Mr. Hade thought the House should hear Mr. Grines before coadening him. He thought that the first resolution should be rejected, because he believed that it had far object to condomn the indivitual. The second should be adopted, for it would give him the means of defending himse'f. Mr. Roussel thought that the adoption of the first resolu

Mr. Sparks said that the object of these resolutions was to being to the bar an individual, and to decide whether he was you ty or not; he thought the House should not express en origin without first examining fully the question. He thought if the House adopted the first resolution, the point would be decided, and it would be unnecessary to have Mr.

first resolution, because he thought the House should give t the world some explanations in regard to the nature of this measure. He was of opinion that this resolution, with the amendment of the gen leman from Rapides was sufficient in detail to explain the conduct of this house. He thought inorcover, that it was necessary to establish for principle, that the House had the right to punish attacks upon its digraty; for, in cff. ct, what would the people whom we represenied say, if we do not know how to make our station respected. According to his opinion, the first resolution wano more than a simple declaration of what the House considered an attack upon its rights: - He saw no inconvenience that could result from its ade, tion.

Mr. Montegut thought the House had no right to adopt resolutions similar to these. This fact should be known, it was for the Attorney General to prosecute this affair, If there were grounds for the accusation. He thought all the House could do, was to ascertain what had taken place, and to charge that officer with the duty of taking the proper steps. The House was not in session; there condition therefore no breach of its privileges. It was that the privilege which this House was at present called upon to maintain, was a privilege that belonged to every del berative body, to all the tribupals, and moreover. that the bringing up to this bat, of any individual, did not preclude the attorney general from procecuting before the Criminal Court, if he rendered himself amends.

The amendment of Mr. Winn was adopted, togethe with the first resolution.

A substitute to the second resolution was presented by Mr. Montegut, having for object, to transmit to Mr Grymes, a copy of the report, and to invite him to be pre sent at the bar of the house, was rejected.

The second resolution was adopted, together with ar smendent, requiring the clerk to furnish a copy of the Upon motion, the House adjourned until to-morrow
