeed so as to change the general sentiments of mankind on that subject; and the consequence of printing this piece will be, a great deal of odium drawn upon yourself, mischief to you, and no benefit to others. He that spits against the wind, spits in his own face. But were you to succeed, do you imagine any good would be done by it? You yourself may find it easy to live a virtuous life without the assistance afforded by religion; you having a clear perception of the advantages of virtue and the disadvantages of vice, and possessing a strength of resolution sufficient to enable you to resist common temptations. But think how great a portion of mankind consists of weak and ignorant men and women, and of inexperienced inconsiderate youth of both sexes, who have need of the motives of religion to restrain them from vice, to support their virtue, and retain them in the practice of it till it becomes habitual, which is the great point for its security. And perhaps you are indebted to her originally, that is, to your religious education, for the habits of virtue upon which you now justly value yourself. You might easily display your excellent talents of reasoning upon a less hazardous subject, and thereby obtain a rank with our most distinguished authors. For among us it is not necessary as among the Hottentots, that a youth, to be raised into the company of men, should prove his manhood by beating his mother. I would advise you, therefore, not to attempt unchaining the tiger, but to burn this piece before it is seen by any other person; whereby you will save yourself a great deal of mortification from the enemies it may raise against you, and perhaps a good deal of regret and repentance. If men are so wicked with religion, what would they be if without it? I intend this letter itself as a proof of my friendship, and therefore add no professions to it; but subscribe simply yours." L. 279—281.

But we have gone to the utmost length of our tether, and must abruptly come to a conclusion. Though no Christian, Franklin was probably one of the best natural men that ever lived, the very incurnation of practical benevolence and worldly wisdom. Yet, to quote the expressive words of Leigh Hunt, "he is but at the head of those who think that man lives by bread alone. He was no more a fit representative of what human nature largely requires, than negative represents positive. He was, I allow, one of the cardinal great men of his time. He was Prudence."

ON SHAKSPEARE'S INDIVIDUALITY IN HIS CHARACTERS.

BY MARY COWDEN CLARKE.

THE character of Orlando, in AS YOU LIKE IT, is, perhaps, the most perfect exemplar of manly gentleness and modesty that was ever drawn. He is so gentle-hearted, that the poet has endued him with a person of stalwart proportions, and a frame of great muscular strength, that no particle of effeminacy may mingle with the gentleness that distinguishes him. He has given him, too, a spirit as high and noble as it is modest,—the perfection of true gentleness. We no sooner learn that he is a neglected youth, blushing under a sense of his unworthy training, than we find him boldly remonstrating with his elder brother on the defective education to which he is doomed. We no sooner hear him speak with shame of his rustic breeding, than we see him step forth manfully to make his claim to treatment better befitting his birth. The action with which his words are accompanied is well contrived, also, to convey the idea of his personal strength and firmness. When Oliver advances upon him, exclaiming, "What, boy!" Orlando's "Come, come, elder brother, you are too young in this;" and his subsequent "Wert thou not my brother, I would not take this hand from thy throat, till this other hand had pulled out thy tongue for saying so;" gives us a complete picture of the powerful grasp in which he holds his elder, and compels him to listen to his appeal. And how truly in character is the appeal he makes.

Oli. Let me go, I say.

Orl. I will not, till I please: you shall hear me. My father charged you in his will to give me good education: you have trained me like a peasant, obscuring and hiding from me all gentleman-like qualities: the spirit of my father grows strong in me, and I will no longer endure it: therefore allow me such exercises as may become a gentleman, or give me the poor allottery my father left me by testament; with that I will go buy my fortunes."

It is that "spirit of his father" burning within him, which teaches him to disdain such unseemly breeding, to throw it off, and to seek a mode of life more worthy his parentage and the name he bears. He has before alluded to this, in his own modest manner, where he says to the faithful old retainer, Adam:—"Besides this nothing that he so plentifully gives me, the something that nature gave me, his countenance seems to take from me: he lets me feed with his hinds, bars me the place of a brother, and, as much as in him lies, mines my gentility with my education. This is it, Adam, that grieves me; and the spirit of my father, which I think is within me, begins to mutiny against this servitude."

This self-diffidence,—the result of neglected education,—blended with consciousness of high claims and higher powers, constitutes precisely the sort of character who would behave as Orlando subsequently does.

Shakspeare, with one of his favourite touches of art, puts into the mouth of Orlando's tyrannous brother, a testimony in confirmation of his good qualities. "Yet he's gentle; never schooled, and yet learned; full of noble device: of all sorts enchantingly beloved; and, indeed, so much in the heart of the world, and especially of my own people, who best know him, that I am altogether misprised."

And then how subtly the poet goes on to strengthen our impression of the personal vigour and courage of Orlando, with each fresh instance of his gentleness of nature. See how ingeniously he lets us know beforehand the fatal prowess of Charles, the duke's wrestler, in that story which Le Beau, the courtier, tells of the old man and his three sons, broken-ribbed, bleeding, and overthrown, by the very man with whom Orlando is about to "try the strength of his youth." How well Celia's words picture him:—"Alas, he is too young—yet he looks successfully." In his replies to the two ladies, when they endeavour to dissuade him from venturing in so unequal-seeming a match, we still see the modest Orlando; concluding with that beautiful speech, profoundly touching in its youthful self-abnegation:—

"I beseech you, punish me not with your hard thoughts; wherein I confess me much guilty, to deny so fair and excellent ladies any thing. But let your fair eyes, and gentle wishes, go with me to my trial: wherein if I be foiled, there is but one shamed that was never gracious; if killed, but one dead that is willing to be so: I shall do my friends no wrong, for I have none to lament me: the world no injury, for in it I have nothing; only in the world I fill up a place, which may be better supplied when I have made it empty."

Immediately after this speech,—almost womanly in its sweet spirit of resignation,—he wrestles with the strong man, throws him, and leaves him bereft of breath and motion on the earth: evincing, at the same time, how little he himself is affected by the contest, by answering the duke's exclamation of "No more, no more;" with "Yes, I beseech your grace; I am not yet well breathed."

Consistently the dramatist proceeds. When the Duke Frederick abruptly leaves the spot, in anger at learning Orlando's name and descent, the young man, true to his high nature, exclaims:—

"I am more proud to be Sir Rowland's son,
His youngest son;—and would not change that calling,
To be adopted heir to Frederick."

But, next moment, when the ladies approach him, when they address him with words of courtesy and kindness, when Celia commends his prowess, and Rosalind bestows a token of remembrance, he has no words in answer; he stands confused, embarrassed, silent:—

"Can I not say, I thank you? my better parts
Are all thrown down: and that which here stands up,
Is but a quintain, a mere lifeless block."

This is all wonderfully artistic. It no less pictures the diffident youth, trained in retirement, and conscious of inadequate breeding, than it serves to intimate the potent influence which has seized and vanquished him:—

"What passion hangs these weights upon my tongue?
I cannot speak to her, yet she urged conference.
O poor Orlando! thou art overthrown;
Or Charles, or something weaker, masters thee."

In the very midst of his kindly cheering of old Adam, on their journey, while he is soothing him with almost feminine tenderness, and proving his gentleness of heart by the most affectionate care, we find the poet reminding us of his manly strength of limb and muscle, by making Orlando raise the old man in his arms, and carry him to a place of rest, while he goes to seek food. Shakspeare has marked this pointedly; for he has made Orlando say, in the course of that exquisite speech, almost unmatched for its cheerful sweetness, and kindly, sprightly comfort,—but which we abstain from quoting:—"Yet thou liest in the bleak air: come, I will bear thee to some shelter;" and afterwards, the duke says:—"Welcome; set down your venerable burden."

In making one so passing gentle as Orlando a hero and a lover, the poet has well kept the image of the man before our eyes in his tall proportions, and his athletic strength. He is gentle-hearted, but high-spirited; he is modest, but firm and manly; his is the gentleness of bravery and magnanimity. Orlando is an embodiment of the power—the all-prevailing might of gentleness. In the scene where he rushes in with his drawn sword, demanding food for his faithful old servitor, Adam, the whole dialogue goes to illustrate this. The courtesy of the forester-duke, who assures him that—

"Gentleness shall force
More than your force move us to gentleness;"

and Orlando's fine speech beginning, "Speak you so gently? Pardon me, I pray you;" and ending with,

"Let gentleness my strong enforcement be:
In the which hope, I blush, and hide my sword;"

equally prove the influence of gentleness; that entreaty is better than exaction; that suing commands where extortion might fail.

With like purpose, the poet has made Orlando's personal courage and power appear in rescuing his brother from the snake and the lioness; while in the same deed, he has shown his magnanimity and forgiving gentleness of disposition.

It may almost be said of Orlando, that we do not see him rightly as a lover. And yet, so skilfully is the character itself drawn, that this is scarcely felt. But from the position in which Orlando is placed throughout the play with regard to his mistress, it is certainly the case. He is always at a disadvantage with her,—as a lover; she knowing who he is, he not recognising her in her boy-disguise. He never acts the lover; for the spectator sees him but in two short interviews with Rosalind in her own character; in the first of which, he is tongue-tied by the spell of his new passion; and in the second of which, he merely echoes the welcoming speech of her father. And yet, who does not feel that Orlando is one among the truest of Shakspeare's lovers? It is true, he hangs verses on the trees in his mistress's praise, instead of seeking herself; it is true, he does not know her face for her own, when he looks upon it. Yet, for all this, who does not think of Orlando as a genuine lover—as even one of the most genuine among lovers? We know it from his own character, not from his professions to his mistress. We know it from his own sincerity, his honest-heartedness, his gentle, yet manly nature. One straightforward word of his brings conviction, where fifty protestings of a man whom we know to be less simply true in character would fail. We know him to be earnest in every word and deed; therefore we find a world of meaning in his reply to Jacques, who says to him,—

"The worst fault you have, is to be in love.

"Orl. 'Tis a fault I will not change for your best virtue."

And this same glory in his passion is again revealed by his answer to the banter of his disguised mistress, who undertakes to cure him of his love. "I would not be cured, youth." He would not be without the secret ineffable pleasure that his love is to him; it is the one delight in his hitherto joyless, aimless, disappointed existence. He cherishes it as the source of all happiness he has known—of all happiness to come; his whole heart is given up to it with a deep and entire sincerity, that we know belongs to such natures as his. There is an exquisite touch occurs here; showing the apparent inconsistencies of a lover, which mostly spring from some unconscious, though deep-seated, emotion, more allied to constancy than the acted inconsistency seems to imply. He at first answers that he will not be cured; but upon the youth's urging:—"I would cure you, if you would but call me Rosalind, and come every day to my cot, and woo me;" he replies, "Now, by the faith of my love, I will; tell me where it is." We may fancy his looking her in the face as she speaks, and that "some lively touches" he finds there of his Rosalind's "favour" influence him in yielding to the young forester's playful proposal. Besides, mark that he says "by the faith of my love," feeling sure of its abiding any test unshaken, unradicated, uncured—as he would have it remain.

And in how charming a manner are we let to see that his love not only maintains its integrity, but increases and strengthens—as of course his mistress, with love's own cunning, intends that it should, when she artfully feeds his passion, while affecting to cure it, in contriving to retain him with her. How it grows from the enamoured fancy which contents itself with the image of his beautiful mistress,—which derives comfort from the wearing of her gift about his neck,—which finds relief in breathing her name to himself, “But heavenly Rosalind!”—which bids him draw mysterious pleasure from his association with the supposed forest-born boy, and to humour his proposal of calling him Rosalind, “taking some joy” in it, “because he would be talking of her;” until at length it assumes the force and impatience of genuine passion. How true to the egoism of a lover—such egoism being a natural and essential element of genuine love,—is his exclamation, upon promising to obtain the duke's presence at Oliver's marriage. The approaching fulfilment of his brother's happiness, awakes him to a full sense of the requirements of his own passion.

Orl. They shall be married to-morrow; and I will bid the duke to the nuptial. But O, how bitter a thing it is to look into happiness through another man's eyes! By so much the more shall I to-morrow be at the height of heart heaviness, by how much I shall think my brother happy, in having what he wishes for.

Ros. Why, then, to-morrow I cannot serve your turn for Rosalind?

Orl. I can live no longer by thinking.”

The concentrated force of those few simple words is perfectly characteristic. There is all Orlando's gentleness of word and manner, with all his force of feeling; all his modesty of expression, with all his manly ardour.

The impression we have of the sincerity of Orlando's love is heightened by the qualities which constitute that of the other lovers in the play. There is more or less of extravagance in the love of all the rest. Oliver's is sudden; Silvius's desperate; Touchstone's whimsical. Oliver's affection offers no reason for its abrupt existence. “Neither call the giddiness of it in question, the poverty of her, the small acquaintance, my sudden wooing, nor her sudden consenting; but say with me, I love Aliena; say with her, that she loves me; consent with both, that we may enjoy each other: it shall be to your good; for my father's house, and all the revenue that was old Sir Rowland's, will I estate upon you, and here live and die a shepherd.”

In this paper we have, happily, nought to do with the character of Oliver excepting as a lover. Till he becomes one, he is tyrannous and treacherous; practising against the very life of his younger brother. Afterwards, he is in all things changed. It is as if the magnanimity of his brother's rescue began the touching of his heart, and prepared it for the gentle influence of a first love—a love at first sight; this, in its softening and refining monition, advances his cure, and his coming into the sweet atmosphere of Arden and its simple happiness completes his reform.

It is a fine tribute to the purity of a pastoral and out-door existence, the way in which this forest life subdues all things to its quality. It wins them all at once. The wandering princess, Celia, on her first arrival says:—“I like this place, and willingly could waste my time in it.” The duke's eloquent panegyric on its sylvan charms, beginning, “Now, my co-mates, and brothers in exile,” is as familiar to us all as the reminembrance of our own childhood haunts; and he it remembered, that in the very moment of his restoration to his dukedom at the end of the play, this right tasteful gentleman exclaims,—clinging still to the life that has yielded him such delight,— “Meantime, forget this new-fall'n dignity,

And fall into our rustic revelry.”

It inspires them all with better thoughts; happier feelings; more virtuous resolves. It leaves to Touchstone but enough of his court affectation to make him as pleasant as ever; while it teaches him to do justice to Audrey. It purges Oliver of his baseness, opens his eyes to his past unworthy conduct, and whispers his heart contentment to “love Aliena,” and with her “here to live and die a shepherd.”

The character of Silvius is in exquisite keeping with the pastoral romance and poetic beauty of this delicious play. He is first introduced to us, as to Rosalind and Celia, on their entrance upon the enchanted ground of Arden. We see him, as they do, fling himself upon the turf, in the languor and abandonment of his passion, beside the old shepherd, pouring forth his love-sick plaints. We see him break away abruptly; we hear of him when he is gone, as in the all-engrossing care of his passion. Silvius is a desperate lover; but there is an earnestness in his devotion, a fervour in his attachment, which redeems it from absurdity in its excess. It is likewise so generous in its quality as to command our respect. He says:—

“That young swain that you saw here but erewhile
That little cares for buying anything;”

“O dear Phebe,
If ever (as that ever may be near)
You meet in some fresh cheek the power of fancy,
Then shall you know the wounds invisible
That love's keen arrows make.”

From all we learn of his character, we feel that he tells her this, as dreading she should suffer the pangs he knows by experience are in store for her, rather than as a threat. She bids him mock her when that time comes; but he does not.

Rosalind, in her sprightly way, rates him over and over for his constancy to one so scornful; and tells him “love hath made thee a tame snake;” but Silvius is too desperately in love to be moved by banter, or repulsed by his mistress's scorn and cruelty; nothing can shake his allegiance, or destroy his passion. He would have Phebe, “though to have her and death were both one thing.”

He is, in his own person, what he asserts a lover to be; his passion is, in its strength and devotion, what he describes love to be. He says:—

“It is to be all made of sighs and tears;
It is to be all made of faith and service;
It is to be all made of fantasy,
All made of passion, and all made of wishes;
All adoration, duty and observance,
All humbleness, all patience, and impatience,
All purity, all trial, all observance.”

Silvius is true to the very letter of his profession of love-faith; he is himself a type of his creed; he is a worshipper in the spirit of the worship he avers to be the true one.

In extreme contrast with these lovers, who all, more or less, smack of the simplicity and "service of the antique world," we have the conventional, the calculating, the worldly-minded Claudio in MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING—emphatically a man of the world. He is profoundly selfish, essentially self-seeking. His friend is a prince; and—as we find him exerting himself to win the liking and patronage of this worthy gentleman, this influential and potential, as well as agreeable personage,—we are led to believe, from what we know of his character, that he has sought this friendship much in the spirit in which the wittiest writer of our own day recommends the choice of a friend to be made. He says:—"Choose your friend as you would choose an orange; for his golden outside, and the promise of yielding much when well squeezed." From all that we find actuating Claudio in his choice of a wife, we may conclude this to be pretty much his motive in attaching himself to his friend, the prince, Don Pedro. The first question he asks respecting the lady,—after, by the way, telling the prince he may do him a favour:—"My liege, your highness now may do me good,"—is an indirect one; but its import is revealed by the reply.

"Claudio. Hath Leonato any son, my lord?

"D. Pedro. No child but Hero. She's his only heir. Dost thou affect her, Claudio?"

On receiving this exceedingly satisfactory assurance, the young count proceeds to state in a gentlemanly, easy, self-complacent way, that he thinks she would suit him, and that he should like to have her. The speech is full of Shakspeare's elegance of diction, but it is instinct with the spirit of self and self-interest, which is Claudio's characteristic. There is also subtle indication of this young gentleman's habit of making use of his friend, in the prince's next rejoinder:—

"If thou dost love fair Hero, cherish it;
And I will break with her, and with her father.
And thou shalt have her: *Was't not to this end
That thou began'st to twist so fine a story?*"

Claudio answers with more of his elegant words, couching more of his worldly-wise and selfish strategy:—

"How sweetly do you minister to love,
That know love's grief by his complexion!
*But let my liking might too sudden seem,
I would have salv'd it with a longer treatise.*"

However, he at once accepts his friend's offer of asking the lady for him, knowing that the advocacy of a prince will be no bad thing in helping him to obtain the governor of Messina's daughter; and then, his next act is to suspect this very friend of playing him false, by endeavouring to obtain Hero for himself.

It is marvellous how consistently the poet has drawn this character of Claudio. He has made him throughout a heartless fellow, with a constant eye to his own advantage; and yet so artistically as well as consistently is he drawn, that he passes for a gallant young soldier, a pleasant companion, a gentleman, and a LOVER! We are made to hear of his bravery in the wars, we are made to see that his friends like him, and we find him polished in manner and accomplished in speech. But on scrutinising his character, we discover his nature to be radically mean and selfish. There are those who will think that Claudio, shown to be this, can be no lover; and, therefore, not qualified to come under the category of character we are at present discussing. But he ranks as a lover in the play; and is, in fact, a type of a large class of men who rank as lovers in the world. He loves the woman for his own sake, not for hers; for what she is worth to him, not for what she is herself. He was precisely the sort of man to act as Shakspeare has made him act, in the plot he had chosen; he fashioned him expressly for the purpose. No other than such a man as he has drawn Claudio, would have been so ready to give credence to the slander brought against his mistress. No nature less base and ungenerous than his, could have played off a hoarded revenge against the woman he had once thought to make his wife. We may here observe, that in such individual delineation, in such harmonious appropriateness of character as this, it is that Shakspeare transcends—as in all else—every dramatic competitor. A modern dramatist has made his plot turn upon a similar hoarded revenge. But his hero-lover is represented as magnanimous, intellectually-gifted, of a high moral nature,—and yet capable of such an act! Claudio is mean-souled, selfish, and a mere soldier in mind, though elegant and gentlemanly in manner; therefore from him comes but fittingly such a course of action. It is singularly in confirmation of the view we have taken of Claudio's character, that he is even more prompt than his friend to believe Hero's alleged disloyalty. His exclamation at once admits the possibility of her frailty;—"May this be so?" While the prince exclaims, confidently, "I will not think it." And Claudio's very next speech not only shows him ready to receive proof of her infidelity, but that he has actually conceived the mode of his revenge before he has received that proof:—"If I see anything to-night why I should not marry her to-morrow; in the congregation, where I should wed, there will I shame her."

In minor points, it is curious to note how consistently Shakspeare works out his individuality of character. That is quite the act of a worldly man, Claudio's asking Benedick, in the first instance, his opinion of Hero. A worldly man is apt to judge his mistress—or aught else he would appropriate—through the eyes of others. A worldly man likes to know the general estimate of a woman or a purchase he seeks to make his own. He rates them by the market-price of public opinion. If he discover that they stand high in the judgment of the world, they immediately rise in his own idea. To find that the lady he admires is thought a fine woman, is toasted as a beauty, is the prize sought by many suitors,—to find that the horse he has thought of for his own riding has several other bidders,—to find that the lease of the house he has some notion of renting is likely to fall into other hands;—gives suddenly to each cent. per cent. additional value in his eyes, and excites his desire to become their possessor.

Claudio's suspicious nature is not only indicated by the circumstance already referred to,—his deeming his friend capable of trying to supplant him,—but by such a minute touch as this. When he first avows his liking for Hero to his friends, the prince and Benedick, Don Pedro says:—"Amen, if you love her; for the lady is very well worthy." And Claudio replies:—"You speak this to fetch me in, my lord."

His base nature is not only shown in his hoarded revenge, but in his telling a white lie—a masquerading lie, it is true—but still a lie; one of those social falsehoods, which men of honour and of the world permit themselves to utter. In so many words, when disguised in his domino, Don John accosts him as "Signior Benedick;" he says:—"You know me well, I am he." This is a paltry subterfuge, quite worthy of Claudio; for he does it to secure an opportunity for eaves-dropping, and for gaining underhand intelligence.

His heartless nature is plainly depicted in the unfeeling way in which he jests immediately after the disgrace and loss of his mistress; going so far as flippantly to joke upon the wrath of her own father and uncle: "We had like to have had our two noses snapped off with two old men without teeth."

There is evidence of his worldliness, in the way in which (under pretence, too, of accepting any penalty Leonato may choose to inflict for the injury he has done his innocent daughter) he catches at the proposal of wedding another young lady—a niece—"heir to both" the old men.

It is remarkable that the very dirge-music, and mourning epitaph, which he brings to Hero's tomb are the result of the father's suggestion; and no inspiration of his own remorse, of his own sorrow for her loss, or of contrition for what he has done. The very way in which he acknowledges Leonato's generosity of treatment has something sneaking, calculating, and characteristic of the man about it. He says:—

"O, noble sir,
Your over-kindness doth wring tears from me!
I do embrace your offer; and dispose
For henceforth of poor Claudio."

Poor Claudio, indeed! Truly, we must come to the conclusion that Count Claudio is nothing less, or, rather, nothing more, than a pitiful fellow of rascal nature, although a nobleman, and an exceedingly gentlemanly young man—of the world.

Here are four individual lovers. Orlando, the impersonation of manly gentleness; Oliver, that of love at first sight, and reformation through love; Silvius, that of desperation in love; and Claudio, that of worldliness in love.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THO^o. MORE.¹

LIBELLUS A MARGARETA MORE, QUINDECIM ANNO NATA, CHELSEÆ INCEPTVS.

"Nulla dies sine linea."

THIS morn, hinting to Bess that she was lacing herself too straightlie, she brisklie replied, "One w^d think 'twere as great merit to have a thick waiste as to be one of y^e earlie Christians!"

These humourous retorts are ever at her tongue's end; and, albeit, as Jacky one day angrillie remarked when she had bene teasing him, "Bess, thy witt is stupidnesse;" yet, for one who talks soe much at random, no one can be more keene when she chooseth. Father sayd of her, half fondly, half apologeticallie to Erasmus, "Her wit has a fine subtletie that eludes you almoste before you have time to recognize it for what it really is." To which, Erasmus readilie assented, adding, that it had y^e rare merit of playing less on persons than things, and never on bodilie defects.

Hum!—I wonder if they ever sayd as much in favour of me. I know, indeede, Erasmus calls me a forward girl. Alas! that may be taken in two senses.

Grievous work, overnighte, with y^e churning Nought w^d persuade Gillian but that y^e creame was bewitched by Gammer Gurney, who was dissatisfyde last Friday with her dole, and hobbled away mumping and cursing. At alle events, y^e butter w^d not come; but mother was resolute not to have soe much goode creame wasted; soe sent for Bess and me, Daisy and Mercy Giggs, and insisted on our churning in turn till y^e butter came, if we sate up alle nighte for't. 'Twas a hard saying; and mighte have hampered her like as Jephtha his rash vow: howbeit, soe soone as she had left us, we turned it into a frolick, and sang Chevy Chase from end to end, to beguile time; ne'erthelesse, the butter w^d not come; soe then we grew sober, and, at y^e instance of sweete Mercy, chaunted y^e 119th Psalme; and, by the time we had attayned to 'Lucerna pedibus,' I hearde y^e buttermilk separating and splashing in righte earnest. 'Twas neare midnighte, however; and Daisy had fallen asleep on y^e dresser. Gillian will ne'er be convinced but that our Latin brake the spell.

Erasmus went to Richmond this morning with Polus (for soe he Latinizes Reginald Pole, after his usual fashion,) and some other of his friends. On his return, he made us laugh at y^e following. They had clomb y^e hill, and were admiring y^e prospect, when Pole, casting his eyes aloft, and beginning to make sundrie gesticulations, exclaimed, "What is it I beholde? May heaven avert y^e omen!" with suchlike exclamations, which raised y^e curiositie of alle. "Don't you beholde," cries he, "that enormous dragon flying through y^e sky? his horns of fire? his curly tail?"

"No," says Erasmus, "nothing like it. The sky is as cleare as unwritten paper."

Howbeit, he continued to affirme and to stare, untill at length, one after another, by dint of straying their eyes and their imaginations, did admitt, first, that they saw something; next, that it mighte be a dragon; and last, that it was. Of course, on their passage homeward, they c^d talk of little else—some made serious reflections; others, philosophical speculations; and Pole waggishly triumphed in having bene y^e firste to discern the spectacle.

"And you trulie believe there was a signe in y^e heavens?" we inquired of Erasmus.

"What know I?" returned he, smiling; "you know, Constantine saw a cross. Why shoulde Polus not see a dragon? We must judge by the event. Perhaps its mission may be to fly away with him. He swore to y^e curly tail."

How difficulte it is to discern y^e supernatural from y^e incredible! We laughe at Gillian's faith in our Latin; Erasmus laughs at Polus his dragon. Have we a righte to believe noughte but what we can see or prove? Nay, that will never doe. Father says a capacitie for reasoning increaseth a capacitie for believing. He believes there is such a thing as witchcraft, though not that poore olde Gammer Gurney is a witch; he believes that saints can work miracles, though not in alle y^e marvels reported of y^e Canterbury shrine.

Had I bene justice of y^e peace, like y^e king's grandmother, I w^d have bene very jealous of accusations of witchcraft; and have taken infinite payns to sift out y^e causes of malice, jealousy, &c. which mighte have wroughte with y^e poore olde women's enemies. Holie Writ sayth, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live;" but, questionlesse, manie have suffered hurte that were noe witches; and for my part, I have alwaies helde ducking to be a very uncertayn as well as very cruel teste.

I cannot helpe smiling, whenever I think of my rencounter with William this morning. Mr. Gunnell had set me Homer's tiresome list of ships; and, because of y^e excessive heate within doors, I took my book into y^e nuttery, to be beyonde y^e wrath of fardarting Phœbus Apollo, where I clomb into my favourite silbert seat. Anon comes William through y^e trees without seeing me; and seats him at the foot of my silbert; then, out with his tablets, and, in a posture I s^d have called studdied, had he known anie one within sighte, falls a poetizing, I question not. Having noe mind to be interrupted, I lett him be, thinking he w^d soone exhauste y^e vein; but a caterpillar dropping from y^e leaves on to my page, I was fayne for mirthe sake, to shake it down on his tablets. As ill luck w^d have it, however, y^e little reptile onlic fell among his curls; which soe took me at vantage that I coule not helpe hastilie crying, "I beg your pardon." 'Twas worth a world to see his start! "What!" cries he, looking up, "are there indeede Hamadryads?" and would have gallanted a little, but I bade him hold down his head, while that with a twig

I switched off y^e caterpillar. Neither coule forbear laughing; and then he sued me to step downe, but I was minded to abide where I was. Howbeit, after a minute's pause, he sayd, in a grave, kind tone, "Come, little wife;" and taking mine arm steadilie in his hand, I lost my balance and was faine to come down whether or noe. We walked for some time, jurta fluvium; and he talked not badlie of his travels, inas-much as I founde there was really more in him than one w^d think.

— Was there ever anie-thing soe perverse, unluckie, and downrighte disagreeable? We hurried our after-noone tasks, to goe on y^e water with my father; and, meaning to give Mr. Gunnell my Latin traduction, which is in a book like unto this, I never knew he had my journalle insteade, untill that he burst out a laughing. "Soe this is y^e famous libellus," quoth he, . . . I never waited for another word, but snatcht it out of his hand; which he, for soe strict a man, bore well enow. I do not believe he c^d have read a dozen lines, and they were towards y^e beginning; but I sd lugelie like to know which dozen lines they were.

Hum! I have a mind never to write another word. That will be punishing myselfe, though, insteade of Gunnell. And he bade me not take it to heart like y^e late Bishop of Durham, to whom a like accident befel, which soe annoyed him that he died of chagrin. I will never again, howbeit, write anieling savouring ever soe little of levitie or absurditie. The saints keepe me to it! And, to know it from my exercise book, I will henceforthe bind a blue ribbon round it. Furthermore, I will knit y^e sayd ribbon in soe close a knot, that it shall be worth noe one else's payns to pick it out. Lastlie, and for entire securitie, I will carry the same in my pouch, which will hold bigger matters than this.

This daye, at dinner, Mr. Clement tooke y^e Pistoller's place at y^e reading-desk; and insteade of continuing y^e subject in hand, read a paraphrase of y^e 103rde Psalm; y^e faithfullenesse and elegant turne of which, Erasmus highlie commended, though he took exceptions to y^e phrase "renewing thy youth like that of y^e Phœnix," whose fabulous story he believed to have bene unknowne to y^e Psalmist, and, therefore, however poetically, was unfit to be introduced. A deepe blush on sweet Mercy's face leld to y^e detection of y^e paraphrast, and drew on her some deserved commendations. Erasmus, turning to my father, exclaymed with animation, "I woulde call this house the academy of Plato, were it not injustice to compare it to a place where the usuall disputations concerning figures and numbers were onlic occasionallic intersperst with disquisitions concerning y^e moral virtues." Then, in a graver mood, he added, "One mighte envie you, but that your precious privileges are bound up with soe paynfull anxieties. How manie pledges have you given to fortune!"

"If my children are to die out of y^e course of nature, before their parents," father firmly replied,

'I w^d rather they died well-instructed than ignorant."

"You remind me," rejoins Erasmus, "of Phocion; whose wife, when he was aboute to drink y^e fatal cup, exclaimed, 'Ah, my husband! you die innocent.' 'And woulde you, my wife,' he returned, 'have me die guilty?'"

Awhile after, Gonellus askt leave to see Erasmus his signet-ring, which he handed down to him. In passing it back, William, who was occupyde in carving a crane, handed it soe negligentlie that it felle to y^e ground. I never saw such a face as Erasmus made, when 'twas picked out from y^e rushes! And yet, ours are renewed almoste daylie, which manic think over nice. He took it gingerlie in his faire, woman-like hands, and washed and wiped it before he put it on; which escaped not my step-mother's displeased notice. Indee, these Dutchmen are scrupulouslie cleane, though mother calls 'em swinish, because they will eat raw sallets; though, for that matter, father loves cresses and ramps. She alsoe mislikes Erasmus for eating cheese and butter together with his manchet; or what he calls boetram; and for being, generallie, daintie at his sizes, which she sayth is an ill example to soe manic young people, and becometh not one with soe little money in's purse: howbeit, I think 'tis not niccetic, but a weak stomach, which makes him loathe our salt-meat commons from Michaelmasse to Easter, and eschew fish of y^e coarser sort. He cannot breakfaste on colde milk like father, but liketh furnity a little spiced. At dinner, he pecks at, rather than eats, ruffs and reeves, lapwings, or anic smalle birds it may chance; but affects sweets and subtilties, and loves a cup of wine or ale, stirred with rosemary. Father never toucheth the wine-cup but to grace a guest, and loves water from the spring. We growing girls eat more than either; and father says he loves to see us slice away at the cob-loaf; it does him goode. What a kind father he is! I wish my step-mother were as kind. I hate alle sncaping and snubbing, flowting, fleering, pinching, nipping, and such-like; it onlie creates resentment insteade of penitence, and lowers y^e miude of either partie. Gillian throws a rolling-pin at y^e turnspit's head, and we call it low-life; but we looke for such unmannerliuesse in the kitchen. A whip is onlic fit for Tisiphone.

As we rose from table, I noted Argus pearcht on y^e window-sill, eagerlie watching for his dinner, which he looketh for as punctuallie as if he c^d tell the diall; and to please the good, patient bird, till the scullion broughte him his mess of garden-stuff, I fetched him some pulse, which he took from mine hand, taking good heede not to hurt me with his sharp beak. While I was feeding him, Erasmus came up, and asked me concerning Mercy Giggs; and I tolde him how that she was a friendlesse orphan, to whom deare father afforded protection and the run of y^e house; and tolde him of her gratitude, her meekness, her patience, her docilitie, her aptitude for alle goode works and alms-deeds; and how, in her little chamber, she improved eache spare moment in y^e way of studdy and prayer. He repeated "Friendlesse? she cannot be called friendlesse, who hath More for her protector, and his children for companions;" and then woulde heare more of her parents' sad story. Alsoe, would heare somewhat of Rupert Allington, and how father gained his law-suit. Alsoe, of Daisy, whose name he tooke to be y^e true abbreviation for Margaret, but I tolde him how that my step-sister, and Mercy, and I, being all three of a name, and I being alwaies called Meg, we had in sport given one the significative of her characteristic virtue, and the other that of y^e French Marguerite, which may indeed be rendered either pearl or daisy. And Chaucer, speaking of our English daisy, saith

"Si douce est la Marguerite."

Since y^e little wisdom I have capacitie to acquire, soe oft gives me y^e headache to distraction, I marvel not at Jupiter's payn in his head, when the goddess of wisdom sprang therefrom full growne.

This morn, to quiet y^e payn brought on by too busic application, Mr. Gummell would have me close my book and ramble forth with Cecy into y^e fields. We strolled towards Walham Greene; and she was seeking for shepherd's purses and shepherd's needles, when she came running back to me, looking rather pale. I askt what had scared her, and she made answer that Gammer Gurney was coming along y^e hedge. I bade her set aside her scares; and anon we come up with Gammer, who was pulling at y^e purple blossoms of y^e deadly nightshade. I said, "Gammer, to what purpose gather that weed? knowest not 'tis evil?"

She sayth, mumbling, "What God hath created, that call not thou evil."

"Well, but," quo' I, "'tis poison."

"Aye, and medicine too," returns Gammer, "I wonder what we poor souls might come to, if we tooke nowt for our ails and aches but what we could buy o' the potticary. We've got noe Dr. Clement, we poor folks, to be our leech o' the household."

"But hast no feare," quo' I, "of an over-dose?"

"There's manic a doctor," sayth she, with an unpleasant leer, "that hath given that at first. In time he gets his hand in; and I've had a plenty o' practice—thanks to self and sister."

"I knew not," quoth I, "that thou hadst a sister."

"How should ye, mistress," returns she, shortlic, "when ye never comes nigh us? We've grubbed on together this many a year."

"'Tis soe far," I returned, half ashamed.

"Why, soe it be," answers Gammer; "far from neighbours, far from church, and far from priest; howbeit, my old legs carries me to your house o' Fridays; but I know not whether I shall e'er come agayn—the rye bread was soe hard last time; it may serve for young teeth, and for them as has got none; but mine, you see, are onlie on the goe;" and she opened her mouth with a ghastly smile. "'Tis not," she added, "that I'm ungrateful; but thou sees, mistress, I really can't eat crusts."

After a moment, I asked, "Where lies your dwelling?"

"Out by yonder," quoth she, pointing to a shapeless mass like a huge bird's nest in y^e corner of the field. "There bides poor Joan and I. Wilt come and looke within, mistress, and see how a Christian can die?"

I mutelic complied, in spite of Cecy's pulling at my skirts. Arrived at y^e wretched abode, which had a hole for its chimney, and another for door at once and window, I found, sitting in a corner, propped on a heap of rushes, dried leaves, and olde rags, an aged sick woman, who seemed to have but a little while to live. A mug of water stode within her reach; I saw none other sustenance; but, in her visage, oh, such peace! . . . Whispers Gammer with an awfule look, "She sees 'em now!"

'Sees who?' quoth I.

"Why, angels in two long rows, afore y^e throne of God, a bending of themselves, this way, with their faces to th' earth, and arms stretched out afore 'em."

"Hath she seen a priest?" quoth I.

"Lord love ye," returns Gammer, "what coule a priest doe for her? She's in heaven alreadie. I doubie if she can heare me." And then, in a loud, distinct voyce, quite free from her usuall numping, she beganne to recite in English, "Blessed is every one that feareth y^e Lord, and walketh in his ways," etc.; which y^e dying woman hearde, although alreadie speechlesse; and reaching out her feeble arm unto her sister's neck, she dragged it down till their faces touched; and then, looking up, pointed at somewhat she aimed to make her see . . . and we alle looked up, but saw noughte. Howbeit, she pointed up three severall times, and lay, as it were, transfigured before us, a gazing at some transporting sighte, and ever anon turning on her sister looks of love; and, the while we stode thus agaze, her spiritt passed away without even a thrill or a shudder. Cecy and I beganne to wepce; and, after a while, soe did Gammer; then, putting us forthe, she sayd, "Goe, children, goe; 'tis noe goode crying; and yet I'm thankfulle to ye for your teares."

I sayd, "Is there aught we can doe for thee?"

She made answer, "Perhaps you can give me tuppence, mistress, to lay on her poor eyelids and keep 'em down. Bless 'ee, bless 'ee! You're like y^e good Samaritan—he pulled out two-pence. And maybe, if I come to 'ee to-morrow, you'll give me a lapfulle of rosemarie, to lay on her poor corpse. . . . I know you've plenty. God be with 'ee, children; and be sure ye mind how a Christian can die."

Soe we left, and came home sober enow. Cecy sayth, "To die is not soe fearfulle, Meg, as I thoughte, but shoulde you fancy dying without a priest? I shoulde not; and yet Gammer sayd she wanted not one, Howbeit, for certayn, Gammer Gurney is noe witch, or she woulde not soe prayse God."

To conclude, father, on hearing alle, hath given

Gammer more than enow for her present needes; and Cecy and I are y^e almoners of his mercy.

June 24.

Yesternighte, being St. John's Eve, we went into town to see y^e mustering of y^e watch. Mr. Rastall had secured us a window opposite y^e King's Head, in Chepe, where their M^{rs}. went in stata to see the show. The streets were a maryell to see, being like unto a continuation of fayr bowres or arbours, garlanded across and over y^e doors with greene birch, long fennel, orpin, St. John's wort, white lilics, and such like; with innumerable candles intersperst, the which, being lit up as soon as 'twas dusk, made the whole look like enchanted land; while, at y^e same time, the leaping over bon-fires commenced, and produced shouts of laughter. The youths woulde have had father goe downe and joyn 'em; Rupert, specialie, begged him hard, but he put him off with, "Sirrah, you goosecap, dost think 'twoulde befit y^e Judge of the Sheriffs' Court?"

At length, to y^e sound of trumpets, came marching up Cheapside two thousand of the watch, in white fustian, with the City badge; and seven hundred cressett bearers, eache with his fellow to supplie him with oyl, and making, with their flaring lights, the night as cleare as daye. After 'em, the morris-dancers and City waites; the Lord Mayor on horseback, very fine, with his giants and pageants; and the Sheriif and his watch, and his giants and pageants. The streets very uproarious on our way back to the barge, but the homeward passage delicious; the nighte ayre cool; and the stars shining brightly. Father and Erasmus had some astronomick talk; howbeit, methoughte Erasmus less familiar with y^e heavenlic bodies than father is. Afterwards, they spake of y^e King, but not over-freelie, by reason of y^e bargemen over-hearing. Thence, to y^e ever-vert question of Martin Luther, of whome Erasmus spake in terms of earneste, yet qualifide prayse.

"If Luther be innocent," quoth he, "I woulde not run him down by a wicked faction; if he be in error, I woulde rather have him reclaymed than destroyed; for this is most agreeable to the doctrine of our deare Lord and Master, who woulde not bruise y^e broken reede, nor quenche y^e smoaking flax." And much more to same purpose.

We younger folks felle to choosing our favourite mottoes and devices, in which y^e elders at length joyned us. Mother's was loyal—"Cleave to y^e crown though it hang on a bush." Erasmus's pithie—"Festina Lente." William sayd he was indebted for his to St. Paul—"I seeke not yours, but you." For me, I quoted one I had seene in an olde countrie church, "Mieux être que paroître," which pleased father and Erasmus much.

Poor Erasmus caughte colde on y^e water last nighte, and keeps house to-daye, taking warm possets. 'Tis my week of housekeeping under mother's guidance, and I never had more pleasure in it; delighting to suit his taste in sweets things, which, methinks, all men like. I have enow of time left for studdy, when alle's done.

He hath beene the best part of the morning in our academia, looking over books and manuscripts, taking notes of some, discoursing with Mr. Gunnell on others; and, in some sorte, interrupting our morning's work; but how pleasantie! Besides, as father sayth, "varietie is not always interruption. That which occasionallie lets and hinders our accustomed studdies, may prove to y^e ingenious noe less profitable than their studdies themselves."

They beganne with discussing y^e pronounciation of Latin and Greek, on which Erasmus differeth much from us, though he holds to our pronounciation of y^e theta. Thence, to y^e absurde partie of the Cicero-nians now in Italie, who will admit noe author save Tully to be read nor quoted, nor anie word not in his writings to be used. Thence, to y^e Latinitie of y^e Fathers, of whose style he spake slightlie enow, but rated Jerome above Augustine. At length, to his Greek and Latin Testament, of late issued from y^e presse, and y^e incredible labour it hath cost him to make it as perfect as possible: on this subject he soe warmed, that Bess and I listened with suspended breath. "May it please God," sayth he, knitting ferventlie his hands, "to make it a blessing to all Christendom! I look for noe other reward. Scholars and believers yet unborn, may have reason to thank, and yet may forget Erasmus." He then went on to explain to Gunnell what he had much felt in want of, and hoped some scholar might yet undertake; to wit, a sort of Index Bibliorum, showing in how manie passages of holy writ occurreth anie given word, etc.; and he e'en proposed it to Gunnell, saying 'twas onlie y^e work of patience and industry, and mighte be layd aside, and resumed as occasion offered, and completed at leisure, to y^e great thankfullnesse of scholars. But Gunnell onlie smiled and shooke his head. Howbeit, Erasmus set forth his scheme soe playnlie, that I, having a pen in hand, did privilie note down alle y^e heads of y^e same, thinking, if none else wd undertake it, why sd not I? since leisure and industrie were alone required, and since 'twould be soe acceptable to manie, 'speciallic to Erasmus.

"It is difficult, excellent friend! to make any comprehensive truth completely intelligible unless we avail ourselves of an example. Otherwise we may, as in a dream, seem to know all, and then, as it were, awaking, find that we know nothing."—Plato's "Politicus."

Conversation of a Philosopher with a Rabbi.—"Your God in his book calls himself a jealous God, who can endure no other god beside himself, and on all occasions makes manifest his abhorrence of idolatry. How comes it, then, that he threatens and seems to hate the worshippers of false gods more than the false gods themselves?" "A certain king," replied the Rabbi, "had a disobedient son. Among other worthless tricks of various kinds, he had the baseness to give his dogs his father's names and titles. Should the king show his anger on the prince or the dogs?" "Well turned!" replied the philosopher; "but if your God destroyed the objects of idolatry, he would take away the temptation to it." "Yea," retorted the Rabbi, "if the fools worshipped such things only as were of no further use than that to which their folly applied them: if the idol were always as worthless as the idolatry is contemptible. But they worship the sun, the moon, the host of heaven, the rivers, the sea, fire, air, and what not? Would you that the Creator, for the sake of these fools, should ruin his own works, and disturb the laws appointed to nature by his own wisdom? If a man steals grain and sows it, should the seed not shoot up out of the earth because it is stolen? Oh no! the wise Creator lets nature run her own course; for her course is his own appointment. And what if the children of folly abuse it to evil? The day of reckoning is not far off, and men will then learn that human actions likewise reappear in their consequences, by as certain a law as the green blade rises up out of the buried corn-seed."

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

BY MRS. BURBURY.

"How low-spirited papa is this evening," said Edith Conway to her sister, as they sat together knitting in the window of their father's lodgings in the Foregate-street of Worcester, on the second day of the assize; "something has annoyed him in court."

"Yes; I heard him tell mamma that a boy has been sentenced to transportation to-day upon evidence so weak that he cannot believe him guilty; and that his poor mother was in court, and when sentence was pronounced, she was taken out in convulsions."

"How dreadful! did papa defend him?"

"Yes, and that is why he is so low-spirited."

"No wonder. What a fearful responsibility is that of an advocate! I am almost astonished that any man should willingly undertake it."

"Undertake what, Edith?" asked the barrister, coming between his two daughters, and placing a hand caressingly upon each fair head.

"Defending prisoners, papa."

"Why?"

"Because it is such a terrible charge to accept, such an awful duty to perform. So much depends upon you; conviction or acquittal, life or death, may hang upon your words, your exertions; and it must be a frightful reflection when all is over, to think that you might have done more."

"You are right, Edith; it is a frightful reflection, and one that haunts us long after the case which excited it is forgotten by others. I remember one, which at the first threatened to leave this terrible memory to me as a legacy."

"What was it papa, may we hear it?" asked Margaret.

"Yes, but it is a story of old times, a tale which happened many years ago. It was on this very circuit, and in this town. I was young at the bar then, one of the least-known juniors, and very poor; anxious to work hard, but without either interest or connexion to bring me forward. I had been the circuit four times, and except twice had never held a brief, and those two were given to me by another man, who was summoned from the bar to his mother's death-bed. Still I did not despair; I had two incentives to courage and perseverance; the first was a firm trust in God's mercy; and the second my engagement to your mother. But it was hard work sometimes, losses, and needed all my resolution to endure; but I did endure, and the end came. Well, it was the Leut Assizes, and Lord Craustoun, the Lord Chief Justice, was on the criminal side. The calendar was unusually heavy, and we knew from his Lordship's charge that he came prepared 'to make an example' as he called it.

"The commission was opened late in the day, after which the court adjourned till the morrow. It happened that for some reason or other I remained in court a short time after every one else had quitted it. It seemed but an accident, although doubtless it was God's doing, and ordained by him. I remember that I was gazing idly on the empty benches, when I heard rapid footsteps approaching through the deserted passage, and a moment after was accosted by an attorney.

"'I beg your pardon,' he said, hurriedly, 'can you tell me where to find Mr. Ashley?'"

"'Indeed I cannot. Some mistake has occurred with his clerk, and when we came into town to-day we found that he had not procured lodgings as usual.'"

"'So I learn. I have been to the rooms Mr. Ashley usually has, and I hear that they are taken for Serjeant Keats. I wish to see him as soon as possible, and I am in the utmost perplexity.'"

"'I am very sorry I cannot help you, Mr. Paget—Mr. Ashley had some intention of going to Malvern this evening, in which case he offered to drive me over; therefore, if you will come to my rooms we may hear some tidings of him; although, perhaps, as I declined his proposal, he may not call; it is all a chance.'"

"'How did you know me?' asked the attorney as we walked together.

"'You are an Oxford man, I think; were you not at Magdalen?'"

"'Yes; and you? I do not remember you.'"

"'I was at Worcester. Do you not recollect that wine party in Lloyd's rooms at Oriel, when the chimney took fire, and the punch was spoiled? I met you there.'"

"'To be sure; how could I forget? And what have you been doing since?'"

"'Marvellously little.'"

"'Is this your first circuit?'"

"'No, the fourth.'"

"'I never saw you here before; did you read with Chantry?'"

"'No, with Monk; Why?'"

"'Because he had an Oxford man of your name with him a few terms since, and he married a cousin of mine. I wish I had seen you before, I should have asked you to hold this brief for me. But now—ah, here is Mr. Ashley.'"

"Ashley had been to my rooms, and not finding me there, had sallied forth in search of me, and now turned back with us. As soon as his eye caught the name upon the brief which Mr. Paget handed to him, he said, 'Sorry I can't take it, sir; I am retained to prosecute.' A short conversation ensued, which resulted in the brief being handed to me.

"'And now, Mr. Conway,' said the attorney, 'can you give me a conference? We must get an acquittal if possible; and I know that no efforts will be spared by the prosecution to convict my client, who is, I firmly believe, as innocent of the charge as you are—when can you see me?'"

"'Now; this moment.' The guineas were nestling comfortably in my waistcoat pocket, and the novel excitement caused me to forget the dignity I ought to have preserved.

"'Thank you; then if you will glance your eye over the case upon your brief, you will, at once be in possession of the names of the parties and the offence charged. When you have done so I will explain the prisoner's previous history, which it is material that you should know.'"

"'It was a prosecution for arson,—the prisoner an apprentice girl, and her master's premises those which had been destroyed.'"

"'Well,' said Mr. Paget when I had finished reading, 'now you must listen to a long story. Eighteen years ago a large basket, containing an infant apparently about six months old, was left at the door of a surgeon in this town. The child was handsomely dressed, and a letter enclosing a bank bill for twenty pounds, and stating that the infant's name was Miriam Lyndon, were found beside her.'"

"'The surgeon was a bachelor, an eccentric and strange man, although a very humane and charitable one, and in spite of all the scandal and jests of the world he kept the little stranger. But he had a housekeeper, Alice Sharpe. Yes,' he continued, seeing me turn again to my brief, 'that is the woman whose house has been burned, and she was so greatly enraged at the prospect of any one sharing the influence she had obtained over her master, that after vainly trying to alter his determination, she revenged her disappointment upon the poor child by the most cruel usage. Ten years rolled on in this way; the old surgeon gave up practice and society, secluding himself in his house and garden. There were no servants beside Alice Sharpe and poor little Miriam, who was still unreasonably hated by the former, with a boy who worked occasionally in the garden. By the exercise of constant watchfulness and cunning, Alice Sharpe managed to keep her master and his little protégé almost entirely apart, and she continued so to fill the child's mind with apprehension and fears of her protector, that when by any chance they did meet, her terror was so great as to mortify and disappoint the kind old man. Still he loved the child dearly, and used to watch her pretty figure running about with great delight. Sometimes too, when Alice was absent for a few hours at meeting or market, he would try to conciliate and attract the little creature, and thus after a time she learned to love, and forgot to fear him. But all this was concealed from the housekeeper. Why, has always been a mystery to me; however, it was so, and Alice Sharpe lived in ignorance of the mutual attachment until her master was taken ill. Then, for the first time, the secret was betrayed by the uncontrolled grief of Miriam and the querulous anxiety of the invalid, who craved to have the child perpetually in his sight. To this after a time Alice was obliged to consent, and a little mattress was brought into the sick-room for her, while the manner and treatment of the wily artful woman changed from its usual harshness to a caressing oppressive kindness that was almost as offensive. But Miriam was too thankful to be allowed to remain with her protector to be fastidious, and she nursed him night and day until his death.

"He had no medical advice, Alice always ridiculing the idea of danger; but she prescribed for him herself, mixed up his medicines out of his own old stock of drugs, and administered them. Miriam observed that after taking them he was invariably worse, and that he often objected to do so; but the housekeeper always prevailed, and by dint of scolding and coaxing usually carried her point. Ten days before his death, Alice introduced into his room a cousin of hers, a lawyer's clerk, whom she told Miriam that her master had sent for; and a will was then made and signed. After this the woman became careless, and left the dying man almost wholly to the charge of little Miriam, who was alone with him when he died.

"The last act of his life was to give the child a packet, which, after his death, he bade her take to the Clergyman; it would explain who she was, he said. And Miriam positively asserts that his last words were, "Bless you, my own child, my darling niece!"

"The packet, however, was lost: whether the child in her exceeding misery mislaid it, or it was taken from her as she slept, there is no means of discovering. Alice Sharpe always asserted that the whole tale was a pure invention, and that Miriam had never received any such article; she, however, remained positive, and so do I.

"Well, all was now changed. A will was produced, executed two days before the decease of the testator, bequeathing all his property to Alice Sharpe, and not one word was said about Miriam. People talked loudly, but the heiress heeded nothing; she took possession of the property, married her cousin, George Sharpe, (the man who made the will,) sent Miriam to the workhouse, and opened a milliner's establishment.

"Wheels roll within wheels; Mr. Sharpe was now a large rate-payer, and once or twice overseer; and when his wife applied to the parish officers, offering to take Miriam Lyndon as an apprentice without premium, those functionaries found it convenient to forget her previous cruelty to the child, extolled her liberality to the skies, and, without consulting the poor girl, bound her instantly.

"The life she led in that house was horrible. No African slave ever worked harder or was more cruelly treated; but she never repined; she had learned endurance from infancy, and the practice was familiar. At last, however, she had another and greater trial to bear: her beauty attracted the evil eye of her wretched master, and her misery was complete. The persecution she underwent from him, and the jealousy of his wife, made existence a burthen to her, and many a night she has gone to sleep with a prayer for death upon her lips.

"One night (that named in the indictment) Miriam was occupied in pressing some straw-bonnets, when her master entered the apartment, and after a great deal of impertinence attempted some familiarities. She resisted, and the noise of the struggle and her cries brought her mistress to the room; while the cowardly assailant, as soon as he saw his wife, slunk away, leaving the poor girl alone to bear the storm of her ungovernable rage. Blows, oaths, and every description of abuse were heaped upon Miriam by the infuriated woman, and she left her with a dreadful vow to be revenged. Five hours after, in the dead of the night, the house was discovered to be on fire, the fire originating in Miriam's room, from which she was absent. She was, however, soon found in a small outhouse at the top of the garden, where she was at work; as she says, by the order of her mistress, but which that woman denies. She was given into custody, and is prosecuted with a remorseless zeal that would do honour to a fiend. A subscription has been raised to defend her, and by God's help she shall be saved."

"Have you seen her?" I asked, after listening thoughtfully to this history.

"Yes, several times; she has been in prison nearly four months."

"And she persists in her innocence?"

"Yes, but there is little necessity to asseverate what to every one who sees her must be so plain."

"Your suspicion then lies—"

"Upon the prosecutor's wife, Alice Sharpe. And more than this, I am inclined to suspect her of using unfair means with her late master, and of holding his property unjustly.'

"How?"

"I cannot exactly tell, but I firmly believe Miriam's assertion that the old man gave her a packet previous to his death, and that he called her his niece; and I also believe that in some way or other Alice Sharpe has become possessed of the secret, and a deeper motive than even jealousy urges her to destroy her victim.'

"But the will,—if that was fairly executed, she need be under no apprehension.'

"So it seems. Still my suspicions of foul play are very strong. Now let us go through the evidence. You see the principal witnesses are Alice Sharpe, Ann Jackson, the servant girl who discovered the fire, Edward Harris, the constable who apprehended the accused, and Louisa Jones, an apprentice, who swears that she heard Miriam vow to be revenged upon her mistress.'

"We perused carefully the evidence given before the committing magistrate: that of the servant and the constable was straightforward enough; there was no collusion or deception there; both spoke to facts within their own knowledge without prejudice or exaggeration. But it struck me upon a second examination that the testimony of Mrs. Sharpe and Louisa Jones was not genuine; there were several points that I did not like, and the language of both betrayed great acrimony and ill-feeling.

"You can make something of that?" suggested Mr. Paget, as he saw me musing upon the matter.

"I don't know. It is very strange they don't call the husband.'

"Yes, and therefore I have served him with a Crown-office subpoena, which has frightened them, and put them on a wrong scent, I think.'

"Is the letter found with the prisoner when she was left at the surgeon's door in existence?"

"I don't know; why?"

"Nothing—a vague idea as to the indictment, that's all. But I think if it is possible it will be as well to have it. By the bye, what brothers and sisters had this old doctor? how could this girl have been his niece?"

"Nobody knows. He came here about thirty years since, but he never visited, and so far as I know never said where he came from. Alice Sharpe followed him immediately.'

"I should like to read my brief over alone, and see you upon it afterwards—to-night if you are not engaged.'

"What time will suit you?"

"Eight o'clock."

"After the attorney was gone, I pored over those sheets again and again, and the more I did so, the more satisfied I was that Miriam was innocent, and that Mrs. Sharpe had some serious reason for wishing to get rid of her. But, unfortunately, this was only my own conviction; I could see no way of working it out, or of bringing a jury to so desirable a conclusion, and the more satisfied I became, the more uncomfortable I was also, because I knew that nothing that was not very plain and unmistakable, would, except by a great chance, be accepted by Lord Craunstoun.

"One help I had, and next to common sense witnesses it is the greatest that a counsel can have—a shrewd; clever, practical attorney.

"It was afternoon before the trial came on. I shall never forget my sensations, as I saw the prisoner come up to the bar. She was not simply pretty, she was beautiful; fair, slight and delicate as a high born lady, and graceful exceedingly. There was a general murmur in court as she appeared, and even the old judge was softened. Oh, what I felt! knowing that under God her life was in my hands. I was very nervous; the pen I held, feigning to make notes, trembled in my hand, and I shivered from head to foot as if agestricken. The constable was the first witness called. His evidence was short and clear. He stated that he was sent for at twelve o'clock at night to apprehend Miriam Lyndon, the prisoner, who was accused of having set fire to her master's house: that when he reached the place he found it burning inside, in a room which he was told was the prisoner's bed-room, and in another immediately under the chamber of her employers. That upon searching the house the prisoner was not to be found, but that after a little delay she was discovered in an outbuilding, at some distance from the house, pressing bonnets.

"The man was turning to leave the box when it struck me that I might put a question or two with effect, and I therefore desired him to stay.

"When you reached Sharpe's house," I commenced, 'what had been done to extinguish the fire? was there any engine or people there?'

"No, sir, none; nothing had been done as I see'd, the fire was a dying out of itself—a few pails of water would have put it out altogether; the straw blazed a bit fierce at first, but there was nothing for it to catch hold on, there hadn't been no body of fire.'

"You say you found the fire burning in two rooms, the prisoner's and the one under her employer's; was there much light, much glare I mean through the windows, anything to attract attention?"

"No, sir."

"It was a light moonlight night, I think?"

"Yes, sir."

"Was the firelight then less visible from the moon shining on the windows, than it would otherwise have been?"

"Yes, sir."

"How far was the outhouse where the prisoner was working at the end of the Orchard, from the dwelling house?"

"About three hundred yards, more or less."

"In going in and out of the outhouse, as you have just told the Court the prisoner would often have occasion to do, in the course of her work, was there anything in the appearance of the house to draw her attention?"

"No, sir; I shouldn't have known there was a fire, outside of the house."

"Did the prisoner express any surprise at seeing you?"

"No, sir; it seems there was a bonnet of my mississes altering at the shop, and she thought I'd come for it, for she said, I'm sorry your wife's tuscany isn't done, Mr. Harris, but we've been so busy."

"Did she seem regularly at work, as if she had been at it some time?"

"Yes, sir, there was lots of bonnets about as she had been scouring and pressing."

"When you took her into custody, what did she say?"

"I told her nothing at first, only as she was suspected of setting fire to the house, and then she looked all amazed, dumbfounded as it were, but after a bit she said very steady like, 'I know nothing of it, I never had such a thought.'"

"The next witness was the servant girl."

"Her testimony was clear and short. She had seen Miriam go to her bed-room at the usual time, had retired herself immediately after, and slept soundly until aroused by her mistress, who told her that Miriam had set the house on fire, and had run away. She was very much frightened, and by her mistress's orders went to the constable. She did not see the burning rooms until her return with the man for whom she had been sent; she wished to do so, but her mistress refused to let her. She knew of the quarrel that had taken place in the evening between Mrs. Sharpe and Miriam, and heard the former say that her apprentice should 'rue the day she had set her cap at her master.' It was unusual to work at the bonnet-pressing and scouring at night, but once or twice before, Miriam had worked all night by her mistress's orders. Mrs. Sharpe was a regular Turk to her; and her master worried the life out of her; she led the life of a black slave between them. Never heard her swear to be revenged, or any such thing, and would not believe it. There wasn't much burned, only a cupboard door and shelves in one room, and an old bedstead in another; there was a lot of straw and matches under the bed; Miriam had no call with either."

"The apprentice was called next. She was a bold impudent-looking girl, dressed in a very showy style, and stared round the court in the most insolent manner. She took the oath with great flippancy, and when she turned round cast a look at Miriam which betrayed all the hatred of her heart, and its cause—she was jealous."

"She swore to many conversations with the prisoner on the day previous to the fire, in each of which she had declared her resolution to be revenged upon Mrs. Sharpe, although she did not say why. Never saw Mr. Sharpe pay her any attention, although she did all in her power to attract him. Considered her a great flirt, and a very artful girl. Purchased a tinder-box and sixpenny-worth of matches for her a few days before the fire. She said she wanted them for a particular purpose. Don't know where she got the money, unless it was from the young lawyer up the street, who was always after her. Would swear that on that very night before she left work, Miriam said,

'You'll hear something before morning as'll make you stare.' Asked what she meant, but got no answer, except a vow to be revenged on her mistress. This conversation took place at the garden-gate. There is an old-fashioned lodge at the gate, open to the road. People can sit and rest in it; anybody there would see all the people who came down the garden-walk. They could not help seeing."

"Cross-examination did very little with this witness, except to show the bitter feeling with which she regarded Miriam, to elicit the fact that the young lawyer had formerly been a lover of her own, but had deserted her for Miriam, and that her own character was far from stainless."

"Then came Alice Sharpe, the only witness from whom I had any hope; and what that hope was, was even to myself so vague and undefined an idea, that I could not shape it into any practical and tangible form. With a hesitating step and furtive glance Alice Sharpe now entered the box, and certainly I never looked upon a more cunning, ruthless, determined countenance than hers."

"She was evidently ill at ease, for she cast an anxious, apprehensive gaze round the court, and trembled visibly. My hopes rose as I saw this. There was something she wished to conceal, something she feared would come out, and I knew better than she did that there is no place like a court of justice to facilitate discoveries, or to unmask a lie."

"At first, while she was giving her evidence, I looked steadily at her, and she became confused and nervous, and hurried on, and I saw that if I hoped to succeed in eliciting anything from her, it must be by setting her at ease; so I buried my face in my hands, and feigned to read; but through the division between two fingers I managed unseen to keep a keen watch over her. The effect of this release from surveillance was immediately apparent. She thought that she had baffled me, and that I felt myself beaten; and this idea brightened her countenance, strengthened her voice, and unloosed her tongue. Thenceforth she spoke freely, and her evidence against the prisoner was, if it could be believed, perfectly conclusive of guilt. She positively denied having sent the girl to work in the outhouse, and swore to having found a tinder-box and matches concealed in Miriam's bed after the discovery of the fire, as also some of the same matches (which she recognised from being made of a different wood to that generally employed for the purpose) by the heap of straw which had been used to set the closet and bedstead on fire."

"She said all this in a flippant, malicious manner, every now and then casting her eyes furtively upon me, but receiving re-assurance by seeing how completely I appeared to be absorbed. While she was speaking, a note was passed over to me by one of the senior counsel, who had been watching her attentively. It ran thus:—'I am not quite sure—but I believe this woman was tried five-and-thirty years since at Liverpool, for aiding in the forgery of a cheque. Her accomplice was a cousin, a sort of clerk in some office; but they were acquitted in consequence of an error in the indictment. I recognise her by that mark upon her right cheek and temple, which she was suspected of receiving upon the occasion of some disreputable quarrel, and by that singular pronounciation; but her name then was Martha Steele.'

"I turned round and handed this to the attorney, and in a few seconds the man who had written it came round and spoke to me. When I next turned towards the witness-box, I saw her displaying an old pocket-book of her husband's, which she said had been found among the articles in Miriam's box, and which had been missed for some days. It was an old book, with a green shagreen cover, and as I glanced at it I saw in silver studded nails the initials G. S. upon it. I resumed my seat carelessly, looking at her with the utmost indifference I could assume. I hoped to throw her off her guard, and all unconsciously Mr. Ashley played into my hands most admirably.

"At last the examination-in-chief was concluded, and I rose as Mrs. Sharpe was hastily quitting the box. 'Stop,' I said, 'I must have a little conversation with you now.'

"I cast one look at the prisoner. The misery of her face gave me new courage, and I mentally prayed for help to bring the truth to light. At first I put a few unimportant questions, and then said, 'You lived with your late brother,—master I mean—twelve years, or thereabouts, did you not?'

"Her face became livid white, and she muttered some indistinct reply. Whether wisely done or not, I felt that I had now thrown off the mask, and must be prepared to make the most of every word, or even change of feature. 'Why do you not answer me?' I said, sternly.

"Another muttered sentence.

"'Speak louder,' said the judge.

"'Yes,' replied the woman.

"'What did you do from the time of your trial for forgery at Liverpool in 18— till your appearance in Worcester as the late Mr. Steele's housekeeper?'

"She gazed helplessly at me.

"'Answer me, woman.'

"'I was living in different places; I can't exactly say where now.'

"'Were you not married in the name of Sharpe?'

"'Yes.'

"'How long previously had you ceased to bear your own name of Steele?'

"A frightened glance was all her answer.

"'Well, never mind; it was somewhere about the time that unpleasant business of the embezzlement in Mr. Pearson's office occurred. You were housekeeper then, I think. After that it would of course be disagreeable to bear the same name; and you did wisely to get rid of it as soon as you could, and I suppose your cousin was of the same opinion.'

"Her face worked convulsively as I went on thus coolly, but she said nothing. This rather perplexed me; I had depended upon discovering something from her own incautions replies, and her wary cunning baffled me. At last I was obliged to let her go down without having produced any stronger effect than that of destroying her credit with the jury.

"Another witness, for whom we were not prepared, now came forward, and deposed that on the very day of the fire Miriam went to her house, and purchased a 'bolting' of straw, and a large bundle of matches, all of which she declared were for her mistress, but portions of which, as it turned out, had been found in the burning room. All my tact failed in shaking her testimony: it was evidently true; and she also proved having herself delivered the straw, which she took upstairs by Miriam's directions, and put under the bed in her room. She asked for what purpose it was wanted, and was told that Mrs. Sharpe was about to make some new mattresses 'unknown to her husband,' and therefore desired that it should be hidden out of his way. The girl, she said, was crying, and upon being asked why she did so, said that her mistress had been very cruel to her, and that she wished herself dead, drowned, or burnt, or poisoned, or anything.

"This closed the case for the prosecution; and I could see that, although the jury had been dissatisfied with some of the evidence, yet this last testimony had decided them against us. Their faces wore the hard resolute expression of men who have made up their minds to punishment. Oh, the agony of that poor girl as she saw it too!

"'I would not run the risk of calling George Sharpe,' whispered Mr. Paget; 'the jury are dead against us, and the judge, too, I think; and if he does you no good, as I fear he will not, he'll ruin the case wholly,—you had better trust to yourself.' But I dared not; one more look at that beseeching face, and the impulse to call Sharpe came so strongly upon me that I gave way to it. Very few, but as prompt as I could imagine, or utter, were the words I addressed to the jury, and then, urged I know not how, I called George Sharpe. He was a long time coming, and when at last he made his appearance, it was only by the help of the crier, and in a most pitiable state, that he could enter the box;—he looked like some one who had been suddenly stricken with death; he shook frightfully, his eyes glared, his teeth chattered, and his mind seemed wandering.

"'Your name is Steele, I think,—George Steele?' I said, quietly.

"He stared vacantly; then said, 'Yes, George Steele; you're right, sir, George Steele.'

"'You are a cousin, I think, of your wife, and of the late Mr. William Steele, the surgeon?'

"'Yes.'

"'Do you remember how long it was after your trial at Liverpool that you changed your name?'

"'No,' he answered helplessly.

"'Had not Mr. Steele another sister besides you, wife,—one who displeased him by marrying?'

"'Yes; Miriam's mother.'

"An exclamation from his wife, who stood in a box behind, startled him a little, but he shook his head dismally, and said, as if to himself, 'It's no good!'

"What was her name—Mrs.—Mrs.—?" and I turned over my brief as if to look for it.

"Mrs. Blackwood, she married young Will Blackwood, the squire's son, as had been courting Martha afore Fanny left school."

"The whole thing was now plain,—legible to my mind as if I had it upon my brief,—but, as fact after fact rapidly followed, corroborated and explained each other, I began to fear that I should lose the connexion, and not shape my questions so as to bring out the truth for the jury.

"When was it that you first knew the child left at Mr. Steele's door to be his sister Mrs. Blackwood's child?"

"Not for a good while;—but Martha knew it soon after."

"That relationship is the reason, I suppose, why she dislikes the girl so much; her sister had captivated her sweetheart, eh?—and of course she did not like the child?"

"Yes, that reason, and another!" he answered, gloomily.

"George!" exclaimed a voice, which all recognised as that of his wife. He heard it, as he had before, but he took no heed.

"Ay, that was the will, I suppose!"

"The will?"

"Yes, that document which was contained in the letter which Mr. Steele gave to Miriam, you know."

"A document;—how came you to know anything about that?" he asked, as if suddenly awaking from his dreamy state to a consciousness of all that was going on around him.

"Oh, I know all about it!—You drew up the first will, you remember, ten days before Mr. Steele's death, but this deed, which altered that disposal of his property, and left it to his sister Fanny's child, was executed the very day of his death, and was stolen from Miriam while she slept."

"Oh, papa!" cried Edith Conway; "how did you know that?"

"I did not know it, Edith; I only thought it probable, and acted as if it were a certainty; but the man looked as surprised as you do, and said, 'He did not leave it all to her.'"

"No?—I've been misinformed, then!—How much did he leave?"

"George!" said the same warning voice.

"How should I know?" answered the frightened man.

"Take that woman into custody," exclaimed the judge, 'if she disturbs the court again!'

"The man was now thoroughly alarmed and perplexed.

"How much besides the house did he leave to her?" I asked, quietly, fixing my eyes steadily upon his quivering face.

"I don't know."

"That's a falsehood. Remember you're upon your oath, man, and answer me truly: how much did Mr. Steele leave to his niece?"

"What's the good of bullying me? I tell you I don't know."

"Then came a moment's pause, and then I said suddenly:

"Who mixed up the medicines?"

The man's face was horrible to look at, as I asked this. White it had been all along; but now it was ghastly: the eyes started and glared, and white froth came out, fringing the blue livid lips. I shuddered as I looked. There was evidently some terrible mystery, and I almost dreaded to speak, lest it should overwhelm me.

"Who mixed up the medicines?" I asked again.

"A vacant stare of terror was all my answer.

"I must have an answer," I said, sternly, 'or I shall ask his lordship to commit you.'

"Oh Lord, Martha, it's come at last!" exclaimed the wretched man: 'I knew it would!' and uttering a hideous scream, he fell upon the floor of the witness-box in strong convulsions.

"After this witness had been carried out, and as soon as the confusion had subsided, Mr. Ashley rose to reply upon his evidence; but, as it was impossible to recall the man, and endeavour to set him right with the jury, or to remove from their minds the fearful impression he had made, the counsel confined his remarks to a few common-place observations, which he hurried over as quickly as possible.

"Lord Cranston then summed up; but the jury heeded him very little: they, in common with all the court, were gazing on the prisoner, who had fainted in the dock, and whose beautiful and sorrow-stricken face lay white and moveless before them. Her head was supported by one of the turnkeys, and a surgeon, who happened to be near, had entered the box to chafe her hands and bathe her face; but to those rough men in whose hands her fate reposed, this swoon appeared like death; and I knew, as I looked upon their pitying faces, that not the most obdurate among them would venture to pronounce the word which must, in the event of her recovery, doom her to die.

"And I was right. Almost without turning in their box, and quickly, as if glad to release her, and do their part towards comforting her, they returned their verdict, and she was immediately acquitted, and borne out of the dock, senseless."

"And the others,—Alice and George Sharpe?" asked Edith.

"She absconded during the confusion in court, and her husband, in the intervals of delirium, and just before his death, made a fearful confession, of which I can only give you the outline.

"Martha, Fanny, and William Steele were the three children of a tradesman living in a Yorkshire village. The son of the Squire, attracted by the bold beauty of Martha, paid her so much attention that she fully expected he intended to marry her, and therefore boasted of her conquest to all her companions; but just when she had decided in her own mind that the proposal ought to be made, Fanny returned from school.

"From that time Martha lost her empire over her lover's heart; and, in her treatment of the unfortunate cause of her disappointment, showed the first symptoms of that innate cruelty of heart which afterwards worked so much evil to herself and others. In a few months, worn out with her sister's unkindness and taunting words, and urged by her lover, poor Fanny Steele eloped, only leaving behind her a vague note for her brother William, whom she dearly loved.

"Soon after this their father died, and Martha accepted a situation as housekeeper to a solicitor in Liverpool. There she became acquainted with her cousin George, and in a very short period attained so great a mastery over him as to persuade him to commit the forgery for which they were both subsequently tried and acquitted. After this she was of course homeless and characterless; her guilt had been too evident to admit of any doubt, and it was very well known that her life had only been saved by some flaw in the indictment: no wonder, then, she found it impossible to obtain any situation.

"In this position she thought of her brother. She knew that he was most merciful and forgiving, and thought that if she could only persuade him of her innocence of the crime for which she had been tried, he might receive her again. This after a time he consented to do, on condition that she changed her name, so that she might not be recognised as the heroine of the celebrated forgery case. This proviso, however, reasonable as it was, angered her greatly, but she affected to be grateful, and after her brother broke up his comfortable house in Yorkshire, and went to Worcester, she followed him in the capacity of housekeeper. Two years afterwards an anonymous letter, informing him of his sister Fanny's dangerous illness, reached the kind-hearted surgeon. Without saying anything to Martha, he went to the place to which he was directed, just in time to see his dear sister before she died, and to undertake the charge of her infant. He learned then, for the first time, that her husband was dead, and that his family had refused to receive her. After the funeral Mr. Steele entrusted the child to the care of the woman who had nursed her mother, and some weeks after, he received the infant from her in his own surgery; while, to baffle the suspicion of Martha (now called Alice Sharpe), to whom he had said nothing of Fanny's illness and death, and to whom he dared not entrust the secret, he deposited the baby, the bank note, and the letter at his own door.

"But Martha was not long deceived. The likeness to her sister was so strong in the child's infant features, that her suspicions were soon awakened, and her brother's tenderness to his protégée, although carefully concealed, speedily confirmed them. She was, however, too wary to suffer her knowledge of his secret to be discovered by the surgeon, and she revenged herself for the silence she was compelled to maintain, and her previous disappointments, by harshness and cruelty to the unoffending Miriam. But after a time a new fear sprang up in her mind, and she dreaded lest Mr Steele, whose health had already begun to fail, should at his death bequeath all his property to the poor forlorn little child. This fear she communicated to her cousin George, who had followed her to Worcester, and, by the aid of a false reference, obtained employment in a lawyer's office; and then commenced that diabolical system of slow-poisoning which wore her brother's life away, atom by atom, and finally ended in destroying it.

"Previous to his death, however, she introduced George into his room as a stranger, and prevailed upon the dying man to make a will in her favour, which he willingly did, having another form ready prepared for his signature, which gave everything to his niece. This he contrived to execute during Martha's absence, the night before his death, in the presence of some stonemasons who were working in the yard, and it was this which he enclosed in a letter to Miriam, explaining her parentage, and which after his death was stolen from her by Martha. Of the fire, also, the miserable man gave a full account. It had been planned and executed by Martha, partly from revenge and jealousy of her husband's admiration of Miriam, and partly that she might, by her conviction, get rid of her for ever.

"All this, and much more, George Steele confessed upon his death-bed; and as, but for his sudden cowardice, which had caused so great a diversion in her favour, that poor girl must have been found guilty upon the strong circumstantial evidence brought against her, I have ever looked with fear and suspicion upon any verdict sentencing to death upon testimony so liable to interpolation, misconstruction, and falsehood."

"And what became of Alice, papa?"

"She was hanged a year after, for an attempt upon Miriam's life."

A FEW NOTES ON THE EDUCATIONAL QUESTION.

"O for the coming of that glorious time,
When, prizing Knowledge as her noblest wealth
And best possession, this imperial realm,
While she exacts obedience, shall admit
An obligation on her part to teach
Those who are born to serve her and obey."

MANY years have passed since these lines were written by the greatest of our recent poets, William Wordsworth, and during those years the question of national education has been continually and prominently before the English public. There is, perhaps, no subject on which so much has been written and spoken,—none on which greater diversity of opinion may be said to have prevailed. And, admitting, as most intelligent persons now do, the expediency of a more general diffusion of the rudiments of knowledge and of sound practical information, we have still to lament over the formidable obstacles which prevent the adoption of a scheme of instruction available for all classes, and adapted to meet the necessities of the age.

What to teach, How to teach, and Whom to teach: Upon this text, which involves, we submit, the gravest political question of the day, a weighty and important discourse might be framed; but as an elaborate argument might be out of place in this magazine, we will simply draw attention, in our own way, to a few considerations that lie on the surface of the subject.

In the first place, it should be borne in mind that, in the present day, a certain amount of information is necessary to ensure worldly success, and even to secure the proper discharge of daily duties. Ignorance now operates as an absolute disqualification for every position to which men usually aspire, —as a bar to prosperity which it is impossible to overleap. In the battle of life mental activity has become equally requisite with bodily exertion, to ensure a victory. And since the value of educational training to all classes is so obvious—nay, its necessity so apparent—to bring it within the reach of all is emphatically both the duty and the interest of the more influential portion of society. The duty—for, as it has been beautifully written by Jeremy Taylor, “if the people die for want of knowledge, they who are set over them shall also die for want of charity:” the interest—because on the general well-being of all depends the security, the stability, and the prosperity of the state.

Fully impressed, then, with the importance of the inquiry, we anxiously ask, What are the real impediments which prevent the adoption of a system of popular education, of a character and on a scale worthy of a great nation? We find that the most obvious and important of them have been well considered and clearly stated in a recent pamphlet now before us, written by a clergyman of the Church of England, the Rev. Foster Barham Zincke,¹ to which we will briefly direct the reader's attention.

1. The first difficulty (and one which we are especially called on to treat with delicacy,) is well characterised by Mr. Zincke as the result of the peculiar complications of our social system. In a country like ours, before any great question can be carried out, we have many opinions to take,—many different interests to conciliate and consult, and “if conciliation be impossible, the only engine that can be brought to bear is public opinion; and on all great questions, to awaken, and enlighten, and direct, public opinion is a work of time.” Whilst the paramount consideration without “great interests” is the prevalence of a particular principle, or the preponderance of a particular party, it is idle to expect a universal voluntary cooperation in any scheme of education which embraces the wants of the whole people. “The conflict of interests,” as Mr. Zincke well observes, “prevents anything being done. It is impossible to propose anything with which all parties will be satisfied; and any one of the great parties which take an interest in this question, is sufficiently strong to hinder the adoption of any plan by which it considers that its position or its interests would be damaged. The cause of education, which ought to be entirely distinct from all party and sectional interests, and which every wise man, and every good man, ought to endeavour to promote and to perfect, has been made with us one of the great prizes in the battle for social and political influence.” In all the voluntary efforts of influential bodies for the promotion of education,—and it is far from our intention unduly to disparage their exertions,—there has been a certain alloy of the selfish principle, an ever-apparent endeavour “to turn the schoolmaster into a kind of recruiting officer,” and to make the school-house subservient to a sectarian purpose. Whilst we admit that voluntary effort has accomplished much, and whilst we admire the zeal and spirit displayed by many earnest partisans, it appears to us nevertheless that the cause of education ought not to be left to chance, or to spontaneous exertion. We are not sanguine enough to believe that any particular system, or specific scheme, could be adopted which would be perfectly unobjectionable to all parties,—in the present state of society this is impossible,—but we do believe that any system would be better than none at all; and we do hold that it is a duty to lay aside minor differences when a great object is to be attained, and a work of necessity fulfilled.

2. Another impediment to the spread of enlightened views on the subject of education is stated by Mr. Zincke to be “the nature of the education which the educated classes have themselves received.” He contends (and on this subject he has addressed the public in another able and thoughtful pamphlet²) that the system of instruction pursued in our higher schools and colleges is not adapted to prepare men for the active duties of life, and that, consequently, they are afterwards led to undervalue the practical importance of all education. “The system pursued,” he observes, “in the education of our upper class, and, to a great extent of our middle classes, is to this day much the same as that which the circumstances of the times made necessary more than three centuries ago. . . . Now it must be evident that persons who have been brought up under such a system—let us hope better things for the future—must have very inadequate ideas on the subject of education. When they recollect how slight in their own case was the bearing which education had upon the purposes of life; when they find how very little good moral effect resulted from it; and, when judged of by the wants of the age, how very small is the amount of intellectual improvement which they have received from it, we must not wonder that many have formed a very low estimate of the advantages which education is capable of conferring upon the people.” There is undoubtedly much truth in this. Many sensible men, before Mr.

(1) “Why must we educate the whole people? and what prevents our doing it?” by the Rev. F. B. Zincke. 1850.

(2) “How much longer are we to continue teaching nothing more than what was taught two or three centuries ago? or, ought not our highest education to embrace the whole range of our present knowledge?”

Zincke, have seen and lamented it; and we may, in passing, remind the reader of an admirable paper on the subject by the late Sidney Smith, in the Edinburgh Review, (and now reprinted among his collected essays,) entitled "Too much Latin and Greek." At a time when nearly all that was valuable in science or literature was locked up in the learned languages, and when an accurate knowledge of them was the distinctive boundary which separated the learned from the unlearned, we cannot be surprised that the education of the higher classes should have been principally directed to their acquisition. But under the changed circumstances of the present period, the question naturally enough arises whether we act well and wisely in giving such exclusive attention at our schools and colleges to the ancient literature.

We have not space at present to pursue the subject; but, in lieu of further remarks, we venture to quote a few lines from an almost forgotten poem on the subject of Education, by West, (the friend of Gray and translator of Pindar,) which appear to us to bear forcibly upon the point we are endeavouring to illustrate. Adopting the Spenserian style and stanza, the poet thus describes the Weird Sisters, who in his time claimed to preside "o'er every learned school:—

"In antique garbs (for modern they disdain'd)
By Greek and Roman artists whilom made,
Of various woofs, and variously disdain'd
With tints of ev'ry hue, were they array'd.

* * * * *

"And well their outward vesture did express
The bent and habit of their inward mind,
Affecting Wisdom's antiquated dress,
And usages by time cast far behind:
Thence to the charms of younger Science blind,
The customs, laws, the learning, arts and phrase
Of their own countries they with scorn declined;
Nor sacred Truth herself would they embrace Unwarranted, unknown in their forefathers' days."

"Thus ever backward casting their survey
To Rome's old ruins, and the groves forlorn
Of elder Athens, which in prospect lay
Stretch'd out against the mountain, would they turn Their busy search, and o'er the rubbish mourn."

"Then gath'ring up with superstitious care
Each little scrap, however foul or torn,
In grave harangues they boldly would declare
This Ennius, Varro, this the Stagwite did wear."

3. A third impediment "arises," to quote Mr. Zincke's words, "from our peculiar social condition. There is such an enormous distance in this country between the rich and the poor, that the rich, upon whom, of course, almost entirely devolves the duty of devising a proper scheme of education, and of carrying it out, cannot be brought to take that interest in the education of the poor which they would naturally take if there were a greater similarity in their habits and tastes."

4. Another impediment, of a ridiculous as well as mischievous character, is pointed out by Mr. Zincke, and is deserving of some consideration. It is the existence of what he calls "a strong aristocratic feeling" (in the foolish and contemptible sense of the expression,) "pervading the whole of the middle classes." Among those who have become enriched in the ordinary callings of life, it is a common ambition to have their children educated with the scions of the aristocracy. And whilst the wealthy tradesman aspires to Harrow and Rugby, the smaller shopkeeper has also a strong feeling against sending his children to school where they would mix with the children of the poor. It is this feeling of pride or prejudice which prevents the establishment of a superior class of district schools, in which the children of the farmer, tradesman, artisan, and labourer might receive, at a small pecuniary cost, varying with their condition of life, a really good and useful education. This obstacle to the diffusion of knowledge is of a serious character, but we doubt not it may be gradually overcome. "The remedy," observes Mr. Zincke, "evidently is to make the schools for the lower orders so good that it will be impossible for the shopkeepers and farmers to avoid seeing that they are far better than the schools to which they are sending their own children, and that their children will incontestably be gainers, by being removed to the parochial school, while they will themselves be gainers by having less to pay for their children's education." In support of his position, Mr. Zincke has referred to the successful efforts of the present Dean of Hereford, to establish a superior class of schools in a pauperised and ignorant district. Having paid a visit to these schools, Mr. Zincke had the good fortune, in one instance, to meet with a direct proof, that self-interest is capable of conquering the repugnance entertained by the better classes towards the parish school; and he thus narrates the circumstance:—

"The following anecdote will show the process by which this principle has surmounted the old ideas and prejudices of those who lived in the immediate neighbourhood, and who were enabled to form an opinion of the schools from what they themselves saw. A farmer, living four or five miles from the parish, came to the Dean, and stated, 'that he had a family of children, and that he had been thinking of these schools, and reasoning the matter over with his wife for a whole year, and although they had prejudices at first about sending their children to school with the children of labourers, that he was quite convinced now, from what he had seen and heard, that he had been wrong in thinking this an objection; that the advantage was in the end greatly in favour of the farmer's child, because he could be kept at school for a much longer time than the labourer's child; and that he was quite persuaded that his farm, if in that parish, near the school, would be worth to him 50% a-year more, on account of the cheap and good education it would enable him to get for his children.'"

Having adverted to the principal obstacles which, in the opinion of Mr. Zincke, prevent the adoption of a liberal and reasonable scheme of popular instruction in this country, we will turn for a moment to a topic which appears to us to have an important bearing on the whole question. Before we can have efficient schools, it will be necessary to have a sufficiency of efficient schoolmasters; and before we can secure the services of an adequate number of educated men, properly qualified for the instruction of the young, it will be requisite to concede to them the social position to which their acquirements and important functions fairly entitle them. We do not wish to be misunderstood. During the last few years, we are well aware that much attention has been paid to the training of schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, and many well-informed men and women have been prepared for the due discharge of their important office, through the instrumentality of training-schools, for the establishment of which society has every reason to be grateful. Parish schoolmasters, as a class, are unquestionably improved, and instances of gross ignorance and inefficiency are of much rarer occurrence than they were ten years ago.¹ But whilst great efforts have been recently made for the improvement of the schoolmaster, and though gross examples of incompetence are not so common as they were, the position of those engaged in the work of instruction appears to us by no means satisfactory. With the establishment of a proper scheme of popular education, we should expect to see greater consideration shown to the profession of the instructor. We should expect to see a proper rank assigned him; and, the dignity and importance of the calling being fairly recognised, we have not the slightest doubt, that many accomplished men of quiet habits and studious tastes would be soon found engaged in the important duty of forming the minds and characters of a rising generation. For very many the task would have a peculiar attraction, if the prejudice against it were removed. The noblest minds would find in the district school a congenial sphere of usefulness. It has been said by Wordsworth, that,

"Strongest minds
Are often those of whom the noisy world Hears least;"

and to such minds a career of unobtrusive usefulness has many attractions. For what are called the prizes of life, not a few educated and highly intellectual men have neither the energy nor the inclination to strive. Are there not many such who would willingly engage in the work of education, if proper inducements were held out, and proper facilities offered?

Before we conclude these desultory remarks, there is one consideration which forces itself on our attention, and appears to us to render the question of

(1) We have accidentally taken up an old newspaper, whilst preparing this article, and in a speech delivered in the House of Lords on the 15th July, 1839, by Lord Brougham, we find the following instances of the ignorance of schoolmasters. "The great majority of the schools in Manchester," said his lordship, "were also taught without order or system, and a great number of teachers were incompetent to their task. On questioning one of the teachers, he always answered in the affirmative. He was asked whether he knew Greek, and Latin, and Mathematics, to all of which questions he gave an affirmative reply, upon which one of the gentlemen observed, 'This is multum in parvo.' The teacher, observing they were taking notes, said, 'Put multum in parvo down too' . . . In another case, the schoolmaster was asked, whether he paid proper attention to the morals of the children? Upon which he replied, 'We don't teach morals, they belong rather to the girls.'"

National Education of peculiar interest and importance at the present time. Our social condition is about to be subjected to the scrutiny of a larger number of civilized strangers than the arts of peace have ever before attracted to our shores. Our habits and institutions will be exposed to criticism, not always of the most friendly character, and comparisons will be made between the circumstances of our own and other countries, which, in many instances, even to the most impartial mind, may not be altogether in favour of Great Britain. Our wealth and industrial energy will excite wonder and admiration; we may appear full even to fatness of all the material attributes of greatness: but there is a darker side to the glowing picture which will not escape the eye of the unfavourable critic. We may expect him to point with reproving exultation to the signs of popular ignorance which abound amongst us, and admit of no excuse. In what way can we palliate the scandalous neglect of duty in high places which the intellectual condition of our people seems to imply? Our goals are filled with the illiterate—the neglected and untaught; and whatever connexion there may be between ignorance and crime,—(a question on which we cannot enter here.)—one thing is clear, that the state which is prompt to punish is not equally prompt to enlighten and instruct. Wherever there is abject poverty, ignorance will be found its invariable concomitant, and generally its cause. Debasing habits and debasing vices flourish, because no intellectual tastes have been implanted or encouraged. When all this is noticed, and contrasted with our vast opportunities; when our great resources, our internal prosperity, our freedom from civil discord, and our professions of religious zeal are called to mind, will not the existence of so much heathen ignorance at our own doors, be a continual subject of reproach which will sound harshly and sorrowfully in our ears? Where so much wealth is ostentatiously displayed, who would have thought that its producers could have been so little cared for?

We are not indulging in mere vague declamation. If the testimony of intelligent observers is to be relied on, the intellectual condition of the English people is far below that of many countries over which we have been accustomed to vaunt our superiority. Other states have not left the education of the people to mere chance, and the adoption of an enlightened scheme of instruction has been, in most instances, followed by a corresponding improvement in physical and moral condition. A writer, in every way qualified to form a correct judgment on the subject, has, in a recent work,² emphatically stated, that "the moral, intellectual, and physical condition of the peasants and operatives of Prussia, Saxony, and other parts of Germany, of Holland, and of the Protestant cantons of Switzerland, and the social condition of the peasants in the greater part of France, is very much higher and happier, and very much more satisfactory, than that of the peasants and operatives of England." And he goes on to give the reasons for this, which appear to us, under present circumstances, of sufficient importance to be inserted in this paper:—

"The great superiority of the preparation for life which a poor man," he observes, "receives in those countries I have mentioned, to that which a peasant or operative receives in England, and the difference of the social position of a poor man in those countries to that of a peasant or operative in England, seem sufficient to explain the difference which exists between the moral and social condition of the poor of our own country and of the other countries I have named. In Germany, Holland, and Switzerland, a child begins its life in the society of parents who have been educated and brought up for years in the company of learned and gentlemanly professors, and in the society and under the direction of a father who has been exercised in military arts, and who has acquired the bearing, the clean and orderly habits, and the taste for respectable attire, which characterise the soldier. The children of these countries spend the first six years of their lives in homes which are well regulated. They are during this time accustomed to orderly habits, to neat and clean clothes, and to ideas of the value of instruction, of the respect due to the teachers, and of the excellence of the schools, by parents who have, by their training in early life, acquired such tastes and ideas themselves. Each child at the age of six begins to attend a school, which is perfectly clean, well ventilated, directed by an able and well-educated gentleman, and superintended by the religious ministers and by the inspectors of the Government. Until the completion of its fourteenth year, each child continues regular daily attendance at one of these schools, daily strengthening its habits of cleanliness and order, learning the rudiments of useful knowledge, receiving the principles of religion and morality, and gaining confirmed health and physical energy by the exercise and drill of the school playground. No children are left idle in the streets of the towns; no children are allowed to grovel in the gutters; no children are allowed to make their appearance at the schools dirty, or in ragged clothes; and the local authorities are obliged to clothe all whose parents cannot afford to clothe them. The children of the poor of Germany, Holland and Switzerland acquire stronger habits of cleanliness, neatness, and industry at the primary schools, than the children of the small shopkeeping classes of England do at the private schools of England; and they leave the primary schools of these countries much better instructed than those who leave our middle class private schools. After having learnt reading, writing, arithmetic, singing, geography, history and the Scriptures, the children leave the schools, carrying with them into life habits of cleanliness, neatness, order and industry, and awakened intellect, capable of collecting truths and reasoning upon them."

It is not our wish—far from it—unduly to disparage the circumstances and institutions of our own country, nor do we wish to see the military system of Prussia imported into Great Britain. Our people are not to be drilled into frequenting schools, or compelled, as our legislators know, by pains and penalties to accept instruction. We have many obstacles here which do not exist elsewhere, and which, as we have before admitted, it is difficult to overcome. We are also proud to confess that as a nation we have to be grateful for many peculiar blessings. But we trust that our patriotism will be considered not the less enlightened and sincere, because we endeavour, in a kindly spirit, to point out that other nations are doing in their own way what we have left undone. Whilst competing with them in the arts of industry, let us also emulate them in attention to the social and moral condition of our people. Let us endeavour to bring a wholesome educational training within the reach of all classes, and impress upon our legislators the important truth, that national institutions are never so stable and secure as when they rest on the safe foundations of intelligent sympathy and enlightened obedience.

JESUS.

"The disciples of Jesus wander about the scene of his sufferings.—The walk to Emmaus.—Appearance of Jesus to his disciples in the room where they met.—His reappearance on the shore of the Lake Genesareth."

A long and sunny tranquil afternoon
Had lured, with sweet enticement, from their toil,
Or festal games, a motley multitude.
Some pass'd with quiet steps the gate which led Towards Siloam, and the pensive vale
Of fabled Jehoshaphat; while others roam'd
Along the banks of pleasant streams which ran Through that broad verdant plain, whereon of yore
The mightiest of the sons of men abode.
Gardens and groves, and every breezy hill,
Had each its gladsome group. But there were those,
Though few, upon whose spirits still there lay
The gloom of Calvary. Of these, some sought Gethsemane, or linger'd round the base
Of the dread mount. Others of quicker hope
Had met together in an upper room
To pray and meditate. But two there were,
Whose faith and sorrow had an equal part
In all they thought and spake; and with the strife,
Fever'd and sad, they took their lonely way
To Emmaus. The balmy breezes play'd
Freshly around them; and the mellow light
Pour'd evening's richest tints upon their path.
Fervent discourse employ'd them; but in vain
They strove to solve the fearful doubt which grew Darker as waned the day, before whose close,
If Jesus spake aright, He should have stood
Again among his people.

As thus they thought,
And to each other told their fears, a voice
Of kindly greeting sounded by their side.
It was the voice of one whose look and garb,
Seen through the meshes of the golden veil
Of the bright evening, seem'd of nobler kind
Than wont to meet the eyes of such as loved
Lonc country walks. But with familiar tones
He follow'd in the train of their discourse;
And ever and anon a stream of light
Flash'd on their minds, as some strong word of his Battled its way through gloomy fears, and roused

Thought to its higher consciousness. But soon,
 They reach'd the rustic lodge by the way-side,
 Where they had oft reposed on summer eves,
 And with a patient memory studied o'er
 The words of Jesus. Greeting them again,
 The stranger pass'd along; but when they press'd
 His hand, and with entreaties manifold
 Besought his stay, He yielded to their wish,
 And took his place to share the simple meal
 Soon spread before them. They had told what joy Flow'd from his words, and as He saw them weigh
 With still increasing earnestness his speech,
 So seem'd there more of gladness in its tone,
 And more of joyousness in every form
 Which hope or memory wore. But when He bless'd
 The bread and brake it, rapture, deep, intense,
 And trembling wonder held them. From their eyes
 A cloud had pass'd: reveal'd before them sat
 Their risen Lord. A ray of glory wreathed
 His calm, majestic brows; of fulgent grace
 Flow'd round about Him; but they saw no more;
 He had departed, as they bow'd their heads
 With that mute worship which is all the heart
 Can give when overladen with its love.

As men who sit and talk of one whose step
 They long have listen'd for, but now begin
 To doubt his promised coming, and to chide
 Those who still look for him, so sat and talk'd
 The little band of fond disciples, met
 In that secluded dwelling, where awhile,
 The doors fast closed, they felt they might be free
 From tyrant malice. Peace and silence reign'd.
 The broad full moon its silver lustre shed
 Through the tall latticed window, and dispersed
 The deepning twilight. Such an hour it was
 As forces on the mind the pleasant thought
 That every hour hath in itself a life,
 A spirit, which in passing us but speaks
 Of its own journey to another sphere,
 Where it will meet with us again, and be
 More powerful for good.

Each heart was now
 Fill'd with its own best hopes; unquiet dreams
 Pass'd silently away; a humble will,
 A readiness to wait and trust, proclaim'd
 The action of some wondrous power at work
 Among those new inquirers.

And when thus
 Sweetest repose prevail'd; and if a voice
 Was heard, 'twas that of one whose inward prayer
 Unwittingly moved the lips,—when thus the hour
 Gave trust signs of life, in what it wrought
 In faithful, patient hearts, lo! Jesus stood Amid his people. Even the air stirr'd not,
 Foretelling his approach. But never form
 Of more distinct, substantial, massive strength
 Had moved on earth. His voice, divinely sweet,
 Utter'd such accents as might best recall
 The days most precious to the soul, and yet
 Lend more of strength to hope than memory.
 He bless'd his worshippers, and with the word
 Which gave them peace, convinced them He was man,
 Man, and not spirit only: and though man,
 A traveller who had journey'd through the grave,
 And sought the world beyond, and had come back
 Replenish'd with the strength which he had drunk
 From gales and fountains there.

Another moon
 Was on the wane, and softly fell its light
 Upon the Galilean lake, where lay
 The fisher's bark which oft had spread its sail
 Obedient to Jesus, till the mists
 Of the grey morning rose upon the waves,
 The patient crew, with wonted toil and skill,
 Their nightly task pursued. But all within

Their hearts and minds was changed. Another life,
 Another work was theirs; and, hour by hour,
 They thought but of the promise of their Lord,
 And of that day when, gifted with the power
 To make his glory known, their voice should rouse
 A slumbering world, and bring its myriad tribes
 To worship at his feet.

Such visions fill'd
 Their souls: but now their bark had reach'd the shore,
 And, faintly visible through the dusky air,
 A stranger hail'd them. By his words he seem'd
 To know all depths and shallows of the lake,
 And all the fisher's art so well, that they Right gladly heard him, as a man grown old
 In that employ. But one among them saw
 With keener eyes, and soon his brethren heard
 That Jesus waited them. Their early meal,
 Prepared beside the sheltering rock—the fire
 Whose cheerful blaze dispers'd the chilly mist,—
 And friendly words as others came to land,
 Stiff with the cold and labour of the night,
 Brought back to many a heart what'er belong'd
 To pleasant recollections of old toil,
 Perils escaped, and hardships well endured.
 Nor fail'd there in the thoughts which thus arose
 Food for discourse with Him, their guest revered,
 Who sat among them, nor unasted left
 Their simple viands. When the morning shone
 Full on the lake, He vanish'd: but his form
 Hung as a shadow on the sparkling waves;
 And they who loved Him most still seem'd to trace
 His presence wheresoe'er they turn'd: sometimes,
 High on the rocks; at others 'mid the flowers,
 The crown'd and golden lilies, which o'erspread
 The sumptuous valleys: then again they thought
 He stood beside them, and his earnest gaze
 Made their hearts throb, as if it could not be
 A fancy of their own.

ITALY.

LA SANTA CASA, OR THE VIRGIN'S HOUSE, AT LORETO,
 BY S. LEY WOLMER.

THE traveller who passes through that part of Italy called the March, or Marquisate of Ancona, in the early spring time, when the feast of the Annunciation of the Virgin is celebrated, or in the autumn, when the Roman Calendar fixes the time of her birthday, will observe an unusual bustle in every part,—groups of travellers are all tending to one destination; bands of pilgrims, peasants, women, and children, are hastening to Loreto! to visit the Holy House of the Blessed Virgin.

Now this town of Loreto is, in itself, but a small place, situate on a hill, at a short distance from the Adriatic Sea, and a few miles from Ancona, the principal city of the district; but Loreto has become famous all over the world, from circumstances as extraordinary (if true) as ever happened to any city whatever.
 Who has not heard of the Image that fell down from Jupiter, of which the town clerk made mention at Ephesus after the messengers of the Apostle Paul had exclaimed against the superstitions of the inhabitants of that place?—but at Loreto there is a house of stone—a real chamber—said to have been built more than eighteen centuries ago in

(1) Acts xix. 35.

the Holy Land, and once inhabited by the most blessed of earth's daughters, and by her more blessed Son, but which was subsequently brought, "upborne by angels' wings," to Italy, and there deposited, and now, A.D. 1851, is there to be seen; such facts as these deserve a record, and demand scrutiny. They are not the shadowy and dim records of the times we are pleased to call dark ages—they appeal to the credence of the day. I shall embody much of the history of this strange prodigy, as well as offer the best authentication of the statements offered by the Romanists themselves in relation to it, by transcribing the Loreto edition of 1839, of the reprint of an old translation, most probably made especially for the benefit of English travellers and pilgrims, and certified thus:—

"I, Robert Corbington, Priest of the Society of Jesus, in the year 1684, have faithfully translated the Premises, out of the Latin, hung up in the said Church."

As the Jesuit, by his statement, appears himself to have a talent for translating premises, we may with greater satisfaction listen, (without altering his style, or correcting his orthography,) to his account of "the Miraculous Origin and Translation of the Church of our Blessed Lady of Loreto;" which is as follows:—

"The Church of Loreto was a Chamber of the Blessed Virgin, nigh Hierusalem, in the City of Nazareth, in which she was born, and bred, and saluted by the Angel, and therein conceived, and brought up her Sonne Jesus to the age of twelve yeares. This Chamber, after the ascension of our Saviour, was by the Apostles consecrated into a Church, in honore of our Blessed Lady. And Saint Luke made a picture to her likeness, extant therein, to be seene at this very day; it was frequented with great devotion, by the people of the country where it stood, whilst they were Catholicks, but when, leaving the faith of Christ, they followed the Sect of Mahomet, the Angels tooke it, and carrying it into Scalonia, placed it by a towne called Flumen, where not being had in due reverence, they again transported it over sea, to a wood in the territory of Recanati belonging to a noble woman, called Loreto, from whom it first tooke the name of our Blessed Lady of Loreto; and thence againe they carried it, by reason of the many robberies committed, to a mountain of two brothers, in the said territory; and from thence, finally, in respect of their disagreement about the gifts and offerings, to the Common highway not far distant, where it now remains without foundation, famous for many signes, graces, and miracles, where the inhabitants of Recanati, who often came to see it, much wondering, environed it with a strong and thick wall, yet could noe man tel whence it came oricinally til in the yeare M.CC.XC.VI. the Blessed Virgin appeared in sleep, to a holy devout man, to whom she revealed it, and he divulged it to others of authority in this province, who determining fordwith to try the truth of the vision, resolved to choose xvi men of credit, who, to that effect, should go all together to the city of Nazareth, as they did, carrying with them the measure of the Church, and comparing it there with the foundation yet remaining, they found it wholly agreeable, and in a wall thereby ingraven, that it had stood there, and had left the place; which donne, they presently returning back, published the premises to be true, and from that time forwards it hath byn certainly knowne that this church was the Chamber of the Blessed Virgin, to which Christians begun then and have ever since had great devotion, for that in it daily she hath donne, and doth many and many miracles. One friar Pavi di Silva, an ermit of great sanctity, who lived in a cottage nigh unto this Church, whither daily he went to matins, said that for ten yeares space, on the viii of September, two houres before day, he saw a light descend from heaven, upon it, which he said was the Blessed Virgin, who there showed herself on the feast of her nativity; in confirmation of all which, two vertuous men of the said city of Recanati divers times declared unto me, prefect of Terremian and governor of the forenamed Church, as followeth:—the one, cald Paul Renaldanci, avouced, that his grandfather's grandfather saw when the angels brought it over sea, and placed it in the forementioned wood, and had often visited there; the other, called Francis Prior, in like sort affirmed that his grandfather, being c.xx. yeares old, had also much frequented it in the same place; and for a further proof that it had byn there, he reported, that his grandfather's grandfather had a house nigh unto it, wherein he dwelt, and that in his time it was carried by the angels from thence to the mountaine of the two brothers, where they placed it as above said."

"By order of the Right Reverend Monsignor Vincent Cassal of Bologna, Governor of this Holy Place, under the protection of "The most reverend Cardinal Moroni,

"To the Honour of the ever-glorious Virgin."

It was on a fine day in Autumn, with the sun shining as it delights to do in Italy, and a glorious firmament without a cloud above me, when I entered the town of Loreto. I felt at once I was in no ordinary city—at the hotel, instead of serving my dinner, the pretty daughters of the host assailed me with trays and boxes full of the most tempting things in the shape of rosaries, necklaces, crosses, strings of beads, books, medals, all blessed in the House of Loreto—consecrated tapers, pictures of saints and saintesses, and other things forming a selection large enough for a bazaar, to which my attention was invited as being the most appropriate occupation for myself in the City of the Virgin, and possibly not less lucrative to the hotel than supplying the ordinary accommodations for the body. I made a selection of pretty toys, and afterwards visited the principal street of the town, of which it would be difficult to give a just idea. The business of Loreto was at its height there; the street, it is true, was full of shops, but shops, and materials in them, unlike those of any other commercial city, I should suppose, in Christendom. I was obliged again to remind myself of the Ephesian craftsmen, to whom "the making small shrines for Diana brought no small gain." Every shop was a mart for variations of the rosaries, necklaces, crosses, strings of beads, books, medals, consecrated tapers, and the pictures of saints and saintesses; and outside every shop stood one or more of the damsels of Loreto to entice the worshipper within!

There was no lukewarmness in the worship here; no one, at least no stranger newly arrived, could pass these relic-marts in peace,—Signore! entrate. Oh, che cosa da vedere!—"Do come in, Sir! see my pretty things." Neither silence, nor assurances that I had already laid in a stock of Loreto ware, proved of any avail. Non importa, non avete veduto la mia, non avete veduto la mia.—"Never mind, you have seen nothing until you have seen mine." I passed on, with determination for awhile, running a complete gauntlet through the street; but human forbearance has its limits—human nature is weak—I yielded at last to the temptation; a pair of large black Loretan eyes, and a flattering tongue, seduced me inside the bottega or shop, and I then found I was not half provided for a visit to Loreto. I showed my already-bought stock, and found of course, what had not occurred to me before, that I had been charged "hotel prices," being about six times the current value. I solaced myself by thinking that the more select assortment of the hotel-keeper might have been blessed in a more orthodox way than the religious ware in such masses before me! I soon discovered that to be considered as a respectable visitor to Loreto I must add to my purchases:—I had no guide-book to the church, no account of the relics, no picture of the Madonna herself, no account of the wonderful cures performed, no box specially made to bring away some of the precious dust of the walls of the house, of which, by a little understanding with the keepers of the chapel, a small portion might be obtained; and then there was a better form of a rosary, and a little crucifix to open by a secret spring and show a little figure of the Virgin within. The result of course was that an exchange was made between the contents of my pockets, for the oddest assortment of things which had ever visited them. A valuable addition to the collection was afterwards made in the shape of a little bell, which, when blessed, I was informed, would be very useful, if properly applied, in frightening away the devil. Thus armed, I at last reached the principal church of the town.

It is a handsome edifice; a statue in bronze of the Pope Sixtus V. in pontifical robes, with the right arm raised in the act of benediction, stands before the front. Thus we enter the Loretan temple, and, instead of giving an account of the feelings of the solitary English traveller, who looked on with a cold and unimpassioned attention, let us suppose that the groups of travellers and pilgrims whom we observed on our way before reaching Loreto, are now assembling in the square before the church, and crowding round the doors on one of the great festive days. All is adorned to receive them—companies of visitors and pilgrims are arriving, with their banners bearing the blazonry of different saints, and carrying large crucifixes and representations of the crucifixion; priests accompany them who chant and sing in unison, with loud and not discordant voices. Then follow other votaries, bearing in their hands their intended offerings, varying in value according to the quality of the person, and their feelings of devotion: these too are singing as they pass forward, and waving their coloured ensigns. A large crowd presses on all sides, and as the pilgrim groups come nearer and nearer to the object of their pilgrimage, some fall on their knees and call on the Virgin Mother, and some in joy, and others in grief, perform strange actions, divesting themselves occasionally of their own garments to put on sackcloth for their sins, and beating their breasts or their shoulders, perform voluntary penance. The priests within the church then meet the coming visitors, receiving them with instrumental music and vocal melody, whilst the church bells are merrily ringing. Entered within, and approaching the sacred precincts, again the devotees cast themselves on the ground, heartily saluting the Virgin, and this some do with so much ardour as to move many who witness them (so says a traveller of former days) even to tears.

At last the shrine is reached, the chamber itself, all resplendently illuminated, and there, as the aforesaid traveller observes, the visitors contemplate the effigy of the Madonna with such piety and such tears, with such sighs and such humility, as was quite wonderful to behold, and many become so fixed in contemplation of the place, and the actions which the Virgin has performed, that if they were not literally pushed out by others who are waiting behind, they would never leave at all. Many of the devotees present some gift at the altar, and those who bear precious things consign them to proper deputies, who duly record the gift and the name of the giver in the books of the treasury. By these means untold treasures had accumulated at Loreto, the image of the Madonna itself was literally a blaze of gems; these treasures, however, were very differently appropriated during the French possession of Italy, and the year 1797 is a deplorable remembrance for the temple at Loreto; in that year, "our Lady" being taken on a visit to Paris. The image was, however, restored to the Pope, in 1801, and shortly afterwards, readorned with jewels and encircled with a royal crown, after a triumphant entry into Loreto, it resumed its place in the sanctuary. Since that period new treasures have been pouring in to such an extent, that upwards of seventy cases full of various offerings are at present in the treasury. The image of the Madonna is again radiant with jewels—a robe of crimson velvet worked and fringed with gold, the gift of a convent of Ursuline nuns, forms a garment handsome enough for any lady's ordinary use. The care of the late beloved Ferdinand of Spain, as is well known, provided the Madonna with an embroidered robe, worked, as report says, by his own royal hands.

Let us enter the sanctuary. Behold some of the titles by which Roman Catholic devotion has eulogized it:—Domus Aurea—Domus Sapientia—Vas insignia devo- tionis—Propitium altissimi—Civitas refugii—Puteus aquarum viventium—Terror demonum—Spes desperantium—Gloria Hierosolyma—Tabernaculum Federis—Sacrarium Divinitatis—and Sacra Santa Casa are amongst them, and others even more high-sounding might be quoted! The Sacra Santa Casa, however, consists of but one apartment, of about thirty-two feet in length, thirteen in breadth, and seventeen in height; the walls are composed of stones of varied form, cemented together, the interstices showing a kind of mortar, which can be in places broken away, the sight of which reminded me of the little boxes prepared at the relic-shops for its reception; I was informed that the supply was never wanting, for the holes soon became replenished with cement and ready for the next concourse of pilgrims. A different result, however, appears in reference to any interference with the stones of the walls; two instances are recorded of the danger of intermeddling with them. A Spanish bishop obtained permission of Pope Paul III. to remove one of the stones, of which he accordingly possessed himself, but not one day of peace or health could the bishop enjoy whilst he kept it, and at length becoming severely ill, he returned the stone to its place, and then immediately recovered. Now this is all duly attested by a letter from the aforesaid bishop, preserved amongst the records of the Holy House. The conduct of the other stone was still more surprising; having been taken without the Pope's, or any other proper permission, it returned to its place in the wall of its own accord.

The continual burning of lamps and incense within the confined space has made the whole interior nearly black in colour, by which the objects which formerly adorned the walls are almost entirely hidden, amongst which there were anciently several frescoes. On the western wall is the opening for the window, through which, tradition reports, the Angel Gabriel entered; above it is an ancient wooden cross, after the Greek manner, with a figure of the Saviour, and which are believed to have been brought with the House itself. There are some niches in the walls, which have a wonderful interest, for in them were discovered some earthen vessels, forming, as it is stated, an undoubted part of the culinary apparatus of the house at Nazareth: of these precious relics there are two cup-like vessels, which were broken and despoiled of their covering of gold during the French invasion; the Pope, however, has remounted and replaced them, but fortunately a small earthen cup was saved from the ravage, and though now covered with gold, is stated to be one of the vessels of Terra Cotta which served for the use of the Holy Family; and these sacred relics are sometimes produced for veneration by the faithful.

The House, as it will be remembered from the account, was said to have been consecrated as a church at a very early period; the original altar, we are informed, has been marvellously preserved, being found in the house after its translation. The ancient altaris at present covered by the one now in use, in which however there is an opening, through which the square stones of the original altar can be seen. The Prince of the Apostles is said to have consecrated the altar, and to have celebrated the Mass upon it himself. Upon the present sumptuously adorned altar is the image of the Virgin, "Our Lady of Loreto;" and that Saint Luke may have the credit of having been a sculptor, as well as a painter and physician, the workmanship of it is ascribed to him. The interior of the Virgin's house is plain and unadorned; the exterior presents a striking contrast!

Art has shown her wonders, and genius has called upon skill, to form a casket for such a jewel. The Santa Casa is encased in marble! and prodigies still attend as if they were but common things in relation to it. The stones of the original building could not be united with other things less sacred, not even of marble, and perceiving this, the workmen desisted from the attempt, and the Holy House stands isolated, beneath the gorgeous covering, which encloses, but does not defile it by contact. The external covering, designed by Bramante, consists of richly-sculptured marbles, presenting four sides, corresponding to the walls within. The materials having been prepared, the building was commenced in the time of Leo X., and finished about 1538. The eastern and western fronts present magnificent bases, each supporting four Corinthian columns, and above the capitals is an ornamental frieze and balustrade-work, the compartments being all filled with sculptures. On the eastern side, the principal one, representing the Annunciation by the Angel Gabriel, is by the celebrated Sansovino; and according to the account of his biographer, Vasari, the Angel is so lovely that he appears not made of marble, but a real celestial. In the smaller compartments are represented the visit of the Virgin to Saint Elizabeth, and other scriptural subjects. The sides present a strange admixture of sacred and profane representations, for whilst the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel utter their sublime predictions as to the Messiah, two females, typifying the Libyan and Delphic Sibyls, are figured also with prophecies; the one bearing the inscription:—

"Æternus tempore Princeps, Reginæ mundi gremio Rex membra reclinans;"

the other:—

"Virgine Matre satus Ille, Deus castâ nascetur Virgine magnus."

The western part is adorned with sculptured compartments, one of which represents the death scene of the Virgin, and the Apostles carrying her on a bier to burial, whilst several Angels are hovering over the corpse. Another sculpture portrays the coming of the Santa Casa through the air to Loreto, and several of the attendant events, which are recorded in the history, and are all performing at the same time. In the niches are figures of Moses and Balaam, with passages of prophecy; and near them the Cumæan and Samian Sibyls, with their prophetic offerings. The southern and northern sides are of the same character of architecture and adornments, but, being longer in extent, there are six Corinthian columns in each façade. The compartments are all likewise filled up with historical sculpturings, and the Prophets Isaiah, Daniel, Amos, Malachi, Zacharias, and King David, are strangely placed in company with an equal number of prophesying Sibyls, all of them bearing some oracular sentence.

Whilst viewing the exterior, we observed numerous devotees making their way around it, on their knees, and a circle might be traced, in which the very stones have been worn away by this species of penance. There were amongst these votaries many peasants in their picturesque costume, and some young girls, who, having just partaken of their first communion, were dressed in white, wore veils on their heads, and a crown of white flowers. Amongst the numerous visitors to the shrine, and who doubtless perform their kneepilgrimages with great fervour, are those from the places which the Santa Casa first visited. Many of such are known to enter even the church on their knees, kissing the very pavement as they approach the sanctuary, and bitterly lamenting their loss, pray the Virgin to return to them,—“Ritorna, ritorna a noi, O Maria! Ritorna a Tersalla, O Maria! Maria! Maria!” “What a grand testimony,” remarks a Catholic writer, “do such terms and tender lamentations as these offer to this admirable sanctuary!”

The pilgrims who visit Loreto are highly favoured also, not only by all the benefits which the place itself with all its associations affords, but by the substantial advantages which the liberality of Popes has annexed to a due reverence for it. There is the grant by the Pope Paul II. of seven years of indulgence to all the faithful, who being contrite, confessed and communicated, should visit the Holy House in the grand festival of the Virgin's Assumption; and on all the Sundays in the year. Julius II. with a more liberal hand offers plenary indulgence for another feast-day; Leo X. for another; Gregory XIII. for every day in the holy week, for all the feasts of the Virgin herself, and even for the octave or eighth day after them. Clement VIII. kindly remembers strangers and pilgrims, and gives them the opportunity of gaining indulgences every day in the week. Then Clement XI. not only ratifies the privileges so granted, but actually renders them applicable to souls in purgatory. Benedict XIII. concedes forty days' indulgence to all whom the rod of penitence shall touch, which consists of a very gentle tap on the shoulder; and it is no wonder that so many should make the tour of the sanctuary on their knees, for Clement VIII. has annexed an indulgence of seven years to the performance. The very keepers of the Holy House have virtue imparted to them by Pius VII., who so lately as 1806 granted to them the faculty to bless the crucifixes, and medals for dying pilgrims, and foreigners; and if such devoted beings should touch the sacred image of the Virgin, all the benefits of the indulgences of Saint Brigida herself should be theirs! After such treasures and such inducements, can it be a matter of surprise that the Holy House of our Lady of Loreto should be one of the wonders of the world? not only to those who believe, but also to those who do not believe, in its facts or its offers! But enough of description, for were we to enter into details of the church itself, and of its varied riches, our sketch must swell into a volume. We will not, therefore, even give a resumé, interesting though it would be, of the rich property and possessions which are again accumulating in the treasury; but it would be unjust on leaving Loreto to be altogether silent as to the evidence, or the facts on which its claims to the belief of an enlightened world repose, or the judgments which wise and pious men have formed of such things. Let Leandro Alberti, who so gracefully described the fair land of Italy, say—so far at least as translation can convey his words—all that a devoted son of Loreto, a priest as well as historian, wished, when speaking of the Santa Casa. Thus he writes:—

“My very powers fail me, when I remember that most sacred chamber, and all the wonderful events which have passed within it. I know not how to express myself, so as to satisfy devout and curious readers, but yet I will write a little, and first I say, one ought to believe this to be the chamber where was born the Queen of the earth, because independently of the authentic writings which we read of it, and how it was conveyed by angels, there is not a man so hard of heart, nor so wicked, who entering there, does not feel himself softened, and disposed within himself to make his reverence to the Virgin, and humbly to pray her to be pleased to intercede for him, and obtain the remission of his sins from the Saviour! And one feels in doing this, to be moved by a certain spiritual influence. And also to confirm this there are the miracles there shown, and the favours granted to mortals who have thus had recourse to the Mother of the Lord, and which they continually do, as their writings credibly inform us, and the statues of gold, and silver, and wax, and pictures, and other similar things, which are there continually brought through many ages. I should be too long, were I to describe the great miracles performed, and great favours granted, in this place, which are such, that they would appear incredible to those who do not believe the Lord to attend to the petitions of his sweet Mother. And not only should I be long, but I want powers to do this properly, so that I shall not proceed further; praying that most amiable Mother to pardon me, if I have not praised her as I ought, and as it is my duty to do.”

Alberti wrote in 1550, and although Loreto since then may have lost some of its attractions, its character and claims remain to the present time unaltered. A mighty change was, however, in Alberti's time, coming over the spirit of Christendom, and we will put in opposition to the views of which he is the representative, those of one of the children of the Reformation, as presenting quite another construction; and the quaintness of the style may not diminish the interest of the observations, which I shall quote from the work entitled, "A Briefe Inference upon Guicciardine's Digression," published in 1629; at the conclusion of which the Author thus writes:—

"There remains yet one other thing, wherein they of the Romane Church have much prejudiced the sinceritie of Christian religion, and that is their miracles. For, as they have beene too full of their canonick Constitutions, and too free of their philosophical conclusions, wherewith their great tomes, and volumes, are loaden, like Cardinal Campegius's Sumpters, (with much trash, and little or no treasure,) so have they beene too lavish, and vulgar in their hyperbolickall miracles. A great miracle, sure it is, (if it were true) that they should grow so thicke in the P'opish aire territories, and thrive so little in this moist climate of ours. For if we have one in an age, it is but of a straw, and yet not worth a straw when wee have it: a miracle, but of foolish fancie, and unsettled imagination, such a one as the eye of conceit may daily see, if it looke upon broken clouds; and the care of credulous fancie hourly heare, if it listen to the ring of bells. But, let them no longer scandalize the truth, nor thinke to cozen the world with this counterfeit kinde of coyne. Their golden legend, of leaden lies, is no more current. Men are no longer babes, to take such counters for good payment, or so simple to believe they see a man in the moone. Let them, if they be wise, stamp us no more miracles of this mint, lest while they endeavour to make men beleevv what they see to be false, they be hardly trusted in what is true. I dare undertake, there be more of these juggling miracles to be seen in the countries of Poperie, than there have beene houres since Christ wrought his first miracle at Cana in Galile: as appeareth by the crutches, armes, legs and other gambolls hung up for shew thereof in all the churches and chapells of Italie; some of which have beene so palpably forged, and so notoriously discovered, as all the figleaves in Italy and Spaine are not sufficient to cover their nakednesse, whereof the modester sort are much ashamed, confessing them to be pia mendacia, and the wiser sort laugh at them. Of this kind of stuffe Rome itself is stuffed, more than any place else; where for my part I beleevved very few, but onely this; that it is a miracle God suffereth the pride and abomination of that See, so long unpunished. But of such miracles as this, the whole earth is full: All the workes of God, from the great frame of the world to the most small and contemptible creatures, are miracles of his power, the stay and upholding them in their first being are miracles of his providence, the punishing of the wicked, and protecting his children, are miracles of his justice.

"What should I speak of those great miracles of God's infinite mercie? the sending of our Saviour into the world, his Incarnation, Resurrection, and Ascension, and all other workes of his, as raising the dead, curing the diseased, restoring the lame, and blinde, to their limmes and sight, registred to us in the sacred chronicle of his holy word? These indeed were truly miracles such as all Christians are bound to beleevve, and confesse."

After such contrasted opinions, we will take leave of the Holy House of Loreto. The facts and the feelings connected with it are perhaps best left, without other comment, to the reflection and judgment of the reader.

THE ENGLISH HOUSEWIFE.¹

NEXT unto her sanctity and holiness of life, it is meet that our English housewife be a woman of great modesty and temperance, as well inwardly as outwardly: inwardly, as in her behaviour and carriage towards her husband, wherein she shall shun all violence of rage, passion, and humour, coveting less to direct than to be directed; appearing ever unto him pleasant, amiable, and delightful; and though occasion of mishaps, or the mis-government of his will, may induce her contrary thoughts, yet virtuously to suppress them, and with a mild sufferance rather to call him home from his error, than with the strength of anger to abate the least spark of his evil, calling into her mind, that evil and uncomely language is deformed, though uttered even to servants; but most monstrous and ugly, when it appears before the presence of a husband: outwardly, as in her apparel and diet, both which she shall proportion according to the competency of her husband's estate and calling, making her circle rather strait than large: for it is a rule, if we extend to the uttermost, we take away increase; if we go a hair's breadth beyond, we enter into consumption: but if we preserve any part, we build strong forts against the adversaries of fortune, provided that such preservation be honest and conscionable: for, as lavish prodigality is brutish, so miserable covetousness is hellish. Let, therefore, the housewife's garments be comely and strong, made as well to preserve health as to adorn the person, altogether without toyish garnishes, or the gloss of light colours, and as far from the vanity of new and fantastic fashions, as near to the comely imitation of modest matrons. Let her diet be wholesome and cleanly, prepared at due hours, and cooked with care and diligence; let it be rather to satisfy nature, than her affections, and apt to kill hunger than revive new appetites; let it proceed more from the provision of her own yard, than the furniture of the markets; and let it be rather esteemed for the familiar acquaintance she hath without it, than for the strangeness and rarity it bringeth from other countries.

To conclude, our English housewife must be of chaste thoughts, stout courage, patient, untired, watchful, diligent, witty, pleasant, constant in friendship, full of good neighbourhood, wise in discourse, but not frequent therein, sharp and quick of speech, but not bitter or talkative; secret in her affairs, comfortable in her counsels, and generally skilful in the orthy knowledges which do belong to her vocation.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER LV.

CONTAINS MUCH PLOTTING AND COUNTERPLOTTING.

It was the evening of the Tuesday in Epsom week, the day before the Derby. Lord Bellefield, though outwardly calm, was inwardly a prey to the most painful mental excitement. His Lordship had met with a continued run of ill-fortune latterly, everything he had attempted had turned out badly; if he betted on a race, the horse he backed invariably lost; if he played, cards and dice equally declared against him; he had lavished hundreds in presents to a new opera dancer, and at the moment in which he deemed his suit successful, she had cloped with a younger, richer, and handsomer man; his tradesmen began to mistrust him, and to dun him unpleasantly; several of his intimates to whom he owed money, grew cool, and eyed him suspiciously; his extravagance had reached his father's ears, and Lord Ashford had not only ventured to remonstrate with him, but apparently bent on adding insult to injury, had cited the example of his younger brother, Charles Leicester, (whom from his heart he despised,) and held him up as a pattern for his imitation, while Lord Bellefield was forced to bear this lecturing patiently; for although the estates were entailed, his father had been a careful man, and was possessed of a large personality which he could leave to whom he pleased. The only piece of good luck, to set against all this "monstrous quantity" of vexation, was the admirable promise displayed by the Dodona Colt. This exemplary quadruped, now individualized by the name of "Oracle," appeared to have been born with a metaphorical silver spoon in its delicate mouth, for from the moment in which its four black legs (suggestive of its future fleetness, for black-legs are invariably fast.) put their feet into this naughty world, everything had prospered with it. The breeder was astonished at it, the groom who watched over its infancy was delighted with it, Turnbull, the trainer, was so impressed by its merits that he never could speak of it without a volley of the strongest oaths in his vocabulary, by which expletives he was accustomed (transposing a certain poetical dictum), to strengthen his praise of anything which was so fortunate as to win his approval; and by the united kind regards of all these worthies, this favourite of nature had grown in public opinion until it now held the proud position of first favourite for the Derby. Lord Bellefield was by this time no new hand upon the turf; on the contrary, by dint of having been cheated, and associating with those who had cheated him, for several years, he had acquired, besides a sort of prescriptive diploma to do as he had been done, a considerable insight into the mysteries of the training stable, as well as the betting ring—he was therefore habitually cautious; but, in the present instance, all his acquired knowledge and natural acuteness coincided with the opinions of his underlings, to prove to him that in the Dodona Colt he had, indeed, drawn a rare prize; and that if he could but ensure that which our sanguine country is popularly supposed to expect, viz. that "every man should do his duty," his horse, and none other, must be winner of the Derby. Accordingly all the powers of his intellect (which, although, not enlarged, was subtle and acute), were now directed to two points; viz. first to take all precautions to ensure that his horse should be fairly dealt by; and secondly, to make such a book on the event, as might retrieve his bankrupt fortunes. This last feat he had succeeded in accomplishing even beyond his utmost wishes; and accustomed as he was to hazard large sums upon the cast of a die, he began to grow alarmed at the magnitude of the stake for which he was about to contend.

Having dined in Town at his club, he returned to his luxurious bachelor menage in — Street, and, desiring that he might not be disturbed, drew out his betting book, examined it carefully, went through the calculations again and again, referred to the latest odds,—and then closing it with a sigh, muttered—"Yes, they are all safe men, men who will pay to the hour, and if Oracle runs true, this cursed load of debt will be wiped off and — I shall be rich enough to begin afresh and contract a new one!—if! aye there's the rub,—if!" He strode up and down the room. "I am wretchedly nervous to-night," he exclaimed, ringing the bell;—"bring brandy," he continued, as the servant appeared; then filling a wine-glass, he drank it off as if it had been water—"leave it"—he said; then resuming his walk, added,—"It must go right—there is not a horse that can come near him; Tartuffe was the only one that had a chance, and Turnbull swears he is safe to lose; he witnessed the private trial himself, and the colt won by a head, carrying 5 lbs. extra weight,—that amusement cost me 50*l.*, to bribe Austerlitz's trainer to allow the trial to take place.—True, Turnbull may have lied,—and yet why should he? he owes everything to me,—though that has nothing to do with it,—gratitude, if there be such a quality, is simply prospective,—men are grateful to those only from whom they expect favours. Well, even thus, Turnbull is bound to me hand and foot, besides I know he has backed the colt heavily himself: barring accidents then, against which no foresight can provide, and of which therefore it is useless to think, I stand safe to win.—And yet it is a frightful sum to hazard on the uncertainties of a horse-race.—If I should lose I must either blow out my brains like poor Mellerton, or quit the country, marry Annie Grant, and live abroad on her money till my father dies, and he's as likely to last twenty years longer as I am. I scarcely know which alternative is preferable. What an infernal fool I've been to bring myself into such a scrape; but when a man has such a run of ill-luck against him as I have been cursed with for the last year what is he to do?" He paused—stretched himself wearily, and then glancing at a gilt clock on the chimney-piece, muttered,— “Twelve o’clock, I must be up early to-morrow, and keep a clear head—I’ll smoke a cigar, and turn in.”

 At this moment the house-bell rang sharply, and Lord Bellefield started like a guilty thing. With an oath at this fresh proof of his nervousness, he filled and drank a second glass of brandy, then stood listening with a degree of eager anxiety, which, despite his efforts, he could not restrain. Doors opened and shut, and at length a servant appeared.

“What is it?” exclaimed Lord Bellefield, before the man could speak.

“A person wishes particularly to see your lordship,” was the reply.

“Say I am engaged, and can see no one; I thought I told you I would not be disturbed,” returned his master angrily; “stay,” he continued, as a new idea struck him, “what kind of person is it?”

“He desired me to inform your lordship that his name was Turnbull,” was the answer.

With an oath at the man’s stupidity, Lord Bellefield desired him to admit the visitor instantly.

“Well, Turnbull,” he exclaimed eagerly, as the trainer entered; “what is it, man?”

Thus adjured, Turnbull, a tall stout-built fellow, with a clever but disagreeable expression of countenance, glanced carefully round the room to assure himself that they were alone, and then approaching Lord Bellefield, began, “Why you see, my lord, I thought I’d better lose no time, for there ain’t so many hours between now and to-morrow’s race, so I jumped on to my ’uck, cantered over to the rail, ’ailed a ’Ansom’s cab, and ’ere I am.”

“Nothing amiss, eh? nothing wrong with the colt?” asked Lord Bellefield, with an affectation of indifference, though any one who had watched him closely might have seen that he turned very pale.

“No, bless his eyes, he’s as right as a trivet, and as playful and impudent as—as a brick,” continued Mr. Turnbull, rather at a loss for a sufficiently eulogistic simile; “it was only this morning he took up little Bill the ’elper by the waistband of his indispenionables, and shuk him like a tARRIER would a rat. It would have done your lordship’s ’art good to have seen him; he’ll come out to-morrow as fresh as paint, bless his bones.”

“Well, then, what is it, if Oracle is all right?” returned his employer, greatly relieved.

“Why unfortunatc/y there’s somebody else as has got a ’orse as is all right too, and I’m afraid we ain’t quite so sure of the race as we fancied we was,” was the dispiriting reply.

“Why I thought you had satisfied yourself that there was not a horse that could run near him. You tell me he beat Tartuffe carrying 5 lbs extra weight.”

“Aye, so I believed; but the sharpest of us is done sometimes. It’s a wicked cross-bred world to live in, and a man need be wide-awaker than—than one o’clock, to be down to all their moves.” So saying the discomfited trainer rubbed his nose as if to brighten his wits, and continued, “the truth is this, my lord—one of my grooms cum to me this morning, and said if I would stand a sovereign between him and one of his mates, he would tell me something as I ought to know. Well, seeing as this race is rather a peculiar one, and as any little mistake might turn out unpleasant—”

“What do you mean, sir?” interrupted Lord Bellefield, drawing himself up with a haughty gesture.

“Nothing, my lord, nothing,” replied Turnbull obsequiously, “only as our colt stands first favourite, and as we’ve made our calculations to win, I thought the Californian farthing would not be thrown away. According/y he brought up his mate, as he called him, which was the hidentical boy as first rode the colt, and he confessed that him and the boy that rode Tartuffe had met one day when they was out a exercising, and just for their own amusement they give ’em a three mile gallop. They run very near together, but Tartuffe beat our colt by above a length; that he’d seen the trial afterwards, and that he knowed from the difference in Tartuffe’s running, that he was not rode fair, or was overweighted, or something. Well, my lord, this information bothered me, and made me feel suspicious that some move had been tried on which we was not up to, and while I was scheming how to cipher it out, the same boy cum again, and told me that the lad that rode Tartuffe at the second trial was a keeping company along with his sister, and that he thought she might worm something out of him if she could be got to try. According/y I sent for the gal, and between bribing, coaxing, and frightening her, persuaded her to undertake the job. She had some trouble with the young feller, but she is a sharp clever gal, and she never left him till she dragged it out of him.”

“Drew what out of him?” interrupted Lord Bellefield, unable to restrain his impatience; “can’t you come to the point at once? you’ll distract me with your prosing.”

“Well, the long and short of it is, as I see your lordship’s getting in a hurry, (and, indeed, there ain’t no time to be lost,) the long and short of it is, that they’ve bin and turned the tables upon us: while we put 5 lbs. extra weight on our horse, they shoved 8 lbs. on theirs.”

“Then Tartuffe ran within a head of the colt, carrying 3 lbs. extra,” exclaimed Lord Bellefield, “and of course without that disadvantage would again have beaten him.”

“I think Oracle is a better horse now than he was at the time the trial cum off,” was the reply, “but the race ain’t the safe thing I thought it. It’s rather a ticklish chance to trust to, if your lordship’s got at all a heavy book upon the ewent.”

As he made this uncomfortable acknowledgment, the trainer leered inquiringly with his cunning little eyes at his employer.

Lord Bellefield did not immediately answer; but, leaning his elbow on the chimney-piece, remained buried in thought; his pale cheeks and the eager quivering of his under lip, which from time to time he unconsciously bit till the marks of his teeth remained in blood upon it, alone testifying the mental suffering he experienced. Ruin and disgrace were before him. Nor was this all. The Duc d'Austerlitz, a young foreigner who, bitten with Anglo-mania, had purchased a racing stud, and was the owner of Tartuffe, happened to be the individual before alluded to as Lord Bellefield's successful rival in the venial affections of the fascinating danseuse. He hated him, accordingly, with an intensity which would have secured him the approbation of the good-hater-loving Dr. Johnson. If anything, therefore, were wanting to render the intelligence he had just received doubly irritating to him, this fact supplied the deficiency. His lordship, however, possessed one element of greatness,—his spirit invariably rose with difficulties, and the greater the emergency the more cool and collected did he become. Having remained silent for some minutes, he observed, quietly, "I suppose, Turnbull, you, being a shrewd clever fellow in your way, scarcely came here merely to tell me this. You are perfectly aware that, relying upon your information and judgment, I have made a heavy book on this race, and can imagine that, however long my purse may be, I shall find it more agreeable to win than to lose. You have, therefore, I am sure, some expedient to propose. In fact, I read in your face that it is so."

The man smiled.

"Your lordship I always knew to have a sharp eye for a good horse, or a pretty gal," he said, "but you must be wide awake if you can read a man's thoughts in his face:—it ain't such an easy matter to say what is best to do; if your lordship's made rather too heavy a book on the race, I should recommend a little careful hedging to-morrow morning."

Lord Bellefield shook his head,—"Too late to make anything of it," he replied, "that is, of course, I might save myself from any very heavy loss, but I must have money—a—in fact, I stood so fair to win largely by this race, that hedging will be quite a dernier ressort. But you have some better scheme than that to propose."

"If your lordship is at a loss how to act it is not likely that any plan of mine will do the trick;" was the reply.

Whether or not Turnbull wished to provoke his employer, certain it is his speech produced that effect, for with an oath Lord Bellefield exclaimed:—

"What is it you are aiming at? if it be money you are standing out for, you have only to prevent Tartuffe from starting, and name your own price."

"Why you see it might be as well to let him start; men have been transported for interfering with a race 'orse to purvent his starting, but he need not win the Derby, for all that," was the enigmatical reply.

Lord Bellefield's lip curled with a sardonic smile; his knowledge of human nature had not then deceived him, Turnbull had some scheme in petto, and was only waiting to secure the best market for it.

"I suppose 1,000*l.* will satisfy you," he said; and as the trainer bowed his gratitude, continued, "You are certain your plan cannot fail? what is it you propose?"

"Why, you see, my lord, 'orses is like 'uman creatures in many respects," replied Turnbull, "there's some things as agrees with their stummicks, and some as disagrees with 'em; the things that agrees with the hanimals makes 'em run faster, the things that disagrees makes them run slower, or if you give 'em too strong they comes to a stand still all together. Now, if so be as Tartuffe was to have a taste of a certain drug as I knows on, that ain't very different from hopium, give to him afore he goes to sleep to-night, he'll come to the starting post all right, and run very respectable, but if he beats our 'orse I'll engage to eat him saddle and all. I can't speak fairer than that, I expect."

"And who have you fixed upon to execute this piece of delectable rascality?" inquired Lord Bellefield, unable to repress a sneer at the meanness of the villainy by which, however, he was only too glad to profit.

"It was not a very easy matter to pitch upon the right man," rejoined the trainer; "but luckily I happened to remember a party that seemed as if he'd been born a purpose for the job, and who has been so thoroughly cleaned out lately that he was not likely to be particular about trifles. I saw him before I left home, showed him which way his interest lay, put him up to my ideas on the subject, and I hope when I see your lordship to-morrow morning I shall have some good news to tell you."

"I'll be with you early, before people are about," returned Lord Bellefield; "it is important that I should know the result of this scheme as soon as possible; the greatest caution must be observed lest the matter should transpire, and if anything comes out you of course must take it upon yourself. The man should go abroad for a time. And now I must try and get a couple of hours' sleep, or my head will not be fit for to-morrow's work. I breakfast at Epsom with a set of men; but I'll be with you first. You've acted with your usual zeal and cleverness, Turnbull, and I'll take care that you shall have no reason to repent your honesty to your employer; only let us win to-morrow, and your fortune is made. Good night."

As he spoke he rang the bell, and with many servile acknowledgments of his master's promised liberality, the trainer departed.

While this interview was taking place, a far different scene had been enacting in the premises occupied by the racing stud of the Duc d'Austerlitz. As the clock over the stables chimed the hour after midnight, a light ladder was placed against the wall of one of the outer buildings, and a slightly-framed agile man ran up it, and drawing it cautiously after him, laid it in a place of security, where it would remain unnoticed till his return; he then crept with noiseless cat-like steps over roofs, and along parapets, finding among rain-gutters and coping-stones a dangerous and uncertain footing, until he reached a building, nearly in the centre of the yard; here he paused, and drawing from his pocket a short iron instrument, shaped like a chisel at one end, he cautiously chipped away the mortar round one of the tiles which protected an angle of the roof, and, by removing the tile, exposed the ends of a row of slating. Quietly raising one of the slates, he, by means of the instrument above alluded to, which is known to the initiated by the euphonious title of a "jemmy," snapped the nails which retained it in its place, and removed it. Having acted in a similar manner by two others, he produced a small cabinet-maker's saw, and cutting through the battens, opened a space sufficiently wide to admit the passage of a man's body. Replacing his tools, he crept through the aperture thus effected, and letting himself down by his hands into the loft beneath, dropped noiselessly on to some trusses of hay, placed there for future consumption. Part of his task was now accomplished, for he was in the loft over the horse-box in which Tartuffe was reposing his graceful limbs before the coming struggle; but the most difficult and hazardous portion of his enterprise remained yet to be accomplished. Crawling on his hands and knees, he reached one of the openings by which the hay was let down into the racks beneath, and cautiously peeping over, gazed into the interior of the stable itself, and noted the precautions taken to secure the safety of the race-horse, and the difficulties which lay before him. The box in which the animal was placed was secured by a strong padlock, the key of which rested at that moment under the pillow of Slagsby, the Duc d'Austerlitz's trainer, while in the next box, half-lying, half-sitting on a truss of straw, dozed "Yorkshire Joe," a broad-shouldered bow-legged lad some eighteen years of age, who had been a kind of equestrian valet to Tartuffe, during the whole "educational course" of that promising quadruped.

These particulars the intelligent eye of the tenant of the hayloft took in at a glance, while his quick wit decided as rapidly the exact degree in which they were calculated to tell for or against the object he sought to accomplish. The padlock was in his favour; for as he did not intend to enter the horse-box by the door, it would serve to keep Joe out without interfering with his design; but the presence of the stable-boy presented an insuperable obstacle to his further proceedings. This difficulty had, however, been foreseen and provided against. Stealing on tip-toe across the loft, he selected a long, stout straw, and thrusting it through the key-hole of the door by which the fodder was taken in, he suffered it to drop on the outside. Scarcely had he done so, when a low cough announced the presence of some confederate, and, satisfied that everything was in a right train, he noiselessly returned to his post of observation. In another moment his quick ear caught the sound of a modest tap at the stable-door. Honest Joe's senses not being equally on the alert, the knock had to be repeated more than once ere he became aware of it. As soon as he grew convinced that the sound was not the creation of his sleeping fancy, he rubbed his eyes, stretched himself, and drowsily inquired, "Who's there?"

"It is I,—Mary;—and I want particularly to speak to you," replied a woman's voice.

"Thy want must wait till morning, lass; for I'm not a-going to leave this place to-night for nothink, nor nobody; so gang thee whoam agin," was the uncourteous reply.

"No, but Joe, dear Joe, you must hear me to-night; it is something very important indeed. You must hear me," pleaded the temptress.

"I woan't, I tell thee; gang whoam!" returned Joe, gruffly.

"Well, if I'd thought you'd have been so unkind, I would not have stayed out of my warm bed, trapesing through Hepsom streets at this time o'night, which ain't fit for a respectable young woman to be out in, and coming all this way to put you up to something as may lose you your place, and worse, if you ain't told of it. I didn't expect sich unkindness—and from you, too; that I didn't;" and here a sound akin to a sob, apparently indicating that the speaker was weeping, found its way to Joe's ears, and going thence straight to his honest unsuspecting heart, overcame his prudence and conquered his resolution. Rising from his seat, he approached the door and listened: the sobs still continued.

"Mary, lass, what ails thee?" he said, "I didn't mean to anger thee, wench! but thee knoas I dare na leave t' horse; besoids t' stable-door be locked, and maister's got t' key."

"And can't you come to the window in the further stable, where we've talked many a time before?" suggested the syren. "It's something about the horse I want to tell you, a dodge they're going to try, to prevent his winning to-morrow. You don't think I'd have come out at this time o'night for nothing, do you, stupey?" This intelligence chased away Joe's last lingering scruple, and muttering,—

"About t' horse!—why did na thee say so afore?" he lit a hand-lantern at the lamp which hung from the ceiling, and, assuring himself by a glance that his charge was in safety, quitted the stable by a side-door.

In the meantime, the occupant of the loft had not been idle. As soon as Joe became engrossed by the foregoing conversation, the sound of a fine saw at work might have been perceived by a more delicate organization than that of the sturdy groom; and at the moment in which he left the stable, two of the bars of the rack were silently removed, and through the opening thus effected, a man cautiously lowered himself, and, resting his feet for an instant on the manger, dropped lightly into the box occupied by Tartuffe. This feat was accomplished so quietly, that the horse which happened not to be lying down, but was standing, trying, through its muzzle, to nibble the straw of its bed, was scarcely startled, merely raising its head, and staring at its unexpected visitant. This individual now produced from his mysterious pocket a handful of oats, and holding them out, allowed Tartuffe to smell and nibble at them; while the animal was thus engaged, he removed the muzzle, worn for the purpose of preventing it from eating its litter, or otherwise gaining access to any food of which the trainer might disapprove. His next proceeding was to draw out that ingenious instrument of torture yecept a twitch, which, for the benefit of those of our lady readers who do not happen to be gifted with "a stable mind," or to have encouraged sporting tendencies, we may describe as a short, thick stick, or handle, about two feet long, terminated by a loop of stout whipcord, or leather, into which the upper-lip, or, occasionally, the ear of the horse is inserted; then, by twisting the stick, the loop can be tightened so as to produce any amount of agony the inflicter may desire: the philosophy of the matter being, that the animal, finding his struggles exactly double his pain, soon has sense enough to choose the lesser of two evils, and therefore stands still while nasty things are being forced down his throat, and other liberties taken with him, which, but for the application of the twitch, he would actively resent. In the present instance, while the unfortunate Tartuffe was still chewing the oats by which his confidence had been betrayed, the twitch was fixed on his nose, tightened, and the nauseating ball which was to impair his strength and fleetness, and secure the victory to the Dodona Colt, and fortune to Lord Bellefield, was already in his mouth, ere he was aware that any incivility was intended him. To give a horse a ball, however, it is not only necessary to put it into its mouth, but to thrust it back as far as, if possible, the entrance of the gullet, and this operation, even when performed in the most skilful manner, is by no means easy to the operator, or agreeable to the patient. In this last particular, the victimized Tartuffe appeared to be entirely of our opinion; the blood of his noble ancestors stirred within him, and, tossing up his head indignantly, he became practically aware of the full virtues of the twitch; the pain, however, only served to increase his rage, and he attempted to rear; but his struggles were vain; his tormentor still clung to him, the ball was thrust further back in the mouth, and in another moment the desired object would have been attained, when suddenly the loop of the twitch, unable to bear the strain upon it, snapped. The first use the race-horse made of his freedom was to shake his head violently, and at the same time opening his mouth, the stupefying ball dropped from it.

We must now return to our friend, Yorkshire Joe, who, suspecting no evil, was engaged in interesting colloquy with the perfidious Mary; this seductive young lady having contrived, with a degree of ingenuity worthy a better cause, to prolong the interview by the following expedients. First, she assailed her admirer with coquettish reproaches for his unkindness and want of gallantry in refusing to speak to her; then she entered into a long account of how, and when, and where she had discovered the pretended design against Tartuffe, which she affirmed was to be put into execution two hours from that time.

"Eh! What! tie my hands behoid me, shove a gag into my mouth, and then and there lame t'horse afore my very eyes—dost thee say, lass? I'd only like to see the man, or men cither, that could do it!" exclaimed Joe, doubling his fist indignantly; "and thee heard this in the tap-room of the Checquers, dost thee say?—What was that noise?"

"Nothing. I dropped one of my pattens, that was all," returned the girl, stooping, as if to pick it up, though she was not sorry for an excuse to hide her agitation, for her quick ear had detected the sound of a horse's hoofs trampling on straw, and she knew that her accomplice was at work. "Why, you are quite startlish to-night, Joe!" she resumed, looking up at him, with a forced smile; "did you think it was a ghost?—but its no wonder you're nervous; its hard lines for you, poor fellow, sitting up at nights like this!"

"There it is agen!" interrupted Joe; "by—it's in t'horse's box," he continued, listening attentively. "Them—thieves can't be come a'ready, sure!" And heedless of Mary's assurances that it was nothing,—and her entreaties to remain only one moment longer,—the groom, now thoroughly excited, leaped down from the window, and rushed back into the stable.

With the speed of thought, the girl sprang to the door, at which she had previously tapped, and, stooping her head to the key-hole, listened eagerly. The first thing that met her ear was a volley of abuse from Joe, accompanied by heavy blows struck against wood or iron; then a noise, as of a door being burst open; next, broken curses, dull muffled strokes, ejaculations of rage or pain, the sound of trampling feet, a crushing heavy fall, and then total silence!

What had happened? She placed her eye to the key-hole, but could see nothing. She listened,—but the throbbing of her own heart was the only thing she could hear: for the first time, the fearful idea occurred to her, that by her treacherous dealing she might have occasioned her lover's death; and, regardless of consequences, she was about to start up and summon assistance, when a man's hand was laid on her shoulder, and a gruff voice exclaimed:—

"So this is the way my grooms are tampered with!—I was sure I heard talking going on;—hold up your head, you jade, and let us see what you're like; nay, it's no use to struggle,—I've got you fast enough, and see who it is I will."

So saying, Mr. Slangsby the trainer drew the girl towards him, and forcibly raising her head, threw the light of a bull's-eye lantern full on her features. "Ha! little Mary Williams," he continued, "and what brings you here, at this time of night, you artful hussey?"

"Oh! Mr. Slangsby, pray open the door, sir; I—I'm afraid they've been and murdered poor Joe," was the reply, and overcome by fear and remorse, the girl burst into tears—real ones, this time.

"They, and who are they, pray? There's some rascality going on here, I expect; it's lucky I got up."

As he spok, Slangsby drew a key from his pocket, opened the door, and still retaining his grasp on the girl's wrist, entered. The first object which met their sight was Joe, by no means murdered, although he bore evidences of a severe struggle, in a black eye and bleeding knuckles.

"Thorse is all right, meister, but I wor only jest in time though!" was his opening speech.

"In time for what?" inquired Slangsby, eagerly.

"In time to stop yon villian from pizonin the blessed hanimal," returned Joe, pointing to something which at first sight appeared to be a large bundle, but which proved on examination to be a human being most ingeniously tied hand and foot with haybands.

"Who the deuce are you, fellow?" asked the trainer, addressing the individual thus uncomfortably situated.

"It ain't o' no use talking to he, for a can't answer with a wisp o' straw stuffed atween his jaws," observed Joe sententiously.

"Take it out, then, and untie his legs so that he can stand up and answer my questions."

"Better shut the dour fust then, meister, for lie's a proper slippery customer, I can tell you," returned the groom; "he promised to gag me and tie my hands behind me, I do hear said, but he's found two can play at that trick,—get up ye warmint," he continued, applying a by no means gentle kick to the ribs of his prostrate captive,—“and show your ugly mug.”

The person thus uncomplimentarily apostrophized rose slowly, and stood sullenly awaiting the trainer's scrutiny. The latter holding the lantern, so that its light fell upon the stranger's features, recognised him immediately.

"Mr. Beverley," he said, in a tone more of contemptuous pity than of anger, "is it you, sir? I knew times had been getting very bad with you, but I did not think you had come to this."

The man's lip quivered—the reproach touched him more than the most virulent abuse could have done. His had been we fear no very unusual fate, at all events he had only fallen one step lower than many who have followed the same career as he had done:—well-born, rich, and with above average abilities, a taste for gambling and low company had caused him to sink lower and lower in the scale of society, till the depth of misery and degradation to which he had been reduced, and the extent of the bribe offered by Turnbull, had overcome his last feeling of honour or honesty, and he had consented to become the agent of another's villainy. Slangsby eyed him sternly for a moment, and then said,—

"You know what you have laid yourself open to, I suppose?" The other nodded in sign of assent.

"I don't wish to be hard upon you, sir," the trainer continued, "so if you will speak out, and tell me all, we may perhaps come to some better understanding:—what say you?"

The other reflected a moment, and then replied in a low voice, "I will do as you wish, but not here."

"Joe, you have distinguished yourself," observed his master, putting his hand into his pocket, "here is a ten-pound note for you. Do not mention this night's work to anybody, and I will take care your wages are raised. Now, sir," he continued to Joe's late adversary, "I am ready to talk to you—by the way, about the girl; she was your accomplice, of course?"

The stranger nodded.

"Your swcetheart has deceived you, Joe," added Slangsby; "give her a good lecturing, and then lock her up for the night in the saddle room; she must not be at liberty till the race is over, upon any account."

Honest Joe scratched his head in deep perplexity—then a light dawned upon him, and he saw how Mary had beguiled him. Seizing her roughly by the wrist, he dragged her off, exclaiming "Come along, thee cheating jade, couldst thee foind nothing better to do than to go and deceive a poor lad that loved thee, and try to get him into trouble? If thee was but a man, I'd wollup thee till thou couldst not stand, and as it be, a little starving will do thee good, so cum along."

At the same moment, Slangsby and his companion quitted the stable, and adjourning to the trainer's private apartments, held there a long and solemn conference; the result may be gathered from the following speeches—

"And you feel sure Lord Bellefield is aware of the whole thing?" questioned Slangsby.

"I've not a doubt of it," was the reply. "Turnbull was too ready with the blunt to be acting on his own account, he has not got the money to do it. I am to have 200*l.* clear for this job, and my expenses paid to any part of the continent I may select."

"And we may trust you?"

"Why, of course you may, man; by doing as you propose I escape transportation, receive 200*l.* to start afresh with, and get sent over to Paris out of harm's way free of expense."

"And your conscience?" inquired Slangsby, with a sarcastic smile.

"Curse conscinccr," was the angry reply; "I began life with as much honourable feeling as any man, but the villainy of the world has crushed it out of me. Life is a struggle, and each one must take care of himself; while I had money I spent it liberally, and met my engagements honestly. Now I have none, I get it as I can:—I undertook to drug your horse, because I was deeply in debt, all but starving, and Bellefield's bribe offered me a chance. I failed through an accident, and fell into your power; your proposal regains me the position, and I embrace it now as I did before. True, I deceive him: fancying your horse is poisoned he will double his bets, which are very heavy already, and be ruined, as better men have been before him, but this only serves him right for his rascality, and — puts 200*l.* into my pocket. I have to thank you for your civility, Mr. Slangsby, and to wish you good morning." He turned to go, then, pausing, said,

"You have used me well in this affair, and to show you I am not all bad, I will give you a hint. Do not rely too much on the result of that trial; Bellefield's colt was only recovering from the strangles then, and has since improved in speed and bottom, still Tartuffe can beat him if he is made the most of; everything therefore depends upon your jockey; if he is careless, or over-confident, Oracle may have it yet—verbum sat—so saying, he placed his hat on one side of his head, coolly ran his fingers through his hair, and departed.

CHAPTER LXI.

DESCRIBES THAT INDESCRIBABLE SCENE, "THE DERBY DAY."

"FAIR laughed the morn, and soft the zephyr played," as Lord Bellefield, having held an interview with his trainer, which had served in great measure to set his mind at ease, cantered back to the inn at Epsom, shaved the small portion of his chin which he saw fit to denude of hair, made an elaborate toilet in the best style of sporting dandyism, and then lounged down to breakfast, of which meal he had invited some dozen of his intimates to partake. Amongst the last comers was a tall, dark-whiskered man, who might be two or three years Lord Bellefield's senior. Pointing to a seat on his right hand, his entertainer began,—

"Well, Philips, how is it with you this morning? You've been wandering about as usual, picking up the latest news, I suppose? what say the prophets?"

"There is nothing original hazarded, my lord," was the reply; "Oracle is as much in favour as ever; Phosphorus is looking up slightly, and the Tartuffe party are backing their horse to a high figure; they seem to be in earnest, and mean to win if they can."

"Aye, if they can," returned Lord Bellefield, smiling ironically; "I confess, for my own part, I do not see that animal's good points."

"He has wonderful power in the loins, and his deep girth gives plenty of room for the lungs to play; no fear of 'bellows to mend' in that quarter," was the reply.

"Very excellent points in a hunter or steeplechase horse, but misplaced in a racer, and by no means calculated to make up for a want of fleetness. Tartuffe, in my opinion, has not the true race-horse stride, as Austerlitz will find to his cost, if he really is laying money on him."

"He may not cover so much ground in his stride as Oracle, but he is unusually quick in his gallop, and takes two strokes while another horse is taking one. Still black and yellow (Lord's Bellefield's colours) will give him the go-by, and that is all we have to look to," was the reply.

In converse such as this, diversified by the interchange of bets of more or less magnitude, the breakfast (if a meal consisting of every delicacy that could please the palate, or pamper the appetite, including meats, fish, &c. &c. can be legitimately so called,) passed off. When liqueurs had been handed round, Lord Bellefield's drag was announced, and the company dispersed, first to admire and criticise the turn-out, and then to dispose of themselves on and about it. The equipage was in perfect taste, and although not so showy as many others on which less care had been bestowed, or money expended, yet the drag, with its panels of the darkest possible cinnamon brown, picked out with a lighter shade of the same colour; the four blood bays, faultless in symmetry; the two outriders on horses so exactly matching those in harness, that any one unaccustomed to such matters might have been puzzled to conjecture how the grooms could distinguish one from another; the harness perfectly free from ornament of any kind, save black and yellow rosettes in the horses' heads; the two grooms in dark well-fitting pepper-and-salt liveries, and irreproachable top-boots and leathers; the coronet on the doors, the cockades in the hats; every trifle down to the gold-mounted whip-handle, excellent of its kind, and in harmonious keeping with the whole; presented to the eye of a connoisseur a tout ensemble calculated to excite his highest admiration.

Seating himself firmly on his box, and, controlling his fiery horses with an easy confidence which proved him a skilful whip, Lord Bellefield drove to the Downs, apparently impassable obstacles seeming to melt before him, as if by magic, (one of the surest tests of a good coachman,) and arrived on the course exactly at the "correct" moment. As he drew up to take his place by the ropes, a showy britska, drawn by four splendid greys, the postillions' bright green jackets and velvet caps blazing with gold, dashed in before him. The carriage contained two persons,—a singularly handsome young man, with a foreign cast of features, and a girl, with black, flashing eyes, and a brilliant complexion, dressed not only in, but beyond the height of the fashion. These were the Duc d'Austerlitz and Mademoiselle Angélique, the fascinating dansseuse.

As Lord Bellefield, with curling lip, passed them to take up his station further on, the Frenchman, catching his eye, nodded carelessly, and turning to his companion, said a few words in a low tone, and they both laughed. Had Lord Bellefield been living at a period when the state of society allowed the hand to act out the feelings of the heart, he would at that moment have sprung upon the Duc d'Austerlitz, and seizing him by the throat, have held on remorselessly till life became extinct. As it was, he merely returned the nod by a bow, smiled and kissed the tips of his gloves to Angélique, and drove on; so that, after all, civilization has its advantages.

Having chosen his station, the bays were unharnessed, and led away, and a mounted groom approached, leading his master's hack.

"I am going down to the ring, and then to the Warren, to see them saddle," began Lord Bellefield; "so I must leave you to take care of yourselves; but any one disposed for luncheon will find something to that effect going on here after the race. If I am not back, Robson will take good care of you;" so saying, he gave an order to one of the servants, who remained with the drag, then, mounting his horse, cantered away.

"He carries it off boldly enough, but they say if he loses the race he is a ruined man," observed one of the friends he had left behind him.

"Oh, Lord Ashford will clear him," remarked another; "his grandfather was one of the leading counsel of the day, and the old boy feathered his nest well before he gave up his wig and gown. He was one of the old school of lawyers, and worked in the days when a barrister's professional income was a great fact, whereas now it is a great fiction."

"Come, Briefless, no grumbling; back Oracle for a cool 500*l.*, and then you may cut chambers till the season's over. But you are wrong about Bellefield. Lord Ashford has paid his debts three times, and has taken an oath on the family Bible never to do so again; but I don't believe Bellefield's anything like hard-up. You know he won 30,000*l.* of poor Mellerton before he blew his brains out. Here's Philips can tell us all about it; eh, what do you say, man?"

"Nothing," was the cautious reply; "and I would not recommend you to let Bellefield find out exactly all you've been mentioning, my dear Chatterby, I've known him shoot a man for less;"—and so saying, Mr. Philips joined in the laugh he had raised against the voluble Chatterby, and then swinging himself down from the box, left them in order to take his place in the betting ring.

We must now change the "venue" to the Warren, a small but picturesque spot of ground, encircled by a wall, within which enclosure the horses for the Derby and Oaks are saddled and mounted. Here jockies and gentlemen, lords, blacklegs, trainers, and pick-pockets, mix and jostle with one another indiscriminately. Assuredly, Epsom, on the Derby day, in exclusive aristocratic England, is the only true Utopia, wherein those chimeras of French folly, Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality, exist and prosper. Let the reader imagine from twenty to five-and-twenty blood-horses, each led by its attendant groom, and followed by an anxious trainer, while the jockey who is to ride it, and on whose skill and courage thousands are depending, carefully inspects the buckling of girths, regulates the length of stirrup-leathers, and as far as human foresight will permit, provides against any accident which may embarrass him in the coming struggle. Then the horse-clothing is removed, and the shining coat and carefully platted mane of the race-horse are revealed to the eyes of the admiring spectators; an attendant satellite at the same moment assists the jockey to divest himself of his great-coat, and he emerges from his chrysalis state in all the butterfly splendour of racing dandyism. Then the trainer, or the satellite before alluded to, "gives him a leg up," and with this slight assistance he vaults lightly into the saddle, and becomes as it were incorporate with the animal he bestrides. Quietly gathering up the reins, he presses his cap firmly on his head, slants the point of his whip towards the right flank, exchanges a few last words with the trainer, and then walks his horse up and down till his competitors are all equally prepared. On this occasion the cynosure of every eye was the first favourite, "Oracle," and when his clothing was removed, and one of the cleverest jockies of the day seated gracefully on his back, he certainly did look, to quote the enthusiastic language of his trainer, "a reg'lar pictur," the perfection of a race-horse. Turnbull's last words to the jockey were,—

"Save him as much as you safely can till the distance, and if the pace has been anything like reasonable, it will be your own fault if the race is not your own."

A slight contraction of the eyelid proved that the advice was understood and appreciated, and man and horse passed on.

"How is it Tartuffe does not show?" inquired Lord Bellefield of Turnbull in a whisper; "the dose can't have been given too strong, eh?"

"No fear of that, my Lord," was the reply; "but they've probably discovered ere this, that there is a screw loose somewhere, and they will keep him out of sight as long as they can, lest other people should become as wise as they are themselves."

As he spoke, the object of his remarks appeared; his rider was already mounted, and the horse-clothing removed.—Tartuffe was a complete contrast to his rival in appearance. The Dodona Colt was a bright bay with black mane, tail, and legs; his head was small, almost to a fault, and shaped like that of a deer, his neck longer and more arched than is usually the case in thoroughbred horses; while his graceful slender limbs seemed to embody the very ideal of swiftness.—Tartuffe was altogether a smaller and more compact animal, his colour a rich, dark chestnut, his head larger in proportion, and so placed on as to give him the appearance of being slightly ewe-necked, his forelegs were shorter, and the arm more muscular than those of his graceful rival; but the sloping shoulder, the depth of the girth, the breadth and unusual muscular development of the loins and haunches, together with a quick, springy step, and a general compactness of form, afforded to the practised eye evidence of his possessing very uncommon powers both of speed and endurance.

"He looks fresh and lively enough," remarked Lord Bellefield, after observing the horse narrowly. "What do you think about it?"

"It's all right, my lord," was Turnbull's confident answer, "things speaks for themselves, the 'orsc ain't allowed to show till the last minute, and then he comes out with his jockey ready mounted. Now the logic of that dodge lies in a nutshell: finding the banimal sleepy and out of sorts, they keeps him snug till the last minute, and then shows him with the jockey on him, when a touch with the spur, and a pull or two at his mouth with a sharp bit, makes him look alive again." Approaching his lips almost to his employer's ear, he continued, "Do you see that patch of black grease on his nose? that's where the twitch has cut him. Beverley was obliged to twitch him to give him the ball,—so, now, your lordship may bet away without any fear of Tartuffe," and, exchanging a significant glance, this well-matched pair parted.

"Ah! Bellefield, mon cher! how lovely your colt looks this morning—I suppose he is to win; for myself I am preparing to be martyred with a resignation the most touching," and as he spoke Armand Duc d'Austerlitz stroked his silky moustaches, and admired his glossy boot, with an air of the most innocently graceful self-satisfaction possible.

"You don't really believe that which you say, Monsieur le Duc," replied Lord Bellefield, "I never saw a horse in better racing condition than Tartuffe."

"Ah! c'est un bon petit cheval, and I have betted, ah!—bah!—I cannot tell you what sums of money upon him, more than half my estates in Languedoc: positively I shall have to go through what you call the Bench of your Queen, if I lose."

"In that case it is useless for me to inquire whether you are disposed to back Tartuffe against my bay colt," insinuated Lord Bellefield.

"No, not if you have a fancy that way, mon cher ami," replied Armand, smiling to show his white teeth, "what shall we say?—an even bet of 3,000*l.* shall it be, or 5,000*l.*?"

"Five is the more comfortable sum of the two," returned Lord Bellefield, quickly. "I always like to bet fives or tens; it simplifies one's book amazingly, and I never had a taste for intricate arithmetic."

"Comme il vous plaira,—say ten, if you like it better." And as he spoke, Armand drew out a miniature betting-book, and a gold pencil-case, blazing with jewels. Lord Bellefield paused for a moment;—certain as he believed himself to be of the race, it was a great temptation. But, on the other hand, if he appeared too eager, might not suspicion attach to him in the event of any clue being gained to the poisoning affair? This idea was so alarming to him, that prudence overcame avarice.

"I have, unfortunately, no estates in Languedoc," he said, laughingly; "and thousands are not so entirely a matter of indifference to me as to your Grace; so we will book the bet at five."

The wager was accordingly so entered; and with friendly smiles and courteous words upon their lips, these two men parted, one hating the successful rival, the other despising the detected swindler! Alas! for the shams and deceptions of society! pasteboard and tinsel are more real than its hollow-hearted seemings.

"Now you see your game," were Slingsby's last words to the jockey who was to ride Tartuffe. "Make running early in the race, so as to render the pace as severe as possible throughout, your horse will live to the end, and their's won't; but if he is not well blown before he gets to the distance, it will be a very close thing, and the length of his stride may beat you."

"I'm awake," was the concise reply; but Slingsby felt quite satisfied therewith.

Racing may be very cruel, and it may lead to gambling, and various other immoralities major and minor; and, being thus proved contrary to the precepts of Christianity, good people may be quite right in using their best efforts to discourage it. Nevertheless, it is a manly and exciting sport; and although the evils to which we have alluded may (and, we fear, do) attend it, we cannot see that the amusement in itself necessitates them; on the contrary, we conceive that they are added to it by the proneness to evil inherent in human nature, rather than as the natural consequence of the sport itself. However this may be, a finer sight than the start for the Derby we cannot easily imagine. Let the reader picture to himself some twenty three-year-old colts, their proud, expanded nostrils snuffing the wind, and their glossy coats glistening in the sunshine, ridden by the crack jockeys of England, and, therefore, of the world, drawn up in a line, preparatory to starting;—let him reflect, in order fully to realize the earnest nature of the scene, that on the fact of which may prove the better horse, depend many thousands,—perhaps, in the aggregate, more than a million of pounds sterling;—that the ruin of hundreds may be involved in the event of the race; that on the chances of that whirlwind course have been expended the anxious thought, the careful calculation of days, and weeks, and months; that the weighing and reducing these calculations to a theoretic system, by which some certainty may be attained, is the business of many men's lives,—and he will then have some faint idea of the deep, the overpowering interest that is excited by witnessing the start for the Derby.

On the occasion which we are describing two false starts occurred. Twice, as the word "Go!" was pronounced by the stentorian lungs of the starter, did one queer-tempered animal choose pertinaciously to turn its tail where its head should have been; and twice did the same "voice of power" vociferate the command, "Come back!" and deep, if not loud, were the anathemas breathed by those jockeys who, having manœvered themselves into a good position, had contrived to "get away" well. However, "'tis an ill wind which blows good to nobody;" and these delays, annoying as they were to most of the parties concerned, were as much in favour of Oracle, as they were prejudicial to the interests of those who had backed "Tartuffe."

Oracle, amongst other gifts of fortune, chanced to be blessed with a most amiable and placid temper, while Tartuffe, not possessing so philosophical a turn of mind, was apt to get excited in a crowd, and the first false start completely unsettling him, he availed himself of the second to bolt half-way to Tattenhan's corner before his rider could pull him in; and even when that was accomplished he showed a decided preference for using his hind-legs only in progression, on his return to the starting-post, by his riotous and unmanageable conduct taking a great deal more out of himself than was by any means prudent.

Once more, however, they are all in their places,—the word is again given, and they are off,—Tartuffe springing away with a bound like that of a lion, and half dislocating his rider's arms by a furious effort to "get his head." As it so happened, that there were two or three other "queer" tempered horses, who required careful handling, beside that of the Duc d'Austerlitz, the pace at first was by no means so "good" as Slangsby had wished it to be; nor could the jockey, riding Tartuffe, venture to improve it, for two reasons: in the first place, his horse was so excited that it required all his skill to prevent his running away with him; in the second, his former attempt to bolt had sufficed to puff him, and he required "saving," to enable him to regain wind. In the meantime Oracle was going sweetly and easily, keeping up with his horses in what appeared scarcely beyond a canter. When past the "Corner," however, Tartuffe had decidedly improved, and his rider, remembering his instructions, began to make play. As the pace increased, the "first flight" became considerably more select, the "tender-hearted" ones gradually dropping in the rear.

Up to this point Phosphorus had been leading, followed by Advance, Whisker, The Lynx, Gossip, and Challenger; but down the next slope Tartuffe came up, passed the other horses, and after running neck to neck with Phosphorus for about a quarter of a mile, took the lead, and kept it by about half a length, Oracle lying well up on the near side. This order they preserved till near the distance, when Lynx and Challenger put on the steam to dispute the leadership with Tartuffe, who appeared by no means disposed to relinquish the post of honour, and the pace grew decidedly severe,—in spite of which, Oracle continued insensibly to creep up to the others.

At the distance Lynx found it "no go," and fell back beaten; Gossip taking his place, closely waited on by Phosphorus and Oracle; a few strides more, in which Oracle improved his position, and then the final struggle begins, whips and spurs go to work in earnest—the pace is actually terrific—Gossip shuts up, Phosphorus retires from business, Oracle and Tartuffe run neck and neck, dust flies, handkerchiefs wave, the spectators shout, when, just at the critical moment, the Frenchman's horse shoots forward, as if propelled by some invisible power, the favourite is beaten by rather more than a head, and Tartuffe is winner of the Derby.

SMEDLEY ON MORAL EVIDENCE.¹

It is the law of our probationary condition, that every state and pursuit of life has its trials and dangers. The prosecution of knowledge, of all conceivable objects, might seem at first sight an exception to this rule. Its calmness, its single devotion to truth, its unworldliness, its elevation, might appear to exempt it from all terrestrial and sordid influences. The very life of the man of science might seem a perpetual ascent

"Above the smoke and stir of this dim spot Which men call earth;"

(1) "A Treatise on Moral Evidence: illustrated by numerous Examples both of general Principles and of specific Actions." By Edward Arthur Smedley, M.A. late Chaplain of Trinity College. Cambridge: Deighton. London: Bell. 1850.

and a proportionate ascent from its contaminations and pollutions. But it is not so. The pursuit of science is purifying and ennobling: but it is the intellect that it purifies and ennobles, not the heart. Knowledge has its moral dangers as well as ignorance; and the desire of knowledge was indeed that very temptation which overthrew innocence, and tainted the moral constitution of human nature. While, therefore, the cultivation of abstract science is every way worthy of man, whose powers were formed to evolve it, and whose mind to enjoy it; while its elevating power is unquestionable, and its dignity recognised by all acquainted with the very idea, still it is not a region impervious to temptations, as indeed no province of human activity or indolence can be. It may have fewer than other walks of life; but it has peculiar dangers of its own, from which other positions are free.

The fatal error of walking by sight rather than by faith is common to all stations and pursuits. It is not only a result of human corruption, but the natural consequence of the proximity of material objects, and the invisibility and absence of such as are purely spiritual. From him who lies on the ground, a mole-hill will shut out a mountain; but this error takes a more subtle form with the mere mathematician and man of demonstration. He does not walk by sight, it is true; even sight is not warrant enough for him; he lives in demonstration. Mathematical truth is pure, incontrovertible truth; in this, and by this, he lives; but, while he imagines he is the faithful and favoured lover of truth, entire in his attachment, and sure of success in his suit, he is in danger of a grievous self-deception; because mathematical facts are attained by a peculiar process, he too often rashly concludes that to all facts must be the same process of substantiation applied. All propositions incapable of this kind of proof, he holds incapable of any proof whatever; and as the truth of the Christian religion cannot be thus evinced, he holds it at least unproved, and, according to his temperament, is more or less sceptical.

This fatal result is not the fault of science, but of the individual who narrows his mind to a single view, which, shutting out those which are more just and liberal, leads him to ignore or disbelieve their very existence. Mathematical demonstration, to a rightly thinking mind, indicates the being and the soundness of moral. Many abstruse mathematical propositions have first taken the shape of moral evidence. There was good reason to believe that the squares of the sides of a right-angled triangle equalled those of the hypotenuse, before that truth was demonstrated mathematically. The mathematician is led by a kind of moral evidence, to some truth which he assumes; and then, by analysis, he works back from his assumption to some axiom or proved truth, from which he synthetically proves his discovery. If, then, even the mathematician, on his own principles, must sometimes admit the law of moral evidence, how should we despise it in other matters? Indeed, this law is much more influential than we are inclined to suppose. The attraction of the earth is not proved by mathematical demonstration. True it is that we ascertain mathematically the consistency of observable phenomena with that hypothesis; and this is considered demonstrative, and is so. But the proof is wholly different from that whereby we discover the properties of geometrical figures, or deduce analytical conclusions. It is a purely moral proof. It amounts to this:—the hypothesis solves all phenomena; no other hypothesis has been advanced which could do so; it therefore is entitled to our universal acceptance. Mathematical truth, also, if rightly regarded, ought to lead to a prepossession towards moral truth, or that kind of truth which is valuable in practice, though not mathematically true. It is mathematically untrue that a finite arc is equal to its chord; but mathematical considerations show that the same proposition is practically true in innumerable cases, as the engineer daily experiences. It is mathematically untrue that solar rays are parallel: but the proposition is practically true, as every optician is aware. Yet the habit of contemplating demonstrations strictly mathematical tempts the mind to disregard these legitimate results of its speculations, and to be dissatisfied with an evidence which differs rather in kind than in cogency.

Bishop Butler is the great philosopher of moral evidence. His masterly work performs much more than it undertakes. It proves "the analogy of religion to the constitution and course of nature;" and the inference that both have the same Author is made more than obvious by his reasoning; but, in the process, he has exhibited the character and laws of that moral evidence on which religion is believed, and which is of such constant use in the conduct of life, both with regard to temporal and eternal things. Mr. Smedley is an ardent admirer, and no unworthy disciple, of that incomparable writer. The arguments employed by Butler to prove religion by analogy Mr. Smedley employs to prove it directly, and by moral cogency.

It has always appeared to us that the terms "moral evidence," "moral truth," are somewhat misapplied. They are popularly used of arguments and positions which have no manner of connexion with ethics. We therefore subscribe to Mr. Smedley's distinction between intellectual and moral truth:—

"While the evidence of intellectual truth shows that things have been, are, or will be, the evidence of moral truth shows that they have been, are, will be, ought to be. Thus, not only are we convinced that Queen Victoria is the sovereign of England; that Napoleon Buonaparte died at St. Helena; that a vine, if it produces fruit next autumn, will bear grapes and not apples; but also, that, if a man's life is in danger, he ought to adopt means of preservation."

We regret that Mr. Smedley has not adhered rigidly to this sound and useful distinction, but has occasionally employed the term "moral evidence" for what is popularly so called, instead of his more accurate expression, "intellectual." But, in mentioning this, we believe we are noticing the only blemish in his work, which is indeed a most admirable and clear investigation of the nature both of moral and intellectual evidence, and of the sure connection by which they lead up to the proof of Christianity.

Mr. Smedley briefly, but clearly, shows the moral evidence for man's responsibility and a future judgment. In this process he concisely, but convincingly, demolishes the fallacy of Paley, that man has no inherent moral sense, and that there is no natural intimation of a Divine law; a theory which vitiates the whole substance of the thoughtful and interesting "Moral Philosophy," and occasionally leads its author into conclusions on morals which charity must hope he never adopted in practice. His "expediency" theory is well treated by Mr. Smedley.

The line taken by Mr. Smedley, after definitions and illustrations of moral evidence, is the application of the evidence to religion. The difficulties of the inquirer are met by moral evidence: natural religion is first proved; and, through the doctrine of a future judgment, way is made for the acceptance of Christianity. This being now admitted, the responsibility of the inquirer is then pursued at some length, and objections to this part of the evidence met. His principle is next examined, which is obedience to God. Hence the duty of man towards God, his neighbour, and himself, is insisted on. Good and evil are estimated in reference to the Divine will. The duty of regulating the instinctive moving principles, and keeping them in subordination, is then discussed. Revelation and Nature are then compared, as evidencing and explaining each other; and the work terminates with reflections on the natural sinfulness of man—his condition since the fall—Christ's mediation—the Holy Spirit—trust in God—and the future judgment.

The work is, among its other recommendations, well suited to present times, when, in the heat and distraction of party argument, men are losing sight of the essentials of practical truth, and the principles of Christian charity. Though argumentative, it is not polemical. Its spirit is calm and philosophical; and its aims are directed at objects manifestly of great and enduring importance. It is therefore a book at all times worthy of study, but never more so than at a period when the mind is excited by temporary causes, and requires to be called back to everlasting truths and quiet contemplations. The sceptic may read it for his direction, the Christian for his confirmation, and both for interest and gratification. Mr. Smedley appears in it as a good disciple and preceptor in the highest and manliest school of Christian, moral, and intellectual philosophy; and we wish him every success of every kind in his valuable and useful labours.

Indolence is a delightful but distressing state; we must be doing something to be happy. Action is no less necessary than thought to the instinctive tendencies of the human frame.—Hazlitt.

REPLY TO HOOD'S "RETROSPECTIVE REVIEW."

BY THETA.

THE lives of some young merry boys
 May be a round of tearless joys,
 Less ceasing than their top ;
 But mine was one ungrateful storm—
 I was head-boy of Sorrow's form,
 And there, alas, I stop!

The hearth bestow'd our only cricket,
 The eaves our bats ; we had no wicket,
 No matches e'er came off.
 Some might have hoops and balls enoo'—
 The only hoop I ever knew,
 Turned into hooping-cough!

I had no friends to bear me up,
 Except the lusty "rodding-rope,"
 And then my back was bare—
 'Twas very well to share the cake,
 And thus a candid friend to make—
 I had no cake to share!

Perhaps when I first beheld "Amo,"
 Deep in my heart it seem'd to go,
 And all my frame seem'd loving ;
 But soon my love so weaken'd grew,
 'Twas all the jilted verb could do
 To keep my love from roving!

The swinging cane e'er bore the scents
 Of "Hinds" or else "Kane's Elements,"
 The birch grew gaunt and yellow ;
 A willow-stick, a weeping one,
 Had spread its sobbing influence on
 The fate of every fellow!

And then to hear the old school-bell
 "Ring in," 'twas surely pleasure's knell,
 A stop to all our joy.
 Are these the sports, then, of your schooler,
 To quake beneath the cruel ruler,
 That rules each little boy?

The only pleasant time I knew
 Was that which in the garden grew
 'Neath the large apple-tree.
 'Mid hopes and plans just then we live,
 Our moods are but indicative
 Of what we soon shall be!

And though the lives of some young boys
 May be a round of tearless joys,
 Less ceasing than their top ;
 Yet mine was one ungrateful storm,
 I was head-boy of Sorrow's form,
 And there, alas, I stop!

THE CAPTIVE OF PETERWARDEIN :

AN INCIDENT IN THE HUNGARIAN WAR.

Translated from the "Revue des Deux Mondes."

TEN days after our arrival at Eszek, the Ban Jella-chich was desirous of conveying his troops by steam down the Danube, in order to direct them rapidly upon Illok, fifteen leagues below Eszek, but having learned that the Hungarians had raised some earth-works at Palanka on the left bank, and had mounted them with cannon, he resolved to carry them by landing a brigade at Bukin, a village on the left bank below Palanka, and sent me forward in order to reconnoitre the banks of the river between these two villages.

I started from Eszek on the 19th of May, at night-fall, and on the morrow, about ten o'clock in the morning, reached the village of Opatovaez. It was there I was to meet some pioneers charged with conveying me in a boat to the opposite bank ; but these fellows had not yet arrived. After having waited for them a long time to no purpose, I obtained a boat from the principal man of the village, and taking three peasants as rowers, pushed out into the middle of the stream. The weather was frightful—the boat, forced upon one side by the wind, was filling with water, and threatened every instant to go to the bottom. At last I arrived in front of Bukin, and having found a place where the depth of the Danube allowed a steamer to approach near enough to the bank to land the troops, I leaped ashore, and repaired to a small windmill established on a boat near the bank of the river. I carried a musket in my hand. For fear of surprise, I cried out for the miller to come to me—he was a German, appeared to be well disposed, and gave me all needful information as to the state and direction of the road by which the brigade must advance through the woods, in order to surprisè Palanka. My three boatmen, not daring to approach the shore, wanted to stop, but the distance was too great to enable me to see whether there were any guns ranged along the bank of the river, or on a spot where some houses built along the shore still concealed me from observation : I forced them to row me until the boat was but a short distance from the shore,—and then stood upright, fixing my attention upon the open square of the village. At this moment a Hungarian officer and fifteen men, armed with fusils, issued from behind a house ; I seized my gun, took aim at the officer, and exclaimed,—“Halt there! I will fire upon the first man of you that steps forward.” He stopped short, and cried out to my boatmen to land. “Row off, row off, into the stream,” I commanded them, in a voice rendered menacing by peril. These cowards, apprehensive of a discharge, leaped out of the boat, and marched along the shore, one only excepted, who, to help me to escape, pushed the boat out into the current. I then threw down my fusil, seized the oar, and struck out for the middle of the river ; but the Hungarian soldiers, rushing into the water up to their waists, pointed their guns at me, and seized a rope which hung behind the boat, and dragged me to the shore. I trembled all over with rage. “Fear nothing,” said the officer to me ; “we are not going to shoot you.” He then ordered their wagons to be got ready, and politely requested me to mount with him into the first ; he sat himself by my side, and placed my gun between his knees. Two pandours, whom he had ordered to load their guns, took their seats behind us ; the boatmen were put into the two other vehicles, and we started forward at a gallop.

The road followed the left bank of the Danube. I closely observed the ground, ready to leap into the river, and escape by swimming, wherever the road ran close enough to the shore, but everywhere on our right was a wide extent of meadows and marshes, and the Hungarians might have recaptured and shot me before I could have reached the Danube. When we passed through the conflagrated village of Futlak, I got down from the vehicle for a moment, with affected indifference, but one of the Pandours jumped out as quickly as myself. I saw that I must give up all hopes of escape, and chewed up all the papers which might have furnished the Hungarians with any information as to our plans. At midnight we arrived at Neusatz. The officer who conducted me placed me in the hands of a captain of the regiment of Ferdinand D'Este (one of those which had betrayed their oath), and left me with the corps de garde. The soldiers, who still bore the imperial colours, had preserved that profound respect, and that attachment to their leaders, which are the inherent virtues of an Austrian soldier. They brought me some bread and fresh water, and with affectionate care, spread out a blanket upon a bench in order that I might repose more comfortably. One of them having begun to speak of the Emperor in an insulting manner, the others compelled him to be silent—their military education had developed in their hearts a feeling of delicacy, with which I was greatly touched.

At daybreak, as soon as a passage was opened by closing up the bridge of boats, which the Hungarians kept open during the night lest it should be destroyed by fire-rafts, the officer conducted me into the fortress of Peterwardein, before General Perczel, the commandant. I entered, saluted him proudly, and communicated to him my name. Perczel endeavoured to put on the air of a man of the world, and said with affected politeness—"I shall ask you no questions about the operations of your army, I know beforehand that you would give no reply to them; for the rest, we know very well where the Ban now is, and await him with the utmost impatience. I may perhaps be entitled to shoot you, but we are not the set of uncivilized savages your army are pleased to imagine. You will remain a prisoner here," he continued, after the lapse of a moment. He then called an officer who conducted me into a casemate, or vaulted room, some eight feet broad and twenty long; the descent into it was by three steps, and it was lighted by a window on a level with the ground, four feet broad and three feet high, intended as an embrasure for a cannon, and defended by strong iron bars. It commanded a look-out over the fosse and counterscarp. At noon the provost charged with the care of the prisoners entered the cell, followed by a soldier bearing something to eat. The provost, who still wore the imperial uniform, appeared to be about fifty; his hair was already white, but a glance full of fire flashed from his grey eyes. His manner was grave and melancholy. As soon as the soldier had left us, he sat down on my couch, and began to talk with me; he told me how he had served forty years in a battalion of grenadiers; he spoke of the emperor with respect; and, as I thought, seemed anxious to obtain my confidence; but I watched him, and held him in suspicion. At length he wished me a good night, and took his leave.

VOL. XIII.

I passed the whole afternoon in contriving a plan of escape. I examined the bars of the window, and having discovered a long piece of iron among a heap of old broken furniture thrown into the corner, I hid it away—this iron was quite strong enough to enable me to spring the lock, but I saw at once that I must give up the attempt to escape through the door which opened into the interior of the fortress. I should have been obliged, supposing this obstacle removed—to cross two lines of the fortifications, and the advanced posts of the Hungarians—the thing was impossible. I endeavoured to bend the bars of the window, but they were too massive—nevertheless, I afterwards succeeded in getting out two, so that I was able to push my head between them. It was not from the inside of the casemate that I had any chance of escaping—by the door or by the window flight was alike impossible, and the walls too were six feet thick.

At noon on the following day, the 22d of May, the Provost entered the casemate as before; he told me he had orders to allow me to take an hour's exercise. I tried to appear indifferent, but could scarcely conceal my delight—for I was now able to devise new methods of making my escape. The Provost took me to an esplanade planted with trees, surrounded with steep grassy slopes, which led up to the ramparts. At the foot of the ramparts flowed the Danube; I saw at once the possibility of escape, by throwing myself into the river and swimming away; but I resolved to wait some days to reflect maturely upon my plan before I carried it into execution. The Provost began again to speak of the Emperor, of his own devotion to the Imperial cause—(he was a Slavonian of Eszek,) but I stood on my guard, convinced that he had his orders to play this part to worm himself into my confidence, and get out of me our plans and our strength. I had no longer a shadow of doubt, when on the morrow, he said to me with an excitement which brought tears into his eyes, "Captain, I have a heavy weight upon my mind, I cannot support this Hungarian tyranny. Is the Emperor then powerless? How are we to deliver ourselves from this thralldom? Ah! Captain, if it could but be shortly." Softly, patience, Kussmaneck, (such was the name of the Provost,) patience, that will come in due time, I said to him with a smile, looking at him with a sarcastic air, that he might see I was not to be the dupe of his fine sentiments of fidelity. "How are we to obtain our deliverance?" he continued without being at all disconcerted; "has the Ban then a powerful army?" This last question confirmed me more strongly in my ill opinion of the man.

Nevertheless, on the 24th, after having walked by my side for some time in silence, Kussmaneck said to me; "There are here several of us attached by heart, as well as by our oaths, which we have never violated, to the emperor. We are here in spite of ourselves." He then stopped and looked into my face, as if hesitating to speak, as though he wished to confide something to me, but was afraid to do so.

N

The expression of his countenance was so sincere, that it gave me confidence in him, and I ceased to reply to his words by a smile of incredulous doubt. "Two subaltern artillery officers," he continued, "a young Croat named Gerberich, the proprietor of the bridge of boats, and I myself, are ready to run all risks to reestablish the emperor's authority within the fortress."—The Provost hesitated yet a moment,— "and so, to tell you the whole, we have at command, Captain, the means of writing to Colonel Mamula; we can even get to him by creeping in a boat along the shore of the Danube by night. It is thus that Brauenstein, the subaltern, was able to arrange signals with him, informing him when the Hungarians were getting ready for the attack. From one of the redoubts of the line of circumvallation the house of Brauenstein is visible. When the Hungarians were proposing to attack the Colonel, the subaltern gave notice to him by placing a light in his window at night, and if in the daytime, by hanging out a black cloak against the white wall of the house. Captain," continued Kussmaneck, "you are our superior in rank, you must be our leader, we must hazard everything; and the moment is propitious. At night there are but fifteen hundred men in the fortress, the rest of the garrison encamp at the 'Tête du Pont,' in Neusatz, and it takes more than two hours to close the bridge of boats and reestablish the passage." I recommended him to ascertain the exact number of the soldiers in the fortress, to inform himself of the strength of the guard charged with the care of the gates, to find out the days when the Honveds were on duty, and I arranged with him to let me speak with the two subalterns at our usual hour of exercise.

I employed a part of the night in considering by what means we could second a nocturnal attack by Colonel Mamula, and give entrance to his troops by seizing one of the gates of the fortress. An idea came into my head: Kussmaneck had told me that he held prisoners in other casemates near my own; namely, eighty soldiers of Croatian and Slavonian regiments condemned to hard labour—some for ten years, others for fifteen or twenty, by the Imperial councils of war during the year that preceded the revolt. These convicts were all Croats or Slavonians, for the Hungarians had given their liberty to such of their nation as were found among them, and had incorporated them into their Honved regiments. These soldiers were all condemned for robbery with violence and assassination, or murder committed without premeditation. Kussmaneck might strike their irons—they might give us their help. The hope of liberty, the desire of vengeance, and a feeling of national hatred, would convert these unbridled men, accustomed to the sight of bloodshed, into a troop ready to undertake anything, forced as they would be to perish, rather than stop short in their work when once the signal should be given them.

The next day, at one o'clock in the afternoon, Kussmaneck took me out, and conducted me near the ramparts. Brauenstein and Kraue (the two subalterns) walked up and down, apparently as if unconcerned; he made them a signal, and they followed us into a narrow path formed by some piles of wood arrayed as in a timber-yard. Brauenstein was fair, pale, and apparently delicate. Kraue was broad in the shoulders, with a large head, heavy eyebrows, and a firm and steady expression. We agreed upon the way in which everything should be conducted. Kussmaneck during the night was to liberate the convicts, who were to be formed beforehand into four bodies of four-and-twenty each. The muskets of the guard who guarded the gate of the fortress on the side next Belgrade were ranged by night before the guard-house whilst the soldiers slept—a single sentinel had charge of them. To rush upon this sentinel, seize the thirty muskets, put to death the sleeping soldiers, and obtain possession of the gate—such was the measure with which we were to begin; and as the captain, I was to be the leader of this band. Kussmaneck, with another four-and-twenty convicts, was to seize upon three pieces of cannon which during the night remained loaded, and the match lighted upon the esplanade ready in case of attack, and once master of these guns he was to draw up his troop against the rampart, turn the guns round, and hold himself ready to fire upon the Hungarians. Brauenstein and Kraue charged themselves with the conduct of the other troops, and with them were to enter into the barracks and seize on the muskets of the sleeping soldiers. While this was going on, Colonel Mamula, apprised by a discharge of musketry, was to push on some bodies of cavalry full gallop for the gate which I held with my men, and then throw himself into the fortress at the head of all his infantry. Without exaggerating our forces and our chances, and even supposing that part of the plan should fail, we should still be in a position to maintain the fight and keep open the Belgrade gate during half an hour, for our men would be forced to fight to the death rather than surrender to be afterwards massacred or shot. It was necessary to write to Colonel Mamula to arrange with him his plan of attack and give him all the necessary details. Gerberich had himself proposed to carry to the Colonel the papers we should have to send him; he was the only one who now had it in his power to accept this dangerous mission. At a time when the Hungarians had not as yet doubled their outposts, Brauenstein and Kraue had succeeded in gliding through the lines and eluding their vigilance; but now, this seemed to be almost impossible. As to Gerberich, by pretending that he had some business between the fortress and the inner line of the outposts, he might obtain a permit to visit them, and afterwards contrive to slip across the outposts into the open country;—it was undoubtedly to risk his life, but this he was prepared to do.

At last, when everything was arranged, in order that I might not have to reproach myself with letting these men rush blindly upon their deaths, I told them plainly, that if our enterprise should not succeed, or if it should happen to be discovered, nothing could save us, and that we should be all of us infallibly shot. I then watched the expression of their countenances. Brauenstein replied to me, calmly, "Captain, we are not afraid of death: whether we are shot in this place, or killed by musketry upon the field of battle like our comrades in the army, matters little, it is a soldier's death. I wish to serve the emperor as I have sworn to do; and, if it must be so, die for the emperor like a brave soldier; and may God enable me to do so!" he exclaimed, raising his hand with the utmost energy.

These brave men were all married, and had each of them several children. "Well!" said I to them, to assure myself for the last time of their firmness, "if everything should succeed, it is I who have everything to win. The emperor will give me the cross of Maria Theresa, and I am decided rather to risk everything than die by inches in this casemate; but as to yourselves, you will get no other reward than a medal of merit, or perhaps the grade of an officer. If we are all shot, what is to become of your wives and children?" "The emperor will take care of them," replied Kussmaneck. I then wrung their hands with warmth, and took my leave of them, and Kussmaneck reconducted me to my casemate.

I passed all the remainder of the day in writing to Colonel Mamula on a slip of fine paper, which when rolled up was not thicker than my little finger, and was but three inches in length. I gave it to Kussmaneck to hand over to Gerberich, and told him to charge him expressly not to conceal the paper in his boots or clothes, but to hold it crushed up in his hand, so that he might swallow it if he were arrested; but Brauenstein, having learned during the evening that some change was to be made among the troops having charge of the posts, moved also, as I believe, by the noble desire of partaking in every danger, desired to transmit these concluding particulars to Colonel Mamula. His handwriting was large, he neglected to use thin paper, and notwithstanding my advice, he suffered Gerberich to put the two letters between the cloth and lining of his coat.

Gerberich had procured a permit signed by the commandant of the fortress, allowing him to go to one of his vineyards situated upon the circle of the Hungarian outposts. On the 27th, at noon, he left the fortress, and was to return the same evening with a reply from Colonel Mamula. I crouched down in the opening of the window, whence, by pressing my face against the bars, I could see the bridge which crossed the fosse in front of the Belgrade gate. It was by this gate that Gerberich was to re-enter in the evening. I was not without uneasiness, but notwithstanding ready for any event. It had just struck three o'clock; I heard steps in the corridor, the grounding of muskets fell on my ear, the door opened, Kussmaneck appeared on the threshold; an officer and four soldiers pushed him by the shoulders into the middle of the casemate; the officer stopped, regarded me a long while with an expression of ill suppressed fury, then departed and left me alone with Kussmaneck.

We were both oppressed by our feelings, and unable to speak to each other. It would have been unmanly to express regret; Kussmaneck paced up and down the casemate, his hands crossed behind his back. I sat down on my bed, stunned by the ideas that crowded in upon my brain. I felt most painfully excited, and in order to overcome this, I said at length to Kussmaneck, while trying to appear calm: "Well, what is it they are going to do with us?" "You know it well, Captain," he calmly replied; "we shall all be shot before the four-and-twenty hours have passed over us." A few moments afterwards, and they came to fetch him and imprison him in another place. I passed the whole evening walking up and down the casemate, suppressing the beating of my heart, and trying to quiet myself by the reflection, that I was in the same situation as the officer who, mortally wounded in battle, knows that he has but a few hours to live. During these hours, I said to myself, he has to struggle with his sufferings, while I am still at this moment full of life and strength. Towards midnight, worn out with emotion, I stretched myself upon my pallet and fell into a profound sleep.

On the morrow, the 28th of May, I awoke about seven in the morning. I felt myself full of vigour; I went to the window; the weather was superb. I concluded that all the population of the city would pour forth to see the execution, and I resolved to show these Hungarians with what intrepidity the soldiers of the emperor could march to their deaths; incessantly repeating to myself, with a feeling of pride, "I am a gentleman, and an officer of the emperor."

At nine, a Hungarian provost came in search of me. Two soldiers marched in my rear. The street was full of people. I passed before these groups with a lofty front. I was conducted into the hall where the council was held: seven officers and a military auditor were seated round a table: my eyes endeavoured to read on their countenances the feelings with which they were animated. One young officer turned away his head, as if his heart had beforehand protested against the judgment; the others were serious and impassable, or wore an ironical smile upon their lips. The chief of the council asked me, while handing me the roll of paper taken upon Gerberich, "Is this your writing?" "It is," was my reply. He then put to me for form the usual questions prescribed by military law; then the provost conducted me into another hall. My four companions were there. I went up to them and wrung their hands, while endeavouring to conceal from them my feelings. Kussmaneck was calm: his features, worn by age, displayed nothing but indifference and resignation. Kraue was quiet, but his look had lost nothing of its audacity; his lips smiled in disdain. Brauenstein alone appeared to be powerfully affected; he was youthful and handsome; some big tears rolled down his cheeks; he lifted up to me his large blue eyes, and said, "I weep for my wife and poor little children." "Courage! courage! Brauenstein: the emperor will take care of them," I replied, in a tone which I still endeavoured to keep firm, feeling his own emotion stealing over me. Gerberich I deeply pitied: he was the youngest of the whole. Urged by his attachment for the imperial cause, he had come forward to share our dangers, and now he was about to die. There he stood, supported by the wall; the anticipation of death caused his teeth to chatter, and his entire frame to tremble.

Meanwhile the Hungarian officers had deliberated, and one of them crossed the hall, holding a paper in his hand. I had assisted several times at councils of war, and knew that this paper was the sentence of death, which he carried for signature to the commandant of the fortress. At the end of some minutes the provost placed me, as well as my companions, between a dozen soldiers, who were to reconduct us to prison while awaiting the execution. I walked the foremost. I heard the word erschossen (to be shot) repeated around me. I saw upon a balcony a couple of men and a young woman: the young men raised their hats as I passed, and the young woman put forth her hand, in which she held a handkerchief, as if to give me encouragement. Doubtless they were some family attached to the imperial cause. I raised my head and smiled at them, as if to say that I would not flinch, but do it honour. I entered my casemate: the door, kept by two soldiers, remained open, and I saw afar, in the chamber which Kussmaneck had occupied, his wife and daughter, who were uttering the most distressing groans—it seems to me that I can hear them still. "My father! my father!" cried the poor girl, with a loud voice, as if to call him to her: she raised convulsively her arms above her head, then, trembling and exhausted, supported herself by her forehead against the wall. I pitied them; but at length their cries and wailings disturbed me: they forced me to think upon my mother and her grief, and I felt that I was becoming unmanned. I had preserved a ring upon which a little diamond was mounted. I drew it from my finger, and wrote upon one of the panes,— "Adieu! dear parents. I am about to be shot. I am tranquil and resigned. I die full of faith and hope. Dear mother, my only grief is your own." I then took off the riband of my cross, in order to place it over my heart when led to execution, and, sitting on my bed, I retraced in memory the ancient recollections of my family. I recalled every detail of the heroic death of Lord Strafford, which I had never read without feeling myself moved to admiration. I tried to maintain a kindred firmness of soul. The illusions that I had nourished in my heart I was now called upon to abandon; but at this supreme moment I might still hope to acquire an increase of honour.

The clock sounded the hours—two o'clock, three o'clock had passed—the execution was to have taken place within the four-and-twenty hours. A ray of hope shot into my heart; but it entirely deprived me of calmness. I now became powerfully excited. All the rest of the day I walked rapidly up and down my casemate, seeking to wear down by fatigue my mental and bodily uneasiness. Exhausted at length, I flung myself upon my couch. Next morning, at nine o'clock, the Hungarian provost, followed by four soldiers, came in quest of me. I was calm and tranquil, and felt no further emotion when they said they were to conduct me once more into the hall of council, where the Hungarian officers were together. At the orders of the leader, two old men were brought in, and the provost demanded of me which of them had offered me money. This they did for the following reason: the proprietor of the bridge of boats, named Bobek, a citizen of Peterwardein, rich, and devoted to the emperor, being secretly informed, some days before, by Brauenstein, that an enterprise was preparing to restore the fortress into the hands of the emperor, had approached me while walking about under the custody of Kussmaneck. He told me that if I had need of money, his fortune, amassed by the toll and construction of the bridge of boats over the Danube, was at the emperor's service, and that he would advance me whatever money I might require. In consequence of this, I had mentioned in the papers taken on Gerberich that I had no need of money, with which an inhabitant of the city had offered to furnish me. The irritated Hungarians knew not upon whom to fix their suspicions. When I told them that I had never set eyes on these old men, the chief of the council ordered them to fetch another of the townspeople; but I then exclaimed, with a firm and resolute voice, "It is of no avail, since I will never point out the man who offered me that money." I learned afterwards that Bobek, finding they were in search of the person who had offered money to the Austrian officer, in order to carry out the plot, had believed that he was on the point of being discovered, and knowing that he would infallibly be shot, had been seized with violent cramps, and was a dead man the following morning. Bobek, not knowing how the offer he made to me had become known to the Hungarians, may well have imagined that the fear of death had wrung from me a confession of it, and that thus I had betrayed him. This idea tormented me for a long time afterwards.

I was reconducted into my casemate. Two long days passed away. At some moments I recovered my hopes; but I repulsed from my heart the struggles which these hopes, which might prove to be deceptive, kept up with the gloomy resolution which sustained me. Hope seemed at instants to restore me to life, and then, a moment afterwards, she gave me up again to death: I thrust her angrily from me.

On Thursday, the 31st of May, the provost told me that the sentence of the council of war had been sent to Debreczin to the Hungarian ministry by General Paul Kiss, who had replaced Perezel in the command of the fortress. I estimated the number of days required by the courier to return from Debreczin. Knowing that the army of the Ban must be on its march, I invoked it with my whole soul, hoping that its approach might perhaps bring me some favourable chance, and even that when the reply from Debreczin should reach the city, they would not dare to execute the sentence while the Ban was in presence of the fortress. The time rolled away in these gloomy alternatives. At length, on the morning of the 12th of June, the cannon began to thunder over my head and about the ramparts. The Hungarians did not cease firing during the whole day. In the evening a red glare lighted up all the counterscarp, and I imagined that the suburbs must be on fire. On the following day, in the afternoon, the cannon began to thunder again, but the firing ceased at the end of half an hour. Every day I heard some discharges of artillery. I thus knew that the army of the Ban was before Neusatz, and invested the fortress on the left bank, and the courier sent to Debreczin could not effect his return. I recovered some of my hopes; but as, towards the end of June, the cannon ceased its roar during several days, I concluded that the Ban had retired. I afterwards found the Ban in fact had attacked the "tête du pont" of the bridge which unites the city of Neusatz to the fortress of Peterwardein. The Hungarians opened upon Neusatz the fire of a hundred-and-twenty pieces of artillery, forced the Ban to abandon the city, which was thus reduced to ashes.

The 2d of July, as I paced slowly up and down my casemate, I saw a Hungarian officer, a captain of artillery, crossing the threshold. He stopped a moment to look me full in the face: I continued my walk; when he seized the sentinel by the shoulder, and exclaimed, "Take care that dog does not escape you, or you shall answer for it." Then, as I passed before him, he shook his fist at me, with a visage inflamed with wrath, and said, "Yes, yes, you have black and white' hound: I must see to it that you are shot." I imagined the sentence of death must have arrived from Debreczin. My strength suddenly left me; a piercing cramp convulsed my chest, and I was obliged to throw myself upon my pallet. One of the soldiers, alarmed at the cries of pain which my sufferings now and then wrung from me, told one of his comrades to go and seek a physician. The physician speedily arrived; but, as he approached me, and, agonised with pain, I called to him to request his help, the provost desired him to go out. Fury restored to me my strength: I rushed on the provost, to seize him by the throat and revenge myself: the provost leaped out of the casemate, and the sentinel stopped me with his musket. At the end of half-an-hour, the military physician-in-chief entered my casemate: he felt my pulse, and toward evening, a soldier brought to me a bottle. I drank its contents, and, feeling a great heat through my whole body, I imagined that I had been poisoned. The commandant of the fortress, I thought, dares not have me shot, for fear of having to answer for my death, if some day the chances of war should force him to capitulate; but now it will be supposed that I have been carried off by the cholera. The night appeared wearily long. The physician returned about eight o'clock. I had resolved to draw from him a statement of my condition. "Doctor, doctor," I said to him, "I am poisoned: tell me the truth." "No, no," he cried, with a voice full of emotion; "never would I have consented to anything of the sort." He took my hand; some tears rolled down his cheeks: "No, never!" he continued: "I have a wife and children, and I fear the judgment of God."

I was weak, but tranquil. I prayed God to leave me my energy. I felt youth struggle with the malady within me, and I soon recovered my entire strength. I sat me down on the window, whence I could see the bridge by passing my head between the bars. In the morning the first beams of the sun penetrated obliquely into my casemate; it was a great delight to me to warm myself in their beneficent glow, and to follow them to the moment when the day, as it rolled on, brought back the obscurity of my prison. Before my window, on the counterscarp, and on a dry part of the fosse, were encamped some poor families, whose houses in the suburbs had been burned down. These unhappy beings were without shelter, and almost without food: the cholera was decimating them; and almost every day I saw some of them carried away in a blanket. I remember one child, about twelve years old; I heard him crying out for several days together. His screams of agony resembled those of a wild beast. The malady contracted all his limbs: I saw him coil himself up and bury his head between his knees, then on a sudden throw himself at full length, violently jerking out his arms. A woman, doubtless his mother, hung over him, and sustained his head. One evening I perceived that he moved no longer, and I imagined that he must be dead.

The 12th of July, during the night, I was awakened by the grounding of muskets on the pavement of the corridor; an officer followed by four soldiers entered my casemate, holding a lantern in his hand. I leaped from my bed, and raised myself before him; he passed the lamp up to my face, then walked round the casemate, scrutinising the walls, and finally went away. I heard the clang of muskets in the neighbouring casemate, and supposed it was the inspecting officer engaged in making his round.

The time dragged slowly along; every morning I wrote the day and the month on my window-pane with the little diamond of my ring. I strove to forget my situation, and my mind wandered freely among the green plains of Styria, or among the mountains of Switzerland. Some verses of an elegy by Titus Strozzi often came to my memory, and I wrote them upon the pane:—

Sed jam summa venit fati urgentibus hora
Ah! nec amica mihi, nec mihi mater adest;
Altera ut ore legat propere auspria vitæ,
Altera uti condat lumina et ossa tegat.

The remembrance of these verses delighted me—it was a consolation to me to read them over once again. Notwithstanding, I soon recovered all my strength; I desired to live. The hope of some day avenging myself excited, sustained me. I passed almost the whole day crouched in the entrance of the window;

some persons often stopped to look at me. I then precipitately retired for fear of attracting the attention of the sentinel. One day when the sun was setting, a young woman passed along the bridge holding some flowers in her hand; she stopped, and knowing probably that I was an officer of the emperor, she pulled the flowers to pieces, and threw them towards the bars of my window. I wished I had been able to thank her for this token of sympathy, which gave me extreme comfort. Several times also, I observed a young priest upon the bridge: when he found himself alone, he stopped and saluted me.

The 21st of July, the provost told me that Kraue had died in the casemate where he had been confined, and that he had desired to bid me adieu. The 27th, in the morning, he entered anew into my cell. His countenance was bathed in sweat, his eyes were fixed upon the ground, he wiped with his handkerchief some drops of blood which stained his collar. "Captain," he said to me, "Kussmaneck, Brauenstein, and Gerberich, have just been shot; for yourself, you are to remain here a prisoner." I would not fasten upon this hope. I feared lest I was reserved for execution in the afternoon or on the following day. It was not till the morrow, the 28th of July, on the evening when the provost told me the execution had taken place in consequence of the order received in Debreczin, that I comprehended that I was out of danger. The presence of the Ban before Neusatz had delayed the arrival of the courier from Debreczin, and when the sentence was sent to Georgey, in order to receive his sanction, the imperial army had everywhere advanced triumphantly into the heart of Hungary, under the command of General Haynau. Whether Georgey had been urged by compassion, or whether he feared for the future at a moment when the Hungarian cause appeared to be lost, he refused to sign the sentence which was to condemn an officer to death.

My three companions all died courageously; they felt themselves soldiers of the emperor. The years which they had passed in the army had given them that lofty pride of caste which they had never belied, and their heroic death was a final testimony of their devotion.¹

At last, on the 23d of August, the provost came to announce that he had orders to conduct me to the Commandant of the fortress. We traversed the square, and I knew not how to admire sufficiently the blue sky, and the green trees upon the esplanade. The Commandant paced pensively up and down his chamber; his face was pale and thin, and his countenance wore an air of gloom. "The chances of war have turned against us," he said; "the cause of Hungary is lost. The army of Georgey exists no longer. He has been forced to lay down his arms; here is a letter which a messenger from him has just brought me. He urges me to give up the fortress, and on the demand of General Haynau, he requires me to restore you to liberty. You are free, but remain in your casemate: my soldiers are exasperated—I will not be responsible for their behaviour. "I asked him if anything had happened to the Ban, and if his army had not fought some engagement since the end of May. He praised the bravery of our leaders, and of our troops, and spoke of the battle of Hagyes, where the Hungarians had been conquerors, with a modesty that surprised me. Then with an affectation of politeness, he returned me my watch, a seal ring, and 600 florins which had been taken from me when I was made prisoner. "You had a handsome sabre," he continued, "I regret that I am unable to return it to you; but Major Bozo, to whom I gave it in charge, is at this present time at Komorn;² accept this one in its place,—and he handed me one of his own sabres. After a moment, he exclaimed with a sigh, "The French have abandoned us; we had fully relied on their assistance!" "Had you then any secret promise?" I inquired. "Not so," he replied, "but was not the revolutionary attitude that France had assumed towards Europe a token for us, a guarantee which sustained our hopes?" He afterwards spoke to me at length, of Isaszeg and Tapio-Bieske; he would not believe that at Tapio-Bieske, the brigade Rastech had maintained the combat alone; he praised the bravery of the Ottokaner, who, at the battle of Isaszeg, had defended the forests: then, after a moment's silence, he said, "I fully expect to be shot," and he stopped before me as if to await my reply. I might have revenged myself, and played off on him an affected pity, by confirming him in the idea that he had no mercy to expect, but I was too happy to think of vengeance, and I told him I felt certain that the emperor would display his clemency. "It is all over with us!" he resumed, "it would be madness to defend this fortress, to keep up the war by ourselves. But I am no longer master of my troops; you will soon discover what is the state of affairs." He made me sit down. Some minutes afterwards his aide-de-camp came to tell him that ten officers and subalterns convoked by his orders, and chosen from the battalions by their comrades, were in readiness without. He ordered them to be admitted, read to them the letter of Georgey, and proposed to them to surrender the fortress into the hands of the Imperial troops. Up to that very moment, he had amused the garrison, cut off from all intercourse with the rest of Hungary, with the most delusive hopes: every day he had proclaimed to them fresh victories, and now these men looked upon themselves as betrayed. They began to speak with threatening voices, and to strike the floor with their sabres; one of them in particular exclaimed like a madman—"I am a Hungarian and a gentleman; I will blow up the fortress rather than surrender." General Paul Kiss remained calm and impassible. I admired his firmness; he threatened to have this officer shot, and having contrived to pacify the others, he insisted on their being silent. He repeated to them that all was over; but his officers maintained that this could hardly be; and at length they consented to choose among themselves an officer, a subaltern, and a soldier, and send them with a safe-conduct to Georgey to ascertain from his own lips if everything was indeed lost to the Hungarian cause. "If it be so," said one of them in a loud voice, "we shall know what we have next to do." The general then dismissed them. "You see," he said to me, "I am to be massacred by my own people, or shot by yours! I have gained my different promotions sword in hand. I am prepared for all events. The Hungarians," he continued, smiling, "are not afraid to die."

On the following day at noon, I was to leave the fortress with the officer sent to Georgey, but General Kiss, fearing for me the vengeance of his soldiers, exasperated by the defeat of their army, caused me to depart at four o'clock in the morning. The dawn of day lighted up the horizon. At length I felt myself free. I turned back a moment to cast one look upon the fortress while thinking how many mortal sufferings had been enclosed within its walls. I pursued the road to Temeswar in order to rejoin the Ban. I hoped yet to take a share in some engagement, but I soon felt myself unable to stand the jolting of my vehicle, so much was I enfeebled by anxiety and bad nourishment. I therefore had myself rowed up the right bank of the Danube, and repaired to Colonel Mamula. He and all his officers embraced me affectionately: for a long time it had been supposed that I was shot. During the entire day I got them to relate to me our glorious engagements, as well as the sufferings of our army. These victories had been very dearly purchased. Many of my companions were dead, and many of our soldiers killed in daily encounters. The brave Captain Freiberg, who had been my companion during the whole campaign, had his head carried off by a cannon ball—Tascis had his face torn to pieces by a bursting shell, so that I no longer inquired, without hesitation, the news concerning those who were dear to me.

Our officers told me how Gerberich had been taken.—Having contrived to slip across the outposts, he then set off at a run to get to the line of circumvallation, but being pursued by the Hungarians, and seeing our soldiers fire upon those who pursued him, he stood still a moment, frightened perhaps by the hissing of the balls. The Hungarians having seized him, led him back into the fortress—as I afterwards ascertained—and found in his clothes the papers which he had there concealed.

I was too weak to travel in the little carts of the peasantry, the sole means of transport which the war had spared. I set out for Semlin in order to ascend the Save by the steamer, that I might repair to Gratz. I met upon the road whole bands of women and girls in rags—they were Servian families from the Banat and the Bács, the male members of which had either been massacred or had perished in battle. These women had escaped to the woods, and had lived there for several months on chestnuts and a little flour; and now, worn out with misery and hunger, they descended the mountains, dragging after them their naked and almost dying children—and before them there was nothing but mouldering carcasses and villages reduced to ashes. This misery was not to be wondered at—the Hungarian war has annihilated the southern population of the empire. After correct returns made by order of Government, in the spring of 1850, the number of widows in the military districts of Croatia, Slavonia, the Banat, and Transylvania, whose husbands have perished during the war, surpasses five-and-twenty thousand.

At Semlin they brought to me three peasants arrested at Palonka two months before, accused of belonging to the band who took me prisoner. My comrades, believing me dead, wished at first to have them shot, but afterwards, hoping that I might be yet alive, and fearing for me reprisals on the part of the Hungarians, they had kept them closely shut up in prison. These poor devils were pale and haggard, one of them I recognised, but I was too happy to desire revenge, besides, they had done nothing worthy of death, the officer alone was to blame—I ordered them to be set at liberty. The poor fellows threw themselves at my feet and embraced my knees; then lifting towards me their eyes full of tears, exclaimed with piercing voices—"O sir, if you only knew all that we have suffered!" "My friends," I replied, "I comprehend a little of it myself." I gave them some money, and ordered that they should be taken and feasted at a neighbouring inn.

The 15th of September I departed from Semlin in the steamer, and remounted the Save: at last I reached Gratz. For a long time it was supposed that I was dead; nevertheless, they had endeavoured to keep my mother in hopes that she might still see me. Some days after my arrival, I found on my table the window-panes of my casemate—one of my friends, who after the surrender of Peterwardein had visited the chamber wherein I had been shut up, had caused them to be removed, and he now presented to me these memorials of my evil days.

[This paper, which gives so vivid but painful a picture of the recent war in Hungary, is written by an officer in the Austrian service. Our selection of it will not be supposed to involve any sympathy with the side espoused by the writer, although his gallantry and sufferings may well excite admiration and sympathy. The cause of Hungary may indeed seem lost. The band of patriots and generals whose exploits were so lately in every body's mouth are scattered to the four winds. Kossuth is a fugitive, Bem and Perczel are no more, and the aged hero Dembinski, it is said, is driven to support himself by selling cigars in New York. Yet let us trust that better times are in store for the Hungarian people, and that the blood so lavishly poured forth in behalf of their liberties, may not sink forgotten and fruitless into the dust.—Ed.]

ROMEO AND JULIET.

We have here, from the pencil of the late gifted but unfortunate B. R. Haydon, a vivid impersonation of the immortal lovers of Verona. It is perhaps his most poetical work, and represents the well-known balcony scene in Shakspeare's play.

LAVENGRO; A PHILOLOGIST'S DREAM.¹

MR. BORROW's writings show that he belongs to a class which is only not so narrow as that of the genuine poets, or creative geniuses. If he has not, with them, held converse with unveiled truth, he has, assuredly, with no dim eye, nor half-glance, looked upon facts; and what he has seen, he tells with wonderful effect, whether he uses his own natural style, or adopts one that reminds the reader of "The Pilgrim's Progress," or of "Tom Jones," both of them models of first-rate excellence in narrative English. At the same time, no man of experience in books and men can fail to observe, that had not the facts been seen and narrated by one of no mean poetic gifts, there had been no charm in these gipsy tales. It was something to write a story like "Gil Blas," but to be Gil Blas in this prosaic matter-of-fact age, when revolutions and counter-revolutions, railway-scrip, exhibitions of industry, and industrial co-operation, are in vogue, is vastly more; and thus it comes to pass that we all read Mr. Borrow's books; and even if we quarrel with him in our hearts at every other page, we are delighted with him, and do not readily lay him aside till we have reached the unwelcome "finis." Thus it was with his adventures in Spain, whilst engaged in the attempt to make the Bible known there; and with his anecdotes, speculations, &c. respecting the Zincali who figured so prominently in his other work; and thus we confidently predict it must be with "Lavengro."

This title, which has perplexed us for a twelvemonth, signifies, it appears, in "gentle Rommany," the Gipsy tongue, Word-master, and was bestowed upon the autobiographer, the "Scholar," by the "Gipsy," one Jasper Petulengro, (horse-shoe master, or maker), because of his readiness in learning that "mother of languages." The "Priest," the third character in the "dream, or drama," announced in the title, is one of whom the preface very truly says, that "neither the Scholar nor the Gipsy would feel at all flattered by being confounded with him;" for most certainly, if the Church of Rome, in these days, can find employment for such emissaries, either she is in her dotage, and does not possess the consummate tact which used to mark her appointments, or she is effete, and cannot produce better than he, or else she is demented, and expects to regain her lost power in the world by means of the scum of English ale-houses, for only those could agents like this one persuade to return to the fold. This preface might easily betray us into some warmth, answering to its own, but however tempting the theme, especially now, and albeit it seems to have been placed before us for the very purpose of tempting us, we shall eschew the discussion of it; for in good truth, Mr. Borrow can do us a far better turn than plunge us into the worse than Irish bogs of Polemical Protestantism; and we read his book, not for what unnumbered divines could supply us with, extempore, in these days, but for what only himself can tell

"of most disastrous chances,
Of moving accidents, by flood and field;
Of hair-breadth 'scapes—" of wild adventure; of conflicts stubborn, both with friends and foes; his

"—portance in his travel's history," wherein, if not "antres vast, and deserts idle," and all the grand concomitants of the story of the "noble Moor," are heard of, we do hear of rude heaths, and rustic streamlets, and dingles far away from human dwelling, and of that hugest "desert" of all, London. Of these

"It is his hint to speak;"

nor is there wanting a fair Desdemona, respecting whom it is most plain, at the end of the third volume, that as Othello said, could he say,

"She loved me for the dangers I had passed,
And I loved her, that she did pity me."

And as it is for these things that we read Mr. Borrow's writings, and from them to learn other aspects of this great world in which we live, than those which commonly present themselves to his readers, so we shall, in this notice of his "last," invite all who can to possess themselves of the book, and regale all who cannot, by giving a condensation of the narrative, with such extracts as will amuse and interest those for whose monthly delectation we cater, and exhibit the character of the work. But first we must observe, that a threefold division of the story is very palpable, and very convenient for our purpose, too; not coinciding, however, with the volumes, and not in the least connected with the three characters whose names appear on the title-page; the first being the period of "acquisition," during which Lavengro picks up one language after another, in ways marvellous enough to us who are not masters of words, as he is, and with them (as will be seen) much other skill—the second, a period during which he vainly endeavours to use his linguistic acquirements in the great mart of the world's literature, London; and the third one, during which he wanders at will in the southern and western counties of England, eventually becoming master of a travelling-tinker's "plant," and practising the healing art on kettles and tin-ware, with a little dilettante shoeing of quadrupeds, in which liberal, or, at least, free occupation, this autobiography leaves the "scholar," just before the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act, as we gather from his last interview with the "Priest," a circumstance which leads us to hope for the appearance, in due time, of other three, or more volumes, carrying on the philologists "dream," by the help of "the Bible in Spain," to the time when the writer could look back on the whole, and see that his way of life had been such as this.

Lavengro was born of right good parentage; his father being one of those "best gentlemen," a Cornish man, and what is more, a captain of militia; and his mother a descendant of a French Protestant family, which with many others sought and found an asylum in England on the revocation of the edict of Nantes. He was the younger son, and as a matter of course his mother's darling, whilst the elder, though the especial favourite of his father, was the darling of all. His honoured birth-place, the name of which the autobiographer partly conceals, was East Dereham in Norfolk, a town which did and does still merit the designation which our author with allowable fondness bestows upon it, "pretty Dereham." His father's corps had their head-quarters here; for, as our own family traditions have informed us, the massive square clocher (or detached tower for the bells) of the parish church was employed as a dépôt for prisoners during the French war, whose condition and treatment was not different from that which Mr. Borrow has described with a manly tone of indignation, as prevailing in the larger dépôt at Norman Bridge. From the sketch he has given of himself in contrast with one of his brother, the divergent partialities of the parents may be without difficulty justified; the bold, open-hearted soldier naturally loved the handsome son, whose character was like unto his own; the mother, with her prescient affection, as instinctively built her hopes upon the musing, taciturn, wild-eyed boy, in whom an urgent word uttered by a stranger caused a paroxysm of tears. From the time of his birth, to the disbanding of the militia after the peace, when his father laid down his unused sword, and assumed the garb of the civilian, in the good city of Norwich, the boy and his brother always followed, under their mother's care, the movements of the father, who was now posted at Norman Bridge, now at Hythe in Kent, now at Edinburgh, and now in the wild region of Ireland; and thus there was instilled into his mind by the inevitable circumstances of his most impressible years, a love of roving adventure, out of which not merely such incidents as are recorded in this work, but more surely those of "the Bible in Spain," came. His education during this period, as could not but happen, was of a rather desultory kind, for scarcely had he become used to the mechanism of a school, so as to be able to derive from it whatever erudition the master had the power, out of his own mind, or out of books, to impart, than he was removed from it, and was compelled to go through the same tedious process of preparing to learn again in another school, and under the system of some other "Dr. Hornbook."

Of all this elementary lore, we will say no word but this; we can hardly believe it possible that a second man in Great Britain, competent in the same way, if not to the same degree with Lavengro, to speak of methods of teaching languages, could be found who could say that he believes "that no one ever yet got Lilly's Latin Grammar by heart when young, who repented of the feat at a mature age." For ourselves, we frankly confess that we entertain for his Propria quæ maribus, and As in præsentia, a most unmitigated hatred, and that we trust soon to be assured that the superior appliances of the present age have in every school, public and private, entirely superseded the barbarous, unphilosophical, unphilological jargon of the great pedagogue of the sixteenth century.

Yet though his school-going was thus broken, and his mind made the receptacle of such learned lumber as Lilly's hexameters, the boy's education went on. A Lavengro was one who could find wholesome food in that most unclassical vehicle for the Latin tongue; and the roving life of the soldier's child supplied him with the choicest materials for mental development and furniture, and gave him abundant opportunities and means of cultivating bodily hardihood, and manual skill, whereby all the possible evils of such a schooling were obviated. In one place it was a narrow escape from being poisoned by eating the berries of the bitter-sweet nightshade, or bryony, that enlarged his knowledge of facts; in another place, the huge and grey old skulls, mouldering in a charnel-house, attributed by the ancient sexton to the Danes, who "long ago came pirating into those parts," set the musing child thinking upon the marvellous prowess of the Sea Kings; and predisposed him for learning the old Danish dialect, and turning into English verse some of their bravest old ballads, in after times: a translation which afforded us, we right well remember, especial gladness in our own school-boy days, being ranked by us, and worthily we believe, with Percy's Reliques, and Robin Hood's Garland. Or it was that book of all books for such a boy as this, Robinson Crusoe; to which he attributes the unlocking of his faculties, and the stimulus which drove him fairly into the path of knowledge: or the sonorous voices of "the dignified rector," and "dignified, and high-church clerk," of "pretty Dereham," as they read responsively the mighty utterances of psalm and litany; the dimly-understood, or totally unintelligible words adding to the awe with which the strange child listened to what appeared to him "portentous descriptions of the wondrous works of the Most High:" or, it was the stern and heartless dealings of the authorities with the poor French prisoners at Norman Cross; or, yet more authentically, it was the half-superstitious, half-crazed, talk of an old viper-hunter, whom he often accompanied in his rambles, who imparted to him some of the secrets of snake-catching and herbalism, and who gave him, as a memento of so singular a friendship, a tamed viper, whose fangs had been removed;—it was such things as these that informed and instructed him.

To this tame viper our autobiographer owed his first intimacy with the Rommany people, or gipsies; and thus it happened. Wandering one day in a green lane, he lighted upon a gipsy encampment, and saw two of the members of the community evidently engaged in the manufacture of base coin. As soon as they discovered the intruder they rushed upon him, the man brandishing a ladle, and both bent on mischief; the casual mention of "bad money" by the boy inflamed them to the highest pitch, when he recollected his tame viper, which lay coiled up in his breast, and threatening to call his "futher" forth to help him with his forked tongue, he gave the well-known signal to his reptile friend, which darted out its head, and confronted the enemy with its glittering eyes. The man was terrified, taking the boy to be a superior being; and both the gipsies, lately so wrathful, could not show enough honour to their unexpected guest; they would even have engaged him to go with them, as their peculiar and protecting divinity, a proposal that led to the discovery that the viper was not his father, which a little lowered him in their esteem. However, he was a sap-engro, a snake-master, and that was not far from being as good; and he would answer their purpose just as well, especially if he could read. The boy at once took his beloved "Robinson Crusoe" from his pocket, and gave them a specimen of his talent. "That will do," said the man, "that's the kind of prayers for me and my family, aren't they wifelkin? I never heard more delicate prayers in all my life! why they beat the rubricals hollow!—and here comes my son Jasper. I say, Jasper, here's a young sap-engro that can read, and is more fly than yourself. Shake hands with him; I wish ye to be two brothers." Jasper was not much more pleasant, at first sight, than his parents, and his first inquiry respecting his new "brother" was, "'Can he box?' But hearing what he could do; 'What, a sap-engro!' said the boy, with a singular whine, and, stooping down, he leered curiously in my face; kindly, however, and then patted me on the head. 'A sap-engro!' he ejaculated; 'lor!'" And thus is the Gipsy of the story introduced upon the scene; a remarkable character, whom we shall meet with again. A sudden alarm from one of the gang hastily collected, and as suddenly dispersed the whole company; and so our young "sap-engro," marvelling at the Rommany language which he had overheard them using, and yet more wondering at the speakers, returned home.

Other influences were at work in forming the child's mind. The gentle spells of kindly nature began to work upon him. On the road to Scotland, he paused at Elvir Hill, unwitting its faery repute, and looked down upon the Tweed, but knew it not. Here is his own story of the incident:—

"Northward, northward, still! And it came to pass, that one morning I found myself extended on the bank of a river. It was a beautiful morning of early spring. Small white clouds were floating in the heaven, occasionally veiling the countenance of the sun, whose light as they retired would again burst forth, coursing like a race-horse over the scene. And a goodly scene it was! Before me, across the water, on an eminence stood a white old city, surrounded with lofty walls, above which rose the tops of tall houses, with here and there a church or steeple. To my right hand was a long and massive bridge, with many arches, and of antique architecture, which traversed the river. The river was a noble one, the broadest that I had hitherto seen. Its waters, of a greenish tinge, poured with impetuosity beneath the narrow arches to meet the sea close at hand, as the boom of the billows breaking distinctly upon a beach declared. There were songs upon the river from the fisher-barks, and occasionally a chorus, plaintive and wild, such as I had never heard before, the words of which I did not understand, but which, at the present time, down the long avenue of years, seem in memory's ear to sound like,—'Horam, coram, dugo.' Several robust fellows were near me; some knee-deep in water, employed in hauling the seine upon the strand. Huge fish were struggling amid the meshes,—princely salmon, their brilliant mail of blue and silver flashing in the morning beam. So goodly and gay a scene, in truth, had never greeted my boyish eye."

And whilst the boy gazed upon this new revelation of beauty his tears fell fast, as has happened with many a one in such circumstances, in places where "the maids of Elie" have no power to make men "elf-wild;" and, inquiring of one of the stalwart fishermen, he learned the name of the green river, and discovered that he had reposed upon "haunted ground."

At length, Edinburgh was reached; and the Castle was the residence of the soldier's son. The "High School" was selected for the carrying on of his often-interrupted instruction in book-learning. Here he construed Latin; was beaten "black and blue" (having numbers against him) for the honour of Auld Reekie; took part occasionally, and not without honour, if not always victoriously, in the bickers between the boys of Old Town and New; became "a daring cragsman," having famous opportunities of gaining a firm hold, steady foot, and a cool head, by exercise amongst the precipitous rocks on which the castle was built; acquired, "to the scandal of his father and the horror of his mother, a thorough proficiency in the Scotch" tongue; and, characteristically enough, formed an acquaintance with a North Briton, who appears, by musing upon "Willie Wallace," to have grown into a robber and a homicide, and who—though if matters had been arranged differently he might have become a Tamerlane (Lavengro thinks) and died "emperor of the world"—"perished on an ignoble scaffold;" not altogether undeservedly, as we must think, in spite of Mr. Borrow's rather remarkable essay towards a defence of him; and after a sojourn of two years at the "modern Athens," the whole family was transferred to Ireland.

Here, as ever in strange company, the language is the first thing that attracts him. An ancient crone whom he asked for water, during the march up into the country, gave him a draught of butter-milk, and when he offered her a penny, "shook her head, smiled, and, patting his face with her skinny hand, murmured some words in a tongue which he had never heard before." From his father he learned that this was Irish; and the remembrance of a tough battle, which the capture of some deserters had entailed, in one of the Irish quarters of the metropolis, in which "fixed bayonets" seem to have narrowly escaped a defeat from Irish shillalies and oaths, was revived by the sound of the Erse language in its native fields, and with it woke up his profound horror of the tongue that appeared to him to befit only savage and vulgar lips, and to consist solely of maledictions. The thorough-paced Orangeman with whom it was the old soldier's good-luck to lodge, now pointed out a seminary suitable to our young gentleman. So to school he went again to mature his Latin and to gain what Greek he could; and the net result of the combined efforts of master and scholar was concisely expressed by the disappointed parent, a few years afterwards, thus,—“I sent him to school to learn Greek, and he picked up Irish!”

Such is the course of a Lavengro; and parents must reconcile themselves to it with the best grace they can, and be thankful if nothing worse than Irish be picked up instead of Greek. Murtagh, his "language-master" in this prohibited acquirement, was, as every one is to a man that has an eye to see it, a "character," and the gift of a pack of cards, for which he longed, that he might "have something to do, like the rest—something that he cared for"—procured his best services for "Shorsha na vourncen," who speedily gained materials for an Erse vocabulary at least, to which he could himself supply the grammar.

Soon the quarters were removed to Templemore. His brother, from "the alumnus of an Irish seminary," had become "one of his Majesty's officers," and there was no school in this desolate region. Nothing remained for the lad (he was no more than thirteen, he says) but to go on educating himself, as best he could. The rude habits of the people gave him every facility for studying both them and their tongue on "the stranger's stone" at their own firesides; and from one source and another he largely increased his stock of self-help; and by way of giving his father on his death-bed some hope respecting himself, he was able, some years later in his life, to boast that he could ride a horse and be his own groom, make a set of shoes and put them on, and might have added, rouse his horse to wrath by a word and tame him by a whisper. Oh, Lavengro! no wonder that brave old father should say, with grave, but not dubious shake of the head, when endeavouring to fix on a calling for him, "I am afraid he will never make a churchman!" We shall see what he makes of himself.

Meanwhile, expeditions to ruined castles; expeditions to see that dear young soldier, the brother, who was posted in a yet more solitary station,—with episodic adventures (or what might have been so) with Jerry Grant, the outlaw, for whose head 100*l.* are offered, or his wrath; learning to ride; learning to shoe a horse, and other acquisitions of skill;—these filled up his time till the peace was fully established, and the "old tired soldier set himself down with his little family" in a fine old city, which we, as becomes us, recognise as our own native place—Norwich. We differ from Lavengro; instead of counting the view of the city from St. Leonard's Priory the best, commend us to that, at a little longer distance, from the hill above Bixley, whence now, not only may all the antique features in that "city in a garden" be seen, but the most distinguishing signs of its modern state also,—the huge yarn factories, and two railroads which lie just beneath you. We do not see "Lollard's Pit," it is true; but that is merely a name now,—a memory of times when this ancient city stood in the midst of a region where the true light shone most brightly, and men dared to die and—loftier aim!—to live for what Bilney, and Taylor, and a host of heroes whose names have perished, taught!

But how throve our autobiographer? After an interval of seeming aimlessness, during which, however, he gained French and Italian from an old tessara-glott grammar and an exiled non-jurant priest, whose patriotism (let us hope) made him rank Monsieur Boileau far before "Monsieur Dante;" went forth as a sportsman, and, with an old honeycombed musket, slaughtered endless strings of singing-birds; or, with rod and line in summer time, fished in the streams that almost begird the "good old town," and, musing upon the story of Earlham, (the Jarl's Homestead;) made a passing acquaintance with the late learned and eminent member of the Society of Friends, Joseph John Gurney; renewed most unexpectedly his acquaintance with his Rommany brother, whose tent he visited on Mosswood Heath, and found the leering boy transformed into the illustrious Mr. Jasper Petulengro, the Pharaoh of the Gipsies! from whom, greatly to the disgust of Mr. Petulengro's mother-in-law, one Mrs. Hearn, (a most unamiable middle-aged lady, who would fain have preserved the Roman people from the pollution of a gorgio's matriculation into its language and mysteries,) he learned the Gipsy tongue, and found it to be, not like "pedlar's French," or the "cant" of certain classes of society now-a-days, a mere hap-hazard, artificial "gibberish," but a regularly constituted and authentic language, one (Lavengro fancied) of the most ancient in the world. After a period so spent, he was bound with all legal forms and solemnities unto a lawyer of good repute in Norwich, to be instructed in the secrets of "glorious English law."

"By adopting the law, I had not ceased to be Lavengro," says our author, and true it was; instead of Blackstone, Davydd ap Gwilym, the Ovid of Wales, was now the favourite study, and then the Kampe Viser, the book of fine old Danish ballads, which an ancient couple, pleased with the courtesy of the young sprig of the law, had presented to him, thinking it to be a curiosity adapted to such a youth; next Schiller, his hierophant in this case being no refugee priest, but William Taylor, once almost the sole German scholar in England, and undoubtedly the parent of half the modern heresies charged upon the Eichorns and Pauluses of the Fotherland. Hebrew and Armenian followed, and by way of a counterpoise to all this weight of learning, "the noble art of self-defence," as it is technically called, was practised, not without effects at the time, nor subsequently, as will appear. Some of the scenes in "the Zincali" belong to this period, and the whole story of a battle for "the belt," in the neighbourhood of Norwich, the bruit of which continued through many years, even to our own time, is told here with a breadth, and accuracy, and graphic power, that makes us regret we cannot give it as a further example of our author's style. The elder brother, disappointed in his expectations of following the profession of arms, had devoted himself to painting, and this gives Mr. Borrow an opportunity of eulogising the Gainsborough of Norwich, Crome. And this first section of the autobiography ends with the death of the brave old father, which brings about a change in the writer's plans, the story of which, with that of the third period, we will tell in another paper.

It would be amusing, had we but the space, to relate an interview with a magistrate, who is sorely put to it between his official zeal for "justice," and his natural taste for a "mill," and who holds up to the young philologist Parr—"Greek Parr," be it well noted—and the Rev. Walter Whiter, who discovered that death was a disease, and who knew, says the worthy magistrate, some twenty languages, as patterns in what, we regret to observe, Lavengro needed no additional incentive to pursue—the "noble art." "Both can box." In violent contrast with all that relates to what we have given in this condensation, are expressions of concern about religious truth, expressions of harassing inquiry after truth upon sundry speculative points, which we may, perhaps, advert to in our second notice, when we will insert fuller specimens of the manner in which our author has told his tale.

THE readers of "SHARPE" will doubtless be pleased to find, that an old and valued contributor has gained the prize offered by the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals for the best exposition of their humane principles. It is indeed a very well written essay, highly honourable to the talent of the authoress.

Among those Societies, prompted by pure benevolence alone, which, almost overlooked by the public at large, pursue their quiet unostentatious course, and which derive their reward from the consciousness of the good they are doing to society, rather than by the noisy tribute of its approbation, that for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals is deserving of peculiar honour. Yet there is danger that its functions should be deemed almost superfluous, and its due support overlooked, in the midst of the momentous and stormy questions of reform and progress that agitate the community. The character of the age, it may be said, is changing; benevolence is becoming the order of the day, and exhibitions of cruelty excite a general feeling of indignation. But so long as the human heart remains what it is, so long as a sound moral education is wanting to the community, and many abuses to which custom has rendered us comparatively callous remain untouched, there is unhappily but too much room for the vigilance of such a Society as this.

Of the cruelties which have been formerly practised upon animals, and many of which indeed subsist to this day, the following is a miserable and humiliating exposure:—

"Examples of rapacity in procuring food can only be equalled by instances of the cruel manner in which it has been often prepared. Though a permission to use animal food was given, there was no licence to torture. And if superstition has instilled a reverence for animal life into the minds of the 'simple Brahmins of the East,' should not religion prevent its being wantonly or cruelly sacrificed by us,—should not humanity prescribe the most instantaneous and least painful mode of depriving the creatures of life, who are intended for food? But protracted suffering was considered to improve the flavour of many. Plutarch tells, that in his time it was customary to run red-hot spits through the bodies of swine, to render their flesh more tender. In more recent times, poor animals have been whipped and bled to death, and cramped and crammed and made wretched. There are receipts in some of the old cookery books which make one shudder; but though the cruelties recommended in them are not practised to such an extent as they were formerly, yet still there are barbarities in use which can scarcely be exceeded by any of them. Nothing can be more shocking than the mode in which the delicate Strasburg pie, so admired by our gourmards, is prepared.¹ Among our modern refinements, too, the system of fattening poor beasts till they become an unsightly spectacle, and a burthen to themselves, is a great cruelty.

"If man has abused the bounty of Providence as to his food, he has been no less cruel and selfish in many of those amusements in which he has taken especial delight. The barbarous sport of cock-fighting was introduced into England by the Romans. William Fitz-Stephen, in the reign of Henry the Second, describes cock-fighting as the pastime of schoolboys, on Shrove Tuesday, the schoolroom being made the arena, and the master the comptroller and director of the sport. Part of the site of Drury Lane Theatre was a cock-pit in the reign of James the First. The cock-pit at Whitehall was erected for the same sport by Charles the Second. Not many years since there was a cock-pit royal in St. James's Park. Many of the members of parliament were in the habit of attending the sport, and lost and won large sums in bets on the game. What scenes of brutality passed before them! The fine birds destined for the disgusting exhibition, disfigured for the occasion, their beautiful plumage cropped off, and their legs armed with artificial spurs;—and thus were they set on to the bloody conflict. The reward frequently bestowed for all his hard fighting, by the owner of the combatant who first gave up, was to wring off his head,—the poor mangled and bleeding creature seldom met with kinder treatment. Mr. Ardis, a celebrated cock-fighter, and a man of large fortune and great hospitality, and whose equipages are described as having been 'unequaled in splendour,' had a favourite cock—one 'who had won him many profitable matches;' but the last wager he had laid upon him, he had lost, which so enraged him that in a violent fit of passion he thrust the poor animal into the fire. His companions, who were in the parlour, were so scared by the cries of the bird, that they ran to the kitchen and interfered to save him; but his cruel master, foaming and trembling with fury, would not desist. His unbridled rage brought its own punishment. He was suddenly seized with brain fever, which carried him off in three days. Cowper has described the whole transaction in 'The Cock-fighters' Garland.' That was no solitary instance of fury towards one of the brute creatures bringing on a fatal attack of illness. Nothing is more common than for the cruel to vent their passion on a harmless, helpless animal. Doctor Moore, in describing the cruel hero¹ in his novel, makes him in his anger squeeze a pet bird to death in his hand.

(1) It is made of the livers of geese, which have been enlarged to an enormous degree by disease, brought on by an inhuman process. The miserable birds are kept before a hot fire, and crammed, sorely against their will, with meat, and deprived of water—at all times so necessary for their health and comfort, and now, in all the heat produced by the fire, and the unnatural food which they are forced to take, a thousand times more needed than ever.

Cockthrowing was, if possible, a more cruel sport than cockfighting, as the bird was rendered incapable of repelling the attack. He was tied to a stake, and assailed with sticks and other missiles, and most wantonly battered and bruised, till at length, worn out, with mangled flesh and broken bones, death put an end to his tortures. This diabolical sport is said to have been introduced into England to commemorate the detestation in which the French were then held,—the Latin word for the cock and Frenchman being the same; and so cruelty and animosity went hand in hand. Another account says, that the odious observance had its origin in the discovery of a conspiracy to expel the Danes from England. There was a plot laid to surprise the guards, and to seize the usurper, which was on the point of being put into execution, when the cocks, being disturbed by the sounds of preparation, commenced noisily fluttering their wings and crowing with all their might, till the Danes, roused from sleep, detected the conspirators. This took place on Shrove Tuesday, which day was ever after set apart for avenging the injury which the cocks had done. The constant exhibition of such cruelty had a most direful effect. It was remarked, that the men who were the most constant in their attendance at these sports, were noted for being tyrannical in their own families. Fathers trained their boys to the most cruel practices; if they evinced a spark of humanity towards the lower creatures, everything was done to extinguish it, and the more effectually to conquer what was considered an unpardonable weakness, they were taught to cut off the heads of poultry, and encouraged to worry dogs and cats, or whatever unlucky animal happened to fall in their way. Bull-fights were introduced into Spain about the year 1260, and abolished there, except for pious and patriotic purposes, in 1784. The great hold which such cruel exhibitions took on the populace is exemplified by the following extract from a letter of Howell's, from Madrid, dated August 10, 1623. 'There was a great show lately here, of baiting of bulls with men, for the entertainment of the prince. It is the chiefest of all Spanish sports; commonly there are men killed at it, therefore, there are priests appointed to be there ready to confess them. It hath happened oftentimes that a bull hath taken up two men upon his horns. As I am told, the pope hath sent divers bulls against the sport, yet it will not be left,—the nation hath taken such particular delight in it.' The perfect sang froid with which Howell mentions this, is not the least extraordinary part of the detail; he passes over the matter without one disapproving word. There was a bull-fight in Lisbon, at Campo de Santa Anna, attended by 10,000 spectators, so lately as Sunday, July 14, 1840."

(1) "Zeluco."

Here we must pause a moment to rectify the statement of the authoress. The bull-fight still continues to be the great amusement of all classes in Spain, and we are sorry to add from personal experience, is too often found to be as gratifying a spectacle to our own countrymen as it is to the natives themselves. We have heard the bull-fight thus described by Englishmen, not with the sang froid above alluded to, but in terms expressive of the most intense satisfaction.

It was but the other day that a project was in contemplation for importing the spectacle to Paris. From chasing the timid hare for sport, to the horrors of the bull-ring and the amphitheatre, is a natural and gradual transition, the root of the evil being the same in all,—a disposition to seek excitement at the expense of the suffering and helpless. It is surprising how soon a familiarity with such frightful but exciting spectacles produces a callousness to the sufferings by which they are attended.

Of this no better proof can be afforded than "was furnished by the reception given to a bill, brought into Parliament for the prevention of the barbarous sport of bull-baiting; it was so successfully opposed by some of England's enlightened statesmen, that the attempt to carry it through the house proved abortive, and it was twice thrown out. The tone of levity with which the publications of the day (1800 and 1802) spoke of the debate, was sufficiently indicative of the lamentable result of cruel customs; they describe the discussion as having 'afforded much entertainment, and being somewhat like the comic episodes which epic poets introduce into their serious compositions to relieve and enliven them.' That the tone of the debate should have justified such a notice, is a melancholy fact, which any one who refers to it will readily acknowledge. The prime minister, who was most strenuous in his opposition to the bill, did not hesitate to show how lightly he regarded the tortures inflicted on the poor beast, when he objected to the sufferings of the bull having been made the principal consideration in the construction of the bill,—its being a subject for discussion, he declared, was quite beneath the dignity of the house. That one venerated in public and beloved in private life should have been his warm supporter on the occasion, is a stronger argument against merciless practices than anything else, as showing how the finest feelings may become blunted when custom sanctions cruelty. Mr. Wilberforce and Mr. Sheridan pleaded the cause of outraged humanity with intense feeling and great eloquence. For many years the journals of the day occasionally touched on these cruel sports in strong terms, and sometimes detailed cases of peculiar barbarity. But, alas for human nature! the tendency to selfishness and cruelty could not be curbed by mere appeals to better feelings,—a more imperative restraint was necessary for the prevention of cruelty to animals: and mainly owing to the humanity and indefatigable zeal of a single individual, a bill was introduced in the year 1822, to prevent the improper treatment of cattle. After much opposition it passed, and went by the name of Mr. Martin's Act:—and thus in three words was the name of this humane man more distinguished than many a one which has been transmitted to marble in most elaborate effusions.

"The value of Mr. Martin's active humanity is greatly enhanced when it is considered that he had contended for those who could never thank him, and who must remain for ever unconscious of all that he had done for them; his reward was in having been foremost in the righteous cause, and in seeing that others became its champions. His bill passed the house where twenty years before the proposal to introduce such a one was scouted with heartless derision. The first act indeed passed; but how were its provisions to be enforced? There is a homely, but a very true saying, 'What is every body's business, is nobody's business;' and many might fail to interfere where wanton cruelty was perpetrated before their eyes, from sheer indolence or timidity, or from total ignorance of the steps that might be taken; but happily, a Society was formed, (in 1824,) which made it its business to prevent the statute from becoming a dead letter. It was composed, as found from the reports of the Society, of several benevolent individuals who deeply deplored the wanton barbarities then daily exhibited in every highway and public street, and who determined to unite in opposition to an evil so injurious to the animal creation, and so demoralising in its social effects. A committee was appointed, and measures adopted eminently calculated to promote the humane design:—the circulation of suitable tracts at low prices, or gratuitously, particularly among persons entrusted with cattle, such as coachmen, carters, and drovers: the introduction into schools of books calculated to impress on youth the duty of humanity towards the inferior animals; frequent appeals to the public through the press, awakening more general attention to a subject so interesting, though too much neglected; the periodical delivery of discourses from the pulpit; the employment of constables in markets and streets; and the prosecution of persons guilty of flagrant acts of cruelty, with publicity to the proceedings, and the announcement of their results.' And here it may be observed, that 'four thousand cases of aggravated cruelty have been prosecuted to conviction, since the Society commenced its operations,—a fact the more astounding when we bear in mind that Mr. Thomas, the Secretary to the Society, who is chiefly engaged in the prosecutions, is most careful that the law should only be put in force in cases of necessity, and never from wantonness or vindictive feeling; indeed the great object of the Society has been to effect a reformation by gentler means, and by exciting higher principles than those which arise from dread of penalty; but, undoubtedly, the vigilance of the officers employed by the Society has inspired a most salutary fear—not merely in shielding the animals from ill-treatment, but inducing habits of restraint in those who were too ready to wreak their ill-temper and impatience on the poor beasts, in acts of cruelty.

"Mr. Martin's Act was excellent as far as it went; but one more comprehensive was required, and a statute was enacted in the year 1835, which took all animals, whether of a domestic or wild kind, under its protection; it provided that 'any person wantonly beating or ill-treating any horse, ox, cow, ass, sheep, dog, or other animal, or improperly driving the same, whereby any mischief shall be done, shall, upon conviction, be fined or imprisoned, and that any person keeping or using any house, pit, or other place for baiting or fighting any bull, dog, or other animal, or for cock-fighting, shall be liable to a penalty of 5*l.* for every day he shall so keep and use the same."

It is in no small measure owing to the exertions of this Society, and the altered tone of feeling it has created, that instances of cruelty are become comparatively few,—for but too many are still perpetrated. Happily, however, they are no longer regarded with indifference, nor are those who seek to put an end to them any longer encountered with derision.

A case of the most atrocious cruelty was reported in the recent papers, in which it appears that no fewer than thirty-eight oxen have been put to the most extreme torture by the hands of their inhuman owner; but by the vigilance of the Society, the delinquent was prosecuted, and made to pay a fine for each of the mutilated beasts.

Many pleasing instances of the sagacity, and almost feeling, of animals are brought together by the authoress, forming a striking contrast to the dark catalogue of the wrongs inflicted on them by mankind.

"A vast number of anecdotes of the sympathy of the lower creatures towards each other, which shows a kindness of feeling beyond mere animal instinct, are on record. Southey mentions one very remarkable; he says,—'I know not whether there be any more interesting anecdote connected with the neighbourhood of Plymouth, than the story of a dog who daily carried food to an old blind mastiff, which lay in a thicket without the town, and regularly on Sundays conveyed him to his master's house to dinner, and as regularly afterwards escorted him back to his covert.' But our wonder and admiration is still more excited by the affection which many of the lower creatures have shown towards individuals of the human race, and the many proofs of sympathy with them which they give, and which may be a vestige of that which once subsisted among all living creatures. The instances of attachment which have been shown to man by birds and beasts would pass belief if they were not well authenticated. Pliny tells of a dog who could not be induced to leave the door of the prison where his master was confined, and remained howling by his dead body after his execution. A spectator threw him a morsel of meat, which he instantly took up, and laid to his master's mouth. The body was thrown into the Tiber; the poor dog plunged into the waters and swam after it, and in his endeavours to keep it above the waves, he sunk with it, to rise no more. The sympathy of a dog to one in sorrow is very remarkable; he has his own gentle manner of letting his master know that he enters into his feelings. We have known an instance, by no means an uncommon one, of a dog howling over the new-made grave of his master, and endeavouring to scrape away the earth with his paws; no coaxing could induce him to leave the spot, but when taken away by force he found means to steal back again to renew his lamentations, and he actually pined away to death. Were we to attempt to recount but one half of the various anecdotes which we have heard of the affection and fidelity of dogs, our Essay would become a panegyric on the admirable qualities of that animal. Imagination cannot paint a more touching picture of fidelity than that of the faithful dog leading his blind master from door to door, and never attempting to touch the scraps of food which charity vouchsafes till invited to partake of them by his owner. So great indeed is the fidelity of this wonderful animal, that he makes it a positive duty to serve and guard his master to the utmost extent of his power. It is common for a labouring man to leave his coat and bundle on the grass, with no other security for its safe keeping but the vigilance of his dog, who never abandons his trust till his master, who may have been working for the length of the day, two or three fields off, comes to claim it.

"Many other brutes have shown an attachment to a chosen individual—even birds, that have their habitations apart from man, and the range of the wide air, where he cannot accompany them, afford examples of those who have regarded him with great affection. Burton tells of a crane that never could be at rest away from a Spaniard to whom he had attached himself—he would never leave searching for him, and lamenting if he were absent, till he found him; and when business called him to another country, the poor bird fell from his food and died. Numerous other instances could be quoted, and some from our own observation. A horse has been known, when his rider has fallen from him into a river, to take hold with his teeth and drag him alive to land, by the skirt of his coat. Many striking examples of the sagacity, the memory, and the forethought of the lower creatures have been recorded by writers and lecturers, which may well aid the reflections awakened by the advocacy of their claims on our good will and protection—an advocacy the more impressive, as it never fails to put forward that 'the Hand that made them is divine.' A great number of these examples are of such a nature as to raise a very reasonable doubt of their powers being limited by instinct, however we may be willing to acknowledge that the actions which tend to self-preservation and the preservation of their offspring may be the result of instinct; yet it would appear that there are some which have been prompted by their own minds—thus, we see a dog, regardless of the great law of nature, the instinct implanted in every living thing—self-preservation, risking his life, nay, often losing it, to save his master. Even from what we know and remark of the brute creation, circumscribed as our observation may be and as our knowledge must be, we cannot but perceive that they possess faculties absolutely inexplicable to us who are not endowed with the like—the extraordinary accuracy with which they remember, and the precision with which they calculate, are powers utterly beyond our comprehension; a horse will halt at a house in a long street, where all the houses are exactly alike, where he has been once made to stop, and this regularly, every time he happens to pass the same way. Among many instances which we could mention, the following is remarkable:—Mr. Collins, who resided with his brother on Ormond Quay in Dublin, left for the United States, taking a favourite dog with him. He did not return for twelve years; on landing, he called his dog, who had been by his side on deck, but he was nowhere to be found. After spending some time in a vain search, he concluded that he had been picked up by some of the idlers who were about the vessel, and as he was much attached to him, he resolved to offer a reward for him next day. He walked on to his brother's house and knocked at the door; when he was let in, to his great astonishment and no slight pleasure, the first object that he saw in the hall was his dog, who gave him a most hearty welcome. The poor animal had hastened to the well-known abode, and watched his opportunity of slipping in when the door was opened; he advanced no further than the hall, where he awaited his master's arrival. Here was an extraordinary instance of memory, and it would appear of reasoning power,—As this is the house in which my master lived before we went away, it is here that he of course intends to come.

"Dogs know the regular time at which to expect their masters home; when they will go to watch for them; and this is proved to be from knowing the time, and not from their keenness of scent, as it has sometimes happened that their masters have been detained out far beyond their usual time. We have heard it stated that it was considered good for the animals at the Zoological Gardens to be left without food for one day in the week; Sunday was appointed for their fast-day, to leave it free for those who were employed about them during the week. In a very short time it was found that they became amenable to the rule. Though they were vociferous as the hour approached when they were to be fed, on every other day in the week, they remained perfectly quiet on the Sunday, never looking for their food. In our own family we had a dog who knew the rules of Sunday just as well; he attended such of the family as went out to walk on every day but Sunday, jumping and frisking before them, but he soon learned that he was not to accompany them on that day, (as they had to leave him at home when they were going to church,) and though testifying the greatest impatience at other times when he saw them prepared for a walk, on Sunday he settled himself to sleep and never attempted to follow them. At first he had of course been taught his lesson, but how he afterwards knew the exact time at which it was to be applied, who can divine? It has appeared from various anecdotes that dogs, cats, and other creatures have been known to observe so accurately, that they know the effects to be produced by certain actions. They have on occasions shown a degree of forethought and contrivance, of which Beattie takes notice in his 'Dissertation on Memory;' and to illustrate this he tells of a dog who was with his master when he was walking across the river Dee, which was frozen—the ice gave way, and the gentleman sunk in the middle of the river; he kept himself from being carried away by the current, by grasping his gun, which had fallen athwart the opening. After many unsuccessful efforts to extricate his master, the dog sped to a neighbouring village, and caught the first person he met by the skirt of his coat. The man was alarmed, and tried to disengage himself, 'but the dog regarded him with a look so kind and so significant, and endeavoured to pull him along with so gentle a violence, that he began to think there must be something extraordinary in the case, and suffered himself to be conducted by the animal, who brought him to his master in time to save his life.' What Beattie relates is not a solitary instance of human life being saved by the judicious measures of a dog. 'Was there not here,' Beattie adds, 'both memory and recollection guided by experience, and by what in a human creature we should not scruple to call good sense?'

THE DISMAL TALE.

ANOTHER of Stolhard's exquisite creations. A group are assembled around a winter fireside, and a story-teller is making their flesh creep by the narrative of some fearful tale of midnight murder or ghostly visitation. The charm of this composition lies in the contrast between the look of coziness and comfort, and the terror-stricken visages of the auditors.

The Card Players.—"This numerous and elegant society assembled every evening in the salon of one of these houses; the company grouped themselves round the card-tables, with the exception of two or three late comers, who, having arrived after the games had commenced, were exchanging a few words in an under tone by the chimney-piece, and of the young girls, who sat in silence behind their mothers, and whispered together as if they were in church or in their convents. An austere and religious silence presided in all the salons during these everlasting games of whist and reversi. The game, moderate as were the stakes, bowed all those heads, threw all those men and women into an almost grotesque state of meditation, which was only interrupted by short phrases, looks and gestures by turns radiant or despairing. The points were five sous, sometimes less; but man is a being so essentially impassioned that he throws passion into frivolities when he cannot throw it into great things. Besides, the evening play in these salons was a habit of the ancien régime, adhered to out of respect for the traditions of another epoch. Play had all the seriousness of a duty belonging to good society, a duty to be accomplished under penalty of being considered an ill-bred man or useless woman. The morning's religious ceremonies in the church were not imposed or followed with more solemnity. You were despised if you neglected it; esteemed and sought after if you excelled in it. I remember five or six men of the lowest grade of mediocrity, who were never mentioned but with extreme reverence, because people said, with more respect than they would have felt for a great artist, 'They play bostou and reversi in a superior manner.' You could very well live and die on that reputation."

The first Earl of Cork.—"The founder of the nobility of the Boyles, which was to spread so wide both in the Irish and in the English peccage, began his remarkable career under Elizabeth, and had even got fairly into the road to wealth and distinction before the end of her reign; but he of all men, both from the circumstances of his history and the character of his mind, must be classed with his latest, rather than with his earliest contemporaries. He owed little or nothing to the past; he was the sole maker of his own greatness; nor did he ever show a disposition to take either his rest or his stand even upon any vantage ground which his own efforts had gained, as if it had been the end of his ambition, or a possession which could not be taken from him; it was only a position from which he might advance to something higher. 'Forward' was the word with him to the last; forward, if need were, at any cost, and at any venture. It was the true spirit of movement and progress that animated him, not at all that of rapacious accumulation. No man had ever less of the narrow-souled timidity of the mere gatherer of wealth. The fine thing about him was that evidently at any time of his life, if he had been stripped of all he had in the world, he would not have given a moment to idle lamentation or regret, but would have instantly set to work to re-establish himself with as much activity and energy, and the same cheerfulness and hope as before. When, in his last days, this necessity actually threatened him, he looked it in the face as firmly as any man ever did. He was one of those strong, bright natures, in whom the mind never grows old, and life burns in age with as intense a flame as in youth. It is this unconquerable vitality that chiefly makes him interesting."—Craik's "Romance of the Peerage."

"The more I look on, the more I remain convinced, that a republic, noble form of government as it is, is the most difficult and most perilous of governments. It is of all governments that which requires at the hands of Providence the most favourable and the most exceptional circumstances, and at those of society itself the largest amount of unanimity, wisdom, and virtue."—Guizot: Preface to the "Life of Washington."

THE SCHOLAR'S BREECHES.

My son was lately obliged, under stress of weather, to put in at St. John's, in Newfoundland. He went to an inn, and glancing at a paper published at that place, he found the well-known anecdote of the Rev. Dr. Neander's having lectured to the students, minus his pantaloons, copied from the American journals. The anecdote is almost universally believed, even in Germany, which shows that it must have been in keeping. The pious, learned, firm, and gentle Dr. Neander, of Berlin, was indeed a most absent man; still, I am sorry I must spoil what to many no doubt appears a good joke. The facts of that famous story are these: Dr. Neander never paid the slightest attention to personal comfort or household affairs. His sister, who told me the story herself, provided for every thing. Among other things, she placed the articles he was to wear every day before his bed. Dr. Neander had never been known to have ordered any clothes; but one day the tailor met him and said, "Doctor, I think you ought to have a new pair of pantaloons." "Very well," replied the great man, and in due time the breeches made their appearance. They were placed, however, without the knowledge of the sister before his bed, and in the morning they served to encase the Doctor's legs. He went to the university building to lecture, and when his sister entered his room and found there the old pantaloons, she did indeed believe he had forgotten to put on any, and was, as might well be supposed, in despair. She went at once in a carriage to receive him the moment he should come out. Her anxiety during the time she waited there was extreme, and equally great was her joy and gratitude when she saw her brother, on whom she doted, leaving the large portal of that beautiful building, with breeches on like any other Christian. She herself had the heartiest laugh at her own anxiety, and told every one of it. The story was improved by making it a degree worse: and thus has travelled all over the European continent, passed to another hemisphere, and to a certainty will find its way into Indian and Australian papers, and ultimately into the foot-notes of some biography of that distinguished ornament of our times.

A BARONIAL HALL ABOUT THE TIME OF THE CIVIL WARS.¹

THE STORY OF RAGLAN CASTLE.

OF the many grey old castles with which the fair green fields of England are studded, few present greater claims to interest than RAGLAN. It is one of the most splendid monuments of that period, when the comforts of a baronial residence were grafted on the sterner features of the feudal fortress—an edifice at once luxurious and massive, and fitted alike for a stronghold in time of war, or a palace in time of peace. It is besides of great historical interest, as having afforded a refuge to the unhappy Charles I. at a period when his fortunes grew darker every day; and as being also the last fortress which held out in his cause. The final tenant of its splendid halls, before they were dismantled by the ruthless parliamentarians—the venerable Marquis of Worcester—was a characteristic specimen of the old cavalier, in all his noblest attributes. Memories of sorrow, self-devotion and loyalty such as these, confer a touching interest upon this picturesque old ruin, and they are admirably brought out in the publication which we propose to make the basis of the present article.

Raglan Castle is situated near the high-road from Monmouth to Abergavenny, in the midst of a luxuriant and well-wooded country; and in sight of the bold mountains of the Welsh frontier. Its most ancient portion dates from very early times; but it did not attain its highest state of magnificence until very near the stormy period of the civil wars, in which it was so soon afterwards destined to be reduced to ruin. It was then an extensive and splendid pile, giving shelter to some hundreds of inmates—a school of chivalry and gentle nurture. Its halls, now roofless and overgrown with ivy, then witnessed a gorgeous and picturesque form of baronial life, which can never return again; and the details of which, as ably gathered up by Dr. Beattie, will be read with curiosity and interest:—

"BARONIAL LIFE.—Of the expenses of a nobleman's family and household in the olden time, some idea may be formed by adverting to the facts adduced by writers of the day. In a letter from the Earl of Shrewsbury, who had the custody of Mary of Scotland, to the Marquis of Winchester and Sir Walter Mildmay, it is said—'May it please you to understand, that whereas I have had a certain ordinary allowance of wine, amongst other noblemen, for expenses in my household, without impost: the charges daily that I do now sustain, and have done all this year past, well known by reason of the Queen of Scots, are so great therein, as I am compelled to be now a suitor unto you, that you will please to have a friendly consideration, unto the necessity of my large expenses. Truly two tuns in a month have not hitherto sufficed ordinarily; besides that which is sacrificed at times for her bathings, and such like use; which seeing I cannot by any means conveniently diminish, my earnest trust and desire is, that you will now consider me with such larger proportions in this case, as shall seem good unto your friendly wisdoms, even as I shall think myself much beholden for the same. And so I commit you unto God. From Tetbury Castle, this 15 of January, 1569. Your assured friend to my power.—G. SHREWSBURY.'

"This passage,' Mr. Lodge observes, 'will serve to correct a vulgar error, relating to the consumption of wine in those days, which, instead of being less, appears to have been—at least in the houses of the great—even more considerable than that of the present time. The good people who tell us that Queen Elizabeth's maids of honour breakfasted on roast beef, generally add, that wine was then used in England as a medicine, for it was sold only by apothecaries. The latter assertion, though founded on a fact, seems to have led to a mistake in the former; for the word apothecary [from the Greek ἀποθήκη, a repositorium] is applicable to any shopkeeper, or warehouseman, and was probably once used in that general sense.' In the retinues and domestic attendance of the nobles of this period, everything proclaimed that the era of feudal authority and magnificence had departed. Accordingly, when the civil wars had commenced, no peer, however wealthy or high in rank, could drag after him a regiment, or even a company, of unwilling vassals to the field. On the contrary, the meanest hind was free to choose between king and parliament. Something, however, of the mere pomp of feudalism was still maintained in the domestic establishments of the nobility and wealthier gentry. 'The father of John Evelyn, when he was sheriff of the counties of Surrey and Sussex, had a hundred and sixteen servants, in liveries of green satin doublets, besides several gentlemen and persons of quality, who waited upon him, dressed in the same garb.'

"One of the largest, if not the very largest, of English establishments ever maintained by a subject, was that of the Lord Treasurer, the Earl of Dorset, heir of the Lord Buckhurst, and well-known poet of the court. It consisted of two hundred and twenty servants, besides workmen attached to the house, and others that were hired occasionally.

"The chief servants of the nobility—so they were called, but they were rather followers or clients—were still the younger sons of respectable, or even noble families, who attached themselves to the fortunes of a powerful patron, and served him either in court or military affairs, for which they were allowed separate retinues in men and horses, with gratuities in money, and promises of promotion. The progress of improvement that had banished minstrels, jugglers, and tumblers, from princely establishments, had naturally introduced the drama in their room; and, accordingly, we sometimes find a company of actors classed among the servants of the chief nobleman, as well as a family physician, or even a whole band. A steward, distinguished by a velvet jacket, and a gold chain about his neck, presided as marshal of the household, and next to him was the clerk of the kitchen. But these cumbersome appendages were daily lessening, as domestic comfort came to be better understood. This improvement, however, had commenced still earlier among those of less rank and pretension. All who had their fortune still to seek in the court, or in the army, and all who repaired to the metropolis in quest of pleasure, found, so early as the time of Elizabeth, that the bustle and the scramble of new and stirring times, made a numerous train of attendants an uncomfortable appendage. The gallant, and the courtier, therefore, like Sir John Falstaff, studied 'French thrift,' and contented himself with a single 'skirted page,' who walked behind him carrying his cloak and rapier.

"In consequence of the extravagant living introduced during this period, the spendthrift gentleman often sank into the serving-man, as we may see from the frequent recurrence of such a transformation in the old plays. When servants were out of place—as we learn from the same authentic pictures of the real life of the times—they sometimes repaired to St. Paul's Churchyard, the great place of public lounge, and there stood against the pillars, holding before them a written placard, stating their peculiar qualifications, and their desire of employment.

"But whatever retrenchment," observes the same author, 'might be making in the household expenditure by a diminished attendance, it was more than counterbalanced by an extravagance in dress, and personal ornament, that had now become an absolute frenzy.' It is said that King James almost daily figured in a new suit, a humour that soon became prevalent among his courtiers. Still more generally influential than his own example was that of his several handsome favourites, all of whom having been indebted for the royal favour merely to their personal attractions, spared no pains nor cost to give those natural advantages their full effect.

"When Buckingham was sent ambassador to France, to bring the Princess Henrietta to England, he provided for this important mission a suit of white uncut velvet and a cloak, both set all over with diamonds, valued at eighty thousand pounds, besides a feather made of great diamonds. His sword, girdle, hatband, and spurs, were also set thick with diamonds. Another suit which he prepared for the same occasion, was of purple satin, embroidered all over with pearls, and valued at twenty thousand pounds. In addition to these, he had twenty other dresses of great richness. As a throng of nobles and gentlemen attended him, we may conceive how their estates must have been impoverished by the purchase of chains of gold, ropes of pearl, and splendid dresses, befitting the retinue of such an ambassador. Even a court festival, of the time of James the First, must have made a perilous inroad upon a year's amount of the largest income. Thus, at the marriage of the Princess Elizabeth to the Palatine, Lady Wotton wore a gown profusely ornamented with embroidery, that cost fifty pounds a yard; and Lord Montague spent fifteen hundred pounds on the dresses of his two daughters, that they might be fit to appear at court on the same occasion. . . .

"Prodigality in feasting and riotous living soon became as conspicuous as extravagance with regard to dress: In proof whereof, we may mention the antesuppers of the epicurean Earl of Carlisle. Weldon informs us, that he gave a banquet to the French ambassador at Essex House, where fish of such huge size were served up, and which had been brought all the way from Russia, that no dishes in England could hold them, until several were made for the express purpose. The household expenditure of James the First was twice as much as that of his predecessor, amounting to a hundred thousand pounds annually.

"COUNTRY LIFE.—While such were the habits of the courtiers, the country aristocracy still followed that kind of life so much familiarized to our minds by the descriptions in the old songs and plays of 'the golden days of good Queen Bess.' The rural knight, or squire, inhabited a huge building—half house, half castle—crowded with servants in homespun blue coats, many of whom were only serviceable in filling up the blank spaces of the mansion; but as these had been born in his worship's service, it was held as a matter of course that they should live and die in it.

"The family rose at daybreak, and first of all assembled at prayers, which were read by the family chaplain. Then came breakfast; after which the master of the household and his sons got into their saddles, and went off to hunt the deer, followed by some score of mounted attendants; while the lady and her daughters superintended the dairy, or the buttery, prescribed the day's task for the spinning-wheels, dealt out bread and meat at the gate to the poor, and concocted all manner of simples for the sick and infirm of the village. If leisure still remained, the making of confections and preserves was a never-failing resource; independently of spinning and sewing, or perhaps embroidering some battle or hunting piece, which had been commenced by the housewives of a preceding generation.'

"At noon dinner was served up in the Great Hall, the walls of which were plentifully adorned with stags' horns, casques, antique brands, and calivers. The noisy dinner-bell, that sent the note of warning over the country, gave also a universal invitation and welcome to the hospitable board; and after dinner sack, or home-brewed 'October,' occupied the time until sunset, when the hour of retiring to rest was at hand.

"Such was the ordinary history of a day in the country mansion. When the weather prevented outdoor recreation or employment, the family library, containing some six or eight tomes, that had perhaps issued from the press of Caxton, or Wynkyn de Worde, was in requisition; and, if the members of the family could read, they might while away the hours in perusing these volumes for the twentieth time. In this fashion, they derived their knowledge of religion from the Bible, and the 'Practice of Piety;' their Protestantism and horror of Popery from 'Fox's Acts and Monuments; their chivalrous lore from 'Froisart's Chronicle,' or, perchance, the 'Merry Gestes of Robin Hood;' their historical erudition from 'Hall' or 'Hollingshed;' and their morality and sentiments from 'the Seven Wise Masters,' or the 'Seven Champions of Christendom.'

"HOLIDAYS.—In such a state of life the set holidays were glorious eras; the anticipation, the enjoyment, the remembrance of a single Christmas or birthday, furnished matter for a whole month of happiness. On such an occasion the lord of the manor was more than a king, as he proceeded with his family through the crowds of assembled peasants, to witness their games of merriment, and feats of agility or strength; for his smile inspired the competitors with double strength or swiftness; while the prize acquired a tenfold value because it was he who bestowed it. At evening, his bounty was expressed by oxen roasted whole, and punchcons of mighty ale, with which he feasted the crowd; while his house was thrown open to the throng of his more immediate acquaintances and dependents. After the feast, his hall was cleared for dancing; three fiddlers and a piper struck up; and as the 'mirth and fun grew fast and furious,' the strong oaken floor was battered and ploughed in all directions by the hobnailed shoes of those who danced with all their might, and with all their hearts.

"Such was the life of an old country gentleman when James succeeded to the crown of England. But these habits, the last relics of the simplicity of the olden times, did not long survive that event. Tidings of the gay doings at court, and the wonderful good fortune of the royal favourites, reached the ears of the aristocratic rustics; and from that moment rural occupations and village maypoles lost their charm. The young were impatient to repair to the metropolis; and the old were obliged to yield to the prevailing fashion. With all the fierce impetuosity of novices, rural esquires, and well-dowered country widows, rushed into the pleasures and excesses of a town life; and thus, with a rapidity hitherto unknown in England, and at which moralists became giddy, ancient manners were soon abandoned; fortunes, that had accumulated for generations, vanished; the hereditary estates of centuries became the property of men of yesterday; and the time-honoured names of some of the most ancient families disappeared from the scroll of English heraldry, and soon ceased to be remembered.

"When Charles came to the throne, the coldness of his character and his decorous habits discountenanced those coarse and profligate excesses; and the courtiers endeavoured to conform to something like the rules of external decency. A general sobriety of demeanour succeeded.' But, as the stern ascetic Puritans grew into power, and advanced to the destruction of the monarchy with prayer and fasting, the court party soon became eager to distinguish themselves by an entirely opposite behaviour. All the excesses of the former reign were resumed; and Charles found himself unable to restrain, or even to rebuke, his adherents, who swore, drank, brawled, and intrigued, to show their hatred of the enemy, and their devotedness to the royal cause.'

"LIFE AT RAGLAN.—Down to this eventful period, the castellated mansion of Raglan had continued to bask in the sunshine of prosperity. Its halls were frequented by the élite of rank and station, and by many of that intellectual aristocracy whose genius threw so much lustre upon that and the preceding reign. The Earl, whose revenues were princely, lived in a style becoming the representative of an illustrious race; and while he observed great state, and gave sumptuous banquets to the magnates of the land, he did not neglect the humble votaries of the Muse."

Such was the gaiety and splendour of Raglan when interrupted by the civil wars, which converted every nobleman's house into a fortress, and reduced so many to the state of ruin in which we now behold them. As the civil commotions increased the venerable Marquis of Worcester fortified his baronial castle, and received his sovereign with the greatest magnificence. He had already expended an immense sum upon raising and equipping a regiment, which was shortly afterwards broken up, and such was his unbounded liberality "that the King, fearing lest the garrison stores should become exhausted by his numerous suite, offered to invest him with powers to exact supplies from the neighbouring county." But, with great magnanimity, Worcester replied, "I humbly thank your Majesty, but my castle would not long stand if it leant upon the country. I had rather myself be brought to a morsel of bread than see one morsel wrung from the poor to entertain your Majesty."

The fugitive Charles was, indeed, right royally treated at Raglan; but this could not gild over the intense bitterness of his position, dependent as he was upon the voluntary contributions of his adherents. But nothing could be deeper, more chivalrous than their devotion. The old Marquis seems to have foreseen the ruin brought upon his house by embracing the fortunes of his royal master, but he shrunk not from the surrender. When the king last entered the gates of Raglan, the Marquis delivered his Majesty the keys, according to the ordinary custom, the king restoring them to the Marquis: the Marquis said,— "I beseech your Majesty to keep them, and you please, for they are in a good hand, but I am afraid that ere it be long, I shall be forced to deliver them into the hands of those who will spoil the compliment." And so it happened. But never perhaps was there a more devoted instance of loyal affection than the following, which soothed the retirement of the fallen monarch during his stay beneath the Marquis's roof:—

"The reverend individual, whom his own act has immortalized, was Thomas Swift, incumbent of the neighbouring parish of Goodrich. Fully aware of the King's pecuniary distress, he mortgaged his estate; and with the money thus raised he proceeded to Raglan Castle. The Governor with whom he was personally acquainted, asked the object of his visit, and whether he could serve him; for he was equally esteemed as a zealous pastor, and a staunch royalist. 'I am only come,' said he, 'to give his Majesty my coat;' and, in taking it off, the Marquess pleasantly observed: 'Thy coat, I fear me, is of little worth.' 'Why then,' said Swift, 'take my waistcoat also.' And here was the hidden treasure, for, on being ripped up, it was found to contain three hundred broad gold pieces. 'And the King,' says Lord Clarendon, 'received no relief that was more seasonable and acceptable than this during the war.' Mr. Swift's zeal and activity in the royal cause exposed him to much danger and many sufferings. 'He was plundered,' says Heath, more than thirty times by the Parliament's army, and ejected from his church living. His estate was sequestered, and he himself thrown into prison."

Charles now left Raglan for a while, but only to return to it after the fatal battle of Naseby. Only five days before this he had written to the Queen that "his affairs were never in so fair and hopeful a way," on the sixth he was a fugitive. Flying by Leicester and Bewdley to Hereford, he made his way to Abergavenny, where he met the Commissioners—persons of large influence in the county—who professed that that they should shortly be able to raise him another force. Thence he went for the last time to Raglan Castle, to await, in a state of devouring anxiety and growing melancholy the further issue of the unhappy struggle. There he was again received with the deepest devotion by the gallant and devoted Marquis.

"At Raglan, however, says the historian, 'the King, as on his former visit, passed days and weeks in sports and ceremonies, in hunting and audience-giving;' for every effort was employed by those around him to obliterate all recollections of the past by promises and predictions of a brilliant future. When his majesty re-entered the gates of Raglan—which was indeed a harbour of refuge in his distress—the loyal Marquess, kneeling down, kissed his Liege's hand; and then rising up saluted him with this compliment—'Domine! non sum dignus.' To which the King replied—'My Lord, I may very well answer you again: I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel. No man would trust me with so much money as you have done.' To which the Marquess replied—'I hope your Majesty will prove a defender of the Faith.'" His Lordship was a Catholic.

"At Raglan the King 'stayed until news came that Fairfax, after taking Leicester, had marched into the west, and defeated Goring's troops at Lampport; at the same time that the Scottish army, on its march, had taken a small garrison between Hereford and Worcester by storm, and put all within it to the sword;' while Prince Rupert sent for all those foot, which were levied towards a new army to supply the garrison. But the expectations, which had been industriously fostered in the King's mind of a more propitious fortune, became every day more faint. Of all the schemes that had been set afoot for retrieving his past errors, and regaining the hearts of his alienated subjects, not one was permitted to prosper. And as a fatal climax to his unhappy fortunes, 'it was at Raglan Castle,' says Lord Clarendon, 'that the King received the terrible information of the surrender of Bristol (September 11, 1645), which he so little apprehended, that if the evidence thereof had not been unquestionable, it could not have been believed. With what indignation and dejection of mind the King received this advertisement, needs no other description and enlargement than the setting down in the very words of it the letter which the King writ thereupon to Prince Rupert; which, considering the unspeakable indulgence his Majesty had ever showed towards that Prince, is sufficient evidence how highly he was incensed by that act, which yet he took some time sadly to think of and consider, before he would allow himself to abate so much of his natural candour towards him. As soon as he received that surprising intelligence, the King removed from Raglan Castle.

"The King took leave of Raglan Castle on the 15th of September, mournfully observing to the Marquess, that by so doing he hoped 'to ease his lordship of a heavy burden.' His Majesty then thanked his noble and devoted host for the large sums of money which had been advanced to him in the course of his troubles. Whereupon the Marquess replied: 'Sire, I had your word for the money; but I never thought to have been so soon repaid; for now that you have given me thanks, I have all I looked for.' Well might the royal guest have expressed his feelings on quitting Raglan in the following lines taken from his own 'Collection':—

" ' I fall ! I fall !
Whom shall I call ?
Alas ! can he be heard,
Who now is neither loved nor feared ?
You, who were wont to kisse the ground,
Where'er my honour'd steps were found,
Come, catch me at my last rebound !
How each admires
Heaven's twinkling fires,
When from their glorious seat
Their influence gives life and heat !
But, oh ! how few there are—
Tho' danger from that act be far—
Will stoop and catch a falling star.'

" ' Distracted with a thousand griefs, and accompanied by a few trusty and disconsolate servants, the royal victim wandered about the country, thankful to accept protection from any one who had fortune or inclination to minister to his distress. And many "cruel days," to use his own words, were spent in weary marchings without food, narrow escapes, and precipitate retreats, before he took his last farewell of the land of Gwent.'

"On one occasion he was hotly pursued in his retreat through Shire Newton, by a party of sixty Round-heads; but reaching a place called Charleston Rock, near the New passage, a fishing-boat was found, in which he was safely ferried over the Severn into Gloucestershire. His pursuers coming up in the meanwhile, but only to find their object defeated, seized upon the remaining boats, and with drawn swords compelled the fishermen to ferry them across. They hurried into the boats, and, with the royal fugitive still in view, made all haste to be once more on his traces. The poor fishermen, however, being royalists at heart, had no sympathy with these king-hunters; but rowing lustily towards a reef of rocks called the 'English Stones,' within a gun-shot of the Gloucester shore, there hauled in their oars; and landing their freight on the rocks, told them the water was so shallow that the boats could go no further, and they might easily wade to the opposite bank. And such, in fact, was quite practicable at low water; but, in the present instance, the tide flowed so rapidly, that in making the attempt to reach the opposite bank the whole party were drowned."

Scarcely had the royal fugitive departed than the stout old cavalier was called upon to fill up the measure of his devotion by standing a siege by the forces of Fairfax. The defence was long and obstinate, and, although it was evident that the place must finally surrender, the Marquis maintained to the last a merry heart, and a cheerful countenance. He was a dear lover of a joke, and could joke under the most desperate circumstances.

"One evening, during the hottest period of the cannonade," says Dr. Bayly, "there came a musket bullet in at the window of the withdrawing room, where my lord used to entertain his friends with his pleasant discourses after dinners and suppers, which, glancing upon a little marble pillar of the window, and from thence hit the Marquess upon the side of his head, and fell down flattened upon the table, which breaking the pillar in pieces, it made such a noise in the room, that his daughter-in-law, the Countess of Glamorgan, who stood in the same window, ran away as if the house had been falling down upon her head, crying out—'O Lord! O Lord!' But at length finding herself more afraid than hurt, she returned back again, no less excusing her—as she was pleased to call it—rudeness to her father, than acknowledging her fears to all the company. To whom the Marquess said: 'Daughter, you had reason to run away when your father was knocked on the head.' Then pausing some little while, and turning the flattened bullet round with his finger, he further said: 'Gentlemen, those who had a mind to flatter me, were wont to tell me that I had a good head in my younger days; but if I don't flatter myself, I think I have a good head-piece in my old age, or else it would not have been musket proof.'"

At last, further resistance being hopeless, Raglan was surrendered, Fairfax marched in with his troops, and the castle was dismantled. The ruin of the devoted Marquis of Worcester was now complete.

"The loss sustained by the family in the immediate destruction of the castle and woods, according to the printed statement, was computed at one hundred thousand pounds; besides enormous sums furnished to his Majesty for the raising and equipment of two armies, and the maintenance of a numerous garrison, of which the daily expenses alone must have required a princely revenue. With this evidence of the Marquess's resources, it is not surprising that he should be described by Clarendon as 'the most moneyed man of the kingdom.' The siege was followed by the sequestration and sale of the whole estate, which, by the parliamentary audit of 1646, amounted to twenty thousand pounds per annum, and remained in the hands of Cromwell till the Restoration, a period of fourteen years. All the old timber in the parks adjacent was cut down and sold; the lead was stript from the roof of the great hall, and sold for six thousand pounds; and a quantity of the timber was carried to Bristol, and there used in rebuilding the wooden houses upon the old bridge, which had recently been destroyed by fire. But the loss of the library was in every sense a national loss, for in this, among many rare invaluable manuscripts, were the archives of Gwent, with the earliest records of Welsh literature. 'One of these manuscripts,' says the late Mr. Thomas, 'was an interesting work by Geraint Bardd Glass y Cadair, an illustrious Welshman, who flourished about the ninth century. He was the first who composed a Welsh grammar, a work that was revised by Einion and Edeyrn, which form and arrangement are now extant; but the original MS. was in the Raglan library at its capitulation.'

"In his palmy days, long before he was created Marquess, the good Earl lived in princely state in this Castle. Surrounded by faithful friends, numerous retainers, and a household that, by its daily expenditure, bespoke almost unlimited resources, he enjoyed in age all the happiness to which men look forward as the reward and solace of a virtuous youth; for, though long practised in the offices of Court, he could still relish the sweets of domestic retirement, the humanizing influence of science, and the conversation of pious and learned men. He was a friend of literature, a pattern of religious consistency, an example of loyalty which no reverses could shake; and when at last plunged into the deepest adversity, stript of his property, bent down with years, and suffering from bodily pain, he maintained a degree of mental serenity that softened the remembrance of his wrongs, showed the true foundation of his faith, and enabled him to view every dispensation of good or evil as coming from God, and intended, by weaning his thoughts from this world, to give him nearer and clearer views of heaven. Reduced in four short years from the height of prosperity into the very abyss of adversity—his home desolate, the prospects of his family blasted, his friends hopeless or in prison, himself an inmate of the Tower—it is impossible to withhold our sympathy from a man who, in no circumstances, forgot the true nobility of his nature, and the obligations of his creed; but in every trial could exclaim, in the words of his own motto—Mutare vel timere sperno."

In conclusion, we cannot but thank Dr. Beattie for the research which has placed before us so vivid a picture of the period of the civil wars. No writer on the subject has so industriously collected or graphically put together the materials scattered through many volumes. We may add that the descriptive and illustrative portions of this work are careful and conscientious. To those who love to linger (and who does not?)—among the crumbling memorials of other men and other times, who find a charm in wandering about spots haunted by the memory of the great and gallant of old, there are few places so full of romance as RAGLAN. To those who are able to pay it a visit, Dr. Beattie's descriptions form the best vademecum we are acquainted with, while to those who are compelled to be fire-side travellers, they offer what is the next best thing—a complete and graphic picture of the place and its associations.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THO^s. MORE.¹

NATA, CHELSEIE INCEPTVS.

HEARDE mother say to Barbara, “Be sure the sirloin is well basted for y^e king's physician;” which advised me that Dr. Linaere was expected. In truth, he returned with father in y^e barge; and they tooke a turn on y^e river bank before sitting down to table; I noted them from my lattice; and anon, father, beckoning me, cries “Child, bring out my favourite Treatyse on Fysshynge, printed by Wynkyu de Worde; I must give the doctor my loved passage.”

Joyning 'em with y^e book, I found father telling him of y^e roach, dace, chub, barbel, etc. we oft catch opposite y^e church; and hastilie turning over y^e leaves, he beginneth with unction to read y^e passage ensuing, which I love to y^e full as much as he:—

He observeth, if the angler's sport shoulde fail him, “he at y^e best hath his holsons walk and mery at his ease, a swete ayre of the swete savour of y^e meade of flowers, that maketh him hungry; he heareth the melodious harmonic of fowles, he seeth y^e young swans, herons, ducks, cotes, and manie other fowles, with their broods, which me seemeth better than alle y^e noise of hounds, fauknors, and fowlers can make. And if the anglers take fysshie, then there is noe man merrier than he is in his spryte.” And, “Ye shall not use this forsaid crafty disporte for no covetyssnesse in the encreasing and sparing of your money onlie, but princypallie for your solace, and to cause the health of your bodie, and speciallie of your soule, for when ye purpose to goe on your disportes of fysshynge, ye will not desire greatlie manie persons with you, which woulde lett you of your game. And thenne ye may serve God devoutlie, in saying affectuouslie your customable prayer; and thus doing, ye shall eschew and voyd manie vices.”

thresholde; “for my part I will fish none, save and except for pickled oysters.”

“In the regions below,” answers father; and then laughingly tells Linaere of his firste dialogue with Erasmus, who had bene feasting in my Lord Mayor's cellar:—“‘Whence come you?’ ‘From below.’ ‘What were they about there?’ ‘Eating live oysters, and drinking out of leather jacks.’ ‘Either you are Erasmus,’ etc. ‘Either you are More or nothing.’”

“Neither more nor less,” you should have rejoyned!” sayth the doctor.

“How I wish I had,” says father; “don't torment me with a jest I might have made and did not make; speciallie to put downe Erasmus.”

“Concedo nulli,” sayth Erasmus

“Why are you so lazy?” asks Linaere; “I am sure you can speak English if you will.”

“Soe far from it,” sayth Erasmus, “that I made my incapacie an excuse for declining an English rectory. Albeit, you know how Wareham requited me; saying, in his kind, generous way, I served the Church more by my pen than I coulde by preaching sermons in a countrie village.”

Sayth Linaere, “The archbishop hath made another remark, as much to y^e import: to wit, that he has received from you the immortalitie which emperors and kings cannot bestow.”

“They cannot even bid a smoking sirloin retain its heat an hour after it hath left the fire,” sayth father. “Tilly-vally! as my good Alice says,—let us remember the universal doom, ‘fruges consumere nati,’ and philosophize over our ale and bracket.”

“Not Cambridge ale, neither,” sayth Erasmus.

“Will you never forget that unlucky beverage?” sayth father. “Why, man, think how manie poore scholars there be, that content themselves, as I have hearde one of St. John's declare, with a penny piece of beef amongst four, stewed into pottage with a little salt and oatmeal; and that after fasting from four o'clock in the morning! Say grace for us this daye, Erasmus, with good cheer.”

At table, discourse flowed soe thicke and faste that I mighte aim in vayn to chronicle it—and why should I? dwelling as I doe at y^e fountayn head? Onlie that I find pleasure, alreadie, in glaucing over the foregoing pages whensoever they concern father and Erasmus, and wish they were more faithfullie recalled and better writ. One thing sticks by me,—a funny reply of father's to a man who owed him money and who put him off with “Memento Morieris.” “I bid you,” retorted father, “Memento Mori Æris, and I wish you woulde take as good care to provide for y^e one as I do for the other.”

Linaere laughed much at this, and sayd,—“That was real wit; a spark struck at the moment; and with noe ill-nature in it, for I am sure your debtor coulde not help laughing.”

“Not he,” quoth Erasmus. “More's drollerie is like that of a young gentlewoman of his name, which shines without burning,” . . . and, oddlie enow, he looked across at me. I am sure he meant Bess.

(1) Continued from p. 167.

Father brought home a strange guest to-daye,— a converted Jew, with grizzlie beard, furred gown, and eyes that shone like lamps lit in dark cavernes. He had beene to Benmarine and Tremeçen, to y^e Holie Citie and to Damascus, to Urmia and Assyria, and I think alle over y^e knowne world; and tolde us manie strange tales, one hardlie knew how to believe; as, for example, of a sea-coast tribe, called y^e Balouches, who live on fish and build their dwellings of the bones. Also, of a race of his countriemen beyond Euphrates who believe in Christ, but know nothing of y^e Pope; and of whom were y^e Magians y^t followed y^e Star. This agreeth not with our legend. He averred that, though soe far apart from their brethren, their speech was y^e same, and even their songs; and he sang or chaunted one which he sayd was common among y^e Jews alle over y^e world, and had beene soe ever since their citie was ruinated and y^e people captivated, and yet it was never sett down by note. Erasmus, who knows little or nought of Hebrew, listened to y^e words with curiositie, and made him repeate them twice or thrice: and though I know not y^e character, it seemed to me they sounded thus:—

Adir Hu yivne bethcha beccaro,
El, b'ne; El, b'ne; El, b'ne;
Bethcha beccaro.

Though Christianish, he woulde not eat pig's face; and sayd swine's flesh was forbidden by y^e Hebrew law for its unwholesomenesse in hot countries and hot weather, rather than by way of arbitrarie prohibition. Daisy took a great dislike to this man, and woulde not sit next him.

In the hay-field alle y^e evening. Swathed father in a hay-ropc, and made him pay y^e fine, which he pretended to resist. Cecy was just about to cast one round Erasmus, when her heart failed and she ran away, colouring to y^e eyes. He sayd, he never saw such pretty shame. Father reclining on y^e hay, with his head on my lap and his eyes shut, Bess asked if he were asleep. He made answer, "Yes, and dreaming." I askt, "Of what?" "Of a far-off future daye, Meg; when thou and I shall looke back on this hour, and this hay-field, and my head on thy lap."

"Nay, but what a stupid dream, Mr. More," says mother. "Why, what woulde you dreame of, Mrs. Alice?" "Forsooth, if I dreamed at alle, when I was wide awake, it shoulde be of being Lord Chancellor at y^e leaste." "Well, wife, I forgive thee for not saying at the most. Lord Chancellor quotha! And you woulde be Dame Alice, I trow, and ride in a whircote, and keep a Spanish jennet, and a couple of greyhounds, and wear a train before and behind, and carry a jersfalcon on your fist." "On my wrist." "No, that's not such a pretty word as t'other! Go to, go!"

Straying from y^e others, to a remote corner of the meadow, or ever I was aware, I came close upon Gammer Gurney, holding somewhat with much care. "Give ye good den, Mistress Meg," quoth she, "I cannot abear to rob y^e birds of their nests; but I knows you and yours be kind to dumb creatures, soe here's a nest o' young owzels for yo—and I can't call 'em dumb nowther, for they'll sing bravelio some o' these days." "How hast fared, of late, Gammer?" quoth I. "Why, well enow for such as I," she made answer; "since I lost y^e use o' my right hand, I can nowther spin, nor nurse sick folk, but I pulls rushes, and that brings me a few pence, and I be a good herbalist; and, because I says one or two English prayers and hates y^e priests, some folks thinks me a witch." "But why dost hate y^e priests?" quoth I. "Never you mind," she gave answer, "I've reasons manie; and for my English prayers, they were taught me by a gentleman I nursed, that's now a saint in heaven, along with poor Joan."

And soe she hobbled off, and I felt kindlie towards her, I scarce knew why—perhaps because she spake soe lovingly of her dead sister, and because of that sister's name. My mother's name was Joan.

Erasmus is gone. His last saying to father was, "They will have you at court yet;" and father's answer, "When Plato's year comes round."

To me he gave a copy, how precious! of his Testament. "You are an elegant Latinist, Margaret," he was pleased to say, "but, if you woulde drink deeplie of y^e well-springs of wisdom, applie to Greek. The Latins have onlie shallow rivulets; the Greeks, copious rivers, running over sands of gold. Read Plato; he wrote on marble, with a diamond; but above alle, read y^e New Testament. 'Tis the key to the kingdom of heaven."

To Mr. Gunnel, he said smiling, "Have a care of thyself, dear Gonellus, and take a little wine for thy stomach's sake. The wages of most scholars now-a-days, are weak eyes, ill-health, an empty purse, and shorte commons. I neede only bid thee beware of the two first."

To Bess, "Farewell, Bessy; thank you for mending my bad Latin. When I write to you, I will be sure to signe myselfe 'Roterodamius.' Farewell, sweete Cecil; let me always continue your 'desired amiable.' And you, Jacky,—love your book a little more."

"Jack's deare mother, not content with her girls," sayth father, "was alwaies wishing for a boy, and at last she had one that means to remain a boy alle his life."

"The Dutch schoolmasters thoughte me dulle and heavie," sayth Erasmus, "soe there is some hope of Jacky yet." And soe, stepped into y^e barge, which we watched to Chelsea Reach. How dulle the house has beene ever since! Rupert and William have had me into y^e pavillion to hear y^e plot of a miracle-play they have alreadie begonne to talke over for Christmasse, but it seemed to me downrighte rubbish. Father sleeps in town to-nighte, soe we shall be stupid enow. Bessy hath undertaken to work father a slipper for his tender foot; and is happie, tracing for y^e pattern our three noor-cocks and colts; but I am idle and tiresome.

If I had paper, I woulde beginne my projected opus; but I dare not ask Gunnel for anie more just yet; nor have anie money to buy some. I wish I had a couple of angels.* I think I shall write to father for them to-morrow; he alwaies likes to heare from us if he is twenty-four hours absent, providing we conclude not with "I have nothiing more to say."

I have writ my letter to father. I almoste wish, now, that I had not sent it.

Rupert and Will still full of theire moralitie, which reallie has some fun in it. To ridicule y^e extravagance of those who, as the saying is, carry their farms and fields on their backs, William proposes to come in, all verdant, with a reall model of a farm on his back and a windmill on his head.

How sweete, how gracious an answer from father! John Harris has brought me with it y^e two angels; less prized than this epistle.

July 10.

Sixteenth birthdaye. Father away, which made it sadde. Mother gave me a payr of blue hosen with silk clocks; Mr. Gunnel, an ivorie handled stylus; Bess, a bodkin for my hair; Daisy a book-mark; Mercy, a saffron cake; Jack, a basket; and Cecil, a nosegay. William's present was fayrest of alle, but I am hurte with him and myselfe; for he offered it soe queerlie and tagged it with such . . . I refused it, and there's an end. 'Twas unmannerlie and unkinde of me, and I've cried aboute it since.

Father alwaies gives us a birthdaye treat; soe, contrived that mother shoulde take us to see my Lord Cardinal of York goe to Westminster in state. We had a merric water-party; got goode places and saw the show; crosse-bearers, pillar-bearers, ushers and alle. Himselfe in crimson engrayned sattin, and tippet of sables, with an orange in his hand helde to 's nose, as though y^e common ayr were too vile to breathe. What a pompous priest it is! The archbishop mighte well say, "That man is drunk with too much propretie."

Betweene dinner and supper, we had a fine skirmish in y^e straits of Thermopylæ. Mr Gunnel headed the Persians, and Will was Leonidas, with a swashing buckler, and a helmet a yard high; but Mr. Gunnel gave him such a rap on the crest that it went over y^e wall; soe then William thought there was nothing left for him but to die. Howbeit, as he had bene layd low sooner than he had reckoned on, he prolonged his last agonies a goode deal, and gave one of y^e Persians a tremendous kick just as they were aboute to rifle his pouch. They therefore thoughte there must be somewhat in it they shoulde like to see; soe, helde him down in spite of his hitting righte and lefte, and pulled therefrom, among sundrie lesser matters, a carnation knot of mine. Poor varlet, I wish he would not be so stupid. . . .

After supper, mother proposed a concert; and we were alle singing a rounde. when, looking up, I saw father standing in y^e door-way, with such a happy smile on his face! He was close behind Rupert and Daisy, who were singing from y^e same book, and advertised them of his coming by gentlie knocking their heads together; but I had the firste kiss, even before mother, because of my birthdaye.

It turns out that father's lateness yester-even was caused by press of businesse; a forayn mission having bene proposed to him, which he resisted as long as he could, but was at lengthe reluctantrie induced to accept. Length of his stay uncertayn, which casts a gloom on alle; but there is soe much to doe as to leave little time to think, and father is busiest of alle; yet hath founde leisure to concert with mother for us a journey into y^e countrie, which will occupy some of y^e weeks of his absence. I am full of carefulle thoughts and forebodings, being naturallie of too anxious a disposition. Oh, let me caste alle my cares on another! Fecisti nos ad te, Domine; et iniquitum est cor nostrum, donec requiescat in te.

'Tis soe manie months agone since that I made an entry in my libellus, as that my motto—"nulla dies sine linca—," hath somewhat of sarcasm in it. How manie things doe I beginne and leave unfinished! and yet, less from caprice than lack of strength; like him of whom y^e scripture was writ,—“this man beganne to build and was not able to finish.” My opus, for instance; the which my father's prolonged absence in y^e autumn and my winter visitt to aunt Nan and aunt Fan gave me such leisure to carrie forward. But alack! leisure was less to seeke than learninge; and when I came back to mine olde taskes, leisure was awanting too; and then, by reason of my sleeping in a separate chamber, I was enabled to steale hours from y^e earlie morn and hours from y^e night, and, like unto Solomon's virtuous woman, my candle went not out. But 'twas not to purpose y^e I worked, like y^e virtuous woman, for I was following a Jack-o-lantern; having forsooke y^e straight path laid downe by Erasmus for a foolish path of mine owne; and soe I toyled, and blundered, and puzzled, and was mazed; and then came on that payn in my head. Father sayd, "What makes Meg soe pale!" and I sayd not; and, at y^e last, I tolde mother there was somewhat throbbing and twisting in y^e back of mine head like unto a little worm that woulde not die; and she made answer, "Ah, a maggot," and soe by her scoff I was shamed. Then I gave over mine opus, but y^e payn did not yet goe; soe then I was longing for y^e deare pleasure, and fondlie turning over y^e leaves, and wondering woulde father be surprised and pleased with it some daye, when father himselfe came in or ever I was aware. He sayth, "What hast thou, Meg?" I faltered and woulde sett it aside. He sayth, "Nay, let me see;" and soe takes it from me; and after y^e firste glance throws himself into a seat, his back to me, and firste runs it hastilie through, then begiunes with methode and such silence and gravitie as that I trembled at his side, and felt what it must be to stand a prisoner at the bar, and he y^e judge. Sometimes I thought he must be pleased, at others not: at length, alle my fond hopes were ended by his crying, "This will never doe. Poor wretch, hath this then beene thy toy! How couldst find time for soe much labour? for here hath beene trouble enow and to spare. Thou must have stolen it, sweet Meg, from the night, and prevented y^e morning watch. Most dear'st! thy father's owne loved child;" and soe, caressing me till I gave over my shame and disappointment.

"I neede not to tell thee, Meg," father sayth, "of y^e unprofitable labour of Sisyphus, nor of drawing water in a sieve. There are some things, most deare one, that a woman, if she trieth, may doe as well as a man; and some she cannot, and some she had better not. Now, I tell thee firme, since y^e first payn is y^e leaste sharpe, that, despite y^e spiritt and genius herein shewn, I am avised 'tis work thou caust not and work thou hadst better not doe. But judge for thyselfe; if thou wilt persist, thou shalt have leisure and quiet, and a chamber in my new building, and alle y^e help my gallery of books may afford. But thy father says, forbear."

Soe, what coule I say, but "My father shall never speak to me in vayne!"

Then he gathered y^e papers up and sayd, "Then I shall take temptation out of your way;" and pressing 'em to his heart as he did soe, sayth, "They are as deare to me as they can be to you;" and soe left me, looking out as though I noted (but I noted not,) the cleare-shining Thames. 'Twas twilighte, and I stode there I know not how long, alone and lonely; with tears coming, I knew not why, into mine eyes. There was a weight in y^e ayr, as of coming thunder; the screaming, ever and anon, of Juno and Argus, inclined me to melancholie, as it alwaies does: and at length I beganne to note y^e moon rising, and y^e deepening clearnesse of y^e water, and y^e lazy motion of y^e barges, and y^e flashes of light whene'er y^e rowers dipt their oars. And then I beganne to attend to y^e eies and different sounds from across y^e water, and y^e tolling of a distant bell; and I felle back on mine olde heart-sighinge, "Fecisti nos ad te, Domine; et inquietum est cor nostrum, donec requiescat in te."

Or ever the week was gone, my father had contrived for me another journey to New Hall, to abide with the lay nuns, as he calleth them, aunt Nan and aunt Fan, whom my step-mother loveth not, but whom I love and whom father loveth. Indee, 'tis sayd in Essex that at first he inclined to aunt Nan rather than to my mother; but that, perceiving my mother affected his companie and aunt Nan affected it not, he diverted his hesitating affections unto her and took her to wife. Albeit, aunt Nan loveth him dearlie as a sister ought: indeed, she loveth alle, except, methinketh, herself, to whom, alone, she is rigid and severe. How holie are my aunts' lives! Cloistered nuns could not be more pure, and could scarce be as usefulle. Thoughwise, they can be gay; though noe longer young, they love the young. And their reward is, the young love them; and I am fulle surc, in this world they seeke noe better.

Returned to Chelsea, I spake much in prayse of mine aunts, and of single life. On a certayn evening, we maids were sett at our needles and samplers on y^e pavillion steps; and, as follie will out, 'gan talk of what we would fayn have to our lots, shoulde a good fairie starte up and grant each a wish. Daisy was for a countess's degrec, with hawks and hounds. Bess was for founding a college, Mercy a hospital, and she spake soe experimentallie of its conditions that I was fayn to goe partners with her in the same. Cecy commenced "Supposing I were married; if once that I were married"—on which, father, who had come up unperceived, burst out laughing and sayth, "Well, dame Cecily, and what state would you keep?" Howbeit, as he and I afterwards paced together, juxta fluvium, he did say, "Mercy hath well propounded the conditions of an hospital or alms-house for aged and sick folk, and 'tis a fantasie of mine to sett even such an one afoot, and give you the conduct of the same."

From this careless speech, dropped, as 'twere, by y^e way, hath sprung mine house of refuge! and oh, what pleasure have I derived from it! How good is my father! how the poor bless him! and how kind is he, through them, to me! Laying his hand kindly on my shoulder, this morning, he sayd, "Meg, how fares it with thee now? Have I cured the payn in thy head?" Then, putting the house-key into mine hand, he laughingly added, "'Tis now yours, my joy, by Livery and Seisin."

I wish William w^d give me back my Testament. 'Tis one thing to steal a knot or a posie, and another to borrow y^e most valuable book in y^e house and keep it week after week. He soughte it with a kind of mysteric, soe as that I forbore to ask it of him in companie, lest I s^d doe him an ill turn; and yet I have none other occasion.

The emperor, the King of France, and Cardinal Ximenes are alle striving which shall have Erasmus, and alle in vayne. He hath refused a professor's chayr at Louvain, and a Sicilian bishoprick. E'en thus it was with him when he was here this spring,—the Queen w^d have had him for her preceptor, the King and Cardinall prest on him a royall apartment and salarie, Oxford and Cambridge contended for him, but his saying was, "Alle these I value less than my libertie, my studdies, and my literarie toyls." How much greater is he than those who woulde confer on him greatnesse! Noe man of letters hath equal reputation or is soe much courted.

Yestereven, after overlooking the men playing at loggats, father and I strayed away along Thermopylae into y^e home-field; and as we sauntered together under the elms, he sayth with a sigh, "Jack, is Jack, and no More . . . he will never be anything. An' 'twere not for my beloved wenches, I should be an unhappy father. But what though!—My Meg is better unto me than ten sons; and it maketh no difference at harvest time whether our corn were put into the ground by a man or a woman."

While I was turning in my mind what excuse I might make for John, father taketh me at unawares by a sudden change of subject; saying, "Come, tell me, Meg, why canst not affect Will Roper?"

I was a good while silent, at length made answer, "He is so unlike alle I esteem and admire . . . so unlike all I have been taught to esteem and admire by you."

"Have at you," he returned laughing, "I knew not I had been sharpening weapons agaynst myself. True he is neither Achilles nor Hector, nor even Paris, but yet well enough, mescems, as times go—Smarter and comelier than either Heron or Dancy."

I, faltering, made answer, "Good looks affect me but little—'tis in his better part I feel the want. He cannot . . . discourse, for instance, to one's mind and soul, like unto you, dear father, or Erasmus."

"I should marvel if he could," returned father gravelic, "thou art mad, my daughter, to look, in a youth of Will's years, for the mind of a man of forty or fifty. What were Erasmus and I, dost thou suppose, at Will's age? Alas, Meg, I should not like you to know what I was! Men called me the boy-sage, and I know not what, but in my heart and head was a world of sin and folly. Thou mightst as well expect Will to have my hair, eyes, and teeth, alle getting y^e worse for wear, as to have the fruits of my life-long experience, in some cases full dearly bought. Take him for what he is, match him by the young minds of his owne standing: consider how long and closelic we have known him. His parts are, surelie, not amiss: he hath more book-lore than Dancy, more mother wit than Allington."

"But why need I to concern myself about him?" I exclaimed, "Will is very well in his way: why s^t we cross each other's paths? I am young, I have much to learn, I love my studdies,—why interrupt them with other and lesse wise thoughts?"

"Because nothing can be wise that is not practical," returned father, "and I teach my children philosophic to fitt them for living in y^e world, not above it. One may spend a life in dreaming over Plato, and yet goc out of it without leaving y^e world a whit y^e better for our having made part of it. 'Tis to little purpose we studdy, if it onlie makes us look for perfections in others which they may in v^ayn seek for in ourselves. It is not even necessary or goode for us to live entirelie with congenial spirits. The vigorous tempers the inert, the passionate is evened by the cool-tempered, the prosaic balances the visionarie. Woulde thy mother suit me better, dost thou suppose, if she coule discuss polemicks like Luther or Melancthon? E'en thine owne sweet mother, Meg, was less affected to studdy than thou art,—she learnt to love it for my sake, but I made her what she was."

And, with a suddain burste of fond recollection, he hid his eyes on my shoulder, and for a moment or soe, cried bitterlic. As for me, I shed, oh! such salt teares!

LIFE AND TIMES OF CURRAN.

BY FREDERICK LAWRENCE.

THE fame of the great advocate, like that of the great actor, is commonly of the most ephemeral description. When the peculiarities of gesture, tone, and manner have passed from human remembrance, what remains, in most instances, of the accomplished orator who won the verdicts of juries and the applause of senates? A few anecdotes of doubtful authority, and some ill-reported speeches, or fragments of speeches, at the bar or in parliament, are often all that can be found to justify the lavish approbation of contemporaries, or to perpetuate the speaker's fame. From such remains how difficult is it to form a true estimate of the speaker's powers! Even the most successful efforts of oratory, as the reader well knows, when printed from the reporter's notes, are not unfrequently utterly unfit to pass through the ordeal of ordinary criticism. When the circumstances which made them tell have ceased to interest, and the reputation of the speaker has become a mere tradition, it is very often a matter of surpris to us all how such common-place appeals could have awakened the sympathies or influenced the judgments of living men.

In the case of Curran, it may be urged that these remarks do not apply. Many passages of soul-subduing pathos and magic eloquence which escaped him in moments of the highest mental excitement have been treasured up with singular care, and will perish only with the literature and history of his nation. Over the herd of professional orators he had some signal advantages. In most of his great efforts his sympathies were completely enlisted; he was personally identified with the topics of his advocacy; and his earnestness and indignation, instead of being simulated for the purposes of the hour, were more frequently the genuine emotions of his heart. It must also be borne in mind that the period at which he appeared, as well as the place of his appearance, were alike favourable to the exercise of his genius. He had the advantage of addressing the most excitable people on the earth, at the most exciting period of their history, on the most interesting and nationally important subjects. Nature had endowed him with a fertile imagination and an exquisite sensibility. He possessed in rich profusion the showiest qualifications of the orator, and circumstances favoured their development. On the other hand, it is plain, that he was no such wonderful man as some admiring biographers have given him out to be. He was not merely professionally superficial and unsound, but many of his reported speeches prove him to have been lamentably deficient in good taste and common discretion. We say this because we have been accustomed to hear, and have recently found, passages of his oratory quoted with approbation, which appear to us remarkable for nothing but their pomp of phraseology and far-fetched metaphors, with scarcely the glimmer of a meaning under all. We readily admit that Curran said a great many fine things in his lifetime—perhaps no man has said finer—but that he frequently sacrificed sense to sound, and mistook exaggeration of language for sublimity, a perusal of his speeches, or even of such portions of them as are contained in the eulogistic sketch of his life by his friend Mr. Phillips,¹ will prove beyond a doubt.

Mr. Phillips's work has been characterised by Lord Brougham as one of the most delightful pieces of biography extant. For ourselves, we willingly confess our obligations to the learned Commissioner, for having taken the pains to produce an enlarged edition of so characteristic a sketch. If not an unexceptionable book, it is certainly a most amusing one. It is thoroughly Hibernian in character, and full of the qualities which render an Irishman the most entertaining of companions. Abounding in wit and anecdote, in flashes of merriment, snatches of eloquence, and occasional touches of pathos, we feel some reluctance in applying to it the strict canons of criticism. But truth compels us to state that it is deformed by not a few vices of style, and by an exaggeration of tone, which is often both ludicrous and unpleasant. We are willing to make all allowances for the partiality of friendship, for congeniality of disposition, and similarity in talent and pursuits, but we cannot help observing that indiscriminate admiration, whilst it argues some weakness of judgment, often defeats its own object. With regard to mere verbal inaccuracies of language, our readers will not accuse us of any disposition to be needlessly captious. Of all imputations, we are most anxious to avoid that of being considered pedantic or ill-natured. But when we meet with instances of singular carelessness and obscurity in a work of some pretension, we conceive it to be our duty to point them out. The preface to Mr. Phillips's volume contains but a few sentences, and we are therefore at a loss to understand how he could have permitted the following obscure and awkward passage to have gone forth to the world. Speaking of his work, he says:—"The period of which it treats was one of vital interest to Ireland, and the men which it produced were not unworthy of the period." We leave our readers to reconcile these its. When such a sentence occurs in the first page of such a work—when we meet with it, as it were, in the very threshold—observation is naturally challenged, and it is difficult to refrain from remark.

We consider Curran, on the whole, to have been fortunate in his biographers. In addition to Mr. Phillips's sketch, there is the memoir by his son, Mr. William Henry Curran, which is well known as an excellent and carefully written work. We are also aware of a memoir by an Irish barrister, Mr. William O'Regan,² a truly Hibernian performance, but containing a very complete collection of Curran's witticisms and smart sayings; whilst the late Thomas Davis³ (famous for his poetical contributions to the Nation newspaper) is the author of a slight but eloquent narrative, which is at least deserving of mention. Mr. Phillips's volume purports to be nothing more than "the simple, and in some measure, the self-drawn picture" of the great Irish orator. It may be premised that he lived for many years in habits of the closest intimacy with the object of his idolatry, and made his acquaintance under circumstances well calculated to beget an enthusiastic partiality. In his early youth, he had published a poem, called "the Emerald Isle," which had been accidentally brought to Mr. Curran's notice. Soon afterwards, when called to the bar, and wandering "not only bagless but briefless" round the hall of the Four Courts in Dublin, he received an invitation to dine at the Priory, a little country villa, where Curran (who was then Master of the Rolls,) resided. Having long worshipped his forensic idol at a distance, the young barrister was transported into the seventh heaven, by the prospect of an actual interview. His gratification was unbounded. Even Boswell, admitted to the social haunts of Johnson, was not more delighted. "I had often seen Curran," he says, (whilst describing this memorable evening,)—"often heard of him—often read him—but no man ever knew anything about him who did not see him at his own table with the few whom he selected. He was a little convivial deity! He soared in every region, and was at home in all; he touched every thing, and seemed as if he had created it; he mastered the human heart with the same ease that he did his violin." No wonder that Mr. Phillips became not merely an admirer, but an idolater of such a fascinating friend, nor is it strange, perhaps, that his book (when we remember how men, and especially Irishmen, are constituted,) should contain some extravagant passages of panegyric.

Having made these remarks on Curran's biographers, we will endeavour to follow them through a few of the most prominent scenes in his eventful life. He was born on the 24th of July, 1750, at the small village of Newmarket, in the County of Cork, at the distance of eight miles from that dismantled castle, where Spenser is said to have composed his "Faery Queen."⁴ His father was seneschal, or steward of the manor of Newmarket, from which office he derived nearly all his scanty income. It is said that the family had originally borne the name of Curwen, and had been transplanted into Ireland from the north of England, at a rather memorable period. "Strange as it may seem," observes Mr. Phillips, "their paternal ancestor came over to Ireland with one of Cromwell's soldiers; and the most ardent patriot she ever saw owed his origin to her most merciless and cruel plunderer!" The father of the great orator appears to have been a very common-place individual; but his mother (whose maiden name was Philpot) was a woman of great natural ability. She spoke the Irish language with fluency, and delighted her children with recitals of traditions and legends of the olden time. It was thus that the imaginative faculties received in Curran a precocious development, and from the impressions made upon his mind in childhood, he drew in after life his exhaustless fund of imagery and poetical illustration. Nurtured amidst pleasant and gentle fancies, his early years were singularly happy, and his genius was fed with its proper nutriment. To quote from the eloquent pages of Mr. Davis, "He grew up a light-limbed, short, brown boy, with an eye like a live coal. He had a sensitive heart, loved his little brothers and sisters, but he loved his mother best, and well he might. She doted on him, and petted him, and taught him much. She soothed him with soft lullabies, that sent the passions of his country into his young heart; she flooded him with the stories and memoirs of the neighbourhood; she nursed him in love, and truth, and earnestness, by her precept and example, and she taught him his Bible."

From the humble station in which his parents moved, and his father's limited means, there seemed at first but a slight prospect that Curran, or Little Jacky, as he was then familiarly called, would receive the advantage of a liberal education. But by a happy accident he attracted the attention of a benevolent clergyman, who recognised him as an uncommon boy, and determined that the seeds of genius should not perish for lack of culture. As he was one day playing at marbles in the village ball alley, "with a light heart, and lighter pocket," a stranger of venerable and cheerful aspect came up, and singled him out from his playmates. The bright eye and intelligent aspect of the little urchin had won the good man's heart. He bribed him home with sweetmeats, and became the architect of the boy's fortunes. The stranger's name was Boyse, a clergyman, the rector of Newmarket, and the sequel of the adventure was, in after years, thus related by Curran to his friend Phillips. "I learned from poor Boyse my alphabet and my grammar, and the rudiments of the classics: he taught me all he could, and then he sent me to the school at Middleton—in short, he made a man of me. I recollect, it was about five-and-thirty years afterwards, when I had risen to some eminence at the Bar, and when I had a seat in Parliament, and a good house in Ely Place, on my return one day from court, I found an old gentleman seated alone in the drawing-room, his feet familiarly placed on each side of the Italian marble chimney-piece, and his whole air bespeaking the consciousness of one quite at home. He turned round—it was my friend of the ball-alley! I rushed instinctively into his arms. I could not help bursting into tears. Words cannot describe the scene which followed. 'You are right, sir; you are right: the chimney-piece is yours—the pictures are your—the house is yours: you gave me all I have—my friend—my father!' He dined with me; and in the evening I caught the tear glistening in his fine blue eye when he saw his poor Little Jacky, the creature of his bounty, rising in the House of Commons to reply to a right honourable."

At the Middleton school above-mentioned, Curran seems to have remained till he attained the age of nineteen, when he was entered as a sizar of Trinity College, Dublin. His career at the university was undistinguished. "He passed through it," says Mr. Phillips, "as Swift, and Burke, and Goldsmith did before him:—

"The glory of the college, and its shame."

He was frequently charged with irregularities and offences against academic discipline; and the authorities regarded him with suspicion and dislike, with which his unprepossessing appearance and slovenly costume had something to do. On one occasion he was called before them for wearing a shirt not so scrupulously clean as it should have been. "I pleaded," said Curran, relating the circumstance to Mr. Phillips, "inability to wear a clean one; and I told them the story of poor Lord Avonmore, who was at that time the plain, untitled, struggling Barry Yelverton. 'I wish, mother, said Barry, 'I had eleven shirts.' 'Eleven, Barry!—why eleven?' 'Because, mother, I am of opinion that a gentleman, to be comfortable, ought to have the dozen.' Poor Barry had but one, and I made the precedent my justification."

From what has been stated, it may be presumed that Curran was little attached to his Alma Mater. But be that as it may, he did not leave her without a pang. As he passed through her gates to commence his uncertain journey through the world, he turned to take a last lingering look (to quote from a letter which he afterwards wrote from London to a college friend) at the scene of his boyish follies, and sighed to think of the many friends whom he had loved and left behind. "Nay, even the Fellows," he added, "whom I never loved, I forgave at that moment—the parting tear blotted out every injury, and I gave them as hearty a benediction as if they had deserved it." Truth to say, the prospects of Curran were at this moment not over promising. After much deliberation, he had resolved on adopting the Bar as a profession, but his course was beset with difficulties, and poverty stared him in the face. "From college," says his friend Phillips, "he proceeded to London, where he contrived quocunque modo, to enter his name on the books of the Middle Temple. Of his resources in the metropolis I never heard him speak, and the subject was too delicate to introduce. I have it, however, on the authority of a friend who knew him well, that he had some small stipend from the school at Middleton; and that, in addition to this, he profited by his literary exertions." It is tolerably certain that he frequently replenished his purse by contributions to magazines and newspapers, although few traces of his compositions remain. He was fond of music, and his principal recreation in these days of severe labour was his violin. Though naturally indolent and disinclined to close and continuous study, we have his own statement, (which, considering his known candour and veracity, there is no reason to impeach,) that whilst residing in London he was a hard worker. He speaks, indeed, of reading ten hours a day, at this period, and of rising at half-past four for the purpose of study. His out-door amusements often consisted in visiting coffee-houses, and similar places of public resort, where opportunities were afforded for the study of human character. He considered this no insignificant part of his professional training, and the keen delight it appears to have afforded him is worthy of observation. "I also visit," he writes in one his letters, quoted by Mr. Phillips, "a variety of ordinaries and eating houses, and they are equally fertile in game for a character-hunter. I think I have found out the cellar where Roderick Random ate shin of beef for three-pence, and actually drank out of the identical quart which the drummer squeezed together when poor Strap spilt the broth on his legs."

During his residence in London, he also assiduously attended some of the principal debating societies. But though destined by Nature for an orator, he laboured under certain disadvantages, which prevented him at first from taking a part in discussion. "He had from his boyhood," says his son, "a considerable precipitation and confusion of utterance, from which he was denominated by his school-fellows 'stuttering Jack Curran.'" This defect was aggravated by an excessive sensibility, and a nervous dread of failure, which it is a matter of common observation is generally experienced by the best speakers in the earlier stages of their career. His first essay in speaking was singularly unsuccessful. On the occasion in question, (as he narrated the circumstance to some of his intimate friends in after-life,) he had risen and commenced, "Mr. Chairman," when, to his astonishment and terror, he perceived that every eye was riveted upon him. "There were only," to use his own words, "six or seven persons present, and the little room could not have contained as many more; yet it was to my panic-struck imagination, as if I were the central object in nature, and assembled millions were gazing upon me in breathless expectation. I became dismayed and dumb; my friends cried, 'Hear him!' but there was nothing to hear. My lips, indeed, went through the pantomime of articulation, but I was like the unfortunate fiddler at the fair, who upon coming to strike up the solo that was to ravish every ear, discovered that an enemy had maliciously soaped his bow."¹ His next effort, however, was more fortunate. Attending a debating-society which held its meetings near Temple Bar, after a social dinner with a college chum, his wrath was excited by the observations of a flippant and unwashed orator,—“just such another,” he observed, “as Harry Flood” (who was accustomed to distinguish the speakers by such ludicrous descriptions of their dress as “the eloquent friend to reform in the thread-bare coat,” “the able supporter of the ministry in the new pair of boots”) “would have called ‘the highly gifted gentleman in the dirty cravat and greasy pantaloons.” The orator was in the act of “calumniating chronology by the most preposterous anachronisms;” descanting upon Demosthenes as the glory of the Roman forum, and Tully as the famous contemporary and rival of Cicero. Seeing possibly a smile upon Curran’s face, the indignant worthy commenced a furious assault upon him, and applied to him the nickname of “orator mum;” upon which the young Irish student rose and administered an oratorical dressing to his assailant, which not only raised him in his own estimation, but procured him the substantial reward of an invitation to sup with the president of the society, by whom he was liberally regaled with bread and cheese and porter. In order the more effectually to cure his defects of utterance, he also declaimed frequently before a looking-glass; and the reader will not be surprised to learn that among the passages from English authors which he selected for recitation were copious extracts from Junius and Lord Bolingbroke.

In the year 1775 Curran was called to the Irish Bar. Previously to this he had married the daughter of a Dr. Creagh, and it is painful, though necessary, to add that this union, which promised him a large share of domestic felicity, was the source of the bitterest calamity of his life. Before taking his place in the ranks of his profession, he had seriously thought of seeking his fortunes in America, but ambition ultimately disposed him to follow the course he had marked out for himself in early life. His chances of immediate success were, however, by no means brilliant. He was without friends or connexions whose assistance could be of any avail to him. He was in needy circumstances, painfully sensitive, and subject to occasional fits of melancholy. “Those who have risen to professional eminence,” it is justly and eloquently remarked by Mr. Phillips, “and who recollect the impediments of such a commencement—the neglect abroad—the poverty, perhaps, at home—the frowns of rivalry—the fears of friendship—the sneer at the first essay—the prophecy that it will be the last—discouragements as to the present—forebodings as to the future—some who are established endeavouring to crush the chance of competition, and some who have failed, anxious for the wretched consolation of companionship—those who recollect the comforts of such an apprenticeship may duly appreciate poor Curran’s situation. After toiling for a very inadequate recompense at the sessions of Cork, and wearing, as he said himself, his teeth almost to their stumps, he proceeded to the metropolis, taking for his wife and young children a miserable lodging upon Hay Hill.” The gifted advocate waited long for the dawn of prosperous fortune, and suffered severely in the interim. His wife and children were the chief furniture of his apartments; “and as to my rent,” he said, when speaking of these times in subsequent years, “it stood pretty much the same chance of liquidation with the national debt.” But business came at last. A heavy brief from a well-known Dublin attorney was the harbinger of good fortune;

the powers of the great advocate became known; contending parties found it to their interest to secure his services, and he rose rapidly to wealth and fame.

For the brilliant position to which his peculiar talents had elevated him, Curran had all the requisite qualifications, and he remained long without a rival. He had no pretensions to profound learning, but he knew how to read the dispositions of men and to avail himself of their weaknesses. His eloquence, which out of Ireland might have been designated as over florid and flashy, was well calculated to win its way to the hearts of those whom he addressed. He had courage—both moral and physical—and quailed neither before the frown of the judge, nor the threat of the duellist. He was not a man who could be put down by the sneers or censures of authority, and the greatest judicial despots soon learned to fear him. His reply to Judge Robinson, who from a knowledge of his poverty, had taunted him with the meagreness of his library, (upon his having remarked in a particular argument that he had never met with the law as laid down by his lordship in any book in his library.) is a well-known instance of his spirit and courage. "I have prepared myself," he replied to the astonished judge, "for this high profession rather by the study of a few good books than by the composition of a great many bad ones. I am not ashamed of my poverty, but I should be of my wealth, could I stoop to acquire it by servility and corruption. If I rise not to rank I shall at least be honest; and should I ever cease to be so, many an example shows me, that an ill-acquired elevation, by making me the more conspicuous, would only make me the more universally and the more notoriously contemptible." He was here, according to his son's account of the occurrence, interrupted by the judge, who told him that "he was forgetting the respect which he owed to the dignity of the judicial character." "Dignity!" exclaimed Curran, "my lord, upon that point I shall cite you a case from a book of some authority, with which you are perhaps not unacquainted. A poor Scotchman," (Curran was here alluding to his favourite Strap in Roderick Random,) "upon his arrival in London, thinking himself insulted by a stranger, and imagining that he was the stronger man, resolved to resent the affront, and taking off his coat, delivered it to a by-stander to hold; but having lost the battle, he turned to resume his garment, when he discovered that he had unfortunately lost that also, that the trustee of his habiliments had decamped during the affray. So, my lord, when the person who is invested with the dignity of the judgment-seat, lays it aside for a moment to enter into a disgraceful personal contest, it is in vain, when he has been worsted in the encounter, that he seeks to recover it—it is in vain that he endeavours to shelter himself behind an authority which he has abandoned."

Judge Robinson. "If you say another word, sir, I'll commit you."

Mr. Curran. "Then, my lord, it will be the best thing you'll have committed this term."

In his early contests with Lord Clare, there will be found, observes his son, "the same spirit of resistance and retaliation; and at a much subsequent period, when he was exerting himself in a cause with his characteristic firmness, the presiding judge having called to the Sheriff to be ready to take into custody any one who should disturb the decorum of the Court: 'Do, Mr. Sheriff,' replied Curran, 'go and get ready my dungeon; prepare a bed of straw for me; and upon that bed I shall to-night repose with more tranquillity than I should enjoy were I sitting on that bench with a consciousness that I disgraced it.'" If this should be thought rather strained and melo-dramatic, we may remind the reader that proceedings in the Irish courts of justice in Curran's time, required in the advocate a bold and resolute demeanour. Upon other occasions, when judicial opposition or partiality called it forth, he resorted with no small success to his talent for sarcasm. He was addressing a jury on one of the state trials in 1803, when the judge,—we quote this anecdote from Mr. Phillips,—"whose political bias, if any judge can have one, was certainly supposed not to be favourable to the prisoner, shook his head in doubt or denial of the advocate's arguments. 'I see, gentlemen,' said Mr. Curran,—'I see the motion of his lordship's head; common observers might imagine that implied a difference of opinion, but they would be mistaken: it is merely accidental. Believe me, gentlemen, if you remain here many days, you will yourselves perceive, that when his lordship shakes his head, there's nothing in it!'"

For the display of physical courage, which in those days was often tested by facing the pistol of an adversary, Curran had unhappily several opportunities. He never modified his language to avoid a challenge, nor shrank from exposing his life when the mischievous code of social honour rendered a meeting necessary. The Irish gentry were at this period a race of hot-blooded duellists, and it was all but impossible for any man occupying a public position, who valued his reputation, to resist the barbarous custom, deeply as he might regret its prevalence. "Mr. Curran's justification on this subject," says Mr. Phillips, "was that on his entrance into life, the state of society in Ireland was literally so savage, that almost every argument was concluded by a wager of battle, and the man could scarcely be enrolled into their Christian community, until, as in some Indian colonies, his prowess had been proved by an appeal to arms." The very judges on the bench had often, before their elevation, distinguished themselves in mortal combat; some of them were ready, even in the very seat and sanctuary of justice, to resent an insult by a challenge; and all of them regarded the offence of duelling as quite a venial affair. It may be observed that these notions prevailed even to a much later period than the early years of Curran's professional life. "I remember well," says Mr. Phillips, "at the Sligo summer assizes for 1812, being counsel in the case of the King v.

Fenton, for the murder of Major Illias in a duel, when old judge Fletcher thus capped his summing up to the jury:—"Gentlemen, it is my business to lay down the law to you, and I will. The law says, the killing a man in a duel is murder, and I am bound to tell you it's murder; therefore in the discharge of my duty I tell you so; but I tell you at the same time, a fairer duel than this I never heard of in the whole course of my life!" Curran was a principal in four duels. One of them was fought with a gigantic barrister named Egan, or Bully Egan, as he was nicknamed in the profession. Curran could never refrain from a jest when any opportunity offered, and a celebrated witticism belongs to this rencontre. When the opponents met on the ground, "Egan complained that the disparity in their sizes gave his antagonist a manifest advantage: 'I might as well fire at a razor's edge as at him,' said Egan, 'and he may hit me as easily as a turf-stack.'" "I tell you what, Mr. Egan," replied Curran, his pistol in his hand, and Egan scowling at him under brows that rivalled Lord Thurlow's—"I wish to take no advantage of you whatever, let my size be chalked out upon your side, and I am quite content that every shot which hits outside that mark should go for nothing."

While we are on the subject of duelling, we may be pardoned for quoting from Mr. Phillips a well-told anecdote of another member of the legal profession, (and a contemporary of Curran's), who was considerably more prone to give offence than satisfaction. The gentleman's name was Keller, a privileged oddity, familiarly known as Jerry Keller. One evening, over the social board, Jerry had engaged in a violent discussion on politics with a Mr. Nicholas Leader, a gentleman of extreme liberal principles. Getting the worst of the argument, he descended to personalities, and made some offensive remarks on Mr. Leader's head, which was covered with thick curly locks. "Leader felt called upon to notice this, and a man of war at daylight invaded Jerry's slumbers. Loudly and gruffly did he grumble at the intrusion, as he poked his red woollen night-cap over the counterpane. 'In the very grey of the morning too,' said Keller, 'I suppose you call this good breeding.' 'I tell you what, Mr. Keller, I want none of your waggery. I'm not here to be trifled with: Mr. Leader's wrongs must be atoned for within an hour. You had full notice. Look at your dressing-table, and you will see we are prepared.' He looked up and sure enough the WOGGERS were there! Things looked very serious—Jerry thought so. 'I hope sir,' said he, 'you don't mean to offer any violence to me in my bed.' 'You need not fear that, sir.' 'Have I your honour for that?' 'Why the question's somewhat offensive, sir, but I do pledge my honour.' 'Very well, then,' said Jerry, 'I'll not get up to-day; so now be off to your principal, and tell the woolly-headed republican, I forgive him! A day thus passed over the wrath of Leader, whose good-nature yielded to the general decree, that after dinner, Jerry was to be privileged."

It is superfluous to assert that during his professional career, Curran was peculiarly famous for humorous allusions and apt retorts. His influence over the risible faculties of his auditors, was at least equal to that which he possessed over their finer sympathies. But like all privileged wits, he availed himself rather liberally of the latitude allowed him, and was not very particular with respect to the subjects he selected for raillery. "No matter how unfair the topic," observes Mr. Phillips, "he never failed to avail himself of it; acting upon the principle, that in law as well as in war, every stratagem was admissible. If he was hard pressed, there was no peculiarity of person, no singularity of name, no eccentricity of profession at which he would not grasp, trying to confound the self-possession of the witness by the no matter how excited, ridicule of the audience." Many of his professional witticisms have been preserved with singular care, but we must confess that they appear to us to have depended principally on the place and occasion for the effects which they produced, and are scarcely worthy of the encomiums that have been passed on them.

In the excitement of a trial at Nisi Prius, we can well imagine that his keen personalities often convulsed the courts; but it is obvious that this description of wit, independently of its not being of the highest description, is little calculated for repetition. We are much better pleased with some of the good things which escaped him in ordinary conversation. Upon one occasion, at a late period of his life, he attended with Mr. Phillips an aggregate meeting of the Roman Catholics in Ireland. "His reception," observes his friend, "was such that he was compelled to say something, but he confined himself to a mere expression of his thanks. He was much gratified, and, in allusion to the scene, said next day in the hall of the Four Courts, 'Well, O'Connell, I scarcely wonder at your being fond of popularity: it is undoubtedly a delicious draught.' A solemn Serjeant, who happened to be present, replied, 'Well, Curran, I never thought so.' 'In truth, my dear Serjeant,' said Curran, 'you are a bad judge of a liquor you never tasted.'" At another time, he thus described a Pecksniff-visaged person, whose solemn demeanour he regarded with extreme aversion. "Observe that solemn blockhead—that pompous lump of dulness. Now, if you breakfasted and dined with that fellow for a hundred years, you could not be intimate with him,—he would not even be seen to smile, lest anybody might suppose he was too familiar with himself."

Having alluded in our opening remarks to some of the principal characteristics of Curran's eloquence, it will be sufficient now to observe that his speeches at the bar and elsewhere were more remarkable for force and brilliancy, than for logical precision or correctness of diction. Encouraged by the applause of his contemporaries, he gave the reins to his fancy, and rioted in high-flown rhetoric. In the more sterling qualifications of the orator, he was unquestionably far behind his great English contemporary Erskine. His strength lay in impassioned declamation; but in argumentative power he was manifestly deficient. He often indulged in strained and audacious metaphors, and some of his most ambitious efforts verge upon the mock-sublime. It is observed by Mr. O'Regan that such was "his copiousness and richness of expression," that "the English language actually broke down under him;" and certainly some of his flights of fancy defy the process of ordinary grammatical construction. In one of his most famous speeches, delivered in the memorable cause of the king v. Mr. Justice Johnson, in the Irish Court of Exchequer, he is represented as addressing Lord Avonmore in a strain of impassioned rhetoric that brought tears into his lordship's eyes; in the course of which he reminded him of the Attic nights and refectations of the gods which they had spent together, "with the admired, respected, and beloved companions who had gone before them. Yes, my good Lord," he continued, "I see you do not forget them; I see their sacred forms passing in sad review before your memory; I see your pained and softened fancy recalling those happy meetings: when the innocent enjoyment of social mirth expanded into the nobler warmth of social virtue, and the horizon of the board became enlarged into the horizon of man (!) When the swelling heart conceived and communicated the pure and generous purpose—when my slenderer and younger taper imbibed its borrowed light from the more matured and redundant fountain of yours." (!) After this singularly clear and intelligible burst of rhetoric, "he proceeded," observes Mr. Phillips, "to re-consider the legal argument, in the midst of which this most beautiful epode bloomed like a green spot amid the desert."

As a specimen of his intricate and laboured metaphors, we select the following sentence on the employment of informers, from his defence of Mr. Finnerly, the publisher of a Dublin newspaper, who had been prosecuted for a libel. Speaking of the fatal influences which resulted from a system of espionage, he exclaimed: "There was an antidote—a juror's oath; but even that adamant chain, which bound the integrity of man to the shrine of eternal justice, is solved and molten in the breath that issues from the informer's mouth; conscience swings from her moorings, and the appalled and affrighted juror consults his own safety in the surrender of his victim." On another occasion, he described a notorious Irish informer as a wretch "who measured his importance by the coffins of his victims, and appreciated his fame in the field of evidence, as the Indian warrior did in fight, by the number of scalps with which he could swell his triumph."

In the employment of terse and epigrammatic phraseology he was sometimes peculiarly happy. "I am aware, my lords," he said, in one instance, when arguing before Lord Clare on the rights of the corporation of Dublin, "that truth is to be sought only by slow and painful progress; I know also that error is in its nature flippant and compendious; it hops with airy and fastidious levity over proofs and arguments, and perches upon assertion, which it calls conclusion." Of all his efforts at the bar, however, the speech which has obtained the widest fame and earned the fullest measure of approbation, is his defence of Mr. Archibald Hamilton Rowan, who was tried in 1794, for the publication of an address to the society of United Irishmen, which had been construed by the government of the day into a seditious libel. Not to speak of the celebrated burst on "Universal Emancipation," this famous oration contains many passages of sterling excellence; and we select from it, as highly characteristic of Curran's style, the following sentences which form part of the noble vindication of the freedom of the press, which was introduced into the defence with great felicity. Having referred to the fatal consequences which had resulted in other countries from the suppression of public opinion, the orator thus continued: "But, gentlemen, if you wish for a nearer and more interesting example, you have it in the history of your own revolution; you have it at that memorable period, when the monarch found a servile acquiescence in the ministers of his folly; when the liberty of the press was trodden under foot; when venal sheriffs returned packed juries, to carry into effect those fatal conspiracies of the few against the many; when the devoted benches of public justice were filled by some of those foundlings of fortune, who, overwhelmed in the torrent of corruption at an early period, lay at the bottom, like drowned bodies, while soundness or sanity remained in them; but at length, becoming buoyant by putrefaction, they rose as they rotted, and floated to the surface of the polluted stream, where they were drifted along, the objects of terror, and contagion, and abomination In that awful moment of a nation's travail—of the last gasp of tyranny, and the first breath of freedom—how pregnant is the example! The press extinguished—the people enslaved—and the prince undone. As the advocate of society, therefore, of peace, of domestic liberty, and the lasting union of the two countries, I conjure you to guard the liberty of the press,—that great sentinel of the state, that grand detector of public imposture: guard it, because, when it sinks, there sinks with it, in one common grave, the liberty of the subject and the security of the crown."

In the darkest period of Irish history, Curran was called on to perform a difficult and painful part. The fatal rebellion of the year 1798 converted his country into a scene of desolation, and was accompanied by atrocities almost too horrible for belief. "It would be revolting," says Mr. Phillips, "to repeat, and perhaps impossible to convince the English reader of all the miseries which the violence of one party, and the fierce, unsparing, and un pitying refusals of the other inflicted during this frightful period. . . . It was a tremendous scene: Government, on the one hand, terrified into desperation; sedition, on the other, preferring death to endurance; and in the few intervals which fatigue, rather than humanity, created, Religion waving aloft her 'fiery cross,' and exciting her clans to a renewal of the combat." For a time every sound was drowned in the tumult of revolt. Military executions were the order of the day; the innocent often suffered with the guilty, and the most detestable cruelties were practised by both parties. On one side was an infuriated and ignorant peasantry, prepared for all the horrors of a servile war, and on the other, a soldiery, "in a state of licentiousness," to quote the words of General Abercrombie, "which rendered them formidable only to the enemy." After a stupendous sacrifice of human life, the revolt was suppressed, and the supremacy of the law restored. A general amnesty was subsequently granted to all but the actual leaders of the rebellion, of whom many were in the hands of the government, awaiting trial for their offence. When these unfortunate men were brought before the tribunals, Curran almost invariably appeared as their counsel. Though his efforts were generally unsuccessful, it must be mentioned to his honour, that at a time of unexampled difficulty he discharged the duties of an advocate with unwavering constancy and courage. When all the circumstances of the period are taken into consideration,—when it is recollected that the single fact of his appearing as counsel for the accused subjected him to the charge of disaffection,—we cannot but admire the bold and energetic demeanour which he displayed on these memorable occasions. It must also be stated that he frequently performed his responsible duty under the deepest mental depression: the shades of melancholy had gathered over his mind, and he was often visited with fits of dejection and despair. At one time he had actually made up his mind to abandon Ireland for ever and to seek a grave in America; and at another, we find him in the course of an impassioned speech thus giving vent to his gloomy forebodings of future calamities. "I feel," he cried, "that the night of unenlightened wretchedness is fast approaching, when a man shall be judged before he is tried,—when the advocate shall be libelled for performing his duty to his client,—that right of human nature,—when the victim shall be hunted down, not because he is criminal, but because he is obnoxious."

We have hitherto, whilst speaking of Curran's professional character, forbore to allude to his parliamentary career. Like many other lawyers, he was more successful in the forum than in the senate. After toiling all day in the Four Courts, he found himself too much enfeebled in body and exhausted in mind to do justice to his reputation in the House of Commons. Still, it will be found that he took an important share in the debates of the period, and frequently spoke with great force and brilliancy. It appears that he was first returned to the Irish parliament in 1783, when he was elected for the borough of Kilbeggan; his colleague in the representation being the illustrious Henry Flood. His politics were thoroughly national. "No matter," says Mr. Phillips, "under what personal, political, or professional discouragements he laboured, he never for a moment deserted the interests of his country; and I am as persuaded as I am of my own existence that, either in the field or on the scaffold, he would most cheerfully have sealed with his heart's blood the charter of her emancipation." Like most of the leading Irishmen of the period, he regarded with extreme aversion the prospect of a legislative union with Great Britain; and in the year 1796, in the course of a speech on Catholic emancipation, he thus characteristically described what he was pleased to consider would be the "inevitable consequences" of such an event:—"It would be," said the patriotic orator, "the emigration of every man of consequence from Ireland; it would be the participation in British taxes without British trade; it would be the extinction of the Irish name as a people. We should become a wretched colony, perhaps leased out to a company of Jews, as was formerly in contemplation, and governed by a few tax-gatherers and excisemen, unless, possibly, you may add fifteen or twenty couples of Irish members, who might be found every session sleeping in their collars under the manger of the British minister."

Curran's domestic life was far from happy. On the bitter calamity which desolated his home, and almost broke his heart, we will follow the example of most of his biographers, by forbearing to dwell. Private sorrows are not always the fittest topics for observation. With the misfortunes, however, of one member of his domestic circle, a painful and romantic interest is connected; and since all the circumstances have obtained a wide publicity, there is no motive for silence. On the 23d of June, 1803, an insane revolt broke out in Dublin, at the head of which was Robert Emmett, an amiable but hot-headed enthusiast, only twenty-three years of age. The insurrection, or rather riot, (for it was little more,) was of a most insignificant character; but its principal and most disgraceful feature was the murder of a revered and aged magistrate, the venerable Chief Justice, Lord Kilwardin. Against this deed of blood Emmett had vainly remonstrated. Finding that all was lost, he fled from the scene of action, but was soon afterwards captured, tried, and executed. Upon his papers being seized, some letters were discovered, which proved his intimacy with Mr. Curran's family, whose house was accordingly searched under a government warrant. The fact was that young Emmett had been for some time the accepted but secret suitor of Mr. Curran's youngest daughter. Vows of unalterable attachment had been interchanged, and the most fervent and sincere affection existed upon both sides. It may be well imagined that the idea of parting with so dear an object embittered the prospect of death to the young enthusiast. On the day before his trial, he occupied himself in plaiting a lock of her hair, to wear in his bosom on the sad occasion. "My love, Sarah!" he wrote, within an hour of his execution, "it was not thus that I thought to have requited your affection. I did hope to be a prop round which your affections might have clung, and which would never have been shaken; but a rude blast has snapped it, and they have fallen over a grave." To the offended father he declared, in a pathetic letter, that he would rather have had the affections of his daughter, in the back settlements of America, than the first situation the country could afford without it.

Upon the poor girl herself the blow fell with unusual severity. The reproaches of her father and the mournful associations of her home, were too much for her endurance; and, after her lover's condemnation, she was glad to take refuge in the family of a compassionate friend. The sequel of her melancholy history has been beautifully told by Washington Irving in the "Sketch-book." "The most delicate and cherishing attentions were paid her by families of wealth and distinction. She was led into society, and they tried by all kinds of occupation and amusement to dissipate her grief and win her from the tragical story of her love. But it was all in vain. There are some strokes of calamity which scathe and scorch the soul—which penetrate to the vital seat of happiness, and blast it, never again to put forth bud or blossom." At length a brave officer, who "thought that one so true to the dead could not but prove affectionate to the living," solicited her hand, and received it, "with the solemn assurance that her heart was unalterably another's." The symptoms of consumption at last appeared: she was taken to Sicily, where, wasting away in a slow decline, she died, "the victim of a broken heart."

Before closing the account of Curran's professional life, we may, perhaps, be permitted to take a passing glance at some of the great contemporaries who shared with him the honours of the forensic arena. Of those with whom he once so zealously struggled for victory, all save one are gone, and a new race of lawyers has succeeded. "Of the more prominent actors on that stage," observes Mr. Phillips, "Lord Plunket alone remains, and remains, I rejoice to hear, with his fine intellect shedding its 'glow serene' upon the evening of his eighty-eighth year." At the bar, on the bench, and in Parliament, Plunket was distinguished for the highest qualities of mind. He was spoken of by Curran as "the Irish Gylippus, in whom were concentrated all the energies and all the talents of his country." Of his success as an advocate one anecdote will be sufficient. "It is recorded," says Mr. Phillips, "that, in his own county-town of Enniskillen, he defended a horse-stealer with such consummate tact, that one of the fraternity, in a paroxysm of delight, burst into an exclamation, 'Long life to you, Plunket! The first horse I steal, boys, by Jekurs! I'll have Plunket.'" In sarcasm and retort he is said to have been peculiarly happy, and his witticisms were generally distinguished for their caustic pungency. "On the formation of the Grenville administration, Bushe, who had the reputation of a waverer, apologised one day for his absence from court, on the ground that he was 'cabinet-making.' The Chancellor maliciously disclosed the excuse on his return. 'Oh, indeed! my lord,' said Plunket; 'that is an occupation in which my friend would distance me, as I never was either a turner or a joiner.'"

The foregoing anecdote has introduced the name of another contemporary of Curran, who is entitled to a passing notice—the revered chief Justice of Ireland, Charles Kendal Bushe. The biographer of Curran has graphically described the "Mirabeau-formed" figure of this remarkable man; the impressive dignity of his voice and manner, and the singular charm of his persuasive eloquence. Like most of the great Irish advocates of this brilliant epoch, Bushe was a wit as well as an orator. In his raillery, however, there was no tinge of ill-nature, and his conversation was the delight of every social circle. Two of his private witticisms, which we find in Mr. Phillips's volume, appear to us especially good of their kind. Once upon a time "a company of amateurs, persons of rank and fortune, established a private theatre in Kilkenny, where the performances rivalled even those of the metropolis. The local influence of the performers filled Kilkenny with visitors during the season, which, for the time, was gay, prosperous, and fashionable. Bushe, during a visit in the neighbourhood, regularly attended the theatre, and being intimate with the company, they requested his opinion as to their respective merits. 'My good friends,' said he, 'comparisons at best are but invidious. Besides, how can I give a preference when all are perfect?' Nothing, however, would satisfy them. 'We are unanimous,' they replied; 'all jealousy is out of the question, and your opinion we must have.' 'Well, well,' gravely replied Bushe, 'I give it most reluctantly. I protest to you I prefer the PROMPTER, for I heard the most, and saw the least of him.'" The next anecdote is quite new to us, and may prove so to some of our readers. "Although attached to what was called the Tory party," Bushe was more than suspected of entertaining liberal opinions, particularly on the Roman Catholic question. In company with the Duke of Richmond, he was one day dining with a zealous Orangeman, who gave, as a matter of course the charter toast of the immortal memory of King William. "Bushe seemed to hang fire. The Duke vociferated, 'Come, come, Mr. Solicitor, do justice for once to the immortal memory.' Hours passed on, and the master of the revels did it such ample and repeated justice, that at last he tumbled from his chair. The Duke immediately raised and re-installed him. 'Well, my Lord Duke,' said Bushe, 'this is indeed retribution. Attached to the Catholics you may declare me to be—but, at all events, I never assisted at the elevation of the Host!'"

We will add but one name more to these random records; and it is that of the eccentric Peter Burrowes, —at once a complete original and an accomplished advocate. "He was a most singular personage," says Phillips, "uniting to an intellect the most profound, the most child-like simplicity. Though walking on the earth, he seldom saw or heard anything around him. . . . It is recorded of him that on circuit, a brother barrister found him at breakfast-time standing by the fire with an egg in his hand, and his watch in the saucepan!"¹ He was the intimate friend of Grattan; and one of the most celebrated bursts of eloquence which were uttered in the Irish parliament during the animated debates on the legislative union, was his unpremeditated eulogy of his illustrious friend. He is reported in the course of it to have made use of the following magnificent image:—"He covered over the unfledged constitution with the ample wings of his talents, as the eagle covers her young: like her he soared, and like her he could behold the rays, whether of royal favour or of royal anger, with undazzled, un-intimidated eye." One more anecdote of his occasional absence of mind is told by Mr. Phillips, and is sufficiently amusing to justify quotation. It is said to have occurred at one of the assize towns on his circuit. "A murder, which caused much excitement, had been committed, and he had to state the case for the prosecution. In one hand, having a heavy (?) cold, he held a box of lozenges, and in the other, the small pistol bullet by which the man met his death. Ever and anon, between the pauses in his address, he kept supplying himself with a lozenge, until at last, in the very middle of his sentence, his bosom heaving and his eyes starting, a perfect picture of horror, Peter bellowed out, 'Oh-h-h—gentlemen—by the heaven above me—I've swallowed the bull—let.'"

To return to Curran. After a career at the bar of uninterrupted and almost unprecedented success, he was created master of the Rolls in Ireland; an office for which he was in every way unqualified. His elevation was fatal to his reputation, and the brilliant advocate sank into an indifferent judge. When he had held the appointment about six years, with little credit to himself or advantage to the public, ill-health compelled him to resign, and he retired into private life. His few remaining years were clouded by the symptoms of melancholy and dejection, which even the bustle of active life had formerly sometimes failed to dissipate. At length, on the 14th of October, 1817, he breathed his last at Amelia Place, Brompton, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

MY LAST CHRISTMAS-EVE.

CERTAINLY it was the most original, exciting, serio-comical Christmas-eve that ever was spent! Shall I tell you the story, reader? You can draw from it, if not a moral, at least a wholesome warning; one that, if you be a provincial, will make you fasten your shutters, and draw round the fire, and declare "that you wouldn't live in such a place as London on any account whatever."

"Well, it is not such a bad world after all, is it, Pussy?" said I, musingly, to my sole interlocutor, the one point into which my "family circle" has now dwindled. And a faithful and a loving companion is my cat Sid. When I call her "Sidney," in full, it sounds a human, woman-like name, as good as a sister's. I never had a sister—I never shall have, now; but the word is sweet, or might have been. Again, I transform my pet into "Rodriguez the Cid," and conjure up some renowned brother, under the shadow of whose glory I might have rested.—But we are short-sighted mortals, all. Well, Sid, my dear, creep to my heart, nestling there almost like a bairn. "Foolish Miss Letty! if you have none of your own, not even nephews and nieces, you have plenty of other people's." That's what you would say, Sid—and you're right. It is something to be an universal aunt; and I flatter myself that in the coming generation there will be half-a-score of little Letitias, to spread gladness over society in general, and to prove that, after all, my poor old name was not a misnomer.

"It is, indeed, a very good, kindly world," I pursued, as Sid and I kept our Christmas-eve together by the fire: "Only to think—I have had five invitations for to-morrow, and three for to-night. Now, if I had been a beauty, a woman of property, a 'charming person,' a 'dear, sweet girl,' this would not have been marvellous; but to be just plain Miss Letty, whom nobody can get anything out of, except thankfulness—well! it is a good world, and a kind world, and I am very much obliged to it."

The clock struck seven. "Come, Sid, you must go down, and keep Christmas-eve by yourself," said I, as I prepared to depart for the one which I had accepted from my triad of invitations. I had made my choice, as the novelists say, solely from "the dictates of the heart;" rejecting all other delights, I had said to myself, firmly, "I will spend this evening with Jemima." Here the question arises, "Who is Jemima?" She is a lassie, in her teens; one of those cruelly-christened ones who have struggled through life under an ill name, which at length, despite godfathers and godmothers, has become so thoroughly love-sanctified that everybody thinks it pretty, and its owner would not change it for the world. So it is with Jemima. She isn't a genius—she isn't a beauty—nor is she an angel; she has her little weaknesses, all of which I know quite well, though I am not going to speak of them. Yet I will defy any one to help admiring and loving Jemima: I can't, I confess it. But one thing I never could understand—how it is that Jemima loves me! We are as different as a young ash-tree and an old crooked thorn. Moreover, she has seen my soul in deshabille—a hard test for any friendship; she has wept with me, laughed with me, teased me, lectured me; I am sure I have given her as much trouble as I ever gave anybody in the world; and yet—Jemima loves me! It is very odd, very odd indeed; but I take it calmly, upon prima facie evidence, believing in it as we are taught to do in our own existence, which nobody ever can prove.

I started for Jemima's home—for she has a home, rich lassie! full of every possible tie, save that of sisterhood. However, that little omission is perhaps the better for me. I walked quickly through the damp raw night, passing out of the region of Christmas shops into the dark quiet streets of private houses, which in London always look desolate, especially after dusk. Down them I sauntered, all alone, save for the ghosts of many a past Christmas-eve and Christmas-day that came behind and plucked at my heart, or voices nearer—perhaps bitterer—that kept singing in the silent air life's ever-recurring dirge—"It might have been—it might have been."

"Heavens! Miss Letty," whispered my good angel; "is this a frame of mind in which to go out visiting?" So I took the warning, put off my blues with my bonnet, and entered the drawing-room with a perfect Christmas face.

"I hope you understand what sort of an evening you have come to spend," said Miss Jemima, rising from the shadowy solitudes of the room, one corner of which was inhabited by her brother Frank, his desk, and a solitary candle. "There's nobody asked to meet you, Miss Letty; you won't even get a mince-pie." And she looked as if she meant to insinuate that I should feel this last as the climax of my woes. Wicked Jemima!

"I can keep Christmas-eve quite well with you and Frank; and I don't care about mince-pies; and I'm determined to be comfortable," said I, resolutely settling myself in a fireside corner; quite prepared for what seemed "the pursuit of pleasure under difficulties."

For we certainly were not the merriest party in the world, nor the largest. Frank's pen went on scratching away—I suppose it was poetry—I hope it was; but that is not my affair. There seemed, too, a shadow over me and Minnie—I ought to explain that she answers to that name likewise: in fact, she is a compound of two characters, the woman and the child; when she appears as the former, I dignify her as Jemima, when she sinks into the sweet loveableness of the latter, I call her Minnie. My dearness, if such it was, nobody had any business with but myself: Minnie had no reason to give for hers, except the purely young-ladyish one of having lost all her little ornaments.

"Look," said she, in a child-like piteousness, putting forth her bonnie bare arm, where bracelets always looked so pretty, "I can't find one of them in my room, and I don't feel happy without them—especially the one that Letty gave me." (Bless her! thought I. I wish I could coin my love into one great diamond fether, and hang it on her arm!) "I am sure," pursued poor Minnie, "it is that mischievous boy, who has been playing me some trick. Confess, Frank."

"Aye, confess!" echoed I, putting on tragedy airs, and trying to make myself young with these young folk. But Frank is the queerest fellow in the world: you never know whether he is in jest or earnest; so, though he denied the deed, during the whole evening he lay under the imputation of having spirited away his sister's little treasures.

It certainly was a quiet evening. I tried to diversify its "intense inane" by producing a pomgranate, the eating of which disposed of half-an-hour tolerably well, and moreover created a little conversation. We floated over to the East, with the old patriarchs, who are sometimes described, "sitting under a pomgranate-tree;" then spoke of "the juice of spiced wine of my pomgranate," which the Beloved in Solomon's Song is made to drink; and at last landed in modern days amidst Browning's "Bells and Pomgranates." But the gods have not made Jemima poetical, though, perhaps, she is all the better for that: it would be a pity if all the world were such fools as Miss Letty! So, ere long, our conversation and the pomgranate were finished together.

A pause—Frank's pen growls on—the firelight shadows dance silently over Minnie and me. We begin talking in a low tone and in the dark, conjuring back our last Christmas-eve, held a year ago, in the same room.

"Whad fun we had! and how we played at forfeits! and what admirable jokes Bob made at 'What-is-my-thought-like?' and how we all fretted and scolded for want of Annie, who afterwards burst in at nine o'clock, like a flash of lightning! And didn't we drink our elder wine, and wait till twelve o'clock, and then wish one another infinitudes of merry Christmases—ah, well!"

And we paused, counting over all the names of our little party, and wondering about them now. It was a change, greater than is often brought by one little year. Some were scattered wide, in this our England and elsewhere. One was at this moment probably hunting kangaroos for a Christmas dinner, or, for Christmas carols, listening to the screaming of parrots under the noon-day sun of an Australian summer. Another, too, had gone from among us, though no further than to the little burying-place down the road, where, through the thin railings which part the ever-flowing tide of life from the stillness and silence of death, we, coming home at night from parties, often saw the white gravestones shine, and thought how soon even the best of us are forgotten there.

These and other thoughts we spoke of—Minnie and I. Some, perhaps heavier than all, were unspoken; but none can lift the veil from his brother's heart. We all live, like the poor hypochondriac in the tale, with some shape haunting us, which to our neighbour is invisible as air. He may walk beside it, or even stand in its place; but there we see it, grinning over his shoulder still.

Well, we talked ourselves grave, and then talked ourselves merry again; especially when on us fell the influence of parental mirth—for Minnie boasts the most popular of papas, and most majestic of mammas. At last I was persuaded into the acknowledgment that I need not go home that night, and that Christmas-morning shining on a solitary breakfast-table was not the pleasantest thing in the world. So we grew "crouse and canty," and nothing broke our cosy cheer save an occasional pathetic reminder from the incredulous and disconsolate Minnie:—

"Oh, Frank! what did you do with my poor little ornaments?"

We waited for Old Christmas—drinking our elder wine—regretting faintly that there were fewer glasses to fill than last year, but still drinking, when our peace was broken by another domestic attack on the unfortunate Frank:—

"Oh, you disgraceful boy, what have you been doing with your mamma's jewel-box? It is carried up to the top of the house, and all scattered about!"

Here Frank, being well abused on all sides, denied with such seriousness that a little surprise arose among our circle.

"How very extraordinary!" said one, "It looks as if some evil agency had been at work in the house." A very unpleasant suggestion, by-the-by, though a curious instance of "superstition in the nineteenth century." However, it was deemed expedient that the head of the household—who was not, and need not be, afraid of elf, ghost, or devil,—should go up-stairs, and investigate. Meanwhile, Minnie and I remained quietly below, drank "a merry Christmas" to each other, and then, perhaps, drank one more, with silence sitting heavily at the heart. But in this world how many blessings, how many prayers go forth dove-winged, and finding no welcome, no rest, flutter back wearily over the sorrowful waters.

This last dolorous sentiment, reader, you may ascribe to whoever you like, but don't lay it to the charge of my young, innocent Jemima.

"Well, Minnie, shall we go and look after the ghost up-stairs?" I said; and lo! there greeted us a domestic hurricane of voices, and trampling feet.

"The house has been robbed! Thieves in the house! Thieves!" A pretty amusement that for Christmas-eve!

I don't think any one of us could lucidly describe the events of the next ten minutes.—There was a rush to pokers and shovels, dim ghastly suspicions of "a man in the house,"—which man, in time, was multiplied into two or three.—Some awful, omni-present burglar was hunted for in dark corners, and in clothes-closets, and under sofas; and there were heard various agonized thanksgivings "that we had not all been murdered in our beds."—Frantic cries of "Policeman" at last produced one of that redoubtable body; then two, three, four, until we were surrounded within and without by those perambulating letters of the alphabet.

The extent of the robbery was ascertained, also the time of its perpetration—some hours before. The formidable "they" dwindled into one small thief, who must have crept over the roofs of houses, and in at an attic window.

"There's the foot-marks of the young willain, sir," observed the astute X 3; and behold a track of Indian perfection—five toes and a heel—imprinted blackly on the spotless floor! Thence descending to Jemima's chamber—in the missing ornaments there was no mystery now.

"What, all my pretty things gone! all?" cried poor Minnie, in a burst of natural, and child-like grief; she has not ceased to be a child so very long, the innocent lassie! "I wonder the wretch could have had the heart to come in here!" And certainly if a thief's heart could be moved by the sanctity pervading the prettiest of pretty bed-rooms, decorated all over with holly and ivy,—poor Minnie had not lost her treasures! But so it was: the house had been rifled completely of jewellery, while its inmates were comfortably at dinner below.

"A nice Christmas-eve we're keeping," observed the much-maligned Frank, as, rubbing his hands, he scampered here, there, and everywhere, in the delicious excitement of "the robbery." And, truly, it was an original celebration of the festival.—Policemen tramping up stairs and down stairs, in the house and out again, clambering over roofs, and searching in cellars; little anecdotes pouring in of neighbours wakened up in terror.—I believe we thought it our duty to be robbed as publicly as possible: some of us womenkind becoming "agitated," and requiring consolation and elder wine; everybody at last growing voluble, all talking at once and nobody listening;—such were the eccentric elements of our Christmas-eve.

At length the alarm subsided a little, the door closed on the last policeman, the troop of imaginary burglars subsided into the probable "little vulgar boy," who, six hours since, had made his exit by the attic window. Of him and his depredations no trace remained save the dirty foot-marks on the floor. We sat over the fire speculating concerning him.

"I wish he had tumbled off the parapet," said one, rather unchristianly inclined.

"Perhaps he wanted a Christmas dinner: well! he'll get one now," observed another; who, having lost nothing, was calmly philanthropic.

"I don't care what becomes of him, if I could only get back my pretty things!" was Minnie's wail—neither a vain nor a selfish one. It was the love-voice at the heart, regretting the lost tokens of other loves. Poor child! the gifts only were gone, not those who gave; may she never learn that there are bitterer things to lose than ornaments!

We gathered once more round the fire to enjoy that inexpressible satisfaction in every adventure,—“talking it over.” We all felt very heroic, now the alarm was past; in fact, I am sure, some of us regretted openly that we did not find the thief, whether with any contemplation of Lynch-law, it is impossible to say. On the whole, we, with customary English phlegm, took the losses quietly, and congratulated ourselves that things were no worse. Though still the prevailing opinion ran that we had miraculously escaped some awful catastrophe—and that it was a marvel we were then and there alive to tell the tale to admiring neighbours. And, perhaps, some of us thought, with harmless pride, of our coming notoriety,—as “the Family that was Robbed.”

"Bless my life," cried Frank, taking out his watch, "it's Christmas morning!"

And so it was! No going to the hall door to open it and let in Christmas:—the worthy Old Fellow had come in of his own accord—after the policemen. So we drank his health, and one another's, and decided that though he came under somewhat troublous and eccentric circumstances, he was welcome after all. Losses were forgotten, and blessings counted over—as should be at Christmas time. And in remembering our own good things, and wishing the like to all our brethren, perhaps some of us thought that if there was no poverty there would be no thieves; and our hearts softened even towards the monster of iniquity whose footprints yet defiled the attic floors.

Ere long the holly-decorated chamber received Minnie and me.

"Oh! Letty, how could the wretch profane my pretty little room, and steal my poor little things?" was the lament of the young heart, still sore. But it was Christmas morn; we looked out on the winter stars and grew comforted. She, probably, thought of her human treasures—I of mine, laid up, still safer, "where thieves do not break through nor steal."

Ere we went to sleep we heard the waits playing in the distance. Unlike all other seems this music—year by year, solemn, strange, and sweet; at least, it is so unto me. One after the other came its waves of sound, eddying over my heart, washing away all things that should not be there; each rose, freighted with some memory, or ebbed, bearing away some pain. And over the great peaceful tide came shadows, walking like angels, some human, as I see them now, some exalted into the image that I see not yet—but shall see. And my heart melted; and to each and all I stretched out my arms with a Christmas blessing, which they could not hear, but ministering spirits may.

"Mistress Letty," hints my Sid, as she puts her velvet paw on my paper in mute remonstrance, "don't you think you have made fool enough of yourself for once? Have you not said sufficient about that Christmas eve?"

Sid! you're right. So ends it.

SKETCHES OF CHARACTER;

OR, MAN AS HE IS.

BY PROTEUS.

THE MAN OF TACT.

THERE is no distinctive term more frequently employed, and less generally understood, than the word "Tact." It is in every one's mouth, and many have a vague notion of its meaning, who yet, if required, would find no slight difficulty in giving its definition. It is the application of perceptive common-sense to life's practical details; the correct adaptation of means to ends, from an intuitive knowledge of character, blended with a careful concealment, a discreet evasion of our own, except when amiable faults are avowed, to enhance the impression of our candour. Cameleon-like, "tact" assumes the colour of contingent circumstances,—is the vague, yet potent spirit, with its shadowless finger arresting the impulses; an unscen ruler of the thoughts, winding its gossamer yet adamantine meshes like a spell; the uncaught "hic et ubique" arbiter of mortal destinies embodied in a fellow-mortal.

When we speak of the "man of tact," as of one in whom this quality predominates,—as hereafter we shall speak of the man of honour, of genius, and of sense, we must confess that above most other characteristics, this is especially absorbent in its influence, and generally usurps the government of the whole man. It collects into its own stream the channels of other motives, which it renders tributary, until it pervades the whole moral surface with one obliterating deluge. If not watched, it will hence induce a general deceptiveness, for the other impulses will partake of its colour, shrewdness will become cunning, discretion will change into artful dexterity. Its very progress is sinuous and oblique, never more so than when assuming the guise of straightforwardness and truth; but if divested of its baser elements, it will soar into the higher intellectual, and will claim affinity to practical observation, or, to speak phrenologically, to causality. In this view it combines with prudence, also with self-discipline, in the regulation of the temper; in fact, is the child of judgment, inheriting with its parent's calmness somewhat of her coldness too.

Observe that man sitting in the private room of one of our largest mercantile establishments. Risen from a low grade to the direction of a vast concern, at one time entrusted with a mission abroad of a most important yet delicate character, he owes the eminence he has attained entirely to tact. The features are now in repose, take your opportunity and watch them, (for they are seldom so, and if he were aware of observation, would assume a different expression;) how the wear upon nerves, even of such flexibility, imparts to the fatigued countenance an air of study, ceaseless even in comparative inaction. The open and bald forehead, clear, expansive, impending over deep-set, small, yet fathomless eyes, restless and anxious in their motion; the lips fullish, wearing at the corner a half-contemptuous yet good-humoured self-contentment, which tells of the owner's disdain for the game of life, and yet of triumphant complacency at his own successful skill in it. He smiles! Ah! he is thinking of how he deluded that shallow fop, Lord F—, whom fortune raised kindly to conceal his puerilities by a coronet; or perhaps (as his eye dilates with haughtier gaze) he dreams of having struck a nobler quarry, when he outwitted the subtle Count de P—; for neither thought they were following aught but the suggestion of their own will. This is the mystery and mastery of tact. Had his victims seen that smile, the game would have been lost; but he was different to each, the man was changed. The lordling saw before him a free hearty abettor of youthful folly, an Apicius, not a Mentor, one versed in life's vanities, yet still ready to quaff the draught he satirized; sagacious in criticising pleasure, yet reckless as the youngest in its pursuit; but to the Count, the deferential air, the silent evidence of every action, so sedulously courteous, yet so artless, attesting the listener's (for he spoke but to inquire as if of an oracle, and demurred but to render conviction more gracefully attractive) reverence for the old diplomatist's sagacity; the rejoinder dexterously introduced to confirm confidence in his visitor that he was not wasting his instruction,—these and the thousand nameless points of tact, dipped in the fountain of his own deep counsel, instilled the wary practiser's motives into the mind of one, apparently his confessed master in the art of diplomacy, convinced the Count that he was regarded as the condensation of profound thought, of astute sagacity; and it so happened, that if there was one qualification in which the foreigner especially exulted more than any other, it was upon his dexterity in decyphering disposition—in his thorough knowledge of human nature!

We have said he was an adept in listening: indeed it was averred that he obtained a large estate by the quiet attention with which he listened to the toothless twaddle of a senile Dowager—age's garrulity—the echo of an empty hall which thought has quitted. He rarely, however, in any case interrupts the driest drawler, for he has tutored attendants who understand not only whom to admit, but also a hint as to the proper duration of a conference, and these with ready message cut short the intruder's dull delay. If, also, in public or private he be himself interrupted, he never loses his temper or the point; resumes the thread just where it was broken, and with polite, yet unswerving pertinacity, directs the minds of all to the wished-for end, in spite of every purposed or involuntary attempt to distract them into devious channels. Some men, like jackdaws, proclaim with noisy loquaciousness their most private matters, alarming the public horizon with egotistical chatter about their own nests: "tact," as the master of it, Cromwell, knew, acknowledges the "safety of silence," and like the rat,—a subtle politician!—saps vast fabrics by an insidious, unheard gnawing underground!

Briefly, this man listens much, speaks little—mostly the latter when he would conceal his thoughts—keeps his eyes and his ears open, his mouth and his heart closed. With numerous admirers, he has many enemies—the latter's hostility is however repressed by fear, and the regard of the other, somehow, never ripens into love; it may be that selfishness, the concomitant of tact, forbids affection. We have shown the fair side of the portrait hitherto drawn from the respectable sphere (as it is called) of life; but it has its evil counterpart or reverse to be seen in a notorious receiver of stolen property, ever watched by, yet ever baffling the police,—one who, having helped many to the halks, has by sheer cunning (tact in motley!) himself escaped. The consciences of both are similarly guided by the law of public not private morality—interest is the ruling principle of both; even the drudgery of each assimilates, for a life of dissimulation is a very hard one. What actor would be always on the stage? Both are commercial men in a sense, though one lives at the west-end, the other near Seven-dials; sometimes they meet,—the rich, upon—the poor, before, the bench—"the Justice" in silk "frowns" on the speciously "simple thief" in rags; yet nature has cut the countenances of both from the same piece, and true it is that her "one touch," the prevalence of tact, successful here,—in hard confronting there—renders both "akin."

Yet not always does "tact" array itself in silken softness, or "stoop to conquer:" some ply the trade with no less success under the guise of rough and candid honesty: these men declare loudly that they always speak their minds: come upon us with a bluff sincerity, disarming prudence by an appearance of incautious trust and open-heartedness. They "cannot cog," they cannot sue, they profess noisily to abhor "humbug," as they term it, in every shape:—a strange ingratitude to what they chiefly thrive by; for certain it is, that though doubtlessly "all honourable men," these are the most insidious tacticians, and generally of the worst kind.

Hitherto we have spoken of "tact" in its deteriorated shape, and indeed the word seems to have got so bad a name that its bare mention breathes distrust. Yet there is a medium class of men who, like William of Orange, reduce violent feelings even to frigidty, and allowing discretion her widest scope, do not entirely obliterate the affections. Machiavelli says that "seldom men of mean fortunes attain to high degrees without force or fraud, and generally rather by the latter than the former," and hence he recommends guile to be adopted—but these, to whom we now allude, practise prudence, yet preserve their guileless sincerity. Here, though the term is rather univocal, and seems to apply only to our concerns with others, its healthy action is forcibly evinced on the individual's mind, for it disciplines the impulses and reviews for ready coaction reason's powers. So high did the ancients in their sense regard it, that they elevated it to a divinity—"Nullum numen adest si sit Prudentia," though, as Addison observes, "this sort of discretion has no place in private conversation between intimate friends. It occupies a neutral ground between caution and art, uses expediency instead of integrity, and hence deceives us by the first, when we look for the consistency of the latter. Almost ever combined with conceit, (the pride of questionable success,) it never possesses the magnanimity to confess an error; for this detracting from its arrogated infallibility might deteriorate its influence: it will acknowledge vices (if polite), but will never plead guilty to mistakes, since the grossest charge against the "man of tact" at the bar of self, much more of public judgment, is not the perpetration of a sin—but the commission of a blunder!

There is a kind of physiognomy in the titles of books, no less than in the faces of men, by which a skilful observer will as well know what to expect from the one as the other.—Butler.

ORNITHOLOGIA POETICA.

BY H. G. ADAMS.

THE SWAN—Cygnus Olor.

"Queen of the silent Lake,
 Gliding majestic o'er thy liquid court,
 Deep in the shadowy brake
 Where the imagin'd water-nymphs resort;
 Where foxgloves hang their bells,
 And oaken bowers their branches intertwine,
 And solitude in leafy covert dwells,
 That sanctuary, snowy queen, is thine.
 Few violate thy state. The timid deer
 May drink the pure wave as he trots along,
 The forest-loving birds may hover near,
 The nightingale may pour her strain of song;
 Yet, queen acknowledged, on thy glassy throne
 Thou reign'st in quiet majesty alone."

[JAMES EDMESTON]

As in the Eagle we behold an emblem of majestic power and resistless energy, so in the Swan may we look upon a symbol of quiet and serene beauty—of dignity in repose. There is much of pride and imperial stateliness in the forms and actions of both these noble birds, but it is pride of a different kind; in the one a proud consciousness of strength and daring, in the other, of grace and loveliness;—that commanding fear, this admiration. As the storm which hurtles around the mountain tops where the mighty eagle makes its home is beautiful, although terrible to look upon, so is the impetuous swoop of this king of birds, the glare of whose fiery eyeballs is like the gleam of the volant lightnings. As the calm of a summer's noontide, when the sunbeams dance upon the bosom of the clear stream, wherein all lovely shapes of fleecy clouds and leafy trees are reflected, fascinates and delights alike the mind and the senses, so does this image of tranquil beauty, the swan that

"With arched neck
 Between her white wings wreathing, proudly rows
 Her state with oary feet,"

as Milton describes it.

We always think of the eagle as an impersonation of manly strength, of physical and intellectual power, and we say, he maketh the rock his dwelling place, he soareth above the thundercloud, and looketh with an undazzled eye upon the sun; while in our allusions to the swan we use the feminine pronoun. He is lord of the realms of air, and rides upon the wings of the hurricane, rejoicing in the strife and tumult of the elements: She "Queen of the silent lake" or gliding river, and sits upon her glassy throne amid the sheltering woodlands in undisturbed security. Schlegel in his "Melodies of Life" has finely contrasted this difference in the nature and habits of the two birds; we quote a portion only of our attempted paraphrase of his imaginary dialogue:—

"THE SWAN.

'Amid the blue pellucid waves my peaceful life is spent;
 Its traces are the furrows light adown the current sent;
 The undulations, scarcely moved as on the waters flow,
 Repeat and multiply my form, without a change below.'

THE EAGLE.

'I dwell amid the craggy rocks; I wander through the air,
 When lurid lightnings fly around and thunders mutter
 there;
 And in the rapid wheeling chase, and in the deadly fight,
 I trust to my adventurous wing, and upward urge my flight.'

THE SWAN.

'The azure of the cloudless sky rejoicingly I see;
 The perfume of the water plants is pleasant unto me;
 And by the verdant bank I pause, with snowy wings
 outspread,
 When sunset tinges all the waves with purple and with red.'

THE EAGLE.

'I glory in the tempest when the forest oak it ronds,
 And o'er the beetling precipice the shatter'd turret sends;
 And screaming, as I circle round the cliffs' aerial heights,
 I ask the rolling thunder if in ruin it delights.'

But, leaving the lordly eagle to rule and revel in his own sky-dominion, and perch, if it so please him, even upon great Jove's celestial throne—as some poets feign he is wont to do,—let us confine ourselves to the more attractive, because more soft and gentle beauties of that snowy paragon of the world of quiet waters and green shadowy woodlands:—

"Fair is the swan whose majesty prevailing
 O'er breezeless water on Locarno's lake
 Bears her on, while proudly sailing,
 She leaves behind a moon-illuminated wake:
 Behold! the mantling spirit of reserve
 Fashions her neck into a goodly curve—
 An arch thrown back between luxuriant wings
 Of whitest garniture like fir-tree boughs,
 To which on some unruffled evening clings
 A flaky weight of winter's purest snows.
 Behold! as with a gushing impulse heaves
 The downy prow, and softly cleaves
 The mirror of the crystal flood,
 Vanish inverted hill and shadowy wood,
 And pendant rocks where'er in gliding state
 Winds the mute creature, without visible mate
 Or rival, save the queen of night,
 Showering down a silver light
 From heaven upon her chosen favourite."

This is Wordsworth's picture, and an extremely beautiful one it is, although not more so, perhaps, than some others which we shall presently place before our readers. "The mantling spirit of reserve!"—how well this line conveys the idea of the drawing back, and arching of the stately creature's neck. We remember a comparison drawn by Lady Marchmont, in L. E. L.'s "Ethel Churchill," which may be appropriately quoted here:—

"A swan always gives the idea of a court lady,—stately in her grace, ruffling in her bravery, and conscious of the floating plumes that mark her pretensions. The peacock is a coquette, it turns in the sunshine; it looks round as if to ask the conscious air of its purple and gold; but the swan sails on in majestic tranquillity; it sees the fair image of its perfect form in the waters below, and is content.

'It seeks not the applause of vulgar eyes.'

And now for another picture worthy of a place in our swan gallery beside that of Wordsworth. We know not who is the limner:—

"Look at the feeding swan beneath the willows;
How pure her white neck gleams against their green,
As she sits nestling on the waters!

Beautiful!

She is the lady of the reed-girt isles.
See how she swells her navigable wings,
And coasts her sedgy empire keenly round:
She looks a bird of snow dropt from the clouds
To queen it o'er the minnows.

The bright,
The pearly creature! lone and calm she rides
Like Dian on the waves when night is clear,
And the sleek west wind smooths the billows down
Into forgetfulness, that she may see
How fast her silver gondola can boom
Sheer on the level deep."

It irks us much to let this go without the painter's name, but we cannot help it; whoever the author is, he has a true eye for the beautiful, a true ear for melody, a rich imagination, and a perfect command of the rare art of word-painting. Our next piece must be also by an anonymous author, it is short, but exhibits great descriptive powers:—

"The snowy swan that like a fleecy cloud
Sails o'er the crystal of reflected heaven, (Some waveless stream,) while through her reedy wings

The zephyr makes such distant melody,
That up we gaze upon the twilight stars,
And think it is the spherical music."

Most of our readers will, doubtless, thank us for adding to these pictures an exquisite piece of poetical imagery by Thomas Hood; it is from a poem entitled "The Two Swans," not so well known, we fear, as it should be, even to the lovers of imaginative poetry. This, like the longer and more highly wrought "Plea of the Midsummer Fairies," "The Two Peacocks of Bedford," and some other of Hood's more serious poems, is worthy of being classed with the best of Keats' and Leigh Hunt's productions. Will Mr. Moxon allow us to whisper in his ear that we, and many others, are looking anxiously for a cheap edition of these "Poems by Thomas Hood," as well as of those of Tennyson,—a "people's edition." Verbum sap. And now for the quotation:—

"And bright and silvery the willows sleep
Over the shady verge—no mad winds tease
Their hoary heads; but quietly they weep
There sprinkling leaves—half fountains and half trees:

There lilies be—and fairer than all these,
A solitary swan her breast of snow
Launches against the wave that seems to freeze
Into a chaste reflection, still below
Twin-shadow of herself wherever she may go.

And forth she paddles in the very noon
Of solemn midnight like an elfin thing,
Charm'd into being by the argent moon—
Whose silver light for love of her fair wing
Goes with her in the shade, still worshipping
Her dainty plumage:—all around her grew
A radiant circlet, like a fairy ring;
And all behind a tiny little clue
Of light, to guide her back across the waters blue."

Exquisitely beautiful, indeed, is this image of the gentle and stately creature, gliding in the silver moonshine which follows her even into the shady places, "worshipping her dainty plumage." And her errand?

why comes she forth at this still and solemn hour?—It is to soothe with her song of love-fraught melody the soul of him who lies imprisoned, guarded by a mighty serpent, and to charm, if it may be, the ears of that ever-watchful monster, and lull his senses to a momentary forgetfulness, so that the captive may escape, and fly with her to taste at once the sweets of love and liberty. Ask not, reader, if she succeeded in her effort; but read the poem itself, if you are not already acquainted with it; read it, and confess that no freak of the imagination was ever depicted in such bright, yet subdued colours; no story of fay or fairy ever told in such pleasing and harmonious numbers—numbers as full of plaintive and pathetic melody, as were the entrancing notes of the bird itself:—

"Oh, tuneful swan! oh, melancholy bird!
Sweet was that midnight miracle of song.
Rich with ripe sorrow, needful of no word
To tell of pain, and love, and love's deep wrong;
Hinting a piteous tale—perchance how long
Thy unknown tears were mingled with the lake,
What time disguised thy leafy mates among—
And no eye knew what human love and ache
Dwelt in those dewy leaves, and heart so nigh to break."

With the last two poets from whom we have quoted it will be seen that the swan is a tuneful bird; nor are they singular in giving to it a power of melodious utterance. From the days of Pindar downwards—Pindar who was himself called "the Theban Swan"—how many a child of poesy and imagination has listened to the musical and plaintive numbers of the bird which, they tell us, singeth its own requiem—listened, if not with the ears of flesh, yet with those of the spirit, and made record thereof, so that it has become an article of faith in the poetic creed, to doubt which were the rankest heresy that ever called forth an anathema from god Apollo or the sacred Nine. What care we though Waterton may tell us that this is "an extravagant notion that antiquity has entertained of melody from the mouth of the dying swan," and describe, in his own circumstantial and forcible way, the last hours of a favourite bird of his, which gave no evidence of possessing these musical powers. What care we though a host of other naturalists and people that only believe what they see and hear, and hardly that, assert that it is altogether a mistake, a fable, an invention, a myth, or what you will—anything but a truth and a reality? Have we not our witnesses in the poets of all climes and ages?—to impugn whose veracity were to doubt the very existence of Olympus itself, and to deny that the music of the spheres ever filled with celestial harmony the azure concave, and set the stars dancing,

"Like a swarm of golden bees."

For the benefit of the sceptical on this disputed point, let us cite a few of our authorities. Of the Greek poets, although more might be quoted, one will suffice for our purpose: it shall be Æschylus, who, in "The Agamemnon," says:—

"Like a swan
Cassandra died, chanting her latest notes
Of grief melodious."

Of the Latin poets we will take only Lucian, who, according to Dr. Maginn makes Timon exclaim :—

“ For when all the rest
Held silence, he alone with many an oath Swore that I sung more sweetly than the swan.”

This author, our readers will remember, wrote comedies, which, more than any other species of composition, must be suited and addressed to the public taste of the age, and he would not have put this comparison into the mouth of one of his dramatis personæ if it were not likely to be generally understood by his auditors; ergo, the idea of the swan's dying melody was a popular one in Rome as well as in Greece—and not only there, but among the Scandinavian nations also, with whom, the bird was a favourite with Niord, one of their deities. Thus Dr. Sayers, in his tragedy of “Morna,” founded on the mythology of those nations, says :—

“ What sound celestial floats
Upon the liquid air?
Is it the rustling breeze
From Glaser's golden boughs?
Is it the dark green deep
Soft echoing to the notes
Of Niord's swan ?”

From among the poets of our own country we will first call upon him who occupies the foremost rank, to give his testimony. The following beautiful passage from “the Merchant of Venice” will be familiar to all of our readers :—

“ Let music sound while he doth make his choice,
That if he lose he make a swan-like end,
Fading in music: that the comparison
May stand more proper, my eye shall be the stream
And watery death-bed for him.”

Especially rich in such allusions as these are the dramatic and pastoral poets who wrote at about the same period as Shakspeare. Beaumont and Fletcher, for instance, in the tragedy of “Valentinian,” make Maximus say to Lucina :—

“ Go, silver swan,
And sing thine own sad requiem.”

Sir Philip Sidney's sister, the Countess of Pembroke, in her “tragedy of Antonie done into English,” gives us this version of the old story :—

“ And though the bird in death
That most Meander loves,
So sweetly sings her breath,
When death his fury proves,
As almost softs his heart,
And almost blunts his dart.”

Then we have the two Fletchers, Giles and Phineas, whose numbers are far more musical than those of the learned lady just quoted; the first giving us this picture :—

“ So down the silver stream of Eridan,
• On either side bank't with a lily wall,
Whiter than both rides the triumphant swan,
And sings his dirge and prophecies his fall,
Diving into his watery funeral.”

And the last this :—

“ So by fair Thames or silver Medway's flood,
The dying swan, when years her temples pierce,
In music's strains breathes out her soul in verse,
And, chanting her own dirge, rides to her watery hearse.”

Then again William Browne, the pastoral poet par excellence, thus describes the scene and manner of our client's death :—

“ Just in the midst this joy-forsaken ground
A hillocke stood with springs embracèd round,
(And with a christall ring did seem to marry Themselves to this small isle sad-solitary :)
Upon whose breast (which trembled as it ranne)
Rode the fair downie silver-coated swan :
And on the bankes each cypresse bowed his head
To hear the swan sing her owne epiced.”

In another place he likens himself to the bird of mournful song; as thus :—

“ I as a dying swan that sadly sings
Her mournful dirge unto the silver springs,
Which careless of her song glide sleeping by,
Without one murmur of kind elegy.”

And, once more, see how fondly he recurs to and dwells upon the idea, as though it were a favourite one with him :—

“ Upon the waves of late a silver swan
By me did ride,
And thrilled with my woes, forthwith began
To sing, and died.”

Surely the force of sympathy could no further go. Before quitting this author we may not inappropriately quote a few lines by an unknown panegyrist of his, which were prefixed to some editions of “Britannia's Pastorals :”—

“ The younger cygnet, even at best, doth teare
With his harsh squealings the melodious wire;
It is the old and dying swan that sings
Notes worthy life; worthy the Thespian springs.
But thou art young, and yet thy voice as sweet,
Thy verse as smooth, composure as discreet,
As any swan's whose tuneful notes are spent
On Thames his banks.”

But, lest it should be thought that this is a poetic fancy which has passed away from the mind and imagination of man, let us call into court a witness or two from among the sweet singers of our own age and generation; not to place too much stress upon the testimony of the German gazelist, Rückert, because his is a land of misty metaphysics; we, nevertheless, quote his lines as rendered by “Theophilos :”—

“ The swan that singeth her own fun'ral song,
And bids her soul in music pass away,
Is like the poet; though he seemeth long
To live when he hath eaded one soft lay,
For the soul struggles with her tyrant strong,
'Life,' who detains her an unwilling prey,
And in each song she strives from life to fly,
But spells detain her, as she seeks to die.”

And Schlegel, too—it would be unjust to refuse him admission to the bar, who, in “the Melodies of Life,” from which we have already quoted, makes the swan herself bear witness to the fact, and say :—

“ Who live a life of quietness yield easily their breath,
And when my bonds are loosen'd by the gentle hand of death,
My voice shall gain a melody, a sweetness, and a power,—
And I with song shall celebrate that last most solemn hour.”

As it is quite likely that some unimaginative person may yet feel disposed to cavil at our hypothesis, we will now, to set at rest all doubts upon the matter, give a transcription of the very words of the swan's song as heard and reported by Lady Flora Hastings:—

"Grieve not that I die young—Is it not well
To pass away ere life hath lost its brightness?
Bind me no longer, sisters, with the spell
Of love and your kind words. List ye to me:
Here I am bless'd, but I would be more free;
I would go forth in all my spirit's lightness.

Let me depart!

Ah, who would linger till bright eyes grow dim,
And voices mute, and faithful bosoms cold?
Till carking care, and coil, and anguish grim,
Cast their dark shadows o'er this fairy world;
Till fancy's many-coloured wings are furl'd,
And all, save the proud spirit, waxeth old?

I would depart!

Thus would I pass away—yielding my soul
A joyous thank-offering to Him who gave
That soul to be, those starry orbs to roll.
Thus, thus, exultingly would I depart,
Song on my lips, ecstasy in my heart.
Sisters, sweet sisters, bear me to the grave.

Let me depart!"

Poor Lady Flora! she seems to have floated away into the land "where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest" upon a stream of song; her last utterances, like those of the swan, were full of softest melody. The lines which Mrs. Norton addressed to the Duchess of Sutherland might with equal, if not greater propriety, be applied to her:—

"But like a wild swan down a troubled stream,
Whose ruffling pinion hath the power to fling
Aside the turbid drops, which darkly gleam,
And mar the freshness of her snowy wing;
So thou, with queenly grace and gentle pride
Along the world's dark waves in purity dost ride."

And yet the "ruffling pinion" could not altogether fling aside "the turbid drops" of "the world's dark waves," which would fain spot the purity of that "snowy wing," and so the fair creature sought rest and refuge in the spirit-land of happiness eternal, saying to her loved companions, "Let me depart!" "An Under-graduate of one of the Universities," in his very sweet and musical volume entitled "Song without Rhyme," gives us another version of the "Farewell of the Dying Swan:—"

"Verdure bright and blooming valley,
Banquet of my roving senses;
Wav'ring reed and whispering willow,
Refuge from the noonday fervour;
Freshness of the wind and water,
Mingling with the breath of summer;
Music of the warbling wildwood,
Into trance my nature lulling—
Fare ye well!
Sweeter than the woodland warbling,
Milder than the summer breezes,
Fairer than the skies reflected
O'er the blue repose of water;
Dearer than the shadowy refuge
Wont to welcome me at noonday;
Banquet of my tender bosom,
Constant mate of all my seasons,
Fare thee well.—We never more may wander
Cleaving proudly the resisting river,
Ne'er may hide us from the flaming day-star,
Basking only in each other's presence,
Ne'er find safety from the storm of winter

Wing to wing and bosom join'd to bosom
Foes for thee may I no more encounter,
Feeling dearer than my own thy being,
Feasts with thee participate no longer,
Finding sweetness at thy side grow sweeter,
Forms like mine shall move on yonder current While thou seekest mine,—returning never,— Lo! before my vision
All creation changes,
Wood and river,
Field and heaven,
Dimly mingle;
Light and sound forsake me;
Breath and being fall me—
Farewell dreams of joy remember'd,
Hours of golden hue departed—
Once I sing and sleep for ever."

We will cite but one more witness before we close the case for the defendant, and call upon the judge to give his sentence, and this shall be Tennyson, whose requiem for departed worth and friendship is just now filling all ears and melting all hearts. We quote not, however, from "In Memoriam," but from "Mort d' Arthur:—"

"And the barge with oar and sail
Moved from the brink like some full-breasted swan
That, fluting a wild carol ere her death,
Ruffles her pure cold plume and takes the flood
With swarthy webs."

And now for the sentence! Deponent for the prosecution, that is Waterton, be it remarked, saith, that "the dying song of the swan is nothing but a fable, the origin of which is lost in the shades of antiquity." To this we reply with the judge (editor of the "Gentleman's Magazine")—"We believe that the ancient poets and mythologists never intended to represent their picture of cantus cygni morientis as true to nature, it was one of their inventions of beauty; they added melody of voice to gracefulness of form, and then dedicated this most beautiful bird to Apollo, at once the god of beauty and melody."

And here we may well leave the matter, having made our case good, and obtained a triumphant verdict. It is scarcely necessary for us to repeat here the stories of Leda and of Cygnus; to the classical reader they will be sufficiently familiar, and those who are ignorant of them may just as well remain so; Beaumont and Fletcher, in the tragedy from which we have already quoted, allude to the former:—

"Leda, sailing on a stream
To deceive the hopes of man,
Love accounting but a dream,
Doated on a silver swan."

The car of Juno, according to some authorities, was drawn by swans; those described by Virgil in the Æneid, were probably the whole, or part of the royal stud,—

"Twelve swans behold in beauteous order move,
And stoop with closing pinions from above;
Where late the bird of Jove had driven along,
And through the clouds pursued the scatt'ring throng."

In Shakspeare's play of "As you like it," again, we find Celia making this allusion to the snowy stud of the Olympian goddess:—

"If she be a traitor,
Why, so am I; we have still slept together;
Kiss'd at an instant, learn'd, play'd, eat together,
And whereso'er we went, like Juno's swans,
Still were we coupl'd and inseparable;"

reminding us of Wordsworth's poetical image of the bird, which in the glassy wave "swims double, swan and shadow." We may here remark, by the way, that there also occur in Shakspeare two other allusions which might have been fitly introduced further back; one of them is in "Othello," where, after the violent death of the Moor's innocent wife, Emilia exclaims:—

"Hark, canst thou hear me? I will play the swan,
And die in music;—Willow, willow, willow."

And the other in "King John," where Prince Henry, on being told that the poisoned monarch sung in his death-frenzy, answered—

"I am the cygnet to this pale faint swan
Who chants a doleful hymn to his own death;
And, from the organ-pipe of frailty, sings
His soul and body to their lasting rest."

Ever has the swan been considered a noble, a royal bird, and our great national bard makes this island its fitting home and eyrie:—

"'T the world's volume,
Our Britain seems as of it, but not in it;
In a great pool, a swan's nest."

Perchance the imaginations of some of our readers may have been haunted by such a monstrosity as a "swan with two necks," and it may be that they have thought that this creature should be placed in the same category as the "griffins, gorgons, and chimeras dire" of ancient fable. We should not care to argue that if Prussia is to be allowed to bear about undisputed her double-headed eagle, England might surely possess in quiet her two-necked swan, because we cannot see of what earthly use the lusus naturee could be to us as a nation; but we rather prefer to state the truth, which is that the term is altogether a misconception, or corruption; the presiding genius of Lad-lane being the "Swan with two necks," or marks, which said necks or notches denoted in old times that it was royal property.

And now we are upon this subject we may as well allude to the ancient custom of "swan hopping," as the annual visit of the Lord Mayor of London, as conservator of the Thames, and the dignitaries of his court, to those parts of the river which the noble birds most frequented, was called. The said term being, it appears, a corruption of "swan wpping," that is, catching and taking up the young swans for the purpose of nicking or marking them, so that they might be known if stolen or strayed. This annual occasion of festivity is not observed with so much pomp and circumstance of civic show as it used formerly to be; but it is still, we believe, the custom for two of the city companies, the Dyers and Vintners, to make an excursion up the river as far as Marlow on the first Monday in August for this purpose, those companies having the special benefit and privilege of owning and protecting all the swans bred and living wild between that point and London Bridge. Any of our readers who would realize the pictures which we have here placed before them cannot do better than take a row up the Thames on a calm summer evening. Almost anywhere between Chelsea and Richmond, and especially about the lovely aits, or reedy islets, which abound near and above the latter place, they will have the gratification of feasting their eyes on such a sight as the author of "the Faerie Queene" beheld and admired,—

"See the fair swans on Thames's lovely tide,
The which do turn their pinions silver bright;
In shining ranks they down the waters glide,
Oft time mine eyes devoured the gallant sight."

It is a truly beautiful sight, this, and we wonder not that the noble bird has been made the special subject of protective laws by monarchs and parliaments. According to an act passed in the reign of Edward IV. it was declared felony, punishable with imprisonment for a year and a day, and a fine at the king's pleasure, to steal its eggs; and more anciently still, usage makes the person who might steal a swan forfeit to the owner as much corn as would cover that, or another bird of the same size, suspended by the beak, so that its feet would but just touch the ground, and this would require no small quantity. There is still, we believe, extant a four-paged quarto tract, printed in 1570, called "the Order of Swannes," wherein are set forth the laws, customs, and regulations, amounting to thirty, which relate to the preservation of this royal bird. The curious in such matters will find a reprint of the tract in Hone's "Every Day Book," where are also many other interesting particulars relating to the swans of the Thames, of which Yarrell gives about the best description of any naturalist we know of, and of which Thorne, in his "Rambles by Rivers," gossips very pleasantly, as does also Mackay, in his "Thames and its Tributaries." The poet Masou may be here called on to add another picture to our gallery:—

"The feather'd fleet,
Led by two mantling swans, at every creek
Now touch'd, and now unmoor'd, now in full sail,
With pennons spread and oary feet they ply'd
Their vagrant voyage; and now, as if becalm'd,
'Tween shore and shore at anchor seem'd to sleep."

We cannot help quoting here a passage from Longfellow's prose poem, "Hyperion;" this image of the sleeping swans calls it so forcibly to memory:—"On the shore under them sat the white village of St. Gilgan, like a swan upon its reedy nest. They seemed to have taken it unawares; and, as it were, clapped their hands upon it in its sleep, and almost expected to see it spread its broad, snow-white wings, and fly away." Nay, we should rather say, swim away upon its own pellucid element, which seems proud to reflect so fair and stately a form.

Well may it be said of her as of a ship:—

"The winds come around her in music and song,
And the billows rejoice as they bear her along."

And here, by the way, we are reminded of Dr. Beattie's beautiful comparison:—

"Now, like a wild swan, hastening on her way,
Spreading her wings to meet the wind's caress;
Once more her course the stately vessel lay,
Crowning the swell of ocean's loveliness."

Of the wild, or whooping swan, (Cygnus musicus, or, according to Linnæus, Cygnus ferus.) we have as yet said nothing; nor is it our purpose to make more than a passing allusion to it. This, if any can lay claim to the honour, is the real musical bird, of which Buffon says that "the bursts of its voice form a sort of modulated song:" very different, however, we opine, from the plaintive melody which the poets ascribe to the bird, into whose natural history it is not our purpose to enter, our space being nearly exhausted, as, perhaps, also our reader's patience may be. Two or three more quotations then, and we have done.

Although the days have gone by when the Latin adage of Rara avis in terris nigroque simillima cygno, held good,—for a black swan is not such "a rare bird upon earth" as it was once considered,—yet do we still look upon snowy whiteness of plumage as a characteristic of the bird, and acknowledge how appropriate are those comparisons of the poets which refer to that quality and that of softness, for which the down of the bird is remarkable; and such references are very numerous. Thus, in Ben Jonson's "Volpone," we find a lady described:—

"Whose skin is whiter than a swan all over,
Than silver, or than lilies."

And in William Browne's Pastorals it is said of another fair maiden that—

"Not Pelop's shoulders whiter than her hands, Nor snowy swans that jet on Isea's sands."

Such passages as these, however, will occur in abundance to every reader of poetry; therefore we need not pause to select more of them. Our concluding quotations shall be from Michael Drayton's fanciful description of the marriage of the Thames with the river on whose banks we are now writing:—

"At length it came to pass that Isis and the Thame,
Of Medway understood, a nymph of wondrous fame,
And much desirous were that princely Thames should prove

If, as a wooer, he could win her maiden love;
But of so great descent, and of so large a dower, Might well allie their house and much increase his power;

And striving to prefer their sonne as best they may,
Set forth the lusty flood in rich and brave array, Bankt with embroider'd meados of sundry sorts of flowers;

His breast adorn'd with swans oft washt in silver showers.

A train of gallant floods at such a costly rate,
As might beseem their case, and fitting his estate."

Just a line or two more we must give from the same author, and, as it may well be thought, upon the same august occasion:—

"Range all thy swans, fair Thames, together in a ranke,
And place them duly one by one upon thy stately banke;
Set them together all a good
Recording to thy silver flood."

THE OLD RECTORY.

ANNABEL C—

I LOVE each stone in thy old walls,
Home of my childhood's years!
How many hours thy sight recalls
Of joy!—how few of tears!

I love each plant that climbs and twines,
Its loving arms round thee;
Even the sunbeam, when it shines
On thee caressingly:

For aught that loves thee, dear old place,
Hath to my love a claim;
Thou hast for me a nameless grace:
There's magic in thy name.

I love the sunny garden old,
That girdeth thee around;
Each flower for me weighs more than gold:—
Each spot is hallow'd ground.

Dear is each graceful tree, whose shade
Hath hung around me oft,
While a pleasant song its branches made
O'er the turf so greenly soft.

And dearly, dearly, do I love
One shady walk of thine,
Where, meeting lovingly above,
The hazel branches twine.

How oft I've paced its length along,
In summer evenings fair,
Alone—while busy fancies throng,
Or some kind voice was there.

But wherefore speak of loving one,
When I love all so well?
The gaze of the world-seeing sun
Sceneth on thee to dwell:

Making thee show more lovely far
Than aught on earth beside:
Thou'rt not to me as others are,
In all the world so wide.

Thou seemest like a friend to me,
A friend I've known for years;
However changèd others be,
No change thy beauty wears.

Bitter, bitter will be the day
When thou and I must part!
But may the day be far away,
Thou home of mine own heart!

AFRICA.¹

We have already shown that vast tracts of the African continent remain incompletely known to Europe. We may now show what mighty expanses of that neglected land continue unvisited by civilization, by glancing at the few spots where she has erected her dominion. There is no region in the world of equal extent, where the savage still holds an empire so undivided. Casting a glance over the map, we find an English colony at the southern extremity of Africa, and another settlement on the east coast, at Port Natal. Nearly five thousand miles distant at the remote north is a French possession, which it were an insult to civilization to include among her realms. At wide intervals along the coast exist a few small communities, each scarcely larger than a family in the patriarchal ages, where polished humanity is contrasted with the millions of barbarians who occupy the rest of this mighty region. The new bond, however, that has been created by steam between Great Britain and the Cape of Good Hope, promises to quicken the principles of progress, and spread the influence of industry and commerce, along the African shores.

The colonization of the Cape territory is an event comparatively recent. Soon after the Portuguese had passed the promontory of Storms an unsuccessful attempt at settlement was made, but for a long period it was only as a refitting station for the traders between Europe and the East that the Cape was valued. Projecting into an ocean that rolls on one side as far as Australia, on the other to America, and southward to the Antarctic Pole, its position is admirable as an emporium of commerce, and this was perceived by the Dutch. Inducements to settle there were few. No mines of gold, no forests of spice trees, no banks of pearls were there to arrest the avaricious traveller on his way to the glowing islands of the Oriental Archipelago. The aspect of the land was unfavourable, and it was only for its convenient port and geographical position, that the Cape possessed importance in the eyes of the European trader.

Exactly two hundred years ago, however, Holland, having commenced that extraordinary struggle with the Indian Archipelago which forms so curious a chapter in the history of the world, resolved to strengthen her position by establishing a settlement in Southern Africa. One hundred women and one hundred men were selected from the industrial seminaries of Amsterdam to found a colony. They were followed by many others, some escaping from the wreck of their fortunes, others flying from persecution for conscience sake, others driven from home and hearth by the despotism of their rulers. Numerous Frenchmen commenced at this time the cultivation of the vine. A territory about thirty miles long was occupied, and Cape Town founded on the brink of the sea. It was only as a midway stage on the high road of their Indian commerce that the Dutch prized this settlement. But the energies of man are expansive, and the enterprise of the colonists spread, until at the present day it covers an extent of territory with an area more than double that of the United Kingdom.

Settling in a savage country, tenanted by barbarians, and contiguous to the wildest regions of the earth, the Europeans could expect no peaceful enjoyment of a right which civilization has assumed, of establishing itself in the waste places of the world. The Hottentots, then a manly, independent people, enjoying property in common, and flourishing in a state of peace and simplicity, at first welcomed, then resisted, then fled before the invaders of their soil. They suffered many wrongs from the Dutch, degenerated, and became a scattered horde of thieves and beggars, sinking down at length to become the serfs of the farmers. They laboured under the whip, and were frequently goaded to work by having small shot fired into the fleshy parts of the body. To offend a boor or his wife subjected the slave to a flogging at the wheel, and when he mortally offended his master, the Hottentot was often knocked over by a rifle-ball, as he went on some pretended errand on a lonely road. Under this system their numbers declined, and their national character became darkened and debased.

Meanwhile the colonists thrived. Their flocks and herds increased, and men possessing three thousand head of cattle and thirteen thousand sheep might be found in the settlement. The flourishing farmers owned horses, and the very wealthy indulged in the luxury of a wagon for locomotion. The manner of life practised by these settlers was sufficiently romantic, and differs in few particulars now, from what it was then. The farmers love comfort more, are more ambitious, and possess more means for living in ease, but with this exception little change takes place in their economy generation after generation.

The boor settles down with his family on a tract of land, then chosen at will, now obtained from the colonial government. The tenement is built with much resemblance to an English farm-house—the walls of unbaked clay, whitewashed on the outside, the rafters of the roof bare and hung with strings of onions, implements, guns, knives, dried meat, &c. The long building is sometimes divided into three compartments—one large family room in the middle, and a sleeping chamber on either hand. Neither stove nor chimney was built in the earlier specimens of these habitations, cooking being carried on outside; but the settlers have learned to love a hearth, and the smoke curls up from the roofs of the modern houses. Among the other decorations of the "parlour," a freshly-slaughtered sheep is often suspended in a corner, two sheep a-day being the common consumption of a moderate family including herdsmen. The corn-fields supply bread, the pasture feeds the herds and flocks, the orchard affords peach-brandy, the vineyard wine, and a mill prepares the grain for food; in the garden are found vegetables for daily consumption, and thus provisioned, the boor is independent in his estate, drawing all the necessaries of life from the soil which he tills himself, but adding comforts and luxuries from the towns on the coast, and bringing from them furniture to adorn his house, utensils for the farm or the kitchen, clothes to deck his family, and miscellanea to increase their stores, in the wagon which bears the produce of his land for sale at Cape Town.

Many traces of the primitive life remain, especially in the interior. In the evening the cattle and sheep are gathered into the fold and the cows are milked. Should a child have been born in the family that day, so many are marked as its future possession. In this way each family sends out branches, and the country for many miles is often covered with the flocks and herds of the children, and the children's children, of some wealthy boor, who sits at the head of his tribe like one of the patriarchs of the Old Testament.

The Cape territory forms an irregular triangle 500 miles long, with an average breadth of 240. It is divided into two provinces and thirteen districts, and consists of three successive plateaus, increasing in elevation from the sea, and separated by chains of hills. The first extends from the coast, with an irregular width of from twenty to sixty miles, possesses a deep fertile soil, is diversified by beautiful valleys, and graced by small forests and grassy levels, with the other characteristics of a fine pastoral country. The temperature here is mild, equable, and salubrious. Beyond the ridge that borders this favoured district is another of similar size, but composed of barren hills, or those wide, naked flats of clay called Karroos, alternating with patches of land properly watered and abundantly fertile. There the climate ranges between greater extremes, as far as the base of the mighty Black Mountain, beyond which lies the Great Karroo, a desolate plain 300 miles wide, shut in by ranges whose peaks attain, in parts, an elevation of 10,000 feet. The vast level is broken by tracts of rugged hills, and intersected by many rivers whose beds are dry in summer. At such seasons of drought the enormous herds of wild beasts which frequent the Karroo are driven further south in search of water, and the roads are impassable. Population is thinly scattered over this region, and increases in density as we approach the sea.

Though the climate of South Africa is mild and healthy, the processes of agriculture are occasionally interrupted by periods of drought. The energy of the settlers, however, often overcomes this obstacle, and is rewarded by plentiful returns. The only spontaneous vegetable product much sought is the aloes, for which the farmers get 20% a load at Cape Town, so that all they have to depend on is industry. The progress of the colony may be indicated by the progress in the culture of its soil. It may be well, however, to remind the reader that the "Cape" was taken by the English in 1805, confirmed to them in 1815, and has since remained in their possession. In 1833, 269,000 acres were under tillage; 124,494 wheat, 46,626 barley, 12,939 rye, 49,645 oats, 20,554 gardens and vineyards. More than seventeen million acres were employed in pasture, and about ten millions remained waste. About 2,000,000 sheep feed on the grassy lands, with 312,000 horned cattle. At present nearly two million pounds of wool are exported, although every branch of industry does not prosper in an equal ratio, as the export of wine, amounting twenty years ago to 1,500,000 gallons, fell by 1941 to 81,600, and only to the value of 40,000*l*. The total exports are now about 1,000,000*l*. of which 700,000*l*. is of wool; and a proportionate worth of British manufactures is consumed. For it must be recollected that it is as the consumer of the produce of English industry that the colonist is of value. It is shown that every settler in the Cape consumes 3*l*. 2*s*. of British manufactures, so that we must have a continual interest in the prosperity of those distant possessions. As a customer, therefore, every Cape colonist is worth ninety German slaves, while every Australian is worth 225. The population of this territory is now about 220,000, of whom 25,000 are located in Cape Town. There are several other towns, many of which wear the promise of great prosperity, adorned already with public buildings, and needing only the energies of an unfettered population to become the rivals of those in New South Wales. We have the testimony of many travellers and residents to show that the climate is pleasant and healthy, less sickness occurring among the troops than among those of any other station out of England. Let us make the country safe; let us conciliate the settlers and promote emigration, and in the whole range of our empire few possessions will surpass in value the Cape of Good Hope.

The resident in Cape Town may enjoy all the advantages he could procure in London,—churches, chapels, banks, hotels, theatres, public conveyances, insurance offices, newspapers, balls, &c., with the luxury of superb scenery close at hand, where he may wander on holidays, on horseback or on foot. Close to him is a beautiful sea-beach, and he may indulge himself in a glass of wine and other good-cheer at the far-famed house of Farmer Peck. Often has the traveller noticed the inscription in a medley of languages above this worthy innkeeper's door; but Dr. Berncastle was recently industrious enough to copy it:—

"Life is but a journey; let us live well on the road,
Says the Gentle Shepherd.

Multum in parvo, pro bono publico;
Entertainment for man and beast all in a row.
Lekker kost (nice victuals), as much as you please;
Excellent beds, without any fleas.
Nos patriam fugimus, now we are here,
Vivamus, let us live, by selling beer.
On donne à boire, et à manger ici;
Come in and try it, whoever you be."

Four classes of population inhabit the colony,—the Hottentots or Bushmen, the emancipated blacks, the Europeans, and the Kafirs. The last are the most troublesome, but have in many instances bent to the yoke of civilization. They frequently, however, revert to their old practices, professing Christianity and returning to heathenism through motives of interest. One crafty hypocrite was recently brought to England, potted, educated, baptized, and sent back with a handsome reward to preach religion among his people; but he was still a pagan in heart, and a savage in his tastes. The account he gave to his tribe of the wonderful land he had visited was very curious. Some details of it may amuse the reader. His friends crowded round him, asking questions about England:—

"Was it large?"

"Yes, it was large; but the people were so numerous they found it small."

"Were they so very numerous?"

"Yes; England was like a large piece of meat covered with flies crowding upon each other."

"What surprised him most?"

"The wagons which travelled without oxen or horses," (railway carriages.) "Ah!" continued the barbarian, who had been to court, and learned hypocrisy there, "I have always told our people that there was no use in trying to conquer the white man. It is like little boys attempting to shoot elephants with small bows and arrows."

When this conviction becomes rooted among the Kafirs we may have an end of the wretched wars between them and the colonists, though under any circumstances, considering the cost of military establishment, the settlers ought to be secured from plunder and murder. England has neglected them; but the monthly steamers constantly attracting observation to that rich and healthy colony, will ensure it, we have no doubt, more attentive notice from the home-country. Thus in every way the facilitated intercourse will prove a blessing and a boon to the Cape.

The next British settlement in Africa is the territory of Natal, surrounded by a region still imperfectly known, but now promising to rise and flourish among our most prosperous colonies. It is a high, grassy country, with a fertile soil, abundance of water, and a healthy climate, subject to none of the epidemics common in other parts of Africa. It occupies about 35,000,000 acres. Its surface is well adapted for road-making. The soil of no part of the world exceeds in capability that of Natal for the cultivation of cotton and indigo. Coal and black-lead have been discovered, and copper will probably soon be found. The rivers are numerous and easily bridged, while the situation of the colony is admirable. Flocks and herds already crowd many of its sweet and airy pastures, yielding hides and wool for exportation. Indian-corn, pumpkins, and tobacco, are grown without irrigation. Sweet potatoes are raised in immeasurable quantities, principally near the sea, where the sandy soil is adapted to them. In the forests are found ebony and other beautiful woods, elegantly veined and taking a fine polish. Numerous fruits, foreign and native, thrive abundantly, while above all grain and potatoes yield immeasurable crops. Oats, millet, and beans, may be added to this list of productions, necessarily imperfect as it is. From the rich virgin soil of this beautiful country will one day be derived, no doubt, supplies of every thing proper for the sustenance and pleasure of a large population.

Timber and woods for all purposes abound. Stone and clay for bricks are found in all parts; coal has been discovered, but little developed; water power is plentiful; the harbour is safe and spacious; native labour is cheap; there are no aborigines to harass the settlers; the right of self-government is enjoyed; there are no poor to support, and no imperial taxes to pay.

We have thus recapitulated the advantages of this favoured colony, which is within a fortnight's sailing-distance of Table Bay, Cape Town. Steam communication will probably be soon established. The disadvantages should, however, be also enumerated. Tick afflicts cattle occasionally, lightning in the summer is severe, the temperature for a few days is oppressively hot, rust now and then visits the wheat crops near the coast, and a swarm of locusts from time to time descends upon the land. A few lions, buffaloes, wolves, sea-cows, rhinoceroses, and wild cats, frequent the woods and rivers, with some alligators and snakes; none, however, of a decidedly deadly character. A decoction of tobacco cures the bite of a serpent. When dysentery makes its appearance, an infusion of pomegranate rind is a sovereign remedy.

It is common to hear sneers at the idea of our ever deriving large supplies of cotton from a territory like that of Natal. Less than a hundred years ago the same jests circulated with respect to America. Eight bales brought to Liverpool by one ship in 1784 were seized, because the customs officers doubted they could have come thence. In 1791 that country exported 2,000,000 lbs., and now, we believe, about 800,000,000 are brought thence to England alone. So it may be in proportion at Natal. Four years ago the export was less than 5,000 lbs.; it is now about 15,000. 400,000 lbs. of tobacco are raised, which may be increased to 4,000,000. Silk, flax, and hemp, with castor-oil, aloes, and colombo-root, may be enumerated among the valuable products of the colony. Besides all we have mentioned, the soil is adapted for coffee, tea, and olives. Gum of beautiful quality abounds; so also bees'-wax, honey, and ivory, could be largely exported, both to Europe and the East. We have a list of forty-four woods growing in Natal and the Cape territory, suitable to every purpose, from flooring the decks of a ship to inlaying the doors of a cabinet.

With all these advantages Natal may be expected to prosper, notwithstanding the occurrence of the numerous difficulties that invariably occur upon the foundation of a new colony. Emigration is proceeding with more rapidity. About 10,000 settlers are located on the soil, with 100,000 Africans,—not natives, since the country was wholly depopulated, but immigrants from neighbouring districts. These multiply in proportion as the demand for their cheap labour increases. Therefore, in spite of the doleful Jeremiads of one or two disappointed settlers who went out fancying they were to reap Dutch dollars as the Israelites reaped manna in the desert, we advise emigration to Natal to those who fear the length and the expense of a voyage to Australia. It may here be useful to indicate the distances of our various southern possessions,—to Cape of Good Hope, 6,500 miles; to Algoa Bay, 6,860; to Port Natal, 7,250; to Swan River, Australia, 11,200; to Van Diemen's Land, 12,260; to Sydney, 13,100; and to New Zealand, 13,340. To the United States the distance is 3,000 miles, and we suppose to this, with the superior advantages offered by that happy region, may be attributed the immense excess of emigration to its shores over that to the shores of our own possessions. We learn from our able contemporary, the "Eclectic Review," that in 1849, 41,000 went from Great Britain to her North American colonies, 32,000 to Australia and New Zealand, 6,490 to the African settlements, and 219,000 to the United States. The writer justly assigns as the cause of this the superior institutions of North America as compared with those enjoyed by our own colonists.

The exports of Natal fell from 15,416*l.* in 1847, to 10,868*l.* in 1849, owing to the Dutch leaving the colony; but the imports were during the same period from 41,958, to 46,304, and are steadily advancing.

These are the two English settlements in Africa, occupying, after all, but an insignificant space on the map of that mighty peninsula. Sierra Leone, Cape Coast Castle, and the other little steam-stations are of little interest to the English reader except as centres of operations against the slave-trade, to which subject they belong. The remaining European territory is that of Algeria, won by French arms, retained by the united power of blood and gold, but civilized or conciliated by neither. It is a possession expensive to its owners, unprofitable to its people. No country can be called civilized, which like Algeria is governed by the sword, and little prospect is presented by the circumstances of its position, of that influence being quickly withdrawn. Won by the edge of the sabre, it is held by the same tenure, for France appears unequal to the task of reconciling her African subjects to the weight of her yoke. But all who are familiar with the character of her colonial policy, will easily understand the cause of this failure. It is not by savage cruelty or selfish tyranny that men are conciliated or rendered content with the loss of their independence.

Algeria lies on the southern coast of the Mediterranean, between the kingdoms of Morocco and Tunis. Its length is about 500 miles, its breadth, not exactly determined, but varying between 40 and 200. The surface is mountainous, barren tracts alternating with others of exuberant fertility, covered with gardens, orchards, and cultivated fields. The climate is fair, and the natural resources are abundant, but agriculture has not extended over half the country, which has throughout its history been the prey of war. Forming at one period a province of Rome, it parted from that mighty mass of empire, after the fall of her liberty, passed through the hands of the Vandals, the Saracens, the Spaniards, the pirate dynasty of Barbarossa, and became the centre of a free-booting system formidable to the trade of the world. It was chastised by successive bombardments, and at length, in 1830, invaded by the French, who immediately united it to their empire. From that day, a struggle for the possession of the region has engaged its conquerors, for a people numbering 2,000,000, hating their masters, are not easily to be kept in subjection.

During the twenty years of occupation, France, it is calculated, has lost 730,000 men in Algeria, besides about 800,000,000 of francs, or 32,000,000*l.* sterling in money. An army of 100,000 men is perpetually manœuvring in the country, and, with the exception of some heavy cavalry regiments, every corps in the French service has been decimated in reaping a harvest of la gloire in Africa. Nor is discipline improved by the process; for the troops thus bivouacking in a barbarous country become demoralized and ferocious. As to the polished manners which tradition rather than experience assigns to the French, how are they in Algeria? Some of our stiff-stocked disciplinarians, cased in brass and crimson, would have fainted at the rough manners of poor Marshal Bugeaud, whose coarseness was imitated by his officers. One of his aides-de-camp in full uniform, wearing a colonel's epaulets, was one day dining at a fashionable restaurant in Algiers. The waiter, being dilatory, excited the hero's anger and encountered a rapid fire of knives and plates when at last he entered the room. Staggered for a moment by the volley, the serving-man rushed forward and discharged an omelet full in the colonel's face, sending the dish after it by way of supplement. In a moment the belligerents were at close quarters, and the military grandee rolled upon the floor in the clutches of the enraged waiter. This, with other similar anecdotes, is related by a French traveller.

When the riches of the country are remembered, it appears surprising that Algeria has no export trade. So, however, it is. The soil does not yield enough to support the people, there are no manufactures, and all supplies must be brought from Europe. From France and Belgium are imported iron, tools, shoes and hosiery, with woollen and cotton cloths; from Marseilles, the coffee of Mocha; from Normandy, fruits; from the borders of the Black Sea, corn; from Spain, vegetables. Tobacco sufficient for consumption is grown, but none exported.

The whole system of government in Algeria is bad. The social system is so miserable that the country is continually poor, relying on importations for food, while its own soil could support a population treble that which now exists; with the materials of wealth indeed, abundant throughout its whole extent, it is a wretched dependency, without industry or civilization. France might have rendered it an ornament, it is now a blot upon her empire. Even as a military school of exercise, it produces none but an evil effect. Our African squadron is valuable to us, if only as a naval school of exercise, and so might Algeria be to France, even if she never attempts to make it worth possessing in any other way. But the army is only harassed and demoralized by service there. This was especially true before the revolution of February, when all offices of honour and profit were filled by worthless parasites of the throne. Since that event much amelioration has been effected. Under the old system, though the ranks shouted Vive la France, and sang songs in praise of la gloire, there was a bad feeling between officers and men. The Duc de Nemours, for instance, appointed by the caprice of the crown, was unpopular in the highest degree. An anecdote may illustrate his character. It is related on the authority of Count St. Marie.

When on a campaign in the interior, he was heard complaining in his tent that the glass of his watch was broken. The sentinel saw him throw away the pieces in vexation, and offered to join them together. His service was accepted almost as a jest, and the poor fellow ran off to borrow a piece of silver money from his serjeant major. Obtaining the coin, he hammered it with his ramrod on a stone into the form of the watch, thus making a concave mould, and contrived with much puzzling of his brain to reunite the pieces of glass. Two hours' assiduous labour produced the desired result, and the watch was restored to the Duke in very good condition. His Highness looked at the workmanship, complimented the artificer on his perseverance and ingenuity, but never touched his princely purse to reward him, fancying doubtless that a gracious word from a king's son was worth five francs from a common man. So he did not pay the man for his labour, or even reimburse the borrowed coin. "The poor soldier," says the Count St. Marie, "became, of course, an object of derision to his comrades, and lost ten days' pay to defray the debt he had incurred." This was a trifling incident, but it had its effect, and was told in a tone of bitter sarcasm by every camp-fire in Algeria.

Of course, however, where Frenchmen are, science must make progress. The grandees of Algeria cannot cover the land with harvests, but they can classify the flies and vermin of the country. Among others, St. Vincent, president of a learned society, visited Algeria, under the colours of natural history. He was very active in his researches, procured numbers of specimens, pinned butterflies and beetles, and invited all zealots in the cause of science to aid him. One day a young officer brought to him two rats, each with a long excrescence issuing from the top of the nose, and resembling the trunk of an elephant. These rare phenomena were eagerly bought, assigned to their proper classification, and ticketed as rat trompé. Intelligence of this important and curious discovery was immediately sent to Paris, where all the scientific host was in arms about this new discovery in rats. Alas! however, the excrescences dried, dropped off, and were found to be only the tails of two other rats, inserted into incisions cut above the noses of the wonderful specimens. Shall we attempt to imagine the shame and vexation of the Naturalist!

All circumstances considered, Algeria can scarcely be said to have benefited much by the passage from barbarian sway to French rule. There remain, therefore, only the Cape and Port Natal to indicate as the spots where civilization has erected her tabernacle on the vast extent of the African continent. Over the rest of that immense region barbarism of different shades prevails. Where it is darkest and lowest is the great field of slavery, a subject to which our third and last African sketch is to be devoted. If our views upon the question be correct, there is no doubt that the establishment of steam communication between England and the Cape will aid largely in their development. The only means which, in our opinion, can destroy that odious traffic, are the introduction of new ideas into Africa. Naturalize among its degraded and ignorant races the knowledge that more may be gained by honourable industry than by the trade in human beings, and the sources of slavery will dry up.

A WRECK OF THE OLD FRENCH ARISTOCRACY.

AN INCIDENT OF TRAVEL IN THE LIMOUSIN.

From the "Revue des Deux Mondes."

It is truly a great mistake to measure the interest of a journey by its duration, and that of a country by its remoteness; and one is deceived in supposing that it is necessary to go afar in quest of adventures, and make a voyage two years long in order to see curious sights. There is a certain author who has made "a journey around his room" more fruitful in incidents of all descriptions than the numberless voyages of an infinity of sailors that I know; and one may make, thank heaven! many an interesting trip without passing beyond the "neighbouring shores" from which La Fontaine forbids us to wander. The only thing is, that it is less easy to travel after this fashion than the other, and that it requires a lengthened preparation.

In order to observe skilfully, one must have been accustomed to look around one. We scarcely become curious except after long habit, and, strange to say, our curiosity seems to increase in proportion as we satisfy it. When we know a great deal we desire to know still more, and it is remarkable that those alone desire to see no sights who have never had any sights to see. Moreover, it is necessary to have contemplated the grandest spectacles of nature in order to understand and love her least conspicuous wonders; for Nature does not surrender herself to the first comer. She is a chaste and severe divinity, who admits to her intimacy those alone who have deserved it by long contemplations and a constant worship, and I firmly believe that it is necessary to have travelled round the world in order profitably and agreeably to make the tour of one's garden. If many years of youth spent in wandering by land and sea can render me an authority in regard to travels, then am I justified in declaring that in none of my more distant courses have I found more interest and pleasure than in the little trip I am now about to narrate.

There were, then, four of us, all alike young, gay, active, clad in shooting costume, going straight ahead, without fixed plan or preconceived itinerary, marching at hap-hazard in these desert landes, respiring freely the pungent odour of the broom, roaming from hill to hill without other rallying point than the top of a mountain which pointed out the direction of the low lands. After four hours' walk we discovered that this mountain was still very far distant, and that the sun was sinking below the horizon. We had already left behind us the wildest part of the department of the Correze. To woods of pine and birch succeeded enormous chestnut-trees; the sterile heath gave place to cultivated fields. Here and there some houses displayed their straw-covered roofs, and some scattered labourers beheld us pass by with gaping suspicion. To tell the truth, we had all of us a tolerably gallow's look. In this wretched country, where every one lives on from day to day without quitting his little enclosure, without even hearing an echo from afar, four bearded marauders like ourselves, avoiding the beaten road, and marching rapidly across stubble and thickets, presented no ordinary reconcontre. All on a sudden the clouds began to gather, and, by way of varying our sensations, a terrific tempest burst over our heads. It was the first incident of our journey. Drenched through in a moment by this diluvian rain, we rushed, with the ardour of soldiers mounting a breach, towards a village perched like a magpie's nest on the summit of the hill we were ascending. A house of capacious size, but of dismal and ruinous appearance, arose before us. We rushed in at a charging pace, and found that it was deserted, except that near the hearth, where smouldered the embers of the most miserable fire in the world, an infant was deposited in, or rather tied to, his cradle, according to the fashion of the country. By the aid of a stout bandage they had swaddled him up like a mummy, and duly sealed him to the planks of the little box which served him for a bed. In addition, his head was carefully turned toward the fire, so that his cranium was in a state of continual ebullition, such being the appointed regimen of the neighbourhood. At the sight of our strange visages the little one, after staring at us for a moment or two with its eyes wildly open, proceeded to utter the most lamentable utterances. I rocked his cradle with the most paternal solicitude, but could not succeed in quieting him. On the contrary, his screams became positively heart-rending, and we were almost ready to smother him outright in order to put a stop to his roaring. At this summons a woman entered abruptly into the house, and stared at us with an expression of alarm. It was incumbent on us to explain that we were no pilferers, and this was no easy matter. The young mother evidently looked on us with suspicion. She was not altogether a mere peasant, at least she wore, instead of the little straw hat, trimmed with black velvet, which is the ordinary head-dress of the countrywoman, a bonnet, which in the Limousin is a certain indication of pretensions to the rank of the bourgeoise. Her robe, besides, however inelegant it might be, was nevertheless town made.

These matters I noticed at a glance, whilst one of my companions gave the needful explanations as to our pacific intentions. Our hostess pretended to be satisfied. She removed the cradle, threw some shavings into the fire to revive it, and sat herself down with a cold, constrained manner, in which I could discover at once considerable embarrassment, accompanied by a certain air of dignity. Never had I seen a Limousin peasant take a seat in the presence of gentlemen, and I speedily made another discovery which not a little perplexed me. The fire as it revived had thrown a glow upon the hearthstone, which was of cast-iron, and presented a large armorial scutcheon. This display astonished me. I looked round again at the smoke-dried kitchen in which we sat; it was a miserable place. The ceiling was falling piecemeal; in the pavement, disjoined and worn, were three or four muddy holes but rarely cleared out, the dampness of which was kept up by the continual dripping of a dozen cream cheeses, suspended in a long basket of osiers. Two beds, a large table, and a few dilapidated chairs, composed the furniture of the apartment, which was pervaded by a sour and offensive smell, apparently very attractive to a huge sow whose grunting snout was ever and anon thrust into the entrance of the doorway. Whence, then, this curious hearthstone? I looked more attentively at the young woman, and discovered in her countenance a certain air of distinction. I then inquired of her at what place we were.

"Monsieur is jesting at me, doubtless," she pretty sharply replied.

I assured her I had no such intention, and was really ignorant of the name of the village.

"It is not a village, Sir," she resumed, "it is a town. You are at the Puy d'Arnac, in the Canton of Beaulieu."

A native of Marseilles would hardly have named the Canebiere with greater satisfaction. I knew that the Puy d'Arnac gave its name to a celebrated growth of the Correze, and I thought I understood the lofty tone of the reply. All on a sudden, one of my companions, whom we nicknamed the "Broker," because he groped into all sorts of places, and, with amusing perseverance, hunted out objects of art and curiosity even in hovels, touched my elbow, and asked me if I had noticed the picture with was half-hidden under the serge curtains of one of the beds. I had not yet observed it, and got up to look at it. It was the portrait of a general officer of the time of Louis XV. The frame, sculptured and gilt, struck me still more, being really beautiful. "This is a discovery indeed," said my friend to me, while I inquired of the young woman where such a portrait could have come from.

"Where could it have come from, Monsieur?" she haughtily replied; "it is the portrait of my grandfather."

"Aha!" we exclaimed, all four of us, turning ourselves round with surprise. With one hand our hostess stirred the fire, with an indifference evidently affected, while with the other she rocked the little box in which her infant was asleep.

"Might I presume to inquire the name of Monsieur your grandfather?" said I, drawing near to her.

"He was the Count of Anteroches," was her reply.

"What, the Count of Anteroches, who commanded the French guards at the battle of Fontenoy?"¹

(1) Fontenoy, we should here observe, is, we believe, the only battle in which the English were defeated by the French, and it is, of course, a subject of no little glorification with our neighbours.

"You have heard him spoken of, then?" resumed the peasant girl, with a smile.

My friend the Broker stood as if stupefied before the picture. All of a sudden he wheeled round and, gravely removing his cap, repeated with a theatrical air the celebrated saying of M. d'Anteroches,—“Fire first, Messieurs les Anglais; we are Frenchmen, and must do you the honours!”

This anecdote is, to my thinking, the most charming and most thoroughly stamped with the image of the age of any recorded in history. With regard to these celebrated sayings uttered in battles, I must indeed confess that I am very sceptical. Little as I may be of a soldier, I have a notion that it is not in an engagement as at the Olympic Circus, and that in the midst of fire, smoke, and musketry, generals must have other work on their hands than to utter these pretty epigrams, which there is moreover no shorthand writer at hand to take down. I know that Cambronne was annoyed when they recalled to him his splendid exclamation at Waterloo, “La garde meurt et ne se rend pas!” (The guard dies, and does not surrender!) “an invention the more clumsy,” said he, “that I am not yet dead, and that I really did surrender.” I have even discovered that this saying was invented by a member of the Institute, for the greater satisfaction of the readers of the “Yellow Dwarf,” in which he wrote, in 1815, together with Benjamin Constant and many other celebrated macontents! The speeches of Leonidas find me equally incredulous. But, wheresoever they may come from, I delight in these anecdotes, which personify an entire epoch, and engrave it upon the memory with a single stroke. We may defy the historian who seeks to characterise the end of the last century and the beginning of the present, to find two epigrams more striking than the words attributed to Anteroches and Cambronne—to two French officers—one commanding the French guards, the other the old guard; both fighting for their country, at an interval of seventy years, with the same enemy, and on the same ground: for it is a singular coincidence that Fontenoy and Waterloo are but little distant from each other, and Heaven saw fit to ordain that the game of success and reverse should be played out almost upon the same fields. “Fire first, Messieurs les Anglais!” Is it not the type of that easy and adorable, that ironical and blasé nobility, who pushed the contempt of life even to insanity, and the worship of courtesy and honour even to the sublime?—who endowed their country with such a renown for elegance, high-breeding, and gallantry, that all its demagogic saturnalia never have effaced it, and never will?—a nobility reckless, if you please, but assuredly charming, and perfectly French withal, who gaily passed through life without ever doing the morrow the honour of thinking about it, and who, beholding one day the earth give way beneath their feet, looked into the abyss without a wink, without alarming themselves, without belying themselves, and went down alive and whole into the gulf, disdaining all defence, “without fear,” if not “without reproach.”

Between the saying of Anteroches and that of Cambronne there is a great gap; we find that the revolution has passed through it. The gentleman, refined even to exaggeration, has disappeared, and we have instead the rude language of democracy—“La garde meurt et ne se rend pas!”—this is heroism, no doubt, but heroism of another sort. Never did the chauvinism of this present time light upon a more cornelian device, but do you not see in it the theatrical affectation, the melo-dramatic emphasis of another race? That he had no fear of death, and no idea of surrendering—this is what the gentleman of Fontenoy had no intention of declaring: it ought to have been well known—his follower had already given proof of it for ages past. To be brave alone to him was nothing—he must be as elegant in battle as he was at the ball. What signified death to that incomparable race who afterwards composed madrigals in prison, and ascended the scaffold with a smile, their step elastic, and their hand in the waistcoat pocket, a cocked hat under their arm, and a rose-bud between their lips. This epoch was personified in my eyes by the handsome and gentle countenance of the Count of Anteroches. After more than a hundred years I had discovered by chance, myself, an obscure wayfarer, in an unknown and miserable cabin, where his grand-daughter was living in the midst of her poultry, the portrait of this brilliant officer, to whose name will ever attach an elegant and charming renown; for if, like Cambronne, Anteroches did not really utter the words attributed to him, they have still been lent to him, and if thus lent, assuredly because there were grounds for it.

After these over-lengthy reflections, I turned toward the peasant woman, who now inspired me with profound commiseration. She continued to rock to and fro her bandaged infant, who was in very right and deed the Count of Anteroches. I inquired what was the occupation of her husband.

“He is dead,” she replied; “I was better off during his lifetime. He was a gendarme, Monsieur.”

“A gendarme!” I repeated with surprise.

“Yes,” replied Madame d'Anteroches, who understood not the cause of my astonishment, “he had even passed as a brigadier during his latter years: we managed our little affairs very comfortably.”

He was a brigadier of gendarmérie—content to be so—he managed his little affairs very comfortably—and his grandfather, as I find it in the “Military Records of France,” had been named Marshal on the 25th of July, 1762; at the same time as the Marquis of Boufflers and the Duke of Mazarine! Would not the rabble of Paris do well to inquire a little before exclaiming so loudly against the privileges of the aristocracy? Moreover, it seems to me that the government of France should not allow the grandchildren of the Count of Anteroches to be sunk—as they are—into deplorable indigence. Apocryphal or otherwise, the epigram of Fontenoy should at least be worth subsistence to all who bear this name. Many enjoy pensions and are maintained by France, who would find it very difficult to produce a similar claim, and the new republic would act wisely by repairing, when occasion turns up, the injustices of her eldest sister.

But it was now high time for us to leave. It was evident that we embarrassed our hostess, and since we had discovered her name we were no less embarrassed ourselves. I could not get over her coarse stuff gown, her filthy kitchen, and her familiar sow. It would have been cruel to ask for her hospitality, and how could we offer to pay our score? Besides, we knew that a rich proprietor of our acquaintance resided not far from Puy d'Arnac; we, therefore, took our leave of the high-born peasant with many excuses and thanks. At the moment I passed the threshold, I cast a parting glance upon the portrait. The fire lighted it up at that instant with so singular a brilliancy that it almost appeared animated. It seemed as if the countenance of M. d'Anteroches was alive, and that the handsome officer looked sadly down from the height of his gilded frame upon the utter misery of his descendants. "Oh! decadence! decadence of France!" I exclaimed to myself, and rushed bravely forth with my companions into the pelting rain.

LAVENGRO; A PHILOLOGIST'S DREAM.

RESUMING our reading of this marvellous "drama," we find the scene shifted with the second act, to which we now call attention.

Lavengro is in London. He has come to the great workshop and mart for the world's labourers; to the great lounge for the world's idlers; he hopes to persuade these last to give him bread, for he has worked, and would still work, searching in the depths of languages rarely learned, for thoughts of power and of beauty, and placing them before such as have neither the strength nor the skill for the acquirement of such treasures by their own efforts, daintily "set" in English rhymes. His translations of Davydd ab Gwilym, and of the Kornep Viser—these, the first-born of his might, he brings with him, and armed with a letter of introduction to Sir Richard Phillips,—for we recognise the likeness to be his, although the features are a little exaggerated,—he seeks to be employed upon other befitting literary tasks. We cannot closely follow our author's footsteps, for the action is slower now, and the details more minute.

After needful refection, as soon as he reached the metropolis by the night coach, the young word-master set out for the abode of the famous publisher. He was already known to the great man, by essays he had contributed to his magazine; William Taylor's flattering letter in addition, secured him a most favourable reception. But the Welsh Ovid, the heroic ballads, were scarcely looked at; the publisher pronounced them, from the disappointed translator's description, nothing-worth; and proposed to set him to work upon "Evangelical Tales," like the well known "Dajryman's Daughter," and confided to him his purpose to set up an entirely new Review, which was to be conducted "on Oxford principles." The ice thus broken, the youth set forth on a ramble through the "big city," and duly admired all its wonders,—the great cathedral, the shops of the "Cheape," old London Bridge, with its rushing cataracts and whirlpools as the tide fell; and commenced two acquaintances, which continued, at least, through his London life; one with an old fruit-woman on the bridge, whose morality, in respect of meum and tuum, may be judged from the saint she most revered, "blessed Mary Flanders!" the other, a young gentleman of the sister isle, whose disposition might be "frank and ardent," as Mr. Borrow says, but who was little better to our literary aspirant than a guide to dog-pits and places of similar respectability.

On the following Sunday, Lavengro dined with the publisher, and a very "slow" affair it was; but he then learned that the "evangelical tale" scheme was exchanged for one which promised to pay better, the compilation of "Newgate Lives and Trials!" Of these unblest stories he was to make six volumes of, at least, a thousand pages each; the "straw" for this brickmaking he must gather or buy for himself; and when it was completed, he would be remunerated by the magnificent sum of fifty pounds. Moreover, he was to make himself "generally useful to the Review," and to translate into German a perfectly new system of philosophy, the production of the publisher's own ingenuity, the character of which, those of our readers who were not so unlucky as to have to tug the oar in one of the heavy flat-bottomed boats by which Sir Richard provided for the voyages of the rising generation of his day in quest of knowledge, may duly estimate by the information that it stoutly maintained, that the form of our hapless planet was that of a pear and not of an apple, as commonly was held by astronomers and other men of nought. For this precious task he might expect to receive something, if the translation sold in Germany! The effect of tying down the acolyte of learning and literature to hack-work such as this may be imagined: he toiled manfully at the distasteful drudgery; but the compilation of the six-volumed Valhalla of Villains, was the only endurable portion of it; and the slender pay, and the overbearing character of the publisher, (who was rendered furious by discovering that the translation of his philosophy was unintelligible,) brought the engagement to an abrupt conclusion, and Lavengro was left in possession of little more than the one blessing which Pandora's fatal curiosity did not suffer to escape—Hope.

Again, and again, Borrow returned to the old fruit-woman of London Bridge and her precious volume—the Life of "blessed Mary Flanders:" and in process of time a change came over the complexion of her thoughts. An attempt made by some idle urchins to rob her by force of her treasured book, induced the suspicion that "clay-faking," or stealing handkerchiefs, (with, of course, anything else that could be found in the pocket,) was not strictly right, although "the blessed woman" in the book had been "a thief and a cutpurse." She finally commissioned her remarkable friend to sell her once-beloved "Moll Flanders," and to purchase a Bible for her, which she studied with the same earnestness as she had De Foc's wonderful fiction, but with a different result, and a clearer perception of its scope. Whilst Lavengro was passing from London Bridge to the shop where he purchased the Bible for his old friend, a clever member of the large fraternity of rogues picked his pocket of the antique volume. With this nimble thief Mr. Borrow met on more than one occasion; he greeted him immediately on his arrival in town, with the demand,—“One-and-ninepence, sir, or the things which you have brought with you will be taken away from you!” a demand which the tall and dangerous-looking young countryman met by a steady silence and a clenched fist. It was Lavengro's luck to catch him in the very act of picking the pocket of an Armenian merchant, of whom we must speak next. And at Greenwich fair, whither our author had wandered when his exchequer had become almost empty, he discovered the detected thief amusing others, and enriching himself, as a "thimble-rigger." The fellow had set himself up in that respectable profession with the proceeds of the "Moll Flanders" he had purloined, for he had by good luck offered it for sale, where a copy of that particular edition was deemed "worth its weight in gold," and now, out of gratitude, it would appear, he offered the disconsolate and disappointed litterateur some forty or fifty shillings a-week, if he would act as "bonnet" to himself in the pursuit of his unlawful vocation. The following is the scene; part of it, at least, is not usual at Greenwich fair:—

“‘I find no fault with the wages,’ said I, ‘but I don't like the employ.’ ‘Not like bonneting?’ said the man, ‘ah, I see, you would like to be principal; well, a time may come—those long white fingers of yours would just serve for the business.’ ‘Is it a difficult one?’ I demanded. ‘Why it's not very easy: two things are needful—natural talent, and constant practice; but I'll show you a point or two connected with the game.’”

After showing Lavengro the trick, which all but the most innocent of mortals understand, the fellow asked him “if it was not a funny one; and on my answering in the affirmative, he said, ‘I am glad you like it, come along and let us win some money.’ Thereupon getting up, he placed the table before him, and was moving away; observing, however, that I did not stir, he asked me what I was staying for. ‘Merely for my own pleasure,’ said I. ‘I like sitting here very well.’ ‘Then you won't close?’ said the man. ‘By no means,’ I replied, ‘your proposal does not suit me.’ ‘You may be principal in time,’ said the man. ‘That makes no difference,’ said I; and sitting with my legs over the pit, I forthwith began to decline an Armenian noun. ‘That ain't cant,’ said the man. ‘No, nor gipsy, either.’ ‘Well, if you won't close, another will; I can't lose any more time;’ and forthwith he departed.

“And after I had declined four Armenian nouns of different declensions, I rose from the side of the pit, and wandered about amongst the various groups of people scattered over the green.” And he fell in again with the “man of the thimbles,” pursuing his work; seeing a constable advancing to put a stop to it, “by a sudden impulse,” he acted the part of “bonnet” gratuitously, and exclaimed,— “Shoon thimble-engro;

A vella gorgio;”

and the “thimble-engro” right speedily took the hint and vanished. The autobiographer then happened with Mr. Petulengro and his companions, who had encamped behind Shooter's Hill; and returned to the city by a route he had not attempted before; gaining a glimpse of hope on the road, as we shall soon see.

The Armenian merchant:—Lavengro had met him on London Bridge, when he was conversing there, once upon a time, with the old fruit-woman; the detection of the attempt upon his pocket made them better acquainted; Borrow's knowledge of Armenian was the foundation of a species of intimacy; and in the course of it not only philology, but religion, or the comparative claims of the Roman and the Armenian churches, and politics, or the relations of Armenia to Persia, were discussed by them. The merchant told him of intercourse he had had with a secret agent of Rome, whom Borrow had heard of before, from his handsome and dissipated friend, Francis Ardry; and in return for his courtesy, the word-master sent him on a right fool's errand,—he persuaded the wealthy merchant (so he avers) to set out upon nothing less than a single-handed attack upon the Persians! And thereby, we may add, he cut off from himself a hope he had cherished, of being employed in the merchant's counting-house, when his literary projects and hopes had all failed.

A visit of his brother to Town to fetch a painter in the “heroic” line to immortalize the person of a certain mayor of the ancient East Anglian city, who deserved a better immortality, inasmuch as he had raised himself by his own persevering industry from the very lowest rank to that much-envied post of honour, serves to introduce an excellent sketch of Haydon, the artist, who, not many years ago, ended an unhappy life by self-destruction. The picture of the worthy mayor still adorns the great hall at Norwich, famed for the triennial festivals held there; and whilome for feasts which were in some respects a copy of those of the Mansion House of the metropolis.

As our autobiographer was returning from his joyless stroll to Greenwich fair, he espied at a bookseller's window a notice that a good novel or tale was “much wanted.” This was enough for Lavengro. Apportioning his last few pence to the purchase of the necessaries of life during the execution of some fiction to supply this demand, he gained for his production the sum of twenty pounds, which determined him to bid farewell to the unappreciating mother-city, and endeavour, by a pedestrian tour, to regain his lost health and spirits. A farewell to Francis Ardry, whom he casually saw at the end of the Haymarket in a dashing cabriolet, with a young French girl, whose beauty had enchained his volatile heart for a while, concludes the second act of our philologist's drama, and opens the Wanderjähre, which appropriately follows this stern and strange "apprenticeship."

Almost at the outset of this grand tour, being overtaken by the mail, Lavengro was tempted to indulge himself in the costly luxury of a ride. The sketch of the drivers, one of whom will whip the off-hand leader, and the other the near wheeler, and who know too well the dignity of their craft to allow "the likes of him," or indeed any but lords, to "talk about 'orses," is excellent, and will remind many readers of the days when the long-stagers of crack coaches were in the height of their glory and of their insolence; all which things have passed away, like the glories of chivalry and the blessings of Protection, never to return.

Speedily he found himself on Salisbury Plain, where he talked "so prettily" to an old shepherd there about Stonchenge, that he got his draught of "milk of the plains" gratis, little though Mr. Borrow believes in presents, whether great or small.

Pursuing his march, the scenery of the route being depicted with admirable skill, he encountered another foot-wanderer, who evidently is the son of the author's old friend of London Bridge returning from an enforced visit to "Bot'ny,"—the result of too literal a reading of "blessed Mary Flanders's" revelations; and, at length, "on the fifth day" from his departure from the house of his bondage, attracted by the charms of a decent-looking inn, he halted in a small town. Here, pending the preparation of dinner, he makes acquaintance with a "very remarkable character," a gentleman of considerable property in the neighbourhood, who, declining the author's pressing invitation to join in the attack of a mighty round of beef, begged him to accompany him to his residence hard by for his "wine."

"I wish I were going too," said the fat landlord, laying his hand upon his stomach; "young gentleman, I shall be a loser by his honour's taking you away; but, after all, the truth is the truth, there are few gentlemen in these parts like his honour, either for learning, or welcoming his friends. Young gentleman, I congratulate you."

The entertainment surpassed this prophetic speech. Lavengro heard his polite entertainer's story, which is a well-written narrative of half-insane whimsies and wholly insane affectation of originality. Here, too, he was introduced to "the Reverend Mr. Platitudo," a clergyman who is very plainly intended as a caricature of the school which maintains "Church principles" in these days; and a gross and unfair caricature it is. However, it is unmistakably a portrait of some actual person, as is the gentleman who "touches against the evil chance," and derives the inspiration of his comic writings from the portrait of the fat landlord who so highly appreciated his "honour's" good-cheer and learning.

His stay with this unexpected entertainer was not long; and soon after he had set out again he found, at a little road-side beer-shop, a "very disconsolate party." It consisted of a travelling tinker, his wife, and his two children. The tinker's "beat" had been violently appropriated by a redoubtable and ferocious fellow-tradesman, yeleft "the Flaming Tinman," who had given to this disconsolate one a tremendous sample of what he could and would do to keep possession of what he had wrongfully gotten. Smitten with the sudden desire for the unconventional liberty of the travelling tinman's life, Lavengro purchased for five pounds two shillings, the man's stock-in-trade, pony and cart, &c. &c., with the right to the "beat," subject, however, to the possible inconvenience of having to adjust his claims thus acquired with the "flaming" interloper pugilistically. A wagoner's smock-frock, purchased of the beer-seller, completed his equipment; and our philologist set out anew in his quest of a living. Any thing rather than book-making! This is his first adventure:—

"The rain still fell, and the ground beneath my feet was wet and mïry; in short, it was a night in which even a trampler by profession would feel more comfortable in being housed than abroad. I followed in the rear of the cart, the pony still proceeding at a sturdy pace, till methought I heard other hoofs than those of my own nag. I listened for a moment, and distinctly heard the sound of hoofs approaching at a great rate, and evidently from the quarter towards which I and my little caravan were moving. We were in a dark lane—so dark that it was impossible for me to see my own hand. Apprehensive that some accident might occur, I ran forward, and, seizing the pony by the bridle, drew him as near as I could to the hedge. On came the hoofs—trot, trot, trot; and evidently more than those of one horse. Their speed as they advanced appeared to slacken—it was only, however, for a moment. I heard a voice cry, 'Push on,—this is a desperate robbing place; never mind the dark;' and the hoofs came on quicker than before. 'Stop!' said I, at the top of my voice; 'stop! or—' Before I could finish what I was about to say, there was a stumble, a heavy fall, a cry, and a groan, and putting out my foot I felt what I conjectured to be the head of a horse stretched upon the road. 'Lord, have mercy upon us! what's the matter?' exclaimed a voice. 'Spare my life,' cried another voice, apparently from the ground, 'only spare my life, and take all I have!' 'Where are you, Master Wise?' cried the other voice. 'Help! here, Master Bat,' cried the voice from the ground, 'help me up, or I shall be murdered.' 'Why, what's the matter?' said Bat. 'Some one has knocked me down, and is robbing me,' said the voice from the ground. 'Help! murder!' cried Bat; and, regardless of the entreaties of the man on the ground that he would stay and help him up, he urged his horse forward and galloped away as fast as he could. I remained for some time quiet, listening to various groans and exclamations uttered by the person on the ground; at length I said, 'Holloa! are you hurt?' 'Spare my life, and take all I have!' said the voice from the ground. 'Have they not done robbing you yet?' said I; 'when they have finished let me know, and I will come and help you.' 'Who is that?' said the voice; 'pray come and help me, and do me no mischief.' 'You were saying that some one was robbing you,' said I; 'don't think I shall come till he is gone away.' 'Then you bent he?' said the voice. 'Arn't you robbed?' said I. 'Can't say I be,' said the voice; 'not yet at any rate; but who are you? I don't know you.' 'A traveller whom you and your partner were going to run over in this dark lane; you almost frightened me out of my senses.' 'Frightened!' said the voice, in a louder tone; 'frightened! oh!' and thereupon I heard somebody getting upon his legs. This accomplished, the individual proceeded to attend to his horse, and with a little difficulty raised him upon his legs also. 'Arn't you hurt?' said I. 'I hurt!' said the voice; 'not I; don't think it, whatever the horse may be. I tell you what, my fellow, I thought you were a robber, and now I find you are not, I have a good mind—' 'To do what?' 'To serve you out; arn't you ashamed—?' 'At what?' said I; 'not to have robbed you? shall I set about it now?' 'Ha! ha!' said the man, dropping the bullying tone which he had assumed, 'you are joking—Robbing! who talks of robbing? I wonder how my horse's knees are; not much hurt, I think—only mired.' The man, whoever he was, then got upon his horse, and after moving him about a little, said, 'Good night, friend, where are you?' 'Here am I,' said I; 'just behind you.' 'You are, are you? take that!' I know not what he did, but probably pricking his horse with the spur, the animal kicked out violently; one of his heels struck me on the shoulder, but luckily missed my face; I fell back with the violence of the blow, whilst the fellow scampered off at a great rate. Stopping at some distance, he loaded me with abuse, and then, continuing his way at a rapid trot, I heard no more of him."

At his first encampment, our amateur tinker, much against his will, and almost at the risk of his life, renewed his acquaintance with the gipsies; the mother-in-law of his "pal," who had left her undutiful son's tent, and returned to her own people, rather than see a "gorgio" taught the Rommany language and customs, discovered him in spite of his disguise, and attempted to poison him. The timely arrival of a Welsh Methodist, of well-earned fame as a preacher, who with admirable promptitude administered an antidote, frustrated her murderous design; and him, and his gentle and loving wife, when sufficiently recovered, Lavengro accompanied to the border of the Principality. This well-matched pair are very admirably portrayed, and are reckoned amongst the favourites of the author. In the course of their conversations with the wondrous youth whose life they had saved, "the priest" flits before us again; and Lavengro, by the exercise of his mother-wit, dispels from the mind of the preacher the morbid fancy that he had committed "the unpardonable sin." Returning from the Welsh Marches in company with Mr. Petulengro, whom he there met, Lavengro learned that Mrs. Hearne, disappointed at the failure of her vengeance upon him, had fulfilled her dukkeripen, or fortune, as she had read it herself, by hanging herself. This, by the laws of gipsy honour, (in this case not widely different from those of a section of the great world,) required satisfaction; and after a tussle, "without the gloves," for about half an hour, in which our friend came off second best, his Rommany brother declared himself "satisfied," and they proceeded right lovingly together. The gipsy "Pharaoh" pointed out to him, also, on finding that he was not enamoured of the social vagabondage of the gipsies, a most delightfully retired dingle, "five miles from the nearest town," where he forthwith pitched his tent. Here he triumphantly encountered, in stand-up fight, more dreadful than any Homeric combat, and as minutely told, "the Flaming Titan;" one unexpected result of his victory being, that he gained as the companion of his solitary dingle, a young Amazon, high Isopel Berners, who, born in the "great house" at Long Melford, had learnt to "fear God, and take her own part," which latter lesson, at least, she seemed proficient in. Having met with "the priest" at the ale-house, whither he went for needful refecation after his conflict, and perplexed him by showing that he was acquainted with his character and his doings, and offered, by the might of his right hand, (or rather his left, for he tells us he was a "left-handed hitter,") to disprove the claims of Romanism, and to establish those of English Episcopacy, he was favoured with a visit from the reverend man in his retirement, and they discoursed bitter satires upon various classes of the community, all which are plainly intended as Mr. Borrow's testimony upon the question raised last autumn by the appointment of the Romanist bishops here, although professedly uttered before the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Act. A postilion, whom a great storm drove as an unlooked-for guest to the dwellers in the dingle, by his naive remarks upon Lavengro and his associate called forth something approaching to a mutual avowal of affection between them, in which the fair virago shows a far tenderer heart than "the scholar;" and with the story of the travels and adventures of the guest, wherein the priest, and some of his brethren and their dupes, nay, the pope himself, figure, and which is written for the passing agitations, and well written, too,—the third act of Lavengro's autobiography, and the third volume of this amusing book, ends. We are anxious to know whether Miss Isopel Berners did really become Mrs. Lavengro; and if not, why not; and how and when the sociable postilion continued his journey; and indeed, all that Mr. Borrow can further tell us of his adventures. And we hope that our desire, which is echoed from all sides, will not remain long ungratified.

We have space for but one critical remark, and that we insert that we may not fail in our duty towards the greater number of our readers. Mr. Borrow rarely exercises his moral sense; he describes characters and incidents, which ought to have some mark of disapprobation placed upon them, without a word of censure. This alone would require to be noticed by a reviewer; but more than this, he suggests apologies for some of the very worst amongst the bad, such as David Haggart and John Thurtell; and not content with turning away the edge of our instinctive condemnation of crime, actually entitles the prize-fighters, the brutality of whose profession can scarcely be exaggerated, the "priests of an old religion." There is a tone of mockery about this, which is exceedingly repulsive; and we can assure the autobiographer, that no vigour of orthodoxy can compensate for such aberrations from humanity, justice, and common sense. We trust that in the remainder of his story, which every reader of the present volumes will certainly expect to see, the charm of his graphic descriptions and lively conversations will not be broken by such great faults as those we have noted. And, thanking him for the amusement he has afforded us, we bid him most courteously, "Farewell."

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF EMINENT MEN.

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

THERE are, perhaps, no two men who ever lived, and left behind them their own memoirs, who display a more remarkable contrast, than Benjamin Franklin and Benvenuto Cellini. The first is an impersonation of the utilitarianism of modern times, as is the second of the fervid and fiery spirit of the middle ages. The reader of Cellini's autobiography is transported back, with marvellous vividness, to the glorious but troubled period of the Italian republics, and of the revival of art; he mixes with that galaxy of gifted artists who have left behind them an immortal name; he enters into their manners, feelings, habits, and foibles, as much as if he had been himself living in the midst of them. The artist of that age was a vastly different being from him of the present day. Such was the stimulus given by the spirit of the times to men of genius, and such was the unsettled state of society, that we find them at once painters, sculptors, architects, engineers, musicians, poets, courtiers, and captains. They were called upon to do everything; one day to carve a statue for the decoration of a city, and the next, peradventure, to draw a plan of fortification for its defence, Benvenuto having, in fact, been thus required to fortify Paris, Rome, and Florence, in the course of his migratory career. Those were days, too, in which every quarrel was put to the arbitrament of the sword, and an artist was called upon to fight for his reputation, after he achieved it by his genius. They were times when morals were often at the lowest ebb, and superstition at its highest flow; in short, when the papal system, at its zenith of splendour and corruption, was paramount over the Italian mind. The spirit of this age, which never can return, was vividly impersonated in Benvenuto Cellini. Loose and reckless in his morals, but profoundly devout and superstitious, always prompt to engage in broils, and repeatedly guilty of homicide, he recounts with the same calm complacency and immeasurable vanity his artistic achievements, his personal encounters, his necromantic visions, his illicit amours, and his visitations in prison by the Saviour of the world. All his adversaries are knaves and fools, and if he puts a man to death, it is never without the most conclusive reasons. He is a striking and a painful instance how completely the influence of a false religion may deprave the natural sentiment of right and wrong. However flagrant were his violations of duty, the absolution of the Pope was always at hand, and always sufficient, to lull to rest the troubled conscience of Benvenuto, and, to say truth, it was always most liberally afforded in his behalf.

He was born at Florence in the year 1500, and was contemporary with Michael Angelo, Raffaele, Baccio Bandinelli, Torregiano, and a host of other famous men. His father bound him apprentice to a goldsmith, and he soon distinguished himself by his extraordinary abilities. Driven from Florence by a fray, he repaired to Rome, where he obtained much patronage, and afterwards to his native city. Here he was a second time obliged to fly, having nearly killed one of his rivals in art. Again he returns to Rome, where he was soon taken notice of by the pope, and employed in many important commissions. It was a most exciting period; the Constable of Bourbon was just about to besiege Rome, and Benvenuto, while engaged in a skirmish without the walls, declares that he was the individual who shot the Constable as he scaled the wall of the city. He was now shut up with the pope in the Castle of St. Angelo, where he performed a notable and Munchausen-like feat of skill.

"I now gave my whole attention to firing my guns, by which means I did signal execution, so that I had in a high degree acquired the favour and good graces of his Holiness. There passed not a day, that I did not kill some of the army without the castle. One day amongst others, the pope happened to walk upon the round rampart, when he saw in the public walks a Spanish colonel whom he knew by certain tokens; and understanding that he had formerly been in his service, he said something concerning him, all the while observing him attentively. I who was above at the battery, and knew nothing of the matter, but saw a man who was employed in getting the ramparts repaired, and who stood with a spear in his hand, dressed in rose-colour, began to deliberate how I should lay him flat. I took my swivel, which was almost equal to a demi-culverin, turned it round, and charging it with a good quantity of fine and coarse powder mixed, aimed it at him exactly; though he was at so great a distance, that it could not be expected any effort of art should make such pieces carry so far, I fired off the gun, and hit the man in red exactly in the middle; he had arrogantly placed his sword before him in a sort of Spanish bravado, but the ball of my piece hit against his sword, and the man was seen severed into two pieces. The pope, who did not dream of any such thing, was highly delighted and surprised at what he saw, as well because he thought it impossible that such a piece could carry so far, as by reason he could not conceive how the man could be cut into two pieces. Upon this he sent for me, and made an inquiry into the whole affair: I told him the art I had used to fire in that manner; but as for the man's being split into two pieces, neither he nor I were able to account for it. So falling upon my knees I intreated his Holiness to absolve me from the guilt of homicide, as likewise from other crimes which I had committed in that castle in the service of the church. The pope lifting up his hands and making the sign of the cross over me, said that he blessed me, and gave me his absolution, for all the homicides that I had ever committed, or ever should commit, in the service of the apostolical church."

After these passages of arms, we find Cellini, in the pursuit of his profession, again dividing himself between Florence and Rome. The pope still continued his fast friend and patron, but some of the cardinals being his enemies, he was often embroiled in disputes with them, and through them with his Holiness himself.

"The pope set out for Bologna, leaving Cardinal Salviati, his legate, in Rome, and ordered him to hurry me on with the work, expressing himself in these words: 'Benvenuto is a man that sets but little value upon his abilities, and less upon me; so be sure that you hurry him on, that the chalice may be finished at my return.' This stupid cardinal sent to me in about eight days, ordering me to bring my work with me; but I went to him without it. As soon as I came into his presence he said to me: 'Where is this fantastical work of yours? Have you finished it?' I made answer, 'Most reverend sir, I have not finished my fantastical work, as you are pleased to call it, nor can I finish it, except you give me wherewithal to enable me.' Scarce had I uttered those words, when the cardinal, whose face was liker that of an ass than a human creature, began to look more hideous than before, and immediately proceeding to abusive language said, 'I'll confine you aboard a galley, and then you will be glad to finish the work.' As I had a brute to deal with, I used the language proper on the occasion, which was as follows: 'My lord, when I am guilty of crimes deserving the galleys, then you may send me thither; but for such an offence as mine, I am not afraid: nay I will tell you more, on account of this ill treatment, I will not finish the work at all; so send no more for me, for I will not come, except I am compelled by the city guard.' The foolish cardinal then tried by fair means to persuade me to go on with the work in hand, and to bring what I had done, that he might examine it: in answer to all his persuasions I said, 'Tell his Holiness to send me the materials, if he would have me finish this fantastical work;' nor would I give him any other answer, insomuch that, despairing of success, he at last ceased to trouble me with his importunities. The pope returned from Bologna, and immediately inquired after me, for the cardinal had already given him, by letter, the most unfavourable account of me he possibly could. His Holiness being incensed against me to the highest degree, ordered me to come to him with my work; and I obeyed. During the time he was at Bologna, I had so severe a defluxion upon my eyes, that life became almost insupportable to me: that was the first cause of my not proceeding with the chalice. So much did I suffer by this disorder, that I really thought I should lose my eye-sight; and I computed how much would be sufficient for my support when I was blind. In my way to the palace, I meditated within myself an excuse for discontinuing the work; and thought, that whilst the pope was considering and examining my performance, I might acquaint him with my case: but I was mistaken; for as soon as I appeared in his presence, he said to me, with great asperity, 'Let me see that work of yours. Is it finished?' Upon my producing it, he flew into a more violent passion than before, and said, 'As there is truth in God, I assure you, since you value no living soul, that if a regard to decency did not prevent me, I would order both you and your work to be thrown this moment out of the window.' Seeing the pope thus inflamed with brutal fury, I was for quitting his presence directly, and as he continued his bravadoes, I put the chalice under my cloak, muttering these words to myself, 'The whole world would prove unable to make a blind man proceed in such an undertaking as this.' The pope then, with a louder voice than before, said, 'Come hither:—What's that you say?'—For a while I hesitated whether I should run down stairs. At last I plucked up my courage, and falling on my knees, exclaimed aloud in these words, because he continued to scold, 'Is it reasonable that when I am become blind with a disorder, you should oblige me to continue to work?' He answered: 'You could see well enough to come hither, and I don't believe one word of what you say.' Observing that he spoke with a milder tone of voice, I replied, 'If your Holiness will ask your physician, you will find that I declare the truth.' 'I shall inquire into the matter at my leisure,' said he. I now perceived that I had an opportunity to plead my cause, and therefore delivered myself thus: 'I am persuaded, most holy father, that the author of all this mischief is no other than Cardinal Salviati; because he sent for me immediately upon your Holiness's departure; and when I came to him, called my work a fantastical piece, and told me he would make me finish it in a galley: these opprobrious words made such an impression on me, that through the great perturbation of mind I was in, I felt my face all on a sudden inflamed, and my eyes were attacked by so violent a heat, that I could hardly find my way home. A few days after there fell upon them two cataracts, which blinded me to such a degree that I could hardly see the light; and since your Holiness's departure I have not been able to do a stroke of work.' Having spoken thus, I rose up and withdrew. I was told that the pope said after I was gone, 'When places of trust are given, discretion is not always conveyed with them. I did not bid the cardinal treat people quite so roughly; if it be true that he has a disorder in his eyes, as I shall know by asking my physician, I shall be inclined to look upon him with an eye of compassion.' There happened to be present a person of distinction, who was a great favourite with the pope, and equally conspicuous for his extraordinary virtues and endowments: having inquired of the pontiff who I was, he added, 'Holy father, I ask you this, because you appeared to me, in the same breath, to fall into a most violent passion and to be equally affected and softened into pity; so I desire to know who he is. If he be a person deserving of assistance, I'll tell him a secret to cure his disorder.' The pope made answer, 'The person you speak of is one of the greatest geniuses in his way that the world ever produced—when I see you again, I will show you some of his admirable performances, as likewise the man himself; and it will be a great satisfaction to me, if you are able to do him any service.'"

The pope was soon after attacked by a fatal disorder. Benvenuto put on his sword, and repaired to St. Peter's, where he had kissed the feet of the deceased pontiff, "and could not refrain from tears." On his way home he fell into a brawl, one of the many in which he was always getting engaged, and the consequences of which proved fatal to his adversary, one Pompeo, a rival in his own profession, who had unfairly decried his works.

"Whilst I was sitting here, in the company of several of my friends, Pompeo happened to pass by in the midst of ten armed men, and when he came opposite to the place where I sat, stopped awhile as if he had an intention to begin a quarrel. The brave young men, my friends, were for having me draw directly, but I instantly reflected that by complying with their desire, I could not avoid hurting innocent persons; therefore thought it most advisable to expose none but myself to danger. Pompeo having made a short stop before my door, began to laugh in my face; and when he went off, his comrades fell a laughing likewise, shook their heads and made many gestures in derision, bullying me at a strange rate. My companions were for interposing in the quarrel, but I told them in an angry mood that in my disputes I never had occasion for the help of any champions, and that I knew how to end them unassisted; so that every man might mind his own business. Mortified at this answer, they went away, muttering to themselves: amongst these was the dearest friend I had in the world, whose name was Albertaccio de Bene, own brother to Alessandro and Albizzo, who now resides at Lyons, and is exceeding wealthy. This Albertaccio del Bene was one of the most surprising young men I ever knew, as intrepid as Cesar, and one who loved me as he loved himself: he was well aware that my forbearance was not an effect of pusillanimity, but of the most undaunted resolution, which he knew to be one of my distinguishing characteristics: in answer therefore to what I said, he begged of me as a favour, that I would indulge him so far as to take him for my companion in any enterprise. To this I replied, 'My dearest friend Albertaccio, a time will soon come that I shall have occasion for your assistance; but on the present occasion, if you love me, do not give yourself any concern about me; only mind your own affairs, and quit the place directly, as the rest have done, for we must not trifle away time.' These words were uttered in great haste; in the mean time my enemies of the Banchi quarter had walked on slowly towards a place called Chiavica, and reached a cross way where several streets meet; but that in which stood the house of my adversary Pompeo led directly to the Campo di Fiore. Pompeo entered an apothecary's shop at the corner of the Chiavica, about some business, and stayed with him some time. I was told that he had boasted of having bullied me; but it turned out a fatal adventure to him; for just as I arrived at that quarter, he was coming out of the shop, and his bravos having made an opening, formed a circle round him. I thereupon clapped my hand to a sharp dagger, and having forced my way through the file of ruffians, laid hold of him by the breast so quickly, and with such presence of mind, that there was not one of them able to defend him. I pulled him towards me, to give him a blow in front, but he turned his face about through excess of terror, so that I wounded him exactly under the ear; and upon repeating my blow, he fell down dead. It had never been my intention to kill him, but only to wound him dangerously, but blows are not always under command. Having pulled back the dagger with my left hand, and drawn my sword with the right, in order to defend myself, when I found that all the ruffians ran up to the dead body, and none of them towards me, or seemed at all disposed to encounter me, I retreated towards the street Julia, revolving within myself whither I could make my escape."

Nothing can be more truly edifying than the conduct of the new pope when informed of this untoward business.

"As soon," says Benvenuto, "as this new pontiff had settled other affairs of greater importance, he inquired after me, and declared that he would employ nobody else to stamp his coins. When he spoke thus, a gentleman, whose name was Signor Latino Giovenale, said that I was obliged to abscond for having killed one Pompeo, a Milanese, in a fray; he then gave an account of the whole affair, putting it in the most favourable light for me that was possible.

The pope made answer, 'I never heard of the death of Pompeo, but I have often heard of Benvenuto's provocation; so let a safe-conduct be instantly made out, and that will secure him from all manner of danger.' There happened to be present an intimate friend of Pompeo's, who was likewise a favourite of the pontiff; this was signor Ambrogio, a native of Milan. This person told his Holiness that it might be of dangerous consequence to grant such favours immediately upon being raised to his new dignity. The pope instantly turning about to him, said, 'You do not understand these matters; I must inform you that men who are masters in their profession, like Benvenuto, should not be subject to the laws; but he less than any other, for I am sensible that he was in the right in the whole affair.'"

After a while the Emperor Charles V. made his triumphal entry into Rome, when Benvenuto was chosen by the pope to present him with a specimen of his skill, and remained for half an hour in conversation with the emperor, which shows, as Vasari observes, "that he knew as well how to speak to princes, as to exert himself in his art." This flattering incident was soon followed by a terrible reverse of fortune. Upon a false charge of having concealed certain jewels entrusted to his care, he was thrown into a dungeon in the Castle of St. Angelo. There the vividness of his imagination, combined with the consciousness of his innocence, soon pictured our Saviour as coming personally to console him for his miseries. After a preliminary vision he observes,—

"There appeared a Christ upon the cross formed of the self-same matter as the sun, and so gracious and pleasing was his aspect, that no human imagination could ever form so much as a faint idea of such beauty. As I was contemplating this glorious apparition, I cried out aloud, 'A miracle! a miracle! O God! O clemency divine! O goodness infinite! what mercies dost thou lavish on me this morning!' At the very time that I thus meditated and uttered these words, the figure of Christ began to move towards the side where the rays were centered; and the middle of the sun swelled and bulged out as at first: the protuberance having increased considerably, was at last converted into the figure of a beautiful Virgin Mary, who appeared to sit with her Son in her arms in a graceful attitude, and even to smile; she stood between two angels of so divine a beauty, that imagination could not even form an idea of such perfection. I likewise saw in the same sun, a figure dressed in sacerdotal robes; this figure turned its back to me, and looked towards the Blessed Virgin holding Christ in her arms. All these things I clearly and plainly saw, and with a loud voice continued to return thanks to the Almighty. This wonderful phenomenon having appeared before me about eight minutes, vanished from my sight, and I was instantly conveyed back to my couch. I then began to make loud exclamations, crying out thus: 'It has pleased the Almighty to reveal to me all his glory in a splendour which perhaps no mortal eye ever before beheld;

hence I know that I am free, happy, and in favour with God; as for you, unhappy wretches, you will continue in disgrace with him. Know that I am certain that on All Saints' day, on which I was born in 1500, the night of the first November, exactly at twelve o'clock; know, I say, that on the anniversary of that day you will be obliged to take me out of this dismal cell; for I have seen it with my eyes, and it was prefigured on the throne of God. The priest who looked towards Christ, and had his back turned to me, was St. Peter, who pleaded my cause, and appeared to be quite ashamed that such cruel insults should be offered to Christians in his house. So proclaim it everywhere, that no one has any further power to hurt me, and tell the pope, that if he will supply me with wax or paper to represent the glorious vision sent to me from heaven, I will certainly do it.'"

After his release from prison, Benvenuto repaired to the court of the munificent Francis I. of France, with whom he became a great favourite, but in consequence of his haughty and independent humour, was so persecuted by Madame d'Etampes, the king's mistress, that he at length repaired to Florence, there to reap fresh triumphs, and to engage in fresh disputes. Baccio Bandinelli, the celebrated sculptor, was the principal object of our Benvenuto's jealousy, and the following scene between them, in presence of the Duke of Florence, is perhaps the richest specimen of artists' quarrels on record:—

"One holiday I went to the palace immediately after dinner, and entering the hall where the great clock stands, I saw the door of the wardrobe open; as I presented myself, the duke beckoned to me, and with great complaisance addressed me thus: 'You are welcome to court,' alluding to my name of Benvenuto, 'take this little chest, which was sent me as a present by Signor Stephano of Palestrina; open it, and let us see what it contains.' I instantly opened it, and answered the duke: 'This, my lord, is the figure of a little boy in Greek marble, and is indeed a very extraordinary piece; I don't remember ever having seen amongst the antiques so beautiful a performance, or one of so exquisite a taste; I therefore offer your excellency to restore its head, arms, and feet; and make an eagle for it, that it may be called a Ganymede: and though it is by no means proper for me to patch up old statues, as that is generally done by a sort of bunglers in the business, who acquit themselves very indifferently, the excellence of this great master is such, that it powerfully excites me to do him this piece of service.' The duke was highly pleased to find the figure had such merit, and asked me several questions about it: 'Tell me,' said he, 'Benvenuto, in what precisely consists the extraordinary excellence of this great master, which excites in you such wonder and surprise?' I endeavoured the best I could to give him an idea of the extraordinary beauty of the statue, of the great genius, skill, and admirable manner of the artist, conspicuous in his work; topics on which I enlarged a long time, and that with the greater earnestness, as I perceived that his excellency took pleasure in listening to me. Whilst I amused him so agreeably with my conversation, a page happened to open the door of the wardrobe, and just as he came out Bandinello entered: the duke, seeing him, appeared to be in some disorder, and asked him, with a stern look, what he was about; Bandinello, without making any answer, immediately fixed his eye on the little chest, in which the above-mentioned statue was very plainly to be seen; then shaking his head, he turned to the duke, and said with a scornful sneer, 'My lord, this is one of those things I have so often spoken to your excellency about; depend upon it, the ancients knew nothing of the anatomy of the parts, and for that reason their works abound with errors.' I stood silent, and gave no attention to what he had advanced, but on the contrary turned my back to him. When the fool had made an end of his nonsensical harangue, the duke, addressing himself to me, said, 'Benvenuto, this is quite the reverse of what you awhile ago so much boasted, and seemed to prove by so many specious arguments: so endeavour to defend your own cause.' To these words of the duke, which were spoken with great mildness, I answered, 'My lord, your excellency is to understand that Baccio Bandinello is a compound of everything that is bad, and so he has always been; insomuch, that whatsoever he looks at is by his fascinating eyes, however superlatively good in itself, immediately converted into something supremely evil: but I, who am inclined to good alone, see the truth through a happier medium; so that all I mentioned awhile ago to your excellency concerning that beautiful figure is strictly and literally true, and what Bandinello has said of it is purely the result of his own innate malevolence.'

"The duke seemed to hear me with pleasure, and whilst I expressed myself thus, Bandinello writhed himself into a variety of contortions, and made his face, which was by nature very ugly, quite hideous by his frightful grimaces. Immediately the duke, quitting the hall, went down to the ground-floor apartments, and Bandinello after him: the gentlemen of the bed-chamber, pulling me by the cloak, encouraged me to go after him; so we followed the duke till he sat himself down in one of the rooms, and Bandinello and I placed ourselves one on his right, the other on the left. I remained silent, and many of the duke's servants who stood round kept their eyes fixed on Bandinello, tittering when they recollected what I had said to him in the hall above. Bandinello again began to chatter, and said, that when he exhibited his Hercules and Cacus to the public, he really believed there were above a hundred lampoons published against him, which contained all the vilest ribaldry that could enter into the imagination of the rabble. To this I answered, 'My lord, when your great artist, Michel Angelo Buonarrotti, exhibited his sacristy, in which so many beautiful figures are to be seen, the members of the admirable school of Florence, which loves and encourages genius wherever it displays itself, published above a hundred sonnets wherein they vie with each other which should praise him most; and as Bandinello deserved all the ill that was said of his work, so Michel Angelo merited the highest encomiums that were bestowed on his performance.' Upon my expressing myself thus, Bandinello was incensed to such a degree, that he was ready to burst with fury, and turning to me said, 'What faults have you to find with my statues?' I answered, 'I will soon tell them, if you have but the patience to hear me.' He replied, 'Tell them then.' The duke and all present listened with the utmost attention. I began by promising that I was sorry to be obliged to lay before him all the blemishes of his work, and that I was not so properly delivering my own sentiments, as declaring what was said of it by the ingenious school of Florence. However, as the fellow at one time said something disobliging, at another made some offensive gesture with his hands or his feet, he put me into such a passion that I behaved with a rudeness which I should otherwise have avoided.

"The ingenious school of Florence,' said I, 'declares what follows:—If the hair of your Hercules were shaved off, there would not remain skull enough to hold his brains; with regard to his face, it is hard to distinguish whether it be the face of a man, or that of a creature something between a lion and an ox; it discovers no attention to what it is about; and it is so badly set upon the neck, with so little art and so ungraceful a manner, that a more shocking piece of work was never seen: his great brawny back resembles the two pommels of an ass's pack-saddle; his breasts and their muscles bear no similitude to those of a man, but appear like a sack of melons; as he leans directly against the wall, the small of the back has the appearance of a bag filled with long cucumbers; it is impossible to conceive in what manner the two legs are fastened to this distorted figure, for it is hard to distinguish upon which leg he stands, or upon which he exerts any effort of his strength, nor does he appear to stand upon both, as he is sometimes represented by those masters of the art of statuary who know something of their business; it is plain too that the statue inclines more than one-third of a cubit forward, and this is the greatest and the most insupportable blunder which pretenders to sculpture are guilty of; as for the arms, they both hang down in the most awkward and ungraceful manner imaginable, and so little art is displayed in them, that people would be almost tempted to think that you never saw a naked man in your life; the right leg of Hercules and that of Cacus touch at the middle of their calves, and, if they were to be separated, not one of them only, but both would remain without a calf in the place where they touch: besides, one of the Hercules's feet is quite buried, and the other seems to have fire under it.' Thus I went on, but the man could no longer stay with patience to hear the defects of his figure of Cacus enumerated; one reason was that what I said was true, the other, that I made the duke perfectly acquainted with his real character, as well as the rest of those present, who discovered the greatest symptoms of surprise imaginable, and began to be sensible that all I said was true. The brutish fellow thereupon said, 'O thou slanderer, dost thou say nothing of my design?' I answered, that he who drew a good one, could never work ill, and that I was convinced his design was of a piece with his works. Seeing that the duke and all present showed, by their sarcastic looks and gestures, that they thought the censure of his performance to be just, he let his insolence entirely get the better of him, and, turning about to me with a most brutish physiognomy, assailed me with the most infamous epithets. When he expressed himself thus, the duke and all present frowned upon him, and discovered symptoms of the highest displeasure. I, though full of passion, thought it best to treat him with ridicule, and succeeded so well, that none present could contain themselves, but both the duke and all present set up a loud laugh. Though I endeavoured to put a good face upon the matter, I was ready to burst with vexation, that one of the most worthless wretches upon earth should have the impudence to affront me in so gross a manner, in the presence of a great prince: but the reader should at the same time take into consideration, that on this occasion the duke was affronted and not I, for had I not been in his august presence, I should have killed the villain upon the spot. Perceiving that the noble personages present never once ceased laughing, this low buffoon, to divert them from deriding him, began to change the subject, and said, 'This Benvenuto here goes about making it his boast, that I promised him a block of marble.' 'How,' said I, interrupting him, 'did you not send word by your journeyman, Francis Matteo Fabbro, that if I chose to work in marble, you would make me a present of a piece? Did I not accept the offer, and don't I still require of you the performance of your promise?' He replied then, 'Depend upon it, you shall never have it.' Thereupon I, who was incensed to the highest pitch by his former abuse, being suddenly deprived of my reason, as it were, forgot for a moment that I was in the presence of the duke, and cried out to him in a passion: 'In plain terms, either send the marble to my house, or think of another world, for I will infallibly send you out of this: but, immediately recollecting that I was in the presence of so great a prince, I turned with an air of humility to his excellency, and said, 'My lord, one fool makes a hundred; the folly of this man has made me forget your excellency's glory, and myself, for which I humbly beg your lordship's pardon.' The duke, addressing himself to Bandinello, asked him whether it was true that he had promised me the marble. Bandinello answered it was. The duke thereupon said to me, 'Return to your work and take a piece of marble to your liking.' I replied that he had promised to send me one to my own house. Terrible words passed upon the occasion, and I insisted upon receiving it in that manner and no other."

But we should stretch this article beyond all reasonable limits, did we go on any longer quoting scene after scene from this most amusing of autobiographies. Suffice it to say, that in 1570 Benvenuto Cellini at length died at Florence, which he had so greatly contributed to adorn, where he had risen to the very highest honours, and where he was buried with the greatest funeral pomp. His character is better displayed by his own pen, than it could be by the most elaborate estimate on the part of others.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER LVII.

CONTAINS SOME "NOVEL" REMARKS UPON THE ROMANTIC CEREMONY OF MATRIMONY.

"FRERE, old fellow, have you prepared your wedding garments?" inquired Bracy, meeting his friend accidentally one fine day, about a week after the occurrence of the events described in the last chapter.

"Aye, I hear that your machinations have succeeded," returned Frere, gruffly; "and that De Grandeville is about to marry Lady Lombard. I'll tell you what it is, Bracy; it strikes me that in assisting people to make fools of themselves and each other, you are just wasting your time, and perverting your talents: depend upon it you may very safely leave folks to perform that operation on their own account, they are not likely to class that amongst their sins of omission."

"Make fools of themselves!" repeated Bracy. "My dear Frere, it's nothing of the sort, that was an 'opus operatum,' a deed done for our friends by beneficent Nature, long before I had the pleasure of their acquaintance. Moreover, in the present case, I am seeking to diminish, rather than to increase, the standing amount of folly—man and wife are one, you know; ergo, by uniting Lady Lombard and the mighty De Grandeville, the ranks of the feeble-minded are one fool minus."

"Well, that, certainly, is an ingenious way of putting it," rejoined Frere, laughing in spite of himself; "and pray how have you contrived to bring about this delectable affair; for I conclude the match is your handywork?"

"Oh! the thing was easy to accomplish," replied Bracy. "I invented pretty speeches, which I declared to each that the other had made about them; I exaggerated De Grandeville's position to Lady Lombard, and Lady Lombard's wealth to De Grandeville; in short, I lied perseveringly, and judiciously, until I fancied I had got the affair thoroughly en train. But I soon found out there was a hitch somewhere; it was clearly not on the lady's side, for she was so far gone as to believe in De Grandeville to the extent of actually estimating him at his own valuation, which I take to be the ne plus ultra of credulity;—so I set steadily to work to investigate him, and if possible find out what was the matter. I tried various schemes, but none of them would act, his reserve was impenetrable; at last, in despair, I gave him a champagne dinner, at the Polysnobion, taking care to ply him well with wine, and to walk home with him afterwards. That did the business,—he must, certainly, have been especially drunk, for, before we reached his lodgings, he confessed to me that his grandfather had been a tallow chandler, and that the bar to his union with Lady Lombard was his inability to discover that she possessed any pedigree.”

“Well, for that matter,” interrupted Frere, “having admitted the tallow chandler, I don’t see that he need have been so very particular as to the aristocratic tendencies of Lady Lombard’s ancestry.”

“De Grandeville did not think so,” resumed Bracy; “he argued that no amount of chandlery could infuse vulgarity into the blood of one of his illustrious house; external circumstances, he declared, were powerless to affect the innate nobility of a De Grandeville: whole years of melting days would fail to drop a spot upon that illustrious name;—but for a man, the founder of whose family came over with the Norman William, to marry a woman without a pedigree, one who probably never had so much as a grandfather belonging to her, was impossible: he had a warm regard for Lady Lombard; he considered that his name and influence, supported by her wealth, would place him in one of the proudest positions to which a mortal could aspire; but even for this he could not sacrifice his leading principle, he could not ally himself to any one without a pedigree.”

“Seeing that he was in earnest, I forbore to laugh at him; and merely throwing out hints that I had reason to believe he was in error, and that although Lady Lombard’s father (an amiable soap-boiler, whose virtues flourished for sixty years in the neighbourhood of Shoreditch) had been engaged in commerce, (he called the tallow chandler a Russia Merchant,) as well as his grandfather, still the arguments which applied to the one case, would hold good in the other, and at all events I begged him to take no rash or precipitate step in the matter till I had applied to a friend of mine who was a great genealogist, (of course invented for the occasion,) and used my best endeavours to clear up the difficulty—for which disinterested offer he, being still more or less inebriated, blessed me fervently, and so, having seen him safely home, we parted. The next morning I visited Lady Lombard, led her on sweetly and easily to talk of her family, gained some information, and learned where to obtain more, and in less than two days had the satisfaction of proving her fiftieth cousin sixteen times removed to Edward the Third. De Grandeville was introduced to my friend in the Herald’s Office—”

“Whom you declared five minutes ago to be invented for the occasion,” interrupted Frere.

“For which reason he was the more easily personated by Tom Edgehill of the Fusileers,” resumed the unblushing Bracy; “De Grandeville was allowed, as a great favour, to peruse the pedigree, believed in it—”

“Or pretended to do so,” suggested Frere.

“To the fullest extent!” continued Bracy not heeding the interruption, “and the next thing I heard was that the parties were engaged.”

“So he is actually going to marry a woman without an idea, properly so called, in her head, and half as old again as he is, for the sake of her money. Well! that’s an abyss of degradation I’ll never sink to while there is a crossing to be swept in London;” was Frere’s disgusted comment.

“Chacun à son gout—for my own part I should prefer involuntary emigration for the good of my country, vulgarly denominated transportation, to being married at all, even were the opposing party (my hypothetical wife, I mean,) the most thorough-bred angel that ever wore a bustle,” returned Bracy. “By the way,” he continued, “I saw your little friend, Miss Arundel, the other day; she and her mother are staying with the ‘Lombardic Character,’ I find, but, of course, you know all this better than I do; really that girl writes exceedingly good sense for a woman; now if I were a marrying man, I don’t know any quarter in which I’d sooner throw the handkerchief.”

“You might pick it up again for your pains, for she wouldn’t have you, I’m sure,” growled Frere.

“Do you really believe so?” asked Bracy, with an incredulous smile, “ahem! I flatter myself the little Arundel has better taste.”

“Better sense than to do any such thing you mean,” returned Frere, more crossly than before; “depend upon it, whenever Rose Arundel marries, she will choose a man who can respect and love her, and not a—well, I don’t mean to insult you, my good fellow, but truth will out,—a self-conceited young puppy, whose head has been turned by foolish people, by whom his cleverness has been overrated, and his vanity fostered.”

Bracy drew himself up, and for a minute pretended to look very fierce,—then bursting into a hearty laugh, he patted his companion on the back affectionately, exclaiming, “Poor old Frere! did I put him in a rage? never mind, old boy, I only wanted to know whether there was any truth in the report that you were engaged to Miss Arundel,—and now let me congratulate you. You are no doubt quite right in thinking the young lady would have shown her wisdom by selecting a sensible man such as you are, rather than a vaurien like myself, even if I were a marrying man, and had placed such a temptation before her.”

Frere looked at him for a moment in utter astonishment, then muttered, “A vaurien, indeed! I always prophesied that foot-boy of yours would die with a rope round his neck, but I begin to think the complaint which will necessitate such an operation, runs in the family, and that servant and master are alike affected by it.”

“And what may be the name of this alarming epidemic which you consider likely to terminate so fatally?” asked Bracy.

“A most unmitigated and virulent form of chronic impudence," returned Frere, laughing, then shaking hands most cordially, these two oddly assorted friends parted.

After having left Bracy, Frere bent his steps towards the dwelling of Lady Lombard, with whom Mrs. Arundel and Rose were spending a few days for the avowed purpose of assisting to prepare her wedding paraphernalia, though, (as the most skilful dress-maker, and the most expensive tradesmen in London were at work in the good cause,) their duties were merely nominal. Mrs. Arundel having explained to her hostess the nature of the engagement between Frere and her daughter, that excellent bear was allowed to run tame about the house. Lady Lombard, who was at first oppressed by a vague sense of his awful amount of learning, and decidedly alarmed at his snapping and growling, had become reconciled to his presence, on perceiving that Rose could tame him by a word or a smile, and committing him to her care and management, troubled herself no further about him.

"Rose, who do you think has gone to Venice?" inquired Frere, after having disburdened his pockets of a little library of books, two large fossils, and the handle of a Roman sword, all highly prized and newly acquired treasures, which he had brought for Rose to appreciate, and to sympathise with him in his delight at having obtained them.

"To Venice," returned Rose, "oh! who? do tell me."

"Why lots of people, it seems;" replied Frere. "I called upon my uncle Lord Ashford this morning, and found him in what is vulgarly termed a regular stew. Bellefield it seems had a horse which everybody fancied was to win the Derby, but what everybody fancied did not come to pass, for the said horse was beaten, consequently his owner has lost no end of money, for which same I for one do not pity him: I have no sympathy with your ruined gamester,—and ruined he is, by the way, horse, foot, and artillery, as the military DeGrandeville would say. Well, poor uncle Ashford showed me a note he had just received from his dutiful first-born, telling him that he had not a farthing of ready money in the world, except 50*l.* to pay his journey, that he was quite unable to meet his engagements, and that before the settling day for the Derby, he must put the British Channel between him and those to whom he owed sums so large that he neither wished nor expected his father to pay them; that he would feel obliged if his lordship would increase his yearly allowance, and that he wished letters of credit to be forwarded to him at Venice, to which place he proposed immediately to follow General Grant and his daughter, who it appears left England only three weeks ago: that it was his intention to marry the young lady forthwith, and live abroad upon her fortune, until something to his advantage should turn up; and he adds in a postscript, that if his father should attempt to prevent his marriage by informing General Grant of what he is pleased to call his misfortunes, that minute he will blow his brains out. Well, poor uncle, who is a high-minded honourable man, though he is rather proud and cold in his manner, could not bear the idea of his son marrying Annie Grant without informing the General of his loss of fortune, and at length he resolved to meet the difficulty by selling the H—shire estate, and by that means increasing Lord Bellefield's allowance, till it would amount to 3,000*l.* a-year, in which case General Grant might be informed of the truth without the match being broken off, or Bellefield driven to desperation;—whereupon I observed innocently enough, that the success of the scheme would, in great measure, depend on the tact of the person sent out to manage the negotiation: Lord Ashford agreed in this most cordially, and then, saying how grateful he should feel to any one who would assist him in this strait, looked hard at me——"

"And you instantly undertook the commission; I know it as well as if I had been present, and had heard all that passed," interposed Rose, with a smile, in which, though affection predominated, a slight shade of regret might have been traced.

"Why, you see, Rose, as I am one of the family, there seemed a kind of obligation upon me to do something to help them; and poor Uncle Ashford did look so pitiful; and really if I had not undertaken it, I don't know who could have been found to do so, for Bellefield quarrelled with their family solicitor, because he refused to allow him to make ducks and drakes of some of the entailed property three years ago; and I shall not be gone long. Besides, I did not quite forget you, Rosey, for, do you comprehend, I shall be able to see Lewis, without his fancying that I have been sent out expressly to look after him, and perhaps I may be able to persuade him to come home and live in England like a reasonable being and a christian; at all events, I shall find out how he is going on there; and I've another thing to talk to Lewis about,—I don't mean to remain for ever without a wife, Miss Rose,—you need not turn your head away—that's sheer silliness—you know we are to be married some day, we expect matrimony will increase our happiness, and we have better reason for our expectations than many of the fools who yoke themselves together for life; those who do so, for instance, in order to obtain rank or riches—our next-door neighbour, to wit," and he pointed with his thumb in the direction of the drawing-room, wherein were seated the mighty De Grandeville and his lady love. "As, therefore, my reasoning is good sound reasoning, and matrimony proved to be a desirable thing, why, the sooner we get the ceremony over, the better; so, as I said before, don't turn away your head like a little goose, seeing that you're nothing of the kind!"

"Poor Lewis," murmured Rose, "he will scarcely rejoice to see you, when he learns that the object of your mission is to hasten the marriage of Annie Grant with Lord Bellefield;—oh, Richard," she continued eagerly, clasping her hands, "it will make him hate you—do not go!"

"Well, now, I never thought of that," muttered Frere, thoroughly perplexed;—"why will people go and fall in love with one another that didn't ought to?" He paused, rubbed his hair back from his forehead, till it stood on end like the crest of a cockatoo, played with Rose's workbox till he overturned it, and in his abstraction committed so many gaucheries that his companion was on the point of calling him to order, when he suddenly returned to his senses, and taking Rose's hand in his, began, "Now, listen to me, my child; in the first place, as this matter nearly concerns Lewis, and therefore you, I will do nothing in it of which you do not approve; premising this, I will give you my own ideas on the subject. Touching Lewis's interest in the affair, the question seems to hinge upon this point; does Annie Grant care for him or not? if she does not, it can't signify to him who she marries; and as in that case she is probably attached to her cousin, (women don't always love wisely, you know,) I should feel able to carry out uncle Ashford's wishes with a clear conscience, and trust to Lewis's good sense and kind heart not to incur his displeasure by so doing. If, on the other hand, Annie by any chance loves him, and has been bullied or persuaded into this engagement, I for one will have nothing to do with promoting the match, but, on the contrary, will exert myself to the utmost to prevent it—and now what say you?"

"That by doing as you propose, you will act rightly, kindly, and judiciously, and that come what may of it, your interference must be for good," returned Rose, gazing with looks of proud affection upon the simple-hearted, high-principled, "honest man," (indeed, "the noblest work of God,") who sat beside her; "but," she continued after a moment's thought, "there is one difficulty which I scarcely see how you will get over—how are you to find out whom Annie Grant really loves?"

"Ask her myself," was the straightforward reply. Rose looked at him to see if he were joking, but his face was earnest and resolved.

"Oh, Richard, you will never be able to do that," she remonstrated, "remember how such a question must distress her."

"Which do you think will distress her most, to be asked abruptly to give her confidence to a person who is anxious to befriend her, or to spend her life with one man, when all the time she loves another?" inquired, Frere, almost sternly; then laying his hand on Rose's head, and stroking her glossy hair, he continued, "No! no! Rosey, away with all such sophistications, they are the devil's emissaries, to render people first miserable, and then reckless and wicked—marriages, properly so termed, may be made in Heaven, but depend upon it, the spurious articles too often foisted upon the public under that name,—alliances in which this world's goods are everything, and the treasures of the next world nothing,—come from quite another manufactory."

Then there was a pause, and then Rose inquired when he proposed to set out.

"Why, there is no good in procrastinating," was the reply; "the sooner I start the sooner I shall be back again; so to-morrow the lawyer gets the necessary papers ready; the next day good Lady Goosecap here is to be married, and I mean to attend the ceremony, in order to learn how to behave on such an occasion; and the day after that, if nothing unforeseen occurs to prevent me, I'm off!"

"You will write very often—every"—(Frere raised his eyebrows) "well then, every other day, will you not?" urged Rose, appealingly.

"What queer things women are!" soliloquized Frere; "now if you had been going to the North Pole," he continued, addressing Rose, "it would never have occurred to me to ask you to write,—I should have taken it for granted that if you had discovered the north-west passage, or done anything else worth mentioning, you would have let one know; and why people write if they have nothing to say, I can't think."

"At all events, it is a satisfaction when we are parted from those who are dear to us, to be assured that they are well," suggested Rose.

"Oh, nothing ever ails me," replied Frere, quietly applying the remark to himself; "there is not a doctor in the country who has ever received one farthing of my money; and as to physic—throw physic to the dogs, always supposing you have any such abomination to dispose of, or any dogs at hand to throw it to: it's a thing I don't know the taste of, and where ignorance is bliss—well, never mind, I'll write to you all the same, if you have a weakness that way, whenever I can find pens, paper, and a post-office; only if my letters should happen to be rather prosy, somewhat in the much-ado-about-nothing style, small blame to me, that's all." Thus the expedition was agreed upon, and Rose having told Frere some hundred things, which he was to say to, and inquire of Lewis, sat down to write a few more "notes and queries," winding up with a pathetic appeal to her brother to bring his self-imposed exile to a conclusion.

So the silver-footed hours turned round the treadmill of time, till the dewy morn appeared, which was to witness the celebration of the nuptials of Lady Lombard and the mighty Marmaduke De Grandeville. Oh, the ardour and bustle of that devoted household! As for the servants, so late did they sit up, and so early did they rise, that going to bed at all became rather a superstitious observance than a beneficial practice. Then everybody had to dress, first themselves, and then somebody else; and the amount of white muslin concentrated in that happy family, rendered space crisp, and gave a look of pastoral simplicity to the most iniquitously gorgeous arrangements of modern upholstery.

The bride's dress was wonderful—words are powerless to describe it—happy those women who, favoured beyond all other daughters of Eve, were permitted to behold it. One very young lady, rash in her ignorance, ventured to ask how much the lace cost a-yard.—The French artiste, Mademoiselle Melanie Amandine Celestine Seraphine Belledentelles, piously invoked six authorized female saints, besides the deceased Madame

Tournure, at whose flounces she had sat to acquire her art, who on her lamented removal to Père la Chaise she had privately canonized for her own especial use and behoof, and thus supported did not faint.—The “mistress of the robes” a black eyed, brown cheeked grisette, turned as pale as her complexion allowed of, and sank upon a chair, but being unprovided with a smelling-bottle thought it advisable not to proceed to extremities, and the mother of the culprit hurried forward, and with great presence of mind led her from the room,—such mysteries are not for the profane.

Then occurred a tremendous episode—the dress was disposed in graceful folds over the ample person of its fortunate possessor, and fitted seraphically; only the bottom hook and eye, situated in the region round about the waist, would by no means permit themselves to be united, and a lucid interval, hiatus valde lachrymabilis, was the fearful consequence. The grisette did her very utmost, but her strength was inadequate to command the success her zeal deserved, and with flushed cheeks and tearful eyes she glanced appealingly to Mademoiselle Melanie Amandine, &c. &c.

That ardent foreigner stepped forward to the rescue, all the noble self-confidence of her nation flashing in her coal-black eyes, and gallantly assumed the post of danger,—she was a small woman, but her frame was compact and wiry, and Tydens-like,—

“Her little body held a mighty mind.”

Setting to work with spirit, she devoted all her energies to the task before her, and Lady Lombard winced palpably, unconsciously echoing Hamlet’s well-known aspiration—but that good Lady’s melting moods were unfortunately mental, not bodily, and in this attempt “to take her in” even the French dress-maker was foiled, the “too solid” substance was not compressible beyond a certain point, and with a sigh which had a marvellous resemblance to the word suer-r-r-e, Mademoiselle Melanie Amandine, &c. &c. desisted.

“Ah! qu’ils sont difficiles ces agrafes!” she exclaimed, rubbing her little hands with a theatrical gesture. “I have not to myself force in les poignets, vot you call oncles.”

“Wrists,” mildly suggested Mrs. Arundel, who was assisting to attire the bride—“mine are very strong, let me try—” and suiting the action to the word, she Curtius-like endeavoured to close the yawning gulf, but in vain.

“Ah non! c’est impossible—you shall only strain your hands too much, chère Madame Hirondelle,” resumed Mademoiselle—“permit me to ring zie bell, we shall make approach le maître d’hot.l., vot you call zie coachman of zie chambre, who shall have much of force, et ce sera un fait accompli.”

“Stop, Madurmoysel,” exclaimed Lady Lombard, agitated, as the energetic Frenchwoman laid her hand upon the bell-rope—“Stop, if you please, I should not like—that is, it is not exactly the custom, to admit the male domestics into one’s bed-room.”

For a moment the Frenchwoman appeared utterly puzzled as to the reason of the objection, then a light broke in upon her, and she began, “Ah, je comprends! it ces not etiquette, que je suis bete! how I am stupid! mais qu’ils sont drôles ces petits scandales Anglais! Vraiment c’est comme la comédie. A Paris nous ne remarquons pas ces petits riens; et en Allemagne, zie schneider, vat you call tailor, ils font toutes les robes,—mais comment faire donc?”

“Why really, madurmoysel, je nur par—I mean, I don’t think I could bear it, if it was got to,” remonstrated Lady Lombard; “don’t you think the hook and eye might be moved a little? it’s unfortunate I am so stout—mais je nur—can’t help it.”

“Oh, mille pardons, miladi. Your ladyship shall not be too stout; après la première jeunesse l’embonpoint is a great beauty; but zie hook an ec, c’est dommage; cependant, nous verrons, ve shall see vot vill be done.” And so saying, Mademoiselle Melanie, &c.’s nimble fingers went to work, and a quarter of an inch was graciously accorded; by which means the impossible became possible, and the crisis was safely got over.

As to breakfast (not the wedding breakfast, but the breakfast before the wedding, two very different matters), that was a regular or rather an irregular scramble—people ate and drank standing, like horses, but in a general way feelings were stronger than appetites, and, with the exception of one middle-aged lady, blessed with a powerful intellect and a weak digestion, who having medical authority never to allow herself to feel hungry, breakfasted three times that morning with three different divisions of the party, little justice was done to the viands.

Rose made herself generally useful, helping all the neglected ones, and bringing comforts to the uncomfortable, until she scarcely left herself time to dress, and yet appearing the most charming little bridesmaid of the lot, although her five companions did not disgrace their uniform of white muslin and pink embellishments (the white symbolizing their maiden innocence, and the pink suggesting the cheerfulness with which they would be willing to exchange it for the honourable estate of matrimony).

Then the carriages came to take up, and Mrs. Arundel and the fair Susannah, relict of Col. Brahmin, H.E.I.C.S. had the greatest difficulty in sustaining the weak nerves and fluttered spirits of the bride elect, who, as she herself expressed it, “borne down by two such agitating sets of recollections,” might well be overcome. However, by the assistance of a rich male Lombard relation (whose wealth gilded his vulgarity, till Mammon worshippers believed this calf a deity) she was safely conveyed to the church, where De Grandeville awaited her, accompanied by a splendid old ancestor, who might by a very slight stretch of imagination have been taken for the identical De Grandeville, who had come over with the Conqueror, and been carefully preserved (in port wine) ever since. Bracy was there, looking preternaturally solemn, all but his eyes, in which, for the time being, the whole mischievous of his nature appeared concentrated, and Frere with him, serving his apprenticeship, as Bracy phrased it.

In solemn procession they approached the altar, where the priest awaited them, and, opening his book, read to them an account of the true nature of the ceremony they were about to celebrate,—how it was “instituted by God in the time of man’s innocency,” and was symbolical of high and holy things, and being ordained to assist us in fulfilling the various duties for which we are placed in this world, and on the due performance of which will greatly depend our weal or woe for everlasting, it should not be undertaken lightly or unadvisedly;—then De Grandeville, having learned the theory of the matter, proceeded to afford a practical commentary on the text by solemnly promising to love and honour Lady Lombard till death them should part, while she, in return, pledged herself (with less chance of perjury) to serve, obey, and keep him during the term of her natural life;—then he, Marmaduke, took her, Sarah, from the hands of the wealthy Lombard relation, and declared that he did so “for richer, for poorer,” though we much fear, if he had foreseen the smallest probability of the realization of this latter proviso, the ceremony would have been then and there interrupted, instead of proceeding as it did, sweetly and edifyingly, till it wound up with “any amazement.” And everybody being much pleased and thoroughly satisfied, there was, of course, a great deal of crying, though why they cried, unless it was to see so solemn an institution thus wantonly profaned, and to hear people use words of prayer and praise, and worship God with their lips, while in their hearts they were sacrificing all the better feelings of their nature before the altar of Mammon, we cannot tell.

Amongst the rest Mrs. Arundel wept most meritoriously, until catching sight of Bracy sobbing aloud into a very large pocket-handkerchief, her weeping became somewhat hysterical, and ended in a sound suspiciously like laughter. Then people crowded into the vestry, which was about the size of a good four-post bedstead, and names were signed, and fees paid, and small jokes made, and then the whole party took coach, and returned to the house, where the wedding-breakfast awaited them. The humours of a wedding-breakfast have been described so often and so well, that we shall merely give a very faint outline of the leading idiosyncrasies of the affair in question.

In the first place, people were very hungry, Nature having asserted her rights, and promoted Appetite, vice Feeling sold out. Even the lady with the weak digestion (which made up by increased velocity for want of stamina) adding a very substantial fourth to her three previous breakfasts. Then, as mouths grew disengaged, tongues found room to wag, healths were drunk, and the specchiifying began. First uprose the De Grandeville ancestor, who was a tall, thin, not to say shadowy old gentleman, with a hooked nose and a weak voice, who whispered to the company that “he rose to—” here his face twitched violently, and he paused, in evident distress,—“he rose to—”—here a tremendous sneeze accounted for the previous spasm, and the patient, evidently relieved, proceeded, “he rose to—” once again he paused, struggling furiously with the tails of his coat, “he begged to call the attention of the company— he had—” still the struggles with the coat-tail continued, “he had a toast to propose;” here, amidst breathless attention, he whispered to his nephew in an aside, audible throughout the whole room, “Marmaduke, I’ve left it in my great-coat—the left hand-pocket, you know;” “the toast was this—thank you, Jenkins,” to the butler, who brought the missing handkerchief on a silver waiter, sticky with the overflowings of Champagne;—“this was his toast, and he hoped that the company would do it justice—Health and happiness to the bride and bridegroom.”

And the company did it justice; so much so, that if the health and happiness of the newly-married pair depended on the amount of champagne their friends appeared willing to drink at their expense, sickness and sorrow were evils against which they might consider themselves amply secured. Silence being restored, the bridegroom rose to return thanks, his inborn greatness manifesting itself in every look and gesture, and dignified condescension adding a new grace to his sonorous voice and grandiloquent delivery. Having glanced round the table with the air of a monarch (in a fairy extravaganza) about to address his parliament, he cleared his noble throat, and began:—

“In rising to—ar—return thanks for the honour you have done us, in so cordially assenting to the toast proposed by a man whose presence might confer a favour upon the most aristocratic assembly in the land,—a man whom—ar—even at this moment, which I have no hesitation—ar—in—ar—” (hear, hear, and question, from Bracy)—“I repeat, no hesitation in—in—no hesitation in—ar—declaring to be at once the proudest and happiest moment of my life,—a man who, even in this season of felicity, I yet distinctly—ar—yes, distinctly say, I envy; for he has the honour to represent the elder branch of that ancient and illustrious house of which I am a comparatively insignificant” (a groan of indignant denial from Bracy, which procured him a gracious smile from the speaker) “yes, I—ar—repeat it, a comparatively insignificant, but I hope, not an entirely unworthy descendant,” here Bracy, after a slight struggle with Frere, who sought to prevent him, rose, and, speaking apparently under feelings of the greatest excitement, said,—“He was sorry to interrupt the flow of eloquence which was so much delighting the company, but he was certain every one would agree with him in saying, that Mr. de Grandeville’s last observation, however creditable it might be to him, as evincing his unparalleled and super-Christian (if he might be allowed the term) humility, could not be allowed to pass unchallenged. He put it to them collectively, as intellectual beings; he put it to them individually, as gallant men and lovely women (immense sensation)—if his noble friend, the illustrious man to whose words of fire they had just been listening, were allowed to set himself forth to the world as 'comparatively insignificant' and 'not entirely unworthy,'—he asked them if such terms as these were allowed to be applied to such a character as that, where was society to seek its true 'monarchs of mind?' where should it look for those heaven-gifted soul-heroes—those giants of thought, those "Noblers" and "that NOBLEST," to quote the glowing words of one of the leading writers of the age, by whom its evils were to be remedied, its abuses reformed, and its whole nature purified and regenerated?—he put it to them to declare whether Mr. De Grandeville must not be entreated to recall his words?"

Deafening applause followed Bracy's harangue, and the amendment was carried nem. con. Thus fooled to the top of his bent, De Grandeville resumed his speech, and after making a very absurd display of egotistic nonsense, family pride, and personal pretension, gave the health of the company generally, and of his ancient ancestor, and the vulgar Lombard relation in particular. Then more healths were drunk, and more speeches made, and a great amount of stupidity elicited, interspersed with some drollery, when Bracy was called upon to return thanks for the bridesmaids, which he did in an affected falsetto, smiling, blushing, coquetting, and screwing up imaginary ringlets, much after the fashion of the inimitable John Parry, when it pleases him to enact one of the young ladies of England in the nineteenth century. Then the female portion of the company retired to relieve their feelings by a little amateur crying and kissing, champagne and susceptibility being mysteriously united in the tender bosoms of the softer sex; then the miraculous robe was taken off, and the bride reattired for travelling; then the gentlemen came up stairs, all more or less "peculiar" from drinking wine at that unaccustomed hour in the morning, and some little business was transacted; one spirited bridesmaid, who had had a shy young man nibbling for some time, actually harpooning her fish, and landing him skilfully beyond all chance of floundering out of an engagement, by referring him on the spot to mamma. Mrs. Arundel, who by this time had learned to entertain a most lady-like and unchristian hatred against the fair Susannah, maliciously laid herself out to captivate the limp and unstable affections of Mr. Dacrell Dace, and succeeded so well, that she actually began to deliberate whether opulence and triumph over her rival, might not render Dace endurable as a permanency. Then the travelling carriage with Newman's four greys drew up to the door, and the stereotyped adieus were spoken, the stereotyped smiles smiled, and tears shed, and all the necessary nonsense rehearsed, with most painstaking diligence, the only original feature in the whole affair being Frere's remark to Bracy, as the happy pair drove off:—

"You were about right, old fellow, when you compared marrying to hanging. I tell you what it is—sooner than undergo all this parade of folly, absurdity, and bad taste, I'll be spliced at the pier-head at Dover, and set sail for Calais as soon as the ring is on the bride's finger; better be sea-sick, than sick at heart with such rubbish as we've been witness to."

CHAPTER LVIII.

DEPICTS THE HERO IN AN UNAMIABLE LIGHT.

LORD BELLEFIELD safely accomplished his journey to Venice, reaching that city of palaces without let or hindrance. Despite his imperturbable assurance, a close observer might have discovered from external signs that his lordship was ill at ease, and in no particular was it more apparent than in the marked change in his manner towards General Grant and his daughter. The cold nonchalance with which he formerly tolerated the General's stateliness, and the easy, almost impertinent confidence with which he had been accustomed to prosecute his suit to Annie, had given place to an affectation of studiously courteous deference when he addressed the father, and to respectful yet tender devotion in his intercourse with the daughter, which proved that to secure the good opinion of the former, and, if possible, the affection of the latter, had now become a matter of importance to him. With General Grant he was in great measure successful, that gallant officer believing, in his simplicity, that his intended son-in-law had at length finished sowing his wild oats; a species of seed, which being universally acknowledged to contain, besides every small vice extant, the germs of the seven deadly sins, has this remarkable peculiarity, that being once sown, it is popularly supposed to bring forth a plentiful crop of all the domestic virtues. Deceived by this fallacy, the General fondly trusted that the coming event of matrimony had cast its shadow before, and extinguished all the wild-fire which had hitherto flung its baleful glare over his Lordship's comet-like course; or, to drop metaphor, and condescend to that much better thing, plain English, the gallant officer taught himself to believe, that Lord Bellefield had at length seen the error of his ways and intended to marry and live virtuously ever after. With the lady, however, his lordship did not succeed so easily; and, skilful tactician as he not unjustly considered himself, never had he felt more completely bewildered or more thoroughly perplexed how to act. Annie's whole nature appeared to him so completely altered, that he could hardly recognise her as the same person. Instead of the simple, amiable, child-like character, which he had despised but fancied would do very well for a wife, he now found a proud capricious beauty, whose mood seemed to vary between cold indifference and a teasing sarcastic humour, which he could neither fathom nor control. If he tried to interest or amuse her, she listened with a careless, distrain manner, which proved his efforts to be completely unavailing; if he attempted the tender or sentimental, she laughed at him, turning all he said into ridicule, by two or three words of quiet but bitter irony. She appeared tacitly to acquiesce in their engagement, but any attempt to fix a time for its fulfilment, served only to estrange her still more. Does the reader think this change unnatural? may he never witness the alteration which a grief such as Annie's makes, even in the gentlest natures,—may he never experience the bitterness of that nascent despair, which pours the sweetest temper, and forces cold looks and cutting words from eyes accustomed to beam with tenderness, and lips from which accents of affection alone were wont to flow!

One morning, rather more than a week after Lord Bellefield's arrival, an expedition was proposed to visit one of the architectural lions of the picturesque old city, and as the General seemed inclined to accede to the scheme, and Annie made no objection, it was agreed that they should go.

"I make one proviso," observed Charles Leicester, "and that is, that you come home in good time. I don't want to frighten you, in fact there is nothing to be frightened about, only I know that there has been, for some time past, a spirit of disaffection abroad among the workmen at the Arsenal, and if they should attempt to make a demonstration by congregating in the squares and few open spaces in this amphibious city, it might be disagreeable for you."

"But is such an event at all probable?" inquired Laura.

"Why, yes," was the reply; "I had a note this morning from Arundel"—catching a reproachful look from his wife, Charley stopped in momentary embarrassment, then continued,—"a—that is, from a friend of mine, telling me such a thing was possible—however, I'll go with you myself, and keep you in proper order."

As Charley in his forgetfulness blundered out the name of Arundel, Laura did not dare to look at Annie; when, however, she ventured a moment afterwards to steal a glance towards her, her features wore the cold listless look which had now, alas! become habitual to them, and exhibited no sign of emotion by which her friend could decide whether she had remarked the name, or whether it had passed without striking her ear. Almost immediately afterwards she rose, and saying, she supposed she had better get ready, quitted the room. Lord Bellefield had not been present at this little scene. With faltering steps Annie sought her own apartment, closed and locked the door; then, instead of preparing to dress, flung herself into an easy chair, and pressing her hands upon her throbbing temples, tried to collect her thoughts. She had heard the name only too clearly, and combining it with Walter's tale of the ghost, had guessed the truth. He was then in Venice, and not only that, but he had evidently established some communication with the Leicesters, and must therefore be aware of the presence of her father and herself; nay, by what she had gathered from Charles's speech, he must be actually engaged in watching over their safety, and as the idea struck her, a soft bright light came into her eyes, and a faint blush restored the roses to her cheeks, so that any one who had seen her five minutes before, would scarcely have recognised her for the same person. "But with what purpose could he be there? why, if the Leicesters knew it, had they so studiously concealed it from her?—from her!" and, as she repeated the words, the recollection of Walter's speech, "He went away because he loved you, and you did not love him," flashed across her. "What if it were true? if he really had loved her, and had left them because his feelings were becoming too strong for his control?" and then a thousand remembered circumstances (trifles in themselves, but confirmatory of that which she now almost believed to be the truth) occurred to her. But if this were indeed the case,—if, instead of resigning his situation because, as her fears had urged, he had guessed at the nature of her sentiments towards him, he had loved her, and his honourable feelings had driven him into a self-imposed exile,—what must he not have suffered! and oh! knowing as much as he did of her feelings towards Lord Bellefield, what must he not have thought of her, when he learned that in less than four-and-twenty hours after his departure, she had renewed her engagement to a man he was aware she both disliked and mistrusted! above all, what a false view it must have given him of her feelings towards himself! Oh, how she hoped, how she prayed this blow might have been spared him! Then the present, what did it mean? the future, how would it turn out? On one point she was determined, only let her ascertain beyond a doubt that Lewis loved her, and she would die rather than marry Lord Bellefield. The evils that befall us in this world are not without even their temporal benefit. Two years of hopeless sorrow had given a species of desperate courage to a mind naturally prone to a want of self-dependence. Anything was preferable to the anguish she had gone through; and Annie Grant's decision now, was very different to the 'lady's yea' or nay she would have uttered ere the storm of passion had swept over her maiden spirit.

The effect produced on Annie by the new light which had broken in upon her, did not immediately pass away, and although her remarks were chiefly addressed to her cousin Charles, Lord Bellefield was equally surprised and puzzled by the change in her manner. In order to reach the building they were about to visit, they were forced to disembark from their gondola, and after proceeding along a species of cloister, to cross one of the foot bridges which so constantly, in Venice, intersect the canals. Under the shade of an arch of this cloister, stood the tall figure of a man; as the party approached he drew back further into the shadow, and, himself unseen, observed them attentively as they passed. The excitement of the morning had left its traces in the flushed cheek and sparkling eye of Annie Grant. At the moment she quitted the boat, Charley Leicester had made her laugh by some quaint remark on the personal appearance of a fat little individual who was one of the gondoliers, but whose figure by no means coincided with the romantic associations his avocation recalled. As, leaning on Lord Bellefield's arm, she passed the arch behind which the stranger was concealed, her companion addressed to her some observation, which necessitated a reply. Turning to him with the smile Leicester's observation had provoked still upon her lips, the light fell strongly on her features, revealing them fully to the eager gaze of (for we intend no mystification as to his identity,) Lewis Arundel. He looked after them with straining eyeballs, till a corner of the building hid them from his view. Then dark lines spread across his forehead, the proud nostril arched, the stern mouth set, the flashing eye grew cold and stony, and a spirit of evil seemed to take possession of him.

"So," he muttered, "it has come to this; with my own eyes have I beheld her perfidy. It is well that it should be so, the cure will be the more complete, and yet"—he pressed his hand to his throbbing brow—"yet how beautiful she is! She is changed; her face has acquired expression, soul, power, all it wanted to render it perfect, and—to madden me."

He paused, then appearing to have collected strength, continued more calmly, "Yes, I have seen it; she clung to his arm, she smiled on him, she loves and will marry him. It is over; for me there must be no past; I must sweep it from my memory. Happiness I can never know; as far as the affections are concerned, the game of life is played. Well, be it so, my art still is left me, and the dark, the unknown future."

Again he paused. Ere the arrival of the party, the sight of which had so deeply affected him, he had been sketching an antique gable opposite. He resumed his work, and by a few hasty but graphic strokes, transferred to his sketch-book the object which had attracted him to the spot. Replacing his drawing materials, he continued, "'Tis strange how the sight of that man affected me! I fancied I had taught myself the evil and folly of nourishing sentiments of hatred against him, and yet the moment I beheld him, all the old feelings rushed back upon me with redoubled vigour. I must avoid his presence, or my wise resolutions will go for nothing." He sighed deeply. "This, then, is all the fruit of two years of mental discipline, to find, at the end of the time, that I love her as deeply, and hate him as bitterly as I did at the beginning. Oh, it is humiliating thus to be the slave of passion!"

Communing with himself after this fashion, Lewis quitted the spot, and proceeded in the direction of his own lodgings. On reaching the square of St. Mark, he was surprised to find it partially occupied by an excited crowd, apparently composed of the very lowest of the people, its numbers being constantly swelled by fresh parties pouring in from various parts of the city. It instantly occurred to Lewis, that in order to reach the Palazzo Grassini, Leicester and his companions would be forced to cross the square, and consequently obliged to make their way through the crowd; and a feeling which he did not attempt to analyze, but which, in truth, was anxiety for Annie's safety, determined him to remain there till he had seen them return. Accordingly, turning up his coat collar, and slouching his hat over his eyes in order to conceal his features, he mingled with the crowd. In the meantime the Grant party, ignorant of the difficulties that awaited them, were quietly examining statues and criticising pictures.

"Laura, you look tired, and Annie seems as if she were becoming somewhat 'used-up,'" observed Leicester, glancing from his wife towards his cousin; "no wonder either, for we've been on our feet for more than two hours, and as for my share in the matter, I tell you plainly, if you keep me here much longer, you'll have to carry me home on your back, Mrs. Leicester, for walk I won't."

Thus urged the ladies confessed their fatigue, and their willingness to return; but there was still another gallery of paintings unseen, which the General evidently wished to visit. He had commissioned an artist to copy two or three of them, and he required Lord Bellefield's opinion as to the propriety of his choice. This occasioned a difficulty, which Laura met by proposing the following scheme, viz. that she, Annie, and Charley should leave the General and Lord Bellefield to their own devices, and taking a gondola, row to a point at which they would be within two minutes' walk of St. Mark's. Lord Bellefield made some slight remonstrance, and it was clear he disapproved of the scheme, but the General was peremptory, so he had no resource but to submit with the best grace he was able.

"Famous things gondolas are, to be sure," observed Charley, as, placing a cushion beneath his head, he stretched himself at full length under the awning; "they afford almost the only instance that has come under my notice, in which the intensely romantic, and the very decidedly comfortable, go hand in hand—they cut out cabs, and beat 'buses into fits; now, we only want a little melody to make the thing perfect—Laura, sing us a song!"

"Sing you asleep, you mean, you incorrigible——"

"There, that will do; don't become vituperative, you termagant," interrupted her husband. "Annie, dear, gentle cousin Annie, warble forth something romantic with your angel-voice, do, and I'll say you're——"

"What?" inquired Annie.

"A regular stunner!" was the reply.

"And if the epithet be at all appropriate it clearly proves me unqualified for the office," returned Annie, smiling, "so you really must hold me excused."

"Then the long and short of the matter is that the duty devolves upon me," rejoined Charley, and, slowly raising himself into a half sitting, half kneeling attitude, he placed himself at his wife's feet, after the fashion of those very interesting cavaliers who do the romantic on the covers of sentimental songs; then having played an inaudible prelude upon a supposititious guitar, he placed one hand upon his heart, and extending the other in a theatrical attitude towards the boatman, began:—

when, having extemporarily parodied the first verse of that popular melody, he was beginning the second with:—

“Ain't this here go—Glorious oh—o—”

when the prow of the gondola struck against the steps where they were to land, with so sharp a jerk as to pitch the singer on his hands and knees, and effectually check his vocalizing. After discharging the boatman, they proceeded a short distance along the bank of the canal, and then turned down a narrow lane, or alley, leading to the square of St. Mark. In this Leicester was annoyed to perceive knots of disreputable-looking men, talking rapidly, or hurrying along with eager gestures, towards the square; finding, as they advanced, that the crowd became thicker, Leicester paused, irresolute whether or not to proceed.

“Surely we had better turn back,” urged Laura; “I should not be afraid if we were alone, for I know you could take care of me, but —,” and she glanced towards Annie, who, although she said nothing, had turned very pale, and clung with convulsive energy to her cousin's arm. Charles looked back, and to his utter dismay perceived that the crowd behind had been increased by a fresh accession of numbers, and that their retreat was effectually cut off.

“There is nothing remaining for us but to keep on,” he said; “the stream of people appears, fortunately, to be going our way, and all we can do is to go with it: I dare say they are too much engrossed by their own affairs to trouble their heads about us. Whatever occurs, don't let go my arm, either of you;—it is rather disagreeable, certainly, but there is nothing to be really afraid of, and we shall reach home in five minutes.”

Hoping these assertions, in regard to the truth of which he was himself somewhat sceptical, might suffice to reassure his companions, Leicester continued his course, occasionally annoyed by the pressure of the crowd, but not otherwise molested till they reached the square of Saint Mark. Here the sight that awaited them was by no means encouraging; the whole space was filled with a dense crowd of the lowest rabble of Venice; who, many of them the worse for liquor, appeared in a state of considerable excitement, and filled the air with mingled shouts, cries, and curses. To pass safely through such an assembly, with his attention divided between his two charges, appeared next to impossible, and thoroughly perplexed, Charles Leicester paused, unable to decide whether it were better to advance or attempt to retrace their steps. As he thus pondered, a rush of people forced them forward, and they found themselves completely hemmed in by the crowd, while from the pressure of those around them, Laura and Annie experienced the greatest difficulty in retaining their grasp of Charley's arm. Still no personal incivility was offered them, and Leicester began to hope they might gradually make their way across the square without actual danger, when a cry from Annie convinced him of his error. The cause of her alarm was as follows;—

One of that industrious fraternity, (some members of which are to be met with in every large city,) whose principles in regard to the rights of property are reprehensibly lax, attracted by the sparkling of a valuable brooch in Annie's shawl, conceived the opportunity too good to be lost; accordingly, pressing close to her, he made a snatch at the ornament, seizing it so rudely as to tear open the shawl, and partially drag it from her shoulders. As, alarmed by her cry, Charles turned to discover its cause, a tall figure sprang forward, and wrested his spoil from the robber, flinging him off at the same time with such force that he staggered and fell; then addressing Leicester, the stranger said in a deep stern voice, each accent of which thrilled through Annie's very soul:—

“Make for the church steps,—think only of protecting Mrs. Leicester.—I will be answerable for this lady's safety.”

Then Annie was conscious that her shawl was replaced and carefully wrapped round her, and she felt herself half-led, half-carried forward by one whose resistless strength all obstacles seemed, as it were, to melt away. How they passed through that yelling, maddened crowd, she never knew, but ere she had well recovered from her first alarm at the ruffian's attack, she found herself placed on the steps of St. Mark's Church, her back leaning against a column, and the tall dark figure of her preserver standing statue-like beside her, in such a position as to screen her from the pressure of the crowd. Involuntarily she glanced up at his features; hidden by the coat collar and slouched hat, the only portion of his face that remained visible was the tip of a black moustache, the proud arched nostril, and the cold stony gaze of two fierce black eyes, fixed upon her as though they would pierce her very soul. It was a look to haunt her to her dying day, and worse than all, she understood it! In a moment, the truth flashed upon her. He had loved her! he knew she was about to marry his bitterest enemy, and now he hated her:—poor Annie, if mental agony could kill, that instant she had died. Lewis, thou art bitterly avenged!

“What is the next move?” inquired Leicester, coming up with his arm round his wife's waist, and his hat crushed into the shape of a biffin.

“Wait here for a few minutes,” returned Lewis, “the crowd is already dispersing in the direction of the Arsenal.”

“The Arsenal, what do they want there?” inquired Leicester.

“To waylay Marinovitch, as he leaves the place, and murder him,” returned Lewis in a stern whisper, “but he has been warned of their design, and will of course take measures to ensure his safety.”

“Pleasant all this!” muttered Leicester, taking off his injured hat and endeavouring in some degree to restore its original shape; “here's a case of wanton destruction, glad it is not my head all the same,—now, the coast seems pretty clear, suppose we move on.”

Coldly and silently Lewis resumed his office of guardian: the space intervening between St. Mark's Church and the Palazzo Grassini was passed in safety, and they stood within the court-yard of Leicester's dwelling. Charley laid his hand on Lewis's shoulder,

"You will come in?" he said, "you are hot and tired, and require refreshment—a glass of wine?" Lewis shook his head.

"It is impossible," he replied coldly; then adding, "I am happy to have been of use to — to Mrs. Leicester and yourself," he raised his hat slightly to Annie and turned to depart: recollecting however that he still held in his hand the brooch which he had rescued from the ruffian's clutches, he paused with the intention of giving it to Laura; but Laura had caught sight of "Tarley's" curly head peeping out at her, and actuated by a sudden impulse of maternal affection, or for some other reason which we shall not attempt to fathom, she had tripped off in the direction of her self-willed offspring. Leicester was slowly following her, all his faculties apparently engrossed by a second attempt to reform his outraged hat. Lewis and Annie were left therefore virtually alone. Advancing towards her with an expression of countenance so cold and immovable that every feature might have been carved in marble, Lewis began,—

"I beg pardon, I had forgotten to return your brooch."

It was the first time that morning he had personally addressed her, and his doing so appeared to break the spell which had kept her silent; she took the brooch from him, murmuring some indistinct words of thanks, then gaining courage as she proceeded, she glanced at him appealingly, saying,— "Strange as this meeting is, I am sure I cannot be mistaken,—Mr. Arundel, have you quite forgotten me?"

As she uttered these words a kind of spasm passed across Lewis's face, and for a moment he appeared afraid to trust himself to speak; recovering, however, he replied in the same cold measured tone which he had used throughout the adventure:

"No, Miss Grant, I (and he laid an emphasis on the pronoun so light, that a casual observer would not have detected it, and yet which shot a pang through Annie's heart, that caused her colour to come and go and her limbs to tremble,) do not forget so quickly."

Unable to meet his glance, which she felt was fixed upon her, and scarcely conscious, in her agitation, of what she was saying, Annie faltered out,—

"You will give my father an opportunity of thanking you, I hope; he will, I cannot doubt, that is, we shall all be glad to renew our intimacy with so old a friend."

Lewis paused ere he could trust himself to reply. Her evident emotion, the earnestness of her manner, half timid, half imploring, tended to soothe his wounded spirit and disarm his wrath; but the vision of the morning, in which he had seen her clinging to Lord Bellefield's arm and smiling upon him, was too fresh in his recollection, and the demon of pride and jealousy still retained full dominion over him.

"You must pardon me," he said, "I will reserve my visit to General Grant, till I can congratulate him on his daughter's wedding." Then raising his hat ceremoniously, he bowed to her, and was gone!

SCENE ON THE COAST OF MALABAR.

On looking at this beautiful picture we realize all the vaunted luxuriance of Indian vegetation, which throws into the shade that of the colder north. The little shrine upon the sea-shore, overhung by lofty trailing foliage—the graceful forms of the dusky daughters of India—and the white birds flitting across the gorgeous gloom of the verdure, compose a scene over which the eye wanders with something of that intoxication produced by the climate and scenery from which the subject is borrowed.

COMBINATIONS AND STRIKES.

PREVIOUS to the year 1824, the mere act on the part of workmen of combining to raise their wages was a punishable offence, and had repeatedly been made the subject of trial and punishment both in England and Scotland. A very strong feeling, however, began to pervade the minds of the community, that the attempt to enforce the provisions of the Combination Act did infinitely more harm than good, and that all such attempts, whether politic or not, were abortive, for experience had proved that it was beyond the power of legislation to prevent the open or covert union of workmen. The subject was brought before parliament in 1823, and in the following year Mr. Hume brought in a bill which swept at once about thirty statutes from the statute book, and legalized ample combination on the part both of masters and workmen, subject only to certain restraints in the event of violence or intimidation being proved against the members of the combination, or persons employed by them. On the repeal of the combination acts, the operatives, as yet untaught by experience, rejoiced in the belief that the principal cause of low wages was at length removed, and that they were now able to secure to themselves what they conceived to be an adequate remuneration for their labour, and a justifiable control over the proceedings of their employers. Accordingly Trades Unions were extensively formed throughout all the manufacturing districts in the country, and attempts were made to organize a National Association, for the protection of labour, composed of an aggregation of trades unions, and having for its sole object the prevention of a reduction of wages. As might have been expected, these associations wholly failed to realize the expectations of their founders, and the numerous strikes to which they gave rise exercised the most disastrous influence on the welfare of the working classes. The ruinous consequences of these strikes, especially in Manchester, Bradford, Preston, and Glasgow, broke up not a few of the trades unions, and for a time deterred their members from a repetition of such unavailing attempts to improve their condition. But a new generation has arisen, who have had no experience of these evils. The lessons which the past history of combinations teaches, appear to be in a great measure forgotten. Brisk trade, good wages, and cheap bread have obliterated the recollection of the sufferings produced by former unavailing struggles to prevent the payment of labour from falling its natural level. Strikes and rumours of strikes once more furnish the themes of discussion among our operatives. The engine-drivers and firemen on the North Western Railway have on two occasions threatened a simultaneous abandonment of their work. The colliers and miners have in various places struck for higher wages, and the newspapers are filled with accounts of strikes among the sailors, and of the riots caused by their violent attempts to hinder others from occupying the situations which they have abandoned. In these circumstances it cannot be an unprofitable or unreasonable inquiry,—How far combinations and strikes are fitted to gain the ends which their promoters have in view, and what are the effects which they must produce on the ultimate welfare of the working classes themselves?

Combinations among workmen are formed merely for the purpose of raising or keeping up the price of labour. Are they fitted, then, to gain this object? Economical science and experience alike answer in the negative. The rate of wages depends on the proportion between capital and population, or in other words, on the extent of the fund for the maintenance of labour, compared with the number of labourers to be maintained. So long as the number of workmen goes hand in hand with the fund for their support, the condition of the working classes remains unchanged. If population should increase, while the capital which supports it is stationary, the workmen begin to experience more and more difficulty in getting employment, and when they do get work, are obliged to accept of a less remuneration for their services. If, on the contrary, circulating capital still remaining the same, the number of labourers were to diminish, or if capital should increase, while the number of labourers remained the same, it is clear the effect will be reversed—employment will become more abundant, and wages will rise. The principle which regulates the remuneration of labour is thus graphically stated by one of the speakers in the popular tale called "The Manchester Strike."

"When Adam was some hundred years old, he said to Eve, "Stay you here and spin with the women, while I go yonder and set my men to delve. Come, my good fellows, work hard and you shall have your shares." "And pray, sir," said the men, "what are we to live upon while our fruit and vegetables are growing?" "Why," says Adam, "instead of my sharing the fruit with you when it is grown, suppose you take your portion in advance. It may be a convenience to you, and it is all the same thing to me." So the men looked at the ground, and calculated how much digging and other work there would be, and then named their demand, not a silver money with King George's head upon it, but food, clothing, and tools.'

"Then at harvest," observed Gibson, 'the whole produce belonged to Adam.'

"Of course the commodity was made up, like all commodities, of capital and labour. Adam's capital and the men's labour.* * * Well, Adam and his men expected to get as much by their crop as would pay for their subsistence and their toil, and this much the men asked, and Adam was willing to give, and a fair surplus remained over for himself. So they made their bargain, and he bought their share of the commodity, and had to himself all the flax and other things that his produce exchanged for in the market. And so that season passed off, and all were contented.'

"And what happened next season, sir?"

"Next season twice the number of men came to ask work in the same plot of ground. Adam told them that he had very little more wages to pay away than he had the year before; so that if they all wanted to work under him they must be content with little more than half what each had formerly earned. They agreed, and submitted to be rather pinched; but they hoped it would be only for a time, as it was a very fine harvest indeed, so much labour having been spent upon it, and there being a fine profit into Adam's pocket. But four times the number of labourers appeared next year; so that, notwithstanding the increase of capital, each had not so much as one-third the original wages; and the men grew very cross, and their wives very melancholy. But how could Adam help it?"

"Why did not the men carry their labour elsewhere?" asked Black, contemptuously.

"Why do you go on spinning for Mortimer and Rowe when Elliot pays higher wages?"

"Because nobody is taking on new hands; I can't get work."

"Well, nobody was taking on new hands in Adam's neighbourhood; all the capital was already employed."

The price of labour is governed by the same law which regulates the price of all other commodities,—the proportion which the supply bears to the demand. There is a certain quantity of work to be done, and a certain number of hands to do it; if there be much work and comparatively few hands, wages will rise; if little work and an excess of hands, wages will fall. It is self-evident that combinations and strikes cannot alter this law. They can neither increase capital, nor diminish population; and, therefore, it is utterly impossible, in the very nature of things, that they ever can procure a permanent rise of wages. Not only so, as their tendency is to diminish rather than to increase the wealth or capital of the country, their effect must be to leave less—not more—for the maintenance of labour than previously existed. When a strike takes place, the capital of the master is for the time locked up. All his machinery and the raw material of his goods, on which he has expended large sums of money, cease to bring him any return. His rent and taxes are still to pay, to say nothing of the injury which the delicate moving parts of metallic mechanisms sustain by inaction in our humid climate. There are some manufactories in which the interest on sunk capital amounts to from 5,000*l.* to 10,000*l.* per annum. If we add to this interest that of the profit fairly resulting to the masters from the employment of their capital, the loss to the workmen of their wages, and the injury inflicted on trade by the customers' resorting to other markets and never returning, we may form some estimate of the vast extent to which the wealth of the country is injured by strikes among operatives. These strikes cannot lessen the number of workmen, but they lessen the amount of capital to be divided among them, and, consequently, must diminish the share which falls to each. It has, accordingly, been found that at the close of a protracted strike the turn-out workmen have been obliged to accept of a lower rate of wages than they were offered at the commencement of the strike.

Experience has shown that strikes are rarely successful, but even if they were so, they would defeat their own ends. The first effect of an increase of wages by such means would of course be a rise in the price of the article which the workmen were engaged in manufacturing. Now it is well known, that a very slight increase in the price of an article causes a decided decrease in its consumption. Our manufacturers are now maintaining a keen competition with those of other countries, and it requires incessant diligence and the most cordial co-operation of employers and employed to enable them to maintain their ground against the increasing skill and activity of foreign competitors. A slight increase in the price of their goods would enable the manufacturers of other countries to meet them in markets of which they have now the exclusive possession, and would drive them altogether from markets of which they have at present a share. As a matter of course, the demand for our manufactures in the foreign market would diminish, and the warehouses of our manufacturers would be glutted with goods for which no outlet could be found. If, therefore, the operatives could succeed in raising their wages by means of combinations, they would themselves be among the first to feel the disastrous effects in the stagnation of trade and the consequent diminution of wages.

Some of the Trades Unions appear to have discovered that the rate of wages depends on the proportion which the number of labourers bears to the fund for their support; but instead of leading them to see the futility of combinations for keeping up the price of labour, this has only induced them to proceed further in the wrong path, and to add injustice to impolicy. In not a few of these Unions it is a rule that no master shall be permitted to take more than a certain number of apprentices. In some trades in Dublin no master, whatever may be the extent of his trade, is permitted to take more than four apprentices. In the articles of the Association of Operative Cotton Spinners in Glasgow, there is the following regulation:—"This Association binds and obliges every one of its members to refrain from instructing any individuals in the art of spinning except such as are sons or brothers of a spinner who may have been or is at present a member of this Association."

Respecting these rules, we may state, in the first place, that they are clearly illegal; and, secondly, that they are in the highest degree unjust, both to the persons who are prohibited from learning the trade, and to the public at large. Every man has an undoubted right to follow whatever profession or trade he may think fit, and it is the grossest tyranny for any person to presume to say to his fellow-men, that they shall not be permitted to learn his trade, lest by so doing they should lower the rate of his wages. If every trade were to follow this plan, (and one trade has as much right to do so as another,) the result would be that a very large number of persons would be prevented from learning any method of earning their bread, and would therefore be either starved outright or compelled to depend for subsistence on the precarious bounty of others. But as it is impossible for every trade to carry this plan into operation, it is obvious that those who do inflict a grievous wrong on the workmen of other trades—that every youth who is prevented by these regulations from learning the trade which he prefers, is robbed of his rights, and that an absolute, unmitigated wrong is inflicted on the public besides.

Another highly objectionable regulation of Trades Unions is that which fixes the minimum of wages, that is, a rate below which not only no member of the Union, but no person whatever, shall work for any master. Whatever may be the intention of this regulation, its obvious effect is to discourage everything like talent and industry, and to give a premium on indolence and stupidity. Suppose that there are in a particular shop workmen of different degrees of skill and application, so that some are worth 30*s.* a-week, some 25*s.*, some only 15*s.*; if the minimum of wages be fixed, say at 20*s.* a-week, is it not plain to the meanest capacity that the sum which the master is compelled to pay to the idle and unskilful workman above what he deserves must necessarily be deducted from the wages of the intelligent and industrious workman? So far indeed is the system carried of depressing the expert and diligent operatives, that taskwork is condemned by some of the Unions in Ireland, as an unmitigated robbery of the rights of others, and the following most extraordinary rule is in some places one of their fundamental laws:—"Should any member of this society be known to boast of his superior ability, as to either the quality or the quantity of the work he can do, either in public or private company, he shall pay a fine of 2*s.* 6*d.* or be expelled the society." The necessary effect of these regulations is to keep down the able, industrious, and skilful among the operatives themselves, to the level of the lowest and most worthless and least efficient members of the confraternity. Let a workman be ever so deserving, his employer has not the means of rewarding his merit, for the rules of the association compel him to pay equally individuals whose labour may not be half so valuable; so that the real effect of this regulation is to take a considerable weekly allowance out of the pockets of clever, skilful workmen, and to put it into those of all the blockheads and bunglers connected with the confederacy. Were matters in their natural state, masters would find it their interest to reward meritorious workmen in proportion to the value of their services, and to pay others of an opposite character only according to their deserts. What the one class would thus lose would be transferred to the other; talent and industry would have fair play, and sober attentive individuals would have a prospect of rising to competence, if not to wealth; but instead of this, the combination system puts all upon a level—superior merit is neither recognised nor remunerated, and every stimulus to industrious exertion is at once blunted. The system, then, is neither more nor less than a tax upon activity and skill, in order that indolence and stupidity may be maintained at an unjust rate of payment. In this point of view alone the injury inflicted upon the deserving class of operatives themselves, is a far more serious matter than they are generally aware of.

The principles of economical science demonstrate that Trades Unions cannot, in the nature of things, permanently gain the end for which they are formed, and the history of combinations and strikes bears unequivocal testimony to the same truth. One of their most frequent results has been to cause the removal of factories to other situations, where the proprietors may be free from the improper control of their men. Of this it would be easy to give many instances. The combinations in Nottinghamshire of persons under the name of Luddites drove a great number of lace frames from that district, and caused establishments to be formed in Devonshire. The increase of the silk trade at Manchester is partly owing to its migration from Macclesfield, which is much depopulated in consequence of the restriction placed on labour by the Unions. Norwich has suffered the same evil. "The business of calico printing," says a gentleman well acquainted with the subject, "which has long been carried on in Belfast, was taken from it in consequence of the combination of the men engaged in it. The manufacturer who had embarked his capital in the trade sold off his materials, and the result was that 107 families were thrown out of bread. In the town of Bandon, a cotton factory was established, which was like to give employment to many persons in that neighbourhood. The proprietor fitted up his machinery, and had received several orders; when that was known to the workmen, they turned out for higher wages. The proprietor remained long enough to complete the orders he had got, but then gave up the business, and thus that neighbourhood lost an outlay in wages of 11,000*l.* or 12,000*l.* With respect to the city of Dublin, on a moderate estimate, wages to the amount of 500,000*l.* a-year were withdrawn from it in the manufacture of almost every article of consumption. In the foundry trade alone, not less than 10,000*l.* was sent out of Dublin, which would have been retained if the system of combination did not exist. Not very long ago there were four shipbuilders in extensive business in Dublin; there is at present not one; the trade had been removed to Drogheda, and to Belfast. What was the cause of this? It was that when there was any business so as to give employment to the workmen, they at once turned out for higher wages. Other instances have occurred where still greater injury has been produced by the removal of a portion of the skill and capital of the country to a foreign land. Such was the case at Glasgow, as stated in the Fourth Parliamentary Report respecting artisans and machinery. One of the partners in an extensive cotton factory, fettered and annoyed by the constant interference of his workmen, removed to the state of New York, where he re-established his machinery; and thus afforded to a rival community, already formidable to our trade, at once a pattern of our best machinery, and an example of the best methods of using it.

Strikes have also led in many instances to the superseding of hand labour by machines. It was the strikes among the Manchester spinners from 1824 to 1831, especially the great strike in the latter year, which induced several of the manufacturers, who were afraid of their business being driven to other countries, to make application to the celebrated machinists, Messrs. Sharpe & Co. of Manchester, and to request them to direct the inventive talents of their partner, Mr. Roberts, to the construction of a self-acting mule, in order to emancipate the trade from galling slavery and impending ruin. Under the assurances of the most liberal encouragement in the adoption of his invention, Mr. Roberts suspended his professional pursuits as an engineer, and set his fertile genius to construct a spinning automaton. In the course of a few months, he produced a machine called the "self-acting mule," which performed the work of the head-spinners so much better than they could do it themselves, as to leave them no chance against it, and which was introduced into the factories as rapidly as the patentees could execute the orders with which they were immediately overwhelmed.

Another example of the same kind is mentioned by Dr. Ure, in his "Philosophy of Manufactures." "The elegant art of calico-printing," he says, "which embodies in its operations the most elegant problems of chemistry as well as mechanics, had been for a long period the sport of foolish journeymen, who turned the liberal means of comfort it furnished them into weapons of warfare against their employers and the trade itself. They were, in fact, by their delirious combinations, plotting to kill the goose which laid the golden eggs of their industry, or to force it to fly off to a foreign land, where it might live without molestation. In the spirit of Egyptian taskmasters, the operative printers dictated to the manufacturer the number and quality of the apprentices to be admitted into the trade, the hours of their own labour, and the wages to be paid them. At length capitalists sought deliverance from the intolerable bondage in the resources of science, and were speedily reinstated in their legitimate dominion of the head over the inferior members. The four-colour and five-colour machines which now render calico-printing an unerring and expeditious process, are mounted in all great establishments. It was under the high pressure of the same despotic confederacies, that self-acting apparatus for executing the dyeing and rinsing operations have been devised.

The croppers of the West Riding of Yorkshire, and the hecklers or flax-dressers, can unfold "a tale of woe" on this subject. Their earnings exceeded those of most mechanics, but the frequency of strikes among them, and the irregularities in their hours and times of working, compelled masters to substitute machinery for their manual labour. Their trades, in consequence, have been in great measure superseded. Similar examples must have presented themselves to all who are familiar with the details of our manufacturing, but these may suffice to illustrate one of the most common results of combinations.

When the nature of the work is such that it is not possible to remove it, or to substitute machinery for manual labour, the proprietors are more exposed to injury from combinations among workmen; but even in these cases, when the strike has been general, the masters have almost invariably been successful in the contest. A volume might be filled with an account of the injuries which unsuccessful strikes have inflicted on the working classes. In 1810, a strike took place in Manchester and the neighbourhood, by which 30,000 persons employed in cotton-spinning went out of employment. For a considerable time, they received assistance to the amount of 1,500*l.* a-week—all was unavailing. At the end of four months, after their funds were totally exhausted, and the turn-out workmen reduced to the greatest misery, the struggle ceased without having in any one particular accomplished the object of the unionists. Some of the men were even glad to accept employment, not at their old wages, but at half those wages. In 1829, another strike took place at Manchester, which threw 10,000 persons out of work for six months. The result is thus described by a workman in his evidence before the Factory Commission,— "The consequence was, that at the end of six months they came into work again at reduced wages." Few strikes have been more extensively supported than the celebrated Bradford turn-out of 1825-26. Before the strike for an advance, 14,000 persons, in the town and neighbourhood of Bradford, entered their names as approving of the plan, and willing to act upon it. Contributions from 152 places enabled the struggle to be kept up for two months. What was the result? At the end of that time, the men returned to work at lower wages than before. It is melancholy to discover, from the notices to their brethren at a distance, the poverty in which the turn-out left the people. They beg to be excused contributing in their turn. "The Bradford workmen are at the present time utterly incapable of relieving any other class of workmen; hundreds of them cannot get bread, and few of the remainder anything else." "Melancholy as all this is," it has been justly said, "it is far from surprising when it is seen how money goes during a strike. In the first place, the waste of maintaining many thousand people for ten months in idleness, is frightful when their future support actually depends on there being no waste. At Bradford, the sum thus expended was £14,431, so when they returned to their work there was all that, and whatever increase their labour might have added to it, the less to pay wages with. How should the masters raise their wages?"

But even this expenditure was less vexatious in its wastefulness than some which belongs like a curse to a strike. It is a hard thing for a man to see his children's maintenance frittered away in upholding expenses such as the following:—

Meat, drink, and lodging of Delegates from various parts of the kingdom . . .	£240	16	11
Travelling expenses of Delegates from Bradford	286	14	11
Expenses of Committees	466	9	10
Stationery, newspapers, advertisements	345	8	9
Postage and carriage of parcels	43	15	11
Loss by bad bank-notes	11	1	0

This is by no means a solitary case. In the statement of the expenditure of the Mechanics' Union of Glasgow, for a single half-year, more than 5*l.* is charged for drink, and half of the whole expenditure (95*l.*) is heaped together in such a way as wholly to prevent a proper investigation of the manner in which the money was spent. The half-yearly report of the expenses of the Newcastle Mechanics' Union contains the following items:—

Club and Committee liquor	£4	6	0½
Painting President's chair	0	4	6
New top and side curtains for President's chair	2	1	11½

It is lamentable to think that the wages of the workmen, instead of increasing the comforts of themselves and families, are sometimes consumed in such absurd charges as putting new curtains to their president's chair. One of the members of the Gilders' Trades Union says in a published letter, "It has been deemed expedient in times past to govern our little trade by secrecy, the mass of the members only having to pay, but ask no questions as to the appropriation of the money." Doubtless there seem to be very good reasons why the committees of the Trades Unions should not like questions to be asked respecting the appropriation of the money. We have before us a statement of the half-yearly expenses of all the lodges of the Union of Mechanics in England, Scotland, and Ireland; in all of them the charge for committee liquor is a large, and in some the chief item in the accounts, so that we may apply to the Unionists literally the words of the prophet, "He that earneth wages earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes."

Towards the close of the year 1836, there was an extensive and very disastrous strike of the operative cotton spinners of Preston, which was productive of an appalling amount of misery and crime. The main reason for the discontent was that the spinners of Bolton had higher wages, but on the other hand it was alleged that the Bolton prices rose and fell with the times, whereas the Preston prices were fixed, and were in the aggregate or long run as advantageous for the regular workman. Be this as it may, a union which had formerly existed commenced operations for raising the wages of the spinners, and made a simultaneous demand on all the masters for the Bolton list of prices. This was refused, but an offer was made to the spinners of an advance of ten per cent. on their gross earnings, or about 3s. 4d. per week, on condition that they would detach themselves from the Union. This offer was in many instances accepted by individual spinners, but the council of the Union, assuming the right to return an answer in the name of the whole body, rejected the offer of the masters, and renewed their demand of the "Bolton List of Prices," unaccompanied by any condition relative to the Union.

To these terms the masters refused to accede, and on Monday morning, the 7th of November, the spinners discontinued their attendance, and the factories were closed. At the time of the turn-out, the operatives of Preston engaged in cotton-spinning amounted to 8,500 persons. Of this number it may be said that only 660 (that is, the whole of the spinners,) voluntarily left their work, the greater part of the remaining 7,840 being thereby thrown out of employment. After standing out for three months, and suffering the greatest extremities, they were compelled to accept of the terms which the masters had offered before the strike commenced, and besides, to sign a declaration to the effect that they would not at any future time, while in their service, become members of any Union or combination of workmen.

The following estimate was made of the direct pecuniary loss to all classes of operatives in consequence of the turn-out:—

The loss to the masters, being three months' interest of £800,000, some of which being sunk capital was not only unproductive, but was taking harm from being rendered useless, was estimated at	45,000	0	0
And the loss sustained by the shop-keepers from loss of business, bad debts, &c. . . .	4,986	0	0
Making the total loss to the town and trade of Preston, in this unavailing struggle	£107,196	0	0

While the turn-out lasted, the operatives generally wandered about the streets without any definite object. 75 persons were brought before the magistrates, and convicted of drunkenness and disorderly conduct; 12 were imprisoned or held to bail for assaults, or intimidations; about 20 young females became prostitutes; three persons are believed to have died of starvation, and not less than 5,000 must have suffered long and severely from hunger and cold. In almost every family, the greater part of the wearing apparel and household furniture was pawned. In nine cases out of ten, considerable arrears of rent were due, and out of the sum of 1,600*l.* deposited in the savings bank, by about 60 spinners or overlookers, 900*l.* was withdrawn in the course of the three months. Most of those who could obtain credit got into debt with the shopkeepers—the trade of the town suffered severely, many of the small shopkeepers were nearly ruined, and a few entirely so.

In 1834, an extensive combination was established among the colliers in Lanarkshire, and the adjoining counties of Renfrew and Stirling. During the latter six months of 1835, and the whole of 1836, they received the extravagant wages of thirty-five shillings a week, for three days' work, at four or five hours a day only. In the spring of 1837, the iron-masters finding that the prices of iron had fallen from 7*l.* to 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton, felt themselves under the necessity of reducing the rate of wages. The terms they offered were that the men should work eight hours a day, during five days a week, at five shillings a day. These terms were immediately rejected, and the whole colliers in Lanarkshire, 2,000 in number, struck work, and remained unemployed for six months. At the end of that time, they were compelled to give in, their place having in the meantime been partly supplied by new hands, chiefly starving weavers, whose numbers ultimately rose to about 800. The loss sustained by the colliers, their employers, and the public, in consequence of this strike, is estimated at upwards of 600,000*l.*

The only other instance we shall adduce is the strike of the Glasgow cotton-spinners, which excited public attention over the whole country, in consequence of the scenes of violence and outrage with which it was attended, and the deed of murder which marked its close. Previous to 1836, the wages of the spinners were from thirty to thirty-five shillings a week. In the summer of that year, the spinners memorialized their employers for an augmentation of wages, in consequence of the rise in the price of cotton goods which then took place. To this the masters agreed, and the wages of the spinners were raised from thirty-five shillings to two pounds. In consequence, however, of the alarming stagnation of trade in the spring of 1837, prices fell so much that the masters found it necessary to propose that wages should be restored to their previous rate. This step was resolutely opposed by the operatives, who struck work in April 1837. The strike continued for a period of nearly eighteen weeks, and terminated at last by the spinners unanimously agreeing to surrender at discretion. The loss to operatives, masters, and shopkeepers, caused by this strike, amounted to nearly 200,000*l*.

The sufferings endured by the operatives during this disastrous strike must have been extreme. Towards the close the aliment allowed by the association to each man was only eighteen pence a-week. The condition of the female operatives, the piecers, pickers, carders, and reelers, was infinitely worse, for there was no fund whatever provided for their maintenance, and from the commencement they were thrown upon the streets, without either asylum, employment, or subsistence. The necessary consequence was, that crime and immorality increased to a frightful degree, and the rapid progress of fever in the city, as well as the great increase in the rate of mortality, evinced in an appalling manner how fatal such strikes are to the best interests of the labouring poor.

The object of the operatives engaged in these strikes has too often been, by combination and violence to force up their wages during prosperity, and by combination and violence to prevent them from falling in adversity, hoping thus to avert from themselves the law of nature, and to build up on the foundation of intimidation a durable prosperity amidst the fleeting changes of human affairs. But experience has clearly proved that all attempts to raise wages by such means are certain in the end to recoil on the heads of those engaged in them. The effectual remedy, however, for this great social evil, is to be found, not in legislative enactments, but in the diffusion of knowledge and of sound moral and religious principles among the mass of the people. Whenever the working classes become convinced that what is prejudicial to the rest of the community can never be really beneficial to them,—that to do evil that good may come is equally at variance with justice and expediency,—and whenever they combine against the future, instead of against the masters, and unite to help one another's savings, instead of to waste the earnings of all,—there will be an end of ruinous quarrels, to the destruction of trade, and the increase of crime and immorality, of disease and death.

EAUX D'ARTIFICE ;

OR, A WINTER'S DAY AT MALVERN.

THERE is a certain charm in the feeling of isolation when not accompanied by that of loneliness. And it is an amusing privilege, being unobserved, to observe the habits of the human species in novel circumstances. Such are assuredly those of the "water cure."

Whence that tolling of door-bells at the peep of dawn, inhumanly rousing from slumber anticipant patients and unsympathizing housemaids? Whence that hurry of bucket-bearing men and women through the lanes of a peaceful village? Is fire to be extinguished? No—it is water, water, water, not to quench the flame of wood; but to feed the flame of life, cooling the fevered, heating the chilled. soothing the excited, exciting the torpid, thinning the thick blood, thickening the thin, healing old sores and evoking new ones, whetting the appetite, and cheating it when found. Great are the "curiosities of common water," as a book of last century styles them, often sung, and as often forgotten, for there is nothing new under the sun, and the nearest remedy is the most overlooked. The simplification of mystery and the mystification of simplicity are the two poles of medical craft and valetudinarian fancy.

Were the wall of each dwelling by an earthquake shock laid prostrate, what strange revelations would there be! Strange as the peep-show of digestion obtained under the lifted flap of a wounded hero's stomach! Behold the mummies, rivals of Egypt, Thebans scorning spice, in voluntary stillness wrapped, and sodden as they lie, waiting the stern approach of watery shock! Behold the sleeper waked; but to court with shudder and recoil the dread embrace of watery wrapper, impending from a spectre's arms, not sheet-enveloped, but sheet-enveloping! Behold the Naiads in hanging folds of white, fit to be planted out amid the classic water-works of royal parks! See others in water rooted, not in earth, rooted at neither end, nor up, nor down; but at the middle doubled like the layer of a shrub, save that it courts, and they abhor the soil! Or else the Pythian stool, or arched oven, compassed or filled with pent-up vapour, where stewed humanity yields up its woes, and parboiled into health, docs, like the blacksmith's plunged iron, hiss water into steam. Hear now the fussy, fretting, fiery scrub (as in the currying and whisping of a hundred horse) recuperant of heat, reactive even unto blood. Then see the shivering grasp at victims, the scandalous infliction of internal drowning cold to meet external, as classics do of two negations compound an affirmation! Alas! this fierce encounter of waters from without, and waters from within, what chance has life between them?

Such are the esoteric things. The exoteric next. What forms be these suddenly swarming forth, sub Jove frigido, unflannelled, uncomforted, unfurred, rushing divergent into infinite space, running as dogs with acolythic saucepans, jostling in reckless haste, by desperate intent impelled, changing the village peace into the stir of a metropolis? Is there alarm of war, or tide of emigration, or scramble for mammon o'er the trampled necks of rivals, selling the soul to find the body? No—'tis caloric. Oh caloric! a kingdom for reaction! the getting up of steam in the burst boilers of men. A gang they form, not the press-gang of former days, but compress-gang of these,—not dragging to the wave, but from the wave escaped,—yet each by fate pursued, in front or else where tortured and armed at once with hidden mail, each in his sorrow wrapped, each in his bosom bearing not secret fire, but water. Nor are other ills awaiting which can't be shaken off like watery clout, but must be remedied by dire eruption, those burning mountains of the microcosm, which disclose the dying indignation of besieged disease.

As the day begins, so does it restlessly proceed and end. Scarce have the busied and blown health-hunters, reposing on their milk and water, and skimming the last morning's Times, begun to recover their disturbed proprieties, when the horrors of noon come relentless on. Sitz, sheet and compress, plunge, deep and shallow, scrubbing and gulping ply their varied work, while the teasing shower and the whelming douche betrickle and belabour poor humanity, by that same power restoring it which wears the rock away. Then off to the highway and the hills again! See how they run express without an errand! pity no errand could be found! See how they thread like weaver's shuttle the steep zig-zag, rising like genii into impending mists! Muscular motion for nought but muscular motion's sake, beginning, end, and centre to itself, hunger and heat the summa bona, what unromantic tread-mill work is this? Much to be pitied they who could do otherwise. Yet still more they who cannot. Side by side with the smart equipage of squire, or gig of traveller, or team of peasant, slowly wheels along the creaking chair of paralytic, wreck of long debauchery, of midnight lamp-work, or of public toils, smitten by suns inclement, carking care, or swift calamity. Or else the form emaciate of atrophy or phthisis pulmonal, like an escaped inmate of that tomb to which it tends with rapid strides, though slow its pace on earth. Or infant borne by mule or stub, born in its malady, deformed and blanched, sadly sedate and ulcerous, jogged carelessly along by ringlet-covered nurse, circumspect not circumspect, or brooded over by the anxious authors of its life and woe. Here the pinched visage of the dyspeptic, there the tallowy of the dropsical, here the bloated cheek of the licentious, there the chiselled pallor of the student, here the fading rose of the ball-room, there the wrinkled collapse of the dowager. And as the only redeeming glimpse of romance in the picture, the shy and sober spinster sauntering pensively, with crookless pole in hand, in style arcadian, a shepherdess without a flock.

As here, with round unvarying of chop and potato, cold water is thrown upon all the festivities of the table, so are all postprandial ease and social enjoyment cut short, and embittered. The flow of soul, the snooze of fire-side comfort, are rudely violated by the afternoon's assault, wherein the untimely loss of raiment, the damp appliance and the frigid draft, form matter for a tale of sorrow, which the rising moon takes up. Who after such a day has heart for stocking silk, or neck-cloth white, or evening circle left—all that proscribed,—tea, coffee, cake, ice, lobster and liquor, which makes such circles gay? Far rather mope at home on bread and water, toasting the shivering limbs, penning our sorrows to inquiring friends, and in fancy spinning out into a dozen the single hour of peace vouchsafed from liquid torments. For alas! like a prisoner to his cell, turn into bed we must not, to consign ourselves to sweet indefinite repose, but to be scared with horrid dreams, pledges of early misery on the coming morn. Yet through this darkness gleams a theory of hope. And in this cup of woe is health and cure.

How are these toilers fed? By what viands are hearts, through stomachs, won? Some put on honour, some watched and weighed, too little for the now ravenous, too simple for the yet dainty, their diet is the flat disappointment of spiceless, heatless monotonous mediocrity, a keeping of the peace by armed neutrality. Alas! alas! ye wine, spirit and ale, pepper, mustard and cinnamon, salad and fruit, muffin and manchet, coffee, tea, sugar, and tobacco, lobster and Lazenby, caper and curry, custard, cake and confection venders, well may ye weep! Othello's occupation's gone. Ye are the traitors in the camp of health, sappers and miners indeed, panderers to the palate, destroyers of all within.

And how are they physicked? Physis and physickers, avaunt! Farewell all moving draughts, dinner pills, and evening powders; adieu, calomel and jalap, stimulant and tonic, alkali and alterative, acid and narcotic. Ye are made worse than in vain—pure evil are ye all. Henceforth shall the food-bag be sacred to food alone; no more the vehicle of harm to other unremonstrant members; no more self-sacrificed in treason's cause. We shall fight underground with malady no more; no more expel disease by death, or destroy the proximate in trying to reach the remote. All shall be surface work, yet not superficial. Of the two surfaces of man—all that can be reached without the knife, viz. the inner and intestinal, the outer and cuticular—the former, lesser, tenderer, and unseen, shall keep its jubilee—the latter shall be hourly viewed. The tanning of the hide, worse than school-boy's, shall exempt the stomach from being eaten into holes by drugs. So from medere, to heal, shall medication flow and thither tend, not by the "Porte du Rhon" of pharmaceutical exhibition, but all above board, with no privilege to poison.

Still, is chemistry a pure black art—science an idle dream? No; the theory atomic, the calculus differential, shall escape the besom's sweep. As facts yield material for fancy, so may fancy create facts. Mind is matter's lord, and by the minimum of matter is materialism sunk to zero. Globules impalpable and quintessent, the q. e. d. of alchemy, fresh from Sir Isaac's nutshell, missed by no vision weak, dropped by no nervous hand, captive in no hollow tooth, enter with magic spell, as a symbolic delivery of matter, where no dose ponderable may—healing by influence and first intention—aiding disease as nature's proper cure, like by like, as far as body and bodiless can be so. Nor, if report tell true, does the mesmeric aura fail to waft its questionable soothing over troubled frames, binding with drowsy spell the resigned impersonal, arming the vision to penetrate the veil of things unseen, and clothing the will to heal with healing power.

The water-cure does indeed hold out remedy for acute disease. But the cure of chronic is its aim and boast—the ablation of old corruption, the righting of perverted function which pleads prescriptive right

For every form of evil, every phase of symptom, every stage of cure, changes exhaustless can be rung on water; yet not, as with the pills of Morrison, where the more you take the better you will feel. To cure old ailment in a day is hopeless. The man who makes his members suffer long must suffer long for them. And yet it seems too hard to buy five years of life with five years of washing, and to spend one's days in getting well. For those whose ruin, begun with sin, has been perfected with drugs—for those whose minds have burnt their bodies out—whose brains have turned their stomachs, or vice versa—for hectic atomy, or nervous atrophy, or latent inflammation—for skins, outer and inner, strangers to cleanliness, or nursed, as in a hot-house, by warm ablutions or hot potations—or for pampered men with morbid appetites, swollen bodies, or aching brows—water does promise much, and does so not in vain. Yet in itself it is a monstrous bore, and he is a fish out of water, indeed, who finds himself thus plunged into the midst of it.

SHEPHERD'S VISION.

In the passing school of Royal Academicians—the contemporaries of Stothard, West, and Lawrence—Henry Howard holds a not unhonoured place. His forte lay in realizing the fairy creations of the poets. Groups of nymphs and naiads and angels—painted from beautiful models—luxurious yet decorous, never overstepping the modesty required by our English tastes—were the class of subjects with which it was his wont to enrich for many years the walls of the Royal Academy Exhibition. Of these works, that before us is a graceful and favourite specimen. Dian in her car, with hosts of attendant nymphs—most delicately grouped and rendered—form a bright apparent vision to the eyes of the happy shepherd who is privileged to behold it. The conception and execution are alike excellent.

EXTRACTS FROM OLD BOOKS.

“CONSISTENCY is the great character in good parents, which impresses children. They may witness much temper, but if they see their father ‘keep the even tenor of his way,’ his imperfections will be understood and allowed for as reason opens. The child will see and reflect on his parent’s intention; and this will have great influence on his mind. The influence may, indeed, be afterwards counteracted; but that only proves that contrary currents may arise, and carry the child another way. Old Adam may be too strong for Young Melancthon.”—*Rev. “Invention is one of the great marks of genius; but if we consult experience we shall find, that it is by being conversant with the inventions of others that we learn to invent, as by reading the thoughts of others we learn to think.

“Whoever has so far formed his taste as to be able to relish and feel the beauties of the great Masters has gone a great way in his study; for merely from a consciousness of this relish of the right, the mind swells with an inward pride, and is almost as powerfully affected as if it had itself produced what it admires. . . . Our minds should be habituated to the contemplation of excellence, and far from making such habits the discipline of our youth only, we should, to the last moment of our lives, continue a settled intercourse with all the true examples of grandeur. The mind is but a barren soil; a soil which is soon exhausted, and will produce no crop, or only one, unless it be continually fertilised and enriched with foreign matter. . . . It is vain for poets and painters to endeavour to invent without materials on which the mind may work, and from which invention must originate. Nothing can come of nothing. Homer is supposed to have possessed all the learning of his time; and we are certain that Michael Angelo and Raffaele were equally possessed of all the knowledge in the art which had been discovered in the works of their predecessors. There can be no doubt that he who has most materials, has the greatest means of invention; and if he has not the power of using them, it must proceed from a feebleness of intellect, or from the confused manner in which those collections have been laid up in his mind.”—Sir Joshua Reynolds.

“James I. did all he could to weaken the Catholic party by dividing them in opinion. When Dr. Reynolds, the head of the Nonconformists, complained to the King of the printing and dispersing of Popish pamphlets, the King answered, that this was done by a warrant from the court, to nourish the schism between the Seculars and Jesuits, which was of great service. ‘Doctor,’ added the King, ‘you are a better clergymen than statesman.’”—Neale’s History of the Puritans.

CHRONIC VIBEX

W. J. G. G. G. G.

A DIALOGUE ON YOUTH.¹

If this were a despotic country, and it were our function, instead of writing reviews of books, to see to their proper distribution, and to place them with imperative suggestions in the hands of such as needed them, we should be inclined to command all persons concerned in the training and management of youth to read, and attentively consider, the volume now before us. The infliction, indeed, would be nowise burdensome, as it is but a little book, and is full of exquisite sense and pleasantry. It is worth anybody's while to read it—so racy, so genial and beautiful is its whole scope and substance. It reminds one of some of the lighter dialogues of Plato, and the author has evidently caught something both of the manner and spirit of that grand old worthy's writings. The style is so completely classical that it reads like a fine translation of some ancient composition. Yet the tone of the piece is modern, and there is a strict respect to the needs and conditions of modern life. It is the author's object to shadow forth his views of what should constitute the education of a gentleman in the times in which we live; and he aims to show that there is still room for chivalry—by which he understands, in the words of Sir Kenelm Digby, "the general spirit which disposes men to generous and heroic actions." As the age of chivalry was in a certain sense the natural development of youthful conditions of society, so, he thinks, youth is at all times to be regarded as the period of chivalrous enthusiasm and aspiration, and that it accordingly requires such a training as shall bring into display all its naturally magnanimous and noble qualities. Though the doctrine is not exactly new, it is here exhibited and illustrated in a somewhat novel shape; and we think that every cultivated reader who considers it must admire the facility and truthfulness and beauty of the exposition.

The plan of the work is excellent for its simplicity. The perfect naturalness of the conception is delightful; and there is in the transitions, and in the general working out, a light and easy grace of execution which is admirable, inasmuch as it is without visible pretence or aim at being artistic. If it be the highest effect of art to conceal the appearance of art, our author must be pronounced a very successful artist. The narrator represents himself to be a physician practising at Cambridge, where, however, he is but little perplexed with patients. One fine May morning he is suddenly aroused from the perusal of a "heavy treatise on Magnesia" by the entrance of Euphranor, a young college student, who comes to invite him to take a row on the river, or a walk in the fields, or, at any rate, to join in some kind of out-door expedition, whatever might seem pleasant—only it was insisted that he (the doctor) must go out to enjoy the brightness and beauty of the day. After a little talk and banter about the responsibility of neglecting the "possible patients" that might send for him in his absence, the doctor agrees to accompany his friend; and accordingly they proceed towards the river, having first called upon Lexilogus—a pale, spectacled "reading man," who kept quarters in a garret, and constrained him to go with them. On taking off his coat to begin to row, Euphranor dropped a book out of his pocket, which he presently requested Lexilogus to take care of; whereupon the doctor began to protest against the presence of books on that occasion, saying, "Now we shall have Lexilogus reading all the way," but then went on to ask whether it was Latin, Greek, Algebra, or German? being too bookish a man himself not to feel an interest in an unknown volume. In reply, Euphranor said the work was Digby's Godfridus, and (after the two had pulled along some little distance) he asked the doctor if he knew that author's writings. Being answered in the affirmative, and informed moreover that the doctor could remember Digby being at college, an inquiry was made as to what sort of man he was? whereto it was responded that he was "tall, big-boned, high-featured, and of a sad complexion, like some old Digby stepped down from the canvass." Thus talking of Digby and his books, and constantly interrupted by little accidents of the voyage, they had threaded their way through the barges congregated at Magdalen Bridge; through the locks, and so to Cross's boat-house, where they surrendered their boat, and footed it over the fields to Chesterton, at whose church they arrived just as its quiet chimes were preluding twelve o'clock.

Here Lexilogus parted from the others, and went to visit an elderly lady relative, who was residing in quiet lodgings thereabouts for the benefit of her nerves. Euphranor and the doctor proceeded on to the Three Tuns Inn, designing to play a game at billiards; but finding the tables occupied, they ordered some light ale, and went into the bowling-green, with its lilac bushes then in full bloom and odour; and there they found Lycion, a clever but apathetic aristocratic freshman, "sitting alone upon a bench, with a cigar in his mouth, and rolling the bowls about lazily with his foot." While Euphranor and his companion were "quaffing a glass of home-brewed," in one of the little arbours cut into the lilac bushes round the bowling-green, Lycion took up the volume of Digby, which Euphranor had laid upon the table, and glancing carelessly over the leaves, exclaimed with some disgust, "Chivalry—Well, I thought people had done talking about that sort of thing." This leads to a conversation about the book, and the merits of the subject treated of, in which, however, Lycion persists in seeing nothing but absurdity, and instances, as a case in point, the Eglinton tournament. "What a complete failure!" said he. "There was the Queen of Beauty on her throne, and the heralds and the knights in armour on their horses—they had been practising for months, I believe,—but unluckily, at the very moment of onset, the rain began, and the knights threw down their lances, and put up umbrellas." But Euphranor interposes that the Eglinton tournament was but an affair of old armour, and had nothing of true chivalry about it. And as it seemed likely that the two would go on disputing, each according to his preconceptions, without ever coming to an understanding, the doctor, a somewhat older man than the others, suggested that before they proceeded further it would not be amiss to refer to Digby's book, and see what, in his view of the matter, the term chivalry really signified. Euphranor accordingly took up the volume and read aloud a passage, some sentences whereof seem worthy of being quoted.

"Chivalry is only a name for that general spirit or state of mind, which disposes men to generous and heroic actions; and keeps them conversant with all that is beautiful and sublime in the intellectual and moral world. It will be found that, in the absence of conservative principles, this spirit more generally prevails in youth than in the later periods of men's life; and, as the heroic is always the earliest age in the history of nations, so youth, the first period of life, may be considered as the heroic or chivalrous age of each separate man; and there are few so unhappy as to have grown up without having experienced its influence, and having derived the advantage of being able to enrich their imagination, and to soothe their hours of sorrow, with its romantic recollections. The Anglo-Saxons distinguished the period between childhood and manhood by the term 'cnihtade,' knight-hood: a term which still continued to indicate the connexion between youth and chivalry, when knights were styled 'children,' as in the historic song beginning,—

'Childe Rowlande to the dark tower came,'— an excellent expression, no doubt;—for every boy and youth is, in his mind and sentiment, a knight, and essentially a son of chivalry. Nature is fine in him. Nothing but the circumstances of a singular and most degrading system of education can ever totally destroy the action of this general law; therefore, so long as there has been, or shall be, young men to grow up to maturity; and until all youthful life shall be dead, and its source withered up for ever; so long must there have been, and must there continue to be, the spirit of noble chivalry. To understand therefore this first, and as it were natural chivalry, we have only to observe the features of the youthful age."

Then, after some little interruption of discourse, the doctor, taking the book from Euphranor's hands, read further what is written on the qualities of youth.

"There is no difference, says the philosopher, between youthful age and youthful character; and what this is cannot be better evinced than in the very words of Aristotle. 'The young are ardent in desire, and what they do is from affection; they are tractable and delicate, they earnestly desire and are easily appeased; their wishes are intense, without comprehending much, as the thirst and hunger of the weary; they are passionate and hasty, and liable to be surprised by anger; for, being ambitious of honour, they cannot endure to be despised, but are indignant when they suffer injustice: they love honour, but still more victory; for youth desires superiority, and victory is superiority, and both of these they love more than riches; for as to these, of all things, they care for them least. They are not of corrupt manners, but are innocent, from not having beheld much wickedness; and they are credulous, from having been seldom deceived; and sanguine in hope, for, like persons who are drunk with wine, they are inflamed by nature, and from their having had but little experience of fortune. And they live by hope, for hope is of the future, and memory is of the past, and to youth the future is everything, the past but little; they hope all things, and remember nothing: and it is easy to deceive them, for the reasons which have been given; for they are willing to hope, and are full of courage, being passionate and hasty, of which tempers it is the nature of one not to fear, and of the other to inspire confidence; and thus are easily put to shame, for they have no resources to set side the precepts which they have learned: and they have lofty souls, for they have never been disgraced or brought low; and they are unacquainted with necessity; they prefer honour to advantage, virtue to expediency; for they live by affection rather than by reason, and reason is concerned with expediency, but affection with honour: and they are warm friends and hearty companions, more than other men, because they delight in fellowship, and judge of nothing by utility, and therefore not their friends; and they chiefly err in doing all things over much, for they keep no medium. They love much and they dislike much, and so in everything, and this arises from their idea that they know everything. And their faults consist more in insolence than in actual wrong; and they are full of mercy, because they regard all men as good, and more virtuous than they are; for they measure others by their own innocence; so that they suppose every man suffers wrongfully.'"

This being read, the doctor bantered Lycion on his latent possession of all chivalric qualities, and hints that he ought not to remain so systematically inert and indolent, when the possibilities of a grand career are palpably before him; but Lycion hardly takes it kindly, and with his cherished affection of indifference to everything, rather sulkily declines to take any part in the discussion; and as he happened to be waiting until somebody in the billiard-room, whom he "particularly detested," should have finished playing and disappeared, he called up to some of his friends who were present in the room, with a view to ascertain whether the coast was yet clear for him to enter. One of the players, appearing at the window, shook his head, saying, however, that "all would be right in a few minutes," and then retired. "On which," says our author, pleasantly, "Lycion had nothing to do for it, but light another cigar, and lying down on his back with his hat over his eyes, compose himself to inattention." The dialogue goes on between Euphranor and the doctor: but, as we cannot pretend to follow all the twists and turnings of an intricate discourse—nor indeed would that be quite befitting in a notice of so small a work, and one every way deserving of being read throughout—we shall expect the reader to be content if we present him with a few selected passages—not perhaps the best, but such only as appear most convenient for extraction. To begin with, let us take the following:—

“Do you remember,” said Euphranor, “what Lamb’s friend said of the Eton boys in their cricket-ground? “What a pity these fine lads should so soon turn into frivolous members of parliament!” . . . No doubt what is called entering the world is a degradation from chivalrous youth; but I suppose Digby would admit the best youth is only a preparation for a better manhood.”

“I said, ‘Perhaps so.’

“And yet,” said he, “in the passage you have read you see he compares the youth of man to the heroic age of a nation.”

“Which, however, may not be its best age,” answered I, “though a very necessary and a very beautiful one. Lycion and I may not agree that Argonautic expeditions, Trojan or Holy Wars, mark the best epochs of a nation, whatever your heroic gentlemen may think.”

“Well, but if what Digby says be true, that it is this spirit which keeps men and nations most conversant with what is beautiful and sublime in the moral and intellectual world!—And here is Bacon declaring that youth excels in the moral, and age in the politic only—poor ignoble politic.”

“I asked, smiling, ‘if by age Bacon might mean old age, as much a descent from perfect manhood on one side, as youth was an ascent to it on the other; or if “politic” was used in that better sense by which Jeremy Bentham secretly proves the expediency of virtue?’

“Euphranor, however, rejected all such base notions of virtue, and would have nothing whatever to do with Jeremy Bentham. ‘And what mighty virtues Aristotle attributes to youth!’ said he.

“And mighty faults too, for that matter,” I returned; “does he not say it is rash, ambitious, overbearing, insolent even? faults which manhood, with its experience, may correct, perhaps.”

“Well, then,” said Euphranor, “Lycion may say, the sooner these Eton boys get into the world and learn that experience, the better.”

“Yes,” said I, “if their stomachs were strong enough to digest it. And even then they might lose more than they gained, for you see how much of this youthful virtue Aristotle draws from inexperience of the world, as he says it is innocent from not having been disappointed, trustful from not having been deceived, lofty of soul and despising riches from never having been brought low; and so forth. Your friend Plato, if I remember, will not allow even those who are destined to be judges in his republic to make an acquaintance with crime till near middle life, for fear they should harden into a distrust of human nature; will he?”

“Euphranor nodded, and I said that on the same principle he and Lamb’s friend might think there was danger of the Eton boys hardening into an ignoble policy by too early acquaintance with St. Stephen’s, before they were established in the good affections, good fellowship, and generous energy, of which Aristotle’s catalogue was so much made up.”

* * * * *

“According to you, the virtue of youth consists in its good affections,” said Euphranor.

“Nay,” I replied, “I am only following Aristotle’s text, whose catalogue is made up of these affections, you see; “living by affection rather than by reason,” he twice says, I think.”

“Ah!” said Euphranor, “and Bacon somewhere observes, I remember, that youth doth profit in the affections, and age in the reason, which may help one to the meaning of that other passage of his that puzzled me before, about the moral and politic.”

“He, too,” said I, “would perhaps agree with Lamb’s friend and Digby, that it would be well to give those affections good time to develop in; that at all events it would be dangerous to forsake them until the reason was far advanced, which this same Aristotle says, I think, does not reach its maturity till about forty years of age, though I say it who should not, having just passed that notable era.”

In connexion with the foregoing it may not be inappropriate to cite a passage on the culture of animal spirits, animal courage, and whatever else may be included in a good bodily condition.

“Too much brute strength, Euphranor would have it, (on Plato’s authority again, I believe, for Plato was his great oracle,) brutalized the mind. To which I could only answer, I was not, as far as I knew, for too much of anything. However, he would admit that Telamon, and Idas, and Enides, and those other youthful knights we had read of, wanted a good share of bodily strength to work that very heavy ship, the Argo; as did also King Arthur’s knights for their fights with giants and dragons; and even those of our own time, ‘the modern gentlemen,’ if they were to lead hosts of blacksmiths, for instance, or any other more vigorous trade than a tailor’s, to conquest. And I asked him whether, apart from any influence such exercises, or the animal condition they helped to bring about, had upon the soul, Digby did not consider strength of body, and the accomplishments of riding, swimming, fighting with many weapons, and perhaps cricketing, as very necessary accomplishments for his young gentleman of England?”

“Euphranor said, ‘No doubt;’ and then recurring to what I had before spoken of, remembered some observation of Sir Walter Scott, (another hero of his,) that strong men are usually good-humoured, Scott himself, as Euphranor remarked, being so good an instance of it. And I added Bacon’s testimony as to anger being chiefly observable in weakness, old age, childhood, and sickness. ‘So that, on the whole,’ said I, tapping on the top of Lycion’s hat, ‘what with the keeping out of knavery till one knows how to join in it properly, and avoiding bad air in more senses than one, and cultivating good affections, and good health, and perhaps, (Euphranor says,) good-humour, and perhaps, also, some other good things we cannot now think of, Lamb's friend might have been right after all in lamenting the departure of the Eton lads from the fields of their youth for a premature manhood in St. Stephen's; though as to deciding which is fairest, a good youth or a good manhood, Euphranor, that may be like deciding which is handsomest, the blossom or the flower.' * * *

"The other day,' said Euphranor, 'Skythroops was in my rooms, and opened Digby's book at the very passage we have been reading—he read it—with what relish you may imagine.'

"What did he say of it?"

"Oh, you can fancy—that youth, so far from drawing clouds of glory from God, who is its home," draws clouds of sulphur from another quarter. He ran over Aristotle's inventory, as you call it; the old talk, he said, of honour, glory, and so on,—Pagan virtues, very well for a Pagan to record and a Papist to quote; but he wondered I could keep such a book in my rooms.'

"Well,' said I, 'dead wood doubtless makes best posts, and that is what Skythroops wants. The living tree would sprout out in a manner incomprehensible to such naturalists. He would nip the flower of youth as if it were flour of brimstone:—then Lycion would stifle it in St. Stephen's; and how many force it to blow before its time, and so ruin it!'

"In the present rage for intellect,' said Euphranor.

"Yes,' I replied, 'intellect, not for its own sake only, but for advancement in the peaceful professions, now so thronged since war has been quiet. Jack and Tom, you know, must not only shine at the literary tea-table, they must get fellowships, livings, silk-gowns at the bar—they cannot be crammed too fast, and to this end the order of Nature is reversed, to get early at faculties which come last in the order of growth; the understanding set to work almost before it is born, the affections neglected or misdirected, the whole body, without whose soundness the soul it encloses cannot, I say, be sound, neglected in its hour of growth, or torn to pieces by premature energies within. But Nature has her revenge. We think the world is growing wiser; it may be in the end, but, as some one said, we are now rearing a generation of fools.'"

With all this Euphranor in the main agrees, but, says, he does not like to consider the soul as being so much subjected to the "carcass," and remarks, after a little intermediate talk, that we have many "instances of the greatest minds dwelling in the craziest and puniest bodies." To this the doctor makes reply:—

"Great parts of mind, as great wit in Pope, for instance.'

"Mens curva in corpore curvo,' quoted Euphranor.

'No, wit itself is said to be a kind of dishonesty of thought, so let it e'en be a disease of the body, if you like. But look at Pascal now.'

"Well,' said I, 'great mathematical and reasoning faculty. But these do not make up a MAN. A bon-mot, a poem, a problem, are no more specimens of the whole man, than that celebrated brick was of the whole house. What is your author in his affections and temper, as well as his understanding? What as relative, friend, neighbour, and so forth? the "whole, sound, round-about" man, as Locke says.'

"But Pascal was a notoriously religious and good man,' argued Euphranor.

"Notoriously ascetic,' said I; "that is to say, of a diseased religion. He would not let his family be too much about him lest their mutual love should deprive God of his due. I should instance Pascal's religion as looking much like the refraction from a sickly body.'

"Euphranor was again silent a little, and said smiling, 'Like some objects that will force themselves on one's eye in a landscape for ever so far, this clay cottage will not be got out of sight. The poets are fond of it. It now occurs to me in that other relation with its tenant which we were speaking of, not where it affects, but is affected by its lodger's incessant strugglings and batterings within. You remember Dryden's old lines about that soul—

"That o'er-inform'd its tenement of clay, Fretting the puny body to decay."

"Well,' said Euphranor, 'and the sooner the better, so she flies back to her proper element again.'

"A great escape, doubtless,' I said; 'but yet it has pleased God to station her here on probation, to do some work for herself and others. And being certain of eternity—yes, and (as a good soul) of a happy eternity, she should be well content to be imprisoned for such a mere point of time as our three-score years and ten in this clumsy lantern of a body, the only means by which her rays can be so condensed as to lighten her more benighted mortal fellow-spirits.'

"Well, perhaps so,' said he.

"And then, if the body does not die at once, but lingers in long pain,' said I, 'this divine soul, though quite independent of the body she lodges in, and unaffected by its pains, does (out of a divine pity) sympathise greatly with its distresses, and loses much of her precious time in condolence, and contriving the means of alleviation: considering the merits of different doctors and medicines. Even in indigestions, which are said to be the plagues of thinking men, how much of her precious self she wastes daily, mourning over some little bit of cheese that will stick in the stomach of the most universal philanthropist!'

"Euphranor laughed, and asked, 'What could be done for her?' and I answered, 'that I supposed, according to that old prescription (the curse of physicians) that "prevention is better than cure," the best way was to build up for her, in the proper season, a tenement strong enough to resist the elements without, and her own batterings within; so that when she is called to her great vocations, she may go about them, undisturbed by creaking doors and windows, falling timbers, and failing foundations, and by all the repairs they incessantly call for.—Besides,' I added, 'if for no particular use, surely one should in decency provide a handsome, spacious, and airy mansion for so divine a tenant.'

How this is to be effected, it is one of the purposes of the book to indicate. We cannot here reveal the details of the author's plan. The following, however, on the training due to a modern gentleman during the earliest stage of his existence, may be worth pondering by intelligent heads of families.

"After the due dandling and rocking of first infancy, give him a clear stage to roll in; he will find his own legs when they are strong enough to bear him. Then let him romp as much as he likes, and roar too,—a great part of children's fun, and of great service to the lungs. And that (besides the fresh air) is so great an advantage in sending children to play out of doors; they don't disturb the serious and nervous elders of the house, who ruin the health and spirits of thousands, by, "Be quiet, child—don't make such a noise, child," et cætera."

"Ah, I remember,' said Euphranor, 'how you used to play at hide-and-seek with us in the shrubbery, rather exciting us to rebellion when my aunt ran out to warn us, or reduce us to order.'

"Or for fear your dresses should be dirtied,' rejoined I, 'for that is one of the fetters laid upon children's wholesome growth. They must early learn to look respectable; as also shouting is vulgar, you know. Then what screaming from the window if a little dew lay on the grass, or a summer cloud overcame the sky.'

"I suppose you would have shoes with holes in them, on purpose to let in water, as Locke does,' said Euphranor, laughing.

"I wouldn't keep a child from exercise in the dirt, because he has no whole shoes at home, at all events,' answered I.

"He catches cold.'

"I dose him instantly and effectually.'

"But he dies.'

"Then, as a sensible woman said, "he is provided for." Your own Plato, I think, says it is best the sickly and delicate should die off early at once.'

"Rather a pagan doctrine, if he does,' replied Euphranor. 'However, we will suppose Sir Lancelot survives, what else?'

"Where did we leave him?' said I, 'O yes, I remember, in the mud; where, by-the-bye, (much better than if shut up in a school-room or parlour,) he makes acquaintance with external nature, sun, moon, stars, trees, flowers, stones, so wholesome in themselves, and the rudiments of so many ologies for hereafter.'

"Not forgetting animals,' said Euphranor.

"By no means,' said I, 'and especially the horse and the dog, whose virtues we said he would do well to share.'

"Horses and dogs, in the women's apartments!' said Euphranor, laughing.

"O yes,' I said, 'his acquaintance with the dog begins in the cradle; and the horse, who, as we said, has given his very name to the spirit of youth, devotion and courage we began talking about,—Sir Lancelot cannot too soon make his acquaintance, to pat him, to feed him, to be set upon his back, either in the stable, or during exercise up and down the avenue.'

"And it is wonderful,' Euphranor observed, 'what forbearance the nobler animals show for children; how great dogs suffer themselves to be pulled about for hours by them; and horses will carry boys with a kind of proud docility, who would kick and plunge under a grown-up rider. Perhaps, they like children's soft voices and light weights; for which very reason I have heard, they are more manageable by women.'

"Yes,' said I; 'and have they not also a sense of humour that is amused at being bestrid by urchins? ay, and real generosity too, that will not take advantage of weakness?'

"After a little pause, Euphranor said, 'When you lay it down that children are scarcely to be compelled against the grain for their first seven years, I suppose you would make some reservation as to moral restraint—the repression of passion, for instance.'

"Not only that,' answered I; 'he must also learn to submit himself to order—to some daily in-door restraint—silence—and task-work, all when he would be out-of-doors romping; only let there be but a little of such compulsion day by day.'

"And if he be refractory, even against this gentle discipline?'

"Then, if the withdrawal of confidence and love, and appealing to his faculty of shame and remorse are not enough, a taste of the rod, the compendious symbol of might and right. Only, I am quite sure, as a general rule, it is better to lean to the extreme of indulgence than of severity; you at least get at truth, if ugly truth, by letting a child display his character without fear; and faults that determine outwardly, are far more likely to evaporate than when repressed to rankle within. Anyhow, the ugliest truth is better than the handsomest falsehood.'

"To this Euphranor willingly assented, and after a time said, 'Well, we have now got Sir Lancelot pretty fairly through his first septenniad.'

"And what sort of chap do you find him?'

said I.

"Nay, he is your child,' answered Euphranor.

"The very reason,' said I, 'why I should be glad of a neighbour's candid opinion about him. However, I am not his father, but only his doctor, and moreover, I will not say what he is, but only that I shall be content if he be a jolly little fellow, with rosy cheeks and a clear eye, with just a little mischief in it at times; passionate, perhaps, and (even with his sisters) apt to try right by might; but generous, easily pacified, easily repentant, and ready to confess his faults; rather rebellious against woman's domination, and against all the wraps and cruels they force upon him; but fond of mother, and of good old nurse; glad to begin and end each day with a prayer and a little hymn at their knees. Decidedly fonder of play than of books; rather too fond, it is supposed, of the stable, and of Will and Tom there; but submitting, after a little contest, to learn a little, day by day, from books which lead his mind towards hope, affection, generosity, and piety.

“So much for Sir Lancelot’s first septenniad,” said Euphranor. “And now for his second.”

From the “second,” which is an admirable outline of a judicious course of training, we can quote only the conclusion:—

“I doubt I shall be content with him,” said I, “if (at sixteen say) he shows me outwardly, as before, a glowing cheek, an open brow, copious locks, a clear eye, and looks me full in face withal; his body a little uncouth and angular, perhaps, as compared to his earlier self, because now striking out into manly proportion, not yet filled up; flesh giving way to fibre and muscle, the blood running warm and quick through his veins, and easily discovering itself in his cheeks and forehead, at the mention of what is noble or shameful; his voice, “sweet and tuneable,” as Margaret of Newcastle notices of her brothers,—she does not mean, she says, (nor do I,) an emasculate treble, but no “husking or wharling in the throat,”—that is her word—a clear, open, bell-like voice, telling of a roomy chest, and in some measure, I think, of a candid soul. However that may be,” continued I, seeing Euphranor shake his head at me with a smile, “candid of soul I hope he is; for I have always sought his confidence, and never used it against himself; never arraigned him severely for the smaller outbreaks of youthful spirit; never exacted sympathy where it was not in the nature of youth to sympathise. He is still passionate, perhaps, as in his first septenniad, but easily reconciled; subdued easily by affection and the appeal to old and kindly remembrance, but stubborn against force; generous, forgiving: still liking to ride rather than to read, and perhaps to settle a difference by the fist than by the tongue; but submitting to those who do not task him above Nature’s due: apt to sleep under the sermon, but not ceasing to repeat, morning and evening, the prayers he learned at his mother’s knee: ambitious of honour, perhaps, but of honour in action rather than in talk; somewhat awkwardly disposed to dancing, and the accomplishments of the drawing-room, which even now he shirks in order to go earth-stopping with Tom and Jack, who used to set him on Topsail’s back in days gone by. In short, I shall be content to find him with all the faults of a vigorous constitution of soul and body, which time and good counsel may direct into a channel of action that will find room for all, and turn all to good. One must begin life with all the strength of life, subject to all danger of its abuse: strength itself, even of evil, is a kind of virtue; whereas weakness is the one radical and incurable evil, growing worse instead of better with every year of life.”

“And this is your education,” said Euphranor, “for all boys indiscriminately, without regard to any particular genius they may show?”

“But without injury to it, I hope,” said I; “for instance, should it lie towards any of those ologies which we thought Sir Lancelot’s free intercourse with Nature especially opened to him, or even toward looking into Plato and Digby for qualities he already unconsciously possesses. But,” I continued, seeing no sign of self-consciousness in Euphranor’s own earnest face, “if Sir Lancelot not only has a genius, (as I suppose all men have some,) but is a genius—big with epic, lyrical, or parliamentary inspiration,—I do not meddle with him—he will take his own course in spite of me. What I have to turn out is, not a genius, but a young gentleman, qualified at least for the common professions, or trades, if you like it. Or, if he have means and inclination to live independently on his estate, may, in spite of his genius, turn into a very good husband, father, neighbour, and magistrate.”

For the rest of what is excellent in this little work we must refer to the book itself. The whole of it is beautiful, and as wise and rational as it is pleasing. We recommend all the fathers, and mothers, and teachers in the kingdom to read it for themselves. The author is a man of fine talents and scholarly attainments; and we think we have already shown that he has not written a book without having something to put into it. And then the whole is so admirably plain, and fascinating from its perfect freedom from pretence—from the author’s charming unconsciousness of any great scheme, which an inferior writer would have been sure to affect—that we are carried along in a state of the most agreeable sympathy and friendliness with our instructor, yearn even to know him, and speak with him face to face, as a man talketh with his friend, and more than anything regret that it has not pleased him to make his book a trifle larger—which he might very well have done, without detriment to its interest and satisfactoriness. And yet it is so nearly perfect as it stands, that one can hardly wish it otherwise; and so we will even say, in words which we adapt from Southey:—

“Go, little book, and fare thee as thou canst—
Being cast upon the waters, go thy ways;
And if, as we believe, thy vein be good,
The world will find thee after many days.”

If we might suggest anything to the writer, it would be that he should, at his convenience, give us a Dialogue on “Manhood.”

I confess I love littleness almost in all things. A little convenient estate, a little cheerful house, a little company, and a very little feast; and, if I were ever to fall in love again, (which is a great passion, and therefore I hope I have done with it,) it would be, I think, with prettiness, rather than with majestic beauty.—Cowley.

INCIDENTS IN THE WAR OF MEXICAN INDEPENDENCE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE "REVUE DES DEUX MONDES."

PART I.

THE SOLDIER CUREÑO.

THE route from Guadalajara to Tessic traverses the Sierra-Madre. There yet remain in this chain of mountains, with their barren sides rising in sharp peaks, and descending in rugged precipices, indelible marks of the War of Independence. I was impatient to visit this interesting part of Mexico, and Captain Don Ruperto, on his part, eagerly desired to return to those plains of the Sierra which reminded him of many adventurous days and nights of his youth; it was not, however, until we arrived at the plain of Santa-Isabel, two days after leaving the village of Ahuacatlan, that we at length perceived the blue summits of the Cordillera. From that moment we hastened our steps by mutual consent, and a few hours' riding across the tall grass brought us in front of a bamboo hut, which Captain Ruperto had previously indicated as our halting-place.

"Halloo! Cureño," cried the Captain, reining in his horse before the hut; "halloo! are you dead or alive?"

"Who calls?" replied a broken and feeble voice from the interior of the cabin.

"The Captain Castaños, con mil diablos!" returned the warrior, "who fired the cannon of which your back was the supporter."

A frightful figure appeared on the threshold of the hut; it was that of an old man terribly distorted, whose spine seemed dislocated and bent. The poor creature was unable to walk, he could only crawl. His features, although contracted by old age and suffering, still retained an expression of nobleness and pride which struck me. On his forehead, marked by deep wrinkles and projecting veins, his long white hair fell in disorder. His arms were encircled with veins as thick as the branches of an ivy which has grown old while clinging to a fine oak. At the sight of this aged man, with his wrinkled face half concealed by his abundant hair, one might have compared him to a decrepit lion maimed in the flower of his age and strength by the ball of the hunter.

"Well, my good Cureño," exclaimed the Captain, "I am happy to find one of the ruins of ancient times still alive."

"Our ranks are getting thinner, it is true," replied the old man; "in a few years they will seek in vain for the first soldiers of the Independence."

"And Guanajuatense, is she not here?" asked Castaños.

"I have been left alone for a year past. She sleeps yonder."

He pointed to a tamarind-tree situated at a few steps from the hut.

"May God rest her soul!" said the Captain; "but you must acknowledge, my good fellow, that your services have been ill recompensed."

"What do I need beyond a little corner of ground to live and be buried in?" calmly replied the old man. "Was it the hope of a recompense that made us of old willing to exhaust our strength? Posterity will remember the name of Cureño, and that is sufficient."

The question of Don Ruperto, and the reply of the old soldier, made me believe that I beheld one of those men whom, after having sacrificed them, a fatal destiny had consigned to oblivion. But what unknown hero did I then behold? That I knew not. We dismounted near the hut, into which we entered. There I listened, without understanding a syllable, to a conversation which turned exclusively on the events of the war against the Spaniards. Unfortunately I did not possess the key of the facts which the two speakers were recalling. At the end of about half an hour, as we had some distance to go in order to reach the venta, which was situated at the foot of the Sierra-Madre, we prepared to continue our journey.

"You have a capital charger there," said our host to me, approaching my horse as I was putting my foot in the stirrup.

At the sight of that distorted being, creeping, thus to speak, up to him, the animal took fright, and attempted to rear; but at that moment the arm of Cureño was extended towards him, and the horse remained immovable—panting from terror.

"What is the matter?" said I.

"It is nothing," replied the old man in his feeble voice; "I am holding your horse under you."

I leant forward on my saddle, and saw, with amazement, that one of the legs of the horse seemed as if riveted to the earth by a chain of iron.

"Shall I loose my hold?" said the old man, laughing.

"If it is your good pleasure," replied I, to this Milo of Crotona; "for I see my horse is not the stronger of the two."

Scarcely was he disengaged from this formidable restraint, when the terrified animal sprang aside, and I had the greatest difficulty in bringing him back again to the hut.

"Alas!" said the old man, sighing, "since a certain blow from a cannon, which this Don Ruperto fired, I stoop more and more every day."

"What were you, then, in your youth, Signor Cureño?" asked I.

"Castaños will tell you," replied the old soldier, of whom we took leave as soon as the captain had promised to spend a whole day with him in the hut on his return.

After two hours' riding we reached the venta, a white house surrounded by colonnades, and roofed with red tiles like all the ventas of Mexico, and having done ample justice to a repast ordered by Don Ruperto, we strolled into the grounds before the hotel. We were on the point of leaving an avenue overgrown with moss, when the captain suddenly stopped, and pointed to the ground. At our feet I perceived, half embedded in the soil, a cannon which the insurgents had dragged from the borders of the Pacific Ocean to this most remote boundary of the state of Jalisco. The soldier seated himself on the cannon, and invited me to place myself beside him. The deep blue sky was bespangled with innumerable stars; the air was mild; around the fires before the venta were seated the muleteers singing their simple tunes; the ringing of the little bells of the mules reached us, accompanied by the soft sounds of the guitar; the watch-dogs answered by their plaintive barking to the indistinct and distant sounds, which were wafted by the evening breeze. In leading me to this retired spot, the captain said he had deemed the time and place suitable for continuing the relation of his military adventures. I hastened to express my concurrence with this opinion, and Don Ruperto, thus encouraged, commenced a long narration, to which I listened attentively, seated on the rusted cannon, round which large tufts of wild wormwood interlaced their stems, and diffused their powerful odours.

After a series of skirmishes, (commenced the captain,) we halted at a place called Las Animas. A sad spectacle was presented by our troops on that day. Panting from thirst and fatigue, we lay on a soil strewn with the carcasses of our horses and mules of burden. A gloomy silence overspread the camp, interrupted from time to time by the agonizing cries of the wounded, who, tortured by thirst, wildly craved a drop of water to refresh their parched mouths. A few soldiers moved like spectres amongst these bodies, of whom some were apparently dying, others were already dead. The sentinels had scarcely strength to hold their muskets during the tumult around the camp. I, myself, was almost worn out, and to disguise my thirst, had pressed the hilt of my sabre to my lips. Not far from me, the woman to whom Albino Cauté had entrusted the care of his son, and whom I had taken into my service in compliance with the dying requests of my former companion, was repeating her rosary in tears, and imploring all the saints in Paradise to send us a cloud charged with rain. The saints, unfortunately, were not in the humour to listen to us that evening, for the sun set gloriously in a sky of undisturbed serenity. As for me, I prayed God that some marauders of my troop, who had left the camp on the discovery of some concealed springs, might succeed in their expedition, and, above all, not forget their captain. God was more gracious than the saints invoked by the poor woman who was praying at my side; he heard me favourably, for soon I discovered one of our marauders returning to the camp with rapid strides. It was the man you have seen, the companion of Guanajuatécia. At that time he had not changed the name of Valdivia for that of Cureño, nor was he so frightfully maimed as you have seen him; the trunk of a pine was not straighter nor more robust than his form. You, yourself, have had a proof of his herculean strength; I need not say more about it. I shall content myself with telling you that his intelligence and courage equalled his physical powers. On every occasion, even the most critical, Valdivia knew how to act.

"Signor Capitano," said he, advancing mysteriously towards me, enveloped in the cloak of a Spanish dragoon, which he had picked up on the field of battle, "I have brought you a leathern bottle containing a few drops of water for yourself, the child, and his nurse, but I should wish no one to see us."

"Some water!" cried I, too much delighted to heed Valdivia's prudent advice.

"Hush!" resumed he; "if you attend to me, you will not drink until night, and when you have quenched your thirst, I will tell you where there is water in abundance, and make a proposition you will like."

I eagerly extended my hand to seize the bottle. "Give it to me, for God's sake!" exclaimed I, "my thirst is consuming me, and can I wait till night?"

"In ten minutes it will be dark. On reflection, I will keep the water, for I do not wish the furious soldiers to attempt to kill you, in order to obtain it. In the mean time, get your horse saddled, and then join me under that 'mesquite,' where mine is all ready. We shall be obliged to mount directly. There remain here about a hundred horsemen; give them orders to wait for us yonder in the plain. We will tell the sentinels we are going in search of water, and they will let us pass without waking the general."

Valdivia walked away, and in spite of my entreaties, took with him the bottle of water. I hastened to obey his injunctions, and at nightfall, our horsemen, quite prepared for departure, awaited us in the place appointed. I took my horse by the bridle, led away the woman and child, and rejoined Valdivia. Instead of a few drops of water, as he had promised, he presented me with a bottleful of that precious liquid. So great was my thirst, that I found considerable difficulty in preventing myself from draining the contents of the bottle; however, I left a sufficient quantity for the woman and little Albino, and when the bottle was empty—"Let us hear," said I to Valdivia, "what you have to propose."

"To go," returned he, "with your hundred horsemen and take possession of a hacienda, two leagues from here, where there is water in abundance, and which is now occupied by a Spanish detachment.

"We will go," said I, "but if it is so, why should you not inform the general, and ask for a thousand men?"

"Why?" returned Valdivia, "because the general is no longer master of his troops, and any order he might give at this moment would but hasten the explosion of a conspiracy for delivering the army to the Spanish. Yes, Signor Capitano, if we do not instantly take possession of the hacienda of San Eustaquio, into which I have been able to creep alone and fill this bottle, to-morrow General Rayou will not have a soldier;—there is a traitor among us, and this traitor is no other than General Ponce."

As Valdivia finished speaking, a great tumult was heard at one extremity of the camp. It soon increased. Torches flared on all sides, illuminating groups of soldiers whose cries reached us. By the gleam of the torches we perceived General Rayou leaving his tent and advancing alone, bareheaded, towards the most infuriated; but his voice, generally so much respected, seemed unrecognised.

"I was mistaken by a day," said Valdivia, "however, the General will probably quiet the malcontents until sunrise. Let us be off, there's no time to lose, this night we must be back and able to announce to the General that the troops shall be supplied with water to-morrow."

The tumult continued, although it was less clamorous, and the voice of the General, which we were able to hear, prevailed by degrees over that of the mutineers. I mounted my horse, and advised Valdivia to do the same.

"I must first," said he, "bring you one of the enemy's sentinels with whom I have taken care to provide myself."

Without waiting to explain these enigmatical words, Valdivia departed, but soon I saw him returning with a black moving mass under his arm. When he approached, I discovered that this mass was a man dressed in the costume of a Spanish lancer. Valdivia set the man down on the ground, loosened his cords, and made him mount behind him. My robust companion had found that the shortest method of reaching the well of the hacienda was, to bind the sentinel placed near the cistern, and take him with us as a necessary guide in our nocturnal excursion. How had he effected this hardy enterprise? how had he taken from his post the Spanish lancer and bound him on his horse? Valdivia had no need to tell me; his nervous arms gave me more information on that subject than his words. The camp had again become calm, during the short absence of Valdivia; it only remained for us bravely to continue the undertaking so happily commenced. We then went without delay to rejoin the horsemen who awaited us in the plain, and at the head of this small troop, we rode towards the hacienda, spurring to the utmost our weary horses. During the journey, we interrogated the prisoner concerning the situation and strength of the Spanish garrison which occupied the hacienda of San-Eustaquio. This garrison was composed, said the lancer, of about 500 men, under the orders of Commandant Larrainzar, a proud, brutal man, detested by his soldiers. We obtained still further information of the position of the troops and the places least defended. It was not, however, without great difficulty that we were able, with our attenuated horses, and on terrible roads, to clear the two or three leagues which separated the hacienda from our camp. You will readily understand why the route was so difficult, when I explain our situation to you. Not far from the town of Zacatecas, which General Rayou sought to obtain, although he knew it to be occupied by the enemy, the Sierra-Madre is divided into two branches. The first, that on which we are now stationed, runs from north to south, parallel with the shores of the Pacific; the other runs from north to east, following the curve of the Gulf of Mexico. On one of the most elevated points of this last ramification was situated the hacienda of which we wished to possess ourselves. It occupied the extremity of one of the largest plains of the Cordillera.

!PART II.

THE VOLADERO.

HAVING arrived at the hacienda unperceived, thanks to the obscurity of a moonless night, we came to a halt under some large trees, at some distance from the building, and I rode forward from my troop in order to reconnoitre the place. The hacienda, so far as I could see in gliding across the trees, formed a huge massive parallelogram, strengthened by enormous buttresses of hewn stone. The rear was protected by an unfathomable abyss. Along this chasm, the walls of the hacienda almost formed the continuation of another perpendicular, one chiselled by nature herself in the rocks, to the bottom of which the eye could not penetrate, for the mists which incessantly boiled up from below did not allow it to measure their awful depth. This place was known in the country by the name of "the Voladero."

I had explored all sides of the building except this, when I know not what scruple of military honour incited me to continue my ride along the ravine which protected the rear of the hacienda. Between the walls and the precipice, there was a narrow pathway about six feet wide; by day, the passage would not have been dangerous, but by night it was a perilous enterprise. The walls of the farm took an extensive sweep, the path crept around their entire basement, and to follow it to the end in the darkness, only two paces from the edge of a perpendicular chasm, was no very easy task even for as practised a horseman as myself. Nevertheless, I did not hesitate, but boldly urged my horse between the walls of the farm-house and the abyss of the Voladero. I had got over half the distance without accident, when all of a sudden my horse neighed aloud. This neigh made me shudder. I had reached a pass where the ground was but just wide enough for the four legs of a horse, and it was impossible to retrace my steps.

"Halloo!" I exclaimed aloud, at the risk of betraying myself,—which was even less dangerous than encountering a horseman in front of me on such a road. "There is a Christian passing along the ravine; keep back."

It was too late; at that moment, a man on horseback passed round one of the buttresses, which here and there obstructed this accursed pathway. He advanced towards me. I trembled in my saddle; my forehead was bathed in a cold sweat.

"For the love of God! can you not return?" I exclaimed, terrified at the fearful situation in which we were both placed.

"Impossible!" replied the horseman, in a hollow voice.

I recommended my soul to God. To turn our horses round for want of room, to back them along the path which we had traversed, or even to dismount from them,—these were three impossibilities which placed us both in presence of a certain doom; between two horsemen so placed upon this fearful path, had they been father and son, one of them must inevitably have become the prey of the abyss. But a few seconds had passed, and we were already face to face,—the unknown horseman and myself; our horses were head to head, and their nostrils, dilated with terror, mingled together their fiery breathing. Both of us halted in a dead silence; above was the smooth and lofty wall of the hacienda; on the other side, but three feet distant from the wall, opened the horrible gulf. Was it an enemy I had before my eyes? The love of my country, which boiled at that period in my young bosom, led me to hope it was.

"Are you for Mexico and the Insurgents?" I exclaimed in a moment of excitement, ready to spring upon the unknown horseman if he answered me in the negative.

"Mexico e Insurgente—that is my watchword," replied the cavalier; "I am the Colonel Garduño."

"And I am the Captain Castaños!"

Our acquaintance was of long standing, and, but for our mutual agitation, we should have had no need to exchange our names. The Colonel had left us two days since at the head of a detachment, which we supposed to be either prisoners or cut off, for he had not been seen to return to the camp.

"Well! Colonel," I exclaimed, "I am sorry you are not a Spaniard,—for you perceive that one of us must yield the pathway to the other."

Our horses had the bridle on their necks, and I put my hand in the holsters of my saddle to draw out my pistols.

"I see it so plainly," replied the Colonel with alarming coolness, "that I should already have blown out the brains of your horse, but for the fear lest mine, in a moment of terror, should precipitate me with yourself to the bottom of the abyss."

I remarked, in fact, that the Colonel already held his pistols in his hand. We both maintained the most profound silence. Our horses felt the danger like ourselves, and remained as immovable as if their feet were nailed to the ground. My excitement had entirely subsided. "What are we going to do?" I demanded of the Colonel.

"Draw lots which of the two shall leap into the ravine."

It was in truth the sole means of resolving the difficulty. "There are nevertheless some precautions to take," said the Colonel. "He who shall be condemned by lot shall retire backwards. It will be but a feeble chance of escape for him, I admit; but in short, it is a chance, and especially one in favour of the winner."

"You cling not to life then?" I cried out, terrified at the sang-froid with which this proposition was put to me.

"I cling to life more than yourself," sharply replied the Colonel, "for I have a mortal outrage to avenge. But the time is slipping away: are you ready to proceed to draw the last lottery, at which one of us will ever assist?"

How were we to proceed to this drawing by lot? by means of the wet finger, like infants, or by head and tail like the schoolboys? Both ways were impracticable. Our hands imprudently stretched out above the heads of our frightened horses, might cause them to give a fatal start. Should we toss up a piece of coin. The night was too dark to enable us to distinguish which side fell upwards. The Colonel beheld him of an expedient, of which I never should have dreamed.

"Listen to me, Captain," said the Colonel, to whom I had communicated my perplexities, "I have another way. The terror which our horses feel makes them draw every moment a burning breath. The first of us two whose horse shall neigh!"

"Wins!" I hastily exclaimed.

"Not so,—shall be the loser. I know that you are a countryman, and such as you can do whatever you please with your horse. As to myself, who but last year wore the gown of a theological student, I fear your equestrian prowess. You may be able to make your horse neigh,—to hinder him from doing so is a very different matter."

We waited in deep and anxious silence until the voice of one of our horses should break forth. This silence lasted for a minute,—for an age! It was my horse who neighed the first. The Colonel gave no external manifestation of his joy, but no doubt he thanked God to the very bottom of his soul.

"You will allow me a minute to make my peace with Heaven?" I said to the Colonel, with failing voice.

"Will five minutes be sufficient?"

"They will," I replied. The Colonel drew out his watch. I addressed towards the heavens, brilliant with stars, which I thought I was looking up to for the last time, an intense and a burning prayer.

"It is time," said the Colonel.

I answered nothing, and with infirm hand gathered up the bridle of my horse, which I drew within my fingers, which were agitated by a nervous tremour.

"Yet one moment more," I said to the Colonel, "for I have need of all my coolness to carry into execution the fearful manœuvre which I am about to commence."

"Granted," replied Garduño.

My education, as I have told you, had been in the country. My childhood and part of my earliest youth, had almost been passed on horseback. I may say without flattering myself, that if there was any one in the world capable of executing this equestrian feat, it was myself. I rallied myself with an almost supernatural effort, and succeeded in recovering my entire self-possession in the very face of death. Take it at the worst,—I had already braved it too often to be any longer alarmed at it. From that instant, I dared to hope afresh.

As soon as my horse felt, for the first time since my rencontre with the Colonel, the bit compressing his mouth, I perceived that he trembled beneath me. I strengthened myself firmly on my stirrups, to make the terrified animal understand that his master no longer trembled. I held him up with the bridle and the hams, as every good horseman does in a dangerous passage, and, with the bridle, the body and the spur together, succeeded in backing him a few paces. His head was already at a greater distance from that of the horse of the Colonel, who encouraged me all he could with his voice. This done, I let the poor trembling brute, who obeyed me in spite of his terror, repose himself for a few moments,—and then recommenced the same manœuvre. All on a sudden I felt his hind legs give way under me. A horrible shudder ran through my whole frame; I closed my eyes as if about to roll to the bottom of the abyss, and I gave to my body a violent impulse on the side next the hacienda, the surface of which offered not a single projection, not a single tuft of weeds to check my descent. This sudden movement, joined to the desperate struggles of my horse, was the salvation of my life. He had sprung up again on his legs, which seemed ready to fall from under him, so desperately did I feel them tremble.

I had succeeded in reaching, between the brink of the precipice and the wall of the building, a spot some few inches broader. A few more would have enabled me to turn him round, but to attempt it here would have been fatal, and I dared not venture. I sought to resume my backward progress, step by step. Twice the horse threw himself on his hind legs and fell down upon the same spot. It was in vain to urge him anew, either with voice, bridle or spur; the animal obstinately refused to take a single step in the rear. Nevertheless I did not feel my courage yet exhausted, for I had no desire to die. One last and solitary chance of safety suddenly appeared to me like a flash of light, and I resolved to employ it. Through the fastening of my boot and in reach of my hand was passed a sharp and keen knife; I drew it forth from its sheath. With my left hand I began caressing the mane of my horse, all the while letting him hear my voice. The poor animal replied to my caresses by a plaintive neighing; then, not to alarm him abruptly, my hand followed by little and little the curve of his nervous neck, and finally rested upon the spot where the last of the vertebræ unites itself with the cranium. The horse trembled, but I calmed him with my voice. When I felt his very life, so to speak, palpitate in his brain beneath my fingers, I leaned over towards the wall, my feet gently slid from the stirrups, and with one vigorous blow I buried the pointed blade of my knife in the seat of the vital principle. The animal fell as if thunderstruck, without a single motion, and, for myself, with my knees almost as high as my chin, I found myself on horseback across a corpse. I was saved,—I uttered a triumphant cry, which was responded to by a cry of the Colonel, and which the abyss reechoed with a hollow sound, as if it felt that its prey had escaped from it. I quitted the saddle, sat myself down between the wall and the body of my horse, and vigorously pushed with my feet against the carcase of the wretched animal, which rolled down into the abyss. I then arose, cleared at a few bounds the distance which separated the place where I was from the plain; and under the irresistible reaction of the terror which I had so long repressed, I sunk in a swoon upon the ground. When I reopened my eyes, the Colonel was by my side.

PART III.

THE HACIENDA.

AFTER having congratulated me on my address and presence of mind, Garduño asked me by what chance I was alone, at that hour of the night, near a building containing a Spanish garrison. I then told him of the project which had brought us thither—myself and my men.

“How many soldiers have you under your orders?” he inquired of me.

“About a hundred,—all resolute to drink or die.” At this news, I saw the officer’s eyes sparkle with almost ferocious satisfaction. “You, too, are suffering from thirst?” I resumed.

“The thirst of vengeance!” replied the officer; “and this is why, in spite of the almost entire loss of my detachment, I wander day and night about the neighbourhood to find some occasion of avenging myself.”

“Of what, Colonel?”

“An outrage, which I shall never outlive if I wash it not out in blood; or unless, at least, I render back shame for shame. I have still about fifty men here,” continued the Colonel, who seemed unwilling to explain himself any further, “and I am ready to join them with yours.”

I directed the Colonel to the spot where he would find them, and hastened to rejoin my troops, who awaited me impatiently. I had scarcely related my adventure to Valdivia when Garduño joined us with his fifty men. We learned from him that he had attacked the hacienda the day before, and had been repulsed with considerable loss. We set ourselves to deliberate, and the Colonel submitted the Spanish prisoner to a severe examination. He then gave the order to march, and, as we drew near the hacienda—

“Think you,” he said to the Spaniard, “that there is a sentinel up in the tower?”

“There is always one at night,” replied the captive; “but you have the chance that he may have fallen asleep at his post, where there is no one to keep a watch over him.”

At the very moment the Spaniard was speaking, the cries of “Alerta sentinella!” resounded all over the hacienda; we followed attentively the different voices which replied, and died away in the distance. No sound issued from the stone case of the clock-tower: the sentinel was then asleep.

“Ah, if we had but a single picce of cannon!” exclaimed Valdivia; “then, while fifty men scaled the terraces of the building by the aid of their lassoes, we could batter and breach in the doorway, and take these dogs of Gauchupines between two fires."

"We have left a gun under some bushes not far from hence," said the Colonel, "but it is of no use; the supports are broken; it is a bit of useless brass."

"Have you got any ammunition?" I inquired, in my turn.

"The cannon lies beside its caisson filled with ammunition," resumed Garduño; "but, as I tell you, it is like a fusil without a stock."

I cast a glance at the nervous arm of Valdivia; he understood me at once.

"I will take some men with me, and go and look for it," said Valdivia. "Gentlemen, this evening we shall all of us drink at our ease." With these words, Valdivia prepared to start.

"But you do not mean to go alone?" said I to him.

"My faith!—if the gun is no heavier than a horse with his rider, I can very well manage to bring it here without assistance."

"But it weighs much heavier," resumed the Colonel; "ten men, who know where the cannon lies, shall accompany you."

At the end of a quarter of an hour the men returned. They had harnessed their horses with cords around the piece of dismounted cannon, which they dragged over the unequal ground. Sometimes an obstacle would render the gun immovable; Valdivia then stooped down, made a powerful effort, and the cannon being freed, slid afresh along the surface. I then ranged my men, in silence, about three hundred paces distant from the hacienda.

"Now, my friends," said I, "we have two methods of attack: the first is to raise our war-cry simultaneously, after the manner of the Indians; the second is to scale the hacienda, whilst we cannonade the gate: the prisoner will accompany you, and act as a faithful guide under pain of death; and whilst we enter by the breach, you will enter by the terraces; but this second plan can only be adopted provided we find fifty men sufficiently brave, agile, and determined, to scale a wall looking into a precipice, the bottom of which cannot be seen. Indeed, after a certain distance, the man who is falling looks not for it."

"I will go first!" cried the Colonel, who had heard me attentively; "and perhaps, as the reward of our audacity, we shall be fortunate enough to possess ourselves of the commandant!"

"He has offended you deeply, it appears," said I to the Colonel.

"Mortally. He has inflicted a mortal outrage upon me."

The example of the Colonel encouraged the soldiers, and soon the former was permitted to choose, amongst all those who presented themselves, the strongest and most active to accompany him.

Of this band, the least enthusiastic was evidently the Spanish prisoner, to whom the idea of scaling a wall, which rose perpendicularly to the height of twenty-five feet above a frightful precipice, was far from pleasing.

The fifty men selected by the Colonel commenced their preparations for scaling. The massive building was adorned with numerous "almenas," (a species of battlements,) which denoted the rank of the proprietor. Each soldier was furnished with his lazo, of which a ring of iron formed the sliding knot. In one minute, from each of these battlements was suspended a loose cord, the extremity of which surrounded the stone projection. Before the signal for commencing the scaling was given, we agreed, Garduño and I, that the soldiers of the Colonel should not attack the enemy's garrison until the third report of the cannon; three cannon balls appeared to us more than sufficient to destroy the gate. These arrangements being made, the Colonel, with his usual calmness, seized the loose cord which was to serve as his ladder, and put it in the hands of the prisoner, commanding him to precede him.

When the Spaniard had raised himself some feet above the ground, Don Garduño placed his poignard between his teeth, and rose in his turn. The soldiers followed his example, and soon we saw fifty men, raising themselves by means of their hands on the cord, and their feet against the wall, floating above the precipice like so many demons, who seemed to issue from the abyss.

Although perilous in itself,—for a sudden dizziness, or the rupture of one of the lazos, might have launched a man into eternity,—this ascension was nevertheless easier than the attack which I was to make. The sentinel, even if he had faithfully kept watch, could not have perceived the assailants; the wall concealed them; but the post we had selected presented another kind of danger: we were soon to leave the cover of the trees, which concealed us from the sentinels, and to enter the open country embarrassed with a cannon which we were obliged to drag by force of arm. Happily, we performed this march without any accident, and when we saw the last of our men set foot on the terrace of the hacienda, Valdivia and I began to act the part allotted to us.

I first gave orders to charge the cannon. Those who had dragged it, harnessed their horses again, and we advanced, but we had scarcely moved half-a-dozen steps when a sentinel perceived us, gave the alarm, and discharged his carbine. The ball, happily, reached none of our party, and we redoubled our efforts to bring the cannon to the place where we supposed the gate to be, which we intended to destroy. Other reports of guns soon reached our ears; and in the courts of the hacienda we heard the drums beating, and the clarions sounding. There was no longer any hope of our surprising the garrison, and I gave orders to my troops to raise loud and shrill cries, changing the intonation of their voices every time. By means of this artifice, it appeared as if five hundred men were raising their voices almost at the same moment. The report of cannon, which I fired, sounded from all the echoes.

Soon the wall was lined with Spanish soldiers, and the discharges succeeded each other rapidly. Although they began to be destructive, so great was the ardour of our troops that not one of the men gave way. We replied to the fire of the enemy. Those who were dragging the cannon increased their exertions; but, just as they were about to turn the angle of the wall to face the one in which the great gate was situated, a deep and broad moat appeared. Without a bridge, it was impossible to overcome this unexpected obstacle.

"We will throw down a portion of the wall," said Valdivia. "These bricks will offer less resistance than a gate of oak supported by iron."

"That is true," returned I; and I descended to point the piece before charging it; but just as I was taking my aim I uttered a cry of disappointment: on account of the height of the wall and the inequality of the soil, the cannon ball could only reach a slope, on which were placed quantities of bricks. All our efforts were in vain. How, in fact, were we to lower or raise the mouth of a cannon deprived of its carriage? Meanwhile, a shower of balls was discharged on us. Our position became critical. We could not, without ladders, scale a wall defended by a well-maintained fire, and the fifty men who were to unite their attack with ours, ran the risk of being killed or taken prisoners without any advantage to us.

"How much is wanting for the cannon to play upon the wall?" asked Valdivia.

"A foot and a half," replied I, measuring again the ground, and drawing with my eye a line to the foot of the wall.

"And if you had a carriage a foot and a half high, you could open a breach?"

"Undoubtedly."

"Well, my back shall serve for a carriage," resumed Valdivia.

"You are joking!"

"No; I am speaking seriously."

Every one knew the extraordinary strength of Valdivia, but none expected such a proposition. Valdivia spoke in sober truth, for he knelt down, placed his two hands on the ground, and presented the surface of his broad shoulders to support the cannon.

"Let us try," said he; "I have promised that we shall be able to drink to-night, and that I would save the General's army. Come,—to work!"

Six men had inconceivable difficulty in raising the cannon to the desired height; however, they succeeded at length in balancing it on the back of Valdivia. The Hercules supported the burden without stirring. One or two lazos, fastened round the cannon, and under the intrepid soldier, served to fix it steadily.

"Charge the piece to the muzzle!" cried Valdivia.

The bullets continued to shower upon us, and one of the men, who was filling the cannon, fell dead beside the soldier transformed into a carriage. They succeeded, however, in charging the piece.

"Sloop a little," said I to Valdivia: "There — that is it; now stand firm."

The carriage remained as immovable as if it were of iron. I took the match from the hand of the soldier, and lighted it. The cannon fired; a large hole was opened in the wall.

"Well!" exclaimed Valdivia, half-raising himself on his powerful hands to judge the effect of the cannon ball.

"All is well, my good friend; the ball has effected a breach." Valdivia resumed his position; the piece was again charged to the mouth: the second blow thundered against the wall, where clouds of dust arose.

Valdivia half-raised himself a second time.

Oh, it was a fine sight, Signor Cavaliere!—it was a fine sight to witness this man, as strong as twenty of his comrades, raise himself after each discharge, and raise also that enormous mass attached to his body!

Valdivia, with his veins projecting, his face swollen, followed with his eye the track of the cannon he himself had helped to guide.

Our brave soldiers raised their voices in admiration.

"One more blow!" cried the Hercules; "but point more to the left."

I obeyed Valdivia's injunction. The cannon was charged a third time, and for the third time the report sounded. I fancied I heard a suppressed exclamation from Valdivia, who attempted to rise, but was unable to do so. We then removed the cannon from the body of the soldier. Valdivia heaved a sigh of relief, and attempted to stand upright. Vain effort!—his legs refused their service; and this man, once so strong and vigorous, sank down like an inert mass.

Without once fancying that this miracle of strength, that these nervous arms, which were worth a machine of war to us, were henceforth paralysed, I ran to the breach we had just opened. During this time, the fifty men commanded by the Colonel had issued from their hiding-place at the third report of our cannon, and the cries they raised in advancing caused a diversion in our favour: in the twinkling of an eye, a sanguinary opening was made in the Spanish ranks. Across the breach our soldiers, parched by thirst, had perceived in the court of the hacienda the noria, which occupied the middle, and no human power could have resisted the impetuosity of their attack. There was soon in the court of the hacienda a mélee as terrible and furious as a boarding on sea. The darkness concealed the paucity of our numbers from the eyes of the surprised Spaniards, whilst we knew, with tolerable accuracy, the amount of their forces. The deafening cries of "Hurrah! Mejico! Independencia!" resounded on all sides; and sometimes I heard the Colonel exclaiming—"To the Commandant!—To the Commandant!—Let him be taken alive, but without the slightest injury,—not even a scratch!"

I then regretted the absence of Valdivia, whose powerful arm would have been so useful to us. Whilst I was making fruitless efforts to reach the Commandant, whom I recognised by his uniform, a large sliding knot hovered over him for a moment, and then descended on his head. I saw him totter and fall; after that I neither saw nor heard anything: a blow from the butt-end of a carabine, which I had received on the head, threw me senseless under the feet of the combatants. When I came to myself, the court of the hacienda was calm; the heroic Valdivia was lying by my side.

"Where am I?" said I, recognising Valdivia.

"In your own territories," replied he; "we are victors. I prophesied truly."

"And you, my brave fellow," said I, "what has happened to you?"

"I have fulfilled my promise," replied the soldier, simply. "An express I have just sent to General Rayou will inform him of our victory; his army will not desert to the enemy, and the war will continue under his orders. As for me," continued he, "I shall no longer be good for much, for my back is half broken."

The Hercules had twice sustained the discharge of the cannon without moving, but the third concussion had been fatal. However, the incalculable strength of the powder had succeeded only in bending his iron muscles without being able to break them, and on that account alone Valdivia was not killed.

THE DEATH OF RUFUS.

(SUGGESTED BY A MONKISH CHRONICLER'S ACCOUNT OF THE FOREST SCENE.)

In the white city's palace
Sat Rufus at the board;
And many an abbot round him,
And many a Norman lord.

The dark-red wine of Malvoisin
Flew fast amid the glee,
While the brutal laugh of Rufus
Rang o'er the revelry.

No need of torch in banquet hall,
For the sun was bright on high,
Like the blessed angels' dwelling-place
It glow'd in yonder sky.

At St. Swithin's shrine,¹ the shaven priest
A holy mass has said,
A mass for the buried Saxon prince,
A mass for the royal dead.

Ah! little reck'd that savage king,
While the jest he shouted loud,
Of him who wore the conqueror's crown,
Of battle or of shroud.

A white-robed monk rush'd swiftly in;
Wild was his frenzied air;
Though his brain seem'd scared by vision,
His hands were clasp'd in prayer.

On the tyrant's lip the mock of scorn
Died in a curse away,
As he stamp'd his foot and shouted,
"What would the driveller say?"

"Hear, monarch!" said the prophet;
"Beware thee of the chase;
I saw a blood-red comet
Hang o'er a blasted place.

"God's wrath is on thy cruel sport;
Outstretched is his hand,
His flaming sword he quivers
O'er a black and guilty land."

Silent the king in wonder
Gazed at the monk who spoke;
No voice of idle mocker
The solemn silence broke.

"I saw thee come in vision
Into St. Swithin's shrine,
Crown'd as for fight or banquet,
With that baughty mien of thine.

"I saw thee like the were wolf,
Seize on the relics there,
And with thy teeth" (stern Rufus smiled)
"The sainted treasure tear.

"I saw a blow from an unseen hand
Dash thee into a tomb,
And smoke and flame from the vault came up,
Till the stars were hid in gloom."

"Is this thy dream, thou dotard?"
His laughter shook the hall;
"A tale to please a holy nun;
Go, paint it on thy wall.

"A health!" he said, and gave the bowl
To him who sat him next.
"Waes hale to the fat monk's treasures
Hid 'neath a rugged vest.

"Why silent?" quoth the monarch;
"I only love the bold.
'Tis but a monk, a drivelling priest,
Who sells his drums for gold.

"Give the fool a hundred shillings."—
He dashed it down in scorn.
"Thy soul will need some masses
Before the morrow morn."

"A sturdy knave," grim Rufus cried;
"Fill up another bowl;
I'll never starve the body
In hopes to save the soul.

"Let women pore o'er painted books,
And tremble at a dream,
Who mates with monks and shaven fools,
A coward knave I deem.

"Let Robert, in a land of fire,
A beggar'd hermit roam,
While I with hound and falcon
Hunt in my royal home.

"Go bid the vassals saddle
The steed at Mons I rode;
By the holy cross at Lucca,²
'Tis the best I e'er bestrode.

"I love the chase, 'tis mimic war,
And the hollow bay of hound;
The heart of Norman chieftain
Beats quicker at the sound."

"Go not, my liege," said Tyrrel.
"Already in yon bay,
The bands all bound for Poictou
For thee, their monarch, stay."

"Prate not of dreams," said Rufus—
A savage oath he swore—
"Though yon woods were full of devils, I'd hunt me there the bear."

* * * * *

Forth, as the sun is setting,
Rides the gay cavalcade,
By many a ruin'd village,
Through many a tangled glade.

The wood in the calm fair sunset
Blazed with a fiery light,
O'er ruin'd church and hamlet
Came slowly on the night.

(1) The cathedral at Winchester is dedicated to this saint.

(2) The favourite oath of Rufus.

Fair as the last sad parting
 The sun will take of earth,
 All silent rode the hunters,—
 It seem'd no place for mirth.

Deep lay the giant shadows,
 Dark, dark, on every side,
 Like a countless host of spirits
 Stood the forest spreading wide.

High o'er the rest, like monarchs,
 The oaks, hoar monsters, stood.
 No eye may pierce the stillness,
 The blackness of the wood.

Like the roof of some great temple,
 Their old moss'd boughs were spread,
 Scarce can the sun's last glory
 Stream through the shade o'er head.

A deer burst forth in panic,
 At the savage laugh and song.
 Hounds from the leash are parted
 The hunters sweep along.

In a forest glade stands Rufus,
 Intent on sylvan prize;
 From the parting rays of sun-light
 The monarch veils his eyes.

"Shoot, Tyrrel, shoot," he thunders;
 Swift came the glancing dart;
 It has pierced the crown'd hunter,
 It quivers in his heart.

* * *

To the gate of the fair white city,
 Comes the charcoal burner's wain;
 It brings no hart for abbot's board,
 It is the royal slain.

At fall of eve, the holy mass
 Chants the monk at St. Swithin's shrine;
 "Great God!" the dreamer mutters,
 "Thine is the vengeance, thine."

SCENES IN THE COUNCIL OF TRENT.

At the present moment, when the realm of England is frightened from its propriety by ultramontane insolence and pretension, it may not be unprofitable to cast a retrospective glance over some past chapters in the history of the Catholic Church. We shall then find how powerful, even in the bosom of that Church itself, have been the protestations against the corrupt doctrines and extravagant pretensions of the Papacy, and how artful, and, unfortunately, how successful also, has proved its Machiavellian policy in evading the most necessary reforms. We shall see a little too into the boasted unity of the Romish Church, which is continually vaunted as an argument for its apostolical pretensions. Forewarned, we are thus forearmed, for it is no injustice to the Romish court to affirm, that in policy, if not in doctrine, she is indeed unchanged and unchangeable.

The close of the sixteenth century with the beginning of the sixteenth, are celebrated in the history of the human mind by the Reformation, the greatest intellectual movement that has agitated Europe since the fall of the Roman Empire. From Germany, their land of predilection, the principles of the sectaries had passed into Italy. Jerome Savonarola at Florence, Frere Thomas Connecticut at Rome itself, had thundered against the vices of the popes and the abuses of the clergy, and these imprudent apostles, expiring at the stake, had sealed by martyrdom their austere and fanatical denunciations.

And yet, so far from amending, the Romish Church seemed to take a pleasure in defying the outcries of the people. Her abuses became more monstrous, her luxury more unbridled, and her vices more barefaced. Europe, and especially Germany, could endure no more; and in order to declare itself openly, the spirit of reformation needed but a single pretext and the coming man. That pretext was the sale of indulgences; that man was Martin Luther.

War being openly declared, the Saxon monk, above all a man of action, maintained no further reserve. The pope had burned his thesis; he burned the bull of the pope. A simple monk burn the bull of a pope! As the sole reply, the effigy of this daring man was committed to the flames, and his person put under the ban of the empire, as that of a devil in human form. Germany, partaking as she did the opinions of Luther, was indignant at these severities. Out of the edict of proscription arose the most obstinate opposition. The people threw themselves into Lutheranism to ameliorate their lot; princes, out of a spirit of opposition to the imperial despotism; and thenceforth the cause of the Reformation was won. And then it happened, that, pressed on all sides by her friends and enemies, the Romish Church had recourse to a measure alike usual and inefficacious;—she convoked her assembly-general. A Council was decided upon.

This word Council, uttered by all parties, made a forcible impression upon the feelings of the people. Great was the torment of conscience, extreme the perplexity; and the faithful, like all the unsettled of the Christian world, saw but a single term to their indecision, a single remedy for their evils,—a Council!

A Council! By this word the Protestants understood an assembly who should sit in judgment on the pope; the pope and his cardinals, an assembly which should condemn the Protestants. Accordingly, Pope Paul III., who remembered the audacious attempts made by the last assemblies of this nature, and who wished to direct the operations of the present, maintained that it should assemble in an Italian city; while the emperor, on his part, and with the same object in view, contended for a city in Germany. These conflicting pretensions gave rise to lengthy and eager debates, to put an end to which recourse was had to a sort of half-way compromise, and Trent was fixed upon as being a city upon the frontiers of both states.

From that moment, the embellishment of the city, which he was desirous of rendering worthy of such a noble assemblage, formed the sole idea of the Cardinal Madruceus, Bishop of Trent. Through his exhortations, the Trentines hastened to enlarge and straighten their tortuous streets. Magnificent mansions were furnished, their interior embellished with tapestry and splendid pictures, their exterior was richly decorated, and those enormous frescoes which still cover the fronts of some of the houses testify to the splendour of these palaces, worthy, as the chroniclers declare, to strive in luxury with the villas of Lucullus!

When the time appointed for the council to meet was known, the whole city was full of joy, and celebrated the happy news by splendid festivities. These festivals were followed by the bull of convocation by Pope Paul III. But three years more intervened between this date and the opening of the assembly, which only took place on the issuing of a fresh bull, dated the 7th of December, 1545.

When the three legates of the pope, charged with presiding over the Council, arrived at Trent, only a few days before the moment fixed for the meeting, there were, besides Cardinal Madrucius, only three prelates in the city. By degrees, however, they came in, and on the 13th of October, the day of the opening, twenty-five bishops, besides the legates, were assembled within the walls of Trent.

The Council was opened by a long exhortation on the part of the three legates, and also by a general procession. The legates and Cardinal Madrucius marched at its head, followed by the rest of the bishops, covered with mitres and precious copes, of cloth of gold, damask, and satin, for the archbishops and bishops, of red or rose colour for the cardinals. Their mitres shone with jewels, and silk velvet and embroidery glittered on every side. After the bishops came the lord of Castel Alto, captain of the city of Trent, in a simple suit of armour, and Antonio Guere, orator of the King of the Romans, the only ambassador present, dressed after the Spanish fashion, in black, wearing a bonnet adorned with plumes, and around his neck a ponderous and richly wrought chain of gold. Next followed the chiefs of the mendicant order—Minorites, Conventuals, Carmelites, Hermits of St. Augustine, &c. &c., followed by a crowd of abbés, theologians, doctors of either faculty, and by a great number of barons, counts, and knights, mingled with the clergy of Trent, and accompanied by all the people of the city and neighbourhood, eager to enjoy so marvellous a spectacle, and, peradventure, to profit also by the three years and a hundred and sixty days' deliverance from purgatory, granted to whomsoever should be present at the opening of the Council.

The procession, leaving the Church of Santa Trinita, repaired to the cathedral, where the Cardinal del Monte celebrated a mass of the Holy Ghost, and where the Bishop of Bitonte, that most flowery orator, delivered a sermon divided into several heads, in which he proved that a Council was necessary, first, because several Councils had deposed both kings and emperors, and, secondly, the Jupiter of the Bœoid assembled a council of the gods. He added, moreover, that upon the creation of the world and concerning the Tower of Babel, even God himself might be said to have held a sort of council. Finally, he urged all the prelates to repair to Trent as into the Trojan horse, the gate of the Council and the gates of Paradise being absolutely one and identical.

This promising oration being ended, the cardinal-legate bestowed his benediction on the people: then turning to the fathers, who awaited in profound silence, he solemnly asked of them, "Does it please you to declare that the Holy Council of Trent is open and commenced?" To which all of them replied in the same voice, "Yes, it pleases us." The cardinal thereupon declared the Council opened, and the singers, with the entire assembly, solemnly chanted the Te Deum.

On the very same day that the Council assembled to give peace to the Church, the Waldenses, to the number of more than 4,000, were massacred in France by D'Oppide and the advocate Guerin.

The first session of the Council was devoted to its organization. It was decided that the three legates, although of different orders, should, as they bore the same powers, wear the same ornaments,—that the place of the assembly should be carpeted, lest the Council should resemble an assembly of mechanics (such are the words of the decree,)—and lastly, as an assembly of dignitaries of so many grades must necessarily create some confusion, it was decided that the place occupied by these personages should in nothing be derogatory to their rank.

During these preliminaries, the laggard bishops began to arrive in great numbers, and the city of Trent soon shone with all the ecclesiastical pomp and luxury of these petty princes of the Church, each dragging in his train a sort of little court filled with guards, buffoons, and dwarfs.

This display of the cardinals and prelates especially scandalised the Lutherans and more rigorous Catholics. Already in the fourteenth century, Dante, in a fit of Ghibelline ill-humour, had bitterly satirised the luxury of the prelates of his day, when, comparing them to apostles, who wandered without shoes to their feet, and seeking nourishment in the first habitation that offered, he cries out—"Our modern prelates must have their valets to open the crowd before them, and others to guide their mules. They are so heavy that they cannot drag themselves along, so that one meets them on horseback covered with immense cloaks, in such sort that two beasts often go under a single skin."

"Si, che due bestie van sott' una pelle." Two beasts under a single skin. "Ah! why did not Dante live in our times," says a commentator on the Divina Comedia, who wrote at about the epoch of the Council, "doubtless he would then have said,

'Si, che tre bestie van sott' una pelle.'"

We may divine who was the third beast covered by the cardinal's mantles, and the greater part of the fathers of the Council seem to have been of the writer's opinion, for the sessions commence by severe lectures as to the manner in which the prelates ought to live during the Council. They are recommended to be sober, chaste, and to govern well their household; they are forbidden to be quarrelsome, drunken, immodest, and addicted to pleasure; they are advised never to put themselves into a passion, but whatever they have to say, to temper it with so sweet a prolation of speech (this musical word is pretty) as that the hearers may not be offended, nor the thread of right judgment become entangled. We shall presently see how far this advice was followed.

During these early sessions, the Italian prelates, all of them Papists,¹ and in great numbers, adroitly obtained a decree that the votes should be counted by heads, as at the council of Toledo, and not by nations, as at the councils of Basle and Constance. The legates also suppressed from the title of the Council the words representing the Universal Church, which might have raised some doubt as to the papal supremacy. Lastly, it was decided that the decrees should be previously discussed in private congregation before they were submitted to the general session of the Council, in the hope that by this arrangement scandal and stormy debating would be rendered impossible. But all these precautions failed to prevent parties from speedily developing themselves in the assembly. It was soon divided into Imperialists and Papists, and thenceforth might be appreciated the system of tactics prescribed to its legates by the Romish Court.

The complete maintenance of the papal power, and the preservation of all its prerogatives—abuses included—such were in fact their instructions. As to whatever touched not upon these delicate questions of prerogative and discipline, the utmost latitude was to be given to the disputants. Doctrinal questions were abandoned to them; of these they might make whatever they pleased, provided only that in issuing their decrees, they studied to make use of those ambiguous formulas, which, leaving the basis of the question undecided, tended to satisfy and conciliate both parties.

It may well be imagined that with these pretensions of the papal party, the reformation of abuses would only be discussed at the very last extremity, and yet this reformation was the very occasion which had called together the Council. The imperial bishops, almost all of them Germans or Spaniards, boldly declared that this question of reform ought to be settled before everything beside. The most illustrious cardinals need to be most illustriously reformed, said Don Barthélémy des Martyrs, primate of Portugal. The French supported the Imperialists, to the great vexation of the Papists, who studied how to ridicule their theologians and their orators. "Here is a cock who crows really well," exclaimed one day (playing upon the Latin word gallus, which signifies at once a cock and a Frenchman,) one of these Italian prelates, who had just been listening to the French ambassador Danès. "Please God Peter repent himself at the crowing of the cock," retorted the Frenchman with admirable à propos.

This reply rendered the Italians more circumspect; they gave up their jesting for the future, and with a view to gain time, obtained a decision that questions of doctrine and reform should be alternately treated.

We are not about to give here a detailed analysis of all the acts of the Council, but shall simply continue the philosophical examination of the aggregate of them, dwelling upon such as best delineate the physiognomy of a great religious assembly in the sixteenth century, and which best acquaint us with the composition of its elements, the tactics of its parties, the deep intrigues, and altogether secular interests, which determined the convictions of its members, modifying their most decided resolutions, and giving birth to decisions in appearance the most holy.

The assembly opened the question of reform by an examination of the points disputed between the Catholics and Lutherans, on the subject of the Holy Scriptures. As the Reformers questioned the authority of tradition, the assembly, entirely Catholic, decreed unanimously that all the books of the Old and New Testament should be recognised as canonical. Another decree declared the Vulgate authentic, and with the view of repressing certain petulant and audacious spirits, forbade any one, whosoever he might be, from daring to interpret the sacred writings contrary to the sense hitherto received by the Church, and to make thereof ridiculous applications for profane purposes.

In the following session Original Sin was discussed, which brought on the singular question of the Immaculate Conception. Had the Virgin Mary been born in sin or not? was the important question that then divided Europe. The fathers of Trent thought it prudent to conciliate both parties, and referring to the decision of the Council of Constance, declared at length, after interminable debating, that the Virgin ought not to be involved in original sin, but that in referring to the constitutions of Sixtus V., neither ought she, on the other hand, to be exempted from it. Had the Church always decided after this fashion, no doubt there would have been many more disputants, but also far fewer heretics.

In the following sessions, they continued to treat alternately, questions of doctrine and of reformation of manners. From original sin they passed to the plurality of benefices, from the justification of the sinner to ecclesiastical residence.

Such questions, obscure in themselves, ministered to unceasing disputation. Sometimes a Catholic prelate would show himself more opposed to the Romish court than was even Luther himself. Mutual exasperation thus rose to such a pitch, that more than once the interference of the legates could alone prevent the opposed factions from settling the argument by blows. Sometimes all their efforts were in vain, and one day, Denis, a Greek, Bishop of Chæronea, having cried out to Thomas de Sau-Felice, Bishop of La Cava, and a furious Papist—"Yes, my Lord, you are either extremely ignorant or extremely obstinate," La Cava flew upon his adversary, seized him by his beard, and would not relax his hold of it until he extracted a copious handful.

(1) The term Papists is here used in a special sense, as indicating those who sustained the pretensions of the Pope, in opposition to those of the inferior clergy and the Emperor

During these stormy scenes, the Lutherans, who had been the occasion of the Council, constantly refused to repair thither. They remembered the fate of John Huss and Jerome of Prague, and would not depart for Trent unless furnished with safe-conducts furnished by the council, and endorsed by the emperor. Meanwhile the dissensions between Charles the Fifth and the Lutherans, and the report of the plague, broke up the assembly, which did not reassemble until three years afterwards. When, at length, the Reformers had obtained the safe-conduct required, they repaired to Trent, but were so put off and adjourned, that it was only upon the formal demand of the emperor that they were at length allowed to present in person the articles of their belief. But upon the very first hearing, great was the scandal in the assembly. On all sides arose outcries against the temerity of these men, who came to impose a faith instead of receiving one. The legates especially had the greatest difficulty in restraining themselves. The mere presence of these dissidents seemed to them an insult to the papacy. It was necessary to disgust or frighten them away, no matter how; and on the 7th February, the Jacobin Pelargue, the organ of the Romish Church, preaching in one of the churches of Trent, exclaimed in a tone of menace—" That heretics alone were the cause of schism, and that it was time to extirpate heresy at a single stroke."

Every day the irritation of the Catholics increased, and in spite of their safe-conducts, these advocates of the Augsburg Confession, these captains of heresy, would no doubt have been roughly handled, had not the irruption of Maurice of Saxony into the Tyrol, with the flight of Charles the Fifth before this chief of the German Protestants, once more put the entire Council to the rout. The fathers hardly took time to draw up a decree of suspension, and to anathematize that malice of the enemy of mankind, which had occasioned them so grievous an inconvenience. The inconvenience in truth was grievous, and the retreat of the fathers so precipitate, that many of them, unable to embark on the Adige, fled into the mountains, leaving their baggage behind—which, for the rest, was not of a very apostolical description. Paul IV. had succeeded Julius III., and the inter-council was prolonged during all his pontificate. Raised from a Theatine monk to the popedom, this man, naturally obstinate, but hitherto humble in his conduct, had yielded to the intoxication of power. The day after his elevation, his steward having asked him how he desired to be served—" Like a king," was the reply. Amidst all his magnificence, he ceased not to declaim against the unbridled luxury and debauchery of the cardinals and prelates who surrounded him; prime causes, as he declared, of all the evils of Christendom. "You want to reform others," he exclaimed, when a general reformation was alluded to; "Physicians, heal yourselves!" In full consistory, and before the ambassadors, he often repeated that he would brook no potentate in Europe as his fellow, but would march over the heads of all of them.

" And that with this foot!" he added, striking it violently upon the ground.

It may be well supposed this haughty man cared little about reestablishing the Council. One day, as the French Cardinal du Bellay warmly insisted upon it, as being the sole means of remedying the disorders of the Church, "A pretty farce is this!" responded Paul, "to send into the mountains sixty bishops and forty doctors, and to imagine that those people are going to reform the world! And I, the vicar of Jesus Christ, and all my cardinals, those pillars of Christianity, and the prelates and celebrated doctors who abound in Rome, are we, I pray you, of no better avail than all that can be got together at Trent?"

And as Du Bellay insisted, he cut him short with, "Enough! enough! I had rather set Europe on fire by the four corners, and lose my life into the bargain, than I would yield thus basely."

In fact, Paul IV., tyrant of Rome, was in a fair way to trouble the whole world, and had already kindled a terrible war in Italy, when he died, in recommending to the cardinals, as the sole means of saving the Church, not a Council, but the Inquisition. Pius IV., his successor, carried away by the sort of reaction which followed this rigorous regimen, decided, however, not for the Inquisition, but for the Council.

This time the peril was immense, and in this closing session we must especially admire the resources of Italian policy, and the address of the papist party. In principles, it had against it the Emperor and the Kings of Spain and France; it held firm against all, and thanks to the skill of its tactics, had contrived by the end of the session, and without having yielded any point of importance, to carry the whole of its adversaries along with it. Nevertheless, at the opening of the session, each of these parties, more numerous and determined than ever, had, whilst proclaiming themselves zealous Catholics, declared against Rome in the most decided manner. On the one hand, the Germans proposed a sort of Reformation in twenty articles, the most important of which required singleness of benefices, obligation of residence for bishops, communion in the two kinds, and the marriage of priests. The Emperor expected no durable peace in his dominions until these religious difficulties were settled. The Spaniards warmly supported the Germans, and the French insisted no less positively for a species of reformation still more complete than that demanded by the Germans, and what was yet more, upon the absolute maintenance of the liberties of the Gallican Church.

For it should be here remarked, such was the progress of reform, that whilst combating against it out of doors, within the Council itself its declared enemies were obliged to contend in its favour. The papal court alone stood firm, and while the other powers, pressed by the Reformers, sought by making important concessions to satisfy and regain the latter, Rome always resisted, and proclaimed her immutable resolution never to compromise with heresy.

This so-called heresy, it is true, attacked the dearest pretensions of the Romish court. In fact, were not what were called abuses among the firmest supports of the pontifical throne? How could they then be touched without threatening to undermine its very foundations? To declare that bishops were instituted by divine right was to abdicate the papal supremacy, and set up against the head of the Church as many rivals of equal power as there were bishops in Europe. To abolish the privileges of the monks, was to deprive itself of a body of zealous auxiliaries: feudatories who, holding immediately from the Holy Father, prevented the bishops from being so many popes in their respective dioceses. Lastly, to allow the marriage of priests, was to renounce its hierarchical supremacy, and break the political tie which bound to the pope the clergy of the whole of Europe. The other refusals of Rome had motives equally obvious, and it was with the view of triumphing over her, and carrying by force what could not be obtained by negotiation, that the court of France decided upon making a last and vigorous effort.

She despatched to Trent the famous Cardinal de Lorraine, Arnaud de Ferrier, one of the friends of the Chancellor de l'Hôpital, and like him an enlightened advocate of toleration, with fourteen of his most devoted prelates. The Cardinal de Lorraine, a man of lofty ambition, was at that time one of the most considerable personages of France. The lover of Diana of Poitiers, and of Catherine de' Medicis, under Henry II. he had introduced himself into court, under Francis II. had been first minister, and under Charles IX. his influence had even increased. Possessed of great learning, naturally eloquent, and proud of his recent struggle with Theodore de Beza, he was ambitious of a wider theatre upon which to display his abilities. He repaired therefore to the Council.

At the news of the cardinal's arrival, the pope and his legates were seized with consternation. They knew well his haughtiness, and were alarmed at his temerity. Apparently a persecutor of heretics, was he not at bottom imbued with the new doctrines, and had he not more than once, among friends, half approved even of the Confession of Augsburg? Did he not look upon himself as invested with a species of Apostolate, and did he not delight in hearing himself called by his partisans the pope of France? All this the Italians well knew, and looked but for little reserve at his hands. Awaking therefore from their temporary panic, they bravely prepared themselves for the encounter.

It would be instructive, had we but the space, to study in detail the artful means employed to make head against so formidable an adversary, and the tactics adopted to conciliate him by degrees, and by little and little divert him from his most decided resolutions. The intrigue was doubtless skilfully managed, but it was also singularly favoured by the natural and well-known levity of the French prelate, by his vanity, which was adroitly flattered, by his interest, brought into play, and lastly, by his ambition, the satisfaction of which was promised. The pope had first thought of neutralizing the influence of the new comers, by sending to Trent the second rank of the Italian bishops, and as the receiver is usually of the opinion of the giver—it was thought that certain pensions bestowed upon a number of poor and doubtful prelates, by putting them more at their ease, would render them also proportionably tractable. The lukewarm were spirited up, the timid threatened, the ambitious received large promises, and all, even to the very buffoons themselves, were put into requisition by the legate Simonetta, who directed their movements.

These Italian prelates, for the most part men of wit and vivacity, and considering themselves as the brilliant and polished portion of the council, affected a contemptuous and coxcombical tone with regard to the ultra-montane bishops, a species of savages but little careful of their persons, who spoke a rude and barbarous language, and in whom everything, even to their very luxury, was vulgar. Since the time of Julius II. and Leo X., Italy, especially Rome, had become the most civilized portion of Europe,—the only place where people knew how to live, declared, while combing their beards and paring their nails, these witty and licentious prelates, whose indecent sallies scandalized the fathers from other parts of Europe,—sombre and haughty Spaniards, susceptible Frenchmen, and rigorous Germans. Thence arose their lively opposition in the Council.

The first success of the papist intriguers was to get the Council to give up the question of supremacy. It was agreed on both sides not to enter into discussion on this subject, and they passed on to decrees of residence, and the institution of bishops.

These questions, also delicate, occasioned the most animated debates, and the discussion was carried on with such animosity, that not only a violent breach among the fathers, but even the immediate dissolution of the Council was apprehended. The Italian party reserved to the pope alone the appointment of bishops, while the German and Spanish party, backed by the French, contended that the archbishops enjoyed this divine right of appointment equally with the pope, thus putting the archbishops and bishops on a certain footing of equality with the sovereign pontiff himself. These disputes were prolonged, tempers became irritable, and the most violent scenes every day disturbed the assemblage.

Melchior Avosmedian, Bishop of Cadiz, warmly maintained that the right of appointment belonged as well to the archbishops as to the pope. One day, driven to extremity, he exclaimed, "Ay, I know certain bishops whom the pope has not named, and who are as true, as legitimate bishops as any appointed by the pope."

"The fact is false! name these bishops!" exclaimed the papists to him.

"They are the four suffragans of the Archbishop of Saltzbourg; that archbishop has ordained them, and the pope has never confirmed them," coldly replied Avosmedian.

"It is an imposture!" cried out the legate Simonetta, "the pope has confirmed them."

"He has not confirmed them, I say. I have the proof of it; and they are no less valid bishops than the rest of you."

At these words a violent tumult arose in the assembly. The Patriarch of Venice, and the Bishop of La Cava shook upon their seats, exclaiming, "Heresy!" Cadiz endeavoured to reply; "Down with the schismatic!" they cry out upon him on all sides. His friends sought to defend him, but their voices were drowned by the angry cries and stampings of the Italians. In the midst of the tumult the Bishop Giles Falcette rises and exclaims, "Anathema!" "Anathema!" replies the assembly. "Let him be burned! he is a heretic!" cries out a voice from the midst of the throng. "Ay, ay, to the stake, to the stake with him!" furiously reecho a hundred voices of the papists.

Cadiz meanwhile, unable to obtain a hearing, had quitted the chair. The Germans muttered a few words of excuse in his favour. His Spanish friends replied with their outcries to the outcries of the Italians, and threatened them by gestures and by looks. The moody Cardinal de Lorraine, pale and motionless, on beholding the excitement of the assembly, assumed an expression of disdain, and held his peace, smiling with a bitter and contemptuous irony; the French bishops remained silent like himself. The legates, nevertheless, had observed the expression of the cardinal, and comprehended his silence. Simonetta, as supple as he was violent, felt that his friends were going too far. Divining, by the expressive sneer of the Frenchman, the violent effort he was making to overcome his indignation, and fearing lest so formidable an adversary should break out, he endeavoured to restore calm to the assembly, imposing silence to his partisans by signs, and flinging among the Spanish benches a few words of conciliation. By degrees the agitation subsided, the deliberations were resumed, and after certain vague explanations, the cardinals abruptly broke off the sitting.

Lorraine, on retiring, passed by the legates and the principal Romish agitators, and when he was within reach of them, exclaimed, so that he might be well heard:—"The conduct of these gentry is degrading. Cadiz was right! Had he but been a Frenchman, I would have appealed on his behalf to a free and national Council." The terrified legates shrank into silence.

On the opening of the next sitting, Hercules de Gonzaga, Cardinal of Mantua, a partisan of the French, and friend of the Cardinal of Lorraine, spoke in the character of legate, and bitterly complained of the disorders of the previous meeting. "If opinions are no longer free," he observed, "there is no longer a Council; and I declare, for my own part, that if such scenes are again renewed, I swear that I will immediately leave the congregation." Lorraine commended the wisdom of Gonzaga, adding, "that the legates ought not to withdraw themselves upon such miserable grounds; but that it was right that the authors of such disturbances should be punished."

Mantua and the Cardinal of Lorraine had done; and the Papists, immovable, kept silence in wrath and consternation, when La Cava, one of the most turbulent of the party, boldly rising, broke out into speech, and far from excusing himself, or apologizing for his injurious proceedings, exclaimed, "Remove the cause of the disorder, and the effects will cease. Had Cadiz offended only myself, I would have freely forgiven him, as charity requires me to do, but it is the whole Church—it is Christ himself whom he has outraged in the person of the Pope, his Vicar; he is entitled to no forgiveness, to no excuse."

While Cava began speaking, the French prelates took down his words on their tablets, preparing for a reply; but when they saw that he delivered himself with such freedom, a sullen murmur began to circulate along their benches. "The insolent! the audacious!" they muttered among themselves; and they would no doubt have ended by breaking out also, had not the more moderate members, such as are found in all assemblies, thrown themselves forward, and by conciliatory speeches, and caressing both parties by turns, succeeded in averting the impending storm. The discussion was resumed with greater moderation, and the honours of war even rested with the French and Spaniards; for, as the Cardinal of Lorraine insisted, the canon against which Cadiz had objected was altered in their favour. This time the Italians were defeated; but, for all that, they did not lose courage, and an underhanded war of intrigue succeeded to more open hostilities.

The address of the Holy See and the resources of its policy seemed to grow with its difficulties, and to increase with its perils. In order to rebut or moderate the attacks of his opponents, the Holy Father had recourse to the most extraordinary manœuvres. He studied, for instance, how to exaggerate the hostility of his adversaries. One day, in full consistory, he entered, pale and downcast, crying out that all was lost! that the fathers of Trent were going to sacrifice him! that Lansac was the soul of the conspiracy, and that this ambassador had gone so far as to declare in public, that by the aid of the French prelates recently arrived, he trusted to overthrow the idol of Rome. Lansac was thus obliged to humble himself before the pope, and exonerate himself from a speech that he had never uttered. Another time, he assured them, that he well knew the French wished to turn the Council into a Council of Huguenots; and the French prelates were compelled to protest against so odious an imputation. Then the pope affected to be indulgent, forgave faults which had never been committed, making use of extreme gentleness in his pardon and his reproofs, even blessing the pretended delinquents, who thus found themselves obliged to make the amende honorable, and to prove the falseness of the accusations against them by the sacrifice of their opinions, and by concessions which otherwise would never have been withdrawn from them. The success of these tactics surpasses all belief.

Our limits will not allow us to trace the deep intrigues by which the formidable Cardinal de Lorraine was gradually gained over by the Papist party, who, their principal adversary being thus reduced, came off at last with flying colours, after all the attacks of their enemies. Suffice it to say, the promises and flatteries of the pope at length so completely won over the French cardinal, that he was now always repeating, that he took as lively an interest in the happy termination of the Council as the Holy Father himself; and that he now clearly perceived that the safety of Catholicism consisted in a sincere union with the Holy See! Such was the triumph of Italian astuteness and diplomacy. No sooner had Lorraine departed for France, than the deliberations of the assembly were scandalously hurried over; and with the exception of some French and Spanish malcontents, the whole of the fathers seemed to have but one desire, that of delivering his Holiness from the torments of the Council, as the nuncio Visconti, the principal intriguer, wrote privately on the occasion to Cardinal Borromeo.

With this view the utmost haste was made in promulgating a list of forbidden books. Fifteen hundred names of authors and volumes were lumped together in this wholesale proscription. It was thought sufficient to copy the list made out at Rome by the Inquisitors, who had aimed at quantity and quality at the same time. The twenty articles of the Reformation were swept away at once. Although these had been discussed in the preliminary meetings, they still presented numerous difficulties on points the most essential; but far from attempting any further discussion of them, it was found convenient to adjourn them sine die.

The Count de Luna, and the French ambassador, Arnaud du Ferrier, alone resisted this indecent precipitation. They ceased not to demand a profound investigation of the matters under discussion. Ferrier uttered a biting protestation against the concluding acts of the Council, and against the encroachments of the clergy upon the temporal power of princes. "I see well," he observed, in a tone of raillery,—“I see well that we have need to fast and weep a long time yet, while awaiting that reformation of abuses decided on and promised for this last hundred and fifty years! What think you, my fathers! instead of seeking to remove abuses, you are endeavouring to humble our princes; instead of desiring to reform what is evil, you are only solicitous how to invade the liberties of our Gallican Church! Alas, my fathers! you seek to get rid of heresy—well and good—but, believe me, it is by able preaching, and by worthy living, that you will succeed in extirpating heretics, and not by provocations addressed to princes by way of pastime, and by decrees drawn up in a hurry while polishing your nails!”

It was the Legate Moro, Bishop of Palestrina, who at length proclaimed the closing of the Council in full assemblage, and with magnificent ceremonial. The Secretary, Ange Massarel, having read all the articles promulgated, and all the fathers being present, proceeded as follows:—

“Does it please the fathers to bring to an end the Holy Council, and that the confirmation of it should be demanded of our Holy Father?” “Yes, it pleases us,” replied the whole Council, with one voice; three bishops alone protesting against it.

“To the blessed Pope Pius, Bishop of the Holy Church universal, be long years, and eternal memory!” And all the Council re-echoed, “Long years, and eternal memory!”

Then followed benedictions for the popes deceased during the Council, and for the Emperor Charles the Fifth; acclamations for the Emperor Ferdinand, (the only sovereign named;) for all kings, princes, republics, legates, cardinals, ambassadors, bishops, abbés, and theologians; and Moro resumed:—

“We all believe, we all feel, we all declare, that this faith of the Council is the faith of Saint Peter and the Apostles, the faith of the fathers of the Church, the faith of all right-thinking and Catholic men.”

“We all believe it; we all feel it; we all declare it.”

“Anathema upon all heretics!”

“Anathema! so be it!”

This was the last word of the Council.

After so prolonged a stay in the city of Trent, the fathers were in such a hurry to get away from it, that the legates were obliged to threaten with excommunication all those who should depart without having approved and signed with their own hands the decrees of the Council. Four legates, two cardinals, twenty-five archbishops, a hundred and sixty-eight bishops, thirty-nine procurators, charged with power by absent prelates, seven abbés, and seven heads of orders, signed these decrees; one of the legates chanted the Te Deum, and the Te Deum being finished, the legate bestowed his benediction upon the fathers, and said to them, “Depart in peace!”

Such was the end of the Council of Trent, assembled on the occasion of the Reformation, and which, incapable of combating it efficaciously, and not being willing to enter into compromise with it, was unable to arrest its progress. In fact, during its debates, Lutheranism became naturalized in Germany, and becoming victorious, dictated its own conditions. Calvinism was solidly established in Switzerland, and in the midst of wars and massacres spread rapidly in France, as it did in England also. Lastly, in spite of the fearful persecutions of Charles the Fifth and his successors, (and Grotius affirms that more than a hundred thousand persons perished by these cruelties,) the Reformers invaded the Flemish provinces, and the atrocious wars of the Duke of Alba, and the measures of the Council of blood, were not able to drive them away.

A man that astonishes at first soon makes people impatient if he does not continue in the same andante key.—Walpole.

THE HOUSEHOLD OF SIR THO. MORE.¹LIBELLUS A MARGARETA MORE, QUINDECIM ANNOS
NATA, CHELSEIE INCEPTVS.

"Nulla dies sine linea."

ENTERING, o' the suddain, into Mercy's chamber, I founde her all be-wep't and waped, poring over an old kirtle of mother's she had bidden her re-line with buckram. Coule not make out whether she were sick of her task, had had words with mother, or had some secret inquietation of her owne; but, as she is a girl of few words, I found I had best leave her alone after a caress and kind saying or two. We alle have our troubles.

. . . . Trulie may I say soe. Here have they ta'en a fever of some low sorte in my house of refuge, and mother, fearing it may be y^e sicknesse, will not have me goe neare it, lest I s^d bring it home. Mercy, howbeit, hath besought her soc earnestlie to let her goe and nurse y^e sick, that mother hath granted her prayer, on condition she returneth not till y^e fever bates . . . thus setting her life at lower value than our owne. Deare Mercy! I woulde fayn be her mate.

We are alle mightie glad that Rupert Allington hath at lengthe zealouslic embraced y^e study of the law. 'Twas much to be feared at y^e firste there was noe application in him, and though we alle pitied him when father first broughte him home, a pillaged, portionlesse client, with none other to espouse his rightes, yet 'twas a pitie soone allied with contempt when we founde how emptie he was, caring for nought but archerie and skittles and the popinjaye out o' the house, and dicing and tables within, which father w^d on noe excuse permitt. Soe he had to conform, ruefullie enow, and hung piteouslie on hand for awhile. I mind me of Bess's saying, about Christ-masse, "Heaven send us open weather while Allington is here; I don't believe he is one that will bear shutting up." Howbeit, he seemed to incline towards Daisy, who is handsome enow, and cannot be hindered of two hundred pounds, and soe he kept within bounds, and when father got him his cause he was mightilie thankfulle, and woulde have left us out of hand, but father persuaded him to let his estate recover itself, and turn y^e mean tyme to profit, and, in short, soe wrought on him, that he hath now become a student in right earneste.

Soe we are going to lose not only Mr. Clement, but Mr. Gunnel! How sorrie we alle are! It seemeth he hath long been debating for and agaynst y^e church, and at length finds his mind soe stronglie set towards it, as he can keep out of it noe longer. Well! we shall lose a good master, and y^e church will gayn a good seryant. Drew will supplie his place, that is, according to his beste, but our worthy Welshman careth soe little for young people, and is soe abstract from y^e world about him, that we shall oft feel our loss. Father hath promised Gonellus his interest with y^e Cardinall.

I fell into disgrace for holding speech with Mercy over y^e pales, but she is confident there is noe danger; the sick are doing well, and none of y^e whole have fallen sick. She sayth Gammer Gurney is as tender of her as if she were her daughter, and will let her doe noe vile or paynfull office, soe as she hath little to doe but read and pray for y^e poor souls, and feed 'em with savourie messes, and they are alle so harmonious and full of cheer, as to be like birds in a nest. Mercy deserves theire blessings more than I. Were I a free agent, she s^d not be alone now, and I hope ne'er to be withheld therefrom agayn.

Busied with my flowers y^e chief o' the forenoon, I was fayn to rest in the pavillion, when, entering therein, whom shoulde I stumble upon but William, layd at length on y^e floor, with his arms under his head, and his book on y^e ground. I was withdrawing brisklie enow, when he called out, "Don't goe away, since you are here," in a tone soe rough, soe unlike his usuall key, as that I paused in a maze, and then saw that his eyes were red. He sprung to his feet and sayd, "Meg, come and talk to me," and, taking my hand in his, stepped quicklie forthe without another word sayd, till we reached the elm-tree walk. I marvelled to see him soe moven, and expected to hear somewhat that shoulde displease me, scarce knowing what; however, I might have guest at it from then till now, without ever nearing y^e truth. His first words were, "I wish Erasmus had ne'er crost y^e threshold; he has made me very unhappie;" then, seeing me stare, "Be not his council just now, deare Meg, but bind up, if thou canst, the wounds he has made. . . There be some wounds, thou knowest, though but of a cut finger or the like, that we cannot well bind up for ourselves."

I made answer, "I am a young and unskilled leech."

He replied, "But you have a quick wit, and patience, and kindnesse, and, for a woman, are not scant of learning."

"Nay," I sayd, "but Mr. Gunnel—"

"Gunnel would be the last to help me," interrupts Will, "nor can I speak to your father. He is alwaies too busie now. . . besides,—"

"Father Francis," I put in.

"Father Francis?" repeats Will, with a shake o' the head and a ruefull smile, "dost thou think, Meg, he coulde answer me if I put to him Pilate's question, 'What is truth?'"

"We know alreadie," quoth I.

Sayth Will, "What do we know?"

I paused, then made answer reverentlie, "That Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life."

"Yes," he exclaymed, clapping his hands together in a strange sort of passion; "that we doe know, blessed be God, and other foundation can or ought noe man to lay than that is layd, which is Jesus Christ. But, Meg, is this the principle of our church?"

(1) Continued from p. 262.

"Yea, verily," I steadfastly replied.

"Then, how has it beene overlaid," he hurriedly went on, "with men's inventions! St. Paul speaks of a sacrifice once offered; we holde the host to be a continual sacrifice. Holy writ telleth us where a tree falls it must lie; we are taught that our prayers may free souls from purgatorie. The word sayth, 'by faith ye are saved;' the church sayth we may be saved by our works. It is written 'The idols he shall utterly abolish;' we worship figures of gold and silver. . ."

"Hold, hold," I said, "I dare not listen to this. . . you are wrong, you know you are wrong."

"How and where," he sayth; "onlie tell me. I long to be put righte."

"Our images are but symbols of our saints," I made answer; "tis onlie y^e ignorant and unlearned that worship y^e mere wood and stone."

"But why worship saints at all?" persisted Will; "where's the warrant for it?"

I said, "Heaven has warranted it by sundrie and special miracles at divers times and places. I may say to you, Will, as Socrates to Agathon, 'You may easilie argue agaynst me, but you cannot argue agaynst the truth.'"

"Oh, put me not off with Plato," he impatiently replied, "refer me but to holie writ."

"How can I," quoth I, "when you have ta'en away my testament ere I had half gone through it? 'Tis this book, I fear me, poor Will, hath unsettled thee. Our church, indeed, sayth the unlearned wrest it to their destruction."

"And yet the apostle sayth," rejoined Will, "that it containys alle things necessarie to our salvation."

"Doubtlesse it doth, if we knew but where to find them," I replied.

"And how find, unlesse we seeke?" he pursued, "and how know which road to take, when we find the scripture and the church at issue?"

"Get some wiser head to advise us," I rejoined.

"But an' if the obstacle remains the same?"

"I cannot suppose that," I somewhat impatiently returned, "God's word and God's church must agree; 'tis only we that make them at issue."

"Ah, Meg, that is just such an answer as Father Francis mighte give—it solves noe difficultie. If, to alle human reason, they pull opposite ways, by which shall we abide? I know; I am certain. 'Tu, Domine Jesu, es justicia mea'"

He looked soe rapt, with claspt hands and uprased eyes, as that I could not but look on him and hear him with solemnitie. At length I said, "If you know and are certayn, you have noe longer anie doubts for me to lay, and with your will, we will holde this discourse noe longer, for however moving and however considerable its subject matter may be, it approaches forbidden ground too nearlie for me to feel it safe, and I question whether it savoureth not of heresie. However, Will, I most heartilie pitie you, and will pray for you."

"Do, Meg, do," he replied, "and say nought to anie one of this matter."

"Indeede I shall not, for I think 'twoulde bring you if not me into trouble, but, since thou hast soughte my council, Will, receive it now and take it. . ."

He sayth, "What is it?"

"To read less, pray more, fast, and use such discipline as our church recommends, and I question not this temptation will depart. Make a fayr triall."

And soe, away from him, though he woulde fain have sayd more, and I have kept mine owne worde of praying for him full earnestlie, for it pitieth me to see him in such case.

Poor Will, I never see him look grave now, nor heare him sighe, without thinking I know the cause of his secret discontentation. He hath, I believe, followed my council to y^e letter, for though y^e men's quarter of y^e house is soe far aparte from ours, it hath come rounde to me through Barbara, who had it from her brother, that Mr. Roper hath of late lien on y^e ground, and used a knotted cord. As 'tis one of y^e acts of mercy to relieve others, when we can, from satanic doubts and inquietations, I have been at some payns to make an abstracte of such passages from y^e fathers, and such narratives of noted and undeniable miracles as cannot, I think, but carry conviction with them, and I hope they may minister to his soul's comfort.

Tuesday.

Supped with my Lord Sands. Mother played mumpance with my lady, but father, who saith he woulde rather feast a hundred poor men than eat at one rich man's table, came not in till late, on plea of businesse. My lord tolde him the king had visited him not long agone, and was soe well content with his manor as to wish it were his owne, for the singular fine ayr and pleasant growth of wood. In fine, wound up y^e evening with musick. My lady hath a pair of fine toned clavichords, and a mandoline that stands five feet high; the largest in England, except that of the Lady Mary Dudley. The sound, indeed, is powerful, but methinketh the instrument ungaynlie for a woman. Lord Sands sang us a new ballad, "The King's Hunt's up," which father, affected hugelic. I lacked spiritt to sue my lord for y^e words, he being soe free-spoken as alwaies to dash me; howbeit, I mind they ran somewhat thus. . . .

"The hunt is up, the hunt is up,
And it is well-nigh daye,
Harry our King has gone hunting
To bring his deere to baye.
The east is bright with morning lighte,
And darkness it is fled,
And the merrie horn wakes up y^e morn
To leave his idle bed.
Beholde y^e skies with golden dyes,
Are . . .

—The rest hath escaped me, albeit I know there was some burden of hey-tantara, where my lord did stamp and snap his fingers. He is a merry heart.

Now that Gunnel is gone, I take to heart that I profited not more by his teaching. Saying to Mercy, overnight, that methought she missed not our good master, she made answer, "Oh yes, I doe; how can I choose but miss him, who taught me to be, to doe, and to suffer?" And this with a light laugh, yet she lookt not merrie.

. . . Writing y^e above, I was interrupted by shrill cries either of woman or boy, as of one in acute payn, and ran forthe of my chamber to learne y^e cause. I met Bess coming hastilie out of y^e garden, looking somewhat pale, and cried, "What is it?" She made answer, "Father is having Dick Halliwell beaten for some evill communication with Jack. 'Tis seldom or never he proceedeth to such extremities, soe the offence must needs have beene something pernicious; and, e'en as 'tis, father is standing by to see he is not smitten overmuch; ne'erthelessse, Giles lays the stripes on with a will."

It turned me sick. I have somewhat of my mother in me, who was a tender and delicate woman, that woulde weepe to see a bird killed by a cat. I hate corporall punishments, and yet they've Scripture warrant. Father seldom hath recourse to 'em; and yet we feare as well as love him more than we doe mother, who, when she firste came among us, afore father had softened her down a little, used to hit righte and left. I mind me of her saying one day to her own daughter Daisy, "Your tucker is too low," and giving her a slap, mighte have beene hearde in Chelsea Reach. And there was the stamp of a greate red hand on Daisy's white shoulder all y^e forenoon, but the worst of it was, that Daisy tooke it with perfect immoveabilitie, nor lookt in the leaste ashamed, which Scripture sayth a daughter shoulde doe, if her parent but spit in her face, i.e. sett on her some publick mark of contumely. Soe far from this, I even noted a silent look of scorn, which payned me, for of all the denunciations in Holy Writ, there is none more awfull to my mind than that which sayth, "The eye that mocketh at father or mother," not alone the tongue, but e'en the eye,—"the young ravens of the valley shall pick it out."

Sayth Lord Rutland to my father, in his acute sneering way, "Ah, ah, Sir Thomas, Honores mutant Mores."

"Not so, in faith, my lord," returns father, "but have a care lest we translate the proverb, and say honours change Manners."

It served him right, and the jest is worth preserving, because 'twas not premeditate, as my lord's very likely was, but retorted at once and in self-defence. I don't believe honours have changed the Mores. As father told mother, there's the same face under the hood. 'Tis comique, too, the fulfilment of Erasmus his prophecy. Plato's year has not come rounde, but they have got father to court, and the king seems minded never to let him goe. For us, we have the same untamed spiritts and unconstrained course of life as ever, neither lett nor hindered in our daylie studies, though we dress somewhat braver, and see more companic. Mother's head was a little turned, at first, by the change and enlargment of the household . . . the acquisition of clerk of the kitchen, surveyor of the dresser, yeoman of the pastrie, etc. but, as father laughingly tolde her, the increase of her cares soon steddied her witts, for she found she had twenty unthrifts to look after insteade of half-a-dozen. And the same with himself. His responsibilities are so increast, that he grutches at everie hour the court steals from his family, and vows, now and then, he will leave off joking, that the king may the sooner wearie of him. But this is onlie in jest, for he feels it is a power given him over lighter minds, which he may exert to usefull and high purpose. Onlie it keepeth him from needing Damocles his sword; he trusts not in the favour of princes nor in the voyce of the people, and keeps his soul as a weaned child. 'Tis much for us now to get an hour's leisure with him, and makes us feel what our olde privileges were when we knew 'em not. Still, I'm pleased without being over elated, at his having risen to his proper level.

The king tooke us by surprise this morning: mother had scarce time to slip on her scarlett gown and coif, ere he was in y^e house. His grace was mighty pleasant to all, and, at going, saluted all round, which Bessy took humourously, Daisy immovecable, Mercy humble, I distastefullie, and mother delight-edlie. She calls him a fine man; he is indeede big enough, and like to become too big; with long slits of eyes that gaze freele on all, as who shoulde say, "Who dare let or hinder us?" His brow betokens sense and franknesse, his eyebrows are supercilious, and his cheeks puffy. A rolling, straddling gait, and abrupt speech.

'Tother evening, as father and I were, unwontedly, strolling together down the lane, there accosts us a shabby poor fellow, with something unsettled in his eye. . . .

"Master, sir knight, and may it please your judgeship, my name is Patteson."

"Very likely," says father, "and my name is More, but what is that to the purpose?"

"And that is more to the purpose, you mighte have said," returned the other.

"Why, soe I mighte," says father, "but how shoulde I have proved it?"

"You who are a lawyer shoulde know best about that," rejoined the poor knave; "'tis too hard for poor Patteson."

"Well, but who are you?" says father, "and what do you want of me?"

"Don't you mind me?" says Patteson; "I played Hold-your-tongue, last Christmasse revel was five years, and they called me a smart chap then, but last Martinmasse I fell from y^e church steeple, and shook my brain-pan, I think, for its contents have seemed addled ever since; soe what I want now is to be made a fool."

"Then you are not one now?" says father.

"If I were," says Patteson, "I shoulde not have come to you."

"Why, like cleaves to like, you know they say," says father.

"Aye," says 'tother, "but I've reason and feeling enow, too, to know you are no fool, though I thoughte you might want one. Great people like 'em at their tables, I've hearde say, though I am sure I can't guesse why, for it makes me sad to see fools laughed at; ne'ertheless, as I get laughed at alreadie, methinketh I may as well get paid for the job if I can, being unable, now, to doe a stroke of work in hot weather. And I'm the onlie son of my mother, and she is a widow. But perhaps I'm not bad enough."

"I know not that, poor knave," says father, touched with quick pity, "and, for those that laugh at fools, my opinion, Patteson, is that they are the greater fools who laugh. To tell you the truth, I had had noe mind to take a fool into mine establishment, having always had a fancy to be prime fooler in it myselve; however, you incline me to change my purpose, for, as I said anon, like cleaves to like, soe I'll tell you what we will doe—divide the businesse and goe halves—I continuing the fooling, and thou receiving the salary; that is, if I find, on inquiry, thou art given to noe vice, including that of scurrillitie."

"May it like your goodness," says poor Patteson, "I've been the subject, oft, of scurrillitie, and affect it too little to offend that way myself. I ever keep a civil tongue in my head, 'specially among young ladies."

"That minds me," says father, "of a butler who said he always was sober, especially when he had cold water to drink. Can you read and write?"

"Well, and what if I cannot?" returns Patteson, "there ne'er was but one, I ever heard of, that knew letters, never having learnt, and well he might, for he made them that made them."

"Meg, there is sense in this poor fellow," says father, "we will have him home and be kind to him."

And, sure enow, we have done so and been so ever since.

A glance at the antecedent pages of this libellus me-sheweth poor Will Roper at y^e season his love-fitt for me was at its height. He troubleth me with it noe longer, nor with his religious disquietations. Hard studdy of the law hath filled his head with other matters, and made him infinitely more rationally, and by consequents, more agreeable. 'Twas one of those preferences young people sometimes manifest, themselves know neither why nor wherefore, and are shamed, afterwards, to be reminded of. I'm sure I shall ne'er remind him. There was nothing in me to fix a rational or passionate regard. I have neither Bess's witt nor white teeth, nor Daisy's dark eyes, nor Mercy's dimple. A plain-favoured girl, with changefulle spiritts,—that's alle.

Patteson's latest jest was taking precedence of father yesterday, with the saying, "Give place, brother; you are but jester to King Harry, and I'm jester to Sir Thomas More; I'll leave you to decide which is y^e greater man of the two."

"Why, gossip," cries father, "his grace woulde make two of me."

"Not a bit of it," returns Patteson, "he's big enow for two such as you are, I grant ye, but the king can't make two of you. No! lords and commons may make a king, but a king can't make a Sir Thomas More."

"Yes, he can," rejoyns father, "he can make me Lord Chancellor, and then he will make me more than I am already; ergo, he will make Sir Thomas more."

"But what I mean is," persists the fool, "that the king can't make such another as you are, any more than all the king's horses and all the king's men can put Humpty-dumpty together again, which is an ancient riddle, and full of marrow. And soe he'll find, if ever he lifts thy head off from thy shoulders, which God forbid."

Father delighteth in sparring with Patteson far more than in jesting with y^e king, whom he alwaies looks on as a lion that may, any minute, fall on him and rend him. Whereas, with 'tother, he ungirds his mind. Their banter commonly exceeds not pleasantrie, but Patteson is ne'er without an answer, and although, maybe, each amuses himselve now and then with thinking, "I'll put him up with such a question," yet, once begun, the skein runs off the reel without a knot, and shews the excellent nature of both, soe free are they alike from malice and over-license. Sometimes their cuts are neater than common listeners apprehend. I've scened Rupert and Will, in fencing, make their swords flash in the sun at every parry and thrust; agayn, owing to some change in mine owne position, or the decline of y^e sun, the scintillations have escaped me, though I've known their rays must have been emitted in some quarter alle the same.

Patteson, with one of Argus's cast feathers in his hand, is at this moment beneath my lattice, astride on a stone balustrade, while Bessy, whom he much affects, is sitting on the steps, feeding her peacocks. Sayth Patteson, "Canst tell me, mistress, why peacocks have soe manic eyes in their tails, and yet can onlie see with two in their heads?"

"Because those two make them soe vain alreadie, fool," says Bess, "that were they always beholding their owne glory, they woulde be intolerable."

"And besides that," says Patteson, "the less we see or heare, either, of what passes behind our backs, the better for us, since knaves will make mouths at us then, for as glorious as we may be. Canst tell me, mistress, why the peacock was the last bird that went into the ark?"

"First tell me, fool," returns Bess, "how thou knowest that it was soe?"

"Nay, a fool may ask a question w^d puzzle a wiseard to answer," rejoyns Patteson; "I mighte ask you, for example, where they got their fresh kitchen-stuff in the ark, or whether the birds ate other than grains, or the wild beasts other than flesh. It needs must have been a granary."

"We ne'er shew ourselves such fools," says Bess, "as in seeking to know more than is written. They had enough, if none to spare, and we scarce can tell how little is enough for bare sustenance in a state of perfect inaction. If the creatures were kept low, they were all y^e less fierce."

"Well answered, mistress," says Pateson, "but tell me, why do you wear two crosses?"

"Nay, fool," returns Bess, "I wear but one."

"Oh, but I say you wear two," says Pateson, "one at your girdle, and one that nobody sees. We all wear the unseen one, you know. Some have theirs of gold, alle carven and shaped, soe as you hardlie tell it for a cross. . . like my lord cardinal, for instance. . . but it is one, for alle that. And others, of iron, that cateth into their hearts. . . methinketh Master Roper's must be one of 'em. For me, I'm content with one of wood, like that our deere Lord bore; what was goode enow for him is goode enow for me, and I've noe temptation to shew it, as it isn't fine, nor yet to chafe at it for being rougher than my neighbour's, nor yet to make myself a second because it is not hard enow. Doe you take me, mistress?"

"I take you for what you are," says Bess, "a poor fool."

"Nay, niece," says Pateson, "my brother your father hath made me rich."

"I mean," says Bess, "you have more wisdom than witt, and a real fool has neither, therefore you are only a make-believe fool."

"Well, there are many make-believe sages," says Pateson; "for mine owne part, I never aim to be thoughte a Hiccius Docius."

"A hic est doctus, fool, you mean," interrupts Bess.

"Perhaps I do," rejoins Pateson, "since other folks soe oft know better what we mean than we know ourselves. Alle I woulde say is, I ne'er set up for a conjuror. One can see as far into a millstone as other people without being that. For example, when a man is overt'aen with qualms of conscience for having married his brother's widow, when she is noe longer soe young and fair as she was a score of years ago, we know what that's a sign of. And when an Ipswich butcher's son takes on him the state of my lord pope, we know what that's a sign of. Nay, if a young gentlewoman become dainty at her sizes, and sluttish in her apparel, we . . . as I live, here comes John Heron with a fish in 's mouth."

Poor Bess involuntarily turned her head quicklie towards y^e watergate, on which Pateson, laughing as he lay on his back, points upward with his peacock's feather, and cries, "Overhead, mistress! see, there he goes. Sure, you lookt not to see Master Heron making towards us between y^e posts and flower-pots, eating a dried ling?" laughing as wildly as though he were verily a natural.

Bess, without a word, shook the crumbs from her lap, and was turning into the house, when he witholds her a minute in a perfectly altered fashion, saying, "There be some works, mistress, our confessors tell us be works of supererogation . . . is not that y^e word? I learn a long one now and then. . . such as be setting food before a full man, or singing to a deaf one, or buying for one's pigs a silver trough, or, for the matter of that, casting pearls before a dunghill cock, or fishing for a heron, which is well able to fish for itself, and is an ill-natured bird after all, that pecks the haud of his mistress, and, for all her kindness to him, will not think of Bessy More."

How apt alle are to abuse unlimited license! Yet 'twas good counsel.

COMM DHUW;

OR, THE BLACK HOLLOW.

THIS is a wild and singular spot in the vicinity of the Upper Lake of Killarney, at the extremity of the Gap of Dunloe. Its name is highly expressive of its dark and gloomy appearance—partly occasioned by the formation of the valley, and partly by the dark-coloured bog and heather with which its back and sides are blackened and embrowned. It is a scene more than ordinarily characteristic of the peculiar scenery of the west of Ireland, and well displays the talents of the accomplished painter, Creswick.

SKETCHES AND ANECDOTES OF WORTHIES OF THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

RICHARD HOOKER.

THERE is no human quality so well calculated to inspire us with feelings of reverence and affection as that graceful simplicity of character which distinguishes the humble-minded scholar. How much do we find to admire and love in that rare union of unaffected piety and unfeigned humility, of innocency of life and guilelessness of heart, with profound learning and enlarged experience, of which the world has now and then afforded us a bright example! Better for us still, if the blameless life has been worthily written by one who was fully capable of appreciating its holiness and excellence. A good biography of a good great man is an invaluable treasure; and all honour to the best of biographers, the worthy and excellent Izaak Walton, for that beautiful life of the venerable Richard Hooker, of which the poet might well say, that the feather whence the pen was shaped that traced it "dropped from an angel's wing."

It was in the "frosty, but kindly" winter of his days that honest Izaak indited his "plain relation" of the life of this humble and accomplished man, whose virtues, to quote the words of Bishop King, "like jewels of unvaluable price, still cast such a lustre as envy and the rust of time shall never darken." We need not dwell on the peculiar graces of the well-known narrative; nor is it necessary to advert to the circumstances under which it was written, except to remind the reader that the good old biographer had passed his seventieth year when he entered on this labour of love.

During the latter half of the seventeenth century, the name of Hooker was regarded with no common veneration by the High Church and Cavalier party. In the scanty library of many a country gentleman was to be found his famous work on Ecclesiastical Polity, which, though perhaps rarely opened, was regarded with reverence by its loyal possessor, from the recollection that his martyred sovereign had often meditated over its pages, and had enjoined his children to be diligent in its perusal. It was also remembered that in the earliest stage of Puritanism, Hooker had signalized himself as a zealous and able champion of the Church,—that in her first struggle with the Non-conformists he had proved himself a learned and successful, albeit, to his credit be it stated, a meek and reluctant controversialist. He had defended the cause of the "passive and peaceful Protestants" against the "active Romanists and restless Nonconformists," when their forces were first directed against the Establishment in the reign of Elizabeth. The works which he bequeathed to posterity abounded in learning and logic. They had received the commendations of some of the most famous prelates of the Church, and when the war of theological contention ran high they were studied as text-books of High-Church divinity. Among those, therefore, who made an enthusiastic attachment to the Church of England the principal article in their political, as well as their religious creed, (and Izaak Walton was a politician of this class,) there were few Englishmen who were considered more entitled to the grateful reverence of posterity than the "learned and judicious Hooker."

The county of Devon, amongst other worthies, has to boast of being the birth-place of this celebrated divine. He was born near Exeter, about the year 1533, of poor parents, who contrived, in spite of their poverty, to give their children the advantage of some slight education. Having been destined for a mechanical employment, Richard Hooker was saved from apprenticeship by the kindness of his schoolmaster, who, perceiving his quickness and docility, prevailed upon his parents to leave him at school till some means could be found of relieving them of a part of their care and charge. "And the good man told them also," says Walton, "that he would double his diligence in instructing him, and would neither expect nor receive any other reward than the content of so hopeful and happy an employment." It happened that Hooker had an uncle in more prosperous circumstances, being chamberlain of Exeter, whom the kind-hearted schoolmaster frequently tried to interest in his nephew's fortunes. At last, John Hooker (for so was the uncle named) determined to present the lad to Dr. John Jewel, Bishop of Salisbury, who, having been addressed on the subject, appointed a day to see him, and to ask him a few questions. When the time arrived for the interview, the bishop was so well satisfied with the boy's answers, that he obtained him a clerkship in Corpus Christi College, Oxford, in which condition he remained till the eighteenth year of his age, at which period he was overtaken by a dangerous illness.

"As soon as he was perfectly recovered from this sickness," says Walton, "he took a journey from Oxford to Exeter, to satisfy and see his good mother, being accompanied with a countryman and companion of his own college, and both on foot; which was then either more in fashion, or want of money or their humility made it so. But on foot they went, and took Salisbury in their way, purposely to see the good bishop, who made Mr. Hooker and his companion dine with him at his own table, which Mr. Hooker boasted of, with much joy and gratitude, when he saw his mother and friends; and at the bishop's parting with him, the bishop gave him good counsel and his benediction, but forgot to give him money; which when the bishop had considered, he sent a servant in all haste to call Richard back to him; and at Richard's return, the bishop said to him, 'Richard, I sent for you back to lend you a horse which hath carried me many a mile, and, I thank God, with much ease,' and presently delivered him a walking-staff, with which he professed he had travelled through many parts of Germany. And he said, 'Richard, I do not give, but lend you my horse. Be sure you be honest, and bring my horse back to me at your return this way to Oxford. And I do now give you ten groats to bear your charge to Exeter, and here is ten groats more which I charge you to deliver to your mother, and tell her I send her a bishop's benediction with it, and beg the continuance of her prayers for me.'"

The death of the good bishop, which happened immediately after the young student had returned to Oxford, deprived him of a kind patron, and plunged him into deep affliction. But his modesty and ability soon gained him other friends, who were able and willing to assist him. It chanced about this time, that Dr. Edwin Sandys, then Bishop of London, who had shared the exile of Jewel during the persecuting reign of Mary, was about to send his son to Oxford, and though Hooker was only nineteen years of age, he had heard so much of his gravity and learning that he determined to select him for the youth's tutor. Shortly afterwards the bearer of another illustrious name was placed under his care, namely George Cranmer, the eldest son of Thomas Cranmer, the great archbishop's nephew. "Betwixt Mr. Hooker," says Walton, "and these his two pupils there was a sacred friendship,—a friendship made up of religious principles, which increased daily by a similitude of inclinations to the same recreations and studies; a friendship elemented in youth and in an university, free from self-ends, which the friendships of age usually are not."

To his other attainments Hooker added a profound knowledge of the oriental languages, and in 1579 he undertook the reading of the public Hebrew lecture, during the indisposition of the Hebrew reader. Three months afterwards, he was, for some trifling cause, expelled his college, but he returned to it again in the course of a few weeks, and resumed his studies, which he continued "in all quietness for the space of three years." There is little doubt but that these were the happiest years of his life; and amidst the domestic troubles in which he afterwards found himself involved through the guilelessness and simplicity of his nature, we can well imagine that he must have cast many a wistful backward glance on his quiet career at college, and the peaceful routine of his academic pursuits.

At length, however, from a sense of duty rather than from his own inclination, Hooker entered into sacred orders, and in a very short time received an appointment to preach at Paul's Cross in London. Beside the stipend paid to the preacher upon these occasions, we are told by Walton, that provision was also made for his lodging and diet for two days before and one day after his sermon. The place set apart for his lodging, (called the Shunamite's house,) was kept at this time by a decayed draper, named John Churchman, who, though himself a good sort of man, had for his wife a most artful and designing woman. At this house, two days before the Sunday on which he had to preach, Hooker arrived, "so wet, so weary, and weatherbeaten," says his biographer, "that he was never known to express more passion, than against a friend who dissuaded him from footing it to London, and from finding him no easier a horse." Oppressed with fear and sickness, the good man altogether despaired of being able to preach his Sunday's sermon; but in this extremity he was so carefully nursed by Mrs. Churchman, that he miraculously recovered, and, to his great gratification and surprise, was enabled to perform his allotted duty. His reputation for learning attracted many distinguished auditors; but strong objections were taken by some of those who favoured the theology of Calvin to the principal doctrinal point in his sermon.

"But the justifying of this doctrine," says Walton, "did not prove of so bad consequence as the kindness of Mrs. Churchman's curing him of his late distemper and cold; for that was so gratefully apprehended by Mr. Hooker, that he thought himself bound in conscience to believe all that she said: so that the good man came to be persuaded by her, 'that he was a man of a tender constitution; and that it was best for him to have a wife, that might prove a nurse to him; such an one as might both prolong his life, and make it more comfortable; and such an one she could and would provide for him, if he thought fit to marry.' And he not considering that 'the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light;' but, like a true Nathanael, fearing no guile, because he meant none, did give her such a power as Elcazar was trusted with, (you may read it in the book of Genesis,) when he was sent to choose a wife for Isaac; for, even so he trusted her to choose for him, promising upon a fair summons to return to London, and accept of her choice; and he did so in that or about the year following. Now the wife provided for him was her daughter Joan, who brought him neither beauty nor portion; and for her conditions, they were too like that wife's which is by Solomon compared to a 'dripping house:' so that the good man had no reason to 'rejoice in the wife of his youth,' but too just cause to say with the holy prophet, 'Wo is me, that I am constrained to have my habitation in the tents of Kedar.' The choice of Mr. Hooker's (if it were his choice) may be wondered at; but let us consider that the prophet Ezekiel says, 'There is a wheel within a wheel;' a secret sacred wheel of Providence (most visible in marriages) guided by his hand, that 'allows not the race to the swift,' nor 'bread to the wise,' nor good wives to good men: and he that can bring good out of evil (for mortals are blind to this reason) only knows why this blessing was denied to patient Job, to meek Moses, and to our as meek and patient Mr. Hooker."

Poor Hooker was, indeed, severely punished for his simplicity and credulity. He was not only "drawn from the tranquillity of his college; from that garden of piety, of pleasure, of peace, and a sweet conversation, into the thorny wilderness of a busy world, into those corroding cares that attend a married priest, and a country parsonage;" but he also found himself under the dominion of a vulgar shrew, who took every advantage of his patient and uncomplaining disposition. Mistress Churchman's daughter is described by Wood' as "a clownish silly woman, and withal a mere Xantippe." What a companion for a man of taste and learning like Hooker! With the tyrannical spirit which is the mark of a vulgar nature, she treated him as a mere drudge; and when his pupils, Sandys and Cranmer, visited him at his humble parsonage in Buckinghamshire, they found him with his Horace in his hand, tending a few sheep in a common field, which he told them he was forced to do, "for that his servant was gone home to dine, and assist his wife to do some necessary household business. When his servant returned and released him," continues the biographer, "then his two pupils attended him unto his house, where their best entertainment was his quiet company, which was presently denied them, for Richard was called to rock the cradle; and the rest of their welcome was so like this, that they stayed but till the next morning, which was time enough to discover and pity their tutor's condition." When they departed, Cranmer attempted to console with his worthy master on his uncomfortable position. But the good man only answered, "My dear George, if saints have usually a double share in the miseries of this life, I, that am none, ought not to repine at what my wise Creator hath appointed for me, but labour

(as, indeed, I do daily,) to submit mine to his will, and possess my soul in patience and peace."

On his return to London from this visit, it appears that Sandys, touched with compassion for his old tutor's situation, solicited his father, who had been promoted to the Archbishopric of York, to remove him to a benefice which would afford him a more comfortable subsistence. The archbishop was well disposed to assist the meek and patient divine, and an opportunity for doing it soon arrived. The master of the Temple, Mr. Alvey, was just dead, and being a learned and pious man, his loss was much lamented by the Society. A successor of equal virtue and ability was anxiously desired; and accordingly, being at dinner with the judges, and the reader and benchers of the society, soon after Alvey's death, the archbishop took occasion to mention the name of Hooker, and to utter an earnest commendation of his excellence. The prelate's powerful recommendation procured for Hooker the immediate offer of the important office; but though its advantages were pointed out to him, it was long before he could be prevailed on to accept it. At last his modest scruples were overcome, and on the 17th of March, 1585, being then, says Walton, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, he was, by patent for life, made Master of the Temple.

When Hooker commenced his duties at the Temple Church, he found himself placed in a rather singular predicament. His predecessor, Alvey, had leaned to the Calvinistic doctrines, and upon his death-bed had earnestly recommended as his successor Mr. Walter Travers, a vehement supporter of the same opinions, who at that time filled the office of afternoon preacher. Travers was a learned and eloquent divine; and, under the circumstances, it may be well conceived that the appointment of Hooker was not very palatable to a large section of the gentlemen of the Temple. It was also soon evident that the doctrinal views of the new preacher differed widely from those to which the Temple congregations had been accustomed. On the subject of church discipline, and upon other important topics, the teaching of Hooker was the reverse of that of Travers or Alvey. His theological opinions, though moderately and meekly expressed, were by no means agreeable to those who had been accustomed to the highly seasoned divinity of Geneva. Accordingly, a strange state of circumstances was created by his appointment, which gave rise to some malicious comments. What was preached by Hooker was afterwards confuted, it was said, by Travers; and it became a common observation that "the forenoon sermons at the Temple spake Canterbury, and the afternoon Geneva." But, in the heat of controversy and fierce collision of opinion, it is worthy of remark, that the judicious and charitable Hooker was ever ready to bear his willing testimony to his opponent's piety and learning. His biographers also, however widely opposed to the tenets of Travers, have pursued the same honourable course. Izaak Walton says that he was a man "of competent learning, of winning behaviour, and of a blameless life;"

and Dr. Gauden, (an earlier biographer of Hooker,) in contrasting him with his theological opponent, observes that, "Mr. Travers was a more plausible and profitable preacher to vulgar auditors, as well as more popular, having much more of the oratorian decoy, a pleasing voice, a pathetic pronunciation, and an insinuating fashion or gesture to captivate his auditors by his agreeable presence, vigorous speech, and graceful activity."

It may be observed that this period was regarded as a most critical one in the existence of the Church of England by all those who participated in Hooker's views of ecclesiastical discipline. She had not only to encounter the opposition of the Nonconformists, and the more subtle and formidable hostility of Rome, but within her own pale were many learned and pious men, who dissented from her practice and teaching in some important particulars. During the late era of persecution, when the more zealous Reformers were scattered over the continent, many of them imbibed at Antwerp or Geneva the peculiar theological views which then distinguished most of the foreign from the English partisans of the Reformation. That portentous struggle was yet too recent, and the recollection of the sharp and bitter persecutions of the English Protestants too lively, to permit of separations or divisions, which, in the eyes of prudent and conscientious Reformers, might serve to weaken their ranks against the common enemy. In the Church itself, therefore, at this period, were to be found many divines, who sympathised with Calvin's notions of Church government, as well as with his theological system. With these men Hooker honestly and widely differed, but the peculiar circumstances of the period eminently required, as he well perceived, the exercise of great moderation and discretion. Though forced into the discussion of polemical questions, his controversial writings are altogether free from asperity, and were evidently dictated in a conciliatory spirit. Whilst opposing, for instance, the Calvinistic system, in his beautiful Preface to the Ecclesiastical Polity, (addressed "to them that seek, as they term it, the reformation of the laws and orders ecclesiastical in the Church of England,") he does not omit to pay his tribute of respect to the character of the Genevese Reformer. "A founder it had," he says, "whom, for my own part I think incomparably the wisest man that ever the French Church did enjoy, since the hour it enjoyed him. His bringing up was in the study of the civil law. Divine knowledge he gathered, not by learning or reading so much, as by teaching others. For though thousands were debtors to him, as touching knowledge in that kind; yet he to none but only God, the author of that most blessed fountain, the Book of Life, and of the admirable dexterity of wit, together with the help of other learning, which were his guides."

As a further sample of Hooker's tolerant spirit, as well as of his weighty and dignified style, the following passage, bearing fully upon the subject under our consideration, may be also appropriately quoted from the same preface. "Among ourselves," he says, "there was in King Edward's days some question moved, by reason of a few men's scrupulosity touching certain things. And beyond seas, of them which fled in the days of Queen Mary, some contenting themselves abroad with the use of their own service-book at home authorised before their departure out of the realm; others liking better the Common Prayer Book of the Church of Geneva translated, those smaller contentions before begun were by these means somewhat increased. Under the happy reign of her majesty, which now is, the greatest matter a while contended for, was the wearing of the cap and surplice, till there came Admonitions directed unto the high court of parliament, by men, who concealing their names, thought it glory enough to discover their minds and affections, which now were universally bent even against all the orders and laws, wherein this Church is found unconformable to the platform of Geneva. Concerning the Defender of which Admonitions, all that I mean to say is but this: there will come a time when three words uttered with charity and meekness shall receive a far more blessed reward than three thousand volumes written with disdainful sharpness of wit."

It cannot excite our surprise that in an intolerant age, the principles of intolerance should have been embraced by many Protestant communities. Both within and without the pale of the Establishment, there was in Elizabeth's reign no lack of theologians, who, however distinguished for zeal and piety, were lamentably deficient in Christian charity. Many of the more popular Gospels in England were distinguished for the same spirit which animated Knox in Scotland and Calvin at Geneva. Some of them were positive in asserting that under no circumstances could a Papist be saved, "insomuch," says Walton, "that about this time, at the execution of the Queen of Scots, the bishop that preached her funeral sermon—which was Dr. Howland, then Bishop of Peterborough—was reviled for not being positive for her damnation." It was for maintaining more tolerant and charitable notions, on this and other points, that Hooker was forced into controversy. Exception was taken against him by Travers for having declared in one of his sermons, "that he doubted not but that God was merciful to many of our forefathers living in popish superstition, for as much as they sinned ignorantly." When such a sentiment, however, was selected for attack, Hooker was not backward in justifying the charitable assumption by an irresistible appeal to reason and the Scriptures; and few who have taken the trouble to peruse the summary of his argument will refuse to admit that in logic, if not in declamation, he had the advantage over Travers.

The contest between Hooker and Travers excited at the time much attention, being conducted on both sides with great learning and moderation. At length, Archbishop Whitgift thought it prudent to interfere between the combatants. This prelate had already had some experience of the principles and character of Travers, and of his turbulent carriage at the university. Having regard therefore to the peace of the Establishment, he felt it his duty to prohibit him from preaching; and although Travers, backed by powerful friends, appealed to the Privy Council, he was not able to prevail against the influence of the archbishop.

The dismissal of Travers did not, however, restore tranquillity to Hooker's congregation, and the good man continued to be sorely troubled by the "neglects and oppositions" which he encountered. To relieve his mind, and to provide himself with congenial employment, he resolved to compose a sober treatise on the discipline and authority of the Church; but he found the Temple no fit place for the composition of such a work, requiring, as it did, deep meditation and study. He sighed for the privileges of convenient leisure and undisturbed quietness of spirit, and earnestly longed to exchange the bickerings, jealousies, and heart-burnings of his metropolitan ministry for a quiet country parsonage. In this difficulty he applied to his friend Archbishop Whitgift, and freely stated his case to that great prelate. He told him that he was weary of the noise and oppositions of the Temple, and that God had not intended him for contentions, but for study and quietness. He referred to his contests with Travers, which were the more unpleasant to him because in his conscience he believed him to be a good man, and that belief had induced him to examine deeply into the grounds of his own views of Church discipline, and to consult every authority, human and divine, upon the subject. "And in this examination," he continued, "I have not only satisfied myself, but have begun a treatise in which I intend the satisfaction of others, by a demonstration of the reasonableness of our laws of ecclesiastical polity. But, my lord, I shall never be able to finish what I have begun, unless I be removed into some quiet parsonage, where I may see God's blessing spring out of my mother earth, and eat my own bread in peace and privacy; a place where I may, without disturbance, meditate my approaching mortality, and that great account which all flesh must give at the last day to the God of all spirits."

We know of no passage of English prose more beautiful or affecting than the last sentence of this memorable epistle; and we may observe, by the way, that the clause we have marked with italics has been elegantly applied by the poet Mason to Dr. Hurd, Bishop of Worcester, in the following lines, which refer to the unobtrusive life of that excellent divine before his elevation to the mitre:—

"Whose equal mind could see vain Fortune shower
Her flimsy favours on the fawning crew,
While in low Thurcaston's sequestered bower
She fixed him distant from promotion's view.
Yet, sheltered there by calm contentment's wing,
Pleased he could smile, and with sage Hooker's eye
See from his mother earth God's blessings spring,
And eat his bread in peace and privacy."

Fortunately for Hooker, an opportunity for the gratification of the wish to which he had given such earnest expression soon presented itself to the Archbishop. The rectory of Boscum, in the diocese of Sarum, became vacant, and happening to be in the disposal of the Primate, it was offered to the harassed pastor. The offer was accepted with pious thankfulness, and Hooker immediately quitted the Temple to bury himself in the solitude of a country parsonage. He made good use of his retirement; for during the four years which he passed at Boscum, he completed and published four out of the eight books which he had proposed to write on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. From Boscum Hooker was transferred, in July 1595, to the parsonage of Bishop's Bourne in Kent, three miles from Canterbury. This living, it appears, was in the gift of the Crown, and having become vacant by the elevation of the former Incumbent, (Dr. William Redman,) to the see of Norwich, Queen Elizabeth bestowed it upon Hooker, "whom she loved well," in special acknowledgment of his merit and the services he had rendered to the Church.

At Bourne the good parson passed the remainder of his life in quiet seclusion, his time being fully occupied with the duties of his ministry, (to which he sedulously and conscientiously attended,) and with the composition of his great work. His parsonage being on the high-road from Canterbury to Dover, we are told that many scholars and others who travelled that way turned aside to see the man "whose life and learning were so much admired." But the strangers who were thus admitted to his presence must have marvelled not a little at his aspect and demeanour. His mean and humble appearance was little calculated to inspire the worldly-minded with respect or awe. No personal graces, or assumption of superiority, gave any outward indication of the profound and subtle intellect which he was known to possess. Instead of the dignified ecclesiastic they had pictured to themselves, the curious visitors found, in Izaak Walton's words, "an obscure, harmless man; a man in poor clothes, his loins usually girt in a coarse gown, or canonical coat; of a mean stature, and stooping, and yet more lowly in the thoughts of his soul: his body worn out, not with age, but study and holy mortifications; his face full of heat and pimples, begot by his unactivity and sedentary life." His humility and simplicity of character were still more observable than his careless and unstudied demeanour. Of all men that have ever lived he appears best to have realized the idea of a meek-spirited parish pastor, modest, affable, and learned; pious and self-denying, and ever ready to esteem others better than himself. So mild and humble was his nature, says Walton, "that his poor parish-clerk and he did never talk but with both their hats on, or both off, at the same time: and to this may be added, that though he was not purblind, yet he was short or weak-sighted; and where he fixed his eyes at the beginning of his sermon, there they continued till it was ended: and the reader has a liberty to believe, that his modesty and dim sight were some of the reasons why he trusted Mrs. Churchman to choose his wife."

We are told by Walton that the parish clerk who has been thus incidentally mentioned survived till the third or fourth year of the Long Parliament. For many years after Hooker's death, it had been his duty and delight to point out his master's tomb to strangers who were anxious to see the earthly resting-place of such a man, and at the same time to add his personal testimony to the holiness and humility of his character. "But it so fell out," says Walton, "that about the said third or fourth year of the Long Parliament, the then present parson of Bourne was sequestered,—you may guess why,—and a Genevan minister put into his good living. This, and other like sequestrations, made the clerk express himself in a wonder and say, they had sequestered so many good men, that he doubted if his good master, Mr. Hooker, had lived till now, they would have sequestered him too!"

The name of this veteran parish clerk, as we gather from another source, was Sampson Horton, and it appears from Walton's narrative that he did not long survive the appointment of the "intruding minister." When the sacrament was about to be administered by this worthy, according to the Genevan form, poor Sampson displayed some natural hesitation, and having been called on by the minister "to cease wondering, and lock the church-door," he replied, "Pray take you the keys, and lock me out: I will never come more into this church; for all men will say, my master Hooker was a good man and a good scholar; and I am sure it was not used to be thus in his days;" "and report says," continues Walton, "the old man went presently home and died."

Leaving, with honest Izaak, "this grateful clerk in his quiet grave," we return to his master, Hooker. Notwithstanding the blameless tenor of his life and conversation, the parson of Bourne was not exempt from the usual penalty of exalted excellence—the liability to slander and malicious misrepresentation. An attempt was made to take advantage of his constitutional timidity by circulating, for the purposes of extortion, a slanderous report, deeply affecting his character as a Christian minister, but the plot was unravelled and exposed by his friends Sandys and Cranmer, and the conspirators brought to condign punishment. The accusation which was made against him was one which none of those who knew him could have credited for an instant; but party feelings then ran high, and it is hinted that the slander was invented by a dissenting brother, who endured not Church ceremonies, and hated him for his book's sake.¹ However this may be, it is worthy of remark that as soon as his character was fully vindicated, Hooker at once forgot and forgave the wrongs he had suffered. He even endeavoured to procure the pardon of the guilty wretches who had slandered him, and he would often afterwards, it is said, exclaim to his friend, Dr. Saravia, "Oh! with what quietness did I enjoy my soul, after I was free from the fears of my slander!"

(1) Walton.

And how much more after a conflict and victory over my desires of revenge!"

In the year 1597, Hooker published the fifth book of his Ecclesiastical Polity, and to the day of his death he was busily occupied in the composition of the remaining portion of the work. When overtaken by a sharp sickness, about the year 1600, it was his constant prayer that he might live to finish what he had so well begun. And so great was his anxiety, so earnest his labour and study, that it has been said, "he hastened his own death, by hastening to give life to his books." When, only a few days before his decease, his house was robbed, on being informed of the occurrence, says Walton, his only question was, "Are my books and written papers safe?" And being informed that they were, his reply was, "Then it matters not; for no other loss can trouble me."

We must not omit to state that the good man's termagant wife survived him; and though habit possibly enabled him to endure her tyranny with patience, yet it is very evident that he enjoyed through life but a slight share of domestic felicity. It is plain, that this vulgar woman, feeling no interest in his pursuits, being utterly unable to comprehend or appreciate his character, and taking advantage of his yielding and gentle nature, treated him with studied unkindness and contempt. Upon Hooker's death, without waiting "a comely time to bewail her widowhood," she married again; but this second marriage she did not live long enough to repent of, for she died within four months after she became a widow. It has been said that a precious manuscript of the last three books of the Ecclesiastical Polity, completed and carefully revised by her husband, was destroyed through her carelessness and ignorance. Having been sent for to Lambeth by Archbishop Whitgift, about three months subsequently to her husband's death, she is stated to have confessed, after some friendly questioning, that "one Mr. Charke," (whom Wood describes as a "noted puritan,") "and another misister that dwelt near Canterbury, came to her, and desired that they might go into her husband's study, and look upon some of his writings; and that there they two burnt and tore many of them, assuring her that they were writings not fit to be seen."¹ The morning after making this statement, the unworthy helpmate of our great divine was found dead in her bed, at her lodgings in King Street, Westminster. It is added that her new husband was "suspected and questioned" about her death, but was subsequently declared innocent, and discharged.

It is pleasant to turn from the contemplation of this woman's fate, to the account which has been handed down to us of Hooker's death-bed. His behaviour in the last trying scene of all, and the dying utterances of his parting spirit, were in beautiful accordance with the wisdom and purity of his life. On the great theme to which he had dedicated so much of his attention, he continued to meditate as long as his soul lingered upon earth. When, on the day of his death, it was observed by his friend Saravia, that he appeared to be "deep in contemplation, and not inclinable to discourse," and a request was made that he should disclose what was passing in his mind, he is said to have replied, "That he was meditating the number and nature of angels, and their blessed obedience and order, without which peace could not be in heaven: and ah! that it might be so on earth." His last recorded words also prove the direction of his thoughts, and the chief aim and aspiration of his heart. "I could wish," he said, "to live to do the Church more service; but cannot hope it, for my days are passed as a shadow that returneth not." Such were Hooker's dying words. "More he would have spoken," says his estimable biographer, "but his spirits failed him; and after a short conflict between nature and death, a quiet sigh put a period to his last breath, and so he fell asleep. And now he seems to rest like Lazarus in Abraham's bosom."

Hooker's great work on the Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity is justly considered, in a literary point of view, one of the most remarkable productions of a most remarkable period. It has the reputation of being the first work in our language which affords an example of strict, continuous reasoning, logically arranged and methodized. Every sentence appears to have been carefully weighed, and demands the reader's whole attention. From the first page to the last, it is full of weighty matter, which requires for its perfect comprehension patient and deliberate study. It is one of the few books, which, in Lord Bacon's words, require "to be chewed and digested," and, "to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention." Regarded merely as a monument of erudition—of exact and varied learning—we should consider it deserving of attention, were it not that its claim to distinction rests upon higher grounds than an ambitious parade of authorities, or display of scholarship.

It would have been incredible if such a work had not, in the author's lifetime, excited the attention, and extorted the approbation of the learned. Its publication was an era in the history of theological investigation, and it is no wonder that its fame soon spread through Europe. Soon after the first four books had been given to the world, the attention of Pope Clement VIII. was called to them, by a learned Englishman of the Romish faith, who boasted that though "he had never met with an English book, whose writer deserved the name of an author, yet there now appeared a wonder to them, and it would be so to his Holiness if it were in Latin;" and what was more surprising than all, this learned work, so grave, logical, and majestic, that in style and matter it had never been surpassed, was the production of a "poor, obscure English priest!" At the Pope's request, the same learned Englishman read to his Holiness, in Latin, some portions of the Ecclesiastical Polity, and at the end of the first book, the Pontiff is said to have remarked:—"There is no learning that this man hath not searched into, nothing too hard for his understanding: this man indeed deserves the name of an author. His books will get reverence by age; for there is in them such seeds of eternity, that, if the rest be like this, they shall last till the last fire shall consume all learning."

In addition to its high reputation as a model of argumentative composition, there is another point of view in which the ecclesiastical polity of Hooker is interesting to the English student. It affords us a curious and valuable example of the weighty and majestic style which was in vogue among the learned in Elizabeth's days. The idiom, as it has been remarked, is that of the Latin rather than the English language. It abounds with long, involved, and intricate sentences, framed upon the classical models, and requiring to be construed with care and attention. On the other hand, in the choice of words, Hooker appears to have been singularly happy. For precision and propriety of expression he has no equal in the language. The character of massive strength belongs emphatically to all his writings. They speak to us with a tone of grave authority which commands respect, even where the assent of the understanding may be withheld. As a brief illustration of our remarks, we would take the first sentence of the first book of the "Ecclesiastical Polity," which is no doubt familiar to many of our readers—"He that goeth about to persuade a multitude that they are not so well governed as they ought to be, shall never want attentive and favourable hearers; because they know the manifold defects whereunto every kind of regiment is subject, but the secret lets and difficulties, which in public proceedings are innumerable and inevitable they have not ordinarily the judgment to consider."

The following remarks on the influence of music, and the propriety of employing it for devotional purposes, appear to us highly characteristic of Hooker's style, and from their intrinsic excellence well worthy of citation:—"In harmony, the very image and character, even of virtue and vice, is perceived, the mind delighted with their resemblances, and brought, by having them often iterated, into a love of the things themselves. For which cause there is nothing more contagious and pestilent than some kinds of harmony; than some, nothing more strong and potent unto good. And that there is such a difference of one kind from another, we need no proof but our own experience, inasmuch as we are at the hearing of some more inclined unto sorrow and heaviness, of some more mollified and softened in mind; one kind apter to stay and settle us, another to move and stir our affections; there is that draweth to a marvellous grave and sober mediocrity; there is also that carrieth, as it were, into ecstasies, filling the mind with a heavenly joy, and for the time in a manner severing it from the body; so that, although we lay altogether aside the consideration of ditty or matter, the very harmony of sounds being framed in due sort, and carried from the ear to the spiritual faculties of our souls, is, by a native puissance and efficacy, greatly available to bring to a perfect temper whatsoever is there troubled; apt as well to quicken the spirits as to allay that which is too eager; sovereign against melancholy and despair; forcible to draw forth tears of devotion, if the mind be such as can yield them; able to move and to moderate all affections. . . . They must have hearts very dry and tough, from whom the melody of the psalms doth not sometime draw that wherein a mind religiously affected delighteth."

It is impossible to read through Hooker's great work without meeting with many pithy and pregnant passages, which might be profitably brought to the reader's notice, but our limits forbid the insertion of any lengthened extracts. One or two brief specimens, however, of his forcible and peculiar manner, selected at random, we are tempted to subjoin to this notice.

IMAGINATION.

"The mind, while we are in this present life, whether it contemplate, meditate, deliberate, or howsoever exercise itself, worketh nothing without continual recourse unto imagination, the only store-house of wit and peculiar chair of memory. On this anvil it ceaseth not day and night to strike, by means whereof, as the pulse declareth how the heart doth work, so the very thoughts and cogitations of man's mind, be they good or bad, do nowhere sooner bewray themselves, than through the crevices of that wall wherewith nature hath compassed the cells and closets of fancy."

OBSERVANCE OF RELIGIOUS FESTIVALS.

"That which the head of all philosophers hath said of women, 'If they be good the half of the commonwealth is happy wherein they are,' the same we may fitly apply to [festival] times; well to celebrate these religious and sacred days is to spend the flower of our time happily. They are the splendour and outward dignity of our religion, forcible witnesses of ancient truth, provocations to the exercise of all piety, shadows of an endless felicity in heaven, on earth everlasting records and memorials, wherein they which cannot be drawn to hearken unto that which we teach, may only by looking upon that we do, in a manner read whatsoever we believe."

SIGNIFICATION OF THE WEDDING-RING.

"The ring hath been always used as an especial pledge of faith and fidelity. Nothing more fit to serve as a token of our purposed endless continuance in that which we never ought to revoke. This is the cause wherefore the heathens themselves did in such cases use the ring, whereunto Tertullian alluding saith, that in ancient times, 'No woman was permitted to wear gold save only upon one finger, which her husband had fastened unto himself with that ring which was usually given for assurance of future marriage.' The cause why the Christians use it, as some of the fathers think, is either to testify mutual love, or rather to serve for a pledge of conjunction in heart and mind agreed upon between them. But what rite and custom is there so harmless wherein the wit of man lending itself to derision, may not easily find out somewhat to scorn and jest at? He that should have beheld the Jews when they stood with a four-cornered garment spread over the head of espoused couples, while their espousals were in making, he that should have beheld their praying over a cup, and their delivering the same at the marriage feast, with set forms of benediction as the order amongst them was, might being lewdly affected, take thereat as just occasion of scornful cavil as at the use of the ring in wedlock among Christians."

UNDUE IMPORTANCE, ATTACHED TO PREACHING.

"There is crept into the minds of men at this day, a secret pernicious and pestilent conceit, that the greatest perfection of a Christian man, doth consist in discovery of other men's faults, and in wit to discourse of our own profession. When the world most abounded with just, righteous, and perfect men, their chiefest study was the exercise of piety, wherein for their safest direction they reverently hearkened to the readings of the law of God, they kept in mind the oracles and aphorisms of wisdom which tended unto virtuous life, if any scruple of conscience did trouble them for matter of actions which they took in hand, nothing was attempted before counsel and advice were had, for fear lest rashly they might offend. We are now more confident, not that our knowledge and judgment is riper, but because our desires are another way. Their scope was obedience, ours is skill; their endeavour was reformation of life, our virtue nothing but to hear gladly the reproof of vice; they in the practice of their religion wearied chiefly their knees and hands, we especially our ears and tongues. We are grown, as in many things else so in this, to a kind of intemperance, which (only sermons excepted) hath almost brought all other duties of religion out of taste. At the least they are not in that account and reputation they should be."

Of Hooker's dispute with Travers we have already spoken at some length, and to his controversial writings it is therefore unnecessary for us to make further reference. But a few admirable sermons are contained in his collected works, which are too characteristic of his disposition and genius to be passed over without a separate notice. In his public preaching, Hooker sedulously avoided the use of florid metaphors and dazzling rhetoric. Nor was he remarkable for the headlong earnestness of manner which distinguished the more popular preachers of the period. His discourses were in general plain but elaborate efforts of reasoning, delivered with suitable simplicity and gravity. In describing the performance of his ministerial duties at Bourne, Izaak Walton informs us that "his sermons were neither long nor earnest, but uttered with a grave zeal, and a humble voice: his eyes always fixed on one place, to prevent his imagination from wandering; insomuch that he seemed to study as he spake." The discourses which have come down to us are, as the reader may surmise, no common performances, and are characterised by the same solidity of structure which distinguishes his larger work. Many beautiful passages may be selected from them, and with one or two of those which have struck us most in a hasty perusal, we conclude this brief and imperfect sketch of the life and character of Richard Hooker.

Our first extract is from "A learned Sermon on the nature of Pride."—"I am not afraid to affirm it boldly with St. Augustine, that men puffed up through a proud opinion of their own sanctity and holiness, receive a benefit at the hands of God, and are assisted with his grace, when with his grace they are not assisted, but permitted, and that grievously to transgress; whereby, as they were in over-great liking of themselves supplanted, so the dislike of that which did supplant them may establish them afterwards the surer. Ask the very soul of Peter, and it shall undoubtedly make you itself this answer: My eager protestations, made in the glory of my ghostly strength, I am ashamed of; but those crystal tears wherewith my sin and weakness was bewailed, have procured my endless joy; my strength hath been my ruin, and my fall my stay."

From the same sermon we extract the following noble sentences on the nature and excellency of justice. "Slightly to touch a thing so needful most exactly to be known, were towards justice itself to be unjust. Wherefore I cannot let slip so fit an occasion to wade herein somewhat further than perhaps were expedient, unless both the weightiness and hardness of the matter itself did urgently press therunto. Justice, that which flourishing upholdeth, and not prevailing disturbeth, shaketh, threateneth with utter desolation and ruin the whole world: justice, that whereby the poor have their succour, the rich their ease, the potent their honour, the living their peace, the souls of the righteous departed their endless rest and quietness: justice, that which God and angels and men are principally exalted by: justice, the chiefest matter contended for at this day in the Christian world: in a word, justice, that whereon not only all our present happiness, but in the kingdom of God our future joy dependeth. So that, whether we be in love with the one or with the other, with things present or things to come, with earth or with heaven; in that which is so greatly available to both, none can but wish to be instructed."

Our concluding quotation is from a Funeral Sermon, entitled, "A remedy against sorrow and fear."

"The death of the saints of God is precious in his sight. And shall it seem unto us superfluous at such times as these are to hear in what manner they have ended their lives? The Lord himself hath not disdained so exactly to register in the book of life after what sort his servants have closed up their days on earth, that he descendeth even to their very meanest actions, what meat they have longed for in their sickness, what they have spoken unto their children, kinsfolk, and friends, where they have willed their dead carcasses to be laid, how they have framed their wills and testaments, yea, the very turning of their faces to this side or that, the setting of their eyes, the degrees whereby their natural heat hath departed from them, their cries, their groans, their pantings, breathings, and last gaspings, he hath most solemnly commended unto the memory of all generations. The care of the living both to live and to die well must needs be somewhat increased, when they know that their departure shall not be folded up in silence, but the ears of many be made acquainted with it. . . . Howbeit, because to spend herein many words would be to strike even as many wounds into their minds whom I rather wish to comfort: therefore concerning this virtuous gentlewoman only this little I speak, and that of knowledge, 'She lived a dove and died a lamb.' And if amongst so many virtues, hearty devotion towards God, towards poverty tender compassion, motherly affection towards servants, towards friends even serviceable kindness, mild behaviour and harmless meaning towards all; if, where so many virtues were eminent, any be worthy of special mention, I wish her dearest friends of that sex to be her nearest followers in two things: silence, saving only where duty did exact speech; and patience, even then when extremity of pains did enforce grief."

SYDNEY SMITH, in London, was shown a lump of American ice, upon which he remarked, "that he was glad to see anything solvent come from America."

THERE is no saying shocks me so much as that which I hear very often, "that a man does not know how to pass his time." It would have been but ill-spoken by Methuselah, in the nine hundred and sixty-ninth year of his life.—Cowley.

PAST AND FUTURE.

ANNABEL C.—

MEMORY.

DEEM not in its hour of birth
Joy hath left the earth;
Or that its glory cannot last,
When the hour is past.

For, however dear and close
To your heart it rose,
Memory makes it far more bright;
Haloes it with light.

Raindrops, they are very fair
In the cloudy air;
But,—the sun upon his way,—
How much fairer they!

Like those drops our joys are, when Present to our ken;
Memory, like the sun, will cast
Brightness o'er the past.

HOPE.

HOPE—hope on!
Hope is my motto still!
And that single word is one
Can shield from a world of ill.

Dark may the morning be,
Sunless, and sad, and cold;
Yet beauty may we see
Or ever the day be old.

Like a steady star that shines
Through an alley of forest trees,
And ever, betwixt their lines,
Its light the traveller sees:

So, with shining Hope before,
Joyfully pass we on;
Troubles we see no more:
We see but the light alone.

THE MORMON PROPHET.

(Founded on a recent fact.)

ONE lovely day, at noon, in August 1850, the inhabitants of the little village of R— in Lincolnshire were unusually astir. Groups of men and boys in working attire might have been seen collected here and there. Women lingered on the threshold of their dwellings, unwilling, by an attention to their domestic avocations, to lose one iota of that piquant dish, called scandal, which, "in ev'ry age, in ev'ry clime," appears so well to suit the feminine palate. The appearance of two strange horsemen, approaching this out-of-the-way village, slightly diversified the attention of our rustic dramatis personæ, until now wholly engrossed with a more immediate object of interest. Let us follow the example of the good people of R—, and take a glance at their physiognomy and appearance. The elder of these equestrians possessed a visage at once striking and unprepossessing. Intellect marred by low cunning—fanaticism mingled with, if not overpowered by, hypocrisy—lips that vainly endeavoured to curb an habitual contemptuous smile—eyes now flashing with scornful pride, now raised to heaven with an air of sanctified humility,—such were the prevailing characteristics of his countenance. His dress, without being remarkable for singularity, was arranged more for effect than in accordance with the prevailing fashion of the day. His companion formed a pleasing contrast to this repelling personage. He was young and handsome; his features more expressive of good-nature than common sense, and he evidently appertained to a class common enough in agricultural districts, wealthy gentleman-farmers.

"Dreaming still of the beautiful unbeliever!" exclaimed the elder, in a voice more powerful than melodious; "can unutterable bliss be obtained without sacrifice?"

"Sacrifice!" retorted the young man, "sacrifice! Was it nothing, think you, to leave childless an aged mother? nothing to relinquish my own true-hearted Marion? Nothing?—and for what? to—"

"Patience, my son," interrupted the first speaker, "this day—the voice of the Most High has proclaimed it to me—this day shall the truth be made manifest; powerful as the whirlwind when it rushes headlong on its course, pure as the drops that glisten in the sun, boundless as the expanse of the starry worlds, eternal as the city of the Lord. Yes, my pupil," he continued in an elevated tone, "this day shall thy future destiny be decided—this day shall prove me a prophet or a deceiver."

As he concluded these words, they entered the one long solitary street of R—.

"Hollo!" he cried, as he reined in his horse at the Rose and Crown, which from time immemorial had enjoyed a state of single blessedness as the sole inn of the village. "What! all the world turned holiday-seekers? Alas! poor misguided mortals, groping in darkness—"

His pathetic exordium was here unfortunately curtailed by the shrill voice of an old woman in a flaming red cloak, who, in that musical (?) patois, impossible to be conveyed upon paper, peculiar to the rustic denizens of fenny Lincolnshire, exclaimed,

"Thee maunna gang there, mon; yow'll be clean left to shift for yoursen."

"And why, my good woman?"

"Good woman, forsooth! none o' your gammins here. Take my word and ride off from that ere bad-luckit 'ouse;" and the "good woman," having delivered this mysterious injunction, drew her scarlet robe more closely around her, to screen her person, we presume, from the scorching rays of the sun, and slowly hobbled away.

"What's all this about?" cried our pious friend, waxing more wrathful than became his saintly character; "call the master; our horses are tired out. What's the matter with the house?"

"Why, sir," answered a boy in a smock who stood at the horse's head; "why, sir, there be a dead mon in th' 'ouse, and," he added in a whisper, "our Mag says as how there was summut wrong."

"Fools!" said the traveller, turning to his young companion, whom we will call Philip Rivers; "let us alight, and solve the mystery for ourselves," and suiting the action to the word, he sprang from his saddle, and quietly led his horse beneath the old-fashioned portal of the inn. Philip followed. Boniface soon appeared, but with none of that smiling visage or honeyed speech which usually distinguishes nine host. No bills of fare were in his hand, no praise of forthcoming dainties on his lips; all he brought into the presence of our travellers was a countenance as woe-begone as generally greets a hand-cuff or a sheriff's officer.

"How now, my friend," said the senior equestrian, "does death so rarely visit your fellow-villagers, that his sudden appearance causes such great sensation?"

"'Tis an awful business, sir," said the publican, who seemed superior to his station; "but walk in, gentlemen, walk in, and if you would hear the history and give a word of advice, why there's none would be so grateful as Sam Winter—that is myself."

"Let us accept his proffered confidence," whispered the Mormon priest; "inscrutable are the ways of God; who can say—but let us enter."

For the benefit of our readers we will condense the loquacious Sam Winter's narrative into a few words. A stranger had arrived there yesterday evening, had retired to rest, and that morning been found lifeless in his bed.

"It wasn't only his dying," continued the discon-solate inn-keeper, "though that was bad enough, for never a body would sleep in the room again if they heerd on't, but I have imities in the place, and Bessie Walters and Bill Jowler" (and a host of other rusticated cognomens,) "had spread it about there must be something wrong in so sudden a death. What can I do?"

"Is there no clergyman," inquired Philip, "that could have advised you in the matter?"

"Clergyman!" echoed Sam Winter, "sorrow a bit of a parson do we see here 'cept on the Sunday; he lives at t'other village."

"Are there no medical men within reach?" pursued Philip.

"Lor bless your honour!" cried Sam, "and who'd pay for a dead man's doctor's stuff? and I've been so flurried like, and my missus" (anglice, wife,) "is away, but I'll send Joe at once, that I will," and he hastened to the door.

"Stay!" exclaimed the Mormon, "stay, and witness the power of the prophet of the Lord, the dead restored to life. But first I would see the corpse—lead on."

His voice was commanding, his manner impressive; in a few moments he was ushered into the chamber of the dead. The body of the unfortunate man was stretched upon the couch; a few straggling beams that forced a way through the closed shutters fell upon his countenance, from which all colour had fled; the lips and face were fearful from the very intensity of their pallor, the eyelids were firmly closed, and the night-dress in which the body was still arrayed, seemed like the shroud ready to enclose those rigid and lifeless limbs.

"Nothing is impossible to a priest of Jerusalem," said the soi-disant prophet; "to his prayer everything is conceded; heaven and earth before it bend. Go, assemble your friends, your neighbours; let all behold the miracle, let all rejoice and believe."

It took some time before Sam Winter could fully comprehend what was required of him, but the gapers outside were speedy in obeying the summons "to come and see a strange gentleman bring the dead man to life." The apartment, which was tolerably large, was soon crowded with spectators. We will spare you, gentle readers, the prophet's oration; it was, like his ordinary conversation, more replete with fine sounding verbiage than common sense, but it told upon his simple and illiterate hearers, as was soon manifest by the awe-stricken countenances of all his auditors. All, did we say? No! there was one sturdy-looking fellow, Jim the butcher, a perfect personification of John Bull, who, with arms akimbo, stood eyeing the preacher with a look of irreverent unfriendliness.

"Now," said he, when our friend the prophet had concluded, "I be no scholar; I be a plain-spoken mon, but I'd loike to ask you a question or so. You say as how you can make that ere deede body alive agin?"

"Yes!" exclaimed the Mormon, resuming his oratorical voice and gestures; "yes! at my command those eyes shall open to the light, those pallid lips shall smile and speak, the blood shall once more warmly flow through those motionless limbs, the spirit of life again shall animate the clay."

"Well," continued the imperturbable butcher; "but if I was to chop off an arm of his'n, would he come to life wi'out his arm?"

"Assuredly," answered the prophet.

"And if I chop off his leg, would he come to life then?"

"Assuredly," was again the laconic reply; "but we waste time—let us pray."

"Stop a wee bit," pursued the butcher; "if I chop off his heede, would he come to life then, eh?"

"Certainly, my friend; all is possible to the prophet of Jerusalem."

"Then I'll do it," cried Jim, in a thundering voice, pushing his way to the head of the couch, and raising his cleaver in the air; "here goes."

"Hollo! hollo!" shrieked the dead man, jumping up; "I'd rather not have my head chopped off this bout, any how."

The spectators, men, women, and children, screamed wildly, and threw one another down in their haste to depart. In an incredibly short time, mine host, the butcher, and Philip Rivers were alone left with the ex-corpse. Jim, laughing heartily, approached the resuscitated man, and seizing him, exclaimed,—

"Now, measter, we'll put a bit polish on yer face," and lo! a few energetic rubs transferred the chalk from that worthy's face to Jim's blue apron. But where is the prophet? Has he not remained to witness this wonderful resurrection? No; the sagacious Mormon, finding that instead of a bevy of dupes he had caught a Tartar, hastily decamped in the general confusion, and his confederate, thus left in the lurch, confessed the whole conspiracy. It is almost unnecessary to add, that after this occurrence no Mormon ever again ventured even the shadow of his nose in R——, and Philip Rivers, for whose edification this little episode had principally been concocted, returned to his home a wiser and a happier man. The last we heard of him was his marriage with his fair Marion, and doubtless he finds matrimonial bliss the best safeguard against the seductions of religious fanatics, and we would counsel all whose heads are a little inclined to be led by the last newfangled doctrine, to follow his example.

JOY AND GRIEF.

BY J. M. W.

"No joy so great but runneth to an end,
No hap so hard but may in time amend."

R. SOUTHWELL.

WHAT melancholy, and, yet, what consolation in that couplet of the old poet! It contains within its simple rhyme the secret of life's greatest sadness—the instability of earthly happiness; and it shows that property of good in all things evil which makes the evil tolerable to the most impatient and insubordinate spirit, and profitable, in a high degree, to the patient and obedient. Let us think a little about these things. It will help to remind us, in the midst of the cares and turmoils of the world, that we are not altogether "of the earth, earthy," unless we choose to forego our glorious privilege of an inheritance in the kingdom of heaven.

That in human speech there is the word joy—that in the human heart there is the emotion which that word expresses—these considerations alone should make a man religious. Surely no one can feel deep gladness in his heart and be an infidel, or a sceptic. He must be grateful for the blessing of existence, hopeful for its continuance, and trustful in that higher power without whose gracious providence he could not be, or hope, or enjoy. There never yet was a happy infidel.

Some of us—many of us—know the full meaning of that word, joy. How beautiful! How bright it is! Supersensuous, supernatural, celestial!—yet terrestrial, natural, sensuous, too! That joy which, as Coleridge says,

—"ne'er is given

Save to the pure, and in their purest hour."

Oh! who can doubt that the being who has felt this—who is endowed with faculties to appreciate its beauty and its glory—who feels instinctively that in God only can there be the fulness and perfection of joy—who can doubt, I say, that such a being is destined by his Creator to a joyful immortality?

I say these things because it seems to me that we do not sufficiently cultivate a joyous spirit in ourselves and in those around us. We fear to rejoice; we have not faith enough to hope, nor hope enough to be joyful. We, in this country, are too apt to associate an idea of frivolity and shallowness of mind with any outward manifestation of gladness in adults; we are by nature more prone to gloom than to gaiety, and we increase our natural tendency by our social institutions and personal habits, and by our philosophy and religion. Our greatest living philosopher, who necessarily embodies in his works a great portion of the philosophy and semi-philosophy of the thinkers of the age, has declared that "the highest religion is a religion of sorrow." Surely, surely, this is not the truest truth. Is there not a higher religion than the religion of sorrow, if haply we may attain unto it—the religion of calm pure joy? I do not say, I do not think, I dare not hope, that many of us, in a generation, can attain to this highest spiritual state possible to earthly existence; but I say that it is our duty to strive after its attainment, and to recognise always that it is the summum bonum—that for which we are and were created. We ourselves may be doomed to struggle for ever in this life with sin and sorrow; and though the struggle may in time bring us strength and purity, yet we may never be strong enough and pure enough to stand fast in our inward joy; that blessing may only come to us in another stage of existence; yet is it our highest duty as well as our greatest privilege to hope that it may come in this, and to throw all our energies upon that hope, that it may animate our every action. That is the true Christian state. All the great sufferers for the sake of Christianity, (St. Paul at their head,) have taught us that sorrow is probationary merely, that joy is the ultimate element of the Christian life, and that we are to "rejoice evermore." May not this be the sense in which man is said to be made but a little lower than the angels, that he is gifted with the faculty of rejoicing? For we must remember that the joy here spoken of presupposes love. If, therefore, it be true that joy is a thing to be desired by man for its own sake and for God's, it cannot but be good for us to occupy our minds as often as possible with the consideration of its beauty, to seek to possess it, and to learn to reject all false and insubstantial joys, which serve only to deaden our power of appreciating those which are true. The fanatic and the bigot stigmatise as snares of Satan many a God-given blessing, and to them all joy connected with earth and human beings is false and unsubstantial. Not so to the true Christian. He dare not think that a man is more pure than God; or cast back His gifts, crying, "Unclean! unclean! I will not suffer my heart to be stirred to gladness by any earthly good." Once for all, let us remember the words of the Psalmist, "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." Yea, the earth is the Lord's; and we shall help to keep the devil out of it if we recognise the fact that he has no right to be master here, and that we have the power, if we have the will, to drive him out of our own little portion. There is no surer weapon against the spirit of evil than true joy in all its forms.

Let us dwell for a few moments on the nature of joy, as we have been allowed to know it here on earth. What glory! What brilliancy! What a perfume, as of the breath of angels, has it shed over the world within us and without! Blessed are they upon whose souls it has come down, once or twice in a lifetime, like a divine afflatus. For a brief space,—a day,—a few hours,—a single hour, perhaps, we have been as gods, lifted above the earth by its power, gifted for the moment with the faculty of seeing nothing but order and light in the universe—the prince of the powers of darkness having vanished utterly into nonentity for us, goodness, love, and beauty encompassed our souls. It is then that we are most confident that our souls are immortal; that there is, indeed, a far higher state of existence for us, a state in which this joy will be permanent. The light of this surpassing glory once shed upon us never wholly leaves us; it lingers round the memory, it warms the heart, and it gives intensity to our prayers and thanksgivings; we feel that God has vouchsafed to us a revelation of the joy prepared in heaven for them that love Him.

Some joys come upon us gradually, rolling slowly on, gathering force and beauty as they proceed, till they sweep over our souls like a huge wave over the pebbles on the beach, stirring them till they give out music. Others burst upon us suddenly, like the sun on a gloomy day; and we almost lose our breath, or shed tears at the surprise, and shrink from the contrast with the previous sadness of our life. Others again, are so delicate and intangible that they will not bear expression; so fleeting, that before you can say to yourself, "Lo! this is indeed a joy!" it has passed away. It would seem that such short-lived joys are peculiarly dear to the memory. You feel that what there was scarcely time to enjoy in the reality you can preserve sacred, there, in the stronghold of memory, and recur to whenever you please. All true joy is bright. There are many sweet pleasures which are not joys, properly speaking, though they have somewhat of chastened joy in them; these grave and melancholy pleasures I do not take into consideration now. Perhaps the brightest of all earthly joys is the joy that is born of love. Love is seldom all joy, as most of us know. It is a bitter-sweet, a lovely terror, a melancholy bliss to many; but all who have ever loved and been beloved—no matter what their condition, position, education, mental calibre—have known what true joy means. The best organized, the highest gifted individuals know it the best, because they love the most; but all can feel such a simple truth as Emerson has happily cast into a poetic form thus:—

"Deep, deep are loving eyes
Flow'd with naphtha, fiery sweet,
And the point is Paradise
Where their glances meet."

Perhaps there are few joys on earth superior in intensity and purity to that meeting of loving eyes. It is perfect in its kind. There are, again, certain looks and tones which the memory treasures as its most precious deposits. These were joys which, earthly as their causes may seem to uninterested observers, were still to the enjoyers themselves unmistakable evidence that they were capable of a far greater amount of felicity; that they could do and be better than their past existence showed; and they yearned towards heaven with an infinite longing. In the joy that is born of love—that beautiful human love which shadows forth dimly the divine—we feel more strongly than in almost any emotion that our faculties are infinite, and that disbelief in their immortality is rank absurdity. A soul so richly endowed, so full of longings after the infinite and eternal love, and joy, and peace, which it can but faintly conceive, but in which, during its best, i. e. its joyous moments, it believes fully,—such a soul could not be created merely to animate a cunningly fashioned tabernacle of flesh for seventy years.

There is nothing of intoxication in the spiritual joy of which I speak. It is thoroughly sane, conscious, and acutely intelligent. It is good for us, intellectually as well as morally, to rejoice. It makes us cleverer as well as better. When the highest joy passes like a divine breath into our souls, we are rapt in an ecstasy; but we do not become wild and insane, like the Pythia or the Bacchante of old Greece, swayed we know not how, or by what, and giving utterance to that which we do not understand, and of which we have no recollection when the fit is over. No; the highest form of joy makes the recipient intensely conscious of its presence. The unconscious, thoughtless joy of childhood or early youth is a far inferior thing to that "sober certainty of waking bliss" which comes to the full-grown man when a great joy is vouchsafed him. He knows that he is happy; and if others could see into his heart, (which they cannot, for a "stranger meddleth not with its joy,") they would be inclined to envy him for "being too happy in his happiness."

All great and universal truths are poetic; they are also bifrontal, and look into us from two sides, if we can turn our minds to inspect them. It has been said by many a poet in ancient and in modern days, that—

"A sorrow's crown of sorrow, is remembering happier things."

Thus truth looks at us with another face sometimes; and then we learn that the recollection of past joy is very different from sorrow. Pure joy, as has been said, is an ecstatic sanity. Bee-like, it stores up honey from its present summer abundance, to meet the dull, cold winter of discontent that must follow. The very young rarely think of laying up in the memory a joy for the days of solitude and heart-desolation,—they have not learned to anticipate them; therein consists the beauty of youth. But when that is gone, when we have begun to look before and after,—when we stand on the utmost margin of that golden land, and must go onward to maturity,—then, when a great joy visits our soul, suddenly, in the midst of that joy—ay, in the very palpitating centre of the heart of it—we hear a voice, a melancholy warning tone, which whispers, "Mark it well! Take note of it! It is transitory—it will never come again! But its memory will be a blessing in the far-off coming years!" Thus it is that the thoughtful prudent soul squanders no fraction of its happiness; it makes memory thrifty; and when the brightest flowers of life begin to fade, she is compelled to preserve them in a sort of hortus siccus. Alas! for the colour and the perfume! Which is best then?—the thoughtless, bird-like joy of childhood, which does not recognise its own bliss, or the joy of maturity, conscious, rapturous, yet dashed with the thought that it must pass away? Let each answer this question according to his own nature. I, for my part, hesitate not, one moment, to choose the latter. Ever let me have, "though full of pain," "this intellectual being." And, though I sigh over the portrait, let me recognise the truth and beauty of the likeness dashed off in this one masterly line—

"Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips, Bidding adieu,"

But, to return. How are we to reconcile these apparently adverse truths which have been stated above? How is it that all true, pure joy rouses the soul to a keen sense of its immortality, inasmuch as joy is the very essence of eternal life; and, at the same time, we know and feel that all joy here below is transitory—that there is "no joy so great but runneth to an end?" How shall we reconcile them? Ah! easily enough. If this world's good—if its bright, fleeting, ecstatic joys could be made permanent—what would be the result? Either we should become supine and contented with our present stage of existence, hoping and caring for nothing beyond it, or we should grow, at length, so accustomed to joy that it would become a matter of indifference to us. Our spirits are too weak to endure a permanent state of joy; it is a sort of moral oxygen which, if inhaled unmixed, would consume us very fast. We must become much stronger ere we can bear a continuity of joy. The most melancholy part of the fact, that there is "no joy so great but runneth to an end," is the consideration that the end of the joy comes as often from our inability to keep on enjoying, as from the removal of the cause of joy.

The great joys of life, glorious and elevating as they are, should not make us regardless of the small blessings, which steal down gently like the dew from heaven, and make us able to bear the burden and heat of another day. Great joys, like all great things in this world, are rare. Iliads are not written in every generation, Niagaras do not pour forth in every petty principality; and that joy, which, like the Iliad and Niagara, speaks to us most distinctly of the glory and power of the Creator, and of our capacity for living in and for Him, does not come more than once or twice in a life-time. Let us therefore value highly the small blessings of life. This thought leads us to the second part of our subject; for the removal of grief is in itself a joy.

"No hap so hard but may in time amend."

In the first pangs of a strong grief we cannot remember this; and though we have had our griefs cured a hundred times, yet every fresh grief comes upon us with the force of novelty, and we believe that it will not pass away; it takes complete possession of the spirit, and for a time there is no room for hope or consolation. We cannot esteem highly men and women who do not know how to grieve, who shake off a sorrow from their soul as a bird shakes off a summer shower from its wing, and cannot be penetrated, saturated by it. We feel that there is something too light and mercurial in their temperament, and far from believing that they are stronger than the generality, and bear sorrow better, we cannot believe that they feel at all in the true human sense of the word. The sorrow does not touch them; they do not bear it; it passes over them. These people do not wear out; placid and imperturbable, they move about in the world without a single unnecessary motion or emotion. They are said to have well-regulated minds. It is easy to rule over a flat, bare, uninhabited plain. They are reserved, and they suppress their feelings, we are often told. It may be so;—but I sometimes wonder what it is they reserve, and where they reserve it; and as to the suppression of their feelings, there surely can be little merit due for suppression where there is no insurrection; very little generalship is required in such a case, I imagine.

Again; your dull, regular, mechanical people are often the greatest comfort and help to the oversensitive and excitable; they rest upon them as upon a pillow; they fall in love with the unintelligent repose of the nature, because it is free from the trials and troubles of their own. Thus we often see a strong attachment (I dare not give it the sacred name of friendship, which supposes community of spirits,) between a quiet, cold, imperturbable man, whom joy cannot elevate above, or grief depress below the even tenor of his way, and another, who scarcely knows what calm means, whose life is spent in paroxysms of joy and sorrow, or in intervening fits of deadly indifference. Both these natures are incapable of deriving that holy benefit from sorrow which it should bring to the human heart.

As joy reminds us of our immortality by giving us a foretaste of heaven, so sorrow reminds us that this earth, beautiful as it is, is no abiding-place for the spirit of man; that it is not permitted to him to enjoy the good that is spread around, except at intervals, and thus it leads him to hope for a better life. Without worshipping, without deifying sorrow, it is our duty to receive it humbly, as a means of purification and sanctification. We cannot love sorrow; if we say we do, we know not truly what sorrow is, and have never drained her cup to the bitter, bitter dregs. Sorrow comes to us in all forms, in all disguises, from all quarters, and at all times. It generally follows joy, like its shadow, and it often rises up substantially where no joy has been. Sometimes it assumes the form of a joy, and only reveals its true nature when it has nestled into the heart; sometimes it wraps itself up in the mantle of duty, and is embraced for years, as duty, by the over-scrupulous yet shrinking soul, that cannot get free from it at last. In youth it comes suddenly, like the tornado, prostrating fair and fertile regions before it, which scarcely recover its dreadful visitation during a decade; in maturity it comes thus, also, and then its ruin is lifelong; and often it steals over the soul like the pestilence which walketh at noon-day. Sorrow comes upon us from without. Persons and circumstances over which we have no control work us woe; but such sorrow is light compared with that which comes from within, which comes from ourselves, from our own misconduct or ill-governed minds. Nearly all nations have a proverb to this effect,—That we ourselves make our greatest sorrows. If we look honestly into our hearts we shall see that it is indeed so. We yield to temptation, and fall into sin. Surely as the thunder follows the lightning, sorrow must follow sin, even in this world. We need not expect that the retribution will be delayed until another stage of existence. "All guilt revenges itself here upon this earth." This is our training-ground, our battle-field, the scene of our conquest and defeat.

Grief brings us on our knees. We struggle to stand alone at first, and we fail. Then we seek for support out of ourselves, in the sympathy and help of our fellows; this, for awhile, may prove efficacious, if the grief be not of the deepest kind; but in the acutest sorrow, in the dreary desolation of the soul, we feel too keenly the insufficiency of all human help, and casting ourselves prostrate before God, we stretch out our trembling hands to Him, because there is none other to help us. We know that such grief as ours isolates us from our fellows, and then, tear-blinded, our eyes turn to Heaven, waiting for the dayspring from on high. The grief for which we can find human sympathy, and a sufficient human remedy, is by no means the heaviest; but the sorrow for which there is no earthly comfort, the sorrow in which we gaze despairingly all round the wide universe for help, and find none—when we feel that God has forsaken us, and that now, indeed, annihilation would be a blessing,—that is the grief which man finds too heavy for him to bear. And it is precisely that grief which, like an angel, with a scourge in its hand, drives him to the only secure shelter which the whole universe affords for a soul distressed, the bosom of the Almighty. Trembling and tearful he rests there, and learns to be thankful for the deep affliction which wrecked his earthly happiness,—which, in his mortal blindness, he believed to be made up of evil alone, and which he now sees was the only means of leading him to infinite goodness. It is a deep truth that a grief which seems final—which shuts out all further prospect from the sufferer, is often but "the cloudy portal opening on the sun." "Manure the soil well with despair, only let it be genuine, and you will reap a plentiful harvest," says Rachel Varnhagen.

It is not an easy thing to derive any comfort from a consideration of the transitory nature of joy. Philosophy may make the thought endurable, and poetry may teach us to bear it cheerfully as a part of God's will; but the human heart in its natural state yearns after joy, and dreads the loss of it. But the thought that grief is transitory, that, as the vulgar proverbs say, "When things come to the worst they must mend," that "it is a long lane that has no turning," that "the darkest hour of the night is that which precedes the dawn," that there is these thoughts should ever make the sharpest grief endurable even to the merely worldly-wise. To the truly religious there is a higher consolation scattered like healing herbs throughout the Scriptures. Let us gather these and treasure them in the breast, that their odour may revive our souls in the hour of grief. "My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."—"Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous but grievous: nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby. Wherefore, lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees." Again, have we not learned, by experience, that though "weeping may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning?"

While touching on this important subject, let me add a few words concerning the manner of receiving afflictions, and bearing sorrow. The mental attitude of the sufferer indicates, to a considerable extent, the nature of his character, and the difficulty or facility with which sorrow will work out good for him. The cowardly, the timid, the weak, (Alas! alas! how many such are there "crawling betwixt heaven and earth!")—they fall prostrate on their faces with fear, at the first stroke of sorrow, or crouch down, trembling, and are crushed by it; so that they have no power to rise and look the thing steadily in the face. These people experience nothing of the ennobling, elevating effects of suffering. They moan always, and are sad, when they should cease moaning and struggle in silence. They are truly miserable. They want natural strength; and they want faith to seek for strength where only it is to be found. Far be it from us to feel contempt for such; they are most deserving of pity; let us be cautious how we indulge contempt even for the weakest, meanest thing that lives. Others there are of a very opposite nature; who, to my notion, bear affliction almost as ill. They stand up against it defiantly, haughtily; they do not bravely bear the evils which the Creator has thought fit to mingle with their lot, in a large proportion;—for, in order to bear an evil bravely, we must recognise it as an evil, not try to blind ourselves to it,—to ignore as much as possible its very existence. There is much ill-directed strength and undisciplined courage in such natures; but they want the fortitude which goes with true wisdom. There is something heathenish in their virtue. Like the Titan, they hurl back defiantly the thunderbolts of Jupiter,—and they declare that they will wage never-ending war (so long as existence is theirs) against the Supreme. They say by their actions "God's clearly declared will shall be no law to me." He has afflicted me thus; but I will not suffer the affliction to dwell in my mind. Away with it;—I cannot undo it, alas! but I will live as much as possible as if it were undone. I will strive to forget it and to make others forget it. I will be strong and brave; and this sorrow shall never soften or subdue my spirit in the sight of men; and as little as possible in secret, when I 'commune with my own heart upon my bed and am still.'"

It would take a volume to analyse such a character, and to show how much of exalted virtue and beauty there is in it, in spite of this great mistake as to the nature of true heroism into which it is apt to fall. It is an extremely interesting one. We need never fear but that such people will act well their part; but we cannot help regretting that they should act a part at all. There is an element of untruth in their life which is quite unworthy of them; which detracts from their power of exciting love. If we have cause of grief, we need not parade our suffering or thrust it on the notice of the world—that is unmanly, and selfish; but also we need not deny the truth, by assuming an idle levity, which is quite incompatible with true suffering—that is undignified, irreligious, and false. If it is our lot to wear a mourning robe, why should we fling it on our shoulders jauntily, and march majestically, as if it were a festal garment or a court mantle? There is want of taste as well as want of clear insight into true wisdom in this. The mourning robe would fall far more gracefully about the person of the mourner than the robe of state; and observers are not deceived,—they see that the robe is black, and that there is cause of sorrow. They say to each other, "This man is not sincere. He tries to deceive us." And some among them who, perhaps, see a little deeper than the rest, say, "Nay! but he does not intend to deceive. He is foolishly proud—but he is strong and brave. He is only not quite strong and brave enough. If he were, he would dare to appear that which he is. He would take his stand nobly and firmly on the portion God has allotted him, and would await what came of it." In such persons the Stoic supersedes the Christian philosophy; and, therefore, grief has not the best, most sanctifying effect upon them. They will not recognise it as a something sent by God, to which they are to submit for a time, and which they should endeavour to digest and assimilate in their hearts, knowing that it is as much a gift of the Eternal Father as life itself. Pride is the vice of these strong souls; and in pride they reject grief. They cast it from them, they struggle with it,—they trample on it—they strangle it; they will not suffer it to master them, even for an hour. Thus they lose all the softening effects of grief,—all the purifying effects; and that gentler wisdom of the sorrow-chastened spirit they forego. But, I fear me, the modern Stoics will succeed no better in actually destroying evil, by steadily determining to deny its power over their own souls, than the ancients did; and Pride must be the crutch they lean on, till they are wise enough to cast it aside, and throw themselves for support on the outstretched arm of the Almighty.

Humility and Meekness,—virtues inculcated by no profane or heathen system of philosophy, are the Christian's best support, until he attain to that degree of Fortitude and Faith which will enable him to bear steadily and cheerfully all the trials and sorrows of this life; and when he has attained such Fortitude and Faith, Humility and Meekness will continue to be his highest graces, making his whole life lovely and of good report. His grief excites the sympathy of the angels; and his joy, no man taketh from him.

HALLOWEEN.

HALLOWEEN is thought to be a night when witches, devils, and other mischief-making beings are all abroad on their baneful midnight errands, particularly those aerial people the fairies are said on that night to hold a grand anniversary. The poem of Burns, of which an illustration is here presented, contains a lively and striking picture of some of the superstitious observances of old Scotland. The scene is laid on the romantic shores of Ayr, at a farmer's fireside, and the actors in the rustic drama are the whole household, including supernumerary reapers and landsmen, about to be discharged from the engagements of harvest. For a full elucidation of the details, we must refer the reader to the poem itself.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "FRANK FAIRLEIGH."

CHAPTER LIX.

"POINTS A MORAL," AND SO IT IS TO BE HOPED,
"ADORN'S A TALE."

No traces of the tumultuous assembly, which had so greatly alarmed Laura and Annie, remained when Lord Bellefield and General Grant crossed the square of St. Mark, on their return from the morning's sight-seeing. As they drew near the Palazzo Grassini, a tall lad in squalid raiment, leaning upon crutches, and with a patch over one eye, approached and begged of them. The General at first refused to listen to him, but becoming wearied by his pertinacity, felt in his pocket for something to give him.

"I have no small change about me," he remarked, after a minute's ineffectual search, "but you have, Bellefield; they gave you a handful of their stupid little coins at the last shop we went into. Lend me two or three, will you?"

As he mentioned his companion's name, the beggar fixed his piercing eye on the features of the person addressed, scanning them eagerly, as though he sought to fix them indelibly in his memory. Returning his glance with a haughty stare, his lordship carelessly flung him a couple of Zwanzigers, and passed on. The beggar watched his retreating figure till it was no longer visible, then turning quickly, hobbled with his crutches out of the square, continuing the same method of progression till he reached the nearest canal, when, looking round to assure himself that he was not observed, he coolly pitched his supporters into the water, removed the patch from his eye, which by no means seemed to require such a protection, walked briskly till he reached a spot where a small skiff was moored, springing into which, he commenced rowing vigorously, and was soon hidden from sight by a bend of the canal.

When Lewis returned to his lodgings, the following note awaited him:—

"My search is ended; I have found my sister in time to see her—die! Her seducer, heartless in his villainy, brought his victim to a foreign land, kept her in luxury till his fancy wearied of her, and then left her—to starve. My curse has little power, or it would have withered him long ago; but may the curse of that God who made him and her, cleave to him until—I meet him. Sir, I know not how to thank you. She has told me how you warned her; how you explained to her his real character. She was infatuated, but it is not for me to judge her. We seem a doomed race, fatal alike to ourselves, to those we love, and to those we hate. Oh that she could live! she is soft and gentle, and,—ay! though a scoundrel has debased her, still I say it,—she is good and pure, and she would have calmed my angry spirit; she would have taught me to love something human; but it was not to be. Each hour that I sit by her I expect to be her last. She sends you her blessing; may God's go with it. "MILES H—."

Lewis could not peruse this letter without deep emotion. In the just, though, alas! ill-governed indignation which gave a rude eloquence even to the expression of this poor youth's outraged feeling, he traced a likeness to his former self. "Heartless in his villainy, he kept her in luxury till his fancy wearied of her, and then left her—to starve." This was the man Annie Grant loved, and was about to marry! Oh, how his heart bled for her! He pictured to himself her future life; how she would gradually, by slow and painful steps, discover her husband's true character; each advance in knowledge a new and separate misfortune, until love should become indifference, and indifference end in hatred. Even yet he might prevent it. His London agent had forwarded to him that morning an English newspaper, containing an unmistakable allusion to the events of the Derby day, and openly declaring Lord Bellefield a defaulter. This shown to General Grant, and his tale of Hardy's daughter verified by the evidence now in his possession, the old soldier would sooner see his daughter lying dead at his feet, than sanction her union with a man devoid alike of honour and of principle. But then came in pride. Had he known that Annie loved him, or had General Grant never mistrusted him, Lewis would have come forward without a moment's hesitation; but his motives had been once doubted, his affections betrayed, and his pride could neither forget nor forgive it. Besides, Lord Bellefield would attribute his interference to a feeling of petty malice; such was not the revenge for which, despite his principles and his reason, his soul still thirsted. So pride gained the day, though, tyrant-like, in the very midst of his triumph he made his victim miserable.

Unable to apply his mind to anything, he strolled out, trusting the evening air would allay the fever of his blood: after wandering about restlessly for some time, he remembered that he had eaten nothing for many hours, and turning into the nearest casino he called for wine and biscuits. Having finished his frugal repast, he was about to leave the house, when three persons entered, and crossing through the refreshment room, passed into a salon which he knew to be devoted to play. One of the three a short insigniscant-looking man, was a stranger to him; but the two others he recognised instantly—they were Walter and Lord Bellefield. A sudden impulse prompted him to follow them; at that time in the evening the salon was certain to be pretty well filled, and Lewis trusted to avoid observation by mixing with the crowd, relying on the alteration in his appearance to escape recognition, even if he were perceived either by Walter or Lord Bellefield. Accordingly, waiting his opportunity, he joined a group of Italians, who, eagerly talking over the attempt upon the life of Colonel Marinovitch, (which had been frustrated by his escaping on board the corvette which guarded the harbour,) scarcely perceived this addition to their party. Entering with them, and still keeping in the background, he took up a position whence he could observe the proceedings of those for both of whom he felt an interest equally deep, though so utterly distinct in character.

Lord Bellefield, who appeared unusually listless and indifferent, lounged up to the table, and staked a few Napoleons on the chances of the game; then drawing forward a chair, he seated himself, and continued carelessly to watch the proceedings of the other players. But despite the presence of the man he hated, Lewis's attention soon became wholly absorbed in observing Walter. From his entire conduct it was evident that this was by no means his first visit to the salon; on the contrary, it was only too plain that a taste for gambling had been implanted in the poor boy's feeble yet obstinate mind. That he clearly understood the nature of the game, Lewis could not believe, but that he had acquired sufficient insight into the rules to enable him to adhere to them, and that he was keenly alive to the results of the deal, or the throw, elated when he won, and depressed when he lost, was most certain.

The third person of the party, whom Lewis rightly conjectured to be his successor in the office of tutor, did not play himself, but appeared to take great interest in Walter's game, looking over his cards, and advising him what to do. Lewis also noticed, that whenever Walter won, he always received gold, but that his losses were paid in paper money, and the truth immediately occurred to him, viz. that child like the poor boy only attached value to the glittering coin, and that the worth of the bank notes had been completely misrepresented to him, so that he believed himself winning, when in fact he was losing considerable sums; moreover, from certain glances which passed between Mr. Spooner and the proprietor of the salon, who held the bank, Lewis became convinced that some secret understanding existed, by which the tutor shared in the profits.

That Lord Bellefield was entirely ignorant of that which was passing before his eyes, Lewis could not conceive, while at the same time the trifling nature of the stakes rendered it most unlikely that he could have any personal interest in the affair; the probability therefore was that he saw what was going on, but felt totally indifferent as to the matter. This view was confirmed when, as Walter grew more excited, began playing higher, and at last staked ten Napoleons upon one cast, Mr. Spooner approached Lord Bellefield and whispered something in his ear, to which his friend replied, carelessly, "Oh, let him have his fling while he's in the humour;" then in a lower tone he added, "I'm not blind! but the money is I dare say of more use in your pocket than in his, so you'll be the greater fool of the two if you attempt to prevent him."

Spooner again appeared to urge some difficulty, to which Lord Bellefield rejoined, with a sneering laugh, "Yes, it suits you charmingly to assume the rôle of the innocent! can't you get him to sign another bond payable when he comes of age? Tortoni will no more refuse to cash it, than he did on a former occasion;" then smiling again, he added,—"I am not blind, mon ami, but 'tis no concern of mine; I am not the lout's guardian, Heaven be thanked." Although from the position in which he stood Lewis only caught a word or two here and there of this conversation, yet his quick apprehension supplied the blanks with sufficient correctness, and the whole villainy of the thing burst upon him. Here was a man engaged to educate and watch over the poor feeble-minded being before him, using the power thus entrusted to him, to lead him to evil, and availing himself of the imbecility he was bound to protect, to swindle his helpless charge—while Lord Bellefield, whose duty it was to denounce such practices to General Grant the instant he suspected them, had evidently not only no intention of doing so, but sat coolly looking on, smiling with a fiend-like satisfaction at each fresh development of human wickedness.

As Lewis watched Walter's flushed cheeks, eager eyes, and hands which trembled as they were stretched out to receive the gold which this time he had been allowed to win; as he marked the lines which excitement, and the permitted indulgence of a capricious, obstinate temper had traced upon his smooth brow, and round the corners of his mouth; all his old affection for the poor boy rushed back upon him, and his just anger grew to such a pitch that he could scarcely repress it. At this moment a fresh deal had begun.

"I will win more," exclaimed Walter, eagerly; "Mr. Spooner, tell him I want to double my stake."

"But that has been done already," was the reply, "the dealer has doubled every one's stake this time."

"Then I will double that," returned Walter, carried away by the excitement of the game; "toll him so, I say."

Spooner appeared for a moment undecided; the stake, thus quadrupled, amounted to 40 Napoleons, and alarmed at its magnitude, he glanced in irresolution towards Lord Bellefield. A look of undisguised contempt for his pusillanimity was the only reply his Lordship vouchsafed; goaded on by which, Spooner turned to comply with his pupil's direction.

But Lewis could bear it no longer; regardless of consequences, he strode across the room, and laid his hand upon Walter's shoulder, saying, as he did so, in a gentle though determined voice, "Walter, you must not play for such high stakes."

With a cry of mingled joy and surprise, Walter sprang from his seat, gazed earnestly at Lewis's features, then exclaiming, "Oh, you have come back at last!" threw himself upon his friend's breast in a flood of tears. Much affected, Lewis returned his embrace, and leading him carefully to a seat, waited till he should recover from his surprise and emotion. In the meantime the game had come to a standstill, the bystanders, consisting chiefly of foreigners, being as much charmed by such a scene as an Englishman would have been annoyed at it. The moment quiet was in some degree restored, the proprietor, mindful of his own interest, resumed his deal, inquiring with a glance at Spooner, what sum his young friend had staked. Spooner paused, but Lord Bellefield, who had risen and with lowering brow approached the scene of action, prompted him, and he replied, "Forty Napoleons."

Lewis's eyes flashed. "It is at your peril you do this," he said; "my first act on quitting this place shall be to inform General Grant of the manner in which you betray the trust he has reposed in you."

Spooner turned pale; but, relying on Lord Bellefield's support, managed to stammer out, "And pray, sir, who the deuce may you be?"

"I will tell you, and this worshipful company also," exclaimed Lord Bellefield, stepping forward. "This fellow is, or rather was, a menial in General Grant's household, discarded for insolent behaviour, and as such unfit for the society of gentlemen, into which he has now ventured to intrude himself, and from which I, for one, vote he be ignominiously expelled."

This speech caused, as might be expected, a sensation throughout the room, and the bystanders congregated round Lewis and Lord Bellefield, glancing from one to the other, to discover from their bearing and appearance which was the true man, and which the false. Up to this moment Lewis had been wrapped in a large Spanish cloak; he now allowed it to glide from his shoulders, as, advancing a step he boldly confronted his adversary.

"Your lordship has been pleased to speak explicitly," he said; "were I inclined to follow your example, I might, with some shadow of truth, denounce you as a ruined black-leg, and an outlawed defaulter; but I prefer simply declaring that in the statement you have just made, you have maliciously and unequivocally—LIED!"

As he spoke he raised his head proudly, and folding his arms across his breast, waited the effect of his words. He was not kept long in suspense. However numerous might be Lord Bellefield's faults, a want of personal courage was not one of them. As Lewis referred to the cause of his ignominious exile, his face grew pale with rage, but when he gave him the lie, his fury became uncontrollable. Springing forward with a leap like that of a maddened tiger, he struck Lewis a violent blow on the cheek, which, firmly as his feet were planted, staggered him; exclaiming as he did so,—

"Take that, beggar!" Instead of rushing on his adversary, as those amongst the spectators who knew him (and there were several who did so) expected, Lewis, recovering himself, stood for an instant, regarding Lord Bellefield with a smile of triumph, though to those who remarked him closely there was an expression in his eyes which, in spite of themselves, caused them to shudder, while, strange to say, he was drawing a soiled white kid glove on his right hand; having done so, he advanced a step, saying in a stern deep voice:—

"Your lordship is too generous—the beggar returns your alms-giving,—thus!"

As he spoke there was a sudden movement in the crowd—a frightful blow was struck, and Lord Bellefield lay insensible on the ground, the blood flowing from a cut on his forehead, whilst over him stood Lewis, his mouth set, and his eyes burning with the fire of hatred. Several of the bystanders sprang forward to assist the fallen man, but Lewis sternly motioned them back.

"Wait," he said;—his voice sounded deep and hollow, and there was something in the expression of his face which quelled the stoutest heart amongst those who stood around him,—drawing the glove from the hand which had struck the blow, he dipped it in the blood that still trickled from the forehead of the fallen man, muttering to himself as he did so,—"That, then, has come to pass—is the rest to follow?" He next examined the countenance of his prostrate foe,—"He is merely stunned," he said, "raise him, and bring water to bathe his temples." As he spoke he assisted those who stepped forward to lift the injured man, and place him on a chair; having done so, he left him to the care of the bystanders, and again folding his arms, stood, coolly awaiting the issue.

The event justified his predictions: on the first application of the cold water, Lord Bellefield revived, and in less time than could have been expected, the bleeding, which was very slight, was arrested. As soon as he had recovered sufficiently to speak, he said, addressing a young Italian of rank, with whom he was acquainted, and who had been bathing his temples with the cold water,—

"Rustelli, you may inform that scoundrel that he has succeeded; rather than allow him to escape with impunity, I will undergo the degradation of meeting him." He spoke in a low, faint voice, but the expression with which he glanced towards Lewis as he pronounced the word "scoundrel" was one of undying hatred.

"If your Lordship intended to apply that observation to the Signor Luigi, I shall have the felicity to explain that your excellency labours under a mistake; that gentleman is the son of a gallant officer, with whom I have had the honour to serve in more than one campaign. It is no condescension in any one under the rank of a Royal Prince to meet the son of the brave Captain Arundel."

The speaker was an old General Officer in the Austrian service, who possessed an European reputation, and whose dictum on all points of honour was conclusive. Lord Bellefield bit his under lip in anger and vexation, cursing his own hastiness which had elicited this vindication of his enemy: perceiving, however, that he should only place himself still more completely in the wrong by any attempt to impugn the old Austrian's statement, he merely bowed haughtily in reply, then desiring to be shown into a private room, he took Rastelli's arm, and quitted the salon.

Lewis stood gazing after his late opponent with a dark and troubled countenance; it was not remorse that he experienced, for were the deed to have been done over again, he would not have shrunk from its performance; and yet the feeling which engrossed him partook of a remorseful character—it seemed to him as though he had now lost all power of free will—he had taken the first step, and THE BEST must follow; there was no longer any possibility of turning back. Like one walking in his sleep, he permitted himself to be led into another room—he heard, as in a dream, Rastelli enter, and make arrangements with a young Austrian officer who had volunteered to act as his second, for his meeting Lord Bellefield at daybreak. As the person challenged, he had the choice of weapons, but he waived his right, and allowed his opponent to select pistols. Ehrenburg (his second) whispered to him that Lord Bellefield was reported to be a dead shot, but an indifferent swordsman.

"The more reason to allow him to choose pistols," was Lewis's careless reply.

Ehrenburg still urged the madness of throwing away a chance. "It will be no boy's play," he said; "mark my words, Luigi, this duel will be one for life or death."

"Do you think I do not know it?" returned Lewis, sternly, "ay, as well as if I now saw him lying dead before my feet," and as he spoke, an involuntary shudder passed through his powerful frame.

"May not another contingency be possible, buon amico? especially if you allow him to secure the advantage of pistols?" suggested Ehrenburg.

"Would to heaven it might so occur," was Lewis's eager reply; "I hope no better fate than to die by his hand, believe me; but it will not be so,—I know—I feel it! Ehrenburg, that man has stood like some evil spirit across my path; time after time he has heaped insult upon me; once, coward-like, the assassin sought my life; but till to-night I have never opposed him. Why? because it is written here" (and he touched his forehead) "that when the final struggle shall come, my destiny is stronger than his, and he must perish. You may smile and deem my words the mere ravings of superstition, but you will see, if we meet to-morrow morning, Bellefield will never leave the ground alive, and I shall quit it with the brand of Cain upon my brow."

He spoke so gravely and with such an evident belief in the reality of his convictions, that for a moment Ehrenburg himself felt impressed. But a duel was no very uncommon event with the young Austrian; he had been principal on two occasions, when no serious result had followed, and second on half-a-dozen more; besides, he was essentially a practical man. So he merely shrugged his shoulders, hinted that Lewis's nerves might be excited, which would produce these little fancies, advised him to take a cup of coffee, and then repair to the shooting-gallery and practise steadily for an hour or so to get his hand in, promised to be with him in good time on the following morning, inquired whether he could be of any further assistance, and then, strolling back to the gaming-table, relieved Lewis of his presence.

To gain his lodgings, and lock himself into his studio, was scarcely the work of five minutes; then, flinging himself upon the first seat that came in his way, he gave himself up to bitter thoughts. Two years ago he had fled his country, had quitted all who were dear to him, because his fiery passions were beyond his control—because he had loved too deeply and hated too bitterly. He had plunged into a life of wild adventure to dissipate his feelings; he had schooled his heart in solitude; he had devoted all his energies to the acquirement of an art; nay, he had devoted the first efforts of the skill he had thus gained to embody a visible representation of the danger of ill-bestowed love and the curse of gratified revenge; and this was the result!

He remained for a few minutes with his head resting on his hands, apparently stunned by his conflicting feelings; then, rousing himself by an effort, he heaved a deep sigh, and drew out the glove. As his eye fell upon the stain of blood, he shuddered, and, hastily putting it from him, began pacing up and down the apartment. An antique lamp hung by a chain from the ceiling, throwing its light strongly on the two pictures from the Giaour. Involuntarily Lewis paused before them, and remained gazing from one to the other with an expression of remorse and horror. "Am I indeed about to realize these creations of my gloomy fancy?" he murmured; "shall I become that human tiger, that stony, soulless image of impenitent despair? Revenge, how I have thirsted for it! how, when writhing under that man's insults, I have pictured to myself the day of reckoning, and deemed life itself would be a cheap sacrifice for one hour of unlimited vengeance; and now, when this coveted boon lies within my grasp, I see it in its true light, and own this wished-for blessing to be a dark consuming curse. Seen through the distorted medium of outraged feeling, retribution appeared an act of justice. The demon wore an angel's form. But, viewed in its true aspect, the sentiment is that which leads to murder, and the deed, with its sickening details, revolting butchery. Yet, seeing this clearly, knowing to what it will lead, I must go on: I owe him satisfaction. Satisfaction!" and he smiled at the mocking term. "Yes," he resumed, "I must go on, even if I wished to turn back. If I could forego my revenge, and forgive him, it is now too late. Well, be it so; 'tis weakness to repine at the inevitable. I will meet my fate boldly, be it what it may; and for him, he has brought the punishment upon his own head, and must abide the issue!" He resumed his walk up and down the apartment; then a new idea struck him,—“What a strange expression her features wore when she ventured to address me,” he said; “and in the crowd, she did not shrink from me, but trusted herself to me with a gentle, child-like confidence.” He paused, pressed his hand to his forehead, then exclaimed, “O God, if I have wronged her,—if—” and here his voice sank almost to a whisper, “if, Heaven help me, she should love me after all!”

Completely overwrought by these conflicting emotions, Lewis sank into a chair, and, burying his face in his hands, struggled in vain for composure, a deep-drawn, choking sob from time to time attesting his mental agony. How long he remained in this position he never knew. It might have been minutes, for he took no note of things external; it might have been hours, for a lifetime of heartfelt desolation appeared crowded into that dark reverie. He was aroused, at length, by a tap at the door, which, as at first he could scarcely collect his ideas sufficiently to attend to such sub-lunary matters, soon grew into a loud and impatient knocking with the handle of a stick or umbrella. Imagining it to be one of his artist friends, come probably to bring him information in regard to the late disturbances, he replied in Italian, that he was particularly engaged, and could not see any one.

“Polite and encouraging, certainly,” muttered a deep-toned voice, at the first sound of which Lewis sprang from his seat, and listened with an eager, yet half incredulous expression of countenance. “A thousand and one pardons, Signor,” continued the person on the outside, speaking in Italian, with a peculiarity of accent which proved him to be unaccustomed to pronounce the language, or probably even to hear it spoken; “but you really must condescend to see me, even if Diabolus himself is supping with you, and there is only macaroni enough for two.”

Without a moment's hesitation Lewis flung open the door, and there in propria persona stood Richard Frere and the cotton umbrella!

“Frere, dear old fellow! is it, can it indeed be you?” exclaimed Lewis joyfully, forgetting for the moment everything in the surprise of welcoming such an unexpected visitant.

“Yes, it's me,” returned Frere, squeezing and shaking his friend's hand, as if he had a design of reducing it to a jelly, “Richard's himself, and no mistake.—Lewis isn't himself, though, it seems, but Signor Luigi, forsooth. I had hard work to find you, I can tell you. But good gracious! what has happened to the man?” he exclaimed, catching sight of Lewis's bearded face and pale haggard features, “why, he has turned into somebody else bodily as well as in name. You look just like one of these horrid Italian fellows, with the proper tragic expression of countenance which they get up by way of advertising that they are ready and willing to cut throats at half-a-crown a windpipe, country orders punctually executed, and the business performed in a neat and tradesman-like manner; but tell me seriously, you're not ill?”

“Not in body, nor usually in mind either,” was the reply; “but to-day events have occurred which have thoroughly unmanned me, still I shall ‘win through it,’ somehow; and now tell me of yourself, of Rose, of my mother,—they are well?”

“A good deal better than you seem to be,” growled Frere, who during this speech had been attentively observing his friend's features; “however, I'll soon satisfy your curiosity,—and then you shall satisfy mine,” he added in an under tone, and removing a wonderful species of travelling cap, he followed Lewis, who led the way to his inner apartment, and then listened eagerly to Frere's account of the various events which had taken place since he had quitted his native land. Rose, by Frere's especial desire, had, in writing to her brother, hitherto forborne to allude to her engagement; the worthy bear, with a characteristic mixture of deep seated humility and surface vanity, fearing that Lewis might not think him a fitting match for his sister, and, therefore, feeling anxious that the matter should be disclosed to him in the wisest and most judicious manner possible, i.e. by himself à la voce. Thus, after having spoken of various less important matters, Frere was gradually working his way towards the interesting disclosure with a degree of nervous diffidence quite unusual to him, when Lewis, whose attention began to flag, brought him to the point by exclaiming—“And about Rose, what is she doing; she tells me in her letters she still writes for some magazine; but is she looking well? does she seem happy?—though I suppose,” he continued, trying to hide his state of mind, by falling in with his friend's jesting mode of speech, “these are minor particulars, into which it never occurs to your wisdom to inquire. I know your old habit of practically ignoring the existence of women, as a sex, regarding them as a race of unscientific nonentities fitted only ‘to suckle fools and chronicle small beer.’”

Frere for a moment looked rather disconcerted; then, veiling his discomfiture under an affectation of rough indifference, he replied, “I can tell you one ‘minor particular,’ as you call it, and that is the fact of the young lady in question being engaged to be married.”

“Nonsense!” exclaimed Lewis, starting, “you are probably joking,” he continued, seriously; “but you know not, dear old friend, how deeply such tidings might affect me at this moment; you know not—how should you?—the mood of mind in which you find me; but tell me in a word, is there any earnest in what you have said?”

“In a word,” muttered Frere, “hum! concise and epigrammatical that! but I'll try to accommodate you, so here goes by way of answer. Yes!”

“And she has never even hinted at such a fact in her letters,” exclaimed Lewis; “out of sight, out of mind, indeed. I may have—Heaven help me! I have neglected my trust, in my self-engrossment; but I did not think Rose would have been the person thus to visit my sins upon my head;—who is the man?” he continued sternly. In the whole course of his existence Frere had never felt more uncomfortable; all his old diffidence and humility rushed upon him, and for the moment he felt as if he had been suddenly detected in an act of petty larceny; however, his sturdiness of nature, and common sense, came to his rescue, and he replied—"It is no fault of Rose's, for I made it an especial point that she should not tell you of her engagement by letter."

"You did, and wherefore?" inquired Lewis in surprise.

"Because I chose to tell you myself," returned Frere; "your sister is not an angel, for angels live in Heaven, and not on earth, but she is the most loveable, the most pure-minded, decidedly the sweetest looking woman (though that does not so much signify) in this world, and I should have added, the most sensible, only that she has, in her tenderness of heart, seen fit to promise to marry a rough uncouth animal like me. Lewis, old fellow," he continued in a faltering voice, "I know better than you can do how unworthy I am of such a blessing, but if loving her better than my own life gives me any title to possess her, Heaven knows that I do so."

When Frere reached that point in his peroration at which he mentioned Rose's promise to marry him, his auditor started, and raising his eyes, murmured an ejaculation of fervent thankfulness. As he concluded, Lewis clasped his hand eagerly in his own, saying, "My dear old Frere, you know not how happy you have made me; one great weight which was crushing my soul to the dust ere you appeared, is removed by your words. Of all men living you are the one I would have selected for my dearest Rose's husband; and now if I—that is to say, whatever befalls me, she will be happy."

"Then you are not disappointed?" rejoined Frere, greatly relieved; "you know you used at one time to be just a very little bit ambitious, and I fancied you might have been cherishing some splendid scheme for marrying Rose to a duke—she's good enough for the best of 'em, even if dukes were what they should be, instead of what they are too many of 'em. Well, I'm very glad!—but now about yourself,—if anything befalls you, you say; pray what is likely to befall you more than other people?—and what do you mean by being crushed by a weight,—and by looking so melodramatically miserable?"

Lewis heaved a deep sigh, and then replied, "You speak jestingly; but there are many melodramas less strange than my wayward fortune: such as it is, however, I have provoked and will go through with it. Frere, you love Rose for her own sake, be kind to and forbearing with my mother for mine—she has many faults, a giddy head, an impulsive disposition, (than which there can be no greater temptation,) but a warm heart—and—and I feel I have never done a son's duty by her. Frere, you will take care of her?"

The events of the day and evening had well nigh exhausted even Lewis's untiring energy, and the sight of Frere arriving so unexpectedly, had brought back to him so many home memories, recollections of earlier days ere with the strength and freedom of manhood had come its trials and its sins, that as he thought of these old associations, and remembered kindnesses slighted, affection cast away, duties neglected, for the sake of that one master-passion, he forgot for the time the wrongs he usually felt so keenly, and remorse for his selfish neglect overwhelmed him and caused his voice to falter and his eyes to grow dim with the mist of unshed tears. Frere perceived his emotion, and waited till it had in a degree subsided; then, going up to him, he laid his hand on his shoulder caressingly, saying, "Come, Lewis, we have known each other from boyhood, we have long been brothers in affection, and are soon about to become so in name, associated by a still nearer tie,—we never used to have secrets from each other, and should not do so now. I have learned from Rose the cause you have had for sorrow, and for two years have suffered you to try your own method of cure, without attempting to interfere with you, but I now see that the experiment has failed, and, that you are miserable,—is it not so?"

Lewis bowed his head in token of assent, he could not trust himself to speak.

"We are not placed in this world to be miserable," continued Frere; "true, this life is a state of trial, and it would not be so if we had not many evils, temptations, and sorrows to endure, but by God's help, the evils may be borne, the temptations overcome, and the sorrow turned to joy, if we do not oppose our will to His; but if we do, sin lieth at the door, we league ourselves with the enemy of mankind, and misery must come of it.—Do not misunderstand me," he added, kindly, "I do not seek to blame you, I can have no pleasure in so doing, but on the contrary deepest pain; still, it is evident your mind is diseased, and, if in probing the wound to discover the nature of the evil I hurt you, you must pardon me for the sake of the object I have in view.—But I am talking at random, for want of a more clear insight into the cause of your present difficulty;—come, be frank and open with me; let us face the evil boldly, and between us, devise some means of overcoming it."

"What brought you here?" exclaimed Lewis, suddenly raising his head, and fixing his piercing eyes full upon his friend's countenance.

Frere smiled a melancholy smile, "Hot-headed, petulant, and jealous of interference yet!" he said. "My poor Lewis, I did not come to catechise you,—affairs of quite another nature brought me here,—I am trying to carry out an arrangement between my uncle Ashford and your ci-devant foe, Lord Bellefield." As he mentioned Lord Bellefield's name, Lewis shuddered and his eyes again sought the ground. "And now that I have cleared up this alarming doubt," resumed Frere, "tell me what ails you, for that you are miserable, and that I mean to know wherefore, and do my best to render you otherwise, are two self-evident facts."

"'Tis useless," returned Lewis in a low voice, "the die is cast, and neither you nor any one else can help me,—would to Heaven you had come a day sooner, and taken me away from this accursed place; as it is, my own mad passion has hurried me on, and my fate is fixed. Now," he continued glancing at the clock which stood at a quarter to twelve, "I must ask you to leave me,—we may meet to-morrow—or—if anything should prevent it—and if—I have not an opportunity of telling you all you seek to know,—my papers—that is I will leave you a letter explaining everything—good night." Scarcely able to control his voice, in this which Lewis felt might too probably be a last farewell, he hurried through the speech in a strange, almost incoherent manner.

Frere regarded him fixedly: "Unless you condescend to explain to me what you purpose doing within the next twenty-four hours," he said, "I'll not leave you till that time has expired. I tell you what it is, Lewis—I have not lived three-and-thirty years in the world without having learned to read men's faces, and I read in yours that you are standing on the verge of some great folly, madness, or—crime—and now, what is it?"

Lewis paused for a moment in deep thought, and then said calmly, "Sit down, Frere, you are an Englishman and a man of highly honourable feeling; moreover, you are my oldest, my most cherished friend; I am as you say, maddened by circumstances, and on the verge of a great crime,—sit down, I will tell you all, and you shall judge between God and man, and me."

Calmly, clearly, truthfully, in the deep silence of night, did Lewis recount to his friend the strange passages with which the reader is already acquainted: he related the simple facts, whether they told for or against him, just as they occurred; without entering into unnecessary detail, he left nothing important untold, till Frere had conceived a clear idea of Lewis's whole career from the hour he entered Broadhurst, to the moment in which he was speaking.

"The upshot of all this is," observed Lewis in conclusion, "that I am weary of life; littleness, brutality, and oppression in man, weakness and treachery in woman, and the tyranny of passion in oneself, render this world an incipient hell,—to-morrow must end it one way or the other; either he will shoot me, or I shall shoot him; the latter contingency I shall not long survive; such remorse as I should feel would be unendurable.—To save myself from the guilt of suicide I shall volunteer into some fighting regiment, engaged in these civil broils, Tyrian or Trojan, Austrian or Venetian, I care little; my sympathies side with one, my associations with the other, and with either I may obtain the only prize I covet,—a soldier's death."

"Now listen to me, Lewis," returned Frere, gravely; "I once at your own request promised you that while we both lived I would never give you up, but would stand between you and your fiery passions. and I thank God, who in his mercy has sent me here at this particular moment, to enable me to fulfil my engagement. You have suffered and are suffering deeply, and from my heart I pity you; but seeing, as I do only too clearly, the cause of all this misery, it would be no kindness in me to omit to point it out to you. Your two leading faults of character, pride and an overweening degree of self-confidence, are at the bottom of it all. Pride made Lord Bellefield your enemy—when he offered money for the dog, he never intended to insult you; your proud answer irritated his pride, and from that time forth he sought to injure you—evil produced evil, dislike grew to hatred, hatred begat revenge, revenge cherished, only required opportunity to become realized into assault and murder, that opportunity has now arrived, you have been guilty of the first, you contemplate the second. So much for pride—now for self-confidence;—you imagined nothing could tempt you to forget your dependent position in General Grant's family (a position which your pride led you falsely to consider a degradation,) so far as to forfeit your self-respect by loving Annie, so you permitted yourself to enjoy her society, till your affections were beyond your own control—mistake number one;—then self-confidence whispered that it would be heroic to overcome this passion, so instead of avoiding the danger, you stayed to brave it till you had sacrificed your happiness if not hers also—mistake number two;—still untaught by experience, in your own strength you endeavoured to crush out the memory of the past; still thinking only of self, you fled your country, recklessly severing ties, and neglecting duties—two years' vain struggling have proved your boasted strength to be abject weakness, unable to save you from becoming the slave of your evil passions, and I arrive here to find you contemplating the sin of—, well, if I call it murder, you will deem that I exaggerate—so I will say the sin of gambling in a lottery of manslaughter—with every chance against you." Lewis again raised his eyes to Frere's face, as he replied calmly but in a cold hard tone of voice,—

"You have described my miserable career harshly indeed, but in the main truly. You profess yourself my friend,—in making this painful recapitulation, therefore, I presume you to have some friendly object; what is it?"

"First to exhibit to you the disease, then to point out the remedy," returned Frere.

"And if you can do this," exclaimed Lewis,—"if, remembering what I am, you can show me how I might have avoided my errors in the past, how I may do aught to retrieve them in the future, I will indeed reckon you my friend,—nay, I will bless your coming as that of an angel sent from Heaven to aid a desperate, well-nigh despairing man."

"Pray what religion do you profess?" asked Frere, abruptly.

Lewis started, but recovering himself, replied coldly, "The same as you do yourself."

"And do you believe in the truth of it?"

"Why ask such a question?" returned Lewis, with a slight degree of annoyance perceivable in his tone, "whatever may have been my faults, I am no infidel."

"I will tell you why I ask," replied Frere; "because, though you confess with your lips the truths of Christianity, in your life you have practically denied them."

Lewis made no answer, and Frere continued in an earnest impressive voice, his manner becoming every moment more animated as he grew excited with his subject,—

"If, as you say you do not doubt, Christianity be true, it amounts to this. The God who made and governs this world, has been pleased to reveal to us His will—namely, that if we believe in Him and obey Him, He will save us from eternal misery and bestow upon us eternal happiness;—to enable us to fulfil the second condition, that of obedience, He has given us a code, not so much of laws, as of principles of action, by which we may become a law to ourselves; in order to demonstrate how these abstract principles are applicable to the exigencies of our mundane career, He sent His Son into the world, 'a man subject to like passions as ourselves, only without sin,' because He was a consistent embodiment of the doctrines He taught. Now had you taken these precepts, to which you accord an unpractical and therefore an equally senseless and useless belief, as the rule of your actions, how different a result would have followed;—instead of provoking animosity by haughty looks and proud words, you would have remembered that 'a soft answer turneth away wrath;' instead of returning evil for evil, you would have considered the example of Him, who 'when He was reviled, reviled not again,' and called to mind His precepts, 'resist not evil, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you;' instead of seeking to avenge your own quarrel by deeds of violence, which outrage nature, and bring their own punishment with them even here, in the pangs of conscience, you would have thought of His words who hath said, 'Vengeance is Mine, I will repay'—and left your cause in His hands. Instead of attempting to do everything in your own strength, and failing thus miserably, you would have recollected that, 'God's strength is made perfect in our weakness,' and prayed to Him for support and assistance. Even now, instead of having recklessly determined to expose yourself to the chance of committing what you own to be a crime of such frightful magnitude, that the remorse it must entail on you would be unbearable, the question would be, not, how at any sacrifice you must vindicate your honour in the eyes of men, but 'how then can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?'"—he paused, then asked abruptly, "Do you admit all this?"

Lewis's features worked convulsively, as in a hollow broken voice he replied, "Yes, I do, God help me!"

"And He will help you," returned Frere, "if your repentance is indeed sincere; but that must be proved by acts, not words—Will you give up your revenge, and agree not to meet Lord Bellefield to-morrow?"

"No, by heaven!" exclaimed Lewis fiercely, springing to his feet. "The sole possession my father bequeathed to me, was his name and his spotless honour, and it shall never be said, that he left them to one whom men had a right to call coward."

"And yet a coward you are," returned Frere, sternly, "not in the particular of brute courage, shared with you by the tiger and the wolf, but in the far higher attribute of moral courage, the martyr spirit which enables the highest order of minds to endure the scorn of worldly men rather than offend God, and degrade themselves, by the commission of evil. I will ask one more question, and then I have done with you—you say you believe in a future and eternal life; are you fitted to enter upon that life to-morrow, through the dark portal of a sudden and violent death?"

As Frere uttered these awful words, in a tone of the deepest solemnity, Lewis, who had been impatiently pacing the room, stopped short, as though arrested in his course by a thunder-stroke. Placing his hand to his brow, he staggered as if about to fall, and Frere sprang up to support him. Recovering himself, he murmured—

"I must be alone, in half-an-hour you shall know my decision."

Then opening the door, he motioned to Frere to await him in the painting room, and closing it after him, locked it. What passed in that half-hour,—how prostrate before the Great White Throne the proud man wrestled with his agony, can be known but to One, the searcher of hearts. When at the expiration of the prescribed time the door was gently unclosed, and Frere entered, he found Lewis, pale indeed, and trembling, but calm as a little child.

"Bless you, dear old friend!" he said, "Truth, and you, have conquered; I place myself in your hands,—do with me as you will."

CHAPTER LX.

SHOWS HOW IT FARED WITH THE LAMB, THAT THE WOLF HAD WORRIED.

ABOUT nine o'clock in the evening, marked by the occurrence of the events narrated in the last chapter, General Grant was informed that a young man, who refused to give his name, requested five minutes' private conversation with him. Somewhat surprised at this demand, the General followed the servant into an apartment used by Charles Leicester as a study, and desired the person might be shown in, and in another moment a tall swarthy young fellow, dressed in the garb usually worn by the lower classes in Venice made his appearance. As soon as the servant had quitted the room, the stranger presented a note to the General, saying, "If you will read that, sir, you will perceive the object of my visit, and learn the necessity which forces me to intrude upon you at such an untimely hour."

The note, which was written in a delicate but somewhat illegible female hand, ran as follows:—

"A dying woman implores you, sir, to visit her, not for her own sake, for her hope rests in God and not in man, but for the sake of one who must be dearest to you in the world—your daughter. The writer has information to impart to you, which may save you and her from years of deepest misery; the bearer of this note will conduct you safely to one who again implores you by all you hold sacred not to neglect this summons, or delay returning with the messenger, lest you should arrive too late. The writer pledges her word, the word of one about to enter upon eternity, that you shall return safely."

"This is a very strange note," observed General Grant, suspiciously eyeing the young man, who stood awaiting his decision; "how am I to know that this is not some cunningly devised scheme, dangerous to my life or liberty?"

"I swear to you that you may safely trust me," replied the stranger, eagerly; "adopt what precautions you will, leave your money, or aught that is of value, at home—take pistols with you, and if you see any signs of treachery, shoot me through the head. I could tell you that which would render you as eager to accompany me as you now appear unwilling to do so, but I have promised to leave her to explain the affair as seems to her best—she is my sister, and dying; if you delay you will arrive too late."

"You are an Englishman, I presume?" inquired the General, still undecided.

"I am so," was the reply, "and have served my country on board a man-of-war."

"A sailor! what was your captain's name, and what ship did you belong to?" demanded the General.

"The Prometheus—Captain Mauvers," was the concise answer.

"Were you in her during the year 18—?" continued his questioner, and receiving a reply in the affirmative, added, "Where were you stationed then?"

"We accompanied a convoy of transports, taking the —th and —th foot to Madras, and then proceeded to China," was the answer.

The General nodded approvingly. "Quite true," he said; "Captain Mauvers is a friend of my own, and I know his vessel to have been then employed as you have stated. I will trust you; wait five minutes while I prepare to accompany you."

Within the time he had mentioned, General Grant returned, wrapped in a military cloak, beneath which he wore a belt supporting a sabre and a brace of pistols.

"If I do not return in two hours, give this note to Mr. Leicester," he said to the servant who attended them to the door; then motioning to the stranger to precede him, he quitted the Palazzo Grassini. Leaving the square of St. Mark they advanced towards the Rialto; crossing this, and passing the fruit and vegetable market beyond, they reached a spot where a gondola was waiting. Having stepped into it, the General, on a signal from his guide, seated himself near the stern, while the young sailor took an oar, and assisted his companion in propelling the light vessel. Having proceeded some short distance in this manner, the rowers paused at a flight of steps. Here the stranger signified to General Grant that they must disembark;

then resuming his office of guide, he led the way along the banks of the canal, and through courts and narrow alleys, inhabited by the lower orders of Venice, till he stopped before a rude door. At this he tapped twice in a peculiar manner. An old crone appeared in obedience to his summons; and cautiously unclosing the door admitted them. Taking a lamp from her hand, the young man led the way up a steep flight of stairs, closely followed by his companion.

"Wait one minute," he said, as they reached the top; returning almost immediately, he continued in a low whisper:—

"She is awake, and perfectly collected, but appears sinking fast, she is anxious to see you without delay;—tread as lightly as possible, and follow me."

Advancing a few steps, he opened the door of a bedroom, and the General, stooping his head to avoid striking it against the top of the doorway, entered. The apartment though small was clean, and more comfortably fitted up, than from the external appearance of the house he had been led to expect. On a low truckle-bed in one corner of the room, lay the form of the dying girl; at a sign from her brother, General Grant approached, and seating himself on a chair by the bed-side, waited till she should address him; for a few minutes she appeared quite unable to do so, and her visitor feared, as he gazed on her emaciated form and sunken features, that she had indeed delayed her communication till the paralysis of coming death had sealed her lips, never again to unclose in this life. In his earlier days, General Grant had been familiar with death in some of its most appalling shapes; he had seen men fall by his side, mutilated by ghastly sabre wounds, to be trampled under the hoofs of maddened plunging horses; he had stood immovable when the deadly artillery ploughed up the ground around him, and mowed down whole ranks as the scythe of the reaper prostrates the nodding corn; and when the word of command had gone forth, he had led on the remnant that were left, till charging to the cannon's mouth, the bayonet revenged the losses they had sustained; and when the fight was won, he had sat by the couch of some wounded comrade, and watched the strong man battle as it were with death, and yield his last sigh in a fruitless struggle with the inexorable enemy. But he had never before seen any one worn to the brink of the grave by sorrow and disease, and despite his utmost efforts to the contrary, the sight shocked and distressed him deeply. The picturesque stage of decline had long since passed away, and in the appearance of his victim the destroyer stood revealed in his true colours. The features of the poor sufferer were characterised by an expression of fatigue and distress, that told of long days and weary nights of patient endurance; she was so emaciated, that the form of the skull and the outline of the bones of the cheek and jaw were distinctly visible through the parchment-like skin, giving a strange unearthly appearance to the face, while the parched lips, the dark fever spot burning in the centre of each cheek, and at intervals the low husky cough, which once heard can never be mistaken, evinced only too surely the presence of that fell disease, which seems, as its peculiar attribute, to select its victims amongst the young and fair. Her whole appearance was so worn and corpse-like, that when, after a paroxysm of coughing, she raised her drooping eyelids and fixed her earnest appealing glance upon her visitor, he started as though he had seen one raised from the dead by the agency of some special miracle.

"I thank God that you are come, sir," she said, in a low sweet voice, "that I may yet do some good before I die. I have been the cause of much evil in my short life, and I felt it a duty to tell you the truth of my sad history, and do the little that is possible to save another from enduring the same misery that has brought me to the condition in which you see me;" she paused, and the silent, inward cough—the voice of death—again shook her fragile frame. "You do not know me," she resumed; "I am Jane Hardy." As she mentioned her name the General started, and, bending his head, drank in her every word with deep attention. "About three years ago," she continued, "or perhaps rather less, a gentleman who was staying at Broadhurst was thrown from his horse while hunting. He was stunned by the fall, and one of his companions brought him to our cottage. There was no one but myself at home; and I fetched water, and bathed his temples. As soon as he began to revive, the friend who had brought him said laughingly, that he could not leave him in better hands, and quitted us to follow the hunt. As the gentleman began to recover, he entered into conversation with me. He was very witty and clever, and told me of the fine sights he had seen in foreign lands, and many other beautiful and wonderful things which I had never heard of, and before he went away he drew me to his side, and kissed me, and said he should come again to see his kind little nurse, and I—God help me—I was young and simple, and I believed all he said, and from that hour I loved him. Well, sir, he came not only once, but often, and I listened to his soft words and specious promises, until I ceased to think of, or care for, anything but him. I had no mother to warn me; my poor father had become stern and morose, and I feared him, and sought only to conceal my attachment from him. With some of the facts you, sir, are already acquainted. My father was captured on one of his poaching expeditions, and sent to gaol. I sat up the whole night, waiting for his return, and in the early morning came, not he whom I was expecting, but my tempter. He told me what had occurred, revealed to me for the first time his real rank, promised to obtain my father's pardon by means of his wealth and influence, and, as the price of his assistance, implored me to fly with him. He could not make me his bride in England, he said; his position forbade it; but he vowed he would carry me to some bright land in the sunny south, and that we should be united, and live happily there. Weak fool that I was! I believed him, and consented.

"The rest of the tale is soon told. I accompanied him to London; he was kind to me, and my dream continued. By his desire I followed him to Rome, under the care of his valet. For a time I was treated with every attention; servants obeyed me, luxuries surrounded me: but his promise of marriage he never fulfilled. Then he began to grow tired of me, and my punishment commenced. He soon proved to me the true nature of his disposition; his temper was fearful, at once passionate, sulky, and vindictive; and I was a safe object on which to vent it. Still I could have borne this uncomplainingly if I could have believed that he continued to love me. But his coldness and indifference became every hour more apparent, till, at length, I awoke one morning to learn that he had deserted me. I discovered his direction, and wrote to him. I forebore reproaches; I knew that I had lost his love,—I knew, alas! too late, that he had never really loved me; and all I sought was to return to England, beg my father's forgiveness, and then, if it pleased God, to die. But I entreated him to send me money enough to take me home again. He left my letter unanswered for a week, and then enclosed me a cheque for five pounds, telling me that I had already cost him more than I was worth, and that I need expect nothing further at his hands."

"And the name of this diabolical scoundrel was——?" inquired General Grant, eagerly.

"Lord Bellesfield," was the reply, in a clear, distinct, though feeble tone of voice.

"What proof can you give me of this?" was the cautious rejoinder.

"These letters," returned the girl, producing a small packet from beneath her pillow.

The General took them, examined the post-marks and the seals, compared the signatures with that of a letter he took out of his pocket, read two or three of them, and then returned them, muttering in a voice that trembled with suppressed rage, "They are genuine, and they are his."

"The rest of my tale is soon told," resumed Jane Hardy; "Lord Bellesfield had left debts behind him, and when it was known he had quitted Rome, not meaning to return, those to whom he owed money seized the few valuables that I possessed (chiefly dresses and trinkets which he had given me), and my last hope, that of returning to England, was taken from me." Here a fit of coughing, prolonged till it seemed as though it must annihilate her feeble frame, effectually interrupted the speaker. Her brother held a strengthening cordial to her parched lips, and after a lapse of some minutes, she was enabled to resume her narration, though her voice was so weak and husky that it was with difficulty her auditor could catch her words. "I have little more to tell," she said; "I suffered much, very much misery, but, thanks to the kindness of some sisters of charity, (rightly were they so called,) I was saved from the depths of degradation, into which too many, deserted as I was, have been forced." Again she paused from weakness, and with the tenderness of a woman, Miles Hardy wiped the cold dews of approaching death from her brow, and put back the rich masses of her (even yet) beautiful hair. The General was visibly affected.

"Can nothing be done to save her?" he said; "I will ascertain who are the most skilful physicians in Venice, and send them to her. No money shall be spared."

A dark look flitted across Miles's face, but the dying girl turned towards the speaker, and a faint smile testified that she had heard and understood him.

"Tell me," she whispered, "that my last moments have not been spent in vain. Your daughter—they say she is good and beautiful; he will take her heart for the plaything of an hour, and then crush it as he has crushed mine. You will not let her marry him?"

"Sooner would I see her stretched on her death-bed before me," was the stern rejoinder.

The girl smiled again. "You have made me so happy," she whispered; then with difficulty, and pausing between each word, she continued, "Tell him I forgive him, and pray for him; I pray that he may repent." Again she paused, apparently struggling for breath; "Miles, it is very dark," she said; "come nearer, dear!" Her brother placed his arm round her, and nestling her head in his bosom, an expression of child-like happiness spread over her features. Having lain thus for some moments, she suddenly started up, exclaiming aloud, "Oh God! my chest!" In a moment the severe pain seemed to pass away, and the happy smile returned; "May He bless you, dearest!" she murmured; then a solemn change came over her countenance, there was a slight struggle, and then the jaw relaxed, the eyes glazed, and she fell back in her brother's arms a corpse.

When, later on that night, women came to perform the last sad offices to the dead, an English Bible was found beneath the pillow, and a leaf was turned down at the text, "Her sins, which are many, are forgiven, for she loved much;" words of mercy we should do well to bear in mind, and humbly trust they may indicate the future of many a "broken and contrite heart."

While General Grant was thus occupied, Annie, little dreaming of the various events that had occurred, and which so nearly concerned her happiness, was thinking over the scenes of the morning, and afflicting her spirit by the recollection of Lewis's parting words. What would she not give that he could know the truth; know why she had allowed herself to be engaged to a man whom Lewis had good reason to believe she both disliked and feared; but it was impossible, situated as she was, to enlighten him, and she must submit to bear that most bitter of all trials, the knowledge that one we love thinks evil of us, and has just and reasonable grounds for such misconception. Then her engagement to Lord Bellefield, now more hateful to her than ever,—what should she do to avoid it? to whom should she turn for counsel and assistance?—Laura?—she had great faith in her good sense, and, above all, in her energy of character—could she, dare she, confide in her? and she had just settled that she certainly could not, when a gentle tap was heard at the door. Annie cried, "Come in," and Laura entered.

"I hope I am not disturbing you, dear," she said, "but I grew fidgety about you, fearing the alarm and fatigue of the morning might have been too much for your strength."

Annie smiled mournfully, and shook her head, at the same time making room for her friend on the settee, upon which she was reclining. Laura placed herself by her side, and taking Annie's hand in her own, stroked it caressingly.

"Poor little hand," she said; "how soft and white it is, but it's getting sadly thin; really, dear Annie, I must lecture you. You eat nothing, and your spirits have quite deserted you—you who were such a happy merry little thing,—it makes me miserable to see you."

She paused for a reply, and at length it came; but in a form she did not expect, and which tended not at all to remove her anxiety.

"Do you think I am very ill, Laura?" Annie asked; "so ill that I am at all likely to die?"

"No, darling; I hope—I trust not," returned Laura, earnestly; "but why do you ask, and in so strange a tone that one could almost fancy you wished that it might be so?"

"Because I do wish it," was the sad rejoinder; "if I live I must be very unhappy—there is no help for it, and so I wish to die. Is that wrong? I am afraid it is."

Laura paused ere she replied,

"I don't think you are likely to die—grief kills very slowly. I am sure you need not die of grief, or seek to die to escape a life of unhappiness, if you would only be reasonable. I love you as I should have loved a sister, had I possessed one; my only desire is to render you happier; I am a woman, as yourself, and as little likely as you would be, were our situations reversed, to do or counsel anything which could wound your feelings or compromise your delicacy; and yet you lock your sorrow in your own breast, and refuse to give me sufficient insight into your heart to enable me to be of the slightest comfort or assistance to you. Is this wise, or even kind?"

Such an appeal, coming at that particular moment, was irresistible. Annie threw her arms round her friend, hid her face on Laura's shoulder, and sinking her voice almost to a whisper, inquired,

"What is it you wish to know?"

"You dislike Lord Bellefield, and are anxious not to marry him?"

"Yes, oh, yes!" was the unmistakeable answer.

"You love—"

Annie sank back, but Laura's arm, passed round her slender waist, detained her.

"You love Lewis Arundel?"

This time Annie did not reply, but a convulsive pressure of the hand answered Laura's question better than words could have done.

"Then, if you love him as he deserves to be loved, how could you allow yourself to be forced into an engagement with Lord Bellefield?"

"Must I, indeed, reveal to you all my folly and weakness?" murmured poor Annie.

"Really I am afraid you must, dear, if you wish my advice to be of the smallest use to you," returned Laura, with a kind encouraging smile; "but, perhaps, the follies may prove not to have been so very foolish, and the weaknesses turn out amiable ones after all. Come let us hear!"

Thus urged, Annie recounted with smiles, and tears, and words now dropping in broken sentences, now poured forth with all the eager vehemence with which feelings long restrained at length find vent, that portion of this veritable history which especially related to herself, and the rise and progress of her unfortunate attachment; until she reached the point whereat, overwhelmed by the belief that Lewis had departed from Broadhurst, suspecting her love and not reciprocating it, she had permitted herself to be hurried into an engagement with Lord Bellefield, sacrificing herself to guard against the possibility of any imputation being cast upon her maidenly reserve. Here Laura interrupted her by exclaiming—

"My poor child! I see it all now; you are to be pitied, not blamed; would to Heaven you had known the truth earlier! how much misery it might have saved you. Lewis Arundel quitted Broadhurst, because he loved you with all the impassioned tenderness of his fiery nature, and found even his iron will powerless to control, or even longer to conceal, his feelings."

"How do you know this?" exclaimed Annie, sweeping back her luxuriant ringlets from her flushed cheeks, and fixing her large eager eyes upon her friend's countenance.

"From his own lips when he first heard that you were coming here," was the reply. And Annie, pressing her hands to her eyes, hid her face in the sofa cushion and burst into tears; but this time they were tears of joy.

Then, when she had in some degree recovered from her agitation, Annie learned the history of Lewis's wanderings to cure his love, and how signally the remedy had failed, and how he had turned painter, and was cleverer than anybody else, (a fact of which she felt convinced before she heard it,) and how Laura had discovered his secret through the medium of his sketch of Annie and Faust,—(she did not mention the Giaour pictures, fearing to alarm her friend,)—and how Charles and she had seen a great deal of him and become very fond of him; (oh how Annie loved her for saying that!) and how at last one day she had gained his confidence, and he had told her all, and how she had resolved never to breathe a syllable of it to Annie, unless she could clear herself in the matter of accepting Lord Bellefield, and thus prove herself not unworthy to possess the knowledge that the priceless blessing of Lewis's noble and generous heart was hers, and hers only. And when Laura had finished, Annie, like a true woman, contrived by a series of "cunning-simple" questions to make her tell her tale all over again, particularly those portions which related to Lewis's nobleness of nature, and the depth, strength, and permanent quality of his affection for herself: and when all had been said and resaid that could by any possibility be found to say, even on this interesting matter, Annie fixed her soft imploring eyes on her friend's countenance, and asked in a tone of the most innocent but complete helplessness,—

"And now, dear Laura, tell me what is to be done?"

Up to this moment Laura had considered the whole question to hinge on one point,—was Annie worthy of the love of such a man as Lewis or not? This satisfactorily decided, all other difficulties seemed, by comparison, insignificant; but now, when the monster obstacle had disappeared, the engagement to Lord Bellefield, the General's obstinacy, Lewis's pride, Annie's womanly reserve, and Charley's indolence and dislike of saying or doing anything which could by the most remote possibility irritate or annoy any one, all flashed across her, and bewildered her. Still she had great faith in her own energy, and in the goodness of her cause, and so replied, vaguely, but confidently,

"Why, my love! it's perfectly absurd to give way to despair as you have been doing; of course, something must, and therefore can and shall be done; but what it is to be will, I confess, require some little consideration!"

And just when their deliberations had reached this point, Laura received a summons from her husband to say that he desired to speak with her; so she imprinted a kiss on Annie's smooth brow, and they parted.

"I say, Laura, read this," exclaimed Charley, looking worried and perplexed, as he handed his wife the following note:—

"Dear Charles, I have desired your servant to give you this note in case I should not return in the course of the next two hours. I am about to accompany a young stranger, representing himself to be an English sailor, to visit his sister, who is on her death-bed, and has some communication to make to me. I have examined the man, and believe his tale; but if I should not return within the time specified, it is probably a clever fabrication, and as no lie can be framed for other than an evil purpose, you had better apply at once to the police, and look after me in whatever way they may advise. Yours faithfully,

"ARCHIBALD GRANT."

"Pleasant that," resumed Charley, as Laura, having finished the note, returned it with looks of alarm. "Evans declares it's more than two hours since Governor Grant started, and there are no signs of him yet. Why people can't stay quietly at home when they've got a good house over their heads, instead of rushing out to seek dangerous adventures, I can't think. I should have supposed the General had arrived at a time of life when he would have sense enough not to be gulled by messages from girls, either living or dying. Perhaps the summons was meant for Bellefield after all, and the bearer delivered it to the wrong man; what a joke that would be, eh?"

"Really, Charles, I don't think it is anything to laugh at," returned Laura, anxiously; "is your brother at home?"

"No, Belle's out too, my family is becoming shockingly dissipated."

"Had you not better apply to the police, as the note proposes?" urged Laura.

"Police, indeed," muttered Charley; "the General can't remember that he is out of London. I wonder he did not direct me to send a cab for him. These confounded sulky Austrian officials are rather different customers to deal with from our blue-bottles,—Messrs. A. I. and Co. The only thing is to go down to the consul's office, and that must be done, I suppose, but it's an awful bore."

So saying, Charley yawned, stretched himself, made Laura ring for his boots, and had just accomplished the labour of pulling them on, when rapid footsteps were heard—doors opened and shut, and the object of their anxiety stood before them, his face flushed with exercise, and bearing in his whole manner traces of excitement and agitation.

"Well, General," began Charley, "we were just going to commence fishing for you in all the canals—" when his auditor interrupted him by inquiring in a quick eager voice,

"Your brother is not in the house, is he?"

"No; he has been out all the evening, and is not yet returned," was the reply.

"Leave us, Laura, there's a good girl," exclaimed the General; "stay," he continued, as Laura was quitting the room, "do not say anything which can alarm Annie."

Laura nodded her acquiescence, and departed.

"I am very anxious about your brother," resumed the General. "As I was returning from this most strange and painful interview, the young man who had summoned me still acting as my guide, some person followed us, and, as we were crossing the Rialto, approached, and, tapping my companion on the shoulder, detained him. They conversed in Italian, but I made out enough of what they said to catch the following words spoken by the new-comer:—

"I have traced him the evening through. He went from—' (the names of the places I could not hear) ' to —, which he has this moment quitted. Jacopo and the others are prepared; we only await your directions. Why have you not joined us sooner?"

"It was impossible," was the reply; "but all will yet go as it should."

"Then, turning to me, my guide continued,—'You have now only to walk straight on to reach the Square of St. Mark; no one will interrupt you. Farewell, air; and remember her wishes.'

"This referred to his poor sister, about whom I will tell you another time. He and his companion then quitted me. Mechanically I walked forward, reflecting on the interview, which had harassed and distressed me greatly, till, suddenly recalling the words I had just overheard, a new idea struck me, and I turned and looked back; as I did so I perceived, at some distance off, a man carelessly advancing towards me—at the moment several others rushed out upon him, there was a short struggle, then, as it seemed to me, he was overpowered, a cloak was flung over his head, and he was hurried away. Instantly I ran to the spot, but it was some considerable distance from the place where I had been standing, and when I arrived there no traces of them were visible. The whole affair from beginning to end was over in less than a minute, but from the glimpse I had, I feel convinced, the man I saw carried off was your brother."

"Nonsense," exclaimed Charles, starting, "kidnap Bellefield; why, what possible motive could any body have for doing that?"

"One only too powerful—revenge!" was the alarming reply. "My guide was young Hardy, whose sister Bellefield has cruelly betrayed and forsaken. Come, Charles, let us obtain aid to seek and save him; God grant we may not arrive too late."

THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

BY J. M. W.

"Then I gazed into the Future far as human eye can see, Saw the vision of the World, and all the wonders that would be."—Locksley Hall.

THE vision of the future is vast and brilliant enough to satiate the imagination of the most poetic among us; and how men who pride themselves on being very sober and practical are reconciled to the necessity for introducing visions of fairyland into the everyday business of life, we are amused to think. Surely they are a little frightened at heart, and could very well dispense with the beauty and brilliancy of the prospect opening before them and their children's children. Beauty and brilliancy—the Fine Arts, and the Pleasing Manufactures—do not seem sound, substantial investments for the British capitalist; yet, strange to say, the British capitalist, in these latter days, begins to find that they pay—nay, pay well. What is more, the mere capitalist discovers that his contemporary, who has taste and knowledge in his brain, as well as gold in his pocket, doubles his money possessions faster than he does, who has no intellectual business to attend to; and thus the unskilled capitalist, like the unskilled labourer, stands no chance in the competition with the skilled. The result is, that the men who are now in the van of British commerce and manufactures are men of enlightened views and elevated aims, and those who would not imitate or cooperate with them from sympathy and confidence, are forced to do so through very shame and the fear of losing what they already possess. They do not halt like the spirit of the age, but they yield to it, nevertheless, and in time will be moulded by it, and will be loath to see their children influenced by the spirit of the coming age, as it is their destiny to be. Without adequate knowledge, and without faith in the progress of humanity, such men shrink from calling up any reasonable picture of the state of things likely to grow up out of the work of this present generation. If any one present to their minds some idea of this, they do not know what to make of it.

Such a man I talked with recently, as I stood on the bridge over the Serpentine, looking at the elegant fabric that rose like an exhalation before us. His talk set me thinking of the "unknown future," and "the good old times," as he called them. While he went on with melancholy forebodings and vague visionary fears, I was calling up a picture of the past, and making him figure in it in a way he little suspected—good man and merchant as he is. I will tell you what I was thinking of, reader, provided you promise never to divulge the matter to my practical friend, who wonders "how all this nonsense of universal exhibiting and promiscuous visiting of foreigners will end!" and "what our sensible forefathers would think of that silly glass toy!"

Closing my eyes for a moment, I opened them again, and looked around. The place was the same, "but with a difference." It was Hyde Park, not as it is now, but as it was nineteen hundred years ago. All marks of civilization were gone. Park, roads, bridge, Serpentine, barracks, houses, people, all had disappeared. I stood on the verge of a tangled thicket, which skirted a great primeval forest on the north, and the carol of innumerable birds alone broke the silence. From the spot on which I stood, the ground sloped gently for about a mile down to a broad winding river, that glittered like molten gold in the morning sun. I knew the fair stream that was one day to be called the "royal towered Thames." Wild swans sailed gracefully hither and thither over its surface, appearing and disappearing among the reeds on the bank of the opposite reach, called afterwards by the invading Saxon, Balder's Sea, or the Sun God's Bay. The ground between me and the river (now populous Chelsea and Brompton) showed no trace of man or his works. Where the Hammer-smith and Putney omnibuses now run, the wild roe and the fox—the snake and the lizard—the badger and the squirrel had all to themselves, save when the hungry wolf came to dispute a claim to existence with them. A rich mossy turf, broken here and there by patches of coarse grass, gorse, underwood, and now and then a tall forest tree, was all that the eye could see towards the south. North, east, and west stretched the primeval forest—now bursting into leaf-bud. It might have been the utmost recess of an uninhabited island, so wild, fresh, and untrodden was the solitude. As I was enjoying the repose, and the savage beauty of the scene—quick and graceful as an aquatic bird, a coracle or light canoe shot across the stream, paddled skilfully by a human hand. Man, then, held dominion here. I watched my new acquaintance land on the near bank, and wander up and down. His attention seemed riveted on the eminence where I stood. He stopped and gazed—advanced, and stopped again. At length he stood still for some minutes, then retreated as if in alarm—again he advanced slowly. It was a strange pantomime of astonishment, fear, and curiosity.—Was I, the modern Briton, clothed in broadcloth and crowned with beaver skin, the cause of all this excitement in the breast of an ancient Briton? At last courage seemed to predominate within him, and he drew near. I felt no more astonishment than one does at the strangest metamorphoses in a dream, when in the graceful form of the naked, woad-dyed, splendidly tattooed savage before me, with his long streaming black hair and short hunting-spear, I recognised my practical round-shouldered friend already introduced to the reader, although I knew well enough that he would never stir from home, on a spring morning, without his everlasting great coat, comforter, and umbrella. I was not in the least shocked, either at the coolness of his stare or of his costume; I was only a little surprised, I remember, to see how nimbly and gracefully he bounded over the ground, and to hear how remarkably well he spoke Welsh. My own sudden proficiency in that language seemed also quite a matter of course.

"Oh, son of Gwynne the brave!" he began, with an agitated voice, and fierce gleaming black eyes; "thou, too, art a seer and a prophet. Is it with thee as it is with me? Is this fair hunting-ground changed to thy view as by the wand of the sorcerer? Have the armed sons of the southern land, that dwell in palaces of stone, made this ground of the brave Trinobantes their own? Dost thou see, as I see, all this green hill, over which our fathers hunted, cut up by the accursed instruments of the Roman, and made to wave with a new grass that they will force us to eat instead of the noble acorn? Are my eyes enchanted that I no longer see the thickets that sheltered the wild beasts? Are the tall trees laid low? Is all the ground laid bare to the plough of the invader? Do I, indeed, see our descendants tamely reaping corn where we have hunted the fallow deer and fought with the wolf?" And he tossed back his hair wildly from his face, and looked about him like a clairvoyant, who dreads the thing he sees. I looked around too. It was as he had said—a change had come o'er the scene. Between us and the river side, the ground was covered with waving corn, and near at hand, on the site of the Great Exhibition, stood a farmer's dwelling, of a fashion I had never seen. A woman clothed in a flowing robe was bearing a vessel of water on her head; she had filled it from a spring that bubbled near; and labourers were scattered in the fields. The scene was no longer one of savage beauty. The hand of man had converted it into one of agricultural industry and prosperous repose.

"Oh, most noble Trinobant!" I replied, "to me, as to thee, is it given to discern the things which are yet in the bosom of futurity; but this future that I gaze upon is fairer and more desirable than that state of things in which you have lived. See here abundance. Food for a score where was lately barely food for one man, and that obtained at peril of his life. Say, is it not better so?" I turned, and the slight motion recalled me from my short dream.

"Better, how?" asked Mr. Jones, testily: "I have been talking this half hour about the dreadful spirit of innovation (improvement, enlightenment, you call it); I have been telling you of the corruption of morals that this terrible influx of foreigners will cause among us; to say nothing of the revolutionary spirit they will spread among the disaffected lower classes; I even tell you of the horrid conspiracy they had formed to murder our blessed queen and her artist-husband, and which was fortunately discovered and knocked on the head by a policeman, and you actually turn round and ask me if it is not better so. Allow me to say that you young fellows of the progress-party are all a little mad. Good morning! I can't stand looking at that great glittering bazaar any longer. And if you'll take a lesson from the wisdom of your ancestors——"

"I shall come to the same conclusion as if I took a lesson from you," I said, laughing.

"The creature man is the same in all ages; it is only the costume that is different," said the commonplace philosopher. "Your great glass-house, and the communion of all people within it, will never change his nature a bit, unless to make him more conceited and less simple in his habits. We shall all be wanting to live in glass-houses next."

"Well," I replied, eagerly, "and what harm would there be in that?"

"Oh, none; only the little boys of the next generation must learn not to throw stones. Glass-houses, indeed! what nonsense! Good morning."

And away went the old-fashioned gentleman, flourishing his umbrella and muttering to himself.

Ten minutes afterwards, I stood within the Crystal Palace, and forgot him and all other things but that wondrous structure. The coup d'œil of the whole from the central point of the ground floor is astounding. The immense length, the height of the transept, the light and elegant supports and galleries; the innumerable right-lines, forming symmetrical figures of various sizes, but perfectly harmonious in their combination; the fine lines spread net-wise over the roof, as if it were the work of a huge geometric spider; the unsubdued light, the aerial, cheerful elegance, produce the strangest sensation of novelty, at the first glance. The feeling of admiration deepens as you remember how rapidly this enormous building has sprung up at the will of an energetic nation. As you move slowly along, and begin to understand how strong and firm it all is, more and more are you astonished that it should be so, for it looks ten times more unsubstantial from within than it does from without. It seems like a mere network of lines and light, like a morning mist ready to dissolve into thin air, and

"like the baseless fabric of a vision
Leave not a wreck behind."

You cannot class it with the great works of archiitecture. Solidity, massiveness, the fretted vault, the sculptured capital, the solemn depth of shadow, and the partial light, revealing more by their mysterious blending and contrast than the flood of day pouring into the Crystal Palace on all sides, above and around; all these are wanted here. There is too much blank light, and there is no shadow at all. On a sunny day it has a wonderfully airy and gay effect, and if it may not be properly pronounced grand or beautiful, it is very elegant and gigantically pretty. It does not bring thoughts of the great supernatural ideas which over-arch our mortal life. It does not help to move from our hearts. We do not feel as we look around, that we are brought nearer to the eternal, immutable, all-perfect Source and Centre of all things; we do not pause and keep silence because the place is hallowed by the inspiration of a lofty genius. No, we are moved to surprise and admiration at the wonderful cleverness of the whole, the signal evidence of the power and intelligence of civilized man to create new worlds (material worlds) out of the fair globe which we inhabit; and we are lost in speculating as to how far off from his present stage of mechanical skill is the point at which God will say to man, "Hitherto shalt thou go, and no further." As far as reason will carry us now, we may safely say that point is far distant.

"the burden of the mystery Of all this unintelligible world"

The feeling of strangeness and novelty, combined with that of airy cheerfulness, is what takes possession of the mind on first entering the Crystal Palace. The sort of thing is quite new, and you have no foregone conclusions, about what it ought or ought not to be like, to reconcile with your first impressions. After the novelty has ceased to astonish, as you wander along the elegant airy galleries, and look down into the vast nave, slowly, a true perception of the enormous size of the building steals into the mind. You see wagons and horses standing in the transept, and they look like children's toys. Large old elms spread their branches, and seem small; the very sparrows believe they are flying about under the blue canopy of heaven. As you are looking at the pigmy size of a fellow-creature below, you see many more,—about five thousand workmen, returning hurriedly from dinner. They blacken the ground near the entrance like swarming emmets. This lasts only for a few minutes; they disperse themselves throughout the building, and it seems empty once more. An army could perform its evolutions conveniently in that long-drawn nave. The galleries themselves are the most charming promenades imaginable, and to see a gorgeous procession sweep through them in the sunshine will be an enlivening sight. As it stands, the only fault that I can find with the appearance of the Crystal Palace is the flat roof of the nave. It would have been better, I think, had it been vaulted like the transept. The blue paint used in the decoration is also not quite pleasing; it should have been of a more delicate hue. When the awning is placed under the roof and along the south side of the building, the effect of the whole interior will be much improved. At present, there is too much light; articles valuable for their colour will lose all richness in the glare. The want of shadow, too, reminds one of the portraits of Queen Elizabeth. A tinted awning would remove these objections very easily. It is a most surprising thing that there should be so little to find fault with, and that the projectors should have had a little difficulty in executing so great and elegant a design. Perhaps it would have been impossible, in ten years' study, to have hit upon anything more appropriate for the intended Exhibition. Mr. Paxton's words occurred to us often while we were wandering about among the bales and packing-cases assembled from every land "from Indus to the Pole." He says in a paper addressed to the Society of Arts on the 13th of November, 1850:—"A structure where the industry of all nations is intended to be exhibited, should, it is presumed, present to parties from all nations a building for the exhibition of their arts and manufactures, that, while it affords ample accommodation and convenience for the purposes intended, would of itself be the most singular and peculiar feature of the Exhibition. How far this has been accomplished, I must leave to the community to decide."

The community will pronounce a decision thoroughly satisfactory to the able projector of the edifice; of that there is little doubt; and we hope future communities, as well as the present generation, will have further cause to be grateful to the memory of Mr. Paxton. May his wish of converting the whole into a winter garden, after it has served its original purpose, be realized! He says, "I would convert the building into a permanent winter garden, and would then make carriage drives and equestrian promenades through it. Pedestrians would have about two miles of galleries, and two miles of walks upon the ground-floor, and sufficient room would then be left for plants. The whole intermediate spaces between the walks and drives would be planted with shrubs and climbers from temperate climes. In summer the upright glass might be removed, so as to give the appearance of continuous park and garden."

Think of the blessing this winter garden would be to invalids, studious persons, and young children! Of the fashionable world we take no account; they are well able to provide for their own pleasures. Surely there is something very nearly akin to genius in the man who plans a Crystal Palace (the very name seems taken from an Arabian tale!) for the purpose of collecting within it all the cunningly devised works of every nation under heaven, that each may see how clever the others are, and learn from and esteem them accordingly; and then proposes to convert it into a garden more beautiful than the far-famed hanging one of the Babylonian Semiramis. And if the ingenuity, taste, and skill of the man who devised the building deserve the thanks and admiration of the world, what shall we say of the mind of the man who first proposed to the country the whole scheme of a Great Industrial Exhibition for all Nations? When you, good reader, hold this in your hand, the completed plan will be in operation; and, as far as may be judged from the promising state of matters now, it will be as successful as its projector and his royal wife can desire. But if it were not to prove successful—were it even to turn out a complete failure, we should say that it was an idea worthy of a great prince,—noble, benevolent, and of extended utility. The spirit in which the thing was conceived, is that in which it should be carried through. What the nature of that spirit is, cannot be better described than in Prince Albert's own words, addressed to an assembly of dignitaries of the chief cities of the British Empire. When we remember that the person who speaks is a young prince, and a foreigner, this beautiful speech is the more remarkable.

"I conceive it to be the duty of every educated person closely to watch and study the time in which he lives, and as far as in him lies to add his humble mite of individual exertion to further the accomplishment of what he believes Providence to have ordained. Nobody, however, who has paid any attention to the particular features of our present era, will doubt for a moment that we are living at a period of most wonderful transition, which tends rapidly to accomplish that great end to which indeed all history points, the realization of the unity of mankind."

It may fairly be disputed whether all history does point to such an end, but I suppose most men would be glad enough to believe it, and at all events we congratulate the prince whose heart and imagination are kept for ever warm by such a thought. He goes on eloquently, thus:—

"Not a unity which breaks down the limits and levels the peculiar characteristics of the different nations of the earth, but rather a unity the results and products of those very national varieties and antagonistic qualities. The distances which separated the different nations and parts of the globe are gradually vanishing before the achievements of modern invention, and we can traverse them with incredible speed; the languages of all nations are known, and their acquirement placed within the reach of everybody; thought is communicated with the rapidity, and even by the power of lightning. On the other hand, the great principle of the division of labour, which may be called the moving power of civilization, is being extended to all branches of science, industry, and art. Whilst formerly the greatest mental energies strove at universal knowledge, and that knowledge was confined to the few, now they are directed to specialities, and in these again even to the minutest points. But the knowledge acquired becomes at once the property of the community at large; whilst formerly discovery was wrapt in secrecy, it results from the publicity of the present day, that no sooner is a discovery or invention made than it is already improved upon and surpassed by competing efforts.

The products of all quarters of the globe are placed at our disposal, and we have only to choose which is the best and cheapest for our purposes, and the powers of production are entrusted to the stimulus of competition and capital. So man is approaching a more complete fulfilment of that great and sacred mission which he has to perform in this world. His reason being created after the image of God, he has to use it to discover the laws by which the Almighty governs his creation, and, by making these laws his standard of action, to conquer nature to his use—himself a divine instrument. Science discovers these laws of power, motion, and transformation; industry applies them to the raw material which the earth yields us in abundance, but which becomes valuable only by knowledge; art teaches us the immutable laws of beauty and symmetry, and gives to our productions forms in accordance with them. The Exhibition of 1851 is to give us a true test and a living picture of the point of development at which the whole of mankind has arrived in this great task, and a new starting-point from which all nations will be able to direct their further exertions. I confidently hope that the first impression which the view of this vast collection will produce on the spectator, will be that of deep thankfulness to the Almighty for the blessings which he has bestowed upon us already here below; and the second, the conviction that they can only be realized in proportion to the help which we are prepared to render to each other; therefore, only by peace, love, and ready assistance, not only between individuals, but between the nations of the earth."

Honour to the head and to the heart of the man who has set himself to work to lay the foundation of a Temple of Concord; not the old Pagan deity, but the most noble Christian virtue, Charity. The result, if it do not equal his hopes, (which, alas! cannot be expected of any earthly scheme,) will, we trust, be of immense immediate advantage to all nations, and that it must have incalculable effects for good in future days, we feel to be as certain as that two and two make four. The city of London will probably profit immensely by the influx of visitors in a mere money sense, and we can conceive few events more calculated to enlighten and improve John Bull's estimate of foreign nations than the visits of so many to this land of ours,—

"This royal throne of kings, this scepter'd isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by nature for herself,
Against infection and the hand of war."

Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur. Old John of Gaunt, had he lived in these days, would have joined heartily with Prince Albert in his desire to show England what other nations can do in the useful arts, and he would have felt that more good would be done to John Bull by the friendly shakes of the hand he will have to give to outlandish foreigners, whom he has been taught to despise, than John Bull has any notion of. Nothing smooths away misunderstanding and ill-grounded dislike like personal contact. Many persons, I know, are in a terrible state of alarm at the revolutionary crowd from the continent that may be expected to inundate London, and poison the minds of our innocent tradesmen and artisans. Such persons show a marvellous want of perception of the grand characteristics of the Anglo-Saxon race; to them we say, Wait and see.

The material of the Great Palace itself is now attracting much attention, with a view to the erection of dwelling-houses of a similar kind; and if the window-tax be abolished, glass will be as common as brick and mortar. Of the antiquity of the manufacture of glass, and the course of its improvement up to the present time, some idea may be gathered from the following extracts from Rees' Encyclopædia:—

"De Neri will have glass to be as ancient as Job, for that writer speaking of wisdom, (chap. xxviii. ver. 17,) says, 'Gold and glass shall not be equalled to it.' This, we are to observe, is the reading of the Septuagint, Vulgate Latin, St. Jerome, Pineda, &c., for in the English version, instead of glass we read crystal.

"Most authors will have Aristophanes to be the first author who mentions glass: Aristotle has two problems upon glass; the first, Why we see through it? the second, Why it is not malleable? If these problems be Aristotle's, which the learned very much doubt, this would be the earliest testimony in favour of the antiquity of glass; but the first author who makes unquestionable mention of this matter is Alexander Aphrodisæus, who uses it in a simile,—'As the floridness of a colour is seen through glass.' Among the Latin writers Lucretius is the first that takes notice of glass,—'Nisi recta foramina tranant, qualia sunt vitri.' Dr. Merret, however, adds that glass could not be unknown to the ancients, but that it must needs be as ancient as pottery itself, or the art of making bricks. How old soever glass may be, the art of making and working it appears of no great antiquity. The first place mentioned for the making thereof is Sidon, in Syria, which was famous for glass and glass-houses. The first time we hear of glass made among the Romans was in the time of Tiberius, when Pliny relates that an artist had his house demolished for making glass malleable, or, rather, flexible; though Petronius Arbitr, and some others, assure us that the emperor ordered the artist to be beheaded for his invention. According to Bede, artificers skilled in making glass were brought over into England in the year 674 by Abbot Benedict, who were employed in glazing the church and monastery of Wearmouth. Till this time the art of making glass was unknown in Britain; though glass windows did not begin to be used before the year 1180. Venice for many years excelled all Europe in the fineness of its glasses; and in the thirteenth century the Venetians were the only people that had the secret of making crystal looking-glasses. The great glass-works were at Muran or Murano, a village near the city, which furnished all Europe with the finest and largest glasses.

"The glass manufacture was first begun in England in 1557: the finer sort was made in the place called Crutched Friars, in London; the fine flint glass, little inferior to that of Venice, was first made in Savoy House, in the Strand, London. The first glass plates, for looking-glasses and coach windows, were made in 1673, at Lambeth, by the encouragement of the Duke of Buckingham; who, in 1670, introduced the manufacture of fine glass into England, by means of Venetian artists, with amazing success, so that within a century past, the French and English have not only come up to, but even surpassed the Venetians, and we are now no longer supplied from abroad. The French made a considerable improvement in the art of Glass, by the invention of a method to cast very large plates, till then unknown, and scarce practised yet by any but themselves and the English."

If the reader is curious concerning the latest improvements in the art of glass-making, he would do well to read a book recently published by A. Pellatt, (Bogue, Fleet Street,) from which he will learn much, and be amused much. Full as London is every year of Exhibitions for the delectation of visitors, this annus mirabilis will far outdo every former year. The great one will not swallow up the smaller ones. Of some of these, the most memorable, we shall probably give some account in a future number. Two or three panoramas of considerable interest we hear talked of already: one of these, occupying the ground of the old Chinese Exhibition, is likely to be among the most popular, embodying the principal sites and scenes of Scripture history, from correct sketches by Mr. Bartlett. When pains-taking artists of this kind are copied by the projectors of panoramas, it is a decided advantage to the sight-seeing multitude, who thus see only what is real, instead of what is doubtful, clap-trap, or decidedly bad. Another of the marvellous London sights will be Wyld's large globe, in Leicester Square. It is something to have geography and a few kindred ologies made easy for the million; and it is also something (no little, I should say, if I lived in the neighbourhood) to get that mournful receptacle for rubbish—the area of Leicester Square—covered over at all. Honour to the map-seller! Vive Monsieur Wyld! echo the Frenchmen of the quartier.

CHRISTIANITY IN CEYLON.¹

THIS handsome volume is merely a portion of the work which Sir James Emerson Tennent meditates publishing on the history and present condition of Ceylon. His official residence in the island, and the intellectual energy and activity he has bestowed on the investigation of the great religious, moral, social and commercial considerations connected with the government of this valuable possession of the British crown, render him a very fit person to undertake such a work for general information. The reason for the appearance of this branch of his subject in a separate form, Sir James states in a brief preface. It is simply this: Upon entering into the question of religion in Ceylon, he found materials accumulate in great abundance, and of so interesting a character, that it was impossible to make them "a subsidiary portion of a more comprehensive work," and still more impossible to leave them out altogether. As no intimation is given of the contemplated size of the forthcoming work, it is not easy to judge whether or not the present volume could have been made a subsidiary portion of it with advantage to the whole. But unless the remaining portion be very much shorter than we hope it will be, there would have been some advantage to the public in keeping them both together, and not much difficulty in doing so, as the present volume is printed in very large type, and contains only a very moderate quantity of matter. However, we are by no means disposed to quarrel with our author for putting forth a book in so attractive a form; and as regards substance, we can have no hesitation in affirming that it gives a complete, though necessarily compendious account of the state of religion, past and present, in Ceylon. The Sketches of the Brahmical and Buddhist Systems of Religion, as they have prevailed, and still prevail in the island, are written with the enlightenment of a philosophical student, and the practical knowledge acquired by personal observation of their effects.

The very name of Ceylon conjures up a hundred visions of Oriental scenery, dear to the imagination of every European; that is, of every European who is blest with such a faculty. The wonderland, the dreamland, the beautyland, the Paradise or Happy Land of the West, has ever been the East; and, in the language of the school-historians, "the cradle of civilization was in the East." Of all the islands in the east, Ceylon is the one which we confess to loving the best—not that we have seen it with our bodily eyes;—neither it nor any other; but we have associated the island of Taprobane, Scendib or Ceylon, with the adventures narrated in Arabian tales, with the early navigation of Greeks and Romans, and the earlier conquests of the great forgotten rulers of Central Asia. We have some notion that Sindbad's valley of diamonds was in Ceylon. At all events, there are in Ceylon just such long, narrow valleys, flanked by "eagle-baffling mountains," and emerging after a long winding course on the sea-shore; and here precious stones are found,—"rubies and cat's eyes, sapphires and emerald." Merchants from foreign lands were wont to trade with the natives for them, or search for the treasures themselves. And as Persians were among these merchants, there are few things we are more willing to believe, than that among these Persians came Sindbad from Bassora; and we have no doubt that there is some foundation for the story about the lumps of raw flesh and the roc's egg. We hear of things quite as strange every day. Then the sea-coast of Ceylon reminds us of the pearl-fishery, the great business of the maritime population of "Ormuz and of Ind;" and its interior regions—vast plains of cinnamon groves and plantations,—mountains, and great tropical forests, where the elephants range in vast herds. Then there are the ruins of temples and mountains, sacred to a world-old faith, to which the natives cling with the tenacity of ignorance and a sluggish intelligence. Their summum bonum is le bien être physique, en attendant, the far-off end of all existence, seen in dim perspective; viz. a positive-negative bliss in Nirvana. In the picturesque towns and villages scattered over the plains, or grouped under the palm-trees, we see a gentle, graceful population, swarming in the morning or evening light,—

"Dusk faces, with white silken turban wreath'd."

With these pictures and imaginings, Sir James's subject has, at a first glance, little in common. The account of a supposed early Christian Church in Ceylon in the sixth century, even of a supposed visit of St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew the Apostles to the island, are scarcely visionary enough to blend with them; but the moment the words Brahma and Buddha sound on the ear, we seem to have found something belonging to the place. Our author touches upon the subject of the dispute as to whether Brahmanism or Buddhism be the more ancient faith,—whether Buddhism be a later effort to purify Brahmanism, or the original primitive religion of which the Brahminical system is a corruption; but he does not pronounce dogmatically on so difficult a question. We give the following short passage on Brahmanism:—

"The religion of the Hindoos has hitherto rested securely on two grand supports,—the scheme of physical science which pervades all the details of their sacred mythology, and their slavish submission to the divine caste of the Brahmans. The latter, the Levites of the East, have been venerated as the vicegerents of spiritual authority upon earth, and the depositaries of human knowledge, and expounders of all heavenly wisdom. From Brahm, the universal and self-existent intelligence, by whom the universe was willed into existence, (but to whom, strange to say, no temples are erected in Hindostan, since his attributes are too sublime and ethereal to be reduced to any intelligible type under which they could be adequately worshipped,) proceeded at the same time the Hindoo triad, Brahma the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver, and Shiva the Destroyer. To Brahma was confided the formation of all the beings that were to people the myriads of worlds that had been produced from the great mundane egg, and direct from his presence proceeded the countless progeny of animated forms that have since moved through the universe.

"From his head issued, first of all, the caste of the Brahmans, and simultaneously with their birth flowed from his lips, in finished and substantial form, the sacred volumes of the Vedas, for the instruction of mankind in all needful knowledge. Of these, from the beginning of time, the Brahmans were ordained the exclusive guardians, and the sole teachers and interpreters of their transcendent truths. From the arm of Brahma proceeded the military caste of the Kshatryas; from his breast Vaishyas, or pastoral and mercantile races, with their innumerable subdivisions, and from his foot the laborious caste of the Shudros, whose doom is that of toil and of humbleness, of slavery and degradation.

"Caste, in all its visible arrangements, is thus not only conferred by the Brahmans to a sacred and lofty origin, but in its distribution and subordination its adjustment from the commencement is asserted to have been unaltered, and it is presumed that to the extinction of the universe it must remain the same and immutable. Caste is not a distinction of degree, but of essence. A member of one recognised caste could by no merit or exaltation be elevated into one higher in the scale; and if by the violation of the institutes of Brahma, an individual should be overtaken by the awful visitation of an expulsion from caste, he falls, not into a lower receptacle, for whose rites and institutions, its functions and its duties, he would be utterly disqualified, but he drops altogether out of the pale of mankind. He becomes an outcast, a pariah, for whom humanity has a form, but no recognised place,—a name that concentrates all that a Hindoo holds loathsome and abhorred."

The whole of this vast and gloomy religious system is so compact and entire, embracing every act, thought, and word of daily life, that it is next to impossible an unthinking, indolent population should ever be set free from its superstition. The high-caste men have too many privileges to be disposed to find any fault with it, and the feudal dependence of the lower castes upon the higher makes all the efforts of the Christian missionary to lead them to a purer faith an almost hopeless labour. But still the Christian missionaries, Portuguese and Dutch, worked hard, in times past, to convert the Tamils of the north, and the Cingalese, or, as our author writes, Singhalese, of the south, from their respective errors. The Tamils were Brahmans and the Singhalese Buddhists, with few exceptions; and are so still, where the doctrines of Christianity have not superseded the older religion. Before giving an account of the progress of Christianity among the Singhalese, we will quote from our author some observations on the widely extended faith of Buddha which it has to contend against. No mere shadowy opposition, as will be seen.

Buddhism, our readers may not be aware, is generally believed to have been professed in Hindostan before Brahmanism prevailed there:—That its chief seat was Bahar. The famous temple of Juggernaut is supposed to have been originally a Buddhist, and not as now a Brahminical temple.

"In its migrations to other countries since its dispersion by the Brahmans, Buddhism has assumed and exhibited itself in a variety of shapes. At the present day its doctrines, as cherished among the Jains of Guzerat and Rajpootana, differ widely from its mysteries as administered by the Jaina of Thibet: and both are equally distinct from the metaphysical abstractions propounded by the monks of Nepal. Its observances in Japan have undergone a still more striking alteration from their vicinity to the Syntoos, and in China they have been similarly modified in their contact with the rationalism of Loo-tsen and the social demonology of the Confucians. But in each and in all, the distinction is in degree rather than in essence; and the general concurrence is unbroken in all the grand essentials of the system.

"Whilst Brahminism, without denying the existence, practically ignores the influence and power of a creating and controlling intelligence; Buddhism, exulting in the idea of the infinite perfectibility of man, and the achievement of the highest attainable happiness by the unflinching practice of every conceivable virtue, exalts the individuals thus pre-eminently wise into absolute supremacy over all existing beings, and attempts the daring experiment of an atheistic morality. Buddha himself is not worshipped as a deity, or a still existent and active agent of benevolence and power. He is revered merely as a glorified remembrance, the effulgence of whose purity is to serve as a guide and incentive to the future struggles and aspirations of mankind. The sole superiority which his doctrines admit is that of goodness and wisdom; and Buddha himself, having attained to this perfection by the immaculate righteousness of his actions, the absolute subjugation of his passions, and the unerring accuracy of his unlimited knowledge, became entitled to the homage of all, and was required to render it to none."

It will be seen from the following, that the ultimate state of bliss or repose of the Buddhist approaches very nearly to, if it be not identical with, annihilation. This doctrine most persons, not versed in metaphysical subtleties, will be disposed to regard as essentially the same with the Brahminical one of the final absorption of the soul in the supreme essence; for such persons will argue that the loss of conscious individual existence is identical with non-existence or total oblivion.

"Externally coinciding with Hindooism, so far as the avatar of Buddha may be regarded as a pendant for the incarnation of Brahma, the worship of the former is essentially distinguished from the religion of the latter in the important particular that it regards that exalted being, not as an actual emanation or manifestation of the divinity, but as the guide and example to teach that enthusiastic self-reliance by means of which mankind of themselves, and by their own unassisted exertions, are to attain to perfect virtue here, and to supreme happiness hereafter. Both inculcate, but with diversified characteristics, the mysterious doctrine of the metempsychosis; but whilst the result of successive embodiments is to bring the soul of the Hindoo a step nearer to the final beatitude of absorption into the essence of Brahma, and actual identification with the Creator, the end and aim of the Buddhistical transmigration is to lead the purified spirit to Nirwana, a condition between which and utter annihilation there exists but the dim distinction of a name. Nirwana is the exhaustion without the destruction of existence, the close but not the extinction of being.

"In deliberate consistency with this principle of human elevation, the doctrines of Buddha recognise the full eligibility of every individual born into the world for the attainment of the highest degrees of intellectual perfection and ultimate bliss; and herein consists its most striking departure from the Brahminical system, in denying the superiority of the 'twice-born' over the rest of mankind, in repudiating a sacerdotal supremacy of race, and in claiming for the pure and the wise that supremacy and exaltation which the self-glorified Brahmans would monopolise for themselves.

"Hence the supremacy of caste is utterly disclaimed in the sacred books which contain the tenets of Buddha; and although in process of time his followers have departed from that portion of his precepts, still distinction of birth is nowhere authoritatively recognised as a qualification for the priesthood. Buddha being in fact a deification of human intellect, the philanthropy of the system extends its participation and advantages to the whole family of mankind, the humblest member of which it sustains by an assurance that by virtue and endurance he may attain an equality, though not an identification with the supreme intelligence. Wisdom thus exalted as the sole object of pursuit and veneration, the Buddhists, with characteristic liberality, admit that the teaching of virtue may not be confined to their own professors alone; especially when the ceremonial of others does not involve the taking of life. Hence in a great degree arises the indifference of the Singalese as to the comparative claims of Christianity and Buddhism, and hence the facility with which, both under the Portuguese, the Dutch, and the British Government, they have combined the secret worship of the one with the ostensible profession of the other. They in fact admit Christ to have been a teacher, second only to Buddha, but inferior, inasmuch as the latter, who was perfect in wisdom, has attained to the bliss of Nirwana."

This similarity between the pure morality of Buddhism and the morality of the Christian faith, in both of which the same great everlasting laws are recognised as of divine origin, makes it an easy matter for the Singalese to become a professing Christian, and that without any violation of his conscience or swerving from his original faith. The following anecdote is sufficiently illustrative of this fact; so that a Singalese can scarcely be said to deceive when he assents to the Christian religion (as he understands it) but remains a Buddhist in his heart. They are not accustomed to anything like accuracy of thought, and have no proper perception of what truth is. Truth mixed with falsehood is in all their thoughts, words, and works. Alas! is it not so with many people calling themselves members of a sound Christian community?

"A curious illustration of the prevalence of this disposition to conform to two religions, was related to me recently. A Singhalese chief came, a short time since, to the principal of a government seminary at Colombo, desirous to place his son as a pupil of the institution, and agreed without an instant's hesitation, that the boy should conform to the discipline of the school, which requires the reading of the Scriptures, and attendance on the hours of worship and prayer; accounting for his ready acquiescence by an assurance that he entertained an equal respect for the doctrines of Buddhism and Christianity.

"'But how can you,' said the Principal, 'with your superior education and intelligence, reconcile yourself thus to halt between two opinions, and submit to the inconsistency of professing an equal belief in two conflicting opinions?'

"'Do you see,' replied the subtle chief, laying his hand on the arm of the other, and directing his attention to a canoe, with a large spar as an outrigger, lashed alongside, in which a fisherman was just pushing off upon the lake—'Do you see the style of these boats, in which our fishermen always put to sea, and that that spar is almost equivalent to a second canoe, which keeps the first from upsetting? It is precisely so with myself: I add on your religion to steady my own, because I consider Christianity a very safe outrigger to Buddhism.'

Until the time of the British dominion in Ceylon, (it was ceded to us at the peace of Amiens) very little seems really to have been done by the Christian Missionaries. The Portuguese, with their ceremonial religion, in many respects similar to the pomps and pageantry of the religion they desired to extirpate, found no difficulty in obtaining nominal converts to the Roman Catholic faith. The celebrated St. Francis Xavier, "the Apostle of India," was the first who preached to the Tamil population of the North of Ceylon, some forty years after the Singhalese in the South had numbered many nominal converts. But all these conversions seem to have been merely the effect of an obsequious desire to obtain favour with their governors. If the Roman Catholic faith, with its many attractions to an imaginative and sensual people, failed to conquer the national superstition, still less success had the Presbyterian form of Christianity, brought into the island by "those gentlemen-pedlars, the Dutch."

For a great part of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, the Catholics and Presbyterians in Ceylon seem to have been more heartily engaged in quarrelling with each other, than in warring against Paganism. The natives took part with each according to the accident of geographical position. This painful state of things gave way to a better, at the occupation of the island by the British. There are now Missionary establishments in Ceylon, of various sects and nations. The American Mission; according to Tennent, is upon the whole the most effective. Their education of females has had the most beneficial result, as will be seen from the following:—

"But the great effort of the missionaries, and that in which their success has been the most remarkable, is the education of girls. In the face of the proverbial jealousy of Orientals, as to everything that concerns their women, it required more than ordinary foresight and courage to encounter the difficulty, amounting almost to hopelessness, of effecting any successful result from such an unpromising undertaking as the establishment of female schools, and, above all, of boarding schools, for the complete separation of girls from their family and friends. No incident in the early struggles of the mission occasioned more severe animadversion of the natives, or created a stronger repugnance to their objects, than the spectacle of the European ladies assuming a prominent position in their own household, and being permitted to sit at table with the males of the family; the idea of a woman presuming to eat in the presence of her husband being something utterly repugnant to all their previous habits and views of propriety.

"As a portion of that social policy which thus condemns the women of India to a position of submissive inferiority and domestic toil, there exists an active hostility to the education of females, as tending to disturb their relative position in society, and to destroy their feeling of passive subordination to the other sex. So universally prevailing is this sentiment, that when the Americans first opened their female schools, reading and writing were sciences unknown to the female population of Jaffna; and it is doubtful whether there could have been found in the peninsula a woman of any rank who knew the letters of the Tamil alphabet.

"The first pupils of the American Mission at Oodooville were enticed to come by presents of dress, by the prospect of reward at each stage of their progress, and by the promise of a dowry of five or six pounds, in the event of their remaining in the institution till married with the approval of their teachers. Yet, even when allured by these encouragements, so strong was the prejudice against female instruction, that the parents who had yielded and allowed their daughters to attend were visited with reproaches for their folly, and the children themselves evinced a sense of shame and confusion, when, for the first time, they engaged in the novelty of learning to read.

"But there was an object to be attained in this undertaking, of much deeper importance than might at first be apparent. Notwithstanding the intellectual degradation of women, and the badge of social inferiority imposed upon them, the custom of the Hindoos in Jaffna, in relation to marriages and dower, had invested their females with an authority and control over property, which go far towards restoring them, in practice and reality, to that position and influence from which ignorance and prejudice have displaced them. It is a paramount object of ambition with Tamil parents, to secure an eligible alliance for their daughters, by the assignment of extravagant marriage portions. These consist either of land, or of money secured upon land, and as the law of Ceylon recognises the absolute control of the lady over the property thus conveyed to her sole and separate use, the prevalence of the practice has by degrees thrown an extraordinary extent of the landed property of the country into the hands of the females, and invested them with a corresponding proportion of authority in its management."

It is evident that the women of Ceylon are by no means in so helpless and dependent a state as their sisters in Persia and Turkey. Whether they can succeed to sovereign power, as the high-caste women of Hindoostan often do, is not mentioned by our author. His visits to the American Mission establishments at Manepy and Oodooville are interesting, as bearing upon the important subject of education, and are in every way satisfactory. The American Mission deserves the thanks of the British government for its successful labours in the cause of Christianity and civilization in this fine island.

"My earliest visits, after reaching Jaffna, were made to the institutions and schools of the several missions, and especially to those of the American missionaries. On the evening of my arrival, so soon as the decline of the sun rendered it practicable, I drove to the printing-office at Manepy, a hamlet within five miles of the fort, embowered amidst luxuriant groves, above which rises the graceful spire of the village church. The establishment was in active operation; the presses in motion, the binding-rooms full of bustle and business, and the book stores crowded like a repository in Paternoster Row, with shelves of bound volumes, and piles of printed sheets, that rose in columns to the ceiling. The contents of these apartments are all destined for the schools of the various missions, and for almost gratuitous circulation amongst the Tamils of Jaffna.

"The Female Seminary of Oodooville is but a few miles from Manepy. It happened to be the commencement of the recess, and the pupils had been dispersed for the holidays; their residences were not, however, very far distant, and having heard of our intention to visit the schools, there was a numerous attendance of scholars, who had flocked in joyfully in order that we might not be disappointed of our object. They were most interesting creatures, from six to ten and twelve years old, clad in white jackets, but wearing the gold and silver ornaments and bangles with which the Indians are so eager to decorate their children. In their gentle, and at the same time happy demeanour, as well as in the neatness and modesty of their dress, they showed to much advantage, as compared with the scarcely delicate costume of the females of Jaffna in general. But what interested me most was that a number of young married women were present, who had been educated at Oodooville. There was a joyous expression in their features, as if they felt proud of their association with a place endeared to them by pleasant recollections, and with which they were still identified in the persons of their children, who had already been enrolled as its inmates. They testified the most agreeable interest in all that passed in the examination of the pupils, waiting for their answers with lively attention, and expressing their satisfaction with a smile when any of their little favourites made a ready reply. At the conclusion of their lessons and exercises, the scholars sung a hymn with Tamil words to a plaintive Hindoo air, and I think I never listened to music more touching, or that left a more pleasing impression on my memory, than was produced by the sweet and melodious voices of that happy little choir."

From our author's interesting chapter on the moral and social character of the Singhalese, a great deal of important information may be derived. The Singhalese seem to have the gentleness and mildness of the Hindoo nature, joined with more liveliness and energy. They are prone to deceive, and with them, until lately, lying and theft were not considered crimes at all, or even disgraceful practices.

Throughout Ceylon there are monuments of the industry and art of a bygone civilization. Great temples and colossal statues of Buddha, in which the ideas of power and repose are embodied, are to be found in the sacred places of the island. What our author says with regard to the wonderful tanks of the island is well worthy attention. He devotes a long note to a description of one of these, from which we extract the following:—

"No monuments of antiquity in the island are calculated to impress the traveller with such a conception of the former power and civilization of Ceylon, as the gigantic ruins of the tanks and reservoirs, in which the water during the rains was collected, and preserved for the irrigation of their rice lands. The number of these structures throughout vast districts now comparatively solitary, is quite incredible, and their individual extent far surpasses any works of the kind with which I am acquainted. Some of these enormous reservoirs, constructed across the gorges of valleys in order to throw back the streams that thence issue from the hills, cover an area equal to fifteen miles long, by four or five in breadth, and there are hundreds of a minor construction."

But the energy and industry which formed these useful works seem to have departed from the people, for they are nearly all in ruins, and are allowed to remain so. However, we think Sir James Tennent gives sufficient cause for hope in the efforts which the government and the various Christian Missions are making in the island, and in time the Singhalese may be all that the most benevolent can desire. One thing must not be forgotten by the teachers and missionaries themselves, or by those who concern themselves in their labours.

"The scope and the soil for missionary labour in the East, at the present day, is in many respects, but especially in this particular, widely different from that cultivated by the first Apostles of Christianity. Man-kind, in the area within which their earliest efforts were made, had been already awakened to inquiry from the long torpor of an exhausted superstition. The philosophy and the ethics of Greece had shed their light over the regions of Western Asia, and disturbed the crude mythology of the Romans and their tributaries. The long stagnation of the human mind was at length moved. Philosophy had given a noble expansion to intellectual power, and diffused an energetic contempt for the absurdity of pagan rites. Satire had directed its shafts in ridicule of popular delusion; and rhetoric had roused, whilst science directed an impulse to the exposure of error, and the search after truth. Contemporary with these great social phenomena, two powerful auxiliary movements were in active operation, to aid the extension of Christianity—the dispersion of the Jews, with their sacred books and antiquities, over every region of the Western World, and the diffusion of the literature and language of the Greeks, (the vernacular of the Apostles, and probably of their august Master himself,) over all the southern dominion of Rome, where the Greeks, before their final submission, had planted their colonies, from the shores of the Hellespont to the confines of the Atlas.

“Coextensive with the march of the Apostles, therefore, were the facilities which they found already prepared for the triumph of their missions; but these facilities, their humble followers throughout the East, at the present day, have, in every instance, slowly and laboriously to create amidst difficulties more obstructive, and influences more adverse, than the dangers which beset the path of the Apostles, or the active persecution which overtook their earliest disciples. Instead of the strife of theology, they have to overcome the apathy of indifference, and experience has proved that they encounter a more formidable opponent in the stupor of ignorance than in the dialectics of scepticism.”

The educated among the Singhalese are, it seems, nice students of style, and care more for the form in which a truth is communicated, than for the truth itself; indeed, they will read anything that is agreeably and gracefully put before them. But no attention has been paid to this point by the Christian teachers, who often offend their pupils by using very inelegant, inappropriate, and sometimes offensive language. The following for instance, is much to be regretted:—

“In the preparation of the Church of England version of the Scriptures, and the Book of Common Prayer, an innovation has likewise been admitted, to which it will be long before the ear and taste of the Singhalese will be thoroughly reconciled. So pliant is their dialect, and so artistically has it been inflected, to adapt it to the relative station of the personages addressed, that in one particular alone, the variations of a single pronoun, a native of Ceylon is enabled to apply with delicate propriety no less than ten or twelve degrees of respect, each appropriate to the recognised rank of the individual addressed, and ranging from a familiarity expressive of contempt, to a degree of awe and veneration, with which, in their ideas of worship, the Supreme Being alone should be approached. In the version of the Scriptures translated by the Church of England missionaries of Cotta, all these distinctions have been equalized; they have omitted the use of the honorific ‘wohause,’ and addressed the Deity throughout, with the ordinary appellation of ‘to’ or thou. The alteration has given rise to the most vehement remonstrances on the part of the higher class of natives, and of the many who, like them, have been reared in that national veneration for rank, which the Buddhists have substituted somewhat inartificially for the prohibited distinctions of ‘caste.’ They have protested, as blasphemous, against application to the Supreme Being of epithets which would be felt as an insult if addressed to themselves. They lately rose in a body, and retired from a Church, when the obnoxious version was introduced, and they have intimated, should an innovation so offensive be persevered in, to seek in some other communion of the Christian Church that respect for their feelings which they conceive has been disregarded in their own.”

We have attempted to give some general idea of the contents of this volume, but to all persons really interested in our East Indian dominions, we would say, “Read it for yourselves.” There is no parade of the pedantry of Oriental learning, and probably the author is more acquainted with men and manners in Ceylon, than with the Pali or Sanscrit languages; but his knowledge is quite sufficient for his readers, on the more abstruse matters connected with his subject, and on all others he will be generally accounted a good authority. We look forward to the publication of the rest of his work with considerable interest. The style of this first portion is easy, fluent, and manly. The few notes to each chapter are full of valuable matter, and the illustrations on wood, from designs by Nicholl, are very fine specimens of this kind of engraving.

“I can never so far sacrifice my judgment to the desire of being immediately popular, as to cast my sentences in the French moulds, or affect a style which an ancient critic would have deemed purposely invented for persons troubled with the asthma to read, and for those to comprehend who labour under the more pitiable asthma of a short-witted intellect.”—Coleridge’s “Friend.”

EDITORIAL ERRORS.

We have received the following, relative to a note in our last Number stating, that in the Battle of Fontenoi the English were defeated by the French:—

“MR. EDITOR,—Learn that the Battle of Fontenoi was gained by the Irish brigade. The French had not moved the English; Saxe admitted it; and the English did not fly; they retreated in good order.—From an OLD SOLDIER.”

We beg to assure our Correspondent that we spoke of this engagement only in general terms, as a victory gained by the French, well knowing that it involved no disgrace to our brave countrymen, whose valour was never more conspicuously displayed. If the “Old Soldier” is familiar with the actions of Versailles, he must be well aware that our neighbours have not failed to make the most of this success.

It is necessary, also, to correct a statement relating to General Dembinski, viz. that he was obliged to support himself by selling cigars at New York. This was inserted upon the authority of a recent American newspaper, and happily proves to be as apocryphal as many other statements from the same quarter. The veteran hero, as we find from the Journals, is released from captivity, and is, we believe, now at Paris.

YETHOLM, AND THE SCOTTISH GIPSIES.

THE village of Yetholm, the head-quarters of the Scottish Gipsies, lies embosomed among the far famed Cheviot hills, and being surrounded on all sides by lofty mountains, seems completely sequestered from the rest of the world. A clear and rapid stream called the Bowmont, a tributary of the Till, separates the village into two portions,—Kirk Yetholm and Town Yetholm; a broad level haugh intervening between them. The former is the residence of the gipsy population. Changes are few and far between in that sequestered district, and the description given of it more than thirty years ago, is still applicable. "A mill, and a church, and churchyard rise from the brink of the water, beyond which appear the straggled houses of the village, built in the old Scottish style, many of them with their gable-ends, backs, or corners turned to the street or towngate, and still further up, the Tinkler Row, with its low unequal straw-covered roofs and chimneys, bound with rushes and hay-ropes; men and women loitering at their doors, or lazily busied among the carts and panniers, and ragged children scrambling on the middenleads (dung-hills), in intimate and equal fellowship with pigs, poultry, dogs and cuddies (asses)."¹ The surrounding scenery is wild, solitary, and pleasingly rural. The hills have no pretensions to magnificence of height or to romantic shapes, but they are smooth and steep, and of the most beautiful verdure. It seems a land, as Sir Walter Scott remarks, which a patriarch would have chosen to feed his flocks and herds. The remains of here and there a dismantled and ruined tower, remind us of the sturdy moss-troopers, whom it harboured only a century and a half ago.

"Their gain, their glory, their delight,
To sleep the day, maraud the night,
O'er mountain, moss and moor."

The whole of the district indeed abounds with memorials of ancient border warfare, and many floating traditions may still be collected among the farm-houses and cottages of the peasantry, respecting the Kers, the Douglasses, the Somervilles, the Scotts, and other border rovers, who issued from their fastnesses among "Cheviot's mountains lone,"

"In England for to drive a prey."

It is not known with any degree of certainty, at what time the gipsies first took up their residence at Kirk Yetholm, or what reasons led them to prefer it. It is probable, however, that their choice of this situation may have been owing to the peculiar facilities which this sequestered district afforded for the indulgence of their roaming and predatory habits. The family of the Faas—the hereditary monarchs of the Kirk Yetholm gipsies—seem to have been the first who settled there; it is supposed, at a very early period. The Youngs were the next in order, and they were followed by the Gordons, Baillies, and other clans. They were long patronised by the ancient family of the Bennets of Grubet,² from whom they received a feu of their cottages for nineteen times nineteen years, which they still hold from the Marquis of Tweeddale, the present proprietor of the estate. Fifty years ago, the gipsy colony amounted to fifty persons; in 1839, it consisted of twenty-six families, including in all, one hundred and twenty-five individuals.

The earliest notice of the gipsies in the historical records of Scotland, is contained in a letter from James IV. to the King of Denmark, dated 1506, in favour of Anthony Gawino, Earl of Little Egypt, and his followers; "an afflicted and miserable tribe, who alleged that they were upon a pilgrimage over the Christian world, by command of the Pope, and having sojourned for a time in Scotland, now wished to go to Denmark." James therefore solicits the extension of his royal uncle's munificence towards them, adding, at the same time, that the destiny, manners, and lineage of these wandering Egyptians must be better known to him, because the kingdom of Denmark was nearer to Egypt. Thirty-four years later (Feb. 15, 1540) a singular document called a "writ of privy seal" was granted by James V. in favour of John Faa, Lord and Earl of Little Egypt. This writ enjoins all sheriffs and magistrates to support the authority of John Faa, "in execution of justice upon his company and folks conform to the laws of Egypt, and in punishing of all them that rebel against him;" and more particularly they are directed to assist in apprehending "Sebastian Lalowe, Egyptian, one of the said John's company," with his eleven "complices and partakers," who have rebelled against him, and "removed out of his company, and taken frae him divers sums of money, jewels, claiths, and other goods, to the quantity of one great sum of money, and on nac wise will pass hame with him; howbeit, he has bidden and remained of lang time upon them, (waited for them long,) and is bounden and obliged to bring hame with him all them of his company that are alive, and one testimonial of them that are dead;" the nonfulfilment of which obligation, he pretends, will subject him to "heavy damage and skaith (hurt), and great peril of loss of his heritage." A special injunction is then given to all magistrates, to lend John Faa their prison stocks and fetters, and whatever may be necessary for reducing his refractory subjects to order; and masters of vessels and mariners are charged to receive John Faa and his company, when they shall be ready to go "furth of the realm to the parts beyond the sea." It appears from this curious edict, that the "Lord and Earl of Little Egypt" had succeeded in completely imposing upon the government, by this story about his "band" and "heritage," and had so adroitly managed matters as to obtain from the authorities not only toleration, but a recognition of his jurisdiction within his own band, "according to the laws of Egypt." In the following year, however, the Lords of Council appear to have discovered the deception that had been practised upon them, and revoked the letters and privileges formerly granted to John Faa and his followers, and proceeded forthwith to pass sentence of banishment upon the whole race. In spite of this peremptory injunction, the gipsies appear to have pursued their trade of tinkering and fortune-telling in Scotland with impunity, for the next quarter of a century, till, at length, both their numbers and their crimes increased to such a degree during the "troubulous times" of Queen Mary, that in 1579, it was found necessary to adopt vigorous measures for their repression, and a statute was enacted for the "punishment of the strang and idle beggars," in which "bards, minstrels, and vagabond scholars," are conjoined in ignominious fellowship with "the idle people calling themselves Egyptians," and it is provided that "being apprehended they shall be put in the King's ward and irons, sae lang as they have ony goods of their own to live on, and when they have not whereupon to live of their own, that their ears be nailed to the tron, or to another tree, and their ears cuttit off, and banished the country, and if thereafter they be found again, that they be hangit."

This stringent statute, though repeatedly renewed and strengthened with additional clauses, seems to have utterly failed in restraining the depredations of these vagrants, and in 1603 a proclamation was issued banishing the whole race out of Scotland for ever, under the severest penalties. This, and various other sanguinary edicts which followed, were put into execution without mercy against this unhappy race, and the records of the Scottish criminal courts make mention of great numbers of "Egyptians," both men and women, who were hanged and drowned in the most summary manner. Notwithstanding these severities, the gipsies prospered amid the intestine feuds by which the country was torn asunder, and received large accessions from among those whom famine, oppression, or civil broils, had deprived of the ordinary means of subsistence. Fletcher of Saltoun, who wrote about 150 years ago, states that "in all times there have been about 100,000 of these vagabonds who have lived without any regard or subjection either to the laws of the land or even those of God and nature." In the progress of time, however, as the power of the laws, and the material prosperity of the country increased, the gipsy tribes were gradually reduced in number, and many were entirely rooted out. As they were driven from the more populous districts of the country they seem to have taken refuge in the border counties, chiefly in such situations as afford a ready escape, either into a waste country or into another jurisdiction.

Kirk Yetholm thus became the head-quarters and stronghold of the Scottish Gipsies, as they were successively extirpated from their other haunts and fastnesses. Like the rest of their tribe in Britain, the Kirk Yetholm gipsies are a mixed race between the ancient Egyptians, who arrived in Europe about the beginning of the fifteenth century, and vagrants of European descent. Still their tawny complexion, black, piercing eyes, and remarkable cast of countenance, together with their wandering and predatory habits, and peculiar language, sufficiently attest their origin. They derive their ostensible means of livelihood from the mending of pots and pans, the manufacture of horn spoons, called cutties, and of baskets and besoms, and the sale of coarse articles of earthenware. They are great adepts in hunting, shooting, and fishing, and are not particularly scrupulous either as to time and place, or the means they employ in following their sport.¹ Many of them cultivate music with success, and in days not long gone by, the favourite fiddler or piper of the district was often to be found in the gipsy village. They are notorious for their pilfering and plundering habits everywhere except at home, where they generally contrive to maintain a tolerably decent reputation for honesty. James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, states that in their visits to the vales of Ettrick and Yarrow they not only cleared the rivers and burns of fish, but the farmers' outhouses of poultry and eggs, and the lums (chimneys) of all the hams and black puddings that hung there for the purpose of reisting. It was also well known that they had no scruples in killing a lamb or a wether occasionally, but they always managed matters so dexterously, that no one could ever ascertain from whom these were taken. Old Will Phaup, a well-known character at the head of Ettrick, was accustomed to give them shelter for many years. They asked nothing but house-room and grass for their horses, and though they sometimes remained for several days, he left every chest and press about the house open, with the certainty that nothing would be missing, for he said, "he aye kend fu' weel that the tod (fox) would keep his ain hole clean."

The Yetholm gipsies, like all their tribe, have a strong tendency to vagrant habits; they are usually absent on excursions ten months in the year; they travel in different bands, and have rules among themselves by which each tribe is confined to its own district. The slightest invasion of the precincts which have been assigned to another tribe, produces violent quarrels, in which there is often much blood shed. They usually travel with a train of asses and small carts, or tumblers, as they are called, in which they place the decrepit and helpless, the aged and infant members of the family. At night they frequently find accommodation in barns and byres, and other outhouses, and when this cannot be obtained they take the canvass covering from the cart, and squat below it, to use the words of a border magistrate, like a covey of partridges in the snow. Although they are almost

Our readers will remember the description given in Guy Rimer of the "goodly stew composed of fowls, hares, partridges, and moor game, balled in a large mess with potatoes, onions, and leeks," on which Meg Merrilies regaled Dominic Sampson. "There's been mony a moonlight watch to bring a' that trade thagither," said Meg; "the folk that are to eat that dinner thought little o' your game laws."

universally a lawless race, neither fearing God nor regarding man, yet they are not altogether destitute of a certain kind of honour peculiar to themselves. They reckon it a disgrace to steal near their homes, or from those who befriend them, and they punctually discharge their pecuniary obligations. If confidence is placed in them they will not forfeit their promise, or betray trust. They are deeply grateful for favours bestowed on them, and will long remember a kindness done either to themselves or to their relatives; but if thwarted in their plans, or checked in their depredations, they are exceedingly vindictive, and are restrained by no check either of fear or conscience from taking desperate vengeance upon those who offend them.¹ The following graphic account of their habits and pursuits is given by Leyden in his "Scenes of Infancy:"—

"On Yeta's banks the vagrant gipsies place
Their turf-built huts; a sun-burnt, swarthy race!
From Nubian realms their tawny line they bring,
And their brown chieftain vaunts the name of king:
With loitering steps from town to town they pass,
Their lazy dames rock'd on the pannier'd ass;
From pilfer'd roots or nauseous carrion fed,
By hedgerow greens they strew the leafy bed,
While scarce the cloak of tawdry red conceals
The fine-turn'd limbs, which every breeze reveals;
Their bright black eyes thro' silken lashes shine,
Around their necks their raven tresses twine;
But chilling damps and dews of night impair
Its soft sleek gloss, and tan the bosom bare.
Adroit the lines of palmistry to trace,
Or read the damsel's wishes in her face,
Her hoarded silver store they charm away—
A pleasing debt for promised wealth to pay.

Their notions of religion are exceedingly limited and imperfect. Like most ignorant persons, says a writer in Blackwood,² they are extremely superstitious, —carefully noticing the formation of the clouds, the flight of particular birds, and the songhing of the winds, before attempting any enterprise. They have been known for several successive days to turn back with their loaded carts, asses, and children, upon meeting with persons whom they considered of unlucky aspect, nor do they ever proceed upon their summer peregrinations without some propitious omen of their fortunate return. They burn the clothes of the dead, not so much from any apprehension of infection being communicated by them, as the conviction that the very circumstance of wearing them would shorten the days of the living. They likewise carefully watch the corpse by night and day till the time of interment, and conceive that "the deil tinkles at the lykewakes of those who felt in their deathdraw the agonies and terrors of remorse."

The reader will, doubtless, recollect the picturesque description given in Guy Mannering, of the superstitious ceremonies practised by Meg Merrilies beside the dying smuggler, at the Kaim of Derneclueh. Kirk Yetholm was the residence both of Jean Gordon, the prototype of the character of Meg, and of her granddaughter Madge, who, as Sir Walter acknowledges, sat to him as the representative of her person. The latter is described by one who knew her well, as "a remarkable personage of very commanding presence, and lofty stature, being nearly six feet high. She had a large aquiline nose, and penetrating eyes even in her old age, bushy hair that hung around her shoulders, from beneath a gipsy bonnet of straw, a short cloak of a peculiar fashion, and a long staff, nearly as long as herself. Jean was accounted the queen of the Yetholm clan, and had great sway over her tribe. She was quite a Meg Merrilies, and possessed the savage virtue of fidelity in the same perfection." Sir Walter Scott tells an excellent story respecting this heroine, which is strikingly illustrative both of the good and bad features of the gipsy character. Having been often hospitably received at the farm-house of Lochside,³ near Yetholm, she had carefully abstained from committing any depredations on the farmer's property. But her sons (nine in number) had not, it seems, the same delicacy, and stole a brood-sow from their kind entertainer. Jean was so much mortified at this ungrateful conduct, and so much ashamed of it, that she absented herself from Lochside for several years. At length, in consequence of some temporary pecuniary necessity, the farmer was obliged to go to Newcastle, to get some money to pay his rent. Returning through the mountains of Cheviot, he was benighted, and lost his way. A light, glimmering through the window of a large waste barn, which had survived the farm-house to which it had once belonged, guided him to a place of shelter; and when he knocked at the door, it was opened by Jean Gordon. Her very remarkable figure, for she was nearly six feet high, and her equally remarkable features and dress, rendered it impossible to mistake her for a moment, and to meet with such a character, in so solitary a place, and probably at no great distance from her clan, was a terrible surprise to the poor man, whose rent (to lose which would have been ruin to him) was about his person. Jean set up a loud shout of joyful recognition—"Eh sirs! the winsome gudeman of Lochside! Light down, light down, for ye maunna gang farther the night, and a friend's house sae near." The farmer was obliged to dismount and accept of the gipsy's offer of supper and a bed.

"Hush! Meg, hush! hush! that's not safe talk."
"What does she mean?" said Mannering to Sampson, in an under tone.

"Fire raising," answered the laconic Dominie.

(3) Lochside tower stands on a piece of ground, now a peninsula, but formerly an island in Yetholm loch, a picturesque sheet of water. It was the baronial residence of the Kers of Lochnower, a branch, probably, of the Kers of Cessford, the ducal house of Roxburgh. This ancient tower, and the surrounding scenery suggested to the author of Waverley the picture he draws of Avenel Castle, in the Monastery.

There was plenty of meat in the barn, however it might be come by, and preparations were going on for a plentiful supper, which the farmer, to the great increase of his anxiety, observed was calculated for ten or twelve guests, of the same description no doubt with his landlady. Jean left him in no doubt on the subject. She brought up the story of the stolen sow, and noticed how much pain and vexation it had given her. Like other philosophers, she remarked that the world grows worse daily, and like other parents, that the bairns got out of her guiding, and neglected the old gipsy regulations, which commanded them to respect, in their depredations, the property of their benefactors. The end of all this was an inquiry what money the farmer had about him, and an urgent request that he would make her his purse-keeper, as the bairns, as she called her sons, would soon be home. The poor farmer made a virtue of necessity, told his story, and surrendered his gold to Jean's custody. She made him put a few shillings in his pocket, observing it would excite suspicion, should he be found travelling altogether penniless. This arrangement being made, the farmer lay down on a sort of shake-down, as the Scotch call it, upon some straw, but, as will easily be believed, slept not. About midnight the gang returned with various articles of plunder, and talked over their exploits in language which made the farmer tremble. They were not long in discovering their guest, and demanded of Jean, whom she had got there?—'E'en the winsome gudeman of Lochside, poor body,' replied Jean; 'he's been at Newcastle, seeking for siller, to pay his rent, honest man, but deil be licket he's been able to gather in, and sae he's e'en gaun hame, wi a toom purse, and a sair heart.'—'That may be, Jean,' replied one of the banditti, 'but we maun ripe his pouches a bit, and see if it be true or no.' Jean set up her throat in exclamations against this breach of hospitality, but without producing any change of their determination. The farmer soon heard their stifled whispers and light steps by his bedside, and understood they were rummaging his clothes. When they found the money which the providence of Jean Gordon had made him retain, they held a consultation, if they should take it or no; but the smallness of the booty, and the vehemence of Jean's remonstrances, determined them in the negative. They caroused, and went to rest. So soon as day dawned, Jean roused her guest, produced his horse, which she had accommodated behind the hallan, and guided him for some miles, till he was on the high-road to Lochside. She then restored his whole property, nor could his earnest entreaties prevail on her to accept so much as a single guinea.

This adventure has evidently furnished a hint for the scene between Meg Merrilies and Bertram, in the ruined tower at Derncleuch.

Jean Gordon's sons appropriately terminated their pilfering career by "the waefu' woodie." According to tradition they were all condemned to die at Jedburgh on the same day. It is said the jury were equally divided, but that a friend to justice, who had slept during the whole discussion, waked suddenly, and gave his vote for condemnation in the emphatic words, "Hang them a'." Jean was present, and only said, "The Lord help the innocent in a day like this." Poor Jean herself was brutally ducked to death in the river Eden at Carlisle by the cowardly rabble of that town, as a penalty for her stubborn Jacobitism. She struggled stoutly with her murderers, and often got her head above water, and while she had voice left continued to exclaim at such intervals, "Charlie yet! Charlie yet!"

Jean was married to one of the Faas, the gipsy royal family, and either her husband, or more probably one of her sons, was murdered at one of their clan meetings by Rob Johnston, another gipsy, who instantly fled, and contrived to elude the pursuit of justice for more than ten years. But it was easier to escape from the grasp of the law than to elude gipsy vengeance. Jean Gordon traced the murderer like a bloodhound, followed him to Holland, and from thence to Ireland, where she got him seized, and brought to Jedburgh. He was sentenced to be hanged on the 13th June, 1727. Before the sentence could be carried into execution, however, he contrived to break the jail, and once more made his escape. But his efforts to elude the long-breathed hatred of the avenger of blood were all in vain. He was retaken, and again lodged in jail, and at length, in August, 1728, Jean obtained a full reward for her toils, by enjoying the gratification of seeing the murderer hanged on the Gallow-hill.

From the time of James V. down to the present day, the Faas have been the hereditary monarchs of the Scottish Gipsies, and a number of curious anecdotes have been preserved respecting the manner in which these vagabond potentates wielded their sceptre. The intrigue of one of these sovereigns, the celebrated Johnnie Faa, with the Countess of Cassilis, has been commemorated in a fine old ballad, entitled "The Gipsy Laddie." According to popular tradition, the heroine of the story was Lady Jean Hamilton, a daughter of Thomas, first Earl of Haddington,¹ and wife of John, the sixth Earl of Cassilis. During the earl's absence, either in England or on a foreign embassy, Johnnie Faa came to Cassilis castle, a massive old tower on the banks of the Doon, in Ayrshire, and by means of his "glamourye" succeeded in persuading the countess to elope with him. Unluckily for the fugitives the earl returned shortly after their flight, and instantly collected his vassals, and set out in pursuit. Having overtaken the gipsies on the borders of England, a battle ensued, in which, overpowered by numbers, Johnnie Faa and his followers were all killed or taken prisoners. The survivors were brought back to Cassilis, and there hanged upon "the Dule Tree," a splendid and most umbrageous plane, which still flourishes upon a mound in front of the castle-gate. The room, from the window of which the countess, by a refinement of cruelty, was compelled to witness the dreadful scene, is still called "the Countess's Room." The unhappy lady was confined for the rest of her life in a tower at the village of Maybole. During her imprisonment she is said to have completely covered the walls of the mansion with tapestry. One of her daughters was afterwards married to the celebrated Bishop Burnet, but the family has been continued by the progeny of the earl's second wife. According to another version of the story, the hero of this adventure was not Johnnie Faa, who was king of the gipsies about the year 1590, but a Sir John Faa of Dunbar, to whom the lady was previously engaged, when her affections were shamefully violated by her forced marriage with the Earl of Cassilis. All are agreed, however, that the hapless lover, whether gallant knight or gipsy chief, was accompanied by a band of these desperate outcasts, and that the whole band perished excepting one,— —the meanest of them all,

Who lived to weep and sing their fall in the following strains:—

The gypsies came to our gude lord's yett,
And O, but they sang sweetly;
They sang sae sweet, and sae very complete,
That down came our fair lady.

And she came tripping down the stair,
And all her maids before her;
As soon as they saw her weel fa'ured face
They cuist the glamourye¹ ower her.

"O come with me," says Johnnie Faa,
"O come with me, my dearie;
For I vow and swear by the hilt of my sword
That your lord shall nae mair come near ye."

Then she gied them the gude wheat bread,
And they ga'e her the ginger;
But she gied them a far better thing,
The gowd ring aff her finger.

"Gae tak frae me this gay mantle,
And bring to me a plaidie,
For if kith and kin and a' had sworn I'd follow the gipsy laddie."

* * * *

And when our lord came hame at e'en,
And speir'd for his fair lady,
The tane she cried, and the other replied,
"She's away wi' the gipsy laddie."

"Gae saddle to me the black black steed,
Gae saddle and make him ready,
Before that I either eat or sleep
I'll gae seek my fair lady."

And we were fifteen weel-made men,
Although we were na bonnie,
And we were a' put down for ane,
A fair young wanton lady.

In concluding our sketch of this vagrant race, it is gratifying to be enabled to state that efforts have at length been made, with a view to their instruction and civilization, which bid fair to be crowned with success. According to the barbarous policy of former times, the gipsies were allowed to remain, from generation to generation, ignorant, demoralized, and degraded, without the slightest attempt being made to instruct or to reclaim them, although their crimes were all the while punished with unrelenting severity. Within these few years, however, under the influence of a wiser and more benevolent feeling, a different mode of dealing with them has been adopted. The practicability of reclaiming this hapless race has been fully demonstrated. The Rev. John Baird, minister of Yetholm, has long exerted himself in the most praiseworthy manner to improve the character and condition of his lawless parishioners, and he is now assisted in his benevolent labours by a society, which was formed for that purpose a few years ago, in Edinburgh. The plan followed is simply to keep the children at home during the excursions of their parents (who are absent usually about ten months out of the twelve), to give them a useful education, and afterwards to find situations for them as servants or apprentices. In this they have to some extent succeeded. They have now about forty children regularly at school, of whose conduct and progress the teacher reports favourably, and about thirty adults have been withdrawn from the vagabond life of their tribe, and are now in the fair way of becoming useful members of society. The reformation of a race so long beyond the pale of civilization must necessarily be a work of time, but the practicability of reclaiming them to the usages of civilized life has been demonstrated, and we trust the meritorious effort will not be relaxed till the gipsies have been elevated to their proper place among the ordinary population of the country.

(1) A species of magical illusion, which the gipsies were formerly believed to exercise.

MAJOR EDWARDES ON THE PUNJAB.*

MAJOR EDWARDES is already known to the English public as a valiant and facetious gentleman. A book of his writing will, therefore, be expected to be a graphic and sensible performance. Carlyle's theory, that a man who can fight well will also write well, appears to have reason in it, and is not indifferently illustrated in the present volumes. This "Year on the Punjab Frontier," contains a good deal of interesting information, intermingled with much lively description, entertaining anecdotes, sketches of notable individuals, incidents by flood and fire, hairbreadth 'scapes, and perilous adventures. To write what is called a "review" of it is nowise our present business or intention, inasmuch as we are persuaded that readers will prefer to see something of the work itself; portions of which we shall accordingly proceed to select for their edification and amusement, troubling them meanwhile with as little commentary as possible.

By way of beginning, it may not be amiss to set forth the author's reasons for publishing the work. In a straightforward and unpretending preface, he says—

 “The book is simply what it professes to be—the record of a busy year, on an important frontier, in a country, and at a crisis, which have excited the national attention of Englishmen. In writing it I have three objects in view; and I will put the most selfish first, to save any one else the trouble. 1. It is to put on record a victory which I myself remember with more satisfaction than any I helped to gain before Mooltan—the bloodless conquest of the wild valley of Bunnoo. It was gained neither by shot nor shell, but simply by balancing two races and two creeds. For fear of a Sikh army, two warlike and independent Mubommudan tribes levelled to the ground, at my bidding, the four hundred forts which constituted the strength of their country; and for fear of those same Mubommudan tribes, the same Sikh army, at my bidding, constructed a fortress for the Crown, which completed the subjugation of the valley. . . . 2. A second object is, to give my countrymen at home an insight into the actual life and labours of an Indian political officer. An indistinct notion prevails that ‘a political’ is a sort of person attached to Indian armies, to embarrass all military operations, and do his utmost to bring disgrace upon the British arms. Amongst other duties, political officers are generally attached to military expeditions; to interpret the political views of Government in sending them; to be the medium of all negotiations; and to assist the General with their local knowledge, and local influence. In a country so totally strange as India to the soldiers of her Majesty’s army, and so very partially known as it can ever be, even to those of the Honourable Company’s service, the practice is not only advantageous, but necessary. . . . 3. Lastly, I have been actuated by a desire to contribute my mite of local knowledge to the world’s common stock. . . . In the present work, I subscribe something towards a knowledge of the countries trans-Indus. If it is not all that could be wished, an indulgent reader will remember, that it was acquired in little more than ‘a year on the Punjab frontier;’ and that not a year of dillettante travelling, going where I listed to seek, and lingering where I found pleasant spots, with a mind at ease, time at command, and nothing to do but fill note-books with reflections; but a year of intense labour in great public duties, with never any certainty of life for four-and-twenty hours. Yet I find that what I collected in a year, I have been six months reducing into form—months I could ill spare from one year’s rest. . . . Within a few weeks of the publication of this book, I shall be again on my way to the ‘Punjab frontier;’ but I cannot bid adieu to England without telling all in it, nobles and commons, gentle and simple, how gratefully I have felt, how long I shall remember, how earnestly I will endeavour to deserve, the great kindness they have shown me. May the past and present alike strengthen me for the future.”

There is an introductory chapter, presenting “a rapid review” of the events which led to the occupation of Lahore by the British troops, and the appointment of a “British resident, having authority in the Sikh councils,” which the author deems needful to a right understanding of the work. From this we learn that the “British Resident,” appointed by Lord Hardinge, to “control and guide” the Sikh chiefs, after the establishment of a “Council of Regency,” was Sir Henry Lawrence; and that one of the first affairs to which his attention was called, in his capacity of President of the Council, was the “Revenue of Bunnoo.” The British officer whom the Resident had intended to associate with the Sikh commander as colleague and adviser, was Lieutenant Nicholson; “but,” says Major Edwardes, “as he could not be spared from the duties on which he was engaged, I was ultimately chosen to take his place in the Bunnoo expedition; an accident to which I am indebted for many opportunities and honours which would have fallen far more happily on my friend.” This was in the middle of February, 1847. The object of the expedition was to induce the Bunnoochees to pay revenue. The Major says he had hardly a month allowed him to talk over an independent people, who had resisted the Sikh supremacy for a quarter of a century; and he thinks it is not very surprising that he signally failed in the attempt. He says:—

“We entered Bunnoo on the 15th of March, and were burnt out of it by the sun on the 1st of May. Of a lakh and three-quarters of rupees of revenue, due from the valley, we had collected only half a lakh; and as to a peaceable settlement for the future (that is to say, an engagement on the part of the people to pay anything annually of their own free will), we had fully ascertained that it was hopeless.” It was not until a second visit that the author accomplished the objects mentioned in the preface.

He does not consider, however, that the expedition was quite fruitless, but that certain ends were gained by it which could not have been so readily gained otherwise. We must not stay with him to enter into particulars concerning his proceedings, but, skipping a great deal of descriptive and other matter, cast about for something which may be read with interest in a detached shape. The following, at page 71 of the first volume, seems not inapplicable, and will introduce us to a strange state of society:—

“The Bunnoochees do not constitute the entire population of Bunnoo, and the reader would have a very imperfect idea of its people and social state; if I omitted to mention three classes of men whose influence materially affects the valley. These are the Oolumá, or religious characters; the Hindoos, and the Vizeeree interlopers.

“A well educated man will, in all probability, be religious; but an ignorant one is certain to be superstitious. A more utterly ignorant and superstitious people than the Bunnoochees I never saw. The vilest jargon was to them pure Arabic from the blessed Koran, the clumsiest imposture a miracle, and the fattest fakeer a saint. The myriads of holy vagabonds, who are the spawn of the prophet, found in the Bunnoochees an easy prey, and in their fertile fields a luxurious livelihood. 'Where the carcass is, there are the eagles gathered together.' Far and near from the ungrateful hills around, the Moollah and the Kâzee, the Peor and the Syud, descended to the smiling vale armed in a panoply of spectacles and owl-like looks, miraculous rosaries, infallible amulets, and tables of descent from Muhommud. Each new comer, like St. Peter, held the keys of heaven; and the whole, like Irish beggars, were equally prepared to bless or curse to all eternity him who gave or who withheld. These were 'air-drawn daggers,' against which the Bunnoochee peasant had no defence. For him the whistle of the far-thrown bullet, or the nearer sheen of his enemy's 'shumsheer' had no terrors; blood was simply a red fluid; and to remove a neighbour's head at the shoulder, as easy as cutting cucumbers. But to be cursed in Arabic, or anything that sounded like it; to be told that the blessed prophet had put a black mark against his soul, for not giving his best field to one of the Prophet's own posterity; to have the saliva of a disappointed saint left in anger on his door-post; or behold a Hâjee, who had gone three times to Mecca, deliberately sit down and enchant his camels with the itch, and his sheep with the rot; these were things which made the dagger drop out of the hand of the awe-stricken savage, his knees to knock together, his liver to turn to water, and his parched tongue to be scarce able to articulate a full and complete concession of the blasphemous demand. Even the weak kings of Cabul availed themselves of these fears, and long after they had ceased to draw secular revenue from Bunnoo, found no difficulty in quartering on any of the tuppels the superfluous saints of Cabul.

"It is no wonder, therefore, that when I came to register the lands, I found one-sixth of Bunnoo in the grasp of the Oolumá. Out of 278 forts registered in the richest parts of the valley, no less than 44 were, in the spring of 1848, the immediate property of religious characters. Indirectly, their possessions were far wider. Exempted from all tribute themselves, (for neither did the lay Mullick ever dare to take title for himself from the Oolumá, nor assess them for the Sikh invader,) these privileged classes soon grew rich, and began to put their savings out to usury. The Bunnoochee landowners, notwithstanding the natural fertility of their country, were poor. Every two or three years the Sikh army harried their fields, trod down their harvests, burnt their houses, and inflicted injuries which it took the intervals of peace to repair; and in these intervals the Bunnoochee Mullick, too ignorant to estimate his own titles, farmed them to a sharp Hindoo trader, and spent the produce in debauchery, indifferent if the Hindoo who had paid him fifty per cent., exacted two hundred per cent. from the people. To meet all these demands, the landowner was too often obliged to borrow; and his neighbour, the Syud, so illiterate, that he could not read the Koran of his great ancestor, could at least plead utter ignorance that the sacred volume prohibits usury to good Muhommudans. He lent his money to the distressed Bunnoochee, and took some land in mortgage until the debt was paid. Whatever burdens that land was liable to in the community, whether title to the Mullick, or black mail to the Sikh, were defrayed by the unhappy landlord, while his holy creditor enjoyed the crops."

The Hindoos are the Jews of Cabul and the Punjab regions; the brokers and money-changers who make themselves generally useful to such of the inhabitants as have landed and cash affairs to manage; and with a Jew's sagacity they usually contrive to turn most of the concerns committed to them, to a private and personal advantage. In Bunnoo, however, they appear to be peculiarly degraded, and are subjected to many restrictions and spoliations. A few of the Major's sentences about them may be here inserted:—

"Once when I was encamped in the Sooraunce tuppels, two half-buried human bodies were discovered, whose wounds bore evidence to the violence of their death. I was afraid they were some of my own men, and instant inquiry was made in camp; when some Bunnoochees came forward to explain that they were 'only two Hindoos, who had gone out without a guard to collect some debts!' No Hindoo in Bunnoo was permitted to wear a turban, that being too sacred a symbol of Muhommudanism; and a small cottonskull-cap was all that they had to protect their brains from the keen Bunnoo sun. When they came into our camp they made a holiday of it, brought a turban in their pockets, and put it on with childish delight when they got inside the lines. If any Hindoo wished to celebrate a marriage in his family, he went to his Mullick for a licence as regularly as an English gentleman to Doctors' Commons, and had to hire the Mullick's soldiers also to guard the procession, and fire a feu de joie. Notwithstanding all these outward dangers and disabilities, the Hindoo in his inmost soul might hold 'high carnival,' for assuredly he was the moral victor over his Muhommudan masters. I do not remember a single chief in Bunnoo who could either read or write, and, what is much rarer among natives, very few indeed could make a mental calculation. Every chief, therefore, kept Hindoos about his person as general agents and secretaries. Bred up to love money from his cradle, the common Hindoo cuts his first tooth on a rupee, wears a gold mohur round his neck for an amulet, and has cowry shells (the lowest denomination of his god) given him to play with on the floor. The multiplication-table, up to one hundred times one hundred, is his first lesson; and out of school he has two pice (half-pence) given to him to take to the bazaar and turn into an anna before he gets his dinner; thus educated, Hindoos, of all others, are the best adapted for middle-men, and the Bunnoochee Mullick found in them a useful but double-edged tool. They calculated the tithes due to him from the tuppel, and told him a false total much under the real one; they then offered to buy them from him and cheated him dreadfully; and lastly, they collected the tithes from the people who were equally ignorant, and took one hundred for fifty, backed by the soldiers of the very Mullick to whom they had given fifty for one hundred. If the landowner was distressed, the Hindoo competed with the Muhommudan priest for the honour of relieving him with a loan upon his land; and if the debt was afterwards repudiated, he easily obtained justice by bribing his friend the Mullick."

Concerning the "Vizeerees interlopers," and how they became established in Bunnoo, we shall be able to quote nothing, though they are rather an interesting people. Neither can we follow the Major in his account of his manifold and active efforts to organize the different interests of the population, and to establish peaceful arrangements in the territory which he had to govern. That he had no easy work of it, an "exciting incident," which shall be given next, will tend to show:—

"After transacting cutcherry (office) business for an hour or two, I was sitting with Swahn Khan, Vizeeree, and his interpreter, talking over Bunnoo affairs, when the cry arose that 'Swords were going!' Swahn Khan having no arms (according to camp rules), bolted out of the tent; while his 'man Friday' began dancing about, wringing his hands, and ejaculating: 'Oh! that I had now a sword! This is the evil of taking away men's proper tools!' Having, ever since the first attempt of this kind, kept a double-barrelled pistol on my table, I now cocked both barrels, and walked outside, for the row had grown quite deafening, and I thought there must be a dozen Ghazees at least; in which case one person inside a tent fourteen feet square would stand but a poor chance. Scarcely had I got out at one door, than the Ghazee¹ (for there proved to be only one) forced his way through the sentries and chuprassess (official messengers), and entered my tent at the other door. Hearing the rush, I turned round, and could see through the screens of the tent a Bunnoochee, with a naked sword, plunging after me like a mad bull. (The outside door of an Indian tent turns up, and is supported on props during the day, as a kind of porch, to keep off the sun. It is very low, and I knew that the Ghazee must stoop as he came out, so here I took my stand.) His turban was knocked off in stooping at the door, and when he stood up outside, he glared round for his victim like a tiger who had missed his spring. Then his eyes met mine; and seeing no resource, I fired one barrel into his breast. The shock nearly knocked him down, for there could not have been two feet between us. He staggered, but did not fall; and I was just thinking of firing the other barrel at his head, when a stream of soldiers and camp-followers, with all kinds of weapons, rushed in and bore away the wretch some twenty yards towards a native's tent, into which, hacked and chopped in every direction, he contrived to crawl; but was followed up, and was so mangled by the indignant crowd before my people could interfere, that I wonder he survived a minute. He only lingered, however, till night, in spite of the remedies which the native doctor, by my orders, applied to him. The rage of the soldiery was beyond description, and I had great difficulty in preventing his being carried off to be burnt alive. Even late in the evening a deputation came to say that it was apparent the Ghazee could not live out the night, and 'had he not better be hanged at once, while he had any life in him?' I said, 'No; let him die; the example will be just as great, perhaps greater, if his body is exposed on the gallows afterwards.'

"My tent, immediately after this startling occurrence, was besieged by the officers and soldiers, some half naked, just as they had rushed from the fort works when they heard my pistol, and it was really quite sufficient compensation for the danger, to see the unfeigned anxiety of the men, and hear their loud greetings and congratulations. All discipline was lost in such a moment of strong feeling. Thirty swords at least, covered with blood, were held out among the crowd, and as many voices shouted, 'I hit the dog this way!' 'I cut him that!' And certainly they had not left much of him untouched, though they had been too much in each other's way to deal very fatal blows. Then came all the officers and sirdars of the force, throwing down nuzzurs and whirling money round my head, as is their custom on occasions of triumph or deliverance, and the sun set before I could get rid of the assembly. The worst part of the whole business is, that the Ghazee slashed one of my ayees (grooms) most severely before he entered my tent, and I am afraid he is anything but out of danger. The poor fellow was cooking his dinner, and the cowardly rascal sliced him with his tulwár all down the back."

We are treating the Major's book as a sort of quarry, wherein it is our business to hew stones. Here is one, rather queer-looking, which the reader may admire or not, as he finds himself inclined:—

"In the course of some other business, Ursula Khan, a fine young lad, sixteen years old, son of one of the Sooraunee Mullicks, came in to impart to me his own and his father's uneasiness about past murders.

"'What,' he asked, 'is to be the law?'

"I asked him jokingly, 'What does it signify to a lad like you? How many men have you killed?'

"He replied, modestly, 'Oh! I've only killed four, but father has killed eighty!'

"One gets accustomed to this state of society, but in England what monsters of cruelty would this father and son be considered. Indeed, few people would like to be in the same room with them. Yet, ceteris paribus, in Bunnoo they are rather respectable men."

It will thus be seen that the standard of respectability differs widely in different latitudes. Bunnoochee manners, again, are somewhat singular: the same Ursula Khan one day begged to be allowed to sit upon the carpet, and contemplate the Major's countenance, as he had fallen in love with him! The

(1) A Ghazee is a sort of Muhommudan Crusader—one who "devotes his life to fighting for the faith, and spilling the blood of infidels."—Vol. i. p. 156.

Major, however, is obviously right in saying, "The only way to take these things is philosophically. It is of no use to get angry, where no offence is intended." It might seem a little more difficult to bear with Oriental notions of humanity, respecting which we have here a rather curious anecdote. One Nizamoodden (a spy) informed our author that—

"He saw one poor man, a beggar, kneading some flour that had been given him in charity. A Douree¹ drew his sword and cut his head off. The bystanders asked what he did that for? He replied, 'Poor devil! life was a burden to him. With what difficulty he got that bread?' ("The very principle," says the Major, "upon which gentlemen in England shoot their old pet dogs and horses, and some tribes of Indians eat their grey-headed fathers and mothers.")

One of the privations to a serious man attendant upon a camp life in such a region as Bunnoo, is the constrained neglect of religious services; yet it seems there are English officers who, even under such unfavourable circumstances, make a point of reading the Church of England Liturgy on Sundays, whenever opportunity permits. Major Edwardes does not profess to have adopted this practice, nor does he seem to have particularly thought of it, until once, in February 1848, his friend Taylor wrote to him to inquire whether he observed the custom, and if not, whether he would be willing to do so, and thereby allow a certain Colonel Holmes (hitherto supposed by the Major to be a sort of nondescript in his religion) to participate in the advantages of the ordinance. What is said about Holmes and his relations to Christianity is rather curious, and seems worthy of transcribing:—

"If I knew that Colonel Holmes was a Christian at all, I certainly was not aware that he had any feeling about Christian duties, or had been in the habit of attending divine service at the house of Major George Lawrence at Peshawer. I thought that General Cortlandt and myself were the solitary members of our Church in that wild region; and if it never occurred to either him or me that it would be well to read together, I trust it was from no indifference to the sabbath itself. Indeed the suspension of the fort works upon that day, though a matter of necessity, and perhaps life and death, sufficiently proclaimed its sacred character in our eyes to both Hindoos and Muhommudans.

"And now that Taylor proposed to me to claim Holmes as a Christian, and ask him to join our service, it startled me.

"Colonel Holmes, or as he was commonly called by the Sikh soldiers, 'John Holmes, Saliib,' was a half-caste who had served in the Company's native army as a musician, but left it, and carried his knowledge of European drill across the Sutlej, to Lahore, where he speedily rose to be an officer, and was now the colonel of a regiment of regular infantry. He could talk English, and did his military duty well. He also professed Christianity; but there was much excuse for any one not knowing this, as he lived like a Mu-hommudan, probably, 'as his father before him;' for in a petition for pension presented to government after the colonel's death, there were, if I rightly remember, set down in the catalogue of his surviving family, the extraordinary items of 'three mothers and two wives!' This was quite consistent with the manners of the native soldiers among whom he lived, and was obnoxious to neither Muhommudan or Hindoo, so long as he passed for one or the other, or was known by both not to be a Christian. But if we claimed him as a Christian, it would not fail to incur scandal, as the general principles and ordinances of Christianity are well known to all Asiatics, and with reference especially to marriage, are gladly supposed by them to be very indifferently observed.

"Such at least was my feeling on the point; and I attempted to bring Taylor to the same opinion. But he was too good to be ashamed of anybody; and though much better aware of Holmes's character than I was, and how little likely he was to reflect credit upon us, he still thought we might reflect some good on him. 'What chance,' he said, 'is there of his becoming better, if you exclude him from your congregation? and how can we tell at what moment the hearing of the truth may take effect upon him?' So that it was for the pure sake of doing religious good that Taylor battled; and I was so struck with the charity and generosity of the motive that I gave way; we had prayers in my tent, and Taylor was happy."

From Colonel Holmes and the catholic-minded Major Taylor, let us turn to another notability who appears in these pages—Shah Niwaz Khan, not quite unknown by name to Europeans, and whose fortunes furnish us with an instance of the singular vicissitudes to which the lives of persons of distinction in the East are liable. It may not be amiss to state that this young chieftain was natural heir to the sovereignty of the province or country called Tâk, but had been deprived of his territories by Sikh aggression.

"By one of those singular accidents," says the Major, "which give interest to a stirring life, I, who was to have charge of the Upper Dérâjât, met this young exiled chief, in the winter of 1846, in the hills of Jummoo, upwards of three hundred miles from Tâk . . . One morning, my moonshec introduced two Puthâns, who, he said, were in distress. They were dressed in the commonest white clothing, and had an air of misery mingled with 'ashamed to beg.' They talked of places I had never heard of, across the Indus, and of events of which I was ignorant; but I gathered that they had seen better days, and, without attending much to the story, gave them ten rupees between them. They took the money gratefully, and departed; and I saw them no more, till February of the following year, when I was ordered to proceed in charge of the first expedition to Bunnoo.

"Again my two Puthân petitioners appeared, and asked to be allowed to go with me, as their native country was also across the Indus, and they would fain visit their homes again, if they might do so under my protection. Moreover, their wives and families had taken refuge in Bunnoo, and perhaps they might be of service to me. I consented, and we all left Lahore together. On the march, I naturally busied myself with seeking information about the countries we were going to; and, during the heat of the day, collected a knot of natives round me, in the shade of a tree, and deliberately picked their brains. It was in one of these conversations that our talk brought us to Tâk, and, with my finger on the map, I asked who knew anything about that country? One of the two Pathâns modestly lifted up his head and said: 'My father was once king of it!' It was indeed Shah Niwaz Khan, Khuttykheyi, the son of that Alladad from whom the Sikhs had taken Tâk; and grandson of that Surwur who had brought streams from the mountains to fertilize it, and turn its desert plain into a richly cultivated land.

"As his tale unfolded, I thought of my miserable ten rupees at Jummo, and felt deeply grieved at having given such paltry relief to such great misfortunes. On inquiry, I found he had had no food for two days, after selling his arms and a few remaining ornaments; so I ordered him five hundred rupees out of the treasury, and sent him on rejoicing to Bunnoo, to see his exiled family, and bring me tidings from the valley."

After reading the above, the reader will probably be gratified to learn that Shah Niwaz Khan was subsequently re-established in his possessions. It became by-and-by a question, What was to be done with Tâk? and the question was ultimately settled thus:—

"I was then, and am still, of opinion that a people is almost always more justly ruled and better off under the British Government, than under their own native chiefs; but I was equally of opinion, from my own personal observation, that a Muhommudan tribe is infinitely happier under its own Khan, even if he be below par, than under a bigoted Sikh official. For this reason, now that Tâk was no longer to be a jageer, but to be governed by a Sikh Kârdâr, I unhesitatingly begged the Resident to give the charge to Shah Niwaz. He would, it is true, no longer be an independent prince like his father, and he would have to collect revenue for the Sikhs instead of for himself; but it would make him well off in worldly circumstances, it would restore him to his home and country, and it would place over the people a grandson of that Surwur Khan, whose memory was so dear to them, and whose laws they were always regretting . . .

"The proposal pleased Sir Henry Lawrence, who valued power only for the good it enabled him to do; and though the measure was vehemently opposed by the Sikh Chancellor, who prophesied a rebellion, and discountenanced even by the timid Tej Sing, who went so far as to shake his head in open council, poor Shah Niwaz Khan, who yesterday had no clothes, received a dress of honour (not much moth-eaten), and was despatched with a bounding and grateful heart, to administer the government of his native country."

Here we must pass from the first volume, which is devoted to the Punjab countries in a state of peace, and go over to the second, which deals with the same countries in a state of war. To tell the whole story of revolution, devastation, and the final establishment of order and British domination on the Punjab, is of course impossible for us here: readers desiring to be sufficiently informed on these matters must consult the Major's book for themselves; the utmost we can do is to draw here and there a passage—odd specimen bricks, as it were, which may show the nature of the building material, but can give no conception of the architectural design. The first thing of the sort that comes to hand, is the following legend of a holy man of Mooltan, which seems to be piously accredited in that city:—

"Mooltan is surrounded by groves of date-trees, and the most beautiful gardens, which are doubly pleasing to the eye, as both adorning its appearance, and bearing witness to its wealth. The mangoes produced in these gardens are, perhaps, the most delicious in India, except those of Mazagâon at Bombay. Oranges, pomegranates, and peaches, are likewise produced in profusion, and better than in Hindostan.

"Mooltan probably owes these fruits to a sun ever burning above, and canals ever flowing below. Its heat is immortalized by some malicious visitor in a miserable couplet which no translation can spoil:

'Churchyards, beggars, dust, and heat,
Are the four best things at Mooltan you'll meet.'

"The churchyards, beggars, and dust are not to be denied by the most patriotic Mooltanees; but are explained away into evidences of sanctity, wealth, and traffic. The heat, which is equally incontestable, is thus accounted for. Once upon a time, there lived at Mooltan a holy man, called Peer Shumsh. His thoughts were in heaven, so he kept no kitchen; but when he happened to be hungry, he, in all simplicity, begged a dinner. One day he was seized with hunger in the city, very near a butcher's; so he begged, and received a chop; for the butcher was a good Muhommudan. Peer Shumsh went on to a cook-shop, and laying his chop on the girdle, said in an absent way: 'Cook that for the love of Muhommud!' The cook was a bad man, and did not care a sheep's tail for Muhommud; so he just took the chop, and threw it into Shumsh's face! There is no doubt if the outraged Shumsh had prayed for the whole city of Mooltan to be swallowed up by an earthquake, it would have happened; but to his everlasting honour, he did not. He mildly picked up the chop, and turning his eyes towards the sun, implored that luminary to supply what man denied. The sun, to the consternation of all Mooltan, descended three degrees, and cooked the chop of Peer Shumsh to a turn; after which, as an everlasting punishment to the city, the sun never went back; but continues to the present day, a burning example to all young Muhommudans, three degrees nearer to Mooltan than to any other city in Asia!

"But the reader must not suppose that Peer Shumsh has spoiled the climate."

While we are in the neighbourhood of Mooltan, let us take a glance at Dewan Sawun Mull, "a man of mind," whom Runjeet Sing appointed to the government of the province in 1821, and who ruled there until his death in 1844. We are informed that during these twenty-three years, Sawun Mull, by his great executive abilities, raised Mooltan to a higher state of prosperity than it had ever before attained; and while giving satisfaction to his government by regular remittances of revenue, he contrived to accumulate a handsome fortune for himself. The worthy Dewan was not without his failings, as will presently appear, and it seems he had some great advantages which former governors had not; but still it is Major Edwardes's opinion that he was really a great governor, and as native governors go, a very good one. Newspaper readers may remember that he was the father of the famous, but feeble, Moolraj, who raised the insurrection in Mooltan.
